[dropcap]T[/dropcap]he Senate Judiciary Committee recently held a hearing on the reauthorization of the Violence Against Women Act. Americans certainly should do all we can to stop partner aggression…but does that mean it's fine to batter the truth?

In order to convince over-burdened taxpayers to pony up the nearly $400 million for VAWA's wide-ranging criminal justice programs, proponents have tucked into the law a series of alarming findings designed to play on the chivalrous impulses of male lawmakers…and the darkest fears of their female constituents.

[box type="note" icon="none"]To put the issue into perspective, every good study has found that women are as likely as men to haul off and slap, kick, or punch their partners. And when women are maimed, more often than not, it's the female who started the melee.[/box]

Professor Martin Fiebert at California State University has compiled the results of over 250 studies, concluding "women are as physically aggressive, or more aggressive, than men in their relationships with their spouses or male partners." The problem is especially worrisome with high school girls who, according to the U.S. Centers for Disease Control, are 25% more likely than boys to be the instigators of partner abuse.

So welcome to the world of VAWA-land, where statistics are blithely sliced, diced, and cherry-picked to the point that they bear little resemblance to the truth. Here's just a sampling from the make-believe smorgasbord….

First, the over-wrought generalizations. One of the VAWA findings avers, "One out of every 3 Indian women are raped in their lifetimes." But that statistic is based on the responses gathered from a grand total of…ready for this?…88 women.

Second, the creative mangling of the truth. VAWA claims, "There is a strong link between domestic violence and homelessness. Among cities surveyed, 44 percent identified domestic violence as a primary cause of homelessness." But according to the U.S. Conference of Mayors report that is the basis of the claim, domestic violence is only the fifth leading cause of homelessness.

[quote style="boxed" float="right"]The CDC says the actual percentage is less than 1%. But hey, when we're talking about a subject as important as domestic violence, any number will do.[/quote] Next come the weasel words. One finding states solemnly, "the former United States Advisory Board on Child Abuse suggests that domestic violence may be the single major precursor to child abuse and neglect fatalities." But according to the far more authoritative National Incidence Study of Child Abuse and Neglect, children living in single-parent households face an 80% higher risk of experiencing serious injury or harm from neglect. In other words, breaking up a family on account of minor abuse constitutes a far greater risk to kids than the initial incident of partner abuse.

Then we come to the one-sided claims: "40% of girls ages 14 to 17 report knowing someone their age who has been hit or beaten by a boyfriend." Shocking indeed, except it fails to mention the percentage of teenage boys who know of someone assaulted by a girlfriend, which is somewhere in the neighborhood of 40%.

This brings us to the gross misrepresentations: "Each year about 324,000 pregnant women in the United States are battered by the men in their lives. This battering leads to complications of pregnancy, including low weight gain, anemia, infections, and first and second trimester bleeding."

Outrageous? Now do you want to hear what the research really says? According to the analysis published by Julie Gazmararian in the Maternal and Child Health Journal, in her words, "we can estimate that between 152,000 and 324,000 women experience violence during their pregnancies."

So VAWA conveniently omits the fact that the actual number may be 152,000, not 324,000. And most incidents of "violence" consist of a minor shove or slap – a far cry from what most people think of as "battering."

Ready for the galloping falsehood? “37% of all women who sought care in hospital emergency rooms for violence-related injuries were injured by a current or former spouse, boyfriend, or girlfriend,” the VAWA finding screams. But the US Centers for Disease Control says the actual percentage is less than 1%. But hey, when we’re talking about a subject as important as domestic violence, any number will do.

And now the grand finale, the gender vilification: “in a national survey of more than 6,000 American families, 50% of men who frequently assaulted their wives also frequently abused their children.” This claim is based on the 1985 National Family Violence Survey. Look closely at Table 14.2 of that study, and you’ll see that child abuse rates for abusive moms and dads are nearly identical.

Overall, VAWA contains dozens of alarming findings that depict a nation of women besieged by loathsome men incapable of containing their abusive impulses. Each year the federal government spends $84 million on domestic violence education and training programs that spew flawed statistics, one-sided claims, and undeserved stereotypes.

It’s time we stop the misinformation and hate.

Innocence Deferred Until Judged

J Galt · 16 August 2011 · Archived copy · Original

[box type="alert" icon="none"]A Thank you To Typhonblue:[/box]

[dropcap]I [/dropcap]initially read her piece when it was posted back in May and found it so profound and powerful I was unable to comment at the time. In fact, I started to write this piece and stopped. Her article, "My name is Typhonblue and I am a survivor of rape hysteria," was very emotional for me and had the effect of shaking a can of soda and then opening it. Or maybe it's better to say that I had very many thoughts that had never connected and reading her article caused a new orb of understanding.

I have spent some time looking at that orb and remembering. I tag that new orb as "innocence." I am very appreciative for the insight, sensitivity and courage of Typhoneblue. With much respect I offer these thoughts and memories.

[quote style="boxed" float="left"]A result of abuse is the residual doubt of self-worth. What am I now worth to my abuser? What am I worth to the witness's and what am I worth to myself?[/quote] I understand the politics of her article, the transition an injured person will go through to believe and to feel safe again. Popular thought can become a personal belief and produce a result that strangely removes individuality.

Empathy can be a twist to safety that is more apt to project itself onto a vulnerable person. We talk about empathy as if having it makes all the difference, but how we apply it is really the issue.

I will console you. As I hear your pain the consolation I offer is my anger, not yours; take it and be strong. This is emotional triage, not emotional medicine. It is a job half done. Your wound is prioritized but not addressed. Next! The words from one who "empathizes" can be as assaulting as the initial wound and you become lost in the waiting room of the injured. I have often heard women bemoan men for not having empathy. I believe men have a profound empathy that expresses itself in a very different and masculine way.

I was raised in violence, the extent of which I do not wish to fully share. Here's why: Abuse is seen as intended injury. A result of abuse is the residual doubt of self-worth. What am I now worth to my abuser? What am I worth to the witness's and what am I worth to myself? One who empathizes becomes a witness and offers a response to those doubts of self-worth. Empathy speaks only to the portion of the experience that the injured and abused is able to define. But it's never complete and it is impossible to communicate emotional confusion. The experience is too complex. The injured is consoled for their powerlessness and offered "empowerment" as a consolation for their innocence, but this is not empathy.

This empowerment is too often awarded as an entitlement

It is a reckless device of intention that hurts more than it heals. If personal justice is answered by empowered entitlement how will we see the difference between social justice and personal justice? When do we cross the line? When does the pain and fear of one equal another? Will we simply compete as victims for our share of entitlement and personal justice? Will we measure ourselves only by degradation? is this our collective dream? Is this the answer to our doubts of self-worth, to be occupied by an entitlement offered by anyone but ourselves?

Will we measure innocence by entitlement? Maybe we already do.

If I stand naked in the street am I entitled to be noticed? If I'm not noticed in the ways I expect, am I entitled to something more? What if I light myself on fire, what then of social justice, entitlement, innocence or personal justice? When does one equal the other? When do self-enabled bureaucrats listen to the truth instead of telling us what it is and using our money to too fund the lie? When does self-immolation equal a slut-walk?

Is it even possible to consider that personal justice, entitlement and the healing of life's wounds are inside of us and accessible? Can we only be healed by entitlements budgeted by a bureaucrat that attempts to award us our significance with our own monies. Then justify their own entitlement by praising themselves with more of our money. When would they become aware if or when they cross the line of social justice? Why the fuck would they care? Just who would stop them? Should we protest, riot, burn it all down to get their attention?

I was ten, standing in the kitchen about five feet from the stairway to the basement. My seven year old foster sister's room was next to it. She stepped out of her room and said she wanted to show me something and started backing up. She must have thought she was backing up into her room, but she was pointed at the stairs and just kept going. Every step she took backward I took one forward. I saw what was coming. I realized that my motion was influencing hers, but I couldn't stop. If I did she might continue.

It happened in seconds and I saw it all, even the subtlety of my influence. She fell backward in a reverse swan dive; I reached forward, grabbed her night gown at the chest and stopped her fall just before she hit her head and hauled her back up to her feet. Her mother screamed – her father came running in the room. He saw me at the top of the stairs grabbing her. I got a left hook to the head that almost turned my lights out and I felt myself flying through the air. He wrapped me around a door frame that finished me off. He saw clearly the innocence of his daughter he simply failed to look for mine.

I can see his. Can you?

A family member once confided in me an experience of sexual assault and I felt the immediate urge to console, but didn't. Instead I asked how the experience had influenced their perspective and listened closely to the response. I was saddened by the anger I heard; anger directed toward others that were uninvolved. I responded by saying "you're safe now that you're equal to your attacker." I was met with a look of disbelief accompanied by an angry response asking "how can you possibly compare me to that piece of shit".

"I don't" I said "but you do." The anger was thick in the reply, "Really? how the fuck do you figure that?" I paused, and then spoke. "Obviously, you didn't expect to be assaulted or attacked. In those circumstances you were innocent and unaware. You're angry now at others that weren't involved. Your parents, your family, and even people you've never met. Your anger is an attack they don't expect or understand. You are attacking their innocence. You want your innocence back; the beliefs you had before this happened. You believed you were safe and protected and you want those beliefs back; the innocence of those beliefs. But you can't get it from the people you believed would protect you, because they didn't."

[quote style="boxed" float="right"]Disdain, contempt, disrespect, scorn, resentment – these are lesser forms of anger. They are less confrontational and easier to deny. [/quote] "The world has changed for you and it is no longer safe. You've lost the innocence of your beliefs in an unnatural way, abruptly, with nothing to replace them. Nobody can survive the fear they experience when their beliefs are abruptly removed. Anger is the best defense to protect any innocence that remains. Anger, and its lesser forms, ignore all innocence except its own. If you care to challenge your beliefs if you can see the connection between innocence and anger. It's interesting to consider that anger is looking for its own innocence. Your anger ignores the innocence of your parents just as an attacker ignores the innocence of their victims. You are now equal to your attacker."

I was asked what I meant by angers lesser forms, likely to avoid the message. Disdain, contempt, disrespect, scorn, resentment – these are lesser forms of anger. They are less confrontational and easier to deny. They are more socially acceptable forms of anger, malice, hatred and assault. These are ways we partition ourselves from life to protect ourselves and the beliefs we have. It is a default method of parenting ourselves when our parents do not complete the mission we assign to them. You could say that anger is a way to express our disbelief or the loss of our beliefs and our innocence as we attempt to mature.

[image]Innocence is a muscle like any other. Without participation and exercise it will atrophy; it will not mature. Innocence is metered by the ability to mature. It should mature with you and with your experiences and without it we are quickly disillusioned, disappointed and easily assaulted. You cannot sustain a life under the constant assault of disillusion. You will not be accepted by the people you assault in response. If you want your innocence back you will have to exercise it, challenge it and let it work. A knife will not sharpen itself and we do not value unpolished gems.

Whether you understand or not, like it or not, you're challenged to let go of the beliefs of your childhood. We are all accountable for our beliefs and the innocence they represent. The world can be dangerous for anyone, but your beliefs will cause you to expect it not to be. When you are entitled you will not ask questions that may protect you and keep you safe. You may dangerously assign that responsibility to others.

It is worth knowing that you're not alone. Most people are engaged in the same process of maturing and suffer all kinds of assault, disillusionment and fear. Life is most fragile for people that cling to their beliefs and build expectations with them. I'm no different. I have fallen and got back up more times than I can remember, because I could. Empathy should never try to reinstall the entitlement of beliefs that are removed from an assault or an injury of any kind.

I consider this against the childishness of feminism and its naïve struggle to return to innocent entitlement. I see feminist men and women longing for their childhood and their innocence, and promising it to each other like damsels and knights in a fairytale. When I am assaulted with anger that won't abate from injured women, I remember that I am not your perpetrator. I owe you nothing more than you owe yourself, least of all your innocence. I can't provide your innocence and there is no going back.

When I read that men turn away from marriage, I know they have surrendered very deep beliefs and left behind their own innocence for their safety. I see MRA's teaching and educating with insight and maturity for men to accept change and define it for themselves. I am left once again to consider equality and the joke it represents. The childish feminist ranting's for more and bigger portions, to hell with the cost.

There is nothing progressive about feminism. It's as traditional as hate, greed and childhood.

Feminism is simply an immature tribalism, incapable of respecting an autonomous individual and yet to evolve a cosmopolitan concept that exceeds narcissism or institutional breast feeding. It is an outdated temper tantrum due for a very serious time out. Their politics are a simplistic attempt to enlarge the prison kitchen in which they shackle themselves to all corners of the world. Evidenced by their ever popular mantra "you can have it all."

As I stand out here in the world I would like to remind them, this isn't your kitchen you elitist fuck, and if that victimizes you, please remember I'm not your therapist, bodyguard or personal cop. I find it quite hard to respect childlike innocence in the body of an adult.

AVfM Radio tonight: Medical Misandry

Paul Elam · 16 August 2011 · Archived copy · Original

[box type="note" style="rounded" icon="none"]

Take two blue pills and call me when you're compliant.

Just a scant look between the lines and you can tell one thing for certain about President Obama's idea of "universal" healthcare. It's anything but universal. In fact, it is saturated with sex-based privilege for women financed with a swift kick in the pants to men and boys.

But is that really anything new, or is it just more of the same in a system that has long operated on the idea that "the preferred sex" is really the only one worth saving?

Tonight at 8:00 CST, U.S., in episode #19 of A Voice for Men Radio, Dr. Paul and JtO will be in the operating room with one more round of putting femmo-chivalrist dogma under the knife; dispensing a healthy dose of masculine counter-theory.

The chat room will be open and Dr. Keyster will be on call for your comments and opinions at

310-388-9709

Register for the show and follow us HERE.

[/box]

Valenti, Futrelle and other child abusers

Paul Elam · 17 August 2011 · Archived copy · Original

[dropcap]I[/dropcap] frequently get asked, and a lot more lately than usual, why AVfM finds it necessary to employ what is often a hostile tone toward feminists and their supporters. It is actually a fair question, and one that deserves a fair and honest answer if we expect to give any rational person the opportunity to understand the mission here and why we are on it.

I usually answer it with pretty much stock information; stuff about Thomas James Ball and the way the media ignored his political self-immolation over the family courts. I tell people about Vladek Filler and the way his open persecution by corrupt state functionaries is continuing with the assistance of a fully complicit media in the state of Maine – despite being publicly exposed for what they are doing.

I talk about denial and the need to shake people out of it, and I have shown more examples than I can remember of how it is an egregious mistake to assume that we are just dealing with a difference in philosophy or simple conflicting worldviews when it comes to MRAs facing off with feminists.

Allow me to give you one more.

Recently we published the sad announcement released by NCFM that we lost Patricia Overberg, a lifelong advocate for men and women who suffered abuse in their homes. The brief article was not political, though it did mention that she had been targeted by members of the domestic violence industry in her area for persecution because she reacted to the plight of abused men by doing what she could to provide them services.

As usual, I posted the article to reddit/mensrights, and as expected it drew a lot of attention, getting, at this point, 148 net up votes from readers in that forum. The comments placed on the article were thoughtful and sensitive, as is befitting the recent death of an individual who dedicated her life to providing help to anyone she could that suffered abuse in the home.

[box type="download" icon="none"]The article has also been down voted, so far, 53 times.[/box]

That is 53 people, or about 25% of the voters in a men's rights forum, that down voted a simple tribute to a departed advocate, clearly on the grounds that she chose to help men, too; 53 people whose derelict brand of humanity represents the voice of feminism in modern culture; 53 pieces of garbage with no discernable reason to any longer be viewed as human beings.

This isn't new and it isn't a fluke. The National Organization of Men Against Sexism (NOMAS) filed an amicus brief, I think it was in 2005, to prevent shelters who were practicing discrimination from being mandated to offer services to men who were victimized by violent women. The members of that organization are not some band of errant "redditors," but a group of supposed academicians whose expertise allegedly lies in the area of domestic violence.

Their intent was to send seriously abused men and their children packing into the streets rather than allow any domestic abuse agency to lift a finger to help them. Their actions are part of a pattern that is no longer just a pattern but the status quo. And it got that way because we have been playing kissy face with bigots and hate mongers for far too long.

You know what, people? I am sick and fucking tired of this shit. I am sick and fucking tired of what amounts to people asking me to sit down at a table with klansmen and have a nice, congenial discussion on race relations and lynching. This is precisely what some people, conscious of it or not, are asking me to do.

[quote style="boxed" float="left"] I am sick and fucking tired of what amounts to people asking me to sit down at a table with klansmen and have a nice, congenial discussion on race relations and lynching.[/quote] Right now we have people like Jessica Valenti and David Futrelle out there pathologizing any reaction to their violently hateful agenda, drawing parallels between psychotic mass murderers and MRAs; arguing that the former is somehow a product of the latter. All while they defend policies that result in self-immolation, other forms of suicide, the loss of human rights and systematic, widespread child abuse.

Yes, child abuse. Children who are robbed of their fathers by the courts, and sometimes later with handguns, or gasoline and matches, are abuse victims. Children in the care of abused fathers that have nowhere to turn are destined for rejection and destructive neglect before the first call for help is made. And the likes of Futrelle, Valenti, NOMAS, Kellett, the 53 scumbags on reddit and the perhaps 53 million other scumbags they represent are part and parcel to that abuse every bit as much as people like Casey Anthony.

So should I be nice to these people? Sure, and right after I am nice to them we will all sit down and discuss the positive aspects of Nazi Germany – there were some, you know? And then we'll cull through the information on lynching blacks and find a couple of them that actually did rape white women so we can explore the whole matter as an attempt at "alternative" justice that perhaps was a tad over-zealous. Perhaps we can have a round table discussion on whether Katherine Becker coldly premeditated the sexual mutilation of her husband, or whether she was just trying to write a script for a sitcom. There should be room for all views, right?

And we can all lift our fucking pinkies when we sip our lattes and feel really great about ourselves for keeping it civilized and above the fray. And then…

AND. FUCKING. THEN...

We can watch the next man light himself on fire in front of an American family court, and tell ourselves, as the father of another child gets reduced to a pile of stinking, charred flesh, that we really must discuss this some more; reasonably, calmly, nicely, futilely. We must all seek to make ourselves feel good about how we handle things, even it it means we do absolutely nothing about the problem.

Or, we can treat these vermin as they deserve to be treated. Well, not as they deserve, because if these people actually got what they deserved the problem would be solved, but at the expense of the very values and principles we are trying to promote. I don't pretend to know the absolute answer to the problem here. Perhaps it is above the head of any one person. But what I do know is that in the future, as perhaps more people encourage me to opt for nice guy activism, the only response I will give them is a link to this page.

Standing at the crossroads

Walter Romans (TDOM) · 17 August 2011 · Archived copy · Original

When Should Feminists Support Men's Rights?

At first glance, feminism and men's rights appear to be at odds. Feminism runs east and west while men's rights run north and south. At any point where they intersect, neither desires to yield the right of way. But the truth is that at nearly every intersection, they should appear to be more like a merger than a crossroads. For nearly every identifiable feminist issue, there is a men's rights issue that if supported, could advance its cause. This will be an examination of how feminists could advance their cause by supporting men's rights.

The Gender Wage Gap

[image]Feminists are quite fond of pointing out the "fact" that women earn about 77-84 cents for every dollar earned by men. This is true. But unlike what feminists would have us believe, there are many reasons for this gap and very little of it, if any, can be traced to patriarchal discrimination or oppression. Mostly, it is due to the different choices made by men and women. Of course feminists will tell you that these differences in choices are due to different expectations placed by society on men and women. Of course these different expectations are due to patriarchal oppression and therefore the wage gap is due to patriarchal oppression and discrimination even if women and men are freely choosing different options.

So how can supporting men's rights reduce patriarchal oppression of women and make things more equitable? Funny you should ask. Let me count the ways.

Family Law, Child Support, and Custody Issues

[image]Some of the difference in the career choices made by men and women can be traced to the care and nurturing of children. Traditionally mothers have chosen to forego careers to stay home with their kids. Fathers have chosen to support and nurture their children by working longer hours in riskier occupations in order to provide more financial resources so their children can lead a better life. This has led to the belief that mothers are more nurturing than fathers. It has also led to extreme anti-father bias in Family Law, and Family Law outcomes where mothers are almost automatically awarded custody of their children.

Because child care is time consuming, the career of the custodial parent tends to suffer. Decisions are made to reduce working hours and increase flexibility in order to accommodate the needs of the children. There is nothing wrong with this. However, shared custody would decrease the demands on the custodial parent (usually the mother) and allow her to make decisions based on career advancement rather than the needs of the children.

If feminists supported shared custody (which would reduce child support obligations) women would have more freedom to opt into more time consuming careers with the potential for higher earnings. Conversely, they would feel less pressure to be care providers and society would place less expectation upon them to fill that role.

Further, feminist support for increased paternity leave would allow fathers to become more involved in the day-to-day care of their young children. It would promote bonding and attachment and would likely result in increased interest in parenting time and improve father-child relationships.

Negative Media Portrayal and Institutionalized Misandry

[image]The negative portrayal of fathers in the media as inept, stupid, drunken, and abusive does nothing more than to promote misandry and negative stereotypes. It is nothing short of contempt for males and male hatred. It has no socially redeeming value and has the power to create and promote stereotypic images that shape the way our society views men and fathers. Since most of these portrayals are negative, they instill a negative view of men as fathers, inhibit positive images, and sway public opinion in such a manner as to demand anti-father legislation and action.

These negative stereotypes become part of the public consciousness that helps to separate fathers from their children. This helps to create single mother families in which mothers bear the burden of caring for fatherless children, believing that this is preferable. Considerable social science research concludes the opposite; that children are better off with involved fathers. It also has the effect of leading to the above described situations where women feel they must choose to forego career advancement in order to care for their children.

If feminists were more supportive of men and more critical of the way men and fathers are portrayed in the media, the public would have a better view of fathers and be more supportive of public policy that would allow fathers more contact with their children, freeing mothers to focus on making career oriented decisions rather than child care decisions.

Sexual Harassment, Rape, and False Allegations

[image]Feminists frequently complain that allegations of sexual harassment, sexual assault, and rape are not taken seriously. Victims, they say, are not believed. They insist that every victim should be believed and that false allegations are practically nonexistent. Women never lie about such things. This is a ludicrous claim that runs contrary to human nature. People lie. They lie about nearly everything and they lie for a wide variety of reasons and everyone but feminists knows it.

Because people lie, the feminist claim that real victims won't come forward because they won't be believed is perpetuated by the fact that lies go unpunished and are therefore encouraged. Unpunished lies simply lead to more lying. Lying leads to disbelief and disbelief leads to less reporting. It's a vicious cycle perpetuated by the lie that women never lie. The logic is circular and fallacious.

This is why nothing that has been done to increase the reporting of rapes (victim shield laws, etc.) has actually worked to increase reporting. The cycle must be broken. The way to increase the credibility of all women who report sexual harassment, assault, or rape is to conduct serious investigations into each and every complaint. Serious investigation begins with a neutral investigator who is not invested in the outcome, only in the truth. Lies must be punished as the crime itself is punished. Once the incentive for lying is removed, the lies will decrease and the integrity of those who make allegations will no longer be suspect. Only an honest, neutral investigation that treats both alleged victim and alleged suspect with human decency and respect can achieve this.

Feminists also tend to use overblown statistics to inflate the problem. Frequently these statistics simply don't add up. One in five women will be sexually assaulted while in college. 90% of sexual assaults go unreported. Interviews of women who participate in many studies that produce these statistics have shown that the vast majority of "victims" deny being victims. If 20% of women suffer a sexual assault, sexual assault would be the most commonly committed crime on college campuses by far. It has been suggested that such statistics are partially responsible for the underreporting of these crimes. Statistics that show low reporting and low conviction rates may help to convince women that their reports won't be taken seriously.

If feminists wish to have alleged victims treated with respect and dignity they should be willing to take steps to hold accountable those who happen to be dishonest. This, more than anything, will help to ensure the integrity of those who come forward and should serve to encourage real victims to report. Encouraging the use of more honest and accurate statistics may remove potential barriers to reporting. Feminists should support each of these solutions as a means to increase reporting and ensure the integrity of those who do report.

The gender wage gap and sexual harassment and assault are but two feminist issues that could benefit from feminist support of men's rights issues. In future articles I will examine other issues such as abortion, sexual freedom, contraception, and paternity fraud. These are other areas where feminists might help further their own cause by supporting men and men's rights.

Fuck ’em!!!

J Galt · 18 August 2011 · Archived copy · Original

That’s right. Fuck ’em.

I find myself constantly reading articles and comments testing the politeness and context of gender politics and tearing them apart in my head. I’m constantly looking for the bullshit beliefs that are delivered as the polite default to what we see as normal. One that’s been squirming in my head for some time now is a comment I read suggesting that men are somehow arrogant to take employment for granted. Men somehow expect employment in a traditional form as part of their traditional patriarchal role as family provider. It sounds and tastes like bullshit the more I chew on it.

Affirmative action for the employment of women has been the default now for at least 30 years. Initially it was a civil rights’ amendment forwarded by JFK to serve minorities and blacks in 1961. N.O.W., on their website, gives countless reasons for the continuation, however Hanna Rosin portrays the end of men as a contradiction to the political lies.

Trust a woman to whine about the flavor of ice cream while engorging herself on it. I skipped over to YouTube and caught some clips by Rev. Jesse Jackson discussing “AA.” He was questioning the white face of woman standing at the head of the line refusing to yield to minorities.

[quote float=”left”]Maybe it’s time for bureaucrats to have an indexed income consistent with national averages.[/quote] Who knows, maybe the thinking of feminists is that minorities have the same sense of entitlement to put food on the table as men do. Of course minorities and men with equal access to employment don’t seem to follow slogans like “You Can Have it All.” They tend to portray their participation in employment as representing responsible and committed community partnership. After all, just who has ever heard a woman described as a provider in comparison to men?

Just exactly what does the employment of women contribute to the well-being of a man in the family? Haven’t women proved that they control the definition of a man in the family and intend to maintain that control? Sorry pal, you’re just ice cream and likely not even the right flavor.

We seem to miss the points of real entitlement in the exchange. “AA” should have included policies to enable men back into the home. Feminists describe home life, child rearing and caregiving as slavery but for some reason don’t support men being present in the home or in the lives of their children. Describing men as arrogant for expecting employment is dwarfed by the entitlement of women to not only the home and family but the work space too. Women and feminists have openly stated that in society there is no viable place for men. Women are guaranteed protections in the home, physically and financially, and are guaranteed the same in the workplace. Men, however, are just guaranteed to pay for it.

I went to a store to purchase a bathing suit for my son. I looked around for a salesperson and none could be found. I went to the cash register to discover three women huddled around chatting. I asked if anyone was working the floor. Two of the women said they were. I went to the manager to complain, because they weren’t.

[image]

At a local grocer I went to the deli counter and took a number for service. Fourteen people were ahead of me and four women were behind the counter, all serving the same woman; I went to the manager. In the same store one man was serving at the butchers counter, no line up, no waiting; I took a number and he said I didn’t need to — everybody was number one.

Whether you have noticed or not, customer service to the public has taken a deadly nose dive throughout the retail sector. The same fucking entitlement supported by “AA” has permeated the attitudes of people in the workplace and their ability to serve the public. I don't stand for it anymore and I complain – and loud. I don't niggle. I prefer to confront people for re-scripting their responsibilities to their employer and to their customers. I strongly suggest you do the same. These members of the pussy-pass posse have managers, and their managers need to know about their deficiencies.

My personal opinion is that real employment entitlements come from government appointed tenure. A bureaucrat locked into the land of milk and honey with an income over 50 grand is really not making much of a contribution to society. In fact, they have a vested interest in making sure nothing changes for them. It's no different for "AA" for women. More tit less equality. I believe it's time to stop accepting the status quo of what's offered.

Maybe it's time for bureaucrats to have an indexed income consistent with national averages. Sort of share the burden of reality and buy into the need for changes that affect all communities. Imagine the levers of power that control this nation having an interest in improving poverty because they share the limits that poverty inflicts. As a side note I just want to say that I personally could never figure out why the "war on terrorism" never included financial and economic terrorism, but instead got a pass.

I digress. Given the current state of employment and the increasing unemployment of men, I can't figure out why "AA" hasn't become "Afirmative Action Anonymous" let's get everyone back to work. The biggest reason for suffering unemployment is that controls to govern it are not in the hands of the people experiencing it, but in the hands of people with a job and money. I don't want to get ideologically liberal or messianic here, but does anyone know what an assault rifle costs and will they accept food stamps?

[box icon="nonw"]If ever the people rise up in a single voice and say "enough," they need to first consider who should be listening to them. The phantasm we refer to as the "Government" doesn't really exist. It is, in fact, people; warm blooded (and often cold) that inhabit the unaccountable policies and positions that govern our lives, empowering who they choose and disenfranchising the rest. It is in your home and living room and at your dinner table that they deliver their promises, controls, restrictions and poverty.[/box]

Should the people ever choose to be heard, it is at the very doorstep of tenured bureaucrats that the point should be made. At their homes and living rooms, not at empty buildings that represent the policies and ghosts that enable and dispense entitlement. It is those standing behind the curtain and impressing us all with the omniscience of their machine that need to hear the message. It is the bureaucrats that are the machine of policy and it is these people that need to embrace the full force of accountability to the people, not to the ne're do well managers that we elect.

I also watched the vid by Alex Jones you will find to the right on this page. My impression of the news coverage of Ron Paul is that men need to make a full frontal attack on the mainstream media, all out. Every fucking statement needs to be rebutted by video all over the internet. We need to dilute the message of MSM so extensively that nobody will be influenced, because the choices will be too diverse. Every pundit out there needs to be called up for the lying piece of shit that they are. The fact that in every case these human thought viruses represent nothing more than a purchased position on a "them only" channel. They need to be utterly wiped out and destroyed.

It's easy to do: Make a 30 second video telling Sharon from "OZ" Osbourne that her personal politics on violence define her as human waste, next. When someone does a search, they will be overwhelmed by the counter argument; they will be left with no choice but to think for themselves. Every video should include the words "We are and I am the mainstream media." The rest are entitlement whores that are lying. FTSU permanently. I think the shorter the video the more it may be viewed. Do it in audio with the picture of the piece of shit you are challenging.

I'd love to have a FTSU forum, to discuss passive methods of fucking up the mainstream. Things like using return postage envelopes to get rid of junk mail. Always paying 5 cents less when you issue a check to pay your bills and the virtue of cell phone jammers and how to retune them to the police band. Making prank DV calls to the police and giving them the address of a bureaucrat or politician. Hey, people, maybe we can make the system work for us.

Mr. Nice Guy doesn't live here anymore

Jared White · 18 August 2011 · Archived copy · Original

[dropcap]I[/dropcap] walked up a mountain today. A small mountain – it only took me an hour. During this hike I had a conversation, described here shortly. On this particular mountain there are a number of trails – most of which have names, known to many of the visitors and hikers who visit there. On the lower part of the trail head I encountered two women in their mid thirties; attractive women. They were occupying (obstructing) the trail, and I passed them by detouring momentarily into the underbrush. They were loudly broadcasting their lack of knowledge of the location of a trail I routinely use to reach the peak, and towards which I was headed this day as well. Like an idiot, I said: "Oh, I'm headed up that trail. Follow me."

There was some kind of comment along the lines of,"Hey, this guy knows where the trail is, he'll show us where." They said some more stuff, but I wasn't listening – until they called out to me to tell me, "I hope you don't mind, we usually talk about boys." I turned around at this point, not because I cared what two strange women chose to talk about – but to see if they were still following me, and if I was still showing them where the trail was.

[quote float="left"]I only regret now that the next thing out of my mouth was not, "There's no need for grunting, when gestures are more efficient," followed by a demonstration of a hand gesture.[/quote] They mistook my look for interest, and one offered the comment: "Not boys, men, we talk about men – okay?" This seemed pretty condescending to me. But the reason I didn't care is that my private opinion is most women have a view of masculinity so distorted that female discussions of men or of boys will be of wholly fictional constructs – regardless of the labels they use.

However, in that statement: "Not boys, men, we talk about men – okay?" there was a strong upward inflection on the "okay." It was a question. In an unplanned impulse to mask my indifference – I replied, "Oh that's fine, I often talk about women."

This was met with the hilariously original and clever witticism, "You talk? I thought all guys could do is grunt." This came from a woman who does not know me and who less than 2 minutes earlier accepted my offer to be shown the location of a trail in steep mountainous terrain which she and her friend apparently intended to hike.

I don't regret the offer of assistance. I don't regret showing two ignorant tourists the location of a trail they would not have found without help. I only regret now that the next thing out of my mouth was not, "There's no need for grunting, when gestures are more efficient," followed by a demonstration of a hand gesture.

I didn't offer this comment or a hand gesture. All I said was, "The trail is marked on the left hand here in about 200 meters."

The woman who'd just suggested I represented a species of sub-verbal grunters didn't thank me. She just said "cool." I picked up my pace and left her and her friend to talk about boys, or men, or whatever without me to oppress them or interrupt their civilized philosophical discussions with my primitive ape noises.

I ditched this pair of obnoxious and entitled princesses, and I hope they didn't fall to their deaths into a ravine, or get eaten by a bear. Mostly. I spent the rest of my hike moving uphill fast, and thinking, and I came to some interesting conclusions. Some of which are even publishable.

Through experience, I have come to expect in dealings with women, to be insulted, abused, exploited and maligned. Many would rightly point out that this contributed to my self identification as an MRA. However, I am increasingly convinced that men outside the men's rights movement are also coming to a conclusion similar to my own.

[box type="alert" size="large" style="rounded" icon="none"]The end of the free pass[/box]

Opponents of the men's rights movement encountering MRA writing on sites like this one, or MRA video and audio content might be surprised to discover that a great many "active" MRAs are cheerful, polite and tolerant individuals. Blog and video-blog appearances to the contrary – even being a loud and active MRA – I don't indulge in arguments or offer my ranting commentary every time I'm figuratively slapped across the face with a casual comment that due to my sex, I'm either stupid, sex obsessed, or otherwise defective.

In fact, being an adherent of an unpopular, contrarian political philosophy has greatly honed my "nice guy" diplomatic skills. I say that admitting that MRA writing tends to be direct, rather than diplomatic; I have always preferred to lead towards my points of view by entertainment and charm rather than by overt argument or direct debate.

When told by a woman I'd just agreed to guide to a difficult-to-locate trail in mountainous terrain "I thought all guys could do is grunt" I didn't tell her to find the trail herself, then abandon her. The decision I've mentioned formed over the next hour as I made my way up the mountain.

Because MRA discourse on women is so often derailed by lying accusation from a feminist viewpoint – it's necessary to explain my position with detail and precision. When faced with male-targeting hatred, disdain, or abuse from women or on behalf of women I will adhere to my own new personal policy, that is: to afford to blue-pillers and feminists no tolerance, and no patience. Now here comes the clarification required due to routine accusatory distortion by feminists :

[box type="note" icon="none"]No tolerance and no patience for abuse, lies and assorted routine male-bashing does not mean I'll be arguing, lecturing or correcting the embedded and unconscious misandry now normal in everyday dealings with women, blue-pillers and other unidentified feminists.[/box]

To argue with an individual necessitates some stake in their opinion. This is a cultural assumption that I'll assert all women hold. It's the assumption that men value their approval. For most men, including many MRAs before full internalization of a "red pill" ethic – this assumption is true. Social acceptance for the blue pill world rests substantially on collective female approval. Even as an MRA the learned ethics of a lifetime make this difficult programming to break.

We are taught by a continuous message of male inadequacy and female elan that as men, our compliance with a female approved model of self is essential to our success, acceptance, adulthood and self respect. This is all a farce – because compliance with what is now the normalized version of a "real man" displaces self respect with a servile utility and craven suppression of identity. My decision to cease entertaining even polite accommodation of male-hate rests on a bedrock of indifference to approval.

Right at this point is where the accusations should start that this is hatred of women, or misogyny, or some other ideologically driven lie to derail the conversation. I'll admit that in the last few months, following the open televised female celebration of the vicious mutilation of a man by Katherine Becker, the excused murder of an infant by Casey Anthony and other recent events I found myself edging towards animosity to an entire sex.

However, an ideology is not a sexual demographic – regardless of the ongoing efforts of ideologues to conflate opposition to a hateful dogma with claims of hatred of women. I continue to enjoy the friendships of a handful of women I distinguish in my mind by classifying as adults. For others – rather than regarding them with an emotionally charged antipathy – I recognize them simply as large, dangerous children.

When faced by casual hate from individuals of entitled infantile character, I will not be trying through charm and finesse to hold up a mirror. I wont attempt to talk a blue-pill man or woman out of their unexamined disdain for masculine identity. Individuals indulging in anti-male bigotry will be figuratively swatted aside, without apology or explanation.

I will also encourage my brothers and sisters who see the world without a feminist lens to dispense with accommodation of unconscious, embedded misandry. This means discarding the illusion of a need for approval. The assumption of masculine need for acceptance by this consensus feminine approval is fundamental to the everyday demonstrations of not only male-bashing – but a growing body of normalized depravity by women in western society.

I know that this will be misunderstood, and mis-attributed and misrepresented by both men and women of the kool-aid drinking majority. However the failure to understand is rooted in the assumption of the blue-pill-normal masculine need for feminine acceptance. An assumption of feminist monopoly on the definition of correct manhood. Stated flatly, a definition of "correct" manhood or masculinity by anyone other than a man applying his own definition to himself is absurd. The abundance of female ideological definition of "real" men in culture and media shows a deep disconnect from reality.

[quote float="right"]These are some of the consequences of a path which apart from that unwieldy set of initials – I'll call "Going Full Zeta."[/quote] For every man, blunt and unapologetic rejection of any feminist-definition of a "good man" is a great starting point. The predictable demands to "explain yourself mister" can also be cheerfully ignored. I wont belabor this with a tedious step by step path. I'd suggest that self actualization is best plotted individually, without apology or explanation. So I wont fall into the trap of hatred, and I've lost any interest in helping those whose actions and speech are poisoned by a mainstream ideology of hate.

That's right princess – if you continue to cling to an outmoded dogma in which masculinity equates to stupidity, or to criminality, I won't trouble to correct you. I've learned through repeated attempts that although most people don't want to be racists, or bigots, or demonstrably ignorant of obvious realities – the idea of "we're better than them" is seductive and satisfying. So what's left?

MRAs reading this may recognize this as my MGTOW moment (Manuel Going His Own Way), but there's more in play than wandering off to a monkish existence. In fact, a monkish existence is far from my reality. That kludgy acronym is actually a rather poor descriptor of where I find my life headed as a man.

Finances, freedom, fornication and fun. These are some of the consequences of a path which apart from that unwieldy set of initials – I'll call "Going Full Zeta." Various authors have belittled a masculine philosophy built on self actualization – such as Kimmel's "Guyland" and Heimowitz's "Child Man in the Promised Land." In the cosmology of these feminists, "Real Men™" are defined by self sacrifice, servitude and utility to women.

While a philosophy rejecting this stifling mode of servile abasement is understandable to many MRAs, for the wider public, I have already seen a complete failure to grasp the consequences of men increasingly going their own way. This manifests in anger, accusation and condemnation of any male behavior which doesn't comply to the feminist definition of "real man™"

The source of this persistent failure of comprehension lies in a set of idiotic false assumptions about men. A comprehensive list would be too long for the scope of this article, but a few items near the top are:

[unordered_list style="green-dot"]

- Men are basically stupid.
- Men will tolerate any abuse for access to sex.
- Male identity is defined by female approval.

[/unordered_list]

These three moronic assumptions underlie a pervasive and escalating flavor of hatred, abuse and violence against men – and most men and women still living in a blue pill reality cant even see it. As a man, discarding them opens a world of possibility, and relief from our culture's feminist defined manhood. It is a relief from a mental bondage that is not excessive to denote with the word slavery.

For those in a blue pill reality, particularly women, a growing number of men freeing themselves from this conceptual fog is shortly going to force a sudden and unpleasant introduction to personal accountability. And for them, I have not a whisper of pity.

Kellett steps in it, big time

Paul Elam · 20 August 2011 · Archived copy · Original

[box type="note" icon="none"]As I reported on recently, Mary Kellett, the Ellsworth, Maine prosecutor notorious for pursuing flimsy cases, always against men accused of sexual or domestic assaults, has put her foot in it again. Only this time it appears that her misstep has put her ankle deep in a bear trap.

A recap of the most recent case goes as follows. Keovilaisack Sayasane, 44, was charged with threatening to harm his wife with a hammer in their home. A problem for the prosecution in the case was that Sayasane's wife was scheduled to testify for the defense. As the only eyewitness and alleged victim in the case it could have proven to be an insurmountable obstacle to a conviction.

But the wife had a change of heart about testifying when she was told by Mary Kellett that Sayasane had been convicted of killing his first wife some 25 years earlier. The Bangor Daily News reports that when the judge in the case, Justice Kevin Cuddy, learned of this, he ultimately declared a mistrial, which ended the current proceedings against Sayasane, but allows the prosecution to retry the case.

Sayasane, however, had not killed his first wife. He was convicted of manslaughter in the 1987 stabbing death of a man in Hampden, Maine.

Court transcripts reveal that both defense attorney Jeffry Toothaker and Mary Kellett informed the court that they were both given the erroneous information on Saysane's conviction by Deputy Attorney General William Stokes, head of the Attorney General's Office's criminal division. But Stokes has a strikingly different story. Namely that it never happened. [/box]

[box type="download" icon="none"]

This is Stoke's version according to the Bangor Daily News:

"Stokes said he never provided any information to Kellett that indicated that the victim in the manslaughter case was Sayasane's previous wife, or even that the victim was a woman. Stokes said he had no prior knowledge of the case before Kellett contacted him about it, and so had to go look up the information in case summaries that are kept on file at the Attorney General's Office in Augusta.

The summary, Stokes said, indicates that the victim in the 1986 stabbing was a 21-year old man named Boudone Meuaneboutdy who was a friend of Sayasane's. He said that is the information he forwarded to Kellett.

"Where the wife part came in, I have no knowledge," Stokes said.

[/box]

[box type="note" icon="none"]Now, assuming that Stokes is not lying, Mary Kellett has just been dropped into the fryer. On the merits of his statement alone, two factors become abundantly clear.

[unordered_list style="green-dot"]

- Mary Kellett engaged in witness tampering by lying to the alleged victim in the case thus coercing her to withdraw exculpatory testimony.
- Mary Kellett further perpetrated a fraud on the court by misleading the judge to believe that she had been furnished information from the state AG's office, when in fact she had been furnished no such information.

[/unordered_list]

There may well be other violations that become apparent as this case is investigated further. But these two points of interest do serve as grounds for further complaints to the Overseers of the Bar in Maine, as well as to the office of Governor Paul LePage and the Office of the State Attorney General.

There is a pending bar complaint on Mary Kellett stemming from the Vladek Filler case that was filed by the National Coalition for Men. That complaint has been investigated and referred to the bar with the recommendation that sanctions against Kellett were warranted.

It was originally the position of AVfM that before a complaint was filed with the bar against Kellett for the Sayasane case that the Filler complaint would be allowed to come to conclusion. These recent revelations by the state AG of Maine are grounds to revise that decision. [/box]

[box type=”alert” icon=”none”]The time for action is now.[/box]

[box type=”note” icon=”none”]On behalf of the people of the United States and in the interest of justice, AVfM will now proceed with a bar complaint against Mary Kellett for the willful fraud of a court of law and for witness tampering in a criminal proceeding. We will also be sending letters of protest and pleas for justice to Governor LePage and to the Attorney General of Maine.

I am also going to call on readers of AVfM to assist with these vital actions as quickly as possible. Please write Governor LePage and the State Attorney General and ask them why, after such demonstrated malfeasance on the part of a Maine state functionary, is she being allowed to continue prosecuting in Maine.

I am also writing Ellsworth District Attorney Carletta Bossano, Mary Kellett’s direct supervisor and the individual that holds the ultimate responsibility for actions that emanate from her office, to demand that Kellett be suspended from duties until her actions are thoroughly investigated. I ask all those interested in justice to do the same.

Finally, if you have a blog or website, no matter how large or small, I ask you to please help us go on the offensive against the Orwellian nightmare happening in Maine by posting this article, in its entirety to your site. Facebook and twitter users, please do the same, and thank you all for helping us turn up the heat on an ongoing miscarriage of justice.

Remember, if we can just take one corrupt prosecutor out it will send reverberations throughout the system of feminist governance and will correct an absolute evil going in the state of Maine. Even the Bangor Daily News, previously hesitant to fully address this story, is now smelling blood. Let’s finish this. Let’s FTSU, and I mean NOW.

Contact Maine’s State Attorney General

Contact Governor Paul LePage

Contact District Attorney Carletta Bossano

[/box]

I graduated from Screw U

J Galt · 20 August 2011 · Archived copy · Original

[dropcap]I[/dropcap]n an open air college staffed by ruthless educators, my major was political yeast infections. My minor was yeast infected politics. My graduating thesis was a study of the effects of female Co2 emissions and climate change. We determined that if women would stop whining we could save the planet. We decide to publish our findings in a documentary film called, “An Inconvenient Ruth.”

As a fragmented and disenfranchised “rape culture,” we will be applying to the United Nations Human Right’s Tribunal for minority status rights and additionally seeking affirmative action status and federal funding, after all, in the words of Harlequin, a little “rape culture” is better than no culture at all. Personally I think the whole issue is based on wishful dinking.

Some time ago when I was in my forties, I considered going back to school I was really interested in a programming course and I have a real love of database design. At the time I thought I’d go all out and take a course and get certification for Oracle. I did the usual; went to the local college, saw what was available, found an information seminar and signed up. When I went to this info seminar I was really astonished at the level of absolute bullshit that was being shoveled.

[image]I have worked in sales and I happen to know the color of bullshit and with my eyes closed. I can even smell it. What I was being peddled was nothing short of a sales job and a half assed con job to promote a half assed product and a meager nod of qualification from an educational institution. I was really pissed that this bimbo had the nerve to waste my time with statements like, “certification in Oracle will get you a job in the income bracket of 60-80 grand, so it’s easy to justify the 25 grand fee we charge for the eight months we offer.”

My response to her presentation was, well if that’s how you justify your fees why don’t you charge 30 percent of my first year of income. I fail to see the relationship, but I’m stubborn and her position to me was unethical and I told her so. Education, in my eyes, should not be trivialized and can affect the quality of your life. So given my position on such crap I elected to not submit myself to the debt and figured I could achieve the same or better results online. I’ve lost confidence and trust in our education system and feel for the most part that it’s a cheat for money.

The public school system has infantilized education to the point where tax dollars simply finance the babysitting of kids. Unless you live in an empowered wealthy community that enjoys real education, don’t expect any. Of course the education they failed to give you in your youth can be charged for in community college so you can pay twice to get what you should have gotten the first time.

I pretty much advocate for closing all the schools, sending the kids home and firing all the assholes that pretend to be teachers and administrators. I’m sure they would be willing to babysit for half the price once unemployed and the bonus is if you don’t like them they can take a walk. Which leads to the issue at hand that is twisting my thoughts like wet panties on a romance novel binge of feminist entitlement.

After reading about all the bullshit that young men are being put through on university campuses, like female studies, rape culture indoctrination and, frankly, the little princesses themselves, it’s time someone said enough. Why are we putting up with this absolute bullshit of entitlement for women at the complete expense of men?Trust me when I say there isn’t one institution on the continent worth the bullshit that’s being peddled.

I don’t see any reason for it to continue. Why not move to complete gender segregation and leave the bitch fest to the whiners? I don’t see why men should have to put up with women on campuses at all. We need smaller institutions and more of them with choice. I see no reason for a man to endanger his education, his future and his reputation to appease some entitlement princess. I think at this point most guys in university would be quite happy to attend an all-male facility. Even get rid of the propaganda parade of bullshit studies from their curriculum and study something in the real world. How about Texas Hold’em? If education is turned into an accusation gamble at least introduce the possibility to win.

[image]

Women's Studies 101

When I see the never ending cascade of rape culture hysteria and myth permeating the esteemed faculties of academe I am truly worried for the future of honesty, integrity and ethics. I'm particularly concerned for the ability to conceptualize it and teach it to our youth. Given the moves in the UK to financially empower the accusation mill princesses with homes and money, I'm left to wonder when they will start assigning the tuition fees of "victims" to the falsely accused as restitution.

I can't see why an internal franchise of study such as women's studies or male studies cannot act as a governing body to oversee the direction of those who enroll and pay their fees. In other words, my fees are directed to the faculty of male studies and they oversee the direction, quality and substance of studies. If you don't wish to be subjected to female studies and the propaganda that they support you shouldn't have to. Feminism isn't monolithic, right?

How about a choice since I'm the one paying the fees? Let's get the government right the hell out of our educational institutions and stop them from fucking them up completely. I hope young men with the support of their parents start challenging this crap in our universities and demand changes that will serve to enhance education.

Maybe young men should consider distance learning online and asking or demanding these universities provide the service. If nothing else it will be a safer environment for men and the princesses can get on with their binge drinking and sidewalk sliding. I've always believed that better solutions are available; we need only demand service for our dollars. Given the on campus politics and sexism that is running rough shod over this generation, I don't count these institutions as viable alternatives to our educational futures. But hey, we already destroyed the family – why not education, too?

Maybe it's time to introduce legislation or contract clauses that protect young men on campus. When that facility determines that a young mans presence must be curtailed, force them to provide distance learning or refund their tuition entirely from day one. Personally when a man on campus is falsely accused and sanctioned I think the university should be sued up the wazoo. I also think their current agreements should be reviewed for legal ambiguities and they should be sanctioned until they clean them up.

But then I also believe that leveling an accusation that cannot be substantiated should automatically subject the accuser to the exact penalties that the accused would otherwise suffer. I do have some radical notions when it comes to institutions and bureaucrats. How about we remove the accountability clause from these people, to the extent that anyone who does not fulfill the obligation of their position can be personally sued? If you're a faculty member and use your influence improperly and affect tuition paying students you get personally sued with no protections from that institution. How about using the same kangaroo court style they offer to the accused to affect that lawsuit?

Children defy police in Washington, purchase lemonade

Paul Elam · 21 August 2011 · Archived copy · Original

(From the youtube descroption) In response to a recent wave of lemonade stand shut downs and harassment of children over such petty regulations as are used to shut them down, several activist gathered at the west lawn of the capitol in Washington, DC to sell lemonade and were arrested.

While the officers were technically on solid “legal” ground in shutting down the stand, they behaved inappropriately by any standard numerous times, using intimidation tactics and physical assault on protestors and observers, and harassing members of the professional media.

The willingness with which children and tourists participated by purchasing lemonade in disobedience of the police instructions is an indicator of how little respect the general public has for government in general, and specifically police when enforcing unjust laws. Gives me hope for America.

Scaling the bridge: is illegal activism justified?

Paul Elam · 21 August 2011 · Archived copy · Original

[dropcap]O[/dropcap]n May 13th, 2011, Michael Fox, a 38 year old father from Narrabeen, Australia, climbed to the top of the iconic Sydney Harbor Bridge in protest of how families in that country face a form of dissolution in family courts that is destructive the lives of their children.

Likewise, throughout the last several years different members of the organization Fathers for Justice have scaled buildings and other structures to stage protests, resulting in arrests and subsequent prosecutions. And from a purely legal standpoint, that makes sense. All these actions were illegal; all of them prosecutable offenses under prevailing law.

Recently, AVfM's Keith, in one of a flurry of articles, explored among other things the idea of making calls to police, reporting domestic violence and surreptitiously referring them to the addresses of state functionaries. In fairness to Keith he included a note to me in the admin that I could delete that part of the article if I so desired. I chose not to.

It is not that I personally endorse that particular idea. Frankly, I don't. But what I do endorse is a healthy, honest discussion of whether non-violent forms of civil dissent, even when illegal, should be held in legitimate regard by advocates for men and boys. In fairness to myself, I have to disclose that I am unambiguously supportive of such actions, though this site will not be used as a platform to organize, execute or encourage any specific plans along those lines. Generally speaking, though, my feelings about this matter are rooted in my identity as an American.

[image]My country was born from an illegal act; treason to be specific. Every signature on the Declaration of Independence came from a man who knew his actions were subject to lawful execution. Every signer, bar none, was a criminal. Or, as Benjamin Franklin is quoted as saying, "Gentlemen we must all hang together or we shall most assuredly all hang separately."

Since that time Americans have frequently protested with illegal disobedience when their government exceeded its authority and operated in the realms of tyranny, oppression and moral turpitude. And God knows it has done those things a number of times, just as it is doing with men and boys today.

When we enslaved blacks, Americans of good conscious violated the law of the land by assisting their escape from bondage and providing transport to safe haven. When the government fabricated the Gulf of Tonkin incident and waged an unconstitutional war in Vietnam, Americans took over university buildings and conducted illegal marches to protest. The same thing happened during the civil rights movement with "illegal" protests and demonstrations.

Not only do I find those actions justified, but indispensible to a nation with a sense of justice that rests in the heart of its people.

The objections to this line of thinking largely stem from a sense that it is laws that constitute morality; that what is legislated is the arbiter of what we deem to be fundamentally right or wrong. Of course, this law and order mentality is the chief enabler of tyranny and oppression. For if what is legal defines our moral sensibilities, then there is no limit to the power of government to do anything it wants and every act of tyranny and oppression becomes acceptable simply because the tyrants and oppressors raise their bloody hands and give say so.

When laws are wrong, they demand that people of courage and conviction break them. Otherwise, we will forever be at the mercy of the most base and avaricious machinations of the elites; a situation that we find ourselves thoroughly mired in today.

Shall we ask their legal permission to claw our way out of it?

To those activists that would say that all the protests of feminists governance should only be staged within the strict and stifling letter of the law, I have some questions for you. Would you, if on a jury, vote to convict Michael Fox?

Do you eschew the actions of Fathers for Justice because they violated statutes in the process? Is your reverence for the very system of laws that is slicing your brothers and sons to pieces so sacrosanct that you will stand by idly and do nothing, or condemn those that commit illegal acts of decency to protest legal abominations?

And what will you say when they criminalize your right to speak out?

I know it is a fine line we must walk. I am not an anarchist, as much as I might find the idea romantic. I do believe that laws can help produce justice, and that justice fosters order and collective safety, to one degree or another. But when the administrators of those laws become so corrupt that we must engage in relentless work to, say, remove a prosecutor who wantonly and openly users her power to illegally terrorize innocent men, then we have a problem that may not be repairable in the conventional sense. In that light, I have adjusted our mission statement and commenting policy accordingly.

While no plans for any specific illegal activity may be discussed on this site, it is now open for the general discussion and debate of those issues. As always, any advocacy or glorification of violence is strictly forbidden and users doing so will be banned from this site permanently.

Fun with Obamacare

keyster · 22 August 2011 · Archived copy · Original

There are at least a dozen provisions for women that ObamaCare mandates funding for, including a national "Department of Women's Health". There are ZERO for men. Are you surprised? A Voice for Men isn't. And hopefully neither are you.

As the feminist mantras about poor oppressed women living under the thumb of patriarchy continue to echo across the culture, from the media to the halls of academe to the government elected to represent all the people, there is a voice starting to rise on behalf of the men those mantras are targeting.

It is time to call bullshit on all the lies. No better place to start than with the liar-in-chief.

S.A.V.E. launches C.A.M.P. program

Paul Elam · 22 August 2011 · Archived copy · Original

[box type="note" icon="none"]

A real Opportunity for MRA's and bloggers to heighten impact.

The following is an announcement from S.A.V.E., the same organization you saw take such an active role in bringing media attention to the Vladek Filler rape persecution, among other issues vital to men and boys. I wanted to include a few words about it myself because I think it represents a brilliant opportunity to further organize online efforts at activism and give us much more punch; an enhanced FTSU factor, if you will. First the announcement…[/box]

[box type="alert" icon="none"]

On July 11 Catherine Becker of California drugged her husband, lashed him to a bed, severed his penis, and threw it into a garbage disposal. Becker coolly explained to the responding officers, "He deserved it."

- Sharon Osburne of ABC's The Talk made light of the assault. Osbourne described the incident as "hysterical" and boasted to her national audience, "It's quite fabulous."
- Others callously blamed the victim. "When you cross a woman, all is fair," remarked TV personality Wendy Williams.
- The most common response of the national media, however, was to ignore the gruesome attack.

But what if the perpetrator had been a male and the victim a female — the reaction would have been totally different: Alarming newscasts, agonized editorials, campus marches, and stern demands for harsh criminal sanctions.

Relying on rapid media response using mainstream media, social media, radio, and other channels, the Countering Abuse Misinformation Project – CAMP – will work to bring an end to this pernicious double-standard.

SAVE is launching CAMP on Monday, August 22. SAVE will be inviting persons to make comments to online newspaper articles, write letters to the editor, and so forth. An orientation call will be held Tuesday, Aug. 23 at 9pm Eastern time. If you would like to participate in this history-making effort, contact Teri Stoddard at tstoddard@saveservices.org .

[/box]

[box type="note" icon="none"]As likely the highest profile internet presence to initially participate in the CAMP program, AVfM will maintain close communication with the group from S.A.V.E.. When there is an offending article in the online media, or egregiously slanted coverage of events like the Becker case, AVfM will be immediately notified, as will an impressive network of other individuals willing to go in an infuse the truth into the comment sections of those articles and news stories.

This is action in the spirit of KARMA, the one man army, and will effectively give us a cavalry of activists to help aggressively refute the lies and reshape some public opinion as a cooperative team. The alerts will also go out on all the Facebook, Twitter and other social networking accounts of CAMP participants. Indeed, immediately after posting this I will be sending it to the A Voice for Men Facebook Page.

We actually have the numbers to make CAMP effective right now, but we can even do better. If you own a blog, no matter the size, please re-post CAMP announcements as they appear at AVfM. If you are on Facebook, please re-post this article there and make a commitment to re-post all the alerts to come in the future. S.A.V.E. will be also be taking it up a significant notch with its increasing arsenal of mainstream contacts.

In short, this will be a swarm of reaction to mainstream misandry on a level never before seen.

And you can play an absolutely vital part in it. When a story like Sharon Osborne making humor of the depraved sexual mutilation of a man gets sent out for a CAMP response, go to the target article and make your comment. You are the most qualified people in the world to set the record straight, and the more this happens the more it becomes difficult for the media to soft peddle or ignore reality.

I encourage all MRA's to contact Teri Stoddard and request attendance for their training session. And if you can't make it, just stay tuned in to AVfM and/or S.A.V.E.. I intend to walk like a KARMA MRA MGTOW on this one, folks. As long as the good people at S.A.V.E. are going to dedicate this much effort to this kind of activism, we are going to put resources here into doing our part.[/box]

Excuse me, do you have a gun I could borrow?

J Galt · 22 August 2011 · Archived copy · Original

[dropcap]I [/dropcap]don't want to come off as a nut job here. Some of you have read previous articles keyed by me and I like to think my ideas have been somewhat restrained, but challenging; hopefully on a personal level. I like head shaker stuff. I also like deceiving humor. The kind of humor that makes you wonder why you laughed. This time I'd like to suspend my sarcasm out of concern.

I have spent some time recently updating my perspective, viewing some 20th century history, the kind that governments prefer you don't know. I'm concerned as most are about the US economy, the system of currency, the debt and particularly the inability for the individual to respond to it. I found myself connecting dots and seeing a holy shit we are fucked conclusion.

If I was planning a meal, the first step would be to prepare the menu and make sure I have the ingredients to pull it off. Nothing succeeds like success and when you taste it. It's succulent. I recently viewed a documentary called "The Soviet Story," a mind blower. This is a film that focuses on the collaboration between Soviet Communist Marxism and Fascist Socialist Germany prior to 1941. My concern is genocide, the killing of 7 million Ukraine's and how it was enabled.

I can't change history, but my concern is being able to identify the same tactics in our current society and the correlation that makes it possible. I'm not asking you to believe it. I'm asking you if the people around you believe it or could be coerced to believe it. Can they suspend their critical thinking, can they accept it as a continuation of their inability to act? Would it fit into their current state of personal powerlessness? If you answered yes to any and all, then you know we are fucked.

Next time you go to the grocery store, look at the food you're buying and exactly where it comes from. You'll notice that very little if any comes from your locale or even your country. If we owe trillions of dollars and cannot afford the interest on the debt, how do we feed ourselves without a domestic food source? An interesting feature of the monetary system of fiat currency is it relies on trade in all areas including food. The most effective lever against a debt or any demands forwarded if unable to pay is to cut off the supply.

Wouldn't it be unfortunate if that supply was food?

In fact the most powerful levers in place are that no country on this planet can self-sustain. The Central Bank through the IMF and the use of paper money and commodity speculation has organized and implemented a very powerful system of levers. They don't have to use a gun, they only need turn around some boats on route with food and we are fucked. There's no brutality implemented by The Central Bank, it's just business. The brutality comes from us when we compete for food.

I'm posting 2 graphs I clipped from the movie "The Soviet Story" to represent the willingness, ability and acceptance of genocide as it was carried out against the Ukraine in 1932 – 33. Again, it's just business. The first graph shows the export of Ukraine wheat at its highest in 1932. The second graph shows the number of deaths during 1932 -33 from starvation. As an aside, the Ukraine wheat was exported to the west and to North America. Can anyone say market adjusted genocide during a collapse of a world economy resulting in a global depression? Not possible you say: check out the graphs better yet check out this clip. (the video is graphic and upsetting, be warned)

As you can see with the proper will and intention extermination is not far-fetched. I would like to remind you of the more recent devastation in Haiti and the choice to limit the distribution of food to women only. You may note that no follow up of its effectiveness was ever reported and never will be.

Without getting into geopolitical influences and the weight of international finance, I have made a connection in a previous paragraph between genocide and the financial influence of the depression. It is worth noting that the same monetary system we have today The Federal Reserve System was in place at that time in the US. What is not known to most is the financial influences being applied to the Soviets in 1932-33. The scope of this could easily represent a book or 10 and obviously it does, but not here, instead some quick linkage to wet your whistle, and the following.

Jacob Schiff was head of the New York investment firm Kuhn, Loeb and Co. He was one of the principal backers of the Bolshevik revolution and personally financed Trotsky's trip from New York to Russia. He was a major contributor to Woodrow Wilson's presidential campaign and an advocate for passage of the Federal Reserve Act. By the way, if anyone would like to throw 20 thousand bucks my way, I'd be more than happy to produce a book on genocide and mass murder as a financial sport, rather than a gender sport.

We all seem to reach for explanations to the inhumanity of our history. Identified over and over is the ideology of the times, its impact and ability to move masses to a state of social chaos. But if we see these ideologies for what they really are, delivery systems, we can then understand that what fuels the delivery system is always the same, finance and money the real power and energy of destruction.

Part of the equation required to carry out any extermination is justified reason, the current US debt provides that reason. If you adequately vilify a group you are targeting, you remove human compassion, you now have the will. Of course if you are also engaged in shaping a new paradigm of social consciousness known as social engineering, it's good to remember the socialist approach. To quote an unnamed speaker in the film "I don't think that many people know that only socialists publicly advocated genocide in the 19th and 20th centuries". From the man himself in his own words…..

Karl, you are the man.

Whether it appears tenable or not, in the west today, we now possess all the ingredients of genocide and extermination. I would not touch on this save for the fact that our media, a representation of our collective thought introduces the end of men. In viewing a documentary called "The Perverts Guide to Cinema" author, narrator Slavoj Zizek suggests there is nothing natural about human desires, they are artificial. We must be taught to desire. Cinema and therefore media does not give you what you desire but teaches you how to desire. We now have a new desire introduced to the collective consciousness, the end of men.

As profound as your existence may appear or reveal itself to you, it is artificial. One could say that it is not really yours and never was. You are a tenant here and unknown to you is the duration of the lease. These are words of absurdity to you, no doubt, your arguments against such a position could be piled one on top of the other endlessly. It would take a lifetime just to review your logic and ethics and that is what you are doing. Now in mid thought, mid-sentence and mid syllable I will raise the barrel, cock the hammer and answer your argument with what you are unlikely to know.

Estimates of the war dead in the 20th century, those lost in battle 36,000,000. That is 36 million. Let's not niggle and waylay the definition, this number includes international and domestic wars, revolutions and violent conflicts.

[box type="download" icon="none"]A term you may be unfamiliar with is Democide ~ The murder of any person by a government, including genocide, politicide, and mass murder.[/box]

It is of interest to note that prior to the 20th century, estimates of what would be categorized as Democide total 134 million. For those curious, that's 7.5 people an hour, every hour for 2000 years. Again these numbers do not include the war dead, those lost in battle.

[box type="info" icon="none"](for those wondering : 134,000,000 ÷ (24 X 365 = 8760 X 2000 = 17,520,000 hrs)[/box]

Democide in the 20th century alone however totals 169,000,000. That's 169 million. For those who may not grasp the scope of this, it amounts to killing 193 people an hour 24 hours a day nonstop for 100 years. These are figures offered by R.J. Rummel a man that spent 30 years studying this issue. Others in the same field suggest that the figures may be as high as 400 million, which would translate to 450 killings an hour, 24 hours a day nonstop for 100 years.

If you think this kind of effort happens in the shadows and is invisible to us, you are sadly mistaken. War is only one of several methods of culling the masses, let's not forget famine, disease (real or invented), genocide and politicide. These all qualify as death by government. Maybe we should also include the will of God entrenched in our psyche by the church. Many Gods have walked this planet in our histories, one in particular comes to mind, his name was Caesar.

The only reason it is not part of our consciousness is because it doesn't make for polite conversation. Let's face it we all belong to the worthy class right? It's not our responsibility and governments are never influenced by public opinion. This way of life and death, is as much your responsibility as it is mine. When we sanction the death of hundreds of thousands with lies and thinly veiled rhetoric, without prosecuting those responsible, you are simply sanctioning your own disposability and death. All based on a predictable economic model that leads directly to slaughter.

The next paragraph is an exerpt from an article written by R.J. Rummel.

"The more power a government has, the more it can act arbitrarily according to the whims and desires of the elite, the more it will make war on others and murder its foreign and domestic subjects. The more constrained the power of governments, the more it is diffused, checked and balanced, the less it will aggress on others and commit democide".

Did you hear that trigger click while you were reciting your rational ethics? The next time I have to tell you to shut up it'll be a bullet to the head, now get on the train.

I think we can reasonably deduce that there is a movement in our collective consciousness to vilify and marginalize, identify and disenfranchise certain groups. The argument otherwise is not worth the spittle to moisten your tongue. For men reading this site, you know who you are. You know you are at risk. What awaits us in this perfect storm is the element that ignites. The first efforts of chaos will be to bolster and make safe the elite and entitled, to divide them safely from those in need. Those in need will quickly be redefined as criminal and a threat. The men.

Against the notion that I am introducing ludicrous thought, grandstanding to whip up male furor, others much more qualified have said it and continue to say it as a warning. For those men who can see the next logical step in our social justice system, you can take measures to protect yourself. Join or create a local group of men, share your thoughts and discuss your safety. If you can, meet as frequently as possible and get to know each other's capabilities. Consider relocating and sharing your home with other men. Work toward independence, start a garden, share a vehicle, stay strong, stay safe and stay united. The concept here is to build a collaborative process with locals, those close to you that can see the future pressing in.

Message from Dr. T

Dr. Tara J. Palmatier · 22 August 2011 · Archived copy · Original

…
…

[box type="note" icon="none"]

Hi Everyone,

I'll be appearing on AVfM Radio this Tuesday, August 23, 2011 at 9pm Eastern. The call-in number is +1 310 388-9709 or you can Skype in directly to the show.

This will be my last appearance on AVfM Radio for at least the next several months. On Wednesday, September 7, 2011 at 9pm Eastern, the first episode of Shrink4Men Radio will air on BlogTalkRadio using the AVfM platform. If the Shrink4Men program grows over time, I'll eventually transition to its own platform.

At this time, it's unclear if the show will be every week or every other week. I'm currently working out the format. If anyone has suggestions, please post them below or email me at admin@shrink4men.com. The success of the program will largely depend upon audience participation, so we'll see how it goes.

The subject of the August 23rd program on AVfM will be:

[unordered_list style="bullet"]

- Women who make false allegations in order to gain the upper hand in divorce and custody cases.
- Women who encourage their children to make false allegations to gain the upper hand in divorce and custody cases.
- Women who make false allegations to punish their partners for ending their respective relationships.
- Women who threaten to make false allegations to intimidate and control their partners and exes.
- Women who make false allegation in order to cover up their own abusive behavior (DARVO).
- Women who deliberately stage an "attack scene" in order to make false allegations to punish or gain the upper hand. (For example, Wife wants to divorce Husband and shut him out of the house. Wife backs Husband into a corner and gets in his face. In an effort to get away from her, Husband pushes her out of the way and Wife calls police and claims domestic violence.)
- Women who make false allegations against their exes new partners in order to block access to the children.
- Women who make false allegations against their step-children to try to create a wedge between their husbands and children from previous relationships.

[/unordered_list]
In other words, the upcoming episode will be about "lies and the lying liars who tell them" (— Senator Al Franken — politics be damned — that's a great turn of phrase).

There are bad people in the world. Statistically speaking, odds are that half the bad people are women and the other half are men. Some men absolutely deserve to have the cops called on them and so do some women. If you're not violent, abusive nor a sexual predator, then you don't fall into this category.

If your partner, ex, child or step-child threatens to call the police and make false allegations of abuse against you, she or he is attempting to rob you of your freedom and to destroy your reputation, career and other relationships. Perhaps the accuser hasn't thought through the long-term consequences of her actions. Perhaps it's an impulsive show of power. Ultimately, who cares what her or his motivations are. False allegations of abuse are abuse.

If you've been the victim of false allegations, please tune in and call in with your stories. If you were falsely accused, fought back and were able to prove that your accuser was lying, please call in and share how you foiled your liar.

Shrink4Men Coaching and Consulting Services:

Dr Tara J. Palmatier provides confidential, fee-for-service, consultation/coaching services to help both men and women work through their relationship issues via telephone and/or Skype chat. Her practice combines practical advice, support, reality testing and goal-oriented outcomes. Please visit the Shrink4Men Services page for professional inquiries.

[/box]

Academicians reject presumption of guilt for men

Robert O'Hara · 23 August 2011 · Archived copy · Original

[box icon="none"]

PRESS RELEASE

Contact: Wendy McElroy, 301-801-0608, wmcelroy@saveservices.org

ACADEMIA REBELS AGAINST THE PRESUMPTION OF GUILT FOR MEN

WASHINGTON, Aug. 24 / U.S. Newswire / — Stop Abusive and Violent Environments is calling on the U.S. Department of Education to rescind a controversial directive. The new DED rule forces persons to abandon their due process rights to get an education. Such persons are considered "guilty until proven innocent" whenever an on-campus sexual accusation occurs.

On April 4, the DED Office of Civil Rights instructed every university that accepts federal funds to use a "preponderance (51%) of evidence" standard in evaluating allegations of sexual offense, including rape. An accuser only needs to 'tip the scales' for a professor or student to be found "guilty."

But the American Association of University Professors (AAUP) is now objecting. The group wants sexual accusations to be judged by a higher standard than traffic courts use for parking tickets.

On June 27, Gregory Scholtz, AAUP's Director of the Department of Academic Freedom, Tenure, and Governance wrote to DED to protest the "lower standard of proof" that threatens "academic freedom and tenure."

Then on August 18, AAUP's Chair of the Committee on Women expressed concern about the "potential for accusations, even false ones, to ruin a faculty member's career." Backlash from two separate units of the AAUP is remarkable. Their recognition of false accusations is extraordinary.

"People lie for many reasons including revenge and shame; people also make mistakes. This is why courts presume an accused to be innocent and place the burden of proof on the accuser," explains SAVE spokesman Phil Cook. "Hard evidence and due process are all the more important in sexual cases that often devolve to 'he said, she said.'"

As a result of the DED directive, campuses are already beginning to reverse the presumption of innocence. Based on questionable data, men are assumed to be predators and women are said to "never lie" about issues like rape. By lowering the standards of justice, the OCR is encouraging false accusations.

SAVE applauds the AAUP for its courage in demanding the OCR rescind its April 4th mandate. SAVE urges college student parents to contact the Department of Education to demand for due process for all.

The SAVE letter to the Department of Education can be seen here: http://www.saveservices.org/wp-content/uploads/OCRLetter.pdf. SAVE is a national victim advocacy organization working for evidence-based solutions to domestic violence.

[/box]

WSJ Publishes Commentary on New Title IX Sexual Harassment

Robert O'Hara · 23 August 2011 · Archived copy · Original

[box icon="none"]

On August 20th the Wall Street Journal, arguably one of the worlds most prestigious publications, published a commentary written by Peter Berkowitz stating his opinion on the new rules for Title IX higher education funding. These rules, promulgated through a dear colleague letter from Assistant Secretary for Civil Rights Russlynn Ali, head of the Department of Education's Office for Civil Rights (OCR) on April 4th of this year, are explained by Mr Berkowotz as such:

"At the cost of losing federal funding—on which all major institutions of higher education have grown and universities are obliged under Title IX of the Civil Rights Act (which prohibits discrimination on the basis of sex) to thoroughly investigate all allegations of sexual harassment and sexual assault on campus, including the felony of rape. They are also obliged, according to Ms. Ali, to curtail due process rights of the accused.

OCR's new interpretation of Title IX "strongly discourages" universities from permitting the accused "to question or cross-examine the accuser" during the hearing. In addition, if universities provide an appeals process, it must be available to both parties—which subjects the accused to double jeopardy.

Most egregiously, OCR requires universities to render judgment using "a preponderance of the evidence" standard. This means that in a rape case, a campus disciplinary board of faculty, administrators and perhaps students serves as both judge and jury. Few if any of these judges are likely to have professional competence in fact-gathering, evidence analysis or judicial procedure. Yet to deliver a verdict of guilty, they need only believe that the accused is more likely than not to have committed the crime."

The rest of the commentary was, predictably, a scathing indictment of Feminism, Political Correctness and the culture of Higher Education and those holding academic and administrative positions in our learning institutions. He goes on to write:

"One might have hoped that in response to OCR's reduction of due process protections some professors and high university officials would come forward to object.

Where are the professors of literature who will patiently point out that, particularly where erotic desire is involved, intentions can be obscure, passions conflicting, the heart murky and the soul divided?

Where are the professors of natural science who will declare that OCR-dictated hearings are antithetical to the spirit of the scientific method, which depends on respect for the facts and testing claims through rational procedures?

Where are the professors of history, political science and law who will insist clearly and in public that due process is a fundamental component of American political institutions and culture, a cornerstone of our legal system, and indispensable in a free society to the fair administration of justice?

Where are the professors of moral philosophy and practical ethics who will stand up and declare that the presumption of innocence rightly gives expression to both the belief in the dignity of the individual and the awareness of human fallibility?

And where are the deans, provosts and university presidents who will explain in no uncertain terms to their campus communities and to the wider public that weakening due process and freedom of speech protections erodes the framework within which free inquiry flourishes?"

This is without a doubt the highest profile condemnation of feminist governance in the educational system and jurisprudence ever published in any mainstream news publication ever. Mr Berkowitz clearly has pointed a very firm and well aimed finger at the target of so many Men's Rights activists and those concerned about the erosion of due process and the presumption of innocence and declares it abhorrent.

Jezebel, a popular feminist source of news and commentary was not long in attacking his article.

On August 21st Jezebel published Erin Gloria Ryan's article entitled: "Women Threatening To Ruin All College Fun" lambasting Mr. Berkowitz's WSJ piece. In it she states:

"Berkowitz is saying that the possibility of rape accusations threatens to endanger the educational experience for men, but apparently by "educational experience," he means "partying experience." What's under threat is not young men's ability to be educated or to live with freedom and liberty and don't tread on me or whatever conservative buzzphrase he wants to ascribe to it; Berkowitz is deeply upset by the threat that due process poses to college men's ability to have unfettered access to consequence-free sex with drunken co-eds."

Ms. Ryan wrote this in response to Mr. Berkowitz's reasonable and substantiated conclusion that much sex on campus is casual and often times fueled by alcohol. Thus, making claims about sexual impropriety often times ambiguous and certainly prone to deliberate falsification as was seen at Hofstra. This also underscores the undeniable theme in her article that the whole reason that men go to college is to have unfettered sex whenever they want and not to get an education.

More commentary on both sides is expected.

[/box]

WSJ piece ticks off the Jezzy's

Paul Elam · 23 August 2011 · Archived copy · Original

[dropcap]J[/dropcap]ust recently Peter Berkowitz of the Wall Street Journal penned a scathing assessment of the Obama administration's decision to ~~encourage~~ blackmail federally supported universities unless they comply with the president's mandate for them to adopt the lowest standards of proof possible, and deny the right of the accused to question his accuser, when investigating allegations of rape on campus.

It seems Mr. Berkowitz is under the impression that men accused of sexual criminality somehow deserve due process and the right to defend themselves. Silly pundit, this is 2011. Due process and constitutional rights for men were tossed out with the first rape shield laws in the late 1970's. If you were going to get huffy about it, Peter, any time in the last 30 years would have been a better place to start. And it might have afforded you a much better perspective on the big picture and the etiology of the problem, both of which have only been aggravated by the current administration. The problem didn't start there.

But even as day-late-and-dollar-short as the WSJ article is, it is quite on target and surgical for a mainstream publication. And it quickly struck a sour chord with feminist ideologues, as evidenced by the bleeding Vaginacrats over at Jezebel.com.

Ellen Gloria Ryan started her article with the typically banal and expected attempt at derision. "Stop the presses! A man is upset!" That's Jezzy code speak for "Circle the wagons girls, some uppity male pointed at our bullshit and called it bullshit." Only her attempt at wagon circling was executed with a lack of finesse and skill so egregious that she ended up looking like a feminist trying to say something intelligent.

After six paragraphs of pointlessness, two of which were copy and paste from the original article, Ryan finally attempts to make a point of her ramble. In reacting to Berkowitz's painfully fundamental observation that pro-female aspects of feminist governance stem from, uh, feminism, Ryan says the following:

[quote]This would be an apt statement if it wasn't made against a straw man and it didn't reflect a disturbing lack of trust in college women. If men aren't to be presumed to be rapists, then are the women who do report rapes liars?[/quote]

After we dismiss her straw man about the straw man, and forgive her for that last, horrendously structured sentence, we really can get to the ~~meat~~ tofu of her problem. First, there is the "disturbing lack of trust in college women." Casting aside the temptation to say "Stop the presses, a woman is upset!" I will instead point out that the disturbing lack of trust in college women is a matter likely aggravated by the disturbing lack of trustworthiness in college women.

When it comes to rape, women, in college or not, regularly lie like a crumb covered four year old next to an empty cookie jar. Here are sources for fence sitters to learn from and Jezzy's to ignore, just as Ryan did in the Berkowitz piece.

The whole point of gathering evidence and proving a case is that you are not supposed to just trust people when they allege a crime has occurred. We (assumedly) don't get to just point fingers and hear the guilty verdict five minutes later. Allegations actually have to be proven with something more substantive than "Dude, like girls don't lie." God, do I really have to explain this shit? Please, don't answer that.

Actually, if there is any trust to be had, the presumption of innocence lends it to the accused; at least in a sane and just society. But of course since Ryan's intent here is to remain willfully ignorant of the value of that presumption – cuz grrls don't lie – then we are forced by reason to dispense with the illusion that she has any understanding of, or interest in, due process, or justice.

In order to keep myself off the path of futility I have to remind myself that trying to educate feminists with facts and reason is like trying to treat cancer with Band-Aides and merthiolate.

And remember, this is the Jezzy's we're talking about. It's the same crowd of women who gather online to back slap each other and gloat over being physically abusive to their partners. So I am hardly surprised at how well they cozy up to the idea of extending that power to abuse into university administration offices and courts of law.

To bolster her sagging rhetoric, Ryan gives us an equally flaccid citation on campus rape reports. "What of the horrifying statistics that paint a picture of rampant sexual assault on college campuses?" she demands to know, without a horrifying number to support those horrifying statistics. To her credit, she does provide us with a horrifying link to a horrifying website. Publicintegrity.org is a sexual grievance industry website teaming with rape hysteria and possessing all the "integrity" you would find at a congressional budget meeting.

[image]The rest of Ryan's diatribe went downhill from there, almost in defiance of physics. She basically accused Berkowitz of trying to defend men's right to ~~party~~ rape, and called it a day. Standard feminist fare.

Oh, and by the way, I know I was a tad harsh on Berkowitz at the start of this piece. That sort of thing happens when I see mainstream pundits stumble on stuff we have been writing about for years. They only prove that they were either ignorant or uninterested till they finally woke up a little, mistaking their new and likely transient consciousness for genius and inspiration. Clever bastard, that Peter, we were all so fooled till he came along.

But overall this was a still a very important piece. It triggered something that you can see in between each and every line of Ryan's less than cogent scrawling. Fear.

Indeed, our blogs in the MRM are growing in audience and are being read by mainstream writers. In the future you will see more and more of them taking the things we have been dissecting for years and presenting them as new and cutting edge to the ignorant masses. Fine with me. If I cared about blue pill recognition I would have taken my wares in that direction long ago.

Regardless of who gets credit (or the money) for doing it, the fact remains that it will be done. This is not the last article like this that you will see. There will be more, and more strident, works in the mainstream to come in the future. And it will answer a question that has been ignored for five decades.

Suppose they had a gender war and men showed up? All we have to do now is wait for CNN and Fox to cover the action; sorties, ground maneuvers and all. But be sure to set your DVR to record. Once it starts in earnest, it will be over on the quick.

AVfM News Release: Filler Case

Robert O'Hara · 25 August 2011 · Archived copy · Original

…
[box type="download" icon="none"]

FOR IMMEDIATE RELEASE

Contact: Paul Elam, A Voice for Men
P.O. Box301172
Houston,TX77230
http://www.avoiceformen.com
e-mail: avoiceformen@yahoo.com

Bar Harbor Maine prosecutor faces disbarment for prosecuting innocent men for rape

A Bar Harbor Maine prosecutor faces historic proceedings after the state Board of Overseers of the Bar Counsel issues a rare recommendation of finding probable cause of prosecutorial misconduct following a 7 month long investigation. Assistant district attorney Mary N. Kellett has been accused of prosecuting dozens of men for sex crimes even when evidence of their innocence was established. Several prosecuted men were accused by their wives or girlfriends in the course of their divorce or child custody disputes. The complaints investigated by the Bar Counsel Scott Davis cited witness and evidence tampering and presentation of false facts and evidence before the Court by prosecutor Mary N. Kellett.

The misconduct first came to light in the case of Vladek Filler, a husband accused of sexual misconduct by his estranged wife during their divorce and child custody battle in the Bar Harbor area[1]. Filler won and maintained sole custody of his children during two criminal prosecutions for spousal rape and the prosecutor's appeal to the Supreme Court[2].

Renowned private investigator TJ Ward of the Natalie Halloway Aruba case conducted a two year investigation of the Filler rape case and called it a "fabrication," publicly criticizing prosecutor Mary Kellett's conduct[3]. The Maine Supreme Judicial Court followed with a decision noting prosecutor's misconduct in the case[4], and numerous complaints to the State of Maine's Board of Overseers of the Bar followed[5].

The Filler case shed light on numerous prosecutions of innocent men[6] in this small New England community which have been dubbed "The modern day Salem witch trials"[7]. Even on the eve of Board of Overseers Commission meeting concerning prosecutor Mary Kellett's misconduct, new charges surface of witness tampering and misinforming the Court. The misconduct resulted in a mistrial and in the office of Attorney General's office publicly pointing at prosecutor Mary Kellett[8]. A Voice for Men, an advocacy organization, is calling for disbarment of attorney Mary Kellett by the Board of Overseers of the Bar, and for her immediate suspension in the interim by the Hancock County District Attorney Carletta Bassano.

For more information contact Paul Elam of A Voice for Men at avoiceformen.com

# #

[1] http://www.renewamerica.com/columns/roberts/110410
[2] http://www.saveservices.org/wp-content/uploads/3.30.11pressrelease.pdf
[3] http://ncfm.org/wp-content/uploads/2011/04/110407-NCFM-press-release-re-Vladek-Filler-in-Maine.pdf

[4] http://www.courts.state.me.us/court_info/opinions/2010%20documents/10me90fi.pdf
[5] http://www.saveservices.org/wp-content/uploads/COMPLA1.pdf
[6] http://fillerfund.com/marykellett.htm
[7] http://fillerfund.com/
[8] http://bangordailynews.com/2011/08/18/news/hancock/blue-hill-man-seeks-case-dismissal-over-bad-information-from-prosecutors/

[/box]

Australia- Fears of Pedophilia Shut down “Men’s Shed”

Robert O'Hara · 25 August 2011 · Archived copy · Original

[box icon=”none”]

Baseless fears of predatory activity have shut down a budding chapter of an increasingly popular men’s group in Australia this week. On the 21st of August the Coolum and North Square News, a publication serving a beach community on Australia’s east coast, published a story detailing a complaint that hauled the establishment of a “Men’s Shed” in the community. The complaint, made by an anonymous man, stated that his concerns about the group of mostly retired and semi-retired men led him to walk his child to the bus stop instead of letting them walk themselves.

From the article:

“Chairman of this men’s shed, former council candidate Ron Campbell, said the complaint to council referred to a “concern of lascivious behavior” by members of the group.”

“Lascivious” refers to being lewd or driven by lust.

“They felt we would create a risk to their children,” Mr Campbell said.

“He (the complainant) now had to go to the bus stop with his child, instead of letting them walk past.”

The Men’s Shed members were handed a 20-year-lease from Coast philanthropist Ray Grace, who donated a small, unused strawberry farm and shed for their use. Plans were discussed for the group to help less fortunate children on the Coast, with former mechanics and builders easily capable of building or repairing toys and bikes.

There was even an idea of having the group act as communal “poppies” – acting as ring-in role models so youngsters could learn basic mechanics, how to repair a bike or work on the Palmwoods farm.

“There was no complaint about parking or noise,” Mr Campbell said. “There was no other complaint but that we might pose a risk of pedophiles.”

The complainant warned council he would pursue any use of the land by the men and have them removed from the site. So, for now, members can do anything on the land as long as it is considered “rural use.” Anything beyond that – including any work for the benefit of children or the elderly – will be done at an abandoned Eudlo sawmill which has no electricity, water supply or other facilities.”

After a flurry of responses to the article comments were closed.

Mensheds, an organization dedicated to establishing local men’s clubs all over Australia in order to provide men with a place they can socialize and engage in community service, originated out of a handful of loosely associated men’s groups that started to organize in 2002 and now boasts over a thousand chapters. Its mission is to improve the quality of life for men and to help engage in community service. Special attention is paid to men suffering emotionally and financially after divorce or facing ill health in older age. They were featured on the popular community radio show Dads On The Air in January of 2008 and their popularity has been growing ever since.

[/box]

The fatherhood effect

J Galt · 25 August 2011 · Archived copy · Original

When I was younger, at the beginning of the relationship with my first wife, I had the occasion to babysit for a family member and was accompanied by my partner. The child a girl about 5 at the time seemed to be edgy and clingy after her parents had left. I decided it might be comforting for her to sit and draw pictures. She quietly insisted on our presence and participation. Clearly she wasn't comfortable alone and was looking for attention.

We continued to draw and I decided to attempt an experiment with her that focused on archetypal symbols. I asked her to draw a house, a tree, a river, the sun and a snake. Some may know what the symbols represent. If you don't, no big deal. It doesn't really matter. Let's say symbols and characters can often represent people or things, our relationship to them and how we may be feeling about them.

The process I use is to simply note the detail of each symbol and ask questions. If you're clever you can use this exercise to introduce positive reasoning skills to address feelings of discomfort. For example if the tree represented the father and it has many branches and no leaves, it may represent a father that is unavailable and often busy. Questions help. Is it autumn? Wow that tree has to work really hard to get enough water out of the ground to make leaves for shade. I'm sure the reader gets the point.

I'd like to note if you're not comfortable with communicating this way, don't. Not everyone is comfortable with abstract conversation and it's easy to misinterpret what is being communicated. My personal opinion is this can help with talking to kids, primarily because they provide the subject matter with their art. My rule of thumb is to never allow my reaction or response to be equal to or stronger than theirs. If it is you may be coercing them to confuse their own feelings with yours. It's disrespectful to treat a child this way. All I can say is – don't. I take a passive role, ask questions, suggest abstract alternatives to abstract statements and listen. They know what they mean. I don't.

In the experiment I was conducting, the most unusual detail was the snake was drawn in the river and the river was drawn with waves. I wondered about this and asked questions.

> "I see waves in your river; is the water rushing by?"
>
> "Yes, the water is very fast, the baby snake can't swim very well."
>
> "Oh that's a baby snake swimming?"

All at once she jumped into my arms sobbing and said. "The mommy and daddy snake are swimming to fast and the baby snake can't keep up, the baby is going to get lost."

Needless to say, I got the drift, held her tight and let her cry. Once she finished, I asked if she felt better. She said she did and I said that I thought the baby snake was a pretty good swimmer and knew when to ask for help. I realized the isolation she felt and gave it some thought. I concluded that she was unable to find a way or did not know how to express what she was feeling and may not have even understood her own feelings of isolation. I have carried that experience with me for years, always with an eye to test the insight and try to change it.

Years later my older son was telling me how much he enjoyed his time with his nieces and nephews. "I have no doubt they love you bud, you are their Uncle Hero!"

> "I miss them," he said. "I wish I had more time to spend with them."
>
> "You do," I said. "Try using the phone."
>
> "Right," he said. "Just what would we talk about? They would rather play and wrestle."
>
> "You are one dumb shit, Bud. Remember the girl you were telling me about? Call your niece and tell her."
>
> "Yeah, right, like a nine year old would understand," he responded.

"Look dipshit, maybe you should consider showing your niece some respect and talking to her in a language she can understand. Hi Angie, do you have a minute to talk, I'm calling to get some advice and see what you think. There's a girl I met, she's pretty and nice, but she won't talk to me, what should I do? If you don't trust kids enough to be honest and open with them, why the fuck would they ever trust you? Keep it simple and they will, too. Zach, think about it."

Kids spend their whole childhood being directed, told what to do, where to do it and when to do it. The moment a child displays kindness they are providing evidence of their thoughtfulness, but we don't ask them for their thoughts, we tell them what to think. Unfortunately we regiment them out of their humanity, train them to follow our definition of responsible and even as adults we are not responsible.

How can it be that a responsible adult can choose who they are accountable to and what they are accountable for? We confuse entitlement for responsibility and praise ourselves for it. Responsibility is an obligation; an availability; an act of listening, taking account. The only time we listen to our children is when we need evidence to correct and control them.

You should be very careful when talking to kids. They are easily coerced, intimidated and controlled. If you do that you will miss their message and they will just give you what you force out of them.

To start the conversation why wouldn't you call your 6 year old nephew to discuss gaming, or the new bike you want to buy? Do you really believe he has no opinion? How do they learn to think, to agree or disagree if you don't talk to them. Where do they get self-respect if you and I don't show them what it is? How will a child understand the concept of honesty if it is only solicited on demand and never freely exchanged?

They don't need to be right and they particularly don't need to be wrong. They do need to be valued. Your honesty and willingness to exchange allows them to conceptualize and express. In that process they learn how to respect a meaningful dialogue. If you say to a child, I feel sad, the people at work are not very nice to me and I don't know what to do, it becomes an open door to problem solve and a process they can use as a template to serve themselves in similar conditions. They will learn to ask questions pertinent to the problem and develop those skills. Or we can teach them to pathologize their feelings and medicate.

[image]If Brian says he thinks you should get a bike that's green, then you fucking get a bike that's green. Thank him for his advice and know that green is the color of your respect and love for him. If you don't allow kids to negotiate a partnership in life, where do they fit? How can they know it's their world if they have no say?

You're their Hero for fuck sake, not their authoritarian, or a cop to police them. If we don't hold kids in higher esteem and show respect, who will they turn to when things get tuff for them? How do they turn adversity around if the simplest resource, conversation is not part of their strategy?

Discipline today for kids is about conforming, following a very narrow definition of acceptance. Zach, do you remember when you were 8 and your mother caught you playing with matches in your bed?

Yeah, but do we have to talk about that? Hey what happened when I found out? Actually you took me out to the back field and we burned shit. I particularly liked when we filled that hole with gasoline and lit it.

The point is Zach, you got to explore your curiosity, I got to teach you about fire and what it can do and we all got to live safer. Discipline isn't about conforming it's about thinking and learning.

I have always believed that children are self-taught and spend most of their time learning, whether it's a toddler moving from shelf to shelf, or running up and down stairs. If you replace the word play with the word learn, then whatever a kid is doing becomes immediately interesting. Their method of learning and the object of their learning makes them interesting. Once you have interest you have conversation and communication. Too often kids become decorations in our life, they are the decoration of our ability to control our lives, the evidence of our conformity. Sit still, behave, listen, don't touch that, I said no, stop fidgeting, put that away.

Children are terribly isolated from a very common human experience. The playfulness of conversation that we exchange between adults can be had with children if you can respect their boundaries. We have a physical bond by proximity and affection but we offer them no freedom to express their thoughtfulness. We regiment their performance but we exclude their experience and their freedom to express it. We love them, but only enough to maintain our sense of control and safety, enough for them to conform to our fears.

We all wish for our children to be safe but we only give them a narrow bandwidth to communicate. How could they possibly learn to identify a predator if they are unable to discern deception? How could they possibly say no when we constantly require and coerce them to obey? We teach them to be afraid, but we don't give them skills to overcome their fears.

An urgent and rare opportunity to speak out

Paul Elam · 25 August 2011 · Archived copy · Original

[box type="note" icon="none"]

Below you will read an email I have just sent to Russlyn Ali, the assistant secretary for civil rights at the U.S. Department of Education, who also happens to be the chief architect of the notorious "Dear College" letter that informed American universities that they were being strong armed by the Obama administration into eliminating due process for college men accused of sexual crimes and placing criminal matters in the hands of college administrators as opposed to the criminal justice system. Many of you have read the scathing evisceration of this affront to the constitution as published in the Wall Street Journal.

Now why is this letter so important? Well, I think for obvious reasons we need to raise our voice against this kind of bald tyranny. But what is even more special about this is the email address provided. It is not a government form or an office address.

It is the direct, personal email for Russlyn Ali.

I have it on pristine authority that this is the email she uses for day to day business.

Don't ask me how I know that. Let us just say that as the movement grows, so does our reach. And now is the time that you can reach out, personally, to register your objections to this heinous policy directly to the source.

And, if you will PLEASE pass this announcement and the email address around as quickly as possible, but AFTER you write your own email and send it.

I would like to remind everyone that the most effective way to get this point across is politely, but firmly. I trust you know how to do that.

[/box]

[box type="alert" icon="none"]

Dear Ms. Ali,

I am writing to register my vehement objection, indeed my shock and offense, regarding the actions of your office to undermine due process and foster a "guilty until proven innocent," standard at our institutions of higher education, and to financially coerce them into compliance with the same.

The safety of our citizens from sexual assault is a concern to all Americans, but the actions of your office has veered us onto a path of hysteria and witch hunts, to be enforced, no less, by the federal government.

The AAUP has come out in opposition to this, and I am sure you are familiar with the scathing and accurate assessment of this policy by the Wall Street Journal as "institutionalizing a presumption of guilt in sexual assault cases."

Ms. Ali, this is an abominable misuse of federal powers and a literal shredding of our constitutional rights. The only decent thing that remains for you and the administration to do is rescind that awful directive.

Sincerely,

Paul Elam
Houston, Texas

[/box]

[box icon=”none”]Activists, let’s ACT. You can write Ali and voice your protest to this policy at russlynn.ali@ed.gov[/box]

The death of due process for males in higher education

NCFM · 26 August 2011 · Archived copy · Original

[quote]civil rights n. those rights guaranteed by the Bill of Rights, the 13th and 14th Amendments to the Constitution, including the right to due process, equal treatment under the law of all people regarding enjoyment of life, liberty, property, and protection…[/quote]

¤

[dropcap]A[/dropcap]ll Americans have "civil rights," not just women. Yet the U.S. Department of Education seeks to deny men our most sacred of protections from oppression–the right to testify on their own behalf, the right to representation, the right to witnesses; and the right to examine accusers.

According to the Wall Street Journal, Assistant Secretary for Civil Rights Russlynn Ali, head of the Department of Education's Office for Civil Rights (OCR), recently distributed a coercive letter discouraging universities from permitting persons [meaning men] accused of offending or sexually assaulting "to question or cross-examine the accuser," during the hearing. In addition, any appeals process must be available to both parties—thereby subjecting the accused to double jeopardy. Worse, still OCR requires universities to use "a preponderance of the evidence"—no hard evidence required — the lowest possible evidentiary standard. Ms. Ali's message: Comply or lose Federal funding.

[quote style="boxed" float="right"]If there's any gender inequality in universities the victims are men, not women.[/quote] On August 18, 2011 Cary Nelson, President American Association of University Professors, and Ann E. Green, Chair, Committee on Women in the Academic Profession, AAUP, sent a strong letter to Ms. Ali which says, "We… applaud your efforts to address systemic gender inequalities in the US educational system. By instructing educational institutions to develop clear procedures to address sexual harassment and sexual violence, the Office of Civil Rights is helping to create a more equitable environment for women [emphasis added]. As an organization, the AAUP has long sought to address gender inequity in the profession…"

If there's any gender inequality in universities the victims are men, not women. Universities typically have more female than male students, staff, and administrators. There are over 400 university Women Studies programs, a couple of Men's Studies programs designed and operated by feminists, and not one "Male Studies" program designed and operated by people who care about and respect males, though Dr. Edward Stevens, founder of the Foundation for Male Studies, has dedicated much of his life creating one.

Courageously Nelson and Green assert that, "Sexual harassment and sexual violence are not only women's issues. Too often addressing sexual harassment is seen only as a means of protecting women. As professors, we are concerned with addressing systemic gender inequities by educating both men and women about fairness and justice." Statements such as those are not thought typical since our university systems have been imbibed with radicalized feminist ideology. To see two leading academicians extend such consideration is heartening and may indicate that academia may be getting fed up with the misandric rules and regulations that plague our institutions of higher education.

Unfortunately, their concern seems primarily for faculty member peers rather than students. They say, "[g]iven the seriousness of accusations of harassment and sexual violence and the potential for accusations, even false ones, to ruin a faculty member's career [emphasis added], we believe 'clear and convincing' standard of evidence is more appropriate than the 'preponderance of evidence' standard."

Existing procedures for eradicating sexual harassment and sexual violence at universities has been and is exclusively directed at males, even though research shows or strongly suggests most intimate partner abuse among college students is perpetrated by young women – not young men.

Moreover, examination of data from any major university will reveal that confirmed cases of either sexual harassment or sexual violence are almost as rare as male graduates with Master Degrees in Women Studies.

Interestingly, neither Ms. Ali, the Department of Education, nor the AAUP mentions anything about holding false accusers accountable, which, of course, would chill many if not most accusations.

Warren Farrell in his book The Myth of Male Power rightly said that males are disposable. Our institutions of higher education are so corrupted by radical feminist thought, influence, and power that even our professors and legislators acquiesce to virtually any initiative that strips males of whatever it is they may still possess, including their self-respect and especially their freedoms. The letter from the DOE is but another step in the process of disenfranchising.

Such hypocrisy borders on treason as national policy. The misandric policies of the Department of Education need to be abolished in favor of equitable treatment for all, which includes due process procedures leading to findings of fact rather than wishy-washy predetermined ideological outcomes.

The Secretary of Education needs to publicly retract her sexist policies and ensure due process and equal opportunity in higher education for all. Regardless, Secretary Duncan, Ms. Ali, and all involved in this scheme to deny men their civil rights should resign immediately. Clearly they have no respect for “civil rights” or education, regardless of gender.

Adventures of a child abusing bitch at PsychCentral.com

Paul Elam · 27 August 2011 · Archived copy · Original

[dropcap]I[/dropcap]n a perfect world it is the one responsibility of mental health professionals to help victims of mental illness identify dysfunctional behaviors, especially abusive ones, and direct them toward healthier, safer decisions and living. And even as far gone as the mental health community is these days, that goal is still generally the mandate for most of them.

Others, not so much. In fact, it is apparently the goal of some to not only ignore these things, but to even foster and enable them. Nowhere is this more evident, as far as I have seen in recent times, than at the website called PsychCentral, which is run by John M. Grohol, Psy.D., Editor-in-Chief of PsychCentral, and who proclaims himself a "pioneer in online mental health."

What he is, in reality, is a pioneer of enabling child abuse and hiding it behind a thinly veiled façade of mental health services. If this seems implausible to you, kindly read on.

One of the features of the PsychCentral website is the provision of blogging services to some site members who are afflicted with mental illness. One such blog on the site is called Adventures of a Bipolar Mom, by a woman who identifies herself as Beth. In a recent blog entry, which I stumbled on by visiting Dr. Tara Palmatier's Shrink4Men website, Beth takes us through an incident in her home involving her oldest "and most obnoxious" son.

Her account is poorly written, but from what I was able to discern she bought her son a video game. His reaction was apparently less than appreciative, but again it is hard to tell. Beth would have us believe that she handed him the game and his immediate response was "shut up, man."

She didn't provide any real sequence of events, so it lacks a lot of credibility. One would think that Hey, I bought you this cool video game, doesn't just segue into Shut up, man very smoothly. There is information missing here, but that isn't really the point.

She provides us the point by going on to say the following:

[quote]He continued with the attitude, that "whatever" teenage attitude that I absolutely despise. It just infuriated me even more. See, I am so limited in how I can handle such an obnoxious outburst from my possibly bipolar son. He has a mouth full of metal (and I mean full, with contraptions I couldn't even try to describe) so bloodying a lip very well might end up being an ER visit, stitches, and a visit with child protective services. No thanks.[/quote]

And she goes on to offer more of her "rationale" as to why she should abstain from beating the crap out of her son:

[quote]Keep in mind I am a short 5'2? and he is a towering 5'9?, maybe 5'10? – getting in his face is getting difficult. My niece standing there, I threw my finger in his face and dared him to test me. He knows better, he knows his mother is crazy, why push the crazy bipolar mom into a rage? That's just stupid if you ask me.[/quote]

And there you have it. Poor Bipolar baby. She could not smash him across the face for acting like a teenager because it might mean doctors and some trouble from authorities. Besides, he is getting big enough to defend himself from the abuse, so she must be careful; nothing so upsetting as the perp becoming the victim. But all is not lost, he can still be intimidated with just how crazy she is and the possibility of what could happen if he does anything "stupid," like resist.

And she thinks all this is unfair, to her. Is it any wonder that she uses a picture of herself on the blog with her arm used to cover her face and eyes? You have seen the pose before, usually from people walking into courthouses to face the music on matters they would rather not have associated with their face. It is called a perp walk, and the Adventures of a Bipolar Mom Blog is an ongoing edition of it.

But seriously, here is the real travesty. PsychCentral is a web portal purporting to help the mentally ill by offering information, education and direct mental health services by qualified individuals. Of course, any qualified individual would have reacted professionally to what was written and intervened.

From a mental health professional who understands the first thing about the ethics and cardinal rules of that work, there would have been an attempt to one, assess whether this youth was in any danger and take action, if necessary, to protect them. And two, offer unambiguous guidance for the person who was the threat, trying to guide them toward less destructive and dysfunctional behaviors.

The response of the management (Dr. Grohol) of PsychCentral was complete silence, and the blog remains up at the time I write this.

While there were a couple of attempts from readers to point to the fact that this was abusive conduct, there was nothing from any mental health professionals, and some readers egged on the abuse. And it should also be noted that Dr. Palmatier has been subjected to hostile emails and threats since writing about this story.

From a reader with the screen name SuzannaMcMahan, Beth got the ubiquitous supportive mantra of "You go, girl!" followed by a short post outlining the positive aspects of a personal lack of accountability. In short, the enabling by omission from the management of PsychCentral resulted in more direct enabling from its readers.

[image]Even with my busy schedule I am suiting up in full FTSU gear for this one. This is child abuse, pure and simple. And I am going to do something about it. And as I am want to do, I am asking for your active help as well.

PsychCentral needs to take down this disgraceful fucking blog, immediately and permanently. And then they need to follow through with their professional responsibilities to safeguard the well-being of the teenager involved. If they do anything less it makes them complicit with child abuse and guilty of unconscionable professional negligence. That won't be tolerated either.

There will be much more on this to come, but for now the first application of pain is due. Here is a couple of tidbits of actionable information. Dr. Grohol's contact information is as follows:

[box type="note" icon="none"]

Psych Central
55 Pleasant St., Suite 207
Newburyport, MA 01950
Tel. 978.992.0008

His email address is talkback@psychcentral.com.

[/box]

Oh, and Ms. McMahan, the "You go girl" moron that sounded like she was auditioning to be a shill for Sharon Osborne? Well, her name linked back to her website. She is apparently a trinket maker that fashions her work out of "Wire & Recycled Vintage Jewelry."

[box type="download" icon="none"]

I have remove this information to comply with certain social networking posting guidelines. For those that would like it, you may post a request in the comments and I will respond by email.

I am sure she would welcome some opinions as well.

[/box]

It makes me wonder, since Beth's son wears braces that are preventing her from bloodying him up, and Suzanne makes jewelry from scrap wire, perhaps they could form a team and make a few bucks from holding him down and stripping the metal right out of his obnoxious mouth? Perhaps Dr. Grohol would be willing to give them some ad space at PsychCentral with a customer's discount.

Yes, Dr. Grohol, that was sarcasm. But I will tell you what isn't. I am not going to rest until you take down that blog and stop providing a public forum for sick people to glorify and justify child abuse. Kindly take a serious look at the activism documented throughout this website and then ask yourself if you think I am kidding.

A profile of Michael Kimmel

Magdelyn C. Prossii · 27 August 2011 · Archived copy · Original

[dropcap]M[/dropcap]ichael Kimmel is to scholarship what intelligent design is to science – a false parity of the process of inquiry. It's not intellectual curiosity that motivates him. He is not interested in investigating phenomena or acquiring knowledge. Like all people of faith, he already knows the answer. Kimmel's answer? Feminism. Feminism, with all its faith-based tenets, is the punch line to all his "scholarship." Yet, it is not Kimmel's blind faith in his ideology that is disturbing. It is that he enthusiastically vilifies a relatively powerless group of society – young men.

Kimmel's contempt is palpable when he writes about Doug Anglin, a former high school student who sued his high school on the premise that schools discriminate against boys. (Kimmel, "A War Against Boys?"; Dissent Magazine, Fall, 2006.) Kimmel writes, "And though it's tempting to parse the statements of a mediocre high school senior…Anglin's apparent admissions angle is but the latest skirmish of a much bigger battle in the culture wars." You can almost feel the hostility oozing out, as if the old man seriously considered matching wits with a seventeen year old "mediocre high school student." That says more about Kimmel than it does about Anglin. What is it about Doug Anglin that is so contemptible to Kimmel? It is enlightening to realize that Anglin shares something in common with other victims of Kimmel's academic aspersions.

IN HIS PAPER, "GLOBAL MASCULINITIES: RESTORATION AND RESISTANCE" (GENDER POLICY REVIEW) KIMMEL QUOTES SOCIOLOGIST ERVING GOFFMAN:

In an important sense there is only one complete unblushing male in America: a young man, married, white, urban, northern, heterosexual, Protestant, father, of college education, fully employed, of good complexion, weight, and height, and a recent record in sports.

Too young to be married, a father, or fully employed, Doug Anglin is a young, white, urban, northern, heterosexual (assumedly), of good complexion, an athletic built young man that played sports (baseball and soccer) and who sought a college education. This, I suspect, is the real problem Kimmel has with Anglin. Although Kimmel perfunctorily attempts to mitigate his obvious distain for his chosen subject with polite references to diversity, it is only window dressing. Why does Kimmel spend time talking about a demographic he obviously despises? Calling Kimmel an authority on boys and men is like calling Joseph Mengele an authority of human anatomy – even if it were true, the thought is repulsive and the pronouncement unconscionable.

Look at his work, "Guyland; The Perilous World Where Boys Become Men." It's an attack on people like Anglin. Go to the official website of Guyland. The first image you will see is five (four on the book cover) good looking white boys who appear to be young, white, urban, heterosexual, Protestant, college kids.

Why don't any of these kids have stereotypically Semitic features? I guess Jews don't dwell in Guyland. The image of these men appears to have been photo-shopped to feminize their lips by coloring them an unnatural, lipstick-esque, shade of red. This is symbolically exactly what Kimmel wants for our young men, the feminization of masculinity.

In fact, Guyland is a racist assault on white young men. "The guys that populate Guyland are mostly white, middle-class kids…Guyland rests on a bed of middle-class entitlement, a privilege sense that you are special." (Kimmel, Michael; "Guyland; The Perilous World Where Boys Become Men," HarperCollins Books, New York, NY, 2008, pg. 8-11.) It's as if Kimmel is looking at these all American types and lashing out at them for being popular. Picture Kimmel in high school; a weak, awkward, obediently studious, creep who resented the popular boys for nailing the girls of whom he would fantasize while under the covers, masturbating. One can imagine him muttering to himself in sulky celibacy; "Don't these girls know that still waters run deep? If only I could get them to see my genius…" He writes:

[quote]What boys 'need'… [are programs] that both honor the actual diversity on boys' experiences – including those who are shy, like school, and/or who study hard – and interrupt the facile connection that is made between academic disinterest and masculinity.(Kimmel, "Boys and School: A Background Paper on the 'Boy Crisis,'" 2010, pg. 34.)[/quote]

What he is saying is that we need programs to honor people like Michael Kimmel. He appears to be the male manifestation of the quote, "There are a lot of homely women in women's studies. Preaching these anti-male, anti-sex sermons is a way for them to compensate for various heartaches — they're just mad at the beautiful girls." Add to this frustration an unhealthy dose of mother-worship, and you may just have the adolescent cocktail that served as the impetus for his subsequent career.

His ramblings demonstrate a man with the ego of an elephant, but the self-esteem of a cockroach. Go to his website and read his "biography." The funny thing about his biography is that – it isn't…a biography. You learn nothing about the man, or where he comes from, or what life experiences contributed to his work. His "biography" is a listing of his accomplishments in a sort of "I'm smart, not like everybody says" exercise in self-aggrandization. One is stuck with the image of a balding, post middle-aged man with a creepy smile and no context with which humanize him.

According to Kimmel, "[Y]oung men typically enter Guyland before they turn 16, and leave in their mid to late 20s…Guyland lies between the dependency and lack of autonomy of boyhood and the sacrifice and responsibility of manhood." (Kimmel, Michael; "Guyland; The Perilous World Where Boys Become Men," HarperCollins Books, New York, NY, 2008, pg. 8) What Kimmel is stating is that grown people of the male persuasion are not men until they "sacrifice" and take "responsibility." You would never expect him to say that people of the female persuasion are not women until some vague event. He just assumes all people of a certain age with vaginas have matured into full human beings. He does not gift the same benefit to our young men. What does he think of young men?

THE BASELINE FROM WHICH KIMMEL APPROACHES BOYS IS THAT THEY ARE SUB-HUMAN.

"The most depressing four words in all educational circles these days are 'boys will be boys.'…what we're saying when we say 'boys will be boys' is boys will be violent, rapacious animals." I don't know what boys he's been hanging out with. Those aren't the boys I've seen. God forbid we allow boys to be boys. A central tenet of his faith is that there is something fundamentally wrong with men and manhood. So, his work is based upon the question, "Why can't a boy be more like a girl?"

When Kimmel defended feminism in the context of the "boy crisis" he, like the American Association of University Women (AAUW) and Sara Mead of the Education Sector, ironically attempts to shift the focus away from gender. "Why don't the critics acknowledge these race and class differences?" he pouts. (Kimmel, A War Against Boys, Dissent Magazine, Fall, 2006.) This is the same refrain put forth the AAUW and Sara Mead:

"…What has happened is that women's organizations, in an attempt to viciate the call for the fair distrubtion of resources, have played the race card and said, 'Oh, don't worry white middle America, your sons aren't doing that much worse that white girls, its only the blacks and Latinos who are woefully behind — no problem here.' The argument is racist and patently untrue for both the interpretation of the research and the actual facts. Boys — ALL BOYS — regardless of income or race fare worse than girls, a reversal of fortunes that has specifically been ignored by both the media and academics, because boys are not as sypathetic as girls…"

Look at Kimmel's own focus. He levels his distain toward one group, white boys,. "[O]n most measures boys—at least the middle class white boys everyone seems concerned about—are doing just fine, taking their places in an unequal society to which they have always felt entitled." (WEEA Digest, Nov. 2000). Why doesn't Kimmel deal with race and class? The answer is that if the fabric of society were complex, the notion of "patriarchy" goes out the window. "Patriarchy" is the simple minded polemic used to assign false causation to complex social phenomena, championed by gender war partisans.

More telling than his shuck and jive with gender and race, is that fact that Kimmel is just patently dishonest. He writes, "[Scott Adams] that women have overtaken men in college attendance and if the situation were reversed it would be considered a national emergency. No, it would actually be considered the Ivy League in 1965. It wouldn't be considered anything. It would be considered normal." (Salon.com interview of Kimmel, Mar. 29, 2011, "Is the Men's Rights Movement Growing?") This statement ignores the fact that Harvard went co-ed in 1977; Princeton, 1969; Dartmouth, 1972; Cornell, 1870 (no, that's not a typo); Brown, 1971; Yale, 1969; Columbia, 1983, and UPenn, fully coed by 1954; all in response to perceived inequities between the sexes. In a 2000 version of Kimmel's aforementioned polemic "A War Against Boys?" for Tikkum he writes: "And while some college presidents fret that to increase male enrollments they'll be forced to lower standards…no one seems to find gender disparities going the other way all that upsetting."

Of course, this is flatly bullshit.

Kimmel purposefully overlooks the fact that Title IX was passed specifically because there were disparities in the education of girls. He overlooks it because it conflicts with his disengenuous conclusion. It's as if the existence of Title IX never enters the equation. When girls were down, we blamed the system and passed Title IX. When boys are down, Kimmel blames the boys, and we'll pretty much do nothing.

Marvin Harris argued in his work, "Cows, Pigs, Wars, and Witches; The Riddles of Culture," that it is women who determine how masculinity is expressed. "It is within their power of selective neglect to produce a sex ration heavily in favor of females over males. It also lies within woman's power to sabotage the development of 'masculine' males by rewarding little boys for being passive rather than aggressive." It is also generally accepted that women tend to favor masculine men. So, what responsibility do the ladies have? According to Kimmel, none. Kimmel doesn't discuss them, except to paint them as weak victims. Although he talks a great deal about men's "privilege," he never addresses women's "privilege."

My position is that being yourself is not a privilege, since I cannot control how other people treat me because of some immutable characteristic, just like it's not my fault if someone discriminates against me for the same immutable characteristic. That being said, Kimmel's doesn't consider women's macro-societal behavior, because in Kimmel's world, women have rights, while men have responsibilities.

Kimmel laments that college men idealize "Athletes, rock stars, and film actors who are in action movies." (Think Tank with Ben Wattenberg transcript, July 29, 2000.) He doesn't tell us why they are idealized. The answer is that athletes, rock stars and film actors tend to attract the favor of women, which gets them laid a lot. Which brings us to the question, "Why doesn't Kimmel discuss the sexual dynamic between young men and women?"

The answer is that, to do so, would necessarily implicate women's complicity, or outright control, in determining what it is to be a man. It would require an examination of the behavior of women. Remember, Kimmel's narrative is that men and masculinity are fundamentally flawed. He wants to change what it means to be a man. So ergo, according to his logic, we must change men, and do so without implicating women as a variable in the equation.

Kimmel describes himself, thus; "I'm a sociologist and an activist who supports gender equality."

The conflict is that he is an activist. He is not a disinterested party. He has an agenda. His work is not scholarship, but propaganda based upon a collection of ridiculously ideological missives presented as science. In the previously cited interview with Ben Wattenberg (Michael Kimmel, Christina Hoff Sommers, and the AAUW's Susan Bailey), Kimmel begins his argument by admitting that he believes that boys and the "ideology of masculinity" are not politically correct. He is then eviscerated by Sommers, with whom he spends the entire program agreeing, until he states, "The place where we disagree is not the observation about boys, the place where we disagree is that Christine's book is not about boys, it's about feminism. It's about how feminism has distracted us, diverted us, whether willingly or not. And that's where we disagree." That's because Kimmel does not care about boys. He cares about feminism. Boys and men are just the victims of his applied faith.

Kimmel's work is celebrated in feminist circles, not because it is profound (it isn't), and not because it is interesting (it's not), but because his propaganda confines itself within the walls of an already established belief system – a belief system so devoid of curious inquiry that false statistics, advocacy research and outrageous statements, predominately slandering men, are common place in gender discourse.

And, thus, Kimmel can argue without irony; "It's feminists who are really 'pro-boy' and 'pro-father' – who want young boys and their fathers to expand the definition of masculinity and to become fully human." (Kimmel, "A War Against Boys, Dissent Magazine, Fall, 2006) Besides the fact that Kimmel is reiterating his theme that men are not fully human, this statement is troubling for its sheer dishonesty. To have Kimmel, who spent much of his career slandering young men, tell us that he and his ilk are pro-boy is laughable.

So what is his agenda? Kimmel is perhaps the most esteemed of the pro-feminist male "women firsters." Although he talks a lot about boys and men, his real agenda is to promote women. He writes:

"Thus any initiative to improve the condition of women must include efforts to involve men…Of course; most initiatives toward gender equality must, and will continue to focus on women's empowerment." (Kimmel, "Global Masculinities: Restoration and Resistance," Gender Policy Review)

"If Guyland could prepare young men to be better fathers, they'll spend more time at home. Which will free women to balance work and family." (http://www.guyland.net/interviews.htm)

It has been said that; "If something has a direct benefit to an individual or a class of people, and a theoretical, abstract, or amorphous benefit to everybody else, realize that the proponent's intentions are to benefit the former, not the latter, no matter what bullshit they try to feed you."

To apply that to Kimmel's bullshit; If something (feminism) has a direct benefit to an individual or a class of people (women), and a theoretical, abstract, or amorphous benefit to everybody else (men), realize that the proponent's (Kimmel's) intentions are to benefit the former (women), not the latter (men), no matter what bullshit (feminism) they (Kimmel) try to feed you.

So, we understand that "changing the definition of manhood," and all that entails will result in freeing and empowering women, but, what is the benefit for the guys? He never articulates it, because he doesn't care.

To illustrate, let's mosey over to Kimmel's "Why Men Should Support Gender Equity":

"But why should men participate in the movement for gender equality? Simply put, I believe that these changes among men will actually benefit men, and that gender equality is not a loss for men, but an enormous positive thing…"

He goes on to spend eleven pages not talking about any benefits for men. When he finally does address the actual issue of the paper, he does so thus:

"We, as men, should support gender equality – both at work and at home. Not because it's right and fair and just – although it is those things. But because of what it will do for us, as men. At work, it means working to end sexual harassment, supporting family-friendly workplace policies, working to end the scourge of date and acquaintance rape, violence and abuse that terrorize women in our societies. At home it means sharing housework and childcare, as much because our partners demand it as because we want to spend that time with our children and because housework is a rather conventional way of nurturing and loving."

It is obvious that Kimmel wants to shape boys into his own image; weak, studious, and uninspired. "…boys can be raised to be competent and compassionate, ambitious and attentive, and that men are fully capable of love, care and nurturance." (Kimmel, "A War Against Boys?"; Dissent Magazine, Fall, 2006.) In other words, boys should be molded into neo-males, "…a bland, conformist, and unimaginative group of males, for which the term "man" is too strong a word."

Thus, he tells us that the benefit to men of feminism is that men can promote women, which just so happens to be Kimmel's aforementioned agenda.

Dept. of Ed Rewrites the Constitution, at the Expense of Men

Carey Roberts · 27 August 2011 · Archived copy · Original

[dropcap]I[/dropcap]f college administrators were turning a cold shoulder to rape victims and female students were dropping out like flies, the recent Department of Education sex mandate might begin to make a little more sense.

But here we are. The once-unthinkable has become a Brave New World reality, in which a bewildered Alice quakes before an arrogant Queen proclaiming, "Sentence first — verdict afterwards."

Let's say you're a student at Cal State-Monterey Bay. There, any sexual "innuendoes made at inappropriate times, perhaps in the guise of humor" can get you into trouble with university administrators. At Alabama State University, any "behavior that causes discomfort, embarrassment or emotional distress" is deemed to be harassing.

You may wonder if such vague definitions are constitutional, and indeed they are not.

In Davis v. Monroe County Board of Education, the Supreme Court ruled that only behavior that is "so severe, pervasive, and objectively offensive, and…so undermines and detracts from the victims' education experience" can be considered to represent sexual harassment.

Nonetheless, such far-reaching concantations of student misconduct have become the norm. According to a recent survey by the Foundation for Individual Rights in Education, 67% of top American colleges have enacted speech codes that are unconstitutional under First Amendment standards.

Which means if your son utters a gratuitous "son of a bitch" remark, that could land him in a load of trouble. And a professor teaching a course on 19th century erotic art could be accused of inflicting embarrassment on overly sensitive students – a concern that recently compelled the American Association of University Professors to demand the DED Office for Civil Rights withdraw the regulation.

Or let's say a student and his new-found paramour share a celebratory glass of Pinot Noir and indulge in a frolic of consensual sex. Surprise! The Office for Civil Rights directive astonishingly dictates the woman (or man) is unable to give consent "due to the victim's use of drugs or alcohol."

[image]We're not talking about a drunken lovefest or even getting a little tipsy — the mere "use" of alcohol now renders the person a "victim."

It gets crazier, because university disciplinary committees originally were set up to hear cases of cheating or plagiarism, not adjudicate cases involving potential criminal misconduct that arise from murky 'he-said, she-said' disputes.

So now it's your day in court, so to speak. Knowing that the accusation is utterly baseless, you didn't bother to engage an attorney to argue your case. You plan to cross-examine your former girlfriend on your own behalf.

Sorry, the Department of Education will have none of that. The delicate-as-a-wallflower victim is now deemed too distraught to answer your questions.

In the past, such cases were decided under the "clear and convincing" standard of proof, which means the lay jury needed to be about 75% sure that wrong-doing had occurred. But now, the college must comply with the "predominance of the evidence" standard, which only requires a 51% level of proof.

Fortunately, the disciplinary committee found you innocent of the charges. Now you can go back to your normal routine, hoping your classmates will stop giving you those dirty looks.

Hold on, Joe, because your ex- can still appeal the decision. Double jeopardy is prohibited under criminal law, but in the DED's Alice in Wonderland universe, she gets a second bite at the apple.

[box type="info" icon="none"]Such Kangaroo Court proceedings do not take place in a vacuum.[/box]

Student orientation programs alert doe-eyed coeds to the looming specter of date rape. Women's studies programs hold frenzied "Take the Night" marches. Faculty members indulge in diatribes about "rape culture." And at Arizona State University, students are ominously warned to "avoid parties where males greatly outnumber females."

The effects on the falsely accused can be far-reaching. A recent Wall Street Journal editorial lamented, "Not only is he likely to be expelled, but he may well be barred from graduate or professional school and certain government agencies, suffer irreparable damage to his reputation, and still be exposed to criminal prosecution."

In short, the Department of Education DED Office for Civil Rights is working to remove the constitutionally rooted due process rights of the accused.

Fortunately, the solution is simple. We take away their money.

The Office for Civil Rights enjoys a $103 million budget, including a cushy $730,000 for employee awards and overtime. Right now Congress is searching high and low for ways to trim the federal deficit. I say we cut their budget to $50 million.

And for good measure, we'll mandate the remaining OCR employees to take a course in Constitutional Law 101.

Supreme Court to hear father's rights case

Robert O'Hara · 28 August 2011 · Archived copy · Original

…

[box icon="None"]

A New York lawyer by the name of Leon Koziol received notice on August 15th that his petition for writ, a legal document submitted to Appellate and Supreme Courts to argue a hearing in front of the full court, was to be given consideration. This marks the first time that an activist/lawyer who champions fathers rights and divorce and family court reform will be given any consideration at all by the United States Supreme Court.

In his petition he documents the events surrounding his divorce and activism. He described instances of document tampering and "star chamber" hearings which harmed his reputation and his relationship with his children. His argument invokes the First and Fourteenth Amendments and his challenge to the court is that these proceedings violated his right to free speech and his right to equal justice under the law.

Excerpt from his blog:

"On August 15, 2011, the Supreme Court of the United States submitted notice to civil rights advocate Leon Koziol that his petition for a writ has been accepted for consideration under docket No. 11-185. The petition will now undergo a review to determine whether the case will be heard by the full court. A vote of four justices is needed to make this occur.

The case is based upon Mr. Koziol's four year ordeal at the hands of state disciplinary agents retaliating against his campaign for reform in state domestic relations courts. Specifically, after 23 unblemished years as a successful trial advocate in federal and state courts, Mr. Koziol became victim to fabricated charges designed to suppress protected activities under the First and Fourteenth Amendments.

The petition is a fascinating read for human rights victims and those who have been abused in divorce, custody and support courts. It has all the ingredients of a John Grisham novel, and it actually seeks protection for lawyers who pursue admirable causes for the people. Through vague code provisions and substandard prosecutions, good lawyers are easily removed from the profession when they take on litigation against powerful government officials.

Leon Koziol is asking all of his supporters and followers to read his petition and pass it on to those who may be of assistance, i.e., media contacts, authors, intervenors, columnists and benefactors to help fund this vital cause. Without the good guys among those practicing law, the people will continue to be fleeced of their resources through orchestrated family controversies that are collectively harming the health, productivity and heritage of an entire nation."

His (links provided in the excerpt) thoroughly documents what appear to be clear violations of his freedom of speech as well as due process of law and equal treatment under the law. AVFM will continue to follow this case.

[/box]

All women are like that: The law says so

J Galt · 29 August 2011 · Archived copy · Original

[dropcap]F[/dropcap]or those still struggling with this term, or sitting on the fence to avoid insulting a potential ally you may feel deserves consideration for her views and positions, I have one thing to say. Wake the fuck up. What I'm forwarding here is the notion, no, the understanding, that men are held to a standard of principle that informs their responsibility to their family, to their community, to their neighbor, to their country and lastly to themselves. These standards and principles are represented in law.

What is the standard for a woman? Please tell me what standard in this community of man, this thing we call civilization, that we hold women accountable to. When you find yourself unable to answer that simple question you may briskly move on to understand that "she" is no longer your partner in civilization. "She" is not your equal. "She" is an object of maintenance. "She," by legal definition, is a seasonal tool, best left in the garden. if you truly wish to extend consideration to anyone, exercise your consideration while that very person stands on the merits of their own principles. In most cases "she" will not.

[image]It is all too common that while we politicize language with new and sensitized understandings, language in and of itself has a purpose. With it comes definition to contribute to common understanding. More now than ever we need to remove the sophistry of emotional language and the entitlements it provides. We cannot award entitlement as systemic policy to the citizenry based on a narrow and personalized definition of personal injury.

We cannot legislate the boogey-man that is conjured by the poor mental health of fear and intellectual dishonesty of hysteria out of our closets and from under our beds. We must leave the postpartum depression of our victimization and struggle for a self-determination and purpose. We cannot protect all the children or the women hiding behind them. They too must learn to act on their own behalf and on behalf of those children.

For those who have read it or may recall a previous article in which I stated "There is nothing noble left of woman, she is as vile a creature as any man she describes." Pretty salty words but truer words I couldn't knit with a #8 darning needle. To flesh this out a little further, consider the popular descriptions of men and take a moment to look at what you ignore about women and particularly those feminist women. If you would like to avoid a schism with an ism you should certainly consider a viable template with which to measure.

Bigots: a person who holds blindly and intolerantly to a particular creed, opinion, a narrow-minded, prejudiced person. This certainly qualifies as an extension of the ism itself, after all what is political correctness if not bigotry plain and simple. Reality itself is a perception, not a rigid construct.

Hypocrites: a person who pretends to be what he or she is not; one who pretends to be better than is really so, or to be pious, virtuous, etc. without really being so. Well hey this almost inspires me to provide a list, Michelle. This one definitely applies to the duckwalk feminists. You know, same quack but they just refuse to fly south. Can anyone see the egalitarian feminist laws as serving or protecting anyone but women? Do they even serve to protect male children?

Sexist: discrimination against people on the basis of sex. Welcome to every university in the western world that is governed by "Women's Studies". This is hatred and sexism on tap with more foam than the beer, a woeful and dead institution that will only survive with gender segregation.

Predator: *a person, group, company, or state that steals from others or destroys others for gain. I think more importantly is to name the most predatory sports: marriage, sex, taxes and the latest addition – college and university campuses. Nuff said.

Violent: acting with or characterized by great physical force, so as to injure, force unlawfully or callously, strong feeling or emotion; vehement; furious emotionally disturbed to an uncontrollable degree extreme; intense tending to distort the meaning. Somewhat more seriously, this is certainly a definition that requires your attention and you may need to completely re-script your perspective and understanding of this word. Please notice that violent is not narrowly defined as making physical contact and is understood to include furious emotionally, disturbed to an uncontrollable degree. You really need to consider parsing the implications and your understanding of this.

Do not misinterpret the violence that has been perpetrated against you simply because the wounds you suffer often require them to be acknowledged by another. The feminist "Domestic Violence Industry" has made every effort to hijack the meaning of violence and frame it as an occurrence that cannot happen to a man. As in the definition that includes intense, tending to distort the meaning, there is not a woman on this planet that has not or will not resort to this.

For very many men this would describe the constant state of violence under which they live from day to day. It is deemed to be 100 percent socially acceptable. It is a level of violence that we have all witnessed in public, in our schools and playgrounds and in our homes and families. It needs to be identified for what it is each and every time it occurs. Call it out and refuse to submit to it.

Review the definition carefully and understand the threshold of its occurrence. If we as men commit to ending violence we must also commit to ending the violence perpetrated against us. Any woman that cannot respect the complete definition of violence needs to be identified for the batterer that she is. She batters esteem and confidence; she batters security and safety, she batters masculinity into silence and suffering. Her violence is identifiable by the tactics and language of shame which she herself would never submit to. If you attempt to defend yourself from this violence she will resort to her use of state thugs to impose her violence.

[image]She is truly a piece of unrepentant shit far beyond the pale and willfully exchanges your pain for her entitlement. Spontaneous physical violence rarely occurs without paid state functionaries present to implement it. Violence in the vast majority of cases is mutual; it begins with an attitude and is served with threats. We can all understand the largest threat of violence looming is the state and she will use it each time you refuse to submit. Until we acknowledge this occurrence of violence we will continue to suffer from the social effects. We all ignore the true nature of violence and it's threat, the feminist "Domestic Violence Industry" sanctions and promotes it with a bias that is itself violent. Because we deem it acceptable our politicians and our law enforcement are free to cherry pick the most economically viable definition. It's time we to say enough and end the lies and the false accusations. It's simply time to walk when it starts and not look back.

Accuser: prosecutor, plaintiff, objector, complainant, libellant, informant, district attorney, court, law, judicial party, suitor, petitioner, litigant, delator, adversary, opposer, opponent, informer, government witness, state witness, rat, stool pigeon*, fink.* We can now understand that the war on men is no different than the war on drugs. It is only in the proximity of a woman that your most profound constitutional protections are removed. Your greatest safety constitutionally is to remove her completely from your presence. It is only with her presence that you can be accused at all.

Batterer: to subject somebody to persistent attack or violence, to damage or injure something by hard blows or heavy wear. Let's play a game. Can you find the words in this definition that represent batterer but do not require physical contact? If you can you are likely a healthy person. If you can't you are likely to be a woman, or a feminist or both. You may even be employed by the "Domestic Violence" industry. And if you aren't, you qualify.

It is important for men to know and accept that the romance of life is gone, it has left in a political whirlwind of accusation. We live in times of entitlement and restitution and knowing this may save you from being cannibalized by a pretender. It is for your personal safety and your constitutional rights to liberty, that we men – all of us – must dismiss these women from our lives completely and permanently.

It is time to suspend our chivalry completely. Remove the armor so brilliantly white and shining. You, after all, don't own it. She does. And it's time to give it back. It is time now more than ever for men to be heroes to their brothers; to other men. It is time for men to speak up against the false accusations, the false representations the false science and the misandry of our society. To see it and to challenge it and deny its governance; to simply accept that there is nothing noble left of woman. She is as vile a creature as any man she describes.

My Older Brother

B.R. Merrick · 30 August 2011 · Archived copy · Original

[dropcap]I[/dropcap]n a county courthouse not long ago, I had the misfortune to witness something that PJ Harvey sings about on her latest album, "Let England Shake." She may not even fully realize that a little anecdote like this could possibly be related to her work, but it most definitely is. The event in question involves a teenaged young man, his mother, more than one cop, Harvey's haunting music, and the observations of a rapidly aging homo.

But first, let me tell you about my older brother. He's terrific. I rely on him heavily, and as my life goes on, I find myself relying on him that much more. In fact, I normally refer to him in capital letters: Older Brother. Some call him Jesus; some Buddha; some just God. There are probably women out there who call him Older Sister. If that works for them, fine. Older Brother, you see, is my conscience.

[quote float="right"]Based on the look in his eyes and his general cool-guy demeanor, I figured this was a teenager's scratch at profundity. [/quote] Older Brother is bigger than I and handsomer. He never judges, punishes, or condemns. He listens. He is frank, open, and honest about not having all the solutions. He asks questions; I provide answers. When I lash out at him, he doesn't hit back. Sometimes, we wait out the tough stuff together, both of us shaking our heads.

I hear that researchers are now discovering the evolution of the human conscience, in a relatively short span of human history. At least one writer claimed (haven't read the book yet) that the writings contained within the Holy Bible denote profound changes in this evolution. He postulated that ancient men may have believed that God existed because the voices of their individual consciences seemed disembodied.

Whatever the reasons for our highly evolved consciences, we have them and we call them by many names. You don't have to call your conscience anything other than what it is. I have found it quite useful to refer to mine as Older Brother, and I will continue to do so. Those of you with actual older brothers, the kind of brothers that every young boy fantasizes about having, may feel less of a need to do so.

Based on what little I know of her life, it is quite possible that PJ Harvey doesn't refer to her conscience by any fancy names. From my vantage point, I see a woman my age who was raised on a sheep farm, amidst placid, peaceful creatures, by a father and mother who had their own individual skills, their own work to do, and who gave her the opportunity to be exposed to various sorts of music. Based on her work thus far, that last observation is readily apparent, as she has infused popular sensibilities with a wide-ranging number of styles. I like to imagine that Harvey was left alone a lot of the time to explore life as she wished. (She refused the intrusion of the computer and the Internet for as long as possible, and goes online only when she has something she wishes to research. What are the odds she wasted any time growing up in front of the idiot box?) I know for certain that she had a father around, with the opportunity to experience his presence in her daily life.

That experience is quite important, on multiple levels. Even though I am not close to my father, I had him around constantly in my growing up years, and the benefits reveal themselves every day as I traverse this land mass we call America. There is stability inherent in the presence of manhood. Undoubtedly, and especially when she's a fine woman, there is stability inherent in womanhood, but the lack of muscle and basic masculine outlook must be, I imagine, a serious lack for those who do not enjoy the experience.

In my mind, however, it is not enough to have a father in the home. There must also be a masculine engagement of the little minds that the father has helped to create. This is where fathering takes on a whole new meaning beyond being a mere sperm bank. I am certain that good fathering leads to a conscience, in the mind of the created, that can function at a much higher level. The absence of good fathering or, at a lower level, the absence of any fathering at all, appears to frequently lead to far more destructive ends.

Enter PJ Harvey's "Let England Shake," an album of popular music on par with Benjamin Britten's classically-oriented "War Requiem." Both masterpieces concern themselves with essentially the same thing: the effects of an empire's wars felt directly through individual experience. Both works are somewhat politically ambiguous, but thoroughly unambiguous about war's ravages on society and the self. Read the opening words of Harvey's titular song:

[box type="note" icon="none"]

The West's asleep. Let England shake,

Weighted down with silent dead

[/box]

We're not going anywhere pleasant from here, folks. Just take a look at what transpired in England a few months after this album's release. Angry Harry put one word underneath it: feminism. In the sense that many prominent feminists have helped to demonize all men; to shame women into the workplace and out of the hearth; to stand silently by while society turns from small-town sensibility to highly mobile suburban culture infused with the sicknesses of empire, including government schooling, television, and consumerism; I find myself in agreement.

Therefore, Harvey's strangely upbeat musical ideas and stranger vocal modulations from one song to the next, carried along like a string of bagatelles so that one song cannot be discarded from the whole, have the power of a medieval minstrel standing on a heap of bodies after a battle, pointing out the sorrows created by the wrong ideas and actions, while strumming her autoharp. (And I thought I was done with popular music.)

The man I saw in the courthouse couldn't be a day younger than 16, but he was already several inches taller than I. He was with a group of people: another young man who didn't look related to him, his mother, and another woman whose relation to him I also couldn't identify. He kept the hair on his small, blond head cropped short, atop his long neck and lanky frame, his face shaped by a prominent nose that seemed to draw out the rest, forcing him to slouch. He had the remnants of acne on his jaw and a rather mischievous half-grin on his face. The pink-and-purple tie-dyed shirt he was wearing was scrawled with a gothic design that you would normally find on the back of a biker's jacket. It featured an eagle clutching something, and beneath the angry beast was a ribbon spinning down below the hem with just two visible words: "ERASE ALL."

Erase all what? Is that supposed to be profound? Based on the look in his eyes and his general cool-guy demeanor, I figured this was a teenager's scratch at profundity. Ah, yes. Erase all. That's what we should do, apparently. Like some nihilistic haiku, it says it all without really saying anything, doesn't it? Well, it turns out that that's merely where my mind was going, because when he turned away from me to speak with someone, I saw the same design on the back of his shirt, only up higher so the rest of that swirling ribbon could be read: "ERASE ALL FEAR."

So it wasn't nearly as pseudo-profound as I originally thought. It was just stupid. How do you erase all fear? That's like trying to erase poverty or bigotry. Besides, fear is an emotion. Why didn't he understand that? We all have fear. Sometimes you can do something about it; sometimes not.

[image]It reminds me of the word "cool," a word that became popular when popular culture started taking a nose-dive in the 50s, and a word that every generation of suburban, government-educated, and increasingly fatherless Americans has embraced. It still has the same meaning to young people that it did in the 50s, although what comprises being cool changes quite frequently. You can't be cool wearing the shoulder pads and fluorescent colors that people wore when I was a teenager in the 80s; you can only be ridiculous.

Why should we want to be "cool"? Think about what that word implies. Not hot… not warm… something akin to cold or frozen… aloof… uninvolved… cynically knowing… no fear. Remember Fonzie? He was cool. Fonzie was never afraid. He'd snap his fingers and young women would come running. No man would dare fight him. He successfully erased all fear. Guess what? Kids laugh at Fonzie for entirely different reasons now. He's ridiculous. He isn't cool anymore. He also had no parents.

Another woman with files and a suit walked out of one of the offices and spoke to the mother. "Well, what do you think?" she asked. The mother had a half-grin like Erase All Fear, but for different reasons. I didn't hear what she mumbled to the official lady, but it sounded like the half-grin was pinned to her face out of exasperation. I never saw the father in the hallway, and have no idea of his whereabouts.

Eventually this little group disappeared. A big handsome cop walked past me and down the hallway a little later on, and from the open door of an adjoining courtroom, I heard a man shout, "Stop!" The door quickly closed and the cop kept walking, looking straight ahead. Consequently, I soon forgot about the disembodied voice. A few minutes later, that same door opened again, and Erase All Fear was pushed violently up against the wall of the corridor by two other big handsome cops. He was quickly cuffed, frisked, and taken away, with that cheesy half-grin on his cool face.

I can't be certain, and I acknowledge that most of my observations are anecdotal in nature, but I strongly suspect that the absence of a father on that day in the courthouse was no mere coincidence. I also strongly suspect that Erase All Fear has no Older Brother to talk to. At least, not yet. Perhaps his mind is too far away from his conscience at this point. But there is also a chance, I hope, that one of the big handsome cops that cuffs him in the future might actually be able to ask him a question or two that wakes up his Older Brother for him. Maybe it happened that day with the cuffer or the frisker. I don't know.

I remember one time when it happened for me. I was in conversation with one of my local church leaders. Back when I was a religious conservative and unhappy about being gay, I was having one of my many personal interviews with this guy. These interviews had become routine, and involved confessing my many terrible "sins." In spite of my ideological differences now, this one particular leader did me a great service. In the turmoil of my personal life, he had the decency to tell me plainly that he had no idea how to help me (something that Older Brother sometimes says). But then he asked a question that changed my life. Eyes searching up towards the ceiling for something – anything – to help me, he asked, "Do you have any buddies?" I answered without hesitation and startled myself with the answer: "No." Eventually, that fatherly remark – a simple question: no lecture, no advice, no threat, no bribe nor diatribe – led me out of a cycle not unlike the one currently drowning Erase All Fear.

That's what fathers are for: building your conscience. Fathers who fail to do that, and mothers who take their children away from fathers who can do that, are creating miniature Erase All Fears as we speak. I know it. I think PJ Harvey knows it. And now you know it.

Therefore, I have a question for all you feminists out there: What are you going to do about it? Before you answer, I suggest you download a female musician's latest album and take a good hard listen to the wildly shifting tone of her voice, which some have errantly described as "childlike." It is nothing of the sort. Being a fully grown woman, Harvey cannot truly ape a child's voice. She can, however, affect a higher register, like she does in the opening number as well as several others, but only in a way that seems hideously condescending, the way some women (and even men) do from time to time in order to ingratiate themselves to little people that they perceive to be inferior and somewhat stupid. It is deliberately seductive, until it turns into the wail of an angry and grieving woman:

[box type="download" icon="none"]

What is the glorious fruit of our land?

Its fruit is deformed children…

What is the glorious fruit of our land?

Its fruit is orphaned children.

[/box]

There is more than one war going on right now, ladies, but the outcomes are always the same. Consider yourselves warned. And good luck erasing the fears about to be unleashed, many of them without conscience and without fathers.

The Thomas Ball Fire Symphony # 1

Robert L. Cheney Jr. · 30 August 2011 · Archived copy · Original

On June 15, 2011, yet another desperate father, disabused with his ongoing decade long struggle with both corrupt state and federal courts—doused himself with gasoline and set himself ablaze on the steps of the Keene, New Hampshire courthouse. This is not unique in regards to this ongoing national Fathers' Rights problem, which plagues us all.

It is estimated that throughout the United States, that 24,000 men a year, commit suicide in this nation directly due to the unconstitutional acts and/or omissions and denial of basic human rights applied by our courts. On any given day, it is estimated that 250,000 to 400,000 men are falsely and unlawfully placed into debtor's prisons. This is accomplished so that the state can both further enslave those men, and directly profit by and through their unconstitutional incarceration.

Indeed, a national Apartheid is being implemented against men in this nation.

And what Thomas Ball's pyrrhic act proves—is that finally—we must stand up and do something about it. The time for polite and excusable rhetoric is over. When men commit such an act which is so outrageous and egregious, that it compels us all to recognize that the time has come that we actually must now act…and do something…anything…in which to stop this anti-law madness.

We have a well-defined domestic enemy which now inhabits not only our government, but also our own court systems. They are implementing and maintaining a foreign unlawful and unconstitutional set of laws, which directly extends out from Soviet Article 81 Constitutional model foreign law throughout the courts in the several states and federal government. Not only is there no relief within these ultra vires courts—there is the direct treason of implementing alien and illegal foreign law, which factually has destroyed men and their families in this country.

These courts incipient design is to overturn the natural human rights and liberties of men, and to destroy men as a specific goal in overturning the freedoms and rights of the American civilization. Simply put: it is these courts which are alien Domestic Enemy courts, which have damaged this nation to such an extent, that men are routinely committing suicide as an expression and social toll of state condoned oppression and injustice. Men now routinely see suicide as their only legal remedy to confront these diseased court systems.

Just before his death, Thomas Ball took the time to write an intelligent fifteen page "Last Statement" which he formally mailed to the Keene New Hampshire Sentinel. This document exposes the inner workings of a very intelligent, driven, and insightful man, cataloguing the reasons which supported his act. His eloquence was elucidated by both his words, and in his last act of self-immolation.

My own analysis has reflected Balls' insights which he reduced to writing. Please note that when he states:

"Any one swept up into legal mess is usually astonished at what they see. They cannot believe what the police, prosecutors and judges are doing. It is so blatantly wrong. Well, I can assure you that everything they do is logical and by the[ir] book. The confusion you have with them is you both are using different sets of books. You are using the old First Set of Books-the Constitution, the general laws or statutes and the court ruling sometime call Common Law. They are using the newer Second Set of Books. That is the collection of the policy, procedures and protocols."

His insights are totally correct. In this one short paragraph, Mr. Ball not only identifies, but nails the problem facing all men within America. Simply put: the government is acting in direct treason by changing the form of government by changing the laws of government—and by implementing and following an unconstitutional set of 'new laws,' which are not American. These 'new laws' directly overturn and place an alien foreign governments laws over established American jurisprudence, thereby overturning the natural and constitutional rights of man.

As we can see, Mr. Ball clearly sees that two laws are being implemented by and through the treason being implemented by all three branches of government supporting these illegal Soviet Article 81 Family Courts. These two set of laws are so disparate, as to cause all of the maladies we are now suffering through our society. These contemporary problems we now face, are directly attributable to this Apartheid being enforced against men. Simply put, this Soviet law mindset which these courts have treasonously enforced against men, is the direct causal factor for our national diminution of our manufacturing base; of our demise of our legal base; and the destruction of our economic base.

Oddly, the American public cannot put together these simple identities, because the national media is not publishing these facts and presenting them for public discussion before the American people. Fathers' Rights is not for public consumption in this nation. There is a national news blackout in regards what has occurred to Fathers' over the past half-century, and what is now happening throughout all facets of life throughout the American economy due to this state approved discrimination. Destroy men for any number of years, and yes indeed you will see massive home foreclosures soon following. Destroy men as a national mindset throughout the courts and government, and soon thereafter you will see the collapse of the national economy, high unemployment rates, and the public scratching their heads as to what the real cause of it is. If you haven't noticed, this is our current national plight.

If you look at the disparate and anti-law systems which can run a government, on the dark side you shall note that the social archetypes of Socialism, Communism, and Totalitarianism. These are the same exact social systems expressed in these form of governments; but they are merely in but different stages of growth. At the nexus, or root of all these evils you shall find something called "Feminism." Feminism is the foundational seed of all these forms of tyrannical governments. And it is Feminism which this nation has adopted as a diseased and fetid root of evil of which you will find as the basis of this nation's current dysfunction.

When you speak of Welfare, you are speaking of war (against the society) and you are speaking only of Feminism supporting such war. The basic and root tenant of Feminism, is the destruction of the American male. In all societies which has adopted this malady as a root of "equality" in which to sustain its rise within such a society—you will find that men are excoriated as a national religious exercise. You shall find that within such societies expounding Feminism, that men are hated, they are denigrated, and there is a national ongoing media campaign to constantly find fault with men, and a government willing to sustain an industry to punish them directly. In such societies: you shall find huge prison populations.

Conversely, when you analyze those societies which are not infested by Feminism, you shall see that men throughout that society are actually venerated. They are respected and loved, and even honored. In those societies, they are not repressed, and they assume their natural stations as the producers and defenders of that society. In such societies, you shall conversely find small prison populations.

[box icon="none"]Those enemies of the state supporting Feminism, claim that asserting such female 'equality' throughout our American society, advocate it as an advanced social system. They are wrong.[/box]

The fact is that Feminism is a throwback to the earliest social system which existed on the plains of Africa 100,000 years ago. In that 'natural' state of affairs, it is the controlling female driven system of Matriarchy was a throwback to the antiquated social archetype which exuded itself out from the social system which also ruled the great apes. In that older social system, as throughout nature—women and children stayed together, with men being driven out of the group. In this natural state, men were only temporary interlopers into the social system of women and children. The main (and only) duty of the male in that backwards natural system, was to inseminate the female, and then to be driven off by the collective tribe, and to once again fend for himself alone in the wilderness. This state of affairs, was the controlling social archetype over hundreds of thousands of years, of which humankind never evolved.

Mankind was held in stasis, directly due to its adherence to the Feminist Matriarchal social archetype which controlled and excluded the male of the society from being an active part within that society.

When you look at both the whole animal kingdom, and the communist communal social state: you shall also concomitantly find that there is no place within that social system to incorporate the male. When you analyze the complete animal kingdom, from ants, to bees, to whales, apes, dogs, birds, bats, and the like—you shall see that again, within the concomitant natural system, that the male is always driven off, and has no place within the family.

It was only with the advent of Patriarchy, approximately 6,000 years ago, which finally incorporated the male into the Shrewdness animal state of humans. This created the modern two-parent nuclear family. Now, for the first time in human history, man was incorporated into the family and both males and females disparate social talents were used to work together for the first time. And directly due to this combining of the disparate entities of male and female into the family social unit—all human civilization thereby ascended from that point onwards. Prior to this—with the human Shrewdness controlling the animal state of man—advanced civilizations never arose. It was only with the incorporation of the male into the human family unit, that advanced civilization arose, of which we have cognizance of at that 6,000 Patriarchal Breakpoint. Prior to this—we virtually know nothing about human-kind, because the archeological record shows virtually nothing during this long Matriarchal period. There is only a void.

Modern socialists and social scientists, claim that the communist state and especially Feminism, is the 'advanced' social condition. That if you do not believe in homosexuality, women's rights, lesbianism, sexual freedom and anarchy—that you are a dolt male throwback of the 1950s. These theorists, feel that the natural condition of incorporating men into the family unit (and society) is old, pastoral and antiquated technology. They believe that their advocacy of Feminism, is the new theocracy that we all must be held hostage to (no matter what its results). These same people, when confronted with the fact, that their theology is a throwback to the base social system which ruled on the plains of Africa 100,000 years ago—get mulct, and do not want to discuss, argue, or confront the point.

For if you recognize that in their system, which again; has no place for the male, you shall find that every despotic government aligning itself to such a Feminist social collectivist archetype, has huge gulag prison systems, as demonstrated and recorded throughout human history (e.g. the Soviet Union, North Korea, China, & etc.). It is within these collective Matriarchal driven systems which develop these huge prison populaces, directly due to the fact, that they are expressing the older Matriarchal natural condition of man, and have no place for the human male within their formal design of government. Such systems are merely expressing their underlying identity of being Matriarchal collectivist societies. Huge prison systems within such governments are merely expressing the fact that their social system is attendant to the natural (older and backwards Matriarchy). Again, such systems, like nature, have no real place for the male. This again, extends from the Shrewdness collective social condition. Just as in the animal kingdom, they are destroying men to express their Matriarchal archetype form of repressive government.

Those societies which incorporate the male into the family, however; conversely obtain free and advanced societies. For it is the incorporation of the male into the family unit, which is the impetus for the free enterprise economic system. Please note, that this fact is also expressed and recorded throughout human history, as all such great thinkers, from Plutarch to Freud recognized, that "…[I]n order to have an advanced civilization, you need sexual regulation."

What is this 'sexual regulation' we speak of here?

It is factually the state institution of marriage of which the modern Matriarchal Communist state is actively combating against and intentionally destroying. What is the main feature of marriage? It incorporates the male into the family (and society), and it binds both the male and wife into a social contract, for the good of them both, the family, and then ultimately the state.

In such free Patriarchal societies, as in the American society, the state promised by operation of law to uphold the marriage condition. The state would be the guardian of that institution. First we must note, again, by operation of law, that the state has a third party interest to the marriage relation:

"The state is a party at interest to the marriage contract or status together with the husband and wife." Duerner v. Duerner, 142 N.J. Eq. 259 (E & A. 1948).

See also:

"It has been well said that in the granting of divorces the state, as well as the parties, is interested, and that the public is represented by what is called the 'the conscience of the court'…" The State is a third party to every divorce proceeding and has exclusive control of the matrimonial status of those domiciled within its borders." McLean v. Graboswski, 92 N.J. Super. 545, 547-548 (Ch. Div. 1966)

Secondly, we must recognize that there is a fundamental reason that the state has an interest in the marriage relation…and that was to protect the interests of the institution of marriage itself in order to protect the advanced society itself:

"…As guardian[s] of the interests of the public and persons not parties to the record , it is our imperative duty to prevent dissolution of the marriage relation by means which the law condemns and expressly forbids. An infant child is the issue of this marriage, and we cannot tolerate that its character shall be sullied and its career clouded by a Judicial conviction of the Father on such evidence of infidelity to the most sacred obligations. Since the "common-law marriages," so called-another name for concubinage-is so obtrusively prevalent in the community, and our calendars are crowded with applications for divorce, it behooves us not to relax the stringency of the rules which, in the interests of good morals and social security, have been prescribed by law for the safeguard of the sanctity and stability of the marriage relation. Daly Ch. J., and Bischoff, J. Concur. Fanning v. Fanning, 2 Misc N.Y. 97

This was also iterated: "Marriage is not a mere contract between two parties but a legal status from which certain rights and obligations arise." DeMatteo v. DeMatteo, 436 Mass. 18, 31 (2002) See also: Smith v. Smith, 171 Mass. 404, 409 (1898) "[O]n marriage, the parties "assume[ ] new relations to each other and to the State". See also French v. McAnarney, 290 Mass. 544, 546 (1935), as the Massachusetts Supreme Court clearly notes—yet, this does not supercede a Civil mandate and union for the parties superior to the Common Law.

"If the parties to a marriage contract were allowed to renounce the ties of wedlock, and to abandon the duties and obligations of the conjugal relation for any cause that seemed reasonable and just to them, or for any cause other than the legal cause for divorce, then indeed would such contract have but little binding force and the sanctity of the marital state would be destroyed. Suits for divorce, already far too numerous, would overwhelm the courts of chancery. Hence "the interests of society, the happiness of the parties, and the welfare of families demand the rule," supra, that there shall be no abandonment of the matrimonial relation except for such causes as would constitute grounds for divorce. I Bishop, Mar. Div. & Sep. § 1753. Warfield v. Warfield, 97 Ark. 125, 128. (December 19, 1910)

Currently, we have government intentionally overturning and destroying the marriage relation by such proactive government protocols, which directly attack marriage and the family—by overtly destroying the Father. These contemporary government programs not only overturn the fundamental law itself, but also fly in the face of 'we the people's' passage of well-settled laws upholding the marriage relation. Anyone seeking protection of 'the law' within our nation, as Thomas Ball clearly recognized—is in for a rude awakening. The state has currently abandoned either upholding the fundamental law, or upholding the institution of marriage. The state, in abandoning the legal rights of Fatherhood have abandoned the legal rights of marriage which they were sworn to uphold by operation of law.

Thirdly, we must consider: who are the enemies of marriage? Who are the people whom historically do not want Thomas Ball to be the controlling entity and "Father" within his own home and family? It is the illegal courts, governments and Feminists who have established an unholy tie within government itself, and has established itself as a new Domestic Enemy within all three branches of our government. Please note these facts:

Socialist and Feminist writers have denounced marriage in unmeasured terms and in the vilest language.

They claim that under the form of matrimony, the wife is made the "sex slave" of her husband, and they advocate their liberation by means of the Freedom of Sex and Economic Independence of Woman, providing that they may be employed and earn wages separate and apart, and without the control of the husband.

They also advocate the dissolution of the marriage relations at the will of either party. That children of such marriages shall not be subject to the control of either of their parents nor dependent upon them for support or education, but that all children shall be dependent on the State for all necessary things – food, clothing, and education.

The Socialists allege that the Christian monogamistic family was originated as a capitalist scheme, from the fact that parents naturally desire to accumulate private property for the protection of themselves and their children and to be given to their children as an inheritance.

Socialists claim that marriage is an invention of the capitalist class and the priesthood, for the maintenance of capitalism, and that therefore, marriage and the family are the greatest enemies and obstacles in the development of Socialistic society-where private property shall not exist.

Below are the given quotations from the Communistic Manifesto-the basis of Socialist Propaganda, which makes a candid avowal of Socialist intentions toward the family. Also from the Origin of the Family it is predicted that the foundations of monogamy would disappear, and that the Christian family would cease to exist.

In fact the bolder Socialists advocate Free Love, the control of births, and other practices which are abhorrent to all persons who have been brought up in a Christian atmosphere:

"Abolition of the family. Even the most radical flare up at this infamous proposal of the Communists.

"On what foundation is the present family, the bourgeois family based? On capital, on private gain. In its completely developed form this family exists only among the bourgeoisie."-Communists Manifesto, page 36.

"The bourgeois family will vanish as a matter of course when its complement vanishes, and both will vanish with the vanishing of capital."-Communist Manifesto, page 36. Carl Marx and Frederick Engels, "The Fathers of Socialism."

"We are now approaching a social revolution, in which the old economic foundations of monogamy will disappear just as surely as those of its complement, prostitution. Monogamy arose through the concentration of considerable wealth in one hand-a man's hand-and from the endeavor to bequeath this wealth to the children of this man to the exclusion of all others. This necessitated monogamy on the woman's but not on man's part. Hence this monogamy of women in no way hindered open or secret polygamy of men. Now, the impending social revolution will reduce this whole care of inheritance to a minimum by changing at least the overwhelming part of permanent and inheritable wealth-the means of production-into social property. Since monogamy was caused by economic conditions, it will disappear when these causes are abolished."-The Origin of the Family, page 91, Frederick Engels.

The above, from Fredrick Engels, distinctly avow the aim of Socialism which appears to undermine the economic foundation of marriage, to cause the disappearance of families and the abolition of private wealth, and to prevent the accumulation of property to the bequeathed to children.

All this is to be done through the abolishing the holding of property which is means of production, after which sacramental marriage will disappear when it loses its means of support.

With this avowed aim of Socialism the public should be advised.

Does this sound familiar? It should, because it is being directly asserted throughout all three branches of both state and federal governments!

My God people. What does it take in order to you to recognize what is clearly a Domestic Enemy embedded throughout the aegis of our government? During the Vietnam War, there were fundamentalist Buddhist Monks whom were being persecuted (to a lesser degree than we are here, as Fathers' in America), who self-immolated themselves. Their acts immediately gave inspiration to the national populace to overthrow their own South Vietnam's corrupt Ngô ?ình Di?m regime.

Recently, in Tunisia, there was a similar event on December 17, 2010 when a 26 year old fruit seller named Mohamed Bouazizi doused himself in gasoline and set himself ablaze merely due to government tyranny and humiliation. His act also toppled the corrupt controlling Tunisian regime by national revolt over his death. Both these incidences sparked national revolutions which overturned their respective corrupt and oppressive regimes. Indeed, both these incidences promulgated immediate reactions from the indigenous populace, against the state oppressions (again, which were minimal to what American Fathers' currently suffer today).

Today, American Fathers' are totally, civilly murdered within our court systems. They are penalized more than murderers, child rapists, embezzlers, extortionists, even foreign terrorists. Both foreign terrorists and illegal aliens unlawfully crossing our borders are able to immediately obtain driver's licenses and bank accounts. A mere Father—especially a poor Father, will never have a driver's license again. He will never have a bank account again. He can never obtain a passport. Such Fathers' whom cannot combat this unconstitutional tyranny lose their professional work licenses; they cannot obtain hunting or fishing licenses; their bank savings are repeatedly seized; their cars (and any other valuable property) are unlawfully, and repeatedly seized.

Where murderers and child rapist may obtain some semblance of redress of grievances within the courts; Fathers cannot obtain any redress within these Feminized institutions whatsoever.

Where the average murderer usually spends on average 5-7 years in jail; Fathers' are harangued constantly and imprisoned repeatedly and indefinitely…for no crime ever being committed…on the order of decades to over a quarter of a century or more.

Father's are civilly murdered eternally—for never committing any crime, other than merely attempting to assert their own rights, or for merely being poor.

Again, we must look at our own American history. Before the advent of the "Child Support" industry of the early 1970s, there was no problem with the institution of marriage. Both marriage and families stayed together. American birth rates were at normal rates, divorce rates were low (approximately 3% at 1900 to 13% by 1955), and the American people were relatively happy. America in the 1950s led every social indicator across the planet. The economy was strong, and the wealth was being accrued, not by big business or big government, but rather; huge amounts of savings were being accrued by the home and family!

…And something saw this, and didn't like it. There were entities who recognized that the American home and family was accruing great wealth; and those foreign alien entities hated the American society and wanted a more controllable Soviet style obsequious slave-type society instituted. So they went directly after the men and proactively destroyed them through the advent of 'Soviet Article 81' Family Law courts, e.g. 'The Wisconsin Model.'

Those persons supporting this treasonous anti-law system within government—soon moved up into the highest ranks of both state and federal worker positions. Those like Tommy Thompson who helped with the institution of the Wisconsin Model, and those like Vice President Joe Biden, who instituted "Domestic Violence" mythology throughout our courts and government—soon were appointed to the highest posts within our own government.

Please note these supporting facts of how alien anti-American interests proactively destroyed the American home and family, and especially Fatherhood:

"In a later conversation, Rockefeller asked Russo what he thought women's liberation was about. Russo's response that he thought it was about the right to work and receive equal pay as men, just as they had won the right to vote, caused Rockefeller to laughingly retort, "You're an idiot! Let me tell you what that was about, we the Rockefeller's funded that, we funded women's lib, we're the one's who got all of the newspapers and television – the Rockefeller Foundation."

Rockefeller told Russo of two primary reasons why the elite bankrolled women's lib, one because before women's lib the bankers couldn't tax half the population and two because it allowed them to get children in school at an earlier age, enabling them to be indoctrinated into accepting the state as the primary family, breaking up the traditional family model.

This revelation dovetails previous admissions on behalf of feminist pioneer Gloria Steinem that the CIA bankrolled Ms. Magazine as part of the same agenda of breaking up traditional family models."

See also:

Rockefeller also told Aaron Russo[1] that his family's foundation had created and bankrolled the women's liberation movement in order to destroy the family and that population reduction was a fundamental aim of the global elite…

…Rockefeller told Russo of two primary reasons why the elite bankrolled women's lib, one, because before women's lib the bankers couldn't tax half the population and two because it allowed them to get children in school at an earlier age, enabling them to be indoctrinated into accepting the state as the primary family, breaking up the traditional family model.
This revelation dovetails previous admissions on behalf of feminist pioneer Gloria Steinem that the CIA bankrolled Ms. Magazine as part of the same agenda of breaking up traditional family models.

Rockefeller was often keen to stress his idea that "the people have to be ruled" by an elite[2] and that one of the tools of such power was population reduction, that there were "too many people in the world," and world population numbers should be reduced by at least half.[3]

[1] Aaron Russo, was an American patriot, businessman, entrepreneur, Hollywood film and TV producer (The Rose, with Bette Midler; Trading Places, with Dan Aykroyd and Eddie Murphy; The Teachers, with Nick Nolte) and he was also a documentary film maker, who openly wrote, and published items of grave concern for all Americans. In 2005, he directed and produced one of the greatest documentaries against the IRS, called: From Freedom to Fascism. Unfortunately, he died Aug. 24, 2007 at the age of 64.

[2] This is a proof of "Darwinist" social inflection, of an elite upon an unsuspecting middle-class.

[3] Cited from: Rockefeller Admitted Elite Goal of Microchipped Population, by Paul Joseph Watson, January 29, 2007, Prison Planet at:
http://www.infowars.com/articles/nwo/rockefeller_admitted_el…]

Thomas Ball (as well as myself and a host of other Father's) was a Vietnam Veteran. As veterans, when we supplicated our own court system to assert our secured rights—the court's and government should have bent over backwards to grant us our natural born, common law and constitutional rights. This was owed to us due to the fact that we fought for this country with honor and distinction. All we asked for, was a government 'Republican in form.' We asked for no special favors…we only asked for what was owed us by operation of law.

Instead, we were brought before a Domestic Enemy who implemented a foreign law against us. This foreign law, not only overturned our law, but it destroyed both our homes and families, and also our own government and society in the process!

Those sick and diseased minds who support this system stating that it is in the 'Best Interests of the Child,' are factual liars. For over a decade now, Fathers' Rights activists have been propounding, what is known as the "Fathers' Rights Mantra" to both the courts, government and even the media—to the point they do not even contest these facts or issues now. This 'Mantra' is well known, and it directly controverts the Feminists approbation that these alien courts instituting feminism against our society, as a necessary good—regardless of what the facts or law says:

THE FATHERS' RIGHTS MANTRA

According to a new publication called Getting Men Involved: The Newsletter of the Bay Area Male Involvement Network, Spring 1997:

[unordered_list style="tick"]

- 63% of youth suicides are from fatherless homes (Source: U.S. D.H.H.S., Bureau of the Census
- 90% of all homeless and runaway children are from fatherless homes
- 85% of all children that exhibit behavioral disorders come from fatherless homes (Source: Center for Disease Control)
- 80% of rapists motivated with displaced anger come from fatherless homes (Source: Criminal Justice & Behavior, Vol. 14, p. 403-26, 1978.)
- 71% of all high school dropouts come from fatherless homes (Source: National Principals Association Report on the State of High Schools.)
- 75% of all adolescent patients in chemical abuse centers come from fatherless homes (Source: Rainbows for all God's Children.)
- 70% of juveniles in state-operated institutions come from fatherless homes (Source: U.S. Dept. of Justice, Special Report, Sept 1988)
- 85% of all youths sitting in prisons grew up in a fatherless home (Source: Fulton Co. Georgia jail populations, Texas Dept. of Corrections 1992)

[/unordered_list]

(Because only a portion of each age group grew up in a fatherless home,) these statistics translate to mean that children from fatherless homes are:

[unordered_list style="arrow"]

- 5 times more likely to commit suicide
- 32 times more likely to run away
- 20 times more likely to have behavioral disorders
- 14 times more likely to commit rape
- 9 times more likely to drop out of high school
- 10 times more likely to abuse chemical substances
- 9 times more likely to end up in a state-operated institution
- 20 times more likely to end up in prison.

[/unordered_list]

There is a litany of abuse more profound than what is stated here, again; all emanating out of the state predictably giving custody to mothers, and not fathers. As sagely stated and recognized by Dr. Daniel Amneus in his watershed work The Case for Father Custody, he quotes a dolt Georgia judge named Robert Noland who is fully indoctrinated into the natural animal state who proudly (and stupidly) proclaimed: "I ain't never seen a calf following a bull. They always follow the cow. So I always give custody to the mommas." It is very odd how every other judge throughout this nation has adopted the same Noland doctrine supporting the collective animal state which supports the facts and statistics ruining this nation as cataloged within the Fathers' Rights Mantra noted above. Judges fully know and understand that the institution of marriage and the institution of Fatherhood gives them nothing. They fully know and understand which side their bread is buttered on.

Indeed, Noland's screed has become the national mindset of the courts—which have ruined this country by ruining men and Fathers' which has cascaded into all the social failures we witness today. As all the great societies warned us: that if you want an advanced civilization—you give control and custody of the home and family—to the Father and not the Mother. This sounds very contra-intuitive, however; this mandate is the only social system shown within all of Western Civilization.

Lex Angliæ nunquam matris sed semper patris conditionem imitari partum judicat. "The law of England adjudges that the offspring shall follow the condition of the father, not of the mother." Co. Lit. 123

See also:

"The law of England vests the right to the custody of all legitimate children of tender age, without regard to sex, in the father, to the entire exclusion of the mother, who cannot even see them without the father's consent."

Let us note (as all judges do); that supporting the lower order animal state, and supporting Single Mothers, does aggrandize their state-run institutions. Every judge who gives custody of children to the mother fully understands that they are seeding and growing their burgeoning state empire. A judge who routinely gives a child to a mother, thereby denying the Father his natural born, common law and constitutional rights fully knows and understands that within five to ten years, that the Single Female Headed Household will need approximately two police officers, a counselor, an additional school guidance counselor, one additional bed within the Juvenile Jail, probably an additional bed within the County Jail, perhaps even a bed in State prison; a psychologist, as well as hiring a plethora of other social workers, Feminist Day Care Centers, Women's Shelters, & etc., etc., ad infinitum, ad nauseum.

Conversely, if any intelligent judge recognizes this and starts giving custody to Fathers…then the state gets nothing. In fact, what society gets by the judge assigning custody to the Father, (as history proves), is a family willing to stay together, and solve its own problems. Indeed, let us consider: which legal entity will the state support? Independent and self-reliant families with Fathers' incorporated into them…or Single Female Headed Household's, which will add to the largesse of the state?

Both our history and Thomas Ball has proven which entity the court and government will support, and is supporting; and it has been the SFHH, to the direct denigration and criminalization of men.

This scatological Feminist system, being directly supported by the fetid complicity and omission of the males of this nation to justly react—to what other societies clearly have justly reacted in favor of truth and justice—is a national disgrace.

Many within the Fathers' Rights movement state that they do not condone violence. With Thomas Balls' demonstrative immolation upon the courthouse steps of Keene, New Hampshire, what else could ever condone violence? Clearly, other nations of the world presented with similar acts of desperation of which Thomas Ball has displayed, acted with a single mind. Those societies actually did something about the tyranny being imposed—even upon special groups other than themselves. All other societies that I have found, did not tolerate such injustice. They didn't sit on their ass; rather, they acted.

Please recognize that neither our courts, nor Legislatures, nor even Executive departments of government are listening to either law or reason. The fundamental right to 'Redress of Grievances' has been obliterated. My God, look at what supplications Mr. Ball had to go through on the order of a decade to finally recognize there was no remedy? My God, you have people throughout this country (I know one in Massachusetts), being told they can no longer come to court for ANY kind of remedy! We have diligent men, making arduous application to both the courts, media and even legislative and executive branches of government, being insolently turned away!

And then we wonder why there is approximately 24,000 men committing yearly suicide because of family courts alone? Do you recognize that we have only killed approximately 58,000 to 60,000 in the Vietnam War? That 145 died in the 1990/1191 Gulf War? That approximately 721 troops have died within the 2004 Iraqi War? And approximately 2433 troop deaths in the Afghanistan war?

Yet, we are killing far more men in these Feminist court wars, than we are killing in all our foreign wars combined! Yet we don't want to upset those in power and state that we don't condone violence?

News flash: Our children have some legal status, and under that legal status as incompetent minors, the law assigns only one person, who owns, and controls that child, for both its safety and comfort, by operation of law. This is the only thing the law states as to that controlling legal fact:

The Father, owns the child against the mother, as well as against everyone else…."The discretion to be exercised is not an arbitrary one, but, in the absence of any positive disqualification of the father for the discharge of his parental duties, he has, as it seems to us, a paramount right to the custody of his infant child, which no court is at liberty to disregard." State v. Richardson, 40 NH 272, 277.

That any asseveration that there is 'equality' within the legal system can be quickly discounted by any man going into these Feminized court systems and attempting to type in 50%/50% into their computerized Dissomaster computer systems to find out what child support percentages are to be awarded. At no time will the court computer accept 50%/50% to be typed in. It always defaults to 49%/51%. Plus, such 50/50 custody fiction is prohibited by the maxims of law which state: "No man can be both lord and tenant over the same property." We must recognize, that the modern Feminist code infected into the contemporary court system, only intimates equality. From that Feminist Equity the actuality is that Judge Robert Noland doctrine (noted above) of giving children to mothers is the only maxim being followed by the judiciary as a whole.

The real law intimates nothing. It clearly assigns only the Father as the main custodian and protector over his children. This right comes under Article I, Section 1 of your state constitution and under Amendment the Fifth, of the Constitution for the United States 1787-1791 "rights to life, liberty and property." Your children are something and have some definable legal status; and under well-settled and well-defined law, that 'something' is that they are real property. If you do not claim them as such, the state most assuredly will, and the state will act accordingly.

I must say, as a favored son of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, that I am ashamed of most of the Fathers' Rights groups there. What acts Thomas Ball was pressured into, by a well-known and well-defined Domestic Enemy; is a known constant; and is constantly repeated throughout this nation to the detriment of men. When you speak of the detriment of men, you are categorically speaking also to the detriment of families, because as I have shown, the institution of marriage and family, requires a man. Without a man in that institution, what you have regressed to is not a family, but an animal Shrewdness, (e.g., only a woman and child). You instantly revert back into the 100,000 year old animal Matriarchal state.

No longer do men expound nor recognize the truth. These courts and governments are in fact, a Domestic Enemy. Have you ever consider that if our currently 'defined enemies' ever took over this nation (e.g. the Muslims) that they would treat father's much better than our own government?!? What this fact shows, is that men are going to war to support anti-law systems which both oppress and destroy them.

Are we in fact, doing that?

Or are we following the path and doctrines of freedom that our Massachusetts forefather's fought and died for during the Revolutionary period of this nation?!??

Have we become an America where men allow unjust courts to promulgate anti-law and then watch as men kill themselves because of the foreign law oppression that we then must suffer? To what end? Do we do this, so we can show even more social pathology failures other than what was clearly visible by what is exposed in the Fathers' Rights Mantra? The law and our foundational freedoms are on our side.

Please note, that any government or public entity, changing the basic law of the country: is factual grounds for treason.

First, recognize this:

"It belongs to [the legislature]… to determine, primarily, what measures are appropriate or needful for the protection of the public morals, the public health, or the public safety… There are, of necessity, limits beyond which legislation cannot rightfully go. While every possible presumption is to be indulged in favor of the validity of a statute, (Sinking Fund Cases, 99 U.S. 718 ,) the courts must obey the constitution rather than the law-making department of government, and must, upon their own responsibility, determine whether, in any particular case, these limits have been passed. 'To what purpose,' it was said in Marbury v. Madison, 1 Cranch, 137, 167, 'are powers limited, and to what purpose is that limitation committed to writing, if these limits may, at any time, be passed by those intended to be restrained?

The distinction between a government with limited and unlimited powers is abolished, if those limits do not confine the persons on whom they are imposed, and if acts prohibited and acts allowed are of equal obligation.' The courts are not bound by mere forms, nor are they to be misled by mere pretenses. They are at liberty, indeed, are under a solemn duty, to look at the substance of things, whenever they enter upon the inquiry whether the legislature has transcended the limits of its authority. If, therefore, a statute purporting to have been enacted to protect the public health, the public morals, or the public safety, has no real or substantial relation to those objects, or is a palpable invasion of rights secured by the fundamental law, it is the duty of the courts to so adjudge, and thereby give effect to the constitution. Cited from: Mugler v. Kansas, 123 U.S. 623, 8 Sup.Ct. 273, 31 L.Ed. 205.

Secondly, note our nation's settled response to the first:

Eli H. Murray a lawyer who rose to the rank of brigadier general in the Civil War [said]:
"The tree of liberty is rich enough in timber to construct scaffolds and coffins for all those who may treasonably conspire to break down our constitution and violate its written laws."

It is undisputable that the government is allowing these courts to overturn our fundamental rights and liberties for the purposes of profit and reward; courts that are in fact, committing Treason. Treason is defined as:

TREASON. In Criminal Law. This word imports a betraying, treachery, or breach of allegiance. 4 Bla.Com. 78. In England, treason was divided into high and petite treason. The latter, originally was of several forms, which by 10 Edw. III, st. 5, c 2, where reduced to three : the killing by a wife, of her husband; by a servant of his master; and the killing of a prelate by an ecclesiastic owing obedience to him. These kinds of treason were abolished in 1838. In America, they were unknown; here treason means high treason.

"Treason it has been said is not felony but a grade of crime by itself." 29 N.J. L. 458, 464.

The constitution of the United States, art. 3 s. 3, defines treason against the United States to consist only in levying war against them, or in adhering to their enemies, giving them aid and comfort. By the same article of the constitution, no person shall be convicted of treason unless on the testimony of two witnesses to the same overt act, or on confession in open court.

It is "the only crime defined by the constitution….The clause was borrowed from ancient English statute, enacted in the year 1852. Previous to the passage of that statute there was great uncertainty as to what constituted treason. Numerous offences were raise to its grade by arbitrary constructions of the law. The statute was passed to remove this uncertainty and to restrain the power of the crown to oppress the subject by construction of this character. It comprehends all treason under seven distinct branches. The framers of our constitution selected one of these branches, and declared that treason against the United States should be restricted to the acts which it designates.

"Treason against the United States,' is the language adopted, 'shall consist only in levying war against them, or adhering to their enemies, giving them aid and comfort.'" No other acts can be declared to constitute the offence. Congress can neither extend, nor restrict, nor define the crime. Its power over the subject is limited to prescribing the punishment. Field, J., in 4 Sawy. 465.

By the same article of the constitution, no "attainder of treason shall work corruption of blood except during the life of the person attainted." Every person owing allegiance to the United States who levies war against them, or adheres to their enemies giving them aid and comfort within the United States or elsewhere, is guilty of treason; R.S. § 5331. The penalty is death, or at the discretion of the court, imprisonment at hard labor for not less than five years and a fine of not less than ten thousand dollars; and every person convicted of treason is rendered incapable of holding any office under the United States; R.S. § 5332.

The term enemies, as sued in the constitution, applies only to subjects of a foreign power in a state of open hostility with us. To constitute a "levying of war" there must be an assemblage of persons with force and arms to overthrow the government or resist the laws. All who aid in the furtherance of the common object of levying war against the United States, in however minute a degree, or however remote from the scene of the action, are guilty of treason; 4 Sawy, 457.

Treason may be committed against a state; 4 Story 614; 11 Johns. 549.
See, generally, 3 Story, Const. § 1796; Sergeant. Const. c. 30; Cooley, Const. Lim. 380; Rawle, Const.; Bish.Cr. Law; 20 Wall. 92; 16 Id. 147; 92 U.S. 202; 93 Id. 274.

As to the Law of Treason under the Roman Empire, see 22 Law Mag. And Rev. 23; 15 Cr. Law Mag. 191; 46 Alb. Law J. 345.

Virtually every state and federal agency, as well as its state Legislatures and concomitant branches of government are routinely committing treason—in the hopes that 'we the people' will become confused because of the wide extent of the problem—and thereby just do nothing.

"But treason is a crime against an entire community, and it is the highest crime that an individual can commit against a community or a body politic, of which he is a member." It is therefore, a political offense; and as such, it ever has been and still is to be regarded.

Such being the nature and character of treason, from the principles and structure of American Government, its object is, generally, if not always, a change either in the form of government or the administration of it."

Now there are many whom shall note that in order to have treason you need the element of 'making war against them.' Indeed, this is correct, and if you read the law, you will find the concise definition of what crimes these Domestic Enemies whom are promulgating this war, are legally implementing, and that is of a Mixed War.

What is a Mixed War?

MIXED WAR. A mixed war is one which is made on one side by public authority, and on the other by mere private persons. People v. McLeod, 1 Hill (N.Y.) 377, 415, 37 Am.Dec. 328.

When you have more men killing themselves than all our foreign wars due to the tyranny of Feminism and these corrupt Court systems, I state for the record, that we are in a Mixed War. When you have but one Father, radically burn himself on a courthouse steps as his only legal remedy, I again state, that by identity, we are in a Mixed War. When you have a litany of failure as shown by the Fathers' Rights Mantra, being supported year-after-year by both congress and the state Legislatures providing ever-increasing amounts of money to support Fatherlessness, then; I formally state that we are in a condition of war, and have been for the past half-century.

Merely changing our form of free-American government into the Soviet Constitution Article 81 court system, is an identity of High Treason, of which both Judges and Legislators (and attendant Feminist and other private opportunistic groups and Foundations) must be formally prosecuted, by operation of law:

If any person or persons, at a meeting of the people convened for the purposes aforesaid, or for any other purpose, shall maliciously and advisedly recommend or desire them to erect or form any new government in any part of this state, independent of the present, or shall read to them any new form of a constitution, with design to induce them to adopt the same, as new and independent constitution, every such person or persons, being thereof legally convicted, shall be adjudged guilty of high treason. Read's Dig. 273. 1 Dall. Rep. 37.

Unfortunately, these execrate acts and/or omissions committed by both our courts and government occurred on our watch. It would be nice to go out boating, or seeing a movie with our children, but how can we do this, knowing that a good and intelligent man was driven to his death by an illegal and corrupt court system and government? And further knowing that other Fathers, indeed our own children, may be destined to the same fate!? How can we do nothing?

The law is on our side. We have the moral high ground with Thomas Ball as our leader. We should go to each and every court and government building across this nation, and boldly paint his black ashes on each and every courthouse steps, indeed both the Legislative and Executive steps, even public buildings and including their homes, until the black soiled indelible stain shames them into recognizing Fathers' Rights.

If our own government and its surrogate courts continue to blacken their hearts with implementing this current Apartheid being leveled against all men in this nation, then their public buildings, their own homes should represent and show that soiled blackness. Thomas Balls' stain should shock the conscience of the community into finally supporting Fatherhood once again. The American landscape should show the ugliness and horror of what Thomas Ball, and millions of other men are suffering through these diseased court systems. The breadth of this blackness, and soiling should be promulgated to such a point, that our enemies fear and hate going to work or even to their own homes, knowing Ball's stain will haunt them in the light of day. These incredibly expensive public offices and buildings should show the stain of Thomas Ball in order to represent the true disease and sickness of what they truly are. The media should also suffer this fate, as they had a public duty and charge to inform the American people of this malady, yet refused to do so.

The egregious death of Thomas Ball must not be swept under the rug. His death is a clarion call to all Fathers, that it is time to do something. It is time to act.

We should be reading the riot act to those well-known suspects implementing this illegal and unconstitutional Feminist perversion against us. We must follow those judges and District Attorney's and others who have lined their own pockets with the blood of innocent Father's, and make them pay. We have a duty to bring them to justice, and to force a plethora of government employees into HIGH TREASON trials. For if this is not the time, then when is?

If what they have done for the past half-century was legal, then; they should be readily willing to face such tribunals to adjudicate their ongoing acts and/or omissions, done in the name of our own children. They should be happy to simply defend themselves against such charges.

From and by this system, our enemies have built, and thrown us into huge prison gulags. It's time to place them into the same jails that they themselves wilfully built—and force them to face their own laws which have so readily placed against so many innocent men, forcing them into prison—for no crime committed.

A government which arbitrarily criminalizes men for merely being a Father, should not be allowed to succeed. A social system which forces men to walk to the steps of their accusers and their surrogate courts who neither listen to their legal supplications, or motions or laws, should be held to the strict light of scrutiny. Those same courts who by their own inspired injustices of wilful blindness to Father's plights, forces a man such as Thomas Ball and makes them pour gasoline over himself in a desperate attempt to be heard should not be allowed to survive. We are better than that, and we must recognize an enemy when we see it, and act accordingly. It is the American way…

In the name of Thomas Ball, the time has come to act.

This article reprinted with permission from TheDailyPaul.com

A Bitch Named Irene...

Izzey · 30 August 2011 · Archived copy · Original

[box type="download" icon="none"][Editors note. Sometimes life on earth makes us want to kill everyone else who lives there. I have been there a couple of times. Our best wishes go out to Izzey, a long time supporter of the AVfM Mission. May it all pass quickly. PE][/box]

...a betrayal, and the almost landed right hook.

I knew she was coming. I also knew I would do everything in my power to kick her ass. I boarded up my windows (eighteen of them, anyway) while neighbors peeked out of their own windows scratching their heads…like I was going too far. A man pulled up in a car with a microphone in his hand and asked if he could interview me. He also wanted the sounds of the saw cutting the wood boards in-between talking to me. It was for radio, not television, so I said "sure, why not" It was a good interview, and he left without telling me what radio station I would be on. I laughed, because it didn't even matter. I had Irene on my mind.

It figures, a hurricane barreling up the eastern seaboard would be named after a woman. She wasn't going to 'turn' either. She had me in her crosshairs, and I was going to have the eye of that bitch coming right over my house. She chose the highest tide to announce her arrival. She did not want me to forget her….ever.

I was prepared. The new sump pump was installed into my basement, three back-up pumps and a generator were standing by. Everything in my basement was up high on shelves, or in heavy grade plastic bins. I have danced with the high tide and hard rains in my basement before, but this was going to be a different dance; so different that I was not sure I was up to the task. I weighed my options– Leave, and come home to a drowned house. Stay, and maybe become a drowned statistic.

I work on boats, and my partner is a commercial plumber. Two people that know the water from different perspectives professionally. He installed the new sump pump as his crew cut it into the waste lines. If you pump out flood water into the street, you get it right back into the house. The waste line was my best bet. The floor pumps had hoses propped over the big tub sink, also going into the waste line. They only had to be turned on when the time came, and they were strategically placed around the most vulnerable parts of the foundation.

Whatever I could carry in the way of lower shelved power tools, artwork, precious personal items, and boxes of frames for my poetry art, were brought upstairs. I even loaded my car, and also put things in the garage up on a big table using the leftover uncut boards from the windows on top of saw horses. I filled my bathtub, had gas cans ready for the generator, and bought dry goods, bottled water, and had more batteries than any one store had on the shelves in the last week. I also had a 'ditch kit' with toiletries, clothing, important papers, cash, my blood type info, and phone numbers for family…etc. I was the epitome of "prepare for the worst, and hope for the best"

I set the clock for 3am. I took 'a nap' for a couple of hours thinking it may be the last sleep I'd get for maybe the next 48 hours. When I woke up, the winds were pinging debris against my boarded windows, the sump pump was already jammin', and the rain was hard. Trees were doing a hula dance.

Game on.

I went downstairs and was smiling. I thought this was going to be a walk in the park. The water started coming in briskly by 4:30am. By 5am, I had to turn on the floor pumps, and get ready to man a big shop vac. I had my coffee, and was wide-awake-ready. But something was wrong. The sump pump was filling up, and so was the tub sink fed by floor hoses. Suddenly water came rushing through holes in the cement foundation like someone shot them with bullets. The side door to the basement, which was a tightly sealed double locked steel door, had water gushing in from under it. It is then that I fucking panicked. Nothing was pumping out, and the tide surge was coming in. I was up to my knees in water in just a few minutes. Within an hour, my waist.

Suddenly, things were floating all around me. I was trying to throw plastic bins up the stairs from where I was. I could not believe it. I knew I had already lost the oil burner and water heater. Washer and dryer were next. They were still plugged in. The outlets were all overhead. When I heard the sizzle of outlets being blown I was still in the water trying to navigate floating objects. My freezer filled with meat and other food, came right off its blocks and almost pinned me into the steps. I thought for sure I was a goner. I was going to drown or be electrocuted.

My dehumidifier slid across the floor tripping me up. I fell backwards, and almost could not get out from the floating freezer. I was trying not to panic. Everything was falling down around me. The washing machine came off its block and just fell forward and sunk. I was grateful it wasn't coming after me. The dryer is a front loader, and filled up with water and pretty much stayed put. The hoses from the pumps were like snakes all around me. I started freaking out. Wood shelves fell over with all of their contents spilling out.

I knew I had to get out. I was now a star in a disaster movie. Sometimes, the star dies. I was up to my neck in water, and there were two steps left at the top of the stairs not yet submerged. The whole basement would be filled to the top within a half hour. I had nine full steps down. I suddenly started laughing. I remembered that I went to school with a girl named Irene. What a cunt. A real bitch on wheels.

There was some stupid irony in that.

I got out, and flooded my kitchen with my clothes. I started to cry. I didn't understand why the water didn't pump out. I was now at high tide with a five foot surge accompanying it. The wind was beating the shit out of my house, and I had only one small window to peek out of. I had boarded all the large ones. I changed my clothes, and prepared for the main floor to take on water. The street was a river, and there was no escape. I hoped I had a phone to at least check on my family and maybe say goodbye. What a fucking nightmare.

I looked into the basement. High tide peaked and I had one step to go. The water looked calmer. The freezer was lodged on two steps against a wall that had my workbench on the other side. 'Christmas' rubbermaid tubs were tightly closed, but flipped upside down, and water was seeping into all of them. My back door to the kitchen had a foyer with a window. The wind was not coming from that side of the house. I was on an open corner, and three sides caught the wind. Not this side. I could see my garage. There was five feet of water against it. I knew I lost everything in there below that.

The betrayal was the town. They shut down the waste lines. They did not tell us they were going to do that. As soon as the tide started to move out, they put them back on and the sound of my sump pump kicking in almost made me cry again. Once the water started to go down, I had to get back in it to make sure the freezer and other floating large objects landed close to their original spots. If they were no longer floating I could not move them back. I needed to clear the floor for pumps and their hoses to get the rest of the water out. I did my best, and was successful. I was finally able to open the door. I worked most of the day pumping only. the streets went down, but suddenly again. I had more water coming in rapidly. I could not understand this. I was working my ass off, filthy, wet, tired, hungry, thirsty, and pissed off. Others, were doing the same.

[image]

I took a break and walked around the corner. Two houses over from my corner house on the other street there was a monster generator sitting in a driveway, pulling out water from a firehouse size hose, with no hose guiding its extraction down to the street drains. It was just spitting out gallons and gallons of water like and uncapped fire hydrant. The driveway sloped down on the right side, flooding my neighbor's house and the runoff from his yard went betweeen our houses – and right back into my basement.

I fucking flipped out. Pure rage took over my whole body. I banged on the door…no answer. I yelled at the house…"Come on out!!!" Nothing…nobody home. So, I did the next best thing. I shut the fucking thing off and waited. Still nothing. Then a big white shiny brand new truck pulls up, with two young muscle jocks – hair perfectly gelled, skin tight t-shirts and jeans on, get out, and are looking at the pump. I said "is this your house…….mother-fucker??"

He said,"It's my father's house, and he rents it out, so I am taking care of the flood for him" (I had fire in my eyes as he said to me, "what's your problem?" I said, "My problem is that you have no hose on this thing, and it is pumping water back into MY basement" He looks at the flooded neighbor's house, and realizes the streets are clear, and he is flooding the houses and not draining into the street. "Oh, I did not realize you guys are lower than me, and when I put this on early this morning, there was water all over the place" (It was now 4pm, and I had been pumping hours and hours of his fucking water out of my basement) "Put a fucking hose on it, or I will break off the switch, and you'll not start this thing again today" I said.

He said –"Calm down lady, I didn't realize I was flooding you" My answer to that, was, "Look around, asshole…what do you see? HOSES everywhere, pumping to street drains." He told me to go home, and he would fix it. I told him I wasn't leaving until he did. He told me to "fuck off."

I told him "there's two ways of doing things: The right way, or you ain't got no business doing it at all, way" (I almost couldn't speak, and thought I was going to have a heart attack or kill him right on the spot) He was in my face with his clean shaven face, and stinky after shave. I was filthy muddy, and felt my right fist clenching. If I were a man in the same situation, I would have landed the punch at "fuck off." I walked away.

He put on the hose, and my basement pumped out completely. I then helped my other neighbors pump out with my own pumps. I came back home and took a cold shower because I now have no water heater, and then I sat down and had a real good cry. Today was the first time in my life, that I really wanted to punch someone, and knock them out cold, for being so fucking inconsiderate.

These guys just turned on a pump and walked away. They worked at nothing. They were squeaky clean, whilst everyone else in the street was filthy, wet, and exhausted, just like I was. The old man on the other side of this house, was left alone by his family to 'ride it out' and take care of the aftermath. Most of the women fled. There were a few left, that worked with their husbands like a team. How real relationships were meant to be. Those people are a rare breed these days. I also have to add, that my other neighbor (single mother) left her sixteen year old son in the house with three cats and a dog, no pumps, or staples and went on a business trip two days before the hurricane. I boarded up his garage window, gave him some batteries, flashlight, food, and told him to RUN or swim to my house if it got too bad at his. What a fucked up world we live in.

One-way chat with nobody

NCFM · 31 August 2011 · Archived copy · Original

"Hey, get a grip, Buddy! It's not my fault you missed your court date and defaulted into paternity.

No, it does not matter that you have never seen the woman or know who she is. When you missed your court-date, you became the woman's father of choice. Yes, one of the children is handicapped, which means you will pay child support until you die as far as the law is concerned.

I know it's four years later, but it takes awhile for us to get all the paperwork done, track you down and garnish your wages, which is how you finally found out right?

Ok, let's see, the amount looks correct considering we're talking three children… err, with penalties and interest…$76,000 and change.

Please keep your voice down.

No, defending our country against terrorism in Iraq and Afghanistan doesn't count. You missed the court date. You're now dear'ol dad whether it's your kid or not.

Well, you should have had your mail forwarded if you were out of the country. We sent a notice to your last known address…

Yes, a judge might modify the amount you pay in the future, but it is rare and you're on the hook for the $76,000.

No, Federal law prohibits forgiveness so you have to pay the full amount plus penalty and interest.

No again. Child support arrears are not dischargeable in bankruptcy, even if the kids are not yours.

No you don't. She gets the tax exemptions for the kids even if the child support you pay is her only income.

I'm not sure about private detectives, but I've heard at least $3,500 to retain a good attorney, which might be worth considering since you only hope is to prove you were defrauded or we made a technical mistake, which is common. I know one guy that spent more than $100,000 for his attorneys.

No, you cannot ask her about whom the biological father is because she lied. The restraining order says so. She is not required to tell you and neither are we, even if we know whom the guy is.

Scam? Please.

No, not her kids either. If you make any effort to contact any of them, you will be arrested and charged with a domestic violence restraining order violation. And, if you get angry and raise your voice within hearing distance of her kids your name might be included forever on the state's Child Abuse Index too. So, you can forget about applying for good jobs when you retire from the military, since employers regularly check the Index and won't hire child abusers.

No, she doesn't have to prove anything. All she has to do is say she's afraid of what might happen and you can be arrested for domestic violence or child abuse. That's why the restraining order was issued. She said she was afraid of you.

Heck, she can even sue you for pain, suffering, and damages if you violate the restraining order, maybe even if you don't. Since she was given a restraining order she is now officially a victim and can apply for all sorts of financial assistance from victim compensation programs.

How did you find out she lived in Sweden? You are not supposed to know even that. Oh, it was penciled in the margin of the notice you just got from our Child Support Enforcement Division that she was applying for an increase in child support since you were promoted. No I don't know how she found out.

I guess she does have you by the bal… well; she has the advantage for sure, especially since we don't prosecute for making false accusations of paternity, child abuse, sexual assault, or domestic violence. Just welfare fraud, sometimes, maybe…

[image]Sure. Restraining order violations are serious. You can loose everything you, your wife and natural children have just because the woman you have never seen lies again and says you were at same grocery store, movie, or something like that, even if she doesn't know what you look like. Basically, she can say whatever she wants and you and your natural family are burnt toast. Plus you go to jail.

Well, yes, I guess she can. Since she has a restraining order she's technically a domestic violence victim and can be granted American legal status.

It doesn't matter that you don't know who she is, you are the court ordered established father. According to domestic violence laws, that makes you a family member.

Oh? I didn't know that. You'll be dishonorably discharged, too. Bummer.

Yes, you have to pay the child support even though the law says that you have no parental rights and are prevented from ever having any relationship with the child or children.

Who said anything about being fair?

I see you've been doing your homework. It is true that even if you start paying the child support, have receipts, and a full accounting from your employer showing that payments were withheld from your checks, that you might have to pay again. Some companies don't pay what they withhold, but that's your problem, not ours.

Well, even if the payments went directly to the woman and she says the money was never received, or she simply chooses not to respond to our inquiries, then we presume the money has never been paid, whether you or your employer made the payments. Between you and me, our computer system is so messed up we don't track things real well even though we've literally spent a couple billion dollars trying to fix it. So, we cannot correctly process most information even if we have it, at least in any timely way.

Sure, happens all the time. Heck, there was a noncustodial mother in here just yesterday with all kinds of proof that she'd paid over $67,000 that was not credited to her child support account. It was garnished by her employer but supposedly never received by the father. Looks like the employer never paid it. We have her credit so messed up she can't get her house refinanced, which she needs to do to pay off the child support arrears. We snagged her tax refunds too and took away her license to drive and practice medicine. She was a pediatrician. So, we screw up the lives of a lot of people besides paternity fraud victims, including noncustodial female parents, though not many women since courts seldom award primary child custody to fathers, even if the women are child abusers, drug addicts, or convicted of violent crimes.

Yes, the children you have never seen and that are not yours can sue your estate as heirs in case of your death and might share your estate with your children of choice or biological children.

Since you're still in the military I assume we've already done the paperwork to get her and the kids base privileges, life insurance, medical, dental and so on.

That's good. You know most of all of your housing allowance goes to her too.

Please calm down! I don't want to call security…

Well, how you pay the rent or support your real wife and natural children is your business, but your first legal obligation is to this other woman and children you have never seen.

What you heard is correct. If you don't stay current with the support payments we will take your house, whatever valuable personal property you own, income tax refunds, and drain your bank accounts, even those of your natural children and wife if you are a cosigner. There was one case where we even grabbed a kid's piggy bank! What a crack up.

Yup, it's also true we will have your passport revoked if you have one, take away your driver's license, any professional licenses you have, and in some cases attach your retirement accounts, since the mother of your court assigned children may have a legal claim to those funds too.

Hmm. Well, how you get to work or make a living isn't our problem either. There's always the bus.

Oh that. Well, the support order says you are required to pay extra for the private school tuition, another $300 per month per child for incidentals, transportation for visits to their grandparents each summer and tennis lessons for the six year old. That's all extra. Whoops, looks like you're paying for all the kid's college, too. That should only cost you a million or so after she and the children move to the U.S. from Sweden as legal resident aliens.

Really? You already have college funds established for your natural children? You wouldn't happen to have the account number with you would you? It would save us some time tracking them down…

I'm sorry, I didn't mean to be insensitive and I don't know why the parents of intact families are not required to pay such things. I guess because they are still free to make their own choices or maybe they cannot afford such luxuries, though if we keep legislating financial incentives to divorce you might want to buy stock in tennis equipment manufactures.

Don't be foolish. You don't think the mother should pay do you? Hold her responsible for lying about you being Dad or having all those kids. No way that will ever fly. That's why the law prevents you from seeking restitution and damages. Otherwise, it might be a burden on her children. Right?

It doesn't matter that the kids don't get the money because the mother is a drug addict and abusive. How she spends the money is her business. Figure it out. If such woman were honest, would she lie, take your money, and destroy your life?

The State reimburses you? Nope, even if the State confused you with somebody else and failed to correctly serve you notice it cannot be held accountable. It's easier to make the innocent pay, which creates jobs, like mine, thank you very much.

Please stay calm, or I really will call security. Then you'll be ordered into one of those designed by women for men only anger management programs.

Duh? Sure, you have to pay for that too. You have to pay for all of it… court costs, attorney fees; filing fees, the psych evaluations and…

No, there is no forgiveness when you go to jail; child support continues to accrue with penalties and interest.

Yes, if you don't pay the support you owe while in jail, upon release if you cannot pay the debt, you might be sent back to jail.

Same thing, how you pay the child support or provide for your wife and natural children while in jail is not our business.

Gee, that's rough. I hope you can work it out with your wife; a divorce would be tough right now, considering the extra child support and everything else you'll have to pay.

Would you please stop fiddling with whatever that is in your pants? It's disconcerting.

[image]

Well, because a small group of legislators redefined family and believe women have the right to name any man they choose as father while ensuring that he has no contact with the children, so you're it. Basically, you're a wallet and you better have some folding money inside or we'll strip you and your family to the bone before sending you to prison and putting your wife and kids on the street.

You're right, there are a lot of people who think it's crazy, but that's the reason nonetheless. Heck, earlier this morning we hauled a Preacher out screaming something about being disenfranchised, radical feminist conspiracy, slavery all over again, and mostly killing minorities.

Why don't I do something? Not my job. I just work here.

Who knows? Basically, if Big Momma isn't happy nobody is happy, and it's politically correct to bash men, fatherhood, and families of choice. Fortunately, women who have watched the destruction of their loved ones are starting to fight back, which is good since men won't do it. So there is some hope over the horizon. Obviously "best interests of children" doesn't include you and your wife's children of choice. And nothing in your situation suggests the laws are concerned with the rest of your family… your natural children's cousins, aunts, and grandmothers, and whoever, or you wouldn't be in this mess.

No, it doesn't matter that someone who jumps bail for rape or escapes from prison after being convicted for murder doesn't get 16 years tacked onto his or her sentence. You missed that one court date, so since the women's youngest child is four you will pay child support for that child for another 16 years, except for the one that's disabled. Remember, you pay child support for her for the rest of the child's natural life. Get used to it. You are conditioned to be abused.

No, I don't think taking your story to the media will help much, though recently more and more paternity fraud cases are being covered in the media. Even so, the media doesn't really see it as a major issue, though in Los Angeles, California last year the Department of Child Support Services defaulted over 4,200 men into paternity. They set a new record and have the highest default rate in the country. I've heard estimates of over seven million men nationwide. Heck the National Association of Blood Banks found that no less than 30% of all men tested for paternity are not the biological fathers of their presumed children! There's a lot of cheating going on out there…

Here's some Kleenex.

That's Ok, use as much as you need. We have plenty.

Yes, that's probably true. If 4,200 women broke their little toe with a faulty polish applicator there would be a national crisis and every media outlet in the country would be digging up mud about the manufacturer while calling for a full government investigation and polish applicator legislative reform.

I'd really appreciate it if you didn't use that kind of language. Like I said I really don't know, but yes it does seem like legal extortion and I understand why you feel that women who lie about paternity just to get money shouldn't be allowed to breed, but there's all that women's choice stuff, too. None of that will change as long as the State refuses to hold women accountable for their own actions, making false accusations and paternity fraud– but changing those things isn't in my job description either.

The good news is sometimes more than one guy gets to support the same women that you have never seen.

Yah, that is crazy, but true.

Well if the court rules you should have known about all this before you petitioned to be released from paternity your petition will be denied. But if you find the real father and get a decent judge, the real father might be allowed to pay half and you can pay half. Saves you big bucks over time, at least until the bio-dad disappears or dies, then it's all on you again.

Do you always shake that bad? Your meds? Ok, here's some water.

No, even if the bio-dad wants to pay for all the child support Courts are prohibited from letting him do so.

What can I say, that's the way it is? We even have cases where the real father is still living with the women and kids. Heck, some paternity fraud victims even pay child support to biological fathers after the state took the children away for whatever reason from the mother and gave custody to Bio-Dad. Crazy huh?

My partner looks like that just before she starts hyperventilating. Would you like a chair or maybe some water?

What's due process?

Hey, Buddy, LIKE I SAID, I just work here, stupid or not.

Oh, you mean the system.

Really, suicide is the fourth leading cause of death for men in America and seven times higher than for women? Over 30,000 men in America a year kill themselves! No way…

That's a bit strong isn't it… men are disposable?'

That's it. Breath. Good. Try counting to ten. Very good. I'm not suppose to do this, but… umm, my partner's a psychologist. You seem like a good guy. Maybe I can get you a discount.

No, huh? Nice gu… Is that a Berretta?

Back off fella… it was your responsibility. You should have had your mail forwarded like I told you. I didn't do anything.

That's better. I appreciate you taking those deep breaths and putting the gun down. It's a nine-mil, right? You don't work for the Postal Service too do you?

Good, good, very good… I'll just put that in this drawer here…

Hey, aren't you that Medal of Honor guy who jumped on a grenade before being captured and tortured for five months?

You are? WOW, that's cool. What a privilege to meet you. I wish there was more I could do. We really need guys like you to protect the freedom we enjoy here.

Be careful! Don't hurt him. HEY careful with the cuffs, he's a war hero. He's just having some trouble with his credit report and political correctness."

[box icon="none"]NOTE: Paternity fraud and child support laws very from state to state, but the above scenario is possible in full or part regardless depending upon which state's laws apply. Reform legislation has been adopted or is pending in many states. Alaska was the first state to adopt comprehensive paternity fraud legislation. To my knowledge it is still the wrongly named father that has full responsibility for correcting the injustice. If you are a paternity fraud victim you need to call the child support office or an attorney to see what laws apply in your state. There are attorneys who specialize in getting false paternity judgments overturned. If you hire an attorney to challenge a paternity judgment you should consider hiring one who specializes in representing paternity fraud victims. If you use the Internet, search "paternity fraud" for more information.[/box]

Mary Kellett placed on offenders registry

Paul Elam · 1 September 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Corrupt Prosecutor also exposed by Russian Times

[box type="alert" icon="none"]

Mary N. Kellett, a prosecutor for the Bar Harbor Prosecutors Office in Ellsworth, Maine, has been placed on the offenders registry at register-her.com, and is listed there as a corrupt public official.

Kellett has a well-documented history of malicious prosecutions, and has now been subjected to harsh criticism in a feature article that was just released by Russian Times. Her actions are currently under investigation by the Board of the Overseers of the Bar for Maine.

It was the prosecution of Vladek Filler for allegedly raping his wife that first brought Kellett under serious scrutiny. Filler's wife, Ligia Filler, a documented false accuser and child abuser with a history of mental illness, alleged she was raped by her husband during the course of a hotly contested divorce that Mr. Filler filed after multiple incidents of abuse from his wife.

Kellett proceeded with the case despite having no forensic evidence and despite knowing about Mrs. Filler's history of false allegations, child abuse and public threats to kill Mr. Filler by "cut[ing] him into pieces."

JTO-Ligia Filler Audio

Ligia Filler is also listed at register-her.com for false allegations of domestic violence. Vladek Filler was at first convicted of the rape allegation but was exonerated of the charges on retrial after the first conviction was overturned due to Kellet's prosecutorial misconduct.

More recently, Kellett is falling under additional scrutiny for alleged witness tampering in another case. Currently a bar complaint is being processed in that case as well.

[/box]

Menshed Movement Gains Widespread Approval and Government Money

Robert O'Hara · 1 September 2011 · Archived copy · Original

[box]

Last week AVFM reported on a news story coming from Australia chronicling the legal problems of a local Menshed chapter in Sunshine Valley. Since that time the local government of has come under heavy criticism and a wellspring of support has come from the community and all over the country.

The Sunshine Coast Daily reports:

“The complainant said he felt uncomfortable with so many men near his children.

This led to community outrage and an outpouring of support for the group.

At their meeting yesterday, even after the speakers had stepped away from the mic, members were chatting excitedly to one another.

They resembled a bunch of boys in a newly built fort. Of course, most forts do not earn $1000 in support from Bendigo Bank. Shed chairman Ron Campbell said he could see “the sparkle” in the members’ attitudes.

“I’ve been surprised on two levels,” Mr Campbell said.

“One is the community response and the second – I’m just amazed by the energy of the men here.

“It would appear that we will stay here. And the material change of use is something we will deal with in the future.” ‘

While the council decision is still pending there is every indication that the Menshed in Sunshine Valley is there to stay.

Another very important development occurred last week as well. Third Sector Magazene reported on Saturday August 25th that the Australian government announced it will appropriate $3 million dollars in funding for the exclusive purpose of funding the Menshed Association. Warren Snowdon, Australia’s Minister for Indigenous Heath, made the announcement at the fourth annual Menshed conference in Brisbane.

“Men’s sheds’ demonstrated success in reaching marginalized and isolated males and contributing to improvements in male health and well being.”

“With Australian men still dying four to five years younger than women, we know we have to support grass roots initiatives like men’s sheds to get males of all ages engaged in ways to improve their health and well being,” Snowdon stated.

This will make Australia almost entirely unique in the western world when it comes to public support for men’s health groups and men’s associations.

[/box]

Celeste Adamski: sexual predator, litigious husband

Paul Elam · 1 September 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Just a handful of hours after the official launch of register-her.com, a complaint was received. Make that a threat.

An individual who identified themselves as John Adamski wrote to inform us that Celeste Adamski, who was registered on the site as a Rapist, was there in error. Well, that is the kind version. Here is the actual email, unedited:

[box type="alert" icon="none"]

Hi,

I am writing because on your website you have false information. The link is http://register-her.com/index.php?title=Celeste_Adamski_–_Rapist . Celeste Adamski was never convicted of Rape or any sexual offense. It is in the best interest that you delete the information from your site, as if you do not, you will receive a subpoena from my lawyer (you will not be the first that has done such) to take it down. You will also get a lawsuit claiming many damages. Thank you for your cooperation in advance.

John Adamski

[/box]

As you can see in the news story that is linked from the register-her.com profile on Adamski, her husband is identified as John Adamski.

And Mr. Adamski actually has a point. Celeste Adamski, after admitting before the court that she had sex with one of her students, a 17 year old male, was convicted of official misconduct, perhaps as the result of a plea bargain, not for the actual crime of rape.

Counsel for register-her.com has advised that there is likely ample constitutional protection for the placement of Adamski in the rape category, but in the interest of accuracy and fairness the staff at register-her.com has opted to react accordingly.

[image]Adamski's profile will remain at register-her.com, but under the perhaps more descriptive category of "Sexual Predator." Perhaps this will assuage the concerns of Mr. Adamski that his wife has been unduly represented. The staff does aim to please.

But on another note, isn't this just precisely the type of reaction that assures us that the registry is such a badly needed public service? After all, it would seem to lend a great deal of credence to the idea that there is too much protection, legally and socially, even for women who commit such egregious breeches of trust and abuse of authority, when the very man behind whose back Adamski was molesting at least one schoolboy, comes out to act as a cuckolded white knight, rushing in to threaten anyone who shines an additional light on her already documented misdeeds. Yes, indeed it does, and in the most conspicuous of ways.

The mission at register-her.com is multi-faceted, but a primary part of that mission is to confront the pressures in this culture that create a shield around sexual predators and other criminals simply because they are women.

The concern here is for the victims of sexual crimes, not for the criminals who commit those crimes. The staff of register-her.com will vigorously defend its constitutional right and its moral obligation to heighten public awareness of this seriously under addressed problem.

Any attempts to coerce, threaten or otherwise bully the organization known as register-her.com out of its mission will only result in more attention on the criminal involved.

Australia has “Voice”

Robert O'Hara · 2 September 2011 · Archived copy · Original

[image]

[box type=”note” icon=”none”]

MEDIA RELEASE – FRIDAY 2ND SEPT – FOR IMMEDIATE RELEASE
A father’s day gift from Labor and the Greens: increased fatherlessness

Virtually every major social pathology has been linked to fatherlessness: violent crime, drug and alcohol abuse, truancy, teen pregnancy, suicide – all correlate more strongly to fatherlessness than to any other single factor.

The majority of prisoners, juvenile detention inmates, high school dropouts, pregnant teenagers, adolescent murderers and rapists all come from fatherless homes. The connection is so strong that controlling for fatherlessness erases the relationships between race and crime and between low income and crime.

Many commentators, including the British Prime Minister, David Cameron, have laid the blame for the recent UK riots at least partially on the fact that many of the rioters were raised in homes without their fathers present.

Men’s Health Australia spokesman Greg Andresen said today, “The Labor government is set to pass a bill over the coming weeks that will raise already high levels of fatherlessness to record levels with untold impact not just on vulnerable children denied the right to see their fathers; not just on fathers who will most likely end up depressed and suicidal after being denied the right to see their children; but on the greater fabric of Australian society.”

Mr Andresen went on to say that the Family Law Legislation Amendment (Family Violence and Other Measures) Bill 2011, if passed in its current form, would:

- increase child homicide rates (in NSW child homicide had reduced by almost 50% since the introduction of the soon to be reversed 2006 reforms)
- give an open license to parents – mostly mothers – who wish to fabricate allegations of violence and abuse as a legal strategy to remove fathers from their children’s lives (by removing the penalties available for the court to discourage false allegations)
- facilitate the practice of parental alienation, whereby one parent – mostly mothers – alienates the child(ren) from the other parent (by removing the law’s “friendly parent” provisions)
- facilitate and reward family violence by increasing the serious social abuse of denying children and one of their parents the right to a relationship
- fail to protect children from abuse and neglect by defining only “serious” psychological harm or neglect as being against the law
- increase litigation and costs for separating families and taxpayers (the soon to be reversed 2006 Family Law changes had led to a 20% reduction in litigation).

The message from the Labor/Green government to fathers and children this father’s day is clear: your relationship doesn’t matter. Happy father’s day!

Media contacts:

Sue Price | admin@mensrights.com.au | 0409 269 621
Warwick Marsh | info@fathersonline.org | 0418 225 212
Greg Andresen | media@menshealthaustralia.net | 0403 813 925

[/box]

A lesson from history

Tom Givens · 2 September 2011 · Archived copy · Original

[dropcap]T[/dropcap]hey say that those who forget History are doomed to repeat it. I'm firmly convinced that this is so, which is why I don't accept the stance of people who wish to dismiss arguments based on how 'wacky' they sound. In my estimation, people like that aren't worth the time it takes to respond.

But there comes a point where merely mentioning certain things becomes laughable, any approach to certain subject matter automatically rendered crazy and completely unacceptable. Usually, those arguments are the most uncomfortable ones. And we all know what that usually means.

I have made the argument in the past that Nazism and Feminism share more than a passing resemblance, but it really goes far deeper than that. Our society resembles the pre-war conditions quite a bit too. To get where I'm coming from, I intend to bore the hell out of you with a history lesson. Ain't that grand?

[quote style="boxed" float="left"]Hitler was a big believer in Natural Selection, and would deliberately set up conflicting departments, and have them fight things out. [/quote] The end of the First World War baffled the German soldiers, who were on enemy territory literally everywhere along the front (ie, they were winning), and rather than accept the death of millions of those back home via flu and starvation as the cause of their loss, they blamed Jews and Marxists.

The widespread hunger and disease that immediately followed WW1 led to a polarization of politics, and all sides became radical in the face of crisis. A Marxist revolt in Munich led to the death of more than 500, with the brutal suppression of Marxists by Right-Wing extremists.

Nearly all of the leaders of this Marxist uprising were Jewish, and Jews were considered synonymous with Marxist. They were held up as scapegoats for all of the ills facing post-war Germany; the starvation, the unemployment, the economic collapse.

In 1921, the Nazi party is established, with member 55 (55th member), a certain Adolf Hitler at the helm. Many famous Germans join the Nazi Party, more for the rush of the Revolutionary spirit than for ideological reasons. The Nazi party line, that there was an International Jewish Conspiracy to dominate the world, was firmly established and openly preached.

Meanwhile, French troops alienated Germans in occupied territories, with oppressive laws and often brutal treatment. The collection of reparations monies sparked a political march by many of the right wing parties in Germany, at Hitlers urging. This became known as The Putsch, and led to Hitler's imprisonment for one month, where he wrote Mein Kampf.

In the mid 1920's, the Weimar Republic (Democratic Germany) began to finance their reparations payments by borrowing from the USA, rather than economy-destroying levels of taxation on its struggling citizens. In short, Germany deficit-financed its way to economic health in what the Nazis referred to as the Weimar Decadence. Berlin is considered the cultural center of Europe during this time, a hotbed of Art, Music, Design and Architecture

Paramilitary groups were in vogue as well, and political parties routinely had a security wing. The Nazis formed theirs, and called them the SA, or Brownshirts, in and around this time.

1928 election, the Nazis get 2.6% of the popular vote.

Then, agricultural prices drop through the floor, causing widespread poverty in the countryside, and the beginnings of more mass starvation. The Stock Market Crash of 1929 has the USA call in their loans to Germany, and unemployment and inflation skyrocket. The suffering spreads to the middle class, and tent cities and soup kitchens abound.

1930 election, the Nazi party, still saying the same things, gets 26% of the vote. More and more people were willing to listen to them, as a result of a more extremist public. Hitler positioned himself as economic savior, at the head of a dynamic party that would destroy Germany's internal enemies and rebuild the country around National unity. And people liked his message.

The Nazi Party campaign platform was more or less as follows:

[unordered_list style="green-dot"]

- National Unity.
- Equal Rights for citizens.
- The powers of citizenship should only be for those of German blood.
- The expulsion of foreign nationals in the case of the existence of unemployment for German citizens.
- The abolition of all income obtained without labor or effort.
- Profit-sharing in large enterprises, the large-scale development of old-age pension, and the creation and maintenance of a sound middle class.
- Land reform in accordance with national needs and a law for expropriation without compensation of land for public purposes. Abolition of ground rent and prevention of all speculation in land.
- Ruthless battle against those who harm the common good by their activities.
- The courses of study at all educational institutions to be adjusted to meet the requirements of practical life. Understanding of the concept of the State must be achieved through the schools (teaching of civics) at the earliest age at which it can be grasped. We demand the education at the public expense of specially gifted children of poor parents, without regard to the latter's position or occupation.
- The State must raise the level of national health by means of mother-and-child care, the banning of juvenile labor, achievement of physical fitness through legislation for compulsory gymnastics and sports, and maximum support for all organizations providing physical training for young people.
- Laws to fight against deliberate political lies and their dissemination by the press.
- To carry out all the above we demand: the creation of a strong central autority in the Reich. Unquestioned authority by the political central Parliament over the entire Reich and over its organizations in general. The establishment of trade and professional organizations to enforce the Reich basic laws in the individual states.

[/unordered_list]

The Party leadership promises to take an uncompromising stand, at the cost of their own lives if need be, on the enforcement of the above points. Oh yeah, and everything bad is The Jews' fault.

[box icon="none"]Munich, February 24, 1920.[/box]

The 1932 elections did not gain Hitler power, but he established himself as a credible statesman in the eyes of the glitterati. In fact, it was backroom dealings by the ultra rich and powerful that got Hitler the Chancellorship, not an open election. That said, the Nazi party was clearly a frontrunner for the next election. They certainly had rich and powerful (and American) friends.

By 1933, political opponents were being incarcerated in 'concentration camps' like Dachau, though most served a year long sentence then were released. There were widespread accusations, and threats of 'protective custody' abounded. Fear of the Gestapo, or more likely being reported to the Gestapo by their neighbor, kept political dissent from formalizing, and kept the population paralyzed with fear…of each other. The Gestapo itself did not have the manpower to do much other than process the paperwork.

Jews were openly harassed and attacked, blamed for societies ills. Nazi propaganda highlighted Jewish participation in certain occupations as "privileged" and suspicious without ever mentioning that Jews were actually restricted to these occupations by law.

The Nazi Party ended unemployment via public spending, and Public Works projects like the Autobahn. These improvements were restricted to True Germans however, and Jews were excluded more and more from public life. The Government instituted retaliatory discrimination against Jews.

The Nazi party itself, and the Government it formed, was a wildly disorganized mess. Hitler was a big believer in Natural Selection, and would deliberately set up conflicting departments, and have them fight things out. Nazi party chapters were led by those who took power, not those who asked for it. Government departments spent most of their time fighting each other.

Hitler was surrounded by "yes men," who he would ramble on to about his vision. These men would then attempt to outdo their rivals in pleasing Der Fuhrer. This led to a quick escalation in brutality. Public beatings, book burnings, robberies and home invasions were commonly carried out against the Jews to no public outcry. The most famous of these incidents is known as Krystalnacht from all the broken glass on the sidewalks.

In order to 'prevent suffering', the Nazis began a program of Euthanasia:

The so-called "Euthanasia" program was National Socialist Germany's first program of mass murder, predating the genocide of European Jewry which we call the Holocaust by approximately two years. The effort represented one of many radical eugenic measures which aimed to restore the racial "integrity" of the German nation. It endeavored to eliminate what eugenicists and their supporters considered life unworthy of life. Those individuals who they believed, because of severe psychiatric, neurological, or physical disabilities represented at once a genetic and a financial burden upon German society and the state.

CHILD EUTHANASIA PROGRAM

In the spring and summer months of 1939, a number of planners–led by Philipp Bouhler, the director of Hitler's private chancellery, and Karl Brandt, Hitler's attending physician–began to organize a secret killing operation targeting disabled children. On August 18, 1939, the Reich Ministry of the Interior circulated a decree compelling all physicians, nurses, and midwives to report newborn infants and children under the age of three who showed signs of severe mental or physical disability.

Beginning in October 1939, public health authorities began to encourage parents of children with disabilities to admit their young children to one of a number of specially designated pediatric clinics throughout Germany and Austria. The clinics were in reality children's killing wards where specially recruited medical staff murdered their young charges by lethal overdoses of medication or by starvation.

At first, medical professionals and clinic administrators incorporated only infants and toddlers in the operation, but as the scope of the measure widened, they included juveniles up to 17 years of age. Conservative estimates suggest that at least 5,000 physically and mentally disabled German children perished as a result of the child euthanasia program during the war years.

[box type="note" icon="none"]The end result of this program is a mystery to no one.[/box]

Many have questioned just what role women played in the rise and brutality of Nazi Germany. In researching the details I stumbled upon a fantastic summary of this subject, which I will share with you now:

"Although Germany had been one of the most progressive feminist societies during the early twentieth century, women generally acquiesced to Hitler's desires. Many women experienced the implementation of Nazi gender policies not as aggression against women but as a welcome return to traditional values (Gellately 2001, 10-11). The elevation and reverence of motherhood showed the regime's antifeminism was not inherently antiwoman. Some Nazi party officials did not hide their hostility toward women. Their insulting rhetoric was often discounted, however, either as exceptional in an otherwise agreeable party platform or because the impassioned speeches of the true leader of the Nazi Party, Adolf Hitler, made clear his sympathy for the plight of women (Koonz 1987, 58-61). Many women found comfort in the ideals of the Nazi Party that relegated women's lives to the private sphere of Kinder, Kirche, Kuche (children, church, kitchen).

Although the Nazi ideal was for women to get married and create large families, many women were unable to do so. The overall surplus of women in Germany and the lack of available men on the home front meant that many German women were single during the war. Most of these women, especially those from the lower classes, were employed before and during the war. The state targeted those who had escaped employment for recruiting drives, with limited success.

Prior to the war, married women were encouraged to leave the workforce to start or expand families. The government gave financial support based on family size. To women in low-paying jobs, with working husbands, significant government assistance in exchange for unemployment was a good deal. The success of the program has often been debated. Although many married women left the labor force, the overall percentage of women employed in Germany was far higher than in Great Britain or the United States (Gellately 2001, 151).

During the war, unemployed married women who did not have children often created a great deal of resentment among those who were forcibly employed. Women of the lower class, even those with young children, could not afford to live off government benefits.

Following long hours of work, working women had to stand in long lines for their rations, while unemployed women were able to get the choicest provisions.

Most of those unemployed, childless women had the financial means not to work, giving the resentment clear class undertones. Attempts to recruit those women were largely unsuccessful, in part because the Nazi leadership refused to make employment compulsory (Noakes and Pridham 2000, 316-325).

Rather than force married women and mothers into employment, the Nazi regime imported millions of prisoners of war and slave laborers from conquered and satellite nations. Extensive efforts were made to prevent foreign workers from defiling the German women who shared common workspace. The vast majority of the Gestapo's manpower was directed at controlling foreign workers and preventing relationships with German women (Gellately 2001, 152). As the war dragged on and times became more desperate, some women did form sexual relationships with non-German men. Many of the denunciations made against women to the Gestapo involved charges of sexual relations with foreigners (Gellately 2001, 197).

Many women found an outlet for their creativity and leadership through work in Nazi social organizations. The umbrella organization for women was the National Socialist Frauen-schaft/Deutsches Frauenwerk (Women's Organization/Women's Work, NSF/DFW). Led by Gertrud Scholtz-Klink, the NSF/DFW acted as a policing organization for women, its main task to indoctrinate, train, control, and organize German women for the needs of the state. Although part of the Nazi Party apparatus, the NSF/DFW did not provide women with avenues to influence political decisions. The leaders within the organizations were given power to operate within the sphere of women but were always subordinate to the command of the male-dominated party. Despite the lack of real power, women participated in the programs of the antifeminist Nazi state in far greater numbers than in the Weimar Republic, which had first enfranchised them (Grunberger 1995, 258). For the most part, women found that the organizations served as support networks, gave them activities to feel useful in the war effort, and provided social benefits for the community.

I'm not going to wax all poetic on the similarities and differences between then and now. I leave the reader to draw their own conclusions. What i will do, however, is say with unmitigated conviction that this sort of thing most definitely CAN happen again…and now, and here. It happened again in Europe barely 50 years after WW2 in Bosnia (see Adam Jones' "Effacing the Male"), it happened in Somalia, and it happens on a smaller scale all the time all over the world.

This is History staring us in the face. It's trying to tell us something. Is the fear of ridicule really all it takes for this to happen again?

They say that those who forget History are doomed to repeat it. I'm firmly convinced that this is so, which is why I don't accept the stance of people who wish to dismiss arguments based on how wacky they sound. In my estimation, people like that aren't worth the time it takes to respond.

KBR files Lawsuit against Jamie Leigh Jones

Robert O'Hara · 3 September 2011 · Archived copy · Original

[box icon="none"]

Earlier this summer Jamie Leigh Jones, former government contractor and employee of KBR, lost a civil lawsuit leveled against KBR involving an accusation of gang rape for lack of evidence. Now KBR is seeking $2 million in damages incurred during the process.

The alleged assault supposedly occurred in 2006, five years before the trial took place. During that time interval, Ms. Jones proclaimed she had suffered from several life difficulties related to the post traumatic response to the alleged assault. These include an inability to function and have normal relationships with men.

Ted Frank, poster at the well respected online forum "Point of Law", stated in a posting after analyzing the court records reported on July 7th:

"The court has already thrown out Jones's most sensational allegations—gang rape and being "locked in a container" for reporting the rape—out of the case for lack of evidence. The medical evidence isn't very friendly to Jones, either. And her damages claims seem exaggerated: "At the same time Jones was telling therapists and psychiatrists that she was virtually disabled by post-traumatic stress disorder and could not work, leave the house, drive, or have meaningful relationships with men, she has completed three college degrees, including an MBA; gotten married; had two babies; worked as a teacher and now as a part-time college professor; testified repeatedly before Congress; gone on TV; appeared in a documentary; and started a foundation to support women working as contractors overseas. It's not the résumé of someone as paralyzed by trauma as Jones has claimed to various therapists and psychologists." '

The initial complaint of the sexual assault was preceded some time earlier by another complaint filed with the EEOC from Ms. Jones not long after her arrival in Iraq stating that she was the only female occupant in the barracks she lived in and as such was subject to sexual harassment.

KBR's official statement regarding her initial complaint:

"In her EEOC charge of discrimination, Ms. Jones first claimed she was the only female housed in all-male barracks in Iraq; that she was subject to sexual harassment; and that her complaints to KBR went unheeded. After KBR produced evidence to the EEOC that there were approximately 25 other women in the same barracks as Ms. Jones, including several down the hall from her, Ms. Jones changed her allegations and said that she was place in "predominantly" male barracks.

With respect to Ms. Jones' alleged complaints of sexual harassment, in its EEOC response, KBR produced a number of emails Ms. Jones sent to KBR employees in Iraq, asking if they knew anyone who could help her move up on the wait list and get into a private living container (rather than in a room in the barracks where she would have a roommate). She did not mention the need to move from the barracks because of a sexually hostile environment. To the contrary, in one of her emails, Ms. Jones reports that things in Iraq were better than she expected, and that she had met a lot of neat people."

Jones has become a symbol of government sponsored sexual assault by much of the sexual grievance industry. The Wall Street Journal's Daniel Gilbert reported on July 7th:

""This case is bigger than all of us here," Houston attorney Ron Estefan, a member of the plaintiff's team, told jurors this morning. Big corporations, he said, are watching the outcome of the trial to assess their own sexual harassment policies.

Jones accuses KBR, a defense contractor, of sexual harassment, condoning a hostile sexual climate in Iraq, and of defrauding her by not disclosing that danger when she signed her employment contract. KBR denies Jones' claims and has sought to raise doubts about her credibility.

Estefan asked the jury to award his client $145 million, including $114.5 million in punitive damages against KBR. Jones is also seeking about $9.4 million from Charles Bortz, a former KBR firefighter who she accuses of rape. Bortz denies the rape allegation, and has not been criminally charged for the incident.

Lawyers for Bortz and KBR said Jones was not drugged, and that she and Bortz had consensual sex in her barracks room in Baghdad's Green Zone.

Throughout the trial, both defendants have sought to portray Jones' behavior immediately after the alleged assault as inconsistent with her claims, and argued that she has a history of making inconsistent statements that she blames on others.

Andrew McKinney, a lawyer for Bortz, suggested Thursday that Jones falsely claimed she was raped in order to get out of a year-long contract in Iraq three days after arriving there.

Jones has testified that she would donate any monetary award to her foundation, which seeks to help Americans who are victims of crimes while working abroad for government contractors."

This will mark one of the few cases in which a former defender in any sexual harassment case has counter sued the Plaintiff for a significant amount of money totaling in the millions.

Sources:

http://rt.com/usa/news/iraq-rape-jones-kbr-823-075/

http://blogs.wsj.com/law/2011/07/07/jurors-in-jamie-leigh-jones-rape-trial-asked-to-think-big/http://www.kbr.com/Newsroom/Press-Releases/2009/10/07/Facts-About-Jamie-Leigh-Jones-Litigation/

http://www.pointoflaw.com/archives/2011/07/jamie-leigh-jon.php

[/box]

When sexual predators are a bonus

J Galt · 3 September 2011 · Archived copy · Original

[dropcap]A[/dropcap]s I was riding to work with a workmate, not a folding one a talking one, we got onto the subject of sex between a female teacher and a student. My friend took the position that she was doing him a favor and I have to say I was really intrigued by his opinion. I really couldn't understand how anyone could view this as a favor and at the same time be in any way thoughtful about the event. I really wanted to understand where he was coming from. I asked him how he arrived at that outlook. His response was "well the kid got laid, bonus for him".

I really had to ask in response: Are you telling me that you believe that sex was the only thing that took place and that there could not have been any other exchange? Well like what he said? How about conversation, how about coercion, how about manipulation? Really when you think about it, if it is that acceptable why are there laws that prohibit it? Have you considered the possibility that a fourteen year old boy may in fact have feelings and can be affected by such an encounter?

[quote float="right"]The crime is against boys, vulnerable to their own inability to protect themselves, to understand the emotional and sexual coercion, the betrayal and condemnation.[/quote] Let me ask you, how many men do you know that have been divorced and lost the relationship with a partner? "Quite a few actually," he responded. Can you think of one of them that was not deeply hurt and affected by the loss of that relationship? "I see what you mean," he said. Excuse me for blathering on but your default to such behavior being okay is a bit of a concern. I'm quite sure when your wife goes off on you it's something you don't enjoy, it may even effect you for days depending on the incident. Some men get depressed when served a constant meal of negativity from a partner.

My point is that men as much as women depend on their partner for validation and affirmation that contributes to their self-esteem. I'm sure you've heard the term "if momma ain't happy, ain't nobody happy." Your partner's ability to contribute to your emotional equilibrium is a real power that she possesses to influence you and your state of mind and you're a full grown mature man of 55.

To the extent that you can be affected by your partner as an adult male, are you seriously going to ask me to believe that a 14 year old child is not going to feel any effects on his self-esteem, or self-image from a single sexual encounter with a 40 year old woman? These are the most critical years for young men, they transition into manhood and are trying to figure out their place in the world. At a time when a young man is challenged to fulfill the power over his own life, plot a course and make choices that affect his life, he is being manipulated emotionally by someone who dramatically outranks his life experience.

As a young man, I grew up in foster care and in my teen years I resided in a "boy's home." The home was run by a middle aged couple that I initially thought were pretty cool, after a time of settling I discovered different. It became apparent to me that the woman/wife a 46 year old was fucking some of the guys. In retrospect, I realize that the normal routines I began to question were in fact a process of grooming. At 14 I was allowed to drink alcohol, in fact all the other guys over 14 were allowed to drink. The restriction was one 26oz bottle per week. At fourteen against what anyone believes, this practice just builds and reinforces alcoholism.

These heroes of male orphans would hold parties that were described as opportunities for the guys to open up and learn to socialize. The problem I found was that only adults attended, except for the 6 resident guys. These were people none of the guys knew. Wives slow dancing with young boys while their husbands sat and watched. The awkwardness of the setting was obvious and the guys preferred not to participate and found it to be very twisted. Unfortunately there was nowhere to go except for another drink.

The woman that ran the "home" liked to have a social night out once a week and go to her 38 year old sister's house and take a couple of the guys with her. It was an evening of drinking along with some card play but I realized the card play was a distraction to promote drinking. The card play would end about 8:30 at which time her and her sister would put on music and dance with the guys she had brought. Not long after it started it would change to slow dancing, all of it in an intoxicated state. Of course the grinding hips, roaming hands and passing caresses these ladies offered were described by them as the guys trying to take advantage.

For those who may be confused let me describe the peripheral effects that go beyond the alcohol, the coercion and the sex. In a group of male youths you have what is perceived as informers. Bluntly, you're fucking the wife, you can't be trusted and any attempt to impose your presence in the group will result in violence and you will be subjected to group violence. You're an idiot and you're on your own. Even the guys not fucking the wife understood the danger of violence lurking, given that her husband had played semi-pro football. The environment is no longer safe, it's a battleground laced with land mines.

The effect of this kind of tribalism is pure violence.

I call it tribalism because the tribe grows and shrinks based on infraction, accusation and identifiable trust. The crime is against boys, vulnerable to their own inability to protect themselves, to understand the emotional and sexual coercion, the betrayal and condemnation. The extreme result is death, death by heroin overdose, death by methamphetamine overdose, death by intentionally stepping in front of a tractor trailer while drunk. Of course an outcome less extreme is prison, for firing a 22 caliber rifle from a balcony at someone exiting a bus. Lesser yet is the outcome of being accused and then assaulted with a brick, repeatedly.

Was the sex that bad? Wasn't it really just a bonus for a young guy? No. In case you've never noticed sex doesn't start and stop at the end of your dick. Once you violate the unspoken constraints of a family construct, what most feminists describe as an oppressive patriarchy, you descend into tribalism. You will pay the price for deconstructing the safety of others and you will learn that you are an unwelcome part of that tribe. Unfortunately in such circumstances your victimization is unseen and you become the perpetrator. In the environment of a “boys home” your death will be attributed to the fucked up family that you came from rather than the inability of an institution to protect you.

But hey……at least she got back at her husband for not paying enough attention to her and the squeeze of some young skin and however many orgasms she was able to achieve. After all doesn’t the outcome of such behavior really reside with a 14 year old male child rather than a 45 year old woman? What credibility does he have compared to her or the institution that supports her, the Children’s Aid Society. The social workers charged with overseeing his safety will even get a raise for dealing so effectively with such a troubled youth. Another file closed, one less problem and less expense to the system. Isn’t it better = more comfortable – to believe that some young guy is just going for his bonus?

[quote float=”left”]It astounded me that a 50 year old emotional gorilla was willing to dismiss her family and children to pursue a sexual relationship with a 16 year boy.[/quote] After the end of my first marriage I decided to rent a room as a border and give myself some time to recover, rather than take on the burden of living alone. During the interview with the homeowner, a 50 something woman, and negotiating a price and privileges I was introduced to a 16 year old guy that was described as a foster child. All seemed fine to me and I moved into the room she had for rent. I discovered after moving in that in fact she had left her husband and 3 children to live with and continue a sexual relationship with her foster son. I discovered this from the boy, not the woman.

I was very concerned for him, and told him so. Do you realize that you exist in this relationship for no other reason than her sexual pleasure? You’re 16 years old, what about your future, where are you going with this? You have left school at a time in your life when you’re just beginning to discover your abilities and skills, what will happen to them? His response was, “She will take care of me, I’m like a house husband.” “Really and how do you socialize, with her friends or yours”? “We don’t,” he replied.

I offered him a job, thinking that he would be best served by stepping into the real world and out of the isolation of the relationship. I discovered that his perception of his social status was skewed and twisted by his intimate exposure to a woman 3 times his age. I needed to inform him with a detailed explanation of why he was not my equal and the difference emotionally between a 16 year old and a 45 year old. It was difficult for him to understand that being the sexual pet of a 50 year old woman did not equal emotional maturity. He needed to consider his own interests, his own well-being and his personal development in context to his age. There is no 50 year old privilege for a 16 year old boy.

He waffled and stumbled with the outcome, resorting back to the dependency of his lover. His real place in the order of things did not become clear to him until his lover openly solicited sex from me, in front of him and offered to include him if that would please me. I gave him a look as if to say, is there anything you do not understand here? I could see the humiliation of betrayal on his face and the absolute arrogance on hers. I appreciated her request for no other reason than she had exposed herself to him. He saw the value she had assigned him and the harm that awaited. The rest was up to him and he successfully broke away and pursued his own life and his own interests. Apparently she was not pleased and it was time for me to move on.

It astounded me that a 50 year old emotional gorilla was willing to dismiss her family and children to pursue a sexual relationship with a 16 year boy. It astounded me that she could legally pull this off, that there was no challenge to her from the very institution that was charged with his safety, his education and his emotional well-being. It astounded me that she would sell out his future and his normal evolution in the face of legal retribution. What astounded me more than anything else was that there was no law of retribution for this boy, no social contract, no accountability of the community.

MA Supreme Court Adds Twist to the Role of Judiciary

Robert O'Hara · 6 September 2011 · Archived copy · Original

[box]

Last week the highest court in Massachusetts rejected an appeal to have the new child support guidelines introduced by the Chief Justice for Administration in 2009 repealed. Fathers and Families, along with a handful of individual fathers challenged the new guidelines saying that they were promulgated through unconstitutional means having originated in an exclusive judicial committee. F&F has had much success in changing state laws via legislative lobbying but not so much through the judicial process.

Boston.com quotes Fathers and Families:

“The New Guidelines were approved by an unconstitutional and illegal process, through formulation by a secret judicial committee, and by unilateral imposition of the Chief Justice for Administration and Management,” the fathers’ group wrote in their brief. “The application of the New Guidelines will extract large amounts of money from these plaintiffs in an unfair, inequitable and unequal manner. ”

The court’s reasoning for the rejection of the appeal was that individual plaintiffs can appeal on a case by case basis as to the unconstitutionality of their judgments. This is an odd case of the judiciary making law (instead of simply determining constitutionality of it) and then telling plaintiffs to come to them if they feel their rights were compromised. This is a clear departure from the idea of a three branch system of government where the Judicial Branch doesn’t make law but simply determines its constitutionality.

Sources:

http://www.boston.com/Boston/metrodesk/2011/09/sjc-leaves-child-support-guidelines-place-rejects-appeal-fathers-rights-group/0EP3e7fCZ4GKkALnMY7WUJ/index.html

http://www.bostonherald.com/news/regional/view.bg?articleid=1362972&format=comments#CommentsArea

http://www.fathersandfamilies.org/?page_id=22

[/box]

Stepping Over Hate

John Hembling (JtO) · 6 September 2011 · Archived copy · Original

[dropcap]T[/dropcap]he act of writing from a MRA point of view can sometimes seem like shouting into a hurricane. It is not merely a matter of being ignored and censored by the vast majority of the world. It is also not merely the issue that public discourse is almost totally dominated by the wilful repetition of false facts, repeatedly and decisively debunked, but repeated in defiance of truth. In fact, the arguments fielded by MRAs, including that men are treated as disposable appliances, that in criminal matters women are partially, and sometimes wholly exempt from legal accountability, that affirmative action programs are equivalent to apartheid, and the celebration of male targeted violence, as if injury when inflicted on men is comedy.

These issues are known to the entirety of the general public already, but a cultivated smog of cognitive dissonance serves to enforce and escalate the grotesque hatred and marginalization which persists in western culture. The obdurate failure of opponents as well as disinterested bystanders to grasp men's rights issues is not legitimate confusion, it is pretence.

[quote float="left"]To indulge in hate is to afford the object of that hate control over oneself.[/quote] This pretence is easily demonstrated by reversing the sexes in almost any statement about men as a sexual demographic in the mainstream media. It's also evident in the continued existence of the phrase "man up"; which means – whatever pain you experience is invalid, so suck it up and continue providing labour, money, or violence on behalf of people who discount your humanity.

[box icon="none"]To anyone who would demand the claims summarized herein be demonstrated with examples, kindly refer to my previous writing on this site.[/box]

The product of this, for a man not wilfully deluding himself that he lives in anything but a violent, hateful matriarchy is a natural and justified anger. In fact, a growing understanding that prevalent wilful denial of what is already understood underlies the apparent obtuse failure to comprehend, to act, or to even answer an argument from an MRM view with anything but lying accusation and abuse brings one quite easily to hatred.

And that, my friends, is the trap. The hatred of women we are so frequently accused of by the bad actors, the collaborating male-feminists, the lying, and privileged ideologues; that hatred is the trap we are meant to fall into. Because justified as any human is to resent a climate of relentless, puerile vilification and belittling lies, if we allow ourselves to fall into this trap, we vindicate the very liars who have heaped injury and insult on the entire male sex for decades. The sneering retort to any argument "you're just bitter" or "you just hate women" will have been made forcibly true.

So what is the answer? To be servile, or saintly, or endlessly tolerant and forgiving of permanent hatred and injury?

No, definitely not. In the collective silence, conformity, and bobble-headed agreement with our culture's debasement of masculine identity there is culpable complicity to the undeclared war on men. This complicity bridges not just feminists, and not just the vast majority of "normal" women, but also most men who out of denial and fear of censure go-along with every bit of male-marginalizing double standard that is heaped on them.

The rage is present in these collaborators too, but buried behind the contradictory delusion that a "good man" is equivalent to a male accommodating of every childish female caprice. Denied and obscured behind a wholly self-inconsistent and externally sourced male identity. This anger denied behind pretence is most dangerous, because it goes unaddressed. But for cognizant men, there remains the problem of the trap of anger. The hazard that through prolonged abuse and censure – we render ourselves politically impotent by conformity to our enemies lies about us.

There is another reason to consider in treading carefully over the boggy ground of this understandable hatred. If indulged, it diminishes the quality of your own life. It is a poison, one which however much you may direct it outward onto your philosophical opponents – also poisons yourself. At this point, it might appear that I am offering a saccharine, Pollyanna view akin to the tone-trolling and concern trolling presented by bad actors in the comments threads of so many MRA forums. My focus, however is not on presenting an agreeable face.

[quote float="right"]The urge to fisk the minutia of ideologues can be a trap.[/quote] To indulge in hate is to afford the object of that hate control over oneself. On recognition of this, it ceases to be a question of how to avoid falling into a self consuming cycle of hatred and anger, and simply a choice of effective thought and action, versus infective indulgence. I refuse to allow those in opposition to self actualized masculine identity to divide me away from joy, or love, or enjoyment of any area of my life. This would be the outcome of indulgence in hatred – a path I've observed in a relative after his brutalization by the family court system of a feminized society. He is effectively crippled by his rage. It owns him. There's the land-mine. Don't step on it.

As suggested earlier, I don't endorse or practice a philosophy of tolerance to hatred or even disavowal of anger. The line is drawn at affording control over any aspect of my point of view. Hatred of ideological bigots, or of women, provoked and cultivated is a technique of control and manipulation.

Conversely, without trying to, and simply by persistence as an MRA – I have earned the scorn and hatred of a small segment of the active radical feminist world who have read my writing. The control some feminists afford me by their hate is gratifying, but is also a distraction.

Recently, a protein-deprived male apologist for male vilifying gender ideology posted a collection of characteristic and insubstantial personal attacks against AVFM's Paul Elam. Like most other such feminist quacking – the purpose wasn't to make a critical rebuttal of any particular argument. It was simply to provoke and insult. It wasn't a particularly effective example – as the quisling in question was punching above his weight, but it was sufficient to illustrate a point.

It is futile to attempt honest discourse with the adherents of a dogma built on transparent lies and class hatred. However, we're all susceptible to being drawn into these supposed arguments – but the purpose of so much oppositional rhetoric isn't to convey a point, it's to belittle and dehumanize the members of the not-preferred sexual demographic. That's you. The urge to fisk the minutia of ideologues can be a trap wearing down anyone with the stamina and the will to try drinking from the fire-hose of male vilifying lies. These lies are easier to fabricate and recycle than they are to debunk – so shovelling the produce is best approached (in my opinion) as an exercise to illuminate the character of an argument based on hatred of an entire segment of humanity based on their sex.

Detachment from concern for the opinion of members of the preferred sexual demographic sidesteps the tendency that being relentlessly heaped with hatred and abuse from fostering a disposition to consuming anger. Its also with great pleasure that having clearly identified the human plankton following a dogma of violence and hatred – I can cheerfully and belligerently lend my attention to the political goals of these ideologues – and without hatred or violence, to persistently fuck their shit up.

Fugitive from the feminist chain-gang

Dr. F (Ian Williams) · 7 September 2011 · Archived copy · Original

[dropcap]M[/dropcap]y upbringing was pretty uneventful in that I grew up in a financially and emotionally stable environment. I say this easily as my parents have always been tight yet never dependent together, and while I never wanted for anything I looked and found solace in a crowded dump of a place when I moved out of home at age twenty one.

Like many people, before twenty five or thereabouts, I felt an ache to express myself through a tunnel vision of extreme political leanings. I chose the left of left because all the other folk with any opinion were simply deluded, and if only I could have sat the whole world down and explained how wrong everyone was then it could have been all so good.

In this first home away from home I recall endless nights coalescing into dawns that blurred into long shadows the next day through a haze of Thai Buddha and Queensland forest THC. The bong gurgled without remiss like a forgotten percolator and the sex was a pastiche of colors I'd never seen before. I'd wake up stoned and bonk the girl next to me and then bonk another later that night. Pretty soon I worked out that the way to get all this bonking done was to listen to the feminist droning of the future bonkee.

[quote style="boxed" float="right"]I left when one of the girls there stuck a box cutter to my throat and in a very quiet voice suggested to me that I back away from her "friend." [/quote] I lived in a shared terrace house of six young people paying rent with a forever floating pool of four or more partying and smoking it up and maybe we got sex and definitely we got feminists. There we all were in a great big house full of serious people trading "love" for sex if you were a bloke and sex for "love" if you were a girl. It took me many years later to realize that the currency of all this required a stupidity within a plodding bubble of thought whose branches touched less than ten minutes ahead of the clock.

We were all taking ourselves tremendously seriously and none of us took seriously what any of us ever did.

There I was with hormones raging; more stamina and insight, and right before me was any number of lovely young girls aching to express themselves through the most important social cause of them all. Quite frankly I was always a goner. Ok, they were on a mission, and if I believed it, I mean if I really believed it then we could talk about it and I'd have sex. You want to talk about feminism, ok let's gawk… I mean talk.

Do you think I was going to get anywhere if I let her know her beliefs stunk? I might have if I had thought about feminism for two minutes or if there were other young women there thinking differently. But I don't recall this. I can say this assuredly as I would have remembered the communal screeching, and she would have been frozen out the door.

Also, as everyone was a feminist I didn't need to think about existing differently. I have thought about this over the years and quite frankly I find this negligence more disturbing as time goes by.

In the beginning I knew nothing of feminism, not really, but then I studied it. I learned about the plight of rape victims and how Blue Stocking day was pretty brave and "leftish." Someone mentioned "The Female Eunuch," and I read the entire book in a cafe over a couple of days while buggered on Ecstasy.

My goodness it was terrific to be alive.

There I was, upgrading myself as a feminist foot soldier. I was hopped up on an alphabet of pharmaceuticals and turning those pages over one by one with a display of mechanical aptitude that would have the mannequins of the Prague town hall clock blush with envy.

When I finished it at three in the morning I knocked on the window of the girl that loaned me the book and I sobbed in her arms. Great big tears of manly shame just bled down my face as she told me I was different and special. I felt even more shame when I pressed my face deep in the softness of her wonderful bosoms.

Then I wondered why she was permitting me to be there while the terrible and grubby thoughts swirled in my head like piranhas in a whirlpool. Surely she could see my thoughts just as all feminists know how the duller and baser enemy thinks? She was truly forgiving to let me be there at all. Later that morning I was further blessed as she let us both frolic on her bed beneath the crisp satin sheets of her final judging. I knew she was by proxy the speaker of a huddle of feminists within a star chamber somewhere and the verdict was in that I was pure enough to be touched and could touch a little.

You might think here that I've made my point about a misspent youth with my personal tale of silly thinking and doing. I wish that you were right, but you're not even close. It gets worse, much worse.

My second year away from home had me living in a quite amazingly lovely house, a mansion, in fact, whose previous occupants were emissaries of the Finnish government. The place was an architectural wonder of a dozen rooms, four fireplaces, several bathrooms and two kitchens. It's no wonder it was the embassy for a country, and all of it set in the middle of an entire block of the intoxicating and primitive Australian native flora I love.

It was a godsend. I was sharing this incredible place with eleven other occupants and we all paid a ridiculous pittance for rent. My great big room in a great big house surrounded by a small forest and living with all these people I didn't know at all made me drunk. Life was getting better and to cap it off every single one of my house mates was female.

Some were gay and some were not and I accepted the fact that all of the toilet seats were glued down. I scuttled about in the shadows when the girls got loud and deep in the common rooms, and learned that to be one of the chain-gang I would have to hand out fliers every now and then and attend meetings on campuses. No need to tell you here what all of this was about, I'm sure you get it.

A few months later I left when one of the girls there stuck a box cutter to my throat and in a very quiet voice suggested to me that I back away from her "friend." I never knew who her friend was but I sure knew what an exit sign was and used it there only one time the next morning.

Just before I left that gorgeous house something happened that I'll not forget, and it was this incident that had me questioning for the first time my gathered disgust of my very own gender.

I attended a rally of feminists outside a beauty pageant and was holding a sign I made bearing the words "Miss World is Mutilation." That night I was safe and happy, scared and angry all at the same time. This was a strange combination of things, but then again so is a pressed cane-toad skin wrapped bolus of white powders, hash and prescription drugs the size of a golf ball.

Before I knew it I was really one of the chain-gang that night. Anyone that entered that municipal building that hosted that oppressive pageant was flayed alive by a great pond of loud chanting and imaginative phrasing that would have the sternest dock worker reaching for a pad and Biro. It all seemed to be going swimmingly with the belligerent group of twenty or so, and then someone lit a fire on the lawn there. In a few minutes a fire engine appeared and a long hose was unrolled in order to attend to it but the nozzle of it never made it.

The feminists in unison broke away from where they were and ran to the hose and stood on it. The fire, no bigger than a small bonfire, burnt merrily as the firemen stood about scratching their heads. There was nothing they could do as they looked upon the limp hose as it lay flattened on the grass with dozens of angry feet on it. Two of those feet were mine and what happened next I will never forget.

The chant became very loud and it was a new chant altogether. Now it was, "Cut it off… Cut it off… Cut it off."

[image]So here I was, a feminist with a penis holding a placard that said, "Miss World is Mutilation," and at the same time I was deafened with the inference and endorsement of violence and barbarism through an enforced surgical procedure. The idea quite simply was to "Cut it off," and it was at this exact moment that I felt deeply betrayed and used and the darkness of the irony of it all was in the wording of the sign I held. I let that sign fall to the ground and I walked to my car and drove away from that nasty circus forever.

It was a number of years later that I became an MRA The telling of that might well be pretty dull and it's not relevant anyway. What's important to me is not so much a climbing awareness of what I now know absolutely, nor is it the demise of what I once was absolutely.

What holds my interest in what I've told you just now is the fact that I was so much like that then and I am so much not like that now. In other words if I changed from an unpleasant micro eared macro mouthed sycophant with a tang of narcissism then there really is hope for almost all of us.

Yes we're all different and there will be those that will never break from their hermetically sealed vacuole of dissonance. You know them and I know them. But then again, do we really?

Who are the ones like I once was who might, just might, be able to listen to themselves if only for a moment? I think this is not only hard to answer but it's also a mere membrane away from impossible to answer. It's very possible that there are many more feminists out there who could make great MRA's one day. This is not Pollyannaism. It's rational affirmation. If you don't believe me just have a think about some of the things I've written about here in this article. Ironically, my personal history makes me a better men's rights activist.

Maybe a trick, or strategy for the inclined is to watch carefully those we care about who are this way and ask them the right questions? Perhaps for others it might be to present at the right moment a paradox of reasoning that brings about a discomfort, or discord in their thinking. Who can say what the precise answer is? It's not me, and I'm clean and sober of feminism now so if I don't know now, I never will.

What I can tell you though with the sobriety and clarity of sea air, is that once I was a member of a feminist chain-gang and now I am forever a fugitive. So very completely and joyously free.

A special announcement from the news editor

Robert O'Hara · 8 September 2011 · Archived copy · Original

[box icon="none"]

A Voice For Men is striving to be a reliable and useful news source for anybody interested in issues facing men, fathers and boys. Pursuant to that end we would like to encourage all readers to submit ideas, suggestions and leads to news stories you feel need attention. Also, as the news editor, I would like to recruit people interested in posting as reporters for our service by combing the internet for content as well as covering subjects and stories in their respective localities all over the world.

With a growing number of readers I know that our audience is lumpy with talent. I would like to tap into this talent and use it to make AVFM not only a credible news source for men, but also a respected and cited source for information and news in the broadest sense. There is no reason why this can not be accomplished.

I would like to see coming into my email inbox stories that readers are interested in as well as press releases from fathers and men's rights organizations worldwide for comment and publication here. I would also like to encourage anybody interested in doing journalism work through research and interviews here as contributors having the title of "Reporter" for AVFM.

The idea is to make the work load light enough for everybody while providing a high quality news service that even those outside of the MRM can take seriously.

Of course there will be rules for posting as a Reporter as opposed to a Contributor posting a commentary. We must have journalistic standards in order to be credible. Citing sources, quoting those sources and brevity as well as reliability will be the focus of any Reporter. This could be something that an individual could do just a couple of hours a week and if they put down their pen for a timer that is ok; they will always be welcome as long as they follow the rules.

For anyone interested in submitting articles as a reporter or just as someone who wants to point out a good scoop just email Robert O'Hara at: vfm_news@yahoo.com

[/box]

Register-her.com hitting the mark

Paul Elam · 8 September 2011 · Archived copy · Original

[dropcap]I[/dropcap]t is time, past time actually, to give you good people an update on register-her.com. And the news is that the site is already exceeding expectations for early performance.

The new web portal, while still awaiting some minor aesthetic changes, is fully functional. Users may now go to the site, enter information on a known false accuser, or other female criminal, add a photo and an information source and submit it for approval.

Our press release is finished and will be going out on Tuesday, provided there is no media consuming event in progress. That should help with promoting the site, especially if some robust news outlet does a story on it. Knock on wood, folks.

On the other front, the actual promise of the website is already being realized. It was our intent from the beginning that we would create a service for falsely accused men, allowing them to target their accusers for public exposure. With that being the primary goal, consider the following:

A google search on Andrea Davio-Michaud, who was placed on the registry for a false accusation of rape, returned her listing at the very top of search results. The same is true for Liselle Ellis, false rape accuser. The pattern repeats itself as many of the women listed on the registry come in at or near the top of search results with their listing at register-her.com. The way Google displays the results is very appealing as well.

[image]

There seems to be only two factors that prevent anyone listed on this registry from coming in at the top of returns. The first is in cases where the offender happens to have a very common name, or a name that is also the same as that of a public figure with a strong internet presence.

The other case is when the offender herself already had a strong showing on the internet, either from heightened media coverage of her criminality, which also serves us well, or because they had a strong internet presence for other reasons.

Jessica Valenti is such a case. The return on her thus far is buried on page 3 of returns. But that will change with time. The site is already in growth mode. While we are still an emergent site, we have gained over 500,000 slots on Alexa since launching. As we market the site and acquire backlinks from more websites, even those on the registry still enjoying some distance from our listing will have that play out on them, Jessica Valenti included.

[image]
So live with it.
Not that she is what really matters here. The important thing is that now, any woman making a false allegation is subject to have her misdeed follow her for the rest of her life. Any prospective employer, or anyone else that invests in Googling her name, will find her listing and undeniable proof of the kind of person she really is. And in an increasingly web savvy world, this will be the rule much more than the exception.

My prediction is that within 6 months to a year we will have our first litigation, maybe sooner, which is why I have secured an agreement for services with the Randazza Legal Group, a firm that specializes in First Amendment issues and internet law. The attorney I made contact with there is very supportive of the MRM.

We are going to go ahead with this full steam, damn the torpedos, and bring to bear the considerable expertise in making these things happen that AVfM is beginning to amass in earnest. It is one of many FTSU efforts we are going to undertake, but I am particularly proud of this one.

The legal system does exactly squat about false allegations. Worse, it enables them with neglect and depraved indifference. With time, some hard work and a smidgeon of luck, the day will come that register-her.com become a known entity in the world of finger pointing liars. It won't stop all of them, but it will stop some, and it will punish those too stupid or emotionally labile to consider the gravity of their actions.

If they make the mistake of getting caught, it won't be swept under the rug or fade into the past the way it always has before. If they tell that lie, they better fucking pray their parents had the good sense to name them Mother Theresa.

I was “raped”

Alex · 8 September 2011 · Archived copy · Original

[dropcap]T[/dropcap]eenage years tend to be turbulent ones. This has been true for me, anyway; though, to be completely honest, I have little to compare them to for reference. The past six months were especially dramatic for me, which resulted in my own “sexual renaissance,” during which time the last pieces of the puzzle that is the mysterious ways of women fell into ironically neat place.

For several years now, my father has diligently educated me in what he perceived to be the workings of the female mind, and the best strategies for Gaming it, and avoiding getting screwed by it. I listened, taking what he said always with a grain of salt, tentatively practiced, and considered the results. For some time I sat on the fence, with traditional interpretations of women on one side, and the newer, apparently radical ideas on the other, undecided.

[box type=”note” icon=”none”]It’s hard to wake up, to relinquish the world as you want it to be, and to see it as it really is. The turning point, which quite abruptly knocked me off the fence, was the night I was “raped.”[/box]

As I said before, the last six months prior to this event had been unpleasant. I went through a nasty break up with my girlfriend of ten months (a long time for high school), was promptly rejected by my dream girl (for whom I dumped my then-girlfriend), totaled my vehicle in an accident that should have killed me, consequently lost my license, and then failed to make the cut for a national athletic competition I had been striving for all year. The spring of my junior year was, in other words, a complete catastrophe.

I was an emotional wreck. I had, however, learned valuable lessons about self-worth, responsibility, and life perspective. I decided to continue this trend of emotional growth by laying low for the summer – no stupid stunts, no people-pleasing, and, most importantly, no fooling around with girls. I was deeply hurt, and I appreciated that true convalescence needed time and a great deal of focused energy.

Over summer vacation I had much time to reflect, forgive, and heal. The process was working slowly, but steadily, and by late August things were looking good. I had avoided vice for months; my abstemious lifestyle blocked any new dramas from entering my small, isolated world, and I felt almost ready to reemerge and rebuild.

One of the most essential parts to this process was avoiding particular friends, friends who would inevitably tempt me back towards destructive behaviors. My chief concern was a girl whom I’ll call Katie. I had watched her change drastically lately from a sheltered, innocent, Christian girl into a wild, hedonistic libertine; says something about repressed sexuality, huh?

Katie was older than I, but had started to push the limits after I did, and I could tell that she was starting to adopt the same destructive behavior I had once exhibited. She was cute, rebellious, and easy prey, but I just didn’t have the stomach for it. Interestingly enough, she had been my best friend’s girlfriend, my girlfriend’s best friend, and an object of great, unrequited desire of another close friend, so I had unconsciously dubbed her “off-limits.” That didn’t stop her. She had passively pursued me for months, and the only reason I hadn’t prepared my defenses was because I didn’t want to believe it.

[image]I was still in denial when I finally – foolishly – agreed to see Katie before she left for college in L.A.. She picked me up at around 8:00, promptly handed over the reins by asking of me a plan, and we drove off. Then she showed me the vodka. Ah, spirits, my great weakness. Katie had it in a massive, purple Nalgene bottle. It was too dark for me to read the measurements, but it was obviously a shit-ton of vodka. I crumbled, and agreed to drink with her. We stopped at a Dunkin Donuts for coffee to mix it with (poor judgment is a slippery slope), and proceeded to trespass to find a secluded spot to get hammered, undisturbed.

Because I was bigger than she, and renowned for a high alcohol tolerance, she insisted that I take the lion’s share of the vodka, and I foolishly complied. Before long I was taking enormous mouth-full-sized gulps from the Nalgene.

And not long after that I was too pissed to walk straight. We lay down together, with my arm around her, to contemplate the stars, while the vodka circulating my veins battled with the remnants of my inhibitions. Funnily enough, we were interrupted by another group of teens who had come to the very same spot to mess around, and Katie suggested that we take a walk. A red flag shot up in my head.

Predictably, not long after the others were out of sight, we were rolling around on the grass, topless. I was just going along for the ride. I wasn't even aroused, and she could tell. The last vestiges of reservation rallied in my frontal lobes, and I told her that I wouldn't have sex with her, and not long after that she drove me home.

It's impossible to conceal how drunk you are to your parents when you are literally staggering, and I was instantly discovered and grounded, the conditions of which included being forbidden to see Katie. She was off to college, anyway. The next morning I woke up with a slight hangover, regretful that I had shattered my spotless summer of abstinence with one night of poor decisions.

So what's the significance of this rather dull (dull as far as drunken hook-ups go) misadventure? Have I drawn you in and mislead you with an inaccurate title? The funny thing is I didn't: According to Massachusetts law, one prerequisite for rape is unwanted penetration of any orifice by any object. This would include, for example, Katie sticking her tongue in my mouth, which she did.

I came to a horrible realization. I thought to myself, what if the roles were reversed! What if I had picked Katie up at her house, and then liquored her up so I could stick my tongue in her mouth, only to have her regret her decisions the next day? All she would have to do is cry rape, call the police, and my life would be ruined; forget the misery I had known in the last six months; my suffering would be dwarfed by that of a wrongly convicted rapist.

What's worse, as a man, not only do I accept responsibility for my actions, and would never even consider accusing Katie under such circumstances, but even if I did report it, the police would undoubtedly laugh in my face, and proceed to arrest me for underage drinking and trespassing. I shuddered. The issue of false rape accusations is very real to me now, after having been "raped" myself…

[box icon="none"]Note: In no way am I satirizing or belittling the very serious issue of rape. It's a terrible, vicious crime, and my heart goes out to all victims of both sexes. False accusations, however, are also terrible and vicious, and the issue needs to be addressed, as they are becoming an increasingly common phenomenon in modern Western societies.[/box]

Talk show seeks the falsely accused

Paul Elam · 9 September 2011 · Archived copy · Original

[box type="note" icon="none"]

[This email came at an auspicious time. In the middle of our official launch of register-her.com, AVfM was contacted by the producer of this television program. It has been forwarded to our friends at the False Rape Society. My impression after email exchanges is that Mr. Goldman is serious about addressing this subject honestly. For those willing, an email of thanks would be appreciated, and if course, if you ever wanted to get your story out there…]

Name: Rich Goldman

Email: rgoldman@billcunninghamshow.com

Message: Hi – I am a Producer on a new national TV talk show called The Bill Cunningham Show. We are a daily daytime talk show that deals with controversial topics and conflict resolution. In a week or two I am producing an episode on the topic of being falsely accused – of molestation, abuse, harassment, etc. I'm wondering if you could put me in touch with anyone who either was falsely accused, or was the false accuser, and might be willing to share his/her story on our show.

Thank you,

Rich Goldman
Sr. Producer

Office: 212-419-7485
Cell: 646-701-3860
Cell: 855-833-7770, ext. 2
Fax: 212-419-7406

Email: Rgoldman@BillCunninghamShow.com

Address:
NEP Studios
401 7th avenue
2nd floor

[/box]

The practice of rhetorical discipline

Luigi Logan (aka Fidelbogen) · 9 September 2011 · Archived copy · Original

[dropcap]R[/dropcap]hetoric is the art of persuasion. And since persuasion is a matter of prime importance, rhetoric must on no account be neglected, but rather subjected to the requirements of a discipline. We are engaged in a contest for hearts and minds, a serious business which oughtn't be left to the hazards of a random crapshoot. The way we go about saying, or not saying, what we choose to say, or not say, will either float us or sink us.

In the present talk I purposely exclude the topic of fallacious argument.That topic has been worked over by so many writers already that I feel I can be of greater service if I limit myself to fields not so thoroughly plowed.

Very well. The sum of rhetorical discipline may be condensed into a single short phrase: minimize grappling points. What follows will be a gloss upon this precept.

A grappling point is anything in the form or content of your communication that gives your enemy an edge, an angle, or an opening. You might say that a grappling point gives your enemy a handhold so he can swing you around, or a foothold so he can climb over you. This sets you in a position of weakness or passivity, and negates you as an obstacle, so that your enemy advances in a tactical or strategic way.

The opponents of feminism are famous for speaking their minds "not wisely but too well." In this way they offer grappling points to their enemy and make their own work needlessly difficult. Their ineptitude may be arrayed under a four-fold heading.

[image]Firstly, that they will say indiscreet things which are bound to excite the wrong kind of controversy at the wrong moment. In this, they fail to establish politics by being politic.

Secondly, that they will use an unseemly or undignified tone. In this, they fail to establish tonal mastery.

Thirdly, that they will neglect to uphold a consistent narrative of non-feminist sovereignty that would cast the opposition in the role of an aggressor power. In this, they fail to establish the necessary political frame.

Fourthly, that they lack political focus, meaning that they neglectstructural unity of message. They speak heterogenously on a ragbag of topics with little thought to the strategic implications of what they choose to talk about, and why, and when. In this, they fail to establish message discipline. Consequently, they waste time and energy and bog down the movement.

Under all of these headings, the failure in question may be understood as a failure to minimize grappling points. I will now enlarge upon each case in turn.

In the first case, the impolitic non-feminist behaves as a "loose cannon-mouth" and makes impeachable utterances. An impeachable utterance may be defined as any saying which at least arguablytransgresses the norms of morality or decency. I say arguably, because evaluative criteria and subtext will differ from one social group to the next. Different groups argue things differently, and to different conclusions.

And so, a statement that would give a feminist a conniption might produce nary a ripple amongst the great middle mass of non-feminist men and women. Any utterance which is arguably impeachable is at leastarguably a grappling point, but if the "argument" is unpersuasive to most people, then it will gain no political traction outside the feminist cultural space. And so it makes a weak grappling point: the worst the feminists can do is dangle you in front of other feminists and cluck about what a horrid specimen you are — but nobody else will give a rip! This bottles up the feminists within their communal psychology and isolates them from the rest of the world. Such an effect, for our purpose, is desirable.

But if you say something universally impeachable, something that would disturb nearly anybody, it makes a strong grappling point: the feminists can use it for political traction in the larger world. It does not bottle them up in their group psychology; it empowers them to "reach out and touch someone" other than themselves. Such an effect, for our purpose, is undesirable.

So don't be a loose cannon-mouth. You should frame your communication in a way that offers no universal grappling points — alternately stated, a non-objectionable surface. We call this the common gaze standardbecause it plays to the psychic consensus of the great middle mass.

One point remains to be considered. You might ask: "How if I discipline my rhetoric to where even the feminists can find nothing impeachable about it? Is it worth my trouble to attempt this?" And I would reply:possibly. It depends how hard you want to work, so it is for you to weigh the advantage or disadvantage in a given case.

To highlight just the advantage, note that mastery in this field could be a method of psychological warfare. A universally non-objectionable surface would leave the luckless feminist with almost nothing to use against youeven in her own mind. That would cut off retreat into communal psychology; each feminist would stand alone as a solitary individual, if you will, before the judgment seat. For many of them, any desperate escape would be preferable to such a desperate hell, and in many cases criminal behavior, driven by rationalization, seems a likely outcome. But until the feminists are ready to "come clean", I would spare them no empathy. Empathy is for your friends.

I turn now to the second case, which addresses the commonly-seen failure to establish tonal mastery. An unseemly or undignified tone does not, in itself, entail either fallacious argument or impeachable utterance of any kind — although it might occur in tandem with these. But I call it a grappling point because, in the ad hominem rough-and-tumble of real-world polemic, contestants will frankly use it against you in that way. And which is more, they will do so to pragmatic effect — a point which bears consideration.

A further consideration is, that the way you say things often weighs a lot more than what you say. A discourse of considerable audacity may, if couched in a dry, nonchalant diction, pass altogether unremarked by the great middle mass — and even by quite a few feminists. What many people find objectionable in a given speaker or writer might be nothing more than, for example, that he sounds angry and disagreeable — and it's a turn-off! So, by the right combination of knowing what the target audience will bear hearing, and intoning this suitably, you can make great headway and speak your mind speak your more boldly and candidly than you might think.

There is, of course, an art of sounding angry. It can be done. However, you need to maintain "artistic control" and to apply the right effect knowingly, bending or breaking the rules in a calculated way with the proper sense of timing. Such is tonal mastery. But you are wiser to follow the rules until confident of breaking them masterfully.

[box type="alert" icon="none"]counterfem.blogspot.com/2010/06/amanda-marcotte-says-that-you-want-to.html[/box]

Whining is another unseemly and undignified tone. Indeed, it is arguably the worst of the lot, and ought to be eschewed. Whining may best be described as complaint for its own sake, accompanied by a keening vocal affect with a descending pitch. And although vocal affect is not present in writing, it is possible to achieve a written whine — perceived as such by others — if you do little else than complain endlessly.

In order that you will not seem to be whining — in either speech or writing — you should forbear to make emotionally-fraught inventories of self-evident things. Thus, you ought simply to recite the bare facts in their bare factuality, and let that bare factuality paint the required picture by virtue of its intrinsic poignancy. This is akin to the advice given to writers, to "show but don't tell." Facts are weighty witnesses that will testify with overwhelming precision if you let them. A bare factual narrative packs the needful cargo on its own account, and needn't be lumbered with pathos.

[image]I should add, that feminists love to accuse their enemies of whining. I mean, they are keen to use that indictment for a grappling point in order to make mileage by mockery. But when you stop whining, they should start worrying, for it hints that you have gone to the next level of insurgency in your thoughts, and are incubating serious plans.

The subject of women often crops up in conjunction with both anger and whining, and when it does, the talk morphs into what some might loosely call “misogyny”. This is not strictly a matter of tone, but rather topic. Still, it is important to note the connection between women as a focus of discussion, and the emotion that goes in step with this. I say it is important, because the ramifications are politically consequential and relate to our study of grappling points.

I turn now to the third case, that of neglecting to frame the political narrative in terms of non-feminist sovereignty. Such neglect has rhetorical consequences, for it sets you eternally on the defensive with any feminist you meet and continually reinforces the feminist construct. You might call it a grappling point a priori.

The feminist war, at its heart, is a war of sovereignties. A certain cultural paradigm (feminism) has gone into a colonizing modality, intending to nullify the sovereignty of any other paradigm that gets in its way. And make no mistake, they ALL get in feminism’s way.

And so the greatest non-feminist weapon we have, is our knowledge of non-feminist sovereignty — no, the certainty of it! In good truth, we are the bulk of the universe. And the laws and principles of that realm work to our advantage more so than otherwise. Yes, the natural order has got our back, and we should so fully internalize this conviction that it will inform every act, every mood, and every gesture that we make. For the feminist colonization of our lives has been a massive aggression built on nothing better than sheer presumption. We ought to know this by now, and we ought to act like we know it.

We should take a page from Marx, and ruthlessly challenge everything about them and their world. And in the spirit of the Frankfurt playbook, we should develop our own edition of “critical theory”, and put it to work right away. Remember that “the theory is to criticize” — and true to that spirit, everything they presume to say or presume to know, is fair game. When they say “patriarchy”, or “misogyny”, or “sexism”, or “wage gap”, or “glass ceiling”, we bounce back instantly with “WHAT patriarchy? WHAT misogyny? WHAT sexism? WHAT wage gap? WHAT glass ceiling?” Yes, undermine them. Deconstruct their categories and presuppositions non-stop. Be skeptical. Be agnostical. Demand explanations. Never let up for one instant — never let them clear the runway! Feminism is not the world, which means among other things that feminism is not theintellectual world. Accordingly, they shall export none of their intellectual merchandise into our world without paying a good stiff tariff — and if we don’t want it in our world, we ship it back in toto.

And if we are scanning the horizon of political events, either current or historic, we shall impose the frame of non-feminist sovereignty upon discoverable feminist actions, and so classify all such actions as to their degree of aggression against us.

To summarize: we must frame our political thinking (hence our talking) in terms of feminist aggression against the rest of the world, and in terms of thwarting such aggression. This, by virtue of reiteration and practice, will grow into a disciplined rhetorical instinct.

I turn now to the fourth case, that in which political focus — orstructural unity of message — is neglected. Proper attention to this point may be understood as a discipline, and for that reason we call it message discipline. This term is established lingo among people who talk about electoral politics, but we make it part of rhetorical discipline because it falls within the gamut of operations that will minimize grappling points. Message discipline, you might say, puts rhetorical discipline on a collective basis.

[image]The rhetorical consequence of neglecting message discipline is that grappling points will multiply in an uncontrolled manner. So it is important to keep a strong hand on the message that we transmit to the general population. Politically speaking, our “message” takes the form of issues and talking points, and in practice this has been an unorganized babble. Many people are talking about many things, and what we palaver about most overall, enters the common awareness, for better or worse, as a composite average of what we ARE.

Now, if there is a “true” or “central” message that we ought to be transmitting, then I reckon it should be one that is politically efficient in terms of a goal. And what is our goal? It is to damage feminism as much as possible by spreading information efficient to that purpose. Such, in bottom-line terms, is how we parse our doings: all of it boils down to some form of information trafficking. But we must always have a care about efficiency, because some information works more efficiently than other information in the work of damaging feminism. So remember that our message is part of our public image, and that public image is nothing if not trafficked information. Therefore we must ask if our public image, as related to our message, is efficient to the purpose of damaging feminism.

In addition to compromising our public image, neglected message discipline pulls us into all manner of conversations which are better avoided. For any time you voice an opinion, there is a chance you’ll be requested to defend it. And in politics, the more opinions you voice the more battles you must fight. Yes, the more you bite off, the more you must chew — one sees that is logical! Therefore we need not, and should not, take a stand on every issue under the sun. This generates grappling points because it permits the other side to hoist and haul us around by putting us on the defensive. So the watchword is “pick your battles”. Any other policy creates a war on more than one front — the larger counterpart of being flanked on a battlefield.

In the end, message discipline means optimally efficient information trafficking in the service of a political goal. So if we compromise our public image by association with flakey or shady things, that is not optimally efficient. If we load the table with issues not relevant to damaging feminism, that is not optimally efficient. If we load the table with issues only weakly relevant to damaging feminism, that is not optimally efficient. If we let people of a certain political leaning siphon us into talking about “loaded” topics that needn’t be addressed at all — for example, race or LGBT issues — that is not optimally efficient. On it goes. All of these are areas where message discipline might get compromised, and as such, they generate grappling points. So rhetorical discipline commands our diligence in these areas.

There are exceptions. For example, were I to opine that the song of the mountain thrush has a more ethereal quality than the song of the lowland thrush, it would not compromise message discipline. That is because the subject of birdwatching is apolitical and mysterious. Also, it could add a whimsical note to an otherwise boring dissertation. So feel free to add those kinds of touches.

Very well. The four parts of rhetorical discipline, which I have introduced here, can be itemized briefly in the following nomenclature. I would suggest memorizing these for quick conversational reference:

[unordered_list style=”green-dot”]

- Discreet Utterance
- Tonal Mastery
- Narrative Frame
- Message Discipline

[/unordered_list]

The remaining question, it seems to me, is the timeless one of how to herd cats. For it is impossible to run a control wire to every loose cannon-mouth in the sector. People will say what they will say even if it is politically ill-advised, and there is little we can do about this in the short run. So the best plan is to form a central column of rhetorically disciplined preachers who may gradually propagate their coherently schooled sensibility.These preachers may school others by example and in time generate a master signal and a focal point around which the chaotic clouds of impeachable or otherwise inefficient utterance will swirl.

S.A.V.E. blasts Tyler Sheilds' "Love is forever (sorry)" expo.

Robert O'Hara · 10 September 2011 · Archived copy · Original

[box]

Late last night, September 8th, Stop Abusive and Violent Environments issued a press release heavily criticizing photographer Tyler Shields' latest work entitled "Love is forever (sorry)" posted on his website tylershields.com. earlier that day. Captions to his photos read: "You can't run and you can't hide Love will always find you when you least expect it…" And "Love is chaotic it doesn't make any sense and if its not done right it can kill you… Ever been in love?" Featured photos include actress Heather Morris and another male modal engaging in domestic violence.

[image]

In their press release S.A.V.E. stated:

"A black-eyed Morris, dressed as Barbie, stares seductively into the camera, and later merrily presses a hot iron to her partner's crotch. The photo depicts a getting-what-he-deserves storyline that reinforces serious misconceptions about domestic violence. Men are stereotyped as abusers, and Barbie supposedly strikes a blow for victims everywhere."

And again:

"Predictably, reactions to the photos have focused only on the abuse to Barbie: her assault of Ken has been ignored, even though it is the more serious crime. Rita Smith, director of the National Coalition Against Domestic Violence (NCADV), spoke to E! news about the photos, but it was as if she had seen a different set of photos.

Still worse, nothing has been said about the photographer's donation to an advocacy group that disregards male victims of domestic violence and portrays men as serial abusers: after the negative public reaction to the shoot, Tyler Shields told the Daily Mail that he would auction off his photos and donate the proceeds to Glamour magazine's Tell Somebody campaign. The Tell Somebody campaign, like almost all programs, focuses exclusively on violence perpetrated against women—that is, on only half the picture."

The photos are somewhat smutty in their nature and some would argue that the artist is trying to titillate a sadomasochistic response in the viewer. Certainly this is an artists prerogative. However, S.A.V.E. goes on to criticize that Shields chooses as his beneficiaries should include advocates of male victims as well. S.A.V.E also is critical of the stereotypical nature of the material in that it poses only males as the perpetrator. One could also argue that the sexual glamorization of domestic violence for profit does not promote understanding the problem and actually trivializes it.

When invited by AVFM News to comment on this criticism of his work via the contact email address on his website we received the following reply:

"I am the model in the photos and my crotch is fine because she was not really trying to hurt me…"

[/box]

Psychology and the Misandry of Feminism

Walter Romans (TDOM) · 10 September 2011 · Archived copy · Original

[dropcap]T[/dropcap]he Sadistic Personality Disorder was officially recognized as a psychiatric diagnosis in the Diagnostic and Statistical Manual of Mental Disorders, Third Edition, Revised (DSM-IIIR). It was described as:

[quote]a pervasive pattern of cruel, demeaning, and aggressive behavior, beginning by early adulthood, as indicated by the repeated occurrence of at least four of the following:[/quote]

[unordered_list style="green-dot"]

- has used physical cruelty or violence for the purpose of establishing dominance in a relationship (not merely to achieve some noninterpersonal goal, such as striking someone in order to rob him or her);
- humiliates or demeans people in the presence of others;
- has treated or disciplined someone under his or her control unusually harshly, e.g., a child, student, prisoner, or patient;
- is amused by, or takes pleasure in, the psychological or physical suffering of others (including animals);
- has lied for the purpose of harming or inflicting pain on others (not merely to achieve some other goal);
- gets other people to do what he or she wants by frightening them (through intimidation or even terror);
- restricts the autonomy of people with whom he or she has a close relationship, e.g., will not let spouse leave the house unaccompanied or permit teen-age daughter to attend social functions;
- is fascinated by violence, weapons, martial arts, injury, or torture.

[/unordered_list]

The behavior has not been directed toward only one person (e.g., spouse, one child) and has not been solely for the purpose of sexual arousal (as in Sexual Sadism)" (p. 371).

However, this disorder was removed as a diagnosis from the DSM-IV. According to Robert Spitzer, author of the Treatment Companion to the DSM-IV-TR Casebook:

[quote]Certain feminist groups were concerned that inclusion of the disorder would serve the interests of defense attorneys representing sadistic offenders. They could claim that their clients "suffered" from Sadistic Personality Disorder, which could then be exculpatory of their wife-bashing, rape, or other sadistic crimes, the diagnosis could at least argue for "diminished responsibility" (p. 295-296).[/quote]

Feminist groups were concerned because those fitting the diagnostic criteria were almost always male. Spitzer argues that the DSM is not intended as a guidebook for judges. Its intent is to identify and describe mental disorders. He further indicates that a study of 119 serial killers that contained sadistic components showed that only four sentences of less than life without parole or death and in all four cases the sentences and ages of the perpetrators were such that none would ever be released.

In The Myth of Male Power Warren Farrell discusses the feminist outrage over Dr. Edgar Berman's statement that women's hormones could have a detrimental effect on decision making during menopause and menstruation but how a mere ten years later feminists were supporting PMS as a legal defense of women who kill their male partners. He demonstrates how this led to the use of "battered woman syndrome," learned helplessness, and post partum depression as legal defenses for women who kill men and children. These diagnoses are made almost exclusively for women.

[image]It is interesting that feminist groups oppose the inclusion of a mental diagnosis that is primarily given to men on the basis that it could be used as a criminal defense while at the same time supporting the use of mental diagnoses for women who kill their babies or partners. It is not just opposition to using the diagnosis for a legal defense, it has resulted in opposition to the diagnosis itself. This is an important distinction. Inclusion of a diagnosis in the DSM spurns investment into research and treatment. Exclusion can hinder research and eliminate treatment as insurance companies will stop paying for said treatment. This means that many men who suffer from this disorder are not being treated and may be incarcerated in prisons where adequate treatment is not possible.

In addition, the exclusion of sadistic behaviors from defining a disorder allows feminists to continue their assault on masculinity. If these behaviors defined a mental disorder it would differentiate them from normal masculine behavior. But by excluding them as such, feminists can group them with more “normal” behavior and vilify masculinity as a whole referring to it as “testosterone poisoning” or “hypermasculinity” neither of which are actual disorders. Both terms, however, can be used to refer to any unapproved male behavior and applied to all men in general instead of a few men with a mental disorder. Thus it helps to justify the position that all men are evil, potential rapists, wife beaters, and child molesters.

At the same time, creating mental disorders that applied almost entirely to women in order to explain abhorrent behaviors such as murder and infanticide perpetuates the myth that women do not commit such crimes and when they do there is obviously something wrong with them. Such behaviors can then be excluded from “normal” femininity and frequently blamed on a male who abused her. The normalization of abhorrent behavior in men and the exclusion of that same behavior in women permits the blaming of men for all of society’s ills.

This is just further evidence of the hypocrisy of feminist groups making excuses for women who commit violent crimes against men and children while using the very same reasoning to deny men proper and adequate psychological treatment. The exclusion of Sadistic Personality Disorder from the DSM-IV is evidence that feminism is a hypocritical hate movement bent on vilifying and destroying masculinity while excusing the same behaviors it vilifies in men when committed by women. It perpetuates the man=evil / woman=good myth as well as harmful negative stereotypes of masculinity.

Crossing The Rubicon-sciousness

J Galt · 11 September 2011 · Archived copy · Original

[dropcap]T[/dropcap]o say that we are creatures of habit is to boor the hell out of anyone with a pulse. Habit is the quintessential fuel of stupidity. Sensible to that is to note that one is a safe stove while the other an unattended fire. Rendering warmth or a meal from either is a job done, but the latter is hardly a remedy and a short career. But let's not deconstruct the flavors of habit or the depth of stupidity. Let's not present evidence for prosecuting our own behavior. It's a personal thing – habit, as is stupidity. To deconstruct safely is to point away from us and at something in the safe distance, such that the object of our exercise is unable to get their hands around our throat as a reasonable response. In this case brilliance flourishes, apparently.

This is the nature of intelligence and the true scale by which it is measured. Fact is and let me make this clear, intelligence has nothing to do with acquired academe or a measured outcome of wealth. Its single standard and measure is the ability to be unaccountable. The primordial definition would be called survival. If you're still alive and unscathed after whatever encounter you engaged then apparently you have not been held accountable you survived and you are intelligent. I had a teacher in junior high school offer to explain that the evidence of an evolving society can be found in the migration away from a standard that "might is right" toward a standard of collective justice.

I once told this to a cop beating me with a baton and quickly realized his unwillingness to migrate. I believe his response was "that's right fucker it's just us and I'm here to collect." Once he determined that I wasn't the perpetrator he immediately withdrew to a position of unaccountability.

[quote float="left"]What's particularly interesting about men is they usually point the finger of blame at themselves. [/quote] "Hey bud no broken bones so no foul, eh?". Well didn't I feel stupid, as I slipped into unconsciousness. Only later could I conclude that my teacher had not determined an intelligent position or insight but had defaulted to habitual stupidity and had offered to take me along for the ride. Her ultimate message to me was; if your brain is baffled by bullshit, you must be civilized. More likely you are on a leash and the state has established its "right to might."

Once entrenched in a sphere of habitual safety and unaccountability we're good, literally. We are then well prepared for the repose of neuro-stimulating emotional tourism, a softer baton – more rhythmic than threatening. I am left to wonder at times if the quality of our ethics and our Gods are not more than a cautious selection to accent the décor. Not more than a drunken repose of dopamine, serotonin and oxytocin. The real drugs of choice, the ones we always have access to.

I'm a reductionist which means I'm pretty much a simpleton by choice but also when it counts. I like the challenge of new ideas and love to dip into shit I know nothing about and don't understand. I deduce and deconstruct in a sort of Fibonacci pattern of occurrence and reoccurrence. I once had an employer in building maintenance who thought I was a mechanical savant; I however thought he was a habitual dipshit. He liked to buy car dealerships and renovate them.

Something I learned a long time ago is that if you're unwilling then you're unsuccessful and the whole process starts and ends in your head. Case in point, during one of those renovations I was asked to repair a cabled car hoist seized in the floor. The caveat was make it work but don't touch those cables. So let me get this straight, you want me to fix it but don't touch it is that correct? Yea! Look dipshit why don't you go away and play with your wallet, there's less moving parts. If you're going to start at the finish line what's the point of the race?

[quote float="right"]It places the politics on the skin, and then it gets the hose again.[/quote] It is here that I would like to say that many men through personal experiences that evict them from their lives often start at the finish line. They reach for the easiest conclusions to their pain, and like women they point the finger of blame in retaliation, and hate. What's particularly interesting about men is they usually point the finger of blame at themselves. You may have listened to the edition of BTR regarding false accusations with Paul and Dr. T – an excellent show that compelled me to call in. I'll apologize for the dramatic tone of my voice. That is in fact the way I talk when I feel passionate about the subject.

My passion lies in my experience of the male double bind that many men experience and I have experienced myself. It's the heads you lose, tails you lose kind of thinking that too many men live under. I think men need to change their perspective on the experience and reframe the meaning from condemnation to celebration. Let's face it, to be accountable is to be responsible and in a world of female agitprop you may be the last man standing. I struggle to abandon this thinking and suspend popular judgments. I reject factory widget politics and cookie cutter definition.

I have gone ghost on political correctness and reject the main stream soliloquy of entitlement propaganda. If I argue my position I am abusive; if I withdraw from discord I am abusive; if I fail to provide, I am abusive. Fundamentally, if I do not submit to the lies and accept the ever changing definition of my crime I am abusive. I am unpatriotic, I am an anarchist and in the current political climate a terrorist, but only accused. What I really am is an individual, informed and tempered by the experience of my life I am not a piece of inventory.

I AM A MAN.

I'm old enough to realize my life is an evolution; a developmental progression. It does not require correction more than it requires living, by me. It has seasons of strength and seasons of frailty, of confidence and confusion. Feminism and the female political agitprop however seek to turn men into a "Buffalo Bill" style sociopath from the movie "The Silence of the Scam." The skin of their political science is just that and awaiting the dancer to transform as a butterfly of collectible design and virtue. Its mantra is clear, it places the politics on the skin, and then it gets the hose again.

If you're even marginally confused by the "Buffalo Bill" analogy I'm going to spell it out. I was recently directed by our brother Denis to an article highlighting an assault on a 15 year old student by a 30 year old teacher. The assault was 300 fold as told by the student and occurred over the course of 2 years. He had pressed charges some 5 years after the occurrence and did it at the prompting of people who quite likely saw the damage of the experience unfold in his life. He was obviously affected and the effects were detrimental to him and to his development.

[image]He flunked out of his university courses and was unable to cope with what he had experienced and endured. But he could not see himself as the victim of emotional manipulation and coercion. It took his family and peers to award him an understanding of his own experience and define for him the wrong that was done. He sought legal remedy for his pain and filed charges with a police force that dragged their feet and struggled themselves with the charges.

In a follow up article presented at the Huffington Post, the online feminist rag of all that is right and wrong with men who proceeded to smear him.

The smear however was not direct, it was rather insidious, conniving and coercive to the reader. In a clear case of rape and the seriousness of the charge, they presented all the support possible but not to the victim, their support went to the perpetrator, the now 40 year old woman, Tania Pontbriand. Their method was effective and garnered the response they obviously desired, disbelief and ridicule. They did this by the adept use of words such as "sexual encounter", "having an affair", "continue their illicit affair" and "two-year relationship". These words are all too common in media descriptions of crimes committed by women against boys. These are words that you would never see if the opposite occurred to a young girl. The outrage would echo across the land. They did, however, garner the effect that was sought, in the comments section of the article could be seen the following.

[quote]As a female teacher of adolescent boys for the past 24 years, all I can say is ewwwww. They aren't even attractive.[/quote]

But if they did become attractive would this be another predator awaiting her turn? And the following;

[quote]What's wrong with this fellow? This should be a dream come true for a young guy![/quote]

Another unchallenged predator that believes her privilege is somehow God given, and unable to see the sickness of her beliefs. But in a reversal of gender she would immediately see the damage and the crime.

It is in the subtle language of the article that describes a relationship that didn't exist. It is a relationship that most of us would believe because the victim was a male. But I would challenge anyone to find the same language, the same characterizations and the same freedom to humiliate if the victim was a 15 year old female. Is there a "rape culture"? You be the judge.

Four levels of knowing

Dr. F (Ian Williams) · 12 September 2011 · Archived copy · Original

[dropcap]S[/dropcap]ome years back when my graduating film had just wrapped up with it's shooting I walked out of my house utterly dazed. It had been a grueling ten day shoot which had me spent; wallet and everything else. Watching the footage meter on the back of the Ariflex camera blur around was like seeing something on the dash of a rocket taxi to the moon. I was now in debt, and there was a tiny window of time between the film's wrapping and a three month haul in front of the editing machine.

I walked in to the local grocery shop to get away from the heat from the footpath, and the wonderful and jumbled smell of fresh fruit brought me back to sometime long ago when I was a kid at the markets. It was cool and pretty dark and my eyes needed time to catch up from a hullabaloo of light outside.

[quote float="left"]He didn't call it that, he called it the Quattro livelli di conoscenza. And he told me about it and didn't let up until he thought I understood it.[/quote] There were a few people milling about, and I heard the sound of someone laughing with absolute joy. It was coming from a room at the back of the small shop and I walked towards the door ajar there. Inside there was an elderly man sitting at a card table and he was drinking something pretty strong and home made by the looks of the large bottle with a cork in it. We were the only people there and he looked at me and didn't miss a beat of his tearful laughing when he said, "Listen to the cricket, just listen to it…"

Nearby was an old transistor radio and the cricket was playing, so I listened to it hoping to get the joke. Quite frankly I didn't get it and thought maybe the guy was happy on his grappa and that was that. He leaned forward and said, "No, listen to the other cricket, can you hear the cricket ?" It was then that I heard the sound of the chirping of a cricket that I'd missed before.

I didn't think the joke was all that funny, but I was very amused by this man I'd never clapped eyes on before. He gestured me to sit and share a drink and so we did. We sat there sharing some of his strong grappa and although we were poles apart in our age and backgrounds we did have this short time together and he told me about the "four levels of knowing."

He didn't call it that, he called it the Quattro livelli di conoscenza. And he told me about it and didn't let up until he thought I understood it.

Now you have to understand I'm not retelling this moment with him as an earthbound Yoda or a swami in a cave with a beard as long as his name. This was just a man who knew something interesting and wanted to tell me about it and he did. Now I'm going to tell you about it and I'm using an analogy here with chess.

Level 1. Unconsciously Unaware:

When you are a toddler you know nothing of chess. You've never seen a chess board and you have never heard the word "chess" before.It's here at level one you are not even aware that you know nothing of chess. You don't know that you don't even know.

Level 2. Consciously Unaware:

For the first time you see a chess game in play. Someone says "look, they're playing chess." You now know that there is a game called chess but you have no idea how to play it. You are at level two because you know that you are aware that you know nothing of chess. You know that you don't know.

Level 3. Consciously Aware:

You are playing the game and you are very new at it. As you move each piece you have to remind yourself how each piece moves differently. The rules of the game are always in your mind, and it's this that makes the play of the game a battle not on the board but in your head as you try to remember them. You not only know of chess, you can play it. This is the third level because you know that you know.

Level 4. Unconsciously Aware:

Years have past and you play at a competition level. You never give a thought about the rules and now you think of tactic only. While you play your mind may wander a moment to something else like a song or a conversation you'd had years before. You can think these things and play chess at the same time and your game is the same. You're an expert. You're at the highest level because when it comes to chess you are not aware that you're thinking about the game while you're playing it. You are so aware it has you asleep to how aware you are.

That's just chess. There's all the other things out there that have you at "competition level." You tie your shoe laces up while wondering if warm beer's better than cold. When you drive a car you listen to music and make words from the number plate in front of you.

All of us are at level four in many ways and in so many other ways we are level three or less. When we do our taxes, we are flying by the seat of our duds, and if we plant a fruit tree in the garden it's normal to read about how much sun it needs and therefore where best to plant it. That's most of us, but for an accountant or a botanist it's a different story because at level four they never think about thinking about it and their minds are free to wander elsewhere.

So what the hell does any of this have to do with you and me? Well, the thing is because you and I know about the Quattro livelli di conoscenza. We can go about our ways better as MRA's.

Have you ever been spluttering with impotent annoyance at a social gathering when someone dumps on blokes? I have and it burns my face red. When it happens I find myself trying to remember stats and sources of credible information and while I am doing this the moment has passed. The sensation of letting myself and you down stays with me and I play the moment over in my head like a creepy sound bite on a loop.

I'm at level three with these things. I am consciously aware of myself trying as hard as I can to remember the information here in the Mission and Values, and it's not just that. There's the shaming tactics I know about but wish to draw upon in a trice when I'm shamed.

There's no way I'm wanting to score points in a misandric hotbed, I simply want to defeat with rapid grace. I can't do this at level three. I just can't while I'm checking the rules and the facts and wondering if I have the numbers and names right. My impotence is secured for the more dilligent feminists, and if there are passive blue pillarians there as well I have missed my moment. I can't go on like this and I'm on a personal mission to bootstrap it to the next level.

Just like the times table or the shoe laces these things will soon be right with me always. I can't sit back and have a beer and let by osmosis the newer me soak into me. I have to work at it, and having a low frustration tolerance in this respect will have me coming off second best.

Every time I practice as an MRA in any capacity online or in social circles I am getting closer to the level of doing something with such expertise I am never thinking of it, I just do it.

I never saw that old guy again and not for any dramatic reason either. With all frankness I never wanted to go back to that grocery shop because the short time I had with him was so treasured I shied from the chance of making it anything else. I didn't want to see him measured less than my memory showed him and I'm happy with that. I'm just saying that he was just a guy who told me something very interesting. And now I've told you.

Dr. T launches new radio program

Paul Elam · 12 September 2011 · Archived copy · Original

[box icon="none"]

[Needless to say we support this new show, which will be the first offering of what is now the AVfM Radio Network. Yours truly will be manning the phones, so give us a shout and help give Dr. T's new show a sterling start-PE]

Shrink4Men.com's Dr Tara J. Palmatier will be hosting the very first episode of Shrink4Men Radio on the AVoiceforMen BlogTalkRadio channel on Monday, September 12, 2011 at 9pm EST.

The show will be an introduction to Shrink4Men Radio as well as a heartfelt thank you from Dr T to the men and women who follow her blog and forum. Dr T will then be taking calls for the remainder of the show, so if you have questions, stories to share or just want to say, "hi," please dial in or Skype in. She'd love to hear from you. The call-in number is +1 310 388 9709.

[/box]

Register-her.com goes worldwide

Paul Elam · 13 September 2011 · Archived copy · Original

…
[box type="note" icon="none"][This press release is now being distributed worldwide through PR Newswire. Just the same, it will help our efforts significantly if individuals supporting this effort post this release in it's entirety to their blogs and social networking accounts. Thanks – PE][/box]

[box icon="none"]

Contact: Candice Howe
Phone: 832-506-4578
Email: Candice.howe@register-her.com

REGISTER-HER.COM LAUNCHES NEW WEBSITE

New Online Registry Targets False Accusers

(Houston, Texas) September 13, 2011. Register-her.com, a public service website has been launched providing a registry of individuals who have been known to make false allegations of rape and other crimes. The site creators point to the following information:

- A study published in 1994 by Dr. Eugene Kanin of Purdue University concluded that 41% of rape allegations in North America are fabrications.[1] Kanin's study covered a 9 year period and was conducted with the cooperation of civic government in cities surveyed.
- The Orlando, Florida Police Department made a public appeal for false rape allegations to stop because they were putting a stress on police resources and creating a climate of undue fear in that community.[2]
- The Baltimore Police Department reported that 30% of the reports of rape to they received proved to be without foundation when investigated.[3]
- The Innocence Project reports that the number one crime for which they secure the release of wrongfully convicted individuals from prison is rape.[4] 153 of the 268 exonerations, or 57.1%, noted by the Innocence Project were convictions for rape.

"When someone is falsely accused of rape or abuse, the consequences are swift and severe," says Dr Tara Palmatier, a clinical psychologist who has counseled victims of false allegations.

"Some of my clients have lost their jobs, homes and good reputations," she adds. "Some have been blocked from spending time with their children. Those who are falsely accused of rape or abuse are immediately presumed guilty by society. They are publicly vilified while their accuser's identity is protected. When allegations are proven false, it's far too late: the damage has already been done. For the accuser there is rarely any downside risk."

Frequently the false allegations go unpunished or under punished, with many of those who commit them being referred to counseling, community service or probation. [5][6][7][8].

The consequences for those accused are frequently severe; resulting in false imprisonment, damaged reputations, financial devastation, loss of employment and even suicide.[9][10][11] Dalton, Georgia police officer Paul Sparks killed himself after a rape allegation was leveled against him. The allegation proved to have no merit. Engineering student Olumide Fadayomi attempted suicide after being falsely accused of rape, and another student, falsely accused by the same woman in a separate incident, succeeded in taking his own life.

"This kind of public service is long overdue." says Register-her.com spokesman Paul Elam, who added, "The devastation of these acts continues long after the false claims are disproven."

Register-her.com was established to heighten awareness of this problem, and to help ensure community safety by creating a clearinghouse of information on known false accusers. It also provides a method for victims to put individuals who have falsely accused them on public display.

Register-her.com is a public service provided to heighten awareness of the false allegation problem and to publicly register individuals known to have made false criminal complaints. For more information please contact Candice Howe at 832-506-4578, or by email at Candice.howe@register-her.com

[1] http://blog.lib.umn.edu/jbs/maysession/KaninFalseRapeAllegations.pdf
[2] http://articles.orlandosentinel.com/2010-06-22/news/os-orlando-false-rape-20100622_1_false-rape-reports-jennifer-dritt-real-victims
[3] http://www.baltimoresun.com/news/bs-md-ci-rapes-20100519,0,5338041.story?page=1&track=rss
[4] http://www.innocenceproject.org/
[5]http://www.nytimes.com/2009/09/26/nyregion/26hofstra.html
[6] http://www.dailymail.co.uk/news/article-493352/Woman-falsely-cried-rape-EIGHT-times-spared-jail.html
[7] http://seattletimes.nwsource.com/html/localnews/2004291649_false19e.html
[8]http://www.thenorthernecho.co.uk/news/8788804.Woman_who_falsely_accused_husband_given_court_order/
[9] http://www.dailymail.co.uk/news/article-1280926/Student-cleared-rape-emerges-second-man-committed-suicide-falsely-accused-woman.html
[10] http://www.timesfreepress.com/news/2010/mar/31/probe-finds-no-criminal-evidence-against-dalton-of/?breakingnews
[11]http://www.thestar.com/Crime/article/705111

[/box]

What makes a man a man? (AVfM Radio)

Paul Elam · 13 September 2011 · Archived copy · Original

[box icon="none"]

Tonight on AVfM Radio we take you on a whirlwind tour of manhood. Your hosts, JtO and Paul, two absolutely perfect specimens of testosterone poisoned masculinity, are going to give you the 101 on being a real man. So grab your crotch and get ready to listen!

If the messages you get from women and from other men about what a man is really supposed to be have left you confused and less than satisfied, then by all means tune in to this show. You will never need to hear another word on manhood again.

The show starts tonight at 9:00 EST in the US, and the call in number is 310-388-9709.

Give us a call on the show, if you're man enough.

[/box]

Creeps, Perverts, Predators and Weirdos

John Hembling (JtO) · 13 September 2011 · Archived copy · Original

How to identify creeps, perverts, predators and weirdos.

A man in his 30's sits on a park bench, watching children in a playground. His physical demeanour is everything we have been taught that signifies a sexual predator. His hair is greasy; his glasses thick. He wears the pervert's uniform; a beige overcoat and a rumpled white shirt and dark trousers. His manner is furtive. A girl, perhaps 8 years old, exits the playground, unattended by a parent – and begins her walk home. The man follows. The girl enters a building (her home?) through the ground floor entrance, the man, checks for witnesses before he too enters.

Every part of this scene is predictable. From the first moment we see this man on his park bench; we know he is a creep, a pervert and weirdo. Of course, we aren't watching real events portrayed, we're watching fiction – scripted to conform to one of our societies most popular and powerful moral dramas. "Creepy man preys on innocent female child." It is, in fact, the visual storyline of a music video.

Play

Being wholly fictional, this story follows an arc which re-assures and re-enforces our cultural assumptions. Watching this mini drama unfold, we soon discover that while she is pursued by the sinister man, this child is far from helpless. As he approaches her, she turns to confront him and by a flourish of her fingers, he is trapped. The remainder of the 3 minute long music video features the child crushing, crumpling and destroying the sinister man through hand gestures. We watch him writhe in agony and we share her satisfaction.

And this is just one version of a story told over and over in infinite permutations. A man, seemingly normal in appearance, is a sinister predator. The woman, or child, or woman-child (is there a difference in this mythology ?) is pursued, preyed on, victimized by the terrible malicious power of the man. Whether she comes to an unfortunate end, or turns the tables on her tormentor depends on what particular point of moralistic lesson is being taught today. The basic story elements are the same.

Man preys on woman, or preys on child or woman-child, and the neighbors all said he was such a nice, polite fellow. This is the narrative we package our unsorted facts with; every night on the 6 o'clock news, and we all nod along because it's the familiar story our society accepts. It's easy. It requires no thought, and no uncomfortable questions.

A society defines itself by the stories it tells, and all of us know this story – In particular, the readership of AVfM, because it is about us. We are, as men, suspect. We are perverse. Our affection is tainted by a malicious will to harm and exploit. We are naturally violent, malicious and corrupt. Or so the popular narrative goes.

But let's not forget that this is a story written by an author.

It is a story portraying the author's and the audience's preferences. If it weren't universally popular, one of our favourites, we wouldn't keep telling it in infinite variations. It's a story presenting the practiced and comfortably familiar elements of our popular mythology – we're telling, and being told the fiction we all agree on.

But lets look again. A man on a park bench, watching children playing. Hes average looking, in fact, hes dressed like me or like you – in a version of the office attire you wear every day to work. He is every man. But we know he's a bad man, the greasy hair and overcoat telegraph that as clearly as if the word "PERVERT" were printed on the screen in 30 point block capitol letters. This story is in fact, cartoonishly absurd. A man who alone, skulks after an 8 year old girl to corner her in the basement of an apartment building? We all accept this imaginary predator as a plausible version of reality. The familiar story line.

In this version of fictional reality, the girl is endowed with the power to trap and punish our villainous everyman . She does in fact destroy him through crushing and twisting his body with some kind of superpower. Whether this is toddler-super-powers or divine justice is left open to the viewer's assumptions, but its a wholly righteous torment and destruction for the bad, bad man.

And all of this is a fetish.

It is the sexual fetish of ideologues who through domination of our culture's narrative, have taught us that all men are bad, all woman are good, innocent and most importantly, victims. This is a fetish. And those who craft and re-tell this story of the sinister man, the victim woman-child and the eventual torturous destruction of the man are telling us not about objective reality, but about their own sexual fetishes, fantasies, and preferred version of reality.

Of course the average looking man is a vile pervert and predator, of course. Because, if he wasn't, then the fantasy of his entrapment, torture and death would be the grotesque, pathological symptom of a sick mind. This story, with is familiar elements, and in all its multitude versions is mean to teach us all who to hate, fear and mistrust. When we recognize in this fiction the fetishized violent fantasy of it's proponents, then we know just who the perverts, creeps and weirdos are.

Just who defines the “real man”?

John Hembling (JtO) · 14 September 2011 · Archived copy · Original

What is a man?

This is a question frequently asked, and immediately answered by pundits of sexual politics both online and in various flavor of the mainstream media. Strangely, this question pervasive as it is, and as forceful and plentiful as the many answers are – is almost never asked or answered by actual men defining themselves. No, what is a man, or what is a real man – these rhetorical devices are supplied by individuals – male and female – who are seeking to draw a line around the definitive “real man” outside themselves. If you’re a man, it’s individuals with their own axe to grind, supplying you with a definition of what you are, or what you should be. If only you were a real man by their authoritative, informed, and approved-by-the-central committee definition – you might have worth.

The attempt to control the definition of a “real man” is considerably more pervasive than the long reach and direct address of the topic in the mainstream media, and it is increasingly more shrill, as men begin to provide their own answers and self definitions without explanation or apology.

The acceptable mainstream narrative encompassing an acceptable man, or a good man, or a real man comes – in almost all cases – from a position of feminism. However disguised, the real goal is that a good man is one who is useful to women, and not ever a self actualized man who doesn’t need outside approval to define whether he’s worth the space he takes up.

One of the forms of public indoctrination of what you as a man should aspire to be comes from the modern mythology of the cinema. This was made clear to me when I was given a copy of a movie with the recommendation that I would enjoy. The movie in question was Man on Fire, starring Denzel Washington. The plot summary is that our protagonist – a former soldier and assasin is a flawed, broken man, who redeems himself by enduring various physical abuse from a collection of highly organized kidnappers and extortionists while employed to protect a blonde white woman and her blonde white child from said bad-guys. In the film’s conclusion, our dark skinned protagonist redeems himself by voluntarily dying so that the rich white woman employing him can live.

Hooray, another fictional male protagonist meeting his full heroic potential...

and earning all our approval by dying for somebody else’s convenience. To you men in the audience – can you even aspire to this level of personally mortal self sacrifice? Because if not, how dare you consider yourself a real man.

This is the myth of masculine worth, and it is not a new idea. It is not some new version of the value of male identity which came along in the last 100 or 50 years with modern feminism. This concept of male worth is as old as human civilization – that the value of a man’s life is it’s utility to kings, and women. What’s come along to put a new spin on this is the feminist-normal idea that men – those good old reliable disposable dispensers of money, labor and violence on behalf of the preferred sex – are creatures who are no fucking good until and unless they’ve submitted to ritual shame and public conformity to working hard at reform – at becoming worthy in female, ah, feminist, eyes.

This is the myth of masculine worth, but its a cynical lie from those telling it on the women’s side – its an unattainable fiction no sane adult can meet, or would try to. Its purpose is control and social censure. On the side of male apologists for this myth – it’s the lie of piety. The very same righteous hypocrisy of the priest or the politician denouncing homosexuality a week before discovery with a male prostitute.

For a man, the universal presentation of the feminist myth of man as real only through utility and self sacrifice, this becomes a more and more obvious lie that obscures as personal self actualization is realized. The red pill makes a great deal of modern mythology much more obvious for it’s bankruptcy. After ingestion of the red pill, watching television or movies with that universal message of servitude and sacrifice, as if acceptable masculinity, is is revealed as slavery with crystal clarity.

So what is a man? What is a real man?

The people providing the acceptable answers to that have their own agenda – and it's one that benefits them. I have my own agenda too, to pretend otherwise would be absurd – but my answer to that question is not what you need to do to be a real man. It's only what I need to do. What you need to do is what you decide, without any self serving ideologue providing you the approved definition of your disposability, or your worth.

Tonia Martin, sexual predator, walks. Not really.

Paul Elam · 14 September 2011 · Archived copy · Original

38 year old Tonia Hennessee Martin, former teacher's aide at Rogers Creek Elementary School in Athens, Tennessee, has been fucking a 16 year old friend of her daughter. For this she was indicted on two counts of aggravated sexual assault and solicitation of a minor.

During the course of the investigation and in the courtroom Martin admitted to raping the boy. But she did not enter a guilty plea as being in possession of a vagina is considered to be mitigating circumstances in our court system, if not outright exculpatory. Martin asked, on behalf of her vagina, to be granted a diversion from conviction. And the asshole judge granted it, lending some credibility to the term, "rape supporter."

What this essentially means is that Martin will be placed on a kind of probation for two years. During that time she cannot go on school grounds or attend school functions, and she must refrain from contacting the kid she raped. Court costs are also on her.

This wrist slapping is pretty typical in western court rooms, where the power of the law increasingly squares off with pussy power and the latter wins. Actually the latter puts the former in a Full Nelson till the former cries uncle and starts whimpering.

Ah well, you might think that at least some justice will be served, right? Surely the kiddy diddler Martin will be placed on some sort of state governed registry and at least barred from ever working in a professional capacity around children again.

That would be wrong to assume at all. One court official reported that under the terms of the diversion Martin can apply to have her record expunged in just two years, thereby erasing any trace of evidence that she is a rapist. This will free her to act as though none of this ever happened and all memory of her misdeeds will be lost.

But they may be wrong. ⍰

Some thoughts on honesty and sex

J Galt · 14 September 2011 · Archived copy · Original

[dropcap]N[/dropcap]ow hold on here, I know the title is challenging, I could hardly hold back the tears of laughter just typing it. But I thought I'd write this not as a response to the warmth and fuzziness of life in the body politic of intimacy and farting, but as a reminder. I was over at the "GUMP" site, for those who are wondering or have forgotten it's the "Good Unless Male Project," Reading an article by none other than Forrest himself, and I thought hey let's check out some other stuff written by the elves that lurk in the Forrest. I do understand in a kind of laundry on Wednesday and bowel movement before 8am way that the challenge of being just a regular guy. Forrest himself has often eluded to his own struggles with his rasculinity.

For those confused that's masculinity with an "R" and only to be used if you're a pirate or plunderer, or missed laundry day, or if you have one leg, or a bird that won't shut up. Wives don't count because they are always honest, honest. It's sage advice being rolled out and if you're looking for evidence just cut the man down and count the number of annual marital rings, I mean "growth rings" and you will know that there is nothing superficial going on here at all. Honest.

Now I do know that in an irregular kind of way, missing those magic moments to contemplate the universe or read an insightful edition of COSMO just before 8 am may lead to a day of being full of shit. It's paradoxical really in a "Male Honesty" kind of way. And since we're discussing "Male Honesty" and being full of shit in a "Paradoxical" kind of way, I thought I might offer some honest insight from the Forrest. Honest questions from an honest man answered by honest people in an honest kind of way. Honest.

I know cause I can "feel" the honesty in his questions, and if you "feel" it, well then it has to be honest. Honest. Now the paradox doesn't just begin and end with the questions, no friends round two of the paradox (and I'm not referring to a shoe style here) moves on to include none other than …….Amanda Marcotte, the epicenter of honesty and her feelings that support it. Not to be confused with a dish of pasta, Amanda herself is often found to be rich in vitamin "aye." But let's not waylay this with a discussion about stuffed linguini or semolina flowers chafed in their own oils. Let's eat.

The probe into Paradox opens profoundly with these questions.....

[box type="download" style="rounded" icon="none"]

What does it mean to be faithful in love?

How do you try to be true to your best self?

Are we a nation of men being dishonest about fundamental truths?

Is radical honesty that helps strangers but hurts loved ones worth it?

Why do men so often lie when the truth would work just as well?

If a good man is an honest man, does a good man never lie?

Is silence a lie?

Is love a compromise of conflicting truths?

Does love require a kind of truth-telling which is always painful?

Is it okay to embellish for the sake of a good story?

Does reality TV really happen?

How do you do no harm when the truth is immensely painful?

How do you tell a woman she is beautiful just frequently enough with sufficient variety that she believes you?

Is it possible to be the same man at work and at home, with the guys and with your spouse? Or is some amount of play-acting necessary to survive in the modern world?

What are the things that it's okay to lie to your kids (or kids in general) about?

What does it mean to live with integrity in a non-verbal way?

Are feelings facts?

Is the truth always more powerful than a lie?

[/box]

Please feel free to address any of these probing questions into the context of "male honesty" and it's accompanying paradox, I know that if you "feel" free then you too are honest.

Maybe I'm one of those "guys" that paradoxically realizes that if you need to affirm your honesty with investigative reporting on who, what, when, where and why then you likely miss the point altogether. Given the frequent connection between love and honesty in the questions, I'm left to wonder where honesty goes if it's anything less than love that you experience towards another. I was taught by my predecessor, Knuckledragger, that honesty is often self-serving. His words echo inside me, "to thine own self be true."

It's one of those opportunities to discover your place in the world, who's who and where you might fit in the scheme of things. But then of course there is a world of difference between being honest and telling the truth. Not knowing the difference can lead to a distorted sense of privilege. Amanda eyeballed that curve immediately and took a swing at the "male privilege" behind the "paradox of male honesty" and I quote……

"It's intellectually dishonest to argue that one can separate discussions of privilege from discussions of honesty. Since we were provoked to be honest, I was honest about this. I realize that it makes some people uncomfortable, but that was the challenge. Having your statements be accepted as truth regardless of empirical facts or conflicting narratives is a function of privilege. Defining what is true and what is not is a function of privilege. If men want to be honest, they must begin by questioning their privilege. Any other starting point is….a lie."

If you are wondering, I've thought it to be important that when you tell a joke in writing where you highlight the punch line so the reader knows when to laugh. Of course I did consider that Amanda was being a cryptic sage and really telling us that she is a liar but that would suggest retrograde honesty and that is much more political than personal. So I'm somewhat confident that what Amanda is offering is her pseudo truth. That without considering the lack of privilege possessed by men and accepting the political powerlessness offered by feminism you are lying to yourself.

[image]
Me...my...mo manda
Honesty is a bit of a Pavlovian maze if you ask me and it seems the rats are always looking for payola after a good run. I'm a profoundly honest person myself, even during delusional episodes of flatulence, and find the delivery is made more honest with sincerity. Really, what's honesty about if not the process of negotiating perception and making rules of predictability? Isn't that really a woman's game?

Even a pathological liar is honest when weighted against consistency and that goes a long way towards sincerity. Maybe the paradox only exists between men and women. I'm kind of thinking that the undertone of these questions may be more related to effectively lying and making it sound honest.

Now for all you guys who are still struggling with the "do I look fat in this dress" question – a piece of advice, don't answer it. There is another way, simply ask her to take off the dress, put it on yourself and then tell her you look fatter than her in the dress. It may not be honest but at least there's comic relief.

It's a process of magical force this thing referred to as honesty and the real measure behind it is not your own honesty but the extent of gullibility possessed by the listener. There's the rub, aye; are you gullible enough to believe that they are gullible enough to believe that you aren't gullible at all? I mean when it comes to honesty it's likely the most honest people you will ever meet are the ones you don't believe.

What about people that talk to themselves? Are they honest or are they lying or are they just second guessing themselves and shopping for sincerity? Seems these folks would believe that honesty is more about a sincere delivery than substance. What if while talking to themselves they exercise any disbelief? Then challenging the source becomes somewhat of a disembodied diatribe. Who the hell is going to argue the accountability of personal honesty while engaged in a conversation with themselves?

Then of course you have people that hear voices, or even "talk to the dead" or to "aliens" or to "oracles." In my younger years, while exploring mysticism, it all came to a breathtaking halt of realization against some very wise words given to me by a man over a pint of beer. It was very sage advice and insight that I had never considered until that moment. "Just cause they're dead doesn't mean they know anything." That, my friends, was a life changer for me and I have to admit real honesty for me always has a touch of humor.

In my experience when it comes to communicating honesty with men a simple "are you shitting me?" or "bullshit" seems to have been adequate over the years. That's not to say I haven't been lied to by guys, but I have taken into consideration that maybe they had to. Fair enough, I'll hold back the tears and push on. I've never felt the need to call the emotion police for a mouth swab to check for honesty. I mean, if someone is lying to me there's two simple questions I ask, why do they feel the need and do I need to feel anything as a result.

I did learn something profound from my last partner about honesty. Whenever she would start on me, you know first comes the evidence then comes the complaint, and then comes the restitution, I would stand quietly look her straight in the eye and smile lovingly at her. She would always start laughing and at that point the honesty would be accompanied by respect. I really did love her for that.

I guess here is where I'll have to be honest myself with the reader. You can put the Kleenex away now, there is absolutely nothing in this article about sex. Sorry, I lied.

Press covers plight of non-custodial parents

Robert O'Hara · 14 September 2011 · Archived copy · Original

[box]

Stories covering the financial and emotional plight of non-custodial parents, the overwhelming majority being fathers, are rare in the mainstream media. Usually non-custodial parents who, for whatever reason, fail to pay court ordered child support are derided and humiliated in the press and called "deadbeats" often making them scapegoats for the irresponsible decisions of the other parent. Judges and legislators often chime in along with women's advocacy groups demonizing disenfranchised fathers who have had their rights taken away as parents and their money and freedom taken away forcibly.

Recently, however, a small but growing number of voices in the mainstream media have started to pay attention to the circumstances of non-custodial parents and in some cases openly criticize the child support system.

Early last month several news outlets covered a police operation in Alabama named "Operation Iron Snare." It was widely criticized by many of those reporting and comments in the online articles concurred with the tone of the articles. The Huffington Post quoted the reactions of bloggers commenting on the operation.

From an August 9th article entitled "Operation Iron Snare: Alabama's 'sleazy' trick to catch deadbeat dads":

"The reaction: Forget sleazy, says Meredith Carroll at Strollerderby. This borders on "cruel," and is somehow making me "feel really, really, bad" for the deadbeat parents who I should be furious with. That's for sure, says Tom Fornelli at CBS Sports. "Yes, they deserve what they're getting, but it just feels wrong." Plus, the whole scheme is a waste of time and money. Was such an expensive, elaborate ploy catering to the news media really necessary?"

Readers are invited to watch the police participating in the operation through a video featured on the page. Be warned it is disturbing and may make viewers angry.

On September 12th MSNBC, a highly regarded and popular source of news worldwide published an expansive article entitled "Unable to pay child support, poor parents land behind bars" written by Mike Brunker the Projects Team Editor. The Thomas Ball incident was cited in the article marking the first time a national news outlet mentioned the affair.

From the article:

"The threat of jailing delinquent parents is intended to coerce them to pay, but in rare cases it can have tragic results.

In June, a New Hampshire father and military veteran, Thomas Ball, died after dousing himself with gasoline and setting himself ablaze in front of the Cheshire County Court House.

In a long, rambling letter to the local Sentinel newspaper, the 58-year-old Ball stated that he did so to focus attention on what he considered unfair domestic violence laws and because he expected to be jailed at an upcoming hearing on his failure to pay up to $3,000 in delinquent child support, even though he had been out of work for two years.

The ability of judges to jail parents without a trial is possible because failure to pay child support is usually handled as a civil matter, meaning that the non-custodial parent — or the "contemnor" in legal terms — is found guilty of contempt of court and ordered to appear at a hearing.

He or she is not entitled to some constitutional protections that criminal defendants receive, including the presumption of innocence. And in five states — Florida, Georgia, Maine, South Carolina and Ohio — one of the omitted protections is the right to an attorney."

Although many would argue that tragedies coming about as a result of child support and custody laws are not rare at all and also that Thomas Ball's letter was anything but "long" and "rambling" this is a very encouraging sign that the rights of fathers are no longer being ignored by the press.

[/box]

Murderess Jasmine Richardson attends Mount Royal University

Paul Elam · 14 September 2011 · Archived copy · Original

In April of 2006 12 year old Jasmine Richardson lured her boyfriend into helping her murder her parents and her younger brother so that she could go live with him.

The cited news story attempts to paint a picture different than the reality that Richardson was the mastermind of the crime by posting a younger innocent looking picture of her and giving it the caption "Before Jeremy," and then showing picture of her in goth make-up, stating "and the transformation begins."

But police investigators uncovered internet communications between the couple that clearly identify her as the one who instigated the crimes. Her first known communication about the crime was a message to the 23 year old boyfriend that said ""I have this plan. It begins with me killing them and ends with me living with you."

Pussy power at 12? You betcha. The power to solicit murder, provided the recipient is of weak enough mentality.

And it was Richardson, who, after hearing her eight year old brother plead, "I'm scared. I'm too young to die," plunged a knife into his chest. The boyfriend followed that by cutting the boys throat. The couple murdered her parents in another room of the house.

In a follow up to this story, Richardson, who was sentenced to 10 years, is now out of prison and in her freshman year at Mount Royal University in Calgary, Alberta. Her parents and brother remain, as far as is known, dead.

In one particular bit of coverage from 2009 there were still concerns that this young woman did not understand the gravity of her actions. View it here.

660 News, which reported the follow up story about Richardson attending school at MRU, did not reveal her name in their bit. They say it is because her "identity is protected."

No it's not. Her identity and deeds are PUBLIC RECORD. Her name is Jasmine Richardson. She is a murdering bitch now attending school at Mount Royal University in Calgary, Alberta, Canada, and you can find her listed in the registry at Register-her.com.

Heidi Jones saga ends with guilty plea

Robert O'Hara · 15 September 2011 · Archived copy · Original

[box]

On September 14th former ABC weather reporter Heidi Jones plead guilty in front of a New York Judge to false filing misdemeanor charges related to an incident last September in which she told police that she had been sexually assaulted on two different occasions by an hispanic man in his 30's or 40's. The judge said that upon sentencing next month she will be placed under probation for three years and have to serve 350 hours of community service-or the amount of time police spent investigating her case. She will also have to undergo continued psychological therapy the nature and duration of which are still unspecified.

The plea bargain was the result of a nine month effort by her lawyer, Paul Callan, who said after the hearing "This has been a tragic case for Heidi Jones. She was at the pinnacle of the broadcast industry at ABC and Good Morning America and her life has really been destroyed, her professional life, by this incident, and Heidi, from the moment I first met with her, she wanted to accept personal responsibility for what she had done." Jones herself stated that she "made it up for attention. I have so much stress at work, with my personal life and with my family," according to the court produced document.

This stands in contrast to the legal behavior of Callan who originally filed to have the charges thrown out saying that she was being charged under the wrong statute in which she would have been tried for causing "public alarm", a crime Callan said is usually reserved for bomb threats. The original allegation by Jones, a high profile news and weather person, caused much furor in Manhattan and when it was discovered that she may have lied caused much anger in the Latino population of New York. Callan also accused the prosecutors of bungling the case because they failed to bring the case to trial within 90 days of the first court appearance. The charges were eventually changed to filing a false report.

Most notably, last month Jones and her lawyer made a final and dramatic attempt to have the charges dropped when she filed court papers nearly a year after the incident claiming that she was coerced into making a confession to the police when they told her that her employers wouldn't be notified of the charges leveled against her if she confessed.

An August 25th New York Daily News article reported:

"Callan is trying to get a judge to toss misdemeanor charges against Jones. The lawyer wrote in the court filing that police also said they would make her claim that she was attacked by a "Hispanic" man last fall disappear.

"[She was] advised that if she would just sign a confession incorporating the specific words and ideas of the lead detective, he would make sure that the 'confession' would never be seen by anyone other than his 'bosses' at [the] NYPD, and possibly the District Attorney's Office," Callan wrote.

Callan said cops told Jones eight out of 10 sex-crime allegations turn out to be false or are not prosecutable, but none of the accusers are ever charged."

The charges were not dropped.

Typically, those falsely accused of rape do not get any such consideration when being charged. It is compulsory to notify employers of the accused immediately after arrest making for an easier prosecution due to the financial stress placed on the defendant. Likewise those falsely accused, even if they escape long term incarceration, frequently have their careers and lives destroyed. Though the assailant was completely fictional, the penalties in the plea bargain coped by Mr. Callan are very typical of those faced by false accusers after they confess or it is proven that they deliberately accused an innocent person of a crime who's punishment routinely includes a long jail sentence.

A profile has been created for Jones at register-her.com due to the documented fact that she has engaged in a false allegation.

Sources:

http://www.cbsnews.com/8301-504083_162-20106221-504083.html

http://www.nydailynews.com/ny_local/2011/09/14/2011-09-14_tv_weather_woman_heidi_jones_pleads_guilty_to_lying_about_being_assaulted_by_a_h.html

http://www.nydailynews.com/news/ny_crime/2011/08/25/2011-08-25_former_weathercaster_heidi_jones_charges_she_was_duped_into_false_confession_in_.html

[/box]

Tennessee deals blow to lifetime alimony

Paul Elam · 16 September 2011 · Archived copy · Original

[box icon="none"]

NASHVILLE, Tenn. (AVfM) — Today the Tennessee Supreme Court ruled that a man does not have to pay lifetime alimony.

The case before the court involved Craig and Johanna Gonsewski, of Hendersonville, Tennessee. The couple had an acrimonious divorce In 2009. During that time the Tennessee Court of Appeals ordered Craig Gonsewski to pay Johanna $1,250 a month in alimony for the rest of her life or until she remarried.

Unlike most cases of lifetime alimony, which involve women who have sacrificed careers in order to raise children and are past the age of a career start up, Ms. Gonsewski was employed for the duration of her marriage, was in her 40's at the time of divorce and was earning in excess of $72,000 per year as a state employee.

The ex-husband appealed the ruling of the lower court, asserting that they exceeded reason with the decision.

The ex-husband had "struck gold," said Johanna Gonsewski's attorney Ed Gross, because he was earning $137,000 per year, and contended the wife had "topped out," in her profession.

That rationale did not stop the Tennessee Supreme Court from unanimously ruling that the award of lifetime alimony was inappropriate, citing tha Johanna Gonsewski earned a robustl salary at a stable job and was also awarded substantial assets in the division of property.

Chief Justice Cornelia A. Clark wrote, "In many instances, the parties' assets and incomes simply will not permit them to achieve the same standard of living after the divorce as they enjoyed during the marriage."

The court also ruled that the Johanna was not entitled to the lump-sum alimony award of her attorney fees because she was partially responsible for generating them and had the financial resources to pay.

The ruling could have a direct impact on many alimony cases where the spouses are both employed or employable.

Gross stated on Friday that his client didn't know about the decision, but predicted that "she will be extremely disappointed."

[/box]

Texas legislates against paternity fraud

Paul Elam · 16 September 2011 · Archived copy · Original

[box icon="none"]

AUSTIN, Texas (AVfM) Legislators have changed a law that prevented victims of paternity fraud from challenging child support obligations. The landmark legislation took six years and three congressional sessions to complete.

According to the old Texas law, a man is legally a father if any child is born during his marriage, regardless of whether he is or isn't the biological father. This resulted in many men paying child support after a divorce for children that were a product of their wife's infidelity.

No genetic test was required to establish paternity. If fact, paternity tests proving no biological connection between the legal father and the child were considered irrelevant to the issue of child support.

Under the old Texas law, he was forced to support that child financially, and had no course of action to terminate the parent-child relationship even though he was a proven victim of paternity fraud.

The new law changes all this. It allows men to use the results of a genetic test to prove they are not fathers, and to petition Texas courts to terminate the parent-child relationship and child support. Courts will now be mandated to terminate child support orders and end legal sanctions against the victims of paternity fraud.

The law includes a grace period until September of 2012 for men who were victims of paternity fraud to make their cases before the court. Men who discover they are victims of paternity fraud after September 1, 2012 will have one year from the time of discovery to petition the courts.

The new law effectively terminates child support payments and requires the state to pay back any support already paid at the time of the petition. It is possible, then, that those women who have been fraudulently extorting monies from those targeted by their scams, will become liable to the state for restitution of the money they have illicitly collected.

[/box]

What's the difference between the men's rights movement and feminism?

Jared White · 16 September 2011 · Archived copy · Original

[dropcap]A[/dropcap] commonly asked question by those on the fence about both men's rights and feminism is what the difference is between the two movements. Feminism has been around for over five decades and the public is understandably more familiar as a movement.

When people hear the word feminist, even if the first image that comes to their mind is an overweight angry lesbian, they still tend to associate the word with women's rights. Men's rights is straight forward with the name. So basically, the average "on the fence" person would think feminism for girls and men's rights for boys; two movements that are the polar opposites of each other. This is how most people define the two movements and it is understandable how many would come to this conclusion. Of course, all of those people would be wrong.

Recently I have argued with two people over this subject. One was a feminist bigot and the other was another one of those neutral "why can there never be any common ground between Men's Right's and Feminism?" observers. These two arguments I had with these two completely different people were interesting for one reason; they both could not argue against the Men's Right's Movement without conflating the term MRA with men. When I say argue against I don't mean arguing against the goals of the MRM…well with the feminist I do but not with the neutral observer. I mean it in terms of trying to refute one of the main differences between the MRM and Feminism that I brought up. The difference is simple and every MRA, anti-feminist, and feminist knows what that difference is, although feminists usually deny it.

Discriminatory laws and policies have been set in place within western governments by feminists influence that allow legal bigotry against men, while not one law or policy that discriminates against women, in any way, is on the books.

[image]The feminist, as one would expect, denied that there is any discrimination towards men within western legal systems and concluded that if there is, it is justified because of what men did to women in the past. The neutral observer, while having the common sense to recognize the discrimination men face still could not drop his stance that the faults within the MRM are supposedly just as bad as the faults within feminism. This is where the arguments from the neutral observer and the feminist were identical.

When I brought up the fact that MRAs have caused no legal discrimination against women and only wish to abolish the unjust laws set in place by feminism the counterpoint from both the feminist and the neutral observer were "but men in the past set laws in place that discriminated against/oppressed women."

The feminist, again as one would expect, could not grasp the concept that "MRA" is not synonymous with "man," however, the neutral observer eventually conceded that MRAs are indeed men and women who oppose the legal bigotry put in place by the feminist movement.

This is something that I feel is a major problem; a very large speed bump in the way of progress towards ending feminist bigotry. As I said before, the common thought surrounding both movements is men vs. women and yet this couldn't be farther from the truth. However, just for the sake of argument, let's pretend that the MRM is comprised of nothing but men. That still wouldn't change the fact that not one discriminatory law against women has been set in place, or attempted, by the MRM.

I'm sure these facts have been pointed out before but I feel they need to be explored again for one very good reason. There are still those who oppose the bigotry feminism has spread, whether they be MRAs, humanists, or simply anti-feminists, who still bring up the discussion about seeking common ground between the MRM and Feminism.

There can be no common ground.

I say this because there is only one way common ground can be reached between the MRM and the feminist movement. Feminists will have to first acknowledge that their movement has spread anti-male bigotry throughout western governments. Whether they want to blame it on “radicals” or “second wavers” or feminist subdivision C subsection 12. It really doesn’t matter which feminists they want to point the finger at, as long as they acknowledge that Feminism is the reason these laws exist.

We are quick to forget the still recent and two of the most important victories against feminist bigotry that occurred in California and West Virginia, where all of the male built, government funded domestic violence shelters would not accept male victims, even if they were accompanied by their children who were also victims of female abuse because of the anti-male polices set in place by the feminists who ran them.

Legal bigotry like this is to this day ignored and denied by feminists because covering up the wrongs done by their movement seems to be more important than legal equality for both men and women. When that bigotry actually is acknowledged it is either deemed justified or blamed on men and women who aren’t “true” feminists. Only the old second wavers could champion something as hateful as denying men and their children help from abusive women, right?

But then of course to believe that we would have to ignore how “third wave” poster girl and leader Jessica Valenti would be more than happy to take away every man’s right to due process in court when accused of rape. And yes I do mean only a man’s right to due process. Valenti was very specific about what gender rapists are when she proposed her most recent suggestion of anti-male bigotry. So as I was saying, for there to be common ground between the MRM and feminism there would have to be an acknowledgement that feminism has done substantial harm to men over the last half century.

Does this mean the MRM is without faults? Of course not. That was never the point. I have not agreed with every idea I have seen from MRAs on how to solve the current crisis men face within western nations. However, the main goals of the MRM are as follows;

Default 50/50 Custody of Children After a Divorce: Meaning neither the wife or husband can argue over who gets the kids unless there is an actual case of abuse or misconduct. You know, in the case that one of them actually is an unfit parent, instead of human emotions, spite, and lies deciding who gets to be a parent to children.

Abolishing Forced Child Support: This solution would coincide with the 50/50 custody proposal. If both parents have the kids for an equal amount of time then each parent can support them when it is their time to have custody. People, mostly men, are sent to prison because they cannot afford to pay child support and a lot of the time the “child” support isn’t even being spent on the child. In reality, it is just another form of alimony. Neither should exist. However, since ending child support probably won’t happen before we colonize mars there is a simple suggestion MRAs have put on the table.

His wallet, his choice.

Unwanted pregnancies happen. Sometimes it is a man’s fault, sometimes it is a woman’s, but most of the time it is the fault of both. Either of the two can make decisions and choices that lead, or don’t lead, to a pregnancy. The mutuality in choices end here.

Before the child is even considered a child the woman has the option of aborting the pregnancy. The most common reason for abortion is because the woman is not ready/doesn’t want to be a mother. She either doesn’t want or isn’t ready for the financial and emotional responsibilities of being a parent. Lucky for her, she doesn’t have to. This is completely her choice and I feel it should be. It is her body after all. If she doesn’t want to have an abortion for whatever reason and still doesn’t want/isn’t ready to be a parent, she can either leave the child up for adoption or abandon it, legally. Responsibility gone and all is right with the world, right?Well if you are a woman, yes.

Men, on the other hand, have two options; give the mother of their child money or go to jail. Doesn't seem fair, does it? Well if you aren't a feminist then no it doesn't seem fair. Here is how it can be fair? If an unwanted pregnancy occurs and the woman actually decides to tell the guy instead of tracking him down and showing up at his doorstep however many years later demanding money, the man should be given a choice similar to that of the woman. He should be able to relinquish all of his parental and financial responsibilities before the child is born. Before the child is considered a child.

Take note that I am not talking about opting out of taking care of kids that have already been born after a divorce. Simply put, just like the woman has the choice of relinquishing her parental and financial responsibilities before and after the child is born, the man is given the option to relinquish his responsibilities before the child is born.

Now if you can hear some squawking and screeching from the house next door that's probably because a feminist is your next door neighbor and she/he just read the last few sentences of this article. According to them, a man being given the choice to opt out of any financial responsibilities to a child before it is born is selfish and irresponsible, but a woman doing the same thing with abortion is the most holy of freedoms.

Oh and don't forget women can and do relinquish their responsibilities after the child is born as well. Just put some ear muffs on or crank up the music, I know all too well how annoying feminist screeching can be.

VAWA Reform: I personally wouldn't mind the name being changed to the Violence against People Act. But regardless of the name, the standards in which it is enforced need to change. Men are routinely arrested by police who answer domestic violence calls, even when it is men who make the call asking for help, and this is just when they do not defend themselves.

[image]Men who dare to defend themselves when being attacked by a violent female partner have almost no chance of seeing their abuser arrested.

On the other hand, one punch from a man who has had enough of being beaten with fists, frying pans, umbrellas, sticks, hammers, knives, wrenches, and other household items will bruise his attacker and in our society a woman with a bruised face is automatically an innocent victim.

Men with bloody faces and knife wounds are ridiculed and asked what they did to upset their wives and/or girlfriends. Men who have their penises cut off are laughed at and their abusers are showcased on talk shows as heroes.

This double standard that is the law; a law created by our feminist friendly vice president, is vehemently defended not only by feminists, but by chivalrously socialized men, too. Men are stronger than women, therefore men should not hit women in self defense because men can do more damage, therefore men are the bigger problem in domestic violence.

This discrimination must be changed. Men should not be automatically hauled off by police in a domestic violence disturbance just because they are the "primary aggressor," which to police means the bigger and stronger person involved in the disturbance. If police can not figure out who started the fight then both parties should be arrested. Tears shouldn't determine which side has more merit.

Intoxicated Rape: If a person drinks too much and passes out and someone else proceeds to have sex with that person, a rape has occurred…that is, if the person who passed out was female. Legally, women could not be convicted of raping a man until recently. Just so there is no confusion, a man can still be given an erection, even when he is passed out. Beyond this, due largely in part to feminist rape hysteria, a man who sleeps with a woman that is intoxicated can be brought up on the charge of rape, even if that man was intoxicated himself.

This is wrong, plain and simple. People, young people especially, have sex while intoxicated all the time. I understand that there is a point when someone drinks too much and their perception gets thrown off, I've been there many times. However, I was still sensible enough to know if someone was trying to rip my pants off. Of course that doesn't mean everyone can drink and remain aware of what is going on around them. However, the general public and the law only seems concerned when women are the ones drinking themselves into oblivion.

A woman who has had too many drinks and decides to go out on the dance floor of some club, find a guy, jump in his car, go home with him, and have sex somehow becomes a rape victim when she wakes up with a hangover and doesn't know who the guy is sleeping next to her. That same guy could wake up with the same hangover because contrary to the rape hysteria, men drink too. That same guy could have a foggy memory about what happened the night prior and be wondering just who the hell the woman is laying next to him.

Both of them could have several reasons to feel that what happened that night was a mistake, however, the woman is the only one with the option to use rape as a cover story. Men having sex with women that have been drinking are not rapists. I cannot say it any more plainly than that.

False Rape Accusations: Feminists are sick to death of hearing about this growing problem. Those who oppose feminist bigotry, myself included, haven't heard enough. Whenever I see acknowledgement from feminists that women actually do lie about rape for reasons other than "rape culture" induced slut shaming, it is usually a nonchalant and brushed off as not important.

Recently I read an article from a feminist posing as a masculinist advocating that everyone should stop raising awareness about false rape accusations and the next to nothing punishment women usually receive for making them. Why? Because raising awareness about false rape accusations and advocating that the women who file them should receive harsher punishments actually increases the number of false accusations made. Well, at least he acknowledged that the rate of false rape accusations aren't stuck at 2-8%. It's a start…right? One step at a time.

The truth of the matter is false rape accusations have seen men's lives destroyed and killed, throughout history. It was, in fact, legal to kill men accused of rape not too long ago and it is socially accepted today. And when I say accused, I do mean accused, not convicted.

Now you would think that something so bad it could get a man killed would be given stricter punishments by a fair and just legal system to discourage its practice, but no. According to ~~chivalry~~ the law, false rape accusations are not serious enough a crime to merit a long prison sentence. One could argue that not all women who falsely accuse men of rape do so out of malice or to seek attention and you would be right. Sometimes women make mistakes about who they accuse and no one would want to send someone to prison just because they made a mistake.

So maybe that is a good reason to not give women who make false rape accusations a long prison sentence. But hold on…aren't innocent men falsely accused of rape sent to prison for several years? Some over 20 years? I understand that with our not so perfect legal system that the innocent will sometimes suffer and the guilty will sometimes slip through the cracks but the way I see it is ~~chivalry~~ the law is set up to ensure that when the accusation of rape is concerned, innocent men are more likely to receive punishment as opposed to innocent women.

The MRM advocates that men accused of rape are not "perp walked," and kept out of the media like their accusers are and considered innocent until proven guilty. The MRM advocates that women who falsely accuse men of rape are given long prison sentences similar to the sentences those innocent men would receive if convicted.

For those of you who do not wish for women that simply make a mistake to be sent to jail while her actual rapist is still free I have a suggestion. If her accusation is proven false it should then be proven whether or not there was an ulterior motive for the false accusation such as "teaching the man a lesson," covering up infidelity, winning a custody battle, getting back at a guy for not giving her a ride home, getting back at a guy because he cheated on her, getting back at a guy because he insulted her, seeking attention, creating an excuse for being late to class, creating an excuse for being late getting home, or because she just felt like it. If none of those or anything similar are the reason she accused an innocent man of rape then hey, no need for jail time.

Male Genital Mutilation: If you're wondering what this is then my point has already been made. MGM is legally and socially accepted. End it. That is all. Calling it "circumcision" and adding it to the hospital bill doesn't make it legit.

These are the main legal reforms MRAs seek to invoke and not one of them, I'll type it again, not one of them, if made law, would take away any rights women have. Now compare that with the constant bombardment of new policies that strip more and more freedoms away from men put out by feminists and you will begin to see how different feminism and the MRM truly are.

Are there bigots within the MRM? Damn straight there are. Do any of those bigots have any type of governmental influence at all? No. Have any of them been allowed to create laws or policies that deny women any of their civil rights?

Not. Fucking. One.

So for all of you men and women who support the MRM and to all of you neutral parties who can't seem to figure out why MRAs and feminists can't find common ground; to everyone who thinks The MRM and Feminism are two sides of the same coin, take a closer look at the damn coin. One side endorses legal bigotry while the other seeks to end it. You can't get any more different than that.

AVfM Radio Special

Paul Elam · 16 September 2011 · Archived copy · Original

[box type="note" icon="none"]

AVfM Radio will present a very special program. JtO and I will follow up last week's show, "What Makes a Man a Man," with a query into the female psyche, in an episode titled "What Women Want."

Suffice it to say it will not be your typical, manginosity filled diatribe on pleasing the "fair" sex, but a serious examination of the question that you can only get MRA style. If you liked the last show, you are going to love this one.

But we are not stopping there. Also joining us on the show will be Tom Martin, the former London School of Economics student who is now litigating against that university, claiming that the institution practices sexual discrimination in its gender studies program. (Tip of the hat to Jeremiah)

Martin's suit was "covered," by The Guardian with an ambush article, full of hollow critique, feminist dogma and condescension, by Jonathan Dean. Martin was, however, allowed to present a response to that article himself, in which I might add he used a THM video as a source for citing the gender bias in the approach to domestic violence (Thanks in part to his use of the video, it has just topped 100,000 views).

Mr. Martin will be interviewed live on the show and will be available to field your questions when you call in to the show at 310-388-9709.

Be sure to join is for what will clearly be one of our most interesting shows. This is one you don't want to miss.

[/box]

Tattoo

Paul Elam · 17 September 2011 · Archived copy · Original

[dropcap]I[/dropcap] am going to show you a video. If you are a run of the mill blue pill mainstreamer, you don't need a warning. You might even find it amusing. It has a lot to do with a man's pain, both emotional and physical, so it won't mean much to you, except perhaps as a source of humor.

But this might be upsetting if you are a red pill convert that actually see's the pain of your fellow man, as well as his clear folly. So be prepared, but be sure to watch all of it.

Play here.

Now that you have seen it, another warning. I have criticism, some of it harsh, for what happened in that video. It is not intended to rub salt into this man's wounds, or to "blame the victim," but to use the event as a lesson; an instruction on how not to be a real man, and how to avoid the pitfalls that accompany such foolish pursuits.

You see, the temptation here is to view this man's actions as a slightly crazy act of liberation; a strange but somewhat understandable stab at self-reclamation; a statement – somewhat akin to what the victim himself utters during the process.

"She can't hurt me now."

It is easy to assume that perhaps, in some way, as his shredded skin flies from the wheel of that grinder and blood oozes onto his arm, that he is actually erasing her; removing her memory and the pain she obviously brought into his life with no more effort than it takes cut flesh with steel; that he is moving forward with zeal into a less vulnerable, stronger future. Yeah, man, let's all do high fives and cheer as he gets that bitches name off his arm.

But there is a fundamental problem with this. This is not a man getting past his pain, but a man savaging himself with it. Clearly, she is hurting him still, and behind the laughter and bravado is a man directly, transparently, turning his grief inward on himself. He has pulled whatever dagger this woman shoved in his back and thrust it into his own gut.

And he is laughing while he does it.

We make much in the men's movement, as well we should, of the suffering men face at the hands of women, especially when their injuries are inflicted with the help of the state. Likewise, we fairly and accurately address the cruelty and depraved indifference of blue pill men who admonish us all to just suck it up and take it. Such men will also not likely care much for this video because it does, even if in a woefully misguided way, acknowledge that a man is in pain. For them, it is much better for him to take the grinder to himself while sequestered away form a world that does not want to hear anything of his troubles.

But we are also seeing something here that even exceeds that level of disgusting, and it is delivered courtesy of the men who surrounded him and made the video. This type of "man," lowly enough to even make someone like me put the word "man" in scare quotes, is at least as contemptuous and vile as the worst that feminism has ever unleashed on the world.

These men are, simply put, puerile scumbags, particularly the scumbag with the grinder. And in a righteous world he righteously deserves to have that power tool shoved up has ass while it is still running, save the fact that it might render the only worthwhile tool in that room unusable.

It pains me even further to observe that the only voice of dissent in that group, albeit weak and pathetic, came from a woman; that the rest of them, the entire video recording, knuckle bumping lot of imbeciles could not have been more happy to witness and incite the grieving showboat. Not a single word of reason offered; not a single plea for a better way than a humiliating public display of self-mutilation. Not one of them with the integrity to say, "I am not doing this," and walking off from the video.

What a group of sick fucking cowards.

I don't know the personal story behind this man's pain, but the end result I have seen a thousand times. So have you, in each and every statistic that shows men kill themselves at 10 times the rate that women do during divorce and breakups.

Is it any wonder why, really? If this is what men betrayed by women can expect from other men, then maybe eating a gun isn't so crazy. Maybe eating a gun is sane.

Except.

Except, that now we have the red pill. We have a viable answer to this problem that actually works. All you have to do is make a man think, just a little; to begin with ask why, seriously, would he so lose himself in woman as to have their name inked on his skin to begin with? Perhaps if he can come to understand that level of insanity he can also get more than a passing glimpse of the fact that we are not really talking about something as simple as the skin. He might see that his skin, even as it bleeds, is really just a metaphor for his entire life.

Men become attached to women almost on a cellular level. It is a bit of genetic insanity that used to work for the species, to keep men attached enough to women to give their lives protecting them, but now is like a 900 pound gorilla on the putting green going full swing with a nine iron for a three foot shot.

The red pill is what wakes men up to the fact that we no longer live on the African Savanna; that women are, essentially, every bit as disposable as men, especially as viewed from the life of an individual man. It is the pill that lets us know we can live without them, and that the loss of one doesn't need to mean the loss of skin, and usually does not mean we have lost love, but just the illusion of it.

Do you think whatever woman hurt this man feels put in her place by this video? The most likely reaction from her will be a sense of power and accomplishment. How special and valuable must she be that a man would allow part of his arm to be ground off from the loss of her. She is laughing at his misery and wallowing in her sense of power. And he handed that to her along with his dignity.

The red pill is THE ONLY WAY to overcome that programming At the very roots of human biology the "need" for women stretches like tentacles through minds and hearts of most men, so that the core of male identity is contingent on female approval and acceptance. And in completely logical reciprocity, they are not wired to love us, but to use us. Only a few rise above it and our skills for spotting them are almost nonexistent. All this affects men in places you cannot reach with a grinder no matter how much you bear down on it.

Anyone who has read much of my work at all knows that I avoid messages like "men should," or other such precursors to Peter Pan platitudes and condescending counsel. But were I to engage in telling other men what is good for them, the first thing, and perhaps the last, that would find its way out of my mouth is that men need a much revised idea of the importance of women in their lives; which is to say they are not one bit more important than the next man. That puts them in pretty good perspective to consider the next time one of use takes a power tool to a man's arm for a hoot on YouTube.

We need to start dispensing that particular red pill, in pre-adolescent days, to help give young men a fighting chance at surviving young women, and surviving the three million years of unconscious programming that will likely as not put them on a chopping block while other men tell them to man up and take it, and others laugh at their misery.

We report on legal events here because they are important. But one of the reasons I started this website is because I know the MRM involves much more than legislation. Pass all the laws you want, it won't do us any good at all unless we also keep passing those red pills around.

Jessica Valenti: photographs and mammaries

Paul Elam · 18 September 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Some thoughts on grabbing tit and public discourse

Take that, patriarchs!

If you do a Google image search on Jessica Valenti, you come up with quite a few results. I did a query with my "safe search" turned off and got everything from Valenti posing in a group picture where she is standing directly in front of Bill Clinton – her tits thrust out as though she wants the former POTUS to give her a reach around – to others where the only thing thrusting out is her middle finger, which seems to be a regular fixture in her life; a courageous act of defiance against her well imagined patriarchy.

Fuck you! You fucking patriarchs, you! Fuck yeah, take that!

Some other images were mixed in, including a few of some dark haired bimbo named Jessica Valentino swallowing any number of 12 inch cocks. No relationship, though. The two Jessica's make entirely different kinds of porn, Valentino's being the one that showcases sex, Valenti's being the one that showcases sexual paranoia.

However, curiously absent from the Google returns were some additional images of the Full Frontal Fascist engaging in what appears to be some her more titillating pastimes with female friends, and even a mollusk or two that resemble, to her obviously trained eye, female genitalia. Today, we solve that problem.

[image]

If she pukes she has to lick it up

Don't give me wrong. I could give a rats ass whether Valenti stays faithful to her new husband or eats at the Y when he isn't (or is) watching, but I do think it curious that these pics have not made their way to the top of the Google image returns on Jessica Valenti, at least so far.

[image]

I so like diversity!

I feel like the public has been robbed of some info on this very public figure and I want to do my personal part to help, because, well, because that is just the kind of guy I am. What can I say, some of us were born to serve the greater good.

So now, courtesy of this website, everyone will have access to this small collection of images that give us a glimpse into the more intimate side of Ms. Valenti, as she gropes and licks and fingers her way through life.

SlutWalk attendee's take notes! Jesse's school of sluttery is in session!

[image]

The husband must be so proud!

Just imagine the value these pics will have, as they climb higher and higher in Google returns, giving anyone interested in researching Jessica Valenti a more complete picture of her as a human being. These photos and her now first page returns on register-her.com, will certainly help members of the media and general public form more cogent decisions on just how seriously her opinion on matters of gender should be taken. A handful of tit – or a titful of hand – always make me pay more attention to someone.

And the tit clutching continues

[image]
Jesus, is this a pattern?
I cannot, by the way, be certain that any or all of these images are 100% legit. I mean, they sure look like her. Same features; same hirsute appendages, and the same demeanor; that of a chihuahua yipping furiously at a pit bull, provided of course that the chihuahua is standing next to or behind its masters feet.

This will be the only qualifier. We are going with the feminist touted preponderance of the evidence rule here. Since I think it is more likely that these are pics of Valenti than not, that will serve as proof. Just ask any college review panel that investigates rape allegations.

[image]
All this titty grabbing worked up my appetite!
That is a sampling of some of the images available on our favorite grrl in the whrrl. We have more, but it would belabor the point. After all, how much interest is anyone going to maintain in looking at Valenti to begin with? The point has been made and the images have been added to great access registry in the sky. Next weekend, Amanda Marcotte and her pussy!

Compendium of Men's Issues

Walter Romans (TDOM) · 19 September 2011 · Archived copy · Original

[dropcap]I[/dropcap] am currently attempting to identify, classify, and define the issues men face in today's society. The Compendium of Men's Issues will be the result. It currently defines and classifies more than 60 issues into 9 major categories. At this point it is not all-inclusive, nor is it ever likely to be. It is a work in progress and will be edited and expanded over time. Eventually, it should explore each issue in considerable depth.

I will be posting each section as I complete them. They will be updated and edited along the way. Once the initial outline is completed, I will be posting it as a permanent page at The Damned Olde Man. Comments and suggestions are not only welcome, but encouraged. I know that I have not thought of everything. In addition to further issues and categories, I am looking for references to cite as sources of information. These can be scientific studies, government statistics, or news articles. If you know of any good sources or have any ideas worthy of inclusion, please leave them in the comments section and include links if possible.

Compendium of Men's Issues

This catalog is an attempt to identify, classify, and define the issues men face in today's society. It is intended as a guide to assist those interested in addressing men's issues and rights. It should assist in clarifying issues and guiding debate and discussion. It currently defines and classifies more than 60 issues into 9 major categories. At this point it is not all-inclusive, nor is it ever likely to be. It is a work in progress and will be edited and expanded over time. Eventually, it should explore each issue in considerable depth.

Family Law

Marriage & Divorce

Due to the increased ease and availability of divorce, marriage has become a high-risk proposition for a man. Lifetime alimony, loss of custody of children, child support, community property, and the likelihood of false accusations of domestic violence or child abuse mean that most men stand to lose nearly everything they've ever worked for and much of that they will work for in the future.

Child Custody

In the United States, mothers are awarded custody of children in contested cases about 84% of the time. This means that in many cases where custody is not contested, men accept conditions they find deplorable because they know they are highly likely to lose should they contest. Contesting custody frequently leads to false allegations of domestic violence or child abuse made by the mother. Judges are loathe to award custody to a father accused of violence or abuse even when those allegations cannot be substantiated. Contesting custody can be a long, expensive ordeal and most men cannot afford it, especially when they are under the burden of child support and alimony payments.

Alimony

Alimony can be appropriate in some cases where one partner has traded career for child care and is thus unable to support herself/himself post-divorce. In such cases alimony should be viewed as a time-limited, stop-gap, measure until that partner can establish a career and income. It should not be viewed as life-time financial support or as a means of maintaining a high standard of living.

Child Support

Child support may be necessary in cases where one partner has greater custody of the children than the other. However, all too often these payments create considerable financial burden upon the payer. It is more difficult for the payer to request a decrease in support payments than for the recipient to request an increase. This is true even when a payer has lost income or employment. Payments continue to accumulate and debt continues to mount while a payer is awaiting a hearing. This debt cannot be discharged in bankruptcy. Those who fail to pay, even when unable, may be subject to loss of driver's license, professional licenses, and/or imprisonment all of which may further affect the ability to pay.

Back child support can accumulate even when the father has no knowledge of a child's existence. A mother can wait until a child becomes a teenager before filing for support and be awarded back payments dating to the time the child was born. As a result a father can find himself paying support to the mother well after the child reaches adulthood.

Visitation and Enforcement

Fathers rarely obtain custody of their children. Therefore visitation becomes paramount in maintaining the father-child relationship. A typical court order for visitation is every other weekend plus one evening per week. This relegates father to the role of visitor in their child's life and has resulted in the term "Disneyland parent." The father is rarely involved in making any of the important decisions for the child and is often resented by the mother who may view the father as undermining of her authority. She fears the child views her as the "bad guy" because she must be responsible for discipline while the father is the grantor of special privileges and is more fun. This arrangement can easily result in creating more conflict and tension between the parents.

Despite the decreased role of the father in the child's life and his limited time with the child, mothers frequently deny visitation in violation of court orders. It is nearly impossible for fathers to get courts to enforce their own orders. It can also be quite expensive to continue to return to court to request enforcement especially when there is little prospect of the court taking action.

Parental Alienation

Parental alienation results when a parent continually attempts to interfere and disrupt the relationship of a child with the other parent. It most frequently occurs in cases where the parents are separated or divorced. The result of these attempts can cause a child to refuse contact with the other parent and/or to dislike or hate the other parent. This can result in detrimental effects upon the child and the alienated parent including loss of relationship and psychological or emotional disorders. It might even strain the relationship with the alienating parent in addition to the alienated parent. It must be noted that the alienation is not justified or explained by the actions of the alienated parent. If a child is alienated because of actual abuse or other legitimate circumstances it does not qualify as parental alienation as the child would be justified in his or her feelings toward that parent.

Parental alienation can occur whether or not a child has "Parental Alienation Syndrome." PAS is currently being considered for inclusion in the Diagnostic and Statistical Manual of Mental Disorders, 5th edition. Inclusion would help to define the disorder and its symptoms, legitimize its diagnosis, provide payment for its treatment, and spur further research. Opponents believe that it would allow abusive parents (mostly fathers) to obtain custody or increased contact with their children, placing those children at risk of abuse. Proponents believe that PAS is synonymous with child abuse and inclusion would allow courts to implement solutions to interference with visitation, order counseling, and arrive at more equitable custody and visitation decisions.

While research shows that fathers are just as likely to attempt to alienate a child from its mother as a mother is to attempt to alienate a child from its father, this is a men's issue because mothers have far more opportunity to attempt alienation due to the frequency they are awarded custody.

Reproductive Rights

Birth Control

While women have a wide variety of acceptable options that carry little to no risk and have very side effects and/or effects on the pleasure derived from sexual activity, men have none. The three most effective means of birth control available to men are abstinence, condoms, and vasectomy. While abstinence may be legitimately practiced for religious, moral, ethical, or cultural reasons, it is not desirable for many men, married men in particular. Condoms, while effective, especially when used when spermicides, reduce sensation and therefore pleasure. It may be advisable to use them as preventive measures in the transmission of STDs and HIV, however, in a long term, monogamous relationship this is generally not necessary. The reduction in sensation makes them undesirable for many men. Vasectomy is not 100% effective, nor is it reversible. While in some instances a vasectomy may be reversed, the longer one waits and the older one gets, the less likely the chances for success. Reversing a vasectomy can also be expensive. Given the drawbacks and limitations of these three methods, more research and development must be done to develop more desirable and effective means for men to control reproduction. (See also Paternity Fraud).

Paternity Fraud

Putative Father Registries

Putative father registries exist in nearly 30 states for the purpose of providing legal recognition that a particular man is the biological father of a child. These registries purportedly guarantee that a man will receive notification if the child's mother places the child for adoption. they do not guarantee that he will be permitted to contest the adoption, only that he will be notified and have the right to appear. Typically a man must register within a specified period of time before or after the child is born or lose his rights altogether. Many states require the putative father to register any time he believes a woman may be pregnant, thus if a man wishes to protect what limited rights these registries provide, he must disclose to the state each and every time he has sex and with whom.

Obviously there are problems. First these registries are a violation of privacy. Requiring a man to surrender to the state the details of his sex life is a gross violation of privacy. Second, the registries do very little to protect a man's right to his children since they typically provide no guarantee that he can contest adoption or obtain custody, or even visitation with his child. Third, although they do little to protect a man's rights, they can be used to establish paternity for purposes of child support. Fourth, they are rarely publicized. Most men know nothing about them. Therefore, rather than serving the purpose of protecting a man's rights, the actual purpose is to get around men's rights in order to allow adoptions to proceed unhindered by a putative father. By requiring a man to register and failing to publicize this requirement, states can claim that the father is unknown and need not be notified.

Putative father registries need to be abolished. Men should not be forced to take extraordinary measures to preserve their rights to their children. If states truly wish to look after the best interest of the children and/or expedite adoptions they would require mothers to disclose the names of all potential fathers prior to permitting an adoption to proceed. Further, if a man is considered the putative father, he should have rights to contest adoption proceedings and to obtain custody or visitation. He should not be forced to disclose the details of his sex life to the state in order to protect his rights to his children.

Abortion

There are many reasons why men may oppose abortion. There are also good reasons to support a woman's right to choose. Regardless of which side of the issues a man takes, there is currently no equivalent right for men. Few would argue that a man should have the right to decide or force a woman to either carry a fetus to term or to have an abortion. Still there are those who would argue that a man should be informed and/or consulted prior to a woman making her decision.

Choice for Men

As stated above, there is no equivalent right to choose for a man. This, however, does not mean that options cannot exist. Feminists argue that a woman should have the right to control her body to justify the argument for choice. The same could be argued for men. Current law requires men to pay child support to their mother(s) of their children without granting men any choice in the matter. Thus a woman's decision can have lasting impact on a man's life. It could impact his ability to support himself, continue his education, career choice, ability to support the family he desires and may already have obligations and commitment towards. Clearly, if a woman becomes pregnant, her choice has considerable effect on his body and life. This is a situation that could be corrected. In much the same manner as abortion permits a women to control her body, choice for men would permit a man to control his.

The basic concept is to allow the man to "opt out" of fatherhood. It would be a decision akin to a woman deciding to surrender a baby for adoption. The father would be notified by the mother of paternity. He would then have a period of time to exercise his option to become a father or to opt out. His decision would be final in the same manner adoption is final.

Criminal Law

Harsher Sentences for Men

Overcrowded Prisons

Prison Rape

Excuses Female Criminal Behavior

Psychological Diagnoses for Women

Shorter Sentences for Women

"Abuse" Defense for Women

Domestic Violence

VAWA

Violence Against Men

Domestic Violence Industry

Lack of Services

Health Care and Concerns

Prostate Cancer

Insurance

The insurance industry has justified charging men higher rates for various types of insurance including auto and life based on increased risk simply for being born male. If sex is in fact a legitimate indicator of risk then this practice would not be gender based and not discriminatory. However, recent changes to health care coverage have eliminated higher rates for women based on higher risk. to maintain higher rates for men while eliminating them for women is a discriminatory practice.

Further, there is evidence that risk is not based on sex when it comes to auto and life insurance. A recent study has indicated that women are just as likely as men to be involved in auto accidents. this study contradicts insurance industry claims and may be indicative of the a discriminatory practice. In 1920, women outlived men on average by about a year. Today, women outlive men on average by 6-7 years. This would indicate that sex is not a factor in determining lifespan and that there are other factors involved, one of which may be discriminatory practices in health care practice and research. Another such factor may be male dominated labor requiring harder, heavier, and higher risk work that exposes men to greater health risks and wearing out their bodies faster than women. While society has encouraged women to enter male dominated careers, these have been predominantly white collar, government, or academic and not those requiring physical labor and high risk. It does not appear to be the natural state of the human condition that women outlive men by any significant amount and therefore life insurance premiums should not be based on sex.

Funding for research into predominantly female health care concerns tends to outstrip funding to predominantly male health care concerns. The health care system has developed specialized practice for women (ob/gyn), but not for men. Breast cancer receives several times as much funding as prostate cancer, but rates of occurrence for these cancers are about equal.

Longevity

In 1920, women outlived men on average by about a year. Today, women outlive men on average by 6-7 years. This would indicate that sex is not a factor in determining lifespan and that there are other factors involved, one of which may be discriminatory practices in health care practice and research. Another such factor may be male dominated labor requiring harder, heavier, and higher risk work that exposes men to greater health risks and wearing out their bodies faster than women. while society has encouraged women to enter male dominated careers, these have been predominantly white collar, government, or academic and not those requiring physical labor and high risk.

Substance Abuse & Treatment

Sexual Assault & Harassment

Rape Laws & Definitions

False Allegations

Statutory Rape

Media Portrayal & Negative Stereotypes

Deadbeat, Dorky, Incompetent Dads

Super Moms

Bullies

Bad Guys

Testicular Attacks as Humorous

News Media Identifies Men

Workers, miners, soldiers, etc. when harmed or threatened

Armed men, gunmen, men, etc. when performing bad acts

Education

Title IX

Public Schools

Sexual Harassment

Bullying

Failing Boys

Over-diagnosis of ADHD

Secondary Education

Under-representation & Declining Enrollments

Portrayed as Rapists

"She Fears You" Indoctrinations

Denial of Constitutional Rights

Dear Colleagues Letter from DOE

Women's and Gender Studies Departments

Feminist Orientation

False Statistics

Sociocultural

Patriarchy

Patriarchy is a term that literally means the rule of the father. It is an organizational system in which society is structured around male lineage and ownership. It placed the responsibility for the female squarely on the shoulders of the male and provided for an orderly structure for society in which all would be cared for, including the female.

Modern feminists have redefined the word to mean male dominance of the female, focusing on just one aspect of the original concept.men are viewed as oppressors (see below) and women as their victims. Marriage is attacked as the means through which men establish dominance and sex is often equated with rape, some feminists going as far as to declare that all sex is rape, or all sex not initiated by a woman is rape, or even stating that women as an oppressed class are incapable of consenting to sex. The concept of "male privilege" extends from this version of patriarchy. To defend the position, feminists point to the fact that societal structures are dominated by men which is indicative of a patriarchal society. However, they ignore that in a patriarchy, men are responsible for the care and protection of women and that as a result, women hold considerable power and privilege.

Chivalry

Chivalry stems from the notion that in a patriarchal society men have a responsibility to provide for and to protect women and children. Originally, the term was applied to a code of honor held by knights in medieval Europe. Later it was applied to gentlemen, and even later to all men. Chivalry requires sacrifice. This sacrifice can be as small as offering a lady one's coat, pulling out a chair for her to sit, or merely standing as she enters a room. It might also mean offering up one's life in defense of a lady's honor. It is the practice of female worship or pedestalizing the female by placing a greater value on her life than that of any male.

In a patriarchal society where men hold authority, a system of chivalry is a natural result and would be instituted to ensure men held to the responsibility that comes with the authority. But in a more egalitarian society, it places men at a disadvantage relative to women. In such a society, men no longer hold that authority, but remain bound to the responsibility. Which at once creates a subservience of men to women, while simultaneously infantalizing women as being helpless and in need of assistance. No society can be truly egalitarian and chivalric. To achieve a society where men and women have equal rights, equal opportuniteis, and equal protection under the law, they must also have equal responsibilities to that society and to each other. To achieve this, chivalry must be abolished.

Male Privilege

In sociology, “privilege” refers to a power structure that exists in society that provides members of a particular class or group advantage over non-group members. In every society there are a variety of power structures in existence at any given time. “Male privilege” refers to one of these structures. “Female privilege” would refer to another. Both exist.

In a patriarchal society male privilege carries tremendous responsibility. In many instances, men are expected to give their lives in exchange for the privilege. Men are also expected to defer to women according to the rules of chivalry. Female privilege, in a patriarchal society, could be seen as the enjoyment of the benefits of male sacrifice without the corresponding responsibility. Thus in a patriarchal society, male privilege carries responsibility to society, female privilege does not. However, the female does have a responsibility to the individual male in exchange for her privilege and exemption from responsibility to society. This is typically to marry, bear children, and keep and maintain the home. But the male pays for this privilege as well. He must provide for and protect the female (his spouse) and the children they share.

In a more egalitarian society, men and women would have equal privilege and equal responsibility to society and each other. Men in today’s society have lost most of their male privilege. But have retained the responsibility. Women have gained privilege in society and in the home, but have not taken on increased responsibility, neither in society, nor in the home. A woman can divorce her spouse, ending her responsibility to him, but may retain custody and control over the children and be paid child support and/or alimony. Thus the man remains obligated to the woman. Women do not register for the selective service and cannot be conscripted onto military service and are not obligated to any civilian equivalent. On the cultural level, men continue to be expected to work and lose social status if they opt out of paid work to become househusbands. Women continue to have the option of being a housewife without loss of social status, but have gained the privilege of entering into a career as well.

The decrease in privilege for men and the increase in privilege for women without a corresponding decrease in responsibility for men and increase for women has created a social imbalance where men have become second class citizens in many respects relative to women (Family Law, reproductive rights, education, etc.).

Viewed as Oppressors

Must Atone for Past Sins (Historical Oppression Justifies Discrimination)

Morally Inferior

Must be Stoic, Unemotional, Tough (emotionally unavailable)

Traditional Role of Provider/Protector

Men are More Expendable/Disposable

Women & Children First

Draft and Combat

Most Dangerous Professions / Workplace Deaths

Dr. T show on sexless marriages

Dr. Tara J. Palmatier · 19 September 2011 · Archived copy · Original

[box icon="none"]

Are you trapped in a sexless marriage?

Does your wife or partner withhold sex and affection from you on a regular basis?

Does your wife or partner use sex and affection as currency in a transactional relationship?

Are you feeling frustrated by the lack of physical and emotional intimacy in your sexless marriage or relationship?

Does your wife or partner make you feel like there's something wrong with you for the very natural desire of wanting to be intimate with them?

Does your wife or partner frequently reject your affectionate and sexual overtures, yet expect you to "perform on demand" whenever they need an ego boost or want to feel desirable or want to reassure themselves of their control over you?

Does your wife or partner ration out sex in order to keep you in the relationship?

Has your wife's or partner's cold, abusive, volatile, and rejecting behavior extinguished your desire to be affectionate and intimate with them?

Does your wife or partner belittle you or accuse you of being gay or unfaithful because you've lost your desire to be intimate with them because of their consistently cold, angry or rejecting behavior?

Does your wife or partner begrudge you, belittle you or make you feel like a pervert for masturbating or looking at porn while they continue to refuse to be intimate with you?

If so, then be sure to tune in to Shrink4Men Radio on the BlogTalkRadio AVoiceforMen channel on Monday, September 19, 2011 at 9pm EST when we'll tackling the topic of sexless marriages in the context of relationships with abusive women.

If you have questions or just want to share your experiences about being in a sexless marriage or relationship, telephone lines will be open (+1 310 388 9709.)

Hope you can make it!

Shrink4Men Coaching and Consultation Services:

Dr Tara J. Palmatier provides confidential, fee-for-service, consultation/coaching services to help both men and women work through their relationship issues via telephone and/or Skype chat. Her practice combines practical advice, support, reality testing and goal-oriented outcomes. Please visit the Shrink4Men Services page for professional inquiries.

[/box]

AVfM Radio interviews Tom Martin tonight

Paul Elam · 20 September 2011 · Archived copy · Original

[box icon="none"]

Just a brief show reminder here for tonight's episode of A Voice for Men Radio, which airs tonight at 9:00 p.m. EDT on Blog Talk Radio. Tonight's show will be on the subject "What Women Want," but more importantly (among an infinite number of other things) is that we will also have Tom Martin appearing on the show for an interview and to take your questions.

As recently covered in The Guardian, Mr. Martin is currently suing the London School of Economics for anti-male sexual discrimination in their gender "studies" program, an action which seems to have the entire feminist world in a twist.

Tonight you will get insights into this case that you have not heard reported by the mainstream media, so be sure to tune in live for that.

Also, with the recent rush of activity around register-her.com, you will get an update on that as well.

The call-in number to the show is 310-388-9709, or if you are a registered listener (easy and highly recommended) you can skype in to join us and/or visit the chat room during the show.

This should be a great show, so don't settle for the archives. Tune in live and enjoy it as it happens.

[/box]

Two Feminist Fallacies

Luigi Logan (aka Fidelbogen) · 20 September 2011 · Archived copy · Original

[dropcap]T[/dropcap]his concerns two common errors of thinking which most feminists stumble into while they are scrambling to decipher what is happening to their world, why things are slipping out of their control, and how they might regain that control. I call these two errors the crosshairs fallacy, and the moral perfection fallacy.

When I call them fallacies, I do not mean they are strictly logical fallacies in the academic way. That is, I do not pretend to add them to the likes of ad hominem, circular argument, strawman, and so on. No, for my purpose, these new items are fallacious simply because they are mistaken; because they initialize thinking upon a foundation of error and trigger downstream error in conjoined regions of understanding. I am keen to call attention to them because they so strongly mark the behavior of feminists in particular — especially those who are describing or attacking the non-feminist revolution. So my motivation to write is political.

I will speak first of the crosshairs fallacy.

Feminists fall into this mistaken thoughtway owing to their confusion and consequent desire to simplify. In a word, they oversimplify. Beset by hostile forces which they cannot fathom, they try to align a narrow target, as it were, in the crosshairs of a sniper scope. Their deluded hope is, that the sum and substance of what threatens them lies within that constricted radius, and that if only they neutralize the target area, their troubles will go away andperpetual revolution will resume its course unhindered.

Among feminists, the crosshairs target of choice is the cyberspace group known as "MRAs", or Male Renaissance Agitators. Feminists are obsessed with MRAs as a kind of "red menace." They sense, quite rightly, that larger social forces are mobilizing against feminism and what feminism has inflicted on the world, and with utmost naïveté they have undertaken a shorthand analysis that would make these things mentally easier to cope with.

[quote float="left"]Things are never "bad" for independent local reasons, but for reasons which feminism arrogates sole authority to enunciate.[/quote]The crosshairs fallacy springs from a childish belief that the vital force of the non-feminist revolution concentrates in a point source — for example, a certain community of websites — and that if you neutralize this particular "head", then the "snake" will expire. But that is a gross misunderstanding — akin to attacking a prominent mushroom in complete ignorance of the underlying mycelium which spreads for miles. For even if you kill, imprison, or pinklist every suspected "MRA" on the planet, you will not have made a dent in the cultural forces which generated MRAs in the first place. Furthermore, you will have overlooked a host of *other*threats to feminism from other directions.

Accordingly, it will not do to sit around in feminist echo chambers mocking the bizarrities of presumptive MRAs who have posted comments on the internet. For such words are not spoken in a vacuum, nor do they enter the universe through a side door from nowhere. It should go without saying that such unsavoriness is the consequence of something — even a feminist could agree on that much. But what a feminist cannot hope to fathom without ceasing to be a feminist, is that these things originate from a source in the objective world which the feminist narrative is not competent to explain.

So the feminists have arrived at a false simplicity. The problem is not that the facts of the case are unduly difficult to comprehend, but that they are difficult for a specifically feminist mindset to process without a prerequisite self-knowledge and the sense of guilt this knowledge would instill. It is to avoid guilty self-knowledge, then, that the feminists project their anxieties onto an abstracted and quasi-mythical group of people — as onto a lightning rod.

To be sure, MRAs do exist in various forms. But "the MRA" as an*archetypal construct,* is largely a figment of the feminist imagination. And MRAs, whether concretely or archetypally, are only one piece of a much larger jigsaw puzzle. The more advanced non-feminist philosophers, by the way, do not make the equivalent error in their thinking about feminism or feminists. Rather, they have evolved a sophisticated conceptual model of feminism as a sociopolitical organism — a subject which I have treated elsewhere.

I will speak next of the moral perfection fallacy.

The feminists wish to discredit their enemies as simply as possible, and so they look for anything that is morally amiss about their enemies in order to expedite that project. This is fallacious mainly because it is shallow. For there is no way that any sizeable demographic sector can be a vessel of moral purity straight through, and the non-feminist sector is no exception. You will find the complete moral spectrum of human nature among those who oppose feminism, because we are talking about humanity en masse — and when did humanity en masse ever include less than a complete moral spectrum?Furthermore, you should understand that feminism is a utopian worldview. It upholds the abstract ideal of "progress" and holds the rest of the world accountable to a certain programme which it dictates in the service of this ideal.

So when the rest of the world is slow to measure up, it counts as proof (in the feminist mind) that the rest of the world is morally invalid and, thus invalidated, without warrant to challenge feminist claims. This mode of thinking is entirely circular and self-referential.In practice, all feminist assessment of human fallibility is made according to a feminist yardstick, meaning that no case of moral dysfunction is permitted to operate within its own frame of reference. Things are never "bad" for independent local reasons, but for reasons which feminism arrogates sole authority to enunciate. And in the feminist utopian worldview, all things are either progressing toward a projected feminist future, or rebelling against that future in some way. No alterity is admitted, and by default, any possible theory of "sin" or "transgression" can only be a feminist theory, imposed by feminists and for feminists, upon the rest of the world.

And so the feminists cannot see the world as it exists in itself, but only as it appears through the lens of feminist theory. In consequence, feminist dealings with the non-feminist sector amount to a coercive falsification of reality injuriously imposed on others. For it ought to be obvious that all manner of folk may be aggrieved at feminism for all manner of reasons. It is not a bit obvious, however, that ALL of these reasons are invalid merely because SOME of them are proffered on questionable grounds by questionable people. Coercive falsification is therefore a cardinal sin upon feminism's doorstep; it is first imposed, reacted against by an aggrieved world, and imposed once more in rejoinder to that aggrieved reaction — which to the feminist mind is deemed a transgression. But with each round the falsification grows — always at the expense of any feminist claim to moral authority. This claim — or rather pretention — crumbles relentlessly.

In sum, feminism has a toxic moral agency within the social ecology. And so the moral perfection fallacy should inspire us to quote the Gospel verse which advises plucking the beam out of thine own eye before thou pluckest the mote out of thy neighbor's eye!

A concluding word: The crosshairs fallacy and the moral perfection fallacy are interrelated; they intertwine; they have territory in common; they illuminate each other. But I will leave it to the reader to work this out for himself or herself.

Register-her.com registers!

Paul Elam · 20 September 2011 · Archived copy · Original

[box icon="none"]

This is a quick but important update just for AVfM/register-her.com supporters. After a couple of glitches with the application process at PR Newswire, the press release for register-her.com was finally distributed…and hit a little pay dirt.

The release was picked up and redistributed by over 246 media outlets, including CNBC, Yahoo Canada Finance and a wide assortment of other media outlets, including several high profile business journals.

Also, I was contacted during the day yesterday and gave an interview to CBS affiliate WKMG in Orlando, Florida which was scheduled to run on their 11 O'clock news broadcast last night. They were doing a feature story on register-her.com! I have not been able to access that show, so if anyone can help with that, please let me know.

There will be more on this on tonight's episode of A Voice for Men Radio, so be sure to tune in.

A word of thanks to all the people who contribute to this end of the MRM, either with money or time spent to register offenders at register-her.com. We are starting to make a difference people. And we are not going to quit, ever.

Here is a partial list of what your good efforts helped us do. Your hand is on this vital work.

AlipesNews http://www.alipesnews.com/Public/ArchiveStory.aspx?id=3697589797122680&languageId=4000 Ask the Experts http://www.asktheexperts.org.uk/prnewswire/?prnewsid=201109191049PR_NEWS_USPR_____DA70717 Association of Energy Engineers http://www.aeecenter.org/i4a/pages/index.cfm?pageid&prnewsid=201109191049PR_NEWS_USPR_____DA70717 Atlanta Business Chronicle287,000 Visitors/day *http://www.bizjournals.com/atlanta/prnewswire/press_releases/Georgia/2011/09/19/DA70717 Austin American-Statesman (Austin, TX) http://www.mediawebsite.net/ausas/story/?catSetID=7002&catID=290237&nrid=130117418&page=1 Austin Business Journal287,000 Visitors/day *http://www.bizjournals.com/austin/prnewswire/press_releases/Georgia/2011/09/19/DA70717 Baltimore Business Journal287,000 Visitors/day *http://www.bizjournals.com/baltimore/prnewswire/press_releases/Georgia/2011/09/19/DA70717 Birmingham Business Journal287,000 Visitors/day *http://www.bizjournals.com/birmingham/prnewswire/press_releases/Georgia/2011/09/19/DA70717 Bolsamania (Web Financial Group) http://www.bolsamania.com/noticias-actualidad/prNews/Register-hercom-Launches-New-Website–DA7071719092011-1–18a36ceeb2e4593a62369c272554cbdb.html Boston Business Journal287,000 Visitors/day *http://www.bizjournals.com/boston/prnewswire/press_releases/Georgia/2011/09/19/DA70717 Business First of Buffalo287,000 Visitors/day *http://www.bizjournals.com/buffalo/prnewswire/press_releases/Georgia/2011/09/19/DA70717 Business First of Columbus287,000 Visitors/day *http://www.bizjournals.com/columbus/prnewswire/press_releases/Georgia/2011/09/19/DA70717 Business First of Louisville287,000 Visitors/day *http://www.bizjournals.com/louisville/prnewswire/press_releases/Georgia/2011/09/19/DA70717 Business Journal of Greater Milwaukee287,000 Visitors/day *http://www.bizjournals.com/milwaukee/prnewswire/press_releases/Georgia/2011/09/19/DA70717 Business

Journal of Phoenix287,000 Visitors/day
*http://www.bizjournals.com/phoenix/prnewswire/press_releases/Georgia/2011/09/19/DA70717 Business Journal of the Greater Triad Area287,000 Visitors/day
*http://www.bizjournals.com/triad/prnewswire/press_releases/Georgia/2011/09/19/DA70717 Charlotte Business Journal287,000 Visitors/day
*http://www.bizjournals.com/charlotte/prnewswire/press_releases/Georgia/2011/09/19/DA70717 Cincinnati Business Courier287,000 Visitors/day
*http://www.bizjournals.com/cincinnati/prnewswire/press_releases/Georgia/2011/09/19/DA70717 CostBasis.com http://www.costbasis.com/home/prnewswire.html?prnewsid=201109191049PR_NEWS_USPR_____DA70717 CRN http://www.mediawebsite.net/cmpch/story/?catSetID=7007&catID=290632&nrid=130117418&page=1 Dallas Business Journal287,000 Visitors/day
*http://www.bizjournals.com/dallas/prnewswire/press_releases/Georgia/2011/09/19/DA70717 DallasNews.com http://www.mediawebsite.net/danews/story/?catSetID=7002&catID=290237&nrid=130117418&page=1 Dayton Business Journal287,000 Visitors/day
*http://www.bizjournals.com/dayton/prnewswire/press_releases/Georgia/2011/09/19/DA70717 Denver Business Journal287,000 Visitors/day
*http://www.bizjournals.com/denver/prnewswire/press_releases/Georgia/2011/09/19/DA70717 Distinctly Diva Beauty Network http://www.theddbn.com/prnewswire/?prnewsid=201109191049PR_NEWS_USPR_____DA70717 Edinburgh Days Out http://www.edinburghdaysout.com/prnewswire/?prnewsid=201109191049PR_NEWS_USPR_____DA70717 EIN Presswire http://www.einpresswire.com/article/538866-register-her-com-launches-new-website EnergyVortex.com http://www.energyvortex.com/pages/index.cfm?pageid&prnewsid=201109191049PR_NEWS_USPR_____DA70717 European Business Express http://www.europeanbusinessexpress.com/prnewswire/?prnewsid=201109191049PR_NEWS_USPR_____DA70717 Finance Industry Today3,000 Visitors/day
*http://finance.einnews.com/pr-news/538866-register-her-com-launches-new-website FinanzNachrichten.de (ABC New Media AG) http://www.finanznachrichten.de/nachrichten-2011-09/21391744-register-her-com-launches-new-website-008.htm Foreclosures Evictions and You http://zingervotes.blogspot.com/p/news-landing-page.html?prnewsid=201109191049PR_NEWS_USPR_____DA70717 FOREX Trading News Today3,000 Visitors/day
*http://forex.einnews.com/pr-news/538866-register-her-com-launches-new-website Funky Brown Chick http://www.funkybrownchick.com/pr-newswire/?prnewsid=201109191049PR_NEWS_USPR_____DA70717 Global Investing Today3,000 Visitors/day
*http://investing.einnews.com/pr-news/538866-register-her-com-launches-new-website Globe Advisor https://secure.globeadvisor.com/servlet/ArticleNews/story/PRNEWS/20110919/DA70717 GlobeSt.com http://www.globest.com/prnewswire/story.html?prnewsid=201109191049PR_NEWS_USPR_____DA70717 Host Province http://www.hostprovince.com/?prnewsid=201109191049PR_NEWS_USPR_____DA70717 Houston Business Journal287,000 Visitors/day
*http://www.bizjournals.com/houston/prnewswire/press_releases/Georgia/2011/09/19/DA70717 Integra CS http://www.amayzon.ce.ms/prnewswire.html?prnewsid=201109191049PR_NEWS_USPR_____DA70717 Integra CS West http://www.aas.cz.cc/prnewswire.html?prnewsid=201109191049PR_NEWS_USPR_____DA70717 IT Industry Today3,000 Visitors/day *http://it.einnews.com/pr-news/538866-register-her-com-launches-new-website IT News Online http://www.itnewsonline.com/showprnstory.php?storyid=178953 ITnews http://www.itnews.it/news/2011/0919170003130/register-her-com-launches-new-website.html Jacksonville Business Journal287,000 Visitors/day

*http://www.bizjournals.com/jacksonville/prnewswire/press_releases/Georgia/2011/09/19/DA70717 KAIT ABC-8 (Jonesboro, AR)13,000 Visitors/day *http://www.kait8.com/story/15495627/register-hercom-launches-new-website KALB-TV CBS-2 / NBC-5 (Alexandria, LA) http://www.kalb.com/story/15495627/register-hercom-launches-new-website Kansas City Business Journal287,000 Visitors/day *http://www.bizjournals.com/kansascity/prnewswire/press_releases/Georgia/2011/09/19/DA70717 KATV-TV ABC-7 (Little Rock, AR)10,000 Visitors/day *http://www.katv.com/story/15495647/register-hercom-launches-new-website KAUZ-TV CBS-6 (Wichita Falls, TX) http://www.newschannel6now.com/story/15495647/register-hercom-launches-new-website KAZT IND-7 (Phoenix/Prescott, AZ) http://www.arizonasown.com/story/15495647/register-hercom-launches-new-website KBMT-TV ABC-12 (Beaumont, TX) http://www.12newsnow.com/story/15495647/register-hercom-launches-new-website KCAU ABC-9 (Sioux City, IA) http://www.kcautv.com/story/15495692/register-hercom-launches-new-website KCBA-TV FOX-35 (Salinas, CA) http://www.kcba.com/story/15495692/register-hercom-launches-new-website KCBD NBC-11 (Lubbock, TX)11,000 Visitors/day *http://www.kcbd.com/story/15495627/register-hercom-launches-new-website KCEN-TV NBC-9 (Temple, TX) http://www.centraltexasnow.com/story/15495692/register-hercom-launches-new-website KCOY CBS-12 (Santa Maria, CA) http://www.kcoy.com/story/15495647/register-hercom-launches-new-website KCTV-TV CBS-5 (Kansas City, MO)36,000 Visitors/day *http://www.kctv5.com/story/15495692/register-hercom-launches-new-website KDUH-TV ABC-3 (Scottsbluff, NE) http://www.kotanow.com/story/15495692/register-hercom-launches-new-website KEYC-TV CBS-12 / FOX-12 (Mankato, MN) http://www.keyc.tv/story/15495647/register-hercom-launches-new-website KFDA CBS-10 (Amarillo, TX)27,000 Visitors/day *http://www.newschannel10.com/story/15495627/register-hercom-launches-new-website KFJX-TV FOX-14 (Pittsburg, KS) http://www.fox14tv.com/story/15495627/register-hercom-launches-new-website KFMB 100.7 Jack-FM (San Diego, CA) http://www.sandiegojack.com/story/15495692/register-hercom-launches-new-website KFMB 760-AM (San Diego, CA) http://www.760kfmb.com/story/15495627/register-hercom-launches-new-website KFMB-TV CBS-8 (San Diego, CA)30,000 Visitors/day *http://www.cbs8.com/story/15495647/register-hercom-launches-new-website KFRE-TV CW-59 (Fresno, CA) http://www.kmph-kfre.com/story/15495692/register-hercom-launches-new-website KFVE MyNetworkTV-5 (Honolulu, HI) http://www.k5thehometeam.com/story/15495692/register-hercom-launches-new-website KFVS CBS-12 (Cape Girardeau, MO)21,000 Visitors/day *http://www.kfvs12.com/story/15495692/register-hercom-launches-new-website KGWN-TV CBS-5 (Fort Collins, CO) http://www.kgwn.tv/story/15495647/register-hercom-launches-new-website KHNL-TV NBC-8 (Honolulu, HI)22,000 Visitors/day *http://www.hawaiinewsnow.com/story/15495647/register-hercom-launches-new-website KHQ-TV NBC-6 (Spokane, WA)19,000 Visitors/day *http://www.khq.com/story/15495627/register-hercom-launches-new-website KIII-TV ABC-3 (Corpus Christi, TX) http://www.kiiitv.com/story/15495692/register-hercom-launches-new-website KING-TV NBC-5 (Seattle, WA) http://www.mediawebsite.net/king5/story/?catSetID=&catID=&nrid=130117418&page=1 KION CBS-46 (Salinas, CA)7,000 Visitors/day *http://www.kionrightnow.com/story/15495627/register-hercom-launches-new-website KKFX FOX-11 (Santa Maria, CA) http://www.myfox11.com/story/15495647/register-hercom-launches-new-website KLFY CBS-10 (Lafayette, LA)9,000 Visitors/day *http://www.klfy.com/story/15495627/register-hercom-launches-new-website KLKN ABC-8 (Lincoln, NE) http://www.klkntv.com/story/15495692/register-hercom-launches-new-website KLTV ABC-7 (Tyler, TX)22,000 Visitors/day *http://www.kltv.com/story/15495692/register-hercom-launches-new-website KMEG-TV CBS-14 (Sioux City, IA) http://www.kmeg.com/story/15495647/register-hercom-launches-new-website KMPH-

TV FOX-26 (Fresno, CA)2,000 Visitors/day *http://www.kmph.com/story/15495627/register-hercom-launches-new-website KNDO-TV NBC-3 (Yakima, WA) http://www.kndo.com/story/15495627/register-hercom-launches-new-website KNDU-TV NBC (Kennewick, WA) http://www.kndu.com/story/15495692/register-hercom-launches-new-website KNOE-TV CBS-8 (Monroe, LA) http://www.knoe.com/story/15495627/register-hercom-launches-new-website KOAM-TV CBS-7 (Pittsburg, KS) http://www.koamtv.com/story/15495647/register-hercom-launches-new-website KOLD CBS-13 (Tucson, AZ)15,000 Visitors/day *http://www.kold.com/story/15495647/register-hercom-launches-new-website KOTA ABC-3 (Rapid City, SD) http://www.kotatv.com/story/15495692/register-hercom-launches-new-website KOTV-TV CBS-6 (Tulsa, OK)48,000 Visitors/day *http://www.newson6.com/story/15495627/register-hercom-launches-new-website KPHO-TV CBS-5 (Phoenix, AZ)19,000 Visitors/day *http://www.kpho.com/story/15495692/register-hercom-launches-new-website KPLC NBC-7 (Lake Charles-Lafayette, LA)11,000 Visitors/day *http://www.kplctv.com/story/15495647/register-hercom-launches-new-website KPTH-TV FOX-44 (Dakota Dunes, SD) http://www.kpth.com/story/15495647/register-hercom-launches-new-website KPTM-TV FOX-42 (Omaha, NE) http://www.kptm.com/story/15495627/register-hercom-launches-new-website KPTV-TV FOX-12 (Beaverton, OR)45,000 Visitors/day *http://www.kptv.com/story/15495692/register-hercom-launches-new-website KQCW CW-12/19 (Tulsa, OK) http://www.tulsacw.com/story/15495647/register-hercom-launches-new-website KRHD-TV ABC-40 (Bryan-College Station, TX) http://www.abc40.com/story/15495647/register-hercom-launches-new-website KSFY-TV ABC-13 (Sioux Falls, SD) http://www.ksfy.com/story/15495627/register-hercom-launches-new-website KSLA CBS-12 (Shreveport, LA)16,000 Visitors/day *http://www.ksla.com/story/15495647/register-hercom-launches-new-website KSTC-TV IND-45 (Saint Paul, MN) http://lifestyle.kstc45.com/story/15495627/register-hercom-launches-new-website KSTP-TV ABC-5 (Saint Paul, MN)26,000 Visitors/day *http://lifestyle.kstp.com/story/15495692/register-hercom-launches-new-website KSWO-TV ABC-7 (Lawton, OK) http://www.kswo.com/story/15495647/register-hercom-launches-new-website KSWT-TV CBS-13 (Yuma, AZ) http://www.kswt.com/story/15495647/register-hercom-launches-new-website

KTEN NBC-10 (Denison, TX)

[/box]

Calling Hate Out

John Hembling (JtO) · 21 September 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Rape Culture.

This is a pretty common utterance of feminists, who due to pushback against their lies, can no longer get away with claiming all men are rapists. But it's the same message – the phrase "rape culture" and the implication that this culture is a rape oriented culture is the exact same claim.

But it's such obvious nonsense that much of the time sane human beings who aren't MRAs allow this disgusting hate fuelled agitprop to pass without immediate challenge. And that's the intention. When sane humans are told something that's obvious nonsense, they dismiss it because it doesn't need to be rebuked. Unfortunately, one of the funny things about people is that we don't have to agree with things in order to buy into them as elements of our reality. Repetition of a statement, even an obviously false statement such as "they hate us for our freedom," if continued for long enough is known to slide past the bullshit filter most sane people employ – and enter the the unshakable bedrock of their subconscious belief system.

Unfortunately – this is the trick being played on all of us whenever we hear that asinine phrase built to incite hatred and fear in women, and shame and compliance from men. But if we're paying attention – what becomes evident is that we're being trained, all of us, adults and children, men and women, to migrate our world view to one built on hate, and fear and shame.

That means, that if we want to chose our world, rather than being led like cattle into a violent, paranoid nightmare where we're all walled off from one another by barriers made of deliberately fabricated hate – we have to address and rebut the disguised hate propaganda when we hear it from its promulgators.

Here's where I have to step carefully. Ive just spent the last few minutes decrying a growing tendency to indulge in hate – and now Im going to have a go at the people promoting it.

According to the United States Department of Justice, Bureau of Justice Statistics – who track rates of offense among types of violent crime; For serious violent crime excluding murder, they identify rape and sexual assault, Robbery, and nonsexual assault, including simple assault and aggravated assault as the three main categories of offence.

In 2010 there were 2,400,000 simple assaults – 725,000 aggravated assaults. There were also 480,00 robberies. And bringing up the rear we have rape and sexual assaults which combined totalled 188,000 incidences of criminal victimization. Combined, rape and sexual assault occur in our society at the lowest rates of statistically tracked violent crime, 2.5 times lower then the next lowest category.

It took me longer to read that data to you than it took me to look it up using google.

Anyone uttering the phrase "rape culture" in a context other than to rebuke it, is therefore either hopelessly stupid, ignorant and lazy, or they are willfully and knowingly promoting a disgusting lie intended to promote fear , hatred and ultimately violence.

I don't like the idea of hate crime laws. I have always suspected that consideration of political or personal ideology in the sentencing or determination of guilt in the commission of a crime creates a system almost guaranteed to be abused by whoever can claim knowledge of motivation.

In fact –laws commonly thought of as hate-crime laws are those which criminalize motivation rather than criminal actions. And this is treads very close to Orwell's thought crime. However, having been on the receiving end of a great deal of rhetoric framed by ideologues with an intent to promote hatred and violence against men, I begin to see the temptation to strengthen "hate crime" as an element of our society's legal framework. An example of rhetoric intended to promote hatred and violence can be found on the Huffington post website, where Pauline Lowry quite openly advocates women murdering their husbands. I'm not making that up, although by the time you read this, some responsible adult over at huffpo might have realized that advocating murder reflects poorly on journalistic integrity and revised the article.

But surely, calling for the mass murder of a segment of the population qualifies as a hate crime – and should be prosecuted as such. Actually, no. We do not need to start prosecuting individuals for their thoughts. In fact, I would argue that this already happens, and we should oppose it, even in cases of male-targeting thought crime. However, public identification and outing of the rhetoric and ideology of hate movements – like what big box feminism has become; is wholly justified, and necessary.

It's necessary because an increasing fraction of the "sane" general public view reality through the perceptual lens supplied by big box feminism through mainstream media. Does anyone remember when feminism was the radical notion that women are people? The short answer being of course, no, because "women are people" has never been a radical notion.

Another notion which grew from the women-good – men-bad doctrine is sadly no longer radical. Namely that men are not people. The organized dehumanization of men is a real and escalating phenomena in our culture, which has an end point taking no predictive power to see.

One Million Moms to Castrate Ben & Jerry

Walter Romans (TDOM) · 22 September 2011 · Archived copy · Original

[dropcap]O[/dropcap]ne Million Moms, an offshoot of the American Family Association, has taken offence to Ben & Jerry's Schweddy Ball's and wants them removed… permanently. Why? Good question. It's not like Schweddy Balls are actually sweaty testicles or any such thing. In fact they have absolutely nothing to do with the male sexual anatomy.

They're named after a vastly popular skit performed back in the 90s on Saturday Night Live featuring Alec Baldwin cast as the character named Pete Schweddy, a character who sold balls; all kinds of balls, popcorn balls, cheese balls, chocolate rum balls, malted milk balls, all kinds of balls for all kinds of tastes. So aside from the obvious pun, and the dirty minds of One Million Moms, there's absolutely no reason to associate a brand of ice cream brand made with chocolate rum balls and malted milk balls with the male genitalia or to insist that Ben & Jerry cut off the production of their Schweddy Balls.

But that's entirely the point.

These women are offended by the male genitalia. It's an outgrowth of the feminist condemnation of male sexuality. Any public mention of anything that might remotely remind us that men are sexual beings and have parts of their anatomy that are different from those of women must be banned. I'd suggest that these women be sentenced to attend the Testicle Festival and be force fed a batch of chicken fries followed by a Rocky Mountain oyster or two. Then perhaps, tongue fondling a few dozen Schweddy Balls won't be quite so offensive.

Besides, I haven't heard of them demanding chicken eggs or caviar be taken off the market. In fact, I'll bet each and every one of them has fed dozens of those female reproductive cells to her children and enjoys eating them herself. In fact, it's so normal for us to consume female reproductive cells that we never bother to think of them as such. But just one mention of a delicious treat that even remotely reminds of manhood is so repulsive and disgusting that we must demand it be taken off the market in order to protect our children. But one thing's for certain, if just one of these million moms were to consume some of these Schweddy Balls, I'll bet she'd swallow; and quite happily, because of course, "No one can resist my Schweddy Balls" ~ Pete Schweddy (played by Alec Baldwin).

[box type="alert" icon="none"]Daily Caller: Parents group boycotting Ben & Jerry's Schweddy Balls[/box]

The Holy Grail of Equality

John Hembling (JtO) · 22 September 2011 · Archived copy · Original

[dropcap]O[/dropcap]ne of the credos of modern gender theory is the concept, presented as a political goal, going by the flexible label: “equality.” It presents an admirable goal – shouldn’t we all want equality of rights in an ethical society? Yes, but that is distinct from the goal of what we now call simply “equality”.

Those promoting equality often claim it means “equality of legal rights,” but this is incorrect, and the error is evident. When we are told women’s legal rights must be protected to place them on equal footing with men, we construe two possible meanings. The first interpretation is that women are now legally disadvantaged in western culture. This idea dissolves when examined.

[unordered_list style=”green-dot”]

- In western criminal trials, women found culpable of violent crimes are commonly excused by a collective fabrication of excuses[1][2], and sentenced more lightly than men[3] for the same offenses.

[/unordered_list]

[unordered_list style=”green-dot”]

- Western family courts operate as a wealth extraction mechanism benefitting women and the courts – which participate[4][5] in moneys appropriated from divorcee men. In North America, [6]roughly 80% of custodial mothers receive a support award compared to 30% of custodial fathers.

[/unordered_list]

[unordered_list style=”green-dot”]

- Universities continue to maintain female favouring affirmative action programs, in the face of higher female enrolment and graduation rates[7].

[/unordered_list]

The second interpretation of the call for continued bolstering of female-centric legal protections is that actual equivalence between men and women is either possible, or desirable. This is the dirty secret behind the ambiguously phrased calls for “equality.”

The problem begins with the pretence within a feminist-dominated academic community of the social construction of sex. This is often couched in pseudo-scientific jargon to avoid immediate dismissal in critical discussion. Culture and education clearly have impact on social and sexual roles. The claim by some academics of no biological basis for sexuality ignores the body of professional literature in the fields of psychology, biology, neurology and cognitive science.

Observation that sexually differentiated roles exist in nature should logically diminish the case for social construction. Oddly, this has not stopped ideologues from pursuing social policies along lines of literal equivalence of sexes. The belief that biological differences between men and women don’t inform cognitive, psychological and behavioural differences. Rather, it is all learned behavior. This new orthodoxy is the basis for continued efforts to mandate equality of outcomes in employment and education in spite of biological differences, and choices made by men and women.

The consequent quashing of individuality and choice would not be entertained in a context outside the social science pretence that sex is a learned construct. But on this foundation, legislated levelling of natural sexual differences becomes a plausible and ethical possibility. The psychological differences in men from women are seen as pathological rather than natural.

This idea provides the rationale used in some elementary school environments for medicating young boys whose natural exuberance and competitive behavior is treated as a disorder – molding them by medication into a more docile behavior model.

An concept of social construction of sex is also used to classify some normal behaviours outside a narrow range as deviant. The marginalization of behavior previously considered healthy goes farther than what is specific to sexual identity[8].

By treating sexuality as a purely learned behavior, or a product of education – we open the door to treating any aspect of human identity as purely learned. This justifies some gender academics to characterize non-conforming philosophical points of view as errant, or pathological. If you don't agree, you're clearly sick, or criminal, and subject to re-training.

This utility of a seemly incomplete viewpoint can explain the continued currency of social construction in scholarly writing. It gives it's adherents a licence to abrogate some rights of self determination for those disputing the tenets of gender feminist philosophy.

Fortunately, practitioners of actual sciences such as biology provide a bulwark against the pseudo-science of constructed gender ideology. Science ceases to work if scientists indulge themselves in nonviable hypotheses.

[quote float="right"]If you don't agree, you're clearly sick, or criminal, and subject to re-training.[/quote] Another barrier to pure social constructionism is the existence of individuals who suffer from sexual dysphoria. This is the condition a small percent of humans suffer from when their sexual self-image does not correspond to their physical selves. Not to be confused with homosexuality, an individual whose internal sexual identity doesn't align with their body is not troubled by sexual attraction to members of the same sex, rather, they are troubled by their personal sexual identity failing to match what is externally manifested in their body. While unusual, the problem is common enough to be understood within the medical community.

The existence of individuals who suffer from sexual dislocation – sometimes labeled transexuals – is a continued vexation to gender feminists, because by existing, they disprove the hypothesis of sex's social construction.

The public refutation of the academic clinging to of social construction is, unfortunately, not enough. Some academics and activists have demonstrated a will to suppress data, and to persistently repeat known myths in the advancement of political goals. A widespread public rejection of the doctrine of sexual equivalence will likely cause ideologues to modify only their language, and not the underlying quashing of human rights.

In legitimate academic debate, evidentiary rebuttal of a theory requires the modification or abandonment of the theory. That repeated factual refutations of the dogma of gender equivalence result in no substantive change to these articles of faith suggests a shortage of intellectual consistency. Although some academics couch their language in scientific jargon, the ideology of gender radicals is essentially religious.

[1] http://www.f4e.com.au/blog/2011/04/12/another-women-walks-free-after-killing-her-husband/
[2] http://www.nationalpost.com/news/canada/case+fuels+debate+over+domestic+violence/4051267/story.html
[3] http://digitalcommons.utep.edu/gang_lee/2/
[4] http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=oJjgOjq5uso
[5] http://www.achildsright.typepad.com/achildsright/titleivd.html
[6] http://deltabravo.net/custody/stats.php
[7] http://www.jhu.edu/registr/reports/retention06.htm
[8] http://jonathanturley.org/2011/01/13/cut-the-line-do-the-time-texas-schools-increasingly-using-criminal-citations-against-unruly-children/

Debby does diminished sentence for child rape

John Hembling (JtO) · 23 September 2011 · Archived copy · Original

And if you need another reason to be angry...

Debra Jean Beasley, also known as Debrah Lefave, is the child rapist who pled guilty in 2005 to charges of statutory rape for her sexual involvement with a 14 year old student.

Guidelines for sentencing sexual offenders in cases similar to Lafave's indicate sentences of jail terms of up to 30 years. Lefave avoided 30 years in prison through plea bargaining, including a condition of her reduced sentence that the 7 year period of probation and house curfew could not be ended early.

And now it has been ended 4 years early. Hillborough circuit judge Wayne S Timmerman granted Lafave's request of additional reduction of her sentence on the grounds that she had blonde hair, blue eyes and a nice figure. According to Judge Timmerman, "she has successfully fulfilled her house arrest and the majority of her time on probation."

Judge Timmerman did not add that the word majority means "more than half of," and also did not note that lafave's completion of 3 years of her 7 year probation is more than half of, because Timmerman apparently cannot perform simple arithmetic, especially when ogling a hot felon. Officers of the court also did not say that the phrase " she has successfully fulfilled her house arrest," is false – because less than half of her plea bargain reduced sentence of 7 years was completed. "Debby does diminished sentences for sexy sex offense," was also not the headline of any media outlet reporting on this story.

According to a relative of Lefave's Victim, who is now 21 years old, he has had his life devastated, and has undergone psychiatric treatment attempting to deal with the fallout of his rape. In 2009, Judge Timmerman also ruled that Lafave could again have unsupervised contact with children.

The rapist's lawyer stated that by serving less than half of the plea-bargain reduced term of house arrest and probation; she's paid a terrible price and now wants to move on with her life.

http://register-her.com/index.php?title=Debra_Lafave_–_Rapist

A lecture from Larry the MRA guy, on anger

Paul Elam · 23 September 2011 · Archived copy · Original

I get lots of advice on the right way to do activism; almost always from people not doing any. Some of my favorites are the ones that come from MRA's that appear to have more issues with MRA's than they do with feminists. I got one such email this very evening. I thought perhaps by posting that here, along with my response, that it would help me in the future. From now on I can simply return those emails with a link to this post, as I am doing now with Larry.

And now for the message from MRA Larry.

[box type="note" icon="none"]I love this – the face for the anti-feminist movement is an angry white man who talks like an ex-drill Sergent and preaches hate toward women! How is this working for you? Oh, and the mission statement of "don't get fucked", that should rally some more angry supporters. After all, the world needs more hatred right! Hate hate hate – hate you, hate them, hate everyone! Hate hate hate! Anger! Violence! This is the way to restore peace. Reminds of the war on drugs! Or the war on crime! Both are absolute jokes! Wage war – that'll fix it!

I don't disagree with you that feminism is terrible – but I completely disagree with your approach – it's atrocious! It won't change anything and will actually make things far worse. You really need to understand that what you fight you strengthen and what you resist persist. This is the laws of the universe. Your message is going to be lost in it's delivery.

I'm on the same journey – but I'm taking a very different approach. The war mentality, along with anger and hatred – they are dead. They leave a trail of broken lives – how is that any better than how it is today?

But you won't understand my point because your ego won't let you. It's blind with anger and you probably don't understand how unconscious you actually are. You think your conscious, but your not. Your ego is driving your whole show – it's in complete control of you. You don't even realize it because the ego is actually not very smart. You see, you are actually a pawn for the feminist movement – you're what gives them the ability to say" see what we man – this is what we're talking about."

Nice website – layout is good and the logo is cool. Has potential to actually do something positive…if it wasn't filled with hate and war.

What you fight you strengthen and what you resist persist.[/box]

Hi Larry,

How is it working for me? Well, first of all it's "us," not "me." There are lots of voices here, and despite your racist and sexist launch not all of them are white or male. Now that this has been clarified for you, let's look at your "points."

This website, another by a man with an "angry" moniker, and an expanding number of others have done more to inject dialogue about men's issues into the mainstream than anything before them. We are growing rapidly and there is a reason for that. It's because anyone who possesses even a modicum of understanding of history knows that no social movement has ever made any progress without at some point being driven by the anger of disaffected people and those that sympathize, empathize, with their struggle. That means the sympathizers are angry, too.

How about blacks in this country? Were they being hateful when taking to the streets and even being sometimes explosive in their protests? Or is that just what we should have expected after a history of subjugation and being marginalized?

Even feminism, which is a social movement, albeit a corrupt one, was and is driven almost entirely on anger. Their anger was not legitimate, but it did give them momentum. Do you think otherwise? Do you know of any movement to seek justice that was not fueled by the shared anger of those previously denied?

Are you even capable of the intellectual honesty to answer these questions? Are you so obtuse as to conflate anger with hate, outrage with bigotry, unfettered honesty with misogyny?

You say you agree that feminism is terrible. And you speak in a way that at least attempts to represent yourself as someone who understands the problem. If you understand that problem fully, then you understand that men are dying, Larry, by their own hands and the hands of others, and that the culprits operate with impunity. You know that there are men languishing in prisons; men having their children, property, freedom and future assets unjustly stripped away from them, because of this problem.

If you understand the problem you know that the future for our sons is being robbed through an education system that begins assaulting the core of their identity, with drugs and denigration, from the first day of school – and that now, by the time they reach college age, most of them have been drummed out of an academic future altogether. And you know this is a problem that is getting worse.

If you are aware of the problem, then you also see people like Hannah Rosin enjoying widespread support for publicly gloating on the destruction of half the human species, promoting more of it, and you know that support is reflective of a deeply seated bigotry against men and boys that will not succumb to reason or decency.

But you are clearly not aware of anything, Larry, save your own sense of omniscience. I have some news for you. Despite the myopic nonsense strewn throughout your intended lecturing of me, this is a war. It is not one that men asked for or wanted. In fact, it has taken half a century to see signs that men are actually starting to fight back. And as anyone present in this cause for any times knows, it has always been the lack of fighting back that has kept us defenseless. Men like you would further that defenselessness.

Your inability to see the war, and your failure to be angered by it, is only a reflection of a lack of compassion and empathy for the casualties; proof that you are ultimately as steeped in the current cultural misandry as any feminist ideologue.

Larry, you are supposed to be angry at the outrages of injustice and cancerous bigotry that has spread though the collective consciousness. The fact that you are not makes you as helpful to the men's movement as dung on a dinner plate.

And you are now coming to me with a condescending tongue because I have the decency to be angry? You dump platitudes at my feet like some sort of pop-psych guru-philosopher, intending to infer some sort of superior wisdom in doing so? You condescend to all of us about telling men who are getting fucked that there are ways to prevent it? And finally, you, in the almost unspeakable depths of stupidity tell me that I am a feminist pawn because I don't subscribe to your milquetoast idea that the way to approach activism is to live in emotional denial of why you were driven to be an activist to begin with; and to shame other men out of expressing that anger.

I said you were of no use to the MRM. I take that back. You are of significant use. You are the example of what not to be, and your less than artfully crafted words are now on display as an example to a good many men and women who know better than this capitulating nonsense, but don't mind the occasional reminder.

Sex, Consent, and Accountability

John Hembling (JtO) · 24 September 2011 · Archived copy · Original

[dropcap]P[/dropcap]roponents of “rape culture” dogma are fond of the claim that sexual consent does not exist when a woman voluntarily participates in sex after becoming drunk. The idea as presented is that a woman is incapable of informed consent once she consumes alcohol. A man who has sex with a woman who’s consumed alcohol has – some feminists will claim – commited rape.

This leads to the question; at what blood alcohol level does a woman lose the ability to consent to sex?

♦

This is a serious question. Serious enough that men who ignore it may find themselves defending against a rape accusation. Whether a man selected for this public vivisection is able to mount an adequate legal defence or not, he will be destroyed. The accusation of rape is special in criminal law because based only on accusation, the family, career, life, reputation, friendships of a man so accused is destroyed.

So we return to the question, at what blood alcohol level does a woman lose the ability to consent to sex? No answer is offered by the ideologues who beat the rape culture drum. In fact – the question itself, provoking as it is of critical thinking is sufficient to get the asker banned from any feminist forum it’s asked on.

This question leads us to others. For example: If a woman, after some as-yet unknown quantity of ethanol ceases to be a self determined adult and reverts to a volition-free ward of the state, then surely, a man 4 beers in is equally no longer a willing or enthusiastic participant to sex, but himself a rape victim as well.

This would be a logical parallel. The reason the question of blood alcohol content comes up is that operating a motor vehicle is also an act of personal volition, which when done under the influence of alcohol, is a criminal offense by the drunk driver. Interestingly, an inebriated driver is equally culpable whether they are male or female.

So when drunk, choosing to drive a car is a crime, alcohol does not eliminate personal accountability. However, when drunk – a woman is not responsible for her choice to participate in sex, and according to some ideologues, cannot even render informed consent.

The logical parallel to this would be that men who participate in sex after 3 or 4 beers are also victims of rape. We can ignore for the moment the absurd dogma that men cannot be raped. One of the dirty secrets of the prison systems is that inmate rape occurs at a rate which doubles the rate of rape against women outside of prisons. How many men are raped in civilian life is unknown, since nobody with access to research funding cares enough to find out, but it’s more than zero.

Returning to the issue of sex, consent and accountability – why, if a drunk driver is criminally accountable for their own decision to consume alcohol then drive, is an otherwise adult human being the reverse of accountable when the choice concerns sex, rather than driving a car?

This standard is logically inconsistent. Some people might argue that criminal accountability exists in both cases and therefore, no inconsistency exists. However, an adult women unable to consent to sex due to inebriation was an adult until she made the informed choice to consume alcohol. Some proponents of “patriarchy theory” will claim that women are so dominated by men that even in sobriety they are manipulated and pressured into consumption of alcohol – which then eliminates the possibility of informed consent, but if that’s the case – women should be regarded legally as children without personal volition. Children, who it is inhumane to burden with adult responsibility such as voting, owning property, or holding anything as serious as a recreational fishing licence.

I don’t actually think women are so divorced from personal volition, or that they should be considered legal children and denied the powers of enfranchised adulthood. Not based solely on their sex, at least.

But if alcoholic intoxication does in fact render an adult woman incapable of the informed consent necessary for sex without it being rape, then we still do have a significant problem. As currently constituted, western laws do not adequately address this problem, and a change is necessary. Women who consent to sex while drunk must be arrested and charged with a crime.

Some questions on strategy

Paul Elam · 25 September 2011 · Archived copy · Original

[dropcap]I[/dropcap] just posted a fucking article from Manuel motherfucking Dexter that addresses the tone and scope of the cock sucking language in MRM articles, and their ultimate impact on shit-eating mainstream mangina consciousness. This is largely due to the fact that the god damned material on MRM websites is increasingly being used as a teaching aide to help mainstream writers, particularly some of the gynocentric cunts, bitches, feminist fucking whores and piece of shit manginas, cut through their own stupid, fucked-up ignorance and actually start forming refutations of misandry in modern culture, despite what dumb fucking assholes they are.

Language is a tool. So is creative language, when it is creative. "Bad" language is a tool of a different kind. Used effectively, thoughtfully, it is a spice that adds flavour and impact to particular ideas, or to draw attention. Used without discretion, or as a way to vent instead of a way to communicate, it is a toxin that undermines the very points a writer is trying to make.

But best not to dwell on that for now (though I am going to return to it), because the article by Dexter (do you remember that as clearly as the cock suckers and motherfuckers?) was not just a simple critique of language and style, and neither is this follow up.

It is, rather, a needed first step toward a dialog about whether we shape the content on AVfM consciously, to further a mission, or whether we will complacently devolve into a platform for venting and/or a pillar for the whatever-the-fuck-I-want-to-say-damned-the-effectiveness-of-the-message crowd.

I am sure that last sentence might cause alarm in some, and of course you are welcome to be alarmed, but I don't think it is warranted.

Allow me to give you a scary little peek at the inside of my mind, and what I have always envisioned as "the plan" for AVfM from the time I started it. And remember, I hold the personal record for using the fucking f-word on this site, so hear me out.

The AVfM concept started in earnest some years back with me, still aspiring to use the internet as an MRA platform after a badly failed attempt ten years earlier. I was reading Angry Harry and thinking, "man, this guy is a genius." He totally understands men's issues, feminism and very importantly, the potential of the internet. I thought, "When I grow up I want to be just like Harry, but being from Texas I can be meaner and much more vulgar."

Actually, I didn't think that last part consciously, at least not the part about Texas. We're a refined, cosmopolitan bunch round here. ?

But anyway, what I was thinking then was that there was still something missing from the online MRM; collective, focused and intense outrage. I don't mean simply the indignation of people offended by bad thinking and stupid ideas, but angry people, so angry in fact that if you were with them in real life that you'd be hard pressed to do anything but let them talk. They'd be that scary.

There was anger aplenty online, but most of it was undirected, poorly articulated and sometimes puerile. Subsequently a lot of the message fell (and still falls) through the cracks, going largely ignored. It was precisely at the time I connected these dots that I knew that to further the mission to make my work and the future AVfM stand out I had to make "Fuck You" a bit of an art form. I had to say it loud and often and in aggressive tones, but that I also had to back it up with impeccable logic that would lead most reasonable people (all of .5% of the western world) to decide that the "fuck you," was warranted and indeed a bit of an understatement.

The value of all this is simple. A cogent position that is gaining traction and involves a "fuck you," will get noticed. And as we were, even as recently as the initial launch of AVfM, still barely a blip on the radar screen, worries about containment, blow back and losing fence sitters were put on the back burner.

Things are not the same as they were when AVfM started. That does not mean we are jumping headlong into change, but it does mean that our awareness of that is critical.

[image]

Thanks to the already well-established work of Harry, AVfM and other sites like The-Spearhead and In Mala Fide, we are in fact, seeing the worm start to turn where it concerns the open discussion of men's rights issues.

We have all been seeing more and more of it in recent times, from the Wall Street Journal to New York Times and even to places like Salon.com, the voices against misandry are rising. There has even been a recent article published from Yale challenging the existence of rape culture, and calling it out for the PC hokum that it is.

This sharp uptick in mainstream coverage of misandry is not accidental. They are reading our sites, our literature, and opening their eyes a bit, as well as getting valuable lessons on how to present arguments against misandric ideals.

We have seen it in other areas as well. Most women's studies programs have changed their names to gender studies in an effort to conceal the fact that they are female centric. Many, many domestic abuse programs have adopted gender neutral language to justify their services, even though they operate the same way they always have.

Even feminists online have shifted down to more gender neutral language on their websites and have toned down the DIRECTLY anti-male rhetoric.

Simply put, all of them have gone into a type of intellectual hiding. They are covering their misandry in a cloak of phony gender inclusiveness, because the standard, overt line of man-bad – woman-good is experiencing rapidly decreasing popularity.

Why? Because of you! Yes, I totally believe it. The online men's movement has caused a significant shift in how feminists operate. They are learning that they can't get away with the same blatancy, even if they can still get away with their misandry under a different guise.

That is the impact that we are having, as predicted, promised and delivered by Harry himself. We are filtering up and as a result of that it will mean even more expansion for us. And a lot of this has happened because we drew attention to our work with an outrage the world was not used to seeing.

But those of you who cursed enough to have had a college intro course on economics will be familiar with the law of diminishing returns. It's a loose association, perhaps, but I think it's applicable here. Just because we have gotten to this point on one method does not mean that it is guaranteed to serve us well into the future. In fact, diminishing returns assures us that we will need to adapt and improvise.

The feminists have had to shift strategy to survive, and it is unavoidable that we will have to begin to make adjustments ourselves. When, not if.

Does this mean that we will ban "bad" language? No. Does it mean that we will start censoring articles here, or turning them down because they are too harsh. No.

In fact, I hope the articles are harsher than before. More direct; more in-your-face, in many ways, but hopefully written with the big picture in mind.

This is a time, however, when we need to start asking questions, and answering them as well. For instance, one of the ambitions I have for this website is to continue, with the hard work provided by Bob O'Hara, to grow a legitimate and respectable news department, so that we can get listed with the Google News Index. It's a move, that if successful, that would likely double our traffic all on its own. And it would greatly increase our influence on the mainstream media.

But of course, if every third sentence on this site has the word "fuck" in it, we are sunk before we start. So we have to question, and the way we do it here is openly: What is in the best interest of our mission?

It is the same question with comments, which I am pledged to manage in the same way I always have. What is in our best interest?

Suppose we run a piece by TDOM, and it goes viral. It would not be the first time. His piece “Legal Insanity” was hit 12,000 times in the first 24 hours it was online, and resulted in a brief shutdown because the site ran over its percentage of CPU limit with that hosting company.

It was a brilliant piece, full of disturbing, uncensored realities; very much in-your-face material. Now imagine that the first comment posted to it was “Great work TDOM! Yeah, fuck all those fucking cunts!”

Thankfully that did not happen, but it could have given some of the comments that end up here. And if we are going to value the mission we have to at least question the potential impact of all this. How do we regard someone who read that article and was stirred by all the injustices it exposed, and then looked at the comment and decided that it was a bad problem and we were the wrong people to be addressing it.

Screw ‘em and don’t look back? Reconsider the comment? What? These are the questions that I put to you, expecting that your take on it will be supported by the same articulate reasoning you give to everything else you offer at this site. We do need to ask these question, and we need to aspire to answering them.

And that is what we are doing, with your participation. Keep heart, we won’t be censoring articles or comments that don’t violate TOS. And we won’t need to.

I am a big fan of the idea that we are the ones that shape our culture. The vast majority of men and women who come to comment on this site are above average in intelligence and insight. I think, at the risk of being called naïve, that we can actually shape the culture here without a bullwhip or a ban hammer; that we can count on your intelligence instead of insulting it.

There will be more articles on this in the future. It is an ongoing conversation we are going to have with activists that frequent the comments well into the future. We are not in a panic to come to conclusion, but we are opening up the doors to the process of our own evolution.

In the end, you have my personal word. AVfM will be kicking ass in the days to come more than we ever have in the past. We may or may not do it differently than expected, but those asses will be just as bruised.

Winning the war of words

John Hembling (JtO) · 25 September 2011 · Archived copy · Original

[dropcap]A[/dropcap] few months ago, I posted an article on AVfM talking about the use of language within the MRM. In particular I mentioned my own preference in avoiding use of the word mangina. My stated reason was that the word – appropriately insulting to collaborating male feminists – lacked in explanatory power to members of the general public.

Another reason I left unstated was beyond addressing an audience of informed men's rights activist readers, the writing on this site has an unceasingly broad audience of the undecided public. In addition to providing A Voice For Men who've realized they're effectively silenced and ignored in most other public venues – this site has the goal of illuminating the phenomena of male dispossession in an increasingly misandric culture.

One of the measures of our success is the appearance of mainstream writing which lifts content and ideas directly from articles on this site and others. When MRM writing appears in places like the washington post, huffpo, and the times online – we're winning.

This returns us to language, and the impact of how we use it. A great example of how to alienate an undecided audience was provided by our dear comrades over at feministing dot com. In an August 25 article called "Fear Factor: Mansplaining edition," Chloe Angyal used the term in apparent ignorance of how revealing it is. "Mansplaining" for those recently arrived on the planet is a term employed by feminists to belittle and deride any argument fielded from a male perspective. An explanation is something to consider, reject, or understand. However, by employing the comical and derisive term "mansplain" – any argument can be dismissed without consideration.

Lets assume person A and Person B are debating two different theories of economics.

Person A presents their case and lays out the logic. Person B then presents an alternative argument, laying out a logical path to their own theory. It happens that person B is black, or African-American, or whatever politically correct term you like. Their surplus of melanin has no impact on the argument presented by person B – and in fact, they may have presented a stronger argument in this debate. Person A responds to the argument of person B by ignoring the details and denouncing the entire train of logic with the comical characterization "nigger-splaining". The audience laughs, person B's argument is not considered.

This is nothing new from big feminism, but the term shines a bright light on the hatred and sexism underlying an ideology claiming to pursue "equality."I'll thank the editors of feministing for so neatly outing themselves, and for the salutary lesson to writers and activists actually pursuing human rights.

With respect to my esteemed philosophical opponents, it could be that your purpose is to serve as a warning to others, and that is a noble purpose. However, as a contributor and writer on a MRM-themed site, I have to assume an audience sufficiently astute that bludgeoning readers with hyperbole, distilled hatred and obvious sexism would be counter-productive in presenting my views. When building arguments based on truth, and with a broadening audience, one of the goals of my writing is to encourage borrowing of content by mainstream channels. In pursuit of this, I'll be developing what Fidelbogen has recently and beautifully described as rhetorical discipline.

This does not mean I will be softening my stated position. In fact, I'll offer none of the concession to sensibilities of the wacky-cheese-fries eating public accommodated in previous content on this site.

The increasingly diverse audience of MRM writing on AVfM and elsewhere signals a change in the landscape. The issues addressed in men's movement writing are increasingly adopted by writers for major media outlets, and this presents an opportunity which will be missed if we don't shape our rhetoric to a wider audience. That means, my brothers – I will be sharpening my pen – and I encourage you to do so also.

Fritzlesque crime punished by fine and time served

Robert O'Hara · 25 September 2011 · Archived copy · Original

[box]

Franklin County, Illinois (AVfM).

On Monday of last week Shannon Wilfong, 32, of Franklin County, Illinois pleaded guilty in Franklin County court to five misdemeanors, including obstructing a peace officer. Wilfong was sentenced to $1,500 in fines and 30 days in jail — a judge credited her with time she already has served — on that count and fines of $100 on each of four counts of unlawful interference with child visitation.

She had forced her now nine year old son, Richard, to live in a crawl space 5' high and 12' long and allowed him minimal time outside of the space – only when visitors were not present. He was deprived of natural sunlight and medical attention, school, friends and his father.

Wilfong's motivation for the crime was the fear of losing her son in a custody dispute with the boy's father, 52 year old Michael Chekevdia. Interestingly, the plea deals came with the blessings of Chekevdia who said that he had strongly suspected that Wilfong was hiding the boy in her mother's house which police raided in September 2009. Wilfong had accused Chekevdia, a former boyfriend and Iraqi war veteran, of being abusive to his son during a custody dispute that took place after she was arrested. In February of last year circuit court Judge Melissa Drew rejected her claims and granted custody to the father under the condition that the court would maintain oversight of the child.

Wilfong had, in fact, tried to exclude Chekevdia from his son's life almost since his birth. She repeatedly accused the father of molesting his son and tried to get social services to take action citing a bazaar reference to a photo of Richard eating popcorn out of a metal bowl in which, it was claimed, the reflection of an erect penis belonging to the person taking the photograph was visible-presumably that of Mr. Chekevdia. Investigators eventually rejected all of her claims and it was then that she abducted her son and placed him in hiding.

"We let him out of the (patrol) car and he ran around like he'd never seen outdoors. It was actually very sad," The Mail Online quotes Illinois State Police Master Sgt Stan Diggs. "He was very happy to be outside. He said he never goes outside. Surprisingly, Ricky is in very good spirits. For someone who's been isolated in that house with no other outside beings, he's a very social, very polite, very talkative little boy."

Wilfong's sentence is roughly what an individual would receive in most U.S. states for a first time marijuana possession charge.

Sources:

http://www.dailymail.co.uk/news/article-2039963/Mother-kept-son-secret-room-size-washing-machine-years-claiming-missing.html

http://www.cbsnews.com/stories/2011/09/20/ap/business/main20109004.shtml

http://www.disclosurenewsonline.com/2011/09/20/case-against-shannon-wilfong-settled/

[/box]

Dr. T on taking the plunge – Shrink4Men Radio

Paul Elam · 26 September 2011 · Archived copy · Original

[box type="download" icon="none"]

Considering saying, "I do?" Before you get ready to walk down the aisle, maybe you should take a minute to consider saying, "I don't." Connubial bliss can be . . . blissful. But it can also be a surefire way for a man to lose everything he holds dear — his children, his home, his assets, his friends, his family, his career, his retirement and his sanity.

Tune in to Shrink4Men Radion on the AVoiceforMen BlogTalkRadio channel on Monday, September 26, 2011 at 9pm EST when Dr Tara J. Palmatier of Shrink4Men.com will discuss what every man should know before he gets married, including divorce and custody statistics and a growing movement called Men Going Their Own Way (MGTOW). If you have questions or would like to share what you wish you'd known before heading down the aisle with Dr T, telephone lines will be open (+1 310 388 9709.)

[/box]

Feminists: the cause of 9/11

JinnBottle · 26 September 2011 · Archived copy · Original

YOU CAN'T KEEP A GOOD MAN GOOD – OR A MONSTER CAGED

[box type="note" icon="none"]

To the Femainstream Femedia:

This just in over, or rather under, the wire:

"Feminists, in fact, did cause 9/11."

[/box]

If, in the face of that blasphemy, you react by snarling vulgarities at this screen; or desperately checking to see if this site could feasibly be reported somewhere for "hate speech," or, without so much as finishing this article, switch to a New File on your WP to begin a withering reply – comparing the author to Jerry Falwell, or MRAs to Norman Bates – a piece you know will be all the femnom that's fit to print in any big city newspaper – if you react anything like along these lines, I say to you:

That* is how Feminists caused 9/11.

Because, instead of asking "That's a provocative assertion, sir – how, exactly do you come to that?" you in the femmedia automatically go into Pravda mode, making sure that such challenges remain forever out of the popular media on which you hold a stranglehold. Because, for years, long after they were far outnumbered by writers and media males who had cowered and converted under your New Girl Order, truly civilized gentlemen like Howard S. Schwartz and Warren Farrell, and ladies truly deserving of the name intelligentsia like Christina Hoff Sommers, Katherine Parker and Daphne Patai, magnanimously and with remarkable restraint, invited you to "vigorous public debate," over their critique of you.

You chose to respond rather with more suppression, and where you absolutely couldn't suppress, to reply with cheap provocations and ad hominem attacks. Where men of genius like A. Justin Sterling and John Grey offered you real empowerment as women, a real understanding of men, and relationships that might actually work, you chose to mock, and insult – and suppress and suppress, and keep on suppressin', right on down the line. While your own irrationality and propaganda went on blasting, a million times a day, through a hundred thousand organs of media in the Western world.

Many feminists claim to appreciate Carl Jung (certainly over his chauvinist-pig mentor – and, as it happens, one of the handful of true geniuses in history – Sigmund Freud). Do you recall, then, how Jung said, over and over, that that which is not allowed conscious, rational and civilized outlet will, slowly but surely, devolve into the puerile, then the infantile – and finally, the bestial?

And that sooner or later that human-animal monster will break out. In mythic proportions.

Refusing, scorning, mocking, despoiling, jailing, exiling the positive power and magnanimous expressions of Western men and masculinity, you – and the immediate victims, and the rest of America along with you – had to endure, on that nightmare-at-midmorning on 9/11/2001, the brutal force of a fundamentalist, atavistic fanatical power whose idea of God is as masculo-centric as to make Jerry Falwell look like Gloria Steinem – hurled phallic jets into what – doubtless in its terrorist cells – calls the Tower of the Whore of Babylon.

Submission Rules and Guidelines for AVFM News

Robert O'Hara · 27 September 2011 · Archived copy · Original

[box type="note" icon="none"]

AVFM News is currently seeking to build a world class news service in order to provide a useful and informative source of news for people interested in Men's Rights issues.

The following guidelines have been implemented in order to cover, adequately and competently, issues that other news outlets do not provide. AVFM News encourages all readers to seek out and share news stories with other readers and the men's rights community in general.

[unordered_list style="green-dot"]

- All submissions to AVFM news are subject to approval and editing from AVFM staff.
- Articles must be grammatically and factually correct for consideration.
- Strong language and/or editorializing is prohibited in all news articles as well as personal attacks on all persons whether or not they are public figures.
- No less than two sources, preferably three, should be cited in the articles as an appendage or as a hyperlink in the text.
- Sources must also be quoted in the text.
- Articles should focus on men's rights issues, broadly defined, and not be a reflection of the writers personal or religious beliefs.
- Article titles should be no more than eight words long with the capitalization of proper nouns.
- Excerpts will be featured beneath the title on the home page and should be considered for how much they attract readers to the material.
- Brevity should be the goal of every general news story in order to facilitate reader interest and for their convenience.
- However, investigative reports and informative articles that are more than ten paragraphs long are welcome as long as the content is pertinent, informative and interesting.

[/unordered_list]

Of course, solid references and factuality are mandatory in investigative reports. You may submit an article directly via email to AVFM news at vfm_news@yahoo.com.

Regular contributors will be given administrative access to post at will only after they have proven that they can consistently provide well written and informative news articles that follow submission guidelines, as well as demonstrating awareness of the presentation of opinion articles that also reside on the site. Personal confidentiality and maturity will be important factors as well in the decision to grant administrative access. Instructions for posting in an administrative capacity will be provided.

Robert O'Hara News Director A Voice For Men

[/box]

AVfM Radio: Men Going Their Own Way

Paul Elam · 27 September 2011 · Archived copy · Original

[box type="alert" icon="none"]

Wow. No, I mean WOW. That is what you are going to be saying, over and over again tonight when you tune in to A Voice for Men Radio and listen to our show on Men Going Their Own Way.

I am going to go out on a limb here and say that this is going to be the best show we have done so far, and at the least the most explosive. It is a good enough topic, but what started out as a more or less generic (for MRA's) examination of MGTOW and the zeta male concept, turned up some real surprises as we got into the research. I am not going to get into specifics here, but I will tell you with absolute candor that both JTO and I were stunned, flabbergasted, at what we discovered and have been giddy with imagining and discussing its implications for the future of the MRM.

And I mean that in the best possible way.

Tune in tonight at 8:00 p.m. CST, to A Voice for Men Radio. Dr. T will be on the phones screening calls, and we have a pretty good idea that within the first 15 minutes of the show, a bunch of you are going to have something to say.

[/box]

Donate and get a nifty patch from AVfM

Paul Elam · 28 September 2011 · Archived copy · Original

[image]Well, we are just a couple of days away from the changing of the season and of course that means it is fundraising time at A Voice for Men. Fundraising here is not exactly the same as it is at a standard blog. The money we receive is not just support for the entertainment value of blogging, it is a vital aspect of the activism we aspire to launch with every passing day.

At the risk of being a braggart, I think we have gotten some real bang for your buck. Since this site launched, we have gained some encouraging media attention, created A Voice for Men Radio, underwritten and provided technical support for Shrink4Men Radio, launched register-her.com and generated some respectable media attention for that important effort.

In the process of all these accomplishments, we have scared feminists into trying to hide public information, prompted a prosecutor to seek a gag order against us and have risen to the top as the number one rated Alexa website on the internet that deals specifically with men's rights issues. We have also attracted a very impressive and growing body of skilled talent willing to take us to the next level and beyond.

It has all been fantastic, exhilarating, time consuming and expensive. And if there is a downside to all this it is that the things we built also have to be maintained and further developed.

And for that we absolutely must have your financial support

So please take the time today to visit the donation button provided in the right sidebar of this website. You can support all we do at AVfM with a one-time donation of any amount, or choose the option to make monthly donations via automatic deduction. There is also a P.O. Box provided for those that prefer to mail in checks and money orders.

[image]
Click to enlarge
Also, thanks to AVfM supporter Bev, from the Great Land Down Under, we are able to offer an added incentive for donations. She has provided AVfM with a quantity of very nice embroidered patches of one of our logo's. It is very good quality work and can be sewn on to almost anything from baseball caps to jacket sleeves to whatever.

Starting today, until the fundraiser ends on Friday, September 30, all those who provide AVfM with a $50.00 donation will be sent one of the patches as a gift.

Holy Cheese Covered Whacky Fries! 50 smackers for a patch!! Yes, that is a lot in exchange for that kind of gift, but remember, this is to fund our activism; to finance FTSU, if you will, and as you know our work is getting pricier, and more effective, all the time.

Allow me to say thank you in advance for all those that contribute with any amount. You have already helped push AVfM into territory never seen before in the MRM. If you can, please help us push harder, like until people start screaming. Thanks.

S.A.V.E. calls for outrage after Biden appearance

Robert O'Hara · 28 September 2011 · Archived copy · Original

[box]

WASHINGTON (AVfM) Yesterday, September 28th, Vice President Joseph Biden appeared on "The View" a popular daytime television show to talk about violence perpetrated against young women aged between 18 and 30. Biden, champion of the Violence Against Women Act which passed in 1994 which is currently past due for renewal, predictably spoke of all types of intimate partner violence as a gender specific crime with men being the sole perpetrators and women being the sole victims. He even invoked the memory of his father who he quoted as saying "you should never ever raise your hand to a woman in anger" and then went on to tell viewers that violence against women and victim blaming was a norm in our society.

Woopie Goldburg, moderator on the show and a popular entertainer known for her role in the 1985 film "The Color Purple" in which she portrayed a victim of domestic violence, interjected abruptly during Biden's diatribe stating: "And will you just also remind people, remind the women that the way to get a man's attention is not to hit him? Do not hit him. (applause) Because this is something violent in itself, is something we need to teach kids is not to perpetrate on each other. No?"

Despite a smattering of applause, Neither Biden or any of the other moderators on the show showed any appreciable reaction to her comments.

The letter cited a number of credible sources including studies performed by the CDC and the American Journal of Public Health that cite violence perpetrated by teenage females as a rapidly growing problem.

Excerpt from the letter:

"• According to the 2009 Youth Risk Behavior Surveillance Survey, 10% of teenage boys were victimized by dating violence in the past year, compared to only 9% of teenage girls experiencing dating violence (http://www.cdc.gov/mmwr/pdf/ss/ss5905.pdf – Table 12)
• According to a national survey of young adults ages 18-25, in cases of one-way violence, females were the aggressors in 71% of the cases, and males the initiators 29% of the time. (Whitaker DJ et al. American Journal of Public Health, Vol. 97, No. 5, 2007)"

This letter, like Woopie Goldburg's comments on the show, was ignored by Vice President Biden.

S.A.V.E. also called upon concerned citizens on Monday to contact the White House to express their concerns. After Biden's appearance emails were sent out to those on S.A.V.E.'s email list urging people to express outrage at the misrepresentation of the true nature of intimate partner violence and an email link to the White House was provided.

Sources:

http://www.saveservices.org/2011/09/save-sends-letter-to-vp-biden-regarding-his-upcoming-appearance-on-the-view/

http://abc.go.com/watch/the-view/SH559080/VD55145134/the-view-927

[/box]

So Many Lies

John Hembling (JtO) · 28 September 2011 · Archived copy · Original

[dropcap]T[/dropcap]he 1 in 4 lie is one of the traditional falsehoods of mainstream feminism's cannon. That it is still used after it's been so thoroughly and repeatedly debunked – should alert anyone in hearing of the lie's repetition of the foundational fraud of big-feminism's premise.

The number comes from a study conducted by Mary Koss in 1984 in which she surveyed 3,187 college students with a questionnaire. 1 in 4 women answered yes to at least one of a subset of three questions on this questionnaire – and in Koss's conclusions, these were determined to be the 1 in 4 victims of rape.

8. Have you had sexual intercourse when you didn't want to because a man gave you alcohol or drugs?

9. Have you had sexual intercourse when you didn't want to because a man threatened or used some degree of physical force (twisting your arm, holding you down, etc.) to make you?

10. Have you had sexual acts (anal or oral intercourse or penetration by objects other than the penis) when you didn't want to because a man threatened or used some degree of physical force (twisting your arm, holding you down, etc.) to make you?

That 27.5% of those who answered yes to any of these three questions is where the 1 in 4 number comes from. The veracity of the study is somewhat diminished by the fact that Koss herself admitted in 1992 that her question relating to sex after consuming alcohol was misleading– and that if omitted from the study the actual number of Koss-defined rapes is 1 in 9. When considered in the context that of Koss's identified victims, only 27% self-identified as rape victims, the number drops to 1 in 33.

The 1 in 4 lie has been soundly debunked many times before, and much more thoroughly than here. And yet, it's still endlessly recycled by rape-culture dogmatists. In fact, recent recitations of the "rape-epidemic" line are now tossing out a 1 in 3 number. Who can blame them – if you're going to cook the books, there's no point in telling anything but the biggest and most outrageous lies. Outrage is, of course the goal. Women must be outraged and terrified, and men must feel shame and remorse. And everybody must pony up a few dollars for the women's shelter, oh yes.

[box type="note" icon="none"]Pay-up brothers and sisters, that way you wont feel so [female:angry] or [male:shamed].[/box]

None of this is new information, but it provides context. It's a very popular lie, and has a life and momentum independent of the truth and critical thinking. But the actual falsehood doesn't even matter – because behind the 1 in 4 lie is a subtler deception.

It goes like this:

A: [Some number] B: [of women are the victims of] C: [some terrible thing]

[A] is a number, it doesn't matter what number. 1 in 4, or 1 in 99 – who cares, it's just a number.

[B] is women, and whatever awful thing is happening, it's women who are the victims of it.

[C] is a terrible thing, maybe rape, maybe domestic violence, maybe even being killed.
(although probably not in the workplace)

It's a simple and effective formula.
[Some number] [of women are being victimized by] [a terrible thing].

It doesn't matter what the number is, or what the terrible thing is, in fact, it even works if you use real numbers! Just plug in the formula and you get automatic moral panic, and quick access to everybody's wallet.

The deception lies in what's left unsaid. If 5 out of 6 women are sexually harassed at the office in their lifetime – is that a lot or is it no big deal? Is it normal? How can anybody determine what the number means when it's presented in isolation from any context? I don't know how many women are sexually harassed at work, I made up the "5 out of 6" number.

But what if we discover that 5 out of 6 women are sexually harassed at work, and 4 out of 5 men are sexually harassed at work. Ignoring that the numbers are imaginary, we finally have context.

The presentation of [some number] of women victimized by [some terrible thing] – with no comparative statistic of what happens to the other half of the human race – is a statement designed to cultivate outrage, but not to inform. Every time a number of victims is waved in front of us in isolation of context – we are being deceived and manipulated.

Setting aside the factual falsehood of the 1-in-4-women-is-raped lie, the structure of the statement itself is built to deceive and control. It means nothing without context. How many men are raped while these claimed 1 in 4 are being supposedly victimized?

It happens that for sheer volume, twice as many men within the walls of prisons are raped each year as the number of women raped in america's non-incarcerated public. How many men in that same public are also victims of rape is unknown, largely because nobody's bothered to fund a comprehensive study. I know with certainty that it's more than zero.

In a world of two sexes, presenting the bad outcome for a fraction of just one sex to promote outrage, fear and shame is deception by design. But it pays well.

Donate and get a nifty patch from AVfM

Paul Elam · 28 September 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Well, we are just a couple of days away from the changing of the season and of course that means it is fundraising time at A Voice for Men. Fundraising here is not exactly the same as it is at a standard blog. The money we receive is not just support for the entertainment value of blogging, it is a vital aspect of the activism we aspire to launch with every passing day.

At the risk of being a braggart, I think we have gotten some real bang for your buck. Since this site launched, we have gained some encouraging media attention, created A Voice for Men Radio, underwritten and provided technical support for Shrink4Men Radio, launched register-her.com and generated some respectable media attention for that important effort.

In the process of all these accomplishments, we have scared feminists into trying to hide public information, prompted a prosecutor to seek a gag order against us and have risen to the top as the number one rated Alexa website on the internet that deals specifically with men's rights issues. We have also attracted a very impressive and growing body of skilled talent willing to take us to the next level and beyond.

It has all been fantastic, exhilarating, time consuming and expensive. And if there is a downside to all this it is that the things we built also have to be maintained and further developed.

And for that we absolutely must have your financial support

So please take the time today to visit the donation button provided in the right sidebar of this website. You can support all we do at AVfM with a one-time donation of any amount, or choose the option to make monthly donations via automatic deduction. There is also a P.O. Box provided for those that prefer to mail in checks and money orders.

Also, thanks to AVfM supporter Bev, from the Great Land Down Under, we are able to offer an added incentive for donations. She has provided AVfM with a quantity of very nice embroidered patches of one of our logo's. It is very good quality work and can be sewn on to almost anything from baseball caps to jacket sleeves to whatever.

Starting today, until the fundraiser ends on Friday, September 30, all those who provide AVfM with a $50.00 donation will be sent one of the patches as a gift.

Holy Cheese Covered Whacky Fries! 50 smackers for a patch!! Yes, that is a lot in exchange for that kind of gift, but remember, this is to fund our activism; to finance FTSU, if you will, and as you know our work is getting pricier, and more effective, all the time.

Allow me to say thank you in advance for all those that contribute with any amount. You have already helped push AVfM into territory never seen before in the MRM. If you can, please help us push harder, like until people start screaming. Thanks.

Biologically Bad

John Hembling (JtO) · 29 September 2011 · Archived copy · Original

[dropcap]T[/dropcap]he undeclared war on men has just dialled the hatred up, again. This time, it's not merely men's behavior and bad attitudes under attack, but male biology which is the root of evil.

You see gentlemen, you are not merely stupid, misguided, culturally stunted reprobates. You're biologically flawed, innately broken bad-people. So says Margaret Wente, whose journalism and english literature degrees make her an "expert" on human biology and male psychology. (not really)

Wente's recent article on the Canadian national news site theglobeandmail.com decries the recent increased availability of hormone replacement therapies for aging men. In a population of aging baby boomers – parallel treatments for women have been widely promoted for more than a decade – but obviously, when men are the target demographic for hormone based aging treatments, its a very very bad thing. After all, everybody knows testosterone is the source of all greed and violence in the world.

Everybody knows this, with the exception of those who actually study it[1]. The conclusions of actual research on the impact of testosterone on human behavior indicates "Testosterone doesn't cause people to become aggressive or risky as many people believe but actually encourages fairness". [2]

However, Margaret Wente isn't letting inconvenient facts get in the way of a good story. In the world of commonly believed falsehood, testosterone is the core of male identity. That means violence and aggression is the core of masculinity, at least, according to Wente, whose journalism and literature degree makes her an obvious expert in behavioural psychology.

Starting from a foundation built on cultural myth, Wente builds a case for the innate biological inferiority of the sex whose energy, creativity and drive have levered humanity into our modern, clean, well fed civilization.

Wente continues her attack on masculinity with the bland declaration that "testosterone is implicated in the world's financial woes." As a subscriber to several financial newsletters, this is new on me, but I wont dispute that maleness is implicated in all the world's woes by ideologues re-packaging cultural biases under the false pretence that hatred is backed up by data. According to our expert on matters masculine and economic:

"Perhaps you've noticed that not a single woman was involved with the reckless speculation that led to the debacle of 2008." Being male, and therefore, inferior – I hadn't noticed that no women at all work in the service sectors of finance and banking, but now I know – It was all because of testosterone.

Unsatisfied with her own professional expertise on masculine psychology and sexual biology, Wente relies on a former investment banker to deliver the knowledge that "Testosterone is the molecule that explains irrational exuberance". Hysterical female Justin Bieber fans are clearly suffering from testosterone poisoning.

Dear lord, somebody help them!

Wente concludes her piece with a quote from a white knight author of yet another best-selling "women are better than men" book. "Women have only 10 per cent of the testosterone that men have. But they probably have 210 per cent of the judgment."

What's interesting in the weak pseudo-science behind this article's hate is that it focuses almost entirely on biology to vilify masculine identity. There is none of the: "you bad men would be better with some re-education" – which I'm paraphrasing from other men-are-bad feminist agitprop.

Wendy Zukerman's New-Scientist piece on the evolutionary roots of domestic violence[3] is explicit in excluding consideration of female offenders. Zuckerman opens with some reasonable concerns that her cited researchers at University of Texas in Austin and Stockton College of New Jersey makes simplistic assumptions. However, in the following paragraph notes only the number of female reports of domestic violence – a large number with no comparison or context.

Another men-are-bad article on the Huffington Post by prostrate male feminist David Katz makes a more oblique , but equally vacuous swipe at biology as the source of masculine evil. His article can be found by googling “The Biological Basis for Behaving Badly.” A bold bit of alliteration by Katz, but the biological approach to claiming man-equals-bad has an interesting tactical component. Within civil rights movements, claims by racist organizations of biological inferiority, or superiority between ethnic demographics are among the most egregious approaches to demonizing a population, because if the idea gains currency – it suggests a biological solution.

This is how ethnic cleansing becomes palatable within a society; the idea that large scale sterilization, medical intervention, internment or extermination is actually a merciful act to the group targeted. Or simply that the targeted demographic is believed to be “not really human” and therefore, outside the consideration of human rights questions.

In 1996 Gregory H. Stanton prepared a document for the US State Department called The 8 Stages of Genocide[4].

In the document’s introduction, Stanton stated :
“Genocide is a process that develops in eight stages that are predictable but not inexorable. At each stage, preventive measures can stop it. The process is not linear. Logically, later stages must be preceded by earlier stages. But all stages continue to operate throughout the process. “

Stanton’s outline difers in it’s scope from the phenomenon of cultural misandry. In his paper, he focused on rising hatred within an individual society; within the context of the global community not following the path described. This differs from the escalating hatred of men in that the ideology of male hatred has growing dominance around the world, and is not limited to a small set of nation states or region.

Stanton’s identified stages are Classification, Symbolization, Dehumanization, Organization, Polarization, Preparation, Extermination, and Denial.
The trend towards male vilification as a product of natural biology – as typified by recent writing by Wente and Katz suggests our culture is in stage 3, which is Dehumanization. Biological solutions to the claimed biological evil of masculinity can be speculated, including legally mandated drugging, chemical sterilization, or tracking through RFID technologies.

At this point, I expect skeptical readers to speculate that my aluminum foil hat is too tight, and that is a reasonable reaction. Which is why I will mention the fact that ideological feminism is a non-local movement with currency in all western nations. In India[5] and Indonesia[6] – commuter trains have reserved cars for women only, but no such trains for men only. In fact, men who accidentally enter these reserved spaces are ritually humiliated and beaten in public. One man was thrown by guards[7] from a moving train sustaining life threatening injuries. This is unquestionably apartheid, exactly the same phenomena which international humanitarian organizations fought against for a decade prior to South Africa ending the practice in 1994. A law is presently proposed under which Indian wives will be paid by the government to beat their husbands[8] in public, with the payment escalating depending on the severity of the beating.

In Turkey, men are barred from attending soccer matches[9]. Rather than international protest at this new manifestation of apartheid, “humanitarian” organizations are cheering. If the argument that the majority of unruly spectators are men is a valid justification, why not stop child abuse by barring mothers from child-care.

Far from doing anything so egregious. The statistics showing female relatives as the principal perpetrators of child abuse in the 2008 Department of health and Human Services report on child maltreatment were removed from the Health and Human Services website[10]. The updated report for 2009 shows the same data re-classified identifying the relationship of victim to abuser as simply “Parent.” Elsewhere in the 2009 report victim relationship to abuser is included, although this table lists “Father” at the top of the table, while data indicates mothers as the principal offenders.

Table 3–9 Victims by Perpetrator Relationship, 2009 (duplicate count)

Perpetrator	Duplicate Victims
	Number	Percent
PARENT
Father	133,268	18.6
Father and Other	6,411	0.9
Mother	270,087	37.7
Mother and Other	39,468	5.5
Mother and Father	128,797	18.0
NONPARENT

However, nobody is calling for the banning of mothers from contact with their children. Because it would be as absurd as banning man from attending soccer matches based solely on sexual profiling.

In England, the labour national labour party ran an all-party convention which expressly forbade men from attending. This too is unquestionably apartheid. In the UK, a proposed change to law would render prison for female offenders a relic of the past, replaced with state funded housing, education and therapy. In Canada – female murderers, when convicted are mandated by the provincial court of Ontario to be charged under the lesser crime of infanticide. When women are found guilty in criminal courts, they are given lesser sentences through informal favour in the courts, but this is increasingly being formalized. One reading of the law for women, another for men. The modern word privilege has its origin in the latin phrase meaning; private law for or against a specific person.

In Stanton's catalog, which he prepared on behalf of US Congress to assist in the avoidance of mass killings in failed states, the step after Dehumanization is Organization. From Stanton's document, "Genocide is always organized, usually by the state".

Where are we on Gregory H. Stanton's 8 step program? The author himself asserted that the stages are not strictly linear, and we're also observing a phenomenon transcending national and regional boundaries. Does the tin-foil hat still fit?

One of the difficulties in writing about this phenomenon is the temptation to comparison with a specific european nation's social transformation between the third and fourth decades of the twentieth century. Id suggest that while there are some similarities the present trend of masculine disenfranchisement has a different character. In particular, this is a world-wide phenomena, and is not occurring in a single region relatively isolated from a (relatively) sane world community. The other major difference being that cooperation and adherence to male despising ideology must continue to encompass most men for escalated apartheid to continue.

Cracks in the foundation are already appearing. The increasing mainstream adoption of men's rights rhetoric is one such crack. The marriage strike is another noticeable sign of times changing in western nations, and the startling and game changing emergence of Japan's version of zeta masculinity – the " soushoku danshi" – or grass eating boys.

Western media paints these men opting out of traditional expectations as if they're weak, but I read it differently. They're Going Their Own Way, and giving not a single toss for anyone's opinion. That sounds like strength to me. They're also becoming the dominant model for masculinity in Japan, with 60% of men between 20 and 30 years old self identifying as "grass eating boys."

This is disastrous for economies which depend on male competition for wealth, status and female access. It may – if it continues to grow – lead to the collapse of nation states. If that happens, big box feminism, which depends on chivalry and on state funding and enforcement – will collapse as well.

Western media has continued to characterize the trend of male self actualization of men unplugging from traditional "provide- protect-disposable-man" as a failure. Hymowitz's Child Man in the Promised Land and Kimmel's Guyland being prime examples of attempts to induce compliance with male disposability through public derision.

Sadly, for Kimmel and Hymowitz – men stepping off the treadmill are not merely the failed competitors detractors pretend, they're men who've evaluated the available options for acceptable masculinity and have selected "none of the above." Shaming based on conformance to a model of male disposability does not work on men who value themselves as humans.

In Japan, Grass Eaters are indifferent to attempts to force compliance by ridicule, and a healthier attitude is hard to contemplate. This is close to what practicing Buddhists pursue as a state of grace – un-attachment. In the decidedly non Buddhist West however, an increasing population of men adopting a zeta definition of self might be considerably less tolerant of the increasingly shrill mainstream's effort to extract money, and force compliance. I predict it will be an interesting time.

[1] http://www.nature.com/nature/journal/v463/n7279/full/nature08711.html
[2] http://www.cbc.ca/news/technology/story/2009/12/08/tech-biology-testosterone-behaviour.html
[3] http://www.newscientist.com/article/dn20976-domestic-violence-gets-evolutionary-explanation.html
[4] http://www.genocidewatch.org/aboutgenocide/8stagesofgenocide.html
[5] http://www.telegraph.co.uk/news/worldnews/asia/india/8165976/Men-caught-in-women-only-train-carriage-forced-to-do-sit-ups.html
[6] http://www.thejakartapost.com/news/2010/08/28/womenonly-train-service.html
[7] http://articles.timesofindia.indiatimes.com/2010-12-15/kolkata/28244162_1_constable-ladies-compartment-train
[8] http://www.deccanherald.com/content/193470/pati-patni-ten-thousand.html
[9] http://www.theaustralian.com.au/news/sport/men-banned-from-turkey-soccer-grounds-in-bid-to-stop-violence/story-e6frg7mf-1226142614442
[10] http://www.avoiceformen.com/wp-content/uploads/sites/2/2011/09/cm08.pdf

Vladek Filler action alert, press release

Paul Elam · 29 September 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Below you will find a press release and a list of media contacts regarding the ongoing struggle to help Vladek Filler finally receive justice, and, just as importantly push for prosecutor Mary Kellett to finally receive her justice as well.

Supporters of AVfM have heard about this case for a long time and have done much to help further this cause by sending emails to officials and members of the media, making phone calls to key persons and by helping to distribute press releases across the internet. I can tell you on behalf of the concerned parties that they are very grateful for your support and persistence.

The case has come a long way with many positive results. The pending actions against Kellett are outlined in the current press release and Mr. Filler has been acquitted of the false rape charge against him.

But we must remember that he is still fighting for his freedom and for the wellbeing of his children. He was convicted, just as unjustly as the initial rape conviction that was later overturned, of assaulting his wife. He is awaiting an appeal of that conviction and the opportunity to present the overwhelming evidence of his innocence.

He was sentenced in that case to 21 days in jail. Some might think that was a good outcome considering they almost put him away for much longer on a bogus rape charge. I urge everyone not to think that way.

Mr. Filler is innocent and is, in fact, the only real victim in any of these criminal proceedings. He was a victim of his wife's abuse; a victim of Mary Kellett's lies and official misconduct and a victim of corruption in entire Bar Harbor prosecutors office headed by Carletta Bassano.

He does not deserve to be in jail for 21 days, or 10 days or even one minute. If anyone deserves to be in jail it is the corrupt functionaries that are orchestrating and abuse of justice in order to harm Mr. Filler.

You have all done much in the past, but I must ask for those who are outraged at this travesty to take action one more time. Please post this press release to your blogs. Please contact the media sources and government officials listed below the release and tell them of your concerns. Please help us see this push for decency and justice one more time for the sake of an innocent man being savaged by these obscenely corrupt and arrogant officials. While all of us see the loaded gun of misandry, and know how dangerous it is, Mr. Filler still has it pointed straight at his head, and the heads of his children. This nightmare is still not over.

Let's finish this.

[box icon="none"]

FOR IMMEDIATE RELEASE

Contact: Paul Elam, A Voice for Men
P.O. Box 301172, Houston,TX77230
http://www.avoiceformen.com
e-mail: avoiceformen@yahoo.com

Bar Harbor Maine Prosecutor accused of fraud, racketeering, and obstruction of justice faces disbarment

Following a seven month investigation, the Maine Bar Counsel and Grievance Commission "found probable cause to believe that Assistant District Attorney Mary Kellett had engaged in misconduct subject to sanction under the Maine Bar Rules for which appropriate discipline should be sought".

Assistant district attorney Mary N. Kellett is accused of prosecuting numerous men for sex crimes despite evidence of their innocence. The complaint filed in connection with the case of Vladek Filler alleges Kellett suppressed exculpatory evidence, elicited false testimony, tampered with evidence, violated court orders, and engaged in "fraud, racketeering, and obstruction of justice."

Filler was accused of sexual misconduct by his estranged wife during a contentious divorce and child custody dispute. District Court found the accusations to be false and awarded sole custody of the children to Filler; however Kellett had him prosecuted twice for spousal rape anyway.

Numerous other cases have surfaced. Michael D. Webber was tried by Kellett twice for accusations of sexual misconduct made during his divorce and child custody dispute. Speaking at a press conference Webber stated "in my case there was no evidence and I was continuously put through the system for no reason…it really destroys your life." His attorney Steven Juskewitch, himself a former prosecutor, cited prior Court findings of Webber's innocence which Kellett ignored. Juskewitch said "it's probably in my 30 years the most egregious abuse of prosecutorial discretion." He added that just his office has been involved with some two dozen such cases brought by Kellett.

There are numerous calls for prosecutor Kellett's disbarment. A Change.org petition shows over 1,170 signatures. National advocacy organizations such as S.A.V.E (Stop Abusive and Violent Environments), NCFM (National Coalition For Men), and AVFM (A Voice For Men) have filed ethics complaints calling for Kellett's suspension and disbarment. According to attorney Robert Franklin of Father's and Families® Kellett's disbarment would be "richly deserved."

The probable cause finding against a prosecutor is very rare, but as the Bar Commission attempts to answer calls for Kellett's disbarment many remain skeptical. District Attorney Careletta Bassano and Attorney General's Office have dismissed the seriousness of the Bar Commission's finding allowing Kellett to continue to prosecute men despite the pending disciplinary proceedings. It has long been established by the Courts that prosecutors are to be held to much higher ethical and legal standards than other attorney's because prosecutors represent the public and have a duty to seek truth and justice and not merely a conviction. It remains uncertain whether prosecutor Mary Kellett will be held to such standards by the Maine Board of Overseers Bar Commission.

A Voice for Men is an advocacy organization dedicated to ending sexual discrimination and promoting equal treatment under the law.

Contact: Paul Elam avoiceformen@yahoo.com

# #

[/box]

KEY NEWSPAPERS:

Citizen Journal
Publisher: Robert Pushard
Associate Publisher: Jan Laux
Editor: Larry Grard
Area Manager: Nick Wood
Tel. 207-355-3171
www.svweekly.com
E-mail: Frontdesk@svweekly.com

Central Maine Morning Sentinel
31 Front Street Waterville, ME 04901
Phone: (207) 873-3341
Fax: (207) 861-9191
Website: www.onlinesentinel.com

E-mail: sentinelnews@centralmaine.com
Tony Ronzio, editor and publisher, 207-621-5678, tronzio@centralmaine.com
Jim Evans, managing editor 207-861-9249, jevans@centralmaine.com

Portland Press Herald/Maine Sunday Telegram
390 Congress Street
Portland, ME 04101-5009
(207) 791-6630
Website: www.pressherald.com
Editor and Publisher Richard L. Connor, rconnor@mainetoday.com news@pressherald.com

Portsmouth Herald
111 New Hampshire Ave.
Portsmouth, NH 03801
Phone: (800) 439-0303
Howard Altschiller, Executive Editor
haltschiller@seacoastonline.com.
news@seacoastonline.com

Bangor Daily News
491 Main Street
P.O. Box 1329
Bangor, Maine 04402-1329
Michael J Dowd, Editor-in-Chief
Phone: 207-990-8238
www.bangornews.com
E-mail: mdowd@bangordailynews.com

The Ellsworth American.
30 Water Street
Ellsworth, ME 04605
Phone: (207) 667-2576
Stephen Fay Editor
news@ellsworthamerican.com info@ellsworthamerican.com

Village Soup
301 Park Street
Rockland, Maine 04841
Editor: Richard M. Anderson
207-594-4401, x326
randerson@villagesoup.com
news@villagesoup.com

Penobscot Bay Press
Community Information Services
PO Box 36, 69 Main St.
Stonington, ME 04681
Phone:(207)367-2200
Publisher and Editor: Nat Barrows cis@penobscotbaypress.com

Kennebec Journal
274 Western Avenue
Augusta, ME 04330
Phone: (207) 623-3811
Fax: (207) 623-2220
Website: www.kjonline.com
E-mail: kjcommunity@centralmaine.com
Editor and Publisher Anthony Ronzio 207-621-5678, aronzio@kjonline.com
City Editor Bob Mentzinger 207-621-5708, rmentzinger@centralmaine.com

Lewiston Sun Journal
104 Park Street
Lewiston, ME 04243
Phone: (207) 784-5411
Fax: (207) 777-3436
Website: www.sunjournal.com
Managing Editor Judith Meyer, 207-689-2902, jmeyer@sunjournal.com
Managing Editor Pete Phelan, 207-689-2826, pphelan@sunjournal.com

Lincoln County News
PO Box 36 Damariscotta, ME 04543
Phone: (207) 563-3171
Fax: (207) 563-3127
Website: www.lincolncountynewsonline.com
E-mail: lcn@lincoln.midcoast.com

Magic City Morning Star
146 Katahdin Avenue
Millinocket, ME 04462
Phone: (207) 723-2037
Website: magic-city-news.com
E-mail: editor@magic-city-news.com

Times-Record
3 Business Parkway
Brunswick, ME 04011-1302
Phone: (207) 729-3311
Fax: (207) 729-5728
Website: www.timesrecord.com
E-mail: news@timesrecord.com

Portland Phoenix
16 York St., Suite 102,
Portland, ME 04101
Tel: (207) 773-8900; Fax: (207) 773-8905
Managing Editor: Jeff Inglis
jinglis@phx.com

Biddeford Journal Tribune
457 Alfred Street
Biddeford, ME 04005
Phone: (207) 282-1535

Fax: (207) 282-3138
Website: www.journaltribune.com
Kristen Schulze Muszynski, Managing Editor, Ext. 322
E-mail: jtcommunity@journaltribune.com

Capital Weekly
295 Water Street, Suite One
Augusta, ME 04338
Phone: (207) 621-6000
Fax: (207) 261-6006
Website: capital.villagesoup.com
Contact Form: http://capital.villagesoup.com/about/contact.seam

Herald Gazette
Address: 56 Elm Street
Camden, ME 04843
Phone: (207) 236-8511
Fax: (207) 236-4245
Website: knox.villagesoup.com

TV STATIONS:

Channel 7
WVII-TV ABC-7
371-Target Industrial Circle
Bangor, ME 04401
www.wvii.com/
Phone: (207) 945-6457 Ex 3122
Fax: 207-942-0511
WVII News and Stories Email: tv7news@wvii.com

Channel 2:
Main Studio WLBZ 2
329 Mount Hope Avenue
Bangor, ME 04401
(207) 942-4821
www.wlbz2.com/
To send a news tip to the NEWS CENTER 2, send an email to: newscenter2@wlbz2.com

Channel 5:
WABI-TV
35 Hildreth Street
Bangor, ME 04401
Phone: 207-947-8321
Fax: 207-941-9378
www.wabi.tv/
E-Mail: wabi@wabi.tv

Channel 6:
WCSH 6 NBC
1 Congress Sq,
Portland, ME 04101-3800
Phone: 207-828-6666

Website: http://www.wcsh6.com
News Director, send an email to: newsdirector@wcsh6.com
E-Mail: newscenter@wcsh6.com

Channel 8:
WMTW-TV
99 Danville Corner Road
Auburn, ME 04210

Phone: 207.782.1800
To report breaking news call: 800.CH8.NEWS (207-248-6397)
Website: http://www.wmtw.com/index.html
E-mail wmtw@wmtw.com

Channel 13:
WGME-TV
81 Northport Drive
Portland, ME 04103
207-797-1313
207-878-3505
Website: http://www.wgme.com
Contact form: http://www.wgme.com/sections/station/

Tom Matlack: Albinos are men, too – sort of

Paul Elam · 30 September 2011 · Archived copy · Original

We are the hollow men
We are the stuffed men
Leaning together
Headpiece filled with straw. Alas!
Our dried voices, when
We whisper together
Are quiet and meaningless
As wind in dry grass
Or rats' feet over broken glass
In our dry cellar

Shape without form, shade without colour,
Paralysed force, gesture without motion
Those who have crossed
With direct eyes, to death's other Kingdom
Remember us — if at all — not as lost
Violent souls, but only
As the hollow men
The stuffed men. ~ T.S. Elliot

[dropcap]T[/dropcap]om Matlack, the paradoxically über-manly and obsequious male lap dog of the Good Men Project Magazine, has just qualified himself as perhaps the ultimate feminists suck-up, and in the process has exposed the racism, homophobia and sexism that the publication will gladly embrace, as long as it is woven into the standardized canard of masculine toxicity that is their bread and butter.

In Matlack's latest offering, Eunuchs are not the Answer, he comes out of the gate puffed up and testosterone-charged with a scientific assessment of real manhood. He measures it in the firmness of a handshake. Though he did not give us a chart with the qualifying PSI's or grip quotients, he does let us know that a lack of clutch factor is a lack of manliness. In fact, if you fall under a certain pressure, you "might as well be dead."

I thought he was going to be subtle enough to avoid it, but he used the tried and true epithet of "limp-wristed" in the very next paragraph as the way to NOT make the manhood cut. Take that, gay men! Those light in the loafers, or men who shake hands like them, are scratched off the man-roster, courtesy of Tom Matlack.

Unsatisfied with excluding gay men, and anyone else with without a firm grip on matters masculine, he moves on to skin color; apparently another litmus test. He informs us that albino's are indeed "macho, in their own way."

[image]In their own way? Just what is the manhood of albino's, Mr. Matlack, that they embody it in their own way? Would you care to inform the world as to how their masculinity is different than that of other men, or indeed how pigmentation plays a role in maculinity at all?

And as long as you are throwing skin color into the mix, what about those black guys, Latino's and Asians? Are they men, too, in their own way?

For those that think I am nit-picking, think again. Those words had undoubtedly been in Matlack's face until he (and his editor) felt the piece was polished enough for posting. In those words he reveals a critical part of his underlying mentality about men, and about human beings in general.

His rejection of men whose handshakes might feel effeminate is just the punctuation to his main statement: Men are supposed to act and look like what Mr. Matlack imagines he sees in the mirror, and nothing else.

He has just informed us that he separates all of us on some level in his mind, not just by sex, but by skin color and sexuality. There is us and there is them, and Matlack's us is the one reserved for the coveted title of man. Faggots, niggers, spics and all other non-hackers need not apply.

Unsatisfied with the thinly veiled insult to minorities and the more overt denigration of gay men, Tom turns his invective headlong into all men throughout history. I suppose it was necessary after his expressions of unacceptable bigotry that he redeem himself with a foray into the bigotry toward men that has always been an integral part of the GMP mission. He does so uncreatively, relying on claptrap that could be pulled from any women's studies text.

"Men have pretty much cornered the market on true evil throughout history. …[W]hen it comes to raping and pillaging, us guys have done it all."

Saying that might have freaked him out a little, because he later back peddles, lamely, with, "I don't believe that means men and women are the same or that all men should pay for the sins of our misguided brothers."

And then he comes back full circle with "From the very beginning, the point of the Good Men Project has been to highlight the countless ways men—as fathers, husbands, sons, and workers—display a uniquely male form of goodness."

Not a bad mission for "us" misguided brothers responsible for all that raping and pillaging, I'd say. Or was that that we were not responsible for all that stuff? Or was it that we did it but we are not responsible? It hard to follow such a circuitous path, but it's a hazard that comes with reviewing Tom's work. It is hard to analyse his opinions without finding yourself slogging through the muddled and convoluted inner workings of an indecisive mind.

Most feminists are wrong about the same exact things each and every time. Critiquing them is easy because most of them have a by the numbers feminist worldview, and they vary from it rarely

But Tom is a man clearly confused, about men, about women, about history and about himself. He is the self-imagined embodiment of the virtues of traditional masculinity, eerily ensconced in an environment that seeks to denigrate the same. His wandering, contradictory and dissonant stabs at pleasing two masters implodes because he lacks the moral conviction to serve just one.

And the kicker is that he is wrong on both counts. Men don't have the market cornered on evil, and measuring manhood with skin color and hand strength is an abominable act of ignorance.

One man, two conflicted and failed ideologies. And not a hint of the backbone to either choose one or reject both. Tom Matlack is to the understanding of manhood what Bernie Madhoff is to the understanding to corporate ethics.

He is a man trying to fill the role of sycophant while desperately angling to project masculine bravado; a quisling of pure steel. He is his own embarrassment; a hollow man, headpiece full of straw, whose only legacy is the sad attempt to draw others into his aimlessness and confusion. It's not likely that anyone with a moral compass and a hint of insight will follow.

Mary Kelly-Williams: Dr. T she's not

Paul Elam · 1 October 2011 · Archived copy · Original

[dropcap]M[/dropcap]ary Kelly-Williams imagines, wrongly, that she understands men. She has penned an article, The Four Words Men Hate Most, at the Good Men Project Magazine. It is an article addressing women, purportedly educating them about why men don't like to hear the four words, "We need to talk."

She observes correctly that men are averse to the term. She even calls women out, ever so gently, on aspects of their style and tone, but pads her observations with redundant assertions that she knows how well intentioned these women are. And then she informs us of the following:

[quote style="boxed"]When women say, "We need to talk," what is most likely being said is, "I want to connect with you."[/quote]

So it appears that women say those words, not in the way men fear, not as the precursor to a round of nagging, but out of some longing for intimacy; a desire to be close.

Men? Hell, she doesn't even understand women. Well, except perhaps their need for self-delusion, and willingness to pay for it.

I wonder, amidst all Ms. Kelly-Williams's self-help pablum, if she has ever ventured past her conclusion that men are just misreading their wives, to explore why they tend to react to those four words with such negativity.

Men, like other humans are conditioned on experience. And that experience for most of them is that "We need to talk," has nothing to do with "I want to connect with you." It translates, literally, to "Here is my problem du jour with you, and I want you to listen to it till I am tired of talking, and then fix it." Yes, Mary, fix it. The canard that women don't bring men things to fix doesn't play here, either.

Her attention to what men tell her is cursory and scant. "When I talk to men about their disdain for these four words," she says, "they admit that hearing these words invokes feelings of shame. "What did I do now?" "What did I not provide?" "Where did I screw up?" "How long is this going to take?""

So, Kelly-Williams hears the words those men are saying, but is she getting the meaning? Not a chance in hell. Nor is she paying any meaningful attention to the behavior of the women they are with. That shame men feel is not pulled out of thin air, or despite their wives "good intentions," but because that "talk," that desire to "connect," is just a paper bag, inside of which is a big fat shame sandwich.

[image]It is, just as those unfortunate men are pointlessly trying to tell Mary, the opening curtain for a command audience, one-woman show on what they did "wrong," or what they supposedly didn't provide, or how they are perceived to have screwed up.

Wanting to know how long that sort of thing is going to take is a pretty healthy response. Not putting up with it for 10 seconds is even healthier.

Sure, there are times when men make mistakes and those mistakes have to be addressed. Any decent fellow will tell you that.

There are times when women make mistakes, too. Like trying to shape and mold a man on an ongoing basis with shame and emotional blackmail in order to make him a better servant. Doing that is a mistake, no matter what kind of bullshit candy coating your therapist covers it with.

And bullshit spin on that kind of connection destroying behavior from women is precisely what Kelly-Williams is offering up here

I have known quite a few women in better than a half century of living, including the one I have been with for ten years. I know how women act when what they actually want is to connect. They flirt, behave with affection and talk pretty much about anything except what they think is wrong with their man. They hold hands, offer up some kindness and do something else peculiar. They listen.

When they want to complain? They say, “We need to talk.” And before the Not All Police start flashing their badges, yes, I am sure that literally dozens of times in human history women across the globe have said they “need to talk” when they meant they wanted to connect. It would hardly be the first time a woman said one thing when she meant another. Come to think of it, saying one thing and meaning another is just what we are getting from Kelly-Williams.

Her entire article has the flavor or male friendliness, even an air of confronting women with what they do to send their men running for the cave, or anywhere else their woman isn’t.

Unfortunately for her clients, she is still affixed to the idea that there is nothing so dysfunctional happening in these women that they need to be advised, not to watch their tone, but to watch their mouths.

They need to be advised that their husbands could likely drum up a laundry list of petty complaints and imagined slights and dump them all over their wives under the guise of “getting close,” but they actually have the wisdom to forego such childish self-indulgence. Perhaps they opt away from this kind of conduct because they know that accepting trivial differences and letting go of minor transgressions is at the heart of getting close, and that closeness built on less than that is fakery.

If she wanted to help women command respect and attention from their husbands, she would refer them to a mirror and ask them to assess their methods, but mostly their expectations.

Don’t hold your breath, though. There is not a nickel to be made with that. No books that will sell; no seminars that will sell out; no revolving parade of paying asses to fill seats in the waiting room.

In her closing, and after advising women only to consider their tone, Kelly-Williams really gives women her blueprint for success. “The next time you really want to connect with your man,” she says, “here are four words that are sure to never fail…“Want to have sex?””

That’s it ladies, speak softly and play with his big stick. The therapist happens to be right on this one. If you want to turn your man-unit into a better trained seal, working ever harder to satisfy every detail of your every capricious whim, then this advice is golden. I mean, as long as he has no self-respect and thinks with his twinkie.

But if you are stuck with a man who dares to imagine himself as something other than a landscaper in your life garden, then you might want to consider another way, like asking yourself what you bring to a relationship, rather than judging your relationship by what it brings to you.

Fire

Izzey · 2 October 2011 · Archived copy · Original

[dropcap]O[/dropcap]ver the summer this year during a week of scorching hot days, I was doing some inventory in my files and putzing around the house doing some of those 'put off menial tasks' that one never seems to catch up on. I happened to have had an unexpected day off because not only did I have a minor accident at work; breaking a couple of fingers and spraining my ankle, my next job in the queue for the travellift was halted by mechanics that had not yet completed their end of the work. I had a boat in limbo, and was very grateful for circumstances that would normally piss me off.

Aside from the air conditioner and the faint sounds of landscapers working down the block, the house was very quiet. I was a very happy human, until suddenly fire whistles and trucks started blaring away. The announcement of a fire nearby had me peeking out windows to see where it was coming from. I did not have to wait very long to find out, because about six fire trucks came down my short block…and then stopped. They blocked my driveway, practically on my front lawn. An army of firemen came off their trucks and started running down the block that connects to mine on the other side of the corner. This had me running out of my house as well.

It turns out, that a house two houses over from the corner facing the connecting street to mine, had smoke coming from the upstairs porch. Structurally, the porch was not a free-floating veranda. It was right on top of the first floor of the house, facing the street. They immediately started ripping up the floor, which led me to believe a ceiling fan or something else electrical had gone awry in the ceiling below it, but was not visible from inside the home.

Also racing to the scene were women with their camera phones out in front of them, like they were going to catch a charred body being dragged out of the home and sell it to Channel 2 News or something. I thought that was pretty pathetic, but not what caught my eye.

On the other corner across the street from mine, was a woman about my size, 5'2″ and maybe 125 lbs., in full firefighter gear; hat, coat, boots, and air tank, none of which looked like it was made for someone her size. She looked like a five year old that put on all of her daddy's work gear in a game of playing 'dress-up.' She was trying to pull the hose to the hydrant, and was struggling. It was twisting as she unfurled it, and no one was paying attention to her. (She kept looking down the other block at the rest of the men already on the scene) She then attempted to get the cap off the fire hydrant.

By this time, because it was almost a hundred degrees outside- and even though I was wearing a tank top and thin cotton summer pants, I was hot, and wanted my air conditioning. So I went back into my house. I watched from a window, like a typical 'nosy neighbor.'

She was frantic. Sweat was pouring off of her, and she kept turning around to see if she was being watched. I almost felt sorry for her. But I could not help thinking, that if my house was on fire and she was in charge of the water to put it out, I'd be royally fucked; probably burned to a crisp.

It turns out that the men down the other street had already hooked up their hoses to other hydrants in short order, and were minute-man ready for an expeditious need for it. This woman was 'a probie' and this was her first time out of 'the house' which was right down the block from me. Another tid-bit of all of this is; the smoking house having the problems belonged to one of their brothers. (a fireman that happened to be out of town, but because his street was sealed off when he finally arrived- actually did park on my fucking lawn…and is how I got the info on the girl later, because he knocked on my door to apologize)

I asked him about the girl. I asked him if she was going to pass muster. He said "Not a chance, but to be politically correct for a gender quota, we have to have a woman in our house."

They left her there to unhook and roll up the hose with two guys and her truck. They did not help her. She finished up an hour after all of the other trucks were gone. I am sure I saw tears.

Some jobs were just not made for women. I would not want this woman pulling me out of a burning building. But feminist governance says that she is equally qualified, and demands that she be there through politically enforced blackmail. Since I have personally been in a house fire when I was a young girl, I have witnessed the brawn and brains it takes to do this job.

I wish that the asshole that said this woman had to be hired, had this woman answer the call to their own house on fire…with their children's lives in her hands. Maybe then, the right man for the job would actually get the fucking job; gender quota be damned. Feminists that put lives in danger for their own self-serving agenda be damned.

Inside the Trojan Horse of Realmannspracht

Anakin Niceguy · 3 October 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Realmannspracht (translated loosely as "real man talk") is the term I use to describe any discourse which suggests manhood is dependent on complying with someone's stated or implied expectations. The thing about realmannspracht is that often serves as a Trojan Horse for a speaker's agenda. When a speaker says, "Real men do <xyz>," what they really mean is "I want men to do <xyz>." They simply have couched their demands in such a way that a debate about their demands is preempted and precluded from the discussion.

It's simply a rhetorical stratagem to shut down honest dialogue about what manhood is. Sure, someone can claim, "You're not a real man if you don't do <xyz> or don't have <xyz> qualities." However, a three-year old could probably do a much better job of telling you who is and who is not a man by pointing to illustrations in a picture book. Adults, all too enslaved to their particular ideologies (traditional, feminist, or otherwise), could learn a lot from children who have an appreciation for the obvious.

Both feminists and traditionalists approach manhood from the social construct angle. They are mirror image of each other in their error. The feminists want to say there is no such thing as manhood because it is a learned behavior. The traditionalists want to say there is manhood, but then equate it with learned behavior. They're both wrong. Manhood is a biological reality, but this fact doesn't seem to stop the realmannspracht crowd (left, right, feminist, conservative, whatever) from making some debatable claims about manhood. Let's look at a few of them …

[unordered_list style="green-dot"]

- Men are physically strong. Really? Are we going to argue that the astrophysicist Stephen Hawking is not a man because he is severely disabled?
- Men are emotionally reserved. Really? So, if someone rapes your girlfriend, do you repress any signs of being upset?
- Men are brave. Really? That's the absence of fear, right? So, I should be completely unconcerned about my safety and celebrate the 4th of July in Waziristan?
- Men are loyal. So if the President is a lawless, big-government crackpot, I shouldn't say anything about because, after all, he is the "Commander-In-Chief"?
- Men are selfless. If you are always selfless, then why don't you sell your house and give the proceeds to finance the habits of meth addicts?
- Men take pain. Okay, go ahead and stick your hand on the front burner of your stove. This should be no problem for you, because, well, you are "man" and you should be able to do this.

[/unordered_list]

I could go on and on, but the above examples should suffice for the point I am making. In each of the examples, I admittedly used some extremes cases to falsify some assertions made about manhood. But I had to do it. Why? Because those who use realmannpracht continually fail to acknowledge that the broad array of men's experiences are usually more complicated than the shallow metrics we force on them.

In actuality, many of things we often list as attributes of manhood are really forms of deprivation that we ask men to embrace. Men don't embrace them naturally, for if they did, we wouldn't have to shame them with epithets like "sissy," "wimp," "loser," "beta," "creep," "jerk" and the such like. What men really do in a lot of cases is sacrifice, and they do this because others find it useful. Reframing these sacrifices as mere attributes of manhood allows people to overlook the social costs men pay to be recognized qua men. When you think about it, a Masculinity Tax is what it all really boils down to.

[quote float="left"]Many of the things we ask of men are not always appropriate, ethical, or humane. [/quote] Let's take some examples from the list I mentioned earlier. Who is to say that as a man, I am unable to break down and cry when life gets hard? Our bodies are designed to demonstrate signs of mental anguish. Since I have this capacity as a human being, I feel free to exercise it. But someone says I can't do this. Why? Why am I being asked to sacrifice something I want to do? For whose good is it, really? Let's take another example: It is said that men are brave. However, as a human being, I find the innate drive of self-preservation to be quite a useful thing. Someone may say, "Don't be so concerned about your welfare." But this also represents a sacrifice. Why I am being asked to make it? Again, for whose good am I making it? On what ethical or moral basis is this demand being made?

You see, when you move beyond the rhetorical sleight of hand about "who is a man" and you move beyond the shaming language, you get into a serious debate about just how appropriate it is to ask men to do certain things. But a lot of people don't want to have this kind of debate. They want to couch their demands and their agenda in shallow sound bites ("You're not a real man if you don't do <xyz>"). They want to give critical thinking the runaround and make men docile sheeple who don't ask hard questions about what is demanded of them.

Here's the bottom line: Many of the things we ask of men are not always appropriate, ethical, or humane. Loyalty from a men can keep a workplace together, but it can also keep a dictator in power. Selflessness from men can make for a charitable society, but it can also lead to codependency and enablement for users and abusers. Being emotionally reserved may help a man be calm-headed and clear in thought during a time of crises, but it can leave him out of touch with his own feelings and ultimately out of touch with the feelings of others close to him.

For those who write on manhood, I am sad to say that many of them are lacking in intellectual honesty and integrity. Why don't they just be straightforward and tell us that the qualities they attribute to "manhood" are really just things they want men to do or be? Why don't they admit that every time they quip, "You are not a real man," they are just voicing their frustration that some men are not complying with their desires? In fact, this whole nonsense about who is and is who is not a "real man" is nothing more than a badly dubbed remix of the "No True Scotsman" Fallacy.

Maybe the sacrifices we ask men to make are appropriate from time to time. But let's be genuinely open to a discussion about these things. Someone may say that realmannspracht is useful in some cases. Indeed, I am certain that taking the easy way out and being manipulative is quite "useful" for the ethically challenged, but for the rest us? As it is, I would like to take a cue from the realmannspracht crowd and ask them to cut the chase and "MAN UP" about what they really are doing.

Dr T: the siren song of crazy, toxic women

Dr. Tara J. Palmatier · 3 October 2011 · Archived copy · Original

[box type="info" icon="none"]

Are you a crazy chick magnet? Does it seem like every woman you fall for eventually turns out to be unstable, destructive, toxic, controlling and abusive? Can't figure out what you're doing? Are you a rescuer of damsels in distress and birds with broken wings?

If you're a woman, does it seem like every man to whom you're attracted has a crazy ex he's trying to get over? Does your partner have a crazy ex with whom he still struggles setting and enforcing boundaries? Are you a rescuer who rescues rescuers?

Are you wondering if you, in fact, may be the crazy one? Are you sick and tired of being sick and tired of your crazy-making relationship pattern?

Tune in to Shrink4Men Radio on the AVfM channel on Monday, October 3, 2011 at 9pm EST when your host, Dr Tara J. Palmatier of Shrink4Men.com, and her guest, Shari Schreiber, M.A. of GettinBetter.com, will discuss the attraction crazy, abusive and self-destructive women hold for some men. If you have questions or would like to share your experiences with Dr T and Shari, telephone lines will be open (+1 310 388 9709.)

[/box]

AVfM Radio: Hypergamy – what every man should know

Paul Elam · 4 October 2011 · Archived copy · Original

[box icon="none"]

Tonight, on AVfM Radio, get aboard the train to hypergamy! We are going to take an in depth look at how this social custom, rooted in our human sociobiology, examine why it used to work, and why it is now a source of the destruction of men. Of course all of this will be delivered with the expected red pill perspective, which of course makes us right about everything.

Also tonight, news on the FBI plans to expand the definition of rape, female firefighting applicants in Chicago that can't pass a physical exam but want the job anyway, bad enough to sue for it, Amanda Knox and her international pussy pass, along with other very topical stories.

We will also be featuring an interview with Tom Manlack of the Good Mangina Project Magazine, with perhaps a surprise for Tom as well.

It all adds up to one great show, folks, so be sure to tune in live and catch it as it happens. You can listen in here, and join us in the chat room for some behind the scenes banter.

And don't forget, the call in number is 310-388-9709. You can also skype in if you are a registered follower of the show. And speaking of that, if you listen, but are not registered, it brings shame to men across the entire world from which they may never recover.

Cheers, folks, looking forward to getting your great calls.

[/box]

FBI to “re-define” the meaning of rape

Robert O'Hara · 4 October 2011 · Archived copy · Original

[box type=”info” icon=”none”]

Washington D.C. 3 October (AVFM News) On Thursday September 29th the Baltimore Sun and other news sources reported that a meeting would convene on the 18th of October in Baltimore Maryland to be hosted by the FBI in which, for the first time in 80 years, the bureau’s definition of Rape would be updated. Currently, the FBI defines rape as “The carnal knowledge of a female forcibly and against her will” which has been widely interpreted as to only include vaginal penetration.

This definition excludes oral or anal penetration as well as male rape. Also excluded are the instances where the woman (or man it is presumed) is “incapacitated” through the use of a “date rape” drug or otherwise “intoxicated.” The definition is used by the FBI’s Uniform Crime Reports and National Victimization Survey, both of which are used to allocate resources to the investigation and prosecution of crimes as they are defined by the FBI. This will be the first time in 80 years that the definition of Rape has been revised.

The definition is clearly a very narrow one as it excludes forms of sex other than vaginal as well as male victims. However, the inclusion of having sex with a woman who has, of her on volition, consumed alcohol and while under the influence consents to sex is a matter of concern that many Men’s Rights activists have bitterly complained about for a long time as it is now the de-facto classification for rape in many jurisdictions. In fact, advocates in the sexual grievance industry have long sought to make having sex with a woman who has consumed alcohol a justification for the charge of Rape every bit as much as if a man had held a knife to the throat of a woman while having sex with her.

The organizations that make up the multibillion dollar, multinational Sexual Grievance Industry would benefit handsomely from a re-allocation of resources from the FBI in order to fund their activities which include training police in sex crime investigation as well as victim advocacy. Clearly what is at issue here is what exactly makes a real Rape victim and who is to benefit from the reclassification of what a rape victim is.

This announcement by the Baltimore Sun comes just over a year after a scathing commentary written by reporter, Justin Fenton, the same reporter who published the announcement of the upcoming meeting, sharply criticized the Baltimore Police Department’s handling of sexual assault reports. In that editorial, as well as the current article announcing the October 18th meeting, Mr. Fenton identifies the decline of reported rapes in the city as a failure of the police department. This is obviously counter intuitive as one would think that a decrease in reported rapes would signify a success in the protection against rape and other forms of sexual assault.

Additionally, Mr. Fenton’s criticizes instances in which police dropped investigations after evaluating in many cases that those filing complaints were, in fact, not being truthful and were filing complaints in order to provide alibis for infidelity and or for many of the other reasons that false rape claims have been documented to occur. This also is counter intuitive as one would think that weeding out false and or otherwise unfounded rape allegations would free police to investigate legitimate claims of rape and other violent crime thus providing better protection for true victims.

Contemporaneously to last years Baltimore Sun editorial, MND published a piece written by the False Rape Society covering the false rape reporting epidemic in Orlando Florida in which police urged those filing false police reports reconsider or they may face prosecution. Clearly, the problems of false reports of rape to the police were not limited to Baltimore. In fact many police departments and prosecutors around the country routinely complain of false accusations and frivolous reports of sexual assaults resulting in wasted police time and resources not to mention the incarceration and prosecution of innocent men.

AVFM News' phone calls to the FBI's field offices in Baltimore and to the National Headquarters in Washington D.C. yielded no information whatsoever as to the nature of the upcoming meeting in Baltimore. No mention of the meetings comes up in a search of the FBI website. It is still unknown and unreported by both the FBI and the Baltimore Sun as to whether or not the meeting will be a public one or one in which only pre-determined stake holders can attend and comment on the new definition of Rape. This is a matter of great concern as if the FBI's definition of rape includes the act of having sex with a woman who has consumed alcohol and yet can still give consent is subject to investigation and prosecution by the police thus inevitably leading to innocent men going to jail.

AVFM News is going to cover this developing story vigorously and will provide regular updates.

Sources:

http://www.fbi.gov/about-us/cjis/ucr/crime-in-the-u.s/2010/crime-in-the-u.s.-2010/the-nations-two-crime-measures http://articles.baltimoresun.com/2011-09-29/news/bs-md-ci-fbi-rape-definition-20110929_1_sexual-assaults-definition-fbi-plans http://articles.baltimoresun.com/2010-06-28/news/bs-ed-baltimore-rape-statistics-20100628_1_number-of-rape-cases-sexual-assaults-victims http://abusegate.mensnewsdaily.com/2010/06/28/the-orlando-false-rape-epidemic/

[/box]

Defining and Implementing Zeta Masculinity

cooterbee · 5 October 2011 · Archived copy · Original

[dropcap]Z[/dropcap]eta Masculinity is not a new concept. It has existed since the Axial Age and has had many adherents in every epoch of civilization since. Though it comes to our attention when many attempts at proscribing a new masculinity are in vogue. Most of these are contrived collections of mores and traits constructed at the behest of and for the convenience of women. Zeta masculinity is very different. It is ancient. It has always been a viable life strategy. The principles are unified and well developed. It is unquestionably and uniquely male in origin and practice. So much so that it is doubtful that any woman could ever pursue or mimic it and it would never be mistaken for a feminist inspired new manhood.

The main difference between the traditional Alpha, Beta, Omega model of masculinity and Zeta masculinity is focus. Traditional masculinity emphasizes duty to the man's particular society and the women in it. Zeta masculinity is devotion to a duty to humanity as a whole within in the service of virtue. The familiar traditional model depends greatly upon physical prowess, conformity and aggression – traits that advance the interests of society. Men who are not physically gifted men, men who are inhibited in the ways of aggression or have an unconventional turn of mind can often struggle to obtain an acceptable self image using the traditional model. Zeta masculinity, on the other hand, places a premium upon discipline and mental acuity – characteristics that further civilization, that ALL men can cultivate and do not have to be born with. Since it is not inborn, it can be acquired peace-meal, refined and altered according to a man's particular situation, and even discarded as conditions warrant.

Core Concepts – The three "V's"

Virtue – To a Zeta, virtue is an important concept. It is not to be confused with hand wringing shame over sexuality or bathroom activity. It is the manifestation of supremely developed skill – as in a virtuoso. Virtue is far too important an idea to limit it to the mere abstention from sex.

Volition – Other types of men have duties and responsibilities forced upon them by society. A Zeta man voluntarily selects his own duties in furtherance of his own purposes. This has two very important implications for mankind: 1) The individual judgment of a Zeta is superior to and more functional than the received edicts of his society. He may freely choose the optimum solution over the proscribed and most often faulty course of action that his society directs. 2) A Zeta may change his mind. When events go badly, the Zeta man has the flexibility to evaluate circumstances and change direction immediately and unapologetically. Ordinary men typically do not. They are bound by such sentiments as "My country right or wrong", "He who is not for us is against us" or even a simple "Stay the course." Only an ordinary, traditional man would think, "A man's gotta do what a man's gotta do". A Zeta believes a man's gotta do what he sees fit.

Veracity – Truth is the Zeta's stock in trade. It is his final and only authority and the basis of everything he thinks, says or does. He spreads it like seed and he gathers it like grain.

Prominent Zetas of the Past

Plato, Themistocles, Augustus, Seneca, Diocletian, Augustine, Gregory the Great, Benedict, Scotus, Anselm, Chaucer, Dante, Copernicus, Machiavelli, Columbus, Luther, Marlowe, Raleigh, Newton, Penn, Charles II,Voltaire, Rossini, Casanova, Hamilton, Jefferson, Emerson, Lincoln, Forrest, Bismark, Lord Byron, Lloyd George, Hemingway, Lenin, Rohm, Hess, Shostakovitch, Picasso

Special Mention

Diogenes – Cynic philosopher who slept in a barrel and carried a lamp through Athens in daylight looking for an honest man. Had the stones to trifle with Alexander the Great (Alpha if there ever was one) not once but twice and was permitted to live. Alexander went out to meet the notorious Diogenes and found him sun bathing. Alexander asked Diogenes if there was anything he could do for him. Diogenes said "Yes. Get out of my light." Alexander also found him studying a pile of bones. Diogenes told Alexander that he was searching for the bones of Alexander's father (Phillip II) but he could not distinguish them from the bones of a slave. Alexander stated that if he were not Alexander, he would wish to be Diogenes.

Julian the Apostate – Roman Emperor, writer, reformer and most accomplished man of his time. Gibbon (a celebrated Beta) said of him that if he had not been Emperor, Julian would have excelled in any circumstance. He would have obtained or at least deserved the highest honors of any profession he chose.

Zeta Jump Start

It is the nature of Zeta masculinity to be highly individualized. Therefore, it doesn't lend itself readily to rules or guiding principles. Most of the writings about Zeta are often a bit vague as Zetas don't demand any particular behavior of another man. Still, there is at least one proven tenant that if fully explicated and diligently applied to all facets of life, will yield the intended result. A man need to remember only one thing:

"A man is rich in proportion to the number of things he can afford to let alone." – Henry David Thoreau

[unordered_list style="bullet"]

- If he can let pussy alone, there is no chance of being exploited by women.
- If he can let pride alone, he cannot be manipulated.
- If he can let fame alone, he will not be a target for envy.
- If he can let drugs and alcohol alone, he avoids a myriad of problems. etc.

[/unordered_list]

By this saying, a Zeta is always a very rich man. He practices the virtue of restraint and sets himself apart from those on the hamster wheel. He does so according to his own priorities and his own understanding. He is his own man and an indisputably masculine one. It is now and has always been the mark of a superior existence.

An open letter to William Bennett

Paul Elam · 6 October 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Dear Mr. Bennett,

I read with some interest, and, I have to add, mild amusement, your recent piece at cnn.com on the state of men in this country. I have to admit I was impressed to see a bureaucrat actually present some meaningful statistics regarding the deteriorating state of men and boys, but I found your conclusions both lacking and myopic.

After addressing the overarching problem of men's disappearance from education and the workforce, and the debilitating apathy that seems to be eating away at the motivation of young men, you gave us what? Too many video games? Get a job, shape up?

Man up?

Well, Mr. Bennett, let me ask you a question here. What if, for some reason, the response from the average young man in this culture to any of these coercive demands is, "Thanks for the suggestions, Mr. Bennett. Now get out of my face with your bullshit"?

Thing is, Bill, were I 24 instead of 54, that is exactly what I would tell you. And I would have very, very sound reasons for saying it. The primary reason would be men like you. But allow me to explain.

You were the U.S. Secretary of Education from 1985 to 1988. During that time many of the nation's feminist academicians furthered their ideological control over our universities and began adopting virulently anti-male policies that precisely correlate to the departure of men from our institutions of higher education. Those institutions were, and still are, aggressively pursuing programs to further the education of women across the board, while ignoring men at best and demonizing them at worst.

During those same years we saw an astronomical increase in the doping of our young boys with drugs like Ritilin, under pressure of school officials now prone to pathologize the normal behavior of boys as a matter of convenience. This drug, sometimes great for controlling behavior when incompetent people can't, is now being linked to cancer, particularly of the liver.

I believe the nation got your message on drugs when you opined that the beheading of drug dealers was "morally plausible." So, where was your strident opinionating when this was happening to our boys? Where is it now?

I wonder, Mr. Bennett, when the Obama Administration recently issued its executive decision to strong-arm colleges into reducing the burden of proof for sexual assault allegations on campus from "reasonable doubt," to a "preponderance of the evidence," effectively stripping men of their right to face accusers and refute allegations, just where were you?

The United States, over several decades running concurrent with your professional life, has erected an egregiously corrupt and discriminatory family law system that renders marriage little less than a house of horrors in which men regularly find themselves trapped. It is a system that destroys them and their children; strips them of assets and sacred constitutional rights as a matter of routine, putting them under the oppressive thumb of state functionaries. This is the same court system that has made an industry, a cash cow, of unsubstantiated restraining orders and false allegations.

Do you know who Thomas James Ball was, Mr. Bennett? Do you have any idea at all of why he stepped up and self-immolated in front of a family court building? Was it because his life had been so reduced by the family courts that he saw no other way out? Or did he just need to man up and take it?

There you have it, sir. Men who are driven from family and education invariably fall from employment and society at large, sometimes in a blaze; sometimes more quietly.

Consider what is happening in Japan right now. The Soushoku Danshi, or herbivores as we know them in the English translation, now represent a healthy majority of young men in Japan. These are men who have dropped out; from marriage; from much of the mainstream job market, and most notably from any concern with the understanding of manhood espoused by men like you. They simply don't care anymore.

And if you investigate them as thoroughly as you apparently looked in to what is happening to American men, you will find some information that might surprise you. Their mass exodus from mainstream society, which bodes poorly for the future economic health of Japan, ties directly to the rise of feminist ideology and governance in that country. Those young men have read the writing on the wall, felt it, and reacted to it, much in the same way you are witnessing in the men in this country; men whom you presume to lecture but don't bother to understand in any better terms than your perceived uses for them.

You might want to ask yourself a very important question, Mr. Bennett. What, and I mean other than autocratic chastising, is supposed to serve as motivation for young men to pay attention to you? What are they to do, just continue to line up for their turn as cannon fodder for our imperialism in the middle east? Get themselves a wife and a couple of kids while they are at it? And then head back home with PTSD for their turn in the grind of our family justice system?

I have to say, in all frankness, that I would brace myself for the answers if ever you wanted to drop the condescending judgments and actually ask some young men why they are dropping out. One of the answers you might hear more than once is "Kiss my ass."

But I am betting on something else to be more the case. I am pretty sure that you would not get an answer at all. Because the reaction for a lot of these young men, when faced with these kinds of questions from men like you, is absolute silence. It is not that they don't have an opinion. They have lots of opinions, but you won't likely be hearing them. Something tells me that getting to the next level in World of Warcraft is more important than talking to the likes of you.

Spotting violence and hate

John Hembling (JtO) · 7 October 2011 · Archived copy · Original

[dropcap]V[/dropcap]iolence is a foundation of modern feminism. I have argued this for a long time; that violence and hatred form feminism's ideological core. While many men's rights advocates will agree, to the general public, the ideology claiming to pursue that moving goal of equivalence is still seen as good, noble, and diligently egalitarian.

This is manifest in opponents of the men's rights movement attempting to discredit men's-rights arguments by calling them "anti feminist." The anti-feminist claim is strictly correct, but intended that a listener should hear "anti human rights," when the "anti-feminist," claim is made.

It would have been impossible to drive the Klu Klux Klan into it's current secretive incarnation without wide understanding among the American public that the group was fundamentally anti-human, violent and hateful. Early incarnations of the KKK operated openly in the Southern United States, often with the tacit or direct cooperation of law enforcement agencies.

Now I'll pause here to give everyone a moment to tut tut and claim some variation of Godwin's law. "Oh no! He compared feminists to the Klan!" At which point I should dutifully back-peddle with some weasel-talk.

In fact, I'm not tip-toeing around this comparison – I am directly comparing big-feminism to the violent, racist, supremacist hate organization commonly called the KKK. To some readers, this might seem like an extreme exaggeration. I'm making this claim, aware that the argument may be dismissed out of hand. However, individuals incapable of evaluating a claim outside the zone of their own comfortable reality won't be convinced by any evidence whether it's presented in large or small doses. If that's you, tell yourself that the author of this piece is a whiny woman hater. Stop reading, go back to watching TV, shopping and eating Cheese Covered Wacky Fries.™

In comparing feminism to the identified violent hate movement of the Klan it's necessary to identify some details and differences.

The Klan is certainly not defunct in 2011, but has lost much of its former perceived legitimacy. The Klan was and is a movement built on hatred and violence – and this is the basis for comparison to big feminism. Where the movements differ is in sophistication, brand-perception and successful occupation of the public zeitgeist.

Feminism capitalizes on our built-in wiring to protect women against threats. In a modern culture with a comparative absence of threats to women, feminist ideologues have drafted up the endlessly shapable threat of "patriarchy" and all the attendant imagined manifestations of danger. They have instructed our culture that men, the doers of the human race, are the source of all evil. Once identified as enemy – the violence at feminism's core can be easily expressed while avoiding public recognition. The significant difference separating feminism's violence from that of well-recognized violent movements such as the Klan is that feminism's violence is largely indirect, rather than direct.

Big feminism is the ideology occupying the centre of public zeitgeist. I've made this claim before, as have others. [1][2][3] The only reason feminism is even identifiable as a point of view separate from "common sense" is because it has no end point, and keeps moving forward. Rather, the "goals" of feminism are slowly but endlessly expanding. No matter what advances are made on behalf of women – it will never be enough, and new distortions of reality will be conjured which must be corrected by elevated affirmative action, funding, protections and so on. The violence at feminism's core will continue to be hidden behind language, and mis-attributed to that omnipresent bogeyman; the patriarchy. Violence is both the centre of feminist doctrine – as well as the key to publicly discrediting an ideology of hate. Due to the dominance of public narrative by feminist doctrine, a perceptive block obscures comprehension of the violence that doctrine depends on and creates. This brings us to the need for some explicit discussion of just what constitutes violence.

Direct Violence Disguised.

Obviously, direct and overt violence should be recognizable to most people. Punching, slapping, kicking, blunt trauma, as well as violence done with sharp objects – and in some cases , firearms. This is easily recognizable – although weirdly, even such direct actions as that just listed is often not identified a violence when committed by a female.

Recall the cheering and giggling over the pre-meditated severing if a man's sexual organs by the violent offender Catherine Becker on the daytime show The Talk. Of the show's five hosts, only one, Sara Gilbert seemed aware that cheering over mutilating of a human being was the behavior of a psychopath. Her observation that a case involving a female victim would be distinctly unfunny was brushed aside by the other hosts with some variation of the dismissive "it's different."

The Kool Aid of mainstream feminist doctrine runs deep when aggravated assault and permanent grievous body harm is mistaken for slapstick comedy because the victim happens not to own ovaries. The mostly female studio audience thought it was hilarious as well, and when CBS broadcast the false apology of Sharon Osborne, she couldn't stop giggling long enough to make it through her 2 minutes of stage-managed contrition. This spectacle is far from unique – violence done against men is routinely explained away as anything except the obvious. But excusing direct and overt violence with rationalizing language and cognitive smog is only one area that a rational evaluation shows feminism to be an ideology built on violence.

Violence under the aegis of big feminism takes several other forms as well.

Displaced Brutality

Because continuous exposure to derogation can render the offence perceptually invisible, it's necessary to directly identify here, a number of types of violence.

[unordered_list style="green-dot"]

- Forced physical restraint of a person with manacles, plastic zip ties, or a cage is violence.
- Physical incapacitation of a person by aerosol based weapon is violence.
- Physical incapacitation of a person by electric shock is violence.
- Grabbing a person and throwing them to the ground, against a wall or a vehicle is violence.

[/unordered_list]

These acts are all /still/ violence when they're done by somebody else, on behalf of the person who initiated it. For example, if a woman in a fit of pique calls 911 and tells the police she has been attacked by her husband – whether the complaint is based on truth or not – functionaries employed by the state will attend the scene – will manacle the husband, and depending on his submission to this treatment, may also baton him, pepper spray him or use high voltage to subdue him. This will all usually occur prior to investigation of the claim's veracity, if indeed that is ever examined. Then they will lock him in a cage.

To state the obvious – this is all violence – enacted on the behalf of a woman, and it follows a version of the provided script because law and law enforcement are governed by our society's mainstream ideology – and that is feminism.

If the state's armed enforcers are summoned by a man victimized by direct violence from a woman, she may be arrested. This is not the usual outcome, but if a violent female is arrested, it will almost always be done with extreme caution and care for her physical safety. A more common result for a man summoning police for his own protection in a case of assault-by-wife is that he is arrested, barred from returning to his home, pepper sprayed, baton-ed, and publicly excoriated by local news media.

The social dynamic between the class of humans called women and the police is similar to that between royalty and palace guards. Certainly, occasionally misbehaving royalty are chided and sometimes physically restrained by the palace guards – but this is a qualitatively different dynamic than enforcement of social caste between royalty and the grimy peasantry.

Violence enacted at one remove by state funded enforcers is not the only example of displaced brutality.

Besides the physical displacement of violence, our culture psychologically displaces violence by pretending to oppose it in narrow areas, and willfully ignoring it where it is much more prevalent.

Are we doing enough to stop violence against women?
This rhetorical question is routinely asked in public service campaigns organized and paid for by everybody from the united nations to the local women's shelter in your city. The question suggests that violence against women is prevalent, and that a non trivial fraction of our culture resources are not already devoted to addressing it. Both of these implied premises are false. A visit to the bureau of justice statistics website[4] shows that men are now, and always have been the principal victims of violence in society, and a large body of peer reviewed research shows in domestic violence, both men and women are victims, and in reciprocally violent relationships – women are as aggressive, or more aggressive than their male counterparts[5].

So why are public campaigns to reduce social and domestic violence never about stopping violence against men and women? Why are we endlessly bludgeoned with the imperative to stop only the violence against women? Nobody producing such messaging can reasonably claim ignorance of the overwhelming male victim demographic, or the coequally male and female victim demographic in domestic violence.

The answer is simple. Addressing only half the problem in DV, and wilfully ignoring the overwhelming male victim demographic in general violent criminal victimization is a strategy designed to not only fail in reducing violence, but to escalate violence within society. In fact, the domestic violence grievance industry pursues this plan-for-failure with the unstated, but real intent of producing more female victims of violence. The grievance industry generates a great deal of public sympathy and associated donation on their manufactured narrative of battered women, but nothing creates moral panic and open wallets as fast as real female casualties. This also produces battered men, obviously, but bloodied and broken male bodies don't pay any bills at the women's centre – so male casualties are simply collateral damage.

But isn't that insane and monstrous? Yes – but it keeps the money flowing.

This is also one of the drivers behind big feminism's ongoing campaign to eliminate due process, habeas corpus and reverse the burden of proof in accusations of rape. This would obviously have profoundly negative consequences to men in sexual relationships – jail would never be more than a whispered accusation away. But the longer term result would almost certainly be female corpses.

[image]The importance of the law as an equal arbiter of grievance between individuals cannot be overstated. Without a mostly impartial legal system for nonviolent redress of grievance, human societies have always, and will always find an alternative resolution to disputes. Without nonviolent legal resolution, what is left? Retributive violence. Feminists such as Jessica Valenti – who are vocal proponents of the abrogation of due process in accusations of rape quite obviously want women to be killed.

Violence also exists behind feminism's ongoing complaint about the supposed wage gap. That the wage gap exists as an imbalance in average lifetime earnings, is used by feminists to pretend that on a job-for-job basis men earn more than their female colleagues. This is a false premise, but its accepted as normal because of 40 years of endless repetition. However, obscured behind this narrative is the ugly reality that of the work place deaths every year – 94% of them are male – and this brutal fact is never addressed outside the framework of mens rights forums.

In fact, mainstream feminist reaction to complaints of the normalized disposability of human lives are answered with standard shaming language that men should man up. Men dying on the job? Quit whining! This goes beyond adhering to a mainstream ideology of violence, it's the wilful reinforcement of killing men for the convenience of a society which discounts their humanity.

In matters of sexual violence – the ideology of feminism surpasses every other area of violence previously mentioned. This too is obvious once identified, but remains smogged behind a cultivated cloud of disinformation. For more than 3 decades – feminist ideologues have indoctrinated the public into a grudging acceptance that the physical expression of sexual love is not the deep connection of interdependence, trust and affection between men and women. The idea that physically expressed love is not the intimate, beautiful act of the genesis of new human life. Rather – feminists ideologues have laboured strenuously to normalize the idea that physically expressed love is actually violence.

The idea that sexual congress is fundamentally an act of aggression and brutality is the most perverse and vile violence against a sane culture, against women, and in particular, against men.

The shaping of adult sexual relations into a framework of perceived brutality and aggression is the realized goal of feminist ideology. This pits women and men against each other not only as competitors, but as enemies in a framework with no resolution, because the expression of biological basis for sexual identity is defined as crime. The only resolution is for our culture to recognize the violence at the root of its now-central ideology. Feminism will continue to shape human society into a brutal and increasingly violent mold, until it is universally repudiated and abandoned.

[1] http://www.mercatornet.com/articles/view/whos_oppressing_who/
[2] http://www.scottlondon.com/interviews/sommers.html
[3] http://www.warrenfarrell.org/
[4] http://bjs.ojp.usdoj.gov/content/glance/tables/vsxtab.cfm
[5] http://www.csulb.edu/~mfiebert/assault.htm

Press release from S.A.V.E.

Robert O'Hara · 7 October 2011 · Archived copy · Original

[box]

In our ongoing effort to convince the White House to be truthful about DV, please email this press release to Valerie Jarrett, director of the White House Council on Women and Girls: vjarrett@who.eop.gov

Thank you!

++++++++++++++++++++++++++++++++

PRESS RELEASE

On Partner Abuse, President Obama Flubs his Facts

Washington DC (Oct. 4, 2011) – Stop Abusive and Violent Environments (SAVE) is calling on President Obama to correct false information in the Domestic Violence Proclamation he issued Monday. At a time when victims are demanding accuracy and accountability, the declaration features misleading statements and inaccurate facts.

The presidential proclamation, issued for Domestic Violence Awareness Month, makes the claim that "One in four women and one in 13 men will experience domestic violence in their lifetime." But multiple studies show that men and women abuse each other at similar rates.

The Center for Disease Control's Youth Risk Behavior Surveillance Survey reveals males are being victimized at a higher rate than females: 10 percent of teenage males versus 9 percent of teenage females report dating violence. In the American Journal of Public Health, a second CDC study of young adults revealed a dramatic gap for one-way violence: in 71 percent of cases, females were the aggressors.

The Obama Proclamation also states, "Young women are among the most vulnerable, suffering the highest rates of intimate partner violence." But the President did not mention that the most important risk factor for female victimization is a woman striking the first blow with a slap, punch, or other form of physical aggression.

This follows Vice President Biden's recent visit to The View (ABC) where he only addressed the problem of male-on-female abuse. The Vice President also side-stepped Whoopi Goldberg's direct question about women hitting men.

The Presidential Proclamation follows a string of high-profile media reports of women harming, or threatening to harm men:

Duke lacrosse accuser Crystal Mangum stabbed her boyfriend Reginald Daye to death in April. In July, Katherine Becker of California drugged her husband, tied him to a bed, and sliced off his penis. Later, actor Daniel Baldwin filed for a restraining order against his wife writing, "My wife has claimed over 10 times in the last two months that she will stab me, slash me or slit my throat in my sleep. I am truly fearful for my life."

Stop Abusive and Violent Environments is a victim-advocacy organization working for evidence-based solutions to partner violence: www.saveservices.org .

[/box]

All right, so men can stop rape. Your point please?

Luigi Logan (aka Fidelbogen) · 7 October 2011 · Archived copy · Original

[dropcap]T[/dropcap]he feminists, our wise and wonderful friends, have a wise and wonderful expression which I am certain you have heard many times. Yes indeed. In their wonderfully wise way, our fine feminist friends have made clear to us that “men can stop rape.”

Now, you might wonder if that maxim contains any wisdom at all, or then again, you might wonder if I am only being a wise guy. So watch closely. I am going to insert this wondrous wisdom into the bench-vise of intellectual violence, cranking the jaws tighter and tighter until the specimen cracks open and parts fly out upon the floor. That way, we can scrutinize them! You would remark nothing phallic in the manner of force applied to the task

Very well, keeping hardlogic on track in the spirit of rhetorical discipline, what does it mean to say that “men can stop rape”? On the face of it, very little. And yet quite a lot. But here, let me break it down by stages, sparing no pains either to myself or to my audience. Everything in this examination turns upon two major points, or rather questions: who or what is “men”, and what does it mean to say that men can “stop” rape? I will address these points in order.

To address the first major point, the subject noun “men” is the plural of “man” — meaning an adult male human. So if we say that “men can stop rape”, we must understand that more than one adult male human is involved in the projected action. This plurality of male participation may be classified under a dual heading: men severally, and men jointly.

[quote style=”boxed” float=”left”]Eventually, men would shun the company of women altogether for the sake of their own survival, so that in theory no women would get raped.[/quote] To speak of men stopping rape severally: almost any man is theoretically able to stop rape, either by personally ceasing a rape action once started, or by intervening to terminate such an action. And any number of men, at separate times and places, will have the like capacity. So even if these men act alone and unknown to each other, they are endowed with the same potential — to either personally cease a rape action, or intervene to terminate one. Therefore it is permitted to class these men as a set or ensemble, from whence we may fairly conclude that men severally can indeed “stop rape”.

And to speak of men stopping rape jointly: if two or more adult human males happen upon a rape action in progress, it is possible for them to intervene and terminate this by acting in concert. Since they are more than one in number, it is here permitted to say that “men have stopped rape” rather than “a man has stopped rape.” In the unusual case of gang rape only one man at a time is raping. Hence it is theoretically possible that his gangmates will have a change of heart and intervene jointly at any given moment to stop him. So again it is permitted to say that “men have stopped rape.”

To sum up, I have noted that “men” is the plural of man. I have further noted that “men” can have two distinctly different senses, so that the possibility of a solitary male stopping rape is not excluded. And I think that exhausts the possible meanings of “men” in the statement “men can stop rape”.

But a final nuance bears consideration. It is possible not only for men jointly or severally to stop a rape action in progress, but for them to intervene in a scenario in order to forestall a merely contemplated rape action. That is to say, the parties would intervene in the scenario before the would-be rapist had effected penetration. In such case it would not be correct to say that they had stopped rape, but only that they had prevented it.

[image]The matter thus far given, is laid out with monotonous clarity and thoroughness. It merely states something that most people could work out for themselves if they would so inhumanly tax their own mental endurance. All in all, it does not meaningfully advance the project of human understanding. It is trite. And it has no utility. Yet the subject of the talk is important. So I have treated it, accordingly, as a matter of import.

I will now address the second major point, referred to in the beginning. The verb “to stop” must be disambiguated even as the noun “men”. I paved the way to this task, in the first part of the talk, when I sketched rape scenarios. But now I must take it a step further. The proposed or imagined project of “stopping” rape may be understood under a dual heading:concretely stopping it, and abstractly stopping it.

We have already made clear what it means to concretely stop rape. It means to either personally desist in a rape action, or to compel somebody else to so desist. We have also underscored the distinction between stopping rape and preventing rape. The talk can now move forward in the light of these understandings.

So, to abstractly stop rape does not mean to stop a precise episode of rape, but to make rape vanish as an earthly phenomenon. Thus, to declare that “men can stop rape” might also mean that men can terminate the very existence of rape. But if you think for a minute, you will see that “stopping” rape in this globally existential way can only mean to prevent rape — any rape — from ever getting started in the first place. That is what it would take.

So it is easy to see that if “men” are to make rape entirely stop existing on earth, they must operate preventatively. Very well, how might they go about this? Briefly, in one or both of the two ways which follow.

The first way, already touched upon, is that men would physically intervene to prevent rape from happening. Now, if this is to be effective toward ending the very existence of rape, one would need to mobilize enormous numbers of men for the task, and to organize these men for both patrolling and intelligence-gathering purposes. Effectively, one would need to create an anti-rape police state. I am sure that most feminists, male and female alike, would find nothing to not like about such a scenario. The female feminists would find ample opportunity to make life miserable for men in general, while the collaborationists (and their white knight helpers) could make life miserable for particular classes of fellow men whom they wish to bully.

The second way, would be for men to never attempt rape under any condition. This would count as prevention by self-restraint, and it would occur through moral persuasion, simple fear, or a combination of these. Either way, the operative force would be mental pressure to not rape. To make such a thing happen, one would need to launch a preventative teaching campaign, a preventative terror campaign, or both. Theoretically, if men en masse were sufficiently lectured, or terrorized, they just might never commit any rapes — and so rape would cease to exist as a phenomenon.

[image]And so we could say that “men” had “stopped rape” — meaning that they had stopped rape in the abstract by preventing rape in the concrete occurrence. But please note that men could effect this only as a joint project. They could not do it severally. For although it is possible for a solitary male to intervene in a concrete rape episode, and stop it, it is not possible for a solitary male by any personal action short of magic, to abolish rape in the abstract. He, as an individual, has no such capacity. That would be a manifest absurdity. So if you confront some individual man with the imperative that “men” should stop rape in the abstract, that man would be quite within his rights to say, “don’t look at me. I am not ‘men’!”

Now, concerning anti-rape moral persuasion efforts: these are already underway, since anti-rape preaching and pedagogy — targeting the young especially — have been a great industry for many years. This can certainly be ramped up a lot more.

As for the terror campaign: that was earlier sketched, in part, when we spoke of an anti-rape police apparatus. Another way to foment terror, is to lubricate the criminal justice machinery with more innocent blood by making it easier to obtain rape convictions. Feminists similar to Catherine MacKinnon are working hard, mostly behind the scenes where they can’t be seen, to make this dream come true by securing the necessary innovations in the legal system. The beauty of this strategy is, that even though it would punish a lot more actual rapists by locking up everybody who got hauled into court in the first place, it would be effective as terror EVEN if none but the innocent were destroyed.

Eventually, men would shun the company of women altogether for the sake of their own survival, so that in theory no women would get raped. Of course, this does not take male-on-male prison rape into account, but since the feminists don't care about that, I'm sure they'll be happy with the solution. As for the collaborationists and white knights, they won't care because they think that false rape conviction only happens to MRAs, proletarians, losers, and assorted goofballs.

Very well. I think I have squeezed everything that you could ever hope to squeeze from the feminist wisdom that "men can stop rape" — unless somebody can think of anything I missed. It is difficult to understand why they keep saying this, since what they are saying is either insignificant or morally grotesque. Personally, I think it is just a way to rape your mind.

Saint Louis University: corruption exposed

Paul Elam · 8 October 2011 · Archived copy · Original

[box icon="none"]

To: Lawrence Biondi, S.J.
President, Saint Louis University biondi@slu.edu

Undergraduate Admission
admitme@slu.edu

Transfer Student Admission transfer@slu.edu

International Student Admission international@slu.edu

Adult Education Admission
sps@slu.edu

Graduate Student Admission
gradadm@slu.edu

Graduate Business Student Admission
gradbiz@slu.edu

Law School Student Admission law@slu.edu

Medical School Student Admission
slumd@slu.edu

[/box]

Greetings All:

My name is Paul Elam. I am a men's advocate in Houston, Texas. I am writing you after being contacted by a SLU student who expressed concerns about your policy on sexual assault. After reading that policy I not only agreed with the student's concerns, but I honestly found your recently amended policy to be rife with the potential for abuse, perhaps even designed for it. Either way, it is wrought with such injustice that it warrants your punishment for it. I intend to administer that punishment in my own way.

I have some questions to pose first. They are purely rhetorical. I understand the nature of most of the sanctimonious pricks and virulent gender ideologues that govern modern university settings, and don't dare to imagine that you would stoop to answer my questions, or indeed that you would even imagine your choices should suffer scrutiny. But for the purpose of this missive I will ask them anyway.

Your policy states that "It is the responsibility of the person initiating the sexual activity to obtain the affirmative consent of the other party throughout the duration of said activity."

Let us take on this particular part of your policy in two steps, the first being the use of the term "person initiating." Just how does one define this in the social setting? If a young couple go on a date and engage in mutual kissing and other forms of foreplay, then who is the initiator? Is it the first person who leans inward for the first kiss? What if the person who initiated the first kiss is not the first person to initiate more kissing or the touching of sexual areas?

What if the first person to initiate the touching of sexual areas is not the first person to start disrobing? How do you even pretend to identify a primary initiator at all? It certainly is not addressed in your posted guidelines.

To be more pointed here, isn't your use of the term "person initiating," just code speak for "target the male"? Of course it is. Like I said, the questions are rhetorical.

The second part of this section stipulates that your surreptitiously designated male student must, "obtain the affirmative consent of the other party throughout the duration of said activity."

"Throughout the duration of said activity"? Some questions come to mind here, the first one of course is what on earth you mean by that? Does this mean that consent must be obtained for each kiss, or is consent for one kiss deemed to cover any future kisses during that interaction?

If consent is given to fondle one breast, must "the initiator" then obtain a separate verbal consent to touch the other one? If so, must consent be given to return to the breast that was originally touched?

I will spare you the possible confusion of addressing all the possibilities that come with touching the vagina, but have to ask about the matter of penetration and intercourse. I assume that after a woman has fully disrobed and pulled an equally naked and sexually aroused man to lay in between her legs, that he must still obtain verbal consent to enter her. That is a given, at least in your world. But must consent be obtained for each thrust into the vagina? What if the woman is on top and is literally in control of penetration? Must she get consent each time she raises up, before she lowers herself down again?

And finally, if the woman clearly is the one who initiated sexual activity but fails to get an articulated "yes" at any given point of sexual activity, does this mean she has committed a sexual assault?

More importantly, though, is the part of your policy regarding incapacitation, or, to wit, that "[V]alid consent cannot be obtained from a person whose ability to make decisions is substantially impaired by alcohol, drugs, or other intoxicants…"

Of course, this begs some important questions. What is the BAC (blood alcohol content) at which a woman is incapable of informed consent? Has such a BAC been established? How will you measure the BAC of an alleged victim after a sexual assault on those grounds has been alleged? Should male students carry portable breathalyzer test kits?

Will evidence that any amount of alcohol was consumed suffice, or will you only require the alleged victim to allege she was drinking? What if the man was drinking as well? Does this mean that a man who is intoxicated is also not capable of making informed decisions and thus has any accountability removed, as you have with women?

Are you concerned that your policy facilitates the ability for any young woman on your campus to act in a sexually impulsive way, choosing, however poorly, to engage in sex with a male student, and then decide later that the two beers she (might have) ingested gives her the option to literally destroy the academic life and future of her sexual partner simply by claiming she was incapacitated, and thus raped? Or was this, perhaps, your intent when you drafted the policy?

These questions may appear facetious to you, but are they not precisely the types of questions you should expect when you issue a vague and incomplete policy that attempts to micromanage the personal sexual activity of every student on your campus? And should they not be asked, especially given the devastating sway this policy gives you over the young lives you are entrusted to protect?

I have read that policy thoroughly and find none of these areas have been addressed. In fact, it seems not so much like a policy as it does a distorted and dangerous edict, written in the form of highly flexible Orwellian twaddle, designed specifically to allow the criminalizing and entrapment of decent, law abiding young men – with the aim of ruining their lives and scoring points among a back slapping group of corrupt and disingenuous university officials.

Couple all this with the recent federal instructions you have been given to honor standards of evidence in these allegations that comply with the "preponderance of the evidence," vs the more stringent and credible, "reasonable doubt," standards, and you have just devised a policy that resides mainly on "he said, she said," with the distinct subtext that what "he said," really doesn't matter.

Just ask your own star basketball players, Kwamain Mitchell and Willie Reed Jr., both of whom you summarily booted from your school based only on an accusation, and one that did not have enough merit for a prosecutor to pursue. Your own investigations also turned up exactly squat on these two young men, but it was too late for them. The damage, that you inflicted, was done. Even before your recent, even more insane policy changes, your school administration proved that it operates with malice in these areas.

This, of course, brings us back to your policy again, which states, with such authoritarian brio, "even if criminal justice authorities choose not to prosecute, the university can pursue disciplinary action."

Of course you can. Indeed, you systematically start the disciplinary actions before any investigation has been done at all. And you write policies that justify this kind of over-the-top reaction. Indeed, that is precisely the purpose of this message.

And lest you think that my rhetorical questions about your policy formed the thrust of this letter, I assure you otherwise. Your university has already taken these kinds of Gestapo policies beyond the pale and the time has come for citizens concerned with this type of institutionalized persecution and bigotry to take some action.

Unfortunately, given your insulated positions and the current social Zeitgeist that favors rape hysteria, I am not in a position to do everything that needs to be done. What I can do, however, is expose most anyone searching for information on the internet about your school to a growing collection of articles and commentary that expose what Saint Louis University is up to.

This email is also serving as the first of those articles. It is possible that by the time you have passed this around and discussed it you will find that a search engine query on your school will return this piece in a relatively high ranking, positioned for effective exposure. My next article, "Will Your Daughter be the Next Rape Victim at St. Louis University?" will be out within a week or two.

That will be followed by many more of similar, more focused content, and as they increase in number, so will their presence in search results, until the average query will return the link to your schools website, and nothing else but damning commentary advising parents not to send their children to your school, warning them both of the danger of rape (using your words), and that of false allegations leading to abuses by SLU (using the actual news stories that cover them). I know, it is a small step, but it has been remarkably effective in some ways.

If, for some reason, you think this is a bluff, or that I can't follow through, then do a search on a prosecutor for the state of Maine, Mary Kellett. Kellett is a corrupt prosecutor of the Mike Nifong variety that has made a career of prosecuting innocent men. She would love your school, I am sure. But now anyone that does a search on her will find the truth. I spearheaded the actions that made that happen.

Kellett was so frustrated and angered by this that her fellow prosecutors sought to get a gag order on me to prevent all the bad press I was giving her. Of course they failed. Not that I would have complied anyway.

You might also do a search on Mount Royal University. The one article I did on their school appears quickly in search returns, near the top, above the return for their wiki page. That single article has resulted in a steady stream of traffic to my site since the day I posted it. Articles on your school will provide even more.

To be clear, this is not an attempt at blackmail. One, I know your policy will not change, and two, even if it did, it would not alter my course in the least. As I said, this is punishment, not dialogue. I have no reason, nor any interest in, talking to you. In fact, the only reason I sent you this in an email is because I know that arrogant academicians loathe, above all else, dissent they are powerless to silence. So I did it for the pure pleasure.

Just be advised that while I cannot stop you from forming corrupt policy, or from dragging more young men than you already have into Kafkaesque nightmares, I can make sure that a very healthy number of people find out about it, and grow my website at the same time. I love a win-win, and I hope you do as well.

Dear Students of Saint Louis University:

John Hembling (JtO) · 9 October 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Dear Students and Prospective Students of Saint Louis University:

Due to recent changes in the university's policy on sexual conduct between students, all sexual activity involving male students, and prospective male students is officially classified by the school as sexual assault. All sexual encounters between complimentary-sexed students attending SLU will be treated by the administration as sexual assault, independent of standard interpretations of state and federal law.

This policy will be selectively enforced in all cases, including where sexual activity has not occurred, but is merely alleged to have occurred. Exceptions to the interpretation of all sexual activity as assault will be made solely in cases where female students actively initiate sexual contact at every stage of a sexual encounter, and where male participants remain entirely passive throughout, routinely asking for permission to continue being aroused at intervals of no longer than 4 minutes.

Male students or prospective students may also be subject to academic sanction by the school in cases where they are non-participant to sex, or not attending the school, or not in the country, depending on anonymous accusation.

It is therefore the implied recommendation of the school's administration and faculty that male students do not attend Saint Louis University, nor have any contact of any kind with female students or prospective female students – since any such contact may be deemed rape by the school's administration.

This is not satire, and thank you for your kind attention.

SLU's sexual assault policy defines sexual assault and consent in the following terms:

Annotations by the editorial board of AVfM are highlighted.

What is sexual assault?
"Sexual assault" refers to engaging in any form of sexual contact or conduct with another without that person's clear, knowing, and voluntary consent.
[box type="note" icon="none"]
Unfortunately, for the interface between SLU's policy and the real world, "knowing voluntary consent" doesn't exist. Sex in the real world is a dance of instincts, high emotions, hormonally driven behavior, and half unaware cultural ritual.
[/box]

It is the responsibility of the person seeking to initiate sexual contact or conduct to affirmatively obtain such consent.
[box type="note" icon="none"]
Male students intent on pursuing sexual relations with classmates can obtain "permission to initiate sexual contact form: 31a.2.4" at the student union building between 8:00 am and 2:00 pm upon proof of payment of tuition and two forms of photo ID. Completed and signed consent forms should be submitted to the bursar's office no later than 24 hours prior to initiation of sexual contact.
[/box] It is not the responsibility of the intended recipient of such sexual contact to affirmatively deny such consent.
[box type="note" icon="none"]
Obtained consent to sex from female participants may be retroactively re-interpreted post facto, this rendering previous consensual sexual encounters into rape after the event, at the discretion of the school administration, or anyone else.[/box]

What is consent?

“Consent” refers to explicit, verbal agreement to engage in, and continue to engage in, sexual activity.
[box type=”note” icon=”none”]
Since sex in the real world doesn’t work like this – sexual consent in the real world is always implied – all actually consensual sex occurring within school demesnes is definitionally sexual assault under these guidelines.
[/box]

Consent is affirmative and freely given (e.g., saying “yes”).
[box type=”note” icon=”none”]
Consent may also be signalled by notarized letter, or by both parties completing the school’s “permission to initiate sexual contact form: 31a.2.4” which can be obtained at the student union building between 8:am and 2:pm Monday though Thursday
[/box] Consent may be withdrawn at any time.
[box type=”note” icon=”none”]
Consent may be withdrawn at any time, including afterwards, the next day, or weeks later, resulting in life altering actions against you.
[/box] Valid consent cannot be obtained from a person whose ability to make a decision is substantially impaired by alcohol, drugs or other intoxicants
[box type=”note” icon=”none”]
Any sex following the consumption of alcohol by a female is automatically rape, at the discretion of the school’s administration, or any female faculty or student. Male students seduced by females while said male students are under the influence of any intoxicant will remain liable and culpable for all voluntary actions taken, no matter how impaired.
[/box] or by mental or physical condition;
[box type=”note” icon=”none”]
The condition of sexual arousal of female students participating in sex qualifying as physical condition rendering given consent to sex void. Additionally, being alive, mammalian, and bipedal also being qualifying physical conditions negating any stated consent, and thereby rendering consensual sex as rape.
[/box] who is unaware that the sexual activity is being committed (e.g., asleep or passed out); or who is compelled or coerced to grant consent by force, threat of force, deception,
[box type=”note” icon=”none”](Female sexual participants lying about birth control, or the identity of the person who impregnates them, are exempt from this clause, and any other elements of this policy that affect female sexual misconduct.)[/box]

The War on College Men at Saint Louis University

Walter Romans (TDOM) · 10 October 2011 · Archived copy · Original

[dropcap]O[/dropcap]n college campuses across the United Statesa war is being waged on male students. Earlier this year, the US Department of Education issued a “Dear Colleague” letter requiring universities, under Title 9, to render findings in all allegations of sexual misconduct according to a “preponderance of evidence” rather than “clear and convincing” or “beyond reasonable doubt.”

A preponderance of evidence is anything over 50%, meaning that if it is more than likely than not that an incident occurred, the accused must be found guilty and is subject to disciplinary action. This means that a male student’s reputation, life, and future career may be ruined based on an otherwise unprovable allegation where the only evidence is the word of the accuser.

This was already the case at Saint Louis Universitywhere in the fall of 2010, four male basketball players were suspended from the university after a female student accused them of rape. According to news accounts of the police report and interviews with one of the accused, a female student, known to one of the basketball players returned to the house of one of the men and went directly into the man’s bedroom where she and that man proceeded to have sex. Afterwards, another of the group entered the bedroom and attempted to have sex with the woman. The other two men were aware of, and/or watched, some of the sexual activity. While the men’s stories varied slightly, all of the men stated that they believed the sex was consensual.

Not so according to the woman.

Her version is that some of what occurred was consensual, but at some point she stopped consenting. This is where it gets fuzzy. That’s because while she objected the first time he attempted to undress her, after a discussion, she felt more comfortable and remained in bed while he got up and got undressed. She consented to this act and of him returning to the bed. She did not object to, nor communicate any withdrawal of consent when he then removed her pants and underwear. She even helped him put on a condom. However, she states she did not consent to these actions. She merely wanted to be somewhere else and wished it to be over.

Her account of the second man was that she objected several times, but he exposed his penis and inserted it into her mouth. As she did in the first instance, she assisted the man in putting on a condom. She then states that the other two men entered the room and asked for sex, but she declined, dressed, and left.

[quote style=”boxed” float=”left”]Saint Louis University went overboard in its reaction.[/quote] This is a classic case of “he said – she said” with apparently no physical evidence to support or refute her version of the events. Even under the preponderance of evidence standard, this could account for no more than 50% of the evidence and therefore should not have resulted in disciplinary action against the men. Even moreso this should have been decided in the men’s favor as there were four men stating that she provide consent and only her stating that she had not (80% of the eyewitnesses denied it was rape). The police closed the case and no charges were filed, but the university suspended the four men.

Two of those men were suspended for not intervening to prevent the rape from occurring. But if they believed the sex was consensual, why would they intervene. The woman gave no indication to anyone that she was being raped, did not cry out, and did not ask for help. How were those two men to know? Unless they were mind readers, there was no way to know.

Saint Louis University went overboard in its reaction. Not just in regards to this one incident, but in changing its policy on sexual assault. This policy now states “It is the responsibility of the person initiating the sexual activity to obtain the affirmative consent of the other party throughout the duration of said activity.” However, the policy does not state how to identify “the person initiating the sexual activity.” Nor does it state what constitutes “affirmative consent” or how to prove it was given. Further, it does not clarify how frequently it must be obtained. In other words, the policy is too vague to be practical. The only possible purpose for instituting such a policy is to allow the university to punish as many men as possible (since women are typically the ones who file such complaints).

Under this policy, and many others like it across the country, a man accused of sexual assault stands no chance of being found not guilty. No man enrolled in college should feel safe. Even if he is not sexually active, he can still be accused and found guilty when the word of an accusing woman is given more consideration than that of four accused men. Given the falling percentage of male enrollment in colleges and universities, these institutions should be concerned with becoming more male-friendly. Not running down a path of increasing hostility towards the men they claim to want to educate.

Shrink4Men Radio: Making friends with your anger

Dr. Tara J. Palmatier · 10 October 2011 · Archived copy · Original

[box type="alert" icon="none"]

Have you ever been told, "You're so angry!" and then felt wrong or ashamed?

Does it seem like it's peachy keen for your wife, girlfriend, ex — or any woman for that matter — to lash out at you in anger or rage, but if you become angry in return, you're labeled the "scary-angry guy" while she's only "expressing her feee-wings?"

Have you had to disavow your feelings, especially angry feelings, in your relationship to the point where you feel shut down and maybe a little (or a lot) depressed?

Do you experience mute rage, meaning that when you're angry, you can't articulate it? Like if you opened your mouth that nothing would come out but a silent, impotent scream?

Are you afraid that if you let go and express your anger that you'll lose control of yourself?

Are you recently out of a bad relationship, marriage or divorce and don't know what to do with your anger?

Are you sick and tired of hearing that, "men aren't good at expressing emotions" or, even more ludicrous, that "men don't have emotions?" Worse yet, do you believe it?

If you're a woman married to a man with a crazy, abusive ex, do you ever find yourself wondering why your husband seems numbed out and unphased while you are legitimately angry at his ex's latest whack-o stunt?

Do you feel your anger for your partner?

If so, then please join me Monday night, October 10, 2011 at 9pm EST, when Paul Elam of AVoiceforMen will join me as my guest on Shrink4Men Radio to discuss Making Friends with your Anger.

Paul knows a thing or two about male anger, what with all the "angry men" in the Men's Rights Movement! Paul will also be sharing some of his own personal experiences and how he came to make friends with his anger, which, I for one, can't wait to hear. We'll be discussing the topic of male anger and how men can learn to make friends with their anger and channel it in healthy and productive ways. Anger isn't scary; it becomes scary when to ignore, deny it and don't do anything with it.

Telephone lines will be open, so if you have a question or would like to add to the conversation, please call +310 388 9709 or Skype in. We'd love to hear from you!

[/box]

Holding the Title

Izzey · 10 October 2011 · Archived copy · Original

“I just got married.”

“Wow, congratulations.”

“Thank you”

“Did you get the title yet?”

“Title?”

“Yes, the piece of paper that says you own him now.”

“What do you mean?”

“From now on, anything acquired in this marriage could someday be yours, because you have the papers to prove that you own him and are entitled to his hard-earned money, recreational possessions, and of course; the house. The law is on your side, especially if you have children”

“Children?”

“Yes, you must have at least one, as soon as possible. That is called insurance. You will fare much better with insurance. It pays dividends for many, many, years”

“Really? I never thought of it that way. How is this possible?”

“You are a woman, and the courts always favor the vagina. They just love the vagina. The vagina always wins.”

“Thank you for telling me this. How did you get so smart?”

“I have a vagina.”

Does this conversation seem a little far-fetched to you? A tad ridiculous? Yes, it is. But its parody mimics real-life reality. If you are a man, especially a young man, this could be your future. A very real future if you get married. There is an expression: “Look before you leap.” It is very sound advice. Regrettably, so many men ignore it. It is a life-altering event not easily undone. And don’t be so naive to not think that most women don’t already know this before entering into a marriage. Perhaps there should be a new expression. If you really look, you won’t leap.

Women virtually hold the title. Just you try to get it back. It will be like fighting off a hostile takeover when the courts act as a Board of Directors that are voting you; the CEO, right out of your own company, leaving you, the titled merchandise scratching your head in disbelief and asking yourself ‘what the fuck just happened?’

I asked a man once, “Why do you always lease your cars? Why not just purchase one, and when you are done with the payments, you own it.” He said to me with a smile, “Because every three years I get to turn it in for a newer model, or even a different model with minimal maintenance costs, and no long term commitment”

Until there is true equality for men in marriage, divorce, and parenthood, I think that men should lease and not buy. Because yeah, you will always have those payments, but in the end it is cheaper. And nuthin’ beats that new car smell.

Where have all the men gone?

keyster · 11 October 2011 · Archived copy · Original

It's a question posed today by both social conservatives and liberals alike. And yet all the "great minds" of academia and political punditry combined, heard spewing forth from their ivory Towers of Babel, seem to be utterly vexed by the answer. From William Bennett, George Will and Kathleen Parker, to Michael Kimmel, Kay Hymowitz and Hannah Rosin they all agree the modern male is broken and somehow needs to be fixed, but how exactly they can't say.

In her natural biological state an adolescent girl is given a rite of passage into womanhood, signaling she's now an adult woman, whether she wants to be one right away or not. If she later becomes pregnant and gives birth she becomes a mother. For the male of the species the transition to adulthood is not so readily apparent.

He can join the military and transition to a sort of manhood, which also offers the distinct possibility of transitioning him to a flag draped coffin or a cripple for life, thus making the rather expedient transition from "man" to "hero". Or he can begin to work, find himself a willing and fertile female to pair bond with and begin the creation of a good old fashion nuclear family, only to have her go all "Eat, Pray, Love" on his sorry ass 5 years later, (because she's bored) finding himself indentured to the local family court system for 10 years hence, and the part-time joy of part-time involvement with his kids lives. Who said men don't have choices?!

A Tale of Two Worlds

In speaking with my brother the other day at our annual catch-up phone call I asked him how his daughter was fairing out in the big cruel world. (I refer to her as "his daughter" and not "my niece" because despite my efforts to reach out to her, she can't be bothered to reciprocate.)

"Oh she's doing great!", he says. She just finished her master's degree in something called "Enviro-catastrophe Studies" and got a cushy little government job with a state agency."

"What about your chance of being a grandfather anytime soon?" I ask.

"Well she likes guys and she's had a few boyfriends, but she makes her position on anything long term very clear, she will NOT be controlled by a man."

"You mean like her mother, your ex-wife, claimed you used to do?"

Now you know why we only talk annually.

A couple of years ago I was asked to help a young man of about 24 years of age out with some "failure to launch" issues. He was just getting off probation for dealing weed, as a little side business to supplement his career in pizza delivery. (At least he understood the dynamics of synergistic market demand) He was the quintessential "lost man in the promised land," sleeping late, getting high and playing Xbox. Eventually our relationship came down to an ultimatum, "Either get a job by the end of the month or live in your car." The very last day of the month he got a job as a dishwasher paying $10 an hour. He was ecstatic that he somehow passed the drug test and background check.

Along our path of living together in my humble little dojo, I asked him one day what he thought about women, having a girlfriend, getting married and having children…and he says to me in a way only the modern high school graduate might, "No way, women are bitches man! I mean some of them are OK but most of them really suck! I'm never gonna get married!"

And here my dear reader in lies the essence of the problem, albeit in anecdotal form; the modern sassy girl on the go; little Ms. Independent, "refuses to be controlled by a man," (although he BETTER allow himself to be controlled by her) and the "lowly slacker" is left with little inspiration to make himself part of such an arrangement, other than perhaps the hope it would somehow work out better for him than every other adult male he's ever known, including his own father. What's the point of all this ambition nonsense when he has nothing to prove to anyone but himself?

To Answer the Question

Wouldn't it be grand if young men, shamed into compliance, would spontaneously "man-up" and start families with young women? "Finally they took heed of all our combined scolding!" – the elites would exclaim. If only men would dump their video games and weed, GROW UP and start marrying young women all would be groovy again. Men are the problem that needs to be fixed; women are simply marvelous examples of human existence, as always. Everyone knows this. It's on TV.

But who exactly does he marry if all these fantastic women are busy being men; toiling in the hard scrabble world of cubicles, meetings and text messaging? They might "settle down" in their mid-thirties and pop out a designer baby conceived from sperm purchased at the "genius bank", or they might not. She has choices. She'd prefer a man, but as Maureen Dowd quipped in her condescending pop art lit tone of commentary, "Are men really necessary"?

[image]"For whatever reason, adolescence seems to be the young man's default state.", concluded Kay Hymowitz. "For whatever reason…," In other words what she means to say is that if a man consciously decides to not marry and have children, (ostensibly his "duty" as a "man" to society and to women) he's chosen a state of perpetual adolescence. "Shame on you guys!" But did it ever occur to the highbrow illuminati that perhaps he doesn't have a choice, that there simply aren't any viable FEMALE candidates for marriage; at least ones that don't defiantly declare they "won't be controlled by a man". Can you imagine a single young man claiming he refuses to marry because he "won't be controlled by a woman"? Cue the accusations of sexism from the sexist police!

So by today's standards, if "manning up" means committing to a lovely young wife who gladly presupposes motherhood and commitment to said young husband and father of their children, then "woman-ing-up" is defined as getting a degree, dedicating her efforts to her career and delaying child birth until she finally quits hitting the snooze button on her biological clock; and that's if she has children at all. In other words, women have made the transition to manhood rather nicely, while men are transitioning to womanhood while kicking and screaming (with a bunch of "whining" as they say). Women want to be like men, but men don't want to be like women. Womanhood has never been so unpopular. Imagine that!

If the combined Ivy League sheepskin of social scientists and cultural prognosticators have to have someone who barely graduated from high school, (yours truly), answer the simple question, "Where have all the men gone?" one must wonder about either the usefulness of a degree or the blind devotion to either chivalry or the power of feminist orthodoxy within the collective conscious of our "best intellectuals thinkers." They stink, therefore they're feminists.

"Where are they?" you ask. They've disengaged and disconnected faster than you can say "herbivore" because after all the ridicule, shaming, condemnation, discrimination and legal abuse society has inflicted on them as a group. They've simply decided to retreat and stop contributing. Call that "adolescent" if you'd like, (they really don't care anymore, as they've been called worse). I call it a very natural reaction that's long overdue. Because if the threat of "control" is the problem, he'll gladly let go of the reigns and the horse that came with them without a shamed or regretful bone in his body.

When I was in 8th grade there was a tough girl that hung out with the tough guys who had it out for me. She would provoke me with insults, kicking and one time a hard whack across my face. She wanted to fight me, "call me out." Had I agreed I would have been ridiculed for beating up a girl, (and beaten up by her enforcement crew as well). Had I said "no" I would have been ridiculed for being a coward (or ironically a "pussy") to not agree to fight a girl.

Eventually I had to "man-up" and make a decision one way or the other or the taunting would continue, so I decided

NOT agreeing to fight was the best choice of two evils. I disengaged from the proposed battle because either way I was gonna lose; it was just a matter of deciding by how much. By that time I was numb to the pain shaming brings with it anyway, the emotional nerve endings scarred over as it were, so I didn't care what they had to say, I just ignored them and eventually they began to ignore me. I declared the game over and conceded, much to their disappointment.

Such is the plight of the modern young man. If he fights/competes against woman (and her enforcers) he loses and if he turns his back to her (and her enforcers) he loses. The difference now is that he's shamed and ridiculed to the point of being impervious to it. He's declared the game over (Hannah Rosin would agree), and he's conceded because while he might meet the definition of being a "man," HE knows WHO he is, and that's someone who won't be taken for a TOOL…

…much to their disappointment.

Hear the Lamentation of the Women

John Hembling (JtO) · 11 October 2011 · Archived copy · Original

[box type="note" icon="none"] Some readers might notice that the style of this piece is similar to that of AVfM contributor Manuel Dexter. Several readers on the site are already aware that JtO has been publishing under the M.D. byline for about a year. The reason for this was harassment of Mr Other by individuals whose actions threatened his employment. The circumstances making this form of harassment no longer remain – and past articles previously posted by Manuel Dexter will soon be correctly listed under this byline [/box]

[dropcap]I[/dropcap]'ve been told repeatedly in person and print that in addition to my biology and sexual identity making me a bad person, I also hate women. This is the definition of a misogynist, which due to my sexual preferences; I am.

Jill F. who writes for the ideological feminist website feministe-dot-com stated in her article "Dealbreaker indeed": men who prefer to not perform oral sex on bleeding lady-parts are misogynists. Okay, add that to the list.

It's a long list – one which has grown continuously during my lifetime. Another ideologue recently issued a fatwa on men whose moral failures manifest in facial hair. Amanda Marcotte's complaint is Beards. She wrote on pandagon [dot] net: "Hate 'em. I don't mean like a couple day's stubble that you routinely remove, but like a full-on beard. It's not like I wouldn't be friends with a guy with a beard, but kissing a dude with a beard puts me way off."

Okay Amanda, not liking beards is your choice – but you're not really talking about what you want in a man, you're talking about what you'd like to be socially verbotten in the larger framework of our culture. I'll add that to the list, too. Certainly Marcotte is an idiot, which argues against taking anything she writes too seriously. But she does draw a large audience – considerably larger than anything AVfM has managed, so far.

A more aggressive inventory of supposed male failure includes the recently popular article by an anonymous ideologue titled "a man is a rape supporter if..," This list includes a number of entirely nonviolent, normal and healthy activities and attitudes – and conflates them with rape. The list isn't worth fisking – but serves to re-frame the old lie "all men are rapists" into a format which wont result in immediate dismissal. Debunking the individual points of the list is the intent of the author – since it is debunking which creates engagement with the underlying lie, that all men are rapists.

Meanwhile, within the media – a rising chorus of "man up" can be heard from traditionalists, social conservatives – particularly women. Men: put down the remote, go get a job and get back to paying for women's stuff. Aren't you a "real man?" The problem as perceived is that increasing numbers of men are opting out of the old game of self sacrifice on behalf of a feminized public discounting the humanity of male human beings.

A certain amount of shrill panic is evident in the "failure to launch," rhetoric. Most fielding versions of this argument are themselves failing to understand why their comfortable reality is collapsing.

Almost all public rhetoric critical of men is shaming language – condemnation of men for "failure" to meet the criteria of what a real man should be, as defined by those who benefit from men's attempts to conform. As the tenor of our culture's "man up" message becomes more shrill, it also becomes less effective. This diminishing effect is not merely due to monotony of the "be a real man" message – it's also because under that accusatory and shaming message is a foundation built on increasingly false assumption.

[image]
C-ya
The assumption is that men should care what anyone thinks. There is growing condemnation and attempt at social shame applied to men self-selecting "un manly" choices – such as prioritizing recreation ahead of a high status, highly demanding life. And men making these choices are saying to those who would heap shame on them, get bent.

Actually, they're not saying that openly, because for this growing fraction of men, public opinion is irrelevant.

Traditionalists moaning about the diminishing number of men self sacrificing to keep everybody else's convenience paid and running have not yet figured out that the game of shame and prestige doesn't work when the benefits of social conformity to the role of protector and provider has no benefit except an early death and ongoing vilification of masculine identity.

Thanks to 50 years of ascendency of the faux-humanist ideology of feminism – men are increasingly despised, legally and socially marginalized and indentured as a class of disposable servants in western cultures. They are finally opting out. Meanwhile, the rest of our society is crapping it's collective pants. Social conservatives recognize that men abdicating their role as disposable labor, money and sperm dispenser have the potential to collapse national economies. These so-cons are trying with growing desperation to shame them back onto the treadmill.

Some opponents of the growing phenomenon of "Free-Range-Men" (term coined by Zed on The Spearhead) will dismiss the characterization of feminist panic as a desperate attempt to shame men into "going back to paying for women's shit and being disposable".

This dismissal is easy to evaluate. Penny Nance – the CEO of "Concerned Women of America" said in an interview on Fox News " Concerned women for America is the nation's largest public policy organization and we love men. We support men and we're rooting for them – we think they're an essential part of the American family. However we want them to feel the pressure to achieve , to put down the remote, to go find a job, to get their education, to build their faith and character" (emphasis mine) … "so walk away from the remote and get busy guys."

Nance stated clearly she knows that men are walking away from the traditionally allowed role as protector and provider, adding: "we need them, all the social science together points to the fact that dads are essential in the home, they're essential in the family. We want them to do a great job now, when they're young learning how to provide, so that when they are dads they can really be there for their families."

Men opting out are characterized as if this is failure to grow up, or Peter-Pan syndrome – and this is where even alert members of the media are missing the picture.

Men opting out have not failed to grow up, in fact, they're to be admired as the only self actualized, and self defined men in our culture. They've seen through the smog of lies used to con "real men" into the destructive role as feminism's enablers and enforcers. For increasing numbers of these men, the shaming language, Peter-pan-syndrome accusations and "man up" rhetoric is actually a source of entertainment.

[quote style="boxed" float="right"]Under any label, I do know that proponents and adherents of big feminism, along with established social conservatives and traditionalists, while they don't fully grasp the MRM or free-range men – they are terrified by us, and with good reason. [/quote] Whatever you chose to call them, zeta males, Free-Range-Males (FRMs), or grass-eating-boys, the panicky flapping of feminists, white knights, and other subspecies of social conservatives is hilarious to these men going their own way. The hilarity of those complaining about "boy-men" comes from watching them struggle to grasp cause and effect in shifting social landscape populated by a growing culture of free-range-men who cannot be controlled by any traditional carrot or stick.

These are men who are a self educating and organizing force of opposition to traditional social conventions which have rendered "men" as disposable beasts of burden.

Until this point in the discussion, I've been referring to variously named zeta males in the third person – as "them". However, I'm one of these men, and have arrived at my present self identification through self education and participation in the still- early stage men's rights movement; a social phenomenon which may take on a wholly new character and name.

Under any label, I do know that proponents and adherents of big feminism, along with established social conservatives and traditionalists, while they don't fully grasp the MRM or free-range men – they are terrified by us, and with good reason. The established feminist-social-conservative framework has served to benefit, protect, and elevate women at the expense of male self actualization, and male lives. We are changing that landscape to suit ourselves, but not by educating anyone in the mainstream – or by convincing the blue pill public that male human beings are indeed also humans rather than appliances. These changes are the natural byproduct of the simple existence of a growing culture of self-actualized men.

“Manning up”, as social commentators in mainstream media would characterize it is a sick racket with no benefit except approval from a public who discount the humanity of men in favour of male utility. Refusal to buy into this worthless game requires no apology. The bleating and ridicule from anyone attempting to impose an “correct” definition of acceptable masculine identity or action is rightly treated by Free Range Men with amused contempt. To these slow moving ideologues, I’ll offer one suggestion: Cry some more.

Where have all the men gone?

keyster · 11 October 2011 · Archived copy · Original

It's a question posed today by both social conservatives and liberals alike. And yet all the "great minds" of academia and political punditry combined, heard spewing forth from their ivory Towers of Babel, seem to be utterly vexed by the answer. From William Bennett, George Will and Kathleen Parker, to Michael Kimmel, Kay Hymowitz and Hannah Rosin they all agree the modern male is broken and somehow needs to be fixed, but how exactly they can't say.

In her natural biological state an adolescent girl is given a rite of passage into womanhood, signaling she's now an adult woman, whether she wants to be one right away or not. If she later becomes pregnant and gives birth she becomes a mother. For the male of the species the transition to adulthood is not so readily apparent.

He can join the military and transition to a sort of manhood, which also offers the distinct possibility of transitioning him to a flag draped coffin or a cripple for life, thus making the rather expedient transition from "man" to "hero". Or he can begin to work, find himself a willing and fertile female to pair bond with and begin the creation of a good old fashion nuclear family, only to have her go all "Eat, Pray, Love" on his sorry ass 5 years later, (because she's bored) finding himself indentured to the local family court system for 10 years hence, and the part-time joy of part-time involvement with his kids lives. Who said men don't have choices?!

A Tale of Two Worlds

In speaking with my brother the other day at our annual catch-up phone call I asked him how his daughter was fairing out in the big cruel world. (I refer to her as "his daughter" and not "my niece" because despite my efforts to reach out to her, she can't be bothered to reciprocate.)

"Oh she's doing great!", he says. She just finished her master's degree in something called "Enviro-catastrophe Studies" and got a cushy little government job with a state agency."

"What about your chance of being a grandfather anytime soon?" I ask.

"Well she likes guys and she's had a few boyfriends, but she makes her position on anything long term very clear, she will NOT be controlled by a man."

"You mean like her mother, your ex-wife, claimed you used to do?"

Now you know why we only talk annually.

A couple of years ago I was asked to help a young man of about 24 years of age out with some "failure to launch" issues. He was just getting off probation for dealing weed, as a little side business to supplement his career in pizza delivery. (At least he understood the dynamics of synergistic market demand) He was the quintessential "lost man in the promised land," sleeping late, getting high and playing Xbox. Eventually our relationship came down to an ultimatum, "Either get a job by the end of the month or live in your car." The very last day of the month he got a job as a dishwasher paying $10 an hour. He was ecstatic that he somehow passed the drug test and background check.

Along our path of living together in my humble little dojo, I asked him one day what he thought about women, having a girlfriend, getting married and having children…and he says to me in a way only the modern high school graduate might, "No way, women are bitches man! I mean some of them are OK but most of them really suck! I'm never gonna get married!"

And here my dear reader in lies the essence of the problem, albeit in anecdotal form; the modern sassy girl on the go; little Ms. Independent, "refuses to be controlled by a man," (although he BETTER allow himself to be controlled by her) and the "lowly slacker" is left with little inspiration to make himself part of such an arrangement, other than perhaps the hope it would somehow work out better for him than every other adult male he's ever known, including his own father. What's the point of all this ambition nonsense when he has nothing to prove to anyone but himself?

To Answer the Question

Wouldn't it be grand if young men, shamed into compliance, would spontaneously "man-up" and start families with young women? "Finally they took heed of all our combined scolding!" – the elites would exclaim. If only men would dump their video games and weed, GROW UP and start marrying young women all would be groovy again. Men are the problem that needs to be fixed; women are simply marvelous examples of human existence, as always. Everyone knows this. It's on TV.

But who exactly does he marry if all these fantastic women are busy being men; toiling in the hard scrabble world of cubicles, meetings and text messaging? They might "settle down" in their mid-thirties and pop out a designer baby conceived from sperm purchased at the "genius bank", or they might not. She has choices. She'd prefer a man, but as Maureen Dowd quipped in her condescending pop art lit tone of commentary, "Are men really necessary"?

"For whatever reason, adolescence seems to be the young man's default state.", concluded Kay Hymowitz. "For whatever reason…," In other words what she means to say is that if a man consciously decides to not marry and have children, (ostensibly his "duty" as a "man" to society and to women) he's chosen a state of perpetual adolescence. "Shame on you guys!" But did it ever occur to the highbrow illuminati that perhaps he doesn't have a choice, that there simply aren't any viable FEMALE candidates for marriage; at least ones that don't defiantly declare they "won't be controlled by a man". Can you imagine a single young man claiming he refuses to marry because he "won't be controlled by a woman"? Cue the accusations of sexism from the sexist police!

So by today's standards, if "manning up" means committing to a lovely young wife who gladly presupposes motherhood and commitment to said young husband and father of their children, then "woman-ing-up" is defined as getting a degree, dedicating her efforts to her career and delaying child birth until she finally quits hitting the snooze button on her biological clock; and that's if she has children at all. In other words, women have made the transition to manhood rather nicely, while men are transitioning to womanhood while kicking and screaming (with a bunch of "whining" as they say). Women want to be like men, but men don't want to be like women. Womanhood has never been so unpopular. Imagine that!

If the combined Ivy League sheepskin of social scientists and cultural prognosticators have to have someone who barely graduated from high school, (yours truly), answer the simple question, "Where have all the men gone?" one must wonder about either the usefulness of a degree or the blind devotion to either chivalry or the power of feminist orthodoxy within the collective conscious of our "best intellectuals thinkers." They stink, therefore they're feminists.

"Where are they?" you ask. They've disengaged and disconnected faster than you can say "herbivore" because after all the ridicule, shaming, condemnation, discrimination and legal abuse society has inflicted on them as a group. They've simply decided to retreat and stop contributing. Call that "adolescent" if you'd like, (they really don't care anymore, as they've been called worse). I call it a very natural reaction that's long overdue. Because if the threat of "control" is the problem, he'll gladly let go of the reigns and the horse that came with them without a shamed or regretful bone in his body.

When I was in 8th grade there was a tough girl that hung out with the tough guys who had it out for me. She would provoke me with insults, kicking and one time a hard whack across my face. She wanted to fight me, "call me out." Had I agreed I would have been ridiculed for beating up a girl, (and beaten up by her enforcement crew as well). Had I said "no" I would have been ridiculed for being a coward (or ironically a "pussy") to not agree to fight a girl.

Eventually I had to "man-up" and make a decision one way or the other or the taunting would continue, so I decided NOT agreeing to fight was the best choice of two evils. I disengaged from the proposed battle because either way I was gonna lose; it was just a matter of deciding by how much. By that time I was numb to the pain shaming brings with it anyway, the emotional nerve endings scarred over as it were, so I didn't care what they had to say, I just ignored them and eventually they began to ignore me. I declared the game over and conceded, much to their disappointment.

Such is the plight of the modern young man. If he fights/competes against woman (and her enforcers) he loses and if he turns his back to her (and her enforcers) he loses. The difference now is that he's shamed and ridiculed to the point of being impervious to it. He's declared the game over (Hannah Rosin would agree), and he's conceded because while he might meet the definition of being a "man," HE knows WHO he is, and that's someone who won't be taken for a TOOL…

…much to their disappointment.

World Net Daily covers MRM: actually speaks to mra's, thousands shocked

Paul Elam · 12 October 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Lucifer must be lacing up his ice skates. A prominent, mainstream conservative website, worldnetdaily.com, has done an article on the men's movement, and the author, Phil Elmore, made some groundbreaking changes from the standard blue pill fare we are so used to being served up with Cheese Covered Wacky Fries and a side of bullshit.

One, the article was written with a good measure of objectivity. Yes, that is OB-JEC-TIV-I-TY. You will need to practice saying this in the same sentence with the word mainstream.

Second, you will find that Elmore actually talked to MRA's to gather quotes for the piece. Yes, let me say that again for those shell-shocked. Elmore actually talked to MRA's to gather quotes for the piece. You will see quotes from myself, Bernard Chapin, and Dr. T, with a mention of John the Other, as well as the much beloved Angry Harry. Not a trace to be found of Michael Kimmel or any other badly cloaked feminist ideologue purporting to speak to the issues of men.

If there is water in hell it will stay in its liquid state, and if not it will be frozen as solid as Harry's nose.

Read the article here, and I expect we can predict a significant amount of commenting on the piece. I am quite sure most of you won't want the voices of raging fembots and shaming white knights to be the only ones there.

Amanda Marcotte placed on offenders registry

Paul Elam · 12 October 2011 · Archived copy · Original

[box type="alert" icon="none"]ATTN: BOMB POST ![/box]

FROM REGISTER-HER.COM

Register-her.com is dedicated to exposing not only the epidemic of false allegations in western culture, but also in identifying government officials, politicians and gender ideologues that exacerbate the false allegation problem through their own conduct. For these individuals we have created separate categories that fall outside the realm of direct offenders.

One of those categories is that of "Bigot" and it refers usually to gender ideologues who have sufficient exposure in mainstream media to influence public opinion, policy makers, or both, in a negative way, due to the promotion of bigoted and sexist ideology.

Amanda Marcotte is one such ideologue and she is placed on the registry here because she is an individual who uses her influence in the public sphere in a way that promotes false accusations and fosters denial about the problem.

[image]When commenting on the Duke rape case, after it became increasingly clear that Crystal Gayle Mangum had lied about the incident and that then District Attorney Mike Nifong had long pursued the case knowing that his only witness lacked credibility, Marcotte had this to say:

"In the meantime, I've been sort of casually listening to CNN blaring throughout the waiting area and good fucking god is that channel pure evil. For a while, I had to listen to how the poor dear lacrosse players at Duke are being persecuted just because they held someone down and fucked her against her will—not rape, of course, because the charges have been thrown out. Can't a few white boys sexually assault a black woman anymore without people getting all wound up about it? So unfair."

She also declared on her blog that people who defended the wrongly accused Duke students were "rape-loving scum."

These types of statements seek to normalize the assumption of guilt when a rape allegation is made, and also seeks to demonize anyone advocating for the long held legal tradition of due process. The epithets marking Marcotte's speech are one indication of bigotry, but this was not her first or only incident of such conduct.

She was forced to resign her position as blog master for the John Edwards presidential campaign after making strings of anti-Christian comments. Bill Donohue of the Catholic League publicly demanded that the Edwards campaign terminate Marcotte's appointment, calling her a "vulgar trash-talking" bigot. The editorial staff of register-her.com agrees.

Eight dead: Isn’t that just delightful?

Walter Romans (TDOM) · 13 October 2011 · Archived copy · Original

[dropcap]L[/dropcap]ast July, in Orange County Ca, Catherine Kieu Becker cut off her husband’s penis and tossed it in the garbage disposal after he told her he wanted a divorce. The incident was described on national television by Sharon Osborne (wife of Ozzie Osborne) as “delightful.” The other women who co-hosted the program joked about it as their audience roared with laughter.

On October 11, 2011, just a few miles up the freeway, Scott De Kraai opened fire in a hair salon in Seal Beach, Ca, where his ex-wife worked. This occurred a day after she had sought a restraining order against him as part of an ongoing custody dispute over their young son. So far, I haven’t heard the word “delightful” used in connection with the incident. But why not?

If it is funny and “delightful” when a woman commits an act of violence against a man, why isn’t it just as funny and “delightful” when a man commits violence against a woman?

By all accounts, Mr. De Kraai was a friendly, responsible man, who had suffered a serious injury attempting to save the life of a female coworker some years back. He was a hero, even though his attempt failed. He has been described by those who knew him as being a good father, totally devoted to his son. Even his wife’s attorney described him as mild mannered. But he had been angry over the ongoing custody battle, though he did apparently have shared custody, at least up until the request for the restraining order the day before the shooting. I couldn’t find any information on the outcome of the hearing, so perhaps new information will be forthcoming that can shed some light on the matter.

But one thing I do know is that this morning, Scott De Kraai and Catherine Becker are awaiting trial for their crimes. Both will likely be convicted. But while Mrs. Becker received vocal support and her victim was made the butt of jokes, that will not be the case for Mr. De Kraai and his victim. Nor should it be. Violence against anyone is a serious matter. No one should think it is “delightful” or funny.

This truth really hurts

John Hembling (JtO) · 13 October 2011 · Archived copy · Original

[dropcap]I[/dropcap]n March 2011 – I wrote “Mainstream feminism is the largest, most successful scam perpetrated on the public since the inception of central banking and fiat currency – and most of the public haven’t caught onto those yet either.” I may have been wrong – feminism might predate those innovations. However, whichever came first, the operative phrase is “scam perpetrated on the public.”

A major item in the cultivated narrative of feminist doctrine is the quaint myth that it is a bottom-up, grass-roots movement. Even within an ideology built almost entirely on a framework of lies – this lie is a big one. The truth, once understood, reveals a depth of willful depravity in the vast majority of feminist ideology’s adherents.

Feminism is not a grass roots, bottom up movement. It is top down, elitist instigated and funded astroturf with real objectives that have no relation to human rights or social equality between men and women. What’s a worse indictment of the gullible public is that this is obvious with the most cursory examination.

This can be seen by the ideology’s produced outcomes – one of which is the reduction of the social power of the family unit as a fundamental unit of society. By isolating individuals from the social support of traditionally strong family framework, this has rendered our culture much more pliable to top-down social control. Another is the reduction of the economic value of labor by the doubling of the available labor pool. This was sold to a credulous mainstream under the guise of giving women the “right” to work. In the year 2011, most feminists still don’t grasp that they were conned.

That feminism is a movement created by the world’s elites and fed to women through lies and flattery is also evident when start-up funding for feminist institutions comes through governments or from hereditary banking families like the Rockefellers.

Gloria Steinem was financed during her startup of Ms Magazine indirectly by the the CIA and the Rockefeller foundation. [1] This was documented New York Times article in February 1967[1]. and confirmed by Henry Markow in a 2002 article called “How the CIA Used Feminism to Destabilize Society”[2].

Before becoming an icon of second wave feminism, Steinem was employed by the CIA to disrupt student organizations, and funnel information to her CIA handlers. During the time she was starting Ms. Magazine, she dated Henry Kissinger – a matter of public record. Amazingly, nobody seems to think this saps the credibility of the movement she helped launch.

Looking farther back, It becomes evident that at every stage of feminism’s run, it has been funded and instigated by political and financial elites. Organized female activism has taken many formats – including women’s temperance movements as an early outgrowth of female social conservatism. This also included women’s suffrage movements all of which were facilitated with the cooperation of political and economic elites to diminish the political power of enfranchised men in society.

If women ran the world, there would be no war.

In 1914 despite widespread pro war propaganda, male enthusiasm for shipping off to go get slaughtered in foreign battlefields was low. To overcome the reluctance of young men to get themselves killed or maimed for the benefit of a few hereditary elites and royals, Admiral Charles Fitzgerald began organizing a groups of women to help “convince” the men of Britain to enlist.

Using public humiliation, the objective of these groups was to shame civilian men into joining the armed services. “This aim was to be accomplished by public humiliation — the women handing out white feathers to any man who did not wear a uniform. The feathers were intended as a badge of disgrace, branding the men who received them as cowards, the primary effect of which as to render them as unsuitable in the eyes of women. “The Order of the White Feather” and their recruiting methods quickly spread across Britain. Women of all backgrounds contributed their influence to the war effort."

"(Gullace, "White Feathers" 178) The zeal and the scope of this gendered phenomenon was paralleled only by the contemporaneous movement for suffrage — a movement which, right before the war, had reached a radical pitch. It is in the radical nature of "The White Feather Brigade" — the confrontational method which was employed by these women toward men — that a tactical tie is evidenced between the pro-suffrage and pro-enlistment movements. It is in the motives and movements of Emmeline Pankhurst that an ideological connection is discovered between the feminine pro-war demonstration of the "White Feather Girls" and the Suffragists."

A feminized society shaming men into compliance is not merely a relic of the past. Feminists and women shaming men into compliance with an entirely self serving definition of masculinity is actually a core component of an ideology that masquerades as humanism. The only possibly new element is that growing numbers of men are refusing to play along. Understanding among a small but growing fraction of our culture is that feminism is a fraudulent sham, built on lies and violence, which depends totally on suppressing the humanity of the penis-owning half of the population.

The shaming language used today is only slightly more sophisticated than the label "coward" of the "go get killed in a freezing trench" campaign of feminists in the 1st world war.

[box type="download" icon="none"]"The child-man, then, is the lost son of a host of economic and cultural changes: the demographic shift I call preadulthood."
— Kay Hymowitz, Manning Up: How the Rise of Women Has Turned Men into Boys.[/box]

Hymowitz is partly correct in her evaluation of modern men. Specifically, she's correctly spotted the rising trend of men refusing to self sacrifice as protector-provider-appliance.

Another ideologue building a career on publicly excoriating the male demographic who just don't cater to female convenience is the CEO of the humorously named "Concerned Women of America." Just like many other confused social conservatives the penny has dropped for Penny Nance.

"We think they're [men] an essential part of the American family. However we want them to feel the pressure to achieve, to put down the remote, to go find a job."

Hear that guys? Stop self-actualizing and get back to paying for women's shit and dying on the job.

To date, even in the ongoing and fraudulent chorus of pay inequity from feminists – no mainstream feminist has ever addressed the rate of workplace deaths among men. Did you know that for every 100 american workers who die on the job – 7 of them are women! Those poor, poor, women.

For that matter – for every 4 people who kill themselves – 1 is a woman! For god's sake – somebody help the poor females. What's that you say? What about the other 3 out of 4 dead bodies who happened to be men? Pay no attention to the piles of male corpses behind the curtain.

These dead men, by the way, are the glue of a feminized society. Dead and mutilated men are the byproduct of keeping everyone else comfortable, and shaming men back into the trenches of war or the zero sum game of protect-provide-sacrifice on behalf of a culture which values male utility but not male humanity.

Feminism, in its nakedest form is the radical notion that men are not people. The violence which overwhelmingly impacts men is feminism's dirty secret. The continued and escalated narrative of female victimhood and male villainy is designed to always keep men on a psychological defence, silenced, compliant and apologetic, while they keep serving, providing and dying. Keep everybody focused on female victimhood, even when its created from whole cloth – this is the smoke and mirror show to distract us.

However, this is now so overwhelmingly obvious that even men who would otherwise be unaware followers of convention are rejecting the acceptable model. Aware adults of both sex are also increasingly alert that the overriding cultural feminist narrative is a great big lie. As those invested in maintaining the status quo; – social conservatives and feminists attempt by commentary and legislation to reinforce and command obeisance.

Unfortunately for them, the truth comes packaged with some painful adjustments, requiring the abandonment of comforts and privileges. The harder these so-cons and ideologues fight to enforce male compliance to an outmoded paradigm of human disposability – the more it's going to hurt when choice to face reality is taken out of their control.

[1] http://www.namebase.org/steinem.html
[2] http://portland.indymedia.org/en/2005/02/310075.shtml

[3] http://www.lifesitenews.com/news/federal-status-of-women-funds-a-new-canadian-feminist-movement/
[4] http://itech.fgcu.edu/&/issues/vol1/issue1/feather.htm

Good women (and why that's a red herring)

Anakin Niceguy · 13 October 2011 · Archived copy · Original

[dropcap]F[/dropcap]rom time to time, some critics of the Manosphere like to point out that there "are good women out there." The implication of this statement is that somehow MGTOWers/MRAs/PUAs/whatever-you-call-yourself have collectively failed to recognize the ability of women to be selfless, moral, jolly good fellows, and all that. So, what do I say to that? Yes, there are good women out there. And your point is …. ?

There are good women out there just like there are good people who have the misfortune of living in very dangerous urban slums. Are you expecting me to walk in such areas at night and sing the theme tune to Mr. Roger's Neighborhood? Do you think many "good women," let alone other men such as myself, would do that?

The issue is not the existence of good women. The issue is that society reflects the aspirations of malicious women in law, politics, academia, business, media, modern religion, the dating scene, the home, etc. What are the "good women" doing in the mean time? No-o-o-o-thing.

Ok, I exaggerate there. I acknowledge the woman here and there who "gets it." But let's face it: Jane Q. Public does not seem to be all that bothered by what malicious women are allowed to do. Jane Q. Public does not seem to be all that bothered by the suffering men are experiencing on all levels due to said malicious women: political, economic, social, relational, emotional, mental, and physical. What "concern" is shown to men is often couched in cynical, utilitarian terms (how a given issue impacts women).

Here's another matter to consider: What does your definition of a "good woman" entail, anyway? A friendly female coworker may be outgoing with you, the life of the party, generous with her friends, and yet come home and treat her husband like dog feces. The nice girl next door who goes to church, who loves her parents, loves her brother, loves Jesus, who volunteers at the soup kitchen, may nonetheless feel it's perfectly within her right to slap a man hard in the face and yet expect him to doing nothing in return except stand there and apologize. In other words, the problem isn't necessarily women who are deliberately evil. Rather, it's "good women" who don't even have a clue how unjust and harmful their behavior is towards men.

I know a lot of "good women" in real life. I love 'em, but honestly, they need to smell the java and get a revelation.

So, when some bucko tells me there are "good women out there," I dismiss the fact as a red herring. When it comes to the problem of misandry, I couldn't give two flips of a raccoon's hindquarters on a hot August night with regard to talking about said women. Just as I won't walk in a high-crime neighborhood at night until some developers turn it all into a well-lit shopping complex with fountains, bistros, and a truckload of security guards, I won't be singing paeans too loudly to "good women" just yet. Not until a critical mass of these "good women" say "enough of this garbage" and demonstrate they really do genuinely care about men. I want to see these so-called "good women" shout down malicious women, not honorable men.

I don't even debate "NAWALT." It's not even on my game table. The Collective Sisterhood of NAWALT has their work cut for them. To quote a famous character in the Star Wars trilogy, "Asteroids do not concern me, Admiral. I want that ship."

When “good” feminists do nothing

Jared White · 14 October 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Wendy McElroy; Warren Farrell; Erin Pizzey; Christina Hoff Sommers.

These are the names of people who are among a very small minority of individuals associated with feminism that truly care about the discrimination both men and women face within western societies. If you were to mention these names to the majority of mainstream feminists, “right wing-nut,” “anti-woman,” or “who are they?” would most likely be the response you receive. You see, to mainstream feminism, which is made up of both “radical” and “moderate” feminists, anyone who dares to place even the smallest hint of blame on the feminist movement for the discrimination men face is a misogynist by default, even feminists.

Not too long ago I wrote an article listing the core beliefs of the feminist movement. These core beliefs are of course misandric as they all blame and demonize the male half of the population for whatever problems women face. Everything listed in that article is the motivation behind most of the things done by the feminist movement. Every law and policy that strips men of their civil freedoms is justified by the theories and bigotry created by feminism. The most elusive of these theories; Patriarchy, is an ever-changing, ever-evolving mesh of hate and bigotry that has shared many different definitions. The reasoning behind these changes is the focus of this article; “good” feminists. To start, I will list a fact most good feminists would like you to ignore.

Most forms of feminism characterize patriarchy as an unjust social system that is oppressive to women. As feminist and political theorist Carole Pateman writes, “The patriarchal construction of the difference between masculinity and femininity is the political difference between freedom and subjection.” In feminist theory the concept of patriarchy often includes all the social mechanisms that reproduce and exert male dominance over women. Feminist theory typically characterizes patriarchy as a social construction, which can be overcome by revealing and critically analyzing its manifestations.

Feminists twisted the definition of patriarchy from the simple meaning of a society in which families share a husband and father’s last name and property to a society in which women are an oppressed class and slaves to men. “Good” feminists will deny this. Not because it is a lie. It’s an irrefutable truth. No, they will deny it because it shines a bad light on feminism. They will tell you the most current meaning that some “moderate” feminists are using. They will tell you that patriarchy doesn’t mean men are oppressors; patriarchy is a class system in which women are on the bottom. To be honest, I don’t see the difference.

Because there isn’t one.

“Good” feminists will tell you that just because women are on the bottom of this patriarchal class system, it doesn’t mean that men don’t suffer too. This is where the “good feminists” either don’t get it or hope that you don’t get it. Claiming that western societies are built on class systems where all men are automatically above all women is the same bigotry as claiming men are the oppressive overlords of women. Claiming that western societies are patriarchal because men have privileges while ignoring or denying the privileges women have is the same bigotry as claiming men are oppressive overlords.

Women. Are. Not. Fucking. Oppressed.

There are two laws in the United States that allow men to do things that women cannot. One is walking the streets topless and the other is being granted the “privilege” of being given a job where the objective is to either kill an opposing force or die on a battlefield.

They. Were. Never. Fucking. Oppressed.

Most “good” feminists, the ones I have spoken with at least, would agree with my above statement. That’s where the agreements usually end. Recently, “moderate” feminist websites and articles have sprung up attempting to put out a different kind of message than the usual “men are bad” that has been the tagline associated with feminism for decades. Now feminists suddenly care about the discrimination millions of men have suffered through for decades. Well actually, they don’t. These new blogs and articles do the same things the bigots that marched through the streets forty years ago holding “men are pigs” signs did.

Honestly, I’d prefer someone to tell me they hate me to my face instead of dressing it up in backwards theories. You will notice that the only place most “good feminists” can be found is the Internet. They aren’t marching through the streets holding “VAWA-reform” signs or at the doors of domestic violence organizations demanding men be given equal advocacy and help. No. “Good feminists” are online commenting on MRA blogs and websites urging everyone there not to blame feminism for any of the legal discrimination men face in western societies.

According to “good” feminists we should forget about the feminist run domestic violence organizations in California and West Virginia that actively denied all male victims of abuse help, falsified DV statistics, and ran a PSA ad campaign which only featured male perpetrators and female victims. We shouldn’t blame feminism for that. No, those feminists were “radicals” and it was an isolated incident.

Of course we would have to also ignore the National Organization for Women, who continually put out the message that domestic violence is a gendered crime that mostly women suffer. We shouldn’t blame feminism for that bigotry, even though N.O.W is the largest feminist organization in North America. All of them are just “radicals” and feminism as a movement is in no way the cause of any of the bigoted laws or policies (VAWA) created by them, right?

Let’s move on to colleges. A new standard has swept North America in which college men, and only college men have been stripped of their right to be considered innocent until proven guilty. Before this most recent act of bigotry against men hit colleges another disgusting practice had already been implemented where all male college freshmen and only male college freshmen are required to attend an anti-rape course where they are treated as potential rapists. If they refuse they can say goodbye to their academic future. None of this is because of the constant rape hysteria people are bombarded with from feminism, according to “good” feminists. In fact, feminists who attend or are associated with colleges are all of the “third wave” variety. You know, the “sex positive” “moderate feminists” of the new millennium. They would never stand for any bigotry against either gender. That is, unless those who are among the gender with penises decide to make a group dedicated to male issues. Then the “moderate” feminists will have a problem.

Pointing out feminist bigotry is useless with feminists of any variety. Your response from a “radical” will be fuck off, your response from a “moderate” will be “you don’t understand feminism,” and your response from a “good feminist” will be “none of the feminists I know are like that.”

Why is any of this important? Because while the Men’s Rights Movement wasn’t born on the Internet, it is the Internet that allowed those who wish to end feminist bigotry a chance to spread their message worldwide and uncensored. Can anyone think of, or more importantly, find a newspaper article or television PSA that acknowledges the fact that men are not the only rapists and domestic abusers on planet Earth, before the year 2000? Can anyone find one today?

Without the Internet, most of the world would be ignorant to the fact that the feminist claim about 1 and 4 women being raped is a fabrication. A fabrication used to garner government money with which to fund a hate campaign against men.

The Internet is not where the resistance to feminist bigotry began, but it is where that resistance continues to grow because every time a feminist steps in front of a news camera and makes a blatantly false claim about domestic violence, such as 90% of it being committed by men, hundreds of websites around the world will light up with the truth. Every day, more and more men and women read these websites and every day, more and more men and women realize that feminism does indeed deserve the blame all of those “angry ex-husbands” from the “abusers lobby" have placed on it. That is why all of these feminist blogs are suddenly popping up with the claim of caring about male issues.

They are attempting to place a smokescreen in front of the association the feminist movement has with the discrimination against men. They are attempting to prevent the growing anger the people of western societies hold because of male suffering from being directed towards feminism. But they won't ever cross the line of calling out feminist bigotry because if they do their names within mainstream feminist communities will fade into obscurity and only be mentioned in reference to "anti-woman" rants. This is why their attempts will fail.

It is important that those who run these MRA websites do not falter to the growing invasion of "good" feminists who are in no way good. It is possible to have a discussion about male issues and propose positive solutions to these issues without ever mentioning feminism. This is something I have never denied because it is the truth. However, it is fucking impossible to have a discussion about all male issues without mentioning feminism because feminism is the direct and indirect cause of several issues men face in western societies today. So if you create a "feminist friendly" website about male issues and don't want to have anyone call out feminism for its part in the problems men face then I suggest you limit your topics to circumcision and selective service and have at it.

That is the only way you will appease your "good" feminist friends because the moment false rape allegations, VAWA, the sentencing disparity between male and female criminals, the wage gap lie, affirmative action, the lowered standards some jobs incorporate to fill female quotas, paternity fraud, family court, or forced child support is mentioned, your "good" feminist friends will go into defensive mode. They will attempt to explain away the bigotry feminism, not "radicals" or "moderates" but feminism has caused. They will tell you your "feminist friendly" website about male issues is becoming "abusive." They will tell you that your language is becoming misogynistic. They will be offended by how everything you say is anti-feminist, which in a lot of feminist minds is equal to anti-woman. Voicing the truth about how women can roundhouse kick their husbands/boyfriends in the side of the head and not receive any punishment and instead have their husbands/boyfriends arrested because of the feminist created VAWA will be categorized as "blaming women" for men's problems. Voicing the truth about how false rape allegations are a growing epidemic will put you in the category of "rape apologists."

Speaking of false rape allegations, as shown in the second link I placed in this article, feminists (moderate/radical/good/whatever) don't feel that false rape allegations are a real problem. Either it isn't an epidemic or it is in no way as bad or important as rape. To quote the author of the article I linked to, it just "sucks." In any case, false accusers should never receive harsher punishments, according to "moderate feminists."

Not too long ago it was legal to execute men accused of rape and today it is socially accepted to murder men accused of rape.

Men have been murdered and had their accusers later recant the lie that ended their lives out of guilt. I really don't see how anyone can make light of a crime that leads to years of imprisonment, rape, abuse, beatings, and oh yeah, murder and claim to be in support of egalitarianism. I guess it's because I don't think like a feminist.

Speaking of egalitarianism, there is a new movement on the rise. The walk on wall street. Care to guess what the "third wave moderate" feminist element of that group is advocating? If you guessed bigotry on the highest scale then you would be correct because "It's cool to think that racism and sexism are OK when we do them" according to "moderate" feminists.

Feminists, real world feminists, not Internet trolls, have ruined the lives of millions of men. They propose, create, and support bigoted policies like the ones overtaking North American colleges. They propagate that domestic violence is a gendered crime that only women suffer. They create PSAs that depict only men as abusers of women and children. They falsify and misrepresent statistics in order to garner funds from their government. They use their positions of authority within the law to conduct witch hunts on men accused of rape. They advocate that men should have no voice against any mutual discrimination both men and women face because men are too privileged by our "patriarchal society." They propagated a girl crisis and claimed that our "patriarchal society" was the reason girls could not excel in school. They used this lie to reform western school systems where masculine behavior in boys, and only in boys, is discouraged and now when boys are in crisis, these feminists claim that it is because girls are just naturally better than boys academically.

And where are the “good” feminists? I’ll tell you where they are. They are busy telling you to stop focusing your blame on feminism. While it is true that not every individual feminist was actively involved in the hateful acts I listed above that doesn’t take away from the fact that the feminist movement is a major part of the reason why these things were allowed to happen and all of the “good feminists” who want to turn the public focus away from that fact are in my view worse than the radical feminist womyn who are at least up front about their hateful beliefs and intentions.

In my most recent article I stated that there can be no common ground between the Men’s Rights Movement and Feminism until feminists will acknowledge that feminism has created and spread legal discrimination against men throughout western societies and then advocate against it. Not with one obscure non-misandric blog article out of hundreds of misandric articles but with PSAs and real world activism on par with what Fathers and Families and S.A.V.E does. I’m still waiting.

Update on FBI's re-definition of rape

Robert O'Hara · 15 October 2011 · Archived copy · Original

[box]

Washington D.C. 15 October (AVFM News) As reported last week by AVFM News a subcommittee of the FBI's Criminal Justice Information Service will convene in Baltimore Maryland to discuss an update of the definition of Rape for reporting purposes. Since that time AVFM News has tried, with limited success, to gather more information about the meeting and its participants.

Subcommittee meetings of the CJIS are made up of individuals that participate in what are called "working groups," made up of state and local law enforcement officials and those working in quasi-governmental organizations. The CJIS periodically holds these meetings in order to update definitions of criminal activity and reporting mechanisms so resources can be more efficiently distributed to fight crime.

These subcommittees write reports that are submitted to the FBI Advisory Board, who in turn report directly to the Director of the FBI – who enacts policy changes. Essentially, they are meetings in which technocrats get together to make collecting data on criminal activity more effective. They are typically not used as secret tribunals in which definitions of serious crimes like rape are updated without public vetting.

However, the meeting in Baltimore on Tuesday the 18th will be closed to the public and organizations whose members make up the subcommittee are all but completely undisclosed. The reasons for this are not clear and despite many attempts to contact the FBI, AVFM news was not able to gain pertinent information about the meeting.

One thing is clear: the meeting comes on the heels of an expansive campaign led by the Maryland Coalition Against Domestic Violence which was heavily covered by Justin Fenton, a reporter at the Baltimore Sun who has taken a particular interest in sexual assault issues.

Last year it was noted by the Sun that the Baltimore Police Department had highest percentage of "unfounded" rape cases than any other city in the U.S. This, it was interpreted by Fenton, meant that when women who had reported being raped but were found to be not credible by investigators were being re-victimized by the police.

Fenton's reporting set off a frenzy of activity amongst local Sexual Grievance Industry organizations, the most energetic and well funded of which was the Maryland Coalition Against Sexual Assault. This organization has been very insistent on the inclusion of consensual sex while under the influence of alcohol or drugs in the definition of Rape.

Fenton wrote a series of articles chronicling the activities or the MCASA and the reforms it addressed in the Baltimore Police Department. This included specific policy changes in the way sexual assault was reported when it came to alcohol consumption. The Baltimore Police Department has, in the past year, made it a point to publicize it's reforms, which include "additional questions" asked those reporting sexual assault who have been drinking, or who had men "try to get them drunk." Personnel changes were also made according to sources at the BPD.

AVFM News contacted the MCASA and asked if they were to have a presence at the upcoming meeting. They told AFVM News that they were not going to have any access to the meeting. However, they did indicate that the Police Executive Research Forum (PERF), an organization dedicated to statistical research on crime, was open to input from activists interested in sexual assault issues. AVFM News tried repeatedly to contact PERF but was unable to get an audience with their Public Relations official.

AFVM will cover the event and it's outcome in the coming weeks.

Sources:

http://www.policeforum.org/

http://www.mcasa.org/

http://www.fbi.gov/about-us/cjis/advisory-policy-board

http://www.baltimoresun.com/search/dispatcher.front?Query=Justin+Fenton+Sexual+Assault&target=adv_article

[/box]

To the Censors at Wikipedia

John Hembling (JtO) · 15 October 2011 · Archived copy · Original

To the moderators and admins at Wikipedia

I'd like to ask you a question. That's not quite true, I'd like you to ask yourselves a few questions.

This requires a bit of context, which I'll establish as quickly as I can.You've just comprehensively re-written wikipedia's entry on Men's Rights. The page, formerly provided a reasonable summary of issues of concern with a movement called "the men's rights movement."

Now, after a thorough rewrite, the wikipedia entry under the heading "Men's Rights," characterizes the phrase to refer to collective privilege afforded to men throughout history. Essentially you've provided the definition of "male privilege" as it is presented in the context of Patriarchy Theory (PT).

PT, by the way, is one of the ideological tenets of Radical Feminism, thus the Men's Rights wikipedia page, formerly addressing a movement called "the mens rights movement" is now a reference page for an item of mainstream feminist doctrine. The rewrite was skillful, certainly – and appears to have taken considerable work. Just look at all those links to feminist advocate research.

Here's my question. or yours, actually. If you find yourself rewriting reference material to obscure and minimize the topic of that reference material; in fact censoring that topic, to create a public impression that it does not exist – do you recognize your own action as censorship? Taking that question further – do you recognize that the urge to silence opinions other than your own is a totalitarian urge?

Your own sandbox – Wikipedia – has a definition of censorship, albeit a rather poor definition. Like your revised mens rights article, the wikipedia definition of censorship obscures the essence of the topic. I have furnished you a cleaner and more concise definition.

It is this:

Censorship is the suppression of speech or other communication by an individual, a government or other controlling body.

I left motive out of the corrected definition, as censors including motive generally end up saying "for the greater good." This, by the way, is the same reason given when nation states begin exterminating members of an "undesirable" demographic. So, do you recognize that you are censors, and do you realize what that means about your ideological motivation?

This isn't an isolated incident. There was briefly an article on wikipedia on a man named Thomas James Ball. This man, after 15 years of being brutalized and abused by the family courts, shared his outrage and pain with the world by going to the steps of the Keene County, New Hampshire courthouse, dousing himself in gasoline, and igniting himself.

He then walked back and forth for about a minute, brushing off two other men's attempts to use their coats to smother the flames. He did this in silence as the fuel burned his skin away and clouded his eyes. He would have been blind after about 30 seconds. Body fat dripped onto the pavement as the flames melted it from his torso as he walked. I've seen photos of the stained pavement. Towards the end, he walked over to where there was some grass and collapsed to his hands and knees, then died.

Political protest by self immolation is arguably the most profound and extreme act of political speech possible by a human being. In fact, it is iconic of protest against totalitarian rule. And you deleted the wikipedia entry for Mr Ball on the grounds that it was irrelevant. You did your level best to silence him.

So, again, do you recognize that you are censors? Do you recognize that your urge to, and in fact your continued practice of silencing opinion disagreeing with your own is fundamentally totalitarian? Do you?

One last question for you to chew on. If unpopular opinion is effectively silenced, what do you imagine will happen next?

Wiki Reeks

Paul Elam · 15 October 2011 · Archived copy · Original

I have recently discovered that I do not exist.

I was equally startled to find that the same thing holds true for Warren Farrell, Angry Harry, Bernard Chapin, John the Other and all other notables associated with the men's rights movement. Indeed, the movement itself is nonexistent.

Phil Elmore of World Net Daily recently did an article on the men's rights movement that drew a significant amount of attention. Someone needs to contact Mr. Elmore and advise him that the movement he reported on is a figment of his imagination, as are all the people he conversed with in preparation for his article. As a word of caution you might want to advise him that if he does any more writing on this subject he may well end up in the land of the non-extant.

Fathers for Justice? Never happened. Dads on the Air? No such radio program exists; nor does this website, nor does any of the dozens of men's and fathers organizations spread across the globe. Nor, if you happen to identify as a men's rights activist, do you.

Why? Because Wikipedia says so.

In a sudden and sweeping change of the Wikipedia page on Men's Rights, references to the myriad of issues and efforts highlighted over the past forty years of pro-male activism have been replaced with the standard litany of feminist dogma about male privilege and patriarchy. They start the page (just below the notice challenging its neutrality) with a simple definition: Men's rights are the entitlements and freedoms claimed by boys and men.

That is followed up by a list of historical and other items that point to male privilege and hegemony, as well as female oppression. Further down the line, below the remainder of the misdirecting clutter (and past where most people will actually read), there is cursory mention of some elements of the MRM, pointing to NCFM and ACFC. This is where they make their first and only mention of men's rights activists. It's placed just below a sub-header addressing the male dominant laws in Pakistan.

There are other, very minor references to legitimate men's rights issues, but they are all literally buried in a deluge of pro-feminist perspective that was added to the page in one fell swoop sometime in the last few days.

The intent here is transparent. The Wikipedia page on men's rights has been rewritten, in deliberate and premeditated fashion, in order to turn it into a tool that will lead readers to conflate the men's rights movement with an agenda of domination and control over women. Actually, the page has not been so much rewritten, as it has been reengineered, to turn it from an information source into an instrument of disinformation and deception. None of this was done accidentally, as anyone who has ever read the previous incarnation of that page can clearly see.

As a matter of fairness, I have to point out that a more accurate (though certainly less traveled) page for the men's movement is in place, giving a more accurate overview of some of the issues and actions relevant to our cause. I was even surprised to see myself included there as a "significant writer."

But, this is all still a matter of diversion. "Men's rights" is now a clearly defined term in modern social lexicon. It is about the same concept of rights as you would infer them in any other social movement. It is about CIVIL rights, just as it was claimed to be for women and other minorities. Wikipedia's actions demonstrating indifference to that are nothing less than calculated.

This is what I will now call the Fourth Wave of Feminism. With the emerging success of the men's rights movement, which Wikipedia has just caused to disappear, we have seen substantive changes in the public discourse on sexual politics. Even the most rabid "gender" ideologues have been forced to adopt sexually neutral language in order to promote their wares. Domestic Violence service providers have changed much of their language to remove the appearance of sexual bias, even as they continue to practice it. Most “Women’s Studies” programs have changed their name to “Gender Studies” and have started to present an image of sexual inclusion where it does not exist.

We see further evidence of this trend throughout mainstream media, where the language and intent of feminist ideologues has become more obfuscated and covert. It’s the Fourth Wave, the hidden wave, that sees the writing on the wall and is going incognito, or as much as it has to in this eyes-wide-shut society.

It is also the starting of the death rattle for hateful ideologues that now realize there is less and less real estate for them in the light of day. They now must seek to operate behind a wall of anonymity, whether in the insulated world of academe, or shrouded in the anonymity one enjoys as a moderator for Wikipedia.

Of course, as long as the MSM and government collude to offer them protection, hiding them in the dark, they will continue to make problems. But there is always that old expression. Some days, the sun even shines on a dog’s ass. Truth is though, eventually the sun shines on all dog’s asses. These people won’t be an exception.

This little non-existent men’s rights movement now spans the globe, and continues to grow in spite of the fact that it isn’t really here. These kinds of shenanigans will all be shone in the light of day.

The American University of Vigilante Justice

John Hembling (JtO) · 15 October 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Higher education now administers the law. Judge Roy Bean would be proud.

In April 2011, the U.S. Department of Education's Office of Civil Rights (OCR) issued a letter ordering colleges and universities to be more aggressive in prosecuting accusations of sexual assault. The letter began with the Orwellian salutation "Dear Colleague" but was a legally binding regulatory document lowering the burden of evidence in prosecution of accusations. These new lowered standards are effective 60 days after the letter's date – and set the new standards without recourse to public hearings, comment periods or any due diligence mechanism.

Officials from OCR frequently assert that one in five students on college campuses will become the victim of sexual assault. If these numbers are correct (let's just pretend for a minute) then college campuses incur an incidence of rape 606 times higher than the most dangerous cities in America.

According to FBI statistics, for example, Detroit recorded an average of 33 rapes per 100,000 people. 1 in 5 in a population of 100,000 would be 20,000 rapes.

The letter, which lowers evidentiary requirements to the "preponderance of the evidence" standard, was enacted during an inquiry into a sexual misconduct case at Stanford University, mid-procedure, reducing the burden of evidence necessary to declare guilt . The accused male student was found guilty of sexual misconduct for having sex with a female student while they were both intoxicated.

Samantha Harris[1] wrote for the New York Times "At the time the student was charged, Stanford was using the "beyond a reasonable doubt" standard — the highest standard of proof, used by courts in criminal cases. But after OCR's letter, Stanford shifted to the "preponderance" standard in the middle of his case."

Stanford's guidelines determining sexual misconduct state : "intoxicated" students cannot consent to sexual contact. This is alarming enough, but even forgetting about adults in the real world who commonly participate in sex after drinking, in this case both participants where intoxicated. How does culpability attach to one, a and loss of volition attach to the other?

The accused man at Stanford, whose case had been dropped by the prosecutor and police in Palo Alto, Calif., was convicted by the student-run court. Convicted of sexual assault, by a student-run court.

Stanford's definition of consent to sex imposes a concept that is foreign to most people's idea of adult consent and is inconsistent with California state law. The training material for their "Dean's Alternative Review Process," which handles sexual harassment and misconduct cases, informs student jurors that they should be "very, very cautious in accepting a man's claim that he has been wrongly accused of abuse or violence," claiming:

"[T]he great majority of allegations of abuse—though not all—are substantially accurate" .

To recognize the significance of this guideline, please consider the following:

On June 2010, the Orlando Police stated : "[F]alse reporting has reached an epidemic level."[2] and asked the public to make fewer false rape claims.

In 2001, Dr Eugene J. Kanin, Ph.D. Of the Department of Sociology and Anthropology, at Purdue University that in his research: "conducted with the cooperation of the police agency of a small metropolitan community, 45 consecutive, disposed, false rape allegations covering a 9 year period were studied. False rape allegations constitute 41% of the total forcible rape cases reported."

Kanin also stated in the same report, "False rape allegations are reported in similar numbers at college campuses; approximately 50% of rape charges are admitted to be false by the accuser."

Kanin's findings are qualified by the documented admission by the accusers that their rape accusations were false –

this means that the 41% to 50% estimates of Kanin's report represent a baseline guarantee of false accusation, allowing the possibility that actual false accusation numbers are significantly higher.

Returning to Stanford's "Dean's Alternative Review Process" – by which students are trained to convict individuals accused of sexual assault:

"[T]he great majority of allegations of abuse—though not all—are substantially accurate"

[image]The book this training material is drawn from is titled, Why Does He Do That: Inside the Minds of Angry and Controlling Men. The title itself reveals a formal logical fallacy commonly called the Unstated Major Premise. That is an argument in which a major assumption, premise, or reason that justifies the conclusion, is absent from the wording of the argument. A training manual for students playing at being prosecutors, which leads them directly to the assumption of guilt is an incredibly dangerous example of ideological trickery and malfeasance. The manual also instructs these student "advocates" that an accused "acting persuasive and logical" is further indication of guilt.

On August 30, Robert Smith published an article on Real Clear Politics[4] in which he stated "If the matter at hand is a minor traffic accident, a breakdown of due process might be unfortunate, but it would not be life-shattering for the party found to be at fault. In matters as serious as rape or sexual harassment, however, due process, if anything, is more critical, not less.

In May of 2011, the Foundation for Individual Rights in Education (FIRE) contacted the Dept of Ed's Office of Civil Rights noting that its members were "troubled by [OCR's] failure to explicitly instruct administrators that public universities may not violate the First Amendment rights of students and that private universities must honor their promises of freedom of expression to students.

The Stanford case is far from unique. In fact, a casual skimming of news aggregate sites produces several cases of this type every day. The pattern is simple and predictable. Boy and Girl get together and kiss, or have sex – girl later regrets her choice because she's been caught cheating, or she's embarrassed about being a "slut" or she is angry the interlude did not result in a relationship commitment – so she retroactively reframes her own consensual sexual contact as an assault.

Once the accusation is made, the administrative machine does what it is now structured to do, grinding up the male, ignoring Habeas Corpus, ignoring due process, ignoring standards of evidence, ignoring everything except the convenience of the automatically presumed-to-be-credible female "victim." The Boy is expelled and barred from re-entry to another school, and the school often keeps his tuition money.

Caleb Warner, a former student at University of North Dakota provides another example of this machine in action[5]. Mr Warner was falsely accused of sexual assault by a female student with whom he'd had consensual sexual contact. The school decided Mr Warner had violated their code of student conduct and barred him from the university for three years. They did this based on no evidence, solely on accusation by the female student who is now a fugitive on the run from police – for issuing the false accusation against Mr. Warner. In light of Mr. Warner's innocence – and the outstanding arrest warrant against his accuser the school has nonetheless refused to lift his ban from academic life.

The abandonment of due process is likely not the goal of the OCR's edict to eviscerate constitutional rights– it's just a tactic. That universities retain the paid tuition fees of male students, once disposed of, may help map the motivation behind the "Dear Colleague," letter. At Stanford, students pay $57,000 per year to attend.

While the theft of tuition is definitionally fraud, the real money comes in redefining sexual assault along greatly broadened terms – and these wider definitions reflected in collected statistics by law enforcement agencies.

That the sexual grievance industry depends on increased carnage for profit leads to understanding the new revenue model is not just for schools. Well run enterprises will test-market a new business model before deploying it on a larger scale. By greatly expanding the scope of the legal definition of sexual assault, encompassing a great percentage of wholly consensual sexual interactions – the "legitimate" statistics will change, reflecting increased incidence of sexual assault closer to what feminism's marketing has long pretended.

Proponents of domestic policy based on data rather than fantasy have been critical of the influence of feminist dogma, citing law enforcement statistics which contradict the narrative of a rape epidemic. Stats, such as those displayed on the bureau of justice statistics website are used to set budgets and justify funding in the domestic violence grievance industry. Universities which increasingly operate extra-judicial courts on ideological rather than legal guidelines serve as both a "test market" as well as a forum where students are exposed to ideological governance , relatively insulated from more mature members of public who would sharply reject the abandonment of due process. Students emerging from this test environment as graduates, or otherwise, do so carrying the normalization of extra-judicial ideological courts into the social mainstream.

And the timing of this may not be coincidental. Very shortly, the FBI will be discussing the revision and expansion of the definition of rape. A subcommittee of the Criminal Justice Information Service of the FBI plans to take up the task at an Oct. 18 meeting in Baltimore. The expanded definition under consideration includes cases in which the victims are under the influence of alcohol. Recommendations of this committee will go to an advisory board and then to FBI Director Robert Mueller for approval[6].

These proposed changes are the result of organizations including the Feminist Majority Foundation and the Women's Law Project in Philadelphia[7] who have been petitioning to expand the definition used by the FBI in their uniform statistics on criminal victimization.

This might appear a terribly cynical interpretation of events. So cynical that readers may assume I've got my facts wrong. Or that I have omitted a major element with which it makes sense for universities to use their own kangaroo courts to appropriate tuition and eject students, barring them from education after defrauding them; doing all this with the complete sanction of the Department of Education.

What we have are universities – which are just businesses, but they've been given sanction to convene courts operating without public accountability, without due process, and hidden from the public in the sandbox of the academic world. These courts – lacking accountability to law – are now being used to defraud male students, derail their lives and demoralize them to an extent that the carnage remains hidden.

[box type="download" icon="none"]The businesses we call "schools" now operate extra-judicial courts and determine guilt using ideology rather than the law, and the government ratifies this. What argument, then, can be made to stop any other business from also convening their own courts using their own ideology in place of laws? Any organization could charge citizens (perhaps employees?) with various offenses, and then determine guilt and penalty. [/box]

Also, because the extra-judicial courts of ideology operate with the force of law and the sanction and funding of government – but conveniently without the checks and balances of legal due process, political efforts to"reform" them are a cul-de-sac designed to frustrate any such efforts.

Universities now operate at once outside the law and with its backing. This is definitionally vigilante "justice," made worse by the sanction of government. In a political climate where government actively funds and propels private, illegal courts – and when citizens are defrauded and professionally destroyed by illegal courts run by businesses – how soon before university administrators and functionaries fear being lynched from tree limbs?

There are several obvious reasons why a volatile, commensurate reaction to the emergence of this system has not occurred. Foremost is the fact that the sandbox of the academic world insulates them from the public scrutiny that law enforcement and legislative proceedings must endure. This means that almost nobody is aware that the rule of law is gone in America.

[1] http://www.nypost.com/p/news/opinion/opedcolumnists/the_feds_mad_assault_on_campus_sex_zjUl29Y8d3NmoYOkKchblO

[2] http://www.wesh.com/news/23991233/detail.html
[3] http://www.anandaanswers.com/pages/naaFalse.html
[4] http://www.realclearpolitics.com/articles/2011/08/30/on_sexual_harassment_and_title_ix_111065.html
[5] http://www.wdaz.com/event/article/id/6963/
[6] http://www.dc50tv.com/news/nationworld/la-na-rape-fbi-20111001,0,3391718.story
[7] http://www.huffingtonpost.com/2011/04/30/fbi-rape-definition_n_855872.html

Updated guidelines for AVfM articles and contributors

Paul Elam · 16 October 2011 · Archived copy · Original

[box icon="none"]The following has just been updated on the writers page for AVfM. Please feel free to ask any questions here as there is no commenting available on the site page for writers. Thanks – PE[/box]

Please read this carefully and completely before submitting.

A Voice for Men welcomes contributions from the larger community of men and women with something to say about most any aspect of the modern sexual zeitgeist. Some basic requirements for submissions are as follows:

You must know, or be willing to learn, how to post an article in WordPress admin. It is relatively simple and we will help you if you are unfamiliar with the platform.

Pieces are generally expected to be between 750 and 1,500 words, but variations on that are not out of the question.

Very important: Use a spell check before submitting, or we will send your piece to the trash before we finish reading it. Sorry, we don't have time to compensate for your lack of attention to punctuation and other details.

One of our pet peeves is improper use of bold fonts, ALL CAPS and punctuation. Caps, bold font and exclamation points do not make your point stronger in most cases, and may actually make you look desperate. Occasionally there are exceptions, but the best policy is just to let the writing, not gimmicks, make your point.

Improper use of punctuation in relation to quotation marks is one of our other pet peeves. For example, when using quotation marks, in most cases punctuation will be placed inside the second set of marks, not outside. Thus, we put something in quotation "like this," not "like this". Cool? There are some minor exceptions, and you can read about that here.

Going through a piece with lots of things placed in quotes and having to henpeck our way through correcting things like that puts us in a bad mood. So, please do your part; have your article not require anyone to sit with it for two or three hours in order to make it publishable.

[box type="alert" icon="none"]Some other matters for writers to consider:[/box]

Your byline: We ask all writers submitting for the first time to give a first and last name to use in the byline. It does not have to be your actual name. It can be a pseudonym of your choosing. Please do not submit articles with an internet screen name like lizardgulp321 or Phineas Fembotcrusher and expect us to let it represent a contributor to AVfM. Please help us maintain a professional appearance that fits the high caliber website AVfM has become.

You have to be able to write effectively. You needn't be Hemmingway, but fundamental writing skills are a must. You can have the greatest ideas and perspectives in the world, but if you can't set them to pen in a way that keeps people engaged, then no one will finish what you have written, or come back to this website.

This is not a place for partisan politics. Period.

This is not a place for woman bashing. Clarification: We invite well written pieces on the dark side of both the feminine and masculine psyche with unapologetic abandon. The point is that bitches and ho's diatribes are not the same thing as incisive analysis about what is wrong with women in this culture, any more than rants about how "men only want one thing" have ever added anything meaningful to understanding men, generally speaking. OK, lecture over.

Regarding religion: AVfM accepts no articles that either promote religion, or that are critical of those that choose to follow a religious path in life. The idea is the AVfM is not a platform for a religious message, nor is it a place where we will tolerate those who are religious being made to feel unwelcome or unwanted.

If you have not just been scared off, and you can wield a keyboard like a sword, then shoot me an email at avoiceformen@yahoo.com. Send me a submission (no attachments, plain text only please), include whatever name you want placed as the byline for the piece, and let's add another voice to the choir.

Eight people dead? Is that all?

Paul Elam · 17 October 2011 · Archived copy · Original

[dropcap]I[/dropcap] have something to say to the mainstream, blue pill zombies in the world; in particular the skeezoids over at Jezebel and an OCWeekly hack named Matt Coker. Scott Dekraai was wrong to murder eight people, including his ex-wife.

And in other news, giraffes are really tall compared to chihuahuas, it is dangerous to look for gas leaks with a lit kitchen match and wiping your ass in the woods with Poison Ivy is a really bad idea.

Can we move on now? Can we actually try to learn something a little more complex and meaningful than "E-w-w-w! Mur-der is b-a-a-a-a-d!" Or is figuring out what would be obvious to a turnip as far as your thinking can take you?

Recently, TDOM posted a short opinion piece here in which he examined the public reactions to two separate incidents of violent crime. He cited both Catherine Kieu Becker, who drugged and tied up her husband, then severed his penis with a kitchen knife and threw it in a garbage disposal. The other was the recent tragedy involving the above mentioned Dekraai case.

The thrust of his piece was not on the motive for either crime, but on public reaction to both, which, as TDOM aptly pointed out, was vastly different.

Friend Ferdinand Bardamu also addressed the tragedy on his blog. His piece explored not only the differences in reaction to these two events, but also challenged readers to examine how that difference in reaction affects our ability to understand and possibly address similar, future tragedies that might occur.

This quote from his piece was also posted into the Coker rant:

[box type="alert" icon="none"]"[D]o I expect this horrific crime to inspire any introspection on the part of Americans, or any questioning of the role of feminism in poisoning the relationship between men and women? Nope."[/box]

I don't expect us to learn anything from this tragedy either, any more than we did, say, from Thomas James Ball's self-immolation. Thanks to a media infested with one-dimensional (and one-trick) morons like Coker, no matter how many get slaughtered or burn themselves to death or eat guns, the public won't get anything more than watery analysis and platitudes. And when anyone actually does try to inject some thoughtfulness into the discussion, we get their attacks. Of course, we are all pro murder; mass murder. We are also pro baby killing, after they come out of the womb. We hunt endangered species for fun and torture children when the mood strikes us. What, you didn't think just hating women and playing video games would hold our interest forever, did you?

Telling, isn't it? We have no problem associating poverty with violent crime, as well as alcohol and drug abuse. We even stretch things (way past the point of reason) to explain violence in women, whether murdering their husbands or their children, with now standardized claims of domestic abuse and/or postpartum depression.

But let an MRA write one line on a blog pointing to the idea that some violent crime might be inspired by ripping someone to shreds in a family court, taking their children from them and their property, and then leaving them a life lived under the thumb of state functionaries, and you get something else. You get ideologues with tunnel vision crawling out of the wood work to accuse you of wearing a tin foil hat and advocating murder.

Jezebel.com, the same website (God, do I have to say this again?) whose readers and staff are on record bragging about physically attacking and injuring their husbands and boyfriends, hyped things up with their big headline:

Men's Rights Activists Come Out In Support Of Salon Killer

Ok, so the ploy here is simple, though not near as imaginative as fembots would like to, well, imagine. They think that by twisting valid exploration into what happened on that terrible day into a pro-mass murder spin job, that they might succeed in derailing a men's movement that is pushing its way right into their faces. It won't work.

First, anyone with enough of a brain to click through and actually read the source material for these hit pieces will see they are lying. And two, anyone who doesn't is more than likely a member of their own neurotic choir. What they are doing here is wasting their time, and saving us on ours. They are recruiting for us, and I expect doing a pretty good job of it. That Jezebel had to rely on the mentally flatulent David Futrelle to mine comments was just a bonus.

Anything they criticize will be debunked by anyone who can think, or see through bullshit. In other words, our demographic. With every dishonest keystroke, these people are driving readers to our sites that have never been exposed to anything remotely truthful.

Tangling with the MRM in this way is a loser for anyone stupid enough to do it, and only finds appeal with bigots and the intellectually challenged. In other words, their demographic. God, I love being an MRA.

It's not really fair here to just keep the focus on these clowns, or even to rob them of what they come here to see. I don't want to disappoint them in that respect.

What happened just days ago was indeed a tragedy. And it should be one that prompts us to exhaust all possibilities in efforts to sort out what happened and why. Since this story involved a custody dispute, we should (call me crazy) take a look at what we know about that.

One thing we do know is that family courts are breeding grounds for conflict, turmoil and often violence. Even the most stable and rational of people wander near the breaking point from their experience in those places. And there are a number of unfortunates who could not hold it together and have ended up killing themselves and/or others.

Another thing we know is that the system is corrupt. We know that ex parte restraining orders are issued by the truckload, based solely on allegation, without so much as a smidgeon of evidence to support their worth. We also know that those courts have become profit centers, sucking up Title IV-D money like mobsters at a casino, largely by confiscating the income of men who are discriminated against in those same courts. It's a can of worms too complicated and too real for the likes of Jezebel and Coker to handle.

Indeed, while we reject any legitimacy in the actions of a murderer, thinking people don't just leave it there. Thinking people are saddened, but not shocked, that eight people got taken out. Thinking people are shocked that the numbers are so low. And that applies to our society as a whole whether the problems we address here were at play in the Dekraai case or not.

We still don't know many of the details of that horrific case, and it is likely we never will. But trying to sort out what happened and why should be part of what happens in a culture that wants to curtail violence, not create more of it.

Did Rayon McIntosh give them what they deserved?

Paul Elam · 17 October 2011 · Archived copy · Original

[dropcap]W[/dropcap]ith a tip of the hat to The-Spearhead, this one is worth re-posting (in about a million places). Jezebel.com comes to mind. It involves an altercation between two women and a man who was working in a Manhattan area McDonalds. The two women went on the attack after the man questioned a $50.00 bill they were trying to spend at the restaurant. The man responded by beating the holy shit out of both of them, even using a metal rod.

Of course the women, both drunk, after slapping the man and further attacking him 2 on 1, were not charged with assault, but with criminal mischief. I also note that the news reported here referred to the women as "unruly."

You can view the video of the altercation in our pop up viewer here.

I think this one will gain a lot of media attention, so AVfM writers may want to address it in upcoming articles. In my view, and this is just on the information so far reported, the assault of a store employee who is scrutinizing money being used at the establishment of his employment should be construed as an attempted robbery. That being the case, his reaction would seem appropriate.

What would you do if you were attacked by two people while working as a cashier for questioning the money they were trying to pass? Forget the fact that they were female. They were both intoxicated and extremely violent. Is it within your rights, or should it be, to respond in a way that ensured your attackers were incapacitated and unable to renew the attack?

Now, undoubtedly, McDonalds will be sued by the two female criminals. And just as undoubtedly they will settle, likely for retirement level funds, just to quiet "bad press" on the incident. Two thugs will walk, with enrichment, because they are female. And one employee will likely go to prison (he has already been charged) because he is a male that defended himself from violent female criminals.

There will be plenty of people that attempt to use the man's violent past as a way to justify punishing him. They will likely succeed. But the fact remains that these two women had no idea of his past when they attacked him. It had nothing to do with the events that transpired.

Last year, during the month of October, which is designated as Domestic Violence Awareness Month, I wrote a satirical piece on violent women called "Bash a Violent Bitch Month," in which I imagined a world where men responded with vigor when women attacked violently because they were confident that they were able to act with impunity. It was in response to a post at Jezebel.com where there readers and staff were celebrating their physical violence toward their husbands and boyfriends.

While it was a piece of satire, I also intended it to portray the possibilities involved in a culture that glorified violent women while pushing men to abandon any sense of chivalry or inclination to protect the "fairer" sex. I just never imagined that we would get such a glaring example of that presented, this year, in the month of October.

AVfM Radio tonight: Rape Hysteria!

Paul Elam · 18 October 2011 · Archived copy · Original

[box type="alert" icon="none"]

Tonight, on AVfM Radio we are back after a week off with a long awaited show on Rape Hysteria. JtO will join me, with Dr. T on the phones for an examination of false rape culture and the victim histrionics that surround the crime of rape as opposed to other violent crimes in this culture.

As part of the show tonight I am going to do a revised monologue based on my rape essay, "The Scourge of Rape, Yeah, Whatever." That is one particular barn burner that I wanted available for download at BTR. It's one that belongs in the archives there.

I am also going to be doing a short question and answer with JtO himself, who is appearing tonight, by the way, on prime time Canadian network television on a show called, "The Arena," with Michael Coren. JtO is representing, you guessed it, A Voice for Men!

So you want to be sure to tune in tonight for details about that, as well as the other goodies we have in our basket.

Oh, and just so everyone is prepared. This is going to be a show that really pushes the envelope, so to speak. So you might want to have your laptops fired up and ready to defend us. We are pulling out all the stops. And brothers, that isn't hype. We are going to get THAT close to the truth.

See you tonight!

[/box]

There are no laws

John Hembling (JtO) · 18 October 2011 · Archived copy · Original

[dropcap]T[/dropcap]here are no laws. If you're a man, you can be murdered with impunity. You can be charged and convicted with rape based on nothing but anonymous accusation. Not just in a court of law, but hey, in a court of kangaroos cooked up by college students. Laws? Bill of rights? Ha! If a woman accuses you of misconduct, your conviction for sexual assault – on no evidence – means increased funding for people who depend on your utility and disposability.

Okay, there are laws – sure, and you're governed by them, but you're not protected by them. We are now living in postlegal culture. Laws are selectively interpreted and enforced. This is nothing new obviously, the rich and the famous have always enjoyed privilege. However the legal system now operates along sexual lines, with you, my brothers, on the bottom tier. You're not even a human being, buddy. Nope, you're a disposable dispenser of labor, money, sperm, and on behalf of anyone but yourself – violence. The law says so.

Speaking of disposability, the appellation of "hero" in our culture depends on you sacrificing your future, and potentially your life on behalf of people who discount your humanity.

In spite of this, most men sleep-walk through life thinking they're living in a culture which treats them as humans with rights. A listing facts which show this to be false is beyond the scope of this discussion. Link in this article's footer for those interested[1].

[image]
Male Power
Certainly many people are aware that their government illegally tortures both foreigners and Americans, arrests and indefinitely detains citizens without trial or charge, wire taps the population in violation of the bill of rights, steals private property through eminent domain, but people still sedate themselves with 4 hours of television per day and mumble something about it being a "free country" while they know it is not.

However, systemic financial fraud and personal destruction by illegal private courts operating with the complete endorsement of government seems conceptually difficult to grasp. Perhaps it's just too similar to dystopian science fiction to recognize. When people are informed of these doings, because is is so far removed from popular understanding of living in a nation governed by laws – they dismiss factual reporting of the phenomena.

Another reason for public ignorance and apathy is that people still believe they're enfranchised citizens. They believe they're protected by the civil liberties encoded into law. These assumptions are wrong, of course, but the illusion persists, re-enforced by the momentum of a formerly democratic society and by cultivated misdirection in mainstream media. The unfortunate truth is that men are effectively peasants; chattel without legal rights. This isn't reflected in the formal structure of law in our culture, which is now mostly ignored as a matter of convenience, and that's partly why it goes mostly unaddressed by men.

The maintained illusion of legal enfranchisement is vitally important, because if men understood consciously they are peasants – they would do what disenfranchised and abused peasant populations has always done through history.

Now I'll attack women, please hold my beer.

This problem continues to be escalated by activism from ideologues who benefit from male disenfranchisement, and the result is an increasingly tiered society. This is superficially advantageous to women, of course – which is why the process continues with widespread public support. However, to be satisfied by benefitting from the legal, social, and economic disenfranchisement of a biological demographic demonstrates developmental arrest. Our culture has socialized women to have the emotional and ethical maturity of spoiled children. A notable characteristic of the developmentally stunted is an inability to be satisfied with any outcome.

A child demanding candy, and given candy at each demand – will not be a happy individual. Children provided with inadequate parental limits on their behavior will demand their parents, and other adults obey them. Those parents who accede to such childish tyranny generally produce children who grow into angry, dysfunctional adults. This is analogous to what western cultures have done as we relate to women as a demographic within society.

Characterized with a broad brush, women in western culture have become angry, entitled, violent, unaccountable, self indulgent, selfish, fat and wilfully ignorant bullies.

I'm not suggesting these qualities are innate. Rather, we have collectively cultivated these qualities, and we continue to do so. Killing men with the excuse of speculated past abuse, and destroying lives, careers and families through unfounded accusations are privileges afforded to only one sex. It is by public complicity as well as institutional endorsement of the routine misbehaviour of females that we've arrived at a society of female sociopaths.

That's not quite right actually, sociopaths tend to disguise the harm they do. Harm to men is openly treated as humor. A kick the the balls is one of the most overused devices in contemporary comedy. When Katherine Becker drugged and tied up her husband before cutting his reproductive organ off with a kitchen knife and disposing of it in a kitchen waste grinder, a female daytime talk show audience found it hilarious.

I'm not sure if sociopath is the correct term to describe so complete a failure to recognize brutal violence as abhorrent – mistaking it for comedy. What's not in doubt is that women in our society are developmentally stunted to a degree that makes mention of behavioural disorders like psychopathy wholly appropriate.

Bitch, and Psycho Bitch are even used as proud self identification by some women – T-shirts featuring these labels are sold to women in department stores, and worn proudly without a hint of irony. The shirts don't generally include the word "violent" but they should.

[box type="tick" icon="none"]Sharon Osborne – who hosted the same daytime talk show mentioned on air that she idolized and maintained a shrine to the violent criminal Lorena Bobbitt.[/box]

If we cheer and giggle at a real occurrence of calculated mutilation of human beings based on their ethnicity, or their religion, there is something wrong with us. We call such people racists and bigots. However – if this violence and hatred is directed at an acceptable target demographic, then we're not bigots, no, we"re empowered – and it feels good.

The dissatisfaction of a child given candy at every demand is also manifesting in a rising social trend demanding of men they obey the strictures of an acceptable masculinity. This model being the "man up, become a provider protector and (disposable) sperm dispenser for women whose concept of "real man" is built on his utility alone.

Key Hymowitz and Penny Nance are just two recent lights of society who have thrown their weight behind an escalating chorus of attempted forced male conformity through shame. The problem, from the point of view of feminists as well as social conservatives, is men are increasingly waking up to their position in society as everybody's beast of burden – and are quietly refusing. Some are opting out and not bothering to be discreet.

A complete blindness to male pain is evident in the mainstream's new narrative to "man up." There is an apparent inability to reconcile feminist doctrine of male-as-oppressor with men's shorter lifespan, higher suicide rate, death rate on the job or exclusion in employment and education. Whether this disconnect is wilful self delusion or conceptual blindness due to ideology is open to interpretation, but in practical terms doesn't matter.

At present, non violent male behavior is increasingly criminalized on a selective basis, while violence against men is excused, or ignored. If this were to merely continue – the tide of men rejecting any onus on themselves could not be slowed. However, as the narrative of shame against male self actualization is dialled up, men are increasingly hostile to the self-serving reproach of their critics.

Campaigns of forced conformity through shame are not new of course. An unusually naked attempt to engineer male compliance with self-sacrifice through shame was practiced to "convince" men to enlist during the first world war. If the men's rights movement existed at that time, it has been buried in history, but MRAs certainly do exist

now. Push back from the MRM community continues to undermine attempts to force male conformity and agreement to disposability – using factual and logical argument, as well as open mockery of so-cons and feminists.

It's because of this push-back, along with the established tendency of feminist ideologues to reject reality, that I expect a new form of feminist and so-con legal innovation. Men who refuse the allowed role of disposable provider will be criminalized. When that begins to happen – I believe that MRA's will not be the only males in this culture that the opponents of men's human rights will find unpalatable.

[1] Summary of Hatred

I will happily use my enemies' lies, too.

John Hembling (JtO) · 19 October 2011 · Archived copy · Original

[dropcap]S[/dropcap]ince I began writing from a MRA perspective, I've been watching with a certain amount of amazement as the general public and the mainstream media consistently fail to grasp what seems screamingly obvious.

One of the questions suggesting itself had been: does this failure of comprehension reflect an actual lack of understanding, or is it a wilful ignorance?The answer to that was provided indirectly by the recent obtuse commentary from several different sources, including Jezebel.com and a blog on OCWeekly.com.

AVfM contributor TDOM wrote last week about a man named Scott De Kraai, who opened fire killing 8 in a hair salon in Seal Beach, CA.

In the first two paragraphs of his article, The Damned Olde Man compared the public reaction to this event with the treatment of Katherine Becker's dismembering of her drugged and bound husband. While both events were grotesque, a man mutilated by a woman was handled as slapstick comedy. "Delightful," was the word used by former host Sharon Osborne of "The Talk." Sane human beings don't think mutilation or murder is delightful, and that's the point TDOM made in 133 words. Ferdinand Bardamu of the blog InMalaFide.com, made similar observations.

Of course, the attack commentary from OCWeekly's Matt Coker and Jezebel's Anna North, makes the claim that TDOM, AVfM and Bardamu are endorsing or cheering the killing of 8 people by a man deranged by the destruction of his life. According to North, "MRAs are flocking to defend Dekraai."

When I read the first of this attack commentary, I re-read TDOM's piece to make sure I hadn't missed his supposed endorsement of an accused killer. It turned out that no, I hadn't missed it, because there was no such endorsement. The same proved true at Bardamu's blog.

This is where the characterization of TDOM, FB and the larger mens rights movement as advocates of murder provides an answer to the question of incomprehension versus wilful pretence. Rather than addressing the emergence of the MRM with something approaching honesty, the commentary is focused on maintaining an approved narrative. Inflammatory stories about those violent, evil, murderous men's and father's rights activists. Paul Elam was understandably annoyed by this yellow ink, and made his ire known in an article which asked "Is that all?"

My view of the matter is more sanguine. Those who've deliberately characterized analysis of violence with support of violence by MRAs have effectively outed themselves. The perplexing question – are they dishonest or merely stupid is answered by "analysis" of extraordinary sloppiness. The careless enthusiasm to vilify the MRM seems to count on nobody ever reading TDOM's original article. This assumption might have been valid as recently as a year ago. However, in spite of the best efforts of ideologues opposing men's rights to silence, censor, defame, and shame MRAs – we are claiming an increasing share of public attention. The flagrant dishonesty our opponents have grown accustomed to has become habitual, and in spite of a changing landscape, the slow-adapting feminists and their white knights continue, for the moment, to gift us by dropping their pants in public.

At this point, I'm going to address Mr Coker and Miss North directly. Thanks, and keep it up. The attack on The Damned Old Man and our friend Mr. Bardamu is only one action, but I'm happy to exploit it, illuminating the pattern of consistent dishonesty in the pronouncements of big feminism's proponents. The go-to tactic of flat out lying isn't limited to criticism of MRM writing of course, as most experienced MRAs know – a great body of feminism's standard narrative is undiluted baloney, most of which has been soundly and repeatedly debunked.

[box icon="none"]Christina Hoff Sommers characterized the pattern of dishonesty within the feminist run grievance industry as "a body of egregiously false information at the heart of the domestic violence movement.”[/box]

The consistent repetition of lies from ideologues is due, mainly to the relative obscurity and scarcity of opposing argument. We’ve operated from a position on the margin, against opponents whose opinion controlled the public narrative. The opposition to lies sold in the open has, until very recently, been drowned out.

This situation persists, but is less true every day. In fact – although few vocal Men’s Right Activists can claim any fraction of the public’s attention – our work is increasingly reflected in content within the mainstream media, including prime time television.

The demonstrated and continuing pattern of open disregard for the truth from feminists and male collaborators will probably not persist for much longer. This is because at each instance of public dishonesty – there is a growing number of individuals ready to fact-check and call out hateful lies when they’re repeated in public discussion. The increased willingness to answer lies with data is not even limited to those who self identify as men’s rights activists. A fraction of the undecided public are increasingly inclined to refute the most obvious of big feminism’s lies.

Returning to directly address of bloggers like Matt Coker and Anna North, along with similar ideological scribblers. Just keep doing what you’re doing, and again, thank you.

Chateau Bullshit

Paul Elam · 19 October 2011 · Archived copy · Original

O.K., so you want to get laid? Here's how you do it. Smell clean, get in the proximity of women, and then ignore them. When they come to fuck you, and they will, shut up and let it happen.

Sorry, but there is little else to it. Women are wired to respond to men who walk with enough self-confidence and involvement in their own lives that they don't need to invest any energy into bagging girls. They attract women naturally.

There now, I just told you in 80 words (and could have cut it to 50) everything anyone ever needed to know about scoring.

Unfortunately the great majority of men have a really difficult time getting this, largely because they don't have any real confidence to project, and it shows at its most glaring every time they get in the presence of women. The big problem here is that indifference can only be feigned so much by a lot of men, which is why we have PUA's out there in abundance teaching men how to jump through hoops trying to get women's attention (read: pussy begging) and move in for the score.

It's a tad ironic, isn't it, that in a culture where women are slinging ass like free hydro at a Pink Floyd concert, that we have men out here actually selling the idea that getting laid is an "art"?

Don't get me wrong. I don't have anything against the high profile PUA's and Gamers. I also have a healthy respect for people who can sell designer lint removers when a patch of masking tape and some common sense will work just as well. But it has to be said, must be said, that both of these kinds of sales people are targeting a similar demographic; ignorant, gullible customers. And I have to admit, making a living at that could be called an art, and probably should.

I think in a way those guys do us a lot of good, though I wish I could say the same for their followers. The MRM, something they sometimes like to take pot shots at (it's that alpha dog thing), actually benefits from their work. I look at it this way. AVfM is a good place to go for Gamers and PUA's once they get some whiskers and disabuse themselves of the misguided notion that getting laid is something you need to work at. Overcoming their denial can be tricky, though. The conversation usually goes something like this.

[box type="alert" icon="none"]

MRA: Man, you don't need to do all that work to get laid.

PUA: But hell man, I get PUSSY!

MRA: I heard you. I am just saying that all the work isn't worth it.

PUA: What do you mean, not worth it? Man, I get PUSSY!

MRA: Well, yeah, sure, but what I meant to say was that you don't need to do all that chasing.

PUA: The more I chase, the more PUSSY I get!

MRA: Don't you think a one track mind on sex can be dangerous? I mean, given the times?

PUA: Man, you're never going to get any PUSSY talking like that!

[/box]

Not much to work with, is it? And I am not really suggesting that anyone try. The men that end up here after being introduced to the Manosphere via PUA and Game sites don't need to be fished out of the cesspool. They tend to walk out of it on their own, as would anyone who would not be Gamed by Gamers forever.

But the ones that remain, and make it a lifestyle, are just too enslaved to imagine red pill freedom, and likely not bright enough to learn what it means. They are literally institutionalized by their own desires and cannot imagine setting foot outside the city limits of Snatchville. The unquestionable black hole that exists in all these men is the place that should have held their core values and self respect.

Anyone who attempts to make an art form of passing a shit test has only succeeded in eating said shit and advertising themselves to the world as a shit eater (Yes, I know, but you get PUSSY!). Too bad such unfortunates seem oblivious to the fact that refusing to even participate in a shit test will have the same effect as passing one, except that it might help to eventually hook you up with a woman slightly less likely to yell rape the first time she gets pissed at you, or cut off your dick when you're asleep.

And anyone who believes in tossing negs, concocted for the purpose of aiding in the score, only does so because they don't realize that living by values that you don't retreat from, one of them being that your self-respect is worth more than time in a common vagina, is the best neg you could ever hope to toss. But hey, if you like begging, eating shit and life with no values, The Chateau has room for you.

Game – zeta style: Part 1, what and why

cooterbee · 19 October 2011 · Archived copy · Original

[dropcap]W[/dropcap]hen visiting the MGTOW message boards, I see many proclamations of celibate splendor. I see many more gasps of frustration at striking out with a woman or being mistreated by one. That all leads me to believe that there is at least some scattered interest in how to reconcile biological urges within MGTOW and Zeta concepts. The call to avoid all women in all circumstances is both loud and unfortunate because no fundamental aspect of life should be addressed solely by self-denial.

This is not an endorsement for PUA procedures. I know little to nearly nothing about them and see no need to even to familiarize myself with them. Beyond the concepts that are all over the media, I have no sense of their utility, unless it is to make you look like a pussy begging clown. Rather this is intended to point out the side effects of the red pill that positively affect how typical women regard Zetas to a greater or lesser extent. This is also not an attempt to redirect a Zeta's focus back to pussy. It is, however, recognition that many men, even after they ingest the red pill, may retain a gnawing sense of undeserved inadequacy that draws them into flashbacks of the blue pill world. The good news is that was then and this is now.

Whopper Question: Why would a Zeta even want Game?

Best answer is for whatever reason that he decides. Who is so well placed that he can tell a Zeta what he should or should not want? Besides Zeta Game is not something you acquire with misspent energy. It accumulates as a result of legitimate self-exploration and increased understanding of one's surroundings.

What does a Zeta need to do to be more attractive?

He needs to look around himself and recognize that he already is. Not as easy as it seems. Ninety-Nine percent of any man's interactions with women are on the pubic level where you will be considered a generic "man" and the proper recipient of any hostility that she may wish to dispense. One percent of the time, you are operating on the private level; the level where she accepts or rejects you as an individual rather than as a franchise of Man, Inc. The change occurs entirely within this sliver of your interactions. Very easy to overlook and disregard.

Level One: The Ninety Nine Percent.

Level One interactions are the teller at the bank, the ER nurse, the bookstore cashier etc. Most of the women you cross paths with during a normal day. Forget about them. To them you are just background filler. It doesn't matter if you have a billion dollars, a build like Charles Atlas or are in the Aga Khan's inner circle. You are a random man and therefore beneath notice; representing slime, sludge and all manner of villainy as you do. The most probable outcomes range from neutral to irate. Usually her goal is to disengage as fast as she can.

One mistake that many men make is that they use Level One interactions gone bad as evidence that they are unattractive to women. The sales girl who went hysterical was just lashing out at the patriarchy that you embody. No Level One exchange is an indicator of your attractiveness. Either she was paid to be nice to you or felt unrestrained in abusing you. Neither amounts to anything.

From what I have seen of "day game" on television, you are supposed to latch on and try to make something of these interactions. The theory is that if you force enough approaches you can reduce your level of shame. Reducing shame is all well and good but, honestly, who wants to do that? Ehh… piss on it.

Level Two: Where it's at.

The willingness to meet you or anyone at Level Two is entirely random and unilateral. This could possibly be the origin of The Numbers Game Theory. Level Two attention can be further subdivided into three boxes: I'm Wet, Let's Just Be Friends (LJBF), and Eww, Ick (EI). What going Zeta does is re-allocate the number of incidents in the three boxes. EI tends to stay constant. Zeta, however, shifts a few LJBF into the I'm Wet box. For example, say the blue pill allocation is 0, 5, 5 – typical. Post red pill it becomes maybe, 2, 3, 5. A tiny percentage, easily missed, but in practicality the difference is enormous. That means instead of none there are TWO girls out there who want to bang you on a given day. It is just a matter of knowing they are there and giving them the green light.

Zetas are all different but they tend to adopt several of the same attributes. It just so happens that women find those attributes attractive. As a Zeta progresses toward his own destiny these attributes become more pronounced and more attractive. I'll get into specifics in the next article. For now, it is enough to note that going Zeta, all by itself, helps one's relations with women. You have to do NOTHING for the result to manifest itself.

FBI changes meaning of rape in closed meeting

Robert O'Hara · 20 October 2011 · Archived copy · Original

[box]

Washington October 20 (AVfM News) On Tuesday, October 18,the Uniform Crime Reporting (UCR) Ad Hoc Sub-Committee of the FBI's Criminal Justice Information Service discussed and voted on an update of the definition of rape for reporting purposes. This definition is not to be considered the actual law, as only legislatures can change the law. Rather, it is a classification used to determine whether or not a certain acts can be counted as rape for UCR reporting.

The meeting followed several other smaller gatherings of law enforcement groups such as the Police Executive Forum who reviewed proposed definitions and deliberated as to whether or not to support them. The meeting was closed to the public and its location was not reported until after it was concluded on Tuesday night.

The old definition of rape was stated as simply having "forced unlawful carnal knowledge of a woman" which only included vaginal penetration and not anal or oral penetration. Also lacking was any language concerning consent of the accuser. The new definition to be passed on to the CJIS Policy Advisory Board reads as follows:

"Penetration, no matter how slight, of the vagina or anus with any body part or object, or oral penetration by a sex organ of another person, without the consent of the victim."

The Baltimore Sun reported that proponents of the update are very happy about the new definition and many of the groups supporting it are on record as saying that non consensual sex should include sex while under the influence even if at the time it was consensual. "The new definition is what I wanted — for sure," said Carol Tracy of the Women's Law Project, an advocacy group located in Philadelphia who attended the meeting. Chuck Wexler, executive director of the Police Executive Research Forum, said Tuesday that 80 percent of police chiefs supported a revision and said changes were a "huge step forward in accurately reflecting the number of rapes that are occurring in our society."

Last summer members of the Woman's Law Project and The Feminist Majority, another very well funded feminist advocacy organization, descended on capitol hill where a special hearing was held after the Baltimore Sun reported that the city had the highest percentage of "unfounded" rapes in the nation. Yesterday, Wednesday, October 19th 40 members of Congress sent a letter to FBI director urging him to sign on for the broader definition of rape when the recommendation of the CJIS Policy Advisory Board is made in December. Subcommittee members and advocates for the change are confident that the Director will do so.

Men's Rights activists may be relieved that the proposed update of the FBI's definition does not explicitly include consensual sex while under the influence. However, what is of great concern is the fact that more reported rapes-many of which may not have been rapes at all but consensual sex while drunk-will mean more funding, not only for law enforcement organizations but advocacy groups that clearly have had a hand in broadening the definition of rape in many state legislatures.

This could give great incentive for local advocacy groups to lobby for an expanded definition of Rape in states where rape is more properly defined. The fact that the Woman's Law Project had access to the meeting exclusive of the public shows a clear conflict of interest and underscores a troubling monopoly that the Sexual Grievance Industry has on the debate surrounding sexual assault.

Sources:

http://www.baltimoresun.com/news/maryland/baltimore-city/bs-md-ci-new-federal-rape-definition-20111019,0,1048062.story http://www.baltimoresun.com/news/maryland/baltimore-city/bs-md-ci-fbi-rape-subcommittee-20111018,0,3325996.story

http://www.fbi.gov/about-us/cjis/advisory-policy-board

[/box]

Speaking ill of the dead

Izzey · 21 October 2011 · Archived copy · Original

[dropcap]I [/dropcap]have to admit that some frank talk about people no longer with us may not be my finest hour, but also feel that it is as much my right to do so as voicing my pure disdain for some of the living. I have a chip on my shoulder, an axe to grind; some serious business with someone that ain't here no more. And for most of the people that say they don't speak ill of the dead, my response to that statement is one word: Liar.

We would have nothing to talk about if we didn't talk about those that came before us. "Yeah, she was a real bitch on wheels," or "He was a real nasty bastard." But mostly it comes in the form of "I hated my mother/father/sister/brother/aunt/uncle…because he/she lied, neglected, robbed, raped, abused or whatevered me."

[quote style="boxed" float="right"]When I see these cunts playing for public sympathy, and destroying the lives of men who didn't rape anyone, I can easily imagine cutting their fucking tongues out.[/quote] What a pathetic bunch we are. Dead people (even those still alive but just "dead" to us) are often the founders of our self-worth. They are our old reliable never-talks-back whipping post, for all the reasons we are who we are today; the endless well of rage we hold near and dear; the handy-dandy excuse for self-loathing, underachievement and shitty life.

This has merit, but to that I say: once you have survived your horrendous past, you have a choice in how you use the experience to build on your future.

I was raped at nine years old. Yup, Izzey was raped; real, live rape that I kept to myself for quite a few years. I told no one, because my father would have gone to jail for it. No, my father did not rape me. His best friend did. Had my father found out he would have went to prison for the rest of his life for murder. I have no doubt whatsoever that he would have killed this man, quickly, brutally.

So I told no one, because I loved my father and did not want to lose him. It's as simple as that, and, quite frankly, a tad too simple for some people to digest. I actually don't give a shit about anyone's opinion of that. In fact, I only feel the need to say so because I live in a world where dialogue about the most challenging of problems is often controlled by people with the most challenged of minds.

It was a horrible experience. It was the movie scene stereotype; the rape advocates version of all rapes, not the kind concocted by drunken sorority rats and angry girlfriends. Still, I lived to tell the tale, eventually. I even went into therapy for it, eventually. That might make a lot of people wonder why I am here advocating for men's rights and even against things like false accusations and rape hysteria. How could I? How dare I?

I can only explain it by telling you that every single time I hear about women that cry rape after going into a hotel room with a stranger, putting a cap on three hours of drinking on his tab and dry humping in the corner of the bar, it pisses me off. When I hear about a woman that used a rape allegation to get back at a man for doing whatever her imagined slight of the moment, or out of regret or embarrassment for something she fucking chose to do, it pisses me off. When I hear about a man being accused of rape because it is good strategy in a contested divorce, it really gets me going.

Unlike these lying, histrionic skeezers, I actually know what it is like to be violated. I know what real fear is, and really deep shame, not the kind you make up in your mind after too many episodes of Oprah and too many messages that you are not accountable for your actions.

[image]When I see these cunts playing for public sympathy, and destroying the lives of men who didn't rape anyone, I can easily imagine cutting their fucking tongues out.

Rape is a serious crime. It is a personal violation of your body that in its real form is an act of unquestionable violence. It isn't supposed to be something women dabble in for attention or utilize for revenge.

The infamous SlutWalks, at their naissance, were the most ridiculous display of that kind of attention whoring I have ever seen. These women needed yet another reason (no matter how absurd) to wield their sexual power while maintaining their right to sexual irresponsibility. They accomplished nothing more than cry-baby ostracism of a police officer for giving them what I believe to this day was sound advice for their safety.

As to my experience with rape, I am going to tell you that I am okay. But my unfinished business with the dead, is that I never had the chance to say "Fuck you, I won. I saved my father, and I saved myself."

I heard he died from a very painful bone cancer a few years later. That was enough for me. But now that I am older and wiser with a clearer mind that can think for itself, I realize a few things. Statistically, and by that I mean in reality, men are raped more often than women. These are rapes that most women will tell you were deserved because many of them are men in prison, and that is only what they will say once you get them to acknowledge that those rapes even exist. They are also rapes that most women will tell you were not rapes because it was a 30 something woman, perhaps a teacher, seducing a 13 year old boy. They will even tell you he was "lucky," and so will far too many men.

They won't be bothered to examine the fact that many of these rapes take place against men that are wrongfully accused, and don't even belong in prison (DNA evidence is now slowly helping to free some them). And they won't be bothered to condemn the utter breech of trust and self serving manipulation that occurs when an adult seduces a child. No big deal, right? He loved it! Sure.

All of this, every last self deluding bit serves one, pernicious rule in the politics of rape. Women are the victims, even when rape is imagined. And men are the perpetrators, even when they are raped for real.

No one deserves to be raped, no one, especially a child of nine years old. But women that use this term to describe something in which most of them willingly took part, drunk or otherwise, should maybe have it really happen to them. At least they would be finally telling the truth from actual experience.

The real rape epidemic

John Hembling (JtO) · 22 October 2011 · Archived copy · Original

[dropcap]C[/dropcap]ontrary to what many MRA's have been saying for years, there actually is a rising epidemic of rape, in the United States, and the world. It's bigger, and more prevalent even than what feminists claim. This is sexual violence perpetrated with malice of forethought and a complete disregard for the humanity of the victims. This form of rape occurs when a man and a woman engage in consensual sex, and afterwards the woman, out of anger or jealousy or embarrassment, or sometimes just the desire for attention, re-frames the consensual sexual encounter as sexual assault or rape. This is the transformation of the physical expression of affection, lust and love into a post-facto act of prolonged brutality against the men so accused.

Like most of the violence on which the ideology of feminism is built, this form of rape is indirect. It is performed at several removes from the instigator. But it is rape as vile and dehumanizing and brutal as the most savage direct sexual violence occurring in our society. It is rape performed by bureaucrats; by the petty, the small-minded and the mediocre. It is rape committed in public, by university faculty and students, and activists. Consensual sex reclassified after the fact as rape.

Accusations are made from safe anonymity. Guilt is determined without the due process of law. Secret committees, run by organizations pretending to a humanist ethic, while discarding human rights en masse.

This rape, this word; is not a euphemism for mere slander or administrative misconduct. No. This is rape as foul as the most forcible and violent aggravated penis in vagina rape that radical feminists would like to reduce all sex to. This is rape disguised as justice; clouded behind a fabricated culture of female victimhood. It continues while we all watch, silenced by our fear that if we speak up, we might be the next target of this human sacrifice for profit.

Yes, profit.

Driven as the systematic destruction of men is by ideology of male utility without male humanity, the real gain is money. This money comes in the form of donations and federal subsidies to help combat the eternal victimization of women. Whether they are victims or not.

Regret after sex, it is made into rape by accusation, and ratified by kangaroo courts convened by students and staff of institutions of "higher education." More rape on the books means more funding, and more political power. Nobody quite dares to question whether it's 3 or 4 shots of vodka and red-bull which renders Suzy guilty if she chooses to operate a motor vehicle, but a victim of rape if she chooses to spread her legs.

To question the veracity of a rape accusation of convenience is to blame the victim. Besides, the boy who drunkenly fumbled Suzie's panties off, or maybe just kissed her, but failed to call the next morning – he doesn't deserve due process, or human rights. Because he's an oppressor, from a class of oppressors. It says so right in the campus manual for student conduct.

Your budget hasn't been approved yet, so don't make a fuss. Keep your head down. Go along, and remain silent while casual human destruction by an extra-judicial administrative procedure at a school is ratified and normalized by years of precedent. Don't ask where men, stripped of their rights, denied their voice, and denied basic humanity will find redress.

Because it won't be in student run kangaroo courts, and it wont be in the proceedings presided over by anointed state functionaries. They will have no redress, except by direct act against those whose silence and complicity abandoned, robbed and raped them.

A memory of a barber

Matthew Steele · 23 October 2011 · Archived copy · Original

[dropcap]P[/dropcap]erhaps it is my age, and it is arguable that I am being nostalgic, but indulge me for a moment, if you please. Growing up, I remember my first trips to a barber; a small little shop filled with the smell of apple flavored tobacco's and Birchwood soaps. The chairs were fine carved oak and decked out in worn red leather. You could see about a hundred pictures on the wall, of old cars, and men in chairs getting a fresh lathered shave. These were masculine moments, where being a man was not only accepted but expected. Men came into this place and I would hear them mutter about the local ball club favorite, or brashly curse about something that was irritating them. These were the moments as I sat in the chair quietly, that brought a smile and a slight scolding while Vern, my barber, was trimming down my sideburns.

Today, finding a man's barber is like finding a gold vein in a long abandoned mine, but you can find hair cutting Crapdonald's just about on every street corner. Perhaps even worse, there is a beauty spa named "Utopia" or some such fucking place that bleeds those poor male slaves of half the paycheck they handed over to their feminist masters. It begs the question of what one of the most important things has been taken from men today. Perhaps we could sum it up in one phrase, the pride of being a man.

[quote style="boxed" float="right"]Because in the end, when you walk out of there, you will remember what it was like to feel good being a man.[/quote] Men have been told they are manipulative and selfish, that they are, in essence, raping, lying, cheating bastards, incapable of any compassion without a woman's guidance. Alright, so maybe we bought into the lie, but more likely it was beaten into us by our master to which we foolishly said "I do." Hindsight being 20/20, you should have gotten into that sports car your buddy had waiting on you, when he hoped you would change your mind. Because you never really thought about what would happen to you in ten years, when she "rediscovered" herself.

When dealing with the courts, the part time fatherhood, struggling to pay child support while slumping into depression over not seeing your children, it's a miracle more men have not ended their lives over the trials this corrupt system has forced them to endure.

Yet men endure it, they take it, like they have hundreds of times over in man's history. Maybe it is because at the end of their enslavement, they find their balls again. Maybe they remember what it was like to stand on their own through the hard times, and find out that being who they are is good and decent and is worth being. Maybe they take a look around and found an old buddy who went through their experience too, and they realize the injustices being perpetrated on them by a misandric society. Then they take a bigger look around, to shows of men being portrayed as idiots and buffoons on television, to being inundated with pink ribbons, while their father dies of prostate cancer – with no marches for their struggle. With that much misandry, and that much money backing it, how much more can a man do to fight that? He cannot even get a decent shave anymore.

Hey, I understand, it was easy to go spend a few bucks on a disposable razor, and a few more on some white shit in a can. "Real" men do not go for shaves when their masters need their nails done and we do not want to short the grocery bill. Real men do not object when those same masters tell them, barber shops are only for men, and therefore, sexist. You chauvinistic bastard, what were you thinking when you wanted your beard trimmed? I know, it was all about being the superior over women and keeping them down. That was what you thought. Something along those lines. Ya. Sure.

[quote style="boxed" float="left"]Alright, so maybe we bought into the lie, but more likely it was beaten into us by our master to which we foolishly said "I do." [/quote] Or maybe, you just want to find a place where a man could be a man again. A place where it was alright to curse about your favorite ball club playing like hell. A place where you could walk in looking like hell and smell like a man when you walked out. Perhaps it was a camaraderie, or maybe it was the old pictures, hell, maybe it was the fact that you did not have to worry about a judge taking away 75 percent of your check, or how you were going to get that toy for the holidays for your child. It was a place where you had to trust another man who was holding a razor to your neck. The good part about that, was that you could trust him. He had your back, because you were on the same side. You were both men. We have to remember that when we look around, at other men, and watch them get dragged through hell. We have to remember our camaraderie in this fight against misandry.

So maybe it's time to look up an old barber, and throw the fucking Gillette five razor disposable out the damned window. You do know that five razors is not good for your face when just one good sharp one will do, right? I guess that is my point. So much of man's pride has been stripped from him because he was just a man, that we do not even remember how to shave properly anymore. So when your buddy just lost half his paycheck to child support over false domestic violence accusations, and cannot make the rent because the other half of his check is still going to the mortgage for the house he cannot live in? Call him up, and take him to a barber shop and get him a good shave and haircut. While you're at it, get one for yourself, and ask the man shaving you for good tips on shaving for men.

Because in the end, when you walk out of there, you will remember what it was like to feel good being a man. Then maybe you will feel strong enough to begin to help your brothers fight back against what made them feel badly in the first place. Because in the long haul we are going to need every good man we can get. The way I see it, might as well look sharp getting there.

An ambiguous apology, or just bullshit?

Paul Elam · 23 October 2011 · Archived copy · Original

As anyone in the men's movement not living under a rock is aware, there was a recent flurry of activity, not to mention anger, around a blog entry made by Jenna Myers Karvunidis on her blog space at ChicagoNow.com. In her article "Keep Dads out of Pre-school Potty Duty," she had posted standard misandric fare implying that men, as a class of human beings, should be excluded from being in a bathroom with children at a preschool, as compared to women.

She was seemingly quite pleased with herself, celebrating an apparent victory in her own comments as she announced that the school had relented to pressures from her, and agreed to formulate policies based on her concerns.

Then, men's advocates got involved.

Since that time, Karavunidis has placed herself on a very public emotional roller coaster, alternating between hostility, to contrition, to fear and back several times. Two days ago I received the following from her in my email, which I now present unedited and in its entirety for your review:

[box type="alert" icon="none"]

Message: Hello, is this Paul?

I would sincerely like to make amends with MRA. Please hear me out. I am very regretful of my unwitting attack against men in my blog post that earned me a profile on this site. My initial responses to criticism were harsh, that I "didn't care" if I was a bigot etc. The truth is, I didn't know who was behind the screen. I was confronted with fire and my natural instinct was to fight back with fire. I was not thinking clearly.

I now realize many of the men so outraged at me were victims themselves. It sincerely hurts my heart to have caused any damage to a group of people. I had never heard of MRA before this incident and am saddened to learn about the plight of men in this modern world. It indeed must be terrifying to live under the constant possibility that a woman's word will be taken at face value and ruin your life.

Please know I did not consider any of this when writing my original, I realize now hurtful, post.

I did remove the post in question within 24 hours. The first time it was removed was by administrators to turn off comments (I don't have that editing power) but the decision to pull the final plug on the post was all mine.

Please allow me to make this right. True, I am concerned about my online presence to a degree and the thorn my profile here has caused. More so troubling me is the fact that I spoke out having NO idea of the harm my speech could do.

I would be more than happy to post a sincere apology on my blog along with better statistics, perhaps shedding light on a topic so many people are in the dark about. MRA issues are a completely new concept to me, but indeed a worthy one.

I am also willing to make a significant donation to your site.

Please consider my offer.

Jenna Myers Karvunidis

[/box]

This signals a huge shift in perspective and even what might be called and awakening on the part of Karvunidis. And to my knowledge this is the first time I have ever seen the offer of an apology from a self-identified feminist blogger for the furthering of hostility toward men, and an offer to correct bad information.

And while it is not a textbook example of contrition, this is an apparent attempt to follow through on her word. However, her latest post regarding this matter, "An Apology to Men's Rights Activists," is a mixed bag.

In it, Karvunidis does, in fact, apologize. And she does, in fact, (marginally) address the issue of the disinformation by saying the following:

"I now have greater awareness that women abuse children as well."

Greater awareness? Perhaps, but this statement is a far cry from what was promised in her email to me:

[box type="note" icon="none"]"I would be more than happy to post a sincere apology on my blog along with better statistics, perhaps shedding light on a topic so many people are in the dark about."[/box]

I want to say with no sarcasm and with all sincerity that I do not wish to pour salt in this person's wounds. Indeed, a sincere apology to men, to men's advocates and especially to the numbers of abused men, along with corrected mistakes, coming from a self-identified feminist is in some ways the brass ring on the carousel. It is what most MRA's see as a turning of the tide in our battle, and something, were it to issue sincerely from a growing number of feminists, that might help move us back in the direction of sanity and unity.

But the fact remains that Karvunidis proclaimed that 99% of all sexual predators are men, and she has still not effectively owned that mistake and presented thoughtfully researched information to clear it up.

Another thing that muddles her "apology" is that she continues to play victim to the outrage that she herself inspired, however unwittingly, even threatening to remove her apology if anyone says anything negative about her.

Conditional apologies are not apologies, they are lip service.

All that being said, I think there is room for this to develop in the right direction. Personally, I am not shocked that anyone might feel shell shocked and a bit jumpy in her shoes; even highly defensive. Even the strongest of blue pill people being force-fed a sudden, massive dose of prescription strength red pill reality can't be expected to have a smooth and seamless reaction. So on some of the continued defensive posturing, I give her a pass. Even for some of the defensive side-stepping that flows through her apology post.

What I can't support, however, is the lackluster attention to the core of her original problem. She targeted Fathers and used misleading and unreferenced stats to paint them all as potential abusers. Now she has now offered a band-aide to put on a very deep cut.

One of the defining aspects of integrity, to me, is that when a mistake is made it is corrected, with aplomb and with an utter disregard of ego. Integrity demands that the lesson not just be learned, but demonstrated.

That is important because it is important that Karvunidis and others learn that this is not just about offending advocates. It is about human decency and about teaching fear and hatred to our children. It is about teaching our daughters that men are to be viewed generally with suspicion and distrust. And it's about teaching our sons to react to females with an equal but different kind of fear and apprehension. It teaches them to see women as dangerous.

Yes, we need to teach caution to all of our children. But there is a wide gulf between healthy lessons for personal safety, and inculcating paranoia based on stereotypes, prejudice and lies.

To drive this point home we need only ask ourselves one simple question. Can we take the word "Dads" out of title of Karvunidis's article, and replace it with any other group of human beings?

How about "Keep Blacks out of Pre-school Potty Duty" No? How about this? "Keep Gays out of Pre-school Potty Duty"? Might sound good to Pat Buchanan, but no, most of us have moved past Socon idiocies. O.K., how about "Keep Hispanics out of Pre-school Potty Duty"? Still no good, eh? Let's see, I suppose "Keep Moms out of Preschool Potty Duty," is dead on arrival.

That is the problem. And that is the problem with the socially cultivated vilification of men. In so many circumstances, we commit ideas that if applied to any other segment of the population, would be rightfully construed as bigotry. Yet when we figuratively don white sheets and burn crosses on the yards of men, we delude ourselves into calling it public awareness, social service or just the personal opinion of one happy suburbanite "Mom."

That is something that people must be educated out of, even painfully if necessary. I truly hope that for Ms. Karvunidis, this lesson has not been a waste.

Why bother with bigots

John Hembling (JtO) · 23 October 2011 · Archived copy · Original

[dropcap]I[/dropcap]t is not a secret that mens rights advocates and feminists of various flavor frequently find themselves in opposition to one another. In fact, a significant fraction of the activism of an MRA is the refutation of feminist public narrative. However, I've made a practice of describing the organized opponents of male human rights with carefully chosen nomenclature. An increasing tendency to avoid the frequently misleading brand name of feminism has informed my recent content. There is a reason to prefer the term ideologue.

There are fundamental differences between philosophy and ideology. Ideology refers to a set of beliefs or doctrines that support a social institution or organization. By contrast, philosophy refers to looking at life in a pragmatic manner and attempting to understand the principles governing it.

Stated simply, ideology attempts to conform reality to a believed state of affairs, whereas philosophy tries to understand the world in its current state. Ideology is rigid, and once fixed on certain beliefs, does not change its stance respective to change in the surrounding environment.

An ideologue is nothing more than a practitioner of this type of thinking. An individual who begins all inquiries already knowing "the truth," and shaping observations and facts to support their doctrine. This is why attempts at reasoned discussion with a majority of feminists is an exercise in futility.

Truth doesn't matter. This is evident in the persistent repetition of feminism's false facts. 1 in 4, the wage gap, the glass ceiling, tra-la-la-la.

In spite of the intransigence of true believers, rebutting the mainstream narrative of female victimhood and masculine malevolence remains an imperative. The wilful promotion and repetition of false facts has more behind it than just ignorance, or even the maintained power of the role of victimhood. The real problem is that all the benefit to operatives of the big box doctrine comes at a cost. That cost is increasingly a tiered society which destroys human lives, treats fundamental human rights as optional based on demographic. All this to justify the budgets of advocacy researchers and state functionaries who don't even bother to disguise their fraud.

Need an example? Eric Holder, you know, Attorney motherfucking General who continues to stand on his claim that "Intimate partner homicide is the leading cause of death for African-American women ages 25 to 44."

The claim is fraud, and numerous individuals and organizations have publicly called for its correction. This has gone unanswered by the AG's office to date. Need another example?

Susan Brownmiller – who regularly contributes to the huffinton-post, and other high traffic sites never tires of citing her 1975 propaganda piece normalizing the asinine dogma that all men are rapists and all women are victims.

[image]From page 14 of Against Our Will, "Man's discovery that his genitalia could serve as a weapon to generate fear must rank as one of the most important discoveries of prehistoric times, along with the use of fire and the first crude stone axe. From prehistoric times to the present, I believe, rape has played a critical function. It is nothing more or less than a conscious process of intimidation by which all men keep all women in a state of fear"

This is an argument of conscious intimidation by all men of all women – and gentlemen – your body is not a natural part of your self, no. It's a weapon. Let any proponent of this much-cited yellow ink try to claim it is not designed to generate hatred and fear.

These examples are not unusual by any measure, rather – our culture has normalized institutional hatred against half the human race. This is not a byproduct of natural atavism, the fear of the "other" underlying the bigotry of racism. This is a hatred knowingly cultivated by academicians, activists and elected officials who accommodate and abet the established and interlocking business models of victim-feminist ideology which trades, and escalates real carnage done to men and women for the salaries of this industry's operatives.

Unopposed, where does systemic institutional promotion of hatred of an entire demographic lead over a period of decades? History answers this question, but that logical end point seems implausible considering that men and women, not only need each other – continue to seek each other out of mutual attraction.

At present, the collected initiatives of the Department of Education's Office of Civil Rights (spot the irony) and the FBI's redefinition of rape indicate a rapid shift in law to a system in which due process and presumed innocence apply selectively, based on sex. This is not wild speculation, its happening already in colleges and universities. The "Dear Colleague" letter from the department of Ed ties funding to schools convening their own student run courts, without due process or the apparatus of an actual legal system. Students accused of sexual misconduct are being academically snuffed and robbed of their tuition in extra-judicial courts of ideology.

The academic sandbox serves as the beta test for pseudo legal, for-profit ritual human sacrifice. If a human is male, they're ruled by the law, but not protected by it. This doesn't lead directly to transport by boxcars to camps – but who imagines a tiered society along sexual ideological lines has any outcome except violent societal convulsion.

This is why bigots and ideologues are a concern. That's an understatement. They're a cultural toxin. None of this is happening by itself. The eradication of civil liberties for men is the outcome of half a century's labour by feminist and other ideologues. The large scale, funded and organized promotion and normalization of the hate and fear of men is cultivated by individuals. Most such individuals are provided a free pass, and their overt promotion of hatred and fear characterized as charity and humanist concern. Repetition of hateful and obvious lies is cheered by a kool-aid drinking public who buy into the story. The standard fabricated narrative that marginalizing and stripping human rights from one demographic will benefit the exalted owners of ovaries.

Proponents of hate continue to shape a public zeitgeist in which the murder of men is excused. The ideologues writing articles and books telling a female electorate that their emotions matter more than facts, and that good men are the ones willing to self sacrifice for female privilege, passed off as empowerment.

This is why identifying, documenting and publicly exposing ideologues matters. It is opposition to hate and violence. This is the reason that among rapists, killers, false rape accusers – the category of Bigot exists on the site register-her.com. It is why we identify ideological bigots, shine a bright light on them for the world to see, and afford promoters of hate no mercy – and no rest.

Shrink4Men Radio tonight: knights who need rescuing

Dr. Tara J. Palmatier · 24 October 2011 · Archived copy · Original

[box type="alert" icon="none"]

Do you fancy yourself a knight in shining armor? Are you a sucker for damsels in distress? Do you like coming to your partner's "rescue?" Do women with a sob story make you feel protective? Do you have a pattern of getting involved with waifs and distressed damsels du jour and set out to prove that "you're not like all the other guys?"

Do you believe that your crisis-ridden partner "can't live without you?" Do you need to feel like a "hero?" Are you a woman who has a pattern of getting involved with men who have crazy, unstable and abusive exes? Do you try to show these men "you're not like all the other women who hurt him?" Are you a rescuer of rescuers?

If so, tune into Shrink4Men Radio on Monday, October 24, 2011 at 9pm EST when Dr Tara Palmatier of Shrink4Menwill be discussing the unhealthy relationship patterns in which many white knights, heroes, knights in shining armor, rescuers, fixers, professional caretakers and rescuers of rescuers find themselves stuck. We'll also touch upon the concepts of hostile dependency, codependency, and parentified children.

If you have questions or a story to share, please tune in and call or Skype in.

310-288-9709

Show page

[/box]

When battered women kill

NCFM · 24 October 2011 · Archived copy · Original

What influences decisions to prosecute and verdicts? Does it get any worse than this?

A number of emails recently arrived, sometimes one right after another, about an upcoming webinar by Jewish Women International, titled When Battered Women Kill: What influences decisions to prosecute and verdicts? One cautionary email said, "Does it get any worse than this…"

[box icon="none"]Let's help battered women go free when they murder their abusers… but not men if roles are reversed.[/box]

The webinar announcement says "[t]his comprehensive and innovative learning experience" is for those "[w]ho want to help battered women accused of killing their abusers stay out of prison!" The bold text and exclamation mark suggest only true believers might want to attend.

The select groups are from primarily politically correct Women Industry occupations like (industry related) attorneys, social workers, therapists, DV service providers and advocates, children's advocates, child protection workers, child abuse service providers, scholars who work on intimate partner violence, child abuse, child custody, or family law policy; physicians, nurses, physician assistants, nursing and medical students, and practicing healthcare providers.

Nothing in the invitation suggests women accused of murdering their partners might be lying about being battered or before the killing knew they could trump a murder charge with the abuse excuse card. Battered Women Syndrome advocates leave little or no room for anything so imaginative. Hypocritically they deny a Battered Men Syndrome. No concern is shown for the murder victim, not even if he ("he", implied by the nature of the organizations sponsoring the webinar) had a history of being abused. The murder victim was an "abuser" because his female murderer said he was.

Lorenza Penguelly was arrested yesterday in Chula Vista, California for stabbing her mother several times in the face, which by any reasonable measure would be considered by any reasonable person unreasonably abusive, if not criminal. In 1986 Penguelly pitched her five-month-old baby Sharai into San Diego Bay where she inhaled enough water to die a horrendously painful death. Penguelly recounted that Sharai had a smile on her face while she was floating.

She was sentenced to six years in prison. She is apparently schizophrenic, might be suffering from postpartum psychosis; was not taking her meds when she attacked her mother, had terrorized her family for years, and was recently released from a mental hospital. Being abused sometime in her life is no reason to let her roam free, nor is it in the best interests of anyone, including Penguelly. She is clearly dangerous to herself and others.

Absent in the webinar invitation is any mention or inference of men driven to murder, suicide, or murder/suicide by a nightmare of a female or male partner. Perhaps dead female partners are considered victims under any circumstance while dead male partners are simply not worthy of discussion.

What if it's a lesbian couple, without a real penis between them, then what? No problem, do the history two-step to avoid personal responsibility and you're good to go. Lesbian researcher Janice Ristock in her landmark work "No More Secrets Violence in Lesbian Relationships" (page 56) writes that "patriarchy, misogyny, heterosexism, racism, and colonization are overwhelmingly present in the lives of lesbians… They are like the air we breathe." Ok, fine, take a breath mint, consider apologizing to the family of the person you murdered, and in prison wear a t-shirt that says "Patriarchy, Misogyny, Heterosexism, Racism, and Colonization Made Me a Murderer". Crazy is as crazy does; and, we're the ones who are nuts if we continue to let murderers run amok for no reason other than they have been abused.

This webinar is co-sponsored by The National Association of Social Workers (NASW), which bills itself as the largest membership organization of professional social workers in the world with 152,000 members. NASW leadership is involved with women and gender studies. President Dr. Jeanne W. Canasta's biography says she has published extensively in the areas of women's issues, GLBT rights, mental health, and social work education. Vice-President Darrell P. Wheeler, PhD, MPH, ACSW has published articles in AIDS Education and Prevention, Journal of Black Psychology, Journal of Public Health Management, Journal of Applied Social Sciences, and Journal of Gay and Lesbian Social Services. How about their army of followers?

NASW Code of Ethics says "help meet the needs of all people".

If NASW helps battered women who kill shouldn't they help battered men who kill?

The preamble of the NASW Code of Ethics begins with, "[t]he primary mission of the social work profession is to enhance human wellbeing and help meet the basic human needs of all people…"A perusal of NASW's Board of Directors' biographies reveals not one social worker with any stated interest or experience working to overcome problems experienced by men in general or heterosexual men in particular. The same is true for Jewish Women International. Neither seems concerned with the fundamental mission of social work encompassing "all people."

The webinar will teach how to overcome issues that might result in guilty verdict or help during an appeal, like (1) was it self-defense or insanity (2) could she have retreated (3) what was her reputation as a wife and mother (4) was she verbally aggressive (5) was testimony regarding Battered Women's Syndrome presented (6) were the judge's instructions on self-defense appropriate to the case? Whatever the case, "man" will be blamed, case specific, generally, and historically. All "she" did was pull the trigger.

Earlier this month Omaima Nelson bid for parole was denied. In California, Orange County Senior Deputy District Attorney Randolph J. Pawloski said when he visited the Nelson's apartment, "[t]here were suitcases and plastic bags soaked with dark liquid from his body parts. In the fry cooker sat Mr. Nelson's hands, and when we opened the refrigerator there was Mr. Nelson's head with stab wounds," Palowski said. "She had his entrails in his Corvette, and she was trying to get an ex-boyfriend to yank out the dentures from the head so she could dump it in the [Newport Beach] Back Bay." A doctor who interviewed Nelson revealed that she sat at the kitchen table with her husband's cooked remains and said out loud: "It's so sweet, it's so delicious…. I like mine tender."

Nelson was earlier convicted of assaulting an ex-boyfriend by tying him up and demanding money at gunpoint. While in prison she bit a security guard's breast and had several violent encounters. "She has served 20 years and she deserves parole," said Thomas Mooney, who represented her at trial and presented evidence that she was a battered woman abused by several men, including her husband. He claimed that she killed because she was abused.

It should be no surprise that Diane Follingstad, PhD, Department of Psychiatry, University of Kentucky Medical School will, during the webinar, share the results of "research studies" exploring vignettes and real-life scenarios, which may mean Follingstad will tell stories about women killing men absent any rigorous scientific analysis. The invitation does not reveal Professor Follinstad as a Woman Industry operative sitting in the Women's Circle Endowed Chair at the Center for Research on Violence Against Women. I guess it's a given.

Male or female, regardless of gender identification, a life of abuse may indeed result in murder. Short of insanity such abuse should not be used as a get out of jail free card. Even the insane should be restrained. Had Lorenza Penguelly not been released her elderly mother would not be waking from nightmares with stitches on her face from stab wounds. Though Omaima Nelson's case is extreme, the introduction of the abuse excuse in her case may have kept her off death row. It may be useful in understanding her background but certainly not in justifying her actions or release from prison.

Abuse is not gender specific. It never has been. Abusive behavior has existed since Man and Woman discovered each other, apple or no apple. Social justice, public good, and humanity are not well served when viewed through gender exclusive rose colored glasses. Indeed, we all can bleed, have bled, and will shed more blood; an irreconcilable human condition no amount of social control, misandric psychobabble, and tunnel vision can overcome, especially when based on a hate movement that blames roughly half the population for everything wrong with everything. If, as the domestic violence industry operatives say, “[t]here is no excuse for abuse”, then how can industry operatives rationally excuse murder?

On October 17 the Associated Press reported that an Everett Washington woman was arrested for trying to cut off her sleeping husbands head with a chain saw…we’ve given women a license to abuse at will, even to kill, which may make us more evil than the evilest women in history. Does it get any worse? Yes, especially if well meaning and caring people don’t do anything to stop it. Time will tell.

‘Dear Colleague’ to be included in VAWA renewal

Robert O'Hara · 25 October 2011 · Archived copy · Original

[box]

Washington October 25, 2011 (AVfM News) Last week on Thursday October 20, a red-line draft proposal for V.A.W.A. re-authorization was made public. That proposal includes a provision to apply guidelines set for college campuses as outlined in “Dear Colleague” letter issued by the Department of Education Office of Civil Rights (O.C.R), which instructs schools to abandon the use of a “reasonable doubt” standard in sexual assault cases and instead use the less stringent “preponderance of evidence,” standard. It will be introduced to the Senate Judiciary Committee soon for deliberation.

This means that the diluted Preponderance of Evidence standard used in civil cases, and the removal of proper criminal justice entities in the investigation and prosecution of sexual assault on college campuses, will be coded into federal law and not simply an extension of O.C.R. policy.

Stop Abusive and Violent Environments, an organization dedicated to V.A.W.A. reform, had been lobbying feverishly with the Judiciary Committee staff to support a repeal of mandatory arrest policy funding and also to make V.A.W.A. gender neutral, thus recognizing male victims and female perpetrators of intimate partner violence.

S.A.V.E. has also been very active in lobbying for the recognition of false allegations of domestic violence as well as well as speaking out about misconceptions regarding Domestic Violence and misinformation alleged to be rampant in the Domestic Violence Industry.

Despite the lobbying, none of S.A.V.E’s recommendations were included in the updated draft.

As reported by AFVM news, the new Title IX requirements for federal funding (almost every public post secondary education institution is heavily dependent on Title IX funding) include the en-statement of new procedures for dealing with accusations of sexual assault on campus. These procedures first and foremost require the establishment of student and faculty tribunals who are not accountable to the law in any way and need only the preponderance of evidence standard to essentially convict a male student of sexual assault. While the accused student may not be sent to jail they are expelled from school and their academic records will show that they perpetrated a sexual crime.

Since the introduction of the new O.C.R. policy, academics and legal scholars have bitterly complained about its constitutionality. S.A.V.E. has also been very vocal about the danger posed to young men in college stating that the guidelines will result in a flood of false allegations and innocent male students having their academic careers and lives destroyed by what amounts to Kafkaesque tribunals in which the accused are presumed guilty and have no right to face their accusers and on which the entire burden of proof is placed on them.

Indeed, as has been seen at the University of South Dakota in the case of Caleb Warnner who last year was expelled from school and had his academic record tarnished by a sexual assault charge that was proven false by police, these procedures are already the DE-facto policy on many campuses. He has since won back his right to attend school again but only after much expense and considerable damage to his reputation.

There have already been scathing commentaries coming from several sources. Open Market’s Hans Bader penned an article titled “Senate bill would further undermine due process on campus” in which he states:

“It really is strange for a bill to delegate to a federal agency the power to lower due process protections and standards of proof to be used against private individuals. I have never seen any bill like this before, and it may be unprecedented. Giving OCR this power raises the danger that it could some day demand an even lower standard of proof like “reasonable grounds” or “probable cause” that would require discipline even where the accused is probably innocent as long as there is some possibility of guilt, effectively creating a presumption of guilt.

It also sets a precedent for future legislation forcing institutions to lower the standard of proof in other kinds of cases that could lead to the firing of employees or expulsion of students. It is also strange to delegate to an agency like OCR that administers one statute (Title IX, which prohibits sex discrimination and harassment) the ability to dictate the standard of proof for an entirely different statute that it doesn't even administer (VAWA, dealing with domestic violence and violence against women)."

Phyllis Schlafly, President of the Eagle Forum released an open letter to all U.S. Republican Senators yesterday urging them not to support the circulating draft. "Conservatives need to stand against the falsehoods and unconstitutional policies that surround the domestic violence issue" she said. "The bill should be re-written so that it adheres to the truth, experience and constitutional policies and helps women instead of harming families."

S.A.V.E. is urging supporters to contact the Senate Switchboard (202-244-3121) and contact their Senators so they can express their disapproval of the new V.A.W.A. Draft.

Sources:

http://www.saveservices.org/wp-content/uploads/VAWA-2011-Draft.pdf see p. 64

http://www.openmarket.org/2011/10/24/senate-bill-would-further-undermine-due-process-on-campus/

http://www.saveservices.org/

www.eagleforum.org

http://thefire.org/article/13758.html

[/box]

Paul, take Jenna off Register-her.com

John Hembling (JtO) · 25 October 2011 · Archived copy · Original

A user on the men's rights section of Reddit.com recently posted a request there for the removal of an offender in the category of Bigot, on register-her.com. I've re-posted the comment here, along with my reply. I have omitted the user-name – because my purpose is to communicate clearly, and not to excoriate one Reddit user.

[box icon="none"]

The Posting:

Paul, You're doing great work and I very much appreciate your contribution to the MRM. Lord knows you're doing much more than me, which is pretty close to nothing. So, with all due respect, and I very much respect you, I ask that you take Jenna off RH. I do not know her, but I know MANY people like her. THAT WAS ME AT ONE TIME. She's not evil Paul; she's not a bigot; she's just ignorant. BUT she's learning. She's trying. Man-hating propoganda WORKS! It sucks people in. The MRM is helping her see the truth. We need to let people off the hook once we point them in the right direction. She does not deserve to be on RH with convicted criminals. It just isn't right.
Keep up the excellent work, Paul. I do very much appreciate the work you're doing. Thank you!

edit: Allow me to stress one thing, not everyone is either a bigot or supporter of men's and father's rights. The VAST majority of people out there, like Jenna, are simply ignorant. The MRM isn't a "you're either with us or against us" proposition, or at least I didn't think it was. We're educating people here, and really doing a pretty good job of it. Making examples out of potential allies is a bad move. Educating people is what matters.

[/box]

My Reply:

Have you actually read the "apology" posted by Karvunidis? It's not an apology, it's an exercise in damage control. In fact – the entire piece is summarized in the ending disclaimer. "I will remove this post if any further negativity is directed at me or my family and I reserve the right to moderate comments."

This privileged princess has used the word "apology" in her title because for the first time in her pampered life, she met opposition to her blatant bigotry she couldn't ignore. A tiny handful of MRAs with a moderately high traffic site – shining a light on hatred that until now has been given a free pass.

You say "She's trying" ? The only thing she's trying is to make us go away, so she – and thousands like her can go back to shitting on men in public with everybody's tacit approval. She posts one fake apology and half the self declared MRA's in the world are ready to roll over on their backs for a fucking belly rub.

No sir, she will stay on the registry, because she is a willful promoter of hatred, misinformation and bigotry. Men are being imprisoned on women's whims, men are sleeping in the street, and men are dying because the ideological hatred exhibited so clearly by this woman is normal. She is a bigot. The fact that hundreds of thousands of others are also bigots gives her no excuse.

She stays on the registry. If the reason why remains unclear to you, I wrote this yesterday – for anyone still confused enough to provide the pussy pass those heaping hatred, censure and accusation of pedophilia on half the human race by sex.

http://www.avoiceformen.com/feminism/government-tyranny/why-bother-with-bigots/

For individuals who don't want to read that article – here is its last paragraph.

This is why identifying, documenting and publicly exposing ideologues matters. It is opposition to hate and violence. This is the reason that among rapists, killers, false rape accusers – the category of Bigot exists on the site register-her.com. It is why we identify ideological bigots, shine a bright light on them for the world to see, and afford promoters of hate no mercy – and no rest.

No Mercy. No Rest.

[And with thanks to JtO for offering our final words on this subject, we now move on. There is a whole world full of these people to deal with. PE]

AVfM Radio: White Knights and other criminals

Paul Elam · 25 October 2011 · Archived copy · Original

[box type="note" icon="none"]

Join hosts Paul Elam and JtO for this show examining the modern political White Knight. Historically this has come in the form of men like Vice President Joseph Biden, who authored VAWA, the Violence Against Women Act, a massive piece of legislation that has resulted in egregious amounts of government waste, deception of the public and a significant negative impact on civil rights and due process.

But there are surprises coming down the tubes from other governement officials right now. The proposed plans you will learn about on tonights show will shock you more than you can possibly imagine. And you know we don't say these things lightly.

You will definitely want to tune in to this one. But be sure to take your blood pressure medicine and be prepared to breath deep and count to 10 a few times over.

If you think that misandry in American politics is already bad, you have not heard anything yet.

On a slightly more cheerful note, Paul talks about his trip to the barber shop and take some shots at DV shelters, aka government sponsored bordellos. JtO delivers his usual slash and burn rant.

The call in number is 310-388-9709 and registered users can skype into the show.

Show page

[/box]

How to be anti-war AND anti-man

B.R. Merrick · 25 October 2011 · Archived copy · Original

[quote]Consistent rates of rape across eras of service indicate that violence towards military women remains an unresolved problem. ~ Anne G. Sadler, R.N., PhD; Brenda M. Booth, PhD; Brian L. Cook, DO, MSc; and Bradley N. Doebbeling, MD, MSc[/quote]

?

[quote]Violence towards military men, however, is completely resolved, based on my thorough research into the matter. ~ B.R. Merrick, PhDoD, PDQ (Doctorate of Doofosity, brought to you by the letters P and D, and the number Q)[/quote]

I've mentioned Antiwar.com before in a separate matter of the denigration of men and vaunting of women. I figured that would be it. In spite of the gaffe, I gave them the benefit of the doubt and moved on. I then stumbled on another one of their more recent headlines that looked like it needed a bit more attention, since it involves the world's most unspeakable crime, the crime against womanhood itself:

"Studies: One in Three Female US Soldiers Raped During Service"

Oh, my God! RAPE! RA-A-A-APE!! And, of course, RAPE! rhymes with APE!, which is, at their core, what men really are. This belief may go consciously or unconsciously acknowledged, but RAPE! there it is. It exists in subtle RAPE! ways that Mr. Ditz and all the other APE! men at Antiwar.com probably don't even realize. There's the smirking, pat-on-the-head condescension of Mike Davis, who writes: "Someday – perhaps sooner than we think – a new Edward Gibbon in China or India will surely sit down to write The History of the Decline and Fall of the American Empire… I think she'll probably classify self-righteous American 'innocence' as one of the most toxic tributaries of national decline…" Ah, yes. We know you can do it, ladies. One of youz is smart enuff to sit your pretty little hips down and plunk out a multi-volume literary work that galvanizes historical research, and the only reason you haven't is because men haven't patted your head lovingly enough.

It's a simultaneously patronizing and demeaning comment that hearkens back to the old fashioned pastime of the "battle between the sexes." It belongs there, in the past. It does not work in a modern society plagued with misandry so entrenched that a writer working for Antiwar.com can publish a headline that screams "RAPE!" and "1 IN 3!" and be taken seriously.

Antiwar.com's 1 IN 3! claim links to Al Jazeera, which then links to a study called "Factors Associated [w]ith Women's Risk of Rape in the Military Environment," which proceeds to detail what some of these offenses are, all under the heading of Military Sexual Trauma (MST). Lumped in with actual rape and assault are such horrific, grisly things as:

[unordered_list style="star"]

- Sexually demeaning comments, behaviors, or pornography at duty station…
- While servicewoman on-duty, soldiers stared at their [sic] body…
- Felt physically intimidated or unsafe because of the number of male soldiers or personnel around you…
- Ranking officer/immediate supervisor asked the servicewomen to perform sex-role stereotypic jobs in addition to regular work assignments.

[/unordered_list]

The above criteria are not placed under the heading of rape, but are entered into the study under the MST acronym as an attempt to determine whether other environmental factors are at play when rape occurs. However, if I was a woman reading this, I'd feel pretty "intimidated or unsafe" around my mostly male colleagues if the contention that I had a 1 IN 3! chance of being RAPED! was true. Since it isn't, but is apparently being repeated ad infinitum et nauseam around the Internet, what are the odds that a great many military women who are not at risk will all of a sudden think that they are, simply by being in the presence of a group of penises men? Now environmental factors that have nothing to do with RAPE! can be included, at least in the minds of impressionable young females, and most importantly, the proponents of RAPE! hysteria have bigger numbers to play with.

"Simultaneous with primary prevention interventions, the development of new channels for reporting sexual assault appear necessary so that victims can report without fear of retribution." What sort of retribution does a man falsely accused need to fear? Sadly, this is not addressed. Instead, it is finally revealed that:

"The rate of rape found in our research (28%) is similar to that of other studies of women veterans reported by Hankin et al. [1999] (23%), and [sic] Murdock and Nichol [1995] (25% of women age 50 or younger), and Coyle et al. [1996] (29%)." 1 IN 3! still looks horrible, until you get into the details and discover, much to Mr. Ditz's dismay, that the number is merely one in three women "selected from the Department of Veterans Affairs (DVA) comprehensive women's health care centers' registries," not 1 IN 3! women who have served. The number of women reporting MST (not just rape) may be closer to one third of the women serving, but take another look above at some of the "trauma" that is included, and envision a man making those same complaints.

[image]I couldn't find much on Murdock and Nichol, but the Hankin study is a "[n]ational sample of women veterans using VA outpatient services between 7/94 and 7/95." The Coyle study covers "[t]he prevalence of physical and sexual abuse in women veterans seeking care at a veterans affairs medical center." In other words, these studies rely on studies that center on women who have used the VA. How many veterans overall use the VA? "18 million of the 24.5 million veterans in the United States have never used the VA's health system." According to the Association of Schools of Public Health: "Among veteran respondents, 6.2% reported receiving all of their health care at the VA, 6.9% reported receiving some of their health care at the VA, and 86.9% did not use VA health care." Let's see, 1 in 3 minus 86.9% of 1 in 3 is…

Sorry. We didn't cover statistics in doofosity training. We did cover throwing paper airplanes, which'll land you a job at Antiwar.com spouting drivel.

From Sage Publications: "Existing research indicates that prevalence rates of MST [which apparently includes being stared at] vary depending on method of assessment, definition of MST used [which may include being stared at], and type of sample." Furthermore: "The VA 2002 national MST surveillance data from approximately 1.7 million VA patients indicated that 22% of women and 1% of men have experienced MST… Although women are 20 times more likely to be victimized during their military duty than men, there are 20 times more men in the military than women in the VA system." This sounds pretty awful for women, doesn't it? The percentages look terrifying, but remember that percentages represent actual numbers of actual people. When you look at the actual number of complainants by sex, you find that "because 22% of female and 1% of male VA users screen positive for MST, the actual numbers of men and women are about equal…" Whoops! How did that happen? Never mind. Moving on with something a little less actual and far less equal.

In yet another "convenience sample of 270 veteran women receiving medical and/or mental health treatment at the VA North Texas Healthcare System," we finally get a big, fat, actual admission of bias: "Although men and women appear to be equally represented in the numbers of MST victims, research examining the mental and physical consequences associated with MST has been unequivocally focused on females."

So what about male victims? "Last year nearly 50,000 male veterans screened positive for 'military sexual trauma' [were they stared at, though?] at the Department of Veterans Affairs, up from just over 30,000 in 2003… By the Pentagon's own estimate, figures for assaults on women likely represent less than 20 percent of actual incidents." Okay, percent refers to a hundred, right? 100 minus 20… (I could probably fold this one into a hang glider…)

"'We don't like to think that our men can be victims,' says Kathleen Chard, chief of the post-traumatic-stress unit at the Cincinnati VA. 'We don't want to think that it could happen to us. If a man standing in front of me who is my size, my skill level, who has been raped—what does that mean about me? I can be raped, too."' Or exposed to a porno mag in the workplace! Or the accidental sighting of a penis! Or…

"'Many men and women will experience symptoms like PTSD or depression after experiencing sexual assault. But the experience seems even more detrimental for men's mental health,' says Amy Street, a psychologist with the Boston VA hospital who has worked with both male and female survivors [and somehow managed not to say what RAPE! means to her]. 'The way I make sense of that is that women, for better or worse, live their lives with this idea that they might experience sexual assault at some point [Oops.]. There are public models of how to recover from rape. Men don't have any expectation that this might happen to them. It's very difficult to figure out how those experiences fit into your sense of self as a man.'…

"What's clear is that the Pentagon has only just begun to figure out how to treat men who have been sexually traumatized. Until 2006, sexual assault was classified as a women's health issue, and even today, Pentagon awareness campaigns target women almost exclusively… Chard… says that more than 11 percent of the men she works with eventually admit that they were sexually victimized. Nationwide, there are just six programs like hers, and there is a single VA facility, in Bay Pines, Fla., that specifically treats male survivors of sexual trauma."

What exactly would these men need to be treated for? Being insulted with a stereotype? Being stared at? Being exposed to (shudder) pornography? Well, an ex-military dude named Blake Stephens said his "assailants told him that once deployed to Iraq, they would shoot him in the head. 'They told me they were going to have sex with me all the time when we were there,' he says.

"Stephens twice attempted suicide. His marriage fell apart. He became paranoid and explosive. In June 2003 his mother wrote a letter to Sen. Barbara Boxer, detailing her son's 'continued humiliation.' 'Congressional inquiries have been know[n] to jeopardize a soldier's rank and standing,' Boxer's office responded. 'There is no way for our office to administratively protect your son's military standing once a congressional examination is in progress.' The following August, Stephens was discharged for his 'physical condition.'" Poor Ms. Boxer's hands were tied, it seems. So much for Gr-r-rl Power!

[image]

The senator's insouciance is par for the course if you happen to find yourself male, raped, and in the military: "A Marine Corps spokesman dismissed the male sexual trauma subject as an 'off-the-wall topic' when asked to arrange an interview with a senior Marine officer. An Army spokeswoman called the reported cases in her service 'statistically insignificant.' Another Army spokeswoman, when asked about sexual assaults on men, began explaining the military's policy on homosexuality." Now there's one we can use to celebrate the repeal of "Don't Ask, Don't Tell." Let's associate all men who have sex with men with RAPISTS!, since men are prone to fuck like rabbits anyway.

The military could make a simple change to take care of the female complaints: separate the women from the men. All-female platoons that are held to the same standard as the all-male platoons as far as combat-readiness – all two of 'em. Separate everything: barracks, showers, toilets, changing areas, mess. We can't do that, though. The minute one barrack, shower, toilet, changing area, or mess being used by women is deemed inferior, you can expect another 1 IN 3!-style harangue from somewhere, guaranteed.

That solution would obviously only take care of half the problem. You can't so effectively separate male rape victims from male rapists. Unfortunately, the military will never get to the root of the problem, as it is an organization that relies quite heavily on distribution of authority and creating a type of separate, higher class of people out of its officers. It is a culture steeped in the exercise of power and authority. It depends upon government schooling for the indoctrination of boys and girls who will eventually join. These young people have spent 12 years associating for large parts of the day with their immediate peers, isolated almost entirely from the surrounding community. In this environment, it is all too easy for certain children to commence forming a hierarchy, by bullying if necessary, in order to reobtain a sense of power over the self. It is a natural shift from this environment to another one where, again, the individual must do as told by superiors, may not leave without permission, and where gaining the favor of the bureaucracy by playing along with the hierarchy is encouraged. Schools and the military, on this level, operate like prisons, where male-on-male rape is epidemic.

The desire for power, as J.R.R. Tolkien tried to tell the world, is the desire that kills. It begins by killing the self. Rapists, whether male or female, walk this earth like Tolkien's Gollum, addicted to the drug of power over others. They are, in a way, already dead. Then they proceed to kill something in their male and female victims.

It works the same as the desire to be right in order to win (have power over) an argument. Antiwar.com's motives are noble, for the most part. They want to spread crucial information about the nastiness of this war. But using falsehoods to win debates is not an acceptable strategy in any libertarian playbook I've ever read. 1 IN 3! sounds horrible, and because it's trumpeted about in the media, it also sounds true. It is not. A falsehood cannot possibly justify any end. That which is false, once it is perceived as true in the mind, coerces the mind against actual truth, which is a necessary component for the correct application of a man's volition. Falsehoods that are therefore honestly meant ought to be corrected as soon as possible. This, rather than falsely inflated numbers, is a far better way to help actual rape victims, both men and women, regardless of percentages, sums, or politically motivated quotas.

The word "rape" used to mean "steal." I imagine it shot into ubiquity as the definition for forced entry during sex as a way of avoiding explicit discussion of sexual matters. It still means stealing. The man or woman who is raped has property and wealth of great value stolen: bodily integrity, volition, sexual identity, peace of mind, and sometimes even physical health. It is my sincere hope that the well-meaning libertarians and anti-war activists at Antiwar.com rethink strategies for future reports that paint women as victims and men as RAPE! perpetrators. Such propaganda is the rape of my mind, as it were, on par with likening procreating Jews with procreating rats. It's one more thing that spawns hatred, and things like this, when they build up, oftentimes lead to the very thing Antiwar.com claims to stand against: governments and their militaries raping people's minds, wallets, purses, and bodies through state-sanctioned, violent, hate-filled conflict. It has an explanation, but no excuse.

As I see it, Antiwar.com has now dropped the ball twice. They failed to ask enough questions about September 11, 2001, blowing off those of us who question as "troothers." The appeal to our culture's misandry, however more subtle, is, as far as I'm concerned, the bigger failure, because hardly anyone pays attention to it. Ends do not justify means, and neither ends nor means justifies hatred of men.

Nicole Fabian-Weber placed on offenders registry

Paul Elam · 26 October 2011 · Archived copy · Original

According to her profile at Café Mom's The Stir, Nicole Fabian-Weber, a "Mommy Blogger" with some spotty writing credentials, describes herself in the following way:

[box type="note" icon="none"]

Not that long ago I moved to New York from Los Angeles, where I wrote and worked for shows like What I Like About You and The Big Bang Theory*. I've written essays for* McSweeney's and Hackwriters*, blogged for a bevy of websites, and even had a short-lived affair with copywriting.*

I live in a dimly-lit Brooklyn brownstone with my husband and shih tzu.

Spend lots of time online. Don't eat dairy. Big fan of puppies.

Sipping on: Gin and juice

[/box]

Let's add something else to her bio: Virulent bigot glorifying and promoting violence and sexual mutilation. Oh yeah, let's also add her sorry ass to register-her.com.

In a post recently written on her blog space at The Stir, Fabian-Weber said the following:

A 29-year-old Vietnamese woman, only identified by her surname, Pan, was sick and tired of her husband's philandering ways and his physical abuse. So she did what any scorned, ballsy woman would do: She waited until he was passed out from drugs and sleeping pills and cut off his penis — with a pair of scissors. Then she threw the severed member in a Taiwanese river like it ain't no thang.

Afterward, she turned herself into police and allegedly told them that she felt no regret for what she did to her unemployed, drugged-out dirtbag of a husband. Bad. Ass.

There is so much glaringly wrong with this post. I need to point out first that drug addiction is a problem for which many people need help. I know, I spent a significant part of my adult life counseling people affected by drug addiction and alcoholism. I never considered sexual mutilation as a possible intervention, nor do I think most of my peers would have approved of that. Well, most of them.

But aside from that I would also have questioned the circumstances of any male client so unfortunate as to be connected with a woman capable of doing what Pan did. Anyone capable of that, I assure you, was a terror in other ways long before she made this heinous attack. It is entirely possible that doing drugs and drinking was a coping mechanism the husband fell back on as a reaction to an abusive wife, and that his alleged violence, if it ever happened at all, was in self-defense.

In this I digress a bit, because it is Pan's sick and disgusting American counterpart that is the real subject of this post. And I am not done with her yet.

After calling the victim of a sexual mutilation a "dirtbag of a husband," and inferring that his lack of income was part of the rationale for severing his penis from his body and throwing it in a river, she further exposes her own psychopathology with the following:

Then again, I've never been pushed to such a point in my life. I imagine women who are actually ready to go through with … the deed have reached a place where they literally have nowhere else to go. They've been abused — physically, sexually, and emotionally — for far too long, and cutting off the thing that essentially gives men their power seems like the best option. And it probably is.

Notwithstanding this depraved rationalization, the only proven physical abuse in this case thus far was from this woman, who waited till her husband was unconscious and defenseless, then savagely attacked and disfigured him.

And the post reflects, some female bigots, disabused of the notion that there are any real consequences for violence perpetrated by women (that much is true), are moving past just committing such acts on their own behalf, but into open advocacy in public forums.

At the end of her blog post, she queries her readers with the following:

Do you think cutting off a man's penis is a suitable punishment after enduring years of emotional and physical abuse?

It is clearly a question that this particular bigot wishes to be answered in the affirmative, as she illustrates with saying "I must admit, I've always admired a woman who has the cojones to cut off a man's weenus. [sic]"

Fabian-Weber, in the spirit of Sharon Osborne and other low-rent versions of humanity everywhere, has just joined the ranks of violence advocates elevating their hatred into the public limelight.

Is this disgusting person going on to register-her.com? You bet your ass she is. Are we going to have a protracted debate on whether to take her off that registry, should she decide to remove her post, or apologize? NO.

Nicole Fabian-Weber has volunteered to out herself as a hateful ideologue that supports the most deplorable forms of violence, against men, for whatever grievances women might allege to have. She will remain on the registry as long as that unfortunate man does not have a penis.

Paul Elam does not have the answers you're looking for (debate)

Frost · 26 October 2011 · Archived copy · Original

It's a weird time we're living in. If you're reading this, odds are you've come to the conclusion that our society's mainstream sources of information are broken. So like me, you've set out into the intellectual wild west known as the blogosphere. Out here, there are no laws, no certainties, and you have to make your own choices regarding who to trust, and who to ignore.

A man named Paul Elam recently suggested that you ignore me. Specifically, he suggested that you ignore the entire Game blogosphere:

"But the ones that remain, and make it a lifestyle, are just too enslaved to imagine red pill freedom, and likely not bright enough to learn what it means. They are literally institutionalized by their own desires and cannot imagine setting foot outside the city limits of Snatchville. The unquestionable black hole that exists in all these men is the place that should have held their core values and self respect."

"Anyone who attempts to make an art form of passing a shit test has only succeeded in eating said shit and advertising themselves to the world as a shit eater (Yes, I know, but you get PUSSY!). Too bad such unfortunates seem oblivious to the fact that refusing to even participate in a shit test will have the same effect as passing one, except that it might help to eventually hook you up with a woman slightly less likely to yell rape the first time she gets pissed at you, or cut off your dick when you're asleep."

"And anyone who believes in tossing negs, concocted for the purpose of aiding in the score, only does so because they don't realize that living by values that you don't retreat from, one of them being that your self-respect is worth more than time in a common vagina, is the best neg you could ever hope to toss. But hey, if you like begging, eating shit and life with no values, The Chateau has room for you."

The reference to the Chateau referring, of course, to Roissy.

I am sympathetic to the values and goals of the Men's Rights Movement, to which Paul is a valuable contributor. But the movement is heading for a split. On one side will be the reasonable and principled Men's Rights Activists, who will recognize and respect the desire of men to improve their lives, including their relationships with women. Those who are older and set in their ways may not be interested in writers (such as myself) whose goal is to help men lead better lives, but at the very least they will ignore us, while continuing to focus their attention on other men's issues.

On the other will be the men who are angered by the growing phenomenon of men, recognizing that their understanding of women, sex and dating is imperfect, coming together to share knowledge and compare notes. These men will continue to lash out at practitioners of Game, pick-up artists, and whatever other label you want to affix on men trying to improve their fortunes with women. The latter side will gradually fade from importance in the marketplace of ideas, as their readers begin to understand their true goals – not to help others, or inform them, or share truths with the world. Rather, to soothe some inner torment, to fuel some deep-seated anger against anyone who dares to be happier and more successful than they.

Here is Paul's advice for the contemporary young man trying to navigate the 21st-century sexual marketplace:

"O.K., so you want to get laid? Here's how you do it. Smell clean, get in the proximity of women, and then ignore them. When they come to fuck you, and they will, shut up and let it happen."

"Sorry, but there is little else to it. Women are wired to respond to men who walk with enough self-confidence and involvement in their own lives that they don't need to invest any energy into bagging girls. They attract women naturally."

But, as anyone who has ever stepped outside of their basement knows (including Paul, deep down) this advice is insufficient. A man who follows it will remain a lifelong celibate. Also perhaps, a lifelong A Voice for Men reader, as his celibacy breeds more bitterness, and thus more susceptibility to Paul's particular brand of self-help advice for the modern man.

I have too much respect for Paul's work to immediately relegate him to the second class of MRAs. We've all written things we later come to see as foolish. So rather than pile on, I'm going to offer him an opportunity for a productive exchange:

Paul Elam, I am challenging you to a public debate on the subject of game and men's rights. You may choose the format, although I will suggest three posts each of unlimited length. You may also choose the proposition, or begin by simply laying out your thoughts on why men shouldn't learn game. Or, you can respond to my points in this post. Or, you can respond to any points I've made in any post, ever.

If Paul chooses to take me up on this offer, great. I doubt we'll come to a complete agreement overnight, but I will always respect someone who disagrees with me, as long as they're willing to discuss our difference of opinion honestly. In any case, I'll probably learn something. As iron sharpens iron, so one man sharpens another.

If he declines? Well, I wish he and his readers all the best as they continue their pointless sideline sniping, while the real players conquer the world.

To the editors of CafeMom, The Stir

Paul Elam · 27 October 2011 · Archived copy · Original

TO: The Management of CafeMom, The Stir

401 Park Avenue South, 5th floor
New York, NY 10016

Tracey Odell, Pulbisher
Amy Boshnack, Editorial Director
Cynthia Dermody, Managing Editor

Greetings,

I am writing you on behalf of A Voice for Men, a men's advocacy group dedicated to ending misandry in western culture. The reason for this missive is a recent blog post by one of your writers, Nicole Fabian-Weber.

In her article, titled "Wife Cuts Off Husband's Penis & Chucks It in the River," Ms. Fabian-Weber made several statements advocating violence and sexual mutilation.

Referring to a woman who was arrested for severing her husband's penis with a pair of scissors and throwing it into a river, she called the woman's action, "Bad. Ass."

Furthermore, she went on to say, "Although I consider myself to be somewhat of a pacifist, I must admit, I've always admired a woman who has the cojones to cut off a man's weenus."

After glorifying this egregious act of sadistic violence, she went on to query her readers with, "Do you think cutting off a man's penis is a suitable punishment after enduring years of emotional and physical abuse?"

The character of this public commentary appears calculated to foster more male-targeting violence. The comment thread of that article presently includes comments demanding the post be removed. Several representatives and readers of A Voice for Men have contacted you through your website's feedback form expressing similar sentiments. We have also published two articles strongly critical of Nicole Fabian-Weber's conduct, as well as placing her on an online registry to maintain a public record of her actions.

Thus far, the question that Fabian-Weber posed to her readers, asking them if they felt that sexual mutilation is justified, has been removed, but the remainder of the post remains. This is unacceptable.

As the senior editorial staff of CafeMom The Stir, you are the final arbiters of what remains on your website. That post is not just the ramblings of one disturbed, pro-violence individual, but a reflection of the values of your entire organization. Therefore, the continued presence of this hate speech can only be construed as overt approval from management – that would be the three of you – for the advocacy of the violent disfiguring of incapacitated, defenseless persons as a way to resolve marital difficulties.

In the most direct sense, it makes you every bit as responsible and culpable as Fabian-Weber.

On behalf of the A Voice for Men organization I hereby demand that you take corrective, ameliorative action to remedy this inexcusable support of sadistic violence. We have already taken actions regarding the author of this blog, and will continue those efforts toward all responsible parties involved, unless a responsible outcome is achieved.

This letter is being sent to you via your website contact form, and is also en route via registered mail.

Thank you for your attention to this matter.

Paul Elam

A Voice for Men

Addendum: since the release of this letter and the barrage of protest communications received by CafeMom, The Stir, they have revising the content of the article. It still leaves a contemptuous ready, but further illustrates that the management has no intention of accepting responsibility and taking corrective action on the post. Rather they have opted to try to conceal and historically revise the original content of the post. You can read the original version of the post here:

Proof of Deceit

S.A.V.E. issues warning about Leahy Bill

S.A.V.E. · 27 October 2011 · Archived copy · Original

[box icon="none"]

FOR IMMEDIATE RELEASE

Leahy Bill Would Turn Every College Male into a Rape Suspect, Group Warns

Washington, DC/October 27, 2011 – Senator Patrick Leahy's proposed Violence Against Women Act reauthorization would trample upon the due process rights of college students, according to Stop Abusive and Violent Environments (SAVE). The bill would make into law the Department of Education's recently issued guidelines that reduce the standard of proof in sexual assault cases to the controversial "preponderance of evidence" level.

That unusually low standard requires only that 50.01 percent of the evidence be in favor of an assault having happened. SAVE previously requested the Department of Education to rescind its guidelines, which were issued without prior notice or opportunity for public comment:http://www.saveservices.org/wp-content/uploads/OCRLetter.pdf.

Earlier this month, Caleb Warner was allowed to return to the University of North Dakota after being victimized by the university's unconstitutionally low standard of evidence. The accuser had filed claims of sexual assault with both the University and the municipal police department. Two investigations resulted — the university's according to the preponderance standard, and the police's according to the usual "clear and convincing" standard — and they could not have turned out more differently.

Warner was found guilty by his university and banned from campus after a swift investigation. Meanwhile local police reviewed *the very same evidence,*determined that Warner's accuser was lying, and charged her with filing a false report: http://www.saveservices.org/2011/10/victory-student-punished-for-alleged-sexual-assault-cleared-by-u-of-nd/

Section 304 of the proposed VAWA law would make the preponderance of evidence standard the legally required one, and sets up UND's shoddy treatment of Caleb Warner as the desired institutional response.

"If Senator Leahy's version of VAWA is passed, we can expect travesties of justice at every college in the nation," warns SAVE spokesman Philip W. Cook. "The frequency with which false allegations of sexual assault are made — as many as half of all claims — makes it absolutely essential that students' Constitutional due process rights are protected."

SAVE has documented the harm done by false sexual assault allegations: http://www.saveservices.org/downloads/False-Allegations-Harm-Families-and-Children. SAVE urges Senator Leahy to reject the Education Department's unjust "preponderance of evidence" standard, and adopt the proper "clear and convincing" standard instead.

Stop Abusive and Violent Environments is a victim-advocacy organization working for evidence-based solutions to partner violence:www.saveservices.org.

[/box]

Rape culture: is it a mold or a fungus?

J Galt · 27 October 2011 · Archived copy · Original

[dropcap]L[/dropcap]et's extinguish the rape culture entirely. Who needs it and better yet who wants it? Not me, and I suspect you don't either. Let's start with our language and make this politically correct while we're at it. That often used French word "rape." No more grated French cheese. Screw them and their smelly products. We know what you French buggers are up to and it's time to put an end to it. Just say no to culture, French culture, and their quaint little bacterial culture. Enough is enough. Speaking of grater's the wife was doing a pretty good job last night, wonder if I can have her charged? Only in France, you say? Tabernac!

While we're at it, just like parsing words like manhole and changing them to anybody holes we need to take a serious look at "the rapists." Especially psycho the rapists. While I'm guessing the(rapy) is a subjective position it does, nevertheless, describe the fee schedule. How much more obvious than this can you get when it comes to rape? These people designate themselves as "the rapists." We need to get to the bottom of this. There will be no more massaging of anything; not your hamstring or your neurosis. This rape culture stops here and now.

By the way, that rapier wit has to go, it's pretty clear that most women can feel the penetrating humor and well, you just don't cuddle afterwards. Those penetrating romantic gazes? Guess what, that's right; rape, rape, rape, rape, rape. If there's no penetration then there is no rape, pretty simple stuff here. Wait, did I just use the word "stuff"? Doh!

By the way, regarding penetration, to all othose occupying academe forthwith any future studies or submissions shall limit their materials to compelling. Penetrating will no longer be tolerated and we haven't settled yet on whether we can tolerate compelling. You will be required to submit consent forms from all attendees. Bring a pen.

Christ on horseback – I feel better already, I think I might ask the wife tonight if she's in the mood for a little consent. I remember the last time I had consent. When she removed it, I couldn't remember if I was thrusting in or pulling out. Fuck it, I just turned myself in to the cops. Let them sort it out.

Of course it was a little embarrassing to admit that I might have raped my wife but I lost track. I was overwhelmed by my insensitivity and trying not to blow my consent prematurely. There has been many occasions that I just wanted to throw my wife down and consent her brains out; just really go to town, just consent her out of her mind. I love to watch her consent to a climax. Or is it climax to consent? Well you know what I mean. You don't know, per se, unless you consent to my consent to know she consented.

Last week the wife caught me consenting off in the shower, but hey, what could she say? I had consent, notarized. When I caught her with her vibrator I immediately asked to see her consent form. She was diagnosed by her "the rapist" as bi-polar. I didn't want to be charged as an accessory, especially since the vibrator was already occupying that role.

We tried this new sex game at home designed to cause maximum arousal. It's called blind consent, all the players are blindfolded and you have to guess who gave consent, the losers get 10-15 years. A little stiff but don't confuse this with arousal. I figured this was just an abbreviated version of divorce court.

I'm guessing that young couples may consider changing their marriage vows from "I do," to "I consent." This would be great for guys, if she doesn't, you can avoid divorce completely. I can just imagine how the women's magazines will be spinning this. "50 ways to make him think you consented." "How to get even with consent hounds by using disappearing ink." "How to put the consent back in your marriage," "Consent: a one way street with no exit and no entrance," "How to make him consent to child support without ever sleeping with him."

I am curious how this will affect the laws of search and seizure, given the fact that every male in prison custody is subjected to a body cavity search the stats for male rape should increase exponentially, unless, of course, they default to entrance through the nose or ear.

I can't imagine a man consenting to it or being made to. Is this a trick question, did these guys at the Federal Bureau of Idiots think this through or is there some law that will remove a man's right to withhold consent? If there is, it should be put on the table in plain view so men can use the same snake slither to ward off false allegations.

[image]I would suppose that invasive medical procedures performed on children to establish sexual contact may no longer be legal. Oh wait, I guess the state just removes children from your custody and grants consent against your will. Maybe that's how they will get around raping men in jails – by assigning men in custody as wards of the state. Maybe men should consider a relationship with a woman only if she agrees that you are a custodial caregiver with all legal rights to exercise consent on her behalf. You may want to consider adding this to the small unreadable print on your coitus contracts.

I'm one of those people that although against rape have many questions regarding it. "Why" is the first, followed by a thousand others. I am much less tolerant not of what we believe to be rape by definition or the victimization of women. I'm less tolerant of the violence and the gender specific connotations that represent systemic violence towards men and boys. Rape to me is nothing less than coerced intimacy as a qualifier, across the board and gender neutral. I don't care if you're a cop trying to coerce a statement or a wife bitching about your menstrual cycle, or a feminist calling some man a homo because he shows no interest in you. You are trying to fuck someone for your own benefit, with no regard for the effects of your behavior.

The whole issue is backwards, we should be focused on the damage that occurs as a result of attempting a relationship. The path to pathology can be altered but not by the current laws. I think we all know both men and women that rape and its perception extends far beyond the legal definition. It is too often an exaggeration of the facts. Unfortunately feminists reside in the background shaking their pom-poms and cheering it on. I believe that there are too many officials willing to alter the facts to fit the charge, for no other reason than to justify funding or acquire brownie points, but more importantly to fit the fact that no other legal definitions exist. Unfortunately our behaviors are not as black and white as the laws that govern it.

The previous definition of rape was obviously penned by those polishing their dicks and believing they were polishing their brains. The new and improved version of rape is so myopic as to provide holes big enough to require consent to engage them. Are these assholes and acolytes of rape really getting paid for this shit or are they planning a new reality show?

I have no doubt that the larger portion of women or for that matter the public if asked to define rape are unable to limit their definition to what is understood to be the legal definition. I expect that law enforcement officials are no better. Rape in and of the perception of it immediately instills vile contempt for its occurrence, in all quarters. But that vile contempt rarely reflects the circumstance. It is quite likely that what feminists consider unreported rape may in fact be a lack of definition to accurately define the occurrence. Those who do not report may feel the definition of rape is too strong to address their experience. But the interest to explore the possibility does not exist.

We simply lack the language to define any occurrence of circumstance that may fit in between the actual definition of consent and the actual definition of rape. So we stretch those definitions to the detriment of both genders. If a man coerces a woman to have sex against her comfort to engage, the result is an exaggeration. If she consented to coercion she is a slut, if he admits to coercion he is a rapist. Both are an exaggeration of the facts. Where the outcome may have been more consistent with remorse for the occurrence, a lack of life skills and a need for counseling, we instead apply a prison sentence. We call this civilization but we don't include the laugh track in the background.

We pretend at politics of liberalism, portray a community consciousness of empowerment and administer totalitarian law enforcement. We know that our lives, experience and circumstances include shades of gray but we refuse to shape our laws to accommodate those experiences. Because we determine that consent and rape will reside at distant extremes with no alternate definitions, I believe every accusation should require the accuser to define rape in writing and both parties should submit to a lie detector. If the accuser fails the test she should be required to meet all expenses. That is to say if you put on a lousy performance the audience should be reimbursed.

My first experience with sex was unwanted; I was coerced by the girl that I dated. When I chose to break it off I was accused by her of transmitting a sexual infection. To the best of my knowledge a virgin cannot do that. I could only conclude that she infected me and I was left to submit to the humiliation of being tested by a female doctor, while four other women stood and watched the procedure. I have no doubt that to 99.9 % of the women who would read this paragraph the humor is compelling. Feminist rape accusers and MRA apologists reside at the extreme opposite ends of the issue, but for those that live their lives in the middle it's not hard to understand and recognize that when you attach humiliation and degradation to sex, you are doing damage, even if it is a fetish.

We simply have no laws to govern or protect men from sexual deviance or sexual abuse. We know the lasting effects are often psychological but men somehow don't meet the measurement for consideration. There are millions of men that suffer from the effects of sexual abuse and categorically defined as damaged goods, not worth the trouble. We lack the compassion to extend any protection or understanding of their experience and this same courtesy is extended to our boys.

As a man who can accept the ideal of equality I no longer have any sympathy, interest or concern for adult women that pretend, protest or parade their rape politics or their claims. I will adhere to 100% jury nullification on this issue and as far as I'm concerned rape culture is completely in the minds of women. It is an exaggeration of the law and does not serve to protect men in any way. Now we are equal.

Women were not oppressed by not having the vote

Luigi Logan (aka Fidelbogen) · 27 October 2011 · Archived copy · Original

[dropcap]I[/dropcap]t irritates the tar out of me to hear feminists say that women were "oppressed" by not having the right to vote in olden days. Excuse me. . . oppressed? I must take exception to the semantics here, for is not plain to me that what was happening ought to be called by such a heinous name.

I am aware that some people might think it was a bad thing that women couldn't vote. And I am aware that other people might think it was a good thing.

Well as you might expect, I am a third way thinker upon this subject. I would submit that women's historical lack of voting rights was neither a good thing nor a bad thing. Rather, it was a morally indifferent state of affairs, based on a cultural consensus that was shared by men and women alike in the past.

Our ancestors lived in a very, very different world than we do, and their cultural norms were very, very different from ours, yet undoubtedly befitting to their world — a world mysterious and unknown to us nowadays. Who are we to judge?

So was it really, inherently, such a horrible thing after all, that women could not vote? And WHY was it inherently horrible? Why should it even matter? Did the average woman in those days honestly feel that voting was "all that"? Seriously. . . who are we new-fangled ones to judge the men and women of past times for their very different way of life, with its very different demands and pressure that we can no longer entirely fathom?

And needless to say, we all know that most men could not vote during most of those same years in which women could not vote, and that there was only a trivial time lag between full manhood suffrage and full womanhood suffrage.

Something else that nobody to my knowledge has pointed out, is that electoral politics as we nowadays know it is a very recent historical innovation. It virtually did not exist before the French Revolution, and came into focus gradually beginning in the early 1800s. So it is utterly vacuous to say that women were deprived of the vote for "centuries", in case anybody wanted to say such a thing. In fact, the time window in which women couldn't vote was historically very brief, and for most of that same stretch most men were similarly deprived. Yes, the more you whittle this down, the more trivial it looks.

As above, was it really such an unspeakable crime that the female population couldn't always go to the polls during that comparatively trifling span of years?

Or is that entire concept nothing but feminist historiography, meant to wring pathos out of history for present-day political purposes by the device of retrojection? That would certainly conform to standard feminist tricknology, wouldn't it?

Once again, I believe that women's historical lack of voting rights was neither a good thing nor a bad thing, but a morally indifferent thing which ought to concern us very little at the present day. And I even think I am being generous, for to be intellectually honest I believe a case might be constructed that it was a positive good in the context of those times.However, I am willing to settle for "morally indifferent", and call it quits.

Look, it's simple. Once upon a time, women didn't have the voting franchise because societal norms found nothing amiss about such an arrangement. Then times changed, norms changed, and women were admitted to the franchise. That's all. And women were never, at any point along that general story-line, "oppressed." Only within the feminist narrative were they "oppressed" — but there are other narratives.

Furthermore, women were never at any time deprived of any rights. You see, women's "right" to vote simply did not exist in the first place — or not during the period when the so-called deprivation occurred. I mean that "rights" are only a figment. Only a mentation. Only a notion. Only a construct. Rights do not exist in their own right. They are not some mystical pure essence which hangs in the air all by itself — they must be conjured into existence by a strictly human will-to-power, and fixed by law or custom. Through the entirety of human history, people have been inventing new “rights”, in train with new appetites, where none existed previously. And I expect they will continue to do so.

So in conclusion, I wish that second and third-wave feminists would shut the hell up with their dishonest, self-laudatory rhetoric about “the vote”. Women can vote now, so the feminists need to quit tooting on that rusty old horn. It is getting really, really old. It really is.

Rape culture: is it a mold or a fungus?

J Galt · 27 October 2011 · Archived copy · Original

[dropcap]L[/dropcap]et's extinguish the rape culture entirely. Who needs it and better yet who wants it? Not me, and I suspect you don't either. Let's start with our language and make this politically correct while we're at it. That often used French word "rape." No more grated French cheese. Screw them and their smelly products. We know what you French buggers are up to and it's time to put an end to it. Just say no to culture, French culture, and their quaint little bacterial culture. Enough is enough. Speaking of grater's the wife was doing a pretty good job last night, wonder if I can have her charged? Only in France, you say? Tabernac!

While we're at it, just like parsing words like manhole and changing them to anybody holes we need to take a serious look at "the rapists." Especially psycho the rapists. While I'm guessing the(rapy) is a subjective position it does, nevertheless, describe the fee schedule. How much more obvious than this can you get when it comes to rape? These people designate themselves as "the rapists." We need to get to the bottom of this. There will be no more massaging of anything; not your hamstring or your neurosis. This rape culture stops here and now.

By the way, that rapier wit has to go, it's pretty clear that most women can feel the penetrating humor and well, you just don't cuddle afterwards. Those penetrating romantic gazes? Guess what, that's right; rape, rape, rape, rape, rape. If there's no penetration then there is no rape, pretty simple stuff here. Wait, did I just use the word "stuff"? Doh!

By the way, regarding penetration, to all othose occupying academe forthwith any future studies or submissions shall limit their materials to compelling. Penetrating will no longer be tolerated and we haven't settled yet on whether we can tolerate compelling. You will be required to submit consent forms from all attendees. Bring a pen.

Christ on horseback – I feel better already, I think I might ask the wife tonight if she's in the mood for a little consent. I remember the last time I had consent. When she removed it, I couldn't remember if I was thrusting in or pulling out. Fuck it, I just turned myself in to the cops. Let them sort it out.

Of course it was a little embarrassing to admit that I might have raped my wife but I lost track. I was overwhelmed by my insensitivity and trying not to blow my consent prematurely. There has been many occasions that I just wanted to throw my wife down and consent her brains out; just really go to town, just consent her out of her mind. I love to watch her consent to a climax. Or is it climax to consent? Well you know what I mean. You don't know, per se, unless you consent to my consent to know she consented.

Last week the wife caught me consenting off in the shower, but hey, what could she say? I had consent, notarized. When I caught her with her vibrator I immediately asked to see her consent form. She was diagnosed by her "the rapist" as bi-polar. I didn't want to be charged as an accessory, especially since the vibrator was already occupying that role.

We tried this new sex game at home designed to cause maximum arousal. It's called blind consent, all the players are blindfolded and you have to guess who gave consent, the losers get 10-15 years. A little stiff but don't confuse this with arousal. I figured this was just an abbreviated version of divorce court.

I'm guessing that young couples may consider changing their marriage vows from "I do," to "I consent." This would be great for guys, if she doesn't, you can avoid divorce completely. I can just imagine how the women's magazines will be spinning this. "50 ways to make him think you consented." "How to get even with consent hounds by using disappearing ink." "How to put the consent back in your marriage," "Consent: a one way street with no exit and no entrance," "How to make him consent to child support without ever sleeping with him."

I am curious how this will affect the laws of search and seizure, given the fact that every male in prison custody is subjected to a body cavity search the stats for male rape should increase exponentially, unless, of course, they default to entrance through the nose or ear.

I can't imagine a man consenting to it or being made to. Is this a trick question, did these guys at the Federal Bureau of Idiots think this through or is there some law that will remove a man's right to withhold consent? If there is, it should be put on the table in plain view so men can use the same snake slither to ward off false allegations.

I would suppose that invasive medical procedures performed on children to establish sexual contact may no longer be legal. Oh wait, I guess the state just removes children from your custody and grants consent against your will. Maybe that's how they will get around raping men in jails – by assigning men in custody as wards of the state. Maybe men should consider a relationship with a woman only if she agrees that you are a custodial caregiver with all legal rights to exercise consent on her behalf. You may want to consider adding this to the small unreadable print on your coitus contracts.

I'm one of those people that although against rape have many questions regarding it. "Why" is the first, followed by a thousand others. I am much less tolerant not of what we believe to be rape by definition or the victimization of women. I'm less tolerant of the violence and the gender specific connotations that represent systemic violence towards men and boys. Rape to me is nothing less than coerced intimacy as a qualifier, across the board and gender neutral. I don't care if you're a cop trying to coerce a statement or a wife bitching about your menstrual cycle, or a feminist calling some man a homo because he shows no interest in you. You are trying to fuck someone for your own benefit, with no regard for the effects of your behavior.

The whole issue is backwards, we should be focused on the damage that occurs as a result of attempting a relationship. The path to pathology can be altered but not by the current laws. I think we all know both men and women that rape and its perception extends far beyond the legal definition. It is too often an exaggeration of the facts. Unfortunately feminists reside in the background shaking their pom-poms and cheering it on. I believe that there are too many officials willing to alter the facts to fit the charge, for no other reason than to justify funding or acquire brownie points, but more importantly to fit the fact that no other legal definitions exist. Unfortunately our behaviors are not as black and white as the laws that govern it.

The previous definition of rape was obviously penned by those polishing their dicks and believing they were polishing their brains. The new and improved version of rape is so myopic as to provide holes big enough to require consent to engage them. Are these assholes and acolytes of rape really getting paid for this shit or are they planning a new reality show?

I have no doubt that the larger portion of women or for that matter the public if asked to define rape are unable to limit their definition to what is understood to be the legal definition. I expect that law enforcement officials are no better. Rape in and of the perception of it immediately instills vile contempt for its occurrence, in all quarters. But that vile contempt rarely reflects the circumstance. It is quite likely that what feminists consider unreported rape may in fact be a lack of definition to accurately define the occurrence. Those who do not report may feel the definition of rape is too strong to address their experience. But the interest to explore the possibility does not exist.

We simply lack the language to define any occurrence of circumstance that may fit in between the actual definition of consent and the actual definition of rape. So we stretch those definitions to the detriment of both genders. If a man coerces a woman to have sex against her comfort to engage, the result is an exaggeration. If she consented to coercion she is a slut, if he admits to coercion he is a rapist. Both are an exaggeration of the facts. Where the outcome may have been more consistent with remorse for the occurrence, a lack of life skills and a need for counseling, we instead apply a prison sentence. We call this civilization but we don't include the laugh track in the background.

We pretend at politics of liberalism, portray a community consciousness of empowerment and administer totalitarian law enforcement. We know that our lives, experience and circumstances include shades of gray but we refuse to shape our laws to accommodate those experiences. Because we determine that consent and rape will reside at distant extremes with no alternate definitions, I believe every accusation should require the accuser to define rape in writing and both parties should submit to a lie detector. If the accuser fails the test she should be required to meet all expenses. That is to say if you put on a lousy performance the audience should be reimbursed.

My first experience with sex was unwanted; I was coerced by the girl that I dated. When I chose to break it off I was accused by her of transmitting a sexual infection. To the best of my knowledge a virgin cannot do that. I could only conclude that she infected me and I was left to submit to the humiliation of being tested by a female doctor, while four other women stood and watched the procedure. I have no doubt that to 99.9 % of the women who would read this paragraph the humor is compelling. Feminist rape accusers and MRA apologists reside at the extreme opposite ends of the issue, but for those that live their lives in the middle it's not hard to understand and recognize that when you attach humiliation and degradation to sex, you are doing damage, even if it is a fetish.

We simply have no laws to govern or protect men from sexual deviance or sexual abuse. We know the lasting effects are often psychological but men somehow don't meet the measurement for consideration. There are millions of men that suffer from the effects of sexual abuse and categorically defined as damaged goods, not worth the trouble. We lack the compassion to extend any protection or understanding of their experience and this same courtesy is extended to our boys.

As a man who can accept the ideal of equality I no longer have any sympathy, interest or concern for adult women that pretend, protest or parade their rape politics or their claims. I will adhere to 100% jury nullification on this issue and as far as I'm concerned rape culture is completely in the minds of women. It is an exaggeration of the law and does not serve to protect men in any way. Now we are equal.

They’re He-e-e-r-e!

Paul Elam · 28 October 2011 · Archived copy · Original

OK, gents and ladies, the new A Voice for Men T-shirts are here. And as you can see in this picture (those fingers belong to our own Bern) they are a fine sight to behold.

We are giving these shirts away to AVfM supporters in exchange for a donation of $20.00, plus we ask that U.S. and Canadian residents add $6.00 ($12.00 outside the U.S. and Canada) to help us cover shipping charges.

The shirts are good quality cotton, and were produced by our enthusiastic supporter Alexander at Hollywoodloser.com. They come in S, M, L, XL and XXL, but supplies are limited so please get your order in right away. (see donation button at right)

These shirts are the beginning of a longer line of products that will help us finance the activism from this site, while allowing us to gift our valued donors with something in appreciation for parting with those hard earned dollars.

Those who order, please be sure to note your size in the paypal comments when you pay. Or, if paying by check or money order, be sure to include your size and correct mailing address with your payment.

Also, everyone who donated for the AVfM patches should have them by now. If you have not received yours, please let me know.

As always, thank you to all AVfM supporters.

PE

AVfM Radio, Tuesday, November 1 – GAME!

Paul Elam · 28 October 2011 · Archived copy · Original

[box icon="none"]

So why, you may ask, would I be making the show announcement for next Tuesday's episode of AVfM Radio on Friday afternoon, instead of on show day, as is customary?

Because we are seizing the opportunity to promote and further a much needed discussion about AVfM, the MRM and how all this fits into the arenas of Game and PUA, and also the ways it doesn't. Or at least we will give the exploration of those ideas a real examination.

For the uninitiated, this is an extension of a debate challenge that was issued by Frost in reaction to a piece I did on Game and PUA. That debate will start running this Monday night with my first response to Frost, who now has a contributor level account at this website. The debate will conclude on Saturday.

We are going to run the show up to a full three hours, depending on the number of phone calls that come in. MRA's, MGTOW, PUA's and Game advocates are all welcome to call in and have your unbridled voices heard. Only one rule: This isn't Fox News so no shouting matches. I give my word that you will be allowed to have your say and the only constraints put on you will be to accommodate other callers that wish to speak.

Also, it will help both our causes if everyone keeps it reasonably civil.

This should be a very interesting show. With the exception of a couple of borderline personalities, who don't know any better, feminists and white knights lack the guts to call in and put their ideas on the line publicly. I don't think this is true of PUA's and Gamers, and expect they will support their side of this well.

So mark your calendars for Tuesday, November 1, 2011 at 8:00 PM Central Time for what out to be a few hours of really thought provoking material. Those of you who have not registered to follow the show can do so here. The show call in number is 310-388-9709, and registered followers can skype in their calls from anywhere in the world.

[/box]

Why isn't Betty Friedan on Register-Her.com?

John Hembling (JtO) · 30 October 2011 · Archived copy · Original

[dropcap]B[/dropcap]etty Friedan is the author of the 1963 publication many people consider the foundation of modern feminism, "the Feminine Mystique". She also founded the National Organization for Women, running it from her apartment starting from 1966.

Friedan stepped down from her position as NOW's first president in 1970 and pursued political activism which included the nation-wide Women's Strike for Equality on August 26 1970. This strike was successful enough to significantly broaden the feminist movement. In 1971, Friedan joined other leading feminists to establish the National Women's Political Caucus.

As the founder and early organizer of the movement which is now one of the largest hate organizations in the world, it would be easy to rationalize inclusion of Friedan in the bigot category of register-her.com, but it would be incorrect.

The corruption, the tradition of fraudulent statistics, the routine employment of logical fallacy in feminist rhetoric, and the numerous other failings of modern feminism do not belong to Betty Friedan.

To be sure, much of her philosophical position was strongly opposed to the humanist libertarian point of view many MRA's lean towards. However, Friedan was a curmudgeon, and though her social movement in its modern form opposes human rights, Friedan herself was a strict adherent to what she saw as the truth. Unlike many later feminists, her version of feminism did not rest on a foundation of hatred.

Friedan's obituary[1], published in the UK Independent makes this clear; "because I'm not anti-marriage and anti-family. I always thought it was dangerous to go against the idea of the family. I don't even like the phrase "women's liberation" because that idea of being set free from everything doesn't seem right to me. I like to think of the women's movement as a fight for equality. Friedan's The Second Stage (1981) aimed to set the record straight, stating that men were not the enemy"

Friedan was briefly a candidate entry in the database of Register-her.com, listed under the category of offence as Domestic Violence False Accuser. As a moderator of the registry, it seemed that founder of the world's most successful hate movement should be listed in an alternate category of offence. The candidate entry, while noting her claim of accusing an ex husband of battery and refuting that accusation with: "she later admitted this was not true," this entry to the registry was short of detail or corroboration. This motivated me to conduct my own research, and to assume a better category would be that of bigot. My assumption proved incorrect and I deleted the candidate entry in the registry for the founder of NOW.

In her autobiography, published in 2000, she stated that her ex husband, divorced in 1969 has beaten her during her marriage. This claim was disputed by Carl Friedan. The Register-her candidate entry submitted contained the statement that "Friedan later admitted this was not true". Unfortunately, the description of that statement of admission is incomplete. Referring back to Friedan's obituary:

"She said that her husband had beaten her, a claim which Carl Friedan strongly rejected. Betty Friedan then admitted they had exchanged blows, commenting, "Look, I'm not a doormat. We did have our battles."

Sometimes a political opponent is just a political opponent, and not a criminal. Friedan's monster continues to cut a swath of destruction through the social landscape, but Friedan is not the ideologue who turned an erstwhile fight for equality into persecution of half the human race.

[1] http://www.independent.co.uk/news/obituaries/betty-friedan-465800.html

Shrink4Men Radio: Rethinking Female Sociopathy

Dr. Tara J. Palmatier · 31 October 2011 · Archived copy · Original

[box type="download" icon="none"]

Does your wife, girlfriend, ex or partner's ex have a Dr. Jekyll and Ms. Hyde personality?

Does she have a "good mask" that she shows the outside world while subjecting you and/or the kids to her cruel and abusive side?

Does she have little to no empathy or selective empathy?

Does she throw a temper tantrum, rage, pout or allege "Abuse!" when you try to hold her accountable for her bad behaviors?

Does she value you (and others) based on what you can do for her or what she can get from you? In other words, does she see people as objects of utility?

Does she lie, cheat, use violence and other forms of intimidation and manipulate to get her way or to "win?"

Does she have scorn and contempt for the people she victimizes or "pulls one over on?"

Has she ever threatened to destroy you and/or tried to make good on her threats?

Does she only recognize her rights and believe she's entitled to violate the rights of others?

Does she have a gross sense of entitlement?

Does she blame others for her own failures, bad decisions and bad behaviors?

If so, your wife, girlfriend, ex or partner's ex may have sociopathic traits or be a full-blown sociopath.

Historically, men have been diagnosed with Antisocial Personality Disorder far more than women. Female sociopaths exist, it's just that we use different terminology to identify them.

It's time to rethink the qualifiers of female sociopathic behavior, which Dr Tara J. Palmatierof Shrink4Men will be discussing during this Shrink4Men Radio episode.

The telephone lines will be open, so if you have questions, stories or thoughts on this topic, please call in (310 388 9709) or Skype in. And Happy Halloween!

Show Page

[/box]

Elam vs Frost: Texas Death Match – Round 1

Paul Elam · 31 October 2011 · Archived copy · Original

[dropcap]O[/dropcap]n October 19, after a long run of on again off again internal debate, I wrote a short, admittedly snarky and provocative piece about PUA and Game; to wit, Chateau Bullshit. My intent was two-fold. One, to take a swing at the dumb and decidedly dodgy notion that pussyism, the ideology of PUA's, is integral to human male development, and two, to take a needed shot at some of the tongue-shite™ about MRA's that has emanated from the ineptly called "other side of the MRM coin."

For the purpose of this event, I don't think targeting individuals in that respect is going to be anything but distracting. We already know the rift is there. Or, as blogger G.L. Piggy called it, "[T]he fault line that has always existed between MRAs and practitioners of Game."

As to my piece that caused so many panties to get in a twist, I openly acknowledge that I could have written a lot more substance into it, but the fact is that in terms of the basic premise, not much else was needed, except to those who need it spelled out, and this "debate" will serve that purpose well enough.

After I wrote that article I was quickly attacked (no, that isn't a complaint) by someone who calls himself Frost, who wrote a response over on Inmalafide.com, a valued site driven by the great and terrifying Ferdinand Bardamu. It was actually not Frosts first effort at lecturing MRA's on what they ought to do, and taking a look at that can help put some of this in perspective.

Another piece he wrote also posted to Ferd's site on October 24 It is titled "Men's Rights Activists: You Will Never Win the Battle You're Fighting."

This was apparently not a response to me, but something meant to enlighten all of us down here in the ranks of us "spineless pussies," as another hostile reaction inferred.

Please bear with the slight diversion into the second mentioned piece by Frost. It serves to illustrate one valuable point.

In that particular article, he starts things off with noting "The definitive MRA publication is The Spearhead, an online magazine that features articles by a variety of regular columnists and guest writers."

Most of you will see the problem out of the gate with that, considering that The Spearhead, though a chest of gold, is not an MRA website, much less the definitive one. All you have to do is ask the man who runs it, W.F. Price, who is not an activist.

I brought this up not to tear into all the fallacies in that article (which I could easily do) but to point out that from the outset, mercy points will have to be given my opponent. He is not very well informed about the MRM.

That being said, this exchange will all come down on my part to supporting my contentions in the Chateau Bullshit piece, and that means a more detailed critique of Game and PUA (which have to be separated) as well as presenting my unimpeachable and pristine rationale for a superior alternative.

I will do that with vigor before we are done here, but the matter at hand now is to respond to Frost's first "attack," and set the record straight on the most glaring of his initial misconceptions.

I will use excerpts from his article, the entirety of which can be read here.

Oh, and a disclaimer. I do not pretend to speak for anyone but myself. I consider my opinions on the MRM, broadly defined, to be just that, my opinions. Acknowledging this in advance will save me a lot of "IMO's" through the debate, and hopefully save knee-jerkers from telling me unnecessarily that I don't speak for all MRA's. I will copy and paste this in the comments for the terminally unobservant.

OK, ready? Let's do it.

First, Frost says this:

"I am sympathetic to the values and goals of the Men's Rights Movement, to which Paul is a valuable contributor. But the movement is heading for a split."

Let's dispense with this nonsense up front. There is no connection between MRA's and PUA's. Sure, there is some crossover in web traffic, and one area of shared interest in human sociobiology, but that is where it begins and ends. There is no unity between the two camps and even less in the way of philosophical similarity. All one has to do is just look at the content on MRA and PUA websites.

The results, in terms of content and focus, look something like this:

[box icon="none"]MRA: False rape accusations[/box]

[box type="alert" icon="none"]PUA: Getting pussy[/box]

[box icon="none"]MRA: Family law[/box]

[box type="alert" icon="none"]PUA: Getting pussy[/box]

[box icon="none"]MRA: Feminist governance[/box]

[box type="alert" icon="none"]PUA: Getting pussy[/box]

[box icon="none"]MRA: Erosion of civil rights[/box]

[box type="alert" icon="none"]PUA: Getting, well, you know…pussy.[/box]

What the fuck, are we not supposed to know what it is that the "artists" are picking up? And do they ever even pretend to be concerned with anything else? And that is what is really at issue here. Picking up women is fine. Trying to pass it off as something more than it is, well, not so much.

Frost's imagined split is like the looming divide between bird watchers and spelunkers. We expect them to be at war any minute now. All they have to do is figure out where they have any real estate to fight over. The war may be on indefinite hold as the bird watchers are watching birds, none of which live in caves.

And this really brings me to the opportunity to deal with something else here that has to be said, especially since I am focusing on PUA only in this post – as opposed to Game, which I will address at length later.

We must accept that on the broad scale that PUA is part of the men's movement. Note, I did not say men's rights movement. The fact is that men, in several ways, are beginning to change, to adapt, with greater or lesser efficacy, to an avalanche of changes in our coexistence with women.

In that light, we have a lot of camps in our vacillating world. This includes MRA's, Gamers, PUA's, male feminists, manginas, and traditionalists that have made some adjustments to the new gender world order. The different groups are diverse and often divergent, but all of them are part of a slowly shifting and changing "men's movement."

With that in mind, think of PUA's as the Amway of the men's movement. They are constantly recruiting, selling, and recruiting some more, which is why they sniff around the outskirts of activist operations like this. They smell DVD sales and enrollment in classes on how to walk up to a woman and say your name without stuttering. Cutting edge stuff.

They cloak all this nonsense in a lot of chest thumping and brio, imagining that non PUA's are a bunch of chumps who aren't very skilled with women.

Remember, it all comes back to the pussy, which also brings us back to another one of Frosts huge misconceptions; that being that somehow he got the idea that I was preaching celibacy – or even practicing it.

He says of my "advice," in his piece: "A man who follows it will remain a lifelong celibate. Also perhaps, a lifelong

A Voice for Men reader, as his celibacy breeds more bitterness and thus more susceptibility to Paul's particular brand of self-help advice for the modern man."

Just for the record I am almost 10 years into a relationship with a woman. I have never advocated, for or against, celibacy, but my experience (I never called it advice) yielded a glut of butt, assuming, of course, that is all you are interested in.

To wit, take a listen to this. I put it up a year and a half ago on YT.

Play

You see, doing what I did resulted in a whole slew of women lining up for summa dis. It was as easy as not giving a shit. I didn't need lines or come on's or a fucking book of tactics. All I needed to do was choose one if I liked her. If the intent was celibacy, I failed miserably.

Now, there is much more to this that I will get to in my next post, but what I am asserting, for men interested in getting laid, as well as being interested in screening out the most obvious of potential problem women, is that they will get a lot more benefit from understanding a much bigger picture than is offered by PUA.

Where PUA fails, and fails at its most miserable, is that it only invests enough in the understanding of Evo-psych to result in a shot of leg. And they invest even less in the reasonable understanding that tail no longer comes without some serious risks that demand any rational man look way past potential notches on his belt. That is something that would be different, in my estimation, if these guys were anywhere near as successful as they claim.

So the things that make up the bigger, more important picture will be a big surprise to a lot of guys that think PUA is the way to go, but nothing new to those that already know better.

One thing I will address now comes from Frost's own words. He says, of his imagined divide in our respective camps, "On one side will be the reasonable and principled Men's Rights Activists, who will recognize and respect the desire of men to improve their lives, including their relationships with women."

Of course, now anyone who wants to can go read PUA sites and sort through all the scheming, calculation, manipulation and conning done to find a dark wet hole for their Twinkie to soak in – oh, sorry, I meant to say "improve their lives and their relationships with women." Then they can come back to AVfM and talk about all those principles.

Much more on those principles later, but right now, as I mentioned in the video, most men seek women out like trained seals doing tricks for a scrap of fish. PUA offers you pay-for-service instructions on how to balance beach balls on your nose a little longer, and clap your flippers a little louder, and abso-fucking-lutely nothing else. It's begging lessons for pussy paupers, but you might tend deny that and believe them when they tell you it makes you a player because every time they make their pitch on their websites, the text is embedded in the proximity of some tasty looking tits and ass. Budweiser sells really shitty beer the same way.

1,000,000

Paul Elam · 1 November 2011 · Archived copy · Original

After 15 months online we are rapidly approaching our first million visits to AVfM. And if current traffic holds or continues to grow we will have at least twice that much after another 15 months. I am betting we do even better than that thanks to the dedicated efforts of all the people who contribute quality additions to the growing library of MRA literature, and the increasing number of men and women who are stepping up to rattle the worlds cage with FTSU.

Those are not the only good numbers to report. After a slight leveling off when the site was rebuilt, we are tracking upward in Alexa ranking again, headed toward a coveted place in the top 100,000 worldwide rankings. Our commenting has also picked up again, after requiring users to register with the site to comment, and our database is now pushing 50,000 comments. Additionally, and most promising, since we rebuilt the site just three months ago, we are exceeding 200,000 page views per month. Expect a lot more in the future, and a lot more from AVfM Radio and register-her.com.

Zeta masculinity for dummies

John Hembling (JtO) · 1 November 2011 · Archived copy · Original

A Guide: For the general public.

[dropcap]A[/dropcap] number of people have written about zeta masculinity on this site, as well as elsewhere on the web. For the uninitiated, this is a term referring to men rejecting the traditional roles allowed for men, and defining their male identity outside that self destructive and exploitive framework. I won't attempt to duplicate or summarize those excellent articles here. I refer interested readers to that writing, linked in this article's footer.

This is not an exploration of what zeta masculinity means for men adopting and defining it. Rather, this short guide's intent is to help individuals outside the men's rights movement to understand and react appropriately to specimens of this newly emerging genus; The Zeta Male.

Violence

Traditionally, men have been willing to defend women from violence. Not just female family members and romantic interests, but complete strangers. In fact, any woman in a public space who signals distress will draw protection from passing men. Some men will even lend themselves to immediate retributive violence against whoever or whatever caused the originally signalled distress. This should be understood by readers of this guide, but is provided for context.

A Zeta male will exhibit none of this culturally programmed behaviour. A Zeta male has no interest in self sacrifice, exposure to violence, or playing the role of enforcer for the benefit of women. In fact, if a woman signals public distress and a man inquires of the difficulty, then turns his attention to other matters, you might be dealing with a zeta male.

Within western culture, women enjoy a exemption from direct consequence to their own violence, particularly when a man is the target. This was famously demonstrated in early 2011 in an episode of MTV's "Teen Mom," in which Amber Portwood repeatedly punched, slapped and kicked a man named Gary Shirley, who, despite his much greater size and strength, did no more than raise his arm to shield his face as Portwood angrily lectured him, punctuating her taunting with full-force punches to his face and neck.

The video depicting this prolonged assault is still available on youtube, where a substantial fraction of comments indicate the continued cultural psychosis which equates passive receipt of violence as /correct/ masculine behavior.

"I respect this guy for putting up with this crazy-ass bitch and her antics. "

"This guy is one HELL of a real man for standing there and taking it like he did."

Whatever kind of man Gary Shirley is now, allowing that he may have unlearned some of his cultural programming since that show's filming, he was not a Zeta male.

The cultural programming that women can assaulted men with impunity runs deep, which is why cases such as the male McDonalds employee's self defence against two female assailants created such confusion in worldwide media. His use of an improvised weapon characterized by confused or simply lying broadcasters as an act of aggression. The cries of "Stop! Stop!" by the attackers as their assault on the man was reversed betrayed a deep confusion and a failure to realize they were the aggressors, but that they'd targeted the wrong victim.

If you assault another person who happens to be bigger or stronger than yourself – its likely that it will go badly for you. With zeta males comprising a growing fraction of the population, this rule of thumb applies to women now too.

Money

What's yours is yours, and what's his is also yours. This is the established cultural norm on western societies. This is reflected in statistics collected by marketers who cynically prey on a cultivated narrative of women's victimhood in their marketing guide "Women want more." Women control 65% of disposable income world wide, and by 2028, this is predicted to rise to 70%. The wage gap citing a traditional lifetime earnings imbalance which favours men is now, and always has been, a ruse. No matter who earns money, it's women who spend it.

50 years of feminist activism have retooled employment and academic life to increasingly exclude men, and this shows in an emerging and accelerating real wage gap favouring women.

Men's value as human beings, and in romantic selection has always been closely tied to financial and social status. Another way of saying most women see men based on their utility, and only secondarily as human beings. Displays of financial solvency are accepted as a normal prerequisite for a man's visibility to most women.

Zeta masculinity puts the torch to this mode of thinking as well. When dealing with a zeta male a woman is not only expected to pay her own way, including in a romantic context – she's going to have to do it without a fuss, or fanfare. You've got a job, right? Why do you imagine you're owed financial tribute for the dubious privilege of your company?

This is an obvious deal-breaker for many women, and men putting fiscally detached zeta masculinity into practice are accustomed to the counter argument. "A real man pays," or "a gentleman doesn't make a lady pay." Or any other traditionally euphemistic phrasing which makes romance a financial transaction.

The argument from force against fiscal detachment is that men rejecting their role as romantic underwriter will find themselves frozen out. This is a mistaken interpretation. Zeta men are not "missing-out" on the supposed benefits of traditional sexual relationships, they've evaluated a crooked game and are voting with their feet. In fact, it might help women to understand this by thinking of zeta men as unusually butch lesbians with no patience for the usual hetero-sex game playing and bullshit. The analogy is obviously incomplete, but it seems obvious that breaking out of the "men must pay for my crap" model is difficult when you've always been a member of the benefitting demographic.

"Men are Pigs"

This is what now passes for humour. Sometimes men aren't pigs, rather – they're dogs. The list doesn't end with dogs and pigs, men are also stupid, controlling, afraid of commitment, aggressive, macho, afraid of intimacy, violent, sexist, and power hungry. Whether individuals buy into this mountain of hate, this is the tone of acceptable public discourse on men in our culture.

For a long time, men wounded by this culturally embedded invective argued or reasoned that not all men were like that. A pretty mild rebuttal considering that nearly no men fit such awful description. However, after enduring years of such narrative, a nearly complete indifference to either censure or praise becomes the only viable position when routinely hosed down with hatred. The effectiveness of disparagement of vilifying male identity trades on the need in human beings for social acceptance.

Humans are, after all social animals. For men, female acceptance has always tapped into reptile brain programming and fear of death. Sexual rejection for men means reproductive extinction. This is not the case for women, because the reproductive economy of human mating almost guarantees for a viable female that other males will seek them out.

Like so much other behavioural wiring, Zeta masculinity breaks this programming, too. Praise and condemnation are tools of control, and although a practicing zeta man can feel the pain of these tool's application, he recognizes them, and ignores them. Alternately, a zeta male – targeted with these old, old manipulative tactics recognizes their attempted use, and this informs his treatment of the erstwhile manipulator. Being washed for a lifetime in unjustified accusation as a biological demographic builds a thick skin, and deep reserves of ire.

Underlying Assumptions.

In almost all relations between men and women there exists what can be called the “Harry met Sally” rule. This is the assumption in personal relationships that men are driven by sexual desire. While strictly true, it’s no more significant than saying all animals including humans are driven by hunger. Women are driven by sexual desire as well, but the dynamics of human sexuality are such that women are the selectors, while men are the competitors for selection. Translated to a modern context of urban career and social life, men traditionally seek women’s approval. This affords women varying degrees of power, as well as a free pass for minor betrayal, misbehaviour, and unaccountability.

Assumptions, meet chainsaw. The path to Zeta masculinity traverses a great deal of revelation not covered in this short guide. However, this model for masculine identity encompasses a deep indifference to approval or rejection, as well as measured self awareness of sexual attraction. Men’s sexual attraction towards women is an element of men’s biological wiring. Through changes to law and a histrionic climate of moral panic over any expression of male sexual agency, male sexuality has been weaponized against men.

The practical consequence of this is adoption among men of survival strategies. Overt expressions of female sexuality, through attire or come-get-me nonverbal communication are increasingly regarded with a deep suspicion which is not excessive to call antipathy. The overused phrase “as a woman” is commonly preface to an emotional statement, opinion or demand, and that preface serving to lend the demand weight or illusory legitimacy. To a practitioner of zeta masculinity, “as a woman” a person is of no value, attraction, or innate importance. More than this, “as a woman” a person is suspect, and deemed a serious potential hazard.

What’s interesting in this recognized hazard is this isn’t expressed by the self defeating pronouncement of “no girls allowed” on a pre-adolescent boy’s clubhouse. This is not even as overt as a polite “no thanks.” It is silent, survival driven antipathy behind a smooth, affable front.

You’re bitter!

A well polished chestnut, likely to be trotted out in this piece’s rebuttal. A condensed version of You-are-just-bitter-because-you-can’t-get-laid, which is item 6 in a catalog 16 common of ad hominem arguments. In this case, the sour grapes accusation is technically true, because the grapes have been studied, evaluated, and are, in actual fact sour. Actually, they’re poisonous.

Addressing those still trying to use the whip of non-access to sex in rhetorical rebuttal, (a puerile argument)- Please be aware that sex is not in short supply. It is more freely available now than at any time in 100 years.

The claim of bitterness however, is an irrelevant distraction. Zeta masculinity is a model for male identity and existence largely apart from bitterness. Rather, zeta males are men who’ve seized the only real power any humans can have – and that’s self determination. The taste of it, by the way, is sweet.

http://www.avoiceformen.com/feminism/the-plague-of-modern-masculinity/

http://www.avoiceformen.com/women/the-male-hierarchy-at-closer-inspection/

http://www.avoiceformen.com/feminism/government-tyranny/breaking-bad-the-male-as-designated-criminal/

http://www.avoiceformen.com/men/standing-at-the-zeta-crossroads/

http://www.avoiceformen.com/feminism/princess-miserable-and-the-great-american-bitch-machine/

Elam vs Frost: Round 2 – Frost Speaks

Frost_25 · 1 November 2011 · Archived copy · Original

In Which I Recruit Paul's Readers To My PUA Death Cult

First, a disclaimer.

I strongly recommend that Paul's more sensitive and impressionable readers click away, and far away, from this post. I'm about to lure you into the secret cult of pick-up artistry, pussy-begging, and pedestalizing. If you resist, beware: I have shaming language, and I'm not afraid to use it. Continue reading, if you dare, but don't be surprised if you black out and wake up next to a paid-in-full copy of my $599 DVD set.

Still here? I guess you're feeling lucky. Good. Me too.

You can find links to the exchange that led to this debate here. But most of you are already familiar with the terms: Age and Guile Vs. Youth, Innocence, and bad graphic design, on the subject of Game and Men's Rights.

Note that this is not a debate between Game and the MRM. At least, not for me. I am a fan of both. If Paul and I were to chat about family law, false rape accusations, anti-masculine biases in our media and pop culture, and the wisdom of marriage for 21st century Western men, I'm sure we would find much to agree upon.

The real question du jour, is thus: What is the relationship, if any, between Game and the MRM? I believe they make fine bedfellows. Paul however, seems intent on offering some token last-minute resistance, which I'd like to overcome.

Let's start by asking: What is Game? The meaning of the word remains unclear, even among this small and incestuous corner of the blogosphere, so let's lock down a specific definition:

Game is the study of how women respond to men's behaviour.

I predict that many AVFM reader will take issue with such a broad definition. Game, to them, must include shiny clothes, effeminate mannerisms, hoop-jumping, and whatever other behaviours that they would like to associate with we 'Gamers'.

But I ask: If you quarrel with this definition, why? Neither I, nor Roissy, Roosh, Dagonet, Assanova, Gmac, Danger and Play, Badger, Private Man, or FFY are committed to any specific 'school' of Game. We're just a community of men, sharing what we know about women and relationships. Whatever your mental stereotype of a 'Gamer' is, I guarantee that at least one of the men on that list doesn't fit it. We learn from each other, we experiment for ourselves, and we use whatever helps us achieve our goals with women, discarding the rest. Precisely what those goals are varies across men – some are only interested in one night stands, some are seeking one good, trustworthy woman to make a wife out of, and most fall somewhere in the middle of those extremes.

The bottom line is that Game is a tool men can use to increase their success with women. No more, no less. If a man chooses to eschew sex for life, I admit he will have no use for Game. Otherwise, he would be a fool to dismiss the idea of thinking critically about his interactions with women.

There are two possible reasons why Paul and other MRAs might disapprove of Game.

1) You think that our specific teachings are flawed.

This is the basic point Paul is making in his original Chateau Bullshit post:

> "O.K., so you want to get laid? Here's how you do it. Smell clean, get in the proximity of women, and then ignore them. When they come to fuck you, and they will, shut up and let it happen.
>
> Sorry, but there is little else to it. Women are wired to respond to men who walk with enough self-confidence and > involvement in their own lives that they don't need to invest any energy into bagging girls. They attract women naturally."

In other words, there is no need for men to read Roissy et al. Having relationships with top-tier women is so easy that the only thing a man (any man!) must do is shower, and he will be irresistible.

Now, for all I know, Paul Elam really is such an insanely attractive man that he is honestly relating his personal experience to us in those words. Perhaps he really can consistently sleep with extremely high-quality women, merely by sidling up to them and radiating Paul-ness.

If so Paul, you're a lucky dog. If you ever roll out a DVD set, seminar, or coaching sessions, I'll be first in line.

But until then, I have to remind you: Your personal experience as an unstoppable force of sexual energy is not indicative of the challenges that mere ordinary men face, if they want to have the same good fortune you do. Don't believe me? Head to a night club. Wait by the door and count the men as they leave, frustrated and alone. Or, create a fake female online dating profile. Watch as the messages from desperate, lonely men pour into your inbox.

I do quite well for myself with women, better than 95% of men in my generation I'd wager, and I still have to do quite a bit more than shower, if I want to consistently sleep with the kind of women I want. Sad, I know.

Maybe I'll never convince Paul that most men have to work for our food, since he apparently does not. But those of you in our live studio audience have seen reality, and you know which of Paul or I has a firmer grasp on it. The 'cult' of Game does not have all the answers for you, but we can at least offer you better than "go take a shower."

Of course, not everyone is interested in self-improvement. Which brings us to our next possible objection:

2) You object to the general idea of improving your relationships with women

All this talk about 'just take a shower' being the sum total of advice a man needs with regard to women, is a bit silly. I don't think Paul actually believes that the legions of young men who are not meeting women, not getting laid, and not having fulfilling relationships with women, just need a bucket of warm soapy water to achieve their wildest penthouse-letters-esque fantasies.

Deep down, Paul realizes that consistently sleeping with attractive women is something that almost all men want to do, and only a small number of men actually do. If it were easy, you'd all be out doing it right now.

One of the human brain's favourite hobbies is self-deception. If we can't have something, we rationalize that we didn't want it anyways. We avoid starting an exercise program, so we can eliminate the risk of failing. We don't talk to that pretty girl, so we can tell ourselves later that maybe we could have slept with her, if only we'd tried.

It's easy to make excuses to avoid going after the things we want in life, and easier still when someone else offers to make the excuses for us. Personally, I'm wary of any belief system that seems to give me an easy way to justify taking the easy road. Especially when that belief system makes multiple demonstratably false and often contradictory assumptions:

– Game is demeaning to you, as a man!

– Game is worthless and unnecessary! Just take a shower!

– Game is all about jumping through hoops, eating shit, and acting like a pussy!

– Gamers are frauds!

– There is no overlap between Game and MRA! Gamers are wholly unconcerned with the MRM!

If necessary, I will thoroughly debunk the first four claims in the comments of this post. Here on the main stage though, to give Paul some ammunition for round #2, I will close by making a few points with regard to the last:

– The people you call "Gamers" are simply those who understand socio-biology and gender politics, and have chosen to use that understanding to improve their personal lives

– Game is the Men's Rights Movement's most powerful weapon in the battle against feminism

– Roissy has done more to empower 21st century men than A Voice For Men by an order of magnitude. Show a little respect.

Elam vs Frost: Round 3

Paul Elam · 2 November 2011 · Archived copy · Original

[dropcap]W[/dropcap]elcome all to round 3 of the debate between myself and Frost on the subject of Game, PUA and the MRM. In round 2, Frost finally raised some points that can serve to illustrate our differences in a much more tangible way.

Thankfully, the points of contention are simple enough that I needn't be too loquacious to address them. I can skip over his initial and lackluster stabs at humor, and the pointless attempt to explain what the debate is not about. Gee, that was helpful.

I can even forgive the embarrassingly myopic definition: "Game is the study of how women respond to men's behavior," and help him out with something much better:

Game is a learned skillset used for manipulating women into sex and other forms of interpersonal compliance.

No charge for that one, Frost, but a suggestion – if you want to debate someone, it's a good idea to understand your side of the argument better than your opponent. There is also the matter that this is really just a definition of Game that Gamebots would prefer. There is, in reality, a definition that is much more accurate.

Game is the skills development required to help men stop talking women out of fucking them.

No charge for that one either, Frost. It will make sense to you in about 10-15 years.

The next point of any "significance" in Frost's response is:

"The bottom line is that Game is a tool men can use to increase their success with women. No more, no less. If a man chooses to eschew sex for life, I admit he will have no use for Game. Otherwise, he would be a fool to dismiss the idea of thinking critically about his interactions with women."

First, and after I dismiss the drivel (for the second time) that only celibate men disagree with him, we probably ought to give him a cookie for only taking three more paragraphs to inch just a smidgeon closer to what he is talking about when he defines Game.

Yes, Game is about "success" with women; meaning fucking them. And of course that is a worthwhile goal of any healthy heterosexual male, with perhaps one caveat. Having sex with a female is also the natural and healthy goal of a male black widow spider, which tends to benefit the female in that she usually gets a post-coitus snack.

[image]
Game on!

Obviously, in the human realm sex with women is not near as dangerous as it is with the black widow. But there are risks and we do have a legion of ideologues working feverishly to create more of them. Thus far they have had a good measure of success. Where Game and PUA fail is in that they operate in complete denial of this, and take a balls-first-brain-on-the-back-burner approach. They protect that approach with hostile vigor, regarding any risk management as a weakness or some other form of "MRA faggotry."

I have to note at this point that the male black widow can almost always be seen feverishly trying to escape his looming cannibalization when sex with the female is complete. He frequently fails, but even with a brain that has less mass than a grain of sand, he is aware of risks and attempts to reduce them with a quick flight. He does not eschew sex, but he knows the possibilities that comes with it and acts accordingly.

So, when you look at the utter lack of risk management practiced by PUA's, it would appear they don't have the intellect of your average arachnid. It is probably this same disregard for consequences that led Frost into challenging me to a debate. Or it might just be that Frost and those of his ilk are simply so pussyblind that talking to them about sex related risk is like talking to a lemming about the dangers of cliff diving. Hard to say, but my guess is that Frost will likely help you decide with his own words before this is over.

So, I offer what I have already written here for context to consider as I examine what Frost finally deemed important enough to number and put in bold text:

> 1) You think that our specific teachings are flawed.

First I have to say how dumbstruck, I am. Wow! And to think, all it took was reading Chateau Bullshit and my first response to your debate challenge and then writing half your own response to get to the volcanically hot and incisive observation that I think your "specific teachings" are flawed. And so you present that bit of intellectual wizardry as your first, heavily emphasized statement in the debate.

Daayum, son, no wonder you da shizz wif da bizzitches.

Except there is still a problem here. Your point there is as half assed as your assessment of Game and its value. It is not just your specific teachings that are flawed, but your specific everything. You have your head so rooted in the pursuit of vagina, that you completely interpreted Chateau Bullshit in the wrong way.

[image]
Quality ass?
It was not intended to present Gamebots and PUA's with a more efficient way to maintain their pussycentism, but a challenge to the centrism itself. And you demonstrate now that all of that flew directly over your pointed little head.

You use sales pitch catch words, e.g. "top-tier women" and references to your own stellar success over 95% of the male population. I am deeply impressed. But perhaps, Frost, you should define what "top tier" means to you. Weather girl Heidi Jones is a good looking woman. Is she top tier? Also consider Victoria Haigh. Not exactly drop dead good looking, but not bad either. Accused her man of child rape. Top tier or no, Frost? And what aspects of Game is it that will help us figure it out before it is too late for the next man caught in her web?

I could hammer at this all day, but truth tell, young man, I think you are so immersed in your own narcissistic gratification via the attention of women that you can't see much of anything but a labia, a patch of hair and yourself, as the imagined idol of women and your fellow P-hounds.

And that brings us to your second "point."

> 2) You object to the general idea of improving your relationships with women.

Part of the problem here is that your constant obfuscations are tearing down any chance you have of making a valid argument. At this point I will just inform AVfM readers that I have taken on the responsibility of translating Frostspeak into plain honest English.

It is not "improving your relationships with women," that Frost is talking about, of course. It is getting more pussy, hopefully from some of those "top tier" women. See pics.

[image]
Top tier pussy?
To the contrary, AVfM is very much interested in improving relationships with women. We do that by advocating for their equal treatment under the law as opposed to special treatment, and by advocating for their uncompromised and unambiguous accountability in matters personal.

That insistence on personal accountability goes a long way toward improving relationships in my own life, with men and women alike. It helps me maintain peace of mind, eliminates most drama and risk, and has never cost me a piece of ass that I wanted. Rather it enhances the quality of all people I choose to associate with because I screen out the dead weight early on, before they can cause real problems or simply suck up time out of my life that I will never get back.

If Game and PUA are supposed to teach men to "see themselves as the prize," I think their failure to incorporate risk management calls irrefutable bullshit on that. But I think speaking of these things to Frost may well be lecturing on physics to a chimpanzee. Nope, I am just debating, and I use that word loosely, a pussy hound here; nothing more. He'll never get more than six inches deep because there is nothing in him that can go any further. Pity.

It is hard to know what else to tell someone like Frost, though I am sure in his next post he will give me the ammunition to do so, just as he did before.

I do hope though, that as he wants to dedicate his life to helping young men enter barrooms full of borderline skanks and not come our frustrated or lonely, that he considers more fully the implications of such a singular mentality about sex.

Sex is available to any man who wants it without foregoing risk management, but men won't be learning that from the legions of hucksters out there doing nothing more than exploiting their loneliness for a buck.

My last response in this debate, which will come after one more round of Frost trying to figure out different ways to convince you he has the golden key to quality pussy, and therefore a better life, will deal with the concept of male self-actualization, values, and how Game and PUA undermine those things in men.

Profiting from Pain

John Hembling (JtO) · 3 November 2011 · Archived copy · Original

[dropcap]H[/dropcap]ere is an infant. This newly formed human being is full of promise, and is a locus of joy and pride to parents, siblings, and an extended community. This tiny, miraculous bundle is the object of all of our adoration, even the flintiest of stoics are mesmerized by the ancient wired-in response to love and protect this infant.

Here is a sharpened steel instrument. A doctor will use this tool to partially flay this tiny baby – mutilating a sensory organ. This pseudo-medical procedure has, according to almost every major medical association in the world; no therapeutic value. In fact, it is a procure popularized by a breakfast cereal salesman and medical crackpot. John Kellog described it as a method of preventing sexual pleasure in boys in his 1877 book, "Plain facts for old and young".

> A remedy which is almost always successful in small boys is circumcision, especially when there is any degree of phimosis. The operation should be performed by a surgeon without administering an anaesthetic, as the brief pain attending the operation will have a salutary effect upon the mind, especially if it be connected with the idea of punishment.

We're living in a culture which sees this as normal, so I'll provide a little comparison by telling you what Dr. Kellog said about girls 2 pages later in the same book he extolled the virtues of boy-mutilation.

> "In females, the author has found the application of pure carbolic acid to the clitoris an excellent means of allaying the abnormal excitement."

In the modern context – promoters arguing for the continuation of infant mutilation claim it reduces the transmission incidence of aids.

The studies from which this claim are drawn are widely disputed, based on questionable methodology, but for the moment, lets assume transmission rates of communicable disease can are actually reduced by some percent in circumcised populations. Condoms are more effective, and don't require cutting off part of a human's body.

This argument is the equivalent of cutting out your eyeballs to prevent eye injury rather than wearing safety glasses. The claim of prevention of infection is asinine, but it continues to distract from a much more realistic reason for continuing the practice.

Women's cosmetic make-up products, and some medical products utilize foreskin tissue harvested from circumcised infants. This provides a profit motive for advocacy research from "medical" companies profiting by the ongoing mutilation of baby boys.

One example of this is the company called Advanced Tissue Science (A.T.S.)[1]. This corporation is based in La Jolla, CA. They are the makers of a product sold under the brand name Dermagraft-TC, which is an artificial skin created from harvested foreskins from infant circumcision.

A.T.S. is also the makers of NouriCel, another product made from harvested foreskins, and one of the main ingredients of SkinMedica's (a cosmetics company) TNS Recovery Complex product.

Infant mutilation is driven by women who want a better wrinkle-cream[2]. SkinMedica isn't the only company selling beauty products made from mutilated children. Its merely a famous example, publicly endorsed by celebrities like Oprah Winfrey and Barbara Walters who bragged about the use of mutilated infant's body parts before this turned out to be a bad public-relations move for each of them. Oprah's web-site has subsequently removed the bragging claims of skin rejuvenation through harvested foreskin products. She has not yet aired a show or written a word about the ethicacy of the use of infant tissue in women's beauty products.

The unnecessary mutilation of infant boys has another cost besides the the fact that circumcised men are denied a major sensory organ. The procedure is fatal to about 117 infants in the US every year[3]. Although the practice of sexually mutilating male infants is increasingly criticized, the procedure continues to be trivialized as a minor, harmless procedure in mainstream media. It would be impolite to tell women, the demographic controlling 65% of disposable income that their beauty products come at the cost of the sexual mutilation, and in some cases – the killing of infants.

Not yet, at least. In light of the recent public celebration by woman in the mommy-blogging community of adult male sexual mutilation such as the Catherine Becker case – a women's make-up product openly flaunting damage to male infants might even outsell competing products which don't publicize the source of harvested human flesh.

Then there's the religious apologists.
In July of 2011, while California debated a ban on infant circumcision, the president of the National Association of Evangelicals, leith Anderson said[4]:

"While evangelical denominations traditionally neither require nor forbid circumcision, we join Jews and Muslims in opposing this ban and standing together for religious freedom […] Jews, Muslims, and Christians all trace our spiritual heritage back to Abraham. Biblical circumcision begins with Abraham. No American government should restrict this historic tradition. Essential religious liberties are at stake".

Sexual mutilating an infant is, according to the the National Association of Evangelicals, an essential religious liberty. The right of a child to freedom from harm is apparently not.

Between the profits of corporations, the frivolous self interest of female consumers, and the fairy tails of stone age desert dwelling goat-herders, male children will likely continue to be mutilated and killed.

These reasons are all worthless.
An ethical human being does not abide the dismemberment of children.

Meanwhile, enjoy looking years younger, and don't trouble your pretty head about the price payed.

[1] http://www.foreskin-restoration.net/forum/showthread.php?t=8415
[2] http://thetyee.ca/Views/2007/01/30/Foreskin/
[3] http://www.circumstitions.com/death.html
[4] http://www.ynetnews.com/articles/0,7340,L-4080741,00.html

Elam vs Frost: Round 4

Frost_25 · 3 November 2011 · Archived copy · Original

[dropcap]P[/dropcap]aul has two main arguments in his latest installment. Three, if you count that I am a shallow, self-absorbed, obfuscating chimp, among other things. Fortunately, both PUAs and MRAs agree that the correct response to inconsequential womanly histrionics is to ignore them, so I will limit myself to the first two.

On risk management, let me outsource this to a comment by Zatarra:

> "I think their failure to incorporate risk management calls irrefutable bullshit on that."
>
> I am not sure where you are getting the idea that Game does not incorporate risk management. Your initial article referenced Roissy. Did you go his site and search for anything on risk management. I did.
>
> http://heartiste.wordpress.com/2009/10/19/repeal-the-imbra-now/
>
> http://heartiste.wordpress.com/?s=false+rape
>
> http://heartiste.wordpress.com/2011/09/22/the-anti-false-rape-accusation-campaign/
>
> http://heartiste.wordpress.com/2009/09/26/film-your-bangs/
>
> http://heartiste.wordpress.com/2011/07/13/potential-rapist-syndrome/
>
> http://heartiste.wordpress.com/2011/06/22/a-blatant-case-of-sex-discrimination-in-the-law/
>
> http://heartiste.wordpress.com/2010/05/13/spinsterhood-bastard-children-are-our-future/
>
> http://heartiste.wordpress.com/2009/10/21/the-beta-crisis-of-american-men-marrying-older-women/
>
> There are so many more. It took me three minutes to find these.

Incidentally, here's my April Fool's post, and follow up. Not only do I warn my readers about the dangers of marriage, I do it with style. The truth is that the majority of the Game blogs – certainly those on trial here, i.e. the one you specifically called out, and the one whose author you accepted a debate with – are well aware of the risks that the current environment poses to sexually active men.

The second point Paul makes is that his teachings on the arts of seduction are an effective substitute for reading the likes of Roissy. From yesterday's post:

> "To the contrary, AVfM is very much interested in improving relationships with women …. by advocating for their uncompromised and unambiguous accountability in matters personal.
>
> That insistence on personal accountability goes a long way toward improving relationships in my own life, with men and women alike. It helps me maintain peace of mind, eliminates most drama and risk, and has never cost me a piece of ass that I wanted. Rather it enhances the quality of all people I choose to associate with because I screen out the dead weight early on, before they can cause real problems or simply suck up time out of my life that I will never get back."

I agree with this. Our culture teaches young men to accept illogical, unreasonable women as a fact of life. Men should refuse to accept that.

But is this advice (plus, of course, take a shower) sufficient for young men today, navigating the treacherous waters of sex and dating in a poisonous society, culture and legal system?

*

Paul, let me tell you what it's like to be a young man today.

Women's sexual liberation has turned the sexual marketplace into a winner-take-all jungle, and we have been dropped into this quagmire dick-first. The problem is compounded by our culture's demonization of healthy masculine values, and the viciously anti-male bias in our social norms and justice system.

Some men will consider this world and say, "No Thanks." Hence, the herbivores, coming soon en masse to a continent near you.

As for the rest of us, we need to learn how to meet, seduce, and have fulfilling relationships with women.

Yes, I realize we don't need sex and companionship, in the same way we need food and oxygen. But we desperately want it. The desire is woven into our genes more tightly than any other. Some young men who choose a life of celibacy will claim to not feel this desire. Most are lying to themselves. The rest need to get their testosterone levels checked.

For the 95% of men who choose a life that involves the pursuit of women, the challenge they face is far greater than Elam, Alek, and their occasional echoers will admit. They want to tell you, their readers, that you don't need Game. Take a shower. Stand next to women. No further discussion needed.

Perhaps this advice, combined with a simple introduction, is sufficient for a decent-looking man, with some degree of social savvy, to get laid. I grant, there are women for whom Shower Game will suffice.

But 'getting laid' is not a binary value. In a healthy man's mind, there is more to life than just 'getting laid' and 'not getting laid.' Do I want to get my dick wet? Sure. But that's not all:

[unordered_list style="arrow"]

- I want to consistently have one-night stands with extraordinarily beautiful, smart and interesting women.
- I want to consistently be in relationships with beautiful, brilliant, kind, sweet, generous women.
- Eventually, I want to find the most incredible woman I've ever met in my life, and I want to have children with her.

[/unordered_list]

Individually, these are all bold and challenging goals. Combined, they strain the boundaries of reality. Less than one-tenth of one-percent of men can honestly claim to have achieved the life that I desire. I have unashamedly set my sights on being the sort of man who can literally take his pick of women.

While pursuing this life, I also want to avoid the dangers endemic to being a man in the 21st century western world. Divorce theft. FRAs. Crazy girls poisoning my dog or cutting my dick off in my sleep.

So you see, the men of my generation have a lot to learn. We have our work cut out for us. This is especially the case if we want to limit your relationships to the cream of the crop – the most attractive, smartest, sweetest, most trust-worthy women in the United States. Paul, have you seen the women in this country? The number that are bangable, let alone dateable, is not great. And I'm competing with every non-dumpster-diving man for those select few.

Fortunately, I've found a few resources that have helped provide a little light on this dark path. Roosh offers simple, natural-feeling examples of how he meets and seduces women. Roissy has introduced an entire generation of young men to Red Pill ideas by interspersing them within practical advice on the nuts and bolts of seduction, and occasional musings on the inevitable downfall of western civilization. Dagonet, FFY, and Gmac write about their lives and experiences, not as a professor lectures his students, but rather as young men swapping war stories. I write about game and sexual politics partly because it interests me, but also because learning how to have fulfilling relationships with women is an important priority to the vast majority of healthy young men.

These men, like me, want to acquire whatever tools they can to improve their fortunes with women. That's what Game is. That's how we define it. If you would rather score points on some fictionalized caricature of the seduction community that turns its members into effeminate hipsters, prostrates itself before women, sells overpriced seminars, and values pussy as the one and only worthy goal in life, go pick a fight with them. As it stands, you called out Roissy, and you're debating me. So let me tell you a little bit about the community we're a part of:

1) We write about Game

There is no upper limit to how successful a man can be with women. Paul, has your ambition hit its limit at the woman with whom you are currently in a relationship? Non-celibate commenters, can you honestly look in the mirror and tell yourself that you don't want more and better? I can't. No one I've linked to can. We are addicted to becoming better versions of ourselves, and we will hopefully not rest while our hearts still beat.

2) We write about Game as one facet of a general commitment to self-improvement and better living

It's actually somewhat ironic that I wound up carrying the 'Gamer' torch in this debate, since only about one-fifth of my posts are Game-related. The rest is about Paleolithic nutrition, personal finance and career choices, productivity and focus, and finding meaning in a world that doesn't seem to have a lot of it.

As a man who is ruthlessly dedicated to discipline and conscious living in every other aspect of his life, I see no reason to make an exception for my relationships with women. I'll say it again: Having my pick of women to have sex and relationships with is vitally important in my life. Is this because of my ego? A bit. Because society has conditioned me? I can't disprove that. But the overwhelming impetus behind my desire to bang hot women is that it's encoded in my DNA.

Among virtually every man my age, this is an enduring and unchangeable fact of life. Nor would I change it, if I could. As men, we love sex, we love women, and we love that we love sex and women. To deny it would be to live a fraction of life. Does that make me pussy-centric? Well Paul, I guess I'm just pussy-centric.

*

In the interest of moving this conversation forward, I hope you can grant me this premise: Seducing high-quality women is not easy. The vast majority of men in the world would like to do it, but they cannot. Maybe it's easy for you and many of your commenters (although as a general rule, I take internet tough-guys' claims to sexual prowess with a shaker of salt). But it's not easy for the vast majority of men. Those of you in the live viewing audience, don't take my word for it – just look around you in the real world. Sleeping with 9s and 10s on a regular basis is difficult.

Now, on top of that challenge, the men of my generation must contend with the very real issues that A Voice For Men focuses on. The legal reality of marriage. False rape and sexual harassment charges. The poisonous effects of unchecked anti-male bias of our pop culture and education system.

This is the world that I live in. This is the world that the young men of my generation are trying to understand. We desperately need guidance, advice, leadership.

We need a hell of a lot more than "just take a shower." If Shower Game is the best that A Voice For Men can do, than the question is closed. Young men need a better source of information about women and dating. The Roissysphere is it.

Power Lines

B.R. Merrick · 3 November 2011 · Archived copy · Original

[dropcap]I[/dropcap] get all weird about my music, and save certain pieces of music for certain times of the year when they are not necessarily meant to be seasonal. Such is the case with Stravinsky's The Fairy's Kiss (stop laughing). I like to play it first snowfall. (I absolutely love the wild string climax of the Danse suisse.)

Bizarrely, I got my chance this year on October 29, the day before the day for pre-Halloween hijinks. It started in the morning, when I wanted to do errands, and it didn't stop until sometime Sunday. Consequently no errands got done, we were all snowed in, and once my neighbors and I were all nice and snuggly, the heavy snow knocked out power.

This happens a lot throughout the year where I live, so I'm used to it. Now that the juice was dried up in my neighborhood once more, I found myself griping about exactly how long it ought to take, here in the 21st century, to get the damn power back on.

On the other hand, Saturday night was absolutely gorgeous, and, of course, the snow was still falling. Everything was white, so much so that the ground illuminated the snowy sky, and since no one had any electricity, everything outside was eerily silent. Perfect walking conditions with Stravinsky as a companion. That's when I discovered that plenty of people on the other side of the hill had power, so why on earth was it taking so long for our side?

This dragged into Sunday, after a cold night in bed with a ski cap on my head, where a trip to a local hardware store revealed that they were completely out of propane tanks, and various other people who hadn't bothered to check the weather (honestly, it's too early for this) were contemplating various portable heaters. A store full of grasshoppers.

[image]Boredom gave me the excuse to drive around a bit more on Monday as I decided not to go into work, imagining the rush hour traffic in the middle of all of this. That's when I saw that my neighbors may have had power, but two days after losing electricity, plenty of other isolated spots would probably go for a few more days at least. Trees with their autumn colors still attached are much heavier after a foot of snow. Trunks and boughs had fallen onto billboards and guardrails, and massive power lines were down, strewn about all over. Somebody needed to do something about it, for sure.

You can guess the rest, can't you? I feel like getting all sarcastic and feigning rapture of seeing so many women who have overcome The Patriarchy up there in the cherry pickers, sawing away at hefty tree limbs with their hardhats, each of them steeped in the pedagogy of feminism. But what's the point? Besides, it would detract from one of the main purposes of this article: to reveal yet two more of my premises.

I try to keep my premises few and simple: coercion is death; desire is the mother of necessity; blah, blah blah. Well, the Hanna Rosin crowd isn't going to like this one, so no more cracks about the agony of cracked nails when gainfully employed in a cherry picker, inches away from being electrocuted to death. Here're two premises to try and choke down:

There will be no freedom without men. There will be no freedom without a circle of men. In order for freedom to truly thrive, that circle must be voluntary.

"Blue collar" men are the backbone of civilization.

Notice that both premises don't mention women. This, believe it or not, is not a dig, and since I no longer believe in superior vs. inferior, it is not an implication of female inferiority or servitude.

That first premise also does not mean that there are not fantastic women out there who stand, in their own unique and feminine ways, for freedom, one of four principles that I believe are requisite for life (another premise not yet hammered out). Therefore, you can certainly find, without very much effort, women who know what freedom is about, and who can inspire you.

Furthermore, I put “blue collar” in quotes for the latter premise because I have come to believe that the designations of “white collar” and “blue collar” are ways of separating men into unnecessary categories. It is also my belief that these terms are a direct result of the building of empire, which I despise. I do not, however, despise what either category of male does. I’m just glad they do. You can find “white collar” men who change the oil, and you can find “blue collar” men with strong business sense, after running their own businesses for years at a time.

So it’s been a weekend of traffic cones, cops redirecting, power lines snaking around, hard-hatted (and probably hard-headed) men in reflective vests pulling tree limbs out of the way, and dolts like me sitting with blankets wrapped around our bodies, staring out into the white abyss. No shower for two and a half days (I couldn’t even get to my gym to use theirs, and I don’t think they had power, either); no Fake TV; no bright light when the sun went down; charging my Stravinsky-laden iPod in the car (where it’s warm!); layers of clothing; no light by which to read; no cooking; no refrigeration; no…

You get the idea. Ms. Rosin undoubtedly doesn’t, even when she acknowledges that “[t]he worst-hit industries were overwhelmingly male and deeply identified with macho: construction, manufacturing, high finance [High finance is ‘macho’?].” Therefore, let me try to explain.

[image]Ms. Rosin and I only get power when a man who figured it out gets the power to us. Without it, our modern lives die quite quickly. A power outage like this last one is annoying, but only less than disturbing because both Ms. Rosin and I know that it’s going to come back on any minute now, even when one power line after another has been severed by a snow-heavy limb. Not only do these guys know how to deliver electricity to your door, they also know how to keep it suspended on those poles for years at a time without being severed, so that electricity is literally commanded at painted, feminine fingertips with the flick of a switch. When that fails, they put it up again and cross their unpainted fingers that the lines will stay in place this time.

As I type this, it’s still going on. It’s dark out now, and most of the snow is gone, but it’s still wet and cold outside. Traffic is speeding past most of these men, with mere common courtesy preventing collisions. They are no doubt earning overtime, but it’s overtime with the threat of electrocution, and with poorer souls than I still wrapped in blankets. It’s a complicated system of cooperation as well, and needs to be taken quite seriously by all the men involved. Furthermore, it’s happening only two months after a nasty hurricane and subsequent rainfall caused flooding in many of the same areas, requiring much the same effort from the same guys. Everything those wires are touching is still wet, including the men, whose end Ms. Rosin and her disciples seem not to fear all that much.

Well, I am now witness to what will happen when the two above premises are not taken into account, and it ain’t pretty. If these men end, so does the civilization upon which I have come to rely, and of which I have grown quite fond. Most of them don’t like The Fairy’s Kiss. It has less to do with the embarrassing title than it does with a lack of patience for a less popular musical genre. When you grow fonder of the more sophisticated stuff of society, I suppose it’s easier to look down on those who don’t – that is, when you still suffer from believing in superior vs. inferior.

Feminists and misandrists, indeed all those who hate, believe in inferior. When they’re made to feel inferior, they get mad. When superior rears its glorious head, they prance around and smirk. Since superior vs. inferior cannot be proven, the anger and resultant schadenfreude are ultimately meaningless. Fixing downed power lines is not. If I could do it, I’d be down there right now instead of typing. Instead, I just get out of the way, which is, I’m sure, what the men who fix it prefer.

Modern civilization’s foundations were laid long before second or third wave feminism came along, when roles for men and women were more rigid and, for the most part, openly accepted. I’m not in favor of rigid sex roles, or rigid roles of any kind, but most of that civilization required a great deal more muscle, which men seem to have in far greater quantities than women. Therefore, it naturally follows that everyone in society would be more willing to leave it to men to get the heavy work done, and there always seems to be a lot of heavy work to do in order to maintain it. When the empire chose to go to war in the 40s, they made a big deal about how women could do the work of men in the factories, and they were right. When the machines you’re operating can lift that much more than the world's strongest man possibly could, hell, you could put me in the driver's seat.

So, ladies, why aren't you up in the cherry pickers? Why aren't you out there right now with hard hats and reflective vests? I'm not calling you lazy. Hell, no. I know plenty of hard-working women, but they do have a tendency to gravitate to different work, something Rosin also admits.

[image]That's fine, but please understand where the foundational work of maintaining civilization lies. It does not lie in a snooty university position. I know the difference. I spent years studying snooty classical music, and I still listen to it as if I'm studying it (which informally I am). Unlike Ms. Rosin, however, I recognize that my ability to enjoy what I learn is based on the man who prints music but can't read it; the guy who puts the piano together and bangs out the bell of the trumpet with a specially designed hammer, but can't play a note; the man who works in the recording studio but doesn't know the difference between a concerto and a symphony; the man who drives the delivery truck but bores easily when Bach is played; the man who designs the music download but prefers grunge; the man who sets up my Internet connection but wouldn't know Ravel from a hole in the ground; the guy who stands in a cherry picker seconds away at all times from his potential demise, but gets ants in his pants when I go on too long about obscure composers from places in Europe he's never even heard of; and all the rest.

It's called division of labor, which is based on division of interest. A lot of these guys (outside and working right now as I type) are fascinated by car engines. I'm not. Based on what little I know, it seems that cars have about as many different parts as the human body, and just as incomprehensible to me. Whenever I go to the doctor or the mechanic with a complaint, I'm always hearing about a part I never even knew about. (PCM board? …How much?!) The empire has regulated health care to the extent that the position of medical doctor is near to God (so the ladies should go for it!), while mechanics, less regulated, get to work in the dirt polishing their people skills with angry and ungrateful customers like Ms. Rosin who don't understand why the doohickey isn't working properly, for a whole lot less money (so the ladies can… do whatever).

The end of these men is the end of us. It's the end of everything that makes life enjoyable. You have no idea how many basic, ordinary, pleasant, everyday activities are tied directly to your ability to use and abuse electrical power, until, like this last weekend, it's too late. Please tell me, Ms. Rosin, or any one of your millions of admirers, what is your plan if these guys ever shrug? Who will mix and pour the concrete? Who will erect the steel columns? Who will put up the drywall? Who will run the wiring? Who's going to do the plumbing? Who's going to install the heating vents, the boiler, and the furnace? Who's going to hang up the wires on the poles? Who's going to put the poles in the ground first? (Always remember those last two in the correct order, guys.)

Here's something even worse to contemplate, in a day and age where, if I'm the kind of guy a local government doesn't like, I can be accused falsely of rape even if I'm using an ATM at the time alleged: who is going to continue to denigrate the sex shared by each of these misunderstood creatures? Millions of people countrywide honored firemen after September 11, 2001, and millions still do, but only because so many of them were killed in the process of trying to do what was expected of them. Where are the millions or even the thousands in my area honoring the men who are, as I continue to type, trying to reconnect those same souls to their precious, modern lives? Or will we only honor one of them if he makes that fatal mistake?

We can only hope that the collective ability of one group of men to conceive, design, create, and connect us all through the Internet will soon spell the end of the rhetoric currently espoused and enjoyed by misandric feminists like Ms. Rosin. They don't see their hatred, I'm sure. Rosin herself would probably protest that she "loves" her husband very much, so how could she be considered a misandrist?

To be fair, I think she sort of gets it with some of the data gathering, but then it's all about Gr-r-r-l Power! in the very next sentence. It has to do with the smugness she embodies, of having won some sort of friendly competition with men. One snowstorm can remind you of something far more serious and sinister. I think it's tied to a specific part of misandry having to do with men's supposed disposability, like negro slaves, and she probably doesn't even know it, because feminism has spent a great deal of time proclaiming the reverse.

Men are expected to cease and desist all sexual seduction, but are made to tolerate female interviewers in their locker rooms. Men are expected to never be violent in their personal lives, even in self defense, but they are made to exact violent vengeance over those outside the community who are undesirable. Men are expected, as boys, to sit and be lectured to all day by females like Ms. Rosin, but when they grow up, it is suddenly demanded that they "man up," take charge, lead, inspire, and produce, as long as they leave room for women who are "oppressed" to do the same, and only when those "oppressed" women feel like it.

Finally, and perhaps most sickening, according to Ms. Rosin, men are expected to laugh along with her as she talks about their collective end, all the while she insists that they set up the microphones and all the audio-visual for her tightly wound performance, and distribute her writings and speakings far and wide via the technology that men largely create and maintain. Much of her blather is available only because we have power lines, and we only have them because men who are ignored and dismissed as dim know how to negotiate tree limbs with cherry pickers. There is not a single thing emanating from feminism to compare with that achievement: a sprawling, worldwide network that is maintained on an ongoing basis by men who are apparently designed merely to be ridiculed and diminished, or, at best, recipients of a passing remark of concern, as if the problem will be fixed just as soon as the lights are turned back on. It won't.

I'll remind the reader once more that the work is going on outside, just a mile or so from where I live, as I type. Somewhere in this world, on the evening of Rosin's lecture at TED, the same thing was happening somewhere else, to the delight and earnest hope of countless men, women, boys, and girls, huddled around candles and waiting. Thank the high heavens for men in cherry pickers, men who ought never to see an end in sight.

Elam vs Frost: Round 5

Paul Elam · 4 November 2011 · Archived copy · Original

…

…

OK, it's time for my final say in this debate, and thanks to Frost I have the perfect lead in to the note on which I wanted to end my part. But first, a couple of brief items of house cleaning.

> "I think their failure to incorporate risk management calls irrefutable bullshit on that."
>
> I am not sure where you are getting the idea that Game does not incorporate risk management. Your initial article referenced Roissy. Did you go his site and search for anything on risk management. I did.
>
> http://heartiste.wordpress.com/2009/10/19/repeal-the-imbra-now/
>
> http://heartiste.wordpress.com/?s=false+rape
>
> http://heartiste.wordpress.com/2011/09/22/the-anti-false-rape-accusation-campaign/
>
> http://heartiste.wordpress.com/2009/09/26/film-your-bangs/
>
> http://heartiste.wordpress.com/2011/07/13/potential-rapist-syndrome/
>
> http://heartiste.wordpress.com/2011/06/22/a-blatant-case-of-sex-discrimination-in-the-law/
>
> http://heartiste.wordpress.com/2010/05/13/spinsterhood-bastard-children-are-our-future/
>
> http://heartiste.wordpress.com/2009/10/21/the-beta-crisis-of-american-men-marrying-older-women/
>
> There are so many more. It took me three minutes to find these.

I have already addressed this in the comments, but it is worth a little expansion. If you want to understand the impact of literature, then look at the cultural norms that are commonly demonstrated by people who follow it. In other words, don't take anyone's word for what they say they believe in, watch what they actually do.

You want to know what this site is about? Skip over our mission statement and look through the entire body of literature and comments. You will see the prevailing ideas and mentality expressed consistently. The proof, as they say, is in the pudding.

Klansmen will tell you they are not racist, and give you some examples to back it up. What does their actual, consistently expressed worldview tell you? Women will tell you they love sensitive men who are in touch with their feelings (pause to laugh). Feminists will tell you they don't hate men (laugh harder), that they have brothers and fathers and sons*, just like Hanna Rosin*. Is she a misandrist? Bet your ass on it. Watch what she does.

Read through the comments on any Game site, as well as the vast preponderance of the articles posted. What you will find is pussy centric redundancy and little else. Lip service to risk management doesn't count unless you can prove that it serves to influence the culture and shape the overall message.

Note, I am not making a value judgment on pussy centrism (though perhaps a judgment about the wisdom in it). Getting laid is normal and healthy. I am just saying pussy centrism is what it is, and all you have to do is some reading to prove it.

The same applies here, both in regards to this "debate" (in the form of Frosts goals and objectives) and what has transpired in the comments.

With NAAGPUAALT stipulated, two of the most active proponents for Game in this discussion both present with the most sociopathic mentality I have even seen on the pages of this forum. Ever. That is not to say that Game/PUA culture is driven by psychopathology, but I do suspect that sociopaths are the ones driving the economic ends.

We have been informed by supporters in this debate that all relationships are based on dominating someone; that if a man is attacked with false rape claim, he must not have done “it” right.

And these are the worldviews that some MRA’s see as the natural co-partner to men’s activism? Ah, dude, whatever.

I also note a great deal of desperation in the dissent, most blatantly in the attempt to paint anyone anti-game as pro-celibacy. Frost has used this particular canard as a crutch throughout his presentation. We see it echoed in the comments and indeed Donlak carried it over to his blog, fitting a pattern of over-the-top-reactions that have characterized the Game/PUA reps here.

It’s a reaction reading somewhat like a conversation with Andrew Dice Clay.

[box type=”alert” icon=”none”]MRA: Getting laid, in these times, requires some caution on the part of men.[/box]

[box type=”note” icon=”none”]Gamebot: You are asking me to be celibate. Whoa![/box]

[box type=”alert” icon=”none”]MRA: No, I am saying that the mindless pursuit of as much pussy as possible without regard to possible consequences is probably a bad idea.[/box]

[box type=”note” icon=”none”]Gamebot: You’re saying that getting laid is bad. Ohh![/box]

Again, as I said in the beginning, not much to work with there. But it does bring me to what I think is the core of what actually needs to be addressed. That would be risk assessment and, just as importantly, how we regard and address the role of healthy sexuality of young men in MRM literature, at least this corner of it.

What comes out most clear for me in this debate is that despite some articles hoisted up as a façade, the Game community is lacking in the concept of risk aversion and it is centered on pleasing women, routinely by the surrender of personal integrity.

No Dan, we are not just talking shoes and beards here, and you know it.

It is also clear that there is a sociopathic flavor, at the very least in what I have read here and several places elsewhere, in the Game/PUA community. Whether that is an artifact of youth, or of the commercial roots of that community, I don’t know. But I do know that sociopaths get others to take risks, or profit from their risk taking, and that is of concern here as well.

GL Piggy has launched his own personal invasion of my inbox, kind of like a rabid chip monk stalker with a crank habit, demanding that I document precise levels of risk for young men with regards to false rape claims, etc.

I can’t do it. Nor can anyone else document any such thing. What he is asking for is tantamount to telling young men to sit in a river in Australia covered in chicken guts and demand documentation on the possibility of a croc attack before exiting the water, or even washing off the chicken guts.

Needless to say, the risks of relationships are not contained to false rape claims, paternity fraud, divorce theft, emotional, psychological and physical abuse, PAS, jail, poverty, depression, suicide, homicide or any number of other potential pitfalls. We just know this shit happens with enough frequency to fuel an emerging social movement. So I suppose it is a judgment call on whether we should encourage young men to consider all this, develop real tools to spot troubled personalities in advance, etc., or whether to yield to Piggy’s conclusion that this is all just histrionics that we should ignore as we traipse off into Vaginaland. My judgment favors caution and thoughtfulness.

But on that point is where I have to admit that the MRM has failed younger men. I know for a fact that I have, and I think this debate drove that home to me. Actually Frost, you did.

You were right about one thing for sure. While I don’t agree with every aspect of how you characterize the world of young men, I completely agree that you guys got no less than a shit deal. Two full generations men before you that completely failed to tackle the forces that left you with no avenue but a life of self-indulgence, where ambition is defined only in short term goals and instant gratification.

I am not being patronizing. I mean that literally. In fact, I wrote about it some time ago in The Plague of Modern Masculinity. It's lengthy and verbose, but I think it describes what happened to you, and who did it to you, effectively, in my opinion.

You come from a fatherless world, Frost. I am not talking about whether your father in particular was involved in your life. But I would bet (and no, GL, I don't have the Harvard study handy) that most all the young men in lifestyle Game or PUA had absent or systemically marginalized fathers. Even young men who have their fathers are impacted greatly by fatherless culture because of the kinds of social forces that culture creates.

And this addresses what I think is the real disconnect between us. I mean, no, I don't ever see the day that Game or PUA will be a part of what AVfM does, or that we will ever acknowledge it as a viable part of the MRM. But the fact is, funny as it may seem to you, the demographics of this site don't reflect a group much older than yours.

This from Alexa regarding AVfM:

"Compared with all internet users, this site's users tend to browse from school, and they are disproportionately childless men aged under 25 and 35–45."

With our level of traffic here, that is a boatload of young men emerging from fatherless culture.

The question I need to take out of this is "What is AVfM doing for them?" Other than the activism we do on their behalf, it is quite frankly hard to answer, except to say "not enough." I am real clear that we can't and won't provide a platform for men to get and use tools for a lifestyle of fucking increasing numbers of good looking women. But of course the answer is neither for me or anyone else here to simply and solely lecture them either.

If I were 25 I would not trust a fucking word out of the mouth of a man my age, and for good reason. I don't think that the generation of men before Frost, my generation, have done anything more than stand by as these young men were thrown to the wolves.

It is fair and correct to impugn the "manipulate, shape-shift and fuck your way to success" drivel posited by the Game/PUA ideologues. What is not fair is to condemn these things without offering a viable alternative or acknowledge how things got so fucked up. Which is to say that AVfM, Paul Elam specifically, has thus far failed.

In my visceral, virtually autonomic aversion to suggesting how anyone should define manhood, I have neglected, in the course of this movement, and in the history of this website, to adequately address what I think of inherently worthwhile human values. I know, these kinds of words are like fingernails on a chalkboard to moral relativists. But they are still part of who I am, and they have been neglected.

In The Plague, the very article that introduced and coined the term "Zeta Male," I addressed this. In fact, I closed with the following:

> He doesn't seek power, but justice. And he has one overarching feature largely absent in the world around him. He cares about those lost young men who were ambushed coming out of the womb. And he will strive to make himself an example, living proof that there are other roads to take than the ones that lead to self-hatred and self-destruction.

Keep in mind here that when I said "self-hatred and self-destruction," I was not referring to Game or PUA. Rather I was talking about the effects of being abandoned by the men who came before them and the influence of the men who took their place; Kimmel, Kilmartin, Smiler, et al.

And I do believe that by trying to seek justice and trying to help men who have been ambushed and destroyed by feminist governance, that I have set an example. So do all the men and women who write here, I am proud to say.

But I also see clearly that in my distaste for the sociopathic mentality that drives Game/PUA, and that emerged during the course of this debate, I did not keep my own words enough in mind. That failure, which failed the young readership of this site, is one for which I have to take responsibility, and for which I have to take action.

I can't do that by tacking on a lecture about values, and the value of values, on this post. That would be pointless.

Frost and other young men like him are struggling for significance in a world that now regards them as disposable pack animals and criminals; unfit to be educated, employed, given rights or cared for. Are they struggling against that in a way that will ultimately work for them? Obviously not. In fact, I think they are being led to undermine the only kind of skills development that will ever make a difference for them. In short, they are being Gamed into developmental stagnancy by the most revered and rent seeking among them.

Now my message here, and my personal lesson, is more complete. I will continue, indeed intensify my efforts to reach younger men with the message that there is an alternative to misandric culture, and that it isn't in the self-hating path of feminism, or waiting for them between the legs of a woman. That won't be easy. It's hard to compete with endless supplies of "quality" pussy.

But I will do my best to remember that these young men are the dysfunctional results of being hated, not the hate itself. And I will be more mindful that time spent pointing at their wounds would be better spent trying to do something about them.

In the meantime, I will do what I think is integral to any idea of success that I ever thought was worthwhile. I will look inward and constantly seek to measure what I know to be my values, one of them being a premium on justice, against what I actually do in life. And right now there is a lot of work to do.

$1,000.00 reward for real identity of Vliet Tiptree

Paul Elam and John the Other · 4 November 2011 · Archived copy · Original [dropcap]D[/dropcap]uring the recent flurry of activity around the debate, which will thankfully end in two days, JtO and I have scheduled a vigorous round of activism regarding CafeMom and the pro-misandry, pro-violence, pro-sexual mutilation blogging in that forum. We will be following through with that beginning on Sunday.

But as times would have it, we have come upon an even more egregious example of bigotry from another feminist blogger. In fact, this one makes Nicole Fabian-Weber quickly pale into insignificance (though we are not done with her).

Some of you have undoubtedly already heard of what is going on at a blog called Radfem Hub, a Radical Feminist Collective Blog. Up on that site right now, by a writer calling herself Vliet Tiptree, is nothing less than a fledgling manifesto calling for extermination of half the human race; the male half, that is. Oh, and she has a plan. A real plan.

I am linking you to the blog post here (read it very carefully), but the short of it is that Tiptree is advocating premeditated and orchestrated violent destruction of men and boys in purely Hitleresque fashion. In her call to action, she seeks "resolution" as compared to the better known term "final solution." She, and I must admit with some skill, skirts around specifics that would justify her immediate arrest for conspiracy, but the intent is more than crystal clear.

After taking her readers through accounts of what she cites as justifiable criminal acts by women in the name of suffrage, and invoking the extremes in rationale of ideologues like Sheila Jeffrys, she lays down a significant bombshell. To wit:

> Our Emphasis on Fundamental Change. We have moved beyond palliation (negotiation, mediation, reform, compromise, engagement with the System) to exploring effective means of extirpating male pathology, including being open to biological explanations and treatment of such psychopathy. We are concerned with the overall structure of male oppression. We are open to going wherever the evidence and experience lead us.

And then she closes the diatribe with this particular nugget

> As to what that cure may be, my best bet is that what's wrong with men is that their androgens need genetic modification. I'm serious about this. If we can do it with corn, men ought to be easy.

Apparently her writing had the intended effect. Take a look at this comment that appeared under her post. And you might want to look at the others as well.

[image]
Click to enlarge
Also, another feminist blogger has taken a liking to her virulent message. She goes by Sargasso Sea, and has a blog bearing the interesting name, Radical Resolution.

The comments on her blog are equally riddled with sadistic, pro-violence sentiments. Even more, it is clear from the ideas expressed in her post that she has intentions to network this through the internet with other radicals of similar mentality and to exploit their connections to feminist ideologues already placed within the standing establishment power structure. In short, this is, while quite insane, laid out within a strategic plan. There is nothing satirical about it.

The time for analysis of this growing problem is over and the time to take serious action on it commences immediately. Therefore, AVfM is now offering a $1,000.00 cash award (or donate it to the charity of your choice) to whoever can provide us with verifiable information of Vliet Tiptrees real identity, including her name, residential address, place and address of employment, name of spouse if applicable, and images and any other information that may be used to bring her identity and location into public view.

Those seeking to claim the reward will be aware that Vliet Tiptree's real world identity and all available personal information will be posted to this site and otherwise distributed on the internet. Additionally, AVfM will print posters that contain real her name, image, online identity, quotes and the factual declaration that she is a threat to her community. We will also work with other MRA's close enough to her location to distribute those posters directly in her residential neighborhood and at her place of employment if applicable.

If no MRA's are available in her area, we will travel wherever she is to execute the plan.

In order to support this effort we are asking MRA's for pledges of financial backing. What that essentially means is if you want to support this effort, just post that here, or email me with the specific dollar amount of your pledge. We will only call in those pledges if and when we confirm that information received is accurate and valid. I am not comfortable committing funds already donated to this site for general operations, so I will personally incur any expense on this that is not defrayed by specified pledges.

Regardless of the level of backing, AVfM is going through with this effort.

Please email to avoiceformen@yahoo.com or at john@johntheother.com

Harriet Harman: hatred and lies from the top down

John Hembling (JtO) · 5 November 2011 · Archived copy · Original

[dropcap]I[/dropcap]n the U.S., bigotry taking the form of racism led to the formation of a supremacist organizations which gained fame by regularly gathering members of communities for the purpose of murdering americans under cover of night. This collection of organizations is now called the Ku Klux Klan.

However, this discussion is not limited to the United States.

World wide, bigotry towards other demographics has also led to various mass killings in recent history, including as recently as the Kosovo war in which an estimated 12,000 civilians were killed. Sometimes journalists refer to instances of mass killing as genocide, other times as “crimes against humanity.” Wars are sometimes fought over territory, sometimes over whose bronze age ancestors were wrong about the creator of the universe, sometimes fought over resources. However, to render the murder of a population palatable, it is necessary to cultivate hatred, and to dehumanize them. To cultivate bigotry. This is why the category of Bigot exists as an offence on the web-site register-her.com.

[image]

Is there anything more corrosive to a civil society than pervasive bigotry? The answer agreed on by Myself and Paul Elam is corruption in public officials. Public officials either reflect the ethical standards of a society or they undermine them. They either further a better society, based on the collective ideals of the people, or they abandon those very ideals in the pursuit of power or popularity or both.

It is not naive idealism to credit official titles such as “the right Honourable” with any reflection of honour, but a recognition that a society reflects itself in it’s elected and appointed officials.

When a public official is obviously corrupt, this too reflects and shapes the culture that official represents. This is why Register-Her.com includes the category of offense of Corrupt Public Official. It is also why the corrupt bigot holding the public office of Member of Parliament for Peckham, London is now listed in the category of Corrupt Public Official. The Harriet Harman profile is available for viewing now.

Elam vs Frost: Part 6

Frost_25 · 6 November 2011 · Archived copy · Original

[dropcap]T[/dropcap]his will be my final installment in this debate. Before I begin, I want to commend Mr. Elam for his willingness to defend his ideas in an open forum, and thank him taking part in the conversation.

It may not feel like it, but we're making progress. For example, Paul has conceded that:

1) Game is a useful tool for men who would like to increase the options available to them in their sex lives. As Paul himself wrote in a comment on the original Chateau Bullshit post: "but one caveat that can't be ignored. The tactics these guys employ work. Maybe not with you, but with lots and lots of women. I was not arguing that they would fail, just that it isn't worth it."

2) Young men are in desperate need of guidance and instruction in the modern dating market.

For my part, I will grant that many valid criticisms of the wider seduction community have also been made. There are a lot of posers selling overpriced bullshit. Most tactics really aren't that important, once you achieve a basic level of social competence. The seduction community really does contain men who are obsessed with the pursuit of women above all else, and who need to be told that they'll live more fulfilling lives if they broaden their horizons.

All of these criticisms apply to a segment of the seduction community that is generally unaffiliated with Roissy, myself, Chuck, Gmac, Donlak, and the circles we run in. But at least, the caricature Paul seems to imagine for us is not a complete hallucination.

I'm curious though – since the Roissysphere is far and away the most MRA-friendly and risk-conscious segment of the wider seduction community, why attack it? Why not write a post saying, "The seduction community is a bunch of bullshit, but if you must read blogs about picking up women, here are a few Game bloggers who, 1) Are aware of MRA issues, and 2) Aren't trying to sell you thousand-dollar seminars. I still think they're wrong about X, Y and Z, but they're the best of a bad lot."

I have my theories as to why many in the MRM are so hostile towards the seduction community, but I won't go into them here. Perhaps some time in the future.

*

In any case, I'm going to shift gears in this final post. Until now, I've been arguing the pro-Game position on a purely personal level. To summarize: Men should learn how to improve their relationships with women, and tune out the voices of men who've given up in life, and wish for you to share in their misery. Call it something other than Game, if you're allergic to the word, but learning how to approach and seduce women is one of the most essential skills a man can have in life. And it can be learned.

Like I said, Paul seems to agree with all this. Still, we seem to be talking past each other.

As those who read my blog know, I primarily write about self-improvement. I focus on how to become a better man for selfish, personal reasons. My blog is very rarely political in nature. Not overtly, at least.

Paul on the other hand is an activist. I'm sure he wants you to become a better man. But his primary focus is on achieving legal, political and institutional change.

So today I want to engage Paul on his own territory. I want to discuss Game, not as a tool for personal success and better living, but as a tactic in the MRM arsenal in the fight against feminism and misandry.

Let's start with a bold claim.

Game is the key to male empowerment in the western world. The ground-level war against feminism and misandry will be won by the seduction community.

There are two fronts on which the Men's Rights Movement must fight: On the public front, they must fight the political, legal and cultural force that perpetuate misandry. But they also must convince individual men to make better choices in their personal lives.

What is the long-term solution to divorce theft, for example? Well, obviously we would like to see the family law system gutted and replaced by something moral, sane and fair. That's not going to happen overnight though. Until then, we need to tell men: Don't enter into legal marriage lightly, if at all.

Perhaps one day the penalty for a false rape accusation will be equal to the penalty for rape. Until then, we need to tell men: If a drunk bipolar girl with a personal history of deceit, drama and manipulation wants to bang you, maybe you should think twice.

More broadly, American men need to stop being such complete and utter pussies in their personal dealings with women. They need to:

– Stop accepting poor behaviour from crazy girls

– Stop encouraging fat chicks by banging them

– Stop letting their women be the men in their relationships

– Have expectations, and enough pride in themselves to walk away from women who don't meet them

– Stop spending their entire lives supplicating to women in exchange for sex, i.e. by paying for expensive dates, presents, vacations, and so on

To win these small battles, men need to have power in their relationships with women. They need options, so they can walk away from women and behaviour that they don't approve of.

Over the past half-century, men have been taught to cede control of all the power they have in their personal relationships with women. They have been trained to continue upholding their side of the social contract, while women have been told that any expectation for them to do the same is oppression, pure and simple. The Roissysphere is the solution to this imbalance. We are teaching men that it's OK to be a cad, it's OK to be selfish, and it's OK to pursue your own wants and needs in the world.

The result will be the breakdown of the sexual marketplace. Feminism is not a self-sustaining entity. It is a parasite, and it requires 'good guys' to feed on. Game is the Red Pill that is turning good (i.e. obedient and self-sacrificing) men bad.

The bigger legal, political and cultural fights are important. But the battle is also being fought in the kitchens, bedrooms, dinner tables, and yes, barroom dance floors of our society every day. Western men will never stand up to feminism politically, until we have learned to stand against it personally.

By far the most amusing argument I've seen used against Game over the course of this debate is that practitioners of the crimson arts are inherently supplicative towards women. Several commenters seem to be under the impression that 'Gamers' achieve their carnal goals by caving in to what women want, jumping through hoops for them, and generally betraying their manly dignity for a taste of some sweet, sweet pussy. The reality is that nothing could be further from the truth.

As anyone remotely familiar with the discipline knows, a man who has properly learned and applied Game will be far less supplicative in his dealings with women than he was before. An attractive man is dominant. He is in control. He is the master of his fate, and his woman's. Consider this story of a man who used Game to reassert his dominance in his marriage:

> "I got married young, and simply did not understand anything about game, or the benefits of assertive masculinity. I put my wife on a pedestal and spent 7 years or so of a very contentious, walking on egg-shell type of relationship that teetered towards divorce more than a few times.

> I discovered PUA/Game sites like this one a few years ago, and after a bit of reading on shit tests, and the subconscious mating desires of females, I began to "run game" on my wife.
>
> The transformation of our relationship is astounding.
>
> Yes, she put on a good 40 lbs. a couple of years after we got married.
>
> Once I learned to game her subconscious, competitive instincts and began to plant suggestions in her mind that I was desirable to other women…she's gotten motivated and lost the weight, and her affection towards me reverted back to the way she was before got married.
>
> Once I started recognizing her shit tests and began to not just "pass them" but literally blow them up, the passive-aggressive emotionally driven conflict that had been the hallmark of our relationship has all but disappeared.
>
> We don't fight anymore.
>
> My wife, who used to grumble and complain and tell all her closest friends and family that we had a "difficult relationship with lots of problems that needs working on" now tells everyone she's happily married without blinking an eye."

His story (which goes on in more detail in the post) is extremely typical in that the result of learning Game was empowerment in his personal relationships. Game made him powerful. Thank god no one told him that Roissy was 'bullshit' before it did, or he would still be struggling through a shitty marriage, and perhaps a messy divorce.

Game empowers the men who use it on a deeper level as well. A man who is confident in his ability to consistently find and seduce women will be less likely to expose himself to risks such as marrying a pregnant hooker, because he has options. In my case, I'm probably never getting married, and I would happily walk away from a woman I loved if she refused to accept this. I can do this because I have options. I have options because I have Game. If I had neither, I would be much more likely to accept marriage and the risks it entails, because golly gee, what are the odds of another woman falling for me? Game turns regular $20k-wedding, no-prenup chumps, into Skittles Men.

The final point on which Paul and I agree, and also the most important one, is that the men of my generation need help. Millions of us are unemployed, indebted, and broke. Millions of us are fat, weak and out of shape. Millions of us are wasting away in front of computer and TV screens, letting the hours and days of our lives slip away. And yes, millions of us are completely and utterly failing to have healthy and enjoyable relationships with women. The vast majority of us want to regularly get laid. Most will eventually want to have families.

A huge number will never realize those goals, if they continue on the paths they're on.

Me and my fellow 'Gamers' are doing our best to offer the men of my generation solutions to these challenges. We haven't figured out all the answers yet. But we've figured out some. Paul does you a disservice by trying to hide you from our world.

Who's my daddy?

keyster · 7 November 2011 · Archived copy · Original

[dropcap]T[/dropcap]housands of children a year are conceived through sperm donation banks to single lesbian or heterosexual mothers and this is the question these children will inevitably ask. They always felt "outside" and as they become young adults they're certain something's wrong. As hard as the gears of the feminist propaganda machine may turn to try and convince society that fathers really don't matter, it seems that they do in a most profound way to the children of the paper cup.

"Mother?"

"Yes sweetheart"

"Who was my father?"

"You don't have a father. You have a donor."

"What's a donor?"

"He's a man who gave his sperm to a bank so mommy could bring you into the world."

"What was he like?"

"His donation profile form said he was handsome, intelligent and athletic."

"Can I hug the donation form?"

Many children who were conceived through sperm donation have a burning desire to meet and form a relationship with their biological father and they're starting to do it. Shocking, I know, that when these women decided to ante up the few hundred dollars it cost to buy some guy's ejaculated DNA who they never even met let alone had sex with, they didn't anticipate that it would matter to the child. After all, weren't we told "all that really matters is the mother"? Isn't the role of the father, besides sperm donor, rather superfluous?

Whenever we attempt any kind of social engineering there always seems to be these pesky little unintended consequences that arise. Where one problem is solved more are created that need to be solved. One such problem solver is Wendy Kramer, a single mom, who started a popular website for children who want to connect with their father, and his other children. From her website:

"The Donor Sibling Registry (DSR) was created in September 2000 by Wendy Kramer and her son Ryan. Certain that other donor offspring would have the same curiosity as Ryan about his genetic origins – yet also knowing that sadly, no public outlet existed for mutual consent contact between people born from anonymous sperm donation, this site was started as the logical next step to making those connections."

Ms. Kramer has access to a data base of sperm donors throughout the world that when the children of these men inquire she'll tell them not only who their daddy is, but they can learn all about and even meet their half-siblings. Amazingly to social engineers, she's a very busy woman with a very busy website. After all who cares about some man's sperm?

I'm Your Daddy

Funny thing, no one ever really bothered to ask who these men were that willingly relinquished their DNA so that hundreds of strange women would bore their progeny. Sperm is just sperm right? You select your "product" from the profile of an individual who seems reasonable. He might even be your soul mate on paper; tall, blond hair and blue eyes with a penchant for the arts. You buy him, I'm sorry his" bodily fluid," online, they FedEx it to your house just in time for ovulation, you go legs up with Mr. Turkey Baster and wait. (A "Love Child" this is not.) Nine months later, glory be it's a miracle! You have in your possession your very own designer baby and you didn't even need a bothersome man to be around. It's almost perfect.

The typical profile for a sperm donor, otherwise known as “the father of your child,” is that of a man down on his luck and in need of some quick cash. Being a handsome, well educated athletic specimen is atypical or not the norm; but the sperm bank doesn’t tell you that. And to offer sperm from a premium specimen it’ll take a premium price; we all know how women love to shop for bargains.

In an Independent Lens documentary, “Donor Unknown,” an in-depth look is taken at a group of siblings in search of each other and their father, known only as Donor 150. Through the donor sibling registry they find not only that he’s an actual man named Jeffrey Harrison, but they have at least a dozen actual biological brothers and sisters, that they know of. It’s a quirky mixture of elation and trepidation as they meet him and each other. They have an irresistible urge to KNOW their real family, not the pretend one feminists say is just as good.

As it turns out Jeffrey is a rather Bohemian vagabond living in an RV with his dogs and a pigeon on Venice Beach, California. By now a 50 year old beach bum with all the ambition a beach bum good ever be expected to muster, when his sperm conceived his children he was a struggling actor. He even admits at one point ejaculating into a small vile was his regular job. At $50 a shot as many as four times a week he “made enough to pay rent for 8 years”. He’s your daddy!

Defying all tenets of “social conditioning” the half-siblings of Jeffrey’s fatherhood found themselves connecting, well, like siblings! Oddly they not only had shared many of the same physical characteristics and traits, but also shared an affinity for spiritual pursuits, music and other things particular to Donor 150. They were now blessed to know who their father was and who his family was. They were blessed to be able to satiate a long and previously unfulfilled desire to know the origins of their other half as humans. They were blessed to know their father, such as he was. Not all children can say that these days.

It Takes a Sperm Bank…

…to raise a child, or at least allow a woman to go father shopping without the pesky MAN part, for the hopes of producing her dream designer human. And as for Jeffrey, if spreading your DNA among as many cows of the herd as any buck could ever hope for is a sign of alpha maleness, having fathered perhaps thousands of children, he’s an evolutionary biological winner. He’s at one with our gene pool, a harem without the “hare”.

If this creeps you out in the least little bit, it probably should. While “Donor Unknown” strains to paint a story of triumph and jubilation, the under current is one of melancholy and lacking a certain wholeness of spirit, (Jeffrey refers to his children as his “new friends”). “What’s the importance of a father? What’s the meaning of a father? What’s the absence of a father imply?” — asks one of the lesbian mothers of one of Jeffrey’s sons, “We were concerned about that.”

The fact that so many young adults are so innately driven to connect with what was once only to their mothers a donor form and vile in a FedEx package, should provide the answer to anyone’s “concern”. It’s not hip and cool to consciously raise a child without a father. It’s irresponsible and troubling.

Footnote: I realize there are heterosexual couples with infertile males that may make use of sperm banks as well as egg banks for infertile females. This is not about them as they’re in the minority of donor parents.

https://www.donorsiblingregistry.com/

http://www.donorunknown.com/film-home

http://www.cryobank.com/

Shrink4Men Radio: female stalkers

Dr. Tara J. Palmatier · 7 November 2011 · Archived copy · Original

[box type="tick" icon="none"]

Does your wife, girlfriend or ex regularly blow up your phone with needy, hostile, delusional and menacing texts, emails and voicemails?

Does your ex or a woman in whom you have no romantic interest "accidentally" turn up whenever you go out?

Are you being stalked by your ex, your girlfriend, wife or a woman you never dated, but who has developed an obsession for you nevertheless?

Do you know that men are just as likely to be the victims of stalking as women?

If you're a woman, is your partner's ex stalking you?

Do you know that many of your girlfriend's, wife's or ex's nuisance, clingy, possessive, angry, threatening, Internet searches, social network, text/telephone/email and/or destructive behaviors qualify as stalking and harassment?

Do you know that many women often use Family Court and negative advocate attorneys to stalk and harass their ex-husbands and/or fathers of their children?

Do you know that stalking and harassment are abuse?

Do you know that stalking and harassment are a form of domestic violence?

Do you know that stalking and harassment (and cyberstalking and cyber-harassment) are crimes?

This Monday, November 7, 2011 at 9pm EST Dr. Tara J. Palmatier ofShrink4Men will discuss women who stalk, the seriousness of this issue and what to do if you're currently being stalked.

If you've been the target of a female stalker and have questions or a story you'd like to share about being stalked, or if you're a member of law enforcement with advice to share, please tune in and Skype or call in +1 310 388 9709.

[/box]

Game Over

Walter Romans (TDOM) · 7 November 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Welcome to the Debating Game

Over at AVfM, Paul Elam is hosting a debate on game and the MRM between himself and someone named Frost. Paul is critical of the use of game and game theory while Frost is defending it as a sort of science of how to get laid (he called it a "study").

Paul's position is that game has no bearing on the men's movement. While some gamers are sympathetic to men's rights and other issues or may be opposed to feminism, game itself is meaningless and those who extol its virtues are mostly in it for the money (selling books, DVDs, etc.). It is all about getting laid and nothing more. According to Paul, game is all about throwing one's values and self-respect out the window in order to pass a shit test. Frost claims it is a legitimate endeavor and defines it as: "Game is the study of how women respond to men's behaviour (sic)" and claims it will increase a man's chances for success with women.

I'm not entirely certain as to why it is important to debate this issue. Game may very well be a waste of time, money, and energy. Its proponents may be con artists. Its practitioners may be superficial scumbags with little respect for women. So what? There are plenty of snake oil salesmen(women) out there and as David Hannum once said, "There's a sucker born every minute."[1]

One the other hand, maybe it works. Again, so what? Lots of people use lots of techniques to get what they want. Car salesmen are taught a variety of manipulative techniques to sell cars to people who may not really want one or need one. Does that make them bad people? No, it makes them salesmen. So if a man wraps himself up in a thinly veiled technique to manipulate a woman into having sex, does that make him any worse than the woman who dons wig or colors her hair and applies expensive cosmetics to attract a man? I suppose that may depend on who is asked, but both are presenting themselves as something they aren't in order to get something they want.

While Paul has only hinted at it, the best I can figure is that he is attempting to save gamers from themselves. He hasn't succinctly stated it, but I can see the following problems with game. Once women realize they've been gamed, they may feel used and cheated. That opens the door for false allegations that could devastate their lives. Further, gamers appear to suffer from a lack of self-confidence, especially with women. This lack of confidence leaves them open to being exploited by unscrupulous con artists willing to take their money for the promise of increased access to sex. Thirdly, PUAs and gamers are typically viewed as sexual predators. They aren't necessarily rapists or even doing anything wrong, but the practice of an art of luring women into bed may be seen by others as sleazy behavior.

Basically, its bad PR for men in general and in that respect it may be contraindicated as part of the MRM. Finally, it only confirms the feminist viewpoint that men are only after one thing. PUAs, they would say, demean and degrade women by treating them as sex objects whose sole purpose is to satisfy their desires.

From the gamer perspective, I suppose that Frost and others would believe that whatever they are paying for the services of their teachers, it is money well spent if it improves success rates. If they get laid often enough, it will increase their self-esteem and therefore game might be considered a form of therapy. The women they find are typically in singles bars, making themselves available. They want it, so what's the problem. That PUAs might be seen as sleazy misogynists never enters their mind. These women want to get laid as badly as the PUAs do. No misogyny involved. In many respects, they have a point.

[quote style="boxed" float="left"]The flaw isn't that the techniques may appear bizarre, but that they aren't backed up by any sort of valid evidence. [/quote] There are lots of reasons women go to bars and consume alcohol, but meeting men is probably at the top of the list. Just as advocates of game can make considerable amounts of money selling game to vulnerable men, there are tons of writers and publications dedicated to taking money from vulnerable women by purporting to teach them how to trap a man. Where better to practice either art than a place where single men go to find single women, especially one that provides legal drugs that decrease inhibitions and provide a false sense of confidence. As such, there's no real reason for a PUA to feel a sense of shame or guilt any more than there is for a woman to feel the same about her use of deception to trap a man. The reality is that both are there for the same thing.

But before we can decide which view is correct, we must define game. What is it? Frost stated that "Game is the study of how women respond to men's behaviour (sic)." But this same statement could be used to define feminism; which is the ideology that describes women's response to male oppression (or so they claim). Are they the same thing? Not hardly. So Frost's definition is insufficient. However, he makes another statement a bit later that may enhance the definition, "The bottom line is that Game is a tool men can use to increase their success with women. No more, no less." In other words, game could be defined as the study of how women respond to men's behavior, and how men can use that knowledge to gain access to sex with women. I use the word sex instead of success because he also states "If a man chooses to eschew sex for life, I admit he will have no use for Game." Thus, Frost equates success with sex and sex is far more specific.

Frost takes exception to the belief that:

> [game] must include shiny clothes, effeminate mannerisms, hoop-jumping, and whatever other behaviours (sic) that they would like to associate with we 'Gamers'.

I don't blame him. While these things are hyped by some gamers, there is more to game than that. To think otherwise is to believe in a caricature. What constitutes real game is found in the next statement:

> We're just a community of men, sharing what we know about women and relationships.

which is a very telling statement.

Frost stated that game is a "study." This implies some sort of methodological approach. But what kind of methodology? A bunch of men sharing what they know is definitely not science. It is personal experience; anecdotal evidence. Any scientist will tell you that anecdotal evidence is simply not evidence. It might have some value in helping to formulate a hypothesis, but it is insufficient to test that hypothesis.

For example, if I were to go out and buy a new pair of shoes prior to jumping off a ledge, I might conclude that I survived because the shoes absorbed the impact and that they were the reason I lived. I might then go out and tell everyone I know about my experience and that wearing these shoes will increase their chances of survival if they intend to jump off a ledge. But I might not have considered that the ledge I jumped from was three feet off the ground and not from a five story building.

Likewise, a gamer may tell all his buddies about how he negged some chick at the local bar who later went home with him. But he may neglect to consider that she had a thing for tall, skinny guys with blond hair and blue eyes and that he just happened to fit that description while all the other guys in the bar that she rejected did not. It may have been the blond hair and blue eyes that attracted the woman, not the neg, just as it was likely the height of the ledge that allowed me to survive, not the new shoes. A more scientific approach might be more beneficial in determining what works and what doesn't.

Frost stated that one objection to game may be that the "specific teachings are flawed." Frost may have been correct, but he was correct for the wrong reasons. The flaw isn't that the techniques may appear bizarre, but that they aren't backed up by any sort of valid evidence. An objection to a comment I made on the debate was that "What works for someone won't work for you…" game must be custom-fit to the person using it. While this may be sound advice, what does it say about game? Game is supposed to increase success with women, but if the techniques are prone to failure, does it actually increase success?

[image]I drive a car to work because doing so will increase my chances of getting to work on time. Provided that the car is in good working order, the make and model won't make any difference in my chances of success. This doesn't mean I won't prefer one model over another because it fits my personality better, but regardless, cars have been proven successful at getting people to work on time. If game is a valid theory, a practitioner may have certain preferred techniques, but any technique of game should work to improve his chances of success.

A valid theory should contain a set of principles for the practitioner to follow that allow that practitioner to make decisions in order to achieve a desired outcome. In other words, the techniques that are applied should not be dependent upon the personality of the practitioner or selected at random, but should be chosen based upon the reactions of the target (woman). For game to be valid, the practitioner must be given a set of techniques that work in specific situations and a method for determining when a particular technique will be most effective, and the application of that technique should result in an increased chance of success with any given woman than the practitioner would have if the technique were not used.

From what I have seen on game, some theories and theorists attempt to address the above and therefore legitimize game as a scientific theory. To do this they draw upon a variety of social and psychological theory. Evolution psychology seems to be popular with gamers. They tend to talk in terms of alpha, beta, and omega males when describing men. These terms, however, seem to be poorly defined. There doesn't appear to be any real consensus as to what differentiates these men or even whether or not it is possible to move between classes.

A couple of years ago a famous golfer appeared to be the pillar of success, everything anyone ever said was "alpha." He was perhaps the greatest golfer in the history of golf. He had more money than most of us could spend in several lifetimes. He was quite good-looking. He had a beautiful wife, and apparently a ton of mistresses. But after his wife discovered his affairs and allegedly beat him with a golf club, there were plenty of folks who claimed that he was not and never had been an "alpha." This seemed rather odd since prior to the incident, he appeared to fit the definition to a tee (pun intended). A good theory requires consistent, well defined terminology or "jargon" that can be understood by those who study it. Without this, a theory is impossible to communicate or discuss.

John Ruscio wrote a book in which he outlined the 10 characteristics of pseudoscience. Number one on the list is that it masquerades as science. The use of vague, obtuse language is one method in which a pseudoscience can appear to be scientific. Reference to scientific theory is another. As previously stated, game theorists tend to rely on psychological principles and social science generalizing real scientific research into areas in which it may not apply.

Reliance on personal experience is another of these characteristics. By his own admission, Frost demonstrates that game theory is developed by a bunch of guys sharing what they know, i.e. personal experiences and anecdotes. Another is the avoidance of risky tests that might disprove the theory. I have never seen reference to any scientific study of game (That is not proof, however, it is reliance on personal experience and such a study may actually exist).

One characteristic of real science is that it is falsifiable. It is possible to conduct an experiment in which the scientist can attempt to disprove the theory. That game must be adjusted to fit the personality of the gamer leaves an out for game theorists to claim the theory is true even when it doesn't work. The technique works, it just doesn't work for him It doesn't fit his personality. Frost make such a statement "We learn from each other, we experiment for ourselves, and we use whatever helps us achieve our goals with women, discarding the rest." Someone says a particular technique works. The rest give it a try. It works for some, it doesn't work for others. What works is incorporated, what doesn't work is discarded, that's pretty scientific until you realize that the theory is different for everyone who uses it. Nothing is ever entirely wrong and nothing is ever entirely right. There is no rhyme nor reason. As such, the theory is not falsifiable.

Another characteristic that fits game is the appeal to authority. In the absence of any scientific data demonstrating its efficacy, gamers use authoritarian pronouncements. I wrote a book. My book sold a million copies. Therefore, I am an authority Trust me. I know what I'm talking about. Pay no attention to the man behind the curtain.

Ok, so game is not a science. If it were, its practitioners might be known as pick up scientists, not pick up artists. I have previously compared game to applied psychology because of the influence of psychological theory. This isn't an entirely valid comparison, but it isn't entirely invalid either. Counseling and therapy are examples of applied psychology. Psychotherapy, when correctly performed may be quite beneficial. Many would consider practitioners in these fields to be more artist than scientist. I've already conceded that some gamers may view game as therapeutic. So even if game is more art than science, game may have some benefit, then again maybe not. Providing counseling and therapy may be an art, but it is art grounded in scientific research. Game is not.

This still doesn't mean that game is worthless. I'm beginning to view it as the placebo for a man's lack of confidence. A socially awkward man unable to impress the ladies decides to study game. He learns a few techniques that someone has convinced him will get him laid. He goes to a bar and with his newfound confidence, manages to approach a woman, try out a couple techniques, and ends up getting laid. In other words, he does something different than sitting at home watching porn on the internet. Simply by doing something, he increased his chances of getting laid. Was it game, or was it just that he finally approached a woman and asked her for sex? My bet is on the latter. He did something different and it worked. He might simply have gone to the bar, clubbed the woman over the head, dragged her by her hair back to his cave, and raped the hell out of her. That might have worked just as well, but it might also have landed him in jail. The result may have had nothing to do with game and everything to do with trying something, anything that led to approaching a woman instead of sitting at home.

Game, as described by Frost and some of the other gamers who commented on the debate, is not much more than trial and error. One man says this is how you pick up chicks. Another man decides that if it works for the first guy, it may work for me. The second man tries it. If it works, he does it until it stops working. If it fails, he discards it and moves to the next suggestion. Its practitioners pretend that it is a systematic approach that has been studied and determined to work. Most likely they do this to deal with the cognitive dissonance arising from having made a purchase of a book, dvd, or class and having invested the time when all they really needed do was something other than what they've been doing.

Other than wasting time and money, game is probably harmless; at least until the woman discovers she's been deceived by a man pretending to be something he's not and comes to regret her evening. It probably takes more than a shower and a bit of Old Spice (or are you an Aqua Vulva man, Paul?) to give a shy man the confidence to approach a woman, but hey, one man's placebo…

[1] This phrase is often incorrectly attributed to P.T. Barnum. Hannum and Barnum were both exploiting people's desires to view a "petrified man." Hannum claimed Barnum's stone man was a fake and made the statement referring to Barnum's customers. Barnum claimed Hannum's was the fake. The fact is that they both were fakes.

Paint the school doors and buses pink

Davd · 8 November 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Truth in Packaging time...

School systems consume huge amounts of tax revenue, and spend much of that money, via the time and resources it pays-for, forcing boys to act like girls. They waste the time of bright children, especially of bright boys, by forcing them to sit still and wait for duller pupils to learn lessons they have already "got".

Kleinfeld (2009) reported:

> middle class parents … were worried that so many of their sons had been diagnosed with Attention Deficit Hyperactivity Disorder (ADHD) and prescribed drugs such as Ritalin which might damage their developing brains. They suspected that teachers' intolerance for active, boisterous boys, not their sons' presumed deficits, was responsible.

Middle class parents—all or mostly respectable citizens—were worried about schools abusing their children—if the children were boys. Sax (2007) considered over-prescription of stimulants so serious as to make it one of five main factors in the de-motivation of boys and young men.

Girls didn't seem to need worrying-about, Kleinfeld wrote later in the same paper: " While the educational problems of girls have led to numerous policy efforts to increase their achievement in areas where they are behind, such as achievement in mathematics and science at the top, the problems of boys have been largely ignored by federal agencies, foundations, and school districts. " Schools, over the past two generations of time, have changed to be more girl-friendly, but have demanded the boys change rather than the schools, even to the point of forcing the boys to change by drugging them (Kleinfeld, 2009; Sax, 2007, Anonymous, 2011.)

Drugging children to force them to adapt to inappropriate circumstances is abuse and may constitute torture. If this were done to children of one race, rather than of one gender, it would be criminal. The only reason it is not criminal—if indeed it is not—is that laws have been written to privilege female and disempower male citizens. Imaginably, men rank lower in civil standing today than Afro-Americans have ranked since Brown v. Board of Education.

Not being a lawyer nor a policeman, i don't know whether criminal prosecution of school agents for drugging boys is possible. I would encourage it if it is—if street pushers go to prison, why not school pushers?* With the street pushers, acceptance is at least somewhat voluntary, so school drugging is worse on the face of it.

If drugging stopped tomorrow, schools would still be prim, sit-still environments that down-grade pupils who—frankly, who act like boys (Anonymous, 2011, Sexton, 19??). Few schools have taken notice of recent research showing that not only are boys naturally more active and boisterous—boys learn better when active. School teaching techniques are more suited to girls than to boys. To repeat "in other words" for emphasis: Schools are failing boys more than boys are failing in school.

Whether or not school "drug-pushers" can be prosecuted, and this may vary from state to state, some truth in labelling is "long overdue": Schools should be pinked. Pink school doors and school buses would be a warning few could misunderstand. They would also be a "bur under the saddle" on school boards and officials until the implied remedy of boy-friendly education is in operation.

Petitioning School Boards had damn well better be lawful, and in a real democracy it should be encouraged whenever the petition has some merit. That's the kind of effort i'll sketch here. The many good activists who read this site should be able to improve the petition and add other ways of getting after school systems to stop drugging boys and start educating them in boy-appropriate ways.

… and meanwhile, pink school buses and pink school doors will at least be some kind of fair warning what schools are like.

Here's a rough draft petition [which does not mention drugging, because that abuse should be more aggressively attacked] for the lawyers and politicians among you to refine:

To the [name of local "School Board"]:

Whereas, the structure of today's conventional classrooms and the behavioural demands made by today's conventional schoolteachers therein, are inconsistent with and inimical to the natural psychology of healthy boys; and

Whereas, the natural psychology of girls is more adapted to such classrooms and demands than that of boys; and

Whereas, the present school bus practices constitute "babying" of most school children, which children need to know how to deal with the traffic on the roads next their homes anyway:

Therefore,

we the [undersigned, presenting] petitioners, hereby demand with all due respect (which may not be very much respect if our efforts should be scorned) that the [name of local "School Board"] forthwith:

1. Cause all School Buses operated by the Board to be painted a bright pink colour, which colour be as easily visible as the presently used shade of yellow, and which colour additionally designates the school buses and schools to be more suitable for girls than for boys

2. Cause the entry doors of all schools operated by the Board to be painted pink, further designating the schools to be more suitable for girls than for boys;

3. Form a committee including at least 50% skilled trades men (which category can include cooks, farmers, airline pilots, physicians, engineers, etc.; but not bureaucrats) to design a school system, as to both architecture and teaching practices, adapted to the psychology of normal healthy boys;

4. Until there are boy-friendly schools available, cease to tax parents of boys;

5. Form a committee of rural residents to review the possibility of replacing the present School Bus system with rural buses which may carry persons who are not school children, thus increasing the mobility of rural non-drivers and the efficiency of rural life; and

6. Retain the pink colouring of both school doors and school buses except, unless, and until:

   a. in the case of school buses, a rural-bus system replaces the school-only bus system;

   b. there are boy-and-man approved, boy-friendly schools in operation, which schools may have doors of some other appropriate colour.

Presented this ___ day of _____ 201_, by the undersigned.

_____ _____
_____

_____ _____
_____

…and further signature lines…

Note:

As the State of Texas has demonstrated well enough for the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation to take notice and report nationally, punishments and corrections other than caging [wo]men up in prisons, may be preferable. The topic is too large to be included in this "blog".

References:

Anonymous, 2011. Reports of school practices in New Brunswick and Anglophone Quebec. November 6. Anonymous, a substitute teacher and church pastor, reports that schools still require pupils to sit quietly in neat rows and listen to Teacher, time-wasting [esp of ablest pupils] is if anyting worse than when he was a schoolboy, many boys are "tuning out". Drugging does occur; he could not state the extent.

Kleinfeld, Judith. 2009. "The State of American Boyhood". Gender Issues.26, 113-120.

Sax, Leonard (2007). Boys Adrift. New York: Basic Books. Note also review by Steven Svoboda, Sexton, Patricia Cayo. 19??. The Feminized Male.

The relationship with yourself is no Game

B.R. Merrick · 9 November 2011 · Archived copy · Original

[dropcap]L[/dropcap]ike TDOM, I stayed on the sidelines over this whole debate about "game," since it doesn't apply to me. I must confess at the outset that I never researched it prior to this debate, and that I was only vaguely familiar with this dating tactic, so what I have to say is confined to what has been thrown back and forth at this website. It's an intriguing yet foreign idea to me, both as a gay man and as a former religious conservative. However, one element of the gamers' argument sticks in my mind. It can be adequately summed up by a quote from Paul Elam's opponent, Frost:

> Men should learn how to improve their relationships with women, and tune out the voices of men who've given up in life, and wish for you to share in their misery.

That statement reminds me of a mother/daughter exchange in "Postcards from the Edge," starring daughter Meryl Streep (Suzanne) and mother Shirley MacLaine (Doris):

Doris: How would you like to have Joan Crawford for a mother?

Suzanne: Oh, please!

Doris: Or Lana Turner?

Suzanne: These are the options? You, or Lana, or Joan?

According to Frost's statement, boys, your options are to listen to gamers show you how to improve your relationships with women, or give up on life. Therefore, we can presumably conclude the following:

Satisfying sexual relationships and encounters with women equal life; all else is misery.

Well, then all that happiness I'm feeling in the same-sex mating dance must be well-disguised misery. From what I see in the gay community, all you have to do to get laid is show up. I'm not bragging about my looks, prowess, or anything I've done; I'm merely observing. My observations include a great many physically less attractive gay and bisexual men.

I am also not advocating that you simply show up to get laid. Nonsense. Whether or not a man ever has sex is his personal business, up to and including celibacy (which ought not to be confused with misery). But since it's so terribly easy for so many gay and bisexual men with other men, there's plenty else to do: talk, laugh, hang out, eat, play games (legitimately fun ones), go places, do stuff, etc. In other words:

Relationships equal life; a life without them is misery.

I decided a while ago, as one of my operating premises, that all coercion leads directly and immediately to death. As I explained it, the first thing to die is your volition. Next: your relationships; then wealth; and finally, when coercion is severe enough, it can end your very existence. It's a complicated matter, but the association of volition with relationships is key here. The order of the four deaths also works in the opposite direction. It is the order of life, or that which is voluntary.

Your free will comes from your mind's ability to communicate with the brain, which uses the body and all five senses to form the abstract design of your volition. Therefore, the primary and most important relationship you have is with yourself. That may sound cliché, but it happens to be true. This is how Henry David Thoreau can sit all by himself at Walden Pond and continue to relate. This then is how wealth is built: after relationships are forged through volition. Ultimately, this combination of relationships and wealth, from one's own volition, is what lengthens life and makes it worth living.

Most people, including the sometimes “solitary” Thoreau, seek out other living things to relate to, in nature, the animal kingdom, and the human race. This is natural and good, for those who wish to be life-oriented. It is also natural and good to find a way to express that desire sexually.

The problem I see from what little I understand about game is that there appear to be elements similar to what I found in reparative therapy, which is a special type of psychotherapy that purports to help gay men turn straight, or at least straight enough to sustain what the client and therapist feel is a healthy romantic relationship with a woman, an emphasis on what Thoreau would refer to as the branches, while ignoring the roots:

> There are a thousand hacking at the branches of evil to one who is striking at the root.

No, I’m not trying to say that having a relationship with a woman is evil. But I think that the analogy of a tree that Thoreau uses here can be used for any cause-and-effect relationship. There are the roots, which are often unseen, and then there are the branches, that can reach into the windows of your life and get your attention. Therefore, I am going to share a little of my own experience with the phenomenon of reparative therapy.

One of the assumptions in this therapy is that the reason men are gay is because they were arrested in their psychological sexual development at some point in boyhood, for a combination of unknown biological reasons as well as early relationships. Therefore, there is a disconnect with male peers and a lack of “proper” bonding. This belief leads reparative therapists, after several “logical” steps, to oftentimes encourage gay men to learn to play sports. The hope is that finding a way to participate in a set of activities that are widespread in the straight male world will enable the “emotionally underdeveloped” gay man to bond with straight men. It also happens to be a complete waste of time.

I spent years — years — trying to learn how to play softball, basketball, football, racquetball, and swimming. Out of all of those, the only one I can say I truly enjoyed was softball, and years later, I can look back on it and see why. We were outside on nice, sunny, Saturday mornings. I liked the guys I was hanging out with. I didn’t need to be good at it. We all looked equally ridiculous, which made it funnier. (Watch a femme run around the bases sometime when he knows exactly how ridiculous he looks.) But what I liked the most is that we would all go out to brunch afterwards.

I never learned to be good at any sport, not even at the level of a below-average straight guy with mild interest in sports. Bonding with “healthy” hetero boys through athletics just wasn’t going to happen. Through it all, one overriding truth evaded me, and I failed to be honest with myself about it until years later.

The truth is I don’t like sports. I had plenty of straight male friends growing up, each of whom showed interest in these manly pursuits more than I did. I was not afraid of these guys, nor ashamed in their company of being bad at it. I was simply not interested. I don’t know why, and it never should have mattered that I didn’t know.

I remember an older man, gay and divorced but convinced that he had turned straight, telling us younger queens in a group session that he made an effort to know the scores and basics of the latest televised sports, so that he could interject into all-male conversations at work in an effort to bond and “stay straight.” That stuck in my mind whenever I would overhear a conversation between two other men with whom I felt the urge to bond. I would listen for a while, and all of a sudden it would dawn on me that their conversation bored me, because the subject matter, sports, also bored me. So much for that urge.

The reason straight men play softball is because straight men want to play softball. The reason straight men stand around talking about scores that don't interest me is because those same scores interest them. The reason straight women talk in a manner that doesn't interest you is because they want to. You're indulging them and misleading them about your intentions. If game means you have to spend any amount of time whatsoever engaging in conversations you really don't want to have with women that you really don't want to know past a Biblical sense, I say here and now that you are wasting your time.

You are also being dishonest, with her and with yourself. This is what politicians do. They get out there amongst the people, paint smiles on their faces, and the minute the cameras are off, their true colors and feelings rise to the surface like an oil slick. Listen at the end of that linked video to that particular politician ask that woman what her kids' names are. Like he gives a damn. They don't want the conversation, or your friendship. Politicians want your political pussy. In that regard, I myself have gone celibate.

To want sex and to enjoy sex is just fine. To sell yourself (beyond the basics of wearing clean clothes, being polite, etc.), or waste your time with people you don't like beyond their ability to stimulate your penis… well, honestly, I think you have to ask yourself if it's worth it. I think you should also ask yourself whether what you are doing is life-oriented or death-oriented.

I eventually learned to accept myself exactly as I am. This happened when I moved out of a culture that subtly demanded an unrealistic type of conformity, and into a wider world with people who live, work, and socialize in many different situations. There is nowhere left to "fit in" in such a world, which means that everyone who is observant will fit into his own place just fine. This is what I see at the heart of what Paul tried to get across in "Chateau Bullshit" when he said:

> "O.K., so you want to get laid? Here's how you do it. Smell clean, get in the proximity of women, and then ignore them. When they come to fuck you, and they will, shut up and let it happen."

There are two ways to interpret this comment. One way is as a branch cutter: "Okay, so I want to get some. This guy says all I have to do is shower and show up. Got it… No, write it down. Do I show up first, or…?" The other way is, I believe, the only correct way to interpret it, and to be a root striker: forget the pursuit and be yourself. Be unafraid to be yourself, because you love and value yourself. Sex, a natural part of life and human relationships, will happen along with the rest of life, which often has very little to do with sex. Likewise, a meaningful relationship with a woman would, I imagine, based on the reams of wisdom that are out there for the taking if you know where to look, involve sex only to a small degree.

Absent getting all the pussy you want, there are music, art, architecture, theater, film, hiking, biking, fishing, camping, sports, cars, family, friends, beer, wine, restaurants, museums, libraries, parks, dogs, cats, iguanas, leaves, flowers, mountains, rocks, trees, rivers, lakes, oceans, martial arts, weights, bungee jumping, ballooning, hobbies, writing, visiting, working, reading, speaking, thinking, and much, much more.

All of which, of course, you can use to distract yourself from your supposed misery over not getting laid. Write them down quickly.

One of the many problems with reparative therapy is that it depends too heavily on relationships from without, and not nearly enough from within. If you're not truly straight to begin with, or an easily influenced bisexual, no platonic relationship with a straight man is going to do it for you. Likewise, if you're straight and miserable, it's not because you failed to play the game correctly on Friday night, and every Friday night prior. The problem in both instances is what's going on in your head. To rely on others to make you happy or give their approval is a serious mistake. Ironically, when you feel good about yourself, acknowledgement of that fact seldom gets in the way of having satisfying relationships of all kinds. Then you can show up at a gathering of other relationship seekers, be yourself with your own temperament, and relax, whether the relationships you seek are romantic or platonic.

Regardless of what game teaches or what the definition may be, I say you would do well to enjoy who you are regardless of what any woman thinks. You're a man, for Pete's sake! That has nothing at all, in my mind, to do with misery.

Pamela O'Shaughnessy exposed

Paul Elam · 9 November 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Two lives examined.

At first glance, they would appear to be two entirely different people on two entirely different paths in life. In the first case we see a person rich in successes; a bestselling author of legal thrillers for a powerhouse publishing firm and a graduate of prestigious law school who enjoyed a lucrative legal career. Add published poet to that list of accolades.

In the other person we find someone obsessed with matters much more dark; a blogger with a small but growing audience, whose driving motivation appears to be an agenda of bigotry and intentional harm, conducted from the shadows of calculated anonymity.

A comparison of these two individuals reveals more than just coincidental similarity. Indeed, they appear to be one in the same person.

Pamela O'Shaughnessy, who co-authors legal thrillers with her sister Mary for Simon and Schuster under the pseudonym Perri O'Shaughnessy, is a Harvard grad who practiced law for 16 years.

She is also, according to the preponderance of available evidence, Vliet Tiptree, a self-identified radical feminist blogger whose writings suggest a desire to promote extralegal efforts to genetically modify the male half of the human race in order to correct what she calls the "[B]light [that] diseases the trunk of our species' existence…"

Of additional concern with Tiptree's writings is a message of recruitment and organization intended to further her agenda with help from other likeminded ideologues.

Although some elements of her writing are cryptic, her justification and strategy emerge clearly within the text of an article she wrote on a blog called Radical Hub. Tiptree tacitly or directly concludes the following:

[unordered_list style="green-dot"]

- That masculinity, by its nature, is a human social pathogen requiring "extirpation."
- That the various incarnations of feminism previously thought to ameliorate the "problem" have actually been absorbed and diluted by patriarchy, which she now refers to as "the system."
- That biochemical alteration of men, as a collective, is a feasible means to address the problem.
- That end means and goals, along with scientific capability, should serve as the guiding rationale and compass for future actions, not human morality or rule of law.
- That radical feminists, free of social and legal constraints, must now secretly organize to further these ideas under the auspices of eradicating women's oppression.

[/unordered_list]

Readers of the radical feminist blog demonstrate the sentiments Tiptree's writing appears intended to inspire. Comments include advocacy for killing all male infants upon birth, and the establishment of a system of sexual apartheid where males are exiled from the community at age 6.

But the core of Tiptree's "solution," as articulated in her article and echoed by her readers, is eugenics.

Or, as she opines:

> As to what that cure may be, my best bet is that what's wrong with men is that their androgens need genetic modification. I'm serious about this. If we can do it with corn, men ought to be easy.

This idea, that of equivalence between human beings and an agricultural product, was quickly embraced by one of her readers.

> [I] think that if we are going to be intellectually honest always, and commit to going to the ends of our thoughts, we cannot take anything off the table. and that includes biology, and biological explanations for mens sickening behavior. And if this turns out to be the case, then to consider a biological solution. we must consider this.

The method that Tiptree uses to guide readers to these kinds of conclusions is simple and effective. She first presents historical acts of violence, including vandalism and arson committed by fringe elements of the suffrage movement, and characterized those things as "as radical as it had to be."

She further rationalizes that any modern feminist activities working in the framework of the current system are ineffectual; that modern liberated women are actually "brainwashed through the use of social controls into using these rights not for our own benefit, but to continue propping up our own oppression."

Tiptree leaves no room for anything legal or in concert with non-radical activism – and offers eugenics, secretly fostered by a well-placed, anonymous group of ideologues, as the answer.

The evidence that Pamela O'Shaughnessy and Vliet Tiptree are the same person is circumstantial, but compelling.

Tiptree identifies herself in her Radical Hub piece with the following:

> Let me briefly describe my background: a hard-working girlhood without much protection in East Los Angeles, California; the feminist ferment of the 1970?s; a first professional job as a civil rights investigator for the federal government; law school; working as an affirmative action coordinator at several universities and colleges; practicing employment discrimination law along with criminal and civil litigation; marriage, motherhood, divorce; becoming a writer of novels and poetry as my second career.

Pamela O'Shaughnessy is from California, attended law school, was married, divorced and is a mother in the same age range that would put her as a young woman in the 1970's. She was a civil rights investigator for the federal government, worked at a law firm in criminal litigation, and also writes novels and poetry as a second career.

This information was taken from her online bio, which you can read here: Perri O'Shaughnessy – Bio.

Note, the bio provided is a .pdf taken from an online cache. Her current bio has been taken down "for maintenance," since her activities began to be addressed on this website.

Click to enlarge

Tiptree appears to have another online identity under the screen name, Autonomyisdestiny. That identity is publicly connected to Vliet Tiptree, in, among other places, an online feminist publication called Bitch Magazine.

Autonomyisdestiny also revealed more personal information in another online forum, The Critical Poet. In it she posted a piece of poetry that she informed readers was a eulogy to her brother, who was formerly a workers comp attorney in Salinas Valley, California.

Pamela O'Shaughnessy's brother, Patrick, was a workers compensation attorney in Salinas Valley, California. He passed away in 2004.

In another post at The Critical Poet, Autonomyisdestiny makes reference to having a sister named Meg.

In Pamela O'Shaughnessy's now removed bio, she identifies several family members, including a sister named Meg.

In a perhaps curious revelation made during a promotional interview with O'Shaughnessy, she revealed that the protagonist in her works of fiction often worked outside the limits of the law. View here.

There are other aspects to this case that further indicate that Vliet Tiptree and Pamela O'Shaughnessy are one in the same person. More of that information will be revealed as this this story unfolds in the future.

The question now is what precisely to do about it. Complaints have been filed with the service where the Radical Hub site is hosted, as the content of the article in question is clearly in violation of their terms of service. Thus far, the blog remains up with the article in question. There will be other continuous and escalating efforts from this website and perhaps others to uncover what appears to be the development of a dangerous plan.

It must be asked, of course, whether it is even possible for a group of ideologues to follow through with this type of plan. At least on the level of their current machinations it would appear unlikely, but the potential for innocent people being harmed by possibly overzealous followers seems quite clear.

One question at this point that is yet to be answered is whether the publishing house of Simon and Schuster is aware of the activities of Pamela O'Shaughnessy, or if it matters. After all, even Mein Kampf had a publisher. But perhaps they will be sensitive to public outrage. Concerned individuals may contact them here:

1230 Avenue of the Americas New York, NY 10020
(212) 698-7000

or by email here, to voice their concerns.

The source of violence and hate

John Hembling (JtO) · 10 November 2011 · Archived copy · Original

[dropcap]T[/dropcap]arget confusion is a term used in military parlance to describe a phenomenon of indecision which can occur when an individual is presented with a large number of obvious, high value objectives. It's also an occupational hazard of writing from a men's rights perspective. In the past few days, there have been so many blazingly obvious examples of male-targeted hatred, discrimination, violence, and persecution that I've been overwhelmed and consequently have failed to adequately address any of them.

Unfortunately, I'm unable to write 10 articles at the same time. What I can do is make a list, and hope for the forbearance of readers that a more thoughtful fisking of each item wasn't presented.

(1) Feminists continue to attempt co-opting the occupy wall street movement, and while this isn't news, one feminist blogger provided a piece of absurdist complaint on the site "occupy-the-patriarchy."

(2) According to Lmarshall, the protesters against the patriarchy demands that the patriarchy provide, enforcers (men) to protect the protesting opponents of the patriarchy from other agents of the patriarchy. We hate you! You must go! Away with you patriarchs! Protect us![1]

(3) According to the sexual assault myths and facts page at Roger Williams University[2], 1 in 4 college women will be raped or sexually assaulted. In a Student Body of 4505[3] , this works out to roughly 732 women raped at RWU every year. Compared to the BJS's criminal victimization survey, showing 1 rape per 2000 people, Rogers Williams University demonstrates a rate of rape 650 times higher than the national average. Paul Elam and I both salute the courage and integrity of the school's faculty and administration, for bravely publishing these numbers. These civic-minded educators value student safety far above any possible loss of revenue due to potential mass un-enrolement as parents and students learn of the exceptionally dangerous environment on RWU's campus.

(4) The best-selling Simon and Schuster published author, Perri O'Shoughnessy – not only writes under the pseudonym in homage to fictional TV Detective Perri Mason, she also has ambitions of genocide exceeding those of Charles Manson. In her blog entry on a site called RadicalHub, she's written a 4000 word manifesto[4] endorsing a long term criminal conspiracy to commit serial as well as mass murder. When first outed by Paul Elam[5], her response was to copy the entire comments thread of Elam's article, posting her own "grrrl-power" rebuttal, and made sure to let each and every commenter at AVFM know that although she advocates genocide and eugenics, it's actually you gentlemen who are "creepy."[6]

(5) The editors and executives at cafemom, a mommy-blogging community catering to middle class, upwardly mobile mothers has endorsed, through silence and inaction – the view that male targeting mutilation and violence[7] reflects "the very best community and content for moms."[8] In a culture of celebrated female criminality, its not implausible to assume that Tracy Odell[9], executive VP at cafemom takes pride in being listed alongside rapists and murderers.

(6) Meanwhile a Montreal male feminist has denounced the November grow-a-mustache-for-prostate-cancer movement on the grounds that getting cancer is a badge of privilege." The ironically misnamed Alex Manley published an article in the Concodia University newspaper in which he claimed "the whole thing is just a really well-disguised tantrum that guys are content to throw to make it seem like prostate cancer research is as important as research towards curing women's cancers." I re-read the article 5 times looking for signs of satire. Manley is, to all appearances, serious. So, according to this execrable excuse for a human, prostate cancer is a hallmark of privilege. Deal with it.[10]

(7) In what feminists continue fraudulently naming a "rape culture," men cannot be raped by women. I'm sure this comes as a great relief to men like Jay Herron[11] and numerous others who cannot come forward without being re-victimized by a mainstream media which routinely denies the masculinity of men who are victim to this crime. These are men who, prior to learning male rape doesn't exist, probably though of themselves as rape victims.

Leading thinkers as diverse as Canadian Broadcaster Micheal Coren[12] and South African Opposition party leader Helen Zille agree that female on male rape doesn't exist. According to a recent twitter posting by Zille : " Because women can't have sex with men without men's consent. "[13] Even Google's online dictionary supports the claim that rape can only be committed by a man. [14][15]

(8) The domestic violence industry continues to knowingly promote rampant fraud, falsehood, lies and policies which promote and exacerbate domestic violence, willfully ignoring research demonstrating that Male-aggressor, female-victim ideology is mythological, rather than factual, and continuing to deny and silence male victims of violence[16].

(9) Universities continue to use Gender studies textbooks filled with known falsehoods, demonizing men, promoting hatred and violence against men, although the entire academic community knows the "facts" used to prop up this agenda of hate are false. In the textbook "Domestic Violence Law." used in women's studies courses at american universities – the claim is made: "The history of women's abuse began over 2,700 years ago in the year 753 BC. It was during the reign of Romulus of Rome that wife abuse was accepted and condoned under the Laws of Chastisement…. The laws permitted a man to beat his wife with a rod or switch so long as its circumference was no greater than the girth of the base of the man's right thumb."Unfortunately, Romulus is a mythological figure, a demigod, sired by the roman god Jupiter and suckled by a wolf. Christina Hoff Sommers said – and I agree – that "people who believe that Romulus actually existed in the real world have no critical faculties whatsoever"[17]

(10) While this is all going on, the academic world continues to gleefully lay waste to the principals of law on which western civilization is built. Kangaroo courts of feminist ideology now routinely destroy male students and reward female students in any allegations of sexual regret by women. In courts run without a system of laws, lawyers, or anyone except enthusiastic students and humanities lecturers – male students are found guilty based on a reduced standard of evidence – by edict of the Department of education's absurdly misnamed Office of Civil Rights.[18][19]

(11) Meanwhile, smug, successful, publicly lionized feminist academic openly gloat about the sarcastically named "mancession". A term used to underscore the fact that economically, academically, and socially, men are an underclass, and that feminist policies in education, government, law enforcement, family courts and employment are successful. Feminism has succeeded in denuding men of a viable role in society. Feminism has succeeded in elevating women as a class of privileged victims, while re-enforcing and amplifying the age-old social dynamic of male disposability. When this reality is acknowleged in mainstream media, outside men's rights writing, it is as a problem to be addressed, but with triumphalism[20][21]

And while this carnival of hate, violence and apartheid churns male human beings into chum – feminist ideologues continue singing from the songbook of men as oppressors, and women as victims. Men as violent, women as innocent. The simple fact is that if men were the violent, evil, oppressive patriarchs they are claimed to be, faced by such naked aggression, violence and marginalization, they would have responded in kind by now.

[image]That most men continue to operate as the disposable providers and protectors of women even as they are culturally reduced to a socially accepted role of appliances provoked some philosophical questions about the nature of human empathy, justice, and the concept of evil.

In 2009, the CBC[22] published an article reporting that Researchers at the University of Zurich and Royal Holloway, University of London conducted a study of 120 women and found that testosterone promoted fairness, and not, as ideologues claim of the male hormone; aggression.

Christoph Eisenegger of the University of Zurich said "If one were to believe the common opinion, we would expect subjects who received testosterone to adopt aggressive, egocentric and risky strategies regardless of the possibly negative consequences on the negotiation process,"

The study by Eisenegger, Naef, Snozzi, Heinrichs[23] – published in the scientific journal Nature was titled "Prejudice and truth about the effect of testosterone on human bargaining behaviour". The published abstract includes the statement “the folk hypothesis seems to generate a strong negative association between subjects’ beliefs and the fairness of their offers, even though testosterone administration actually causes a substantial increase in the frequency of fair bargaining offers in our experiment”

Another study published in 2011 appears to point to conclusions opposing the fairness hypothesis on the Eisenegger study published in Nature.

Researchers van Honka, Schuttera, Bosa, Kruijtc, Lentjesd, Baron-Cohene published thier research in a report from the Proceedings of the national Academy of Sciences of the United States of America – which suggested Testosterone as a causative factor in reduction of empathy. However, the research indicated this effect in women, and excluded mention of male response. The published paper: called “Testosterone administration impairs cognitive empathy in women depending on second-to-fourth digit ratio”[24] is one more item of evidence not only is masculine behavioural psychology closely tied to fairness and empathy – but also that feminine psychology is, rather than the culturally understood model of fairness and kindness, linked to such socially “negative” behavioural qualities as cruelty, aggression, and selfishness.

In fact, this hypothesis is not new. I wrote in March of 2011 about a possible evolutionary selector in female behavioural pathology.[25] I speculated that a tendency toward selfish self-interest and lack of empathy might, in pre-agricultural human cultures have provided a reproductive advantage for women and their children in conditions of food or resource scarcity. The economy of human reproduction has always resulted in females selecting reproductive partners from males who competed to be selected. While inter-male rivalry and conflict is a significant driver in this competition, female-favouring behavior in males must also be considered in a reproductive economy governed by female selection.

This means that the selecting sexual demographic has a real control in any society not ruled by directly applied violence. For women, typically possessing lesser physical strength than men, reproductive control means disposition to greater manipulative skill and innate selfishness provide reproductive and survival advantage to women in a way that to men these qualities do not. A selfish and manipulative man affords survival advantage to himself, but not necessarily to his family group. A highly selfish and manipulative woman of reproductive age, being the biological center of the family unit, does increase group survival.

Understood from a view of reproductive advantage, the behavior modes of fairness in men, and selfish manipulation in women can be understood as biologically associated. Unfortunately, those evolutionarily selected characteristics have not just disappeared in our modern environment where food and shelter are plentiful. The modern ideology of feminism, which now dominates our courts, government, education, and social custom provides an amplifying effect on old selective advantages which we no longer need. In fact, in a context of mechanized labor, food production, and warfare – humans are still driven by built in behaviour patterns that have become toxic.

The deep biological programming of men to accommodate women has led to a social reality where a host of “disorders” have been created by the mental health community to excuse and absolve adult women from responsibility for their own actions.

The modern recognition of this is hidden behind a prevalence of clinical terminology describing mental illnesses which overwhelmingly afflict women, we need to realize we’ve created these clinical conditions.

Narcissistic personality disorder, avoidant personality disorder, histrionic personality disorder, these are arguably not aberrations of normal human psychology at all, rather they are the amplification of female personality traits which afforded women a survival advantage throughout human pre-history. The pathology is in a society which socializes half the human population to retain the emotional development and non-accountability of children while possessing the social and political power of adults.

And if you don’t like it, just plug your ears, close your eyes, and tell yourself that none of this makes sense, because everybody knows we all live in a patriarchy.

[1] http://occupypatriarchy.org/2011/11/09/statement-on-the-right-to-safely-occupy/
[2] http://www2.rwu.edu/studentlife/studentservices/counselingcenter/sexualassault/rapemyths.htm
[3] http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Roger_Williams_University
[4] http://radicalhub.wordpress.com/2011/10/04/radical-feminism-in-the-21st-century/
[5] http://www.avoiceformen.com/mens-rights/activism/pamela-oshaughnessy-exposed/
[6] http://avoiceforcreepymen.blogspot.com/
[7] http://thestir.cafemom.com/in_the_news/127533/wife_cuts_off_husbands_penis
[8] http://www.cafemom.com/about/people.php

[9] http://register-her.com/index.php?title=Tracy_Odell_–_Bigot
[10] http://thelinknewspaper.ca/article/2139
[11] http://jayherron.wordpress.com/2006/09/24/a-male-rape-survivors-story/
[12] http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=-lzQ_9wZ1xE

[13] http://www.reddit.com/r/MensRights/comments/m7asa/the_leader_of_the_opposition_in_sa_says_women/
[14] http://i.imgur.com/HcdbX.png
[15] http://www.google.ca/search?rls=en&q=rape+definition
[16] http://csulb.edu/~mfiebert/assault.htm
[17] http://www.newyorker.com/online/blogs/books/2009/08/literary-smackdown-sommers-vs-romulus.html
[18] http://www.avoiceformen.com/mens-rights/false-rape-culture/the-american-university-of-vigilante-justice/
[19] http://www.nypost.com/p/news/opinion/opedcolumnists/the_feds_mad_assault_on_campus_sex_zjUl29Y8d3NmoYOkKchblO
[20] http://www.theglobeandmail.com/news/opinions/margaret-wente/young-men-without-work/article2231234/
[21] http://www.pellebilling.com/2010/12/hanna-rosin-at-ted/

[22] http://www.cbc.ca/news/technology/story/2009/12/08/tech-biology-testosterone-behaviour.html
[23] http://www.nature.com/nature/journal/v463/n7279/abs/nature08711.html

[24] http://www.pnas.org/content/early/2011/02/02/1011891108.full.pdf
[25] http://www.johntheother.com/2011/03/evolutionary-understanding-of-female.html

In the bosom of justice

Paul Elam · 10 November 2011 · Archived copy · Original

[dropcap]I [/dropcap]am disappointed in men; men in the MRM in particular. Actually, disgusted is a better word. Here's the deal. Since yesterday, there has been a critical news story out on the WWW that has to do with achieving long awaited equality for men. It is a story about a man, driven to the edge with abuse who finally takes action to reclaim his life and his dignity, and how the system now regards him as a criminal for that. Though the events still fall into the "alleged" category, here is what happened according to Goldcoast.com.au out of Australia.

44 year old Darryelle Arthur Dixon, a former Gold Coast security guard, had a girlfriend. Skank is probably a better way to describe her. She was a stripper. She was also a gold digging, cheating parasite according to Dixon. And let's be honest here, men do not lie about these things.

Let's be even more honest. He didn't have to lie about it. The trollops own life, spent picking up dollar bills off dirty floors with the crack of her nasty ass in front of roomfuls of howling drunks is a testament to who she really is.

And she was using Dixon's meager income to supplement her pointless life with boob jobs and hair extensions. She was also cheating on him. So, he did what any other normal man would do after so much abuse and humiliation at the hands of this low rent piece of garbage. He sliced up her tits.

Bad. Ass. [1]

Just delightful.[2]

Dixon paid for those implants, so he went to get them back. I am pretty much a pacifist, but I have to admit that I have always admired a man with enough estrogen to slice and dice a woman's booberies.

But I am totally disappointed that after 24 hours of this story being available, I cannot find a single MRA who has stood up to support Dixon, whom we should, in reality, consider a hero – empowering men everywhere with his example.

Has feminism not taught us anything? Have they not taught us that violent attacks, when provoked for the right reason, are a valid, excusable statement against the evil system of oppression? Can't we even get a good laugh?

Question: What do you tell a hooker with two sliced up breasts?

Answer: You don't need to tell her anything. She's already been told twice.

How do we know the bloody skeezer liked that joke? Because it left her in stitches! Hyuck-yuck-yuck!

Jesus, where the fuck is Sharon Osborne when you need her? Now, there's a woman who would find the humor in this.

But just look at MRA's. Not a word about this important story, not a snickering line or a hint of support from a single one of you. Goddam it, it seems like I have to do everything around here. Well, not as much as Mr. Dixon, but you get my point.

We are often accused by the more milquetoast and ineffectual around us of being just like feminists. We are always cautioned that we must not sink to their level, that we must not become like the enemy we face. Well, if it was not clear before, it should be now. We have, thank goodness, a long, long way to go before MRA's can claim to be anything like feminists at all.

[1] Source

[2] Source

Tracy Odell of CafeMom placed on offenders registry

Paul Elam · 10 November 2011 · Archived copy · Original

[dropcap]O[/dropcap]n October 18, 2011, Nicole Fabian-Weber, a blogger for CaféMom, The Stir, wrote an article about a 29-year-old Vietnamese woman who, after becoming upset with her husband, cut off his penis with a pair of scissors and threw it in a river. Fabian-Weber's article was entirely supportive of the idea, and of the general idea of sexually mutilating men. Fabian-Weber expressed those sentiments in a variety of ways.

The reaction to the article was energetically negative and almost immediate, with many comments posted to the piece by readers who were outraged at Fabian-Weber's statements and demanding that the article be removed.

MRA's followed suit. Fabian-Weber was registered as a bigot on register-her.com, and numerous complaints and demands we sent to the editorial team that manages CaféMom.

This included multiple forms of correspondence to three key persons in that organization; Publisher Tracy Odell, Editorial Director Amy Boshnack and Managing Editor Cynthia Dermody.

No correspondence was returned from any of these individuals. In fact the only response so far to the concerns addressed to these key management persons has been that the original article posted by Fabian-Weber has been revised, taking some of the more inflammatory material out. It was, instead of a reasoned and responsible reaction by a team of professionals, an adolescent attempt to revise history, adding insult to the already despicable display of hate speech.

And as the article still contains explicit support for sexual violence and mutilation, it also demonstrates that the management of CaféMom is part of a culture of sexism and promoted violence within marital relationships.

For this reason, Tracy Odell, publisher of CaféMom, is now listed as a bigot on register-her.com, alongside Nicole Fabian-Weber, and alongside the remaining collection of bigots, corrupt public officials, pedophiles, rapists, murderers and other violent criminals that represent the moral equivalent of Ms. Odell.

Though Odell will likely enjoy this distinction, as will her underlings in the future, it will nonetheless create an indelible and irreversible record of the facts about the sickness that permeates CaféMom.

I Moustache You a Question

John Hembling (JtO) · 11 November 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Is Alex Manley stupid, or just a sociopath?

Alex Manley is the writer at Concordia University in Montreal who, in a stunning display of callous contempt for men as human beings, published an article at thelinknewspaper.ca telling men that prostate cancer is a hallmark of privilege. Several days after my first reading of Manley's words, this still shocks me. In possible fairness to this writer, I must admit the possibility that he is demonstrating mastery of a particularly sadistic flavour of satire. However, even if this is the case (unlikely) Manley's brand of callous cruelty towards men who die, or whose fathers, brothers, and friends die of a male-specific form of cancer is well off the mark.

People dying of cancer are not a suitable target of mockery, Alex, and I'm being as kind as possible presenting the possibility that you're kidding.

On the other hand, It might be that our young sociopath, Mr Manley is entirely serious.

Of course, our young Alex doesn't limit himself to mockery, he makes several reasoned arguments against donating or raising money and public awareness to combat prostate cancer. So rather than merely pointing out the ignorant, callous cruelty of Manley's position, I'll address a few of his arguments, all of which are [spoiler-alert] wrong [/spoiler-alert].

Manley's first point is that men, the people who get prostate cancer – are privileged. Therefore, in the pseudo-intellectual world of male feminist self abasement, this means they should be untreated, unregarded, and left to die. That second part isn't explicitly stated by Manley. Obviously, because it's openly sociopathic, however, it's left as an implication where hopefully, a feminist indoctrinated readership will fail to examine and reject it.

The second point, wrapped up in the first is the endlessly repeated claim of male privilege. What privilege are you talking about, young sociopath? Name or otherwise identify this supposed male privilege for us, please. I don't really expect an answer to that, I've never had one before.

It this point, some might object to my repeated references to Manley as a sociopath. I'm not a clinician or a trained psychologist – so this is merely my layman's opinion, and in young Alex's defence, he states early in his piece: "Let me be clear—I don't want anyone to get cancer."

Once more however, theres an unstated implication. If anyone is going to get cancer, it should be men, and not women. Men, you see, don't matter as much. They're disposable. This is obvious a few lines further along where he states "Unfortunately, that's $176 million taken away from more pressing issues in the world than prostate cancer."

We are lucky have young Alex to instruct us who to help, and who to abandon in his calculus of mortality. Let's also not forget: "Furthermore, it's worth mentioning that, as far as cancers go, prostate cancer is not much of a cancer. It's slow acting, and it has relatively low death rates. "

According to the American Cancer Society, in 2011 about 240,890 new cases of prostate cancer will be diagnosed and about 33,720 men will die of it.

This works out to a 14% fatality rate.

According to PLoS ONE; a peer-reviewed, online publication reporting on primary research in all scientific disciplines.

[box icon="none"]
"It is noteworthy that the largest absolute decreases in death rates (per 100,000) that occurred between 1990/91 and 2006 were observed for lung cancer in men (23.2) and breast cancer in women (9.3). These accounted for 37% of the total decrease in all-cancer death rates in men and women during this time period. The decrease in prostate cancer death rates accounted for 24% of the total decrease in men”

[/box]

Would anybody like to guess why the decrease in prostate cancer mortality is 24% of the total decrease in male cancer deaths? Here’s my guess : public awareness, fundraising and research. You know, the things Alex Manley is instructing us we should not do.

Young sociopath’s second argument against prostate cancer activism and fundraising is that it’s a first world problem. According to Alex: “Men in Detroit get prostate cancer at about 100 times the rate of men in Hanoi.”

At this point I’m going to admit that I’m quite stupid, so I’m going to carefully parse what I’m being told by the individual whose last name signals that he’s the man we should listen to.

If you live in Detroit, or anywhere in the first world, you’re 100 times more likely to get prostate cancer than a man in Hanoi. Therefore – um – lets see, If you get prostate cancer – uh – you should – move to Hanoi!

By Jove! That’s much better planning than funding research to lower cancer rates and improve treatment. Good thinking Alex.

And after all, as our manly young writer tells us, efforts to address prostate cancer research isn’t a real issue. It’s a cute little initiative, but not worth supporting, like a child with a lemonade stand – and a fatal disease.

Also, let’s not forget that “Men, by and large, are doing okay for themselves.” In fact, according to Manley “They’re still out-earning women by significant amounts.”

- Study: Young Single Childless Women Out-Earn Men[3]
- Women ages 22 to 30 with no husband and no kids earn a median $27,000 a year, 8% more than comparable men in the top 366 metropolitan areas, according to 2008 U.S. Census Bureau data[4]
- NYC’s young women out-earning the men[5]

Opps, wrong again Alex.

Alex next re-iterates his claim on male privilege, again failing to substantiate the myth, and moves on to get it wrong about rates of violent criminal victimization too.

[image][6]

“There are a lot of people in the world who would trade your slight risk of prostate cancer for their serious risk of being raped, being killed”

And remember : Prostate cancer is a hallmark of privilege. Deal with it.

Alex, you disgust me.

[1] http://thelinknewspaper.ca/article/2139
[2] http://www.plosone.org/article/info:doi/10.1371/journal.pone.0009584

[3] http://www.time.com/time/business/article/0,8599,2015274,00.html
[4] http://www.usatoday.com/money/workplace/2010-09-01-single-women_N.htm
[5] http://www.nypost.com/p/entertainment/date_works_hard_for_the_money_and_rW7bKzX7mR5zMDvNRk8fOJ
[6] http://bjs.ojp.usdoj.gov/content/glance/tables/vsxtab.cfm

JtO is driving the boat

John Hembling (JtO) · 11 November 2011 · Archived copy · Original

[box icon="none"]

As almost everybody will be aware by now, Paul's been pushing himself pretty hard the past few months. There's a lot of work running the site, the radio show, coordinating interviews, conducting research, dealing with media representatives, lawyers and politicians, face-time with El Presidente, and almost never getting enough sleep.

Last week we had to cancel the show as a stomach bug took Paul out of action. There were even a few comments mourning /my/ absence from the weekly broadcast – and while that's flattering, my honest view on that sentiment is: there's no accounting for taste. Now however, He's taking a much needed break for at least a week, and guess who's left running the shop?

Yep, me.

I will be approving article content on AVFM submitted through the site's administration, as well as accepting submissions sent by email to articles@avoiceformen.com

In addition – Ive been reviewing and approving Register-Her submissions this week, and while I've approved many submitted offender-candidates, Ive deleted a nontrivial fraction of the submissions as well.

Gentlemen and Ladies, typing: "she's a bitch and she killed her kids" is not an adequate description for entry to the registry. I will not write the entries for you. Please provide —>at least<--- 100 words. More is better, and as always, submissions without reference links will be deleted. And that's the housekeeping taken care of. However, much as I enjoy working with Mr Elam as a part of the editorial team of AVFM – he's a generation older than me, and quite honestly, more conservative in his approach than what could be optimally effective. Now that the old guy's off for the week, It's time to dial up the heat. I'll do my best not to burn the place down [/box]

Time to take some time

Paul Elam · 11 November 2011 · Archived copy · Original

[box icon=”none”]

Sometimes you can even get fried to a crisp doing what you love to do. And for me that “sometime” is now. I’m crispy, guys, like bacon cooked good and proper. And, after a recent bout with a rather nasty bug I have been reminded that I have not had anything resembling a life for way, way too long.

It’s time to unplug and recharge the batteries, though I still don’t know how you can do both at the same time. ⍰

I will be out of action for at least a week (likely two). JtO is at the helm, which is a good thing, unless, of course, he posts something that has S.W.A.T. teams and black helicopters circling the compound. You people have no idea how crazy he really is. I mean, scary, man.

What this will likely mean is a general slowdown of content for a bit and a bit less FTSU. With that in mind, if any of you, especially those with admin access have articles you want to submit, this would be the perfect time. Also, if you have considered submitting material (that does not require more time to edit than it took to write) this is a good opportunity to make use of the new contact email for submissions to AVfM, which is articles@avoiceformen.com All future correspondence regarding article submissions will be handled through that email.

It also unfortunately means no AVfM Radio during the time I am off. Unfortunately, JtO living north of civilized society means he cannot call in as the show host to BTR’s control panel. Again, an unfortunate but needed slow down.

That being said, they have this phenomena happening outside right now. It is called sunlight. I am going to see what the buzz is about.

[/box]

Between Misandry and Misogyny

Jared White · 12 November 2011 · Archived copy · Original

> What on earth is misogynist about calling all the fucking cunts who accuse men of rape of being goddamn lying bitches?

It's a simple question, but does this simple question infuriate you? If you are a misogynist then probably not.

Those who do not hold a deep hatred for women might find the above question to be very offensive, and it is. A more important question would be; do you think the only person that would ever say something this offensive could possibly be anything other than an ignorant woman hater? Think carefully before you respond because the person who asked this question might not uphold the "neckbeard" redneck image usually placed on those evil misogynists. Who asked it? I'll get to that later. First, I have to elaborate on a small social experiment I recently enacted on the men's rights subreddit a few days ago.

A user posted a statement to the subreddit, which read;

> For all the good work we do pointing out feminist hypocrisy, I think it important to acknowledge that there does seem to be a lot of misogyny on reddit. I don't think it does our movement any good to pretend it doesn't exist. Instead, I think we should create the circumstances that allows us to contribute toward determining what is and what is not misogyny.

Everything about this statement, in my opinion, is true. However, something that has bothered me since I began working with the men's rights movement was distilled in that reddit post. The word misogyny has been used to classify everything from hatred towards women to minor disagreements between ideologues.

An individual stating the truth, that some women lie about abuse in order to gain the upper hand in a child custody dispute is likely be labeled a misogynist.

The tactic, now common; of classifying anyone with an opposing view as a misogynist woman hater has been a growing source of irritation.

To challenge this worldview I made a statement on the reddit post which received a fair amount of attention. The posting was an impulsive decision, but I felt it needed to be done. My intent was not simply to challenge this worldview with feminists but with MRAs as well. Here is that statement;

> Misogyny: The hatred of women
>
> Not misogyny: Bad taste jokes about rape/abuse/etc. Logic. Counterarguments. Disagreements. Harsh language. Saying cunt. Saying bitch. Calling women names. Being pro-life. Calling a woman who accuses a man of rape a liar.
>
> Why are none of these things misogyny? Because you do not have to hate women to do any or all of these things. You might, but not everyone who does them hate women.
>
> Misogyny: The hatred of women
>
> Not misogyny: Any and every reason that a feminist would call a man (or woman) a misogynist.
>
> The word is being applied to things that do not uphold its meaning.
>
> I think the word most people are looking for when they react to most of the things I listed above is, asshole.

> But because feminists have slung the word around so freely, labelling anyone they disagree with, any time they read something critical or disparaging of a woman, they automatically think "misogyny" when it really isn't.
>
> My two cents.

You will probably not be surprised to learn my posting lit a fire beneath the collectivist asses previously pushing that claim of misogyny. This was my intention. Ideologues can usually be counted on to focus on minutia, ignoring the intent of argument to attacking one word or point. Flying into full-screech, hyped up on emotion and fueled by personal outrage.

The first response was from someone who I don't believe was a full-patch feminist. I didn't bother to ask but the response was what I expected;

> Calling every woman who accuses a man of rape a liar. hmmm…

I responded, and we went back and forth for a while. The argument was civil enough with no insults being flung from either side. The beginning of the discussion had yielded the concession I was looking for.

Referring to my statement that "Calling a woman who accuses a man of rape a liar" does not constitute hatred of women.

When my debater admitted that while it's true not everyone who would say something like that is a woman hater, most of the people that do must be. I asked for proof in support of this claim.

This is where things went downhill.

My request for any type of proof was denied and instead proof was demanded of me to show that not everyone who says this is a woman hater. I obliged the commentator with a link to the definition of the word misogyny and was quickly told this would not be good enough. A "census, survey, study" or anything other than the definition of the word was demanded of me to prove that misogyny meant the hatred of women and calling women names was not the equivalent of hating women.

This, is where things went really downhill.

I was told that using words like cunt or bitch were misogynistic acts. That is, the act of saying a word someone finds offensive is equivalent to hating women. Next I was told that just because someone makes a sandwich joke they might not be a misogynist, but their actions are misogynistic.

By this point I was beyond baffled. Not at the fact that there were people who thought this way, but at how they attempted to justify this "logic" in their arguments. I was told an individual making such a joke must have serious contempt for women. This was only the beginning of the nonsense I witnessed, and wasn't even the worst of it. I'll return to the sandwich shortly.

My next detractor was slightly more thoughtful, stating agreement that the things I listed as not being misogyny were in fact not misogyny. At least not by the definition of "misogyny," but that there are many sociological theories and representations surrounding the word that broaden its meaning. I agree with this, but that does not diminish the point I was making in my statement.

Then, what I had been waiting for happened. The feminist ideologues and trolls stormed in.

This is where the debate returned to the "inherent misogyny" of the sandwich. No, I'm not making that up or joking.

This portion of the debate was the payoff for my post. A commenter from one of the down-vote brigade trolling subreddits decided to engage me where my first detractors left off, with the sandwich joke.

I was told that a person saying a sandwich joke may not be misogynistic but the joke itself is inherently misogynistic.

Go ahead and read that again, I'll wait.

I wondered if I was seeing things, but that was indeed the counterargument being put forth. So, propelled by curiosity, I asked this feminist how a sandwich joke could be inherent woman hatred. Her response was mind-boggling.

> It assumes that the male is a command authority who can order the female to do whatever he wishes. His command to do what is considered stereotypical "woman's work" (i.e. cooking.) It makes the assumption that the female belongs in a kitchen instead of, say, in a laboratory, on a construction site, in a boardroom, or in a space shuttle. Finally, it ignores all the wants, wishes, desires, dreams and opinions of the female. She is just someone to be ordered around by the male with absolutely no thought whatsoever as to what she thinks or feels.

Okay, I'll admit that telling a sandwich joke, or a stove joke, or a vacuum cleaner joke, or any kind of joke in the context this feminist was describing can imply some of the reasoning behind their absurd previous statement. But is all of that inherent to the sandwich joke? Just the sandwich joke? A sandwich joke inherently represents a man as the "command authority?" I didn't ask the feminist this next question when I replied.

I didn't really have to ask this in order to refute the ridiculousness of the statement but… what if said sandwich joke is being directed towards a man? What if … and this is an even more radical scenario, what if it is a woman telling the joke about a man? Does the joke somehow change from being inherent misogyny to inherent misandry?

No. It doesn't. The joke holds no inherent misogyny or misandry. The joke is misogynistic if it is told in the context of misogyny, which is the hatred of women. This feminist, like most I have met has perceptual blindness to what I like to call: "facts and common sense". The only way she was able to field her argument was by adding on a list of things she feels is hatred towards women. I can't really see how a man being assumed as the one in charge is equivalent to the hatred of women, but I digress.

This tactic; adding on things that actual woman-haters are known to do, is what all but a few of the trolls replying to my statement attempted. All to disprove my claim that the definition of the word misogyny is what that word actually means, rather than whatever insults or offensive jokes and phrases that they don't like. This is a problem that has needed addressing for a long time. It is one thing to apply a statement like "women are liars when it concerns rape" to misogyny but when the word gets saturated in enough ideological dogma, sandwich jokes suddenly become the beacon of our culture's supposed woman hatred.

Sandwich jokes.

I would like everyone to take a brief break from this article to look at a short segment from the comedian Dave Chappelle. Skip to around 1:53 in the video and listen till about 2:50. Now please ask yourself, where exactly was the inherent woman hatred in that joke? According to feminist ideologues, Dave Chappelle holds contempt for women. I don't know the man personally so it's possible that he does, but stating so definitively requires a huge assumption. This is amplified if we're going to base that assumption off of a sandwich joke. But hey that's "logic" coloured through an ideologue's lense for you.

My final detractor, or rather my latest detractor, is none other than Mr. David "men can cause more damage with their bare hands so they are a bigger problem when it comes to domestic violence" Futrelle. For anyone who was wondering who this nefarious, neckbeard scratching, woman hating sleaze ball is I quoted at the beginning of this article, stop wondering. That's right, Mr. Futrelle, his self-righteous, morally superior man-boobs jiggling, is the misogynist you're looking for.

No the feminists say?

It's difficult to claim of the writer of the question: "What on earth is misogynist about calling all the fucking cunts who accuse men of rape of being goddamn lying bitches?" is a misogynist, regardless of the reason why he said it, and still deny Futrelle's inherent woman hatred.

Oh and because of my inherent integrity, something our depraved and futile friend dave seems to know little about, I'll admit I took his statement out of context. I'll do him a favor and repeat the statement in it's entirety.

> Seriously. What on earth is misogynist about calling all the fucking cunts who accuse men of rape of being goddamn lying bitches? When guys call women lying whores, they do it out of love.
>
> But hey, in all seriousness, I have to give [blank] props here for actually raising the issue of misogyny in r/mensrights.

You see! He was only "mocking" the misogyny of people who say those things seriously. But wait, he still said it. If something as harmless as a sandwich joke holds inherent misogyny and if the simple act of uttering the words cunt or bitch, for whatever reason is misogynistic then, wow, I don't know what to say, Dave. According to your groupies, you're a misogynist.

The logic hasn't sunk in yet? Allow me break it down for ya right quick, playa.

My original statement, you know the one that you quote-mined, leaving out the bottom half in order to induce that 'anti-misogynist rage without reading an entire statement' that your commentators are known for? Well, in that statement I said that there are things being applied to the word misogyny that do not uphold its meaning.

I said people, mostly feminist ideologues, are using the word to classify other people as woman haters just because those people happen to say something that pisses them off. The meat of my argument is the point I made at the end of my statement (the point you left out), which is classifying someone as a woman hater just because they say something that angers you or something you disagree with is more than just intellectually dishonest. It's dangerous.

There have been men and women classified as misogynists for not only saying the one sentence you and your groupies would like to focus on, but also every other thing I listed. Words are powerful. Words can cost people their jobs or even incite violence and physical harm. Misogynist, which you toss so freely about is one of the most powerful words in our time.

There was no word of defense in my statement for the people who do any of the hurtful things I listed. In fact I called the people who do and say some of those things, assholes. I state agin, that was what you "conveniently" left out. I said the people who do and say these things might hate women. Hell, some random person plowing a field out in the middle of nowhere "might hate women" but not everyone who might do or say these things hates women. In your snark, you make the implied claim of "why else would anyone say something like that?"

Let's examine why someone would say that all women are liars when it concerns rape. Let's posit a man who has just lost his brother. He and his brother had always been close. They did everything together and were always getting one another into and out of trouble. One day a woman accuses him of raping her.

There weren't any police involved and there was no trial. This was not because the woman never reported the alleged crime but it was because another man, perhaps her relative; believed her, and took matters into his own hands. In a story repeated all too often, he located the accused rapist and killed him.

He may have later learned there was no rape, and the claim was motivated by jealously, or to cover up infidelity, or for attention, or any other reason. Whatever the reason, she lied. Doesn't matter, a man dies, another man goes to jail, their families are shattered and destroyed, the local community talks about it for years. The damage splashes outwards onto relatives, brothers, in-laws.

Now imagine some third individual witness to these events, whose father, or brother, or uncle destroyed in the narrative described. Some man whose life was touched by this outward ripple of damage. Years later, at his friend's house a news broadcast pops up on the television. “Woman raped behind college dorm” the report says. The man in company he trusts says, “she’s probably lying like all women do.”

Oh but that scenario is bullshit right? Because no one ever loses their life over a false rape accusation, right? Ok. Well what if someone just says it out of frustration from hearing about so many people being wrongly accused of rape? Better yet, what if some quote mining jackass on the internet decides to say it in “mockery” of a valid argument? Because that never happens, right Futrelle?

Misogyny: The hatred of women

That is what misogyny means. Regardless of how upsetting it is to hear “All women lie about rape”, regardless of it’s veracity or falsehood, you don’t know what the person who said it actually thinks.

Are they ignorant for saying it? Possibly. However, ignorance might not apply, and the reason for stating an obviously hateful lie might involve a real hatred of the female sex, wrapped in a cloak of pious opportunist chivalry as Futrelle himself has demonstrated.

Another response to my statement worthy of mention flips the coin on this issue to the other side of misogyny, which is misandry.

> The thing is, a lot of the things that we call misandry also cover a range of things just as wide, and yet, we use that term all the time. I just think that we should refrain from culturing a double standard.

That quote tells the truth, and I had to step outside myself to address it long before I made my statement on reddit. It is no secret to anyone who reads my articles that I sling the words misandry, bigot, and hatemonger around with relative ease. In doing so, I am just as wrong as Futrelle is for claiming anyone who says something bad about women is a misogynist. This applies to nearly every MRA I have read, as well.

This is why I said near the beginning of this peice not only to challenge the absurdity orbiting the word misogyny but also to challenge those who call out misandry. It’s no secret that I am not a fan of Jessica Valenti.

I must have repeatedly pointed out her advocation for elimination of the legal right of due process. I have called this an act of misandry on many occasions. I was wrong. Stripping people of their right to due process is not misandric. Calling for only men to loose the right of due process is not misandric. The act itself is not misandric. However, if the person advocating for that act to take place or the person carrying out that act is doing so because of their hatred towards the male sex, then the act is misandric.

I expect I just lost about 25% of my MRA fan mail with that statement. too bad. Just like there are several reasons besides hate to say something hurtful, there are several reasons besides hate to do something hurtful.

Domestic violence shelters provide another example. For the moment, let’s ignore government funded shelters which have been known to falsify statistics, thereby justify denial of assistance to men in programs that were enacted on the premise of helping both men and women.

Let’s think about domestic violence shelters which actually fund themselves. These are privately owned and the owners can admit whoever they want. Naturally, certain individuals would only allow women aid in these shelters.

Is this because some of them hate men? Probably. But do all of them? Probably not.

Not every feminist literally hates men, but why else would they deny men?

Well, some women, especially feminist women, are actually frightened of men. In fact many women who seek aid in these shelters are frightened of men. If there is only one shelter and it is owned by feminists, then most likely only women are going to be admitted. Women walking away from an abusive relationship might actually be afraid of men in general.

This might be the only reason why they would restrict access to men, even if they genuinely need help. Does the routine denial of help to male victims of domestic abuse help piss me off? Oh yes, a great deal and I have on more than one occasion, called anyone who would do such a horrible thing misandrists and/or bigots.

It gets worse. Some feminists will deny aid to men because they truly believe that domestic violence is a gendered crime that only women suffer. While this is an ignorant belief, it doesn't necessarily have to be a hateful belief. But that is where the term misandry, like misogyny, loses some of its weight. Just because a feminist might be fucking stupid for believing something as outdated and ignorant as that doesn't mean she or he hates men.

I do understand the tendency we humans have to lash out at those who we feel are doing great harm, and as I said I am as guilty as those I have written about. When I first saw the "a man is a rape supporter if…" list; the first words that came to my mind were "fucking misandric bigot" and that mindset carried over into the response article I wrote. That response article was a satirical copy of the list but instead of rape supporters the list read "a feminist hates men if…"

I found it interesting, after I considered how far the words misogyny and misandry have been diluted on both sides, that even though I knew the things I listed weren't definitive actions a man hater would take, they were still pretty horrible things to do so I figured "what the hell? This asshole probably really does hate men anyway."

Ill state clearly I strongly believe she does, but I could be wrong. She might actually believe every man is a potential rapist and still not hate all men. She might just be stupid.

Why is any of this important? Words can be dangerous. The term "hate speech" is slowly rising in the western zeitgeist. It is becoming illegal to say what others find too offensive. A false empathy, pretence of sensitivity to the bruised feelings of others is beginning to override our free will and expression. I am not suggesting that we should openly pile vitriol on those we disagree with. However, I do not want to live a world where hurting someone's feelings is a crime.

Words are powerful, but they are only powerful if you give them power.

In an open society, people will say things which upset us.
Calling them woman haters, man haters, or assclowns does not always make it so.

After some consideration , I have decided to avoid the impulse to accuse someone of hating an entire sex when their apparently ignorant, or hateful declarations piss me off. I hold that Jessica Valenti is still a misandric bigot. But I acknowledge I could be wrong.

Oh and on a final note to my quote mining friend. Those lying bitches you speak of really wouldn't know real misogyny if it bit them on the ass.

Sex discrimination at London School of Economics

Sexism Busters · 13 November 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Tom Martin has made headlines[1] around the world for bringing a £50,000 sex discrimination lawsuit against the prestigious London School of Economics (LSE), claiming a gender studies Masters programme he withdrew from, consistently focussed on women and exaggerated female victim-hood perspectives, blaming men, in order to justify excluding[2] male equality debates.

Tom has discussed his case on A Voice for Men[3], and now appears in a youtube video, asking LSE students if discrimination against men in a gender studies course is justifiable, as the university's defence team now argue. Some LSE students are immediately hostile on camera, one declaring "There's no discrimination against men!" – the outburst juxtaposed by a fast-scrolling 160 item A to Z[5] list of discrimination issues faced by boys and men. Other students agree with Tom's cause, one quietly admitting "I've been here for three years and never heard or read of a study about equal rights or equal opportunities for men, so definitely, there's a case there."

The head of LSE's Gender Institute wrote[6] candidly in 2011 (p.10), that when 'women's studies' changed to 'gender studies' it signalled a new era of inclusion for men, and exclusion for the old victim-feminist bias, in favour of neutrality and objectivity – but that in truth, no such change happened. In 2008 [7] (p.275), she further spills the beans, " 'Gender studies' as a designation [rather than 'Women's studies'] is more likely to attract funding." On camera, one LSE gender student justifies a focus on women in gender studies as "just kind of what happens", so corruption for her too, the unproblematic norm.

False advertising aside, the contract all students enter with LSE, explicitly rules out sex-discriminatory learning materials, but Tom has shown[8], the compulsory texts[9] are full of male-blaming bias. At first the university denied any bias, but now Tom has measured it, the defence are trying to make lame excuses for the bias[10]. Evasive or disingenuous denials of discrimination by defendants in lieu of a proper investigation, are grounds for further prosecution (p.641).

One text[12] in the curriculum actually recommends bias, calling it 'Critical Studies on Men (CSM)'[13] – and according to various anecdotal reports[14], it taints a wide range of subjects, at every level, from kindergarden up[15]. Boys and men feel threatened by the negative stereotypes[16] targeting them, and research shows, this badly effects males' concentration and performance[17].

With 59% of university degrees going to women and 41% to men[18], the gap getting wider, Tom's lawsuit should invigorate educationalists to update their curricula and become more welcoming to males and male equality issues, as with females.

Equality, or a £50,000 lawsuit? For the 900 plus[19] women's studies and gender studies departments worldwide, it should be an easy choice.

[1] http://www.thisislondon.co.uk/standard/article-23983895-former-student-sues-lse-over-its-gender-bias-against-men.do
[2] http://www.guardian.co.uk/commentisfree/2011/sep/14/gender-studies-male-blaming-bias
[3] http://blogtalkradio.com/avoiceformen/2011/09/21/what-do-omen-want-and-an-interview-with-tom-martin
[4] http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=6y9_oklmHvU
[5] http://sexismbusters.org/ref1.html
[6] http://www.dukeupress.edu/Catalog/ViewProduct.php?productid=45732
[7] http://books.google.co.uk/books?id=Q7hPoTVrLJkC&pg=PA275&lpg=PA275&dq=
[8] http://sexismbusters.org/Line%20by%20line%20analysis%20of%20text%201.pdf
[9] http://sexismbusters.org/First%206%20week's%20core%20texts.pdf
[10]

http://www.thisislondon.co.uk/standard/article-23983895-former-student-sues-lse-over-its-gender-bias-against-men.do
[11] http://www.lag.org.uk/Templates/System/Publications.asp?NodeID=89132&Mode=display
[12] http://fty.sagepub.com/content/5/1/49.abstract
[13] http://jmm.sagepub.com/content/5/1/5.abstract
[14] http://www.youtube.com/user/e33State
[15] http://www.manwomanmyth.com/video/education/nursery-and-primary-school/
[16] http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Stereotype_threat
[17] http://www.guardian.co.uk/education/2010/sep/01/girls-boys-schools-gender-gap
[18] http://news.bbc.co.uk/1/hi/education/8085011.stm
[19] http://userpages.umbc.edu/~korenman/wmst/programs.html

Rape victims should not have to pay their rapists

NCFM · 13 November 2011 · Archived copy · Original nor should other crime victims like Justin Bieber, Catherine Kieu Becker's husband, or the millions of paternity fraud victims.

For two days now I've listened to morning talk jock Chip Franklin's[1] incessant rant and "outrage" over the Chrystal Harris spousal rape case[2]. Her husband was unemployed and losing it mentally. It was a horrible time. "I didn't know what to do," she said. He threatened to kill her. He choked her, slapped her, raped her, sodomized her, and forced her to perform oral sex. She was able to tape record the attack which was truly horrific.

Chrystal had a six figure job. San Diego Superior Court Judge Gregory Pollock ordered her to pay spousal support to her husband when released from prison in 2014. The judge also ordered her to pay for his attorney's legal fees.

Franklin started a scorched earth campaign against Judge Pollock; demeaned him, vilified him, and encouraged listeners to barrage him with protests. After all, Franklin was rightly "outraged" that victim Chrystal was being re victimized by being ordered to pay her abuser, the criminal, the perpetrator, her rapist…

Franklin was also incensed that Chrystal's husband would immediately upon his release from prison have joint custody of their children.

Now San Diego District Attorney Bonnie Dumanis is proposing long overdue legislative reforms to ensure violent crime victims do not have to compensate their abusers. But why now? Such injustices are hardly new. Many individuals and organizations have been advocating for similar legislative reforms for years. Now Johnny-come-latlies rise from the ashes like a born again Phoenix.

Were Chrystal a similarly victimized man the story would not have triggered Franklin's sensationalism sensor and Dumanis would not be proposing reform legislation. A man's victimization would have been a non event, understandable, perfectly fine, no big deal, nothing to get excited about.

So why have earlier pleas for crime victims reforms been ignored?

Franklin[3] wondered if "the old school guys" in Sacramento were the culprit. He thought "this was" an issue feminists should really get behind. He railed against the court and criminal justice systems for being unfair by re victimizing abused women. He praised the courage of the four or five women who called to tell him they had been raped but got no justice. Apparently he knew for a fact the callers were indeed rape victims, no other evidence required. If they had been male rape victims would Franklin's outrage been the same?

Franklin often mentions how he was raised by his mother and older sisters, which may explain his deference to women issues and superficial treatment of issues adversely impacting men and boys. Like the rest of us Franklin is a product of his environment. While understandable, though harmful, he, like millions of others, is chivalrous at the general expense and injury of males.

For example, Frankin gave cursory lip service to Mariah Yeater's[4] claim that she had sex with heart throb pop star Justin Bieber[5].

As many of you now know, Yeater[6][7] later gave birth to a son and wants a paternity test. Yeater was legally an adult and Bieber legally a child when they allegedly had sex. If the sex occurred, Yeater probably will not be arrested, not be tried, and not be imprisoned. Yeater will be shown to be a poor, misguided, and desperate young woman scheming to survive the best way should could contrive. She may even be portrayed as victimized like real crime victims. If she lied, falsely accused, jeopardized the life of another, she won't be arrested, tried, or imprisoned for that either; not even fined.

If true however, Yeater is by law a rapist. Even so, victim Bieber may be ordered to pay millions in child support to Yeater, as well as hundreds of thousands of dollars to cover Yeater's attorney's legal bills.

What if Yeater were the 15-year-old pop star and Bieber the 19-year-old rapist? Then, should Yeater, a young girl, be required to pay child support to Bieber and his legal bills? Never happen; and, Bieber would probably do some time behind bars.

Why should rapist Yeater retain custody of "their" purported child? Shouldn't Bieber, the rape victim, be given custody, receive child support, and have his legal fees paid by Yeater? Or, should that apply only when the victim is female?

Let's consider the case of Omaima Nelson. Last month, in Orange County, California, her bid for parole was denied[8], thank God.

Omaima murdered her husband, chopped him up bite-size, cooked his body parts, ate him and chased her dinner down with a bit of white wine. Police found her husband's head in the refrigerator, hands in a fry cooker, and entrails in his Corvette. Apparently Omaima sat at the kitchen table with her husband's cooked remains and said out loud: "It's so sweet, it's so delicious. I like mine tender."

There are no issues of spousal or child support for Omaima the Cannibal, her husband is dead. However, this case is so horrendous one would think it would be a focus of talk shows like Franklin's. Yet I cannot find anything to show he ever mentioned Omaima's predilection for sweet meat. Regardless, I suspect Franklin could not resist reviling the man who butchered his wife, fricasseed her, and chased his dinner down with a fine wine?

Then there's Westminster, California sweetheart Catherine Kieu[9][10]. In July 2011 Kieu poisoned her 60-year-old husband, tied him to a bed after he passed out from being sick, waited until he awoke, cut off his penis with a 10-inch kitchen knife, and in their garbage disposal ground his severed organ into sewage. Police found him in great pain, terrorized and bleeding profusely. He was hospitalized in critical condition. She said, "[h]e deserved it."

"It's hard to believe what would motivate a person to do this sort of thing. It's one of the worst things you could do to a person short of killing him," said District Attorney, Susan Kang Schroeder." I agree and such a crime has to be worse than threats, stalking, choking, and even rape?

So why wasn't Franklin "outraged" about Kieu? Like Nelson, I couldn't find any evidence that Franklin ever mentioned Kieu's butchery let alone devoted considerable air time to it like he did for Chrystal's rape.

If Kieu is released from jail, not convicted because of some "abuse excuse", not sent to prison where she belongs, it's possible her husband will have to pay her spousal support. Will Franklin be up in arms, albeit "outraged" about that? Doubt it. Franklin may be of the ilk that rallies with, "What did he do to piss her off."

Consider choking. Not strangulation, but "choking". Hands squeezing throat, thumbs deep in flesh, lungs begging for air, eyes bulging from fear, it stops, hands removed, red marks, bruising, breathing freely again, still fearful, rightfully so, now safe, nightmares, perhaps forever, not good, certainly a crime, but it's over, those few minutes of abject terror…

Now, consider paternity fraud, a choking of a different kind, much more devastating, seldom if ever prosecuted; perpetrators are readily identifiable, always goes free, and seldom suffer sanctions. The victims, thousands of men annually, are indentured up to 20 years or more to their female perpetrators and the State which is not only complicit in the crime but, openly protects the perpetrators.

These women are rewarded with tens of thousands of dollars in child support, counties get millions in Social Security Title IV-D incentive dollars, and the victim gets the privilege of paying for being victimized, just like Chrystal being ordered to pay legal fees and spousal support.

Undue mental and emotional force is by definition "violence". Paternity fraud certainly causes all of that and then some. Yet legislators and the agencies charged with child custody collections fight hook, line, and sinker against outlawing this perverse and debilitating thievery. All victims are fair game males.

Have you noticed a theme yet? Are you now able to answer the question why the laws were not changed earlier to protect real victims? Have you figured out why there has been no public outcry, no interest, and no political will to stop rewarding certain types of criminals by ordering their victims to support their abusers?

If not, you might want to read this article again while wondering why so many fathers with sons seem predisposed to sacrifice their lives to protect felonious women. I imagine people like Franklin find revolting the mere thought of wondering such a thing. Tomorrow, like millions of others, he'll start pandering to women again. He still won't get it.

It's the good'ol "Women's Caucus" that virtually controls or influences every piece of state legislation. Is it possible feminists have not rallied for reforms because they long ago realized that overtime such reforms may cost women more than they gain? Powerful legislative committees are often controlled by misandric female legislators who for decades have prevented meaningful paternity fraud and other reform legislation that benefit males. Courtly, if not fearful, male legislators generally acquiesce. New school feminists and "ol'school guys" drove legislation to absurdity where victims pay their abusers. Needed is common sense legislative reform absent gender politics. Needed are influential talk show hosts who "get it,"6 otherwise they do great harm.

[1] http://www.kogo.com/pages/chipfranklinmornings.html
[2] href="http://www.youtube.com/watch?feature=player_embedded&v=YpfeX8Mcn0I

[3] http://www.kogo.com/pages/chipfranklinmornings.html
[4] http://www.huffingtonpost.com/2011/11/02/mariah-yeater-justin-biebers-alleged-baby-mama-photos_n_1072211.html
[5] http://www.guardian.co.uk/music/2011/nov/03/justin-bieber-twitter-paternity-claims
[6] http://www.huffingtonpost.com/2011/11/02/mariah-yeater-justin-biebers-alleged-baby-mama-photos_n_1072211.html
[7] http://www.signonsandiego.com/news/2011/nov/03/woman-in-bieber-lawsuit-could-face-charges/
[8] http://www.socialworkers.org/pubs/code/code.asp
[9] http://news.yahoo.com/mans-penis-cut-off-put-garbage-disposal-210500789.html
[10] http://www.dailymail.co.uk/news/article-2041578/Catherine-Kieu-Woman-drugged-husband-cut-penis-pleads-guilty.html

Eve Ensler prefers GOOD rape

John Hembling (JtO) · 14 November 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Gentlemen and Ladies, may I have your attention please.

Eve Ensler is over it. She's over the whole rape thing. Brother, she's over, shes O-V-A-H![1]

In her own words "I am over rape. I am over rape culture, rape mentality, rape pages on Facebook."

Ensler is the feminist activist and writer, sometimes remembered for her authorship of The Vagina Monologues. The stage show in which a 13 year old girl is raped by a 24 year old woman, then utters the words "well, I say if it was rape, it was a good rape."[2]

Well. That was a short article. Thanks for reading it.

It might be that Ensler isn't exactly over rape. After all, she's just devoted 847 words to declaring, over and over just how over it she is. But I'm not buying it. She does, after all use the word rape 31 times in her HuffPo piece. The article is almost 4% rape by word count.

Ensler indirectly tells us what she's really doing by mention of several things she's "over".

"I am over Facebook taking weeks to take down rape pages."

Because that's bad rape, not good rape.
She makes no mention of the facebook, cafemom and other community webpages where male sexual mutilation and murder are celebrated, and where those pages remain online.

She's also "over" the /hundreds of thousands/ (no citation for that number) of women raped in the Congo. "still waiting for the rapes to end and the rapists to be held accountable." Again, thats women raped, so that would be bad rape, not good rape. However, no discussion of rape's application of a weapon of war can be undertaken without noting that men are routinely raped in wars on the African continent[3][4][5][6][7][8]. Ensler makes no mention of it, so I guess that's good rape too.

But she's over the thousands of WOMEN in Bosnia, Burma, Pakistan, South Africa, Guatemala, Sierra Leone, Haiti, Afghanistan, Libya [..] still waiting for justice.

She's also over the 1-in-3 women in the U.S military getting raped by their comrades. She doesn't cite a source for that number – of course, which likely means she made it up.

She's also, apparently "over women still being silent about rape". You know, like mentioning rape in the Congo and completely omitting note of any victim besides women. Or completely failing to mention in an article in which the word rape makes up 4% of the total word count – and omitting that twice as many men are raped in american prisons than women are raped in the entire United States[9][10].

So if Ensler is not "over" rape, as appears to be the case, mentioning it 31 times in only 847 words – what's really going on? She certainly appears to be deliberately omit mention of any victims besides women.

To make myself clear, I'm not raising the issue of male victims of rape to engage in a puerile victimhood-olympics. I'm making a different point.

There is a principal, known in law and in rhetoric called Expressio Unius Est Exclusio Alterius[11]. It means Expression of the part excludes consideration of the whole.

For Eve Ensler, there's good rape, and there's bad rape. Good rape (I'm just guessing here) would be the kind when a frivolous accusation of a college student destroys a man's academic and professional career after consensual sex. [12]

In fact, thanks to the legal innovations of ideologues like Ensler, the ultimate trump card of politicizing the personal bypasses the legal checks and balances traditional in western law. Habeas corpus, the presumption of innocence, the right to face one's accuser – these are fast becoming relics of history. Monologuing feminists like Eve lack the phsyical appendage they so incorrectly equate with male agency, and conduct their own acts of rape by proxy, using the courts. A false rape accusation is an act of malicious sexual violence which lasts a lifetime. It is rape.

Eve Ensler comes close to admitting that her obsession with rape is not outrage over injury to herself or those she cares about. She is jealous of the rapist.
"And thinking about rape every day of my life since I was 5-years-old"

Because as she wrote back in 1996 – there is bad rapes, and good rape.
"well, I say if it was rape, it was a good rape."[2]

Her HuffPo piece throws un-cited stats around with carefree abandon, so here's one more from Ensler.

"There are approximately one billion women on the planet who have been violated."

Why not a trillion?

As mentioned in previous discussions on this site – the number doesn't matter. Ensler's lie is built into the structure of her claim. Its not that [some number] of women are rape, or violated, or pressed into soilent green biscuits – it's that it she provides no context.

[Some number] of women are [forced to drink bleach] ! This creates moral panic. But it doesn't mean anything. Is the number a lot? Or a little? We cant compare, because there's no context.

How many men are victimized? That would be context. The lie is built in.

But getting back to Ensler's obsession with rape. She loves it. She loves the power that being a victim demographic brings her, and as she very nearly stated in explicit terms, her fantasy is to rape, which is why she's announcing that the war against male sexual agency is ramping up. Not war against rape – no. That would require compassion for victims, honest discussion of the reciprocal nature of partner violence, and it would require deviating from simple and easy narrative that women are victims, and men are just plain bad.

Ensler's escalation is an embrace of rape by proxy, the disposal of due process, the weaponization of accusation and the sanctity of fabricated victimhood.

Ensler asks a rhetorical question near the end of her declaration. She says "I am over the passivity of good men. Where the hell are you?"

Right here Eve, and you'll find we're anything but passive.

[1] http://www.huffingtonpost.com/eve-ensler/over-it_b_1089013.html?mid=52
[2] http://www.lewrockwell.com/orig/mcelroy2.html
[3] http://www.nytimes.com/2009/08/05/world/africa/05congo.html
[4] http://www.guardian.co.uk/society/2011/jul/17/the-rape-of-men
[5] http://www.msmagazine.com/spring2005/congo.asp
[6] http://www.hbo.com/documentaries/the-greatest-silence-rape-in-the-congo/index.html
[7] http://www.care2.com/causes/rape-tactic-of-war-in-the-congo-finds-new-victims-men.html
[8] http://www.newser.com/story/66130/congos-new-horror-men-raping-men.html
[9] http://www.hrw.org/reports/2001/prison/report1.html#_1_5

[10] http://www.spr.org/pdf/struckman.pdf
[11] http://www.duhaime.org/LegalDictionary/E/ExpressioUniusEstExclusioAlterius.aspx
[12] http://thefire.org/article/13758.html

Shrink4Men Radio: Abuse and the WTF moment

Dr. Tara J. Palmatier · 14 November 2011 · Archived copy · Original

[box icon="none"]

Relationship Stages

Do you remember the first time you saw behind your wife's, girlfriend's or ex's mask and saw her true abusive nature?

Do you remember the first time you wondered, "Who is this person?"

Do you remember the first time you realized, "Something is very wrong in this relationship and it's not me?"

If so, please tune into Shrink4Men Radio this evening when Dr. Tara Palmatier will discuss relationship stages, abuse (particularly men who are abused by women) and the WTF moment. The WTF moment is when you see behind your abusive partner's mask for the first time and finally realize there's a problem in your relationship and it's not you.

The telphone lines will be open, so if you have a question or story to share that pertains to this episode's topic, please call in (310 388 9709) or Skype.

[/box]

Sen. Leahy Drops Controversial VAWA Campus Sex Provision

Robert O'Hara · 14 November 2011 · Archived copy · Original

[box icon="none"]

PRESS RELEASE

But Civil Rights Violations Remain

Washington, DC/November 14, 2011 — As a result of criticism from Stop Abusive and Violent Environments (SAVE) and other groups, Senator Patrick Leahy (D-VT) has dropped the controversial "preponderance of evidence" standard from his proposed Violence Against Women Act (VAWA) reauthorization bill. "Because of the feedback he has received concerning this proposal, he does not plan to include it in the bill he later will introduce," according to Erica Chabot, spokeswoman for the Senate Judiciary Committee (1).

Language in the draft bill would have required federally funded universities to apply a lower standard of proof — a 51% "preponderance" of evidence rather than the usual "clear and convincing" evidence — in cases of alleged sexual assault or domestic violence.

SAVE is thankful that the Senator decided to drop this section from his proposed bill, but other parts of the measure still contain troubling civil rights concerns:

Due Process Violations:

- Allows for the continued funding of mandatory arrest policies, which a Harvard study found to increases in partner homicides of 60 percent.
- One false allegation can be used to tear apart a family: VAWA is an engine for the growth of single-parent households and the demand for welfare services.

Equal Protection Violations:

- Provides legal assistance to accusers, and at the same time, denies it for the accused
- Perpetuates sex-based discrimination through biased predominant aggressor policies and continues due process violations
- Does not distinguish between those simply making allegations and those with probable-cause evidence of violence or abuse

These civil rights problems are explained in SAVE's Special Report, Are Domestic Violence Policies Respecting our Fundamental Freedoms? (2).

Violations of citizens' civil rights cannot be justified by resulting reductions in partner abuse. The Department of Justice has acknowledged, "We have no evidence to date that VAWA has led to a decrease in the overall levels of violence against women."

SAVE spokesman Philip W. Cook says, "We congratulate Senator Leahy for removing the unacceptable 'preponderance of evidence' language from his bill. It shows that he is responsive to well-documented civil rights concerns. We hope that he and other Senators will now take the necessary steps to ensure that the many other problems with the proposed legislation are also addressed."

(1) http://www.burlingtonfreepress.com/article/20111111/NEWS03/111111020/Leahy-scraps-provision-upcoming-bill

-following-complaints?odyssey=nav%7Chead

(2) http://www.saveservices.org/downloads/SAVE-Assault-Civil-Rights

Stop Abusive and Violent Environments is a victim-advocacy organization working for evidence-based solutions to partner violence: www.saveservices.org.

Contact: Teri Stoddard

Telephone: 301-801-0608

Email: tstoddard@saveservices.org

[/box]

The question they never ask

Tom Givens · 15 November 2011 · Archived copy · Original

The collapse of western civilization™ continues apace, and the handwringing intensifies. As MRAs (or MGTOWs or PUAs) we are neither surprised, nor particularly motivated to preserve the status quo. Most of society, however, is scared and confused. Which I suppose is hardly surprising considering the cracks are appearing from all angles. The problem is, to see the cause of the rot, one must take the Red Pill. And most people think the Red Pill tastes horrible.

For decades now, the sweet, sweet nectar that is the Blue Pill has been in abundant supply. We have accepted as a society, on faith, that 'women never lie about rape', that 'domestic violence is overwhelmingly male on female', that 'discrimination has kept women down', and even that women aren't as sexual as men. The Blue Pill makes us feel powerful as men, and benevolent, as we bestow all these benefits and goodies on women, who surely deserve them as reparations for all the evil things other men have done to them (metaphorically speaking, of course).

We may not get the girl, but we're demonstrably made of stronger, purer moral fibre by providing and protecting…are we not? It is, after all, what we were designed to do by nature, and what we are expected to do by society. And we sometimes get a pat on the head when we do it.

Of course, we have to accept certain punishments as well, to show contrition and that we really mean it when we abase ourselves, and present the freshest offering. We must accept that men are simple creatures, easily controlled via our sexuality. We must accept that female approval is the only measure for a man, and that it is best if women define masculinity for us since we got it so wrong for such a long time. We must allow women to pass us in every social sphere, that achieving success is every woman's right, and that too many men is a reasonable phrase.

I could go on, however I believe we are all familiar with the litany. The point to take away is that the list of 'reparations' is ever-growing, ever more extreme. Some among the PUA crowd suggest this is a society-wide shit test. A suggestion that has a lot of merit, I might add.

The effect this increase in demands (along with a sharp decrease in the rewards for meeting said demands) has had on society is profound. This is not to say that direct legal / socioeconomic pressures alluded to here are the ONLY cause of The Collapse of Western Civilization(tm). Not at all. In some cases, they are merely the vector.

Let's look at some of the issues facing North America today. The failing education system, coupled with a welfare state that discourages self-improvement (in accordance with 'no child left behind, or let ahead') is but one of the mechanisms used to create today's mediocracy. Concern and fairness was cynically twisted to ultimately pick which group should succeed, and policy (if not Law) was adjusted to obtain those goals. Rather than treating all the students equally, and allowing natural ability to hold sway, educators pre-determined which children would succeed, based on their demographic group.

Those not in the preferred demographic group quickly learn to shut their mouths, and try and hold on as long as they can. This, over time, has led to an educational imbalance between the sexes. And this imbalance has led to, and will increasingly lead to, an Economic imbalance between the sexes. This has already begun to happen, and frankly the only thing making the imbalance less than glaringly obvious is the inclusion of the incomes of the Baby Boomers. Once they drop off the statistics, the true nature of this problem will be undeniable, and Government will no longer be able to hide the injustice. If only their White Guilt could drop off the RADAR as easily…

Currently, these issues are causing concern among the Intelligentsia. Such notables as Bill Bennett, Kay Hymowitz, and more have noticed that young women are having trouble finding suitable mates. And they are deeply troubled that men aren't rising to the challenge, and throwing themselves into becoming the man some woman might want to marry. And, as usual, they believe that whipping out the old Shame stick is going to continue to force men into the required role.

But the problems go a bit deeper than that, since the refusal to marry is a logically sound choice. There's quite a good case to be made that the level of risk, and the magnitude of the consequences for failure so great and long lasting, that marriage is a foolhardy choice, no matter your threshold. The potential rewards are irrelevant, since literally nothing is worth that amount of risk, in the eyes of a growing number of men.

Another of the main social ills we face is a result of these pressures, primarily through the vector of single motherhood. There is a reason why society frowns on this concept, and nearly every culture over all time has done so as well. Single mothers depend on charity to survive, and too many of them will bleed the society dry. The problem is, how do you deal with the problem once it's begun? No one wants to see massive swaths of child poverty, and children in rags with swollen bellies on Madison Avenue. Someone has to take care of Mom and her kids…right?

This is where the heavy hand of the law and the heavy hand of social roles get together and shake. Multiple causes of destruction of society stem from this area, nearly all of them a product of overblown Paternalism. The tendency to view sexual competitors in a less than flattering light combines with a social, and biological, compulsion to protect the female at all costs, and her children as well if possible. This is Camelot, and the place is crawling with White Knights more than happy to remove the rights, and posessions, and even children of men in obeyance of the edicts of an ideology they haven't even begun to grasp.

They rely on "experts'" for that sort of thing. Maybe a discussion panel on the evening news, or a blurb on page five. People to tell us why these tyrranical behaviours are needed, and just. To provide the sound bytes that encapsulate the meme (1 in 4!) that can then be used by the commoner to shut down anyone who questions them. So that the Beat may indeed Go On.

And it's largely worked while men lost their careers to trumped up harrassment charges, and went to prison because rape means a lot of things these days, most of which aren't illegal unless she feels they should be. The constant men are evil drumbeat from the domestic violence industry has made it all too easy to believe that men are all rapists underneath as well, and where there's smoke, there's fire after all.

We are then told it's better to err on the side of caution, as if the imprisonment of an innocent man is somehow of less concern than that a woman might not be automatically believed.

Is that Blue Pill losing some of it's sweet, sweet flavour? A lot of men in society are starting to answer yes to that question. They may not have found the Red Pill yet, but they know they're not big on the Blue Pill anymore.

So a lot of guys have started to withdraw from society. They've given up on an education system that obviously has no interest in serving their educational needs – and no, they don't want to 'deal with it', they want value for their money thank you very much. Like Marriage, Education is turning into a losing proposition where the cost far outweighs any possible benefit. Both in the teaching, and in the learning, women have begun to dominate, and thus their concerns have taken precedence over mens. And now college age men need to worry about being accused of sexual assault, since they can lose their career with the flimsiest of evidentiary standards used to determine their future. At least the presumption of innocence hasn't been reversed…yet. And the majority of students (ie, women) are more than happy to see Civil Rights trampled. As long as the right people are trampled, and for the right reasons.

But it doesn't stop there. It's in Society's best interest to grow, at least slightly, in population over time – at least in general. And an unintended side-effect of giving women so much power with Unilateral Divorce was a precipitous drop in the Marriage Rate (which continues to this day, by the way), so when Dan Quayle objected to the Murphy Brown storyline, he was (to the chagrin of many) dead right.

A lot of women opted to 'go it alone', either via Divorce, or the increasingly popular Single Mother by Choice 'movement'. As of the time of this writing, 42% of all children in the US are born to unmarried mothers. In some demographics, that figure is as high as 70%.

And someone has to pay for their upbringing. Being a Mother is the Hardest Job in the World(tm) after all, so it's hardly fair to expect a woman to be a Mother AND feed and clothe her kids herself. It's not the child's fault if Mom got pregnant via an anonymous one-night stand, and since someone has to pay, the Law says it should be the 'father' – or anyone willing to take on the role, willingly or not – that pays. No excuses, no mercy.

Except that same Law also denies these same men the right to decide if they want to become a father at all, even while holding them responsible for any children born against their will. There is literally nothing he can do if a woman decides he would make a good ATM…er 'father'…for her. Oh, and her kids.

The only way for a man to protect himself from this happening with any degree of certainty is to avoid women altogether. Or get a vasectomy and never get too close. This social pressure has pushed men away from women in anything but the most facile of relationships, reducing the value of relationships to mere sexual transactions…a bit of release and some bodily fluids exchanged, then back to the daily…

The resulting lack of intimacy has spurred a feeling of 'being used' in a lot of women. Which is fair enough, since it's largely true – although I would maintain this is precisely because women have steadily allowed themselves to be reduced to having no value in any other area of life. Indeed, they have been tricked into becoming a danger to men…something best avoided.

Women have allowed themselves to be worth not much more to the average man than a zipless fuck. And a lot more dangerous than the average wolverine.

Wow, now that's Progress. Feeling empowered ladies? Men now have to be enslaved by the State to do the things they used to willingly, and gladly, do for their families. And every encounter with you carries the risk of Prison in a he said/she said courtroom.

So men withdraw further.

As intended so long ago.

So, now we have a society with a large portion of it's males in Prison (more than the USSR in it's heyday), the ones that remain in society are highly undereducated and lacking in prospects for employment. In many western societies, upwards of 20% of the young men are considered unemployable, as in not likely to ever hold a job. 1 in 5. How's that for a scary sound byte?

We have failing relationships, a crumbling Marriage Rate, social instability from rampant single motherhood and fatherless children, incarceration further limiting the prospects of an ever greater segment of society, and whole generations of men who see literally no benefit to being a member of the society they live in…just a lot of bills to pay for everyone else's stuff.

None of the things I talked about here are denied, and in fact many of them occupy the intelligentsia quite a bit. They are very real problems, and they 'concern' a lot of people. And by 'concern', I mean not at all. Because they all, every last one of them, fail to ask the one question they would ask immediately if these issues were facing women:

"What are we doing, as a society, to cause this?"

I suppose that's because the answer would make them confront some beliefs they don't want to confront. The urge to 'justify' it all, based on an illogical 'Theory' based on falsehoods and prejudice, may prove too great to deny. But until they do, these problems will continue to get worse. And, I suspect, that too is intentional.

Indoctrination in the Duluth Model for continued harm

Greg Canning · 16 November 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Michael Flood – political indoctrination or education?

A student who knows I have an interest in domestic violence research recently forwarded me an email invitation she (and presumably all students on the James Cook University mailing list) had received, inviting her to a seminar "He hits, she hits: Assessing debates regarding men's and women's experiences of domestic violence." An initial small glimmer of hope that the title might have implied the seminar would present an unbiased gender neutral approach to a controversial topic quickly dissolved upon reading the flyer. A major component of the stated aim of the seminar was to "assesses the political character and agendas of those groups involved in advocating for a gender-equal approach to domestic violence." The presenter of the seminar Michael Flood, a purported expert in the field, appears to be locked in the seventies and still cites the discredited Duluth model as the preferred theoretical basis for addressing family violence.

A quick check of Flood's CV revealed a recent article published in a journal called "Violence Against Women" http://vaw.sagepub.com, nope you wont find any non gendered view of reality there, the journal title conveys the ideology within.

Not unexpectedly feminist ideologues posing as academics choose such forums to expound on their male hatred and it would be hard to find a better example than this 2010 article " 'Fathers' Rights' and the Defense of Paternal Authority in Australia" . The central tenant of this opinion piece long on dogma and short on evidence is that men should be denied their democratic right to express opinions on issues such as false allegations of domestic violence, residency and contact with their children, and bias within the family court because by doing so, they are increasing "violence against women" and turning back the "significant advances of feminism."

Implicit throughout the article is the false and unsubstantiated linkage of "violence against women" and "child abuse" as if they are one in the same thing, implying that any "fear" contrived by a mother automatically translates to a "risk" for the child. It beggars belief that one credentialed as a sociologist could be so illiterate of human nature. The overwhelming desire most fathers is to protect their children, they are expected to and would gladly if needed sacrifice their own lives to protect their children, and many have done so in the past. Such protective instincts come acutely into focus when a malicious and vindictive mother wants to enlist the states power to remove children from the safest environment, an intact family, to the environment that is well known to pose the highest risk for children of abuse, the mother headed household.

Flood insists that these evil fathers rights groups groups use typical rhetorical devices such as "an appeal to formal equality, a language of rights and entitlement, claims to victim status (and) the conflation of children's and fathers' interests." The implication being that somehow none of these well abused feminist tactics should be used to counter the ideology who pioneered them. Kinda reminds me of the "fight fair" idea espoused to "perpetrators" of DV, which essentially says don't ague with a women, thats domestic abuse!

Although Flood is dismayed that men's rights groups have achieved such visibility, he accepts that "Painful experiences of divorce and separation, as well as experiences of family law, produce a steady stream of men who can be recruited into fathers' rights groups." But rather then offering any concern for the steady stream of dispossessed men or addressing the cause of their pain, or acknowledging the consequent suicide rates for men, he laments that such increased numbers of recruits may increase the political influence of mens groups.

In Floods' words it is quite acceptable that "Women's movements in Australia have had a distinctively high level of direct involvement in government policy making, with feminist bureaucrats or "femocrats" playing key roles," but quite unacceptable that " Fathers' rights groups have become vocal opponents of feminist perspectives." His sexist agenda clearly being that women's voices should not only be heard but acted upon, while mens groups should not even have the right to speak.

Amongst the supposed achievements of feminism he notes, is making “violence in the home a criminal offence.” No mention is made that criminal assault and battery has always been an offence no matter where it takes place, rather the achievement of feminism was creating a new class of criminal out of men who dared disagree with women, at a time disagreement is most likely to occur, after a women unilaterally decides to end a relationship. The women then uses control and power tactics to enlist the abuse industries considerable resources to achieve their often stated threat to financially ruin their spouse and alienate him from their children. This is the real state sanctioned and aided domestic violence and if it was, as it should be, acknowledged as such men would account for the majority of victims of domestic abuse.

The growth of the abuse industry and the propaganda machine that goes with it is, in Floods view a good thing, as are the erosion of civil rights by “expanded police powers”, “reduced standards of evidence” “quasi-criminal protection or restraining orders”. No mention is made of the vested financial interests of the hordes of abuse workers, lawyers, feminist pseudo-academics, and other hangers on who derive financial sustenance from such morally contemptible activities and whose motive is, to clearly grow their business. If this industry was results based and actually decreased domestic violence and conflict many would be unemployed, hence the perverse incentive to keep case loads high even if this means redefining domestic violence to include the most trivial infractions , and to “emphasise ‘reasonable’ fears regarding personal safety.”

In the circular illogic so typical of feminist thinking Flood claims to understand the motivation of men who bring contravention orders against malicious mothers who breech contact orders, claiming they are “harassing” the mother and have no genuine interest in contact with their children, when he more rightfully should be condemning the mother for acting illegally and breaching the basic human rights of the father and children. A man who does not seek contact (not being being violent in Floods view, by causing his spouse the discomfort of having to face changeover with him) will of course be labeled as distant and uncaring, simply another inequitable win and win again situation for the mother.

What merge attempt there is to justify his position relies more on rehashing the words of other ideologues then presenting credible evidence. The evidence he does cite relates to a handful of small case series without statistical power and extreme selection bias being derived from some of the more extreme cases dealt with in family courts. Ignored are the great mass of average men caught up in separation, divorce and the domineering and abusive actions of women wielding “their” children as weapons, never reaching a court room because they cant afford it financially or emotionally, they are correctly advised that their chances of success are negligible, or through altruism are not prepared to put their children through the emotional duress that such court action would bring.

Rather than crediting magistrates and solicitors working in the area of family law with having any understanding of what happens routinely in their own workplaces, Flood makes the ridiculous assertion that their views are based on pressure from mens rights groups. If 90% of magistrates believe that protection orders are used as a tactic in family court proceedings, then this is highly likely to be the case, they are certainly used in general as a power and control technique by women in separation and divorce. Weather they admit to it or not, all family law practitioners know this, and Australia is likely not far behind the USA when failure to recommend a protection order be taken out by women against their husband in such circumstances can be construed as “malpractice”. It’s not too difficult to see how DV statistics in general become bloated.

Further Flood argues that the changes requested by fathers groups are a betrayal of male victims of domestic violence, and are rhetorical rather than real. He writes “Such changes would represent a profound erosion of the rights and protections available to the victims of violence and the ease with which they and their advocates can seek justice.” Such a statement might hold some truth if indeed male victims of domestic violence were recognised or able to access even a fraction of the services and resources available to women, which of course they are not. Rather men who approach existing DV services are likely to have a feminist abuse worker accuse them of being a perpetrator and offer a program to help curb their violence, and there is certainly no “justice” to be gained from that.

Perhaps Floods' grandest lunacy is the claim the research based "quantitative measurement instruments focused on acts of violence" are not actually measuring violence, but inventing it, effectively allowing him to though his feminist tinted glasses to ignore the large body of evidence showing the frightening extent of female on male and reciprocal violence. It should be noted that social scientists finding such evidence of female acts of DV have often been reluctant to publish their findings, and when they did, have faced vilification and even death threats from the same feminists who insist women are incapable of violence. The chilling accounts of abuse perpetrated on Erin Prizzy founder of the first UK first women's shelter, and the death threats against Strauss/Gelles in the US are but 2 well known examples.

Flood concludes that "the efforts of the fathers' rights movement in Australian family law are already putting women, children, and indeed men at greater risk of violence and abuse." Even if he were correct which he is not, his solution is a totalitarian stifling of debate, and call for fathers groups to be silenced or ignored. Flood goes further than the Orwellian claim that that all animals are created equal, but some are more equal than others, to an outright claim that men are simply not equal at all. His female supremacist masters are not doubt proud of his efforts, but in defence of intellectual honesty should such a person by indoctrinating young and impressionable students, I think not.

http://www-public.jcu.edu.au/public/groups/everyone/documents/news_item/jcu_093632.pdf

http://www.ncbi.nlm.nih.gov/pubmed/20133921

http://www.oneinthree.com.au/

http://www.erinpizzey.com/

http://www.abc.net.au/news/2010-09-02/ombudsman-finds-domestic-violence-campaign/2245608?section=justin http://www.uow.edu.au/arts/ssmac/staff/UOW084229.html

Brown University declares due process dead

John Hembling (JtO) · 16 November 2011 · Archived copy · Original

[dropcap]B[/dropcap]rown University is a private, Ivy League university located in Providence, Rhode Island. It's also where the school's faculty and administration have endorsed the eradication of due process – and where the school's newspaper, the Brown Daily Herald printed the following statement.

> "You need to check your behavior carefully before you enter into a relationship with a woman. There will be no due process if you are accused of rape. The woman's version of what happened will always be accepted over the man's account."[1]

Do I need to keep writing, or is that enough?

For context, I've included the fifth and sixth amendments of the Bill of Rights.

- No person shall be held to answer for a capital, or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a Grand Jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the Militia, when in actual service in time of War or public danger; nor shall any person be subject for the same offence to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb; nor shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself, nor be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor shall private property be taken for public use, without just compensation.

- In all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial, by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which district shall have been previously ascertained by law, and to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation; to be confronted with the witnesses against him; to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor, and to have the Assistance of Counsel for his defence.

Do not skip over those two short paragraphs. Please don't simply bypass them, because without them, the only redress of accusation, injury or grievance devolves to the use of force, the jurisprudence of a mob, or a vendetta.

The ideology driving the "thinking" at universities like Brown has gone beyond being a parody of itself and has crossed deep into the territory of Kantian nightmare.

I hesitate to call this feminism – although I know it is that victim cult taken to a logical extreme by blind progression without opposition. What I don't hesitate to call it is stupid, hate-driven bigotry on par with the set-of-mind which led in recent history to late-night lynchings. It is the most craven abdication of ethics by academicians, and were it not happening now, a parody containing such events would be rejected as too absurd.

I have written many times that human society, in the absence of a viable system for nonviolent redress of grievance – such as the due process of law – will always adapt an alternative system of redress. The simplest such alternative being retributive violence. Im am surely not uniquely prescient to see this. Academicians at institutions like Brown University cannot possibly be so stupid they fail to grasp this simple concept.

For the moment, I will setting predictions of upheaval aside. A student, or parent who reads the words published by the Brown Daily Herald, and sees the school as anything but a free-fire zone where young lives are destroyed must be equally stupid.

> "There will be no due process if you are accused of rape. The woman's version of what happened will always be accepted over the man's account."

A university is a business, it sells a service. The students of a university are the customers. They're the ones who buy the university's product.

Male students : you have just been told that a business you pay, that you are customers of – this business will cheerfully ignore the law. That this business will constitute its own laws along lines of sexual ideology, and that you have no rights should you ever be accused of by any female customer of the business.

There will be no due process if you are accused of rape.

Brown University used to be a private, Ivy League university located in Providence, Rhode Island. Now it is a private fiefdom run along the lines of a female supremacist victim cult. If you are male, and you attend this school, then you may simply be too stupid to help, and your life's purpose may be to serve as a warning to others.

[quote style="boxed" float="right"]you are culpable.[/quote]If you are female, and you attend this school, and you say nothing, and do nothing, and sit quietly as your institute of higher learning pursues the policies of sexual apartheid, you are culpable.

Following the lead set at Brown University, the future is not a feminist utopia of women carried in gilded thrones on the backs of chained men. Utopian dreams are always false. What's coming has the shape of a mad-max future of wastelands, and universal application of the warlord model of local government. Unfortunately, before we arrive at any outcome so sunny, cities will burn, and bodies will litter the streets. This is not a threat, nor a promise. Despite what detractors of men's rights writing in general, and my writing in particular say, I have no sympathy for violence. America has been the most prosperous and affluent cultures in history, and when the great dream becomes the failed state, it will be very ugly indeed.

But don't worry ladies, that bad outcome could be as much as 50 years away. Lots of time for somebody else to solve the problem.

Back in the present, graduates of Ivy League schools tend to a degree of pride on the subject of their alma matter, and even now – this is justified. Post baccalaureate degrees can be a draining program of lost sleep and hard work. However, there's not much of altruism in attaining academic credentials, people do this for their own benefit, as they should.

I had intended to include and then examine a quotation from the Russian novelist Tolstoy.

> "All that is required for evil to prosper is for good men to do nothing"

The Russian didn't say so, but his good men includes good women. I'm not convinced either animal exists, except as defined in each moment by their acts. However, in the context of animals doing nothing, there's reason to examine the pride of an ivy league graduate, whose framed papers adorn their office wall.

Humans tend to be obtuse when faced by their own inaction – so Ill state this again in explicit terms. If you are a female student or staff of Brown University, and you benefit from a female-favouring climate while your alma mater discards the human rights of men, you are culpable. It will not be forgotten.

The Russian was famously verbose in his work, but I'll leave just one more comment of his.

> I sit on a man's back, choking him, and making him carry me, and yet assure myself and others that I am very sorry for him and wish to ease his lot by any means possible, except getting off his back.

[1] http://www.browndailyherald.com/letter-in-defense-of-u-s-handling-of-mccormick-1.2670225#.TsK3AetWL6g

Niko, here's why Jenna Karvunidis is a registered offender

John Hembling (JtO) · 17 November 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Today AVFM received an email from a fan of the site. Some readers might remember that back in October, a Chicago mommy blogger named Jenna Myers Karvunidis famously pressured her daughter's pre-school into excluding fathers from participation in shared supervision of toddlers – Based on the egregiously false and hateful claim, made by Karvunidis that "99% of sexual predators are men, only 1% are women."

As this is a men's rights website, run by men's rights activists, a major fraction of the work we do is to debunk lies like this one. Lies which continue to be promoted by the feminist mainstream in complete knowledge of their falsehood, and which serve to demonize and marginalize men in our society.

Karvunidis's article made it clear that she knew she was indulging biased, bigoted and reactionary thinking – she was quite explicit in saying so.

"I know I'm being sexist. "

"I understand I could be wrong and we're not in the "socio-economic risk demograhic." I get it, but I don't feel it. "

I'm quite sure that in the mid 20th century, the wives of klansmen knew at an intellectual level that the blacks their husbands lynched were just decent men caught in an age of acceptable hatred, but they still feared those black man, so killing them felt right.

On discovering Karvunidis's public promotion of factually false, male targeting hate, I posted a comment on her blog. The text of that comment was exactly as follows.

> Jenna Myers Karvunidis. Your claimed, but unsourced statistic – that 99% of sexual predators are men, only 1% are women is an egregiously false, and hateful lie. And when we discuss abuse of children, as your article focuses on, then a factually backed up claim would be that women are the world's champions at abusing children.
>
> The US Department of health and Human Services show mothers abusing children at more than double the rate of fathers.
>
> http://www.acf.hhs.gov/programs/cb/pubs/cm08/figure3_6.htm

This was a relatively mild rebuke, and provided Karvunidis a reputably sourced statistic in correction of her own false claim, as well as an opportunity to directly address and correct the open bigotry of her original posting.

My comment, posted on her blog was removed within 24 hours. What followed was a series of puerile taunts from Karvunidis – including the accusation that men objecting to her unsourced 99% were themselves sexual predators attempting to molest Karvunidis 's daughter. The depravity of this claim by Karvunidis exceeds my descriptive powers.
The chicago mother and blogger, once faced by a rising tide of public objection to her promotion of male targeting hatred and lies declared herself proud to be a bigot.

On October 19 2011, She was listed on a registry of female murderers, false accusers, corrupt public officials, and bigots – under the category of offence of Bigot.

Within a week – An email arrived from Jenna Karvunidis claiming to have seen her error, and promising a public apology. In this email, she acknowledged that men are routinely demolished by unsupported accusation from women.

[box icon="none"]
"I now realize many of the men so outraged at me were victims themselves. It sincerely hurts my heart to have caused any damage to a group of people. I had never heard of MRA before this incident and am saddened to learn about the plight of men in this modern world. It indeed must be terrifying to live under the constant possibility that a woman's word will be taken at face value and ruin your life."

[/box]

She further stated her intent to correct, to the degree she could, the damage done by promotion of hateful lies on her relatively high profile blog.

[box icon="none"]
"Please allow me to make this right. True, I am concerned about my online presence to a degree and the thorn my profile here has caused. More so troubling me is the fact that I spoke out having NO idea of the harm my speech could do.

I would be more than happy to post a sincere apology on my blog along with better statistics, perhaps shedding light on a topic so many people are in the dark about. MRA issues are a completely new concept to me, but indeed a worthy one."
[/box]

And she did in fact post a follow up article, which had some of the characteristics of an apology. Unfortunately, that posting finished with a disclaimer, which rendered the preceding text void.

[box icon="none"]
"I will remove this post if any further negativity is directed at me or my family and I reserve the right to moderate comments."
[/box]

Several people besides Karvunidis commented on this site and others demanding the removal of Karvunidis from the registry of offenders. These postings moved me to write an article explaining exactly why a public promoter of anti-male bigotry would not be de-listed from the bigot category on register-her.com. That article is here.

The last paragraph, for anybody without the inclination to read it in full is quoted here:

This is why identifying, documenting and publicly exposing ideologues matters. It is opposition to hate and violence. This is the reason that among rapists, killers, false rape accusers – the category of Bigot exists on the site register-her.com. It is why we identify ideological bigots, shine a bright light on them for the world to see, and afford promoters of hate no mercy – and no rest.

This brings us to today, and a new friend of the site who has emailed us. It is Jenna's husband – and his email betrays a degree of confusion which occasions my summary on events in the preceding paragraphs. The text of his missive is included here. I will address his several points below.

[box icon="none"]

Dear Paul Elam,

Now I know some time has passed and I normally don't get involved in my wife's internet affairs, but I think at this point its safe to say that the vicious defamation that took place a couple weeks back against my wife went way too far. I figured all the hoopla would blow over in a couple days, but of course it didn't – mostly because of yours and related websites condemning feminists. What's really amazing is that she is being decried as a feminist when in fact she is and we are very traditional in most of our beliefs.

Let me first say that Jenna and I are in COMPLETE agreement that we did not want the neighborhood Dads who happen to volunteer at our school help my little daughter in the bathroom. Nor would I want to be put in the position to have to perform this task if I was asked to help out. Let us be clear that this, and only this, is the issue at hand.

Jenna has weathered this storm as an individual but she did not act alone in this matter with the school. Our whole extended family discussed this matter and agreed that no matter the gender, we were concerned with the schools policy, or lack there of. Additionally, she cited a statistic from the Abe & Harlow Molestation Prevention Study which she was chastised for. Now it seems that these statistics are in dispute, which is fine, but shouldn't that organization be the one that receives your angst?

I beg the question, is our family questioning the schools toilet policy a reason to persecute and embarrass a person – especially one that has apologized to those that she offended? Is it a reason to ruin someone's all too important web image in our new internet-based world? I imagine you have bigger fish to fry than a pre-school Mom spooked by a child abuse study.

What has subsequently taken place since the original post is a complete and utter misunderstanding of what was intended. The relentless verbal attack is not warranted in any way, shape, or form. The fact she continues to be placed on Register-Her.com as a sex offender is quite ludicrious.

So I implore you Paul, please do us all a favor and cease and desist. Sounds like a lot of your followers have reached the same conclusion. If you want to have an effective registry, at least pick on targets you can all agree are a threat.

So as you would say:
And I naively thought it would go away.
We are not smiling about it any more.

Thank you for your consideration

[/box]

For the remainder of this article, I will directly address this email's author.

Good afternoon Mr Karvunidis, thanks for your letter. Paul is out of the office this week, so you'll be dealing with me on this matter. I am the co-host of Mr Elam's radio show, and I also do videos. You might enjoy my recent treatment of a eugenics enthusiast and female supremacist named Pam O'Shaughnessy.

- [Perilous Pamela]
- [Eugenics for a Feminist Utopia]

[image]But let us address your concerns Niko, starting with "vicious defamation". This is a mischaracterization of our treatment of your wife. Prior to Mr Elam taking some time away from the running of operations at AVFM – he has consistently moderated the enthusiasm of other contributors such as myself. While Paul is this site's founder and senior member of the editorial board, he is considerably more conservative in his brand of activism than what some members prefer. We pursue an agenda of human rights here, on behalf of a demographic brutalized, vilified, and silenced by almost all mainstream media. In temporary charge of operations as I am, I endeavour to maintain the site's character as Mr Elam has set it, but my personal preference is for a considerably more aggressive stance. We have dealt most gently with Jenna so far.

In addition, the claim by you of defamation, whether vicious or otherwise is similarly incorrect. To be defamation, the listing of your wife as a bigot would have to be false.

You have also expressed amazement that she is decried as a feminist (an ideology which, once examined is demonstrably built on hatred and violence). Why wouldn't she be decried as a feminist? She self-identifies as one.

From her original blog posting :
"As a matter of fact, I pick and choose when I'm a feminist"

"…I'm being sexist. The feminist, progressive, modern, cool kid perspective …"

Your next point : "we did not want the neighborhood Dads who happen to volunteer at our school help my little daughter in the bathroom."

You imply these are random men off the street, while admitting they're the fathers of children attending the same classes as your daughter. So you share your wife's asinine and factually insupportable bigotry. Your wife deleted my first comment on her blog, here's the chart I included in my rebuttal of her lie.

The US Department of health and Human Services show mothers abusing children at more than double the rate of fathers. http://www.acf.hhs.gov/programs/cb/pubs/cm09/figure3_6.htm .

And yes, that's the same link I included earlier in this article, and in my comment on Jenna's blog on October 18 this year, which she deleted. I keep reposting it because like most people, you're too stupid and lazy to correct your moronic and bigoted cultural assumptions. A fact you further demonstrate with your email to us, Niko.

Mr Karvunidis, you've also asked why I and other men's rights advocates address your wife's promotion of a debunked statistic rather than direct our ire at the source of that debunked stat. She didn't cite a source. She just repeated a lie. I was kind enough, in my comment on the blog to provide the source for my correction of her lie, which she deleted. Is that clear enough for you sir?

Your next question, Mr Karvunidis, is does your family's questioning the schools toilet policy a reason to persecute and embarrass a person – especially one that has apologized to those that she offended.

Questioning the schools policy was never the issue – and if you were honest, you would not attempt to float that stinker in your letter to Mr Elam. The problem was, and remains Jenna Karvunidis's persitant claim that despite being provided with peer reviewed research, in the face of her her own self-admitted bigotry "I know I'm being sexist" she responded to the objections to her hateful lies with accusation and triumphal gloating.
Quoting her again: "I didn't care if I was a bigot "

As for her apology, It was not an apology. Apologies don't come with disclaimers.

Doctor Tara Palmatier, whose skill in evaluation of human motivation exceeds my own had the following to say about the apology of Jenna Karvunidis

"Apologies never include the word, "but." What's more, she is still defending her actions. This woman, with her disingenuous apology, is more dangerous than the other bigots on R-H. Why? Because she was able to con some folks with her expedient crocodile tears and dubious mea culpa.

She's not sorry for what she did. She's sorry she's being publicly called out for it. Big difference.

She still believes painting men as potential molesters was right and she still believes she was right in bullying the daycare."

Mr Karvunidis, you further state " I imagine you have bigger fish to fry than a pre-school Mom spooked by a child abuse study"

Yes, we do, and we'll fry them too. But let's not pretend your wife is merely a pre-school mom spooked by a discredited study.

Jenna is an activist, not a bystander. Though she may be small-fry in the scheme of things, she has spread hatred against men and is proud of the effect her work has had in her community.

Niko, you go on to opine that your activist wife's continued placement on a registry of criminals and bigots is "ludicrous". I'm saddened that anybody sees the opposition to promotion of hatred, lies and the marginalization of half the population is a "ludicrous" endeavour. However, this failure of understanding nicely underscores the continued need for an aggressive and vigorous men's rights movement.

You also exhort my colleague Mr Elam to cease and desist. No sir, we would do nobody a favour by taking that advice.

Proponents of hate, like your wife continue to shape a public zeitgeist in which the murder of men is excused. The ideologues writing articles and books telling a female electorate that their emotions matter more than facts, and that good men are the ones willing to self sacrifice for female privilege, passed off as empowerment.

This is why what we do, which seems so painful to you is necessary. Identification of, and exposure of ideologues matters. This opposition to hate and violence is why bigots are listed along with rapists, killers, false rape accusers. It is why expose them brightly for the world to see. And why we afford the promoters of hate no mercy and no rest.

However, I would like to thank you for your email, as it afforded me this opportunity to place Jenna Karvunidis's register-her listing in the category of Bigot back into the spotlight.

Thank you for your kind attention.

Feminism is not Built on Violence or Hate

John Hembling (JtO) · 18 November 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Several days ago this site ran an article addressing the unintentionally revealing ravings of a disturbed ideologue who still manages to cling to the pretence of being a brave righter of wrongs and champion of the meek. However, Eve Ensler demonstrated in her comments that her life-long obsession with rape is not driven by some noble humanism or desire for justice. She appears to simply be jealous of the physical strength and outboard plumbing which allows men the possibility of overpowering a smaller individual, and reflected in Ensler's distorted desires, committing rape.

This wasn't a new consideration for me, I did wonder if Eve might consider indulging herself with fantasies of raping individuals of lesser physical prowess than herself, children for example. Then I remembered she's already included those fantasies in her play "the Vagina Monologues". Whoops, I guess I'm late to the party. The reality that some women sexually abuse children is unsurprising. Women aren't special human beings, they're not innately innocent, or pure, or magical, they're just humans. People quite naturally put themselves into positions of access to what they're attracted to. If it's children, then they'll gravitate into roles affording access to children, and the sex of a potential child abuser has no impact on that.

However, the accepted narrative in our culture is dominated by the perverse ideology well known to readers of this site which places a masculine label on all that is negative. So despite continued reportage of cases like Vanessa George, Angela Allen, Tracy Lyons and Tracey Dawber (pedophilia), Casey Anthony (child murder), Crystal Dawn Mckenzie (murder) Rachel Hicks, Abbie Swogger, Lisa Marinelli (rape) – the approved party line remains focused solely on offenders who happen to be male.

According to Author and director of the UK Charity Kidscape, Michelle Elliot, over 75% of cases of child sexual abuse by women were committed where women acted alone or without male participation, and this, according to Elliot, "messes up the narrative". Elliot was blacklisted following her publication of "female sexual abuse of children" in 1994.

Returning to I'm-over-it-Eve and her rape fantasies, how long have ideologues used a belligerent mantra of women's victimization to shout down more reasoned humanist voices pointing to peer reviewed research undermining the narrative of female victimhood? This goes beyond a childish inability to engage in civil debate, and beyond ideological blindness in which conforming data is selected and nonconforming data rejected. The feminist victim mantra is most understandable in recognition that it's proponents are projecting their own unacknowledged impulses onto the sexual demographic accused of all wrong-doing in the world.

There is a simple reason why feminist ideologues who endlessly beat on the drum of female victimhood and male aggression rely so heavily on anecdotal evidence and debunked research like the infamous Koss study. Its not just that the peer reviewed data fails to support men=bad, women=good. The accepted narrative of male evil continuously promoted is projection of desire. The ideology commonly called feminism, which wraps itself in a phony blanket of pious humanism is, after all a doctrine built on the foundation of hatred and violence.

This realization is thrown into sharp focus by recent developments, including the reporting several on this site of an ongoing criminal conspiracy to engage in male-targeting eugenics. An article written by Pamela O'Shaughnessy used euphemistic language to suggest mass murder and eugenics as a solution to imagined male defect. This attracted a collection of feminist ideologues whose reactions ranged from the necessity of mass murder to reduce men to a manageable number under a female supremacist governance. For illustrative purpose, I've included a few of the weeks-old comments from that blog, left standing in place by the editor.

One cheerful enthusiast for mass murder and female supremacy said :

> The magic number to bring the males under control is ~30% of the population

Believing themselves above public accountability, and above the law, other commenters also suggest eugenics and infanticide openly.

> "Women need to stop raising male children. Women who raise male children are digging the graves of other females. Nobody wants to bite that bullet (except lesbian separatists) but it must be done."
>
> "it occurs to me that a female ob/gyn that was willing to perform sex-selective abortions on male fetuses would be giving a gift to the next generation"

Some openly lament the knowledge that sane women might refuse to join in a collective campaign of child murder.

> "The danger of talking about "radical action" as being only things like killing all male babies at birth is that we know in our hearts that the vast majority of women will NEVER do that. NEVER. EVER. So we can sit back snug in the belief that we know exactly what it will take to be free AND never have to do anything about it."

Another commenter rebukes those who've preceded her for their apparent moderation and timidity.

> "and so what if there is no such thing as radical action, or realistic radical action? are you honestly saying that there is danger in speaking the truth? or do you disagree that radical action is limited to things that are practically unspeakable like infanticide?
>
> if something is true there is no harm in saying it, is there? I mean, the danger in not discussing things like a biological solution is…it doesn't get talked about. we don't go to the ends of our thoughts. "

These radical, extremist, openly murderous ideologues conducted this discussion in a publicly visible blog, which weeks after being outed by commenters on this site – remains online. The author of this blog, far from being a diagnosed mental patient is a trained lawyer, a published author, and a director of a major political organization.

This private murder club is out in the open because it's not actually radical. These women believe they are immune from legal consequence. They may be right.

Individuals attending Occupy Wall Street protests have also provided a glimpse into increasingly open expression of murderous and violent fantasies of ideologues.

"Eradicate males" Is what one woman's sign at an Occupy Wall Street protest rally read. She paraded this message of genocide in public, knowing that the message would be pushed, and that she'd face no consequence.

Another group of self identified feminists advocated for re-distribution of weapons from police to themselves. The picture on their banner was an outline of an assault rifle. For self protection, and not murder, right ladies?

Feminism has always been an escalation of chivalry – the normalized ideal of male disposability. As an ideology, the female favouring doctrine of violence and hate has always relied heavily on male enforcement of female privilege, and male disposability for the convenience and comfort of women, but it has progressed. Ideologues who, amazingly continue to claim they are oppressed, increasingly broadcast an open call for large scale murder. Do members of the public need to hear the gunshots outside their doors to wake up to this?

The continued narrative that feminism is anything except violent, brutish and murderous melts like wax in a blast furnace when it's examined in the light of evidence. Eve Ensler is a frustrated rapist. Dworkin was a frustrated murderer. Mackinnon was a frustrated dictator. And feminists ideologues who continue to promote their narrative of omnipresent rape and physical abuse are themselves frustrated rapists and violent abusers.

The ongoing political push to reverse the burden of evidence in accusations of rape is wholly unrelated to any desire for justice or reduction of sexual violence. It is the manifestation of the desire of followers of a violent ideology to re-purpose the courts into a tool of sexual violence against the demographic they openly hate.

This depraved perversity was summarized in a recent letter published by Brown University's newspaper, with apparent pride at the abandonment of decency in favour of a wholly ideological governance. Western civilization had a period of wholly ideological rule once before in history. It's a period commonly called the dark ages. Are the ideologues pushing for this outcome so craven they seek a repeat of legal systems using dogma, torture and astrology to determine and enforce their doctrinal truth? Apparently so.

This is where stupidity of a wholly new level emerges. Let's assume, just for a moment that somehow we arrive a few years down the road in a world of ideological feminist governance. Men are chattels, reduced to livestock – or, as ideologues like Pamela O'Shaughnessy would have it, an agricultural product.

> "My own personal vision is that women will cure the sickness that ails men […]
> I'm serious about this. If we can do it with corn, men ought to be easy."

Try to imagine this feminist utopia, men in cages, maybe raised in laboratories, lobotomized so their keepers don't need to suffer the cries for help as their bodies are used as procreative dispensers. Does that sound like a functional society? Or does it have the character of a nightmare world.

Some men might be left intact for use operating heavy machinery, or protecting natural resources such as oil from theft by other nation states. The dirty, dangerous jobs where workers still die – men will be needed for them too.

Now try to imagine getting from here to that no-too-distant future without massive and society-wide violence. Imagine somehow creating that feminist distopia without decades of ongoing and universal bloodshed.

Stalking Sady Doyle

Paul Elam · 18 November 2011 · Archived copy · Original

[dropcap]S[/dropcap]ady Doyle is a feminist blogger with a problem. She is concerned that for years she and her sisters in the struggle have been harassed, stalked, threatened, called names and otherwise made to feel uncomfortable. She's written herself a little advice piece over at inthesetimes.com, called The Girls Guide to Staying Safe Online, in which she claims to have received a death threat, hate mail, rape threats and the like. She also claims that her photo inspired someone to pontificate about fucking her in the ass.

Doyle doesn't mention precisely why she thinks all this is (allegedly) happening, except to say that apparently being a feminist blogger, or even having a female screen name, is enough. All these women have to do is screech online about men being pigs; lie about everything from phony wage gaps to domestic violence to an imaginary rape culture – while they glorify their own bigotry and sense of entitlement. And then for some inexplicable reason they end up getting an occasional bit of nastiness via email or in the comment sections of men's websites.

Fuck sake, what has happened to the world that a grrl can't even trash half the human race based on sex without someone getting all huffy about it?

Of course, Sady, I ask that question rhetorically because I know the answer. The reactions you have seen over the past several years are just the beginning of a boil over that was inevitable from the moment gender feminism raised its ugly head.

For the last fifty years, feminist ideologues like yourself have been given free reign to lie, distort, vilify and practice open hatred toward men and boys. You have been given pathological enabling by politicians, police, and a more than sizable portion of the well trained and obsequious male population. You have been given almost godlike power over families and sufficient hegemony over the lives of men that you can effectively destroy them with no more effort than it takes to point a finger. And you have not hesitated to support a culture that embraces the use and abuse of those powers, and writes them into law.

You have trumped over truth, reason and justice with an ersatz victim card, over and over again, and you even attempt to do so now, inferring that anyone who says things you don't like, about your ass or otherwise, is some sort of threat that must be dealt with – socially and legally.

But no matter what you do, you are going to see a lot more of the things you don't like in the future. I don't mean that in the way of violent threats and continued fixation on your rectum, but in much more organized, high impact consequences for those of your ilk, courtesy of the men's movement.

Simply put, we are coming for you. All of you.

And by the time we are done you will wax nostalgic over the days when all you had to deal with was someone expressing a desire to fuck you up your shopworn ass.

The fact is, Sady, you are a corrupt, hate-spreading bigot. I would ask you to remember that when you whine about a little rough talk, but it is pointless to ask someone to remember something they can't or won't acknowledge in the first place.

It is your bigotry that is at the source of all your troubles, just as it is your bigotry that is spawning troubles that you cannot imagine, but that are nonetheless coming down the pike.

Misandry will find its way to the graveyard of failed ideas. It will die its quiet death alongside racism and other social pathogens. In that light, there is no "safety" for you and your kind. You will all be exposed, and publicly excoriated; forced into the shadows alongside other bigots.

Ask Pamela O'Shaughnessy. She is a Harvard educated attorney and a best-selling author that goes by the online name of Vliet Tiptree. By any definition she is a person of means and some influence. She is also a feminist advocating eugenic shaping and control of men.

We have exposed her publicly, which has outraged her. But she is powerless to do anything about it. She will take whatever we dish out and her only reaction will be to slink further into the darkness, hidden away in private forums where the disease of her thinking won't see much sunlight, or be allowed to gain a growing audience.

She will take all this because she has to. And she has to because she is a bigot. Bigots only have two choices when it comes to public discourse. One is to retreat, which O'Shaughnessy has wisely done. Two is to stay and pretend not to be a bigot. That pretense becomes more difficult to maintain as an individual's words fall under real scrutiny – and as more people stand up publicly to the hate.

There's a lot more standing up going on these days.

The harshness you and your ilk have been subjected to is just the first signs of an approaching tipping point; the place where the misandry bubble is stretching toward the inevitable explosion. And yes, Doyle, that would be the explosion that will take you out; not with violence or rape, but with the illuminating light of truth.

Unfortunately, just because your moral superiors are organizing to take you down with truth and reason, it does not mean that the inklings of violence you are now seeing are going to stop. There is little you can do about that either. Hate begets hate.

You will just have to deal with increasing hostile reactions that will mirror the virulence you practice. Alongside the wholesale razing of civil rights under the feminist agenda, a little rough talk up the pooper just doesn't amount to much.

International Men's Day meets the MRM

John Hembling (JtO) · 19 November 2011 · Archived copy · Original

As some people know, November 19 is International Men's Day. So being a good little MRA, I looked online to see if any event was scheduled in my town, and indeed, there was one. The day was established 12 years ago, and according to the website is observed in over 50 countries. I attended, wondering what to expect, and who I might run into.

You will not be surprised to learn I was underwhelmed by International Men's Day, but I did find a way to entertain myself. The Roundhouse, where this event was held, is a very nicely appointed community centre located in the heart of Vancouver's Soho neighborhood at Davie and Pacific Boulevard. The building is a converted train switching station, built around what was once a turntable for rotating loaded train cars. The brick architecture is a pleasant change from the more recently popular steel, concrete and glass dominating my city.

Inside the community center was an open-plan conference room with a raised platform, several speakers made presentations while I watched. How to be more connected to your community and nature. Why truly sustainable energy matters at a personal level. Please come join our drum circle in the other conference room. There was a foreskin awareness table – and a woman in a black t-shirt printed with "I [heart] foreskin" handing out leaflets. Men's Health magazine had a table. A local book-seller had a table with books on men's spirituality, including a title by Robert Bly. I noted nothing written by Dr Farrell.

Somebody gave me a leaflet and explained I could use it to attend his first class on being a man for free. Manology helps men look at how ideas about masculinity shape us. It's a place for men to be authentic and connect with each other.

The tone of the event was subdued, and the men each representing their issues were subdued men. International Subdued Men's Day. I watched as a middle aged female employee of the community centre cruised slowly through, keeping an eye on proceedings, and making sure teh menz didn't get ideas above their station. She noticed me too, as I was making no attempt to slouch or avert my eyes.

To be sure, each of the various issues presented, or represented by tables lined with fliers were, and are legitimate concerns. Men's health, foreskin integrity, responsible electricity use with communities. Sure, none of these are illegitimate issues.

However, missing from the presentations, from the literature, and from the signage was the central issue of men's rights. That men are are now, and have for 50 years, been under sustained, organized attack. That was the elephant in the room, and whether anyone at the roundhouse community center International Subdued Men's Day event knew it, besides the scowling MRA in the bike jacket – they surely all felt it. Evident in every slumped posture and gentle, subdued voice, these men know they're being allowed to have their little men's drum circles and book-tables. They are being permitted to pretend they have personal masculine agency. This is the safe, moderated, permitted men's movement. This is the feminist-friendly version of masculinity. Of course you little darlings can have a men's health table at your event. After all, if prostate cancer takes daddy out, who will buy princess her cute little hatchback for college?

Feminist governance, the ongoing war against men was nowhere mentioned. I would hazard to guess that while these international subdued men can feel their second class status – they do no recognize it consciously. They do not recognize that they are under attack, or by whom. I am, of course, a civic-minded sort, and so I took steps to aid them in their understanding.

On leaving the International Subdued Men's Day even at the West End Roundhouse community center, I noticed that activists besides myself were showing the colors. It was a chilly, but sunny Saturday in Vancouver, and directly across the street from the community center were two yellow-placard wearing volunteers from a local women's shelter. These are a familiar site when the sun comes out, and I wandered over to take a picture of whatever lie the signs sported this day. Sometimes its 1 in 4, sometimes it's 1 in 3, sometimes its rape, other times its domestic violence.

Today, I learned that an astonishing 90% of women are sexually harassed in the workplace. As usual, no source was cited, but why only 90%, why not all of them? Several questions bubbled to the top of my mind, including:

- how many men are sexually assaulted to compare to your claimed 90%?
- what's the source of that made-up number?
- why don't you know the source of the number on your sign?
- aren't you dishonest to make an inflammatory claim without knowing its source?
- why do you support violence against men?
- why does promotion of hate against men not count as hate speech in Canada?

…along with many other questions.

However, I didn't ask any of these questions. Not because I'm timid or lazy, but because I'd thought of a different approach.

I asked if they knew what was going on right across the street in the community centre.

They claimed that no, they did not know.

I informed them, using the tone of a colleague providing insider information – that today was International Men's Day – and that an International Men's Day event was being conducted right in that building there.

I further confided that the men at that mens day event had a table of books about drum circles and men's mysticism, and a prostate cancer awareness table, and a community living talk was being presented. I asked my new feminist friends – one of whom was a protein deficient male feminist in his late 40's "you guys are raising money, right?" Indicating his collection jar as I said this.

You guys should go in there and hand out your flyers. This is what you're here for. And those guys can donate some money, too.

After a little more friendly encouragement from me, I smiled, took a flier, and waved goodbye.

I pulled back a block and a half to watch. Sure enough, my new friends from the women's shelter crossed the street, and I'm sure found enthusiastic support from the men putting on their International Subdued Men's Day presentation. I'm glad I was able to help.

$1000 bounty to identify Swedish SCUM members

John Hembling (JtO) · 20 November 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Of European nations, Sweden is the country arguably farthest along the path to Orwellian nightmare. Its the home of the swedish model for prostitution, where sale of sex as a service is legal, but purchase is not. It's a country deep in the grip of overt, totalitarian radical feminist rule.

This is what a feminist looks like

If you don't know by now, a group of as-yet unidentified Swedish women produced and posted a video on youtube[1] depicting the point-blank shooting murder of a man reading a newspaper. The shooting was staged with the cooperation of the portrayed victim using theatrical blood make-up. The women appeared to enact this fantasy in a state of ecstatic glee. The group of would-be murderous psychopaths identify themselves in the title of their video as SCUM having fun, taken from the title of a famous piece of hate literature by Valerie Solinas; the SCUM manifesto, Society for Cutting Up Men.

The portrayed murder is followed by the ecstatic giggling of a handful of other females, and an impromptu dance celebration. The woman who apparently shoots a newspaper-reading man appears to have an spontaneous orgasm following the killing. A minor discontinuity in the video shows where most of the orgasm was edited out. Killing a man for no apparent reason than his sex is nothing to hide from the public, but dampening your panties over it apparently is. The short video concludes with the text message "Do Your Part."

While the murder is plainly staged, the sadistic glee has every appearance of being genuine. The plain endorsement of murder is also unambiguous.

That is why A Voice For Men is offering a bounty of 1000 dollars for the confirmed identity of one or more of the individuals in the video. We are asking for the full legal names, home addresses, places of employment, email addresses and contact phone numbers of the women and man who produced and starred in the video described above. We will pay 1000 dollars to any individual who provides and confirms this information, to be paid either directly to themselves or to a charity of their choice.

This is the second such reward offered for the identity of an individual, the first being a blogger advocating extralegal eugenic modification of men. This blogger has since been identified as the former lawyer and published author Pamela O'Shaughnessy. O'Shoughnessy and her followers no longer enjoy anonymity – and will be pursued by their own nefarious plans for the rest of their lives.

The group of swedish women advocating murder – and staging fantasies of murder in sadistic ecstasy will be publicly identified on this site and on Register-Her.com. Complete details of these individuals names, addresses, phone numbers, government identification numbers, drivers licences, and employers will be permanently published. It is the intent of the editors of A Voice For Men that these individuals be publicly and permanently identified.

Some individuals may criticize the intent to publish not only names, but also addresses, phone numbers, employers and other personal information – on the grounds that such exposure create a risk of retributive violence against individuals who openly advocate murder based on sex. It is the considered position of the editorial board of AVfM that any such risks are out-weighed by the ongoing hazard to the public of these individuals continuing to operate in anonymity. Open advocation of murder cannot be allowed in a civil society, without that society devolving into a culture of brutal violence.

http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=XJjKJ-_d4YQ

Addendum:

I have just UN-approved a comment which included the statement "People like this need to die."

The author still has commenting privileges, however, calls for killing will result in the ban hammer without warning.

~JtO

A feminist conception of violence

John Hembling (JtO) · 21 November 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Yesterday, readers of a voice for men met the face of feminism in Sweden. Cute, bubbly girls who have spontaneous orgasms while pretending to murder a man, execution style, then licking the bullet wounds on his head. Prior to seeing the video from the spiritual inheritors of Valerie Solanas – I thought such abyssal, malevolent and psychopathic madness existed only in fiction. The gaudy and flamboyant evil displayed in the staged fantasy of these young women is hard to fathom outside the context of particularly violent comic books.

The concluding message, "Do Your Part", translates to: "we're not kidding, but we haven't quite worked up to isolating and murdering men for real, yet."

On the video version of the article on Swedish feminist murder enthusiasts, I've already been accused of being sexist, of having no sense of humour, and of being violent. I intend to discuss the topic of psychological projection in greater detail soon.

But this returns us to violence, and the feminist concept of it. This needs clarification, the now normal concept of violence between women and men is that women can and should employ violence against men for any reason, and at any extreme, up to and including murder. The accepted idea is that men, if they're "real men," should not only take it, they should continue to uphold the male half of the social contract which is to protect women and provide for them. The female side of this once included something like "..and women shouldn't punch, kick, stab, bludgeon, shoot and otherwise mutilate, injure and murder men." Something like that, but that was burned to the ground by half a century of feminist agitprop.

Amber Portwood on MTV's "teen mom" slapped and punched Gary Shirley, a man twice her size. Gary stood there and took it. Commentary on the youtube video of this abuse called him a "real man" for passively absorbing the beating. This is the male side of the social contract – protect women – still upheld by men while women indulge freely in male-targeted violence.

Sharon Osborne and a daytime studio audience, as well as a majority of the home audience cheering and jeering over Catherine Becker's severing of her husband's penis and her destruction of the severed organ in a garbage disposal. The female audiences response to this was laughter. Osborne, pressured after a letter writing campaign from men couldn't stop her giggling for even the 3 minutes it took to read her phony apology. "I'm so sorry, ha ha ha."

The former Lawyer and Simon and Schuster published author Pamela O'Shaughnessy who blogs as Vliet Tiptree, and who posted a public manifesto calling for a campaign of male targeting eugenics. A former lawyer, arguing for the same thing pursued by Joseph Mengele.

The Feminist activist and writer Eve Ensler whose own poorly planned article on the Huffington post simultaneously chastises men for an alleged failure to protect women, while she bangs her bongo drum of victimhood – naming wars where men are routinely targeted for rape, and pretending rape is a female only problem. This same author who in her own play, declares the rape of a child a good rape.
The word depraved fails utterly to describe Ensler's ethical position.

The ongoing exhortation to men to protect women – while remaining silent and passive to attack against men betrays profound cognitive failure in feminist ideology. That's a charitable view. The alternative is that this is wilful and conscious from the bright lights of violence-wrapped-in-humanism.

Another author named Rebecca Carter published a plan to exterminate men. Naming her piece of female supremacist hatred "Proposition 777." She classified this execrable incitement to class hatred as humor.

`Oh, you silly men, I was just kidding – why can't you take a joke and see how funny your proposed extermination is.' The article has since been taken offline. Classification as humour wasn't quite enough to provide plausible deniability. A copy of the piece is located here.

The concept of violence as it appears to be understood by women in a feminized society is that women are uniquely permitted to indulge in assault, mutilation, and murder as long as the target is male. This is the practical norm – even while feminist ideologues claim that women are the universal victims of violence. The forced eugenics enthusiast Pam O'Shaughnessy encapsulated this in her statement:

"Our Sharp, Clean Boundary/Definition of Oppression that begins and ends with Women."

This is a clear attempt to morally justify any act of male-targeting aggression, brutality or damage. If you can define oppression by who it targets, then anything is excusable, up to and including the murder of children or men.

http://authors.simonandschuster.com/Perri-O'Shaughnessy/43321272

Meanwhile – men, the traditional protectors of women and children – are expected to keep on keeping on. Never mind that the feminist-mainstream narrative is normalizing your murder, gentlemen. Continue protecting and providing. In fact, men, you must keep protecting women while those same women are advocating your deaths.

I'll assume readers of this article are not so demented that this incongruence needs to be explained.

The shocking stupidity of this position is further demonstrated by the puerile scribblings of feminist bloggers attempting to co-opt the Occupy Wall Street movement. According to a public statement made on the site occupypatriarchy.org : the article "Statement On The Right To Safely Occupy" simultaneously condemns men for participating in the universal oppression of women and LGBT identified people, and in the same article, demands protection and the right to "safely occupy."

Straight white men are bad, and oppressing women and LGBTs, right?

I'm confident that plenty of non-heterosexed identified individuals will take umbrage at the implied inclusion in this childish nonsense, but just in case anybody is confused about who's actually the major recipient of violent victimization in the real world. Heres a graph from the US Bureau of Justice Statistics.

http://bjs.ojp.usdoj.gov/content/glance/tables/vsxtab.cfm

Down with the patriarchs. Also, protect us, you bad patriarchs!

How can adults function in the world while exhibiting this level of disconnect from reality? The simple answer is that adults can't. Children on the other hand, can, and do.

Western society, through a 50 year program of indoctrination has produced at least 2 generations of women with the developed personal accountability of children, but the sense of entitlement of royalty or poorly raised teenagers. However, this is more than just a generation of overgrown spoiled children. The cultivated climate of class-victimhood, feeding on itself in a feedback loop for five decades is manifesting a perception of men as less than human; unworthy of human rights, and suitable objects of scorn, exploitation, mutilation and murder.

If this culture of hate were cultivated in psychologically mature minds, it would provide a fertile climate for class or ethnic warfare. However, this manufactured entitlement and rage is rooted in social immaturity, a childish frame of reference in which the spoiled teenager attacks the parent, while always knowing they're safe from harm because the parent they attack will always protect them.

The general failure of female accountability, cultivated in Western society is one of the principal forces behind projects like Register-Her.com. Individuals were listed who committed child rape, or muder, or who carelessly levelled false allegations of rape for the relatively trivial gains of advantage in divorce. Those were placed on the registry by Paul and myself to provide a non-violent mechanism for accountability in the face of ongoing failure by the courts.

The willful and organized promotion of hatred is major in this ongoing cultural failure, which is why corrupt public officials and bigots are also listed.

The ideology driving escalated male apartheid has always promoted and relied on indirect violence. The outsourcing of direct force to state funded enforcers as well as conformist men, still buying into their allowed role as dispenser, as well as recipient of violence on behalf of the preferred sex. Unfortunately, the culture of female unaccountability and exemption from consequence has escalated. This manifests as an increasing number of women advocating murder, mass murder, and in growing numbers, directly engaging in male targeted violence and murder. This all developing in the climate of female exemption from consequence.

Crystal Dawn MacKenzie was the Canadian woman who after stabbing her husband was acquitted in late 2010. She walked free even after her defence attorney admitted during the trial that she had options besides murdering her husband.

Kasey Anthony is the mother who after evidentiary determination that she'd murdered her child so she'd have more time for partying, was treated a victim by western media.

Men's rights activists are clearly not the only people noting this tradition of female exemption. While childish in their developed accountability and emotional maturity – women are certainly capable of rational calculation. This is manifest in an increasing number of female advocates of murder and mass murder of men. Like poorly socialized children who've not yet learned to see the people around them as humans – a small but noticeable segment of women and girls have learned they are not accountable, and indulge in a type of infantile tyranny. Kill all men, abort male babies, or even kill them after they are born – women's empowerment taken to the absurd and homicidal extreme of the claimed power of extermination of males.

For members of the human race who, due to possession of a Y chromosome, find themselves identified as appropriate targets for murder, this posses a logical problem. Western courts have already demonstrated that male-targeting violence, including murder is permissible. This is not a question of whether the war against men becomes a shooting war, or however described, a war in which combatants are killed. Men dying on the job, or at the hands of state-enforcers, or white knights, or in any situation where their deaths are hidden behind their job titles proves the earnest brutality of our hatred towards men. The only question is at what point in the escalation of the killing of men, they begin to fight back with more than words.

It is neither practical, nor ethical to passively tolerate attack, or violence, or murder. For the self-declared advocates of murder and male extermination – from whom the intention to kill is amply demonstrated, the only ethical response can be self defense, which is the prevailing reason why this culture must embrace the agenda of the MRM, which is to prevent further violence from happening.

Depraved and Futile boob makes JtO's argument

John Hembling (JtO) · 22 November 2011 · Archived copy · Original

[dropcap]A[/dropcap] learning-disabled male feminist has taken exception to my article, two days ago, calling for the public identification of Swedish murder advocates. These are the Valerie Solinas followers who identify themselves as "Scum having fun" in a video depicting the gleeful shooting of a man for no reason.

Futrelle apparently thinks publicly identifying the promoters of murder is a problem. The video, which has been on youtube for a year – is in no danger of being taken offline – despite its unambiguous call for murder. Futrelle claims that "do your part" after depicting a young woman shooting a man point blank is only a performance piece. "Violence and murder have been dramatized in the theater since its beginnings," says David.

And he's right, however, horror, or action films depicting violence aren't published under the title "manifesto" and generally don't end with calls to action, emulating the depicted violence.

Shakespear didn't attempt to kill his own uncle after writing Hamlet. Solinas, the author of The Scum Manifesto, did attempt to murder Andy Warhol. The same Scum Manifesto from which our Swedish murder enthusiasts take their identification.

There's a difference between between depiction of violence – and advocacy of it, and Futrelle is trying to disguise that difference. Futrelle might even half-believe his own argument. It must require constant effort to keep cheerleading a doctrine of violence and hatred while telling yourself it's humanism. However, seeking approval for conformance to the dominant ideology is more important than actually opposing murder for this depraved and futile male feminist.

So, the MRA is the bad guy for what, publishing the names of advocates of murder?

Our Depraved and futile murder apologist actually makes my points for me. In his copy-paste of my argument, he even highlights a key statement which I assumed readers didn't need explicitly pointed out to them. [Emphasis Futrelle's]

> Some individuals may criticize the intent to publish not only names, but also addresses, phone numbers, employers and other personal information – on the grounds that such exposure create a risk of retributive violence against individuals who openly advocate murder based on sex. It is the considered position of the editorial board of AVfM that any such risks are out-weighed by the ongoing hazard to the public of these individuals continuing to operate in anonymity.

That's right manboob, identifying a group of self-declared murder advocates to the public is more important than protecting those murder advocates from the consequences of advocating murder.

In the truth-is-fiction world of Futrelle's mind, the men's right advocates calling for public identification of a hate organization have been transmogrified into promoters of violence.

And what if they get killed David? What if rather than be arrested – as promoters of hate, and public advocates of murder, what if these depraved and murderous female supremacists come to harm at the hands of a citizen. If that happens, it will mean that a society's system of law, designed to prevent hate organizations, and to allow redress of grievance through non violent due process is gone, wiped out by your ideology of violence and hate. That's what you're defending, David.

The futile and depraved collaborator carried on to cite several apparently inflammatory comments by readers of AVfM, and since no item of feminist agitprop is complete without lies, he throws a few in.

In his ideologically induced blindness – Manboob is unable to see that the phrase "shoot back" implies defensive use of force. It's impossible to shoot back, if you are not already being shot at. You know – shot like what is clearly and unambiguously advocated by the swedish feminists.

Yes Dave, I advocate shooting back. As opposed to sitting still while hateful ideologues work themselves up to murder and the public endorsement of killing. Self defense is a moral imperative, although given the deep disconnect from reality demonstrated by our Futile and Depraved Dave – this most simple principal obviously needs explaining.

In truth, the Depraved and Futile attempt to characterize opposition to murder as if it was the feminists video endorsing murder is hard to rebuke, because in Futrelle's failed criticism, he makes my own point for me several times. At one point quoting my thesis statement:

[box icon="none"]
"Open advocation of murder cannot be allowed in a civil society, without that society devolving into a culture of brutal violence."
[/box]

Unfortunately, he spoils this apparent moment of enlightenment by lying.

Evidently [John the Other] has no problem with, or has somehow not noticed, the comments on AVfM fantasizing about shooting and killing the women involved in the video.

Lets expose your lies, Dave.

Every comment posted on that article is still in place – and none advocate violent aggression. The very few hyperbolic mentions of the use of force are statements advocating defense. You would characterize these as murderous, you shameful worm. While you pretend a humanist ethic in defense of the open advocacy of murder.

In fact, I hope your article remains online, Dave – because no rebuttal of mine could exceed the job of outing your craven stupidity, and sickening support of murder-advocating hate organization naming itself "Society for Cutting Up Men."

To those who support you or your ideology, beware. Not of violence – not of murder. Unlike David Futrelle, I do not and will not lend myself to the support of violence, or indeed, of murder. Beware that we will expose you, and illuminate your hatred and your support of violence for the world to see clearly.

David Futrelle is not, in my opinion, confused. He knows his position is immoral, unethical and in support of hatred and violence and murder. He takes this position not because he thinks it's right, but because it is the dominant narrative, the dominant ideology. He is an authoritarian, and a lickspittle, and he knows it.

Magic Paul has left the building

John Hembling (JtO) · 22 November 2011 · Archived copy · Original

[box type="alert" icon="none"]

In November of 2011, This site's founder and Editor-In-Chief announced he'd be taking some time off from the running of the site, the radio show the numerous demands of running operations at A Voice For Men. Stating it mildly, he was more than a little burned out from editing articles, writing, producing a radio show, coordinating access with media correspondents, planning other activism, overseeing register-her.com as well as dealing with a great many individually enthusiastic MRAs who each needed Paul to research this, or write that, or publish who-knows-what, as soon as they convinced Magic Paul to also write it for them.

When Paul decided to finally step back and take a break, he left me more-or-less in charge. Lucky me. I chose not to run the radio show because the site by itself is already a handful, and I'm lazy. However, I also became the focus of a fraction of the enthusiasm of other MRAs to conduct their research, write their articles and in general, push their plans to completion. Gentlemen, you enthusiasm is great, but you've got to wield you own shovel. Researching, summarizing and writing is the work. Discovery of a blog on which individuals out their own plans for infanticide is great source material, but lets be honest with ourselves, such discoveries are common. The world we are living in has normalized the advocation of male targeting violence and murder, yet another collection of psychotics is raw material for activism, but the work is in actually doing the research, writing the summaries, and writing articles, blogs, creating graphics, printing stickers and then sticking them.

This is not dismissal of the excellent work done by the many MRAs who unearth further evidence of the moral bankruptcy of the now mainstream doctrine of violence-wrapped-in-humanism, but the work is in doing the writing. This site will publish your work, but we can't do the work for you. Paul remains at AVfM, but Magic Paul has left the building.

[/box]

Some questions from Sweden

Paul Elam · 22 November 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Late last night/early this morning I was contacted by Eigil Söderin, the editor of the Swedish newspaper ETC. The purpose of Söderin's contact was to ask interview questions about recent activism from AVfM that centered on a controversial Swedish video which depicted a group of young women murdering an innocent man and celebrating their actions with dance and orgasmic joy.

The questions were relevant, if a little superficial, so I thought they deserved to be answered. As I don't know when the interview will be published, or under what editorial "flavor," I thought it best to share the unedited questions and answers here with AVfM readers.

Why is A Voice For Men is offering a bounty of 1000 dollars for the confirmed identity of one or more of the individuals in the video?

Because the video is advocating murder.

In the commentary field of your blog the infioramtion[sic] of the people behind the video is now posted. What are you going to do with the information?

We will continue to gather as much more information as possible, and once the information is confirmed, we will then write articles profiling each of these individuals for public view and disseminate that information to as many people as possible, particularly targeting Swedish readers where possible.

Are you advocating violence against these people?

No, it is the individuals in the video who are advocating violence.

If some one of your readers act violently against these people aren't you somewhat responsible?

Absolutely not.

What the purpose of Register-Her?

Two-fold. One, to provide a public record of women who commit crimes like rape, murder and false allegations. Two, to provide a public record of individuals the promote hatred based on sex, as the individuals in the video are doing.

Do you know the swedish blog "Genusnytt" by Pär Ström?

Yes, I have heard of the blog.

Do you know Pär Ström personally?

No, I do not.

Sweden is a "country deep in the grip of overt, totalitarian radical feminist rule", what do you mean?

Those are not my words, so I cannot comment on them directly. I can tell you, though, from the perspective of many western men who are involved in the men's rights movement, that Sweden has a reputation for having a very strong and oppressive form of feminist governance. Julian Assange, whom your government is now helping persecute on behalf of other corrupt western leaders, through a fraudulent rape charge, has called Sweden the "Saudi Arabia of feminism." Surely this criticism is not new to you? The fact that the SCUM Manifesto, written by a man hating feminist who attempted to kill two people was adapted into a play and given the OK for Swedish High School students says something about the deplorable state of your countries politics.

Your questions themselves are part of the problem. Why are you asking an American about Swedish politics when it is Swedes and Swedish politics that support their young citizens for making videos that call on others to "do your part" by killing innocent men?

That video is a sick abomination. Why are you talking to me instead of pressing the people who made it?

I saw that Pelle Billing is a writer on your blog, is he a friend of yours? What kind of contact do you have with him?

I have no contact with Dr. Billing.

♦

And that is how the interview went in its entirety. There are a couple of matters of concern here. The first point is that of the intent of Söderin's questioning. How the information he was given is presented will be the ultimate determinant of whether there is cause for concern, but there appears to be a focus here on protecting the anonymity of bigots engaged in spreading a violent and hateful ideology. I hope that is not the case.

The other concern I have is over questions about Pelle Billing and Pär Ström, neither of which do I have a personal or professional relationship with.

And with that I want to add a note addressed to the people of Sweden. A Voice for Men is a loosely organized, standalone activist community of men and women concerned with the problem of misandry (the hatred and marginalization of men and boys). We do not have any official affiliation with other men's organizations, either in North America or Europe.

So if, in the future you see any attempt to establish a connection to bloggers in your country who may happen to share our concerns about the state of men and boys, be advised that you are being led away from the real issue here, which is why some Swedish citizens are making videos that advocate the murder of innocent people based on their sex, and into a witch hunt that is an intentional distraction.

Of course it is up to you what you choose to believe, but I do ask you to watch this video and ask yourselves who you think is the real problem here.

The radical truth about Josefin von Zeipel Segerberg

Paul Elam · 23 November 2011 · Archived copy · Original

[quote]Truth is regarded as a terrible word in this age of deconstruction. ~ Katherine Young, while fielding questions at the Conference on Male Studies.[/quote]

Imagine this scene: The government and media are working in concert to produce propaganda that legitimizes hatred and violence perpetrated by one half of the population on the other. They use the theories and philosophies of an individual that attempted to murder two people based on their sex, and develop material that is shaped and molded to influence the minds of young people, then they disseminate it through high schools.

Now imagine this: Anyone who objects to it is branded a "radical."

If this sounds like the story line for some dystopian novel; something that would even elicit shudders and chills from Franz Kafka, think again. This is actually a modern non-fiction; a news report being played out in Sweden, a country that has become the most prolific purveyor of class hatred since post Weimer Germany.

For those that have not seen it, here is a self-explanatory example of Swedish wares. And another tidbit that has emerged since this video was highlighted on this website is brought to us courtesy of the shooter in the video, Josefin von Zeipel Segerberg, who reportedly attends school at the University of Gothenberg, Gothenberg, Sweden. She has also been identified as the director of the SCUM Theater in Sweden.

[image]
Josefin von Zeipel Segerberg
Segerberg is also involved in a performance in celebration of "Straight Hate Day," an attack on heterosexuality in Swedish culture. The writer who reported this story on Straight Hate Day claims they don't really hate straight people, just the heterosexual norm. I would ask how far a leap it is between hating heterosexuality and heterosexuals, but that question would be interpreted by Swedish newspaper ETC. as a threat and a hate crime, which brings us to the real point.

After my recent interview with ETC Editor Eigil Söderin, it came as no surprise that she gutted the conversation and reduced it to what she felt she could use to demonize me and the men's movement, painting us as violence advocating misogynists bent on causing harm to women. That is pär for the Scandinavian course these days. To be fair, much higher profile media sources have tried than ETC, which is a significant website in Sweden, but actually gets less traffic than AVfM.

Still, the larger question remains.

What, in the current political zeitgeist and climate of sexual hatred against men and boys, is the appropriate stance to take? Well, Pelle Billing, a known MRA from Sweden, has made his feelings known in his interview with ETC. He said, and I am paraphrasing through the Google translator here, that "We were in contact when Paul Elam was Editor of Men's News Daily, when I experienced him as a pretty calm person. Since then he has radicalized."

And if that is what Pelle said, then he is half-correct. I still consider myself level headed. But yes, I have radicalized. And so will you Pelle, if you actually want to get anything done.

That is not a personal indictment of Pelle Billing. He's done a great deal of work on men's issues. But unless his quote was taken out of context, he is dead wrong on this. Did I really hear Pelle telling a newspaper that is supporting murder-based-on-sex advocates of the SCUM Manifesto- which they are treating like a mainstream political movement – that he is concerned that Paul Elam has radicalized?

WTF, Pelle? Say it ain't so!

Now, of course, the quote from Pelle was just the sort of fissure creating fodder that Söderin was looking for. Her attempt here is to divide MRA's and hopefully weaken us; stall our growth. That tactic reveals a great deal of ignorance of the MRM as a phenomena, though, and a failure to understand that if anything, they have only served to make us collectively stronger. In the end, I am not going anywhere, and they are now more likely than ever to have to deal with Pelle, who remains a valuable asset despite the gaffe.

Also, before anyone becomes upset with Dr. Billing, please consider that there is a lot that could be lost in the translation here, as well as the distinct possibility that ETC is just outright lying about what he said. I have no ill feelings at all.

One of the lessons here in my mind is that words like extreme and radical are really just so much semantic quicksand. From the calls to destroy the nuclear family, to the promulgation of countless lies, to the SCUM Manifesto and that horrific video, to the celebration of hating heterosexuals – it is hard to imagine things already being less radicalized.

I search my conscious for the willingness to emulate any of this toward any group of people, including feminists, and I find nothing that will allow it. I have no capacity to stage a mock murder and orgiastic dance of celebration or licking the blood off of a victim's wounds. I have no ability to embrace a hatred of any sexual preference and actually plan its traditional celebration. Hell, I don't even have the brazenness to make up statistics or revise history in order to achieve political goals. And I am the radical?

What I do have is the willingness to "out" hate mongers and put a light on them in front of as many people as I can. It is one of the very few weapons I have in a misandric zeitgeist dominated by government, media and social complicity. And it is one I use not with a wish for harm, but with sadness. Misandry is an evil. It must be confronted and its purveyors must not be allowed to wrap themselves in the comfortable shroud of impunity.

And let us be clear here. While ideologues and news reporters, already demonstrably deficient in integrity, will paint this as incitement to violence, I will instead remain focused on the truth. This is a reaction to the ideological and real violence that feminism has fostered for fifty years and which now has taken a governmental seat in the country of Sweden.

I not only have a right to present what is already public information, I have a moral obligation to identify the agents of hate wherever and whoever they are. I intend to fulfill that obligation regardless of objection or dissent. If you don't want to be identified as a bigot and a social criminal, then quit advocating murder and hatred.

John, please put this disgusting bigot on the registry.

[box icon="none"]
Addendum:
http://register-her.com/index.php?title=Josefin_Von_Zeipel_Segerberg_–_Bigot

~JtO
[/box]

In the shadows of Dachau

John Hembling (JtO) · 24 November 2011 · Archived copy · Original

[dropcap]I [/dropcap]will begin with an admission. In the past week, through my participation in the discovery and documenting of the overt, violent hatred of a collection of Swedish devotees of Valerie Solinas, I have been repeatedly shocked.

After years of dealing with advocates of the violent hate movement calling itself feminism, I previously believed I had seen it all; that I was beyond such surprise.

The glittering evil of these women remains difficult for me to understand. Intellectually, I know how far human cruelty can reach. I have read the first-person accounts of former prisoners of Dachau and Buchenwald. In fact, as a young man, I was an apprentice to a Polish sculptor who in his teens had been a prisoner in a camp 40 kilometres from the Polish township of Oswiecim. In his late sixties he still bore the serial number tattoo on one forearm.

Intellectual knowledge of recent world history did not prepare me to see directly, women half my own age giddy and eroticizing their own naked malice. I was similarly shocked weeks earlier on discovery of Pam O'Shaughnessy's radical feminist eugenics club, still you-go-girling each other on their pseudo private blog over on radical-hub.

Simon and Schuster will probably continue to publish the eugenics advocate's crime-fighting novels. As long as the general public don't know Perri O'Shaughnessy is an advocate of the same thing once pursued by Dr. Joseph Mengele – they'll still buy her books.

However, O'Shaughnessy's eugenics enthusiasm, and the murder-advocation of Swedes Josefin Von-Zeipel Segerberg and Matilda Bordin are increasingly common. Another murder enthusiast recently published a manifesto[1] calling for the extermination of all males. Rebecca Carter was just kidding, of course. However "just kidding" is a good test of an idea's palatability when your own ethical compass is broken, or missing.

For other mass-murder enthusiasts, don't forget to give yourself plausible deniability for when the public catches a whiff of what you are test marketing.

The apparent rising acceptability of public endorsement of male-targeting murder or mass murder significantly changes the tone of men's rights activism. The register-her.com database, aside from listing traditional criminal categories for Rapists, Killers, Pedophiles and others, includes Corrupt Public Officials as well as Bigots; that last being a highly subjective descriptor agreed on by myself, Paul Elam and several senior project contributors.

What is a Bigot? Setting aside the obvious appeal-to-dictionary, in the context of this site and register-her.com, it's a promoter of class-hatred or violence targeted against a biological demographic.

It's the opinion of Paul and myself that bigots fitting our definition are a significant contributing factor escalating brutality, violence and inequity in Western society. This is why we include individuals in this category in the registry.

It's common within men's right's writing to characterize the escalating climate of male disenfranchisement and marginalization as a gender war. Establishing an evidentiary justification for this language is beyond the scope of this article, but is repeatedly provided in previous writing on this site.

During the development of the Register-her project, one candidate-offender was added to the registry whose actions, if they had been topic of a stand alone article, might have been appropriately described as "crimes against humanity" or "war criminal." Those are not categories of offense included in the design of that site's database.

The individual was listed on Register-her as a killer. Pauline Nyiramasuhuko[2] is the former Rwandan women's minister, found guilty by an international court of the crime of genocide. According to BBC reporting[3], she helped organize and participated in the killing over over 800,000 people over a period of 100 days.

The presiding judge at the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda, read the court's decision on her conviction, saying "The chamber convicts Pauline Nyiramasuhuko of conspiracy to commit genocide, crimes against humanity, extermination, rape, persecution and violence to life and outrages upon personal dignity."

Judge William Sekule said scores of ethnic Tutsis were killed after taking refuge in a local government office. "Hoping to find safety and security, they instead found themselves subject to abductions, rapes and murder. The evidence […] paints a clear picture of unfathomable depravity and sadism."

Reporting originally published by New York Times[4][5] in 2002 stated: "Before becoming Rwanda's chief official for women's affairs, Pauline was a social worker, roaming the countryside, offering lectures on female empowerment and instruction on child care and AIDS prevention. Her days as minister were similarly devoted to improving the lives of women and children."

At a stadium, where hundreds were killed, Pauline goaded her Hutu marauders, commanding:

"Before you kill the women, you need to rape them."

At the time of my addition of Nyiramasuhuko to the Register-Her.com database, the extremity of her crimes seemed to be far outside the normal continuum of violence, murder and rape. She appeared to be a lone outlier, but still to be included in the category of Killer. It did not enter my consideration that she represented a type of offence existing with such prevalence that a new category was useful.

The recent discussions on AVfM of feminists organizing with self-declared goals of infanticide, murder, male extermination and male targeting eugenics forces the consideration of new language, not only in the categories of offence on Register-her, but also in ongoing discussions within human rights advocacy on this site and others.

The word Bigot is clearly inadequate.

If murder of hundreds of thousands of people merits the convening of international criminal courts to address the offence we call genocide, what do we call the planners and advocates of this crime?

[1] http://www.avoiceformen.com/wp-content/uploads/sites/2/2011/11/Proposition-777-Extermination-of-Man.pdf
[2] http://www.register-her.com/index.php?title=Pauline_Nyiramasuhuko_–_Killer
[3] http://www.bbc.co.uk/news/world-africa-13507474
[4] http://www.nytimes.com/2011/06/25/world/africa/25rwanda.html?_r=1
[5] http://www.racematters.org/nyiramasuhuko.htm

Dworkin got it wrong, Naomi Wolf got it wronger

John Hembling (JtO) · 24 November 2011 · Archived copy · Original

[dropcap]N[/dropcap]aomi Wolf's 2002 article on the effects of porn, republished in the new Yorker's online edition[1] got it partly right. Of course, all convincing falsehoods are salted with the truth. Wolf, like Dworkin before her, lamented in "The Porn Myth"- the effects of freely available porn on society.

Starting from an ideological point of view she inherited from Dworkin, The Beauty Myth author stumbled only partly into a conceptual model of human behavior matching reality. This was despite an Ivy League Alma Mater at Oxford and Yale.

Dworkin predicted that access to porn would turn men into sex crazed beasts, based on her belief that men were subhuman. Wolf, by contrast, explained the failure of Dworkin's prediction with the rationale that while still subhuman beasts, men's lack of hyper-sexual aggression was due to porn's supposed numbing of male sexual instinct. In this model, men were still subhuman. Despite its failure, the opposite of the predicted outcome was re-interpreted to conform to the standard feminist narrative.

Interestingly, this perfectly illustrates the difference between an ideology, in which facts are retooled to serve a doctrinal truth, and a philosophy, in which conclusions are drawn from observation, or data, or experience. Ideologies are immune to data, which is what makes them poisonous to civil societies.

Returning to Naomi Wolf and following her assumption that men are subhuman, the twisted logic of feminism is that because men are sex-obsessed beasts, real women can't compete with the fantasy of porn.The poor, natural flesh and blood women of the real non-porn world are left bereft of affection or attention in a world where males are satiated by pixilated flesh. In Wolf's own words "In the end, porn doesn't whet men's appetites—it turns them off the real thing." She expands on this, to say:

> "The onslaught of porn is responsible for deadening male libido in relation to real women, and leading men to see fewer and fewer women as "porn-worthy."

This is a simple, black and white version of reality, consistent with the old feminist narrative of men bad, women good. It's simple in the way children's stories are simple. The truth requires an adult understanding of human behavior.

Rather than turning men off the real thing, ready access to porn provides an alternative to men (and women) in seeking sexual satisfaction. That's it; an alternative. It's not the deadener of sexual interest claimed by Wolf, and its also not the inflamer of runaway sexual aggression claimed by Dworkin, because… surprise! Men are human beings, not simply appetite driven brutes as Dworkin and Wolf's feminist models of reality cling to.

So why have women, as Wolf claims, lost so much market value? If we are to listen to her, it's because in the sexual arms race between real flesh and blood women – and the airbrushed, silicone enhanced shaved, shined and professional stage managed world of fantasy presented by porn, reality can't compete. If sexual attraction were actually an arms race between humans and machines – then it wouldn't be the evolutionary driver pushing living organisms to spam their environments with little copies of themselves. Wolf's analysis of porn as a supplanter of real human contact fails because Naomi Wolf continues to assume men are not the fully realized humans that she obviously is, because she's a woman.

Of course, the dogma that women are uniquely human, uniquely possessed of emotion and the ability to feel pain and so on is comfortable to a childish mind. The conceit of "I'm better than them" satisfies an immature ego, and so this unexamined dogma persists. Young, hip, progressive feminists in Sweden end elsewhere continue to cling to the solipsistic view of second wave feminists, taken directly from Solanas:

> “Being an incomplete female, the male spends his life attempting to complete himself, to become female.“

Men’s constant failure to conform to this delusion provokes frustration and anger in those whose ideology informs the attempt to force conformity to their ideal, rather than accept reality. Faced by a decades of blame, anger, manipulation and shame for failing to conform to “man-as-defective-woman,” those men are, to state it mildly, weary of the ongoing abuse.

This climate of abuse cannot be understated – a fabricated cultural narrative of male supremacy and women’s oppression routinely derails useful discussion of human motivations, so a short list of examples is provided here for reference.

- Men’s on the job death rate: 97%
- Men’s shorter life expectancy [+- 5 years depending on country]
- Selective military service
- Exclusion of consideration in ant-violence PSAs
- Exclusion of protection of legal due process
- Routine depiction in media as inferior humans
- Discrimination by businesses catering to women only
- Routine male-vilifying falsehood promoted by government
- Routine male-vilifying falsehood promoted by charitable organizations
- Promotion and endorsement of male-targeting rape by prison system
- Treatment of male sexual victimization as comedy
- Culture-wide prioritization of rescue resources away from men (women and children first)
- Female dominance and affirmative action in education
- School-endorsed hate rallies in major universities
- Male targeting murder-advocacy
- Male targeting eugenics advocacy
- Anti-male hatred promoted openly by online communities
- Mainstream television’s celebration of male-targeted sexual mutilation
- Female cosmetics industry use of male infant mutilation in beauty products
- Male-hatred promoted in mainstream clothing design (boys are stupid)
- Cultural prohibition and eradication of male space in western society
- Murder of male sexual nonconformism (gay bashing, gay murder)
- Courts ignoring fathers and children in favor of mother’s convenience

- Male reproductive responsibilities without rights
- Debtors prison for only fathers
- 90% of homeless are male / Female focused homeless aid
- female-only health initiatives

These few items were typed quickly and represent a tiny sample, with no pretense of providing a comprehensive list. While increasingly disenfranchised, men continue to weather an escalating narrative of male censure, both from mainstream media and at a personal level. In almost any workplace environment men-are-stupid jokes have become common, and while such female censure is commonly grounds for hostile workplace litigation.

Piling onto the climate of open hostility, men who treat this as anything besides good natured humor are shamed, told to man up, get over it, and stop being so sensitive. Add to this the endless shit testing, lying, manipulation and game-playing that all women engage in with men. Not all women are like that? Okay, not all, only the vast majority. Oh, and by the way, if they're real men, they'll still pay for drinks, dinner, vacations, buy gifts and the list goes on.

And for Naomi Wolf, published author, political consultant, and Rhodes Scholar, the failure to grasp this without being spoon fed it is indictable.

According to Wolf :

> "By the new millennium, a vagina, which, by the way, used to have a pretty high "exchange value," as Marxist economists would say, wasn't enough; it barely registered on the thrill scale."

Wrong Naomi, dead wrong – and for somebody with your education and apparent awareness of the social landscape – I'm going to call this at least self-deception on your part. The problem is not the lack of shine and bounce of your fluffy bits in comparison to pixilated fantasy. It's that the 50 year feedback loop of entitlement and unaccountability, and male facing blame and anger have rendered the selection of flesh over pixels an idiot's choice.

It is the current and escalating social climate of false accusation, men-suck, women are smarter, better, more human than men that has cooked women's market value. Borrowing once more from Naomi Wolf's NYMag market economic argument, the product on offer is now dangerous, toxic, and unreliable.

Of course hardly anybody is going to tell women this unkind truth, because there's no profit in telling overgrown, emotionally stunted children they need to get over themselves and grow up. Especially while all other commercial messaging saturates them with flattery. The universal message of "Women are better, women are stronger, women are more mature, women are goddesses," is what sells diet pills, granola bars, lipstick and bikini wax. Personal accountability is a downright bummer compared to all that fake adulation.

Men are obviously still expected to compete for selection, while women select from competitors. That's the built in behavioral wiring we share with almost all sexually differentiated life on the planet. And its not going to go away any time soon – no matter how hard radical re-inventors of reality try. That's why in an economy re-developed along female-favoring lines, in which most of the economic recession lands on men, and where higher education has become so hostile – men are simply opting out. It's also why women aren't going to become the pursuers in romance. They're not naturally wired for it. A few might, but only those few with the mental acumen to adapt. However, myths of women's innate superiority aside, most people are by definition; average.

Men on the other hand, who've always had to negotiate risk as competitors for sexual selection are voting with their feet. In rare instances where women do take a sexual lead, the downright hostile and dangerous climate men are now inured to provokes another response. Female sexual initiative is as likely to be treated as ambush than regarded as well intended attraction. The abject failure to recognize this, by the way, somewhat diminishes the fiction of superior female perception or intelligence.

This explanation is not a wake up call to women, by the way. I have no intent of enlightening frustrated females that in the current economy of sex they should try demonstrating a personality, or a sense of humour, or disengagement from the “all men suck” ideology. I intend to provide women no such manual, even exposing such outline in the previous sentence. No. This would be a total waste of time, because to benefit from any such revelation, they’d first have to grow up. Accountability, self-responsibility and empathy for others are elements of an adult’s consciousness, that omitting a few, our culture does not foster in women. Saturated by a nearly universal mainstream narrative of entitlement and victimhood, several generations are unsalvageably locked into permanent mental childhood. Corporate control of our culture’s narrative provides no immediate profit in reversing this cultivated phenomenon. Children are easier to sell to.

Anti porn advocates will continue formulating and selling semi-coherent rationales for the banning and suppression of alternatives to the vagina racket. And as long as our culture continues to pretend men are the source of all evil, and that women are victims, despite feminism’s dominance, men having sexual options will continue to leave women in diminished romantic demand.

That’s why, Naomi, your vagina isn’t worth shit.

[1] http://nymag.com/nymetro/news/trends/n_9437/

Thanksgiving thoughts from AVfM

Paul Elam · 24 November 2011 · Archived copy · Original

In America this is the Thanksgiving holiday. Canadians are kind of weird and celebrate their Thanksgiving in October, but since that country is represented in our management I won't be to snotty about it.

Seriously though, as schmaltzy and illogical as it sounds I have had a personal tradition for years now to reflect on something, or some things, I have every reason to be thankful about on this day. This year is no exception.

I have been doing an awful lot of bitching lately about the demands and the stress of conducting all this activism. I have griped about people making more requests of me than they are willing to do themselves, and I suppose that I had a right to some of that. This shit is hard and I could use 10 more hands and 24 more hours to each day.

But the other side of that – the part I want to talk about here – is that for most of my adult life I have dreamed of doing what I am doing now; of spending each and every day fully dedicated to making a difference. And for all the chiding I have done, the fact is that I never dreamed I would have had as much help and sacrifice from others as I have.

When I started A Voice for Men, I had hopes that it would become a successful blog and that it would project a strong voice, for men and boys, into the cacophony of misandric chatter that now deafens the masses to the truth. What I ended up with, what we ended up with, was an emerging lighthouse for the world of men and boys, many of whom are adrift in a sea of increasing troubles.

We have a body of literature, over 800 articles strong now, that I do believe is the most compelling collection of masculine counter-theory ever collected. We have a base of real activists, men and women who do more than shake their heads at the troubles we face. Every time AVfM has called on you, you have been there.

We have something that has outgrown my simple proprietorship and is truly the intellectual and moral property of many, many people. We have, finally, A Voice for Men, and I cannot imagine being any more proud or any more grateful.

On behalf of John and myself, hopefully your worthy servants in this great cause, thank you. May you all, from whatever part of the globe you call home, find your lives enriched by reasons to be grateful – and by the justice we all seek.

My road: from blue pill to red

Patrick Henry · 25 November 2011 · Archived copy · Original

[dropcap]I[/dropcap] was raised by a feminist, single mother. When I was very young, my father grew tired of hassling with her and drifted away. I grew up feeling that my father didn't love me. I didn't know what parental alienation was but I knew what it felt like. The only thing I was told about him was he was a "deadbeat dad," that didn't pay his child support.

When I was a teenager, my mother and I ran into him by chance while out on an errand. He looked at me and asked, "Do you know who I am?" I hadn't a clue and said, "No." I could tell by the pain on his face that I had stabbed him in the heart. As we said our goodbyes, he gave me his pocket knife. I never saw him again. I still have that pocket knife today to remind me of him.

My first taste of the red pill was in college, when there were no clothesline projects or white ribbon weeks, for which I'm grateful. I do remember the sense of unfairness with scholarships and finical aid. No one would help me because of my skin color and gender. Eventually, I "manned up" and earned my way through school.

Consumed with school, work, and girlfriends, my first taste of the bitter red pill was forgotten and I slipped back into my blue pill coma. I had met the love of my life and eventually we were married.

Nothing you could have told me back then would have changed my mind. We were best friends and perfect for each other. I wasn't going to make the same mistakes my mother and father made. I was going to always be there for my wife and children, no matter what. I made an oath before God and witnessnes to honor and protect her, till death do us part. I meant it and I lived it.

15 years later, I had a good job, a house, great kids, and I was still in love. I was truly happy. Blue cool-aid is yummy! What happened next would shake me to my core and force me to choke down the red pill; whole this time.

I discovered my wife was having an affair. When I confronted her about it she called the cops on me because she was "afraid." Afraid! Afraid of what? I was her white knight. I never laid a finger on her or the kids, ever. In a wash of horror, I got it. She wasn't afraid at all. It was over, and she just played her trump card.

I met the cop in the driveway and calmly told him what happened. He gave me a choice. I could leave and never come back or he could take me to jail. I'm grateful this happened before VAWA.

For the next year I lived in an unfurnished apartment, sleeping on the floor. Between my attorney fees and paying both the house mortgage and apartment rent, I was dead broke. There were days I would go without food because I didn't have any money.

I would "man-up" at work, then I would come home and sob. I had lost everything that was important to me. Friends and family turned on me. In some twisted way they blamed me for the divorce. I tried two different counselors who wanted to sell me their version of "women good, men bad." There was nowhere to turn but within.

In my darkest hours, I considered taking my life. Blue pill withdrawal is a bitch. My children kept me going. I didn't want to leave them with a whole in their hearts, like the one I felt as a child. During this time, I developed a deeper understanding and compassion for my father and his loss.

As time went by, I would just sit and think for hours. I would sit and wonder how did I get here? This was her wrong not mine. She had an affair, yet she gets the house, the car, and the kids. I get attorney fees, alimony, and child support. What kind of fucked up world is this? There is no justice!

Once the divorce was over, I got my life back together. I wandered for a couple years thinking the world was crazy. No one could see what I could see or at least wouldn't admit to it. I was living outside the matrix. I was MGTOW but I didn't know the term then.

Then one day on YouTube, I came across one of Factory's videos, and then JTO's, then The Happy Misogynist. I realized I wasn't alone. In fact, there were men much farther down the road than I was. That day an MRA was born.

Fidelbogen joins the AVfM team

Paul Elam · 25 November 2011 · Archived copy · Original

[box icon="none"]

Gents and ladies, it seems the holidays have wasted no time fulfilling the tendency to bear gifts. We are happy to announce that Fidelbogen, the devastating deconstructionist of feminist ideology, also known as The Counter Feminist, today officially joins the ranks of the editorial staff at AVfM.

And so what precisely, you may ask, does this mean?

Well, some things are immediately certain. He will be posting a "letter of introduction" in the near future to speak to some of that, but a couple of things are already clear. One, he will bring a surgical eye to the spelling and grammar of the work presented here, and will be able to correct mistakes as he encounters them. He also has a well-documented history of providing MRM literature of impeccable quality and lasting value. We expect that will continue in earnest.

But there are contributions as yet undefined. As an editor here, Fidelbogen joins a loosely associated staff of independent activists, all with the authority to use AVfM to launch all manner of FTSU. He will be free to initiate such actions, or not to, as he sees fit and as his life schedule allows. As an FTSU "free agent" it is better to allow him to address that from this point forward.

Needless to say, we are pleased to no end around here at this development. Editorial positions at AVfM are by invitation only, and we are damned picky about who we invite.

Please join me in welcoming Fidebogen to the team at the leading online platform for men's rights activism in the world. We are lucky to have him.

[/box]

Shrink4men Radio: Why does she ruin every holiday?

Dr. Tara J. Palmatier · 27 November 2011 · Archived copy · Original

[box type="note" icon="none"]

Do you experience an impending sense of doom when Walgreen's sets up their Christmas displays?

Do you wish you could settle down for a "long winter's nap" on Halloween and wake up on February 15th?

Do you brace yourself for your wife's inevitable tantrums, tears, rage outs, the cold shoulder and other forms of abuse directed at you and your family as the winter holidays approach?

Does your wife or girlfriend sabotage every holiday and then blame you for ruining "her" holiday?

Does your wife or girlfriend demand that you spend the holidays with her family and give you grief if you spend time with your family, that is, if she'll even let you?

Does your wife, girlfriend or ex make shopping lists and expect you to buy every item for her and the kids on Santa's List™?

Does your wife, girlfriend or ex throw more tantrums at Christmas and New Year's than an actual 2-year old?

Does it seem like your wife, girlfriend or ex ruins every holiday and special occasion?

If so, tune in to Shrink4Men Radio on Monday, November 27, 2011 at 9pm EST when your host, Dr. Tara J. Palmatier of Shrink4Men, will explore the question, why does my wife, girlfriend or ex ruin every damn holiday?

The phone lines will be open, so if you have a story to share about how your wife, girlfriend, ex, partner's ex, mom, sister or aunt tries to ruin every holiday, please call in (+1 310 388 9709) or Skype.

SHOW PAGE

[/box]

When is a death threat funny?

John Hembling (JtO) · 27 November 2011 · Archived copy · Original

At what point does a “real man” take death threats seriously?

In response to this site’s ongoing opposition to increasingly common calls for male-targeted murder, a blogger named Hannah Mudge appears to have missed the point entirely.

In a discussion on the topic of online bullying[1], Mudge correctly identifies threats of violence or death as problematic for opinionated bloggers whose postings, in the pseudo-anonymous culture of online writing, sometimes provoke threatening responses. Unsurprisingly, on a site named “bitchbuzz” the tacit assumption appears to be that female writers hold a monopoly on receipt of such threats. However, this fallacy is so common that exploration of it would be a distraction.

Mudge spends a paragraph establishing her ideological credentials, and demonstrating to her readers that she knows about the subtleties of psychological abuse, before getting to the meat of her argument.

According to her source, a “man” renowned for depraved futility; one of the more high-profile men’s rights websites (that’s us) recently offered a reward to for the personal details of a group of Swedish women who have made a video we don’t like.

Hannah omits mention of the reason we don’t like it, namely that it called for male-targeted murder. In addressing the video’s naked endorsement of homicide, Mudge manages to characterize it as “admittedly ridiculous.” She further smogs the issue by claiming it was “publicity for a play, which isn’t, you know, real”.

And in the limited sense of being technically correct, Mudge is right. The depiction of a man’s murder, followed by the text message “Do Your Part” is indeed the promotion for a play. That play being the stage adaptation of Valerie Solanas’ infamous anti-male hate literature “Society for Cutting Up Men Manifesto”[2]. Many apologists for male targeting hatred and violence claim that Solanas was kidding. However, in addition to authoring this manifesto, she also shot Andy Warhol. Probably not kidding so much, eh?

But lets, just for argument’s sake; assume that Solina’s work is no more than a particularly dark joke. Clever satire, characterized by sentiments such as:

[unordered_list style=”tick”]

- To be male is to be deficient, emotionally limited; maleness is a deficiency disease and males are emotional cripples
- Every man, deep down, knows he’s a worthless piece of shit
- Being an incomplete female, the male spends his life attempting to complete himself, to become female
- The male is completely egocentric, trapped inside himself, incapable of empathizing or identifying with others, or love, friendship, affection of tenderness

[/unordered_list]

The stage production based on Solana’s hate manifesto, and promoted by this disgusting item of murder advocacy is routinely performed by the group calling themselves “S.C.U.M.” for school-children. Yes, children. Try to imagine explaining to a 12 year boy that the presentation he was shown at school explaining that he is male and therefore worthless – that it was only satire and he should just man up.

Hannah Mudge also mistakes the intent behind identifying and publishing the names of murder-advocates. She claims my article on this site was “[a call] for those who are involved in the video to be publicly shamed.”

While public advocation of murder is shameful, particularly when based on a sexual demographic, the real reason for naming murder advocates is to prevent murder. The obtuse failure to grasp that Swedish feminists' public call for murder is actually a public call for murder, while the identification of those murder advocates is a matter of civic responsibility is difficult to credit as genuine confusion.

If calling for male-targeted murder is, in Mudge's words "All just a bit of fun," then how does identification of those murder advocates transmogrify into an endorsement of violence?

Perhaps in Mudge's mind, its not really violence or murder if it targets males.

National and regional governments commonly list male offenders on state-funded websites. News outlets also routinely publish the names of men accused, but not even convicted of various crimes, including unproven accusations of rape. Such men are professionally and personally destroyed, even after legal exhortation. The register-her project, condemned by Hannah Mudge, includes only those offenders on whom reputable reporting exists, and does not register those who have been accused but not convicted of crimes. Their crimes are already a part of the public record and are linked on their register-her profiles. However, in Mudge's words: "if that's not an encouragement to disturbed individuals looking to go on the rampage, I don't know what it is."

This is a rhetorical question, but one betraying either laziness or stupidity. The "About" page of register-her includes the following statement.

[box]
"This website is a public service designed as an information resource regarding criminal threats in the community. The need for register-her.com was born out of the unfortunate social and legal custom of failing to punish female criminals and to safeguard society from their continued criminality."
[/box]

Borrowing from Hannah Mudge again – the video of which I and the editors of AVfM are unreservedly critical is explicitly "an encouragement to disturbed individuals looking to go on the rampage."

Mudge's assertion, that public identification of the advocates of murder and promoters of hate constitutes "another example of women being targeted for harassment" stretches credulity. I do not believe that Hannah Mudge is an honest actor. Rather, she is attempting to protect hate mongers who advocate murder and who indoctrinate children in the same mentality, as if these people are satirists, and she is characterizing men who object to being targeted for murder as aggressors.

[box]WAR IS PEACE, FREEDOM IS SLAVERY, and IGNORANCE IS STRENGTH[/box]

The Swedish feminists aren't unique in their advocation of male-targeted violence. An american author who writes crime novels under the pseudonym Perri O'Shaughnessy also blogs using the online identity Vliet Tiptree. On a feminist themed blog called radical-hub, O'Shaughnessy crafted an anti male diatribe of more than 4000 words[3]. In this rant O'Shaughnessy demonstrated her lawyerly skills by using euphemistic language to call for a long term program of male-targeting eugenics. Commentary from her followers – left standing months after the blog's exposure by AVfM is more explicit, suggesting programs of male infanticide as well as other methods of extermination.

Another blogger named Rebecca Carter[4] advocated male extermination in explicit language. The daytime women's show "the Talk" treated male sexual mutilation committed by Katherine Becker as slapstick comedy[5], and one of that show's hostesses announced that a previous generation's celebrity male mutilator – Lorena Bobbit was worshipped at an alter in her home.

So Hannah Mudge I have a question for you, and it's not rhetorical.

At what point should a "real man" take the direct threat of murder seriously? When, as a man, should an individual take the signal that the calls for murder, for eugenics, and for extermination are not "all in good fun" anymore, but that they represent a real violent malice?

Ill ask you again Hannah – with a repeat of my notice to you that this is not a rhetorical question. When does advocacy of violence or murder stop being a joke, and start being what it is; namely a death threat issued against an entire sexual demographic?

Maybe it's when rape of members of a sexual demographic – happening with the sanction of law enforcement becomes a staple of late night comedy on TV? No, of course not, men getting raped in prison is hilarious!

Is it when state-sponsored performance groups teach children to hate based on sex? No, of course not, that's just satire from silly old Valerie Solanas; the attempted murderer.

Is it when numerous blogs call for male targeting murder? Is it when those blogs receive dozens of comments in support of, and in escalation of advocated violence? Ha! No, of course not, the hundreds of women calling for men to be killed in their facebook, myspace, and twitter blogs are just cute.

Maybe its when gruesome, violent crimes targeting one sex are openly celebrated on daytime TV. Ha! men getting chopped up is funny, you can tell because the entire studio audience cheered and laughed.

So, men like me clearly have no idea how to recognize the difference between good-natured comedy, and murderous intent, so please Hannah, do inform me.

One more question for you Hannah. How does objection to violence transform, in your mind,to harassment of women?

Hanna Mudge, you are a disgrace.

[1] http://tech.bitchbuzz.com/this-week-in-online-harassment.html
[2] http://www.womynkind.org/scum.htm
[3] http://radicalhub.wordpress.com/2011/10/04/radical-feminism-in-the-21st-century/
[4] http://www.avoiceformen.com/wp-content/uploads/sites/2/2011/11/Proposition-777-Extermination-of-Man.pdf
[5] http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=5rkl_oLSKQc

S.C.U.M. murder and dance party with credits

John Hembling (JtO) · 27 November 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Normally we only place videos in our newfangled video library. But sometimes you need something front and center. PE

In November of 2010, a collection of Swedish feminists identifying themselves as followers of Valerie Solanas – by the title of her male-hating diatribe, the S.C.U.M. Manifesto (society for cutting up men) posted a video depicting the murder of a newspaper reading man, followed by an impromptu dance party, and the text message "Do Your Part" – a clear, unambiguous call for male-targeting homicide.

This video stayed on youtube for over a year. It received over 5000 views, and got more than 300 down-votes. It is likely that dozens of people flagged it using Youtube's complaint system, on the grounds that it was hate speech, and endorsed murder. It remained on Youtube, along with the open endorsement of murder until the readers at AVfM took notice, and uncovered the identities of these murder enthusiasts and hate mongers. Unfortunately, the Swedish theatre group, naming themselves "SCUM" continue to present a stage adaptation of Valerie Solanas's male-targeting hate propaganda to school children. However, thanks to the efforts of MRAs around the word, they're no longer doing so without world-wide criticism.

AVfM Radio: WTF is wrong with Sweden?

Paul Elam · 28 November 2011 · Archived copy · Original

[box icon="none"]

[NOTE: Schedule change for AVfM Radio. The red pill broadcast is moving to Thursday nights. This is done purely for selfish reason on the part of the red pill pharmacist. The problem was simple. I need to start scheduling – and taking – a couple of days off. Weekends seem like a good time for that, but with the show airing on Tuesdays it puts John and I both in pre-production over the weekend. So, the move. Mark your calendars, gents and ladies. Thursdays at 8:00 p.m. is the new day and time for A Voice for Men Radio]

And speaking of that we have a humdinger lined up for you on this Thursday, December 1, 2011.

What is the problem with Sweden? Is it meatballs? ABBA? Volvos? Bergman films? Bjorn Borg? Well, how about the golf club swinging Elin Nordegren? No? Ericsson phones, maybe? Nope. Actually, aside from ABBA and Nordegren, not too much bad can be said about the lengthy list of Swedish icons.

That leaves the matter of gender politics, which we are starting to understand are so corrupted by feminism that the country may soon rename, reshape or do completely away with Swedish meatballs as they might be oppressive artifacts of the patriarchy.

Come Thursday, your cohost John the Other and I will be talking about the land of frozen vaginas a little bit. Actually, we will be talking about it a lot, along with a few tidbits from the States and other parts of Europe that highlight why we may not be near as far from Sweden's model of feminist governance as we would like to think.

Join us for the return of A Voice for Men Radio now that we have taken a much needed break. We will be back with enough heat to grow palm trees in Stockholm.

SHOWPAGE FOR "WTF IS WRONG WITH SWEDEN?"

[/box]

To my fellow workers in the vineyard

Luigi Logan (aka Fidelbogen) · 28 November 2011 · Archived copy · Original

On Friday the 25th of November, 2011, I was honored to join Paul Elam and John the Other in the work of editing and managing A Voice for Men.

Some of you old-timers already know me, even from years back. But for others, I am just Mutt Wulfe or Vince Verngehetznor who has recently popped up on the radar scope. So an introduction is very much in the warrant here, don't you think so?

All right, I start with a confession: I confess that I am a lucky bum. Many people have arrived in the pro-male sector by the road of bitter experience and even, at times, horrific tragedy. But I can't claim that distinction for myself, and that is why I'm a lucky bum. For yes, I am oh-so-lucky that I arrived here by the merely conceptual pathway, the path of deciphering reality and following my nose because something didn't smell right.

There was a time, believe it or not, when I felt neutral or indifferent about feminism. In those days, I had nothing particular against feminism, but the fact is, I paid it scarcely any mind whatever. For me it was eccentric background noise, full of sound and fury but signifying nothing. And to be frank I was more invested in such weighty affairs as panlogomachia and chronopolitismus. (Don't ask!) But shortly after Y2K I grew keenly aware of feminism as of a fetid breath from a quagmire, and I commenced to sniffing around.

[image]What I discovered did not please me, so I put away panlogomachia and chronopolitismus and embarked on a journey which led me finally to the online men's rights community — such as it was in those days, when the word 'MRA' didn't even exist yet! Here I lingered and learned, participating in mail lists, forums and so on. I also started digging into feminist books that I excavated from used bookstores. Oh…and I will never forget the time when I first set eyes on the Redstockings Manifesto, in a feminist anthology, at the downtown Seattle library. I remember copying key passages into a notebook, which proved unnecessary because it was easily available online. But oh…those were heady days of dawning awareness and discovery — rich, ripe, juicy and full to the brim with a bracing sense of mission.

In October 2006, I started the Counter-Feminist blog — and oddly enough, I did this on a whim, on the spur of the moment. Prior to then I had compiled a body of writing for the purpose of organizing my thoughts, and this material formed the backbone of the blog in its early days. The blog got off to a rolling start, and the rest is history. Which brings me up to right now, to this very day, to this very minute.

I drool at the thought of exploiting the AVfM platform for my own dark, nefarious counter-feminist purposes. Such opportunity! I am rubbing my hands together like a villain as I contemplate this. And yes, I am even saying things like "mu-ha-ha-ha!" Curse me, but this here is a bully pulpit indeed.

All right, I have an agenda. Call it a vision for the future; an idea where things ought to be heading. And no, I don't mean AVfM. I mean ALL of this. The whole game. The whole revolution. The whole damned enchilada. Just imagine: a world without feminism. What would such a world look like? Well, you haven't got far to seek, because that world is here today. It exists, has always existed, and always will exist, even though feminism is loud enough to drown it out sometimes.

Feminism, I would have you know, is no better than a guest who has overstayed his welcome. Or then again, perhaps we never invited that so-called guest into our home in the first place. But either way, this unwanted person must be shown the door. Are you with me? Now, we would have some rights in the case of a literal unwanted guest, and these would be covered under trespass law. But in our actual case, we face a spiritual kind of trespass that no earthly statute, civil or criminal, may remedy.

So it looks like we must take the SPIRITUAL law into our own hands, eh?

And that is what I, for one, would like to talk about. Among many, many other things.

In truth, I have so many ideas for kicking feminism out of our spiritual home that they jam the exit door of my mind and can hardly issue forth. But the crowning imperative, to expel the rascal rudely, overshadows everything else. We mustn't stand on ceremony, oh no! And if the application of this involves discipline, political finesse, and a host of details in practice, the core of it remains, ever and always, primitively stark and simple. I mean that we do not "persuade" this monstrosity to make its departure, but rather cause it to be removed from our premises by any efficient method or combination of methods our ingenuity might suggest. The key is, that whatever works, works. So the problem is to figure out what works.

Bear in mind that feminism is not the world. It is only a part of the world, and it holds power only at our sufferance — until we elect to suffer it no longer. And when feminism is gone, the world will still exist — and we will still understand it. And feminism's disappearance will have expunged no wisdom. So we can understand almost straightway what the world without feminism will look like, because we have only to recall what we have always known. As the sign in the shop window says, "Inquire Within".

I repeat, part of the world is feminism and part of it is not. And let us never forget that the latter is the larger portion. For knowing this, we know that the line is drawn and the die is cast, and that from here on out the story will get interesting. Yes, we live in interesting times.

But we shall speak further of these matters.

Welcome to Absurdistan

Joakim Ramstedt · 28 November 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Sweden is the best country in the world. At least we who live here think so. At one time we were a superpower, but that is no longer the case. All we got to keep when the Russians kicked our asses 200 years ago was a piece of forestland and some mountains in the snow and ice hell near the Arctic Circle. But the superpower mentality of the inhabitants, they could not take from us. So I guess we fooled them after all.

In Absurdistan, we are equal. We are actually the world's most equal country. Did you know that? Oh yes, here we are equal, all of us. Except politicians and bankers of course. They are worth more than the rest of us. But that is probably equal. At least they tell us that, so it must be true.

[image]Yes, it is actually obvious when you think about it. If they could not be trusted they would hardly be worth more than the rest of us, would they? No, it is quite logical. Here in Absurdistan, we totally trust those who govern us. If someone does not agree with them, or, god forbid, even protests against them, we get angry. We, the people of Absurdistan, know that we must defend our authoroties against shameful attacks from dissident citizens. There is actually a word that we use to describe these stirrers here. We call them "justice-crashers," just to taunt them. That is a word that is quite unique for our proud country.

Our king has a job guarantee

In Absurdistan we have a king. His name is Carl Gustav, and he is a fishy character. But what ellse can you expect? He is, after all, a man. It also has been in the newspapers and that is how we know it's true. Did you know that he went to a strip club in Canada and looked at naked women during the olympics when he was young? Damn dirty old man. We do NOT like naked women here in Absurdistan. We think that is disgusting and ugly. Though quite a few say so, but watch anyway on the sly. That's a bit hard to explain. It is called pornography, and we do NOT like that here, because we think it is degrading for women to show themselves naked. Not for men however, because they have a choice, women don´t.

But above all, we think it is insulting to a woman if anyone thinks she is beautiful to look at. Or in a worst case scenario, even get excited by it. Yikes! The men who are doing this we call "filth lobsters" unless they are over thirty, of course, because then they become "old men mucus." Our king is thus an "old man mucus," although he was younger than thirty when he did it… well it´s complicated. I guess you have to be as advanced in equality as we are here in Absurdistan to fully understand these things, and since noone is, well…

Unfortunately, we can not get rid of him since he he has a job guarantee. That doesn´t mean we can´t slander him though.

Nature is messing with us.

I said that we were equal here in Absurdistan? Yes, though not quite yet. There is in fact a major obstacle in our strive for gender equality, and it's the damn biology.

Here in Absurdistan we do not like the fact there are two sexes, because then it becomes unfair … for women.

It goes without saying really. They are the weaker and more fragile sex the poor things. It sometimes feel completely hopeless to achive full equality as long as nature continues to screw with us this way.We are trying to solve this problem in different ways though. For example, by making it unfair for men we can make it equal. Therefore, we have, for example, introduced two different laws: One for males and one for females. The law on violence against women is great. It says that if you disturb a woman's peace, you go to jail. Our prisons have become very crowded with men after we invented this law.

Women however, may interfere with a man's peace however and whenever she damn well pleases. Is this not brilliant? Who said that gender equality must be about to making it better for people? It works just as well the other way around. If someone is not feeling well, everyone else should feel bad, too. That is equality.

Assange and the unused condom

Here in Absurdistan we naturally assume that a man is guilty. Because just face it. He is isn´t he?

But the law also sometimes creates problems in our struggle for equality. For the most part, we solve these problems by sentencing men for sex crimes behind closed doors. That way the judges and prosecutors are left alone to rule without having to have a bunch of people, or even worse, journalists, going on about evidence and stuff.

Actually we have invented an ingenious way to ensure that no offenders get off… well, suspected offenders then if want to be picky about words.

Here is how we do it. First, we state that the man is guilty, because he is. He has been since he was born. Then we take a little peek at the evidence and if there is something that seems to be exculpatory we twist it around a bit so that we can use it against the suspect. Is it not brilliant? In the cases where it is word against word, we have excellent judges who can determine who is lying and who is telling the truth. If, for example a woman cries during her testimony, it means she is telling the truth.

Take Julian Assange for example. He is man, that's something we know for sure. Thus, he is guilty. If not of rape, then at least for something. If the broken condom that the poor little defenseless woman submitted as evidence, bears no DNA from either him or her, that does not mean he is innocent. Of course not! The poor ravaged woman, obviously in her upset state, must have saved the wrong broken condom for 15 days before handing it in as evidence. Do you see the logic? It´s brilliant, isn´t it?

That is roughly how we do it. We here in Absurdistan are very pissed off at Julian Assange because he did not come here and take his punishment like a man. Sitting whining about small details such as human rights and other gewgaw. That´s not very manly now is it?

He is obviously not supporting gender equality, Mr. Assange. We here in Absurdistan know exactly what gender equality is, because Gudrun Schyman and other feminists have carefully explained it to us. And she should know because she is an expert. Actually she has defined equal, so who could possibly explain it better than her? Here in Absurdistan, we are smart enough to understand these things, you see.

We teach our children early

Another way to counter that damn biology saboteur is another Absurdistansk invention that we are very proud of, namely gender science. Ahhh, just the word makes you shiver with pleasure.

[image]Take this photograph for example. I found it on a webpage for "funny pictures" a while ago.

What is it exactly that is funny? Are there any of you who out there who can understand this? On the contrary, it shows exactly how our gender science have triumphed. We have discovered that if children are of kindergarten age, teach them that they really have no sex, and we become equal. We have trained lots of so-called gender educators and set up specific gender kindergartens so we can save the children from the delusion that there is a difference between boys and girls. In time we are planning to have these gender educators in every kindergaden in the whole country.

The differences between the sexes, which of course is just imagination … or something, we take out of the children by not letting the girls dress in pink, even though they want to. The boys, however, which certainly do not want to, have to anyway. That is how we create gender equality. We are also prohibiting free play for children because we have discovered that if we let the kids play freely, then the gender roles get cemented, and that is not good. The boys insist on wanting to play with cars and Lego, while girls want to play with dolls. And, of course, we cannot have that. If children are allowed to play freely, we will never be equal.

This is why gender educators sometimes have to step in and control what and how the children play; to prevent this cementation, so to speak. The children may protest a little at first, but they do not know what is best for them, only the gender educators know that.

Terrible enemies of equality – and thus women – have begun to appear on the web

We in Absurdistan have a very tight control on our media. Noone who does not fully support gender equality will be heard here. How would that look?

[image]On the Internet, however, it happens more and more frequently that the enemies of equality shows their ugly faces. Then we get angry at them and tell them what disgusting pigs and misogynists they are. Like that Pär Ström, for example, or citizen X, not to mention the horrible Daddy. By the way, wasn´t he a pedophile? I seem to remember having read that on a equality forum somewhere. Then it is true, of course.

One would think that it would be sufficient to tell them what discusting male pigs they are, but they are like leeches. So sometimes we must resort to more serious ammo against these male-chauvinist reactionaries. There's plenty you can do if you are a little creative. One can, for example, take their children away. It tends to silence them. Or you can fix so they get fired or have their dole money retracted. After all, they are not suitable as parents anyway.Think of the poor children. They can, for example, get the impression that it's okay to be a girl, or worse still, a boy! We do not want such unequal individuals here in Absurdistan.

What if everyone thought like that? Then a whole generation of boys could actually grow up to be men! And not only that, they could quite possibly be proud of it too. Get it?! It would be the end of our lovely equality for which we have fought for all these years. All would be lost. We would return to a sexist Sodom and Gomorrah where men and women would involve themselves in all sorts of nasty stuff. Yuck! Love, they call it, good lord!

We are past hat kind of nonsense here in Absurdistan. Sure the occasional he and she are still trying to form families, but they have not understood anything. Not to worry, they will. What they do not yet understand is that it is hopeless. We do not like the traditional family here in Absurdistan. We have therefore arranged to make it impossible to balance work and home life while retaining a life together. Do you know that when we liberated women the middle of the 70's, the number of divorces dramatically increased, and they are still increasing.This is of course a very good thing since a married woman can never be equal. The traditional family is a concentrationcamp for women.

It´s very disturbing however that more than half of the women surveyed said that they would still rather be at home taking care of their children than working. These women do not know what is good for them. They should be thankful that we who know about these things can tell them what´s best for them.

True Absurdistanian equality

Then there are other positive side-effects to the Absurdistanian equality as well, which depletes these odious love relationships. Look at this picture for example.

[image]It's a win win situation. It makes me all warm just thinking about it. However, there is a fiery little horrible party in parliament which seeks to uphold the traditional family. The Christian democrats of course. We do not like their kind here in Absurdistan. Extremists and reactionaries the lot of them. Yuck!No, here in Absurdistan, we are proud to be the world's most equal country. But we are obviously not satisfied. You can always get a little further, and it annoys us greatly that Mother Nature persists in opposing us in our important quest. Just take all the filth she created under our clothes for example.

Fortunately, these disgusting body parts soon will be unnecessary because women will soon have the natural right to have children without a father involved. Then maybe the man finally can be eradicated, a freak of nature as he is. Then we finally will be completely equal.Dear lord what I am going on. Now I will go and make myself a cup of coffee and sit down and take a smoke on the porch in my loneliness. You see I have no woman living with me anymore to keep me company. All attempts have failed and my children went with their moms so I don´t see them very often either. Sure, it can feel strangely lonesome and empty at times, but why complain? I have the gouvernment watching over me and to raise my children for me so that they become equal, Just like me.

God bless our beloved Absurdistan. The most equal country in the world.

A kinder, gentler machine gun hand

Paul Elam · 29 November 2011 · Archived copy · Original

How Feminism Capitalizes on Men's Rights Movement Victories

Exposing feminist extremism helps to spread the MRM message. Large or outrageous acts of misandry will sometimes yank a few of the oblivious masses out of their stupor, causing them to sit up and take notice. We tend to look upon these events as small victories for the MRM as they almost always draw a handful of people to our cause. It is only natural that we would celebrate our exposing.

We are prone to become so caught up in our taking of a hill that we fall into the trap of thinking that the hill was a victory. I would suggest otherwise. In the fog of war against the male sex, we fail to see how extremist behavior provides a diversion from equally important issues. In some cases, the hills we charge serve to empower the more mainstream of feminists who are able to look normal in comparison to their extremist sisters. Attention is never drawn to the fact that it is always the MRM that first exposes these radicals. It is rarely stated that 'moderate' feminists remain utterly silent about their fringe elements proposals of male genocide until the plots have been exposed to the public eye. Only then do these mainstream feminists step into the spotlight to announce that not all feminists hold those beliefs. Feminists capitalize on misandry by presenting an image of disapproval when their radical sisters are brought to light, giving the world an impression that they themselves are the reasonable voice of feminism. Our skirmishes become victories for mainstream feminists as well.

Meanwhile, police departments and college campuses across America continue to incorporate inaccurate abuse data into their domestic violence policies. False rape accusers continue to suffer no or mild punishment for their crimes. Talk show hostesses laugh about male genital mutilation without a blip on the news radar. Men are portrayed as buffoons in innumerable television programs and commercials. Civil courts overwhelmingly grant mothers custody of children, but refuse to intervene when non-custodial mothers abduct children from their primary guardian fathers on grounds that it is a civil issue instead of a criminal one.

While the MRM revels in a 'victory' against radical feminists the mainstream feminist movement continues their unrelenting attack on men's rights. Draconian laws are passed in which due process is cast out with the bathwater if you are guilty of the crime of having external genitalia. Boys are taught that it is wrong to behave as boys, indeed that it is 'natural' to behave in a manner diametrically opposed to what their biology tells them. While this happens all around us, the sculptors of these tyrannies, the feminists, smile benignly. This is the path of feminist 'equality'; the kinder, gentler machine gun hand, ready to goad us at gunpoint down the hellish road of their good intentions.

Divide and Conquer

To counter the feminists win/win scenario, we must learn strategies which will allow us to expose the links between mainstream feminists and their radical elements. We must remind people that Qui tacet consentiret, silence implies consent. We must do this consistently with every battle in order to expose the hypocrisy in feminism. Society must learn that the actions of feminists do not match their claims of striving toward equality. By continually calling them out, we can force feminists to either take actual strides toward equality by supporting men's rights issues, or to display their bigoted ideology.

Feminists enjoy claiming that there are many schools of feminist ideology. Despite this claim the average feminist will conveniently mix & match various ideologies. It is not uncommon for a feminist to portray herself as a liberal feminist while ranting about how the oppressive nature of female exploitation (Socialist feminism) is created by the Patriarchy (Anarcha-feminism) and the social construction of gender (Postmodern feminism).

Feminists fall into only two camps, those supporting gender equality and bigots. The former is by far the minority. By continually pointing out these overlaps we are able to dismantle the individual ideological shortcomings, creating rifts that actually separate what now only pretends to be separated. This tactic also has the potential to draw gender equalists into our fold.

The terms 'sexist' and 'sexism' are weapons in the feminist arsenal. Feminists often use these terms to stifle debate and criticism. Sexism has two meanings, only one of which is relevant. The first meaning is that of sexual discrimination. The second is an attitude or behavior based on traditional stereotypes of sexual roles. Part of feminist theory is the distinction between gender and sex. This second definition is flawed, as it has been demonstrated in the case of David Reimer that gender has a biological basis.

Since that time numerous peer review publications and studies have demonstrated innate differences between the sexes along with the biochemical causes of these differences. To combat the feminist's ability to employ these as weapons we must divorce the two definitions. The first definition requires clarification when it is used, as it is often applied to anyone that disagrees. The second usage is a feminist construct rooted in their ideology that has no bearing on reality. By forcing the feminists to define their use of the terms in this manner we expose their mentality to the public.

Carrying the Fight Forward

Countering feminist claims when they are presented is a reactionary process. This tactic is doomed to failure. The feminists have already scored their sound bite, and by the time we respond their meme has already taken root while our tardy voices are shouted down by the drone of the feminist hoard. The end result is that the MRM message reaches only a small fraction of the population. While reactionary actions will always be needed, we must make strides in being proactive. To this end it is necessary that we present some form of united voice swiftly and publicly on equality issues. We need both men of words and men of action to present our side as a voice of reason and moderation.

We must find ways to reach the disenfranchised men, to offer them guidance and support. We must explore new mediums for spreading our message on local, national, and international levels. MRM and MRA websites have a limited appeal and will attract a limited audience. In order to be heard, to be a force to be reckoned with, it is imperative that we escape this corral of our own making.

Education is one key. Feminists have been preaching their gospel of misinformation for over 50 years. Males young and old have been indoctrinated with the belief that gender is a social construct. Many of those men have been further oppressed with the ancient social construct of chivalry which leads them straight down the path of defeat. Feminists have spread their false statistics not only into courtrooms which grant them the protection of men with guns and cages, but into scholastic institutions that further fuel the indoctrination.

We are now tasked with enlightening the indoctrinated. As these false beliefs and statistics are firmly entrenched, we are presented with the difficult job of digging them out and laying down a new foundation based on facts. We have to reach the lawmakers, the police stations, the student bodies, and the general public. The tools for this job are there, if only we can learn to operate them.

The New Battlefront

Our next generation will be rooted in the digital age. News, entertainment, and social events now take place at the speed of the internet. As the modern world becomes more entwined with and dependent upon electronic communication, it becomes more apparent that this is the most powerful tool at our disposal. The electronic world is our new battlefront. We have a distinct advantage over civil rights movements of the past in that the internet is a source of communication that can tremendously speed the process of organization, outreach, and information sharing. The second greatest tool for social reform, the printing press, is lost in the shadow of the internet.

If the internet has taught us one lesson in electronic organization, it is flash mobs. Through networking, a mob can be coordinated, brought together, and disbanded in a matter of minutes. In more populated regions with a higher concentration of activists, impromptu rallies and protests can be brought together whenever an opportunity arises. These could be staged in conjunction with political visits, or even for opportunistic media hits during live news reports. We have at our fingertips the tool to make a store opening or weather report a conveyance of civil reform.

Thousands of forums and websites open to commentary exist, and yet we employ only a miniscule fraction of these mediums. We need to think outside the corral of men's rights, and ask ourselves what areas do not pertain to us. Our interests lay well outside the realm of MRM pages which tend to be areas of preaching to the choir. Do men not extend into the reddit pages of politics, worldview, science, advice, IaMa, and even economics? We cannot continue to box ourselves in. Innumerable forums are present for us in which we can make our voices heard. We need not be invasive, overt, or spamming. A simple discrete comment or tag line can spark interest.

Many newspapers are now available in e-print. This throws open the door to commentary and letters to the editor ranging from local to world readership. Each and every one of those papers represents an opportunity to spread MRM awareness and concerns. Each and every paper is a chance to communicate with another frustrated, disillusioned, repressed man who has yet to find a voice for his discontent.

Petitions are another weapon that the internet has made simple. A google search for e-petitions will generate multiple hits for sites that create electronic petitions. Gone are the days of door to door signature begging. Petitions can now be created and circulated from the comfort of your home or office. With e-petitions we can enter the political arena with a force unprecedented in history. This is a weapon that we would be foolish to ignore. There is no better tool to make our collective voice be heard to the lawmakers than petitions, and no faster method of collecting signatures than e-petitions.

The one area of this new battlefront that we have occupied well is that of video. The MRM produces videos that are witty, funny, and informative. What we need are videos en masse. We also need the speakers to be charismatic, impassioned, and eloquent orators with skill at public speaking.

No better testimony to the power of charisma and presentation can be offered than the 1960 Nixon/Kennedy televised debate. Nixon appeared sickly and refused makeup. Kennedy was young and vibrant in full television makeup. It was not Kennedy's arguments that swayed public opinion, as people who only heard the debate on the radio pronounced Nixon the winner. What won the debate for Kennedy was his visual charisma and presentation.

Today politicians are well aware of this, and utilize good speech writers and lighting in conjunction with their appearance and presentation to win votes. These are the skills and tools that we need to make the most of.

Recently a Texas judge whose belt whipping of his daughter that was captured on video was uploaded to youtube. The video quickly went viral, and as a result of that video the judge has been suspended from the bench. The power of video is phenomenal, and the power of a viral video can be earth-shaking. We need videos that go viral. To achieve this will require the work of more than individuals working alone. We need to utilize our collective wisdom and skills to brainstorm and produce videos of exceptional quality and substance. I would suggest that anyone producing videos watch a few episodes of Penn & Teller Bullshit to get a feel for the use of emotive language, gestures, voice infliction, and humor used by Penn Jillette in making his points.

A second area that we already use is that of radio. Again the internet has made it possible for virtually anyone to broadcast. Using the non-visual tools outlined above, we can more effectively utilize this medium of communication for getting the word to the masses. Oral presentation is everything in radio, and a mixture of humor and fact is the formula for keeping listeners engaged.

Finally we are able to resort to a variant of that great tool of liberation; the printing press. Johannes Gutenberg changed the world in the mid 1400's with the invention of movable type printing. For the first time in history, books could be mass-produced. The first presses were monstrous apparatuses that could take up the majority of a room. Today we are able to print more literature with greater speed using machines smaller than a suitcase using a computer and printer. Flyers and handouts can be generated at home with ease. These can be passed out, left lying in reception areas or waiting rooms, stuck between the pages of magazines at a bookstore, placed under windshield wiper blades in parking lots, or scattered strategically across college campuses. Some of these are already formatted and waiting for download, and many more can be created. By adding reference sources and website addresses to these, they can help spread the word. Just a few minutes of our time while shopping or visiting the dentist can help further the reach of our voice.

These are only a few suggestions. With a concerted effort we can identify many more avenues for generating public exposure.

Sally Forth. We have been on the losing end of a battle that many of our brethren are not even aware of for too long. Lest we see ourselves subject to the kinder, gentler machine gun hand that is Swedish feminism, we have no choice but to rally our forces, hone our skills, learn to use the weapons before us, and carry the charge. We can no longer afford to celebrate empty victories while feminism claims the reward. It is our duty to expose the myriad hypocrisies of feminism while challenging them on every hill. The virtues of fact and ethical high ground are on our side. Now is the time to carry those twin virtues to the world.

VAWA re-authorization introduced in senate

Robert O'Hara · 30 November 2011 · Archived copy · Original

[box]

(AVfM News, Washington November 30) Today the re-authorization of the Violence Against Women Act was introduced to the U.S. Senate. This follows an announcement on the Senate floor by Senator Patrick Leahy (D-Vermont), chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, on Monday evening. VAWA has been re-authorized in 2000 and 2005 and the current authorization expired in September. Senator Mike Crapo (R-Idaho), is cosponsoring.

This comes just weeks after an initiative by Leahy to introduce into VAWA a virtual copy and paste job of the "Dear Colleague" letter issued by the Department of Education's Office of Civil Rights in which educational institutions receiving Title IX funding from the federal government were mandated to reduce the standard of evidence in disciplinary actions concerning sexual assault. That language was removed from the draft after an outcry from civil rights organizations as well as legal professionals.

Stop Abusive and Violent Environments, an organization dedicated to reforming domestic violence legislation nationwide, distributed an email today urging people to take this opportunity to call their senators and urge them to support the Partner Violence Reduction Act. SAVE also sent emails to senate staffers urging them to support the PVA as well and also directing them to a special report in which SAVE points out the civil rights violations imposed by VAWA. The SAVE report concludes, "The pervasive constitutional violations that emanate from domestic violence laws are now challenging Americans to dramatically recast our basic conceptions of a civil and just society." The PVA is intended to correct the constitutional violations of VAWA and to acknowledge male victims of domestic violence.

In a press release posted on Leahy's website the senator stated, "The Violence Against Women Act has been successful because it has consistently had strong bipartisan support for nearly two decades. I am honored to work now with Senator Crapo to build on that foundation. I hope that Senators from both parties will join us to quickly pass this critical re-authorization, which will provide safety and security for victims across America."

It is rumored, however, that support for VAWA is no longer ubiquitous and that efforts from SAVE and other organizations have had an effect of causing more stringent scrutiny of domestic violence laws.

Sources:

http://leahy.senate.gov/press/press_releases/release/?id=ede57362-831d-4371-8b94-fb2cb6f35814

http://www.saveservices.org/pvra/overview/

[/box]

Bombing Sweden in three hours

Paul Elam · 1 December 2011 · Archived copy · Original

[box icon="none"]

This is a show reminder that in three hours A Voice for Men Radio will be back on the air after a break in programming.

Tonight, Sweden, yep, the whole country, is on the chopping block. You can join me and cohost John the Other, with Dr. T on the phones for a look at what's wrong with them there meatballs. You will also get a chance to listen to AVfM writer Kyle Lovett, who will be joining us on the show by phone.

For those of you who have been suffering withdrawal symptoms from the shows absence, this will be your need fix and then some. For any of you who have still not heard AVfM Radio, click on the link below, sign in to the chat room, and enjoy the audio version of FTSU.

The call in number is 310-388-9709. Those of you registered with the program can also join us by skype.

The show starts in three hours at 8:00 Central Time, US.

SHOW PAGE

[/box]

Moral panic for fun & profit

Brutal Antipathy · 1 December 2011 · Archived copy · Original

An exercise in evil.

Let's play a game. I want you to imagine for a while that we are a cabal of evil villains that have decided for nefarious purposes to create a state of moral panic. Not that myself or any other ethical person would ever actually put this into practice. We are only going to take a stroll down the road of hypothesis in order to see where it might lead us.

In order to start this journey, let us take a scary word and see what we can do with it. Rape. We all know the definition of rape and what it entails. It is even a familiar word which causes it to lose some of its shock value. As an aside that will only be important down the line, we need to mention that rape is an act found in nature. Many animals rape, and at least one genus of animal, felis, only reproduces through rape. All male cats have a barbed penis, and partially paralyze the female by biting her on the back of her neck while mating. The screams heard coming from a female cat during sex is from pain as evidenced by the fight she puts up in trying to escape. If this is not an act of rape, then no act is.

From the mighty lion to the beautiful Himalayan curled up in your lap, every cat is a product of rape. It can be argued that rape is an evolutionary cheat, a way of reproducing even though an animal might not otherwise be a suitable mate. This is not a defense of rape, but simply an explanation for how it arises and remains in a population of animals. Rape is fairly simple to understand. Yet even with our understanding the very word has a negative effect on our brains.

This is due to what is referred to in psychology as a negativity bias. Basically this means that people will give more attention to a negative event than to a positive one. When considered in terms of survival this makes sense. The adage 'Once bitten, twice shy' remains a cultural phrase in several forms just because it is a useful piece of information to convey. People who have experienced a negative event will require far fewer indicators of danger before they react. This is an evolutionary survival response, where reaction to false danger is more productive than failure to react to actual danger. In other words, our minds and bodies are wired for fight or flight. But how can this come into play if we have not actually suffered the event?

Words have a direct effect on our brains. Language is a part of how we think, and language is conjoined with emotion. As we are wired to respond directly to negative or dangerous situations, our minds prioritize potential dangers and act accordingly. Likewise, when we hear negatively biased words, we begin to react to them negatively, even if it has not happened to us. An example of this would be the word 'murdered.' Not a single one of you reading that word have at this moment been murdered. And yet the negative association triggers minute responses in your body. The word implies threat, even though you are not directly threatened. In this small way the negative association with the word causes a reaction. Still, there is another way that words can work on you as well – emotional contagion.

Emotional contagion seems to be a driving force in mob mentality. It is spread much like a virus throughout concentrations of people. We can convey a lot of information through both physical and verbal cues. When combined with our natural tendency to react to negative events or triggers over positive ones, crowds pick up on negative emotional states or expressions like disgust and fear quickly.

Emotional contagion sounds remarkably similar to Richard Dawkins' meme theory. A meme is an idea or concept that spreads from person to person throughout a population. Also like viruses, memes can mutate as they spread. Fads can be seen as a form of meme, as can slogans, catch phrases, and various other concepts. We may also take advantage of emotional contagion to spread fear. But in order to take the word rape and make it not just cause a vague sense of unease, but a real force of terror, we need to add a few more ingredients to the cocktail.

We can increase the shock value of the word rape by attaching to it another word that in itself is completely innocent. Perhaps a word that in most cases would be seen as positive. How about the word 'culture' for instance? When we think of the word culture, what normally comes to mind, unless you work in a laboratory at least, is the collection of achievements, values, and practices of a civilization. These are wonderful things. We also tend to associate culture with good taste. Culture is a happy word, a word that makes you just a little proud when you think of it.

Ah, but now the word becomes attached to a negative association- rape. "Rape as a culture? How horrific!" one might rightly think. We have just taken a negative word and kicked it up an order of magnitude. Now rape is not something associated with the individual, but with an entire population. A word that would normally function as a positive bump to the mind has been corrupted through association.

[image]

We have done a fairly good job of creating fear so far. We have found a way to take a positive word and attach it to a negative word in order to form a verbal chimera that is considerably more fear inspiring than just the negative word alone. We have also found a method in which to spread this chimera by relying on human's innate tendency to focus on harmful words. Even were we to leave things as this, we would still have managed to generate a degree of fear. But that would be too short of a hike down this road. We can do a lot better than this if we set our minds to it. To this end we will continue to exploit biology.

What we need to do next is create a mythology to support our chimera. We can take mundane interactions and attach them to the mythology. We know that friends and associates have a camaraderie that will make them behave in ways that that most would usually consider unethical when it comes to protecting their own in-group. The people in your in-group or clan are to be protected at the expense of outsiders. Naturally there will always be some in these groups that will set aside their moral convictions in order to fabricate an alibi for a member of their in-group. We have seen this behavior all through history. It is 'us versus them' mentality, and is a natural extension of evolutionary group survival. We can exploit this natural trait and co-opt it into the mythology by claiming it as part of rape culture. "See how those frat boys are all covering for their guy? Rape culture!"

Good, we have a start here, but there is a lot more work that we can do. Today we have a view of what is attractive and healthy that in many ways is identical to that of ancient Greece. We find well toned individuals and those with clear skin to appear more healthy and attractive than we do people with poor complexions and out of shape. Again, a lot of this is evolutionary biology. Bad complexion can be an indication of disease. Poor physical condition means less ability to bring in food. These are traits we are genetically programmed to look for. Advertising takes this into consideration and selects models that fit the current ideal of attractive and selects male and female models based on the public perception of beauty. We will disregard the male models that meet our ideal standard with their sculpted forms and rippled abs, and instead point to the females. "You are making her into a sexual object by displaying her. Rape culture!"

Splendidly done! Let us continue down this path and see where it leads. We can point to prostitution. Prostitution is observed in penguins with the female trading sexual favors for shiny stones. Some species of hummingbird females trade sex for food, as do numerous insects. Even female monkeys will prostitute themselves for food. Prostitution is a matter of supply & demand, just like any other service. The female is exchanging her sexual services for something she desires. It is fairly important that we in the role of evil villains nip this one in the bud, because we are trying to use rape to create fear. If people can just pay for sex there will be less rape. This will not do! Yell it with me now. "You are exploiting that poor woman through your solicitation of prostitution. Rape culture!"

We are well on our way now, but we can't rest yet. In our exploitation of biology, rape of biology if you will, we need to make rape itself even worse. We are very much aware of the fact that rape exists in nature. We can see how it can be used as a reproductive shortcut. We are still civilized, though, and we understand that rape can have a detrimental effect on society. We also possess empathy which helps the majority of the human race cooperate. Naturally, we criminalize rape. Actually we cannot even take credit for that, as our ancestors etched those laws into clay and stone long eons ago in our dim past. Still though, in our role as evil villains, we need to find some way to make rape seem even more horrendous than it already is.

To do this, let's take a look at criminals. Crime happens all the time. We are to a degree desensitized to crime because we understand what criminals are doing and how they think. A burglar robs your house because he wants what is in the house and is more concerned with his satisfaction than he is in your security and peace of mind. He will steal your car for the same reason and with the same lack of remorse. In the same manner, the rapist rapes because he or she wants sex. There is nothing surprising about it. There are no political motives. The tiger is not raping because he wants to repress the tigress or because he wants to stifle her political ideology. He is raping because he desires to have sex.

[image]The college student that first asks a girl on a date then tries to sway her with sweet talk and pleasant verbal coercion while touching and fondling until rejected and only then resorts to more coercive tactics is not repressing the girl out of hatred or a desire to control her. He is behaving that way because he wants sex. But let us not forget that we are playing the role of villains, so we need to twist this around. We will do this by taking the natural crime out of rape and claim it is an act of control, not sex. This technique works marvelously, as now when anyone points out the obvious fact that rape is rooted in our biology we can scream "You are a rape apologist. Rape culture!"

This is turning out incredibly well for a hypothetical exercise. Next we need to take these tools of evil and begin to apply them. We will need to dig up some statistics first. We will scour various sources for rape figures. When those figures do not add up to enough to convince people, we twist them around, we add different figures together to reach higher numbers. Heck, we are villains, if the figures don't say what we want them to, we can just make up figures on the spot! This will work, and I will explain why.

We are going to present these figures along with our newly created mythology to congressmen and lawmakers. We are going to petition these same people demanding laws be created to protect us from our construction. We are going to sweetly approach police chiefs and sheriffs and offer to educate their forces free of charge. We will prey on their natural empathy as well as using negative bias & emotional contagion to our advantage. These are horrible things we are telling them. Their first reaction is going to be shock, then horror and outrage. They are going to want to know what they can do to protect their loved ones from this. They are putty in our hands.

College deans will be almost as easy to convince. This is an emotional appeal, granted one that is only backed with shoddy and false information, but their moral character will be seduced by way of negative bias just as the lawmakers were. We will even create a college rape myth while on campus to better stir the coals of fear.

We keep up the pressure until we get a single law passed in favor of our villainous construction, then point to that law as proof that we are on the right track. Domino effect as more and more people fall victim to this evil scheme. Newspapers pick it up, as does television and radio. We throw the words 'Rape culture' like rice at a wedding. The meme spreads, panic ensues. Women everywhere are gripped in a viral moral panic. "What do we do?" they ask "Rape is everywhere around us!"

The women begin to take precautions. These are sensible precautions like everyone takes in order to prevent crime. Common sense precautions like removing the keys from their ignition and locking the car doors in order to help prevent their cars from being stolen. We will tolerate none of that! "Why should we have to change the way we act?" becomes our meme. "Teach the bad rapists to stop raping! Rape culture!" is a perfect way to keep the rapes happening.

Of course if you report to the police that your car was stolen and during the course of the investigation he learns that you left the keys in the ignition while you ran into the store, the officer is going to tell you that you had it coming. But as we the hypothetical evil villains have convinced both the officer and the hapless citizen that rape is not like other crimes, he will not even think of taking the woman's dress, behavior, or location into consideration.

This is exactly what we the villains want, because if fewer rapes happen we are tasked with creating more false statistics. Besides, the real thing is much better for business because then we can exploit the poor rape victim by parading her case around with an air of triumph. Now they will really start to believe the meme of rape culture. And with that belief comes the full blown moral panic that we were looking for.

We have managed to transform an already nasty word into one of terror. We have relied on our own biological nature to make the most of this generated fear. We have rigged the deck to increase rapes by taking more prostitutes out of the picture while convincing women that it is not their duty to take reasonable precautions to protect themselves from rape.

We have even neglected to mention to them that most rapes are perpetrated by close associates, not strangers, making them even more susceptible to being raped. We have capitalized on human nature to spread our fictional creation and have seen how it balloons. Now all that is left is to use the power of fear to being strategically maneuvering the government in whatever direction our criminal minds wish.

Were we actually evil villains, there could be few quicker routes to seizing power than this without resorting to a bloody coup. From the fear and turmoil we could build upon this framework, using it is a springboard for other related fear mongering. We would have our feet in the door and could drop more false statistics on the table to back anything else we desired to push. Using fear to control the masses, and shame and oppressive laws to silence the lone voices of dissent we could swing laws and milk state & federal funds into any schemes we felt like controlling. Humans are childishly easy to manipulate once you begin to turn their own biology and psychology against them.

Now this was only a hypothetical exercise. I am confident that none of us are so vile, so evil, so monstrous as to actually put something like this into motion. No, it would take someone far less ethical that we good fellows to ruthlessly pull the emotional strings of entire nations for fun, profit, or other selfish reasons.

References:

http://related.springerprotocols.com/lp/de-gruyter/negativity-bias-in-language-a-cognitive-affective-model-of-emotive-w0L20WmKHE

http://cfpm.org/jom-emit/1998/vol2/marsden_p.html#HEADING http://www.uoguelph.ca/~rfoster/repropath/surgicalpath/male/cat/normal_tomcat.htm

http://www.nwf.org/News-and-Magazines/National-Wildlife/Birds/Archives/2005/Mating-in-a-Material.aspx

http://www.time.com/time/health/article/0,8599,1700821,00.html

http://www.city-journal.org/2008/18_1_campus_rape.html

BPD: Sick, or just crazy asshole?

Paul Elam · 2 December 2011 · Archived copy · Original

I have been a longtime admirer of the scant handful of mental health professionals that have chosen to deal in the truth, rather than just peddle whatever is sellable to women in the misandric zeitgeist.

Staying on an honest road is tough in any arena. In the feminist dominated realm of mental "health," it is brutal. I know, I lived that life for a couple of decades. I can tell you from personal experience that the greatest amount of flak I got from other professionals was for failing to follow the party line on any given matter.

My first serious conflict was over alcoholism, which I was supposed to view as a disease. That complicated things for me, mainly because alcoholism is not a disease. I don't speculate on that, or assert it as my "perspective." I claim it as the irrefutable truth. There is no evidence at all, none, that alcoholism is a disease, except that it was recognized as one in the year of my birth, 1957, by the AMA, with absolutely no scientific evidence to back it up.

It was purely a political and financial decision that enabled doctors to start charging alcoholics to "treat" them, and allowed active, drinking alcoholics to do what they do best…point at something other them themselves as the culprit in their lives. It was a win-win, kind of.

Another significant area of conflict I experienced in the mental health field was in respect to the Borderline Personality Disorder (BPD), or, the more accurately labeled, "dangerous asshole that should be avoided like the plague."

Please bear with me while I cover some basics here. In dealing with mental health issues, we are dealing with a spectacularly wide and diverse array of problems and their causes. There are disorders that a purely physiological in origin, like Organic Brain Syndrome (OBS) where medical disease (or injury) results in impaired mental functioning. OBS is a somewhat antiquated term, and has been removed from classification from the Diagnostic and Statistical Manual of Mental Disorders (DSM) because of a growing number of discoveries that point to organic (physiological) causes for many psychiatric disorders.

But of importance here is that what we find with many victims of brain injury or disease is that they have severely diminished control over their thoughts, and often their actions. That capability has been taken from them due to the effects of brain trauma or disease.

Schizophrenia, a devastating condition which causes all manner of neurocognitive impairment, is also thought to be at least partially physiological in nature. As with other organic brain problems, the victim is completely powerless over their symptoms and sometimes their behavior. It is a crushing disease that literally terrorizes its victims. Imagine actually seeing demons come out of the wall to tear you to pieces, or your mind telling you that God is speaking through your dog, telling you to kill someone.

Schizophrenics do not choose these hallucinations and bizarre thoughts and without medical or even legal intervention, they sometimes have little to no control over how they respond to them. Similarly, bi-polar disorder can result in acute psychosis rendering an individuals ability to control their actions questionable at best.

There are other examples of when physiological causes are at the root of severe psychological and behavioral problems. Depression is a good example. It can be traced to a myriad of physical causes and result in some very dangerous physical symptoms, including alcoholism, drug abuse, violence and suicide.

But depression is a disorder, despite having some possible physical causes, that demands to be differentiated in approach from diseases like schizophrenia.

An individual, no matter how depressed, is capable of making an informed, rational choice about their actions.

In that light, they are fully responsible for whether or not they drink alcohol, take recreational drugs, become violent or even kill themselves. We can give them medication and psychotherapy, as well as provide other support services, but in the end they are fully and completely responsible for every choice they make in their lives. While their thinking can be clouded by their problem, they are fully capable of determining the difference between right and wrong as well as understanding the consequences of their actions.

That brings us to the BPD. This individual, typically a female (yes, that is documented) is one whose mental state renders her a significant emotional, psychological and often physical danger to anyone in her life, and in particular men with whom she becomes involved romantically.

BPD is the indicated diagnosis when some or all of the following are present:

[unordered_list style="green-dot"]

- A long-term pattern of unstable or turbulent emotions, including frequent displays of inappropriate anger.
- A pattern of impulsive actions and chaotic relationships, including, but not limited to impulsiveness with money, substance abuse, sexual relationships, binge eating, and shoplifting.
- Intolerant, often hostile reaction to being alone.
- Repeated crises and acts of self-injury, such as wrist cutting or overdosing.

[/unordered_list]

There is a more thorough examination of behaviors common to BPD, but you won't likely find them detailed in diagnostic literature. The following are traits I have drawn from personal experience observing borderline women in clinical and real life settings.

[unordered_list style="bullet"]

- A remarkable facility for lying and manipulation, particularly for sympathy and adulation, but also to enlist action from others that will further their personal objectives for revenge or retaliation.
- A propensity to make false allegations of rape, sexual abuse and domestic violence.
- A near bottomless capacity for vengeance over the least, or even imagined, slights.
- A sadistic pleasure in causing unwarranted harm to others who are perceived to be enemies, or even those determined to not love them "enough."
- The capacity to justify and rationalize any abusive behavior, no matter how extreme or how innocent the victim. No moral compass.
- The repetitive demand that others sympathize with them, even as they cause destruction in the lives of innocents.
- The distorted mindset that the abuse they inflict is not abuse, but that objecting to it or fighting back is abusive to them.

[/unordered_list]

And one other thing must be incorporated into your understanding of the BPD. They are in total control of what they are doing. There is no organic factor or deficit in self control that causes what they do. Their acts are willful and premeditated. They comprehend the difference between right and wrong, appropriate and inappropriate, truth and lies, reality and fantasy.

They frequently hold jobs and involve themselves in social situations where their destructive behaviors would quickly work against them. They often perform admirably and demonstrate a respectable capacity for self control and appropriate behavior. Any notion that they cannot help their actions, which you will most frequently hear from BPD's or the unscrupulous clinicians who profit from their condition by helping them rationalize their behavior, is completely fraudulent.

They know what they are doing and often enjoy it.

Do they suffer tremendously from internal chaos and unstable emotions? Certainly. So do the depressed, and alcoholics and those with anxiety disorders and other maladies. We just don't offer any of them as pass on hurting themselves and others. Nor should we.

Given the absolute potential for devastation that the BPD brings into the lives of anyone unfortunate enough to be in their path, it is pretty important to understand the prognosis for their condition.

There is no psychotropic medication that treats BPD and there is no known cognitive therapy that works with them. In short, they have an intractable condition that is impervious to treatment of any kind. They cannot be helped near as much as they can be avoided for the sake of helping others.

There is a running joke among psychiatric professionals about BPD's. And yes, we told jokes about serious problems. It is one of the ways clinicians deal with the stress of working with them. Anyway, it's a simple one-liner.

You don't treat borderlines, you ignore them.

And that, in the broader sense, is also indirect professional advice when it comes to anyone with the misfortune to find themselves locked in the sights of a BPD.

Get away from them.

Go directly in the other direction. Do not pass GO. Do not collect $200.00. Just get thee…away; chalk whatever losses you suffer up to experience and be grateful about what you could have lost.

Families of alcoholics are told to cut them off (and the enabling) as long as they are drinking. It is good advice that helps the alcoholic face their problem and often saves the family a lot of misery. But dealing with a borderline is not near as simple or easy as going to an Alanon meeting and learning better boundaries. Their pathology is far too serious and dangerous for that.

Hear this, and hear it clearly. They are not going to get better. Ever. There is nothing you can do, no kindness you can extend, no sympathy you can embrace, no psychological slight-of-hand, nor the culmination of wisdom from your entire life's experience that you can bring to bear to make a BPD anything other than a major, life draining pain in the ass and a potential nightmare waiting to destroy everything you have, inside and out.

In fact, should you find yourself engaging in endless internal debate about whether you should stay or leave a relationship with a BPD, I suggest you get help for yourself. Unlike them, there may be a chance to reach you and help you identify what causes you to stay attached to a lifestyle of abuse, chaos and danger.

Then again, there is always the red pill.

The ontology of female supremacism

Luigi Logan (aka Fidelbogen) · 2 December 2011 · Archived copy · Original

I have concluded elsewhere that men as a group owe no special collective favor to women as a group, any more than Democrats as a group would owe any special collective favor to Republicans as a group. In view of the objective political situation of men in Western civilization, such is the only conclusion to which moral consistency would lend itself.

However, I know that plenty of feminists would take issue upon this point. And being feminists, they can do no less. If they agreed with this way of thinking, they would no longer be feminists. And why? Because the entire feminist enterprise is constructed around the overarching and atmospherically all-pervading premise that men are the problem. This is so because feminism is a hate-fueled, anti-male, female-supremacist movement, and such a movement couldn't possibly embrace the view that men and women are BOTH the problem. No, that wouldn't work – it would bust their gearbox all to hell!

[quote style="boxed" float="right"]The fruits of feminism bespeak an enterprise embued with the spirit of moral rapacity…[/quote] If in fact men are the problem as feminism supposes, and consequently that women are not, then it would follow that men specifically are under some form of obligation which would translate as a debt owed to women. And such indeed summarizes the general wind that has wafted from the direction of feminism and spread widely into other quarters. That is why I say that the feminists would take issue with the idea that male and female are political parties: because it implies that men and women are equal cutthroat gangs competing equally to cut each other's throats. The feminists would favor a scenario in which one of those gangs (men) would bare its collective throat voluntarily to the gang wielding the knife.

But what does it mean to say that "men are the problem"? What is this statement really driving at? Which "problem" does it refer to, exactly? I have implied that this idea lies at the root of a world-view. A paradigm. But how can we spot it in action? What signs or tracks does it leave?

Here is what to look for: any time a woman does something notably blameworthy, or any time something goes awry between a man and a woman, a feminist will nearly always search for a way to either get the woman off the hook, or reduce her share of blame to a barebones minimum. Female wrongdoing will always be extenuated in whatever way possible, if not denied altogether.

The bias is persistently male-negative. It is evasionary of any realization, or any frank admission, that women in the depth of their nature are just as rotten as men. You can almost hear the female-justification hamster spinning its little wheel into overdrive in the backs of feminist heads, any time the least shadow of womanly or girlish malfeasance confronts them. They are not a bit concerned to know what actually IS; rather, they fervently wish to know what, according to their template, must be. It is a deeply rooted emotional reflex which transfixes the core of their world like a pivot or an axle or a black-hole singularity.

In fact, let's give it a name.

Let's call it the "must-be" maneuver. Yes! This little trick is the alpha and omega, the sum and substance, the necessary precondition for everything that feminism seeks to put about in the world. It must be that a man is to blame in every argument, it must be that he doesn't listen, it must be that he is insensitive to her needs, it must be that he is using male privilege, it must be that he has control issues, it must be that he has anger management issues, it must be that he is "condescending" her, it must be that he feels threatened by intelligent women, it must be that she was violent in self-defense or if not, it must be that she attacked him pre-emptively. On it goes.

And should it prove impractical to pin the blame on a particular man, it is always possible to fall back upon men or maleness in the abstract: it must be the patriarchy which oppressed her into lying, killing, cheating, stealing or stumbling! It must be male-dominated power structures which drove her to anorexia or smashed her head against a glass ceiling!

Inherent to the must-be maneuver is the exclusion of examination. A commonsense, rough-and-ready calculus might suggest to the layman that male input is to blame in at most half of the suggested cases, and that prior to concluding what must be, we should interrogate the full range of what might be. However, such a proposal is anathema to the feminist paradigm, and if you presume to make it, it must be that something is amiss in your character, your education, or your political leanings.

I cannot overemphasize the formative foundational character of the must-be maneuver. I could even call it theological or cosmological: "In the beginning, Goddess created man and woman. And Goddess said, 'Let man be the problem – for verily it must be so.' And behold, it must be so."

[box type="alert" icon="none"]In a compressed way, the must-be maneuever fits the model of Kant's hypothetical imperative: "If you wish feminism to be viable, then the principle that men are always at fault must be reiterated at every possible opportunity."[/box]

This idea that "men are the problem" is an eternal unsupported premise, and like the god of the infinite regress, prior to everything in every way. It is never a point of arrival but always a point of departure. Feminism did not give birth to this idea – the idea gave birth to feminism! Feminism grew from the idea and not the reverse. At no point did feminism ever not contain this idea, and at no point was feminism not contained by this idea. At no time did feminism ever go in quest of the idea and finally get to it by any chain of reasoning – the idea was always present at the outset! And had it not been present at the outset, feminism would never have set out.

Feminism never studied the world in order to formulate the idea, but rather studied the idea in order to formulate the world, for it is by light of the idea itself that feminism seeks to know what the world "must be." Yes, men are the problem – and come hell or high water, the world according to feminism must be shown to reflect this!

Such is the platform on which feminist ideology asserts its political claim against men on behalf of women: that men, being the collective source of a unique and historically-rooted trespass against women, are under a collective moral obligation to make good.

When we scalp the duff down to the bedrock we uncover, in the end, manichean dualism – a cosmology in which good and evil (or light and dark) are separate cosmic principles eternally at war with one another. Further, the principles are said to be perennial and uncreated: they did not come about due to interactions in the ecology of occurrence, but were present from the very foundation of the world. They are not different branches on the same tree, but different trees altogether- and they grow from different roots. As such, they can never coherently exist side by side because they share no genetic mutuality – they will forever bear the stamp of their separate beginnings, and they will harbor mutually irreconcilable systems of logic. Accordingly, their relationship is and must forever remain paradoxical and fraught with tension.

In the manichean cosmology of feminism, male equals darkness or evil, and female equals goodness or light. There are NO zones of gray. There is no spectrum. There is no continuum. For feminism, man equals bad and woman equals good, and if at times woman appears to equal bad then it must be that appearance is not reality in that particular case, and so a contorted explanation must ride to the rescue and set things straight!

In feminism's paradigm, man equals bad and woman equals good. And in the feminist mind, this correlation can no more be established by any chain of demonstration than the dualism itself can be said to have evolved historically. For just as the manichean duality was prior to all things in the order of creation, so likewise it must be prior to all things in the order of feminist logic. To demand that the truth of it be proven, would decentralize and desacralize it. This in turn would radically deconstruct the entire feminist enterprise.

This has consequences for the two-party model of gender politics. The feminists want to place women on a footing of moral superiority to men, which in turn implies deferentiality or servility by men. Men, being one with the principle of darkness, must in theory be taught to respect their betters – who are one with the principle of light!

This indeed postulates a kind of political struggle if you want to call it that, but it is a one-sided struggle: men must be forced to “surrender”.

Stated in such terms, the “political struggle” sounds more like plain and simple warfare.

But in fact political struggle is not quite the same as warfare. Although it is true that political parties are not deferential or servile toward each other, the situation differs from war in that the parties understand they are governed by rules of play which in theory do not include ultimate subjugation of one side by the other. That is to say, the Republicans at least in theory do not have as a goal making the Democrats grovel, or vice-versa.

(Von Clausewitz famously called war “an extension of politics by other means”, and I will leave it to the reader to reflect upon this privately, since it would make too much of a tangent to the present discussion.)

Thus, no feminist who is truly a feminist could accept the two-party model of man-woman relations as a set way of life, for that would imply that good and evil are somehow not subject to a moral comparison – which in turn defeats the purpose of the manichean paradigm as an occult motor of the feminist project. And why? Because if good is not “better” than evil, if light is not “better” than darkness, then there remains no validating metaphysic for female supremacism and man-hating as a whole. And I can assure you that feminism bereft of those things would be like unto a banana which is all peel!

Thus, it is essential to the collective purpose of the women’s movement that the movement be engaged in a manichean struggle with an eternally culpable foe who must be vanquished.

Granted, if you put the question point-blank, most feminists would disavow the manichean paradigm as I have described it. But this is less of a contradiction when you realize that stated individual beliefs and unstated collective intentions can easily go their separate ways. Therefore, as a famous philosopher once put it: “By their fruits ye shall know them.” And the fruits of feminism bespeak an enterprise embued with the spirit of moral rapacity and undertaken with a view toward conquest. Any feminist who tries to talk you out of this critical insight is playing the game of cognitive fragmentation.

Pavement wars

Merlin · 3 December 2011 · Archived copy · Original

What I'm seeing on the pavements of our towns and cities is disturbing and cannot be ignored anymore. I am speaking of belligerent foot traffic on our pavements.

This phenomenon is somewhat concerning in its nature because it tells me, it tells us all, that basic manners and courtesy are being eroded and replaced with a total disregard for anyone else. This disregard is quite unsettling if it's to be considered a glimpse of what we are to look forwards to in the future.

This article will be looking at this phenomenon and is divided into sections for closer analysis. It reflects what I and others have experienced firsthand on our pavements.

The Shield Wall:

Identified by:

A group of women or girls occupying the full width of the pavement striding towards you.

Analysis:

The Shield Wall's occupants tend to be sublimated to the lowest animalistic denominator of a small crowd. More times than not the average blood alcohol reading of its occupants is inversely proportionate to their manners and good temper.

Rules of engagement:

Negotiating this one can be a tricky affair and mental alertness is of benefit. The primary option is to assess the pathway on the opposite side of the road and if clear one is to cross to that side for ease of passage.

If this is not possible, then the secondary option is to be employed; the formation of ramming stance and then employment of ramming speed centered at the weakest link of The Shield Wall. This maneuver is known as 'The Pavement Spear' or TPS."

A personal testament:

Brendon of London says, "I find the Shield Wall move to be particularly lacking in any thought or appreciation for other peoples movement and personal space. On one occasion as I walked along the pavement I could see a group of rowdy, semi drunken women out on the town. I could see the potential of this situation getting ugly so I chose to cross the road for clear advancement. Well…you would not believe what happened next as I couldn't believe it myself."

"Two from the group of women despite their drunken state noticed my avoidance tactics and breaking from their group deliberately crossed the road blocking my path once again. Walking arm in arm they headed straight for me. They proceeded to stay on course knowing full well that their chosen formation of "The Shield Wall" gave me very little room at all to avoid colliding with them."

"This belligerence fuelled my decision to adopt "The Pavement Spear". As I closed in on the women at ramming speed they continued indecently giving me no room to pass. Consequently, TPS was duly executed breaking their linked arms. This was met with much muttering followed by drunken cackles. Incredibly, I'd gone out of my way in the first place to avoid such an altercation?"

Brendon went on to say, "If it wasn't for TPS I'd be done like a nuked dinner. I definitely recommend it's usage where required."

The Chariot Formation:

Identified by:

Two or three women with baby strollers walking side by side occupying the full width of the pavement striding towards you.

Analysis:

"The Chariot Formation" is the most disregarding and aggressive formation pitted against the unwitting pedestrian. The women indulging in The Chariot Formation are oblivious to anyone's need for passing space. These creatures are to be seen on our streets more and more, and The Chariot Formation is particularly despicable because it shows absolutely no thought for anyone else other than for those within its formation.

Rules of engagement:

There is but one option when encountering The Chariot Formation and that is to employ "The Castle Wall." TCW is a primarily defensive posture whereby the opponent is to hold tightly with muscular rigidity in order to mitigate against oncoming vehicular collision, i.e. The possibility of chariot burns on the ankles.

A personal testament:

Adrian of Manchester says, "The drivers of The Chariot Formation show no common sense or decency in any of the situations I've personally witnessed or been involved with. This one is tricky to negotiate without confrontation. Bearing in mind the majority of cases I've been involved in usually end up as an exchange of expletives because I haven't been prepared to walk into the road for their royal convenience. TCW has saved me on more occasions I can recall."

He went on to say "On one occasion I was returning home on foot when I noticed two women in the distance grouped in the Chariot Formation. The pavement was particularly narrow so I decided to make my position known early on by walking close to the wall. I'm done with the chivalrous road side.

He continued, "[a]s I approached the women I observed they had noticed me but they carried on relentlessly. It was obvious that they had no intention of making space, and this was when I decided to employ the stance of TCW with my coming to a complete halt – standing my ground. I had no intention of swerving onto the road for anyone and quite frankly, leaving a little passing room is just basic manners. Well, seeing that I wasn't going anywhere soon they just stopped right in front of me, didn't they?"

"There we were, the three of us standing eye to eye upon which I simply asked them, "Where would you like me to go…would you like me to levitate perhaps?"

Remarkably, she was quite embarrassed by my question and proceeded to flush a delicate shade of ruby and made a vague apology. This was a rare occasion because most of the time I have been met by very hostile language and total a disregard for anyone else other than themselves.

The Flank Attack:

Identified by:

When a woman either pushing a chariot or simply walking alone, crosses to your side of the street when her side is perfectly clear.

Analysis:

The Flank Attack is not as common as the Chariot Formation, but is by its sheer bad manners one for which to always be vigilantly scoured. Wearing an iPod or other device that impairs the detection of scuffling feet to the side is to be avoided at all costs, and angular adjusted mirrors affixed to tailored eye-wear should be considered for the auditory challenged.

Rules of engagement:

When faced with the Flank Attack there is but one card to play. Assuming collision is imminent, no adjusted posture will mitigate against impending damage and the “Tarmac Turbo” is to be employed. The T.T. is best administered after ingestion of caffeine for the necessitation of the innocent party to speed up immensely in a short burst to avoid collision.

A personal testament:

Nathan, from Land’s End, Cornwall says, ”The flank attack really pisses me off in a big way. I have trouble comprehending what’s going through their minds with this one. There I am minding my own business and enjoying the crisp autumn air and relishing the fact that I don’t have to do a slalom course on an empty pavement in front of me, when all of a sudden out of nowhere someone is heading straight for the space directly in front of me. If I don’t check my walking pace there’s going to be a collision of some sort.

Nathan went on to say, “What is it with these women or girls that do this? It has me lost for words every time. I’ve looked across at the other side of the street to see them on the pavement with nobody in their path, yet they decide to cross the road in order to “head me off at the pass,” you might say.

I nearly lose it when I’m minding my own business and some brainless halfwit makes a grab at the space right in front of me nearly knocking me over. The space behind me isn’t good enough for her, oh no, she has to be the leader as such.

He concluded, “I’ve actually experienced a woman with her chariot administer the T.T. maneuver against me in order to secure the spot directly ahead of me. What’s with this bullshit? I’m starting to think that modern women and girls aren’t the shy, retiring and delicate wall flowers the media and legislators would have us believe.”

One On One combat:

Identified by:

An oncoming party directly in front of you adjusts their course of perambulation with the sole intention of inducing a collision or eventful encounter. Changing your intended course to avoid an impending collision elicits an immediate response of the oncoming party whereby their line of travel is aligned once again with yours.

Analysis:

Stepping onto the road, levitating, or ducking into an alley or open doorway of a shop is not to be considered as this will deliver a message of accommodation to the belligerent party. Accommodation of this order will foster future encounters of a similar nature with the belligerent party and their associates.

Rules of engagement:

The “Pedestrian Ruse Of Distraction,” or PROD, is best administered. The PROD is best described as the innocent party feigning interest in something to one side whilst maintaining current momentum and direction of travel. This has a two pronged effect. Primarily it delivers the message that the innocent party has missed the cue to step aside and secondly that the innocent party does not give a rat’s crap if a collision does indeed occur. When The PROD is delivered the belligerent party will immediately self-instigate a behavior change by correcting their course in order to produce an uneventful encounter.

A personal testament:

Hamish from Fife in Scotland says, “Now this one is frustrating and amusing at the same time. When I notice a woman in the distance heading towards me I chose a position on the pavement so as to avoid collision. She forces me to dance the ‘pavement tango’ with her.”

He went on to explain, “The oncoming woman adjusts her course for a collision with me no matter what I do. I go one way and like a reflection in a mirror she does the same. It’s a mystery why this happens, and it begs the question: What’s going through her grey cells at that moment?” It almost seems that the simple law of physics doesn't register with her and this bizarre perambulating tango must ensue."

"To this end", Hamish continued, "I always use the PROD method. It works every time and I make damned sure I feign interest in something on the other side of the street leaving Tango Woman with the job of ensuring a collision is avoided. Sometimes it's been a last second swerve on her behalf, but they always get the message that you're not compromising your position on the pavement. I use the PROD to let them know that they have to watch where the fuck they are going and like all of us is better to stick to a path that doesn't involve a head-on.

So what are we to make of this, and what does it mean for the rest of us? Well I can't say for sure, but I'll bet you our parents saw only some of this and their parents none at all. Younger generations have seen a decline in "Time Served" traditional values, replaced with unorthodox practices that are used to reprogram the very foundation on which we once existed in harmony without corruptive government intervention.

Like a gathering cloud of Affinitas Toxicus that's arrived in on a quiet breeze, I'm putting to you that feminism along with all its calculated hoopla and it's aerobics has our once lovely women adulated and preened as princesses on a socially manufactured pedestal, a pedestal that's long overdue for demolition.

Projection and violence by proxy

John Hembling (JtO) · 4 December 2011 · Archived copy · Original

As most readers know, advocacy of human rights for men creates a climate of continuous accusation. This demands rhetorical discipline in activists, now accustomed to exploitation by bad actors who deliberately twist their statements out of original context.

As targets of this persistent and often absurd torrent of accusation, and realizing the falsehood of the narrative, the ongoing imputation of malice begs explanation.

A recent HuffPo article by Eve Ensler suggests a possible explanation for innate male predatism. The Vagina Monologues author, in her rush to declare how over she was of her rape-culture fantasy, dropped the hint that she spent every day since the age of five obsessing on the topic.

> I am over years and years of being over rape. And thinking about rape every day of my life since I was 5-years-old. [1]

When this is considered against Ensler's play, in which a 13 year old character declares her own rape "good," it becomes clear that the author's concluding statement in her HuffPo piece reflects something other than the desired end to sexual violence.

> The time is now. Prepare for the escalation.

Ensler appears earnest, but her rhetoric suggests a desire to indulge in large scale sexual victimization of the demographic she devotes so much time to heaping with accusation. In fact, Ensler and other advocates of her persistent-victim identification use the maintained narrative to enact violence by proxy against the sexual demographic supposedly responsible for all human harm.

Although the FBI recently redefined the legal definition of rape, criminal victimization statistics have consistently demonstrated that rape is the lowest-incidenced category of violent crime tracked by law enforcement. Thus the claim of "rape culture" decried by so many prominent feminists is not based is on real world data. Rather, it a projection of desire. Indeed, the feminist approved view, now normalized – that all harmful behavior is masculine – is also projection.

Further illustration is provided by the ongoing emergence of female supremacist online organizations cheerfully advocating systematic male-targeting infanticide and male-targeting eugenics. Pam O'Shaughnessy, the Simon and Schuster published author, advocates male targeting eugenics.[2] She is only one example of many.

While academically obvious – mainstream recognition of women's capability for malevolence is obscured by the recitation of cultural myth. Specifically, the childish fantasy that women are uniquely good, nurturing or innately innocent. That this fantasy fails on cursory examination does not diminish the idea's persistence.

Main stream media continues to promote and re-enforce the fantasy of male equivalence with evil using the sloppiest and most obtuse argument.

If women ran the world, there would be no war.

Even aside famously hawkish or corrupt politicians like Margaret Thatcher, Hillary Clinton, Condi Rice, Indira Ghandi, Imelda Macos, Winnie Mandela, this statement is complete nonsense. It is not merely false, it is one of the most hateful statements in continued use.

This idea trades on a wilful avoidance of the fact that now and throughout history, men's and women's motivations and means of acting in the world are different. The simplistic claim that most criminal offenders are male deliberately ignores this, and ignores how much male behavior is on behalf of, or manipulated by, women. This is not an attempt to re-attribute all male misbehaviour to women, but to point out the widely ignored but obvious fact that women's misbehavior and violence is largely indirect, pursued through others.

Within domestic disputes, women's use of chivalry-practicing men, as well as the use of state-funded enforcers, is not a secret. Setting aside the ethics of false claims of abuse or simply of fear, courts and police provide a mechanism of violence by proxy for women.

Outside of legal consideration, violence on behalf of women (or children) is the basis for the cultural construct of heroism. Within MRM writing, unaware men willing to absorb or provide violence based on chivalry are called white knights, and this term is not a compliment. These are men who have failed to recognize their own value as humans, but cling to the externally sourced valuation of themselves as "good men." The literal translation of which is "disposable human."

On a larger scale, western societies apply violence almost exclusively through the use of males, and on the behalf of females. This is demonstrated in the United States in the continued tradition of male-only requirement to registrater for military service. It's also demonstrated by the practice of deploying female military personnel into low risk assignments.

Simple minded denouncers of masculine violence point to our culture's choice in expending young men's lives, while protecting women's – and claim that soldiers using deadly force reflect those individual's choices rather than their utilization by our culture's collective will. So,the hateful, false claim of "If women ran the world there would be no war" is not only a direct lie, it also contains a number of other false assumptions.

[box type="alert" icon="none"]Judged by the measure of electoral power, women do run the world. "Women comprise more than half of the U.S. electorate and have influenced electoral outcomes for more than 40 years." [3][/box]

[box type="download" icon="none"]Women also control the world when that control is measured in money. According to a number of sources, women control up to 65% of spending world wide, and 80% of spending in the united states[4][5][6][/box]

Some ideological bigots skilled in the art of public relations are lionized for celebrating this increasingly obvious fact. Rather than seeking equality of rights and opportunity – such individuals approach masculine apartheid with triumphalism.[7]

But what about war? If the human beings who have to die on foreign battle-fields controlled the world, then, maybe there would be some substantial reduction of war. Likely substantially less war which serves no purpose but to secure the profits of corporations.

Pauline Nyiramasuhuko was the first woman convicted of genocide for her Role in the Rwandan Genocide. Although she was a high-level organizer as well as direct participant in the mass-murder and rape of over 800,000 people within 100 days, the international press focused on her appearance – that of "school teacher" or someone's "dear great aunt."

Underneath these remarks was an assumption that women are purer, weaker, more subservient than men and therefore less capable of committing the kind of atrocities for which she stands accused.

Those who view Nyiramasuhuko's actions during the genocide as somehow inexplicable because of her gender ignore history and engage in the stereotypical thinking that perpetuates the special victimization of women.[8] "The case [is] that women's innate peacefulness is as mythical as men's violence"[9]

The traditional view of women in conflict has always been as passive victims. This myth trades on a conception of feminine identity as lacking volition or agency. As if to be a woman is to be a child. It is an item of cultural mythology routinely exploited by ideologues and other bad actors, and it's persistence prevents rational approaches to ameliorate violence both at a personal level in civil societies as well as large scale violence within the frameworks of warfare.

Pauline Nyiramasuhuko's role as a planner and and driver in the Rwandan genocide is often incorrectly characterized as an item adherent outlying data, at odds with normal feminine behavior, but this is rationalization, attempting to conform to the mythology of women's innate benevolence.

Nicole Hogg, a former legal adviser for the International Committee of the Red Cross wrote in March 2010 :

"Many 'ordinary' women were involved in the genocide but, overall, committed significantly fewer acts of overt violence than men. Owing to the indirect nature of women's crimes, combined with male 'chivalry', women may be under-represented among those pursued for genocide-related crimes, despite the broad conception of complicity…"[10]

The American historian Wendy Lower drew international attention by documenting how large numbers of ordinary German women willingly went out to the Nazi-occupied eastern territories as part of the war effort, participating in support of genocide.

"Thousands would be a conservative estimate," Lower said, in an interview in Jerusalem in July of 2010 . While most did not bloody their own hands, the acts of those who did seemed all the more perverse because they operated outside the concentration camp system, on their own initiative."[11]

The common understanding of violence is that which is direct, but this a simplistic conception of it, ignoring the indirect use of violence and force. This is not limited to flashy and spectacular evil such as organizing of mass-murder or genocide in the context of warfare.

While it may be true that women are not as direct in their use of violence as men, a number of social customs provide mechanism for indirect use of violence by women. The accepted outsourcing of violence through chivalric men is not only common, it's also formalized in the use of state-funded enforcers by women. A persistent ideology of violence and aggression as uniquely masculine qualities helps obscure this. In situations of domestic violence – a phenomenon known by researchers in this field to be reciprocal, and not sexually specific – almost all public messaging portrays a false, sexually directional picture. This is the persistent myth of evil men, abusing innocent women.

In fact, women enjoy the ability to instigate violence on their behalf by using conformist men who buy into the idea of their own human worth as a product of their utility in dispensing and absorbing violence on women's behalf. Using the police as muscle, making false claims of abuse, or merely claiming to be "afraid" are mechanisms available to women for indirectly instigating violence against men. As many as 75% of protective orders against males are obtained without justification. [12] This is a court-enforced mechanism for women's indirect use of violence in the form of court officers or police.

That a uniformed man enacts this on behalf of an initiator of violence by proxy does nothing to change the fact that although outsourced and indirect, this is still violence.

The reality of the use of false accusations of rape, sexual assault, or violent assault are point of contention among ideologues whose attachment to the mythology of innate feminine innocence disrupts useful address of this issue. Despite a climate of denial, law enforcement professionals report that false accusations comprise as much as 50% of such allegations.[13][14].

False claims of victimhood are also an effective mechanism for directing violence by the proxy of police and court officers against individuals without direct participation by an instigator.

The examination of differing models for enactment of violence, comparing the direct and the enactment of violence by proxy illustrates two points. One being a disposal of the myth of feminine nature as uniquely peaceful. The converse case, that women are innately violent is not implied here, rather – that human beings, without respect to sex are capable of malice and violence. If a false narrative of innocence is attached to one biological group, members of that group are exempt from the adult accountability. The personal responsibility necessary in adults for a functional society.

Every person is capable of aggression, physical and otherwise, but adult accountability without an idealized self-image is what allows non destructive participation in a community. The second item is recognizing the demonstrated tendency to use indirect, rather than direct use of force nicely accounts for our current climate of accusation by members of one demographic against the other. No phantom epidemic of unreported criminal victimization is necessary to make sense of widespread frivolous accusation.

In addition, cultural recognition of indirect violence – or the use of force by proxy – is necessary if we're serious about reducing the ensuing human damage.

[1] http://www.huffingtonpost.com/eve-ensler/over-it_b_1089013.html
[2] http://radicalhub.wordpress.com/2011/10/04/radical-feminism-in-the-21st-century/
[3] http://www.america.gov/st/elections08-english/2008/April/20080523105153WRybakcuH0.5036737.html
[4] http://she-conomy.com/report/facts-on-women/
[5] http://www.trendsight.com/content/view/40/204/
[6] http://blog.nielsen.com/nielsenwire/global/below-the-topline-womens-growing-economic-power/
[7] http://www.avoiceformen.com/feminism/hanna-rosin-abusing-her-children-on-video/

[8] http://papers.ssrn.com/sol3/papers.cfm?abstract_id=1662710
[9] Jill Steans – Gender and International Relation http://www.polity.co.uk/book.asp?ref=9780745635811
[10] http://www.icrc.org/eng/assets/files/other/irrc-877-hogg.pdf
[11] http://www.nytimes.com/2010/07/18/world/europe/18holocaust.html
[12] http://www.dvmen.org/dv-16.htm
[13] http://mensnewsdaily.com/2007/04/22/during-my-time-as-a-prosecutor-i-was-amazed-to-see-all-the-false-rape-allegations-that-were-made/
[14] http://www.ipt-forensics.com/journal/volume6/j6_2_4.htm

JtO apologizes for Register-her.com

John Hembling (JtO) · 5 December 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Catherine Kieu Becker was arrested on July 11, on charges including aggravated mayhem, false imprisonment and assault with a deadly weapon. What she'd actually done was drug her husband, tie him to a bed, and on his return to consciousness, partially dismember him using a kitchen knife. After cutting his penis off while he watched, she destroyed the severed organ by pulping it in a kitchen garbage disposal unit.

This savage mutilation was discussed on a daytime talk show, called "the Talk" as an item of comedy. A real world case of sexual mutilation – treated as slapstick comedy.

17 Years previously, Lorena Bobbitt, who now uses her maiden name Lorena Gallo – was lionized and worshipped by millions of women for the malicious wounding of her sleeping husband. For the cognitively impaired, it's necessary to point out that sexual mutilation of an unconscious victim does not constitute self defense.

Once publicly known as a celebrity violent sex offender, Bobbitt was rewarded with appearances on several interview shows, including Oprah. Bobbitt was found not guilty by reason of insanity – and spent 45 days under psychiatric observation. After the trial, Lorena was treated as a feminist hero.

Other cases of male targeted sexual mutilation occur world wide every year[1].

Kim Tran pled guilty to charges of aggravated assault on her husband. The assault involved the severing of her husband's penis while he was asleep was given a two year suspended sentence by the B.C. Supreme court after telling police she had " she had no choice but to cut off her husband's penis." [2]

Another case of mutilation of a sleeping male victim which occurred in Vietnam, but was celebrated by american commentators including Nicole Fabian-Weber. The 29-year-old Vietnamese woman, only identified by her surname, Pan, waited until her husband slept , then – according to american blogger Fabian-Weber, "did what any scorned, ballsy woman would do"[3].

I disagree with Fabian-Weber. Attacking and mutilating a sleeping victim is what a violent psychopath would do. Rather than "ballsy," it seems depraved and cowardly, but my cognitive function might be affected by a lifelong case of testosterone dementia. I, in my masculine pea-brain think that walking away from an abusive environment is a better indication of empowerment and courage.

Maybe that's just self congratulatory bias, having myself been subject to phsychological and physical abuse within a relationship which I walked away from without recourse to putting anyone in a hospital or morgue; You know, like an adult. And no, I don't think walking away from a violent or abusive relationship merits a medal. It's what you're supposed to do when you have adult agency and volition.

Fabian Weber's original commentary on this matter was: "Bad. Ass. Although I consider myself to be somewhat of a pacifist, I must admit, I've always admired a woman who has the cojones to cut off a man's weenus."

As I'm also an advocate of non-violent problem solving, I must admit to some confusion at the statement by Fabian-Weber of admiration towards attacking and mutilating a sleeping victim.

Katherine Heigl's supposedly humorous claim; that her advocacy of neutering pets is an outlet for her desire to chop human male's balls off shouldn't be taken out of context. The context being that she's a creature of hollywood who lives in california – the same state which earlier this year saw Katherine Becker cut her husband's penis off for the "offense" of wanting a divorce. In fact, on the same day I added Heigl to register-her.com – Sunday Dec 4, CBS news reported on that a 67 year old Palm Springs woman was arrested after attempting to cut off her husband's penis using a pair of scissors.[4][5]

The victim received medical attention for treatment for a non-life threatening wound and has subsequently was released later the same day.

On the mens-rights section of the popular news aggregation site Reddit.com – more than 100 commenters have made it clear they believe the inclusion of Heigl on register-her for her flippant joking endorsement of human castration diminishes the potency and purpose of the registry.

- "This isn't what the registry is supposed to be for." [18 up votes]

I built the registry, and what it's for includes several goals, high among them is to de-legitimize the current climate of accepted male-targeting violence, as well as the acceptance of male injury as humour. How often is a women kicked in the groin for comedic effect on TV or in a movie? How often does a late night comedian get a guaranteed laugh from the audience when mentioning female-victimizing rape?

- "I always thought that this whole "bigot" thing on register-her was pretty silly in itself. I think it undermines the entire enterprise, turning it into a laughingstock [….] You guys are getting outraged over that? It was a fucking joke" [20 up votes]

We're not outraged. We're pointing out the blatant double standard in which violence against men substitutes for humour. Violence which, in case you haven't kept up with current events is increasingly reflected in real world events. Do you remember how shocked and outraged the entire studio audience was when Sharon Osborne joked about Katherine Becker's dismemberment of her husband? I don't. I only remember how hilariously funny they thought it was.

- "You know, Register-Her started out with so much promise. But as soon as they listed their first hater, I began to worry about its future utility."

This comment only got 2 up votes – but it implies a question nobody seems aware needs asking, and answering. Why is male targeted violence funny? Why is it, that if your wife, or girlfriend, or female co-worker decided to cut your penis off and throw it into the street; you be derided as a failed man, and she lionized as an empowered woman? Do you doubt this projected outcome?

If you are male, you are worthless. You have no value as a human being, and your potential dismemberment is fodder for comedy. Your only value is by your utility, your ability to provide money, or labor, or violence or to absorb violence for somebody else's benefit – usually a woman.

This accepted worthlessness is re-enforced and maintained by ridiculing any man who demonstrates the fortitude to stand on his hind legs and declare that he has value as a human. To deny that mutilating him is funny, and to point out the factual truth that mutilating a human being, whatever their sex; is not funny.

- "This is the kind of thing that could totally undermine that website." [31 up votes]

With Paul's help and the volunteer help of a collection of other individuals whose names are withheld for their protection, I built the website. Maybe if you'd like to support and re-enforce the current cultural value of men as appropriate targets for disposal, de-humanization and dismemberment – you should build your own site to serve that end.

- "Attention AVfM guys, if you are reading. You do great things and are a valuable resource. Everyone makes mistakes, for the love of God please take that down. Katherine's campaign is clearly tongue-in-cheek and this makes us look foolish and histrionic as a group."

Does anybody know where the following bit of copy-pasta is from?

> "Charge of Hypersensitivity: The man is accused of being hysterical or exaggerating the problems of men. "Stop whining.", "Get over it.", "Suck it up like a man.", "You guys don't have it as nearly as bad as us women.", "You're just afraid of losing your male privileges." "Your fragile male ego…", or "Wow. You guys need to get a grip."

We know it's a joke. That's the point. It's both shocking, and plausibly deniable. It also wouldn't be funny to most people if there was not an element of truth in it. Heigl's "joke" included the word "yet". This is an obvious nod to her awareness of increasing cultural acceptance of male-targeted violence and mutilation.

How many female-kills-male murder stories have we covered at AVFM where the murderer walks away with a slap on the wrist because she's female? Furthermore, how did we get to a place in society when otherwise sane human being shrug off the murder of men by women and even celebrate those violent individuals as cultural heroes.

Male targeting violence persists and escalates because in the unconscious reptile corner of men's minds, they think nodding along with whatever vile , violent, murderous shit the nearest vacuous barbie utters in her you-go-girl bubble of social enablement might get him approved for access to the magic vagina.

This is blue pill thinking. It's what we're here to destroy. The overwhelming condemnation of Heigl's listing is proof that what we're doing is right and necessary.

However, because Paul and I are both sensitive, weak, approval seekers without our own ethical compasses, we will , from now on, put further additions to the registry to a public vote. We feel its important to give the blue pill, blue cool-aid drinking public every opportunity to tell us what's appropriate, and what's not.

Thank you all for your kind attention.

[1] http://listverse.com/2010/01/16/15-cases-of-penis-removal/
[2] http://www.fathers.ca/News/STUDIES/VIOLENCE/JustifyingWomensViolence/THEKIMTRANCASE.aspx
[3] http://register-her.com/images/4/4f/Wife_Cuts_Off_Husband%27s_Penis-comments-1.pdf
[4] http://www.heraldsun.com.au/news/world/palm-springs-woman-67-arrested-for-trying-to-cut-off-husbands-penis/story-e6frf7lf-1226214377001

[5] http://losangeles.cbslocal.com/2011/12/04/woman-67-accused-of-trying-to-cut-off-husbands-penis-with-scissors/

Taking it to the streets

Paul Elam · 6 December 2011 · Archived copy · Original

American MRA's may want to make sure next year's taxes are done at least a few days early. Some of them will be busy in Washington D.C., staging a protest against misandry.

April 15, 2012 is the 100th anniversary of the sinking of the Titanic, an event that showcases the end game consequences of chivalry, as well as providing indisputable evidence that patriarchy is a system of male disposability, not male power.

There is a memorial on Washington D.C.'s west side, erected through fundraising by American women, honoring the men who sacrificed their lives so that women and children could live.

Here is the memorial and inscription:

TO THE BRAVE MEN WHO PERISHED IN THE WRECK OF THE TITANIC
APRIL 15 1912
THEY GAVE THEIR LIVES THAT WOMEN AND CHILDREN
MIGHT BE SAVED

ERECTED BY THE WOMEN OF AMERICA

It was a harsh deal for men, even then. But now, as the pall of feminist governance degrades even the token honors bestowed upon male sacrifice, and seeks to throw us all over the rails of a sinking ship, it is time to recognize that there is no longer any value in the social contract that places men at such risk. Our society has become a great, sinking ship, and it is time for men to save not women, but themselves, and their sons.

False accusations, false rape culture, corrupt family courts, educational bias, legal tyranny, PAS, media demonization, government corruption, VAWA's false DV hysteria, Title IX and the institutionalized minefield of "Dear Colleague," all have helped shape a culture of hate, and given rise to even more insidious agendas and ideologies.

We do as much as we can with our growing arsenal of online weapons to alter this destructive and hateful course, but the time has come to also take our voices to the streets in protest.

It has long been our position here that AVfM focuses its attention exclusively on online activism. However, the centennial of the Titanic's sinking provides us a unique and one time only opportunity.

Thus, this first announcement is one of many to come regarding A Voice for Men's "Sink Misandry" protest, to be staged live in Washington D.C. on April 15, 2012.

You are asked to join myself, John the Other, and a soon to be announced group of fellow MRA's in America's capital on that day to voice your opposition to the scourge of social and legal misandry. T-shirts and protest signs will be provided gratis, to registered participants, as well as information on travel and discount lodging for the event.

Please sign up here for our newsletter below. Feel free to sign up even if you cannot attend, but if you do plan on coming, please sign up and let us know you are attending.

The Sink Misandry protest will the important first step in taking the activism on this website to the world at large. And it will provide some much needed live contact for MRA's.

Also, as we will be repeating in the future, there are Titanic Memorials spread throughout the world, including key cities in Europe and Australia. Please contact AVfM if you want support in organizing an event in your country on the same day.

I am sure there will be many questions. We will be collecting all of them and providing answers in future announcements.

It's time to fuck their streets up.

[note: Your actual first and last name are not required for this form, so please enter any name you like if you choose to remain anonymous. But a valid email address is essential]

[gravityform id="1″ name="Subscribe To Our Mailing List"]

Tom Martin vs LSE court date set

Robert O'Hara · 6 December 2011 · Archived copy · Original

[box]

PRESS RELEASE: December 5th, 2011

Court date for man's £50,000 lawsuit against 'male-blaming' gender studies degrees at LSE

(AVfM News)A former student of the London School of Economics (LSE), who has filed a lawsuit claiming all five of its gender studies Masters degrees "exaggerate women's issues and recommend blaming men to justify ignoring men's issues," will make his case at the Central London County Court, a hearing date now set for February 14th, 2012. As reported by The Evening Standard , The Guardian (here and here),Forbes Magazine, The West End Extra, A Voice for Men, Men's Matters, and dozens of blogs and vlogs, Tom Martin's case has garnered a lot of public support, his legal fund receiving £3055 in donations from ninety people in eight countries to date, but Martin says he now needs more donations, "Clerical errors by the court have caused a three month delay, so I now need a few thousand pounds more to continue devoting all my time in preparation for winning the case."

Director of LSE's Gender Institute, Dr Anne Phillips, told LSE's student union newspaper The Beaver, "I find it almost surreal when [LSE's] Gender Institute is portrayed as representing 'women good, men bad," but Martin's website documents his method and analysis of texts in the opening compulsory unit for all gender degrees at LSE as evidence of "systematic male-blaming bias," and argues the contract students enter explicitly rules out sex-discriminatory learning materials. LSE's defense now argues key texts are not compulsory learning materials, only "recommended." Martin claims key texts are indeed compulsory, that students are explicitly told to read them in preparation for further discussion in seminars.

LSE also argue texts are available for both women and men to read so therefore do not directly discriminate. Further, they argue a focus on women in gender studies is expected, claiming any bias or discrimination against men "plainly justifiable." Martin says the prospectus did not warn of any discrimination or bias, nor seek to justify it.

In a 2011 book (p10), Dr Clare Hemmings, senior gender lecturer at LSE, admits when "women's studies" became "gender studies" programs, it signalled a rejection of biased, exaggerated female victim-hood perspectives in favour of greater inclusion, accuracy, and fairness for the field, but that subsequently, nothing changed. In 2008, Hemmings wrote that replacing the prefix "women's" with "gender" was a good way to ensure continued public funding and support.

Another of LSE's key gender texts recommends ignoring men's studies in favour of "Critical Studies on Men (CSM)." According to various reports, many educational programs around the world are similarly critical, from kindergarden up. Research shows negative stereotypes on men effect focus, performance, and health. With 59% of university degrees going to women and 41% to men, and the gap widening, Martin hopes his lawsuit will encourage educators to improve their stories. He appears in a Youtube exposé, finding some LSE students justify bias against men, by citing discrimination issues they say women face, one student exclaiming "There's no discrimination against men!" her outburst replayed in slow motion then freezing as a 160 item A to Z list of discrimination issues scrolls by.

Commenting on the February 14th court hearing date, Martin says "I think LSE's Gender Institute is planning an extra special Valentine's Day massacre for men's issues as usual, but people would prefer to see these gender studies industry representatives publicly renew their vows to gender equality, and make a serious effort to pick up the £50,000 tab, too – loose change for LSE maybe, but not for the more than 900 other gender studies and women's studies departments worldwide who can avoid similar payouts by dropping the man-hatred, and incorporating men's equality debates without further deceit, delay, or excuse. Gender-developmental progress is much more attainable when considering both women's and men's issues. Equality is a two way street."

The university's press office can be contacted here. Tom Martin can be contacted here.
[/box]

Private board for discussing strategy & tactics

Brutal Antipathy · 7 December 2011 · Archived copy · Original

[box type="note" icon="none"]

With my first submission to AVfM I proposed adopting methods to combat feminism. The more I thought about this, the more I realized it was foolish to discuss and plan such methods in a public venue. Any methods we might discuss here are open to view by the general public, including feminists. I have no doubt that some feminists monitor AVfM, and knowing this, realize that any discussion on tactics we raise here is subject to counter-maneuvers, including preemptive ones.

It has since been my opinion that a more private area would be necessary for serious discussion of strategy and tactics. I mentioned this to Mr Elam, and have been given license to put such a place together. This private forum is intended to be entirely a complimentary forum to AVfM in specific regard to activism, and no detraction from the normal flow of discussion on AVfM will be tolerated there.

As the forum is intended to be private, the location of the forum will not be posted. Please contact Mr Elam or myself for the URL. Viewing is open to members only, and admission is subject to administrative approval. Admission will be denied without a reasonable degree of certainty that you are who you claim to be.

I can be contacted at desdenova@hotmail.com

Welcome to the resistance!

[/box]

When feminists attack

Dr. Tara J. Palmatier · 8 December 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Some mornings, going through my email is just part of my usual routine. Then, other mornings, like today, someone sends an email that elicits a huge smile and just makes my whole day.

Ben Vonderheide aka Daddy Justice, is a relentless men's and father's rights activist. He and his video camera have been holding corrupt public officials and the corrupt family court system and its minions accountable for almost a decade.

Mr. Vonderheide's fight began 8 years ago when his ex made false allegations of abuse against him in an effort to separate him from his child. He fought back and won and now he is fighting the good fight for countless other men and their children.

In July 2011, the Violence Against Women Act (VAWA) was up for renewal in the U.S. Senate. Dr. Phil McGraw and other mucky-mucks in the $4 billion dollar plus Women's Domestic Violence industry offered up their usual misinformation, lies and inaccurate statistics in order to have the act renewed.

After Dr. Phil lied spoke to the Senate, Mr. Vonderheide was waiting for him in the hallway with his camera.

Dr. Phil ignored Mr. Vonderheide, but other hearing participants did not. Let's watch!

U.S. Senate, Dr. Phil and FemPork from Ben Vonderheide on Vimeo.

The woman who assaults Mr. Vonderheide in the above video is Lisalyn R. Jacobs. Ms. Jacobs is the current vice president for government relations of Legal Momentum, NOW attorney and one of the individuals responsible for implementing the highly discriminatory and unconstitutional VAWA legislation. Here is Ms. Jacobs' bio from the Legal Momentum website:

Lisalyn R. Jacobs

Lisalyn R. Jacobs joined Legal Momentum as vice president for government relations in March of 2003. She began her legal career at the National Partnership for Women and Families under the auspices of Georgetown's Women's Law & Public Policy Fellowship. Following three years in private practice, she joined the Office of Policy Development of the U.S. Justice Department in 1995 and worked on a number of issues including implementation of the Violence Against Women Act, the welfare reform law, judicial nominations. and affirmative action.

She also served as Chief of Staff of the Civil Rights Division, as well as Special Counsel to the Director of the Violence Against Women Office. In May of 2000, she left DOJ and for nearly three years was a civil and human rights consultant on issues ranging from capital punishment to affirmative action, and international human rights. She has testified before congressional committees at both the state and federal levels.

On December 5, 2011, Lisalyn R. Jacobs was charged and arraigned for assaulting Ben Vonderheide (Daddy Justice) outside the U.S. Senate VAWA hearing in Washington, D.C.

One would think that an individual who is against violence, who has devoted most of her adult professional life to ending violence and promoting human rights, would know better than to assault another human being in the corridors of the United States Senate for doing nothing more than filming her and asking her questions in an effort to hold her accountable for her very public beliefs and role in creating discriminatory and unconstitutional legislature.

Ms. Jacobs believes violence against women and girls is wrong. Her actions, however, seem to indicate that female perpetrated violence against men is right and acceptable and the Orwellian belief that some humans are more equal than others.

I could go on and on about what a hypocrite Ms. Jacobs appears to be. I could point out how a violent female offender shouldn't be allowed to participate in any discussions or policy-making about the violence of men and the protection of women. I could say all these things and more.

Instead, I think I'll go back to enjoying my schadenfreude-gasm at seeing this kind of hypocrisy exposed.

Multiple schadefreudegasms.

This article originally appeared on Dr. Palmatier's website, shrink4men.com, and is reposted here with permission.

Feminism occupies Wall Street

Robert O'Hara · 8 December 2011 · Archived copy · Original

[box]

Washington, Dec. 8 2011 (AVfM News) "Dec. 5 (Bloomberg) – For Gloria Steinem, the international conversation that the "Occupy Wall Street protests sparked about economic inequality is, at its heart, about gender," opened an article published by Bloomberg, one of the most popular outlets for business and economic news as well as data early this week. The article exclusively featured Steinem, her thoughts about the movement and how gender inequality and injustice for women are at the heart of the matter even though the movement was started by its founders as adressing an entirely gender neutral problem.

Within the article are mentioned twenty three year old women who are saddling $95,000 in debt who complain that they cannot pay it off as if it were any easier for a 23 year old man. Also, as expected, is a diatribe about the wage gap and how women are especially affected by the current economic downturn. This despite the fact men have fared far worse in recent years as a group than have women and in fact, for the first time in history, women outnumber men in the workforce.

There is a broad effort amongst prominent feminists and well funded feminist groups to convince the American public that the whole banking crisis is, at its root, all about the "patriarchy." Resulting is an Occupy Patriarchy movement budding up amongst the protesters who have been squatting on park squares in cities all over the world.

Starting their effort in September, they have been encouraged and supported heavily by an organization called The Woman's Media Center, founded by Gloria Steinem and Jane Fonda in in 2005. "The Women's Media Center convenes panels, issues reports, organizes grassroots campaigns, and meets behind the scenes with members of the media to address issues of women's representation and general diversity," reads the description of it's activities aimed at injecting gender politics and feminist ideology into the general media. Since its founding it has received well over $3.5 million in contributions according to IRS documents; hardly making it a grass roots operation.

Partnering up with The Woman's Media Center is none other than the Radfem Hub. Distributed by the WMC is a flyer produced by Radfem stating "Occupy Wall street is a men's movement, but it doesn't have to be." Along with references to radical feminist literature and common feminist memes there are also outlined on the flier shocking accusations of sexual misconduct by OWS protesters and the police:

"The conditions for women at OWS offer a glimpse of what "success" would look like, if OWS succeeded. It does not look good.

Women's concerns are marginalized and we are expected to support men's concerns first and foremost, and adopt them as our own.
Women are cooking, cleaning and serving men, as men claim all the leadership positions and positions of power and prestige for themselves.

Male-centric sexuality that poses known dangers to girls and women, specifically the risk of unwanted pregnancy is over-represented, and female-centric sexuality that is safe for girls and women is under-represented. Women have been groped and assaulted "

The homepage of the Occupy Patriarchy website features a link to a podcast in which members of OP in Houston are interviewed and a link to a Blogtalk radio show who's debut program features prominent feminist Robin Morgan who speaks of the OP movement. In both programs the OCW protesters are described as mainly white males who are no different than the patriarchal oppressors that they are trying to overthrow. Accusations of sexual misconduct in both programs are abundant.

Many have noted that for decades feminists have co-opted many other movements in a parasitic manner in order to raise their profile and procure more funding as well as to gain more political influence. This has been readily apparent with the civil rights and anti war movements of the 1960's and the environmental movement. All of these were never intended to have anything to do with gender but feminists, through dogged publicity, made these things synonymous with feminism.

However it is unclear whether Occupy Patriarchy wants to simply press OWS protesters to make the issue of crooked bankers a gender issue or simply discredit them altogether. In the case of the other movements mentioned above the parasitism was indeed more symbiotic but in this instance the relationship is much more hostile and doesn't seem to be sustainable. For whatever reason though, it appears the feminist leadership is getting out the big guns and putting down some serious cash to both astroturf and discredit the OWS movement.

One can only speculate as to what their true motivation is.

Sources:

http://www.bloomberg.com/news/2011-12-05/steinem-s-wall-street-occupied-as-women-earn-81-cents-on-each-male-dollar.html

http://womensmediacenter.com/blog/2011/11/exclusive-ows-where-does-feminism-fit/http://radicalhub.files.wordpress.com/2011/10/brochurepdf2.pdf

http://www.womensmediacenter.com/index.php/about-wmc/about-us.html

http://occupypatriarchy.org/

[/box]

We are all being watched

Paul Elam · 9 December 2011 · Archived copy · Original

"I am not placing you under arrest, but I have some questions and I am going to read you your rights."

That was the first thing the prominent Canadian MRA, whom we must now refer to as Mr. X, was told when he walked into the police investigators office. He had been phoned at work the day before by police officials, who told X that an allegation had been made against him that involved the MRM, stockpiling weapons and threats to do harm. They asked him to come in to "answer some questions."

Those questions were largely about his personal life and beliefs, focusing on whether he was a violence prone individual. There were questions about the MRM and MRA's, and it became clear to him during the course of the interview that significant prior effort had been invested by police officials into studying his beliefs as well as the overall mentality of those in the movement.

He admits to being a little rattled. Making threats of violence of any kind is a very serious matter in Canada. And something like this coming nearly to the day on the anniversary of the "Montreal Massacre," was a bit more chilling. December 6 marks the day that Marc Lepine murdered fourteen women and wounded ten women and four men at the École Polytechnique, an engineering school affiliated with the University of Montréal.

Anyone, and this includes police officials, who has read Mr. X's blog articles or watched his YouTube videos, knows him to be a level headed, intellectual sort, not given to violence. But it is clear that someone reported otherwise to Canadian law enforcement. The question remains why, but that is likely to never be answered because he was not made privy to where the complaint originated.

He was informed, according to my conversation with him last night, that he was not a suspect and the police found nothing in his writings that caused them concern. They were, in effect, following up on a complaint and after speaking with him determined there was no need for further inquiry. So they said.

But even in the best case scenario, there is an object lesson in the thick of this that must be addressed. The men's movement is a growing phenomenon. We are, as were we destined to do, starting to scare some people. That is what happens when insight meets ignorance. Those who cling to the status quo, in this case feminist governance, get uncomfortable. They react. Over react. Although over reaction may be the wrong word. These people were full of hate and lies long before anyone started speaking back.

It is possible that this was orchestrated, that more than one person conspired to set our associate up for trouble. It is also possible that this was one reactive person acting on their own. Again, we will never know.

But we do know enough to know that for MRA's, especially those that live in Canada, that there is a need, not for panic, but for caution.

We are documenting the fact that these events transpired for the sake of public record. If other MRA's are called in and questioned in similar circumstances we will document that as well. On the outside chance that we are seeing the police manipulated into some sort of ideological McCarthyism, we want to document it as it happens.

Regarding AVfM, there have been times when I have banned people from this site for making even non serious suggestions of violence. I have gotten complaints and nasty emails for doing so. Now you know at least one reason why I felt it was necessary.

Personally, I would be flabbergasted to know there are any MRA's out there that would take their beliefs and use them as an excuse for violence. And truth tell, I am more than happy with their being removed from our ranks, and even from society, if they are out there.

The only weapon we ever needed is the truth, and I do believe that we can see through Mr.X's unfortunate experience, that the truth is indeed a potent weapon that causes irrational reactions from the very people we would identify as the problem.

But a word of caution. As we know all too well, lies are powerful weapons, too. They can take a terrible toll in terms of lost reputation, as even lost freedom. Unfortunate then that our stock and trade is in dealing with liars. We see people like David Futrelle and others trying to cast us as pro-violence in any way they possibly can, often treating the truth and integrity like minor obstacles to their ambitions.

So, the question becomes, how are we going to react to what has happened here? The answer is that we are going to move ahead full steam. We won't slither into private forums with our beliefs. That is the province of those we oppose, as you will soon see detailed on the pages of this site like never before.

Just like Mr. X, the people at AVfM are simply telling the truth and looking for justice. There is no need to slow down or change course. But these events remind us that on whatever level you can imagine, there are those that would do most anything to shut us up. Or, as we have said around here before, we are getting flak, so we must be over the target.

But, it is official now, people. They are watching us. We must remain aware of that, even though it changes nothing that we do. AVfM will continue to enforce its no violence policy, just as we have from the day we launched. And we will continue to confront hateful ideologues, corrupt public officials and the plague of misandry wherever we find it and FTSU.

Sometimes the ride will get bumpy, so we are all better off to strap in securely.

Questioning the MRM – a short self examination cooterbee · 9 December 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Why are we doing this? What, exactly, is our complaint? In absolute terms, men have never had it better. Our lives are longer than ever before. Especially in the western world, we are not nearly as plagued by violence and disease as our grandfathers. Never in history have we had as much economic opportunity or as much latitude to choose our own careers and our ultimate station in life.

We are clearly neglected and abused relative to women, but is that really a legitimate comparison? Is that any more meaningful than measuring how we are doing compared to squirrels or dolphins? There are a few men who do cross-over and become women but I never heard of even one who did it to gain access to all the goodies that go with being an entitlement skank. I know of few men who would be anything else despite the supposed unfairness.

So what is the beef? Could it be that even though men are doing better than ever that the level of ingratitude is also disproportionately high? Let's face it. Men are and always have been where it's at when it comes to sustaining this world. In former days, men used to get some credit for it. Not now. Scorn, vitriol and blame are the thanks we get for making this world livable. Biting the hand that feeds you was always a no-no. Perhaps that's what eats me.

I am starting to tire of all the stats and data. All of the situational analogies with the sexes reversed are starting to get to me. Does it really count that the outcome for each sex might be different? Isn't the fact that we don't like what is going on enough reason to change it? It is in any other aspect of life. Don't get me wrong. Debunking, facts and logic have their place within a rational discussion. Thing is this isn't and can't be a rational discussion. May just as well stake out a dogmatic position and listen to nothing.

I suspect that we hedge too much and appeal to fairness too often. Why would that be a bad thing though? It sounds too much like begging. "Oh please, please respect me even though you want me dead. I swear I can get laid and don't hate women no matter how much they hate me." Thankfully, more men are saying, "I said it. Too bad for you"

Talking equity among men is useful because men are capable of equity. Exceptionally few women are capable. Talking about equity to a typical woman is like talking particle physics to a baboon.

We want it the way we want it and so it should be done. No other justification is significant.. We have it good but want it to be better still. Why isn't important. Just that we do is enough. Man is the measure of all things? A man's reach should exceed his grasp? Perfectibility of man or eternal pursuit of happiness? (liberal traditions that many of us utterly reject) What's the difference? Our decision to change things is made. Deal.

Baby boys and turtles

Karen Straughan (aka GirlWritesWhat) · 10 December 2011 · Archived copy · Original

[dropcap]I [/dropcap]finally broke down about a month ago and watched my very first video of an infant circumcision. It was an instructional video, the picture grainy and the color off, so I couldn't quite see in sparkling clarity what exactly was being done (for which I'm grateful). I watched it on mute at first, too. When I finally had the guts to turn the sound back on, the only thing more appalling to me than the screams of the baby was the cold, detached, clinical description of the procedure recited by the doctor performing it.

I'm not a squeamish person. Back in the day, when I was a professional cook at a high end hotel, I was the go-to girl whenever someone accidentally stuck his hand in the deep fryer or cut the tip of her finger off, to assess the injury, determine if it required serious attention and, if necessary, locate the missing part, at the very least to make sure it never found its way into anyone's dinner. I've held my three year-old's head still while a doctor stitched it up, and have been through the pain of natural childbirth three times. I was even seriously considering a career as a medical examiner at one time.

But watching that video left me shaking, my throat clogged with tears, and my chest tight and hot with this kind of simmering anger that such things are still done to other human beings–and such helpless ones–in this so-called progressive age.

And no, this is not an article about infant circumcision, per se. It's an article about what the cultural and legal acceptance of infant circumcision, even in cultures where it's not the norm, tells us about society, and about men's place in it.

[image]I also remember the media shit-storm that occurred a decade or so ago in Vancouver's Chinatown when vendors were reported to the SPCA (by horrified schoolchildren on a field trip, no less) for chopping up and selling meat off live turtles, stripping off the shell and carving up the turtle piece by piece while it still lived. The vendors themselves didn't see what the problem was. Keeping it alive as long as possible kept each slice of meat fresh. What could be simpler or easier? Besides, it was just a turtle. Why should anyone care?

Animal rights advocates were outraged by the practice (as were the majority of Average Joes I spoke to about it), but the SPCA considered it a "cultural norm", and since there was no specific law against it, there was "not a whole lot we can do".

Which seems bizarre, when a person running a puppy mill, or beating their cat with a hose, or allowing a dog to starve in their care, can earn themselves a fine and even jail time, or be banned from owning animals.

Denis Leary did a "funny because it's true" bit in his Special "No Cure for Cancer", where he aptly observed, "We only wanna save the cute animals, don't we?" But I think it's more complicated than that. It's not just an animal's (or human's) cuteness factor that impacts how much we empathize or don't with them. It's a whole host of perceptions we have regarding their functions, roles, inner workings (if any), contributions, harmfulness, strengths and weaknesses, that combine to formulate our ability to value them as beings in their own right, rather than translating their existence solely into a function of their usefulness or harm to us.

The turtle may be cute, but it's also food. Its role and function in relation to us is to be used and consumed by us. It's cold-blooded, with the soulless personality of any reptile, and not even smart enough to be litter trained. It is perceived to be emotionally dead, therefore its pain is presumed to be non-existent, and its entire being alien to our own experience. And while us westerners have long had the luxury of caring about the survival and wellbeing of species other than our own, I'm not sure there's even an agency equivalent to the SPCA in China. Their culture is still largely one of seeing animals primarily for their utility, as we used to. There's probably not a lot of lambs or calves with names there, because when you name your food, it's a lot harder to butcher it. You've turned it into a "who" rather than a "what".

When it comes to cruelty to pets, well, things look very different to us. Our pets' roles and functions feed our humanity–love, affection, companionship. We don't keep them around for their utility, but for the joy they give us. We admire their attributes, and relate to their rich, emotional lives. And oddly, because we don't "need" them, because they serve no practical purpose, perform no necessary labor, and are even burdens on us…we seem to value them all the more. We often respect their feelings and desires too much, and allow them to get fat, or become the "boss of the house".

I used to be confused by the tendency of society–both the male and female halves of it–to over-empathize with women and not empathize at all with men, but the more I think about the turtles in the Chinese market, and the baby boy strapped screaming to a board, the more clear my thoughts become, and at the same time, the more complex.

What is "male"? What attributes do our biology and our culture assign to maleness, and why?

Strength. Independence. Self-determination. Toughness. Courage. Threat. Ruthlessness. Danger. Competence. Ambition. Predation. Reticence. Stoicism. Anger. Aggression. Violence. Perseverance. Invulnerability. Utility. Protection. Self-sacrifice. All of this is "male".

Can such a being even feel pain? And if he does, why should we care? More importantly, can we, and have we ever been able to, afford to care?

A huge part of the role men played for ages of our evolution involved them not just being agents acting upon the outside world, but also absorbing violence, risk, pain and damage, from nature, other humans, or their own labors, so that women wouldn't have to.

[image]How could society's expectation of a man to willingly, bravely, uncomplainingly stand in front of a woman and act as her shield, face the elements and possible death on a game trail to act as her spear, work his hands bloody to act as her scythe, bend his back to act as her ox, sit hungry and cold and scared in a trench to act as her curtain wall…how could this expectation exist and be enforced, if we felt real empathy for that man, if we saw him as a being in his own right, worthy of humanity just because he was human, if we valued him as much as we did the uses he could be put to, or if his suffering truly mattered to us?

How can we expect him–command him–to suffer for the benefit of women and society if we care about sparing him pain? If we could climb into his skin and imagine ourselves there, experience the full spectrum of the fear he hides, the pain he conquers, the anguish he suppresses, the loneliness he buries, the helplessness he denies?

In Africa, there is a growing movement on the part of aid agencies and federal bodies to put an end to the barbaric practice of female genital mutilation. At the exact same time, there is a program supported by the World Health Organization to implement widespread infant circumcision (the mutilation that isn't), for the benefit of African society.

I think of that male baby, strapped to a board while his male part is cut from him, his screams as ineffectual as the squirming of a turtle with its shell stripped off, the voice of the doctor, no different in cadence or tone from the voice of the market vendor saying, "but it's only a turtle."

And the only way it makes any sense at all to me is to conclude that the maleness of that cut somehow transforms his suffering from that of a baby, which we might care about, into that of a male. It's beneficial, not just to him, but to society. Even if it isn't. Because a little male suffering never hurt anyone, right?

And I imagine the mother of that baby holding him afterward, consoling him even as she praises, "that's my good, brave boy, my tough little guy…" and admonishing him not to cry.

I've been called a lot of things since I started writing about men's issues: sexist, misogynist, hateful, unfeeling, sociopathic, insensitive, uncaring, even inhuman. And the most telling thing is that these accusations are most commonly made when I empathize with men or boys, without empathizing with women and girls more.

I don’t know how to teach society to feel any empathy for men. I don’t know that it’s a thing that can be taught. I only know that this lack of empathy for men, and society’s pathological outpouring of empathy for women, lies at the very heart of every major men’s rights issue, the wellspring of each injustice I see, and is the foundation of the wall that stands between men and real equality.

FBI advisory board approves new definition of rape

Robert O'Hara · 10 December 2011 · Archived copy · Original

[box]

Washington, Dec. 10 2011 (AVfM News) On Tuesday, November 6th the FBI's Criminal Justice Information Advisory Board unanimously voted to submit an updated definition of Rape for final approval to FBI director Robert Muller. It is expected that he will approve the new definition.

This comes after over a year of activism by feminist groups who stand to benefit financial by the the broadened definition of rape which is now to include the "inability to give consent." This is a gray area that many legal scholars argue could classify some instances which are actually not rape to be considered as such, particularly in the case of alcohol consumption.

"This new definition will mean that, at long last, we will begin to see the full scope of this horrific violence, and that understanding will carry through to increased attention and resources for prevention and action" said Eleanor Smeal, president of the Feminist Majority Foundation, one of the many organizations who lobbied to expand the definition of rape. The Feminist Majority Foundation is known for its avocation of including within the definition of rape; sex while the female is under the influence of alcohol.

If the new definition of rape is approved for reporting purposes by Muller then more money and resources will flow into the hands of advocacy organizations like the FMF and others who have dominated the entire public discourse concerning sexual assault.
Sources:

http://www.nydailynews.com/news/fbi-change-definition-rape-time-1929-article-1.988510?localLinksEnabled=false

http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=3DRybjsweu0&feature=channel_video_title

http://www.fbi.gov/about-us/cjis/advisory-policy-board

http://www.avoiceformen.com/featured/fbi-changes-meaning-of-rape-in-closed-meeting/

[/box]

Understanding the men's rights movement

John Hembling (JtO) · 10 December 2011 · Archived copy · Original

A Guide for Law Enforcement Professionals.

The Men's Rights Movement (MRM) is a grass roots, unfunded and loosely associated collection of human rights advocates focused on opposing the marginalization and vilification of men and boys in Western society. The MRM is a non-violent, non-political movement comprised of men and women who believe, based on a growing body of evidence that the human rights of males are being systematically removed by activists, lobbyists, politicians and academicians who cling to a misguided and wrongheaded belief that masculinity is fundamentally violent or harmful. This persistent myth is often referred to as cultural misandry.

The fact of men's second-class status within western society is demonstrated by a number of well known, but ignored facts. This is a short sample for illustrative purposes only.

A few examples include that Men die roughly 5 years earlier than women, men commit suicide at 4 times the rate of women. In addition, 93% of workplace deaths are male, and while courts enforce financial obligations to women with children, men have no reproductive rights. More information is available at http://www.avoiceformen.com/mission-and-values/about/

Myths about the MRM.

"Men's Rights Activists Just Hate Women"

This is the most common and laziest argument offered by opponents of male human rights. Much of men's rights writing opposes the ideology operating under the name of Feminism. Critics and opponents of the MRM claiming this equates to a hatred of women make several false assumptions.

The first such assumption is that "women" and "feminism" are synonyms. One is an ideology, one is a biological demographic. In fact, many of the loudest adherents of feminism are male. Dr. Phil McGraw, Hugo Schweitzer, Micheal Kimmel are all loudly self-identifying feminists. In addition, whether they identify as such, most men are feminists by default in that they conflate feminism with equal rights.

The persistent dogma of female victimhood within feminist ideology affords political power to women embracing it, but ultimately locks women into the role of children lacking adult agency. The superficial benefit to women of feminist ideology is, in the view of many Mens rights advocates, destructive to women's rights, and to civil society.

"Men's Rights Activists Want To Send Women back to the Kitchen"

Some extremist social conservatives promote a view of returning to a "golden age" in which men occupied an honoured position in families and society, and in which women were subservient. This is not a view endorsed by Mens Rights Activists, and represents an absurd fantasy with no historical truth.

Individuals promoting this view occasionally surface within Men's Rights forums online, and are almost immediately ignored and booted by the moderators of those forums.

"Mens Rights Activists are Violent"

This claim is absurd. The men's rights movement is an avowedly non violent human rights movement. A cursory examination of this website will reveal that the typical reaction from site management to any advocacy or glorification of violence, even in "humor," is to remove the offending statement and permanently ban the user from posting again.

To date, almost all men's rights activism has taken the form of video blogging and online writing. This self documentation of men's activism is distinctly and explicitly non violent. In fact, a substantial fraction of writing within the movement addresses anti-male violence increasingly promoted by feminist ideologues and mainstream media personalities. To wit:

[unordered_list style="arrow"]

- Swedish Feminists in 2010 advocated murder to promote hate literature.
- Hosts of a daytime TV show "The Talk" treated male sexual mutilation as slapstick comedy
- Self-identifying feminist "mommy bloggers" regularly celebrate male targeted violence

[/unordered_list]

False Accusations

Almost all rhetoric opposing the Men's Rights Movement is based on insult, accusation and speculation of motive, and ignores the substance of arguments made in men's rights literature. To date, no published writing, online or in print has made any serious refutation of mens rights argument. It is the opinion of most men's rights activists that this failure represents the intellectual, factual, and ethical bankruptcy of active opposition to the mens rights movement. Consequently, only very new writers in the MRM will attempt to engage in substantive debate with opponents of men's rights. Experienced men's rights activists generally learn that debate with dishonest, morally bankrupt ideologues is a futile exercise. As a result, much men's rights writing focuses on exposing the blatant corruption, double standard and anti male bigotry of rhetoric opposing the men's rights movement.

Ideologues opposing the men's rights movement are increasingly frustrated by the small but growing success of the movement – and have begun using false criminal accusations against men's rights activists in efforts to shut them up, using the police to intimidate and silence them.

A common view within the MRM is that police are exploited as enforcers of feminist ideology. This is formalized by sexually biased legislation such as the Violence Against Women Act in the United States, and by use of the discredited Duluth Model informing police policy on domestic violence disputes.

Bad Actors

In addition to accusations and insults, ideologues opposing the men's rights movement have also demonstrated a willingness to establish fake men's rights organizations for the purpose of diluting the message of actual mens rights advocates – as well as posing as men's rights activists but taking extremist or hateful viewpoints, to attribute those views to the larger men's movement. The website goodmenproject.com founded by Lisa Hickey and Tom Matlack is a feminist funded operation using the first strategy mentioned.

For more information, law enforcement professionals in the United States are encouraged to contact Paul using paul@avoiceformen.com, while law enforcement professionals in Canada are encouraged to contact John using john@avoiceformen.com.

A better use for December 6

Davd · 11 December 2011 · Archived copy · Original

[dropcap]I [/dropcap]did something "Politically Incorrect" on December 6th, and I'm glad. Early that afternoon, I sent my son in Finland, his Finnish-speaking brother in Canada, two professors in Finland with whom I worked when Editor of Ecoforestry, and three others, an Independence Day message.

It never occurred to me that it was Marc Lepine Day in the approximate sense that October 5 is Guy Fawkes day in the UK… until the 5PM CBC Radio News came on, with a lead-story "commemorating the Montreal Massacre … demanding that the Long Gun Registry be kept." In perspective,"Marc Lepine day" was not worth lead story status, 22 years after the event; and the Long Gun Registry should fairly be described as over-reaction and if not scrapped, at least reformed to restore a presumption of innocence. It may have been "Politically Incorrect" to forget Lepine's rampage and remember Finnish Independence Day—but methinks it was the right thing to do.

That 1989 "Montreal Massacre" is the least deadly event this writer has seen called 'massacre': The second smallest number of deaths was at the Wounded Knee Massacre. Fourteen died at the Ecole Polytechnique: Larger numbers of people have been killed in several car bomb, suicide bomb, and public transit bombings during the 22 years since. These events have not been called massacres. 146 died at Wounded Knee.

Memorable massacres usually involve thousands to hundreds of thousands dying: The Katyn Forest, Srebernize [Srebrenica], Rwanda, and Assyria in the time of Timurlane and again in the early 20th Century. (Ironically, the ancient Assyrians, when they conquered, are reported to have massacred their enemies and piled up hundreds of severed heads to intimidate the survivors, though no statistical specifics got through to our time.)

The Nazi Holocaust stands out among those for which we have some approximate count of the victims: Some six million Jews and no small number of Christians and "untermenschen," died in a drawn-out, deliberate mass murder. My Finnish Independence Day message named one of the Christians, Dietrich Bonhöffer, who went back to Germany from a safe professorship in the US to stand, and eventually die, in solidarity with the Confessing [Lutheran] Church.

The distinctives of the Marc-Lepine "massacre" were that he killed women and ranted against Feminism. If his act is labelled more drastically than others, equally deliberate[1] and involving more deaths, that label represents an implicit condemnation of his act as horrible for reasons other than just the number who died. There are two obvious candidates for "reasons": The notion that women's lives deserve more protection than men's[2]; and the notion that Feminism, not the works of Matthew, Mark, Luke, John, Moses, Muhammad, or the Buddha, is sacred.

The special protection of women began in a context where men expected to be the adventurers and risk-takers and women expected to stay home and nurture babies, children, the sick,and the very old. When women had precedence in the loading of lifeboats and the custody of children, as part of a deliberately sheltered and restricted life scope; and men had precedence in higher education and the professions, it resembled a balance. When women have precedence in all four, it more resembles a caste system, with men beneath women. The "long gun registry" came into existence more or less along with the caste system.

The "registry" is more than the word implies. The idea that the police should know whether one has hunting arms, and how many, is something one might have reservations about to the extent that the police represent other values; but to which most Canadian men would consent. The practice, however, is to require all gun owners to apply every five years for continued permission to keep their guns. What's more, every cohabiting male applicant must get the approval of the woman living with him, in order to receive continued permission[3]. It's a real incentive to avoid manipulative and vindictive women, and to some extent, to avoid doing anything "Politically Incorrect": It's a chill-law.

If the rules changed to allow the noncriminal, non-crazy majority, lifetime permission to keep guns (or perhaps, allow non-criminal rural citizens that lifetime permission and be slightly more restrictive of urban residents); that would be a good step toward the presumption of innocence. A criminal conviction could still over-rule the “usual procedures”; the problem currently is that the usual procedures treat well-behaved non-criminals as one would expect criminals and the unstable to be treated. (Whether that “good step” is better or worse than the complete elimination of registration, is a separate question and too extensive to address here.)

As to how many people’s lives the “Registry” saves per year, let’s remember that statistics are never any better than the data collection and coding practices that underlie them. One wonders how a life comes to be deemed to be saved by the Gun Registry; and two concerns arise:

[unordered_list style=”bullet”]

- that many times, the database informing police of a 0.1%-10% risk of demise, is translated into 100% of a life “saved” by some tendentious supporter of the five year renewal rule;
- that police and-or bureaucrats may well have a vested interest in the jobs and funding involved.

[/unordered_list]

Guns are for biathlon, hunting, and sadly, sometimes for policing and war. Vanishingly few men approve shooting strangers because of their demographic category—and lately, there is a heavier visible threat to men than to women. Vis-a-vis Marc Lepine, we might compare the recent Swedish SCUM video depicting the murder of a man, licking blood from his bullet wounds, and exhorting viewers to do likewise [4]. Valerie Solanas, whose Society for Cutting Up Men Manifesto is the ostensible the inspiration for the videos, did attempt the murder of artist Andy Warhol and one other man; her followers urge viewers to go kill men and revel in their blood[5]. As of today, it is more than merely likely that men are more at risk from the Solanas legacy than women are from Lepine’s.

The excessive attention given by Feminists and their allies in the CBC, to a multiple murder over 22 years ago—a multiple murder that has been “topped” by several more horrendous acts of homicide since then, and hasn’t been copied—seems to be given because the normal treatment of a despicable deed by a probable madman (letting its memory fade with time), wouldn’t serve some political purposes. The simple inference is that those political purposes do not deserve support; to over-ride the simple inference, powerful contrary evidence should be presented.

I haven’t seen such evidence: What we should learn from Marc Lepine and Clifford Olson and Karla Homolka is how to better detect such monstrous exceptions before they kill, not to treat the average [wo]man as suspicious.

December 6th should not be “Marc Lepine day”, (and even less “Montreal massacre day”); it has a truly historic event to be known-for, the independence of the Finnish Republic from Russia. Finland has managed to keep free for over 90 years, with one of the world’s highest literacy rates and “scholarly output rates” relative to its small population, and in its wisdom did not import great numbers of culturally incompatible immigrants. Finnish men have less than equal power under divorce law, but in my experience and my son’s recent report, more than Canadian or US men.[6]

Two four-letter words symbolize for me, the distinctive Finnish social and cultural virtues: Sisu and Teho. Teho translates pretty well as “efficiency”; and our social inefficiency has contributed to the denigration and abuse of men at law. Sisu is not so easy to translate, but combining courage, persistence, and a certain disdain for soft living, might come close. These are far better themes to honour on December 6th, than blaming all men for the acts of one crazy one, or requiring hunters whose violence is limited to their proper quarry, to beg the bureaucracy every five years, for permission to keep their hunting equipment.

December 6th is Finnish Independence Day, and the customary way to honour nearly a century of self-government of that formerly colonized people, is by putting two lighted candles in a window toward the road, from dark until bedtime.

Amen to that.

Notes:

[1] Like most car- and suicide-bombers, Lepine seems to have had a general target, but not to have intended to kill the specific individuals that he killed. Sometimes, an attack targets one or two specific people (e.g. Hamid Karzai's brother) and seeks to kill many of their co-workers without specifically choosing which of them.

[2] http://www.everyman.ca/2011/04/28/has-time-changed-the-meaning-of-self-sacrifice/

[3] I'm not sure if the mirror requirement applies to female applicants.

[4]http://www.youtube.com/watch?feature=player_embedded&v=XJjKJ-_d4YQ —link provided by the AVfM website, November 23 [to Editor—does it need replacement?]

[5]http://register-her.com/index.php?title=Josefin_Von_Zeipel_Segerberg_–_Bigot

[6]One of my sons is studying at a Finnish university, and he had some qualifying comments on the Laasanen post (http://www.the-spearhead.com/2011/12/02/equality-feminism-and-the-mrm-in-finland/): In his view "there are other men's-studies people who have more acceptance", and Laasanen is best known for advocating "the market value theory of dating". My son also wrote the main gender-law change being advocated, and slowly accomplished, is "that men not be denied equal child custody based on gender —[that is, be] allowed to participate more in the raising of their own children". This is consistent with a common Finnish warning to foreigners sojourning there: "Finland is not another Sweden."

Open letter to Prosecutor General Anders Perklev

Joakim Ramstedt · 12 December 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Anyone who might be interested in getting some answers to these questions regarding the extradition of Julian Assange, should feel free to copy this letter and mail to the swedish prosecutor general Anders Perklev. These questions should after all be very easy for him to answer.

Mr Anders Perklev
Prosecutor General
Office of the Prosecutor General

Östermalmsgsatan 87c

Box 5553, 114 85 Stockholm, Sweden

email: anders.perklev@aklagare.se

Dear Anders Perklev,

The extradition of Julian Assange to Sweden under the European Arrest Warrant is currently before the UK Supreme Court, who will decide whether to hear his appeal on the grounds it has not been issued by a proper judicial authority. Mr Assange's case has drawn international attention and left many ordinary European, Australian and US citizens questioning what safeguards and protections there are in the EAW (european arrest warrant) scheme for people facing police investigation in Europe. In view of this, could you please provide some clarity for non-Swedish citizens on some aspects of Swedish judicial procedure for which you as Prosecutor General have overall responsibility.

On 6 December 2011 the Swedish Prosecution Authority issued a statement pointing out that Sweden decided to make ALL public prosecutors "judicial authorities" for the purposes of issuing EAWs under the Framework Directive. This is not something that was anticipated by British Parliamentarians when drafting the UK Extradition Act 2003 (Hansard), who felt strongly that such warrants should only be issued by a court. May I ask why you felt it necessary to issue such a statement on that date?

Mr. Assange's name was leaked to the press, apparently by the Stockholm Prosecution Service, which is illegal under Sweden's privacy laws. Can you outline – for an international audience – what steps were taken to investigate this and a summary of the findings? How were those responsible dealt with?

Can you publish some statistics on how often a Swedish public prosecutor nominates themselves as the chief investigator in a case? The Swedish Prosecution Authority English website says: "In the case of less serious crimes, the police continue to lead the preliminary investigation." As the strongest allegation against Mr Assange is described on the Prosecution Authority's own website as "less serious crime," it is not clear why Marianne Ny is involved in the case as chief investigator at this stage.

Mutual Legal Assistance is ordinarily used to interrogate people in foreign jurisdictions. However, Marianne Ny stated that British and Swedish law prevented her from questioning Julian Assange in London, which was untrue. Her statement was later redacted. What disciplinary measures are available to you as Prosecutor General when a senior public prosecutor misleads the public in this way?

Can you please outline – if only in general terms – on what basis this case was re-opened on 1 September 2010 after Eva Finné, a senior prosecutor you appointed to review it, cancelled the original arrest warrant – "I consider that there are no grounds for suspecting that he has committed rape." – leaving only one instance of alleged molestation still to be investigated? From reading the leaked police protocol on the internet – as millions of people across Europe have – there seems to be only one item of new evidence which might have appeared between Eva Finné's decision on 25 August 2010 and the re-opening of the case, a torn used condom. However, the forensic analysis of 25 October 2010 included in the prosecution protocol does not support any offences related to this item being included on the face of the EAW issued by Marianne Ny on 18 November 2010. To put it plainly, no DNA could be found on this condom.

This would appear not to meet the Prosecution Authority's Objectivity Demand (on your website): "Forensic evidence must, of course, be gathered and investigated in a correct and secure manner. The prosecutor must also be objective when he or she initiates a prosecution. During the course of the trial it is admittedly the prosecutor's task to prove that a crime has been committed, but the prosecutor is obliged to give due consideration to anything that could change the situation with respect to evidence."

Again, please outline – for an international audience – whether this is a disciplinary matter and, if so, what disciplinary measures are available to you as Prosecutor General.

I am particularly concerned that Mutual Legal Assistance has not been used in this case. Under Sweden's Code of Judicial Procedure "the investigation should be conducted so that no person is unnecessarily exposed to suspicion, or put to unnecessary cost or inconvenience." (Chapter 23, Section 4) and there is no doubt that a great deal of both Swedish and British taxpayers' money has been wasted arguing this extradition in court when much simpler methods could have been used to question Julian Assange. Can you please explain the mechanisms by which Britain is reimbursed its costs in representing the Swedish Prosecution Authority in the UK courts? Likewise, what avenues are available to Mr Assange to seek recompense for his substantial personal legal costs in challenging this abuse of the European Arrest Warrant process?

Yours sincerely,
[name] [UK/Swedish/Australian Citizen / Citizen of _____]

An MRA by any other name

Paul Elam · 12 December 2011 · Archived copy · Original

[dropcap]R[/dropcap]ecently I saw suggestions in the comments here that we needed to find an alternative to the use of the term “men’s rights,” and “men’s rights movement.” These were not the utterings of armchair quarterbacks or transient opinions offered by fly-by contributors to our discussions, but from those I would call heavy hitters in the collective thinking of this movement; men whose ideas on the issues I have come to respect and often embrace.

On first blush those ideas would seem to pass muster, for a number of reasons. One, feminism has been so successful in painting powerless men as powerful that to the common ear the term “men’s rights movement,” seems absurd; akin to “White power,” or “Wealthy Rights Movement.”

The people that convinced society of this similarity are the same people that have convinced the world that we have no “male history” celebrations because all history is male history; that we have no “male studies” programs in colleges and universities because all studies (save the sacrosanct women’s programs) are filtered through male dominated worldview, and that we have no Office on Men’s Health because, of course, even health itself has always belonged to men. We have no male liberation, and no need for it, because men, and only men, as a collective, were always free.

Now of course the fembots will scream that they have always held that gender roles have long harmed men, even as they only criticize aspects of those roles that they imagine, if corrected, will serve women more efficiently. But, I digress.

We are also confronted by literally millions of years of biogenetic programming that has largely bred out our capacity to muster compassion for men as a group. Had concern or outrage over the deadly, defeating aspects of male existence ever been allowed to flourish, we would not, in my opinion, be here to have this discussion. Procreation and the furthering of the species had its demands, and catering to the needs of men was never a part of them.

More accurately, the often sadistic exploitation of men, even as it destroyed them, has always been the bread and butter of civilization.

As the effects of the red pill washes away millennia of denial, we have come to see that men have always been the canaries in the coalmine, as well as those with shovels, digging alongside walls that tremble.

That is what the world and humanity has demanded of us, and that is exactly what we have provided, largely without question or dissent. In a true sense, being concerned with ourselves is considered an act of weakness and a betrayal to the species.

[image]So, in light of these realities, and in particular of our fellow human beings seemingly hard wired aversion to compassion and concern for men, it would seem to make sense to devise some sort of linguistic trickery; a misnomer, tailored and twisted into the appearance of human rights over men’s rights; a device designed to avert the visceral reaction to the idea of rights for men as a collective.

Allow me this pulpit for a moment, if you will, to tell you why I think this cannot work, and why, with all respect to the men whose ideas have helped shape this movement, it is the very antithesis of what we are trying to accomplish.

First, do we imagine that, even as gullible as the general public has proven to be, that we are going to address the plethora of male centered struggles in this culture under another name?

Did “Gender” Studies, as opposed to “Women’s” Studies, impress you? Did even the blue pill masses come to think these programs were about anything but women?

Please note that in the recent thread bringing this subject forward that there were a few statements that indicated we “must find,” another term for men’s rights. And that is precisely where the discussion fizzled out and died. There is a solid reason for that, and my opinion is that the reason is there is nothing else we can call it that makes any sense, or that does not mislead, or that does not open us up to co-opting by other forces, or that does not lead us right back into denial.

We are indeed supporters of all human rights in this movement, but are we to convince the public (or ourselves) that we are not focused and centered on the rights of men and boys, which have been suffering greatly in the last 50 years?

Isn't it what we do to reach people, painfully and slowly, and help them pull the blinders off, as so many of us already have?

It is men, and men's rights, that have been targeted quite successfully. We have lost the right to presumed innocence, to face our accusers, to due process, and even to freedom of speech. From parking spots in Korea to trains in India to legislation throughout the west, we increasingly find ourselves in the back of the bus.

Our struggles are ignored and shut out of the mainstream of politics and media as though we, a rapidly growing group of human beings discontent with cultural hatred, do not exist. Indeed, the targeting of males continues to escalate.

What sort of red pill have we taken if we feed all this societal rejection and ignorance? What sort of activism do we practice with a capitulating move to call it something other than what it is? Are we to attempt deception in order to curry favor from those that hate us or acceptance from those who are unfamiliar?

I do not say this as a matter of bravado, but of strategy. In order to continue to draw more men and women to our ranks, we must continue, with absolute clarity, to name the problems and the solutions; honestly, directly and without reservation.

Now, I am not suggesting that we need to hammer the label of "Men's Rights" into every article and comment we write. Indeed, I do think that staying focused on the subjects that affect our rights serve our purpose better. I do not need to announce every time I object to "Dear Colleague," that I am an MRA, part of the red pill ingesting MRM.

Pierce and Steve give us a sterling example of issues centered activism at The False Rape Society. I even get mention there of a "False Rape Activist," of which I am inordinately proud. And, they are correct. I am a false rape activist. But that is just one part of what I do, and more importantly, one part of what is needed. The rest, the entire scope of all things combined, is a need to address the rights of men and boys.

And the moment I change the rhetoric to minimize that fact, to make the idea of men's rights more palatable, then I am failing to help society develop a taste for which it is long overdue to acquire.

Is it not just more of the social and ideological programming to sugar coat our own identity, or dilute it with PC labels and obfuscating rhetoric? Isn't that just blue pill shame come back to sedate us into acquiescence?

I have no reservation about it. My name is Paul Elam and I am proud to be a men's rights activist. And I am proud to have created this forum, where growing numbers of men and women call themselves the same.

Growth, in the end, is all we need. And that is undoubtedly happening, for all the right reasons, the primary of which is that we need to advocate for justice for men and boys, something the world is stripping away each and every day.

S4M Radio: Meet Daddy Justice!

Dr. Tara J. Palmatier · 12 December 2011 · Archived copy · Original

[box type="alert" icon="none"]

Shrink4Men Radio is back this Monday, December 12, 2011 at 9pm EST with your host, Dr. Tara J. Palmatier, and special guest, Ben Vonderheide aka Daddy Justice.

Recently, Mr. Vonderheide and his video camera exposed the violence, bigotry, sexism, arrogance and hypocrisy of NOW attorney, vice president of Legal Momentun (a syndicate of over 2,000 domestic violence organizations), and VAWA chief counsel and DV spokesperson, Lisalyn R. Jacobs. Ms. Jacobs physically attacked Mr. Vonderheide in the hallway of the U.S. Senate outside of the VAWA judiciary hearing. Jacobs has since been charged and arraigned for her violent crime.

Mr. Vonderheide will discuss his brand of in your face activism and dogged commitment to exposing the corruption of U.S. Family Courts, the dishonest, hate-fueled, feminist driven and privately and publicly funded multibillion dollar Domestic Violence Industry, the multibillion dollar spousal support and child support industry, and much more.

Please tune in to hear how one man is fighting to make a difference in the lives of men, women and children. The telephone lines will be open (+1 310 388 9709). Hope you can make it!

SHOW PAGE

[/box]

AVfM Radio tonight: Agent Orange

Paul Elam · 13 December 2011 · Archived copy · Original

[box icon="none"]

As the men's rights community scours over volumes of information just released regarding the hateful and often illegal online activities of radical feminist ideologues, it begs for a special edition of AVfM Radio; one like you have never heard before.

Tonight at 8:00 Central Time, John the Other and I will be joined, first by AVfM News Director Robert O'Hara, who just blew the lid on this almost incomprehensible story, and then by Agent Orange himself, the operative that infiltrated the Radfem group and gathered a library of data on these individuals and their hateful agenda.

The regular show schedule is off tonight. No music, no commercial parodies, and no news broadcast. Tonight, the show is the news, from start to finish.

Join is, as we continue the FTSU on the program.

SHOW PAGE

[/box]

The SCUM connection

Paul Elam · 15 December 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Due to our recent coverage of events that have transpired in Sweden, many AVfM readers have had their memories refreshed about Valerie Solanas and the SCUM Manifesto. The book by the late feminist who attempted the murder of artist Andy Warhol is labeled as extreme by so called moderate feminists, but it seems to be enjoying a nostalgic resurgence in the mainstream feminist community.

It also appears there is growing evidence of a connection between SCUM proponents and Radfem Hub, as well as their plans (and current activity) to influence law and culture with a hate driven agenda. The trail is a bit complicated, but discernible and should become more clear as evidence is continuing to come in.

It will be very helpful to read Robert O'Hara's breaking expose on Radfem Hub in preparation for this information.

Between September 23-25th, 2011, two members of the Radfem Hub and Radfem Forum, Danielle Elina Pynnonen (Allecto) and her partner, Big Brother UK 5 contestant Kat "Kitten Pinder (Amazon Mancrusher) organized and hosted a three day feminist conference in Perth Australia that they called the 'SCUM Conference'. They billed it as:

[box type="download" icon="none"]"THRILL SEEKING FEMALES UNITE! Life in this society being, at best, an utter bore, this THREE DAY RADICAL FEMINIST CONFERENCE is for civic-minded, responsible, thrill-seeking females who want to overthrow the government, eliminate the money system, institute complete automation and destroy the male sex. Workshops, guest presenters and social activities, plus a space to celebrate and re-member the life and work of Valerie Solanas and other radical feminists."[/box]

As you've seen in previous articles, the people that frequent the Radfem Hub and forum have often contemplated and discussed gendercide (mass murder), sexual mutilation, advocating the targeted abortion of male fetuses and infanticide – murdering newborn males.

Valerie Solanas, the woman for which this group has almost worship-like admiration, was the author of the SCUM Manifesto, never made it a secret about her feelings towards men. She wrote:

> "Life in this society being, at best, an utter bore and no aspect of society being at all relevant to women, there remains to civic-minded, responsible, thrill-seeking females only to overthrow the government, eliminate the money system, institute complete automation and destroy the male sex."

In another passage she wrote:

> "Retaining the male has not even the dubious purpose of reproduction. The male is a biological accident: the y(male) chromosome is an incomplete x(female) chromosome, that is, has an incomplete set of chromosomes. In other words, the male is an incomplete female, a walking abortion, aborted at the gene stage. To be male is to be deficient, emotionally limited; maleness is a deficiency disease and males are emotional cripples."

Her writing seems to be in lock step with the very disturbing writings we have witnessed recently on the Radfem Hub and forum. Many would dismiss these people as mentally unstable and their words as the disturbed ranting of a few, no-name, sadistic people. This isn't the case, as many of these women are in positions of responsibility and influence in the real world.

But what of the guest speakers for the conference – the individuals who also celebrate the life, work and virulence of Valerie Solanas? The ugly truth is that not only are these lecturers well known professors, authors and activists, but they also run in the same online circles with the same women that advocate a desire for violence and death towards men and boys. They are part of the same philosophical sisterhood.

While many of those who spoke have been smart enough to not talk about such ugly things as we have seen here online, (at least nothing that can be traced back to them) they are friends with these same groups of women on Facebook, guest post articles on the Radfem Hub and even comment on some of these women's individual blogs.

Julie Anne LeComte on Canberra, Australia, the owner and administrator of the forum where most of the worst hate is espoused, goes by the online names of Rain Lewis, Rainsinger, and Raindancer.

A quick look at her Facebook page, as well as online forum discussions, that she, as well as Danielle Pynnonen (Allecto) and Kat Pinder (Amazon Mancrusher) personally know many of these professors, authors and activists.

Take a look at the speakers and some of the attendees of the 2008 Brisbane Feminist Conference. You also might ask who the speakers were at the 2011 Perth SCUM conference that they would openly associate with people that express a desire for murder and child abuse.

Here are some of them, with their self-styled promotional bios.

Susan Hawthorne PhD

"Susan Hawthorne is the author of six collections of poetry, a novel, political theory and a quiz book. She is an Adjunct Professor in the Writing Program at James Cook University, Townsville. In 2009, Susan was an Asialink Literature Resident at the University of Madras, Chennai. She is also a publisher and Director of Spinifex Press and played a leading role among independent Australian publishers in innovative and eBook publishing."

James Cook University is the institution where Michael Flood, the well-known pro-feminist professor teaches.

Dr. Abigail Bray

"Dr. Abigail Bray is a research fellow at the Social Justice Research Centre at Edith Cowan University. She has published widely in leading international academic journals on anorexia, child sexual abuse, moral panics, and child pornography. She is the author of Hélène Cixous: Writing and Sexual Difference (2004) and Body Talk: A Power Guide for Girls (2005) with Elizabeth Reid Boyd"

Melinda Tankard Reist

"Melinda Tankard Reist is a Canberra author, speaker, commentator, blogger and advocate for women and girls. Melinda has just initiated a new grassroots campaigning movement called Collective Shout. It aims to expose corporations, advertisers and marketers who objectify women and sexualize girls to sell products and services. In demand as a speaker, Melinda is named in Who's Who of Australian Women and the World Who's Who of Women."

Dr. Betty McLellan

"A psychotherapist with over 20 years experience, Betty McLellan is the author of HELP! I'm Living with a Man Boy, which has been translated in 12 languages. She is also the author of Overcoming Anxiety (1992) and Beyond Psychoppression (1995). She believes in the importance of honesty in relationships and works with women and men in individual and couple settings and facilitates groups for women and men separately and then together. She lives in Townsville, Queensland."

Dr. Gail Dines

"Gail Dines is professor of sociology and women's studies at Wheelock College. The author of two previous books and a regular commentator on TV and radio, Dines has been covered in Newsweek, Time, USA Today, the New York Times, Boston Globe, and Philadelphia Inquirer. She lives in Brookline, Massachusetts."

Spider Redgold aka Spiderlily Redgold

Linkedin

"2005 Finalist Global Enterprise Architecture Excellence Award Zachmann Institute for Framework Advancement (http://www.zifa.org) 2004 Elected Board member responsible for Education and certification Global Enterprise Architecture Organization (http://www.geao.org) 2003 included on the Pioneers Women's Hall of Fame Quilt for Contribution to Women and Technology http://www.pioneerwomen.com.au/quiltsigs.htm

1999 Elected Board member and Vice President for one of Queensland's leading industry organisations – Women In Information Technology (WIT) Inc [1999-2002] 1998 – finalist (and runner up) in the Australian Institute of Management QLD Innovator of the Year Awards. 1996 Keynote Presenter at South Korean Summit on "Women and Informationalization of the workforce"

And some of the other speakers?

Christine Sitka

Christine is a well know writer, speaker and activist in Australia who works with the Victorian Women's Liberation and Lesbian Feminist Archives Inc.

Ryl Harrison

Ryl is a PhD Canidate at James Cook University in Townsville Australia

Samantha Berg

Samantha is the National Coordinator for the feminist organization Stop Porn Culture.

And of course:

Julie Anne LeComte (aka Rain Lewis/Rainsinger/Rainsong of Radfem Hub)

Julie Anne LeComte, the owner and operator of the Radfem forums is also the Communications Coordinator for the French-Australian Chamber of Commerce. She is recognized as a nationwide leader for Australian women's rights activism.

In 2006, Dr. Browyn Winter, Associate Professor at the University of Sydney, wrote a piece on White Ribbon Day for the Australian website On Line Opinion. At the end of the piece, Dr. Winter, who is Facebook friends with Danielle Pynnonen (Allecto) as well as LeComte, listed who she felt were the most prominent feminists. LeComte was named.

And the question remains whether some of the other names listed are connected to the group of radical feminists who frequently discuss how to reduce the male population through sexually selected murder, or just kill men and boys for the pure pleasure of it.

It is clear that the rabbit hole of radical feminists in positions of public trust does not just stop with just these women. More on that later, but I'll leave you all with a question; When the Australian government wants input on new legislation concerning sexual assault, domestic violence or special assistance for women only, who do you think they turn to for expert opinions? I will answer that, and much more, in the next article.

Site problems

Paul Elam · 15 December 2011 · Archived copy · Original

[box icon=”none”]

Last night there were technical difficulties with the site. An attempt by customer service to correct matter resulted in more problems. We had to resort to a full restoration of the site based on the most recent backup available, but this still resulted in a loss of some content.

The site, minus the lost content, should now be fully operational again. We apologize for any inconvenience. PE

[/box]

Artistry Against Misandry

Paul Elam · 16 December 2011 · Archived copy · Original

[box type="note" icon="none"]

Guest post from Jade Michael.

Tired of misandry in pop culture media? Sick of hearing about "Womyn in Music"? Do you write songs that stand up to Feminism and expose it to be the hate movement it has turned into? How about poetry? Short stories? Spoken words? Have you snapped any compelling photography lately? Does your artistic material deal with men's issues? Do you refuse to pander to a primarily female demographic? If so, would you be interested in an MRA artistic collective willing to feature your work?

Search no more!

It is with great pride I announce the codification of a new MRM website, Artistry Against Misandry, which will serve to feature the awareness-raising music, spoken words, creative writing and graphic art of MRAs. If your creativity is your strength, let it be your voice. If you're the type of person who expresses himself/herself best through artistic avenues vs. blogging, then this is perfect for you.

For all of you writers out there, fiction or non-fiction stories, as well as poetry or stream of consciousness writing focusing on the good in men or the cultural adversities we face, would make great submissions.

Musicians, you share my greatest passion and I invite you all to submit any MRA/pro-male related material you have, for free download. Compilation CDs featuring your work may be produced and distributed in the future!

Photography, spoken words, graphic art, short films and PSAs are needed as well. This could be a great outlet for all of you amateur filmmakers out there. (Some songs will be uploaded without a corresponding video so I am hoping to find creative minds to supply strong visual images for a greater impact.)

If you have writing you would like to have turned into a spoken word or lyrics you would like turned into a song, please don't be shy and submit these as well. I will write, produce and record all backing music for those selected. This will take time and monetary donations but it is something I promise to do with the utmost respect for your work/vision.

This website will be a place where MRAs can go to express themselves in positive, artistic ways so other MRAs (potential and otherwise) can view thought-provoking material. Being an MRA can be daunting at times, with all of the uphill battles and steady barrage of misunderstandings thrown at us. I hope to offer a "decompression chamber" in which we can be reinvigorated. Any pro-male art that inspires and esteems us will be considered for posting.

I hope to have all initial material (my own included) ready by a release date of February 15, 2012, so if you have ideas rolling around in your head but no outlet for them, now is the time to get to work! Please submit work to info@artistryagainstmisandry.com. Your help in making this a viable, visible network will be greatly appreciated.

Thank you for your kind attention.

Artistry Against Misandry

[/box]

Radfem Hub: the underbelly of a hate movement

Robert O'Hara · 16 December 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Note: This article is also available in Portuguese.

Imagine that you are a fly on the wall of a private meeting. The attendees include a legislative lobbyist, an arts council member, a political writer, a bestselling novelist, a communications assistant for a national chamber of commerce, a web developer, a special education teacher and a child care worker.

What do you imagine you would hear in that meeting? Maybe plans to improve children's education, especially those with special needs? Perhaps a call to mobilize resources to ensure school kids are not attending class hungry, or that they are safe from abuse and exploitation? Maybe you would hear concerns about the quality of education and school budgets during the global recession, or other problems faced by the upcoming and developmental generation of world citizens.

Well, one such meeting has been happening, conducted by well-placed individuals who fill the job descriptions listed above. But educational and welfare improvements were not the topics they discussed. The agenda of the meeting was the shared desire to abuse and murder children, to trap people in wooden buildings and blow them up, to throw children from, through, windows, to pursue infanticide and forced eugenics, and to seriously entertain and secretly pursue ways to exterminate half the population.

If you are waiting for a punch line, don't.

Radfem Hub (Radfem is short for Radical Feminist), is a website featuring articles from well-known activists, many of whom are in significant real-world positions of political and social influence. The site has been the focus of some attention since Simon and Schuster novelist Pamela O'Shaughnessy, posting under the name Vliet Tiptree, penned an article there advocating human scientific experimentation and forced eugenics, in order to "extirpate" certain aspects of masculinity.

The publishers of Radfem Hub frequently profess and promote philosophical solidarity with the late Valerie Solanas, author of The Scum Manifesto, a violent ideologue who advocated the extermination of men. She also gunned down artist Andy Warhol, maiming him for life.

Some well-known figures are closely associated with the Radfem Hub. Loretta Kemsley, publisher of Moon Dance Magazine, which was given an award by the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization, is listed as having a "board presence" on her public profile there. Sheila Jeffreys, feminist author and professor at The University of Melbourne has a public presence there and frequently provides articles. Julie Bindle, author and columnist with The Guardian, a well read newspaper in the U.K., has also posted there. (see Wikipedia Links Below).

Underneath Radfem's veneer of social consciousness, however, and hosted on the same website, is a private forum; the underbelly and engine room for the site as a whole. The discussions there, assumed to be out of the public eye, are virulent and hateful; often peppered with calls for violence. For a long time, they have been successful and maintaining both secrecy and anonymity. Until now.

Over the past several months an operative ,who will only be identified as Agent Orange, has successfully infiltrated the group and has collected trove of information, including over a hundred screen shots that document what can only be called the most shocking evidence of extreme hatred in the feminist movement seen to date.

Not only have these conversations been documented with screen shots but Agent Orange, with the help of an investigator, has tracked down the identities of several of these individuals. The confidence level of the information is compelling, and more is on the way.

Here is a portion of the individuals identified, along with some of their statements.

Danielle Pynnonen (screen name "Allecto"), a child care worker whose employer is unknown;

click to enlarge

Kat Pinder (screen name "Amazon Mancrusher"), a community development coordinator for the City of Perth in Australia and former U.K. Game show Big Brother contestant;

Click to enlarge

Isabelle Moreira (screen name "Izzie"), a web developer in Curitiba, Brazil;

Click to enlarge

Mary Syrett (screen name "Mary Sunshine"), a writer and member of the City of Kingston Arts Council in Ontario, Canada;

Click to enlarge

Julie LeComte (screen name "Rain"), a communications assistant for the French-Australian Chamber of Commerce and Industry in Australia;

Click to enlarge

Lorraine Allen (screen name "White Tiger"), a special education teacher at The Center for Discovery Hurleyville, New York;

Click to enlarge

Laila Namdarkhan (screen name "yabawife"), a well known feminist activist who was instrumental in passing legislation in the U.K. Regarding the mental health of women in prisons;

Click to enlarge

And of course Pam O'Shaughnesey (screen name changed from "Vliet Tipree" to "karma"), an established writer, publisher and lawyer. In this post, the complete depravity of O'shaughnessy's ideology shines though with a clear willingness for mass murder as a "last resort."

Top profile pm quote

karma

Post subject: Re: The Fem Matrix

Posted: Thu Oct 20, 2011 4:11 pm

Journeywoman

Joined: Tue Mar 29, 2011 7:28 pm
Posts: 75

I like it a lot, Luckynki, I agree basically with your analysis, though I have a different emphasis so far in the evolutionary biology stuff I'm looking at. You're more radical than I ATM, though who knows where I'll be in a year - but your proposal to exterminate the male entirely a la Solanas is to me more of a last resort. I would like to hear more about your thoughts on this as they develop. I sense that both you and I are non-biological scientists - but I'm pretty good at wading through scientific journals and getting the gist and I bet you are too. We can get quite a ways, is what I'm saying. We should only do this in these closed threads, obviously.

I read about a scifi writer - I'm trying to remember her book - who did a novel about a woman geneticist, I think it was, who discovers that men are going to die off a lot faster than we're hearing. It's a Y chromosome thing but I haven't read it yet, just reviews. The novel is about the hostility and rage she engenders, etc. Anyway, to prepare herself she worked intensively with a woman geneticist, so the book came off authoritative in many ways. I'll post the novel name as soon as I can find it.

I assume you object that lowering testosterone levels would not necessarily end the oppression. You may be right, I'm trying to figure that out, in which case your theory will look better than my line of thought.

I think you are right about how the violence, domination, and hierarchy has been heightened and tightened over the past ten thousand years. I have just

Click to enlarge

These screen shots represent just a sample the images and other data that document real people engaging in what can only be described as an orgy of gender hatred. What's more, these are not individuals who live on the fringes of society. They are people who hold public offices, positions in academia and the media. Their voices and ideas are heard in legislatures all around the world and even in the chambers of the United Nations.

In the very near future, the complete body of data collected by Agent Orange will be made available to the public at large. This means that anyone interested learning more about these people and publicizing their own analyses on their blogs, Youtube channels or other media will be able to do so. It also means that interested members of the general public can voice their concerns regarding these individuals to the press, as well as anywhere these individuals may pose a direct threat, particularly to the welfare of children.

For a long time men's advocates and others have tried to point out to politicians and the public that feminism was, at its heart, a movement rooted in hate. Those contesting this point of view claim that radical feminism isn't recognized as legitimate by most feminists and that radical feminists aren't taken seriously. This new information demonstrates those assumptions are false.

This data, and the mountains of it to soon follow, reveal that radical feminists with bigoted, violent leanings are thoroughly entrenched in the media, governmental and education systems worldwide, and that they are exerting their influence to further legislation and policy that reflects not only their hatred of men and boys, but a desire to put themselves in a position to inflict as much harm on them as possible.

I will be joining Paul Elam on AVfM Radio tomorrow night, when we will be speaking live with Agent Orange, who has a great deal more information and perspective on what has been happening at Radfem Hub. Another surprise guest will be appearing.

Sources:

http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Moondance_Magazine

http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Sheila_Jeffreys

http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Julie_Bindel

http://radicalhub.wordpress.com/

Danielle Pynnonen: Your child, her rapist

John Hembling (JtO) · 17 December 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Danielle Pynnonen is a child care worker participating at the feminist website Radfem Hub, under the username "Allecto." Of the threads captured by the MRA: Agent Orange, the one beginning with "I'll just rape you" was Pynnonen's. This shocking item of dialog was attributed to a 9 year old boy under Pynnonen's professional care as a child care worker.

The boy apparently made this remark after being manipulated by a girl his own age into stating his affection for her, and having been rebuffed after his admission.

According to Pynnonen, who claims to have brought the incident up with her professional peers and supervisors, "I was told in no uncertain terms that Ms. Harrassment Victim was sexually precocious and like [sic] to draw attention to herself and it was her fault that this was happening to her and that she was in the early stages of being experimental with her sexual power over boys." This is Pynnonen's characterization of what she was told, and which she followed with "Fuck that for fucked up shit!!!!!"

The child-care worker's reactionary rejection of her supervisor's alleged explanation appears to be based on a failure by her bosses to classify a 9 year old boy as a predator, and to attribute developing manipulative skill to a 9 year old girl. This evaluation being at odds with Pynnonen's preferred dogma of the innate evil of males. Even outside the field of child care, it's widely understood that girls develop socially ahead of boys, so even allowing for the bias of a self identified radical feminist, Pynnonen's outrage is hard to grasp.

What's harder still to address is the attitude of a professional child care worker towards a pre-adolescent boy whose behavior she finds unacceptable. Why is a statement by a nine year boy such a source of terror and outrage to an adult? Why is his objectionable statement not simply a matter for the gentle correction that professional childcare workers are called on to provide on a routine basis for boys and girls?

Another commenter in this thread, Lorraine Allen, who is a special education teacher at The Center for Discovery Hurleyville, New York who blogs as "White Tiger", remarked that she would like to throw this boy out a window without opening it.

> Sigghh… my gut reaction to this was to mentally pick him up and throw him out the window – without bothering to open it first. Nine years old and already ruined for life by the older males in his sphere of influence.[1]

Obviously, there are a number of problems in the commentary of these women, whose careers consist of the care and education of children. That these problems, so obvious to a layman, are nowhere addressed by professional caregivers and educators necessitates some tedious recitation of the obvious.

That a 9 year old boy should suggest rape as a possible solution to un-returned affection suggests very strongly that he learned this from an adult. As a commentator to this drama, I can guess from whom.

Here's a hint: He's being raised at least partially by a child-care worker obsessed with the radical-feminist dogma of masculine evil and feminine victimhood. Since some of the readers of this article will be radical feminists, I'll bludgeon this point a little more. For you deliberately obtuse fembots – this little boy probably learned that rape was a male-normal response to unreturned affection from Danielle Pynnonen, the same child-care worker in whose charge he is placed.

Danielle Pynnonen, the child care worker who, throughout the thread at Radfem Hub refers to her young charge as "Mr Rape Threat." This is a nine year old boy who almost certainly learned about rape from Pynnonen, and given a free hand to hold his mind – would likely turn him into a future rapist. Given her distorted view of little boys and maleness in general, how could she do otherwise?

This is also why for Pynnonen, he's not to be corrected or taught a more well adjusted response – but punished with great fury, and in Pynnonen's preference, done great harm.

[box type="alert" icon="none"]"RULE ONE: never say anything to hurt the poor widdle[sic] boy's feelings. […] RULE TWO: never ever threaten the widdle[sic] boys! These are the future rulerz of the world. Don't hurt the sons of the king!"[/box]

That was Pynonnen's explanation to another radical feminist whose suggested response was to threaten the nine year old boy with sexual dismemberment.

> "if you don't apologize to that girl right now, I'll just cut off your tiny little pecker."

This remark came from an individual who comments at Redfem Hub under the username, Bonobobabe.

Rather than Bonobobabe's presumed reason; that it would be impolitic to injure the son of a king, I'll assume than a small fraction of my readers are flat-out retarded. So for those mental defectives from Radfem Hub, I'll offer another reason. You don't injure children (or adults, for that matter) because it's morally indefensible to injure children. Let's take that logic a step further. If you're a child care worker, at your place of employment, being paid to care for children, then injuring the children is the opposite of doing your job. Am I going too fast for anyone here?

If you're still with me after those wild leaps of logic, try this on for size: We abhor individuals who harm children, and put people who harm children in jail because protecting children from harm is one of the basic, fundamental functions of human communities. This is part of what makes us "social animals."We take care of each other, particularly of children, because the biological drive to protect children is part of our species basic survival programming.

I'll wait here for a minute to let the rad fems catch up. I hope I didn't hurt anybody's head.

That Bonobobabe is not a child care worker means her clearly expressed will to do harm to infants has lesser opportunity for expression than Danielle Pynonnen or Lorraine Allen, but this is very small relief.

The incandescent, violent hatred of these women towards male children exceeds anything I've ever encountered. Indeed, this self documented desire to inflict harm on children would appear to be a good place to start investigation of employment histories. The enormity and depth of this sickness might be new to western law, requiring a new framework to address. Laws used to bring to heel hate organizations like the KKK may be inadequate to address this particular brand of pathology. Investigation of unsolved child abuse or infanticide cases in connection with Pynonnen or Allen's past employment does not seem unreasonable.

It's also important to note that these individuals advocating dismemberment and murder of children are not alone or isolated. They're educated, employed, connected and established "respectable" people of society's mainstream. Dismissing their violent and hateful fantasies as the ravings of crazies ignores that they are, on outward appearances – normal people with nice clothes, mortgages and who drive late-model cars. It's just that they spend their free time sharing fantasies with others who are obsessed with harming children.

In the past year, a number of high-profile male-targeting mutilations and infanticides have reality-checked the myth of women's innate innocence. Despite this, our society continues to indulge in an increasingly pronounced denial of reality when it comes to female offenders. The citizen journalism exposing a developing will to engage in murder and infanticide may take months of repetition and publication of details before mainstream media, and more importantly; the parents of children under these monster's care, take serious notice.

For the men and women participating in this project, this will not be a hindrance. For radical feminists ideologues the age of comfortable anonymity in pursuit of violence and murder is over, you have Pam O'Shaughnessy to thank for the recent exposure. We will continue to document and publish the murderous, infanticidal, and genocidal pursuits of your hate-movement until it is extinct.

Thank you for your kind attention.

[1] http://www.avoiceformen.com/wp-content/uploads/sites/2/2011/12/Ill-just-rape-you.pdf

[editors note: We were advised by a reader of the following petition demanding that Danielle Pynnonen remove herself from the care of children. We are posting it here for your convenience and hope you will take a moment to sign it. Thank you. PE]

Change.org|Start an Online Petition »

An open letter to NOW President Terry O'Neill

Paul Elam · 18 December 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Dear Ms. O'Neill,

As the president of the National Organization for Women, you are in the national spotlight as a spokesperson and representative for feminist minded individuals across the nation, and arguably the planet.

It has long been asserted by many feminist icons that the ideals you support are rooted in the desire for equal opportunity and equal treatment under the law for women everywhere. Many self-proclaimed feminists have rejected the charge that feminism is driven by animosity toward men and the desire to foster female supremacy.

As a men's activist who has long sought to bring attention to issues adversely affecting men and boys, I have frequently been instructed by feminists that my personal perception of feminism is off base. I have been told repeatedly that feminism is about, and only about, equality. I have also been informed on many occasions that feminist goals are ones that will also benefit men because they foster and embrace a more just and equal society. I would like to extend the opportunity to lend merit and credibility to those ideas.

Recently, information was made public about members of a feminist website known as Radfem Hub. This internet portal is one that hosts articles and opinions by such feminist notables as scholar Sheila Jeffreys and columnist Julie Bindle.

But a private forum on that site, run with the clear support and knowledge of its ownership, was discovered to contain frequent and egregious examples of hate speech that can only be considered to constitute a culture of hate. The discussion there included the promotion of murder, mass murder, both of children and adult males, eugenics, sexual mutilation and other depraved, criminal acts. All of these ideas were furthered under the banner of feminism, the cause for which you work so actively.

These were not fringe radicals residing on the periphery of your movement. They were qualified individuals, holding important, often prestigious positions in their respective communities.

These include Pamela O'Shaughnessy, a bestselling novelist for Simon and Schuster, Kat Pinder, a community development coordinator for the City of Perth in Australia, Mary Syrett, a writer and member of the City of Kingston Arts Council in Ontario, Canada, Julie LeComte, a communications assistant for the French-Australian Chamber of Commerce and Industry in Australia, Lorraine Allen, a special education teacher at The Center for Discovery Hurleyville, New York, and Laila Namdarkhan, who was instrumental in passing legislation in the U.K. Regarding the mental health of women in prisons.

All of these individuals were positively identified and their statements advocating criminal violence in support of feminist goals were documented. You can read the entire overview HERE.

This presents a very unfortunate and disturbing situation, but also a clear opportunity that may provide the silver lining to this cloud.

It gives you, Ms. O'Neill, a nationally recognized and credible authority on feminism and its agenda, the opportunity to help define what feminism is about to those who currently question it – and to distance yourself and your cause from these hateful individuals.

So I am writing to ask you, on behalf of the many thousands that will hear your answer, what is your position on this type of speech in the name of your cause? Do you reject and condemn these individuals and their statements, publicly and without reservation?

Do you plan to issue a statement demonstrating your objection to calls for violence in the name of feminist goals? Or, conversely, do you support these individuals, by action or omission, and their desire to inflict harm and death as a way to fulfill their political objectives?

Your answers to these questions will settle any lingering doubt about the state of modern feminism, just as your failure to answer will do the same.

Kind regards,

Paul Elam
A Voice for Men

[Addendum: This letter was originally addressed to Kim Gandy, who is the former president of NOW. Unfortunately, NOW had not updated her profile on their website and still had her bio saying she was president of the organization.]

Registered offender Victoria Haigh gets 3 years

John Hembling (JtO) · 18 December 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Victoria Haigh has finally met a consequence.[1] It may be the first time in her life that she's actually been held accountable for her actions, and consequently, she might find it a puzzling experience. On December 18, 2011 Judge Peter Kelson sentenced Haigh to 3 years in prison – with the comment that it was a 'completely unrealistic hope' that she would comply with any court order.

The former race-horse trainer mounted a false smear campaign against her ex husband as a pedophile, including a petition at her daughter's school naming him as a "pedophile father."

Haigh also coached her daughter to accuse the innocent man, had previously broken non contact orders, as well as committing assaults on her ex husband. She also enlisted a white knight in the person of the Earl of Huntington, William Edward Robin Hood Hastings-Bass. Yes, that's really his name. Hastings-Bass wrote a letter to the court on Haigh's behalf, stating that her fabrication of a history of sex abuse by the father was "totally out of character."

Judge Kelson criticized the Earl, saying: 'He is gravely misguided about [Heigh's] attitude to the British justice system. It could not be more disrespectful.'

This disrespect for the courts, however, is appropriate. In fact, it is a disrespect shared by a substantial fraction of women in a society in which the justice system does not hold them accountable.

Calls for the complete closure of women's prisons in England have met with widespread support, based on a bizarre idea that female offenders should be protected from consequence, and thus, their families should not suffer.[2] Aside from the suffering of their unchecked criminal behavior, obviously.

Although women have traditionally received lighter sentences than men for criminal offences – this was apparently not enough, and a growing movement calls for the elimination of prison for women altogether. Proponents of this movement advocate a focus on counselling, subsidized housing and education as alternatives. According to a report from a group calling themselves the Women's Justice Taskforce: Women should not be sent to prison and should instead serve community sentences.

The Chief Constable of Devon and Cornwall Police Stephen Otter, a member of the Prison Reform Trust which led the taskforce, said the case for keeping women out of prison was "very compelling."

"There's very clear evidence that this works for women but it also works for their family," he told BBC Radio 4's Today Programme.
"Two-thirds of women sentenced to less than 12 months in jail are re-convicted within a year of their release," he added, with no apparent irony.

In this social climate, why would women feel anything but contempt for a justice system which continues to demonstrate a deep commitment to enabling their criminality?

Opponents of this school of thought argue that a continued failure to hold women accountable as responsible adults will produce two parallel outcomes. The first is a society in which females experience no pressure to mature into adults, and consequently remain permanent children through their lifetimes. This is arguably an ongoing phenomenon with half a century of history of created human misery and damage. It's escalation would follow the formal elimination of women's prison as a consequence of criminal offense traditionally handled by incarceration.

A second and more dramatic consequence of increased non-accountability in criminal offence by women is predicted to be retributive violence. Human societies have always adapted to changes, and the current formalized system of redress of grievance through the courts provides a method removing the need for informal redress in more primitive societies. When there is no justice system, people have historically created their own. Resolution of dispute by direct violence is as old as the human race, and is, in the option of this article's author, a considerably worse option than sexually equal human accountability in a court of law. Apparently, as a society, we may have to have to re-learn this the hard way.

However, the incarceration of Vicky Haigh appears to indicate we haven't gone full-retard, just yet. That she'll likely serve only a fraction of that time indicates the continued power of the pussy-pass. But looking on the bright side, being only 41 years old, when she walks free, she'll still be young and energetic enough to kill somebody. So there's always that to look forward to.

[1] http://www.mirror.co.uk/news/top-stories/2011/08/23/racehorse-trainer-vicky-haigh-coached-her-daughter-to-falsely-claim-her-dad-was-a-paedophile-high-court-rules-115875-23365076/

[2] http://www.dailymail.co.uk/news/article-1394739/Short-jail-terms-women-axed-prisons-closed-report-says.html

Hugo Schwyzer: hate finds a home boy

Mortimer Vertias · 19 December 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Hugo Schwyzer has a bit of an obsession with the infamous feminist blogger Factcheckme (FCM), who also doubles as an admin of the Radfem Hub. Now, I don't know, but if I were Hugo, a Professor of Gender Studies at Pasadena City College, and if I wanted to remain a reputable writer and activist for the feminist community, I'd steer far away from someone like FCM. She has gotten a reputation for being a hostile and belligerent simpleton, who has made no secret of her hate for men. Oh, did I mention she often advocates the abortion of male fetuses and the systematic reduction of the male population?

[image]
Click to enlarge
But her "reproductive solution" hasn't stopped Hugo from obsessing about her.

[image]
Click to enlarge
No sir, forget about her desire to "dispatch male babies at birth idea." Indeed, the "mainstream" feminist Schwyzer actually feels that FCM can teach us something useful.

> "Radicals like Julian, Factcheckme, Andrea Dworkin, Robert Jensen, and Andrea Smith are great "cover-pullers," rousing from slumber those of us who sometimes like to hide from the reality of the oppression all around us. That doesn't mean that their criticisms are always right, or that their solutions are wise. It does mean that their perspective is useful and deserves to be taken seriously."

And part of FCM's perspective is?

[image]
Click to enlarge
Schwyzer stumbles on, trying to find common ground with FCM and other radical feminists, attempting to deliver a "serious response" to her criticism of men in general and men teaching women's studies.

> "That's a criticism I've heard many times over the years, and it's a serious one that deserves a serious response. There are three parts to FCM's critique of men teaching women's studies, and it may be helpful to answer them in turn"

[image]
Click to enlarge
Where does her biological solution to us genetically mentally ill men come into play?

After almost a year of writing various articles on FCM's viewpoint, it seems Schwyzer has almost given up on FCM, but:

> "Though I don't think FCM and I could have much of a conversation (a civil exchange requires a mutual recognition of good faith and legitimacy, and she's made it clear she doesn't think I possess either), her views are not unique to her and deserve a response.
>
> I'd also like to make it clear that as off-putting as her rhetoric is, FCM is making some very important points that deserve responses, even if actual engagement is unpromising."

And one of FCM's very important points?

[image]

Click to enlarge
Huh, now where does one begin a response to someone who is “more than willing” to consider the end of humanity to end her idea of oppression?

Jeffrey Dahmer might have had a few ideas and perspectives that some may have considered worthy of examination as well, that is if he wasn’t a complete psychopathic serial killer who kept body parts in his refrigerator for eating at a later date. Schwyzer, despite whatever good intentions he had, is not only enabling a disturbed and potentially violent monster like FCM, he is enabling and promoting her views to a larger audience. And Schwyzer is hardly alone with “mainstream” feminists fawning over radical feminist bloggers who often advocate gendercide and murder. Indeed, there are several others as you will see in the coming days.

Hugo Schwyzer should know better, and should have never given any type of attention to someone as disturbed and as deranged as Factcheckme (Yes Mindy, you are not a secret anymore). Forget about MRA’s or feminists for a second, Schwyzer has lost all credibility as a professor or even as a decent human being for allowing this filth a stage of any sort.

Reaching out to your fellow man

James Huff · 20 December 2011 · Archived copy · Original

I feel that it is important to address a topic that we don't often touch upon here at AVFM. I say "don't often," because while there are sources on the subject, we rarely bring them up. We get lost in a deluge of stories of abuse, blatant hatred, institutionalized misandry – all the evils of the world somehow find a way to our doorstep here at AVFM, and into our hearts and minds.

We all respond a little differently to these things on the screen. We all write in much of the same vein.

"That's horrible!"
"What non-sense."
"Let's do something about it!"
"We can fix it if we do x, y, and z."

This is the norm for us, indeed, a human norm when you look across the spectrum of human interaction. Just because it's on the screen does not make it any less real than if it was right in front of us. Granted, we are displaced by the events (time and space have a way of altering the perception the events we describe here) but in the end it is all the same.

We deal with mass quantities of bullshit. I'm not going to gloss it over. It's tough. It's like our own little war zone…and we see body parts flying everywhere each and every time we read a new posted story about this, that, or the other. Yes, I am speaking figuratively, but once again we internalize these horrors just as surely as if we were the ones involved. Somehow the situation becomes our own personal war. We have hundreds of them every month.

Sometimes these things keep us up at night. We worry about what might have been, for better or worse – or what could be happening now, which leaves us sweating – or about our own futures, which usually ends up falling in the "worse" category rather than the "better". We resolve before we go to sleep to try again the next day to scream a little louder and a little longer at our enemies. We even begin to wonder in our heart of hearts if there is anyone out there trying to scream as loud as us.

We also have the added benefit of being involved. We are not blinded by the lies that have been heaped upon us time and time again. We know there is something wrong; something bigger than us as individuals. We have our daily lives; work, family, sometimes children – and for a few of us things like child support, travel for visitation, dealing with the ex, etc. Our lives away from the screen feel just as complicated as what stares us in the face every time we log in. We inundate ourselves not just with the maintenance and upkeep of survival, but also with a personal mission to be a voice in the darkness that is crying out for something pure and good to light the way, not just for us as individuals, but for all of us.

The effects of repeated exposure to such a lifestyle can only be likened to the hardships of battle.

There is no difference. Not in the hind-brain, so to speak. Some of us may have some perspective on the matter, having been in real battles before. Those are sometimes the hardier ones, if they learned to deal with what they have seen in a healthy way, and surprisingly they can also be the least hardy, because they see their past in just about everything they do. It wears you down, though, eventually. It will turn you into a mockery – a caricature of a human being – just another husked out empty bitter shell rife with depression, who feels as if the battle can never be won. No one is immune to this. We are only human after all.

There comes a point and time when you have to recognize this pattern inside yourself. All of a sudden, the new activities you have embarked upon to make the world seem a better place feels more like a job instead of a passion. You log in or tune in out of a habit of lifestyle rather than real personal choice. There comes a creeping sense that all your doing is walking over the same blasted landscape you walked over yesterday, and cannot see the progress you have made because it looks pretty much like it did the day before. You feel ineffectual, worthless in your task, and driven to distraction by the notion that there is no one who listens, and no one who cares.

The pattern continues. Your entire waking life becomes like the walking dead. You gird yourself for battle – knowing the routine – and it is automatic to you now. You may snap at others for perceived ignorance or perceived transgressions of some moral or honor code that hardly anyone knows because all the old faces are gone – dead from the war, or just having served their time and left for greener pastures. Others see in you the anger and bitterness that has turned that once proud soldier into a cold automaton – and you feel it. You know. It escapes you as to what you can do about it, but you, like many, simply fall farther into yourself.

To top it all off you tell yourself that you have no time for tears. “This is not the time.”, “I am still fighting, I can cry later,” and “This has nothing to do with my sadness,” are all the rote responses you keep telling yourself. But you are human – you still feel – and you try to find a way to make the pain go away in such a way that it doesn’t compromise this self-imposed mission or so it doesn’t compromise your lifestyle or it doesn’t compromise the team. Unfortunately, there are few ways to do this for long. Anything that you turn to is just a placebo for a very real problem. The problem remains but is now exacerbated by the escapist means you have adopted to deal with it.

You begin to make mistakes and you begin to alienate those around you. Eventually you may shut yourself inside the cold hole you have dug in your own heart, surround yourself with your vices and watch the lines on your face grow deeper and deeper day after day. You don’t feel the passion for the fight anymore. Your real life begins to falter. In the worst case your life may be snuffed out in loneliness and isolation.

Ask a real soldier. Ask a Vietnam veteran what they had to deal with inside their own minds. Ask an Iraqi veteran of the Second Battle of Fallujah or a combat veteran from the Battle of Kamdesh in Afghanistan. They will tell you stories, usually over a beer. They may even tell you how some of their friends fared. If they are a friend of yours, they may even cry over what they had to do, or what they saw done to others. Some of these guys have been able to move on with the proper coping mechanisms. I promise you almost all of them know someone in their unit who never recovered, and either committed suicide or lost their careers and/or family to one vice or another that they picked up to escape the pain.

My brothers and sisters, there are ways of recovering. As cliché as it sounds, the first step is admitting that we feel pain, and can no longer deal with it on our own. There are ways, even if it is a shoulder to cry on, or someone to hold us for one moment, or even to take us someplace new where the world is vibrant and alive for a while. Sometimes we need the help of those who have experience dealing with the pain of others, people who are willing to listen and provide some kind of perspective to our lives. Sometimes we look at holidays, or birthdays, or the anniversaries of days of significance in our lives and realize that we should not be alone, that we need that familiar warmth of just being human for a little while instead of another tool on the battlefield. Sometimes we just need to be told that our pain matters, and that it is okay to cry for ourselves as well as the world.

For those us who have not fallen prey to the deprivations of self-inflicted drudgery, isolation, and vice – look out for each other. We are the one who can make a difference. A kind gesture or helping hand, even something as simple as a phone call or a care package can do so much for your fellow man. We have people walking beside us that we should know. These are our comrades, with all their faults and all their merits. We should remember our own humanity and our own pain in seeking to help others overcome theirs. We should remember our shared passions and build memories of shared experiences that bind us together and make us whole with each other.

We should honor each other, and hold sacred our cause, and not let each other fall by the wayside. This is what it means to reach out to your fellow man.

A resounding silence

John Hembling (JtO) · 20 December 2011 · Archived copy · Original

I've been an active MRA for a few years, and I've written and read a lot of different arguments.
Some of them are as follows:

[unordered_list style="bullet"]

- Men have no reproductive rights;
- Men are sentenced unequally in criminal courts[1][2];
- Men are a disposable commodity in Western society;
- Men are 9 out of 10 of the homeless[3][4];
- 4 out of 5 suicides are male[5][6][7];
- Fathers are extorted and abused by family courts[8][9][10][11];
- The media portrays masculinity as either childish and stupid, or violent and evil;
- Men die earlier[12];
- Men are the majority of the victims of violent crime[13];
- Although women dominate higher education, female favoring affirmative action persists[14][15];
- The wage gap is a lie [16][17][18][19];
- The 1-in-4 rape statistic is a lie[20][21][22][23][24]

[/unordered_list]

et-cetera.

This short list represents a sample, rather than an exhaustive list, but these items are not areas of debate. They are not subjects on which it's a matter of opinion pending the discovery of better data. Certainly some of them are still central in campaigns of purposeful disinformation by dishonest ideologues, but liars only change perception, not reality. And the arguments surrounding these issues on the opposing side to men's rights are feminist arguments, even when those making such arguments don't self identify as feminists.

Having said that, it's important to distinguish feminism as a thing separate from women. The crowd endlessly claiming men's rights activists just hate women seem unable to make this distinction, and we have to have patience with the learning disabled.

However – the issues of male exploitation and suppressed human rights are, from the oppositional side; matters of gained advantage for women. As an example, men's total lack of legal reproductive rights mean that women have powers not only over their own bodies and choices, but they also enjoy the power of control over the lives, freedom, finances and careers of men.

By the way, the usual, puerile argument in this case is that the choice to have sex equals the choice to reproduce. That argument failed with the advent of abortion rights for women.

In addition, almost all opposition to male human rights takes the form of personal attack, straw man and other ad-hominem arguments. It appears that for ideologues, the only way to "defeat" men's rights arguments is by changing the topic or silencing the human rights advocates making them. However, there remains a third side to the debate. This is the agreement with status quo through silence.

[quote style="boxed"]We're not really modern humans with a sane modern ethic. We're jumped-up cavemen with modern technology.[/quote] Most people believe themselves to be ethical, and there is some merit to this belief. The twentieth century is full of examples of individuals from one demographic putting their voices, their money and their bodies on the line on behalf of individuals from some other demographic who were getting a raw deal.

Apartheid in South Africa was ended, in part by an intensive campaign by the members of the entertainment industry to apply international pressure to the problem, and it worked. Individuals stopped buying South African products while South African blacks were second class citizens of their own country. It was a system that thived as long as there was the complicity of a silent majority.

Returning to that first item in the list, that men have no reproductive rights, this is not a matter of debate. If you think it is, my respected fellow MRA GirlWritesWhat may have a few words for you.

Women not only enjoy the legal self determination at every single step and decision leading to reproduction, they also enjoy state-enforced power over men's lack of personal autonomy in these matters. Enjoy being the operative phrase. In fact it is emblematic of the stated positions of the men's rights movement. The enjoyed advantages and privileges gained at the expense of the subtracted civil rights of men are at the core of the silence of the vast majority of women.

There is a comfortable self deception in a thought process which occurs in almost all women. It includes the idea: "I'm not the one denying your right to reproductive self determination." But this idea is a lie. By your silence, you are supporting the continued treatment of men as a disposable commodity. In fact, in any number of supposed human rights initiatives benefiting women – but which ignore equivalent issues impacting men, the activists promoting those causes are indirectly supporting the equivalent victimization of men. All violence against women initiatives do this.

This is because in every area of violent victimization of human beings, including rape, men comprise a larger victim demographic than women. This sounds like a hyperbolic claim because almost all public messaging on the topic is dominated by special interests who benefit by maintaining a narrative of women's exclusive ownership of the status of victim.

Expressio Unius Est Exclusio Alterius is a Latin dictum expressing a principal of western thought, particularly in law that the expressed mention of one thing, implicitly excludes all others. In application, in the situation where men and women are victimized by violence at similar rates – but efforts to reduce this violence focus exclusively on women as victims – constitutes a practical support for the escalation of violence against men.

This is what almost all funded violence reduction initiatives do. It is not by mistake. To the actors and lobbyists of the billion dollar grievance industry, anything subtracting from the easy and heart-tugging story of doe-eyed and decorative female victims means a reduction of access to government funding and public donation. This is why honest reporting of actual rates of victimization showing sexual symmetry is constantly obscured by advocacy research from the sexual grievance industry.

This is only one example, but it's out in the open for anybody to see. Like a greater fraction of the issues continuously addressed by men's rights advocates it doesn't need to be explained to anybody with a passing acquaintance with current events. Despite this, the response from the public is a resounding silence. Followed closely by the facile solipsism of : "Not all women are like that."

[quote style="boxed"]Where once the very real threats to female humans mandated their protection at male expense, we now have and industry that manufactures the illusion of those threats in order to maintain their advantage.[/quote] In actual practice, barring a few notable outliers, all women are exactly like that. For that matter, so are all men. Oh yes gentlemen, you traditionalists, white knights, chivalry-believers and "good men" are feminism's enforcers. And when I say feminism, I don't mean the egalitarian, all-for-equality grass roots social movement. That feminism is a sham, and exists only in the public relations lies of top-down organizations like the National Organization for Women, and in people's imagination. You're the enforcers of the movement pursuing a never-ending agenda of constructed female victimhood and legal privilege. Try, even in your own mind, listing a single factually true and concrete example in the western world of women's oppression.

The feminism of the real world is built on hatred and violence. Violence supplied by "good men" like you, who believe their own worth depends on utility, rather than the innate value of your own humanity.

This embedded belief is why the men's rights movement is necessary. Because "good men" continue to buy into the abyssally stupid idea that of all the different human demographics – males don't deserve to be valued as human beings, only as human-doings. In fact, "good" men take pride in this culturally accepted disposability, and imagine themselves as "brave" or "honourable" by the degree to which they embrace their mortality for somebody else's convenience. How noble of you to work yourself to an early grave in a coal mine, or fishing in the atlantic, or the crushing pressure of the corporate ladder.

As it turns out, the ethics of human societies are those they can afford. "Women and children first" is a group survival mechanism, it preserves the reproducers and the offspring at the expense of males. Its the oldest deal in the book, and has real value to group survival in situations of scarce resources or lifeboats.

The problem emerges when human culture evolves past the need for a purely survival driven ethic. In a modern technological culture of abundant food and other resources, that ancient women-and-children-first ethic of survival must be arrested, otherwise it manifests as a malignant drive towards apartheid. We're not really modern humans with a sane modern ethic. We're jumped-up cavemen with modern technology. We're still conforming to an ethic which kept the species alive in periods of famine and tribal wars. but that now turn inward destructively in an age of relative safety and abundance. We live in a world of mechanized agriculture, advanced medicine and every other life enhancing feature of modern technology.

Unfortunately – despite our relatively large brains, the built-in ethic which served us in pre-agricultural societies is just as strong as it ever was, but is now expressed by disregarding the humanity of males where it is neither necessary or currently ethical.

An ideology has formed which exploits this for the political and economic advantage of it's operatives, and this is the ideology of eternal female victimhood and masculine malice. Where once the very real threats to female humans mandated their protection at male expense, we now have and industry that manufactures the illusion of those threats in order to maintain their advantage. Its the doctrine of hate and violence against the disposable human demographic, pretending to humanism, and calling itself feminism. As much as this superficially benefits women, it's men who are the enforcers – and who do so by defining acceptable masculinity as self sacrificing, disposable humans.

How brave and honourable such men are to define their own disposability as manly. Yes, how brave they are to totally conform to a public zeitgeist of their utility. Go along with the crowd – that's certainly admirable. Meanwhile, those who dare to declare themselves humans of innate human value while male, and not disposable – those conforming "good men" along with women who superficially benefit from the disposability of men rise up to condemn any males who dare to self actualize. Or, they remain silent.

Most women have no strong moral position apart from a lock-step conformity with whatever flattering pseudo progressive pablum they're spoon fed through popular media. Between Oprah, and The View and the two dozen standard women's magazines grabbing attention at supermarket checkouts – there is not a whispered breath of implied adult accountability. Women are constantly spoon fed the saccharine treacle of goddess-hood along with equal dose of you're-too-fat-and-plain shame to keep them buying useless face-paint and stinkum and ignoring anyone who'd treat them like adults. They're certainly in no danger of growing out of extended childhood while its easiest for corporations to sell to locked-in permanent immaturity.

So when anybody points out that they're actually the most pampered, free-from-accountability humans who've ever lived, their immature minds vomit up some inculcated talking point to shame, silence or change the topic. "1 in 4 women is raped!" Or "the wage gap!" or "women have always been oppressed" – all of which are puerile, simplistic lies designed to silence and shame.

And when it comes to addressing the reality that our society runs on the corpses of disposable men, there remains, from women, a resounding silence.

For the vast majority of women, this is the default. But of course lets not forget that not all women are like that.

Polling my contacts and acquaintances on four continents and a dozen countries, I happen to know half dozen who are not. For the rest of you, your continued silence is deafening.

Part 2 – Silence of the man.

[1] http://ncfm.org/2011/04/issues/criminal-sentencing/
[2] http://www.terry.uga.edu/~mustard/sentencing.pdf
[3] http://www.crisis.org.uk/data/files/document_library/research/factfile_full.pdf
[4] http://triggeralert.blogspot.com/2011/08/how-i-know-that-something-like-90-of.html
[5] http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/List_of_countries_by_suicide_rate
[6] http://www.cdc.gov/ncipc/factsheets/suifacts.htm
[7] http://www.merck.com/mmpe/sec15/ch205/ch205a.html

[8] http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=oJjgOjq5uso
[9] http://www.achildsright.typepad.com/achildsright/titleivd.html
[10] http://www.daddy.typepad.com/
[11] http://mkg4583.wordpress.com/category/title-iv-d/
[12] http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/List_of_countries_by_life_expectancy
[13] http://bjs.ojp.usdoj.gov/content/glance/tables/vsxtab.cfm
[14] http://nces.ed.gov/programs/digest/d07/tables/dt07_258.asp
[15] http://mjperry.blogspot.com/2009/06/women-dominate-higher-education-at.html

[16] http://mensnewsdaily.com/2007/04/23/the-gender-feminist-wage-gap-myth-appears-to-be-growing-legs/
[17] http://mensnewsdaily.com/2007/04/23/gender-feminist-wage-gap-myth-appears-to-be-growing-legs-part-ii/
[18]
http://consad.com/index.php?page=an-analysis-of-reasons-for-the-disparity-in-wages-between-men-and-women
[19] http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=Cb_6v-JQ13Q
[20] http://www.avoiceformen.com/mens-rights/false-rape-culture/so-many-lies/
[21] http://antimisandry.com/abuse-dv/one-four-abused-mary-koss-study-update-24633.html
[22] http://www.leaderu.com/real/ri9502/sommers.html

[23] Nara Schoenberg and Sam Roe, “The Making of an Epidemic,” Toledo Blade, October 10, 1993;

[24] “Examining the Facts: Advocacy Research Overstates the Incidence of Date and Acquaintance Rape,” Current Controversies in Family Violence eds. Richard Gelles and Donileen Loseke, Newbury Park, CA.: Sage Publications, 1993, pp.120-132;

AVfM Seasonal Fundraiser

Paul Elam · 21 December 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Well, gents and ladies, it is the feared, dreaded but highly necessary time again to appeal to AVfM readers for financial contributions to help us cover the operation of this site, the radio programs from us and Dr. T, and most importantly the activism we conduct through this site.

If I can be so bold as to say so, I think we have delivered a pretty big bang for the buck. It isn't just that we have done so much to rattle the cage of feminists. The success of this website, now unquestioned, has attracted more talent, much more, than I would have guessed at this point.

We now have a team of individuals that goes beyond what we advertise on our pages, and we are gearing up to add a new doomsday prophesy to 2012. Let's put it this way: The fembots better hope the Mayan's were right about next year, because they would rather deal with that than the things we are cooking up.

Over the past two years, with your help, AVfM has set the standard for online activism. We are forging new ground and gaining momentum. And we are adding significant traction to an idea that some green MRA's and of course, feminists, would love to disabuse you of.

[box type="alert" icon="none"]Progress for men will not be gained by debate, reason or typical channels of grievance available to segments of the population that the world actually gives a damn about. The progress we need will only be realized by inflicting enough pain on the agents of hate, in public view, that it literally shocks society out of its current coma.[/box]

We have seen some evidence that it is working; a twitching toe here, a moving finger there. Just enough to let us know we need to turn up the voltage and hit it some more. Once we get the patients eyes and ears working, then we can talk and reason with people.

We can only do that with your help. So I ask you once again to sacrifice some of your hard earned money to help us out. The donation button is on the right hand side of the page here, as well as a link to the PO Box for those that prefer to send check or money order.

Thank you in advance for your help, and for all the donations in the past that have taken us to where we are today.

Paul

Agent Orange files released

Robert O'Hara · 21 December 2011 · Archived copy · Original

[box]

Washington December 21, (AVfM News) Today the files collected by Agent Orange, an MRA who infiltrated a private forum on the Radfem Hub website have been released to the public.

Since AVFM, Antimisandry and What Men are Saying About Women released stories regarding the leaking of threads at Radfem Hub and subsequently the identification of many of the posters readers, both feminists and MRAs alike, have been anxiously awaiting the promised complete files of screen shots and associated materials collected by Agent Orange. Shortly after the news broke Reddit was on fire with comments in a thread called "mensrights announces their plan to release the private information of RadFem Hub posters," in which Radfem sympathizers accused Agent Orange of enticing terrorism and violence against the Radfem Hub posters by releasing their personal information.

There have even been threats to get the FBI involved even though there is nothing personal about a Facebook or Linkedin profiles. To date, AVFM has not been contacted by the FBI or any other law enforcement agency.

Radfem Hub and other major sources for feminist news and commentary have remained curiously silent on the matter. There is no mention of the release either on Radfem, Jezebel, Feministe or Feministing as might have been expected considering the comments on Reddit. It is assumed, however that much attention has been paid amongst the feminist community to this story and its developments.

With the publication of the Radfem Data it is expected that more identities will be revealed and also that MRAs and other interested parties in the broader press will write about the postings and the implications for the public perception of feminism.

The Agent Orange Files may now be found here: [1] [2] [3]
NB: These are in 7zip format and you may need to Download a decompressor for your OS.

[/box]

SCUM Manifested

Walter Romans (TDOM) · 21 December 2011 · Archived copy · Original

The Hate-Filled Legacy of Valerie Solanas

Radical feminism can be traced more or less back to Valerie Solanas, author of the SCUM Manifesto. It was first published in 1967, though Solanas began drafting it in about 1959 or 60. In the Manifesto, Solanas calls on women to rise up against men who she sees as biologically inferior and responsible for all of the world's problems. However, she doesn't end there. She refers to the male as "a biological accident" and the Y-chromosome as being an incomplete X-chromosome, making the male an incomplete female. She further calls for men to be exterminated and to assist in eliminating themselves by eliminating each other.

There are those who have stated that this Manifesto is little more than a parody of "patriarchy" or a work of satire. They claim to view it as an anti-patriarchal statement, but state that the calls for the elimination of men should not be taken seriously. However, while the work may contain elements of parody and satire, these devices are used to emphasize the message, not to indicate that the author wasn't serious. Solanas' own history would indicate this as she shot pop artist Andy Warhol, art critic Mario Amaya, and attempted to shoot Warhol's manager Fred Hughes on June 3, 1968, attempting to kill them. In 1977, she claimed that her views had not changed since the Manifesto was published, indicating that she believed what she had written.

Further evidence that the SCUM Manifesto was to be taken seriously is found in the reaction of feminist leaders and organizations to Solanas' Manifesto and shooting of Andy Warhol. Ti-Grace Atkinson, radical feminist and president of the New York chapter of NOW, called Solanas "the first outstanding champion of women's rights" and heralded her as "a 'heroine' of the women's movement." Robin Morgan, former editor of Ms Magazine, included excerpts in her book, Sisterhood is Powerful. Other feminist authors such as Amanda Third and Catherine Lord have credited her with creating radical feminism and have stated that the feminist movement would not have occurred if it hadn't been for Valerie Solanas. There have also been several books, plays, and movies glorifying Solanas and her actions.

There are also those who would dispute the acronym that SCUM stands for the Society for Cutting Up Men. While this is not spelled out within the document itself, It was stated on the cover of her self-published version in 1967. Later, Solanas would deny that she intended the acronym. Instead she stated that there was no such organization, nor would there ever be. SCUM was a state of mind. It was meant as a reference to empowered women who considered themselves fit to rule.

The legacy of the SCUM Manifesto has continued. It was published as late as 2004 (perhaps since then, though I don't have a record of it) and has been translated into several languages. Currently there are organizations based on SCUM existing in Sweden (producing materials for high school students) and on the internet (RadfemHub) It has impacted society in many ways which will be outlined below.

In New York in 1967 at about the same time Solanas was publishing the SCUM Manifesto, Shulamith Firestone, Pam Allen, Carol Hanish, and Robin Morgan founded a group called New York Radical Women. This short-lived organization adopted a radical feminist ideology that emphasized the patriarchal oppression of women by men similar to that outlined in the SCUM Manifesto. They claimed that men exercised social dominance over women by creating social roles that divided privilege and power by gender. This group is often credited with the first bra burning at the 1968 Miss America Pageant. However, rather than burn them, they tossed bras and other artifacts of patriarchal oppression into a garbage can. Firestone would move on to found Redstockings and New York Radical Feminists while Morgan would become more involved in feminist activism and writing. Hanish would help found Redstockings and would later edit a journal called Meeting Ground in which she would publish an essay called The Personal is Political and is sometimes incorrectly credited with coining that phrase, although she undoubtedly helped popularize it.

In 1969, the radical feminist organization Redstockings published its Redstocking Manifesto. The influence of SCUM is unmistakable. It is considerably less violent, but no less hateful. It characterizes "all men" as oppressors of women. It characterizes individual male-female relationships as "class relationship(s)" and provides that all individual male-female conflicts are political, not personal and "can only be solved collectively." Men are identified as the agents of oppression and the users of physical force to subjugate women. "All power structures throughout history have been male-dominated and male-oriented. Men have controlled all political, economic and cultural institutions and backed up this control with physical force." In SCUM, Solanas outlines a similar concept:

> "Authority and Government: Having no sense of right and wrong … the male feels a need for external guidance and control. So he created authorities — priests, experts, bosses, leaders, etc — and government… he sees to it that all authorities are male."

Redstockings states: "We call on all men to give up their male privilege and support women's liberation in the interest of our humanity and their own… In fighting for our liberation we will always take the side of women against their oppressors. We will not ask what is "revolutionary" or "reformist," only what is good for women."

This is quite similar to Solanas' call for men to assist in their own extermination and /or work towards women's goals:

> "SCUM will kill all men who are not in the Men's Auxiliary of SCUM. Men in the Men's Auxiliary are those men who are working diligently to eliminate themselves, men who, regardless of their motives, do good, men who are playing pall[sic] with SCUM. A few examples of the men in the Men's Auxiliary are: men who kill men; biological scientists who are working on constructive programs, as opposed to biological warfare; journalists, writers, editors, publishers and producers who disseminate and promote ideas that will lead to the achievement of SCUM's goals…"

Redstockings did not take the ideology to the same extreme as Solanas, but the hatred that Solanas felt towards men was obviously present as was Solanas' influence. The prevailing attitude of the SCUM Manifesto is that men are to blame for everything wrong in the world and that ridding the world of men will automatically result in improvement. The first portion of this was outlined by Carol Hanish in The Personal is Political in 1969. Hanish states:

> "The most important is getting rid of self-blame. Can you imagine what would happen if women, blacks, and workers (my definition of worker is anyone who has to work for a living as opposed to those who don't. All women are workers) would-stop blaming ourselves for our sad situations? …We are only starting to stop blaming ourselves."

She later adds: "Women, like blacks, workers, must stop blaming ourselves for our "failures."" Of course if women aren't to blame for their own condition or their own failures, who is? The Redstocking Manifesto provides the answer: men. "Women's submission is not the result of brain-washing, stupidity or mental illness but of continual, daily pressure from men. We do not need to change ourselves, but to change men." The result of this "blame shifting" is that women can deny responsibility for their actions. Any wrong committed by women (or a woman) can be blamed on men or "The Patriarchy." This "blame shift" has led to disastrous legal consequences for men; most notably in Family Law, domestic violence, rape and sexual assault laws.

But while Redstockings was not as extreme as SCUM (at least publically), some of its organizers were. Robin Morgan would attack marriage as the basis for all sexism "We can't destroy the inequities between men and women until we destroy marriage." She would also help lead the charge to define all sex as rape "I claim that rape exists any time sexual intercourse occurs when it has not been initiated by the woman, out of her own genuine affection and desire." Her hatred for men was nearly as intense as that of Solanas "I feel that "man-hating" is an honorable and viable political act, that the oppressed have a right to class-hatred against the class that is oppressing them."

In her Manifesto, Solanas spends a great deal of time demeaning and demonizing men. She begins:

> "The male is a biological accident: the Y (male) gene is an incomplete X (female) gene, that is, it has an incomplete set of chromosomes. In other words, the male is an incomplete female, a walking abortion, aborted at the gene stage. To be male is to be deficient, emotionally limited; maleness is a deficiency disease and males are emotional cripples.
>
> The male is completely egocentric, trapped inside himself, incapable of empathizing or identifying with others, or love, friendship, affection of tenderness. He is a completely isolated unit, incapable of rapport with anyone. His responses are entirely visceral, not cerebral; his intelligence is a mere tool in the services of his drives and needs; he is incapable of mental passion, mental interaction; he can't relate to anything other than his own physical sensations. He is a half-dead, unresponsive lump, incapable of giving or receiving pleasure or happiness; consequently, he is at best an utter bore, an inoffensive blob, since only those capable of absorption in others can be charming. He is trapped in a twilight zone halfway between humans and apes, and is far worse off than the apes because, unlike the apes, he is capable of a large array of negative feelings — hate, jealousy, contempt, disgust, guilt, shame, doubt — and moreover, he is aware of what he is and what he isn't."

She then continues:

> "Eaten up with guilt, shame, fears and insecurities and obtaining, if he's lucky, a barely perceptible physical feeling, the male is, nonetheless, obsessed with screwing; he'll swim through a river of snot, wade nostril-deep through a mile of vomit, if he thinks there'll be a friendly pussy awaiting him. He'll screw a woman he despises, any snaggle-toothed hag, and furthermore, pay for the opportunity. Why? Relieving physical tension isn't the answer, as masturbation suffices for that. It's not ego satisfaction; that doesn't explain screwing corpses and babies."
>
> "Fatherhood and Mental Illness (fear, cowardice, timidity, humility, insecurity, passivity): Mother wants what's best for her kids; Daddy only wants what's best for Daddy, that is peace and quiet, pandering to his delusion of dignity (`respect'), a good reflection on himself (status) and the opportunity to control and manipulate, or, if he's an `enlightened' father, to `give guidance'. His daughter, in addition, he wants sexually — he givers her hand in marriage; the other part is for him."

The demonizing of men, turning them into something sub-human and obsessed with sex would be a recurring theme of radical feminism. The obsession with sex would evolve into "all men are rapists" or "all men use rape to control all women." The desire to "control and manipulate" would become the "power and control" of the domestic violence industry. The concept of the male as a biological accident sets the stage for concepts of "testosterone poisoning" and "toxic masculinity." Both are concepts claiming that being male is by its very nature, a disease.

> "If men were wise they would seek to become really female, would do intensive biological research that would lead to me, by means of operations on the brain and nervous system, being able t to be transformed in psyche, as well as body, into women."

This lays the foundation for the Redstocking Manifesto's claim that women need not change, but men must be changed. The feminist call for masculinity and manhood to be "redefined" stems from this concept as well. The "redefinition" is the changing of men.

> "Eliminate men and women will shape up. Women are improvable; men are no[t]."

Here we have the antecedent of “the personal is political,” a statement that relieves women from any personal responsibility for their actions and places the blame on “patriarchy,” the elimination of which will result (by default) in a better world and an improved woman.

Susan Brownmiller was another product of New York Radical Women and New York Radical Feminists, both associated with Redstockings. She would later write Against Our Will: Men, Women, and Rape in which she would proclaim that all men use rape and the fear of rape to keep all women in a state of fear in order to perpetuate male dominance. This position would be the logical next step to Solanas’ assertion that men are sex-crazed animals that “[screw] corpses and babies” and desire their daughters (sexually).

Andrea Dworkin, a radical feminist crusader against pornography, may have also been influenced indirectly by Solanas and SCUM. While living in Europe in the late 60’s, she was introduced to the writings of Shulamith Firestone and Robin Morgan, both members of Redstockings. Dworkin also worked closely with Gloria Steinem and Catharine MacKinnon in her opposition to pornography as a form of sexual discrimination that reinforces male dominance over women and as such promotes violence against women. Steinem had also worked with former Redstocking Robin Morgan to found the Women’s Media Center.

Other radical feminists who appear to be under the influence of Solanas, but are not easily connected are Mary Daly, a radical feminist professor at Boston College who was removed from her position after refusing to admit male students to her advance courses in feminism, may also have been influenced by Solanas and her Manifesto. Daly was once quoted as stating “If life is to survive on this planet, there must be a decontamination of the Earth. I think this will be accompanied by an evolutionary process that will result in a drastic reduction of the population of males.” This was apparently a response to a statement by Sally Miller Gearhart who advocated reducing and maintaining the male population at 10% of the human population. Gearhart helped establish on of the first women’s studies programs in the US while teaching at San Francisco State. There could be little doubt that she was aware of Valerie Solanas and the SCUM Manifesto. Although it is unclear as to when Solanas moved to San Francisco, that is where she was residing when she died in 1988.

The legacy of Valerie Solanas is found in the writings of Morgan, Dworkin, Firestone, Hanish, Brownmiller, Daly, Gearhart, MacKinnon, Steinem et al. But it doesn’t stop there. Many of these women have led the charge on domestic violence and rape law reforms that have done away with basic rights to due process and fair, impartial trials. MacKinnon pioneered sexual harassment law and may have been the one to invent the term. The child abuse hysteria of the 80’s may have been a direct result of the anti-porn crusade of Dworkin, MacKinnon, and Steinem.

The next generation of misandrists is already here. These are women like Sharon Osborne and the other women of “The Talk” who joked on national television when Catherine Becker sexually mutilated her husband after drugging him. They are the gender feminists of Sweden who open state-sponsored schools that portend to teach equality by emphasizing homosexual relationships and nearly excluding heteronormative relationships from the curriculum. They are the Swedish members of SCUM who produce videos depicting the brutal and senseless murder of men, then call upon women to “do their part.” They are Swedish feminists such as Ireen von Wachenfeldt, chairwomen of the National Organization for Women’s Shelters who have professed adherence to the SCUM Manifesto as have other prominent Swedish government officials such as former Minister of Gender Equality Margareta Winberg, and Professor Eva Lungren. Wachenfeldt publically stated “‘All men are animals…All men are emotional parasites… The male of the species is a biological disaster… To call a man an animal is to pay him a compliment.” They are the women of RadFemHub; Danielle Pynnonen, Kat Pinder, Isabelle Moreira, Mary Syrett, Julie LeComte, Lorraine Allen, Laila Namdarkhan, Pam O’Shaughnesey who are authors, teachers, childcare workers, and government officials from around the globe plotting and planning the destruction of the male sex via eugenics, murder, selective abortion, etc. There are Hugo Schwyzer, Michael Kimmel, Tom Matlack, The Conscious Men and many other men who might be considered the Men’s Auxiliary of SCUM as they support and defend the hate movement known as feminism. Solanas has indeed left a legacy. It’s a legacy of misandrous hatred and violence that by its own admission can only result in the destruction of the entire human race, men and women alike.

> “Why produce even females? Why should there be future generations? What is their purpose? When aging and death are eliminated, why continue to reproduce? Why should we care what happens when we’re dead? Why should we care that there is no younger generation to succeed us.” – Valerie Solanas, SCUM Manifesto.

[Addendum: The name of Evin Rubar was mistakenly included in the list of radical feminists. Instead of being a radical feminist, Evin was attempting to expose them. I apologize for the error. – TDOM

An open letter to Tom Matlack

Karen Straughan (aka GirlWritesWhat) · 22 December 2011 · Archived copy · Original

I understand. I do.

Hugo doesn't. Other male feminists, in their scramble for self-aggrandizement among the fairer sex, certainly don't. They haven't been through it. And they can't empathize, because their biology and the culture of traditionalism and feminism both have taught them that no matter what, their greater empathy belongs with women.

This bone of contention you have with feminists…you know you're right in this. You know it. And though you never assumed they would blindly have your back, you DID believe they'd listen to you and try to understand your perspective.

Hugo's response to your article…that was your divorce papers being served. Never mind that it was couched in terms of "it's not you, it's me, I wish you the best but it would be unfair to YOU for me to continue as an editor on your site." This was a unilateral declaration of rejection. You dared to question. You dared to stick up for men on your own terms, as a man. You followed your conscience rather than the crowd. And now, you're an outsider, no longer trusted. You are the enforcer who dared to ask the boss that intolerable question: Why?

Now you know the answer. You might not think you do, because you're still spinning in shock from their betrayal, the betrayal a morally defunct skirt-chaser like Hugo sees as nothing a man should fear. In his state of delusion, a woman's anger holds no power over a man, and can do no harm to him. You know differently now. You feel as if a rug has been pulled out from under you, and all they want to do is batter you with explanations of why it's wrong for you to feel that way, and that THEY are the ones who've been transgressed.

You used to be a good man, Tom. And now? Now you're beginning to realize what a "good man" is. A "good man" tells women what they want to hear, and he leaves uncomfortable truths unspoken. A "good man" sets aside his honor and integrity so he can continue to be useful to women. A "good man" kicks the shit out of other men, if they offend a woman's sensibilities. A "good man" has as much freedom to define his own masculinity as his women will allow him, and not one inch more.

You were the man in civilian clothes in WWI England, handed a white feather by a woman, who took the challenge and enlisted. And now? You've returned home, having sacrificed a limb for the cause, and not one of those women wants to look you in the eye. All they want to do is tell you how you've failed them. They told you to come back a hero or come back dead, and guess what? You tarnished your glory by daring to question, and now you're dead to them. They can't get away from your soon-to-be stinking corpse fast enough.

You're not useful to feminism anymore. And since that usefulness was the defining characteristic of your existence to them, well… welcome to male disposability, Tom.

I've come to discover over my years of reading about gender issues that there really is no fury like a feminist scorned. I've learned a lot about human instinct in my 41 years on this planet, enough to know that the women and men who are most ruled by their instincts find a comforting ideology in feminism. The male feminist is chivalry incarnate, and the female feminist is a woman's instinctive self-interest rendered down to its purest elixir. This marriage of male self-sacrifice and female self-interest in an age of total female liberation is social nihilism. It is a critical mass of troglodytic instinct sufficient to deny objective reality and steer humanity down a very dark path.

When you started the Good Men Project, you believed you were demonstrating your devotion to a set of ideals and the group that represents them. Now you've learned what your devotion was worth to them. Like a homeless man, you put your foot wrong and were cut loose, you've become a lifeboat rower with no arms, a broken cog in their machine, and it's time to throw you away.

I remember once, in my identity as a writer of erotica, commenting on a blog that I was not a feminist. That I believed in gender equality, but I felt that humanism or secular egalitarianism was the answer. 173 scathing, enraged and abusive comments later, I regretted ever outing myself as a non-feminist among the very women who'd praised my fiction and lauded my writing on female sexuality and sexual agency.

Hell hath no fury, Tom. You were a part of the "Male Auxiliary" of the Society for Cutting Up Men, and the moment you stood up for yourself and other men, you were shown the door. At the very moment in history when the revelation that prominent feminist scholars, activists, and educators exposed as genocidal maniacs has evoked a unanimous chorus of crickets and tumbleweeds in the mainstream of feminism, you've been vilified for daring to ask why it's so bad for a dude to be a dude.

I'm sorry, Tom. But the moment you decided your integrity was not disposable, you rendered yourself useless to them, and you're discovering the fair-weather friendship feminism offers men.

You have a choice now, Tom. Because your reputation among feminists is absolutely salvageable. You can fall back into line, apologize for "forcing" them to attack you, and subject yourself to their re-education, and if you're a good enough boy, they'll suspend your excommunication and put you on indefinite probation. You can supplicate like mad and try to make amends to people who see you as nothing but a useful cog in their machine, to be banged with a wrench the moment you slip off their track.

Or you can stand on your own, and decide what your integrity is worth to you. Only you can make that calculation, and decide what the relative outcomes are worth. I wish you luck with that. Merry Christmas, for what it's worth.

–

Tom Matlack's article

Hugo Schwyzer's response

Silence of the Man

John Hembling (JtO) · 22 December 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Continued from part 1: A resounding silence

A decade into the 21st century, Western culture operates by explicit denial of some obvious facts. Men and boys are second class citizens. This is plainly evident in a large number of measurable factors.

Infant males are routinely sexually mutilated, and the harvested tissues used, among other places in high end women's cosmetic wrinkle creams[1][2]. In fact, males are so despised that at least one company has abandoned animal testing in favour of testing products on the harvested tissues of mutilated male infants[3]. Debtors prisons, although formally illegal for more than a century, still exist solely for men[4][5][6][7] who have run afoul of the corrupt family court system. Most publicly funded anti-violence programs focus exclusively on the victimization of women, the sexual demographic already least victimized[8][9], implicitly promoting escalated violence against the demographic most victimized; men[10].

Proving this case for purpose of debate is outside the scope of this article. The fact of male disfranchisement is supported by a few examples above, but established and cemented in a substantial fraction of the article content on this site, a body of more than 800 essays.

How did we get here? The ideology of supposed feminine victimhood and the imaginary male domination of Western society has held an increasing totality of the public zeitgeist for the last half century. On our road to the present, it's worth noting a few of the bigger cultural fractures.

Historically, the protectors of society have been men. That means the protectors of women, of children, of the elderly and of the infirm have been men. In a public places, the presence of men going about their various business has always been to the benefit of everybody else's safety.

Men, for their part, have almost universally accepted this role of de-facto public bodyguard with pride as an element of masculine identity. Fast forward a few decades with a continuous looping backbeat of claimed rape culture, pedophile hysteria, and the masculine reality that a whispered accusation from an antonymous stranger destroys life, career, family and future. Then demonstrate to men the willingness of a major fraction of the female public to indulge in this blood sport for motives ranging from boredom to petty revenge.

Heidi Jones fabricated a phantom rape against herself for attention[11]. Nafissatou Diallo fraudulently accused Domenique Strauss Kahn in a paid strategy to derail his political career.

According to the Amy Davidson in the New Yorker: "Ms. Diallo is the first accuser in history to conduct a media campaign to persuade a prosecutor to pursue charges against a person from whom she wants money. Her lawyers and public relations consultants have orchestrated an unprecedented number of media events and rallies to bring pressure on the prosecutors in this case after she had to admit her extraordinary efforts to mislead them." [12]

Julian Assange was fraudulently charged with rape because he had embarrassed the US government. Amanda Knox[13] accused an innocent man of rape because she was angry with one of his relatives over a minor debt. These, along with hundreds of cases making it into the news every year send a crystal clear message. Men are regularly imprisoned and destroyed with ease, based on nothing but words. Nicola Osborne, 32, of Winchester Road, Portsmouth, Hampshire fabricated a rape to cover up her own extramarital affair.[14]

The Canadian province of Ontario is one of the few places where false rape claims are statistically tracked by law enforcement. In that province in one year, more than 2,235 sexual assault allegations were not merely unproven as assaults, but in fact proven definitively to be false[15].

Pile onto this climate of false accusation the organized efforts of ideologues to eliminate due process[16] and the presumption of innocence for males, and we have a truly male-hostile culture. If this were not enough, we also have a media culture which celebrates male targeting violence, and treats male-targeting violent female criminals as pseudo-celebrities. Lorena Bobbitt and Katherine Becker being two most famous examples of this.

Further piling onto this extraordinarily ugly public ethic we have mainstream, respected pillars of society engaging in open discussion of male targeting eugenics and mass male-infanticide. The authors, teachers, daycare workers, politicians and professors orbiting Pamela Oshaughnessy's women's murder club[17] continue to reveal that accepted male-targeting violence is a community value for a large fraction of the female public.

All this, of course, is not enough. Take every argument made by members of the men's rights movement, addressing the issues listed above and more, and stand these arguments against the other side of the debate. From the counter-men's-rights camp, there is mockery, accusation, threats, and various attempts to shame and censor. There is also, from a vast majority of the public, a great, indifferent silence.

Men are, of course still expected to perform. Chase that all- important career path so that as good, conforming men we can pay for diapers, diamond rings and generally do right by the women in our lives. There's even a newly emerging genre of literature dedicated to exhorting men to get back to protect, provide and die when convenient. Kimmel's Guyland, and Hymowitz's Child Man In The Promised Land being template examples of such.

Penny Nance, the CEO of Concerned Women of America has made a career of tut-tutting the growing fraction of men recognizing the non-viability of the allowable masculine role of disposable appliance. According to nance "We have an increasing problem of men walking away from families, walking away from their children, and we need to be concerned as a nation. We need to urge them to achieve and to be essential, and to be present in the family"[18]

In her interview with Fox News, she makes it clear, saying, "We need them, all the social science together points to the fact that dads are essential in the home; they're essential in the family. We want them to do a great job now when they're young, learning how to provide so that when they are dads that they can really be there for their families"

Nance frames the phenomenon of men opting out as a failure on the part of men to "grow up" and conform to her understanding of "good man," but whether this is a conscious deception to shame men into compliance – or simple failure of comprehension on Penny's part – is irrelevant.

What's abundantly clear is that in the male-disposable zeitgeist of modern feminism, a new ethic of male survival is required for every man with the mental acumen to value himself as a self determined human, rather than a disposable appliance providing labor, money, sperm and violence on behalf of women.

The social contract between men and women has been broken. Our society's feminist-driven war on men, pursued for the last five decades, has burned, bombed and razed to the ground that ancient agreement between men and women. Everybody, including the social-conservative women wringing their hands over men opting out are all aware of the annexation of the social contract.

For men, a new ethic of survival has become necessary, and that ethic has elements which will disturb and terrify those still invested in maintaining the status quo. To be clear, that means individuals invested in the continued casual disposal of men's lives for everybody else's convenience.

A complete description of this ethic is not the point of this article, and indeed, for other self actualized men, the solution will vary in it's details. However, common to most men opting out of traditionally allowed disposable masculinity will be at least a version of the following elements. For convenience, this emerging masculine ethic is labeled with an expression coined by Paul Elam, that of Zeta Masculinity.

Zeta Masculinity entails no more acceptance of personal violence. This seems like nothing startling at first, until it is understood that outside of the newly emerging ethic of masculine self actualization – men are expected to both dispense and absorb personal violence on behalf of women and children as well as on behalf of high-status men. This is the ancient evolutionarily wired in model of men as the disposable protectors of family, community and taken across the large populations, the protectors of societies. For men alert to the social reality that they are despised as human beings, and only valued as disposable human-appliances, a total refusal to accept and absorb violence, or to dispense violence for any reason except personal protection is likely startling to socially conforming men and women.

Depending on the presentation of this non-violence – men refusing their own disposability are called cowards, or not-real-men. In the most desperate thrashings of social conservative rationalization – this nonviolence is characterized as support for violence. These accusatory reactions are based either in fear of removed protection by previously disposable males, or simply blank stupidity's failure to grasp a masculine ethic of nonviolence. In either case – the failure lies with the critic, and no scant breath of apology or explanation is warranted. Zeta males owe nobody either.

This means that women and high status men can learn to abandon their assumption that the men around them owe them protection or enforcement. It's likely that neither women nor high-status men will soon learn any such thing, but zeta men will be wholly indifferent to the pain experienced by either group on that learning curve.

Zeta masculinity also entails an abandonment of the self-sacrificing drive for career and status. That means the rapidly growing numbers of men adopting the emerging ethic of zeta masculinity are rejecting the age old female utilization of men as success objects. If women as a demographic can learn to value men as humans in a calculus separate from their fat wallets, shiny cars and prestigious high power careers, thats great. However, nobody's expecting that, and women already whining in blogs, newspapers and social commentary talk shows can just keep complaining about peter pan until they're blue in the face. Zeta men don't care, because we know the game is rigged for men to earn, provide and die – and there's no appeal in it.

Rebuttals to this of the character: "but you'll never attract women without a respectable paycheck" are pre-emptively noted, and the real answer is that this is not a problem for anybody except those social conservatives and feminists invested in maintaining men's role as disposable providers. Zeta males don't care. That old game of sacrifice and early death isn't worth the candle. We're not going to pay for other people's shit anymore, and we don't care what this does to the bottom line of Saks 5th avenue, or Wells fargo, or Exxon. We don't care, at all. What zeta males do understand in excruciating clarity is that the established, acceptable and respectable role of men as protector and provider is what props up a culture which has always run on the corpses of "good," disposable men.

There is one more plank in this platform worth mentioning here. Zeta males are increasingly careful of their biological contributions in baby-making. The family courts, excepting a few recent reforms in specific states – have demonstrated a wholly corrupt mandate of wealth appropriation from men who've contributed their chromosomes in the procreative process. The problem being that although required by law to abide by and to underwrite the reproductive rights only women enjoy, men enjoy no such reproductive rights or choices themselves.

The only sane response to this is to exercise extreme caution in the disposal of semen. Without a gratuitous detail of method, the result is that an increasing number of men are refusing to impregnate women. Certainly the greater majority of men continue to fall blindly into the baby trap, but even this is likely to change rapidly with the emergence of new male contraceptive technologies.

What will happen without men willing to burn in this machine's fuel? The system will either collapse or adapt to an modern ethic which doesn't require human disposability. Whichever case emerges, zeta men are prepared to survive and adapt. The rest of you are on your own.

We'll be taking first seats on the lifeboats, too. Thanks for asking.

[1] http://www.foreskin-restoration.net/forum/showthread.php?t=8415
[2] http://thetyee.ca/Views/2007/01/30/Foreskin/

[3] http://www.dailymail.co.uk/news/article-2076666/Scientists-secret-German-laborator/index.html
[4] http://purplemotes.net/2011/03/22/persons-in-jail-for-child-support-debt/
[5] http://www.rense.com/general51/chsup.htm

[6] http://articles.cnn.com/2009-07-15/justice/georgia.child.support_1_child-support-deadbeat-jailed
[7] http://today.msnbc.msn.com/id/44376665/ns/today-today_news/t/unable-pay-child-support-poor-parents-land-behind-bars/

[8] http://www.amnesty.ca/campaigns/svaw_overview.php
[9] http://www.unifem.org/gender_issues/violence_against_women/
[10] http://bjs.ojp.usdoj.gov/content/glance/tables/vsxtab.cfm

[11] http://www.cbsnews.com/8301-504083_162-20106221-504083.html
[12] http://www.newyorker.com/online/blogs/closeread/2011/07/nafissatou-diallo.html
[13] http://www.cbsnews.com/stories/2011/10/03/501364/main20114867.shtml
[14] http://www.independent.co.uk/news/media/press/woman-jailed-for-false-rape-claim-2225627.html
[15] http://www.equityfeminism.com/articles/2002/false-rape-claims-the-evidence-from-canada/
[16] http://online.wsj.com/article/SB10001424053111903596904576516232905230642.html
[17] http://www.avoiceformen.com/feminism/radfem-hub-the-underbelly-of-a-hate-movement/
[18] http://www.newshounds.us/2011/10/09/concerned_woman_for_america_penny_nance_loves_men_but_wants_them_to_grow_up.php

A holiday message for men

Paul Elam · 23 December 2011 · Archived copy · Original

[dropcap]A[/dropcap]s I indicated in a comment on James Huff's recent article "Reaching out to your fellow man," I am generally at a loss for words at this time of year. I loathe the idea of sounding like a Hallmark card, especially so where it concerns a community of men, many of whom have been devastated in ways that cut to the core at this time of year; lost children, lost homes, lost sense of belonging.

After all, when we peek underneath the bantering and commentary common to this environment, that is what we are left with; men for whom Christmas, and all that it means, has been transformed into a traditional, unavoidable reminder of what was taken, and what will never be again.

So I have no holiday cheers to send, at least not in the traditional sense. But just saying that this is a difficult time for me to know what to say is not good enough. Since I made that comment I have looked back on it with embarrassment. I have pledged my life to defying the demand for my silence. Going mute, where it may count the most, is a betrayal of that in its worst form.

So let me say what I should have said then. For all of you, no matter how long you have been forced into that corner and kicked; no matter how much you have been betrayed and no matter what sort of gaping hole has been left in your lives as a reward for being a "good man," we are with you during this time. Of course, we cannot "fix" anything. We have no such power, nor will we ever. But we can offer something, a gift from us all to each other, that has been so lacking for so many for so long. You fucking matter here.

This site was established about you and for you, based on the absolute certainty of your intrinsic worth; of your value outside of your utility or usefulness to others, or to the system.

It is important for you to know that there are people working for you. We do a lot of work to expose and undermine hateful feminists, and that is, of course, a noble and worthy cause. But the end goal here is not nearly about that alone. The end goal here, if I may be so lofty as to phrase it this way, is to create an environment unlike anything else seen in human history; a home for men that they actually own. A place where their existence alone is sufficient for inclusion, and the only price paid for being loved.

And that is the rub, isn't it? Men have, throughout time, been used, exploited, sacrificed and expended; forced into the role of pack animal and personal bodyguard. They have been rewarded for this with false accolades and more expectation. On occasion, they are the recipients of honor tainted with the fact that such positives are contingent on further usefulness to anyone but themselves.

But have they been truly loved? We think not. How could any form of love among human beings result in so much death and pain? In this place, we pass on the mockery of feigned affections, on conditional approval and the strings attached to acceptance as a man.

We pass on your disposability once and for all.

With that, I am going to take some time with my other family over the next couple of days. I just could not make myself begin that in good conscience without saying some things first. If I come across as Hallmarkish or canned, please accept my apologies. This is awkward business, telling you that you are loved. But it is, when all is said and done, the only real business we are in.

Amanda Marcotte's secret decoder ring

John Hembling (JtO) · 23 December 2011 · Archived copy · Original

On behalf of MRA's worldwide, I'm writing today to apologize to Amanda Marcotte. I've said unkind things in the past about her, and have ignored her writing based on my own mistaken understanding. You see, I foolishly believed that Marcotte was a zealous ideologue, wedded to a solipsistic, Dworkinesque view that women are superior humans, and men are inferior, base, grunting troglodytes. Earlier this year, I compounded my offence against Amanda by throwing her into the bigot category on the site Register-her.com.

For all of that, I apologize, and not only must I admit my error, I am here today to correct it. I now understand that Amanda Marcotte is not a bigot or a female supremacist, or a vile hatemonger as I have previously believed. No, she is none of those things. She is actually a simpleton. I have just read her article published Monday 19 Dec, called "The Good Men Project I Used To Know" in which she excoriates the insufficiently self-abasing male feminist Tom Matlack[1].

In the article, Marcotte makes clear what I have been too lazy to previously notice; that in her conception of reality, "good" and "bad" are code words, and once you have Amanda's secret decoder ring it's obvious that agreement with Amanda is good, while disagreement with Amanda is bad. Marcotte is guilty of none of the failures of character previously attributed to her, because she's incapable of such complicated malice. Her ethic is charmingly uncomplicated and pure. If you agree with her, you are good. Disagree or question, well then you're bad.

However, although now correctly identified as a self absorbed stooge, Amanda's article condemning Matlack to the coal-bin does get a few things wrong, and asks a few questions which, being a civic minded fellow, I'll assist by answering.

I'm here to help, Amanda.

According to Marcotte, "The whole mission behind the Good Men Project is presumably to advocate for good men.." That's cute, I always thought the GMP mission was to pretend to a male friendly point of view, masquerading as a site in favour of male human rights, while feeding the unwary a steady diet of anti-male feminist agitprop. Of course, I previously would have mis-attributed Marcotte's characterization of the GMP as deliberate obfuscation, now it's obvious she's just a blameless dunce.

However, circular as Marcotte's reasoning tends to be, she demands of Mr Matlack answers to questions no man in a feminist-moderated forum has ever been allowed to answer.

1) I wanted examples of these "differences" between men and women that Tom alluded to, but didn't describe.

2) I wanted evidence of how women are not accepting men, and what acceptance would look like."

The answers to these questions are easy to come by, in fact they're present in a substantial fraction of men's rights writing. Unfortunately for Amanda, answers from that camp are not to be considered.

Marcotte's opening paragraph includes the statement : "Personally, I'm a big fan of just banning MRAs. They have nothing of value to add to a conversation…"

Nothing of value, according to Marcotte, which; with my new understanding of her as a conformist dullard, means that answers she doesn't already agree with are "bad" answers.

However, to Amanda's first question on differences between men and women, the fields of biology, cognitive psychology and neurology have, in the past decade supplied a mountain of peer reviewed research establishing sexual differences, and most professionals in those fields don't cross-post their research to MRA blogs. Google is your friend Amanda – except, of course when the answers you find don't conform to your "women good, man bad" ideology. In those cases, then Google is of course, bad.

To Marcotte's second question " I wanted evidence of how women are not accepting men, and what acceptance would look like."

This is two questions, but friendly and helpful fellow that I am, I'll answer both. To the first part, I'll give a couple of examples, starting with Penny Nance of the Concerned Women of America. Nance, along with a large fraction of the feminist mainstream – has noticed that men are increasingly opting out of the traditionally allowed roles for men of protector, provider and disposable utility. This is mischaracterized of course – using language like "man boy" and "peter pan syndrome" in an attempt to shame and manipulate men back onto the zero sum treadmill of service and disposability.

Kay Hymowitz provides another example with "Manning Up How the Rise of Women Has Turned Men Into Boys".

To Hymowitz and her ideological contemporaries, male self actualization in any path other than self sacrificing service to women is intolerable and must be punished, shamed and scorned.

Of course, I'm an MRA – which "by definition" rules my opinion out of consideration, along with any evidence I might provide, so I wont waste Amanda's precious time with any more examples. Getting back to Amanda's world of simple good and bad : "They [MRAs] have nothing of value to add to a conversation, and exist online solely to disrupt any conversation they fear might lead others towards reaching the conclusion that women are people."

This always puzzled me. Since when have women not been people? In what dusty corner of whose demented mind is a woman not a person? In fact – getting general society to treat women as fully enfranchised adults with adult powers and accountability is a major goal of the men's rights movement.

It is your camp, Miss Marcotte, which continues to argue, wheedle and lobby for feminine exemption from anything resembling personal responsibility. Of course, Amanda won't find agreement with this opposing view, making me, by definition, a bad man.

Obviously, this definitional stance betrays the simplistic and dogmatic character of Marcotte's position. That which agrees with Amanda is good, and that which disagrees is bad, and we can tell the difference because Amanda is definitionally right. It's like fundamentalist religious logic, except Marcotte has substituted herself in place of almighty Yahweh. Sadly for her, feminist ideological supremacy has not yet endowed her the legal power to smite questioners or individuals with an objecting conscience.

Marcotte's definition of AVFM founder Paul Elam as an individual who hates women reveals the common feminist failure of conflating the biological female demographic with the ideological camp of feminism. Feminists and women are two separate group identities Amanda. Is that news to you? In her definitional declaration of Elam as a bad man, Marcotte outs herself as an adherent to circular, self referential dogma rejecting all data which doesn't support her ideology. The Amada-Marcotte-Decoder-Ring™ clearly identifies disagreement with Amanda as bad, and agreement with Amanda as good.

When Marcotte, in her condemnation of Good Men Project founder Tom Matlack, demands "you really need to prove it, or even just provide a single piece of supporting evidence."

She's demanding the data she's already declared verbotten. As always Amanda, the men's rights blogging community has provided that data in abundance for years – you're simply unwilling to consider that which your magic decoder ring translates to bad.

Whether Mr. Matlack has the answers Marcotte refuses to consider is of academic concern. He is, after all, a long-term male feminist only just now beginning to assert himself a human apart from his utility to feminist interests. It's going to be a bumpy road for Tom, and the MRA community will likely not offer much help for the distrust he's earned. For Marcotte however, I'll offer my own contribution to her repeated demand for evidence. Citing Marcotte's defenstration of Matlack: "nor does he have evidence that women categorically refuse to accept men who are behaving like decent human beings."

This is anecdotal, rather than peer reviewed research, but I'm not much motivated to provide Marcotte what she could easily uncover herself with three minutes and a search engine. Male utility is what most women (including avowed feminists) value in men.

The following link is to a video in which three overheard conversations are related from a zeta-male point of view. http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=viwI3YUiU4U

If, by the way, Amanda, you don't know what zeta-masculinity is or why it is necessary – The following reading list should cure that area of your ignorance. I am, of course assuming you are capable of learning, an assumption which runs contrary to my recent understanding of you as not a bigot, but merely a simpleminded dunce. I remain an optimist.

http://www.avoiceformen.com/feminism/the-plague-of-modern-masculinity/

http://www.avoiceformen.com/feminism/government-tyranny/breaking-bad-the-male-as-designated-criminal/

http://www.avoiceformen.com/women/the-male-hierarchy-at-closer-inspection/

http://www.avoiceformen.com/men/standing-at-the-zeta-crossroads/

http://www.avoiceformen.com/sexual-politics/evo-psych/a-resounding-silence/

http://www.avoiceformen.com/misandry/chivalry/silence-of-the-the-man/

It's likely Marcotte won't read any of the content provided, as her decoder ring of good and bad blanks anything except flattery. A rewrite of the listed articles with a liberal peppering of her name throughout might overcome this filter, but I doubt the utility of such spoon-feeding.

From Marcotte:

> As a general rule, I ignore anti-feminists who spew bile about women all day on the internet.

Once more, our bright light of feminist thought conflates "women" and "feminists" into one group. As an MRA, I'm able to tell these two groups apart by a number of methods, including that the two words are spelled differently.

Finally, It's worth a passing mention of the absurdity of the definition of good or bad man by anybody except a man. As expected from a mind possessed purely by self interested solipsism – "good" in men is defined by utility.

Marcotte condemns the GMP for Tom's abortive attempts at self determination apart from his use to feminists :

> It seems that we're still going to have to wait for a space truly dedicated to giving voice to "good men."

After the providing the public with a Rosetta Stone to translate feminist valuation of good and bad by utility to self-interested women, I'm left with only two questions. Do other adherents of female supremacist ideology recognize how nakedly and thoroughly Marcotte has outed them?

And, is Amanda the next candidate to be thrown under the bus?

[1] http://pandagon.net/index.php/site/the_good_men_project_i_used_to_know

Fathers At Christmas

Karen Straughan (aka GirlWritesWhat) · 24 December 2011 · Archived copy · Original

The other night, while my boyfriend worked his third to last graveyard shift before Christmas, my kids and I went to my younger son's Christmas concert. In the row in front of us, a young family sat. A mother with a baby maybe five months old, and her husband tending their two other children–a girl of maybe four and a boy of two.

There was this moment, when the little boy was squirming and stood on his chair, that the father looked at him with gentle sternness and said, "Sit down, please." Instead of sitting down, the boy hugged his father and rubbed his chin against the whiskers on his dad's upper lip. Lightly inked arms, strong from blue collar work, wrapped around the little boy and they just gazed at each other, sealed off from the crowd of bored parents by shared affection and love.

Despite the fact that I should be paying attention to the kindergarten class and their barely intelligible rendition of Rudolph the Red-Nosed Reindeer, I couldn't look away from that moment between father and son, as precarious as water held in cupped hands, one stumble and it might be irretrievably spilt.

My older son glanced over at me and asked why I was crying.

I couldn't answer him right away. I've always been a crier, and it's always embarrassed me, which usually leads to more crying. "You must have worn your earplugs," I said, nodding toward the off-key kindergarteners stage, "or you'd be crying too."

But I was remembering another moment in a grocery store, only a few months after my boyfriend and I met, when I'd caught him in a moment of distraction, staring across the aisle with this strange sad smile. I'd looked, and saw a little girl, his daughter's age, who'd accidentally knocked over a display of cereal boxes, and was trying to stack them back up.

It had been five months, at that point, since he'd last seen or had contact with his daughter. I'd met him when the loss was still sharp as a razor to him, and it's a pain that returns to him at times, more than a year later and as much as he tries to lock the door on it, and as much as he knows there's nothing to be done. In the grocery store that day, I knew exactly what he was feeling. I reached for his hand, pressed my lips to his knuckles, and said nothing.

What was there to say?

He did everything right. None of that mattered to anyone who had a say in what would happen. And as helpless as that makes us both feel, we know there is nothing he can do but bear it, and nothing I can do but understand him and give him my love and my support, and let him know he's not alone.

I know there are men here whose losses cut so very deep. And while those losses can never be made less by the simple act of someone taking your hand in understanding, that understanding is first step on the road to a better place.

And to a little girl out there who goes by the name of Ayla, Merry Christmas. Your daddy loves and misses you, and this is your present:

[youtube http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=L64c5vT3NBw]

In defense of an indefensible pastime

B.R. Merrick · 30 December 2011 · Archived copy · Original

I remember when my three-year-old nephew introduced me to addictinggames.com. I'm not much good at computer games, but this site has lots of puzzles that get me to puzzle and puzzle until my puzzler is sore. (An apt paraphrase for this time of year.)

I didn't realize until I was at my parents for "the holiday" (Geez. Why does every special day need to be saddled with this bland moniker now?) – lying there in a lazy boy with a laptop warming the unmentionables – that there is a special section set aside just for boys. Neat. Apparently computer game designers are finally taking notice that some boys like to play, too.

Just click on the word "Boy" in the banner at addictinggames, right next to the word "Funny." There you'll see a small group of games that appeal directly to boys: "Showjumping 2 (Race Your Own Pony!)"; "Gomez [Selena] Kisser (OMG she is so CUTE kiss kiss kiss)"; and "Dress Code Nightclub (Are You Style Enough for the Nightclub?)" But the one game that I think will appeal to impressionable boys and young men the most is the one entitled "The Girlfriend Trainer." I just love the description at the bottom: "Such bad habits, this girlfriend! Catch her in the act and teach her to be good!" And look at the adorable tags: "Cute" and "Naughty"!

I fear, however, that feminists and misandrists will probably misunderstand the nature of this game, since it puts the word "girlfriend" and the word "trainer" in the same phrase without explaining the context. Allow me to shove a little context in here. You start off on: which we'll call "The Roving Eye." On this level, your girlfriend, who has a more active libido than the average female, is constantly checking out cute guys as they pass by your café table. Since you're a cute guy yourself, you don't understand this behavior too well and it's understandably upsetting. After all, you had a cartoon agreement in this cartoon relationship that she would only have eyes for your cute little anime face. Furthermore, she signed the cartoon consent form, which means you've got it in writing.

Level 1

So hit her. Hit her hard enough that it causes a bruise to appear on her cheek for a few seconds. That'll teach her. And if it doesn't (which it won't if you're not paying attention while her eyes light up heart-shaped), just hit her again. The bruises always go away. Besides, she deserves it. Don't worry about any attendant humiliation. She's used to it. As you can see, she peacefully goes back to sipping out of the same glass as you.

Mind you, if you hit her when she's behaving herself, or if you don't hit her the correct number of times at this level, you'll lose one of three hearts (chances to get your training session right) and she'll get pissy. No need to get her mad. If you hit her at precisely the right moment, she'll understand that she has it coming. What you want from her is simple and playing the game is, like your demands, easy. Just haul off and hit and hit and hit to your heart's content. If, like most guys, your gaming skills are sub-par, have no fear. This game is so easy that even you dumb-as-shit types can figure it out. Once she's adequately learned to stop enjoying the beauty of the male form as other men embody it, you can hop up to:

Level 2

which can be referred to as "Pick Up the Room." This is where you get to take it up a notch by using a taser. You know what tasers are, don't you? Little electrocution devices used by the police that only kill people sometimes. Be cool. This is merely a cartoon taser. Nobody expects boys to actually take it seriously. We in the men's movement know that the majority of males are non-violent. It's only a joke, for shits and giggles.

Anyway, whenever your honey drops a newspaper or one of her skimpy little outfits on the floor, zap! Remember that these devices are only slightly and temporarily harmful, and they also get women's brains to actually work. ("Damn, woman, why don't you listen??!!") After she's been thoroughly tased over and over again, you're ready for: which can be thought of as "The Remote and the Whine Wine." Just turn on the television to the game you want to watch, and see if she strays from the rules again. You'll know if she's not quite with the program if she picks up the remote to change the channel from the all-important game, or if she picks up the glass of wine instead of juice. In spite of the fact that a small amount of wine consumption with meals is now thought to be good for the digestive system, juice is still considered better for you. You're only looking out for her. It doesn't even matter that you apparently keep wine in your house. Oh, unless this is one of those priceless, irreplaceable wines. Did she go down in the cellar without your permission? Boy, is she going to get it.

Level 3

So, every time she goes for the wine or the remote, whack her with a fly swatter. It doesn't hurt nearly as much as an electrocution device, but the annoyance and humiliation of the fly swatter ought to be enough for this level. And may I remind any offended female readers, who are reading and reading until their readers are sore, that this is just a silly computer game? Get over yourselves! Sheesh! Once you're over yourselves, you can go to:

Level 4

and "Out on a Drive." Since women prefer to drive with their boyfriends in the passenger seat; since they really enjoy going out of their way to plan dates, pay for them, pick you up at your place, get your doors for you, and pull out your chair; you can rest assured that they also don't mind being told how fast to drive. This is the level where you get to use a leash, like you would with a dog (in this case, a bitch). And this ain't no ordinary leash; it's a choke collar. Every time she starts to drive too fast, choke her. Now, I didn't say choke her to death, or anything approaching organ failure. For Pete's sake, you're out on a date! She'll resist, but after a couple of seconds, the car will slow down again so that you don't have to choke and choke and choke her. I have to admit, I never made it through this fourth and final level. I'm afraid that being a professional doofus precludes me from getting any better at the game (union rules). To be honest, I think it's timed poorly. I watched my cartoon girlfriend very carefully, making sure to click the mouse at exactly the precise moment she put the cartoon pedal to the cartoon metal, but I kept running out of time. I don't get it.

Oh. You should also choke her whenever she tries to turn up her lousy, bland, plastic, Barbie-doll, manufactured, techno crap music. I don't care if it's her car.

See all the harmless fun you can have with cyber-violence instead of the real deal? All your relational difficulties, all those little annoying things she does, all that built-up aggression, and you can be "in charge" of the relationship virtually, with a simple mouse click. Even the most strident, not-all-women-are-like-that feminist couldn't possibly make an argument against that, could she? It's just pretend authority that you're imposing, not actual, and just look at all of the wonderful things that open-minded boys are learning:

- It's okay to hit a girl if you feel justified.
- It's okay to hit a girl if you're certain that she deserves it.
- You should only hit girls who are bigger than you. The culture has imbued larger-sized people with the idea that they should never hit back, so you're perfectly safe.
- You should never hit, electrocute, or choke a girl hard enough that the bruises or injuries are permanent. You are only trying to communicate. Again, we in the men's movement do not advocate organ failure. I don't know how many times I have to say it. Besides, permanent injury can be used as evidence against you. Avoid it like the plague.
- It has been clinically proven that enjoyment of interactive, virtual violence never leads to actual violence. I just opened a clinic; did I tell you?
- You should fully expect girls to never strike back. They are, after all, the fairer sex. If they do hit back, either out of "self-defense" or "retribution," cry foul. Their violence is worse and far more frightening than yours. Once you get the attention of passers-by, cry a lot. That will get you sympathy.
- You should only hit girls and never other boys. Boys and girls are different, except when they're the same. The Patriarchy will tell you when.

- Hitting girls is funny.

Feminists may shudder at these lessons, but it is true, isn't it, that we're done oppressing women? Why shouldn't we have a little fun now? Or is the huge, decades-long dialogue over breast cancer only happening because there's not enough funding yet?

I apologize for so many links and questions, and for the overload of sarcasm and satire. Wait. No, I don't.

In all seriousness, I knew a woman who was in an abusive relationship. She was intelligent, funny, and conversational. Her husband was lazy and inconsiderate. He never once had a kind word for her. He was rude, critical, bossy, and frequently put her down for his own amusement. She put up with it for the sake of her marriage. Then he beat on her. Then she left him.

I also knew a non-abusive man who peacefully divorced his wife who then sought revenge for her hurt by taking the good, decent father of her children to court, bankrupting him in a bitter custody dispute. No beating was required.

But back to the female abuse victim. She now lives on a Southern pig farm with a nice guy. Neither one of them requires being told what to do by the other, nor does either one of them hit or otherwise treat the other like dirt. I'm sure the leash her second husband bought her is much nicer and goes with everything.

Oops! A bit more sarcasm leaked out. Don't worry. I'll clean it up. A dog eventually eats his own vomit, you know.

Systemic gendered violence?

Karen Straughan (aka GirlWritesWhat) · 31 December 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Okay, so the other day, I came across a comment from a feminist that went something like this: "Men and women have different issues. Men have to solve fairness in child custody, family maintenance, and stuff like that. Women have the problem of systemic, gendered violence directed at them on a global scale."

Um…okay, sounds serious. On the other hand, when I think of systemic gendered violence, and I look at the real world and what goes on in it, it's becoming more and more apparent to me that systemic, gendered violence is not a female problem.

Let's look at domestic violence, the quintessential example of gendered violence against women. Any well-informed MRA, and many an egalitarian, could tell you that intimate partner violence is perpetrated roughly equally between genders, and that the causal factors tend to be identical no matter the gender of the perpetrator. Men and women suffer that violence in roughly equal numbers, too.

In fact, the only gendered aspects of intimate partner violence seem to be in report rates and society's response to it. Women are much more likely to report being abused than men are. Men are more likely to be arrested (even if they were not the physically violent partner). State-funded domestic violence victim services overwhelmingly serve female victims, and even our federal legislation explicitly excludes male victims from many of its protections and benefits. Hell, some domestic violence shelters will not shelter the children of battered women if those children are over 16 and male.

Huh. Seems to me as if women feel they should not have to put up with being physically abused by their partners, and society agrees with them. And it seems to me like men feel they have to put up with being abused by their partners, and society agrees with them, too. The social and political consensus appears to be that domestic violence against women is intolerable, while domestic violence against men is…well, who cares? And boys? Our society fails them, too.

[image]One has only to look at the recent Verizon ad on domestic violence to see every single disgusting stereotype we hold as a society distilled into a single piece of distorted propaganda. The father is the monster (because only men are abusers, don't you know). Mother and daughter are terrified victims. The son is not a victim, but a monster-in-the-making. We're not supposed to care about the trauma he suffers, other than that it might lead him to be an abuser of women and girls in the future. He's not a victim, he's a potential future perpetrator. His suffering means nothing to us, other than the fact that his suffering might lead him to victimize others.

But what about sexual violence, you might ask? The common wisdom is that rape is "overwhelmingly perpetrated by men on women." But one huge, cross-cultural study on sexual coercion in relationships found, again, roughly equal numbers of victims and perpetrators between genders within heterosexual relationships. Men were just as likely to be forced or verbally coerced into sexual intercourse by their female partners as women were by their male partners.

Moreover, the CDC's most recent report on sexual victimization–if one goes to the bother of amalgamating all the categories into two pools of "non-consensual sexual intercourse" perpetrated on men and women… even this report shows parity in the numbers of male and female previous-year victims. Yet how aware are we, as a society, of sexual violence against men? Or boys, for that matter?

Sexual violence and exploitation of underage males by adult women is almost never characterized as rape in the media. The preferred language titillates rather than evoking outrage: "teacher seduces male student," "forbidden love," "teacher's dirty little secret fling," "hot for teacher." It actually seems to me that the only way a boy will even be seen as a real victim within the public consciousness is if the perpetrator is an adult male, at which point pervasive and lingering homophobia overrides our view of the kinds of sexual violence against males that are acceptable in our culture.

While we're justifiably appalled at the idea of a barely pubescent girl married off to an adult man in Afghanistan, how aware are we that adolescent and preadolescent boys are bought and sold there–often in order to support female family members–when the authorities in that country choose to look the other way?

When we look at some real numbers, we find that sexual victimization of children is not really a gendered problem. Victims are both male and female. Perpetrators are also male and female, with larger percentages of female perpetrators coming to light all the time, as we start asking less biased questions on surveys.

Yet, at the same time, one recent study done by a children's charity showed that 80% of sexually abused children who disclosed victimization by a woman were not believed by the first person they told, even though the majority of them disclosed to people whose job it is to keep kids safe–police, crisis lines, counsellors, teachers. And adult men who report sexual victimization by women, even in informal settings? The first question asked is usually, "Well, was she hot?" Followed by something along the lines of, "wish I could get raped by some hot chick."

It seems clear to me that interpersonal violence–sexual or otherwise–perpetrated against women and girls is strongly condemned by both society and the system, while that perpetrated against men and boys is largely minimized or ignored.

Now let's look at other kinds of violence, such as stranger violence–muggings, stranger assaults, random homicides–and state violence. Here, the statistics clearly show that men are the overwhelming majority of victims of assault, homicide, war violence, and state violence against its citizens.

The vast majority of mugging victims, or victims of random violence and murder, are males. As are the vast majority of those unjustly incarcerated as political prisoners by totalitarian regimes; those who are beaten, killed and arrested during times of political upheaval, those who are forcibly conscripted as children in the Third World. Displaced people who don't survive long enough to make it to refugee camps are almost always male, and on a global scale, even those whose genitals are mutilated due to cultural norms are overwhelmingly male.

At the same time, how many times have we all heard, on Remembrance or Memorial Days, of the "brave service men and women who made the ultimate sacrifice"? WWI saw 10 million male soldiers killed on all sides, and no female soldiers killed. That there were some women killed during WWI is not something I'm going to debate–of course there were. But those women dying, them making the ultimate sacrifice, was not an expectation. They were not involved in the war effort as combat soldiers, whose role was to die for their country. The women who died during wartime were unintended casualties, while the men who died were filling their assigned role. Dying in war is a tragedy when it happens to women, and simply the way things are when it happens to men.

At a time when there are global efforts to end female genital mutilation, there is a huge program on the part of the world health organization to mutilate baby boys in Africa, for the betterment of African societies. This is a sacrifice not only expected of those boys, but demanded of them, a violence against infant boys that is par for the course, when equivalent violence toward females is abhorred.

And I think a lot of what I'm talking about is illustrated beautifully by a very recent shit-storm in the media: The Egyptian woman in the blue bra. For those unaware, the headlines went something like this: "Female protester stripped and beaten by Egyptian police".

Um…watching the video, all I can see is a woman getting the typical beat-down any protester would get in that part of the world, whose garment came open as they were dragging her away. In fact, police moved to cover her back up after they'd pulled her out of the area.

This incident led to the UN expressing concerns that Egyptian police were "targeting" female protesters. Um….what? It was one woman. How does that equate to targeting women? Moreover, if they weren't "targeting women" before this incident, then who were they targeting during the protests up until that point, during the countless beatings, killings and arrests that occurred in the months leading up to this incident? The incident also spurred unprecedented protests by Egyptian women, who marched the streets chanting slogans.

Let's think about that for just one moment. While these protests are admirable in their way, because it's always good to see women as well as men standing up and fighting against tyranny, how many Egyptian men had been beaten, killed and jailed by this point, while these women remained silent at home? And yet all it took was a single goddamn woman in a blue bra to spur them to action? Where were they when it was men suffering for the political freedom of all Egyptians?

But when I think about the words they chanted as they marched down the street, it is they themselves who answer this question, as honestly as can be: "Drag me, strip me. My brother's blood will cover me."

It's right there, in the words they chanted: it's men's place to inflict violence and to absorb it, on behalf of society and of women. A single female victim of state violence will lead the women of Egypt to rise up and pledge their brothers' lives–not their own–to avenging that wrong. And yet it is women who suffer systemic gendered violence across the globe?

This cognitive dissonance on the part of both feminists and larger society is…incomprehensible to me. "Systemic gendered violence" pertains to violence against a specific gender that is aided, enabled, endorsed, accepted, normalized or required by the sociopolitical system in which it occurs.

There is nothing gendered about interpersonal violence–even sexual violence–against women and girls, since men and boys suffer this type of violence in roughly equal numbers. Moreover, there is nothing systemic in that interpersonal violence against women, since all of society believes it is a serious social problem in need of solutions.

Violence against men, in any form? This is both gendered, in that many forms of violence affect men vastly disproportionately compared to the levels at which they affect women, and it is absolutely systemic, in that the system sees that absorption of violence by men as beneficial, no big deal, even a requirement, and enables and perpetuates it by minimizing, glorifying or ignoring it.

According to Hilary Clinton:

> Strike a woman and you strike all of society.

And as I say:

> Strike a man and it's business as usual.

That is the very definition of systemic violence against a specific gender. When it's business as usual.

The very fact that feminists can see systemic gendered violence as a problem women suffer–when they don't–and a problem men don't suffer–when they do…tells you a lot about their ideas of male and female roles, how equality works, and where the motivation for all their advocacy seems to lie. And it seems to lie right in line with patriarchy: Protect the women at all costs.

I've often said that feminists–male or female–are the very people who are the most at the mercy of their evolutionary instincts. And how could it be otherwise, when one looks at all the facts, and deny all of that objective reality in favor of what feels right: Protect the women, and who cares about the men?

http://www.csulb.edu/~mfiebert/assault.htm

http://www.mediaradar.org/docs/Dutton_GenderParadigmInDV-Pt1.pdf

http://lab.drdondutton.com/wp-content/uploads/2011/02/Dutton-D.G.-Corvo-K.-20…

http://pubpages.unh.edu/~mas2/ID45-PR45.pdf

http://www.kidscape.org.uk/assets/downloads/Femalesexualabuseofchildren.pdf

http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=oua2y11BMxw

http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=J1Iawx1sRrw

ANZAC Day

Greg Canning · 31 December 2011 · Archived copy · Original

ANZAC Day is Australia's national day of remembrance for those who made sacrifices, including the ultimate sacrifice of giving their lives for their country. ANZAC stands for the Australian and New Zealand Army Corps. The men of that corps landed on the beaches of the Gallipoli Peninsula at dawn on 25 April 1915, as part of the ill-conceived and poorly executed allied plan to gain naval access to the Dardanelles and ultimately the Black Sea ports. Their determination and perseverance in the face of adversity and acts of heroism and self-sacrifice created a legendary reputation for ANZACs that subsequent generations of Australian soldiers have emulated.

Officially named and celebrated for the first time in 1916, ANZAC day has evolved to hold a special meaning for Australians, also remembering the sacrifices of our service men and women in subsequent conflicts. ANZAC Day has also attracted controversy over the years, and attendances at remembrance ceremonies declined in the aftermath of the Vietnam War, when some mistakenly believed it represented a glorification of war, rather an acknowledgement of self-sacrifice. Recent years however have seen a resurgence of interest and attendance at ANZAC day events, with particular enthusiasm shown by younger Australian's and school children.

ANZAC day has always held special meaning for my family. My father was 19 when the Second World War commenced, but unlike many of his contemporaries he did not immediately enlist. Whilst he rarely spoke of it, he was well aware of the futility of the WWI campaigns on foreign soil that saw the loss of 60,000 Australian men's lives for negligible strategic gains. However, as the second war evolved the Japanese advance through South East Asia and the Pacific posed a direct threat to the Australian soil, and by July of 1941 he considered it his duty to enlist in the defense of his homeland.

According to his discharge papers he served for 1694 days and was involved in the battles for Milne Bay, the Buna and Sanananda Beach Heads (on the northern coast of Papua New Guinea), Shaggy Ridge and mop up operations in New Britain. The arduous and degrading conditions and events of these campaigns are matters of well documented historical record and many books, including Peter Brune's 2003 classic, A Bastard of a Place.

Following the battle of Buna in late 1942 his battalion, the 2/9 Australian Infantry, was sent to reinforce the protracted stalemate that had developed at the largest and most strongly fortified Japanese beach head at Sanananda.

On 12 Dec 1942 Dad was wounded early in the day by a Japanese sniper, and lay on the battlefield till near dusk when an American Army Medic, from a flanking unit, dragged him under heavy fire to safety. We do not know who that brave American was, but my 2 brothers and 6 sisters owe him a great debt of gratitude, indeed our very existence. The alliances forged between US and Australian Soldiers in the Pacific Campaigns continue to this day on both strategic and personal levels.

So perhaps you are asking why I am writing about ANZAC day at this time? Well, when the whole O'Shaggesy/Radfem Hub thing blew up, and perhaps in a moment of poor judgment, I registered to receive notifications of new posts to the Radfem Hub site, and periodically my inbox is contaminated with their filth. Such was the case this Friday when I was alerted to the post titled "Lest we forget," penned by "Rainsinger." (By the way if Kyle or AO or anyone has info on the identity of "Rainsinger" please let me know as I would like to expose her to the Australian public prior to 25 April 2012.)

Rainsinger would like to reassign to ANZAC day what should, of course, all along have been its true meaning, but Australians were apparently too blinded by patriarchal oppression to see it. ANZAC day should really be about 'Women Against Rape in War,' because there is a "complete lack of human respect for women's systematic ritualized rapes/deaths." She laments that in 1984 "the women who marched way-back at the rear of the formal military parade, to just lay a wreath on the war memorial cenotaphs, in memory of our own war dead and injured," and carried a banner reading:

"IN MEMORY OF ALL WOMEN

IN ALL COUNTRIES

RAPED IN ALL WARS"

did not receive an overwhelmingly positive reaction from the gathered crowds!

Typical of feminist cognitive dissonance she then goes on, presumably in an attempt to justify her stance on the issue, to spend several long paragraphs describing various elements of Greek Mythology, Legends of the founding of Prague and Rome, and a 2009, the Czech film "The Pagan Queen"?

Nope, feminists don't require any verifiable historical facts to support their stance. Irrelevant myth and legend will do quite nicely. Eventually she returns to the topic, which is "mass rape/murder/sacrifice of females to the Greater Glory of Man" and how ANZAC day should really be a forum to mourn the female victims of war atrocities, somehow believing that women are denied the right to do this.

Nope women have never been denied the right to voice their opinions. It is just the tasteless, vulgar, contrived selfish ones, who would try to minimize the sacrifice of men like my Dad – and his comrades who did not return to have the chance of starting a family – in order to make ideological statements desecrating their memory, on their day. Yes ladies, these guys laid down their lives to protect your rights of free speech, but apparently don't deserve your respect for having done so.

I am hopeful that the alliances being forged here at AVFM, between the men and women of different nations, can see significant strategic gains made in our war against feminist supremacists and their goals of extinguishing masculinity and eradicating men.

A BASTARD OF A PLACE

Feminists: demented, stunned or cultists

John Hembling (JtO) · 2 January 2012 · Archived copy · Original

Why Do MRAs Keep Attacking Feminism?

Feminism is a label used to identify two major sets of viewpoints and ideologies. Because they apparently oppose one another, I've argued in the past that re-branding would ameliorate much of the confusion of conflicting ideologies with the same name. Two different points of view, which, to outsiders appear to oppose one another, yet continue to both call themselves feminism, albeit with different prefixes. Liberal feminism and radical feminism, might seem like different ideologies to a feminist, but prog-rock and hard rock don't appear much apart to a follower of baroque chamber music.

When I made the suggestion of re-branding, the small number of liberal feminists I was in routine contact with experienced a collective melt down, insisting that their own version was the "true feminism" and that all others were corruptions. I was roundly excoriated for my suggestion. However, since that minor controversy, my own viewpoint has changed based on an increased understanding of the ideology in it's different versions, but still operating under that label.

For purpose of discussion, two main camps are identifiable, one which we can call liberal feminism, and the other, radical feminism. Liberal Feminism is the ideology most people are familiar with, and is, on it's face, similar to a philosophy of humanism. This is the ideology's great disguise. Superficial examination of liberal feminism reveals a drive toward equality of legal rights between men and women, a libertarian view of bodily autonomy, sexual self determination, and equal access to opportunity. These are all goals a humanist or a small-L libertarian would support, and which are represented in feminist literature written for a non-feminist general public. What differentiates liberal feminism from true humanism is that all these goals are taken in the context of patriarchy theory. That is the name of a specific dogma of the ideology of feminism.

According to wikipedia, Patriarchy is a social system in which the role of the male as the primary authority figure is central to social organization, and where fathers hold authority over women, children, and property. It implies the institutions of male rule and privilege, and entails female subordination. In short, men rule society. The lack of veracity of this claim will be addressed shortly.

Patriarchy theory is not a theory in the scientific sense. It could be used to make testable predictions, such as a prediction that men receive favourable treatment by the criminal or the family courts, or that they die on the job at lower rates than women, or commit suicide a lower rates then women. However, if "patriarchy theory" were examined with any degree of intellectual rigour, it would be immediately discredited and forcibly discarded. The persistence of the idea as a foundation of feminism, and the aversion of feminist adherents to critical evaluation of this dogma suggests it is part of an ideology rather than a philosophy.

The difference between ideology and philosophy being a matter of rigidity and adaptability to conflicting data. In contrast with a philosophy, an Ideology starts from a fixed idea, deemed "the truth" and discards or suppresses nonconforming evidence. In spite of the untenability of the core doctrine of "patriarchy theory," liberal feminism is the friendly face of the ideology, which when challenged uses the humanist goals of equal legal rights, bodily autonomy and other humanist ideas to diffuse suggestions that it is a supremacist hate movement.

By contrast, radical feminism is liberal feminism's ugly, violent and politically potent big sister. The core views of this brand of feminist ideology are reflected in the writings of a number of feminist authors. Valerie Solanas's SCUM Manifesto Susan Brownmiller's Against Our Will being examples.

Radical feminism is unambiguously an ideology of violence, female supremacy and class hatred. Brownmiller wrote in 1971

> Man discovered that his genitalia could serve as a weapon to prehistoric times, along with the use of > fire and the first crude stone axe. From prehistoric times to the present, I believe, rape has played a critical function. It is nothing more or less than a conscious process of intimidation by which all men keep all women in a state of fear.

In this execrable passage, Brownmiller indicts every man on Earth for participation in a conspiracy to consciously brutalize and terrorize every woman. The author, who regularly writes for sites such as Huffington Post, still touts her authorship of this hate literature, with no apparent remorse or contrition. In comparison, Valerie Solanas' manifesto is characterized by the opening declaration:

> The male is a biological accident: the Y (male) gene is an incomplete X (female) gene, that is, it has an incomplete set of chromosomes. In other words, the male is an incomplete female, a walking abortion, aborted at the gene stage. To be male is to be deficient, emotionally limited; maleness is a deficiency disease and males are emotional cripples.

However, as obviously hateful and reality-challenged as such views are, the ideology embracing and developing these doctrines is not at the fringe of the feminist movement. This radical version of feminism has built steadily on its foundation of relatively simple-minded hate, into a murderous, antihuman ideology of hatred and genocidal ambition. It is radical feminists, the ideological inheritors of Solanas, Brownmiller and Dworkin who now occupy tenured positions in major universities, who write white papers for the United Nations and who rewrite law and craft domestic policy. Radical feminism is the politically potent, mainstream and established flavor of the ideology.

Following the exposure of the contents of a clandestine radical feminist online message board, it has become evident that rather than marginal, politically impotent, low influence shut-ins, the individuals advocating sex-selective infanticide, mass murder and eugenics are published authors, advisors to government, and senior, tenured academicians. Indeed, the political and academic elite of western nations have been poisoned by an ideology of irrational, violent hatred toward half the population. While individual radical feminists refer derisively to moderate feminists as "fun feminists" – they absolutely depend on the humanist cover provided by these moderates who are in reality, a politically impotent minority.

This is the mask which must be stripped away if an agenda of apartheid and mass murder is to be avoided.

In Australia, a radical feminist conference named after Solanas's manifesto for genocide was held between September 23-25th, 2011. Two members of the Radfem Hub and Radfem forum, Danielle Elina Pynnonen (Allecto) and her partner, Kat "Kitten Pinder (Amazon Mancrusher) organized and hosted the three day event in Perth, which they called the 'SCUM Conference'. They billed it as:

[box type="alert" icon="none"]THRILL SEEKING FEMALES UNITE! Life in this society being, at best, an utter bore, this THREE DAY RADICAL FEMINIST CONFERENCE is for civic-minded, responsible, thrill-seeking females who want to overthrow the government, eliminate the money system, institute complete automation and destroy the male sex.[/box]

For reference, Danielle Elina Pynnonen is the child-care worker who labeled a 9 year old boy in her care as "Mr Rape Threat," and discussed the open desire to harm him and other male children in her care.

Quoting her comments on the rad-fem-hub site:

> I honestly have been reassessing the fact that I am giving care to these little future rapists, and what that says about me and my separatism. I know it is kinda going against my principles to support and care for these little fuckers.

Kat Pinder is a former contestant on the TV show Big Brother, who was booted from the show for disruptive behavior and property damage. Evaluating the account provided by the online blog for the show, Pinder appears to be an individual afflicted by High Conflict Personality Disorder. Whether this is due to upbringing or malfunctioning brain chemistry is a matter of academic interest only. Surely a self entitled, personality disordered rich white girl is the one to tell the rest of the world how oppressed she is due to being daddy's little princess.

However, although examination of these individuals reveals them as low integrity, personality damaged violent sociopaths, they align with ideological contemporaries who have conned their way into positions of public trust and authority all over the world.

This is reflected in a male-hostile environment in higher education[1], while female-favouring affirmative action admission policies and university-endorsed anti male hate-rallies combine to push male students out of school. To clarify, affirmative action is a pleasant-sounding name for a policy of discriminatory treatment of one demographic over another. It is a synonym for apartheid.

The success of the hate fuelled ideology of radical feminism is further evident in mainstream commentary excoriating and condemning masculinity as the source of all social pathology. This is so universally common the contained class hatred passes unnoticed without tedious and explicit explanation in each case. The UNICEF public literature on domestic violence identifies women and children as victims, and excludes men from any category besides perpetrators.

This reflects a picture in opposition to that provided by the majority of peer reviewed literature[3], which shows men and women coequally committing domestic abuse. For an institution as well funded and organized as UNICEF, this cannot be attributed to error or omission. Around North America, law enforcement policies and domestic policy are shaped by an ideologically driven, methodologically flawed "theory" of domestic violence which starts from the unexamined assumption that men are innately evil. This is called the duluth model[4], and despite it's well known departure from credible research and statistical analysis of domestic violence, it's application continues. The model focuses solely on the men's use of violence in abusive relationships, rather than on the behavior of all parties concerned, as would be necessary for any model to be effective in violence reduction.

"Programs based on the Duluth Model may ignore research linking domestic violence to substance abuse and psychological problems, such as attachment disorders, traced to childhood abuse or neglect, or the absence of a history of adequate socialization and training.[5][6]

Donald Dutton is a psychology professor at the University of British Columbia who has studied abusive personalities. According to Dutton:

> The Duluth Model was developed by people who didn't understand anything about therapy.

An exhaustive list of examples would change the focus of this discussion, however, what is obvious from even the few listed is that the ongoing narrative of men as villains and perpetrators and women as eternal, permanent victims is a doctrine immune to contrary evidence, peer reviewed study or even common experience of men and women living in the real world. Whether argued from the camp of radical, kill-all-men feminism, or it's politically correct cover version posing as humanism, the doctrine endorsing patriarchy has all the tenacity, the immunity from reason, the immunity from data and logic that characterize religious cults.

Radical or moderate adherents to this ideology are, it is increasingly obvious; followers of a religion. Here, of course, I am likely offending individuals who follow any of the primitive mythologies of the desert dwelling goat herders of the iron age mid-east. Taken as an example, Christianity is a death cult which worships the murdered human scapegoat of the rest of humanity's transgressions. It's mostly treated as normal by conformists in the continental United States. However, this relatively old cult is based on a scripture which makes as much objective sense as the Norse creation myth from the bones of the ice giant Ymir, the ancient greek, or the creation myths of native North American stone age humans.

The religion of feminism, whether radical or liberal, by adhering to "patriarchy theory" counter-indicated by male death rates on the job, suicide rates, lifespan, income disposal disposable etc; is similar to other fundamentalist cults by it's persistence and the reality-denial of it's adherents.

However, after recognition of what appears to be emotional attachment to dogma, another model besides religious conviction emerges. The established behavior in proponents of both the radical and liberal female-centrism of refuting male-rights argument with accusation, obfuscation, censure and goalpost mobility is explainable by emotional arrest.

An Insight to Motivation:

One of the ongoing campaigns of radical feminism, of reclassifying the physical expression of love and affection between adults as a violent crime has always been impenetrably confusing to this author. To exploit the human need for physical intimacy in men and women as a weapon for vilifying one half of the human race appears on surface examination; a deeply evil tactic. To re-label something beautiful as the ugliest of crimes seems a most depraved and vicious tool of political and legal leverage.
As an optimistic person, it was always difficult coming to terms with the idea that a large subset of the female population was possessed by such amoral malice and conscious will to do harm. The radical feminist view; that male sexual agency is inherently malicious, was very hard to explain without viewing it's proponents as thoroughly vile. Alternative explanations such as prevalent dementia or intellectual failure, while more palatable than an explanation of evil, seemed far less probable.

However, in recent discussions posted at AVfM, I have on several occasions suggested the hypothesis that Western society provides scant, or no motivation for women to develop emotionally beyond a childish and selfish mode of pure self interest. Certainly, an emotionally immature mind is far easier to deceive and influence, which is why corporations like McDonalds, Coca-Cola, and RJ Reynolds Tobacco bend so much effort to market their products to children. Emotionally immature individuals are more malleable and easier to sell to.

This is why for at least several generations, a major fraction of adult females have operated with the singular self-interest and disregard for others of overgrown children. We provide no incentive, indeed substantial disincentive for women to grow up. Controlling a customer base through flattery, greed, envy and guilt is far easier than appealing to critical thinking or rational analysis. Similarly, love, affection and empathy take on substantially different characters in a mature adult's mind than in an immature child.

An adult understanding of love and affection beyond the simple desire for self gratification means that expressed love through physical intimacy is perceived merely as satiation of appetite from an immature point of view. Seen through this lens, the feminist narrative that male/female sexual congress is oppressive and exploitive is suddenly comprehensible.

In addition, the radical feminist doctrine denying female adult agency and volition is also compatible with a model of emotionally arrested development.

> A woman who has sex with a man, therefore, does so against her will, even if she does not feel forced. – Judith Levine
>
> In a patriarchal society, all heterosexual intercourse is rape because women, as a group, are not strong enough to give meaningful consent. Catharine MacKinnon
>
> When a woman reaches orgasm with a man she is only collaborating with the patriarchal system, eroticizing her own oppression. Sheila Jeffrys

By the tenant of radical feminist doctrine, female agency and volition does not exist, and the illusion of the ability of a woman to make a self determined choice is an illusion used by "the patriarchy" to further oppress each woman.

This is not a new doctrine of radical feminism, but a persistent one. To an outsider to that ideology, it seems flatly absurd until and unless it is examined from the viewpoint that adult women may be emotionally infantile, and like children, controlled by a the parental influence of men. Men; who being responsible (for all evil) are mature and accountable adults. If this idea is tenable, then while men must shoulder all accountability for ill, they must also carry responsibility for good in the world. Indeed, in addition to human damage through history, almost all modern medicine, philosophy, science, art, literature, music, innovation, and the improvement over time of human living standards can be blamed squarely on men.

Taken to a logical conclusion, if radical feminists are correct, and females lack personal agency, then revocation of the rights of enfranchised adulthood must be immediately effected. Only a self determined and accountable adult can vote, own property, testify in a courtroom, hold public office, or be taken seriously in expression. Radical feminists must, if they are correct, immediately declare females the wholly owned chattels of the only responsible human beings, namely men.

As a humanist, a small L libertarian and a men's rights advocate, I strongly disagree with this absence of individual agency in women. My relatively new understanding of culturally induced infantilism does provide a explanation of what previously appeared deeply malicious behavior. I also hope for and encourage women, self identifying feminists or not, to grow up.

Addendum: I will not be holding my breath in anticipation of this outcome.

[1] http://www.ccl-cca.ca/ccl/Reports/OtherReports/201104GenderReport.html
[2] http://www.usatoday.com/news/education/2005-10-19-male-college-cover_x.htm

[3] http://csulb.edu/~mfiebert/assault.htm
[4] http://www.theduluthmodel.org/about/index.html
[5] http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Duluth_model

[6] http://www.chicagotribune.com/news/local/chi-abusers-02-jan02,0,1147422.story?page=2
[7] http://www.themensproject.ca/files/uploads/stfnetw_tmp2-files/menandhealingfinal.pdf

Neely Steinberg loves you, as long as you don't love yourself

Paul Elam · 3 January 2012 · Archived copy · Original

Neely Steinberg, the relationship/dating columnist for Blast Magazine, has a lot of things she loves about men; Twenty, to be exact. She posted the complete list as part of an article over at the Good Men Project, an online publication that has, by a rather strange twist of events, begun to accommodate some actual defense of men in recent days, and in the process has alienated some people whose bread and butter resides in attacks on the same.

But before we rush to praise this newfound religion, we should take a moment to examine Steinberg's ideas, especially as honest money says they echo the oft stated sentiments of GMP founder Tom Matlack, and his increasingly vocal shill, Lisa Hickey, regarding men and masculinity. I bring Tom into this because Steinberg's piece is indicative of where I think Tom has wanted the GMP to go all along.

So what are the qualities in a man that makes Neely's heart go all aflutter, and lifts it up on the wings of her womanly passion? Here's her version of the testosterone top 20:

[box type="note" icon="none"]

I love when a man puts his hand on the small of a woman's lower back, as if to say, I'm here for you if you need me.

I love when a man wipes away a woman's tears or pushes a strand of her hair away from her face, tucking it lovingly behind her ear.

I love how millions of men go off to work every day and then come home after long work hours to share in the housework and child-rearing.

I love how men contribute hundreds of millions of dollars every year to charities in the U.S. and across the globe.

I love when a man makes us feel like women.

I love when a man waits patiently inside an elevator to let all the ladies out first.

I love how a man who would go to the ends of the earth for a woman he loves.

I love how a man who will rub his partner's feet at the end of the day even though he's had a hard day at work too.

I love the men who so bravely and willingly risk their lives in service to our country and to protect us all.

I love being Little Spoon.

I love the way a man looks into his child's eyes and loses himself.

I love that men's various discoveries throughout the ages (scientific, mathematical, medical, etc.) have made our lives easier.

I love the way a man runs into the ocean like maniac.

I love the shape of a man's big, strong back when he leans over to pick up something heavy.

I love when a man knows what to say and what not to say to make a woman happy.

I love when a man tells a woman how lucky he is to have found her.

I love the way a man takes a woman's delicate hand, brings it to his lips, and kisses it gently, showing how much he adores her.

I love when a man chows down on his food, as if only a 9.0 Richter Scale earthquake could shake him from his glorious feast.

I love how a man in love thinks of his partner's sexual pleasure before his own.

I love a man who will do the jobs that most of us would never consider. Sewer inspector, anyone?

[/box]

I understand the appeal. There was a time in my life when I thought the world of people who didn't clutter my life with their own needs or concerns for their own well-being; who did all the nasty, painful, dangerous and sacrificing tasks in life, while I got to remain protected, carefree and clueless. I got to live on a pedestal at the expense of others, and I didn't have to consider the cost.

Yes, I remember it clearly now. It was called childhood. It was a time that was, in retrospect, one of unending self-indulgence – provided by responsible people that knew such sacrifices came with raising someone who, by the nature of life, was relatively helpless. Fortunately, they also took the responsibility of walking me through pain of growing out of that and showing me the more realistic world that did not revolve around me.

Am I being verbose? Well, I could have summed all this up in one sentence.

When the things I loved about people were the closest to the twenty items on Steinberg's list, it was also the time that I didn't have the maturity to care about anyone else's needs and wants but my own.

What else could such a list represent?

Twenty reasons to love? No, Neely, twenty narcissistic fantasies; twenty ideas that reveal your belief that you are more inherently valuable than the men you claim to love. And for me, twenty eye rolls and twenty reasons to figure that your notions of love originate not in the heart, but the mirror.

You tell us you "love the men who so bravely and willingly risk their lives in service to our country and to protect us all." Well, as a man who wore the uniform, please allow me to say thank you for that. I will remember to carry your message of "love" on my next trip to the V.A. Hospital, and pass it along to the young men with no legs; men whose bodies and lives have been shredded and shattered and piled up through the ages at your entitled feet. I will tell them all is not lost. They have love of Neely Steinberg, internet relationship guru from Boston.

But first please indulge me with a question or two. Did it ever occur to you to plead with these men you "love" not to put themselves in harm's way? Is it not strange, even perverse, that in a world terrorized with illicit wars, that you dangle love like a carrot for the men who leave body parts, or everything, on the battlefield?

And please tell me, if you really loved these men, in the most pure and real definition of the word, and you support their being fodder, would you not be better off talking of your willingness to stand with them where the metal meets the meat, willing to offer your own blood for whatever cause you have deemed sufficient to demand their sacrifice? Or are you just satisfied in a world where they fall in your stead while you bestow platitudes and hollow affections?

You also say that "love the shape of a man's big, strong back when he leans over to pick up something heavy." No doubt, this is a great turn on for you. But isn't your sentence incomplete? Would it not be more accurate to add the words for me on to the end? This is one of the things you really love most about men, is it not? The willingness to do your heavy lifting; and the payment of the price for that labor with a broken body that eventually buckles beneath the weight of all your "love"?

I think that is the answer, and nowhere is it more aptly revealed than in three of your reasons in particular, as follows:

[box type="alert" icon="none"]

I love how a man in love thinks of his partner's sexual pleasure before his own.

I love when a man knows what to say and what not to say to make a woman happy.

I love the way a man takes a woman's delicate hand, brings it to his lips, and kisses it gently, showing how much he adores her.

[/box]

Admittedly, these things do not rise to the level of catching bullets, staring down danger or converting one's body into an appliance for your convenience. They do, however, make all things possible. You've concluded in them that even in life's most intimate moments, even after you have been serviced and sacrificed for, that you, and only you, are the only thing that really matters.

Love? Please. These acts, or rather your infatuation with them, are not elements of any kind of love. You don't love men. You love yourself. You just use men as your visible proof that what you want is justified and wholesome, and not the conceited, parasitic sickness that it is. If there is love to be had in this world, you are the least deserving of it.

What is a man worth to you, Ms. Steinberg? I don't mean his service and sacrifice, but his intrinsic worth as a human being. What love do you have for your fellow man that is not based on his blood, his back or his wallet? Do you even comprehend these questions and why I am asking? Or am I asking the wrong person?

I was pleased to see that Tom Matlack finally took some semblance of a stand against his own expected utility to feminists, apparently after spending too much time on their leash settling for the crumbs of appreciation tossed down from his betters. So I do have hopes that as Tom continues to mature, to learn, and to find values that are actually worth standing up for, that he gets to the next level of his development as a man, and figures out that there is no difference between Neely Steinberg and the feminist ideologues that have just crucified him for not toting their barge. Both view Tom only in terms of what he will do to serve them; both will blithely slip a shank in his back the moment he forgets that they both "love when a man knows what to say and what not to say to make a woman happy."

That will happen when the day comes that he starts writing about the innate human worth of men; about their real struggles and not just their willingness to sacrifice for women and other men. And no, we are not talking about men embarking on a path of solipsism that would result in more self-indulgent lists of petty desires à la Steinberg.

I am speaking instead of the simple and honest fruition of love; the idea that you are worth something before you pay for it in blood, sweat and tears. And that the idea of tending to your own needs and your own survival, and those of your fellow man, is not an act of shame, cowardice or unworthiness, except in the eyes of the depraved.

28,000,000 African men to be circumcised through massive U.N. program

Robert O'Hara · 4 January 2012 · Archived copy · Original

the result of this massive program of male genital mutilation will be the further spread of AIDS, wide scale surgical infections and death. Feminist ideologues are leading the way on the ground.

In November of last year the World Health Organization, in conjunction with various other worldwide health organizations like UNIAID and the Presidents Emergency Plan For Aids Relief, released a document entitled, "Joint Strategic Action Framework to Accelerate the Scale-Up of Voluntary Medical Male Circumcision for HIV Prevention in Eastern and Southern Africa 2012–2016."

This document outlines a multinational plan to circumcise tens of millions of men in Sub Saharan Africa over the next four years. The scope of the plan includes branding circumcision itself so young people will want to have it performed as well as school programs that actively "recruit" young boys to have the procedure done and to encourage them recruit others as well. In spite of repeated assurance throughout the document that human rights would be respected, it included provisions for a "sustainability phase" intended to eventually make male infant circumcision compulsory in the region.

It is intended to expend massive amounts of money from stakeholders to implement programs in targeted countries.

The topic of correlations between incidence of HIV infection and circumcision has made recent news. In a July, 2011, at an AIDS conference in Rome, the results of a controversial study called the "Orange Farm Study," were released which purported that the procedure significantly reduced the incidence of HIV infection in the circumcised study group compared with the control group by 60% in South Africa, 53% in Kenya and 51% in Uganda. All over the world leaders of health organizations and advocates for sufferers of the disease celebrated. It is this report that gave the go ahead for the WHO's Joint Strategic Frame Work and that is also being used to sell the plan of mass circumcision to local governments for approval.

Since the release of the study many voices in the medical community have expressed concern over the reasoning of the WHO's program since condoms are nearly 100% effective and circumcision, even if the study is truly accurate, is much more expensive and risky considering it has only a fraction of the success rate. More importantly, the study itself has come under serious criticism by many who say it was seriously flawed.

In an extremely rare move, administrators of the study ended the trials early for "humanitarian" reasons. This has been criticized as a gross lapse of protocol. According to Dr. Daniel J Ncayiyana, editor of the South African Medical Journal, "The extended claim that circumcision confers lifelong protection seems like a stretch, and cannot be inferred from this or the other RCTs (randomized, controlled intervention trials), all of which were terminated at 24 months or less. And because the control groups were also offered circumcision at the termination of the RCT, the opportunity to continue longer-term follow-up was forever extinguished."

From his article published in November of last year titled "The illusive promise of circumcision to prevent female-to-male HIV infection – not the way to go for South Africa" he goes on to explain other problems with the study:

"However, the three RCTs have not been without detractors. In a scathing critique, Van Howe and Storms6 point out that 'In the South African trial, men who reported at least one episode of unprotected sex accounted for 2,498 person-years and 46 HIV infections during the trial. Among the remaining men, who accounted for 2076 person-years, 23 became infected although they either had no sexual contact or always used a condom …"

"Similarly, in the Ugandan trial, men who consistently used condoms had the same rate of infection as those who never used condoms. Finally, in the first three months of the Kenyan trial, five men became HIV-positive who reported no sexual activity in the period before the seroconversion.' They conclude from their recalculations and statistical reasoning that 'Conservatively for the three trials, 89 of the 205 infections (43.1%) were sexually transmitted."

"Without knowing which infections were sexually transmitted [and which were not], it is impossible to test the hypothesis of whether circumcision reduces the rate of sexually transmitted HIV.' Such studies, it must be said, depend on subject self-reporting, and, sexuality being a very private matter, the subjects may sometimes be inclined to be less than candid."

He later points out in his article that concurring results were not present in the real life regional and global population of men.

Last week, in Zimbabwe's online publication ZimEye, an article titled "Use Circumcision money to buy food and condoms," was published in the business section pointing out further problems with the trials. Among other bulleted points it reports:

> Even if the claim were true, based on the rate of infection in the studies, about 60 men had be circumcised to prevent one HIV infection. The other 59 men did not receive any benefit. However, based on another African report, men circumcised in Africa could be subject to a complication rate of 35% for a traditional circumcision or 18% for a clinical circumcision.

and

> The studies were not consistent with other evidence. African national population surveys in eight countries found a higher rate of HIV infection among circumcised men compared to men who were not circumcised. There are at least 17 observational studies that have not found any benefit from male circumcision in reducing HIV transmission. Among developed countries, the United States has the highest circumcision rate and the highest rate of heterosexually transmitted HIV. Other countries have lower rates of HIV infection than the United States and do not practice circumcision.

In spite of these compelling objections the WHO and other super national organizations still plan to execute the initiative to circumcise nearly 28,000,000 men, boys and infants over the next five years. The list of stakeholders in the project reads like a who's who of international political and economic powerhouses: They include:

[unordered_list style="green-dot"]

- Bill & Melinda Gates Foundation (BMGF);
- Centers for Disease Control and Prevention (US CDC);
- Department of Defense, U.S. Government (US DOD);
- Office of the U.S. Global AIDS Coordinator (OGAC);
- UNAIDS Secretariat Headquarters (UNAIDS/HQ);
- UNAIDS Regional Support Team for Eastern and Southern Africa (UNAIDS/RST);
- U.S. Agency for International Development (USAID);
- WHO Headquarters (WHO/HQ);
- WHO Regional Office for Africa (WHO/AFRO);
- The World Bank Global HIV/AIDS Program;

- The World Bank country-level Health Team and Task Team Leaders of World Bank Health Operations.

[/unordered_list]

In fact the plans for this initiative were formed a nearly a year before during a three day USAID sponsored meeting taking place during September of 2010 in Durban, South Africa. The South Africa AIDS Support and Technical Assistance Resources (AIDSTAR-One) Project, as the meeting was called, brought together over a hundred health professionals from 14 countries in east and southern Africa and international experts from Europe and North America.

None of them presented any medical data concerning the RCT tests nor was there any medical discussion concerning the efficacy of male circumcision for the reduction of HIV infection risk compared to that of condom usage. The vast majority of participants were not even medical doctors but rather public health officials and academics as well as a spattering of epidemiologists.

The presentations at the meeting resembled marketing plans for big sales drives more than anything else. They talked of branding, community outreach, demand creation and even “training journalists.” in one instance. The common themes throughout the reports were:

[unordered_list style=”bullet”]

- Communicating with women about the dangers of uncircumcised men and enlisting them in the “recruitment process.”;
- Supplying money to and engaging with local governments and tribal authorities to promote circumcision;
- Creating programs targeting adolescent boys in order to encourage them to have the procedure done;
- Setting the groundwork for compulsory circumcision of male infants;
- Secondary to all of these objectives were the distribution of and education on the importance of condom use. Nowhere is there any mention of specific strategies in this regard other than as a follow up to circumcision;

[/unordered_list]

Prominently represented in the list of presenters were two women in particular:

Kawango Agot, a PhD. in Nutrition and Kenyan native and Ayanda Nqeketo, a health official in Swaziland. Both are the program heads for the project in their respective countries. Neither are medical doctors. Both have been leaders in wooing governments with promises of millions of dollars in support the plans implementation. Both are self-proclaimed feminist ideologues who have on occasion betrayed a disturbing fixation on the topic of male circumcision.

In actuality these two women had not only been preparing their communities for the grand project that was about to come for some time, they were actually engaging in their own studies and implementing their own promotional programs in which thousands of circumcisions took place.

In 2008, Dr. Agot came under severe criticism by Kenyan blogger, Harun Lumiti in an article titled “Why is This Woman So Eager to Circumcise Her Kinsmen?” in which he quotes her as saying:

> As I was reading through some academic books on HIV, I bumped into one that suggested a link with male circumcision and it made a lot of sense to me. The more I read books about the male cut, the more interested I became.

Keep in mind that Agot is not a medical doctor.

Lumiti goes on to describe a study conducted under the guidance of Agot and others not affiliated with the Orange Farm studies:

"And so one thing led to another until she bumped (?) into circumcision enthusiast Robert Bailey and secured funding for her research on the role of the penile foreskin in spreading AIDS. So determined was Agot and her zealous cohorts that their study in Kisumu was cut short because of "overwhelming evidence" to support their contention that circumcision protects against HIV infection."

"Where was the Professor rushing to? Or were people dying at such a rate that there would be none left to cut by the time the study ended? Or was she rushing to beat some deadline for unlocking project funds? Indeed PEPFAR and other donors including the Global Fund for fight against AIDS had said they would not support male circumcision programs until the results from the study were released. Did this not influence the outcome of the study? Obviously, no funds would be released if no correlation between HIV and the cut was established."

"And what was the overwhelming evidence at the time the study was terminated? From the uncircumcised group, 47 men tested positive for HIV while from the circumcised group the number was 22. That is about 60% less. Interpretation? Circumcision offers 60% protection against HIV infection. Such genius!"

"Next stop was the Prime Minister's Right Honorable Office. Raila Odinga, also from the Luo community, quickly offered the stamp of political correctness to the study so as to smoothen Agot's campaign in Luoland. Roping in the PM was a smart, though not entirely difficult feat for Agot, given Raila's perpetually devious politics that is about to attain legendary status. Said he:"

> I know circumcision will raise a lot of eyebrows. But there is evidence that it reduces infection by as much as 60 per cent.

"Apparently, in Luoland no one questions what Raila hasn't. His approval not only helped reduce resistance to the campaign but also ensured its incorporation into the government's public health programs. This was crucial to access further funding. And so Agot went over the moon. In her words:

> In the idiom of the youths, I can say tumetoboa.

Tumetoboa is Kiswahili for "we have made it". It is exclusively used to express the joy of crossing over to riches.

And, in a turn of events a few weeks later;

"The chairman of the Luo Council of Elders, Ker Riaga Ogallo says that he was arm-twisted to endorse the male cut among the Luo community.

"Ker Ogallo said that the whole affair had been turned into a cash cow by individuals and NGOs bent on enriching themselves. He claimed that an NGO recently bought a fleet of vehicles and hired a few staff but did not have any structures."

"Our people are still languishing in poverty. No NGO is ready to offer practical assistance. I am shocked that when it comes to circumcision of Luo youths, an organization can import 24 new vehicles at once," he said.

Ayanda Nqeketo, on the other hand, has had a good reception in the Swaziland press. She has also enjoyed considerable support from the government in Swaziland although King Mswati III has indicated his support in private but not given it publicly. An article was written in February of last year in Physorg.com featuring a program she had started with funds from the Bill and Melinda Gates foundation meant to be a pilot for other programs in Africa. The language within betrays the contempt “recruiters” have for male sexual health and religious sensibilities:

“One man boasts that he got circumcised because it is “nice to have sex without condoms” — drawing a furious reaction from the recruiters.

“That is NOT what he was told at the clinic!” exclaimed Mbogniseni Ndzimandze, the leader of the recruitment team.

“What am I going to do when God asks me, ‘Where is your foreskin?'” demands another man.

It is a question the recruiters are used to answering

“Why do you cut your hair?” says Mzwandile Shongwe. “God could ask you that, too.”

It is not explained where the man got the idea that getting circumcised would immune him from HIV infection or why it is necessary to compare the tip of a man’s penis with his discarded hair.

Even more alarming is the content of one of the reports that Nqeketo presented at the AIDSTAR-One meeting entitled “Mobilizing the General Population for Male Circumcision Saturation.” In the report she describes plans for a massive campaign for a media drive including branding, street theater, along with TV, radio and billboard adds.

Weighing heavily in the presentation are descriptions of programs already under way which include involving women family members in the recruitment process. A newspaper clipping pasted into the presentation features an article titled: Maidens Compose a Circumcision Song, which describes how hundreds of women symbolically cutting off the ends of reeds simulating the circumcision procedure while singing “the male youth are arrogant by not going through the circumcision process.” The participants then marched to the gates of the royal palace to place the reeds at the door of the King himself.

Perhaps most disturbing though is a newspaper clip describing the success of a “Back to School” program aimed at recruiting young adolescent boys that used the reward of a T-shirt to be awarded to any boy that convinced five others to go through with the procedure.

It is not clear how what started as a male health issue regarding HIV contraction has turned into what can only be called a feminist ideologue theme park concept. It is also not clear why these very powerful stakeholders are both listening and giving money to individuals and groups who clearly are not qualified to lead this initiative and who have come under considerable scrutiny from a wide variety of critics.

It is a well-known and proven fact that condoms as well as education concerning the spread of HIV have been extremely effective in the developed world, yet these methods are only being used as a secondary to a procedure whose benefits are at best unclear and unsubstantiated. This is not to mention that a growing number of people around the world are starting to view male circumcision as a barbaric, dangerous, cruel and medically unnecessary procedure.

Aside from the risk of illness and death through surgical infections, which are much higher in undeveloped nations, perhaps the most disturbing facet of these massive scale plans for “the cut,” is that they will have a negatively synergistic effect with rampant ignorance in that area. Africa has experienced some horrific problems, including child rape, because people superstitiously believed that sex with a virgin would cure aids.

It is not unreasonable to expect that a widespread belief that circumcision would prevent AIDS could easily foster the spread of the disease.

One thing is for sure, a lot of money, resources and political clout is sinking into an effort which has the potential to result in the deaths of millions of people.

Sources:

http://www.who.int/hiv/pub/strategic_action2012_2016/en/index.html

http://samj.org.za/index.php/samj/article/view/5384/3655

http://www.zimeye.org/?p=42943&cpage=1

http://www.aidstar-one.com/focus_areas/prevention/resources/technical_consultation_materials/Male_Circumcision_Communication_Meeting_Durban#presentationsection

http://hlumiti.instablogs.com/entry/why-is-this-woman-so-eager-to-circumcise-her-kinsmen/http://www.thelancet.com/journals/lancet/article/PIIS0140-6736%2807%2960312-2/fulltext http://www.physorg.com/news/2011-02-swaziland-hiv-mass-circumcision.html

http://www.aidstar-one.com/sites/default/files/prevention/resources/tech_consult/MC_presentations/2_Nqeketo_mobilizing.pdf

Australia launches “The Plan” and the end to civil rights

Paul Elam · 6 January 2012 · Archived copy · Original

As chief cook and bottle washer at AVfM I have been in the dubious position of gathering information from across the globe on the negative impact of feminist governance.

Last year we addressed matters like the “Dear Colleague” letter, which effectively ended the right of due process for college men accused of any sort of sexual misconduct. We covered the unthinkable events in India, where men have been assaulted and even thrown from moving trains for daring to set foot in train car reserved for women; where politicians have suggested bounties be paid to women who beat their husbands in public. We exposed circumstances in Sweden, where school children are being indoctrinated into the virulent and hateful ideology of Valerie Solanas. Just last night we did a radio show as a follow up to Robert O’Hara’s investigative piece on the plan to coerce 28,000,000 African men into being circumcised. And of course there is the ongoing exposure of ideologues at Radfem Hub, a group of well-placed feminists who glorify murder, child abuse, eugenics and infanticide.

It appears now that 2011 was just a warm up for 2012.

Over the next several days you will find a series of articles on this website regarding an assault on human rights that will sweep the Australian continent. The scope of a planned campaign by the Australian government (The National Council’s Plan for Australia to Reduce Violence against Women and their Children, 2009-2021) is so far reaching that presenting it without overwhelming readers has been a significant challenge for myself, Kyle Lovett and John the Other. The sheer volume of the content, as well as the staggering loss of civil rights that Australian men are about to suffer is formidable.

The amount and complexity of the material to come is sufficient that I felt it warranted to prepare you with this article, which in essence is written solely for the purpose of bracing you for the onslaught of information; to, if I may request your indulgence, tell you what you are about to be told.

These machinations have now reached the stage of action, and are about to be implemented. They involve, but are by no means limited, to the following:

[unordered_list style=”bullet”]

- The systemic enabling and promotion of child abuse by mothers and other women.
- The Australian government suppression of research that implicates women as child abusers.
- The legal redefinition of domestic violence to include acts such as making purchases without consulting your wife, not listening to your wife or even disciplining your dog.
- The legal redefinition of domestic violence to exclude male victims from that legal definition.
- Arresting and holding men in prison, without bail, on the accusation alone of domestic violence.
- Summarily evicting men from their homes while forcing them to maintain financial responsibility for those homes on nothing more than an accusation from their wives or girlfriends.
- Shifting the burden of proof on domestic violence from the state to the defendant. The accused will be forced to prove he did not commit an act of violence.
- The legal redefinition of rape, and subsequent shift of the burden of proof onto a defendant to prove the he obtained specific kinds of verbal consent for sex.

[/unordered_list]

These actions are not individual initiatives to change isolated and different laws. They are all part of a package deal referred to as “The Plan.” It is a far reaching, invasive effort of monumental scope designed to eliminate the civil rights of men and children across the Australian continent, and as you will see in the upcoming articles it is well on its way to becoming reality.

The articles will explain “The Plan” in detail, and show the egregiously corrupt methods that ideologues employed within the Australian government are using in order to pass it all through to law.

For instance, Australian research up to 1997 demonstrated empirically that women, overwhelmingly, are the perpetrators of physical, emotional, psychological and sexual abuse of children – compared with men.

[image]
Click to enlage
After 1997, the Australian government ceased requesting and recording information on the sex of offenders against children in the home, and all the subsequent proposals in “The Plan” run on the assumption that the male is the primary perpetrator.

What you will also learn in the upcoming series of articles is that all of the proposed legislation is specifically gender targeted. The suggested laws will be written with the protection of women and the punishment of men in mind, and will leave scores of abuse victims even more vulnerable than they were before implementation of “The Plan.” This will be particularly true for children who will frequently have the father, their only protector from an abusive mother, removed from the home and incarcerated without bail as the “identified problem.”

What you will also learn is that the suppression and distortion of scientific research so that it appears to support “The Plan,” has reached pervasive levels in Australia. Such a level of corruption is occurring with complicity and enabling from within the Australian government.

Australia, you will learn, is about to be thrust into the legal Dark Ages, beginning in 2012.

A Voice for Men, I am proud to say, is a very popular website in Australia. It is our hopes that this series of articles will give our friends Down Under something on which to take action with their elected representatives. Perhaps it is not too late to prevent the majority of the damage.

There is some action already. Dr. Greg Canning, an Australian oncologist, has formed an organization to foster an initiative to address these issues. I am going to close this piece with his announcement, hoping that it reaches the eyes of as many Australian citizens as possible.

[box type=”alert” icon=”none”]

An open letter to all Australian Men’s Advocacy Groups

There exist in Australia many men’s advocacy groups, albeit with differences in focus. This indicates that many men are not being treated fairly in our country that prides itself on providing a fair go for all.

In the lead up to the next federal election, I have a vision, that if all the men’s groups in Australia unite to jointly lobby for men’s issues to be put on the national political agenda, we can make a difference.

To this end I ask all groups to commence a joint dialogue with a view to supporting a delegation to go to Canberra and lobby for change.

The focus of the delegation will be open for discussion, but I believe it should present a small number of broad objectives, which could include:

[unordered_list style="green-dot"]

- Establishment of an Office for Men, and Minister for Men as are currently operating for women.
- A requirement for intellectual honesty and peer review in the data being used to drive social policy for example the "National Plan to reduce violence against women and their children 2010 to 2022"
- A requirement to address the increasing problem of fatherlessness in Australia, its determinants and consequences.
- A focus on Male specific health and education issues.

[/unordered_list]

Whilst it is acknowledged there will be philosophical differences amongst the groups, I have little doubt that all would agree with these types of objective.

In the first instance I have commenced a discussion group that can be accessed at http://menscoalition.blogspot.com/

This is a private site and you will need to be invited to join the discussions please email gregcanning@me.com to request access.

Please log on to the blog and in the comments section of the first post introduce yourself and your organisation or group and share your thoughts on forming or joining a "Coalition of Australian Men."

We can then see where the discussion leads us, but I believe if our joint voices can finally be heard nationally as those of reason and egalitarianism, in the land of the fair go for all, perhaps our sons and daughters will enjoy a brighter future.

Please pass this message onto anyone you believe would be genuinely committed to such a cause.

Yours sincerely,

Dr. Greg Canning

[/box]

An open letter to Bill and Melinda Gates

Paul Elam · 6 January 2012 · Archived copy · Original

Dear Bill and Melinda Gates,

It has come to my attention that your foundation is a significant stakeholder in the current plan to circumcise tens of millions of African men and boys over the next four years, and that this program is being conducted under the auspices of reducing the spread of HIV on that continent.

I am writing this letter, and posting it to my website, to investigate whether you are personally aware of the corruption and disinformation on which this plan is based, and whether you are aware that there is no scientific reason to believe that it will result in any success. I also want to inquire if you are aware that there is abundant scientific reason to believe that this plan will result in the pointless death and disfigurement of countless thousands of innocents.

Please be advised that the science supporting your work is incomplete, to put it kindly. The "Orange Farm Study," on which your project is based, has come under well-deserved attack by respected members of the medical establishment, mainly because the clinical trials were never completed.

Dr. Daniel J Ncayiyana, editor of the South African Medical Journal said, "The extended claim that circumcision confers lifelong protection seems like a stretch, and cannot be inferred from this or the other RCTs (randomized, controlled intervention trials), all of which were terminated at 24 months or less. And because the control groups were also offered circumcision at the termination of the RCT, the opportunity to continue longer-term follow-up was forever extinguished."

African national population surveys in eight countries found a higher rate of HIV infection among circumcised men compared to men who were not circumcised.

So the entire plan, costing hundreds of millions of dollars, is based on one study with no acceptable clinical trials and no claim to scientific validity. Yet it was ramrodded through the WHO and is being used to justify surgery on tens of millions of people. All this despite the fact it is well known the use of condoms and education can severely curtail the spread of HIV.

Are you aware of the incidence of surgical site infections (SSI's) on the African continent? It runs by some estimates up to 40%. I urge you to consider the math on this and what it actually means. 28,000,000 unneeded circumcisions, induced with disinformation and deception, on a grossly impoverished population with little or no access to adequate, sanitary medical care.

Have you considered what impact the message that circumcision is protection from HIV will have on masses of poor, uneducated African men? Perhaps you should. Ayanda Nqeketo started a circumcision program in Swaziland, reportedly with funding from your foundation. One man was heard to say that he got the circumcision because it was "nice to have sex without condoms."

Your entire project is ill-conceived and is a recipe for a certain human disaster. If you participate in it you will absolutely have blood on your hands.

Members of the A Voice for Men organization are now forging relationships with concerned individuals in Africa who have long been vocal about the highly suspicious nature of this enterprise. We will be reporting regularly on the death and disfigurement your plan is sure to inflict, as well as attaching the names of all individuals and organizations associated with the project.

We urge you in the strongest of terms to divest your foundation completely from the plan to manipulate and coerce African men and boys into being sexually mutilated in this horrendously misguided agenda.

Paul Elam, Publisher

A Voice for Men, LLC

Eric Holder weaponizes a Grey Goose

John Hembling (JtO) · 8 January 2012 · Archived copy · Original

On Friday, January 6, The United States Department of Justice announced it is revising a decades-old definition of rape to expand the kinds of offences that constitute the crime and for the first time, include men as victims.

The official statement from the Justice Department said the crime of rape will be defined as:

> Penetration, no matter how slight, of the vagina or anus with any body part or object, or oral penetration by a sex organ of another person, without the consent of the victim.

This is being cheered as a great improvement on the 80 year old definition which previously identified only vaginal penetration as an instance of this crime. Carol Tracy, the executive director of the Women's Law Project, which has been pushing for the definition change said, "We are very pleased that the FBI has agreed to revise its definition used in data collection so it more accurately reflects what the public understands to be rape"

In fact, mainstream as well as explicitly feminist blogs and journals have been applauding this change – and in most cases, taking pains to point out that men sexually violated will now be correctly counted as victims of the crime of rape. However, this claim is belied by the fact that sex forced onto a man by a woman in any instance other than penetration of his body is not included in the new definition. This exclusion is not because forced sexual contact by women on men doesn't occur, it quite obviously does. The argument that physical arousal in a male rape victim equates to consent is standard from ideologues, but the same argument, if taken seriously can negate the claims of most female rape victims. Physical arousal in men and in women is an involuntary response, outside the control of conscious choice.

The claim that the new definition of rape's inclusion of male victims is a ruse. Mainstream and feminist commentators have persistently ignored the legal disenfranchisement of men. Those few men willing to stand up in complaint have been taunted, belittled, and censored. Suddenly this community is cheering for recognition of men as potential victims of rape? Hardly. In fact – taken outside the persistent anti-male climate fostered by organized feminism, in the larger framework of American politics, does anybody believe for a second that a change in law is for the benefit of individual citizens, whether they're male or not? So, if the inclusion of males as potential victims is not the real goal, then what is?

The new definition also includes instances in which a victim is incapable of giving consent because of mental or physical incapacity, such as intoxication. Physical resistance is not required to demonstrate lack of consent. This is where the power of a new definition for rape is expressed. Consent is no longer consent. Voluntary participation in sex is no longer voluntary.

> incapable of giving consent because of mental or physical incapacity, such as intoxication.

If a woman has a few drinks and operates a motor vehicle, she's committed an offence, but if she has a few drinks and spreads her legs, well, then she's a victim. How about men? If a man has sex while he's drunk, is he a rape victim because being drunk, he was unable to render informed consent?

Don't hold your breath.

Under the new definition, every woman participating in a sexual encounter with a man in a social setting which included consumption of alcohol is now deemed a rape victim. Are you a woman who has had a drink before having consensual sex? If so, you are now legally empowered to destroy the life of the man you slept with. Most adults drink socially, and now, for men, every woman with a drink in her hand is armed with a metaphorical gun, pointed at his head. It is the power to destroy his life, his career, his family, tear his children away from him, strip him of his savings, his home, deny him the ability to earn a living or to travel, and in many cases, to actually kill him by proxy.

In states and counties which pursue no-drop prosecution – which is where a prosecutor pursues charges and conviction regardless of the will of the alleged victim, this ability to destroy doesn't even hang on the whim of the offended women, it's in the hands of a state employee building a career based on notches in their briefcase.

Don't worry though, ladies, the district attorney is surely only acting in your best interests, and if your husband or boyfriend is jailed or career-terminated, you can just get another one. Men are replaceable commodities, after all. Your son, if you have one, might get chewed up in this system, but hey, who cares, right. You can just crank out another one. It's not like men are really human beings deserving rights.

Is that too sarcastic and cynical?

I'm still addressing this to female readers, so please consider how a legal invalidation of your choice or consent in a sexual encounter gives you the power of a rape victim if you decided to spread your legs. If the man you slept with also drank before getting naked and horizontal – why are you legally a victim and him an offender? If a man drinks and has sex, wouldn't it be logical to consider him a victim of rape?

The standard argument is that due to "patriarchy" society puts men into a position of power in relations between men and women, and therefore they're always the offender, while women are always the victim. However, this item of mythology falls apart with the slightest examination. Men die earlier than women, commit suicide at 4 times the rate of women, are sentence more severely than women, and continue to die on the job a 13 times the rate of women. What patriarchy is anybody talking about?
The facile follow up argument that "patriarchy hurts men too," is so ethically and intellectually bankrupt that it's proponents should wear a visible tattoo identifying them as mentally defective. If alcohol renders a woman unable to exercise adult volition in a sexual act, then women are not adults. They should be stripped of the right to vote, to own property, to receive an education, to go into debt or to be taken seriously in a courtroom. Except this abdication of adulthood seems only to operate when personal accountability is at stake, but never when advantage or personal enfranchisement is in operation.

If offenses like operating a motor vehicle while impaired are violations of the law – even when the drunk driver is female – then what magic is it that makes driving an offence and sex a form of victimization? This comparison is obvious. Even a public anaesthetized by years of reality TV and fast food can spot this blatant double standard. So why are feminists who've been arguing for years that their movement is one in pursuit of equality silent on this issue? Well, it is because they have put their mouths into advocating for it because the metaphorical gun this legal redefinition puts in every woman's hand, pointed at every man's head, is what they really want.

A woman willing to have sex with you after a drink is as dangerous as a violent predator in a culture without laws.

An old pair of gloves

Matthew Steele · 8 January 2012 · Archived copy · Original

It's been a hell of a lot of years since I saw that aged gym, as a young man. The morning sun had not even cracked the sky, and I had already seen five miles of city, while I wore down those black sneakers, trying to reach a place most of the guys I knew were running away from.

Gene's place looked like it had seen too many demolition crews, with the dry wall cracked off old slats, and Plaster of Paris crumbling through the holes. The smell of stale sweat was enough to make a billy goat want to lose it's lunch, and I would be lying if I said I did not have to steel myself before walking into those ancient wooden doors. The only thing worth saving in the entire place was that beautiful hardwood floor, shining and mopped every day. That and the ring, with faded blood stains from fights years passed; still etched into the canvas that showed them off like precious trophies.

Stepping into a solitary soft light over the heavy bag, my taped hands would sting from the old black leather, and somewhere behind me, that old man would speak in a voice that had been gargled in gravel for a good 70 years. "Go to the body Matty, take that bag's wind."

Some memories you cannot get to fade away, and some moments haunt you until your last breath. But the one moment that defined that old man and my friendship came down to one sentence, "If you do not get in the ring Matty, you will never know what you are made of and I wont either." The trouble is, that was the very thing that led me to that gym in the first place, to learn how to steel myself against the fight that was coming. We all have to face down a bully once in our life, and that was why I was there, because I was never really good with living with fear. The truth is, that fear was the motivation behind courage and action, so maybe I learned how to shake hands with it, at least in the short haul.

In today's society, what I was doing would be considered unacceptable on multiple levels. Certainly fine young civilized boys do not learn the "sweet science." It is a barbaric, aggressive, and uncivilized display of male physical dominance. At least, that is what my ninth grade teacher, an early feminist, had said to me when she saw I had my boxing gear in a gym bag. The comment was made to me in the middle of class, "Maybe you want to box so you can learn to hit the poor girl who is foolish enough to marry you, harder, after a night of drinking?" This got a lot of chuckles from my peers, and I just sat there, thoroughly confused and embarrassed. This certainly was not the beginning of the routine indoctrination and humiliation that young boys must deal with when being raised in a feminist education system. It certainly was not the end, either.

To state that western society is a male dominated society, is a foolish representation, at best. You can see it everyday, that foolishness, when you see a man in the grocery store, being ceaselessly berated by some woman who stripped his individuality from him years before, as the weeks groceries are purchased. He walks with his shoulders slumped, and the tired resignation of the forlorn. Perhaps if you would slowly watch the shopping trip, you would see him smile softly at the child with him, a sign of life still behind those eyes, while he endures the emasculating barbs his master throws at him.

You can see it in the man cleaning the floors, as some mid-level feminist master orders him to take the few pieces of paper from the trash as he walks by, making sure she says it in front of others as she demonstrates her power. You can see it in the unemployment lines, where a man who could build a house, or run power through a skyscraper, waits quietly for his place to talk to an employment counselor. His eyes are lifeless, save for the desperation that comes from knowing you have no income, there are mouths to feed, and more barbs to endure at home.

In my first amateur fight, it took me a moment, standing outside the ring, under the lights in an old arena. It took a moment, to fight back the fear, and go from standing outside the ring, to standing face to face with an amazing young fighter. Sooner or later, you have to stand face to face with that opponent. Sooner or later, you have to tape up your hands, so you can trade punches with Goliath. In the third round of the fight, that magnificent fighter fell, and was counted out. As I stood there, feeling battered and worn, that old man said to me “Now you know what you are made of, kid.”

Somewhere along the way, I hung up those old gloves. I spent more time hitting the books instead of that weathered bag. I miss that sport, though many would argue it barbaric. I have never made any apologies for getting in the ring, and I sure as hell wont offer any today. Another truth is, that every single individual in this movement is staring down Goliath. Take a good hard look, and realize how big the monster is that you are fighting. Every time I stare at that monster, I wonder if I have enough inside me; if, at my age, I have the one good fight left in me. Then I realize the string of fighters before me that this juggernaut has beaten down. It has taken good men, decent men, and whipped them like animals in the court system, until they were empty shells. It has left them buried under the rubble of wars, and early deaths at the hands of hard labor. It has left them on the streets empty, stripped of their lives, their possessions, and even the dearest of things, their child’s smile.

I have been standing outside the ring for a hell of a long time, and I just watched it. I watched it happen to some of the best friends I have ever had. I have watched it happen to men behind a computer screen, and felt the beatings they took as they wrote of their struggles. I just watched as the bully pushed well meaning and honest men into the worst of despair and desperation, lost in alcoholism, post traumatic stress disorder, and depression. To be even more honest, I watched it happen to me, as well.

There comes a time when a young man has to find what he is made of, and there comes a time when an older man has to remember what he is made of. I have been outside the ring too long. At my age, and after everything this bully has done to me, I have nothing left to lose, and everything to gain. It is time to stare down the Goliath called the feminist movement, and that sound in the distance of the mountains of Colorado is a bell ringing, and I am coming to fuck your shit up.

Shrink4Men Radio: High conflict divorce

Paul Elam · 9 January 2012 · Archived copy · Original

[box icon="none"]

Shrink4Men Radio is back this Monday, January 9, 2012 at 9pm EST with my guest, family law attorney, Natalie Malonis. The topic will be High-Conflict Divorce. Ms. Malonis is both a supporter and contributing author to Shrink4Men.

Her articles include:

- Interview with New Shrink4Men Contributor, Part One: Natalie Malonis, Family Law and High-Conflict Divorce Attorney
- Interview with New Shrink4Men Contributor, Part Two: Natalie Malonis, Family Law and High-Conflict Divorce Attorney
- Leaving an Abusive Wife: Pre-Divorce Checklist
- Parental Alienation: Navigating the Court System, Part 1
- Parental Alienation: Navigating the Court System, Part 2
- Personality Disorder Diagnoses in Family Law: Pros and Cons
- Family Court Minefields: Dirty Tricks Used by High-Conflict People in Custody Disputes and Parallel Parenting, Part 1

The show will begin with a brief interview with Ms. Malonis and then we'll take your calls. If you have questions or stories you would like to share, please Skype in or call (310) 388-9709.

If you can't catch the show live, but would still like to ask a question, please post them as comments below.

Shrink4Men Coaching and Consulting Services:

Dr Tara J. Palmatier provides confidential, fee-for-service, consultation/coaching services to help both men and women work through their relationship issues via telephone and/or Skype chat. Her practice combines practical advice, support, reality testing and goal-oriented outcomes. Please visit the Shrink4Men Services page for professional inquiries.

[/box]

Shepherd of lies

Paul Elam · 9 January 2012 · Archived copy · Original

Tory Shepherd writes for The Punch, an Australian online outlet for political news and opinion. One of her available online bios presents her as a worldly, devil-may-care sociopolitical guru, steeped in hard news coverage and life experience:

> Tory Shepherd studied anthropology, then travelled, then studied some more, then travelled, then ended up with a cadetship at The Advertiser in 2006. She covered police rounds, politics, general news and health, while working at The Punch on the side. Now Tory is working full time at The Punch. She can be seen and heard on ABC local radio and Radio National, PM Live on Sky, and in other nooks and crannies. She is passionate about words, wine, chilli, soccer, and people (even the ones who hate her or keep praying for her soul).

Let's add some more credentials to infuse some credibility into all the fluff. Feminist, ideologue, yellow journalist, liar.

It appears that recent articles presented here that exposed the corrupt ideological influence on Australian government have Tory's panties in a bit of a twist (which is only sexist if she doesn't wear them), and now she has gone on the attack in an adelaidenow.com article, rolling out big guns like Michael Flood, and, well, Michael Flood, to discredit the lot of us as a bunch of bitter, moustache twirling, hypervigilant, middle aged white guys who present an egregious threat to the rights of wimmen everywhere.

She softens her readers a little by feigning some understanding of men's issues (more and more required these days), bestowing on us the following bits of her egalitarian largess:

"Men's outcomes in some areas really are poor. Male suicide rates are three to four times higher, their life expectancy is lower. Girls often outperform boys at school. Males are more likely to be incarcerated, more likely to be addicted."

And then of course, true to her agenda, she puts her foot in it with the following:

"But these genuine issues are not the ones that concern the new breed of men's activists. These men are aggrieved because they see misandry – the hatred of males – everywhere in society, from government down."

Oh really? Since Tory quite pointedly attacked AVfM as Paranoid Central, then she might have done some searching on our website and read into the more than 50 articles that either target these issues or make significant reference to them. She might have even stumbled onto our Facts Page, where these issues and a score of others are documented. Sorry, we don't have a Misandry is Everywhere page. I will have to talk to our managing editor John about that, as I am sure it is his fault.

Generally speaking, though, we only tend to see misandry where it exists. For instance, I am having Chinese for lunch as I write. I note that my eggrolls are misandry free, as is the Kung Pao Shrimp. The young man who delivered did not "appear" to be a misandrist that I could tell. And while I am not quite through eating, I do not anticipate that my fortune cookie contains a secret misandric message. Admittedly, I cannot vouch for what is written in Mandarin on the Chinese side of the fortune.

I do, however, see misandry in a law that would have me in jail without bail because my wife got angry and accused me of giving her the silent treatment, which is exactly what is on the agenda in Australia, courtesy of real misandry. Color me creepy for seeing it that way, I was born like this.

Shepherd goes on to highlight all the things that make us paranoid and stinky and extreme, as well as white and male. Let's take a look at her list, and see what we can make of it. I will try to stop the misandric voices in my head long enough to be more objective than Tory.

Women have never been worse off than men – this is a feminist lie and is part of the plot to subjugate men.

Well, so far – so good. Women never have been worse off than men. Well, only if you consider being dead, unhealthy or incarcerated as "worse off." Did I mention dead? Remember those items you seemed to acknowledge about men, Tory? All that stuff about life expectancy, suicide, education, incarceration and addiction? Well, here in Texas those things rank pretty high in the "worse off" department. And when they happen to men a lot more than they happen to others we consider it a "worse off" qualification. Pretty much the gold standard as far as worse off goes. We can add plenty more, like conscription, combat death, workplace mortality, victimization by violence, etc.., etc.., but I don't want to belabor the point.

Now, I don't recall anyone here saying that this was all a feminist lie and part of a plot to "subjugate" men. Just that it is a feminist lie and used to con government and everyone else out of more special considerations and money. I know, I am just being extreme.

Women are all gold-diggers who use marriage and divorce to extort money from men.

Well, I should hand this one over to any one of the women that write for this site, but I can tell you what they will anyway. No one ever said that. You're lying again. What has been said, and is quite true, is that the system is set up for women to do that very thing with State muscle behind them, and way too many of them do. So many, in fact, that marriage is a role of the dice on a man's future. I just checked my fortune cookie. No misandry there.

Family law courts let women legally steal children from men, and let women get away with false accusations of child abuse.

Thanks for admitting it. Now go do your homework and come back with the complete laundry list of family court corruptions and we can talk some more.

Women routinely falsely accuse innocent men of rape.

Well, duh, yeah. A little hint here, Tory. If you want to paint men as having extreme ideas you need to allege they are saying things that are not true. Be sure they can't instantly reference studies[1] and news stories[2] that completely back them up. Just saying.

Domestic violence statistics are warped; men are victims as much as women and women make false claims about violence in courts that are too inclined to believe them.

Same problem, Tory. Lordy mercy grrl, you got it bad, doncha? Not only are domestic violence statistics warped, so are the ideologues doing the warping. The problem is so pervasive, in fact, that the warping itself has been made the subject of study by one of the most preeminent authorities on domestic violence research in the world, Dr. Murray Straus. [3] His conclusion? Feminist ideologues have intentionally corrupted the study of domestic violence and the dissemination of information from research results. Oh, a slight hint here, Dr. Straus is an esteemed academician, not a blogger, or a paranoid white guy who is angry because they let women vote. Neither is anyone else I know, though I still have my suspicions about the guy who delivers Chinese. Something kinda funny about him, in a possibly misandric way.

So now, according to Tory's veiled "threat," it appears that over at The Punch the lot of them are going to come out with a series of articles condemning the men's movement. I trust they will be delivered with the same top flight, cutting edge drivel just dished out by the desperate and disingenuous Shepherd. And I am sure they will be ready to block comments as they come in. Can't have an open discussion about this, can we?

The long and the short of it is simple. The plans of corrupt ideologues in Australia have just been outed, big time. And now they're pissed. They want to come on the attack.

Alrighty then..

The really wonderful thing about the internet, Tory, is that it does not give a fuck if you are a woman or a feminist. It affords all people the opportunity to make their case. Those that have relied on the silence and acquiescence of others to further their ideas are screwed in a world where everyone gets to speak, and will. So by all means, take your shots. Come at us with everything. In the end, you will be exposed for the liars you are and you will see your ideology continue to crumble while you see men and women increasingly defy your agenda.

We are here to fuck your shit up in just that precise way.

References:

[1] Kanin, 1994

[2] Orlando Sentinal, June, 2010

[3] Straus, 2007

The princess in the golden box

Alison Tieman (Typhonblue) · 10 January 2012 · Archived copy · Original

[dropcap]T[/dropcap]here once was a Kingdom ruled by a wise and benevolent King. The king had two sons, and one tiny pearl of a daughter who was so delicate her father worried that the slightest breeze might crush her.

Because she was so very delicate and so very precious, he built her a golden box to live within. The box was as high as she was and had four windows on each of its sides; every inch of it that was not gold filagree was encrusted with jewels and it flashed brightly in the firelight. Four servants would come into the princess's chambers every day to polish the box to a rich luster, serve the princess's needs and move the box where ever the princess wished to be on the palace grounds.

One night assassins crept into the castle, they killed the Queen and her youngest son in complete silence, but when they came upon the elder son he woke and fought back. The sound of battle roused the King from sleep and he lept to protect his son. In the fight that ensued, the oldest son was slain and the King gravely wounded.

The Princess, in her box, went unnoticed and untouched.

When the Queen and the Princes were buried, and the King recovered enough to have an audience, the Princess's Box was brought to his audience chamber. Inside her velvet lined box, the Princess was terrified at the sudden pallor and age of her father.

"My Princess. The future of the kingdom rests upon you." The King's voice shook with the effort of speaking. "You must select a new King or our Kingdom will fall into chaos. I have called for suitors and three Princes have answered my call."

The first Prince, handsomely arrayed in the finest brocaded silk, boasted of the wealth of the empire he had built from trade and dockside speculation. The second Prince, imposing in his plate armor and surcoat embroidered with dragons, spoke of the strength of his personal army and how it had crushed every one who opposed it.

The Princess listened politely to each suitor and then waited for the third to speak.

He did not. Instead, with her father's permission, he lifted her and her box and carried her, without a word, to a grotto in the palace garden. There he set her down and told her about the things he had seen in the world. He described them with wonder and warmth and kindness and in a way that made her feel like she had always been there at his side. After hours of quiet conversation he ended his tale with, 'I wish you had been with me.'

That night they were wed and the king died. On his death bed, the king made the newly crowned Prince promise that he would do everything that his daughter asked.

The Prince agreed.

After the King had been buried, they mourned for a year and during that time the Prince and the Princess established a ritual. Each night, after the affairs of state were settled and every duty he had dealt with, the Prince would carry the Princess to the garden and talk with her about everything he had seen and done that day. And he would end his stories with 'I wish you had been with me.'

One night, the Princess was inspired. "My Prince. I can be with you if you open my box!"

The Prince, remembering his promise to the King, smiled and said, "Of course I will." He unsheathed his sword and struck the hinges from the box lid and shoved it off.

The Princess clapped her hands and laughed, then, timidly, peaked over the edge of the box. After a moment she stood up boldly and twirled around inside her box. "The world is so beautiful, and wide, and vast, and nothing holds me from it!'

The Prince waited with anticipation for the Princess to climb from her box and join him in the adventures he had imagined for them both, adventures that could now be made real.

Glowing with triumph, the Princess turned to the Prince.

“My Prince. I wish to sit in the shade of the willow tree and contemplate all the wonders I will see outside of my box. Carry my box to the other side of the garden.”

The Princess believed that now she was no longer constrained to her box she should be able to do all the things she saw others doing around her. And so she demanded that the Prince lift and push and carry her and her box in such a way as to emulate the feeling of running, doing cartwheels, leaping over brooks.

These constant demands exhausted the Prince, who began to hate the sound of the Princess’s voice and would now linger a few moments, a few seconds before answering her call. The Princess noticed he no longer ran to her side with a smile and was gripped by dread.

Her demands became more frequent, more querulous, and more elaborate. And the Prince’s exhaustion grew, his body breaking from his attempts to fulfill her wishes, his face hardened, losing all the warmth and kindness the Princess had once loved so dearly.

At some point she started to hate him. Hate him because no matter how hard he tried he could not give her what she wanted and hate him because despite his failure, her fear of losing him was so great. Where would she be without him to lift her?

One day the Prince and the Princess sat by a riverside. The Prince, so tired and broken every breath was agony, had set the Princess’s box down on a tussock overlooking the fast flowing river. While he rested, the Princess watched several strong youths swimming in the water upstream. After a moment she pointed them out to the Prince.

“My Prince. I wish to swim as they do.”

For a moment the Prince stared at her, uncomprehending. Then he found his voice. “My Princess, the current is very swift and I am not very strong right now. Even unencumbered it would be a difficult swim for me.”

The Princess was dumbfounded at his refusal. She watched him, stricken, till she found her voice and said what she had felt for many, many weeks. “You never wished me to be with you. That was a lie.”

Torn by her words, the Prince said nothing. He simply sat, defeated.

Was it love or hate that inspired the Prince to eventually pick the Princess up in her box, set her into the river and wade into the water with her? He fought the current as best he could while holding onto her bobbing, dragging box but did not make it half way before his exhaustion overwhelmed him.

The Prince drowned and the Princess was swept down stream. No one ever saw her again.

A hard rains gonna fall: how hard is up to you

Paul Elam · 11 January 2012 · Archived copy · Original

[quote]Those who make peaceful revolution impossible will make violent revolution inevitable.
~ John F. Kennedy[/quote]

The Punch, an Australian website, employs Tory Shepherd, a feminist activist that has done some bit writing for a few mainstream outlets. She has recently pledged to debunk the men's rights movement and has begun a series of articles to that end. However, all that has materialized is two short, poorly articulated rants, completely devoid of substance.

In her first piece, she created her own talking points for the men's rights movement. Yes, she created them, herself, without speaking to or even quoting any men's activists, and then asserted that she was going to debunk the points she had written, representing them as coming from the MRM. This particular fact seemed to go unnoticed by a following of fellow ideologues, most of which appeared to have no more interest in journalistic integrity than The Punch, or indeed Shepherd herself.

The second piece, recently released, was a cursory overview of conspiracy theorists that didn't even address the men's movement, except by loose and tacit implication. It looked to be written in about 10 minutes; an even less involved effort than the first article. Shepherds failure is complete, but it did not emerge from a void. It was not a coincidence she came out at this particular time and with puerile conduct and taunting that she alleged was a critique of the men's movement. Lest anyone forget, AVfM is engaged in an ongoing exposé of the corrupt influence currently within the Australian government. It is well researched and meticulously documented. Shepherd is fabricating MRA talking points and using the approach of diversionary ridicule because she cannot contend with the facts in the case, which have been made available in abundance by AVfM research editor Kyle Lovett and managing editor John the Other. A review of her articles reveals she does not dispute any of those facts. She doesn't because she can't without digging a deeper hole for herself.

So while she is useless in terms of vetting facts and meaningful discourse, and has presented her series clearly to attempt to personally malign the messengers bearing the information, she has nonetheless brought more attention to the matter, which does help us present it to more Australians who will not hear about it from their own mainstream media. For anyone visiting this site for the first time, a great deal of that information is available here, and here.

Since Shepherd is not delivering on "debunking" her own assertions as promised, I hoped to fill in some of that gap here. There is debunking that needs to happen, mainly of the idea that there is no need for a men's movement as a reaction to feminism. Shepherd alludes to it, as has every gender feminist ideologue that I have ever seen address the subject. It is a common theme that feminists are increasing in volume and frequency as the numbers of men participating in the men's movement continues to steadily increase.

For those that want the basics on the issues faced by men and boys, we have many of them documented here on our Facts Page. Then there is the matter of why men face these issues but have taken so long to even begin doing anything about them. Part of the reason is biology and socialization. Despite feminist rhetoric, men, by their nature, are much more apt to take care of women than themselves. Then there is social pressure. Men don't take very good care of themselves and that is pretty much the way society likes it. We like men to be strong and independent. It makes them good protectors and providers. Unfortunately, we don't much like them to be weak or in need. Socially speaking, it is not considered very masculine.

But there is another force at play here; one that also works against men and women who have evaluated the male gender role and found aspects of it detrimental to men and boys in modern times, as well as observing the various ways men and boys face discrimination and prejudice. Those who act on those observations, politically and socially, are who we refer to as men's rights activists/advocates, or MRA's.

Let's take a moment, aside from the information on The Facts page, to consider just a few recent events that have induced even more people to take a stand:

[unordered_list style="bullet"]

- After ten years of abuse by the family courts in New Hampshire, Thomas James Ball walked up the courthouse steps and self-immolated in protest.[1] News coverage of the horrific suicide stalled and died with Ball, at the local level. Wikipedia, which maintains a list of political self-immolations, declined to add Ball to the list,[2] and in fact refused to include his story on their pages, citing "irrelevance."[3]
- The Obama Administration issued a "Dear Colleague," letter, advising American institutions of higher education that federal funding would be withheld if they did not reduce the standard of proof in sexually related allegations to that of "preponderance of the evidence," likewise removing the rights of the accused to face their accuser or utilize other aspects of due process, leaving many to have their lives ruined on allegation alone.[4]
- Australia is now embarking on a path that includes criminalizing a man for not talking to his wife enough and for making a purchase without including her in the decision, as well as revoking his right to bail if he is arrested for these things. [5] Activists have used egregiously fraudulent documentation and deception to further this political agenda.[6]
- In India, men are forbidden to ride on "woman only" train cars, and have been beaten, publicly humiliated and even thrown from moving trains for straying on to the wrong car.[7][8] Also in India, politicians are pushing for a law that would pay women a bounty for publicly beating their husbands; a law which would escalate the amount of payment with the severity of the beating.[9]
- In Sweden, the murderous ideology of Valerie Solanas has been translated into plays for school children that glorify bloodlust and murder, and at least tacitly advocate for the extermination of men altogether.[10]
- Men constitute the lion's share of combat deaths[11], workplace deaths[12], suicide deaths[13], and are afflicted with almost every known human malady and disease more frequently and more severely than women.
- We have a number of offices and agencies concerned with women's health[14], and none for men.[15] In the US we have a staggering, staggering amount of other government agencies and social organizations dedicated to the welfare of women.[16] Efforts by well-meaning individuals to take an interest matters that adversely affect men are met with disdain, vicious personal attacks and death threats.[17][18][19]

[/unordered_list]

The current ridicule and dishonest "journalism" being presented at The Punch is just another example in a long list of attempts to mischaracterize the men's movement.

Meanwhile, the predominant social narrative is that we live in a patriarchy that operates for the enrichment of all men at the expense of all women. That narrative includes the frequent characterization of men as inferior and sub-human, deserving of every misfortune this society can manufacture and inflict upon them, including the draconian and outrageous matters listed above. Those who vociferously object to these injustices are now targeted with increasing invective and condemnation. The default criticism rests on the allegation of pathological anger.

Yes, we are accused of being angry, about gross injustice, as though we are not supposed to be. We are accused of having hostile feelings about sweeping social bigotry; which is to say, in all earnestness, we are accused of possessing human compassion and good values; accused of advocating for a more fair society. In the eyes of ideologues like Shepherd, those values and the compassion are the real problem. She just attacks the anger because it is easier, and she plays on the perception of men as all-powerful to excuse and justify it.

Normally, in the routine course of my work, I would spend at least some time donning a psychological and emotional biohazard suit and plumbing the depths of this mentality in order to try to understand what is driving it. And indeed I am truly curious as to what festering, morally atrophied deviation of humanity could look at anything approaching this level of discrimination and suffering without becoming angry. But I honestly think at this point there is more value in prognostication than etiology.

What is more significant here, and speaks directly to the core of the men's movement, is the probable fallout from continued neglect of, and indifference toward, these issues. What feminists fail to understand, by choice or ignorance, is that we are attempting to prevent the likes of Thomas James Ball, not inspire it. His inspiration came from policies feminists support; the very policies which we oppose. Thomas Ball represents a tragic, dysfunctional reaction to chronic, systemic abuse. There are many possible reactions. Some even worse than his. And while we cannot, must not, condone violence, we had better learn to expect it as long as an ideological war against men is allowed to make a battlefield in our justice system and within the heart of our own families.

When people are subjected to hatred, bigotry and legal persecution – they always eventually react. Anyone who does not believe that has never cracked a history book. Some of the stories are chilling. There have been acts committed in the name of legitimate civil rights that are inexcusable. But they are an unavoidable part of the human condition. Inflict enough pain, as America did on blacks, and you get cities ablaze. There were burning buildings, bodies in the street and a nation torn apart. All of it could have been avoided with justice and compassion.

When you look at what is happening with feminist influence across much of the planet, you see the same formula coming into play. Pressure is building. That is precisely why even Tory Shepherd expressed caution about a men's movement that is on the rise. The only release valve for that pressure is the recognition and amelioration of injustices against men, but we are moving, horrifically, in the wrong direction.

This isn't some specially privileged information that we MRA's hold license to. All you have to do is read the articles of Kyle Lovett or John the Other, visit The Facts Page here, or investigate the bullet points laid out above and you will see the problem, and why we are angry about it. It is all there in open view available for anyone. The only thing preventing anyone from seeing all this and being angry about it is apathy, indifference, and frequently, evil.

The good news here is that things will eventually change. The bad news is that it will not be easy or comfortable. The social pendulum cannot be controlled. It will swing, back and forth, seeking as always to find balance and equilibrium. It will at times knock people and institutions over in the process. Surely as physics apply in the physical world, they similarly govern our societal existence. Men and boys are under fire, in deep trouble. Most of those problems have emerged in a zeitgeist that fosters hate and indifference toward them. They are losing in our families, our schools, our courts and our media. And they are not losing to women's rights. They are losing to hatred and depraved indifference. Regardless of anyone's judgments or prejudices, it is fostering a reaction that is gaining visible momentum. Even as the likes of Tory Shepher denies all else, she is not denying that at all.

Whether it becomes a wave of social change, or a violent tempest of indignation and fury, the pendulum will continue to swing. The men's movement is pushing for the former, because without that, the latter is the only thing we are left with.

Sources

[1] Free Keene, June 2011

[2] http://familyrights.us/news/archive/2011/june/thomas_james_ball/wiki.html

[3] http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Self-immolation

[4] http://online.wsj.com/article/SB10001424053111903596904576516232905230642.html

[5] http://www.fahcsia.gov.au/sa/women/pubs/violence/np_time_for_action/national_plan/Pages/default.aspx

[6] http://www.avoiceformen.com/feminism/feminist-lies-feminism/fostering-discrimination-through-lies/

[7] http://hahajk.com/newz/world-news/man-beaten-off-womans-train-in-india/

[8] http://articles.timesofindia.indiatimes.com/2010-12-15/kolkata/28244162_1_constable-ladies-compartment-train

[9] http://www.deccanherald.com/content/193470/pati-patni-ten-thousand.html

[10] http://translate.google.ca/translate?hl=en&sl=sv&u=http://www.pellebilling.se/2011/11/scum-forestallningen-kontext-ar-allt/&ei=k9rKTuCyMuPZ0QHN0_hn&sa=X&oi=translate&ct=result&resnum=2&ved=0CC8Q7gEwAQ&prev=/search%3Fq%3Dpelle%2Bbilling%2Bscum%26hl%3Den%26biw%3D695%26bih%3D835%26prmd%3Dimvns

[11] http://repository.upenn.edu/cgi/viewcontent.cgi?article=1000&context=psc_working_papers

[12] http://www.bls.gov/iif/oshcfoi1.htm

[13] http://www.suicide.org/suicide-statistics.html

[14] http://www.womenshealth.gov/

[15] http://www.glennsacks.com/mens_silent_health.htm

[16] http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/List_of_women's_organizations

[17] http://pubpages.unh.edu/~mas2/V70-Gender-symmetry-PV-Chap-11-09.pdf

[18] http://books.google.com/books?id=5g4tc4WZRvYC&pg=PA71&lpg=PA71&dq=Letter+from+richard+gelles+on+death+threats&source=bl&ots=jUCfrWEYdB&sig=2Ci_MpDNSwjo3HhabY36hw4fCzI&hl=en&sa=X&ei=CR0OT_LwAaKbiQKq_bzHDQ&ved=0CE4Q6AEwBg#v=onepage&q=Letter%20from%20richard%20gelles%20on%20death%20threats&f=false

[19] http://www.washingtoncitypaper.com/blogs/sexist/2010/04/08/mens-studies-too-feminist-for-you-meet-male-studies/

All men are rapists and they are coming after you

S.A.V.E. · 11 January 2012 · Archived copy · Original

… and they are, so get off your couch and do something about it!

There is a well-orchestrated government-backed effort underway to allow women who participate in any sexual activity with a man to charge him with sexual assault or rape – whenever they choose to do so. Every man, married or dating, is at risk.

This unprecedented attack on dating teenage boys and all men began with an April 2011 Department of Education directive. The directive was issued without prior notice or opportunity for public comment: "[I]n order for a school's grievance procedures to be consistent with Title IX standards, the school must use a preponderance of the evidence standard (i.e., it is more likely than not that sexual harassment or violence occurred)."

In October 2011, Caleb Warner was allowed to return to the University of North Dakota after being victimized by the university's low standard of evidence. The accuser had filed claims of sexual assault with both the University and the municipal police department. Two investigations resulted — the university's according to the preponderance standard, and the police's according to the usual "clear and convincing" standard — and they could not have turned out more differently.

Warner was found guilty by his university and banned from campus after a swift investigation. Meanwhile local police reviewed the very same evidence, determined that Warner's accuser was lying, and charged her with filing a false report.

Don't think it could happen to any male you know attending college? Think again. Vice President Joe Biden has launched an active campaign in support of the Department of Education's new directive.

The character Val in the Marilyn French novel, "The Women's Room," said, "All men are rapists." If the definitions are broadened sufficiently, it becomes true. This might be seen as the somewhat laughable assertions of a radical feminist fringe, but the U.S. government is acting on their behalf.

It's no coincidence that the FBI has recently changed its definition of what rape is. The previous definition was in place for eighty years: "The carnal knowledge of a female forcibly and against her will" The Uniform Crime Report Subcommittee has changed that definition to: "penetration, no matter how slight, of the vagina or anus with any body part or object, or oral penetration by a sex organ of another person, without the consent of the victim."

Has she had a drink or two of alcohol or used a drug? Then she's "incapable of consent" even if she voluntarily became inebriated.

Los Angeles attorney Marc Angelucci says, "Think about what the new definition of "rape" means. Every exploratory "hands-on" teenager in the back seat of a car or on a sofa in the parents' basement is now at risk of being branded a "rapist". They kiss. His hand touches ("penetration, no matter how slight, of the vagina or anus with any body part"). She does nothing ("without the consent" means he has the burden to get consent; she doesn't have to express lack of consent). He stops touching. Too late. The hand committed rape and the only question is whether she will press charges. By changing the definition at the FBI data collection level, all jurisdictions will come under pressure to change their underlying statutes to make the crime fit the Federal definition."

Are you a man? A parent with a son? Scared yet? You definitely should be. There are powerful mainly hidden forces at work. In this case, paranoia is not merely justified, it is overdue. There has been no news media coverage of these issues.

Surprised? Shocked? Now that you are informed what action will you take to change these federal initiatives? Will you just sit back and hope that a false charge of rape or sexual assault will not happen to any males you know? Don't count on it.

Fostering discrimination through lies

John Hembling (JtO) · 11 January 2012 · Archived copy · Original

[box type="note" icon="none"]
NOTE: between the date of this article's publication, and September of 2012, the Australian government either moved or deleted the PDF document of "The Plan", formerly hosted at the address: http://www.facs.gov.au/sa/women/pubs/violence/np_time_for_action/national_plan/Documents/The_Plan.pdf

Fortunately, a copy of this document was saved by this article's author, JtO, and the PDF version of The Plan is now hosted by AVfM at http://www.avoiceformen.com/wp-content/uploads/sites/2/2012/09/The_Plan.pdf

[/box]

In 2009, the Australian Civil Service, comprised of hundreds of careered bureaucrats and public academics, assembled a publicly funded organization called The National Council's Plan for Australia to Reduce Violence against Women and their Children. This organization was formed along ideological lines, as is evident in the name. The phrase "women and their children" indicating a strong suggestion of a concept of family which excludes fathers as a part.

This council included a dozen members who authored a 204 page rationale and set of recommendations for sweeping changes to Australian domestic policy and law. These recommended changes, if passed into law, will transform Australian society from a Western, egalitarian society into a tiered, totalitarian state organized along lines of sexual legal segregation. The planned abrogation of male human and civil rights in Australian society represents a profound humanitarian crisis. That this is planned, and principally impacts men, means that humanitarian organizations worldwide are now ignoring, and will likely continue to totally ignore, the organized campaign of apartheid and its resulting human damage.

This campaign is being pursued and justified in a document called The Plan using a repetitive and internally inconsistent narrative built almost entirely on falsehood.

This plan's justification includes repetitive use of the formal logical fallacies, Appeal to Authority, Appeal to Popularity, purposeful exclusion of a known victim demographic, open self-referential contradiction within the document's content, disregard of peer-reviewed statistics negating the implied assumptions, and a host of other deliberate falsehoods.

This discussion on AVfM examines the pervasive factual and rhetorical dishonesty used by ideologues within Australian government to promote and rationalize a program of human rights violations, child abuse and intentional social damage in Australian society. Further deception throughout the published plan is accomplished by selective citation, using only studies which show male perpetration and omitting others, fabricating conclusions in cited research which that research does not support.

The goal of The Plan, taken as a whole, is malevolent. It is sold through rhetorical construct fabricated in a grand deception built on falsehood, misdirection, logical fallacy and emotional appeal by the collective effort of its dozen authors on The National Council to Reduce Violence against Women and their Children.

Australia is gearing up to change the country's system of laws; de-classifying men as human beings and re-classifying them as the owned possessions of women, or perhaps, as livestock.

That's the short version. If it sounds absurd, or monstrous, or insane, that's because it actually is absurd, monstrous and insane. But it's also true.

The Australian government has a plan, which when taken in sum, amounts to a collection of brutal and broad reaching violations, no, revocation of the human rights of more than half the population of the country. And they'll probably succeed, because they're pursuing this agenda under the false and pious wrapper of protecting women and children. It is possible to inflict just about anything on anybody if pursued behind the claimed goal of protecting women and children.

Asserting that the Australian government is doing this is not an indictment of the elected government. Although that would be problematic, it would be less dangerous and destructive to human rights than the reality. It is the civil service and careered bureaucrats who, regardless of elected administration, actually run the apparatus of Australian public life. The Australian public sector is populated by ideologues with an agenda. This agenda has been published for private citizens to find. The document, produced by a public funded organization called The National Council to Reduce Violence against Women and their Children is simply named "The Plan" [1].

Starting from false assertions

Before delving into that ugly, antihuman statement of intent, it's worth commenting on the name of the authoring organization.

The phrase "to Reduce Violence against Women and their Children" is a clear statement of intent to ignore violence against men. Implied in this statement is the suggestion that women, the demographic named to be protected, suffer a rate of violent victimization higher than men or higher than the sexually heterogeneous population of the country. This suggestion embedded in the authoring organization's name is false. According to the Australian Institute of Criminology, men are overwhelmingly the majority of the victims of violent crime. In addition, in domestic violence, women are as violent or more violent than their male spouses or partners [3][4][5][6][7]. This is universally known within DV reporting and service agencies, as it clearly demonstrated in peer reviewed research on the topic. In fact, within the domain of academic and public specializations addressing the phenomenon of domestic violence, there is a culture of ideological bias, manifesting as systematic dishonesty. This was studied and documented by Dr. Murray Straus, Ph.D. Co-Director of the Family Research Laboratory at the University of New Hampshire in his 2007 paper "Processes Explaining the Concealment and Distortion of Evidence on Gender Symmetry in Partner Violence."[2]

Strauss identified seven categories of deceptive practice utilized by writers and practitioners in the field of domestic violence, almost all of which are demonstrated in the body of the Australian government's published plan. These include suppression of evidence, avoidance of nonconforming data, selective citation, and fabrication of conclusion – claiming that cited research makes conclusions it does not. The last method is identified by Strauss as Evidence by Citation.

The name of the organization authoring The Plan contains further implied falsehood. The phrase "Women and their Children" reveals a belief that apart from men as fathers, a "family" is a woman and her children, and that fathers are a mere disposable utility. Setting aside the hatred towards men innate in this idea, an overwhelming body of peer reviewed research demonstrates the developmental importance to children of the presence of their fathers [8][9][10][11]. This reveals the accepted falsehood used by family courts to sever fathers from their children. The phrase "in the best interest of the children" is revealed for the ideological dogma that it really is.

Fundamental Lies

These two fundamental lies are apparent in the name of the organization which authored the document hosted on the Australian government's server, called The Plan. The document itself includes 204 pages of recommendations for ways to violate and discard the human rights of men in Australia, self through a pervasive campaign of lying and purposefully false advocacy research. To be fair to the document's publishers, they've made this clear in the first page and distanced themselves from the lies and anti-humanist recommendations they're publishing with the following disclaimer:

> "The Department of Families, Housing, Community Services and Indigenous Affairs (FaHCSIA) accepts no responsibility for the accuracy or completeness of any material contained in this publication."

The prospect of reading and reporting on 204 pages of government-speak appears at first a daunting task. However, after reading the first dozen pages, it becomes clear that due to the repetitive nature of the content, it is likely that such documents are deliberately bloated to unwieldy length to discourage reading and public exposure. It is also obvious that the Australian National Council to Reduce Violence against Women and their Children's plan is built from a sloppy rhetorical framework of lies.

The entire 204 pages of emotionally persuasive rhetoric is an edifice built from falsehood. It is a catalogue of factual falsehood, misdirection and of formal and informal logical fallacy.

A Framework of Deception

In the following paragraphs, we will be discussing a number of formal logical fallacies. Due of the flagrant and comprehensive dishonesty permeating the document produced by the Australian federal bureaucracy and state employees – these falsehoods are identified as we progress.

Mentioned informally in this article's introduction, the Title page of The Plan contains the first falsehoods, embedded in the title itself.

Fallacy: Begging the Question

The logical fallacy, not already discussed is formally known as begging the question, also called a circular argument. An argument is circular if its conclusion is among its premises, if it assumes (either explicitly or not) what it is trying to prove. Such arguments are said to beg the question. A circular argument fails as a proof because it will only be judged to be sound by those who already accept its conclusion.

In the case of The Plan this lie is committed several times within the title. The first offence being the implied conclusion that violence against women is the highest incidence of demographic-specific victimization. Reference to the Australian Institute of Criminology statistics or peer reviewed literature on DV show this to be a false assertion [2][3][4][5][6][7]. i.e.: A Lie.

The second occurrence of Begging the Question, also found in the title is the implied assertion that children are the engendered family of only women, exclusive of fathers; and that men, as fathers, are not a fundamental element of families, that basic unit of all human culture. By repetition throughout the document, it's obvious that men are excluded from consideration as part of the families by practice of the propagandist's maxim.

> Make the lie big, make it simple, keep saying it, and eventually they will believe it.

Fallacy: Mention of one thing excludes all others.

While not a formal logical fallacy, another category of deceit is also found in the document's title. The Latin dictum: Expressio Unius Est Exclusio Alterius; meaning "the express mention of one thing excludes all others" is employed to dismiss consideration of the real violent victimization of men and boys, despite the documented fact that this victimization comprises a statistical majority of violence impacting the Australian public.

Alternatives to the interpretation presented here might render these complaints moot. One such not explicitly stated is that women and children comprise the only two significant subsets of humanity, and the men and boys victimized should be excluded on the basis of exclusion from consideration as "real" human beings. Obviously, this is a speculative understanding of "The Plan" which is not stated explicitly, but is presented only as illustration that alternative readings outside the scope of this discussion are not intentionally excluded.

Moving past the title, the next item of content is a copyright notice, and a legal disclaimer.

Found on page 2:

> "The Department of Families, Housing, Community Services and Indigenous Affairs (FaHCSIA)

> accepts no responsibility for the accuracy or completeness of any material contained in this publication. Information in this publication is made available on the understanding that FaHCSIA is not providing professional advice. Views expressed in this publication are those of third parties, and do not necessarily reflect the views of FaHCSIA or the Ministers responsible for the portfolios of Families, Housing, Community Services and Indigenous Affairs."

On its face, this is a plain admission of the falsehood of the rest of this document's 204 pages of lies.

This distancing from responsibility is also nullified by the frequent inclusion in The Plan of letters of explicit support for the plan by members of Australian parliament.

> FaHCSIA accepts no responsibility for the accuracy or completeness of any material contained in this publication.

Looked at from an understanding of the established doctrines of ideological feminism – this can also be interpreted as an extension of the absurdist dogma that under "patriarchy", personal volition and agency are illusions covering the omnipotent power of evil masculine oppression and control exerted through unknown means; the concept that all "choice" is merely cooperation with exploitive and vile masculine domination.

The second paragraph of this disclaimer, containing the statement: "…that FaHCSIA is not providing professional advice…" is a simple factual lie. This document is a formal recommendation to elected officials and legislators on matters of legal change and domestic policy. The document's forward, found on page 6 makes the second major lie within the disclaimer apparent, by obviously contradicting the claim that FaHCSIA is not providing professional advice.

From page 6:

> "The Plan of Action discusses the current situation in Australia and recommends sweeping changes between now and 2021. The Plan of Action identifies six core areas for improvement and identifies strategies and actions to achieve this."

Fallacy: Appeal to Authority

Following the document's disclaimer, on page 4 is an Acknowledgements section, and it's here that the first instance of Appeal to Authority crops up. Formally, this is known as an Irrelevant Appeal.

Irrelevant appeals attempt to sway the reader with information that, though persuasive, is irrelevant to the matter at hand. The veracity of an argument is independent from who utters or endorses it.

> "It is important that we first acknowledge that the authority for this Plan of Action was derived from the Australian Government's 2007 election platform to establish a national council of experts – the National Council to Reduce Violence against Women and their Children (the Council) – to develop a plan that would reduce the incidence and the impact of violence against women and their children. "

This passage also contains a repetition of the falsehood that violence against women is the highest incidence of demographic-specific victimization.

> "If you tell a lie big enough and keep repeating it, people will eventually come to believe it. The lie can be maintained only for such time as the State can shield the people from the political, economic and/or military consequences of the lie. It thus becomes vitally important for the State to use all of its powers to repress dissent"
> ~ Joseph Goebbels

Fallacy: Appeal to Popularity

The Acknowledgements section of "The Plan" also establishes a framework for Appeal to Popularity, a logical fallacy suggesting that an idea must be true simply because it is widely held. This, like Appeal to Authority, is another specialized subset of the general category of Irrelevant Appeal.

> "There are many people we must thank for their overwhelming generosity of spirit, for their willingness to share their life experiences and for their well-considered thoughts and ideas."

Further distortion of the balance of who is actually in receipt of the majority of violence in Australian society is pursued in the Acknowledgements section. Piled on here are two overlapping formal fallacies, that of appeal to pity – or emotional appeal, and a reiteration of the previously stated Begging the Question. Women's implied unique and imminent peril from abuse in a relationship is reinforced, despite the peer reviewed statistic's failure to support this dogma, and a healthy heaping of phony heroism in the statement brave women standing up for themselves against this unsupportable unique female victimhood.

> We recognize the courageous women in the history of the women's movement who started this journey to set free and protect women from abusive relationships. They led the way and awoke our nation to the plight of women who have experienced sexual assault and to these women and children for whom domestic and family violence is a daily reality.

The peer reviewed literature on DV shows a sexually reciprocal violence as the norm, and not, as continuously implied in emotive rhetoric that domestic violence is sexually one-sided. The peer reviewed literature [2] hasn't changed since we last looked, and continues to indicate males as the majority of victims of violent crime, and sexually symmetrical abuse in domestic violence [3][4][5][6][7].

This is bundle of lies, piled so thickly by unelected career bureaucrats in Australian public service. A continued list of brave, noble and credentialed individuals is effusively acknowledged, building an emotional appeal to Appeal to Popularity by the length of listing of contributing organizations and individuals, and Appeal to Authority by the portentous credentials and titles of that list's members. All this emotional persuasion is pursued before the serious deception begins in The Plan.

The next section of the document is a forward written by an elected official, Tanya Plibersek, Member of Australian Parliament, Minister for Housing and Minister for the Status of Women.
The minister's forward is continues the focus on establishment of The Plan's authority and populist appeal to emotion. However, in this piling-on, the parliamentarian stumbles, indirectly revealing repeated use of the formal fallacy of Appeal to Popularity. This is exemplified by a passage in the document and immediately admitted to in following descriptive narrative:

> "The Council's members have worked tirelessly to achieve this objective. We travelled extensively and consulted many different stakeholders. We listened to, and heard from, more than 2,000 people across the country. We received hundreds of submissions from all parts of Australia, and we held six expert round-table forums."

Worked tirelessly and traveled extensively are characterizations, not measurable claims of fact. We have a suggestion of sample size with the vague mention of "more than 2,000 people" but this is an imprecise re-iteration of appeal to popularity.

In the next paragraph of the minister's forward, on page 6 of 204 is a direct admission of magical thinking.

> "During our investigations, we found a widespread belief that this issue was pressing and serious."

If it's widely believed, then surely it must be true. This document is written to convince an intellectually defective readership. We know the intended audience is a nation's elected representatives, so this shouldn't be surprising.

Later in this forward, on page 7 – a prediction of female victimization is tossed out for its shock value.

> Without appropriate action to address violence against women and their children, an estimated 750,000 Australian women will experience and report violence in 2021-22, costing the Australian economy an estimated $15.6 billion

The mention of large number of victimized women with no citation of source is emotionally compelling, but fundamentally and factually uninformative. Whether this number is realistic or not, readers are provided no context and no comparison. How many men are predicted to "experience and report violence in 2021-22"?

Noting that men are presently the majority of the victims of violent crime, it's logical to predict more male victims than female – more than 750,000. We aren't told this number or any number for male victims, because the intent of the document is to manipulate, and not to inform. The consistent pattern of logical fallacy and emotional manipulation through The Plan should be apparent to readers of this discussion by now.

The provided Executive Summary continues to bludgeon readers with what after ten previous pages is now a monotonous repetition of the mythology that women and their children are endlessly threatened, victimized, and subject to violence. No repetition of this narrative in the previous pages yet cites research to establish veracity. However, a new claim of Sexual Violence affecting 1 in 5 women in their lifetimes is made in the Executive Summary refers to the Australian Bureau of Statistics, but fails to identify a specific report or study.

The term Sexual Violence, which in the Executive summary, it is claimed 1 in 5 women are victimized by in their lifetimes is purposefully ambiguous. Fortunately "The Plan" includes a glossary of terms which a reader can use to determine if this represents violent physical assault, or a broader range of activities designed to pathologize nonviolent behavior for purpose of statistical inflation.

The glossary provides a definition for Sexual Assault, but not for Sexual Violence. If we assume the authors of The Plan are incompetent, this variation in terminology can substitute Sexual Assault's glossary definition for Sexual Violence referred to in the Executive Summary.

On the other hand, if we assume the authors of The Plan are competent, the absence of a definition for "Sexual Violence" in the document's provided glossary takes a different character. Familiarity with an ongoing pressure from ideologues to expand the definitions of offences indicates that use of undefined terminology is purposeful male vilification and inflated statistics.

Another visit to the Australian Institute of Criminology website shows that despite the insistent narrative of "The Plan" the collected statistics of the A.I. of C stubbornly refuse to show anything except men as the primary victims of violent crime. Similarly, reference to methodologically valid peer reviewed literature on domestic violence continues to fail to support a sexually one sided view of domestic violence. The repetition of an unsupportable narrative by the authors of The Plan may convince readers who fail to compare the doctrinal view of domestic violence with research on the topic. To informed readers, the repetition appears increasingly desperate.

The executive summary also continues to promote the fantasy that any organized effort to reduce violence must obviously focus exclusively on female victims, since, in the fantasy world being sold by this document, male victims don't exist, and female perpetrators don't exist. This theme is continually re-enforced through the document, with an insistence bordering on panic. The authors know the enormity of the deception they are crafting. A lie which, if not continually buttressed through the narrative, will collapse due to its stark contradiction of reality. Researchers and service providers in the area of domestic violence have the same, or greater access to publicly available, peer reviewed statistics that the public do.

Strauss stated in the conclusion of his 2007 paper:

> Processes Explaining the Concealment and Distortion of Evidence on Gender Symmetry in Partner Violence

Seven methods identified in Straus's research created an intellectual climate which:

> "…inhibited research and publication on gender symmetry in PV and largely explain why an ideology and treatment modality has persisted for 30 years, despite hundreds of studies which provide evidence on the multiplicity of risk factors for PV, of which patriarchy is only one.." [2]

Despite a doctrinal adherence the male-as-oppressor model for domestic violence, the greater body of peer reviewed research on DV continues to indicate:

> that women are as physically aggressive, or more aggressive, than men in their relationships with their spouses or male partners.[3]

That intimate partner violence is a reciprocal issue, without sexual direction in it's practice, means that any plan to address purposefully ignoring half the problem by sex is a plan deliberately designed to fail. Counter violence programs with this designed impotence will effectively escalate violence by diverting attention and resources from legitimately useful strategies.

The purpose of The Plan is not to reduce violence. Rather, it appears to be the establishment of a legally tiered society, and expansion of the state's power to a level of totalitarian reach, recognizing no limit in the interference and abrogation of individual's human and civil rights.

The document's executive summary includes the paragraph, indicating a bold and sweeping deception:

> Domestic and family violence and sexual assault cannot be excused or justified under any circumstances. It is wrong, and all victims need compassionate and highly responsive support, and all perpetrators must be held accountable for their violence.

Rewriting the Dictionary to Excuse Violence

In the included glossary, Domestic Violence is defined to:

> refer predominantly to abuse of a person, usually a woman, by their intimate partner.

Taken in this document's larger scope, the possibility here of men as victims is a major concession. However, this is potentially discounted by the declaration that:

> Domestic Violence refers predominantly to abuse of a person, usually a woman.

When this narrative's contradiction of well known sexual symmetry in DV is considered, it's apparent that to the plan's authors, males do not merit consideration as "people". The remainder of the glossary's provided definition for Domestic Violence provides a detailed attribution of motive.

> "the central element of 'domestic violence' is an ongoing pattern of behaviour aimed at controlling one's partner through fear"

Rather than DV being violence which occurs within a domestic context, according to the supplied glossary, DV is distinguished by the intention of the alleged perpetrator, and is not even limited to actual violence. However, the implied exclusion of male victims from consideration is solidified by characterization of an assumed motive, rather than the behavior of participating individuals.

> the violent behaviour is part of a range of tactics to exercise power and control over women and children.

Persistent omission of mention of male victims of DV demonstrates a selective avoidance of the peer reviewed literature indicating DV as sexually symmetrical.

The glossary definition of domestic violence continues to include an inventory of types of qualifying abuse.

Economic Abuse, Psychological Abuse, Spiritual Abuse, Sexual Abuse and physical abuse are the listed categories, each with accompanying descriptions which when taken in sum, allow for almost any non-abusive behavior's categorization as abuse. In addition, the first three inventoried abuse types are commonly female behaviors towards men. This fact, along with repeated implied male exclusion from consideration as victims of DV clarifies the persistent falsehood that stopping DV is this plan's purpose.

An unstated purpose becoming increasingly obvious is the stripping of human rights from males, the abrogation of personal autonomy and volition of women, and justification of unlimited reach of the state to interfere in the lives of Australians.

The glossary definition of perpetrator is also explicit in its exclusion of women as possible violent offenders.

> A 'perpetrator' is the individual who inflicts violence against a woman or child.

What word do we use to describe an individual who inflicts violence against a man in any situation, domestic or otherwise? Is this omitted from the definition because men are never victimized? No, because despite the narrative of the Australian government's plan, the criminal victimization statistics clearly show men as the majority sexual demographic in receipt of violence. The peer reviewed literature similarly provides no support for definitional exclusion of women as perpetrators:

> 282 scholarly investigations: 218 empirical studies and 64 reviews and/or analyses, which demonstrate that women are as physically aggressive, or more aggressive, than men in their relationships with their spouses or male partners.

The glossary's definition of perpetrator as an individual inflicting violence on women or children, and excluding consideration of male victims shapes the entirety of the rest of this document, decoding the concepts of "safety", "justice", "victimization", "rape" to mean only for women and excluding men.

In fact, this government authored and produced plan is increasingly obvious as a procedural road map for legalized sexual discrimination and a practical legalized abrogation of personhood for males in Australian society.

The glossary also defines Family Violence, excluding men from consideration as recipients of abuse in the definition.

> Family violence refers to violence against women perpetrated by a family member which may include, but is not limited to, their intimate partner.

Whether this exclusion is because violence against men is not violence, or whether men are not parts of families is academic, the executive summary's conclusion – that "Family violence […] cannot be excused" is an obvious lie in the context of this document's recommendations.

It obviously can be and is excused when violence is committed against men or boys.

There are three implied assumptions in this selective definition.

- Domestic violence is sexually directional against women but not men. False
- Male victimization is acceptable because men are “not really people”. False
- That reciprocal DV can be reduced or stopped by a plan ignoring half the participants. False

The glossary’s definition of Sexual Assault is also predictably incomplete, using the word “explicit” to characterize omission of male victims from consideration in cases of sexual assault.

> While ‘sexual assault’ is explicit in the definition of violence against women and their children in the Plan of Action.

By now, this pattern of exclusion has exceeded characterization by the words repetitive or pervasive in the government’s plan, and can only be described as excessively overstated to the point of boring monotony.

However, the provided definition not only excludes the real-world male victims of violence perpetrated by men and women, in its exclusive identification as females as victims, expands the scope of sexual assault to a potentially unlimited range of non abusive, non sexual, and non assaultive behaviors which healthy people engage in regularly.

According to the continued glossary definition of sexual assault:

> there is no single nationally or internationally agreed definition of what constitutes ‘sexual assault’ and definitions used in Australia vary between jurisdictions, agencies and surveys.

According to this definition, subjective perception of behavior, social awkwardness, miscommunication, or badly timed flirting could all plausibly be classified as sexual assault.

> The experience-based term defines sexual assault as unwanted behaviour of a sexual nature directed towards a person:
> which makes that person feel uncomfortable, distressed, frightened or threatened….

The numbingly monotonous repetition of the doctrine of exclusively masculine violence and exclusively feminine victimhood is reiterated following the Executive Summary in a letter signed by the collaborating Prime Minister of Australia, The Hon. Kevin Rudd.

From that letter:

> how it could still be the case that in 2008 so many Australian women could have experienced violence from their partner…
> It is my gender – it is our gender – Australian men – that are responsible.

This statement by Rudd is false.

In fact, Rudd is either misinformed, or unconcerned about the content of what his name is attached to, because domestic violence is not a sexually directional issue at all.

Erin Pizzey, the founder of the first women’s shelter in England stated in 2001:

> If you come from a dysfunctional, violent and sexually abusive family, how do you learn? Therefore, domestic violence can’t be a gender issue, it can’t be just men, because we girls – and I was from one of > those families – are just as badly affected. [8]

Pizzey's extensive and direct experience is confirmed by Martin Fiebert's research at California State University in Long Beach.

> "…women are as physically aggressive, or more aggressive, than men in their relationships with their spouses or male partners."

Culpability for a Mountain of Lies

Page 13 of The Plan opens with a roster of the document's authors, the membership of the National Council to Reduce Violence against Women and their Children.

- Libby Lloyd AM (Chair)
- Associate Professor Moira Carmody
- Maria Dimopoulos
- Rachel Kayrooz
- Vanessa Swan
- Pauline Woodbridge
- Heather Nancarrow (Deputy Chair)
- Dorinda Cox
- Dr Melanie Heenan
- Andrew O'Keefe
- Lisa Wilkinson

The introduction of this collection of experts makes it clear to readers that the greater body of peer reviewed research and expert literature demonstrating domestic violence as sexually reciprocal, and not sexually directional cannot be unknown to the document's authors.

> Established for a term of one year, the Council consists of 11 members from across Australia selected for their extensive knowledge, expertise and networks in the fields of sexual assault and domestic and family violence.

These individuals have no excuse, and as professionals, and the authors of this Brobdingnagian edifice of falsehood, are plainly a clan of professional liars, intent on doing harm escalating violence against men and women, and collapsing the human rights of anyone but themselves.

In 2011 Christina Hoff Sommers, speaking to a live audience said on the topic of domestic violence:

> We're not talking about a few errors, we're not talking about occasional lapses, we're talking about a body of egregiously false information at the heart of the domestic violence movement. False claims are pervasive. False claims are not the exception, they are the rule.

The Plan provides a further narrative of justification in its development.

> The Council developed this Plan of Action by validating emerging trends, repeatedly testing ideas and solutions against the best available evidence, and building on the experience and wisdom grown from practice.

The claim: repeatedly testing ideas and solutions against the best available evidence is patently false, as through this document, the male victimization, and the sexually reciprocal nature of domestic violence is ignored. Perpetrator is defined in the plan's glossary exclusively as an "individual who inflicts violence against a woman or child".

Also ignored is the fact that most child victimization is perpetrated by mothers.

Advocacy Research

Advocacy Research is a term used to distinguish unbiased research from that which is conducted with a particular conclusion as the researcher's goal. This kind of study seeks to measure, or to illustrate social problems with a view to heightening public awareness of them and providing a catalyst to policy proposals and other action to ameliorate the problem in question. Advocacy research studies are susceptible to bending of research methods in order to inflate the magnitude of the social problem described, and thereby enhance the case for public action to address the issue.

This is why scrupulous care and rigorous adherence to valid methodology is so importance in advocacy research. It is easy to craft a study supporting a pre-selected conclusion, ignoring evidence or data which doesn't conform to the selected conclusion.

The Duluth Model is the name for a conceptual model for understanding and addressing domestic violence, and it is a template example of an ideologically selected conclusion.

Critics of this model have stated that "programs based on the Duluth Model may ignore research linking domestic violence to substance abuse and psychological problems, such as attachment disorders, traced to childhood abuse or neglect, or the absence of a history of adequate socialization and training. [10][11] Some criticize the Duluth model as being overly confrontational rather than therapeutic, focusing solely on changing the abuser's actions and attitudes rather than dealing with underlying emotional and psychological issues.[11]

Donald Dutton, a psychology professor at the University of British Columbia who has studied abusive personalities, states: "The Duluth Model was developed by people who didn't understand anything about therapy." He also insists that gender doesn't play a role in domestic violence. [10]

The exclusive focus on males as perpetrators and the rejection of system dynamics models has been criticized from perspectives influenced by psychology and family therapy. The fields of psychology, psychiatry, and social work all provide for application of skill learning, improved social understanding and practiced behavioural mastery to provide for corrected and alternative behaviours.

In comparison, the Duluth Model presents only a simplistic and ideological "once an abuser, always an abuser" response to the complex problem of partner violence. It also starts from the false doctrine that domestic abuse is a sexually directional form of abuse.

The Plan's frequent reference to the Duluth model (pages 137, 139, 148, and 155), when considered beside the panel of expert authors of this document does nothing to lend it credibility.

What's obvious to the point of extreme tedium is that this plan is built, promoted, justified and supported by lies. What's also obvious is that the plan's framers have no intention to reduce violence, create safety, or pursue anything describable as justice.

What the council intends appears to be the elimination of the human rights of men in Australia, and the radical expansion of the power of the state to interfere in the private lives of Australians.

These goals, among others are explored and exposed later this week by AVfM Researcher and Contributing Editor Kyle Lovett.

[box]
Following the publication of this article in January 2012, The Australian government has either moved or deleted the PDF document, formerly hosted at the address:
http://www.facs.gov.au/sa/women/pubs/violence/np_time_for_action/national_plan/Documents/The_Plan.pdf

Fortunately, a copy of this document was saved by this article's author, JtO, and the PDF version of The Plan is now hosted by AVfM at http://www.avoiceformen.com/wp-content/uploads/sites/2/2012/09/The_Plan.pdf
[/box]

[1] http://www.facs.gov.au/sa/women/pubs/violence/np_time_for_action/national_plan/Documents/The_Plan.pdf

[2] http://www.aic.gov.au/publications/current%20series/facts/1-20/2006/3%20crime%20victimisation.aspx
[3] http://pubpages.unh.edu/~mas2/V74-gender-symmetry-with-gramham-Kevan-Method%208-.pdf

[4] http://csulb.edu/~mfiebert/assault.htm

[5] Headey, B., Scott, D., & de Vaus, D. (1999). Domestic violence in Australia: Are Women and Men Equally Violent? Australian Social Monitor 2:57-62

[6] Dutton D. G. (2007). Female Intimate Partner Violence and Developmental Trajectories of Abusive Families. International Journal of Men's Health, 6, 54-71
[7] Archer J (2000). Sex Differences in Physically Aggressive Acts between Heterosexual Partners: A Meta-Analytic Review. Psychological Bulletin, 126, 651-680

[8] http://www.childwelfare.gov/pubs/usermanuals/fatherhood/

[9] http://www.childwelfare.gov/pubs/usermanuals/fatherhood/chaptertwo.cfm

[10] http://www.babyzone.com/mom_dad/fatherhood/article/fathers-are-important

[11] http://www.sciencedaily.com/releases/2008/02/080212095450.htm

[12] http://www.guardian.co.uk/world/2001/nov/26/gender.uk1

[13] http://www.chicagotribune.com/news/local/chi-abusers-02-jan02,0,1147422.story?page=2

[14] http://www.ontla.on.ca/library/repository/mon/23001/288919.pdf

The campus rape kabuki dance

Pierce Harlan · 12 January 2012 · Archived copy · Original

My friend Horace was down in the dumps this afternoon when I ran into him at the mall. He'd just learned that his alma mater, Yale, is thinking of instituting gender-neutral housing, which means the girls and the boys will be allowed to live together. Horace is livid because he fears for the safety of the women on campus.

I tried to tell him his fears are for naught. "The Yale College Council says that gender-neutral housing will improve the sexual climate on campus," I said.

"What does that mean?" asks Horace grimly.

Since I have no idea, I proceed to quote the learned individual who made the assertion. "It means it would reduce the sexual implications of male and female students socializing in a suite."

"'Sexual implications?' I'm completely lost." Horace sputters. "You're not going to tell me that inviting horny college boys to sleep in the same room as their female counterparts isn't going to cause problems for the women, are you?" he asks. "You seriously think the boys will be able to refrain from cajoling the girls for some, um, action? And that no sexual assaults will come of this? Don't you pay attention to the stats? This gender-neutral housing will only increase the already unconscionable likelihood that women on campus will be sexually assaulted." (Horace uses words like "unconscionable" because, as I say, he went to Yale.)

I put my hand on Horace's shoulder. "You worry too much, my boy." I sit him down. "Melanie Boyd seems to think it's a good idea, and she should know. She's Yale's assistant dean of student affairs. Dean Boyd says — and I agree with her — that your concern misunderstands the nature of sexual misconduct. Now are you satisfied?"

Horace frowns. "Of course not. Aren't we constantly told that men rape their wives, girlfriends, and female acquaintances at terrifying rates, and that one-in-four college women are raped? Didn't Jessica Valenti tell us that rape is so 'normalized' that 'otherwise decent guys' don't even think it's wrong? Yet, you're sitting here telling me that, somehow, for reasons you can't explain, gender-neutral suites are 'rape free zones' where the women are safe? What's your basis for that?"

"'Hmm. 'Rape free zones.'" I ponder the phrase. "I'd prefer to think of them as more like vampire nests, where these beautiful young women reside with the evil Undead — except the women have garlic smeared all over their hot, naked flesh so the vampires can't lay a finger, or other protruding appendage, on them."

Horace tells me to go do something to myself with my male organ of copulation that I am quite certain is an impossibility. I make a mental note that Horace isn't into gender humor.

"Calm down," I tell him. "If you'd give me a second, I'll tell you why Dean Boyd says gender-neutral housing is safe for women, and I know her explanation will satisfy all your concerns. She says, and I quote: 'The assault of a suitemate would be a very risky act, legally as well as disciplinarily.' She went on: 'What we know of sexual offenders suggests that they are more likely to seek out other, less risky targets.' Now do you get it?"

Horace frowns. "That's gobbledygook!" he shouts. "You must be misquoting her. You damn well know that men routinely rape the women they're dating. So why isn't raping a date just as 'risky' for men as raping a suitemate, both 'legally' and 'disciplinarily'?"

"Because it isn't!" I snap.

"Besides," he continues, "if rape is so 'normalized' that men don't even think it's wrong, why will men in gender-neutral housing fear raping a suitemate?"

"Don't mix me up!" I blurt out. "I know that Dean Boyd is right about this because gender-neutral housing is the 'in' thing on campus. UCLA recently made the switch, and it declared that any concerns about sexual assault in gender neutral housing have 'no basis in reality.' Brown University and UC Riverside also tried it, and had no reports of sexual assault."

"But, but, but . . ." Horace is so upset, he can barely get the words out, "don't colleges use any occasion — even a false rape claim — to beef up security to make women feel safe? Don't they give women their own shuttle buses to keep them safe from men? Don't they arm women with rape whistles and tell them to walk in pairs? Don't they replace doors on women's dorms that don't adequately keep the men out?"

He's standing up, and his arms are flailing like he's conducting Flight of the Bumblebee. Everyone in the food court from Sbarro all the way down to Orange Julius is staring at us.

He leans in toward me, and for the first time I see that a vein in his forehead is ready to burst. "What about all those campus programs where men are taught that women justifiably fear them? 'She Fears You'? 'Walk a Mile in Her Shoes'? 'Take Back the Night'? You don't expect me to believe that colleges would purposefully put women in danger by embracing promiscuity and no-consequences sex, and by inventing absurd rationales to justify having the roosters to move into the hen house?!"

"Next thing you're going to tell me is that colleges don't take their own alcohol policies seriously," he says angrily, "even though they know that booze is what ignites sexual assault!"

All I can do is stare at him sadly. Suddenly, a look shoots across his face that I haven't seen since the day my daughter figured out there's no Santa Claus, and beads of perspiration dot his forehead. Horace is having a terrible epiphany, and I wish I wasn't around when it happened.

"What you're telling me," he says with the gravitas of a newsman announcing the death of the king, "is that all these efforts to combat rape culture on campus are a charade — a kabuki dance — to satisfy a small gaggle of angry feminists, and that the schools, themselves, know it's all bullshit!"

He chokes back sobs. "Because," he struggles to get the words out, "if one-in-four college women were really being raped, the schools wouldn't be inviting the boys to live with the girls, they'd be banning boys altogether."

Horace puts his head on my shoulder and weeps silently for what seemed an eternity. Just then, a miracle saves me.

"Number 24!" yells a young man from behind Sbarro's counter.

"That's me!" I shout. Saved by the conveyor pizza oven! I shake Horace's hand and mutter something about keeping in touch. The last I see him, foamy saliva is oozing from the corners of his mouth, and he's blurting out something about "patriarchy."

AVfM Radio: female entitlement fail!

Paul Elam · 12 January 2012 · Archived copy · Original

[box]

Female entitlement, a subject near and dear to the heart of many an MRA, is often a target of the work we do at A Voice for Men. It's an area of life that covers a lot of ground, from women expecting they are entitled to be wined and dined, to women that think they are entitled to cut off their man's penis if he treats her badly, or if he doesn't wait for her to cum, or if he wants a divorce.

Setting aside the more extreme examples of this brand of gender insanity, you are invited to join myself and co-host John the Other for a countdown of the top twenty Female Entitlement Fails (FEF's) from recent times. From funny to fantastic to downright bizarre, we are going to deliver a truckload of narcissistic antics. And of course, being MRA's you will want to call in to the show at 310-388-9709 to tell us what we really should have selected for the show. So, gents and ladies, gather up your FEF examples, listen to ours, and be ready to have a few laughs at the decidedly feminine world of Meeeeeee!

Dr. T will be on the phones, of course provided she doesn't suddenly decide she doesn't have to answer them.

SHOW PAGE

[/box]

AVfM gets a new team membr, correction, member

Paul Elam · 13 January 2012 · Archived copy · Original

[box icon="none"]

One of the most tedious and thankless jobs at any regularly updated publication is that of line editor, or the person who actually sits down with a few thousand words of someone else's work and combs through every detail checking for errors in spelling, grammar, punctuation and sentence structure.

It is a job every bit as critical as the original effort put into a piece of writing. New readers can be engaged by one of our articles, and absorbing the message, only to be instantly deflated when they encounter mistakes.

But preventing that is such a pain in the ass that very few people like to do it, even for money. Needless to say, getting someone to do it for free, and on a demanding schedule that supports an ongoing and unforgiving need for "right now" attention, well, it is like trying to find a feminist that supports equal treatment under the law for everyone.

We found such a rare person anyway. Or rather he found us by raising his hand when it counted.

George Olduvai, a reader of AVfM and a lover of professional presentation, has stepped up to the plate to help us bring you articles that are not undermined by misspelled words and other mistakes. He has suited up for all our benefit, and we are indeed grateful for it.

With his arrival and commitment comes a modification to our submissions process that will affect ALL writers for AVfM that do not already have a contributors account with admin privileges. Henceforth, all material submitted to AVfM needs to be sent to articles@avoiceformen.com, in a word document if at all possible.

And a side note here, with all respect to our valued contributors. It is George's job to polish up articles AFTER you have practiced due diligence in getting things right to begin with. Articles that are submitted with numerous, unnecessary mistakes, that appear to have that "I'll let someone else tend to the details," appearance will for sure be attended to, but not in the way you want.

In short, if you won't bother to run it through a spell check, we won't bother to run it on AVfM.

Let's help George help us with professionalism coming in the door.

The end result of this will be a greatly enhanced publication with a smoother, more credible user experience.

I said this was a thankless job, but please join me in thanking George Olduvai just the same.

[/box]

On trial for the truth

Joakim Ramstedt · 13 January 2012 · Archived copy · Original

Most of you have probably read tons of articles about Western society's war on fathers and families. How fathers are forcefully separated from their children against their will, falsely accused of despicable crimes, shamed, and discriminated against by the family courts. Well, Sweden is of course no exception to that rule; quite the contrary. Neither is my story particularly unique in that regard I, guess. I challenged the system and went public with proof of the corruption. Now they are prosecuting me for it. A court date has already been set.

My story is a long one, but I will try to give the short version. I swear that every word in it is absolutely true. It all started back in 2006 when I woke up one morning finding both my one year old daughter and her mother gone. Our relationship had been on the rocks since the child was born, and I guess we both felt pretty fed up. But you can´t just take a child from one of her custodians and move, both have to agree before the child can change address. That is the Swedish law. Back in those days I still lived under the assumption that the laws were protecting both men and women equally. Now, six years later and one daughter poorer, I know better.

My daughter was registered to a new secret address in another town, eventually enrolled into daycare there, and I was not even informed about it. Neither would the national registration office inform me of her address when I asked them. The school authorities also refused to tell me anything about the whereabouts of my child.

I have later learned the reason the mother got away with this. The prosecutors in Sweden are under orders from the state attorney not to press charges when it comes to domestic kidnappings. Only if a parent takes his or her kid out of the country does Sweden gives a shit about it, and they probably wouldn´t even do that if the US hadn´t pressured them after a case involving some American children that were taken to Sweden some years ago. The female state attorney that issued this order said that these crimes were not in the "public's interest" to prosecute.

This strange exception to the law has created a bizarre situation in Sweden. On average three children are kidnapped from one their legal guardians every day. I have spoken to DA's in Sweden who tell me they have boxes full of complaints, but that their hands are tied.

So, with assistance from the state, she got away with her first crime. Afterwards, years of sabotage and false accusations of domestic abuse and all the usual stuff followed. I was told that if I didn´t like it I was welcome to find a lawyer and go to court. The little smirk she had when she said this should have warned me, but following the usual path of all the fathers before me, I fell into all the same traps. The court allowed me only four hours of supervised visitation every other week pending trial. It took CPS almost three months finding someone they thought was suitable for the job. The visitation took place in a dull apartment owned by the social office in the new town of the mother. For me that meant another three hours in the car every time. After just three visitations this self appointed expert on children tried to tear my crying daughter from my arms. I refused to ever let her near my kid again. For that I was punished with another three months without seeing her at all.

Why would I need supervision at all spending time with my daughter? I was never convicted or even charged with any crime ever, and there were absolutely no evidence of abuse, simply because none had ever taken place. But in Sweden a mother's word in a preliminary hearing is all it takes. It took over one and a half years of this ridiculous and humiliating arrangement before I was finally granted a court date. By that time my useless lawyer had pretty much emptied my savings account and I had lost my job because I couldn´t handle the stress. Before the matter of custody is decided in court the "family services" have to do a custody investigation and make a recommendation to the court. And since the feminist ridden parliament changed the custody laws in 2006, they are given a free hand to recommend single custody to whomever they want. All it takes nowadays are two words in a report: "Co-operation difficulties." Guess what mothers that want single custody create? Yep, that´s right. In my case that´s exactly the term they used to recommend that I should lose custody.

[image]When my day in court finally arrived I felt hopeful after all. For the first time since this farce started I would get a chance to be heard. I also was allowed to call a few witnesses. It all went well. The stories that the mother had cooked up all crumbled like a house of cards. Now I just had to wait two weeks for the verdict. I guess it was when I read it two weeks later I first realized that there is something seriously wrong with our Swedish justice system.

The courts in Sweden consist of one judge with legal expertise and three lay judges appointed by the different parties in the parliament (all feminists of course). Their conclusion after the court hearing was that, yes, the mother had falsely accused the father of crimes to the police. And yes, the mother had made a lot of false claims to the family services and the court about the father being dangerous, insane, an addict, socializing with criminals and yada yada. And yes, the mother had committed the crime of removing the child without the father's consent. And yes, she had gotten herself a hidden identity in the public register on false grounds. And sure, the father is probably the best suited parent to ensure the child's needs and rights to both mom and dad. And no, there was no evidence that the father was in any way unsuitable as a parent. HOWEVER…due to the "cooperation problems", shared custody was not in the best interest of the child, and since she now had spent almost all her three years living close to her mother, and almost none with her dad, the court finds that the mother should get single custody of the child. The father would get visitation rights every other weekend.

I remember thinking "this is not happening." I am in the twilight zone. A few months later I started my blog "Daddys". Not because I planned for it to ever make a difference, but because I needed an outlet. Otherwise I would explode with all the anger that was starting to build up inside. First I wrote anonymously; it´s much safer that way when you want to write about stuff such as fathers and men's rights in Sweden. That is considered "anti-feministic and misogynist."

Having reached her first goal of stripping me of my parental rights, the mother now free to do whatever she damn well pleased. I couldn´t do shit about it. Whenever I tried to call anyone to ask or talk about my kid or her problems, they refused to tell me anything. "Are you a custodian?" "No." "So what are you calling us for?" Meaning, "I know exactly your kind, you god damn woman and child abuser." Not even if she had been dying in a hospital would they have told me. Instead they would have denied her even being admitted and sent me packing. I had lost all rights to call myself a father. Why? Simply because I had "co-operation problems" with her mom, that's why.

A year passed and I mostly managed to get her to allow my girl to visit on my weekends. But when time came for me to have her two weeks on her summer holiday, new accusations were made to family services. This time I was said to have chased her and the child with my car for ten minutes while shouting and swearing. She had been sooooo scared. She refused to hand her over. Back to court, demanding that they would enforce the verdict. Faced with the risk of a fine, the mother eventually caved. Those were the best two weeks in my life, and probably in my daughter's as well.

So next comes Christmas and another longer visitation. I had planned a trip north to the snow and mountains, and both my daughter and I had been looking forward to it. But two days before the handover my daughter suddenly got sick with high fever and would not be fit for a train ride. I said "OK, but can I come by then and leave her Christmas presents before I go?" She said "Sure." "OK, fine. I´ll come tomorrow then, and while I am there we can take her temperature and check if she´s better?" She exploded and started cursing and swearing in the phone. I recorded the whole conversation. Her bluff was called, and my daughter was allowed to go on the trip. We had a wonderful time as always.

In March 2009, about a year after the verdict, the shit really hit the fan. My daughter was showing signs of not feeling well. She cried a lot and refused to tell me the reason. "I can never tell anyone" she said. She wanted to stay with me after our weekends were through and she could not understand why she was not allowed to. I tried to explain that the judge had decided this and that it was not up to me. She begged me to talk to the judge and ask him to let her stay. My heart was breaking and I promised her I would. Now I wish I hadn´t.

I contacted another lawyer that sent a letter to the mother about settling this out of court, demanding that the girl's request to spend more time with her dad be respected. I wrote a letter to family services about my daughter and informed them that I was worried about her psychological health and begged them for help. I later found out that the female official in charge had colluded with the mother behind my back for about a year. She immediately made a copy of my letter and gave it to the mother and then she just threw it away, thus breaking a few more laws. She didn´t even bother reading it. During the next handover her mother threw a fit. She screamed "If you sue me for shared custody I will go to the family services and claim co-operation difficulties." My daughter started to cry and I just left. Little did I know that this was the last time I would see my princess for over 10 months. Just seven days later I got a call from the same secretary from family services that I had sent my plea to, informing me that they had now started an investigation against me concerning sexual abuse against my daughter.

That´s when I went public on my blog, which by this time had become quite well read. I declared what I had been accused of. I published the custody verdict telling the truth about all her previous lies and false accusations. I started to call family services, the court, and the national register and record the calls. I recorded the police officer that was in charge of the interrogations of my girl; who was, among other things, forced to draw penises with a crayon. I called up the prosecutor and asked him why he didn´t follow the laws regarding interrogating children. I published it all. I basically pulled their pants down and hung them out to dry.

I reported the corrupt and lying family services to the parliament's justice department, and the police and prosecutor to internal affairs. I published it all. I was a man on fire. Burning with a rage that grew with every day they kept me from my child.

They didn´t like that.

When the parliament's justice department started to look into the family services after my complaint, they suddenly reorganized. The ones that had been responsible on our case suddenly all transferred to other departments, the bosses too. New ones came, and said that they would "check their routines". And that was that. Case dismissed.

Internal affairs freed both the police and the prosecutor from all accusations. The investigation against me was dropped like a hot potato, and now my blog was officially declared a "work health issue" at social services.

When the visitations eventually got started again after ten months, my daughter was shy, but we soon found that old father daughter love again. But once again I was only allowed supervised visitations, so there we were again with the four hours every other week with some stranger guarding us. The mother refused to leave the girl out of her sight, even though she got her demanded supervisor. Pretty soon my daughter, now six years old, started to show more serious signs of psychological stress. She even started to get panic attacks before the scheduled visitations. A child psychiatrist was brought in to find out why. Her investigation ruled out any abuse from me, and stated that the girl enjoyed being with her father. The attacks were caused by her mother subjecting the girl to parental alienation.

The new officials at family services then decided it was time to investigate the mother so they placed both parents and the girl in what they call an "investigation home" with constant supervision. Once again I offered the mother a truce, but instead she took off with the child. They found her and forced her back, but that just lasted for a couple of days, and she was gone again. She also started to report all officials that didn´t buy into her lies to the police. By this time she had made at least 15 unfounded accusations against me for all sorts of crimes. All were dropped.

The investigators final report showed several serious evidence of psycho-social abuse against my daughter. Her grandmother had screamed and called her father an abuser in front of her and on another occasion my daughter had started to talk about how she hated her father and didn´t ever want to see him again. Then she grew silent, turned to her mother and asked "what more was it you wanted me to say?" This is all in the report.

After running off a second time with the girl, the court finally lost their patience and gave me back shared custody, but what good did that do? Family services just let them run off and hide in another city again claiming that they were powerless, probably eager to get rid of the now most famous custody case in Sweden and the risk of ending up on my blog. The national registration office kindly gave her renewed secrecy, even though I handed them all the evidence of her fraud.

I had to go from school to school in the city I knew they lived in and look for her personally. The principal later blamed her lie on the registration office. (If they approve a secret address, there must be a reason).

And there we pretty much stand today. I have not seen my daughter in over a year. It is being said she does not want to. She still lives with her mother at a secret address. The state social board has criticized the family services on five different counts regarding their handling of the case; among other things, not caring about the child and her best interest.

But guess what? The only one they will drag to court and prosecute after all this, is me. I am accused of violating my daughter's and her mother's integrity by publishing the custody verdict with their names in it on my website. A document anyone can call the court and ask to see at any time. They have made my seven year old daughter a plaintiff in a case against her father, who now faces conviction for trying to reveal the truth about the abuse and torture they have put us through.

The trial is set to take place on the 21st of February. I don´t have any doubt the verdict will be "guilty". Knowing the courts in Sweden they probably have already written it.

That´s just a little tale about justice and treatment of children in the feminist state of Sweden.

I hope I have not bored you with this long piece, and that you have made it all the way here to the end. It takes a pretty perverted state to prosecute a victim of all these crimes and protect the perpetrator. How the hell can it be a crime against my daughter to expose the mistreatment of her to the public? And should it not be every man's right to protection from being sent to jail for something he didn´t do? Well, it isn't. Not here.

I called one of my former articles on A Voice for Men "Welcome to Absurdistan." Now maybe you understand why. God help us all.

Real men are disposable, so says Maria

John Hembling (JtO) · 14 January 2012 · Archived copy · Original

Disclaimer: The article by Lucia Maria referenced here[1] is so insanely disgusting that it may be deliberate satire. Unfortunately, due to it's similarity to standard social conservative rhetoric, I cannot tell the difference. ~JtO

Lucia Maria recently explained in her January 13 article that grown-up men should quit trying to have human rights, and go back to dying for her convenience. Maria is a blogger for the traditionalist conservative New Zealand blog nzconservative.

According to Maria, men arguing for the non-disposability of males are the equivalent of children. This comes in response to my recent assertion that the majority of women in Western culture are socialized to buy into an ideology of victimhood. The New Zealand blogger uses quotation marks to attribute a conclusion to my article which it doesn't contain. "Women need to grow up." These are Lucia Maria's words, attributed to me.

Why is that statement in quotes, Lucia? It's not taken from my article. I didn't know this was allowed in real journalism. It's similar to what I was saying, true, but a change in wording also changes meaning. Perhaps the actual conclusion in the piece she referenced was too complex, and she's simplified it for readers of lesser comprehension.

Here's the last paragraph in full:

"As a humanist, a small L libertarian, and a men's rights advocate, I strongly disagree with this absence of individual agency in women. My relatively new understanding of culturally induced infantilism does provide a explanation of what previously appeared deeply malicious behavior. I also hope for and encourage women, self identifying feminists or not, to grow up."

Some of the context can be inferred, but I encourage those interested to consider the article as it was written, not as re-phrased by a critic in efforts to field a flimsy straw man.

However, this simplified message leads Maria to explore the nature of adulthood. Stating the case for confused and selfish men's rights bloggers such as myself, she explains. Also, Maria, I've included your exact words here, so you can see how a quotation works. You're welcome.

"A grown up is a person who does not put their needs, wants and desires first. They are more interested in looking after those they are responsible for than looking after themselves, even to self-sacrifice. In short, they die to themselves so that others might live."

I think Lucia Maria has it backwards; an adult is an individual who takes responsibility for themselves.

By contrast, a parent is responsible for their child, but a person required by convention or law to put another person's needs before their own well-being, to the extremity of self sacrifice or death, that's what most people would call a slave.

The author doesn't leave much room for doubt about who are deemed lesser human beings in her rhetoric, or in the accompanying illustrations. In her article, an included drawing titled "the weaker sex" depicts four women poking a finger-sized man with a knitting needle.

If men are to be counted as "grown up" in her cosmology, voluntary disposability is what Maria expects. Strangely, she seems to miss the connection that in demanding men indulge in fatal self sacrifice, the same standard doesn't apply to women. No men's rights writing I know of makes a demand of female sacrifice of life. For Lucia Maria, however, this is a major criterion of manhood.

Prior to her idiotic and self serving conception of adulthood, she also exalts men getting themselves killed to benefit corporations, bankers and other royalty. Oh, and women too. This is my rephrasing of Maria's language, which if quoted directly states:

“Men obviously don’t go out to fight in wars because women are poking them with knitting needles, they go out to fight because they love us and their families and will do what it takes to protect us and what they value.”

As a member of the disposable sex, the attribution of motive in this claim appears mistaken at best. Men’s socially permitted conception of self has traditionally been one of disposability. In fact, men with the personal strength to declare themselves humans of value besides their disposable utility to women or royalty have traditionally been shamed into the fatal self sacrifice of soldiery. Maria’s self serving statement in support of male death in wartime makes some big assumptions. “[men] will do what it takes to protect us and what they value.”

What if they value their own lives? I’m sure you value yours, Maria, just as I value my own, but is a woman’s life objectively more valuable than any man walking past you on the sidewalk? Does a man who makes the choice to protect himself before self serving ideologues cease being an adult or a “real man”? What about a man who values his own life ahead of a society who devalues his humanity but enforces his utility as a labor and sperm dispenser, and violence absorber? The answer is obvious.

Unfortunately for those accustomed to benefiting from the willing sacrifice of others, the game of control through attempts at shame is of diminishing effect. Within the men’s rights movement as well as outside it, men worldwide are waking up to the facts that despite an increasingly urgent public imperative to “man up,” in the real world men die earlier than women, they comprise 93% of workplace deaths, 90% of the homeless, 75% of suicides, and the majority of the victims of violent crime. Men worldwide are waking up to this reality just as they come under increasing public demand for service, sacrifice, protection by those denying male humanity, but demanding male disposability.

A broader list of issues is hosted here on AVfM, just in case anyone gives a fuck about reality outside an approved and sanitized narrative where women are always the victims.

The urge to silence and marginalize human beings opposing their own escalating legal disenfranchisement is hard to describe without strong pejorative. The exhibited effort to reinforce the disposability of a segment of humanity in defense of the privilege provided for by that same human damage is so naked in Lucia Maria’s posting that the article could pass easily for satire. Sadly, she is in deadly earnest when she declares that, for men, being a grown up amounts to a willingness to die for her convenience.

[1] http://nzconservative.blogspot.com/2012/01/true-grown-ups-and-little-on-male.html

Addendum: If you’ve arrived on AVfM from an attack article opposing this site or the views expressed here, the following several articles should provide you additional fuel. Enjoy.

http://www.avoiceformen.com/sexual-politics/m-g-t-o-w/hear-the-lamentation-of-the-women/http://www.avoiceformen.com/feminism/government-tyranny/there-are-no-laws/http://www.avoiceformen.com/feminism/feminist-governance-feminism/this-truth-really-hurts/

Women, men – and the truth

Paul Elam · 15 January 2012 · Archived copy · Original

Recently, John the Other ran an article here, "Socialized psychopathy, modeling female misbehavior," in which he postulated that women were inherently amoral. It was written in JtO's typically provocative fashion, and created some dissent, some of which even spilled into one of my personal friendships in a very sad and unfortunate way.

Does John's article skirt the edge of convention and in fact dance over it wearing muddy combat boots? Well, yes.

Do his points contain enough reason that they warrant vetting and further exploration? Yes, they do, to a certainty.

Part of the dissent in the comments asserted that material of this sort was a mirroring of feminist strategy; to effectively operate within a "man good, woman bad," paradigm. Yet when I went back to give another, intentionally more thoughtful read to the piece, I find that assertion unwarranted, and in fact consciously avoidant of important details contained in the article.

I will not go through a point by point analysis here. That may well play out in the comments if that is what readers desire. It is all still there, just as originally posted, through the link above.

There are actually more important issues at hand that I will choose to address. And, honestly speaking, I think it feeds into an already severe problem for me to take the time to present a defense to John's already well stated ideas when there is so much more at stake than just one article.

The value of this discussion is that it brings us to a needed vetting of the concept of deconstruction; of whether it is appropriate or helpful to evaluate aspects of the modern psyche of men and women, and draw conclusions as to how those observations may or may not contribute to misandry in society.

To answer this is simple for me personally. If we cannot look at the roots of social customs like hypergamy and chivalry honestly, and seek to understand their origins, then not only are we wasting our time here, we will have also proven to be hypocrites and liars with no right to be here in the first place.

Either that, or we must subscribe to the feminist doctrine that all sexual identity is socialized and that none of this is inherent to our nature. I am willing to give that idea due examination, but can't assume it has any validity in advance.

The fact is that even on cursory examination I can make sense, through a sociobiological lens, of female selfishness and male disposability. I can even speculate that had women adopted a moral code that placed them in expendable roles, it would have resulted in the end of all of us a long time ago. If that is true, it does not make women bad, it makes them human.

I can make the same quick analysis about male disposability. Had men not been willing to risk and die for procreation and female survival, we likely would not be here to have this discussion. And the same inference applies. This does not make men good, just human, and disposable, which we are trying to rise above.

The entire philosophy of this corner of the men's movement hinges on understanding all this and looking at how those roles, applied in a modern setting without such immediate survival needs, have come to visit all of us in ways that are detrimental and often unnecessarily deadly. In particular, we look at how these things play out in our social infrastructure in places like courts, schools and the workplace.

So unless I am wrong, and there was no biological mandate that ever urged women to self-preserve at the expense of men, and to take advantage of their blood and labor without compunction or moral compass, then this is a conversation we must have.

It is just as vital that we understand what drives men to chivalry when the time and practicality have long past; indeed when the practice of it is dangerous to men in ways that no longer serve any benefit to the species at all.

If this conversation is going to be squelched by voices confusing it with misogyny, or our own internal PC aphorisms to “not do what the feminists did,” even when we didn’t, then I hope people will let me know so I can pack up this tent and go home. Just kidding. I am not going anywhere.

I hope, as this conversation gets some perspective from the fine minds that frequent this site, that at the very least we can rise above having to qualify that this is not about vilifying women, or developing a corrupt paradigm in which they are blamed for the ills of the earth; that we can immediately disabuse the notion that we are acting in the same way that feminists do.

For those of you who interpreted John’s article as a feminist-like attack on all women, it is customary in the mainstream to offer an apology, something along the lines of “if you were offended, we apologize.”

First, I don’t offer apologies that start with the word “if.” Those apologies are empty and meaningless. And second, I don’t offer apologies when nothing wrong was done.

What I do offer, what we offer at A Voice for Men, is people of good intent, trying to slog each and every day through the gender insanity in this world, trying to find answers; trying to find truth. We will not always hit the mark, but will not miss because our aim is clouded by hate, prejudice or ignorance.

Where we do err, we will strive to be better, but not because of PC mandates and swallowing blue pills. This website will continue, as we always have, to examine how men and women came to be the way they are.

I have been doing that myself for years, and always with the hope that at some point we can assist men and women, at least the few who want to, in rising above all of it and meeting each other in a place where they see each other as human beings instead of human doings.

We won’t get there without the truth, and the truth won’t be found unless we allow ourselves to look for it.

The silence of the voiceless

Matthew Steele · 15 January 2012 · Archived copy · Original

The silence in the morning, when a man is outside breathing in the crisp winter air, alone with his thoughts and emotions, we say is golden. We never dare admit, however, these are the moments when we reflect on the emotions that have cracked the stony exterior of our being. We stand there quietly, even stoically, while we wage a war on ourselves, with no white flags being raised to stop the fighting. If another man were a fly on the wall, he may see the shimmer of a tear in our eyes, and the effort to swallow hard to choke the emotions back down. In the midst of the battle inside our minds and hearts, we would bellow a cry of rage and despair, but men have no such luxury, for silence to us, is golden.

As the sun breaks, the hues of purple shimmer from the rocks in the distance, and the rays of orange streak across the sky, illuminating the heavens, it begins the darkening of my mind. I find myself drifting from moment to moment, searching for answers that will never be given. In the darkest moments of our lives, unbidden at any time, there is the fear that the darkness will enclose us forever and we will fade into that oblivion. What is even worse, the fear subsides and we slip into those dark moments, wishing it would close off the light forever, and we can slip into that cold embrace. It would be easier to slip into that darkness, to let the physical pain that grips our chest subside; easier to forget the face of our fathers, and our children. Lest we forget, nothing that came easy was ever really worth having, and the consequence of those actions are too much for those who love us to bear.

So we walk in the darkness, we continue in the night, though the sun breathes warmth to our face in the cold air of winter. We forget the taste of food, and we plunge headlong into the bottom of a bottle of whiskey. We become old friends with the names on those bottles, and we let them fight the war on our pain, because we feel we have no strength left to fight the struggles. The air hangs like a stone on us, and every breath brings that old familiar ache in our hearts.

We can feel it, it is the physical expression of our emotional war. We can see it, like brutal autumn rain on a windshield, pouring across our eyes. As the rain pours down, the thunder crashes in our heads, and the weight becomes too heavy to bear, we fall like toy soldiers to our knees. We would cry out, and we try, but the emotions have choked our voice, and all that is left of that voice is the silent scream of the voiceless.

Men are not in touch with their emotions. Men do not feel anything. They have no compassion, they are automatons, they cannot communicate effectively, they do not feel to the depth women do and need consistent reminding of their inability to be complete human beings without women. They are not good parents without womanly guidance. They are not capable of properly providing a good home to a child without a woman. If they do not prostrate themselves in their relationships then it is acceptable to dispose of them and upgrade to a servant who will do as they are told. Men do not understand women, they lack the emotional maturity; they lack empathy, and they will abandon their responsibilities with no regard to whom they hurt because they do not feel emotions the way a woman does.

The thoughts weigh heavily as we go through our lives. Through the distorted hues of cold stones in a scotch glass, we try desperately to see how we came to this place. The emptiness of a room, filled with only a chair and a bottle, starts to close in on us. The ghosts of our past, and the events that led us to this room, without light, devoid of the smile of our children, haunts us to the core of our being. There are tears in this moment, as we sit, stone cold sober, staring at a drink untouched. We would give anything to change this moment, to hear laughter again, to trip over a skateboard, or step on a stuffed animal. We would give everything, for more moments like that, if it had not been robbed from us.

We gave our hearts, our time, our very souls, for that idea of completeness. We gave every waking moment, to a hope, and a dream. We never saw the betrayal coming, not from her, and not from the courts.

Yet, we were betrayed from the very first day. Oh, we knew, somewhere inside us, that it would come; that as time passed, and our favorite chair was thrown out, and our faults more viciously thrown at us as each day came and went. We lied to ourselves, and we took that abuse. We took it as she constantly reminded us of our shortcomings, told us how lucky we were to have her, and what failures we were as men. You do not make enough, you do not wash the dishes enough, you do not fix enough things around this house. You are not a good parent, you do not know how to communicate, you do not understand me, you do not give me any time for myself.

We let her shove us, and hit us while we stood in confusion. We ducked as she threw scissors and broke picture frames, and cleaned up the glass so our child would not be injured in the morning. What is worse, is that we believed we deserved all of it.

There are men, who, even now sit in the deepest of despair, and their sorrow dwells deep in their eyes. I watch as you men torture yourselves, placing your soul in chambers of the most brutal sort, and the iron maiden swings high from the chains you are bound in. Your mind spins like a wounded plane. Turning inward on yourself, you place heavy loads of blame, doubt, shame and even self loathing on your heart, believing you have to carry that weight. Like a little boy lost with no compass in the deepest of forests, you search endlessly for the way out. You take it, you endure it, until the strain cracks your stony facade like a sledge hammer to a pane of old glass. Make no mistake, you will fall. You will be buried under the rubble of their feminist revolution.

You can lay there, brother. You can lay there in the darkness, as the weight crushes the last of your life from you, and the sweet dark embraces you into the eternal black. However, there is another road you can choose. For outside that stone prison are the voices of your fathers, and their fathers before them. They bid you to get up, to push the weight away from your chest, and stand again; to let the sweet orange light of the morning bathe your face, and refresh your soul with its warmth. To remember your face is that of your father, and his father before him. To remember that your child is out there, and that child has your face.

Will you leave that child to someday be buried as you are? Will you sentence that child to that fate? Or would you, for one moment, strip away the shame, and the pain, that is not yours to bear, and remember you are not alone. Your brothers wait for you, and in that dark moment, if you reach through the stone, we will extend our hand and help you stand in the midst of others who pushed their way out as well. As the tears fade, and the moment of darkness ends; as the light pours down onto the sweet green of the trees, we will find our strength again.

We will do this together, and we will bring hell down on those who perpetuate injustice against fathers, and in doing so, perpetuate against their children as well. We will not be silent, we will not back down, we will never stop. We will do what is needed to see those little smiles again, no matter the cost, no matter the pain. We will ensure that our sons are not left in the darkness as we were. We will breathe deep that morning air, and let the roars of our voices thunder across the morning sky. We will have our justice, and true equality. We. Will.

Selling the MRM

Paul Elam · 16 January 2012 · Archived copy · Original

The comments here often prove to have as much or more substance and relevance than the feature articles. They are also a vetting ground; a place where we hash out ideas and test their tensile strength under the pressure of heavy scrutiny.

As has happened before, the subject has once again surfaced regarding how we present this site and men's issues to the mainstream world, especially as it relates to the desire to expand by having more average people embrace the agenda we serve.

All we have to do is figure out a way to overcome 3,000,000 years of human evolution, an equally longstanding tradition of male disposability, the past 50 years of demonizing anyone as a woman hating pig who disagrees with the feminist narrative and a general population of people programmed by their corporate masters to be so ignorant and disconnected that they spend more time worrying about their Cheese Covered Wacky Fries™ than the litany of civil rights that are being stripped away by feminist governance right under their ignorant noses.

So I think from the outset that we may need to question whether a broad reaching effort to appeal to these guys is in our best interest. In fact, I am betting the farm on the idea that this is not the way. I note that I encounter regular dissent to this notion, not only from Cheese Covered outlets like reddit (aside from the MRA's there), but right here at home.

Reddit I could care less about, which was part of my point, but as we are still struggling with this at home, it rates an article from me.

Recently Keyster has questioned what he sees here, and expressed his concerns about how to introduce this site to the afore mentioned mainstream. He is an insightful MRA asking important questions and making points that need to be addressed. Doing so affords me the opportunity to more fully explain our "marketing plan" for those that are not aware of it, and to explain why I offer Keyster's perspective a respectful but less than exuberant reaction.

I am going to use a couple of clips from one of his comments, as well as offering him the opportunity to write and post a rebuttal to this piece. Yes, I do think it is that important.

First, we have this statement from Keyster:

> IMHO the litmus test of a solid narrative is to be able to direct my neighbor or a friend to it and they'll at least be able to grasp the basic assumptions. And then there's the potential benefactor.

My response to this is simple. The litmus test of a solid narrative, especially given the overwhelming nature of our opposition, is whether it is getting any traction. Results, period. And those results cannot be measured one acquaintance at a time or in our gut level comfort with exposing "decent folk" to this crowd of misfits.

AVfM is now very, very close to becoming one of the top 100,000 websites on the world wide web. There will be ebbs and flows, but we will find a nesting place there without question. Indeed, over the last 30 days AVfM has had more traffic than Feministing.

My money is on the idea that along with the generally increased interest in men's counter-theory, our strategy is the reason. In fact, I will be so bold as to say I know this to be the case.

We set out on a plan that breaks from old school marketing strategies (that have also become ineffective for mainstream organizations). Is anyone buying stock in print media, lately?

It was a given from the outset that this was going to be an internet based message. The only question was how that message would be delivered, and to whom.

Those questions were answered for me a long time ago in this video. If you have 15 minutes to spare, please watch it carefully.

I do not claim that it is the be all and end all of modern marketing, but every organization needs a guiding philosophy. And this concept – that of being remarkable and speaking to our own enthusiasts – is our plan. There is no other. We can neither be remarkable, nor speak credibly to our enthusiasts, with an eye on the mainstream and an ear listening to the admonishments and sensibilities of the people that represent the very problems we fight. They need to come to us, not the other way around. I know, it's counter-intuitive, at least until you look at our traffic trends.

We aim to speak directly to converts, and pretty much only converts, with the intent that our message would be spread through them, and that they would act as the benefactors to our operations.

So far, that is working, too. They have come through in spades and the support grows almost daily. I am sure you have noticed a sharp influx of talent here as well.

Keyster also has concerns about the comments. I have to admit that I have shared those concerns on more than one occasion. Consider what he says here:

> But when the first line of a comment reads, "As a group, women are weak and pathetic.". There's absolutely no way I'll do that. In other words if I say "I'm a men's rights activist and belong to an organization called "A Voice for Men", there is no way in hell I'm directing them to this web site if they wanted to know more. Sadly, this isn't the place for that.

I am tempted to be snarky here and ask Keyster if he refuses to refer people to a Times article because some of the comments there come from actual nut cases, but that would be avoiding the point.

He is saying. I think, that pitching this message is hard enough and we are sunk the moment a fence sitter comes in here and reads something like that. Now in that case, I did down vote the comment and express my disagreement with it, but that is not really the point, either.

Remember our plan does not involve selling the MRM to fence sitters. Watch the video. Absorb it. Our plan does not require us to be concerned with individuals that will go into the comments and say, "Gee, I better disregard everything on this website because some dude named The Chartreuse Fly said something silly or stupid in the comments."

Undoubtedly there are many good MRA's that are hesitant to refer people they know here for exactly the same reasons. I do understand. But it has not stopped us from growing in the least.

We have not failed to acquire benefactors either. AVfM is partly funded by many who make small contributions. All of them are greatly appreciated. But honestly, what keeps us afloat is a small group of men and women who ante up larger donations on a regular basis. I have no reason that to think that will not continue to improve as the site grows.

And I argue that what we are doing is working. The public dialog about all this, at least online, has changed dramatically since websites like AVfM and The Spearhead have come online.

That brings us to the second part of the flaw in your argument. You might as well get used to it Key, ANY message of men's rights will only be absorbed by a distinct minority of the population. There is not a way to present it to mainstream western culture that will make a large scale impact. That is where I think you have a major flaw in your understanding of the big picture.

With all respect, Keyster, this is the path of your prescription; an intellectual high road that offends no one and leads nowhere.

AVfM is working, and will continue to work well into the future because, IMO, I have studied the course of these things very well and mapped out a strategy built on Harry's excellent prognostications about the internet and activism.

We have, all of us, officially changed the public discourse online. Feminists across the world wide web are getting contentious, aggravated and afraid, because everywhere they go they see the spotlight of our ideas is shining on every one of their lies. Almost every time a misandrist piece of shit article comes out in a mainstream online rag, our people are there. Not at all just MRA's, but average men and women, now exposed to the counter-theory and the idea that speaking up is alright. They are finally doing so. There was a time very recently that I could identify most of the people commenting in dissent of feminism on any given mainstream site. Now they are crawling out of the woodwork, from all walks of life, calling bullshit with all the abandon of your average MGTOW.

The only thing the truth ever needed was a voice and an audience.

We are seeing more and more antifeminist slant emerge in the mainstream. You can even look at what is happening now over at GMP, where Hugo Schwyzer and Amanda Marcotte have jumped ship. The real intentions are still a matter for the jury, but Tom Matlack is without question challenging feminist hegemony in his own front yard.

Getting pounded with the truth 10,000 times over, in a not so friendly way, will do that to a man.

And eventually this will change the pulse of the entire public at large; enough, say, that even a politician could put his finger on it and feel a change in rhythm.

And that is what we do. We are a machine that cranks out the truth and regularly bitch slaps people with it. We do it just hard enough to make them wince before they open their mouths again. And when the ringing in their ears quits, the first thing they want to talk about is us. It is happening all the time now.

But the important part of that purpose is to validate the experiences of our readers, who are the ones that have lived this shit enough that they don't care about offending people in order to get the message out.

It is those men and women, the ones who don't need to be told that there is a problem, that we need to keep in mind when we publish; not the hapless masses who don't realize they are bleeding till the blood starts dripping on their Cheese Covered Wacky Fries™. For those that don't like the friction involved, I hope they can take solace in the success.

{addendum 1/11/14. I am updating this post in order to declare it conclusive. We have accomplished everything I predicted in the article and much more. AVFM is now by far the largest, most influential website of its kind on the internet. Our work has increasingly spilled into more "real world" environments, attracted national media attention and effectively changed the dialog across the board on sexual politics. Our work is not near done, but even feminist ideologues are no longer able to deny the issues explored on this site; issues that are becoming a part of the cultural consciousness. Our trend of growth and expansion is clear and convincing, and we have attracted an incredible array of supportive talent and expertise from a highly diverse group of writers, technology professionals and activists in this field. PE]

To rape or not to rape...

Howard Gordan · 16 January 2012 · Archived copy · Original

That is the question. Most men have never even had to think about how to answer this question. The answer seemed obvious. However, it now looks like the government will be putting men in the precarious position of figuring out how to answer that in 2012. It also looks as though if men make the correct decision, women will have actually just lost a right that many currently enjoy; a right that men will continue to enjoy. More on that later. First, some background on how men and women have come to this quandary.

For those old enough to remember, feminism, decades ago, contained what was thought of as a radical branch. These "wackos" were seen as extreme and small in number. They were hateful toward men and were frequently quoted in books and seen at protests with signs claiming all men were rapists and batterers. No one really paid any attention to this "little" group of women. Most of the attention went to those women that (allegedly) promoted equal rights. While no one was paying attention, the small, hateful group slowly began to promote their agenda and have affected a substantial amount of legislation. These "wackos" have successfully convinced their fellow women (and their white knights) that, yes indeed, essentially all men are batterers and rapists. Now they have hatched their true agenda's implementation.

The same feminists I just spoke about have now succeeded in expanding the definition of rape. This can be seen in two recent developments. The first is the rape definition the CDC used for its recent survey about violence. This definition of rape includes attempted forced penetration. No other crime statistic adds attempted crimes. In fact, I didn't have much success searching for attempted murder rates by state even though murder rates by state were an easy find. This CDC definition also includes sex when a woman is drunk or on drugs. By using these incidents in the definition of rape, the CDC says 1 in 5 women have been raped over their lifetimes.

Amazingly, the CDC does not include in their rape statistics men who were forced (with violence or threats of violence or by being held down) to penetrate a woman (vaginally or anally) or a man (anally) or forced to give oral sex to a woman or forced to receive oral sex from a woman or man. If these were counted as rape, men would have been raped at a rate of 1 in 16 as opposed to the reported 1 in 71. In fact, using those instances counted as rape, the rate of rape of men and women are exactly the same for the 12 months prior to the CDC study. (1)

[image]

The second development is what the FBI has included in their new rape definition. This definition now includes penetrating someone, no matter how slight, while that person was under the influence of alcohol or drugs. You can bet the feminists have their soldiers lined up at the doors of every state legislator to pressure them to adopt this new definition for their state. Judging by history, the states will bow to their wishes. If so, common rapists will include those men that engage in sex with women that were drunk, high or on drugs. How many ladies reading this sentence can say they have ever had "consensual" alcohol or drug facilitated sex? If so, you are a rape victim and your partner is a common rapist. So here we go- To Rape or Not to Rape?

Men, you must now make that feared decision. Let's look at a few examples and see what this new definition does:

a): A husband and wife celebrate the wife's 40th birthday. They go out and enjoy a nice dinner. They then arrive back home and share a bottle of wine to celebrate her big day. There is some sensual talk and they express their love for each other. She then goes into the bedroom and comes out dressed in erotic lingerie, takes his hand and leads him back to the bedroom. She tells him to make love to her.

b): A woman asks her new boyfriend to meet her at a local restaurant/bar to enjoy some light fare and perhaps a drink. He calls to tell her he is running late from work and will be there in 45 minutes. The girlfriend notices a couple of female coworkers at the bar. She joins them for a few drinks while she waits. Finally her boyfriend arrives and tells him that instead of dining there they should order takeout and dine at her place a few blocks away. When they arrive at her apartment, she says dinner can wait. She brings him into the bedroom and pushes him down on the bed and asks if he would enjoy some oral satisfaction. He agrees.

c): The same woman as example b) goes to a bar and meets her girlfriends after work for happy hour. She drinks the same amount as in example b). She seems fine when she leaves so her girlfriends say nothing when she says she is going to leave and drive home. She misses a stop sign and plows into a car going through the intersection, killing the passenger. Subsequently, the police discover she is slightly over the legal limit.

d): A husband and wife go out for New Year's Eve. Every year they go to the same tavern and celebrate. They tell each other prior to the party that they will enjoy the first sex of the year together after dinner and drinks and midnight toast. After consuming several drinks each, they go back home via cab and start their initiation of the New Year. Both are inebriated, but neither is passed out or staggering.

e). A man and woman just finished celebrating their wedding reception. They have both had their fair share of drinks. They take the limo to the hotel and consummate the marriage.

OK. Let's analyze some scenarios using the above examples:

a): If the husband decides to help his wife remember her 40th birthday with some passionate romance and sex, she can now lay claim to spending her 40th birthday being raped by her spouse.

b): Again, even though the girlfriend initiates the sex and is the aggressor, he will be raping her unless he pushes her off and says stop. At the moment of passion, he must now decide whether to probably lose his new girlfriend due to her being insulted and thinking he doesn't like her, or whether to be a common rapist according to the new legal definition (and perhaps future state law) even if he wasn't aware she drank before he arrived.

c): Here we have a woman that is in the same inebriated state as example b. She also chose to drink one or two too many and made her own decision to drive home anyway. In b, the woman is removed of all responsibility of her actions even though it was her choice to drink and her decision to not stop at one or two. If we apply the logic from the new rape definition in b to c, then this woman should not be arrested for vehicular manslaughter or any crime since this car crash was alcohol facilitated. A woman cannot be held responsible for any bad choices if the choices were alcohol facilitated. In fact, based on the FBI thinking, the sober driver should be arrested as he should have known the woman was incapable of making her own choices and decisions about driving after drinking.

d): Here we have both husband and wife inebriated at equal levels. The husband is expected to be responsible for his actions and be able to think clearly enough that if he has sex, he will be committing rape. His wife is not expected to be responsible at all for her actions in accepting sexual enjoyment. Even though they both agreed ahead of time that they would enjoy sex after some drinks, this is not good enough. Consent must be at the time of encounter, not given hours prior to relations.

e): Here, after the reception at which most likely drinking took place, consummation of the marriage will, according to the FBI and the CDC, be rape. Yes, there is nothing like raping your new bride on her wedding night. The FBI has turned what used to be a tender moment of passion and romance into a criminal act.

OK. I know some out there are saying that these rape examples I gave would almost never result in any kind of rape accusation by the woman. The key word is almost. We all too well know there are women out there that will, for various reasons, falsely accuse a man of rape. If, however, this becomes state law, it wouldn't be considered falsely accusing since it would be actual rape. Should the FBI definition become state law, there is no longer a defense justified by her consent. Once under the influence, the man is a rapist, period. Should the revised VAWA be passed, any college male would automatically be a rapist since the proposed revised VAWA now defines rape using the FBI definition (cleverly the feminists saw to that knowing they would get their way and change the FBI definition). This would mean, essentially, guilt by accusation and immediate expulsion. No chance to ever get your degree.

A man must think of the future. Even in example e, it is quite possible the new bride would accuse her groom eventually. Perhaps the relationship sours in 5 years. Over half of marriages end up in divorce, with the wife filing most of the time. If she wants to get even for some perceived wrong-doing, all she needs to do is call authorities and state that she was raped on her wedding night. 200 witnesses, photos, and a videotape will all corroborate her drinking that day. The man now may be imprisoned for 25 years just because he wanted to consummate his marriage. Similarly, a, b and d could result in a rape accusation if the wife/girlfriend chose to get rid of her husband/boyfriend at any time. Of course if they are married, she'll take the house, kids and assets as well.

I am bringing up these examples as a warning to men; most especially to college men. "To rape or not to rape?" Ask yourself if 15 minutes of pleasure is worth expulsion from school or 25 years in jail. Personally, I would not take the risk, no matter how slight it may seem. No woman is worth decades in jail. No orgasm is worth my life being destroyed. Self-love is much less risky, and I could get a good night's sleep without being awakened by the thought I have just given license to a woman to destroy me. I would think avoidance of any ladies nights would now be the accepted norm.

That atmosphere invites trouble. It is rife for manipulation and entrapment. An upscale bar may give free or low priced drinks to ladies and advertise for men to come and enjoy the company of the self-inebriated. At any of these ladies nights, there could lurk an opportunist willing to be picked up in order to blackmail a well-intentioned male with a rape charge if he doesn't make her financially happy. Or perhaps an ego trip, actually accusing someone to destroy a successful man's life. Now there would be no hassles of a trial with he said/she said issues. A woman would just need an affidavit from her regular bartender telling of him serving her several drinks on the night in question.

I would avoid bars if I knew myself to not be able to resist conversing with the opposite sex hoping to get "lucky." I'd have to think twice about meeting a woman that enjoyed alcohol at a favorite bar. Men, the same goes for college parties. If you attend in hopes of meeting a woman, you'd better think twice. Don't even be alone with a woman that has indulged. The conference call on 1/9 given by the President's administration made it clear that college men are now the main targets of this new definition regarding drug/alcohol facilitated sex.

Ideologues have asked, and now received for all women a total release of responsibility for their actions and are automatically provided the rape victim status if they decide to engage in sex while using drugs or alcohol. In each case, by indulging in drink, the female is always a victim and the male always the rapist. Hey, just like the feminists proclaimed all these many years.

A victory for feminism. Or is it?

If all men heed my warning (which I know is unlikely), then any time we went out with our wives or girlfriends, we would have to state up front that if they would enjoy some romance and sex later on, they can no longer enjoy having anything to drink over dinner or at the bar other than soft drinks. We as men would be able to enjoy our wine or beer or hard drink while we watched our partners complain and scold us about how lucky we were that we could enjoy alcohol or drug facilitated sex while they could no longer do so.

Most likely the feminists will use this as another example of Patriarchy, despite themselves being the creators. As men, we would need to tell the woman we are with, that this is what women want. By law, we can't have sex with women if they insist on drinking with us at dinner. If we take this seriously, which we damn well should, feminists just took away a right most women do enjoy and have given us sole ownership of this right. We'd have a right that women don't. Yes, I am looking at this new rape definition optimistically because I have to. And, being the optimist, I see this with my wine glass half full.

Source:

(1) http://www.cdc.gov/ViolencePrevention/pdf/NISVS_Report2010-a.pdf Pages 17-19.

Cultivating violence against the MRM

John Hembling (JtO) · 17 January 2012 · Archived copy · Original

There is a phrase gaining in popularity among those who oppose human rights of male citizens. This phrase is used to characterize a small collection of individuals calling themselves activists, and whose activism consists almost entirely of writing and making videos, and activists whose message rejects the use of violence.

The phrase being used to attack men's rights activists is "men's rights extremists." This terminology has the usual intent of vilifying and marginalizing writers in the MRM. However, the migration from standard anti-male insults to the claim of extremism also serves is to make potential violence against them seem acceptable. Similarly, referring to a collection of bloggers and videographers whose message includes a rejection of violence – and then calling these activists violent, is also a rhetorical tactic which appears designed to encourage and to normalize violence done against them.

Obviously, opponents of the men's rights movement have never been shy of heaping scorn, abuse, and unfounded accusation on the movement as a whole; as well as directing campaigns of false accusation against individuals. But the now common characterization of MRAs as violent extremists surpasses hypocrisy, and seems obvious as an attempt to foster violence. It is a disgrace, and reflects the complete moral bankruptcy of those who employ this tactic.

Some individuals, skilled in rhetorical manipulation, have taken this deceptive and indirect promotion of violence to a new level. An example of this was shown when a hate organization produced a video depicting male-targeted murder, eroticized licking of the victim's bullet wounds, and showed the closing message "Do your part." This unambiguous promotion of male targeted murder was discussed within the men's rights community, and AVfM identified the individuals who produced this call for murder. We felt it was a matter of ethical responsibility to identify members of a hate organization who promote killing.

A morally bankrupt and stunningly unethical blogger wrote about this, but managed to portray the producers of a video advocating murder as victims, and portrayed those who outed them as violent. The mind boggles. I was one of the writers calling for the identification of the makers of the video and then publishing the identities of these murder advocates – and now, thanks to the rhetorical contortions of a depraved and futile feminist; I find myself a potential target of violence.

Following the political protest by self immolation of Thomas James Ball, A Voice for Men published Mr. Ball's final words to the world. This was 15 page account of his abuse by the New Hampshire family court, his decade long struggle, and his clearly articulated intention to draw attention to systematic corruption in the courts through the ultimate sacrifice of his own life in a self-ignited gasoline fire.

Mr. Ball also detailed his desire to burn down the courthouse buildings, though he thankfully did not act on it. In the republication of his writing on AVfM, Ball's paragraphs providing instructions for incendiary devices were omitted because both Paul Elam and I (along with everybody else contributing at AVFM) strictly oppose the use of violence.

Somehow, our omission of instructions on building a fire bomb was translated by an opponent of male human rights into our purported support of such catastrophic violence. This distorted characterization surpasses my ability to explain in its depravity and deceit. The characterization of bloggers who openly oppose violence as though that opposition is support of violence is purposeful. It is plainly intended to facilitate the use of force against us.

I will not be modifying my position, nor toning down my rhetoric, nor apologizing on behalf of the purposeful distortions of bad actors. In fact, individuals fielding rhetoric intended to foster a social climate conducive to violence will enjoy increasing exposure in my writing.

The indirect, by proxy, or once-removed approach to using violence shown by cultivating a public image of human rights activists as “terrorists” demonstrates a mode of indirect application of force. Through the shaping of perception, more direct actors are motivated to use force, believing themselves justified in the application of violence.

Men’s and women’s motivations and means of acting in the world are different. Men are traditionally imagined as the violent actors of the human race. This, however, is an incomplete understanding which ignores the reality that due to women’s average lesser physical strength and stature, women often act indirectly, by motivating others or using proxies to apply force or violence. The simplistic view of men as the source of all physical aggression ignores how much male behavior is on behalf of, or is manipulated by women.

This is not an attempt to re-attribute all male misbehavior to women, but to point out the widely ignored but obvious fact that women’s misbehavior and violence is largely indirect; pursued through others.

Outside of legal considerations, violence on behalf of women or children is the basis for the cultural construct of heroism. Within MRM writing, men willing to absorb or provide violence based on chivalry are called white knights, and this term is not a compliment. A police officer who batons, pepper sprays, tasers or arrests a man accused of attacking his wife on no evidence except her accusation is a white knight. The police may later untangle a false accusation and release the accused man, but he has still been bludgeoned, pepper-sprayed, tased or caged by proxy on behalf of the accusing female.

Some opponents of men’s rights writing have begun to use the word “terrorist” to characterize bloggers in the MRM. Apparently, the by-proxy application of police tasers, batons or pepper-spray is unsatisfactory, and military force is the desired tool to silence bloggers arguing for human rights.

Shortly after her announcement as a regular contributor at AVfM, the blogger and videographer, our fellow MRA GirlWritesWhat received an email warning her of the dangerous character of other writers on this site.

Apparently, Paul Elam, founder and publisher of AVfM is a terrorist based on his preference for inflicting pain on the agents of hate. His exact quote from the December 2011 seasonal fundraiser was:

[box]
“Over the past two years, with your help, AVfM has set the standard for online activism. We are forging new ground and gaining momentum. And we are adding significant traction to an idea that some green MRA’s and of course, feminists, would love to disabuse you of.

Progress for men will not be gained by debate, reason or typical channels of grievance available to segments of the population that the world actually gives a damn about. The progress we need will only be realized by inflicting enough pain on the agents of hate, in public view, that it literally shocks society out of its current coma.

We have seen some evidence that it is working; a twitching toe here, a moving finger there. Just enough to let us know we need to turn up the voltage and hit it some more. Once we get the patients eyes and ears working, then we can talk and reason with people.”

[/box]

Of those three paragraphs, the second, taken out of its context of the blogging and online blogtalk radio show which comprises AVfM’s activism might sound very scary indeed. Of course, the concerned citizen omitted that context to deceptively portray Paul as a violent maniac, indeed, calling him a terrorist.

In the email sent to GirlWritesWhat, the concerned citizen issued this whopper of a lie:

> “To recap, Elam is raising money while drumming up support for a public act of violence to make the MRM message heard. Public acts of violence with political motivations are called acts of terrorism.”

In reality, Paul Elam, along with myself and every other contributor on AVfM oppose violence. This is regularly evident in the unapologetic booting and banning of any commenter or contributor who suggests or endorses violence. This is flatly false claim by yet another morally bankrupt individual attempting to portray bloggers as violent criminals, indeed, as terrorists.

I too, was flattered to be explicitly named as a potential murderer by the same lying degenerate. You may be asking yourself, “Why are these claims of violent criminality applied to bloggers who regularly take pains to disavow and discourage any use of violence?”

The answer is obvious. If such a narrative is fabricated and popularized, then those with guns, funding and the legally approved state sanction to use them will eventually silence us. Naming human rights activists as terrorists is a device; the fabrication of a public narrative to drive a cultural consent for violence.

And I still refuse to use violence in return. The fact that rather than factual argument, opinions backed by peer reviewed stats or even attempts at logical debate, our opposition now cultivates violence, is a measure of the total fraud, failure and bankruptcy of those opposing the human rights of men.

NCFM asks the U.N. to end discrimination against men

NCFM · 18 January 2012 · Archived copy · Original

Through the generous volunteer work of our Democratic Republic of Georgia Liaison Carl Augustsson, and after review and unanimous approval of our national board of directors, over 170 letters were sent under NCFM letterhead to all United Nations Delegations requesting sponsors for the "Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination Against Men" (below), which Carl also authored.

Thus far no country has agreed to sponsor out convention, though the Swedes were kind enough to tell us they declined; which, was certainly expected considering Sweden is thought to be the most feminized country on the planet.

The NCFM convention is modeled after United Nations Convention for the Elimination of all forms of Discrimination against Women. The United States is the only civilized country holding out on signing the convention for women. For those of you who follow the current administration's catering to the power feminist elite, the failure of the United States to sign the convention for women is remarkable.

Mr. Augustsson is fluent in several languages and he wrote the cover letters in the the appropriate language as able. Click here for a sample cover letter . The convention NCFM submitted follows:

Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Men

Reaffirming the goals set out in the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination Against Women;

Re-noting that the Charter of the United Nations reaffirms faith in fundamental human rights, in the dignity and worth of the human person and in the equal rights of men and women;

Re-noting that the Universal Declaration of Human Rights affirms the principle of the inadmissibility of discrimination and proclaims that all human beings are born free and equal in dignity and rights and that everyone is entitled to all the rights and freedoms set forth therein, without distinction of any kind, including distinction based on sex;

Noting that both men and women have faced sex discrimination throughout history, only in different ways;

Further noting that like women, men have also been the victims of harmful stereotypes;

Realizing that there will never be equality between men and women unless equality for men is also established;

Emphasizing that discrimination against men persists;

Further emphasizing that discrimination against men is just as wrong as discrimination against women;

Understanding that societies need both men and women and that men and women need each other;

Further understanding that most men are honest, decent citizens and are not criminals, rapists, pedophiles, or violent in general;

Underscoring that consenting sexuality between adults is a normal and healthy part of human existence that is to be celebrated and that attacking it is counter-productive to bringing about equality between men and women;

Determined to bring about equality for men as well as women and, in doing so, create a better world for everyone;

Have agreed on the following:

Part I

Article 1

1. States Parties which recognize the 8th of March as International Women's Day are requested to recognize the 19th of November as International Men's Day.
2. States Parties which recognize an official Mothers' Day are requested to either recognize a Fathers' Day or to convert Mothers' Day into Parents' Day.
3. The existence of a Veterans' Day, though laudable, shall not be considered as an equivalent to a Men's Day.

Article 2

States Parties shall take all appropriate measures to eliminate discrimination against men with regards to military service obligations and ensuring that all military service obligations apply equally to women as well as men, in particular:

(a) Either repealing or rewriting to equally include women all military service laws which apply exclusively to men or even mainly to men, including laws whose implementation have been officially suspended;

(b) Either repealing or rewriting to equally including women all constitutional references to conscription which apply exclusively to men or even mostly to men, including such references which are not currently being enforced by law;

(c) Either repealing or expanding to equally include women any registration obligations regarding a potential future draft should such registration requirements apply exclusively or even mainly to men;

(d) Officially pardoning all men who failed to perform military service obligations, including registration failures, if such obligations applied at the time exclusively or even mainly to men;

(e) Passing legislation making it illegal to discriminate against men who failed to perform military service obligations (including registration obligations) which applied exclusively or even mainly to men in all areas, including but not limited to employment (both public and private sector), holding elected office, receiving grants and other scholarships, and receiving any other form of public assistance and/or benefits.

Article 3

1. States Parties shall take all appropriate measures to ensure that the lives of men are considered equally as valuable as the lives of women.
2. States Parties shall take all appropriate measures to ensure that men have just as much right to be evacuated from war zones as women have (an exception can be made in cases of pregnant women and nursing mothers).
3. While reserving priority space on lifeboats for children over adults would still be permissible, men must be given equal priority as women with regards to being evacuated from ships (an exception can be made in cases of pregnant women and nursing mothers).
4. Men shall be evacuated from all other dangerous situations with equal priority as women (an exception can be made in cases of pregnant women and nursing mothers).

Article 4

1. States Parties shall take all appropriate measures to ensure that men's health is given equal priority to women's health, including in such areas as state funding for medical research. An exception can be made in instances in which a State Party wishes to spend more research money on behalf of the sex with a lower life expectancy.

2. States Parties shall take all appropriate measures to ensure that all social welfare services treat men equally with women and are just as available to men as they are to women.

Article 5

States Parties shall take all appropriate measures to ensure that blood feuds, especially those which apply to all male members of the family or any other group rather than merely towards the alleged culprit of the perceived injustice, be fully eradicated by fully prosecuting all of those responsible for perpetrating blood feuds.

Article 6

1. States Parties shall take all appropriate measures to ensure that the genital integrity of minor boys is respected equally to that of minor girls and that no form of genital cutting should occur on anyone, male or female, under the age of 18, or on any adult without the complete and total consent of that adult absent pressure from others.
2. States Parties shall take all appropriate measures to ensure that any painful rite of passage ceremonies, especially those involving the cutting of the body, be eliminated.

Part II

Article 7

States Parties shall take all appropriate measures to ensure that men and women are charged the same rates of taxation, as there is no justification whatsoever for charging one sex more taxes than the other.

Article 8

States Parties shall take all appropriate measures to ensure that all age requirements, in both the public and private spheres, apply equally to men as well as women, including but not limited to retirement ages, minimum ages for withdrawing from pension funds, minimum ages for collecting state benefits for the elderly, minimum ages for marriage, and minimum ages for entrance into business establishments.

Article 9

1. States Parties shall take all appropriate measures to ensure that immigration policies apply equally to women as well as to men.
2. States Parties shall take all appropriate measures to ensure that all visa policies apply equally to women as well as to men in all respects, including visa application forms.
3. States Parties shall take all appropriate measures to ensure that fathers have the same rights of conferring citizenship on their children as mothers have.

Part III

Article 10

1. States Parties shall take all appropriate measures to ensure that society never loses sight of due process and that the rights of the accused, no matter how horrendous the accusations, are respected in all manners, including for such crimes as rape, pedophilia, and domestic violence.
2. States Parties shall take all appropriate measures to ensure that perpetrators of false accusations of all crimes, including rape, pedophilia, and domestic violence, are prosecuted to the fullest extent of the law.

Article 11

States Parties shall take all appropriate measures to ensure that male victims of domestic violence are acknowledged by the state in that:

(a) All the same resources available to female victims of domestic violence be equally available to male victims;

(b) The perpetrators of domestic violence against men, be they male or female, be prosecuted just as vigorously as the perpetrators of domestic violence against women are prosecuted.

Article 12

1. States Parties shall take all appropriate measures to ensure that the law is enforced equally towards both female perpetrators as well as towards male perpetrators and that male perpetrators are not treated any more harshly than female perpetrators.
2. States Parties shall take all appropriate measures to ensure that incarcerated men receive the same privileges granted to incarcerated women, included visitation rights with regards to the prisoners' children.

Article 13

States Parties shall take all appropriate measures to ensure that policies, in both the public and private spheres (including but not limited to seating polices on airplanes), are neither written nor enforced in a manner that views all men as potential batters, pedophiles, or rapists.

Article 14

States Parties shall take all appropriate measures to ensure that pedophilia laws designed to protect minors are not used to prosecute them, in particular:

(a) For taking and sending lewd pictures of themselves;

(b) For engaging in sexual acts with each other provided that both minors are close enough in age to each other.

Article 15

States Parties shall take all appropriate measures to ensure that sex offender registries only include the names of perpetrators, both male and female, who are genuine threats to the community for such crimes as rape and pedophilia, and exclude the names of those convicted of crimes that are not a genuine threat to the safety of the community.

Article 16

States Parties shall take all appropriate measures to eliminate discrimination against men regarding safety policies, including in particular but not limited to:

(a) Taxis shall not offer any discounts to women;

(b) Subways and trains shall not have women only sections;

(c) Institutions shall not be permitted to offer transportation to women only;

(d) Women shall not have the right to carry any weapons or any other forms of protection if men are not also permitted to carry such weapons.

(e) Parking spaces shall not be reserved for women only (an exception can be made in cases of pregnant women).

Part IV

Article 17

States Parties shall take all appropriate measures to eliminate all stereotypes and one-sided expectations regarding courtship and dating.

Article 18

1. States Parties shall take all appropriate measures to ensure that sexual harassment policies do not create an even more hostile environment, and that openness with sexuality is goal that society should have and that that should not be seen as an example of sexual harassment.
2. The label of sexual harassment is to be reserved exclusively for truly egregious behavior in which the perpetrator intended to create an uncomfortable atmosphere and was fully aware that his or her actions were doing so.
3. States Parties shall take all appropriate measures to eliminate discrimination against men, both in the public and private sphere, regarding mandatory sexual harassment training seminars which are only required of men, as such a requirement constitutes discrimination against men.
4. Establishments, both public and private, which wish to eliminate their sexual harassment polices altogether shall not be discouraged from doing so.

Article 19

States Parties shall take all appropriate measures to ensure that sex workers are treated with the full dignity and respect which they deserve, including

(a) A complete legalization and regulation of the sex trade amongst adults;

(b) Recognizing that consenting adults are entitled to engage in acts of sexuality with each other, even if consent was only granted for the want of money;

(c) Ensuring that the sex trade does not lead to human trafficking.

Article 20

1. States Parties shall take all appropriate measures to ensure the sanctity of marriage and that no policies be adopted to either discourage marriage or encourage divorce.
2. The existence of alimony payments is to be discouraged and kept to an absolute minimum.

Article 21

States Parties shall take all appropriate measures to recognize the important role that fathers play in the upbringing of children, and that no policies are adopted which discourage fatherhood.

Article 22

States Parties shall take all appropriate measures to eliminate discrimination against divorced men and non-custodial fathers, in particular:

(a) Claims made by fathers to child custody must be fully respected;

(b) Visitations granted to non-custodial fathers must be fully respected and mothers who disregard them must be held accountable and should perhaps have their custody revoked;

(c) Child support payments are to be for the exclusive benefit of the children in question and not the custodial parent

(d) Child support payments must never be set at unreasonable levels and adjustments must be made for fathers who lose their jobs or who have taken a pay cut;

(e) Single fathers, including minors, should not be required to complete any parenting courses prior to gaining custody if the mother has no such requirement.

(f) A man who have been found not to be the father of a child shall be allowed to terminate all custodial obligations, including financial ones, if he so chooses.

Part V

Article 23

States Parties shall take all appropriate measures to eliminate discrimination against men with regards to education, in particular, the awarding of scholarships or other grants for study.

Article 24

1. States Parties shall take all appropriate measures to ensure that any affirmative action programs, both in the public and private spheres and in both education and employment, be ended as soon as they are no longer needed.
2. States Parties which have minimum quotas for women in any given field, both public and private, must have the same minimum quotas in place for men.
3. States Parties which do not wish to bring about equality through affirmative action shall not be required to do so.

Article 25

States Parties shall take all appropriate measures to ensure that men are freely permitted to hold jobs that have traditionally been viewed as female, and that such men are fully accepted by society.

Article 26

1. States Parties shall take all appropriate measures to eliminate any harmful stereotypes against men who are stay-at-home-fathers and househusbands.
2. States Parties shall recognize that within the family, it is the children who are of paramount importance and that it is better for children to have one parent, either the father or mother, at home rather than being in a daycare center.
3. State Parties shall encourage employers to offer fathers more flexibility with regards to working hours and leave of absences from work
4. State Parties shall encourage employers to be equally accepting of fathers who leave the workforce for a number of years as they are of such mothers.

Article 27

States Parties shall take all appropriate measures to eliminate discrimination against men by prohibiting business establishments from refusing to serve men, such establishments include but are not limited to hotels, restaurants, gymnasiums, and taxis.

Article 28

States Parties shall take all appropriate measures to eliminate discrimination against men with regards to the prices charged by business establishments in that men must always, including even in cases of special promotions, be charged the same prices as women in all sectors of the economy, including but not limited to, insurance, food and drink, admission fees, and airplane tickets.

The battle for feminism's soul

Luigi Logan (aka Fidelbogen) · 18 January 2012 · Archived copy · Original

The title of today's talk is, the Battle for Feminism's Soul.

So . . . What is feminism? What ISN'T feminism? These are vital questions, and controversy has swirled around them for years. This controversy is no storm in a teacup, for I can assure you that much rides upon the outcome.

When a non-feminist encounters a feminist, the mood is sooner or later bound to get testy. To state that another way, each party carries a psychic atmosphere of her own, and these atmospheres are bound to clash. The encompassing social ambience will not accomodate both of them; one or the other must yield. As they say in the old western movies, "this town ain't big enough for both of us."

The unspoken tension between feminist and non-feminist will eventually come to a head and show itself openly. This regularly happens in a small way, in the social microcosm. It has not yet happened in a grand, conclusive way, in the societal macrocosm, although it is our job to accelerate the arrival of that day. But on whatever scale it occurs, the confrontation rides upon a mutual assessment between these two parties or, if you will, between these two principles.

Hence the typical pattern of interchange between a feminist and a non-feminist. The non-feminist will make known her feelings about feminism and the feminist will, mildly or otherwise, "get defensive". So what is happening in these discussions? Clearly, the talkers are talking past each other because they are talking about two different things. The feminist's "feminism" is NOT the same thing as the non-feminist's "feminism". Each conversant has a different mental picture of what the word feminism signifies in real world terms.

The non-feminist looks upon feminism as the less desirable option; that is what makes him not a feminist. Meanwhile, the feminist looks upon feminism as something sacred, and for that reason looks upon the non-feminist standpoint as akin to sacrilege. Please bear these points in mind.

Again I put it to you: what is feminism, and what ISN'T feminism? We need to address that pesky little question with exactitude in order to reach any over-arching conclusion about feminism's desirability or lack of it. Therefore feminism, the object under examination, must be pinned down, immobilized, and forced to become a definite something; only in that way does it become examinable and susceptible to evaluation. So answers need to arrive, and they need to arrive from authoritative sources. Consequently, the question of authority itself comes to the fore, as does the question of questioning authority.

Briefly then, who has authority to tell the world what feminism is or is not? Does the feminist have such authority? Does the non-feminist have such authority? Or do they each in their own way have such authority?

In the present talk, my contention is that any person at all may at least presume to speak with authority on the question of what is or isn't feminism. Anybody may set up shop in this trade, and there are no licensing requirements. Self-declared participation in feminism itself is no prerequisite for this. If that word (feminism) points to any discoverable object at all, we must allow that the pathways of discovery are manifold and not subject to any monopoly. Anybody may compete in this market, although success will vary according to the governing criteria. So, it is the governing criteria which are now under consideration.

"But wait!", I hear some feminist interject. "Only a feminist has any true authority to say what feminism is or is not, because only a feminist has participated in feminism and truly LIVED feminism. No outsider has any authority to tell ME what feminism is or is not!"

I would reply, that your communal experience among self-styled feminists grants you no authority but to speak of what you and others underwent in your time together, and what you felt and concluded from this. Your particular viewpoint and your especial path of knowledge are in no sense privileged. Neither is it taken on faith that you would evaluate your position honestly. Hence, your authority is merely clubbish, a compound of social memories mingled with selective awareness and possibly wishful thinking. And while these club memories might constitute authority of a parochial sort, there are other forms of authority, from other sources, which must not be neglected. Do not forget that others can view your club from an outward aspect—does that count for nothing?

“But wait!”, I hear that feminist interject again. “I have studied feminism for years, and I have read all the books, and I have earned a degree in women’s studies. Don’t tell me your authority equals mine, mister!”

I would reply, that if in addition to hanging out with supposed feminists, you boast of a scholastic or intellectual authority, you must remember that you aren’t the only one who can read books and think about things. Others, very different from you, are avid readers and thinkers also—and they do not have the same emotional filters that you have. So they are free to follow their own unblinkered genius, to quaff from fountains of knowledge that would not occur to you, to generalize, to factor-analyze, to string the dots together and formulate conclusions that might differ markedly from your own.

“But wait!”, our feminist chimes in for a third time. “I am a WOMAN! How dare you tell me what feminism is or is not!”

I would reply: “Quite right, you are a woman. And I am a Sagittarius.”

And I repeat: ANYBODY may presume to say what feminism is, or what feminism is not. It adds no weight to your claim to merely call yourself a feminist. It gives you no head start in the game. After all, anybody can say “I am a feminist”. Talk is cheap, and whether you call yourself a feminist, or call yourself a two-headed Patagonian, has no bearing on your claim to expertise.

And again I say, that a lot rides upon the outcome of this controversy. We must eventually decide in very exact terms what feminism is or is not, and the question is so important that I have given it a special name which hints at the magnitude of it. I call this question the battle for feminism’s soul, and I wish to make known why I do so. And as I have already suggested, we seek not only to discover what feminism IS . .. but to determine whether it is right or wrong, desirable or undesirable, noble or ignoble.

Up until now, the feminists have claimed a monopoly of discourse in this realm, thought-policing the avenues of conversation leading into it or out of it and transforming the world of respectable mainstream opinion into an echo chamber where only feminist questions are permitted to be raised, and only feminist answers permitted to be formulated. Not surprisingly, the feminists have concluded that feminism is desirable and honorable. However, they have consistently shrouded in fog the plain and simple definition of feminism, making available so many so-called “answers”, and such inadequate ones, that there is effectively no answer at all. And that, I submit, is the weak point where we as counter-feminist seekers of truth must conduct our drilling operations.

Which indeed we have done. And after years of work, we have concluded this: that the “nice” parts of feminism are not feminism’s soul, because they do not quintessentially belong to feminism. Rather, they belong to the world at large, and to the realm of liberal humanist bromide. They belong to the generally received body of traditional opinions about fair play, common decency and the like, and if they were broken loose from feminism they could just as well sail under their own flag. Certainly, they do not require a new-fangled monikker like “feminism”. And yet, they serve feminism as a masking device because they obscure the vital presence of that OTHER feminism, the not-nice kind whose sole purpose is to boost the female-supremacist agenda.

Yes, we have concluded that female supremacism is feminism’s soul. For it is indeed, by any measure, more significant, interesting, original and consequential than liberal platitudes—and politically more profound in its implications, by an order of magnitude

Already, I can hear a howl of protest. “No! That’s NOT what feminism really is!”

And I would reply: “Bad luck! You’ve had YEARS to tell the world what feminism really is. Now it is the world’s turn to tell feminism what feminism really is!”

The battle for feminism’s soul, is the battle to define feminism’s core minima in both a moral and practical sense and, by so doing, gain effective control over feminism's narrative in pragmatic, real-world terms. It is the world's turn to tell feminism what feminism is, and this will come about by shifting the center of narrative authority away from feminism itself. If you are a self-declared feminist, your supposed "inside" knowledge of feminism is worth no more than the "outside" knowledge which others are able to bring forward—THEIR knowledge can be as quintessentially revelatory or determinative as any other.

Accordingly, the nasty bits which outsiders may remark about feminism are not regrettable, accidental, outlying features. They are as much a part of "real" feminism as anything your friendly neighborhood Earnest Feminist would urge you to believe. If these things are feminism's "excrescence", it is because they have been excreted, or forced out from the center, which makes the center their point of origin. Accordingly, our task as counter-feminist propagators of knowledge is to factor feminism's excrescence into its essence. Or as certain wits and wags will be quick to say: to feed feminism its own shit!

Yes. The world has long been an object of the feminist gaze, so it is time to flip the script, and make feminism an object for the world. They have been gazing into the abyss long enough; now the abyss is gazing into them.

Such is the battle for feminism's soul.

21st century fatherhood

Rocking Mr. E · 18 January 2012 · Archived copy · Original

In some ways I am the quintessential modern man. Every day I wake up at six thirty with my wife, while she gets our one-and-a-half year-old daughter out of her cot. We then spend a bit of time together as a family prior to my wife getting ready for work. Before my wife leaves I have my breakfast, check my online activity, and then around the same time as my wife departs I'll change my daughter, which does include dealing with full and smelly nappies. I'll then take a shower while my daughter sits in her highchair watching Mickey Mouse. Then I prepare my daughter's breakfast, usually organic porridge, followed by a banana or some other fruit.

On most days I'll give my daughter some supervised playtime at around ten, playing together with bricks or puzzles, or maybe having a picnic with her toy set. Most of all I just make sure that she can walk around freely without causing chaos, like pulling things out of drawers and moving furniture around the room. I may also do chores like vacuuming or polishing, and all this before twelve!

Now before I start sounding like a housewife, making clams that this is really hard, or that no one has sympathy for my plight, I'll add that it is a pleasure to be involved in raising my daughter so actively. Men, historically, weren't involved in directly raising children, instead having to bring home the bacon while women took up this role. Was this a raw deal for men? Absolutely. Men missed out on a lot, and often it was only when boys grew older that fathers had the responsibility of teaching them the ways of the world through the eyes of a man, only to perpetuate the cycle of male responsibility for the next generation.

However, unlike feminists, I am pragmatic about the roles of men and women in history. I believe that women being the nurturers and men being the providers was an evolutionary necessity, as people like me constantly keep repeating to feminist ideologues. Feminist theory paints a different picture however, one that involves the patriarchy putting women down and preventing them from reaching their full potential. The irony here is that men being given more "rights" also came with responsibility, something that MRAs also keep repeating, often in vain. It also resulted in men missing out as parents.

That which men gained through power they lost in the personal connection with those around them, like their own children. Do we have feminism to thank for a transformation that allows men to stay home, as certain people have told me? Well, I would vehemently disagree with anyone that feels this way. For starters, we have the economic factors that now force Mothers and Fathers to go out to work, resulting in more children spending time in daycare from a very young age, even in the first few months after birth. In spite of the obsession of certain groups claiming that daycare is positive for young children, there is plenty of evidence to show that the bond with parent and child in the first few years of life is integral to their self-esteem, and therefore their development.

This aside, the increased size of the workforce has had serious implications on the bargaining rights of employees. The reason for this is simple, and doesn't require a complex economic theory to explain. If you are advertising for a job when you know there are plenty of people who want to do it then you are the one in control. This gives you an advantage when it comes to setting out the parameters of the job description, wages being one example. Thus, wages have not kept up with the cost of living, and while we can't ignore numerous other factors contributing to the skyrocketing inflation all around us, we do have a scenario now where mother and father both go out to work to retain a standard of life similar to the previous generation.

Feminism's biggest failure in this regard comes from instilling a modern form of selfishness in women, a sort of hyper-gynocentrism if you will. Everything around us is geared towards teaching women that they should be free to make decisions independently, to put their own needs above those of the family. Instead of modern women working with men to preserve the family, providing stable a home life for children, the opposite has occurred. Women taught that if they don't work they are economically enslaved, or even abused, especially when we consider that it is now easy for a woman to claim domestic violence via "financial abuse."

What is the alternative to this erosion of the family unit which has resulted in two parents going out to work? For one, any couple that genuinely wants to succeed will have to learn to compromise – both man and woman. There are numerous ways this can be done. Some examples being both parents working part-time, or the parent earning the highest wage going out to work. But most of all, it seems that the modern consumer culture we now live in has eroded the ability to make informed decisions about what is best for a fully functional family. Perhaps part of the problem is that this culture teaches us that we should aspire for the better car and the bigger house, when in reality we should be aspiring for close personal bonds with the ones we care about.

It is in this area that I feel men need to adapt for 21st century fatherhood. It's built into men that they should bring home the bacon, but this often means that men miss out on so many experiences in life by being forced into financial servitude. This is our time to stand up and expect more from a relationship, and what better way to test the sincerity of a woman than by expecting her to pull her weight financially, or to expect men to have similar life choices to women?

What's more, isn't it time that the human race started to realize that there is more to life than simply earning money? I personally cannot express how much flexibility I have acquired by being a part-time self-employed father – what many people now call a "dadpreneur". Do I feel enslaved or emasculated by my wife's higher earnings? No, because my wife isn't a power mad modern woman who thinks that her social status comes first, and when she comes home from work she shuts the door and focuses on being a mother and a wife.

Then again I do feel that my relationship is unique, not least because my wife and I are ideologically very similar, and this includes our views on feminism. I know that for many MRAs these ideas will be controversial, and in this regard I would like to elaborate. I am fully aware that there are only two ways that my relationship could work out.

First, I really have found a diamond in the rough culture of female entitlement. Second, my relationship could blow up in my face. There are some good women out there, despite the feminist meme, and how men can safely date in this present climate is a serious problem. However, there are good women coming forward to support the MRA, more than ever it seems.

But for those who feel that dating isn't worth the risk, I respect and understand why men want to go their own way. Equally, there are reasons why I feel the family is worth fighting for. Children are being seriously scarred by this system of feminist governance, and this alone must be fixed if there is any hope of a better tomorrow. The biggest reason though, that many seem to miss, is this; I have serious doubts that the state will bat an eyelid if the family dies. Why? Because we're a hair's breadth away from humans being born in artificial wombs, so it won't be long before the state can do away with human procreation entirely.

At this point the radical feminist dream of breaking up the family can easily become a reality given that the birth of children won't require a mother, let alone a father. If this doesn't send a chill down spines then nothing will. So, the way I see it, every family that succeeds is another finger up to feminism and the state – and that's worth fighting for.

One step forward, two steps...

Paul Elam · 19 January 2012 · Archived copy · Original

[box]

...Back.

A couple of quick announcements here, neither of them happy news. Sorry no radio show tonight. My internet problems persist and it looks to be several days before they will be able to take care of the problem. Something to do with intermittent signal degradation outside of my property and having to track it down.

Also, we had a most unfortunate and sudden pull-out of needed logistical support for the Sink Misandry event in Washington, D.C., purportedly due to philosophical differences. The manner in which it happened left me unable to compensate for it immediately, and so that too, for time being, is off the schedule.

The good news is that your donations have bought us another year on Blog Talk Radio, and once the technical problems are solved we will be back on track. The other good news is that we are MRA's and will overcome the Sink Misandry disappointment in due time.

My apologies to all. None of this is under my control.

[/box]

Politics, money and ideology- WHO's circumcision plan

Robert O'Hara · 19 January 2012 · Archived copy · Original

[box]

(AVfM News) AVfM recently published a story about the United Nations and World Health Organization's plan to circumcise twenty eight million men, boys and infants in Sub Saharan Africa over the next five years. Since then, our ongoing research on the issue has produced more information.

Adding to what is becoming a furor in the medical community over the ethics and efficacy of circumcision as a tool in the war against AIDS, the Journal of Public Health in Africa published an article written by Dr. Robert S. Van Howe and Dr. Michelle R. Storms of Michigan State University in December of last year. The article was just short of an excoriation of the Orange Farm study and WHO policy concerning the massive drive to circumcise an immense portion of the male population in Southern Africa. Using very strong language for a medical journal piece the authors in the article entitled "How the circumcision solution in Africa will increase HIV infections" stated in the abstract:

> Based on our analysis it is concluded that the circumcision solution is a wasteful distraction that takes resources away from more effective, less expensive, less invasive alternatives. By diverting attention away from more effective interventions, circumcision programs will likely increase the number of HIV infections.

The article goes on to point out the problems with the Orange Farm study and its failure to provide any real scientific evidence that circumcision reduces the risk of HIV infection for heterosexual males. Also covered are the lack of biological plausibility, compensation behavior and lack of consistent epidemiological evidence in much larger populations around the world. Also discussed in the article was a survey of men who had undergone the procedure in which it was reported that a substantial number of them were given promotional material telling them circumcision was an effective method to prevent HIV infection. The authors flatly stated that the policy was misguided -a strong term in medical circles- and meticulously draws a cost-benefit analysis of other methods such as condoms (the most effective method) for deterring the spread of AIDS.

This article and others like it came out on the heels of a much publicized speech given by U.S. Secretary of State Hillary Clinton on November 8, 2011, at the National Institute of Heath in Bethesda Maryland where she announced Helen DeGeneres as the new Special Envoy for Global AIDS Awareness. During the speech Clinton repeatedly mentioned a combination prevention strategy winch involved preventing mother to newborn infections, male circumcision, and antiretroviral drugs. Condom use was only mentioned as an afterthought in her speech. In fact circumcision was one of the key themes of her speech being mentioned often and it was also pointed out that of the one million circumcisions performed in Africa since 2007, three quarters of them were funded by PEPFAR- the Presidents Emergency Plan for AIDS Relief. The word "condoms" was used only once in the entire speech.

Another key theme in Clinton's speech was gender equality. She states the need for "institutional changes" including "reducing discrimination against women and girls; stopping gender-based violence and exploitation, which continue to put women and girls at higher risk of HIV infection," was a major tone setter for her speech. She stated that 60% of all people in Sub Saharan Africa infected with HIV are women and girls. In fact, epidemiological data published by UNIAIDS reports that this is true only in Sub Equatorial Africa and in no other region. Virtually everywhere else in the world it is men who comprise the majority of those infected with HIV.

The most implied explination for the discrepancy between southern Africa and other areas of the world is that there is something particularly anti female about the region and that it is a gender equality issue. However, there is no discernible difference between the economic and legal condition of women in Africa compared to other under developed areas in the world and no particular factor other than gender has been identified. There is, however, a discernible difference between the legal and social condition of homosexuals, particularly gay men, in Africa and the rest of the world. In most every country in Sub Equatorial Africa homosexuality is punishable by a prison sentence. In some cases the sentence is life long and spent in a labor camp. Yet again, in several countries like Uganda and Somalia either public flogging or the death sentence is prescribed. Many activists and epidemiologists have noted that this may be a major cause in the reluctance of men to get tested in Africa and leads to a skewing of the data. Critics of the Orange Farm study point out the reluctance of participants to divulge their sexual behavior as a factor in the studies fallibility.

The habit of linking rates of HIV infection with perceived gender inequality is ubiquitous throughout the army of people implementing the WHO's initiative. In fact Dr. Katherine Hankins, Chief Scientific Advisor for UNIAIDS and only medical doctor present at the UNAIDS–PEPFAR Southern & Eastern Africa Region Male Circumcision Communication Meeting, where the plan for "scale up" was put together, is a ardent believer in this rather unscientific notion.

Dr. Hankins' career has been characterized more by AIDS activism in non governmental organizations than clinical or research work. After finishing her medical degree in Canada, she spent a short time practicing with her father and then joined the Calgary Board of Public Health in Calgary, Alberta, where she eventually served for several years as Deputy Medical Officer of Health. When the AIDS crisis became acute in the mid 80′s she re-located to Montreal where there were a large number of cases present.

She focused her efforts on women with AIDS during that time period. In a 1989 address to the Fifth annual International Conference on AIDS in Montreal she stated: "Until we are economically equal, with pay equity and equal distribution of care giving responsibilities whether for the sick, the elderly, for children or the dependent women will not be in a position where they can fully protect themselves from HIV infection." She presented no evidence to support this claim during this address and to this day there has been no scientific research that shows any link whatsoever with pay equity, and or gender roles with the incidence of HIV infection.

Since becoming the Chief Scientific Advisor for UNIAIDS Dr. Hankins has focused primarily on the needs of women affected with AIDS, strongly promoting antiviral drugs to reduce the rate of transfer of HIV from mother to child. There has never been any program or policy initiated or overseen by her that focuses solely on the needs of men affected with AIDS or prevention for men aside from the current drive for mass circumcision.

Not only has the AIDS epidemic and HIV infection been touted as a gender equality issue, but circumcision itself has become a symbol of gender equality and social change, as purported by the operatives on the ground in Africa. Ayanda Nqeketo , mentioned in the previous article on the subject, has been very busy in Swaziland in promoting male circumcision as an "entry point" for a gender based ideology that will supposedly change social norms and somehow benefit women and promote reproductive health. She states in an opinion piece, "Public attitudes on sexual, reproductive issues," featured in the Swazi Observer on December 31 of last year:

> Public opinion and attitude is often the yardstick against which interventions are made. Perhaps this is due to conventional gender roles ascribed to both sexes by educational programs focusing on sexuality. Male roles are often stereotypically understood as that of being breadwinners who work outside the home and thus not fundamentally relevant to reproduction as much as production. Females, on the other hand, were supposed to be responsible for domestic issues, which include reproduction and raising children. These gender based understandings of male and female roles nevertheless tended to assume that women acted as independent decision makers on matters related to their reproductive health, e.g. the number of children to have, use of contraceptives, etc. Yet a number of studies done among males in African countries show that some men exert profound influence on the contraceptive choices their partners could make and on the number of children they have. If men play such an important role in reproductive health it is imperative for me to focus my discussion today on male circumcision and respect for women in the context of male circumcision intervention as the entry point.

She continues later in the piece:

> Male Circumcision intervention should be used to change sexual attitudes, practices and expand masculinity work with men and boys. There is now a body of international and national evidence pointing to the efficacy of gender-based work with men and boys in shaping attitudes and practices around gender and sexuality. Investment is required to scale up these efforts, and in particular to fund the training of an increased number of male peer educators who can lead this work. As this work is scaled up, it will be important to put training, support and monitoring systems in place to ensure the quality of work done, and to maintain a focus on male power and privilege, and their impact on women's lives, as well as notions and practices of masculinity, and their impact on men's lives. Individually-targeted and small, peer group interventions aiming to support self-defined behavioral change and shift social norms may be appropriate for this population. Health care institutions identified for MC must be utilized for these HIV preventive messaging. There is still much that is unknown or poorly understood about the complexities of men's sexualities and vulnerabilities, and how these relate to women's sexualities and vulnerabilities, that requires more ethnographically sophisticated research.

Also mentioned in her article are references to male violence and rape.

As with the argument that HIV infection rates are somehow linked to gender inequality, the argument that circumcision can be used as a tool to rectify the percieved and or imagined errors in social norms caries with it absolutely no proof and virtually nothing is done to convince target audiences that there is any link whatsoever. No links to reproductive health, no links to male privilege no links to gender violence….nothing. There is nothing more than an assertion, and in response to it comes millions upon millions of dollars and an incalculable amount of international political support.

Sources:

http://www.avoiceformen.com/featured/28000000-african-men-to-be-coerced-by-u-n-to-make-the-cut/

http://www.zimeye.org/wp-content/live_images/2012/01/44-419-1-PB.pdf

http://www.state.gov/secretary/rm/2011/11/176810.htm

http://www.unaids.org/en/dataanalysis/epidemiology/

http://www.avert.org/gay-africa-hiv-aids.htm#contentTable3

http://www.ncbi.nlm.nih.gov/pmc/articles/PMC1452470/pdf/cmaj00227-0118.pdf

http://www.aidstar-one.com/focus_areas/prevention/resources/technical_consultation_materials/Male_Circumcision_Communication_Meeting_Durban#presentationsection

http://www.observer.org.sz/index.php?news=33853

[/box]

Koan: the herbivore eats meat

Patrick Henry · 19 January 2012 · Archived copy · Original

I've come to the conclusion that women are just no longer worth it. The company of a woman will never be worth the rest of my life in jail or indentured servitude. Not all women are like that (NAWALT), some will say, and I would whole heartedly agree. But here's the rub. How do you know she isn't like that? You don't. Not until things go bad and by then it's too late.

Feminists might say I hate women or I'm a misogynist, depending on whether they passed her gender studies classes, but that's far from the truth. In fact, if I were a misogynist my life would be easier. I'm drawn to women like a moth to flame. I know women aren't good for me, even dangerous, but I still desire them.

It's one thing to come to the conclusion that women are no longer an option intellectually. It's quite another to come to terms with it on an emotional level. My biology and social conditioning rebel against this conclusion. Women are my dukkhu but we will get to that in a minute…

After my divorce I became a grass eater. Back then, I didn't know about the MRM or MGTOW. I found my way on my own. I guess you could say I'm self-taught. When I first started out, I tried using the internet to learn how to live without women. I found a lot of dating services and porn. On how to actually live without women, I found nothing. That's crazy talk after all.

This lifestyle is not for the faint of heart. Emotional pain, financial troubles, sexual frustration, loneliness, and social stigmatization all have to be faced head on and dealt with. I came to the lifestyle though intense emotional trauma; emotional pain so intense that at times death seemed preferable. That was until I discovered meditation. Meditation allowed me to clear my mind and provided me with relief from my pain.

Zen meditation teaches you to free yourself from emotional suffering by eliminating desire through living in the moment. I learned that women are my dukkhu, the source of my suffering and pain. If I could eliminate my desire for women, I would free myself from my emotional turmoil.

"There's an old Zen story of two monks traveling along a road. They came upon a beautiful young girl who was unable to get across the stream. The older monk offered to help. He picked her up and carried her across the stream. Several miles down the road the younger monk could no longer contain himself. "Master," he said, "we aren't supposed to associate with women, yet you touched that beautiful woman. You picked her up!" The master answered, "I put that woman down on the other side of the stream. You're still carrying her (McClain and Adamson)."

Chivalry aside, this story illustrates how the mind can continue to cause us suffering long after the actual event occurred. If we can clear our minds, the suffering goes away. Zen meditation is a philosophy, not a religion. So you can be a Zen Atheist or a Zen Catholic it doesn't matter. Interestingly, Siddhartha took the red pill around 400 B.C. to become the Buddha. When he discovered his life was a lie, he left his royal family to find enlightenment. Buddha was a red pill; a grass eater. Remembering that always puts a smile on my face when I rub his belly for good luck at the local Chinese restaurant.

Most Westerners are familiar with the koan, "What's the sound of one hand clapping?" Zen masters would give their students koans to meditate on. After deeply meditating on the koan, the student would present their answers to their Master. If the Zen master liked their answer, the student would be given another koan to consider. If the Zen master didn't like their answer, the student would be sent away to reflect some more. The koans were intended to press on the student's perceptions until they glimpsed a new reality and ultimately obtained enlightenment.

My wife, unknowingly, gave me a koan to consider when she said matter-of-factly, "You're nothing more than a piece of furniture that needs to be replaced." This statement hit me like a 100 megaton koan, which blasted me into the red pill world. The woman I loved had no feeling for me what-so-ever. In her eyes, I wasn't human or even an animal. I was an inanimate object, a tool, a utility. I'm not sure if I glimpsed Buddha's enlightenment but I sure took the red pill.

Like Buddha, I understood my life was a lie. I had been living a grand conspiracy. I was lied to by my family; I was lied to by my teachers; I was lied to by society, and I was lied to by myself. I was told I had power and rights, yet had none. I was told I was loved but was merely a tool. I was told I mattered but my feelings were forfeit. I was a slave without chains.

Gradually I learned to quiet my mind through meditation. I began looking at what was influencing my thoughts and desires and found the media was poisoning my mind. It was fuelling my dissatisfaction and my sexual desires. Once I understood that, I pulled the plug on the media's blue cool-aid. I cancelled my cable subscription and converted over from rock 'n' roll to classical music. Without looking at beautiful women, wanting to get-it-on if I bought the right toothpaste, I was remarkably less sexually frustrated. As a bonus, I had an extra $1,200 in my pocket at the end of the year. I was actually paying $1,200 a year to be given blue balls! That's really crazy, if you think about it. I haven't completely given up on rock 'n' roll but songs about women, love, and sex have been deleted from my iPod.

Since I'm an average guy and no Zen master, meditation only went so far for me. Loneliness was still a factor. Every red pill man knows this world is set up around women and children. There aren't many social outlets available for men and coming home to an empty house can feel unfulfilling. So, I decided to get a pet. A goldfish wasn't going to fill the need. I went with a large dog that is ecstatic to see me after a long day of work. The dog also helps with socialization. When I'm with my dog, I'm no longer a creepy, single guy. I'm just a guy with a cute dog people want to pet. A little polite conversation while my dog is being petted goes a long way. Plus, I'm getting my exercise too.

Keeping up with the manosphere by reading articles and listening to AVfM's radio allows me to keep up on current events. Posting comments, participating in letter campaigns, writing the occasional article, and making donations gives me a sense of community and a purpose greater than myself.

To increase my independence, this spring I plan on planting a garden. This garden will provide me with fresh, healthy vegetables and I'll be able to convert a little sweat equity into savings. I'm off to a good start; I have a four foot pile of mulch I began last summer just waiting for the snow to melt. The money I would have been spending on women is now being saved for a piece of land. I want to move out to the country where I can become more in tune with nature and self-reliant by raising my own food and get off the grid. There's something to be said for being your own man, having your own land, and providing for yourself.

Some have questioned whether you can be both a grass eater and an MRA. What might have the great Chinese military General Sun Tzu said about the MRA army? While this is an ideological war, Sun Tzu still has some insight. Let's take a look at some of the thoughts in his book the Art of War.

"It is the rule in war, if our forces are ten to the enemy's one, to surround him; if five to one, to attack him; straightway, without waiting for any further advantage. If twice as numerous, to divide our army into two. If equally matched, we can offer battle; if slightly inferior in numbers, we can avoid the enemy; if quite unequal in every way, we can flee from him (Watson)."

"By discovering the enemy's dispositions and remaining invisible ourselves, we can keep our forces concentrated, while the enemy's must be divided (Watson)."

"What we can do is simply to concentrate all our available strength, keep a close watch on the enemy, and obtain reinforcements (Watson)."

Considering the size of the MRM, I think Sun Tzu would approve of the grass eater strategy of withdrawing from women. Withdrawing denies the enemy the resources they need to maintain their forces. We must be patient and let our numbers grow. While we wait, we can call them out on their lies and propaganda. Over time this will weaken them and show others they are not invincible, which will bring additional numbers to our cause.

I see Japan's grass eater phenomenon spreading across the globe. With new developments around the world, SCUM in Switzerland, the Dear Colleague letter and VAWA in the US, "The Plan" in Australia, mass circumcision in Africa, and men being thrown from trains in India, our numbers will grow. Men will adapt to the insanity by opting out in greater numbers.

Living without women is possible and furthers our cause. To be successful you must understand and adapt to the emotional and social conditions of the lifestyle. Given extreme environmental stress factors, even deer learn to eat meat, and this herbivore eats meat.

References:

McClain, Gary, and Eve Adamson. Zen Living. 2nd. New York: Penguin Group, 2004.
Watson, John . "The Art if War." Sun Tzu's Art of War . John Watson, LLC, 2012. Web. 11 Jan 2012. http://suntzusaid.com.

All this goodness is killing me

Paul Elam · 20 January 2012 · Archived copy · Original

[quote]Never trust anyone who puts an adjective in front of the word man. ~ Mike LaSalle, MND Publisher[/quote]

Recent events over at the Good Men Project have added a kind of Jerry Springer quality to the man-o-sphere of late. Tom Matlack had the audacity to offer some mild dissent from feminist hegemony – on the website that he founded – and all hell broke loose. Savage tweets were exchanged like bodily fluids during spring break and two psychotically feminist contributors took their toys and went back to playing where they make all the rules. Then our camp chimed in, giggling like school kids looming over an unfortunate garden slug with a shaker of salt. The people at GMP had to scramble to figure out what happened.

All the hoopla certainly involved some measure of the chickens coming home to roost. When you swim with sharks, you tend to get bit, and those that tried to tell you so might just have a snicker at your expense. But, I don't think all of this is simply reduced to karma and schadenfreude.

The psychodrama we witnessed was fitting and edifying. It was driven, I think, by the core question essentially posed in the name of Tom Matlack's website, and the modern struggle to own the answer. What is a good man?

That remains the question for which Tom, nor any of the other contributors to his website, have ever really produced an answer. Lest you think I am here to add to the beating Tom has taken over the past few weeks, I am not. In fact, as I review his handling of the matter, I am really quite impressed.

Tom stood up for what he believes in, going against the grain in his own environment. When it started to cost him, he did not back down. When MRA's played a perhaps well-deserved round of "gotcha" he stood his ground with them as well (Hey, I don't agree with him, but I respect his fortitude). Rather than reframe or misrepresent the criticism against him, he presented it unabridged and directly from the source via John the Other and Girl Writes What, two of the most articulate voices we have.

Tom has said that his mission was to include a full spectrum of ideas and opinions, and he has shown a lot more than token follow through on that. Isn't this at least part of what makes a good man?

I think so. Well, except for one rather significant caveat. Most of what I have just said about Tom I could also say about Lisa Hickey, CEO of GMP. She has generally supported the diversity of voices there, and stood by Tom even as Schwyzer and Marcotte were trying to have him sent packing (assuming his luggage was under the bus). I also note in recent times that Ms. Hickey's "voice" has begun to express a great deal of compassion for men; not for men that are being what women want them to be, but for men as they are outside of their utility; men demonized; men in trouble. Like Tom, Lisa Hickey has taken a dose or two of my less than friendly attention. I don't regret doing it, as I was following my beliefs, but I have to respect the current actions of both of them.

Now, Is Lisa Hickey a good man?

That is the whole problem with this mess, and I want to offer it now as a challenge to Tom Matlack, Lisa Hickey or any other person affiliated with that site.

Please inform us of anything, one single quality, that you think constitutes a part of being a good man – that does not also apply to being a good woman.

I am not taking the feminist path here. I understand and accept that there are differences between men and women, physically, psychologically, emotionally and intellectually. I would disabuse anyone of the notion that any of those innate differences constitute a difference in innate value or should result in different expectations or different rights.

After extensive consideration, I can find no quality in human beings by which I don't measure men and women equally. Tom, can you? If so, please email that to me because I am genuinely interested in hearing the answer.

I understand it may be tempting here to claim that I am sinking all of us in semantic quicksand. What's the harm, after all, in striving to be a good man as opposed to being a good woman?

Well, for me there is harm because it is ultimately used to control people, and to abuse them.

Case in point. At least 11 people died after the Costa Concordia cruise ship ran aground on January 13. One of the first criticisms of the emergency procedures that came to light came from Edwin Gurd, a retired police chief who was on the scene and assisting with rescue efforts. He said, "We were keen for women and children to go first, and men if they had babies or families. A lot of men regardless of that were trying to save themselves."

And this is where the rubber meets the road; for Tom Matlack; for Lisa Hickey; for all of us. And it is still the crossroads where GMP will more likely opt for a dating column than an honest exploration of the real issue. In the end each and every one of us knows what our culture sees in men who try to "save themelves." Cowards. Not good men.

Is Edwin Gurd a "good man" because he wanted to help women and children ahead of other men and because he wanted to enforce that on everyone? How about the men who ignored the call to stay on a crippled ship while strangers were put ahead of them on life boats? Are they bad men? Should they have stayed, willing to die, in order to live by a code of disposability they were born into?

If, Tom, you are really struggling to get to the idea of what makes a man "good," I submit you can't get there without taking this bull by the horns and answering the questions. Romantic notions of masculinity are understandably appealing, but please tell me how romantic you would find it to see your son's body floating face down next to a lifeboat that would not take him because he had a penis.

Some of the people defending the men who chose to ignore calls to wait behind women and children had an interesting rationale. Why would a man choose to die that way for strangers if it meant taking himself away from protecting and providing for his family?

My, what a telling defense! It is as though we cannot imagine that a man would think his life of equal value to anyone else's, simply because he exists. The reason those people thought he was worth saving was because he was already sacrificing for those he knew. His life did not have value, but his utility did. Does this kind of thinking reflect what we should call good humanity?

Again, is this the sum of a man's "goodness," his worthiness to live? Is this why he cannot hope to have the value of someone with a vagina?

These are the real questions, and when you strip away all the internal politics; when the histrionic fits of your former associates have faded away, you are still left with a need to answer them.

My position on this is pretty clear. I don't trust the thinking of anyone, no matter how good their intentions, who wants to define what a good man (or woman) is. That is the guy who wants me to die while someone else gets to live. It's the woman who wants me to shut up and quit complaining because "good" men don't whine; they either go out quickly, or slowly bleed to death without bothering anyone else with their troubles.

Good men line up to die in illicit wars for corporate interests, and leave their families to take solace in folded flags and cheap pieces of tin.

And worse, good men die the much slower and painful death, laboring daily just to stay out of jail, quietly dying in poverty, in the absence of home and children that were stripped from them – because speaking up gets them a "man up" or a "fuck off," from most of the world.

Just ask Bill Bennett, Kay Hymowitz and Penny Nance. All of them have their ideas on what a good man is, and how we should all shut our fucking mouths and be one whether it kills us or ruins our lives.

Similarly, when many feminists speak of good men, they mean the ones who stand by them in trashing men and painting them as human contagions, in need of being reengineered so as not to contaminate the lives of their human betters. These are the same men working right now across the globe to foster a system of governance that reduces men to less value than livestock.

Yep, the whole world has ideas on what makes a good man, all of it hinging on how they can be used by thoughtless, shallow ingrates and ideologues.

As a man I know the price of being good. I see it in saltwater graves, flag draped coffins and a patch of charred pavement outside a family court in New Hampshire. I see it in the self-loathing of male feminists and sycophants, even in men like Hugo Schwyzer that fuck their students and try to kill people – then publicly display a psychopathic lack of remorse for all of it. By and large they will remain in good graces with many feminists, as long as they don't make the mistake of imagining their own autonomy, like Tom Matlack did.

But most of all I see the price of being a good man across the pages of A Voice for Men every day, in the stories of men who have been battered, butchered and belittled for their goodness. These are men who have been strung up by the very things that most people would find worthy in men. And they stand, understandably, at arms-length from anyone who furthers the mentality that ultimately destroyed their lives.

Do I think Tom Matlack is a good person? Yes, I sincerely do, despite not agreeing with him on many things. I just don't think he is a good man. I would not wish that on anyone.

Maligned

Gabriel Raphael · 21 January 2012 · Archived copy · Original

The Campaign to Diminish Men's Social Status to Slave Class in Western Culture

Author's note: This is not intended to be an attack on women. I am friendly with women, some of whom consider themselves feminists. This is an analysis of what I and others have identified as a disturbing trend throughout society. As a career artist, teacher, and divorced father, I have always shunned New Age jargon, paranoid conspiracy theories, or any cultish group mentality. I had very little awareness of or regard for the organized Men's Rights Movement before writing my first draft of this essay in virtual isolation. My assumption was a common one that men's groups were comprised of a few ragtag misfits who got together in the woods to bang bongos, whine about their lives, and atone for the perceived sins of their fathers.

Since then however, I have found an impressive collection of intelligent work by some very well-informed and accomplished authors who write with great clarity and objectivity about these disturbingly overlooked men's issues. I was pleasantly surprised to discover that I was not the only man (and even a few remarkable women) to draw similar conclusions about the organized campaign to denigrate and subjugate men in Western culture. In this piece, I touch on many facets of the subject that will be well-known to readers who are already familiar with the MRM. However, I probe a little deeper than merely identifying the symptoms into some informed speculation about the sinister origins and ultimate goals of this insidious trend.

–Gabriel Raphael, 2012

* * * * *

It's A Man's World?

[quote]All women's issues are to some degree men's issues and all men's issues are to some degree women's issues because when either sex wins unilaterally both sexes lose.–Warren Farrell[/quote]

We have lived for so long with the cliché that it is a man's world that we rarely question what it means. So I'm asking. Does it mean that a disproportionate majority of men enjoy freedoms, advantages and benefits that women are denied? If that's what it means, then it is one of many absurd fallacies regarding men's and women's status in this day and age here in the Western world. It has been anything but a man's world for most of my lifetime since the late 1960s and I know for most men of my generation here in America, whether or not they have the awareness or nerve to admit it. Like a hapless frog boiling to death in a slowly heated pot of water, we never saw it coming. The apparatus of feminism has seen to that. In the politically-correct-osphere, it has become taboo for anyone, male or female to even question the motives, tactics, or ultimate consequences of the feminist agenda. However, as a man to whom it would never occur to question the notion that the sexes deserve equal rights, I definitely do question the feminist agenda. In my lifetime of experience, I must objectively conclude that true gender equality and the goals of feminism as it is practiced are anything but synonymous.

My beautiful daughter attends a successfully integrated public school where we live in Northern California. She has never witnessed racial discrimination but is taught about it in school, especially around the time of MLK day. When she was only about eight, I asked her if she understood what it was all about. She innocently replied, "Yeah but it isn't like that anymore, so why do they still have to make such a big deal about it?" Hesitantly, I answered her that some people think that it's the only way to prevent it from happening again. And yet while offering this explanation, I had misgivings about how it felt disingenuous. Even though it was the stock answer, didn't really make much sense to me or to my daughter. Contrary to its intended purpose of being preventative, it instead seemed more likely to perpetuate the resentment. They are teaching children about a time of hate to whom it would never otherwise occur. I'm not suggesting that we should deny historic facts either, but such sensitive subjects must be kept in proper perspective. I mention this as a parallel to what I now see happening in the so-called battle of the sexes.

With the same paradoxical logic that would put the American Cancer Society out of business if a cure for cancer were found, I submit that the apparatus of feminism actually reinforces and depends on the fallacy that it's a man's world in ways that actually diminish the dignity of both sexes. In science, including social science, any good theory or procedure must withstand the test of objective scrutiny. So let's put feminism to the test. In this case, as simple thought experiment. Like most men of my generation, I can't even imagine having the motive or power to oppress women. It is an empty accusation. And yet feminism depends on that premise. Therefore, I must conclude that feminism fails the credibility test— catastrophically. Why? Not because men are threatened by the idea of gender equality or "strong" women, a familiar accusation so often claimed by feminists. We're not. Really. Yet most men become baffled by this accusation just long enough to lose their focus. That is a typical ad hominem logical fallacy that effectively obfuscates the real problems and usually derails any meaningful conversation before it begins.

Feminism Knows Best

[quote]It would be futile to attempt to fit women into a masculine pattern of attitudes, skills and abilities and disastrous to force them to suppress their specifically female characteristics and abilities by keeping up the pretense that there are no differences between the sexes. –Arianna Huffington[/quote]

Another reason that feminism fails is because it has rampaged far beyond its alleged goal of gender equality and spawned some other very hostile and inequitable conditions for men, women and children. It has elevated women not to equal status but to special status, while promoting a universal perception of men as clueless buffoons or violent criminals by a grossly disproportionate measure. Hand in hand with the self-righteousness of "therapy culture", feminism has diminished the quality of life for everyone by destroying the values that once sustained the stability and bonds of the American family. This is no accident or side effect, nor is it good for anyone including women. It can't be denied that this brazenly indefensible objective is at the core of feminism's purported nobler goals of equality. Yet radical feminists will still try to defend it with the absurdly paranoid assertion that the traditional family is nothing more than a male invention designed to oppress women. This theory is even hostile to women who find fulfillment as wives and mothers as being naively brainwashed by a tyrannical patriarchy.

If a tenet of feminism is that women have choices, then this is yet another example of hypocrisy and cognitive dissonance. What feminists are really saying is that women are free to do whatever feminism says they should do because feminism presumes to speak for all women and that it knows what's best for them; better than they even know for themselves. Amazingly, too many Americans have already accepted such rhetoric and readily ignore the fact that the family unit is our greatest asset and source of strength as individuals and as free citizens. Without the support and strength of the intact family, we are weakened and reduced to proletariats of the state. This, I believe is no mere coincidence. Women— the so-called nurturers and caregivers have been the unwitting foot soldiers this destructive campaign; and men— the proverbial protectors and providers have passively stood by and allowed it to happen. We are all equally accountable for allowing our natural instincts as protectors and nurturers to be so easily perverted.

What began as a seemingly honorable movement to insure legal, financial, and social equality between men and women when war widows were left with no means of support, has now degenerated into a grotesque caricature that backfires far more than it accomplishes any true gains toward its presumably virtuous purpose, or as other authors have identified it: feminism's "cover story." A minority of angry, vocal women have hijacked and franchised the feminist movement into a disturbingly destructive force while sheltered under its original banner of righteousness. Yet we dare not question their rhetoric lest we are branded as hostile to their seemingly noble cause, so most men comply or assume the obsequious role of championing the feminist cause.

Even if some women really do have legitimate personal grievances with specific men, I would point out that these exceptions to the rule are personal and unique; and not justification for a universally hostile social trend. Thousands of people are killed in car accidents every year but we don't outlaw cars. I love dogs even though I've been bitten once or twice in my life. In fact, I love women despite all of their shortcomings and ways that I have witness few of them have behave with depravity or unjustifiably extreme cruelty toward me and other men. Most young women are now systematically taught that there is a sinister conspiracy among all men against all women with nothing more than a tiny percentage of isolated transgressions to justify this claim. This is mobilizing a political agenda through fear and loathing of the proverbial boogeyman which most women have never personally experienced.

And yet despite the finger pointing, the vast majority of actual men have been anything but unsympathetic. On the contrary. Millions of men just like me have done as much or more to support and abide by the demands of feminism as the women that it is supposed to benefit. In an effort to be deemed as "acceptable" by the feminist sensibility, a whole generation of men spend most of their lives bending over backwards to suppress their better judgment and male instincts while apologizing for simply being male (which ironically further incurs women's contempt.) It begins and ends with this militant faction and their unrelentingly vitriolic characterization of men as their oppressors or abusers. It may seem counterintuitive, but the explanation is that like so many human institutions, feminism would have no cohesion without a scapegoat. I will therefore submit that feminism's raison d'être is a phantom— but that its effects are dreadfully tangible.

A few so-called "moderate" feminists may attempt to distance themselves from these radical extremists, but their voices are drowned out by all the noise. And even they can't evade the truth that feminism even exists at all because of a contrived fallacy that a hegemony of men opposes their freedom. Here in America in the 21st century… really? By that definition, any feminism is akin to radical fundamentalism. Eliminate that unjustified core theory and feminism has no unifying meaning or purpose. For a little perspective, all we need to do is look at some Arab and African countries to see what it really looks like for women to be oppressed by men. Despite enjoying advantages and freedoms above almost any other class of people in the world, American women, like spoiled children, aren't embarrassed to keep right on complaining. Yet perhaps they should complain— not for anything that they have been denied, but for the tragic consequences of what they themselves have wrought: the unmitigated betrayal of their men, their children, and ultimately, themselves.

Plunder and Slander

[quote]I remember Nazi election propaganda posters showing a hateful Jewish face with crooked nose. –Jack Steinberger[/quote]

All of this may come as no surprise. Any social trend that gains enough momentum will always attract a few fanatic extremists who undermine its true spirit. They are to feminism what suicide bombers are to Islam. These "squeaky wheels" always opt for a rage-fueled tirade over logic against their manufactured adversary. Such fanatic hyperbole inevitably becomes the manifesto for the whole movement. Declare war and then justify it by accusing the identified enemy of initiating aggression for displaying the slightest hint of defense at the attack. Assassinate character instead of seeking accord. Rather than graciously recognizing the willingness of the other party to be reasonable, they default to the most adversarial position possible and employ the same strategy as price bantering in a Cairo street market: aggressively demand more than is reasonable, take as much as they can get, demand more still, give nothing back, and never apologize. This strategy may achieve some petty gains, but the net result is a severely diminished quality of life for all concerned from an increased atmosphere of antagonism and distrust between men and women. The strategy being, "screw him before he screws me." It is the equivalent to the short-sighted greed of corporate raiders who plunder the assets of an old beloved company and lay off all of its loyal employees rather than reinvesting in its long term potential. A small minority benefits while most suffer. Starting to sound familiar?

Radio pundit bullies like Rush Limbaugh and Tom Leykis have been called out for making the regrettable comparison of feminism and Nazism: "Feminazis". In so doing, they undermine their own credibility by stooping to the same low level of inflammatory name calling, and yet I believe the core point that they clumsily make is how feminists demonize men just as Nazis demonized Jews so as to justify their hostility. If so, then I'm afraid to say that even they got that part right. Of course, these are rare examples of the kind of man that feminists love to use as poster boys for what's wrong with all men. They depend on each other to define themselves. Such polarization is inevitable. Like a law of physics, for every radical feminist, there must be an equal and opposite male "pig" to serve as a yardstick by which they measure their own limits. If the moniker “feminazis” is going too far, then it may not be going too far to compare feminism to McCarthyism. At least McCarthy didn’t massacre millions of people that he falsely accused of communism, but the similarity is that he did foster an unnecessarily antagonistic atmosphere for a period of this country’s history based more on a personal paranoia than on any legitimate or widespread threat.

“Displacement” is a well-recognized psychological phenomenon in which the subject redirects their rage toward any convenient target while repressing awareness of the true cause. If they can justify their antagonism by indoctrinating as many others as possible, then they feel validated in their delusion.

And so, in the last 40 years, men in America and a few other Western nations in the northern latitudes have been the target of one of the most insidious slander campaigns ever waged against any minority, and it hides in plain sight. It is not just against the tiny minority of genuinely “bad guys”, but toward all men through guilt by association and the questionably paranoid logic of always erring on the side of caution. In many cases, the easiest targets—the proverbial “nice guys” are the recipients of the most egregious injustices. Why? Because they offer the least resistance. They are the weakest link.

So, if women aren’t really oppressed by men in this country, then why all the sound and fury? All we need to do is look at the effects. Skyrocketing divorce rates, children raised in broken homes and daycare, and the “ghettoization” of the middle class. Nothing is an accident. What we may dismiss as a collection of unfortunate side effects is the purpose. Who would possibly benefit from such social devastation? I’m getting to that.

Riding the Civil Rights Bandwagon

[quote]We live in a society of victimization, where people are much more comfortable being victimized than actually standing up for themselves.–Marilyn Manson[/quote]

“White guilt” became part of our vernacular since the civil rights movement as whites began to have a collective awakening of conscience about the centuries of black suffering in America. Jumping on this bandwagon, comfortable, well-educated, middle and upper class women sought to extend this sentiment to include “male guilt” by comparing their situations as wives and mothers to the conditions of black oppression. And thus began their campaign to demonize men— all men, in exaggerated ways that even exceed the animosity that blacks expressed toward whites for incomparably more legitimate reasons. Thus, the “victim culture” was born and suddenly everyone had a new tool for manipulating the system to their favor. However, unlike our new found sensitivity to racism toward ethnic minorities and sexism toward women, this reactionary form of bigotry toward men is regarded with nothing more than a chuckle during any romantic comedy or primetime sitcom.

Men are the one minority that is banned by definition from playing the “victim card”. If a man complains, then he is not a real man. However, I submit that as real men, we can set a better example for improving our station than by resorting to the same crybaby strategy so overused by other groups. No more crying wolf. You can’t get respect by whining for it. Being a man is not something that requires a feminist’s permission or approval.

The implications are much farther reaching than these venues. Substitute the word “woman” or “black” or any other minority for the word “man” or “dad” in any derogatory joke commonly made at men’s expense and then see if you still think it’s funny or inconsequential: “It’s so simple, even Dad can do it.” Harmlessly funny, right? Now try: It’s so simple, even a woman can do it.” Still laughing? We usually shrug off “male bashing” as a relatively trivial footnote in daytime talk shows and women’s studies college courses. And yet, regarding the latter, the editorial board of the Canadian newspaper National Post has argued:

The radical feminism behind these courses has done untold damage to families, our court systems, labour laws, constitutional freedoms and even the ordinary relations between men and women. Women’s Studies courses have taught that all women — or nearly all — are victims and nearly all men are victimizers. Their professors have argued, with some success, that rights should be granted not to individuals alone, but to whole classes of people, too.

Justifications for Male Discrimination

[quote]The anger that appears to be building up between the sexes becomes more virulent with every day that passes. And far from women taking the blame… the fact is that men are invariably portrayed as the bad guys. Being a good man is like being a good Nazi.–Dave Thomas[/quote]

The rationale goes something like this: Men have always had all of the advantages, so now it's OK to level the playing field by denigrating any man, anywhere, anytime, in any situation. What this logic conveniently ignores is that only a tiny percentage of men at the very top of the social pyramid have these mythical advantages. The rest of us are all in the same boat. And yet the remaining ordinary, hard-working men who do dutifully work difficult or dangerous jobs that women don't want to do in order to support their families are vilified as oppressors, predators, or as immature buffoons, making it open season on the proverbial boogeyman. In any conflict, men are almost always seen as guilty until proven innocent, while women's virtue is always given the benefit of the doubt, even when evidence to the contrary is irrefutable. Where exactly is the oppressive patriarchal system that I have been hearing women complain about my whole life? I don't see it. Not here in America— at least not in my lifetime. This is the classic cognitive dissonance that many men live with every day. Is it any wonder that a few snap under the stress? How much hand wringing are we doing in the hope of understanding them compared to when a woman snaps?. Men are held 100% accountable for their actions regardless of extenuating circumstances while women are infantilized, analyzed, coddled, and excused under identical circumstances. The fact that so-called "empowered" feminists insist upon this is hypocrisy in the extreme.

It has already been demonstrated that statistics regarding earning disparity are misleading due to the failure to take into account the fact that men tend to work longer hours and more days per year at many jobs that women simply don't want to do. And yet, feminists cherry-pick the final tally of their own choices as the prime example of discrimination against them. And we've been buying this nonsense for a generation now.

The news media is insidiously complicit. Every leading story on the eleven o-clock news begins with some atrocity committed by a "man", while the feel-good human interest stories refer to men merely as "personnel", "coalminers", "soldiers", or any other gender-neutral euphemism.

Others have already written at length about exaggerated or fabricated statistics on atrocities like rape and DV perpetrated by men against women. In a nutshell, the fact is that violence is initiated equally by men and women and that women abuse children (including sexually) at more than twice the numbers than men. And yet, we behave as if only men are perpetrators and only women are victims. Once again, acting as if things are the way we think they should be instead of how they really are.

All of this amounts to being the ultimate straw man fallacy, and the true cause for such widespread insistence upon it goes even deeper than almost anyone really understands.

Of course, there will always be some bad eggs among any demographic group that deserve the scrutiny that they receive, but that includes both men and women. Neither gender owns the monopoly on virtue. However, for the same reason that racism is wrong, condemning an entire category of people for the shortcomings of a few is ultimately far more damaging than the behavior that it presumes to denounce.

Propaganda

[quote]This idea that males are physically aggressive and females are not has distinct drawbacks for both sexes. –Katherine Dunn[/quote]

This phenomenon has its tentacles in every important aspect of modern life including education, the job market, retirement, health care, the economy, the media, journalism, literature, the arts, law enforcement, criminal courts, dating, marriage, raising children, family courts, and divorce. In all of these arenas, there is a profound pattern of discrimination against boys and men, and preferential "kid glove" treatment or portrayal of girls and women— which is only possible because of a baseless but persistent myth that the bias favors men.

We say that women can do anything men can do, but then force men to pay alimony to women in the vast majority of cases when it is awarded in a divorce. The assumption of course, being that the poor, helpless woman can't fend for herself without a husband to support her— even if she left him. Suddenly, pride in being a strong, independent woman is conveniently set aside. In such cases, it is presumed that life with him was so unbearable that she had to "escape", which is something that doesn't require any proof. She is then "owed" compensation for the excruciating ordeal of having to sleep with her husband for the years that they were married as if she were a prostitute or sexual slave with no choice in the matter. If it is an insult in the extreme to call a woman a whore, then you'd think that more of them would be embarrassed to behave in a way that invites such characterization.

In any case, the man is expected to continue supporting the woman; an outdated vestige from the time when most men worked and most women stayed home to raise the children. While feminism has ravaged that traditional model, they have staunchly defended the disproportionate alimony and child support awards in family courts that originated in a time when most women didn't work. The legalese is: "in the lifestyle to which she has become accustomed". In higher income cases with children, outrageous amounts of child support are granted that far exceed what is required to comfortably raise a child. As "discretionary" income, the custodial parent (the mother) is free to spend this jackpot on anything she wants. This stunning hypocrisy is still boilerplate practice in divorce courts. The spectacularly insulting double standard goes unnoticed, dismissed, or rationalized as "evening the playing field". And yet, it can be demonstrated that we have grossly overcompensated for something that was never as far out of balance as it has now become. It happened only after the natural differences in gender temperament and predisposition became falsely branded as inequality and injustice. The implications of all this are much farther reaching than a few hurt feelings.

Boys Taught Early

[quote]The differences between the sexes are the single most important fact of human society. –George Gilder[/quote]

In subtle and sometimes not so subtle ways, boys are now taught from an early age that their maleness is a flaw to be suppressed or punished. Anyone who has observed young children play can easily see the obvious natural differences in the temperaments of most children of each gender. There are always some exceptions but most boys are naturally more competitive, active, and fascinated by things that can be thrown or ridden, while girls tend to more often sit quietly and "pretend" play. These are not learned behaviors— they are instinctive. However, in many experimental new educational environments, young boys are deterred from their more naturally boisterous instincts by hyper-sensitive adults who deem boys' natural behavior as disruptive and sometimes even going so absurdly far as to deem it oppressive of the girls' well-being.

We're talking about politicizing children's natural behavior.

A whole generation of boys are now being chemically castrated with Ritalin and other drugs, presumably to curb their so-called "hyperactivity", or what was once called, you know, "being a boy." In some "progressive" educational environments, young boys are even directed to play quietly with dolls along with the girls. The message is that the educators are attempting to break down natural gender behavior under the insane theory that it is unnatural— before the children can possibly understand why they are being discouraged from behaving normally. This symbolic gender reassignment goes far beyond the need for a reasonable degree of discipline and order when children really do behave disruptively.

The fact that girls often enter puberty a little earlier than boys has spawned a myth that they mature intellectually sooner as well, and yet there is no evidence at all to support this belief. In fact, girls' school performance sometimes drops sharply at the onset of puberty, with far less of this effect observed among boys. Statistically, it's no surprise that girls' aptitude skews a little more toward verbal and language skills while boys skew a little more toward analytical and math skills, but there is no significant difference in overall performance except when one group is favored over another, which is exactly what's been happening in the last 30 years. Boys' tendency to assert themselves a little more than girls has been branded as damaging to girls' self-esteem. So, instead of dealing with each child according to their innate temperaments, boys are admonished for their natural enthusiasm. Being born male has taken the place of "original sin", and boys learn to feel guilty just for being boys, especially when most elementary school teachers are women who consider themselves feminists.

Boys see their own fathers marginalized in their lives and fathers in media portrayed as inept buffoons instead of the stable, wise heroes that they once were. No longer is the protector, the provider, the decision maker respected or even acknowledged. In domestic disputes, the man is almost always arrested even when the woman was the aggressor, which is far more frequently than reported, for the same biased reasons. Men are blamed for all the evils of the world with a naïve dream that all problems would be solved if only women ran the world. None of these biases are absolute, but they are now commonplace enough to have a cumulatively negative effect on how boys learn to see themselves. This far exceeds the seriousness of any complaint about how women are portrayed in the media. Once again, all of this reinforces the absurd and dangerous idea that the only way to "empower" girls is to emasculate boys, even at very young ages.

In the Workplace

[quote]The sexes in each species of being… are always true equivalents – equals but not identical. –Antoinette Brown Blackwell[/quote]

In the professional world, women often complain that their male colleagues don't take them seriously. Having worked for several large companies, I have often heard the complaint but never actually witnessed the alleged cause. On the contrary, I have seen many women in positions of authority, surrounded by mild-mannered beta males who would never dare question them even if they had good reason— out of fear that any challenge whatsoever to a woman would be misinterpreted as the deadly sin of sexism. These are the young men who were raised in the generation of feminism.

Nevertheless, even if it still sometimes happens that a few old-school men don't take their female colleagues or subordinates as seriously as they'd like, one very important reason for it is rarely acknowledged: women actually have more options than men, despite a common assumption to the contrary. Every working man knows that he has no choice. He has no safety net. He must work, period.

For men, working for a living is not a privilege, group therapy, or a liberating expression of his individuality, creativity, and freedom, as feminists have been taught to see it and envy it. For men, work is merely an inescapable and necessary burden whether he likes it or not. A man must work his whole life because he knows that no one is ever going to take care of him, and he will have to work extra hard, long hours that most women won't if he is going to be considered successful enough to attract a woman and support a family.

A woman in the workplace on the other hand has many more choices, especially if she's attractive. Whether we care to admit it or not, she can flirt or screw her way up the ladder if she wants. She can threaten to sue for sexual discrimination pretty much any time she is challenged for any reason by a male colleague or superior. That is not to say that every woman does these things, but some do. That is a fact, and everyone knows it. Every man in the professional world knows that even if a woman doesn't do these things, the threat that she could always looms, while he will never have such options. It's not difficult to see how this knowledge could influence even fair-minded men to begin seeing working women as mere career dabblers or hobbyists who are exploiting unfair advantages compared to their more serious male colleagues who have only their hard work and dedication to earn credibility.

Also, most women can still opt-out and revert to the traditional role of housewife pretty much whenever they want, if they want, unless they wait until it's too late. There should be no shame in this option, but it is there. In such cases when they do wait too long, only then do some women begin to think that the grass is greener on the path not taken. They then long to be wives and mothers often long after the optimal time to start a family has passed. Like men, such women finally realize that being responsible for themselves is not a mere test of self-esteem to prove like a precocious child, but after a certain point, it becomes a hard, inescapable reality. Some even admit to feeling as if they had been "suckered" into pursuing careers that they only later realize that do not bring them the fulfillment that they were promised by their women's studies professor in college. So until that day of reckoning, no matter how hard a woman works to prove herself equal to her male colleagues in a professional environment, the unspoken knowledge that she has a safety net that he lacks has an unavoidable affect on her credibility as a serious employee compared to her male colleagues.

If there is one attractive woman sitting in the boardroom at a meeting with her male colleagues, then everyone including her is acutely aware of the proverbial pink elephant in the room that no one dares to talk about. Everyone is uncomfortable and she can use that fact to her advantage. While this may not seem fair, it is foolish to pretend that it's not true. But we do pretend. We pretend that things are the way we think they should be, instead of how they really are. This head-in-the-sand reflex does not bring about positive change. It only fosters more tension and distrust. Consequently, the workplace has become a minefield of hyper-vigilance against the slightest perception of harassment, which stems more from a fear of lawsuits than from any actual behavior that rises to a reasonable interpretation of being genuinely offensive. Talk about a hostile work environment!

An attractive, successful business woman that I once dated told me that as an artist, I was a refreshing alternative to the stodgy men in suits that she worked with all day. She actually complained to me that they didn't take her seriously even though she was just as competent and hard working as any of them. Without hesitation, I told her why I thought that was so, and her jaw dropped. Not in offense, but to her credit, in recognition of the truth. She replied, "Oh my god, you're right. I never thought of it like that." We eventually parted on good terms but I know that she will remember that conversation.

Sex and Drugs and Rock & Roll

[quote]No one will ever win the battle of the sexes; there's too much fraternizing with the enemy. –Henry A. Kissinger[/quote]

Before the 1960s, the American male archetype was admired for being strong, and stoic, with grit and moral fiber. Women chose men carefully based on these qualities— with good reason. In the time before the pill and legal abortion, unwanted pregnancy was a serious concern, so a stand-up man was valued and appreciated. Strong, smart, heroic men were a staple in literature, television and movies.

Enter: JFK's assassination and the Viet Nam war. Suddenly, all bets were off and a new young generation dared to seriously challenge the status quo through an explosion of creativity in music, literature, film, and personal exploration of new ways of thinking and living. This posed a far more serious threat to the incumbent establishment than most people realize. In ancient Rome, the powers of the time realized that they couldn't stop Christianity, so they co-opted it and formed the Roman Catholic Church in order to maintain power over a growing population of Christians. This is not a discourse about religion but a similar thing happened here in America in the wake of the 60s. The hippie movement was completely derailed with the pacifying temptations of sex and drugs, courtesy of your friendly CIA. Contrary to popular belief, the sexual revolution was actually part of the arsenal to sabotage a movement that could have otherwise had a real chance of overthrowing the corrupt establishment. Like giving smallpox-infected blankets to Native American tribes, hippies were given unrestricted sex and recreational drugs with the idea that these were expressions of their rebellion, when they were actually the elements of their demise. Indeed, my parents' generation naively and eagerly partook of these temptations without having any idea of the intended consequences. An entire generation of rebels was anesthetized into docility with very little bloodshed except for isolated incidents like Kent State.

The pill was developed and Roe v. Wade legalized abortion. One of feminism's dictates was that women should no longer be ashamed to be single mothers if they chose not to terminate their pregnancies. The lid blew off sexual restrictions. Promiscuity was no longer shameful, women no longer needed to be coy about their sexuality, and men no longer needed to be strong or responsible. The androgynous rock star replaced the chiseled leading man. We invented absurd new euphemisms like "polyamory", to legitimize behavior that was once taboo, which of course has nothing to do with real love. Qualities like commitment, responsibility, character, and virtue became synonymous with the rigid, oppressive establishment of the previous generation. Motivated by the temptation of easy sex, most men eagerly adapted to these new mores. The American male archetype transformed from stoic and masculine to the non-threatening man-child anti-hero. As a friend suggested, men went from "pull out artists" to "pick up artists." This may all seem like good fun, but at what cost? Skyrocketing statistics of single mothers, uninvolved fathers, broken homes, and tension between the sexes.

Like trying to live on a diet of nothing but hot fudge sundaes, all this non-committal sex eventually led to an inevitable breakdown of trust or respect between the sexes. "Free love" was anything but free. Sex as recreation demands the suppression of the natural intimacy and bonding that normally accompanies it. But suppression begets perversion, jealousy, resentment, disillusionment, and rage. By the 80's, the AIDS epidemic struck, rehab clinics became commonplace and the party was over. Having forgotten any sense of the traditional values and respect that once existed between the sexes, it was too late to turn back. All we were left with was animosity, distrust, and a tidal wave of blame.

Fast forward to today and sexual relationships have come to resemble tense diplomatic negotiations during a temporary cease-fire between warring nations that are considering the benefit of temporarily lifting a trade embargo. People are torn between their natural instincts and the legacy of a generation of promiscuity. Confusion predominates; consumerism and convenience prevail. With absurdly oversimplified theories like "The Rules" and "Men are from Mars, Women are from Venus" gaining traction among most of the population spoon-fed on pop culture, men and women have abandoned their own common sense and decency. Instead, they have come to see each other as alien specimens to be analyzed and manipulated through a scripted and choreographed series of disingenuous interactions, or as disposable consumer products to be traded in at the first sign of boredom or imperfection. Relationships and marriage are more frequently than ever based on short-sighted whim and superficial convenience more than on genuine love, trust, respect or devotion. No commitment is deep enough to withstand the opportunity to "trade up". The slogan "I want it all now" from Cyra McFadden's satirical book "The Serial" has lost its irony and become the mantra for a whole generation. Scratching the surface of these trends reveals some interesting underlying causes.

We are now surrounded by overt sexual imagery everywhere in the media. Despite our professed abhorrence toward child pornography, we allow our children to become inured to sexualized imagery, attitudes, and styles at increasingly younger ages. Worldwide pornography industry revenues are now far in excess of $100 billion annually, which is more than double that of Microsoft and more than the NFL, NBA, and MLB combined. When natural sexuality becomes unavoidably confused with the caricature of pornography, it is not unusual for men to be ridiculed as pigs or perverts merely for expressing any sexual desire at all, whereas women's sexuality is seen as almost a divine sacrament, even when it really is perverted.

The mixed messages are enough to drive anyone mad. Men are bombarded with the admonition that they are supposed to be kind, honest, chivalrous, respectful, and gentle, but men who are naturally like this find themselves rejected time and time again, only to watch women run into the arms of thugs. Why? Because most women now resent the non-committal dandy that they invented. They instinctively revert to their desire for a strong, stand-up guy, but there are very few good models for this type of man left these days. So, women settle for any superficial display of strength or power as the next best thing. Of course, attraction to wealth never went out of style, but good character is seen as weakness and usually ignored, despite protests to the contrary. Actions do indeed speak louder than words. The exceptions to this rule are the relationships comprised of a domineering woman and her male lap dog. These men either lack or have suppressed their natural male traits in order to be deemed worthy of the woman's acceptance. These variations tend to be regional but the net effect is a profoundly diminished quality of life for all.

Parenthood

[quote]I could not point to any need in childhood as strong as that for a father's protection. – Sigmund Freud[/quote]

Loving fathers are systematically torn from their families, branded as deadbeats, and treated like criminals in family courts. We accept this as if it's just the natural order of things. It isn't. And yet we still hold the notion that papa was a rolling stone, when in fact a much larger percentage of women actually initiate divorce than men, forcing the fathers of their children out of his own home. In the minority of cases when men leave their marriages, we assume that he's a jerk for abandoning his wife. When the woman leaves, we still assume that she had no choice because, once again, he must be a jerk. All of this is accepted with absolutely no evidence; just an automatic assumption that flatters women and insults men. Men are the targets of this "damned either way" bias in almost every kind of situation. Even more shockingly, more than twice as many women than men neglect, harm and even kill their own children, especially after moving in with a man other than the biological father. Yes, you read that right.

Despite these facts, we do not err on the side of caution by systematically taking children away from the majority of decent mothers. Instead, we ignore the statistics and do the reverse, because we mistakenly assume that it must be the reverse. Why? This is justified in part by a baseless theory about the breastfeeding bond between mother and child superseding any possible bond between fathers and children, even long after children have long since moved on to solid food. It is also regarded with a nod and a wink as a kind of ad hoc reparation for perceived injustices against women elsewhere in society, such as the aforementioned debatable wage discrepancies. And so children become the bargaining chip, with the insulting justification that such decisions are made in the children's best interest. Wink, wink.

However, reverse the genders and there would be riots in the streets. Take children away from a mother simply because the father decided that he needed to leave his wife to go "find himself" along with his kids in tow? Laughable, unless the mother is caught selling crack on the schoolyard— and even then we would wring our hands trying to understand what unbearable stresses could push a poor woman to do such a terrible thing, when even a good man would receive no such consideration. Instead, decent, loving fathers are forcibly removed from their children every day without as much as a shrug, often for no better reason than the woman's whim. Ask any man who has experienced this if it is any less heartbreaking than it would be for a woman and you are likely to see a grown man break into tears, not to mention his children. This is how callously and systematically the family court system not merely permits, but is actually geared to goad already fragile families into devastation, and is really at the heart of the whole matter.

Also, birth control options for women far outweigh the options for men. Choices in birth matters is regarded as the woman's alone; and yet still the man's burden depending on the choice that she makes without his wishes carrying any weight whatsoever. Yes, it is her body that will or will not be pregnant for nine months, but his desire to be a parent or not for the next eighteen years and to bear the financial burden or not is completely disregarded depending on her whim. When a sperm bank becomes an equally viable or even preferable alternative to an involved father, then clearly no one any longer takes the consequences of raising fatherless children very seriously. But the results are in and the naïve social experiment that elevated single mothers from shame to glorified sainthood can be declared an unmitigated disaster.

There was once a good reason why it was considered shameful for an unmarried woman to get "knocked up" and raise children on her own. Now, women should never feel shame for anything they do, however careless or selfish. Where single motherhood was once considered a tragedy, it is now considered a perfectly viable or even admirable choice. However, the epidemic rise of drug use, teen pregnancy, gang violence, depression and suicide all correlate precisely with the increased absence or marginalization of biological fathers from the lives of their children. Once again, this is not a coincidence or an unintended side-effect. I assert that it is undeniable case of calculated and predictable cause and effect, and raises the disturbing question of who really benefits. I'm still getting to that. In the meantime, I contend that the system is critically broken and that we can do so much better.

Rite of Passage

[quote]Ah, yes, divorce… from the Latin word meaning to rip out a man's genitals through his wallet. –Robin Williams[/quote]

As mentioned, most children are raised in broken homes because far more women than men are abandoning their marriages. I can almost hear the feminists cheer at this "victory" but, but the noble cause of equality is just a decoy and the ramifications are much farther-reaching. The devil really is in the details. Of the aforementioned majority of divorces initiated by women against their first husbands, only a very small percentage of those are for serious reasons like abuse or infidelity by the man. In most cases, "irreconcilable differences" is a meaninglessly vague euphemism for "she's liberating herself from the institution of patriarchal oppression." But is that really what she's doing?

It has instead become a rite of passage for women… an initiation to womanhood. You're not really a liberated woman until you've abandoned at least one devastated beta male in the dust to either "trade up" or go "find yourself", with or without kids in the picture. Even if he was the most loving, supportive husband in the world, simply claim that he was "controlling" and that you felt "trapped", or that he left the toilet seat up, and the sisterhood will all nod in unison, "just like a man." I guess it just wouldn't be as satisfying or meaningful to find herself before ruining a few other people's lives in the process. This is accepted and even encouraged as the woman's prerogative to change her mind without moral accountability to anyone that her almighty whim might harm. The fact that she never thought of this before willingly entering the marriage is ignored or explained away as her having been too young and naïve to know what a terrible trap she was getting herself into… you know: stuck with a hard-working man who loves her and provides for her. She can't execute the symbolic act of liberating herself until she has first willingly entered a union that she can only then vilify as her prison. The fact that she may cause irreparable harm to others in the process is an acceptable casualty at best; or perhaps it is even a badge of honor at worst.

