However, the question has never really been whether a woman has the right to choose. The real question is (or should be) how well she chooses. If women truly want to see themselves as equal to men in society (as they should), then they must be held to the same standard of accountability for the choices they make as men are held, and not expect to be forever coddled like children taking their first baby steps into the real world.

Pop Culture

[quote]All propaganda has to be popular and has to accommodate itself to the comprehension of the least intelligent of those whom it seeks to reach. –Adolf Hitler[/quote]

There are countless examples of propaganda in the media that reinforce these skewed views. Despite feminists' complaint about unrealistic images of thin, sexy women in the media, every romantic comedy is about some immature rogue who can't commit until he meets the right woman. Every sitcom (and commercial) is about an overweight idiot married to a beautiful, mature, intelligent, sophisticated woman who treats him like a child. Practically every Disney movie since the 70s has been about a plucky, independent young heroine proving herself in some way.

Recently, the bestseller book "Eat, Drink, Pray" and subsequent 2010 film starring Julia Roberts was lauded as a landmark of feminist aspirations but what was it really all about? An attractive, successful, married, middle-aged woman abandons her perfectly decent, loving husband to go on a year long quest to "find herself", only to ultimately learn that she has selfishly pushed away every man who ever loved her. At least she had a great time in the process while her poor ex was left in anguish— but who cares? It was her adventure and a vicarious fantasy for every married woman in the audience who ever felt a twinge of restlessness. Now, reverse the genders and make the main character the husband who does what Julia did. He would be seen as an irresponsible, selfish villain and everyone would sympathize with the ex whose part is pretty much over after the first 20 minutes.

In the blockbuster 2012, John Kusak asks his ex-wife Amanda Peet if she really loves her new husband. She answers, "I love him enough", which clearly means that she tolerates him because he's a better provider than the father of her children, whom she left. This is considered to be a perfectly reasonable answer. Now reverse the genders. If a man gave the same answer when asked if he loves his wife, then that would not definitely not fly with modern audiences as an acceptable reply for a likeable guy. He'd be a real jerk for admitting that he married a woman for convenience. Like so many double standards that give women a free ride that men are denied, it is accepted as a small retribution for some other contrived offenses.

These are only a couple of examples that recently caught my attention out of countless others. For anyone interested, I suggest counting how many television commercials for a wide variety of products and services follow this formula. Apart from selling products, what's the overarching message?

The Rhetorical Trap

[quote]Anger is never without an argument, but seldom with a good one. –Indira Gandhi[/quote]

Like a religious devotee suffering from a crisis of faith when exercising a bit of common sense, any man who raises these questions is immediately attacked for challenging the politically correct status quo. He is branded a chauvinist, or as a whining, humorless crybaby who can't take a joke and doesn't know how good he has it compared to women, or as a loser venting his sour grapes. After all, if you are presumed to have all of the advantages, then you should be able to take a few hits and have no reason to complain, or so the reasoning goes. And if you do complain, you are not being "manly". Men should be stoic. Men should take their lumps. Men's feelings don't get hurt, or at least don't matter compared to women's feelings. Men are the oppressors, and so have no credibility to complain. There's no vacancy in the victim hotel, and men are to blame. It is the classic ad hominem logical fallacy designed to keep men silenced about any injustices they endure.

Instead, you have the occasional hard working quiet family man who just snaps one day and shoots up the post office. Now let's do a little soul-searching to really understand what terrible stresses could push this poor guy to the edge: Perhaps if he only had the opportunity to voice his frustrations just once in the way he heard the women around him do every single day, then such tragedies might be averted. Just a thought.

No Good Deed Goes Unpunished

[quote]All I ever seek from good deeds is a measure of respect. –Walter Annenberg[/quote]

Despite being the target of all this hostility from women, most men silently nod and continue to say and do whatever it takes at all costs to appease women's bottomless well of demands. They will go along with the common platitude that "she's always right", even with all the derogatory jokes about what clueless pigs men are. They will not question the notion of how much more sensitive, nurturing, intuitive, intelligent, and spiritually enlightened women are compared to men, who are always presumed to be inept, immature, knuckle-dragging goobers who lie, cheat, and need to be treated like one of the children by their flawless wives— if they are lucky enough for a woman to tolerate them at all. And so, in either ignorant bliss, the desire for acceptance, or fear of ridicule, most men play along with the burden of trying to impress women, while women maintain their posture of trying to remain unimpressed without even the courtesy of showing up on time, or at all. And which men get the shortest end of this stick? The ones who offer the least resistance… the "nice" guys who least resemble the negative stereotype.

Women often seem to do this with smug, almost perverse satisfaction as if they are cashing in their retribution chips against men— against any man, and yet for exactly what offenses, and to what end? Such small victories ring hollow. There are a lot of bitter, divorced, middle-aged women out there who have never once let down their guard to show genuine appreciation for the decent men in their lives. Let's not underestimate how much they are suffering too— not because of how awful men are, but because of how awful they think men are. This myopic view becomes their own personal hell. Unwittingly, a woman who believes that she is justified in "getting one over" on the men in her life ends up suffering just as much, if not even more in the long run, and worse: causing her children to suffer too. No one wins. Well, almost no one.

Life Out of Balance

[quote]There is more difference within the sexes than between them. –Ivy Compton-Burnett[/quote]

All of this preferential treatment toward women on the surface would seem to be with good intentions. But if you really think about it, the message actually undermines everything that feminism would logically advocate. Rather than women being able to do anything men can do, it actually reinforces the message that women are helpless victims who need to pressure men into feeling guilty so that they will grant special concessions to women—presumably because women are incapable of succeeding otherwise. The false message is that men's power is the only power, so women should feel inferior unless they can pilfer men's power and become more like men. This is actually the opposite of "empowerment". It negates women's true feminine power and natural dignity as women, as well as attacking men's masculine power. It's like a social short circuit.

Paradoxically, men are now also made to feel guilty and inferior for the very same traits to which women now aspire. So, the bizarre logic is that it is a virtue for women to be more like men, but it is shameful for men to be like men or like women. This is obviously no good for men, but it really doesn't help women either. They may claim some petty victories, but this ultimately keeps women dependent, in a childlike fantasy world where they can get whatever they want (or what they think they should want) by being aggressive, whining, manipulative, or insisting on changing the rules; and it keeps men in a constant, weakened state of guilt, confusion, and contrition for their natural instincts to be manly. If women can't compete successfully with men in arenas where men excel, then we must rig the game.

In conversation with women friends about men's frustration about never knowing what women want, some of the more sympathetic ones have admitted to me, "I don't blame men for being frustrated since we don't even know what the hell we want most of the time."

The hidden message in the jargon of "empowerment" is that you are powerless until someone else rigs the game for you. It's like affirmative action and special Olympics for women. You'd think that any self-respecting woman would see through the insulting condescension of this, but they don't because it offers the path of least resistance toward an artificially contrived goal, under a banner of false righteousness. It's like the trifecta of manipulation. Madison Avenue would be proud (or should I say is proud?)

The net result of all this actually undermines both men's and women's dignity, strengths, self-awareness, and autonomy over their own lives to follow their true nature as long as they accept the fallacy that each gender should suppress their natural instincts and strive to be more like the other. Sure there will always be some exceptions to the majority, which is fine for them, but we now act as if the exceptions must be the rule for everyone. As far as we may think we have "evolved" intellectually or socially, we are still biological creatures operating to a great extent on instinct. This is not a bad thing. It is a supreme conceit of human ego to think that gender is an arbitrary contrivance to be methodically altered based on some passing social trend. Rather, it is our nature; it is DNA, hormones, biology, and instinct. We are suffering by attempting to suppress it based on some misguided social theory.

As Jeff Goldblum said in Jurassic Park, "Nature finds a way."

Acknowledging Skepticism

[quote]Do not let yourself be tainted with a barren skepticism. –Louis Pasteur[/quote]

So, as a man who believes that this subject is in dire need of closer examination, how can I present my case without inviting the same kind of derision directed at every man who has ever attempted to voice similar ideas? I'm not sure that I can. But I can anticipate the ridicule and point out what I believe really motivates it. This extends far beyond my personal experience with a sympathetic view toward all concerned: men, women, and children alike. My purpose is not to complain or to make an appeal for sympathy. It is to shed some light that I believe will benefit all concerned.

Why?

[quote]Why shouldn't truth be stranger than fiction? Fiction, after all, has to make sense. –Mark Twain[/quote]

If you begin to even consider the validity of this entire premise, then the next question to ask is: why would a presumably enlightened, modern society that has made such great strides against racial discrimination so systematically undermine the natural dignity and respectability that both genders once took for granted? A militant feminist will predictably assert that men have brought this upon themselves and declare that the end of the argument. Now, let's look at it from a non-dogmatic perspective. My theory is not for the faint of heart. In fact, it is rather chilling and based on well-documented historic facts. It may seem at first like a long leap of logic, but the parallels between past and present are uncanny, so please bear with me.

Historic Precedent

[quote]Dictatorship naturally arises out of democracy, and the most aggravated form of tyranny and slavery out of the most extreme liberty. –Plato[/quote]

Back in 1712, a man named William Lynch gave a seminal speech to a coalition of Southern Plantation owners on the bank of the James River. The speech was titled, "The Making of a Slave". In it, Lynch described in explicit detail a systematic approach to psychologically "breaking" a population of people so that they will remain obedient and docile.

The simple premise was "divide and conquer" at the level of the most intimate family bonds.

The first and most important step was to weaken the strongest link. Remove the father from the family unit and brutally humiliate him in front of his woman and children. We've all seen "Roots". Remember?

The next step was to give the woman more decision-making power than the man, especially regarding children, yet always under the control of the master. Children raised under these conditions were deprived of any strong male influence except the master. Women learned to despise their own men's weakness and consequently form a stronger allegiance to their captor, the master. Sex between masters and female slaves was commonplace. Whether it was forcible or consensual was ultimately usually irrelevant under the circumstances. Much later, this phenomenon was recognized as the Stockholm syndrome in which a group of kidnapees grew to identify with their captors. The first generation of male slaves were killed or maimed beyond any ability to fight back, but the next generation of boys grew to be more compliant, usually through brutal "whippings" from their own mothers, inflicted to avert even worse beatings from the masters.

This became a mindset and a way of life so deeply instilled that it persists in black American culture today, 300 years later. How many African American women really respect African American men, even in this day and age? Very few. This is the legacy of Lynch's system that he actually predicted. And now, this malignant mindset has spread far beyond the descendents of African slaves throughout all of society in America.

The Conspiracy

[quote]Where justice is denied, where poverty is enforced, where ignorance prevails, and where any one class is made to feel that society is an organized conspiracy to oppress, rob and degrade them, neither persons nor property will be safe. –Frederick Douglass[/quote]

Fast forward to the Civil War, emancipation, and then further to the civil rights movement. Slavery is abolished. The economic system that built this nation and depended on slavery was on the verge of collapse. Bankers and wealthy land owners needed to think fast. They figured out that they could continue a form of legal economic slavery as long as they didn't call it that. Just employ the same techniques that Lynch taught, but in more subtle ways throughout the whole society, not just against a single minority group. Open Ellis Island to the largest influx of poor, immigrant worker classes in history with the lure of a chance at a better quality of life in America. Undermine the dignity of the father in the family unit, if not through torture, then through industrial mechanization, economic oppression, and seductive propaganda. Make the ordinary man obsolete as an authority, even in his own family and useful only as an obedient worker… all legally. The dystopian visions of Orwell and Huxley were not that far off the mark. The only subtle but important difference is that we have replaced the chilling bleakness Orwell's cautionary tales with Huxley's placebo of banal consumer comforts and dream of a shot at the glamorous life. "You can never underestimate a population's appetite for distraction."

And yet the ultimate irony and insult to women is that much of the feminist agenda that they so religiously espouse is really part of a sinister plot devised by a very small group of very powerful men to control the masses by undermining the family unit. They simply planted the seed, and let it play out. Divide and conquer, just like prison guards maintaining their authority by fueling hostility among the inmates. So yes, the real oppressor probably really is male, but it is a very small, elite group of powerful men whose existence and directives are far below most people's radar. The rest of us ordinary men in women's lives however, are not the enemy. We're really all in the same boat.

The Cost

[quote]It is the logic of consumerism that undermines the values of loyalty and permanence and promotes a different set of values that is destructive of family life. –Christopher Lasch[/quote]

The scheme is working. A vast population of the working class is keeping the top fraction of a percent of the wealthiest elite in power, with the recent exception of the Occupy movement. We are the 99%. However, the general public is usually too docile and distracted by consumer media to recognize their own plight or to ever consider a revolt. Instead, most wave their banners in blind allegiance to the powers that be. At what cost? At the cost of the most basic and fundamental social unit upon which the pursuit of happiness depends: the intimate bonds of the intact family. The only difference now is the vast scale and that the "master" is now the faceless godlike entity of corporate capitalism and consumerism. In contrast, husbands and fathers who were once the heroes of their families are now reduced to a punch line.

We believe in things more than we believe in each other. We cheer for our sports teams, for our armies, for our movie stars, for our politics, for our religions, and for our precious cars, fashions, and gadgets— but not for each other. We are allowing our greatest asset— our families— to be sabotaged from within. This is undeniably the brave new world that we live in today. It has not always been this way, nor must it remain so.

As Krishnamurti said, "It is no measure of mental health to be well adjusted to a profoundly sick society."

Conclusion and Prediction

[quote]The sexes were made for each other, and only in the wise and loving union of the two is the fullness of health and duty and happiness to be expected. –William Hall[/quote]

Now, here we are in the midst of the worst economic crisis since the great depression, an epidemic of foreclosed homes, broken homes, and a general atmosphere of malaise and mistrust between the sexes. None of this is an accident. We have been led like sheep to this much weakened place. How can anyone with a merely average sense of decency look around and fail to see that something has gone seriously wrong?

Now, the question is whether it is possible for us to gain the collective awareness to recognize it, to see the bigger picture, and as a population of intelligent and decent men and women, reclaim our dignity and the family bonds that once made us strong as individuals and as a nation? The present course is clearly unsustainable. I predict that the pendulum must start swinging back. There will be a shift in coming decades back toward a healthier respect and appreciation for men's strength, dignity, wisdom, and roles as beloved husband, father, provider, protector, wise authority, and hero, at least in some sectors. When critical mass is reached, then this reawakening will become universal.

Just like the apologetic state that men are in today, there may even come a period of female atonement in which they will express contrition for their formerly misguided hostility toward the men in their lives. Mutual empathy, compassion, and respect between men and women for our strengths as well as for our differences will become the norm and families will once again become strong and stable. This is the true source from which social and economic recovery will "trickle down." Of course, there must always be acceptance for alternative family models including blended families, single parent families, and gay couple families. However, the standard prototype of husband, wife, and children will resume its rightful status in the pantheon of stable family models. Feminism will dissipate and be replaced by the more inclusive “humanism.”

For all the die-hard feminists who will misinterpret this as some veiled attempt of reinforcing their imagined shackles of female subservience, please. You were never a slave to men and certainly no one is forcing anything on you now. Are you so insecure as to think that any positive relations with men must be synonymous with oppression? Is that what you call empowerment? If you are really happier alone with your cats, or at least without any positive relationships with men, then that’s always your choice. But as the minority, you don’t have the right to speak or choose for all women. In your own philosophy, women more than anything else have the right to choose what’s best for them. Those many choices must include the choice to take the most natural path in the world: to become truly invested in creating a healthy, happy, strong family… to know the contentment of finding herself right there, without shame, and to stay, for better or worse.

We have mustered the collective mobility to occupy Wall Street. It is now time for the 99% to turn that collective focus back to our homes and families.

Pierce Harlan is a fucking jerk

John Hembling (JtO) · 22 January 2012 · Archived copy · Original

In case you don't know, he's the bastard who runs the falserapesociety website. It's a site featuring thousands of news stories in which women, for reasons ranging from boredom to sexual frustration – level false rape accusations against men. In a majority of these cases, the falsehood of the accusation comes to light soon afterward, and although the falsely accused have been arrested, fired from their jobs, blacklisted, severed from their kids, assaulted, driven out of communities and had their lives generally ruined, the false accusers usually skate away without consequence.

The stories of false rape claims are culled from main stream news sources all over the english speaking world, and Mr Harlan has, on his website, collected a damning body of evidence of the obvious hazard of contact with women in the absence of reliable witnesses or secure video surveillance.

Most recently, Harlan ran a story about a woman in Scotland who after being rejected in her sexual advances, vented her frustration by charging the man who refused sex with rape. The story would not be a story if police had not noted inconsistencies in her account. The woman, Lisa Wright, confessed to police after 4 days that the story was fabricated. She was sentenced to 210 hours of community service. (about 5 weeks of work).

This was obviously not the first such story I had read. Nor was it the tenth, or the hundredth. The details vary, but in every such story culled from mainstream reporting, there is a monotonous repetition of theme. A woman, for widely differing, but uniformly trivial and petty reasons concocts a rape allegation, and a man's life, reputation, family, career and personal life are permanently ruined. Then she is discovered in the lie and flutters away with a token slap on the wrist. Sometimes the police will even issue a statement, admonishing other women not to issue their own false accusations. The reason given is not because it destroys the lives and families of innocent men, but that it wastes police resources, and most terribly, throws doubt onto actual victims of crime. The reason to not field a false rape allegation is never because it will destroying an innocent man's life.

After reading the endless torrent of mainstream reporting collected under one banner on Harlan's site, http://falserapesociety.blogspot.com/ I can no longer deny the evidence and treat women as if they are not all potential predators. And I'm bitter. Fuck you Harlan – this is your fault.

As a rational human being, I can no longer enjoy the company of women without a permanent vigilance. My knowledge of the ease of a false accusation, and the blind eagerness of communities and law enforcement to grind up men so accused without a hint of forbearance. The automatic media publication of men accused, but not convicted, the automatic sheltering in anonymity of women issuing accusation, safely free of accountability. In such a climate, a colleague, a friend, an in-law, if female must all be treated as potential hazards. It would be irresponsible and suicidal to allow a woman into my car, without a trusted third party as witness. I find it now fatally irrational to allow a new female acquaintance into my home without secured electronic surveillance. All because Pierce Harlan couldn't leave the truth alone.

It is mortally dangerous to ever offer assistance to a woman in need of it, unless a number of trusted witnesses are also present. It's obviously hazardous to even tell a woman the truth, or tell her anything except the most bland, and expected flattery, and then quickly depart her company. So who is to blame for this unhappy state of affairs? Pierce Harlan, that asshole.

Now, obviously, not all, and not even most women are likely to spot an opportunity for trivial advantage or entertainment from devastating a man's life through false accusation. However the easy and nearly total absence of consequence for this commonly documented behavior indicates that for men, women should be avoided at all costs. Not just avoided, but ignored, in cases where they may be in distress, shunned. If, for example a woman's car breaks down and she calls a towing company, the tow truck driver is better served to quit his job than to assist her without witnesses or his own video surveillance.

If pizza is ordered and the delivery driver happens to be female, a safe course would be to turn off the house lights and wait in silence until she's gone away. For male drivers delivering to a woman home alone, the hazard might be unavoidable without aggressively interrogating customers as they place their orders on the phone, and refusing service to women. Of course, all of this sounds extreme and paranoid, but in a culture and a legal climate increasingly eager to discard due process for men accused, and protecting false accusers from consequence, ameliorative measures become increasingly necessary.

Most people working in the restaurant and bar industry will be aware of the fairly common phenomenon of young women, in company of a group of female friends drinking themselves into a state of blackout. Whether this is due to their youthful belief in their own immortality, or a culturally induced sense that everybody else in the world is there to serve and protect them from consequence is a matter for speculation. However, men doing the job of doorman, or bouncer, or even bartenders and serving staff are pretty routinely called on to deal with a blackout drunk, vomiting, or passed out girl who got too excited and drank herself stupid. Rather than helping such passed out girls to a chair, or loading them into a car to be driven home or to an emergency room, its advisable in a climate of easy accusation to just put orange highway cones around a girl passed on in the street so she's less likely to be run over by a car, and not move her out of traffic. Such action might be used as the basis for a rape accusation.

And very clearly, the the fault for all of this necessary self preservation belongs to Mr Harlan. If he hadn't collected together and presented so much mainstream news reporting of the free for all blood sport that false rape accusations have become – men would be able to live lives of carefree abandon. Well, until they were charged with molesting the female grocery-bagger, or sexually harassing a passing dental hygienist. It's Peirce's fault that feminine, socially-approved and ritualized male destruction is impossible to ignore. So, Mr Harlan, thanks a lot, you jerk.

I now envy other men, those that can see all this information and still live in denial. I don't know how they do it. No matter how many times I try to pull the wool back over my eyes, I still see it all, thanks to – that guy. No matter how many blue pills I try to choke down I still end up with all this knowledge gnawing at me like a rat on a piece of cheese.

So once again, Mr. Harlan, thanks for making a cognizant mess of my life, but rest assured no matter how much you do over there at FRS there will be men who remain happy and ignorant, right up till the time the cuffs are slapped on.

I wrote this piece with the intention of exaggerating to make a point, and realized, half way through writing that I was not exaggerating.

All this goodness is pissing me off

Paul Elam · 23 January 2012 · Archived copy · Original

I have always been a person that thrives on dissent. When reasonable and considered it's a good, human check and balance for what we choose to believe. It puts what we think under a microscope and lets us put the ideas of others to the test as well. And, importantly, it staves off the forces of conformity and groupthink that so often lead us to mindlessness, feminism and really confused websites.

With that in mind I welcomed, prompted rather, the exchange here with writers at the Good Men Project regarding the question of what makes a good man, and indeed if we are making an egregious mistake by even asking it.

I challenged Tom Matlack, Lisa Hickey and other GMP writers to answer one simple question, which I pose here again:

Please inform us of anything, one single quality, that you think constitutes a part of being a good man – that does not also apply to being a good woman.

Tom, Lisa and someone named Jackie Summers all took their shots at answering.

I can only think of one thing that near adequately characterizes the responses. For those of you old enough to have seen the movie Cat Ballou, summon from your memory the image of Lee Marvin, cross-eyed drunk and hanging half-off his equally shit-faced horse, clutching the saddle horn with one hand and trying to shoot the side of a barn with a gun he barely held in the other…and missing.

Yes, he actually missed the side of the barn, but he came closer to the target than any of these people did to directly and concisely answering one really simple…fucking…question.

First, let's take Tom's "answer," if you really want to call it that. After playing patty-cake with his keyboard for a while, saying squat, he finally cuts to the fail:

> My personal definition of being a good man means trying to make more good decisions on a daily basis than bad. It means showing up for my wife and kids even when it's not easy. It means trying to help someone else out of generosity rather than greed. It means telling the deepest truth I am capable of. And it means forgiving myself when I fail.

Sometimes I want to cut a foot-long piece of razor wire, run one end though my lower lip, and then yank it back and forth like I was trying to start a friction fire, just to not have to feel how painful it is to deal with this kind of bullshit.

Tom? TOM!! You didn't answer the question. Fuck sake man, you didn't even try. Every word you said could equally apply to a woman – these days even the part about coming home to a wife.

I am sorry. Really I am. Because if I am going to make myself believe that you were trying to answer the question, then I have to assume you are not smart enough to understand what I was asking, or maybe not smart enough to read a complete sentence. But I never thought you were stupid, and still don't. It appears, though, that you think I am.

Since Tom wouldn't, couldn't, answer the question, let's take a look at what Jackie Summers, a "big scary black guy with bowling balls for shoulders and tree trunks for thighs," had to say, assuming he didn't damage his keyboard with his jack hammers for fingers.

He did no better job than Tom. Actually, it was worse because in addition to the scary-bad metaphors about his body he also forces us to stomach a redundant stream of 5th grade level platitudes and Peter Pan observations. So says Summers:

> Bad men exist. This is undeniable.
> This is because bad people exist, and men are a subset of people. The world has always had bad men, because the world has always had bad people. Men who hurt. Men who maim. Men who kill.
> Good men exist. Also undeniable.
> This is because good people exist, and men are a subset of people.

The second time he said that "men are a subset of people," my eyes started playing tricks on me. The article started to look like it was written in crayon. God knows it sounded like it.

I do understand, though, Jackie. I also have to repeat the fact that men are people all the time, usually to people like you, but that is a different story. Also, the simplified version of good and bad is so off the mark that it puts termites in your tree trunks. Men who kill and maim are only bad when they are not killing and maiming the right people, such as those with brown skin and oil deposits. The real good men are just future corpses. Really bad men are self-defined. Guess which group I'm in?

Relying on a Mr. Rogers approach getting his "points" across, Summers avoids the question entirely and cuts right to the core of the problem by demonstrating that the problem is, indeed, him.

Dig this from The Teach.

> The world has always had good men, because the world has always had good people. Men who heal. Men who protect. Men who would sacrifice their lives and limbs for the greater good.

Ahhh, the "greater good." The great, masculine meat grinder of history. I wonder again if it occurs to Jackie that frequently those men who sacrifice their "lives and limbs" are often the same ones doing the killing and maiming. But, I digress.

As I said, you won't find an answer to my question within a light year of Summers' article, or even any indication that he read the question. The theme, though, which he repeats with as much annoyance as he does the startling and edgy fact that "men are subset of people," is simple; Men are expendable because "that's how we all survive."

He supports this by pointing out that in a dicey situation, his size, which he directly ties to his sex without actually saying so, make him the odds on choice for protecting any weak little women in his immediate area.

Welcome to the world of Jackie Summers, everyone. Please set your watches back 50,000 years, or at least back to the time before technology made self-protection an equal opportunity responsibility. By the way, Jackie, that was about the same time, at least according to all the patriarchy theorists, that "good" women were chattel and not much valued past their ability to close their mouths and open their legs at the same time. Such is the extent of the quazi-patriarchal pablum you have dished up to your readers; another reminder that it really is about chivalry, no matter how much you try to hide it behind what passes for postmodern enlightenment.

You, in virtual lockstep with GMP editorial slant, are simply an advocate for how best to exploit men in modern times.

I could write almost endlessly on the symbiotic relationship of old world chivalry and feminism, and how GMP has always been intellectually paralyzed by the dissonance that creates, but I'm already up to my waist in waste. So let's get 'er done before I have to start cutting that razor wire.

As I said, Tom didn't answer the question at all. Jackie wrote as though the question never existed. That leaves Lisa Hickey, who actually answered the question, but apparently without the benefit of being aware of it. She says:

> While there may be nothing inherently different in being a "good man" or a "good woman", there are plenty of ways in which society tries to trick us into believing there are.

Gee, you mean like “The Good Men Project”? Jesus, where did I put those wire cutters? Lisa Hickey has just told us not only that there is nothing inherently different in being a “good man” or a “good woman,” but that anyone suggesting there is a difference is tricking us.

Irony’s a motherfucker, innet?

And that pretty much sums it up; a trio of chances, a triumvirate of abject failure. The only thing left is why.

Ms. Hickey came here and commented, somewhat to her credit, in response to this challenge and said:

> I posted a response to Paul’s challenge as well. You may all hate The Good Men Project, but you can’t say we aren’t willing to engage.

Disregarding the accusation of hate for the time being, that is 100% correct, but keep in mind that Hugo Schwyzer “engaged” with Tom Matlack, as did Amanda Marcotte. I have engaged people like David Futrelle, who is loathe to hit a keystroke that would contribute to a word of truth. Simple engagement is not proof of integrity, but how you engage certainly can be.

What matters in this bad man’s opinion is engaging meaningfully; in dealing with questions and criticisms directly and honestly. Anyone can ask meaningful questions about the content of this site and our mission here. They can attempt to shoot holes in any of these articles, and they may be able to. Regardless of the possible findings, we will respond to those challenges head on. I have immense pride in that, and it is one of the reasons we have a very popular men’s website, with mostly male readers.

GMP’s failure to practice that same integrity is the explanation for their failure in this exchange. Men are not their target audience, just their target, and it shows.

Ms. Hickey, you said that you were not here to make friends or be liked by people, and so far that is working out very well. But it is not, at least in my case, because your ideas suck so badly. It is because your whole shtick does.

From engaging but not honestly, to auto-refreshing your site to artificially inflate your traffic position and advertising impressions, to running a men’s website that has trashed men more than understanding them, and encouraged men to sacrifice themselves more than solve their problems, all for the sake of a buck, you have literally begged for disdain. We may live in a shitty, relativist zeitgeist, but integrity is not so far out of style that lacking it can’t hurt you.

If it were not for the false advertising, it would not bother me so much. In your About Page, it says, “The Good Men Project is not so much a magazine as a social movement.”

How many phony page impressions does it take to make a movement?

Silly me, am I asking questions again?

I really do have hope that recent events at GMP are a good sign of times to come, that you really are, as you claim, embracing a policy that requires you to listen to your male readers, all of them, and react accordingly. Perhaps if you actually do that enough you will end up with interest from a male audience. Anything is possible.

But I also know that I have been reminded in this exchange that you have a great deal yet that you need to hear, not the least which is a lot of good people still respect honesty more than they do a slick angle.

Manufacturing victimhood, marginalizing victims

Alison Tieman (Typhonblue) · 24 January 2012 · Archived copy · Original

Toxic victim-consciousness is the process by which women are made into a class "acted upon" by emphasizing a disproportionate victimhood where none actually exists or isn't proven.

In "Women Do Not Benefit: The Science", I outlined how toxic victimhood limits women and socializes them to undermine their own achievements. Toxic victimhood promotes the perception that women are "acted upon" rather than actors. When a society is promoting toxic victimhood, there is no need to limit women overtly through legal, financial or social restrictions. Instead women will limit themselves through their own mental foot-binding.

Here I will look at a recent and very successful effort to manufacture toxic female victimhood whole-cloth, the CDC's 2010 National Intimate Partner and Sexual Violence Survey.

The much publicized figure on rape from this survey is that 1 in 5 women versus 1 in 71 men are victims of rape in their lifetime. (If the rate men are raped is reported on at all.)

Let's see exactly how the female-as-victim juggernaught churned this nugget out.

Question: When is Rape Not Rape? Answer: When a Rapist Uses Her Vagina

The first thing to note is that the NIPSVS decided that men being forced to have sex with women isn't rape. Let's think about this again. The NIPSVS finds that men are the majority perpetrators of rape. 98% of female rape victims and 93% of male rape victims had a male perpetrator. A woman shoving her fingers up a man's anus is rape, but a woman shoving her vagina down on his penis is not. The latter is not classified as rape, but as "made to penetrate" and is placed in the category of "other sexual violence".

Logically, if you define rape as penetration, but not envelopment, you are going to end up with an arbitrarily large number of male rapists compared to female rapists.

Rape could easily be redefined as forced envelopment, which is exactly as arbitrary as the NIPSVS's redefinition of rape. In that case we would find that 80+% of rapists are female. Which is as fatuous a finding as the reverse.

So why are significantly more men then women rapists and significantly more women raped then men? Because when women rape using their vaginas it's not rape, it's "other sexual violence".

Men are the vast majority of rapists and women are the vast majority of victims because rape was defined in such a way to make sure that this was so.

The Real Risk of Rape in the Last Twelve Months

It should be noted the NIPSVS presents no statistics on male victims of rape through penetration for the last 12 months. This is interesting because the 2000 National Violence Against Women Survey found that 0.3 percent of women and 0.1 percent of men surveyed said they were raped via penetration in the previous 12 months.

The NIPSVS says: "The estimates for male victims raped by other types of perpetrators were based upon numbers too small to calculate a reliable estimate and therefore are not reported."

The NIPSVS surveyed 18,000 people; The NVAWS surveyed 16,000. Did the risk of rape of men by other men take a nose-dive between the NVAW survey and the NIPSVS survey?

Luckily the NIPSVS did track the risk of "made to penetrate" for men in the last year. It was 1.1%, identical to the 1.1% of women "made to envelop".

If the act of forced envelopment is correctly classified as rape—namely a woman forcing a man to have sex using her vagina, the vagina being one of the two most commonly used instruments of sex—then you get an equal risk of rape between men and women in the last twelve months.

An equal risk of rape between men and women in the last twelve months.

Why then, is the lifetime risk of rape so different?

Men Rape; Women Are Raped

Researchers into the field of traumatic memory recovery note that the longer the period of time a person is asked recall a traumatic event, the less likely they are to remember it. How this works is that surveys that ask about a traumatic event in the last six months get less false negatives then those that ask about a traumatic event in the last twelve months which, itself, gets considerably fewer false negatives then lifetime prevalence.

For men this effect is even more pronounced.

> 16% of men with documented cases of sexual abuse considered their early childhood experiences sexual abuse, compared with 64% of women with documented cases of sexual abuse. These gender differences may reflect inadequate measurement techniques or an unwillingness on the part of men to disclose this information (Widom and Morris 1997).

Only 16% of men with documented case histories of child sexual abuse disclosed that abuse on a survey intended to capture child sexual abuse. Sixteen percent of men compared to sixty-four percent of women.

That amounts to a disclosure rate of child sexual abuse four times higher in women then in men.

Is it any wonder that the CDC's 2010 survey (correcting for their mis-categorization of female-on-male rape) found that 18.3% of women and 6.2% of men were victimized over their lifetimes?

Comparing the lifetime rate of sexual abuse for men and women is misleading in determining their relative risk of sexual violence, simply because men disclose childhood sexual abuse four times less often then women.

There may be many reasons for this. It's unlikely that it's due to sexual abuse being less impactful on men because studies have shown that sexual abuse does have a profound impact on men, and this includes female-on-male sexual abuse. For instance, the link between sexual abuse and suicide attempts is stronger in boys (Rhodes et al. 2001) and sexually abused boys are twice as likely to commit suicide (Molnar et al. 2001) than sexually abused girls. In addition to that, there is a risk factor for sexually abused men to sexually abuse others is if their abuser was female (Salter et al. 2003.)

One possible reason for men not disclosing, or even "forgetting", is quite simple: our social narrative does not allow for, nor does it depict, the sexual abuse of males. To a degree it allows for the sexual abuse of boys by men, but not boys by women or adult men by anyone.

In a study on the effects of retention interval and gender on the perception of violence, Ahola et al. (2009) found that eyewitnesses rated female perpetrators less violent than male when reporting after an interval of one to three weeks as opposed to ten minutes. Ahola et al. (2009) proposed that over time eyewitnesses reinterpreted the behavior of perpetrators in order to conform to gender stereotypes regarding violence.

Widom and Morris (1997) propose that a similar process is occurring with male victims of sexual abuse (particularly by females) as, over time, they reinterpret their victimization to conform with the dominant social narrative regarding sexual abuse: that it happens to women and is perpetrated by men. They will do this by reframing their abuse as consensual or as a rite of passage or less violent than it was or by "forgetting" it completely. The more time passes, the more our memories conform to the dominant social narrative.

> Gender differences in reporting and in perceptions of early childhood experiences may reflect early socialization experiences in which men learn to view these behaviors as non-predatory and non-abusive. Many of the sexual experiences considered to be sexual abuse (showing/touching sex organs, kissing in a sexual way) may be seen as developmental rites of passage, part of a learning process (Widom and Morris 1997.)

Note that this “forgetting” does not mean that there is no psychological effect; only that the source of that effect is buried, becoming a silent trigger for self-destructive behavior.

The Real Ratio of Male to Female Rapists

If we look at the more reliable statistic, the risk of rape in the last twelve months, and we fix the NIPSVS’s mistake in classifying forced envelopment as “other sexual assault” and not rape, we find that 80% of men report a female rapist and 98% of women report a male rapist.

That works out to 40% of rapists being female and 60% being male. A far cry from 95+% of rapists being male.

Instant Female Victimhood, Just Add Media

The cautious and least sensationalistic position to take based on the NIPSVS’s findings is that men and women are most likely at an equal risk of rape and that the proportion of male to female rapists is not significantly gendered. [1]

But this is obviously not what anyone really wants to hear. Instead, the NIPSVS manufactured a non-existant female victimhood by first redefining rape to exclude the vast majority of female-on-male victimization. Then mainstream media (and other parties interested in female victimhood) followed up by selecting the statistic most likely to be fraught with reporting error while completely ignoring the more reliable statistic that suggests parity and further ignoring the ratio of female to male abusers (40/60) in that more reliable statistic.

And so from a survey that strongly suggests that neither rape victimization nor rape perpetration is significantly gendered, we get a resounding shout of ‘MEN RAPE/WOMEN ARE RAPED!’

Men act, women are acted upon.

And the juggernaut rumbles on.

[1] The moderate skew in favor of male rapists may just be an artifact of using female interviewers. We won't know for sure until a survey is done that doesn't require male victims of female aggressors to disclose their victimization to a female interviewer. Likely the NIPSVS used female interviewers preferentially in order to capture as much female victimization as possible; the logic being that women would be more likely to disclose to another woman.

Walter Romans (TDOM) · 24 January 2012 · Archived copy · Original

Recently Paul Elam at AVfM challenged the staff of The Good Man Project to define the “Good Man” as an entity differing from a “Good Woman.” He wanted to know specific qualities unique to men. Three of them took up the challenge and according to Paul, they each failed There found nothing, no quality at all that was unique to men.

This is the very question that brought me to the men’s movement. I was in search of a modern definition of masculinity and what it means to be a man, specifically, how that differs from being a woman. Is there anything unique about men? I have made some strides in this area, but I too have failed. My best attempt thus far was recently posed in my series Redefining Masculinity. I conclude the third article in that series stating:

“The general expectation that a man must not only earn his own way, but provide for and protect, and sacrifice himself others (society in general and women and children in particular) is unique to manhood. Women may freely choose to do these things, but are not looked down upon for choosing alternate lifestyles that require no such sacrifice on her behalf. This places an extreme burden upon men that is not placed upon women. It is certainly unfair and may be considered oppressive. The Zeta Male will reject the sacrifice as it pertains to others, but not to himself. The Zeta will require himself to earn his own way as he knows there will be no safety net as would be provided to women. Thus for a man to be a man, manhood requires a man not only to choose his own path according to his personal values, but it also requires that he earn his own way.”

However, aside from the differing societal expectation for men and the safety nets provided for women, any woman may also choose her own path according to her personal values and earn her own way. Therefore it also fails to indicate anything inherently unique about men.

To answer this question one must first identify those human behaviors that are unique to the male of the species. Since men and women are more alike than different, every possible human behavior that can be performed by members of one sex can be performed by members of the other. That is every possible behavior except those concerning reproduction. Men cannot be mothers. Women cannot be fathers. These behaviors are unique to each sex.

This, of course, does not mean that there is not any crossover in responsibility and/or function, but each performs those responsibilities from a different perspective. This begins with mate selection, the act of reproduction, and the division of labor performed in child-rearing.

In the pre-industrial age these activities were defined more by biological functioning and ability than anything else. Women get pregnant, men don’t. Women can nurse young children, men can’t. Men on average grow bigger, stronger, faster, and have greater lung capacity and endurance than women. These simple facts, more than anything else, made it more suitable for women (rather than men) to remain in or near the home where they could care for young children. They also made it more suitable for men (rather than women) to leave the home to acquire basic necessities. In the modern era, technology has made it possible for each to assume large portions of the roles of the other in this regard. However, the basic differences in males and females remain, only the roles have changed.

These differences lead to the social contract of marriage, a contract which has been adopted by nearly every successful society in one way or another. This contract allowed the formation of the basic unit of human society; the family unit. It also delineated the roles of the two heads of the family and their responsibilities to themselves, each other, and their children. These roles were frequently codified in various societies at one time or another. Even when they were not codified, they generally were incorporated into cultural expectations, practices, and traditions. They also provided for smooth and orderly transfers of wealth, property, and power as well as providing for social safety nets for individual members of the society.

For instance, men were expected to marry and to provide the basic necessities for their wives and their offspring. Women were also expected to marry and produce offspring. These roles were complimentary and meant that the adult male, the adult female, and all children were provided for. The basic obligation of both men and women was to their offspring and future generations. Because of this, most societies developed a patrilineal system of heritage in which the sons inherited property from their fathers and in which daughters were handed over to their husbands' families to be provided for. While the basic fairness of such systems could be argued, they were undoubtedly necessary for smooth transitions in societies at a time when biological limitations could not be overcome and basic resources were scarce.

With the onset of the industrial age basic resources have become increasingly plentiful and biological limitations were, for the most part, overcome. However, the basic obligation to offspring and to future generations remains to ensure the survival of the species, just without rigid sex roles once needed to ensure survival. While the act of reproduction continues to require both a male and a female, only the female is required for gestation of the fetus. Once born, care of the infant can now be performed equally well by either sex. Further, technology and the evolution of society have made it possible for the female to produce sufficiently to provide for the care of her offspring and herself in the absence of the male. This makes the social contract of marriage obsolete as it has traditionally been executed. This has resulted in the disintegration of the traditional family unit and the dissolution of obligation of female to male as well as male to female, leaving the only remaining obligation as that of parent to child.

To this point I have shied away from discussion of the traditional male role as protector in favor of discussion of the male role as provider. It is now time to discuss the role of protector as it has applied to both men and women.

The larger physical size and greater physical ability of the human male combined with the greater vulnerability of the female (especially while pregnant) made him more suitable for the task of protecting himself and his family from threats to their physical well-being. The nearly unlimited reproductive capacity and inability to nurse young children of the male compared to the limited capacity of the female and her ability to nurse also made the male more expendable to the family unit than the female. Therefore it was only natural that the male take on the role of primary protector. The female also shared in this obligation, but typically as a last line of defense. As societies grew to include multiple families, the male obligation was expanded to include the protection of society as well.

The technological advancement that came with the industrial age has negated some, but not all of this difference, though it is likely to overcome it entirely at some point in the future. At present, however, the male remains better suited for the role of protector of society than the female. Thus the male obligation to society would appear to still exist. But does it? Perhaps a better question is, should it and should the female assume at least part of this obligation?

It is in this obligation (conferred by a natural sex role and biological difference) that the one measure of manhood as opposed to womanhood continues to exist. Via the biological difference in physical stature and ability between the male and the female, the male remains obliged to be the protector of society. The female has assumed no such obligation, though she may freely choose it or not.

Thus the one remaining sex role for the female is to give birth. The one remaining sex role for the male is to protect society. All other sex roles have been made obsolete by technology. They may now be defined as gender roles (socially, not biologically constructed) and can be maintained or discarded according to the values of any given society.

But the question is should the male continue to take on this role? In modern society the one remaining obligation for women is to produce the next generation. However, in many societies women are permitted to opt out of this obligation. Social convention, birth control, and legalized abortion each permit any individual woman to choose not to become a mother. In these modern societies motherhood is no longer viewed as the measure of a woman. In fact, womanhood appears to have no yardstick by which to measure it that makes it significantly different from manhood. One might say that womanhood no longer exists in these societies. It has become personhood. Any woman can be replaced by any man at any given time in the societies that have released women from their one remaining obligation. Of course for a society to do so would mean that over course of a generation, that society would cease to exist.

The results of this can already be seen in western societies where birth rates have dropped below replacement rates and immigrants are required to maintain population levels and economic strength. The consequence being that the society is slowly eroded and replaced over several generations.

Would a similar destructive process occur if a given society were to permit the male to abdicate his obligation as that society's protector? Western societies have not yet permitted men this luxury, yet they have begun a process of vilification of traditional male sex roles that discourages men from fulfilling this obligation. The result has been the disintegration and erosion of societal values, culture, and tradition. The breakdown of the family as the foundation of society has met with tragic consequences. Fatherlessness has been associated with any number of societal ills. The recent instability of the economy may also be a symptom. While it could be argued that this may fall more under the purview of the provider role, it might also be argued that the role of provider is a sub-role of protector. Thus it would appear that should men abdicate their obligation as protectors, the result would be just as destructive to society as the abdication of obligation by women as reproducers. It is doubtful that any society can survive the abdication of obligation of either role, let alone both.

But does the protection of society (or the family) require men to sacrifice life or limb? In modern society it certainly could, but should not. There are many ways to protect a society (or a family) and each of them allows a man to fulfill that role. In my latest definition of masculinity, I stated that this obligation "places an extreme burden upon men that is not placed upon women." I also stated "manhood requires a man… to choose his own path according to his personal values…" I would now state that the man's biological imperative to protect society is what differentiates manhood from womanhood; that he may not abdicate this obligation; but the way in which he chooses to fulfill this obligation should be consistent with his personal values and will ultimately define him as a man.

While a woman may choose this path, the biological imperative does not exist; therefore this choice may define her as a person, but not as a woman. Masculinity becomes personal according to this definition and its values and ideals vary according to the individual man. A single definition encompassing all of masculinity becomes impossible, but an individual definition remains necessary. There is no one masculinity, but many and each points the individual man in the direction to fulfill his biological imperative.

AVfM Radio: The incarceration of America

Paul Elam · 26 January 2012 · Archived copy · Original

[box]Tonight AVfM Radio pays homage to the work of Kyle Lovett and returns with JtO and Paul Elam discussing what is happening in the criminal justice system in America, and indeed in the world at large.

For tonight, blue pill listeners with think that both JtO and Paul have contracted with the Stetson Company, who has produced an AVfM Special Edition 10 Gallon tin foil hat that they will both be wearing during the broadcast. This stuff is that "out there." Also, however, it is all 100% true.

Some facts to consider before listening:

1. More people are incarcerated in the United States than any other industrialized nation.
2. Most of those imprisoned are for non-violent crimes, such as drug offenses and failure to pay child support.
3. Congress is currently engaged in turning over the penal system to private contractors.
4. Those private contractors are subletting the labor produced by those incarcerated to other corporate entities.

Add to the mix that we are now undergoing a massive expansion of what is considered criminal conduct in men, from having sex with an intoxicated woman to simply asking for sex and getting it, and you have a prescription for as much tyranny we have ever seen in American history outside of Jim Crow.

Other countries are following suit. Australia, Sweden and India have all begun adopting laws that ultimately undermine any notion of civil rights for men and could well land men in prison, committing crimes that no civilized society has ever considered unlawful.

Kyle Lovett to appear on Dad's on the Air

Paul Elam · 26 January 2012 · Archived copy · Original

[box]An announcement of tonight's episode of AVfM Radio will be coming out in a couple of hours, but first a different sort of radio announcement.

AVfM's research editor Kyle Lovett will be appearing as a special guest on Dad's on the Air Radio, the longest running radio program regarding men and fathers in Australia, and likely the world. Kyle will be talking about the upcoming legal Kamikaze attack on men in Australia, a subject he has extensively researched and written about here at AVfM for the past several weeks.

Also on that show will be Barbara Kay, a Canadian columnist for the National Post. Kay often produces some very sound critique of feminist perspective on issues like domestic violence.

The show airs on Tuesday, January 31, and a link to the broadcast archive will be made available here after the episode airs.

Many thanks to Kyle for his continued efforts to put this information in the spotlight.[/box]

Colleges push anti-male sex policies to the edge

Pierce Harlan and Paul Elam · 26 January 2012 · Archived copy · Original

On a daily basis on this Web site, one story about injustice to men cascades upon the next, until they collapse of their own weight to form a sort of dark and twisted kaleidoscope of misandry. It is little wonder that readers sometimes find it difficult to tell the difference between bad news and awful, appalling, and dreadful news. This post is about awful, appalling, and dreadful news.

There is an unprecedented effort underway on college campuses across America to re-engineer male sexual conduct in a grossly misguided effort to construct a female-friendly sexual utopia. More and more colleges are punishing men for engaging in a form of consensual sexual behavior obtained by supposed emotional or verbal "pressuring." They call it "sexual coercion," and it sanctions men not for forcing themselves on, or physically threatening, women, but for doing nothing more than nagging for sex. Men are being punished for doing precisely what, for decades, society has been telling them they're supposed to do — ask for sex.

Readers who have sons in college, or whose sons are about to enter college, need to check the school's sexual misconduct policy. If it punishes students for sexual coercion, those readers need to express their acute displeasure to the school's administration and board of trustees. Get specific. Relate the things mentioned in this article and see if they can refute any of it.

Sexual nagging is now a punishable offense

Sexual coercion is a nebulous, amorphous blob of a concept that is defined in myriad ways. No rational person questions policies that punish sex procured by physical threats. That's not what we're referring to here. The policies at issue go far beyond this and punish men (even though they are couched in gender neutral terms, make no mistake: the policies are meant to police male conduct) for sex procured after "unreasonable" verbal or emotional pressuring.

The import of these policies must be clearly understood: even though the woman agreed to have sex, the school can invalidate her manifested assent by later deciding that the man's conduct in obtaining it was too boorish, too overbearing, or too insensitive. Most importantly, for the first time, men are being held responsible for sexual misconduct even though their "victims" have reasonable alternatives to engaging in the sex act but choose not to exercise them.

If that sounds like so much spin from a men's rights blog, or if it sounds too far-fetched to be true, don't trust us. Look at an example given by Brett Sokolow's NCHERM, the organization that advises colleges across America on their sexual misconduct policies. If there is a sexual grievance industry (and there is), NCHERM is General Motors and Apple combined. In NCHERM's Model Sexual Misconduct Policy, found here http://www.ncherm.org/documents/MODELSEXUALMISCONDUCTPOLICY1-10.pdf, adopted in whole or in part by many colleges, the following example appears, which is as chilling as it is legally and morally misguided:

> Amanda and Bill meet at a party. They spend the evening dancing and getting to know each other. Bill convinces Amanda to come up to his room. From 11:00pm until 3:00am, Bill uses every line he can think of to convince Amanda to have sex with him, but she adamantly refuses. He keeps at her, and begins to question her religious convictions, and accuses her of being "a prude." Finally, it seems to Bill that her resolve is weakening, and he convinces her to give him a "hand job" (hand to genital contact). Amanda would never had done it but for Bill's incessant advances. He feels that he successfully seduced her, and that she wanted to do it all along, but was playing shy and hard to get. Why else would she have come up to his room alone after the party? If she really didn't want it, she could have left. Bill is responsible for violating the university Non-Consensual Sexual Contact policy. It is likely that a university hearing board would find that the degree and duration of the pressure Bill applied to Amanda are unreasonable. Bill coerced Amanda into performing unwanted sexual touching upon him. Where sexual activity is coerced, it is > forced. Consent is not effective when forced. Sex without effective consent is sexual misconduct. p.9

In NCHERM's example, Bill "convinced" Amanda to give him a hand-job — he asked, and she agreed. She willingly stayed in his room for hours, apparently listening to his boorish and pathetic entreaties. Amanda had a reasonable alternative to engaging in the sex act but chose not to exercise it: at any time she was free to say "good night" and to get up and leave. She didn't do it. Yet Bill is responsible for Amanda's choice? Come again?

Giving a horny college guy a hand-job because he wants it, or to shut him up, or because the woman wants to foster a relationship with him and sees that as a way to do it, is not sexual misconduct in any setting other than the rarefied, über-PC halls of academia. Bill may be many things – boorish, immature and even selfish – but based on the limited information available to us in NCHERM's example, he is not a rapist and shouldn't be punished because he asked for sex in a way Amanda later decided was offensive.

Until now, rape law has never been a clearinghouse to redress every less than ideal sexual encounter. Katie Roiphie once summed it up in a landmark New York Times piece: "With their expansive version of rape, rape-crisis feminists are inventing a kinder, gentler sexuality. Beneath the broad definition of rape, these feminists are endorsing their own Utopian vision of sexual relations: sex without struggle, sex without power, sex without persuasion, sex without pursuit. If verbal coercion constitutes rape, then the word rape itself expands to include any kind of sex a woman experiences as negative."

NCHERM's example, above, accomplishes the seemingly impossible task of insulting both genders at once: it insults men by telling them they are akin to rapists even when they ask and get permission for sex, and it insults women by suggesting they are not free moral agents capable of saying "yes" when they want sex, and "no" when they don't. It is political correctness with a hard-on, radical feminism run amok.

Fatal legal impediments

There are at least two fatal, insurmountable legal problems with this kind of "sexual coercion." First, it punishes acts that are, by any rational standard, consensual. Second, prohibitions against sexual coercion do not pass due process muster because they are not sufficiently definite to warn the accused that he's violated a policy.

Consent. Consent in the rape milieu has its roots in contract law, and it is there that we need to seek guidance. Not all agreements formed with apparent assent are legally binding. Duress is a common law concept employed to invalidate contracts due to the absence of the kind of freely given consent that society has decided is necessary to bind people to their promises. The classic example is a loaded gun pointed at someone's head with a threat that "either your brains or your signature will be on the contract," per Don Corleone. A contract is voidable for duress if (1) the victim's manifestation of assent has been induced by an improper threat, and (2) the victim has no reasonable alternative except to manifest assent.

NCHERM's brand of "sexual coercion" fails on both counts. Asking for sex is not an improper threat, and being able to say "no" and to get up and leave the guy's room is a reasonable alternative. End of inquiry. Big Sister needs to get out of the bedroom.

The aforementioned approach isn't some loony invention of a misogynistic, far right, Neanderthal, men's rights bogeyman. To illustrate how extreme NCHERM's policy is, note that legal scholars sympathetic to the feminist rape agenda accept the approach referenced above – because it is the only approach that works: "When a complainant believes that he or she does not have any alternative choice but to submit to unwanted sexual demands, even a verbal 'yes' does not necessarily indicate genuine consent." M. Buchhandler-Raphael, The Failure of Consent: Re-Conceptualizing Rape as Sexual Abuse of Power, 18 Mich. J. Gender & L. 147, 183 (2011). The example cited by the legal scholar to support this proposition is a case where a woman gave a teen male and his friend a ride home. When they stopped in a secluded area, the teens told her she would not be able to leave until she had sex with them, so she ostensibly gave her permission. Assuming that she reasonably felt threatened by the young men's words, as the legal scholar seems to accept, the woman's ostensible consent was fatally tainted because she had no alternative but to engage in sex. That example is in a different universe than NCHERM's, and it underscores how extreme NCHERM's policy is.

Due process. Our criminal law is not a guessing game. A valid criminal statute puts the public on clear notice as to the conduct that is forbidden. "A penal statute, . . . to be valid, must be sufficiently definite to show what acts the legislature intended to punish." William Lawrence Clark et al, A Treatise on the Law of Crimes at 59 (1996). This is a component of due process. "The test is whether the language conveys sufficiently definite warning as to the proscribed conduct when measured by common understanding and practices." Jordan v. DeGeorge, 341 U.S. 223 (1951). A law that does not meet that standard is unconstitutionally vague.

College sex policies should not be free-floating standards of purported wrongdoing and should not punish rape "in the air." Fundamental notions of fairness dictate that college rules of conduct be sufficiently definite to warn the accused when he's in violation of them.

Look at NCHERM's definition and decide for yourself if you can pinpoint when sexual coercion occurs. According to NCHERM's Model Policy: "Consent cannot be procured by . . . coercion. Coercion is unreasonable pressure for sexual activity. Coercive behavior differs from seductive behavior based on the type of pressure someone uses to get consent from another. When someone makes clear to you that they do not want sex, that they want to stop, or that they do not want to go past a certain point of sexual interaction, continued pressure beyond that point can be coercive." (Page 7) The model policy further states: "There is a difference between seduction and coercion. Coercing someone into sexual activity violates this policy just as much as physically forcing someone into sex. Coercion happens when someone unreasonably pressures someone else for sex." (Page 2)

Let us analyze. What does "unreasonable pressure" mean in a culture where sex roles of pursuer and "hard to get" have been fairly divided along gender lines for eons? The guy can ask for sex, but he can't ask too much, and he might be expelled if he crosses some indistinct, blurry line that's about as clear as a dense New England fog. Does a "no" at 7:00 o'clock mean the topic of sex is off-limits? For how long? Until 10:00 o'clock? Midnight? The entire night? When does asking become nagging? Does the policy prohibit any nagging for sex whatsoever? Is a little nagging acceptable? At what point does a little nagging become excessive nagging? When will one more nag be enough to expel a young man? When does "seduction" magically turn into "coercion"? There is no mistaking midnight for noon, but at what point does twilight become night?

To say that the contours are fuzzy is an understatement. No one — no one — can be sure at what point the line is crossed. As a law, it is unworkable nonsense. As a policy, it is grossly unjust to men and insulting to both genders.

Actual school policies

Here is a sampling of schools that follow the NCHERM definition, or otherwise include "coercion" in their definitions of "consent" — and this list is by no means exhaustive. It's the tip of the iceberg to illustrate the breadth of the effort to punish sex procured by verbal or emotion pressuring:

Some schools parrot the NCHERM model policy (page 7) definition of coercion, above: Colorado State University-Pueblo; Loyola University Chicago; Franklin University.

Other schools parrot page 2 of the NCHERM model policy: Kean University ("There is a difference between seduction and coercion. Coercing someone into sexual activity violates this policy just as much as physically forcing someone into sex. Coercion happens when someone unreasonably pressures someone else for sex."). Notre Dame College also buys into NCHERM's "coercion" versus "seduction" distinction: "Consent cannot be procured by use of physical force, compelling threats, intimidating behavior, or coercion. Coercion is unreasonable pressure for sexual activity. Coercive behavior differs from seductive behavior based on the type of pressure someone uses to get consent from another."

Other schools attempt, without success, to better define the parameters of "coercion": Gettysburg College's definition is singularly unhelpful and stretches the limits of vagueness: "Coercion exists when a sexual initiator engages in sexually pressuring and/or oppressive behavior that violates the norms of the community, such that the application of pressure or oppression causes the object of the behavior to engage in unwanted sexual behavior. Coercion may be differentiated from seduction by the repetition of the coercive activity beyond what is reasonable, the degree of pressure applied, environmental factors such as isolation and the initiator's knowledge that the pressure is unwanted." Dickinson College employs language almost identical to Gettysburg College's definition.

Trinity University has a definition of "coercion" that requires men to be mind-readers: "There is a world of difference between seduction and coercion. Seduction implies that both people involved are 'playing the same game.' Coercion on the other hand occurs when one person does not want to 'play along.' Seduction becomes coercion; coercion begins not when the sexual advance is made, but when someone pushes past the point of realization that the person does not want to be convinced."

Other schools punt and leave the definition of "coercion" up to amorphous "reasonable" standards: University of Vermont ("Consent is communicated either by words or clear, unambiguous actions that are not achieved through manipulation, intimidation, fear or other acts that a reasonable person would construe as coercion.") Columbia's policy provides: "The use of coercion in instances of sexual assault involves the use of pressure, manipulation, substances, and/or force." The policy handbooks of some schools just mention that "coercion" is prohibited without bothering to try and define it: Dennison University; Marquette University; Clemson University; Syracuse University; Duke University; Wesleyan University.

Kansas State University is, at least, honest in acknowledging that by prohibiting sex by coercion, it is going beyond the commonly understood definition of "sexual assault": "The Kansas State University policy prohibits not only those acts commonly understood to constitute 'sexual assault,' but also all attempts to coerce sexual activity. Individuals can be in violation of the Kansas State University policy without being in violation of the Kansas legal statutes."

A policy bordering on pathology

Transmogrifying "sexual coercion" into a punishable offense has been a feminist dream for decades. "Sexual coercion" has its roots in an extremist feminist tradition of rape advocacy that encourages purported victims to engorge the definitions of "rape" and "sexual assault" to include all manner of alleged violations that are neither "rape" nor "sexual assault." Time once famously wrote: "Catherine Comins, assistant dean of student life at Vassar, . . . sees some value in this loose use of 'rape.' She says angry victims of various forms of sexual intimidation cry rape to regain their sense of power. 'To use the word carefully would be to be careful for the sake of the violator, and the survivors don't care a hoot about him.' Comins argues that men who are unjustly accused can sometimes gain from the experience. 'They have a lot of pain, but it is not a pain that I would necessarily have spared them. I think it ideally initiates a process of self-exploration. 'How do I see women?' 'If I didn't violate her, could I have?' 'Do I have the potential to do to her what they say I did?' Those are good questions.'" Time correctly noted: "Taken to extremes, there is an ugly element of vengeance at work here. Rape is an abuse of power. But so are false accusations of rape . . . ." See here:
http://www.time.com/time/magazine/article/0,9171,1101910603-157165,00.html

Writer Joanne Jacobs aptly explained: "In the largest survey of campus date rape, 43 percent of women classified as rape victims had not realized they'd been raped." Was this because women were hesitant to label rape as a crime? "Hesitant to label rape a crime?" Ms. Jacobs scoffed. "No, they were hesitant to label having sex 'when you did not want it because you were overwhelmed by continual arguments and pressure' as rape, which is what happened to most of the 'victims.' They weren't raped; they were nagged."

Writer Sarah Overstreet once wrote: "Our college students need the tools of personal power and responsibility, not a false definition of rape. So do we all. Lacking the skills or confidence to resist verbal coercion doesn't make it a crime."

By allowing the lunatics to write policy for the asylum, we've tumbled down a rabbit hole so dark and deep it will be difficult to climb out. For decades we've preached that when a woman says "no," the man must stop. Now we are telling young men that when a woman says "yes," they are still rapists because they didn't ask in a politically correct manner. They've trivialized sexual assault to the point that women who truly do not have reasonable alternatives except to give in to sexual abuse are being lumped in with women who merely regretted the exercise of their own free will the morning after. Is it any wonder that so few outside the feminist community believe there is a campus rape crisis? And is it any wonder that young women are not reporting these "offenses"?

The latter point, strangely, is the only saving grace. While colleges are reimagining "proper" male sexual conduct in an effort to construct a progressive, supposedly female-friendly, sexual utopia, why aren't many more men being punished for "coercion"? The reason "coercion" policies are not expelling college men in massive numbers is because college women, largely, aren't buying the notion that their male peers are predators, and they aren't reporting the men's "misconduct." Heather MacDonald summed it up: "One group on campus isn't buying the politics of the campus 'rape' movement, however: students. To the despair of rape industrialists everywhere, students have held on to the view that women usually have considerable power to determine whether a campus social event ends with intercourse."

Still, though, the fact that policies are in place to allow women to use the power of a college tribunal to punish men for being nothing more than sexual naggers is unjust in the extreme.

At their core, these campus policies are premised on a smug, PC elitism that seeks to smack down what their purveyors regard as undeserved male privilege. They are making a statement that masculinity itself must be changed to make campuses less burdensome for the "historically oppressed" gender. We have sadly reached the point where American colleges prefer to punish, by suspension or expulsion, a male student who convinces a woman to have sex, rather than put the women through the bother of just saying "no" and walking away if she doesn't want to do it. That is a policy bordering on pathology.

The real question is, why in the hell are parents tolerating it?

Lessons from nature: Brain in a vat

Stephen Jarosek (aka Codebuster) · 27 January 2012 · Archived copy · Original

In this somewhat tongue-in-cheek article we examine the difference in intelligence between men and women. The normal bell curve distribution is often addressed metaphorically to describe women's distribution in parameters like intelligence as being taller and narrower, while that of men's is flatter and wider. This essentially makes the point that men occupy a wider variation on parameters like intelligence; from incredibly dumb to incredibly smart, while women occupy a comfy medium. There is less variation in performance and abilities among women than there is among men. It turns out that, on average, the intelligence of men and women is the same.

This is all well and good, except that there is another dynamic playing out in gender differences. There is something called sexual dimorphism. [11] This is a term from the mainstream biological sciences where the male and female evolve to acquire different phenotypic traits. And in the case of intelligence, there are actually grounds to infer that provided-for women who never have to do anything except shop shop shop, text text text and dance dance dance finish up actually losing their intellectual capabilities. In their provided-for lives, without moral responsibility, their brains actually appear to rot. They do become dumber. In order to appreciate why this should be so, we need to dump the mainstream evolutionary psychology (EP) paradigm grounded in genocentrism. [5] If this offends genocentrists, then be warned. Muff your ears and cover your eyes. This article is not for you.

Habits of indulgence

Men and women value attractiveness in women. Especially within the Anglosphere, a woman's entire worth is established almost exclusively on her physical appearance and how she packages it. The EP crowd have an explanation for the importance of female beauty. They will blather on about attractiveness as being an indicator of health, superior genes, etc. Meanwhile, the Game and PUA community worship beautiful women at the Altar of the Vag, and women who can package themselves to look attractive enjoy privileges and entitlements that are not extended to those women who either fail to pay attention to their packaging, or for whom no amount of packaging can salvage.

But there is one dimension of womanly existence that is never taken seriously, especially within our current zeitgeist, and that is a woman's intelligence. Personality may rate to some extent…her readiness to laugh at men's jokes, her social savvy, her ability to get drunk just like men do, her ability to establish belonging within a huge group of girls, etc. But these are aspects more related to group-think and conformity rather those deeper qualities that we associate with intelligence… such as curiosity, integrity, skill, commonsense, courage, etc. This raises a most important question. Can the disconnect between beauty and brains ever be reconciled? In terms of universal possibilities, I'm confident that it can; in terms of human life on Earth and our current trajectory, the answer is no, it cannot. Trying to reconcile the beauty-brains disconnect within the context of our zeitgeist and culture is a fool's errand.

Atrophy of the mind

It is well established now that PUAs, as performing seals begging for fish, routinely work themselves into a lather about what women think of them, and then construct elaborate strategies to demonstrate to their objet de l'amour that they don't care what women think of them. The extent to which women's opinions matter is proportional to where these women rate on the attractiveness scale. The unspoken rule is that the opinions of nines and tens are weighted more than the opinions of fives and sixes, while the opinions of ones and twos are weighted probably nothing at all. There is no rational reason for this instinctive association between attractiveness and credibility. It's a subconscious reflex, a bias.

This manner of thinking comes about because of the EP paradigm and the genocentrism on which it is based. Women who are deemed to be attractive are valued more, and so game theory extends the fantasy by rationalizing that they must also be "better" at other things, such as intelligence. These "higher quality" women demonstrate their intelligence in their social savvy. This is naught but projection, receiving its inspiration from a culture obsessed with female beauty and then attributing to it various assumptions that are unfounded.

But let's take a closer look…What if the reverse is actually true? What if intelligence is more likely to be inversely proportional to attractiveness? There is sound reason to expect precisely this to be the more likely truth. There are various theoretical frameworks available to suggest this; whether they are grounded in religion, customs, psychology, semiotics or science, for example, and within many of these frameworks is the idea that habits play a crucial role in character formation. [6][7][8][9]

Sometimes these habits might be described in terms of "units of imitation", and this brings us to the field of memetics and the spread of memes. [10] Where do these habits, or memes, come from? The answer is…culture. The provided-for sex has permission to be, well, provided for. These days, a woman has permission to work (if she wants) or to do nothing (if the fancy takes her). Affirmative action grants her freebies and entitlements to which men have no comparable access. And of course the prettier that a woman is, the more privileges and entitlements she can wallow in. For all her practical utility, she might as well be a brain in a vat.

Traditionally, women's stay-at-home option was a part of the marriage contract, a division of labour that came with responsibilities, from raising and schooling children to domestic and social duties. Implicit within this contract was moral conduct. Sharing the load with her husband, these environmental pressures and the attendant division of labour between the sexes constantly tested everyone at the boundaries between self, family and environment. So imagine how intelligent…not…today's prettiest stay-at-home must be, given that she no longer bears the onus of these responsibilities. Today's provided-for stay-at-home must be the ultimate hippopotamus wallowing in freebies for which she does not have to account. She is a parasite sucking the lifeblood from her clod provider and as useless as a brain in a vat. A brain in a vat is not sustainable – without stimulation from the environment, it is destined to turn to mush.

Now it is true that women often derive considerable stimulation from texting, gossiping, shopping and dancing. However, these forms of stimulation are not comparable to things like fixing a car, creating a computer, composing a work of art, or working out a business strategy. So what do we notice here in the differences in the ways in which men and women think? In women, it's the absence of decision-making. There is no outcome to decide on in the process of texting, gossiping, shopping or dancing, beyond consolidating popularity with your girlfriends or more simply: pure indulgence for its own sake. And while housework and shopping for the family have an important part to play in domestic responsibilities, decision-making is rarely as consequential for women as it is for men.

There are limited risks in deciding on one brand of hairspray over another. For women, there are no consequences for mistakes that are comparable to getting sand in your engine, or misaligning the head of your engine, or messing up a masterpiece, or creating a short circuit on a circuit board, or your opponent getting wind of your strategy. Men have to make things work… often to the extent that it can become a matter of life and death. For women, texting, gossiping, shopping and dancing are not quite as dangerous or risky. Many things that women do can be done in their pyjamas, without even having to venture beyond the front door. Women's activities may stimulate memory and white matter (glia), but they won't stimulate the grey matter…the neurons. Maybe that's why women age so much quicker than men…with the limited stimulation that texting, gossiping and dancing can provide, things must get old for them very quickly.

And here we come up against an essential property of all living things. Namely, a mind that is never tested is a mind that atrophies. Use it or lose it. And it does apply as much to men as it does to women, it's just that men's role as utility device limits their options for being an unproductive parasite. There is evidence that the "use it or lose it" principle is pervasive throughout the animal kingdom.

Sexual dimorphism in the Angler Fish

Feminists will be delighted to read of the apparent role reversal between the male and the female Angler Fish (refer Wikipedia here). [1][2] The female Angler Fish is everything that the "you-go-grrrl" crowd could hope for. She is the embodiment of what feminists project that they notice in men. She patrols the ocean as an independent, free spirit, hunting for her food using the fleshy lure dangling in front of her mouth to attract food. She is the provider, maintaining her modest harem of clingy males in the lifestyle to which they have become accustomed. The differentiated sex roles of the Angler Fish is an example of sexual dimorphism. [11]

It wouldn't be quite accurate, though, to think of her harem of clingy Angler Fish dudes as castrated. Rather, quite the opposite – it's not their testicles that disappear, but their body. Their testicles become the most important aspects of their being. Their only value appears to be in becoming testicles. If we recall Germaine Greer's famous quip describing women as life-support systems for wombs, well, the poor male Angler Fish's mind and body amount to nothing more than a homing device for testicles. Once this homing device for testicles has accomplished its goal – which is to pair up with a female (much like a PUA) – the rest of his being atrophies. His brain, his digestive organs, liver, eyes – everything but his testicles – basically, "poof"…vanishes.

The reason that the human PUA does not atrophy as completely as the male Angler Fish, however, is that though his intelligence, honor and integrity are compromised in his reliance on validation from women; he is a utility device who still has to provide for himself. His somewhat diminished existence continues to be tested in the workplace. His productivity would be rather limited if all that remained of him was a pair of testicles. Now, as disappointing as the PUA is as a human being, his usefulness as a utility device will exact demands of him that will always test his existence at his boundaries. In the case of the male Angler Fish, by contrast, no comparable demands are placed on his survival, because he is fully provided for in the nutrients that he receives from his provider host – his entire identity is thus destined to atrophy, though his testicles will remain. The male Angler Fish, in contrast to the male human, can sustain his existence as a pair of testicles, once he has found true love in Angler Fish heaven.

So what can we make of this, in terms of understanding the nature of human intelligence? The nature of intelligence has always been a source of controversy. How do we measure it? We won't attempt to answer this question in the course of this article. However, we can infer some appreciation of the nature of intelligence by considering the behavioural trajectory of the male and female Angler Fish.

The male Angler Fish, for all intents and purposes, ceases to exist once his testicles, attached to the female Angler Fish, become the last remaining vestige of his being. The female, by contrast, maintains a robust identity, with her body and brain fully developed. Attached to the end of her elongated dorsal spine is a fleshy "lure" that she is able to dangle in front of her mouth. She is thus able to provide for herself. As a provider, her conceptualisations of reality are constantly being tested, and so she maintains a fully functioning mind-body that does not atrophy. Furthermore, not only is she able to fend for herself, but she is also able to provide for her harem of clingy males (up to six at a time), who draw their sustenance from her body at the point at which they first attached themselves, back when their minds and bodies were intact as homing devices for testicles (before they became mere testicles).

So what lessons do we take away with us from the Angler Fish? Firstly, we need to incorporate a systems [12][13] view of life, and the idea that living entities self-organise in order to accommodate the choices they make (this contrasts with the evolutionary-psychology perspective that presumes that everything is accounted for in the genetic blueprint). In this context, the human brain rewires itself to accommodate the choices that a person makes – refer to Norman Doidge [3] and Gerald Edelman [4], and the idea that the brain is a kind of ecosystem comprised of neurons. Provided we accept the systems view, then the following reasoning makes perfect sense:

1) Any living entity whose existence is not tested at its boundary, atrophies. While aspects of this atrophy can be noticed over its lifetime, if the absence of environmental stimuli persists over the generations for all members of the species, then the atrophy becomes especially important to its evolutionary trajectory. If an entity's muscles are not tested, they become flabby. If its eyes are not tested, then, over the generations, they disappear. And of course, if its conceptualizations are not tested, its synaptic connections degenerate, and its brain atrophies, both within its lifetime, and over the generations. Systems theory resonates with aspects of Lamarckism;

2) The sex that provides is constantly having its conceptualizations of reality tested at the boundary. Well-defined physical strength, mental agility, resourcefulness, agency, are resources that are essential to making decisions at the boundary (in this context, "boundary" refers to the point of equilibrium between organisational structure and environmental pressures – an organism is only as muscular or intelligent as it needs to be in order to ensure its survival);

3) The sex that is provided for also has its conceptualizations tested at the boundary, but because being provided for imposes fewer demands, atrophy in comparison to the provider is inevitable.

When pretty is ugly

So, what's the bottom line? Intelligence might be difficult to define, especially given the current state of our life sciences. But the end points of a trajectory can be established with some amount of certainty. The mature male Angler Fish, at the end-point of his provided-for trajectory, for all intents and purposes has no brain. By inference, the mature female human, at the end-point of her provided-for trajectory, has an atrophied brain in comparison to the male. The only way that the human female can avert neural atrophy is by moral conduct, because it is only in moral conduct that her conceptualizations can be tested at any boundary that is comparable to that of the male. It is only in moral conduct that she can realize that there is a price to be paid for indulging in freebies that are not earned.

Affirmative action and the pussy pass in all matters costs men not only in terms of their rights, identity and dignity, but it also costs women in terms of their psychological and emotional development. And so it makes sense that, in immoral cultures where the most "attractive" women are the ones most likely to be provided for, they are going to have the most atrophied brains, they are most likely to find fulfilment as emotionally stunted doormats, and thus the least stimulating company…unless of course you are a PUA, who will linger on a dumb ten's every word as the basis for his validation.

There is, however, a solution to overcoming one's biases favouring "attractive" women. You can do this at a deeper, subconscious level. When you see a "beautiful" woman, learn to see an atrophied brain-in-a-vat. Her visage, insofar as you can extrapolate what lies beneath the makeup, is defined by a featureless topography devoid of the lines that define character. We need to revive ideas that have been practised in various world religions, from Christianity to Buddhism and Hinduism. The modern, pretty, atrophied brain-in-a-vat is a self-obsessed, vacuous, bovine creature that is unlikely to care for sharing in your adventures or hearing what you have to say.

Such is the reality of "attractive" women, at least within our zeitgeist. Men and women value physical attractiveness in women, but many of us value other dimensions of attractiveness, such as character. The idea of an attractive woman with courage, dignity and self-respect is, in the mainstream, logically incongruent. Within the contemporary zeitgeist, with its current moral decline, the combination of beauty and brains is pretty much mutually exclusive. It is a combination that is most likely to be realized only in cultures where men do not put women on pedestals.

CONCLUSION

With the impoverished state of our life sciences, the nature of intelligence has not been settled. This catastrophe is multiplied with the current state of our moral cultural decline. However, not all is lost. We can infer some things about the nature of intelligence from the developmental trajectories of other creatures, at their end points. We've thus been able to establish that organs, such as brains, do atrophy in the absence of stimulation from the environment. Indeed, in the example of the male Angler Fish, we have conclusively established that the atrophy can be virtually complete.

The bottom line is this. If the modern woman seems kinda dumb, well then maybe that's because she really is.

[quote]The idea of jury nullification is generally viewed as an abuse of power by twelve citizens whose only legitimate role is to apply the law as given to them by a judge to the facts that they find in a case. Yet it has not always been so. There are legal, historical, and philosophical arguments to justify a jury's right—as opposed to its inherent power—to nullify the judge's instructions on the law. ~ David Farnham, Former Senior Trial Attorney, Office of Consumer Litigation, US Department of Justice—Civil Division, 1999.[/quote]

[quote]"I consider trial by jury as the only anchor yet imagined by man by which a government can be held to the principles of its constitution." – Thomas Jefferson[/quote]

It has been close two years since I wrote an article, On Jury Nullification and Rape. In it I used all the information I could find to articulate a condensed, 3,500 word examination of the investigative, prosecutorial and legislative components of how we handle alleged sexual assaults within our criminal justice system. That examination resulted in a multiplicity of very disturbing observations. In distilled form, my conclusion was, and remains, that the handling of alleged rapes, from the original accusations, to police investigations, to the ensuing prosecutions, and indeed many questionable irregularities in the laws themselves are systemically wrought with what can only be called corruption.

We have a system that is past broken. False accusations are rampant and go largely unpunished. As documented in the first article, police investigations are often tainted with misconduct or incompetence, as are criminal prosecutions. Rape shield laws have been documented to withhold crucial evidence regarding the credibility of alleged victims, as well as fostering courtroom practices that are clearly prejudicial to juries.

The system is so bad that it rewards and advances prosecutors like Mary Kellett, Jody Vaughn and David Corisica. The list goes on and on, disgustingly, revealing a culture of prosecutorial misconduct where those sworn to seek justice instead go after men they have every reason to believe are innocent, do so unrepentantly, and feverishly resist efforts to correct the injustices they have inflicted on innocent persons.

In a stable, self-correcting society, attention would be drawn to these problems and efforts to ameliorate them employed. Unfortunately, the opposite has happened. In the scant time since I penned the original article, the Supreme Court has ruled that no matter what a prosecutor does; witness tampering, withholding evidence, even suborning perjury, the victim of their crimes has no legal recourse against them.

Add to that the fact that the FBI redefined the meaning of rape after a series of closed door meetings. Those definitions now make consensual sex a rape if the woman has ingested alcohol, even if the man was also intoxicated. Consider, too, that colleges and universities have been instructed by the justice department to reduce the burden of proof in alleged sexual assault cases to the "preponderance of evidence" rule, as opposed to the "reasonable doubt" standard, eliminating the possibility of an accused rapist to get a fair hearing on campus. Where it concerns the allegation of sexual crimes in this country, we no longer have a system of criminal justice. What we have is a system of state induced criminal tyranny that has become a malignancy eating through the fabric of our system of justice.

When the government becomes an instrument of tyranny against its own people, it becomes the responsibility of the people to put an end to it, by whatever means are at their disposal. Fortunately, our founding fathers possessed the wisdom to construct a constitution that empowered the people to do that within the framework of the law.

It is called "Jury Nullification," and it has a long standing history of use within our criminal justice system. Sometimes that use was to poor ends, as when all-white juries summarily acquitted white defendants for crimes committed against black citizens. It has also been used to challenge and protest government actions; to put the law's application, or the law itself, on trial.

[quote]"It is not only [the juror's] right, but his duty … to find the verdict according to his own best understanding, judgment, and conscience, though in direct opposition to the direction of the court." ~ John Adams[/quote]

Jury nullification has been employed in a variety of ways. In the mid 1800's, northern juries practiced nullification in prosecutions brought against individuals accused of harboring slaves in violation of the Fugitive Slave Laws. In the Prohibition Era of the 1930s, many juries practiced nullification in prosecutions brought against individuals accused of violating alcohol control laws. Jury nullification has also been used in cases regarding gun laws and as apparent retaliation for the so called "War on Drugs." Activists for gay rights have encouraged its use against anti-sodomy laws.

It is with consideration of the dire need for legal reform and reconstruction; for accountability of state functionaries and for constitutional integrity in applying the law, that AVfM launches the Movement to End Legal Tyranny (M.E.L.T.). It is now the editorial policy of this website to advocate for all men and women to become educated about the ongoing, systemic corruption it the legal system, and to provide them with knowledge and applicability of jury nullification in matters where the state has lost all contact with the concept of justice.

We will be authoring, and soliciting for, many more articles in the future that address this subject, with the aim of informing fellow citizens that while their "right" to practice jury nullification may be in question, depending on who you ask, the power to practice it is without question in the hands of the juror. When you sit on a jury, you are the law for all practical purposes. That is a critical reality in a time when the legal system has abandoned its responsibility to pursue justice.

The next red pill

Stephen O'Brian · 31 January 2012 · Archived copy · Original

It's going to change EVERYTHING.

The world will not be the same when it inevitably arrives. No, I'm not talking about global warming, or the next recession, or war with Iran or China. I'm talking about new male contraceptives which are currently being developed.

Most exciting is the development of a non-hormonal male birth control pill (NHMBCP) by Prof. Haim Breitbart of Israel's Bar-Ilan University. The professor claims that the pill, when it arrives, needs only be taken once every month, or every three months depending on dosage, and being non-hormonal has no side effects and is also harmless to long term male fertility (being easily reversible upon not taking it). (1) (2)

Of note also is that the Israeli effort is only one of several different kinds of developments taking place concurrently in different countries globally, with a focus on producing a male birth control pill. Such efforts are apparently underway alongside traditional native non-medical approaches in China, Indonesia, India, Brazil, Africa, USA and U.K. (3) (4) (5) (6)

Scour the internet, as I did recently, looking for feminist commentary on the topic of the imminent non-hormonal male birth control pill (NHMBCP) and chances are that you'll find a huge and telling silence. I say huge because I can think of no other aspect of sexuality and reproduction that feminists aren't talking about. Female birth control, conception, childbirth, abortion, adoption – they're all covered extensively from a feminist point of view with articles, academic papers and blogs easily accessible. All of this, yet when it comes to the topic of the non-hormonal male birth control pill, and other forms of male only contraception – wall to wall silence.

Something is up. Something very big I figure.

The answer as to why such a silence exists seems fairly obvious to me as it's contained within the very name of the product itself:

Male non hormonal birth control pill.

Strip some of the words away and you're left with two words that will surely strike fear into the heart of feminist ideologues – "male control". I don't think this is some frivolous exercise in semantics either.

"Male control" – anathema to feminists, who as we know are all about creating and maintaining female supremacy. A fact borne out (sorry, couldn't resist the pun) and skillfully elucidated time and time again on this website and borne out by their willfully ignoring men's plight whilst actively seeking further female advantages plus being silently and tacitly complicit about that process as well. No wonder they are verbally frozen. They know the jig is up.

Here's a quick list of what's on offer for feminists with the advent of the NHMBCP –

- Male pill = end of paternity fraud
- Male pill = reproduction on men's terms
- Male pill = massive drop in the numbers of women being able to become single parents by choice as a lifestyle funded collectively by men
- Male pill = scarcity of sperm. Sperm banks already can't meet demand. This will create much more male 'fertility value'.
- Male pill = increased male political power as men will be able to hold out on reproducing with biologically ticking women everywhere – until men are granted long overdue human rights translated into laws and social conventions which treat men as equals.

Now, I don't think the NHMBCP will be the magic bullet that totally slays feminism. However, I've thought about this topic many times over the last year or so and do strongly suspect though that it will go a long way towards that end. I've reasoned out but a few of the enormous social ramifications of its inception and want to offer some thoughts to open up discussion. I'm glad to see that amongst a few men at least that discussion is apparently already underway. It seems the timing is ripe, as men's concerns regarding reproductive rights is starting to be voiced online.

"The most important point with all of this is now Men can control their own reproductive fate. Now THEY can avoid parenthood for as long as they wish. They cannot be tricked, duped, or fraudulently trapped into unwanted parenthood. HE can now be in control of his reproduction. And don't say that he can be in control right now. It is simply not that easy when a woman states that she is on the pill – and she may be. But suddenly turns up pregnant. In a recent survey in Great Britain >40% of women surveyed indicated they would LIE to their "partner" about birth control if they wanted to have a baby. This is FRAUD! But unfortunately this is legal. And THAT is why this Male Birth Control pill is so important". Davidtoo (2)

"This is the beginning of Men's equal rights in reproduction. Vasectomies are not recommended to young men by medical professionals. With the current state of family law, I predict birth rates will plummet!" Denis (2)

"This pill is going to be the great equalizer for men! Just as "the pill" was revolutionary by giving women control over procreation, finally men are going to get the same. Finally males will have an option to prevent us from being tricked, lied to, and trapped. Far too many men and children in the United States are being exploited for financial and other gain by our incredibly sexist and bigoted society that places no value on fatherhood".
I predict a massive decline in the birth rate, and a much, much, happier life for men" Cyberxen (2)

I think these men are possibly recognizing something related to an evolutionary psychologists view of male and female sexuality too. That view is that historically it's been the case that women produce only a few hundred eggs during their entire lifetime, whereas each man produces billions of sperm daily. Thus the argument goes that females are much more sexually valuable and males much more expendable as one single man could, if need be, impregnate thousands of women. According to the theory, this situation has become further exacerbated by further "egg scarcity" compared to massive sperm production due to the advent of the female oral contraceptive pill and other female only contraception. Currently there are 11 contraceptives for women whilst there are only 2 for men – condom or vasectomy. (6)

But here's the thing I reckon (feminists are hugely silent about this) – What if the situation were, in a way, reversed?

Imagine a world in which millions of men decided to use the NHMBCP. In effect they are willfully, albeit temporarily, making themselves infertile until such time as they decide that social and political conditions are safe enough to breed. What we have then is a scenario in which sperm becomes scarce and eggs relatively plentiful. Men's reproductive value goes up, women's reproductive value plummets. Men then go from being the reproductively weaker and less valued sex to being at least equals or even arguably dominant. That idea intrigues me a lot.

Feminists are fools and despots. We know that.

They obviously overlook and don't appreciate that it was overwhelmingly male brilliance which invented the technologies and systems – democracy, electricity, home appliances, transportation systems, birth control, modern medicine, telecommunications, etc. that freed women from their historically very limited sex roles. I think now, however, they are also tellingly silent about how male invented technologies will inevitably free men up from their own sex roles in the near future too.

I imagine some of this meshes with the huge current social and political drive to get masses of young women educated and on professional career tracks too. For their future under the Western feminist model is very probably not as wives and mothers – not when the power to become such is more and more in the hands of men. Men who are choosing relationship and fertility strikes as weapons for male emancipation (Think MGTOW and Japans millions of young male "grass eaters'). Women's response is another story though, and frankly not one I'm much interested in discussing as I prefer to think about men's future rather than the future of women. Women can sort out their own paths. They have more than enough support to do so.

I think this issue must also mesh with mounting concern about the environmental sustainability of having 7 billion humans and rising on the planet. Consider this from Scientific Progress publication –

[box type="alert" icon="none"]

…men's autonomy is also diminished by the fact that they are usually not responsible for contraception. For many men, neither of the two currently available male contraceptives is well-suited for their contraceptive needs: they want a long-acting, reversible contraceptive. The lack of such options forces many men in monogamous relationships to rely on their partners to contracept. Even when men choose to use the condom, given its high failure rate of 16 percent for typical use, they are still not able to regulate their reproduction as effectively as women, for many female hormonal methods and IUDs have failure rates under three percent. To further decrease the probability of pregnancy, some couples use both the male condom and a female method. But even if men contracept, they are often dependent on women to also use contraception if they want to use a method with a high success rate (and they are not yet ready for sterilization).

This dependence on women reduces men's reproductive autonomy. Men have to trust that their partners are correctly and consistently using contraception. If a pregnancy does occur—either unintended by both partners or when the woman decides to stop contracepting without telling her partner—men have no recourse. Men cannot mandate that women get an abortion. Regardless of the circumstances under which the pregnancy transpired, men are still held socially and financially responsible for any children they father. In some ways it seems unfair to hold men responsible for children they did not want when they are ill equipped to prevent pregnancy.

What men need in order to successfully control their reproduction is the one type of contraceptive they are missing (and that women currently have – Long Acting Reversible Contraception), LARCs. Indeed, the development of male LARCs would enhance men's reproductive autonomy by enabling them to do what women have been doing since the advent of the female pill: effectively regulate their fertility outside of all sexual activity and without their partner's participation or knowledge. Scientists have been working on developing male contraception for the last 40 years and keep saying that these contraceptives are just around the corner. So why are there still no male LARCs? (6)

So will future life for men soon be a LARC? Will we be literally as well as figuratively taking the red pill?

The last cap run

Dr. F (Ian Williams) · 31 January 2012 · Archived copy · Original

Matthew Rudy Anders ran along the narrow path to the beach. The dry sand scooped from his calloused feet made small clouds that hung in the air for a moment only to fall behind him like soft packets of rain falling from a sprinkler.

He was only nine, but "Matty, you can run like the bloody clappers" his father would say, and right now he was running just like the clappers. He didn't know what clappers were but he knew if they were bloody then they must be special.

It was hot and two in the afternoon and he had nearly three kilometers to go before he reached the turnoff to Red Cap Lookout which was the highest point on the coast. He'd done this run hundreds of times before and he knew every stone and every turn and dip before him. In the early days his mum and dad ran with him making sure he could reach the Cap and now he could do it in the dark if he had to. He didn't need Dale but they insisted he come anyway. That was the rule; Dale had to come with him when he did the run, always.

Dale was half dingo and half everything else. He had four thousand years of bush breeding in him and he knew better than to piss the old man off by running ahead of the kid. So he loped behind Matty, occasionally snapping at a sand fly that got near his graying muzzle.

As they ran further from the camp and closer to the lookout the cicadas everywhere had them prey to their forever screech, but just as stars in a ticker-tape parade ignoring falling confetti they pressed forwards just the same. They always did when the little buggers were out and hiding.

"If Dale was a kid he'd have been the boss because he was older than me," thought Matty, but he wasn't, so he couldn't, and that was that. What he was though, was a big, four-legged, carrier pigeon with a message written on paper folded neatly in a tiny key holder that hung from his cracked brown leather collar. While Matty couldn't read because the state wouldn't let him learn, he saw the note once and asked his mum and dad about it.

"What does the note say?"

"It's instructions for the blokes at the boat stop in the sand," his father would say.

"That's right Matty," his mum said, "…just make sure you run like mad and make sure they get it."

His spritely, sun dunked body was now lord of the cap run as his father called it. A cap run began as soon as he saw his dad put the collar on the dog and say to him, "Cap run, so off you go." A cap run happened randomly. It could be three in the morning or just before dinner and there was no way of getting out of it. As soon as that collar was on Dale you were locked right in tighter than a Kookaburra's laugh.

The first time Matty did the run at night he was scared.

"Listen mate. There's nothing to be scared of. It's just like running in the day but different only because it's dark," his dad said matter-of-factly as he put the collar on Dale.

He added, "You can do it with your eyes closed now and that's harder than doing it in the moonlight. You've done the run exactly two hundred times now so you'll be fine. I promise you."

The old man's tone comforted Matty. "And when you get to the Cap you won't see any smoke because it's night so you have to look and see if there's a glow of the fire instead."

That was six months ago and now a cap run came on any day in a week and any number around a wrist watch.

His kid brain hurt when he tried to think of what this all meant. All his life he'd been at the secret camp with the other families and life was hard work and fun at the same time. He was the oldest kid of the nine families because all of the other kids were bubs and toddlers only. They couldn't fish off the spit or spot wallabies in the hinterland, and there was no way that they could find dry sticks of blue gum or melaleuca for the emergency fire stack.

Artwork by Dr. F
The fire stack was an enormous cube of bundled wood that stood at the only entrance to the camp. It was strung together with loops of piano wire and was nestled in a larger cage made of dry timber. The unseen core of the fire stack lay beyond slats of brush and strips of tea tree bark and was a compressed mass of top end beach grass and dried kelp. Old towels, twisted tight as ropes, snaked their way outwards from the green core to the edge of the cube, their ends rammed into plastic bottles filled with diesel, keeping them moist and alive. Matty could walk under its belly if he wanted to. The whole lot of it stood higher than a man and a half and it sat atop a square metal frame supported by four steel poles and it looked at you sideways, hungry for a match.

"If this bastard ever goes up, the smoke will be so thick the birds will need ladders to come down," his father would say. "You'll see it for miles and they can't hide that, no matter what they do."

"Is this why I'm practicing the run dad?" Matty said.

"Yes," he said slowly as he knelt down to the boy, *"and when you get to the Cap you look back here…"* he paused for a moment and tapped the edge of the fire stack, "and if you ever see smoke coming from this bastard…you know the drill, don't you mate?"

Matty lowered his head and nodded, *"Me and Dale have to run like the bloody clappers to the boat stop in the sand."*

"That's right Matty, we can't have you being a husk, now can we?"

Matty didn't know what a husk was but he knew that the state wanted them and if they got him they'd turn him into one. He remembered last year after a camp dinner he wandered off with Dale and saw Mrs. Garlin crying alone under the starlight. He went up behind her and put his arm on her shoulder.

"Why are you so sad?"

She didn't look around but said quietly, *"*They took my boy away to be a husk." Matty didn't understand. "Will he come home?"

*"No…"* she whispered, "They need him so they can make people."

They were nearing the turnoff to the Cap now and Matty was caught unguarded by a sudden rush of joy. He slowed his running to a trot and then to a skip and he kicked at the peppery white sand and laughed. A tiny crab clasping a poor beetle scuttled quickly to miss his footfall and a hungry skink lizard watching it had slunk away as the boy and beast rounded the sun dappled corner.

The boom of the surf against the black rocks to the East was carried to him on the salty air and he stuck out his tongue to taste it. His joy grew stronger and from the middle of his chest a happy tickle rippled its way to the sweet spot between his shoulder blades. High above him two red feathered sea kites cried out as they chased their tails, printing crimson loops on the fat empty sky and Matty right then wanted to stop all the clocks.

He jumped high in the air with a whoop and collapsed on the soft path. Rolling over and over he laughed as Dale woofed and skidded around him in doggish delight.

"I'm a nat and you can't catch me!" he sang out to nobody before lying on his back with his head resting on a clump of cooch grass. The thick hinterland surrendered a small blue strip of sky above and he looked up into it and wondered what a nat was exactly. Then he thought about what his dad said.

"The grownups all come from husks and technology," he said. "Me and your mum made you right here just like all the other kids were made right here."

He still didn't understand and his father laughed, *"You're natural."* He walked off shaking his head and laughed again, *"*Lucky bugger. Bloody well wish I had a mum and dad."

Matty sat up on the path. Something hunted him from his thoughts and he listened, daring himself not to move at all. He sat for a while and heard the sound of big sticks breaking but it sounded different somehow. He stood up and heard it again and this time he knew it was far away but he couldn't tell from where it came. This unsettled him even more than his mum did earlier today when she was crying and hugged him so hard he breathed out but couldn't breathe in. Even his dad looked strange when he put the collar on Dale and his hands shook like a Coronation Trout.

"C'mon, c'mon," he said to Dale and they jumped from sandy stone to root and grassy clump all the way to the top of Red Cap Lookout; getting there in six minutes flat. When they reached the summit Matty put his fingers through the wire on the old fence that stood on the rim of the cliff wall and he looked towards the camp and saw smoke. It looked like it wasn't allowed to be there but there it was: a silent, frozen, black smudge looming much larger than any tree in the endless forest beneath him. It wasn't the only one either. Further away and to the left was another one, and way off to the right he could see three more. Matty's heart thrashed in his chest and he opened his mouth in raw fear at the five terrible intruders, and now for the first time he could smell against the quiet sky the whiff of its deeper corruption.

*"They lit the fire stack Dale,"* he shrieked, *"…and there's other fire stacks too."*

Dale barked happily and trotted off down the path in the direction they had just come from. In a panic Matty grabbed him by the collar and shouted.

"NO. We have to get to the boat stop down there." He pointed to the narrow path that threaded its way down the broken wall of granite to the beach far below.

Ten minutes later the boy and the dog were running on the beach to the forty-footer leaving a short pier. Alf Waylon, standing on deck of 'The Simpson Guard', lowered his binoculars and shouted below deck, "Wait. There's one more. Turn about*."* A moment later 'The Simpson Guard' veered port side in full circle and when its starboard rim bumped against the pier gently Matty and Dale jumped onto the deck.

"OK, mate, show us the back of your neck and we'll get going," he said to Matty.

Matty turned around and swept upwards the hair that fell against his green t-shirt and Alf grunted with satisfaction. He called out below deck once more.

"He's a nat*,"* and then looking at Dale he continued, *"There's that dog with him and I reckon it's got a note on him, sure as eggs."*

As 'The Simpson Guard' moved out to sea again Alf took them down the steps to the small bridge. Steering the boat was Alf's son, Ryan, a boy of sixteen who fixed his eyes straight ahead and said nothing. Behind him was the open door to the hold and it was crowded with kids from bubs to a couple of young teenagers. Most of them were crying.

Kate Waylon, thirty six and weathered well for sea life like her husband and son, was the oldest one there. She smiled at Matty while Alf took the note from Dale's collar and handed it to her.

*"Here you go love, wassit say?"* He shook his head at Matty and smiled with a tinge of shame, *"Damned Matriarchy never let me read, boy. Wouldn't allow it."*

Matty watched her face closely for any change at all and saw her lips tighten, and just for a moment her voice unsteadied.

"It's the Anders kid." She leaned in closely to Alf's ear and whispered something else and he nodded slowly and bit the inside of his cheek. Kate turned away to console a sobbing boy of fourteen or so, and she spoke soothingly to him against the dull throbbing of the diesel engine. "You did well. You got your baby sister here safely."

Alf took Matty's hand and they went topside and looked out from the stern. The short pier was far away now, a tiny comma on the empty beach that looked as though it had fallen as a crumb from the black ribbon of cliff wall above it. Alf's eyes welled and there was no way he'd look at Matty while they were like that and so he leant on the rail and stared out over the water.

*"We're going to a new home Matty, and we can't take any more. Do you understand why?"*

*"No,"* said Matty.

"The island is too small for loads of people and your parents know this*."* He paused trying to find more simple words but found none. *"*It's in international waters and the state can't get us there see? There are some grownups there too."

Matty shook his head.

Alf scratched a tear away before facing the boy. "Your mum and dad wanted to live with you in the bush forever mate, but they knew that if the state found the camp you'd have to get away."

Matty didn't know the words island or international and he was about to ask what they meant when he heard Dale bark happily as the bow of the vessel speared the rim of a wave ahead. The spray shot over the cabin and broke above them as soft as gossamer into thousands of colored gems. With the same bliss he felt earlier that day he ran and jumped up into it with his arms outstretched and shouted.

"We ran like the clappers."

Put on your thinking caps

Tom Givens · 1 February 2012 · Archived copy · Original

I've got some questions for you, so let's get down to business.

What, exactly is wrong with being an advocate of change to help men and boys? I mean what, specifically, is so offensive or hostile about bringing attention to thus far ignored social issues such as parental rights for men, or reproductive rights for that matter?

It's an undisputed fact that men have no inherent rights in these areas, and in most cases have no rights of any kind unless conferred by the mother. Our society prides itself on removing oppression, on equality, on tolerance. And yet, in the rare cases that extending these rights to include men are even considered, they are subject to a cost/benefit analysis and dismissed on those grounds.

It is if men only deserve equality if and when it doesn't cost too much. Otherwise, the individual men involved get stuck with the bill for the political capital the politicians used to screw them with. Even the judges involved in such areas as Family Law openly mock the idea that men have Human Rights.

But show concern for this, and you are a misogynist?

We mutilate the genitals of baby boys routinely, selling off the foreskins to make face cream, and point to whatever bogus reason the medical establishment is justifying their inhuman avarice with this week as a reason, all while avoiding the reality that we are permanently altering his sexual function, years before he is even sexually mature, and he has no say in the matter. How is this not hypocrisy given the stance on FGM? And how quick would their tone change if selling foreskins were illegal, do you think?

Do you really think comparing male and female circumcision is Oppression Olympics? How much harm has to come to these defenseless babies before we allow the exact same reasoning used to ban FGM to apply to baby boys? Do you really think the only possible objection to this barbaric practice is anti-Semitism? Really? Why don't boys deserve the same right to bodily autonomy we so cherish for our girls?

Throughout nearly all of my years, the concept of affirmative action has held sway throughout the west as official policy. Multiple campaigns on both national and provincial (or state) levels have been mounted to "correct a gender imbalance," as well as a racial one. This has resulted in the success women (usually white) enjoy today in fields like medicine and law, and resulted in more women entering "non-traditional" careers. All of this, by and large, is seen as a desirable goal throughout society.

That changes, it seems, when men are the ones that are "under-represented," as is the case in fields like HR, nursing, and education. In those cases the lack of male participation is seen as natural, the fault of men themselves, or even a good thing. In areas such as child care, for example, men are openly regarded as threats, or creepy, for even wanting to be there.

The equality rhetoric disappears when men are disadvantaged. Even, it seems, in education, where anti-male prejudice is openly treated as a positive. As are overly-broad interpretations of already vague law, and other anti-male practices. Do you think the government has any intention of enforcing its own laws, and living up to its own rhetoric, when men stand to benefit? Or do you think they will finally see the folly in this form of discrimination when men begin to gain?

And apparently, to question the judgment of those leaders, to be suspicious of their motives after watching the respective constitutions of several countries shredded to enable their policies, is dangerous and scary.

So we best avoid that. Right?

Simple concern for the health of men also seems to be a no-no. Men die quite a bit younger than women do, this shouldn't surprise anyone. The fact that suicide is the second or third leading cause of death for males in all but the oldest age group, on the other hand, might make a person sit up and take notice. A word of caution to the unwary: failure to have more concern for the higher number of female attempts usually results in a charge of (you guessed it) misogyny. And don't EVER point out that suicide isn't even in the top ten causes of death for women. Just don't, trust me on this. God help you if you suggest cultural attitudes might be responsible for the difference. I'm just saying…

I would like to insert the obligatory paean to call such and such hotline if you're feeling suicidal, but truthfully most of those lines are staffed by people whose personal beliefs usually agree with the very forces causing so much pain. In my hometown, the suicide hotline is run by a battered women's shelter, for example. Given the spike in suicide rates for men following divorce, and how common false accusations are as a tactic in divorce, whoever OK'd this was a lunatic…yet it seems to be common. Shouldn't I be concerned that men in a fragile state are served properly? Is pointing out a conflict of interest a bad thing now?

Wanting to change this situation, to improve the chances that men will survive until retirement, usually gets you an accusation of hating women. Why? I don't know. Any thoughts?

I also don't know why people seem so complacent with the structural failure of our society. It's hard to imagine anyone could be unconcerned, for example, with an underclass in the UK so large that Single Motherhood has become a career choice. It's equally hard to imagine people can ignore the role education (or more succinctly, the lack thereof) has played in a fifth of young British men being not only unemployed, but officially considered unemployable. It's beyond comprehension that people would buy this as being "natural", isn't it? They don't even seem to blink when they find out it's specifically men and boys permanently relegated to the underclass. Some pablum about "colored folk" dragging down the average (how progressive…and don't "those people" have daughters?), and it seems people go back to sleep. Do you think people are this complacent without being conditioned to be so?

It is of the utmost importance, by all accounts, to regard the destruction of generations of men, the shredding of rights and the vanishing of futures (and children, sometimes) as most tragic. After all, aren't women complaining they can't find a good provider to marry? Don't their children need replacement father figures?

Failure to regard the state the male sex has been reduced to as nothing more than a bummer for marriage-minded women will result most often in accusations of misogyny.

Should I "man up" or is it OK to point out the denial of "person" status to men inherent in such a viewpoint? Is it bad form to point out the frequency of such a viewpoint in popular culture? How about the disapproval alternative viewpoints receive?

Concern for the health and welfare of men, without equal or greater concern for the health and welfare of women (even though women receive far greater care and attention, politically and medically) is also forbidden in polite company. Cynical manipulation of the regard men have for women is to remain unremarked upon, on pain of banishment, and no further outbursts about women having rights and men having responsibilities will be tolerated without reprisal in forums across the land. As our national leaders have scolded: we need to "man up". At least, so the media tells us. Because of patriarchy, apparently.

Do I have it right so far? Does this mesh with what you've been taught? Am I confirming that men's activists have nothing to complain about? That we're really just mad at losing privilege?

Like the privilege to see your own kids? Like the privilege of presumption of innocence? Like the privilege of property rights and legal protection? Like the privilege of being regarded as a human being? Yeah, I suppose some are mad at losing that sort of stuff.

Let me ask a couple more things while I have you here.

What would you do if you took these concerns to people who have entire organizations dedicated to fighting these battles, people who could have tackled the problem in months, or even weeks…and had them deny those problems exist? And then had similar groups block attempts to find out if they really were issues, or worse, hide information confirming them?

What would you do if these people who insist on being the last word in equality issues flat out refused to hear a word of it? Would you give up, or would you try other avenues? What if politicians followed suit, and flat out refused to even investigate? Or even denied their own data if it suggests men might need help?

Would you heed these same people's later demand for use of a "proper tone" when addressing them, once they couldn't continue to deny the reality? Would you care at all how those people felt about you? Would you need their approval to have legitimate concerns, do you think?

What would you do if no one would lift a finger to even find out if there might be something wrong? Would you yell until they wake up, or would you let them sleep?

Are you not even a little bit curious how things can have reversed this much for men in 50 years? Are you honestly buying the idea that men can't adapt? And when are we going to get around to making someone actually prove all this social engineering was a good thing. Heck, don't you think someone should have actually analyzed patriarchy theory before we started tearing down society?

Why are some people so afraid of having their ideology questioned, and why are alternative viewpoints considered borderline illegal? When did Western governments become secular theocracies? What does our society more resemble, a Democracy or a Police State? Has any of this made you curious? Do you care at all? Can you honestly say you didn't know this stuff already? And most importantly, why aren't you mad as hell?

AVfM Radio Tonight: Nullify!

Tonight on AVfM Radio, the subject is jury nullification. Rather the subject is why we advocate for it in cases of rape, domestic violence, drug offenses and all other areas where state and federal governments across the western world have become more criminal than the people they are prosecuting.

Rape shield laws mean that in some trials a physical barrier, a literal protective wall, is constructed between the alleged rapist and his alleged victim in order to make the supposed victim feel safer. It is the visible manifestation of the presumption of guilt put on display right in front of the jury. In other cases key evidence as to an alleged victims credibility is withheld. That's just the legal, institutional stuff.

Add to that the immoral scheming and treachery of over-zealous police and prosecutors and you come up with one very undeniable fact.

There is no way any person sitting on the jury of a rape trial can know if they are getting seeing evidence of a crime or, or a state constructed circus side show. In that light, there are very few circumstances that justify a juror voting for a conviction when the obligation is to hold the evidence to a "reasonable doubt" standard.

And the problem is not confined to rape. From prosecutions of so called domestic violence to the war on drugs, the criminal justice system has been remolded into a tool for tyrants control the masses and satisfy the appetites of rent-seeking beurocrats and other state functionaries.

Fortunately, there is a way to fight back against this kind of malfeasance.

Tonight Join JtO and Paul as we dig deeper into the criminalization of masculinity and the criminalization of humanity itself.

Rape is a 1970's mood ring

Pierce Harlan · 2 February 2012 · Archived copy · Original

Paul Elam and I recently wrote a piece called "Colleges push anti-male sex policies to the edge," about how colleges are bending, stretching, twisting, and pounding the definition of sexual misconduct to include all manner of things that, by any rational measure, are not sexual misconduct. We explained that this stems from an extremist feminist tradition of rape advocacy that encourages purported victims to engorge the definition of "rape" and "sexual assault" to include all manner of alleged violations that are neither "rape" nor "sexual assault."

The past few days have given us stellar examples of how that extremist tradition has become the norm.

He raped me. He raped me not...

First up is Lauren R. Taylor of the Washington Post, who defends the sexual violence study conducted by the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention. That study, in the words of Christina Hoff Sommers, "suggests that rates of sexual violence in the United States are comparable to those in the war-stricken Congo." How does the new study arrive at the conclusion that sexual violence is rampant? By "careless advocacy research," Ms. Sommers explains, and by asking respondents if they had sex while inebriated or if someone pressured them by by repeatedly asking, showing they were unhappy, telling them lies, or making false promises. In short, the study defines sexual violence "in impossibly elastic ways," as Ms. Sommers puts it.

Well, impossibly elastic is just fine by Lauren R. Taylor, thank you very much! She proclaims: "The questions [in the study] are vague and broad, because the reality of sexual violence is vague and broad."

The statement is as inane as it is dangerous. The sine qua non of sexual violence is the absence of consent. Either there is consent or there isn't, and there's nothing "vague" or "broad" about that. While some manifested assertions of assent are so tainted by impropriety that our law does not consider them legally operative (an example is a promise obtained by duress), nagging for sex and the other things asked typically aren't among them.

Next up, a Harvard student named Emma Wood, who pooh-poohs the prevalence of false rape claims. Emma is in a class by herself. Aside from slinking into the easily-mouthed clichés of radical feminism, Emma lobs the following bomb, presumably with a straight face: "I am convinced that no umbrella definition of sexual assault can exist. Just as each person defines his or her sexuality for him or herself, each person defines sexual assault on a similarly personal level."

There you have it. Rape is in the eye of the beholder. In Ms. Taylor's and Ms. Wood's world, sexual assault isn't a crime that needs to be defined with sufficient due process specificity to put the accused on notice of the conduct it proscribes. It is a free-floating clearinghouse to redress any sexual encounter deemed unsatisfactory at the caprice and whim of a self-anointed victim.

For eons, rape had a widely accepted, horrific meaning. Now, according to the people who dominate the public discourse on it, it means nothing — because it means everything. Carefully crafted criminal laws, honed by centuries of thoughtfully constructed judicial decisions, have been scrapped in favor of a 1970's mood ring.

That tells us all we need to know about the people who dominate the public discourse on rape.

The Zeta Contract

John Hembling (JtO) · 3 February 2012 · Archived copy · Original

I recently saw a question posted to an online forum, asking "If a woman chooses to be alone with one or more men – is she agreeing to be raped?" Pretty obviously this was a stupid question, and it was likely posted in an attempt to troll readers into responding out of emotion. The question, however, when considered in an inversion of context, bears some consideration.

Does a man, allowing a woman, or women, into his presence – tacitly agree to be falsely accused of sexual violence? This is not a question of legal precedent, or of rights; it's a practical question for practical men to consider. False accusations are rampant and go largely unpunished.

When considered against the ever mounting catalog of men's lives destroyed by false rape accusation, the answer is obviously yes. A man freely associating with women is agreeing in advance to be personally destroyed by false accusation.

The fact that men generally continue to associate with women, and seek out female company indicates pretty strongly that most men haven't yet realized the obvious. In a society of escalating false accusations and rapidly disappearing legal rights for men, such as legal presumption of innocence – men, by female association, give agreement to false accusation leveled against themselves.

This obviously informs a few imperatives for male behavior, with a focus on self preservation. In fact, it is a major factor in the growing phenomena of Men Going Their Own Way (MGTOW) along with other branches of male self actualization, including Zeta masculinity.

A fairly common attempt at dismissal of the men's rights movement is the claim that men's activism is purely reactionary, and constitutes a backlash against the nearly universal mainstreaming of feminism. This rebuttal, which attempts to dismiss men's activism, is factually correct; but in being so completely misses the point. Thanks in large part to the successes of a half century of lobbying, activism, and feminist changes to domestic policy and law, male human beings are both legally and socially second class citizens in Western cultures. Establishing the veracity of this assertion has been the focus of hundreds of articles on this site, and thousands elsewhere – and re-iteration of the evidence would be a distraction in the present narrative.

It is a matter of fact, not opinion, that women enjoy legal privilege and protection that men do not. It is further a fact that women, by accusation alone, can and regularly do destroy men's lives by leveling false accusations of sexual violence, for the most trivial of gains. When caught, such false accusers suffer almost no consequences and demonstrate almost no remorse or even recognition of damage done.

Recent changes to the legal definition of rape represent an escalation of the already omnipresent climate of false rape accusation. By drinking alcohol, a woman renders herself legally incapable of informed consent to a sexual encounter. This means that sex after a few drinks is, by definition, rape; whether a woman says yes, or even initiates sexual or romantic contact herself. This change in law comes after years of lobbying and activism by feminist organizations including the women's law center in New York, and says a lot about women's adult volition and self determinacy. After a few drinks, a woman is no longer a competent adult. In this re-definition, a man, by contrast, remains an adult. This is not the patriarchy telling women they're lesser humans, this is feminism redefining the law to make it so. However, the most deadly consequence are to men, who might foolishly treat women as if they're still self -determined adults after 2 or 3 drinks – and consequently find themselves feeding the machine of the sexual grievance industry.

This is the social and legal reality of male identity in the 21st century, and it informs some necessary choices men must face.

The most obvious is the previously mentioned MGTOW, men going their own way. This has been discussed in some detail in numerous articles on AVfM and off it. However, most discussions on the subject address it from a position of male philosophical and practical necessity. What's not usually discussed are the direct effects for women, of men self actualizing apart from socially acceptable male utility and disposability.

In almost all discussion of men within the mainstream, the feminist – and unfortunately, even men's rights circles, whether men are being vilified and belittled or not, the value of men is always based on utility. Are fathers necessary for children's development? Are men responsible for the majority of scientific and technological advancement? Do men still do society's dirty and dangerous work? The jobs which account for 93% of workplace deaths being male?

Do "good" men pay for child care, and "bad" men default on alimony? Do "real" men hasten to deliver women to the first seats on the lifeboats, whether the ship is called Titanic or the Costa Concordia?

Whether good or bad, all such questions revolve around a conception of men as utilities of greater or lesser value to women. There is no whisper of indication from any camp besides the men's rights movement, that men and boys have value simply because they are human beings. This is recognition of a human value women enjoy without question, while men are either valued or despised based on a utilitarian consideration to women.

The point of this discussion is not to exhort women, or feminists, or men – including male feminists – to recognize innate human value in those with the biological fortune to own external genitalia.

This discussion is a public notice of what the requirement of male survival through MGTOW or Zeta masculinity means, when considered from the utilitarian view of male humanity. Does a man, allowing a woman, or women into his presence – tacitly agree to be falsely accused of sexual violence?

Yes.

This means men choosing a rational path of self actualization which excludes their own convenient disposability; this path will produce some unfortunate outcomes for women.

MGTOW, or Zeta masculinity, encompasses more than just a few catch phrases and rules of thumb. It is informed by a necessary ethic running crossways to traditional thinking. To the slow witted or the self interested chivalrists and traditionalists, this will appear uncivilized and hostile. To the adopters and shapers of this ethic, the valuation of humans as disposable utilities has a similarly sour taste.

Zeta masculinity entails a consistent ethic, but that ethic aggressively discards any obligation to people who de-value male humanity. For Zeta males to do otherwise would be an embrace of slavery.

The ethic encompasses the following points:

The traditional cultural onus on men to protect women is gone.

This deal is off. This means the ability of a woman to cry out and instantly summon and direct the violent capacity of every man within hearing is finished. A woman is subject to assault, or robbery, or any other physical altercation in which men would traditionally always step in without hesitation to protect and shield her. A man is under no ethical, legal, moral or social obligation to value the life of a woman above himself, and in fact, a new ethic should condemn such stupid self sacrifice as unmanly, weak, and foolish. If a man's humanity is not recognized beyond his utility, then what possible social contract can exist to compel him towards risk or sacrifice?

The onus to provide is similarly relegated to the waste bin. Shiny cars, expensive watches and clothes are all sexual signals. Although frequently denied, it is not a secret that the visible signs of high income in a man are of principal interest to women looking to secure access to that income. Indeed, social censure used by women against men commonly focuses on men's imputed income or financial status. This is seen as normal, in fact, a man who doesn't out earn a woman is effectively invisible to her in most cases. The "wage gap" will often be cited as a logical reason for men to finance romantic engagement, despite the fact that no such wage gap exists. Zeta males whose self identity doesn't include this financial servitude will not be financially underwriting other adults simply because they own ovaries. This seems simple and inconsequential, given an understanding that not only is there no wage gap, due to persistent affirmative action, but female university graduates are also rapidly outnumbering male grads. Obviously, this means women's average earning potential is quickly outpacing men's earnings.

In the romantic context, women who expect the traditional male-pays social model to continue are faced with changes to social expectation forced directly by female favoring affirmative action. Even assuming men as a demographic were to foolishly continue supporting an exploitative view of men as women's financiers; this is an increasingly untenable model, based on the shifting economic balance created by male targeted sexual discrimination in higher education. Piled on top of this is the emergence of the Zeta masculine ethic, in which male financing of female entitlement is entirely rejected. For women, this means that female evaluation of men as viable romantic partners – including evaluation of those men's income presents a rapidly shrinking pool of men still foolish enough to allow their own continued exploitation.

Unfortunately, this has consequences far beyond destruction of female preference in romance. For growing numbers of men actualizing a Zeta ethical path, a refusal to pursue high stress, high status careers has a long term impact on larger society. As always, good men and the corpses of good men are the fuel nations run on. A collective refusal to burn in this machine forces changes to the landscape. In Japan there is a social phenomenon, independent of the western men's rights movement, but analogous to Zeta masculinity, that has emerged under the publicly dismissive nomenclature "grass eating boys".

According to reporting from macleans.ca: "Just as they {"…soushoku dansi—translated to "grass-eating boys" or, more commonly, "herbivores."} disdain old-fashioned alpha males, they scoff at the status-conscious consumerism of their parents' generation. Grass-eating boys aren't big spenders and they don't take flashy vacations. They are close to their mothers, prefer platonic relationships with female friends, are attentive to their appearance and have fewer career ambitions. A subsidiary of Dentsu, Japan's largest advertising agency, estimates that 60 per cent of men in their 20s consider themselves grass-eaters." [1]

A facile reading of this phenomenon might conclude that these are feminized men, but this would be to entirely miss the point. Japan's grass eaters have evaluated the traditionally allowed male role of worker drone, and disposable human, and rejected it entirely to pursue their own quality of life.

The grass eaters are effectively tanking Japan's economy, which, like all nation states, runs on the burned out corpses of "real men".

For the practitioners of Zeta masculinity, as wider adoption of a MGTOW ethic produces a similar national derailment, and no regret or apology will be forthcoming. There might even be some derisive laughter. Men die in coal mines, logging, fishing in the Atlantic, and other dangerous jobs because their socially accepted male identity is tied to human disposability as well as a requirement of economic provision for others. The refusal to self-dispose is only half the result of non-disposable male identity through Zeta or MGTOW actualization. The second element is that those previously benefiting from men's willingness to sacrifice and generate income will have to do without the financial and material products of the humanized remaining half of humanity.

This discussion began with social fallout of activist retooling of the concepts of justice and law in matters of sexual violence, and this merits further consideration. The phenomenon of escalating false rape accusation, and its lack of consequence for false accusers is only a fraction of the distortion of what's still called the justice system. Direct violence by women against men is increasingly excused with little to no consequence by both the courts and the public. Public denial of this operates just as mainstream reporting accumulates stories like that of Sheona Keith, who slashed a man's face with a glass because he smiled at her.

The dailymail.co.uk headline read: "Judge refuses to jail woman plumber who glassed nightclubber who smiled at her 'because she had been sexually harassed [by somebody else] during training.'" [2]

This is simultaneously preposterous, and sadly typical of a public willingness to suspend both social and legal accountability for criminal violence committed by members of "the innocent sexTM".

Women's violence, up to and including the infliction of grievous bodily harm, is increasingly excused, and treated as if such violence and injury is funny. The sexual dismemberment inflicted by Katherine Becker providing another example. A studio audience who laughed at crippling injury inflicted for no reason except the expressed desire by the victim that he wanted a divorce.

A legal system and a public which excuses violent assault for one demographic when inflicted on the other denotes a deeply sick public zeitgeist. Rather than correcting such a debased public ethic, this fashion is escalating. For men and boys it is increasingly obvious that a legal system prohibiting assault, sexual assault, and even murder operates selectively based on the sex of the offender and the victim. We are rapidly moving towards a society where for women's violence against men, there are no limits, no rules and no consequences.

Based on the apparent hilarity of the Katherine Becker case, where "the talk" host Sharon Osborne couldn't stop giggling long enough to make it through a false one minute apology – there seems to be not even a perception that grievous injury done to men counts as harm at all.

All human societies have laws, whether formally encoded or informally observed through traditions. One of the principal functions of those laws is to provide a mechanism for redress of grievance between individuals in a publicly agreed-on framework. This convention allows disputes ranging from disagreement over property to personal offence, injury and death – without recourse to direct application of violence. Laws applied more-or-less evenly are a social mechanism which prevent resolution of disputes through retributive force, or vendetta. The current and increasing climate of one-sided accountability is untenable, and will likely produce a societal adjustment. If that adjustment occurs before the rising tide one one-sided non-accountability is corrected, the results may be far reaching and brutal.

In this event, it will likely not be individuals from the emerging Zeta demographic who manifest violent societal pathology, but sociologically unaware members of the public. Mass protests such as the Occupy Wall-Street movement are likely places for informal applications of retributive violence to occur; even as such violence will, by the ignorance of the mob, be directed at targets of convenience and circumstance.

As the phenomena of female violence being given a pass by a feminist driven legal system permeates the public understanding and subconscious, then retributive violence, even mob violence, against women is likely to become common. Our current feminist narrative maintains that it is common already, but a visit to any law enforcement statistics website shows this feminist lie for the fabricated falsehood it is. National and international campaigns to end violence against women, operating under the pretence that male-targeting violence is not more common, serve to demonize and de-legitimize the actual majority of the targets of violence: men and boys. These campaigns, by focusing on protection of the demographic already least victimized, also serve to escalate victimization of the demographic already most subject to violence, again, men and boys.

Men following a path of Zeta masculinity or MGTOW will have no part in this unfortunate outcome, of female targeted mob violence, although further legal marginalization of men is likely to follow that outcome. This further male legal marginalization will have no positive impact, and will likely lead to a still more brutal and violent society.

This returns us to the question mentioned near the opening of this discussion.

Does a man, allowing a woman, or women into his presence – tacitly agree to be falsely accused of sexual violence?

Yes, and it's going to get worse.

How feminists corrupt DV research

Dr. Murray Straus · 4 February 2012 · Archived copy · Original

Processes Explaining the Concealment and Distortion of Evidence on Gender Symmetry in Partner Violence

Graham-Kevan's paper fully documents overwhelming evidence that the "patriarchal dominance" theory of partner violence (PV from here on) explains only a small part of PV. Moreover, more such evidence is rapidly emerging. To take just one recent example, analyses of data from 32 nations in the International Dating Violence Study (Straus 2007; Straus and International Dating Violence Research Consortium 2004) found about equal perpetration rates and a predominance of mutual violence in all 32 samples, including non-Western nations.

Moreover, data from that study also show that, within a couple relationship, domination and control by women occurs as often as by men and are as strongly associated with perpetration of PV by women as by men (Straus 2007). Graham-Kevan also documents the absence of evidence indicating that the patriarchal dominance approach to prevention and treatment has been effective. In my opinion, it would be even more appropriate to say that what success has been achieved in preventing and treating PV has been achieved despite the handicaps imposed by focusing exclusively on eliminating male-dominance and misogyny, important as that is as an end in itself.

Graham-Kevan's paper raises the question of how an explanatory theory and treatment modality could have persisted for 30 years and still persists, despite hundreds of studies which provide evidence that PV has many causes, not just male-dominance. The answer is that it emerged from a convergence of a number of different historical and social factors. One of these is that gender symmetry in perpetration of partner violence is inconsistent with male predominance in almost all other crimes, especially violent crimes. Another is the greater injury rate suffered by female victims of PV brings female victimization to public attention much more often.

Although there are many causes of the persistence of the patriarchal dominance focus, I believe that the predominant cause has been the efforts of feminists to conceal, deny, and distort the evidence. Moreover, these efforts include intimidation and threats, and have been carried out not only by feminist advocates and service providers, but also by feminist researchers who have let their ideological commitments overrule their scientific commitments.

At the same time, it is important to recognize the tremendous contribution to human relationships and crime control made by feminist efforts to end violence against women. This effort has brought public attention to the fact that PV may be the most prevalent form of interpersonal violence, created a world-wide determination to cease ignoring PV, and take steps to combat PV. It has brought the rule of law to one of the last spheres of life where 'self-help' justice (Black 1983) prevails by changing the legal status of domestic assaults, by changing police and court practices from one of ignoring and minimization PV to one of compelling the criminal justice system to attend and intervene.

In addition, feminists have created two important new social institutions: shelters for battered women and treatment programs for male perpetrators. However, the exclusive focus on male perpetrators and the exclusive focus on just one of the many causes has stymied this extension of the rule of law and the effort to end domestic violence. Ironically, it has also handicapped efforts to protect women from PV and end PV by men (Feld and Straus 1989; Medeiros and Straus 2006; Straus 2007; Straus and Scott, in press). Consequently, information on how this could have occurred can be helpful in bringing about a change. This commentary identifies seven of the methods.

Methods Used to Conceal and Distort Evidence on Symmetry in Partner Violence

Method 1. Suppress Evidence

Researchers who have an ideological commitment to the idea that men are almost always the sole perpetrator often conceal evidence that contradicts this belief. Among researchers not committed to that ideology, many (including me and some of my colleagues) have withheld results showing gender symmetry to avoid becoming victims of vitriolic denunciations and ostracism (see Method 7 below). Thus, many researchers have published only the data on male perpetrators or female victims, deliberately omitting data on female perpetrators and male victims.

This practice started with one of the first general population surveys on family violence. The survey done for the Kentucky Commission on the Status of Women obtained data on both men and women, but only the data on male perpetration was published (Schulman 1979). Among the many other examples of respected researchers publishing only the data on assaults by men are Kennedy and Dutton (1989); Lackey and Williams (1995); Johnson and Leone (2005); and Kaufman Kantor and Straus (1987).

Method 2. Avoid Obtaining Data Inconsistent with the Patriarchal Dominance Theory

In survey research, this method of concealment asks female participants about attacks by their male partners and avoids asking them if they had hit their male partner. The Canadian Violence against Women survey (Johnson and Sacco 1995), for example, used what can be called a feminist version of the Conflict Tactics Scales to measure PV. This version omitted the questions on perpetration by the female participants in the study. For the US National Violence against Women Survey (Tjaden and Thoennes 2000), the US Department of Justice originally planned the same strategy. Fortunately, the US Centers for Disease Control added a sample of men to the project. But when Johnson and Leone (Johnson and Leone 2005) investigated the prevalence of “intimate terrorists” among the participants in that study, they guaranteed there would be no female intimate terrorists by using only the data on male perpetrators.

For a lecture in Montreal, I examined 12 Canadian studies. Ten of the 12 reported only assaults by men. The most recent example occurred in the spring of 2006 when a colleague approached the director of a university survey center about conducting a survey of partner violence if a recently submitted grant was awarded. A faculty member at that university objected to including questions on female perpetration, and the center director said he was not likely to do the survey if the funds were awarded.

Method 3. Cite Only Studies That Show Male Perpetration

I could list a large number of journal articles showing selective citation, but instead I will illustrate the process with official document examples to show that this method of concealment and distortion is institutionalized in publications of governments, the United Nations, and the World Health Organization. For example, US Dept. of Justice publications almost always cite only the National Crime Victimization study, which shows male predominance (Durose et al. 2005). They ignore the Department of Justice published critiques, which led to a revision of the survey to correct that bias. However, the revision was only partly successful (Straus 1999), yet they continue to cite it and ignore other more accurate studies they have sponsored which show gender symmetry.

After delaying release of the results of the National Violence against Women for almost two years, the press releases issued by the Department of Justice provided only the “life- time prevalence” data and ignored the “past-year prevalence” data, because the lifetime data showed predominantly male perpetration, whereas the more accurate past-year data showed that women perpetrated 40% of the partner assaults.

The widely acclaimed and influential World Health Organization report on domestic violence (Krug et al. 2002) reports that “Where violence by women occurs it is more likely to be in the form of self-defense. (32, 37, 38).” This is selective citation because almost all studies that have compared men and women find about equal rates of self-defense. Moreover, it also illustrates Method 4 (conclusions that contradict the results) because reference 32 (Saunders 1986) reports that 70% of the minor violence and 60% of the sever violence was not in self-defense. Reference 37 (Dekeseredy, Saunders, Schwartz et al. 1977) used a similar method, and got similar results: 37% of the minor violence and 43% of the severe violence was initiated by women. In addition neither of these studies had data on self-defense by men, so neither provides a basis for concluding that violence by women differs from violence by men.

Method 4. Conclude That Results Support Feminist Beliefs When They Do Not

The studies cited above, in addition to illustrating selective citation, are also examples of the ability of ideological commitment to lead researchers to misinterpret the results of their own research. A study by Kernsmith (2005), for example, states that "Males and females were found to differ in their motivations for using violence in relationships" and that "female violence may be more related to maintaining personal liberty in a relationship than gaining power" (p. 180). However, although Kernsmith's Table 2 shows that women had higher scores on the "striking back" factor, only one question in this factor is about self-defense.

The other questions in the factor are about being angry and coercing the partner. So, despite naming the factor as "striking back" it is mostly about anger and coercion. Therefore, the one significantly different factor shows that women more than men are motivated by anger at the partner and by efforts to coerce the partner. In addition, Kernsmith's conclusion ignores the fact that the scores for men and women were approximately equal in respect to two of the three factors ("exerting power" and "disciplining partner"). Thus, Kernsmith's study found the opposite of what was stated as the finding.

Method 5. Create "Evidence" by Citation

The Kernsmith study, the World Health Organization report, and the pattern of selective citation show how ideology can be converted into what can be called "evidence by citation" or what Gelles (1980) calls the "woozle effect." A woozle effect occurs when frequent citation of previous publications that lack evidence mislead us into thinking there is evidence. For example, subsequent to the World Health Organization study and the Kernsmith study, papers discussing gender differences in motivation will cite them to show that female violence is predominantly in self-defense, which is the opposite of what the research actually shows. But because these are citations of an article in a scientific journal and a respected international organization, readers of the subsequent article will accept it as a fact. Thus, fiction is converted into scientific evidence that will be cited over and over.

Another example is the claim that the Conflict Tactics Scales (Straus et al. 1996) does not provide an adequate measure of PV because it measures only conflict-related violence. Although the theoretical basis of the CTS is conflict theory, the introductory explanation to participants specifically asks participants to report expressive and malicious violence. It asks respondents about the times when they and their partner "[…]disagree, get annoyed with the other person, want different things from each other, or just have spats or fights because they are in a bad mood, are tired or for some other reason."

Despite repeating this criticism for 25 years in perhaps a hundred publications, none of those publications has provided empirical evidence showing that only conflict-related violence is reported. In fact, where there are both CTS data and qualitative data, as in Giles-Sims (1983), it shows that the CTS elicits malicious violence as well as conflict-related violence. Nevertheless, because there are at least a hundred articles with this statement in peer-reviewed journals, it seems to establish as a scientific fact what is only an attempt to blame the messenger for the bad news about gender symmetry in PV.

Method 6. Obstruct Publication of Articles and Obstruct Funding Research That Might Contradict the Idea that Male Dominance Is the Cause of PV

I have documentation for only one case of publication being blocked, but I think this has often happened. The more frequent pattern is self-censorship by authors fearing that it will happen or that publication of such a study will undermine their reputation, and, in the case of graduate students, the ability to obtain a job.

An example of denying funding to research that might contradict the idea that PV is a male-only crime is the call for proposals to investigate partner violence issued in December 2005 by the National Institute of Justice. The announcement stated that proposals to investigate male victimization would not be eligible. Another example is the objection by a reviewer to a proposal a colleague and I submitted because of our "[…] naming violence in a relationship as a 'human' problem of aggression not a gender-based problem." When priority scores by the reviewers are averaged, it takes only one extremely low score to place the proposal below the fundable level. Others have encountered similar blocks; for example Holtzworth-Munroe (2005). Eugen Lupri, a pioneer Canadian family violence researcher, has also documented examples of the resistance to funding and publishing research on female-perpetrated violence (Lupri 2004).

Method 7. Harass, Threaten, and Penalize Researchers Who Produce Evidence That Contradicts Feminist Beliefs

Suzanne Steinmetz made the mistake of publishing a book and articles (Steinmetz 1977, 1977-1978) which clearly showed about equal rates of perpetration by males and females. Anger over this resulted in a bomb threat at her daughter's wedding, and she was the object of a letter writing campaign to deny her promotion and tenure at the University of Delaware. Twenty years later the same processes resulted in a lecturer at the University of Manitoba whose dissertation found gender symmetry in PV being denied promotion and tenure.

My own experiences have included having one of my graduate students being warned at a conference that she will never get a job if she does her PhD research with me. At the University of Massachusetts, I was prevented from speaking by shouts and stomping. The chairperson of the Canadian Commission on Violence against Women stated at two hearings held by the commission that nothing that Straus publishes can be believed because he is a wife-beater and sexually exploits students, according to a Toronto Magazine article. When I was elected President of the Society for the Study of Social Problems and rose to give the presidential address, a group of members occupying the first few rows of the room stood up and walked out.

Concluding Comments

The seven methods described above have created a climate of fear that has inhibited research and publication on gender symmetry in PV and largely explain why an ideology and treatment modality has persisted for 30 years, despite hundreds of studies which provide evidence on the multiplicity of risk factors for PV, of which patriarchy is only one. Because of space limitations and because I am a researcher not a service provider, I have not covered the even greater denial, distortion and coercion in prevention and treatment efforts. An example is the director of a battered women's shelter who was terminated because she wanted to ask the residents whether they had hit their partner and the context in which that occurred. An example of governmental coercion of treatment is the legislation in a number of US states, and policies and funding restrictions in almost all US states that prohibit couple therapy for PV.

Finally, it was painful for me as a feminist to write this commentary. I have done so for two reasons. First, I am also a scientist and, for this issue, my scientific commitments override my feminist commitments. Perhaps even more important, I believe that the safety and well-being of women requires efforts to end violence by women and the option to treat partner violence in some cases as a problem of psychopathology, or in the great majority of cases, as a family system problem (Straus and Scott, in press; Hamel and Nicholls 2006).

Why are atheists so religious?

Paul Elam · 7 February 2012 · Archived copy · Original

I have often wondered if my state of mind as an atheist has also played a role in becoming a men's rights activist. I like to think I view things objectively; that I rely on available science rather than faith or folklore to shape my beliefs. That attitude has certainly helped me to understand issues like domestic violence and alleged wage gaps as much as it has evolution.

I have been hindered, though, in my ability to form alliances in the atheist community by two critical factors. One, my atheism does not lend me to being antagonistic or condescending to people of faith. I am not frightened by them and I don't find them to be ignorant or deficient. Indeed, I have no investment whatsoever in the personal religious beliefs of anyone I encounter, a trait I find lacking in some religious people and to a much greater degree, atheists.

But the other problem here is much more significant. The problem I have with atheists is that they are too religious. Yes, I mean that literally. For when you wipe away all the bombastic bellowing about empiricism and the strident mocking of those who choose a life of faith, what you are left with is a population of people that surrender their reason and cognition as though they were at gunpoint; that hit their knees as fast as any Catholic…to worship at the altar of feminism.

There are some notable exceptions, of course, but in the rank and file of vocal atheists, particularly in their online incarnation, what I have found is a culture of indoctrinated clones, with no more discernment of fact and fiction than you would find at a Branch Davidian revival. Indeed, they are so ideologically rigid that the only things these people are missing are shaved heads, tambourines and two weeks without a shower.

I got a slight taste of this in 2009 after penning an article about a Levi Strauss ad campaign for Men's News Daily. One of the writers at Atheist Nexus picked up on it and used it to pose a question to the reader base there. He referred to the piece, and said, quite cautiously, that it "prompted me to wonder if AlN is ready for a true discussion of masculinity."

And they were, as long as it was within the parameters of the approved feminist narrative. Though there were some decent comments early on, the instructive feminist posturing on gender, concerns about homophobia and of course ultimately the fresh-out-of-women's-studies indoctrination talk, like "the binary of masculine-feminine which is the dominant gender identifier in the West and the socialized nature of what we call masculine and feminine," eventually took over and all was lost in a sea of conflated femmo-babble. No real discussion of masculinity took place, at least nothing near in the context of my article, which was the supposed centerpiece of the OP.

With a couple of refreshing exceptions what transpired between the members of this oh-so-erudite group was a demonstration of feminist dominance and cluelessness, complete with the obligatory attack on MND for fearing women's equality. Or as one devout atheist-feminist put it:

> The whole web site mensnewsdaily.com is a sad overreaction to the growing equality of women in society.

These people are forward thinkers; people who think they have overcome ages of religious indoctrination and bravely stand to tell the world their vision isn't clouded by superstition and fantasy?

Apparently they can't even handle 50 years of loud mouthed arts majors without drinking the Kool-aide and going brain dead. There was scarcely a voice among them that did not wallow in the ersatz enlightenment so common to feminist ideologues. There was no real discussion, just an impotent thread that came to a rather underwhelming and predictably vacuous conclusion.

I understand the phenomena all too well. Feminism, as far as ideology goes, has been very effective at using human reproductive realities to co-opt other movements. In fact, from the American Civil Rights Movement to Occupy

Wall Street, feminism has progressed without paying its own way, but rather by sending women in to other social arenas and wheedling men into supporting them. The Borg would be proud if they had emotions. Resistance is Futrelle.

All of this goes to demonstrate the power of reproductive dynamics between men and women. Even in a sub culture that places an unusually passionate emphasis on science and empirical evidence, the dogma of gender feminism, complete with the entire litany of enabling fantasies, was just able to waltz in and take over.

You find this in the work of PZ Myers, a zealous ideologue with an openly feminist agenda who makes no bones about what men should do in the presence of women. They should put a piece of tape over their dominant, patriarchal mouths and shut up. So says Myers:

> Listen. To. The. Women.
> I've got a simple suggestion for my fellow men. Learn to shut up and listen. Seriously. You want women to find your organization pleasant and interesting and worth contributing to? Then don't form panels full of men trying to figure out what women want, talking over women who try to get a word in edgewise, belittling women's suggestions with jokes, and trying to determine how We Well-Meaning Men can give Those Women what we think they want. You are assuming an authority and presuming that it is in your power to give it to the minority, when what you should be doing is deferring to that minority and giving them your attention, letting them speak and shape your organization.

If that is not enough bilge for you, he also recommends that you click on over to be treated to more shaming at the hands of fellow ideologues Sharon Moss and Lyz Liddell, who are making it their mission to convince free thinkers (there's a fucking laugh) of the male persuasion to similarly shut their mouths and let feminists dictate their sense of decency as well as their beliefs, rational or not.

How's that for humanism?

As an atheist, I will be the first to admit that I take some issue with the male disposability often furthered by religious doctrine, and I surely do not approve of the way many modern churches have taken a top-down pro-feminist stance. But I understand that sort of thing a good bit more in communities that so strongly attach themselves to tradition.

What I find utterly laughable, though, is the idea that a collection of people whose raison d'être appears inextricably tied to freedom of ideas and independence from groupthink, now find themselves in open public view, turning their hymnals to the instructed page, and singing for phony salvation.

The more of Myers you read, the more you get the idea that masculinity is his version of original sin, and that he is constantly trying to indoctrinate his readers (or is it congregation?) to fall into line with it; without thinking, without dissent. Religiously.

Just shut up and listen to the women. How long, one has to wonder, before PZ wants us all to pray to them?

The next red pill: part II

Stephen O'Brian · 7 February 2012 · Archived copy · Original

I recently wrote an article about some of the exciting new developments in male contraception technology from an MRA perspective – specifically about the various Non Hormonal Male Birth Control Pills (*NHMBCP*s) being developed (1). One of them contains Gardarusa – a herbal extract that goes on sale in Indonesia this year. (2) In response several challenges were presented touting problems for the clinical development and men's uptake of the new NHMBCP. Interesting food for thought, for which I'm thankful, and yet as an MRA I remain very optimistic. Why? Well, let's get to that.

First though, by way of preamble I want to remind readers of something I said in the first article –

> Scour the internet, as I did recently, looking for feminist commentary on the topic of the imminent non-hormonal male birth control pill (NHMBCP) and chances are that you'll find a huge and telling silence. I say huge because I can think of no other aspect of sexuality and reproduction that feminists aren't talking about. Female birth control, conception, childbirth, abortion, adoption – they're all covered extensively from a feminist point of view with articles, academic papers, and blogs easily accessible. All of this, yet when it comes to the topic of the non-hormonal male birth control pill – wall to wall silence.
> Something is up. Something very big I figure.
> The answer as to why such a silence exists seems fairly obvious to me as it's contained within the very name of the product itself:
> Male non hormonal birth control pill."

That said, now to the issues that got raised by responders to the first article.

The concern has been raised that men using a NHMBCP would still suffer from paternity fraud. Women could get impregnated by some other guy and try to pin it on an innocent cuckold.

I have another view. A guy only need capture himself on one of our now ubiquitous smart-phone's video cameras ingesting the male pill or get someone to witness them taking it (remember the Israeli version of the NHMBCP – Non Hormonal Male Birth Control Pill apparently only needs be taken once a month/3 months) and any confused/lying woman claiming he has paternity hasn't a leg to stand on. She can bleat all she likes that the guy got her pregnant, but he isn't going to be on the hook for 18 years of child support, because not only will he be able to point to evidence he took the pill, he can also insist on DNA testing to back up his story if need be as well.

More than that though, by making a false accusation of paternity and getting caught out, the woman gets herself into a whole lot of social trouble again resultant from recent male invented technological advances – despite any judge's white knight/feminist pussy pass leniency. For what she does is not a good look to the actual man she fucked, nor to any fertile potential fathers looking on and getting character analysis about her via social media. Remember, all of this would be taking place in a world with a massive sperm shortage for women due to NHMBCP uptake. Therefore, short of successfully hiding her identity, she essentially then puts herself out of the game of reproduction thereafter. The manosphere sees to it she becomes a socially vetted fertility pariah in other words. Guys might even invent their own language for such instances –

Guy A – "Hey Kyle, what do you reckon to Cindy? She any good?"

Guy B – "Nah, She's a dead egg man. Got caught double dipping. Shame. She's a looker, but she's a hooker." Laughs…….

Besides which, if this NHMBCP catches on as much as I imagine it's eventually going to in the misandric West then where is she going to find a fertile guy in any case? The number of fertile guys is going to be as rare as hen's teeth. All those millions of biologically ticking women amidst an absolute, male controlled, sperm drought. That's massive male power. BTW, Google it and I'm sure you'll find as I did that –

Already in many countries sperm banks can't get enough sperm to meet demand. That's only going to increase as the NHMBCP gets taken up.

I see also there's been mention of stem cells being used to produce sperm so women won't even need men to breed – feminist's wet dream. (3)

Not going to happen. Women need men far too much for that. Even if the technology were readily available for humans, which it isn't, can you imagine for a moment the vast majority of women deciding – "Oh I know! Let's all get pregnant by stem cells…without men…Hell yeah! You go Girlz! It'll be OK, we don't need men. We can build our own roads, dig our own coal, farm our own animals and plants, fix our own plumbing/roofs/cars/boats etc. We can deal with pests, provide security, go to sea in trawlers, run our own power stations, telecommunications centers and hubs and run all the transportation, plus we have all these female geniuses to invent more stuff too…ppppffffff

I've been doing web-searches and there's zilch overt feminist response to this article that I can see. Now, I don't preclude that feminists may be twittering and tweeting and god knows what else in private to one another about it. But the fact remains that in the public domain they are silent.

I think that's because there's nothing they can say. I figure they're like stunned possums trapped in the headlights of a truck they can't stop – frozen. Best strategy they have is to try to ignore it and maybe it will go away – only it won't. As I've thought about this today already I've noticed I'm walking with a bit more swagger and inner confidence.

This really is a fascinating position for us modern men to be in.

I'm also thinking it's such a sensational topic it might well be used to spread the word about the deservedness of Men's Rights in general. I think of it as a kind of cultural leverage. I mean, imagine for a moment you're a naive blue pill guy (I know, not a good feeling) and you come across a news article on the male pill – say about a bunch of guys declaring themselves fans and pushing for it's release to market. That could get you curious, right? You see/read/hear the news report and discover guys interviewed in your country (USA, UK, Canada etc.) or perhaps from Indonesia where men start using Gardarusa pills this year who either want to use it or are already using it ->>> to avoid paternity fraud and subsequent child support (the MRA issues attached).

All of a sudden I can see the MRA red pill being ingested in increasing numbers and spreading globally.

There's another angle to all of this too. Global population is currently said to be 7 billion and rising soon to a perfect storm of overpopulation crisis by 2030 according to some political analysts (4) (5).

It makes sense then, that in densely populated countries where citizens want a lower population, increased per capita income and life quality with more space and less pollution there is going to be a lot of pressure to uptake the NHMBCP as is happening in Indonesia. In a globalized, increasingly mobile world how long will that be able to be contained to pockets of the globe. Not for long I figure. I'll bet there are guys right now scouring the net to see how they can get Gardarusa into the USA. Others will be getting their passports in order for a jaunt to Jakarta to try out Gradarusa for themselves or report on it at least.

Meanwhile, amidst this, one of the most momentous social/technological moments in history see if you can hear feminists online. Me? I find it's so eerily quiet I can hear a pin drop. (6)

Another F-word: Flood, now Fisher

Greg Canning · 8 February 2012 · Archived copy · Original

It would be difficult to imagine a male radical feminist more extreme in his views supporting elite white female supremacy than Michael Flood. However, the White Ribbon Campaign Australian appears to have found a contender. A feminist by the name of Stephen Fisher has penned the "White Ribbon Policy Research Series No. 3" titled "From Violence to Coercive Control: Renaming Men's Abuse of Women."[1] Fisher, as far as I can determine from a quick Internet search, is a Ph.D. candidate at Deakin University in Victoria whose doctoral subject is listed as "Effectively communicating for gender equality."

The introduction states that The White Ribbon Policy Research Series is intended to "present contemporary evidence," however there is neither evidence nor research to be found, only discriminatory, misandric opinion, anecdote and unsubstantiated claims regarding the gendered nature of "men's violence against women." Not unexpectedly a paltry 3 references are cited.

White Ribbon has no interest in impartial research on family violence, or acknowledging the now widely accepted gender inclusive model of family violence that views "violence against women" as but one form of violence, and includes all the forms of family and relationship violence including those predominantly perpetrated by women (child abuse, elder abuse, lesbian IPV)[2].

Such an inclusive view that argues for an examination of the multifactorial personal and social determinants of violence of which gender is but one small part is contrary to the prevailing feminist ideology behind the White Ribbon Campaign that sees violence against women as the only aspect of family violence worthy of attention. The subtext of this philosophy is that all violence worthy of attention rooted in male privilege and patriarchal dominance. So naturally they embrace any pseudo academic treatise such as this endorsing their prejudice.

Fisher commences with this gem:

> "The choice of words is always a political, value-laden decision and based on theoretical premises."

And while his intent is to imply that terms such as Domestic Violence, Family Violence, and IPV are chosen to conceal the gendered nature of "violence against women by men," he neglects to mention that such terms have been used by the almost exclusively feminist researchers who have dominated this area for more than fifty years. Further, he betrays his intent in arguing for the renaming of family violence, which is for political and ideological reasons rather than for impartiality or intellectual integrity.

Violence is also an unsatisfactory term in Fishers estimation because it disguises the non-physically violent aspects of Family Violence "such as emotional, sexual, financial and spiritual violence." Indeed, an inclusive view would acknowledge that it is precisely these areas in which women excel in their abuse of men. Notably women are the predominant users of "administrative abuse," a term coined by Australian psychologist Elizabeth Celi [3], relating to the use of false or trivial protection orders, the police, the courts, the child support agency or other statutory authorities as tools of abuse. Most men will be familiar with the widespread abuse of sexual power by women, the withholding of approval and affection, wielded in a passive aggressive manner in manipulation of their partners to enforce conformity with their desires. Certainly coercive control would appear to be a reasonable descriptor for this predominantly female behavior.

Fisher would make the second wave feminists of the 60's proud with his support for patriarchal conspiracy theory. He writes, "The issue is one of systematic power inequalities and a society that supports men's entitlement to a range of gender privileges." But rather than enlighten us on what those supposed privileges and inequities actually are he stereotypes men in this way; " The benefits to men are great: he is more likely to be serviced, have food prepared for him, have the house cleaned, have children prevented from disturbing him, have sex on demand." While such a "division of labor" may have been common in the past it is rare nowadays. Do we consider women who choose to work full time and partners that choose to be stay at home dads in this light? Of course not, it is exactly because of equality that some couples choose to reverse the traditional gender roles, and it will be real equality when as many men in relationships have the option of being homemakers and stay at home dad's as women do.

Disguised abuse in public (a charmer) and overt abuse in private (a terrorizer) is in Fishers view a male-only strategy of abuse. He is clearly unaware of research showing gender symmetry in intimate terrorism [4],[5], and the association of Borderline Personality Disorder (a predominately female diagnosis) with this pattern of abuse. Rather than impartially and comprehensively assessing the growing literature on family violence, Fisher asserts that "men who are committed to supporting this important work must continuously strive to listen to and read the work of feminists who have worked tirelessly for decades for gender equality."

Further we must allow our masculinity to be redefined because:

> "The dominant sense of manhood in Australia is built on the idea of being tough, in control, competitive and smart. Coercive control is the logical outcome of enacting this unfortunately commonplace form of masculinity."

Is not the feminist ideal for women to be bold, independent, intelligent, success oriented, and so on, and if so why would this dominant sense of femininity not lead to coercive controlling behavior by women? We all know the answer to that! It does, and this is likely why one in three victims of family violence in Australia is a man. Fisher is none too happy that a website exists [6] to inform the community about this because his is the only "proper understanding of men's violence against women." And of course rather than argue for real gender equality, he concludes with a number of recommendations that should only be applied to men's violence against women despite their applicability to violence between any family members. [7]

That this sort of adulterated, intellectually bankrupt trash can be passed off as a legitimate policy research paper by White Ribbon is yet another symptom of their terminal decay into ideological extremism.

Steven Fisher's lies to Australian men

John Hembling (JtO) · 8 February 2012 · Archived copy · Original

Addressing the hatred, lies, and bigotry of the white ribbon campaign: A counter-argument in opposition to institutionalized corruption and malice.

The men and boys of Australia are under concerted attack from an established, moneyed, and mainstreamed religion of hate. The proponents and actors of this ideology occupy seats in government, the civil service, in Australian academia, and in privileged positions in much of the non-profit as well as for-profit private sector. The ideologues pushing this movement forward are re-writing laws to denude men of their legal rights, access to justice, and any representation in government whether local or national. This social trend represents a long term degradation of the quality of life for all Australians, and will have far reaching negative consequences to the fabric of civil society, and the economic prosperity of the country. However, the gravest and most immediate outcomes are now, and will be, for the men and boys of Australia. This document is written with their interest, their civil rights and recognition of their humanity in mind.

In 1914 despite widespread pro-war propaganda, male enthusiasm for shipping off to be slaughtered was low. To overcome the reluctance of young men to get themselves killed or maimed for the benefit of a few hereditary elites and royals, Admiral Charles Fitzgerald began organizing a groups of women to help "convince" the men of Britain to enlist.

The objective of these groups was to shame civilian men into joining the armed services. This was accomplished by public humiliation — with women handing out white feathers to any man who did not wear a uniform. The feathers were intended as a badge of disgrace, branding the men who received them as cowards, the primary effect of which as to render them as unsuitable in the eyes of women. Women of all backgrounds contributed their influence to this effort, to the great benefit of armed services recruiters.[/box]

In Australia, a similar assault on the character of men comes from Stephen Fisher, a quisling in radical feminism's war on male identity. Fisher is the author of Australia's White Ribbon Policy Research document titled:

From Violence to Coercive Control:
Renaming Men's Abuse of Women

In this campaign, men are publicly targeted by women and confronted, receiving a demand to wear a white ribbon as proof of their support for branding men generally as abusers. This assault is thinly disguised as a well intended plan to protect women from an epidemic of domestic violence. But, the epidemic happens to be fictional. Abusive men are the decided minority and occur with no more frequency than abusive women.

The purpose of this discussion is not one of converting opinions. Men aware of their own lives don't need to be told they're not violent abusers. However, the sickeningly dishonest and hateful white ribbon campaign aims to do much deeper harm than simply accusing all of Australia's men and boys with violence in which they have no part.

In a strategy of surpassing cruelty and malice, the white ribbon campaign endeavors to re-characterize nearly every aspect of masculine thought, masculine sexuality, and masculine agency as pathological and violent. The invisible, fictional, and unsupportable narrative of omnipresent male against female violence cannot be maintained, and so a new fairy tale is being packaged and sold.

Violence in the real world is measurable, and its absence is equally measurable; making that old lie a useful tool of public policy increasingly difficult. The white feather campaign's new lie is that non-violent, non-pathological and non-abusive behavior is part of a continuum of oppressive coercion and control of women.

The migration from claims of actual violence to an ephemeral, invisible, but socially systematic coercion and control places this narrative of claimed oppression beyond easy refutation by evidence, and that is deliberate. In a socially level playing field this tactic would be impossible, but in a society already gripped by the narrative of a radical feminist zeitgeist, dissenters to this unsupportable hogwash can be silenced, marginalized, blacklisted, and censored. Bigots already control the ideology now running Australian government, law enforcement, the courts, and education. Now, they want your mind.

The white ribbon's assault on Australian men begins with the following falsehood.

> The White Ribbon Campaign is the largest global male-led movement to stop men's violence against women.

This is false. The white ribbon campaigns purpose is to de-legitimize and to demonize male identity; to build fear and resentment between men and women in Australian society. It is to weaken families and to render the public less able to oppose the increasingly totalitarian reach of Australian government into the lives of all Australian men and women.

The white ribbon introduction continues:

> It engages and enables men and boys to lead this social change. In Australia, White Ribbon is an organization that works to prevent violence by changing attitudes and behaviors.

This is code, and what it means is that the white ribbon campaign aims to convince men and boys that no matter what kind of humans they are; decent, hard working, and loving human beings, that because they are male, they are corrupt, violent and innately evil. This is to be corrected by indoctrination into the belief that they should be beasts of burden in service of feminist elites, academics, and bureaucrats.

My brothers, don't fall for this lie you are being sold.

> "The prevention work is driven through social marketing, Ambassadors and initiatives with communities, schools, universities, sporting codes, and workplaces."

This is a program of indoctrination, and it's goal is to claim domain over your mind and your identity as men. You will be what feminists determine you to be, and that is the vile oppressors of all women, to be made sorry and supplicant and to atone through your utility to these ideologues.

The white ribbon campaign is in no way concerned with protecting women. It is concerned solely with the marginalization of men, and to enslave minds, your mind.

Throughout this hateful piece of feminist agitprop, claims of fact are made with the purported goal of protecting women. This ruse is a cynical and calculated appeal toward the good nature of men to compromise their own human rights in service of supposed protection of their female friends, lovers and relatives. While pushing a narrative of innate male evil, men's innate goodwill is callously exploited to coerce male compliance.

From the Fisher policy report we have this slick and cynical deception:

There are a number of key points that men involved in men's violence prevention should understand. These include the following (lies stated for truth):

- "Violence is gendered"

This is false. Almost all peer reviewed research on domestic violence demonstrates that men and women are violent within intimate relationships at equal rates.

In non-domestic criminal violence, men are correctly identified as the majority of offenders, but the facile and populist reading of this ignores that due to an average lesser physical stature than men and differing psychology, women utilize force and violence indirectly rather than directly. Violence is not gendered.

The next lie in Fisher's report:

- Violence is primarily a social and structural problem, not an individual or medical one"

This is a statement calculated to justify persecution of men and boys without regard for their commission or non-commission of supposed acts of coercion or violence. If somewhere, anywhere, a single solitary woman is subject to violence, then all men are guilty of it, especially you.

Fisher's ambition exceeds even that summary, by changing the language from violence to coercion, a much more slippery fish to nail down, as this creeping evil can be claimed in all social interactions.

The lies continue:

- "Violence involves processes of coercive control rather than only acts causing physical injury"

This sweeping claim, if allowed to pass enables all male expression, action, and identity to be treated as social pathology. The only good men in such a narrative are slaves in chains. If you swallow this lie, gentlemen, or allow its utterance without challenge, then the chains will be on your mind and your identity.

Fisher's next item of agenda is as follows:

- "Men's physical violence against women is a crime"

This seems obvious, uncontroversial and unchallenging. The interesting element is what is left unstated. The word only.

Only men's physical violence against women is a crime, women's violence against men is not.

Finally, Fisher attributes a motive of malice to men and boys, in an ultimate demonstration of projection.

- "Perpetrators act in dynamic and strategic ways."

This is a back-handed way to re-characterize all nonviolent, non-coercive, and non-pathological behavior by men as an offense.

If you are a loving father, husband, or hard working man, Fisher has created a narrative in which everything you do is attributed a motive of harm to women.

Here is his plan – presented to you without adornment or translation:

> Each of these points can be best addressed by taking a pro feminist stance on men's violence against women.
> Such a stance "… acknowledges the gendered nature of this violence; addresses the complex nature of power, status and inequality between women and men in our society; and is committed to eliminating both this violence and its impact to improve the lives of women and children."

The message here, gentle men and brothers, is conform; obey.

I'll offer a different suggestion. Don't obey, don't conform, and do not accept this vile attempt to render you a slave. As a man who recognizes and values his own humanity apart from utility to a cynical bureaucrat or a banker, I urge Australian men to believe in themselves apart from the cynical mandate of servitude Stephen Fisher would map for you.

I'm asking you, men of Australia, don't fall for the sick lie you're being sold. Don't take this assault on yourself and your sons lying down. It's also an assault on your families, and indirectly, on your wives, daughters and mothers, and female friends and lovers.

It is a cynical and perverse attempt to de-humanize you, and force your compliance and cooperation in your dehumanization. Tell Stephen Fisher to take his white feather campaign and go fuck himself.

In a recent "experiment" I wrote an article on feminist influence in the atheist community. Given that the conversation that followed did not devolve into flame war between the Godly an the Godless, I think it turned out pretty well, and speaks to the focus of MRA's, even those with vastly different views on religion.

What also came about in the discussion was an acknowledgement of the ideological parasitism that constitutes modern feminism, and how the philosophy mimics the characteristics of a virus in order to spread.

We thought this would make good discussion for the next episode of AVfM Radio, where we will examine how feminist ideology has begun to usurp the collective consciousness of a growing segment of the population that connect to each other based on their rejection of religion. And in that we witness the erosion of reliance on hard science and empiricism that many atheists would say is core to their system of beliefs.

Just as we have witnessed in some elements of the religious community, feminist influence has resulted in the undermining of the very principles on which these individuals rely.

While we will likely, predictably, need to over explain that we are not pigeon holing the entire atheist world, we do consider this show to be a challenge to vocal atheists to confront the pseudo-science, mythology and outright quackery that feminism is now bringing in to the realm of atheist expression.

Hopefully, before we are done, MRA's of differing views will find more common ground, and PZ Myers will be limping to the drug store for some KY Jelly.

Campus warrior against political correctness

Pierce Harlan · 9 February 2012 · Archived copy · Original

College campuses are among the least tolerant places in America. Smug, elitist faculty gravitate to the easily mouthed clichés of feminism and other forms of political correctness to give them a false veneer of enlightenment and sophistication, and to separate them from the "guns and religions" crowd they find so abhorrent. This veneer arms them with McCarthyistic bats to attack anyone who doesn't share their world view.

When someone in that world isn't afraid to stand up against the purveyors of forced orthodoxy, the fetishists of group identity victimhood, well, as Arthur Miller wrote, "Attention, attention must finally be paid to such a person."

Meet Prof. John McAdams of Marquette University.

Prof. McAdams holds court in a no-holds-barred blog called Marquette Warrior, which is my source for the following. Prof. McAdams' blog notes beneath its title: "This site has no official connection with Marquette University. Indeed, when University officials find out about it, they will doubtless want it shut down."

Last December, a student complained to Prof. McAdams' political science department chairperson that Prof. McAdams had made comments in class about rape that constituted "harassment based on gender" and were "demeaning to rape victims."

What terrible thing did Prof. McAdams utter? Prof. McAdams had the temerity, as he put it, to "disagree with feminist claims about date rape."

Lock the doors and hide the children!

Here's what happened: in Prof. McAdams' introductory American Politics class, he was discussing media bias, "and how one can recognize media bias when the media accept bogus and inflated numbers as factual." He used as a contemporary example "one that the students have almost certainly been subjected to as part of their university indoctrination: the idea that 25% of all college women are victims of 'date rape.'"

That didn't sit well with a feminist in the class. "The student who complained didn't think such statistics should be debunked," said Prof. McAdams, "apparently since campus rape is a serious problem (and therefore inflating the scope of the problem serves a good purpose)."

But "the number is absurdly inflated," he insisted. He told the class about the infamous Koss report. "Feminists are defining rape far too broadly. Ambiguous sexual encounters, often fueled by alcohol, are defined as 'rape' by feminist researchers, but not defined that way by purported victims." And: "We point out that feminists insist that if a woman consents to sex under the influence of alcohol, she has been raped."

"This past semester we piled on a bit," the good professor admits, "by pointing out to our class that 'this is yet another issue, like abortion, where academic feminists simply don't think like real women in the real world.'"

The head of Prof. McAdams' department wouldn't give McAdams a copy of the complaint lodged against him. Echoing procedures likely last employed in Star Chamber, counsel for the university determined that Prof. McAdams could only read the text of the complaint, but he couldn't have a copy.

If you are scratching your head, or other parts of your anatomy, over that one, welcome to the rarefied halls of academia.

Prof. McAdams gave the department chair his side of the story. Then, on his blog, Prof. McAdams wrote this — and make sure you are sitting down: "In a properly run university, some administrator would sit this prissy little feminist down and explain to her 'this is a university, you are going to hear things you disagree with. Live with it.' But a timid administration, used to genuflecting to all the demands of political correctness, will never do that." He also made it clear he would not back down: "We will, of course, say exactly the same things about rape when we teach the same class next semester."

The venerable organization FIRE proceeded to take up the good professor's cause. It concluded that "by pursuing this investigation, Marquette is letting a single student entangle a professor in disciplinary proceedings simply due to protected classroom expression. How many professors at Marquette are now going to steer clear of sensitive topics just to avoid an Ethics Point investigation?"

In late January, the chair of Prof. McAdams' department told him that he and the provost had decided not to pursue the claim because Prof. McAdams was within his rights to say what he said.

Great, right? Not so fast.

The head of Prof. McAdams' department "suggested that perhaps we criticized feminists in an 'uncivil' way in class." What's the evidence for that? He said that Prof. McAdams "accused feminists of lying" in an office meeting. Prof. McAdams claims he said that feminists lie about the incidence of rape. "That's a much more limited (and entirely accurate) statement," he correctly noted.

Marquette refused to put the resolution of the case in writing, and Prof. McAdams fears that the school's administrators "want to keep open the option of using 'sexual harassment' in the future as a pretext to shut up faculty speech that the politically correct crowd does not like. They doubtless find this option very desirable, especially for use against some faculty member less combative than we are."

The bottom line is that Prof. McAdams isn't happy. He notes that "it's often prudent for administrators to pander to politically correct faculty, given that they are very numerous, and very vociferous in wanting to shut up speech they dislike."

When I read about Prof. McAdams, I thought about someone seemingly unrelated — Earl Weaver, the long-time manager of the Baltimore Orioles who's now in baseball's Hall of Fame. Why on earth did I think about Earl Weaver? Mr. Weaver was ejected from over 90 regular season games in his illustrious career because he constantly argued with umpires, often in the most operatic fashion. According to Jim Caple of ESPN.com, Earl Weaver "once told an umpire that he could appear on 'What's My Line' wearing his mask, chest protector and ball/strike indicator and still nobody would guess he was an umpire."

What good did it do Mr. Weaver's team? An umpire once revealed that when he and his colleagues worked games with Mr. Weaver managing, they were a little more careful to make correct calls.

My guess is that, from now on, Marquette will be a little more careful when it comes to Prof. McAdams.

Flashback: A rape lie and a curfew for men and boys

Pierce Harlan · 10 February 2012 · Archived copy · Original

George Santayana was wrong. Even those who can remember the past are condemned to repeat it. The incident I'm about to describe occurred more than 20 years ago, yet the same sort of thing keeps happening, over and over. Still, we should look back, if only to remind us what's coming again.

Last year, July 29 to be exact, marked the twentieth anniversary of something that didn't happen–an imaginary rape that turned the teenage boys of the bucolic college town of Davis, California into creatures more loathsome than pariahs.

On August 2, 1991, Janet Berger, 44, who was then a circulation manager for a local Davis newspaper, falsely claimed she had been raped on July 29, 1991 at 10 p.m. by five skateboarding boys in one of the city's park-like greenbelts.

Berger said the supposed rape was in retaliation for her act of accidentally brushing up against one of the youths on her bicycle earlier in the evening. She claimed that on her return trip along the same path, a wilding gang of skateboarding teen males in tank tops, ages 13-17, wrestled her from her bike and proceeded to rape her.

Two weeks later, Berger told a rape counselor and police that it was a lie: she had merely fallen from her bicycle and she had made up the rape story. She furnished neither an explanation nor a motive.

But it's what happened during those two weeks to one particular class of citizens, the teen male skateboarding community, that makes this story instructive.

Immediately following the spurious allegation, the news media took the woman at her word. One headline solemnly announced: "Rape shatters illusions in Davis."

Anonymous flyers were circulated calling for a curfew for all men and boys.

Threatening, anti-male graffiti was scrawled on an overpass favored by skateboarders. It read: "Dead Boys Don't Rape."

Other graffiti repeated the "Curfew for All Men" sentiment; still other graffiti demanded: "Get the Skateboard Rapists."

Apoplectic women's groups ran out of synonyms for the word "shock."

The newspaper where Berger worked reported that a rally was planned in "support of the rape victim and other rape victims." But then the rally was canceled at Berger's request.

A local chapter of the National Organization for Women held a news conference to denounce the alleged crime. And townsfolk demanded arrests, even though the only evidence of the putative assault was the word of an unidentified woman the townsfolk knew nothing about.

Police questioned 75 completely innocent boys in connection with the rape that never happened.

Skateboarders kept a low profile once the woman's story became public. "After it happened, there wasn't a skateboarder in town," said Bill Gray, a Yolo County youth counselor at Davis High School.

One of the innocent boys taken in for questioning was then-16-year-old Josh Fernandez, who is now a mid-30s married man and a writer. Josh, then an avid skateboarder, knew as soon as he heard the allegation that he and his friends would be targeted.

"Once, when we were taking a break from skateboarding in the parking lot of Carl's Jr.," Josh recalled, "a car pulled up. In the car was a man, about 40, who had a ratlike face with a patchy mustache. 'Hey, you fucking rapists,' he said, with his window rolled halfway down. He tried to spit on me, but the saliva didn't quite make it out of his car."

Josh told the man, "Fuck you," but was glad that the man sped off, "because, frankly, he would have pummeled me to death with his white-trash methamphetamine arms."

This was typical, according to Josh: "For a couple of weeks, wherever we went, something of that nature would happen: A truck full of UC Davis jocks threw a dozen soda cans at us and screamed, 'Rapists!'; Butchy Davis women in hemp dresses glared us down with their murderous eyes as we rolled past on the sidewalk—and so on."

"I don't know about my friends," Josh later wrote, "but there were moments that summer when—even in my gangly, 5-foot frame—I felt like a big, lumbering, greasy rapist."

Police finally decided Berger's story was filled with holes, so they confronted her with the inconsistencies. One key failing in her story was her refusal to reveal the name of a doctor she claimed examined her.

"The reason I can't give you a doctor," Berger finally told police, "is because there is none."

Police officers and a rape counselor spoke to her for 3 1/2-hours, and she finally acknowledged the fabrication.

Davis Police Chief Phil Coleman called a news conference to announce the jig was up. Flanked by politicians, two detectives, and two rape counselors, the Chief said the rape never occurred.

Mayor Maynard Skinner offered an olive branch to the skateboarders, calling them "an important group in our community." He announced that the city planned to open a skateboard park.

The mayor also called on the woman, Jan Berger, 44, to publicly apologize. (I can find no indication whether she did.)

Councilwoman Lois Wolk said: "It's a tragedy for this community. We were very ready to point fingers and make accusations and stereotype groups–men (and) skateboarders."

But then, Wolk proceeded to call Berger a "victim," and said she hoped Berger would receive therapy.

Some local women identified as feminists would not accept the fact that a rape did not occur, and they worried that rape victims might not come forward because the public did not believe this "rape" occurred.

"I don't think any one of us (is) convinced that it didn't happen," said feminist Sherilyn Adams. "It's not uncommon for women to recant out of fear of retaliation . . . or denial–make this thing go away."

Police confirmed a report that Berger ran a small day-care center that was shuttered after children were molested there in 1986. She was never prosecuted for the crimes, but felt responsible. Before she recanted her rape lie, she told a detective "what happened now [the supposed rape] was punishment for what had happened" at the day-care center.

A rape counselor, who told reporters that she only uses her first name (Cheryl), said that Berger did not "act out of malice." Rather, she had experienced unspecified traumas in her life. "She does deserve a great deal of compassion."

There is no indication that the newspapers were at all interested in Josh Fernandez's back-story, or that of the other 74 boys questioned by police.

For a rape lie that pitted an entire community against a group of some of its most vulnerable citizens–children–Berger was charged with a misdemeanor of filing a false police report, carrying a maximum penalty of six months in jail and a $500 fine.

The boys questioned by police never forgot the experience. But Josh Fernandez, the writer, and his friends have done pretty well for themselves. One went on to write jokes for Jay Leno; another is an ophthalmologist; another is a chemist.

When Josh got married a couple of years ago, he got the old gang together to be his groomsmen, and they skipped the traditional bachelor party. Josh rented out an indoor skate park, and these guys now in their mid-30s — who, long ago, were taken to the police station to answer for a lie — skated like they were 16 again.

How I became an MRA: Domestic violence advocacy

Phil in Utah · 11 February 2012 · Archived copy · Original

It should come as no surprise to readers here that feminists only support the rights of women who agree with them, and have no qualms throwing disagreeing women under the bus. To that end, few women (with the possible exception of Phylis Schlafly) have earned as much ire from feminists as Camille Paglia, despite the fact that she describes herself as a feminist. The fact that she described the MRM as "absolutely necessary" probably doesn't help her at all.

The woman has a treasure trove of comments poking fun at mainstream feminists and showing them for the prattling, hypocritical idiots they are. One of my personal favorites is "Leaving sex to feminists is like letting your dog vacation at the taxidermist's." The same, I think, can be said for domestic violence advocacy.

I can speak on this with firsthand experience. As a child, I grew up in a house rife with domestic violence, nearly all of it perpetrated by my mother. She yelled at and beat myself and my sister, but she was far, far worse to our father, who never hit her back, and never raised a finger in his own defense. Until I was taller than her, I lived in constant fear of my mother, and poignantly aware of just how much violence women are capable.

It was a relief for me to discover that I wasn't alone in having to live with the fear of domestic violence. A girl at my school (let's call her Zoey), who'd had similar experiences to mine, introduced me to a number of people bearing helpful alternatives. She told me about a police officer who had been documenting her abuse at the hands of her mother, and about the many advocacy groups that existed to help children and women who were in abusive relationships with no way out. I never met the police officer Zoey had talked to, but the advocacy groups were glad to have me on board.

Feminists often say that women are unable to leave abusive relationships because of financial dependence. It apparently never occurs to them that men (and boys) could be in similar situations. After Zoey's friends made it abundantly clear that what was being done to me was illegal, I threatened on several occasions to call the police on my mother. My mother was a researcher in the School of Nutrition at the local university, and somehow she made more than my dad, who was a professor in the Modern Language department. She was the one bringing home the bacon, and my dad warned me that if I called the police, my mom would lose her job and our family would starve. That was enough to dissuade me, but I still kept up my work with Zoey's friends on behalf of those who could afford to lose an abusive parent or partner.

Zoey's friends were a group of activists, led by several students in the Women's Studies department at my parents' university. They usually had me sitting at their tables, distributing flyers and answering canned questions. I suppose, reflecting on it, that my presence was part of a silent PR effort on their part to dispel the "myth" that feminists hate men. I didn't mind my position at first, since it was easy. When I attended their meetings, they mainly discussed tactics for reaching the public. Remembering how much my father suffered under my mother, I realized that they had been saying very little about adult female-on-male violence. Since they'd been so kind to me, I thought that maybe they were just unaware of what a massive problem it was. They were quite passionate about helping battered women, so I thought they genuinely cared about what they were doing. I approached one of the Women's Studies majors (let's call her Lily) who led the group about the problem of violence against men. When I told her about it, she gave a patronizing smile and said "Honey, I know there are men out there who are being treated cruelly by women, but it's just not a problem worth our time. There aren't men out there fearing for their lives, getting their phone calls cut off, or who are financially dependent on women and forced to stay with them." I was too stunned to tell Lily about my father's position. She also told me about how most domestic violence calls made to police are made by neighbors reporting incidents, and police said that neighbors rarely reported incidents of female-on-male violence.

Unfortunately, I didn't have the knowledge then and there to tell Lily that when a woman hits a man, society usually assumes that the man did something to deserve it. I did, however, do some research of my own, and here I discovered Warren Farrell's work, in particular his citing of studies by Murray Straus and Suzanne Steinmetz, which showed that women are every bit as likely as men to hit. I didn't bother taking the time to read Dr. Farrell's other works, but instead printed out what I thought was necessary.

Another time, I volunteered to help out with a church-sponsored therapy group designed to "cure" abusive men of their violent tendencies toward their wives or girlfriends. I asked each of the men there to tell their stories, and in 90% of the cases, the stories they told were about their wives or girlfriends hitting them first. I listened patiently, and at the end of the meeting, I calmly and casually reprimanded them for not exercising more self-control when they were being assaulted. Since, however, I am a rational, equality-minded person, my approach never completely sat right with my conscience, and I thought this incident worth mentioning to my advocacy group.

I brought my findings to the next meeting of our group, which by then had partnered with MAVAW (Men Against Violence Against Women), an organization better known to us here as the White Ribbon Campaign. When it was my turn to speak, I said that we needed to add a focus on violence against men…I even mentioned the need to help out gay men who were in abusive relationships. Most of those present acknowledged that violence against men did exist, but they said it wasn't a concern of theirs because it was so rare. I passed around the studies I'd found, and asked them to look at them. Oddly enough, the ones who were the most receptive to my message were the women present. The MAVAW White Knights present immediately started barking at me like a bunch of bulldogs, accusing me, among other things, of being a misogynist, of trying to ignore violence against women, and trying to sow discord within the group. Never mind that I'd been campaigning with them for four years, trying to get the general public to take violence against women more seriously; never mind that I had made some rather scathing remarks about abusive men; apparently, my expansion of my sympathies to include abused men somehow meant that I hated women, and obviously beat them myself.

After the meeting, I spoke to Lily about what had happened. She said that she hadn't realized that the studies I cited even existed, and she would start working to include men as a group in need of help. Though I was relieved to hear that, I was devastated when she asked me to leave the group. I asked why she couldn't force the men who had verbally attacked me to leave, and she said it was because they needed them as allies.

A note about Lily: unlike most Women's Studies majors, she was a sweet, open-minded person. Though I wasn't present at any future meetings to confirm it, I heard later that when she had tried to push a pro-male agenda, she was kicked out of the group as well. I was more surprised by the group's actions than by hers, since she was next in line to be in charge of the group. Then, I decided to give The Myth of Male Power a read. The rest, as they say, is history.

Though I'm sure the feminists would love to tell you otherwise, my becoming a Men's Rights Activist hasn't made me at all hateful of or cold to women. I still believe that men who brutalize women are the scum of the Earth. However, I also believe in the "trust, but verify" rule. Women who make accusations of domestic violence should be made to face the same scrutiny as anybody else making an accusation of a crime, and anybody who says otherwise has an agenda. When a woman hits a man and he hits her back, this is not a male-on-female crime; this is reciprocal violence. Likewise, the idea that women are hurt more than men by being abused is a load of crap. Women can do plenty of damage, physical and emotional, and they are far more likely than men to use weapons, kick, bite, or hit with objects. The only reason that violence against women is presumed to be so much worse is because women bruise far more easily than men.

I know first-hand what abuse can do to a person. Nobody, whether they are male, female, gay, straight, bisexual, transsexual, a man who likes to wear women's clothing, a woman who likes to wear men's clothing, black, white, Asian, Hispanic, Christian, Muslim, atheist, feminist, or MRA deserves or should have to experience being abused. If you are being abused, and you have not been trying to provoke your abuser, I will fight for you, no matter which of that combination of groups you fit into. Feminists disagree with me on that. It's funny how they try to paint me as the biased one.

A catalog of feminist lies and cruelty

John Hembling (JtO) · 12 February 2012 · Archived copy · Original

For anyone aware of the rhetoric and the pursued policies of the politically powerful, central established flavor of feminism – it is overwhelmingly obvious that radical feminism is a doctrine of hatred and violence. This is the version of feminism established in university humanities departments. It's proponents inform domestic policies and write white papers for the UN and non-governmental organizations (NGOs). Radical feminism also informs the family courts, law enforcement, education, and employment law. The modern Western world runs on an unambiguously and increasingly feminist zeitgeist. That is to say the ideology driving public policy and opinion is a corrupt, violent, and hateful ideology.

This shouldn't be news to anyone with a passing acquaintance of local and international news. What might not be understood is how completely devoid of a redeeming feature modern – mainstream radical feminist ideology is.

An evaluation of the doctrines and pursued policies of mainstream, big box feminism reveals a damning inventory.

Big, big, big lies. And lots of them.

The doctrine of "Patriarchy theory", although not a scientific theory, states that society is organized to afford social, economic, and political power and privilege to men, at the expense of suppressed rights, and disenfranchisement of women. This doctrine is used to justify domestic policies and programs which elevate women's powers and privileges, in an effort to redress the presumed patriarchal oppression. Oppression against women that is frequently mentioned, but never identified in any single specific detail.

Comparing the claim of patriarchal societal male advantage to mortality rates, workplace death rates, criminal sentencing outcomes, violent criminal victimization, sexually specific medical research funding, and a long list of other factors:

"In sentencing, […] women receive better outcomes; consistent with women's being treated paternalistically in court. Although some contend that the sentencing guidelines harm women, studies have usually concluded that females are sentenced more leniently than males."[1]

According to the US Department of Labor the sexual distribution of individuals killed on the job improved to the benefit of men in 2010. With an improvement of 1 percent, only 92% of those killed on the job in 2010 were men. Men are also 94 to 97% of the homeless [2] in the United States, and 78.9% of suicides [3].

Men today die on average 6 years sooner than women [4][5][6]. In 1920 the variance was one year. The death rates for prostate and breast cancer are similar, but because men die of other things more frequently-accidents, war, heart disease etc., there are fewer men left to die of prostate cancer.

Women also control over 65% of discretionary spending worldwide [7]. In the top 20 markets, women control $10 trillion of $15.3 trillion in consumer discretionary spending. This is known to manufacturers, retailers and advertisers, and is used to drive the profit model in spite of the endlessly claimed "wage gap". The wage gap lie starts from an element of truth. The life-time earnings of women are lower on average than the life-time earnings of men. That this translates to lower pay for the same work is where the spin-doctoring starts. Women, on average, work fewer hours over their lifetimes, and chose jobs affording flexibility, access to friends and family and with lower physical risk. That Bob and Betty work the same job with the same hours, training and seniority is one of feminism's big lies, repeatedly debunked, but endlessly recycled. [8][9][10][11]

The Patriarchy is a myth, a lie, a farce, and so transparently false that repetition of it as a cultural root deserves open and instant contempt. Its purpose is to cultivate guilt, obeisance, and compliance from the demographic whose disposability is the basis for corporate profit and middle class safety.

Do I hear somebody claiming most the top politicians are male? Be quiet, idiot. The electorate putting those alpha male politicians into power is decidedly female [12]. In 2004 in the United States,

44.9% of women and 38.8% of men 18-24 years old voted
55% of women and 48.8% of men 25-44 years old voted
69.4% of women and 72.5% of men 65-74 years old voted

Oh, most executives are male? Gee whiz, have you ever worked 15 years, 65 hours a week, for minimum wage to build a company from zero to profitability? No? Then be quiet again. The patriarchy, if it can be said to occupy reality in any sense at all, exists as a rhetorical device to compel silence.

Rape Culture, the invisible crime wave:

Human sexuality is evil!!! Maybe not, but certainly male sexuality is evil.

- "all men are rapists and that's all they are" ~ Marilyn French
- "And if the professional rapist is to be separated from the average dominant heterosexual [male], it may be mainly a quantitative difference." ~ Susan Griffin
- "When a woman reaches orgasm with a man she is only collaborating with the patriarchal system, eroticizing her own oppression." ~ Sheila Jeffrys
- "Men's sexuality is mean and violent, and men so powerful that they can 'reach WITHIN women to fuck/construct us from the inside out" ~ Judith Levine

This [13] is an incomplete selection of published radical feminist thought (mainstream) on the issue of male sexuality. For the purpose of this discussion, no effort will be made to disabuse anyone of such ideas if they hold them. If that's you, reader, I regard you as damaged beyond any possible salvage.

To everyone else – thank you for your attention.

Not only is the standard narrative false, that stated overtly or covertly, male sexuality is malicious, the idea is fundamentally hateful. It is a lie told in service of promoted hatred.

This same fundamentally hateful lie is reflected in anti-porn, anti-prostitution evangelism. The crusade against porn – a genre of commercial entertainment – ignores the peer reviewed research, in preference to an empirically false dogma that this produced entertainment is harmful and toxic. The common claim is that porn oppresses women. In reality, because porn's audience is mostly male, the real reason for its opposition is the persistent lie that male sexuality is evil.

A few points of data:

[unordered_list style="bullet"]

- Female porn actors make approximately six times more money than male porn actors [14][15].
- For women, porn is a relatively high paying job requiring no skill or education.
- A direct correlation between porn's availability and reduced social pathology in society has been repeatedly established in peer reviewed literature on the topic [16][17][18][19][20].
- Piling on top of the myth of this entertainment as a tool of men's oppression of women, much of the porn industry in the Western world is run by women [21].

[/unordered_list]

In spite of this, Porn Harms and other crusading organizations continue to promote the idiotic idea of porn as a cultural toxin, based on the false idea of its oppression of women. Anti-porn crusaders like Gail Dines, in spite of her apparent unfamiliarity with reality are taken seriously by the conservative right as well as mainstream feminists.

On consideration, it may be that rather than taking her seriously, they find political utility in her irrational zeal for controlling the behavior of adult men and women. The politically established radical feminists and social conservatives also don't care about reality outside of their respective ideologies.

The abstract of the 2009 study titled: "Pornography, Public Acceptance and Sex Related Crime: A Review" [17] published by the university of Hawaii read:

[box]It has been found everywhere scientifically investigated that as pornography has increased in availability, sex crimes have either decreased or not increased. It is further been found that sexual erotica has not only wide spread personal acceptance and use but general tolerance for its availability to adults. This attitude is seen by both men and women and not only in urban communities but also in reputed conservative ones as well. Further this finding holds nationally in the United States and in widely different countries around the world. Indeed, no country where this matter has been scientifically studied has yet been found to think pornography ought be restricted from adults.[/box]

The political support from different ideological camps which should logically oppose one another indicates two facts. That political expediency trumps ethics for supporting political organizations, and that facts do not matter, as reported in the legitimate research on porn's effects. To those opposing porn, what matters is doctrine, not reality. Porn caters to male sexuality – and therefore, it is evil.

Despite the evidence, anti-porn crusaders continue to bang their drum on the totally unsupportable claim that this entertainment genre is innately harmful to women. All credible research on the matter indicates the opposite. This begs the question of motive. While some in this camp are genuinely stupid and ignorant, the anti-porn segment of radical feminism cannot be written off or dismissed on that basis. This leaves several explanatory hypotheses.

Malice.

The hypothesis that actors in the feminist camp exploit the existence of a narrative of women's rights as a cover for personal indulgence in malicious harm to an acceptable enemy has, I believe significant weight. However, while this is a credible motivator for individuals, this fails as an understanding of the larger context of institutional feminism.

Money.

The continued story of women's eternal victimhood is a vehicle for funding for organizations with a purported mandate of harm reduction. Women's crisis centers, domestic violence organizations, and other groups have a demonstrated history of selling a fraudulent narrative in pursuit of government and private donation. If you're in the business of opposing or ameliorating a certain type of crime, such as partner violence, the catch-22 comes when success in that pursuit runs your organization out of business. The grievance industry knows this all too well, as does anybody paying attention. This is what prompted a fellow at the American Enterprise Instrument Christina Hoff Sommers in 2011, speaking to a live audience said on the topic of domestic violence:

"We're not talking about a few errors, we're not talking about occasional lapses; we're talking about a body of egregiously false information at the heart of the domestic violence movement. False claims are pervasive. False claims are not the exception, they are the rule."

This widespread fraud is not limited to grievance advocacy organizations. Eric Holder, the Attorney General of the United States published a letter on the DOJ website [22] in October of 2009 stating that:

"Disturbingly, intimate partner homicide is the leading cause of death for African-American women ages 15 to 45." One paragraph later, Holder says "These numbers are shocking and unacceptable".

What he doesn't say is that they are also a lie? They stats claimed on the DOJ website, in the letter from the Attorney General of the United States are fraud.
The actual leading causes of death for African-American women between the ages 15–45 are cancer, heart disease, unintentional injuries such as car accidents, and HIV disease. Homicide comes in fifth and includes murders by strangers [23][24].

How can this be possible, still on the DOJ website 3 years later, this same fraudulent statistic?

But it gets better. In November 2011, the Centers for Disease Control threw statistical rigor and intellectual honesty out the window with their report:

The National Intimate Partner and Sexual Violence Survey: 2010 Summary Report [25]

According to this survey, in the United States in 2010, approximately 1.3 million women were raped and an additional 12.6 million women and men were victims of sexual violence.

To put this into context, in 2010, the population of the US was 308 million [26], roughly 158,620,000 of whom were female.[27]

If 1.3 million of them were raped in 2010 – that is 1 out of 122 women in the US, raped per year.

According to the United States Bureau of Justice Statistics [28] – in 2009 the rate of rape was 125,910 rapes and sexual assaults in a population of 158,105,000 women. This works out to 1 out of 1256 women in the US, raped per year. For readers unaware of rigor in statistical analysis and its importance, the BJS enjoys an established reputation as the gold standard as a reliable source. The CDCs report claims a jump in victimization rates of more than an order of magnitude.

If we are to believe the CDC's survey, then the rate of rape occurring in the United States is comparable to Rwanda or the Congo during each respective nation's recent civil wars. This is an absurd claim, and the CDC's study represents the zenith of corrupt, ideologically driven advocacy research.

For years, opponents of big feminism have been citing peer reviewed research and statistics in opposition of the ideologically driven domestic policies of a feminist-controlled society. Human rights organizations have pushed for a rational approach to policy based on legitimate data and research. In answer, the established proponents of big box feminism now act to corrupt and pervert the bodies and organizations collecting and analyzing generated statistics.

A rational approach to domestic policy is rendered impossible by the co-opting of the organs of justice, data collection and public research.

After a multi-year campaign of lobbying and activism by the feminist driven Women's Law Centre, the FBI also expanded the scope of the definition of rape to include consensual sex which occurs while a woman is under influence of alcohol or drugs.

Ideologically driven policy, based in unsupportable assumptions is rendered "valid" by the perversion of these previously reliable institutions like the BJS and the CDC.
In the emerging marriage between the various arms of national government and ideological radical feminism, we're witnessing the collapse of the concept of human rights being a foundation of law in the West. This has been painfully evident as the Bush administration and following Bush, the Obama administration, have discarded, dismantled, and ignored almost every one of the ten amendments which constitute the American Bill of Rights.

The move towards a totalitarian state is unmistakable and not a matter of debate without a willful denial of observable reality. However, correlation between this observed phenomenon and the social and political primacy of radical feminism remains an area of deep public denial, due in part to the highly successful promotion by feminists of their agenda as if it is humanist or egalitarian.

"Feminism is the radical notion that women are people"

This puerile nugget of unsavory and false martyrdom has the explicit purpose of pretending women are now, or have been regarded as if they were owned possessions, inanimate objects devoid of humanity. This is a falsehood of surprising depth and utility, as it implies a moral justification for the most overt bigotry and censure of anyone outside the approved victim demographic. This claimed victimhood, demanding of special consideration is the misdirecting cloak of the tyrant.

For individuals concerned about the rapid erosion of human rights in the US and elsewhere, the elephant in the room is the undeniable connection between economic, industrial, and political elites and the ideological actors of feminism, who by placement in academia and the non-profit public sector are themselves social elites. The public mythology promoted by feminism's adherents holds this movement to be a grass-roots social movement driven by public conscience. This story, still accepted by most people, is the polar opposite of the truth. Feminism is a constructed social movement, conceived and sold to the public by society's economic and political elites, through a fabricated narrative, flattering and exploiting women and men ready to set reason aside for social approval.

Prior to his death, documentary film producer Aaron Russo disclosed the content of a conversation with his friend Nicolas Rockefeller of the Rockefeller family. What follows is a transcription of an interview shown in full in Russo's documentary "America, Freedom to Fascism".

"We were at the house one night, and we were talking and he [Nicolas Rockefeller] started laughing.

Aaron, what do you think women's liberation was all about? And, I said, I had pretty conventional thinking about it at that point, and I said I think it's about women having the right to work – get equal pay with men, just like they won the right to vote.

You know, and he started to laugh, and he said you're an idiot, and I said why am I an idiot? He said let me tell you what that was about. We the Rockefellers, funded that. We funded women's lib. You know, and we're the ones who got it all over the newspapers and television, the Rockefeller Foundation. He says…you wanna know why? There were two primary reasons. And they were one reason was: we couldn't tax half the population before women's lib. And the second reason was: now we get the kids in school at an early age, we can indoctrinate the kids how to think.

This way it breaks up their family. The kids start looking at the state as the family. At the school, at the officials, as their family. Not at their parents teaching them. And so, those are the two primary reasons for women's lib, which I thought up to that point was a noble thing. You know, when I saw their intentions behind it, where they were coming from and they created it and the thought of it, I saw, I saw the evil behind what I thought was a noble venture."[/box]

Taken alone, this revelation from Russo might be dismissed, and indeed, although its veracity has never been seriously challenged, it is ignored by the entirety of mainstream media.

It is not a coincidence that organized feminism has persistently attacked the family and the institution of marriage for the fast five decades.

- "The nuclear family must be destroyed…Whatever its ultimate meaning, the break-up of families now is an objectively revolutionary process."
  ~Linda Gordon

- "We can't destroy the inequities between men and women until we destroy marriage."
  ~Robin Morgan

- "Since marriage constitutes slavery for women, it is clear that the women's movement must concentrate on attacking this institution. Freedom for women cannot be won without the abolition of marriage." ~Sheila Cronin

In addition, much of second wave feminist literature specifically opposed marriage:

- Kate Millett, Sexual Politics (1969)

- Germaine Greer, The Female Eunuch (1970)

- Marilyn French, The Women's Room (1977)

- Jessie Bernard, The Future of Marriage (1972)

- Shulamith Firestone, The Dialectic of Sex: The Case for Feminist Revolution (1970)

This opposition has significantly abated in the current narrative of Big Feminism, due to two factors. Through changes to family law and the widespread advent of no fault divorce, marriage provides men with a number of major disincentives and onerous obligations without compensatory benefits. Also, because of decades of affirmative action in education, women are rapidly overtaking men in lifetime earnings expectations, de-motivating females from partnering with men of lesser earning power than themselves. Female hypergamy, the evolutionarily driven tendency to always cultivate financial and social relationships with higher position men combines with the changed economic landscape to create, for women, a perception of no suitable male partners.

This becomes comical when social conservative women's organizations publicly campaign; exhorting men to step up, earn and provide, even as men are economically sidelined by decades of feminist affirmative action in higher education.

There is a glaringly obvious divergence between the public claims of organized feminism, that social or legal equality is any feminist actor's goal, and the observable outcomes – the legal marginalization of men and an increasingly defunct social contract between men and women.

This is the contract in which men and women not only have understandable social roles, but also complement and cooperate with each other to mutual benefit. By more than a half century of continuous attack on men by a fully feminized culture, social cohesion and mutuality of respect, affection and cooperation are irreparably damaged.

Women are told and trained through all channels of mainstream media that they're victims of an all encompassing system keeping them down, raping them, making them victims. The goal of this narrative is to cultivate anger, resentment, and justify ongoing removal of human rights from the "guilty" half of the human race.

The factual falsehood of this narrative does not matter, and no recitation of collected statistics or peer reviewed studies can trump the emotional appeal of the unimpeachable power of victimhood. In addition, as the disenfranchisement of men and boys becomes more pronounced, rather than women taking notice or acting out of ethical concern to correct this, another rationalization is manifested.

For women in a highly feminized society – one which suspends accountability and affords privilege, correction of such a system would require surrender of privilege and embrace of accountability. In a consumer culture driven by corporations and relying on women – who control more than 65% of discretionary spending, no pressure exists to do anything except continue telling women they are entitled, victims, and superior humans. This manifests as a cheerful willingness to manipulate and exploit men, as well as an absence of empathy toward men and a disregard for male targeting violence.

As this social system continues eroding men's human rights while escalating pressure to perform, provide, and die for the benefit of women and elites, an increasing disaffection is building.

In addition to overt hostility and derision aimed at men in mainstream media, men are becoming increasingly aware of a number of metrics of social inequity. Some of these are mentioned, with cited sources in the first few paragraphs of this article.

The persistent denial of these facts, and the continued insistence of feminism's proponents of false claims of oppression of women illustrate that feminism constitutes a belief system as rigid in its denial of reality as the most radical religious denials of demonstrable fact.

The Earth, for example – is not the center of the solar system. Galileo was summoned to Rome to stand trial for his reputed support of Copernicus' heliocentric model in 1616, and was sentenced to permanent house arrest. A decree of the Congregation of the Index was issued, declaring that the ideas that the Sun stood still and that the Earth moved were "false" and "altogether contrary to Holy Scripture", and suspending Copernicus's De Revolutionibus until it could be corrected. [29]

Currently, some American Christian sects pursue a campaign to deny the scientific theory at the heart of modern biology. Interestingly, this reactionary denial of modern science is only 50 years old, and not shared by most European Christians, or by the Vatican.

However, the denial by feminists of the increasing dominance by feminism of Western culture and the commensurate social, legal and economic disenfranchisement of men has every character of intractable religious faith.

The real and ongoing damage done by occupation of the public zeitgeist by a doctrine ignoring the carnage of 90% of suicides being male, or 93% of workplace deaths being male, and pretending that further removal of male human rights will correct a nonexistent "patriarchy" indicates the need to identify this ideology as the vile, hateful, and anti-human cult it really is.

This ideology is a tool, created and funded by elites, and used to divide people against each other, to destroy the integrity of human bonds of love and family. The destruction done to families, both as a unit in society and as the stable foundation of every person, means individuals are greatly weakened and isolated from one another. This has the effect of making society weaker and more pliable to top-down control by increasingly far reaching government, and allowing elites in control of central banks a far more overt grip on public policy for their own benefit at the expense of loss of individual human rights.

Feminism cannot be afforded the continued illusion of legitimacy as a humanist movement. Its produced damage and human suffering is so overt that under whatever banner its collected ideologies operate, it must be rejected and denied in the same way racism or racial supremacism has been in the past.

The alternative is an increasingly totalitarian world, an ever diminishing standard of human rights, and the acceptance of continuously escalated human damage for the benefit and power of elites.

"Reasonable, that is human [individuals], will always be capable of compromise, but those who have dehumanized themselves by becoming blind worshippers of an idea or an ideal are fanatics whose devotion to abstractions make them the enemies of life". ~Alan Watts

Red pill prescription: take ’em all

If you are new to these hallowed halls it may be perplexing to you to observe that feminism is an ideology that spread like fire through a stretch of parched Australian brush, while forcing momentum in the men’s movement has been more like trying to ignite a clump of soggy swamp grass by rubbing two sticks together.

The reasons for this are simple enough. Men are hard-wired to cooperate with women, and women are hard-wired to cooperate with each other. At the same time, women are hard-wired to utilize power generated by men, and men are hard-wired to compete with each other, often savagely, to provide that power to women in exchange for sexual access. These realities are as deeply ingrained in our sociobiological programming as the drive for survival, which of course is what much of this boils down to, historically speaking.

Enter the red pill, though, which a limited number of men and women are able to ingest without intellectually imploding. The effect is to strip away a few million years of evolutionary impulses and see past what we were stamped out to be. Feminists imagine they have taken the red pill; that they have moved past biology and social coercion and found a path to freedom from history and the oppression of gender roles. In reality all they have done is step up to the smorgasbord of life and demanded to fill their plates with the most delectable items available, skimming over any unpalatable burdens.

And of course they have been enabled to do this only with the support of some men by the exploitation of other men.

Red pill? My ass. It’s the blue pill at maximum strength; chivalrists and fair damsels in distress; social parasitism suckling from the tit of sexual competition, and we see it play out as it always has, from the Africa Savanna, c. 3,000,000 B.C., to the modern camps of the politically left and right, in the church and among seculars, and alas, between some MRA’s and their fellows.

Thing is, red pills are like antibiotics. You have to take all of them or you are just asking for more problems. At the right dosage, and given enough time, the results can be spectacular. But if your pills are half ingested or if you are taking a placebo, then not only do you stay sick, but you have the possibility of re-infecting others who are trying their best to get better.

The whole point of the red pill, in my opinion, is that we get to move past bio-programming entirely and into an existence that does not mandate our disposability or tolerate abuse, by anyone, even the state. Even from each other.

So far, most in the MRM have done pretty well with seeing and addressing the knee-jerk response in men to support women, no matter the cost or lack of legitimacy (white knighting). We have also done pretty well with taking a look at how women tend to circle the wagons and defend each other, no matter the cost or lack of legitimacy (feminism). And we have begun to sharpen our focus on the notion that both of these factors, though we call them out with modern terminology like feminism and white knighting, are actually just manifestations of what has always been present in men and women. We are learning that the new boss is just the old boss in a different costume.

This is progress for sure, but hardly a stopping point. And unless we are going to stagnate where we are (and ultimately perish because of it) then we need to complete the red pill prescription. We need to keep chugging those little red bastards down till we are able to see that the part of the programming that leads us to compete with each other for alpha-primacy also forms a mentality with the same biological roots that make men disposable and enables feminism.

I am going to use a recent article on this site, and some of the comments that followed, to point to what I am talking about. In this I am going to directly use the words of other MRA’s. I don’t really like doing it, but it is important to show examples, and we were provided them in a quite classical way in the past few days.

A new writer to the MRM penned a piece in which he described his path to becoming an activist. A new writer doing this kind of work is precisely why AVfM is here; to give a forum to a growing chorus of men and women who are manifesting the effects of the red pill and taking a stand.

Within that piece there were a couple of areas that I thought revealed a man who is a work in progress. The first is clear cut:

> I still believe that men who brutalize women are the scum of the Earth.

I admit I flinched a little when I read this. Clearly these are words rooted in old world sexist notions about violence; that somehow men who brutalize women are worse than women who brutalize men. It is old programming that tends to swim around in the unconscious even after the first few rounds of red pills.

In addition to that, and a perhaps more subtle revelation about the authors mentality, he describes physically defending oneself from an attack as "reciprocal violence."

I don't personally agree with either one of these statements. Indeed, I think they reflect a collective problem in societal consciousness; one that gets corrected with sufficiently therapeutic levels of red pill Realitol™ in the system over a long enough period of time.

It will not, I respectfully submit, be rectified with standardized doses of blue pill shame. But that is what happened.

Case in point, the very first comment to this article contained the following:

[box type="note" icon="none"]

When a woman hits a man and he hits her back, this is not a male-on-female crime; this is reciprocal violence.

Really? Is it not self-defense against a woman's violence? or justified payback against a female aggressor?

I am always shocked that even fervent men's rights proponents still are too pussy-footed.

[/box]

"Pussy-footed." Really? It is as though the rest of the article, which was actually quite good, inspirational even, somehow didn't exist. Suddenly, in the eyes of this MRA, he was not a fellow man stepping out of the shadows for the first time to raise his voice against a corrupt, feminist dominated domestic violence industry. He was just "pussy-footed." Need I fill in the blanks for all that implies? At the time I am writing this, that comment was up voted 27-2, and one of the two down votes was mine.

Yet another person who commented took it even a step further by name calling.

> You're still a mangina/white knighter.

Fortunately that one was the recipient of more down votes than up, but voting is not really the issue here. Culture is. And so is our shared understanding and values.

I posted a nudge for readers to consider that we need to measure our responses and reactions to each other; that we need "constructive dialogue that strengthens our ties and encourages the refinement of our ideas."

The reaction from the one calling names was, "Isn't that what we are doing?"

Uh, no. MRA's name calling and shaming other MRA's is not constructive. It is petty alpha-gaming, but I will get to that in a moment.

The options here are pretty straight forward, as far as I can tell. How do we choose to react to new MRA's who are "getting it" but have not had the time or opportunity to fully refine their understanding of the modern zeitgeist? Do we support their work and encourage them to perhaps re-evaluate some of their less thoughtful ideas? Or do we call them names and publicly humiliate them?

Well?

It isn't just common manners that make prefer the former. I think I have long demonstrated the belief that good manners with the wrong people are a waste of time. No, my aversion here is to blue pill thinking.

As I noted at the start of this article, a significant part of the dynamics that hinder progress in the MRM is the innate friction between men which is driven by an undercurrent of sexual competition. Our unfortunate programming is to apply downward pressure on each other in order to vie for sexual selection. In the last 50 years, we have seen much of that downward pressure manifest in the legal system, in politics and in the PC mandates that dictate social conduct. It is without a doubt a core reason that the MRM even exists in the first place.

And it will serve no better purpose here than it does in society at large.

Part of AVfM's mission is to create an alternative environment to that. That mission is made all the more difficult by latent misandry. And so it must be addressed from time to time.

My perspective on this is in keeping with my perspective on sociobiology. Feminism is an outgrowth of chivalry. It is dependent on male sexual competition to thrive. In short, misandry, feminism, the stinking lot of it, is a human problem rooted in men's mindless competition for women. We don't get out of that competition by simply rejecting women or Going Our Own Way. We get out of it by identifying and respectfully challenging the elements of that competition when they prove dysfunctional, as in going after MRA's for blood any time we imagine they are not 100% on message. This conduct, when distilled down to its essence, is just a tell-tale artifact of pussy-centric masculinity.

Of course, I know there are many who feel that tearing down each other's points is just a part of the vetting process, and I agree with that. But when it becomes attacking on a personal level, or an exercise in shame, it is immediately proven that it is not about the point but about the primacy. It is time for another red pill, and then another, till we wake up and realize that it is us, not the target, who is off message.

If you have ever looked around at the explosive numbers of blogs and other efforts to promote men's rights and wondered "Why the fuck aren't these guys pooling resources, organizing and flexing more collective muscle?" then in my opinion you have just been given the answer.

Men have never done well at working together in ways intended to benefit men, as a monolithic group. We have always been too busy cooperating for the sake of others, stabbing each other in the back for the sake of pussy, and helping women who work only for their own gain.

I doubt that we will ever see the end of that in the human race. However I also believe that with time and effort we can construct a sub-culture for men and women who want something better than that. From time to time we may have to gently turn to our brothers with a bottle of red pills and say, "Have another."

More on the anti-man mentality

B.R. Merrick · 13 February 2012 · Archived copy · Original

I've already taken Antiwar.com to task in a couple of previous articles, and unfortunately, I feel the need to do it again. I fear that harping on one particular website may become repetitive, but at least the repeat of the offense is highly instructive. Therefore, before I point out what is becoming increasingly obvious, I'd like to side-step the major points of two articles at Antiwar (one linked and one original), a third article from a blog that is frequently linked from Antiwar, and point out the most infuriating parts of each. I single out this website because I visit it frequently, but what I am finding is not the fault of Antiwar. It is deeply ingrained in the culture. Thus, it is inevitable that it will reveal itself in the words of thinkers who have obviously never had to think much about misandry.

The first article is by Noam Chomsky and was linked from Antiwar's homepage. Much of it is taken up with articulating historical points that have been buried and forgotten concerning the Vietnam War. Not having studied or verified any of these particular points, I cannot say whether I agree or not, but I do find it provocative.

I find it even more interesting that he was able to work in the Founding Fathers, and the unavoidable fact that what they had in mind was an idea of freedom married with a particular view of prosperity in keeping with ancient English law and philosophy. In other words, Chomsky claims (and I also believe) that what the Constitution enshrines as the bullet points of "freedom" was not originally designed to include certain groups of people. Chomsky is factually correct when he says, "Native Americans were not persons. Neither were slaves." True. Even as late as the Dred Scott Decision, the best and brightest that the Federal government supposedly had to offer wondered aloud for all to hear: "Can a negro [sic], whose ancestors were imported into this country, and sold as slaves, become a member of the political community formed and brought into existence by the Constitution of the United States, and as such become entitled to all the rights, and privileges, and immunities, guarantied [sic] by that instrument to the citizen?" Try saying that at a cocktail party with a straight face.

The native tribes were pushed off the land they needed to survive, the buffalo they needed for basic necessities quite possibly made endangered deliberately. Dred Scott, a dude, fought and fought and fought for the opportunity to be left alone, and didn't just fight for himself, but for his loved ones, both male and female. Punishments for slaves who were noncompliant were severe and unconscionable. So far I'm digging what this Leftist has to say.

And then, like so many other Leftists swallowed whole by feminists and misandrists, he says, "Women were scarcely persons."

Really? Scarcely? How so? Were their buffalo slaughtered? Were they pushed as a group onto "reservations," to be made into drunkards? If any American women of the eighteenth or nineteenth century wanted to leave the house or the grounds without permission, were they whipped and beaten? Were they made to work all day against their will? Were they brought from another continent on ships where the smell of shit, piss, and vomit was so extreme that the men who worked on the ship refused to go down to their holding cells? Were they paraded around naked at Caribbean auctions? Did somebody ransack their teepees and longhouses? Were they given blankets with small pox so that they would just hurry up and die? Were they routinely referred to as "savages," and "n*ggers"?

Only if the women in question fit into those subcategories as well, and probably less often than the men.

When one spends just 30 seconds thinking about that last sentence of his, about the "non-personhood" of women, in the context of an article where Chomsky points out that "the bombing of rural Cambodia, surpass[ed] the level of all Allied bombing in the Pacific theater during World War II," it becomes, in every way except grammatical, a thoroughly indefensible statement. The supposed oppression of women simply does not compare to wiping out Cambodia – men, women, boys, and girls – from the air. This, like more and more of what I encounter written and linked at Antiwar, is just too painful. All that Chomsky is doing with that sentence is repeating a cultural shibboleth that has no basis in fact. Furthermore, by doing it, he is doing his own sex no favors.

He is not alone in the anti-war crowd, and most certainly not alone among men. Arthur Silber is also a writer frequently linked from Antiwar. In an article on the myths surrounding American immigrants, and in keeping with this great cultural myth about women, he wrote: "…that is, they are willing to be 'Americanized,' self-reliant, and independent in the mode adopted specifically by the ruling class in America — which is to say, by affluent, white (and until very recently, exclusively male) Americans, who have always determined the particular content of the term, 'American.'" As if women had no say in the matter. As if no woman was consulted. As if not a single wife of a single Founding Father spoke up at the dinner table, or in bed. As if not a single female was allowed to enjoy the fruits of those precious votes.

Two otherwise extraordinarily intelligent men seem to forget something significant, and, unlike the above cultural tenets, very true: It is men who do the dirty work. When you want smelly immigrants/Negroes/tribesmen to stay away, it is men who will do your bidding. It is men and women who will give their consent – vocally, politically, mentally, emotionally, and even sexually – to the men doing the dirty work of empire and coercion. It reminds me of an episode of "WKRP in Cincinnati", where the radio station's sales manager Herb Tarlek complains about his wife: "She thinks sex is a reward: [in falsetto] 'C'mon, Herb. Mow the lawn, or no num-nums tonight! Uh-huh, uh-huh!'"

The reason two men who know a lot about the state's hidden history know next to nothing about *her*story is because the women, by choice, are usually not out in front doing. This isn't like the glass ceiling or its Patriarchy, neither of which can be proven. This is, like life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, self-evident. Women, for the most part, prefer to stay behind the scenes, where they wield more power than Chomsky and Silber can imagine.

The occasional portrayal of brutality toward women, frequently from other cultures (for a reason) and oftentimes cultures with which the ruling elite of this land mass wish to make war, is trumpeted loud and clear after it is conveniently filtered from what is happening to the men; the women who are influencing the men who are out in front doing are silent (just about the time that the whole brass section falls silent) and in the background. Too busy shopping.

But there is another phenomenon at work while a falsehood whips its way around the world at light speed. Original Antiwar writer Kelly Vlahos, to her credit, does not repeat any pointless platitudes like "Women were scarcely persons." However, in an article talking about adverse medical problems suffered by many veterans, the word "men" appears three times, once in reference to two male doctors who are discovering something they call "Iraq-Afghanistan War lung injury." Thus, one time that the word is used is not in connection to victimhood. The two other times it is used, it does indeed concern the medical problems suffered by victimized veterans, but then it is simultaneously and deliberately included with "women" (just so we don't leave any of our plucky little gals out of the victim narrative).

Even though the article is about veterans' issues, and even though the vast majority of veterans are men, absent one anecdotal story of one male veteran — and a sprinkling of the words "he" and "his" here and there — the rest of the language used to describe those who suffer is littered with sex-neutral words: veterans, soldiers, people, servicemembers, individuals, etc. Interestingly enough, the first link in Vlahos's article, concerning "the high suicide rate among veterans [emphasis mine]," does not make the same unthinking slight: "The suicide rate among 18- to 29-year-old men who've left the military has gone up significantly [emphasis mine]." I bring up these articles in order to point out two of the central memes of our rotting cultural muck, for which these articles have provided ample evidence, even though they are about other subjects:

1. Women have always been the victims of men.

2. Men can seldom be victims as men; merely as sexless people.

I am sure that if you look back in history, you will find evidence of women being put down as inferior in certain circles, having property taken by a court, and being denied the opportunity to vote. I am also sure that if you look back in history, the same history that Chomsky decries in his article as being "unhistory," you will find evidence of men being put down as inferior in certain circles, having property taken by a court, and being denied the opportunity to vote. Furthermore, I am dead certain that, like the use of racial epithets, you will find examples that affect men or even married couples more than women.

Chomsky probably believes as most others do, that women who wanted the "right" to vote were just like Glynis Johns in Mary Poppins, innocently throwing eggs at the Prime Minister in her off hours. (Speaking of Mary Poppins, I'd like to know why the father is the only one to get a lecture in that movie, since neither parent shows much of an interest in the kids. Beyond that, what is the mother doing hiring a nanny, a cook, and a maid, when she has two adorable kids, a gorgeous house her husband worked hard to obtain, and no need for a day job?) How was the denial of the vote to women close to anything that native tribes and people with dark brown skin have suffered with? Were the latter two groups whipped, beaten and exterminated because they didn't have access to the polls?

Suffragettes were indeed arrested, imprisoned, and force-fed. But please keep in mind that "[b]y 1912 women still didn't have equal [sic] voting rights with men and the suffragettes launched a more violent campaign that initially involved smashing shop windows. Eventually this campaign escalated to burning stately homes and even bombing Westminster Abbey [emphasis yikes]." Violent children often throw tantrums. Violent adults often end up in prison. I don't believe they should be force-fed or tortured, but the suffering of women arrested in this regard does not compare to extermination and enslavement. They were not protesting, like black and native peoples, because of the harsh treatment they received; they received the harsh treatment because of their violent protests. Regardless, it takes center stage in the third wave act of Victim Theater.

The suffering allegedly suffered by post-suffragette women does not necessarily need to be widespread or statistically impressive. It just needs an audience, which men readily provide due to their sexual and social programming. Then the first statement – "Women have always been the victims of men" – can be true, even if it's not technically, contextually, or even literally true. It can be "true" in the sense that it makes you feel good to say it: Women have always been the victims of men.

The second meme – Men can never be victims as men; only as sexless people – is so fucking easy that it needs no explanation. Just read Vlahos's article again and try not to shake your head. Here are a whole bunch of things that routinely happen to boys and not girls that I'm sure have escaped Ms. Vlahos:

1. Rough and tumble play, which is more likely to end you up with scrapes, bleeding wounds, and broken limbs.

2. Teasing, oftentimes physical, as a form of bonding and insult.

3. Being told by a great many adults (both male and female) to clam up, take it, deal with it, you're on your own, etc.

4. Violent fantasies geared toward males in video games, television, and cinema.

5. Social stigma coupled with evolutionary impulse to protect women and children, especially female children, and violently so. The more impressive the violence, the better.

6. A government schooling environment that seems more stifling, since it hardly involves any physical activity, and now includes being legally drugged into submission.

7. Erections that, for the first few years, won't go away through willpower alone, making sexual arousal visible to others. (A woman's sexual arousal is always and everywhere easily hidden.)

8. Growing up in a culture that singles out members of your sex for derision when their genitals are mutilated. When the culture isn't doing that, it's shaming you for continued possession of the same.

9. A serious lack of access to older members of your sex, with boys subdivided all day long and lectured to by women, unilateral divorce with preference for the mother, and a culture that is suspicious of single men who spend time with boys.

All this suffering, in keeping with what is learned at an early age due to #3, is suffered in silence. No trying to burn down Westminster Abbey. No throwing eggs at anyone. No handing out feathers. No call to get your "representative" to actually represent a single one of your views. No buttons and pins. No marches in the streets. Just quiet suffering as you show everyone else in your platoon that you're just as much of a man as they are. There is no comparable contest of femininity for females. If a woman or girl feels like being weak or just admitting weakness, most other women will rush to support her, making her feel like she belongs. A man is far more likely to be left behind by the other men, if there's even a group of men to belong to; hence, the manly suicides in the military, as opposed to the small number of female ones.

But we can't even talk about possible root causes of all this suffering if we are not permitted to divulge the sex shared by the sufferers. Once we are able, we can take the above nine phenomena and link them to the second cultural truism: "Men can seldom be victims as men; merely as sexless people." How true is that truism now?

The truth is that once the culture creates a certain level of hatred toward any category of humanity, actual victimhood is probably not far behind. What the culture hates will simply not grow. Watch this rather odd but very revealing collage of semen samples from NBC's "Law & Order: SVU". It confirmed what I suspected from watching a spare minute of this awful program every once in a while. Every time I chanced upon seeing a bit of it, someone somewhere said "semen."

Now, think about that. This is a show that has been on the air for more than a decade, a spin-off from another program more than two decades long, dedicated to entertaining millions of Americans every week using salacious, graphic language about terrible crimes. Semen. Semen stains. Semen samples. Semen on a dead body. Crime. Law, order, crime, and semen. Am I setting up a straw man argument here? I don't think so, but I'll knock it down anyway.

Semen is disgusting, if I am to conclude anything from watching this program. How is it that a show that continually mentions semen in connection with horrific crime can remain so popular for over a decade? Millions watch, but virtually no one notices. It is as if the ejaculation of semen is something that the world puts up with but secretly detests. Since only men make semen; since it is usually voluntarily ejaculated except for certain cases of rape and nocturnal emissions; and since the voluntary giving of this life-giving substance is usually frequent; what are men supposed to think if the culture embraces mainstream entertainment that virtually equates semen with crime?

The conclusions we are supposed to draw seem pretty obvious to me: Women and sexless children are the victims of semen, the victims of men. Men are too quick to indulge their semen-connected desires. Pornography is directly connected to men, semen, and the oftentimes unavoidable crimes that result. Once you indulge a penis, all bets are off. Unless, of course, he's been thoroughly trained.

Men who are raised not to take their feelings seriously will probably feel a little tinge that is quickly ignored when semen is mentioned in a silly television program. Men who are used to being teased will grin along with the giggling girls who laugh at a man whose penis is not only severed, but shredded in a garbage disposal, so that he can spend the last several decades of his life without one. Men who have been thoroughly indoctrinated in government schools will go on wistfully believing that our government doesn't take the sex of the accused into account because, after all, that lady is blindfolded, isn't she? Men will ignore writing like this article, because too much is being made of that which men should be able to handle. The following is a list of what men get to handle, continued from the above list of boys' concerns:

10. The vast majority of workplace deaths.

11. A culture that takes a dim view of sexuality, especially male sexuality, including semen.

12. Shorter life expectancies.

13. A roughly equal number of prostate cancer victims to breast cancer victims, with a great deal less funding.

14. The vast majority of difficult, back-breaking, weather-beaten work (without which we'd all be living in tents and caves).

15. Fighting, dying, and being maimed for life in all wars for all states, everywhere, all the time.

16. Fulfilling all traditional male expectations in romantic relationships with women.

17. Losing in family courts on a routine basis, many times after being falsely accused of any number of semen-related crimes.

18. Keeping his mouth shut about what he can remember from 1 through 9 above, and 10 to 17 after that.

19. As a direct result of 18, a much higher suicide rate.

As far as waking up the culture to misandry, that's a lot to tackle, and I never even wanted to play touch football. The same Silber that I mentioned above gave me the clue, however. In one of his other articles, he mentioned a book entitled Bury the Chains by Adam Hochschild. I haven't finished it, but I must confess to finding it quite inspiring thus far. It concerns the fight to end the institution of slavery, a battle that began in earnest in eighteenth-century Britain, when, according to what is written on the back of my copy, "twelve men – a printer, a lawyer, a clergyman, and others united by their hatred of slavery – came together in a London printing shop and began the world's first grass-roots movement, battling for the rights of people on another continent [emphasis you-know-whose]." From the introduction (also quoted by Silber) we learn: "At the end of the eighteenth century, well over three quarters of all people alive were in bondage of one kind or another, not the captivity of striped uniforms [like now], but of various systems of slavery or serfdom."

In other words, eighteenth-century culture thought in terms of slavery, as our culture thinks in terms of male disposability, utility, and culpability. 12 men started the abolitionist movement. They didn't finish it, but boy did they start it. Do we have more than 12? I think we do. And we've already started something, haven't we? Perhaps someday, we'll be able to replace those two ridiculous cultural memes with something a bit more sensible, like:

1. Women, as a group, have seldom been victims, but have far more often been protected and nourished, for the most part, by men as they were able.

2. Men as a group are victims of ingrained cultural hatred; women as a group are not.

3. You wouldn't be reading this if some dude hadn't ejaculated his semen years ago.

Changing a culture's beliefs takes time, effort, and patience. I find it heartening to think that some other guy out there put together that "Law & Order" video without me ever even meeting him. What does that tell you? It tells me that the effort is already well under way. It tells me that the effort is organic and self-directed. It tells me that I am not in control of it, and that I don't need to be. It tells me that it is gaining momentum.

It tells me that I'm not alone. I like what I'm being told.

Lessons from nature: primal masculinity

Stephen Jarosek (aka Codebuster) · 14 February 2012 · Archived copy · Original

We human beings, especially those of us from the Anglosphere, grow up with strange notions of what it is to be a man. Americans bow to a pompous git wearing a black robe and address him as "Sir" for fear of going to debtor's prison for being unable to pay child support. In Australia, draconian laws exist not to protect but to control – voting is compulsory, anti-association laws [1] (defining whom you are allowed to associate with) are periodically entertained and taken seriously, and we are fined hundreds of dollars for failing to wear bicycle helmets or failing to buckle up our seatbelts.

These are examples where we are penalized not for hurting anyone or stealing anything, but for minding our own business and taking responsibility for our own choices. In America and throughout the Anglosphere, we surrender our livelihoods and our dignity to provided-for women in their petty indulgences with Affirmative Action, while they grasp for alimony and government handouts. Men are having their children taken away from them in the interests of their primary abusers, placing their children at the mercy of their primary abusers. We must be the most gutless, spineless, dumbest manifestations of the male condition that the world has ever seen. Human dignity? What a joke.

It therefore pays to ask, what have we lost? What is the essence of male knowing? What does it mean to be a man? I reckon that this dude in the gorilla suit [2] might have a better idea than we do. What does he know? No one taught him to "man up". What he knows seems to go beyond the petty "should" and "should-nots" of human society. What's with his confidence, his calm temperament, and his sense of responsibility? He hangs back behind the group and looks around to check for stragglers, before rejoining them. He places a firm but gentle hand on one of the youngsters, guiding them to move aside, lest the over-enthusiastic youngster spook the oddly-behaving creature with the funny plumage. He encourages everyone in his tribe to check out the fragile creature at centre stage, making sure that no one hurts it, and it does not hurt them. His presence is a source of safety to both the fragile creature as well as the females and the youngsters of his tribe mesmerized by it.

Without his presence, who knows what impulses the females or the youngsters might heed, or what liberties they might be inclined to take? He sits back, observing proceedings, without feeling the need to also indulge. He is a natural leader, he turns to leave and everyone follows. He is the formidable male, and it is clear that he has earned the respect of his troop. If you look into his eyes, his face, and observe his demeanor, you cannot help but wonder what he knows that the females of his tribe never can. And he did not learn any of this from a human being. He is no chivalrous white knight, fawning over undeserving, grasping females regardless of their conduct. His is primal knowledge emerging from the jungle.

What is the nature of masculine knowing, without all the bullshit that we humans have to contend with? What do men, properly developed, know that women never can? Women have sexual power, but they can never know what men know. It's as if nature has deliberately established a divide that can never be traversed. There is no crossing this Rubicon. You cannot have both knowledge and sexual power.

What, on the other hand, is the nature of female knowing? For this, the best clues lie in matriarchal collectives, like bees, ants, meerkats, bonobos and hyenas. They too are impressive, but not in the same way that our video-clip shows the silverback male to be. Now I don't claim to be an authority who knows enough about gorillas in the wild or otherwise to provide a definitive, referable source accounting for their biology and behavior. But I do know that this singular video-clip has impressed me in an unexpected way.

Feminists, both male and female, despise the fact that at some primal level, the masculine ideal elicits their respect. They cannot stand it. Deep down inside they realize that the same kind of respect can never ever be earned by the provided-for sex. That is why feminists are trying to drive men down to their own level. That is why they are trying to turn men into [their impressions of] pleasure-seeking, group-thinking bonobos [3]. They cannot stand that they cannot know as men can. For all of women's sexual power, they find women's position of enslavement and inherent ignorance utterly unbearable.

Happy Ballentine's Day!

Dr. Tara J. Palmatier · 14 February 2012 · Archived copy · Original

Daddy Justice, otherwise known as Ben Vonderheide, has once again shined the light on yet another corrupt public official.

Judge Kelly S. Ballentine was elected to Pennsylvania's Lancaster County's southeast district judge seat in 2006. In the approximately 6 years she has been in the trusted and venerated position of district justice, she has committed at least 12 criminal acts.

According to the York Daily News:

> Ballentine is charged with six counts of tampering with public records, three counts of restricted activities due to a conflict of interest and three counts of obstruction of the administration of law.
> Ballentine is accused of dismissing three tickets issued to her by police. Two were for allegedly parking illegally and another was for an alleged vehicle registration offense.
> Ballentine, 43, dismissed a parking ticket and an expired-registration ticket in December 2010 and a parking ticket in January 2011, according to the affidavit.
> City police Officer Thomas Gjurich placed tickets on Ballentine's BMW sedan three times in November 2010 when it was parked outside her home, according to the affidavit.
> The $268.50 she owed on the three tickets was never paid, according to the affidavit.
> On the citations, "it was Kelly Ballentine's handwriting dismissing them," an agent with the attorney general's office writes in the affidavit.
> According to the state Judicial Conduct Board's rules, district judges should disqualify themselves in proceedings in which they are a party.

The information reported in mainstream news outlets is only the tip of the iceberg. Mr. Vonderheide began his independent investigation of Judge Ballentine in May 2006 after she railroaded him with the Lancaster police department. Mr. Vonderheide and his associate, Ron Harper, Jr. (a private investigator), discovered the first of many abuses of power Judge Ballentine has committed in her illustrious career on the bench. The first incident involved her then boyfriend, convicted cocaine dealer, Terence J. Mitchell. At the time, Mr. Mitchell was 28-years old and Judge Ballentine was 37.

In the early morning hours of New Year's Day 2005-2006, Mr. Mitchell and his passenger, girlfriend Judge Ballentine, were pulled over by the Lancaster police. The police discovered a concealed loaded gun under Mr. Mitchell's car seat and he was arrested.

Ballentine - Busted
While Mr. Mitchell was en route to jail, Judge Ballentine called the city police, went to the station and took responsibility for her cocaine dealing boyfriend's 9mm Luger and hollow point bullets. She then arranged a get out of jail free card for Mr. Mitchell.

Judge Ballentine also appears to be a false rape accuser.

In 2010, Judge Ballentine accused a man of breaking into her home and of attempting to rape her. In May 2011, a jury found the accused man not guilty. The accused had been sitting in jail since his arrest date, July 17, 2010, time that he will never get back.

Upon hearing the verdict, the plaintiff, Judge Ballentine, became belligerent and shouted obscenities at the jury, at which point she had to be subdued and physically removed from the courtroom by deputies and her family. According to Mr. Vonderheide, Ms. Ballentine removed one of her shoes and threw it at the jury whilst repeatedly dropping F-bombs. Imagine if a plaintiff had done so in her courtroom. My guess is the offending individual would've been jailed for contempt. This did not happen to Judge Ballentine.

According to Lancaster Online:

> The jury of nine women and three men returned their verdicts just before noon on Wednesday after deliberating seven hours over two days.
> Ballentine reacted in disgust and was physically removed from the courtroom by family members and deputy sheriffs.
> "You all let him do that to me and it's supposed to be OK!" she screamed on her way out the door.
> "Get off of me!" she told supporters who tried to calm her.
> Plata showed no reaction and sat with his hands on his lap when the verdicts were announced.
> Prosecutor Randall L. Miller and defense lawyer George N. Marros also did not react.
> "They believed, as we thought, he was invited in," Marros said outside the courtroom. "Either she let him in, or told him to come over."

Here's the Daddy Justice video that documents his investigation of Judge Ballentine, which concludes with her arraignment yesterday, February 13, 2012.

Ballentine Busted from Ben Vonderheide on Vimeo.

Perhaps I'm wrong, but shouldn't individuals holding the position of judge, either through election or appointment, be in possession of a thorough understanding of the law and in possession of good judgement. How are "we the people" supposed to trust and respect a judge, man or woman, who exercises such poor personal judgment (e.g., a convicted cocaine dealer boyfriend; false rape accuser; dismissing her own traffic violations)?

Here's the real kicker, Judge Ballentine has not been removed from the bench as of yet. According to the Mail Online, Judge Ballentine is on paid leave while the 9 felony charges are "resolved." If Judge Ballentine is allowed to continue to sit on the bench it will be a disgrace.

Do the right thing Pennsylvania and treat this woman as you would any other criminal and let her serve as an example to other corrupt judges, otherwise your justice system will be nothing more than a farce at best. Keystone cops indeed.

Mr. Vonderheide's brand of activism might not be everyone's cup of tea, but he sure gets things done. Mr. Vonderheide will be joining me and my special guest co-host, Paul Elam of AVfM, this Monday, February 20, 2012 at 9pm EST to discuss this case and his continued crusade against corrupt officials, including corrupt family court officials. Go, Ben, go!

On military preparedness

James Huff · 15 February 2012 · Archived copy · Original

Introduction:

There has been some backlash across the internet recently concerning some comments that Rick Santorum made about the use of women in frontline combat units. His original reasoning was not just an argument of physical prowess, but also one of men's emotional issues. His explanation of that is as follows:

"So my concern is being in combat in that situation instead of being focused on the mission, they may be more concerned with protecting someone who may be in a vulnerable position, a woman in a vulnerable position."

I call bullshit. He kicked the ball into typical Social Conservative territory, and placed the onus of the argument on men. There are a number of things I am going to point out here that really define the argument, away from the sound of the sharpening blades of the Feminist PC Police. It's time to say what Rick Santorum was too afraid to say, and place the entire argument in full context. I will break it down the same way you break it down to a new recruit.

Tasks, Conditions, and Standards:

Task: Shape the Red Pill argument for not placing women into front-line combat units.

Conditions: One PC with an internet connection, half a brain, and a set of virtual balls.

Standards: To be able to take this argument anywhere, that we can keep some form of military preparedness.

Physical Readiness:

In the U.S. there are two different standards to meet the Physical Requirements to pass any of the Armed Forces PFTs (Physical Fitness Tests). These tests are set up by the sex of the individual. There is one standard for males, and another one for females. For our purposes, we will use the Army Physical Fitness Test (APFT). The minimum scoring for each event (push-up, sit-up, and run) is 60 to pass. Failure to score at least 60 points in each event counts as a failed APFT. Administrative action can be taken against those that fail the APFT, flagging them against future promotions, or even for military discharge.

Keep in mind the minimum amount of points required to pass each event is 60.

Here are the standards to pass each test for males:

Push Ups

2 Mile Run

And for Females:

Push ups

2 Mile Run

As you can see, the women's minimum standard for the Run fall off the chart after the age of 31.

The Sit-Ups are the same regardless of sex.

Sit-Ups

These are the minimum standards required in order to pass each event, regardless of your occupation in the military.

There are certain standards that individual units have that may exceed the regulation for purposes of consideration for privilege or promotion in any unit. It is up to the Commander's discretion as to how to implement an "above regulation" standard for the APFT, and usually it depends on the function of the unit to which one is assigned.

For example:

Fort Bragg, N.C. is the home of the 82nd Airborne and the 18th Airborne Corps. These units are comprised of their own types of units. 18th Airborne is comprised a lot more of MP's, logistics, intelligence, and some special operations units. 82nd Airborne is comprised a lot more of infantry, artillery, and mechanized infantry. These Corps units write their own standards that meet or exceed the Department of the Army's standards for physical fitness. Usually, 18th Airborne will leave the standard as is, and allow the alterations in unit regulation to be made at a brigade level or lower. 82nd Airborne does the same thing for the most part.

Do you think a Commander of a military intelligence unit is going to alter the expectations for passing an APFT?

No. Chances are that commander will not worry about it. These soldiers rarely see frontline combat, and are trained to provide information assets that serve battlefield commanders and logistics commanders at a moment's notice.

Do you think a Commander of an infantry unit will change the expectations for the soldiers when it comes to passing the APFT?

ABSO-FUCKIN'-LUTELY! This commander knows that the minimum requirement to pass the APFT is not nearly good enough to be an effective frontline combatant. More than likely, he will commit his soldiers to a minimum standard of 75-85 points to score on each event. Failing to meet those requirements by regulation may not land you in for administrative action, but it sure will affect how you are viewed by your team. It will also affect your likelihood of promotion (scoring on the APFT counts toward promotion points), and those with the highest promotion points get promoted first for the ranks of Sergeant and above. You will likely have fewer privileges, and also be placed on a remedial PT program until you meet or exceed the standards of the unit.

Take this time to compare the minimum men's standards of 60 points to the minimum infantrymen's standard of 75-85 points.

Now…compare that infantryman to the minimum female standards.

Do you notice quite a difference? You bet your ass.

Keep in mind that these events are done back to back in the order listed. The energy you have to perform one action is not restored before moving to the next, excepting about 10 minutes in between each event. If you really want, you can look at the application of the APFT in Chapter14 of the Army Field Manual 21-20 (FM 21-20).

I consider myself a pretty in shape guy. I can still pass an APFT with the same standard as when I got out…and I even switched age categories in the last couple of years. Let's look at what an average veteran like me can do:

I'll use my current age category for scoring: 37-41

Push-Ups in 2 minutes: 57 Score: 84

Sit-Ups in 2 minutes: 72 Score: 96

2 Mile Run-Time: 16:30 Score: 75

Total Score on APFT: 255/300

I might still fare well in an infantry unit for my age.

Indeed
Chances are, if I would have entered the military at 18 and gone into an infantry unit, I would now be a Sergeant First Class trying to keep up with the young bucks, with only my will to keep me going…considering the years of abuse to my body. Ever see a combat infantryman after 20 years on the job? Do you have any idea of the pain these guys have learned to live with every day as their knees, backs, shoulders, and feet break down under the constant stresses of the job?

Now, place your standard female in those positions. Let's see her carry around not just herself and her gear (about 70lbs or 31Kg worth) for 10-12 miles, but also carry 160-210 lbs. of her fallen comrade – perhaps with his gear – for a few hundred yards.

The Argument against using Feminism against itself:

It has been argued that perhaps we should allow females into frontline combat positions off the misguided notion this will either teach these feminists a lesson or end wars as women come home in body bags. I find that argument abhorrent for a few reasons and I will outline them below.

While I sympathize with the idea that we should be teaching society better than to go to war for a country that uses and abuses half the population, the fact remains that the circumstances under which many men find themselves makes the Armed Forces a more viable way to stay alive than living on the streets. I have seen assholes turn into fine and responsible men.

Compare the stats. There are more men dying in our prisons and on our inner-city streets than in our wars (U.S.). Many young men turn to the military for both financial and physical survival when the chips are down. In this case, we are talking about individual choice. I do not condone propagandistic action on a societal level, but pragmatism overcomes idealism when your business tanks, you sell what you have to stay alive, and then realize that the only way you are going to get three hots and a cot is either go to prison or go into the Army.

Where else men are going to get the resources they need? There are few shelters worth a damn. Those that do exist provide little training or hope for advancement in society. Those that do provide job training are filled with the worst of misandric crap talk and no sense of camaraderie or belonging.

What I am saying is this. The Armed Forces have always been used as social institution for men to be able to make a living. It provides benefits, meals, clothing, and training in a variety of tasks. It provides job security. It provides meaning to many men (even if you don't agree with the meaning). It also provides the opportunity to look oneself in the mirror. I should know. That's how I found myself re-enlisting after nine years of being in the private sector.

The Armed Forces have provided a means for young men from some really fucked up backgrounds to rise above the level of homelessness or drug dealing and make something of their lives. It has broken cycles of poverty in numerous families, and has allowed men to perform at a standard they did not know they could. It has provided millions of men with a "second chance" while the rest of society would have fucked them with spiked dildos and no lube. It is not just about going to war, or playing some fucked up game on a politician's chessboard. To many of the men in the military, it is simply a means to an end – a means you will not find anywhere else in society.

Not all these men are indoctrinated fools. Many of them know that they are simple mercenaries, and are just trying to bide their time long enough to get their foot in the door of the private sector long enough to allow that free training they received to be worth something. In today's age of entitlement culture, it also offers these men something that a lot of civilian sector men lack – self-worth and a sense of accomplishment.

I don't care how much spitting and sputtering anyone does about some idealistic bullshit concerning fighting wars for all the wrong reasons…the truth of what I say about these individual choices weighs more heavily than any anti-war argument. Within the context of this article, an anti-war sentiment means jack shit. Wars are not going to end anytime soon.

Now…when we solve the problems of institutionalized misandry in the private sector, free men up for the same opportunities (note: not the same "results") that all these women have, and see some real progress, then come back to me with some ideologically based argument for men not going off to fight wars. I assure you I will be in perfect agreement.

Until then, if we start placing women in front line battle units because of some fucked up idea of equality…or trying to teach a “lesson” to these ignorant feminists, ideologues are consigning more men to die. It’s twice the damn risk for the same fucked up causes. It makes them no different than the politicians who already do such things over oil or land by using men’s lives to further a political or ideological agenda.

We are NOT disposable. That means protecting our assets. I refuse to go along with a plan that would place thousands in danger for truths we already know to be self-evident.

Onto the REAL psychological effect on men:

There are a few things that commanders have to keep in mind in order to have effective units. Two of the most important are supply and morale. In our argument we will focus on morale.

Take a unit of heavily trained combat soldiers. They have worked together in training for some time, usually 4-6 months before being deployed. They probably have two months of field time, a couple of months of garrison time, and maybe a little leave. These soldiers have learned to depend on each other for almost everything. From toilet paper and digging foxholes to live fire training operations and obstacle courses that require creative thinking and teamwork in order to cross.

Each of them has a role. They know their own strengths and weaknesses. They live, breathe, and sleep in the same close quarters for days and weeks at a time. These guys also realize that they all have to meet a minimum standard set by the unit in order to be part of the group…in order to be trusted, respected, and sometimes even befriended. They have gone through some seriously fucked up shit in training, and they have come through better for it. They have been trained to be cohesive unit capable of performing maneuvers, taking risks together, and respecting each other.

Let’s place some women into the unit. These women are not expected to conform to the same high physical standards that the men have to conform to. Most of them are placed there “by quota”, and even if they can score well on the women’s version of the APFT, the fact of the matter is that it does not take as much for them to make the same scores.

They are placed there by a system that perpetuates this notion of equality…and forces it into the unit.

How will the commander handle this? Will he make only the men carry the heavy weaponry in the unit, and only use the women as riflemen? Who will carry the extra ammo stores? Will these women be able to carry 70lbs. of equipment and an injured buddy for half a mile? Will you let the women only fill the role of radio carriers, or medics?

Ask yourself how that builds resentment in the unit. All these guys are pulling not just the stuff they have to deal with but the extra that is needed because these women cannot handle it. The unit is allocated a certain number of personnel to perform the necessary task, male or female. How will they get over the worst part of an obstacle course that was set up to test the endurance of bodily strength in men? How will their “teamwork” change in order to get the women across the course in a training scenario?

Morale will drop. Unit cohesion will suffer. The men will not trust these women to meet or exceed their own physical capabilities, and the women will get pissed because they know this.

Let’s look at it form a slightly different perspective. Have you ever been around an infantry combat unit and seen their speaking tact? Ever see them at rest in the field? Do you have any idea of the things they say or do to each other? I assure you, I could regale you with all kinds of sick, twisted, and supremely funny things these guys do to each other. It’s our version of play when the veneer of civilization is stripped away. Like it or not, it is also a method to release the day into memory, and it creates a bonding experience with the others.

Let’s place a bunch of women in there. These guys all of a sudden have no outlet. The “male” space they have to bond and work together in their own way is, all of a sudden, disrupted. They have to become cautious and conscious of every little detail, repressing that play, for fear of a cry of sexual harassment.

Believe me, when it comes to shit like that, the military is pretty damned misandric. Try bullshit seminars every quarter of the year to listen to yet another speech by some government funded Women's Representative telling them what pieces of shit they are. Place that crap into the middle of a combat zone with the fear of reprisal for normal male play. I guarantee you that unit morale and cohesion will plummet.

This is the effect on the psychology of men…without even accounting for that "protective instinct" crap that social conservatives like to bandy about.

More on the Standards of Excellence Quotas:

Within the Armed Forces there are similar quotas in place for women as there are in the policing and fire-fighting fields. These quotas effectively force a lower standard to be required in order to be recognized by promotion boards, and for awards and merits.

The ultimate price of PC
We have already seen the double standard that exists within the U.S. Army in relation to the APFT, and how it relates to effective combat units. Other military occupations do not usually require the same level of physical prowess that a combat unit requires, and many of their functions can be performed in relative safety behind the wires of a Forward Operating Base (barring checkpoint incursions and the occasional mortar round). This is not to say that there are not supply vehicles that are manned by women on mounted .50 caliber machine guns or the occasional M240B machine gun in a turret that do not come under sniper fire or IED attack.. However, all these areas are scanned and patrolled regularly by scouts and infantry.

The Tactics, Techniques, and Procedures of moving through the areas require our soldiers to look for newly dug holes, wires, or even rocks that are out of place. They come to know the territory like the back of their hand, and become increasingly adept at discovering suspicious behaviors or suspicious areas. These roads are in essence relatively secure, as compared to the new paths that are forged by our fighting men everyday. These positions of relative safety come at the cost of a much greater amount of combat deaths to men than to women.

While there are many female soldiers that are capable using the same techniques in a supply convoy trundling along a dusty road, this is not the entirety of the infantry and scout functions. They actually take the fight to the enemy, and this requires a physical prowess and physical training that most women cannot perform.

Unfortunately, placing women into combat units will not alter the military policies concerning double standards and quotas. The powers that be in the sexual grievance industry and various "women's superiority" groups have already infiltrated the military machinations on a very deep level. They will continue to purport lowering the physical requirements for women, when the fact is that there are many men who cannot meet the standard, even with a biological advantage. They will also push these women into leadership positions, and further their own agenda at the cost of lives.

Selection for promotion boards works off of quotas. Let's say that several positions for the rank of Sergeant open up within a battalion. The units within may submit 5 personnel files each. These people represent those with enough promotion points to go to the board. From these, perhaps 10 are selected. What they do in order to fulfill the "quota" (though they won't call it that) as guide-lined by the military's equal opportunity program is knock of the bottom ranks of the files and fill them with women and minorities who have the requisite promotion points (with women minorities usually given a double whammy), and then proceed with the board.

We have seen successful integration of minority males into combat related military professions, and these men are expected to uphold the exact same standards that every other man is expected to uphold. No pass there; discounting a couple promotion points (which is what it usually comes down to). What happens when we do that for women who are not required to meet the same standard?

We suddenly have an influx of substandard leaders in one of the most dangerous professions in the world. Talk about having a crappy effect on morale, unit readiness, and unit survivability.

Do you want a lowered standard for combat troops when your ass is on the line? Will elements of the MRM still try to push for this so-called equality?

I say we don't throw grease on this particular fire in an attempt to put it out. We will have blood on our hands for doing so.

AAM to host International Men's Day

Jade Michael · 16 February 2012 · Archived copy · Original

Artistry Against Misandry is hosting an International Men's Day 2012 event in Nashville, TN. AVFM's very own, John The Other, is scheduled to be a special guest speaker amidst performances by regional bands. Although the official day of annual celebration is 11/19, the greater IMD organization has approved our celebration for Saturday, November 17, 2012 It will take place at The Listening Room in downtown Nashville, from 6:00pm – 10:00pm. The event will be all ages and open to the general public. To my knowledge, at this point, this will be the only MRA-hosted IMD event in the United States for 2012. It will be a historical starting point from which many future celebrations will hopefully come.

The regional theme I have picked for this year is "Overcoming Misandry through Introspection and Positive Personal Action". This will encompass many topics we, as MRAs, discuss within the MRM and it will emphasize the importance of personal growth as a precursor to making the best choices in order to live a long, safe and healthy life. The phrase "man up" will be up for dissection and the detractors that men face in western society will be exposed. Free literature on various resources and life options promoted within the MRM will be supplied to the public. The local male medical clinic will be invited to join the event as well. A raffle will be held in which participants can win prizes from local businesses. Families will be invited to attend as there will be entertainment for the kids as well.

The IMD organizational committee has appointed me Regional TN (USA) Coordinator for International Men's Day 2012. I plan to uphold this title with honor and to do the MRM justice; however, to execute these goals I need to secure the monetary funds necessary for the promotion and production of this event. Fliers, brochures, online and print promotional ads, the venue's staff and the entertainment need to be paid for. Believe me when I say it is something I abhor doing; however I am asking you for any donations you are able to provide. I cannot do this alone but with your help we can make our presence and message known. You can send funds via clicking on the "donate" button on the home page of Artistry Against Misandry. I thank you in advance as your help means more to me than I can ever express.

AVfM Radio: VAWA under fire!

[box icon="none"]

As recently reported by SAVE, and editorialized by Phyllis Schlafly, On February 2, the reauthorization of the Violence Against Women Act (VAWA) passed out of the Senate Judiciary Committee. That in itself is not remarkable. What is remarkable is that all eight Republicans voted "No" to the current Leahy version of the bill up for consideration.

Schlafly was quick to pronounce that this admittedly thunderous moment was an indication that Washington Republicans were "no longer intimidated by feminist demands."

And she might be right. The typical leftist suspects are losing their minds. Both CNN and Huffpo are so bent out of shape that they are explicitly calling for the Obama administration to EMPLOY VIOLENCE against Republicans.

If Schlafly is correct, then we can start icing down the champagne, because if either party really qualifies as being henceforth unfriendly to feminist governance we're gonna throw a shindig, the likes of which has not been seen since, well, since people started throwing shindigs.

But don't get out your party poppers just yet.

It is clear that this is a big one. Bigger than big. A straight party line vote against the feminist owned VAWA behemoth is a monstrosity of a change in the status quo, no matter what the reasons. But just like we do with everything else around here, we are going to dig through the politics and other poop and put some red pill analysis on the matter.

We are doing our homework, folks. This ought to mean a very interesting episode of AVfM Radio. So be sure to tune in for yours truly, along with co-host JTO as we gladly sort out why eight politicians said no to the biggest, most invasive and important piece of feminist legislation ever passed.

Hell, this show is so special we got a doctor there, just to take your phone calls. And that ain't no campaign promise. Tonight folks. Be there.

Components of bullying

Tom Lynch · 16 February 2012 · Archived copy · Original

Psychologists analyze the minds of individuals. Sociologists study people's relationships. This leaves a middle area not well developed, that of the social expression of individual personality and personality pathology. This paper is part of this latter area, and is specifically about individuals who apply social intelligence to the task of being aggressive, and how this aggression is expressed.

Most aggression is social as typically more than one person is involved. The term social aggression used in this paper is not used in this sense, but rather indicates aggression through the manipulation of relationships. Aggression usually exists in scenarios known in the colloquial as fights. This report does not discuss fighting scenarios, but is limited to the single acts where a person hurts another, whether that act is in defense or not. I call the person who does the hurting the aggressor and the person who is hurt the victim. This is not intended to imply that the victim will not also be an aggressor within some wider scenario. Nor does it not imply legal or moral guilt on the part of either party.

Social aggression as a term in the context of this report is not a moniker for the aggression that may be perpetrated by gangs or other authority hierarchies. Rather this report discusses how an individual can express non-physical aggression through relationships – whether the individual is part of a gang is irrelevant.

Aggression is often a normal part of resolving human conflict. We, as citizens of society, desire to evolve refined methods of resolving conflict, such as open debate and voting. We see that primitive forms of aggression often do not lead to resolution but propagate a pathological scenario. However, in this study we explore the expression of the psychopathic personality which is aggressive through social relationships for personal satisfaction, not out of any desire to improve society or even to improve the local situation. Avoiding the physical fight is not altruistic but rather camouflage for the social attack. The psychopath is simply not able to be physically aggressive or does not want to be caught. We co-opt an older term that has fallen to disuse to describe this personality that turns to social aggression; sociopath.

Background

Seminal work on social aggression was done by Rachel Simmons and is summarized in her book, Odd Girl Out. In this book Ms. Simmons follows a group of girls as they mature. She shows how the girls hone their skills of social manipulation into socially aggressive acts, and she describes a flocking phenomenon. Among the descriptive examples given in the book was that of a young girl who waited years to 'get even' then did so by stealing another girl's boyfriend even though she didn't like the boy. The aggressor took pleasure from the aggression by telling the other girl what she had done.

Simmons' thesis appears to be that girls are just as aggressive as boys, though the girls tend to be socially aggressive while the boys tend to be physically aggressive. Accordingly, an angry boy hits his target immediately, while an angry girl designs situations where her target is denied emotional support, denied opportunities, or becomes disliked or even physically assaulted by others after a period of time. Simmons points out that the most socially aggressive girls are typically well liked by teachers. This attribute of being liked by those who have the authority to put a stop to aggression facilitates attacks.

Awareness of Simmons work has made it into counseling programs in lower schools around the U.S. It is largely being called bullying, but that is a mischaracterization. Firstly it is not about a group beating up an individual. If anything it would be social bullying. However Simmons also describes a number of scenarios that are not even social bullying, such as the case of the girl who stole a boyfriend, 'to get even'.

Carol Gilligan in the book "In a Different Voice" made the argument that women are more aware of relationships than men, and as a result have a different set of ethics. She wrote this thesis to explain why women as a population group scored lower on Kohlberg's morality test. Her explanation is that the test was gender biased for not taking into account solutions to moral problems that involve knowledge of the thoughts and feelings of the individuals involved in the scenarios presented.

For children and in domestic relationships this concept of gender bias may fit the data at this time, but Pierre Bourdieu points out that in a wider context social aggression exists for both genders. There are many examples of social engineering of aggression by people in general including in office politics, state politics, diplomacy, business, in vying for grants, and in the practice of law. Also, culture is changing and as physical aggression is being suppressed both due to it not being accepted and due to the virtualization of relationships, aggressive personalities are finding other means for winning in competitions of will. The social aggression is now more readily accessible, and typically not even illegal.

As another example, passive aggression is already recognized as aggression that is non-physical. Passive aggression manifests in relationships. It is reasonable to suppose there are additional non-physical methods of aggression.

I am often surprised to find out how familiar non-professionals are with the subject of social aggression. Many people refer to sociopaths in the colloquial as “manipulators” or “witches”.

The Nature of Social Aggression

In physical aggression the aggressor attacks the victim’s body. In the extreme, and the psychopath is likely to go for the extreme, the victim’s body is so badly damaged the victim dies. In intermediate forms the psychopath may enslave the victim and allow the victim to heal between attacks, and thus take repeated enjoyment out of hurting the victim over a period of time. In order to succeed the aggressor must cut off all accesses of escape for the victim.

In social aggression the aggressor attacks the victim’s ego. In the extreme, and the sociopath is likely to go for the extreme, the victim’s ego is so badly damaged that the victim suicides. In intermediate forms the sociopath may enslave the victim and allow the victim to recover some sense of worth between attacks, and thus take repeated enjoyment out of hurting the victim over a period of time. In order to succeed the aggressor must prevent the victim from finding support from others.

As an example of a social aggression killing consider the Megan Meier story. Megan was a sensitive teenage girl. A middle aged neighbor woman who ‘wanted to get’ Megan created a MySpace account as a young boy. After gaining Megan’s trust and becoming her ‘boyfriend’, the neighbor garnered the help of others and they started attacking Megan’s self-identity. Megan committed suicide.

The only reason we know what really happened is the MySpace records. Though the internet facilitated the violence against Megan, there are plenty of other cases of socially aggressive people using the technique of ‘false friendship’ to cast a victim into an emotional tailspin where the internet played no role whatsoever. The Internet did not invent social aggression; rather it is playing the role of documenting it.

The news media often calls this a case of ‘cyber bullying’ – but the primary means, false friendship, is not a type of bullying. In this case the role of the others included was probably in preventing Megan from finding an escape.

It is important to note that the aggressor was not successfully prosecuted because the judge ruled that social aggression is not illegal.

It is not uncommon for social aggression to lead to suicide. Many such cases are documented as a result of social aggression in the context of family law, see http://www.fallenones.org.

Techniques of Social Aggression

Of primary importance to the sociopath is to not get caught. Hence a number of these techniques are mix between aggression and obfuscation.

Denying the Victim an Ego

The sociopath removes all support for the victim’s ego. If the victim does well at a task, the sociopath belittles it or diffuses the subject. As examples, saying that he or she should have been doing something else, or pointing out something the victim "needs to work on". If the victim likes something, then that something is made out to be unimportant or undesirable. Flaws the victim has are dwelled upon. As examples, if the victim has acne, is overweight, clumsy, then that is tied into the root cause why he or she can't do other things or is not liked by others.

Making Public Embarrassing Personal Information, 'Talking behind Ones Back', Vicious Rumors

The sociopath learns about his or her victim, what the victim's sensitivities are and then says something or provides something that embarrasses the victim among the victim's peers. The victim may use a 'rumor' so that the source of the information will not be clear. It is all the more effective if it appears to the victim to come from 'everywhere'. It is not necessary that the rumor be true, and often times as the aggression become more intense, the rumors become exaggerated or outright false. This heightens the effect as the victim comes to feel powerless. The sociopath will typically want to be present when the rumor is first told to the victim so as to enjoy the victim's pain. The next best to being there is to receive a detailed account from someone who was there.

Leveraging False Friendship

An example from the Megan Meier story was given in the prior section. In this case the aggressor pretends to be a friend. This facilitates the aggressor in learning intimate information that can be fed into the rumor mill. The false friend will out themselves in a coup de grâce, yanking the victim's support network at a crucial moment in order to intensify the effect of one of other methods.

Recruiting Others to the Cause

The sociopath weaves a tale to others to get them to also avoid the victim or even strike out against the victim. The sociopath may even make it fun or a game. Often the people recruited are from the victim's peer group, all the more effective if it is the complete peer group leading to ostracism of the victim. This is where the title of Rachel Simmon's book came from, "Odd Girl Out". In the extreme the sociopath will be able to identify sycophants who are willing to carry out the smallest of commands for the sociopath.

Flocking

Sociopaths are astute to relationships, and they recognize each other easily and can naturally work together. Most all the techniques above work out better when done by a group.

Covering Achievement, Plagiarism, Rigging Competition

The sociopath will not want the victim to get credit for an achievement, and will if possible arrange for others to receive credit for work done by the victim or actively recruit others to the team, company or school who further excel at the same activity. For example, if the sociopath is a teacher, the teacher may arrange for an award to be given to another student who did lesser work on the same subject. The actual victim may be a loved one of the student, or another teacher who has the student in his or her class. The sociopath lacks empathy and will use other people to achieve their goals independent of the effect on those used.

Attacking the Victims Support

This includes taking the victim's money, attacking his or her job, or position, as well as preventing the victim from having or making friends. The sociopath does not want to see the victim have the love of parents or rewards for his or her accomplishments.

Taking Friends and Loved Ones Away

Rachel Simmons reported on the case of the high school girl who stole another girl's boyfriend just to get the other girl. In the Megan Meier story, Megan lost a boyfriend in conjunction with other things. In what is being called parental alienation syndrome, PAS, the sociopath denies children access to their other parent in order to punish their ex-spouse. The sociopath may find a number of ways to drive a wedge into a relationship. If the victim is becoming close to someone as a friend, then the sociopath attempts to drive in a wedge, to take over, or to alienate the pair.

Invoking Safeguards

The aggressor may report to an interested party a love affair, report a crime to an enforcement agency, or blame the person for something gone wrong to others. The sociopath may enjoy this all the more if the report is false. If the sociopath knows that the victim will find out he or she may set up others to make the report, or beg for physical protection.

Piled High and Deep

This technique is often seen in political campaigns. In order to avoid a false rumor or accusation from being discovered, the aggressor makes a new false rumor or accusation. The rumors or accusations end up stacking up so deep that the victim cannot say enough to reply to all of them. This is facilitated by the fact that nasty rumors and accusations are more entertaining to the general public than mundane explanations.

Extortion

Plain ole blackmail. The sociopath denies the child or other family member of something he or she needs or wants, such as parental love, in exchange for the family member doing something. The threat of distributing embarrassing material, etc. can also be used.

Disrupting the Party

Literally and figuratively, the sociopath cannot let his or her victim to have a party or analogous event such as a holiday with the child of a marriage. The sociopath may schedule another event to coincide or fall shortly before the victim's event and compete for attendees. The sociopath may arrange to ruin the party by taking over on a key guest, spoiling reservations, or may co-opt the event to expose embarrassing information.

Conspiracy as a Weapon used against a Victim

Sociopaths tend to recruit others and to flock. Hence the victim may attempt to garner help while saying that a number of people are out to get him or her. Those involved will point out that the victim is 'imagining a conspiracy' or even has paranoid tendencies, is paranoid, or even psychotic. The sociopath(s) will appeal to Occam's Razor principal and ask the question such as "Which is more likely, that everyone in the school doesn't like Ann, or that Ann has low self-esteem and is imaging things?" Unfortunately it is often a rule of thumb for judges in a court room that truth is determined by majority opinion, and this works in the sociopaths favor.

Stopping the Victim Short

When the victim attempts a defense, the aggressor picks on small points quickly and makes a big deal out of them so that the general discussion is lost. Any sort of physical evidence will be quickly brushed aside.

Pushing a Rope, Held at a Distance, The Interpreter in the Middle

In pushing the rope, the aggressor promises something the victim wants or needs, and then draws it out as long as possible while always being positive and promising lots of action. It is a common technique used by passive aggressive attorneys and can be part of a larger social aggression. In related techniques the sociopath sets the victim up to require contact with someone whom the victim can never reach, or the aggressor plays interpreter for information from a person the victim cannot talk to directly. The unreachable person may not exist or may not be at all what the sociopath says he or she is.

Recycling Victims

When the weapons of the sociopath are known to work on a person, then that person is a marked target for other sociopaths. Sociopaths, like all predators, prefer easy targets as they are less risky. Some victims will come to see the sociopath as a familiar role in their lives and may tolerate them or may even seek them out. The person may not realize that a sociopath in the past was actually a false friend rather than a real friend, and misunderstand the cues the sociopath presents, especially if the victim was manipulated in such a manner by the sociopath that the sociopath was an only friend. Perhaps the most extreme case is that of the child of a sociopathic parent who cues on the sociopath to provide motherly love or fatherly guidance that was perhaps never provided before.

Characteristics of the Sociopath

A sociopath will be socially intelligent and astute to other's internal emotional constructs and motivations, yet lack empathy and thus be willing to use his or her gifts for personal gain at other people's expense.

In this mode a sociopath designs his or her communications for effect rather than to convey information. When analyzing such communication one must often look for the intended end affects rather the logic or factual content. If one analyzes the logic or content one may find it to be 'piled high and deep' and boring rather than dangerous.

Simmons noted that socially aggressive girls were almost always well-liked by their teachers. Sociopaths use their social intelligence and ability to quickly pick up on the emotional constructs of others to raise their social standings. They are almost always well-liked by people in positions of authority.

For the same reasons sociopaths are often the alpha player in a group hierarchy. They naturally fall into positions of authority that can be gotten through social manipulation. Unfortunately, this means they are over represented in such population groups as attorneys, politicians, psychologists, social workers and academics.

Sociopaths flock. They quickly recognize each other, and if their interests are in alignment or they are part of a network of trading favors. They will work together.

A sociopath's circle of close friends will often include sycophants or people who are dense and 'believe in' him or her. The reason for this is that those who do not like to be manipulated create more distance from the center. They prefer to be observers, possibly for the entertainment sake.

The sociopathy underscoring socially aggressive behavior can also lead to directly aggressive behavior when the socially aggressive person perceives he or she can get away with it. A component of the pathology is that the aggressor enjoys the fact that others who could help the victim think the aggressor is a nice person. Hence, such a person is careful not to be found out. When being directly aggressive the sociopath uses less obvious means that are likely to go undetected.

Sociopathy and Divorce

Apart from sycophants, those who are easily manipulated, and convenient arrangements, sociopaths make for bad spouses. Sociopaths are accustomed to getting what they want and punish those who cross them, so it follows that they are over represented in the population of spouses involved in contentious divorce.

Our current family law system hands socially aggressive people a number of weapons while offering them sanctuary. A divorcing spouse or family practice specialist may effectively use the child or children, may make false allegations, invoke protection orders to falsely create the appearance of danger, and/or garner like minds, naive ideologues and sycophants to the task of attacking the target. All the while making friends and gathering allies who are profiting.

Family laws and attitudes are designed to protect against physical aggression, but ignore the existence of socially aggressive people, so such people are left free to pervert the system to their own ends. When one person is physically violent against another via force the police are often engaged immediately and investigation ensues. In contrast no one will be taken seriously if calling the police department to report being a victim of 'social aggression'. Such a victim will find no support.

In the context of family law socially aggressive people might be found among divorcing spouses, attorneys, social workers, psychologists, and those not directly in the system who take advantage of the divorcing spouses lack of attention to other matters. It is the nature of the pathology that socially aggressive people flock, as a result it is not uncommon that a vulnerable child or adult becomes the center of a shark feed. An example of this phenomena is well documented in the book “ITIO a Child”.

Conclusion

Our laws are written almost exclusively to punish pathological physical aggressors. In contrast sociopaths are not punished. For example, in the Megan Meier story the judge explicitly said what was done was not illegal.

The system can even facilitate sociopaths. This is because our laws are written from the same point of view and philosophy as Kohlberg’s morality test. Gilligan is correct, this bias needs to be removed; removed not only from ethics tests, but from our laws as well. This ‘stuff’ needs to be illegal.

Laws in general, and especially divorce needs to be designed to work even in the presence sociopaths both as parties and in the system. It is a common error on the part of legislators to believe that the laws they pass will be prosecuted by angels.

There can be no perfect solution for divorce, but social weapons can be placed further out of reach of those who would use them to do harm. Divorce is a civil matter for canceling a marriage license. The whole ‘scene’ could be avoided by extending no-fault property divorce to no-fault custody (shared parenting on calendar rotations) and getting divorce proceedings over with quickly. There are already criminal laws in place for those who commit fraud or who hurt children. We do not need redundant divorce courts for this.

At least part of the population of people who deny children access to the other parent are socially aggressive sociopaths. The base syndrome is psychopathy in the presence of a gift for being socially astute. One should expect that when one parent denies the child access to the other parent that other sociopaths in the system will be involved or even dominant players in accomplishing this (flocking).

Despite representations and appearances sociopaths are not concerned for the children, but rather they see personal satisfaction in participating. Personal satisfaction may be in ‘getting the victim’ as a surrogate, as a trade of favors, for entertainment, or for profit. Divorce laws need to recognize and take into account the social aspect of sociopathy.

On male victims of domestic violence

M. R. Walks · 17 February 2012 · Archived copy · Original

The rationale for government funding being directed to services for male perpetrators and women and children victims of violence is often given as, “men make up such a small percentage of victims of family violence that services should focus on the majority of clients: women and children.”

One of my colleagues works at a New South Wales (NSW) Local Area Health Service. She attended a compulsory training session for all NSW Health workers covering the use of a NSW Health domestic violence screening tool. The following is a direct transcription from the one of the presenters:

> Well, you will encounter gender issues, obviously, throughout the whole of society. But around domestic violence, because, well as you know, because over 90 per cent, something like 98 or 97 per cent of perpetrators are male in our society, NSW Health decided to focus their Domestic Violence Policy on women, because we only have so much time and resources.

First, it should be noted here that a NSW Government employee is giving staff misinformation about the gender breakdown of domestic violence. There is absolutely no evidence showing that “something like 98 or 97 per cent of perpetrators are male.” The most conservative recent estimates [1] (from police reports, which do not cover the vast majority of male victims who never report their assaults [2] show that 82 per cent of offenders in NSW between 2001 and 2010 were male, while 30.8 per cent (almost one in three) victims of domestic assault were male.

> I’ve put myself in my own prison because I don’t want to have any interaction with society any more. I feel too vile, too dirty, because the mainstream of society says this kind of behaviour from a woman is OK
> Kevin – Male DV victim

Secondly, this rationale is never presented when talking about services for any other sub-population. For example, gay, lesbian, bisexual and transgendered (GLBT) or Aboriginal victims of family violence aren’t ignored because they make up a small minority of victims. To the contrary: there are specialist services available for these sub-groups precisely because they are in the minority and need services tailored to their specific needs and circumstances. The same is true of male victims of family violence. It doesn’t matter whether males make up 5 per cent, 15 per cent, 35 per cent or 50 per cent of victims of family violence; the fact is that there are no services currently available to assist them. This flies in the face of our international human rights and equal opportunity obligations.

The following statistics demonstrate that at least one in three victims of family violence in Australia is male (perhaps as many as one in two). This figure includes assaults by both male and female perpetrators, and includes family members as well as intimate partners. When reading these quantitative statistics it should be remembered that family violence is extremely complex and doesn’t just boil down to ‘who does what to whom and how badly.’ The context of the violence and abuse is extremely important. Abuse can occur without the use or threat of physical violence.

Recent Australian statistics

The Australian Bureau of Statistics Personal Safety Survey (PSS, 2006) [3] is the largest and most recent survey of violence in Australia. It found that :

- 28 per cent (around one in three) people who experienced physical assault by an intimate partner (current partner, previous partner, boyfriend, girlfriend or date) in the last 12 months were male

- 29.8 per cent (almost one in three) victims of current partner violence since the age of 15 were male
- 24.4 per cent (almost one in four) victims of previous partner violence since the age of 15 were male
- There were no statistically significant differences in the prevalence rates between women and men experiencing physical assault by known perpetrators in the last 12 months (2.6% or 198,500 women and 2.7% or 213,100 men)
- In their most recent incident of physical assault by male and female perpetrators in the last 12 months, the difference in estimates for men and women reporting physical assault by a male or female family member/ex-boyfriend/ex-girlfriend were not statistically significant. However this information does not infer that there were no differences in the overall prevalence of men and women experiencing physical assault by family members/ex-boyfriends/ex-girlfriends.
- The characteristics of the location of the most recent incidents of physical assault by males and females in the last 12 months showed that while men experienced almost equal numbers of most recent assaults by male and female perpetrators in a home; and while women experienced almost five times as many most recent assaults by male compared to female perpetrators in a home; the total number of most recent assaults experienced in a home was similar for men and women. It is not possible to generate estimates for the total number of persons who experienced physical assault in a home. ?Significant problems with this survey include, (a) only female interviewers were used, (b) a much smaller sample of male informants was used compared to female informants, and (c) no data was published on types of violence or injuries or threats received by male victims.

> I was petrified to come home from work and would see her car in the drive and have to drive away and sit for an hour or so by myself to prepare for the likely barrage to come. I lived in terror walking on eggshells around her for nigh on 20 years. I attempted suicide a number of times.
> Dan – Male DV victim

The SA Interpersonal Violence and Abuse Survey (1999)[4] found that 32.3 per cent (almost one in three) victims of reported domestic violence by a current or ex-partner (including both physical and emotional violence and abuse) were male.

The Crime Prevention Survey (2001)[5] surveyed young people aged 12 to 20 and found that:

- while 23 per cent of young people were aware of domestic violence against their mothers or step-mothers by their fathers or step-fathers, an almost identical proportion (22 per cent) of young people were aware of domestic violence against their fathers or step-fathers by their mothers or step-mothers
- an almost identical proportion of young females (16 per cent) and young males (15 per cent) answered “yes” to the statement “I’ve experienced domestic violence”
- an almost identical proportion of young females (6 per cent) and young males (5 per cent) answered “yes” to the statement “my boyfriend/girlfriend physically forced me to have sex”. ?The NSW Bureau of Crime Statistics and Research (BOCSAR, 2005)[6] found that between 1997 and 2004, 28.9 per cent (almost one in three) victims of domestic assault in NSW were male. Men and women suffered similar percentages of injuries and similar injury types as illustrated below.

> Poor dad. I had seen him walking naked in the back yard at night all up- set and embarrassed; and I had seen him crawling under the bed to escape her vicious attacks, and I have seen him nursing his fresh wounds in the toilet, and he would say no word against her.
> Son talking about parents

BOCSAR also examined trends and characteristics of domestic homicides in NSW over the period January 2003 to June 2008 [7]. During this time, there were 215 victims of domestic homicide; 115 females and 100 males (almost one in two victims were male). Intimate partners were responsible for 43 per cent of domestic homicide victims (70 females and 23 males – one in four were male).

The Queensland Crime and Misconduct Commission (2005)[8] found that 32.6 per cent (almost one in three) victims of family violence reported to police were male.

The Australian Institute of Criminology (2008)[9] found that 48.7 per cent (almost one in two) adult victims of family homicide and 35.4 per cent (over one in three) victims of intimate partner homicide in 2006-07 were male.

The Victorian Victims Support Agency (2008) [10] found that 31 per cent (almost one in three) persons admitted to Victorian Public Hospitals for family violence injuries were male.

The Australian Institute of Family Studies (1999) [11] observed that, post-separation, fairly similar proportions of men (55 per cent) and women (62 per cent) reported experiencing physical violence including threats by their former spouse. Emotional abuse was reported by 84 per cent of women and 75 per cent of men.

A University of Melbourne / La Trobe University study (1999) [12] found that men were just as likely to report being physically assaulted by their partners as women. Further, women and men were about equally likely to admit being violent themselves. Men and women also reported experiencing about the same levels of pain and need for medical attention resulting from domestic violence.

An extensive study of dominance and symmetry in partner violence by male and female university students in 32 nations by Murray Straus (2008)[13] found that, in Australia, 14 per cent of physical violence between dating partners during the previous 12 months was perpetrated by males only, 21 per cent by females only and 64.9 per cent was mutual violence (where both partners used violence against each other).

The Queensland Government Department of Communities (2009)[14] reported that 40 per cent of domestic and family violence protection orders issued by the Magistrate Court were issued to protect males.

A study of risk factors for recent domestic physical assault in patients presenting to the emergency department of Adelaide hospitals (2004)[15] found that 7 per cent of male patients and 10 per cent of female patients had experienced domestic physical assault. This finding shows that over one in three victims were male (39.7 per cent).

The Australian Institute of Family Studies' evaluation of the 2006 family law reforms (2009)[16] found that 39 per cent (more than one in three) victims of physical hurt before separation were male; and 48 per cent (almost one in two) victims of emotional abuse before or during separation were male.

A study of relationship aggression, violence and self-regulation in Australian?newlywed couples by researchers at the University of Queensland (2010)[17]?found that female violence was more common than male violence, with 76 women (20 per cent) and 34 men (9 per cent) reporting to have been violent. In violent couples the most common pattern was for only the woman to be violent (n=48/82 or 59 per cent of violent couples), next most common was violence by both partners (n=28, 34 per cent), and least common was male-only violence (n=6, 7 per cent).

We reiterate: it doesn't matter whether males make up 5 per cent, 15 per cent, 35 per cent or 50 per cent of victims of domestic violence, the fact is that there are no services currently available to assist them and this flies in the face of our international human rights and equal opportunity obligations.

[box icon="none"]

Hello Everyone,

Shrink4Men Radio will be back this Monday, February 20, 2012 at 9pm EST.

My co-host for the evening, Paul Elam of AVoiceforMen, and I will be speaking with Daddy Justice (Ben Vonderheide) about his role in exposing one of Pennsylvania's corrupt judges, Kelly S. Ballentine. We'll also be discussing Mr. Vonderheide's continued activism and what you can do to get involved if you'd like to help fight the rigged, corrupt and gender biased family court system.

The last time Daddy Justice visited was one heckuva program and I have no doubt this Monday's program will be just as inspiring. The telephone lines will be open, so if you have questions or would just like to call and say hello please Skype in or give us a call at 310 388-9709.

What the fuck is up with all these "trigger warnings" on feminist websites? Every time I go to wade through one of their articles, looking for the occasional cogent idea, I first have to read one of their warnings about what they are going to say in the article, apparently to keep me from freaking out when I read it. It rarely works. Probably because they don't have trigger warnings for stupidity and lies. So, I have to figure that the warnings are more for their "regulars" than for likes of me. Still, questions arise.

Being the intrepid investigator that I am, I wanted the low down on the subject, so I did a Google search on the term and clicked though the first return I got. It took me to a site called Geek Feminism sumptin' or another, and sure enough a nifty little primer on trigger warnings filled my screen, with no warning I might add.

Here's how they describe it. (Warning: I am assuming this definition is safe to read. It does mention self-harm, though there was no warning about that beforehand.) I know, it is confusing, but you know I already told you where it came from.

> Trigger warnings are customary in some feminist and other spaces. They are designed to prevent people who have an extremely strong and damaging emotional response (for example, post-traumatic flashbacks or urges to harm themselves) to certain subjects from encountering them unaware. Having these responses is called "being triggered".

Now, does it surprise me that feminist bloggers figure their readers can't make it through an online article without doing something stupid? Nope. Not at all. In fact, I have to give them kudos for knowing their audience. Camille Paglia, noted feminist and author, also knows the audience well, to her apparent dismay. She put it like this:

> Let's get rid of Infirmary Feminism, with its bedlam of bellyachers, anorexics, bulimics, depressives, rape victims, and incest survivors. Feminism has become a catch-all vegetable drawer where bunches of clingy sob sisters can store their moldy neuroses.

I gotta say, Paglia does have the gift. And she nails it here with one minor exception. You can scratch the delineation of "infirmary" from the equation. In other words, if you want to see the mental ward of modern feminism just turn on your TV, pick up a newspaper, watch a few minutes of C-Span or go to any feminist website and observe what a big steaming pile of sick fucks they all are. Infirmary feminism? Is there any other kind?

One might pop up and say. "Hey Paul, what about Paglia herself? She is a feminist. Doesn't that prove NAFALT?"

Uh, no. It doesn't. Camille, sooner or later, will have to resign herself to the fact that she subscribes to Paglism, a good enough philosophy, but not feminism. Feminists, the only ones that matter, are those with power and influence over law and social discourse. They are the hair-brained mental defectives; the ones that spend day in and out obsessing on and writing about rape and other trauma, for an audience they openly assume is not mentally stable enough to read it.

Is it any wonder that feminists manage to traipse through life unopposed by people with brains? Again, I say no. No one wants to argue with a retarded kid, especially one with a vagina.

Indeed, I suppose since we are dealing with trauma triggers for emotional imbeciles, which literally includes the entirety of the English language, and a few of them are likely to read this, I should have issued the appropriate alerts. Is it too late? Probably, but I don't want it on my conscious that I clogged up emergency rooms with sickos making fake suicide attempts. So here we go:

Warning: This article contains all sorts of triggers. It has the word "rape" in it so please avoid all words that begin with the letter "R". It also has references to trauma, which might be traumatic, or might trigger trauma, especially the kind you inflict on yourself because you're a sick fuck. There are triggers in this article so big that Roy Rogers could mount and ride them. But wait, Roy Rogers is dead. Trigger warning: Dead cowboy! Come to think of it, his horse is dead…and stuffed. Trigger warning: Dead Trigger! Taxidermy!

Also, if your eating habits make you look like a resident of Auschwitz; if you can't resist the impulse to eat seven bags of potato chips and then jam two fingers down your throat for desert, or if your idea of emotional pain management involves dragging razor blades across your wrists just deep enough to cut through capillaries and then calling 911, then consider this a Super Duper Extra Special Trigger Warning With Power Attachments. Better put your blindfold on before reading another line. Better yet, make this the last article you ever read anywhere. You never know when some unenlightened lout is going to cause you to starve yourself because he didn't warn you he was going to mention a ham sandwich.

I don't know about you, but I feel much better now. That may be short lived. Those geeky feminists also inform us that there are some of their ilk who believe the even a passive mention of "triggering" words and phrases, outside any emotional context, could give rise to fucktarded, self destructive behaviors or an acute episode of post traumatic stress. To wit:

Some people argue that even factual, dry mentions of the above subjects should be warned for. In some sections of Media fandom there are also arguments that warnings should be made for:

[unordered_list style="tick"]

- depiction or discussion of violence
- depiction or discussion of particular kinds of consensual sexual activity (BDSM, homosexual encounters, heterosexual encounters…)
- depiction or discussion of any consensual sexual activity
- depiction or discussion of discriminatory attitudes or actions, such as sexism or racism

After I stopped laughing (which took quite a while) I began to wonder about the Catch-22 this presents. What the fuck is a trigger warning if it is not a dry, factual mention of these subjects? Aren't they telling us, in fact, that trigger warnings are a trigger? (sigh) So many idiots, so little time.

Just wondering aloud here, but wouldn't it be better to just put a trigger warning on feminism itself? I mean, hopefully that would have the effect of driving out the mentally deficient from their ranks. Never mind. They couldn't afford it.

Challenging claims about gendered violence

M. R. Walks · 19 February 2012 · Archived copy · Original

The increase in the numbers of women being proceeded against by police in Australia for violence related assault is probably due to a number of factors.

First, men are probably becoming more willing to report women's violence against them. We know that men have historically been up to three times less likely than women to report the violence they experience [1]. Perhaps this is starting to change.

Second, police appear to be applying the law more fairly and justly. In the past it was the largely the case that whenever police attended a family violence scene, the man was arrested by default, based on nothing more than his sex. More recently some police have started addressing this discriminatory gender bias and have been arresting perpetrators of violence not simply on the basis of their sex, but on the evidence before them. We note that this does not yet occur across the board: the 'old school of thought' still exists in some police circles where male victims are told to 'just get over it'. More training of officers around this issue is still required.

Third, the socialization of young women appears to have changed. Young women are increasingly likely to consume alcohol at harmful levels. There was a doubling in the rate between 1998-99 and 2005-06 of hospital admission for intoxication for women aged 15-24 [2]. Young women also appear to be increasingly likely to use violence (especially when inebriated). Numerous recent news stories have reported on this phenomenon:

A Sydney Morning Herald article [3] in August 2009 reported that in 2006, police in Victoria were called to more than 3500 family violence incidents in which children were the perpetrators. One in three involved girls, mostly aged 12 to 17. Police also revealed that attacks by boys against their parents rose 19 per cent between 2003 and 2007, but attacks perpetrated by teenage girls grew 30 per cent in the same period.

A Daily Telegraph article [4] in June 2009 reported that the number of women who have been charged with domestic violence-related assault in NSW has soared by 159 per cent over the past eight years. The figures, from the New South Wales Bureau of Crime Statistics, show 2336 women faced court on charges of domestic violence in 2007, mainly for bashing their husbands, compared with just 818 in 1999. Although the number of women prosecuted for general assault remained stable between 1999 and 2007, there was an increase of 11 per cent a year in the number of women prosecuted for domestic violence. During the same period, domestic violence charges against men rose by 2.3 per cent a year.

Recent Nine News articles reported on two incidents of extreme female violence in just one small corner of South East Queensland, over a 12-hour period on July 14, 2011. In the first [5], a 19-year-old woman was charged with murder after allegedly running her car into her boyfriend and crushing him against a house in Brisbane, following a dispute over a pet. She fled the scene and was apprehended on the Gold Coast. The man was on crutches at the time with an injury. In the report, family members said their relationship had always been volatile. A charge of drink driving against the woman was upgraded to one of murder. In the second incident a woman attacked her partner, firemen, paramedics and the media in the street during a house blaze. Her partner reported he had gone to see a doctor to get stitches in his head after she head-butted him, and when he returned, found the house ablaze and he was attacked again.

> "She not only destroyed me when we were together, but stopping me from seeing the kids – my life was not worth living then" ~ Steve

It would certainly make sense that female violence is on the rise, because on top of the age-old schoolyard rule that "boys shouldn't hit girls," we have had forty years of anti-violence campaigns telling people that only male violence against women is wrong. Just a few examples of recent campaigns include the Federal Government's Violence Against Women: Australia Says No campaign, the NT Government's Stop the Hurting, Start the Healing campaign, the Tasmanian Government's Safe at Home: Tasmania campaign, the SA Government's Don't Cross the Line campaign and the Federally-funded White Ribbon Campaign. We haven't yet seen a single government-funded campaign in Australia telling people that female violence is just as wrong.

Males make up at least one in three victims of family violence in Australia. Some will argue that, while this may be the case, there are differences between the male and female experience of family violence, specifically that:

- Men's perpetration of intimate partner violence is more severe, and more likely to inflict severe injury
- Women's perpetration of intimate partner violence is more likely to be in self-defense or a pre-emptive strike against a violent male partner
- Men's violence towards women is most often an attempt to control, coerce, humiliate or dominate by generating fear and intimidation, while women's intimate partner violence is more often an expression of frustration in response to their dependence or stress, or their refusal to accept a less powerful position
- Men who are violent in intimate relationships typically underreport their violence
- Male victims of intimate partner violence are far less likely to be afraid or intimidated than female victims.

[/unordered_list]

These claims are not supported by reliable data. [7] To summarize:

[unordered_list style="bullet"]

- Overall, women are injured more than men, but men are injured too, and often seriously
- The overall physical and psychological effects of intimate partner violence are similar for men and women
- Women and men who use intimate partner violence hurt their partners in similar ways (kicking, biting, punching, choking, stabbing, burning, etc), however men are as likely or significantly more likely than women to experience assaults using a weapon
- Men and women bear similar intentions when using intimate partner violence, leading to similar results when their average differences in physical strength are taken into account (such as when weapons are used)
- Children witnessing intimate partner violence by either their fathers or their mothers are more likely to grow up to use violence themselves
- Self-defense is cited by women as the reason for their use of intimate partner violence (including severe violence such as homicide) in a small minority of cases (from 5 to 20 per cent)
- In a study where self-defense was given as a reason for women's use of intimate partner violence in a large number of cases (42 per cent), it was cited as a reason for men's intimate partner violence more often (56 per cent)
- Reciprocal partner violence (which makes up approximately 50 per cent of all intimate partner violence and is the most injurious to women) does not appear to be only comprised of self-defensive acts of violence
- Men and women initiate intimate partner violence (both minor and severe) at around the same rates and women are equally likely or more likely to perpetrate violence against a non-violent partner

- Dominance by either partner is a risk factor for intimate partner violence (both minor & severe). It is the injustices and power struggles that are associated with inequality in relationships that give rise to violence, not just the inequality of male dominance
- Both husbands and wives who are controlling are more likely to produce injury and engage in repeated violence
- Coercion (control and domination) is a frequently cited reason by women for their own use of intimate partner violence, and by male victims for their partner's use of intimate partner violence
- Even in research samples selected for high rates of male aggression (such as shelter samples), women sometimes report using comparative frequencies of controlling behavior
- In a large recent Canadian study, victimization by repeated, severe, fear-inducing, instrumental violence (often called intimate terrorism) was reported by 2.6 per cent of men and 4.2 per cent of women in the last five years. Equivalent injuries, use of medical services, and fear of the abuser were also discovered, regardless of the sex of the perpetrator and the victim
- Both sexes tend to over-report minor acts of violence they commit, under-report serious acts they commit, and over-report serious acts they suffer
- The same results are obtained regarding the relative frequency of men's and women's violence regardless of whether men or women are the ones being questioned
- Males are taught by sex-role conditioning not to admit fear, making it appear that women are more fearful simply because they report fear more freely than men
- Women and men have different perceptions of danger and use fear-scales quite differently. Women are twice as likely as men to fear death from a partner, when the actual probability of being killed is the same. Women may over-react to objective threat, while men probably under-react
- Men have rarely had their fear of female violence assessed. One of the few studies to do this found that a substantial minority of male victims of intimate partner violence feared their partner's violence and were stalked. Over half the men were fearful that their partners would cause them serious injury if they found out that he had called the domestic violence helpline.

Sexual Profiling of Offenders and Victims

Of much concern is that the Key Objects of the NSW Crimes (Domestic and Personal Violence) Act 2007 state that "domestic violence is predominantly perpetrated by men against women and children." As you have seen from the above statistics, this statement is clearly not supported by the available data with regard to adult victims of family violence. And as far as children go, the main perpetrators of child abuse, neglect and homicide are not men, but women [8].

This amounts to sexual profiling of offenders and victims in NSW family violence legislation. Gender or racial profiling of offenders in legislation violates Australia's international human rights obligations since it creates a bias in the minds of judges and magistrates that a particular class of defendants is more likely to be guilty by reason of his or her sex or race than would be the case if he or she were of a different sex or race (and likewise the other sex more likely to be innocent). A society that condones family violence conditional upon the sex or ethnicity of the victim is not the kind of society in which we want our children to grow up.

To make a protection (i.e. freedom from violence) through government law dependent on the victim's gender could be construed as violating some of the most fundamental and cherished principles of international human rights law. Articles 2, 4 and 26 of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (ICCPR), to which Australia became a party in 1980, and which in turn reflect the rights set out in Articles 2, 7, and 16 (1) of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, are quite explicit and uncompromising in prohibiting discrimination based on sex. Article 26 of the ICCPR, in particular, guarantees "to all persons equal and effective protection against discrimination on any ground such as, inter alia, sex".

Setting the record straight on the men's rights movement

Robert St. Estephe · 20 February 2012 · Archived copy · Original

> Honest history is the weapon of freedom. – Arthur Schlesinger, Jr.

Let us now embrace our true – yet utterly forgotten – men's rights history. Now is the time to throw off myths we have been sold by the peddlers of the orthodox historical narrative. For much of what we believe to be true about the relations between the sexes in the past is, in reality, nothing but fake history; a sheaf of fables fabricated and promoted by social constructionist ideologues.

What is offered in this article is an introduction to the unknown history of 13 subjects I believe are crucial to today's men's rights movement. These 13 subjects are areas in the history of the relations between the sexes which have been obfuscated and defaced by an army of academics and policy-shapers who, in their effort to promote utopian agendas for the future, have been, over the past five decades, distorting and censoring the record and have peddled to the public a narrative deliberately tailored to seduce it into accepting a totalitarian set of protocols handed down from above and rolled out by a gigantic and powerful bureaucracy.

Having obliterated all inconvenient facts of the pre-1960s past, these bureaucrats and professors who either control outright, or make their living from, the post-1960s American nanny state, are able to claim, in essence, that if it were not for the "progress" initiated by their camp, life would be an unmitigated nightmare of oppression for the victim class they have identified, or, have invented. The historical falsehoods which now circulate everywhere in our culture – from high literature to junk entertainment – are a fundamental implement in the tactical perpetuation of the social engineers' claim on power. This is why we should understand that getting hold of an accurate historical perspective on the relations between the sexes in the past should matter to us, and should matter a great deal, and this is why this piece was written. What follows is a big, fat – and very, very red – pill that we are all in dire need of. Call it a weapon of mass instruction.

1) Alimony

Most of us believe that, before the 1960s-1970s period of cultural turmoil, women were at such a disadvantage in the employment market that in divorce cases universal and mandatory court awards of alimony were justified and that the public at large believed that such were necessary. This is a belief of recent, post-1960s, origin. It is not true.

The fact is that long before the 1920's alimony had been recognized as a racket and it was in the mid-1920s that in the United States there erupted across the nation in the press new dissenting voices across a wide spectrum of interests. A resistance movement had been born. Here is what one of the earliest and most prominent of these dissenters, Chicago Judge Harry A. Lewis, had to say about the matter in 1925:

> Under our modern standards woman is no longer man's inferior. If you would find out whether this is true ask any one of them and see what she says in reply. Yet there appear before me every day unobligated women who seek from $15 to 50 a week from their former husbands' earnings to add to their own comfortable salaries and for no other reason, pretext or cause than that they were once married to the men.

And in the following year New York Judge Selah B. Strong offered a parallel view:

> The whole business of alimony grabbing is degrading. It cheapens the relations between men and women. I truly believe alimony keeps thousands of couples from being reconciled. The woman being supported by her husband under order of the court isn't anxious to effect a reconciliation. She is dawdling in idleness, free, irresponsible. She's making him suffer, so she gloats.

[image]

But these, of course, are male voices. What could we expect to hear from the opposite sex?

In 1925 Doris Blake, widely read syndicated newspaper columnist, devoted a column to Judge Strong's views, summing up her own view by calling alimony grafters a "parasitic class." In 1928 bestselling novelist Faith Baldwin, had this to say:

> The rising tide of divorce has brought us a new industry, the ultimate refinement of gold-digging, the perfection of blackmail within the law – marriage for alimony. Women who do not want husbands or children have found a joker in our marriage laws by which they can establish themselves comfortably for life; free, respectable, rich, safe – without personal cost or sacrifice.

There are thousands and thousands of women who are being supported by men to whom they are no longer wives. There is no doubt that this business of alimony is getting to be a serious menace, it may be alright when a man has plenty of money. To pay a former wife a few thousand dollars in alimony may mean nothing to him. But, on the other hand, just consider how many men are forced to pay alimony who cannot afford it. You will find in the majority of cases that there is no good reason why they should pay it, either. The women are well able to take care of themselves. If they did not lack pride and self-respect, they would not accept money from men who no longer mean anything to them."

Journalist Ruth Brown Reed in 1931 spoke of an "industry":

> The alimony racket has become the great woman's industry. A sobbing pretty woman before the court – and what chance has the husband? In many cases the amount of alimony is so large in proportion to the man's earnings that it completely nullifies any chance of happiness or of another marriage. And why – one cannot help but ask – should a divorced man be denied the right to a normal family life?

In 1937, novelist Kate Baldwin complained that "there are many women who will marry merely with the idea of getting alimony. They know that marriage can be painlessly dissolved and they take their marriage vows with no intention at all of keeping them." And in the same year journalist Maxine Garrison wrote: "Women who marry that they may divorce for money are high-class chiselers who have so far got off scot-free. It's an old con game with streamline trimmings … It's all too easy these days for a woman to reason along these lines when she is momentarily bored or angry, 'Why should I go on putting up with this guy? A divorce, with alimony to take care of the money problem, and I can live my own life as I please.'"

In 1939, Dr. S. L. Katzoff, domestic dilemma expert, medical director, and consulting psychiatrist of the San Francisco Institute of Human Relations, estimated that in his day "alimony in America has grown into a billion-dollar annual business, and only a fraction of the alimony payments are justifiable" and asserted bluntly that "alimony often amounts to holdups with the aid of barbaric laws."

And a good three decades following the mid-1920s eruption of the Alimony Racket issue as a major public debate on the national scene, newspaper columnist Helen Worden Erskine offered a 1954 assessment:

> Will we ever have a new Lincoln to free the alimony slave? In New York's Manhattan telephone book you'll still find the entry: Alimony Jail. At various times it's been my job as reporter to interview inmates of this jail, which is at 434 West 34th Street (appropriately in the Hell's Kitchen district). Each time I was ashamed of my sex.

The presently accepted official narrative claiming of alimony as a culturally accepted necessity before the supposed economic liberation of the oppressed woman with no opportunity to support herself – until the Marxist-feminist came to the rescue in the 1960s – is a hoax. Let's dump the myth. Pre-60s divorced women were not helpless unemployables who, without an alimony check every month, or two, or three, would starve in a job market that had no place for them. The official narrative we have been duped into believing is a recent fabrication and could never have been believed by the public until the period following the '60s, when the fake history of the relations between the sexes was first delivered to us and then for decades pounded incessantly into our heads by the schools, the bureaucrats and the media.

2) Men's Rights Organizations

By the mid-1920s the term "alimony racket" became commonplace throughout the United States. The scandal of alimony profiteering – which in some cases manifested itself in some serial wives racking up a string of check providers, whom they were briefly wedded to, by moving from jurisdiction to jurisdiction – gave rise to America's earliest men's rights organizations.

But the world's first men's rights organization dedicated to a comprehensive range of men's issues with a goal of legal reform was founded in 1926 in Vienna, Bund Für Menschenrechte ("Federation for Men's Rights"; erroneously cited in English language newspapers as Liga Für Menschenrechte, which was a different, and unrealers "human rights" organization also founded in 1926). And if you are wondering what book you might find it mentioned in, or what encyclopedia lists it, or which college professor discusses it, the answer is: none, zilch, zippo. In other words, the world's first men's rights organization has been erased from history as if it never existed.

The Vienna Men's Rights federation was founded in March 1926 by Sigurd Hoeberth and lasted (under a different name, following a schism in January 1927) until a Nazi commissioner shut it down in 1938, just after Germany annexed Austria. Hoeberth's Aequitas (as distinguished from the male-only Justitia, headed by Bund co-founder Leopold Kornblueh) staunchest supporters were women, specifically mothers of marriageable sons. The mandate: finding solutions to paternity fraud, malicious alimony extraction, alimony prison, sexual blackmail, and false accusations leading to incarceration. Hoeberth produced eight issues of the two men's rights periodicals his group published — one of which was named "Self-Defense" — between the years 1930 and 1934.

In the United States many organizations sprang up – The Alimony Payers Protective Association (later called National Sociological League), The Alimony Club of Illinois, National Divorce Reform League, New York Alimony Club – prominent activist members being Dr. Vernon B. Cooley, Robert Ecob, Dr. Alexander Dallek, Adolph Wodiska, and Theodore Apstein. They organized to fight the alimony racket but expanded their scope to address other men's rights problems.

While Hoeberth's Viennese organization's doors were still open it reached out internationally, inviting representatives from the American organizations to attend an international conference. Charlie Chaplin was one outspoken American supporter of the international organization. But all this internationalism came to an end in 1930 during the early months of the Great Depression (yet the Bunde, which split into two different organizations in 1927, lasted until 1938). In America other alimony organizations came and went through the course of the 20th century, and there was always a national alimony reform organization somewhere within the United States which could be found by any who sought it out.

3) Female Men's Rights Activists

Women played a prominent role in the early men's rights movement in the United States. Mrs. Bessie Cooley, a second wife of an alimony-scarred husband, was founder of what may well have been America's first men's rights organization, the Society of Disgruntled Alimony Payers. Mrs. Rose Fox and Mrs. Samuel Gompers joined existing organizations, the New York Alimony Club and National Divorce Reform League, respectively, and publicly pressed their case despite the fact neither was personally affected by Alimony Racket injustices. In addition, women with no formal tie to men's rights organizations in their capacity as journalists, judges, and legislators, were prominent in the promotion of the men's rights issues discussed by the organized groups.

Mrs. Cooley formed her organization in 1927, to promote her well-considered view that "No woman without children, who is able to support herself, is, deserving of alimony. … There are too many gold-diggers among divorced women, and half of them aren't deserving of consideration."

In 1932, Mrs. Gompers, and elderly widow, having heard endless stories of injustices done to men in the divorce courts, was motivated by to join up with the National Divorce Reform League, an organization of about 1,000 members, to fight, in her words, "alimony swindlers and the indefinite confinement of men in alimony jails." She was not shy of controversy, explaining with a smile, to one reporter: "I get letters from women all over the country charging me with being a traitor to my sex. Well, I'm certainly an enemy of gold-diggers, if that's what they mean."

Mrs. Fox, spokeswoman of the New York Alimony Club was well aware of how crucial the involvement of women in the movement would be. In 1934 she explained to the newspapers that she "joined this club primarily because that very often a woman can attack her own sex with more effect than can a man."

4) Heart-Balm Racket, Badger Game & Other Rackets

The early 1930s saw three female state legislators become the most important political champions of the early men's rights movement: Roberta Nicholson (Indiana), Blanche Hower (Ohio), and Gladys Stewart (Missouri). Each succeeded in passing state laws to ban breach of promise suits, a particular type of civil suit which, since the late 1800s, had grown into an epidemic scam. By the 1930s it was universally known as the "Heart Balm Racket," an insidious shake-down scam that men's rights activist Theodore Apstein called "one of the most vicious and lucrative rackets which exists on the well crowded American scene."

The standard version of the scheme went like this: the woman seduces a man into proposing marriage, coaxing from him a minimum of three letters – being the evidentiary standard required by the court – which prove his expressed desire to marry her. Once this documentary end has been achieved, she then creates some sort of upset to their romantic rapport which will cause the target to realize his chosen mate would become an unbearable wife, causing him to withdraw his offer of matrimony. Next stop for the heart-broken jilted "victim": the lawyer's office.

The extraction of large amounts of cash from promise-breaking fiancées was not limited to those women who were premeditated grafters, however. In 1901 an 18-year-old young man named Michael Beck who broke off his engagement with nineteen-year-old Matilda Wood; but only after a bit of time following the pair's attempt to be married had been frustrated by a clergyman who had refused them, deeming the parties underage. When, four months later, Michael's matrimonial ardency had cooled, the girl had her would-have-been groom arrested. He languished in jail not being able to come up with the $2,000 bail the court demanded as assurance for his return to face his ex- fiancée's $10,000 heart balm claim against him.

Woman journalist Nicola Greeley-Smith sardonically essayed the breach of promise/heart balm phenomenon in 1911, comparing the love market to the stock market. She asked: "What is the balm that may be applied to the wounded feelings tender soul who discovers suddenly that she is not as much engaged as she thought she was? Ten thousand dollars is the current market quotation on heart balm, as disclosed by two verdicts for that amount rendered by sympathetic juries in New York this week." Greeley-Smith's conclusion: "Only moral from this week's crop of breach of promise cases is that now is a good time to sue."

In reality, the Heart Balm Racket was merely an updated variant of the older Badger Game, a shake-down racket practiced by predatory women in league with male accomplices. The Badger Game was epidemic in the 19th century, scamming "hundreds of men a month in New York City alone." In the classic Badger Game set-up an attractive woman approaches a man of some financial means and entices him to a private place with the intent of maneuvering him into a compromising position. Afterward a male accomplice, usually a purported husband or brother, enters and threatens to expose the dupe unless the targeted victim pays him off to avoid scandal or prosecution over some trumped up charge.

Another variant on the Badger Game, reported in Time magazine in 1930 and still flourishing, is one which, as Wikipedia tells us, "involves accusations of professional misconduct. In an example of this form of the con, a 'sick' woman would visit a physician, describing symptoms that required her to disrobe for the examination, require the doctor to examine the genitals, or ensure similar scrutiny from the doctor. During the examination an 'outraged husband' or 'outraged father' would enter the room and accuse the doctor of deviant misconduct. The 'sick' woman, who is of course part of the con, takes the side of her accomplice and threatens the doctor with criminal charges or a lawsuit."

As soon as the Heart Balm Racket industry was brought to a halt by legislative ban in 1935, long-practiced older scams came to attract the female predator. Simple false sexual harassment cons picked up steam so that petty extortions of men by histrionically "offended" women in New York City became "so widespread that according to one of Manhattan's 'confidential detectives,' the average male visitor to New York, no matter how circumspect, 'is only lucky if he doesn't get clipped.'"

Detective Edward Z. Holmes explained how predatory women, unpleasantly restricted by the new Heart Balm laws, found entrepreneurial solutions to their dilemma:

> The girls used to have to do nothing more than lead a man into writing them a letter." Holmes said, "Then they had him. Nowadays they can't get any place that way, so they have worked up a mess of small time traps that place a man in such an embarrassing position that he'd rather shell out a ten or twenty dollar bill than to call in the police. For instance, one of the girls' favorite rackets is to stand on a corner and wave at a man driving an out of town car. The girl is well dressed and says that she is in a hurry and could the man give her a lift for a couple of blocks? The minute the car stops for a traffic signal she just remarks that if he doesn't give her $10 she'll break the car window and scream! Work? I'll say it works!

This was 1935. Sound familiar in 2012?

Criminologist Otto Pollack has noted that "The female modus operandi suggests that women have numerous opportunities for criminal behavior which are not open to men." (The Criminality of Women, 1978, p. 38) And this feminine modus operandi is infinitely adaptable as new circumstances arrive. As we can see from studying female serial killers, the female sociopath operates not in back-alleys but in the open, exploiting socially acceptable behavior such as engagement and marriage in the case of Heart Balm operators and Black Widows, as well as child care and health care. Unlike the typical male serial killer who seems to need to announce his existence, leaving clearly murdered corpses in his wake, the female of the species covers her tracks with ingenious inventiveness, enjoying her power in closely held privacy.

The term "Badger Game" is long obsolete, yet the scam continues to this very day in updated forms: such as shake-downs involving false sexual harassment or rape accusations. These new variants should not be regarded as innovations directly resulting from novel legal changes, but simply as recent adaptations of longstanding extortion scams which have been widely employed by female sociopaths for the past two centuries. These newer scams do not, as some argue, find their inception in recent developments in "women's progress", but rather represent the exploitation of a present-day loop-hole available to the same type of female opportunist, which, like her male counterpart, has been around since time immemorial.

What is, however, completely new is that chivalrous tolerance of old (on the part of all-male juries) towards female criminality has now been replaced by new opportunities for exploitation by ideologically driven governmental policies which act to create a de facto license for racketeering. And with tax-payer funded advocacy in the picture, today's freelance blackmailers get outside support in such a degree that one might say that we now have a legalized "organized crime" sanction, much the same as we have in the banking industry following the repeal of the Glass-Steagall act.

5) Military Rackets

Wars have provided another profitable racket to the predatory woman. World War I gave rise to what in 1920 California Judge Thomas F. Graham colorfully called the "war-marriage vampires." Judge Graham laid out the workings of the war-marriage racket to a news correspondent:

> The matrimonial profiteer is a thousand times more dangerous than the economic profiteer who can more readily be reached by law. Since the war began, divorces have increased 50 per cent in California, and I am sure it is the same over the nation. Thousands of young men in the heat of war married women who lived with them perhaps two or three days, then put in claims for alimony. I know of one case in which a woman married five soldiers and for long time collected allotments from each. Many married soldiers hoping they would be killed in France so that they could collect insurance. Now that our soldiers have returned, many are finding how they have being victimized! They are too disgusted, too disillusioned to fight. The courts must do it for them.

Ironically Judge Graham had earlier in his judicial career earned a reputation for his rigid pro-alimony policy, but his "white knight" attitude could not be sustained in the face of outrageous cases involving victimized servicemen.

Across the country from Judge Graham's San Francisco jurisdiction these "vampires" were to be found as well. Army Lieut. Thomas J. Milton was the victim of an especially damaging variant of the allotment scam. When he returned to Chicago in 1919 from active duty to rejoin his mother and his two children, a son, 10, and daughter, 6, who had lived with grandma ever since their mother had abandoned them and their father six years before, he found that the children had been taken away. It turned out while he was away that his wife had attempted to get hold of his allotment checks and on discovering she had no claim of the payments as long as she did not have custody of the children she went to court, got custody, and once Milton had returned refused to let him see them.

During World War II such alimony profiteers as these acquired the new moniker "Allotment Annies." Acknowledged champion of the Allotment Annies was Vivian Eggers. Eggers was arrested in 1942 for marrying seven soldiers in quick succession. Two of her victims had been wedded to her within a single 24-hour period. Elvira Tayloe collected multiple allotment checks as well. She specialized in sailors. Like Elvira, Mimi Taylor had a thing for the Navy uniform as well. She scored five monthly Navy allotment checks, but unlike other "Annies," Mimi also had a real husband too, whom she did not bother to let in on the deal – and this was her downfall.

Hundreds of Allotment Annies were convicted of preying upon servicemen during and after World War II. Convictions totaled 242 in 1946 alone. More original than most "Annies" was Gladys Goude. She married 15 times: 11 civilians, all war workers, plus four servicemen. After the FBI was tipped off by husband number 15, Gladys was sent to the pen for a two year stint and was fined $2,000.

In 1950 during the latest war mobilization the FBI announced that the Alimony Annie racket was back with a vengeance. The Korean War, having begun in June brought 47 unluckily discovered Alimony Annies to the attention of federal prosecutors.

6) Chivalry Justice

In the early part of the 20th century there was a great hue and cry for the extension of women's rights on the part of a group of persons who are never talked about in discussions of women's suffrage: judges, prosecutors and sheriffs. The reason? The words of Chicago prosecuting attorney, John E. W. Wayman, spoken in 1912, sum it up:

> Only by making women citizens and giving them the right to vote can they be made eligible for jury service. I hope to see the day when women will serve on juries. Then only can we expect to obtain justice against criminal and murderous women in our courts.

There was a group of citizens who vehemently disagreed with this point of view and they made their opposition loud and clear. Among those who rejected the idea of women juries were Lulu Blackwell, Elizabeth Buchanan, Mrs. Harriet Burnham, Mrs. Louise Lindloff, Margaret McCabe, Mrs. Antonio Musso, and Mrs. Louise Vermilya. Each of these women was, when they expressed their views to news reporters in 1912, awaiting trial for the crime of murder.

Throughout the early part of the 20th century Chicago was notorious for the predilection of its all-male juries to acquit feminine killers despite the weight, frequently overwhelming, of the evidence. Newspaper blurb writers across the country made jokes about it, yet there were also sheaves of serious articles written expressing dismay and disgust at what was seen as the Chicago woman's de facto "license to kill." Headlines such as "Is It Reign Of Terror?; Husbands Fearing Death; Opinion Of Chicagoans" (1913) and "Safer For Women To Kill Than Steal In Chicago Town" (1918), stood above reports of the latest string of failed murder prosecutions of women.

This "reign of terror" inspired Chicago lawyer Agnes McHugh to tell reporters, as she was being considered – on the recommendation of a women lawyer's association – to be appointed special prosecutor to the latest husband-killing case. Ms. McHugh announced to the press that "a man jury will not convict a woman, murderer in this county if the prosecutor is a man," attributing the long series of failed prosecutions of women to "latent chivalry in every man," and explaining that "the jurors see two or three big strong men sitting at the prosecutors' table, and subconsciously feel that these fierce prosecutors are attacking the frail, pretty woman in the prisoner's chair. Their instinct is to defend her." The lady lawyer saw this "latent chivalry" as a temptation to the calculating woman: "I believe the leniency of juries with feminine slayers is responsible for the wave of 'affinity crimes' sweeping Chicago," asserting that "the woman criminal will receive justice only when there's a woman in court to prosecute her. We demand justice for women — not maudlin sympathy or leniency."

When women's suffrage was finally achieved in 1920 with the ratification of the 19th amendment, Chicago Judge Frank E. Johnston Jr., rejoiced, announcing that, "When women judge members of their own sex, it is a sure thing that no more sentimentality will affect the prisoner's release. Women jurors will vote to convict a guilty woman every time, and we intend to make Chicago safe for husbands."

Suffrage soon brought women into the judiciary. Early female judges were adamant in expressing their intention to overturn the injustices of the chivalry of all-male juries. Seattle Judge Rhea M. Whitehead quipped in 1921 that "A husband is going to get a square deal in my court. Too many men are convicted on sobby tales of wives!"

The same year, Oklahoma Assistant Attorney General, Mrs. Katherine Van Leuven, was sent from the state capitol to Ardmore in order to assist in the prosecution of husband-killer Clara Smith Hamon.

Again in 1921, Cleveland Judge Florence E. Allen, soon to be the first woman ever to sit on a Supreme Court bench, explained the evils of what in her words was "not born of chivalry, but what men chose to call chivalry, something totally different." In plain terms she announced that "it is quite true that all men – lawyers, judges, prosecuting attorneys, witnesses and jurors – are inclined to be lenient with a woman on trial or in any way connected with a case. The leniency is not deliberate, but instinctive. Pretty women are all too likely to make men lose their balance."

When asked in 1922 to answer the question, "Why do juries acquit women?" Judge Allen explained what she had learned from her experience on the bench:

> Men have always sat on juries and men instinctively shrink from holding women strictly accountable for their misdeeds. Now that women sit on juries I expect the percentage of convictions in cases of women to be greater. Women are more clever than men in arousing sympathy. I had one woman, a hardened criminal, stage a terrific fainting spell in my courtroom after the jury found her guilty. It took four men to carry her to jail. She continued having these spells, so long that I had to defer pronouncing sentence. Finally I sent her word that > the longer she acted so, the longer she would be in jail. Within a few moments she sent up word that, she would be good and received her sentence meekly, with no trace of feeling.

No doubt, in this period when overtly stated misandry was still relegated to ideological extremists and a few criminal sociopaths, the introduction of responsible female citizens into the jury box, as well as the growing number of female judges and prosecutors, helped to stem the tide of penalty-free murders planned by women who might previously have calculated their risks as attractively low. And female citizens of the jury did manage to put many of those who did kill behind bars.

The Chivalry problem came to the forefront in public discussions once again in 1922 when the death penalty for women was hotly debated in the public arena. The inspiration for the controversy was the Atlanta, Georgia case of husband-killer Mrs. Cora Lou Vinson. Cora Lou shot her husband to death in his drug store for daring to go against the wishes of his estranged wife in having filed to divorce.

In order to cover the national controversy over the unexpected death penalty verdict Mrs. Vinson received from the famously chivalrous Georgia men of the jury, the Associated Press sent out a journalist to gather the views of prominent feminists and suffragists, as well as a female lawyer, a policewoman, plus some male judges and sheriffs on the big question: the propriety of executing a woman. A clear majority of interviewees stood firmly behind the idea of a death penalty for women. The few exceptions were from the South: two men, a sheriff and the murderess's lawyer and one woman, the matron of the jail housing the convicted woman. The feminists – who were what today we would call "equity feminists," not "gender feminists" – were united in their call for equality. Mrs. Vinson herself remained insouciant, chiming in that "I'll never hang. The sentence doesn't worry me." As it turned out, the murderess was correct. In the end she got a lawyer-negotiated life sentence.

Yet as time marched on, more and more women would indeed become the recipients of death sentences. A great many of them, however, were pardoned by governors. Yet some did indeed eventually find their way to the gallows or to the electric chair.

The situation in France in the 1920s was pretty much the same as pre-1920 Chicago. A woman could murder her husband with impunity. The male juries were chivalrous in the extreme. So much so, that Frenchmen in 1930 reportedly began to take a keen interest in a novel organization formed in Vienna, Sigurd Hoeberth's Bund. The impetus for this interest? In 1929 France "47 wives were tried for murder of their husbands – None paid penalty for her crime," according to one US newspaper article.

The female death penalty topic was still a controversial one in 1937, when Marian Mays Martin devoted her "Modern Woman" syndicated column to the subject, with the author coming down firmly on the side of equality. Now, seventeen years after the achievement of women's suffrage, the long-maligned female-judging male jurist was still regarded by objective observers such as Ms. Martin to be an unreliable arbiter of justice:

> What the fate of any of these creatures will be at the hands of a mixed or male jury leaves little room for speculation. What their fate would be at the hands of an all-woman jury leaves none at all. It would not be possible to assemble twelve women who had sufficient pity for them to spare them the death penalty. Women criminals do not like to be judged by women.

Since the early 20th century the women's rights movement has, to put it mildly, changed. Early 20th century feminists – apart from an assortment of marginal misandrists and female supremacists – were genuine advocates for equality who, whether or not they held naïve progressive (social engineering) views, sincerely sought justice for all.

7) Female Serial Killers

It is a great irony that it is women's studies scholars of the 1970s who have challenged earlier criminological scholarship for having, for the most part, ignored female criminals. In the orthodox victimhood theory of the present, this oversight is due, according to the "gender" experts, to – you guessed it – a motive on the part of male criminologists to subjugate women by covering-up women's victimization by rape and domestic violence.

It is presently commonly believed that female serial killers are rare. More thoughtful observers, however, do note that the modus operandi of the vast majority of these supposedly rare criminals is radically different from the male serial killer. The females do not, with occasional exceptions, leave behind a string of obviously murdered corpses. Almost all of their victims' deaths are either deemed "natural causes" or are carefully hidden away. Nobody looks for a serial killer unless they have a series of obvious murder victims. In short, women criminals of this category get caught – let alone get noticed as even operating – less often than do men. According to forensic psychologist Katherine Ramsland, it is directly due to the fact that the public believes the ubiquitous stereotype of the serial killer as white and male and a loner, that those serial killers who fall outside the description, such as women, non-whites, and sociable persons, are able to operate with great license.

The most complete list of female serial killers, published by Peter Vronsky, names 140 cases. Yet new research, conducted by the author of this article, has turned up an additional 256. Female serial killers constitutes, it turns out, a subject which has never yet been thoroughly researched.

Peter Vronsky, author of the comprehensive and wonderfully well-written 2007 book, Female Serial Killers: How and Why Women Become Monsters, is an historian of criminal justice, and as far as you can get from being a feminist. He rips the mask off the politically correct excuse-makers who seem endlessly imaginative in their ability to perform mental gymnastics in their quest for universal female excuse-hood. Apart from the fascinating analysis of a goodly number of murderous female psychopaths, the book is worth a read if only for the thorough skewering given to infamous crackpot misandrist Phyllis Chesler.

In the early twentieth century the notion that female serial killers (though that specific term was not then used) were rare would have been thought absurd. In the year 1925, for example, there were multiple prosecutions of female serial killers running concurrently, the killers' names and faces known to a large public.

The new research offers some fresh data. The category "Black Widows," women who have murdered two or more husbands (in many cases with non-spouse victims in addition), now numbers eighty, a great many never listed before as serial killers. While the list of those who have sent four or more husbands to their graves numbers, at the moment, seventeen.

A large number, scores, of previously unlisted child care providers who were serial child-murders includes such notables as the teenaged German Ida Schnell, who was caught in 1906 after killing babies by sticking hair-pins into their skulls; the Russian philanthropist Madame Kusnezowa, who in 1913 was charged with having murdering 1,012 children by poison; American child care provider Elizabeth Ashmead (early 1900s), who murdered hundreds, Helen Geisen-Volk (1920s), German immigrant to New York and former wartime Red Cross nurse, killer of an estimated fifty-three infants and also a child-torturer; and Georgia Tann (1930s-1950), a sexually perverted child molester and torturer, baby-seller, and kidnapper, who was a nationally recognized expert on child rearing at the same time as she acted as death maven responsible for baby deaths likely numbering in the thousands.

A large number of forgotten husband-killing syndicates turned up in the new research. From the 1880s through the late 1930s, English language newspapers would frequently carry reports on these murders, mostly taking place in eastern Europe, with headlines such as "Husband Poisoning by Wholesale" (1882), "Ten Husband Poisoners" (1890), "A New Business; Husband Poisoning on the Scale of a Commercial Enterprise" (1891), "Killing Off Husbands" (1895), "Epidemic of Poisoning in Hungary; Eighteen Men Killed" (1901), "Women Formed Club to Murder Husbands" (1903), "Woman Kills 300 At Wives' Behest" (1909), "Exterminating Husbands" (1911), "Wanted to Be Widows So They Hanged Their Husbands" (1933), "Used Fly Paper to Kill Husbands" (1935), "How Wives Gained Power by Mass Murder of Husbands" (1937). Yet another of these husband-killing clubs, located in Belgrade Yugoslavia, even created an officially registered organization, called the Lucretia Club. In 1926 five of the club women were arrested and charged as its ringleaders.

Another little known fact is that some female serial killers specialize in victimizing females. The previously unlisted Leopoldine Kasparek, an Austrian, convicted in 1917, strangled four elderly women and assaulted the necks of a great many more. Russian Darya Saltykova tortured and murdered 138 young women until her perverse career ended in 1801. Greek Miriam Soulakiotis tortured and murdered 177 young women before her arrest in 1950. Mexican Juana Barraza murdered older women, an estimated 49 of them. These three have appeared on many serial killer lists, but for some reason they seem to never come up in discussions of "serial killers and gender." And there are many, many other sadistic female serial killer of females whose stories are known but not well-enough known or are entirely obscured by time and scholars' lack of interest – before now.

8) Domestic Violence Against Women

In 1986 Newsweek magazine published a report on domestic violence including this claim:

> The policy of benign neglect toward domestic violence was tolerated until feminists began focusing attention on the issue of spouse abuse a decade ago and insisted that wife beaters be treated like other violent criminals. The nation's police have finally begun to take domestic violence seriously." ("Attitudes change toward domestic violence – Newsweek, March 3, 1986, p. 58)

The claim is a lie. Here we are, two and-a-half decades later, and the hoax – the claim that domestic violence was tolerated by society and law before the 1960s feminists stepped in to save the day – still continues. The truth is that domestic violence against women has, in the United States – as proven by mountain range of evidence, has always been taken seriously by police and the courts and, more importantly, by the communities in which such crimes occurred. If there is any exception to law enforcement intolerance of domestic violence against women in the American past it would likely have been a new development as a result of federal bureaucratization due to the War on Drugs and the beginnings of the militarization and the cumbersome bureaucratization of local police, combined, perhaps, with the overall permissiveness of the counterculture of the 1960s.

Yet nobody before the 1960s would have believed the false claim that is current today. For well over a century preceding the 1960s newspapers regularly reported arrests of wife beaters and, up until the mid-1900s, reported the various punishment for the crime: chain gangs, jail sentences, public shaming, flogging and other forms of corporal punishment, often illustrating the malefactors' just desserts with dramatic drawings or photos.

Currently the lie that domestic violence against women was unpunished by the legal system in the past is often presented in an elaborated form with the added fraudulent claim that society at large found domestic violence tolerable and therefore law enforcement and the courts, by neglecting domestic violence (which they in fact did not), were merely reflecting the purported widespread acceptance by the population as a whole.

The fact is, that in the pre-'60s era, not only was wife-beating not seen as acceptable by the public at large, but public response this crime was frequently extremely harsh and frequently citizens did not bother with waiting for their employees, the public servants in law enforcement, to deal with matters. They could handle things just fine on their own. Old newspaper reports show wife-beaters being subjected to tarring-and-feathering, beatings, community banishment, and in some of the more egregious repeat-offender cases, even lynching.

Some examples:

On January 27, 1853, The Jeffersonian Republican, the newspaper of Stroudsberg, Pennsylvania, reported the death of New York City wife-beater, Joseph Hines, who had been thrashed by three men who, when passing by the house of the perpetrator and hearing the children's screams, seized him and gave him a severe thrashing, so severe that he died two days later. The writer summed up the prevailing attitude of the day concerning domestic violence against women thusly: "It is a pity that every vile rascal who beats his wife could not be served in the same manner."

In 1885 Pittsburg a group of gentlemen formed a society to collect funds for the prosecution of wife-beaters.

On March 23, 1914, in the small town of Malvern, Iowa, “a delegation of citizens consisting of a minister, church members and business men” paid a visit to a chronic wife-beater to demand he leave town if he cared for his health. He took the advice and vamoosed.

The issue of domestic violence against women was a major topic of public discussion which raged from the mid-1880s into the mid-20th century, as is attested by the large number of newspaper articles chronicling the heated public debate on the problem and its appropriate solution. From the start, the employment of the whipping post was central to the debate. Illustrations dating back to 1885 which show the flogging of wife-beaters provide dramatic evidence of the seriousness of the discussion. The flogging practice’s most notable proponent was Theodore Roosevelt, who promoted its use beginning in 1899, while governor of New York and continued to do so after he became president.

A 2006 book, Donald G. Dutton’s Rethinking Domestic Violence, discusses the heated controversy over the whipping post as punishment for wife-beaters, yet his assertion that flogging bills “were supported by suffragist leaders” is misleading. The leaders did indeed take up President Roosevelt’s whipping post proposal, yet when voted upon during the 1905 National American Suffragist Association convention they were rejected. Likewise, in 1911 and 1913 women’s rights groups (District of Columbia and California respectively) publicly condemned the punishment.

Sentences of corporal punishment for domestic violence offenses eventually became obsolete. Maryland was the last hold-out. In 1938 the Baltimore flogging of Clyde Miller was displayed in photographs for the world to see, but by that time such an event was a rare one. One of the final instances of flogging of a wife beater was that of Lloyd Busching in 1945, again in Maryland, which provided the inspiration for an anti-domestic violence comic book.

9) Ransom Child Kidnapping & Parental Kidnapping

In 1997 a book about child kidnapping in America was published by UC Berkeley professor Paula S. Fass, regarded as the national authority on the history of childhood. The book is cleverly constructed so as to hide the fact that it is in reality a tendentious piece of propaganda designed to create a historical narrative that will serve as the foundation for collectivist childrearing protocols instituted by the United Nations (under UNESCO). The underling thesis of the book is that parents are too protective of their children and they must be coaxed to change their outdated unprogressive attitudes so that they will allow “society” to have more and more authority over their offspring. Professor Fass, in order to “prove” the error of normal protective parental mores, goes about creating a false narrative through the deployment of carefully selected, but unrepresentative, examples, and the strategic of omitting politically incorrect facts.

[image]

A sampling of falsehoods and omissions includes:

[unordered_list style=”bullet”]

- Leading the reader to believe that children were not kidnapped by Gypsies, when in fact they frequently were, a falsehood in accordance with politically correct doctrine;
- Claiming parents had no good reason to worry about child kidnapping before 1874, when a famous case was widely publicized causing the public, according to Fass, to become exaggeratedly protective;
- Failing to include ransom child kidnapping gangs operating as early as 1839;
- Failing to include the politically incorrect fact that the first, and widely publicized ransom child kidnapping occurred in 1819, and was committed by a female kidnapper, as well as generally obfuscating the issue of female kidnappers in general, and omitting notable cases of female kidnappers dating back to the first decade of the 1800s;

- Claiming, despite overwhelming and easily accessible evidence to the contrary, that parental kidnapping was not seen as a serious social problem in the early 1900s, a deception she deploys as a tactic for bolstering her false media-created-hysteria thesis;[/unordered_list]

Radical underplaying of the participation of females in such criminal activities, by mentioning few female cases, by making deceptive generalizations, and by selecting those few female kidnappers mentioned in order to ensure that the sample would make the female kidnapper appear both marginal and limited to a narrow range of types: unsympathetic society queens and basket-case neurotics.

On publication in 1997 the book got numerous academic reviews and not a single review questioned a single claim of "fact," not even the most improbable of them, included in it. It can reasonably be said that Fass's fake history is now accepted as factual and no one else in academia is inclined to challenge its canonical status by publishing the facts which contradict it. The book's claims, thus, are currently treated as facts by the readers it was intended for: bureaucratic policy-makers and the academic thought-shapers of those who are to implement policy.

Nine years following this tract's publication, in 2006, Fass took part in a conference at the New School for Social Research in New York, an institution founded expressly for the purpose of promoting social engineering, entitled "Parenting – Why Are We Afraid to Let Go?" The conference aimed to discover means by which to assist policy-makers in finding ways to creatively coax the public into accepting increasing governmental interference with their parental rights.

10) Parental Alienation

One of most evil hoaxes ever perpetrated by professional misandrists is that surrounding the phenomenon which we today call "parental alienation." The claim is that it is a recently identified (and nonexistent) phenomenon, that the term and its definition are primarily meant to describe female parental behavior, and that the main motive for those who promote awareness of parental alienation is their desire to assist fathers in gaining freedom either to indulge in sexual perversions with their own children or to gain access to their exes in order to commit abuses against them.

In actuality, parental alienation, often called in the past "poisoning the child's mind" or "alienating the child's affections," has been common in divorce court cases since the early 19th century. Historical records reveal that fathers have indeed been alienators, were accused of such behavior by their wives and further, that women have been accused of being alienators by female relatives. Two well-documented early 19th century London cases, Westmeath v Westmeath (1820) and Ball v Ball (1827) involved accusations of parental alienation. In the former, the father was accused, in the latter cross-accusations of alienation were made. The most eloquent description of parental alienation ever published is the 1980 book, Somewhere Child, by Bonnie Lee Black is a brilliantly written, excruciating account of a viciously alienating father – and parental kidnapper – and the havoc he wreaked.

In 1939, the most widely-read advice columnist in the English-speaking world, Dorothy Dix, discussed the widespread tendency of many mothers to leave their husbands and then callously destroy their children's relationships with their father. Dix described some of the gate-keeping tactics and condemned them as criminal:

> In all the range of crime there is none blacker or cruder than separating a father from his children and yet women do it every day without a pang of compunction because they consider that they have a monopoly of their children. They are not even fair about it because they know the father can't fight for his children for he has no home in which to keep them, nobody to take care of them.

This type of obsessive "monopoly" is vividly represented in two early-1950s cases which reveal the dynamics of parental alienation perpetuated by a female alienator against an alienated mother and her daughter: the Star Schneider (10-years-old) and Marlene Matchan (9-years-old) cases. In both instances the court identified the alienation and made a custody decision based on a strategy to end the mind-poisoning. Newspaper photos from both cases give us an unsettling glimpse of the misery of the child victims.

In the Schneider court case the alienated parent, Ethel Martin (formerly Schneider) disclosed that she herself had been an alienated child, estranged from her alienated father through the devices of her own mother, the grandmother of now alienated little Starr. “After my father and mother were divorced,” Mrs. Martin testified, “my mother turned me against my father. I hated my father while I was a little girl.”

In sum, the historical record shows that child custody-related “mind-poisoning,” or “parental alienation,” is not sex-specific nor is it a novel concept invented in the 1980s by the man who coined the modern term.

11) The Disengaged Father

Historian Robert L. Griswold’s book, Fatherhood in America: A History, came out in 1993. It’s a miserable, politically correct tract; a narrative crippled by the social constructionist fallacies it embraces. The author had previously distinguished himself for having bought into the idiotic theory that, because some early American court archives of divorce records from the 17th century contained no documents referring to child custody it is reasonable to conclude that parents at that time did not care about their kids. Slavishly following the social constructionist dogma, Griswold’s Fatherhood ludicrously states, as if it were a plain and proven fact, that “gender is historically and socially constructed.” He develops a picture in which fathers – like all other humans, according to constructionist theory – have no personal agency or character as individuals but rather are no better than biological ciphers responding much as a group of puppets would, moving in lockstep to whatever the historical conditions demand – yet with the increasing help of experts, marching along the inevitable straight-line historical continuum of social “progress.”

In discussing the question of whether century fathers in the late 19th century took significant interest in their children, Griswold quotes from some letters found in an archive, pointing out two letters from fathers, a Mr. Kendall and a Mr. Laflin, showing that they were intimately engaged parents. But Griswold finds it necessary to feed the evidence through his constructionist meat-grinder so that it will conform to his prefabricated narrative.

> Men like Kendall and Laflin were not alone. They represented a style of fatherhood congruent with long-developing attitudes about children and in line with the hopes of domestic moralists that men commit emotional energy to their wives and children. But such emotional bonds were difficult to establish and likely uncommon.(p. 15)

With respect to father-daughter relationships he makes the constructionist claim, without bothering to offer any supporting evidence, that “Fathers’ frequent absences from home coupled with their daughters’ immersion in a female world militated against deep father-daughter relationships.” (p. 17)

Sadly, because most of the public has been for decades sautéed in this kind of philosophy – holding that there is not essential human character, so personal agency, that society “evolves” rather than merely changes – many have fallen under the spell of the specious premise that parent-child bonds are a “social construction” rather than an essential part of the natural normal human psyche.

12) Misandric Fixation

What is misandric fixation? It is the obsession with the eradication of maleness.

Contrary to what we might nowadays suppose to be the case, misandric fixation is not necessarily the result of subjection to ideological indoctrination. Historical cases reveal that the condition can take hold without the subject having been influenced by either Marxist or eugenics ideologies. Indoctrination can, obviously, exacerbate certain vulnerabilities in the subject which were pre-existent, yet indoctrination is not a necessary prerequisite to the condition. Several notable cases, hitherto completely overlooked by historians, which date from the late-19th to mid-20th century, offer insight into the mindset of women subjected to misandric fixation.

Marie Irrgang, who died in 1901, was leader of an Austrian misandric organization called Jungfrau Verein (Virgin's Association). Fraulein Irrgang called herself the "champion man hater of the world." She not only detested men, but also all masculine beings regardless of species. At Irrgang's death in 1901, her followers assiduously attempted to obey their champion's willed dictates by the letter, as they organized her funeral. Males, it goes without saying, were forbidden to be present. But the collective of man-haters discovered to their dismay that they could not locate a woman with strength enough to carry their club's banner in the procession, so they reluctantly hired the services of a member of the detested sex in order that their organizational symbol of hate could proudly wave.

This hatred of all male living things was shared by the American misandrist, Sarah Hunt, born circa 1834. After running off her husband and sons (but not her daughter) in 1889, Mrs. Hunt figured out how to operate her farm without the presence of a single male animal.

Inveterate man-hater Harriet Evans, born circa 1841 in England, spent most of her life under the long reign of Queen Victoria. She stayed indoors with the blinds drawn to avoid the male-infested outdoors. But once Victoria's son, King Edward VII, inherited the throne, Miss Evans had to make special arrangements with the postal service – in order to avoid coming into contact with stamps bearing the image of a man; when she had occasion to handle paper money bearing the male monarch's image it was quickly tossed into the fire. 1878 saw the beginning of the vengeful career of the obsessive Scotswoman Sarah Hyslop who, having been jilted by her fiancé, devoted her life to a militant campaign of jilting a long series of deceived fiancées at the altar in order to exact revenge on the entire sex. She chalked up 53 victims by the time of her death in 1939.

American bachelorette Miss Louisa Strittmater, who died in 1944, called men "the inveterate enemies of women." It was revealed in her will that she believed that "men some day would revert to apes." She "looked forward hopefully to the day when science would enable women to bear children without the aid of men." Once woman acquired this power she wanted "all male children killed at birth." She willed her money to the National Women's Party for the Advancement of Feminism.

Viktoria Rieger, known in Hungary's Tisza valley by the nickname Smoking Peter – which she earned because she, whom everyone thought to be a he, "was never seen without a pipe in his mouth" – was one of scores of women who serially murdered husbands of others as a "service" to wives, was not, like most of the Hungarian female serial killers, merely a greedy opportunist. She did not always profit from the murders she committed. Her method was unusual. Instead of providing poison to the wife who hankered after a graveyard divorce as did most of her sisters in crime, she did the dirty work herself. The wife would coax the victim to the barn where Viktoria would conk him over the head and then hang the unconscious husband employing a noose prepared in advance. In 1933 following a long string of such "suicides," the murderess was finally exposed and arrested. But when apprehended by police "Smoking Peter" was thought to be a man. Prison staff discovered the truth and later doctors determined she suffered from a hormonal imbalance caused by a glandular disorder. Viktoria Rieger was an avowed man-hater. Investigators believed that Viktoria, who had escaped from an unhappy marriage 22 years earlier, had a "fixed idea that all wives were abused and therefore it would be a sort of noble crusade to go around liberating as many wives as she could from the misfortune of having a husband."

So we see that the infamous Valerie Solanas, who was able to publish her eugenic dreams of a misandric final solution for the world, was not as unusual as she might appear. Misandric fixation, it seems, deserves looking into.

13) Origins of the word "misandry"

Currently circulating as a "meme" on the internet is a false claim concerning the origin of the word "misandry," holding that the word is of recent origin and that it was concocted by post-1960s men's rights activists. One misandrist blogger actually barks that "misandry does not exist. It's a modern made up word. So stop f*ing using it." That none of the internet dictionaries currently offer accurate dates of origin only encourages the proliferation of the falsehood. Both Oxford and Miriam-Webster ascribe “misandry” a mid-1940s date of earliest use.

The fact is that the words “misandry,” “misandrist,” “misandric,” and “misandrous” appeared in the English language in the nineteenth century, and were employed not just by males. The German word with the same meaning “Misandrie,” appears as early as 1803 (note that German has a different word, Menschenhassen, for what we term “misanthropy,”). The new research offering these early citations has now been made available online, yet we can expect the inaccurate claims to continue to flood forth from those devoted to stamping out the “thought crime” – discussing misandry.

Final thoughts

A sentence from a recent chat-room thread appeared in which the writer makes a sincere effort to defend the idea that misandry exists: “Men have not been subjected to violence and oppression by women. That’s not the debate.” This unfortunately utterly uninformed claim represents precisely the sort of dilemma – due to ignorance of the past – that inspired the composition of the present article. The reality is that we cannot hope to succeed in countering false premises regarding the present as long as we uncritically accept false premises about the past.

It is a fact that all totalitarian systems – without exception – employ false history as a major strategic weapon which, when deployed, succeeds in sowing confusion and weakness, undermining the clarity of understanding that is prerequisite in order for the target population to organize itself to fight back effectively.

Our bureaucracy-plagued world, of course, contains enough well-paid Marxists and governmental control-freaks to allow for every historical fact disclosed in this article to be, in short order, thoroughly subjected to a “critical theory” treatment which, by ignoring facts and substituting “discourse,” would explain away each and every piece of evidence as yet another exemplification of the “oppression” that comes from living, as the fashionable saying goes, “in patriarchal societies.” Consequently it is up to the sane among us to make sure that the facts contained in this article get out to the public and, most importantly, get out to the boys and girls who are at this very moment being marched by smug social engineers into the ravenous jaws of that monstrous and all-consuming politically correct control-matrix which we tend to euphemistically call “contemporary culture.”

An overview of the Bund, reproducing English language sources and supplying corrections and additional information from German language sources appears online in The Unknown History of Misandry. http://unknownmisandry.blogspot.com/2011/07/worlds-first-mens-rights-organization.html There is an excellent German language dissertation on Bund für Männerrechte from 2009: [Kerstin Christin Wrussnig, "Wollen Sie ein Mann sein oder ein Weiberknecht?" Zur Männerrechtsbewegung in Wien der Zwischenkriegszeit, Diplomarbeit (Mag. phil), Wien, 2009]; a brief article from 1998, also in German on the organization is:[Elisabeth Malleier, "Der 'Bund für Männerrechte'. 8) A currently operating organization, Österreichische Liga für Menschenrechte exists. Their website states it was founded in 1926 (in association with an international organization), disbanded in 1934, and revived in 1946 – the same year as Hoeberth's Liga für Menschenrechte was founded – with a mission to promote human rights, with a specific interest in combating anti-semitism. English language newspapers confused the two organizations and when a German name for the group was given it was either the incorrect Liga (never "Bund" or "Bund für Männerrechte") or, after the January 1927, the correct (but abbreviated) names Aequitas ("Equitas") and Justitia.

94) Donald Dutton, Rethinking Domestic Violence, 2006, UBC Press Vancouver, p. 10. On page 11, Dutton asserts that "During the first quarter of the twentieth century the perception of family violence as a serious crime began to diminish," but he does not offer evidence to support this. The evidence shows otherwise ("Society's Acceptance of Domestic Violence?" UHoM). Dutton further states that "This era could be called the Age of Denial: families did not talk about intimate violence" and that with increased social engineering bureaucracy, such as the increase in social workers, "criminal justice system sanctions for family crime came to be viewed as inhumane and outmoded," and that "Police didn't want to get involved when they received "domestic disturbance" calls. Dutton does not explain his source for these views, but it does seem as in the case of child abuse, that the more reliance that is places upon "experts" (pediatricians) to take care of problems, community awareness and sense of responsibility (community morality) diminishes under the assumption that superior powers and superior minds have all the answers and the best methods. Nevertheless, Dutton's narrative of gradual change leaving up to the interventionism of the Marxist feminist era is quite a bit too tidy and without any evidence or explanation of its sources, it remains as mythical as the 1986 Newsweek version of the narrative.

Thanks to the work of Alek's Team, and your dedicated support of this website, AVfM is proud to announce the launch of an online store containing a growing line of AVfM merchandise. It will provide a much more efficient way to acquire our T-shirts, coffee mugs, bumper stickers, business cards, the AVfM patch and other products soon to come.

The store has full e-commerce functionality, so you will be able to easily order, pay for and track your purchases. While we will not make a fortune on these products, we hope they will provide an incentive for those making donations by making your support of this site an immediate win-win.

The system is new and has been tested, but there could be improvements to be made. If you notice anything not up to par, please let us know and we will try to improve it as soon as possible.

The product images are not the final professional images, but we will be bringing that up to speed in the near future as well.

As a side note here, we get a lot of suggestions for T-shirts. Please keep them coming by posting them in the comments. We have to choose carefully because every new design represents a significant investment. Also, if you would like to donate products like stickers, etc., we would be happy to add them to the line-up of products.

Needless to say, AVfM operational expenses have gone far past basic web hosting. The store will add a vital source of income to help us continue the work done here. You can visit the store here, or through the masthead and donation area to the right. As always, we thank you for support of avoiceformen.com, A Voice for Men Radio and Register-her.com. Here's to adding more weapons to the arsenal in the days to come.

Kenyan men protest domestic violence

[box icon="none"]

(Washington D.C. Feb 21, 2012 AVfM News) Yesterday the BBC reported that a men's group in Kenya named Maendeleo Ya Wanaume (translation not available) announced an initiative to protest what is becoming a growing problem of female perpetrated domestic abuse in that country. The protest will entail a nation wide boycott of meals made by their wives and partners and is supposed to encourage men to eat away from home together and share their experiences with domestic abuse whether it be physical or emotional.

In Kenyan culture eating your wife's meal is said to be a very important part of a mans expression of appreciation for his wife.

Last year, the group conducted its own survey of Central and Nairobi provinces and found that up to 460,000 men said they had been subjected to some sort of domestic abuse. The two provinces have a combined population of more than seven million people.

In addition to the BBC release local Kenyan television station, NTV Kenya, has broadcast a story about the protest and featured victims of extreme physical abuse. Explanations for the abuse perpetrated by wives included undocumented reports of widespread alcoholism by men and the fact that women were now earning more than men and as better earners were more resentful that they were taking up more financial responsibility.

Just recently a reader sent me a link to an article over at cracked.com. It was the typical groveling vomitus from a deep-fried feminized quisling calling himself Luke McKinney. Seems Luke is up in arms about cutting edge social concerns like how much cartoon titty is exposed on female super heroes and the much more serious problem that his readers are starting to call him out for talking like Amanda Marcotte has promised him his very first blow job. He spends the OP lashing out at his own readers for tiring of his feminist bilge, and true to current times many of them are not buying it for a minute.

In fact, a retort came that from one (someone delightfully calling themselves fulukemckinney) was so good I thought it deserved to be preserved here for posterity. It is a checklist of items reflecting sexual privilege, and my guess is that a link here will prove useful for MRA's well into the future. The next time someone starts squawking about "male privilege," just link 'em and forget 'em. Without any more ceremony, let's get to it with thanks to fulukemckinney.

Sexual Privilege Checklist

1. Do you experience other people paying for your dates, or occasionally even picking up the tab in non-romantic settings? Or paying for your vacations when the relationship moves along?

2. Do you occasionally experience subservience and deference being volunteered to you by the opposite sex (opening doors, giving up a seat in the bus, standing up when you come in the room)?

3. Are you able to pursue what you are interested in at university without much societal pressure on "breadwinning" – although you could also take that route if it so interests you?

4.a Have you never been required to register for selective service? Would you never be ripped out of your life and forced to defend your country in time of attack or national emergency? Can you demand strength and full participation in society, but then get out of this obligation by pretending to be weak with no influence over society (but only when it suits you)?

4.b. Can you come up with any and every excuse to get out of the draft without being laughed at ("No one should be drafted" – when you would be the first to cower in the corner and demand that someone do something if, say, China & Russia combined and attacked full force – and "Men start wars …" when women are the majority of voters and the expression should be "Men are SENT to wars …" – exactly what you're trying to get out of – and sometimes sent by M. Thatcher, G. Meir, I. Gandhi and other such women)?

5.a Will you statistically get a much lighter sentence for exactly the same offense if you commit a crime?

5.b Do you have special legal excuses for your sex alone which often allow you to get off the hook for the crimes you commit? Are judges usually more lenient, protective and paternalistic when it comes to dealing with your sex?

5.c Are you 25 times more likely to have your death sentence canceled?

6. Are you able to take on a job or choose a career route that is only capable of supporting yourself, with no thought to preparing yourself to also support a spouse/children, although you are also free to choose a more difficult career that will bring you more money? Do you not have much pressure on you with regard to this?

7. If you are in a committed relationship, do you have much greater flexibility to choose whether you want to work or simply stay at home (even without kids)?

8. Will you not be called an unemployed loser if you decide to be a homemaker?

9. If you have a flat tire on the road, if someone is harassing you in a public place, if an animal attacks you, or if you are lost, will someone be much, much more likely to step-in and assist you?

10.a Are people generally much nicer to you in public? Are you sometimes given privileged treatment or better customer service?

10.b Do you get first dibs on a lifeboat when your ship begins to sink?

11. Are you much more capable of "marrying up" and enjoying the money and status that comes with this?

12.a Are you statistically much more likely to be given money in a divorce – sometimes huge amounts – even if your behavior caused the divorce (e.g. affair) and even if you didn't work for the money?

12.b Is custody of your kids almost automatic after divorce regardless of your parenting abilities? On top of this, do you have the ability to make false accusations of rape or child abuse in order to help you gain custody? Is it possible for you to deprive your child of his or her other parent in violation of court orders without serious consequences?

13.a If you hit or slap a person – or even knock someone's tooth out throwing your Aunt Selma's Christmas mug at that person – is it much more likely to just be viewed as cute, understandable or not a problem? Are there nearly zero consequences for your violence?

13.b If you are ever physically, emotionally, or sexually abused by in any way, are there dozens upon dozens of organizations that are specifically in place to fight for you and house you when necessary? Do you have the ability to have someone taken-away by police if you make a false or exaggerated accusation of abuse?

14.a Do you statistically live much longer – possibly due to less stress on you with regard to breadwinning, providing protection, being responsible, not having society viewing you as "expendable" or not having society viewing your problems as being unimportant? Can you blame the earlier deaths of the other sex on their stupid behavior or bad genes?

14.b Are you about 20 times less likely to die or get injured in your workplace?

15. Do you have much more money spent on your health concerns in reality (e.g. 5 times as much on breast cancer as on prostate cancer – although they have roughly the same death rates) while you simultaneously claim that more care has to be taken for your needs?

16. Are you much less likely to be homeless? Is more offered to you by society when you are in this position?

17. Is there far less scorn and pressure on you by society when you are an irresponsible doofball? Are your default rates for payment of child support roughly twice those of the other gender, while you simultaneously complain about the other gender not paying?

18.a Has whining about and hating the other gender actually been made into a course of studies in college- as opposed to the true, neutral, unbiased study of this topic – which is simply anthropology?

18.b Can you tell everyone that your sex is the superior sex without you being called sexist?

18.c Can you ignore the fact that your sex's traditional gender-roles would not place you into situations where you'd be likely to be forced to do immoral things and then use the results of this as evidence that your sex is morally superior?

19. Do you have full opportunity to pursue you want in life – become a doctor, a lawyer, start a business – while simultaneously using the fact that many of your gender don't CHOOSE themselves to do these things as an argument to try to gain even more advantages? Do you get affirmative action because many of your gender don't choose to do these things, and thusly the numbers don't "come out right"?

20.a Can you manipulate the other gender with sex in some cases to get what you want? Can you pretend like you don't even know what anyone is talking about when confronted on this?

20.b Can you use your sex appeal to get-ahead on the job? Can you knowingly dress provocatively but act shocked if someone treats you provocatively?

20.c Do you also have the ability to accuse people of sexual harrassment for any reason, factual or not? Do you make up the definition of 'sexual harrassment', and can this definition change depending on the person and whether you like them or not?

21. If you take a job that is traditionally taken by those of the opposite sex, will you be thought of as a brave pioneer by many? Will no one call your sexual orientation into question?

22.a Can you complain that the clothes, shoes hair, grooming items etc. for your sex are more expensive than those of the opposite sex without ever noticing that the varieties, styles and complexity of those products are often greater than those of the opposite sex? Do you have far more retail space devoted to your shopping desires than does the opposite sex?

22.b Can you wear the clothes traditionally associated with the opposite sex without running the risk of getting beat-up or ostracized?

23. Can you manipulate using old notions of men protecting and deferring to women when it comes in handy?

24. Can you effectively manipulate by playing the victim? Do tears help you in getting your way instead of getting you called a wimp?

25. As a child, were you told that you are beautiful, cute and sweet? Could you wear any color you wanted without fear of insult?

26. Can you get sympathy if you don't work and don't have children by listing all the household work (hmm … Oprah really does get high ratings, though) while simultaneously being able to bear the cognitive dissonance of calling your sister's husband who stays home a worthless bum whom she ought to leave?

27. Can you claim that your sex's work "never ends" while your sex also, on average, watches more television in every time-slot than members of the opposite sex?

28. Can you "mix and match" traditional and progressive roles – finding just the right mix to get what you want? Can you be a "traditional wife" – enjoying the positive features of that (like not having to go-out and work a job in a factory) – while simultaneously being a progressive feminist when THAT gets you advantages? Or having a career while simultaneously using traditional chivalry and male deference to your advantage?

29. Can you constantly say "that's just typical" and "it doesn't surprise me a bit" and make lemon faces if you are a parent-in-law? Is near-universal contempt by both genders for your behavior hidden to a much greater extent?

30. Can almost any remark by your partner be construed as verbal abuse if you want sympathy, but the meanest, nastiest, most humiliating things that you can say simply involve "speaking your mind" and "some people just don't want to hear the truth"?

31. Can you use the fact that gender roles were differentiated long ago – with different advantages/disadvantages for both genders – to try to induce guilt today in people who had absolutely no connection with any of that? Can you say that you have been discriminated against for thousands of years with a straight face when you're only 20 years old? Can you even make things up about history and no one will really check or dare call you on it?

32. Can you propagate myths and outright lies ("Superbowl/domestic violence hoax", "rule of thumb", inflated rape statistics, intentional misconstrual of pay figures and many more) and be given a "pass" – without more rigor being demanded?

33. Can you rationalize your own failures using the concept of the "patriarchy", and blame the other gender for nearly everything that goes wrong in your life – even with quite contorted explanations that no one would otherwise buy – while failures of the other gender are just … failures?

34. Do you want to be treated like a child when it suits you but as an adult when you get advantages from that? Do you "look the other way" when someone doesn't require responsibility from you that they certainly would from the other gender?

35. As an infant, would amputating a piece of your genitals be a crime? Would not cutting your genitals be considered a basic human right to which you are entitled?

36. Can you focus heavily on perceived earnings in the workforce – the statistics of which are influenced by people's choices in reality – while utterly ignoring the inter-family transfer of wealth? Can you completely ignore the fact that one gender picks tougher jobs (garbage collector), works more hours and takes on more responsibility because of more pressure to earn – but the other gender has the same lifestyle and statistically more assets (and not just because of inheritance/earlier age of male at death….). Can you deliberately claim that earnings figures are based on equal pay for equal work? (when you probably full well know that they simply involve all people working more than 35 hours – and don't take type of job, hours worked over 35/week, danger, responsibility, years in the work force etc. into consideration at all)?

37. Is what used to simply be an irritation for grown-ups many years ago – the self-centered rantings and foot-stompings of spoiled high-school and college brats – now not only embraced by your most progressive movement but almost the cornerstone of it?

38. Can you get irritated about generalizations and stereotypes —- and utterly fail to see the hypocrisy in stereotyping and generalizing about one gender while simultaneously making a career (literally in some cases) whining about your own gender being stereotyped?

39. Can you get irritated about old-fashioned restrictive attitudes towards your sexual behavior while insulting men who engage in the same kind of sexual behavior that you would do in an eyeblink if you could?

40.a Do you reserve the right to blame any cruel, rude, or unrestrainedly angry thing that you do on my "time of month"? Is this true regardless of what time of month it actually is?

40.b Do you reserve the right to get angry and indignant if somebody suggests this to you regardless of how often you say it about yourself?

41. Do you reserve the right to call anyone "sexist" for any reason, based upon your own definition of the term? Is your sexist behavior never noticed?

42. Do you have the privilege of making long lists criticizing the privileges of the opposite sex while everyone pretends to not notice that you have a long list of none-too insignificant privileges of your own?

43. Do you have the privilege of blaming your privileges on the opposite sex?

44. Do you have the privilege of dishonestly insisting that you don't have any privileges?

Patriarchy

Phil in Utah · 22 February 2012 · Archived copy · Original

Yes, that one word. That one word that rolls of the tongues of feminists like hairs off a cat. The one word that, I'm sure, makes most MRA's either grow red with exasperation or roll their eyes, and for good reason.

To find what feminists really mean when they use the word is no easy task—even the supposedly reliable definer of feminist concepts, finallyfeminism101.com, has a very shaky, unclear, tinfoil helmet-wearing article on the subject. So, perhaps a bit of help from Wikipedia is in order: "Patriarchy is a social system in which the male gender role as the primary authority figure is central to social organization, and where fathers hold authority over women, children, and property. It implies the institutions of male rule and privilege, and entails female subordination."

Is this what we have in Western culture today? No, of course not. Anybody who says otherwise is either living a very sheltered life, or has an agenda (usually the latter). The fact that women initiate 70% of divorces is certainly evidence that women aren't held in perpetual slavery by their club-toting, whip-cracking, double-breasted suit-wearing husbands who stepped out of a time machine fresh from the Fifties.

What is Patriarchy blamed for? Well, if we want to pick apart the few instances in which feminists are anything resembling specific in their use of the term, I suppose we could go with their blaming it for domestic violence. This claim, of course, falls flat in face of the fact that domestic violence is so high among lesbians. The same thing happens when feminists try to blame rape on Patriarchy.

More recently, though, a feminist I was debating blamed patriarchy, as I'm sure we've all heard before, on "systematic, widespread violence against women." She, of course, completely skated over the high rates of domestic violence against men, the portrayal of anti-male violence in popular culture as not only acceptable, but humorous, and the fact that men make up 80% of murder victims.

What if she were correct? If you said "horseshit," you'd be right, but if we examine that claim a bit longer instead of dismissing it immediately, we'll find a few anti-feminist gems. Evaluating her claim requires a look at what is meant by Patriarchy in this context, for one. She is referring, of course, to the Man, or what is more accurately interpreted as "men in power". So, who holds the power in our society? The answer "men," while technically correct, is quite misleading. Since 85% of the homeless are men, obviously being a man doesn't give you power. A tour of the American South will also debunk the notion that it's white men who have the power. No, the people who hold the true power in our society are the rich and politicians; whether they are male or female has absolutely no bearing on the amount of power in their hands.

So, let's assume she's saying that it's the powerful people who are causing the violence. Does this hold up under scrutiny? Certainly not. A vast majority of violent crimes are committed by people of low socioeconomic status. Many bigots, from white supremacists to feminists, have tried to paint violence as a result of blackness or maleness, conveniently forgetting that blacks and men represent disproportionately larger numbers of the people of lowest socioeconomic status.

But violence does affect people of every class, in some form or another. So, poverty isn't the cause of crime, but is certainly a mitigating factor.

Perhaps it's time to take another look at the prison demographics for the United States. In addition to men of color (excluding Asians), the most common group of males you'll find in prisons are children of single mothers, who represent 78% of prisoners. Yes, fathers, when they are responsible, are one of the biggest crime-stoppers out there.

A rather interesting study was conducted by zoologists in Hluhluwe-Umofolozi Park in KwaZulu-Natal, South Africa. They had been discovering disturbing numbers of rhinoceros carcasses all over the park, bearing injuries that were inconsistent with any type of weapon used by human poachers. After investigation, they discovered that the rhinos were being killed by juvenile elephants whose fathers had been killed by poachers. One of the scientists decided that they should remedy the problem by bringing in a group of six elder elephants. The adult elephants arrived, and the moment one of the juveniles tried to brutalize a rhino, his step father picked him up and slammed him onto the ground. Before too long, the rhino killings stopped altogether.

The lesson that can be gleaned from this, and which shows this feminist theory (like pretty much all others) to be a house of cards, is that Patriarchy, at least in the traditional meaning of the word, isn't the cause of violence. It is the solution to violence. Feminist theory, when put to work on modern societies, makes them nothing short of unlivable. Who knew?

[box]As readers will already be aware, Paul is taking a much needed break from AVFM and from AVFM-Radio. However, the show, as they say, must go on, and I'll be taking up some of the slack. We needed somebody in the United States to produce AVFM-Radio and we have found him. James Huff is A Voice for Men Radio's new producer. The show will be in hiatus for a week and back next Thursday at 6PM Pacific Standard time, with John the Other behind the mic, and James Huff running everything else. [/box]

Double standards: the sine qua non of misandry

Pierce Harlan · 23 February 2012 · Archived copy · Original

Double standards lie at the heart of the injustices men and boys face for being born male. It's the double standards that are most galling to us. Gender double standards have always been with us, but the women's movement has served to underscore and even exacerbate them. I am no fan of generalizations, but I thought the following list would help illustrate the point.

[unordered_list style="bullet"]

- We happily remove male role models from our sons' lives, then when our sons behave badly, we blame patriarchy;
- Stereotyping girls as inferior to boys in any facet of life is "misogyny." Stereotyping boys as potential batterers and rapists is a public service announcement;
- Boys are taught that they must never hit a girl, but they are given license to beat the crap out of other boys. Girls are taught boys must never hit a girl, and they are given license to beat the crap out of boys;
- When girls were behind boys in educational achievement, people said the girls were just fine, the problem was with the schools. Now that boys are behind girls in every facet of educational achievement, people say the schools are just fine, the problem is with the boys;
- Women criticize young men hesitant to marry as immature and afraid of commitment. When those same women later end their marriages because they aren't feeling "fulfilled," they say it's because they have matured, but their own "commitment" is not at all pertinent to the issue;
- A woman who tells her fiance that she wants to take time off from work when they have children is called a normal woman. A man who tells his fiance he wants to take time off from work when they have children is called an ex-fiance;
- If a man wants sex more often than his wife is willing to give, he's selfish. If a woman wants sex more often than her husband is willing to give, he's selfish;
- It is the mission of feminism to unshackle women so they can express their femininity in whatever manner they desire, and to shackle men so they can express their masculinity only in the manner feminists approve;
- When dad in an intact family goes through tough financial times, the entire family tightens their belts and sacrifices together. When mom kicks dad out of the house and dad goes through tough financial times, no one needs to worry about tightening their belts any more — dad either comes up with the support money or he goes to jail;
- People criticize men for not being actively involved in their children's lives, but the minute they see a man they don't know in the park with his own children, they call the cops;
- Women seeking to enter the business world are afforded all manner of assistance to encourage them to own their own businesses. Men seeking to enter the domestic world as stay-at-home dads are afforded nothing from anyone, least of all encouragement;
- Women have long insisted they are victims of discrimination that manifests itself in the "wage gap." Now that young women earn more than their male counterparts in urban areas, women still insist they, not the males, are victims — because they can't find mates who are their intellectual peers;

- Women are told they should be free to explore sexuality in whatever manner they choose, yet feminists pen lengthy, angst-ridden screeds on whether it is proper for women to give blowjobs;
- Women insisted on having equal access to every place men congregate, then after they gained admittance, they insisted on having “women-only” spaces because they say they are afraid of the men;
- When women commit domestic violence, it’s called “self defense.” When men act in self-defense, it’s called domestic violence;
- Man who hits his wife = felon; woman who cuts off her husband’s penis = feminist hero;
- When a woman accuses a man of rape and he denies it, there are conflicting claims of criminality, yet only one is arrested; only one’s name is reported in the news for the world to titillate to his humiliation; only one is likely to be imprisoned if he’s convicted; and only one will have the accusation trail him like a ghost for the rest of his life even if it is false. Can you guess his gender?
- We insist that women are at least as capable as men in every conceivable sphere of life — except the bedroom, where women are as helpless as the most distressed of Disney damsels and only men are responsible for the mutually tipsy sex she later regrets;
- Women never lie about rape, except when they recant;
- Men accused of rape are pathological liars, except when they confess;
- Women who are raped must never be told they should have made better choices. Men falsely accused of rape routinely are told they should have made better choices, and sometimes they are told to apologize to their false accusers;
- Young men are taught that they must ask for sex. When those same young men go to college, they are expelled if they have consensual sex but asked for it too much;
- If a teen boy rapes a teen girl, he must be jailed and prosecuted as an adult. If a teen girl falsely accuses a teen boy of rape, it is “awful” to jail her, much less to prosecute her;
- In college, if a student is accused of stealing another student’s pen, any disciplinary claim likely will be adjudicated under the stringent “clear and convincing” evidence standard. If a student is accused of the far more serious crime of rape, he will have the claim adjudicated under the “preponderance of the evidence” standard, the lowest in our jurisprudence;
- When it comes to rape, everyone agrees one rape is one too many. When it comes to false rape claims, feminists turn into actuaries who declare that some false claims are acceptable because the risk to men is so low;
- For men accused of rape, we defend humiliating practices such as “perp walks” because, we say, there should be no secrets in criminal matters. For rape accusers, we defend keeping secret the very identity of the person on whose shoulders the entire case rests;
- Some countries pay women for claiming they’ve been sexually assaulted, even if they lie and no matter how slight their injuries. Those same countries do not pay men falsely accused of rape, even though they are telling the truth and no matter how great the harm to them;
- Rape of women is a national crisis; rape of men in prison is a punchline;
- We shame young men who would never harm a woman by insisting they must be “part of the solution” to end rape. If we tell young women they must be “part of the solution” to end rape just by being careful, that’s victim blaming;

- When underage teens have consensual sex, usually only one is convicted as a statutory rapist and, upon his release, required to register as a sex offender. Can you guess his gender?
- Men having sex with teen girls are viewed as the lowest form of life, and they are usually sent to prison for many years; women having sex with teen boys are seen as "mixed up" and any prison sentence they receive is far lighter than when the genders are reversed;
- A teen girl who is statutorily raped can have an abortion if her rapist impregnates her. A teen boy who is statutorily raped will be forced to pay child support to his rapist if she decides to have the child. And if the boy doesn't pay, he likely will receive a punishment his rapist did not receive — he will be jailed;
- Women insist that males are undeservedly "privileged," arrogating to themselves the right to define what "privileged" means.[/unordered_list]

In the current public discourse, the gender injustice most discussed is women's "right" to have free birth control, paid for their employers. That injustice overshadows the following:

[unordered_list style="tick"]

- women outlive men in developed countries by five or more years; men have higher death rates for virtually all of the leading causes of death;
- men are approximately 50% of the workforce but account for 93% of job related deaths;
- males between 20 and 24 have a seven times greater rate of suicide than their female counterparts, and overall, men commit suicide at rates three to four times greater than women;
- males are between 1.5 to 2 times more likely than females to be assaulted;
- government funding for breast cancer research outpaces funding for prostate cancer research by nearly two to one even though prostate cancer and breast cancer have roughly the same caseload;
- death among young men due to testicular cancer in the 15-34 age group outpaces the number of deaths from breast cancer among women in the same age group;
- victims of war, both combatants and non-combatants, are more likely to be male;
- responsible young men are legally charged considerably more for auto insurance than irresponsible young women, simply because they were born male, but gender differences for health care premiums are being outlawed in the US since women claimed they were discriminatory;
- a woman who commits the same crime as a man will receive, on average, only a fraction of the sentence;
- during FY 2009, 169,586 names and addresses of suspected violators of the duty to register with the Selective Service System were provided to the Department of Justice for possible investigation and prosecution for their failure to register, carrying a penalty up to five years in prison. Every name on the list was male — because young women are exempt from even registering.

Setting priorities

Being at the helm of AVfM has always been more than just running a website. It is a constant and sometimes frustrating juggling of priorities, stress and conflict; it can be (and has been) life-consuming. Before this starts to sound like finger pointing at my own website for the stresses it brings, let me fully own that I have been obsessed with these issues for a long time. I needed to say that before saying that I am increasingly experiencing the toll from all this on my health and even my state of mind. I am also sure that the years I spent sedentary and smoking while chained round-the-clock to a computer have taken their toll as well. I don't feel too well these days, folks.

So here's the deal. I have quit smoking for a while now, but there are other changes I need to employ if I want to be around for a good bit longer than the near future, at least with the gusto to continue the work here. Diet, exercise (for my body as well as my brain) and something other than activism in my life are now musts for me. I have run out of excuses and room to procrastinate.

That means I need to make some changes, today. It means I have to make cuts. None of them are easy. Starting today, I am suspending operations of AVfM Radio. John is fit and capable to do the show, but unfortunately cannot control the show studio from a Canadian locale. He could, however, make it work if there were a conscientious, reliable and known MRA who would step up to the plate and produce the show. It would not require you to be on the air, but would require your "show must go on" commitment.

Once I have adequately addressed the health issues I am experiencing, I will return to the show on some sort of modified schedule.

In the meantime, I will continue to perform the day to day operations of the site, as well as hopefully writing one or two articles a week. John will sit in as chief cook and bottle washer during this time. Until I feel like I have retaken ownership and control of my health, that is all I am going to be able to give. My goal is to be an activist till the day I die. Meeting that goal was never in question, but I would like to add some quality and maybe even some time to that objective.

I appreciate your patience and support during this time of change.

Court imposes jail sentence for Facebook rant

Robert O'Hara · 24 February 2012 · Archived copy · Original

(Washington, Feb 23) In what can only be described as a blatant violation of an individuals first amendment rights a Cincinnati court magistrate recently imposed a 6o day jail sentence for a man who posted an angry rant on his Facebook page concerning his divorce and custody battle.

Photographer Mark Byron had a son with his wife in 2010 and soon after the marriage became problematic. She accused him of domestic abuse and "threatening her with his fists." He was exonerated only later to have a civil restraining order issued against him ordering him to stay away from his wife. Angry about the limited access he had to his son and the bitter divorce proceedings he posted an angry rant on his Facebook page in November of last year.

"…if you are an evil, vindictive woman who wants to ruin your husbands life and take your son's father away from him completely – all you need to do is say that you're scared of your husband or domestic partner…" he posted on Facebook.

Even though his wife was blocked from his page she saw it and told court officials she was "embarrassed" by the post. Court Magistrate Paul Myers determined that Mark's rant on his Facebook page violated the protection order and ordered him to take down the post and put in its place an apology, written by Myers, or face 60 days in jail. Byron also has to pay his wife's attorneys fees brought about by the Facebook issue if he wishes to avoid jail.

"It's outlandish," Mark Byron said. "I'm afraid to do anything. People are even fearful that Facebook can be regulated by a judge."

The case is next in court March 19.

The Big What If

Stephen O'Brian · 25 February 2012 · Archived copy · Original

I'm a day dreamer. A muse. I'm often not here, but "there" instead. It got me into big trouble as a school boy. It still does as I'm on the harsh end of the cultural zeitgiest, being a western male.

Occasionally I like to deliberately daydream and see what comes to mind. I know that only when folks ask the right questions, do they get the right answers. Questions don't fall out of the sky and into our heads though. We need to take time to think them up.

Recently I had the luxury of time on vacaton to do just that. =So recently I dreamt up some questions which I offer here. They are questions which in turn are designed to provoke MRA's imagination and discussion.

So here goes, in no particular order of importance, just how they came up in my mind:

- What if men drop out in huge numbers globally – like Japan's "Grass eaters"?
- What if the non-hormonal male birth control pill is used by most men?
- What if male studies takes off as an academic discipline? (ref)
- What if the non hormonal male birth control pill is used by men to selectively breed only with non-feminist women?
- What if men started using quick-dial communication to signal other men instantly when in misandric situations?
- What if lots of men insisted on learning male health in colleges and universities?
- What if there was a website specifically set up to notify consumers of stores and companies which discriminate against males so consumers can take their business elsewhere?
- What if men formed the National Organization of Men – NOM?
- What if someone opened Men's health shops stocked with everything from Viagra to walking sticks (with inbuilt gizmos: GPS, MP3, men's radio)?
- What if men's sex toys (fleshlights etc.) became as common as women's (vibrators) and men held sales parties with some proceeds going to veteran's and men's health?
- What if men formed associations globally with for example: USA Men's Rights Activists, Japanese Grass-eaters, UK Fathers for Justice, and Indian Men's Rights Activists meeting annually under one roof for a week?
- What if MRA launched a prison rape awareness campaighn called "Black ribbon day"?
- What if male use of pinhole videocameras for self protection became commonplace? (ref)
- What if men advertised being part of an organization called "feminist watch" with bumper stickers, lapel badges and tiepins (proceeds to men's health) ?
- What if men create an underground DNA paternity testing and counselling movement for those places where DNA paternity testing is outlawed ?
- What if boys got superhero comics, video games and movies with MRA messages?
- What if boys sports coaches taught game as well as sports?

- What if men's retirement villages became commonplace where male elders created centers for male history and culture?
- What if someone developed "a Voice for Boys" website and radio show?
- What if someone created a TV channel for boys?
- What if groups of men targetted infant male genital mutilation centers with graffitti, street protests, video camera surveillance and online exposure of personal and public health warnings?
- What if men formed men's holiday clubs to retreat and connect their collective experience whilst learning how to effectively be even more MGTOW?
- What if someone started an organization to raise awareness of the horrific male suffering for gratuitous entertainment in contact and extreme sports?
- What if a rock supergroup focussed on MRA was created?
- What if someone developed a website with an easy on the eye checklist comparing political candidates male friendly/unfriendly policy?
- What if someone opened a store/franchise full of food and beverages designed specifically for men's health ?
- What if a thousand men find they are dreaming similar dreams, and it becomes ten thousand, a hundred thousand, a million, a billion men?

Sweet dreams everyone.

The ethics of hypocrisy

M. R. Walks · 26 February 2012 · Archived copy · Original

The concept of a "racist ethicist" would strike most as ridiculous yet the oxymoron designation "feminist ethicist" is accepted by the broader community without pause for thought. Indeed along with "psychotherapist," "feminist ethicist" is a descriptor used in the online biographies of prominent Australian radical feminist, Dr. Betty McLellan [1]. This is the same Betty McLellan we know as a presenter at the 2011 Perth SCUM Conference, contributor to the extremist Radfemhub blog and advocate for everyone's human rights except those of men.

Her most recent published work is titled "Unspeakable – a feminist ethic of speech" about which she writes on the Radfemhub "the principle of Freedom of Speech is a sham. It's a myth." [2] Look no further then the comments policy on this public web site for proof of that:

> The discussions on this blog are reserved for women. Female-born, women-identified women are welcome to take part. This means that no male-born or male-identified person is given a platform to speak in this space. An amazing thing happens when women-identified women have the chance to speak, away from the carnivorous and necrophiliac behaviors(sic) of men. Our conversations get deep, rich, interesting, and fun. This atmosphere is valued and will be protected.

Radicalhub.com is a site to which any serious ethicist should be loathe to be associated. McLellan, however, appears to celebrate her involvement. I recently wrote to McLellan pointing out the hypocrisy of her stance but not surprisingly have not received a response.

McLellans' Townsville office has a plaque outside that simply states:

"Dr Betty McLellan Psychotherapist"

Now I gather Betty has a PhD, and hence her use of the salutation Dr. agrees with convention here in Australia, although on professional plaques it is most commonly associated with clinical practitioners. According to the James Cook University where she holds an appointment as Associate Professor (Social Work and Community Welfare) she received her Ph.D. from Claremont CA in 1977 but I have been unable to track down the topic of her dissertation. [3]

[image]Psychotherapist is a poorly defined designation in Australia. Unlike Psychologists, Psychiatrists, Medical Practitioners and other health professionals who must be registered with the Australian Health Practitioners Regulatory Agency (AHPRA), psychotherapists seem to be a law unto themselves. You will not find Betty McLellan listed on the AHPRA web site, nor does she appear in The Psychotherapy and Counseling Federation of Australia (PACFA)[4] listing of practitioners. The PACFA is an attempt to gather the disparate groups who practice "counseling" and "psychotherapy" [5] under a banner of legitimacy, and have them conform to a code of ethical practice. [6] Many submissions have been made to bring "psychotherapists" under the supervision of the AHPRA.

Mental health professionals, a group to which McLellan claims to belong, would also by convention advertise their affiliation with their professional body. For example, a Psychologist might add in addition to their qualification, MAPS (Member Australian Psychological Society) as a post nominal, indicating that as a member of that group they abide by its Code of Ethical Practice. [7] This provides reassurance for potential clients of the mental health professionals qualifications and an avenue of redress if they feel that the professional breeches the code of ethics to which they subscribe. McLellan has no such affiliations advertised in her phone directory listing or elsewhere that I can find. However, she does have a pretty, pink, albeit somewhat faded plaque outside her office. Perhaps indicating she is a female friendly practitioner?

McLellan fails to advertise her qualifications as a psychotherapist or any affiliations that would bind her to a particular code of ethics. This is convenient for her because one must wonder how a person holding such extremist and radical views could be involved in therapy with clients in an impartial, non-discriminatory and non-judgmental way. The ethical standard for Psychologists listed under "justice" for example forbids members from "discriminating unfairly against people on the basis of age, religion, sexuality, ethnicity, gender, disability, or any other basis." Further, they require psychologists to "demonstrate an understanding of the consequences for people of unfair discrimination and stereotyping related to their age, religion, sexuality, ethnicity, gender, or disability." These are clear ethical standards to which she obviously does not subscribe.

One of McLellans books, HELP! I'm Living with a (Man) Boy [8] is described thus: "From wet towels on the bathroom floor to carelessness with money or outright abuse, the frustrations of women with immature partners are viewed here as genuine problems to be solved by better communication."

A browse through this book shows it to be perpetrating the usual negative stereotypes of men whilst reinforcing the blameless victim status of women whose partners don't communicate with them at the exact time and in the precise manner they demand. Clearly not an ethical and unbiased view of relationships, embracing the above mentioned standards.

Beyond Psychoppression is another McLellan book promoted as a guide to therapy that explores the intersection between the personal and the political. (Have I heard that line before?) The introduction to Beyond Psychopression:

> Poor Men. I suppose we ought to feel sorry for them to some extent. In every generation, you see, men are sold a lie. In their socialisation, they are deceived into believing they are superior and that their superiority gives them unlimited power over women, animals, the environment, material goods, and all the worlds wealth.

Rather than cite contemporary research she continues to proffer patently false generalizations about men that cannot be substantiated. Naturally it follows that:

> Because the personal experiences of individual women are tied so closely to society's attitude toward and exploitation of women collectively, a therapy that recognises the political nature of our relationships must pay attention to both the individual and collective needs of women.

In other words feminist therapy needs to enlist clients into political action (feminism) to end oppression and discrimination against women collectively for an individual to progress in therapy. Sounds more like a treatise on how recruit for a cult than an ethical approach to psychotherapy. Still the experiences of unwelcome attempts to indoctrinate women into feminism via the abuse industry and women's shelters staffed by ideological commissars are well known.

McLellan has, over the years. been an avid writer of letter's to the editor, of our local and other newspapers. Recently the tragic murder-suicide deaths of a father and his child, after jumping from a bridge in Brisbane made headlines here. The situation involved family breakdown and the man involved was ostensibly a normal and well respected member of his community. McLellan wrote to the Townsville Bulletin:

> Unacceptable ANOTHER day; another bridge; another father; another baby thrown to his death. Another heart-broken mother; another shattered community in total shock. When will it ever end? Not until our society stops making excuses for men's violence and makes it clear that such hideous acts of violence are totally unacceptable in a civilised society. BETTY McLELLAN, Railway Estate.

Ok, does that sound like an ethical mental health professional trying to understand the complex determinants of human behavior with a view to remediation, or a radical feminist trying to score cheap political points from a personal tragedy? A similar tragedy played out in Brisbane in September 2011 also making national headlines, a mother stabbed her teenage daughter to death then drove with her young son to the same bridge and jumped to her death whilst the son watched. The women apparently had a history of mental ill health, and the whole thing was quietly minimized and justified. Betty McLellan did not write to the local paper asking for a halt to women's violence. Possibly in her view it was "patriarchies" fault, so more control of men would be the political imperative from this particular personal tragedy, not addressing women's violence.

McLellan might be better described in her biographies, as a feminist bigot, and based on her published views such a descriptor would be fully deserved. The reality is her writings are about sexual stereotyping, feminist dogma, and gender discrimination and have nothing to do with the reality of ethical or moral discourse. That archaic gender feminists such as McLellan still thrive in Australian academia is a sad reflection of the decline of academic standards and intellectual rigor in Australian universities.

Politics and Men's Rights

Rocking Mr. E · 26 February 2012 · Archived copy · Original

I was really impressed with Paul Elam's recent article "Why are atheists so religious?" Religion is a subject that MRAs tend to stay away from due to its affinity to offend, so this was a brave venture. Likewise, and with the help of JtO, the AVFM radio show "What if God Was One of Us?" did an excellent job of tackling the atheist connection to feminism. This coincided with the week that the Amazing Atheist (otherwise known as TJ) received a lot of flak from feminists and manginas alike. TJ was less than subtle in a confrontation on reddit with a feminist claiming to be a victim of rape. Few would disagree that the Amazing Atheist handled the situation poorly. It is however clear that TJ was goaded into oblivion, eventually cracking under the pressure. This is a common feminist tactic used to character assassinate opponents.

What is revealing about the whole episode was how 'moderates' were very quick to chastise TJ en masse. TJ openly admits to being molested as a child [1], so this is very telling when we consider his mannerisms, not least his typically volatile and eccentric behavior, both on and off camera. Many called for a complete boycott of TJ's YouTube channel, some even labeling him a potential rapist. It's funny how people like PZ Myers [2] are very quick to stand up for female behavior associated with a victimized past. The same cannot be said when men suffer from the aftermath of a traumatic event, a perfect example being soldiers with post-traumatic stress disorder [3]. The eventual breakdown of soldiers is used as a device to trump up levels of domestic abuse against women. This double standard allows women to chop and change between perpetual victim and empowered female, depending on whatever fits the moment. People like PZ Myers provide the ammunition for this to occur.

On the other hand the mysterious reddit rape victim escaped scrutiny for the most part. It seems she was very quick to use her victimhood as a means to shut down discourse, not that discourse is what feminists are after. Feminists are at the heart of the PC culture that we experience today, where free speech is restricted by the chosen technocracy of the political and academic elite. The scurrying of the "moderates" at the bottom of the hierarchy ignites this system like a flame beneath a bonfire. Some feminists are conscious of what they are doing; many are too ignorant to see it. Some feminists are clearly enraptured by the euphoria of female supremacy, while there are always going to be those that actually believe that what they are doing is right. And so, one by one, the misandric policies and data go unnoticed, while radicals are all too aware of the underlying con.

Feminism started out as a strongly classically liberal philosophy through the likes of John Stuart Mill and Mary Wollstonecraft [4]. It's very important that people understand that the use of the term 'classically liberal' [5] is very deliberate. What we sometimes call liberalism today is not liberal at all. Many of the founding fathers of the USA were classically liberal philosophers, inspired by the likes of John Locke.

So what changed? The answer is simple and is not uncommon knowledge among MRAs. Feminism became entwined with Marxist philosophy. Friedrich Engels in particular was very open about his belief that the family was a product of capitalism and property rights [6]. The woman was seen as an instrument of this oppression, and was therefore considered pivotal to the eradication of capitalism. By attacking the family it was believed this would bring Marxists one step closer to the proletariat vision of a communist society. This led to the Marxian inspired second and third-waves of feminism, as well as the political correctness used to shut down dissent. Feminists, like those TJ encountered, are well versed in the art of antagonism and shaming. They know exactly what buttons to push, and they are all too aware of how to ruin a person's reputation through their reaction to being taunted, thus ending their ability to voice their opinions. It will be interesting to see whether TJ has the guts to talk about feminism again after his scathing fiasco.

PC culture has consumed classic liberalism to the point where 'liberal' is synonymous with the leftist Neo-Marxism we have today. Herbert Marcuse, one of the founding members of the culturally Marxist Frankfurt School, was integral in defining what he called "repressive tolerance" in an essay [7]. In a nutshell Marcuse believed that the only way to realize perceived goals was via intolerance towards opposing voices. Justification for this is given by citing aims of creating a more humane society, but as we have seen time and again free speech is far more valuable than any utopian goal. What Marcuse actually did with his essay was create an alarming parallel with Stalinist orthodoxy that occurred in the USSR. It truly is shocking how Marcuse's techniques are now adopted by so many in the modern political left. That is not to say that others, like politicians of other political slants, are not adept at sinking to lows of character assassination. But no one does it quite like a leftist, as one learns all too well when going up against feminism.

The connection between feminism and atheism is also an important link to the left, which MRAs have recently addressed. Yes, delving into religion can be controversial, but perhaps MRAs shouldn't stop there. Maybe it's time that they started to explore that other controversial topic more often – politics. I am of the opinion that MRAs should politically identify themselves in the same manner as basically every other movement in the past and present.

However, today's bipartisan politics are inadequate. The left seeks to use guilt to make men succumb to disposability, while the right desires men to embrace the traditional role as provider and protector. It's clear then that the political system we have today is not designed to help men, for men have always been the sacrificial lambs required for the state to exist. It is for this reason that endless excuses, disruptions, and delays are the outcome of those working towards ending male injustice.

Feminists will have us believe that women are the true victims of history, but I would take a job in a factory over the battle of Normandy in a heartbeat. This epitomizes precisely why feminism is a movement driven by all rights, no responsibility, ignoring the hardship that men were faced with in the past. Feminists only seek privilege, supremacy, socialism, and most of all – power. MRAs should learn from this misguided mindset, especially when we look at how the left that feminism is a part of has no concept of the free rider problem. Providing infinite welfare and entitlement is a recipe for the ticking time bomb we are presently faced with. National debt is sinking the whole of society. Children are being raised by incompetent single mothers. Fathers are pursued for alimony by state thugs who deny them access to their own children. It is a culture of irresponsibility and insanity driven by left-wing ideologues damaged by their own disfunctionality, not to mention the resentment stemming from being incapable of competing in a meritocracy.

The left may be the cause of the feminism we are faced with today, but I do not presume that the right, with its traditional values, will help MRAs either. Yes, a small victory has been achieved with the help of the Republicans in the battle against VAWA, but you can bet your bottom dollar that this will only go as far as their white knight mentality will stretch.

It is therefore my belief that MRAs should mirror libertarianism and classic liberalism, the laissez-fares economists that champion skill over affirmative action, and the responsibility inherent to true individualism. Instead of using coercion to take from one group and give to another we should strive to show men, and indeed women, how to be responsible for their own lives. Detrimental to this is political lobbying for more government intrusion. I feel that MRAs should work towards dismantling this system, which allows groups like feminists and corporatists to bribe politicians into compliance.

It is impossible to avoid lobbying altogether at the current climate. I do however believe that MRAs should seek to stand against state influence in almost every sense. It is for this reason that I disagree with anyone who argues that the state can truly help MRAs – you will pay a heavy price for whatever you ask for, much like making a deal with a con artist. The evidence to prove this is stacked to the rafters, both today and in history. Instead of the state the family should be the heart of society, though I do not feel this should be built upon the disposable male model of old. Nonetheless it is by fighting to keep the family alive, the natural enemy of the state, that we can defeat those opposed to men's rights.

AVfM going dedicated

Some of you may have noticed we were down for a little while yesterday. Today was filled with short "changing servers" messages and even cryptic server pages. We apologize for the inconvenience and thank you for the messages and forum posts expressing concern.

AVfM has been dodging a bullet for some time by changing between differing levels of less expensive hosting plans in attempt to avoid dedicated servers. A while back we attempted running on a compromise between performance and price, a so-called VPS server which cost us about a 100$ a month, but we shortly found it offered no better performance than cheaper shared hosting. So we decided to move back to shared hosting and try to stretch it out and abuse it for as long as we could without getting kicked off.

Unfortunately, this didn't work for too long either, because our level of traffic and advanced features put stress on available resources – mainly CPU use percentage – on a level of abuse never attempted on shared-hosting plans. This rattles our hosting company, who showed their displeasure yesterday by shutting us down without prior warning.

It is actually not surprising. On November 2 we hit our first 1,000,000 visits to this site after 15 months of being online. Now, less than 4 months later, we are about to hit 1,500,000. This kind of growth was bound to be accompanied by some growing pains.

So, thanks to the final push from the hosting company, we finally went the whole stretch and ordered a full on dedicated server. Unfortunately, this change is expensive. We are now going from the temporary $100.00 per year shared hosting to a new and never before done $219.00 per month. Success has its price.

We apologize for the rather un-elegant way in which this transition happened, but we simply had no warning. The moment we got shut down we purchased the dedicated server plan on the spot, but due to the way the internet works, it takes time for the changes the propagate.

You couldn't access the old server because it was shut down, and you couldn't see the new one since it takes time for changes to propagate. Bigger companies usually handle this transition in such a way that you simply see things served from the older server while the move is happening. We didn't have this luxury due to no warning time.

Thanks for your patience and for supporting this sites mission.

Domestic violence law is ready for the dump

Why it's time to kill Joe Biden's favorite law.

(Dallas) The Violence Against Women Act, a monument to feminist political power, is up for reauthorization. VAWA does nothing for victims of domestic violence, and it's time to kill it, argues JANICE SHAW CROUSE.

Grounded on the feminist dogma that men are inherently abusive, VAWA wrecks families and tramples civil rights. It funnels hundreds of millions each year to a corrupt domestic violence industry. It indoctrinates judges, prosecutors, law makers, teachers, and school children in an anti-male, anti-family ideology. All that, without protecting abuse victims.

Laws should be based on reality, insists Dr. Crouse. Women are as likely as men to initiate physical aggression. About half of intimate partner abuse is mutual. And extreme interventions by the criminal justice system make many victims afraid to seek help. There's simply no reason not to have sensible domestic violence laws. VAWA must go.

To interview Janice Shaw Crouse, contact Tom Spence: tspence@spencemedia.com

Questions for Dr. Crouse:

- What is VAWA and what's wrong with it?
- Is there a chance that Congress won't reauthorize VAWA? Who's against it?
- You say that VAWA hasn't lived up to its promise. In what ways?
- How have VAWA's sponsors changed the proposed version? Is it better or worse?
- VAWA's opponents are accused of waging a war on women. Are you?
- What are the financial arguments against VAWA? Is it a good use of tax dollars?

CREDENTIALS: Janice Shaw Crouse, Ph.D., senior fellow of Concerned Women for America's Beverly LaHaye Institute, is an international expert on cultural, women's, and children's issues. Male reproductive rights

John Hembling (JtO) · 29 February 2012 · Archived copy · Original

A woman's body, a woman's choice.

In discussions of reproductive rights, this choice nugget of execrable rationalization is repeated so often it may be considered a new word.

Awomansbodyawomanschoice.

It is a sloppy, dishonest, and unethical excuse for the continued maintenance of the amoral and opportunistic annihilation of the human rights of men in reproductive matters.

The rationalization hamster races whenever this topic is broached in support of a regard for male human beings deserving basic human rights:

- Men don't get pregnant, stupid!
- You should have used a condom, stupid!
- You made your decision when you had sex, stupid!

The first of these asinine, and yet often repeated rebuttals – that men don't get pregnant, to the extent that it's true, supports the argument that being pregnant is a choice, and it's a choice that only women have.

Now, I won't pretend that women cannot or do not become unintentionally pregnant, either through failure of condoms, or failure of birth control pills, or in rare cases, failure of tubal ligation. However, accidental pregnancy will be set aside for the moment.

Women living in the first world, that is, in nations with a developed industrial economy, access to modern medical services and all the attendant conveniences of the 21st century have nearly total control over their own fertility.

A listing of all available methods for women to control their own reproduction would be tedious, but dozens of pre-conception consumer technologies for birth control are cheaply and easily available to women. This consideration addresses technology only, and doesn't touch on women's legal rights of self determination. In the few instances of political discussion over whether women should or should not retain rights of bodily autonomy and self determination, suggestions of those rights being denied has resulted in the rapid smack-down of any politician suggesting otherwise.

Post-conception, women also enjoy the right to terminate pregnancies using a version of the morning after pill, or by surgical abortion. The criteria and window of legally allowed access to abortions varies from state to state, but is available in every state.

A women's body, a woman's choice is not merely a motto, it is the law.

There are of course, some restrictions, and these vary based on progression of the pregnancy. These limitations are based on the fact that at some point during a pregnancy, the bundle of cells becomes a human being, to whom the human right to not be killed based on parental convenience must be afforded. Where this line is drawn varies based on who is asked, which is why in most states, abortion is limited to early term pregnancies.

Where this line should be drawn is not the topic of this article, other than to state that it is appropriate to draw it somewhere.

To be clear, I reject the doctrine claiming the personhood of a fertilized egg.

Women control their own pregnancies.

Men, by contrast, do not control women's fertility, nor their pregnancies. This is why men have no right to force a woman to continue a pregnancy, nor any right to limit a woman's use of pre-conception birth control.

However, a man whose sperm is used to fertilize a woman's ovum carries legal obligations to not only abide by the woman's decision to become pregnant, noting that in almost all cases this is a matter of volition and choice. In addition, the full enforcement powers of the state, both the civil police and the financial institutions regulated by the state will compel a man whose sperm is used to support that woman's reproductive choice for almost all of the following two decades.

A man has no legal choice in this. He has no reproductive rights, even while he carries legal and financial obligation. In fact, although debtor's prisons have been outlawed for more than a century, men unable to meet the enforced financial obligation mandated by a woman's exercised right of reproduction, these men are regularly imprisoned.This is unambiguously an implementation of the morally repulsive practice of slavery; the reproductive trap.

While assertions of its occurrence are frequently mocked, women can and do contrive to become pregnant without the consent or knowledge of men whose sperm is used.

"When [Jonathan's] girlfriend of just a few weeks announced her pregnancy, the news was coupled with an astonishing admission: she claimed to have impregnated herself using a condom that they had discarded after sex. […] Six months later, though, Jonathan received a letter from the Child Support Agency asking him to make a contribution to his daughter's upbringing." [1]

In another article [2], Daily Mail columnist and apparently amoral would-be mother Liz Jones wrote about self impregnation using stolen semen.

"The 'theft' itself was alarmingly easy to carry out. One night, after sex, I took the used condom and, in the privacy of the bathroom, I did what I had to do. Bingo."

In the same article, Jones claimed a 2001 survey revealed that: "42 per cent of women would lie about using contraception in order to get pregnant in spite of their partners' wishes."

She didn't cite a source for this survey, so this may be hyperbole. Lying about statistics in an online article is a lesser offence than theft of somebody's gamete cells.

Aside from the stunning prospect of overt theft from a condom, the "accidental on purpose" forgetting to take birth control and becoming pregnant within a relationship without male consent is quite common.

This practice is possible of course only because socially and legally, our culture affords no reproductive rights to men, despite the necessity of male contribution of personal genetic material, and the legally enforced onus to finance women's reproductive choices.

The Irish Supreme Court recently took this absurd situation to a new level of hypocrisy. On February 23 2012, the Supreme Court delivered a landmark judgment upholding the constitutionality of a law that allows teenage boys – but not teenage girls – to be prosecuted for having underage sex.

Under the 2006 Act "teenage boys can be held criminally liable for having sexual intercourse with an underage girl" while teenage girls are immune from prosecution.

In 2010 the Court rejected a challenge to this law because "girls risk pregnancy and the law is entitled to place the burden of criminal sanction on those who bear the least adverse consequences". [3]

Meanwhile, in some US states, including California and Kansas, minor boys statutorily raped by adult women must pay child support to the criminals who raped them. In one case, the boy was drugged before sex. [4]

At what point do humans of conscience take a stand and cease to recognize the courts rendering such judgment.

When conscience says law is immoral, don't follow it. You can cite me for contempt, Your Honor. I don't care.

A short lesson in reality

Paul Elam · 2 March 2012 · Archived copy · Original

When you foster a culture of female entitlement, you get two net results. One, you get a lot of women that seem to be deluded into thinking they can engage in any sort of conduct they choose with no expectation of consequences. And two, you get the occasional woman who has a very fucking rude awakening.

We saw that not too long ago in the case of Rayon McIntosh, and we see it here in this street altercation that was caught on video.

I think what is seen here should make a good topic of discussion. Obviously, the woman was assaulting, or attempting to assault the man in the video – repeatedly. It also looks like he had other options that did not involve that level of force. But one question that deserves to be answered is whether or not he should feel compelled to exercise any other option than what he did.

Was what he did self-defense? Was it overkill? Are we obligated morally to use restraint with women when attacking men? Or are all bets off? Ya takes a swing, ya takes ya chances.

One matter of interest here to me is the absolute lack of anyone in that scenario that appeared to take the white knight stance. I was half expecting the guy to be attacked by the other men, but what we saw was a message of caution delivered to women in general about going on the physical offensive with men.

No chivalry on that street for sure, but was this more than just her stepping over the line?

A double standard on violence

Zerbu · 3 March 2012 · Archived copy · Original

If someone were to question why men and boys are told not to hit women and girls, even in self defense, then most likely the most frequent answer would be that men and boys are, in general, physically stronger. In some cases, the same can be said about why violence against males in general should be taken less seriously than violence against females. However, this does not appear to be the sole reason. In reality, feminists want female privilege and extra protection.

For those of you who are not yet properly aware of the double standards, allow me to elaborate:

[unordered_list style="arrow"]

- In general, violence against men and boys is taken less seriously than violence against women and girls;
- Men and boys are not allowed to hit women and girls, but the reverse is considered acceptable;
- Men and boys are not even allowed to defend themselves against women and girls. A man or boy could be punished severely for defending himself while the woman or girl could receive little to no punishment for a severe form of violence;
- In mutual violence, the man or boy is punished more severely and the woman or girl may not even be punished at all.

BULLYING OF WEAK MALES

First of all, I'd like to ask you all a question. Which of these two groups is given extra protection and biased support? Is it "females" or just "people who are less physically strong?"

Why is it that the men and boys who are most prone to violence and bullying are those who are less physically strong than the average male? This is true not only in real life, but it is also portrayed the same way in the media. How often have you seen or heard of the common trope where a mean bully actively picks on, beats up, and destroys the well-being of "nerds" and other weak boys for the sheer pleasure of it?

Although this form of violence is usually male-on-male (though there may be infrequent cases of female perpetrators) one can argue that this contradicts the feminist excuse that the reason that violence against males is taken less seriously is because they are stronger. These "nerds" and other weak boys have less physical strength than the average boy and some may even have the same amount, or in some cases even less, physical strength as the average girl. Do they receive any more sympathy because of this? Usually not! Like most violence against males in the media, it is portrayed as not only acceptable, but funny. The fact that they aren't physically strong doesn't change that.

So, if the reason females are given more protection from violence is because they're less physically strong, then why aren't these weaker males given the same protection and support?

So in conclusion, the answer is "females," and not simply "people who are less physically strong."

MALE-vs.-FEMALE SELF-DEFENSE

We now know that in order to receive sympathy and protection from violence when you are not physically strong, you must have female genitalia. Oh wait a minute…I think part of what I just wrote is questionable. More specifically, the part that says "when you are not physically strong" may not be properly fact-checked. The question here is: does a female even need to lack the physical strength of a male to receive access to this special privilege? Another question is: in a fight between a male and female, does the female need to be weaker than the male in order to throw out the gender-biased “men/boys can’t hit women/girls” excuse, even when the male is only defending himself?

The answer to both these questions is a flat-out no. The excuse can be used regardless of the relative physical strength of the male and the female. One particular example of this, and remember that this is only an example, is how this biased rule is applied to prepubescent children. Before puberty, boys and girls have the same amount of natural strength [1], and any additional strength one has is purely socially constructed. Yet, boys of that age are still dressed down for hitting girls, even if done in self defense.

I have even personally witnessed strong teenage girls physically attacking weaker teenage boys and when the boy does anything in self-defense, the excuse that “boys shouldn’t hit girls” is still called out.

So in conclusion, the actual strength of the individuals has no effect. While they say the reason violence against males is taken less seriously because males are in general stronger, individual exceptions to the stereotype seem to make very little difference, if any. The excuse is based solely on the general traits of the genders, and not on the actual traits of the individuals.

VIOLENCE WITHOUT PHYSICAL STRENGTH

So now we know physical strength doesn’t really make much of a difference in the matter. It’s really based solely on gender, and the excuse of physical strength is just something used by feminists and other gynocentrists to justify discrimination against men. There is, however, another thing to debate. What if the case in question doesn’t involve physical strength?

One does not need to be physically strong to be violent; they can simply wield a weapon or throw an object. Not only are the effects no more harmful to women than they are to men, but some studies have actually shown women tolerate pain better than men. [2][3] It looks like the feminists have some explaining to do.

If a man were to say that violence against women that doesn’t involve physical strength should be taken less seriously because of this, it would be no less chauvinistic than any of the suggestions feminists have driveled out of their mouths. Not that I truly believe that should be the case, however, as what feminists say is in no way logical. There is some debate to these studies, [4] but whether or not the study is correct, the realistic thing to do is have all forms of violence punished the same way, depending on how serious the individual case is, regardless of gender.

The inflated definition of misogyny

Zerbu · 5 March 2012 · Archived copy · Original

Feminists are very quick to scream when they see or hear something they consider to be discrimination against women. According to feminists, misogyny is still rampant in society, and women are treated badly and unfairly. Really, though, what do they consider to be sexist?

The issues most feminists today complain about, are normal issues that happen to many people and are not gender based. Mainstream misogyny is very rare in today's society, and if it ever occurs, people will know about it, report it immediately and it will be gotten rid of as soon as possible.

So, what are some examples of what feminists consider misogyny?

- If a man is chosen over a woman for a job, it's considered misogyny;
- If a woman or girl doesn't get taken seriously, it's considered misogyny;
- If a woman or girl is not given complete control over her choices in life, it's considered misogyny;
- If violence is inflicted against a woman or girl, it's considered misogyny;
- If a female boss is not respected properly, it's considered misogyny;
- If a woman or girl is falling behind in a class, it's considered misogyny on the part of the education system;
- If a woman or girl is not given proper health care, it's considered misogyny;
- If a woman or girl is poor or suffering financial stress, it's considered misogyny;
- If a woman or girl gets in trouble for a reason she disagrees with, it's considered misogyny;
- If a woman or girl in general is suffering, it's considered misogyny.

Now, despite what feminists claim, these issues are not misogyny, because they are not gender issues. These issues happen to everyone, not just women and girls. Men and boys suffer from them as much, a lot of the time even more so. It has nothing to do with gender discrimination.

- People get chosen for jobs over other people;
- People don't always get taken as seriously as they should;
- People aren't always given complete control over their choices in life, and may be restricted for financial, health and/or other reasons;
- People suffer violence;
- Bosses and people in power are not always respected the way they should be, regardless of gender;
- People often fall behind in classes;
- People are not always given the proper health care they need or deserve;
- People suffer financial problems;
- People get in trouble for improper reasons, or at least what they consider improper;
- People in general suffer.

…but if one of those people are female, feminists immediately blame it on discrimination. Most of the problems feminists call misogyny are simple human issues that effect both genders. As has been demonstrated, feminists are not after equality. What they really want, by making these claims, is to change it so that only men ever suffer from these normal issues.

An example of this is how feminists continuously try to classify domestic violence (and in some cases, even violence in general) as a form of gender discrimination. Men can be victims of domestic violence too, so domestic violence is a violence issue, not a gender issue.

To demonstrate further the way situations are so easily labelled misogyny, here is a detailed example of a fictional situation:

> A student at a school has just been accused of misbehaving. This student believes they have done nothing wrong, and is annoyed by the false accusation and is determined to have something done about it. The student complains to one of the teachers, but doesn't use proper manners and instead uses shouting and foul language. The teacher disciplines the student for it, and the student has to do extra work after class.

The short story above does not mention the gender of the teacher and student. So let's say, both the student and the teacher are male. It would be considered a normal dispute. Change the gender of both of them to female, and it's still a normal dispute. However, make one of them male and the other female, and bang… it's gender discrimination! The male in the situation is a chauvinist, and the female is being discriminated against, despite the argument having nothing to do with gender. It could also be noted that in situations like these, the male is the one who gets blamed the majority of the time, and the female is always considered the victim.

That, folks, is the inflated definition of misogyny. For something that is done by a man (or boy) to be considered discrimination against women (or girls), the woman or girl just has to disagree with it. Whether or not the problem actually has anything to do with gender makes no difference in what feminists decide to call it.

Feminist lie #3,468: Obamacare

Antony Zarat · 5 March 2012 · Archived copy · Original

Shut the fuck up about a make believe "War on contraception"

Feminism is the most powerful lobby in human history. In every Western nation, feminists enjoy unwavering political patronage, exert move-by-move control of humanities departments (while other academic disciplines are submissively silent), wield unchallenged power over judicial and executive institutions, and preside over the cowed submission of the media and other societal self-correction institutions. Feminism is the biggest and meanest fish in the sea, and once it smells blood, you can be sure that someone is going to get slaughtered.

This week, the feminist behemoth is busy devouring the Catholic Church, the conservative lobby, and what remains of the congressional Republican delegation. Admittedly, the GOP brought this upon themselves. Frustrated by disappointing poll numbers and costly political infighting, Republicans gambled that red meat would bring needed discipline and unity to their ranks. Nobody took the bait, but it attracted a monster from the deep. Now the feminist beast is gorging on a bait-ball of panicked Republicans. Some huddle together seeking safety in numbers, others jump out of the water and pray that gravity will forget about them. Neither strategy saves anyone from the gullet of hate.

With the vulnerability of the GOP so dramatically unveiled, everyone wants to take a bite. The Washington Post reports on a fantasy "War on Birth Control," the New York Times predicts that the "Senate Nears Showdown on Contraception Policy", and even the conservative Wall Street Journal humorlessly criticizes "Birth Control Yes, Government Control No." Predictably, nobody has questioned the feminist narrative that the underlying issue has anything to do with banning birth control.

Gentlemen, sadly this means it falls upon the MRM to debunk yet another feminist whopper. It gives me no pleasure to do so. I am tempted to enjoy the GOP wriggling on the hook for just a little bit longer. These are the same White Knights that can always be counted upon to offer male blood, male sweat, and male tears as a bribe to keep women warbling contentedly in the Republican harem. However, there are occasions when the feminist monologue becomes so absurd that someone has to kick down the whole rotten edifice of calumny, on general principles. Everyone else is afraid to swim with Jaws so, as they say in the Army, "it's our turn". We MRAs are used to swimming circles around the big dumb fish, and I guess we can put in a token effort for king and country. It might even be fun.

One thing you won't find anyone discussing in this feeding frenzy is the language of Obamacare, and how it pertains to women's and men's health. I guess everyone is shivering in their boots, afraid that if they say the wrong thing, big sister might eat them for lunch. Sigh.

So, here is the exact text from the Obamacare legislation that describes those services that (i) must be offered by all healthcare providers and (ii) must be free of any cost or co-pay requirement:

(a) IN GENERAL — A group health plan and a health insurance issuer offering group or individual health insurance coverage shall, at a minimum provide coverage for and shall not impose any cost sharing requirements for –

(1) evidence based items or services that have in effect a rating of 'A' or 'B' in the current recommendations of the United States Preventive Services Task Force.

(2) immunizations that have in effect a recommendation from the Advisory Committee on Immunization Practices of the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention with respect to the individual involved; and

(3) with respect to infants, children, and adolescents, evidence-informed preventive care and screenings provided for in the comprehensive guidelines supported by the Resources and Services Administration.

(4) with respect to women, such additional preventive care and screenings not described in paragraph [1] as provided for in comprehensive guidelines supported by the Health Resources and Services Administration for purposes of this paragraph.

(5) for the purposes of this Act, and for purposes of any other provision of law, the current recommendations of the United States Preventive Service Task Force regarding breast cancer screening, mammography, and prevention shall be considered the most current other than those issued in or around November 2009.

That is it. If it is not in this list, there is no mandatory free coverage under Obamacare. Republicans advocate that certain religious institutions should be exempt from the requirement to provide mandatory cost-free birth control to women. But how does this "right" to free birth control fit in with the rest of the bill? What comparable benefits does this legislation extend to other demographic groups, such as men? To answer this question, we will have to examine each of the (5) categories of mandatory free coverage.

Item (1) refers to a list of "USPSTF A and B Recommendations" that are updated yearly. You can find the current list here.

This technical document has acceptable gender-parity for most items. There is a nauseating focus on pregnancy-related items, but I will not quibble because plausible justification can be made for some of it. However, there are also line items for three breast health treatments, with no matching prostate health coverage. There is cervical cancer screening, but no provisions for male specific cancers. There are several line items protecting women from STDs, but no matching money for men.

This is also where mandatory free birth control products and free tubal ligation services for women will be, once the Institute of Medicine's recommendations are accepted by the president. That approval process led to the fuss over a "war on birth control". Nobody talks about the fact that birth control for men, including vasectomy, is not covered, not free, and not mentioned in either the IOM or the USPSTF. Feminists and the liberal left are crying foul because a small number of women will have a small number of their female-only services under Obamacare limited. A few women, some of the time, will be treated like all men are treated, all the time. Outrageous!

In summary, item (1) has the same composition as broader American society. So, we have some special privileges for women, generalized neglect of men…but nothing worth putting on war paint for.

Let's read on…

Item (2) is more of the same. There is money for cancer prevention for girls, but not for boys. This got my attention because of recent evidence that the Gardasil cancer vaccine is protecting girls not only from various reproductive and abdominal cancers, but also several of the big upper body killers — including lung cancer. This is something of a "serendipity" moment in anti-cancer research. It turns out that the HPV virus (targeted by Gardasil) lives in many parts of the body, even though it only causes warts and other visible injuries in genital and oral tissues. But wherever it lurks, HPV is cancer causing — even in lung tissue. It seems inexcusable that the CDC is putting the lives of boys at risk to burnish its pro-woman credentials. But I digress. I can't blame Obamacare for this either.

Item (3) appears to be gender neutral. It is hard to believe that government can do anything without groveling at the feminist altar.

And then, we get to items (4) and (5). Where shall I start? The good news is the legislation is fully contained within the document (both items refer to sub-sections within the body of the 907 page "affordable care act"). The bad news is the act has so much feminist bigotry and hate that an exhaustive list is out of the question in the interests of space. However, a quick search for the words "man" and "woman" will suffice to illustrate how this twisted document shamelessly panders to every conceivable female health issue, while completely neglecting men and boys.

The word “women” appears 134 times in the body of Obamacare.

The word “men” appears twice in the body of Obamacare

Both occurrences of the word “men” are in generic “men and women” sentences that mean nothing.

In contrast, all but two of the 134 occurrences of the word “women” outline special privileges, pampering, or programs that benefit women only. To illustrate this, I will examine every “Nth” occurrence of the word “women”, where “N’ advances in 5s. This is all that I have time to do.

1st This is in item (4) above, outlining free preventative health services for women, but not for men.

6th Mandates that before the Secretary of Health “qualifies” (approves) a health plan, he/she must “take into account the health care needs of diverse segments of the population, including women, children, persons with disabilities, and other groups.” Health care programs are on notice: pamper the pussies, or pay the price.

11th Establishes a congressional program to study “the relative mental health consequences for women of resolving a pregnancy in various ways, including carrying the pregnancy to term and parenting the child, carrying the pregnancy to term and placing the child for adoption, miscarriage, and having an abortion.” There is no reason to ask fathers what we think, because we are reptiles who do not care about the “fate” of our children.

16th Mandates that the Secretary of Health must present to congress a prescription drug plan within 12 months, and must “consult with drug manufacturers, clinicians, patients and consumers, experts in health literacy, representatives of racial and ethnic minorities, and experts in women’s and pediatric health.” Great, now the Secretary of Health must consult with feminists to determine which drugs are covered, and how much they will cost. Get ready for the tentacles of feminist hate to strangle you whenever you walk into a pharmacy.

21st Establishes the Office of Women’s Health within the Department of Health and Human Services, with an immediate mandate to “establish short-range and long-range goals and objectives within the Department of Health and Human Services and, as relevant and appropriate, coordinate with other appropriate offices on activities within the Department that relate to disease prevention, health promotion, service delivery, research, and public and health care professional education, for issues of particular concern to women throughout their lifespan.” Naturally, none of these issues matter to men, and anyways male “lifespan” is so short, who gives a shit, right? We are like lovebugs or dayflies, expected to do our thing and then die already.

26th “Establish a Department of Health and Human Services Coordinating Committee on Women’s Health, which shall be chaired by the Deputy Assistant Secretary for Women’s Healthy and composed of senior level representatives from each of the agencies and offices of the Department of Health and Human Services.” Apparently, this is a watch dog organization to make sure that the Office of Women’s Health is adequately “energetic” in promoting women’s health, as it must “monitor the Department of Health and Human Services’ offices, agencies, and regional activities regarding women’s health and identify needs regarding the coordination of activities, including intramural and extramural multidisciplinary activities.” Wow, I had no idea that women’s health was so much worse than men’s health in America, we need multiple interlocking agencies to address this national emergency!

31st “There is established within the Office of the Director of the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, an office to be known as the Office of Women’s Health.” Yep, another office, this time in the CDC, to make sure that “the Center’s activity regarding women’s health conditions access, where appropriate, age, biological, and socio-cultural contexts, in all aspects of the Centers work, including prevention programs, pubic and professional education, services, and treatment.” This is big league pussy power. Nobody at the CDC is going to be able to pass gas without feminist say-so.

36th “Establishing within the Substance Abuse and Mental Health Administration an Office of Women’s Health” yadda yadda yadda. W*e get it; every federal agency that has anything to do with health administration is going to answer to the feminist Gestapo.*

41st "There is established within the Office of the Director, an Office of Women's Health and Gender Based Research." So not only health administration, but also health research, will be politicized and fully feminized. We are going to need a bigger boat!

46th "The Secretary shall establish within the Office of the Administration of the Health Resources and Services Administration, an office to be known as the Office on Women's Health." Huh? What could this outfit possibly do? "Consult with health professionals, nongovernmental organization, consumer organizations, women's health professionals, and other individuals and groups, as appropriate, on Administration policy with regards to women." This looks like the feminist outreach arm. Handing health and human services to the feminazis is not enough. Government has to threaten the private sector, ensuring that "consumer organizations" are responsive to women's desires. Who knew feminine hygiene was so expensive? Government will "oversee" the private sector to make sure that feminine products are affordable. Clearly, Patriarchy must be responsible, because any legitimate business would offer tampons and maxis for free. Go girl!

At this point, we have covered 436 pages out of 907 pages in Obamacare, and the document never stopped talking about women's health.

It proceeds the same way until the bitter end. From cover to cover, Obamacare is actually Omama care. There is an exhaustive section on breasts, a nauseating section on motherhood, and finally a heartbreaking section on domestic violence. The violence section is the worst of all. Out of pity for those of you who have endured the unendurable at the hands of crazed and violent bitches, I am going to give you an executive summary. Obamacare is a long litany of sentences that begin with "there is established within [insert public institution] an office to be known as the Office on Women's [insert feminist wet dream here]."

Nothing for men, cover to cover. Nothing for boys, cover to cover.

Vile, feminist filth. I promised to discuss 1 out of every 5 woman-only programs in Obamacare, but with 98 more women only programs and privileges to go, "I am out of puff" (as Thomas the Tank Engine says). I can't go on. MRAs can easily avoid the big dumb feminist shark, but swimming through the carnage and offal left by the feeding beast is too nauseating to tolerate. The shock, the pain, and the reflection of what this document will mean for millions of men, boys, and fathers — it is too much to bear.

This brings us back to that circling behemoth that is happily swallowing conservative loud-mouths.

So just what is in the Blunt amendment that has brought the media to a fever pitch and the feminist beast into a blind rage?

It turns out that in some cases, some women may have to pay for birth control. This means that a tiny number of women will be treated just like men. You see, Obamacare already has no provision for male reproductive health. All female gender specific health needs, including birth control such and tubal ligation, is covered free of charge. Vasectomy is not, along with all other male gender specific health care needs.

Women would still enjoy hundreds of privileges, programs, pampering, and special provisions. Men would continue to experience nothing but neglect and hate. In a very small number of cases, one of the many female-only provisions would not apply. There is no mention that there are no provisions for men or boys, anywhere in this vile feminist document.

So all this fuss is basically because a tiny number of women, in a tiny number of cases, regarding a tiny number of privileges, might be treated just as badly as all men are treated, in all cases, all the time.

Here is my message to all feminists:

Fuck off and die.

AVfM Radio opens a new chapter

Dr. Paul & Dr. T · 7 March 2012 · Archived copy · Original

AVfM Radio Network will enter a new stage of development next week. The AVfM Radio Program will continue on Thursday nights, hosted by John the Other. The program will continue its forays into the realm of men's activism with John at the helm, microphone in one hand and chainsaw in the other. JTO is on the loose, so tune in and crank the volume up loud enough to get some blood on you.

Beginning Monday, March 12, 2012 at 9pm EST, Dr. Tara Palmatier and Paul Elam (in the unabridged and unapologetic, salty persona of Dr. Paul) will work together in an effort to deal with the issues that matter in men's lives with women – in ways that matter most to men.

This is not a "relationship advice" show. You will still have to consult COSMO or Oprah for bad relationship advice. This show is about helping men understand the true nature of women, how to deal with them and how to thrive instead of living in daily survival mode. Think of it as Tom Leykis on steroids.

The first show this coming Monday is Shit Tests: How and Why to Fail Them with Finesse and Style.

Some men know that life with most women often entails ingesting their shit tests. They are part of the naturally occurring dance of power and control in many intimate relationships. They are also where many men's spines will die slow, miserable deaths by a thousand cuts.

Dr. T and Dr. Paul will examine common shit tests, give you the lowdown on why they are happening and some solid suggestions on how to handle them. Not only is it okay to fail a woman's shit test; it's how you move to the head of the class!

This will mark the beginning of what we hope will be a relevant and important new age in which men learn that you don't have to surrender your balls in order to be in a relationship with a woman and that, in fact, surrendering your balls sows the seeds of contempt in your woman and the seeds of resentment in you.

John Hembling (JtO) · 7 March 2012 · Archived copy · Original

It is now the beginning of the spring on 2012, which means we should all expect the international grass roots protest movement known as SlutWalk to return bigger and better than ever before.

For those few who might not be familiar with this populist juggernaut, SlutWalk is a humanist protest movement against the badly worded suggestion by one Canadian police officer that women, in order to avoid sexual victimization, should avoid dressing as sluts.

The movement, which in a single year has spawned protest marches in dozens of cities worldwide, took the words of the Canadian cop, constable Micheal Sanguinetti to mean that when women find themselves the victims of the lowest incidenced type of violent crime tracked by the FBI in their uniform crime victimization survey, that these women have only themselves to blame. And that's the story. That is the narrative behind the mobilization of women in protest marches all over the western world, the story that Micheal Sanguinetti, the Toronto cop, was telling rape victims it was their own stupid fault they got raped or sexually assaulted.

This message, this black-and-white over-simplification of criminal victimization, this "it's your fault," is a terrible, regressive and hateful position to take. Anyone who blames the victim of a crime rather than the perpetrator of a crime is clearly a deranged sociopath who should never be employed in any capacity dealing with the general public.

What's interesting is that nobody thinks that's what Constable Sanguinetti meant, not even the organizers or participants of slut walks which took place in cities all over the world. Nobody -save a tiny handful of idiots – thinks that the victims of crimes are solely responsible for their own victimization, not even when the crime in question involves sex.

The SlutWalk movement is not a movement protesting the view that the victims of rape have nobody to blame except themselves, and this is evident after the most fleeting consideration. At the Vancouver, British Columbia instantiation of the protest parade which I attended and observed, one oft-recurring slogan read:

"Don't teach women not to get raped, teach men not to rape."

Men, you see, do not know they should not commit the crime of rape, they must be taught this. Men, we learn from this slogan, would rape women if they didn't know better. This sort of conduct, raping women, well…it's impolite and unsportsmanlike.

"Teach men" we are told "not to rape."

Not even rapists, no, but men. That's who needs an education, so men don't rape. Because after all, if we don't teach them, the poor little rapey men simply won't know any better.

More than 40 versions of this slogan appeared on signs at the Vancouver slut walk, produced by organizers from one of Vancouver's battered women's shelters.

"Teach men not to rape."

The other purpose of this international protest movement, we are told, is the reclamation of that demeaning, degrading word – the word slut. It is a word which, as nearly as I can determine outside of the approved, politically polite superdoubleplussgood speak actually means "sexually irresponsible jackass". That's the word the marching sluts seem bent to put a positive spin on. So gentlemen, you mustn't say slut anymore, when what you really mean is sexually irresponsible jackass. So just say: sexually irresponsible jackass.

The SlutWalk Movement is neither a protest of Micheal Sanguinetti's words nor a protest against "victim blaming." It is a show of force and a demonstration of superiority of status. Slut walks worldwide are a reminder to men to know their place. No matter how drunk, slutty, irresponsible, and sexually suggestive the attire and behavior of a drunken, drugged, partying slut becomes, she is supreme, and owns no culpability. Men are responsible, and should she, at the time, or later in a moment of post facto regret decide that whatever sexual pursuit was pursued – if she decides she doesn't or didn't like it – well then, the man is at fault. In fact, he's a criminal to be destroyed.

The SlutWalk Movement is a show of power. To men it is a clear message. Know your place, bow your head, and agree that the most privileged, protected, pampered demographic in human history are actually victims, and further agree that you belong to a class of criminals. That is what the international protest movement called SlutWalk really is.

Ruminations on apologies in the gender wars

Pierce Harlan · 8 March 2012 · Archived copy · Original

In feminist activist Sandra Fluke's now famous congressional testimony, she made the following statement, among many others: "Forty percent of female students at Georgetown Law report struggling financially as a result of this policy [that contraception is not covered at Georgetown Law School]."

Note that it's not the tens of thousands of dollars that go toward crushing tuition debt, housing, and books that cause female law students to struggle financially. It's the cost of contraception. (Could it also be the Skinny Flavored Starbucks Latte and similar beverages many law students are known to buy on a regular basis?)

Let's be fair. Fluke's absurd statement, and others, didn't justify Rush Limbaugh's other-worldly assumption that Fluke was fucking her way through law school, and that she wants to be paid to have sex, so, therefore, she's a slut and a prostitute. Pretty much everyone said Rush's name calling was wrong, and Rush properly apologized last Saturday, and again Monday.

But, of course, that wasn't enough for Fluke or her gender warrior friends. They insist the problem goes far beyond Rush's poor choice of words, even though Rush's poor choice of words is the sole reason the story is in the news. "I don't think that a statement like this… changes anything," Fluke clucked the women on The View. Left-wingers and their web arms, like Media Matters, who loathe and despise Rush's politics, smelled blood and tried to use Rush's misstep to bring him down with sponsor boycotts. For his part, Rush claims there are plenty of sponsors waiting to take the places of the ones that jumped ship.

(Speaking of apologies and The View, remember Sharon Osbourne's giggling apology last year after the ladies of that dismal show guffawed over the news story about a woman who cut off her husband's penis and threw it in a garbage disposal because he filed for divorce? Sharon Osbourne proclaimed, among other things, that this act of mutilation was "quite fabulous" and "hysterical," adding that she lights candles by Lorena Bobbitt's picture. After some people objected to this bizarre and somehow acceptable celebration of gendered mayhem, Osbourne tried her best to keep a straight face and said she was "sorry that I offended people cause that's not my intention." No sponsors pulled out.)

Liberal comic Bill Maher, for one, isn't joining in the Rush feeding frenzy. He took to Twitter to call out liberals for their continuous criticism of the right wing talkmeister. "Hate to defend #RushLimbaugh but he apologized, liberals looking bad not accepting. Also hate intimidation by sponsor pullout." Mr. Maher may recognize the double-standard where he was largely given a pass for calling Sarah Palin a "tw*t" and a "c*nt."

Among the more fascinating takes on Rush and Fluke came from two New York female politicians from different parties. Assemblywoman Nicole Malliotakis (R,C-Brooklyn/Staten Island) said this: "While I may disagree with Ms. Fluke on some aspects of this issue, I am in complete agreement with those calling on Mr. Limbaugh to apologize to all women for his demeaning comments." Council Member Debi Rose (D,WF-Staten Island) said this: "I call on the sponsors of his show to call for him to apologize to Ms. Fluke and all women and make it clear to him that the public does not support his hate rhetoric," said See here.

Rush must apologize to "all women." Hmm. This reminded me of the time Katie Engelhart, writing in the Huffington Post, said that governments owe women, as a class, an apology on behalf of their men. Of course, men, both as a class and individually, are owed nothing. The oppressors never are, you see.

And we can't forget the following:

Tiger Woods should apologize to all women, one female newspaper writer wrote, for what he did in his personal life.

Attorney Gloria Allred said that Mel Gibson should apologize to "all women" for telling his partner, "if you get raped by a pack of ns, it will be your fault." (Oh — Allred added that Gibson should also apologize to African American men, but note she puts women first).

Sarah Palin said David Letterman owed an apology to young women across the country for his joke that Palin's daughter got "knocked up" by New York Yankee third baseman Alex Rodriguez during a trip to New York.

Sigh.

Whatever trouble Tiger Woods and Mel Gibson were having in their private relationships was just that — private, and all womanhood isn't victimized by them. Letterman's lame joke that referenced both a male and a female wasn't an assault on all things female anymore than it was an assault on all things male. It was just a lame joke.

Not all calls for apologies are informal. A Hamilton County judge ordered a man jailed for his Facebook rant about his wife — or, to avoid the jail sentence, the man was ordered to post on his page an apology to his wife and all of his Facebook friends, something free-speech experts found troubling.

There was a case twenty years ago where a woman's rape lie led to the following: an innocent man lost his job; his family was harassed; his children were taunted at school; one of his daughters was forced to quit school altogether; his wife got to the point that she hated even going shopping; people in town were buying guns because of this innocent man; and women in town feared him. The rape lie was discovered, and the liar was convicted. The judge's sentence required her to apologize to the man she falsely accused in half-page advertisements in four newspapers and 10 spot announcements on two radio stations. The judge explained: ". . . the rape charges were all over the papers, but when [the innocent man] was exonerated nobody hears about it. I told [the false accuser] the only way to get it out was to have her do it." This was a fitting punishment because the principal harm of a rape lie is reputational. Yet the ACLU fought it, alleging, among other things, that an apology constituted cruel and unusual punishment. Rather than appeal, she grudgingly abided by the sentence.

And my favorite apology of all: the infamous case from several years ago at Milton Academy, Massachusetts. A 15-year-old girl engaged in group sex with five teenage boys in the boys' locker room. They were 16. The boys, and only the boys, were expelled and charged with statutory rape, and the court ordered the boys to publicly apologize to the girl and her family, and to do community service.

Alan M. Dershowitz, a Harvard law professor and criminal defense lawyer whose daughter attended Milton Academy, said this: "This represents the most senseless use of prosecutorial discretion I've seen in a long time." He added: "The idea that these youngsters should be branded rapists and the girl should be labeled a victim is preposterous."

Read on only if you want to get your blood boiling. The 16-year-old boys read their apologies to the girl and her family, in open court, as part of their plea bargain. One boy read this: "Not a day has passed since the incident that I don't wish I had shown more respect for you, myself, and everyone involved. I understand that by taking part I put myself in a very dangerous situation with consequences none of us had dreamed of." Another boy read this: "Every day I am sorry, so sorry, for what happened. And every day I think of how hurt you must be and how upset your family must be. More than anything in the world I wish that I could turn back the clock. . . . All I can do at this point is truly and sincerely apologize for my actions and wish you happiness."

The girl and her family sat there stony-faced as the boys were publicly emasculated.

Just another of those wacky, wonderful double standards in the gender wars.

Bury the bullshit

B.R. Merrick · 8 March 2012 · Archived copy · Original

I spoke too soon. At the end of my last tirade over a Leftist writer and his libertarian/anarchist allies, I mentioned a brilliant but left-leaning work of historical analysis by Adam Hochschild entitled Bury the Chains, about the ending of the slave trade by a handful of British abolitionists. I forgot about the bug that buzzes around my ear whenever I listen to or read the words of a Leftist, no matter the level of intelligence he possesses or interest I hold in what he's trying to communicate. I'm still not done with the book (slow reader), but I know I shall continue to enjoy it. Well, most of it. I do have to put up with passages, on occasion, like the following: "The couple returned to England and, her book of adventures quickly published, settled in Anna Maria's hometown of Bristol, where, as with so many women of her time, no further trace of her remains [p. 212]."* Frightening to contemplate, isn't it? Anna Maria Falconbridge simply disappeared into the setting sun of the eighteenth century, never to be heard from again. I'll bet a domineering husband is to blame.

Keep in mind that this is a book about slavery, an institution so indescribably awful that other women who had the misfortune to be born black, African, and in the same century as poor Mrs. Falconbridge were made to work in the fields, and more of them than men apparently, who were often given specialized tasks "like maintaining mill equipment, building sugar barrels, or doing masonry [p. 66]." The fields and sugar mills were where the most horrible work was to be done, toiling unspeakably long hours all day and well into the night. What was Mrs. Falconbridge's greatest complaint? She apparently married a drunkard she didn't like, and settled briefly in a poorly organized colony in Sierra Leone where she "hit it off wonderfully with the slave traders [p. 179]." Then, after giving up on this (rather socialist) little colony of good intentions, and with the aid of slave trading sailors, she returned to the bosom of Britain, became the best-selling author of a book against slavery, and retired. Not disappeared; retired. I can assure you, gentlemen, if I wrote a single best-seller, none of you would ever hear from me again. Actually, I'd probably never even get around to the book if you put me with a bunch of hardy and agreeable sailors. But that's beside the point. Sadly.

Anyway, a quick look in the index shows a whole bunch of entries under "Suffrage": "…for women in Britain… for women in Sierra Leone…" There's even an index entry for "Women": "field work done by… mutiny attempts by slave… as petition signers… as prostitutes… as public speakers… rights for… as slave revolt leaders… suffrage denied… suffrage for… travel narratives by… whipping of slave…"

There's no index entry for "Men." Yet the reader is led to believe that there was something in the eighteenth century that was quite important but was denied to women by virtue of their sex. The only thing anyone ever comes up with, including Hochschild, is the vote. But why did women in Britain need the vote?

The women who would have directly and immediately benefited from having a say in how the empire was run were female slaves with the wrong skin color. If the vote had been extended only to enslaved black men and not black women, does anyone honestly think that the men, of their own accord, would have done anything other than vote to have the women relieved from excruciating field labor? And if those same men had remained immovable on that issue, what would the slave women have done? Lied down and taken it?

No, they would have mobilized in the limited fashion available to them, and compelled the men to the polls. British women without the vote did much the same thing without even sending their men to the ballot box. According to Hochschild, it was mainly women who started a boycott of sugar: "Quietly but subversively, the boycott added a new dimension to British political life. At a time when only a small fraction of the population could vote, citizens took upon themselves the power to act when Parliament had not [p. 195]." Hochschild doesn't mention women in these few pages with much specificity, but then again, he doesn't need to. Who goes shopping for the household in eighteenth-century Britain? Who does the majority of cooking, baking, and making of tea? Who, after all this shopping and cooking, gets to say exactly what she wants to the family voter? Who withholds affection and sex if the voter fails to listen?

For the uninitiated and/or the thick-headed, this is usually how women, in general, like to wield power: quietly, in the background, and in a "supporting" role. They get on boats worked by men whose trade they disagree with, bat their eyelashes up on deck, and then blab in a tell-all book that sells, sells, sells. They decide, behind the scenes and purse in hand, to join the mass movement to boycott a single slave-traded item. How wonderful it would be if women in modern times would boycott air travel in protest against having their snatches glared and groped at in the airports. In comparison, using honey instead of sugar to protest the mistreatment of others in far away places seems quite pale, does it not? The only difference I can see is that modern, air-traveling women can vote. Is the sugar in your belly slowing your pace to the polls, honey?

Yet Hochschild brings up women again and again, as if they had no voice due to not having a vote. The rest of the "oppression" of women remains, as it has always done and probably always will, amorphous and evasive like the changeling it is. In the meantime, Hochschild ignores one of the most glaring, obvious, and truly awful examples of men being deliberately, directly, and decidedly oppressed due not to skin color, region of origin, or social class, but to their very sex.

I don't know how it's possible to ignore the profound differences between the way eighteenth century men and women were treated, but Hochschild manages the cognitive dissonance with ease. Chapter 15, entitled "The Sweets of Liberty," is all about the question of why. Why did eighteenth-century Britain catch anti-slavery fever when other countries did not? America and much of the rest of Western Europe had roughly the same rate of industrial advancement. Enlightenment principles were bandied about by both American and French revolutionaries, but neither group of white people cared much about ending the atrocity against black people. Hochschild narrows it down to three things collectively peculiar to Britain: a free press, the improvement of highways with a parallel increase in ease of travel, and a diabolical phenomenon called "impressment."

What was impressment? It was slavery for men. Regardless of color, social status or financial ability, the owner of a penis and testicles, if he was found on the wrong street at the wrong time by the wrong group of armed men in service to the wrong empire, would be pressed into "service" in the mightiest navy the world had yet seen, to fight however near or far "king and country" needed him to. Hochschild makes a distinction between impressment and modern-day drafts by pointing out that at least in modern times, drafts are approved through bureaucracies maintained in part by modern-day men and women who have access to the polls.

Big fucking deal. The only difference I see is that you're less likely to be flogged for deserting this modern form of enslavement. You are not less likely to escape imprisonment or even social scorn for doing so. You are also not at all likely to be a woman: "The Royal Navy could rule the waves only because it was far bigger than any other fleet, and it expanded with every conflict throughout this era of battling empires; during the Napoleonic Wars, it would reach a peak of nearly 1,000 ships and more than 140,000 men [pp. 222-223]." One third to half of those "serving" in this navy were forced at gunpoint, at the end of a whip, and at the mercy of a number of infectious diseases, poor sanitation, cramped quarters, malnutrition, and the odd bullet or cannonball.

All of them were men.

All of them were utilitarian.

All of them were disposable.

All of them are dead.

All of them, when they were alive, had eyes to see, as the representation of Jesus in "The Passion of the Christ" could see, when standing in front of a drunken King Herod, the cast-down eyes of a black slave. The same thing was happening. To male and female slaves, it was happening because of their skin color. To British males, it was happening because they were men wandering around outside. To British women, nothing nearly as horrible was happening.

It reminds me of yet another movie, "Saving Private Ryan." The only shot we see of Private Ryan's mother, who is given no lines (That bastard Spielberg!), is when she collapses on her front porch after a telegram is delivered with the news that three of her four sons are dead. Heartbreaking, indeed, which is why I think a lot more people should be listening to Cindy Sheehan. But I'm left thinking to myself: DID ANYBODY HAPPEN TO BE WATCHING THE FIRST TWENTY MINUTES OF THIS MOVIE??!!

Spielberg did something virtually unprecedented in war movies: no set shots; no carefully timed explosions. It was all over the place: the body parts, the fallen men, the bullets whizzing past, the explosions, the blasted sand, the barbed wire, the flame-throwing, the random, spontaneous executions, the drowning, the blood, and the one image that sticks in my mind (since I only ever saw it once and will never see it again), row after row of men in an amphibious landing craft mowed down by machine guns fired by other men as the door of the craft drops down to the sand.

That's how disposable we are. Collapse on your porch over that.

People outside the men's movement need to understand that we are not in competition for sympathy here. We are trying to point out the painfully obvious, for anyone who cares to dismiss the concerns of feminists, which, compared to what countless men have had to go through, are everywhere and in every way thoroughly trivial or nonexistent.

Women never were and never will be thought of as being disposable. Why is that? It is, I believe, simply because we are aware, at some primal level, that it takes an awfully long time for a human female to produce a single, viable human being, whether male or female. It takes a man a few glorious, headboard-banging seconds to do his part. If he's healthy with a high enough libido, he can "manage it" more than once a day, and would undoubtedly be more than happy to oblige. It takes one man to impregnate several women in one day. We have more than enough men to get "the job" done.

Somewhere, in the back of her mind, while standing on deck, soaking in the sun, and noticing on her particular ship that the slaves "experienced the utmost kindness and care [her own words]," I suspect that Mrs. Falconbridge knew this. She could safely sail and flirt, be bitterly disappointed that her ship was supposedly yet remarkably free of the horror accompanying so many other slave ships, and disembark to a new life brought to her by her brand new husband, whom she married three weeks after her alcoholic husband drank himself to death on page 212.

Mr. Hochschild, I'm not done with your wonderful book, but please get back to writing about the end of this wretched system of coercion. I'm tired of hearing about the complaints of pampered pets. When they are someday able to tell me of the weird feeling they felt in the pits of their stomachs on that fateful day after turning 18 when they walked off to the post office, be sure to let me know.

An open letter to Richard Cohen of the SPLC

Re: Identification of A Voice For Men as a Misogynist Web Site
Dear Mr. Cohen,

Yesterday I received the unfortunate news that your organization, the Southern Poverty Law Center ("SPLC") listed my website, avoiceformen.com, among others, as misogynistic, or "woman-hating." This description is found in "Intelligence Report, Spring 2012, Issue Number: 145," on your website at http://www.splcenter.org/get-informed/intelligence-report/browse-all-issues/2012/spring/misogyny-the-sites.

Specifically, your report states the following:

> A Voice for Men is essentially a mouthpiece for its editor, Paul Elam, who proposes to "expose misandry [hatred of men] on all levels in our culture." Elam tosses down the gauntlet in his mission statement: "AVfM regards feminists, manginas [a derisive term for weak men], white knights [a similar derisive term, for males who identify as feminists] and other agents of misandry as a social malignancy. We do not consider them well intentioned or honest agents for their purported goals and extend to them no more courtesy or consideration than we would clansmen [sic], skinheads, neo Nazis or other purveyors of hate." Register-Her.com, an affiliated website that vilifies women by name who have made supposedly false rape allegations (among other crimes against masculinity), is one of Elam's signature "anti-hate" efforts. "Why are these women not in prison?" the site asks.

The excerpts you have chosen from these sites are taken out of context and misrepresent the goals of A Voice For Men ("AVfM") and Register-Her. Contrary to what readers of your site may be led to believe, the goals of SPLC and AVfM are quite similar: We both work to identify groups who seek to oppress others, and inform the public of the inequities they would perpetuate. If you would allow me to do so, I would like to clear up some misconceptions about AVfM so that SPLC and its supporters can reconsider their view of my service.

A Voice for Men has more than 90 registered contributors. Similar to the supporters of SPLC, AVfM's contributors are male and female, Black, White, Hispanic and Asian; gay and straight; Jew, Atheist and Christian; from all points of the political spectrum; and they all hail from many different nations across the planet. We invite even more diversity. All of our contributors share a common interest and concern in the affairs of men and boys. They speak to the issues autonomously – not as a mouthpiece for the editor. I regularly find AVfM publishing content I do not wholly agree with, or stated in terms that I personally would not necessarily use. However, it is not my role to impose a uniform voice upon AVfM's contributors – my role is to ensure that the site furthers its purpose of speaking truth to power.

The work of AVfM is vital and, despite what you may think, not dissimilar from the goals and aims of the SPLC. The beneficiaries of SPLC's labors are more likely than not to be men. Men and boys face very serious problems in modern society. Men are more likely than women to be homeless, on society's bottom rungs.[1] Men are more likely than women to commit suicide, as well.[2] America's exploding prison population, which overwhelmingly includes and victimizes the working class and new poor, contains more than 2 million people, but under 100,000 women.[3] This disparity has had profound effects on African-American men, as more of them are incarcerated than in post-secondary education.[4] Young men, ignorant rather than criminal, are placed on lifelong sex offender registries that prevent them from obtaining education and even healthcare, and ensuring that they will never contribute to society.[5] Relatedly, male attendance in higher education has fallen to 40% and continues to diminish,[6] and men lag far behind women in obtaining advanced degrees.[7] The performance of boys in our grade, middle and high schools is deteriorating. Meanwhile, men have become a minority in the workforce, ensuring their further social and economic marginalization, as well as any hope of upward economic mobility.[8]

Men face additional disparities in selective service, reproductive rights, healthcare funding, and many other areas. These differences are documented and undeniable. While society once rallied around the right of a woman to control whether she has a child – an the economic consequences it carries – there is no concomitant outcry to ensure men are not laden with the lifelong obligation of another human being. While the NFL is awash with pink every October to raise awareness for breast cancer, nary a mention is made of its equally lethal male-only cousin, prostate cancer.[9] The examples are endless. These are problems that must be addressed in a just society. Sadly, until now, it would seem to have been in the purview of SPLC to help ameliorate these problems, not aggravate them.

I also believe you may have misunderstood some of AVfM's semantics. A "white knight" is an expression describing a traditional male, one who practices chivalry to a degree that is irrational and demeaning in this day and age. Also, the term "mangina" is not a euphemism for "weak men," but rather a label for men who enable and excuse female misconduct – ranging from physical violence to exculpatory false reporting of crimes[10] – solely because the offender is female (and to gain women's approval).

Regarding Register-Her.com, SPLC states the following:

> "Register-Her.com, an affiliated website that vilifies women by name who have made supposedly false rape allegations (among other crimes against masculinity), is one of Elam's signature 'anti-hate' efforts."

To the contrary, all of the offenders on Register-Her.com who have been placed there for making false allegations have either 1) had the falsity of their claims proven in a court of law, or 2) publicly recanted their false police reports. All of these actions are a part of public record. There is nothing "supposed" about these false rape accusations.

Curiously, though, SPLC has not taken any sort of stand on websites like RadFemHub.com, which openly advocates the extermination of males (including male infants), eugenics and sex-specific child abuse. Perhaps these outlets may warrant further examination, and treatment from the SPLC as sources of Misandry.

The movement for civil and socioeconomic equality in America was and is difficult, and spans both racial and class lines. For many years the majority resisted progress, but found that nothing could stem the human desire for civil liberty; Not slavery, not Jim Crow, not water cannons or batons or even bullets. While the SPLC has done good work for the cause of equality across incomes and races, it was not lawyers and arms-length activists that took the brunt of standing up to an unjust system. It was the men and women on the street that would not be bullied any more that forced the world to change. That world was as hostilely indifferent to the struggles of African-Americans as you appear to be to the struggles of men and boys.

There are hundreds of websites dedicated to real, actual hate on the Internet, with more springing up all the time. AVFM, a human rights organization, is not one of them. Nor are the others that you identify as sources of misogyny, such as The Spearhead and the False Rape Society. Those who fear truth, and brand it as hatred and bigotry, hide behind the worst kind of cowardice – the sniveling complacency that for generations allowed the rich to starve the poor, for one person to own another because of the color of their skin, and for the officers at Nuremberg to claim they were "just following orders." For men and boys, there is no more time for complacency.

It is no surprise that a movement like AVfM's began on the internet, as the free flow of information finally made it possible for men to see what they had long suspected: The laws and norms of society had turned against them. This movement will grow, as it has since its inception, and the time will come when the SPLC (and other groups) must admit our fundamental similarities and aspirations. I am inviting you, with open arms, to do just that.

The alternative, I fear, is that you come down on the wrong side of history, with the likes of Dred Scott as your legacy.

Sincerely,

Paul Elam

Mississippi State students forced to “Walk a Mile in Her Shoes”

Robert O'Hara · 10 March 2012 · Archived copy · Original

(Washington D.C. Mar 10, 2012 AVFM News) On Monday, March 5th, hundreds of male students donned high heel shoes and marched on the campus of Mississippi State University in the second annual Walk a Mile In Her Shoes event sponsored by MSU’s Sexual Assault Services Office. Billed as an event in which men march to end sexual assault, the event is only one of many such events held around the world which are promoted by Venture Humanity Inc., a California nonprofit organization.

“Each year, an ever-increasing number of men, women and their families are joining the Walk a Mile in Her Shoes. The International Men’s March to Stop Rape, Sexual Assault & Gender Violence. A Walk a Mile in Her Shoes Event is a playful opportunity for men to raise awareness in their community about the serious causes, effects and remediation to sexualized violence.” the home page of walkamileinhershoes.org states, clearly implying that this is an all volunteer effort my men everywhere to combat sexual violence.

But the event on Monday was not playful and it is ambiguous how by wearing high heel shoes men would do anything to help genuine victims of sexual assault. It was also anything but voluntary and “Raising Awareness” in this case meant administrative and social coercion of male students, almost exclusivity from the Greek community, to participate as well as distributing literature and raising more money.

The crowd of marching men were subjected to demeaning slurs from the crowd of onlookers and given hand written notes from members of a virtually all female audience implying their complicity in the supposed sexual assault epidemic.“Female students stood on the side lines. Over 400 male students wore heals and walked in a 1/4 mile circle, four times while the female students stood and watched, mostly smiling and some were laughing.

Also, they had a female student model walk in front of the formation with the 400+ men following her. She is a member of the fashion board; there were lots of female students from the fashion board at the event. The men who followed her were mostly in heels and about half of them were carrying signs that said things like, “Rape Hurts Us All.’

‘There were several men in suits who talked on the microphone and reported the 1-in-4 rape statistic, among many other false statistics. One statistic that I heard several times was that women are more likely to be victims of non-lethal intimate partner violence than men. They never said anything about lethal intimate partner violence. Apparently there must have been a tie between men and women when it came to lethal intimate partner violence so they just ignore that statistic and only talk about non-lethal intimate partner violence.” said an MSU engineering student who wished to remain anonymous.

An active MRA on the same campus made videos about the Clothesline Project, another event organized by the Sexual Assault Services Office, in which tee shirts upon which slogans were written such as “33% of all women will be raped in their lifetime” and “Daddy why did you steal my innocence” were hung on the quad.

The Sexual Assault Services Office, part of the Division of Relationship Violence and Outreach at MSU is one of the most energetic administrative entities of it’s kind in higher education. In April of last year the MSU student newspaper, The Reflector, reported that the SAS office received a competitive grant from the Justice Department’s Office of Violence Against Women. The $300,000 grant named the “Campus Grant Program” is one of twenty one competitive grants distributed by the OVAW who’s recipients are given broad discretion on how to use the funds. There are generous provisions for the increase of salaries, benefits and travel expenses to any recipient organization. The purpose of the grant is outlined by the OVAW as follows:

“The Grants to Reduce Domestic Violence, Dating Violence, Sexual Assault, and Stalking on Campus Program (Campus Program) encourages institutions of higher education to adopt comprehensive, coordinated responses to domestic violence, dating violence, sexual assault, and stalking. Campuses, in partnership with community-based nonprofit victim advocacy organizations and local criminal justice or civil legal agencies, must adopt protocols and policies that treat violence against women as a serious offense and develop victim service programs that ensure victim safety, offender accountability, and the prevention of such crimes."

In other words the grant was not only an income booster for personnel but also a source of money for both law enforcement organizations like the campus police who, curiously, were required to wear high heel shoes as well, and other non profit organizations like The Clothesline Project and Walk a Mile In Her Shoes. The efforts of these organizations are ostensibly aimed at "raising awareness" of sexual assault.

On the condition of anonymity a member of a participating fraternity spoke with AVFM about the event. He said that the Intra Fraternity Council (IFC), an administrative body who enforces rules and guidelines set both within the Greek community itself and by the school administration evoked a "Standards Requirement," imposed to ensure a participation rate of at least 80% for all fraternities. Consequences for non-compliance of this requirement include revocation of privileges for individual fraternity members as well as suspension or termination of a fraternity's charter.

"People seemed to get hostile when topics came up like 'hey don't you think that this is weird or wrong' and the reaction would be like 'hey, what are you implying? there isn't anything weird or wrong about rape?' Said the student who indicated that there was an extreme amount of social coercion as well as administrative pressure to participate in the event.

"Its ridiculous, its humiliating" said the student. "I think that it doesn't serve the purpose that it's meant to serve, I think that it is more or less of a shaming tactic aimed at humiliating instead of teaching someone a lesson and if they are trying to teach a lesson what lesson would that be? You are taking gentlemen, basically, who care about women and care about women feeling better about themselves and their safety and you are making them humiliate themselves for the benefit of what? Not all men are rapists but that is basically the message that an event like this conveys. Even the thought of that if you take a step back is preposterous that all men are rapists."

When asked how he felt about the other activities going on on campus initiated by the SAS office he said: "I have seen things posted around campus all throughout the year like the 'one in four women will be raped in their lifetime' statistic which shocks me because of all the girls I know only one says they've been raped and I think that is bazaar." The student went on to describe fliers that were posted in the bathroom stalls of the building where he took most of his classes distributed by the SAS office. "That implies to me like someone saying 'hey you, taking a piss right now, look at what we are posting right now you shouldn't rape people.'"

He would be correct in thinking that not all men at MSU were rapists. According to annual Campus Police reports there have only been four reported rapes from 2005 to 2010. This on a campus who's fall enrollment was between 15,000 and 20,000 students during that time period roughly half of whom were female. Rape, by far, is the least common violent crime reported.

Figures like these didn't deter the SAS office from inviting Venture Humanity Inc. to endorse a Walk a Mile In Her Shoes event at MSU. Venture Humanity requires a licensing fee of $125 dollars for every event and has copyrighted its name. Merchandise is also available and you are encouraged to buy signs and other materials from the online store. "What started out as a small group of men daring to totter around a park has grown to become a world-wide movement with tens of thousands of men raising millions of dollars for local rape crisis centers, domestic violence shelters and other sexualized violence education, prevention and remediation programs." boasts their website which also collects donations.

Shoes, however, are key. An outfit called Le Dame Footwear, a distributor without a storefront located in a residential neighborhood in Verona Wisconsin, just outside Madison, is the official provider for these events. Specializing in over sized feminine footwear, they boast the ability to provide shoes for an impressive women's sizes 10 ½ to 17 (wide) or a men's size 9 to 15 (medium). The owner of Le Dame Footwear, Bernie J. Fatla, was recently elected to the board of directors of Venture Humanity Inc.

“Le Dame Footwear has been providing shoes for these walks at a significant discount to the participating organizations as part of their effort to promote this cause. Le Dame Foot ware also makes an annual donation to Walk a Mile Organization based on the total number of pairs of the “Natilie” sold.” Le Dame’s press release concerning Fatla’s ascension to the board states. The “Natile” being a popular model of shoe provided by the company supposedly designed just for this event selling for $92.99.

The shoes provided for the event at MSU were paid for by the SAS Office.

In correspondence with AVFM News in which one source described the humiliating signs the male students were required to carry and the taunts they received from onlooking female students he provided a copy of the attached “Pledge to End Sexual Violence.” “”The Pledge” involved men in suits standing before a microphone reading the pledge on that slip of paper I am attaching. Hundreds of men repeated the words of that pledge before on-looking college girls.” said one student. “This is just wrong, Bob. It’s plain wrong. I want these types of rallies to disappear from this college.”

Over one hundred Walk a Mile in Her Shoes events are planned so far according to the sites schedule of events. Most of which are on college campuses.

SPLC: A poverty of integrity

Paul Elam · 10 March 2012 · Archived copy · Original

As most of you are undoubtedly aware, the Southern Poverty Law Center (SPLC) recently posted a rash of articles that constituted a malicious and misleading attack on the men's rights movement. As publisher of AVfM, and one of the identified targets of the attacks, I penned a response and addressed it to SPLC president Richard Cohen.

Now that their initial accusations have been refuted, and much of their misinformation corrected, it is time to present an overview of recent events for the benefit of MRAs, and for those who are still unclear about the intent of our work, especially as it relates to this website.

The first order of business is to clarify that the letter written to Cohen was not intended for his benefit, but for the education of those under the false impression that SPLC is the same civil rights organization it was thirty years ago. By that I mean before it devolved into a gang of ideological hooligans whose stock-in-trade is to harass and demonize – not actual hate groups, but anyone who embraces a worldview different from their own.

There is an abundance of other information about SPLC, both in regards to their alleged misuse of power, and the personal conduct their founder and Chief Trial Attorney, Morris Dees. We will get to that in upcoming articles, but for now we will remain focused on their recent attacks; their alleged purpose, and, of course, what all this is actually about.

The initial attack.

The SPLC, which as some point was a trusted source of intelligence on actual hate organizations, and whose intelligence gathering is still forwarded to law enforcement agencies, published an article on the "manosphere," identifying 12 of allegedly hundreds of blogs and websites that they tagged as "woman hating" and "misogynistic." There were actually 13 sites referenced, including register-her.com, which was included in their mention of avoiceformen.com.

Their justification for alleging hate activity from the sites and individuals running them was broadly defined. Individuals like Roosh (rooshvforum.com) was targeted because he had sex with women and did not call them back. The False Rape Society was attacked for posting news stories about false rape accusations, and for making a critical observation about a Michelle Bachmann supporter's undeniably sexist statement, "It takes a woman to get the job done."

This website is bashed for not being more tolerant of bigots, and register-her.com is demonized for posting already public information about known criminals and, ironically, agents of hate.

Marky Mark is criticized for being unhappy, financially challenged and in poor health; still others are vilified for not wanting to marry western women. Finally, of course, The Counter-Feminist is taken to task for countering feminism.

They found even less to criticize about Stop Abusive and Violent Environments (S.A.V.E.), a domestic violence advocacy organization, so they just lied, saying that S.A.V.E. was engaged in "lobbying to roll back services for victims of domestic abuse and penalties for their tormentors."

There were some quotes from the targeted sites that indeed appeared angry, especially as they related to western women. Nothing however, that rose past the level of common and socially "acceptable" sentiments about men. e. g. "Men are pigs," and "Boys are stupid, throw rocks at them."

Their level of incredulity was certified – that of being on par with fundamentalists trying desperately to locate a message from Satan in a Mötley Crüe album – by the fact that they listed someone named "Manboobz" as their source of information. Also, since the article was published, Radfemhub.com, a website known to actively push for violent means to achieve bigoted political goals, has started fundraising on their behalf.

What it was really about.

At some point, arguably, it was actually the SPLC mission to identify and track the activities of organizations engaged in hateful agendas. Whatever time that was now appears to have passed. What remains is a group of postmodern thugs, using the pretense of their former purpose, and substantial political clout, to target individuals and groups who do not fit the left-wing worldview of their leadership. They have targeted "family values" organizations as hateful for opposing gay marriage and for taking what SPLC determines is the incorrect position on issues like "Don't ask, don't tell," in the military. They were instrumental in forcing the ouster of Lou Dobbs from CNN because they didn't like his views, and now, in a complete departure from whatever legitimacy they once possessed, they target men's groups as hateful threats for saying they don't want to marry, for not following sex with a commitment and for reporting on news stories already a matter of public record. It creates for them a level of embarrassment so profound that they can only be blinded to it by hubris.

I don't personally oppose gay marriage, nor would I ban gays from the military, nor am I a fan of Lou Dobbs. However, I would consider any of these much more palatable options than the demagoguery SPLC now employs to force their beliefs on the world.

And this is precisely what this effort by SPLC is about. It is to shut you up; to intimidate you out of speaking truth in the face of corrupt power, and to use the threat of social disapproval and the proxy violence of police agencies to get the job done.

Taking it to the next level.

In a follow up article to the first one, SPLC ups the ante considerably. In doing so they tip their hand by loosely alleging that two of their primary targets, yours truly and this website, are somehow connected to acts of violence by psychotic, deranged killers.

Their strategy was as simple as it was ineffective. Essentially, they talked a lot about the manosphere and tossed in the occasional reference to a killer, e.g. Scott Dekraii. There is no connection at all between the men's advocates they are attacking and the killers named, mind you, but they wanted to leave readers with the impression that there is. Essentially, they peed in the swimming pool and called it an exposé on dirty water.

This theme was repeated regularly throughout the article, with one additional ploy for effect. They trotted out Amanda Marcotte to tell us that being put on register-her.com – for being the complete sexist pig that she is – has scared her away from writing about MRA's as much as she used to.

"[T]hey're so doggedly mean," she says, "It becomes frightening after a while." One can almost see her eyelashes flutter as she touches the back of her hand to her forehead.

And there you have it, folks. Take a group of activists addressing issues that affect men and boys, place them next to a bunch of unrelated psycho killers, then toss in the powerless wailing of a victim card shark, and presto-change-o, an intelligence report on hate groups materializes courtesy of SPLC and their ace informant, Manboobz.

What feminists and the SPLC will get from this.

Exactly squat. Only less than that. By trying to go on the attack in this fashion, these people not only appear foolish and paranoid, they reveal a fundamental lack of understanding about the MRM and why it exists. Sure, they may scare a few people away (I heard Alcuin pulled the plug on his blog). That is hardly a real loss any more than it would be real loss if this site were to be taken down.

There is a men's movement, like it or not, and it will continue to grow and become more strident as long as the marginalization of and discrimination against men and boys persists.

Many feminists don't believe that the discrimination is happening. They are too entrenched in the fantasy that all men are privileged by default. Some of them know it is happening and want it to continue. All of them want us to shut up about it and just take it. You can even see it in their articles, from which I paraphrase. "Well, they have some legit complaints, but…" "Yes, there are problems that need to be addressed, however…."

We are done with "but" and "however." And we are done with them for good. We are through with the hatred being piling on us and our sons. You will not change that by attacking a dozen websites with implied threats and a truckload of lies. Even a cursory glance at what SPLC once was ought to tell you that empty words, threats and intimidation only create more dissent and more resolve. And it has.

We are not going anywhere, so you better get used to it. Why? Because we are, in the most literal way, a grassroots movement. This is not a movement orchestrated with money from elitists and calculated by insulated academic doctrinaires. It is happening across the world, from the soushoku danshi in Japan, to MGTOW's and MRA's in the west, to the men's organization of India, to fathers groups spanning the globe.

This is all happening because there is a need for it to happen; because men and boys are suffering, falling out of education, employment, losing their rights and because the world is largely blind and indifferent to it. Or worse, because too many people count on it and celebrate it, tragically mistaking it as necessary for the advancement of women.

If you want to help fix the problem, then pull your entitled heads out of the darkness and face the truth. Quit deluding yourselves that we want to revert to women being in the kitchen or that we are pining for some fantasy of patriarchal power of old, or that we are pro-rape, pro-violence or pro anything other than pro-justice.

Quit feeding those lies to the public, and quit feeding them to yourselves. Or, if you insist, maintain that diet for all you are worth. Eventually you will choke on it.

And we will still be here, stronger because of you.

Are you man enough?

John Hembling (JtO) · 11 March 2012 · Archived copy · Original

A few weeks ago, I was emailed by a young man attending university in the United States, concerning a public awareness and fundraising campaign being organized on the campus of his university. He witnessed the same event the previous year, and knew from experience that although this event is promoted as being supportive of a demographic associated with victimization of domestic abuse, the shape this victim support takes is in the public vilification and ritual humiliation of an entire biological demographic, based on a false, but popularized public conception of domestic abuse.

Men, the politically correct narrative tells us, are the abusers, the predators, and the violent. Women, that same narrative states, are the victims. This is the message repeated both subtly and blatantly by professionally produced public service announcements filling media channels on television, radio, magazines, public print advertising, and everywhere else advertising can be found. Men are violent! Women are victims!

This is the message drilled into us until it occupies the totality of our conception of what domestic violence is – just that, men beating on women – and sometimes, men also beating on children.

This message is false.

The majority of valid peer-reviewed research on domestic violence indicates that sexually directional violence, from men to women, or indeed, violence from women to men is false. Domestic violence is not sexually specific.

In domestic violence, women are as violent or more violent than their male spouses or partners [1][2][3][4]. This is universally known within DV reporting and service agencies, because it is clearly demonstrated in the peer reviewed research on the topic. In fact, within the domain of academic and public specializations addressing the phenomenon of domestic violence, there is a culture of ideological bias, manifesting as systematic dishonesty. This was studied and documented by Dr. Murray Strauss, Ph.D. Co-Director of the Family Research Laboratory at the University of New Hampshire in his 2007 paper "Processes Explaining the Concealment and Distortion of Evidence on Gender Symmetry in Partner Violence."[5]

Erin Pizzey, the founder of the first women's shelter in the UK stated in 2001:

> If you come from a dysfunctional, violent, and sexually abusive family, how do you learn? Therefore, domestic violence can't be a gender issue, it can't be just men, because we girls – and I was from one of those families – are just as badly affected.[6]

When Pizzey published this observation, noting that many women emerging from violent relationships were just as violent and abusive as the men they were apparently fleeing – she was blacklisted and threatened with murder by radical feminists who had taken over the shelter movement she started. Pizzey was forced to leave her own country due to persistent threats that she would be murdered for publishing the truth.

Her extensive and direct experience is confirmed by Martin Fiebert's research at California State University in Long Beach.

"…women are as physically aggressive, or more aggressive, than men in their relationships with their spouses or male partners."[1]

The advocates, and salaried employees of the domestic violence grievance industry are not confused or mistaken or ill informed when they state categorically that violence is gendered. They are lying. The reason for this lie is that women-as-victims creates a sympathetic story tugging on everyone's emotions and providing easy access to everybody's wallets for donations. The more nuanced truth, that partner violence is committed by men and women more or less equally, and that abuse impacts men and women more or less equally, well that doesn't quite create the warm fuzzy glow when making a donation, or the instant, visceral rage at that mythological evil male – pictured in everybody's imagination, pummeling some sweetly innocent and decorative feminine victim.

The truth doesn't make the Domestic Violence industry as much money. In addition, for all those working in this industry, if they actually managed to significantly reduce domestic violence, they'd put themselves out of work. This is why they focus only on the narrative that DV is simply evil men, abusing innocent female victims. However, in the real world, where violence happens reciprocally, where women and men abuse each other within violent relationships, trying to combat domestic violence with a focus on only half the participants is like trying to extinguish a structure fire by spraying water on only the north and east facing walls, and letting the south and west facing walls burn freely.

The DV industry does not want to stop domestic violence, in fact their strategies to reduce it are calculated to foster and continue the problem, because as long as there's more human damage occurring in the real world, their funding and careers are secure.

That's why campaigns to "raise awareness" against domestic violence on university campuses – such as "walk a mile in her shoes" are a sham. The event my friend emailed me about is actually an anti-male hate rally. Male students at his university were required to purchase women's shoes in their own size, and on the day of the event, required to walk a mile across the university's campus to the laughter and jeering of spectators.

These students at a university, paying tuition to secure their own education, forced by the university to participate in their own public shaming, because according to the accepted narrative, men are violent abusers.

I have written to the school's administration suggesting that the event be made more inclusive and multicultural. Jewish students could be made to wear a yellow cloth star of David, pinned to their jackets as they marched across campus, and gay students identified by a pink triangle, sewn onto their work smocks as they too joined the parade.

Leading up to this "walk a mile in her shoes" event, a flier appeared on public bulletin boards around the school's campus, which encouraged men to acknowledge the shared guilt and natural evil of males, and to pledge obedience to the correct doctrine of atonement for violence they might or might not have ever had any part of.

"Are you man enough.....

Most men don't rape, men can help

I pledge to end sexual violence

I understand that rape is about power, control and violence.

I know that if a woman is sending me mixed signals, I should just ask her what she wants.

I am saddened by the fact that more than 70% of rapes are not reported.

I know that the overwhelming number of perpetrators of sexual violence are men.

I promise if I see a woman in danger, I will speak up for her.

I realize that a rape occurs every 40 seconds in this country.

I Pledge:

To never commit, condone, or remain silent about sexual violence

To challenge other men to recognize that they can be powerful without making others powerless.

As a “REAL MAN” I know that it is part of my duty to create a safer place for our mothers, sisters, friends, lovers and daughters. “

I re-wrote this flier, to represent a more realistic view of reality, and emailed the corrected version, to my friend for printing and distribution on campus. My version reads as follows:

Are you man enough...

See that question? That implication that unless you conform, your manhood is in doubt. That is straight-up mind-control being played on you by people with their own interests in mind.

Most Men don’t rape, All men can help

Oh, most don’t, there’s a sop to your ego, you might be one of the good men, not one of those “bad men” But in order to prove to those judging you a “real man” which of these types of slave you are, here’s a list of things for you to pledge allegiance to.

I pledge to end sexual violence.In order to do this, I must pretend that sexual violence is directional. This is the lie regularly sold by the grievance industry, but it’s false, and the experts know it. I must pretend too, to be a “good man”.

I understand that rape-culture is a fiction built to exert shame, control and violence against men. But to be a “good man” I will play along, while I, my sons and friends are criminalized and emotionally extorted.

I know that if a woman sends me mixed signals, I should walk away, refusing to be manipulated by this culturally accepted lack of personal accountability.

I am annoyed by the obvious fraud in the claim that more than 70% of rapes are not reported.Unreported events are unknown and un-tracked, thus claims of their prevalence are pure imagination.

I know the claim that the overwhelming majority of perpetrators of sexual violence are men is fraud, and runs contrary to methodologically valid research on this topic. I also know that women-as-victim is the story generating maximum sympathy and donation, so that remains the approved narrative.

I promise if I see a woman in danger, I will evaluate potential risk to myself before taking any other action, because I am a human being with innate value beyond my disposable utility to a woman as a dispenser or receptacle of violence.

I realize that the claim of rape occurring every [blank] number seconds in this country is pure hype telling nothing of actual rates of criminal victimization, also, according to the Bureau of Justice Statistics, men are the overwhelming majority of victims of violent crime, and rape and sexual assault are committed at the lowest rate of all violent crimes tracked by the BJS.

I pledge

To not be manipulated into accepting violence against myself, or commit violence on anyone else’s behalf except in defense of myself or my loved ones, or as dictated by my own clear conscience and faculties of reason.

To challenge other men to recognize that they are not evil by virtue of being male, and deserve no shame or mistreatment based on the fabricated mythology of innate male evil and female victimhood.

I am a REAL MAN by my own definition, and nobody besides myself has any right to force another definition on me, or require my risk or sacrifice in service of their agenda.

I know that discussions of my duty are a trap and a sham in this culture which discounts my humanity but values only my utility. I also know that our mothers, sisters, friends, lovers and daughters – if they attempt to use shame to force obedience or compliance or agreement with a narrative of male evil and female victimhood are deluded by a false narrative affording them privilege at the expense of my humanity. I will therefore reject any valuation of myself that discounts my humanity.

Fear and Loathing

I have become accustomed to accusations of hatred of women by people, who are either intellectually lazy or dishonest or confused about what I say in my blogging and writing. I have always seen these accusations as a sort of surrender from people I'll call my philosophical opponents.

In debate over ideas, accusations of bad character, bad hygiene or bad ju-ju are nothing new for debaters unable or unwilling to address what's actually being argued. I have thought too that the difference between a rational argument and groundless insult of character was glaringly evident to observers. When certain self identified radical proponents of a view I find unethical have habitually heaped accusations on me, ranging from sexual impotence, personal unattractiveness and deviant behavior – I've dismissed those insults and accusations, confident that those actors only painted themselves into an increasingly narrow corner of implausibility.

However, as many people are already aware, a high profile organization with an established reputation as proponents of human rights and opponents of bigotry and prejudice has recently announced that a movement I am a part of – along with a collection of other movements and organizations, advocates or promotes hate. This was the Southern Poverty Law Center.

Thankfully, several respected publications and channels have publicly objected to the recent pronouncements of the SPLC – confirming, for me anyway, that I have not woken up the only sane human being on a bizarro planet of the demented. Included in the protest were the American Spectator[1] and Reason Magazine[2] who both called baloney on the SPLC's new list; Reason-Magazine doing so in several articles including the perfectly titled Fearmongering at the SPLC.

However, the repeated justification for inclusion of writing within the men's rights movement in a list of hate groups is that such writing frequently takes an openly oppositional position to an ideology calling itself, in various forms and flavors: feminism.

If you believe feminism represents a movement seeking equality of human rights between women and men, then a movement in opposition to it might indeed seem misogynistic. Misogyny is, of course, the most common argument against human rights advocates arguing that men are mistreated by the nation's family courts, sentenced unequally in criminal courts, characterized as either buffoons or villains by most media, and variously marginalized, shamed, silenced, and told to shut up, man up, and get back to protecting, providing, and dying when convenient.

Arguments for fair treatment in the courts, the workplace the education system and elsewhere are, by this logic, transmuted in oppositional commentary as hatred of women.

This is why in my own writing, my answer to accusations of misogyny (the hatred of women) is to explain, as to a child, that a group of people (women) and an ideology (feminism) are not actually the same thing, and that opposition to an ideology, particularly one based on hatred or violence – does not translate to hatred of women.

However, this all depends on a shared understanding of just what is encompassed by that most flexible of labels: feminism. If a reader equates feminism with women's rights, then opposition to it is logically an argument against women's rights. Clarity of understanding of just what anybody means when using the F-word (feminism) is hindered by the reality that widely different philosophical positions all use the word feminism to identify themselves. To any proponent of any of these ideologies – they likely appear so widely different that shared use of the feminist brand name presents no problem, however, to an outsider, and subscriber to none, the differences can appear superficial at best.

This is not simply a problem of which is the real feminism – as all these variations are arguably real, but also a question of who is at the politically potent centre, and who occupies the fringe of this thing we all rather sloppily call feminism. This can be answered in two ways. I know a number of men and women who self identify as feminists, and whose activist goals, although not identical to mine, point in the same direction. That is to say: the pursuit of equality of legal rights and opportunities in employment, education, representation, and protection from harm under the law. Their goals are largely the same as mine, and although they might not use my nomenclature – for clarity in this discussion I will call them humanist feminists. Another group, or set of groups, also calling themselves feminists have a decidedly different list of objectives and these goals are – from my point of view – monstrous.

The reduction of men to a tiny fraction of the population through eugenics. The eradication of human rights for "male animals". The de-coupling of "human society" from "male society" to create a feminine utopia free from "male predation". Male targeting infanticide, sexually selective abortion and so on.

These feminists call themselves radical, and it's easy to take that word as a synonym for absurd. However, the usage intended is based on the classical Latin verb radicalis, which means "of roots".

Radical feminism then can be better understood by calling it a feminism pursuing replacement of the fundamental root and branches of the basic tenets of human society. The proponents of this particular flavor of the ideology being similar in character to fundamentalist adherents of an Abrahamic religion, substituting the writings of Dworkin and Solanas for the holy writings of early desert dwelling religionists.

Because of the rabid and often overtly violent tone of radical feminist rhetoric, the public conception of radical feminists has been that they were fringe elements, barely functional, unemployable wing-nuts, living in cat-filled apartments, and subsisting on food stamps; or naive, but equally fanatical freshman women's studies students who after graduation and contact with the real world – we all expect will grow up and stop being such idiots.

These radicals are obviously at the fringe, and "mainstream" feminism is the equality-seeking human rights movement which a number of my friends advocate.

That's what I used to think too.

In November of 2011, the news aggregator web site Reddit.com published a link to a radical feminist blog posting, calling for male-targeted eugenics, infanticide, direct violence against male children, and male-targeted sexually selective abortion. This by itself wasn't enough to draw community-wide attention and dismay; from lone-nut bloggers this type of violent rhetoric is not so unusual. However, rather than eliciting condemnation – the comment thread on this article took the author's suggestions of eugenics and hatred and doubled down, amplifying the enthusiasm for violence, murder, infanticide and psychological and physical abuse of children.

The savagery and hatred demonstrated in the comments thread led some human rights activists to inquire just who was advocating such a violent and hateful direction for the movement claimed by some to be nothing except "the radical notion that women are people."

When it turned out that the article's author was Simon and Schuster published novelist and former lawyer Pam O'Shaughnessy – and that the commentators taking calls for eugenics and murder to the next level of violent-and-crazy were tenured professors, child care workers, teachers, civil rights activists and other professionals internationally pre-eminent in their respective fields – a re-evaluation of radical feminism's apparent occupation of the fringe was necessary.

What came to light next was a collection of Swedish feminists producing and performing a stage adaptation of Valerie Solanas' SCUM manifesto for Swedish school children, and advertising their performance with a realistic staging of the execution-style murder of a newspaper reading man, followed by celebratory dancing and the text message "do your part".

The play, staged for school children, based on Solanas' published rant which in the opening paragraph calls for the extermination of the male species.

The incandescent hate which characterized Solanas' work was adapted for school children and advertized with the simulated murder of a man by 6 giggling women. Based on on-line Swedish language reporting, translated using Google – the play features on a Swedish national holiday called “Hetero Hate Day.” If I were properly multicultural, I might suggest the holiday be made more inclusive, extending it to a full weekend with the second day being Homosexual Hate Day. Unfortunately, I can’t really get behind hating people for their sexual preferences – or even for their arrangement of reproductive organs. I also can’t muster the energy to give much care for the levels of melanin in somebody’s skin, or whether they worship the appropriate diety. People with peanut allergies though, I really hate them. Passionately and with vigor.

After writing about Swedish murder cheerleaders and hetero-hate advocates, I, along with several other writers at AVfM wrote about a movement within the Australian civil service to craft legislation which appeared to have the purpose of stripping human rights from men, and propagandizing the factually false narrative used by the grievance industry that all domestic violence is male on female. This narrative is of course false, as the peer-reviewed research shows.[3][4][5][6][7] In domestic violence, “women are as violent or more violent than their male spouses or partners”.

Australia also hosted an international feminist conference called “the SCUM Conference” in late 2011, named in unambiguous reference to Solanas’ violent and furious anti-male hate literature.

But the radical feminists, the violent-and-crazy feminists driven by hatred, and arguably mental illness; we continue to think of them as the fringe, the ineffectual and the irrelevant. It is increasingly obvious that radical feminism is the potent, politically connected and central driver of change within feminism’s wider ambit. Humanist feminists, arguably far more numerous than their radical cousins – are sadly the ineffectual fringe.

Thus, opposition to feminism – without any prefix of “radical” or “violent” – is not an opposition to the human rights of women. However, due to ignorance of the power and tenacity of those we might instinctively relegate to the disregarded fringe, the general public still equates the label of feminism with a humanist, civil-rights movement.

The sloppy research identifying human rights activists as a hate movement and absence of due diligence by a formerly prestigious human rights organization whose principal active members are licensed legal professionals, on the other hand, is not excusable. The former prestige of the Southern Poverty Law Center is now shame. And it is deserved.

The new war on hate

Walter Romans (TDOM) · 13 March 2012 · Archived copy · Original

Hatred in the Name of Fighting Hatred

How the Southern Poverty Law Center became a Hate Group

In the 1950s and 60s the war on racism and sexism rose to its highest level since the American Civil War. A movement for social justice gained momentum, coalescing around the young, liberal, anti-war college crowd uniting them with anti-racists fighting to liberate Blacks, and a growing women's movement to eradicate institutionalized racism, sexism, and other forms of discrimination. The movement was so successful that within a couple of decades, nearly all vestiges of institutional racism and sexism were outlawed and racist groups in particular, were forced underground. By the end of the 1980s, the "southern man" debated and immortalized by Neil Young and Lynyrd Skynyrd was all but extinct.

Organizations like the Southern Poverty Law Center were instrumental in waging and winning that war. There were still battles to be fought, but these were on a much smaller scale. They mostly involved crimes committed by individuals that indicated that the fires of racial hatred weren't quite out. These crimes were dubbed "hate crimes" and organizations like the SPLC fought and lobbied to pass special legislation that dealt more harshly with "haters." In fact, today organizations like the SPLC continue to maintain relevance by waging these small battles against alleged haters. But in its struggle to remain relevant, the SPLC appears to have forgotten its raison d'être.

Recently the SPLC published and posted to its website an article railing against the misogyny it claims to have found in the men's movement. Arthur Goldwag's Leader's Suicide Brings Attention to Men's Rights Movement is everything the SPLC has opposed over the years. Goldwag uses scant evidence to argue that the leading bloggers active in the Men's Rights Movement (MRM) support and glorify violence against women and other forms of misogyny. To accomplish this, he uses examples of the worst kinds of atrocities and attempts to paint a wide range of men who he associates with the MRM as being supportive and representative of all men involved in the movement.

He begins with Thomas Ball, a man who believed he had been wronged by the Family Court system after having abused his daughter. After ten years of fighting to remain in his daughter's life, Ball self-immolated, leaving behind a rambling manifesto detailing his struggles and calling for revolutionary action. Although he is not the best example of fatherhood, nor of a man being wronged by the system, many in the MRM have held him out as a prime example of what can happen to a man whose rights have been consistently trampled. Ball has become their champion, not because he slapped his daughter, but because of the drastic action he felt forced into by an uncaring, unfeeling system that deprived him of his family the same way it has deprived a great many men of their families. Many men in the MRM have felt much the same way Ball must have felt before lighting himself on fire. By committing that act, Ball said the one thing that many men have wanted to say for a good portion of their lifetimes. What matters to these men is not whether or not Ball was crazy, not whether or not he was abusive, and not whether or not he was a misogynist. What matters is that he stood up and told the system to "fuck off." But Goldwag doesn't get this. Instead he focuses on Ball's alleged defects and chooses to believe that the men of the MRM idolize an abusive misogynist.

He later moves on to Anders Behring Breivik who gunned down 77 Norwegians, mostly teens, at a summer camp in June of 2011. Breivik was primarily upset with Muslim immigration and this was given as the primary reason for the shooting, but Goldwag links the MRM to him because he was an advocate for father's rights and quotes him as stating ""The most direct threat to the family is 'divorce on demand,'" he wrote in the manifesto he posted just before he began his deadly spree. "The system must be reformed so that the father will be awarded custody rights by default.""

Never mind that the radical feminists of the 1960s explicitly stated a goal of breaking up families and pushed no-fault divorce as a means to that end. Apparently opposition to feminist ideology is equivalent to misogyny and that is more than enough to condemn an entire movement for the actions of a single lunatic who was apparently more concerned with immigration issues. Of course Goldwag doesn't stop there. He throws in George Sodini, Scott Evans DeKraai, and the apparent father of the men's rights movement, Mark Lépine, who he states fired "the first shots in this so-called war on feminism…"

Almost any movement could be condemned if all we examined was its lunatic fringe. With feminism, one doesn't even have to look beyond the mainstream. As bad as the aforementioned killers were, I don't recall any of them advocating for the extermination of half the planet's population. But that's precisely what Valerie Solanas advocated in her SCUM Manifesto (Society for Cutting Up Men) which she penned shortly before shooting artist Andy Warhol and another man approximately twenty years prior to Lépine's founding of the MRM. Someone please correct me if I'm wrong, but I don't recall a single men's organization rushing to defend Lépine's actions. However, Ti-Grace Atkinson, radical feminist and president of the New York chapter of NOW, called Solanas "the first outstanding champion of women's rights" and heralded her as "a 'heroine' of the women's movement." Robin Morgan, former editor of Ms Magazine, included excerpts in her book, Sisterhood is Powerful. Other feminist authors such as Amanda Third and Catherine Lord have credited her with creating radical feminism and have stated that the feminist movement would not have occurred if it hadn't been for Valerie Solanas. The only person who thinks Mark Lépine started the MRM is Arthur Goldwag. Solanas may have been the lunatic fringe, but those who applauded, praised, excused, and condoned her actions are or were very mainstream.

Since Goldwag didn't stop with Lépine, this article shouldn't stop with Solanas. Goldwag enlists the assistance of Rita Smith, director of the National Coalition Against Domestic Violence in discussing parental alienation syndrome (PAS), a mental disorder Smith believes doesn't exist. Goldwag and Smith paint the disorder as way for men to get custody of children by making it appear as though women and children lie about abuse in divorce proceedings. Goldwag fails to mention that PAS is being reviewed for inclusion in the DSM by the American Psychiatric Association even though he does mention it isn't included. The omission of this is evidence of the outright dishonesty of Goldwag's article. The reason it is important to mention the opposition to PAS is the existence of women such as Andrea Yates who murder their children (and/or husbands) and then plead not guilty by reason of insanity citing post-partum depression or battered wife syndrome. While Yates may not be associated with feminism, mainstream feminist organizations such as NOW have advocated the use of these defenses by such women.

Another woman who used such a defense was Lorena Bobbitt, who severed her husband's penis and tossed it into a field nearly twenty years ago. Like Solanas, she was heralded as a feminist hero. She claimed that he had abused her for years and had raped her. She was diagnosed with clinical depression and possible PTSD and found not guilty by reason of insanity, despite the fact that there was substantial evidence that the abuse in the relationship had been mutual and her statements to police indicated that she knew exactly what she was doing.

In a similar incident, Catherine Kieu Becker drugged her soon-to-be ex-husband before slicing off his penis and tossing it into a garbage disposal. Like Lorena Bobbitt, Becker became an instant celebrity. Mainstream feminists applauded, laughed, and joked. The Talk, a nationally televised program feature its all-female team of hosts giggling and laughing themselves silly over the incident. Sharon Osborne referred to the incident as "delightful" and the all-female audience roared with laughter. We're not taking about lunatic fringe elements with somewhat vague connections to a movement here. These are examples of mainstream women, feminists, and feminist organizations applauding acts of vicious acts of violence against men. Where was Goldwag's or SPLC's outrage at the institutionalized misandry displayed following these events?

Goldwag also excoriates men's rights advocate, Paul Elam, owner of the blog A Voice for Men for calling out a feminist blogger who wrote "about her discomfort with male adults helping female toddlers in the bathroom at her daughter's preschool. The blogger conceded that she was being sexist, but wrote that "I'd rather be wrong than find out if I'm right."" Yes, the blogger admits she's a sexist, but Goldwag calls out Elam for being misogynistic for not accepting her apology. Does the SPLC support sexism against men? Apparently it does.

Another article composed a list of alleged men's rights websites that it dubbed "Misogyny: The Sites." While the term "misogyny" may apply to some of these sites (I haven't visited all of them and don't care to), the SPLC presents scant evidence to back its claims. For instance, The False Rape Society, a blog that discusses cases where women (and men) have falsely accused others of raping, sometimes with very disastrous consequences, the evidence that the site is misogynistic is an article "attacking a female supporter of… Michelle Bachmann" told a reporter that "It takes a woman to get things done." The article at FRS pointed out the misandric nature of that statement. No further evidence of misogyny was presented. That was more than enough to place them on the list of misogynist websites.

MensActivism was included for copying headlines for news articles published elsewhere. According to SPLC these articles are meant to undermine "the myth that women are less violent than men." SAVE Services is included for referencing a study that concluded that the best predictor of injury to women from domestic violence is the woman's initiation of the violence. They also misrepresent SAVE's position on services for victims of dv. Rather than advocating to "roll back services" as the SPLC claims, SAVE advocates eliminating the gendered nature of services and including services for male victims and female perpetrators. Obviously it takes very little for the SPLC to consider a website misogynistic.

Yet they leave off openly male-hostile websites such as radfemhub that openly advocate the extermination of men. One woman states "Even if we killed off 90% of men…" Another commenter states "The "magic number" to bring males under control is ~ 30% of the population…" Another suggests "a biological solution" to "men's sickening behavior" and in a separate post that same commentor states "a female ob/gyn that was willing to perform sex-selective abortions on male fetuses would be giving a gift to the next generation…"

Obviously it is far more difficult to be declared misandric, though it is doubtful that the SPLC believes misandry even exists.

A third article, written by Mark Potok and Evelyn Schlatter, entitled Men's Rights Movement Spreads False Claims about Women accuses MRM sites of spreading false or exaggerated claims about domestic violence and sexual assault committed by women. In fact, Potok and Schlatter do their own hatchet job by providing some very nicely cherry-picket statistics to support their conclusions. They completely misrepresent the CDC's National Intimate Partner and Sexual Violence Survey by citing some statistics that support their conclusion, but also ignore other statistics contained in that report that support exactly the opposite. This study found that 18.3% of women have been raped compared to 1.4% of men according to Potok and Schlatter. What they don't say is that the study defined rape in such a way to ensure that almost no male could be a victim. Rape was defined only as a penetrative act. Being forced to penetrate was not included in the definition even though this is defined as rape in every state. They also failed to report that over the preceding 12 months, this same study found that had the definition included being forced to penetrate, men and women reported similar rates of rape and women comprised the majority of perpetrators against men.

Potok and Schlatter criticize the overgeneralization of a study by Deborah Capaldi that showed that women were more likely to be injured in domestic violence incidents when they initiated the violence. This may be a correct criticism, however, I have seen references to other studies that confirm Capaldi's results with other populations that may be more generalizable (I don't currently have those references to cite). Next they cite a DOJ study regarding violence in general as being committed by predominantly males. However, they ignore other studies such as the CDC study by Whitaker that indicate about half of all IPV is reciprocal (both partners are violent) while women commit approximately 71% of non-reciprocal IPV.

Finally, they criticize a study by Eugene Kanin that concluded that 41% of rape allegations ar false. They criticized his methodology stating that he did not provide the criteria used by police to determine that an allegation was false.

However, Kanin did state that he only considered an allegation false if the woman had recanted the allegation. Further, the police department was said to have used or threatened to use a polygraph with the accuser and call this a “now discredited practice.” They cite no source for this statement and to my knowledge; it has never been studied empirically. That said, Kanin’s figures were probably quite high and there may be some validity to these criticisms. However, Potok and Schlatter go on to discuss the studies they believe to be “the most comprehensive” and “the best” without providing any support or reasoning behind these claims. Most likely, these were simply the studies that reported the lowest rates of false allegations that Potok and Schlatter could find. Typically, studies that find very low rates of false allegations use exceedingly restrictive definitions and are statistically more likely to contain more false negatives (in this case a false negative would be a false report of rape being counted as not false). Kanin’s study, by contrast probably contained a greater likelihood for false positives.

The Southern Poverty Law Center appears to be taking a stance against hatred and bigotry only when taking such a stance supports its prevailing ideology. In fact, the SPLC would now appear to be perpetuating hatred and bigotry by publishing intellectually dishonest articles that misrepresent an entire movement concerned with social justice for men and making it easy for hateful bigots, sexists, and female supremacists to marginalize and dismiss those concerned with men’s rights and to advance a hateful anti-male agenda. In what could be characterized as a desperate attempt to remain relevant, the SPLC has employed the same sort of tactics that it accuses the MRM of using to promote misandry; the hatred of men, and by so doing has become a hate group.

A Voice for Men and register-her.com regularly investigate political organizations, activists and internet based entities that engage in hate speech and/or work to undermine the basic civil liberties of targeted groups within the general population. We place particular emphasis on individuals and groups that target men and boys for discriminatory or violent persecution because we regard them as an underserved population.

A recent example of that is Radfemhub.com, a website where ideologues have been known to gather to further plans for male targeted infanticide, murder and food supply poisoning. Simon and Schuster published novelist Pamela O'Shaughnessy, operating under a hidden identity, has been associated with that group as an advocate for eugenics that are targeted at male children.

A group that has recently come to attention is the Southern Poverty Law Center (SPLC), an Alabama based organization operating under the auspices of civil rights advocacy.

Indeed, there was a time when SPLC did proactive work in the civil rights arena, targeting the Ku Klux Klan and other known hate organizations through the legal system. It appears, however, that under current leadership the organizations mission has drifted, first toward the persecution of individuals and groups from opposing mainstream political camps, and now toward organizations that attempt to ameliorate problems faced by men and boys, in a calculated attempt to undermine their progress.

By using their formerly legitimate reputation as a civil rights advocacy organization to launch defamatory attacks against legitimate agents for social improvement, SPLC is not only engaging in an egregious public deception, but is seeking to viciously undermine the principles of tolerance and equal treatment under the law.

Stop Abusive and Violent Environments (S.A.V.E.) is a "non-profit victim-advocacy organization working for evidence-based solutions to domestic violence." They have gained widespread respect as a nonpartisan effort addressing the social ill of domestic violence.

It may be that there nonpartisan and equalitarian nature has inspired the ire of SPLC, who recently published articles on their website characterizing S.A.V.E. as "misogynistic" and "woman-hating." SPLC also made the incredulous and groundless accusation that S.A.V.E. was attempting enable abusers, by "lobbying to roll back services for victims of domestic abuse and penalties for their tormentors."

What S.A.V.E. actually does, by all outward appearances, is to promote the identification of all victims and perpetrators of intimate partner violence and push for the appropriate interventions to be available to all. They are also active proponents for ensuring accuracy of reporting and research in intimate partner violence.

SPLC's efforts to dishonestly discredit S.A.V.E. amount to an attempt to prevent men, and children of both sexes, who are victims of violence in the home from being identified and offered assistance. They are targeting a group, based on sex alone, in an effort to deny services and equal treatment under the law. In doing so, they help perpetuate and institutionalize the violence that is being committed against them.

It is the very definition of a hate group, and a remarkably successful one. It is not a particularly new revelation.

SPLC Report: Heavy On Smear, Thin On Facts

[/box]

Admittedly, these are sources which may be ideologically different from opinions expressed here, but they are not hate groups by any stretch of the imagination.

Additionally. SPLC's disinformation campaign appears to have struck a resonant chord with the members of Radfemhub.com, the group advocating for the murder of male infants and other forms of violence. After hearing of SPLC's activities, they kicked off fundraising efforts on their behalf.

A Voice for Men and register-her.com will both continue to monitor SPLC, Radfemhub.com, and other known and suspected hate groups and report back to the public on their activities.

And the song plays on

The Huffington Post has jumped on the SPLC bandwagon, and written an article targeting the men's movement, this website, and the men's rights subreddit at reddit.com.

The article is glaring with factual errors and direct falsehoods, including the incredible claim that "The Innocence Project" is a product of the Men's Movement. There are equally off target claims on nearly every line of the piece. They couldn't even manage to write the headline without trying to shame MRA's by telling us to "grow some." On a normal business day I would walk you through that generic Huffpo writer's lines of broken logic and repeated falsehoods, for your entertainment if not for anything else.

Today, however, is not just another business day. Today I will just link you to the article. Read it at your leisure or don't. You have heard it all before. They have us all figured out, only they don't know even the most fundamental things about us. Same shit, different day.

It has become apparent that after keeping their heads in the sand for as long as possible that some elements in the mainstream are waking up to the fact that the MRM is here to stay, and growing.

They are freaking out.

The SPLC fiasco was an orchestrated warning shot (with Huffpo likely being a hapless, tagalong follow up). They clearly don't understand the nature of this thing well enough to know that coming after us this way is like trying to stop a thunderstorm by going after one raindrop at a time. I am happy for them to do this. It gives us a bounce in publicity and does nothing to slow things down.

But there is another concern here which takes us back to why this is not just another day in the MRM.

Recently we went through a crisis that, unlike what SPLC and Huffpo can muster, was real. One of our more respected members became despondent and sent me an email in which he stated he was going to end his life. Luckily, with the help of MRA's we were able to track him down and get some help to him before he took himself out. We still don't know exactly how he is doing, except that today we are reasonably certain that he is still in the land of the living.

His breaking point was exactly what many of our adversaries want. Or, as one feminist troll on Reddit quipped hopefully, "1 down 35,000 to go."

This is not just an isolated scumbag. There are others out there, sitting in corners and lurking, waiting for MRA's to make posts expressing their feelings of hopelessness. And when that happens, they come out of the woodwork wherever people like David Futrelle hang out, like the SRS subreddit; the same place that assumed feminists were recently taunting suicidal men; goading them; hoping to push them toward ending their own lives.

This is, in the end, who we are dealing with. It is a population of people that want to target the many wounded men that find refuge in this movement and urge them toward the unspeakable.

I can hear the fembots screeching now some crap about how those aren't real feminists and not to blame them for the actions of a few. Forget about it. As far as I am concerned, there is no difference between someone who will say, '1 down, 35,000 to go," and other scumbags that will treat abused, disheartened men like they are hate-mongers, or better yet misogynistic whiners that are pettily grieving for some confabulated illusion of male privilege that they don't and never did have. It is just as cruel and depraved.

It is hard for me to start in on these "people" and not write a book about it, but that is not why I am writing this article.

What I want to say today is that I know what these immoral bigots refuse to understand, and refuse to care about when they do. There are a lot of desperate and damaged men in this movement; men who have been taken to hell and back by a system that started throwing them overboard 50 years ago; men who have not seen their beloved children in years, men living in squalor, working in servitude to a system that owns them like chattel; men who have been destroyed by evil, outrageous lies – taken as gospel by authorities who just don't give a damn about truth or justice.

We have men in this movement who have been stripped of everything; who have not even been allowed to hang on to their freedom or their dignity. And now, in this faltering, but still female-centric economic climate, we have legions of men who are destitute, homeless, and who see only bleakness in the days ahead. The cruel icing on that cake is that they still live in a world that tells them they are worthless if they are not financially successful.

In short, we have more than our share of men teetering on the edge.

Of course, we don't have much of any services that are wired to deal with these men, and almost nothing in the way of social understanding. Increasing numbers of men are, for all most of the world cares, simply a bunch of broken appliances; outmoded, useless and taking up too much room. And the moment some reach out for compassion or help, there are more than a few that will shove the knife in deeper and twist.

It sounds terrible, and it is. But there is another side to this as well. When our friend Factory reached out, many, many in the MRM offered whatever they could to help. I had offers of help from the town in which he lives. I had emails of support from people who offered to do whatever was asked. I am still getting messages inquiring about how he is doing. There were people, men and women, from Texas to California to British Columbia to Saskatchewan, all taking action of some kind or another. All of this from MRA's and MRA's only.

And that is worth writing about. It is a much more important message than dwelling on the society of human garbage in which men and boys currently find themselves living.

I want to encourage those MRA's who are not in the worst of times to please continue to watch out for those who are. And for the many of you who are just hanging on, hang on a little tighter. If you need help, please let someone know. We will work something out. Scratch and claw if you have to, but choose to live. We have a long way to go, and we need you. Not to mention the fact that despite what people who oppose our cause think, you are worth staying alive just for the sake of living.

Perhaps someday when our culture recognizes that men are human beings we can quit operating everything for them on tattered old shoe strings and the men's movement can actually start funding some services to help men in crisis. Till then, please hang in there and help us get down that road.

Demonizing machismo

The Consequences of Publishing a Book Titled "Huevos: The De Masculinization of the Macho"

Two weeks ago I asked a former clerk from Tia Chucha's bookstore why my book, Huevos, had not been allowed to be presented at the small, supposedly progressive Mexican American bookstore in the Sylmar area of the San Fernando Valley. She responded by saying, "Well, the committee led by Trini read the book and was uncomfortable with what you wrote and she asked a Cal State Northridge Professor Denise Sandoval to co-panel and counter what you said but she refused to do so."

I then queried, "Has Sandoval, a renowned feminist in Chicano Studies, published a book on male issues?" To which she replied, "Well, no."

Such has been the life for this book that was published by Floricanto Press; though researched thoroughly the book has been rejected because of its content, which is to analyze feminism by writing from a male cultural perspective. My arguments are simple: Mexican American males have been trampled by a legal system that favors women and criminalizes the nature of males. My emphasis is on Mexican Americans because I am one; however, the legal system mentioned applies to all men, so there is a universal application. But once race factors in, favoritism is much more apparent. Hence: for white women to claim victimhood when they dually benefit from both race and gender becomes a slap in the face to someone like me who has the door closed on him continuously.

From the moment I published this book and started bringing up male themes (when I taught as an adjunct at California State University, Long Beach, in a ill-conceived course titled "The Multi-ethnic Experience" wherein women are considered an ethnic group) I began to challenge the myth of female exploitation by bringing up data that corresponded to my point; the negative response came from female faculty of all colors who believed, followed shortly thereafter by the girlie men who believe in feminism. Even though my evidence was sound, such as arguing that white women were not segregated or that culturally I was raised by my mother to not trust women, I was summoned by the civil rights office. Imagine that! I was summoned to the civil rights office to account for my academic freedom, which did not exist, to the union and assistant dean; a Mexican American male having to reply to a white woman's concern for my wording. I told her that feminism threatened Mexican American males (the fact that there are more women in college alone proves my point) and all she could say was: "Which feminism, I, II?" She then started to recite female authors and I simply told her, "All of them."

Let us just say I survived with the aid of my female union representative but the writing was on the wall, I was to be gone at their next possibility. The next round of budget cuts was their shelter and I was given a permanent goodbye. Simultaneously, in discussions within my department, one male faculty member, Jose Moreno, would only ask, "Were you hurt by a white woman?' with his limited Harvard intelligence.

Afterward, at another Cal State, Northridge, I used the book and that very semester, even before it ended, I was essentially terminated with no review. The chair had placed a female spy in my class who was writing notes and then providing them to David Rodriguez, who had me explain why I said this or that even though my material was academic. I did not back down; I challenged him and told him all the information was consistent with the lectures. He was essentially upset because I argued that "feminism distracted the Chicano Movement," and when I requested the female student be removed at the end of the semester they wanted me to give her a grade. This was despite the fact that she had not completed the requirements of the course. We got into a shouting match because I refused and because I was not going to be re-hired, my stay there ended rather rapidly. My only consolation from CSUN was that their library had purchased the book, Huevos, and had it on display, under new books, which affirmed my work even though it was not in the Chicano Studies Department.

Lastly, at a nearby community college, my boss called me in and told me he had been summoned by the vice president of academic affairs, a black woman, to answer questions about my book. He told me that she was upset from what she read and that this book was not appropriate. His response was "I do not necessarily agree with everything he says, but he has gotten published." This is uncommon at the community college level. He told me that I should hold off on using the book because he did not want any more trouble for me or himself; I knew it was serious when the union lady warned me that the female president had also inquired about the book and that I should not use it if I did not want employment trouble. I had to swallow my pride and not use it until the women in power left. I was able (after the president left) to use the book again some semesters later, but I try to be careful. As an adjunct faculty, I have no legal protection because I am a temporary employee and the administration can do an evaluation as they see fit.

I circumvented the use of the book by writing another book that incorporated the male themes lacking in the study of Mexican Americans with the same effect. At Cypress College where that book, Higher Education as Ignorance, was used and I presented, I was challenged endlessly from women about my position but I did not back down and proved my points factually.

The dean, a white female, was present during these challenges. Afterward, she prohibited my return to the college as a guest speaker, even for other books I have published, which further proves that women have too much power in censoring and censuring my ideas. After all, how am I a threat? I'm only a guest and a part-time instructor that no one wants to hire. Though I do have a follow up to Huevos, I just have to sit down and write it (as me publisher has asked me to do repeatedly). Maybe I will call it Girlie Men.

AVfM Radio: Understanding the Blue Pill

[box]Tonight AVFM Radio introduces GirlWritesWhat as new co-host, and examines male identity in an increasingly feminized world. This is the blue-pill, blue kool-aid world most men and women inhabit before theyve swallowed and digested what we commonly call the red pill. But what do we mean when talking about these two views of reality. Male identity and value as a human being is what's at stake. In the blue pill world, this is based on utility, conformity and disposability. However, as women take on a greater participation in the working world, men find themlseves increasingly identified as disposable drones, socially indistinguishable from women. Where in this landscape do men find social value in thier identity as men?

Slop.

That's what it has been my misfortune to read as yet another self-identifying "reporter" attempts to hitch his wagon to the populist, psuedo-human-rights-watchdog organization called the Southern Poverty Law Center; those rent-seeking lawyers whose shoddy semi-journalism and lack of due diligence earns a daily increasing tide of public rebuke.

Kyle Bachan, writing for the Canadian edition of the Huffington Post, attempts to take the moral high ground in his recent article addressing growth in the men's movement. Unfortunately, like lesser commentators preceding him, the reporter shapes his published impression with persistent omissions. Bachan begins by noting the success of "The Innocence Project," which works to exonerate the wrongly convicted. While the Innocence Project is a just and commendable endeavor – it is unconnected to the men's rights movement (MRM). Bachan also mentions "Just Detention International" whose mandate is to end prison rape. It is also is not part of the MRM, although it shares overlapping goals. However, as Bachan's article was published directly following the Southern Poverty Law Center's ill-researched and clumsy attempt to raise funds, he cannot be unaware of the work of the False Rape Society (FRS), which aggregates mainstream reporting of false rape accusations. Bachan's omission of mention of the work of the FRS is his work's gauge.

Bachan makes his purpose clear with the statement, given its own paragraph to stand it apart from the rest of the text:

> These emblems of progress represent all the good the MRM could accomplish if it wasn't stymied by one simple premise — MRM doesn't want to work with feminist groups

There are layers of deception and misdirection in the claim that we do not want to work with feminist groups, but all well-crafted falsehoods are salted with the truth.

Bachan omits the reasons for the reluctance to work with feminist groups, and that omission is central to understanding the movement itself.

In November of 2011, A Voice for Men – the largest online publication devoted to the MRM, ran a series of articles addressing the published intentions of a collection of self-identified feminists.

Setting aside whether these feminist academicians, social workers, child care professionals, lawyers and novelists had the means, their goals included promoting and organizing a campaign for the eugenic extermination of men. These activists also advocate a systematic denial of the human rights of men and boys, sex selective abortion, and the calculated abuse of male children with the intention of developmentally crippling them.

These were, and are, the publicly admitted goals of the bloggers and commentators on a site called radfemhub, whose members are known to be established professionals in the fields of education, law, community organization, publishing and child care. This gang of would-be murderers, despite repeated coverage by AVFM, was omitted by the Southern Poverty Law Center as a hate organization, while this site; AVfM, somehow merited mention as such.

Obviously, not all feminist organizations are so nakedly murderous in their published rhetoric. However, much of feminist reaction to MRM concerns over male suicide rates, homelessness, mistreatment by family courts, medical research, unequal criminal sentencing and so on is marked by avoidance, personal attack, threats, accusations, or simply ignored. Anyone with a passing acquaintance of MRM rhetoric will already know this.

A summary of this, published on AVfM as "Where is The Counter Argument?" and permanently listed in the site's recommended reading, addresses the problem.

So, as Kyle Bachan noted, the men's movement is reluctant to cooperate with feminist organizations. The reason strategically omitted is that these organizations persistently attempt to censor, silence, vilify, accuse, threaten, and deny the rights of men whose major offense is to claim their own humanity.

Again, not all feminist organizations are as pro-violence as Radfemhub. Most, like the eponymous National Organization for Women (N.O.W.), pursue the advancement of women, falling down only where their address of women's victimization omits the equivalent or greater damage borne by men. Almost all public campaigns to relieve violence against women fail to address the persistent fact that violent criminal victimization has always, and continues to, land predominantly on men. Kyle Bachan mentions this complaint in his own article, illustrating his own omissions are not all due to ignorance.

Bachan also correctly states that "Ask any feminist and they'll be sure to tell you that the fight for equality includes men," although he fails to mention the difference between public utterance, principally affecting the perceptions of listeners, and activism that impacts public life, policy and law. The unfortunate reality is that what feminist organizations say, and what they do, are usually at significant odds.

Bachan also makes a selective note of the recent re-definition of rape by the FBI, achieved by a decade of canvassing by led by the Feminist Majority Foundation and Ms. Magazine. In the new definition, rape's scope expanded to include sex while intoxicated. Bachan however omits to mention the political utility of such a change; that nonviolent, indeed consensual sexual encounters now criminalized by drunkenness will inflate the statistics which for the present show rape and sexual assault as the lowest occurrence category of violent crime tracked by the FBI.

Bachan also omits to mention the absurdly illogical double standard that deciding to operate a motor vehicle while intoxicated remains an act of adult volition, while deciding to participate in sex in the same condition is now defined as being victimized by a criminal sexual assault.

Further omitted in the crowing claim that, Hooray, men can now be counted as victims, is the fact that the updated definition carefully excludes the possibility of rape of a man by a woman. In Israel, when human rights activists attempted to include female-on-male rape in that state's definition of the crime, feminists there marched in protest. Bachan omits to mention that, too.

Bachan's failure is not limited to omission. He also represents a picture at odds with a world where feminist organizations advocating murder are not listed as hate groups, but those opposing murder are so listed. According to the Huffington Post reporter:

> [W]hereas feminism has evolved to embrace the fight for the rights of all genders, races, and sexualities.

Where is a feminist organization seeking sexual equality in criminal sentencing? – as presently males are sentenced far more harshly in criminal courts [1][2].

Why, in the endless repetition of the increasingly false narrative of lifetime earnings imbalance is the predominance of 93% male workplace deaths ignored by feminists? [3][4]

Where are the feminists acting to address the issue that after 40 years of education systems being retooled to promote women's opportunities – the system now produces over 60% female graduates. Feminists are discussing this issue, but rather than as a problem of inequality, their tone is one of triumphalism.[5][6]

Certainly, there are individual feminists whose personal activism is not the ongoing legal disenfranchisement of men, but where is there an organization, identifying as feminist, addressing any issue regularly raised within men's rights groups?

Nowhere, which is why, in a climate of puerile accusation, censorship, and open contempt of the human rights of men by feminist organizations, the MRM is unwilling to work with them. But our HuffPo reporter, Mr. Bachan, omits to mention those minor details.

He would have his readers believe that non co-operation with feminists is equivalent to denial of women's human rights. Aside from being untrue, it's a cheap and convenient out.

Bachan also mentions Violence Against Women Act, and characterizes opposition to it as misogyny or acceptance of violence, but omits any mention or exploration of the ideological bias on which that law is built; namely the Duluth Model of domestic violence which states unequivocally that partner violence is exclusively male on female, and considers patriarchal oppression of all women by all men as the only source of that violence.

This conception is completely at odds with the majority of reputable research on domestic violence [7][8][9][10][11][12], which indicates reciprocity of abuse, and that women in violent relationships are "as violent or more violent than their male spouses or partners"[7].

VAWA provides the basis for sexual profiling – using the predominant aggressor doctrine [13]. This is an arrest procedure reduced to the simplistic view that men are bigger and stronger, and therefore guilty. This cultivates a law enforcement climate of policing by script, removing the judgement and discretion of police when dealing with DV situations more complex than the simplistic Only Men are Perpetrators Doctrine.

VAWA also provides incentives to frivolous prosecutions, rewarding prosecutors for robotically painting many men in non-abusive, non-violent disputes as violent criminals. However, these unimportant details are omitted by Bachan, because in the simplified world of his narrative – opposition to this corrupt law is exactly the same as promotion of actual violence against women.

The HuffPo reporter also employs quotation marks to suggest that the organization RADAR, whose mandate is accuracy of reporting of domestic abuse, ever, at any time suggested by statement or omission: "If we can't have something that benefits us, then no one can".

I was not aware that journalists could fabricate quotes and retain any semblance of professional credibility.

Bachan also mentions a survey [14], paid for by the Alberta Council of Women's Shelters (which includes conclusions but no methodology and no data on sample size) to decry the apparent attitude of "us versus them," within the men's movement. For a real world example of this atavistic tribalism, readers are encouraged to read the summary of the Duluth Model website.

> Domestic Abuse Intervention Programs creates innovativecommunity-wide interventions to end violence against women and help men who batter to change.

If domestic violence actually conformed to this simplistic and false narrative, the phrases partner violence and domestic abuse would not exist, and we would all still use the obsolete distillation of anti-male hate contained in the phrase "wife beating."

Unfortunately for these dishonest ideologues, the research refutes this black-and white narrative of universal male predation on women. If we're honest, we recognize that "282 scholarly investigations: 218 empirical studies and 64 reviews and/or analyses, which demonstrate that women are as physically aggressive, or more aggressive, than men in their relationships with their spouses or male partners".

In spite of this the domestic violence grievance industry pursues a public narrative in which all significant DV is male-on-female, because this is what resonates with our primitive desire to protect women and disregard men. This is what makes the DV industry money. But according to Bachan, it is the men's movement indulging in an "us versus them" ideology. In 2010 Christina Hoff Sommers described the persistence of the grievance industry's mythology in the following terms:

> We're not talking about a few errors. We're not talking about occasional lapses. We're talking about a body of egregiously false information at the heart of the domestic violence movement. False claims are pervasive. False claims are not the exception, they are the rule.

Bachan further clouds the issue by directly conflating feminism – which is an ideology, with women, a subset of the human race.

> The question then, that feminists are likely to ask about MRM, is whether the movement is even looking for equality or if the whole thing is simply a guise to facilitate misogynistic tendencies. Judging from the anti-woman/anti-feminist sentiments that seem to entrench the most popular MRM online hangouts.

This accusation of misogyny is the sloppiest and oldest straw-man argument made to silence men speaking up on behalf of their own humanity. It's the slipshod pretence that opposition to an ideology is equivalent to hatred of women. Identification of a biological demographic with a mythology of innate victimhood does not serve the human rights of that group. In fact, it denies the self-determination and adult volition of individuals within that group, which is one of the sole indicators of their status as equals.

Kyle Bachan's article is not just slop, it's execrable slop.

Ben and Jerry's is a radical hate group

Dr. Tara J. Palmatier · 16 March 2012 · Archived copy · Original

Trigger Warning: If you have below average intelligence, if you are an emotional reasoner, if you think holding a woman accountable for her behavior is a form of domestic violence, and/or if you are a radical feminist, please be advised that this is a work of satire. And, no, satire does not have anything to do with Satan or satanic cults and the sexual abuse of children.

With all the hullaballoo over the SPLC 2011 "Intelligence" Report on emerging hate groups, we failed to notice that one of the most nefarious men's groups was omitted from the report: Ben Cohen and Jerry Greenfield, the purveyors of Ben and Jerry's ice cream. It boggles the mind how someone who calls himself Manboobz, the SPLC's very own Deep Throat, could have made such a glaring oversight. [1]

The Evidence

Ben and Jerry's is an emerging hate group. I know this is true because I read a comment on the Internet about men who like ice cream. Here's the smoking gun:

You like ice cream? Well, ice cream is dairy. Dairy comes from a cow. Cows are female bovine. Female bovine put a lot of work into making the blessed milk* for their children. Then what do YOU do, you patriarchal pig? You not only take the milk not intended for your species, you mix it with eggs, salt, and ice. A total perversion of it's original form, for your own patriarchal pleasure, you misogynistic consumer you!

THAT, is misogyny writ large! [2]

Ice cream makes women fat. Fat is a feminist issue. [3] Sure many MRMs will argue that ice cream doesn't make women fat; that some women make the choice to over-indulge in ice cream without a commensurate amount of physical exercise to counter their caloric intake, but they are wrong. It has been proven that women are not responsible for their choices. Ever.

The FBI's newly broadened definition of rape makes it clear that women are not responsible for the choices they make. [4] Ergo, ice cream makes women fat against their will. It is nonconsensual fat.

Ben and Jerry's is one of the most successful ice cream brands worldwide and is run by two men; Ben and Jerry. Therefore, Ben and Jerry are agents of the patriarchy; a two-man, anti-women hate group. As previously noted, ice cream comes from milk. Milk comes from female cows, as opposed to male bulls. Milk is the sacred life force of the Divine Feminine. Ben and Jerry are men who are stealing the sacred life force of the Divine Feminine for personal profit and the oppression of women by making them fat.

It cannot be stated enough that Ben and Jerry are both men. If they cared about the plight of women and women's long history of oppression, they would rename their organization Beth and Jerry or Ben and Jenny or Beth and Jenny. Ben and Jerry are clearly representatives of the business as usual Old Boy's Club. They are stopping women from breaking through the dairy ceiling.

The first letters of Ben's and Jerry's names are B and J. BJ is the abbreviation for blowjob. A blowjob is a degrading sexual act that is perpetrated on 15 out of 10 women every 3 seconds for the sole purpose of a man's pleasure as found by the Random Statistics Generator ™ from the Outtamyass Institute of Femtechnology. Therefore, Ben and Jerry are supporters of oral sex rape.

Need further evidence? Ben and Jerry plan to unveil a new flavor next month; Dominique Strauss-Cone.

Ben and Jerry have no fashion sense. They look like a couple of slacker stoner dudes who live in the basement of their mother's underwater house. You just know they wouldn't be able to support a woman. They don't look like they even know how to groom and dress themselves. Losers.

Their callous disregard of the latest fashion trends just goes to show how right Star columnist Heather Mallick was when she wrote, "Women often shop for men, and I shudder to think how men would dress if they didn't. Most men can't even enter shops to buy their own pants." [5] (* No joke: This excerpt is taken from an attack article Ms. Mallick directed at a 17-year old boy).

Ice cream is served in scoops. The French word for scoop is boule, which translates to ball. Men have balls. A few years ago, I ordered a dish of glacé at a French restaurant in Zurich. The Italian waiter teased me by asking how many "boules" I wanted. He sexually harassed me with Ben and Jerry's ice cream.

Couples often frequent Ben and Jerry's ice cream shops after a dinner date. Men ply unsuspecting women with Ben and Jerry's ice cream in order to get them into bed. After a woman's inhibitions are disinhibited with a little Cherry Garcia, for example, the act of seduction becomes much easier.

Furthermore, many women who are tricked into bed with Ben and Jerry's, never hear from their dates again. Not only is this an act of domestic violence [6] it is evidence that these so-called seduction artists are members of a hate group. [7]

Ben and Jerry give their ice cream flavors misogynistic names. Don't think for one moment that I've forgotten the Schweddy Balls ice cream incident. [8] Forcing women and children to lick Schweddy Balls. Sickos. These two creeps should be on the sex offender's registry.

Not to mention, Alec Baldwin was in the SNL Schweddy Balls skit. [9]

This is the same Alec Baldwin who believes PAS (Parental Alienation Syndrome) is real and supports equal custody laws. [10] On the other hand he is a liberal and contributes to the MuffPo. [11] Dammit. Cognitive dissonance is tugging at my brain cells. CONFLICTED! [12]

And let's not forget about the Ben and Jerry's flavor Chubby Hubby. [13] This is indisputable evidence that Ben and Jerry support same-sex marriage. Everyone knows girl on girl is hot and man on man is not.

If men are allowed to marry one another, they will deprive women of resources that they are entitled to via heterosexual marriage and then heterosexual divorce (e.g., spousal support and child support). Ben and Jerry support denying access to money and other valuable resources for marriageable women and their children.

Additional MRM hate groups currently under investigation:

Dick's Sporting Goods

Hungry Man Dinners

PS3, Xbox and Nintendo

Dungeons and Dragons (for the old-schoolers)

The Boy Scouts of America

The NFL

The Sarasota Men's Barbershop Quartet

The Gherkin Building (Well, I mean, c'mon. Just look at it. It's a phallic monument to the patriarchy. I hear MRMs meet in its basement and think misogynisticky thoughts and act all misogynisticky.)

Disclaimer: This is a satirical editorial. Stating that Ben and Jerry's and its co-founders, Ben Cohen and Jerry Greenfield, are misogynistic MRMs and leaders of the growing MSM hate movement in no way implies that AVfM or I believe that they are misogynists or members of any hate group.

Talking out of their vaginas

Jim Muldoon · 17 March 2012 · Archived copy · Original

Sorry, guys. I need to get you to stop watching football for a moment. Really. It's important.

It's about an interview I saw on the state funded, national broadcaster; the ABC here in Australia. That the interview did no harm to the feminist movement shows how indestructible the feminist cause is. Indeed, had any other movement whether political, religious or social in nature offered up anything like this logic it would have been treated with ridicule and contempt.

However, because we are dealing with feminism, the babble becomes sacred babble and must never be criticised. Like religion in the middle ages, feminism is the one true word. The meanings should not be questioned, but simply one should be in awe of its all encompassing correctness. Even when it is wrong, it is correctly wrong. In fact, it is wrong to point out any wrongness, in case that wrongness is seen as evidence that feminism isn't completely correct. And that, of course, would be wrong.

What's that got to do with football? Please, read on and all will be revealed. It could be the end of violence.

Eve Ensler wrote a play called the Vagina Monologues and, following this, helped begin the V-Day Movement to end violence against women and girls. She came to Australia last month to deliver the annual Australian Human Rights Centre lecture in Sydney.

The ABC interviewed Ensler on its news analysis program, Lateline (Ensler, We don't own our bodies: Ensler, 2012). The ABC describes this program as "…a provocative, challenging and intelligent window on today's world." They continue to say, "Lateline engages the foremost experts or commentators… to bring you penetrating insights from a range of perspectives (ABC, 2012)."

The foremost expert or commentator who interviewed Ensler was Emma Alberici, who has some twenty years experience in journalism.

This, dear reader, is what passes for "an intelligent window" in Australia today.

The Play

The word "vagina"

Alberici begins the interview with a general question about her play. Ensler opens up with how "everyone" was scandalised with the word "vagina" in the 1990s. She claims that "you could say 'Scud Missile' on the front pages…" but, apparently "if you said vagina the whole world went crazy. "

The next part is worth quoting verbatim:

"And I think part of the reason of doing the play was that so many women I had interviewed had not only, not said the word vagina, they never saw their vaginas, they didn't know what they looked like, they didn't know how their vaginas functioned, they didn't know what gave them pleasure. They didn't even know their vaginas were their own."

In the 1970s I attended college in Scotland. In my class, a Computer Science course, the gender mix was 50/50. Every single woman on that course knew the word vagina, and a whole lot of other words for the vagina. Twenty years later, when Ensler wrote her play, and the word vagina has mysteriously vanished from the western woman's vocabulary?

I'm glad that Ensler points out that they had never seen their vaginas. I immediately became aware that I have never seen my own anus.

The real question, of course, is: so fucking what?

To what level should a woman understand how her vagina functions? For example, should she be able to discuss in detail what part Bartholin's glands play?

And why? Does Ensler know how her thyroid glands work? Does she understand how wax gets in the outer ear? As long as she knows which end to stick over the toilet, where to put the tampon, etc. does it really matter?

Ensler's final statement, that women "…didn't even know their vaginas were their own," is feminism at its finest. Alberici doesn't ask "Who did they think their vaginas belonged to?" Or, "Were they just renting them?" Or "If I kicked them in the vagina, who did they think would feel it?"

Ensler tries to paint herself as the radical who is not afraid to break taboos. And to do this she will use any word she chooses, no matter how upset the establishment gets. The fact is that when the play was written and first performed in the nineties, the word "vagina" was seen as a proper and polite term to describe female genitalia. You could have "The Vagina Monologues" on a bill board and in neon lights. It may have been titillating, perhaps, even risqué, but certainly short of scandalous in Western society in the nineties.

The use of scandalous words

Ensler informs us that in China the play was banned because the Chinese only had vulgar and derogatory words for vagina.

Speaking of scandalous and vulgar words, the Vagina Monologues uses the word "cunt" 30 times. Now that word, all by itself, ensures an "Adults Only" rating in Australia. You can say it in a play with that rating, but you won't be having "The Cunt Monologues" in neon on Main Street.

But Alberici doesn't ask if it was the translation of "vagina" or "cunt" that caused the Chinese such problems.

In fact, the Shanghai Drama Centre was told by the Chinese authorities who banned the play that "…it does not fit with China's national situation (USA Today, 2004)." Did Alberici ask Ensler if she was surprised that a Western play written by a "Human Rights Activist" was banned in China in 2004? No, she just lets Ensler give us the sacred babble.

The rape and domination of women by women

There are two serious aspects about her play that Alberici should have raised with Ensler, particularly given the "Human Rights Activist" tag.

The first is a section of the play which deals with the seduction of a girl by woman, which involves the woman giving the child alcohol as part of the seduction. In one version of the script I found the girl is sixteen (Ensler, Vagina Monolgues Script – The Dialogue, 1996). However, there have been reports of other versions of the script where the child was aged as young as thirteen (Swope, 2006).

In January this year a 29 year old female teacher was found guilty of the crime of having sex with a sixteen year old female student in Melbourne, Australia (Lowe, 2012). Also, note that the legal age for drinking alcohol in Australia is eighteen. In other words, Ensler's play is describing an act that is illegal in Australia, as well as immoral anywhere.

Ensler's monologue describes the seduction from the point of view of the child. It concludes:

"You know, I realized later, she was my surprising, unexpected, politically incorrect salvation. She transformed my sorry-ass coochie snorcher [vagina] and raised it up into a kind of heaven."

In other words, this manipulation into a sexual act was good for the child.

This blasé attitude is also seen in another monologue in the play, where Ensler's heroine dominates women during sex. The dialogue explains:

"Sometimes I used force, but not violent, oppressing force, no. More like dominating, 'I'm gonna take you someplace, why don't you lay back, enjoy the ride' kind of force."

So clearly, according to Ensler, domination and child sex abuse are alright when done in a feminist context. When men rape its rape, when women rape it's "salvation," so "lie back and enjoy the ride".

Alberici does not ask one thing about this. How's that for "a range of perspectives"? That's the "let's ignore it completely" perspective.

Utopia

A world without violence against females

Now, Ensler got together with a group of friends, presumably in what became the V-Day movement, to end what she called an epidemic of violence. Specifically, she states "not manage it, not contain it, but end it."

Given that this Utopia has never been achieved in all of human history for any group of people, including royalty, you'd think that Alberici would have one penetrating question at least about how all this would be achieved. Nope. None seemingly sprung to our expert reporter's mind.

Ensler goes on to expound explicitly on her Utopia:

> You know, see a world where women were safe and free and could wear what they wanted to wear and walk where they wanted to be and be who they wanted to be and live the lives they wanted to be without fear of attack, or harassment, or rape or innuendo or whatever it is that makes you feel less than you want to be as a woman.

Does Alberici ask Ensler why men are missing from her Utopia? Does she ask if Ensler thinks the other half of the world's population simply does not experience violence? Does she ask Ensler about the statistics that show that men are three times more likely to be killed in a homicide (World Health Organisation, 2002)?

Does she ask Ensler why she deems innuendo as significant as rape? In an interview that discusses "rape and torture survivors", are we now going to have "double entendre survivors"?

The suppressed girl cell

Alberici, whose interviewing technique could be called leading the cheer squad, provided another feed for another Ensler monologue.

"You talk about something you call the 'girl cell' and you talk about the fact that has been suppressed over time not only in women but in men. What do you mean by that? And you also say that that's parts of the reason we see so much conflict and disaster in the world?"

There is a girl cell? One that exists in women and men? How can an educated journalist say that out loud?

Doesn't that make it a human cell? Or is that just me questioning the sacred babble?

It's been suppressed? Really? Not only are women in the big world being oppressed, but at the cellular level there is gender specific oppression!

Now, I'm guessing here that it is the oppression, and not the girl cell itself, that is responsible for conflict and disaster. But really, the earthquakes, tsunamis, floods, hurricanes and twisters were all caused by the suppression of the girl cell?

And conflict, too? Wars are not, as previously thought, manifestations of a desire for power or resources, or defence against marauders. No, just suppressed girl cells.

Now, if you're waiting to know what the girl cell actually is, I'm here to tell you that I have no fucking idea. The transcript goes on for pages, and Alberici asks her twice, but Ensler talks about everything and anything else without so much as a hint of what a girl cell might be. As for the subject of suppressing them, Ensler is equally busy explaining something else.

Maybe this is why Alberici doesn't ask Ensler any hard questions. Maybe Ensler simply doesn't do hard questions.

Why do men commit violence?

Ensler herself does tyr to ask some hard questions: "How did a man end up in a gang rape of a five year old girl?" She continues to emote, "How did a man…cut out a woman's baby out of her belly…and destroy it? What was going on in that man that allowed that to happen?"

And the Great Ensler's theory:

> And it has to be that through the processes of patriarchy and colonialism and enslavement and poverty, impoverishment, that people end up getting further and further and further removed from their hearts and from their empathetic selves.

Where is the penetrative journalism we are promised by Lateline?

In December 2011, Heather Glendinning killed her two children and then herself in what was described as the most gory scene the Western Australian police had ever seen (WA Today, 2011)."

Earlier last year, Sidonie Thompson, a fourteen year old girl, was killed by her mother, Kim Patterson, with an axe. Kim Patterson then took her son to the Brisbane Storey Bridge where she jumped to her death (The Telegraph, 2011). How terrible would that have been for her son to witness?

Where does patriarchy, colonialism, etc. fit in here? These are atrocities in every sense. Except, and this obviously makes a difference to Alberici and Ensler, these are atrocities committed by women. Presumably, therefore, these acts simply didn't happen.

Women in Politics

Gillard's plight

Although Ensler is not generally held as an expert on Australian politics, Alberici obviously decided to elicit some thoughts from this feminist icon on local current events. In particular, she asks Ensler about the recent treatment of the Australian Prime Minister Julia Gillard by the press.

Alberici asks Ensler about the "…lot of discussion… the tone in which the coverage of her policies and politics has taken a very kind of sexist or misogynist tone. Is that something quite particular to female leaders around the world?"

Now, this "discussion" was had by none other than the likes of Greens Senator Bob Brown (The Sydney Morning Herald, 2012). Brown is not an independent observer of Gillard's government. His party has joined with Gillard's Labor Party to allow her minority government to stay in office.

"The government would be defeated if an election was held now, according to the latest Nielsen Poll, (Nielsen, 2012)" was the poll that Brown was discussing when claiming that the treatment of Prime Minister was sexist.

Moreover, the sexism in question essentially boils down to one interview with Mike Willisee. In this interview Willisee asks Gillard "You say you're a woman – would it be easier if you were a man?" (Prime Minister's Office, 2012)

Apparently, it is fine for Alberici to reference Gillard's gender to distinguish her from other politicians; it's not OK for Willisee to ask what difference it makes to be a woman.

Alberici tries to further the misogyny discussion by referring to a certain point in Willisee's interview, where he asks the Prime Minister if she cries much. Again, Alberici fails to show the context of the question.

In his interview, Willesee asks this question first. “Prime Minister, people talk about your lack of emotions and they’re only talking about seeing you in public. Are you a very emotional person when you go home?”

It is after she answers this question with a response that discusses emotions of love and joy, but not sadness, that Willesee asks about her crying.

It would be fair to accuse Willesee, in my opinion, of mining for sensationalist dirt on the Prime Minister, but not misogyny.

Alberici’s efforts to embroil the playwright in local controversies are in vain, however, as Ensler instead talks about powerful women in general, Hilary Clinton in particular, and Gillard not once.

Ensler’s theory on what stops women in power

Ensler expounds on a theory as to why the media, and in fact the world, takes a different microscope to female politicians, by referring to criticism of Hilary Clinton during her presidential campaign. Ensler, it seems, is not short on theories:

> And I think what happens to women a lot, I think particularly when they’re powerful, is the way the media, the way the world reduces them is to focus on these very shallow, these very superficial, these very insignificant aspects, as opposed to the brilliant and wise and visionary things that they’re saying.
> And I think that’s very clever because it gets women then to focus on these very insignificant things about themselves. Like their body and being skinny and worrying about ageing and worrying about fat and worrying about … so then women end up spending their days fixing this little country [themselves] as opposed to fixing the world.

These powerful, brilliant, wise and visionary women are undone because someone says her arse looks big in those pants?

No need for political skulduggery; for difficult questions in parliament; for leaked reports; for damaging emails; or for getting the numbers for a particular piece of legislation. Just ask her how she could possibly think those earrings would match anything else in her wardrobe.

And more: It’s clever. Really?

Even more: Undo Clinton and women everywhere start worrying about their wrinkles, their clothes, their fashion. Every single one of them driven to distraction by one master stroke of sexism. Did ageing cream sales increase when Clinton dropped out of the presidential race?

The real important thing to not miss is that women are too busy fixing their make up to fix the world. What does this say about these women or feminism?

It is these kinds of statements that one expects of misogynists. Is Ensler really implying that female politicians are just empty headed bimbos?

Would Alberici have been justified in asking “If women are as easily diverted from their political goals as you say, what good would they be in a leadership role?” Or “What if Clinton had been elected and, say, China or Russia decided to criticise her latest hairdo a few days before launching a nuclear strike?” Or “If deciding what to wear with a particular jacket is too hard, how hard is the Greek financial crisis?”

Moreover, implied here is that while these women are busy attending their manicures, men are just running about fucking things up. Apparently that’s all they can do. Just when a woman sees the problem and decides to fix it, the bastards just say “Didn’t you wear that last week?” and she’s undone. A vicious cycle!

Alberici accepts this theory like most people accept the theory of gravity. It goes up, it comes down; the bigger the mass, the more attraction – got that. Men are useless, world’s a mess, women can fix it, men criticise women’s appearances, world stays in a mess. You're so right.

Ensler's theory of power

Alberici asked Ensler a convoluted question about women in power acting the same as men. In other words, have we really seen a woman in power yet? Or, to put it another way, have we only seen, with the likes of Thatcher, Ghandi, Meyer, Merkel and others, women acting like a man so that they can get into power? This drivel allows another monologue on the meaning of power.

Dear reader, you'll be relieved to know that the power of men, that is "the power to dominate; the power to control," is not the kind of power Ensler is interested in. Instead, she is "…interested in the power that includes, the power that feeds, the power that sees all the people at the table, the power that is moved by the heart…"

Is that the same power that is easily undermined by questions of how much cleavage should a dress reveal? Alberici doesn't ask, so we'll never know.

Ensler's definition of feminism

Alberici, for no apparent reason, asks "Do you think the word "feminism" has become a dirty word?"

You'll be glad you got this far, dear reader, because Ensler defines feminism for us:

> Feminism means that women have the right to equality. That women have a right to voice, a right to equal pay, a right to be present, a right not to be harassed and raped, a right to thrive rather than just survive, a right to have children or not have children, to have desire, to have a lot of sex or have a little sex, whatever their bodies want.

Now, equality by definition requires two comparable entities. Ensler doesn't explicitly state it, but it is implied that the equality is with men. Right? You might think this is obvious, but look closer at the statements she makes.

The right to a voice is not a world-wide "right." How many men have that in China, North Korea, or Syria? Who wants equal pay with any man from a third world country? Who is safe in Afghanistan or Iraq? Who is thriving instead of surviving in Somalia, or the Sudan?

And as for the sex! Is Ensler discussing masturbation or is someone else going to be involved? When the women decided how much sex their bodies want, are they just going to snap their fingers and get it?

No, Ensler does not want women to be equal with men. She wants them to be equal with some super-privileged group.

"Who are they?" you might ask. Well, typical feminist dogma would have it as the men who dominate patriarchy. This is alluded to by Ensler when she talks about impoverishment and colonializing. Most often this is reduced to "white men", or "rich men" or sometimes, "rich white men". It's certainly not "men in dangerous jobs" or "men who die early."

Given her attitude of sex on demand for women, she doesn't want to be equal to the men who must understand that 'no' means 'no'.

No, given her earlier statements about living in Utopia, Ensler wants to be equal to the one percent of rich that the Occupy movement complain about. That is, Ensler wants the 1% to become the 51%. Or would she be happy if the 1% became 2% with just Ensler and her friends cashing in because they understand "power that feeds"?

And the men? The men in China, North Korea, Sudan, etc? Are they nominated for equality? Even a little bit of equality? Well, we'll never know because Alberici doesn't ask.

The End of Violence

And so, dear reader, we now come to point of the interview where it all becomes clear. And this is where football comes into it. It all begins with another magnificent theory:

> How is it capable [I think she meant 'possible'] that we're witnessing the amount of rapes and massacres and genocides and atrocities that we're seeing in the world without people responding to that? Part of it I think is that we bring up boys to be bifurcated, to cut off their hearts and their heads, so that they're capable once they come into power of doing very terrible things without feeling.

First of all, when she says "part of it", she doesn't explain what the other parts of it are. We can only assume that she means that the part she is talking about is the biggest part; that there is no other part of it that is in any way significant. In other words, this is the whole reason.

Secondly, I see governments and NGO's asking for money or making announcements about going here and there to do this and that in response to wars and natural disasters every other day. Does Ensler mean that Oxfam, Medicins sans Frontiers, USAID, World Vision, etc., are not run by people?

Third, notice the gender difference between the first two sentences. In the first "people" are not responding. In the second, not only are the males not responding, they are the ones in power committing the atrocities.

The females, presumably, are still too consumed with trying to get their eyelashes both full and separated to either commit violence or respond to it.

Fourth, the males, she goes on to explain, can't respond because they are bifurcated. In men, according to Ensler, the head is separate from the heart. If they were bifurcated, that would mean that one part of them could respond. She, however, is implying that their heart is not simply separate from the brain. It is, in fact, dead.

Given that they keep fucking things up, maybe their brains are dead, too!

Ensler then quotes another statistic. "One out of three women on the planet will experience rape or violence in her lifetime. That's a billion women, a billion women."

Now Ensler doesn't say where she gets this fact from, and Alberici doesn't question her on it either.

In general, this "one in three" figure gets attributed to the WHO Report of 2002 (World Health Organisation, 2002). This same report shows that when it comes to death by violence, in other words, the sharp end of the problem, men outnumber women as victims by more than two to one.

Ensler and Alberici also ignore the fact that the Australian Bureau of Statistics' Personal Safety Study of 2005 showed that men in Australia were twice as likely to experience violence of any kind (Australian Bureau of Statistics, 2005).

So, that's two billion men who will experience violence in their lifetimes To take Ensler's lead, let me say it again. That is two billion men. That's double. Two.

Sorry. I can't help myself. That's twice as much. Two billion. Men.

They also both ignore the fact that, as Murray Strauss has pointed out, the feminists in academia have been cooking the books on domestic violence for years. (Murray Straus, 2012)

Last, but not least, Ensler brings up her solution to ending violence against women:

> And I really just want to say to all the good men if they were busy standing up and speaking to the men who were committing the violence and asking them why and making violence against women their central issue, and as important, for example, as football is, I bet you violence against women would end very, very, very rapidly (laughs).

There you have it, Gentlemen. Get rid of your Tigers scarves, your Victory shirts and your Storm season memberships and get your white ribbon on. Don't go to the game on Saturday. Instead, get yourself down to the nearest war zone. Find a bunch of drug fuelled, undisciplined youths armed to the teeth and ask them why.

Tell them that Ensler and Alberici would have come themselves to ask why, but some rotten male asked if that blouse was still in fashion.

Let me summarise Ensler's logic:

There are three distinct types of human beings. They are Good Men, Men in Power, and Women.

The Men in Power are interested in "the power that controls," but are just making a mess of things. It seems this is because they are stupid, heartless and bifurcated. But, whatever the reason, clearly they shouldn't be in charge.

It would be much better if Women were in charge, because they want the "power that sees all at the table". It is so obvious that this power is a better kind of power that Ensler doesn't have to explain it. Unfortunately, Women are so easily distracted by criticisms about their appearance that they get lost in a confusion of neurosis and narcissism.

This just makes the world a bad place of rape, torture and violence. Oops! And, I almost forgot, derogatory comments.

And so we need the Good Men. These are the men who don't want "the power that controls", but instead see the wisdom of allowing "the power that feeds" to be administered by Women. This is presumably so they can go back to watching the game.

And so, if the Good Men make violence against women as important as football, then they'll go and talk to the Men in Power. As we all know, what thwarts a man with "the power to control," is being asked why by a Good Man standing up.

And no, Alberici doesn't ask the question "Why don't the women make politics as important as fashion? There's no "But what if the man with "the power to control" just shoots the Good Man who asks why? Like Hitler, Stalin or Mao?"

Or maybe, just maybe, in a single master stroke, the men with "the power to control" will ask "Who should play alongside Rooney for Manchester United and what should his girlfriend wear to the after-game party?" Two birds. One stone. All done.

Final score: Patriarchy 2, The Rest of the World 0.

Distraction over. Back to the football, guys. Thanks for your time.

False victimhood

John Hembling (JtO) · 19 March 2012 · Archived copy · Original

"You know, I think we're beating around the bush here," Michael Sanguinetti said: "I've been told I'm not supposed to say this – however, women should avoid dressing like sluts in order not to be victimized."

And from that statement, an international protest movement was launched.

A sign typical of the sentiment behind slut walk protests reads:

"Who should we blame for rape? Sluts rapists fixed that for you"

Another, shaped like a cocktail dress reads:

"This is not an invitation to violence"

These signs illustrate an interpreted meaning behind Constable Sanguinetti's words. That meaning being something like: "female victims of crime are to blame for their own victimization," or in more extreme terms: "rape victims are asking for it if they dress provocatively".

Other signage visible at multiple slut-walks states "don't tell me how to dress, tell men not to rape," and the ubiquitous "Not asking for it," which implies that the Canadian cop, addressing only 10 people, meant – if you get raped, you were asking for it.

That is one interpretation of constable Sanguinetti's statement and a very convenient interpretation for anyone wishing to exercise moral outrage.

Another interpretation of his words: "I've been told I'm not supposed to say this – however, women should avoid dressing like sluts in order not to be victimized." is that women should take some personal responsibility for their own safety, just as every other adult must do, even in a city with low crime rates and a strong, well organized, and trained municipal police force. One clumsily worded statement by a cop, speaking informally to 10 people – with multiple possible interpretations.

One of those interpretations being "Women dressed in short skirts deserve it if they're raped," and another interpretation being "Women, like other adults, should take some personal responsibility for their own safety."

One of these interpretations is absurd. The victims of crimes are not to blame for their own victimization. One of these interpretations is reasonable and logical – women, like other adults, should take some personal responsibility for their own safety.

Sanguinetti did not say "just wear coveralls, so we don't need a police force, or municipal street lights, or courts." But something like that appears to be the reading given to his statement, badly worded as it was that: "Women should avoid dressing like sluts in order not to be victimized."

I don't buy it. I do not believe that anyone, not even the protesters marching at slut-walks, actually think Michael Sanguinetti meant "you are to blame if you get raped." I think every adult man and woman at a slut walk understood his statement to mean "Women should take some personal responsibility for their own safety."

The outrage, the chanting, the poster-board signs, the thousands of marching women – and their fawning fan-boy "I love sluts" male cheerleaders all understand that the interpretation of Sanguinetti's words driving the slut walk movement; that "sluts deserve to be raped," is fabricated false outrage.

What if Constable Micheal Sanguinetti had actually said, and meant the words "Women dressing provocatively, who are subsequently raped, deserve it."?

What if he said that, in those words? One cop, in the Canadian city of Toronto, addressing a crowd of 10. What if he had said exactly: "Women dressing provocatively, who are subsequently raped, deserve it."?

He might have been fired, or placed on administrative leave and required to take some kind of awareness training. But let us compare that insensitive statement – which we must remember is only one possible interpretation of Sanguinetti's meaning – let us compare that to what else cops in large cities get up to. Sometimes they shoot unarmed civilians. Sometimes they beat people to a bloody pulp in the course of making an arrest. Sometimes they detain and harass law abiding citizens based only on ethnicity or skin color. These offences are many orders of magnitude worse than the worst possible meaning we can assign to Sanguinetti's statement and these cops not only keep their jobs, they don't, or rarely, even spawn protest marches in their own cities.

For that matter – there is no international protest movement against the United States' legalization of the fiat murder of American citizens. There is no international protest movement against Israel's continued blockade of water, food, and international aid to Palestine. There is no international protest movement against the continued illegal American occupation and brutalization of Iraq and Afghanistan. There is no protest against the newly legislated powers of the United States government to send its own citizens to Guantanamo Bay indefinitely, without trial. No international protest movements for these things. But a single Canadian Cop says something that might be interpreted badly against women, and we have an international protest movement for that?

The outrage behind slut walk is false. The purpose of this international protest movement is not to end "victim blaming" or reclaim the word "slut".

The real reason for slut walk is that women must never be criticized – ever, and the international show of force is a reminder to men, to know their correct station. Women are victims, men are predators, and we must never be allowed to deviate from that narrative.

The slut walk movement is a show of force to shame men, and preserve the culture; preserve the cultural narrative of universal and identity based female victimhood.

The gist is that by virtue of being female, every owner of ovaries is, at the level of their identity, a victim. When we are told we must never blame victims, this is a sort of code.

Victims, particularly female victims, are afforded a sort of elevated status within our culture. Now this serves some legitimate purpose when the victimhood is specific, such as an individual being subject to a violent crime – including rape. However, when this victimhood is attached to feminine identity – in the women=victim and man=predator conceptual model of rape, sexual assault, and domestic violence, then it has a different purpose. It makes women into children, to be protected, sheltered, given succor, but most especially, carefully separated from the personal accountability we associate with full adulthood. Infantalization and victim identification of half the population gives them, as individuals, some pretty impressive social power, but it also strips their individual volition and adulthood and is toxic to them as individuals and society as a whole.

Red Pill Radio tonight – Take two

After an unforeseen emergency cause us to delay last weeks episode of the debut of Dr. T and Dr. Paul joining forces for a new AVfM radio program, we are back on schedule. Tonight we will present the episode originally scheduled for last week.

Do you ever feel like you are being tested in a relationship with a woman to see just how much crap you will put up with? Does her voice start sounding like fingernails on a chalkboard? Do you often want to pull your hair out and scream "What the fuck will it take to make her get off my back??!!"

Well, she is probably not a borderline, or a narcissist or any other kind of personality disorder.

She is a normal female, and she is making you crazy with normal female behavior. She isn't bad, guys. She isn't evil. She's just a woman.

Shit testing, also known as nagging, bitching, pissing and moaning, manipulating and a dozen other labels that your average guy knows all too well, is a normal and expected part of the female relationship repertoire, and the fact is that most all men are really powerless and ignorant when it comes to handling these things.

You don't have to take the brunt of this nonsense, and tonight, on Red Pill Relationship Rehab with Dr. T and Dr. Paul, we are going to discuss this and the very simple solutions will bring peace back into your life if you spine up and use them.

The call in number is 310-388-9709. The show starts at 9:00 p.m. EDT.

No jail for man who withdrew Facebook apology

Robert O'Hara · 20 March 2012 · Archived copy · Original

(Washington D.C. Mar 12, 2012 AVFM News)Mark Byron, the Ohio father who was ordered by a court magistrate to post an apology to his ex wife on Facebook after an earlier posting in which he criticized the family courts decision to withhold visitation rights with his son, has not received jail time for the premature withdrawal of the Facebook apology.

As reported by AVFM News and many other news sources around the world, Byron was told to post an apology written by a court magistrate every day for 30 days or face 60 days of jail time. The apology was posted only 26 of those days. This comes after an uproar from all over the world by men and fathers rights groups as well as defenders of free speech over the past several weeks concerning the decision of the court.

In a Nov. 23, 2011, Facebook post, Mark Byron wrote "… if you are an evil, vindictive woman who wants to ruin your husband's life and take your son's father away from him completely – all you need to do is say that you're scared of your husband or domestic partner…" This set off a fury of legal action from the court at the behest of his ex wife that included the threat of a 60 day jail sentence if he did not post an apology written by court magistrate Paul Meyers.

"I'm sure they didn't put me in jail (Monday) to keep it from getting bigger," said Byron, who wore under his sports jacket a T-shirt that read "free speech" reported Cincinnati.com.

Of course the court was critical of Byron too. "There is a certain monetary interest to be served in this media exploitation," Justice Sieve of Hamilton County Domestic Relations Court said, in stern and pointed comments to Byron. Mark Byron has solicited funds to help pay for his legal costs in the case. Byron said he's received "under $1,000."

Though he did not get sent to Jail directly there is still a court date set for June 27th of this year.

Support for Byron has not been limited to his Facebook page. Comments on virtually all online news articles covering the story were overwhelmingly supportive of his right to free speech and his paternal rights. The Men and Fathers Rights community lent its support along with the Men's Rights forums who were sent into a frenzy after the court decision to impose a jail sentence on Byron if he did not comply with the demand of posting an apology written by Court Magistrate Paul Meyers.

Legal experts familiar with the case also voiced their concern. Hanni Fakhoury, a staff attorney with the San Francisco-based Electronic Frontier Foundation, said the rulings are unique and "raise quite a few" free speech issues. "She wasn't harassed because she deliberately sought this out." he said, commenting on the court's decision to find him in contempt of court for posting the comments even though his wife was barred from his Facebook page.

"I decided to stand up for our freedom of speech," Byron wrote on his Facebook page last week after deciding to withdraw the court imposed apology.

"Civil rights matter."

"In the course of history, there have been many champions of the First Amendment," Judge Sieve said after his verdict today. "You, sir, are not one of them.

"You have, in fact, thumbed your nose, figuratively, at the court system."

Byron encourages concerned people to donate to his legal defense.

Is Futrelle Barca's boy-toy?

Paul Elam · 20 March 2012 · Archived copy · Original

I am not in the least bit homophobic, but if Hannibal Barca ever takes refuge in the loving arms of David Futrelle, I might have to reconsider. I will spare you any attempts to construct a visual. I'm heartless at times, but not sadistic.

After watching this video made by our own JtO, which pointedly addresses Barca's "work," I was left with some lingering questions.

One, if Barca and Futrelle took their shirts off and kissed, would it be lesbian porn? Sorry, I should have issued a trigger warning.

On a more serious note, though (and less nauseating), I really do have questions about, and directed to, the building opposition to the men's rights movement. Fittingly, the primary questions is, are you serious about doing battle with MRA's?

Are. You. Fucking. Serious?

If so, you are in deep shit.

Let's consider all the recent attempts out there to discredit us, and especially how lame they are. I know, that's ableist of me, but hey, I'm feeling dangerous.

First the SPLC portrays a bunch of unconnected, often oppositional websites as cohesive parts of growing hate movement, ready to endanger womankind at every turn. They attacked us (unaware that there isn't an "us") with devastating and pinpoint accuracy (grading on the feminist curve) at all of our weakest points.

In one surgical strike, they lambasted Roosh because he may not call a woman back after sex if he isn't impressed.

Hateful. Hateful.

They skewered this website for the horrible practice of having a category called "feminist lies," and for posting already public information about known criminals and bigots. They dealt a devastating blow to the False Rape Society for aggregating news stories.

Down the list of 12 websites they went, punching away. Pow, pow! Biff, Bam! Stan Lee is somewhere smiling.

Then Muffpo comes out with even more pressure, targeting me and this website with crippling commentary, like asserting that The Innocence Project was born of the MRM, and criticizing anti-feminists for not wanting to swap spit with feminists.

Man, they got the goods on us, don't they? De-va-state-ing.

This is them at their Sunday, rockin' sockin' best; the feminist assault wave we have anticipated and feared for years. It's their storm troopers, and they are all spit-shine and polished brass.

That brings us back to the cellulite twins, and just in time. For what are the feminists left with when you take away the crack units like SPLC and Muffpo? Well, the answer is degenerate circus clowns like David Futrelle and his equally bovine counterpart, Hannibal Barca.

These are two individuals whose specialty, other than apparently downing copious amounts of Ben and Jerry's Patriarchy Chunk ice cream on a daily basis, is mining for minority voices on the fringe of the MRM, and conflating them with out of context quotes from actual MRA's, twisted into the desired form. But they don't even do that with enough gusto to burn a few calories.

We have long quoted Gandhi around here. "First they ignore, you. Then they laugh at you. Then they fight you. Then you win."

What I don’t think many of us counted on is that the people they sent to fight would be such insufferable morons. I mean, really, 50 years of dominance in media, academe and government, and the best they can do is send us a ragtag bunch of intellectually crippled ne’re-do-wells who are also waddling on the path of Mamma Cass?

We are gearing things up around here. The world is catching on. You can tell they have noticed by the fact that some of them now seem to have a pulse. But the blood still isn’t reaching their brains. Really folks, this isn’t even sporting.

As you will see here, though, we can still have some fun with it.

The abuse excuse

Phil in Utah · 20 March 2012 · Archived copy · Original

Due to the undeniable role that they play in perpetuating the abuses of Family Courts (as well as the existence of Gloria Allred), precious few MRA's would be willing to consider anybody bearing the title of "lawyer" as an ally to the cause. There is, however, one law professor from Harvard who, whether by accident or design, has contributed invaluable material to the Men's Rights Movement. The name of that man is Alan Dershowitz.

Dershowitz is popular with most liberals, but very unpopular with feminists. For one thing, he destroyed Andrea Dworkin in a debate over pornography. For another, he has mastered the art of logic better than nearly any other man alive. As such, one of his books, I think, should be required reading for anybody willing to participate in the MRM in a capacity greater than that of an observer. I picked it up three years ago and it changed my life. The name of that book is The Abuse Excuse: And other Cop-Outs, Sob Stories, and Evasions of Responsibility.

In this gem of a legal treatise, Dershowitz treats us to an idea originally put forth by Dostoevsky in The Brothers Karamazov: that a defense of criminal irresponsibility for one's actions is a double-edged sword. He applies this idea to a number of real-life legal cases, and shows how doing so harms the defense's arguments. In doing so, he also explains the uses of and difference between necessary cause and sufficient cause better than anyone I've ever seen.

What Dershowitz does, first and foremost, is point out what was a glaring legal trend in the early Nineties: to invent new "Syndromes" for every court case under the sun. From "Battered Woman syndrome" to "Black Rage syndrome", to "Holocaust Survivor syndrome", Dershowitz shows how these defenses ultimately hurt the people they're designed to protect.

In the case of Battered Woman syndrome, Dershowitz references the infamous "Burning Bed" incident which happened in my home state of Michigan. In this case, a woman was being abused by her drunkard of a husband (or so we're told). Late one night, after he fell asleep, she took her children out to the car, doused her husband's bed in gasoline, lit it on fire, and drove away. Her attorneys argued that she acted in self-defense; Dershowitz points out that she did not, since her husband was asleep at the time. He also points out that if she did indeed have a psychological disorder that prompted her to kill her husband, then she's not exactly the sort of person you should trust around children. He makes the same argument in his installment on the Lorena Bobbitt case.

In the case of Black Rage syndrome, we are treated to the case of a black man who murdered a white man. The black man's attorney argues that he was so persecuted by white society that he had no choice but to lash out. Dershowitz asks why a man who has a psychological disorder that could prompt him to lash out at any given moment and kill a white man should be admitted back into mainstream society.

In the case of Holocaust Survivor syndrome, Dershowitz tells us the story of a group of holocaust survivors who asked him to defend them in court pro bono (since he had a history of doing so) on charges of theft. They asked him to argue that they had Holocaust Survivor syndrome; in other words, struggling to stay alive in Hitler's Germany had conditioned them to get by through stealing and lying. Dershowitz refused to take their case, saying that he knows plenty of holocaust survivors who have no trouble obeying the law.

If nothing else, Dershowitz's book is worth reading for the absolute skewering he gives to Catherine MacKinnon's and Andrea Dworkin's arguments in favor of banning pornography. Dworkin claimed that pornography was responsible for such crimes as rape and child abuse. Dershowitz tied these in with similar anti-religious arguments and capped them all off with a logical gem, in which he said that blaming religion for the acts of violent fanatics, just like blaming pornography for rape and child abuse, is "like blaming oxygen for pyromania."

Dershowitz seems to delight in debunking feminist arguments or just arguments in general that spring from the notion of female entitlement. He also mentions an incident in which a police officer pulled a woman over, suspecting that she was driving while intoxicated. The woman proceeded to assault the policeman, saying: "You can't fucking do this to me! I'm a doctor, goddammit!" She was, of course, instantly arrested and subjected to a sobriety test, which she failed. Her attorney defended her against the assault charges, saying that she was suffering from PMS at the time of the incident. Dershowitz, clever man that he is, pointed out that the judge accepting the PMS defense would also be obligated to revoke the woman's medical license, since it would be an absolute disaster if she started exhibiting symptoms of PMS during an operation.

In what looks like a foreshadowing, Dershowitz also argues against expanding the definition of rape to include intoxication. He points out that, unless the drink was drugged or force-fed to the woman, it wasn't rape, because while she may not have been in her normal state of mind, she chose to drink the alcohol and is therefore responsible for whatever she did while under its influence. Sadly, it doesn't seem that Dershowitz convinced too many lawmakers.

The Abuse Excuse is the one book that, more than any other, shaped my critical thinking skills and made them as sharp as they are today. I think it should be required reading for all MRAs. If you haven't yet read it, go to your local library and pick up a copy. If you can't find a copy, order one from Amazon—it's dirt cheap. It's a bit outdated in terms of the cases it discusses (around a fifth of the chapters are devoted to the OJ Simpson case), but all of Dershowitz' ideas are every bit as applicable today as they were when he wrote them. I don't know if we can peg him fully as another Red Pill-taker, but he's definitely not part of the Blue Pill crowd.

Letter to my brothers

Valdez Addiction · 20 March 2012 · Archived copy · Original

I recently listened to my first MRM radio show from avoiceformen.com and the biggest thing that stuck out to me was a caller who went by the handle, "Sarg" which I think maybe short for Sergeant, I'm not really sure. The reason why this particular caller stuck out in my mind was because he immediately made the discussion about race.

Being an African American male, I certainly can identify; however, I didn't see the need to point out racial differences. And I will also admit that for a long time, I thought this was just a black issue. I honestly believed that white men had better relationships than black men, but I never blamed white men for this. I just believed, like so many other people, that black women were just angry.

We didn't know why, it was just accepted as a social norm. Because of that, I'll admit that I suffered in silence for a long time. I knew something was wrong but couldn't quite put my finger on it. It's just like being Neo in the Matrix, which is why I think the blue pill/red pill concept is a wonderful idea as the metaphor for the MRM.

After getting a little fed up with the constant man bashing parade in my social group, I began to notice something very strange. I started to notice the role all men seem to play in the media. Sitcoms and commercials became more and more offensive. Even my favorite bookstore had mountains of material for women, but rarely any books on men's issues.

I even began to notice the small, subtle statements that women made in reference to a man's responsibility. Of course they had no problem making loud statements about how sorry men are; the other type however, told a different story. One day I was watching television with my girlfriend. Nothing in particular, just surfing the channels and an advertisement for the reality show, "Ice love Coco" came on. My girlfriend turned to me and said, "Do you think Ice T is using her?" The question immediately struck a nerve. Actually to be honest, it pissed me off.

The first thing that popped into my head was the male/female gender roles. Or, more importantly, what my girlfriend thought they should be. The fact that they were an interracial couple didn't really make a difference. What pissed me off is that fact that my girlfriend felt that because Coco was a successful model, Ice T must have had some sort of angle for marrying her. It didn't matter that he was already a successful rapper/movie star/sitcom star. I dare say that it's very possible that he makes more money than her.

In her mind, he must be using her. Not to mention the fact that the couple have been happily married for much longer than most celebrity couples. She still believes it's a ruse. Now I'm not going to get into the many issues that my soon to be ex-girlfriend has, however I did feel the need to provide some context and thought that was the perfect example.

It was at that moment that I truly began to understand what was going on. I began to realize this feeling I've been feeling for years was a growing feeling of disgust for the lies and false expectations that society has placed on all men. And the more I searched, the more men I found that had stories just like mine. Some of the stories are my experiences almost word for word. It was right then and there that I realized this isn't an issue that is affecting only one race. This is an issue that crosses color lines and socio-economic lines.

So for the sake of this movement, I'm begging my fellow African American men or any men who would feel the need to separate our situation; please do not fall into that trap. We need to be a united front against this bullshit that we have had to endure for so long. The cost is too high and the stakes are too high to get involved in petty infighting. This is a war and, just like any war, our ranks are filled with men from all walks of life. The important thing that we need to realize is that we have one major thing in common. We are men and at the end of the day we have to cover one another's ass.

Race or class does not matter. So as I bring this letter to a close I must say I'm new to the MRM but I'm a long time prisoner to the misandry of this society. I have nothing but the utmost respect for people like Paul Elam, Angry

Harry, Dr. T, and anyone else who's leading the way in this movement. I can finally say I see the light at the end of the tunnel. People like them have given me the strength to stand up and no longer accept the shackles of the status quo. This has been a letter to my brothers. And when I say brothers, I mean all my brothers whether you have white, light, brown, or dark skin. Whether you're filthy rich or barely broke.

Whether you're fed up husbands, tired boyfriends, or good women who can no longer stand idly by and witness this injustice. You are all my brothers in arms and I plan to be on the front lines of the battlefield from here on out. Angry words, shaming tactics, and death threats don't scare me. I've been stabbed by women, unjustly thrown in jail, and even committed by a woman. I've been called a dead beat in child support court even though I supported my children (sometimes at the cost of my own well being). There's nothing left to do to me. So for all the Feminists out there; you don't scare me, because I would rather die than live in a world where boys like my sons are treated like their pain and suffer doesn't matter.

God bless all of you for what you are doing and I'll see you on the battlefield.

Passing an all important hat

As with every change of season, it is fundraising time at AVfM. It's one of four times a year we ask AVfM supporters to contribute to operations here.

Thanks to your help, we have enjoyed some progress in the battle to further a change in consciousness about men and boys, and some headway in the battle against cultural misandry. That progress does not come easily.

$7,195.00! We made it!
As evidenced by recent hostilities against this and other men's websites, we are causing a lot of concern in people who have had possession of the floor unchallenged for a long time now. Almost unthinkably, VAWA is now facing real opposition. More male- supportive voices are emerging and growing more strident. And because of this the enemy is reacting to us, to you, with unprecedented hostility.

I wish I could say this was going to be a quick, decisive battle; that the end was in sight. That is not the case. But finally things are beginning to change. That change is painfully slow, but undeniable in the face of their attempts to silence us.

First they ignore you…

AVfM is a proud and persistent part of the impetus for change. And we plan on stepping up the tempo as much as our resources will allow. That is where we must ask for your help.

In the past month we have changed over from an inexpensive shared hosting account to a dedicated server; a 2,500% increase in cost. We have substantial expenses for the radio program, images, legal fees, equipment and other business related items. And all that is before we spend one minute on the almost endless work it takes to manage all this.

We are most fortunate to have people like Alek's team, JtO, George and others volunteering the needed time and expertise to keep things afloat, but the financial demands are still great and increasing as we grow.

So once again I ask you to give us your support by visiting the donation buttons in the right column of the home page, with our thanks in advance. Without your help, we are just another blog.

This time, I want to leave you with a reminder of just how significant this place is. When the Huffington Post recently published an article attacking this website and the MRM in general, their comment section was overwhelmingly dominated with a diverse group of people calling bullshit, challenging the misandry in the article. Among the comments was one that follows. It exemplifies, at least in my mind, why we must keep this going, and why we must ultimately prevail. The comment is presented here unedited:

> 2 years ago my nephew had an experience that left him hopeless and struggling with daily thoughts of suicide. Therapeutic intervention had a minimal impact but he was directed to writings at a site AVFM per a recommendation I received from a former female student. There will be a lot of things said about this site but let me be the first to endorse the necessity of its existence as the empowerment that my nephew received literally "picked him up off the floor" with a message that contradicted societys tendency to reduce the value of mens lives to "doings" as opposed to the value of their "being." Two years later my nephew is in a doctorate program and is focusing much of his time on the devlopment of male counseling centers in collaboration with several of my former female students. I am forever indebted to the "MRM" for their role in my nephews currently restored faith in humanity. Its time we > stop minimizing the experiences of men. Whule one may not agree with all that the movement platforms, no attempts at understanding is unacceptable and may inevitably expedite the rapid detrioration of our society. And for those that reference the occasional issues with messaging, do we not understand the anger and frustration of those that are growing weary in their struggle to be heard by society? As a woman of color I get it and stand in solidarity with those men that have decided to stand up for themselves!

We are going to win this.

AVfM Radio: You say you want a Matriarchy?

John Hembling (JtO) · 22 March 2012 · Archived copy · Original

[box icon="none"]

So you say you want a matriarchy, eh?

John the Other and Girl Writes What will be examining this question tonight on AVfM Radio.

What is the natural outcome of a true matriarchal social system, in which in contrast to property and land being owned by men and passed through inheritance from father to son, it is owned by women, and passed by inheritance from mother to daughter. Idealistic feminists continue to insist that this is a more peaceful and utopian way of doing business for human cultures. Are they right? In tonight's show, we will apply a little bit of logical reasoning, as well as examining the outcomes of some currently extant matriarchal social models in real world application. The answer is unfortunately a violent, socially fragmented social system in which everyone is impoverished, and the most aggressive, violent and predatory men end up on top of it all. Opposing arguments are invited to call in to the show 310-388-9709

How feminists define gender traits

Zerbu · 23 March 2012 · Archived copy · Original

The ever so common feminist mantra in our misandric society is “men bad, women good.” To put it another way: men are inherently bad by nature, and women are inherently good by nature. If a man or boy ever displays a positive trait, or if a woman or girl ever displays a negative trait, it’s then identified as a social construct. In the mind of a feminist, and someone who believes feminism, women are the embodiment of everything good about the human species, and men are the embodiment of everything bad.

	Male	Female
Positive Trait	Learned	Innate
Negative Trait	Innate	Learned

Feminists switch between believing that all human behaviour is socially constructed, and believing that there is innate human behaviour, depending on whether the belief will support the “men bad, women good” mantra. They deny that there may be any innate positivity in males, or any innate negativity in females, by psychologically projecting any negative female traits onto males, and any positive male traits onto females. This way, they can continue to take down males.

How traits become male traits

Whenever someone who possesses male genitalia (that is quite literally the one and only requirement, a male personality isn’t even needed) displays a negative trait – it is a male trait. When someone with that same genitalia gets angry, it is “male aggression.” When a male does something stupid, it is because males are stupid.

This does not just apply to traits that are actually associated with maleness. The trait does not even have to actually be masculine for it to be seen as a typical male trait. As long as it is negative, and the person is male, it is a male trait. Even if it is equally likely to be displayed by females, it is still viewed as male behaviour. In fact, it could even be a typical female trait that is rarely displayed by a male, and feminists and other gynocentrics will still view it as a male trait, simply because it is something they don’t like.

The negative trait, whether it is typical male behaviour or not, gets attributed to the male gender. Even if it is only one person who has displayed it.

Of course, it is a common mistake for someone to attribute traits to someone’s gender, age, race, religion or other group, even if it is not a typical trait of that group, and this is a mistake that most people, regardless of their own gender, age, race, religion or other group, make. However, feminists and other gynocentrics not only go overboard with shaming the male gender in any way possible, but they even institutionalized their beliefs as the norm that men are bad and women are good.

Phrases such as “men are stupid”, “boys will be boys”, “sigh boys”, “all men are jerks” and many others can be used for any purpose, as long as the person they are used on has male genitalia.

Another thing worth mentioning is how male-on-male conflict is viewed in regards to gender. In a negative situation where both the perpetrator and the victim are male, it is often that both are blamed, even if the victim does everything he possibly can to avoid the situation. If a male so much as explains a lie that’s been told about him by another male, he is accused of retaliating, as a result of his maleness of course. The term “boys fighting” can be used even if only one boy is actually doing any fighting, though a male being a victim of male-on-male violence can be viewed as violent.

What they say about females who display negative traits

When a woman or girl displays a negative trait, unlike a man or boy, it is viewed as a social construct. For example, if a female ever perpetrates any kind of violence, it is always because a man wound her up (even if it is something stupid like not getting her the right gift, it is still the man's fault.) Some feminists even blindly blame negative traits displayed by females on patriarchal discrimination. Negative traits displayed by females can also be portrayed positively. For example, when a female attacks a male, even for a stupid reason, it is sometimes considered perfectly acceptable, and in our society where everyone has been poisoned with misandric views, it is assumed that the male deserved it.

When a male and female are in an argument, the female is usually the one believed by default. Why? Because according to feminists, females are never wrong, only males are. If the female is reacting negatively, it must have been because the male did something very bad, whereas if a male is reacting negatively, it's his nature. Some feminists even consider any male who dares say no to a female to be a misogynistic woman-hater.

Some people make jokes about how women and girls who do show negative traits or do stupid things are acting "like men/boys." This label can be applied whether the behaviour is masculine, neutral, or feminine. It just has to be negative to be seen as a male trait.

In situations where both the perpetrator and victim are female, unlike where both are male (which was mentioned above,) it is seen as a social construct and that both parties have suffered problems in their life. Many feminists try to label this as a result of the so-called patriarchy. Generally, neither are really "blamed" for the situation.

So, an outline on who is by default blamed for problems…

- Male problem: It is a result of his male stupidity.
- Female problem: It is a result of the patriarchy oppressing her.
- Male-on-male conflict: Both are to blame.
- Male-on-female conflict: The male is to blame.
- Female-on-male conflict: The male is to blame.
- Female-on-female conflict: It's a social construct forced by the patriarchy.

So remember, the feminist mentality is that there are no positive male traits or negative female traits, and anything that contradicts the "men bad, women good" mantra is a social construct. That, folks, is how feminists define gender traits. Anyone who dares to question it will be labelled a misogynist by feminists.

A message from Dan Moore (Factory)

Tom Givens · 24 March 2012 · Archived copy · Original

About 2 weeks ago, I made the decision to end my own life.

I have been living with severe depression, with varying degrees of success, for 27 years. As is common in those with depression, I didn't recognize the signs at first, and men present depression differently from women. Oddly enough, men tend to present as angry, when really they are depressed.

Of course, this is all old hat for me, and had nothing to do with recent events. Since its all over the net anyway, I might as well tell you all what happened so it may serve to help others understand they are not alone.

In addition to the usual MRM related shit and abuse, I've been carrying around some baggage in real life. And it's sorta relevant, so I'll bring it up.

I've been through abusive relationships, lost my children to poverty, lost a house and new car, been cheated on, used, and belittled. Like nearly everyone else. I've also been chronically underemployed, again like most people.

Pretty regular stuff really. But add in the depression and you have serious problems. And while in hospital, nearly everyone else in there was also there for depression. So again, I'm not exactly a special case. And in a perfectly regular way, I planned my own execution.

After I finished work, I was going to take the hose (exhaust hose, about 4 inches around) that I had bought, drive out to a secluded spot (not hard to find in SK) and gas myself. I sent out an email to those who would need to know what happened, thinking it was by then too late to stop me. Paul proved me wrong on that score, by the way. Oddly enough, it really pissed me off that I couldn't finish my work properly while I sat in the back of the cop car.

I've recently become rather disgusted with, and mistrustful of, police….but in this case, they made the right call. They 'arrested' me and took me to hospital, where I would spend the next week. And it was a good call, and I thank Paul for doing that. That might be because I have a supportive employer. It's probably because I'm still alive to say it.

In addition, the doctors were well aware of the predominance of male depression, as well as the stats on male suicide. Encouragingly, at least around these parts, they are very much interested in promoting the issues surrounding men and depression. A few nurses had even heard of the MRM, and one of them slipped and called me 'Factory' once. So I took heart in that a little, and I hope you do too.

I've regained my balance, by the way, so I think you may find me a little less angry these days. Still disjointed, but calmer. I have read many of the comments you have left, by the way, and as I said to Paul I'm flabbergasted, since I didn't really think anyone would care.

Apparently, depression fucks with a guys perspective.

Anyway, I hope this is enough for now. There may be something else coming out of this experience, and if so I'll let you all know. In the meantime, thanks again for your concern and support.

Alleged “gender-based” treatment

Zerbu · 25 March 2012 · Archived copy · Original

How often have you heard feminists give out the false notion that a woman or girl has been mistreated just because she is female? How often have you heard feminists claim that a man or boy has been praised or chosen for leadership positions just because he is male? If you regularly listen to what feminists say, or read what feminists write, chances are you have probably heard that a lot. But how exactly do feminists and other gynocentrics define this treatment? What factors take place for treatment to be considered gender-based? This has already partially explored this in the AVfM article “the inflated definition of misogyny“, but this article will go into further detail.

The basic idea is that feminists define anything negative that happens to a woman or girl as “gender-based” discrimination, and anything greatly positive that happens to a man or boy as a “gender-based” result of the patriarchy.

	Male	Female
Positive Situation	Gender-based privilege	She earned it
Negative Situation	He deserved it	Gender-based discrimination

False claims of gender-based discrimination against women and girls, and gender-based privilege for men and boys, are an important part of feminism’s lifeblood. These claims are what the feminist theories of the patriarchy, female oppression and male privilege stem from. In this article, a few common examples of what feminists consider gender-based treatment will be debunked. Remember, these are just examples.

Violence

Perhaps one of the most exaggerated form of so-called “discrimination” is violence. There are many attempts by feminists to stop violence against women, but not violence against men. It should be noted that men are much more likely to suffer physical violence than women. Boys are taught from a young age that they should never hit girls, even in self-defense. The media frequently shows violence against men and boys being portrayed as not only acceptable, but funny, but when a more minor version of this happens to a woman once the feminists have a shitfit. [1] It could be said that much more violence occurs against men because they are men than violence against women because they are women.

Even though men are far more likely to suffer physical violence, feminists still insist that women receive extra protection from such forms of violence, and continuously blame the minority of physical violence that is inflicted against females on discrimination. This is not because females generally have less physical strength, it is because they are female.

When it comes to violence, the term “gender-based” simply means against a woman or girl even if her gender has nothing to do with why the violence was done.

Work and Hiring

Take a look at how feminists react when a man is chosen for a job over a woman. Feminists will often blame this on discrimination, even if the man is more qualified for the job. Also take a look at how feminists react when a high-rank or even decent-rank job is male dominated. They claim that this is due to discrimination. If someone were to ask: “why are there so few male hairdressers?” how would you answer? Surely most of you would answer by stating that it is because fewer men apply for those jobs. Well the same should be said about women in male-dominated jobs: it is because fewer women apply for those jobs. Feminists don’t get that, though.

Exclusion

If a group or club consists of mostly men or all men, many feminists will blame this on discrimination. It could easily be that fewer women decided to join the group or club, or that fewer met the requirements to join, but feminists will still blame it on discrimination. It is possible for a group or club to openly rule itself as “women only” but when a group or club appears to only allow men in the eyes of feminists, well, that’s a whole different story.

Authority

If a female boss or leader, be it at a job, school or even a group or club, is not respected or obeyed, especially if the people she is in charge of are male, feminists will often blame it on discrimination. There are a variety of other reasons this may be happening. It could be that the people she is in charge of don’t like her management style, or are just disobedient in general, but regardless of whether it is her fault or not, there are possible reasons other than gender discrimination.

Family Treatment

If a boy in a family is treated better than a girl, many feminists will blame this on discrimination. Actually, in many households, it is actually girls who are given preferential treatment over boys. If a girl is treated worse than a boy, there are plenty of other reasons, good or stupid, that are not based on her gender. It could be that the boy has earned the treatment more (in the family’s opinion) or that the family favors older or younger children. All families work differently, but treating boys better than girls is certainly not the norm.

The end of tolerance

Jim Muldoon · 26 March 2012 · Archived copy · Original

Mary Crooks, the executive director of the Victorian Women's Trust (Victorian Women's Trust, 2012), wrote an opinion piece in the Australian newspaper, The Age, entitled Breaking The Cycle (Crooks, 2012). This article takes up the call, so often heard nowadays, for men to speak out to end the violence against women and girls.

She starts off like this:

"True story. People hovered in the chemist shop waiting area. She felt one of the guys looking her up and down. In taking his turn to speak with the chemist, he said loudly – 'You can always tell a depressed lesbian can't you?' Mildly discomforted, the chemist remained silent."

Now how about that? She was "looked up and down". The poor thing! Not just up, but down as well.

And as for the loud statement, was that an insult? I can almost hear John Cleese, looking over the ramparts at King Arthur crying in that silly French accent "Your mother is a depressed lesbian."

And a little translation for Americans: Chemist = Pharmacist.

Now, a quick "whodunit", Who's the problem, here? The man who made the loud comment? The woman?

O ye of limited vision! Clearly it was the chemist! Crooks explains:

"By choosing silence, the chemist becomes what filmmaker Abigail Disney describes as a 'tolerator' – someone who knows that another's behaviour is unacceptable, but offers no resistance or contestation. The 'tolerator' becomes complicit in the other's action. Without challenge, the guilty party receives tacit permission to continue behaving boorishly."

Now I know that the chemist experienced some mild discomfort and all, but really! Fuck him, right? Fucking tolerator!

So, should the chemist have reached under the counter for his shotgun? Or perhaps given the man poison instead of his hay fever tablets?

Nothing so harsh! Crooks asks:

"Why the silence? The chemist could have said with a soft smile, 'Mate, there's no need to talk like that,' sending the other man a signal that his abuse was unacceptable. Lacking social sanction, his customer might think again and even change his ways."

In other words, a fairly uninteresting event at the chemist's shop could have had an entirely different, yet equally trivial, conclusion.

Let me turn a moment here to discuss that noted filmmaker, Abigail Disney. You've heard of her, right? Me neither. I had to look her up.

Apparently Disney made a documentary about "women power" in Liberia. The Liberian women got political, wore white T-shirts, got rid of the dictator Charles Taylor (sanctions, international pressure and government bankruptcy had absolutely nothing to do with it) and elected a woman, Ellen Johnson Sirleaf in 2006 (PBS, 2011).

You go, girls! Right?

The fact that Sirleaf was re-elected with a Mugabe or Putin like 90.7% of the vote (CIA, 2012) doesn't cause the likes of Disney to make another documentary. Not even when the UN declares "Liberia is a source, transit, and destination country, principally for young women and children subjected to forced labor and sex trafficking." The UN also notes that no one has been successfully prosecuted in Liberia for this trafficking since 2005 when new laws were created specifically to outlaw this practice (UNHCR, 2011).

Recently, Sirleaf was in the news again for her country's laws which criminalise homosexuality. Sirleaf approves of the law. (Ford & Allen, 2012).

All of this is after Sirleaf has been in power more than six years. Whatever is going on in Liberia, it ain't good. And, it ain't Patriarchy. My guess is that's why there's a lack of follow up documentaries.

So that gives Disney all the credibility of the next person you meet in a bus queue. It also means she's a "tolerator".

Let's get back to Crooks and the tolerating chemist. Now, of course, what Crooks wants to tell us is that it is everyday conversations like these, multiplied throughout the country, that cause an epidemic of rape and violence against women. We go from mild discomfort to "life-long trauma" in one long continuum of violence.

So, let's follow the logic. The chemist should have spoken up, but didn't, so call him out as a tolerator!

But, there were other people in that shop. Why stop at the chemist? Should another man have said to the chemist, with soft smile, "Mate, that's just tolerating bad behaviour"?

And should another, other man; let's call him the man who saw the man who saw the chemist tolerating. Should he have said, "Mate, we just don't need to tolerate a man tolerating."

Where does it end?

With all this distraction, you almost forget about the woman. She, who will remain nameless, who was looked up and down, and no matter what you might think of her, was not a depressed lesbian (not that there's anything wrong with that). Isn't she giving anyone a soft smile and a mild, understanding, respectful, strong, affirming, gentle, caring yet confronting reprimand?

Apparently not! Crooks clearly assumes that women are not up to the task. In a world where they talk about fighting for equality, that surely doesn't include speaking up at the chemist. There will be no group of women in white T-shirts voting in a new chemist in this town.

No. According to Crooks, women will only be truly equal when men go to the pharmacy and speak up for them. And, I presume, the moment men stop speaking up, women will become unequal again.

Is Crooks a feminist or a misogynist?

Is she saying that women really are equal to men, but oppressed? Or are they actually less than men? Is it really that men are superior? So superior, in fact, that they can pretend women are equal by speaking up for them whenever they need it at the chemist, but do it in soft gentle way that seems so feminine that the women think they're actually in control?

Thankfully, Crooks resorts to the sacred babble to clear it up:

"Men need to learn and practise ways that confront and ultimately supplant the culture of masculinity that sustains violent behaviour. Increasingly, with community education and positive support, men need to be prepared and equipped to confront their male peers in everyday situations – family gatherings, staff rooms, office corridors, parliamentary life, building sites, clubrooms, online, and at the chemist shop – sending clear signals that sexist, abusive and violent attitudes and behaviour are just not on."

So the example of the chemist shop, if I can wade through the unsupported claims, is not just a badly chosen example because Crooks doesn't know anyone who has actually been sexually assaulted. She is quite serious. She wants that sort of tolerating to stop at pharmacies throughout the land.

Now where will men get that "community education and positive support" you might ask? My guess would be from the Victorian Women's Trust that Crooks runs. Is this letter an opinion piece or a fund raiser? You be the judge.

Another question is this: Why are Good Men to be Crooks' eyes and ears in the community sniffing out sexism everywhere? Why doesn't Crooks cut out the middle-men, who are clearly not doing the job anyway, and get her sorry arse over to the chemist's shop and sort the whole lot out herself?

I don't know about you, but I can't really follow the logic here. If women need men to speak up for them in order to be equal, why do men need to be shown how to do that by a woman who, by Crooks' own definition, does not have the capacity to speak up and so needs a man to speak up for her. Doesn't that just disappear up its own arse?

And another thing to note: Crooks isn't suggesting that Liberian men have a soft smile and a gentle word with Ellen Johnson Sirleaf. Not even the gay men. No documentaries, white T-shirts and monitored elections for them.

No, this behaviour correction method is required for males only. This follows the typical feminist argument of women are victims, men are bullies, so Good Men must intervene. But is this attitude adjustment technique as benign as Crooks would have us believe?

Consider the case of Vivienne Dye, who sued the Commonwealth Securities Limited (owned by the Commonwealth Bank) and two of its employees for sexual harassment and worse (Australian Legal Information Institute, 2012).

Dye made complaints of sexual harassment initially against Michael Blomfield at the bank. She turned to a friend and colleague, Angus Patterson for assistance, friendship and support.

Later she raised complaints against Patterson, too, including digital rape.

Was Dye a woman who decided to stop tolerating behaviour that was not on, and spoke up? Was she a woman asking the Good Man, in the form of the courts, to intervene and stop this harassment? That's certainly the appearance she gave early on in the proceedings:

"Vivienne Dye claims she was subjected to psychological bullying and alienation and her employment as a public relations manager terminated after she made it clear that she was not interested in having an affair with Michael Blomfield, an executive general manager, whom she worked below (Kontominas, 2009)."

And, as in all matters of principle, the complainant was asking for more than one million dollars in compensation (Carson, 2008).

According to the Judge Buchanan's judgement years later, Dye's written testimony was "… progressively altered, re-recorded, edited, polished, embellished and even substantially changed as though it was a novel." He also did not believe much of what she had to say at the trial, apart from her name and a few other corroborated details (Australian Legal Information Institute, 2012).

Essentially, the Judge came to the view that Dye was lying from beginning to end for her own gain. When her complaints were challenged, she just upped the ante by making more serious claims.

What Dye was hoping for, it seems, is that a "community educated and positively supported" man would step up to those she accused and say "Guys, you should settle this now for a reasonable sum and save this poor woman any more trouble?"

The judge pointed out that the burden on the bank and the two men would have been "very substantial" and noted that the pressure to reach a settlement for the bank would have been considerable. These pressures would have been to avoid negative publicity and to pay Dye something rather than pay even more to their legal teams.

Importantly, the judge continues "However, the costs incurred, and other burdens assumed, by the respondents could not have been avoided if the truth was to emerge."

In other words, had the bank tolerated Dye's dishonesty and paid up, she would have been rewarded for her dishonesty, and those two men would have a constant shadow over their reputation and career for the rest of their lives.

They may have won their case, but at what cost? Dye's accusations punished them for years. This is the type of news report Mr Blomfield got to enjoy with his wife, two children and other family and friends:

Bank Bigwig 'dirty danced'

"…Mr Blomfield had shown her a tattoo above his buttocks and had been "dirty dancing" with other female bank employees, Ms Dye said (Kontominas, 2009)."

And

Sacked woman 'shunned bank exec's offer'

"A top bank executive who made unwanted sexual advances to employee Vivienne Dye worked his way into her heart before doing the "most disrespectful thing a man can do", she told a Sydney court (Drummond, 2009)."

So back to the chemist's shop. Crooks declares the man, who looked the woman up and down, as the "the guilty party". His crime, of course, is "behaving boorishly". The chemist is "complicit" in this crime.

In all seriousness, Crooks declares boorish behaviour as a crime that is worthy of a concerted effort of all Australian Good Men. Normally, life would punish the truly boorish man with no friends, no love life, no promotions at work, etc. But this is not enough for Crooks. Every boorish sentence he utters, every boorish look he gives, should receive immediate condemnation.

But that, of course, is if you believe Crooks' interpretation of the incident.

What if the woman was a depressed lesbian? What if the man mistook the woman for someone he knew, and was making a private joke? What if the man had serious mental health issues, and his carer had only left him for a moment to go back to the car to get his wallet? What if the woman had been repeatedly insulting the man, but the chemist didn't hear it?

What if the story Crooks told wasn't true at all?

And of course, there is nothing fairer, nothing more tolerant, than a group of people at the chemist deciding that one person is in the wrong. Remember the good the Hitler Youth did in Nazi Germany?

And I can think of a worse crime than boorishness.

Sanctimony!

Recently, we had what was called a landmark case in Australia regarding sexual assault. Kristy Fraser-Kirk sued department store David Jones and its former CEO Mark McInnes.

McInnes, Fraser-Kirk alleged, had touched her bra-strap; on another occasion put his hand under her shirt at the front and touched the bottom of her bra; made a few attempts to kiss her in public; and invited back her back to his place for, she assumed but he didn't state it, sex. (Metherell, 2010)

For this harassment, Fraser-Kirk wanted 37 million dollars. That's right! 37 and six zeroes. More money than me and ten other guys will earn in five lifetimes. For attempted kissing and actual bra contact!

Can someone at David Jones touch my undies? Please?

So, it is hardly surprising to see a year later in the newspapers, "AUSTRALIA'S biggest ever sexual harassment case – Kristy Fraser-Kirk v David Jones – has emboldened scores of other victims to take on their harassers. (Bibby, 2011)"

And don't forget – no one came to Fraser-Kirk's aid. The alleged harasser was repeatedly thwarted by Fraser-Kirk herself. He tried to kiss her and she stopped it. No gun, no knife. She just turned away.

Now, when the case was announced, Fraser-Kirk declared she would give the money to charity. "I just want to be treated with respect" she declared (Metherell, 2010).

It was also quoted that her legal team, too, were in it for the principle by working pro bono. Not only that, but Fraser-Kirk claimed in a statement that there were six other women who would make similar allegation against McInnes and David Jones (Knight, 2010). The implication being that Fraser-Kirk and her team were concerned for these women, and women everywhere "… this should never happen to me or to anyone" Fraser-Kirk told the press (Metherell, 2010).

Fast forward some months later to the settlement of a meagre $850,000 (twenty times the average annual salary). Here we find that Fraser-Kirk is keeping what's left of the money after her legal team pocket their fees (Jamal & Hinch, 2010). The other six women got the same as the charities. Nothing. The reported nobility, it seems, was lost in the negotiations.

Because the case was settled out of court, we'll never know what really happened in the David Jones boardroom, etc.

So, was Fraser-Kirk vindicated because she got a settlement? Did David Jones and McInnes buy their way out of trouble?

Or was it simply a hard-headed business decision for David Jones, unlike the Commonwealth Bank, to cut its losses?

What certainly seemed to help Fraser-Kirk's case was the media publicity that the unprecedented $37 million claim was guaranteed to bring (Knight, 2010). After all, the publicity had a negative impact on their share price (Funnell, 2010). It is unlikely they would ever recover the full cost of their legal fees, never mind the commercial damage, from Fraser-Kirk.

But what is more important here is that a Watershed Case (capital letters intentional) is not for a heinous crime. At worst, it is unwelcome, clumsy flirtation and almost, but not quite, being groped. That's if you believe Fraser-Kirk's story in its entirety.

The complaint is more about what McInnes could have meant; tried but failed to do; and where it could have ended up. McInnes and David Jones were being punished for women being exploited everywhere rather than for whatever it was McInnes had actually done.

So, back to the pharmacy again. Last time, promise.

It's not what actually happened at the chemist's shop, but what it might lead to that is to be our concern.

For this, all men get punished by this tale. Even those of us who were not there are supposed to take on some guilt. We should be preparing ourselves, even getting some training, to thwart this evil should it show its ugly head in our neighbourhood again.

I'm surprised she didn't even come up with a pledge: If anyone, anywhere, makes a remark with any negative, sexists, connotations; I want a Victorian Women's Trust trained agent to be there. I will be that agent.

Instead of minding their own business, men everywhere are to monitor everything going on around them. At all times. No idle day dreaming while waiting in the queue. Don't be listening to your iPod. No, no.

Listen to any and all conversations and interfere at the first sign of potential sexism, otherwise you might be guilty of tolerating.

Crooks is right about one thing. We are "tolerators". We, as a society, tolerate feminist bullshit.

Crooks writes this article for a National newspaper. She quotes statistics without giving proper sources; she makes connections that are quite illogical; she quotes filmmakers as though they were experts; she puts a guilt trip on completely innocent men; and no one says, soft smile or not, "Mate, you can do better than that."

Instead, they publish it! It gives her ideas a credence they do not deserve.

Crooks' victory over "tolerance" won't be the Utopia of mild admonishments by Good Men she proposes. Like Liberia's election of Sirleaf, problem A will simply be replaced by problem B.

Let me ask this question: How will you know when a man is tolerating?

Answer: When he's leaving other men alone.

Instead of all men respecting all women, we will have zealous agents constantly meddling in other peoples affairs and trying to out-do each other with soft smiles and constant admonitions.

"Mate, you don't have to talk like that" says the chemist.

"Mate," says the man who saw the chemist speak up, "It's good that you spoke up. But, you need to explain more about where he went wrong."

"Mate," says the man who saw the man who saw the chemist speak up, "I don't know that you need to explain anything. But, I thought you should have spoken up sooner when he was looking her up and down."

What happens when Good Men get told to fuck off and mind their own business? At what point do the women and the good men resort to the courts to show their intolerance?

And, can we really expect all women to refuse to turn this to their own advantage and everyone else can go fuck themselves? Dye proves we can't; Liberia proves we can't; and Fraser-Kirk raises real concerns.

Personally, I think problem B is a much bigger problem than anything that might be said at the chemist's shop.

AVfM Radio: If you’re sick of the princess, kill the prince

Dr. Paul & Dr. T · 26 March 2012 · Archived copy · Original

Do you throw up a little in your mouth whenever you hear a woman say she expects her man to “treat her like a princess?” Are you tired of the Princess Mentality exhibited by so many women today? Then it’s time to stop playing page, serf and vassal to her self-appointed highness.

With the exception of the few remaining royal houses, princesses aren’t born, they’re made. Well-meaning parents buy Disney princess costumes for their little girls and refer to their daughters as their “little princesses.”

Here’s the problem: Many little princesses grow up to become adult princesses with out of control entitlement issues, believe it’s all about them, all the time and that their wants and feelings trump all else. Self-appointed princesses typically don’t see their partners as equals, but rather as subjects who live to serve them. Reciprocity? Pfft.

For the men out there who haven’t figured out that a woman who refers to herself as princess is best avoided (huge red flag), this show is for you. It’s time to stop playing vassal to Her Monstrosity (i.e., her monstrous, over-inflated ego) and time to learn that healthy love relationships are about treating one another with MUTUAL respect, dignity, integrity, love, affection, consideration, getting back what you give and not treating one partner like royalty.

Please join your co-hosts, Dr Tara Palmatier of Shrink4Men and “Dr Paul” Elam of AVfM on Monday, March 26, 2012 at 9pm EST, when they’ll discuss a big part of the Princess Problem: Men who buy into these royal pains in the arse.

Barry Nolan: Boston Magazine's TV critic and gender expert

John Hembling (JtO) · 27 March 2012 · Archived copy · Original

[quote]Looking at men in government and saying they have all the power is like looking at women in grocery stores and saying they have all the food. ~Jack Kammer [/quote]

Barry Nolan, on Monday, March 26 published an article on Boston Magazine's online edition issuing a harsh critique of MRAs, declaring that white men rule, and asking a rhetorical question.

"So why do so many of them whine about how tough it is to be a white man?"

I suspect Nolan thought that was a question with no valid answer besides "they're whiney babies," but I'd hazard to guess that some reasons men whine about their social station is because of the workplace death rate, dominated by men. According to the US Department of Labor the sexual distribution of individuals killed on the job improved to the benefit of men in 2010. With an improvement of 1 percent, only 92% of those killed on the job in 2010 were men.

We also have the homelessness rate, which is 90% men[1], or the fact that 4 out of 5 suicides are male.[2] It might also be the fact that educational outcomes are dominated by women from high-school to the attainment of advanced degrees, and female favouring affirmative action programs in funding and program access remain. It might also be title IX legislation used to justify the closure of male-preferred extra-curricular programs across the country, It might even be that despite more than a decade after the near universal ban on female genital mutilation in western nations, infant boys are routinely subject to the unnecessary removal of the most sensitive part of their sexual organ with no anesthetic, and those openly complaining are mocked for efforts to protect male infants from this stone age brutalization. These are just a few guesses as to why some men might not feel terribly privileged.

Nolan points to the floor of US congress to prove his case that men rule and thus, being male is an exercise in privilege. What he doesn't say is that first, those representatives of masculine supremacy are elected by a majority of voters who are female[2][3]. Nolan also indulges himself in repeated commissions of the Apex Fallacy, which is the assignment the characteristics of the highest visibility members of a group to all members of that group. Most senators are male, thus, most males are senators. This works just as well substituting CEOs or other high-profile, high status roles in society. This fallacy deliberately ignores that almost all coal miners, garbage collectors, and day labourers are also male. These are roles at the bottom of social hierarchy and near the top in terms of danger, as well as providing a much larger and more representative sample of the lives of the majority of men. After iterating through instances of the apex fallacy using corporate CEOs and supreme court justices, Nolan manages to avoid considering the entire rest of the world where everyone else lives, and concludes that "by almost any metric, any statistic, it works out to be a pretty deal to be a white male". Suicide rates, homelessness, death in the workplace notwithstanding, it's certainly a joy being the only demographic for whom open contempt hatred, and scorn is publicly praiseworthy.

Nolan might not have gotten away with this if he'd singled out men as a sexual demographic, but tossing "white" into the mix and he's free and clear. The Boston columnist also claims confusion about "why so many white men like me can be found whining".

In the current and rising proliferation of writing on issues of male human rights, detailing exactly what men's areas of concern are, repeating and re-iterating issues from biased criminal courts, family courts, health care, access to education, biased hiring practices, public vilification, media mockery, and reproductive rights, just to name a few; Nolan's claimed incomprehension seems implausible.

According to Nolan, himself a self-admitted white man "the system is so stacked in our favour, it's almost embarrassing." However, like every feminist who every screeched "check your privilege" – he somehow forgets to name a single specific instance of male privilege. It's almost as if he couldn't think of any, almost, dare I say, that hes repeating a fabricated myth of male privilege, without giving the matter any critical examination at all.

Nolan carries on to decry rising opposition to the Violence Against Woman Act, claiming that this opposition is because the updated VAWA adds protection to lesbian, gay, transgender and bisexual individuals.

> [Senator] Grassley and the far right don't want to see it pass in its current form because it extends some of its protections to LGBT victims, Native American victims, and some illegal immigrants. Because of what? Because it should be OK to brutalize them?

The actual reason for the growing opposition to VAWA is that the language would undermine the most basic principal of western justice – lowering the standard of evidence for conviction of a crime. The bill also approaches domestic violence from the philosophical conception of the Duluth Model, in which all violence is a manifestation of patriarchal evil. This model of "understanding" domestic violence disregards the gender symmetry inherent in the problem, disregards causal factors such as poverty, alcohol or drug addiction, psychological disorders, trauma affecting adult behavior and reduces all partner violence to a simplistic and false black and white cartoon where men are predators and women are their victims.

This model disregards female perpetrators by design, which necessarily disregards the men and children that are their victims. This, legitimized by "primary aggressor," and "mandatory arrest" laws, results in pro-female scripted police work and incentivized prosecutions against men. All of this operates in a framework of irrational laws that inflict lasting damage on families, communities and children.

So no, Mr Nolan, its not protection of individuals practicing alternate sexual lifestyle that fosters opposition to unconstitutional laws.

None of this manages to merit notice in Nolan's analysis. According to him "The passage of the bill has also been muddied by — well — mud. Stuff crazy people make up and throw out there to make it seem like it's somehow a radical or controversial idea to try to stop people from beating up women."

Mud? Crazy people? It certainly would be radical to "stop people from beating up women." If anybody was trying to stop other people from beating up women, that would be crazy. In fact, anyone openly cultivating violence could easily be called radical. Oddly however, in spite of Barry Nolan's rhetoric, nobody seriously opposing VAWA's re-authorization has demonstrated any such sinister agenda, which probably explains why Nolan didn't even try to offer evidence of the mud and crazy people.

Of course, being a professional writer, Nolan would not expose himself to the deserved scorn following his naked use of ad-hominem or straw-man argument. It seems obvious, since those formal logical fallacies are so easy to spot. The Boston writer reveals himself by next mentioning the recent and hilariously inept attempt by the Southern Poverty Law Center to ride the wave of reactionary vitriol right-wing commentator Rush Limbaugh attracted by excoriating a 30 year old feminist with the word slut. The SPLC tried to capitalize on anti-right-wing backlash against Limbaugh by scratching together a list of unrelated websites disapproved-of by left leaning bloggers and authoritarian progressive conformists.

Nolan is of course, late to the party in jumping on the SPLC's bandwagon, as the slapdash, irresponsible fear-mongering of the SPLC has already been roundly criticized by reason magazine[4], business insider[5], the american spectator[6], Christian Science Monitor[7] and even the Huffington Post[8][9] and World Net Daily[10], who pointed out that according to the SPLC, if you're not on the political left, you are a hate group.

Reason Magazine's Mike Riggs[11] posted a comment on twitter stating: he has "zero interest in supporting the SPLC's shoddy work".

Undaunted by lack of any cited evidence in his own article, Nolan soldiers on to declare: "One of the things these groups [Men's Rights Groups] like to do is generate baloney statistics about how men are the "real victims" of domestic violence." Actually, speaking only for myself, but with awareness of my own small influence in the men's movement, I happen to prefer locating and citing peer-reviewed research, and reputably sourced statistics in support of my opinions. Such as a growing body of research[12][13][14][15][16][17] indicating that contrary to the popular narrative that domestic violence is sexually directional, men-abusing women, it's committed more or less equally by women and men, and cannot be rationally addressed by any model ignoring the behavior of half the participants.

This is similar to the logic of fighting a structure fire by pouring water on only the North and East facing walls, but letting the South and West facing walls burn freely. Nolan's characterization of the evidence-based objection to ideological modelling of DV is that men attempt to claim ownership of victimhood as "the /real victims/ of domestic violence."

Of course, he has no supporting evidence of this. He doesn't cite any evidence in refuting this argument, but employs emotional appeal to sweep such arguments aside without examination.

As proof of the impossible insanity of men arguing for their own civil rights, Nolan goes to youtube of all places, citing the video on the satire channel of a user called RamzPaul. In other news, The Onion is a comedy channel, and the FlintStones cartoon series was not a BBC anthropology documentary.

Nolan also repeats the SPLC's claim of the prevalence of female victimization pulled from a 2005 Bureau of Justice Statistics report, which oddly, the SPLC does not link to. In the report[18] a claimed 86% of the victims of partner violence are female, while 75% of deaths within a domestic violence context are female. What Nolan does not mention – but which seems obvious is that justice department reporting on rates of partner violence victimization is necessarily self-selected data, based on reported incidents involving police or other law enforcement agencies. This is confirmed in the methodology section of the BJS report which neither the SPLC nor Barry Nolan even stirred themselves to link to.[18]

The following paragraphs are copied directly from the methodology section of the BJS report:

> "SHR (Supplementary Homicide Reports) data are based solely on police investigation. Not all law enforcement agencies which report offense information to the FBI also submit supplemental data on murder. At the time of analysis, the most recent SHR data contained information on 12,940 of the 16,204 murders reported in the FBI's Uniform Crime Report. To account for the total number of homicides, the SHR data were weighted to match national and State murder estimates prepared by the FBI. All victim-based analyses are adjusted in this manner. "
> "The dataset utilized in this report was compiled by James Alan Fox, the Lipman Family Professor of Criminal Justice at Northeastern University. The dataset, along with additional details about imputation and estimation procedures, is available from the National Archive of Criminal Justice Data."
> "To compare family violence recorded by police to nonfamily violence recorded by police, this report utilizes official police statistics reported to the Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI) in 2000."

The rates of victimization by sex and other group identifications within this report quite obviously represents only those incidents reported to police, and which were accepted by responding officers as incidents in the category of domestic victimization. Unconsidered is the known tendency of men to under report domestic violence, and the vast amount of interpersonal violence that does not involve intervention by state functionaries. In some cases, men attempting to seek police intervention in their own defense are arrested, despite being the true victim of violence at the scene. To consider this single study applicable to the general population is absurd.

The grass-roots campaign canvassing the White House to establish a Council on Boys and men states in introduction of their July 2011 Maryland Report:

> The most confusing, perplexing, and controversial area in which men's health needs are overlooked is the issue of male victims of domestic violence. One immediately noticeable trend is the strong tendency to focus solely on female victims and ignore male victims. This tendency is seen repeatedly.

In 2009, Dr. Denise A. Hines of Clark University and Dr. Emily Douglas of Bridgewater State College presented conclusions of their research on partner violence in a lecture called "Men who Sustain Partner Violence and Seek Help: Their Abuse and Help Seeking Experiences and Implications for Prevention."[18]

Clark and Douglas found that population-based studies indicate 25-50% of all partner victims in a given year are men. These men are generally ashamed to come forward, and expect that they will not be believed. They also feared that they would be accused of being the aggressor if they sought help.

Vivian L. Holley is an attorney has been practicing family law and mediation since 1978. Holley maintains a blog[19] in which she addressed the findings of Clark and Douglas's research, pointing out that: "Almost all domestic violence shelters and hotlines offer services only to women. Most men were either turned away or referred to batterers programs. […] Ninety-seven percent experienced the local domestic violence agency to be biased against men; 80% did not treat men victims of domestic violence; and 69% suggested the male victim was really the batterer!"

Barry Nolan, just prior to concluding his piece indulges in some direct lying, by declaring: "If you really really don't want to get beat up, killed, or thrown in jail, my suggestion to you would be to become a white male." Nolan is indulging in misdirection here. It's true that caucasian men are subject to lesser violent criminal victimization than black men, but Nolan's insistence on framing this as a racial issue is deeply dishonest. The men's movement is not a black versus white movement. White women are victimized by violence at lower rates to white men. Black women are victimized by violence at lower rates than black men. In criminal sentencing the same pattern emerges. Nolan manages to completely avoid the persistent problem of produced violence and criminality within communities and the relationship of that violence to fatherlessness, economic hardship, drug abuse and poor educational opportunities, all of which are functions of domestic policy, driven by what is increasingly obvious as an ideological narrative.[21]

But forget all that. According to Nolan it's about being white and male. That's the politically popular narrative, and somebody somewhere is giving Barry a cookie for saying so. Nolan concludes by announcing himself a mangina. Not a word I use, since it conveys appropriate contempt, but lacks explanatory power. In the public discourse of escalating acceptable hatred against men, white or otherwise, Barry Nolan is bending his back to be a good one. A good man, as distinct from bad men who openly complain as their identities are marginalized and their human rights set quietly out of site. The correct term for the good man identity Nolan seeks for himself is not mangina. It is collaborator.

AVfM Radio: Proxy violence and outsourced harm

[box icon="none"]

In tonight's edition of A Voice for Men Radio, JtO and GWW take a closer look at violence. Necessary in this examination is discarding the childish notion that all, or even most violence in the world is direct. The use of violence by proxy, at once or more remove is the principal way that we disguise the use of violent force, from others, as well as hiding our own violence from ourselves, if we experience the ethical failing of the use of force.

The proxy violence of ideologues opposing the human rights of men is thrown under a bright light tonight with Hosts John the Other and Girl Writes What. The call in number for the show is 310-388-9709

A slight problem for the opposition

Paul Elam · 29 March 2012 · Archived copy · Original

Some time ago I issued a respectful challenge to the American Men's Studies Association (AMSA) to explain how they could claim to advocate for men and boys when their literature and activism appears so completely based on negative and misleading male stereotypes. I also invited them to support the still ongoing initiative to further the idea of "male studies," a move toward a scholarly understanding of men and boys outside any political or ideological control.

What I got back was a dismissive and condescending reply from Michael Kimmel in which he claimed intellectual ownership of the study of males, and laid out AMSA's alleged objectives using the four legs of a table as a metaphor.

Said Kimmel:

> We are pro-feminist, which means we believe in gender equality. (2) We are gay-affirmative, which means we support the rights of all men to live lives of dignity and love, free of all discrimination, regardless of their sexuality. (3) We are anti-racist, which means that, again, we support the rights of all men to live lives of integrity and love, free of all discrimination, regardless of their race. (4)And we believe in "enhancing men's lives" by which we mean that we want to enable all men to live lives of integrity and happiness.

These are the four legs of AMSA's table; four statements which they proudly hail as guiding principles. But what do these statements say about their perspective on men as a whole? Where is any statement addressing the plurality of men? Do we not exist unless we are gay or black or feminist? And if we are one of those things, do we exist at all, as men?

The answer is no. To AMSA, to be male is to be privileged, and if you are male the only way to prove you are not privileged is to prove that you belong to some other disadvantaged group.

Those four legs are just four divisive postmodern guises; four attempts to attract those that feel disenfranchised and help them feel included, not as men, but as whatever other demographic makes them acceptable.

That is the wobbly intellectual infrastructure of AMSA's agenda, which is not to further service to men and boys, but to further feminist doctrine – predominately for the benefit of white, middleclass western females, who currently hold more privilege than any of other class of people in human history; much of it with no compensatory obligations or responsibilities.

This is the "equality" AMSA is selling, and they need "men" to pay the invoice. AMSA's so called table is just something to stand on and characterize anyone who opposes them as racist, homophobic, regressive and misogynistic.

Now, as recent developments are bearing out, the 50 year reign of cultural denial about their real agenda is coming to an end. The cat's head is poking out of the bag and the countdown has begun till more reasoned, less hateful voices dominate social discourse on the sexes.

One of those voices is this one; A Voice for Men, a growing collection of diverse and sometimes divergent individuals bound primarily by a passionate concern for what is happening in the world of modern men and boys.

We also subscribe to a set of principles that have been shaped by our common beliefs, and they have been expressed in a number of ways on the pages of this website.

I'd like to do so again because AMSA's metaphorical "table" provides a succinct backdrop against which to illustrate our differences, and because of late certain elements in the mainstream have been peddling lies about our nature.

Let's take a look at the legs of AMSA's table again and compare it to our own bit of woodwork around here.

AMSA says:

(1)We are pro-feminist, which means we believe in gender equality.

We say:

We believe in gender equality, which means we believe in gender equality. We also happen to think men are a part of that picture; an equal part. This is what makes us distinct from feminist organizations like AMSA, and also addresses the recent rash of disinformation about the MRM, part of which is the fallacy that MRA's support traditional gender roles and want to go back to the 1950s. Try to find any significant writer or activist in the men's movement who has ever said such a thing. You will fail. Those voices don't exist in the MRM. We don't want to turn back the clock or force anyone, anyone, into a life of expectations based on gender. Those obsolete ideas are a great part of what we are fighting to end. If you have come to this website because you have been told otherwise, you have been lied to.

AMSA says:

(2) We are gay-affirmative, which means we support the rights of all men to live lives of dignity and love, free of all discrimination, regardless of their sexuality.

We say:

We support the rights of all men to live lives of dignity and love, free of all discrimination, which means that we support the rights of all men to live lives of dignity and love, free of all discrimination.

One of the most outlandish claims against the MRM is that our agenda is homophobic. Admittedly, we don't have an AMSA-like, special interest designation like "gay affirmative," on the masthead of our website. Nor will we ever. We do, though, offer gay men what places like AMSA never can; We accept them first, and only, as men. Their sexuality is not a qualifier or a disqualifier. It is not really cared about in any way. It's blind inclusion. They are men. No politics, no shame, no patronizing.

And many of us believe that is curative. If there is a single wound that society has long inflicted on gay men, it is the ostracizing message that they are not men (because they are largely free from taking care of women). Even supposedly progressive organizations, like AMSA, draw lines according to sexuality, creating not a table, but another wall between heterosexual and homosexual men.

AMSA says:

(3) We are anti-racist, which means that, again, we support the rights of all men to live lives of integrity and love, free of all discrimination, regardless of their race.

We say:

We support the rights of all men to live lives of integrity and love, free of all discrimination, regardless of anything.

This is where, as with sexuality, the men's movement has forged ahead of the shopworn divisions of the past. While organizations like AMSA put race and sexuality concerns ahead of the general concerns faced by men, we search here for ways to do the opposite. We fully recognize the fact that the policies and legislation against men (which AMSA supports) are applied disproportionately. Even feminists know it.

> Criminalization of social problems has led to mass incarceration of men, especially young men of color. ~ Ms. Foundation for Women

Sadly true, society perpetuates this is by failing to see that this is a men's issue more than a racial one. Black men face more injustice than White men, but they are facing much, much more injustice because they are men than because they are Black.

Thankfully, the men's movement has evolved into the first social movement where all kinds of men, and women, regardless of any previous divisions, have come to advocate for themselves and each other, and moved beyond the male disposability expected by our culture. It is a great example of racial harmony because race neither unites nor divides us. Race, like sexuality, simply does not count in the scheme of things. It is the best kind of integration there is.

AMSA says:

(4)And we believe in "enhancing men's lives" by which we mean that we want to enable all men to live lives of integrity and happiness.

We say:

We believe in "enhancing men's lives" by which we mean that we want to enable all men to live lives of integrity and happiness, not just those that are feminist, gay, black or some combination of those things first, and men second.

We do not ask other men to engage in a cause that also makes them the identified enemy. We seek to address corrupt power, and we have never known it to have a sex or a color or a sexual orientation. We work in the name of men and boys, a grossly underserved and under recognized group, which is ironically what has organizations like AMSA so upset.

These are our values, and that is actually the most significant problem for all the people that are now trying to organize against us.

The MRM is growing in numbers and in influence because things for men and boys are bad and getting worse, and because the message we carry is unassailably justified and resonates cleanly with more and more men. The strength in our position is something that has been demonstrated by the embarrassing feebleness of the attacks against us.

The problem for our opponents is not that we are a bunch of angry white guys who want every woman to be June Cleaver. The problem for the opposition is that they don't have a morally or intellectually sound rebuttal to our case, because there isn't one. That will eventually become the shepherd's hook that yanks them off the world stage for good.

Girls behaving badly

One of the cornerstones of conventional domestic violence dogma is that the victim is never, ever, responsible for violence perpetrated against them. Rather perpetrators must accept responsibility and be held accountable for their violence. Statements along these lines are enshrined in the White Ribbon Campaign and Australia's "Time for Action" Plan to reduce violence against women and their children.

A White Ribbon Campaign fact sheet states:

Myth 4 Some people deserve to be beaten by provoking the violence. Fact : Responsibility for violence must rest solely with the abuser.[1]

As a young intern during one of my first night sifts in the casualty department (ER) I received notification that a young man was being brought in by ambulance after being punched in the head outside one of the local nightclubs. He was said to be unconscious but stable, however on arrival he was in complete cardio respiratory arrest and after almost an hour of vigorous resuscitation attempts could not be revived. Post mortem examination subsequently showed that he had suffered a massive cerebral hemorrhage as a result of a single blow to the head. The story from bystanders was that another male had walked up behind him and punched him once in the back of the head; there was no apparent provocation.

I learned several lessons that night including, the potential for a single well placed blow to be fatal, the dangers of alcohol fuelled violence on the nightclub strip – and never trust the paramedics radio alert to be accurate. In those days most of the brawling was male on male. But trends in more recent times show mixed violence and female on female violence becoming more common.

In 2010 the New South Wales Bureau of Crime Statistics and Research released a paper "Female Offending: Has their been an increase" [2] found that Using police person of interest (POI) data, this brief considers trends in offending by females and juvenile females over the 10 years to June 2009. Over this period, the number of females proceeded against by police increased by 15 per cent, whereas the number of male offenders remained stable.

They also noted a much greater rise in the rate of female juvenile offenders 1/3-increase verses a 1/10 increase for male juvenile offenders.

There are thousands of video clips on Youtube showing drunken violent women to which I recently added this one: http://youtu.be/7qq8Z3L6UwE It's a recording from a popular Australian evening show called A Current Affair.

Three young women, two of them mothers of young children, were recorded on a mobile phone drunk, violent and out of control outside a nightclub after closing time. The general community attitude to this was one of disgust at their behavior. However the girls wanted to "give their side of the story," and appeared on national television to tell us "they were provoked by a group of drunken men."

One of the girls explains "I remember crossing the road, and some guy yelled out you're a fat s(Beeped out – presumably "slut"), and then I walked over and started yelling at him and stuff, and I think that's when it started, all the troubles."

It's not quite clear what she means by "and stuff" but presumably it means a physical element added to "yelling at him." Suffice it to say she could have simply walked away rather than crossing a road to confront a group of men and start a fight.

The girls claim "They hit us, they spat on us, they called us names." Yet whilst there is lots of shouting and name calling to be heard during the video there is no sign of any male hitting any of the girls, only their relentless aggressive attacks. Despite being dragged away by security these girls continued to run back into the fray on the attack.

One even walked up behind a male who was facing away from her and posing no threat and viciously wacked him on the back of the head with her high heeled shoe. That scene sent a shiver down my spine and reminding me of the case I encountered as an intern. She said in the interview that perhaps he did not deserve a heel in the head but "he did deserve a punch in the head."

When quizzed by the interviewer if this was indicative of their usual behavior the girls admitted, "We've been in fights but nothing like this," so this was not their first involvement in violence. Further the girls admitted to consuming a large amount of alcohol, and feeling "very angry."

> We just wanted to hurt someone because they were hurting us.

When asked if they were sorry for their behavior all agreed they were "embarrassed" but it would appear that they were more embarrassed about being recorded and exposed then by their actual violence, which they claim their victims deserved. "I'm not sorry, I'm not sorry to those guys, I'm sorry to my family but not to the guys."

One of the girls has no hesitation in stating for the camera "No guy should hit a girl, I think it's disgusting," yet their recorded behavior show they clearly believe it is ok for women to be violent toward men.

One of the girls offered this gem "what if their mothers saw them behaving like that towards girls?" which had me bemused. Surely she meant what if their fathers saw them behaving like this toward girls? But then it hit me; apparently single motherhood and fatherlessness are now common enough to considered the norm.

> I don't like being judged as a mother. They don't know the full story about everything, like we were provoked and they wont know till they watch this.

If this is the view of young mothers it does not bode well for the chances of our current generation of children to become civil, non-violent members of society.

Another recent trend of concern is that of mothers encouraging their daughters to fight in the schoolyard or similar circumstances. There have been several well-publicized cases in Australia and the US including this one where the mother was charged with child abuse. http://youtu.be/G9chmFG50E4

So what is the message from all this? Abusers must always be accountable for their violence except if the abuser is a woman and they were provoked to violence by a man. There is an increasing trend for women to be physically violent and encourage such violence in their offspring, a trend that can only worsen, as the mother headed household becomes a social norm.

US Senator Daniel Patrick Moynihan commented in the mid sixties "A community that allows large numbers of young men to grow up in broken homes, dominated by women, never acquiring any stable relationship to male authority, never acquiring any rational expectations about the future – that community asks for and gets chaos."

We should add to this that girls who lack the guiding influences of a father and who are encouraged by mothers (who don't seem to understand all violence is wrong) are adding to that chaos.

AVfM Radio: Get her off that pedestal!

[box icon="none"]

We don't have to sell this to a red pill crowd. You know all about women on pedestals. Been there, done that, got the T-shirt and outgrew it. But there is still an awful lot of salvageable blue pill men out there that could benefit from a better understanding of what pedestalizing, and especially depedestalizing, is about. The knowledge alone can make the difference between walking bi-pedal and upright, or crawling through a relationship getting your knees, and everything else, scuffed up.

[image]
Pedestals are not made of wood or stone, but human flesh.
Join Dr. Paul and Dr. T Monday night on AVfM Radios "show with no name," as we discuss the many ways you can tell if she is on a pedestal and what can be done about it.

Once the smoke clears from all the non PC points we have to make what we are left with is the most important thing for a man to know. If the choice is between keeping her and keeping self-respect, only a moron keeps her.

But the sad fact is that a hell of a lot more then than will admit it sacrifice their self-respect in order to hang on to someone who also doesn't respect them. And remember, this isn't Oprah. No one here is going to give these men a pass on making bad choices. That is why they call them choices.

What we will offer, though, is the rationale for making better choices; choices that lead men back to their dignity and well-being, and that offer them the only legitimate path to being treated with respect by their partners.

As always, the call in number for the show is 310-388-9709. We would especially like to hear men call in that can tell us their stories on how they depedestalized a woman in their life.

Violence by proxy

John Hembling (JtO) · 1 April 2012 · Archived copy · Original

If women ran the world, there would be no war.

This isn't a quote easily attributable to any one particular person, but it's an idea which has entered mainstream thought and finds easy agreement. The quote is actually a mis-quote of the actress Sally Fields who said during an Oscar acceptance speech in 1980, "If Mothers Ruled the World There Would be No War".

Violence, or the threat of violence – attributed to the MRM, is one of the principal foci of attack by opponents to the movement seeking human rights for men and boys. These attacks are not merely false; they are the opposite of the truth. While it is not complete to say so, it is true that the men's rights movement is an anti-violence movement. In fact, one of the principal points in rejection of ideology opposing male human rights is the violence inherent in that oppositional ideology.

This is frequently repeated within men's rights writing but is then either ignored or misunderstood by ideologues clinging to oppositional systems of dogma. Conformist writers following a populist narrative continue to recite versions of the simplistic and false claim that violence is gendered or that men are, by virtue of sexual identity, the source of violence or predation in human affairs. When examined in a clear light, the absurdity and hatred of these claims is obvious. However, in order to understand the basis for rejecting the ideology opposing male human rights, due to that ideology's reliance on violence, the use of force through proxy must be examined and understood.

If two people have a disagreement of opinion and one of them attempts to sway the other's point of view or change their course of action using violence, this is direct violence, which conforms to most people's understanding of what violence is. This exists in the real world, but to imagine that all, or even most, violence fits into this extremely simple model is an incomplete concept. In the real world, violence is rarely placed in demand and initiated by the same individual. Most real-world violence is enacted by proxy.

Soldiers deployed to foreign countries and given duties which include killing brown people on oil bearing land are performing the proxy violence of the politicians whose executive instructions sent them there.

Police officers responding to a woman who claims her boyfriend did something which frightened her, who place him in handcuffs or remove him from the house prior to asking questions, whether her complaint had merit or not, are enacting proxy violence on behalf of that woman.

A man who uses violence on another man because the target of that violence offended or insulted somebody whose favor the aggressor seeks is enacting proxy violence on behalf of that person.

A woman who broadcasts her own grievance of impugned honor to chivalry-practicing males for them to redress on her behalf is, in many cases, making a plea for proxy violence.

These are blatantly obvious examples of violence by proxy, but many more types of violence, effected at once or more remove, can be listed.

In a society in which one demographic is known to carry the majority of violent criminal victimization (men), exclusive direction of efforts to reduce that violence to the demographic least impacted (women), is the implicit promotion of the ongoing brutalization of the first group. This is the maintenance of violence by proxy.

Many more examples could be listed, but are omitted here for brevity. The point being that violence in the real world doesn't too often occur in a vacuum in which the direct participants, the aggressor and the subject of a violent action operate without relation to other indirectly participating actors. Adults with a functional grasp of reality will already be aware of this; however, such individuals form a small, vanishing fraction of the general public.

A number of writers addressing sub-cultures growing within the MRM, such as zeta masculinity and MGTOW (Men Going Their Own Way) – including myself – have explicitly rejected violence in their own philosophies. This includes the social expectation of enacting the proxy violence of others which seems to be accepted as normal within social conservative rhetoric. This is the assumed requirement for men to automatically participate in or to volunteer themselves as targets of violence on behalf of others. This social expectation is wholly irrational, not only in the automatic acceptance of or enactment of violence, but also in the de-valuation of the life and safety of any individual expected to buy into socially required violence by proxy.

It is startling when critics of this point of view characterize the explicit rejection of violence as if it is an endorsement or advocacy of the violent use of force. The degree of ideological distortion necessary for the rhetorical transmogrification of opposition to violence into enthusiasm for violence provokes the need to explain this reaction. Can these critics be simply lying? Perhaps they suffer from some form of dementia? Or is their ideology so immovable that a wholly fictional reality is superimposed on what filters through their eyes and ears before it is processed?

One example of this might be the oppositional reporting on a group of ideologues whose public rhetoric makes open advocacy of eugenics. A writer using the pseudonym Vliet Tiptree published this emotional call for an engineered program of extermination. Many months later, this nightmarish diatribe remains online, despite the public notice which followed commentary on that insanity by MRAs on this site. However, other ideologues, who claim a mandate to oppose violent hate organizations, listed as dangerous the activists exposing and opposing this endorsement of eugenics, omitting the author and supporters of the still-publicly visible call for human extermination by sex as violent hate mongers. Worse, the same organization previously exposed for their advocacy of eugenics and infanticide are now openly raising money on behalf of that self-styled anti-hate organization.

The Southern Poverty Law Center is now being openly funded by an organization which publicly calls for sexually selective eugenics and infanticide.

Neither hypocrisy nor corruption is adequate to any attempt at description of this situation.

To return to the discussion of indirect violence and violence by proxy: All over the world, violence by proxy is the rule, rather than the exception. Starting in January 2011 and continuing to the present, Egyptians have protested and assembled in public in opposition to President Mubarak. In these demonstrations, Mubarak's security forces have brutalized, batoned, water-cannoned, run down with trucks, and shot hundreds of young Egyptian men. These security forces rain a torrent of brutal and deadly violence against the Egyptian civilian population.

Throughout this brutality, it's necessary to note that all of this is violence by proxy, not the individual volition of members of those security forces to engage in coordinated campaigns of public abuse and killing. However, in December 2011, during a protest in which hundreds of civilians clashed with security forces inflicting Mubarak's violence – a woman was shoved to the ground, kicked, and beaten by several baton-wielding security members and had her garment partially ripped, revealing her blue bra. This was certainly not the only woman subject to public abuse by Mubarak's forces – and it must be noted that thousands of men were brutalized compared to relatively few women. However, in the international outrage that among the thousands of men killed, shot and bludgeoned, some women were similarly abused – nobody seemed to catch the meaning of Egyptian women's protest in response to this incident.

Outraged that a handful of women were subject to the beatings and violence, which thousands of protesting men suffered, on Tuesday December 20, hundreds of Egyptian women took to the streets chanting "Drag me, strip me, my brothers' blood will cover me."

Piling on like lemmings, the international media roundly denounced the horrible, horrible brutality suffered by a handful of Egyptian females – as if the thousands of men truncheoned, run down with trucks, tortured, and variously murdered just didn't count. But nobody seemed to grasp that the thousands of Egyptian women protesting the public beating of blue-bra-woman were pledging not themselves in protest, but their brothers. "Drag me, strip me, my brothers' blood will cover me."

The abject moral bankruptcy innate in this pledge, and the international community's total failure to even notice that in a nation ruled under the supposedly woman-oppressing rule of Islam, thousands of women outraged that a handful suffered violence similar to what THOUSANDS of men suffered – these women pledged their brother's blood in retribution.

This is the abject and total disposability of men, the promise of participation in violence and receipt of violence of men as proxies for the female protesters – shown in front of the entire world in bright Mediterranean sunlit illumination – "my brothers' blood will cover me" promised in the public pledge of outraged Egyptian women. This is violence by proxy, and most of those brothers will take it, never even realizing that they count as lesser human beings to be used and killed to assuage their sisters' and mothers' outraged privilege.

Once the proxy violence is understood and recognized apart from the commonly held and simplistic view of direct violent application of force, it becomes useful to revisit the obvious fact that violence is abhorrent and repulsive to ethical human beings. That is to say, direct violence is repulsive and abhorrent to most of us, for some very practical reasons. Violence carries a high social, moral, and physical cost to anyone directly using it. Administration of direct violence against another person will produce social ostracism, penalties of law, as well as the real hazard of personal injury or death. All adults understand this instinctively, so of course we find it repulsive. This is why violence by proxy is so universally preferred by those whose ethical or moral failings lead them to the use of force in worldly dealings.

War is one of the most common and is the largest scale application of proxy violence in human affairs. However, to accomplish the sleight of hand necessary to manipulate thousands of young men to travel overseas and murder foreign brown people on oil bearing land, as well as cheerfully fill the role of receptacles for violence, is no simple task. In the run up to a government shipping men overseas to die, be maimed, and kill and maim foreigners it's necessary to cultivate a public perception of the foreigners as either victims to be rescued or portrayed as horrible evil sub-humans who must be stopped. This is recognizable as an established pattern preceding every incident of the United States flexing their empire in the past several decades.

Saddam has weapons of mass destruction. Iraq under Saddam is an existential threat to peace. The Iraqi people are to be liberated from the oppression they suffer under the despotic regime of Saddam Hussein. All of these arguments were routinely circulated in mainstream media prior to the American invasion of Iraq. That is to say, the narrative of a deadly dangerous threat was fabricated and evangelized, in preparation for hundreds of thousands of young American men to enact the proxy violence of the American state against millions of Iraqis who were murdered through that proxy violence.

This is the creation and sale of a public narrative of danger and dehumanization of a target to be rendered an acceptable target of future violence. A similar phenomenon occurs as the pseudo-statist apparatus of the Southern Poverty Law Center propagates lists of hate groups, or "potential" hate groups, including pick up artists, social conservative women's organizations like the Concerned Women of America as well as men's rights activists. This is nakedly obvious as the cultivation of public acceptance for later proxy violence against named targets. Carefully omitted was an organization still openly advocating sex-selective child murder and eugenics. Although possibly their fundraising on behalf of the SPLC explains that omission? Of course, in pointing out the financial relationship between a group calling for the extirpation of humans based on their sex and an organization claiming to oppose hate organizations the hypocrisy is so blatant it has becomes unintentionally comic.

However, in spite of most people's natural aversion and repugnance to direct violence, the indirect use of violent force comes easily to anyone able to disconnect initiation of violence from the direct practice and application thereof. There may be an argument to be made that males, traditionally both the actualizers and the recipients of the proxy violence of others, have a superior understanding and greater aversion to violence than women. But this is only conjecture, and posited as a question for later exploration rather than assertion as opinion.

Despite this, men and women both seem blithely willing to ignore the violence done by others, or to others, for their own benefit or convenience. Violence done on their behalf is what almost everybody is willing to ignore. What's more, the violence done to them through indirection, the violence in the form of an invisible gun in the room while we all make believe that we are not being threatened with death or imprisonment whenever we have a pretend conversation. A conversation about how violence is gendered, that men are the violent, the brutal, and the evil. We will congratulate ourselves that rather than those bad men, we are good men, and in the case of women, of course, all women are good, because women, for their part, don't generally do the heavy lifting of dispensing and, most convenient for everyone else, absorbing the proxy violence of others.

But we're all willing to pretend proxy violence doesn't curtain our decisions and we pretend we are above it, that the violence we denounce is not our own. It's somebody else's. Rather than see the moral cowardice of accepting proxy violence, we simply contrive to have its cost in damage, pain, and moral failure carried by somebody else. By men, obviously, and that fits in perfectly with the preferred narrative – that violence is simple, and direct, and that men are the ones who do it.

Because the critics of the men's rights movement persist in behaving as if they are learning disabled, reality impaired, and bereft of comprehension, I'll finish this with one more re-statement of what must in a sane reader now be known in the marrow of their bones. Violence is abhorrent to ethical human beings.

Feminine surrender as emotional dominance

Alison Tieman (Typhonblue) · 3 April 2012 · Archived copy · Original

The first in the V-leaks series: Uncovering the Feminine Codex.

This series is going to focus on an examination of how women develop and employ power in a feminine way. And by feminine I mean as a manifestation of some combination of feminine biology and socialization.

Just a note to stem off the inevitable charges of misogyny: If you consider this series misogyny, then by extension the entire body of work looking at men's use and abuse of power—including my own vlog on male power structures called apexuality—is an ocean of misandry sufficient to drown the entire world.

A while back there was a domestic terrorist in Canada who was targeting infrastructure related to gas processing and transportation. He was doing this because he felt this infrastructure was responsible for illness in his family. He was a survivalist and a very religious man.

At some point they interviewed one of his daughters. She explained that she had been taught that "women were weaker than men." The news obviously included this particular bit in order to vilify her father as a horrible misogynist. But I picked up on a very different dynamic. She expressed this sentiment in the exact same way a young man might arrogantly proclaim his 'pimp skills.'

Now, why is that?

To explain the origin of her smugly superior attitude let's dissect the related concept of the surrendered wife. For those not in the know, a surrendered wife is a woman who has decided, usually unilaterally, to abdicate all agency and responsibility in a relationship. She simply responds to whatever her husband does by enduring it without comment and enjoying a god-gasm over being a good Christian at his expense.

An example of a 'surrendered wife' is a woman who, when her husband made a wrong turn off a freeway, never informed him of his mistake and let him drive for half a day in the wrong direction.

How is this related to female emotional domination, you might ask… that is, if you're not picking up on it already.

Well, I'll explain what's really going on.

Human beings have an extremely strong instinct to take care of creatures that are helpless. We have this instinct because our offspring are the most helpless and dependent in the entire animal kingdom. Our instinct to help the helpless is therefore the most highly developed on Earth.

It is capable of superseding our survival instinct. There are plenty of examples of people (mostly men) sacrificing their lives to save others. Our instinct to take care of the helpless also supersedes our sexual instinct, which explains why paternal caretaking in the human species is so involved and common. Instinctively, human men will focus on taking care of their offspring preferentially over courting further sexual options (there are exceptions to this, of course, but these exceptions prove the rule.)

This protection instinct can be taken a step further in men. Not only do men have it but they are also socialized to see their gender identity revolving around exercising it. The implicit assumption of 'women and children first' is that it is men who provide the 'first' and if they don't, they aren't men.

To coin a phrase, a man's social body, his positive social or spiritual identity–thus his connection to human society–is made up of his ability and willingness to fulfill the needs of those perceived to be more helpless than himself. So not only do men have an instinct to help the helpless, they also have a strong social compulsion on top of that instinct.

Remember this. The very survival of a man's social body—his positive spiritual identity–is contingent upon sacrificing for the needs more helpless then himself.

Now let's take a closer look at how someone can exploit this instinct in an aggressive manner.

Everybody understands that when person A puts a gun to the head of person B and makes demands, that person A is placing enormous pressure on person B to do whatever Person A wants.

What people don't understand is that Person A can easily point the gun at her own head, and by pointing it at herself put the same or more pressure on person B to do whatever she wants.

In the first scenario Person A is triggering Person B's survival instinct; in the second she's triggering his protection instinct. Functionally, both actions are about bringing to bear tremendous coercive pressure on a target by triggering a powerful instinct. The second action has the added benefit of allowing person A to remain 'a victim', 'powerless' and 'not harming anyone' since she's just threatening herself.

The reality is that she is covertly harming person B through the use of coercive force.

So, while you read the rest of this article, remember that triggering a person's protection instinct is as coercive a force as triggering their survival instinct. If you need to, every time I refer to a woman triggering a man's protective instinct by presumptively submissive behavior, imagine, instead, her putting a gun to her own head. Or if that still doesn't clarify the coercive nature of triggering his protection instinct enough, imagine she's putting a gun to his head instead. This image is not far fetched, because when a man fails to protect a woman, his social body is in jeopardy, therefore every instance of her triggering his protection instinct is also an instance of her threatening the continued existence of his social body, his positive connection to his community.

When a woman engages in the 'surrendered' lifestyle (in any of its forms, including secular ones), she is, in essence, inflating her helplessness in order to parasitize both her mate's protection instinct and the connection between the survival of his social body and him providing for the helpless. The more helpless she is, the more his instinct is triggered and the more implied threat she is directing towards his social body if he does not provide for her needs.

If she does it right, she can attain a level of apparent helplessness that can supersede even that of an infant. This is because she is in possession of a relatively adult level of agency (even if she isn't going to allow her husband to benefit from its existence) and is capable of avoiding an infant's kneejerk communication of discomfort. Thus she can appear even more inert and uncommunicative and thus more completely helpless than an infant.

Think how thrilled new parents would be to not only have to deal with the all-consuming needs of a newborn, but to have a newborn that had absolutely no way of communicating those needs. The child is completely silent and unable even to cry. This sounds, on the surface, like it might be a relief not to have a fussy child but take a moment to imagine how much worse it is to be a new parent gripped with the endless fear of not knowing if they're doing anything right or wrong or not enough or too much.

Not only does the surrendered wife want her husband to find her needs as all encompassing as those of a new born baby, she encourages a terrifying level of uncertainty in him that he's actually fulfilling them.

It's sort of like her not only putting that gun to his head, but not even explaining the actions she wants him to take to avoid having his brains blown out.

This leaves no room in the relationship—and I use the word loosely—for the man's needs and vulnerabilities. Just ask any parent of a three-month year old child how parenting an infant has affected their sense of self and being able to take care of their own needs. In fact in the 'surrendered wife' model because the infant is man's presumptive partner, not only is there no time to address his needs but there exists no other adult in the relationship to address his needs. (And just a note, addressing your male partner's needs is not synonymous with giving him fifteen minutes of uninspired 'godly' sex every two months. I know this will come as a shock but each man, being human, has his own unique tapestry of fears, insecurities, things that make him sad, you know, vulnerabilties.)

Since this isn't a relationship of emotional equals—it's a relationship of mistress and emotional slave–a woman has to look elsewhere to get her adult emotional needs met. That's why all people recommending the surrendered wife model insist that a surrendered wife have female friends.

The surrendered wife, on the other hand, is likely her husband's primary or only emotional relationship, his only real connection to humanity. Likely this assists in the process of hijacking his agency like a body-snatching alien pod since he has no other outlet for getting his emotional needs met. Or even an outside perspective on what's happening to him.

Another clue to the real nature of the surrendered wife phenomena is how often women engaging in it talk about it achieving their aim of getting their husbands to do exactly what they want them to.

As a very intelligent MRA noted, a women's limitations are a man's obligations. The more helpless a surrendered wife is, the more he has to revolve his life around sacrificing for her. Until there is no autonomous life left in him.

The end result of this is emotional emeshment is that he becomes no more than a vehicle of her needs. In that context telling her that she must 'obey' her husband becomes a sort of farce. There is no autonomous being to obey.

It's also interesting how people evangelizing the 'surrendered wife' model seem to assume that a woman emotionally dominating her partner—either through overt verbal abuse or through invasion-of-the-body-snatchers style emotional emeshment—is just a given. Either you're an abusive harridan or an all-consuming waif.

But there exists a third possibility that is opposite to both: a mutually respectful adult relationship in which a woman is grateful for her husband's strengths and respectful of his vulnerabilities.

We often misunderstand the nature of the 'surrendered wife' model as somehow beneficial to men because we are locked into seeing dominance on male terms. We think that the dominant partner in a relationship is the one making all the decisions, when in fact the dominant partner is the one those decisions are being made for. The partner who's in the driver's seat, so to speak, is the one whose needs have been prioritized over the others'. And the one who's needs have been prioritized is always the one who has co-opted the other's protective instinct. The one who is seen as the weaker party. That's also the partner who's deriving the primary benefit from having the relationship.

Conversely when a wife respects her husband's vulnerabilities, by definition she will take the lead when he is vulnerable. But it's his needs that are the driving force behind the decisions she makes while in the lead.

This is why the husbands of surrendered wives are the subordinate partners in the relationship. Their wives never take the lead, thus they never take the lead in making decisions driven by their husband's vulnerabilities. In every equal relationship each partner gets some 'me', in the surrendered wife relationship there is only she.

This is how you end up with a woman who will let her husband turn off the wrong exit on a freeway and say nothing while he humiliates himself by driving for hours the wrong way. She would rather see him suffer than expose her own agency and risk lessening her own power over him. Alternatively she doesn't even see him as an autonomous person; his mistakes are just a disaster, like a flood or a tornado, that she endures in order to rack up her god-points.

Now not all surrendered wives are going to take this toxic dynamic to the extreme of complete emotional domination of their husbands. What I'm saying is that this dynamic provides no protection for the man from a wife who will.

Particularly in a Christian community where the husband is held strictly liable for all of his wife's behavior. 'Why are you complaining? Isn't your wife's godly supplication to you sufficient?'

And men are particularly vulnerable because they don't pick up on the subtle cues that indicate a woman is practicing this sort of psychological aggression against them. When a man 'surrenders' it's the end of his power; whereas when a woman 'surrenders' it's just the beginning of hers.

Further you can see this dynamic in a lot of secular, non religious relationships as well. The harridan wife is just a subset of the surrendered wife, except like a fussy infant she's more vocal about her requirements. And you see the same coercive dynamic in some political ideologies: Make yourself look like a victim to appeal to men's instinct to protect you. It's just the 'surrendered' wife lifestyle distills the dynamic to it's clearest essence.

And no, I'm not saying it's impossible for a male partner to exploit his female partner by triggering her protective instincts, I just don't see an entire subculture dedicated to it or ubiquitous cultural expectations supporting it.

So in conclusion, why was the daughter of the survivalist telling the viewer that she was taught that 'women are weak' with such a palpable air of smug self-satisfaction?

Let me translate her words from female dominance language to dominance language men are more likely to recognize. 'Weakness is my pimp hand, yo. And you boy-bitches better fall in line, because my pimp hand be strong.'

So you think you understand patriarchy? What if masculine "dominance" meant that instead of being in charge, men were required to assume all responsibilities, and had no choice. What if female submission meant that women were protected, provided for, and served, but owned no accountability. What if the definition of masculine identity was inexorably tied to service and sacrifice, and self actualization outside these narrowly defined boundaries was automatically punished with socially approved violence?

Tonight JtO and GWW examine the other side of patriarchy, the side big feminism refuses to acknowledge. It might even be that feminists banging the bongo drum have been right all along, but have only been telling half the story.

If you see Jezebel in the road, run the bitch down – Part II

Phil in Utah · 5 April 2012 · Archived copy · Original

TRIGGER WARNING: This post contains copious amounts of sarcasm, which is yet another tool of the Patriarchy, and the author's assertion of his Male Privilege.

We have already covered an article here about how Jezebel, an online feminist publication that focuses on pop culture, promoted violence against men. [See Paul Elam's, If You See Jezebel in the Road, Run the Bitch Down.] They asked readers to share their oh-so-hilarious stories of when they'd wailed on their husbands or boyfriends, for whatever reason. In one case, it was because the guy said he thought that he had breast cancer (newsflash: Men actually CAN get breast cancer. Look up Brian Piccolo.) In another case, it was because her boyfriend caught her writing a sex story about herself and another guy, and he confronted her about it.

Well, as if we needed any more proof that feminism promotes violence, Jezebel published an article (translation: they lifted it from somebody's blog and published it as their own) in which a woman tells about the time she hit a man in the face.

The author, who is a lesbian, talks about a time she was walking through the streets of Boston and had a bunch of drunken frat boys whooping and hollering at her and her girlfriend. They said such soul-destroying things as "Hey, you girls wanna sleep with me tonight?", "Hey, baby," and "Ooooh!" Normally, this woman just took it in stride.

Then, the unthinkable happened. A guy stepped out and spoke directly to her. Can you imagine the horror? She was so shocked by this act, she doesn't even remember what he said to her. So, she did what any rational human being would do when being addressed by a stranger: she punched him in the face, then acted totally surprised when it made him so angry, he called her a "fucking dyke," which is a totally heinous hate crime that should have earned him a lifetime in prison.

What's most revealing about the mindset of your typical Jezebel isn't that this article was published on their site at all, it's the comments underneath. If you don't have time to read them, I'll sum a few up. "I applaud you for standing up for yourself and women everywhere." "You did the right thing." "This'll teach men to watch themselves." "Men have no idea what it's like for us."

Really? Nerdy guys don't know what it's like to be called names or threatened with violence? Gay men don't know what it's like to hear homophobic slurs? Men never feel any fear walking alone at night, despite the proven fact that they are far more likely to be assaulted than women?

No, you don't understand. This guy was saying things to her. SAYING things! She was well within her rights to hit him, because women are such delicate, fragile flowers that can't bear to have anything about them challenged in any way, shape, or form. If a woman punches a man for a crude remark that she can't even remember, that's perfectly fine, because she was just lashing out against the Patriarchy, and doing her part to help end Rape Culture.

Yours truly tried to point out the hypocrisy here by posting a hypothetical situation in which all the same things happened, only the sexes of the parties involved were reversed. Needless to say, this little stunt got me banned from Jezebel for life. I'm not surprised, and I'm not angry about it. I should have remembered that, like sarcasm and harassment, logic is a tool of the Patriarchy.

Feminists keep insisting that, barring reproductive capabilities, men and women are completely the same. Well, except for when there's violence involved. Then it's always the man's fault, especially if it was the woman who threw the punch. He is, after all, a part of the all-consuming patriarchy, and nothing that he does or experiences could ever make him otherwise.

So take note, men: if you ever dare to say something to a woman that she doesn't like, she is well within her rights to hit you, and she'll be right to do so.

You filthy, sexist pigs.

An offer of help to feminists

Paul Elam · 5 April 2012 · Archived copy · Original

The Southern Poverty Law Center (SPLC), among others, is now watching all the hoopla they created with published attacks on the MRM quickly fade into a silent void; a place where stories suffocate from a lack of traction.

It's not much for all their effort, but I do think it could serve to be constructive for feminists. With the utter incompetence they displayed in their ideological attack on AVfM and the men's movement in general, it became clear that these people don't know what they are doing. The total incompetence is so pronounced that it approaches bizarre, especially considering their apparent intentions. They started a game of ideological football and fumbled every time they got their hands on the ball.

But I am not here to add more ridicule to what they have already piled on themselves. I am here to help. That decision was made shortly after I had a conversation with John the Other in which we both expressed frustrations with the shoddy planning and execution of the feminist attack on men's human rights that was spearheaded by the SPLC. We wanted better. Actually, we need better.

We benefit by having our ideas scrutinized and challenged by serious, intellectually honest parties, particularly feminists (I know, but we hope eternal). Presenting those arguments to the public is a big plus for our side. And since the time is coming that most everyone, not just MRA's, are going to demand credibility and competence from feminists, they seriously need to start making sense. They have a long way to go.

In fact, it came up in my conversation with John that we could make their case, the one for universal female victimhood, far, far better than they can, and we don't even believe a word of the shit.

So, if we are ever going to get them up to speed on this newfangled idea of making sense (which is oodles and boodles of help when making an attack), we are going to have to help them get there.

I thought I might offer some of that help in the form of a handy reference guide, so that is what I decided to call it.

The Handy Reference Guide for Feminists, on White Horses or Not: How to Beat Those Meanie MRA's in the Court of Public Opinion and Other Places Where People Talk About Things

I know, it is a really long title. Actually it is so long I could not fit it at the top of this article, so I had to call it something else. This is a hard job.

Anyway, a guide you were promised, a guide you get. As an example I am in part using the SPLC 's recent public self-sodomizing which they failed to disguise as an attack on the MRM. These suggestions can be saved and referenced by all feminists, horsey or not, should they want to launch an attack in the future that doesn't end up dripping from their faces.

1) Recognize that the truth is about to get in your way a lot more.

I know you guys are not keen on some aspects of reality, but this is one to which you should pay attention. For some time now all you have had to contend with is a small band of bloggers buzzing around your ears. You could just make occasional jokes about us and that was all you needed to do. You regaled us with witticisms about our sexual frustrations and general status as losers. Nobody cared, you had the floor all to yourselves.

Notice anything different, lately?

The weather has changed. VAWA is being openly challenged. Bullshit is being called on misandry in most free forums. The message that men have an untold side to this story is being delivered and, most importantly, listened to. Fewer people are bowing down to your demagoguery, and your attempts to shut them up are only resulting in more people calling your bullshit.

You are approaching the time when fraudulent statistics and base emotional pleas are not going to cut it with a public that wants to know why you need so much money and what you are doing with it. If you want to hang on to that money, you better start figuring out a way to justify yourself rationally. That will require you to do what you haven't done so far: Work.

2) Study the MRM.

It's like when you were in college, but this time you have to read. Learn enough to know you don't make an asshat statement like "The Innocence Project" is part of the men's movement, or that many MRA's want a return to "traditional values." If you appear ignorant – and prove it's more than appearance – before you even get to your first criticisms of the MRM, then don't be surprised when people laugh in your face, or when the response from the people you are attacking is to publicly salt your self-inflicted cuts.

3) Pick better targets.

Your target selection sucks. Register-her is a loser for you. A few of you tried to play the "what-if-the-girls-are-afraid" card for a bunch of convicted felons and bigots. I mean, even today, how fucking dumb Is that?

Seriously, your better target would have been our stand (keeping in mind we are not monolithic) on jury nullification. Many of us support the use of jury nullification wherever the access to equal protection of the law and due process has been denied. We specify rape trials and have called for acquittals.

There is your target! Instead of spinning register-her, where your preferred demographic happen to have criminal records, you should have gone for the "totally unassailable" victims associated with rape trials. Doooods, seriously, how could you not see this? Rape's your ticket. Men go ape-shit over rape and do all kinds of crazy things to kill or destroy the rapist or even men who might be rapists. It kind of blows your "men as oppressors" model, but the times will demand that of you.

Now, you'll still have to deal with the fact that some people will actually read our writings on nullification and see your objections are another spin job. But that is more complicated and nuanced than the register-her thing. Fewer people will take the time to ferret out the truth, and you will have a better illusion of credibility and competence. Just keep reminding yourself that the truth doesn't get to everyone.

Don't forget, you will still have the support of socially conservative traditionalists. You must know that without their muscle you are fucked anyway – and that they are showing signs they might not be such quick bodyguards in the future. Better line up some big tits to shake at them when you want their attention.

They are still much more prone to go ballistic on your behalf over perhaps legitimate rape victims than those proven to have lied about being raped. Again, really, it's kinda silly that I have to tell you this, isn't it?

That just leaves one problem. The chivalrous demand for us all to get hysterical over rape is fading away. You have created a generation of young men that just don't give a shit. Their growing apathy is the biggest problem you now face, and it won't change till you start treating them better. But that can't be addressed in this manual.

4) Quit trying to tie the MRM to psychotic mass murderers.

I know this is hard for you to see, but painting groups of men that want to spend more time with their children, or not be jailed for being poor, or want to be afforded due process or enjoy equal treatment under the law, don't ultimately make very good targets for that kind of insinuation, especially since you don't have a shred of evidence.

The fact that a couple of crazed killers said they didn't like feminists only proves that being crazy doesn't necessarily make you stupid.

You should get some sort of affirmation for realizing that the "can't get laid" retort has played out for you, and bonus points that you knew you needed a different caricature to paint of MRA's, but making us out to be Ted Bundy's made you look histrionic and foolish in front of the world.

5) Calling us anti-feminist is not a shocking revelation.

There are lots of anti-feminists in the world. Many of them are not MRA's. We are successfully showing the world that being anti-feminist is not being anti-woman. So when I see some mainstream hack make a statement like 'They say they are for men's rights but really they are anti-feminist,' I cringe for you.

You would do well to realize that most women don't identify as feminist, and your assumption that everyone will always get offended at the idea of anti-feminism is only a product of your insulated and detached thinking. Yo, wakey, wakey. You're looking desperate.

I hope the feminists out there find this guide informative and useful. There is no need to thank me. Teaching you how to make a cogent, credible point, or at least the appearance of one, helps you, and it also helps the MRM. It's a win-win for us both!

We have long been criticized here for not being willing to work with feminists. It is one of the few criticisms that has real merit. I feel bad about it personally and I really want to fix the problem, to make the MRM better and to make myself better as a person. So this is the first of more efforts in the future to build a bridge with you and help you with your mission.

AVfM Radio: News and Activism

Recently, AVfM Radio has experienced a sharp increase in listeners, both for the live shows and in the numbers of people accessing the show through archives. This is in no doubt partly explained by the expansion of programming with two male-female teams as anchors.

From John the Other and Girl Writes What we have a show that focuses on sociopolitical realities facing modern men, and from Dr. T and Paul Elam we explore more into the interpersonal relationships between the sexes, as seen through the lens of masculine counter-theory.

Since expansion and variety was an instant success, we have decided to use that formula to take the next logical step at AVfM Radio.

On Tuesday night, April 17 at 9:00 Eastern Time in the United States, AVfM Radio will launch the first weekly broadcast of AVfM News and Activism. The program will be hosted by James Huff, and will include news and opinion related to the week's significant news stories that have an impact on the lives of men and boys.

James will also be covering events and pointing you to good articles throughout the man-o-sphere, helping direct you to the best possible reading available on men's issues.

And finally, there will be interviews with MRA's who are actually out there breaking new ground in the war against misandry, showcasing the living examples of activism in action that are paving the way for all of us to foster change.

"All of this serves as a backdrop to inspiring people to get out there and do something," Says Huff, promising a show that is entertaining, informative and action oriented.

A Voice for Men News and Activism is the newest edition to the AVfM arsenal. We extend our thanks to James Huff for his willingness take a lead role as yet another general in the MRM Army.

Fem-education down under

Greg Canning · 6 April 2012 · Archived copy · Original

Christina Hoff Sommers 2000 expose "The War Against Boys – how misguided feminism is harming our young men," provides a chilling account of how gender feminism and it academically bankrupt pseudo-research, aided and abetted by a politically correct main stream media fundamentally changed the USA's education system to a female centric one that is hostile and harmful to boys and young men [1].

Similar trends occurred in other developed countries including Australia, where in the in the 1970's research indicated fewer girls then boys were completing year 12, or commencing higher education. Government action was called for resulting in the 1987 "National Policy for the Education of Girls in Australian Schools." By 1989 slightly more females than males were proceeding to higher education and this excess has continued to increase ever since. By 1992 school retention rates to year 12 were 10% higher for girls and have remained at or above this level.

Australia also saw the same trends toward feminization of our educational doctrine, with a shift from structured teaching with a focus on basic numeracy and literacy skills toward the laissez faire, female friendly, student centric and group learning environments so typical of todays classrooms. Predictably boys failed to thrive educationally in this milieu with documented decline in academic achievement. Boys natural exuberance and vitality did not mesh well this new pedagogy and the inability of the increasingly female teaching staff to deal with boys resistance led to a redefining of boys reactions as a variety of behavioral and learning "disorders." A concern about boys rather than for boys led to a perceived need for boys to be socialized to be more like girls in order to fit into this feminized learning environment.

Concurrent with this and continuing there has been decline in the number of male teachers and reduction in the number of male role models for boys in schools. This is especially evident in primary education where in 2006 males accounted for about 20% of teachers and many of these in administrative rather than active teaching roles. Males make up only 2% of the preschool teacher workforce and 4% of the childcare workforce. The impact of child protection policies, media prominence of allegations of child sexual abuse and fear of being labeled as a pedophile are significant factors in men avoiding careers in these areas.

It became apparent that the gains in terms of improved female educational outcomes were occurring at the expense of boy's outcomes, rather than from a fair and equitable integration of the needs of both genders. Data confirming the deterioration in boys educational achievements has been growing in all western countries since the early 1990's, but unlike the swift action by governments to correct the "girl crisis" of the eighties, very little concrete has been done to address male educational disadvantage.

Australia's NAPLAN scheme the "National Assessment Program – Literacy and Numeracy" collects detailed data, which continues to confirm boy's poorer performance in literacy [2]. Boys remain less engaged in schooling and report fewer positive experiences in terms of enjoyment, perceived relevance of curriculum and teacher responsiveness. The proportion of young men enrolling in and graduating from tertiary education courses continues to decline. In 2009 of the 175,070 domestic students completing a tertiary degree 60% were female and only 40% were male, and in 2010 of the students commencing tertiary study 56.2% were female [3].

Australia has historically had a two-tier education system of government-funded schools, and government assisted private schools where parents supplement government funding with additional tuition fees. Some of the private schools have been traditionally, and remain, gender segregated all boys or all girls schools. There is a current debate regarding the level of government funding for private schools, which are seen by many as elitist with an argument they should receive reduced government funding, with more funds diverted to disadvantaged groups. Still many parents are keen to secure the best available education and elect to incur financial liability in the hope of better achievement and opportunities for their children.

During this years hype around international women's day I came across an article over at the "Huff Post" by one Soraya Chemaly a “Feminist, Satirist, and Media Critic” titled “International Women’s Day: 10 Reasons Why Feminism is Good For Boys and Men [4]” OK, got my attention. Are there 10 reasons, really?

Not far into the article was an embedded you tube clip (Trigger Alert: viewing this video may cause extreme nausea take an anti-emetic or have a suitable vomit receptacle handy! Feminists: suggest a good supply of chocolates and ice-cream and tissues in case of excessive bodily fluid secretion) http://youtu.be/JgIg6z5nXGI

Chemaly goes on to explain:

> This video was produced as part of a Gender Equality Project at Sydney Boys High School last year. The project concluded with the boys’ joint presentation with a local girls’ school to 400 business leaders. These boys and their efforts got some flack for “mansplaining,” in this case the implications that the “little women” need the help of big strong boys. But, I don’t think that’s what’s happening here. In order for gender equity to happen, girls and boys need to be taught why it is important to them and it’s just plain fair when you respect other people’s equal rights. That’s what these boys are talking about.

The boys PowerPoint presentation can be downloaded here for anyone who is game.[5]

While some of the statistics in the presentation are indeed “confronting” they are presented in the completely unbalanced non-contextual way that is so typical of feminist propaganda. Targeting that emotive protective male response in order to co-opt advocates to their cause.

Here are a couple of examples from the presentation. The first and most “unequal” statistic quoted is;

> Just 2% of the world’s land is owned by females.

Land ownership is not an issue that I have found particularly prominent in my readings around gender issues. Yep, its there if you look for it, and “UN Women” is vocal about it, but it’s an issue singled out as problematic in developing countries which are in early stages of cultural evolution from long established systems of ownership and transference or inheritance of land to rightly more equitable ones. In developed countries it is more an issue of land ownership by wealthy elites versus that owned or not owned by the socially disadvantaged classes. Given a long standing ideal is for Australian couples and families to “own their own home” it would have been more appropriate for the boys to have looked a property distribution by gender post divorce, but no matter – around half of them are likely to find out where the inequality is in that sphere in due course.

Violence is a given in any equity presentation, so let’s just spout the standard unqualified feminist line.

> Guess how many women and girls are beaten or sexually abused at least once in their lifetime. Maybe you think 1 in 10, or 1 in 8, 1 in 5? It’s 1 in 3. That’s how bad the situation is. That’s how bad gender inequality is.

I wonder if any of the teacher’s supervisors had bothered to point out to them that the rate of male violent victimization is 1 in 2, perhaps if they did their concept of “how bad gender inequality is” would be different? They might even have mentioned war dead, but if that came up perhaps it was neutralized by the idea that it’s men who cause wars in the first place?

No gender equality presentation would be complete without mention of female genital mutilation.

> Another story repeated every day is females being subjected to genital mutilation.” The boys go on to tell us that this affects “130 million” and “If we put that into context, that’s more than a third of the U.S. population. And the number continues to increase.

Undoubtedly, female genital mutilation is an abhorrent cultural/religious practice that has occurred over thousands of years in some parts of the world, and deserves to be stopped. However male genital mutilation is a cultural/religious practice that has occurred over thousands of years and was accepted as a norm in western societies. This is a clear sexual double standard that would have been worthy of noting and of debate.

The Sydney Boys High School is an elite all boys school, which aims to attract "gifted students" and prides itself on the large number of graduates going onto tertiary study and gaining recognition in public or professional careers [6]. The "GenEq" project was completed under the auspices of a group called "Highresolves" who state their aim as "developing high school students to become effective citizens and leaders who are armed with the confidence and skills necessary to tackle the unique challenges of the 21st century" [7].

It's interesting that the Highresolves initiative arose out of the graduate program at Harvard University, and it was feminist professor Carol Gilligan of the Harvard Graduate School of Education's corrupt research that invoked the beginning of the gender feminist's reformation of the US education system.

I wrote to both the Principle of Sydney Boys High School and the CEO of Highresolves with my concerns about the lack of balance in the project, which has been publically promoted and applauded. The principle has not responded but I did get a phone call from one of the Highresolves staff who said they did not interfere with the "content" of projects only provide tools and assistance with the "processes." One can only wonder why objectivity and an examination of the counter viewpoints should not be integral to the "process." Naturally if the intent is to co-opt young impressionable minds to be better "global citizens" by adopting a feminist understanding of gender equity then all dissenting views should be explicitly excluded, lest the boys get a whiff of the truth and perhaps start to follow there own logic and reason.

While the boys may have chosen the topic themselves (and who would argue that gender equality is not a reasonable topic to investigate) I felt particular umbrage that the teachers and sponsors of the project allowed such a prejudiced perspective that assumes gender equality can be achieved simply by identifying and advocating for change in areas where females are apparently disadvantaged. This to me is an inherent breach of their duty as educators and appears as an overt attempt to indoctrinate. That boys from an elite all male school are advocating gender equality when it is inequity in wealth and educational resources that affords them the position to do so is an irony evidently not noticed by many who showered accolades on this project.

Education and its abuses remains a key area of concern for the men's movement and I would encourage all to speak out against such instances of gender bias and misrepresentation when they encounter it.

The feminine use of male dominance

John Hembling (JtO) · 7 April 2012 · Archived copy · Original

Patriarchy theory is one of the fundamental dogmas of feminist propaganda, a narrative which has effected almost all public discourse on sex and gender in the past several decades. This has been to the extreme detriment and inhibition of understanding of male and female behavior, motivation, socialization and social power.

The conventional wisdom on the topic of patriarchy is that men, by establishing male favoring systems of hierarchy, patrilineal family structures and systems of inheritance, have – by conscious intent, suppressed and oppressed women for millennia.

This theory, taken in many different versions represents the popular and widely accepted understanding of society's distribution of power. This theory is also without merit, without truth, and using a childish, foolish, and facile conception of human behavior. This infantile model should embarrass any social scientist or even any thinking adult who clings to it out of either ignorance or out of a deference to popular opinion.

The periodic contributor to a voice for men dot com, TyphonBlue, recently wrote an exposition of the selfish and hostile manipulation manifested in the phenomenon of the surrendered wife. Her article provides the basis for understanding how feminine cultivated absence of adult agency is used by females as a weapon, and exploits the use of culturally normal violence, enforcing male compliance by force brought by other compliant males. Deliberate feminine non-agency, or self infantilization is a way of disguising a woman's adult agency, and weaponizing the protective instinct of males to enforce compliance and protective behavior in a husband or boyfriend. If that man avoids this manipulation – he risks retributive violence from other conformist males within the community. Those males, enforcing masculine protective socialization are the actuators of the surrendered wife. She not only provides the basis for their protective violence against a noncompliant male, she totally hides her indirect initiation of violence or it's threat, by maintaining a cover of her own non agency, as the submissive wife.

She cannot be called out on this, as any challenge of her motivation and self interest in this manipulation game can be deflected by assuming a posture of victim of the challenge. The instinctive protective behavior of other males coming to her rescue will appear perfectly reasonable, and violence directed by them against anyone challenging her complicity and indirect agency is hidden, and attributed in a simplistic reduction to male aggression.

What's worse is that within some traditionalist or conservative religious communities – female surrender of adult agency, and the transference of any possible responsibility, choice, and agency onto a man is praised by men and women within those communities. Unfortunately, this model of female non agency, and male hyper agency, when coupled with social enforcement of conformity and expressed masculine protective instinct turns men into slaves.

The perception of a male dominated household as if it is to male benefit requires the most reduced and simplistic understanding of human interaction, and should embarrass anyone who espouses this reading of the matter.

A woman who surrenders her agency to a man is the very worst tyrant, because she exploits his instinct to protect her as if she is an infant while retaining her .

What's worse is that in a community in which feminine surrendered agency is viewed positively, men trapped in such relationship have no way to protest, since such protest is seen as victimization of the most helpless – the women whose social posture is that of a volition free child. Such a man, attempting to assert himself as a human with his own needs – he will forced back into his role of protector through social censure, including violence from other complying males. In fact, his identity as a human being of any social worth at all is totally tied to his conformance to be the actuator and the active agent of whatever his wife needs or wants. If her submission to his is more pronounced, she might not even communicate what her needs are, and he is left with a social requirement to figure out what she wants, with his validity as a worthwhile human hanging on getting it right, and always the threat of violence done to his person by other males if he ever deviates – because in this model, self expression, self actualization in any mode except service to his woman is perceived as attack on her. And brother, you don't attack a woman.

And here's the kicker, he cant even see it. A man given primacy in this social context – in which he is placed over his wife – and she is totally subservient to him – he cannot develop the social cognizance to even understand how he is both exploited and threatened at the level of eradication of his male identity in any deviation of his behavior. He is effectively blinded and silenced, because in this system of value – where he is the patriarch, and assigned agency over himself and his wife. His socialization does not include self reflection. He is enslaved in his own mind.

And his wife, subservient, without her own visible agency or exercised volition – she owns him, and owns no accountability. This is power, without any check, or thwart, hidden from those it controls expressed behind a veil of helplessness.

And that, ladies and gentlemen, is how Patriarchy works.

Women, for their part did not chose this behavioral model, this is the natural expression of our prehistoric hominid programming. This programming served our species very well when we averaged a 30 year life-span, regularly died of starvation, or during childbirth, and when the dark was full of predators, giving us a real reason for our fear of it. This primitive hominid programming, when its still being expressed in a modern environment of abundant food, shelter and safety doesn't serve us quite so well anymore – and is being exacerbated and amplified in the form of a modern popular ideology of gender. You know, the one starting with F.

But here is the real definition of patriarchy – this is the operational definition that has always been relevant, but has been until now hidden behind the muddy thinking and self-serving dogma of infantalized adults with the power of not just communities of compliant males behind them, but the full deadly remote control power of violence of the modern state.

Patriarchy is a system of social cohesion which uses masculine agency, exploiting adult protective instincts towards infants to serve the reproductive benefits of females. This system is based on the masculine instinct to protect women, and maximizes the perception of male agency in service of this goal.

PLEASE NOTE THAT THE SHOW TIME HAS CHANGED TO 8 PM EST!

Please join us Monday, April 9, 2012 at 8pm EST when Paul Elam of AVoiceforMen and Dr Tara Palmatier of Shrink4Men will discuss the merits of thinking with your big head instead your "little head" and your lower brain. Too many otherwise intelligent men get themselves into trouble by choosing romantic partners based solely upon physical attraction and sabotage potentially good relationships or stay in bad ones out of fear.

Physical attraction is important, but if what lies beneath the surface is ugly and incredibly damaged, you're not using your big head. If you sacrifice your self-respect and integrity to please a woman, you're using your little head. If you sacrifice your self-respect and integrity because you believe you can't live without some woman, you're using your lower or "reptilian" brain because you're allowing fear to guide your behavior.

We'll also discuss how to engage both your reason and emotion in your relationships with women. Reason and emotion do not have to be antagonists and making proper use of both is one path toward having more satisfying relationships.

As always, the phone lines will be open, so if you have a story about allowing your little head or lower brain to do the thinking for you or how you've been able to get your self-respect in alignment with what you will and will not tolerate in a partner, give us a call at +1 310 388 9709.

Don’t like catcalls? Cover your tits

I’ve just read another article variously excoriating men and “empowering” women on the topic of exposed female flesh. Cleavage specifically, and it’s power to draw male attention. As this is being written in early Spring, the seasonal spectacle of high cut skirts and low-cut tops will be putting a bit more bounce back in everybody’s step, and social commentators will write predictable criticism of males who just cant keep their eyes to themselves.

I’ll be the first to admit that every spring when horseflesh goes back on display, I enjoy the scenery. I’m biologically wired to not only enjoy it, but also be distracted every time a bit of pink goes jiggling through my peripheral vision. However, there is apparently a bit of a problem. Women who put themselves on display and enjoy the attention of high-income, high-status men are somewhat less than enthused with being ogled by men they regard as low-status, unattractive, or gods-forbid: beta males.

Those guys – men who don’t have what it takes to get a second glance from women – well, those losers are just as likely to leer at bouncy cleavage and short skirts, and sometimes even offer unwanted comment or commentary. In fact, average guys, when told to buzz off and that their attention is unwelcome, sometimes don’t even have the good sense to control themselves in these circumstances. Rude remarks are increasingly common from this sort of creep. It’s almost like low-status males imagine they have a right to look at what’s paraded in front of them, or even a right to speak. How stupid are these guys anyway? Don’t they know to shut their mouths and avert their fucking eyes?

Or maybe, just maybe – there’s another way to understand this problem. It might even be that provocative attire is described using the word “provocative” because such clothing is designed to provoke a response. It might be that male sexual attention, when it is deliberately stimulated by women showing off their secondary sexual characteristics is stimulated in men without regard to the size of their paychecks. It might even be that men whose income or attire doesn’t mark them as high-earning alpha males, that these fucking stupid losers think they’re human beings even if they don’t tick all the boxes on women’s reptile brain wiring and make them wet. It might be that these guys have a different view of themselves and their worth, wholly apart from the primitive hominid programming most women use to discard 90% of men as worthless before they’ve even registered there’s a person in their field of vision.

Holy fuck, these guys might even think they’re human beings worth saying hello to. Can you imagine anything so stupid? In fact, this is going to stretch credulity, but as I was writing this, another possibility crossed my mind. Because it made me laugh, I’ll share it – just for the entertainment value.

It might be that low status men, ones who are socially invisible to women seeking the attention of executives, lawyers and elite athletes – well, it could be that these guys know they are socially invisible – and that attractive women parading their sexual and social power as if it’s an unholstered gun, they know such women regard them as low grade peasant scum. These foolish males might even realize the contempt they’re held in, and it might mean they’re increasingly unwilling to defer to those privileged princesses whose sexual and social power is based not on accomplishment, but just on their sex.

It might even be that as average, low status males, these guys understand that their social value to the women who flaunt their sexual power and potency is based only on what use those women can make of them. It might be that understanding they are seen by females only as under-performing appliances for dispensing money and for female convenience; violence – they’re disinclined to respond to women’s open contempt with anything except unapologetic honesty.

In fact, according to Bettina Arndt, in her article “the Booby Trap” although some claim slutty attire is just to make themselves feel good, the main message sent is about flaunting women’s sexual power. It’s an “UP YOU” gesture of the most provocative kind. The message is unsubtle. look what i’ve got, what you want, and what I’m flaunting in front of you and that you are not even allowed to respond to.

And many men, increasingly aware of their second class status, and faced by undisguised contempt from a sexual class who recognize no limit on their own behavior, these men are uninterested in pretend deference.

So if you've got great tits, or a pert, round behind, and you've put them on display, of course men are going to stare, princess. You might even get a few comments. Also, the difference between creepy and appreciative in those comments exists almost entirely in your mind, and not in the content of the offered commentary. As a woman, your evaluation of the difference between appreciated compliment from an attractive gentlemen and unwanted creep-behaviour from a loser is based on your subconscious evaluation of social status and wealth. This is the reptile portion of your brain's instinctive selection – evaluating men as utilities which dispense money, violence on your behalf, and sperm. This is also why low status males are socially invisible to you. Your subconscious has edited them out before you even consider them as individuals worth chatting up. And no, those men should not apologize to you for being attracted, or for saying so. Instead, perhaps you should apologize to them, for presenting for inspection what was not on offer.

Or maybe, and here I'm just making a wild-assed suggestion, when you're picking your outfit, including that low-neck top that gives guys whiplash and the short skirt that shows off your cute round butt, you should not be so shocked when it results in male eyeballs vectoring in on your advertized cleavage. And when you get a whistle, or a clumsy comment, realize that attention is exactly what you asked for.

Patch Adams: sycophant with a red clown nose

John Hembling (JtO) · 9 April 2012 · Archived copy · Original

Hunter Doherty "Patch" Adams is a physician, an entertainer, and the founder of the Gesundheit Institute, which according to their own rhetoric are dedicated to revolutionizing health care delivery by replacing greed and competition with generosity, compassion and interdependence. Adams's use of comedy within a medical setting was fictionalized in a movie starring comedian Robin williams in 1998.

Dr. Adams has made some significant and admirable contributions in his life, including building a children's hospital and improving the health of many patients. To be fair to Adams, his views on medicine appear more humane, and admirable than a conventional approach to health care.

Unfortunately, when Adams sits down in front of a camera – he reveals himself a self-aggrandizing, pompous bigot with a deep hatred of men, as well as a conception of women as if they are all inert, helpless children without volition or agency. This is unfortunate, because this man deserves a great deal of the credit and esteem heaped on him. Sadly, the man is obviously addicted to what we call the blue kool-aid.

> All healthy women say the same thing, all the problems of the world are due to men

This is the declaration of Patch Adams, reflecting a narrative for which he is almost universally celebrated. Unfortunately, for both Dr Adams and his enthusiasts, this distillation of his philosophy is one of the most hateful statements ever made.

"All healthy women say the same thing, all the problems of the world are due to men."

It might appear on the surface that this is an unfair indictment of men, to attribute all of the world's troubles to masculinity, but this is the tiniest fraction of the offence given.

Adams attributes to women no agency, no power, no volition and no adulthood. In his cosmology, women are powerless, witless, rudderless chattels with neither opinion nor actions of their own. They are things to be pushed around and acted on, not people with minds, voices, ambition, intelligence and agency in the world.

All of that is contained in the statement by Adams – in which he says "all the problems of the world are due to men."

Inherent in this is the construct of masculine hyper agency, the mythology in which men, by some unidentified magic manifest a totality of control of events in the world. Were such control real, the observably chaotic and brutal reality enjoyed by people all over the planet would deserve some pretty strong censure. Unfortunately, this attribution of total male culpability for every worldly problem falls apart when an adult recognizes that men, contrary to any myth of male hyper-agency, and patriarchal model of how the world works, men are actually humans, much like everybody else they're supposedly busy oppressing.

That men are "only human" fallible, greedy, fearful, foolish and demonstrative of every other human failing, is the other side of the narrative claiming patriarchy as the source of all evil. How men, as a distinct biological group can be both super-powered masters of reality, while also being the foolish, idiotic, evil, malevolent, regressive primitive subhumans is something of a contradiction, which despite it's blatant self refutation has not yet managed to sink the dual dogmas of patriarchy theory and the myth of feminine spiritual superiority.

Unfortunately, although H.D. Adams appears to be attributing no adult volition to women, he's quite obviously practicing some naked flattery. In Adams' pantomime, he is the good man, casting himself in sharp contrast with bad men.

> The One Good Man sees in Woman what men lack. Woman is bright and charming and good. Men are > dark and sinister and bad.

> To maintain the image of Woman as bright and charming and good, the One Good Man swallows Her darkness. Her rages, Her excesses, Her cruelties are his responsibility, not Hers. All Her goodness is not chosen because She is helpless in Her goodness—as She is helpless in Her femininity. ~ TyphonBlue

These are the words of another contributor at AVfM whose insights into the psychological motivations behind much of gender politics are consistently sharp.

Adams is distinguishing himself "good" and seeking the approval of those he holds helpless and fault-free, by his demonstrated willingness to vilify other men. All other men, because unlike him, they are bad.

'Look at me, look how good I am, I'll even disavow my own sexual identity, casting all my brothers aside, and look, I'll whip myself with a knotted rope, see? You see? I'm good; right here grovelling at your feet.'

As one of the bad men, I'll admit the previous statement is not a direct quote from Adams. Rather, it's a dramatic interpretation of his sentiment. I am, of course, a very bad man, certainly worse than most.

Returning to the good doctor's statement "All healthy women say the same thing, all the problems of the world are due to men."

All healthy women? Setting aside the inclusive unanimity, my own layman's grasp of mental health does not include the practice of externalizing all responsibility and holding oneself unaccountable. The behavior of assigning all blame to others is common enough to be recognizable, but its not what we expect from healthy adults. Yes, I'm positing the revolutionary idea here that women are adults, or at least, they can be.

The other possibility in Adam's statement might be that women, as he sees them, are not adults. Rather, they are perfect, blameless infants, toddlers bereft of conscious agency and volition. I'm not sure how to reconcile this perception with women driving cars, voting, being approved for mortgages and generally enjoying adult powers, but perhaps rather than infants, women are creatures of mythical ether? I also wonder which of these narratives is going to "empower" them.

Obviously, in Adams' cosmology, with the pseudo-enlightened mummery dialled up to frappe, I wondered if he'd already branded himself with a capitol F. A Google search turned up the following twitter posting.

> Feminism is the act of constant nuturance [sic] of the "we" with attention for anyone in need. The interest & pleasure to seek out helping.

Assuming for the moment that Adams meant "nurturance", his big-F ideology is the constant nurturance of the we. In Adams' claim, "we" is enclosed in quotes. So who is this "we"?

In this posting, Adams makes his own identification with the big F pretty clear, however, the remainder of his tweet is less than lucid.

Feminism is the act of constant nurturance of the "we" with attention for anyone in need. Comparing this to Adams' claim about blame for all worldly ills illuminates who he means by: we. "All healthy women say the same thing, all the problems of the world are due to men". Okay, so Adams excludes men from this 'we', which seems strange until we remember that he distinguishes himself as the one good man, separate from the bad men.

Couple this with moral superiority, and an ideological revision of history, in which good and evil are simplistically defined, and assigned to clearly identifiable protagonists and antagonists.

> Seven thousand years ago, men chose to worship money and power over love.

That's doctor do-good again, declaring himself on the side of love, while heaping distain on everyone else who happens to own a penis. Adams probably didn't mean neuterance in his semi coherent tweet about constant attention of the we. That would have been too obvious.

The cynical part of my brain wonders what, along with flattery shaped to appeal to childish egos, Dr Adams is selling to his spiritually superior fans. The Gesundheit institute website's most prominent link is the big red donate button, found on the site's entry page. However, we shouldn't be confused into thinking he's just pandering to adult children for filthy money, and we know this because he's already denounced money in favour of love.

"Seven thousand years ago, men chose to worship money and power over love."

Once more, Dr Adams declares men evil, distances himself from his own male identity, and insults the intelligence of any women who happen to actually be adults.

My only real question is at what point in the escalation of us-versus-them narrative, including the cynical and predatory flattery and abasement do men and women wake up and recognize an opportunist carrion eater.

The flattering-to-toddlers fiction of women as children and men as predators only takes us in one direction, and towards love, or peace, or whatever is meant by "equality" is not it.

Winning the war on women

John Hembling (JtO) · 10 April 2012 · Archived copy · Original

In case you haven't heard, there's a war on women.

This rhetoric usually refers to a handful of bills in US states which propose limits on access to abortion. Contrary to popular opinion, some people believe abortion should not be as easily and casually used as pre-conception birth control. In a democratic system of government, legislative wrestling over how much or how little unimpeded access to surgical termination of a human embryo is both reasonable and expected.

In response to this, several female legislators, starting with Georgia State Representative Yasmin Neal have introduced legislation to deny men's access to the pre-conception birth control of vasectomy. The reason stated for this is explicitly totalitarian. According to Neal:

> It is patently unfair that men can avoid the rewards of unwanted fatherhood by presuming that their judgement over such matters is more valid than the judgement of the general assembly, while women's ability to decide [over the life of an existing embryo] is constantly up for debate throughout the United States. Women, our bodies, and what we do with it[sic] are always up for debate. This bill has been drafted for all women. Who have the wherewithal to chose. The day has come when men should feel the same pressure and invasion of privacy that women have faced for years. I have introduced this legislation because it is the purpose of the general assembly to insert an invasive state interest of reproductive habits of men in this state, and substitute the will of the government over the will of adult men.

The false equivalence between birth control prior to fertilization and conception, and the treatment of the termination of a pregnancy – in which a viable human embryo is killed is likely not lost on Yasmin Neal or her supporters. If men were to "feel the same pressure and invasion of privacy that women have faced for years," men would first have to have reproductive rights – which to date, they do not. What men do have is a legal onus to financially underwrite a woman's reproductive rights, in which she legally compels a man to abide by whatever decision she makes over reproduction. Debate over male reproductive rights cannot actually occur until men have such rights, and representative Neal knows this.

In fact, it has been gender ideologues who unilaterally deny men access to basic birth control technology women have enjoyed for a half century. A male contraceptive pill has been feasible for at least a decade. According to Dr. Elsimar Coutinho, a Brazilian endocrinologist and a human reproduction scientist, the male pill is widely used in China. However, in an interview on Brazilian TV, Dr Coutinho explains how when seeking approval for a male contraceptive pill based on natural substances extracted from cotton seeds, he was denied permission at the Budapest World Population Congress.

During his interview Coutinho explains:

> In Budapest, I went to try to get the support of women. I thought, if women support it. The American feminists were all there, including Betty Freidan. It was her, I started to speak and in some ten minutes, she interrupted. She said: Dr., do you think we've fought our whole lives to have in our hands the decision of having children or not? Do you think we're abdicating that? Men say they're on the pill, women believe them? Do you know what you are, what you all deserve? To have credibility, swear you're using pills just to get laid and leave? Leave us with the responsibility and then 'the pill failed' ? I was dazzled, because the women stood up screaming NO MALE PILL!!
> I was suprised that women wouldn't support me.

One of the hosts on the Brazilian television show questioned Dr Coutinho, asking “It was the feminists who rejected the male pill?” and Coutinho replied, saying “[At] the international feminist movement in Budapest, World Population Congress, I was the only scientist to talk. The others were politicians. I went to tell our results which were great. We already had more than 1000 men who had taken the pill, no side effects, etc.”

The show’s female presenter interjected: “I don’t get it, she was demanding to her, or to us [women] the decision on procreation?” Dr Coutinho responds by stating the position of the feminist panel members at the Budapest Population Congress, “WE take the pill, when we want to get pregnant, we stop taking it”.

And that is why the in the “free world” there is no male birth control pill. Because, according to politically connected feminists,“WE take the pill, when we want to get pregnant, we stop taking it.”

This also explains the ideology behind denying men access to the pre-conception birth control of vasectomy. As long as women exercising their “rights” over reproduction can also use the power of the state to appropriate money to pay for their own choices from unwilling fathers, then any encumbrance to this totalitarian system will be painted in the hysterical colors of a “war against women.”

If such a war were real, and not the hyperbolic fear mongering of professional liars then State Representative Neal’s openly declared intention to escalate the inequality of rights between men and women would place herself as serious risk. The fact is that men face ongoing legal disenfranchisement, companied with continued state enforcement of the unilateral legal reproductive rights of women including the imprisonment of men unable to finance baby making they have no rights over.

Although debtors prisons were legally abolished more than a century ago, men are still locked up if they find themselves unable to finance a woman’s decision to reproduce. But if we listen to our media, this is a War Against Women.

The Violence Against Women Act is another area of push-back, after 20 years of a law which governs policing and prosecutions based on a totally discredited model of domestic violence. VAWA turned the real problem of violence within romantic relationships in which men and women abuse each other coequally, in a world of legal fiction in which women were universally innocent victims and men were universally guilty aggressors. While male-on-female abuse is real, it is only a small part of the larger problem domestic violence. However VAWA also incentivized frivolous prosecutions by allocating funds to prosecutors for indictments, regardless of convictions. Now, after 20 years of policing by profiling, where cops follow a script of arrest-the-man-no-matter-what rather than doing actual police work, the public is catching on to this scam, and VAWA faces open opposition in it’s re-authorization.

In addition, Wisconsin Governor Scott Walker, prior to the Easter weekend repealed that state’s Equal Pay Enforcement Act, a law based on the persistent myth of the wage gap. In reality, women on average do earn less over their lifetimes than men. Gender ideologues who have enjoyed an increasing command of public narrative have always claimed that this meant women and men doing the same job were payed differentially based on sex, but this is now, and always has been a lie. The difference in lifetime income is actually just a byproduct of women’s preferences, on average, for employment which affords greater flexibility, greater access to friends and family than the career paths men generally pursue. The wage gap myth has been so thoroughly and so repeatedly debunked that continued public pretence to it is no longer politically viable. Of course, oppositional commentary characterizes Walker’s action as further evidence of the “war on women.”

Omitted from this “war on women” narrative is the department of education mandate for diminished standards of evidence in male-targeting accusations of sexual misconduct in american universities and colleges. Also omitted is the persistent female favouring affirmative action in access and in higher education, despite 20 years of escalating female favouring imbalance in educational outcomes. Even the feminists have noticed this, but rather than treating it as a problem to be solved, systematic male exclusion from higher education is celebrated by professional bigots like Hannah Rosin.

Also omitted from the war on women is the unofficial policy of the courts to fabricate excuses for female criminals – like Amanda Knox, whose bizarre acquittal reveals in human beings a wholly irrational ability to forgive any behavior from a sexually attractive female, including murder. A google search for “woman kills baby” revealed a lengthy list of women acquitted or given suspended sentences for the killings of their own children. When it comes to the behavior of females, there appears to be no limit on violence, murder, or outrageous conduct. However, we are constantly reminded that there is a war on women. How much repetition will it take to convince all of us?

The Obama health care package is another area in which, rather than being sensibly omitted from the constructed narrative of a “war on women” in the few places where women are expected to pay for coverage – the “war on women” screen rings out again. Strangely, in every area where free coverage is offered for women, no corresponding coverage is listed for men.

Breast cancer screening, yes, prostate cancer screening, no. According to reporting by AVfM contributor Anthony Zarat:

> ..there are also line items for three breast health treatments, with no matching prostate health coverage. There is cervical cancer screening, but no provisions for male specific cancers. There are several line items protecting women from STDs, but no matching money for men.
> This is also where mandatory free birth control products and free tubal ligation services for women will be, once the Institute of Medicine’s recommendations are accepted by the president. That approval process led to the fuss over a “war on birth control.” Nobody talks about the fact that birth control for men, including vasectomy, is not covered, not free, and not mentioned in either the IOM or the USPSTF. Feminists and the liberal left are crying foul because a small number of women will have a small number of their female-only services under Obamacare limited. A few women, some of the time, will be treated like all men are treated, all the time. Outrageous!”

So this is the war on women? That women sometimes are treated as men are treated all the time?

Although it would very likely have a salutary effect on the perception of people whose reality is filtered through the lens of mainstream media, I am not bloody-minded enough to wish for a reversal of the imbalance of legal rights between men and women. I lack the necessary cruelty.

In addition, whoever came up with that marketing for this apparent “war on women” wasn’t trying hard enough to get guys like me on board, but after examining what’s behind this war on women, and in spite of the poorly chosen name, count me in. After reading some of the recent, emotionally overblown and free-from-facts attempts at condemnation of the MRM, it’s evident that many commentators of the gender-ideologue stripe are convinced that the movement seeking equal legal rights and recognition of the humanity of men is rising. Our most vociferous detractors are clearly worried that we are winning. In that concern, they are correct.

The final sacrifice

cooterbee · 12 April 2012 · Archived copy · Original

For the first time in history men are starting to address the concept of male disposability. Most of us hope that male disposability is merely a long standing social construct that may be dispatched with careful education and diligent application. What if it is not? What if it is, somehow, encoded in Y chromosome DNA and there is no prospect of dismissing it from our very natures? The tangible result of fully embracing a biological determination at the outer limits of its realization would be the exactly the same as the repudiation of an obsolete cultural meme.

As we understand it, male disposibility is the willingness to sacrifice that which is ours for the sake of women and society. If we absolutely must do so then let's make it count. The value of a sacrifice is proportional to how much it is cherished by the donor.

Some sacrifices made in the past:

Our Fortunes – for pikers – Whether it be a few coins in the Salvation Army kettle or vast corporate scale philanthropy, charity is an inferior sacrifice because it is an offering of material, not of the soul. Though there can be much benevolence behind it, the gift, itself, is impersonal.

Our Freedom – small potatoes – Military enlistment, matrimony and monasticism are examples of renouncing freedom. Though they are spiritual commitments, they narrow one's scope from a wider to a smaller world. One has to wonder if they can be considered a sacrifice at all in some cases because they are sometimes used as a voluntary refuge or outlet for personal ambition.

Our Chastity – no pain, no gain – To remain chaste is to defeat a very strong biological imperative. No mean feat. But is it a sacrifice or an orderly retreat in the face of stronger punitive factors such as STD's, a corrupt legal system and acrimonious interpersonal relations?

Our Lives – we can do better than that – Death is often called the supreme sacrifice. I beg to differ. Men have been willing to die for things as crass as money. Men have thrown their lives away for rabid patriotism, religious zealotry, mindless ideology and a host of other ephemeral and questionable reasons. Most often, men forfeit their lives to protect something even more dear, namely, the esteem and approval of women.

If men were in bitter earnest about making the most meaningful sacrifice, that sacrifice would be the regard of women. It is so valuable that men routinely lose life itself to secure it. It is moral because under the utilitarian definition of morality, if every man in the world forsook female approval simultaneously, conditions would improve. Lastly, it would be a highly personal act of devotion toward the betterment of all mankind. A most fitting sacrifice.

If male disposability is a social construct, then we extinguish it in accordance with our manifest will. If it is a biological directive, then we fulfill it by laying female approval on the alter of our DNA. Either way, disposibility is gone.

AVfM Radio: MRM just angry, privileged white guys

According to the opposition, the Men's Rights Movement is nothing except a bunch of sexually frustrated, angry, abusing, woman-hating white men. Angry that they've lost thier patriarchal privilege to beat their wives and send women back to the kitchen, barefoot and pregnant to "go make me a sammich!" .

If you believe this narrative, you are codially invited tonight, to join AVfM Radio's resident angry white man JtO along with his subservient helpmeet GirlWritesWhat for an evening of male privilege, female victimhood and desperate clinging to the tatered remnants of the patriarchy. Or maybe, GWW and JtO will demolish the lies of gender ideologues with a chainsaw and a flame-thrower, bringing a bit of illumination to the mainstream's dark smog of lies. That is tonight, at 9:00 EST. The call in number for the show is 310-388-9709

Domestication of the human male

V Leaks 1.1:

In V-Leaks 1.0: Feminine Surrender as Emotional Dominance I detailed how women use submission as a way of developing dominance in their relationships. Two proponents of the 'surrendered wife' lifestyle weighed in to defend the dynamic. I will be addressing their criticisms in this vlog, as well as expanding some of the concepts touched upon in the original.

The Draft Horse

When the draft horse asks, 'why am I plowing the farmer's field?' The farmer will answer, 'because you're stronger then me, of course.'

The draft horse's identity then becomes a self-reinforcing solipsism based on the farmer's flattering deception: 'I plow the farmer's field because I'm stronger than the farmer; I am stronger than the farmer because I plow the farmer's field.'

A wild horse would have none of this. A wild horse would simply be; his identity defined only by what experiences he chooses to have. It's not until a horse's definition of himself can only be expressed in terms of the farmer that he becomes domesticated.

The horse is stronger, faster, smarter then the farmer, but always he is judged in relation to the farmer's limitations and because this judgment is the domesticated horse's identity, the farmer's limitations become the horse's obligations. When the farmer is weak, the horse must show himself to be stronger and pull her plow for her; when the farmer is slow, the horse must show himself to be faster and carry her upon his back; when the farmer is stupid, the horse must show himself to be smarter and solve the problem she has.

In each instance the horse's strengths are used to benefit the farmer in her weakness. By tying the horse's positive identity in opposition to her weakness, she tethers his effort to her benefit as well.

The draft horse then sees thoughts of freedom or any other aspect of his wild horse nature that does not relate to plowing fields as a threat to his own identity. Finally, because the draft horse believes plowing fields to be his identity, he no longer sees the transactional nature of his relationship with the farmer. He starts to see her taking care of him as a benefit rather then an aspect of her exploitation of him. In his mind she takes care of him because she loves him; not because he's a utility that requires maintenance.

A farmer does not bother to make herself aware of his draft horse's emotional needs. If she did, she would have to face the fact that the entirety of the draft horse's life is constructed for the farmer's benefit and her benefit alone. Regardless of how much extra mash the farmer fetches for her horse as he impatiently stamps his hoof in his stall.

She might say to herself: 'I feed him, muck out his stall, give him access to sex and raise his young to be future draft horses, what more can he possibly need?'

Of course a wild animal will not allow the farmer to clean it, to feed it, to control its sex life (even if it's just deciding who the animal will have sex with) or even touch its young much less raise them. A wild horse must be broken, then tamed first before it will even see the farmer's service as a benefit. A wild horse prefers its independence to dependence on the farmer; that's why the draft horse's young must be raised by the farmer's hand. So they too can learn to be dependent on the farmer's service instead of independent and self-possessed wild creatures.

So when the draft horse asks 'why am I drafting the farmer's field' and the farmer responds 'because you are stronger than me' this is not an answer. It's a flattering deception. The greater strength of the horse is why the farmer has set him to plow her field; but the greater strength of the farmer is why the horse actually plows it.

The Human Draft Horse

Because women control and have controlled the fundamentals of human survival for generations upon generations, children grow up associating feminine approval with provision of their basic needs. This association persists even into adulthood. As a boy grows into a man, his association between feminine approval and his basic needs evolves into associating feminine approval and a positive social identity. Needless to say those entities we see as the source of our basic needs hold considerable power over us.

Respect for men is now measured in terms of respecting the identities women give them as draft horses, rather then respecting the needs of the men themselves. In fact by setting up a man's personal needs and vulnerabilities in opposition to his socially approved identity as a draft horse, you create the perfect uncomplaining beast of burden. The biggest threat to this system is a man's emotional matrix and the possibility he might imprint his emotional matrix on his children.

Each man is the key to freedom for his sons. If a boy associates provision of his basic needs—food, shelter, comfort—with the presence of his father, he starts to develop an association between masculine approval and a positive social identity. Eventually as he grows this will allow him the ability to develop a positive male identity distinct from women, because his social identity will not be provisional on their approval.

The reason why men's emotional needs are conflated with their base drives for food, sex and hygiene and ignoring their actual emotional needs is disguised behind 'respecting their manhood' is because this allows women's emotions to dominate the relationship, both her relationship with her husband and her relationship with her sons.

And like the draft horse who defines himself as stronger then the farmer, all the mechanics of a man's domestication are hidden behind his manhood. Because to admit to himself that he is controlled by the farmer, would be to admit to himself that he is weaker then the farmer.

Domestication has become his identity.

The Carrot

A commentator on the article Feminine Surrender as Emotional Dominance posted the following comment.

> I have to say that if a woman is claiming to be "surrendered" or as I would call it submissive, and yet she is manipulating her husband, she is nothing more than a hypocrite making Christianity look bad and she doesn't have a clue about true biblical submission.

First of all, the surrendered wife dynamic may play out to exclude the man's emotional needs from the relationship without the surrendered wife actually being aware of what she's doing. That's one reason why it's so dangerous.

The commentator goes on to show this potential danger in action in her description of own relationship.

> I homeschool our children, clean our house, make my family's meals, and happily have sex with my husband whenever he wants to. The real Christian meaning of surrender/submission would be putting the needs of husband/family ahead of your own. I am sorry to hear of these situations where women exploit men's goodness but let's not call it something it's not-and it's not surrender, submission, or Christian.

In essence this surrendered wife is appealing to the 'carrot' offered the man to justify the submissive wife lifestyle.

Before I get into discussing this part of the response, I want to point out that I can only infer from what was written. It's difficult to describe the entirety of a relationship in a short paragraph and no doubt information is lost in translation. Having said that, from this description I don't get the impression this surrendered wife has any idea that her husband has a human emotional landscape at all.

First of all she defined all of her husband's needs in exactly the same way a farmer would define her draft horse's.

You could replace what she said with: I feed him, muck out his stall, give him access to sex and raise his young to be future draft horses. And lose nothing in meaning. The one thing that addresses a human emotional need is what she says about sex. Unfortunately she does not recognize whose emotional needs are being met in her sexual exchanges with her husband. When she says 'I happily have sex with my husband sex whenever he wants to' she believes that giving her husband access to sex when he wants it is an emotional benefit to him.

Access to sex is something you give a farm animal. Desire is something you give a human being.

Desire is the gift, not sex. So when her husband desires her, he's giving her the gift. In the situation she describes it's actually her husband tending to her emotional needs as a human being. Namely the need to feel desired.

There was a reason why I explicitly referred to the intricate tapestry of a human's vulnerabilities, insecurities and fears when I described men's needs. These vulnerabilities are the man's emotional matrix. In an equitable relationship the man's emotional matrix is given as much room as the woman's.

In an inequitable relationship the man's emotional matrix is misunderstood as identical to his base needs. In an inequitable relationship a woman provides a man exactly the same things that a farmer provides a well-performing animal. In an inequitable relationship a woman mistakes a man providing for her emotional needs with her providing for his.

This carrot, like all carrots is more about benefitting the person offering it then the one receiving it.

The Whip

To understand how the whip functions in the surrendered wife lifestyle, imagine it is, instead, a ring through a bull's nose.

When the farmer tugs on the bull's ring, the bull experiences pain—she tugs on his ring either overtly through shaming language, 'you're not strong enough' or covertly by presenting a weakness in herself that he must act to address or risk losing his positive social identity as stronger then her.

Pointing out the existence of the ring is also painful because, being an obvious point of control and weakness, it challenges his identity as more powerful then the farmer. This pain functions as a control mechanism to keep the ring in place.

But when the farmer says 'don't point out the existence of the ring to the bull, it insults him.' What she means is 'don't point out the ring to the bull, he might be able to pull it out if he is aware of it.' And she's hiding this truth behind presumptive compassion for his 'fragile male ego.'

An online commenter using the handle Lilith had the following to say in defense of the surrendered wife lifestyle. The way the former commentator used the carrot, Lilith uses the whip.

> And what about the man in this story? You paint him as a hapless, manipulated victim who is comically failing in his attempts to live up to the dominant male ideal that is not very well defined either and usually a target of public ridicule and disgust.

This is in reference to the previous article in which I detailed a story of a man whose surrendered wife sat silently as he took an incorrect exit from the highway, allowing him to drive half a day before discovering his error.

The surrendered wife in question could have easily said to herself 'I don't want to insult his role as head of the household by pointing out his error.' And felt her decision entirely justified by the ideals of the surrendered wife lifestyle. After all she was ignoring his vulnerability in order to respect his role as draft horse—or 'head of the household' if you prefer.

Which brings us to an irony. Lilith uses the existence of the nose ring to justify why we shouldn't bring attention to the existence of nose rings.

Just as the surrendered wife could have justified her abuse by saying she was respecting her husband's dominance, Lilith is in essence, saying, 'Don't point it out to the poor dears, it'll only insult their manhood.'

On my part will continue point out the traps laid for men in these situations so that they can make their own decisions about what to do. After I've pointed out what I see, it's the man's call to make.

Finally, since I don't believe that men's identities as men need to be predicated on anything to do with their relationships to women—either benefiting women or being stronger then them–I don't believe pointing out the dangers these dynamics hold for men somehow reduces their manhood.

Rather, it empowers them to start to reclaim defining manhood for themselves. Which is probably the real issue here. Where's the Love?

If you can talk about your partner's emotional needs in the same terms a farmer would use to talk about taking care of a draft animal, then you do not even view your partner as human. Further this explains the sinking sensation that a lot of men have (spoken about by WF Price in his post 'What's Wrong With Wanting Love?') that they are not loved.

No. If your female partner talks about you in the same terms as a farmer would about a draft animal, what she feels for you is not love. In fact she does not recognize you as human at all. Love comes from shared vulnerabilities; it's comes from being strong for your partner which requires recognizing his emotional needs in human terms—not animal terms—and allowing them to drive your decisions.

This is precisely why women in the surrendered model of both secular and Christian relationships do not love.

Not only will your entire emotional landscape revolve around such a woman, no matter how much you serve her needs in exchange for her submission, she will never love you. She may respect your role but she will not respect you.

This is an especially dangerous system for men since it is only the benevolence and forbearance of their female partners—the love of their female partners—that prevents them from being sent to the glue factory.

And a human cannot love a draft horse.

Maine Bar Council recommends discipline for ADA Mary Kellett

(AVFM News) Washington D.C. Apr. 13, 2012 – Fathers and Families, a popular men and fathers rights group engaged in activism involving primarily the rights of fathers, reported on their website yesterday that Assistant District Attorney Mary Kellett of the Seventh Prosecutorial District of Maine was recommended for discipline by the Bar Council on April 6th. Bar Council J. Scott Davis handed down the recommendation which could result in anything from Kellett to getting disbarred to a criminal investigation.

It is unclear whether or not Maine has a provision for an independent prosecutor at this time as that would be the best way to secure criminal charges against Kellett. "Obviously, the District Attorney of Ellsworth likely won't prosecute one of his/her own lawyers, but, if there's an independent prosecutor statute, someone else can. They can and should." Wrote Robert Franklin in his article on the Fathers and Families website.

Mary Kellett has been the target of activism from many different quarters including S.A.V.E., A Voice for Men, Fathers and Families and Antimisandry.com, who all participated in a petition signing drive to have her disbarred for the wrongful prosecution of Vladek Filler, a man falsely accused of rape by his unstable wife Ligia during a custody dispute. Kellett has been criticized heavily for disregarding the due rights of those accused of sexual assault crimes in her district and has a known record of convicting men who were strongly suspected of being innocent.

Among the abuses cited by the Bar Council are Kellett's refusal to hand over evidence to Fillers attorney, Daniel Pileggi, the nature of which was extremely exculpatory. Pileggi eventually had to get the court to produce the evidence for him because of Kellett's refusal to cooperate in a lawful manner.

Franklin calls upon others who have suffered at the hands of Kellett to file a grievance with the Bar Council.. AVFM News will be closely covering any developments.

AVfM Radio to introduce children's programming

Paul Elam · 13 April 2012 · Archived copy · Original

[box icon="none"]

We need some new archetypes for children.

We speak often (but not often enough) about how our boys are in trouble; in school and other ways often tied to fatherlessness. And we talk a great deal about the ill effects of chivalry and the mandate to protect and provide. We advise men about socially created princesses and document the destruction they do.

It only makes sense that it is time we started an initiative to address some of this where it starts, in childhood.

A Voice for Men Radio, which runs news, opinion and relationship oriented programming, will be adding a children's program to the AVfM Radio lineup.

The show will present children's stories with themes that encourage a positive identity, boundaries and self-respect.

A team of male and female writers has been assembled and some stories are already in progress. They will be produced and broadcast on AVfM Radio, available at I-tunes for individual download and also available in an illustrated text version online. If there are any illustrators out there that would like to contribute to the effort, please get in touch.

A start date will be announced in the future.

Open Letter: Thank-you feminists and ideologues

John Hembling (JtO) · 14 April 2012 · Archived copy · Original

This is a thank you letter, from the editorial board of AVFM to the Southern Poverty Law Center, as well as other elements of the mainstream and alternative media.

In the last year, the un-funded grass roots movement consisting mostly of bloggers and vloggers – loosely associated and identified as the "So-Called Men's Rights Movement" has come under increasing attack from not-for-profit organizations, left leaning and right-leaning media organizations, and even comedy web-sites.

However, rather than logical rebuttals or evidence based arguments, the majority of oppositional rhetoric falls squarely into the category of ad-hominem and straw-man argument, along with other formal logical fallacy. One recent "cracked.com" article stated "no REAL MAN has ever come out as an MRA" [emphasis mine] as well as claiming that opposition to feminism is equivalent to burning down a house in response to an infestation of ghosts. The implication in that metaphor being possibly that feminism doesn't actually exist?

Other commentary condemning the rising mens rights movement focuses in on the obvious and overwhelming privilege of white males, and the clear absurdity of any complaint about unequal treatment in the family court system, the criminal courts system, higher education, employment, homelessness, suicide, criminal victimization, prison rape, life expectancy, sexually-specific health funding, misrepresentation in domestic violence education, and general disposability based on sex.

Of course, the oppositional opinion doesn't actually address any of those topics, but takes the simpler path of denouncing men's rights activists as sexual losers, and unemployed, mother's-basement-dwelling cretins with small penises and a hate-on for women. When you're a busy journalist trying to meet deadlines, researching your topic is terribly time consuming, and unneccesary if recitation of simple stereotypes will do the job of selling ads and keeping your readers comfortable.

New ideas are scary, and it's hard to win fans by challenging convention, so we don't blame writers on the right and left for clinging to convention as "journalism" careers evaporate in a world of online instant information overload. Indeed, as a part of this "So Called Men's Rights Movement," we would like to thank all the mainstream and alternative commentators for the continued and increasing attention. However, the absence of any opposition other than childish name-calling will only be effective for a limited time. The problem being that continued commentary on the mens rights movement means an ever greater fraction of your readers are becoming our readers too. This becomes increasingly problematic to gender ideologues as rhetoric and ideas published by the "So Called men's Rights Movement" are adopted in mainstream journalism. As example, a recent Wall Street Journal article examining reluctance of young men to be sexually entangled with women stated:

"A woman's "reproductive rights" also include the right to carry a pregnancy to term. The crucial point here is that while the decision belongs entirely to her, in the event that a child is born the law assigns financial responsibility to the male involved. That is what the boy in her study means when he worries about being "screwed for the rest of my life." Short of sterilization, the only way for a male to be sure of avoiding this fate is to abstain from sex."

The sentiment of this paragraph could have been lifted from any of a dozen articles on this site, and I thank WSJ contributor James Taranto for his obvious courage to say what others have not dared.

Unfortunately, this trend means the current absence of substantive counter argument in anti-MRA writing is making channels pushing yellow pixels appear increasingly foolish and dishonest.

As a lazy writer myself, a weak opposition does make my job easier, but this movement needs robust opposition, otherwise how will we ever uncover our own false assumptions or faulty reasoning? It is for this reason that this site's Editor in Chief, Paul Elam published a how-to guide for feminists and other ideologues, so that their attacks on the MRM become stronger and more effective.

In that same spirit, I have included my own helpful guide to the opponents of male human rights, so that they might craft a better attack. We're aware that for many rhetoricians, being provided an instruction manual on how to field an effective counter argument might seem insulting. We apologize for that, but to do otherwise would be unfair, and unsportsmanlike.

Among bloggers within the "So Called Men's Movement", a document has been long-circulated called "the shaming tactics catalog." This is a list of sixteen common logical fallacies routinely levelled against anyone arguing for the human rights of men and boys. MRM bloggers use this document to quickly identify and then swat aside logical fallacies such as straw-man arguments, appeals to force, ad-hominem arguments and other common tropes of broken and dishonest rhetoric. As an opponent of this movement, you too can benefit from familiarity with this catalog. It's just 2 pages long, and your attacks will be far stronger if you can eschew such obvious and easily deflected name-calling. Here's a link to a PDF version for you to download. You're welcome.

My colleague Paul Elam mentioned in his Guide-for-attacking-the-MRM that for most oppositional writers, target selection is a badly underdeveloped skill. He was right, and frankly gentlemen and ladies, your target selection sucks. The "angry white man" trope seems to be popping up with increasing frequency, and this is just sad. Even as an angry white man myself, I pity those whose point of attack remains fixated on racial and gender stereotypes. Some readers of this piece might be aware that AVfM, in addition to maintaining a web-site also produces two weekly radio shows. (whoops, now it's three)

In addition to Paul and myself, these shows are co-hosted by several extraordinary women, namely Dr. Tara Palmatier and GirlWritesWhat. On "my" radio show, I know who the rising star is, and I am not her. In addition, AVfM features the writing of authors from a variety of ethnic backgrounds, sexual identities and orientations. TyphonBlue, Barbarossaaa, B.R.M., Izzy, J.White, Valdez, and the incandescent GWW all being high-profile, and sharply incisive contributors outside the "privileged white male" cartoon-reality regularly referenced. In fact, the "So Called Men's Movement" has been largely unaware of race or sex or sexual orientation until the recent rise of "angry white man" rhetoric drew our attention to the idiocy of that claim. Gentlemen and ladies, sharpen your pencils, please, you're embarrassing yourselves.

Missing the point.

Also, one of the most unfortunate and foolish tropes regularly regurgitated is the claim of the threat of violence. The Southern Poverty Law Center, whose half-baked attacks tried to paint male human rights as a dangerous hate movement is being funded in part by a group of radical feminist bloggers whose most famous rant calls for the eugenic extermination of men and the sex selective abortion of infants.

Arthur Goldwag, author of several of the SPLC's attacks on the human rights of men and boys gave the call-back to the eugenics enthusiasts over at radical-hub in a twitter shout out. Does this even need my commentary?

In fact, rejection of violence is a principal driver in much of the writing from the "So Called Men's Rights Movement" in opposition to feminists who advocate child-murder, or who use staged shootings in promotion of hate literature adapted for school children. A group of swedish feminists were exposed by writers on this site after portraying the execution style murder of a newspaper reading man, following in thier promotional video by the text "do your part". This video posted on youtube stayed online for more than a year, in promotion of a stage adaptation of Valerie Solana's infamous hate literature, the "Society for Cutting Up Men Manifesto". The writing from the "So Called Men's Right's Movement" opposing this murder advocacy was transmuted by gender-ideologue commentators into an endorsement for violence – attributed to "So Called MRAs" including myself. The problem being that the names of individuals advocating murder were published by this web-site.

To oppositional writers, please understand this clearly. The men's movement is an anti-violence movement. If if your enthusiasm you forget yourself and publicly endorse child abuse, physical violence, eugenics, or murder, we will publish your name. Not because we wish for harm to befall you, no. We will do this because a civil society cannot continue to function when mainstream media becomes a conduit for the advocation of violence.

For readers to whom this is stunningly obvious, and appears condescending, I sincerely apologize. Sadly for many who now earn a living behind a keyboard, this clarification is unfortunately necessary.

So, here's one more tip for effective rhetorical attack against the "So Called Men's Rights Movement." Try not to call for violence. It makes you look stupid, and might even get you arrested. If that happens, then somebody else will have to attack us, and we'll have to educate them as we've tried to educate you. As mentioned earlier in this article, many "So Called Man's Rights Activists" are lazy, me for example. And I'd much rather not spend my time in repetitive tasks.

I sincerely hope that these several points will be helpful and informative to the opponents of this movement. The quality of attack must improve if those fielding opposition to advocates for the human rights of men and boys are to provide a useful foil for MRA writing.

However, I do wish to repeat my thanks to all those writers and commentators providing continued exposure of the movement seeking human rights for men and boys, and I look forward to working with all of you in promoting the "So Called Men's Rights Movement" into the center stage of mainstream discourse on human rights.

Gender privilege in Titanic Era

Phil Leigh · 14 April 2012 · Archived copy · Original

During the past few months regular movie-goers could hardly avoid James Cameron's film-trailer announcing the recent release of a 3D version of his Titanic movie in response to the Centennial the shipwreck this month. However, few are aware that the relationship between the motion picture industry and the disaster stretches back nearly a full century. Even fewer realize the two films that "frame" the 100-year span are gross distortions.

Staring a notable and authentic personality, Saved from the Titanic was the first movie in May of 1912. Twenty-three-year-old Dorothy Gibson was among the era's highest paid movie stars and was also a Titanic survivor. She sketched-out the movie plot herself.

Dorthy Gibson
Dressed in the same clothes worn the night of the wreck, Dorothy played a young woman returning from a European vacation to marry her lover, a Navy Ensign. The young man learns of the shipwreck from a buddy who is a wireless operator. He is compelled to call upon the girl's parents to inform them of the disaster.

Later in a post-disaster scene when Dorothy's character is telling her family of the events at the dinner table, she is overcome and faints. Her mom calls upon the Ensign to resign from a seafaring career if he wishes to marry the girl. After some dramatics, the Ensign declines by announcing it would be dishonorable to abandon his duties to the Navy. Admiring the officer's patriotism, the young lady's dad says, "My daughter, there's your husband", as the final scene closes.

As befit her movie star image, Dorothy is portrayed as a heroine. But her actual conduct was lacking. When she realized the danger was serious, Dorothy became hysterical and entered the first of twenty lifeboats. Once upon the water she began to shiver and accepted an overcoat from a thereafter-coatless gentleman.

After the ship foundered a lifeboat crewmember wanted to return to rescue people thrashing in the water. Everyone aboard, including Dorothy, shouted him down. After the victims' cries faded away, Dorothy proclaimed that the loss of life was minimal since most of the passengers were saved in lifeboats. She was silenced when a crewmember interrupted to say, "If the boats were filled, not more than a third could have escaped."

Although married, Dorothy vacationed in Europe without her mate and was greeted with a $1,000 engagement ring by her extramarital lover upon returning safely in New York. She would not divorce her pharmacist-husband for another four years. Meanwhile she continued to accept the largess of her benefactor-lover who was a rising movie industry mogul. By the early 1920s she was living in Europe where she remained until her death by heart attack 1946.

A hundred years later, James Cameron's 3D Titanic foists another misrepresentation. The familiar plot characterizes the leading lady as a victim of gender discrimination whose miraculous survival convinces her to thereafter lead a lifestyle that boldly challenges the evils of patriarchy. She is portrayed as a pioneering feminist decades ahead of Gloria Steinem and Jane Fonda. In reality, far from being victims, the ladies of RMS Titanic were highly privileged.

As the preceding table documents, three-of-every four women were saved as compared to only one-in-every-five men. Moreover, five-to-ten percent of male survivors were pulled out of freezing water, many of whom stood for hours on an overturned lifeboat. Finally, of the four First Class ladies who perished, at least three bravely elected to stay on board despite being offered a chance to enter a lifeboat. (The most oft-cited example was Ida Straus who was the 63-year-old wife of a Macy's Department Store co-owner.)

Female privilege even trumped the needs of children. The fifty percent survival ratio for children is scandalous compared to the seventy-five percent fraction for adult women.

Contrary to feminist dogma, Titanic males convincingly prioritized the safety of women and children ahead of their own. While the ladies routinely accepted male sacrifice as a gender entitlement, some could unfairly take advantage of men who might simply have been alleged to have of evaded it. For example, two wives famously divorced surviving husbands. Each woman dubiously charged the men with cowardice on Titanic. Given the assumed era-specific female virtues — and reciprocal male obligations – such accusations were enough to condemn the men within society at-large.

Despite the obvious male sacrifices documented by survival statistics, modern feminists are determined to characterize women as victims and men as selfish perpetrators of the disaster. For example, Professor Ann Larabee of Michigan State University states:

> Although many men seemed to have behaved admirably…They may simply have had a cavalier trust in technology. Some did not behave like gentlemen at all, jumping on top of women…and when in the boats refusing to return to the disaster site to save those in the water.

Thus, Larabee implies the disproportionate male death ratio merely reflects a false hubris in male inventions, to wit, the ship itself. (Later she contradictorily asserts that men ascribed a feminine identity to the ship in order to designate blame for technological failure on a female as well.) She further implies that men alone failed to rescue those in the water, whereas women objected to returning even more often and forcefully than men. There are few reports of lifeboat ladies even suggesting a return.

Titanic Survival Table

Trivializing male disadvantages is popular sport among feminists. For example, women have outnumbered men on college campuses for so long that, The New York Times feels justified in publishing articles portraying men as advantaged because of their superior dating environment. Although men have long outnumbered women in the military I'd wager $100 against a good Cuban cigar that The Times has never published an article lamenting the dating disadvantages of male soldiers. More importantly, however, dating status is a trifling matter compared to the growing hostility toward males on campus where they are often forced into indoctrinations accusing them of being latent, if not active, rapists.

As former Senator Moynihan was put it, "Everyone is entitled to their own opinions, but not their own facts." Simple honesty requires that feminists and Hollywood admit that the overwhelming gender privilege aboard Titanic favored ladies. Even among the crew, over ninety percent of the women were saved.

Titanic-style chivalry: My body, my choice

Jonathan Taylor · 15 April 2012 · Archived copy · Original

April 15, 2012, is the 100th anniversary of the sinking of the Titanic. It is also around this time that the movie Titanic was re-released in 3D. So now that Titanic fever is sweeping through the zeitgeist once again, I feel compelled to lend my voice on the subject, particularly on how differently men and women were treated when the ship sank, and society's reaction to that treatment.

As the ship was going down, the crew called for women and children to board the lifeboats first. Since there were not enough lifeboats for everyone, many of the men went down with the ship into the icy water and died. When the disaster was over 72% of women had survived, followed by 50% of children, and a mere 19% of men. Commentators often argue the reason for giving women preference on lifeboats was either to allow the weaker a chance at survival (whereas stronger passengers had a higher chance of toughing it out in the water), or that the species would be able to reproduce and survive more effectively than if women and men had been saved at equal rates. Yet there is another aspect of the event society often dismisses or ignores.

If the crew instead called for whites and white children to board the lifeboats first, and if people of color not only complied, but also saw their exclusion and death as sacrifices that whites were naturally entitled to, how would we reflect on the event? Would we regard it as a noble sacrifice? Would we refrain from questioning why so many felt obligated to commit suicide based solely upon their existence in a particular birth group? I do not believe so. I believe we would have been asking some very different questions we currently are not asking of men, namely:

- Why is it offensive for society to say a woman's place is in the home, but not offensive to say that a man's place is in the grave?
- What cultural pressures have so conditioned men to believe that their mere existence as men decreases their value relative to that of women, to the point that women are entitled to their very lives?
- Why did women have a higher survival rate than children?
- If the primary reason for excluding men was to save the weaker and leave the more able-bodied to swim, why were the elderly not saved before the young? Why were children not saved before women, or even pregnant women before non-pregnant women?
- If excluding men served mainly to preserve the species, why were pregnant women not given priority over non-pregnant or elderly women, the latter of whom could not have children? And were the populations of the passenger's respective nations of origin so disproportionately concentrated within the Titanic that those countries would have died from under-population if men and women were saved at equal rates?

When a particular principle is selectively applied, we may be certain that it is not the primary motivator, and must look for alternatives. I do not believe women were saved primarily because they were weaker, or to repopulate the species, as these arguments are highly problematic. I believe these are either secondary reasons or smokescreens that serve to occlude the very real and politically inconvenient possibility that women were saved first and foremost because they were women.

Matriarchy is the accordance to women of primacy over children and the means of reproduction, and the institution of laws and customs which grant special rights and protections to women as a political class in recognition of that primacy, while excluding men from the same. It is the other half of our history which our culture denies when it swallows whole the Feminist lie that gender equality is a one-way street. The phrase "women and children" (as opposed to “women, men and children,” a much more inclusive and egalitarian grouping) is a slogan of both Matriarchy and Feminism. I encourage society to broadly observe, just as we see when we compare the survival rates of women to children on the Titanic, that whenever a law, policy or custom is promoted for the interests of women and children, it is usually women who are the primary beneficiaries. The examples are manifold.

In family courts, the phrase “best interest of the child” often actually means best interest of the mother, which is why children are often reflexively given to mothers in high-conflict divorces. When child support and welfare are given to single mothers with no oversight into whether the money is spent for the benefit of children, it is clear that the effect is not to bail out children from impoverished conditions, but to bail out single mothers.

The Domestic Violence Industry, founded upon the Feminist lie that men are nothing but perpetrators and women are nothing but victims, chants endlessly that its raison d’etre is to protect women and children, and turns a blind eye to abuses inflicted upon children by female perpetrators, leaving a man whose partner is abusive toward his children with no shelter to turn to.

Some dispute the role of sex in determining who was saved, and instead argue that class served a more prominent role. Indeed, first class members were selectively saved before those in second or third class. But the analysis for this line of argument stops there. When we further break down the victimization stats by sex within each class, we get a different picture. Among third class passengers, for example, 49% of women and 13% of men were saved. In addition to women being saved at roughly four times the rate of men, the disparities in survival by sex is also a critical factor and a common denominator across class lines, making it evident that class was more a coefficient of gender than the other way around.

Recently, when the Costa Concordia wrecked off the coast of Italy, society was given a chance to display how far it had progressed in 100 years. The results, while still disappointing, were yet encouraging. As reported by A.N. Wilson in the Daily Mail, a UK publication, “One of the features of the disaster that has provoked a great deal of comment is the stream of reports from angry survivors of how, in the chaos, men refused to put women and children first.”

Horror of horrors. Lining men up to knock them down just isn’t as easy as it used to be. Am I supposed to feel ashamed? On the contrary, I feel glad that men were willing to stand up for themselves, rather than be marked as second-class citizens simply due to their sex. Wilson continues:

When the Titanic went down in April 1912, the Captain’s orders were: ‘Women and children first!’ Although this legendary edict was never part of maritime law, it was adhered to so strictly on the Titanic that men were actually stopped from boarding lifeboats, many of which went to sea only three-quarters full. There were only a few exceptions to the unvarying tales of heroism: three men in steerage who disobeyed the rule – Italians, coincidentally – were shot.

Wilson forgets that a critical element of heroism is the possession and exercise of the choice to place oneself in the line of fire for the benefit of others. When people are coerced or forced into sacrifice and death, they are not heroes, but victims. Wilson goes on: “Flora Annie Steel – a forgotten name now, but a famous author in 1912 – wrote a poem in the paper saying that the men who perished in the Titanic disaster achieved a mercifully quick death and instant glory whereas their wives were left to grieve and fend for themselves.”

The words of Flora Steel are similar to those of Feminist and Secretary of State Hilary Clinton, who said “Women have always been the primary victims of war. Women lose their husbands, their fathers, their sons in combat.” One wonders why men should bother making these traditional sacrifices at all when they are often twisted into forms of abuse against those they sacrifice for. But moving beyond the incidence of shipwrecks, we may use this occasion to question why men should feel it is their role as men to reflexively place themselves in danger, or sacrifice their lives for women, in any situation.

If I see a woman being attacked in the street by a man, for example, I will at least fulfill my responsibility as a citizen by calling the police. But as far as playing the traditional male hero and intervening with my life, I cannot say I feel compelled to do so. Now I may very well choose to do so, if I am reasonably certain the attacker is unarmed and that she did not strike first. But if after calling the police I instead shrug my shoulders and walk away, why not? If I were attacked in the street, would a woman see it as her role to risk her life to save mine? And if I were to make that risk or sacrifice, is there any evidence the woman I saved would be any more grateful to me than our culture in general is grateful toward men as a group for the historic sacrifices they have made on behalf of women? My body, my choice.

If I happen to live with a woman and a criminal breaks in, and she hides under the bed and tells me to check it out rather than help me defend my home (or better yet, leave the premises together), I would not feel obligated to perform my "manly duty" to confront the intruder on her behalf. On the contrary, I would feel more than entitled to open the window, climb out, leave the house and everything in it behind me, and then call the police from a safe distance. And I would not feel the least bit of shame in doing this. If instead it were I who hid under the bed, would my partner see it as her role to personally ensure the security of the house? And why should I risk my life for mere bricks and mortar, or for a woman who has a 50% chance of divorcing me anyway? My body, my choice.

I apply the same reasoning to all disasters – including burning buildings, earthquakes, and the like – where an attempt to rescue a woman would mean risking a man's life: that men should not feel pressured to risk their lives for women by social compulsion, but rather are free to do so – or not – by individual choice. The blood sacrifice of men, which has historically been poured out for the safety and security of women, children and society, is a gift. It is not an entitlement, and no one has the moral authority to take that away from them. My body, my choice.

Now if a child was in danger, I would most likely act to save that child. In addition, I will refrain from speaking ill of men who choose to sacrifice their lives for women. If they wish to do so, in full knowledge that their sacrifices as men will neither be remembered nor appreciated by our misandric culture, that is their choice – so long as they do not attempt to force that responsibility on other men, nor prevent me from empowering my brothers by preaching the good news that they don't have to. My body, my choice.

Ah yes – my body, my choice! I do like that phrase, don't you? It feels rather empowering to say it. The social contract is broken, and this is cause not for our consternation, but celebration. Men as a collective are no longer obligated to die for women, and it is our great honor to proclaim this good news to the world. The time has come for men to assert their vulnerabilities as men, and to challenge the role of male protector. I am proud to stand by my brothers in such rare and invaluable male-friendly spaces, and to look back on the suffering men faced on the Titanic and say "never again."

Youth to pay for sexual contradictions

Ash Patil · 16 April 2012 · Archived copy · Original

I have just had the privilege of taking my 9 year old son and 7 year old nephew to a carnival in Sydney, Australia.

The boys are on Easter holiday break and always look forward to their annual visit to the Easter show, and going together, given their proximity in age, makes this enjoyable event all the more special for them.

I must admit that I too get excited, mostly in response to the contagious anticipation of the boys on the way to the carnival, and in response to the innocent laughter of young children who find so much enjoyment in all the child-friendly activities found at these events.

However, with all the rides, show bags, walking and carrying, along with the sometimes chaotic behaviour of excitable boys, I am typically 'spent' by the end of the day, although with a quiet sense of satisfaction that I have been able to give the boys another positive little memory, hopefully one more small piece in a happy and fulfilling childhood.

However this evening I did not feel this typical sense of satisfaction, in large measure I suspect because of what I and the boys were so noticeably confronted with as we mingled with the tens of thousands of other Australians while at the carnival.

To my utter despair, on a very cold autumn day in Sydney which required winter clothing for me and the boys, one of the earliest sites we saw while waiting in the queue for our tickets was countless young girls, aged between eight years up to their mid-teens, with skimpy-sized, 'Daisy Duke' cut-off jeans, not only exposing the length of their legs, but their buttocks too.

On a warmer day and on older women, this may not have looked so out of place, if at an appropriate venue, but in the midst of a cold-snap in Sydney, in a supposed family-friendly event, this seemed nothing less than bizarre.

What I found most distressing was the fact that the boys immediately caught on, and it clearly left a strong and I suspect unhealthy impression on them. The boys, almost on song, started what they described as a "bum-bum count", and before I even realised the boys were counting in the tens.

It was at this point when I naively quizzed the boys as to what they were counting, assuming naively that only I noticed this most obvious of distractions. In response to my question I got giggles and guilty looks on their faces.

"We are doing a bum-bum count daddy, because we can see the girls bums." my son finally said while giggling uncontrollably with his cousin.

My immediate response was to sternly warn the boys that it was impolite to stare, and that they should be focussing on the reason we were their instead. On reflection, I perhaps over-emphasised the issue with the boys, but as an adult male, I know only too well that in a society of heightened sensitivity against anything resembling sexual improprietary towards females, that such behaviour can lead to 'disaster' for an unwitting older male.

Despite the tone of my voice as I tried to emphasise the seriousness of this behaviour to the boys, my nephew was clearly keen to keep the topic alive, and began to quiz me.

"Why are the girls showing their bum-bums?." my nephew would ask, while laughing with my son, indulging in this opportunity to say otherwise inappropriate words, seemingly for a legitimate query.

I was at a loss as to how to explain this, but chastened the boys repeatedly throughout the day, for either staring, making references to the visible anatomy, or for giggling quietly for what was to become a quiet but obviously transparent joke between them.

This whole episode left me quite disturbed, as this was a wholesome family event, and the last thing I was expecting was to be confronted by hyper-sexualised displays from under-aged girls, that would get my son and nephew excited for all the wrong reasons.

Pondering on these events after the day was done and dusted, I realised that I was left ‘disturbed’ on a number of levels, some obvious and some that only came to me after some thought, as I realised that this dress code seemed to challenge what I thought were cornerstone values in our society.

I was left asking ‘in a society that prioritised above everything else the protection of children against sexual influence of any kind, what kind of social pressures, or perhaps social incentives, really do exist in our society that compels young girls to expose themselves in such cold weather, in such a sexually affronting manner?’

What does this then say about our very ‘in-your face’ public campaigns against child sexual abuse, and campaigns against the treatment of women as a whole as sexual objects? Are we as a society saying one thing, but doing the complete opposite in truth?

If we are, then our children, both girls and boys, are going to pay a high price for this contradiction.

As we left the carnival that day, a group of young girls, most of which were dressed in these short cut-off jeans, shuffled passed us, all locked in arms and singing in tune to what I think is currently a hit song on the radio.

“I am sexy and I know it”, they chanted as they buzzed passed us mocking the stares of other teenage boys in close proximity.

I hope for their sake, that they don’t really mean it.

Man, Woman, Truth: Getting honest about boys

Dr. Paul & Dr. T · 16 April 2012 · Archived copy · Original

[box icon="none"]

Boys face a lot of pressure in their young lives. Trying to navigate their social lives with young women is a trying, painful experience even when things go well. It is a time of lessons, most of them by trial and error.

They don't get much help with this. Most of what they get from adults is some lectures on how you treat, or perhaps please, the opposite sex, but almost nothing on how to hold your own with them. Simply put, we fail to teach boys what they really need to know about girls, and themselves, where it concerns relationships.

On Monday, April 16, 2012, at 8:00 pm CDT (yes, we are back to the regular time), join co-hosts Dr. Tara Palmatier and Paul Elam for an episode of Man, Woman, Truth that focuses on the messages we give boys about their expectations in relationships with women, and how we set them up for misery in later life.

The call in number for the show is 310-388-9709.

The Iron (sulfide) Lady

B.R. Merrick · 17 April 2012 · Archived copy · Original

Interesting.

In a televised Amnesty International special back in 1989 called "The Secret Policemen's Biggest Ball," two Monty Python members, John Cleese and Michael Palin, begin re-enacting the famous Parrot Sketch from "Monty Python's Flying Circus." However, not long after starting the sketch, Palin, who is supposed to protest throughout that the parrot he sold Cleese "not 'alf an hour ago from this very boutique" isn't dead but resting, immediately gives Cleese an apology, a refund, and a couple of holiday vouchers. With this rendition of the sketch now apparently over, Cleese, just before disappearing offstage, tells the audience, "Well, you can't say Thatcher hasn't changed some things." The audience applauds.

Funny.

Another audience for another episode of "Monty Python's Flying Circus" did the same thing back in the early 70s, when said Cleese made reference to Thatcher's brain being located in her shin. This was 'round about the time, according to Thatcher's official website, that "The Labour Government of 1974-79 was one of the most crisis-prone in British history, leading the country to a state of virtual bankruptcy in 1976 when a collapse in the value of the currency on the foreign exchanges forced the government to negotiate credit from the International Monetary Fund."

The British economy at that time was largely run by regulators and Leftists, who always seem to think you can fix things by passing more laws and spending more money. Margaret Thatcher relieved quite a lot of that, to the groans of Leftists and their media sycophants. It was a remarkable achievement, done by a politician who cared less about the personal attacks she endured and more about the end result she desired. I don't agree with political solutions, and can think of a great many things Thatcher did that I disagree with (most notably a national "education" program), but Britain is not my island, and this is not a political rant. There are at least two things I like about the woman: From what I can tell, she did what she said she was going to do; and she gave the world a lesson in successful economics by reducing the degree of governmental coercion in the marketplace. It's a lesson that humanity refuses to learn, and one that the modern state and its media refuse to teach: Leave people alone, and they will eventually prosper. You'll notice that we haven't brought up Thatcher's sex yet, but we're going to, because that's ten times more important than leaving people alone.

Ridiculous.

Meryl Streep, an actress with some weird, unearthly gift, just won Oscar Number Three for portraying an aged version of Thatcher in "The Iron Lady," with scene after scene depicting the former Prime Minister wandering around her house, halfway to dementia. If you go by the film, Thatcher was saddled with ungrateful children and a nagging househusband. (In reality, she was married to a successful businessman, and, just as in the movie, let's forget about whatever the kids' problems were.) Her mother didn't want her to go to Oxford, as if the idea of a woman getting that much education was horrifying. (I can find no evidence of this, in either Thatcher's early life or anywhere else in the Western world.) She was surrounded by men throughout her political career, and oftentimes uncomfortably so. She didn't like piles of garbage and decided to do something about it. (We never find out exactly what.) Some stuff blows up near her. (We never find out exactly why.). A war happened on TV. And finally, she got to be Prime Minister for a while, so she could wear her cute little outfits and walk around big important halls, surrounded by men.

Like "She-Devil," a movie where the protagonist destroys her husband's life because he cheats and gets a little too upset at home, the only thing worth watching in this film is Streep. Also like "She-Devil," Streep's performance alone isn't able to save it.

What the film tries to do over and over again – to paint Thatcher out to be yet another victim of the opposite sex's ignorance – can best be summed up by the worst offending clip. During the Falklands War (the TV war mentioned above), Alexander Haig is visiting from America ostensibly to offer advice. (Or something. The scene is approximately 20 seconds long and I'm not watching it again.) The director makes the execrable choice of showing Haig's entrance in slow motion, with a swagger that's the walking equivalent of a 10-inch dangler as he struts into the room. Thatcher is unmoved and unperturbed, as she is throughout the film whenever she is standing in a room full of men. She puts him in his place with a few direct words. In reality, Thatcher always did seem untroubled with the political boys, so here Streep plays it correctly. Why, then, are we shown continual opposition to Thatcher via the opposite sex, and throughout the entire film no less, when it apparently meant so little to the one made of real iron?

To begin with, "The Iron Lady" was directed by Phyllida Lloyd, a woman who also directed "Mamma Mia!", a film so awful that I had to press eject before it was less than halfway through. Streep starred in that one as well, refusing to save it by playing a woman with a grown daughter whose father Streep's character tried to ensure she would never know about. "The Iron Lady" was written by Abi Morgan, a woman who also wrote "Sex Traffic" for television, which I haven't seen, but the description at the Internet Movie Database says in part: "Because of the near epidemic problem of sex trafficking of young Balkan women, [American defense contractor] Kernwell has decided to support the charity, Worldwide Federation Against Forced Migration." I guess I'm not going to see that, either.

The one area where I agree with Thatcher, the reduction of governmental ownership and control, is barely brought up except with the odd encomium to individuality or some sort of vague reference to hope. The end result of Thatcher's dismantling of governmental oversee is met with headlines screaming "Profit!" and Brits in an office doing a conga line. In other words, that's apparently all that was accomplished by Thatcher's administration. She let Brits get greedier.

Appalling.

Not to mention insulting. It misrepresents not only what Thatcher actually believed and stood for, but it's a slap in the face to women everywhere. If there is a single feminist out there that ever thought feminism's end goal was to actually help women become all that they can be, she should be absolutely disgusted with this film. Why is every confrontation with men so flat and over with so quickly? Why doesn't Thatcher react more when she is slighted due to her sex? Did she ever hang out with any women? What about with female politicians, the state's fun-loving parody of women? Did she stand for anything specific? Did she accomplish anything beneficial? There are all these people in the film, standing outside various cars that carry Thatcher this way and that, jerking placards up and down, and shouting in her face. What's that all about? Did any of them change their minds years later, like Cleese? Can we talk to a single miner in this film? What about a single trade union leader? What the hell was the matter with Britain?

The only thing this movie succeeds in doing is showing you what the problem is between feminist and Leftist views of female politicians and who those politicians actually are. It has nothing to do with their sex. The only place where it ever has to do with a woman's sex is in her mind, especially in the modern world. Thatcher knew this. She wasn't vilified for being a woman; she was vilified for being a conservative woman. She was a traitor.

It's the same with Sarah Palin. For a while, she seemed to be quite the presidential contender, so the Left came out with stories of her stupidity (her brain's probably in her shin, too) to take her down a few notches. Years later, when a couple of American feminists make a biopic of Palin, it will probably be the same deal, just so they can avoid talking about any conservative ideas that might actually have a basis in fact. To some small extent, Thatcher understood the nature of coercion, at least coercion against businessmen. We can't have people learning that! The only thing that feminists seem to admire about Thatcher is her sex. If she weren't demented in real life, I'm sure that the real Thatcher would have plenty of unpleasant things to say about that sort of attention.

Women have had access to the halls of statist power now for decades. They have had access to education and opportunity for much longer. Yet the only story about an important historical figure like Thatcher that two well-connected female filmmakers can come up with is not unlike the questions asked by a few female reporters at a press conference in 1975, when Thatcher won her position as leader of the Conservative party: "Mrs. Thatcher, have you spoken to your husband?"… "And what do you plan for … tonight?"… "You were carrying a bouquet of flowers when you came into Tory Central Office, … can you tell us who gave them …" Compare that to an exchange she had with a male reporter:

Questioner: Mrs. Thatcher you said that sex was not the issue and so did the other candidates. What was the issue you think that put you over the top…?

Thatcher: I would like to think it was merit?

Questioner: Could you expand on that?

Thatcher: No, it doesn't need expansion. You chaps don't like short answers. Or direct answers. Men like long rambly, waffly answers.

Speak for some other man, (iron) lady. I like it short, sweet, and to the point. I'm glad you do as well.

It's no surprise to me that Streep was attracted to this role. She was of much the same mind three decades ago when she starred in "Out of Africa," another biopic about another extraordinary woman, Karen von Blixen, better known by her male pseudonym, Isak Dinesen, who ran supply wagons on the African plains during World War I. Near the beginning of the film, von Blixen accidentally walks into a men's club and is quickly escorted out. After a dangerous journey, and meeting up with these same men on the African plains with much-needed wartime supplies, they invite her back to the club at the end of the film for a toast before she leaves Africa for good. As the thorough professional she is, Streep plays it the way it's supposed to be played: with gratitude. In an interview on the accompanying DVD, however, all she has to say is, "Big fucking deal!"

Ah, modern women. Getting all pissed off at us guys for opening their doors, pulling out their chairs, and standing when they enter the room, yet keeping a little place for ourselves. It escapes Streep and all other feminist-indoctrinated females that these little niceties were intended as a man's sign of respect. Opening doors, pulling out chairs, and standing when one enters the room is what a butler does for his employer, or what a servant does for his ruler. Somewhere down the line over the last few decades, some idiot who doesn't understand an ounce of manhood told these women that we did these things because we thought of them as being weak, like children. Streep will probably never understand that the toast to von Blixen, whether or not it actually occurred, was because she did something amazing that, in the minds of those men, benefited them far more than it did her, and it was obvious to them that she did so at the risk of her own safety and well being. The toast to her fantastic feat had little to do with her sex; the doors opened, chairs pulled out, and legs straightened for the real von Blixen, probably every other day of her life, had everything to do with it. That, Ms. Streep, is the big, fucking deal.

Bollocks.

Thatcher understood the world of work. Until recently, work outside the home was largely a man's world. The demographics have changed, but men have not. They're not going to. Therefore, women who envy men's exclusive clubs, who look longingly at the big office, who see from way far away where men appear to be doing something interesting, need to understand what men are like in these settings before they embark. Once women were let in to these "all-male" areas of modern life, they discovered that it wasn't tailored to women!

Shocking.

I remember a father writing online about his daughter wanting to go out for high school football. He agreed to help her train by taking her out into the backyard and clotheslining her. That was the end of that. Yes, ladies, football looks like a lot of fun, until you actually play it. Then it's bruises, broken bones, cold mud, grass stains, body odor, sweat, taunting, teasing, sore losers, sore winners, sore muscles, and beer. Still want to play?

The insults hurled at Thatcher, both in this silly movie and in slightly-less-silly real life, are insults the men hurl at each other. British Parliament is notorious for this. It's expected. Any woman who wants entry had better have a thick, Thatcher-like skin. To stop the proceedings every time your feelings are hurt and blame it all on men is childish. To base an entire movie on this skewed world view is even more so.

Streep wins an Oscar for playing a woman whom we're supposed to admire simply because a) she won a political contest, and b) she's a woman. Kate Winslet wins an Oscar for playing a former Nazi prison guard who let Jewish women burn to death in a church instead of opening the doors, and we're supposed to feel somewhat sorry for her because a) she can't read, and b) she's a woman. Katharine Zeta-Jones wins an Oscar for playing a woman whose murders we're supposed to excuse or at least laugh at because a) she can sing and dance, b) her feelings were hurt, and c) she's a woman.

Charlize Theron wins for playing a prostitute who kills her johns. Sandra Bullock wins after jokingly telling a large black guy she's just adopted that she'll cut off his penis if he impregnates any young woman at college. Liza Minelli's Oscar-winning character gets an abortion without the father's knowledge or consent. Julie Andrews wins an Oscar for lecturing a dad who ignores his children, all the while ignoring the mother who ignores the same children. That is a large part of our culture, and it stinks almost as much as a large pile of shit.

The real Margaret Thatcher was invited to view new designs for British Airways on little model airplanes. She saw some weird design reminiscent of a 60s-era Dixie cup on one of the tails. The Union Jack, a design that no doubt appealed to a conservative monarchist like Thatcher, was absent. With a tight-yet-polite grin, she covered it up with a tissue, to the nervous laughter of the men surrounding her. Makes you wonder what a mentally competent Thatcher would do to this movie if she could comprehend it. That's entertainment I'd gladly pay for. And it would have nothing to do with her sex.

Why men's rights?

externalangst · 17 April 2012 · Archived copy · Original

[dropcap]F[/dropcap]or those concerned about the environmental challenges of an increasing human population, pollution and resource depletion, there is an unmentionable solution to what seems like a politically intractable problem. That solution is men's rights. Unlike ecofeminism, which simply blames men for all environmental problems or the more academically accepted Human Ecology; which similarly denies any female agency for said problems, men's rights may provide for a sensible sex systems theory understanding of the seemingly diabolical problem of environmental degradation and conflict over resource competition.

The problem is how to persuade people that via technology and intelligence, working less and consuming less are personally, socially and environmentally beneficial. This is not such a problem if one is prepared to consider that the main driver of working and consuming more is female hypergamy. This would be blasphemous in the academies and government, yet it is hypergamy which drives men to work harder for wealth to attract females; and once paired, to continue to work harder (at women's not so gentle behest) so mainly women can consume even more unnecessary stuff and services.

There is a disconnection between the working and earning of wealth (mainly men) and the spending and consumption of wealth (mainly women). This is a moral hazard; as why would someone choose to lower their level of unnecessary spending when there are no benefits; only costs, to them for doing so. The solution is as simple as it is socially unacceptable. Minimize wealth transfer from men to women; and the subsequent demand that only men are socially required to work full-time or longer. People should only consume as much as they are prepared to pay for with their own efforts and labor. This reconnection between earning and consuming can only lead to better purchasing decisions and less waste.

While we have had many soul searching inquiries into 'what women want', 'what men want' is not asked – and for a good reason too. Men may actually tell you what they want. Governments and women would be appalled at the prospect of men not being encouraged and/or enforced to work harder that they themselves would which. Less tax, less political power to redistribute wealth, less national power on the world stage are the obvious reasons why men's rights are to be denied. Women's self determination is an obvious good; men's self determination an obvious disaster for both the powerful and women. It has been ever such. Since the beginnings of civilization, Kings have required men to be soldiers and slaves; and have required women to produce male soldiers and slaves. Women can also produce more females to produce more male soldiers and slaves. Is it little wonder there are only women's privileges and rights to choice?

Studies have shown that given a choice men want to work less. A 2009 study [1] by the Centre for Policy Studies in the UK found that men and women both wanted to work around the same hours part-time. This fact is only used in the study to prove that women are not "work shy"; since both women and men desired the same number of working hours. However, the only recommendation from this aptly titled study, 'What Women Want…and how they can get it' is for government policy to accommodate women's desire to work less; not men's. This study was unusual in that it asked what people desired beyond financial imperatives. More common is to bundle men's desires for work with the all-pervading expectation that men are required to financially support women and society. Even then, one in three fathers want to work less; and yearn for more home time [2].

Thus female hypergamy and government ambition are the reasons why the average man is forced into service for most women and the powerful. As such, the average man is, as well as a demographic minority, certainly a minority in the power stakes. This is why men's rights are so fiercely denied and contested. They don't suit the powerful; that is, the vast majority of women and the holders of political power – a frightening large and omnipotent demographic.

What is to be done? Many people would object to men's rights for self-determination as the obvious result would be to risk prosperity, and therefore, national interests in an increasingly competitive international scene. Surely, acceptance of men's rights would only accelerate the relative decline of the western economies in a jealous and bitter world. It seems western civilization will be seriously challenged by other civilizations within the next decade. The US has already have lost the prime polluter mantle to China. Perhaps the institutional male-bashing should just continue until male morale improves, men work harder and the US is restored to polluter primacy. Is this the only way to protect and benefit the nation and thus ourselves?

Given the decline of the West economically, there may be another way to improve the world, our standing in it and the future of humanity. That's right – men's rights. While economic and military power are not to be sneezed at, soft power like the cultural benefits that would arise from men's rights should not be ignored in a world where so many are enslaved and/or impoverished. Immigrants are already attracted to countries which give them a better lifestyle and human rights. This means the Men's Rights Movement may have a solution to not only a nation's social problems, but possibly to the international problems of environmental degradation and perhaps even conflict over ever dwindling resources. The West could, in time, lead a men's rights revolution that would be irresistible to the rest of the world in the same way that entrepreneurial and religious freedoms have become.

Imagine if all those men currently enslaved in boring, repetitive, sole destroying jobs could be freed to engage in the creative industries of technology and the arts. Technology is our best hope for the future, especially for environmental and conflict problems. Art is what helps make life worth living. Men are gifted at both. How much of a better lifestyle have we already forsaken by forcing the innate genius in us to forgo creating a better world; and instead provide marginally useless consumables and dubious services for the consumer sex.

Why is there a need to first point out the benefits that men's rights could achieve in promoting a more technologically and socially agreeable future? Why not just because it is the right thing to do anyway? It is because while women's rights are seen as acceptable and desirable things in themselves, men's rights are a revolutionary threat to the existing power group – women and powerful men. Their minds are closed in the same way that all previous power groups had their eyes closed. Primitive societies were and are controlled by power groups who would suppress the creativity and enterprise of others; lest they increase their wealth and power relative to the power group. They would regard this as a loss to their relative power, rather than an overall increase in the community's wealth; and subsequently suppress it. It is the power group's obsession with relative wealth and power; rather than absolute wealth and power which holds their communities back. Such self-serving blindness to a better future for all is a significant contributing factor acting against the establishment of men's rights.

Time is running out and currently, the prospects for men's rights are remote and distant. There is only one thing for it. Men – go your own way. Force them to open their eyes. No society can compete (or duly cooperate) internationally without the willing involvement of their men. Everyone's future depends on it.

Too much perhaps. Somewhat exaggerated. Surely just one simply good thing – men's rights to determine their own lifestyle and retain a reasonable amount of compensation for work done – could not lead to world peace. How could it? Instead consider how women's rights to unfettered hypergamy would contribute to world peace. Hypergamy leads to increasing resource over- consumption and competition. This most probably will lead to conflict.

Currently the ambition of men is largely attributable to the social sanction of women's hypergamy and its fulfillment. Previously it was through the selection of a higher status male and their subsequent harassment to procure more wealth and status. It is now becoming more acceptable to abandon the current mate and trade up. Hypergamy is women forever attempting to better themselves. The problem is that it is always at the expense and labor of men. There are two ways a woman can improve her lot in life. She can accomplish it herself or she can use hypergamy, that is, receive it from a man.

This is where men's rights come into the big picture and humanity's future. It would be reasonable to object that naturalistically, we men are forever condemned to female hypergamy, and as such, men's rights can never be properly realized. But I ask you. Do we have a choice? At root, it is hypergamy that is leading us ever more towards over-consumption and competition. The future is uncertain and worrisome. The future is men's rights or major problems. Future technologies will progressively remove the biological sex differences or otherwise fulfill their requirements. The direction for humanity's success is incontrovertible. Technology and men's rights are the only possible future.

Frenzied Feminists Find The Soviet Marriage Situation Much To Their Liking

As a member of the So-Called Men's Rights Movement I must say am a bit ashamed of how little work I put into the article I humbly present to you here. I might have taken the time to paraphrase my sources rather than quoting them. I might have given a short history of the political system referred to herein in order to put the facts in their specific context. I might have taken these reports pertaining to a foreign country, in a long past time, under a different political system than our own, and took the trouble to explain why I think they deserve your notice. But I chose not, I confess, to do any of these things.

My reason for this? Simply put, if there are any historical text I have ever uncovered in my extensive research on the relations between the sexes (which is the barbaric way I refer to what our legal superiors call "gender relations") which need no explanation, analysis, or introduction, it is the two brief newspaper articles which I reproduce in toto below. This pair of journalistic ditties made their appearance in American newspapers in 1927, spaced apart by a period of about six weeks. This was right smack-a-dab in the middle of the years when the world's first formally organized men's rights groups – in Vienna, Chicago and New York – came together.

1920 Soviet poster (Wikipedia Commons)

Newspaper report #1: Feb. 13, 1927 – "New Soviet Marriage Laws Find Favor Among Women"

MOSCOW – Frenzied feminists find the soviet marriage situation much to their liking. It is the male of the species that all new marriage laws attack. Once upon a time it was the woman who cried when she was deserted. Now the case is reversed. A dictatorship of the eternal woman has been declared and it is the man who weeps.

He weeps because a new law just passed in the Ukraine permits him to be married without knowing about it. He can simply be notified through the post that a certain lady says she has married him. That is enough, no other ceremony is necessary. The lady "announces" the marriage, and he is a benedict, whether he wishes it or not.

The law provides that either party may deal thus summarily with the other. But it is usually the man who finds himself married without knowing it. Then upon refusing to continue with the marriage, he can be made to pay alimony in case there is offspring.

ANOTHER CAUSE

Another cause for weeping is the fact that all over Russia a law now exists that will hold the man responsible for all matrimonial ventures, whether registered or simply do facto. He must pay alimony to any and all fair ladies who can prove that at one time, they lived in a state of de facto matrimony with him.

Cases that come to court show that this is easily proved. There is always some woman ready to swear that the defenseless man was the recognized "de facto husband" of her "girl friend." A third person as a witness that the couple has a joint household, even if only for a few days, is all that is needed.

Should there be children, the question is settled without further ado. The woman collects. Should there be two women and two sets of children, they also collect and so on ad infinitum. So the new legislation insures a second thought on the part of the man before he goes in for a new and casual attachment.

The scions said the recognition of the de facto marriage as equally binding as the registered one would automatically quash any polygamous tendencies on the part of the man.

MUST DIVIDE WITH ALL

If he must divide his property with all the ladles of his heart, then he will take care that there is just one with a real claim upon him, reasoned the lawmakers. Perhaps there is logic in that.

The situation which the latest legislation strives to remedy is certainly bad enough. For the last few years there had been a new profession arising in the land of the Soviets. It is that of the "alimony widow."

The "alimony widow" it is who lives in several short de facto marriages, and raises a brood of de facto children. For the support of her offspring she is legally entitled to collect a certain percentage of the wages of the men she names as the fathers of her brood. In this way she rakes in a much larger income than she could ever make working in a soviet factory or institution—and lives comfortably and happily ever after.

Newspaper report #2: March. 27, 1927 "'Alimony Widow' Is Soviet Problem – Women Who Wed Several and Insist on Collecting From All Rapped by Russian Commisar of Health."

Moscow. – Commissar Health Semashko condemned the superficial attitude toward matrimonial relations which exists among modem Russian boys and girls, in a lecture which drew a full house and enthusiastic applause.

As one method of control the Health Commissar suggested that Freud's theory of converting sexual energy into more sublimated channels should be taught youths. Yet, he said, despite the lax living which is prevalent, university students of today are three times healthier than those of pre-revolutionary times.

These prematurely mated youngsters live "more intensely than common cense should permit," he said. Semashko has just published a new book on the morals of the young in Soviet Russia entitled, "Rely on Alimony but learn to provide for yourself."

This title is a parody on an old Russian proverb where the word 'Alimony" has been substituted for "the Lord."

Alimony has proved a stumbling block in the new order of matrimony. Young women who married for a week at various times were tar too clever in collecting a permanent income from the fathers of their assemblage of children.

"With alimony from one man," they argued. "I can just manage to exist. But if I can collect from three or four at a time then I've a settled income tor life."

Chiefly against these “alimony widows” Semashko directed the complaints in his book.

There you have it. The naked documents as I came across them.

I personally cherish these two journalistic gems. These creepy reports – from totalitarian Russia dated only three years before the creation of the NKVD on April 25, 1930, and therefore precede the mass arrests and incarceration in gulags of all those comrades whom the state considered to perhaps have secret thoughts which might run counter to the philosophy of “social justice” – are in my estimation quite valuable to every single So-Called Men’s Rights Activist, and likewise to all others who detest tyranny and its sycophantic ethics-washed and spineless “public servants,” whose taxpayer-funded ranks expand in our former republic on an incremental but nauseatingly steady basis.

Now you too, dear reader of AVfM, can share in the delight I experienced in discovering these charming little bomblets of utopian top-down planners. Share ‘em with your buddies. Quote ‘em in the comments you wildly sew across unfettered cyperspace like so many So-Called Johnny Appleseeds disseminating intensely unwelcome and inconvenient seminal truths. Milk ‘em for all they’ve got to offer. And may your orchards blossom with the passionate spirit of victorious post-totalitarian liberty.

Tonight, AVFM's JtO and GWW take a high-altitude view of the most obvious opponents of the human rights of men and boys, namely the followers of big-Feminism. Much ink and many pixels have been expended in discussions of whether the movement named after females is one seeking their equal rights, or their supremacy.

The answer might surprise even some experienced opponents of what sometimes seem like a cult of sexual superiority. In addition tonight, we'll be examining the motivations and behaviours of the superior sex, those who are sometimes compared to royalty, to goddesses, or to children, and in moments of clarity, to simple stimulus responders like flatworms.

In addition, AVfM introduces a new segment to the show : "Who Feminists Want to Murder his Week".

The plow horse and the princess

Alison Tieman (Typhonblue) · 19 April 2012 · Archived copy · Original

There once was a queen who was sovereign over a modest but prosperous queendom. On the day her daughter came of age, the Queen took her daughter aside and showed her the source of her prosperity.

In the stables, far from prying eyes, was a broken old horse wearing a worn leather bridle with a rusty iron bit. The horse's coat was worn thin in places, his mane falling out, his legs trembling from the effort of keeping himself standing.

'He's ready for the knackers, my daughter.' Said the Queen matter-of-factly. 'And there he shall go in due course.'

'This is the horse that built the queendom!' The princess said. 'Surely he should have some sort of retirement! And a proper funeral.'

'No, my daughter. You must respect his role; his role is to sacrifice for us, therefore even in death we respect his role by allowing his body to provide a last benefit. It will be the glue factory if he doesn't live to make it to the slaughterhouse.'

'Besides, it is not him that is magic. His bridle is the magic, my daughter. When you place it on a plow horse, the plow horse will be so proud to wear it and so proud that you placed it on him that he will work himself to death to fulfill your needs. It is his pride that makes the magic work; and his pride that gives it its strength.'

With that the Queen lifted the bridle from the old horse's head. The old horse let out a rattling cough and, trembling, knelt. After a moment even kneeling was too much for him; he lay on its side. A few moments more and his last breath shuddered his broken body like a paper doll on a string.

The Queen watched the horse's death with a cool detachment.

'That poor horse.' Said the princess, dabbing at her eyes with a lace kerchief. 'He was pitiful.'

The Queen stared at her daughter, her demeanor solemn. 'Controlling your sentiment is the price of leadership my daughter.' Replied the Queen. 'Speaking of which, after you place the bridle upon a horse's head do not let yourself want it; do not take it off him before you are done with him; above all, do not explain its true nature to him. Now, you must select the horse that will wear your bridle.'

The Queen's daughter took her time selecting just the right plow horse to wear the bridle. In due course she found a strong, handsome draft horse and all the queendom came to celebrate her placing the bridle upon his head in a great festival.

The princess basked in the adoration of her people as she brought out the bridle and made to place it upon the horse's head. But soon as the bit hit the back of his tongue, the bridle transformed from worn leather into spun gold and silver, embedded with pearls and rubies.

The princess gasped at the sight of it and so did her people. She glanced around herself; now all eyes were no longer on her, they were on the draft horse. Resentment stirred in the princess's heart.

Sensing her daughter's discomfort, the Queen interjected. 'But lets not forget the woman behind the draft horse.'

The gathered nobles agreed with their queen and toasted the princess's choice.

True to her mother's words, when the Princess had a need, the draft horse would provide. When she felt the queendom threatened by northern barbarians, the draft horse built a castle to thwart their ambitions and led the charge to repel them.

When the queendom was gripped with a famine and the princess felt the first stirrings of fear for herself, the draft horse pulled the plow faster and harder than any horse could because of the pride he had for his bridle.

But the princess was not happy. She seethed silently to herself. How the plow horse was admired when he wore the bridle! People would stop and stare and remark on how strong he was and how much he had accomplished. They awarded him titles for his great deeds. And each admiring glance and handsome trophy was a dagger in the princess's heart.

After all it was her needs he lived to fulfill; her benefit he bowed to; her frailties he sacrificed for.

She should have the bridle! And all the attention given him should be rightfully hers! But remembering her mother's words, 'don't let yourself want it; don't take it off him until you are done with him; and above all don't explain its true nature to him' the princess resisted giving in to her jealousy.

One day a passing dignitary from another land happened to mention the beauty and majesty of the castle built by the plow horse. How wonderful it was and how ingenious the plow horse had been to build it. The plow horse preened under the dignitary's compliments and the princess fumed. It was enough that her own people admired the plow horse; but must she bear a stranger's admiration for the plow horse as well?

The princess, unable to contain her anger any longer, cried out, 'He may have built it, but he built it for me!' And clomped from the dignitary's presence.

That night she went to the stable and crept to the horse's stall. Watching him rest with the handsome bridle—surrounded by all his medals and trophies—bile rose in the princess. 'Give the bridle to me.'

The plow horse woke and used to giving the princess whatever she needed, dutifully allowed her to grab hold of the bridle.

'Stupid horse, I let you wear this bridle, but it was always mine. I just used it to control you! And look what you did! You were supposed to live for my needs, but you saved the best in this world for yourself!' She pulled the bridle from the horse's head. It turned back into crackled leather and rusted iron in her hands.

She stared at it, dumbstruck and so did the horse.

Once the horse saw the bridle for what it was, old, worn—and above all a bridle—his demeanor changed instantly. He reared up, pawing the air with his great hooves. In her haste to get out of the stall and away from him the princess dropped the bridle.

The stallion turned his head to the stable door. The door was open. In her greed for the bridle the princess had forgotten to secure it. The stallion's nostrils flared, catching the scent of long night runs, open water and wild grasses.

He bolted through the open stable door, trampling the bridle to pieces in his escape.

The horse gone the princess looked at the cracked leather bridle now laying broken on the ground. Off the horse's head the magic was gone—there was nothing left in the bridle to want—and she felt a dawning horror as she finally understood her mother's warning. The bridle's only real worth was its ability to control the plow horse and she had lost its magic forever.

We have a wealth of statistics, insightful reasoning and copious references in support of our positions on women in general and feminists in particular. We should. That is what we do best; take a logical stand and support it. Among ourselves that is entirely appropriate and should continue. When dealing with most women and all feminists there is no substitute for knee-jerk, entirely visceral and inflexible moral judgments. In fact, they should be preferred.

Endless citation, refutation of fallacy and Socratic pursuit of truth are the tools of reason. Men tend to understand them. Women, generally speaking, don't because indignation, outrage and gut level distaste are rooted in emotionalism. Women do understand base emotionalism and do respond to it in a more predictable way than they could ever respond to reason. They are also more likely to respond appropriately because the message is more clearly understood. Emotionalism is their language.

When you blurt out a definitive moral statement from the soul rather than a contrivance of the mind, you then occupy the high ground. It puts those who disagree with you in the unenviable position of convincing you that bad is better, if they are to persuade you at all. They may not wish to persuade you, but in the case of women, if others take your position they will feel compelled to try. Thereby forcing them more closely examine their own positions.

Feminism and Moral Relativism

Feminists promote Moral Relativism for one simple reason: Feminism is suspect on moral grounds and they know it. It is necessary for them to muddy the waters in the minds of the public because feminism cannot stand in the face of any absolute standard of morality. In a system of binary right and wrong, the individual tenets of feminism will usually fail. Those tenets that do not fail are easily acceptable to men. One doesn't need feminism to sell those.

The Utility of Ceaseless Moralizing

If the Civil Rights Movement used the strategy of the MRM, segregation would still be in place. Imagine if MLK or any other civil rights leader ascended the bully pulpit and went on and on about how studies have shown that desegregating mass transit will increase GDP by 14 percent or how a voter registration initiative will reduce the incidence of infectious disease. People rejected racism because it was unequivocally wrong. No other facts were necessary. The hammer of moral justice came down on Jim Crow and that was it. The losers in that battle were the ones to resort to recitation of supposedly sound arguments.

In a personal context, we don't even have to employ female examples to see how much more effective judgmental dogmatism can be. Imagine a party where you observe another guest double dipping a chip. Imagine first that you tell him about the geometric reproduction of bacteria and go on to list the different species of microbes contained in human saliva. Now imagine that you say, "I don't want your germs you f-i-l-t-h-y pig!" Which would have the most personal impact?

No need to waste words or knock yourself out reasoning with feminists or even your wife, for that matter, when a short and visceral pronouncement from on high will do and is more effective. Sluts are against slut shaming because sluttiness is, indeed, shameful. Say so. Your position would be unassailable because they too believe it. They invoke moral relativism and slut pride marches as a means to escape the inescapable.

Ostracism and the Herd Mentality

Females have depended upon the collective from very ancient times. Until recently, social exclusion was fatal to a woman and her offspring. A man's life and limb has always depended upon his ingenuity, cleverness and perseverance. The origin of reason and strength. A woman's survival has always hinged upon maintaining membership in the group. It is natural for a man to favor liberty more than a woman because his survival depends upon skills that are distinct from those that would secure inclusion within a group. In the case of women, no such distinction is possible. To most effectively punish a man, remove his liberty. To most effectively punish a woman, expel her from the group.

Slut Walks, “Sex in the City” and the self esteem cult are all attempts to reassure women that even when they behave abominably that the bad behavior has the sanction of the collective and they face no risk of expulsion if they engage in it. To modify the behavior of women, reimpose that risk. The good news is that it can be done in relatively short order. Yes, the example of Lindsey Lohan is huge but somewhat remote. A stark and unvarnished remonstration from someone in closer proximity will undo the propaganda swiftly. Declarations of “that is disgusting” accumulate. Hearing it once may not overcome Cosmo and she can dismiss it as an isolated raving of a lunatic. If she were to hear it more often, however, she begins to doubt herself and wonder about her status within her more immediate collective. Women also have the tendency to assign more significance to something than it deserves. If she were categorically reproved as many as three or four times, she would imagine that the whole world is against her. A man can conclude that one man with courage is his own majority and it renders him invulnerable to criticism. A woman cannot. She is too reliant upon consensus. What is more, she is naturally more risk adverse. Risk is something men are supposed to take. A small handful of reproofs are enough to make her reconsider her behavior. There is too much at stake.

One does not have to always be punitive. There is nothing that can be done about the Mary Kellets and Vliet Triptees of this world but most women do want to align themselves with goodness. The problem lately has been that moral relativism and the aggressive marketing of debauchery has made discerning righteousness murky, particularly for women because they equate right with plurality of opinion. It is for us, who are able to identify virtue independently from community opinion, to point it out to them in a way that they can understand. There is plenty of room for positive encouragement too. It is just as easy to praise from an unmovable moral position as it is to condemn. Do it whenever it is warranted.

The Joy of Black and White Moral Absolutes

Chick language provides us with a construct that we can use. To women something is “nice” or it is “mean”. They use that simple, emotionally based dichotomy because that is what chicks understand. They use it with us and they use it with each other. That is how they evaluate the world. Use it.

To communicate a concept to women, a man need only set up a dichotomy and inject an emotional judgment. The difference is that instead of using the sliding scale of nice/mean that is situational, the right/wrong, good/evil dichotomies that we select are to be absolute. Most women want to be good so tell them what good is in a way they can grasp easily.

Who is to decide what is good and what is evil? Simple. You are. Some men might think it arrogant to anoint themselves as the final arbiter of all moral issues. Not true. As a man, nature equipped you to make decisions based on merit alone without respect to consensus. Women are bound by consensus and cannot divorce abstract principles from its influence. Act where they cannot. Such determinations must be made, so they might as well be made by you. You know right and wrong when you see it. We trust you.

A Couple of Possible Objections

Bigotry, injustice and immoderacy all sprout from emotionalism. Won’t a renewed emotional reflexiveness undo progress against evil? I think not. Enlightenment, like evolution, is irreversible. The arrow of time in on our side. Remember, it was undiluted moral condemnation that defeated the ills of the past in the first place. We have nothing to fear from the obstinate insistence on our current scruples.

What of good women? Do they deserve to be treated in such a heavy handed fashion? There are good women. The women who contribute to AVfM are proof of that. I am of the belief that most women are good, if somewhat misled. They only resist righteousness because they think that any behavior that the collective endorses IS righteous. The rare woman who is capable of moral judgment will select good herself and would not be on the receiving end of harsh moral criticism. Good women are human too. Even in the seldom occurring event of a temporary moral lapse by a decent woman, your diatribe will be no more severe than the one she administers to herself. Would you do less in the case of a man whose judgment falters? Aren't decent women as deserving of positive recognition as morally weak women are of reproach?

What we stand for

To hear feminists talk, you'd think we were the worst people in the world. They, like most leftists have a collection of words that they just iiiiiitch to throw at their political enemies, for absolutely no reason other than to demonize them. The Southern Poverty Law Center have become veritable experts at this practice.

Most of the labels that they throw at us are easily refuted simply by pointing out what different demographics the contributors to this site belong to:

We're misogynistic? Thanks for telling us; try informing the women here how much they secretly hate themselves. We're racist, too? Ask the men of color here if they feel unwelcome. What's that, we're homophobic as well? I guess the gay and bisexual men who write and comment here, including myself, never caught onto how unpopular we are in this place. Silly us!

Then, there's the worst one of all: we're violent. To support this claim, they cite such extremists as George Sodini and Anders Behring-Breivik. Violence is perpetrated by members of every group, so our mere membership in any of those groups isn't an automatic refutation of this claim. However, a summary of our basic beliefs, when examined to any degree, is. Observe:

We want an end to forced military conscription of American males.

Every year, thousands of male American teenagers turn 18, and are forced, by law, to register for the draft, even if they have a crippling mental or physical disability. If they don't do this, they will not be able to get a job, go to college, or get Social Security benefits. In rare cases, they will be punished with a $250,000 fine and/or five years in prison. War is not an instrument of men, it is an instrument of politicians. Many world leaders, male and female, have used war as a means to advance their objectives or increase their power base; Margaret Thatcher, Indira Gandhi, Golda Meir, Elizabeth I, and Boudica are just a few examples. Our sons are sent out against their will to fight and kill the sons of foreigners, who were also sent out against their will.

We want an end to false rape accusations.

False rape accusations can destroy a man's life faster than anything short of a gun, knife, or blunt object. If acquitted, he will still be hounded for the rest of his life. If convicted, he will be sent to prison, where he himself will inevitably be raped when the other prisoners find out what he's in for. Within prison culture, the most respected people are murderers, so he will probably kill another prisoner just to end his own torment. We want this to stop.

We want an end to the atrocities committed by corrupt Family and Divorce Courts.

In the movie Falling Down, Michael Douglas plays a man who has just lost his job. In the middle of a traffic jam in the blazing Los Angeles heat, he makes his way home on foot for his daughter's birthday. His wife has filed a restraining order against him, saying that she feared his violence. Oddly enough, the police officer who questions her about the incident learns that he has never hit her or their daughter, he has never been arrested for a violent crime, and he never drinks. All she had to do to get the restraining order was say that she feared him. In a cruel twist of fate, he goes on a violent rampage, trying to right societal wrongs as he makes his way home; it was her filing of the restraining order that brought out the violent side of a man who had nothing to lose.

We encourage men to stop seeking the approval of women.

Many men are willing to put themselves in harm's way for a woman's approval. This includes committing acts of violence against other men. Women constantly encourage men to commit violence for them, whether it be killing a spider, beating up an unfaithful lover or an alleged rapist, or censoring men who dare to disagree with them. Sometimes, women don't even need to say anything; they simply act to defend a woman automatically and without question. In some circles, this is known as chivalry. In a few others, this is known as violence by proxy.

We encourage women to use their own financial means to support themselves.

A man's desire to support his offspring and their mother is biologically ingrained, and surpasses many other instincts, including his restraint from violence. Indeed, countless men throughout history have taken up violent professions in order to support women. If men need only support themselves, the demand for money will be much smaller, and men will be less inclined to use violence.

As mentioned above, feminists are in the habit of citing Anders Behring-Breivik as proof that MRAs are violent. While it is true that Breivik was unfriendly to feminism, he was no MRA, since he was pushing for a restoration of what he called "traditional Norwegian culture", with men working to support women staying at home.

We demand an immediate end to domestic violence against men.

Photographs circulate constantly of women with bruised faces, with the implication that it was a man who was responsible. What is rarely asked, though, is what happened before the incident? Usually, the woman hits first, and she doesn't hit just once. She hit her husband or boyfriend repeatedly, and he grew tired of it and hit her once, just to get her to stop. Unfortunately, the evidence of this is often in women's favor, since women bruise far more easily than women. Yes, there are violent, abusive nutcases of men out there, but they are nowhere near as common as PSAs would have us believe. Overall, ending domestic violence falls on the shoulders of violent women.

We demand an end to chivalry justice.

In the decades before women's suffrage, there was an epidemic in the United States of men being murdered by women, and women being acquitted, particularly in Chicago. All it took was a little flash of thigh, a few half-hearted apologies, and a thimbleful of tears. The appointment of female judges has curbed this trend somewhat, but it's still going on. Within very recent memory, we saw two blatant cases: Casey Anthony and Amanda Knox. I hardly find it coincidental that female violence is at an all-time high, and shows no signs of slowing.

Conclusion

Our society is in a very sick, sad, and sorry state. We have found the problems, and have offered a simple solution: stop enabling violence, and punish perpetrators of violence. This is quite different from the feminist policy of Defend perpetrators of violence if they have vaginas, and punish those with penises for violence, whether they are guilty of it or not. Do I even have to point out how this will worsen the problem of violence in both sexes?

Ours is not a violent movement. It is fundamentally an ANTI-violence movement.

VAWA and the war on men

Gordon E. Finley Ph.D. · 22 April 2012 · Archived copy · Original

[dropcap]T[/dropcap]he Violence Against Women Act (VAWA) arguably is one of the most misguided pieces of legislation ever passed by Congress. From conceptualization to consequences it has wreaked a wide swath of destruction across American society and accurately can be described as "A War on Men."

Conceptually, VAWA is based on the false Duluth Power and Control Wheel model. VAWA falsely presumes that all Domestic Violence (DV) is perpetrated by evil patriarchal males against virtuously innocent female victims. This false gender ideology has no research support.

By contrast, social science research, replicated across hundreds of studies, shows that: DV is initiated about equally by men and women; slightly more women than men are physically harmed by DV but men nonetheless still represent more than 40% of the physically harmed victims; the DV initiation rates for women, and especially young women, have been rising; and DV has nothing to do with an evil patriarchy because the DV rates for bisexuals, gays, and lesbians all are higher than for heterosexual couples.

The research further exposes misrepresentation in the title: "The Violence Against Women Act." Given that DV approaches 50-50 on most indices, why does Congress want to serve only half of the victims? Where are the programs for male victims of DV? Where is the money for fathers and their children who have been victimized by violent and abusive wives and mothers?

The relentless feminist war on boys, men, and fathers across the past half century has successfully destroyed one of the bedrock foundational institutions of American society, the American family.

VAWA has been pivotal in the destruction of the family by depriving fathers of their civil rights, due process rights, and their right to cross-examine those who falsely accuse them of DV — most notably during divorce proceedings. VAWA also provides free legal services to purported women victims while simultaneously denying free legal services to men.

VAWA most effectively destroys families through temporary Restraining Orders. Gone are the days when physical evidence of DV was required and cross-examination was permitted to help judges distinguish between false and true allegations. In today's courts, a woman can allege to a judge (without the accused being present) that she was the victim of DV and is requesting a restraining order based on "expanded" definitions of DV. "Expanded" definitions include vague senses of discomfort, fears, and "Economic DV" (where the man did not fulfill the woman's economic wants).

Judges virtually always grant VAWA restraining orders to women "just to be on the safe side" even when there is no tangible evidence of threat — just the woman's non-verifiable internal purported feelings. Tragically, however, the consequences to children, fathers, and families are very tangible. With the restraining order in hand, the police remove the father from the home (often in the middle of the night) with nothing but the shirt on his back, order him to stay out of his home and away from his wife and children, and immediately begin paying child support to the woman who just "stole" his children and his home from him.

Fair, you ask? Convicted in what court of what crime by what jury on the basis of what evidence, you ask? The answers are obvious.

Critically, the current VAWA reauthorization will come before the Senate in a matter of days and lists 61 co-sponsors. As a man – or equally as a woman who loves her son, father, brother, nephew, grandson, husband or who wants male friends in her life – could you vote for any Senator who co-sponsors VAWA?

This may be your last opportunity to re-balance the scales of justice, to demand genuine domestic violence reform, and to end the war on boys, men, fathers, and families. If your Senator is a co-sponsor, contact them immediately. Tell them that unless they withdraw their co-sponsorship, you will withdraw your vote.

Why feminism may be right

Ethical · 23 April 2012 · Archived copy · Original

Men's Rights bloggers are right in saying that feminism has made marriage a losing proposition for today's men. Whether women enter the marriage contract in bad faith, or frivolously break the marriage contract to seek a better deal elsewhere, men are left paying for their free ride. Sometimes men pay for life. On top of that as an extra slap in the face men are often deprived of any meaningful rights to the children they've fathered.

Feminism hasn't just broken marriage. It's made all relationships between the sexes completely dysfunctional. It has unleashed high status alphas, game bloggers, and others to feast at today's sexually liberated commitment-free all-you-can-eat pussy buffet. At the same time it turns sex into a game of Russian roulette for all men. The ones who lose like U.K. footballer Ched Evans will discover the buffet wasn't completely free. All along they've been playing with fire.

Men's risk is that the current legal definition of sexual consent puts all responsibility for the consequences of women's slutty behavior solely on men. At the same time women's consent has become ambiguous. More men who love easy sex are recognizing that the safest way to avoid a life destroying "false rape" charge is to prevent morning after remorse by being subserviently nice to the slut who offered that easy sex up. Instead of letting a disgraced slut wake up naked and alone in the morning as Ched Evans did, alpha men are now obliged to pedestalize her. In the feminist desire to remove all consequences of slutty behavior we as a society are literally criminalizing the scorn and disdain we used to have for these sluts. High status men in particular can no longer get away with banging them so carelessly.

Once done with sex he may be dying to leave or to get rid of her by calling her a cab. Having a good understanding of the law surrounding consent almost forces him to spoon the slutty women affectionately all night, to listen to them patiently and earnestly, to look into their eyes lovingly, and to make sure to call. At least until he's out of the ever widening danger zone of a rape accusation.

By waging this war of false accusation terror feminism has successfully reengineered society to remove any restrictions on women profiting from use of their natural sexual assets. Sluts can now freely exchange sex as currency for personal gratification, to obtain gifts or favors, for coercion, for self-promotion, or even for marriage. Western men are losing or may already have lost any input on the market value of chastity.

One way men have responded is by rejecting the marriage noose in droves. More men are even opting out of dating, finding that investing in a woman rarely makes sense. Having come to terms with it these men are happier than ever to stay at home satisfying themselves with porn "10"s instead of spending money taking an over entitled "6" on a date. The remaining men who go out looking for easy sex brave the odds of being called a "creep" for just saying hello. More aggressive and angry at being "victimized" than ever before, where women used to decline advances politely now they use the word "creep" so carelessly. A man is right to fear the label. To feminists it puts him one step away from having to hire a lawyer.

How could any of this be good? Bizarrely it could be exactly what the planet needs. Every first world economy in the world relies on the assumption of growth into the infinite future for it's very survival. Growth means more consumers buying more cars, watches, and IPods, then paying more taxes and allowing businesses to create more jobs. A world wide and permanent end to growth will be a catastrophic change. We don't yet know to survive it and we don't even know if we can. But the planet has never had unlimited resources and unlimited space for population growth. That catastrophic change may be an inevitable part of our future. It might even be necessary. At some point world economies may have no choice but to find an equilibrium based on zero growth. Feminism is taking us there.

The traditional marriage was good at producing well adjusted children capable of filling the positions growing economies were able to provide. This marriage contract is unsuitable if we're preparing for a world that can no longer accommodate population growth or economic growth. The feminist marriage contract however will cure population growth by killing any incentive for an increasing number of men to enter the reproductive game at all. It might even help select for positive traits in our populations in that it allows women to mate more selectively with fewer high status men since they have little fear of being left un-provided for regardless of how many women those men already have.

History has shown it's a fundamental principle of all current western democracies that in such democracies entitlements steadily accrue to those who demonstrate "victimhood" rather than those who demonstrate merit. History has also shown men will accept ever greater social burdens without resistance. Given our lack of male resistance and that our very system of government can only do a one way flow of entitlements to women, feminism may be the natural solution to healing the earth. The caveat is that the new feminist economy will replace an assumption of growth with another assumption that also might not be true forever. Feminism will create growing legions of disenfranchised men. To succeed feminism must be right in assuming these men will forever continue to accept their defeat, and that they won't one day rise to tear down the feminist system that's literally imprisoning them.

SPLC linked to anti men's rights subreddit

(AVFM News) Washington D.C. Apr. 24, 2012 –There has been much debate amongst MRAs as to what in particular prompted the SPLC to identify several Men's Rights groups and websites as hate groups in their 2012 Intelligence Report. The report itself did not give any specific clues and in fact featured mass murderer, George Sodni, a man with absolutely no ties to the movement whatsoever.

Recently, it has been pointed out to AVFM News that a poster on reddit announced shortly after the release of the Agent Orange Files that they were going to contact the SPLC and that she, in fact, had ties there. She later took credit for the organization's naming of the MRM as a hate movement. This will be the first time that a direct connection between the releasing of the AO files and the actions of the SPLC.

In December of last year A Voice for Men published and article entitled "Radfem Hub, the underbelly of a hate movement" which exposed screenshots from a private Radfem online forum which can only be described as heinous examples of vitriolic hate speech. An MRA going by the name of Agent Orange, along with others, had painstakingly collected the screenshots over a period of time and in addition tracked down the identities of the forum participants. Their names, along with their respective quotes from the screenshots, were featured in the article.

Shortly after publication of this article AVFM announced that Agent Orange had made available online a warehouse of screenshots that included Facebook and Linkedin profiles of Radfem Hub participants along with examples of their postings. This was done in order to expose the hateful activities of feminists and to make aware to the public their intentions. AVFM encouraged MRAs to browse through the files and write their own articles in order to publicize the matter further.

The immediate reaction from feminists all over was that of carefully guarded shock. Articles written by Jezebel and David Frutrele (Manboobz blog author) tried to minimize the impact by posting articles that glibly chided MRAs for doing what they described as a feeble attempt to discredit Radfem Hub and Feminism in general.

However, the reaction from other quarters betrayed panic.

A lawyer from Baltimore named Kathy Brennan, who is also an active member of Radfem Hub, frantically tried to track down the identity of Agent Orange and openly called for his prosecution. She was not successful. Online Feminist forums became suddenly quiet for weeks due to fear among their members that they too would be identified. Calls for action by the FBI were heralded all over the internet in an attempt to get the federal government involved. These too were not successful.

One instance where there was no hiding the panicked reaction of Agent Orange's targets was a on the Sub Reddit "Shit Reddit Says"; a sub-reddit who's only apparent aim is nothing more than to discredit the Men's Rights Movement. As AVFM reported in January, along with the announcement of the Agent Orange files publication, the sub reddit was ablaze with anger and rage directed at AVFM and Agent Orange for publishing the names of Radfem participants. One thread in particular, named "r/mensrights announces their plan to release the private information of RadFem Hub posters" hosted a frenzy of redditors posting their angst and disgust regarding the AVFM's coverage of the Agent Orange Files.

One redditor calling herself "little tiger," named the writer of best Effortpost and Best Submitter of 2011 announced four months ago on the SRS thread that she had connections at the SPLC and would try to get them involved. After the SPLC released their intelligence report concerning the MRM she took credit for initiating the report as recently as five days ago on a subreddit called "Subreddit Drama."

“I have known the folks at SPLC since approximately 2006. I talked to a friend of mine there personally in December after a particularly frightening incident at /r/MR (I did not identify the subreddit specifically or even say it happened on Reddit, just said “a men’s rights group online”), and they essentially told me that they were aware of the MRM already and yeah, sometimes MRAs did frightening things, isn’t the Internet weird blahblah.” she posted in response to an inquiry about her activities on the thread.

Agent Orange contacted AVFM and notified us about littitiger and provided links to her activities on Reddit. (see links below) He also shared with us a brief correspondence with littletiger.

“From me to littletiger:

‘Thank you

‘I wanted to personally thank you for helping get the word out to the SPLC after the Agent Orange release. The press you helped to provided us has allowed us to begin pushing out agendas into India, New Zealand, the Philippines, and Germany. We literally have tens of campus student groups forming across the U.S. as a result of the this.

You see, since the SPLC exposure, folks across the U.S. that had no idea of the issues have been coming to us in droves, and quite a few are telling their families who are in other countries.

‘There are even more articles showing up in publications talking about our issues since the SPLC release, many of them second [guessing] the current paradigm in gender politics.

‘On behalf of the MRM, I’d like to extend a warm thank you, and kindly ask you keep up the good work.

Littletiger responds:

“I want you to know that I also called the SPLC about RadFemHub’s hateful tendency to drop dox on trans women. The problem is doxxing, not the fact that you are an MRA.”

It is curious that in addition to the SPLC not reporting about the Radfem Hubs activities they are also accepting money from them as reported by AVFM previously.

A game not worth the candle

I have the pussy, so I make the rules.

Most readers will already be aware that the author of this article does not posses female genitalia, so the preceding statement might seem, at first, odd. However, the sentiment behind "I have the pussy, so I make the rules" will be familiar as a thread in almost all modern discourse between men and women. Depending on who is asked, when this is pointed out, this elicits grudging acknowledgement, or agreeing nods, and in a few cases, resentment. What's less common is a philosophical parsing of that narrative, usually left unstated: "I have the pussy, so I make the rules".

Pretty obviously, this is an example of the formal logical fallacy known as the Appeal to Force. This might be argued as less a fallacy than an operational practice. Although it is usually unstated, this remains a major element in relations between men and women. In fact, in any masculine objection to this ideal the fallback narrative almost always present in modern sexual discourse is another logical fallacy, the charge of sour grapes. "you're just bitter because you can't get laid".

The superb Shaming Tactics Catalog lists these as "The Pink Whip" and the "Charge of Rationalization," respectively, and in the second case asks the relevant question, "what if the grapes really are sour?" In asking that, it must be noted again that "I have the pussy, so I make the rules," rather than being an opening conversational gambit is a usually unstated narrative. This means that while it applies as blunt force trauma and a tool of manipulation and control, it's more subtle application is in public popular definition of acceptable male identity. What constitutes a good man? what is a gentleman? and who ultimately determines any shared agreement of these definitions?

Another way to examine this is: who does the definition of good man benefit, and who carries the cost?

Unfortunately, most socially accepted models for male identity continue to depend on service to, or utility to the social collective, or to women. A "real man" is one who provides for, protects, or sacrifices on behalf of the collective, or of a woman. This is really just an extension of "I have the pussy, so I make the rules." The rules in this case govern the acceptable definition of a real man.

Men, socialized in this framework are dependent for a positive social identity on the childish and selfish emotional caprice of women. If masculine adult self-determination was not sufficient to reject this model, the modern reality that females are neither socialized to acquire, nor often demonstrate any empathy, accountability or motivation beyond a narrow and short term self-interest; Men must reject both their socially conditioned model for being "good men" as well as learning a healthy contempt for collective approval.

However, development of a male model for self-value and positive identity apart from utility to collectives or females is not enough. Even as a growing culture of positive male self identity emerges from the men's rights movement, it is necessary to publicly outline some of the emerging framework. Because of self-interested hypergamy, men not showing-off their utility to women are largely invisible to them. In fact, when such men are visible, it is through the filter of female defined male-identity, so Men Going Their Own Way are incorrectly characterized as failures. This is the opposite of the truth, men going their own way are winners by their own measure. The early adopters of this path are pioneers shedding thousands of years of behavioural programming and freeing themselves from a corrupt system of exploitation.

What are these pioneers winning? The answer to that being their own value as human beings endowed naturally and automatically with the human rights, justice, reproductive rights which under traditional frameworks men are denied in all cases except where they are of positive utility to collectives and to women.

The system wide impact of this new framework has positive benefits substantially beyond those accrued to individual practicing men. First among these is the removal from collective use of labor, money, the dispensation or absorbtion of violence on behalf of others, women, or a collective.

That collective which discounts the humanity of men and boys, and regards their worth as human beings conditional on their utility. Examining the near total failure of feminists, and women in general to respond to detailed exposition of human rights inequities impacting men, it becomes evident that women, as currently socialized, are immune to these inequities when expressed in terms of facts, logic, statistics or empathy.

Men continue to die, as they are legally marginalized and the gender-ideology driving this responds by portraying them as less than human. Rather than responding to evidence based arguments, feminists as well as non-feminist women have demonstrated no tendency except to react with accusations of misogyny to men stepping off the treadmill of service and disposability. To men arguing for human rights which women have long taken for granted, women have shown a collective refusal to acknowledge that such men are anything except criminals, monsters, weaklings, sissies, subhumans and failures. They are non-men, who in their stupid testosterone addled brains dare to pursue any path outside female-defined real-manhood. Bluntly, women, taken as a demographic have demonstrated an almost purely emotional and reactionary aversion to men's attempts to address male disposability, marginalization, and legal disenfranchisement.

That women control the majority of discretionary spending and a small but real majority of the electorate means that women's engagement with the human rights issues of men is a necessary component of resolving male disposability and marginalization. A demographic wide failure to respond other than by reactive emotionalism informs an alternative strategy in reaching women. A biologist does not reason with flatworms, rather – he steers their responses by modifying their environment.

The growing pathway of masculine self-actualization, in addition to benefitting men as individuals – has some significant potential to modify the political and economic environment in which public indifference to male exploitation and marginalization flourishes. As a courtesy to those few who might be moved to minimize the societal convulsion which might result, some specifics of these changes are explored here. It must be noted here, that women, taken as a subset of humanity currently operate under a few assumptions of rapidly diminishing relevance.

The first being that men, in their interactions with your female majesty are all enraptured by the prospect of access to the hole in the front of your lower torso. This is what men, as reproductively viable mammals are programmed to want, but the reductionist dogma of men as sex-obsessed troglodytes is the childish fantasy of feminine superiority reinforced in public zeitgeist. The reality is that "you've got the vagina, so you make the rules" is supremacist, infantile and no-longer to be tolerated bullshit.

For women, this bit of mythology is something to be abandoned, as growing numbers of men in the blue pill majority are rejecting their own expected male-as-manipulatable-lemming behavior. In the red-pill world of MGTOW, masculism, and Zeta-Male identity, men are increasingly unwilling to tolerate recitation of male-is-inferior mythology.

Regrettably, because much rhetoric opposing male human rights uses emotional rather than evidence based argument, some conclusions here might be redundant to logical thinkers. They have been listed here in spite of that hazard, because for those this is intended to enlighten, emotional reasoning will not have revealed these predicted outcomes. Some of you may be feminists, so I will type very slowly.

The hole in your lower torso which which bleeds every 28 days is of rapidly diminishing social or commercial value. This is not a new idea emerging exclusively within the men's rights community. Naomi Wolf bemoaned the diminished market value of feminine orifices in her 2002 article "the porn myth". What Wolf failed to grasp was that "young, hip, progressive feminists" continue to cling to the solipsistic view of the second wave, taken directly from Solanas: "Being an incomplete female, the male spends his life attempting to complete himself, to become female."

Men's failure to conform to this delusion provokes frustration and anger in those whose ideology informs the attempt to force conformity to their childish expectations rather than accept reality. Faced by a decades of blame, anger, manipulation and shame for failing to conform to “man-as-defective-woman,” men are, to state it mildly, weary of the ongoing abuse. Piled on top of this is that women are increasingly socialized to demonstrate violent, irrational, childish and openly sociopathic behavior, and we all go along with this as if it is normal.

All of this depends on men, for their part, allowing their self definition as “real men”, or as “good men” to rest on the judgement of women. The historical tendency of men to tolerate almost anything because positive self identity depended on valuation by women is rapidly waning. This is also why pussy’s market value is now at such a historical low. And it’s going to get worse. The recent phenomenon of slut-walk protests claiming among other things a positive cultural spin on the traditional criticism of the word slut is an expression of inability to understand having one’s cake and eating it. Widespread sluttism such as hook-up culture, cougar culture and other female driven casual sex means that sex, widely and easily available undermines women’s ability to manipulate men by controlling sexual access. Coupled with a feminine consumer culture in which young women have all the charm and wit of baboons, a feminine approved definition of male identity has rapidly diminishing currency.

What’s on offer is universally and freely available, but comes with grotesque entitlement, violent tendencies and, a broadly unpleasant demeanour. So thanks, but no thanks.

Western nations like Canada and the United States are, it must be admitted, coming late to the party. In Japan, an emerging model for male identity includes a growing majority of the male population. These men are called soushoku danshi[1], and are characterized by an indifference to social approval, an unwillingness to pursue women, and a rejection of self-destructive competition for status, high income or materialist consumer culture. And there’s a lot of them.

According to a 2009 slate.com article, “a consulting company that is a subsidiary of Dentsu, the country’s largest advertising agency, estimates that 60 percent of men in their early 20s and at least 42 percent of men aged 23 to 34 consider themselves soushoku danshi, which translates to grass-eating men.”

“Of the 1,000 single men in their 20s and 30s polled by Lifenet, a Japanese life-insurance company, 75 percent described themselves as grass-eating men”

Young men are deciding, en mass to avoid traditional romantic pursuit of women. This doesn’t mean they’re gay, or weak, its simply that they’ve decided that the quality of their own lives matters more to them than conforming to externally applied metrics of accepted male identity. The rise of this masculine model in japan has effects far beyond frustrating women who still wish men would compete for their attention, and pay for drinks, dinner, et-cetera. Japan’s soushoku danshi, in their indifference to traditional expectations are opting out of the corporate ladder and punishing career path of high status and high income, and in the process are collapsing the country’s economic growth. This is why japanese media uses perjorative and belittling language to describe these men, defining their own identity and self actualizing apart from their “allowed” role as disposable providers and protectors.

In fact, the Japanese media treat the soushoku danshi identically to the way the media in the west has begun to treat MRA’s and MGTOW’s.

Yoto Hosho, a 22-year-old college dropout who considers himself and most of his friends herbivores, believes the term describes a diverse group of men who have no desire to live up to traditional social expectations in their relationships with women, their jobs, or anything else. “We don’t care at all what people think about how we live,” he says.

That indifference to approval or censure is shared now by a growing number of western men, variously identified as Men Going Their Own Way (MGTOW) or Zeta Males. These are paths to positive male self identity de-coupled from the popular shared view of what a real man is, a protector, provider and self sacrificing dispenser of money, labor and sperm.

The issue of sperm and it's theft, and the monopoly of reproductive rights owned by women, with the power to legally compel males to finance female exercised reproductive rights is leading many western men to carefully avoid sex. This has been so thoroughly discussed in men's rights writing that even mainstream media has now begun to cover the issue.

James Taranto, writing for the Wall Street Journal[2], correctly pointed out that young men are increasingly aware that in the event of a pregnancy, males have no legal rights, and of which increasing reportage shows women willing to sabotage condoms or lie about birth control to achieve. Men and boys are also aware that should a woman they sleep with become pregnant they will be committed to nearly 20 years of financial service. Piling onto this is the growing climate of blood-sport in false accusations of rape, sometimes concocted from post facto regret by a woman who participated in sex but decided after it had been a bad idea. In this legal and social climate, men in small but increasing numbers are quite sensibly avoiding women.

However, this is men in the majority, blue-pill average-guy population. This doesn't include men electing a purposeful MGTOW or Zeta Male identity. For these men who've taken the red pill and read the commentary on sites like this one, or written their own, they are defining a growing movement in which feminine approval or censure is irrelevant.

In simplified terms, the standard female assumption that a vagina commands respect is going to lead many women to bad decisions. Sadly, because many men are not yet prepared to discard a woman-approved definition of self identity, there remain plenty of white knights as the social enforcers of female deference. Coupled with the treatment by emotionally reactive feminists of men opting out of their traditionally allowed servitor status – these men will likely be targeted by feminist zeitgeist as enemies of all decency, and attacked at their identity, and in many cases, by the proxy use of force through blue-pill men.

This is where the wake up call in this article aims to enlighten feminist and nominally non-feminist women alike. The use of such attacks to force male compliance will likely be treated with more than the indifference many red-pill men now default to. In fact, attacks on male identity and coercion are increasingly understood for the bigotry and hatred they express.

The forbearance of men, treating attacks on male identity with patience is coming to an end. This patience was based on the social acceptance of female-defined manhood, which as mentioned above is increasingly obsolete. The acceptance of feminine attack on male sexual identity has also been based on men's wired in behavior to protect and accommodate women – but this masculine tendency is counter-productive in a culture which exempts women from personal accountability.

Recent discussions within the feminist blogging community have endorsed the practice of "creep shaming." This is cultivation of social shame and ostracism in men based on the internal emotional state of whatever woman offers up that insult. Of course, this method of social control depends totally on the assumption that identity-based attacks will be accommodated because of a female-defined positive masculine identity, or male desire for access to the magic vagina. That which even Naomi Wolf noted in 2002 now no longer carries much exchange value. I strongly encourage feminists to embrace and escalate this tactic, because if adherents to a doctrine of class hatred and violence continue to clearly identify themselves, treating them with appropriate respect becomes nearly automatic.

That truism "you've got the pussy, so you make the rules" it turns out was not an absolute law. Obviously, you've still got the pussy, but now it seems you've fucked yourselves. The game you've so long controlled is no longer worth the candle.

Is CNN's Frida Ghitis stupid?

John Hembling (JtO) · 25 April 2012 · Archived copy · Original

Is Frida Ghitis Stupid?

No, probably not, but that didn't stop her from asking a stupid question in the form of her CNN article, Are Men Stupid?

Ghitis opens with a repetition of the title's rhetorical question: "Are men stupid?" and followed this by stating: "How else can we explain the endless parade of otherwise successful individuals, who by all appearances seem intelligent and competent, and yet risk destroying their careers and their personal lives over the chance to have a sexual escapade?"

The attendant question, "how else can we explain the parade of successful, intelligent men" who risk personal destruction by exposure of their sex lives; has a very obvious explanation. But to understand this requires recognition of a basic element of modern social identity. Women are the arbiters of what is publicly agreed constitutes a "good" man. Borrowing from Ghitis's rhetorical stylings, let's ask ourselves, how else can we explain men's willingness throughout history to die in the protection of women?

Well, maybe men are stupid after all, maybe, but let's continue. Add to the fact that masculine social identity depends on feminine approval, the further fact that men, like other human beings are sexual creatures with both biologically driven sexual needs, as well as socially driven sexual needs – and most of them, being adults, are going to find ways to satisfy those sexual needs.

This probably seems tedious to some readers, but seeing all the dots and actually connecting them is apparently difficult for some. I apologize for the possible insult to readers in presentation of such a rudimentary didactic. Frida Ghitis is invited to re-read this as many times as necessary, but there won't be a formal quiz.

The fact that powerful, male, high profile leaders of industry are regularly ruined by public exposure of sexual misadventure tells exactly nothing about male stupidity. Of course they have sex, thats what people do. People with vaginas and penises have sex. Those who are rich and powerful have more access to sex than those who are poor and powerless. What's revealing is that men, when outed in their sexual pursuits are publicly chewed up, spat out and destroyed. When Dominique Strauss Kahn shagged a hotel maid (if we accept that part of the story) the entire world lost it's collective shit because this was a rich powerful man expressing his sexuality in a way that didn't conform to woman-approved male sexuality. Kahn's wife was surely never so stupid that she imagined the head of the IMF didn't pursue some strange on the side, but DSK going off the reservation of the socially approved sexual trade union meant he had to be destroyed.

Intelligent, successful, powerful men with a lot to lose being regularly demolished when their sex lives become public doesn't indicate men's stupidity, it indicates the power of female-defined male social identity. Frida Ghitis's CNN article might have been a better article if the thesis had been "Is collective group-think a social cancer?" Admittedly, it is not as catchy a title.

Ghitis's exposition of apparent male stupidity is frustratingly short on substance, but manages to list athletes, politicians, bankers and other public figures in an attempt to equate pursuit of off-brand poon to mental malfunction. The only real stupidity in the presented narrative being the antiquated and obsolete notion that men, whether they are rich and powerful or not should continue to defer to a collectivist puritanical feminine judgement of where when and with whom it is allowable for men to seek consensual sex with other similarly inclined adults.

Is Frida Ghitis a judgmental, puritan scold with an inadequate grasp of human nature and a condemning hatred of any male sexuality which doesn't directly profit women?
Yep, apparently she is.

Frigiditis: noun

1] A mental disorder characterized by systematized delusions and sexual disfunction whereby healthy sexuality expressed in high visibility individuals including public figures becomes a focus for social condemnation. This is a socially corrosive mental pathology which in low mental function observers can be contagious. Outbreaks of frigiditis have been observed in correlation with high levels of societal misery and absence of individual happiness in community members.

[/box]

But wait! there's more!

[image]

After a resoundingly negative public response to her original article, some of which CNN published in their news.blogs.cnn.com[1] feedback section, Frida, apparently basking in the attention of being publicly called out on her open hatred, decided to double down, rather than admit that an identity-based attack on any other biological demographic would have been her Don-Imus career-ending move.

Okay Frida, round two.

Four brothers in my inbox

Paul Elam · 25 April 2012 · Archived copy · Original

From time to time I post some of the emails I get. With all the recent activity my inbox has been pretty busy. But I just got one from one our Australian brothers, a gent known to some of you as Dr. F, who wanted me to pass on some recent events in his life in some way.

Being both reasonably bright and lazy it occurred to me that this was the sort of thing better coming from the horses mouth, so I asked for and got permission to run the email. There is nothing I could add to this, and in fact would likely have spoiled any effort to take the story and say it for him. So here we go with the email, which was a very welcome bright spot in my day. A lot of bright spots these days.

G'day Paul,

I am hoping that this write sees you fine and well. As for me, I am doing more than ok I can tell you.

Last Sunday me, my brother and Stu gathered at Karma's place for a meet and greet. We all knew we'd have a time of it, and to say we did would not be explaining the half of it. So I am going to try to fill you in on some other bits as much as I can.

I had already met Karma one time the week just gone, and instantly he and I drew upon the familiarity we have built by way of your website over the previous fourteen months or so. We sounded like a couple of jabbering monkeys as we became excited more than the sum of our parts with stories and idea we have. It was an experience I will never forget.

Anyway, when the four of us got together it was all this and quite a bit more as well. All of us in one moment that was for four hours, just could not stop discussing and debating and swapping ideas like tomorrow wouldn't turn up. It was miraculous for all of us, and something occurred to me. I knew that had we been alone that day with only ourselves as four units apart in geography then our combined ideas would not only have been diminished, but the forte of them would have been so as well. What I mean by this is that together our new and wonderful ideas were much stronger than four blokes just shooting the shit, we were twenty "apart" MRA's in strength but we were only four in one room. Four.

The flow and ebb of many MRA's gathering on the net is one thing and this is wonderful. However, the conversation and exchange of ideas are staggered with time interrupts and loss of translation occasionally, but not so with a kindred soul right there in real time.

Right now there are plans for a parody video, a musical addendum to something else from my brother, a video editing work bench nearly established, another YT video montage regarding the placement of MRA stickers, three other videos discussed and other things I can't talk about for reasons important to relevant parties.

My want here is for you to know at least two things, one is that we four thank you for your site and how it's ripple effect of having us meet, and secondly for you to know all the more as you do already, that when MRA's get together (I mean get together with a handshake and a laugh and the other) we are a multiplication of our parts not just the sum. We were tripping over ourselves with all of the pent up bit of it all I can tell you, and I know you can see it in your mind's eye the same. How could you not ?

Just four blokes in four hours, and what will come from this may yet have some needing a seat-belt that needs buttoning. I tell you I am busting and more dawns won't find me dropping off with that. There are others out there who are just as passionate, and we become all the more so with our now meeting each other on the other side of the screen.

Please tell others of this if you will in the way you do. This is my request of you Mr. Elam, and I can never tell you all the more how when MRA's gather for real it is so disarming and arming at the same time in the way that screen to screen will never know.

Keep well mate.

Like I said, there really is nothing I can add to this. It says it all perfectly. I don't think we are very far away from the time that emails like this one will be common, and expected. Then the FTSU gets taken up to a whole new ball game. Carry on, brothers. Give them hell.

AVfM Radio: Men going their own way

[box icon="none"]

Where are the good men going? The answer being, obviously, the same place good men have always gone: to an early grave, or a nicely appointed cage. Bad men, on the other hand, are going somewhere else. Anywhere else, in fact, wherever they want, without concern for who tells them no. Men going thier own way, and Zeta Masculinity, the modern paths to male self actualization without necessary self sacrifice on behalf of those who hate them are the topics for the 26 April 2012 episode of AVFM Radio. GirlWritesWhat, Johntheother, and TyphonBlue will be wrestling with what it takes to shake off the mental shackles of a society which discounts male humanity and values only male utility. The social contract between men and women is broken, burned and bombed into rubble, and those who've bombed it provide no replacement except a cage for men. What will replace this contract is still largely unknown, but a few ideas are currently in beta-test now.

Taming the abusive shrew

Ethical · 27 April 2012 · Archived copy · Original

Judging from the popularity on and off screen of personas depicted by earlier stars like Sean Connery and Errol Flynn, the commonly accepted solution to a hysterical woman's verbal abuse was a well-timed slap followed by an earnest rogering to soothe her feminine dissatisfaction.

How things have changed. The horror genre aside, today widespread feminist advocacy has largely eliminated gratuitous violence against women in film. Women have been educated to be more aware and now reject that violence. Films perceived to use violence to gratify male viewers in these or any other ways provoke modern women to extreme reactions. For these reasons, though stories of women who've been victims of violence are still seen as courageous, the depiction of that violence remains an extremely sensitive issue. Hidden messages that "she deserved it" are quickly detected as a form of covert violence in itself. Women are extremely unlikely to use their entertainment dollars to support films depicting sexual or other violence against unsympathetic women.

Strangely enough movies themselves haven't become less violent though. Today's movies are full of fearless kick ass chicks. Men may not appreciate the importance of this change to women because male audiences have always had male on screen action heroes to cheer. Guys like Stallone and Schwarzenegger portrayed the very definition of tough by surviving being knocked out, tortured, stabbed, burned, and shot, before coming back and unleashing hell. Schwarzenegger said it best in Terminator: "I'll be back". But now female audiences now have women action heroes too. Decidedly feminine, these "Grrls" don't try to "out man" their male action hero counterparts. They fight in high heels while never quite losing their perfect makeup and hair. All these women are too skilled in the ninja arts to ever catch a real beating from any man they engage in fisticuffs with, and they never back down from any confrontation that brings them standing toe to toe with one. When they fight men they never lose, and they're ready to fight all the time.

With all the thrashings being handed out by these ladies, it seems that the appetite for violence against men has actually increased with the decrease in movie violence against women. Perhaps that's because as audiences we're still allowed to enjoy the most appalling violence against men. Recent Sci-fi thriller Lockout was a great example. Killings of males were flying on to the screen left right and center with no more significance to the storyline than flies hitting a speeding windshield. By contrast the director brought an entire room full of crazy prisoners to momentary pause during a jail break just to add significance to the death of one inconsequential female character. Having been given the appropriate attention she was able to deliver her final lines.

Feminists advocate for eliminating depictions of violence against women in movies because they say it promotes violence against women in real life. If true it brings us to reconsider the depiction of physical aggression of women against men and the depicted lack of consequences of that aggression which we see so often in today's movies. Does the pervasiveness of these images impact women in real life?

That may be exactly what's happening. A 2006 study in the American Journal of Health found that women were the perpetrators in more than 70% of the cases where one partner was violent, and that women initiated violence the majority of the time. The worst violence occurred in cases where both partners were violent. In other words things didn't really get bad until it turned into a fight. Unlike the movies, when women initiate violence and men react the consequences are sometimes severe.

The fact that the abuser was the woman in 70% of cases where one partner was violent brings up another issue. Domestic violence puts men at tremendous legal risk. Even police officers confess that when they show up to a domestic violence call the general policy is "arrest the man". Men accused of domestic violence are routinely evicted from their homes by force, and denied access to their children with no trial and no evidence other than her word – said in the heat of the moment. The losses he might suffer as a consequence often have permanent repercussions in terms of child custody and divorce, not to mention serious repercussions in the criminal justice system.

So men may be physically stronger, but these huge risks mean women who attack men clearly not only put themselves in danger of violent repercussions, but much more often also put the men in danger of serious legal trouble. Unfortunately the number of false abuse claims show some women understand all too well their power to misuse and manipulate the system to the detriment of innocent men.

All this brings me to the point, which is finding a more modern way for men to defend themselves from being so afraid to stand their ground in relationships that they become emasculated. Unfortunately rather than appeasing an abusive woman this strategy often just culminates in her legally harassing him after the relationship is over.

If, like me, you have a crazy great uncle, his solution might be “a slap followed by a good rogering”. In his day men might have derided a henpecked man as either being unable to control or satisfy his woman, or both. Don’t listen to him. Nothing could be more insanely dangerous to you in this world where sexual consent only occurred if a woman says it did, and where she’s at liberty to change her mind and revoke that consent at any time after the fact. There’s no safe way to react. We have to focus instead on prevention.

Today’s “go girl” culture demands empowerment through depictions of fist fighting movie heroines who show no restraint whatsoever in taking on men. If aggressive women are more likely to file false abuse charges, there’s a legitimate argument that these images create a culture of women prone to verbal and legal abuse that has serious life altering consequences for the men who come up against it. Perhaps these images of aggressive women in movies are where we should target our efforts. Is it time we advocate against violent movie heroines as being responsible for the legal abuse culture victimizing men?

From an old man to a young man

Terrence Howard is the actor who portrayed Col. James Rhodes in the 2008 film Iron Man. He's an accomplished actor with a long list of credits, and his role alongside Robert Downey Jr. is arguably his highest profile role. Aside from acting, Howard has also earned himself press coverage by threatening to kill the 14 year old boy his teenage daughter was dating, because Howard didn't approve of him.

However, rather than censure for this murder threat, Howard was praised. The uncredited writer/moron who covered this story for the entertainment blog "celebitchy dot com" characterized Howard's threat by saying "to me, that makes him a great dad right there." The un-named hack writer, apparently female, enthused further to say: "Maybe I'm old fashioned, but it makes me happy to hear that some dads are still involved in their daughters' lives, and care enough to threaten the crap out of some boy. Isn't that a rite of passage for everyone? I honestly believe one of the reasons my dad sucks is that he never threatened anyone on my behalf."

The idea of the murderously over-protective father continues to find currency in our culture, as well as an element of popular entertainment.

The comedian Bruce Cameron published a list of what he called "8 simple rules for dating my daughter". At least 3 of the rules include threats of murder, and all but 2 include threats of grievous bodily harm. This list has been plagiarized, repeated and embellished by numerous other comedians, commentators, sermonizing priests and others so many times that dozens of versions can be found by Googling the term "so you want to date my daughter".

In 2011 a man named Dale Boyer uploaded a video to youtube which contained a public lecture to any young man with ambitions of dating his daughter. In this video, the daughter, an attractive young woman in her late teens or early twenties sits next to her father nodding and agreeing with Boyer's admonitions. Speaking to his daughter: "I have reminded you every single week, all your dates must be approved by me. If they touch you, I will cut their wanger off". Boyer expands on this, adding, "If they put their hands where they don't belong, I will cut their wanger off, and go to prison and get three hots and a cot".

The daughter interjects, saying: "don't mess with me". The father continues, adding "don't F with me, because I am a christian man." as his daughter smiles in agreement. He stopped short of saying the word "fuck." He figured threatening to mutilate his daughter's boyfriend was okay, but saying fuck was going too far. Well, fuck him.

Now my story. At age 17-ish, I very briefly had a semi-girlfriend who was a classmate. The romance, if it can even be dignified as such was ended by me, following my first meeting with her father. He showed me his shotgun, and made it clear, in front of his daughter that he would use it to kill me if I made his Daughter, and my friend, Tanya cry. This implied threat was not if I had sex with her, which several weeks into a high-school crush in the mid-1980s I had not gotten around to yet. He also wasn't talking about some hypothetical violence done against his daughter, no, the threat of death was offered on the mere event of her crying.

At the age of 17, my brain was a-slosh with hormones, and I didn't have the developed sense of self I now enjoy, but even then, whether it was a romance or a friendship – I discontinued the relationship that had been placed under condition of a threat of death. I did not, at the time have the skill or faculty to explain my reasoning to anyone. Not even Tanya, who had, until then been a friend. She raised no objection to the threat which I took seriously.

As I saw matters, If I explained to her that she was being immediately dumped – I might be creating the condition for fulfilment of the threat. In my mind, this had consequences beyond the possibility of my own immediate demise. My own father was likely, in my mind, to respond to such event with the retributive killing my girlfriend's dad, and maybe her too. To be clear, even to my 17 year old hormone-demented mind, this was an intolerable possibility to be avoided at any cost. It must be noted, looking back that my old man was capable of such response. I was also unwilling to inform my dad why Tanya was suddenly vanished out of my life, because news of the threat against his son might also have provoked violence from him, either against me, or against her father, an equal chance in my 17 year old judgement. It even briefly crossed my teenage mind to consider whether, in the event of a man in his early 50s coming after me with a shotgun, I might get the better of him, resulting in my incarceration rather than my own death. So, I cut off contact – avoided Tanya at school, didn't return calls, and weathered my own self enforced exile in silence.

I never discovered what effect this had on her, as we never spoke again – although in the following year, several large and athletic white knights at our school sought me out, and I lost those fights.

However, although I didn't break off that early romance with a great deal of grace, I was correct to do so. Since then, our culture of acceptable violence against men, particularly young men has grown more pronounced rather than less.

Which brings us to the point of this discussion, which might have been usefully given the title: "advice for a young man, from an old man".

Here's the advice, for young men, listed here in several parts.

First, value yourself. Value your health and your life. Put yourself first. This should not be taken to mean be a self absorbed douche-bag, rather, recognize that you have value as a human, and do not allow anyone to devalue your humanity.

If you are threatened with violence or death, take those threats seriously. This has two components. The first is to not minimize threats or laugh them off – because while in many cases such threats are empty, rhetorical and not followed through, a skimming of the news shows that young men die at the hands of white knight fathers who still cling to moronic traditionalist views of their daughters as fragile flowers on behalf of whom everybody else must suffer and die.

The second component of this is that our society treats violence against men as if it is normal. If this is going to end, it starts with you. There is no reason to quietly abide threats of violence or death, just because everyone else is a moron and thinks it's acceptable. Fuck anyone who says or who implies by their silence your life has less value because you're male.

So, if you find yourself on the receiving end of some fatherly threat of death over possible offence to your girlfriend, and she abides by this condition on your relationship – then she is part of the problem, too. It might seem that explaining your position as a person whose life should not be threatened over trivialities is a good course of action. Some people might even advise sitting down with her to point out why continuing in a relationship under threat of death is impossible. This is not what I'll suggest. If a girl accepts, without complaint the dire consequence against you in any event of her discomfort, drop her without ceremony, notification or apology.

When you've been shown the gun, there is no more civil discussion, there is only the choice to exit or to return fire. The argument for the human rights of men and boys wont be won by escalating the violence already directed at men and boys. But the other side of a culture of violence against men and boys isn't passive acceptance of that violence, it's a loud and firm rejection of it. Just say no. Say fuck no.

So that's what I'm saying to younger men, anybody who puts a condition of the threat of violence on your relationship with them, throw them the hell out of your life. Demand the respect as a human being of value that everyone except you gets by default.

To everyone else, there's another suggestion on offer. Abandon the conceit that you are not complicit in the world's problems, that men, particularly young men should be your goat to be heaped with sin and driven into the desert.

To fathers of daughters who would smugly issue a threat of death or violence against young men, satisfied in your supposed protection of your little princess, consider what you'd do if the threat came from some other kid's parent, targeting your rotten spawn. Don't be such a moron. If your daughter is sexually mature, seeking male company, your job is not to protect her from real world. If she doesn't have the judgement to make those decisions, then you are already a failure as a parent. Don't compound it by giving her the at-one-remove use of lethal force to enable her asshole behavior.

To daughters on whose behalf protective violence is wielded, grow up, or get used to the choice between males in your life with so little self worth they'll tolerate their own total disposability in deference to your fragile emotions. Or get used to a growing culture of men who totally wash their hands of you as an enabler of violence against them.

Male Privilege Checklist

Forty Seven Lies : another tool to silence men rebuked.

Check your privilege. This choice nugget of establishment-feminist shit-talk doesn't get thrown around with the frequency it used to, but the cultural meme of "male privilege" continues to occupy the podium of unchallengeable truths. In fact, this idea has been of such utility to gender ideologues that rather than letting it dissolve and die as feminism becomes increasingly recognized as a violent hate movement built on lies, the trope of "male privilege" should be properly dragged into the spotlight and destroyed.

However, it's also worthwhile to examine just what the political utility of this lie is. In short, "check your privilege" is a highly effective method of silencing men. By telling men, or when men reject the lie, telling everyone else that men are privileged, a feminist can render their voice mute. For example a man complaining that "stop violence against women" ignores the fact that men, rather than women, are the majority of violent crime victims – but a simple utterance of "check your privilege" renders any man's complaint void. What he says doesn't matter, he's male and privileged and we can all move along and redirect resources to female victims. This has been so effective that for decades gender ideologues and robotic conformists to the status quo continue to use it.

What about male suicide, which is 4 times higher than female suicide, and in men post divorce, 11 times higher? Well, men have the privilege of being unaware of their privilege. Like magic, poof, such complaints for male consideration are vanished behind the over-riding TRUTH that men are privileged. The same simple trick works for any issue. Witness the co-option of citizen activism within the occupy wall-street protests. When gender ideologues injected themselves and their ideology into that movement a protocol for order-of-speakers was established called the "progressive stack." In this system, at gatherings where activists were to speak before crowds, the order-of-speaker was that "traditionally oppressed" ethnicities and sexual orientations would go automatically to the front of the line and white men would go to the back. Thus, white men were – through rhetorical-ideological sleight of hand, effectively silenced.

However, in addressing this venerable claim of male privilege, some, who argue for recognition of male human rights sometimes have occasion to ask the forbidden question: what privilege is anyone talking about? After all, men die earlier, commit suicide at higher rates, die on the job at higher rates, work longer hours, receive lesser comparative medical funding, are more of the homeless, and in many other areas get the shaft, so what privilege are we talking about here? Where are the examples?

When asked of gender ideologues – this usually elicits one of several predictable responses. The first and most popular reply, when asked "what male privilege" is, of course, silence. The next most popular predictable response is the hilariously stupid: "If you don't already know, then I can't help you."

As this is an irrational response, it's useful to list several another versions of the same answer. When an ideologue, asked for examples of male privilege offers something as sadly pathetic as "If you don't already know, then I can't help you." what they mean is this:

"I have no evidence, so I'm going to try to shift the burden of evidence for my claim onto you, because you oppose my asinine argument."

This response, if it's even to be dignified by continued engagement with whoever offers it, can be brushed aside by pointing out that the burden of evidence always rests on the person making a positive claim. Then again, those arguing for the human rights of men and boys, if they're not inclined to provide free education to ideologues, might prefer a more succinct answer.

Fuck you, for example.

However, when challenged to provide an example of the claimed "male privilege" feminists so often use to attempt to silence oppositional argument, an increasingly common response is to post a link to a document called the “male privilege checklist”.

This tactic betrays the laziness, ignorance, and intellectual void from which feminist rhetoric springs. Rather than formulating an answer of his or her own, anyone employing this demonstrates their argument as simple repetition of programmed doctrine, rather than an intelligent response. The list itself, if those posting links to it even read it, is an indictment of the bankruptcy of the “male privilege” claim. Sadly, it’s unlikely that those using this “argument” even bother to read it, because while none of the items in the list actually demonstrate male privilege, many show the opposite case. Because of the robotic and intellectual vacancy of such actors, it’s unnecessary – and ultimately pointless to bother -actually addressing the non-argument of any blind linkage to the “male privilege checklist”.

This rebuttal includes the complete text of that so called proof of male privilege, along with explanation of the falsehood of every single claim in the list.

The Male Privilege Checklist: Or, a great list of lies, designed to exhaust and insult anyone with the intellectual integrity to actually read and address those lies.

1. [box]A man’s odds of being hired for a job, when competing against female applicants, are probably skewed in his favor. The more prestigious the job, the larger the odds are skewed.[/box]This is flatly false. In fact, this is the reverse of the truth. Men, especially white men, are uniquely disadvantaged in getting hired. Affirmative action, multicultural workplace and equal opportunity employment policies in all areas of the working world function to send men to the back of the line when competing for jobs – even when those men have superior qualifications and greater relevant experience.
2. [box]A man can be confident that his co-workers won’t think he got his job because of his sex – even though that might be true.[/box]“even though that might be true.”
   The fact that women might be hired based on their sex or retained during a period of lay-offs due to their sex is presented in a list of male privileges as if female advantage – when known by co-workers somehow becomes a male privilege. The stupidity of this claim is beyond explanation.
3. [box] If a man is never promoted, it’s not because of his sex.[/box]Once again, women being promoted due to their sex, which the author of this “privilege checklist” doesn’t dispute; somehow, this is characterized as a male privilege. The fact that men are not generally promoted except when they’ve earned it – this is a privilege enjoyed by males? Holy fuck.
4. [box]If a man fails in any job or career, he can feel sure this won’t be seen as a black mark against his entire sex’s capabilities.[/box]This is no truer for men than for women. It is not a privilege.
5. [box]A man is far less likely to face sexual harassment at work than his female co-workers are.[/box]This is false. Men face sexual harassment at work – the only difference being they have no recourse; if they complain, they will usually be fired or demoted.
6. [box]If a man does the same task as a woman, and if the measurement is at all subjective, chances are people will think he did a better job.[/box]This is false, also in many cases women have an advantage in being able to assume credit for work done by male colleagues.
7. [box]Whether a male is a teen or adult, and if he can stay out of prison, his odds of being raped are relatively low. [/box]This is false, and not a privilege.
   The odds of being raped if a female are also relatively low, however, for males, odds of violent criminal victimization are significantly higher. In addition, rapes of females are treated as a major crime, where rapes of males are treated as comedy.
8. [box]On average, men are taught to fear walking alone after dark in average public spaces much less than their female counterparts are.[/box]While it is true that men are taught to fear less than women, men are much more likely to be victimized by violent crime than women, so this is not a male privilege.
9. [box]If a man chooses not to have children, his masculinity will not be called into question.[/box]This is a false comparison, since men who do not marry are considered “un-manly” or social failures. Thus, once more, not a privilege.

10. [box]If a man has children but does not provide primary care for them, his masculinity will not be called into question.[/box]This is another false comparison, to the extent that a woman who doesn't care for her children will be criticized, a man who DOES care for his children as a stay-home-dad will also be considered less masculine.
11. [box]If a man has children and provides primary care for them, he'll be praised for extraordinary parenting if he's even marginally competent.[/box]This is false, men are treated with great suspicion when caring for children, and stay home fathers are regularly considered weak failures.
12. [box]If a man has children and a career, no one will think he is selfish for not staying at home.[/box]Another falsehood. Men do not have the option of retaining a career and staying at home. By contrast, women are socially accommodated in this respect.
13. [box]If a man seeks political office, his relationship with his children, or who he hires to take care of them will probably not be scrutinized by the press.[/box]This is another false comparison, a man running for political office who has any role except working-full-time away from his family will be socially censured and heavily scrutinized.
14. [box]For men, elected representatives are mostly people of their own sex. The more prestigious and powerful the elected position, the more this is true.[/box]Another implied falsehood. Having elected representatives the same sex as voters is not a privilege or an advantage. Politicians traditionally cater to women, as women comprise a small but real majority of the electorate, and female favoring policies also appeal to traditionalist men.
15. [box]When a man asks to see "the person in charge," odds are he will face a person of his own sex. The higher-up in the organization the person is, the surer he can be.[/box]This is not a privilege; men in positions of power and authority define their identities primarily by relationship to their hierarchy, not principally as men. They see men lower than themselves as tools, and men equal to and higher than themselves as competition.
16. [box]As a child, chances are that boys are encouraged to be more active and outgoing than girls.[/box]This reflects our culture's requirements of boys to act directly, take risks, and disregard their safety on behalf of others, and our tendency to protect and shelter girls. This is not a male privilege.
17. [box]As a child, a boy can choose from an almost infinite variety of children's media featuring positive, active, non-stereotyped heroes of their own sex. Boys never have to look for it; male protagonists were (and are) the default.[/box]Children's literature provides models for male identity which almost exclusively require sacrifice and service and ultimately, disposability. This is how the literary device of the "hero" is defined, by sacrifice, and disposability.
18. [box]As a child, chances are that boys are given more teacher attention than girls who raised their hands just as often.[/box]This is false. Girls are favored and catered to in primary, secondary, and post secondary education; as evidenced by rates of drop out, personality-flattening medication, and educational success outcomes.
19. [box]If a man's day, week or year is going badly, he need not ask of each negative episode or situation whether or not it has sexist overtones.[/box]Neither women nor men "need ask of each negative episode or situation whether or not it has sexist overtones". Only a paranoid moron subjects all negative experience to this type of minute analysis.
20. [box]A man can turn on the television or glance at the front page of the newspaper and see people of his own sex widely represented.[/box]This is true of both sexes, and also irrelevant. Not a privilege.
21. [box]If a man is careless with his financial affairs it won't be attributed to his sex.[/box]To the extent that this is true, it's true or false in relation to both sexes, and also irrelevant. Not a privilege.
22. [box]If a man is careless with his driving it won't be attributed to his sex.[/box]This is false, young men typically pay higher insurance than young women, in violation of law.
23. [box]A man can speak in public to a large group without putting his sex on trial.[/box]To the extent that this is true, it's true or false in relation to both sexes, and also irrelevant. Not a privilege.

24. [box]Even if a man sleeps with a lot of women, there is no chance that he will be seriously labeled a "slut," nor is there any male counterpart to "slut-bashing."[/box]This is false, creep shaming and virgin shaming are corollaries to slut shaming.
25. [box]Men do not have to worry about the message their wardrobe sends about sexual availability.[/box]False. Men's wardrobes and other signals of status govern whether women will instantly dismiss them as irrelevant, invisible, and non-persons.
26. [box]Men's clothing is typically less expensive and better-constructed than women's clothing for the same social status. While a man has fewer options, his clothes will probably fit better than a woman's without tailoring.[/box]"Fewer options" [True]."his clothes will probably fit better than a woman's without tailoring" [False].
    So women's broader clothing options are rhetorically contorted into a male privilege. The smaller profit margin of women clothing, due to manufacturers producing more variety translates to lesser quality – and this is a male privilege? The dishonesty in this list is utterly staggering.
27. [box]The grooming regimen expected of a man is relatively cheap and consumes little time.[/box]Women's decoration, in hair, makeup, jewelry, and other adornment might be inconvenient, but this ignores the reason why women wear makeup, jewelry, and so on. Woman are valued; in fact, they are treasured; as individuals. Men, by contrast, have value only to the extent that they are of use to women or to a larger collective. Men are, in fact, disposable. So putting on lipstick is a chore, oh dear, how awful that must be for you, to be valued enough to be decorated with makeup and jewelry.
28. [box]If a man buys a new car, chances are he'll be offered a better price than a woman buying the same car.[/box]If you possess skill at negotiation, you'll get a better price, if you allow a professional car dealer to dictate to you, you'll get the shaft. This is unrelated to sex, except that women, by employing their sexual power have a tool of manipulation men lack. This is not a male privilege.
29. [box]If a man is not conventionally attractive, the disadvantages are relatively small and easy to ignore.[/box]Women's attractiveness to men is measured in health, youth, and biological signals of fertility. Things ALL women are endowed with by nature (some to greater degree than others). Men's attractiveness to women is measured by accomplishment, it's earned; thus, once more, not a male privilege.
30. [box]A man can be loud with no fear of being called a shrew. A man can be aggressive with no fear of being called a bitch.[/box]Word games: Men who are loud and aggressive are called assholes and douche-bags. In addition, a man who pushes this asshole behavior far enough will get punched in the face, where a woman will not.
31. [box]A man can ask for legal protection from violence that happens mostly to men without being seen as a selfish special interest, since that kind of violence is called "crime" and is a general social concern.[/box]"violence which happens mostly to men"
    How is this a male privilege? Legal protection against criminal victimization (outside of domestic violence) is applied to women and to men, with extra vigor in applied protection for women, due to men's naturally wired behavior to protect females more than males.

    (Violence that happens mostly to women is usually called "domestic violence" or "acquaintance rape," and is seen as a special interest issue.)

    This is another lie, domestic violence is committed against men and women at nearly identical levels, except where it is one-sided (where the victim does not reciprocate the violence), and in that one-sided violence, women are the majority of perpetrators. Despite this, almost all public narrative perpetuates the falsehood that men are the universal aggressors in DV. Being falsely labeled as evil and violent based on sexual identity is not a privilege.

32. [box]A man can be confident that the ordinary language of day-to-day existence will always include his sex. “All men are created equal,” mailman, chairman, freshman, he.[/box]Through most of history, men and women have had differing roles, based on the social disposability of men and the tendency to protect and care for women, thus the names of careers reflect male undertaking in these pursuits. This is not male privilege; it’s a byproduct of male care-taking of women. In other words, a byproduct of historical female privilege.
33. [box]A man’s ability to make important decisions and his capability in general will never be questioned depending on what time of the month it is.[/box]This is because men do not vary in their emotions or capabilities based on what time of the month it is. Social recognition of the REALITY that women’s emotions and capabilities DO vary in such a regard is not privilege, it’s a reflection of observable reality. Privilege would be the public agreeing to a consensus that indeed, women are unaffected by their own biology, and are exactly identical to men in their capabilities. This consensus agreement with fiction is increasingly the norm, as entry standards for physically onerous jobs such as soldier, firefighter, and police officer are lowered for women, even as their pay and powers within such jobs are legally the same as men, who perform those physically onerous tasks at a higher average capability.
34. [box]A man will never be expected to change his name upon marriage or questioned if he doesn’t change his name.[/box]False, men will sometimes be expected to change their name, and belittled when they do, as well as when they don’t. In addition, WOMEN will almost never be expected to get down on one knee and beg a man’s hand in marriage, nor shell out 3 months salary for a bauble, nor fill the role of financial underwriter of the entire enterprise. Those “privileges” are reserved for men.
35. [box]The decision to hire a man will not be based on assumptions about whether or not he might choose to have a family sometime soon.[/box]This is true to the extent that men are not allowed the option and luxury of suspending their career to be parents, while women enjoy such privilege, while their jobs are legally preserved by federal law, should they chose to return. Men who do take such indulgence are expected to start new jobs on their return to the work force- without intercession from the state. Oh, those lucky, lucky, privileged men.
36. [box]Every major religion in the world is led primarily by people of the male sex. Even God, in most major religions, is pictured as male.[/box]Except for hinduism, and its offshoots, and Buddhism – which has no god figure.
    Concerning Islam, Allah is both male and female, so god being male is limited even in abrahamic traditions to Christianity and Judaism. Judaism being the western faith which brought us the innovation of cutting off the most sensitive tip of the male sexual organ.According to renowned biologist Dr. Richard Dawkins, the god of the bible is: “arguably the most unpleasant character in all fiction: jealous and proud of it; a petty, unjust, unforgiving control-freak; a vindictive, bloodthirsty ethnic cleanser; a misogynistic, homophobic, racist, infanticidal, genocidal, filicidal, pestilential, megalomaniacal, sadomasochistic, capriciously malevolent bully.”

    What a privilege it is to be the same sex as this character.

    In addition, within christianity, Mary, the mother of Jesus was the closest to the deity through her giving birth of humanity’s apparent saviour. Women, as the direct creators of human life are naturally most closely associated to the creative powers of god.

    Also, the absence of a gospel of Mary Magdelin – who was Jesus’s companion (wife) removes from Christian canon any pathway to naturalistic male spirituality through men’s bodies. Women, by comparison do have such a path. Men’s pathway to “grace” within western religious tradition is through service and sacrifice, and explicitly excludes their own bodies.

    St. Augustine of Hippo, born 354 AD, declared the penis a demon rod, and semen a sort of toxic glue. Semen, within a more naturalistic religious philosophy would be a spiritual sacred elixir, rather than male sexual expression being a road to damnation.

    If a this is a privilege, we’re going to need a new definition for privilege.

37. [box]Most major religions argue that the man should be the head of the household, while a wife and children should be subservient to the man.[/box]Feminine submission is a method of control and indirect domination. It is a way of enslaving a man into the role of total responsibility, without any exit or relief. The traditionalist Christian “surrendered wife” is a way to make a man into a draft animal.
38. [box]If a man has a wife or live-in girlfriend, chances are that household chores will be divided so that she does most of the labor, and in particular the most repetitive and unrewarding tasks. [/box]This is false; the reality is that she will do the safest, easiest, and the indoor tasks, while the man will do the most physically onerous tasks, those outside the house, and those which are the most dangerous. But whenever housework is mentioned, this fact is omitted, because this is almost always presented in the context of a dishonest list of supposed male privileges.
39. [box]If a man has children with his girlfriend or wife, he can expect her to do most of the basic childcare such as changing diapers and feeding.[/box]This is true, but what’s also true is that those men performing any child care task are automatically suspected of and frequently accused of sexual deviancy and child molestation, and demeaned and belittled based on such pursuits being un-manly. Also, men are expected to hustle out to the workplace to fund home-childrearing activities, without complaint, and with no recognition that maybe they’d rather be with their families instead of grinding out some unrewarding and potentially dangerous 9 to 5 on behalf of wife and kids at home. So guess what, not a male privilege.
40. [box]If a man has children with his wife or girlfriend, and it turns out that one of them needs to make career sacrifices to raise the kids, chances are both will assume the career sacrificed should be hers.[/box]False. (see above)
    Also, women have legal reproductive rights. Men, by contrast have only the obligation to support and to finance whatever reproductive choices a woman may make. Whether a couple come to agreement on reproduction or not, in law, the woman’s choice is supported and enforced by the state, for a man, there is only the obligation to pay.
41. [box]Assuming a man is heterosexual, magazines, billboards, television, movies, pornography, and virtually all of media is filled with images of scantily-clad women intended to appeal to him sexually. Such images of men exist, but are rarer.[/box]Feminine sexuality is feminine power. Men are manipulated through commercial exaggeration of, and the marketing of feminine sexuality. The “male privilege” being complained of is the privilege to be manipulated by this imagery. The comparative salaries of female and male porn actors express this power imbalance quite clearly. On average, female performers earn 6 times what their male contemporaries do.
42. [box]In general, a man is under much less pressure to be thin than his female counterparts are. If he is fat, he probably suffers fewer social and economic consequences for being fat than fat women do.[/box]This is another false comparison. For men, the social pressure is to be lean and muscular. The claim that men face fewer social consequences for failure to conform to a body ideal is simply false.
43. [box]If a man is heterosexual, it’s incredibly unlikely that he’ll ever be beaten up by a spouse or lover.[/box]False. Peer reviewed research on domestic violence shows that in reciprocal violence, men and women commit violence at equal levels, and in one-sided violence, women are the majority of aggressors. In addition, men seeking outside help when they are victimized risk being arrested rather than helped and men who have been victimized are routinely mocked in mainstream media as weak, un-manly, and sissies.
44. [box]Complete strangers generally do not walk up to men on the street and tell them to “smile.”[/box]False comparison again. A man looking directly into the eyes of another man risks violence in response. Women generally do not carry such risk. Men are also far more likely to be victims of violence generally.
45. [box]Sexual harassment on the street virtually never happens to men. Men do not need to plot their movements through public space in order to avoid being sexually harassed, or to mitigate sexual harassment.[/box]Another false comparison. Sexual harassment in a female heavy workplace is common, and generally has no remedy through the company’s HR department or through law. A man complaining of such harassment will likely be fired and publicly mocked. In addition, men in public are the overwhelming majority of the victims of violent crime.

46. [box]On average, a man is not interrupted by women as often as women are interrupted by men.[/box]False. Seriously, come on, this is a prepared list of supposed “male privileges”, and what we’re delivered is pathetic falsehoods, so obvious, unsupportable and blatantly untrue that reason isn’t even required to dispute them.
47. [box]Men have the privilege of being unaware of their male privilege.[/box]In reality, men have the privilege of being endlessly told of privileges which don’t exist, and being silenced, marginalized, sent to the back of the line, and belittled based on a cultivated narrative that they are privileged when they are not.

So there you have it, a list of forty-seven feeble lies. What’s most appalling about this list is not that any individual lie is so easily debunked. Rather that this is a prepared list, not vomited up in the middle of a debate, but assembled and collected in advance of challenge of substantiation of the worn out lie of “male privilege”. Even after passing through many hands, this pathetic collection of moronic falsehoods is the best rebuke which feminist has to offer?

This list, offered up as “evidence” of masculine advantage in a patriarchal society serves, ironically to illustrate the total intellectual and ethical bankruptcy at the heart of feminist ideology. In fact, a casual perusal of the list, absent of the rebuttals included here shows something else as well. These 47 feeble lies, collected together indicate the intent of so-called arguments pretending to establish the veracity of any claim of male privilege. These forty seven pathetic falsehoods, collected into one document are not meant to provide evidence, rather, they are meant to overwhelm anyone demanding evidence. Forty seven pathetic lies are intended to exhaust any proponent of male human rights with so much bullshit that it cannot be reasonably addressed within a debate. The weakness of each individual lie in this list is irrelevant. That there are forty seven separate claims – weak as each one is, the length of the list is intended to exhaust and to silence any individual arguing for the human rights of men. That intention, shown by the weakness of the arguments, and the length of the list is most revealing of all.

Forty seven separate lies are not intended to convince, they are intended to overwhelm, to exhaust and to silence debate. This document, saved as a PDF is all the answer such dishonest and ill-intentioned tactic deserves.

You want privilege? You got it!

Paul Elam · 2 May 2012 · Archived copy · Original

I swear by everything holy that the next time I hear some fembot caterwaul about "male privilege," I am going to find something to break, turn it into shards, and drag the broken pieces across my chest just to distract me from the pain of their increasing stupidity. Just picture me like Martin Sheen, collapsed in a heap of bloody, tearful insanity on the floor of a cheap hotel in Saigon.

It would be better than listening to this bullshit one more time.

Ladies, since so many of you insist on addressing men as a monolithic group when it works against us, and likewise address yourselves as a group when it works to your advantage, allow me to honor that from my seat here among the ranks of the so called privileged. Trust me, I would rather just talk to any one of you as an individual human being, but I am not setting the terms here…you are, so I aim to accommodate.

Mind you I still don't know what that privilege is. One time when I was young and very poor I was late on my light bill. I showed the electric company my balls, but they cut my power off anyway. Maybe they weren't big enough, since I am an MRA and all, but it didn't even buy me one minute past the deadline. I was male powerful, but I had no power. Go figure.

Still, as long as you insist on seeing all this privilege where I don't, I think I ought to help.

If you want my "privilege," by all means you are welcome to it. All you have to do is pay the price.

And that price is strange. You might think we pay for that privilege with the bucket of Krugerrands that come with each male birth, or with the spoils of patriarchy awarded each man as he comes of age. But you would be wrong, I'm afraid.

To give you the real picture, let me suggest a little experiential exercise that will help you understand how we pay for all this unbridled power. Go stand in front of a mirror. Make eye contact with yourself and pretend you are talking to a new person; a stranger who has just been bestowed their fair share of said privilege. Give yourself a very serious, meaningful look and speak from the heart when you say the following:

> "You now have privilege! That means you are a worthless, expendable piece of shit, to be used and disposed of by more powerful women and all men. Your feelings, thoughts, actions and indeed your life have absolutely no value outside what others can use them for. That is the cost of your privilege. Shut the fuck up and pay it."

There are other costs, and I think it is about time that you are aware of them. Here is a brief rundown, emphasis on the word "brief."

When there is a war, women, almost exclusively, will do the killing and dying. If anyone is to be conscripted and forced into combat, it is the privileged women that have that honor.

When, and if, you return from war, prepare to have the powers that sent you there discard you like a kid who has outgrown a toy. Your damaged body and soul will keep you company on the street, where you will live, shattered by all the unthinkable horrors your privilege has led you into.

Men will serve with you in the military, but it will be more like a day care camp for them. Enough effort will be made to protect them from the worst of war that it will mean they will represent less than 2% of the death and disfigurement that the privileged women will face. Enjoy the ride, you powerhouse!

Don't forget, when you are a part of the privileged class you get to pay for everything. With your privilege comes the right to work on crab boats, drive trucks, work on electric lines, walk into burning buildings and sink into the bowels of the earth digging out coal and other things people find useful. Those things might pay well enough for you to maintain your privilege. But remember, you don't get to really keep the money. You get to spend it on others; others that know it is your place to take care of them and fully expect you to do it. And if you fail them, or disappoint them, or don't look as good on Thursday as you did on Tuesday, then they can boot you out and have the state collect the money and hand it to them. How's that for power?

You can also expect that the men taking your money and spending it on themselves will be resentful because of it. They will take what you give them and endlessly bitch that you were able to earn it in the first place. But remember, as a member of the privileged class you have the right to keep your mouth closed about it. I mean, hey, you actually can speak. It is the right of the privileged to do so any time they want. Just be prepared for the world to tell you to quit whining and woman up. The privileged carry with them the expectation of silence in the face of adversity and injustice. Funny how it works, isn't it?

When a ship goes down, or any other life threatening disaster strikes, you have two choices. Be a real woman and die, or treat your life like it has value and have the world shit on you as a coward who refused to perish on cue. There is also the possibility of third option, either die from the disaster so that men can live, or have another woman blow a fucking hole in your face with a pistol because you tried to save yourself.

I know, privilege is a funny thing. Have fun using it to change the rules, but don't be in a big hurry. All that power has a way of supporting the status quo.

And here is a really important word of caution; one that you should remember above the simplicity of the "shut up and produce" mandate that will guide your privileged life. You will come to a point, for whatever reason, that you will look at your life, in all its reality, and decide that you really don't have any privilege at all.

Like noticing the emperor has no clothes, it may hit you one day when you decide not to offer your seat to a man; when the stares at you from all around seem to come down people's noses. Or it may dawn on you that you don't feel privileged when the state takes your money and gives it to a man you used to live with so he can take care of a child that he doesn't allow you to see, or just so he can afford really good, high-end liquor, as opposed to the bottles of dreck under your kitchen sink.

Whatever the moment, it hits you that the privilege is not what you had imagined; that it indeed has begun to more resemble an anchor around your neck than the helm of a great ship that everyone tells you that you are captaining. That is the moment you must remember to just shut up and take it.

You must learn not to say a word. Not to anyone else, not even to yourself. You must learn to see flames, coal dust, icy saltwater, death and sacrifice for the trappings of power that the world around you thinks them to be. And you must be willing to hang your head in shame over that power, even as the world chews you up, spits you out, and gets ready to take its turn with your daughter.

If you talk, if you say what you see, it will break the spell of your privilege, and the whole world will hate you for it, though hate may not be strong enough a word.

They will call you all manner of names, and say many, many hurtful things to try to wear you down; to humiliate you into hanging on to your privilege. They will put you on a list of haters, dedicate websites and blogs to painting you as human garbage. They will even try to get you watched by the FBI and other government agencies. They will advocate for your extermination.

Of course they will hate you anyway, even if you say nothing. They will resent your privilege and attack you for it, but ironically if you choose to abandon that privilege and even hand it over to them, their vitriol will get even worse. Sorry, I am just a man and I can't tell you why things work this way. It's just above my pretty little head. But work this way they do.

So, that is it, ladies. You want my privilege, it is yours. I will gladly hand it over to you this very minute. I am just waiting for you to meet the pre-requisites of disposibility and an utter lack of self-value. I am waiting for you to woman up to the job, take off your fucking make up and be ready to bleed, for better commerce, and for my approval. Indeed, I have made your attaining more privilege the calling of my life.

I, like a Jew gone weary of being called a chosen one, am completely ready for anyone else, and in particular, you, to be chosen.

Personally, I have had about all the privilege I can stand.

Sex discrimination commissioner ignores men and boys.

Greg Canning · 2 May 2012 · Archived copy · Original

[box icon="none"]

FOR IMMEDIATE RELEASE

Sex Discrimination Commissioner ignores men and boys.

Details of an open letter have been released claiming Elizabeth Broderick, the National Sex Discrimination Commissioner, has failed to address concerns raised with her regarding disadvantage and sexism faced by men and boys in favor of advocacy predominantly for women.

The letter, compiled by Townsville doctor and International Men's Day coordinator Dr. Greg Canning has also been forwarded to the Male Champions of Change, the group of prominent CEO's and board members who worked with Ms. Broderick to elevate the representation of women in leadership positions within the business community. It is hoped these same influential men may encourage her to be more supportive of issues facing ordinary men and boys.

The poor educational performance of boys although recognized for decades, is not being adequately addressed, and is reflected in the declining rates of male enrollments and graduations from out tertiary institutions.

Whilst the introduction by the current Labor Government of the first Australian Male Health Policy in 2010 is applauded, much more needs to be done, especially to address men's mental health, disproportionate rate of suicide, reduced life expectancy and bias in research funding.

Gender discrimination during separation, divorce, within the family court and the subsequent alienation of fathers and children is seen as a basic human and children's rights issue that should rightly be championed by Ms. Broderick. Dr. Canning believes that the trend toward fatherlessness is at the root of many Australia's social ills.

Family violence is also a key area of concern in that strategies in Australia over many years have focused solely on "violence against women," largely ignoring the one in three victims of family violence who are men. www.oneinthree.com.au

Concerns are also raised about the misrepresentation of statistics relating to violence, and the concealing of the gender of the predominantly female perpetrators of child abuse for ideological and political reasons.

The letter has been endorsed by Jerome Teelucksingh, the founder of International Men's Day, who joins the call for the Sex Discrimination Commissioner to advocate for International Men's Day and publicize the event on the commissions web site, as it currently does for International Women's Day.

http://db.tt/EecgIe58

Dr. Canning encourages interested Australians to contact their political representatives, and the sex discrimination commissioner to voice their concerns.

AVfM Radio: Sex, rape and self-selected victimhood

John Hembling (JtO) · 3 May 2012 · Archived copy · Original

[box icon="none"]

Sex, Porn, Victimhood and the use of victim identity in political tyranny. Tonight on A Voice for Men Radio, John the Other and Girl Writes What will be discussing sex as a means of reproduction, and sex as a social communicative tool, in pair boding and in relationships, and the difference some ideologues seem determined to remain blind to. Also under discussion is how victimhood changes its character when it is a self selected identity rather than an unfortunate outcome or accident. What's the difference between a self selecting victim and a tyrant? Not much besides political charisma.

Male sexuality, un-demonized

TyphonBlue and JtO · 4 May 2012 · Archived copy · Original

[box]Understanding breeds compassion, and so, within the theoretical framework of the Compassion for Men Movement, we begin with an examination of one of the most demonized aspects of men, their use of the services offered by the sex industry.
[/box]

A survey of men who seek gratification through commercial sex services – either porn, or prostitution, or lap dances or any other commercial sex showed that rather than men seeking sexual gratification as rutting animals – modelled on the Dworkinian view of men as subhuman; men's motivation to seek commercial sex is based on the human need to be recognized as desirable. This runs contrary to the populist notion of male sexuality as debased, inferior and pathological.

Socially, men are expected to validate women's value as objects of sexual desire by exhibiting attraction, affection, and deference, but at the same time, men are also expected to weather a culturally normal climate of pre-emptive rejection. Further men must pass tests of fitness, financial and physical, to 'prove' the worth of their desire. All of these expectations validates the feminine fantasy of hyper-desirability; desirability beyond the humanly possible.

The self validation of women and girls by rejection of positive male attention is expressed in hundreds of small, socially normal gestures and practices. De-escalation of male initiated social contacts. Two messages or more required for a single call-back. Voice message left, but only a text message returned. All these variations on 'playing hard to get' reflects a normal social protocol in which men, on whom the onus has always been to initiate social contact, have to make a more overt effort than that which is returned, even when the woman in question desires that contact. This establishes a climate in which men automatically assume a low level of ongoing social rejection. This is normal across our culture, and masculine complaint can be easily punished through the censure of "wimp", "sissy" and similar minor insult.

Feminine attire which puts secondary sexual characteristics on display is standard in casual clothing as well as evening attire or less formally "party clothes". The obvious purpose of such clothes being to amplify the wearer's overt feminine sexuality and command attention. Conversely, although all men are expected to respond with positive attention, only those passing the feminine test of high status or conspicuous wealth are allowed to express their stimulated attention. This is the social levy exacted, but only returned to those males overtly demonstrating their utility as dispensers of upward social mobility and feminine access to resources. Men expressing the attraction or desire socially assumed of them also risk censure if such expression is mis-timed, too overt, or for any reason, not reciprocated.

This elaborate, confusing dance becomes much simpler in the lens of manufacturing hyper-desire. The more obstacles a man must overcome to express his desire the more the woman feels desired by the man.

Romance novels can be reduced down to a simple formula in which female desirability inspires grandiose acts of self-sacrifice on the part of the male. The men in romance novels are 'eyeballs and actions', empty ciphers that exist only to illuminate the hyper-desirability of the female protagonist.

In fact this whole system, from shaming of male sexuality as debased through the expectation that men weather rejection without end in order to manufacture hyper-desire for women to it's vetting of which men are allowed to desire—excludes men from a fundamental human need—developed through eons of evolution as pair-bonders—the feeling of being desirable.

In discussions of female sexual objectification for the purpose of marketing to man, the usual language describing imagery of women usually refers to "tits and ass". However, research from the Center for Behavioural Neuroscience in Atlanta[1] shows that depiction of the feminine gaze is key to male attraction to such images. It is, in fact, the sexual agency of an attractive woman, as expressed through a direct gaze towards the male subject that lights up the male's reward response system. [2] When an attractive woman is presented as a 'sex object' her gaze averted and herself unengaged with him—his reward system is unresponsive.

To put it simply, men look at porn to feel sexually desirable. Men pay strippers to get positive, sexualized attention from women. Men use prostitutes to feel like whole sexual beings.

It is, in fact, the basic human need to feel not only loved, but sexually desired turns out to be what drives the use of commercial sexual services by men. Most women are aware that being a woman does not detract from their sexual desirability; most men are acutely aware that being a man most certainly does. In that context male sexual fantasies revolve around male sexuality simply being desirable. Porn can be likened to the fantasies of an impoverished developing nation—it's people imagine a world with abundant and plentiful food. Romance novels are, on the other hand, the fantasies of a prosperous nation—sprawling McMansions, yachts, vacations to the Caribbean.

In this context the social censure against men's self medication for the psychic wound inflicted on them by women's thirst for hyper-desirability is just as morally bankrupt as a prosperous nation sneering at the 'base and animalistic urges' of an impoverished nation for food and clean water.

We starve men, then shame them for their hunger and then when they reach for what little food is within their grasp, we smack their hand away.

My inner Christina

Paul Elam · 4 May 2012 · Archived copy · Original

Having spent a great deal of time as a “helping” professional, I have heard the feminine mantra echo through my brain more times than I can remember. Get in touch with your feminine side.

The message comes wrapped in a number of ways, from the direct command to just access my internal, repressed feminine, to the much more subtle messages about women’s superiority in matters of emotions, communication and interpersonal relationships. I am not even counting the whole “women at one with nature” thing, or the unending spiels about women’s enhanced morality coming into the workplace and politics. I can only handle so much femininity at once, so I am going to stick with the basics.

Today, I make it happen. Today, I choose to connect to my inner feminine, and reach for being the most complete human I can. Today, my anima rules.

I start the day early, imagining I have a vagina, and it is the source of my inner goddess, the pinnacle of my feminine nature.

So far this is how it has gone:

I woke up with a slight headache and my hair was a mess, so I immediately took it out on my partner by being rude, demanding, petty and unreasonable. The coffee she made for me was not the kind I like, so I left it where it sat, took her credit card and drove to a Starbucks, by myself.

It was kinda cool, though. There was a nice looking woman in the line ahead of me talking on her cell phone. Well, she actually wasn’t all that hot, not at all as good as I can do, but I heard her say something about being a dentist, so I didn’t just write her off altogether.

I know, I DO have a partner, but hey, nothing wrong with having a plan B. right?

There was this other woman there, actually the girl working the counter. She was very friendly and I caught her looking at me a few times. It was kind a creepy, actually. A counter girl at Starbucks, with me? As if!

Anyway, I guess I was in too much of a hurry to drive back home, because I got pulled over for speeding, which of course I was not doing. I quickly unbuttoned the first two buttons on my shirt, and cried/flirted a little when the cop stepped up to my window, but I got a ticket anyway. It was like he could not even see my feminine side at all. Bastard.

Well, the ticket really pissed me off. You-know-who is going to have to shell out for this one, too! I didn’t make that lousy cup of coffee, so it is not my fault that I had to go to Starbucks, by myself, which cost me time and made me hurry. My partner deserves to pay for the ticket. I don’t know why I put up with her.

Anyhoo, I got back home, my coffee now cold because I had to waste my time with that stupid cop, and my morning was ruined. Naturally, I took that out on my partner, too. And can you believe it, she had the nerve to tell me that the ticket was my fault!?!? Eww! I am so getting back on the market!

But that is the problem, too. Where are all the good women who know how to honor my feminine side? I find it strangely sexist of women who won’t listen to me blame them for every little miserable detail of my life; who are so stupid that I have to actually tell them what I want instead of their being able to read my mind.

And I have yet to find one that sees my feminine side and accesses her masculine side to pay homage to it. Where are all the enlightened women who want to take care of me?

I wonder about the almost cute dentist in Starbucks. She was dressed very nicely, and I spotted her driving off in a Porsche as I was leaving. Surely she has the resources to give me what I want and the smarts to make a cup of coffee without fucking it up. Like I said, she wasn’t all that hot, but she was the kind of woman that I might have sex with if she didn't say or do anything stupid.

She might even make a good starter wife. Must note the day and time I was at the Starbucks and go back. I hope that creepy bitch behind the counter doesn't undress me with her eyes again. If she does I will sue.

And that brings me up to the rest of my day. I am torn on how to spend it. I can either go shopping (I still have you-know-who's credit card), or maybe I will start a blog and tell the world about how my feminine side has been repressed.

And it has, you know. It is the best example of absolute proof there is of how the masculine has dominated the feminine. And it demonstrates a problem I have been having all morning with getting in touch with my feminine side.

Every time I take out my frustrations on my innocent partner, this godforsaken masculine voice keeps popping up and telling me that it is wrong, and my stupid masculine self keeps listening. What a buzz-kill. I wish I were feminine enough to be able to easily displace all my negative feelings onto other innocent people, but I am just not there yet.

There is also something about forcing others to pay for my mistakes that my masculine side keeps screwing up as well. It's like my feminine side knows I deserve to take what I want and not look back, but this repressive masculine asshole inside me keeps raising objections!

If I can't even shit on people emotionally, or steal from them, without this male fucktard inside me mucking things up with a sense of right and wrong, then how the hell am I supposed to express my femininity in all its divine glory? I feel like a sociopath trapped in the body of a Good Samaritan. I am transvalued.

I feel so screwed! I may not be fully in touch with my feminine side, but I have come far enough to know that if I feel something the world is supposed to treat it like its real, even if it makes no sense at all. That is what being feminine is all about!

But I am still left wondering, just who will honor my feminine side? My partner wouldn't. The cop sure wouldn't, and I suppose that says a lot about the courts in advance. Where does that leave me? Do you have any idea how much all this sucks?

I guess there is nowhere else for me to go. I am going to spend the rest of the day spending a ridiculous amount of money on inconsequential bullshit, most of which is designed to cater to my vanity, and then I will take the nascent awareness of my superficiality and uselessness and morph it into a slogan to justify anything else superficial and useless that I want to do.

You GO boy!

Now, that has a ring to it! Perhaps if I say it often enough and loud enough it will drown out this masculine voice of reason and accountability, and I can get on with the business of expressing my feminine nature without the oppressive chains of human decency holding me back.

I know, I know, not all femininity is like that. There are some women who are completely fair, accountable, logical and unassuming. They are full grown adults, steeped in the expectations of mutuality and compromise. They are great human beings. They are in touch with their masculine side, and it shows.

But being like them is defeating the purpose. I am already like them!

I need to get in touch with and utilize the kind of femininity that rules the day in modern life; the kind of femininity with which most people are familiar. I need to get connected to my inner shopper, my repressed Bridezilla, my stifled princess to which the world owes all. I don't need my inner Dr. T., I need my inner Christina Aguilera. And I need her to take control without all this pesky masculine droning on about integrity. I just need a way to pursue everything I want regardless of whether I have earned it, and regardless of whether it hurts those a lot more deserving than me.

I guess it is time to call on my inner feminist.

The future of civilization

externalangst · 4 May 2012 · Archived copy · Original

Take heart MRAs; history is on our side. We may not see substantial success in our lifetimes, but give civilization enough time to develop and female preference will be regarded as backward as racial preference. Sociobiology suggests that gender feminism is akin to racism. Both are derived from our deep evolutionary past in order to give an advantage to the groups that practice it over those that do not.

The use of brain scanners has provided support for the evolutionary psychology of moral decision making. Certain triggers are seen to elicit activity in mainly the older emotional areas of the brain, whilst scenarios not related to our evolution are processed more in the higher cognitive areas. When confronted with issues with an evolutionary imperative, such as sex and violence, subjects whose moral position aligned with an ancient evolutionary imperative displayed activity mainly in their lower emotional brain. Conversely, subjects who considered the consequences and utility of their moral decisions utilized mainly their higher cognitive faculties [1].

Hardly surprising, but very important. This is evidence that, far from what traditional moralists would have us believe, when it comes to sex and violence: it is not at all their finer moral or religious sensibilities, nor their superior reasoning skills, that inevitably lead them to concur so fundamentally with pre-historic humans on modern manners. No. It's their most base emotive reaction, which is largely devoid of reasoned considerations.

It will come as no surprise to MRAs that the heart-felt rightness that many feminists feel for female preference is an unthinking emotional response derived from our deep evolutionary past. It is the same reason why racism just feels to be the obvious and correct sentiment for too many people.

Only after emotional determination are higher order rationalizations employed to justify that response [2]. This is why a feminist will claim that there are reasons for female preference: e.g. men are stronger than women; yet remain unmoved by a particular case where the woman is stronger than the man, or where strength is irrelevant. Similarly, when all evidence necessitates compassion for a male rather than a female, it will automatically be bestowed on the female instead. By the primitive brain regions and then justified ad hoc, if at all. It is an emotional response, not a rational one. In the modern world, this is as inappropriate as racism.

Importantly, in the case of racism, we can intellectually override this base emotional drive in order to relate to each other in a multicultural world. But think back to the times, not so long ago, when racism was not only approved but mandatory. There was a time when if you were not a racist, there was something wrong with you. We now realize that we can longer afford such unreasoned and hateful indulgences, as the alternative is conflict. Yet we are not so civilized as to apply the same intellectual override to our base evolutionary preference for females. We will ignore this at our peril.

This does however, hold out hope. For if primitive racist tendencies can be overridden by a cognitive process through self examination, education, and logical thought then there exists the possibility that the innate preference for females can also be intellectually reevaluated and diminished on a mass scale. Equality of the sexes may be our best measure of civilization. If this is so, we're in trouble. It is as if having progressed well down the road rejecting racism, we do an about face and now embrace it wholeheartedly. This is what has happened to sexual equality. It is being reversed.

Evolution gave us our prejudiced base traits. Civilization and education can free us. How are we doing? Progress on racial prejudice is advancing; but slowly. The ubiquity, persistence, and stubbornness of racism around the world attest to its biological and social power. It is likely that sexual prejudice is even more powerful, as it has not only favored group selection, but also individual selection. Social reinforcement and modification by the power groups (state & church) for the benefit of power groups wraps it all up nicely.

Why do we pay politicians and judges so much when, for the most important human rights issues, they use their lowest, reptilian faculties and revert to being a simple, reactive, emotional blob? It is because society itself is still largely reptilian in relation to sex. This does not bode well for the future.

It is not just sex and race where we are so uncivilized. Deference to power may be another negative evolutionary throw-back to a primitive past. This may explain the resilience of corrupt political donations and practices, public indifference and acceptance of police brutality and corruption, and as some have pointed out – celebrity culture. Deference to power; be it political, sexual or reproductive is not a viable long term strategy.

Deference to powerful people and females is primitive and uncivilized; because in the modern world there are no good reasons for it. Eons ago, when we lived in small groups, respecting a leader and protecting the group's reproductive capacity had an evolutionary advantage. This is no longer the case. Today, deference for the powerful only encourages and protects their corruption and the resultant harm visited upon the people. Deference for females promotes overpopulation, underachievement, and waste. As well, both constitute an offence against the rights of the average male.

The future will only see the differences between the sexes become ever more diminished in importance, via technology and the irresistible desire for equality. Why then do gender feminists insist on an ever more genderized world? A world with more and more laws and customs based on sex? It doesn't make sense unless seen as a further power grab by the powerful. It is antithetical to the civilizing project of releasing us from the tyranny of our genes and a threat to us all. MRAs: civilization is calling. Feminists are the racists of the future.

Digging for gold, above and below

Dr. F (Ian Williams) · 5 May 2012 · Archived copy · Original

When Edward Hargreaves found gold in Bathurst here in Australia on 12 February 1851 he had no idea what was to come. Soon after his pick hit yellow oil the swarms of metal maddened flew like bullets across the sea to the open fields in New South Wales.

They ran across the very ocean to get here in unbroken lines of a greed so unfettered that the hills themselves groaned with their collective weight. Overnight we saw the swing of pick, the swirling pans and the jiggered sluice bays that dug and gouged and hacked away at the land like Mr. Lorax did when spewing his "Thneeds".

What was once a lush and gorgeous bush with a shimmer of such aching beauty that stole your breath, now became a mud splashed ruin of such filth that even the wombats and water fowls glanced away in shame.

Of course, when the flurry had faded and the tents had collapsed the land eventually healed as before, but now there was something quite different in the wind. The whiff of a "free feed" met every nostril whether it was there on the gold fields or not. The fields had delivered gold and the nation now understood the real face and delights of opportunity itself. The meme broke from dirt as a B grade zombie and it croaked, "Find gold and get it no matter what."

Now here and today, tucked in safe beds or standing proudly behind orange Laminex kitchen counters or preened as young queens in juice bars, the scintillating tingle of striking gold lives on. You'll chance upon it in an elevator with a glance at your opal cufflinks and then a cute smile your way. Maybe you'll see it in the glimmer of a moist eye of the desperate after a twitching display of crafted drama for the audience of just you?

Ok, so you've never been mined as it were, and you're safe. But tell me if you will that the following true stories can never happen to you.

[unordered_list style="arrow"]

- Mr. B. lost his wife to a degenerative disease, his son froze to death on a bus shelter after being spiked at a party, his other son died from a heart attack from misdiagnosis and his remaining son is ignored by government help with his treatable schizophrenia. That's astounding in itself with its horror but there is more to come. His daughter moved in with him after the events and will now file him as a sex offender if he does not release her inheritance right now.

- Mr. G. Lost his right to see his son after his ex-wife decreed he is a poor father. Although he is a respected doctor of good repute in the community with no record of any sort, he is hauled before a court to explain himself. His word is heard and there are agreeable nods all around. However, the result is that to prove he is a good father he must increase his support to his ex all the same. If not, then he will be hauled in to another court with more kangaroos.

- Mrs. L. fought tooth and nail to snare a man. He was flattered by her charms and forgot in his haze how his new love ridded her three opponents with social shame through lies and social networking. He was wealthy by his own enterprise, and after the divorce she scooped up forty two percent of his assets. Not bad after only three years of her hard work. She is now in the process of divorcing an even wealthier man as she racks up Mr. Three.

- Mr. K. Loved his wife of thirty one years and most of him died the night he found her on Facebook entwined with another man. He begged her to stay with him all the same, yet she threw him on the street with claims of violence and won his house eighteen months later.

- Mrs. V. Knew her time was up when she was caught fiddling the till in the family business. She pointed to the camera in her workplace and let the judge know she was oppressed and if in the workplace why not her home?

She walked free, got the house and the kids and a controlling share in the business.

[/unordered_list]

Five true stories seen firsthand from just one man and the upshot is not looking good.

One man is dead by suicide; one man is frantic on the work-treadmill while his son becomes estranged. One man dies every day when he wakes, and two women are fine, fit and happy in fucks, money and smiles. Not to worry, their new baby girls are safe because they are cut from the same cloth. (With a mother like her those kids don't have a chance, nor do the men in their futures as they waddle swirly eyed towards them with a shovel in their hand.)

The well off, the disenfranchised or the loving only, it makes no difference because it might be you, it might be that other guy next to you on the tram, the opera seat or dole queue. Diggers for gold know no colour, creed or status as the push of the spade is blind. It just digs for lodes of the stuff small as peas or big as beach balls.

If you are small of gold the spade is large, and if you are big of gold the spade is bigger. The rule is this:

The spade expands in equal proportion to your gold and always remains larger than it.

You'll need to be your own watcher in the crows-nest of the ship with your name on it, because I can swear it to you that those lovely sirens that surround you are not afraid, they are not sad or lonely or dumb with a spanner or a remote control handbook. When you open your wallet, watch out from all sides for the lipstick boring through the woodwork.

Watch out for the spade and know the face of it's wielder. They are a sophisticated and upgraded "Smart Phony" who'll cross the Rubicon to your heart and your mind to get your gold whatever the cost may be.

Edward Hargraves found gold in Bathurst, and you can bet your bippy that others are always looking for more. There's not much in the ground, but there's tons of the stuff walking on it.

Anywhere and everywhere, it's a junket of women perving at the glittery things on King Midas as he blinks in the light while he walks down the catwalk. Is this junket our own doing because we have accommodated it, and for that matter what can we do to stop it?

We all know the dissuasive power of accountability when there is mischief. Register-her. com is a flagship of this truism, and the fools that sail her page are forever bowed in frozen shame. I'm asking you now, should there be a Register-Gold-diggers dot com?

If you pause for an answer, ask yourself in that pause this question if you will: "Could I have swerved a bullet if I knew of such a thing beforehand?"

That's right. Could you? If not you, then what of the poor bastards yet to come ? Could we have done something to have helped good men already gouged for gold?

My heart hurts for them as they sit about in debtor cells maimed and numbed to a life misspent.

They are the chaps who look achingly in your eye begging for a tip as they deliver your pizza, and they are the blurred souls of men who pass you on the street with a focussed sadness we never know about. We know of these empty walking gold fields but is this you now, has it been you or will it be you or your son ? You are my brother, and this means these questions matter to me, and for all of us who care about the answers.

Political correctness in it's well pressed coat with two shiny rows of buttons will let you know with a lazy smile that the idea of a data base of known gold diggers is not the thing to do.

Shame on you PC, and I want to know the things you have given us with your handsome face and crisp manners that have brought happiness. Real and simple happiness. What are these things you have given us?

Edward Hargreaves found gold in Bathurst and he buckled at the knees in joy. If he saw us right now with our "hands free" world of wondrous devices, would he gasp at our collective uncertainty and fear?

I think he would. I also think he would be quite knocked over by a wonderful world accommodating one sex swirling the pans of another.

Dr. Greg Canning – Australian Corespondent for AVfM News

Robert O'Hara · 5 May 2012 · Archived copy · Original

[box icon="none"]

A Voice for Men News is delighted to add to its staff Dr. Greg Canning as Australian News Correspondent. Dr. Canning has already submitted two journalistic articles to A Voice for Men and as a clearly dedicated MRA who is deeply concerned with and vigilantly watches goings on in Australia; he was a natural choice. His medical expertise, nose for a good story and conviction will surely be of great value to AVFM and it's readers.

AVfM has very strong ties to Australia and I personally am very excited to see that MRAs there will be served well by Dr. Canning's work.

I would also like to take the opportunity with this announcement to encourage others to become correspondents for AVfM. Whether it is a particular geographical region or a particular news topic (politics, education, family law etc.) that you feel you could serve then please contact me and express your interest. I would like to someday see correspondents from all over taking just a little time every few weeks or so to produce an original story or just cover something that may not be adequately covered in the mainstream media.

The more we have participating here the better our news service will be and in turn our readership will increase and our activism will become more effective world wide. AVFM along with other MRA sites like Antimisandry, WMASAW, and many others have already demonstrated that our work has an impact and our activism has a bite.

Welcome to the team Dr. Canning!

Paul Elam · 6 May 2012 · Archived copy · Original

As the men's movement grows we will see the realization of many hopes and dreams for men, long denied an audience for their struggles. The first inklings of change have begun to sprout, and grow defiantly into the misandric landscape.

We see it in a news commentator who steps up and questions why men don't have reproductive rights. He even does so with a bit of an MRM chip on his shoulder. We also see it from the likes of Dr. Keith Ablow, who stands against the current tide that justifies the rape and abuse of schoolboys. His article on Adam Sandler's latest film was so good that by the time I was done I was nodding my head and doing a short fist pump here in front of my computer.

Damned right, fuck Adam Sandler and his fucked up disgrace of a movie. He will never see another nickle of my money.

As the movement proliferates we are going to see a lot more of these things, from a lot more people. Unfortunately, as we grow and become powerful, there will also be attempts to co-opt our message. And I don't mean with lame and transparent attempts by places like the Good Men Project. I mean serious, professional attempts to take ownership of the work we have done and to push it forward on an agenda that we have nothing to do with.

It will be a battle that drags in the left and right, my friends, and I write to you today because it is coming. Make no mistake about it.

I have attempted, with a good deal of success, I think, to avoid, circumvent, dissuade from and eschew involvement in the modern left-right paradigm. I intend to continue on that path as much as possible, but we are at the point in time when it is important to include this in our regular discussions, and to open the floor to our ranks of writers and commenters to add to the discourse.

That being said, allow me to make some clarification on my personal take on politics and the MRM. Hopefully, you will add to this dialogue with your own thoughts. As I said, we are approaching a crossroads where we will be challenged to keep this movement in our own hands.

To begin the discussion I will invoke our brother Bernard Chapin who regularly puts forth the idea that we make a mistake by not seeing men's rights as a left-right issue. And I am here to state my fundamental agreement with that position, albeit with what I think are significant caveats and qualifiers.

The primary of the caveats is that we must remember that left and right has very little to do with Democrat and Republican, something I am quite sure Bernard has stated, and I support. It has more to do with conservative vs. liberal, but even that must be qualified.

In my opinion, there is no Democrat and Republican any more. All one has to do for verification is look at the glove-like fit of the anti-freedom, pro-imperialist policies of thievery from the American people on behalf of Wall Street conducted by both the Bush and Obama administrations. Bush shredded our constitution and doused it with gasoline. Obama stepped in and tossed a lit match on the pile.

Change? My ass.

All of this was done to benefit multinational corporations and a very corrupt group of the powerful elites. We should never be deluded into thinking anything else, particularly where it concerns men's issues. This is important because we must always make ourselves remember that feminist governance, which is what both Republicans and Democrats have created, depends on the grunt labor of uneducated, disenfranchised men. They need us economically, and they need us to maintain the infrastructure because women can't or won't.

It is tempting to believe another picture. Recently 31 Republicans voted in a failed effort, to reject the reauthorization of VAWA. The Republican Governor of Wisconsin repealed that states "Equal" Pay Law.

Republican Ted Poe opined that VAWA should be written in sex neutral language. There are other things happening, many of which have been reported on by AVfM News Director Bob O'Hara and his partner at AVfM News and Activism, James Huff. It is all encouraging and refreshing.

But a closer examination of what is happening clarifies the picture. Some of the opposition to reauthorizing VAWA was not for the right reasons. In fact, it was for the most directly of wrong reasons. Objecting to VAWA because the new version includes provisions for our gay brothers does not cut it. I mean, I will tacitly accept any opposition to VAWA that I can get, but it is imperative that we remember that this "opposition" is misandric. It is an artifact of closed minded and hateful traditionalism. And of course it did little or nothing to slow down the VAWA march, largely because the Republicans have still failed to attack all the things that are wrong with that horrific piece of elitist, statist legislation that robs people of both money and freedom.

They still voted the son-of-a-bitch in.

And that pretty much sums up the "Right" in this country, in their current incarnation. They are not conservatives. For the most part what they are is a Mafioso of fundamentalists and pro corporate, consumerist ideologues. These are people that pay lip service to small government while doing everything thing they can to further government intrusion into marriage, personal sexual lifestyle and anywhere else their religious and political beliefs lead them.

If anyone thinks they are friendly to men and boys, they better think again.

And of course on the left, things only get worse.

I know, there are many great men who feel aligned with the political left that frequent this website. But my message to them is the same message as it is to the men who identify with the so called right. Prove that you support men and boys rather than your political chosen ones.

Men on the right should, in my opinion, be calling out the whores that have taken over the Republican Party and destroyed conservative values while they did it. Yes, that is right, the whores that have destroyed conservative values. Whores like George Bush, Bush Senior, Ronald Regan (who ushered in no-fault divorce); whores like Sara Palin, Mitt Romney and every other misandric lout that has supported feminist governance, sacrificing any notion of small government and personal freedom.

These people don't offer hope for men's rights. These people are the very ones in the way.

The other problem, of course, is the so called left; big government fear-mongers whose stock-in-trade is division politics, particularly where it divides women against men, and where it involves forcing the population to cough up the cash for their Utopian bullshit schemes. They are the proverbial big tit that gender feminists suckle on, which of course makes you the actual boob, as long as you are paying for it. The money sure as hell isn't coming from the likes of Barbara Boxer.

It may seem a bit contradictory. I am at once equally chastising and dismissing the political left and right, and also agreeing with Bernard Chapin that the answers to this are to be found with conservatism, in a left-right paradigm.

The problem is in finding real conservatives, and I don't see any Republicans that fit the bill. Well, there is Barry Goldwater, but in his current condition he won't do the party much good.

By the way, I should take somewhat of a side road to address some of the people I am pissing off here. If you are a left leaning individual, and you support men's rights but are tiring of people taking shots at the left and blaming them for feminism, then I can only suggest that you take that to the feminist source in your own camp. The people you have voted for are the problem. You may like the idea of National Healthcare. Do you like it so much that you will vote for misandrists like Obama and Biden again, knowing full well that all the "care" will be delivered to women at the expense of sick men and boys?

If so, I respectfully suggest calling yourself something other than an MRA (brainwashed asshole comes to mind), but it is just an opinion. Maybe you could put down the Foucault long enough figure out that bringing men's rights to the modern political left is like bringing multiculturalism to the Aryan Nation. And if you don't want to hear that, please take a couple more red pills.

The same goes for the right. Even with all the "encouraging" developments of late, the modern political right is about as helpful to men and boys as Andrea Dworkin.

Find me a piece of misandrist legislation that was voted down by the right.

Just one will do.

(insert sound of crickets chirping here)

(insert more crickets here)

The fact is, from no-fault divorce, to VAWA, to primary aggressor laws, to mandatory arrest policies, to rape shield laws, the so called conservative right has been either a happily willing partner with the left, or a gutless, spineless conglomeration of quislings, rubber stamping every bucket of anti-male bilge that the left has served up for the past 50 years.

Recent events do not change that. No, not one little bit.

Here's why. I am sure many of you have noticed, as I alluded to in the start of this article, that the so-called right has recently included some very MRMish language to its dialogue. More and more anti-feminist voices have made themselves heard. But again, two points. One, what have they voted for? Sorry, but what they voted for was more VAWA; more of the same. And a close examination of the 31 who voted against VAWA won't net you a single red pill politician.

Where were these people when the "Dear Colleague" letter was released? I tell you where they were; the fucking cowards were hiding in dark rooms while a lone Wall Street Journal writer spoke the truth. Fuck them, and the elephant they rode in on. If you want to vote for one of these gutless wonders, feel free to use the alternative to MRA I have suggested for the left.

Those voices who did manage to emerge in opposition were those generally pushing for a traditionalist paradigm. You know that one, don't you? That's the good folks who want you and your sons in Afghanistan, on a leash in family courts, and keeping your mouth shut while universities strip the skin off innocent young men and call it social progress.

As this movement grows, which is unstoppable at this point, the cowards and whores from both sides of the fence will start to clamor for our approval.

Don't give it to them.

Bernard Chapin is right. Conservative values are the answer to our problems. The problem is that there are no real conservatives to help our cause in the mainstream. There are not even very many people that understand what conservatism really is.

Conservatism is not pro heterosexuality, pro marriage, pro Christian, pro war or pro Wall Street. It is purely and simply pro individual freedom. Being pro freedom it is by necessity against big, intrusive government, a real world evil that now has the support of the so called right as much as it does the left.

I think it is critical for MRA's to understand this and act accordingly. Any allegiance we hold to partisan politics muddies our understanding of the real issues. In fact, it makes us part of the problem, and it has us in the role of useful idiots for whatever side of the partisan fence we choose to call home.

As a conservative, a real one, like I think Bernard Chapin to be, I believe that real conservative values are the answer to feminism. Small, weak government, minimal intrusion into our private lives; no funding of identity politics; no allowance of ideological agendas; no preemptive wars, no imperialism, period.

Feminism cannot survive without government guns and money. If you pulled the voraciously sucking lips of feminists off the government tit right now, they would all emaciate and die in short order.

I know, that tips my hand as a Libertarian plainly enough, but I am not wed to them as a party. I would vote for a pig with polka dots if it would shut down a federal department or two. Right now, they are the only ones even talking about it.

Part of taking the red pill, in my opinion, is that a sufficient dose will pull off the blinders completely. The result is that we see the truth about men and women, but also about government, academe, the social strata and the plethora of other lies that now make the meat of potatoes of the western diet.

What we once thought of as left and right actually did constitute two groups of philosophically opposed populations; one thinking that the government was the answer to all problems, one thinking that government was the source of all problems.

If you think things are that way now, please set your watch ahead 50 years to 2012. All we have now is two crime families competing with each other to extract blood and money from men and boys, pass it along to women and girls, while skimming their cut off the top.

When they come courting you in the future, and they will, I say give them nothing. Don't let them use you to further their agenda while diluting ours.

Or you can put them to a litmus test. Look at their voting record. All of it. And remember, if it looks and smells like a pig, it probably is.

The daughter he found

Jeffery M. Leving · 6 May 2012 · Archived copy · Original

A thin pasty-faced tattooed teen-aged girl knocked on Ed Green's Salt Lake City, Utah, condo door one day a couple of springs ago. She looked strung-out and exhausted and burst into tears the moment she opened her mouth and sputtered, "You're my father." Much to Ed's surprise, the image of a girl he'd had a somewhat casual relationship with in college came back to him. Her eyes the same steel blue as the tattooed girl's. Immediately he wondered, why had the girl he'd slept with in college never told him she was pregnant and that she'd given birth to their daughter? Over the next few hours he learned the tragic story of his daughter and the tumultuous life she'd lead since her birth. After giving birth, her mother realized she didn't really want to have a baby and half-heartedly mothered her until she put her up for adoption as a toddler. Her adoption family broke up and she was thrust into bouts of poverty and depression and early experimentation with hard drugs and left with an overwhelmingly constant feeling of abandonment and rejection.

A bit shocked but full of paternal love and desire to be the father Tiffany wanted and deserved, Ed welcomed Tiffany into his world with open arms. She moved into Ed's condo and almost immediately bonded with Ed's mother and 12 year-old daughter. By the following fall she was enrolled in her first semester at community college and thriving. While on the one hand Ed was thrilled and grateful he could fill a void and have some positive influence on Tiffany's life, he was also angry and hurt that Tiffany's mother could have given birth to his baby and put her up for adoption without legally having to notify him. It took him awhile to let go of the idea that if only he'd known about Tiffany from the beginning, her childhood would have been less traumatic.

However, even if Ed had known that Tiffany's mother was pregnant and wanted to put Tiffany up for adoption, Ed would have had to jump through impossible hoops to assert any rights to decisions regarding his daughter. In fact, Utah has become to go-to state for pregnant women who want to exclude biological fathers from the decision making process.

In the state of Utah a birth mother may consent to an adoption or relinquish an infant after giving birth. She does not need the consent of the unmarried father unless he has done the following: filed a petition to establish paternity in a Utah court with an affidavit stating he is "willing and able" to have full custody and will pay child support, pregnancy-related and childbirth expenses (it also must detail a plan for the child's care); filed a "notice of commencement of paternity proceeding" with the Office of Vital Statistics; and has offered to pay for a reasonable share of the mother's pregnancy-related and childbirth expenses, unless he is able to show he did not know about the pregnancy, or was prevented from paying the expenses, or the mother refused his offer to pay.

Under Utah's law Ed would not even be entitled to notice of the mother's proceedings unless he complies with the above as an unmarried biological father. By virtue of the fact that he is engaged in a sexual relationship with a woman, a man is considered on notice that a pregnancy and adoption proceeding regarding the child may occur. Utah imposes upon the father a duty to protect his own rights and interests.

This is archaic and sexist and heartless and downright ridiculous. Just because a man doesn't have a uterus doesn't mean he doesn't care about what happens to his biological offspring. Just ask Ed Green who, two years after reuniting with his long-lost daughter, Tiffany, still shakes and shudders when he thinks about all the years Tiffany lived feeling abandoned, without knowing her father was more than willing to love and nurture her.

The voices of men

James Huff · 7 May 2012 · Archived copy · Original

It has long come to my attention that there are major differences in the minds of those who would depose a gynocentric culture with one whose tenants are based upon personal accountability, individual merit, and individual freedoms. As I speak these words, there is evidence enough of the discontent in the hearts of men, that they have been stripped of liberty, of love, of joy, of family, of personal property, and even their lives by systematic abuses of a government system that uses men as chattel and women to breed more chattel. Regardless of the proposed paths to freedom, it is exactly that which binds us in total; a passion to claim for the first time in history a separation of our definition as men from the expectations of the flawed and corrupted system under which we are ruled.

I have stared around in wonder as a blind man who sees for the first time, and have found want in every corner of men's hearts for something greater than they are given. It is not the want of greed but the want of necessity for survival of our minds and hearts where we see a world cold to us as empty space. It is not the want of ease and comfort given by others but the want of the means to pursue an honest days labor and to pursue the fulfilling of individual dreams through our own volition, without fear of it being smashed beneath the feet of jealous interlopers or stolen by the coercive force of a state gone mad with power.

That we share these things in common, in the NOW of our shared experiences with the empirical evidence that validates these experiences as being beyond subjective speaks volumes. We may claim legitimacy of our experiences as objective, as we have proven our case by the standards of "beyond a reasonable doubt" based upon the empirical evidence. We have seen reams of studies, of collected data by government agencies, of correlations of this data across almost every nation on the planet, regardless of the system of economics or the system of government.

We have seen the same patterns of evidence repeated regardless of faith or the lack thereof. We have witnessed it ourselves in the streets, in our schools, in our place of work, in our homes, and in our media. There is no more denying the truth of our collective enslavement to a vile model of our relationships with one another, and a definition of ourselves as truly free under the current system of gendered politics is as laughable as squeezing blood from a stone.

We have long argued the history and the histrionics of gendered politics through antiquity for thousands of years. Yesterday's collected knowledge and contemporary art has given way to today's knowledge and contemporary art with regard to the relationships between the sexes with nary a smidgeon of difference except in the complication of the theory of "Why?"

We argue such theory because the answer might give a solution to the problem of "What now?" – or at the very least, convince others who personally relate the newest theory to their own political view or personal experience as a reason to agree with the assessment of what should clearly be the evidence of the issues "Right now." It does not alter the objective truths that we can plainly see in front of our eyes. Dividing the issues into theories that appeal to paradigms of Morality vs. Immorality, Faith vs. Atheism, Science vs. Mysticallity, or any other conceivable subdivision does not alter the fact that we can no longer sustain the present condition and that suffering is the at the end of inaction.

Suffering is at the end of inaction.

Suffering is at the end of inaction.

To the action we have addressed our various forms of solution, but it is tainted with regard to theory. By that I mean I could compile a long list of proposals and that only one would appeal to an individual, and the rest shunned because of the implications of the end result of those other actions, their consequences to far across the dividing line of whatever moral code the individual ascribes to. Even the idea of doing nothing appeals to some, for the sake of evil, as some people just want to watch the world burn itself to ashes, or want to become masters of humans, or prop up a corrupt system for monetary benefit.

I am therefore addressing those whose interests lay within certain forms of actions that can be described as non-aggressive and non-violent in nature, and who want to see truly free men redefined away from the corrupt standards of gendered politics and statist intervention in personal affairs. I am speaking specifically to those who will listen to reasoned argument and may be swayed by it to work as individuals toward a common goal.

I am in essence, asking for activism.

I am, in fact, asking that we place down our theories and our own inaction and attempt to raise our voices in unison.

We have honed our words to sharp points over the years, and the debate that should not have to be debated has begun to fall upon the ears of the masses. The very real physical threats to personal liberties have been noted by a growing portion of the population, and this from all corners of the political and theist spectrum. Discontent flares higher on all sides as the means to financially sustain the weight of an entitlement culture begin to strike Western Cultures in total. An increase in gynocentric political power systems is happening at an alarming rate in many other countries as well.

Old models of gynocentrism that were previously only social and cultural are being inflated and institutionalized within the laws of many less developed countries, and the resultant effects have an even more odious effect on the direct liberty of men trying to stay out of reach of the new police states being formed right now. Of this we have ample evidence, and I will not bore you with further detail as would insult the facts you already know, but to say that these things are now being talked about more regularly in the context of peaceful civil disobedience to the human farmers who care a not a whit for the men they enslave.

Know that we have the capacity to alter things. By choice we can adapt lifestyles that free us from many of the obligations of gendered politics and the state, and that while often described Men Going Their Way, being vocal about such action as you may take in this direction is just as powerful a force as rubbing a dog's nose in its own feces. Being vocal about it is a form of activism, and the decibel at which you get the message across can be as soft as talking to a friend or as loud as going on the airwaves and talking to thousands.

This takes the idea of MGTOW away from a personal form of safety in this stormy sea of gynocentism and actually offers it as viable solution to others, especially when framed in the context of self-actualization and self-improvement. I offer a gentle reminder who practice this lifestyle and wish to speak of it openly that It does not require the disparagement of the opposite sex, or complex theories to describe whether or not the actions of men and women are caused by nature or nurture. MGTOW stands as the basis for a lifestyle that allows men to find self-fulfillment without having to be angry or bitter and it can stand alone as a project of love instead of anger. It defines itself by the individual!

Those who become activist MGTOW can move the discussion into the realm of the MRA without necessarily addressing every issue, or at least with a minimum of effort. Being MGTOW and being an activist are compatible in this sense. It represents a surefire way to deprive the government of all kinds of taxes, and literally shuts down the current gendered politics paradigm on a significant level if done in mass.

To those who describe themselves as MRA's I can say that I have seen just about every variation out there. There seems to be even more diversity in ways and means than MGTOW if only for the fact that they are often more inclusive of both sexes in their personal lives. This provides neither benefit nor hindrance to the MRA. I must stress that by definition an MRA actively advocates on behalf of the issues. We will find them performing nearly every type of non-violent activism out there.

I will not list these individual actions except to say that will be plenty of time to examine each one in future discussions. There are some who may call themselves an MRA who have not fully grasped that they must do something more than speak into a vacuum on the many chat-rooms or forums dedicated for such. Such as it is MRAs should not be blinded by the hatred spewed upon them by a gynocentist culture, but should be wary nonetheless and stand strictly on the merits of individuals before including or calling others by the same title. There is a reason why most MRAs are actually vetted in some social circles. While we respect diversity and differing opinions, there are a few actions that are inimical to any movement based upon principles of non-aggression and non-violence, and any so-called MRA who displays violence should be disavowed immediately.

Then there are the rest. By "the rest" I mean those of you who will not define themselves as MGTOW or MRA, but who will stand upon the issues in the light of either or both groups. Here is where I look right now for our next great charge. You are the individuals who outnumber us ten to one, or a thousand to one. You are the silent ones, the ones in the shadow of a corrupted system of sexist politics who really do not feel as if they have the strength to walk beyond day to day survival. Perhaps even with the understanding of what is happening you are thinking, "I am only one.", or "I could lose everything if I speak out." Perhaps it is something as simple as not rocking the boat because you are in that struggle for custody in a divorce, or you are trying to renegotiate child support payments because of layoffs in a recession. Perhaps you are the abused one in a relationship, and fear that speaking out will result in further abuse not only by your partner, but by state coercion at the point of a gun.

I argue that continuing to be silent only enforces your own slavery. I argue that continuing to be silent only consolidates the loss of human dignity and allows the leash to be tightened even further upon your neck. I argue that continued silence will effect your children and your children's children beyond the point that you may be able to reach them, beyond the point meaning their eventual indoctrination in our schools, their own pain as they repeat the cycle of gynocentric violence enforced through the state, the eventual dissolution of individuality as they become just another number, their reliance upon the opiate of the masses to keep them compliant even in their pain, and the remanding of the product of their own labor to be redistributed to those who abuse state power. And ultimately the final slap in the face as they look back and say "What did you do? You had the power to say something when it was the most important time to do it! Why did you sell me into slavery?"

Can you look into the eyes of a child, any child, even if it not your own and imagine answering that question? Is soothing the pain you feel in your own life by going along with this miserable facade worth the price that must be paid in future generations because of your inaction?

The time is NOW. The time has come. We must call out in unison while these issues are rising in the consciousness of mankind. We must lift our voices into the streets. We must hold our freedom, our dignity, our hope before all humankind….and we above all…we must be willing to love our fellow man enough to give us the strength to do it!

Tonight, on the fourth edition of AVFM News and Activism, we will be featuring University of Mississippi student and MRA Ben Robinson. Ben has made a name for himself on YouTube under the names Helperdogfromhell and ConnectingRod911 where he reported stunning examples of misandry at his school including videos about the Clothesline Project and more recently the Walk a Mile in Her Shoes event. Ben was instrumental in helping AVFM report on the Walk a Mile in Her Shoes event by giving us first hand accounts and providing valuable information that helped us expose the avarice nature of the schools Office of Sexual Assault.

Robinson, a senior engineering student at MSU, has come under personal attack for being outspoken against the misandry on campus and has been noted by many as a prime example of a one man show when it comes to Men's Rights activism. We hope that his appearance on our show will encourage other student MRAs to engage in similar activism on their own campuses.

He will be answering our questions and yours so do call in at (310) 388-9709 . Showtime is 9pm eastern 8pm central and as usual we will be featuring news and commentary before the interview.

False allegations of rape – 1925

Robert St. Estephe · 8 May 2012 · Archived copy · Original

Publishers note: Recently Robert St. Estephe, publisher of the blog Unknown History of Misandry, and author of the now iconic piece of MRM literature, "Setting the Record Straight," joined the ranks of AVfM contributors.

St. Estephe's command of history and research skills are so masterful and compelling that I was forced to ask his permission to run a regular feature on this site presenting his work. This first one on false allegations is a great example to start with.

Pierce Harlan and E. Steven Berkimer have, as a team, forced a dialogue about false allegations into mainstream discussions. Their brilliant work is a badly needed and courageous exposure of modern realities. But the problem of false allegations is something that predates all of our lives. It just took someone like St. Estephe to excavate the information from our Unknown History in order to prove it.

With that, gents and ladies, I give you the first installment from UH of M; a kick off of sorts, bringing Robert's great contributions to your very deserving eyes. Many thanks to Robert St. Estephe for adding yet another valuable feature to the pages of AVfM. – PE

Bill Against False Rape Accusations & Sexual Blackmail – 1925

FULL TEXT (Article 1 of 2): Madison, Wis., Apr. 1. — Equal rights for men is sought in a bill landing in the Wisconsin legislature which seeks to save males from the lure of blackmailing women.

Senator [Max] Heck, Racine, introduced a bill to amend the Wisconsin rape statute to bar uncorroborated testimony of women in criminal assault cases. "It is time men be accorded equal rights with women before the law," advocates of the bill said. "Women of today are no longer without protection. They can vote, wear trousers, do anything a man can do. And they have one immense advantage over men. The unsubstantiated evidence of a woman in court can put a man behind the bars."

The handicap is too great. Senator J. L. Barber, a physician, believes. Shrewd women can outwit the law by defects in the criminal code, Barber holds. Women are doing it every day. It is time this form of blackmail is stopped.

Barber came out in support of the bill, following its endorsement by the Wisconsin Judges association. "I can cite instances where women practicing their wiles on unsuspecting young men have lured them into the trap and then swindled them on the threat of court action. There is only one alternative in such a predicament. The man always pays. He hasn't got a chance in court; where a woman's word counts for everything. I personally know of young men now serving prison terms who were 'framed' on a woman's perjured testimony."

"These cases are all too common should say thousands of instances of out and out blackmail, engineered by a woman's cunning, occur yearly throughout the country. The world hears nothing about them. We want to put a stop to the practice in Wisconsin."

FULL TEXT (Article 2 of 2): Madison, Wis.—The senate has voted to scrap the equal rights bill designed to safeguard the manhood of Wisconsin from sex blackmail on the unsupported testimony of girls under 18 years of age. A violent wrangle between Senators Barber, Marathon, and Ben Gettleman, Milwaukee, proceeded the 17-10 roll call by which the bill was indefinitely postponed.

Senator A. K. Carey, Edgerton, who voted for the bill, changed his vote at the last moment. He announced he will move [for] reconsideration.

~ Gettelman Attacks Bill ~

Gettelman opened the debate with an impassioned attack on the measure, which he asserted would leave the young girls of the state without adequate protection against sex crimes.

“Direct supporting evidence in criminal intimacy cases is always difficult to obtain,” Gettleman declared. This bill would make conviction under the statutory rape law almost impossible.”

“This bill would put a stop to a species of blackmail from which male victims have no recourse,” Senator Quick stated. “Sex charges made by a girl of 16 or 17 against man, young or old, are easy to make, but hard to disprove. When a jury has to take the man’s word against that of a girl. 99 times out of 100 the man is convicted, innocent or guilty.”

~ Have Sentimental Appeal ~

“Whenever legislation is proposed to bring human relations up to a more equitable standard, always you have this poisonous sentimental appeal, which has been used against this measure.”

Senator Barber, whose veiled thrusts at Gettleman provoked the Milwaukee wet leader* to a frenzy, eulogized the bill as correcting a situation he described as “a crime against civilization.”* [“wet leader” refers to a politician opposed to alcohol prohibition.]

Clementine Ford calling fellow feminists stupid

John Hembling (JtO) · 8 May 2012 · Archived copy · Original

Clementine Ford is writer for the Australian online magazine Dailylife.com.au, who, on May 1, 2012, published a scorching indictment of the populist doctrine of feminism. In fact, her article addressing that ideology was so grievously misleading that by now, a week later, feminists around the world almost certainly have the Aussie columnist at the top of their list of enemies.

Ford's opening premise is that feminists and women are the same thing, based on the assumed claim that opposition or criticism of that ideology is, by definition, hatred of women (misogyny being the name for hatred of human beings based on their sexual identity as women or girls). Obviously, feminism is more than just an up-with-girls club, indeed, feminists are known to frequently remind critics that in spite of the ideology's name, it is actually a humanist movement. In fact, after more than 60 years of feminism's pre-eminence in our cultural zeitgeist, men victimized by unjust cultural demands on them benefit from feminism as well. Indeed, men whose female-governed sexual identity requires them to act as disposable protectors and providers or men who are raped but denied any resource because the definition of rape excludes men or men targeted by the majority of criminal violence, well, feminism helps these men too. Or it will, soon. Any day now.

Obviously Ford's implication that feminism and women are interchangeable synonyms is no more insulting to real feminists than her facile implication that criticism or disagreement with the ideology has no possible source except hatred towards women and lies. This trope, if feminists were actually foolish enough to swallow it, would suggest that they are too intellectually weak to address an argument or a criticism. What does Clementine Ford think you are, moronic children who cannot think or speak for themselves? Apparently so, as her rhetoric suggests that counter arguments from anyone outside the Feminist reserve are all simply lies built on hatred and thus feminists need not even consider them, or address criticism with anything except accusations of hatred. "You just hate women, so I'm not listening! La la la la la la!".

How weak and intellectually vacant feminists must be in Ford's mind to need such rhetorical mummery. The pretence that feminism itself is the only true point of view and that therefore oppositional argument must be both hateful and false is offered by Ford as a magic shield to protect those whom the Australian writer regards as infants so feeble minded that they need not think for themselves or address a differing opinion. Surely no other criticism of feminist ideology could be as demeaning as this.

Ford then cements her characterization of feminists as mental weaklings by portraying her version of what non-feminists might offer as criticism. Whoops, not "not-feminists", since that implies differing points of view can have legitimacy, ha! Rather, Clementine Ford provides a series of caricatures of arguments, protecting her fragile readers from the real hatred of these tropes if encountered in the wild. Just remember children, all differing opinion is false and built on misogyny, but Clementine will be your filter and your shield. I'm paraphrasing Ford's wording, which is actually as follows:

"If you're not trained in the spotting of smug, self-satisfied misogynists, you might not know the general thrust of their shtick. Luckily for you, I've become somewhat of an expert in the field since they all started following me on Twitter. So to help novices and outsiders, I've taken the following five popular misogynist arguments and parsed them into some kind of legible (if not logical) format for your benefit"

[/box]
Straw-man number one.
If you want to see real oppression, go to the Middle East.

This might be an argument made by critics of feminism somewhere, sometime, but if so, it's surely not common. As an actual critic of feminist ideology (as opposed to Clementine Ford's imaginary woman-hating critics) I've written critically about feminist doctrine for years without encountering the argument at the top of Ford's list as a criticism of feminism. In fact, while some hawkish and nationalistic politicians sometimes refer to the poor status of women in Islamic nations, a strong argument exists asserting that the Western perception of women as oppressed in Islam is a distorted and deeply mistaken point of view, based on ignorance.

Straw-man number two.

How can women expect us to respect them when they won't respect themselves?

Ford is talking about the standard come-here-go-away game of sexualized feminine attire and attention seeking behavior, coupled with the socially normal climate of automatic male rejection. In spite of claims to the contrary, sexualized feminine attire is worn to attract positive male sexual attention. This attention isn't expected or in most cases allowed to be expressed, at least not without men jumping through the usual hoops of female approval through demonstrations of utility, wealth or other female-benefiting traits. However, Ford manages to recycle the absurd claim that expressed opinion to attention-demanding feminine attire denotes assumptions of male ownership of women. The reality being that women in semi-undress, alcohol-lubricated or otherwise sexually charged environments routinely shove themselves into men's faces and personal space; and social convention holds women doing this exempt and untouchable except to the exact degree individual women want. Men who modeled identical behavior towards women would be arrested and subject to immediate retribution from socially conformist males.

Ford's characterization, along with its absurd claim of assumed male ownership, also refers back to caricatures of foreign perceptions. "When Sheik Taj Aldin Alhilali compared scantily clad women to uncovered meat, we were rightly outraged."

The senior Muslim cleric comment's during a sermon in 2006 were delivered in Arabic, but translated to English as: "If you take out uncovered meat and place it outside on the street, or in the garden or in the park, or in the backyard without a cover, and the animals come and eat it, whose fault is it, the animals or the uncovered meat?"

Of course the reading projected onto this statement, that women are the owned commodity of men (like uncovered meat at a picnic), is claimed by Ford, who obviously imagines feminists as self-victimizing tyrants, demanding the pseudo-privilege of permanent victim identity. Ford, in her quotation of the Muslim cleric, manages to omit the comparison of men to animals drawn to uncovered meat. The animals in this analogy don't own the meat; they are simply drawn by appetite and instinct to eat it, unencumbered by the intellect or socialization which we assume men have, in spite of them being so obviously inferior.

In fact, a 2008 Islamic advertisement for the benefits of traditional Hijabi attire used a photograph of a lollypop with and without its paper wrapper to symbolize women in concealing versus revealing attire.

In much the same way as the cleric, this metaphor is obvious in its message. Women are people of value, and men are dirty animals or in the case of the lollypop image, flies. This isn't a question of ownership, but of the relative humanity and value of sexual demographics. Ford's inverted mischaracterization trades on the assumption that feminists are so passively uninformed and mentally vacant that the characterization of men as animals and women as something to be protected from those animals will be lost on her audience. Ford does stumble briefly onto the truth in a commentary which skirts within a hair of self satire when she says: "The fact that we criticize other cultures for it doesn't make us champions of women – it makes us both sexist AND racist."

Straw-man number three.

Stop criticizing domestic servitude! Some women are proud to look after their families.

Admittedly, Clementine Ford almost stumped me with this one.

According to Ford: "Some women are proud to look after their families". Well, maybe they are, but that isn't really the point. Women who stay at home in the context of a marriage are there because they choose to be. Of course any mention of choice puts this entire discussion, along with me, in the "to-be-discredited" trash-bin of misogyny, the hatred of women. Yes, according to Ford, mentioning the fact that women, like other citizens in Western nations are people who make choices about their own lives – that makes my opinion void and me a hater of women. Therefore, if you're a feminist, don't even keep reading, just tell yourself all this discussion is merely a thin veil disguising a deep hatred of women and you won't have to trouble your pretty little head to consider any single word of it.

Stated flatly: women control their own reproduction. They have the legal rights as well as the medical technology through dozens of birth control techniques to do so. If a woman has a child, it is by her own choice. Men, by contrast, have access to condoms; a pretty-good technology to prevent pregnancy but not foolproof. However, men generally have no legal rights over reproduction, whatever a woman decides, a man must abide by, and in the event of a pregnancy, he must pay. The idea that a woman in a marriage is somehow there at the behest or under the enforced will of a man is flatly absurd. In fact, in marriage as well as in reproduction, women are in charge. Marriage is a three way business relationship between a woman, a man, and a government. The woman can exit that relationship whenever she wants, while forcing the man to remain locked in, paying her. The state acts as her enforcer, taking a percentage of the payments. To pretend otherwise, that women are somehow oppressed by such an arrangement, into which they enter and exit freely without coercion, is to indulge in absurd fantasy.

However, after claiming that anyone pointing out female choice is obviously a misogynist, Ford admits the truth of that claim herself. "The thing is, women can choose those things if they want to." Goes on to call herself tedious and then imputes motive and argument to feminism's critics, by saying "But the fact is, these people aren't advocating for or defending a range of choices." Of course they're not, if they were, then Clementine's readers might be motivated to consider some arguments from outside feminism's big-top and that would be just too much for those poor little darlings. Clementine Ford will tell you what the bad people are saying, so there's no need to look elsewhere.

But how does Ford know that no such arguments are being made?
"Because if they were, we wouldn't even be having this conversation."

This translates loosely to: "trust me".

Straw-man number four.

"It's a science thing."
"Look, men and women are built differently. It's biological. Men are more visual, women are more emotional. That's why more men are in executive roles. It's about merit. If women were better, they wouldn't be so crap. I didn't make the rules."

Like all effective lies, this one is salted with the truth. Men and women are indeed built differently. This is why fitness standards are being lowered all over the world in fire-fighting, police, and military entry requirements to accommodate female applicants. However, the reason for the much-evangelized wage gap isn't capability or male-favoring sexism, it's choices made by women.

While it has been historically true that men, on average, earned more during their lifetimes that women earned, on average, during their lifetimes, this has been repeatedly and fraudulently interpreted to indicate a culture of male-female job parity and pay disparity. This interpretation has been repeatedly and exhaustively debunked.[1][2][3][4] The lifetime earning difference reflects differing choices made by women and men, in which (on average), preference for more flexible, safer, and less demanding careers translate to lower lifetime earnings.

In addition, in spite of the real statistical lower earnings of women, they still manage to control the spending of 80% of disposable income worldwide. But Clementine Ford omits this, because to her, feminists are simple, innocent creatures to be sheltered from complex reality and spoon fed a simple narrative of their ongoing victimhood. The assumption by Ford of her audience's childish stupidity is breathtaking in its condescension and insult.

Straw-man number five.
Men are oppressed too, therefore women aren't! Or something.

“If feminists really cared about equality, they’d be addressing all the inequality that faces men. Like, why do feminists only care about breast cancer and not prostate cancer? Why aren’t feminists advocating for single dads? Why won’t women sleep with me when I’m a really nice guy and I’ve made a particular effort to be nice to them, particularly? Until feminism can answer that, I’m afraid I don’t really see it as being legitimate.”

Ford skirts just close enough to the truth here to dismiss it, but gives herself away with an absurd reference to a “nice-guys” apocryphal inability to get laid.

Ford also paints feminists as a culturally dominant movement of quite breathtaking cruelty and inhumanity by suggesting that feminist driven fundraising for female-specific cancers deliberately displaces and excludes male-specific cancer fundraising. This would be a shocking indictment of a so-called humanist movement if it were true. If, for example – in a male dominated professional sport, organized medical fundraising events omitted male-specific cancers and committed the all male athletes in a professional sporting league to breast cancer – that would be monstrously cruel. It would almost require a view of those male athletes as not even human beings worth consideration for male-specific cancer fund-raising.

Ford also suggests that feminists are cavalier and indifferent to the pain of fathers stripped from their families by a monetized family court system, then garnished of income while held legally away from their own children. The Australian writer portrays feminism as a movement indifferent to the fact that men’s suicide rate, already 4 times higher than women’s, jumps to 10 times higher after divorce. Clementine Ford’s portrayal is of feminists so openly contemptuous of human suffering that her article used a graphic of a laughing cartoon face in answer to a hypothetical argument for the concerns of males in a feminist society.

Should feminism, the movement claiming that women’s recognition as human beings is a radical notion give any concern for men’s on the job death rate (93%)? Should feminists care that in a patriarchy, women outlive men by 5-7 years? Should feminists be concerned about increasing displacement of men in a feminized higher education system?

According to Clementine Ford: “Ha-ha! Ha-ha! Ha-ha! No.”

So, according to Clementine Ford: her feminist readers are callous, indifferent to suffering not their own, small minded, feeble of intellect, and should be sheltered from any real argument outside their own ideology. A set of flimsy straw-man arguments are supplied by her in place of possible encounters by actual feminists with any real oppositional argument. Obviously, Ford’s characterization of feminist ideology and its proponents cannot possibly be true, because if it were, after 60 years of pre-eminence the world would recognize feminism as a doctrine of self-absorbed female supremacy, fabricated victimhood and totalitarian, narrow-visioned female self interest. The advocates and proponents of such an ideology would be widely recognized as vile, cruel and selfish children.

As an opponent of this ideology, I know that the Australian writer must be mistaken, because feminism is now and always has been a movement seeking “equality” and which posits that women being people was once a radical notion.

As a left-leaning MRA, I've noticed that some men active in the movement continue to cast the issue of human rights of men and boys as a left versus right political debate.

It is certainly true that collectivist doctrines, like termite mounds, find ideological support from the philosophy of the political left. It is also true that small government, personal liberty and the human rights of individuals (rather than collectives) are ideas found in conservative political philosophy. However.

However.

The modern political landscape, populated (in America, anyway) with Democratic and Republican politicians, pundits, commentators, policy wonks and other actors uses the language and rhetoric of left and right political philosophy, but labels and talking points are as far as those pretty words take us. Outside of ineffectual debating societies, there is no such thing as a real political philosophy. The smiling, suited whores who lie with varying degrees of charm in front of crowds and cameras are not men and women with convictions, or beliefs, or anything like a philosophy of governance, whether it be left or right. They are simply very well dressed sociopaths, pretending to conform to this or to that party dogma, while being handsomely paid by lobbyists to recite whatever gibberish tests strongly in their focus marketing surveys. Once elected, these smiling zombies have no more interest in their electors or in a political philosophy than pinworms care for interest rates.

Political philosophies exist, certainly, and people even care about those views, but none of those people occupy political office. Those in seats of power care to the extent that they read the right slogans from teleprompter, then vote on whatever policies the bankers and corporations who own them dictate.

To imagine that either the political left or the political right has real goals beyond the cancerous scope creep of bloated government, the escalation of public enslavement through debt, and the wholesale eradication of human rights requires wilfully ignoring the enacted policies of both major parties on the past 40 years.

Unfortunately, many, if not most people continue to believe in their own enfranchisement through engagement with the political process. This is understandable, as we are bludgeoned throughout our lives with the message that this is how government works, our representation by honourable men and women, enfranchised to act in our best interests by the vote. We believe in this because the alternative is very ugly.

That alternative is that voting, or any other non-disruptive engagement with out established political system is a placebo, an ineffectual puppet show in which the puppets, operated by a single puppeteer distract us as we are robbed, murdered and sold by our governments, en mass, as collective human debt-service-drones.

This is a hard option to face, because effective change within such a system requires leaving behind the comfort of our established political machinery, cancerous and inefficient as we all recognize it to be. This means that whatever system or solution we develop and embrace is, from the present perspective, unknown – and to many conventional thinkers – impossible.

The difficulty of mapping a complete path into an unknown framework is, in my opinion, why many highly intelligent and politically sophisticated advocates of the human rights of men and boys frame their argument in the context of philosophical conservatism versus collectivist political viewpoint. The idea that the existing political system still retains some of what is stated in public political rhetoric.

Unfortunately, this is a more optimistic view of modern political reality than the routine destruction of male human beings by our courts, education system, and media warrants.

Obviously, for men to stand up on their hind legs in defiance of our current system of dehumanization of men requires powerful optimism and strong will. However, placing confidence in the actors within a demonstrably corrupt system, even when their public rhetoric includes small government and personal liberty, but this faith is not warranted in a broken, corrupted system.

This is what is what is meant by statements that the men's rights movement is not a political left or a right leaning movement. The political infrastructure of our court houses, governments and political institutions are a rotting corpse with no utility except the maintenance of a continuously bloating parasitism on the public, and the forcible exclusion of innovation in human progress.

Currently, this is one of the drivers of the growing currency of the MGTOW movement. Men opting out of a system they see as no longer viable. This has the obvious benefit of protecting men from predation and cannibalism in a system disregarding male humanity, and considering only male utility. However, a growing fraction of male society taking their own income and utility off the table for thievery and exploitation by a cancerous political establishment is already re-shaping the ecosystem in which broken government feeds and thrives.

SAVE demands apology from Rep. Zoe Lofgren

SAVE Demands Apology from Rep. Zoe Lofgren for Remarks Made During

House Judiciary Committee Mark-Up

Stop Abusive and Violent Environments (SAVE) is a victim-advocacy organization working for evidence-based solutions to the problem of domestic violence. Stop Violent and Abusive Environments supports the reauthorization of the Violence Against Women Act (VAWA).

SAVE advocates for all victims of domestic violence, regardless of their race, sex, or gender identity. Unfortunately, false claims of domestic violence and sexual assault have become widespread, a problem that robs true victims of desperately needed services, protections, and credibility. (http://www.saveservices.org/downloads/False-DV-Allegations-Cost-20-Billion)

During the May 8, 2012 mark-up of the House Judiciary Committee, Congresswoman Zoe Lofgren (D-CA) made certain statements regarding Stop Abusive and Violent Environments, alleging SAVE represents a group of "apologists for abusers." In support of this accusation, Lofgren referred to a member of the SAVE Board of Directors, Natasha Spivack.

In 2000, Nataliya Derkach Fox, who was seeking permanent US residency, accused her new husband, James M. Fox, of attempted homicide in order to bolster her petition under VAWA's battered immigrant provisions. The allegation was found to be non-meritorious. On June 7, 2002, a Loudon County judge went so far as to issue an order that all police and court documents regarding the case be expunged from the record (Page 1:http://www.saveservices.org/wp-content/uploads/expungement-001.pdf, Page 2: http://www.saveservices.org/wp-content/uploads/expungement-002.pdf).

In addition, Nataliya Fox committed fraud, telling an immigration officer that the name on her immigration petition had been incorrectly listed as Elena Rybak (http://www.saveservices.org/wp-content/uploads/DocumentFraud01-001.pdf). But as a result of VAWA's confidentiality provisions, Ms. Spivack was barred from informing immigration authorities about the fraudulent claim.

Instead of being recognized for her efforts to stop immigration fraud, Spivack found her company, Encounters International, accused of violating an obscure provision of VAWA that requires an international dating organization to provide an "information pamphlet" to prospective foreign clients (Section 833). A prominent Washington DC legal firm accepted the case on a pro bono basis, eventually leading to a jury award for damages against the firm owned by Natasha Spivack.

Full details about the case are available in a statement provided by Spivack at the False Allegations Summit held in Washington DC on June 2, 2011:http://www.saveservices.org/statement-by-encounters-international/

SAVE is not alone in raising concerns about false allegations. Senator Chuck Grassley (R-IA) has expressed similar worries about immigration fraud and provisions in VAWA that encourage it:

http://www.grassley.senate.gov/news/Article.cfm?customel_dataPageID_1502=40474

Since its passage in 1994, the Violence Against Women Act has helped many victims. But the law has also eroded long-cherished due process protections that many Americans take for granted. This erosion has contributed to a growing problem of frivolous accusations, wrongful arrests, undue prosecutions, and false convictions. These problems are documented in the following SAVE Special Reports (http://www.saveservices.org/reports):

- The Use and Abuse of Domestic Restraining Orders
- Arrest Policies for Domestic Violence
- Unequal Justice in the Criminal Justice System
- Domestic Violence-Related Immigration Fraud

Good people can disagree over issues, but a smear campaign against a victim rights organization based on one highly disputed case is not an action a member of Congress should endorse. Representative Lofgren's charges made during a House Judiciary Committee meeting were unfounded, scurrilous, and false. Stop Abusive and Violent Environments demands that Rep. Lofgren retract her remarks about SAVE, issue an apology to Natasha Spivack, and begin to work for ways to stop false allegations so true victims can get the help they need and deserve.

AVfM Radio : the invisible business of slavery

John Hembling (JtO) · 10 May 2012 · Archived copy · Original

[box icon="none"]

Tonight on AVfM Radio we will be talking about what everybody knows is a relic of the past, and not a feature of modern life. That most abhorrent and vile of human institutions, slavery.

We like to imagine that as modern citizens of a post enlightenment culture, we're different we're conscious and conscientious – shit, some of us go out of our way to buy "farmer friendly" products and "ethical" coffee beans – patting ourselves of the back hard enough to need a spa day and a professional massage afterwards. We also imagine slavery as an ancient, brutal, obsolete practice marked by whips, chains, and black men beaten or whipped for not picking the cotton fast enough, or for daring to speak up to their betters, their masters.

Like all human practices, slavery changes through innovation, becoming more efficient, and most importantly more invisible. JtO and GWW will be ripping the covers off tonight to examine the modern format of one of humanity's most shameful and long lasting social institutions. The business of slavery.

FRA's take aim at Utah adoption agencies and lawyers

Robert O'Hara · 11 May 2012 · Archived copy · Original

(AVFM News) Washington D.C. May 10, 2012 – The president of Utah Adoption Council, a Utah based non profit organized in 1981 to assist in lightening the load of the foster care system in that state, resigned on Tuesday amidst widespread claims that its members were actively undermining the interests of biological fathers who's children are adopted in Utah. Wes Hutchens, an adoption lawyer who has facilitated over 1000 adoptions in his career had only one more month to serve as president. Yet at a council meeting on Tuesday he announced he was leaving to start his own non profit that will advocate for a more ethical approach to adoption that respects the rights of all those involved. Members of the council, comprised of lawyers, adoption agencies and parents, accused him of having his own agenda but Hutchens shot back, asserting that members were not acting ethically when administering adoptions.

Utah's adoption laws and the practices of it's adoption agencies have been the center of much controversy when it comes to the rights of biological fathers over their children. The state has become a veritable Mecca for birth mothers who want to exclude the biological father from the decision process when it comes to adoption. Recently, a ruling was handed down by the Virginia Supreme Court that a biological father, John Wyatt of Virginia, could sue both the adoption agencies and the lawyers who handled the surreptitious adoption of his daughter to a Utah couple shortly after her birth. On April 27th, a Colorado judge ruled that biological father, Rob Manzanares, should not have his parental rights terminated after a four year long battle to gain access to his daughter after his ex girlfriend gave the child up for adoption in Utah under similar circumstances.

News agencies in both Colorado and Virginia have reported on dubious practices of Utah adoption agencies and lawyers which include coaching birth mothers to mislead biological fathers and giving cash incentives for mothers to give birth within the state. Chanel 9 News in Colorado published audio recordings on their website of investigators posing as the sisters of expecting mothers when calling adoption agencies asking for advice on how to exclude the father from the process. "We can have him not be involved at all," one agency employee was recorded saying, and another suggested that the mother tell the father that their was an accident and the baby died.

The way some adoption agencies handle birth mothers Hutchins claims "is an invitation for birth mothers to lie, cheat and defraud birth fathers into thinking they don't have anything to worry about."

"The idea that the birth mother can travel from any state to Utah and be in Utah for two or three days and then give birth to a child and then leave the state with the sole purpose of cutting off the rights of the biological father has to stop," Hutchins said.

Murder cheer-leaders polish their image

John Hembling (JtO) · 11 May 2012 · Archived copy · Original

It appears that the professional victims at radical hub don't yet grasp that Pam Oshaughnessy's call for mass murder, eugenics, and child abuse makes them, and radical feminism in general look like a violent hate organization. Of course, the endorsement by an apparent human rights organization like the SPLC probably emboldens great minds behind a public manifesto for male-exterminating eugenics, along with a lack of legal fallout for the same.

[box]

- Some say an earth with only 10% men will be a safe earth free of oppression
- We have moved beyond palliation (negotiation, mediation, reform, compromise, engagement with the System) to exploring effective means of extirpating male pathology, including being open to biological explanations and treatment
- I'm serious about this. If we can do it with corn, men ought to be easy

[/box]

In October of 2011, a group of radical feminists published an article written by the former lawyer and novelist Pam Oshaughnessy, in which the ex lawyer used carefully circumspect language to argue for eugenics and mass murder against men.

Male human rights advocates took exception to the public call for human subjugation and murder. In addition to criticizing the amorality and violence which received support from within the radical feminist community of radical hub, the names of the advocates for murder, child abuse, sex selective abortion, and eugenics were identified publicly in the article titled Underbelly of a hate movement out of concern that such overt and murderous intent presents a threat of real violence if it was not identified.

It is the shared opinion of this site's editorial board that individuals advocating violence or murder should be publicly identified and their names published. To remain knowingly inactive and silent in the face of public calls for violence and murder would be both irresponsible and complicit.

In March of 2012, when the radio comedian Rush Limbaugh called Sandra Fluke a prostitute in commentary of her public claim that the state should pay for her birth control, the mainstream media collectively threw Limbaugh under the bus, focusing on his inflammatory language, rather than the issue of public payment or sexual choices by Fluke.

In an attempt to capitalize on anti-conservative backlash against Limbaugh, the Southern Poverty Law Center drafted a hasty and poorly researched list of new enemies, attempting to justify the SPLC's continued federal subsidy and ongoing solicitation of donations.

However, because of the political leanings of the SPLC and lack of planning or research, the list of potential hate organizations in their "intelligence report" was little more than a catalog of politically right leaning organizations, such as the socially conservative Concerned Women of America, the conservative libertarian John Birch Society, and Glen Beck as well as second amendment activists. However, in the clear view of hindsight, the SPLC's list of baddies was a construct assembled in haste and desperation with the intent to fund-raise through fear mongering and included a pick-up artist calling himself Roosh, a victims advocacy organization, as well as some elements of the men's rights movement, including this site. Interestingly, Charles Cooke, in a telephone interview with the SPLC managed to secure an admission that the apparent human-rights advocates at the SPLC only address right-wing hate groups[1], which is logical enough, considering that their principal activity is fund-seeking.

However, after Reason Magazine[1][2], the American Spectator[3], Business Insider [4], the Ms-magazine-funded Good Men Project[5] and others called baloney on the SPLC's flabby fear mongering and fund seeking – Mark

Potok indulged in some pretty impressive back-pedaling, particularly on the men's rights section of the content aggregator site reddit.

According to Potok:

"It's false. We wrote about the subreddit Men's Rights, but we did not list it as a hate group"

Of course you didn't, Mark.

Interestingly, the SPLC's use of the term "hate group" has no legal meaning, as was correctly pointed out by word-press blogger Rkeefe57[7]. It was this same blogger who also noticed that the SPLC's hate map[8] defines "hate group activities" as "criminal acts, marches, rallies, speeches, meetings, leafleting or publishing". There are seven activities in this list, and all but one are constitutionally protected expression of freedom of speech and political expression in American constitutional law.

Advocation of murder, child abuse and eugenics are obviously not listed in the SPLC's definition of hate group activities, which is why a growing relationship between the eugenics-enthusiasts at the blog radical-hub and the Southern Poverty Law Center should raise no eyebrows. After all, it's not like the SPLC would leave an identified hate organization off their list in exchange for political favors or payment. Except when the organization engages in fund-raising on behalf of the SPLC – as the fine feminists at Radical Hub have done.

[image]

Arthur Goldwag of the SPLC swept aside any possibility that this was one-sided non-reciprocal support by tweeting a link to the Radical hub blog, directly to the page on which SPLC fund-raising was promoted by the radical hub bloggers.

[image]

However, as the financial relationship between radical feminist eugenics enthusiasts and apparent human rights attorneys at the SPLC is repeatedly pointed out, it might seem that the blatant hatred, the calls for murder, eugenics, child abuse, and sex selective abortion by those radical fems would be a bit embarrassing to the fund seeking lawyers.

When originally criticized by independent human rights activists, including AVfM, on this murder and eugenics enthusiasm, the admins at rad fem hub responded by establishing a blog on a subdomain of the radical hub site called "a voice for CREEPY men". [emphasis mine]

Apparently, being publicly identified as advocates of eugenics and a searing hatred built on sexual identity caused no embarrassment at all. When you know beyond any evidence or outmoded, obsolete sense of human ethics that you're right, trifles such as the planned elimination of major fractions of the human race must seem like minor concerns.

In addition, rather than distancing themselves from the advocates of murder, eugenics, hatred based on sexual identity, and sex-selective child abuse, the SPLC appears to be taking the course of maintaining and strengthening their relationship with radical hub. When everybody knows you stand for human rights and against hatred and violence, actually standing against hatred and in favor of human rights takes a back seat to securing income from donations, no matter the source.

There is a group of feminists who have set up a pro-violence subreddit and modeled it to appear to be MRA owned and operated.

r/beatingwomen was set up by some of the same people that brought us r/SRS, an openly anti human rights group of feminists who have attempted to attack the MRM for some time. Some of you I am sure will remember the self-imploding SPLC fiasco comparing MRA's to mass murderers, and that it blew up in their face.

Apparently not getting enough attention from the new subreddit, they have decided to up the ante. I followed an email link sent to me today there for the first time, and was treated to an image of me in the side bar, with the supposed quote from me "Best Subreddit of the Year."

It is clear that since they are able to convince fewer and fewer people that MRA's are the kind of human garbage they accuse us of being, they have become the caricatures they paint of us, and indeed have begun using our names in order to mislead the public about the MRM.

Aside from once again proving to be dishonest, bad actors, another little tidbit has surfaced in the midst of things, courtesy of Agent Orange, who contacted JtO today with a piece of intel about the subreddit.

It appears to be the work, if not the brainchild, of our one and only David Futrelle. And as fate and outreach would have it, yet another source that will remain anonymous, confirms the same information.

I know that some of you might be asking, "Damn Paul, why give this clown the attention his dysfunctional parents chose not to give?" And it is a valid thought, but we still have an opportunity here.

Since every move these clowns make is something we can use, then the question becomes how to best use this. I am thinking we expose them and shut them down.

We already know they are cowards. I made a single comment about them using my name and photograph and within minutes they took it down, replaced "Paul Elam" with "Dr. Paul" and used an "artistic" likeness of me. This lets me know they don't have the spine to be doxed and outed, which we will also do.

To all of them.

Agent Orange is already in, as is at least one other. Further word is coming.

In the meantime, contacting reddit, for those interested, with complaints about the pro-violence nature of the offending subreddit would be in order. I don't suggest you bother telling the SPLC. Except perhaps, after the fact, as an object lesson.

She was just a child/baby killer

Robert St. Estephe · 12 May 2012 · Archived copy · Original

Recently I posted on The Unknown History of Misandry a brief little article on a long-forgotten female serial killer case from 18th century Portugal, about a young woman by the name of Luisa De Jesus.

Luisa was a child care provider who had murdered 28 children so that she might profitably pocket advance payments given to pay for the little tykes' care. No mention is made in the sources of the sex of any of the young woman's victims. This modest post is part of a large and ongoing information collection effort documenting female serial killers, generally forgotten ones.

The criminal phenomenon of the female serial killer is, like all other forms of female criminality, only scantly researched and studied. This pervasive incuriousness has been the norm ever since the pre-1960s era when almost all criminologists were male (and were imbued with chivalrous attitudes). And it is still the norm today as well, where the field of criminology is, like everything else, constantly monitered by "ministry of truth" overseers always prepared to quash any "inappropriate" (undesired) research – by withholding funding or blacklisting and termination of employment, whenever any scholar violates the politically correct orthodoxy.

My own independent and unfunded research of female serial killers took as its starting point a published list of 140 cases, most of which many required some aggressive digging around to bring to light the particulars. To this skeleton list I have added hundreds of others, so that my list now numbers over 600. The expanding list includes many cases similar to that of De Jesus, involving female child care providers, called "baby farmers," who murdered children. The collection includes about 70 of these murderous baby farmers from across the globe. Some of these cases of women caught murdering their charges involve the slaying of upwards of a thousand. In these homicidal baby farmer cases the cause of death varies, and includes drugging, poisoning, starvation, strangulation, battery, stabbing in the heart with a needle or a hairpin, exposure to the sun and even incineration while alive.

Furthermore, despite the widely disseminated claims of crime experts that serial killers are not only almost always male but also that they are almost always "white," the 600 female serial killer cases span non-"white" Africa, Asia, South America as well as "white" Australia, Europe and North America (the US, in itself, sports many remarkable non-"white" cases). Class status covers the full spectrum from aristocrat to peasant.

Shortly after posting the scant information on the sad case of Portuguese murderess Luisa De Jesus (who, by the way, was executed for her crimes) that I culled from an obscure medical publication the post attracted a blog comment, and a particularly bilious one. It is reproduced here, without corrections, but I have changed the all caps in the original to a conventional upper and lower case, for readability's sake. The comment was signed "Christinne":

> Luisa De Jesus' case has nothing to do with misandry, looks like someone needs a brain here. And nowhere it is mentioned that she killed only baby boys which indeed would have connected her to the subject of this blog. No, she was just a child/baby killer, thats all…. misandry, yeah, rite….hypocrisy without boundaries….

The commenter focuses her indignant wrath on the word "misandry" that indeed appears prominently in the name of the website, but which does not appear within the post itself, and the commenter has apparently little interest in looking into topic at hand: the history of violence, which is one of several subjects dealt with in detail on the blog. "Misandry" is not only not mentioned in the post in question, but it is not mentioned in 99% of the several hundred other posts on female serial killer published on the site. Yet it is that word "misandry" that matters most of all to commenter Christinne, and she sure does let me know about it. Her comment has, as it turns out, come to serve a useful purpose. It has gotten me to pay attention to the thing that mattered so much to her, namely my use of the term misandry as it relates to the facts of feminine violence.

Current public knowledge about violence is grievously distorted by the lack of attention female violence has gotten from those who supply and disseminate the information that influences the broader public. And that is why the collecting and analysis of cases of feminine violence warrants the attention of one who, like myself, seeks to elucidate the phenomenon we call "misandry."

Yet, by no means would I get too carried away with evaluating the crimes of Luisa De Jesus in much different a way had her tiny victims been mostly or exclusively male. This is because I, for the most part, reject the simplistic fashionable class-warfare model of thought known to educators as "CRG" (Class, Race and Gender), a model that was created and perpetuated by mid-20th century Frankfurt School marxists – and which has infected and dominated public discourse so pervasively that it is no longer even recognized by most people as the product of a specific identifiable utopianist ideology. Commenter Christinne is, it would seem to me, fully submerged under the mesmerizing utopia-or-bust CRG spell.

It should be mentioned, however, that before the onset of the age of post-World War II "expertism" – where we stop thinking for ourselves and defer to credentialed lords of reality up on high – the idea that women were frequently murderously violent was far from being an exotic one. The notion that female serial killers were rarer than male ones would have been thought absurd to newspaper readers of the 1840s through the 1940s. Such homicide-addicted women were constantly in the news.

Yet for the Class-Race-Gender indoctrinee, the world is just one vast battleground arrayed with paired-off opponents: "persons of color" versus "whites," the poor versus the middle class and wealthy, men vs. women. This is the image of World Class War, all day, every day, everywhere, incessant. The sum total of human interactions are thus reduced in this dumbed-down mindset to nothing but bilateral oppositions of interest/identity groups. The combatants go at each other within a 24/7 arena of battles fought exclusively by members of teams known by the labels "oppressor" and "oppressed." The hostilities are manifested in every little petty detail of every human's quotidian existence ("The personal is the political," as the saying goes).

Those who are indoctrinated into this mindset are thus addicted to narrow ideations of conflict, and are likewise addicted to the affective rushes concomitant to the ideations. The indoctrinees are obsessed – and they are paranoid. They are blind to nuance and immune to the employment of analytical reason. This state of affairs is, it goes without saying, makes for an exhausting and nerve-wracking way to live – and it makes the indoctrinee as nutty and burned-out as a pecan pie left too long in the oven.

For such an indoctrinee, The Unknown History of Misandry, which displays, as it does, a cornucopia of far flung historical documents of bad behavior on the part of females, must seem – to such a beleaguered benighted soul – to be designed with the purpose of putting forth such an argument as this:

"Hey people, it is not the guys who are the a-holes. No way. It is the gals who are the a-holes. – See? So there! – I win!"

No. That is not at all what we are up to in this blog. To think in such a way as that would merely be reflecting the mirror image of the most pedestrian variety of the pre-packaged Class-Race-Gender marxist picture of reality. We seek no "win," nor do we even recognize the conflict of ideas as being defined by sex (or, "gender," so called). Rather the conflict is between neat self-serving ideological cultism and actual complex human reality.

►Collectivist Ciphers or Human Beings?

The "So there! I win!" mentality would not be consistent with how a non-indoctrinated mind works. Not at all. Rather, the website's generous presentation of details of violence by women is to us not a demonstration of what could be thought to be an essentially violent tendency in that sex, but rather it is a set of documents that may assist in demonstrating certain points. They are useful, for example, in showing that the politically correct notion – that, somehow (in the fairytale land of gender theories), women are in their very essence non-violent receptors of conflict, and are never initiators of it; that they inherently and universally, possess a depth of compassion unknown to members of the "oppressor" sex – is a false one.

The particular portion of the larger anti-misandry project that UHoM sets out to serve can be identified as that of the necessity to contradict – through the exhibition of evidence – the collectivist and social constructivist dogma which holds that a human being is not an individual agent but rather is merely an atomized particle in the historical continuum; that a man and a woman are mere products of inescapable "social forces" who have no free will.

The stranglehold that this dumb dogmatism has on such a large portion of the public is why I find it necessary to publish such tabloid-styled collections as "Female Serial Killers Who Like to Murder Women." The title sounds dumbed-down because it is designed to be so.

There is an oft-repeated truism stating that "female serial killers are rare" (in comparison with the males) and it is false. The statistics used to support that myth are merely the product of a wildly disproportionate allocation of resources in the pursuit of criminological data. The myth is further reinforced by the bias of chivalry and by the ethos of institutionalized female privilege currently masquerading as "gender studies."

Thus it becomes necessary to point out in such a crude manner (as in a collection of cases of serial killers who are women who choose women and girls as their victims) that we ought not to be looking at violence as some "gotcha" illustration of some intellectual's made up ideology, but rather as just plain old-fashioned murder.

We all want to avoid being murdered, most of us at least. Thus when we get the idea in our heads that women are somehow supra-human beings, sugar-and-spice morally superior gender-fairies, who, as individuals, are immune to the pressures of temptation that have been known to wise men and wise women since the dawn of history – namely pride, avarice, envy, anger, lust, gluttony, and sloth – then we are not going to be properly on the lookout. Violent and predatory women use the absence of circumspection on the part of potential victims of both sexes to their great advantage. A little bit of feminine wile goes a long way in setting up her victim for a fall.

Equally vulgar are the titles of posts of collections on violent women – such as "Women Who Like to Torture" "Cannibal Murderesses," "Acid Queens: Women Who Throw Acid," "Give 'Em the Axe," "Ice Pick Chicks," "Ogresses," "Step-Mothers from Hell," "Murder-Coaching Moms" – which throw light on the specific and individualized realities of feminine violence.

There is nothing fancy about these crime stories. They are merely simple ordinary facts that happen to blatantly contradict the sophisticated (that is, artfully dishonest) and heavily-funded propaganda generalizations ubiquitously and unceasingly deployed for the sole purpose of training the public to be a PC-whipped hoard of controllable drones ("PC" standing for political correctness).

Gender ideologues do not, obviously, want to hear one single peep about the reality of widespread violence by women against women – committed with guns, knives, ice picks, meat cleavers, axes, hatchets, razor blades, hammers, poison and acid – which goes on, except when the ideologues can "excusify" it away by reclassifying those violent acts under some other label pulled out from the vaunted Class-Race-Gender model. Such female-on-female crimes can be handily repackaged as "violence resulting from economic/class disadvantage" – classic bait and switch. Obfuscation is central to the CRG regime's war-craft.

You don't hear about violence by women against women from malicious monologist Eve Ensler.. For such gender maniacs as Ensler women and girls harmed by women are the victims that can Go To Hell. The pain of these girls and women is embarrassing and their wounds and their deaths must be hushed up, for the sake of a "higher cause": that of collectivist feminist power. – "Utopia or bust!"

To the typical dumbed-down indoctrinee the publication of such information on violence by women as is featured on UHoM will elicit merely the primitive, banal, mindless response of: "He hates women!"

So crippled is the rattled mind of the politically correct indoctrinee.

►Christinne was right, but without knowing why

We assent that 18th century Luisa De Jesus, as Christinne has so accurately pointed out really "was just a child/baby killer." But that is just my point. Like so many other women and men any decent person ought to avoid, Luisa the baby farmer was a self-centered, conscienceless, dissimulating, calculating, perverse and violent criminal. The fact that she committed her crimes in a fashion more typical of her sex – in accordance with the facts of her sex-specific hormonal make-up, her sex-specific brain chemistry, her sex-specific physical characteristics, her sex-differentiated perceived aptitude to be an appropriate nurturer of infants – does not mean that mean she should be looked at, for the most part, any differently than any male sociopath who goes about his murderous business in his more characteristically male, rather than female, malicious manner.

Yes, this particular female criminal was just a criminal – and the distribution of the sex of her victims ought to be seen as secondary to the viciousness, the inhumanity, the ruthlessness, the coldness, the shamelessness, of her sociopathic mentality. For us, the un-indoctrinated, to twist our minds into trying to look at every murderer as some sort of "gender warrior" would be perverse – indeed, it would be insane. Yet this is just what we are admonished to do by the ideologues who steer the public discourse.

Luisa De Jesus was, according to the record, scant as it is, a standard sociopath – and the other details, such as race, class and sex (her so-called "gender") are a secondary matter. The particulars of her victims' class, race and sex cannot change the fact that she was cold-blooded in her homicidal predilection.

For my part, I shall keep on putting the spotlight on those overlooked sociopathic members of the non-existent "non-violent gender," whether they be perpetrators of instrumental violence or of indirect violence (as is the particular wont of professors, political opportunists and ideologues who gleefully infect the world with their fallacious and harmful "theories"), or proxy violence, the manipulating of some chivalrous male to do all the heavy lifting.

It turns out for me, just as for Christinne, that Luisa De Jesus really "was just a child/baby killer" first and foremost; her sex and the sex of her victims really is not the issue. The bottom line is that a sociopath is a sociopath, regardless of genitalia or sex-specific particulars.

So I say, thank you, Christinne, for reminding me to explain why exposing female violence against victims of either sex is central to countering the mental disease of misandry.

Countering the propaganda, the fake statistics, the distorted and inaccurate generalizations, the carefully constructed false historical narratives of the social constructionists, the oftentimes simple and blunt protocols of politically correct censorship, is, it turns out, smack-a-dab central to the project of dismantling misandry. And it is not just the "G" of Class-Race-Gender ideology with its dialectical materialist, social constructionist "long march through the institutions" strategem that we must contend with. CRG is, more importantly, a dumbing-down tactic thattrains its indoctrinees to replaces critical thinking with lock-step operative conditioning responses. This causes the "re-education" victim to fail to see reality in all its complexity, supplanting perception and understanding with trained responses. The indoctrinee is trained to be emotionally dependent on peer acceptance. Class-Race-Gender drones require their every moment to make them feel "comfortable," – or else they become disoriented and "offended."

Luisa De Jesus "was just a child/baby killer" indeed; and so were – and will be – a great many other women. Public obliviousness to the large presence and the characteristics of such feminine sociopaths (despite the occasional and isolated media circus case such as Caylee Anthony and Jodi Arias) – an obliviousness deliberately cultivated by professional ideologues – has everything to do with misandry.

The mother of all lies

Robert Franklin · 12 May 2012 · Archived copy · Original

The New York Times whacked a small beehive recently with its Room for Debate column. Taking off from French Feminist Elisabeth Badinter's new book "The Conflict: How Modern Motherhood Undermines the Status of Women," the Times asked seven women to respond to the following questions: "Has women's obsession with being the perfect mother destroyed feminism? In particular, has this trend of 'attachment parenting' been bad for working moms?"

The responses of the seven were enlightening, mostly because not one of them attempted to answer the first question. Maybe they just thought it was dumb. I know I do. The answer is clearly "no." Even if women generally have an "obsession" with being "the perfect mother," an assertion for which there is no evidence, feminism is all too obviously alive and kicking. And it will be, long after the current fad of attachment parenting has become a distant memory.

But far more interesting than the short pieces in the Times is the snit the whole column has created in the print and electronic media. To many of those writers, the very idea that there's a conflict between feminism and motherhood is anathema. So Mary Elizabeth Williams of Salon.com weighed in with an article entitled "The NYT's Ridiculous Motherhood Debate." Not to be outdone, Lisa Solod's piece in the Huffington Post countered with "The Fake Fight Between (sic) Women and How It Will Hurt Us All," in which she shouted "Motherhood vs. Feminism? Give me a break."

For both Williams and Solod, even to ask the question was offensive. Unlike the Times writers, to them the answer to the question is obvious; there is no conflict between feminism and motherhood. Many mothers are feminists, after all.

Too bad they neglected to read the title of Badinter's book that set the entire debate raging, much less the book itself. She, after all, sees a very distinct "conflict" between the feminist holy grail of work, commercial and intellectual power on one hand, and motherhood and domestic power on the other.

Far worse, Williams and Solod seem not to know the history of feminism. If they do, they're at pains to hide the fact. Have these two feminists truly not read the seminal books of the Second Wave feminist canon? The Second Sex? The Feminine Mystique? What about virtually anything ever written by Catharine MacKinnon? Or Badinter for that matter.

If they had, they'd know that for decades, feminists have proclaimed the family to be the seat of the oppression of women. Badinter says as much herself: "The best allies of men's dominance have been, quite unwittingly, innocent infants." But at that, she was only channeling Simone de Beauvoir who famously stigmatized a mother's choice to stay home and raise her children as possibly criminal. Bette Friedan agreed, likening home and family to a prison.

Those scarcely exhaust the list of feminists who have successfully tried to make domestic life (including a husband) seem like a threat to women's physical and psychological well-being. But suffice it to say that Badinter's claims fall squarely within mainstream feminism as it's been practiced for well over fifty years – children are the enemies of women.

So why would Williams and Solod be so desperate to pretend that so much feminist writing simply doesn't' exist, that there is in fact no conflict between motherhood and feminism? And why would they believe they could wish away that conflict as simply as Dorothy clicking her ruby slippers together? Whatever the answer, their pretense is also part of mainstream feminism – the intellectual dishonesty part.

A lack of basic honesty has dogged feminism at least since the 1960s and continues to this day. Examples are too numerous to detail, but some writers like Christina Hoff Sommers, Daphne Patai and Carolyn Graglia have developed a small cottage industry devoted to debunking some of the more laughable instances of feminist mendacity. From made-up facts (Steinem: 150,000 women and girls die of anorexia each year; Brownmiller: only 2% of rape claims are fabricated), to vanishing research data (Carol Gilligan's "data" on girls in school never saw the light of day) to outright lies (women don't commit domestic violence; parental alienation is a plot by fathers to steal children), the dark side of feminism is littered with the type of intellectual dishonesty that would get a high school sophomore expelled.

Thus Williams' and Solod's claim that there's no conflict between feminism and motherhood takes its place within the hoariest traditions of feminism – public anti-intellectualism. But sadly for them, hiding crazy Aunt Sally in the attic isn't easy, try as they might. For far too long, far too many people have noticed the side of feminism that calls motherhood a betrayal of women.

It's always been feminism's Achilles heel. Take on motherhood and you're fighting a bear; it's a fight you're likely to lose. And that, I suspect is the answer to my question about what Williams and Solod are up to when they seek to deny the plain conflict between feminism and motherhood.

The desire by women to conceive, carry, give birth to and care for children is one of the most powerful motivations we humans are heir to. It won't be undone by those for whom every urge, regardless of how good and natural, is really just the social construct of an evil patriarchy. Not surprisingly, the desire to mother hasn't withered away, but has remained vital and alive despite the hostility of feminism. We can expect that to continue.

However much Williams, Solod and their sisters in arms may wish to deny the fact, feminism and motherhood have long been on a collision course. The natural, and I would argue inevitable, solution is for feminism to yield to avoid its own destruction. Indeed, that's what we're already seeing. The seven NYT writers discuss motherhood a great deal, feminism barely at all. Sensible observers note that legitimate feminism seeks to free women to make choices equally with men, and the choice to procreate and care for one's young is one of those choices.

Feminism went down the wrong road when it proclaimed motherhood, home and family to be bad for women. Countless women know that road to be a dead end. It's not their fault that Williams and Solod find themselves at the road's end wondering where to go next.

She was just a child/baby killer

Robert St. Estephe · 12 May 2012 · Archived copy · Original

Recently I posted on The Unknown History of Misandry a brief little article on a long-forgotten female serial killer case from 18th century Portugal, about a young woman by the name of Luisa De Jesus.

Luisa was a child care provider who had murdered 28 children so that she might profitably pocket advance payments given to pay for the little tykes' care. No mention is made in the sources of the sex of any of the young woman's victims. This modest post is part of a large and ongoing information collection effort documenting female serial killers, generally forgotten ones.

The criminal phenomenon of the female serial killer is, like all other forms of female criminality, only scantly researched and studied. This pervasive incuriousness has been the norm ever since the pre-1960s era when almost all criminologists were male (and were imbued with chivalrous attitudes). And it is still the norm today as well, where the field of criminology is, like everything else, constantly monitered by "ministry of truth" overseers always prepared to quash any "inappropriate" (undesired) research – by withholding funding or blacklisting and termination of employment, whenever any scholar violates the politically correct orthodoxy.

My own independent and unfunded research of female serial killers took as its starting point a published list of 140 cases, most of which many required some aggressive digging around to bring to light the particulars. To this skeleton list I have added hundreds of others, so that my list now numbers over 600. The expanding list includes many cases similar to that of De Jesus, involving female child care providers, called "baby farmers," who murdered children. The collection includes about 70 of these murderous baby farmers from across the globe. Some of these cases of women caught murdering their charges involve the slaying of upwards of a thousand. In these homicidal baby farmer cases the cause of death varies, and includes drugging, poisoning, starvation, strangulation, battery, stabbing in the heart with a needle or a hairpin, exposure to the sun and even incineration while alive.

Furthermore, despite the widely disseminated claims of crime experts that serial killers are not only almost always male but also that they are almost always "white," the 600 female serial killer cases span non-"white" Africa, Asia, South America as well as "white" Australia, Europe and North America (the US, in itself, sports many remarkable non-"white" cases). Class status covers the full spectrum from aristocrat to peasant.

Shortly after posting the scant information on the sad case of Portuguese murderess Luisa De Jesus (who, by the way, was executed for her crimes) that I culled from an obscure medical publication the post attracted a blog comment, and a particularly bilious one. It is reproduced here, without corrections, but I have changed the all caps in the original to a conventional upper and lower case, for readability's sake. The comment was signed "Christinne":

> Luisa De Jesus' case has nothing to do with misandry, looks like someone needs a brain here. And nowhere it is mentioned that she killed only baby boys which indeed would have connected her to the subject of this blog. No, she was just a child/baby killer, thats all…. misandry, yeah, rite….hypocrisy without boundaries….

The commenter focuses her indignant wrath on the word "misandry" that indeed appears prominently in the name of the website, but which does not appear within the post itself, and the commenter has apparently little interest in looking into topic at hand: the history of violence, which is one of several subjects dealt with in detail on the blog. "Misandry" is not only not mentioned in the post in question, but it is not mentioned in 99% of the several hundred other posts on female serial killer published on the site. Yet it is that word "misandry" that matters most of all to commenter Christinne, and she sure does let me know about it. Her comment has, as it turns out, come to serve a useful purpose. It has gotten me to pay attention to the thing that mattered so much to her, namely my use of the term misandry as it relates to the facts of feminine violence.

Current public knowledge about violence is grievously distorted by the lack of attention female violence has gotten from those who supply and disseminate the information that influences the broader public. And that is why the collecting and analysis of cases of feminine violence warrants the attention of one who, like myself, seeks to elucidate the phenomenon we call "misandry."

Yet, by no means would I get too carried away with evaluating the crimes of Luisa De Jesus in much different a way had her tiny victims been mostly or exclusively male. This is because I, for the most part, reject the simplistic fashionable class-warfare model of thought known to educators as "CRG" (Class, Race and Gender), a model that was created and perpetuated by mid-20th century Frankfurt School marxists – and which has infected and dominated public discourse so pervasively that it is no longer even recognized by most people as the product of a specific identifiable utopianist ideology. Commenter Christinne is, it would seem to me, fully submerged under the mesmerizing utopia-or-bust CRG spell.

It should be mentioned, however, that before the onset of the age of post-World War II "expertism" – where we stop thinking for ourselves and defer to credentialed lords of reality up on high – the idea that women were frequently murderously violent was far from being an exotic one. The notion that female serial killers were rarer than male ones would have been thought absurd to newspaper readers of the 1840s through the 1940s. Such homicide-addicted women were constantly in the news.

Yet for the Class-Race-Gender indoctrinee, the world is just one vast battleground arrayed with paired-off opponents: "persons of color" versus "whites," the poor versus the middle class and wealthy, men vs. women. This is the image of World Class War, all day, every day, everywhere, incessant. The sum total of human interactions are thus reduced in this dumbed-down mindset to nothing but bilateral oppositions of interest/identity groups. The combatants go at each other within a 24/7 arena of battles fought exclusively by members of teams known by the labels "oppressor" and "oppressed." The hostilities are manifested in every little petty detail of every human's quotidian existence ("The personal is the political," as the saying goes).

Those who are indoctrinated into this mindset are thus addicted to narrow ideations of conflict, and are likewise addicted to the affective rushes concomitant to the ideations. The indoctrinees are obsessed – and they are paranoid. They are blind to nuance and immune to the employment of analytical reason. This state of affairs is, it goes without saying, makes for an exhausting and nerve-wracking way to live – and it makes the indoctrinee as nutty and burned-out as a pecan pie left too long in the oven.

For such an indoctrinee, The Unknown History of Misandry, which displays, as it does, a cornucopia of far flung historical documents of bad behavior on the part of females, must seem – to such a beleaguered benighted soul – to be designed with the purpose of putting forth such an argument as this:

"Hey people, it is not the guys who are the a-holes. No way. It is the gals who are the a-holes. – See? So there! – I win!"

No. That is not at all what we are up to in this blog. To think in such a way as that would merely be reflecting the mirror image of the most pedestrian variety of the pre-packaged Class-Race-Gender marxist picture of reality. We seek no "win," nor do we even recognize the conflict of ideas as being defined by sex (or, "gender," so called). Rather the conflict is between neat self-serving ideological cultism and actual complex human reality.

►Collectivist Ciphers or Human Beings?

The "So there! I win!" mentality would not be consistent with how a non-indoctrinated mind works. Not at all. Rather, the website's generous presentation of details of violence by women is to us not a demonstration of what could be thought to be an essentially violent tendency in that sex, but rather it is a set of documents that may assist in demonstrating certain points. They are useful, for example, in showing that the politically correct notion – that, somehow (in the fairytale land of gender theories), women are in their very essence non-violent receptors of conflict, and are never initiators of it; that they inherently and universally, possess a depth of compassion unknown to members of the "oppressor" sex – is a false one.

The particular portion of the larger anti-misandry project that UHoM sets out to serve can be identified as that of the necessity to contradict – through the exhibition of evidence – the collectivist and social constructivist dogma which holds that a human being is not an individual agent but rather is merely an atomized particle in the historical continuum; that a man and a woman are mere products of inescapable "social forces" who have no free will.

The stranglehold that this dumb dogmatism has on such a large portion of the public is why I find it necessary to publish such tabloid-styled collections as "Female Serial Killers Who Like to Murder Women." The title sounds dumbed-down because it is designed to be so.

There is an oft-repeated truism stating that "female serial killers are rare" (in comparison with the males) and it is false. The statistics used to support that myth are merely the product of a wildly disproportionate allocation of resources in the pursuit of criminological data. The myth is further reinforced by the bias of chivalry and by the ethos of institutionalized female privilege currently masquerading as "gender studies."

Thus it becomes necessary to point out in such a crude manner (as in a collection of cases of serial killers who are women who choose women and girls as their victims) that we ought not to be looking at violence as some "gotcha" illustration of some intellectual's made up ideology, but rather as just plain old-fashioned murder.

We all want to avoid being murdered, most of us at least. Thus when we get the idea in our heads that women are somehow supra-human beings, sugar-and-spice morally superior gender-fairies, who, as individuals, are immune to the pressures of temptation that have been known to wise men and wise women since the dawn of history – namely pride, avarice, envy, anger, lust, gluttony, and sloth – then we are not going to be properly on the lookout. Violent and predatory women use the absence of circumspection on the part of potential victims of both sexes to their great advantage. A little bit of feminine wile goes a long way in setting up her victim for a fall.

Equally vulgar are the titles of posts of collections on violent women – such as "Women Who Like to Torture" "Cannibal Murderesses," "Acid Queens: Women Who Throw Acid," "Give 'Em the Axe," "Ice Pick Chicks," "Ogresses," "Step-Mothers from Hell," "Murder-Coaching Moms" – which throw light on the specific and individualized realities of feminine violence.

Esneda Ruiz Cataño, Colombian Black Widow – 2013

Robert St. Estephe · 13 May 2012 · Archived copy · Original

We would like to present to you the latest short article from The Unknown History of Misandry, which is a large and growing resource for those interested in the history of hatred for and violence against the male sex, with examples from history all the way through to today. The Unknown History of Misandry is meant to be a useful resource for all those interested in understanding the broad tendency to believe women are less violent and dangerous than men are, and how men are treated as afterthoughts when they're on the receiving end of violence–and to document just how far back a general hatred for males of the human race goes. Although this latest entry is very recent, Unknown History of Misandry contains entries going back hundreds of years. This resource, currently on BlogSpot, is planned to be converted to Wiki soon for easier referencing (and we may be looking for volunteers to help with that by the way), but in the meantime, this incredible wealth of amazing information is available right here. All are encouraged to use this resource for their own writings.–DE

Today we present the latest addition to our collection of Black Widow Serial Killers. The widow Ruiz is also featured the our roguess's gallery of images, Female Serial Killers of the 21st Century (it is shocking how many people think female serial killers do not exist).

On January 29, 2013 45-year-old Esneda Ruiz Cataño was arrested Ebéjico, in Antioquia, Colombia, on the suspicion of murdering three husbands, each of them stabbed to death, in 2001, 2006 and 2010. The media has dubbed her "The Predator" ("La deepredafora"). Ruiz collected life insurance payments following each death.

Police Col. Fernando Restrepo Espinosa told local media: "This woman, by deception, seduced men and convinced them to take out life insurance where she was the sole beneficiary." He said agents had been tracking Ruiz for more than two years, adding: "We realized the lady had murdered her three husbands in the same way: with a cut to the neck."

Husband #1: Juan Pablo Aristizábal, 33, died in 2001 in the town of Rionegro. The widow scored $8,445 and a lifetime pension.

Husband #2: José Johany Valencia, 42, died in 2006, in Medellin. He was stabbed in the neck by two men, presumably acting on the wife's behalf.

Husband #3: Miguel Ángel Veleño García, died from a stab in the neck in 2010, also in Medellin. She was expecting to rake in $40,000 in insurance money, but the insurer became suspicious and contacted police, who conducted an exhaustive investigation of Ruiz's background.

Legal action against Australia's family courts

Greg Canning · 15 May 2012 · Archived copy · Original

[box type="note" icon="none"]

(AVfM News, Australia) Australian men are advised of the pending legal action: Michael McGarvie – Legal Services Commissioner v Harold James Johnson in the Victorian Civil and Administrative Tribunal (VCAT) scheduled to commence on Monday 21 May 2012 at 10.00 AM, 55 King Street, Melbourne, Victoria, Australia.

James Johnson is a prominent human rights lawyer, and stanch opponent of what he terms the "Lawyerocracy" which includes the corrupt Family Law, Federal Magistrates Court's of Australia and the Child Support Agency. Johnson has written and advocated widely about the constitutional and civil liberties breaches that routinely transpire in these settings and the horrific consequences for families, men and children.

As Mr. Johnson points out from the Australian Government's own figures, 4000 "Child Support Agency Clients" (Political "NewSpeak" for non-custodial dads) die every year. That's an average of 12 new deaths (many of them suicides not properly recorded as such) and 36 newly orphaned Aussie kids, happening every day in Australia.

He also highlights the $4 billion transferred annually by "The System" out of taxpayers' pockets into the pockets of the judges, other lawyers and public servants who staff these courts, and the $40 billion "drawn and quartered" out of Australian families each year.

This $40 billion redistributed among layers ($10 billion), the cash economy via the banking and repossession systems ($20 billion) with only $10 billion remaining to be fought over like "cats and dogs" by the 200,000 families processed by the system.

Interested readers are encouraged to follow the links below for more information. More importantly, anyone who might have the opportunity to attend the hearings (especially the opening May 21) are encouraged to show their support for James as he takes on the system, and help put this travesty of justice firmly on Australia's political agenda in the lead up to the next election.

Roger Ebert is better than women

John Hembling (JtO) · 15 May 2012 · Archived copy · Original

According to film-critic Roger Ebert[1]: “Women are nicer than men. There are exceptions. Most people of both sexes are probably fairly nice, given the nature of their upbringing and opportunities. But in terms of their lifelong natures, women are kinder, more empathetic, more generous. And the sooner more of them take positions of power, the better our chances as a species.”

That is the beginning of Ebert’s 1500 word pean to women, published on Mother’s Day, and yes, it’s another one of those articles. Men are bad, women are good, men are worse, women are better, men are the worst thing ever, and women are just the best, squee!!!

The top rated comment on the movie reviewer’s tedious recitation of gender feminist dogma is:

“Bravo, Roger! ⍰ Now this is a column that took balls to write! I hope you get lovely comments from your readers. Bollocks to the ones who don’t like it”

Considering that Ebert is a professional reviewer of commercial entertainment, the principal consumers of which are women, I can certainly see that it really did take big brass balls to devote an entire column to flattering his audience. Well done Roger, you brave, brave soul.

It is also just a coincidence that the movie reviewer’s view on the relative merits of women as better, smarter, more nurturing, more human, and just generally superior is a perfect reflection of the common thread of female flattery and disdain for men prevalent in all commercial entertainment. Coincidentally, one of the reasons men are a minority of the consumers of such entertainment, is it’s not-quite-so entertaining to be told over and over that due to owning external genitalia, you’re worthless.

Ebert, in his attempt to ingratiate himself to a mostly female audience has done what countless other approval seeking men have done. Simply, to metaphorically prostrate himself – declaring – look, I’m a good man, not like those other bad men, you see how I heap scorn on them and flatter you? Approve of me!

Interestingly, this is where Ebert inadvertently reveals his contempt for his audience. How debased must women be, how small minded, selfish and weak; that to feel better about themselves – they must degrade their brothers, fathers, sons and other men around them? What’s worse, is how stupidly childish must we think women are to heap them with such degrading sexist flattery – assuming they will not notice our assumptions of their vain and venal character. Surely, we can hold women in higher regard than this. Not Roger, but if he is not rejected in his sycophantic pseudo flattery, his assumptions of his audience’s character might even be right.

Aside from notation that his attitude mirrors the standard trope of movie and television that women are superior in every way, Ebert’s male-abasing and false esteem is a tired and monotonous repetition of standard gender ideology.

Sing along with me, you all know the words!

Women are better then men!
Boom boom boom!
They do everything better than them!
Boom boom boom!

Ladies are generally nicer!
Quack quack quack!
Their thoughts and feelings are higher!
Quack quack quack!

Girls and women are smarter!
Bing! Bang! Smash!

To keep up, men must try harder!
Clang! Bang! Bash!

Et Cetera.

Ebert actually admits that his view of the “superior sex” is based on too many hours immersed in the fantasy world of produced entertainment, although he doesn’t seem to notice his own admission.

According to Ebert: “This occurred to me while watching a forthcoming movie named “Where Do We Go Now?” It could have occurred during dozens or hundreds of movies.”

Women in movies generally are superior to men, because they’re written that way, to flatter the sensibilities of the intended audience. The failure to notice that fiction reflects the assumptions and intentions of its authors rather than objective reality being a common thread in women-are-better social commentary from other writers, which base those assumptions on movie and television reality rather than, ahem real reality.

The sycophant notes the trend of women’s rapid displacement of men in higher education, but fails to connect that to decades of overhaul of the educational system, rendering it hostile to men.

Referring again to Ebert’s words: “I could bore you with more statistics, but I doubt you need convincing. Most of these things are intuitively true.”

This, by the way is how bigotry works. Facts? We don’t need no stinkin facts! I know Whites are smarter than Blacks because it feels right!

Whoops, not blacks, I meant women are better than men, Ha, silly me, putting one demographic above another based on biological characteristic of identity would be racist, which is just stupid bigotry with no place in a modern, enlightened society.

Oh, dear me, how embarrassing that I almost suggested something so bigoted. Anyway, back to Ebert’s astute observations of superiority of one biological group over another.

Ebert repeats the endlessly debunked wage gap myth, and also lies about the social science showing fatherlessness as the largest predictor of negative outcomes for children. Ebert skips entirely over the champion position mothers hold in the Olympic sport of infanticide and child killing. He also notes that fathers are more likely to be missing from their children’s lives, but fails totally to examine a monetized family court system and cultural norms which forcibly sever men from their families. Ebert goes on to predictably characterize men’s attraction to strippers as childish mommy-seeking. The point of his piece is, after all, not to enlighten, but to vilify one group and flatter another.

However, throughout all this naked sucking up to women, Roger Ebert depends on those superior beings to never notice that if compliment or admiration depends on the rhetorical degradation of men, his view of women is of infants lacking self reflection or empathy. Ebert depends on his preferred sex being cruel and cowardly, and never noticing this assumption he makes of them. Interestingly, he steers close to self parody in a few places. One such is in naming the superior sex’s inclination to nurture the defenceless.

This ignores the entirety of human history in which men have killed and died in the defence of women, and that in all our eagerness to vilify men, calling them lesser humans, and calling women superior, more ethical, more empathic, we demonstrate a failure of the vaunted womanly empathy and ethical supremacy we lay a claim to.

Feminist "Allies"

Phil in Utah · 16 May 2012 · Archived copy · Original

When most Westerners hear the word "Allies", they tend to think of relations between the United States and the United Kingdom, during World War II and the Cold War. Though we had declared war on them almost two centuries earlier to gain independence from them, we provided them with plenty of resources and several heavy cruisers, even before we declared war on the Axis powers. Of course, we had some strong disagreements, mainly on the issue of whether India should have been independent, but we shared intelligence, and often carried out joint operations.

That is why I find it profoundly disgraceful that on so many feminist websites, they list websites hosted by gay or bisexual men as "allies." Feminists pander to gay men for the exact same reason that Rudy Giuliani pandered to firefighters: because their presence in photo-ops made him look good. A feminist brings in a sassy, snappy-dressed, non-threatening twink of a guy with an oh-so-cute speech impediment to sit next to her in round table discussions, where he'll no doubt agree with her about how scummy Republicans are and how fugly Michelle Bachman's getup is. He'll also be allowed to fetch coffee for her and her gal pals, but that's pretty much the limit of what he's allowed to do.

As has been explained before, feminists are perfectly content to have men as allies, up until those men start thinking for themselves. When a man starts acting like a "dudebro", as they call it, he's being an obnoxious, sexist douchebag. As that article demonstrates, feminists don't make any secret of their contempt for men who are self-thinkers or who want their own rights. Naturally, you'd think that they'd like gay guys for a change, since they act so feminine and don't want anything to do with mainstream masculinity, right?

Wrong. Most gay men are virtually indistinguishable from their heterosexual counterparts. They drink beer, watch football, and work blue-collar jobs. The only substantial difference is that they prefer to have sex with men instead of women.

Perhaps that last one is the worst of all. Here, you have a bunch of men who not only enjoy acting in a way that feels right to them, they don't go around seeking women's approval. What does that mean? It means that they don't care if a woman takes offense at what they're saying, and they decide for themselves what makes a man a good man. What'll they do next, find fulfillment in making money for themselves instead of forking it over to some ungrateful harpy who blows it on wine and jewelry and gives nothing in return? How dare they!

Now, I'm not going to pretend that I don't have an agenda here. As I've said before, I'm openly bisexual. Feminists probably find this even more frustrating than dealing with a gay man, because I could potentially end up pleasing a woman sexually, but I have alternatives. So, what do they do when confronted with a man like me? Well, they do take some of the traditional approach; I've been called a "faggot" by no fewer than five feminists, all of whom stated on their blogs that they are SOOOO MAAAAD that gay marriage isn't legal in all fifty states. But, since I'm not totally gay, they just try to deny my existence. They insist that I'm a gay-in-denial, and that the moment a man ever experiences any sexual desire for or activity with another man, it automatically erases any and all interest in women. No, it doesn't.

When it comes to matters of sex, feminists will readily embrace antiquated, patriarchal notions about gay and bisexual men (i.e. that we're pedophiles, we're overly promiscuous, and our sexuality is predatory to the extreme). This, coupled with their refusal to denounce misandrists within their own movement, only goes to show just how much bigotry makes up the foundation of feminism. In the end, it's quite simple to figure out how they feel: if you have a penis between your legs, you are the enemy. End of story.

And THAT, my friends, is why we embrace men of all backgrounds here in the MRM.

AVfM Radio: The social contract

John Hembling (JtO) · 17 May 2012 · Archived copy · Original

[box type="download" icon="none"]

The social contract is of course, the label for a view that an individual's moral obligations are dependent upon a tacit agreement among them to form the society in which they live.

Between men and women, It was once – men are "superior" and women are "inferior". Of course what nobody ever said out loud was that the inferior partners in that top to bottom relationship were the ones controlling the social identity and value of their superiors. Strong, large, and apparently in charge, men had the role of providers, protectors, and actors in the world, assuming risk, dispensing and absorbing violence – and when convenient for the interests of others, dying. In exchange – men got a social identity as humans. Fast forward fifty years, and that positive social identity is no longer a part of the deal, but the onus to provide, to protect, and die, we've still got that. So what possible answer can any of this have? Quite simply, the deal is off. The social contract is broken.

House passes VAWA reforms!

S.A.V.E. · 17 May 2012 · Archived copy · Original

[box icon="none"]

WASHINGTON / May 17, 2012 – The House of Representatives has passed the reauthorization of the Violence Against Women Act by a 222-205 margin. Responding to public discontent, H.R. 4970 contains a number of measures designed to curb widespread waste and fraud in the domestic violence field.

A recent U.S. News poll found a strong majority of persons are opposed to the Violence Against Women Act (VAWA) in its current form: See Here Many women have questioned the effectiveness and fairness of the existing VAWA law: See Here Reforms contained H.R. 4970 include strong accountability measures, gender-inclusive language, and provisions to stem fraudulent claims of abuse by immigrants. The current VAWA law has invited immigration fraud by not allowing the US citizen accused of abuse to submit evidence that could refute the accusation.

The White House played an active role in opposing the bill. The Obama Administration issued a Statement of Administration Policy on Tuesday stating it would veto any bill that was modeled on H.R. 4970.

During Wednesday's floor debate, sponsor Sandy Adams (R-FL) withstood numerous challenges. When informed by John Conyers (D-MI) that numerous organizations opposed her bill, she retorted, "Shame on them!"

Following passage of the bill, a number of established domestic violence organizations have reacted with anger and implied threats. The National Task Force to End Sexual and Domestic Violence Against Women called the bill "dangerous." The National Organization for Women charged that Representatives who voted for the bill "will be judged in the public arena and at the polls in November."

According to SAVE spokesman Philip W. Cook, "H.R. 4970 certainly is not a perfect bill. Still, passage of the House measure is a victory for victims who have been refused service in the past. It removes most sex discriminatory language. It is also a victory for taxpayers who are tired of the ongoing reports of waste and fraud."

SAVE thanks the many organizations and individuals who have supported VAWA reform efforts. SAVE will continue to work for ways to reform and strengthen the Violence Against Women Act: www.saveservices.org/pvra .

Golden age of the white knight

Robert St. Estephe · 17 May 2012 · Archived copy · Original

Publisher's thoughts:

From the pages of Robert St. Estephe's historical goldmine of a blog, we bring yet another example of how the more things change, the more they stay the same.

Where it concerns the modern men's movement, we are thankful for the rising chorus of cogent and articulate female voices that have risen above the rote programming in order to point at the misandric elephant in the living room. At AVfM it has been and will remain our policy to provide a platform for those women to speak to the issues.

But we must remember, as we are so plainly reminded by this Boston Globe excerpt, that it is the male voice that must change and be heard. Read this short piece, gents. The rules they are trying to gag you with are not a new invention. Those rules are not even feminist rules; they are an edict from humanity, the kind of humanity that wants you on your knees with your mouth shut.

Don't give them what they want. Be a part of freeing your sons and grandsons to come from the shackles of silence enforced with shame and ridicule. The lies are scattered all around you at your feet. All you have to do is point to them and tell the truth, blue pill men and women be damned. PE

The continuing education of Arthur Goldwag

John Hembling (JtO) · 17 May 2012 · Archived copy · Original

Arthur Goldwag is still a liar, and still an unskilled one. In his May 15 edition of easily refutable nonsense, The SPLC advocate began with the following:

> "The last issue of the SPLC's Intelligence Report presented a scathing portrait of "a hard-line fringe" of the Men's Rights Movement (MRM): "women haters whose fury goes well beyond criticism of the family court system, domestic violence laws, and false rape accusations," whose rage is "directed at all women, not only perceived feminists."

In those opening 57 words, Goldwag sells a number of falsehoods, a few of which are worth examination.

"…the SPLC's Intelligence Report presented a scathing portrait of …"

Wrong, the SPLC presented a sloppily assembled misrepresentation of conservative organizations, including the Concerned Women of America, the Libertarian-leaning John Birch Society and Glen Beck, as well as second amendment activists. The SPLC's hastily constructed list of disjointed enemies also included a pick-up artist calling himself Roosh V, an organization called Stop Abusive and Violent Environments, whose mandate is to aims to improve the effectiveness of domestic violence policy, as well as some elements of the men's rights movement, including this site.

"…a hard-line fringe" of the Men's Rights Movement (MRM)"

This intentional mischaracterization is intended to discredit this site and it's contributors as outliers. Far from being a fringe, AVfM is the largest and highest-trafficked men's rights site on the web. AVfM also hosts the largest online collection of original, men's-rights-specific literature anywhere in the world. The contributing authors come from across the planet and represent numerous political, sexual, economic and ethnic backgrounds and points of view. To call this site a "fringe" of the growing human rights movement, the "so called men's rights movement," is a gross falsehood.

"…women haters…"

Oh dear, that old canard trotted out again?

This is based on the tired and sloppy argument (since Goldwag presents no other) that opposition to feminism and hatred of women are the same thing. Feminism, the ideology, and women, the group of people identifiable by their sex, of course are not the same, and not just because one is a biological demographic while the other is an ideological construct, the proponents of which are of any sex.

It is not even true to claim that feminism is a movement which serves or benefits women -although admittedly, most feminist advocates believe they are benefitting women. Treating an entire sexual demographic as if they are permanent children, powerless, locked into victimhood as a matter of identity – does not help them. It makes them easily manipulated stooges of whoever pretends to flatter and coddle them. Also, by pandering to the pseudo-celebrity privilege of victim-identity politics, it makes them easy to shake down for donations. Doesn't it, Artie ol' boy?

Interestingly, even as Goldwag clings to the notion that feminism and women are indistinguishable, he also manages to locate and cite a MRM blog[2] correctly pointing out that "Women are not feminism." Goldwag, in his efforts to cherry pick and misrepresent quotes, managed to miss that this painfully simple idea has been a regular part of the rhetoric at AVfM[3][4] since its inception.

From the pages of AVfM…

"…implication that feminism and women are interchangeable synonyms is no more insulting to real feminists than [the] facile implication that criticism or disagreement with the ideology has no possible source except hatred towards women"

"This is why in my own writing, my answer to accusations of misogyny (the hatred of women) is to explain, as to a child, that a group of people (women) and an ideology (feminism) are not actually the same thing, and that opposition to an ideology, particularly one based on hatred or violence – does not translate to hatred of women."

The logical refutation of the false claim that opposition to feminism equates to a hatred of women is documented at least as far back as 2007 in a document called the Anti-Male Shaming Tactics Catalog[5] This fallacy is listed in the catalog as "code black" or the Charge of Misogyny.

In spite of repetition on Youtube, on AVfM, on this guy's blog[2], that is, repetition of the fact that feminism and women are two different things, one being an ideology, and the other being a group of people, Goldwag still can't help himself. He categorizes his own article, in which he admits this most obvious fact, under the category "anti-woman." Really.

The last falsehood (at least from the opening paragraph) is this choice nugget :

"…whose rage is directed at all women…".

There are two lies here, but because I've already addressed the endlessly recycled lie that opposition to feminism is equal to hatred of women (feminism and women can also be distinguished by the spelling of the two words. Feminism starts with an F, for example)… rage will be addressed.

This is another circumstantial ad hominem. If individuals are angry, they usually have a reason. Sometimes the reason is difficult to discern, and must be guessed at. Someone mistreated and abused through childhood may carry anger through the rest of his or her life. To some, the source of that anger may be hard to ascertain. On the other hand, much of the black civil rights movement of the 1960's was fuelled by anger, and the source of that anger was plainly obvious. Black civil rights activists were vocal, and repeatedly explained in excruciating detail that being denied civil rights and treated as subhuman was a major source of black anger. Similarly, the current men's rights movement is also driven by a degree of anger.

Human beings dismissed as violent and hateful when they complain of the denial of basic human rights are quite naturally also angry at being lied to and being lied about. Arthur Goldwag, who writes for an organization which once protected human rights is now participating in the campaign of lies designed to silence human beings who are struggling for those same rights.

By characterizing legitimate anger as "rage," Goldwag is attempting to kill two birds with one lie. First, he is attempting to pathologize the anger; to reframe it as dangerous and unhealthy. Second, he is attempting to lead people away from the issues driving the anger and deny human rights advocates an audience willing to listen objectively. Rage, used to describe human emotion, implies fault in the humans experiencing it, and elicits scorn for those expressing it. The word: rage, chosen by Goldwag, also implies violence, doesn't it? He can't quite get away with saying so directly, as the MRM is an avowedly non-violent human rights movement, but building a case for fear of human-rights bloggers works even by implication.

All of this from Goldwag's first paragraph. 57 words conveying almost as many lies, however, a complete parsing of all of Goldwag's dishonesty is not the point of this discussion.

Surprisingly, he does mention a radical feminist blog discussed at AVfM several times in the past, on which the radical feminist bloggers advocated male targeting eugenics, infanticide, boy-targeted child abuse and other hate fuelled violence and murder.

Following the SPLC's first sloppy attempt to vilify the MRM, the fastest growing human rights movement in Western culture, the eugenics and murder enthusiasts at Radfem Hub began fund-raising on behalf of the SPLC, and Artie Goldwag himself confirmed the support of the SPLC for these prospective eugenicists and killers, by tweeting a link directly to their page featuring SPLC fund raising.

Who is a hate movement Arthur? Who? Have you looked in the mirror? Goldwag claims that AVfM's founder and publisher, Paul Elam – and his colleagues (that would include me) read or represented Pam Oshaughnessy's eugenics advocacy as a well-developed plan, calling us "obtuse" for the misrepresentation. However, he doesn't cite any actual claim of a "well developed plan" on our part, probably because we never made any such claim. Obtuse is the word he used. Okay Arthur, if you say so.
Goldwag, although he mentions the eugenics enthusiasm and other hate driven violent rhetoric at Radfem Hub, somehow forgot to mention that after AVfM exposed that group of radical feminists open call for mass murder, and after they began fund raising for the SPLC, he endorsed their site and it's content in a tweet to the SPLC fund raising page at radical hub. Oops. Obtuse, Arthur? Who? Us? Gentlemen and ladies, this is comedy that writes itself.

According to Cathy Brennan, the owner of radical hub site featuring calls for child murder, extermination, and eugenics – and where male human beings are discussed as an agricultural product, she said:

> "I don't hate men, […] I have a father, I have a brother, I have a son. The war that Paul Elam is waging is in his head"

Such is what she offers for proof she doesn't hate men. She is related to some. Will this work as a defense against the charge of misogyny as well? I have a mother, therefore I can't hate women?

This statement is also somewhat at odds with the private registration of the domain-name "paulelam.com" by Brennan, and the redirection of that domain name to the Radfem Hub hate and violence advocacy blog. Apparently Mr. Elam's head covers a lot of territory, including at least some of the terrain in the head of Brennan herself.

Oh, and in addition to having a father, a brother and a son, Brennan also has a blog which calls for their genetic modification. "If we can do it with corn, men should be easy."

Brennan also claimed that the infamous manifesto by Valerie Solanas calling for male extermination was a piece of Swiftian satire, not to be taken seriously, and that interpretations of that "satire" as a serious call for hate and killing reflected failed comprehension by "so called men's rights advocates".

This claim ignores the fact that the author of the Society for Cutting Up Men Manifesto followed her authorship of that famously incendiary hate and violence by shooting the artist Andy Warhol, among others. It also ignores the continued references by modern feminists to the document which began with: "The male is an incomplete female, a walking abortion, aborted at the gene stage. To be male is to be deficient, emotionally limited; maleness is a deficiency disease."

SCUM Manifesto derived conferences and projects continue to be held by funded and organized feminists worldwide, including a 2011 conference in Australia[6], and a Swedish theatre company adapting Solanas's hate manifesto for Swedish school children using a realistically staged public execution of a man to promote their event, followed by the call, "Do your part."

Brennan claims to view the manifesto calling for male extermination as nothing more than satire. This claim contradicted by promotion of Australia's feminist "SCUM" conference on Cathy Brennan's blog, Radical Hub. Oopsie, caught you lying again, Cathy. Arthur Goldwag somehow missed this connection, too. Blame those darned misogyny coloured goggles.

Of course, all the rhetorical mummery from Goldwag and his fellow rent-seekers at the SPLC reflect the fact that while the Southern Poverty Law Center once served an important task, helping to greatly diminish the power of the KKK in the United States in the 1960's and 70's, that former human rights organization did their job so well they're now grasping for continued relevance. Ironically, because those human rights struggles were fought from the political left 40 years ago, that still left-leaning law firm, with their two palatial high rise office complexes and gigantic budget cannot see that the fastest growing human rights movement in America today is the one they're fighting against. And why? Because men's activist don't express themselves in a way in which bigots would approve. The SPLC has become the monster they used to slay.

Arthur Goldwag can't see this, because he is an ideologue, and because he is a liar.

On politics and perspective

Fuck feminists. Fuck the left. Fuck the right. ~ Jared White, from Those Who Oppose Us

I think it is time to make a statement about AVfM. There has been much back and forth of late about right vs. left, and how that helps or hinders the men's movement. I find part of the discussion interesting, part of it disturbing and part of it stupid and unnecessary. All of it provides some simple but important lessons.

First, and to clarify for those that don't know by now, my thoughts on government fall pretty squarely in the libertarian (with a little L) camp with some rather inconsequential differences.

And that would work just fine if this were A Voice for Paul Elam, or a voice for any other individual that appoints themselves High Priest of What We Should All Believe.

However, that is the religiosity of partisan politics, and it is marked by the same destructive, divisive rigidity and denial that we see in feminists, fundamentalists and rabid, holier-than-thou Atheists. While it will invariably snake its way into MRM dialogue, including glimpses of it on the pages of this site, AVfM will remain nonpartisan and wholly inclusive of any non-violent man or woman acting earnestly in the best interest of men and boys. Anyone who would sell that out for a party vote might consider joining the Democrat or Republican Men's Rights Movement, when and if either of them grow a big enough spine (or brain, if you prefer) to start one. I am not holding my breath.

This is a discussion we are not going to avoid, though, and we should start it with a clarification of certain realities. One, the men's movement, including MRA's, MGTOW's, grass eaters, Zeta's and others who are simply opting out, is a phenomena happening regardless of what is said or done on this website or any other. It is bigger than this band of renegades, bigger than the internet, and is growing rapidly. We document it here more than we drive it.

Men are finally starting to wake up to the fact that they are getting shit upon. And it isn't just men on the right who are ending that slumber. Consequently, it isn't just men on the right who are included.

At this point we have enough real estate to faction off and it will not slow things down at all. In fact, as factions emerge and grow, the movement itself gets stronger. We now even have voices from the left that are finally beginning to realize and articulate how they have been coopted by a feminist ideology that has diluted and distorted their political ambitions.

That. Is. A. Good. Thing.

And yes, it is a good thing even if you are an ardent anti-leftist like me. I take great pride in the fact that men and women on the left can come to A Voice for Men and read some articles that reflect some of their beliefs while addressing their concerns about the state of men and boys.

We have voices from the right, who have always been slightly more welcoming of messages that eschew victim politics, who are becoming more and more anti-feminist as time goes by. They are also welcome here.

What is not and will not be a part of the editorial message of this site is blanket condemnation of MRAs because they didn't vote for a particular candidate, or because they believe in socialized medicine or because they think prayer in school is a good thing or that abortion is either a human right or the mindless murder of a child.

I will happily let the blue pill world of political automatons stay at each other's dumbed down throats over these issues while we carry on the mission of examining and ameliorating the problems faced by men across the metastasized spectrum of left and right.

That is something we are so good at that we have succeeded even in changing the rhetoric of feminist ideologues. Has anyone noticed that in the middle of all the growing attacks on this website, in other words, attacks on you, that they are now routinely acknowledging and legitimizing the list of issues that we have championed? Even the fembots are carrying our message now. They have no choice, because places like this have changed the discussion. We have put men's issues on the map and they can't even attack us any more without admitting to them. That is what not focusing on petty differences has done for us.

It wasn't the right or the Republicans that got us here. It was telling the truth to the powerful and to the powerless alike, repeatedly, doggedly and without apology. As often as not, we have had to speak that truth to the supposed right as much as the equally supposed left, neither of which seem to resemble their label these days.

As I predicted in an earlier article, we will now be faced with those who have a political (read NOT MEN'S) agenda, who would love to coopt the men's movement every bit as much as when the card carrying leftists were swallowed up by feminism.

This is in part because what we are doing, e.g. MRA's, MGTOW's, Zeta Males, etc., is not on the traffic beaten road of mainstream politics. We are forging new ground and defining a path never before taken by any group of men before the grass eaters of Japan. Those who don't understand it will attempt to own it only to find that they cannot.

Ask the Japanese government how they are going to handle the economic fallout from the Soushoku Danshi in Japan. I bet if you could get one of them to talk, he or she would tell you they don't have a fucking clue. That is, if you could catch one being honest. But, I digress.

Where it concerns those who insist on politicizing concern for men and boys, they will attempt to wrest a form of control that does not exist. They will create divisions, drawing imaginary lines in imaginary sand, and double-dog daring any of us to step over it. And still all we have to do is keep walking, with an indifference born of deeper understanding of the issues than what is possessed by would-be usurpers.

A side effect will be some good discussions. Conservative philosophy is a compatible fit with the MRM, at least until the chivalrist, tradcon, über-capitalist war mongers start fucking everything up. But speaking for and about AVfM, I can tell you that this forum will never, ever be defined by those with ambitions to pigeonhole the MRM into an American partisan agenda.

First, this is an international website that happens to be housed in Texas (a fine country that borders the U.S.A.). Like our Aussie brothers, we're kinda partial to taking our own road. Our supporters come from across the planet and from innumerable backgrounds and systems of belief. Allowing that to change by marginalizing any of those men and women is nothing less than a well-aimed bullet directly in the foot.

We did not make it this far by being dense and we are not going to take a detour down Stupid Street now. The belief here is that there is no such thing as a bad voice in opposition to the bigotry of gender feminism.

This site was created to discuss the problems faced by men in this society. As far as I can tell, as many of those problems are created and/or maintained by the right as the left. I am not going to ignore that for Barak Obama, and not for Mitt Romney, when I would trust neither of them with a man's freedom, or the well-being of a male child.

The clincher to this is obvious to me. Our time is better spent on other things. As the movement grows there will be factions that emerge from our divisions. Support them. If right wing social conservatives want to battle feminism so they can clear the way for more young men to mount their white horsies, then let 'em do it. They are still battling feminists, lessening their foothold on power and legislation, which is still good for us at this stage.

If leftists want to start standing up to the feminist bullshit that is now defining their entire movement, they are welcome to send articles here so they can do it.

If any of the polemicist's are smart, they will stay out of our way, too, and enjoy the fact that the work we do also supports their agenda, at this point in time.

Bickering now, when we still benefit from each others work, just to claim ownership of something we don't and fucking well CAN'T own, is kinda crazy, isn't it?

No to the stick, no to the carrot

The Huffington Post ran an article on 9 May 2012 suggesting to women that sexual relations[1] with Republican men be unilaterally suspended as a form of work-to-rule, based on the current media characterization of a supposed "war on women".

Setting aside the fiction that as the only sexual demographic who actually have any legal reproductive rights; women are currently subject to a "war". This false but popular characterization obscures the actual political debate ongoing about whether women should benefit by forcing other people to pay for their birth control and other health services. However, on hearing about this from Bernard Chapin, it struck me as an applied case of the "appeal to force," or collective blackmail.

However, there is an unexamined assumption in the Huffpo feminine-approval-seeker's advice for a sex strike. This assumption is present in several other areas of superficially male-versus-female political rhetoric.

It is most strongly evident in a substantial fraction of anti-rape activism. A widely circulated list of "tips to stop rape" includes repeated admonitions, aimed at men, to "remember to not rape". Of course, this timely advice reinforces the essential truth that men, as distinct from human beings, are simply appetite-driven rutting beasts. This is not only the logical basis for controlling men's behavior (in particular, Republicans) by denying them what they quite obviously care the most about. Aside from this handle of ownership and control, the subhuman character of male creatures certainly justifies a continued blithe disregard for any of the complaining of so called activists in pursuit of male human rights.

The assumed, and indeed the expected response, by men towards overt female sexuality is of course, competition for access, sycophantic subservience, or simply a drooling, blatant caricature of lust, like a cartoon wolf. Modelling of behaviours outside these few allowable expressions is treated in an insecure society with revulsion and censure. This at least partly explains the continued prejudice, sometimes manifested as violence against gay men in some parts of the United States. However, there is another unacceptable masculine response growing in popularity.

This is the avoidance of sex, and of women. As a self defined man, this is entirely unsurprising to me. Wall Street Journal columnist James Taranto[2] mentioned a growing reticence of young men to become sexually entangled with women, referencing sociologist Amy Schalet's New York Times article[3], misleadingly titled: Caring Romantic Boys. In her April 6 article Schalet claims first romance, then fear as the motivation for increased caution and reluctance to have sex. In both cases she misses the point, but comes closer to the truth mentioning fear.

Taranto, a writer who is coincidentally male, nails it in his discussion:

> …there is good reason for males (men as well as boys) to be more fearful of sex than females. Contemporary reproductive technology and law place all the burden for unwanted pregnancy on them. Between the pill and abortion, women have complete control over the reproductive process. They can avoid or end any unwanted pregnancy, and the man involved has no say in the matter.

Schalet somehow missed this point, in spite of the obvious implication of this quote, directly from her NYT piece: "American boys often said sex could end their life as they knew it. After a condom broke, one worried: 'I could be screwed for the rest of my life.'"

Apparently, there's more to young men than a bottomless drive to ram-jam themselves into every willing feminine orifice. It might even be that beyond an intelligent awareness of their own total lack of legal rights in reproduction, coupled with their government's willingness to compel their financial support of women's exercised legal rights by force, asset seizure and imprisonment, that men, even the young and stupid, are increasingly unwilling to be controlled through their hormones.

This emerging conscious self preservation and rejection of a growing cultural censure of male identity is finding its way into mainstream reporting, as demonstrated by Schalet and Taranto. But as this becomes more obvious, attempts to force conformity with female-selected definitions of “real” masculinity also rise. This is evident in social conservative women’s organizations whose message to men amounts to: “get back on the treadmill of provide and protect” as well as unambiguous attempts to shame men into conformity with characterizations such as “peter pan syndrome”, “boy-men” and similar pejoratives directed at those opting out. Even Amy Schalet managed to characterize men saying no as if it were feminine romanticism.

The reality of this phenomenon was noted in 2002 by Naomi Wolfe in her online NY Magazine article “The Porn Myth”. According to Wolfe “By the new millennium, a vagina, which, by the way, used to have a pretty high “exchange value,” as Marxist economists would say, wasn’t enough; it barely registered on the thrill scale.”

The Beauty Myth author spotted the trend, but misattributed its cause, based on the old 2nd wave feminist conception of men as subhuman. But increasingly, the rutting beasts in this narrative are having none of it.

This doesn’t mean male culture necessarily embraces celibacy, as some critics of the MGTOW movement will sneer in their attack articles. Rather, that men are now and always have been human beings whose sexuality, desires, and human needs are as complex and nuanced as women’s, even if those desires and needs are not identical. This simple fact appears to run contrary to the feminist mainstream in which masculine character is one of violent, brutal, and indiscriminate lust.

And the men who say no thanks to such a vision of their identities are told they are unmanly, faggots, infantile children, man-boys, failures or any other of a host of pejoratives. The choice then seems to be between conform as a man-beast, or refuse as a testosterone deficient, non-“real” masculine example of failure.

The answer to these unappealing prospects, for a growing number of men is no thanks. No thanks to option A and no thanks to option B. But sex is critical to the interface between men going off the reservation and the culture which simultaneously depends on, and condemns them. The choices proffered are finding ever diminishing preference from men, opting for sex on their own terms, or not at all. Those terms generally being exclusive of conformity to external definition of what is a real man. A violent man, a domineering, oppressive man, or a weak, prostrate, and apologetic man seeking approval or permission to exist.

The absence in this narrative of just what is encompassed by men going their own way is deliberate. This is the province of men as individuals, many of whom; while not a collective, are disinclined to explain themselves, ask permission, or apologize.

Man, Woman, Truth: Divorcing your children

Dr. Paul & Dr. T · 19 May 2012 · Archived copy · Original

[box icon="none"]

What do men do when the marriage is over, but the ex-wife uses the kids as a permanent, go-to method for continuing her vindictive and vengeful behavior? For many men, there is no good way out. They are, out of love for their children, locked in to a lifestyle of continuing abuse. Frequently the children are enlisted by the mother to share her hatred and animosity for the father, and what was once a broken marriage becomes a broken family.

Some men are forced to consider an almost unthinkable solution, which is to say good-bye to their children. It is a problem that no man wants, yet many face.

Some men live by a code as fathers that no matter what the circumstances saying good-bye to their children is not an option. Unfortunately in some of those cases that position results in more chaos, for him, and for his children.

Sometimes staying in the mix is the wrong thing to do.

This is a very difficult and controversial topic, but this Monday, on the Man, Woman, Truth Radio Program we will address it with frankness and honesty.

We invite you to join hosts Paul Elam and Dr. Tara Palmatier for a rare discussion on the difficult decision to divorce your children.

The phone lines will be open at 310-388-9709 for your calls, and after the one hour program both Paul and Dr. T will be present in the Stickam room for further discussion and to field questions.

If you are a father feeling trapped in an endless pattern of destruction by your ex-wife and dealing with children whose minds have been poisoned and turned against you, please join us for this very special program.

The show airs live on May 21, at 8:00 Central Time, US, which is 2:00 a.m. May 22, in London and 11:00 a.m. May 22 in Brisbane. If you have not yet requested membership in the Stickam Room, you can do so through the link below.

MRM Marxism?

Mateusz Wacek · 19 May 2012 · Archived copy · Original

I don't intend this article to be entirely in defense of leftist ideology (Marxism, communism, socialism, etc.), and I don't mean to say that leftism is the answer to all of the problems men face. Rather, the purpose is more of a clarification. While the men's rights movement has a diverse membership, there is a large anti-left tendency, particularly hostility towards socialist or communist ideology.

I am proposing a few points which I want to elaborate on. First, I want to explain the ideology of the left, including specific terminology. Second, I'd like to state how, contrary to what feminists may claim when using the leftist movement, feminism is actually in opposition to Marxist communism in particular, and leftism in general. Also, I would like to point out how the men's rights movement can actually benefit from leftism, including communist ideology and Marxism, as well as how capitalism, especially as it exists now in the West, is harmful to men.

As for background, I don't have a PhD in Marxism, and the closest I come is studying for a Master's in the People's Republic Of China (a name with almost as many falsities in it as the Holy Roman Empire, though at least the PRC is Chinese). I also don't consider myself entirely Marxist, socialist, nor communist, and have issues with all three (I prefer to keep unlabeled, as labels tend to be inaccurate and troublesome), though also find points of agreement with Marxism and especially limited state socialism.

However, I have read the Communist Manifesto, gone through Wage, Labour, & Capital, and I have been a part of an anti-capitalist organization on my college campus where I have seen that organization reflect an increasingly feminist stance. Though, in case McCarthyists are interested, I am not now, and nor have I ever been, a card-carrying member of the Communist Party.

One problem with the definitions is that even among scholars and experts, there is not full consensus on terminology. However, I have come up with some working definitions which are basic enough to be more or less agreed upon. When I say leftism, I'm referring to general anti-capitalist tendencies, which include various branches of communism (Marxism, Maoism, Leninism, Trotskyism, etc.), socialism, syndicalism, anarchism, and the variations (anarcho-socialism, social democracy, libertarian socialism, anarcho-primitivism, etc.). Specifically, communism is a political and economic theory developed (though not invented by) Karl Marx in which all property is publicly and collectively owned. Communist ideology holds that there are two main classes, the workers (proletariat), who do the actual physical work, and capitalists (bourgeoisie), who own the means of production, such as land and factories, and make money from the work of others.

Capitalism, according to leftist thought, is inherently exploitative, especially since companies are driven by the mandate to make profit, and the concerns of the workers don't factor into a company unless they affect profit. An illustration would be an example of a factory. The workers perform all the labor, but they do not own the finished product, nor have true say in the working conditions, pay, or workplace safety. The owner makes all of the decisions, and also owns the finished products, and sells them on the open market to earn a profit.

After subtracting the cost of materials, transportation, and operational costs, the capitalist (not the workers) decides how much of the money made from the sales to give to the workers, as well as how much money to spend on such things as workplace safety (if any is spent). In modern times (the Communist Manifest was written over a century and a a half ago), this is further developed into exploring how corporations work within the state, such as political lobbies and government regulation, or lack thereof.

Socialism, then, would be an answer to this. Socialism would primarily collectivization, taking the means of production from capitalists, and putting power into the hands of the workers (collective farming after the Chinese revolution, for example) by means of a socialist state. Capitalists as a class would be eliminated, and individual capitalists would then become workers (this also happened during the Chinese revolution, though often though force, when landowners often attempted to hold onto their property).

A socialists state would also have a planned economy, where the state controls the means of production in the name of the workers (as opposed to direct control by workers, such as in syndicalism), and makes all economic decisions, i.e. It would be full nationalization. This would be the "dictatorship of the proletariat", and according to Marx, "… the first step in the revolution by the working class is to raise the proletariat to the position of ruling class to win the battle of democracy." Ideally, however, it would still be accountable to the workers, so that those who work in the factories would be protected from exploitation by the government, which would be answerable to the people.

It should be noted that this hasn't been the case historically. Leon Trotsky accused the Soviet Union of being a "… degenerated workers' state under the dictatorship of the bureaucracy." Mao Zedong also initially criticized members the Chinese Communist Party who he saw as becoming a new social class of ruling elite, and called for the workers to also voice criticism. However he did also change his stance quickly when he personally felt threatened by such criticism ("Fight the power" is a less appealing slogan when you are the one in power).

Pure communism would be the final stage, where the state power vastly declines, and is decentralized into the hands of the individual workers. It would be a completely classless society, where all are equal, democratically elected officials would rule by consent of the ruled. The people would then own the means of production through the state, and so all decisions regarding the actual running of businesses, as well as how to spend the material wealth generated, would be made in the interests of the workers. Using the earlier factory example, under communism, the workers at the factory could decide to spend the profits made on better salaries or working conditions.

As mentioned before, there are a great many leftist ideologies besides Marxist communism, however addressing them would take a great amount of time, and risk going too far off the main topic of how leftism relates to men's rights. While there are many disagreements on issues such as how strong the state should be, or what should be the level of organization, the basic tenants of opposing capitalism, and putting power into the hands of the common people, the workers, are held by almost all leftist ideologies. However, I'll be mainly addressing Marxist communist ideology. While the above explanations are still lengthy, it's important to know the terms.

Feminism has, especially recently, allied itself with Marxism (you can check the sites of many Marxist and Marxist derived organizations), as well as forming their own organizations that are explicitly Marxist-feminist (as well as socialist-feminist, or communist-feminist, distancing from pure Marxist ideology), such as Radical Women, or the Freedom Socialist Party. However, while these organizations may have helped feminists in gaining more power, by co-opting communism and socialism, they ignore that feminism is incompatible with Marxist thought, as well as leftism in general.

Most obviously, and most importantly, Marxist ideology is based on class struggle. From the Communist Manifesto:

> The history of all hitherto existing society is the history of class struggles. Freeman and slave, patrician and plebeian, lord and serf, guild-master and journeyman, in a word, oppressor and oppressed, stood in constant opposition to one another, carried on an uninterrupted, now hidden, now open fight, a fight that each time ended, either in a revolutionary reconstitution of society at large, or in the common ruin of the contending classes.

Nowhere there is any mention of sex or gender. Feminists, both Marxist and otherwise, add "men and women" to the "oppressor and oppressed" list, but in doing so, completely and often intentionally miss the point. According to Marxism, a person is a member of the oppressor class by oppressing. A person is a member of the oppressed class, by being oppressed. It is all based on action and behavior. For feminists, a person is a member of the oppressor class by having a penis, and a person is a member of the oppressed class by having a vagina. This allows any man to be demonized as oppressor without considering if he actually did any oppressing.

Likewise, a woman gets the status of oppressed, with all the moral high ground, regardless of if she actually was oppressed. Marxism would see a male coal miner as oppressed, and a female sweatshop owner as oppressor, while feminism would not, looking only at gender. The miner, by having a penis, would be hated as privileged, and the sweatshop owner, by having a vagina, would be thought of as held down by the patriarchy. Marx himself, as far back as the mid 1800s, said “Differences of age and sex have no longer any distinctive social validity for the working class. All are instruments of labour, more or less expensive to use, according to their age and sex.”

While feminist Marxists (as well as other leftist feminists) pay lip service worker’s rights, they fail to address that men are the ones currently most exploited by the current system (and would also benefit most in abolishing the current system).

For example, and this is just one such example, an article “The Russian Revolution and the Emancipation of Women” on the International Communist League website says, “A working woman has more in common with her male co-workers than with a female boss, and the emancipation of women is the task of the working class as a whole.” [1]

This is true, and under Marxism, women would be liberated as part of the working class no more or less than men would be liberated as part of the same class. Despite stating this, the same author also says, “Today, millions of women even in the advanced capitalist “democracies” endure nasty and brutish lives of misery and drudgery. In the United States, to name just two instances of anti-woman bigotry, abortion rights are under increasing attack and quality childcare is scarce and too costly for most working women.” [1]

This flagrantly ignores that men are the majority of workplace fatalities [2] (here’s the BLS statistic, even though most MRAs have it burned into their minds to the point where I could simply offer the citation as “Your own memory”), because mine owners decide that it would cut into profits too much to improve safety inspections. When there’s a disaster on an oil derrick, women aren’t disproportionately the ones crushed under tons of twisted machinery and drowned. This is not to say that women never have the dirty and dangerous jobs, but rather that men outnumber women in these jobs.

The author also assumes that only women have rights on the issue of abortion (ignoring men, who lack reproductive rights, and the unborn, who has no say at all in their own life or death), and that only women should have the right to childcare. This female supremacist viewpoint is something that can be found all over socialist/communist movements, as well as other leftist movements.

Men are also the ones forced into the system of wage slavery far more than women. Feminists ignore that women have society’s blessing to choose full-time work, part-time work, or full-time child care, while men who choose anything other than full-time work (and thus the greatest worker exploitation) are objects of ridicule in popular culture, and objects of suspicion when seen in public taking care of children (the only reason a man would want to be anywhere near a child is because he wants to rape it into oblivion, of course). Further, the current system of alimony and child support (both highly sexist), allow women to consider divorce and paternal fraud as careers.

The redistribution of wealth and resources is often a source of contention, where MRAs see governments benefit women with funding for specialized programs such as offices of women’s health, paid for with tax money, direct giving money to women through special loans to female business owners, and opportunities through affirmative action. The state also facilitates direct person to person transfer of wealth through alimony and child support (including making it easy to commit child support fraud). However, this is not a problem with wealth distribution (at least in terms of pure men’s rights), but how it is done, and how it is done is not Marxist, but following a feminist path of female supremacy.

According to Marx, “From each according to his ability, to each according to his needs!” Female victims of violence, the smallest population of violence victims, are given funding through shelters and programs (like VAWA) far above need. Following true Marxism, men would get the same tax supported benefits, such as funding for prostate cancer research.

Further, a worker’s state would be accountable not to the wealthy political donors (here’s a good place to note that women control a majority of the wealth [3], allowing them to decide what organizations to fund, and which political candidates to donate to) and lobby groups (such as the American Association Of University Women, or the National Organization Of Women, as only a few examples of powerful feminist lobbies), but to the workers themselves.

There is so much pushback for men's reproductive rights because men lack the ability to install candidates friendly to the cause of male rights. Feminists can easily lobby for laws that redefine rape to exclude male victims, because MRAs have little say in the matter, lacking the wealth and resources. A Marxist state would have a mandate to protect all rape victims, regardless of the sex of the perpetrator and victim, and if the government failed to do so, there would be no powerful lobbies to drown out the voices calling for more egalitarian leadership.

While women control a majority of the wealth, men still earn a majority of the wages (and thus are the most oppressed by wage slavery, under Marxist thought), because men don't have the choices women do. In fact, this is one way almost all forms of leftism, from anarchism to Zapatistismo, has much in common with zeta masculinity, and Men Going Their Own Way (MGTOW).

Zeta masculinity and anti-capitalism both acknowledge that the jostling for higher and higher position and blind accumulation of wealth and status are detrimental to the people who are trapped in such a life style. They both accept that people all have inherent value that is not contingent on the size of their bank account or how much they can produce for others to consume and profit from.

Both also could contribute to each other. Zeta masculinity can demonstrate how the drive to wealth and status is due to female hypergamy and societal pressure which ties the value of a male as person to his wealth and status. Leftism can offer for consideration how the acquisition of wealth and status is through worker exploitation. In a classless society, men would be free to go their own way without capitalists pushing for society and government to keep men in their place as an exploitable class, and without biased family laws using the threat of debtor's prisons to have men support women and the children they did not chose to have (assuming they even helped to conceive them in the first place).

So finally, what can the MRM take from this? The MRM has plenty of theory, and while theory is important, so is practical application. Well, here is some such practical application. As stated, leftist ideology has more in common with men's rights than many might think. While this doesn't mean that MRAs need to become revolutionary Marxists, it would at least be an argument for giving leftism a detailed looking over as a possible path towards equality of the genders.

More importantly, it means that those who are already on the anti-capitalist left already have more in common with the MRM than they think (to look at it from the reverse side). MRAs might meet people who actually are card-carrying members of a communist party, or are some part of a left tendency movement (one such example is in an article [4] from a disgruntled anarchist I came across while researching this article). Those in communist, socialist, anarchist, or other such movements are faced with growing feminist domination to the point where they can be feel they need to choose to either support a leftist tendency, or a path towards male equality, but cannot do both.

This was actually my own experience, and one reason I felt the need for such an article as this. I was part of a leftist, anti-capitalist student union. While I never fully chose one label as identity, I agreed with much of Marxism, as well as communist ideology. However, I saw how the group became increasingly feminist, and pursued gynocentrism in ways that had real impact.

The organization had a women's committee, without any such committee for men. Whenever rape was addressed, it was according to what feminism allowed (evil men raping innocent women), and because rape was something only men ever did, false rape accusations were taboo to talk about (feminist defined rape culture was treated with actual seriousness). The organization promoted International Women's Day, with nothing for men.

The university, like so many other American universities, lacked a men's resource center, despite having one for women, and the student union was silent, as it was also silent during the male shaming "Walk A Mile In Her Shoes" campaign. This was an organization that organized and participated in protests and hosted rallies for rights, just not for everyone's rights. I was increasingly frustrated at the support, tacit and explicit, for inequality as long as it was female supremacist. More important than my discomfort was the feeling of lost opportunity. If there was a viable MRA view in this, and other such student unions, important changes could have been instituted.

We in the MRM need to make it know that they are not at all mutually exclusive. There exist people so revolutionarily Marxist that Che Guevara would have worn shirts with their faces. We can let them know that not only do they not need to abandon Marxism (or any other form of leftism) in order to seek male equality, but that must oppose feminism and take up gender equality in order to be true to their ideology.

MRAs can have the discourse tools needed to engage those on the left on terms they are familiar with, and appeal to already held views, not to persuade through deception or sleight of hand, as feminists have done, but with the logic and factuality the MRM has been forced to develop over the years by virtue of being a repressed viewpoint.

The MRM is not a monolithic organization, singular in thought on all things. Rather, it is a coalition of people united in the struggle to bring about gender equality. An advantage of a coalition is the way it brings together varying viewpoints. We have been good at allowing members of differing religious beliefs to feel welcome and bring their views.

Perhaps there is something a Jewish point of perspective can offer to men's rights, or something atheism can bring, or Hinduism, or various forms of Christianity. Incidentally, this is in contrast to the above mentioned feminist "communist" organization, "ICL", which only allows atheism, and is openly hostile to other beliefs.

If the MRM is able to benefit from acceptance of different religions, then there should be room for different political views (as long as those views are beneficial towards the goal of equality). Not only should there be tolerance in spite of the differences, but looking to see what these different political views can offer the movement.

SFU feminists say STFU to male students

John Hembling (JtO) · 20 May 2012 · Archived copy · Original

Simon Fraser University may become one of the first universities in the world to establish a men's centre. The logical complement to that school's women's centre – an established feature which almost all universities have had for decades. When asked why there is no men's centre, the comfortably funded and long established women's centre's advocates claim "the men's centre is everywhere else". In spite of the fact that men are overwhelming the targets of violent crime in all areas of life, according to the women's centre FAQ: "The simple answer is that the men's centre is everywhere else."[1]

Men are privileged, men are privileged, men are privileged, men are privileged, men are privileged, men are privileged – which is why when men speak up, they are told to shut up, sit down and go to the back of the line. Men have the privilege of not being aware of their privilege, until told in sneering tones that male privilege is what means men must man up and shut their mouths. I looked up the word privilege while writing this, just to check the meaning hadn't been officially altered.

According to the FAQ page on the SFU Women's Center website, "the men's centre is everywhere else". But this "everywhere else" reflects the public climate in which, without blushing, or a nod to self satire – the women's centre FAQ includes the statement that "We are not interested in seeing a group or centre develop that promotes the status quo, encourages sexual assault, or fosters an atmosphere of competition and violence."

Suggesting that fostering violence or encouraging sexual assault was ever, or ever would be a goal of a men's centre. This is naked and despicable anti-male hatred expressed from a position of such comfort, and dominance it's authors do not even bother to obfuscate it behind circumspect language.

Farther down the FAQ page of the women's centre, male identity is defined as denigrating women. That masculinity sexually objectifies women. That masculinity is hateful, that masculinity is violent, and stifling of emotional expression. Within the FAQ: "What is the Male Allies Project" of the SFU women's centre states:

> "We know that many men are concerned with the way masculinity denigrates women by making them into sexual objects, is homophobic, encourages violence, and discourages emotional expression."

Masculinity, the sexual identity of men, is according to the women's centre FAQ, violent, hateful, denigrating and emotionally stunted. The male allies project then appears perfectly suited to teaching young men, forming their adult identities as they attend university, to hate themselves.

A few paragraphs farther up the page, the FAQ also includes "we believe that no one in this world should be treated as a doormat and that we are all entitled to receiving respect and social and political rights." (emphasis mine) These two declarations found not only on the same site, but a few paragraphs apart on the same page, but both cannot be true, unless the "we" in the claim " we are all entitled to receiving respect" is not intended to encompass men. It is after all, the women's centre FAQ page.

On the other hand, the page includes a link to the anti male hate organization NOMAS, listed under the heading "some great websites".

The FAQ uses the word violence 8 times. Once to suggest the disgusting lie that a proposed men's centre would promote violence. Once to suggest that male identity is violent. Once to refer to domestic violence, which in feminist rhetoric is constantly represented with a false narrative of men as universal abusers, and women as universal victims. Four references are made to stopping violence against women, in spite of the fact that men are more likely to be the victims of violence.

But predictably, men are admonished through the language of the site to help end violence against women. Not to help end violence. No, just that against women, who, statistically, are the least targeted by violent crime.

And the public rhetoric emerging from the SFU campus is that a men's centre is a fiscally irresponsible idea, and that a "room with a Play-Station 3 and a bunch of douche bags sitting around playing games" is what's actually under consideration.

The male targeting hatred is so thick, even mainstream reporting is talking about it in unambiguous language. Robyn Urback of the National Post referred to ideological opposition to the proposed men's centre as "shocking anti-male hatred on the SFU campus"[2]

Probably more shocking to some than others, but whether the SFU Men's Centre is defeated by gender ideologues or not, male targeting hatred now has an official opposition. We are coming.

Exposing feminism's rotten core

Luigi Logan (aka Fidelbogen) · 20 May 2012 · Archived copy · Original

The all-seeing eye of the non-feminist revolution is everywhere — especially in enemy territory — and there is no telling what it will turn up next! And by now you'll have heard about Agent Orange, our man behind the scene who has done such stellar work exposing the rotten core of female supremacism to the disinfecting sunlight. Agent Orange has seen much indeed, behind the scene, and his summary of the scenery gets to the point: "When you see what feminism really is, you cannot unsee."

In late 2011, AVfM ran some articles exposing a radical feminist writer, Vliet Tiptree, and a very disturbing post which she published on a blog called Radfem Hub. In her blog post, Vliet Tiptree muses upon the worthlessness and ultimate disposability of the male sex, and seems to insinuate that male genocide, or at least a radical eugenic engineering program, might be in the cards.

Various pro-male partisans conducted a search of the public record, and discovered that "Vliet Tiptree" was in fact Pamela O'Shaughnessy, a prominent California lawyer and bestselling novelist who has been published by Simon & Schuster and reviewed by the New York Times. Yes — a person living a double life; a public figure with a valuable reputation to lose!

Pamela O., being a lawyer by profession, knows very well how to choose her words. And in her article she lays out her theme in such circumspect language that we cannot pin her down conclusively as recommending male genocide. Still, it seems clear that she wants to plant this idea, in the minds of her readers, as something worth thinking about. In the comment thread that follows the article, readers are quick to oblige, and their manner of expression is less guarded.

All of this is old news, but it sets the stage for our present story. Briefly then, the enterprising Agent Orange accessed a members-only discussion forum attached to the Radfem Hub website. (Yes, this is a war, and in war, espionnage happens. Deal!) The name of the forum is "Women's Lives Matter/Women's Life Matters", and it is populated by the most extreme radical lesbian separatists you can imagine. We shall abbreviate the cumbersome title as WLM. Agent Orange, in his investigation, studied the forum encyclopedically from end to end and downloaded the entire content — dubbed the Agent Orange Files — for the enlightenment of non-feminist men and women. Pamela O. enters into this, and I'll get back to her. But first things first.

This is what you get when you boil down feminism to its unadulterated essence. It is the sticky, foul-smelling residue at the bottom of the pan. Contrary to what feminists will tell you, it is indeed "really" feminism — as real as feminism gets. And whoever informs you otherwise, is directing your attention away from "the little womyn behind the curtain."

All right. Here we have a group of feminists who hate men so violently that they choose to talk in secret amongst themselves — they cannot let the outside world hear. Even other feminists, who perhaps hate men only one half or one quarter as much as these ones do, cannot be admitted to the inner sanctum.

Huddled in a self-referential intellectual masturbation circle, out of the sight of non-feminist men and women, their sickness is plainly apparent. They go through life looking for validation, seeing only what they need to see, ignoring anything that might guide their understanding toward a different conclusion.They are blocking, filtering, maneuvering and cherry-picking, or in a word, rationalizing. And why? Well at a guess, I'd say it's because they'd rather not discover the truth about themselves. Isn't that just good old fashioned human nature?

Theirs is the frustration of spoiled children who cannot always get their way. The world — or as they would say, the patriarchy — always outmaneuvers and defeats them. And why wouldn't it? The world is so much bigger than they are. In the end, that word "patriarchy" is little more than a placeholder for "anything of a plausibly male origin which frustrates me".

In classic feminist form, they cannot separate the personal from the political. Men have hurt them? Goodness, haven't they noticed that people hurt each other all the time in this hurtful world? They must learn to deal with this — it's called growing up. Yes, it is true that men have hurt women. It is also true that women have hurt men. Oh, and men have hurt other men, and women have hurt other women. So the traffic runs in four different channels. As I say, people hurt each other all the time — they do this every which-way from Friday. So if the radfems are hell bent upon revenge, why don't they just hunt down all the men who have hurt them — one at a time! — and hurt them right back? That seems like the way to do it, if you want my opinion. But I should be very, very careful of what I say here, or they will be hunting for me too. Poor dears.

These feminists make no bones about stating that "men are the problem". They are not bashful upon that subject; they lay it on the line just as pretty as you please:

Mangetout says:

"Males are the problem. They refuse to see that they are the problem."

Maggie H. says:

"Womyn, having to put up with men's shit, place the onus onto themselves to stop a bad situation from happening, while it is men who need a thorough discipline forced upon them."

White Tiger says:

"..men have the same designation, in my view, of annoying rodents."

Journey Mistress says:

". .men are assholes. That last part bears repeating; men are assholes."

rjeenah says:

". . men are self-centered assholes who expect you to cater to their every whim . ."

Dawnsister says:

"I'll take any revolution I can get. Any revolution that removes most of the males will do just fine."
I could go on and on with these samples, but you get the idea. And no, putting them back in their context will not improve them. They are every bit as bad as they sound, and the people who wrote them are ten times worse. For it is a mark of narcissism when you cannot admit that you are wrong at least some of the time. And it is a mark of female narcissism in particular, when you cannot admit that women are wrong at least some of the time. And the people cited above are guilty on both counts. How quickly the personal becomes the political, yes?

My own observation has been, that the stereotypically destructive qualities which certain folklore ascribes to women in general, cluster more thickly around feminist women. For indeed there is a stratum of women which has always given the female population a bad name, and these people have been called different things at different times. In recent times, they've gotten politically organized, and yes, "feminism" is the name they have given to their gig.

The hatred of men and things male, so patently displayed in the WLM forum, also appears among mainstream feminists when they converse or otherwise express themselves. However, you will not often find it so concentrated; normally, the misandry occurs in subtle flashes and fleeting innuendos. It will be heavily watered down, as a pervading moral undertow, seeping through the culture like tainted outflow from a sewage treatment plant. Almost never is it so crudely vitriolic and sustained as what we are now revealing to the world. Here, we learn what feminists say to each other when they think the world isn't listening.

We should lay to rest the silly notion that such feminists as these are only "fringe radicals" or "extremists", and that we mustn't judge the entire movement by them. My question is, why shouldn't we judge the entire movement by them? Compared to them, what do the moderate feminists really add up to? Anything much? What does a heap of feathers amount to, compared to a cannon ball? What really fuels feminism, anyway? Is it driven relentlessly forward by mellowness and grooviness — by fun, fluffy, happy feelings? Or does it run, let us say, on pure hate, pure spite, pure malevolence, pure malignancy? Well, you get the idea: darker emotions?

Well? Do you reckon the earnest feminists with their philanthropic "gynergy" got this big thing rolling fifty years ago, and have been the central driving force ever since? And do you suppose that a few disaffected souls gravitated after the fact to this fine, humanistic social movement, and decided to lurk around the fringe just to confuse us about the truly wholesome nature of it all?

Say what you will, but I am partial to the old maxim that happy people don't make history. And which is more, I've got some experience with feminists; I have studied them, as chaps like me will do, and I have logged a few years in this trade. And I can attest that feminists are all alike. Monolithic, you might say. They vary in superficialities, but under all those sheathing layers lies the high-conductive cable core on which the feminist message travels. It is the same message every time. Every feminist I have ever personally encountered, or been informed of, differs from the radfems we are now studying only in the strength of the underlying signal. One way or another, let them veil it ever so artfully, the message never skips a beat: "Men are the problem. . . men are the problem . . . men are the problem."

The elaborately braided radfem "story" about men, patriarchy, and all the rest, is the core of the entire feminist narrative. As such, it is the core of the entire feminist enterprise. And these radicals represent the frontier toward which all of feminism, by the law of its nature, is forever trending. True, these ones are ahead of the curve — and yet they point the way. The future of liberal feminism is always radical, and if it is not, then it has no future at all.

Speaking of the future, the WLM feminists are forthcoming about how they'd like to address the man problem, and have floated a number of lively proposals:

Daughter of the Stars says:

"Actually, they [men] should be put on a leash, put in a cage, or put to sleep, just like they do to any animal which causes them any problem."
yba wife says: :"…we have a [similar idiot] group here in the UK Fathers for Justice . . . who love nothing better that telling women they 'have too much power' and they have had enough . . . . even swift bullets are too good for this wankering lot."

Maggie H. says:

"Men can all fuck off and die as far as I'm concerned."

WhiteTiger says:

"I think it's a great idea to produce sperm in a la-BOR-a-tory. That way, men will be completely redundant."

MGO says:

"That is how wewill win. Not birthing males. Convincing vast numbers of females not to birth males. We have the absolute power over reproduction (and teh menz know it). So that is our weapon."

Bonobobabe says:

"Actually, now that I think about it, a better source of animal glue (and leather, for that matter) would be from the bodies of men who have committed any crime against a woman. They should be put to death, skinned, and then their carcasses can be boiled for glue."

Bonobobabe continues:

"Although, I think we would be overrun and probably wouldn't have the resources to deal with all the bodies."

Luckynkl says:

"A 12″ cast iron skillet to the back of the head speaks far louder than words and allows him to take your point with crystal clarity. Men don't want women taking up their valuable time, so clarity is appreciated."

Mangetout says:"….kill off all the alpha-males, all the aggressive males, and retrain the remaining more compliant males."

Bonobobabe says:

"Ah, Lorena Bobbitt. That takes me back. I remember the reactions were distinctly split by sex. …and even if the women expressed sympathy for Mr. Bobbitt. . . when they were in mixed company, as soon as no men were around, the women admitted they thought it was cool what she did."

"Radfem attitude is a spiritual aquifer that feminist-leaning women can dip into whenever the mood strikes them. We too have lowered a bucket into this deep, dark well — and behold the sample we have hauled up! We do this because we wish to show what is hidden from the world's gaze. Certain women haul this spirit up because they wish to fortify themselves."

And that goes double for the radical feminists. Whoever carries this radfem ideology as a mental backdrop can go almost anywhere and arbitrarily stir up trouble. They will be equipped with a bag of tricks and a way of working, and can work their game independently of right or wrong, of true or false. For almost any human scenario has a grain of ambiguity somewhere about it, and a skilled manipulator can make this grow and turn it to unethical advantage. In the end, feminism is all about stirring up trouble in this way and blaming it on others, especially if those others are male.

Let me be very, very clear. I do not doubt that many of these radfem women have endured genuinely bad, even traumatic experience at the hands of one man or another, and that these male actors were indeed the malefactors. But I believe that such experience, in many cases, warped their keels so that they could no longer navigate correctly, and that subsequent experience suffered from this warpage, which in turn compounded it. The warpage is what concerns me — I don't want it to spread to the rest of the world. But the radfem project, seemingly, is to make that very thing happen.

Radical feminism — and especially the brand we see here — is a kind of think-tank or test laboratory for ideas that will be gradually drip-fed into the general culture. Almost everything you hear such womyn talking about eventually percolates into the collective mind, melds with the zeitgeist, and makes itself familiar. However, you will sense only the broad flavor of it, as it ripples around the buzz-o-sphere. It will have no evident point-source; it will seem to precipitate from everywhere like a fog and you will not be able to nail it down. Another way of expressing this would be to say, that pieces of a conceptual jigsaw puzzle had been scattered randomly into the world, each transmitting its particular message and resonating uncannily with the others. In time, people would naturally fit the pieces together and draw the ordained conclusion, likely believing they had thought of it themselves, and unaware that their understanding had been primed and seeded. And in this way, the world at large crystallizes more and more along a feminist pattern.

Consider a mainstream feminist such as Jessica Valenti. I doubt she would fit in with the WLM crew and its "way-out" ideas. Jessica markets herself mainly to teenaged girls and hip, twenty-something yupsters, and once admitted having no interest in "herstory" and suchlike notions. And yet, Jessica Valenti harbors a seething core of anti-male bigotry which her glossy, pop-feminist personna only barely holds in check — and not always. She sees nothing morally amiss about informing the world, on no particular authority, that Gerald Loughner's murderous rampage was a problem stemming from masculinity. Yes, you heard that right: Gerald Loughner was "expressing masculinity". Jessica Valenti thinks she is entitled to say such things. But wait, it gets worse. On another occasion,

Jessica Valenti implied that men accused of rape should forfeit the presumption of innocence and bear the burden of proof when they go on trial. In other words, Jessica does not believe in equal protection of the law for men. So far as Jessica Valenti is concerned, men are second-class citizens and innocent men can jolly well get their lives destroyed and suck it up. Jessica figures that's okay. That's the kind of history she wants to be making.

So who the hell is Jessica Valenti anyway, and what the hell gives her the moral license to say such unspeakably vile, vulgar, filthy things? And why the hell is Jessica Valenti not getting morally bitch-slapped, within an inch of her psychological life, from every press room and pulpit in the land? Eh? Bonobobabe, Luckynkl, and all that crowd are a bit worse than Jessica Valenti . . but only a bit. So Jessica Valenti, consider yourself bitch-slapped, Fidelbogen style! Yes, you DO deserve this.

Next consider Amanda Marcotte, another mainstream feminist who is Jessica Valenti's spiritual twin sister. I constantly get those two mixed up; I can hardly tell them apart. Amanda shares Jessica's hatred of men as reflected in her stance toward false rape allegation. She has made it clear that she doesn't think women lie about rape, and she will brook no disagreement on this subject. Consider the following:

Think about what Amanda Marcotte is saying here. She is saying that if you are a man who cares about the lives of innocent men and cares about living in a just and free world, then you are motivated by a desire to commit rape. Yes, that is truly what Amanda Marcotte appears to be saying. I took Amanda severely to task for this, here. Some time afterward, as I was informed, Amanda's commment (which I had preserved in the screen capture) disappeared from the comment thread in question. Too late Amanda, it will haunt you forever!

In a separate incident, Amanda Marcotte made it clear that, in her opinion, people who defend falsely rape-accused men are "rape-loving scum." Those are Amanda Marcotte's very words. If you think there is something horribly wrong about accusing innocent men of rape, then according to Amanda Marcotte you are "rape-loving scum." I wish I was making this up.

So who the hell is Amanda Marcotte anyway, and what the hell gives her the moral license to say such unspeakably vile, vulgar, filthy things? And why the hell is Amanda Marcotte not getting morally bitch-slapped, within an inch of her psychological life, from every press room and pulpit in the land? Eh? Bonobobabe, Luckynkl, and all that crowd are a bit worse than Amanda Marcotte . . but only a bit. So Amanda Marcotte, consider yourself bitch-slapped, Fidelbogen style! Yes, you DO deserve this.

Jessica Valenti and Amanda Marcotte are both popular feminist morons, and they haven't got the name of being radfems at all. In fact, they are considered cute, sassy, classy, photogenic and perfectly respectable. Heaven help us all, but people like Jessica and Amanda can walk around and talk their vulgar trash in broad daylight, and get handsomely paid for it. Dear God, what the hell is this world coming to, anyway?

The radfems at WLM are simply impatient. The full-blown feminist future they wish for isn't happening fast enough for them, and they are champing at the bit. Yet they ought to be dancing a victory jig in their private forum, since the world as a whole is drifting steadily along a path which ought to delight them. The progress of anti-male legislation has been dramatic. Men are being undermined on many fronts. Man-hating is a persistent underlying theme which surfaces everywhere, in more forms than I can begin to describe. Why, the cult of Valerie Solanas is certainly a hardy perennial, with Valerie's fan club going strong nearly a quarter-century after her death. Yes, the Solanas cult is a powerful organ in the worldwide feminist body — let none tell you otherwise! Still, most of the misandry is subtle, understated, and not always recognized as such either by the people who spread it, or the people who hear it.

All right, I will speak once more of Pamela O'Shaughnessy, or Vliet Tiptree as she calls herself when she wants to be incognito. I said I would come back to this, didn't I?

Pamela O. is a true feminist in that she occupies her mind very deeply on the thought that "men are the problem". This maxim is central to feminism in every way, so much that whoever would allow that men are only HALF the problem cannot possibly be a feminist at all. Mainstream feminists will play word games, and talk around it or past it, but if you “torture-test” their worldview, you will find it consistent with no other precept but that men or maleness are to blame for nearly all of what’s wrong with the world. Well isn’t it great when the assholes identify themselves forthrightly? I am talking about the WLM crowd here, and although they think they are conversing in secret, they at least admit their true opinion to themselves and to each other — which is more than some people do.

So we know that Pamela O., in her Radfem Hub article, has tiptoed lead-footedly around the subject of male genocide. Certainly, to reduce male numbers or genetically engineer the evil out of men, would strike the root of the Man Problem very radically indeed, yes?. Pamela O. was keen to talk about this, and sought an audience, and for that reason broached the subject on the affiliated WLM forum where she was certain of a receptive public.

On 2 April, 2011, Pamela O., under the username “Karma”, nailed her thesis to the door:

“First, the ground of the Problem (that is, male oppression and coercion of women) is male aggression. And second, male aggression is not limited to human beings. It is biologically-based and not particularly subject to eradication by social engineering. . . . .That seems to lead inescapably to an answer to the Problem: male oppression must be clearly defined and understood to be pathological (one writer calls its manifestations in humans an “encapsulated psychosis”). It needs to be recognized as a deviation from the norm (the aggression levels of females) that may be correctly called a mental illness. Call it the “Y Syndrome”, maybe. Then, it must be cured, and we are very close to having the cure: a genetic modification that will cure the deficiencies of the Y Syndrome which lead to over-expression of male hormones (putting it very simplistically ATM). Which leads to the primary objection: there’s no way to administer such a cure. Such a cure will never be voluntary, just as treating other severely mentally ill people cannot always be voluntary. People who are dangerous to themselves and others have little insight into their condition and may have to be restrained and treated without their consent in many cases. It is impossible for male humans to have the needed insight. My thought in response to that objection is: due to the historic circumstances, the cure will have to be administered”.

Sure enough, other forum members took the bait with gusto — Pamela knew her public, all right! So. . the talk went on for a while, Pamela pondered this and that, and six months later — on 4 Oct, 2011 — she published her now infamous guest post on Radfem Hub. And you know the rest of the story.

Now, I would not have you think there is anything new about the ideology Pamela O. has laid out. This is classic radfem fare which we’ve known in various shapes for many years — although it is indeed, if you will, the most radical of radicalisms! But still, stuff like this is not generally known, and to find such a great sample all bunched up in one place is a mighty windfall. In fact, it is a golden opportunity for those (such as the present writer) who want to make the world see what feminism really amounts to at its rotten core.

There is furthermore, the disquieting hint that these radical wimmin are not merely TALKING about these things. That is, they are not just speculating in their armchairs. The passionate seriousness of their tone is not to be mistaken: Pamela O. herself hints at global groups and networks, and our own investigations (spearheaded by Agent Orange) have uncovered an intriguing web of connections — an international rabbit hole that goes deeper and deeper, with passageways reaching into sites of power and influence that would surprise you.

The release of the Agent Orange files in the near future will throw a shaft of sunlight into places little known, and permit people to form their conclusions.

It remains to ask, whether I think the implied scenarios ever would or could become real? My answer is, no, probably not. It is seriously to be doubted that radfem male-genocidalists will ever get the future they dream of, or anything close to it. So my present motivation is twofold: firstly, to have a care about the havoc these people might wreak in merely trying to get their way, and secondly, to awaken the general public to the presence of such people on the same planet with themselves, and to make that same public ponder the implications of such a thing.

What is perverse and dangerous about these people — and really, all feminists — is that they consider themselves literally more infallible than the patriarchal Pope of Rome himself! What monstrously swollen egos they have! Men are mentally ill, cannot grasp objective reality, and must therefore be engaged by methods of deceit — such is their conclusion. They know for a lead-pipe fact, at least in their own minds, that they are dead right and the rest of the world is dead wrong.

That is disturbing to think about, but if you think carefully, it is a tremendous gift which greatly simplifies our lives. In a nutshell, it means that they will never engage us in good faith, and by not doing so, they release us from any obligation to engage THEM in good faith. That's a head-spinner, don't you think so? Chew on the implications of this; grind it small in your mind. It means that this entire business is naught but realpolitik, a pure game of power and very little else. That is how they play it, and that is how we too are entitled to play it.

But for some of us, this is old news. We've known it for years.

The problem of this question is that both of these ideologies start out from the idea that material ownership is a real concept, the differences in ideology are simply differences of who they want to control the dissemination of material property.

Material Possession

We think of material possession as a reality, we being the inheritors of the main cultures of our modern world, but not all cultures had the same notions of possession. A good example is when European explorers "bought" land for trinkets. Even today this is characterized in such a manner that leads us to think of Native Americans as either completely naive or stupid. What generally is not portrayed is that the likely reason they took these trinkets is because they thought they were fleecing the Europeans. To them no one owned land, they might fight each other but it wasn't about ownership of land it was about survival. That is not to say they didn't have ideas about possession, just that some of the things we consider able to be possessed – they didn't.

The idea of material possession rests on the idea of legal ownership, what is meant by this is: a family owns their home because they legally transferred it from a business, that business owned it through owning the land and the materials used to build the house, they owned these because they legally transferred ownership from others, this is repeated indefinitely but not infinitely. Eventually at the end of this chain you come to a time when no one owned the land or the materials, at that point how did these get transferred legally? Well in truth they don't, because no one owns them, the law invariably gives the first person, or government, who takes them the initial right of ownership.

A byproduct of the idea of material possession is the idea of material theft. To take something by theft is to take possession of something that by law is not yours. This idea is even taken past one iteration of property transfer. If you bought an item that turns out to be stolen, even if you were not aware of the theft, that item is not yours because it could not be legally transferred to you. This is why stolen property if recovered is given to the original owners even if those who owned it previously thought they had legitimately purchased it.

Both of these ideas rest on the belief that material ownership is a real state of being, that independent of belief or statement there is a true owner of an object.

For this to be true, material ownership would have to pass two tests.

[unordered_list style="green-dot"]

- Ownership must always apply to an object. If the state of ownership did not always apply to the object then the only reason a person has possession is that at some point someone claimed ownership.No force can remove the state of ownership, only transfer it. If ownership is a state of reality then as long as reality exists ownership must exists, much like conservation of energy.

- All material ownership is derived at the beginning from a government or person taking possession and stating that they then owned said possession.

[/unordered_list]

Because there is no chain of transfer from the beginning of that material items existence, the first test fails

If material ownership were a state of reality then it would be impossible for said state to change short of destruction of said object. It is possible for an item to become lost and then through the death of the original owner, un-owned, the second test fails.

Intellectual Property

This is not to say that no form of possession can exist; beyond material property rights there is the realm of intellectual property rights. The amazing thing about intellectual property rights is they pass both tests that material property rights fail.

From the beginning of an intellectual properties existence, is it owned? As the direct product of an intellectual exercise, this property and the creation process are intrinsically linked, put simply, yes.

Can any force remove intellectual possession? Because intellectual possession is an expression of individuality and this expression creates the intellectual property then by its very existence the property is linked to the entity that created it. As long as the intellectual property exists it will be owned, again: yes.

One thing to note about intellectual property is it is not solely in the realm of art or science. Any creative process, even as simple as constructing a brick wall is a creation process and the process itself is intellectual property.

Left…Right…Reality…Disconnect

Most of those left of center don't want the majority of material possession to be controlled by an elite few.

Most of those right of center don't want what they have worked hard to create, intellectual property, to be redistributed in any fashion.

To this I say what's the problem? While you may not be saying the same thing, nothing about the basic ideas are contradictory. The left dislikes material possession and the right wants intellectual property rights.

To those on the right I say, "All intellectual property should be sacrosanct and any material used for said property should be sacrosanct until it stops being used or maintained."

To those on the left I say, "All people should have the right to use any part of the world that isn't already being used as part of intellectual property."

What does this mean?

Every person has rights to what they have made or are intellectually invested in conserving. You build a house; the creation gives you intellectual property. You maintain a house; the maintenance gives you intellectual property. You financed a house being built or being maintained; managing the process gives some intellectual property but not to the exclusion of full ownership.

No person would have a right to property that they have not through physical or intellectual effort invested in. All those empty plots of land everywhere that are only owned because someone said so in the past would be able to be actually used by anyone willing to put in the work.

What does this have to do with Men's Rights

I don't necessarily agree that politics have no place in the MRM but I think everyone needs to acknowledge that every branch of politics has been corrupted by Feminism. So any current political ideology that any MRA professes to me is suspect.

Libertarian, Marxist, or other, doesn't matter to me. No matter what, in comparing these ideologies we're talking not about better ideologies, or good vs. bad ideologies, but about the lesser of multiple evils. No political ideology that I know of has not been co-opted or corrupted by Feminism.

MRA's will no doubt need to eventually become political, the question is not if we will need to get involved in politics, but are we going to get involved in the corrupt game of politics and then compound that sin by using the same rotting and infested equipment the other side is using. Can we as a movement have the strength to create a new ideology, one that is fresh and free from what is already corrupted?

The failed manhood of white knights

I saw a cartoon today. I present it here as the image for this article for your consideration. As you can see, it isn't very funny, and it isn't intended to be. Even less funny was the numbers of likes and shares it got from Facebookers. And when you click through and read some of the comments, mostly by women, it gets decidedly *un*funny.

Read at your own risk. The promotion of violence is constant, and there are some comments even more alarming. The worst thing about it is that this is not a feminist thread or an MRA thread. It is just the general public; average people, whatever that is these days.

The blue pill appeal of this kind of White Knightery, the kind you see portrayed above in the form of a cartoon thug about to deliver some "righteous payback," is understandable. For most women these men are service machines prepared to make assaults on their behalf; willing to dispense, and absorb violence, enthusiastically, whenever a woman, any woman, advises them there is a need.

To these women, this is one of the many things that make those men real men. Read the comments on Facebook. And note that mixed in with cheering for violent acts you see the scraps of puffery offered to the male bodyguards there. These are men who will gladly stomp mud holes in their brothers if it will make a woman smile or give an approving nod; if, as they pine for in their fantasies, it will dry a single feminine tear.

Per the cartoon, real men are prepared to attack other men and beat them savagely without a second thought. All you have to do is point at their victim and say, "He hit a woman."

You can grab your popcorn at that moment folks, because it is ON right then and there. You don't know who it is going to be, but one of the guys, or even both of them, are about to bleed.

Remember, real men attack and bludgeon complete strangers because a woman makes an accusation. Real men will assault strangers on behalf of other strangers as long as the stranger they are being violent for has a vagina. Consider the story of Renada Williams, who told two men that her boyfriend had raped her, so they tied him up, then beat, tortured and raped him for almost 24 hours. She was later proven to have lied.

This is not the only time this has happened. Women were singing "My Boyfriend's Back," long before the song was written. In fact, men wrote that song. Women just mouth the lyrics, but I will get to that.

Reacting to illegal violence, or the allegation of illegal violence, with even more illegal violence may moisten a few vaginas, but it does not seem likely to solve the fundamental problem. Clearly we need a new paradigm about sex and violence, one that puts the onus on women to take care of themselves without all those pesky, domineering men (who are just the ones they need for violence) doing it for them.

What I have done, as a service to the entirety of humanity, and all womanhood in particular, is to dismount my white horse and take an objective look at women getting hit. Doing this has enabled me to not only discern the two different types of women who get hit, but also prescribes a course of action for each type of woman. It will significantly reduce their chances of ever getting hit again. How's that for a real man?

OK, let's get started. Meet Female Violence Victim Number One, the true victim. This is the woman who was minding her own business, running an orphanage or serving lunch at a kitchen for the homeless, or researching a cure for scabies, and some guy comes out of nowhere and smacks her across the face for no apparent reason.

It doesn't matter if the attacker was a stranger or someone who knew her, the attack was totally unprovoked and senseless. These women are a distinct minority, but we have them covered.

The answer for them is twofold. One, call the cops. If there is as much as a blemish on their face, or even if there isn't, he will be arrested. Once he is in stir, she can get to the second part of the solution. She can go about shopping for all kinds of technology that will make his, or anyone else's, next attempt to assault her a very unpleasant experience. They range from pepper spays, to stun guns to nice little Glock 9 mm's with pink ammo clips, at least if they live somewhere that allows handguns. They even sell this stuff to women and provide classes on how to use them without men helping.

And if she messed up and shot the wrong guy, don't worry. The courts will understand that she felt threatened and had no choice.

So, you see, for female victim number one there is no need to wait for some guy (at least one without a badge) to go skin his knuckles or get the crap beat out of himself tying to extract revenge on an attacker. She can do it herself. Remember ladies: You don't need a man, right?

Right?

Next, we have the average domestic violence victim. According to the research we have, this woman, more likely than not, is not exactly like the true victim. She is actually a woman who hit first, at least according to the Centers for Disease Control, and ended up getting a bigger helping of the same thing she was dishing out.

This woman has a couple of options that don't involve using the flesh and blood solution of a convenient male bodyguard. One, she can avail herself of the afore-mentioned self-defense aids recommended to true victims. This way she can improve on her abusive ways and simultaneously ensure that whoever she is abusing won't be stupid enough to ~~defend themselves~~ attack her again. And yes, in case you are wondering, the cops will also side with her when called. It's a win-win for her. Ask Chris Brown or about a million other guys.

I strongly recommend this option as the go-to. The other option is less attractive. She can get used to getting her ass kicked. Funny thing about punching men. If you hit them enough times most of them, the ones that aren't real men, will forget you are a woman and tag you a good one.

These women and their male enablers actually think that the man she is punching is too depraved and sick to understand that she is the real victim. Her slapping, punching, kicking and spitting on him is viewed as evidence that he is the perpetrator.

This is where things get tricky, because this is where the real men really want to step in and act out violently on behalf of the woman. In fact, being so well indoctrinated into their positions as convenient fodder, their very identities hinge on beating up that guy that she tried to beat up, but couldn't.

They will ignore his pleas that he was defending himself with the standard, pre-assault scream of indignation, "I don't care if she hit you. You never hit a woman!"

Here is an example of what I am talking about. Note the one sorry bastard of a man in that video. He hit a woman. He was dead wrong and deserved a good thumping. End of story, right? That is right for the good men in this video; the thirty or so of them that ganged up on the guy and beat him for returning a completely unjustifiable attack from a woman. The good men, the real men, taught him, didn't they?

This is what needs to change. We can only do that by promoting a culture where women have both agency and power, and of course they cannot have either if they are treated like children who cannot defend themselves, or if they are allowed to leech protection and other services they should be providing for themselves.

On a more personal note, I have to admit to some pretty intense emotional reaction to some of this material. I am angered beyond words by the story of Renada Williams, and by the man who was assaulted, defended himself and was then assaulted again by a mob for daring to fight back against a woman. The video doesn't tell us what happened to him after they took him off camera.

I am even angered, though less so, by that cartoon and the scores of hateful, violence glorifying comments from women that followed it. But at least I understand that part.

We have not only taught women that exploiting men's physical capacity for violence is acceptable, we have all but insisted that they feel entitled to that kind of power; that they just consider protection and provision from men something owed to them. Obviously they need to get off that boat, but I don't blame them for being there in the first place, not with legions of white knights begging them to do it, lining up to infinity to be the next guy to slay their dragons.

I don't know that I could resist that kind of temptation.

No, I am not angry at them. My real anger is saved for the phony, sanctimonious White Knight pricks who don't know the difference between what they see in the mirror and Dudley Dooright. It is not that they want to do right, they want to do women.

Like chameleons, which I note is a lizard, these men are adept at blending in. The only difference is that the ambience they mimic is their perception of whatever it is women want to hear.

They have little to no concept of truth, or it's value, or of justice, or even of human decency if it runs afoul of what they think women want to see in them. In other words, all the normal values of honesty and integrity that we generally tend to instill in men are precisely where this brand of man fails, and fails completely.

The white knight wraps all of his obsequious agreement with The Collective Woman in a shroud of "social enlightenment," or just as bad, "traditional values." Whether he is a male feminist or a mindless tradcon, he will tell you he does not argue with women because he values them so and appreciates their wisdom. The truth is that he does not argue with them because the idea of their rejection scares the living shit out of him. He lacks the skills or courage to argue with a woman at all.

The fact is that he does not have a woman's excuse. As a man, he has been exposed his entire life to the expectations of personal accountability, reason and justness. He abandons all of that to act as a thug, either intellectually or physically, in hopes of female approval. Even if he knows what he is doing is wrong, he lacks the spine to do anything about it.

To him, the disapproval of a woman, and even worse the disapproval of women collectively, is more emotional upheaval than he has the courage or skills to manage. He knows that by most of the standards for men in this culture, he has failed. Undaunted, he uses the pats on the head of approval he gets from women who generally hate men as evidence that he is at least the kind of man which women who hate men will approve. It is all he has.

You can see many of them out there now, writing blogs that all boil down to one simple thing: an insecure boy repeating over and over again, "Look at me! Look at me! I am a good man!"

"I will say whatever you want to hear."

"I only exist when you look at me."

It's David Futrelle. It's a lot of other losers just like him over on Facebook, and everywhere else you turn. It's all these good, good, real men.

Ok, so maybe I don't hate these guys. Maybe they are too pathetic to hate. But I don't have to look any further than the story of Renada Williams, or indeed the acts of the SPLC, to know just what they are capable of.

A Plea to my fellow MRAs

As announced here (http://www.avoiceformen.com/mens-rights/aam-to-host-international-mens-day/)in February, Artistry Against Misandry is scheduled to host an International Men's Day event in Nashville, TN on Saturday, 11/17/12. The event is slated to feature guest speaker, John The Other, as well as regional musical entertainment. It will be the first public celebration of its kind and will hopefully inspire many more to follow.

In order to pull this event off, your help is needed. I am again asking you all for any monetary donations you can spare. Thus far, just under a quarter of the funds needed have been raised. I am extremely grateful to the contributors who have made this possible; however a second round of donations is necessary. A minimum of $2000.00 needs to be raised in order to not have to pull the plug on the event, so if every MRA reading this donated even a small amount, I'm sure we could get there. We still have t-shirts to be made, entertainment to hire, sound/recording engineers to compensate, advertising/promotion to be done, raffle items to be bartered for and tons of literature to be printed.

In just the five short months of its existence, Artistry Against Misandry has welcomed well over 10,000 visitors to its website. The impact of MRAs in the arts is growing; however it will take all of us as a community to help push this material into the mainstream where it belongs. This event is important to our cause in that it is the only MRA-hosted event scheduled in America for 2012 and it could help bridge the gap between members of the general public and our (mostly) online community. I'm sure we all understand the importance of reaching out to more potential allies. Media will be invited so it is imperative we "do this up" as thoughtfully and professionally as possible. I ask you to please help me accomplish this so our beloved JTO doesn't fly all the way to the American south just to speak to an empty room!

You can all be a part of making history by sending your donations via the home page (http://www.artistryagainstmisandry.com) of Artistry Against Misandry.Or you can just use this donation button for AAM. I thank you in advance for your help.

Forbes misandry for profit scheme

Imagine you are a financial advisor specializing in female clientele who are navigating the family courts during a divorce. It's a niche market for sure, but it makes sense. There are a lot of divorces and women file the majority of them.

You also know these women are looking to maximize their take. Another plus for you is that many of these women have an all-time low opinion of their husbands, and more than a few are looking for revenge. Feelings can and do go autonomic at times like these, which also works for you.

Now imagine you just need a hook to get more women in the door. And imagine you don't have pesky scruples that interfere with how you get there. That leaves a lot of doors open, including selling women the idea that family courts actually have an anti-woman bias; that men are trending toward abusing family law against women with false accusations and restraining orders and that it is becoming a problem for which women, as a group, need specialized protection.

I know what even a lot of feminists are thinking. I've heard many diehard believers acknowledge the bias against men in courts. They make excuses for it, but they know it is there. Everyone does.

But you can sell anything to the crazy obsessed, to the angry, to the hurt and to the frantically driven to win. Up will be down if it serves their agenda.

Can you imagine it? Good. Now imagine your name is Jeff Landers and you write for Forbes Magazine.

The title of a recent article he wrote says it all. "How Some Men Are Upending Domestic Violence Laws to Scam an Advantage in Divorce."

In Landers' wildly misleading and disingenuous ~~article~~ sales pitch for his business, he blows past forgivably biased statements found in most advertising and goes straight to the snake oil like it was a cancer cure.

The star of Landers' ~~piece~~ advertisement is a biographical book that centers on a woman, Janie McQueen, who was allegedly the victim of a false allegation as a part of a divorce. Apparently the experience was so disturbing that it prompted her to write the book as a warning to all women about men in family court. Or maybe it was just to make a few bucks. If she saw the worst of family courts she no doubt needs the money.

All this, however, is one woman's story. Instead of checking his facts, Landers uses someone else's anecdote to infer applicability to the general population, or rather the part of the population that is female and divorcing…and solvent enough to need a financial planner.

Presto-change-o, false allegations of abuse in family court now fall into the "women's issues" arena, courtesy of a financial advisor.

Nice to see the Wall Street types haven't gone changing on us.

S.A.V.E. has issued an action e-lert, asking concerned individuals to contact Forbes Magazine and let them know what you think about the Landers article and the willful misrepresentation of reality for commercial purposes that it contains.

Of course I support this action and urge other MRA's to follow suit.

S.A.V.E. has posted about this on their website, including the results of their own professional research on false allegations.

But I also wanted to address one other point that needs some attention in this story. These situations have a way of teaching a larger lesson.

As I said earlier, I have no idea if Janie McQueen was a victim of being abused by her husband through the courts. I certainly know it is possible. I have read of a few other cases where women ended up on the short end of the stick.

It's a bad system. They can't expect it to not backfire from time to time.

But if McQueen really was the victim of a false accusation, and she ended up in jail unfairly, then it happened because no one has been listening to what men's activists have been telling them for years. And they were not listening because it was only happening to men.

Restraining orders are supposed to require probable cause determined under reasonable standards. They are designed to keep people safe from threats. But the prevailing anti-male bias has reduced them to a flimsy hoax issued by every family court in the west in order to favor women during the marital dissolution. Some of them are legitimate, but it is impossible to tell which ones are good or bad because they do not require any substantiation. They are issued when one of the marital partners claims something happened, or claims they are afraid something will happen. This almost always results in a man being forced from his home and children while a woman retains possession of everything.

Blowback was unavoidable. Bigoted systems, like bigotry itself, hurt everyone, not just the people targeted for discrimination. Allowing hollow accusations to pass for credible evidence in a matter so serious that children are taken from parents is an abomination of the courts that has been openly practiced as long as men and children were the only ones getting shafted by it.

Well, those that swim with sharks, eventually get bit. If Ms. McQueen wants to fix the system, male bashing and feeble distortions of the truth are not going to help much.

If your gig is to sell books or get new clients by spreading lies that create fear, then stay the course.

The publishers of Forbes should get a message. Please join me in doing that. Disguising advertising as informed journalism is bad enough. Fear-mongering on the backs of men to make a buck off women during periods of extreme emotion and turmoil is a fall to rock bottom.

SAVE: June is False Allegation Awareness Month

S.A.V.E. · 25 May 2012 · Archived copy · Original

[box icon="none"]

Publisher's note: In respect to June being False Allegation Awareness Month, we encourage AVfM contributors to submit articles on the false allegation problem. PE

June is False Allegations Awareness Month, and this year SAVE will be addressing false allegations of domestic violence, sexual assault, and child abuse. False allegations are a huge problem in our country — according to our national survey, 1 in 10 persons have been falsely accused of abuse.

SAVE will be sponsoring a variety of activities designed to heighten public awareness:

[unordered_list style="arrow"]

- Radio interviews
- Press releases
- Social media
- Lobbying day in Congress, June 29
- False Allegations Summit, June 30 in Washington DC

[/unordered_list]

Of interest, public concern about the Dept. of Education Sexual Assault Directive continues to mount because it strips persons of due process protections and will increase false allegations of sexual assault on campus. To date, 13 organizations and over 35 editorials have come out against the DED policy.

And progress in reforming the Violence Against Women Act reauthorization bill also gives us a sense of optimism.

We encourage you to begin planning now for an event in your area to highlight False Allegations Awareness Month. A listing of resources can be found here.

Attacking male sexuality

John Hembling (JtO) · 26 May 2012 · Archived copy · Original

Male identity is one of the fundamental drivers of the MGTOW movement; which, for anyone returning to this planet after a decade of vacation, is a growing pathway of masculine self-identity in which men are rejecting a statist, a collectivist, feminist or even a female-approved definition of what constitutes a man.

Instead, MGTOW men, or Zeta males, are defining their own identities as men – without much regard for the convenience and utility of those identities to outsiders, to women or to a runaway state. It is, in fact, a revolution of thought in which men declare themselves human beings of worth – and don't ask permission or apologize or allow anyone else to devalue their humanity in preference to their utility.

Male sexuality is of course both demonized and treated as a form of predation, but also strictly limited to a narrow set of acceptable expressions. Outside of sexual identities which place men in positions to benefit women as sexual gate-keepers, masculine sexuality is generally condemned.

This is evident in the frequent use of rhetorical attack on male sexuality as a go-to response to criticism of feminist dogma. Almost as popular as "you just hate women" is a catalog of ad hominem attacks reducing to "small penis, mother's basement dwelling, and unemployed virgin". These standard and frankly boringly predictable insults all relate to a man's inability to gain access to sex, or in the case of an imputed tiny penis – to perform sexually.

The most absurd and telling indictment of this most puerile insult is that the accusation of sexual failure is nothing more than a reflection of the feminine sexual selection of whatever woman offers such commentary. Oh, you don't fancy me? I can assure you darling, I completely understand just how you feel.

However, there is a thread of opinion with a growing currency among some MRAs which rejects the legitimacy of men whose self identity and sexuality is gay or bisexual, or indeed, transsexual.

Some of the rhetoric around this refers in condemning tones to the "gay agenda", which as nearly as I can tell, includes such radical notions as "let's not beat up or murder gay men" and the equally shocking "let's extend to gay men and women the same legal rights everybody else has" and so on. If that's the gay agenda – as a MRA, or just as a decent human being, then I'm behind it.

Sometimes scriptural argument is invoked in the condemnation of gays, bisexuals, and anyone else whose sexual identity is non-heterosexual.

None of the other obsolete rules of ancient holy writings are given modern credence, but gay men are heaped with scorn and contempt and scripture is used to justify it? I don't have much to say to this attitude besides grow up and get over it.

Male sexual identity is both policed and vilified in a feminized culture and some MRAs are now doing what amounts to the same thing. These are men (and women) whose sexuality, either chosen or not, doesn't conform to an acceptable standard – and some within the MRM would demonize them. Gentlemen and ladies – this is nothing short of stupid.

At what point does who an individual finds sexually attractive diminish their value as a human? How is it that a man whose preference doesn't include vagina becomes less of a man? Conversely, are we going to pretend the sexual preferences of our female colleagues matter in the context of partnership in the fight for the human rights of men and boys?

The valuation of human beings, of men and women, based on who they'd like to fuck or what kind of orifice they prefer is stupid and has no place in the men's rights movement, or at AVfM.

Admittedly, some people might find the prospect of non-heterosexuality alien, foreign, and unappealing. As a much younger man, having inherited the prejudices of the era I grew up in, I was perplexed and scandalized to receive the occasional flirtatious attention of gay men. But then I grew up, and got over it. Isn't it time for this human rights movement to do the same?

If we don't get over it, then this is not a men's rights movement, it's a straight men's movement. Or, it's a white men's movement, or maybe, a tall men's movement, or a republican men's movement. For myself, I find these narrow categories and self-selected separations to be unhelpful, and irrelevant in a larger fight for the humanity, and the human rights of men and boys. In the phrase "gay men", gay is an adjective, and men is the noun.

When men are not expected to die without complaint any time higher gas prices make it inconvenient for soccer moms to drive from their gated community to the local grass pitch, or any other time men's utility trumps their humanity, well then maybe I'll entertain the usefulness of keeping the gays or the darkies out of the club house. On the other hand, maybe I'll still think it's a stupid argument. But I do know that for a so called men's rights movement to marginalize men based on who they want in their bed – well, it's beneath us.

The alimony war of 1935

Robert St. Estephe · 27 May 2012 · Archived copy · Original

Editor's note: As I have gotten to know Robert St. Estephe better, it has opened my eyes to the years of work and dedication he has given to exploration of misandry in history. The work itself has opened my eyes as well.

For years as an MRA I have struggled with the message that feminists were the source of our problems. Of course I have always known that they have caused incalculable amounts of damage, and are rightly seen as one of the enemies of men, but stopping there is far too simplistic. Any honest examination of history surely demonstrates that there are elements to our culture, even aspects of who we are as human beings that are, in modern life, unfairly exploitive of men. In fact, I would argue that the long standing tradition of using men to serve the needs of women, and of elites, is precisely what opened the door and allowed a virulent form if sexism we call feminism to flourish like an infection in a dirty wound.

All we need to support that is an unblemished accounting of the historical record. That is precisely what Robert St. Estephe has given us, through many years of tedious, dedicated research. The scope and volume of what he has accomplished is mind blowing. There is enough material to educate an army, and to keep us occupied for years.

Some of you will obviously think of Robert's blockbuster treatise, Setting the Record Straight, in which he skillfully uses facts excavated from beneath the veneer of *her*story to give us an understanding of the MRM from a historical perspective. It is must reading for MRA's, but it is actually nothing compared to the gold he has mined from archives that span the nation's history. Some of that work is presented on his blog, The Unknown History of Misandry, but there remains in his possession a huge amount of information heretofore unpublished.

What we are going to do at AVfM is set about correcting that. Over a period of time, we are going to present specially tagged articles on this site that will warehouse all of his work. Each one will be presented with his article and will include my observations, thus the shared byline. Make no mistake from that, though. This is a product of Robert's love for the work.

I am learning from Robert's writing that we are men and women with a history long predating gender feminism. Indeed, Robert's work gives us proof that there were MRA's well before there were feminists as we know them today.

I think it may be important, for those that want to, to make some real effort to acquaint ourselves with that history. As we do, we will discover our forefathers and examine the issues that drove them in their day to rebel. Often we will discover that they are the same issues that drive us today.

In the following piece from Robert's blog, he takes us to 1935 for an examination of MRA's working against the alimony racket. Something tells me these 77 year old events would look right at home on today's landscape. – PE

Alimony Reform League vs. Sociopathic Sadism in 1935

[image]

The present-day passionate devotion to the notion of a police state – with its kidnapping, theft of property, mental torture (alienating children from their fathers), and state-condoned homicide – which is exhibited by present day cultural Marxists ("feminists") was not shared by mainstream feminists in the early 20th century, but such devotion to tyranny was throughout the entire 20th century – as it is today – indeed shared by a large population of sadistic sociopaths of the female sex (1912 article).

There has always been a large number of female sociopaths, despite the failure of psychology researchers who use male criteria on female subjects – resulting in skewed unreliable comparative statistics.

The following articles demonstrate that the sociological tendencies which result in misandric behavior need not have the trappings of political "theory" to be pervasive and damaging – all with the active support of "white knight" males.

The organization discussed in the following 1935 article is but one of many such early men's rights organizations formed in the 1920s and 1930s to combat the Alimony Racket.

FULL TEXT (Article 1 of 2): What do you suppose an ex-wife is thinking about when she has her husband put under the jailhouse for not paying alimony?

That question has bothered thousands of former husbands who from the inside of the jail saw no rhyme or reason in it. It led to formation of the Alimony Reform League of New York, which inquired into the subject. Now the story can be told.

Such women are psychopathic cases almost every time! And they are sadistic! At least they are bordering on some kind on some on some kind of psychosis that approaches sadism.

The Alimony League got back about one-half of 2,000 questionnaires it sent out. The first three questions ran: "Why did you send him to jail? Are you satisfied now that he is in jail? How long would you like to have him remain there?"

More than one-fourth of the women answering the first question declared he belonged in jail, deserved it. About 63 per cent were tickled to death with the status of everything in answering the second question. They were satisfied. About 21 per cent were sorry, the rest, undecided.

[image]

Answering the third question, 49 per cent – on how long he ought to be kept in jail – declared: "Until he rots!" Their composite view of the man in jail – the "ex" – was expressed in the most fulsome eloquence:

"My husband had the grace of a hippopotamus, the brain of a gnat, looked like a giraffe, stung like a wasp, and he had the personality of a dead salmon."

Perhaps some slight exaggeration crept into the description.

And to the question of them not getting any alimony as long as he is in jail, the answers tended to sum up to this:

"That's perfectly all right with me. I'll get along without his money."

That, of course, really doesn't make sense, but perhaps it's the reason that the Alimony League declares that women who send husbands to alimony jails "suffer from some sort of mental ailment."

["Those Alimony Seekers," syndicated, The Palm Beach Post (Fl.), Jul. 19, 1935, p. 4]

???

[image]

FULL TEXT (Article 2 of 2): New York. – The alimony reform league set out today revise the state's archaic marital laws. If successful, a lot of time and carfare will be saved New York couples who have agreed to disagree – and Reno's divorce mill will loose its best customers.

Another result might be a "for rent" sign on that unique institution of the metropolis, the "alimony jail" in which may be confined, for as long as the woman in the case desires, former husbands unwilling or unable to keep up alimony payments.

The league's campaign began with submission to Gov. Herbert Lehman and John W. MacDonald, secretary of the law revision commission, of six proposed new marital laws, designed to bring the richest and most populous state in the union up to date in dealing with the marriage problem.

The two most important measures sponsored by the league, said Jack Anthony, executive secretary, would establish the right to sue for divorce after a separation, and would establish a new marital court.

Anthony pointed out that New York permits legal separation on grounds of abandonment, non-support or cruelty, but grants divorce only for adultery, which must be sworn to by witnesses. Abandonment, non-support or cruelty are grounds for divorce in every other state except New York and South Carolina.

"It is positively ridiculously inhuman for the law to require two people to remain married to each other after they have been legally separated and are living apart," Anthony said.

After a couple have gone through the court procedure necessary to secure a separation and have failed to effect a reconciliation during a two-year period, it is logical to assume that their marriage has proven a failure. From every social and economic standpoint, separations are impractical and unsound."

Another new law urged by the reform league would establish a five-day period which must elapse between issuance of a marriage license and performing of the ceremony, similar to laws now in effect in 20 states.

Establishment of a separate and distinct court to hear only cases arising out of the marriage status would prevent attorney from "shopping around" among scores of judges, often leading to action by judges unfamiliar with all circumstances of the case, if not to actual miscarriage of justice, Anthony said.

The other new laws recommended provide for absolute divorce after a two-year legal separation on motion of either party, and reform the alimony statutes – particularly by providing that a man may not be sent to jail for non-payment of alimony, without first having an open hearing in court, at which witnesses are orally examined and cross-examined.

Man, Woman, Truth: Divorcing your children II

Dr. Paul & Dr. T · 28 May 2012 · Archived copy · Original

[box type=”note” icon=”none”]

Last week we began talking about the very sensitive subject of divorcing your children, or what it means to come to the conclusion that your involvement in your children’s life is doing them, and perhaps you, more harm than good.

This is the situation many men find themselves in after divorcing or breaking up with an abusive female who takes the conflict from the breakup and carries it on with no end in sight, dragging the kids into the fray until their minds are warped and poisoned.

Judging by the emails that came in from this show, it was one that struck a nerve with many listeners, particularly men who have been forced against a wall with their children since their relationship with the mother was dissolved.

Per the request of listeners, we are returning to this subject again tonight on Man, Woman, Truth Radio, and this time we are going to dig a little deeper.

If you have ever considered the relationship you have had with your children since the divorce has gone from loving and supportive to destructive and adversarial, this is a program you will want to listen to. We will be discussing the actions that you might consider in this unfortunate circumstance, up to an including telling your child or children good-bye.

The show airs live on May 28, at 8:00 Central Time, US, which is 2:00 a.m. May 29, in London and 11:00 a.m. May 29 in Brisbane. If you have not yet requested membership in the Stickam Room, you can do so through the link below. The call in number is 310-388-9709.

And a note to listeners. This is the last week we are going to use the AVfM Stickam for after the show. Starting next week we will be using the new Man, Woman, Truth Stickam. Details to come.

Let's belittle men

Paul Elam and John the Other · 28 May 2012 · Archived copy · Original

On 21 May 2012, the online magazine New Statesman ran an article announcing their intention to run a series in the following week on the modern state of men. As the men's rights movement commands a growing segment of public attention, such features will become increasingly common. Unfortunately, in the series posted on the New Statesman, beginning with the chatty-titled "Let's talk about men" Helen Lewis-Hasteley starts with a tired and predictable insult.

> Lurking in the cellar of the internet are a group called the MRAs

This clumsy metaphor is Lewis-Hasteley's attempt to appeal to one of the standard ad-hominem arguments levelled against activists pointing out the growing legal disenfranchisement and public censure of male identity. When faced by arguments based on evidence or logical challenges to standard anti male zeitgeist, attacks of character are the expected standard, purposefully changing the topic, and attempting to shame and silence through ad-hominem argument. This is so common that within the growing men's movement, a Shaming Tactics Catalog has been authored and circulated for reference in quickly swatting aside such logical fallacies. Lewis-Hasteley's basement-dweller reference is of course, a variation of the circumstantial ad hominem listed in the catalog.

The target is accused of being immature and/or irresponsible in some manner that reflects badly on his status as an adult male. Examples:

• "Grow up!"

• "You are so immature!"

• "Do you live with your mother?"

• "I'm not interested in boys. I'm interested in real men."

The New Statesman blogger next casts former London School of Economics gender studies student Tom Martin as a typical MRA. In 2011, Martin launched a suit against that school on the grounds of anti-male bias in the curriculum. According to a hit-piece against Mr. Martin published in the Guardian[1]

> [C]ourse material he studied during his six weeks at the LSE was systematically anti-male overlooked men's issues, and ignored any research that contested a "women good, men bad" line of reasoning.

Of course, according to Lewis-Hasteley, the LSE student was suing over the hardness of the seating.

From Lewis-Hasteley 's New Statesman article: "The man who recently tried to sue the LSE in case which partly rested on the hardness of its chairs."

Let's talk about men, indeed. However, Lewis-Hasteley gives herself an out in her yellow pixel'd introduction by adding "but it would be a mistake to dismiss all of their concerns."

The New Statesman blogger briefly mentions the loss of a "family wage," but characterizes the attendant economic marginalization of men as perpetual adolescence. It is the same language used by "conservative" women's organizations like the Concerned Women of America (CWoA), which exhorts men to stop going their own way, and get back on the treadmill of working themselves into early graves for the benefit of wives and corporations. The CWoA is also one of the organizations recently tarred by the Southern Poverty Law Center as a hate organization – along with this website. Whoopsee, better be careful whose rhetoric you borrow, Helen.

Lewis-Hasteley also notes the preponderance of men in low pay, high risk jobs – which women and feminists seem uninterested in, despite feminism's half century of campaigning to equalize outcomes at the high-pay high-safety end of the employment spectrum. L.H. Also notes the cultural acceptance of male targeting violence, something else not yet addressed by feminism's campaign for, ahem, equality.

The recent drugging and sexual dismemberment of her husband by California woman Katherine Becker, because he wanted a divorce – provided fodder for the hysterical laughter of the hosts and live studio audience of a CBS women's day-time talk show. Clearly, the vicious sexual mutilation of a human being is pure slapstick comedy, provided the victim is male.

Lewis-Hasteley notes however, "None of this is to say that feminism has failed, or has gone too far."

Indeed, feminism has succeeded beyond anyone's wildest expectations. The movement whose early second wave was funded by bankers and statesmen has driven a wedge of hatred into the heart of society, pitting men and women against each other, destroying the social cohesion of the family, leaving many women to lives of dependence on the state.

L..H. says "to admit that there are problems specific to men as a gender is not to deny that women suffer too."

Indeed, some reactionary, and fringe elements of the blogging community occasionally cast the human rights concerns of men and women as a zero sum game.

In the funding of domestic violence shelters, almost all resources are provided exclusively to women, despite the fact that 35% of domestic violence victims are men. Women's shelter industry advocates claim that consideration of male victims would detract from the necessary assistance offered to women. Male victims, in this ideology either do not matter, do not exist, or these female-favouring DV advocates see human rights as a zero sum equation.

That domestic violence is not sexually specific or sexually directional is shown in hundreds of studies of the issue, and this is widely known by professionals working in the grievance industry. However, provision of support for men is repeatedly framed as withdrawal of support for women.

According to reporting in the Guardian's online edition: "Nicola Harwin, chief executive of Women's Aid, said its branches were still allowed to exclude men from refuges, but were being told when council contracts came up for tender that they must provide services such as advice and outreach to men or lose their funding. [she said] decades of progress in setting up refuges were being undermined."

L.H admits that acknowledging men's problems does not exclude the issues face by women. However, she declares that those who brought that discussion into the public sphere – namely, Men's Rights Activists, cannot be allowed to discuss their own issues without the input of adherents to the mainstream they struggle to be heard by.

> And talking about them [men's issues] can't be left to the MRAs.

After all, if men are not supervised by their betters, they might all poop their pants, collect together in caves to form rape clubs, or set themselves on fire, the poor darlings.

Of course – who best to discuss men's issues than two female bloggers on the left leaning New Statesman calling themselves by the collective moniker "The Vagenda." They are the concatenation of the words vagina and agenda, apparently without any outward hint of parody. These two feminists are claiming to hold authority over what issues are, or should be relevant to men – or indeed be discussed by them. This is comedy that writes itself.

Rhiannon and Holly, following the lead from the loose and hasty introduction by Lewis-Hasteley, posted their contribution in the Statesman's "Talking about Men" series by talking about women. The article, incongruously called “Men’s Rights Zeitgeist” opens with the declaration: “It’s been one hell of a week for women,” then catalogs several items of female celebrity gossip. Checking that title again, yes, it’s called: The Men’s Rights Zeitgeist, and subtitled “Don’t buy into this pretend battle of the sexes.” The article’s accompanying photo is of a pick-up artist named Neil Strauss. This is presumably included in the erstwhile men’s rights article to legitimize the continued efforts to conflate human rights activists with pick up artists. When the Vagenda bloggers finally do manage to address areas of concern to men, it’s in a sneering reference to David Benetar’s book “The Second Sexism”.

In spite of the heavily layered snark, Vagenda-twin powers activated, Rhiannon and Holly managed to admit to bias in the family courts, and the primarily male rise of national unemployment.

However, female favoring sentencing bias in the criminal courts is skipped over as two-girls-one-keyboard deify gender ideologue Suzanne Moore. Moore’s guardian.co.uk rubbishing of Benetar’s book includes the telling paragraph: “Still, abundant tripe trickles down from on high, even academe. Every so often a new tome details how men, not women, are discriminated against (apart from rape, murder, equal pay, genital mutilation, the power imbalance in politics, business, education, law and arts they may have a point).”

Apart from rape – which when men are the victims is treated as comedy, and which according to the Daily Kos[2] the CDC’s recent report impacts men outside of prison far more than anyone outside the MRM ever contemplated.

[unordered_list style=”arrow”]

- 4.8% of American men claim they have been forced to penetrate someone else. That’s more than three times the number who have actually been raped according to the FBI’s “penetration” definition of rape.
- The 1 in 5 number for female victims in the CDC report also uses a definition of rape which conflates sexual harassment with sexual assault and rape, revealing a strong ideological bias.
- While the CDC survey counts 1.3 million rapes of women in 2010, the total number of rapes and sexual assaults (of males and females combined) in the Justice Department survey was 188,380”. These two numbers are an entire order of magnitude apart.

[/unordered_list]

However, even in mainstream reporting which mentions male targeting sexual violence, the claim of under-reporting of female victimization is repeatedly trotted out to impute a higher rate for women, while the same argument is not made for male victims.

In addition, sexual violence in war, used against men to demoralize and break the will of occupied civilian populations[3][4][5][6][7][8] is purposefully suppressed in reporting by UN affiliated relief organizations, while female targeting wartime rape is played up.

Prison rape, due to the overwhelmingly male prison populations in western nations, also targets predominantly men and results in roughly twice as many men raped in prison each year than women raped outside of America’s prisons[9][10]. After decades of public activism by prisoner’s rights advocates, this was finally addressed this month by the Obama administration’s new guidelines aimed at reducing prison rape. Oddly, the guidelines[11] include a prohibition of male prison employees to perform searches of female prisoners, but no rule addresses the reverse case. “male guards are now banned from patting down female inmates, female guards can still have free reign over male inmates”[12]

To re-iterate what the deified Suzanne Moore noted:

> Every so often a new tome details how men, not women, are discriminated against (apart from rape, murder, equal pay, genital mutilation, the power imbalance in politics, business, education, law and arts they may have a point).

Murder, according to the USDoJ criminal victimization survey, impacts men 3 times more than women. According to the abstract of a University of Tennessee study[13]: “A total of 215,273 homicides were studied, 77% of which involved male victims and 23% female victims.”

In fact, men are overwhelmingly the majority of the victims of violent crime, at all ages, and for all types of violent crime according to the collected statistics of the DoJ[14]. “The victimization rate for males (11.6 per 100,000) was 3 times higher than the rate for females (3.4 per 100,000)”.

Moore also lays a claim to Equal Pay as an area in which men face no problem, referring by inference to the pay gap myth. This is the re-framing of male favouring lifetimes earnings imbalance into the narrative of male favouring sexism. This myth[15][16] ignores the longer hours worked by men on average, the higher risk and career choices of income over life-style, access to family and flexibility of work favoured on average by women. The narrative of “pay gap” also ignores that women control the disposal of 80% of discretionary spending.[17]

Genital mutilation is Moore’s next point, somehow failing to register that throughout the western world female genital mutilation is banned as an archaic, brutal crime, while infant male genital mutilation is still common, and promoted – falsely – as a preventative measure against the transmission of HIV by western outreach programs in continental Africa.

Moore also itemizes power imbalance in politics, but neglects to note that women are the majority of registered and active voters. Is she simply hoping nobody will fact-check her laundry list of lies?

The Vagenda article also mentions the revised version of the Violence Against Women Act, making a factually false claim that the National Coalition for Men (NCFM’s) support is based on recognizing that men are also victims of domestic violence. However, in a and b’s characterization, the NCFM is “claiming it will give the “true victims” of abuse the long sought for protection they need.”

Placement of “the” in front of the phrase “true victims” serves to foster an impression that the NCFM, or the Republican party’s version of VAWA claims that men are exclusively the victims of DV, which is not an honest mischaracterization by new statesman contributors Rhiannon and Holly. The un-attributed National Coalition for Men document supporting the reformed VAWA uses the following language:

> We cannot adequately address violence related issues by excluding half the population, allowing precious resources to be squandered for ideological purposes, empowering false accusers at the expense of true victims, and letting malfeasance and maladministration run unchecked without holding applicable program administrators accountable.[18]

The R and H writing duo also take shots at AVfM with the lazy, ignorant, and much recycled argument that the site is anti-female. After an obligatory small-penis shot taken at broadcaster Tony Parsons, the twins state:

> …but that’s the minor end of the spectrum when you consider the anti-woman agenda peddled by websites such as “A Voice for Men.”

In fact, the site’s editorial position opposes the ideology of feminism, which is not the same as women. Women are a group of people, several of whom regularly contribute article content at AVfM, whereas feminism is an ideology, whose proponents are also of both sexes. Rhiannon and Holly are both encouraged to refer back to this paragraph any time they become confused about which is which, or about how they are not the same.

Our dynamic duo also manage to get it wrong when mentioning the online registry Register Her. According to the pair, the register-her project:

> …purports to be an alternative to the male-dominated sex offenders’ register, in which they publicly > name and shame women who have cried rape.

This description by the Vagenda duo is misleading, whether purposefully or not.

The project's purpose is clearly stated on the entry page of the site, as well as on the submission guidelines page. Namely, to draw public attention to the rising problem of false accusation without consequence and the damage this does to communities and public confidence in the courts.

> The need for register-her.com was born out of the unfortunate social and legal custom of failing to punish female criminals and to safeguard society from their continued criminality.[19]

From the submission guidelines page of the site:

> Register-her.com is a registry of individuals that have caused significant harm to innocent individuals either by the direct action of crimes like rape, assault, child molestation and murder, or by the false accusation of crimes against others for personal gain in one form or another.
>
> It is not the intent of this registry to emulate those who commit false allegations, therefore this policy is written to provide guidelines for the approval of submissions designed to ensure the authenticity of the information provided.
> Only those submissions that can be corroborated by either a link(s) to a recognized news affiliate and/or digital copies of court records, with correct contact information for that court, or other compelling, substantiated documentation, will be accepted as proof.

Rhiannon and Holly dismiss the action of individuals who willfully made false accusations of rape, confirmed by reporting in reputable news media with the flippant appellation of "cried rape."

What the writing partners do get right, almost, is the inclusion of bigots in the registry. However, rather than "high profile feminists" as claimed by Doublefem, the Bigot category on that site "is used to designate individuals whose active ideology is one that results in socially inflicted harm on men and/or boys in the general population".

Inclusion of "high profile feminists" as is claimed by our heroines would indicate a category for "feminists" which that site does not use, and would obviate articles on AVfM such as "Why isn't Betty Friedan on Register-Her?"

However, rather than their public recognition as "high profile feminists" as is claimed, individuals such as Jessica Valenti and Amanda Marcotte earned their way into the registry by their public agitation in the erosion of the legal rights of men and boys.

Valenti merited inclusion principally for the public advocacy of the overturning of the burden of evidence in criminal accusations of rape and sexual assault. According to her authorship of a 2010 washington post article:

> …we should look to [Sweden] as a potential model for our own legislation. In fact, some activists and legal experts in Sweden want to change the law there so that the burden of proof is on the accused; the alleged rapist would have to show that he got consent, instead of the victim having to prove that she didn't give it.

This re-invention of jurisprudence, which would effectively turn western law upside down, has, since been implemented in American universities though the Obama administration, although not yet in the criminal courts proper.

Valenti advocates a system of totalitarian law, for one sex, creating a tiered society along lines of a sexual apartheid.

Amanda Marcotte, also listed in the category of Bigot, earned her spot in the registry by an established pattern in her writing of exploiting the personal tragedies of men, either when they have died or have been brutalized by demonstratively false criminal accusations. Typically she will re-characterize events to portray men killed or destroyed as aggressors and oppressors, and then characterize tragic outcomes in their lives as if they are events victimizing women.

Said Marcotte of the now infamous Duke Rape scandal:

> I've been sort of casually listening to CNN blaring throughout the waiting area and good fucking god is that channel pure evil. For awhile, I had to listen to how the poor dear lacrosse players at Duke are being persecuted just because they held someone down and fucked her against her will—not rape, of course, because the charges have been thrown out. Can't a few white boys sexually assault a black woman anymore without people getting all wound up about it? So unfair.

Marcotte has also done her share to emulate Valenti's ideas on the evisceration of presumed innocence and due process for men.

Journalist Cathy Young described Marcotte as a leader of a "cyber-lynch mob," writing:

> …in Marcotte's eyes, the real crime of the independent feminists is helping preserve the idea that the presumption of innocence applies even in cases of rape and sexual assault."[6] The post attracted so much commentary, including from The New York Times, that Marcotte ended up deleting it.

Marcotte is as racist as she is sexist. Her mentality is one that serves to de-humanize male victims, and re-enforce the mainstream narrative that all men are evil, particularly White men, and that all women are their victims. In short, she is a Bigot.

The Vagenda also identifies this site, the parent site of Register-her as the "English Defence League of the men's rights movement." That is accurate enough, except for AVfM not being a right wing site, or left wing, nor racist, nor tolerant of violence in either action or in rhetoric, nor sexist, nor homophobic, nor associated with a single political party, nor attached to one country and also not exclusionary of anyone by religion, ethnicity, political leaning, sex, sexual orientation or other characteristic of identity. Aside from that, yes, this site is exactly like the EDL.

The New Statesman's week long campaign addressing men's experience and the rising Men's Rights Movement appears to be, rather than informative or investigative, a torrent of snark and condescension driven by the fear of lost privilege.

It may be that the volume of insinuation, pejorative and mockery is intended to by its volume to thwart any serious attempt at scrutiny.

However, in spite of poor intentions, the writers contributing to public scorn of men and boys and the derision of male pain must still be thanked. Readers of high traffic sites such as New Statesman are now exposed to the issues of concern of the MRM. Those readers, a few at a time, become readers of this site and others like it. Some few even become contributors, having much to say. They just didn't know they had a place to say it with a significant audience till they found us, and discovered that we validated their struggles.

The Statesman Sisters are now our publicists.

For writers opposed to the Men's Rights Movement, in spite of an adversarial editorial stance, several guides on this site have been posted to foster stronger opposition to the MRM. The easily debunked rhetoric prominent in this week's NS series could have been much stronger, and it is the purpose of oppositional guides on this site to promote a more factually and logically rigorous opposition.

"Thank you feminists and ideologues" is available on the site from John the Other, and offered in a spirit of assistance, as is the similar guide from Paul Elam "An Offer of Help to Feminists."

We look forward to working with all of you in promoting the "So Called Men's Rights Movement" into the center stage of mainstream discourse on human rights.

Addendum:

In the torrent of snark, characterization and falsehood recently posted at the New Statesman, one point of apparent sarcastic amusement fixed on by the writers at the New Statesman as well as depraved and futile bloggers elsewhere is recommended self-preservation located on AVfM's "don't get fucked" page. The point of that derision being that self preservation denotes paranoia, folly, and apparently; ninjitsu.

Anyone clinging to such view is invited to view the following linked video. A Canadian cab driver was saved from the frivolous false accusation of a girl whose motivation to accuse him was to evade a $ 13 dollar cab fare. Any individual who advises men to not protect themselves in climate of such easy destruction is amoral, depraved and futile.

What is a real man?

John Hembling (JtO) · 29 May 2012 · Archived copy · Original

There are many common answers to this question, and most include service, and sacrifice for others. Usually, for a collective, or for others who are socially superior to the "real man" making that sacrifice.

This is already a slippery definition. Because how do we define socially superior? We might assume the clearly defined hierarchies such as between employers and employees, or elected officials and voters explains this. But in those cases, status is not always so well defined. In fact, it is fluid, and depends on the context in which it occurs.

A hired hand, normally lower than their boss can take on higher status than the boss in the light of hazardous work, hostile workplace, worker dispute and so on. The postures people take in different situations change their relationships of power.

Sometimes a child has more power than a parent. In some cases a victim has more power than who victimizes them. Sometimes more power than who rescues them. In this picture, women are victims needing protection, as we imagine them socially inferior to men. They're smaller, weaker, and in most minds, the low position in the power relationship.

A "real man" is the one who carries the load created by changes in hierarchy, while everyone pretends he is The Man.

This is the dynamic of power, hierarchy, and expectation placing a "real man" in a position to set aside his own needs, his safety, even his humanity. Serve, protect, sacrifice, and (when convenient for anyone except himself) die.

In a top to bottom social relation, the bottom controls the positive identity of the top. Does this sound like the politics of sexual fetish? It is the same. The control of identity in any top to bottom power dynamic is identical. The weaker party controls the social identity, and the human value of the stronger party.

Of course, everyone knows this deep down. Except that nobody knows any of it, and when pressed – will deny any such dynamic exists.

The social contract demands denial of the truth.

The social contract is the label for a view that an individual's moral obligations depend on an unstated agreement to form the society in which they live.

One obligation, for men, is an unstated demand to protect women. Even at the cost of hazard, injury or possible death of a "real man" must fill that demand. This is why men carry the legal onus to register for selective military service in the US. Women, face no such demand. It is also why in event of violence towards a woman, men are expected to put themselves in the path of it. Absorbing, and dispensing violence on behalf of a woman. A man who doesn't disregard his own safety, or dispense violence on behalf of a woman under threat, he's no man at all. He's a coward, a shirker, hell, he's damn-near doing violence against that woman himself if he doesn't protect her using whatever level of force is needed.

This is a basic element of the social contract. It is not just an expectation to assume risk, but to engage in direct violence because somebody else's actions created a situation of threat to a woman, even when that woman's own actions are the cause. Step up, protect, and pay, that's what a man does. And what he gets in exchange is a social identity, to be a human – not despised. Just that, nothing more. Just recognition as a human being. At least, that used to be the deal. Scanty and one sided and deadly as it was, it was enough. It worked. But that is in the past. That is no longer the case.

Roll the clock forward for 50 years of a narrative in which men are bad, and women are not just good, they're victims. They're victims of men.

Men's role in society was always to protect, serve, provide and dispense violence in protection of weaker individuals or in protection of women. Or to absorb violence for all those motivations and (when convenient for anyone but themselves) to die – We've spent a half century re-characterizing all that into a story of male oppression of women. And male identity, which was traded – your recognition as a human being if you were male – for your sacrifice, your provision for others, sold to you as if it was a privilege – this identity has been taken out of the bargain, a piece at a time.

Now we arrive in the present, where it is perfectly acceptable for little girls in kindergarten to wear t-shirts, purchased by their mothers, which say "boys are stupid, throw rocks at them". In which day time talk shows with live studio audiences laugh openly at the mutilation of a human being who happens to be male.

When movie reviewers losing their audience deem it logical to market themselves by telling the male half of the human race they're inferior. When men are publicly derided as incomplete females, as walking abortions; aborted at the gene stage. To be male is to be deficient, emotionally limited; maleness is a deficiency disease and males are emotional cripples.

Oh, yeah, but men are still expected to keep on keeping on, to step up, to serve, to disburse and to absorb other people's proxy violence, and (when convenient to others) to die. That's the other half of the social contract, the one still in force.

And men, for their part, are increasingly alert to this one sided rotten deal. A deal, or a contract if you will, a social contract in which men are shit, men are aggressors, men are rapists, men are worthless, but oh yeah, they'd better still step up because otherwise, they won't have a worthwhile social identity, as determined by the fiat of the weaker sex.

And what is the only possible answer to this state of affairs for sane men, human men, humane men, and self respecting men to give to everyone else still participating in that old, crooked, broken, and one sided deal which for men amounts to you're damned if you do and damned if you don't?

Fuck it, I'm out.

And now let's talk about the social consequences of a practical ethic of non-violence.

For many men rejecting the dysfunctional and toxic model of acceptable male identity, self definition includes a rejection of violence. This means a rejection of their own utility as receptacles for violence, as well as use as dispensers of force.

In addition to having no accepted path to positive identity, men are increasingly not afforded the protection of law. Men can be murdered, mutilated, and raped – and these events are treated as comedy – not just in fiction, but when they happen to real men in the real world. When men are killed by women, our courts, in the face of proven culpability – manufacture histories of abuse. Obviously, past grievances, when they're real, have always been the basis for justifiable homicide. Indeed, on my way back from work today, a man driving a Toyota cut me off in traffic. Two intersections farther on, I signaled him by blinking my headlights. We fought to the death on the boulevard; when the police arrived, I simply explained his rude driving and they understood. They gave me a medal. Nice job slugger, you're a real man.

In January 2011, a New Brunswick resident named Crystal Dawn MacKenzie walked free after her acquittal for the knife-killing of her common-law husband, whose name doesn't matter, because he's male…and dead.

McKenzie's lawyer, David Kelly, pointed out that "Of course she had other options," but that she was drunk at the time, oh and also female, so a violent history between the acquitted killer and her murdered husband was used to excuse making a choice to stab that man to death. Her defender said this, and she walked.

The standard expectation of men to automatically resolve violence affecting anyone else is what, in a world where men are hated, is no longer acceptable.

Dispensers and receptacles of violence, for anyone but themselves, in a narrative where men are no longer humans with rights. No. Protectors whose quiet presence everywhere in life is a guarantee of safety of others. No. Men, those stoic citizens who, in a moment of violent crisis could always be counted on to step forward without regard for their own mortality. No.

The new deal is men, after half a century of public vilification, marginalization, and the ongoing removal of their human rights and human identities – men are saying no to the expectation that they will dispense the proxy violence of others, or absorb it.

At this point, a reader might wonder what men? What weak men, sissy men, failures, and "not a real man" would ever contemplate refusing to step instantly forward in protection of a woman? What kind of faggot would shrink away, considering his own safety before the safety of a woman or anyone weaker than himself? This is the ethic of non-violence, refusing receipt and refusing to dispense the violence of other people's proxy.

And that is the consequence men must face, who dare to think of themselves as humans worthy of even being considered human, rather than disposable. It surely takes brass balls to be such a sissy. That is the consequence of an ethic of non-violence. A real man is disposable. That's what real means, at least when the definition of real man sits in the hands of those who benefit from that manly disposability.

This is the driver of an emerging ethic of male identity in which men, awake to their own status as barely human disposable utilities, are saying no. In increasing numbers men are defining themselves, but as men increasingly demand recognition of their own humanity they earn a constantly escalating torrent of public scorn. Men refusing the definition of themselves as disposable appliances are told with rising volume that any move towards their own identity defined apart from their utility to others is not self worth, it is hate. You just hate women. You're a misogynist. Men told when they refuse receipt or disbursal of the proxy violence of others, that refusal of violence is violence. Men standing up for their own humanity do so against a climate of censure, hatred, and depraved lies. But those lies, vile, hateful, and condemning of men who dare to claim their own humanity; those are the lies denying men any human identity, shaming them back to disposability. Get back on the treadmill, provide, protect, and (when convenient) die – and we'll grant that you're "real men".

And what is the public narrative in response to men declaring themselves human beings apart from utility and convenient disposability? You just hate women.

You just hate women. You just hate women. You just hate women.

> "beating the gay" out of children, especially boys who are "more like" you, is aimed at you.[women]"

Rhiannon and Holly; Two Vagendas, One Keyboard of the New Statesman claim misogyny and conservatism:

> these men are attempting to fight back against vagina-wielding harpies by reasserting their masculinity in a way that is not only misogynistic but also deeply conservative[3]

According to the Simon Fraser University women's centre web site "masculinity denigrates women"[4] Jessica Valenti has repeatedly claimed that online men's rights activism is driven by misogyny. Male self actualization is characterized as hatred of women.

Clementine Ford of "how to spot a misogynist" quacked:

> If you're not trained in the spotting of smug, self-satisfied misogynists, you might not know the general thrust of their shtick.

Amada Marcotte claims:

> …if you scratch an MRA, you find a guy upset that someone is keeping him from beating his wife and kids.

That's right, according to Marcotte, in spite of thousands of blogs explaining the violations of human rights – and male targeting violence, the use of male rape and male mutilation as comedy, it's really all a ruse so men can get back to beating their wives and children.

According to Arthur Goldwag of the southern Poverty Law Center on the Men's Rights Movement:

> …women haters whose fury goes well beyond criticism of the family court system, domestic violence laws, and false rape accusations.

Goldwag skipped over "misogyny" and went straight for "woman haters" – although at least he managed to name a few of the areas of concern for men struggling for recognition as human beings.

But in every case, and hundreds more not listed here – according to the opposition, men arguing for the human rights of men and boys really just hate women. You just hate women. You just hate women. You just hate women, but if you give up on the foolish notion that as a man you can have an identity as a human being, get back to being disposable, we might just allow that you're almost a human.

No thanks.

AVFM News and Activism Show 6

James Huff · 29 May 2012 · Archived copy · Original

[box icon="none"]

Our guest tonight will be Karl Mathews, founder and primary administrator of Antimisandry, an internet forum which many consider to the be premier online forum for Men's Rights Activists worldwide. Members of this forum include Angry Harry, Paul Elam, Phyllis Schlaflay and both of your hosts James Huff and Robert O'Hara. Antimisandry has been at the center of many MRA actions in recent years, being an important platform from which action against Mary Kellett and other corrupt officials have been challenged.

Most importantly, it is the home of none other than Agent Orange. It was Antimisandry that provided almost all of the logistical and administrative support for his activities and it is there that the Agent Orange Files are made available to the public.

We will be discussing many issues with Mr. Mathews on tonight's show and we hope that you will join us and consider calling in.

The show airs live on May 29, at 8:00 Central Time, US, which is 2:00 a.m. May 30, in London and 11:00 a.m. May 30 in Brisbane. A father's undying love

Civil War Vet, John McCray Devoted His Life to Searching for His Children

In the last 50 years the teaching of history has been overhauled by gender ideologues. We have tainted our accounts of many notable people and events by filtering them all through feminism's convoluted lens of wholesale victimization.

Along this truth-deficient path, we have also reimagined many of our heroes as actual villains. Our male ancestors went from being pioneers, great thinkers, warriors and statesmen to being caricatured as megalomaniacal villains. Not individuals, mind you, but all men. This did not happen by uncovering facts that would correct our impressions, but by the infestation of unsupported and unsupportable gender theories that paint all men and their relationships with women as inherently evil.

This belief has metastasized from the halls of academe, has pervaded mass media, and, unavoidably, the collective consciousness. It has tainted our perceptions of what men are across the board; as fathers, husbands, citizens and servants of the ideals by which they sought to live. It lends the expression "A good man is hard to find," a new, and chilling meaning.

If you don't know what that means, just wander into your nearest university and try to learn something about good men. It won't take you long to discover that there are none. In fact, you can pay a lot of money and they will teach you there never were, including you, if you happen to be one.

Actual history is taught only by those with the fortitude to do it, as Robert St. Estephe does now by bringing us this Chicago Tribune story from 1893, of a civil war vet who today could not make the classified section of the same newspaper.–PE

FULL TEXT: How many minor tragedies there are of which the world has no knowledge. Less than a week ago there was sounded the last note in a long drawn minor strain to which one man's life had been attuned for nearly thirty years. An unknown man was knocked down by a horse that ran away in a Pittsburgh street. Two or three hours later he died, but before the end came he said his name was John McGray and that he had served with the Ninth Illinois Cavalry during the war.

In 1862 John McGray, then a prosperous Chicago merchant, enlisted in the Union army and went to the front, leaving behind him a wife and two children. After three years of faithful effort on behalf of the flag he returned home only to discover that his wife had abandoned him and had taken the little ones with her. Those two children were very dear to John McGray. In camp, on the march, and amid the roar of conflict their images were often before his eyes. He would not give them up. Disposing of his remnants of property he started out to seek his own.

Patiently and with fidelity that knew no wavering he continued his quest but without any appearance of encouragement. Then his money gave out and the search moved less rapidly but without diminution in its persistence. With but one object in life the soldier worked at whatever occupation he could find, scorning charity, until funds enough had been saved to make another movement possible. From state to state he wandered, occasionally believing he had a clue, but more frequently groping in the dark.

He was looking for employment in Pittsburgh when that runaway horse came along, and then, perhaps, John McCray found his children.

["Perhaps He Found the Children – Sad Life Romance, Beginning with the War and Ending Last Week," Chicago Tribune (Il.), May 19, 1893, p. 18]

One has to wonder if today this man would be tagged as a member of an abusers lobby, and his wife an empowered woman prevailing against the odds. ~ PE

Devil with the red pill on

Jade Michael · 31 May 2012 · Archived copy · Original

The early-mid 1980's saw the emergence of "satanic panic"; a widespread phenomenon that, among many false allegations, fingered various Heavy Metal bands and fans as "Satanists", and implied that the accused were involved in unsavory and/or illegal behavior. These allegations have since been debunked by the FBI, but for the better part of a decade the devil served as the scapegoat for those who felt repulsed by an evolving art form.

Christian-based organizations, conservative think tanks and groups that were a combination of the two all cast their judgments based on (at best) loose interpretations of several Heavy Metal album covers, song lyrics and the stage antics of "suspect" bands.

To give you an idea of just how much this witch hunt was rooted in irrational paranoia, even the Progressive Rock band Rush was on a hit list of "occult" oriented bands, mainly for the band's use of a red star inside a circle pictured on the band's 2112 album cover. Even when taken at face value, the circled star clearly had nothing to do with Satanism as the Church of Satan's official symbol is the Sigil of Baphomet.

Some Satanists will also use an inverted Pentagram enclosed in a circle as a symbol of recognition for the Left Hand Path. At best, the artwork on the Rush album cover could be misconstrued as a symbol for Pagan ritual, but upon further investigation and after the album's lyrics are taken into consideration, it becomes obvious that both implications are laughably false. This fatuous stretch was symbolic of just how virulent conservative Christian groups became in the face of free speech.

Cut to the present, society now has a New Devil created by sanctimonious "vigilantes" hailing from the bowels of political correctness. These feminist whitewashers have made their devil out to be a much larger and much more significant group of people than the Heavy Metal subculture was in the 1980's. This New Devil crosses race, sexual orientation and financial status, as it demonstrably includes any member of the male gender (and many females as well). Not surprisingly, along with the vast change in western politics since the Regan/Thatcher era, today's inquisition emanates from left-driven media zealots; a camp akin to its conservative Christian cousins when it comes to employing bullying tactics.

These ideological bottom feeders have made multiple attempts to hurl negative attention onto MRAs; a growing population of men and women who stand up for men as human beings worthy of equal treatment under the law. To the politically correct, men represent everything that "got us into this mess". Men are the scapegoats to the world's ills and the media has outfitted us all with horns and tails.

When men and women speak out about injustice, they are typically referred to as "activists". When these activists ban together to raise awareness of their cause they often times create various forms of artwork that is reactionary to their struggle. It's typically representative of the oppressive forces responsible for the injustice in the first place.

This is generally all fine and dandy as far as the masses are concerned – except when said artwork criticizes women, feminists or anti-male policy. Why? Because, to allow the devil his day in court would be blasphemous to the status quo. All Hell would break loose. No one wants to hear what the devil has to say because no matter what may roll off of his double-pointed tongue, it is inherently diabolical and will need to be censored forthwith.

Societal scapegoats are created to blame and shame; to foster a "negative" to an established "positive". However, when it is inevitably proven that certain scapegoats aren't a perceived threat, rather just another part of the population that is neither all good nor all bad, it is "out with the old and in with the new". A New Devil must be brought to light for the sake of those who are "good", in order to keep those of us who are "bad" in line. Since the advent of pop culture mediums, outing these supposed Spawns of Hell has become not only easier but trendier. And it is chic to hate today's New Devil. One appears especially dapper when pushing a clear misconception of the New Devil as truth.

It is socially acceptable for these dreck peddlers to knock and spread lies about men and, moreover, what men do for each other and themselves (i.e. their underground movements, music and art). Our critics don't focus on the fact that many of us have faced and dealt with adversity and abuse because it is more sensational to focus on our sometimes, and rightfully so, harsh reactions to it. If the genders were reversed, this would be a non-issue as any female criticism of men is deemed "empowering."

When a man shows emotion or especially when he shows vulnerability, he becomes unsuitable based on the rigid societal standards set upon him. Unless he fits within this manufactured format by assuming the correct thoughts and actions, he could be considered a "loose cannon" at best. Certainly, if he does not maintain a preconceived report with women, he will be ostracized.

But…back to Satan.

Upon educating oneself on what the philosophy of Satanism actually is, it becomes more absurd that droves of teased-haired teenagers in Motley Crüe t-shirts were accused of blindly adhering to its principles. I say this not to promote or denounce any religion or to knock Crüe fans, but rather to demonstrate a point, and make a parallel between then and now.

Satanism champions staunch individualism and a rational disbelief in a red guy with a tail and pitchfork. Its one part Atheism, one part Ayn Rand Objectivism and one part Aleister Crowley. "Responsibility to the responsible" is one of Satanism's most promoted tenets. Now, could someone please explain to me how a disgruntled, mentally unstable 13-year old who abuses animals and/or shoots his classmates could possibly get lumped in with Satanism? Additionally, there is a written application process and a stiff membership fee to pay before a prospective member can legally and publically align himself with the Church of Satan.

Clearly, its detractors were creating a circus of misinformation to benefit their own Christian/conservative agendas of the day. And to round out this analogy, MRAs are no more a "hate movement" than registered Satanists are a cat-killing gaggle of baby snatchers.

Pure silliness.

It could be said that MRAs have been deemed "satanic" by feminist media parasites when, in fact, if someone actually reads our articles and looks at our artwork without extracting and manipulating aspects of it to create falsehoods with, it becomes clear that we are not the devils we are made out to be. There are those, however, who harbor irrational fear towards us and turn their fear mongering into a fragmented career. Through this fear they attempt to persuade their minions by disguising their efforts as journalism or some other pseudo-intellectual affectation.

Do some MRAs create angry artwork? Absolutely.

Is the MRM a hate movement? No.

Well, we do hate misandry, but we are not a movement based on hating women, of which we've been accused. Not all women are misandric, likewise, not all men are rapists or greedy, evil, pillaging patriarchs. Good grief, do these things really need to be explained? Apparently they do insofar as bands like Slayer had to defend not only their right to free speech, but also had to interpret their lyrics for their opposition. When an opposing force is without even the basic understanding of what they are opposing, their arguments are undoubtedly baseless. As much as our detractors may accuse us of the same, we are at the very least, able to come up with proof time and time again that this New Devil has in fact been irrationally and legally marginalized.

And for the record, not all Heavy Metal bands (very few as a matter of fact) promote real Satanism. Merciful Fate was one of the first to play with satanic themes. Ever hear of a Merciful Fate or King Diamond fan hacking up babies in the name of Satan? I'm guessing not because fans of those acts might even adhere to the real tenets of Satanism, if they are in fact Satanists at all.

And MRAs might not actually be misogynistic wife beaters.

And Pit Bulls might not be bloody thirsty Hellhounds.

When MRA artwork is demonized I am reminded of a t-shirt that a gay friend of mine used to wear. The t-shirt read “ditch the bitch and make the switch”. Neither he, nor I ever once heard anything about the manufacturer or retailer of the shirt being accused of misogyny. But the MRM’s critics should, by their standards, decry the shirt as promoting “hate” towards women, right?

After all, it has the word “bitch” in it and suggests that women not be paired with. Nah, not likely. Perhaps that is partly because it is just a humorous, gay-affirmative t-shirt and partly because…well…it is not misogynistic. And most importantly, it was not a male-affirmative t-shirt, which is the only reason it was held to different standards in regards to public scrutiny. But I ask, if a MGHOW was to wear that same t-shirt, how do you think he would be perceived?

Whether you’re a herd-mentality think tank stemming from the left, right or center you need a devil to oppose in order to amass numbers. And, according to shit starter law, you’d better make damned sure those numbers usurp the group you are demonizing in order to “successfully” refute its claims. You can only do this by opportunistically creating falsehoods and provocative drama designed to pander to different segments of the population. In short, you’re a popularity-driven whore whose wares are based solely in narcissistic advantageousness. The need to be admired as the saint surpasses any call to understanding, compassion and objectivity. In lieu of my earlier analogy, I feel it is relevant to add that Anton LaVey called this the “good guy badge” in an essay he penned under the same title.

Like many MRAs, I wish not to be the good guy, the bad guy or the indifferent guy. I just wish to be a guy in a world where being one isn’t demonized. However crude my methods are to wake people up to this injustice, I guess I’d rather be called out for that instead of standing idly by while doing nothing, or worse yet, selling out the very real suffering of so many men in order to self-aggrandize.

AVfM Radio: Male Spaces

John Hembling (JtO) · 31 May 2012 · Archived copy · Original

[box icon="none"]

If masculinity is evil, predatory, regressive atavism – which is what the proponents of radical feminism seem to believe, then male spaces, or places in human society which are male oriented, male friendly without apology without polite curtaining of male identity in deference to women – such places cannot possibly be allowed.

Female spaces, that is, places where female identity dominates to the total exclusion of men are relatively common, and indeed, almost all public space shared by women is governed with an ethic of deference to female emotion and sensibility. However, in a healthy, functional society which acknowledged the existence of men and women, as humans, both Female and Male friendly spaces are necessary feature of the landscape. So where are the male spaces in modern society, and how do we get them back?

JtO, GWW and TyphonBlue get busy tonight with some necessary groundwork, rebuilding male space in western society.

The show airs live on May 31, at 8:00 Central Time, US, which is 2:00 a.m. June 1, in London and 11:00 a.m. June 1 in Brisbane. Patriarchy is the oppression of men

Alison Tieman (Typhonblue) · 31 May 2012 · Archived copy · Original

Patriarchy is Oppression of Men

We cast others into the roles of agent and patient. Agents do things, patients have things done to them. People prefer to deliver pain to agents, even those agents who act in the benefit to others, than patients. Agents, good or bad, are seen as both capable of enduring more pain than patients and elicit less sympathy when they do so.[1]

This dichotomy divides people into those who can expect to draw upon the resources of society to be protected and provided for, and those who can't.

This dynamic can also be titled 'hyperagency'[2]. Hyperagency is the perception that a group of people has more agency than they actually do. Being cast in the role of hyperagent has significant drawbacks for groups so cast and throughout history we can see groups of marginalized people cast into this role as scapegoats. They are seen as having disproportionate influence on society, thus responsible for all of its ills, thus punishment or confinement of the hyperagent group is justified.

Hyperagents suffer from hyposympathy relative to hypoagents. Hypoagents are greatly enfranchised over hyperagents in their ability to expect and demand that others protect them when they are victimized and provide for them when they require it. Hypoagents weild power through the creation and exploitation of hypersympathy. Hypersympathy is an artificially inflated sympathy based on reducing other's perception of one's agency.

Hyperagents, on the other hand, are considered the appropriate dispensers of violence on the behalf of hypoagents. Hyperagents are also expected to buffer hypoagents from directly experiencing violence or depredation.

Men, in every society on earth, are cast into the role of hyperagent. They are expected to assume positions of overt power in the family and in the political, legal and financial spheres. This is an expectation of their gender role and one they have to fulfill least they be seen as 'not a man' and thus worthless to their families and society.

Needing to be emphasized is men's lack of agency regarding assumption of the position of hyperagent.

Men are forced to assume the role of hyperagent in various ways. Some men have it thrust upon them as a condition of being male; for example in communities that have a cultural practice of appointing men as heads of households (even though there is evidence indicating that men have less actual control over their households relative to the true head of the home, the woman who has taken him as husband.) Men are also expected to acquire hyperagency through participation in systems that expect sacrifice of emotional and physical health as a cost of participation.

Forcing men into hyperagency as a condition of their gender role enables a vast reserve of vulnerable men—made vulnerable by society's relative indifference to their suffering and deaths–for society to sacrifice when and where it requires such sacrifice.

Without the perception of male hyperagency, cultivated through cultural rules about 'heads of households' and the 'stronger sex', there would not be this battery of human bodies to throw into the woodchipper.

This creates a self-reinforcing cycle. Generals exist because there are tens of thousands of privates willing to give up their lives on his order; tens of thousands of privates exist because men have been thrust into the role of hyperagent thus society will turn a blind eye to their deaths; men have been universally stereotyped as hyperagents because Generals are male. But Generals are male because only men are so motivated by the expectation to assume hyperagency that they will endure the emotional strain of sending thousands of people to their death. (Regardless if that emotional strain is lessened by the fact those people are mostly men.)

Men die in war precisely because our leaders are men.

(In fact arguing that excluding women from positions of power is oppression of women when those positions of power only exist because other men are willing to sacrifice their lives to create them seems to be moral slight of hand of the worst sort.)

Far from being empowering, a man's role as hyperagent is disempowering.

Every cultural institution that casts men into the role of overt hyperagent disenfranchises men as a group emotionally. They become victims of hyposympathy and are incapable of rousing concern from others for their vulnerabilities. (Instead their vulnerabilities arouse contempt and ostracisim.) Simply, the more cultural institutions that presumptively exclude women from the role of hyperagent, the more women are perceived as hypoagents relative to men, the more hypersympathy women receive and the more men suffer from hyposympathy.

In a system, where overt hypoagency benefits women by enfranchising them with hypersympathy, women policing the behavior of other women—including resisting overt political enfranchisement of women as the female founded and lead Antisufferage movement demonstrates– to make sure all women play the role of hypoagent is makes complete sense.

Rather than dupes of the patriarchy, these women are protecting the dynamic that produces the hypersympathy that they then exploit to benefit themselves.

Conversely forcing men into the role of hyperagent represents a real and often deadly loss of empathetic potency. It puts men into an inferior position relative to women when negotiating for sympathy from society at large.

And no one in history ever asked men's permission before forcing their participation in all of this.

Radfems ousted from Conway Hall!

Paul Elam · 1 June 2012 · Archived copy · Original

[box icon="none"]

I just had the pleasure of a skype conversation with the one and only Agent Orange. I felt compelled to speak with AO after discovering that the pro-violence bigots at Radfem Hub were just dealt a significant blow, courtesy in part of the Agent Orange Files.

Conway Hall, a London convention center and speaking venue where the Radfem group was scheduled to have an upcoming "conference," issued a statement explaining why the Radfem group is now banned from that venue.

"We had sought assurances that the organizers would allow access to all, in order to enable the event to proceed at the venue. We also expressed concern that particular speakers would need to be made aware that whilst welcoming progressive thinking and debate, Conway Hall seeks to uphold inclusivity in respect of both legal obligations and as a principle."[1]

The language is polite, but the message is clear. They don't want to do business with a bunch of bigots.

AO sent them selections from the Agent Orange Files a week ago. Those files have also been making the rounds in the transgendered community recently (also via AO), and have spawned a great deal of protest from there.

This was not just about their exclusion of transgender people, though, and they are being lambasted for it across the board. In addition to being exposed by activists on the MRM side, an increasing amount of heat is coming from other directions.

Even feminists at the wildly liberal Democratic Underground[2] have also scrutinized this group of violent bigots and is raising their voice in objection.

One feminist that goes by Catherina there had a message for them:

> Everyone, regardless of gender, regardless of identity, is quickly realising that your odious views have no place within our future.

This series of events raises several matters of much significance. One, the fact that these goons have been denied a venue makes it much easier to make sure they are denied other venues. We now have precedent that we can refer to repeatedly that shows a clear mainstream rejection of their bigoted agenda. I don't think it helps the SPLC either that they are publicly supporting and accepting money from an organization so rife with bigotry that they cannot even muster the credibility to pay for a venue in a liberal environment. Just saying.

We also gain from feminists being forced to go after each other publicly. Who cares if feminists at Democratic Underground don't get that they are just as culpable as the Radfems? I don't. I am happy to use their rhetoric against the slightly more extreme versions of typical feminists, and then to use it again on the "less" extreme when appropriate.

But here is the kicker. Radfem has already announced that they are going to carry on with their conference at "an alternative venue."

Uh, don't bet the farm on it.

We now have Conway Hall on public record as rejecting Radfem for their bigotry and exclusionary policies. And we have the AO files. And now we have pressure building against them from the transgendered community.

We are going on the attack wherever they go, and we are going to do it FTSU style. So I suggest this group of “wimmen born wimmen” better start looking for private property on which to utter their hateful incantations and burn their crosses, because wherever they go in the public realm we are going to follow up with immediate action to get them booted, just as they were from Conway Hall.

Score one for the team. We are going to marginalize this group of fucking psychos completely out of existence.

I have been concerned to see a number of rumors floating about that revolve around Dr. F having his own radio show in the AVfM network, where he will add his own unique voice for the benefit of our Australian MRM audience.

As great an idea as this is, it is unfortunately not true. So I thought it better to put the rumors to rest before anyone gets the wrong idea. Dr. F will not be adding his voice to our radio program for the benefit of our Australian MRM audience.

What he will be doing is a radio show in which he will be directly antagonizing the agents of misandry in the Land of Oz by getting in their faces with extreme prejudice and recording it, then playing it for us on his very own AVfM Radio program. This will be for the benefit of ALL MRAs across the planet, not just Aussies. In other words, we can all have a good laugh at the expense of foolish bigots, courtesy of the Dr. F show.

Imagine this as Daddy Justice meets Sam Kinison, only sicker and more in your face. With a twist of black humor he will be asking all the right, embarrassing questions of people who really do not want him to be asking anything at all. It will be the first effort of its kind in the MRM, and something tells me it will be very, very entertaining.

It takes a certain amount of spunk to do this kind of show. I have long thought Dr. F to have the guts, and hopelessly incorrigible nature to do it and do it right. He has told me repeatedly, and asked that I pass it along to you, that he has the goods to deliver.

He attributes most of this to the size of his unusually large penis, which he says is so big that entire families of kangaroos stand under it on hot days for the shade. It is so utterly fucking huge, he says, that one glimpse of it caused John Holmes so much immediate despair and humiliation that he filed for unemployment on the spot. And Dr. F promises to use it to figuratively bludgeon everyone on his continent who has anything to do with feminist governance, or is otherwise in the way of men's rights.

That is a lot of ground to cover.

I am sure in the months to come you will hear many feminists talking about the Massive Prick from Oz. And what they say will not be good. This, of course, means it will be music to our ears.

The program starts in Australia on June 10. Look for the show announcements here at AVfM.

Taslima Nasreen: a prize idiot

John Hembling (JtO) · 2 June 2012 · Archived copy · Original

According to her bio on freethoughtblogs.com, Taslima Nasreen:

"[I]s an award-winning writer, physician, secular humanist and human rights activist. Nasreen's fiction, nonfiction, poetry and memoir have topped the best-seller's list. Her writings won the hearts of people across the border and she landed with the prestigious literary award Ananda from India in 1992 and 2000. Taslima won The Sakharov Prize for Freedom of Thought from the European Parliament in 1994. She received the Kurt Tucholsky Award from Swedish PEN, the Simone de Beauvoir Award and Human Rights Award from Government of France. She received Le Prix de l' Edit de Nantes from the city of Nantes, France."

"She is a Humanist Laureate in The International Academy for Humanism, USA. She won Distinguished Humanist Award from International Humanist and Ethical Union, Free-thought Heroine award from Freedom From Religion foundation, USA., IBKA award, Germany,and Feminist Press Award, USA . She got the UNESCO Madanjeet Singh prize for Promotion of the Tolerance and Non-violence in 2005. She received the Medal of honor of Lyon. She got honorary citizenship from Paris, Nantes, Lyon, Metz, Thionville, Esch, Venice, Barcelona etc. Taslima was awarded the Condorcet-Aron Prize in the "Parliament of the French Community of Belgium" in Brussels."

"Bestowed with honorary doctorates from Gent University and UCL in Belgium, and American University of Paris and Paris Diderot University in France, she has addressed gatherings in major venues of the world like the European Parliament, National Assembly of France, Universities of Sorbonne, Oxford, Harvard, Yale, etc. She got fellowships as a research scholar at Harvard and New York Universities. She was a Woodrow Wilson Fellow in the USA in 2009. Taslima has written 35 books in Bengali, which includes poetry, essays, novels and autobiography series."

Unfortunately, in spite of that long list of international esteem and praise, and in spite of being the winner of every literary award and humanist laurel of praise ever invented, Taslima Nasreen remains…

...an idiot.

She began a posting on the hilariously misnamed feminist-flavored host freethoughtblogs with the declarative sentence. "Men hate woman's body[sic]". In spite of the confusion over verb tense, this was easy to parse. Men's apparent hatred of women's bodies being the driver behind the near universal use of women's bodies to sell everything from cars to deodorant. Oh yes, men hate women's bodies – which is what gives women so much power over men, right? Because men, the heterosexual ones anyway, find the female form so unappealing? This perfectly explains why the female form is now and always has been featured in so much art through history, right?

Nasreen continues, adding:

> Women learn from men to hate their own bodies.

Assuming for a moment that Nasreen's insanely idiotic claim of male hatred of the female form is true, the attendant claim that women learn to hate themselves from men is an indictment of women's independence of mind and adulthood. Can't women think for themselves? Although the claim of male aversion of women's bodies is false, why would women simply inherit hate for their own bodies just because men supposedly hated them. How much inane stupidity are Nasreen's readers expected to uncritically swallow?

> Media has been busy for decades advising women what they should wear and how they should look like.

According to Taslima Nasreen's bio, she was born in Bangladesh, but in light of her nearly endless list of literary accolades, phrases such as "how they should look like" are difficult to overlook. However, through the media, corporations have been telling men and women what to wear, what to look like, and what to buy for decades, the fact remains that women control 80% of disposable income and are catered to, flattered and marketed to more than men. If that burden is too terrible to bear, maybe a little less COSMO and a little more philosophy, math and science could benefit those poor, self-esteem-challenged victims.

> Men hate women's hair if they[sic] are not silky and long. Most women keep their hair long even though many of them feel comfortable having short hair. They use different chemicals to make their hair silky.

Grammar issues aside, this is pure dribble. "Men hate women's hair if they are not silky and long"? I've seen this nonsense before, and I'm pretty sure it was in a shampoo commercial. Men do not hate hair, long hair, short hair, silky hair, whatever hair, men, generally speaking do not care about trivial concerns addressed in make-up advertisements and women's magazines. The attribution of hatred to men, by this much celebrated humanist scholar is persistently shocking throughout the body of her article. The claimed concern by men over trivialities usually relegated to the pages of glitter magazines is frankly surreal.

> Men do not like the colour of our skin.

Really? Men do not? Maybe what our great feminist arbiter of right and wrong means is that whoever wrote the advertizing copy for skin whitener in whatever puerile lifestyle magazine she skimmed recently – that copywriter convinced her she needs darker, or lighter, or shinier skin. Nasreen however attributes this "do not like" to simply; men. Jesus wept.

> So women bleach their skin or get their skin tanned. We spend almost all our money to buy cosmetics so that we can decorate ourselves and become someone men want us to become.

Of course, what's really being said here is that women, spenders of almost all disposable income – women are not responsible. If women are foolish, vain, insecure, credulous puppets of advertisers who throw their money in whatever direction they're told, thats men's fault. Women are victims, women have no will of their own, they're just innocent objects the bad men of the world control. And if their skin according to whatever bling bling magazine they read is the wrong colour, that's men's fault too. Nigger, please.

> [S]o that we can decorate ourselves and become someone men want us to become.

How about becoming whoever the fuck you actually are, like a grown up. Take some personal responsibility for yourself Nasreen, and readers of Taslima Nasreen. Or are all females just too much the fragile, and free-from-volition victims, defining themselves by victimhood and pretending to be the empty vessel of other people's desires. Nasreen's antagonist isn't even A man, it's all men. We're a collective now, I guess ill have to start going to the meetings.

> We want to make men feel happy.

…says Nasreen, I guess that where she was going by telling us we hate women, that makes me feel happy – being told I hate people delights me. In truth, Nasreen, by repeatedly telling men they're filled with hate, seems intent on making them feel guilty.

Next, Nasreen declares what men don't like in terms of hair colour. Men, the monolith – given singular preference by our instructor, Nasreen. In fact, biological attraction is tied, evolutionarily to signs of fertility, of which grey hair is a contra-indication. Blame is assigned to men-the-monolith, and women's apparent monolithic countermeasure, to dye their hair – laid in blame at men's feet as well. Women, practicing deception to mislead the natural attraction to signs of fertility is characterized as another male failing.

> Men do not like us when our hair turns grey. So we dye our hair.

Interestingly, the description offered by Nasreen, "So we dye our hair" indicates calculation and agency in women doing said dying. What a revolutionary idea, women acting on their own behalf, almost like they're adults.

Continuing, Nasreen decrees even more of what men, according to her, hate.

> Men hate women's eyes, eyebrows, nose, lips, cheeks, neck, ears.

As a member of Nasreen's monolith, designated "men" – her claim on authority of what men hate is tiresome, and false. Men hate all these body parts? Baloney, rubbish, and insupportable drivel. Following this declaration of the preferences of men, and whether it is wrong because Nasreen is ignorant, or merely lying is a matter left unexamined, but she follows it with a statement of women's action – again, in the monolith of all women.

> Women paint their eyes, eyebrows, cheeks, lips. We wear jewelries on our neck, we pierce our nose and ears to wear ornaments.

- Women paint their eyes, eyebrows, cheeks, lips.
- Actors performs actions.

Women paint their eyes et-cetera. Whose eyes? Women's eyes, that is, the eyes belonging to women are painted in acts of volition, by women. Do men paint women? No, they (women) paint themselves. Perhaps then, men force women to paint themselves. Clearly not, as many women go out and about without such self adornment.

> We wear jewelries on our neck, we pierce our nose and ears to wear ornaments.

Even more self actuated self expression and self actualization by women, and why? Because they are held at the points of gun barrels by men? No, it turns out not. Women do these things, painting and adorning, and even dying their hair because it attracts positive attention. In other words, women, to various degrees use make-up to control the behavior of men.

Taslima Nasreen is trying in her article to foster the impression that women are agency free shuttlecocks at the mercy of the prevailing winds, or of men. However, she repeatedly fails to support this. She includes declarative statements of what women do. Doing things is what denotes people with volition and agency.

The next stupid claim offered as doctrine is:

> Men hate women's breasts if breasts are not round and large.

While it's true that many men enjoy large round breasts, it is flatly moronic to infer from this that breasts not conforming to this ideal are not also greatly admired. In addition, breast size and shape, like skin colour and every single thing in Nasreen's idiotic list of what men love or hate, is a superficial cosmetic detail which ultimately doesn't much matter, except to shallow, superficial people. So, based on this so-authoritative decree of what men hate in breasts, what?

> We go for breast implants.

We, being the monolith; women. In the feeble attempt to cultivate a narrative of victimhood, Nasreen doesn't even bother to float the lie: "men make women get breast implants," although the clumsy grammar and clear dissimilarity with reality may indicate software driven translation into English – from crayon, perhaps. But no, it's women who – exercising agency and volition, go and get themselves breast implants. Why? To exert greater control over men's sexual response and attention. To exert control over men, because according to the winner of every literary and human rights award ever named, men hate women. Quite obviously then, women should define themselves as referential to men, or to what they hate. Self definition as humans apparently never occurred to the monolith that is women, or to Nasreen.

> We go for breast implants. Implants leak, rupture, burst. We increase our cancer risk.

And if this really was driven by men, who apparently hate women, isn't this supposed male-accommodation rather stupid of women?

> Men hate our natural abdominal fat.

Do they? Do men hate abdominal fat? Is that what men are? Haters of body parts? I wonder how humanity survived – reproducing to remain a viable species on this planet millennia after millennia through human pre-history, if indeed men hate women's natural body fat.

However, positing the claim – briefly as if it were true, what do women do? Why they exercise their adult volition and agency:

> We almost stop eating to reduce our fat to please men. We suffer from anorexia, bulimia and other eating disorders. We become skeletons. We die.

And all to please men, who, according to Nasreen hate all the parts of women from not-round-enough breasts to too fat abdomens. To please these hateful men, women starve themselves and die. This seems rather stupid as an exercise of self agency, surely women aren't so foolish as all this? Surely theyre motivated by more than a referential identity, tying all self image to whatever it is in Nasreen's mind that men hate?

But what else do men hate?

- Men hate women's legs.
- Men hate us if our hymens are broken.
- Men hate our vagina[s].
- Men hate our natural leg hair.

Et-cetera.

This list is so stupid, so false, and so frivolous – that each body part, apparently a matter of grave concern and a target of male hatred. To say Nasreen's list is insulting also insults the intelligence of men. Who rather than assayers of collected body parts, generally regard women as people, complete. But that difficult truth doesn't fit into a narrative of demeaning objectification, reduction to parts, and make-believe hatred.

In answer to each item men supposedly hate, Nasreen lists detailed accounts of self injury by women. What women, her monolithic "we" do to themselves – of their own free will, but apparently, still victims. Women's actions are never their own, no, somehow evil men, using the magic of patriarchy, they are the puppeteers of female adult human beings.

And what of men in Taslima Nasreen's imaginary world?

> We tell men that we like them for who they are.

Actually, Taslima Nasreen tells men they are creatures of hatred. If men really did hate women in every separately listed portion of their anatomy, and women: " lik[ed] them for who they are" then women would be stupid, self-abasing idiots wouldn't they? In spite of Nasreen's demonstration, in most cases, women (the monolith) are not so pathetic.

Continuing on men:

> They do not destroy their natural body to make us feel happy.

…except when they die in coal mines, in diamond mines, in the Atlantic fishing and crabbing, in forests cutting lumber, on oil rigs and tankers and in battle, everywhere men die on the job. The death professions which keep the world running safely for women, while those oh-so-hated women spend 80% of the world's disposable income. So, men actually do destroy their natural bodies to keep women safe, fed, housed, and protected. But according to Taslima Nasreen,

> [p]atriarchy [is] a system artificially imposed on society causes all the injustices and inequalities against women.

Yeah, sure it is.

One of the highest rated comments on this woman's article calls her a goddess. It doesn't say "of stupidity" or "of lies" but it should.

However, the most remarkable aspect of Taslima Nasreen's article is the contrast between writing which indicates the point of view of a foolish child, and a byline enumerating multiple literary awards and accomplishments. In addition, the largely complimentary tone of comments left on Nasreen's free thought blog shows no apparent awareness of an obviously immature, ignorant and stupid point of view. It may be that her readers are as foolish and silly as she seems to be herself. It is quite sad.

More bleating from Clementine Ford

Greg Canning · 3 June 2012 · Archived copy · Original

The release of David Benatar's scholarly exposition of the "Second Sexism"[1] has caused a deluge of articles by feminists, eager to shout down his achievement. This scholarly work distributed by the renowned academic publishing house Blackwell has, rather than attracting critical reviews, been confronted with standard feminist lies and derision.[2]

None of these feminists offer any serious analysis of Benatar's well developed and referenced arguments. In fact, many appear to not even have read the book. They attack the concept that unfair discrimination against men could even exist and then grasp the opportunity to distract the agenda with stale factoids inflating female victimhood.

This is exactly what junior Radfem journalist "howling Clementine Ford[3]" did in her opinion piece titled "Men are marginalised, claims book" published at stuff.co.nz.[4]

She howls:

> Before you laugh yourself into a coma at the desk where you're no doubt earning two thirds of your male counterpart's salary.

Ford demonstrates her ignorance of formal logic; claiming something is humorous is not an argument against its validity. Still, in this case, it provides her an opportunity to append the repeatedly repudiated myth of a gender wage gap. [5]

She continues:

> Benatar's thesis therefore attempts philosophically to address the ways in which men ALSO experience discrimination in a rigidly patriarchal society.

Here Ford resorts to capital letters, rather than literary skill, to shout rather than howl, that the word "also" is important. Indeed had she bothered to read the work she would know that Benatar clearly states:

> This book is about the second sexism. Accordingly it is not about that sexism of which females are the primary victims. That is not because I deny the existence of such sexism. It clearly exists and has existed for a very long time.

Ford finds it offensive that any attention should be given to discrimination against males and such offence is intended as an argument against such a study. She distorts Benatar's thesis by misrepresenting it as relating to "rigidly patriarchal society." Most of, but not all the focus of the book relates to circumstances in highly pro female western societies and the term patriarchy/ or patriarchal does not have a single occurrence in the book (I know because I have a searchable electronic copy). Ford simply invented this.

Benatar correctly states that discrimination against women has been extensively researched and written about, but that researching and describing discrimination against men has rarely occurred in academia. He notes:

> Discrimination against females has been the subject of almost all the discussion about sexism. I do not plan to add to it here.

There is so little formal research into discrimination against men that the true extent of it remains to be elucidated.

Benatar has structured The Second Sexism to establish certain sequential aims. In the introduction he clearly defines the terms used and scope of his work, and contrasts alternate terminologies and meanings used elsewhere. For example whist everyone knows what we mean by sexism in common usage, academics define and apply the term in different ways. In Chapter 2 he presents the source data and describes the instances of male disadvantage he will later examine in more detail. Chapter 3 attempts to understand why these disadvantages have arisen, looking at beliefs, attitudes, biologic and social factors, whist chapter 4 seeks to determine if these examples of male disadvantage are due to unfair sex discrimination.

The 5th chapter is devoted to addressing the various objections likely to be raised by those who would deny or minimise the second sexism. These include in addition to the well-known logical fallacies, the inversion argument where examples of discrimination against men are contorted and claimed to be examples of discrimination against women.

The cost of the dominance argument is that men must pay in some way for their supposedly privileged position in society. The distraction argument, in which instances of male disadvantage may be begrudgingly accepted but are considered unimportant or unworthy of attention as female disadvantage, is considered a more pressing problem – finally uses the technicality of defining discrimination as a way to deny anti-male sexism. Typically feminists deny that members of dominant groups (to which men are naturally considered to belong) are by virtue of their dominance unable to suffer discrimination. Ford and others have not disappointed him.

In response to a list of examples of discrimination against men, and noting that whist many men occupy positions at the top echelons of society, a similar number are at the rock bottom.

She claims:

> Evidently, this is supposed to cancel out discrimination against women by invoking the rules of the world's most logically unsound game of Rock, Paper, Headdesk.[sic]

This is a distraction argument. Clementine, the book is about discrimination against men, get used to it! What relevance rock, paper, scissors headdesk has is beyond me. It is as logically unsound as using asterisks for quotes.

Ford notes in relation to the fact that men are more likely to be victims of violence that this is "usually at the hands of other men, but that's apparently beside the point." This tired retort of course denies women's complicity in violence enacted on, or by men, on their behalf (see JTO's Violence by Proxy[6]) as well as the substantial violence against men perpetrated directly by women.

Family violence is one of the areas where gender bias has historically focused research predominately if not entirely on women's experiences of violence. Despite this there is a growing body of evidence that women are equally if not more violent in interpersonal relationships as men.

We know in Australia that at least one in three victims of family violence are male.[7] The academic and scientific literature is clear that women make up the majority of perpetrators of child abuse and neglect[8]including murder of ones own child or children. Perhaps Ford would consider these victims "beside the point" and unworthy of assistance or redress as well?

She continues:

> But it would be folly to write Benatar off as some kind of mad troll suddenly lumped with a megaphone and a mission. Unlike some of the more fervently frothing men's advocates barking up trees they can't see the wood for.

And

> Unfortunately, so used have we gotten to deflecting the spittle that shoots forth from these self-fancying modern day slaves that Benatar's argument will likely (and perhaps understandably) be met by exhausted ranting and cynical eyerolls.

Name calling and describing the disparagement with which some feminists might receive his work does nothing to argue against or negate its inherent truths. In fact the reactionary and intellectually vacant proliferation of feminist tripe the book has generated, is likely to draw extensive attention, to what is destined to become a classic for advocates of men's rights and true gender equity.

Perhaps the greatest condemnation of Ford's hypocrisy should be directed to her comments about war and war deaths.

She writes;

> While we could argue that the price of men starting wars is that they have to fight them, is that really the answer? 'Men' don't start wars – governments do. Governments are typically overrun by men and structures of power that favour masculinity. And the people who start wars very rarely actually fight in them.
> So is it sexism against men that leads to their lives being considered, in this example, more expendable? In part, yes – but unlike the discrimination experienced by women, sexism against men occurs in a counterintuitive fashion.

So Ford sees of sexism involved in the social expectation and legal compulsion of predominantly men being sent to war as a cost of dominance argument, but that's ok because it's only "counter intuitive" sexism. Women those bastions of intuition and compassion for life need to reject their innate humanity to condone such discrimination. They have to rationalise that having men protect and suffer violence on their behalf is worth reducing men to the role of disposable utilities because it benefits women. She then makes the following assertions:

> People don't bristle at the thought of women being sent home in body bags because women's lives are inherently given more value; thousands of years of history has a pretty solid company line on this. They bristle because women aren't considered naturally capable of Getting The Job Done – because, in an obscure twist of logic, they lack the natural masculine attributes of strength that apparently help men both protect their fellow humans, and kill them.

No, Clementine, evolutionary biology and psychology tell us that women are the "reproductive bottleneck." For a group to survive you can expend most of the males but still repopulate if enough females are protected, which is exactly what has happened repeatedly in history. Women have had the privilege of exemption from conflicts that threatened the group and that has always been the "company line."

Yes, it may be a biologic fact that men in general are stronger than women (nothing to do with twists of logic), but women's inferior strength has not precluded feminists arguing that they should have equal opportunity in any other occupation in which strength may be a prerequisite; firefighting and law enforcement, for example. It is unfettered hypocrisy to claim biological determinism when it suits and social construction when it does not in justifying female privilege and entitlement.

Next she presents a barrage of blatant lies:

> (if Benatar wants to argue extremes of discrimination in men's education and economics, he can begin by addressing the fact that women make up 66% of the world's illiterate adults; 3 out of 4 fatalities in war are women and children; gender based violence is the biggest cause of death of women aged between 15 and 44; and that even while men may be being sent to war, tens of thousands of women are being raped as a weapon of it.)

Another distraction argument, Benatar is not obliged to address any of the false stats you quote, but I will.

If you want to look at literacy rates, look at western feminised countries where boys consistently fall behind girl's literacy ratings.

Where did you pluck the 3 out of 4 fatalities in war figure from I wonder?[9] Which war or wars are you talking about? Given you are an Australian how many Australian women and children do you believe have been killed in wars compared to deaths of Australian men? Of course when counting children just add them to women because there are never any boys in the civilian casualty figures and children are of course possessions of women. Show me where in the Australian or US military doctrine rape is listed as a weapon, or as tactic? How many cases of alleged or proven rape by Australian or US forces can you document?

As for gender based violence being the "biggest" cause of death for women aged between 14 and 44, that statistic relates to "death, disease and disability" most of it is"disease and disability" and even then the methodology in calculating this"burden of disease figure" is at best dodgy.

At one point Ford states "it's not a competition" but in the following sentence is obliged to point out that "women undoubtedly suffer the lion's share of patriarchal oppression." Nope it's not a competition but women win hands down anyway in the victimhood stakes and don't you sexist men forget it.

Sorry Clementine, male disadvantage is real. It is often due to unfair sex discrimination and a growing number of men and women are becoming aware of it, studying it and informing others. Your fallacious illogical bleatings will never stop that. If anything, bigots like you are simply fuelling the men's rights fire. Please keep it up.

Is the right sympathetic to the MRA?

barbarossaaaa · 3 June 2012 · Archived copy · Original

Within the MRM, we often are confronted with a select few right leaning conservative MRA's (they know who they are), that have a habit of dogmatically demanding the the men's movement adopt a decidedly republican bent. They insist on explaining to all MRA's that do not share their ideas about right wing politics, be they apolitical or left leaning, that one simply cannot expect to form any kind of organized push-back against misandry, if not through the injection of all MRA efforts — the expenditure of all MRA energies, through the vehicle of conservative right wing politics.

Being that I am admittedly much more of a MGHOW, than a bonafide MRA, I will be the first to admit that I have voted a long time ago, decidedly in favor of the party of attrition. I acknowledge that political advancement for men is possible and certainly applaud any MRA willing to fight that battle, but i believe that in the end, freedom for men will arise either gradually via the effects of male societal non-participation reaching levels that render society unstable, or some cataclysmic event that brings the downplayed fact of societies dependability on men into the fore.

I do however think it important to debunk this nonsense, this belief that all misandry stems from the big bad left, which will upon its eradication yield to a golden age of right wing utopianism, if only us wayward MRA's would just realize that the right is in fact…right.

First let's talk about what these specific conservative MRA's mean when they say, right and left. From my understanding of it, they judge the left collectively. Meaning simply that although every politician on the left doesn't necessarily support a certain spending project, or this or that bureaucracy inducing bill, the left is judged for what they have shown themselves to be collectively — their overarching trend towards centralized government power, their predilections for big government, their feminism.

This is a standard of scrutiny that "right is right"ers unfortunately do not apply to themselves. When conservative MRA's are confronted with the blatant misandry and male disposability in their political infrastructure, they eagerly tell you about their special brand of conservative libertarianism they espouse in theory, but very rarely in practice. In appraising whether or not one political party benefits men more than any other we must extend to all prospects the same methodology we apply to left wing politics – Likewise the GOP, the conglomerate that makes up right Wing politics must be similarly appraised.

One does not get to judge the left collective, as they should be judged and hand pick their personal brand of right wing politics when a critiuqe is leveled at their political leanings. I make the accusation that the right also perpetuates misandry as frequently as the left does (albeit in different form). In analyzing the tendencies of collective right wing politics, i claim that we will find a predilection for statism and big government rivaling that of the left, as well as a good amount of misandry to boot.

Since I have no problem acknowledging that the left is a bastion of misandry and feminism, it will not suffice simply to state that the right is sympathetic to men, while offering only comparisons to the left's misandry as evidence. The oft parroted "lesser of two evils" meme is inadmissible. I intend to show where misandry permeates right wing politics, without highlighting the deficiencies of the left wing politics. I subject right wing politics to its own independent inquiry.

Seeing as how conservative MRA's will (appropriately) refer to president Obama as a paragon of leftist misandry, my assessment of the right will center on paragons of the right– republican presidents Reagan and Nixon specifically.

I start with Nixon, The first to coin the term "The war on drugs."

Nixon created the DEA — although the war on illicit drugs had been going on since the early 1900's, the detrimental effects of the drug war on men were catalyzed by the passing of a series of anti-drug legislation's by the Nixon and Reagan administrations. Nixon signed into law the Comprehensive Drug Abuse Prevention and Control Act of 1970. This divided illicit drugs into five different categories (schedule 1, 2, 3 etc.) dictated by their potential for abuse and medical application. Marijuana, with its medicinal properties, its zero drug mortality and addiction rate, was designated as a schedule 1 drug along with Methamphetamine LSD, and PCP. The immediate consequence of this was of course to be the criminalization of a widely used harmless substance — an often used tactic by a coercive state designed to justify law "enforcement" expansion.

This landmark legislation accelerated the war on drugs, and was re-enacted again by the Reagan administration for the purposes of asset forfeiture laws, and prison warehousing. These measures were mere stepping stone's however, when compared to the Reagan administration. Nixon put these policies into place, Reagan ran with them.

Reagan signed into law the Anti-Drug Abuse Act of 1986, which appropriated $1.7 billion to fight the so called drug crisis — $97 million of which was allocated to build new prisons. The bill reinstated, and vastly expanded upon mandatory minimum sentencing provision's. This made Possession of at least one kilogram of heroin or five kilograms of cocaine punishable by at least ten years in prison. The sale of five grams of crack cocaine now carried a mandatory minimum five-year sentence.

It's not a coincidence that we see Reagan spending just under a a hundred million dollars to build new prisons, while imposing mandatory minimum sentencing for non-violent drug transaction. What he essentially did was to create — out of thin air, a vast and far reaching new standard of prosecutable crime with which to feed (by design) a burgeoning new prison industry. Fast forward to present day and we are now five percent of the world population with an astonishing 25 percent of its prisoners.

This was the genesis of the prison industry, a major conduit of misandry where our brothers are housed like livestock, and peddled to work ridiculous "jobs" for 17 cents an hour. We all know what it really is … slave labor. These policies are directly responsible for why the bureau of justice statistics reports 9 out of 10 non-violent offenders are male, and this is also why the single largest category of total non violent arrests are drug related. This is why the non-violent offender spends an average of 16 months in incarceration, this is why there is a for profit big money prison industry. It all ties back to the policies of the so called iconoclast of limited government and freedom, Ronald Reagan and his failed drug policies that are still largely in effect today.

Lets ask ourselves — under these laws, how many non-violent men are languishing in prison over non-violent drug transactions? How many of them have been or will be raped in prison as a result of their incarceration for a non-violent drug crime? Whenever someone tells you that it most certainly is a right left issue, ask them why the president conservatives most often hold up as the epitome of limited governance passed laws that disproportionately incarcerate men, which in doing so, capitalizes on their labor for pennies on the dollar, whilst exposing them to the threat of violence and rape.

Many conservative apologist's state that Reagan and Nixon didn't start the drug war, that this is something that's been going on since Henry j. Anslinger's reefer madness. They'd be right… to a degree. Graphically, however an incarceration rate vs year graph leaves no room for misconception as to Reagan and Nixon's drug policy being the main catalyst for disproportionate male imprisonment.

[image]

Starting at around 1975 we see a spike begin to develop, and just about at 1984 we see a massive exponential spike in male imprisonment, accompanied by a comparatively minuscule amount of female imprisonment that instead rose gradually and then plateaued. Nixon came into office just before 1970, Reagan in 1981. The correlation is clear. The war on drugs disproportionately effects men, it incarcerates them at a rate that can only be described as systematic enslavement and it was the right, Nixon and the small government iconoclast Ronald Reagan that catalyzed this war of imprisonment against men, there can be no doubt about it.

To reiterate, nobody is claiming that the left isn't anti-man and pro-feminist, yet to claim that MRA's should enter into right wing politics, because the left is unequivocally anti male, means that the right — taken as a whole should stand on its own, regardless of the misandry perpetuated by the left as being pro-male and for limited government. We will scrutinize the right on its own merits and as I have demonstrated it was right wing presidential policy that is responsible for a massive incarceration of men, it was right wing policy that has allowed the heavy hand of government, to create this incarceration behemoth.

I'm not going to really touch to heavily on the right's propensity to use men as cannon fodder, but I will mention that it was right wing politicians that initiated the war in iraq in the majority. A war that has demonstrably achieved nothing in terms of making America more prosperous, a war that has killed thousands of Americans and an untold number of Iraqi's. It goes without saying that the vast majority off these war dead on both sides are men. Remember that 215 republicans in the house voted for the Iraq war with only six voting against, as opposed to 82 democrats voting for and 126 voting against. In the senate we saw 48 republicans vote for and one lone republican vote against, while democrats voted 29 for and 21 against. The decision to go to war in Iraq — while supported by both parties was supported to a much greater degree by the right than the left. The result of this in terms of the effect it was having on the male soldiers fighting in Iraq, were rates of military suicides rising to their highest level in 2009, and again in 2011 since records records started being kept in 1980.

The graph clearly shows that during the Clinton years, suicides were marked by a sizable decrease. Immediately upon Bush taking office in 2001 — undoubtedly due to Iraq, the military suicide rates soared until they peaked at the highest point in 2009 when bush left office. As Ive just stated, this reached another high point in 2011 under the Obama administration, the main difference here is that I in no way advocate or proscribe to men that they will find redress of their grievances in the left wing. I understand quite clearly that Clinton also made his significant contributions to the war on drugs, as has Obama. I'm under no illusions, I simply don't trust the right either.

The question I ask those telling us that the right wing is the "party of men" is — whether or not massive incarceration rates, men being used as cannon fodder in unjustifiable wars that do not bring prosperity security or even a defined sense of victory to American and western men, wars that kill men of western and middle eastern descent alike — if you agree with me that all this has come about as a result of predominantly right wing politics, is this not the perpetuation of misandry and of male disposability? are we supposed to hone in on and expose misandry on the left, only to remain willfully ignorant of misandry on the right?

In regards to the not all republicans are like that excuse. This I want to address personally, as I've identified it as what i'll call the right is right'er MRA bait and switch. Conservative MRA's that do this know, when taking the bigger picture into question that the right wing is also for big government and coercive state power, as evidenced by the patriot act and the legislations mentioned above.

What these specific conservative MRA's do, is to highlight an ultra libertarian candidate such as Ron Paul — who because of the anti-freedom, pro big government nature of right wing politics stands no chance of actually getting elected, they'll dole out a token vote for him and when his candidacy inevitably fails as Ron Paul's has, they tow the line and vote for whichever right wing hack gets the presidential nomination. In case of this upcoming presidential election its Mitt Romney. They then rationalize away their vote by performing an "at least hes not a leftist" mental gymnastic.

MRA's must ask themselves why, whenever these so called different "true conservative's" run for anything more influential than a congressional seat, it's the right wing themselves that characterize them as an extremist or a nut job? Isn't that what we saw with Ron Paul? The facts are clear, Ron Paul made a good go of it, said the right things, and talked about fiscal responsibility and limited government. He talked about not policing the world and reducing military spending, His voting record reflected what he was saying consistently.

What did it earn him? Failure — for a second time as per the the votes of the American right wing electorate, and they gave their vote instead to Mitt Romney. If the right wing political infrastructure — what right is right'ers are selling to MRA's as the vehicle for smaller government and individual freedom – will undoubtedly benefit men, then why, when that same political infrastructure was given for the second time, the opportunity to elect what is essentially the ideal fiscally responsible constitutionalist conservative, did they instead opt for Mitt Romney? It shouldn't have to be explained that this isn't just some monumental failure of discernment, but the GOP and the right wing working as its intended to. That being against the wishes of the people, for endless war and defense spending; for the war on drugs, etc…

Do right is right'ers expect MRAs that choose to follow their advice and participate in right wing politics to support people like Mitt Romney when whatever Libertarian candidate they recommend eventually fizzes out and loses, because the republican political party is just as corrupt and defunct as the leftist's they despise? Are they honestly under the impression that a Mitt Romney, or even a Rick Santorum gives fuckall of a damn for men and our issues? Will they really insult the intelligence of MRA's by expecting them to buy into this?

Personally I have no problem with MRA's injecting themselves into the entire political spectrum, wherever they see the possibility of gaining political power for men, and men only, in hopes of equality and male advocacy. There most certainly are MRA's that can talk the right leftist lingo, appearing sufficiently liberal enough to begin injecting in a calculated way, conversation pertaining to male issues, while understanding that the left is a bastion of misandry.

The right is no different, MRA's can go there with the express purposes of securing and promoting male advocacy, while keeping in mid that it, as a political structure will not hesitate to see men as canon fodder whenever necessary. I have no problem with MRA's getting into politics as MRA's, and for MRA's, but what conservative MRA's and many leftist MRA's want to do is to have their political party define the MRA. One needs only to look at what happened, for example to the tea party, a grass roots movement having significantly more mobilization and power than the MRM does currently — what happened to them?

They achieved marginal success with the November elections, but the bigger picture has shown them to have done what — other than being absorbed by the republican party? They lost their identity, they lost their core issues and beliefs, and Mitt Romney — the antithesis of the so-called freedom and liberty the tea party claimed to be about is still going to win the nomination. The last thing I want is for this movement to be absorbed by a fake conservative agenda.

Why not date a feminist?

John Hembling (JtO) · 4 June 2012 · Archived copy · Original

Jennifer Hansen is a feminist writer who recently produced a list of six reasons to keep poisonous insects as house pets, why to drive without a seat-belt, motorcycle without a helmet, why to acquire heroin addiction, and why you should place your infant in a pen amongst unfed crocodiles. Also, why look for gas leaks using a lit match, and why to wipe your ass with poison ivy after shitting in the woods.

Actually, Hansen argued for none of these things, rather she recently wrote a list of six reasons for men to date feminists[1]. Several of these are good and compelling reasons to not date a feminist, such as the flatly moronic idea that dating your future employer is a good plan, and the rest are simple lies.

Hansen's first reason is the claim, made without apparent irony that: "Feminists are, by definition, educated women."

To address this, it's necessary to define a few terms, notably: "educated", and "feminism".

Educated, in it's colloquial meaning generally implies some handful of years at a university or college, and the attainment of an academic credential. Pretty obviously, almost all universities and colleges are highly feminized environments, but there is a qualitative difference between acquiring proficiency in a body of expert knowledge, skill in business methodology or mathematics, or engineering, and the mere acculturation into an ideology. In contrast with academic subjects such as biology, physics, philosophy, political science or systems analysis, Feminism is an ideology. Many usefully educated graduates of other fields also become acculturated to feminist ideology during their education, but acculturation and education shouldn't be confused as the same thing.

And what is the ideology of feminism? This is sometimes hard to answer, as adherents to the ideology indulge in almost never-ending obfuscation of what feminism actually is. "The radical notion that women are people" still gets tossed out as a pat-answer, but women being people is not now, and never was a radical notion.

Cutting through the fluff, feminism is a doctrine built on the pre-supposition of victimhood of women by men as a foundation of female identity. In it's goals is always the utilization of the state to forcibly redress this claimed victimization. In other words, the proxy use of violence and wealth appropriation. In whatever flavor, and variation, these two basic features are common to every doctrine using the label feminism. Feminism is therefore, a doctrine of class hatred, and violence.

According to Hansen, feminists also "read, travel, play golf, and hold interesting jobs". And nobody else does any of those things, reading, having interesting jobs, feminism has the monopoly. Seriously, this is satire right? Oh yeah, you might end up dating your future boss. Checking the article, this is reasons to date a feminist, not reasons to run far and fast in the other direction. Oooookay.

Hansen's next reason to date a feminist is that "There is no presumption that you should pay". Obviously I have no presumption that I will pay, but what has this to do with feminism? Having dated self described feminists in the past, I know the cultural onus on me, the man to pay remains present regardless of whether a woman declared herself feminist and therefore liberated from all gendered expectations. Unfortunately, this self actualization seems strangely transient, taking effect when advantage can be had, and returning when traditional female advantage is up for grabs, like the man pays. Cue knee jerk protestations of no-true-scotswoman in three, two, one…

The fact is that in social settings, almost all women, feminist or otherwise continue to expect financial gallantry from men, which is identical to prostitution, simply less honest. As a man with self respect, I do not pay women for the privilege of entertaining them. Feminism or it's absence has nothing to do with that. Hansen bludgeons her readers with a re-iteration of the claim that "Remember, feminists are educated women." Which betrays her continued confusion between the concepts of education and ideological indoctrination.

Reason number three to stick your head in a deep-fryer: "You might get laid on the first date".

Because after all, everybody knows men are sex-obsessed, hormone driven subhumans who are always horny, and and desperate to fuck everything with a hole in it. I know this is true because my TV tells me so, quack quack quack quack! And don't forget, feminists are educated, so says Jennifer Hansen for the third time in a row, and by golly, now I believe her. Educated, that's what feminist means – an educated woman, and a non feminist is an uneducated simpleton. If only i'd known sooner, I could have saved myself so much trouble. Woof woof!

Setting aside the asinine cultural dogma that men are foolish sex-obsessed simpletons, claiming I fuck on the first date isn't much motivation to spend an evening with somebody, sex is easy enough to come by, that dating the town bike doesn't hold much appeal to an adult with a developed sense of self.

Hansen's forth reason is that when dating a feminist, it is "unlikely [that a] shotgun wedding scenario [is] in your future." The feminist dating apologist continues to bang the drum that "feminists are educated women" apparently unaware that the ideology is equally subscribed by men. However, the fact that feminist women-folk are so well educated they're safe as sexual partners. "Safe sex is part of the package."

Apparently, Hansen believes her male readers are stupid. Apparently, she – and they, have no awareness of the fact that in western societies, reproductive rights are owned entirely by women. That men, in spite of the legal onus to finance any women'a exercised reproductive choice, in spite of the state's enthusiasm for garnisheeing wages, or imprisoning men, or treating them as breeding and paying livestock – sex with a feminist is totally safe. Because as we know, in addition to being educated, feminism endows women with superior ethics, and the legal right to accidentally-on-purpose get pregnant and then force a man, under colour of law – to make a man pay, while excluding him from the life of his child – no feminist would ever do that. They're too ethical, as well as too educated. For that matter, no feminist would ever turn a willing sexual encounter into a criminal accusation – because the next morning that guy didn't look so good, or she's been caught cheating. Or any other trivial reason hundreds of women every year file false charges of rape. But oh yeah, lets fuck on the first date, its not like feminism is an ideology of hatred in which casual destruction of a man's life is fodder for comedy.

Hansen's reason number 5: "Not only is there no crying in baseball, but there [is] also no crying in feminism."

It may be that Jennifer Hansen has lived a life in which she has never been challenged on any assertion, no matter how silly, how false, or cross-wise to reality that assertion might be. Perhaps in an environment free from differing opinion, she now simply believes any self-flattering dribble which spills from her keyboard. "..there [is] also no crying in feminism."

Crying, whether using actual salty tears, or in the form of repeated histrionic complaint over trivial issues and imaginary oppression is foundational to feminism. To claim there is no crying in feminism is to claim there are no baseball bats, or balls, or bases, in baseball. women are oppressed, therefore, the government much change the laws, re-distribute wealth, and use force to redress that oppression. That is feminism in a nutshell, feminist crying to motivate the proxy violence of others.

Hansen's sixth and final reason why men should date feminists is a repetition of her fifth reason, rephrased. "no drama".

Words fail me in trying to address this, except to wonder possibly if Hansen is satirizing feminism. A strange possibility, if true. A woman with the same name, who may be the same person teaches at St Lawrence University, including a course called: Feminist Philosophy.

Notable that ideologies, of which feminism is one are distinguished by starting from a pre-supposition, and then selecting and crafting evidence to support that doctrinal truth. Philosophies, by contrast, start with evidence and observation, and formulate a view of reality based on evidence and observation. Feminism – which starts from the doctrinal truth of female oppression is an ideology, and not a philosophy.

The absurdist claim of "no drama" isn't even a clever attempt at spin, it's simply the polar opposite of reality so obvious even dyed-in-the-wool inductees to that ideology must roll their eyes.

But those are Jennifer's reasons for men to date a feminist.

However, as dangerously unsound as that advice is, a simple rebuttal of Hansen's six blatant lies is insufficient. Not only should men not date feminists, they should be considerably more pro-active in opposing that ideology of hatred and violence.

No man should date any woman who is not avowedly anti feminist. Remembering, in all of the various flavors and brands of that doctrine common to all is the doctrine of universal male oppression of women, and the endless grasping after the power of legal violence and legal financial appropriation through the state. If you are a man, you are an oppressor, and the only way out from that blanket definition is to renounce and denounce other men, allowing that you're provisionally "one of the good ones". Feminism's endless claim of female oppression takes no note of the millions of men throughout history who died defending women, and the expectation of male protection of women. No historical mountain of female corpses balances the male dead on which civilization is built. Female favouring changes to education, in the past 4 decades have created a system with 65% female graduates – and rather than acting to correct this, modern feminists celebrate and gloat over male marginalization in education. Feminism is a doctrine of the hatred of men, and it is the practice of violence against them through the financial instruments of the modern state, as well as legalized force against men through police, and through war.

Obama, the self declared feminist president of the United States just re-classified foreign civilian men as "combatants"[3][4]. Thus, the male civilian casualties of American military adventure will not be counted, although female civilians continue to matter as humans. Feminism is absolutely a doctrine of hatred and violence. It is therefore necessary to recognize it's adherents, and not only not date them, but to exclude them from your life if you have any concept of yourself as a man being a human of human value.

This is not to say exclude women from your life as a man, as feminism and women are two separate things. Women are human beings, as worthy of human consideration, affection and love as everybody else. Feminism however is a thing built from ideas, and feminists are it's adherents. Dating them, or allowing them into your car, apartment, or life, is ultimately a bad plan.

Terry O'Neill, another lying profiteer

John Hembling (JtO) · 5 June 2012 · Archived copy · Original

Terry O'Neill's talking points are lies. In her Huffington Post article[1], they are obvious lies. The president of N.O.W (an organization whose name dishonestly conflates female human beings with the ideology called feminism) begins with a repetition of the statement by Republican representative Sandy Adams. Representative Adams said, "Shame on them" after being told of groups opposing the revised Violence Against Woman Act, HR 4970.

This opposition came from "more than 300 organizations and government agencies helping victims of domestic violence, dating violence, sexual assault, and stalking"

The agencies in question are characterized by O'Neill as: "agencies helping victims of domestic violence" but another way to express this, without any metaphorical vaseline smeared on our lens would be to note these are agencies funded by provisions in the previous version of VAWA.

"Shame on them."

That now expired version of the Violence Against Women Act was built on the ideology of the Duluth Model of domestic violence. This is an unsound, dogmatic conception of domestic violence in which all violence is male initiated and perpetrated, but which does not correspond to valid research on domestic violence, or reality.

The Duluth Model's website FAQ page is explicit in identifying men as abusers and women as victims going as far as justifying and excusing women's violence against men, and imputing the motive of patriarchal domination to men in abusive or violent relationships.

Monotonous adherence to the claim of ideological motivation and sexually directional violence (men abusing women) is what makes the Duluth Model so entirely useless as a tool to reduce violence within relationships. Focusing on only half the problem in violent relationships is the logical equivalent of fighting a structure fire by pouring water on only the North and East facing walls, and allowing the South and West facing walls to burn freely.

> "[W]omen's violence against men has a trivial effect on men compared to the devastating effect of men's violence against women" [2]

However, the sexually selective fiction of the Duluth Model is what makes it so useful as a narrative for the securing of funds. The image of a violent angry man, beating and abusing an innocent and decorative female victim is what fires everybody's imagination and outrage, and provides easy access to their wallets for donations. The more nuanced truth, that violence is committed reciprocally by men and women[3][4][5][6][7], and that it is motivated by financial stress, mental illness, drug addiction, poor socialization, single-parent upbringing and a host of other factors[8][9], well, this isn't such as easy sell when collecting money for shelter funding.

If "agencies helping victims of domestic violence" focus on only half the participants, using a narrative excluding possible participation of the other half – then those "helping organizations" will never run out of customers, or funding, because they will never reduce or ameliorate any violence or abuse within relationships. By using a purposefully dysfunctional model, those "agencies helping victims of domestic violence" maintain and exacerbate violence in relationships, ensuring the money keeps flowing and that their decorative and innocent female victims are never in short supply.

This is why the previous version of VAWA included almost no provision to thwart abuse of the bill by false accusation, for legal advantage in situations of divorce, immigration, and notably, by prosecutors pursuing frivolous cases against men on scanty or on no evidence – because regardless of the outcomes of those prosecutions, they were funded in the previous version VAWA.

It was a law so tailored for exploitation that under VAWA – the domestic violence grievance industry became a business of profiteers, using a system which escalates human carnage to keep lawyers, lobbyists, prosecutors, and shelter directors paid. VAWA created a system which perpetuates abuse of women and men, and destroys lives, and tears apart families for profit. Terry O'Neill knows this of course, because she is a part of that system. Which explains why she is now lying about honest attempts to reform it. Cui bono?

O'Neill notes (correctly) that the organization called Stop Abusive and Violent Environments (SAVE) authored some of the revised language in the new version of VAWA, but characterizes this as "language that rolled back protections for battered immigrants".

This characterization is false, but the revised language does provide for increased accountability, and some checks against use of VAWA for fraudulent purposes, both by accusers, and by opportunist prosecutors like the infamously corrupt Mary Kellett. No-drop domestic violence prosecutions, such as those pursued by profiteers like Kellet were funded regardless of whether convictions were obtained. This incentivized and funded thousands of frivolous prosecutions, brought for motive of profit to District Attorneys, regardless of the attendant destruction of families and men fraudulently accused.

The use of VAWA by women marrying into the United States to fast-track their citizenship is well documented, feeding their erstwhile husbands to the machine of the grievance industry and gaining citizenship. The structural accommodation is of abuse and fraud, almost as if abuse of the law had been intentionally planned by the framers of the previous version of VAWA. This is what the updated version of the bill aims to correct. But Terry O'Neill claims this is the removal of the protection from victims. It is impossible to take her claim at face value. A detailed reading of the new bill's language doesn't support the claim, and a return to the question of who benefits suggests a more realistic reading.

This is transparent in O'Neill's own explanation, as she says : "The principles underlying H.R. 4970's rollbacks of existing law seem to be that victims don't tell the truth, and that the governmental and nonprofit agencies that provide services to victims and hold perpetrators accountable are engaged in self-enrichment."

Revealing is the use of the word victims. By the act of accusation, in O'Neill's cosmology – accusers are transformed to the un-impeachable pseudo martyrdom of victimhood. Due process, evidentiary inquiry, and the foundation of western justice; a presumption of innocence – these are swept aside by the old VAWA. Expediently condemning those accused, and moving funds to the "victims" and their advocates and enablers.

In O'Neill's words : "victims don't tell the truth" but in reality, accusers often do not. In a system incentivizing false accusation, more of it will occur. O'Neill also invokes the imagery of the third Reich, with her declaration that:

> Right-wing House members marched in lockstep..

Obviously, this is a metaphor, and not an actual parade, but no marching or lock-stepping public demonstrations of martial prowess are going on among elected representatives. The move to reform a badly written law which encouraged fraud and suspended due process is attacked by a profiteer who sees opportunity escaping. O'Neill also appears to count on no fact-checking as she indulges in some fantasy.

"Yet not one of them provided evidence of rampant fraud and abuse among VAWA's thousands of grantees and subgrantees, which include law-enforcement agencies, prosecutors' offices and courts" et-cetera, and so on, and so forth, ad infinitude. The mention in her claim of "thousands of grantees and subgrantees" likely included to discourage fact checkers by the enormity of the necessary research.

However, the repeated coverage of one such case by this website springs to mind in O'Neill's claim of "Yet not one of them provided evidence of rampant fraud.."

Mary Kellett provides one such example.

- Maine bar council recommends discipline for A.D.A. Mary Kellett
- A campaign for justice
- Saint Louis University corruption exposed
- Vladek Filler press release
- AVfM news release Filler Case
- Kellett steps in it
- Kellett's prosecutorial crime spree continues/
- Vladek Filler a political prisoner in America/

Strictly speaking, O'Neill might be correct to say "not one of them provided evidence", since it could be more than just one.

O'Neill falls to use of the propagandist's tool, using repetition to establish that accusers are automatically victims, in her words "And why does the language of the bill assume victims are liars and grantees are embezzlers" ?

The language of the bill makes no such assumption, but does accommodate the reality that human beings, if presented with opportunity and advantage, will tend to capitalize on it, as has been repeatedly established under the regime of the previous VAWA. Presumption of innocence is applied to accusers who stand to profit by their accusation, but in the old VAWA, not to the accused, overturning a fundamental principal of justice.

As ever, shame is rolled out against anyone with an opposing view, or an ethical sense that human beings are not innately guilty based on sex. But according to O'Neill, rather than reason, evidence or logic, her tool of control is shame. To quote her once more: "The real shame is on you."

On tonight's show we will have as our guest Katherine Gibson of FLAIR or Family Law Advocates Initiating Reform. FLAIR was founded by both Ms Gibson and Gordon smith who was a victim of the family court in Delaware where he was falsely accused by his ex wife of domestic violence and had his children taken from him.

After helping Gordon and countless people with problems in Family Court she realized that the problems were systemic and reform needed to be made legislatively.

Catherine is active in lobbying efforts locally and in Washington on family law and related issues. She advocates for individuals, as time allows, liaising with agencies and entities, on their behalf.

She is a former legal assistant and mediator. Previously she worked in a law office that handled 400-450 divorces a year.

In Wake of Abdalla Suspension, SAVE Says Sex Abuse Policies Recall 'Soviet-Style' Justice

WASHINGTON / June 5, 2012 – Following revelations of denial of due process protections to Hany Abdalla, accused by an anonymous source of sexual abuse of an 8-year-old student, Stop Abusive and Violent Environments (SAVE) is calling on lawmakers to investigate the problem of false allegations of abuse.

Abdalla, who works as a teacher's aide in a New York City school, was arrested on April 25. The next day the Manhattan district attorney's office announced it would not prosecute the case and released the man. Abdalla, father of 3, had worked at the school since 2007 and had no prior investigations or convictions on his record. Abdalla always worked with other adults in the room, according to the man's attorney.

The teacher's union has filed a grievance on behalf of Mr. Abdalla. Still, a school system representative refused to indicate how long the department could keep Abdalla suspended without a hearing, or what could lead him to be reinstated, according to the New York Times account: http://cityroom.blogs.nytimes.com/2012/05/30/accused-of-abuse-but-not-charged-teachers-aide-remains-in-limbo/

The Abdalla incident occurred just as the National Registry of Exonerations released a ground-breaking study that details how dozens of persons around the country have been falsely accused and convicted on charges of child sex abuse, only to be exonerated after years behind bars. Some had been handed life sentences for a crime they didn't commit.

The exonerations occurred after the "victim" stepped forward to reveal the crime had been fabricated, or after DNA testing proved another person to be the perpetrator. The report deplored the sex-abuse "hysteria" that surrounded many of the prosecutions: http://www.law.umich.edu/special/exoneration/Documents/exonerations_us_1989_2012_full_report.pdf

"Anonymous allegations, secret procedures, open-ended investigations, and media accounts that presume guilt are an anathema to justice." notes SAVE spokesman Philip Cook. "Every lawmaker who took an oath to defend the Constitution should be asking why Soviet-style justice is being allowed to flourish in the United States."

June is False Allegations Awareness Month. According to a national telephone survey, one in 10 persons has been falsely accused of abuse: http://www.saveservices.org/falsely-accused/survey

A Boy at D-Day

Pierce Harlan · 6 June 2012 · Archived copy · Original

His fellow soldiers would needle him that he should be in the Boy Scouts, not the United States Army. Joseph Argenzio, Jr. was just 16 when he enlisted, and he looked it. He hadn't thought about what fighting a war would be like, he just wanted to "be a part of all the patriotism," and he couldn't wait to get into uniform.

It wasn't long before this gung-ho kid, who was rejected when he tried to join the Marines and then had to lie about his age before the Army would take him, found himself on a landing craft heading to Omaha Beach — "a nice cruise on the English Channel," as his sergeant put it — to be part of the first wave of the largest amphibious invasion in the history of the world, 68 years ago today.

The dimple-cheeked boy had been at the front of the craft close to the ramp before they landed, but his sergeant knew that wasn't right and moved him to the back. As soon at the ramp went down, the soldiers in the front were mowed down by German machine gun fire.

Someone made Joe jump over the side of the vessel, and he landed in water over his head. Sinking fast, he had to ditch two heavy cans of ammo and his rifle. Soldiers were falling in every direction around him, and bullets were spraying nearby. Joe stayed alive by hiding among the dead to block the machine gun fire aimed his way.

He took cover on the beach behind a wall. He put on a helmet from a dead soldier and it went down to his nose, a sardonic reminder of his youth. Dodging enemy fire and mortar shells, his unit eventually made it up a hill, crawling through cut wire, burning grass, and mine-laced trails. They flanked a couple of German machine gun stations and destroyed them.

Joe survived, and he is believed to be the youngest Allied soldier who fought at D-Day. Of the 160,000 Allied troops in the invasion, there were approximately 10,000 casualities, mostly American. It was a turning point in the war, and the beginning of the end of the Third Reich.

As the war continued into August, Joe caught flak in his back and was thrown into the air and knocked unconscious. He recuperated, and didn't know that his injuries entitled him to a noncombat position, so he returned to his unit. He later found himself at the Battle of the Bulge, and, in all, saw action in Algeria, Tunisia, Sicily, France, Belgium, Germany and Czechoslovakia. When the war — the Big One — had ended, Joe was still a teenager, but he came home with two Purple Hearts, a Combat Infantry Badge, two Bronze Stars, and he was later awarded the French Legion of Honor Medal for his role on D-Day.

Joe married, raised a family in New York, joined the local volunteer fire department, and for many years worked for the Department of Defense and then the Department of State. But D-Day haunted him until the day he died. He couldn't speak about it for more than 55 years, and then, only with difficulty. When they say "war is hell," they're talking about June 6, 1944. When people would ask Joe what it was like, he'd tell them to watch "Saving Private Ryan" — the scene a lot of people can't watch, where young man after young man after young man was methodically gunned down, butchered, by the fierce German resistance. The unspeakable carnage was matched only by the other-worldly valor of the young men called to duty.

Joe Argenzio died in 2010, leaving behind a wife, four children, seven grandchildren and a great-grandchild. He was an old man who had lived a full life. But every obituary, every article about him, made sure to talk about that nice cruise on the English Channel, when a 16-year-old boy helped save the world.

No Good Deed Goes Unpunished: Richard Farnum's Homecoming – 1957

Photo Caption: TEARFUL FAREWELL – Carol Farnum weeps as she says good-bye to her father, Richard C. Farnum, who took her and two other children from home after he returned to Mississippi to find wife divorced, remarried. Stephen, Carol's brother, is also held by his father.

FULL TEXT (Article 1 of 2): A Santa Barbara oil field worker was arrested early yesterday as he arrived at International Airport after Gulfport (Miss.) police telegraphed that he had kidnapped his three children from his former wife.

Richard C. Farnum, 34, was booked on suspicion of kidnapping by police who met him when he arrived with his two sons and daughter aboard an American Airlines plane. Later he was released on a writ of habeas corpus returnable March 5 in Superior Court. The three children from a nursing home where his wife, Mrs. Barbara Murphy, had placed them while she went on a honeymoon with her new husband.

"I didn't even know she was divorcing me," Farnum protested to police. "I called the day she was getting married and told her I was buying her a house. She didn't say a thing.

"I came out here last September to work in the oil fields. As soon as I was established she was to join me.

"Then last week a friend called me and said she had married someone else."

Farnum said he had been living in Santa Barbara with his brother Stephen. The brother and the two men's mother, Mrs. Blanche Farnum, were at the airport when the plane arrived.

["Man Held as Kidnapper of his three children; Arrested on Arrival Here From Mississippi With Family on Complaint of Former Wife," Los Angeles Times (Ca.), Feb. 26, 1957, p. 2]

FULL TEXT (Article 2 of 2): Richard O. Farnum, 34, oil rigger accused of kidnapping his three children, yesterday settled his dispute with his former wife by retaining the two older children and allowing her the youngest.

Terms of the compromise were disclosed in Superior Judge Harold W. Schweitzer's court when Farnum's petition for guardianship over the children, Stephen, 5; Carroll, 4, and John, 1, was removed from the calendar.

~ Moves to Santa Barbara ~

Farnum's attorney, Walter H. Young, said that Farnum had moved to Santa Barbara with the two older children and that his former wife, Mrs. Barbara Lee Murphy, had taken back to the home she has established with her new husband, Charles Murphy, in Handsboro, Miss.

The oil worker was arrested here last Feb. 25 upon alighting from an airliner with the three children, who were placed in Juvenile Hall. But in his guardianship petition, Farnum said he had left Handsboro to work in California and that upon his return to bring his wife and children here he had found that she had obtained a divorce and was on her honeymoon with Murphy.

He charged that the divorce decree was illegal because he was not notified and asked that he be given full control over the children.

But the settlement carried his agreement to recognize validity of the divorce. He still must appear before Superior Judge Louis H. Burke April 4, however; for disposition of the extradition request made by Mississippi authorities on the kidnapping charge.

Here is the publication summons placed by the scheming Mrs. Farnum while her husband was out of town preparing a new home for his family:

The trick of using a published service of summons, when the litigant knows the location of the other party, but claims ignorance of same, so that the litigant may get a default judgment, has been common in United States divorces since 1805, when the crooked practices of judges and lawyers in Vermont became a scandal throughout the young nation. AVfM Radio: The pathology of disconnection

AVfM Radio · 7 June 2012 · Archived copy · Original

[box icon="none"]

Technology is the name for a body of human accomplishment which has levered our species out of a subsistence, survival based existence to a modern culture of plentiful food, modern medicine, transportation, art, philosophy and affluent prosperity. But technology also enables us to place great distance between the initiation of actions and their execution. This is particularly true in the practice of violence, and in war. But the great separation between initiation of the use of force, and execution also allows detachment, and it's in this great gap that a malevolent and pathological ethic can grow.

Tonight on AVfM Radio JTO and GWW discuss whether proxy violence is the practice of an ethic of evil.

Australia celebrates False Allegation Awareness Week

Greg Canning · 8 June 2012 · Archived copy · Original

Ironically, this week, False Allegation Awareness week, sees changes to the Australian Family Law Act come into effect. For the first time in Australian history these amendments were passed through parliament without bipartisan political support, and then only after a late night stifling of debate in the Senate. These changes in effect give unsubstantiated allegations of family violence primacy above the rights of the child to an ongoing and meaningful relationship with both parents whilst effectively removing legislated penalties for perjury. [1]

In media announcements heralding the legislations coming into effect Labor's Attorney General Nicola Roxon blatantly lied to the public by claiming "it will remain a criminal offence to make false allegations of violence during court proceedings."[2] The truth is the only way any women can be punished under the new legislation is by an award of costs against her, this is not a "criminal offence" at all, simply an administrative slap on the wrist, which has rarely if ever been imposed. Such a penalty could only be awarded in the event of a "contravention application" by the father, something advised against by family law practitioners on the basis of it's negligible chance of being successful and the potential for inflaming an already high conflict situation to the detriment of their prospects of seeing their children.

Of course feminist bloggers have had a field day announcing how beneficial such changes will be in protecting women and children from men's violence, whilst parading the standard list of false DV Statistics. [3]

Even before the changes became law, in recent weeks we have seen a flurry of emotive reporting from the Australian gynocentric feminist controlled mainstream media concerning a high profile international child abduction case.

Briefly for those who don't know of the case, a young Australian women moved to Italy to study languages met her Italian beau, married and had 4 children all girls. In 2008 they separated and the Italian court granted shared custody with the father having access one afternoon per week and some weekends. In 2010 the children and mother travelled to Australia ostensibly for a holiday but never returned to Italy and the fathers contact even by phone has been stonewalled ever since.

These events are by definition International Child Abduction and after 2 years of lobbying by the father for the children's return to Italy the Australian Family court did as it is obliged to under international conventions and ordered the children's return. The mother then obstructed the execution of this lawful order by sending the children into hiding committing second criminal act.

Next came the leveling of unsubstantiated allegations of abuse against the father and the staging a media circus including airing a contrived obviously edited video on national TV of the children pleading to live with the mother in Australia. Legal haggling continued with the focus being shifted to the "right's of the children" to determine their futures and the matter referred to the High Court of Australia. It has yet to be resolved.

However in the time since the referral to the high court was made, the Italian father who remains in Australia has been granted supervised visitation with his children, the conduct of such visits rather than showing 4 girls afraid of their father, are testimony to a wholesome and loving relationship.

What should happen of course is that the criminal, in this case the mother, should be brought before the courts and treated in exactly the same way a father who abducted his children and breached court orders would be. Instead appeals were made to local members of parliament and senior politicians including the prime minister to intervene, because of overwhelming public support for the girls and their mother.

Voices of reason however are beginning to appear amongst all the mother-centric emotive trash with the recent article by Miranda Divine: "Tug-of-war custody battle is the mother of all issues." Miranda logically contrasts the criminality of the mother versus the law-abiding actions of the father. [4] Robert Franklin of Fathers and Families has also penned a balanced commentary[5] on the situation.

Meanwhile a federal magistrate has sent a pathetic guilt ridden letter to 2 children he wrongly ordered be alienated from their father even thought he knew the mothers accusations against the father were false.[6]

How much worse do things have to become before an ignorant public realizes the damage the corrupt family law system is doing to families and children? Time will tell but the floodgates are now open for a free for all of false allegations. The dodgy lawyers and feminist abuse industry workers are no doubt rubbing their hands with glee.

Similar Movements?

Phil in Utah · 8 June 2012 · Archived copy · Original

Last time I posted here, I linked to a feminist site that I (wrongly) assumed was mocking the very idea that men should have rights. Quite the contrary, the main poster had rightly been calling out such misandrist hacks as Cracked's David Wong and Steve Harvey. So, as Glenn Sacks has been saying all along, there is hope, right? Feminists really will someday be willing to open talks with MRAs because, after all, we're both trying to destroy Patriarchy?

Nope, not quite. "No, seriously, what about the menz?" originally started off as a WordPress blog, but it was soon picked up by (surprise, surprise) the Good Men Project. The originator of this blog, Ozyfrantz, has posted a rather telling self-description: "Ozy Frantz is a student at a well-respected Hippie College in the United States. Zie bases most of zir life decisions on Good Omens by Terry Pratchett and Neil Gaiman." Ozy also claims that she (sorry, zie) would call zirself a radical feminist, were it not for the fact that the radical feminists have completely disowned zir. Gee, I wonder why? As has been pointed out here, no radical feminist would ever say that "Patriarchy hurts men, too," because they don't give a damn.

Though they've all been deleted from the WordPress page, 60% of Ozy's site consisted of "borrowed" articles from other sites and offering a paragraph or so of commentary. She also offered a long introductory article, which unfortunately has not yet been posted at GMP. In the article, she gives a long list of the problems facing men, and says she's tired of every single one. Then, she criticizes feminists, saying "Feminism is NOT in a state where it can accommodate men well. And no, simply telling men that they need to be more feminist is not the solution." Sounds like she might actually be on our side, huh?

APRIL FOOLS!! Ozy then says "MRAs, you are not off the hook," then proceeds to tear down the very people who are trying to end the things plaguing men that she claims to hate, out of her supposed love for those who own penises. She then tears into the MRM with the usual insults: We're misogynists, we're buddies with PUAs, we're bitter virgins who live in our mom's basements (this one really clashes with her saying that she's tired of virgin-shaming), all that bullshit. But hold on, isn't there still hope? Is she maybe truly sympathetic to our movement, but just angry at the handful of MRAs who actually are misogynists?

Sorry to let y'all down again, but no. While she does acknowledge the many hardships faced by men (which, let's be honest, a lot of feminists do, if only paying lip service to the idea), Ozy is still a feminist on a very fundamental level. She lectures lengthily and pedantically about White Heterosexual Christian Male Cisgender privilege, and often calls out her commenters for using "ableist" language. She censors like Jessica Valenti, cusses needlessly like Amanda Marcotte, and draws ridiculous examples of misogyny from nowhere like David Futrelle. Ozy also tells commenters that they need to think exactly like her whenever they use terms like she (sorry, I keep forgetting to use her preferred pronoun–zie) does. Zie also labels tons of her articles with trigger warnings, which, as Dr. T has told us, were created to give women an easy alternative to personal responsibility. Oh, and most of all, Ozy resolutely refuses to believe that any non-conservative woman should ever be held accountable for anything she says or does.

So, even when they claim to be for the rights of men, the handful of "friendly" feminists out there aren't exceptions to the sea of misandry and re-labeled Patriarchy that constitutes the movement; they are perfect examples of it. This is why we must continue to stand our ground against these charlatans.

Matt Forney: Belly aching and bravado

Paul Elam · 9 June 2012 · Archived copy · Original

Matt Forney has a problem. You see, he has been a long time lurker, supporting the idea of men's rights from the silent shadows. He never really did anything, but he was with us in spirit, rooting for the home team when no one was listening. He was what you call a Men's Rights Inactivist, and he was scary good at it.

Oh, but then AVfM changed all that when we put Katherine Heigl on Register-her.com. Or, as he puts it so succinctly on his blog:

> I agree with much of what they [MRA's] say, but I realized a while ago that I couldn't in good conscience consider myself a supporter of men's rights. The catalyst? Register-Her.com.

Fatal mistake on our part, it seems. Ol' Matt pulled his non-actualized, non-materialized non-support support like it was, imagine this, never really there. And then he set about calling us a bunch of whiners. He apparently wrote about it in In Mala Fide back in May, and just recently reposted the piece to his blog, because, he says, the blog "will soon be defunct."

I was too busy with everything else he said to try to make sense of that one. Maybe someone can 'splain that one to me later. Right now it appears a good a time as any to give the piece the attention that Forney is so obviously seeking.

I should start by saying that it's pretty natural that someone in my position gets their share of criticism. I make a lot of calculated decisions that get publicly vetted. Some of the dissent is fair, some not; all of it is useful, save a few exceptions. This article would be one of those.

In fact, what Matt has managed here is to epitomize the very thing he ultimately complains about in his article. He's whining, about jack shit, on behalf of a misandric cunt. And he is doing it with a straight face, it seems.

AVfM has launched a website that has drawn significant, worldwide attention. We have also seen the upstart of three internet radio shows, with a fourth on the way. And then there is Register-her, which has literally sent shock waves through the online feminist community and beyond. It now serves as one of the opposition's focal points of attack. That has had the added benefit of forcing feminists to acknowledge significant men's issues in public venues. And mind you, they are attacking us for all the "right" reasons, none of which are the trivial-to-the-point-of-stupidity waste of time that Forney is peddling in his article.

In other words, RHC has performed admirably, and Forney just doesn't get it, or doesn't care. He wants us all to be manly men like him and go crush people in his inactive, sedentary and thoroughly non crushing way.

By his account, all was well and fine till RHC served as the catalyst that thrust him from the role of silent sympathizer of the MRM to direct involvement as a harsh and judgmental critic. And he makes it obvious that all it took to foster that change was putting one woman on the registry that didn't happen to offend him personally.

I won't bother asking what a video similar to the Heigl video, made by a man joking about sexually mutilating women, would do for his Hollywood career. It really doesn't matter. Nor will I bother asking what the Heigl video says in a culture where women actually do sexually mutilate men to a joyous and celebratory reaction from other women and men. It is one of those "if you have to ask you must be too stupid for the answer" situations.

What I will point out is that this kind of chicken-shit nit picking by a supposed sympathizer is far more pathetic that the Heigl video could have ever hoped to be. But pathetic and stupid I can handle. Misandric, not so much. In his article, Forney tags men destroyed by the family law system as whining losers:

> I don't want to get in line for a bowl of victim borscht. "Oh, your whore wife divorced you? Here here, cry on my shoulder. Here's a cookie. It'll be alright.

This is the male badass who agreed with MRA literature? I suppose, that for some, their distaste for misandry and crimes against men is more of a matter of mental masturbation than actual social involvement. If that is the case, and it is, Matt Forney just jerked off all over his bed sheets. And now it appears he is standing there like a virtual 'tard, grinning about it and drooling.

To add more stupid to the equation, Forney beefs up his distaste with a barrage of bilious bravado:

> The problem is that I don't want to be a victim. I want to be a victor. I want to crush my enemies, see them driven before me, and hear the lamentations of their women. I want to look them in the eye and dare them to take me on.
> Come at me, bro.

Whoa. Toughest inactivist I have ever heard. And I am sure Forney's enemies, wherever they may exist, are besieged with concern. I know I'm impressed beyond words, so I won't try.

Just to make sure we have no illusion about our uselessness, he also kicks in the following:

> The men's rights movement wants men to keep picking at their scabs, to wallow in self-pity for all eternity.

Oh, mind you he does this while reminding us of how he is aware of the need for addressing very real problems, and how, underneath all this shaming bullshit, he really, really supports what we are trying to accomplish without his help as long as we do it his way.

Seriously Matt, if you don't support men's rights because a woman ended up on a registry when you don't think she belonged there, or because men are going to articulate their problems, then all I can say is "no problem." The world is full of obtuse, shaming blue pill pinheads with a level of moral acumen that precisely explains the fucked up state of affairs for the men and boys. Those would be the men and boys who actually end up paying for the problems people like you create.

I get that, and I write people like you off all the time. But then you have the gumption to parrot a bunch of keyboard courage about crushing your enemies? And you make fun of guys who get fucked over by the system? What a laugh. I don't mean what you said, but you, personally.

You may be every bit as brave as your words. I doubt it, but I don't know. What I do know is that your article is a misandric piece of shit. Based on your rhetoric, though, I would lay dollars to doughnuts you have never crushed so much as a Dixie Cup at a water cooler. Your kind of man never does. You just shit on those out there taking the hits and doing the work, likely because you lack the conviction to stick your neck out for anything really important to anyone but yourself.

Personally, I would not talk to MRA's about picking scabs until you quit being one.

Working men, heroes and corpses

John Hembling (JtO) · 11 June 2012 · Archived copy · Original

I recently found myself in conversation with an individual, which lacking another label, I'll describe as a working man of the old school. In his own description, this is somebody on the job on time, every day no matter what. A man to be counted on. One who does not take days off, no matter what. A man who doesn't complain of hard work or hard conditions, or blistering heat, or numbing cold, or injury, or pain, or disregard as a human, or despair. A real man.

I'm confident he is exactly what he describes himself as. A man who is strong, reliable, honourable, and stoic. And I also know this man takes a rightful pride in these qualities, and defines himself in part by his utility to others. My own characterization, not his.

He is definitely a real man. I also know that in our struggle for recognition of men and boys as human beings , it is this man and men like him who built and maintain the world we live in.

And what I told him was that he is what we are fighting against. Men who define manhood by being sacrificial beasts of burden. I told him this attitude is exactly why women, such as the female hosts and the female audience of a daytime TV show feel justified in treating the mutilation of a man as comedy.

And although I maintain that this self definition of male identity by men willing to work themselves to death , or to step between a bullet and a child or a woman in self sacrificial defence is what fuels and supports a runaway feminist ethic of hatred of men and disregard for their humanity, at the same time I have to recognize the greatness of what men like this represent. And who am I to tell any man he cant be that hero.

The problem is in the economy of human esteem, in which men are valued by utility, and devalued as human beings, denied consideration and that sacrifice used as the meter of their manly worth.

Men like this are great men, but their greatness and their self selected sacrifice is reflected back on themselves and on other men as required sacrifice by a culture who regards disposability as worth.

The guy who always shows up for work, sick or healthy? That's him. The guy who never sees a doctor. The guy who in his conversation admits to serious health issues over the years. And in his next utterance points out that but over time he either stopped noticing them or they just went away.

A man who sees himself as a wooden robot, bark skin stretched over a sold core. Like a tree, only the outside, only bark is truly alive.

In his own words born and bred for sacrifice, for the common good.

This is a real person, a real man, and a valid human being. And to my ears, these words are the words of a slave, in bondage to a world which demands his life's service, but a world which denies his humanity except in that act of sacrifice.

Without men like this, our world will fall in on itself. But without men like this, willing to serve as the disposable bodies of a feminized culture, we would not need to withdraw our sacrifice and protection.

The greatness of men like this one is truthfully what levered humanity from a survivalist, pre-civilized existence, into a modern safe, well fed and housed modern world. Men, and the corpses of men like the man I call the old school working man, are what paved the way for civilization. And now, the continued willingness of men to sacrifice, to be heroes is what no longer serves us. It's what enables and supports a growing culture of feminized entitlement, childish self indulgence, lack of human empathy, and which retards the adulthood of our culture. Heroes as great as they are, and as much as they are owed, have got to go.

> "We do not ride on the railroad; it rides upon us. Did you ever think what those sleepers are that > underlie the railroad? Each one is a man…. The rails are laid on them, and they are covered with sand, and the cars run smoothly over them. They are sound sleepers, I assure you. And every few years a new lot is laid down and run over; so that, if some have the pleasure of riding on a rail, others have the misfortune to be ridden upon."

AVFM News and Activism Special Edition

James Huff · 12 June 2012 · Archived copy · Original

[box icon="none"]

This week will be a special show for AVFM News and Activism. Instead of having regular news stories and a guest we will have a round table discussion about activism and the future of the MRM. James and Robert will be talking about effective strategies and how they have thus far be gauged. All are welcome to call in and talk about their efforts or aspirations and what they think could be effective strategies.

This movement is only just recently beginning to make its presence known and our opponents are taking notice. Sharing activism experiences and techniques are important if we are to make any real change.

It is more important than ever that people call into the show to talk about activism strategies and encourage others to become active themselves. Please do not shy away from calling if you are a newcomer or a novice; you are every bit as important as seasoned MRAs and your input, as well as your efforts, are very important.

The show airs live on June 12, at 8:00 Central Time, US, which is 2:00 a.m. June 13, in London and 11:00 a.m. June 13 in Brisbane. If you have not yet requested membership in the Stickcam Room, you can do so through the link below. The call in number is 310-388-9709. You can also contact the show via Skype free if you are registered with Blogalk Radio.

AO, feminist lies, and trans-activists

John Hembling (JtO) · 12 June 2012 · Archived copy · Original

I was talking to another member of the AgentOrange team today, and that individual pointed out to me that I hate transexuals. At least, that appears to be the official party line among members of a twitter community who have adopted use of the hash-tag #OrangeisPatriarchy.

As I write frequently on issues of a growing legal and social marginalization of men in family courts, the education system, in media and other areas of society, this apparently translates to opposition to the rights of transexuals, and to misogyny (hatred of women). You may wonder how the first argument; in favour of male human rights translates to the second; hatred of women. I wondered about that too. However, twitter postings only allow 140 characters, which really isn't enough to develop an articulated case of logical cause and effect. The users of the #OrangeisPatriarchy tag say it is so, thus it must be so.

Funny how they seem to know more about the goals and positions of the MRM (men's rights movement) than I do.

All of this discussion comes on the heels of a radical feminist conference which was to be held in the UK, and which lost it's booking at the original venue, Conway Hall in London. The venue's administration issued the following statement when they cancelled the radical feminists' booking.

> "We had sought assurances that the organizers would allow access to all, in order to enable the event to proceed at the venue. We also expressed concern that particular speakers would need to be made aware that whilst welcoming progressive thinking and debate, Conway Hall seeks to uphold inclusivity in respect of both legal obligations and as a principle."[1]

Apparently these particular radical feminists subscribe to a doctrine called womyn-born-womyn, in which only human beings with double-x chromosomal sexual identity are ever to be allowed into conferences, meeting spaces, and so on.

Adhering to an ideological enthusiasm for eugenics, child abuse and publishing fantasies of sexually targeted murder apparently won't get you booted from a conference centre booking. Excluding self-identified transexual women from your conference though, that's going too far. Ha!

All of this is old news, originally released on AVfM several weeks ago, but it merits mention again because it provides the context for the emergence among some trans-activist twitter users of the hashtag #OrangeisPatriarchy.

It is also a little bit funny. Of course, I can predict some objections to my amusement, structured along the logical line that disruption of a radical feminist conference is equivalent to suppressing the legal or social equality (or rights) of women.

Other versions of this argument:

[unordered_list style="arrow"]

- "you just hate women"
- "you're supporting patriarchy"
- "you want to send women back to the kitchen"
- et cetera, ad infinitum, ad nauseum

[/unordered_list]

These standard, predictable and boring arguments all hang on a false premise. That false premise being that feminism and women are the same thing. They're not. Women are a group of people, identifiable by their sex. Feminism, as a thing distinct from "women" and indeed, distinct from "people" is a thing made from ideas. It is an ideology. Obviously, some of feminism's proponents and apologists are women, and a great many of them are men, too. Some are even transexual men and transexual women.

But feminism is not a group of people, it is an ideology. However, a slightly more defensible argument might be made that feminism is a movement seeking equal rights between men and women. That is my phrasing, btw. Feminists usually use the term "equal rights for women" which if examined logically, excludes the consideration of human rights for men, (a revealing slip in their rhetoric). However, whatever they claim as a supposedly humanist, equalist, egalitarian goal, it all amounts to happy talk and baloney, because an examination of the activism and produced outcomes of the past half century reveals that feminism's true goals are sharply at odds with any public declaration of equality or humanism.

The radical feminists unceremoniously denied the Conway Hall booking are a bit more wrong-headed than simply being squeamish over the challenging prospect of transexual women attendees to an organized event. They are advocates of eugenics to cull the earth's human population of men, and the sex-selective practice of purposefully developmentally damaging child abuse. They are monsters.

Obviously, not all feminists are so extreme as this. But, at the core of every version of feminism are two problematic elements.

The first is an attachment between victimhood and female identity. Whether this is expressed as "patriarchy" or "rape culture" and whether it is conceptualized as historical or ongoing, the attachment of feminine identity to an all-encompassing victimhood is fundamentally flawed. It is an ideological construct starting from a "Truth" and selecting or fabricating evidence to support that "truth".

This is the defining quality of an ideology, and that which distinguishes ideology from philosophy. A philosophical approach begins with observation and evidence, and posits a view of reality dependent on that evidence. If you are always a victim, then you are never a self actualized adult, and you do not own personal accountability. Feminism's victim identity creates an identity for women in which they remain non-actualized infants. Mental toddlers is hardly a useful model for self actualized empowerment. That is feminism's first problem.

The second problem is that starting from that doctrinal victimhood, feminism seeks to use force to redress that claimed victimhood. In many versions of feminism, this is the co-option of the apparatus of the state to use violence, to appropriate funds and property, and to dis-enfranchise groups deemed in the doctrine of victimhood to be "the enemy". More extreme flavors of feminism don't bother to disguise this violence by acting through the proxy of the state, rather they talk openly about plans for human extermination, mass murder, infanticide and so on, such as the public postings on the blog Radical Hub.

However, the extreme and overt violence advocated by those radicals does not exempt non-radical flavors of the ideology from accountability simply because for them, violence is pursued by proxy, through the state, through legal and financial instruments of government. Violence done at one or more remove is still violence.

However, this is why, whether it is radical or not, feminism is not a human rights movement. It is a dogmatic ideology of class hatred and violence. This is why many self identified MRAs oppose it, and why opposition to feminism is not opposition to, or hatred of women.

This is also why in much MRA writing, the word feminism is omitted in favor of the term Gender Ideologue. Those being so labeled should recognize the low esteem they are held as ideologues.

The MRM, or men's rights movement, generally does not advocate equal rights for women. ♠ It is a humanist movement recognizing that men and women are not identical, but pursuing equality of rights among all people, whatever their sex or gender might individually be. Shocking as this may be, this includes men and women and transexuals of whatever self identification they use.

The MRM is also distinct from most flavors of feminism based on a foundation of libertarian philosophy. MRA's (mostly) do not support collectivism, or state-ism. Also, we don't want to murder anyone – which sets us apart from radical feminists as well.

However, many transexual rights activists, at recent odds with their radical feminist colleagues appear greatly attached to the rather stupid view that the MRM wants to shove them back into the kitchen, or something. This may be a manifestation of the shared roots of radical-feminist and transexual activism. Until thrown under the metaphorical bus by radfems, the trans activists appear to have been a subset of the radical feminist community.

Lately there has been substantial complaint that the "evil men's rights movement" is attempting to colonize or co-opt the trans-activist community. Unfortunately, much recent trans-activist rhetoric addressing the recent schism uses language such as "kill" or "exterminate" in reference to radical feminists.

I can assure all readers of this. The men's rights movement wants no part of any movement using the language of killing or violence. However, since men's rights activism has nothing whatsoever to do with denying anyone else's legal rights or humanity, I'll suggest what I hope is taken in the friendly helpful spirit it's offered in.

To trans-activists: clean up your childish act, abandon the use of violence and killing in your rhetoric, or be ready to be bulldozed aside along with your violent and idiotic cousins; the radical feminists.

♠ The spade represents a quote mining alert. It is designed to assist feminist critics in locating material that they can take out of context in order to promote a false impression of MRM literature. In this case, the quote identified and tagged can be used to paint MRA's as against women's rights instead of its actual meaning, which is that we support human rights for all individuals.

Men's Hell-th

Paul Elam · 12 June 2012 · Archived copy · Original

> Many U.S. men only go to their doctor when they're extremely sick, skipping preventive care. ~ Miranda Hitti – WebMD Health News

There are dysfunctional parts of my old school "masculinity," particularly where it regards my health and self-care. Like many or most men, I seem to be locked into a stereotypical, self-neglecting role of maleness, despite my most noble intentions to defend the innate value of my life. My actions (meaning myself) have served up a good deal of proof of this in recent days. I have been my own stark reminder of the ingrained and self-imposed misandry that drives male disposability.

This should not be real news to most of the men that read here. We currently have over 1,000 of the finest articles on men's issues ever assembled in one place, and none of them are focused on the issues of men's health. Hell, until this article we didn't even have a category for it.

I don't really know what to do about a lot of this, and don't know that I ever will. So, lacking any real wisdom or expertise on the subject, and not wishing to be a bigger hypocrite than I am already being, I will simply tell you my story, and hope that you learn more from my experience than I have.

I also hope to kill a flock of birds with one stone, as I have received many kind inquiries about my health recently, largely from men whom I suspect could also be taking better care of themselves.

I will warn you in advance, though, that the details are suitable for a trigger warning. Some of this is pretty gross, guys, so continue reading with the same caution that I would issue the average man about neglecting his own needs: do so at your own peril.

There are a few medical issues at play here. I will take them in no particular order. Considering they are all part of the same problem it won't help to adhere too much to chronology, nor will it serve to address things in order of chronicity.

I am 55 years old. I started smoking in earnest by age 14. I "tried" quitting a few dozen times, with varying degrees of success, but always found my way back to a pack of menthols before it was over.

Two years ago I started to experience breathing problems. I don't mean that I got short of breath when running the hundred meter dash. I mean that I was waking up at two and three in the morning struggling to get air. I went to the doctor (after months of procrastination), got put on Albuterol, and continued to smoke.

The Albuterol was a godsend. You see, it got to the point that I was forced to put my cigarettes out about halfway down because my chest was getting so tight every time I lit one. The Albuterol fixed that to a degree. I would just take a small puff from the inhaler and the bronchodilation would allow me to breathe through the last half of that smoke, sometimes even a little longer.

Who says men can't solve problems? We're experts at it.

During this time I was also facing a couple of other issues. I had a bad gallbladder. That is the little sack-like organ attached to your liver that stores bile (produced by the liver) that aids in the digestion of fatty foods. In some people, the organ also starts producing stones which do not aid in digestions, but do cause pain in "attacks" on a level that would make a Southern Baptist bow to Mecca.

I listened patiently to the doctor's advice that my gallbladder could eventually cause very serious problems and that it needed to come out. That was six years, and about 12 trips to the ER ago, in excruciating pain.

In between those trips I suffered constant rounds of diarrhea, stools full of undigested fats and excess bile. I also lived in fear that every time I ate something with more than a trace of fat that I would end up in the hospital jacked up on morphine that usually did not resolve all the pain.

That fear was rational, even if my actions weren't, and I stuck with it long enough to experience that "you again?" look from more than one emergency department employee.

During all this time I was following my AVfM obsession faithfully. I was tending to what I thought was important. I was, in fact, hiding behind it in a strange sort of way. While I attended all that important work (and no, I am not saying that sarcastically) I slipped toward a bad and untimely end.

I put on a great deal of weight, battered my already damaged lungs with the help of R.J. Reynolds, and even learned to play chicken late at night with my gallbladder and plates of pizza. Most of the time I dodged the bullet and didn't have an attack. Most of the time, yes.

I was living my life, guiding my affairs with a brain that thought it could kill me and keep on living. With a smoke in one hand, an inhaler in the other, and the occasional stray piece of pepperoni on my keyboard, I continued doing what a man does. I worked and met my goals, none of which were about me obtaining a better quality or quantity of life.

It makes sense, in a crazy sort of way, when you consider that is precisely how all of us are raised to view our own intrinsic value.

It is also worth mentioning here that during all this time I noticed a reduced flow of urine when urinating. It is a sure sign of an enlarging prostate. No big deal. I am in my mid-fifties, after all, and that is what starts happening when you get a little older. No need to go see a doctor. No, not in the least.

If all this sounds like I am cleansing myself, or seeking absolution for my own stupidity, I probably am. If it seems brave to be this personal and revealing, it really isn't. It was not bravery but fear that led me here.

You see, I quit smoking four months ago, just before my 55th birthday. It was not because I had an epiphany and suddenly desired the smoke-free lifestyle of a SoCal granola head. I would love nothing more than to torch one right now and hammer out another piece on feminism than to be doing what I am doing.

I would love to have a cheeseburger as a reward after I am done, but I can't. In addition to dropping the smokes I also dropped 30 pounds. But it was not insight or a healthy ego that got me there.

It took the, "is this going to be the one that kills me?" thought, every time I lit a cigarette, before I got, for the first time in my life, serious about quitting. It was pretty much the same with the food. I am still not exercising near as much as I should.

The silver lining here is that the sudden fit of healthy decisions led to other things, and a week ago today I had the gallbladder surgically removed. Oh, and my prostate? The propofol they gave me during the surgery made it swell so much that it cut off my ability to urinate completely. Eight hours after the procedure I was back in the emergency room, subjected to very hearty attempts to insert a catheter into my bladder before it ruptured. The fact that you are reading this lets you know that they got it in – with enough sawing back and forth.

The catheter came out today, and I will be going back for a PSA test (a screen for prostate cancer) in a week. Apparently the catheter causes false high results on the PSA so they need to have it out for about a week before testing.

When I go back for that we are going to discuss the kidney stone in my right kidney that I never followed up on because it wasn't bothering me like the one in my left kidney did; because it would have got in the way of the really important stuff I was doing.

There is a lesson in this, but I am vowed not to insult you with platitudes or Peter Pan advice or some brain dead preventative medicine slogans. What I will do is tell you what all this means to me, and hopefully have the humility to shut up about it afterward and stay out of your way.

We live in a misandric culture, and often times, when we are scared enough or motivated by some other powerful force, we find that the root of the hatred is in the mirror staring back at us and mocking.

We men are raised with a sense of shame for having any needs. We are told, in fact, that we already have everything, and largely don't deserve even the most basic of our needs for dignity, respect and love. If you look around in medical literature long enough, you will even see them shaming us for not going to the doctor more. Feminists have even used our tendency to neglect ourselves as a good reason to go full steam ahead with the unabashedly pro-female Obamacare.

And you can watch many men nod their heads in agreement with this crap. Sure, some of it is just the typical effects of feminist ideology on the brains of obsequious men, but there is something else at play here.

What made men willing to stand on the decks of sinking ships where their betters were loaded onto lifeboats? What makes men OK with being singled out for selective service? When is the last time you heard an average man point out to a woman who is whining that her great grandmother could not vote, that even today, unless a man signs an agreement with the government to use his body as cannon fodder, that he still won't be allowed to vote?

We often have to point out to morons that being anti-feminist is not the same thing as being anti-woman. I think we would do well to remember from time to time that misandry is often not something done to us, but something we do to ourselves.

It is a monster that can live in any one of us, and often does. I have been doing battle with my own for a while. 25 years of consideration, soul searching and bucking the system and I am just now figuring out to go see a doctor when I have a problem.

I want to take this time also to thank the many of you that got wind of my problems and wrote to inquire. I hope you are doing the same for yourselves, because that is the real point here. It is about all of us, and about our inherited demons.

I know many of you have done a better job at taking care of yourselves than I have, but I am still betting that we are dealing with a monster that inhabits us all to one degree or another.

Let us not continue to give that beast a place to hide.

Feminism has changed fatherhood for the better!

Greg Canning · 13 June 2012 · Archived copy · Original

Once upon a time journalism was about investigating and reporting on an issue in a balanced way from all perspectives of an argument. Recent times have seen a proliferation of self-indulgent feminist writers who spout misandric nonsense and infuse feminist propaganda into the mainstream media as though it were orthodox truth.

Chloe Angyal[1] is an Australian novice feminist writer, who has moved to the US to cross-pollinate dogma with her American Radfem sisters. The Australian Fem-fax media group recently published an opinion piece of hers titled Thank feminism for an ever-improving line of fathers. [2]"

Line of fathers? What an unusual turn of phrase. For me the title conjured up images of fathers lined up outside family courts, outside Child Support Agency offices; lines of fathers alienated from their children, falsely accused of child abuse or domestic violence; lines of mourners at the funeral processions of fathers who commit suicide.[3] I imagined lines at paternity testing centers, in the debtor's prisons; even lines struck though the fathers names on birth certificates, legally replaced with the mother's lesbian partners name.[4]

I also thought about the people who will line up at the forthcoming Fatherless games in the London[5], and the earlier lines of fatherless rioting youth in that city.[6] Yes the rise of feminism is arguably responsible for the greatest epidemic of fatherlessness ever, yet Miss Chloe considers this "ever-improving" and mentions not one of these issues in her article.

She contends:

> The feminism that burst into being when my father was in his early 20s declared that women had the right to have careers. And, it insisted that, for women to have careers and children, men would have to shoulder more of the work of parenting.

Well not exactly, Chloe, You see, women's innate drive toward hypergamy ensures that they still want all the resources that a husband can provide. So rather than increasing the effective parenting of children by greater involvement of both parents, infants as young as 6 weeks old are pushed en masse into the emotionally empty environment of the feminist/Marxist inspired day care industry.

Feminism created an economic milieu in which the previous ability of a family to live in comfort on one wage was replaced by an economic imperative for many families to require 2 wages, just to survive. Furthermore, any couples that exercised their choice and elected for the wife to be a stay at home mum (even if just through their children's, preschool years), found the wife denigrated and ostracized by rabid feminists, as indeed they still are.

This passage from Maggie Hamilton's 2007 book, What Men Don't Talk About, sums up the situation in Australia.

> There's no conflict about this: Australian women don't like it when their men work part-time,' says Jan van Ours, an international researcher… from Australia's HILDA (Household Income and Labour Dynamics in Australia) survey. 'Australian women want their men in full-time jobs. They are least satisfied when they, themselves, have a job of more than 50 hours, and most satisfied when they are working part-time, or not at all.' Happily, Australian men are in lockstep: they too prefer to work full-time – although, unlike women, they don't mind if their partners work full-time, part-time, or not at all.

Rather than feminism, I suggest that it is the easygoing nature of men, their adaptability and desire to please women – whatever women's choices be – that has facilitated much of women's progress into the workforce, as well as their option to avoid professional life altogether.

Australian labor force statistics confirm, however, that fathers continue to have little choice. Part time and stay at home dads remain a rarity, regardless of how many men would jump at the chance of being one.

Fathers working away from family and children are historically a relatively recent occurrence, commencing with industrialization. Traditionally fathers were intimately connected with family and children and had well defined roles in the upbringing of both boys and girls but especially the initiation of young men into manhood. This fact of recent history if conveniently forgotten by feminists whose memory however for any instance of perceived injustice against women stretches back to prehistory.

She continues:

> Statistics indicate that decades later parents in two-career families have yet to figure out how to split that work equally.

Not surprisingly the "statistics" she is referring to are not referenced. However when feminists speak of division of domestic labor they refer only to tasks traditionally performed by women and exclude from their calculations tasks traditionally performed by men. Excluded items include chores such as yard, house and vehicle maintenance. When researchers do consider these things the conclusions are quite different:

> However, if we consider the full range of domestic tasks, including the outdoor activities that are the traditional tasks that men do, then we [illegible] see a more equal division of labor. [7]

The focus of feminists remains on childcare activities and indoors housework as though these were the only tasks needed to finance and run a household. Additional factors such as travelling times for fathers who generally have to travel longer distances to work are not considered, nor is adjustment made for higher incomes generally earned by men for the good of the household even when most spending decisions regarding that income are made by the woman.

Chloe then utters this absurd statement:

> One of the greatest challenges feminism has faced is getting men on board.

How surprising, that an ideology founded on the hatred of men, that sees men as disposable sources of finance, sperm donors, that paints men as innately violent monsters from whom wimmen-and-children must be protected by gender biased laws and disregard for constitutional rights, that has declared destruction of the family as a central objective – how surprising that men are not flocking to get on board!

Well of course some men do flock to get on board and Angyal quotes one such male born feminist, Michael Kimmel and describes him as "a leading thinker in masculinity studies." Nope sorry, calling bullshit on this one. Masculinities as a branch of gender studies, which is a branch of feminism, might be the breeding ground for white knights such as Kimmel and our very own Michael Flood[8], who wish to engineer modern men into servile androgynous drones of women but they know little about the realities and challenges facing ordinary modern men. It is only through the MRM and initiatives such as New Male Studies[9] that these challenges will be addressed.

Other silliness from Chloe's article:

> Feminism is one of the best things that ever happened to fatherhood.

Sure it is Chloe; please see above for a few of the many reasons that feminism is actually the worst thing that ever happened to fatherhood.

> Thanks to feminism, the men my friends and I marry will be engaged, emotionally present fathers.

And

> Those men, some of whom are just meeting their future spouses, will feel the positive influence of feminism every day.

Sure they will, Chloe! Men all over the world are waking each morning and bowing down in thanks to the wonders of feminism. You are clearly well versed on social trends.

I wonder exactly how many feminist trollops are getting married these days? Are not marriage and family institutions of oppression rejected by feminism? Recent US data does not look good for their prospects as young men seeing the inherent dangers of involving themselves with the narcissistic and entitled female end products of feminist engineering, and facing a greater than 50% chance of divorce, financial ruin, and little if any access to their children are increasingly rejecting marriage and going their own way.

Aware of the trend for American men who do seek partners and family to look outside their own country, feminists aim to further control men though legislation, rather then looking inside their own hearts and acknowledging that they are a big part of the problem rather then part of the solution.[10]

Human rights activism is now a blood-sport

John Hembling (JtO) · 13 June 2012 · Archived copy · Original

Erin Pizzey is a woman now in her early 70's.

She is also a British family care activist and a best-selling novelist. She became internationally famous after she set up the world's first refuge for battered women in 1971 – and went on to establish an international movement for victims of domestic violence.

However, after the establishment of her first shelter in England, she was driven out of that shelter by the dysfunctional and psychologically damaged women who had taken over her small organization.

In her 1981 book "Prone to Violence", Pizzey stated:

> Of the first 100 women who entered that refuge, 64 of them were as violent or more violent than the men they were allegedly running away from.

This provoked such rage in the UK feminist community that Pizzey received multiple death threats, had bomb threats called on several occasions when she was speaking in public and lived under full time police protection. Her dog was killed by feminists frustrated they couldn't get to her due to her police protection, after which she fled the UK and lived in hiding for roughly 10 years. Ironically, this cemented the truth of the violence and pathological behavior of many of the feminists described by Pizzey in her writing.

Pizzey's writing and activism are widely referenced in what is now called the men's rights movement, and the father's rights movement. This is a strictly non-violent non-political human rights movement which among other things, seeks to correct a strong anti-male bias in family law, the education system and other key aspects of society.

One prominent member of this human rights movement, who lives in Canada, publishes an online magazine and is strongly critical of the ideology of gender feminism. In early 2012, the Municipal Police in the home-city of this man were contacted anonymously, and a fabricated claim was made that he was stockpiling weapons and munitions. He does not now, nor did he in the past own a firearm, and this anonymous "tip" was made with the calculated intention of harassing him, using the local police to do so.

Several other harassing phone calls were made to his employers and family members, causing significant uproar and pain to him and his family. When rumors surfaced online that he had contemplated suicide, several feminist blogs posted sadistic and triumphal articles, including one with the title: "1 down, 15,000 to go" referring to the number of subscribers of a blog he contributed to. His name is omitted from this account to minimize further harassment against him and his family.

Ben Vonderheide is a father's rights activist and a vocal opponent of ideological feminist. He produces father's rights videos on youtube. Vonderheide uses the online name "Daddy Justice" and focuses a substantial measure of his activism on the American family court system, which he contends is monetized, deeply biased against fathers, and substantially corrupt. When Vonderheide attended hearings on the Violence Against Women Act in December 2011 at the US Senate Building in Washington DC, he was assaulted in the hallway of the senate building by Lisalyn R. Jacobs, a lawyer and a gender ideologue activist member of the Legal Momentum organization. Vonderheid captured the assault on himself on video and uploaded it to youtube.

Jacobs was charged and arraigned for assault on Dec 5 2011.

In May, 2012, Vonderheide was the victim of a home invasion. He was robbed during this invasion, by a large man, armed with a knife, and wearing a black balaclava. In addition to contacting his local police and cooperating in their investigation, Vonderheid documented this home-invasion/robbery after the event and uploaded a video description of it to youtube.

Vonderheid made several other videos about this, including one in which he and a police constable walked through the park outside his home, observing a location from where the home invader might have sat in the dark watching his house.

A close associate of Mr Vonderheid was also subject to a home invasion several weeks later, and the man, in his 60s fled his home nude to escape the attacker, calling the police from a neighbor's house.

It is believed that home invasions, and harassment of these activists are the result of their activism, writing and reporting on organizations comprised of individuals who are unstable, driven by pathological hatred, and prone to violence.

And it now appears that there are no limits to what gender ideologues will do to silence, intimidate or physically harm their critics and opponents.

The dangerous and dirty technique of "SWATting"

In June of 2012, CNN contributor Erick Erikson, a conservative blogger and columnist was interviewed on air by Don Lemon as he described how an unknown individual had called 911, falsely identifying himself as Erikson, and informing the police operator that he was armed and had shot his wife. Police responded rapidly to the call, arriving at Erikson's house with drawn weapons. As the call was faked, Erikson was not armed as he greeted the attending officers, but in the high stress for those officers responding to what they believed was a volatile and dangerous situation, Erikson came close to being shot by those officers.

Gender ideologues have established they are both capable and willing to do terrible violence, including manipulation of police through false reports to harass, and to potentially kill philosophical opponents, critics or human rights activists by cultivating an impression among responding officers of imminent danger, including fire-arms threats.

The men's rights movement and the father's rights movements are non-violent, non political human rights movements. It is strongly advised of MRAs (men's rights activists) that they introduce themselves to their local police departments, explaining who they are and what the men's movement is.

Get to know your local police, get them to know you.

AVfM Radio: is feminism just psychopathy dressed up

AVfM Radio · 14 June 2012 · Archived copy · Original

Today on AVfM, JtO and GWW ask the question – Is feminism nothing more than an elaborate political framework for psychopathy? Examining the produced outcomes of a half century of feminist activism, are active feminists anything except violent criminals – constructing a huge framework of smoke and mirrors to excuse ongoing violent and antisocial behavior? What is the difference between antisocial and violent behavior and feminism? Can a real humanist movement really generate this much hate, including public calls for male extermination, child abuse, mutilation? Would real humanists have laughed at the violent mutilation by Catherine Becker of her husband? Would a humanist movement engage in public parades and fly banners reading dis-arm the police, arm the feminists – and Exterminate men now. Would humanists persistently stage anti violence campaigns which ignore the demographic who is most victimized by violence?

The original feminazis? Fake rape cases – 1945

Robert St. Estephe · 14 June 2012 · Archived copy · Original

As an ongoing part of False Allegation Awareness Month, we bring you another tidbit of history, courtesy of Robert St. Estephe. And as with each of Robert's lessons, we are reminded that there is nothing new under the sun. False rape lies have been a part of the western landscape for a long, long time. Often we find that the driving force behind the misdeeds, as well as their unfortunate efficacy at harming the accused, is obscured by the ignorance and bigotry of the general population.

From the fictional struggle of Atticus Finch to the very real nightmare lived by the Scottsboro Boys, racial hatred has been part of the equation. It even extends in more modern times to cases like Duke Lacrosse, where the perception of the falsely accused's status as white and affluent worked to congeal public perception against them.

But it is the trappings of sex, gender and misandry that underlie the continued popularity of rape lies, fueling a modern false rape culture that is no different in essence than lynch mobs in the 1930's rural south.

Haywood Patterson (Scottsboro) and David Evans (Duke) would appear to be and are very different kinds of men. One rich, the other poor. One Black, one White. One educated, one not. Though worlds apart in race, socioeconomic status and the times in which they lived, both had the commonality of being accused of a sexual crime by a female liar in a society that was predisposed to think them guilty.

They were both men, and that was enough to get them railroaded in front of the entire world.

And it appears that this same understanding of how sexual power actually works between women and men (which is to say it works well for women and not for men) was embraced by the German's during World War II.

In an attempt to turn American troops against each other during the early part of the way, false rape allegations were attempted to be used as a weapon. They counted on the fact that most men hate rape with such abandon that they will engage in witch trials in order to serve up some "justice."

Feminazis? Oh, yeah, but not just the ones that Rush Limbaugh talks about. –PE

FULL TEXT: Early as it is in the occupation of Germany, the American army appears to have won one major battle against an evil which might have seriously undermined its authority.

It was the battle of the fake rape cases.

As yet, few level-headed high army officials are certain whether it was an organized campaign of subtle sex sabotage or merely a sort of individual feminine guerrilla campaign.

Whatever its origin – either individual or collective – it has pretty definitely failed.

~ Viewed as Murder. ~

To understand the seriousness of the original situation when American troops first swept into Germany it must be realized that, for both moral and disciplinary reasons, our army views rape as civilian courts view murder. American soldiers have been hanged for rape in several European countries where this war has been fought.

Thus, word of the American army's penalty for rape obviously filtered into Germany. That at least some nazi-minded frauleins heard of it and made their plans is now a matter of record. Others perhaps "innocently" – if that word is fitting – fell into the scheme.

It should be said that the army's overseas rape cases generally have been fewer than would occur among a similar number of similarly aged civilians in most countries. But suddenly in Germany the military police began to be approached by numbers of women crying “Rape!”

Arrests were made immediately, but investigations prior to courts-martial began to unearth many discrepancies, for instance:

Out of three such complaints in one division, medical investigation revealed that two of the girls were virginal and civilians testified that the third was a known prostitute.

All three finally admitted they had been prompted by the departing Germans to try the rape racket as a means of harassing American troops.

~ Followed Instructions. ~

Several cases of German girls found fraternizing with doughboys first appeared as sex cases. The frauleins realized they had been found out and mistakenly thinking they too would be punished for such fraternizing they immediately cried “rape” in hopes of saving themselves.

The soldiers were punished for such fraternizing – but there’s a difference between a $65 fine and hanging.

More than once it developed that frauleins who said they had been raped did not even know what the English word “rape” means. They had merely been instructed briefly on how to say it. Rape remains a hanging offense in the American army – but no doughboy is going to the gallows simply on the word of a clever German girl.

Logic should not be transsexual kryptonite

John Hembling (JtO) · 14 June 2012 · Archived copy · Original

Control of the discourse, and forcing fantasy onto reality.

This week, aside from the routine claims by establishment zombies that men defending their human rights must necessarily be doing so out of a desire to subjugate, marginalize and oppress everyone else, I was entertained to see new group of actors piling on, claiming as loudly as possible that they were in no way associated with human rights activists arguing for the rights of men and boys. In the words of these new players:

- "MRAs are charlatans"
- "MRAs are even scummier than rad-scum"
- "MRAs want to oppress everyone"

Of course, this hatred from self-identified radical feminists is understandable and expected. These are after all the same ideologues whose public literature calls for eugenics, male targeting infanticide, and systematic child abuse.

However, from communities outside radical feminism, the irrational fear of men doing anything other than dutifully sacrificing themselves on behalf of others seems to be spreading. The online trans-activist community appears to have been infected by this reactionary drivel, which is unfortunate. The possibility that some of this public vilification of men's activists is actually posturing, attempting to win approval from avowedly male-hating radical feminists has crossed my mind before. I have avoided saying so because such motivation seems almost too silly to credit, although it has been raised as an explanation by commenters other than myself on AVfM recently.

However, just as the MRA community, while is seeks to address anti male discrimination in the courts, education system, employment and elsewhere is not populated by a representative sample of "all men", the trans-activist community isn't necessarily composed of a representative sample of all trans-identified individuals.

The possible motivation to ingratiate trans-rights activism into acceptance in radical-feminist circles seems like a sucking up to the class bully in hopes of avoiding that bully's attention.

Although the radical feminist community has not been consistent, a thread of distinct hatred towards trans-identified women has an established legacy in radical feminist discourse. When I first encountered this among radical scribblings, it puzzled me greatly. Weren't trans-activists and lesbian separatist feminists natural allies? Surely – in their respective cosmologies, a struggle against the over-arching "patriarchy" would unite these two groups.

Since then my own understanding of how "patriarchy" works has broadened significantly. Far from the self-serving conception of a near magical and omnipresent conspiracy squashing all women and elevating all men; so called patriarchy is a grossly incomplete model mis-attributing cause and effect, and largely ignoring the utility to women of cultivated feminine non-agency[1][2][3][4]. This male-elevating patriarchy claimed by gender ideologues being the same one which somehow manages to kill more men than women, creates more male suicides than women (4:1), more male workplace deaths, combat deaths, higher male unemployment, et-cetera.

In spite of the appearance of natural alliance between radical feminists and transexual activists, the seemingly illogical hatred towards trans-sexed individuals has a rational source. The key to understanding this lies in two doctrines which although mutually exclusive, are each of utility in justifying rad fem hatred of transexuals. The first of these is the doctrine of the social construction if sexual identity. In this concept, male and female identities are deemed to be entirely learned, and that human identity begins as a blank slate. This is the same ideology which informed the decision of the parents of a boy named David Reimer, who was raised as a girl.

Reimer was mutilated during routine infant circumcision, and the decision taken by his parents was to simply amputate the remains of his genitals, and raise him as a female. At age 15, Reimer rejected his socially conditioned female identity, re-identified himself as male, but suffered from extreme depression for the rest of his life – finally killing himself at age 39.

Despite the empirical fallacy of the doctrine of socially constructed sexual identity, it is given continued currency by radical feminists, because it provides justification for hate. If sexual identity is entirely constructed, then non-conforming sexual identity can be deemed pathological, subject to "correction" through conditioning or medication, or simply criminalized.

The existence of trans-sexed individuals, those whose physical body, whether male or female; does not align with their internal sense of self, creating what is termed sexual dysphoria – the natural existence of such individuals DE-legitimizes a substantial body of the core dogma of gender ideologues. This is one of the reasons for what seems on it's surface to be irrational resistance from radical feminists against recognition of the gender identity of trans-identified individuals.

The other doctrine, which although it cannot logically coexist in a consistent belief system is the idea of womyn-born-womyn. This is gender essentialism, another word for the doctrine that feminine sexual identity is chromosomal. The utility of this dogma is that it provides a pseudo-scientific basis for the sexual supremacy of much radical feminist thinking.

Whatever quasi academic language this idea is couched in, it is a re-iteration of Solanas's rhetoric; that the Y chromosome is a defective X chromosome, and that maleness is a deficiency, or defect. Thus, the quasi-scientific justification for female supremacy is given the appearance of academic credibility, at least for the scientifically illiterate. This provides a rationalization for such rhetoric as the now infamous radical hub call for male exterminating eugenics, as written by Simon and Schuster novelist Pamela O'Shaughnessy. Hi Pam.

Obviously, these two doctrines are mutually exclusive, which is why they are rarely argued at the same time, except by the sloppiest and intellectually laziest of gender ideologues. However, these two doctrines are switched back and forth by radical feminists dependent on what justification is called for, or what abrogation of the human rights of outsiders needs justification.

These two dogmas, and the facility with which they are used to prop up what would otherwise be ethically untenable arguments from gender ideologues also serve to illustrate why the apparent alliance between those gender ideologues and the gay, bisexual or transexual activists appears to outsiders so utterly self destructive on the part of those gay, bi or trans activists.

However, the MRM, while it is not condemning of gay, bisexual, or trans-gender rights activism is not an explicitly pro-gay, bi, or trans-activist movement. In particular, transexual activist writing does not find a home on strongly pro MRM sites like AVfM, not because trans-identified individuals are unwelcome, but because the rhetoric of a significant fraction of trans-activist writing uses the language of violence.

Taken as an example; following comments made by a gender ideologue named Cathy Brennan whose views are strongly biased against trans-identified individuals, some trans activist websites circulated a photoshoped image of a can of insect repellant, modified to read: "Rid-fem :kills radfems instantly".

Whether this style of rhetoric is informed by a real desire to do harm, or by immature idiocy is an open question. It's already true that men declaring themselves human beings of worth outside their utility to others are accustomed to an endless torrent of accusations of violence, rape-apologism and other imputed malice. Because of the character of much trans-activist rhetoric, it is unwelcome within men's rights circles. The trans community will have to demonstrate some maturity before any larger non dysfunctional activist community accepts them as allies. It may be the shared roots with radical feminists which informs the violent and occasionally frivolous content of trans-activist writing.

Much radical feminist rhetoric continues to advocate the organized large scale use of sexual violence as well as killing, and that community appears as-yet unable to self-regulate.

In spite of the often absurd and frequently violent rhetoric from trans-activist as well as radical feminist writing, those communities show no reluctance to repeatedly fall to the infantile and frankly craven tactic of imputed malice – leveled against anyone who doesn't slavishly agree with whatever half-reasoned demand is made.

Imputation of malice being a dishonest but effective rhetorical tactic to attempt to force non-conformists or philosophical opponents to refute or disprove any vile accusations hurled at them. Whatever argument is being made is derailed by the intellectually lazy practice of accusation of misogyny, oppression, violence, hatred, etc…

In response to release of files by an individual known as Agent Orange; detailing violence advocacy by some gender ideologues, some within the online trans community have taken to using the twitter hash-tag OrangeIsPatriarchy.

As that short-format micro-blogging application's limit of 140 characters concentrates thoughts down to a semi-literate essence, it should surprise nobody to see such concentrated intellectual laziness, dishonesty and hatred.

However, the regular quacking of accused misogyny and woman-hating remains, for the moment the most popular of these imputations of malice. Also, because of the seeming immaturity of many whose rhetoric employes fallacy of malevolence; the following explanation is included.

Editor's note:

The remainder of this article is written in simplified language. This has been done in an effort to be intellectually accessible to gender ideologues, and to others who may suffer learning disabilities, brain injury or other cognitive malfunction.

Feminism is not a group of people. It is an ideology.
That's a thing formed from ideas.

Many MRAs (men's rights activists) oppose the ideology of feminism.

Feminists, those who believe in feminism, are people.
But they are special people, convinced the ideas of feminism must be true.

Even though feminists are people, who they are, and what they think, are separate things.

Who you are is your identity. You cannot easily change this.
What you think are your thoughts. Your thoughts change all the time.

This is true for other people too. People's ideas and people's identities are not the same things.
Some feminists pretend their selves and their ideas are the same thing. To them, disagreement with their ideas is the same as hatred of themselves.

Of course it is harder defend an idea than to cry out : "you hate me".

Some feminists like to do what is easier, so they become skilled at saying "you hate me".

They are good at this, and many observers have forgotten that their crying is fake.

They make an awful racket, and they have been doing so for many years. This ruckus is quite disturbing to everybody else.

Many other people also like to do what is easy.
For them, it is easier to give in to children throwing tantrums than to correct their error.
This is the error in which disagreement is the same thing as hatred.

By contrast, some people don't want to do what is easier.
They prefer to do what is right.
When cranky children say: "you hate me" these individuals don't take the easy way out. They don't simply give those children whatever they demand.

Unlike things formed from ideas, women are people.
They are human beings, like you, and like me.

Hatred of people based on their identity has a special word. That word is bigotry.
Because they are people, hatred of women has a special word too. That word is misogyny.

When that word is used to describe disagreement with ideas, it is used incorrectly.

Pretending disagreement is the same as hate is a trick. It is a trick to cultivate shame, or to silence those who disagree. This trick is easier than forming logical arguments around an idea. Sadly, this trick is dishonest and lazy.

Some people are in love with their own ideas. These people know that there is a difference between themselves and their ideas. But they do not defend their ideas.
Instead, they pretend disagreement with those ideas is hate against themselves.

Some people are so much in love their own ideas, they become confused.
This confusion causes them to mix up what is themselves, and what is an idea.

When faced by disagreement, these people become angry and upset. For them, disagreement with an idea is the same as hate against themselves.

This is because they have mixed themselves up.
They have forgotten that themselves and their ideas are not the same things.

For these people, pretending disagreement is actually hate diverts attention away from their ideas.
It sometimes even distracts others if those ideas are not very good.

Bad ideas can be sheltered by distracting those who disagree.
Claiming “you hate me” or “you hate women” is dishonest and lazy, but it works well as a change of topic.

Some people who play this game of distractions are filled with hate.
Hate, for them, is a special kind of fear.

Those people filled with fear and hate will hide themselves behind their game of pretend.

So, they say those who disagree with them are also full of hate.

This is easier for them than being honest.
This game also gives them an excuse to play the role of victim.

When they talk, it sounds just like this:
you just hate women! you’re a misogynist!

To adults, these people seem to be dishonest and tiresome liars.

Dr. F Show: Big gobs

Paul Elam · 15 June 2012 · Archived copy · Original

[box icon="none"]

SEX !

There. That got your attention didn't it hhmmm ?

Yes yes yes, Paul's name is on this short announcement, but it's me, Dr. F, speaking to you right now and not him at all. The silly man actually posted this without reading it first. Wow, I mean c'mon… seriously ?

Anyway, just so you know, the Dr. F show will be bubbling and frothing out of your radio tomorrow Australian EST Sunday at 2 in the afternoon. That means 11 P.M. Saturday your time if you draw a line vertically going right through Texas.

The theme of the show is "Big Gobs". That's right, big gobs and what this means to you and what it might mean to those other lot that are the "F Word."

The show will be life… I mean live, this time, except for the phone calls I have made to some dickheads on the other end of the line. They have been recorded forever and ever and aren't going anywhere just like me.

Our Jade Michael has recorded a song that will be played for the first time and will be the opening jingle forever, and after that you'll be hearing an interview with an Aussie legend called C.J… I like C.J., as he is not as tall as me and I have more hair than him almost forever.

There will be original music and then "Post of the Week" and after that I might, (might) take your calls if (if) you behave yourself and talk about me (me) for most of the time.

A new segment called "Black Knight Corner" will be near the end and that's where Mr. Amfortas and me (me) will be sitting next to a fire with our whiskey balloons filled with beer just reflecting on live… I mean life. Think of it as a five minute off-cut from a sheep's ass that spent it's entire life prancing about the daisies in heaven and only ate organic stuff forever.

Also of note! Last week, just like Santa, I drew up a list of naughty boys and girls who did not actually listen to my show. Thanks to them, I have been spending the entire week bum rooting what amounts to an entire road-train full of chooks, mate. Disgusting turn of events it was with all the feathers and the scratching and buck-buckaaawing. The cops thought it so funny, those bastards, they almost drove of the road while taking me to see the judge.

I have their names and badge numbers and I will not be giving them back – ever.

Also, I have better things to do and bigger fries to fish. So next time you think of not listening to the show, can you please spare a thought about me (me) and how I don't like doing all this chickens and sex business ? Apart from anything else it's embarrassing walking around in public with what looks like a kind of a strange feathery knob hat with a beak.

Fatherless Day

Rick Westlake · 15 June 2012 · Archived copy · Original

A few weeks ago, we celebrated the Goddess-worshiping festival that we call Mother's Day. It's more than a day. The build-up, in advertisers touting flowers and jewelry and day-spa packages and special treats for "the Mom in your life" had gone on practically since Easter.

For restaurants, it is the busiest day of the year, a day for expansive and expensive brunch buffets, crowded with families "giving Mom a break from the kitchen" – families who needed to get the reservations weeks in advance. Flowers, a party, gifts, general lionization – it's almost like a mini-Bridezilla experience, all in worship of Mom, Glorious Mom.

I wouldn't be surprised if many single moms and divorced moms feel left-out. Without husbands to take them out to brunch, buy them the choice gifts and pay the tab. With children who have so little, after Mommy does what she pleases with the "child-support" payments (from Daddy via "Child Services"), that they can scarcely give more than hugs and perhaps a few flowers rustled out of somebody's garden.

They have only part of a thug-boyfriend's attention; after all, she's not the mother of his kids. And when the children are put to bed (there's school tomorrow, after all), she is left alone, sitting on the couch that her "ex" paid for, in the house that her "ex" paid for, with nothing for solace but a bottle of wine. Or gin. Or whatever.

The day before Mother's Day, A Voice for Men published, This Mother's Day: Daffodils for Dumpsters – a harsh scolding for the millions of women who have abortions rather than become mothers themselves. One of the comments attached to the article went off-topic, but stung me personally:

> How about instead of addressing abortion, we address the fact that mothers, even "good" mothers, do fuck-all nothing about men raised without fathers.

So we do the same thing. Hand out ribbons, black ribbons, which say, "what are you doing to make sure a mother doesn't deny a man access to his children?"
This stung me because I was raised without a father, but it's not just my own experience that demands my attention to this problem. Mom-only households were rare while I was growing up. "Single-mom families" and "divorced-mom families" are much more common today. The children from these disabled, dysfunctional families are growing up disabled themselves; subtly, emotionally disabled, in ways that hurt but that don't show in a physical sense.

There's an empty place in their hearts, a Daddy-shaped hole that neither Mommy nor her boyfriends can even patch over. There's an empty space in their learning, too; they don't learn the value of fathers. They don't get the lessons that can only be taught subliminally by that role-model in their lives. And they don't even know what they're missing – rather I should say that I grew up fatherless with only the haziest idea of what I was missing. But I knew that I had no one to play catch with me. No one to swat me when I messed with his tools, then help me build my Pinewood Derby car. No one to treat me like "his boy." No one to show me, really show me, that a man has a deserved and necessary place with his children, with his family, in his home. No one to live with me and show me what it is to be a man.

Don't even try to tell me that isn't important. I fucking-well know how important it is.

The third Sunday in June is labeled "Father's Day." It sounds like a day to celebrate and lionize Father – but if past years are any indication, the main course will be shaming for the men that “should have done better,” and vituperative scorn for the “Deadbeat Dads” who aren’t with their children.

Many of those “deadbeat dads” don’t even know they have children. Many others have had their children torn from their lives in a brutal divorce.

Some of them languish in prison because they could no longer pay ruinous child-support demands, set when they had a much better job – and before their reputations, and their employability, were ruined by their former wives’ mendacious and malicious charges of “domestic violence” and “child abuse.”

Yeah, there are thugs who don’t care, but they are very much in the minority, as are the “dads” who are not merely “deadbeat,” but actually dead; leaving, perhaps, some photos, some shiny trinkets, and a flag folded in a triangular display case.

Most fatherless kids, though, are fatherless because their mothers pushed the fathers out of their lives.

I’d like to propose some recognition for these fatherless children, and the men who would have been with them as fathers if their mothers hadn’t kicked them out. Let’s call it “Fatherless Day.”

It should be a day to remind women everywhere that their children need their Daddies, too – and all the time, not just two weekends a month. A day to remind children just how important and precious their fathers are. A time to remind fathers, themselves, that they are worthy of having a major role in their children’s lives.

And a time to remind “Daddy Government,” and its enabling whores in the Main Scream Media, that fathers are important – not just as sperm donors and ATMs, not just for paying the fuckin’ bills, but for the sake of the children.

Eunice Murphy arranged fiancé's lynching – to get his money – 1911

Robert St. Estephe · 17 June 2012 · Archived copy · Original

[box icon="none"]

FULL TEXT: Valentine, Neb., Sept. 26 – I have just come from the Rushville jail, where I "visited" Miss Eunice Murphy, a pretty frontier girl who is held without bail for inciting to murder. That, in Nebraska, is a capital offense, punishable by hanging.

Eunice doesn't look the part of a murderess. Although she is 24, she has the face and form of a girl in her teens. I couldn't detect a trace of coarseness, evil, or anything bad.

"Why, she's as nice as she can be," said one woman caller.

Yet this mere slip of a girl faces the very gallows, for, as charged, having urged a private lynching party, composed of three of her beaux and her 18-year-old brother, to hang another beau — Charles Sellers.

"There isn't a doubt in my mind," said Prosecutor Tucker, "but that Eunice persuaded these jealous suitors to hang Sellers.

Eunice's brother, Kenneth Murphy, a clean looking lad of 18; George B. Weed and Alma Weed, big strapping "cow punchers," and Harry Heath, expert "roper," Eunice's cousin, admit that they hanged Sellers.

"We did it because he threatened to kill Eunice and the rest of us," they told Sheriff Rosseter.

Sellers had been courting Miss Murphy three years. She wore a ring he had given her. She accepted other presents from him. Undoubtedly the young ranchman was head over heels in love.

The plot was hatched, according to the prosecution, at a dance. Eunice, the Weed boys and Harry Heath held a number of conferences during intermissions and Sellers, who brought Eunice to the dance, noticed it, but was not suspicious.

On the evening of the lynching the men rode off to Sellers' ranch. Sellers was asleep.

George Weed woke Sellers up with a gun at his temple and threw a rope over his head. Then the gang dragged him out, threw the rope over the arm of a telephone pole and left Sellers hanging. Then they wont home. William McGee, who was staying at Mrs. Heath's, says that while the boys were away Eunice told him that "the boys have gone over to string up Charley Sellers."

"When Harry and Kenneth returned," says McGee, "I heard Harry tell Eunice: 'It's done.'"

"'What's done?' asked Mrs. Heath."

" 'Oh, we hung Charley Sellers to a telephone pole,' coolly replied young Heath."

" 'Something had to be done,' Eunice added."

At daybreak Miss Murphy, her brother and Heath went to the little cattle town, Cody, and to the home of William Dunbar. There they told of the hanging. Dunbar told the prosecutor that "Eunice said 'she wanted to go along and help pull the rope, but the boys wouldn't let her.' Adding, 'I was to blame for the hanging, any way.'"

At noon the next day the men were arrested and rushed to the jail at Rushville under double guard to avert another lynching. They are held for first degree murder. Eunice gave herself up.

Man, Woman, Truth Radio: The Golden Uterus

Paul Elam · 18 June 2012 · Archived copy · Original

[box type="tick" icon="none"]

Going up against women in a conflict can be tough in a culture that reveres the female above the male. Whether it is in court or the court of public opinion, women tend to get a pass based on victim identity and being the "fair" sex. It creates a significant bias in their favor.

But even the exalted status of "woman," pales into insignificance when compared to the state of holiness of "mother" in our culture.

Motherhood, another term for having had a baby, elevates women from a special class to being without peer. Mothers are assumed to be wise, mature and by their very nature the perfect arbiters of what is best for children, and indeed the rest of the world. As actress Sally Fields once said, "If mothers ran the world there would be no wars."

And Sally should know. After all, she is a mother.

This is a kind of magical thinking that plays out in more than a few mothers. Or, as Dr. Palmatier has said, "A Golden Uterus (GU) is a woman who believes the very common act of giving birth is an act of such cataclysmic importance that all humanity should bow down at her feet, worship her and give her special privileges and, in some cases, a get-out-of-jail-free card just because she's reproduced. If only the physical act of giving birth could automatically make someone a good mother and a good person."

Dr. T continues:

"Simply put, it doesn't. In fact, becoming a mother can make an immature, controlling, abusive, entitled, crazy woman even worse than she was pre-baby."

Tonight, on Man, Woman, Truth Radio, Dr. T and Paul Elam will perform an examination of The Golden Uterus, that special organ in a privileged class of women that aside from being reproductive equipment, is also apparently a second brain and an additional soul that men cannot possibly have, and some women use it to claim privilege and even bully others into submission to their whims.

Our society, including our legal system, stands right behind that idea, often as it causes the destruction of lives.

Much of the show will focus on Mary Richardson Kennedy's suicide and divorce from Robert Kennedy, Jr.

The show starts tonight, June 18, 2012 at 8:00 Central Time, which is June 19 at 2:00 a.m. in London and June 19, 11 a.m. in Brisbane. The phone lines will be open at 310-388-9709. Men, and patriarchy in the church

TyphonBlue and JtO · 19 June 2012 · Archived copy · Original

Patriarchy is a word we're all familiar with, often used in the context of cultural dogma of "The patriarchy". This implies a hidden social structure threading through history, elevating men and suppressing women.

One institution, in particular, is singled out for feminist ire. The Christian Church. According to feminists; Christianity, like all Abrahamic faiths, elevates men above women.

But does it?

The existence of a male priesthood, and a male-headed nation state (the Vatican) both seem to support the feminist conception. But we are all aware of the frontman fallacy; because there is a man in the front, it does not follow that the frontman uses his power to benefit other men. Because Christianity has a male priesthood, is headed by a man and uses masculine language to refer to the God and humanity's savior, does it necessarily follow that Christianity is male favoring?

In Christian tradition of the last two millennia, the books of the New Testament provide a foundation for the spiritual identities of men and women – based on the life of the son of the creator of the universe, born of a virgin mother, and redeemer of all human beings who accept him. Of course, the apparent son of God, who in some variations of the doctrine is the human incarnation of God, fathered by himself on a virgin mother – this is a male avatar of the God on earth.

The masculinity of the Christ is usually taken as evidence for male supremacy fostered through the church and it's long influence on Western culture.

However, simply acknowledging the sex of God's son, or his avatar doesn't justify automatic assumption of male elevation. For men, spiritual identity is tied to service in the form of conformity to the doctrine of the Christ. While men may find a model for identity in the character of the son of the God, according to the books of the new testament, figure had no sexual life. This absence leaves no spiritual connection between the masculine body and the divine.

The Christ is sexless; presumptively masculine, but never actually engaging in any activity unique to his masculine body.

This stands in contrast with the story of the Virgin Mary. She, unlike the Christ, was a human woman who had a relationship with the divine mediated through her own feminine physicality. The Virgin conceived, gestated, gave birth and nursed the Infant Jesus. Absent a human father, Mary's conception, pregnancy and birth of God's avatar on Earth are all deeply and supernaturally rooted in the female body. As the mother of the Christ, Mary was the one human being who came closest to God.

The implicit stricture of making the female body the vessel of Holy Spirit while offering no corresponding connection between the divine and the male body creates a spiritual caste system with women on top and men on the bottom. But this is not the only or even the worst form of virulent misandry in Christianity.

The birth of Christ is without sin because, quite simply, it did not involve a penis. The entire mythology around the birth of Christ implicitly indicts male sexuality as the vector of original sin from generation to generation. This is not explicitly stated, but the conclusion is inescapable.

Saint Augustine of Hippo (354–430 C.E.) was a principal theologian and philosopher of the early Christianity, and credited with responsibility for the merging of Greek philosophical tradition with Judeo-Christian religious and scriptural traditions[1]. A seminal member of the early church, Augustine denigrated male sexual desire and turned the Fascinus[2] into the demon rod.

"the organ was a lever of sin: "the demon rod." Semen itself was a toxic glue, effectively damning both men and women to a state of sin, a neat one-two punch that rendered sex dirty by definition. Erections were less spiritual highs than demonic jolts, an interpretation that was to ripple through much of Western culture."[3]

Augustine's wrote City of God to discredit and undermine existing pagan traditions which did not denigrate male sexuality and were in direct competition with the Church for the hearts and minds of the citizens of Rome. In City of God he stated:

"when sexual intercourse is spoken of now, it suggests to men's thoughts not such a placid obedience to the will as is conceivable in our first parents, but such violent acting of lust as they themselves have experienced."[4]

Forget Eve. Forget the fruit of the tree of knowledge of good and evil and the Serpent. If all human women, tomorrow, conceived and gestated and gave birth without ever coming into contact with a penis, our race would be purged of original sin.

Would anyone care to speculate where Radical Feminists got their ideas from?

Indeed even mainstream feminists cling to their insistence in blaming all the world's ills on men. Not just patriarchal oppression, but domestic violence, rape, child abuse, war, financial crises; all original sin can be laid at the feet of men. Or their penises.

In Christianity a woman's experience of her body's uniquely feminine characteristics (sans male influence) brings her closer to God; a man's experience of his body's uniquely masculine characteristics drives him into damnation.

By contrast, the pagan traditions displaced by Abrahamic monotheism provided a path to spirituality for men and women through the experience of their own bodies. Women, quite obviously had then, and still retain a naturalistic spiritual identity as creators of life through the act of childbirth. This is preserved in the mythology of the Virgin Mary. But in most pagan traditions, men also have a connection to the divine through their own bodies, semen and the penis itself were both seen as symbols of divine generative power. It is this aspect of the spiritual masculine which is excised by the mythology of the Church.

"We speak of things which are now shameful, and although we try, as well as we are able, to conceive them as they were before they became shameful, […] For since that which I have been speaking of was not experienced even by those who might have experienced it—I mean our first parents (for sin and its merited banishment from Paradise anticipated this passionless generation on their part)—when sexual intercourse is spoken of now, it suggests to men's thoughts not such a placid obedience to the will as is conceivable in our first parents, but such violent acting of lust as they themselves have experienced."[4]

Christ, the asexual model of male virtue did have a female disciple, specifically Mary Magdelen. However, the gospel of Mary although it exists today in fragmentary form, was excluded from cannon. The gospel of Thomas, also excluded mentions that Mary was the favored and closest disciple of the figure we know as Jesus. Why then would the testament of both Mary and Thomas be omitted? If Christ had a scripturally acknowledged intimate relationship with a woman, this might represent a recognition of the acceptability of male sexuality.

Our culture's war against masculine identity, male sexuality and fatherhood is an old one. That war arguably began as we adopted a faith which marginalizes the role of men in procreation, idolizing a story that removes them completely from the process. The exemplar of male virtue in this theology is a man who had no natural sexual expression, although his character is designated as male. And his primary purpose was to be flogged, literally tortured for the "crimes" of others, and then bound and nailed through his limbs, still alive to an erected cruciform scaffold, to die from shock and exposure on a hilltop. And we somehow manage to claim that this religion elevates men over women?

Rather than supremacy, Christianity provides to men the role of asexual stewards of women's benefit, and sacrificial penitent, preaching the gospel of a female-deifying, male-demonizing faith. It is true that women have not historically been allowed to front this farce, but mostly because that would make the message too obvious.

But we continue to ignore all of this, and we entertain the farce that our religious institutions constitute a maleelevating, female oppressing patriarchy.

Yeah, tell us another one.

Naomi Wolf's combat rape epidemic

Paul Elam · 20 June 2012 · Archived copy · Original

Feminista Naomi Wolf has, through reciting some Department of Defense estimates, uncovered a sweeping rape epidemic in the United States military. Unfortunately, it is hidden from the world because the government itself is dominated by a pernicious "Culture of coverup[sic]," as it concerns the sexual assault of the young women who now serve on the fringes of direct combat.

According to the DoD numbers, or Wolf's interpretation of them, fully 9 percent of active duty military females, 19,000 in all, are raped every year. For this, the military manages to receive only 3,192 sexual assault reports with only 1,518 of those leading to referrals for disciplinary consideration. The final insult is a paltry 191 servicemen who were convicted at courts martial.

There are, it appears, rapes everywhere the uniform is worn. 19,000 rapes a year is 52 rapes a day! They must start raping them at the recruiter' s office to keep up those kinds of numbers. If Wolf is correct there is indeed a huge problem.

And if she is right about that, she may also be correct about a cover-up. To my knowledge the military has not been placed on special rape alert and women have not been warned against joining the armed forces.

Still, action has been taken. Emergency "non-profit" rape advocacy groups for military women are springing up like milkweeds, hanging shingles and gearing up operations. Grant requests are being written. The Pentagon has taken the matter under advisement. Perhaps Oprah and Dr. Phil have been notified (or will come sniffing).

Of course, whether any of this hoopla is worth it is contingent on Wolf's interpretation of the numbers being correct. But who am I to question 19,000 estimated, perhaps possible, but unreported sexual assaults when the estimate is provided by the same DoD that provided us with the Gulf of Tonkin, WMD, Jessica Lynch and Pat Tillman?

I won't even get picky with Wolf for complaining that, "The Department of Defense…does not keep any kind of military sex offender registry that could potentially alert soldiers and commanders, let alone law enforcement, to the presence of military sexual predators."

I do, though, wonder if she is saying the military should just put known sexual predators on a list and let them stay in uniform. Kinda hard to say with Wolf.

Seriously though, there are several almost obligatory things to do here. First would be to dismantle everything Wolf has claimed, which amounts to just another reaching, histrionic episode based on recklessly filtered data, spun by a gender ideologue.

Another would be to bring up and explore the real and actually ignored incidence of male rape in war zones, something military brass is loathe to even think about. But in this case to do these things would just be following a distraction. Let me explain.

Let's suspend common sense and fair analysis for a moment and assume that Wolf is correct, at least about the severity of the rape problem. I still can't make myself don a tin foil hat and imagine there are shifty patriarchs in The Pentagon, lording over a culture of rape cover-up, but I will stipulate the "epidemic," for the sake of argument.

My explanation for it is simple. Who but an incomprehensible moron would put women in a war zone and not expect rapes to happen?

I know, in the minds of people like Wolf, especially from her station in life, what is happening in the Middle East is not a war zone, but a field experiment in social engineering. I can't fault her too much for that as the Pentagon sees it the same way.

If Ms. Wolf wants answers to the problems, though, she would be well advised to seek understanding of what a war zone really is. She should at least try to imagine places that words like chaotic and insane don't begin to describe; places where all kinds of really bad things happen, and keep on happening, even after the war is over.

War is hell, as they say, and 97+% of American war dead are men. That is not offered up as a trade-off for women being raped, but a statement of relevant fact in that the unquestioned majority of the service members actually fighting the war are young men who have been trained and psychologically conditioned to do extreme violence without hesitation.

It's the only fucking reason they're there.

They are not only following through with their training, they are witnessing things routinely that would scar most of us inside.

These are young men, usually those with severely dumbed-down high school educations and few life options, from poor socioeconomic backgrounds, who have been prepared to step over body parts of (mostly) men, women and children, even the body parts of their friends, in order to pursue and kill people they don't even know.

They have been conditioned to dissociate from their humanity, first by a society that trains them for disposability; that values their willingness to engage in atrocities for a few hundred bucks a week. That preparation is capped off and sealed by military training and real world combat exposure. Their experience on the battlefield has proven that the training is necessary to keep them moving and killing during the conflict. They can fall apart after it's "over."

And fall apart they do. PTSD is rampant in modern combat vets. Right now, for the first time in history, the suicide deaths of male soldiers exceeds the number of those killed on the battlefield.

Consider that. This war zone is so very bad that more soldiers kill themselves after the experience than those who die at the hands of the enemy.

This is what happens when we strip away a man's humanity and turn him into a killing/dying machine; when we fill his young mind with propaganda and manipulate his aggressive capabilities for use by the government on behalf of its corporate protectorates.

When we do this; when we create a dispenser and absorber of horrendous, chronic violence, we get all kinds of bad results, even if we "win" our war. We get a suicide epidemic. We get PTSD, divorce, child abuse, alcoholism, violence and other forms of criminality. And that is just what happens after the war.

During combat we get people who murder, or "frag" each other in the field. We get torture, places like Abu Ghraib and Mai Lai. We get countless terrible acts that the public will never hear about. The field is like Vegas, what happens there, stays there. And a lot happens there.

Oh, and we get rape. I am not excusing it or condoning it, just acknowledging the unavoidable fact of it. If President Obama does not want servicewomen to get raped, even at the numbers it is actually happening, he should keep them out of war zones. The fact that they aren't actually fighting in the war should make that choice a little easier. The fact that it appears they can't even defend themselves from an alleged groper, much less defend a perimeter from armed and motivated combatants , should pretty much seal the deal.

If our society doesn't want a once decent young man from Nebraska or Arizona or Ypsilanti, Michigan to end up a threat to commit most any form of violence against anyone, then it might also behoove us as a society to quit standing by silently while the government trains young men to dominate and kill and then uses them as assets without consulting a moral compass.

It's just a thought.

What we can't do, mustn't do, is take young men, mold them into stone cold killers, and then feign shock and disappointment when the monsters we create act monstrously.

Of course, that is precisely what we are doing.

I understand the nature of the social experiment, or at least I get the basics. We need to see if we can somehow create men who will fight and die, employing all manner of deadly tactics, right down to killing the enemy with their bare hands, but won't practice any of that violence or aggression except as instructed. We need obedient, focused killers who can shut off the violence and still their tortured minds on command.

We want demons who will mow down strangers or go get the stranded kitty out of the tree, depending on which way we point when we snap our fingers.

Fat chance.

Ms. Wolf should remember that these are not the men she set out to undermine years ago. They are the sons and grandsons of those men; men that are a product of feminism's "success."

Many of these young men grew up without fathers; without the stabilizing influence of men, whose job it once was to lead young men from bravado to maturity, but who were not there because they were demonized and cast out of their homes. It already inflicts many young men with an atrophy of character; a tendency to being somewhat feral. Think gangs, Gamers and pick up artists. Think potential rapists, too.

If these men are more prone to suicide and other forms of violence than generations before them, it does not seem too much of a stretch to imagine they may be more capable of rape.

But in the end, we are still dealing with distraction. We still have not gotten to the real point of Wolf's piece, which is not really about rape.It's about feminist doctrine and it is about control.

The tell here is the alleged rape victim trotted out by Wolf for her article. Kori Cioca, of the Coast Guard, claims she was raped by a commanding officer. Wolf calls it a "rape" in her article, though the officer was not charged with or convicted of raping her.

He apparently broke Cioca's jaw during an altercation, something that happens in the military from time to time, but he denies it was a sexual assault and he was never officially even accused of it. Back to the tell, though, it comes out in a quote from Cioca in the article.

> He didn't rape me because I was pretty or because he wanted to have sex with me; he raped me because he hated me.

Of course, there's the rub. Rape is about power, in this case driven by hate, not sex. Straight out of women's studies, 101. I am not even saying she wasn't raped. Fact is, no one but Cioca and the accused knows for sure, but the gender-political flavor of her statement is clear; suitable for framing and picture perfect in the realm of pro-feminist media sound bites.

Possible translation: The assault was not a rape, and I lied. Now I want money (the "victim" is suing the DoD).

In the midst of Wolf's smokescreen of estimated ersatz rapes, which unlike the Cioca case, never even reached accusation; in the midst of fair damsels wailing for help, calls for military sexual predator registries and stacks of grant applications, there is an unfortunate but clear reminder of modern realities.

Rape is about power…for the sexual grievance industry, and for gender ideologues whose bread and butter is convoys of victims. And it is about control, which is why we see feminists now headed for the modern battlefield, not to take arms and fight alongside the men as equals, but to ensure women's marginal efforts in war zones, compared to men, are accomplished without the horrors of war ever falling in their laps.

The battlefield for men will remain largely the same; bullets, blood, torture, rape, terror; crash and burn when it is over. The military, as it has always done, will pursue rapists, real and imagined, and punish them harshly.

For women, their already privileged status in the military will improve. It will be chaperones and attorneys; battalion level babysitters and lots of time “in the rear with the gear” to complain about the conditions and not get shot at.

So we can sit back here and wait with Naomi as she hopes her ideas of military priority gain traction, and they probably will.

How long before we have a Dear Colleague Letter for the armed services issued from the President or from the Joint Chiefs? How long before the military recognizes, if they have not already, that they can exert even more power over their pawns with a special policy to deal with supposed rapes? How long before alleging rape gets added to the list with pregnancy and other factors that equate to a ticket home and special benefits for the accusers? How long before they teach the male troops to not only hate, but fear the women in uniform who cross their paths from time to time, even as they are bearing the brunt of hostilities for those same, specially coddled “soldiers”?

Not so long, I am thinking. Take Back the Combat Zone Rally, anyone?

[box]What does the phrase, endlessly repeated in our media “women and children” tell us? Whenever there is a tragedy, a disaster, or a report of the deaths of people, we hear this phrase “women and children.” This is what makes a tragedy special. This is what makes us, the listeners at home, sit up and take notice. It is the code phrase which tells us who we should care about, and who matters in the calculus of human damage.

Women and children are the ones who matter. Men, by the implication of constant exclusion, even in mention of the deaths of men, don’t matter. And we – as human beings, if we happen to be men – those never-mentioned humans whose humanity is hidden behind the names of our jobs when we die – we are constantly reminded by the special mention of women and children that we do not count. We are not humans, and our only worth is in our use to the humans who do matter. Women, and to a lesser degree, children.

13 reasons it's unlucky to be a man

Glen Poole · 22 June 2012 · Archived copy · Original

When your life is committed to helping the world work for everyone – men and boys included – it's easy to forget that most people don't see the inequality and discrimination that men and boys face on a daily basis.

So to help us spread the word about the desperate need to help men and boys live longer, happier, healthier lives we are developing a list of THE THIRTEEN WAYS THE WORLD DOESN'T WORK FOR MEN AND BOYS. We welcome your feeback on the first draft of this document which we will be developing over the coming weeks and months.

1. LIFE EXPECTANCY

From the moment they are born, boys all over the world are destined to live shorter lives, most notably boys in Swaziland who, at 31 years, have a life expectancy 56 years shorter than girls born in Japan who will live to 87.

In the City of Brighton & Hove in England, boys from the poorest neighbourhoods die THIRTEEN YEARS SOONER than girls from the richest areas and yet women's projects still receive THIRTEEN TIMES MORE FUNDING THAN MEN'S PROJECTS

Amazingly, girls in Iraq (71.3), India (72.6) and Indonesia (73.4) now live longer than a boy born in East Brighton (70.9 years).

2. EDUCATION

Boys now underperform girls at every stage of education, are less likely to attend university and FOUR TIMES MORE LIKELY TO BE PERMANENTLY EXCLUDED FROM SCHOOL – an issue which is particularly troublesome for boys as 90% of boys aged 15-18 in prison were excluded from school (compared with 40% of girls) and excluded boys and girls are 19 times more likely to commit suicide.

Interestingly, while boys make up 80% of excluded pupils the Coalition Government only highlights the higher rate of exclusions of African Caribbean boys ignoring the plight of poor white boys failing in schools.

3. EMPLOYMENT

In general men do more paid work than women. They work longer hours, take less time off sick, throw less sickies and when they are out of work, men are three times more likely to be on Job Seekers Allowance and looking for work.

Men are 50% more likely to work full-time, three times more likely to be self-employed and when they have children, mums are four times more likely to not be working than dads. Overall 79% of UK men work compared to 70% of women.

At the same time, research shows that men do more than their fair share of household and domestic chores. Amongst young people not in education, employment and training (NEETS), young men are twice as likely to be a NEET with no identifiable barrier to education, employment and training.

And while men on average are pulling their weight at home and putting more hours in at work, women (20%) are twice as likely to be economically inactive and are more likely to be being taken care of financially by a partner, an ex partner or the state. In contrast, when you consider who is economically inactive, men are three times more likely to be actively looking for work (ie on Job Seekers Allowance).

4. SOCIAL DIVIDE

There has been a great deal of focus on the need for the UK workforce to reflect the diversity of the population it serves in recent years. The logic is that the public sector cannot be effective in helping the communities it serves if it does not reflect the diversity of those communities.

As a result we have seen positive action to recruit more people from across the six equalities groups – ethnicity, sexuality, disability, religions, age and gender.

But when it comes to gender, while more men than women work and are looking for work the gender focus in the public sector where men are massively under-represented has been placed firmly on women.

Meanwhile, the overwhelming majority of education, health and social care staff are female – while the majority of people who do badly in education, die young and end up in care are men and boys.

The logic of the diversity argument which suggests that a public sector that is under-representative of one group (in this case men) – is less capable of serving men and boys, seems to be borne out in this case.

This is a particularly worrying state of affairs for boys who are far less likely than girls to grow up around same sex role models and mentors. One in four children now grow up in fatherless families and are nine times more likely to commit crimes than children living with their mum and dad.

In addition, 98% of childcare workers are women, one in four primary schools have no male teachers and boys under 12 are seven times more likely to be taught by a woman teacher than a male teacher. Within this context, boys grow into men with low male social capital.

According to the Office for National Statistics General Household Survey, 2000/01, a person with low social capital is typically male and will be poorly edudcated, under 30, single, unemployed or on a low income and living in rented accommodation in a deprived neighbourhood

It seems the lack of male role models in families and communities is helping produce a lost generation of young men with worrying impacts with recent research showing that Fatherless boys are three times more likely to be suicidal and boys without a male role model are three times more likely to be depressed.

And according to the Children's Workforce Development Council (CWDC), while a third of boys growing up with lone mothers have less than 1 hour a day of contact with a man, two-thirds of single mums say they would welcome a man being involved in the care and development of their young children.

5. WORK LIFE CHOICES

There is a growing acceptance that men have a narrower selection of work life choices than women, driven by emerging research challenging conventional thinking on the gender pay gap which challenges conventional thinking on the pay gap championed in the Equal Pay: Where Next? report promoted by The Equality and Human Rights Commission, The Fawcett Society, The TUC and Unison.

New research in the US suggests that the pay gap is a healthy sign that women have more opportunities to choose family-friendly, flexible jobs.

It's important to note that male graduates are now 50% more likely to be unemployed, women now earn more than men in the UK in their twenties and that the big difference in men and women's average earnings kicks in when they become parents and prioritise their children with one parent (usually mum) working less while the other parent (usually dad) works more.

Research from the Equalities and Human Rights Commission in the UK reveals that 53% of fathers and 52% of mothers with children under 1 year old say dads spend too little time with their children.

The same research shows that dads are twice as likely as mums to feel that they spend too little time with their children.

Meanwhile, a new report called Work Life Balance: Working For Fathers? report by the charity Working Families and Dr Caroline Gatrell at Lancaster University supports the theory that being the main breadwinner is no fun for men with 82% of fathers saying they want to spend more time with their families.

6. VIOLENCE

Men and boys are twice as likely to be victims of violence than women and girls. Internationally two thirds of the 1.6 million people who die violent deaths every year are men and boys – and yet the United Nations PR coverage on violent deaths fails to mention that men are the biggest victims and its subsequent poster campaign on ending violent deaths men – who are two thirds of victims – by choosing 4 images of women and just two of a man. (NB: Since we first highlighted this issue in January 2011, WHO has updated the two pages referenced above to include men, though the primary focus of the poster campaign is still on violence against women – August 2011)

Locally the situation is the same with the British Crime Survey for 2001 revealing that twice as many young men in Brighton & Hove experience violence as any other group but there being no international campaign to stop violence against men and boys.

Locally (as well as nationally) there is stubborn resistance to acknowledging and dealing with the fact that 40% of domestic violence victims are male, part of the problem being that the issue is still tackled strategically within the national Violence Against Women and Girls Strategy.

Locally, while there is a well established service for female victims and an officer dedicated to supporting LGBT victims, there is no service for male victims and an "intelligent commissioning" review of services conducted in 2010 saw 53 women invited to take part in focus groups but no men – no straight men, no GBT men, no BME men, no disabled men, no old men, no young men, no boys, no male perpetrators, no male victims, no men in mutually violent relationships – just women.

It is perhaps not surprising than 41% of male tell no-one about the abuse they experience and are twice as likely to keep it to themselves as women.

This one-side approach to the issue has been picked elsewhere in the world by campaigns such as the excellent 1 in 3 domestic violence campaign in Australia.

The fact that men are the majority of all violence victims is often overlooked. In 2008/2009 in the UK 71% of murder victims were male. Men are also three times more likely to be be killed by a stranger.

Despite this the worrying trend in early intervention work has been to focus on changing boys attitude towards violence against women and girls when research on attitudes of young people towards domestic violence shows that girls and more tolerant of violence against men and boys – being 11x more likely to say it is okay for a woman to hit her partner for nagging or arguing (when compared to their attitude to men hitting women for the same reason)

Sadly, boys seem to growing up with an attitude that it's ok for them to be hit by their partner – being 15x more likely than girls to think it is okay for their partner to hit him if he was nagging or wouldn't stop arguing.

Meanwhile, the focus on early intervention work in schools remains on addressing boys and girls attitudes to violence against women and girls – and is not equally addressing our societal tolerance of violence against men and boys.

7. AVOIDABLE DEATH

Men are more likely to die from all manner of avoidable deaths being three times more likely to commit suicide, being more likely to be suffering with a serious undiagnosed illness and accounting for over 95% of employees who killed at work every year.

More men are killed at work (more than 3 a week 2007/2008) than women killed at home in domestic violence incidents (less than 2 a week) – and this doesn't include the hundreds of predominantly male workers in the armed forces killed in conflicts such as Afghanistan.

Young men are particularly vulnerable with teenage boys and young men age 15-24 in England & Wales are two and a half times as likely to die young than women and girls of the same age according to the Joseph Rowntree Foundations Poverty Site.

One hundred UK men die every month in a car accident – accounting for 71% of all victims.

More than fifty 15-24 year olds die young in England & Wales every week and the majority (71.5%) are boys and men – according to the statistics on premature male death.

8. FATHERS' RIGHTS

The lack of fathers' rights in the UK and Internationally has a broad range of impacts but is perhaps seen most starkly in the fact that according to the UK Fatherhood Institute's family fairness index just 1 in 9 UK dads having the opportunity to continue sharing the parenting of their children after separation (compared to 1 in 3 dads in Sweden).

Around 15% of fathers are not living with partner when their child is born (Kiernan, K. (2003) Unmarried parenthood: new insights from the Millennium Cohort Study. Population Trends)

Children living apart from their dads in lone parent families are twice as likely to live in poverty than children living with both parents – though the risk of poverty is reduced seven-to-eight-fold when mum is working full time.

There is a widespread failure of services to engage with of non-resident fathers – for example 31% of the non-resident fathers who have contact with their children go into their schools, compared with 75% of fathers who live at home (Nord et al, 1998) – and this may be contributing to school failure in this group.

According to the DWP what happens then is around a third (33%) of children have contact with their non-resident parent at least once a week, a third (35%) see dad less than once a week and a third (32%) have no contact at all.

Interestingly, children in lone parent families and nearly twice as likely to see their real dad regularly than children in step families seeing their non-resident parent on a more regular basis than re-partnered couple families (35% on a weekly basis compared to 18%), although the proportions that never saw their non-resident parent were similar (32% against 30% respectively).

In 2010 Harry Benson, of the Bristol Community Family Trust, undertook analysis of cenusus data using census data and found that 60 per cent of families remain intact until their children are 15 – 97 per cent of these are married.

The broad impacts of Fatherlessness in all areas of life were highlighted by the Think Tank Civitas in a 2002 report called Experiments In Living: The Fatherless Family – and the costs of Fatherlessness are now thought to be as high as £100bn and have been linked to youth offending with children with separated parents nine times more likely to commit crime.

9. MENTAL HEALTH

The UK's mental health charity Mind has described the lack of national mental health strategy for men in the UK – when there is a strategy in place for women and children – a major health inequality . Meanwhile, while men and women experience depression in equal numbers, women are twice as likely to be diagnosed for depression as men.

The experience of mentally ill men in prison is also a major concern with the Government's jails watchdog recently warning that mentally ill men are being kept in conditions as bad as "Victorian lunatic asylums".

10. DRINK AND DRUGS

In the absence of good access to mental health support men appear to self medicate and are twice as likely to be problem drinkers. Men in Brighton & Hove are also four times as likely to die of a drug related death with the city being Britain's drug death capital with one death per week in 2009.

11. SEXUAL HEALTH

A report by The Men's Health Forum revealed that the National Chlamydia Screening Programme screened fourteen times more women as men — yet it is known that men and women carry the chlamydia infection in equal numbers and that most women are infected by sexual contact with men.

Our national attitudes on sex have led us to suspect that all men are potential paedophiles and sex criminals with British Airways refusing to allow children to sit next to men incase they abuse the child and a Labour MP for Bristol calling for every man in her city to be DNA tested to find the killer of Joanna Yeates, when it turned out the suspected killer live next door.

Men and boys are also victims of men and women's sexual abuse – an issue we highlight in our blog post Six Top Sex Abuse Taboos We Must Smash.

As a result of these taboos female victims of rape are twice as likely to report as male victims and the potential number of victims of female sexual remain unheard and unhelped was hinted at when the television programme This Morning opened up a hotline for callers to talk about abuse by women. In the course of one day, they had over 1000 telephone calls. Ninety per cent of the callers had never told anyone about their abuse.

Anyone who is challenged by this important taboo should read Dr Michele Eliot's 7 page report on women who sexually abuse children here and this article tackling the notion that it's ok for women to have sex with underage boys in the wake of a case of a mother and daughter abusing a teenage family member in the US.

12. CANCER

Men are more likely to die of cancers, less likely to be screened and more likely to be living with undiagnosed cancer. Men are 1.5 times more likely to have undiagnosed bowel cancer for example and this failure to diagnose men is repeated across other health problems such as men being twice as likely to have undiagnosed diabetes.

Organisations like Cancer Research UK, spend four times more money on women's cancer than men's cancer – and yet its own research shows that showing that when you factor out sex-specific cancers men are 60 per cent more likely to get cancer than women, and 70 per cent more likely to die from it

According to Prostate Cancer Charity's research on male cancer inequalities, men with prostate cancer consistently report a significantly worse patient experience than people with other common cancers.

• Fewer men with prostate cancer receive information on side effects or how their treatment had gone

• Fewer men fully understood the explanation of how their treatment had gone

• Fewer men have a named nurse in charge of their care

• Fewer men were given information about self-help groups

• More men were likely to have to wait longer for their treatment

13. OLD AGE

Until recently in the UK men and women's retirement age was not equal – with women retiring 5 years younger than men despite living longer – cause championed by the UK charity for equal rights for men – Parity

While the retirement age has been equalised, men are still twice as likely to be working over 60 and have a shorter life expectancy. Older men also experience a retirement gap – having 7 years less than women on average to enjoy their retirement.

When you look at all the people over 65 in the UK today, twice as many of the women will still be alive at 100.

According to research by Age Concern – now Age UK – there is an increasing body of research evidence pointing out that the specific needs of older men are largely ignored in current services for older people,

The research shows that older men are more likely than older women to be excluded from wider social relationships, especially men who are divorced or never married.

Divorced and never married men are particularly susceptible to social isolation, poor health, risk behaviours (e.g. smoking and drinking) and material disadvantage than married older men.

Sandusky verdict is no victory

Paul Elam · 23 June 2012 · Archived copy · Original

Former Penn State defensive coordinator Jerry Sandusky has been called to account for his crimes. Yesterday the 68 year old was pummeled with repeated guilty verdicts on charges related to the sexual abuse of boys; charges that could result in being sentenced to as much as 442 years behind bars.

It means he will die incarcerated, depending on how long prison conditions and other inmates allow him to live. As harsh as it is, as cathartic for the victims and their families, it still won't return lost innocence or repair the broken lives.

A conviction was attainable. Justice is not so easy. And while Sandusky's victims got their well deserved day in court, it is not a victory in the real sense of the word.

The real hope in this case, as in all cases like it, was that we, as a society, had an opportunity to learn the larger lesson; we could have gleaned, from the recurring nightmares of Sandusky's making, some awareness and understanding about the nature of monsters and the devastating impact they have on the lives of male children.

In this case, however, as in all cases like it, we will learn nothing. In fact, the reaction to this case across the board demonstrates that the only lessons this culture is capable of learning are ones that teach nothing, ameliorate less and, in fact, make things worse in the long run.

Nothing illustrates that better than the sanctimonious mob coverage of this story, which is now spreading through the mainstream media like free crack in a tenement. That would be the same mainstream media, and sadly the same justice system, that would have quickly issued some kind of a pass if Sandusky were a woman.

The justice system, rife with the anti-male and homophobic leanings common to public sentiment, actually worked in this case, but only in spite of itself. There is a long and irrefutable track record to prove it. The trial results were a half victory regarding a half addressed problem, rousing cheers from a half aware public.

I can almost hear the groans now, some of them coming from MRA's. I don't care. The media coverage of this tragic story, along with much of public sentiment, is a myopic and ignorant mixture of misandry and homophobia. Sure, what Sandusky did was beyond despicable, and it hardly makes anyone misandric or homophobic to feel that way, but I have to wonder how much triumphant snorting and "justice has prevailed," backslapping would be going on if Sandusky had been a straight woman.

[box type="alert" icon="none"]Author's note: Yes, I know that Sandusky, like many other male pedophiles that target boys, is not "gay" per se. But we are not talking about his orientation as much as public reaction to what he did. [/box]

The question remains, though. Would the abuser in this case, if female, be given 442 years in prison, or a slap on princesses frail little wrist and a book tour? You know the answer.

The victims in this case were just lucky that Sandusky is a man. Without that, they would have likely never had their day in court. They only got some measure of vindication because their assailant has a penis, and in spite of the fact that they have penises, too.

Real public outrage is saved for the girls. As a society we feign indignation about what happens to boys, but only when their attackers are same sex. It is especially likely to produce a cause célèbre when the alleged perpetrator/s are linked to what is commonly perceived to be a patriarchal domain. Like say, football, or the Catholic Church.

Compare that to the media coverage, legal repercussions and public sentiment where it concerns female dominated areas like teaching, where the sexual abuse of children continues with no real public outrage. In fact, the reaction is just the opposite of what we are seeing in the Sandusky case.

For those of you who have not seen it, check out this World Net Daily article containing a partial, but still shockingly long list of female perpetrators, many of them special education teachers who targeted emotionally/mentally disabled boys for sexual predation.

If you went through that incredible list of perpetrators and added up all the sentences you would be hard pressed to come up with 442 years. In many of the cases you come up with little or no punishment at all. And in some cases, as with child molester Debra LaFave, you find women who are rewarded with public notoriety and adulation, even when disregarding court orders to stay away from their victims.

That is on the legal end. But what of the media? Well, the take on female predators from the Houston Press, a rag local to my area, was straightforward enough. They gave us, "The 10 Hottest Women on the Texas Sex Offender List," which included such babe-a-licious offerings as Ester Welty, who was busted for sexual contact with a 4 year old boy, and Sharon Beth Faubian of Ft. Worth , who was given a six year sentence for the aggravated sexual assault of a two year old boy.

According to the records, she will be back on the streets about now.

If that is not sick enough, consider pedophilia advocate Adam Sandler's new movie, "That's My Boy," a heartwarming tale revolving around a school boy who was emotionally and sexually abused, raped, by a female predator who happened to be his grade school teacher.

The movie sure strikes a chord with perpetrators and some of their victims. Known child abuser Mary Kay Letourneau's husband, Vili Fualaau, who was groomed and sexually abused by her at 13 years old., and was later allowed to marry her, is apparently going to enjoy the movie with his wife/abuser. He is quoted in a recent MSN article as saying:

> "We're talking about my life and a young boy banging his hot teacher … what's not to like about that?!"

One has to admit, with male victims rationalizing what happened to them in this way (which they often do as long as a way to cover the internal turmoil), it does make it harder on the victims suffering silently. Perhaps a more sobering look at other victims, ones not enjoying notoriety with their abusers, will help.

In 1994 David Lisak, Ph. D., interviewed 26 male sexual abuse victims, many of whom were molested by women. Unlike Fualaau, their memories of their abuse are not a source of sexual heat or the subject of good-natured banter with friends. In fact, their long term reactions, categorized by Lisak, are alarming. They are as follows:

[unordered_list style="arrow"]

- Anger
- Betrayal
- Fear
- Helplessness
- Homosexuality Issues (for those abused by men)
- Isolation and Alienation
- Legitimacy (being able to take the abuse and its effect seriously)
- Loss

- Masculinity Issues (being OK about being male)
- Negative Childhood Peer Relations
- Negative Schemas About People (difficulty trusting others)
- Negative Schemas About the Self (feeling bad about one's self)
- Problems with Sexuality
- Self Blame/Guilt
- Shame/Humiliation

[/unordered_list]

The Lisak paper includes interview quotes that were taken from a random sampling of the 26 victims. Perhaps child molesters like Letourneau, and pedophilia advocates like Adam Sandler should have looked past their own petty sexual gratification at the real results.

Said one victim:

> I just had to put up with it. That's the way she was. They were her rules. If she said I have to kiss her, I have to kiss her. If she says I have to hug her, I have to hug her. It was like I kept trying to fill her cup and it just kept running out. And she is standing there screaming "Fill it, fill it, fill it!"

And another telling young man who said:

> So they [women] can see themselves as victims. Maybe they can see themselves that victims are okay, they're good somehow, they martyred themselves. Some way if you can have a black and white, good or evil, women were good and men were bad. Well, I'm the victim, but I'm a guy, and guys are bad. So I can't even be a victim, right?

It is almost funny, isn't it? It appears like no one has to explain the issues of the MRM to a boy who is a victim of a female sexual predator. Just imagine what that means. Is that what it takes for some men to "get it"?

I am afraid the answer is yes, and that is a tragedy that we see played out across the culture each and every time this subject rears its ugly head.

How fucked up is this planet that in order to be seen as a male victim of sexual abuse that your perpetrator must also be male? It's only bad, it's only real, it only counts, when it's a homo. We have a well-educated public. They know full well that boys cannot be harmed by women. They follow through with that knowledge brutally. So if a woman destroys your life before it really gets started, you can only hope to end up in a study that will be noticed by a few academicians and a handful of MRA's. That is what we do to boys, after they are abused.

If you have a male child unfortunate enough to be molested, and you want any real justice or compassion for him, you better hope his assailant is a man. For male victims it is the only way that this society is going to give a shit about what happened to them. And that is only because they hate gay men, or men who choose same sex children for predation, about as much as they hate you.

Sweden: empire of governance feminism

Greg Canning · 23 June 2012 · Archived copy · Original

For many of us the extremist brand of gender feminism that has permeated Swedish culture and politics came acutely into focus last year. The YouTube video of a group of female students murdering a man reading a newspaper and their ecstatic post murder dance celebrations, revealing that exposure to and advocacy of male genderocide, is an accepted part of the Swedish education systems indoctrination of their youth, "do your part." [1]

Letters to Australian parliamentarians including the then Foreign Minister Kevin Rudd asking for our government to expresses diplomatic alarm at such vilification on the basis of sex, fell on deaf ears. An AVFM commentator provided a link to the Swedish documentary (with English subtitles) "The Gender War" (Könskriget) by journalist Evin Rubar, which is highly recommended viewing for anyone who has not yet seen it and interested in the truth about Swedish feminism. [2]

The most disturbing aspect of this documentary is the confirmation that the central tenants of radical feminism have been accepted in Sweden as core political orthodoxy and all aspects of legislation and government services must adhere to it's "gender correct" understanding of male dominance and oppression.

Veteran Aussie broadcaster Phillip Adams recently interviewed Oscar Swartz the author of a new book, A Brief History of Swedish Sex: How the Nation That Gave Us Free Love Redefined Rape and Declared War on Julian Assange. [3]

Adam's introduces the Radio National show with a quote from an expatriate Swede now a professor at the University of Chicago:

> From being admired and envied by many as beacons of sexual enlightenment from the 60's the Scandinavian countries today have some of the most repressive sex laws in the western world, Sweden in the most draconian. The message conveyed by recent laws is clear – your sexuality is the property of the state and the state will claim its right to regulate and punish that sexuality wherever you may be.

Swartz's book tells in chilling detail how this situation has come about. It presents, as a time line, events that made headlines (from the 1950's to early 2012), quotes from parliamentary records and the public speeches and writings of the key players. Minimal commentary is offered, as the author believes these items speak for themselves and don't require embellishment.

In Part 1 Swartz illustrates The Rise of Swedish Sin with pioneering sex liberals arguing for women to have the same sexual freedoms as men (were presumed to have), and that this should also be extended to those often excluded from enjoyment of sex such as the unattractive, physically and intellectually disabled, elderly, ill, infirm and even the imprisoned. The impact of Swedish films, which routinely breached decency laws in other western countries, the growth of the sex club industry, and acceptance of mid teenage sex as healthy normality are all detailed.

Part 2, titled The Fall of Swedish Sin, shows the ideological U-turn initiated by radical feminists that now viewed sex as a tool of power and dominance wielded by men and over women. Sex, they argued, should only be tolerated in committed and loving relationships. Male sexuality was demonized and increasingly criminalized and punished to shame men into behaving in more "relationship oriented" ways. Covered in this part is first the redefining of rape and the introduction of the "Sex Purchase Act," which criminalizes purchasing of sex from prostitutes but not the selling of sex by prostitutes, who are seen as misguided victims of patriarchal oppression.

Part 3 is called the War on Sex and exposes the absurdity of many of the public arguments and actions of powerful radical feminists. In the ideological but disproven belief that pornography causes sexual violence, regulations are enacted to insist government funded hotel use will only be at "porn free" hotels, that is hotels where adult content is not available for purchase on in-house entertainment systems. Subsequently late night adult content on cable TV is banned.

Despite being acknowledged as one of the most gender equal societies in the world, feminist politicians regularly describe average Swedish men as comparable to the Taliban and Sweden as like Afghanistan so far as its treatment of women is concerned. The outrageous claims regarding sex trafficking and the supposed ramping-up of prostitution in Germany in "preparation" for the FIFA world cup in 2006 highlighted to an international audience the insanity of Sweden's state delusions. Calls were made for the UN and Amnesty International to intervene and Sweden to withdraw from the EU in protest. This would be comparable to US government acting on the Super-Bowl / DV myth amplified thousands of times.

In the fourth and final part The War on Men, "progressive" strategies in enforcing the Sex Purchase Act are revealed. Hotel staff are trained in how to spot potential sex purchasers and instructed to report suspects immediately to the police, whose special "sex agents" are dispatched to listen outside the hotel rooms and sweep in for an arrest if sounds of sexual activity are heard. Hotel employees are provided with contact cards and posters placed in staff rooms, hotels performing well are more likely to receive government-funded business.

Meanwhile special sex units tail known and suspected prostitutes to track down men who might illegally pay them for sex. Further, changes to the definition of rape include the addition of "pleading" for sex, now considered a type of "sexual coercion and molestation," or sex that even years later a women did not feel good about. Everyday sexual encounters between consenting adults can now be turned into legal nightmares, with rape defined not by the intent of the accused or the belief of the supposed victim but by only be trained legal personal who truly understand what is meant by rape under Sweden's legislation. The increasingly severe penalties for rape are contrasted with the leniency of sentencing for grossly violent assaults.

Naturally the Swedish tourist groups do not detail these repressive laws in their glossy brochures, and many tourists are still under the illusion that Sweden is a sexually liberal country, like it's neighbor Denmark. Yet the rate of rape in Sweden is reportedly 8 times higher than Denmark and second highest in the world after Lesotho in Africa.

The details of the Assange case also emerge including the probability that part of the motive for it was as a distraction from prolonged unsavory national media focus in the lead up to an election when two Social Democratic Workers Party candidates are caught purchasing sex while staying in a union flat.

One of Assange's accusers is well known Radfem Anna Ardin who had published on her blog "Rebella"[4] a list of how women could legally take revenge on an unfaithful partner – including sabotage of his new relationship, enticing his new partner to be unfaithful, having "a lunatic" stalk him, and sending letters and photos to make the new partner believe he still has a relationship with the avenger herself.

The sordid details of the Assange case and interference from politicians and bureaucrats in the legal procedures around draconian gendered legislation will have to wait for another article. Assnage's barrister has, however, correctly stated:

> It is not Julian Assange that is on trial here, but Sweden and its reputation as a modern and model country with rules of law.

Not unexpectedly, Assange has received no useful support from Australia's current feminist labor government, and is now seeking asylum in the Ecuadorian Embassy in London. [5] However, in another recent case of an Australian female solicitor detained in Lybia on suspicion of espionage, the new foreign minister Bob Carr is immediately dispatched to assist. Well, after all she deserves it. She's a mother. [6]

A Swedish feminist academic from Monash University in Victoria Dr. Johan Lidberg,[7] joined Swartz in the radio national interview to represent the "counter viewpoint." He believes the Swedish laws are not a war on sex or on men but simply supporting a women's right to say no to sex at whatever stage of a sex act she determines. He applauds such laws as being beneficial in reducing exploitation of women and human trafficking for sex. He denies the existence of "state feminism"[8] in Sweden and argues that women as still not empowered, citing the usual unequal representation on company boards, gender pay gap, more male professors etc.

Yes, that's feminist logic for you – convicting more men of rape helps empower women and is necessary to improve numerical equivalence of gender outcomes, Dr. Flood and underling Fisher would be proud of Johan!

There is no doubt that gender ideologues in Australia, who echo their Swedish sisters dogma almost verbatim, covet such a situation existing here and are planning for it.[9]

The unconstitutional, feminist Labor organization EMILYS List (EMILY's List is an acronym that means Early Money Is Like Yeast "it makes the dough rise") has, as its core aim, feminist control of the Australian Government and imposition of a feminist agenda on the electorate.[10] Emily's list has a sex discriminatory constitution allowing full membership only to women.

Whilst the objectives of Emily's list outlined on their public website might appear relatively tame at first glance, the organization is strongly supported by radical feminists and academics whose true motives and male hatred we have come to know well.

The most important video you will watch this week

Paul Elam · 24 June 2012 · Archived copy · Original

Sometimes, usually when a video is really good, I break our normal formatting and post it here with the featured articles. This time I am doing it because the video is not only good, but very important.

It comes from DannyboyCdnMRA over on youtube. It documents his intereaction with the office of the Attorney General of Ontario in regard to the complete lack of services for men who are abused by their spouses.

If you want to help, please sub to his channel and and pass this video around everywhere. Danny is working diligently, on his own, to bring needed attention to this serious problem.

If you are from the Ontario area, perhaps you could make contact with him and join his work on this project. I am sure he will be willing to update us with more videos like this one as more happens. MRA's are now organizing and meeting on the ground in Vancouver with JtO, which is a great example of us moving to the next, needed stop.

The work Danny is doing in Ontairio could use the same kind of support. Please help him. Thanks PE

Altobelli's Dilemma: The failure of Australian family law

Jim Muldoon · 24 June 2012 · Archived copy · Original

On May 30, 2012 Federal Magistrate Altobelli gave his reasons for the judgement he made in Gaylard v Cain in the Federal Family Court of Australia (Altobelli, 2012). This judgement showed that, beyond all doubt, the Family Law system is corrupt.

The overall result of the decision is that the mother has sole care of the children and the father is banned from making any contact with them. Clearly uncomfortable with his own decision, Altobelli decided to write a letter to the children explaining his decision and urging them to seek a relationship with their father.

No, you read the last paragraph correctly. He banned the father from seeing the children. Then, he wrote a letter to the children saying you should see your father.

In this letter, and in his judgement, he describes his own anguish at not being able to find a better solution. The conundrum, if you take it at face value, is this:

The law states that the children must have a relationship with both parents unless there is a realistic danger of abuse. The mother claimed that the father is likely to sexually abuse the children. According to the magistrate (in paragraph 2 of his judgement) this "perception of the father is based on illusion not reality."

What is very real, however, is that the mother has alienated the father from his children by turning them against him. This has resulted in the children making statements to the effect that they want nothing to do with their father.

Thus, the proper application of the law, that the children should have a relationship with both parents, will put the children under dreadful stress if they are compelled by the orders to see their father.

What is a poor magistrate to do?

Altobelli's view is, in the paragraph 1, "In any event the orders I make in this case bear scant resemblance to any idealized notion of best interests and look pragmatically more like the least worst alternative."

Altobelli's judgement, however, is disingenuous to say the least, and it shows how the legal system is a complete failure at its core. There are so many reasons for this failure that it is hard to count them all.

Here are seven that spring to mind.

First, it is clear from Altobelli's statement above that the law's primary objective, that the orders must be made in the child's best interest, has been thwarted.

The thwarting has come from a corruption of the decision making process itself, which brings us to the second reason.

Courts make legally binding decisions. It is a cornerstone of democracy that these decisions should be based on the facts and the law. The extent that the outcomes of the court are generated by the influence of individuals for their own benefit, rather than the facts of the case or application of the law, is a measure of the corruption of the court.

In this case, the mother is not just influencing the court, but dictating to Altobelli what the outcome should be. By manipulating the children and interfering with the previous attempts to re-unite the father with his children, the mother has essentially established a new status quo. In paragraph 68 Altobelli describers it thus, "At the moment, however, the children's world of relationships has been drastically changed because of their alienation."

Essentially, because of this, Altobelli decides to adopt Dr. K's preferred recommendation of 'tactical retreat', which is to leave the mother with her victory of the children, and let the dust settle.

In all practical aspects that affect the children themselves, best interests or not, Altobelli is simply rubber-stamping the mother's decision, even if it takes him 102 paragraphs of gristle-chewing to do so.

However, this rubber stamping is not simply a benign administrative duty, and leads us to the third reason why the legal system is a complete failure.

The father is now under the shadow of these court orders. If he should try to make contact with the children, a normal thing for a father to do, he will now be guilty of a crime punishable by fines and/or imprisonment. Even if he should accidentally meet these children in a shopping centre, or any other public place, he will be in danger of criminal action simply for saying “Hello”.

The father is in this state, not because he is a danger to his children, or has committed any crime in the past, but because the magistrate allowed the mother to make the decision for him. This is, in effect, a probationary sentence on an innocent man.

The fourth reason is that Altobelli disingenuously ignores one important, and by far the most powerful, actor in the situation: The courts.

Consider this statement from paragraph 8,

> It is common ground that the father has not spent any meaningful time with the children since December 2010. Whilst a number of attempts were made to facilitate supervised contact after that date, none were successful.

What Altobelli is hiding is that since proceedings began in the courts, before December 2010, the only access the father was allowed by the courts was supervised contact; that the mother prevented this access means that she overrode court orders and the fact that there was no sanction on the mother indicates the courts, by de facto, allowed this to happen.

So the courts provided the mother with unfettered access to the children to break the law by alienating them from their father; and made sure that the father could not interfere to protect his children.

The fifth reason may seem philosophical in nature, but its relevance is seen in Altobelli’s angst.

Rather than being a venue for deciding, with proper rules of argument, what happened in the past, the Family Court’s focus is on what will happen in the future. That the law makers thought this possible, never mind practical, is arrogance beyond description.

Altobelli shows his difficulty with his task in paragraph 82 of his judgement: “On the one hand it was clear that I was contemplating orders that would probably mean these children would not see their father for many, many years, and possibly mean they would not see him ever again. On the other hand Dr K. was stating that in his expert opinion it was likely these children would, one day in the future, want to re-establish a relationship with their father, and make their own decisions. This might happen as early as the children’s adolescence, or during their adult years, or perhaps not at all.”

Clearly, Altobelli has no clue as to the outcome of his decision. Equally as clearly, the expert Dr K is more expert at hedging his bets than predicting the outcome for these children. The only firm statement from the two future gazers is that the possibilities are many, but don’t hold them to that.

The eye to the future, however, is what allows Altobelli to sidestep the mother’s breaching of court orders during this lengthy case, and her refusal to comply with any orders that allow the children access to the father. In other words, the potential harm in a possible future overrides the very real harm that has happened illegally to date.

However clever Altobelli and Dr K might be, they have no idea what events are in store for the members of the family over the next three weeks, never mind years of constant change as the children mature. To assess how a child will react to something at age 14, when you’ve met them for a day at age 7 or 8 is impossible. There certainly is no single study, never mind a body of evidence, that would support Dr K’s views or Altobelli’s decision.

Altobelli's conscience clearly doesn't sit well with him. He therefore writes a letter which is to be given to the children when they turn 14 years old, urging the children to consider seeing their father.

The responsibility, therefore, will fall on a 14 year old child to request Relationships Australia therapists to facilitate some sort of communication with the father, irrespective of the fallout that will occur when the mother finds out. That is, of course, assuming that the mother, who knows about the letter, takes the children to the therapist.

Altobelli again shows his complete inability to assess the future circumstances when he states, "The role of the children's mother in facilitating or obstructing this [the children reading the letter] is something neither Dr K. nor I can predict or control."

This brings us to the sixth reason why the court is corrupt: bigotry in the form of misandry informs its decision. I don't say this simply because the father, being male, lost the case.

Consider how flummoxed Altobelli and Dr. K. were by the mother's intransigence. Yet the father was not allowed to have his children because, in paragraph 55, Altobelli states: "He [the father] could not convincingly articulate how, for example, he would deal with two alienated children with whom he no longer had a relationship, and who did not want to be there with him."

For my money, that simply puts the father in the same boat as Altobelli and Dr. K.: he doesn't know how to stop the mother's manipulation either. But let us not forget that the father has a bigger problem than the magistrate. His problem in reality is this: how does he counter the mother's manipulations while the court's interference empowers her?

Clearly the unstated issue here is that the mother is, after all, the mother; and therefore her relationship with the children comes first.

She didn't just fail to "convincingly articulate"; she positively assured them that she will make all efforts to continue to break the law by refusing to allow access, and backed up these words by breaking the law. Whatever harm the father might inadvertently do, the mother guarantees intentional harm by deliberately breaking the law.

In other words, Altobelli's orders are designed to make the mother's illegal behavior legal. Even if Altobelli's motivation is blindly gynocentric in its intent, and that's being kind, it is misandric in effect.

Also consider again the inability to predict the future. What does not come up once in Altobelli's ruminations about the future is that the father might not be available because of the future choices he might make in his life. No, the magistrate simply assumes that the father will remain, like a stuffed toy, in the cupboard awaiting a summons to participate in a relationship with his children. The father has no other purpose in life.

This brings us to the seventh and final reason why the law is a failure. Altobelli cites the law as directing him to considered these children's best interests, and not children in general's best interests.

For this reason he can ignore yet another question: How did the mother know she could be confident that her intransigence would win the day? In most other legal situations defying the court is a recipe for disaster.

Consider another recent case, Summerby v Cadogen that was decided by the Full Court of the Family Court of Australia in October 2011 (Thackery, Strickland, & Young, 2011).

In this case a mother was ordered on four separate hearings to let a father see his child. After each hearing she simply refused to obey the orders. The result, eventually, was to make her illegal behaviour legal by again ordering that the father be banned from seeing the child. This final decision was approved by the Full Court.

So cases like Summerby v Cadogen, and this one, Gaylard v Cain, whether read in the press or heard about on the grapevine, can give a mother full confidence to make baseless accusations to get complete access to their own children. From that position, the mother can win the day by simply refusing to cooperate with the courts and let the children see their father. The courts might threaten. There might be a bit of bluster and criticism.

But, at the end of the day, the courts will most likely fold into a 'tactical retreat'. So, by feigning a focus on these particular children each time, the court can pretend blindness to its own systemic bigotry, and how spiteful mothers can easily use this to their own ends.

This case shows that the Family Court, and the laws that support it, are fundamentally corrupt. It intentionally and deliberately ignores the damage that it does to fathers and their children. Instead, it uses all the sanctimony it can wring out of "the best interests of the child" to deflect criticism while it makes bad decisions based on ideology, pop psychology and arrogance.

Summer donation drive

Paul Elam · 25 June 2012 · Archived copy · Original

Well, the summer heat has started turning the humid city of Houston into a massive sauna, which means the seasonal AVfM fundraiser is here again.

It is an annoying necessity for which many of you share credit. Because of the intense involvement of reader-activists, AVfM has grown faster than any of us ever dared to imagine. The first way we see this is with traffic. For the "old timers" here, most of you will remember back to when we posted the visitors globe announcing our first million visits. The globe was installed on the site on July 3, 2010. We hit the million mark on November 2, 2011, after almost exactly 16 months. A very good start indeed. Unless, of course, you consider where we are now, with the globe just about to hit two million visits.

The second million took less than half the time.
I must admit to being happy about that. And it points to another valuable measure of success. Anyone who pays even slight attention to what is happening in the world of gender politics knows two things. One, virulent feminism is spreading like the clap in a bordello. Two, the dialogue about matters of gender politics, e.g. false rape culture, domestic violence statistical chicanery, the abuse of boys, father's and other issues is finally making its way into the public arena. It is happening despite the rising choir of hateful voices emanating from places like the SPLC, trying to silence us. Maybe even because of it.

As should be obvious, a real change in the public discourse means an eventual change in the game. That was the intent of AVfM from the start, and we are fulfilling the plan, though we do have a long way to go. We have been remarkably successful in my book, especially given that we don't have the confiscated money of tax payers or female consumer culture supporting us like the opposition does.

What we have is you, and that has yielded slow but steady progress. A dedicated, private server, image rights, internet radio services and attorneys are a costly but necessary part of what we do. All of these expenses are recurring. So with that, please consider helping us continue to do this necessary work.

A bit of good news here is that the last fundraiser was so successful that it has allowed me to revise fundraising goal for this quarter down by two thousand dollars. The donation button is to the right near top of page, and the new address for mailing in donations is posted under “other options.”

As always, thank you in advance to those that donate, in any amount, to the fight that this website is now leading on behalf of men and boys, and in the name of justice.

Evil by proxy

John Hembling (JtO) · 25 June 2012 · Archived copy · Original

Violence has sides. Obviously, violence used by one person on another establishes an aggressor and a recipient. However, this is the most simplistic, and least frequent type of violence. In most violent situations the initiator and the performer of a violent act are separate. One person expresses offence or provides some motivation, and somebody else commits violence in response, or on the first person's behalf. This happens everywhere from interpersonal relationships to world war.

There is a relationship between the initiation of violence, and it's cost in hazard, injury and mortality to those who practice it. But this is a cost borne by the actuators of violence, and setting aside precept of a golden rule, it is the cost of violence which informs ethical repugnance to it. There is an argument to be made that only those who directly experience it's cost can be consciously moral human beings.

One of the great shames of human culture has been the proxy utilization of human beings to murder and brutalize one another by bankers, politicians and other elites in war, including women. As the First World War ground onward, young men were increasingly unwilling to die in the freezing mud of foreign trenches. To overcome their reluctance to get killed in benefit of hereditary elites and royals, The British high command under Admiral Charles Fitzgerald organized groups of women to help "convince" the men of Britain to enlist. That is, to kill and to die on behalf of their social betters.

Using public humiliation, the objective of these groups was to shame civilian men into joining the armed services. Women handed out white feathers to any man not in uniform. "The feathers were intended as a badge of disgrace, branding the men who received them as cowards" The Order of the White Feather and their recruiting methods quickly spread across Britain. Women of all backgrounds contributed their influence to the war effort." (Gullace, "White Feathers" 178)

These women saw no hypocrisy in using their social power to compel men's participation in a distant foreign war between obsolete monarchies. Of course, those women were held exempt from participation in the brutal business of trench warfare, death from dysentery, malnourishment, freezing to death, or dying on the business end of a bayonet.

The cost of joining up to do your manly duty wasn't to be carried by the women compelling those men, so there was precious little aversion to enthusiastic support for a squabble between royals. This demonstrated the conceptual disconnection between initiation of the use of violence and it's direct consequence to the actuators of that violence. To women shaming men by awarding them white feathers, the prospect of death in a foreign, mud filled ditch was an abstract consequence without any personal reality.

The connection between initiation and performance of violence – which in the case of a war is deadly violence – was missing for the women of the white feather campaigns of the first world war. Consequently, there was no moral repugnance towards their proxy initiation of deadly, murderous, and ultimately futile violence. This is what happens in human beings when initiation of violence is distanced from actuation of violence, when the hazard is carried by somebody else. Human ethics do not exist in a vacuum, they are directly connected to the economy of consequence and hazard.

We might like to convince ourselves we are ethical humans based on some pure, logical formulation of reason. But this is a conceit, because while some individuals are capable of the adult cognitive/emotive skill we call empathy, that is, fully modeling the experiences of others, a great many adults demonstrate no capacity for adult empathy. Whether this failure is socialized or innate is beyond the scope of this discussion. The conceit, for most people, is evidenced by the minimal public outrage over the routine killing of foreign civilians by military contractors employed by the US State department in overseas military adventure.

Rather than American military personnel, the use of contractors is a further displacement between force's initiation and its execution. Taken a step further, the United States now regularly uses remote control drones to kill foreigners, whether they're soldiers or civilians, turning the experience of killing into something reminiscent of a video game. The Obama administration, satisfied that sufficient distance between initiation and effect exists in the public eye, re-classified foreign male civilians as combatants, rendering their deaths through proxy of the American public inconsequential.

In the once removed murder of modern technological warfare, female civilian deaths still matter, of course. However, now that male civilians are officially designated as combatants, and thus, their murders rendered palatable – how difficult is the re-classification of females – as the only humans whose deaths matter – when killed to be counted as male. After all, it all just accountancy. They weren't women and children, they were insurgents. Just as men who die in coal mines are not men, but miners, their humanity hidden behind a job title.

And the great separation between the initiation of violence, and it's cost in corpses – means that as a society we increasingly see it as palatable. That is, when we see it in our mind's eye at all.

Of course, 5 decades ago, science fiction writers dreamed of modern computer and robot reliant societies, and speculated that advances in human technology would provide great benefit by removing the need for murders of millions we call war. Stanislaw Lem wrote about a society in which modern robotics and computers had advanced to such a degree that wars were fought robotically on uninhabited planets – and the attendant human misery, mutilation and killing we now hide from ourselves now was unnecessary and obsolete.

We are in that future now, and rather than having done away with the large scale use of violence in domestic as well as foreign policy, we use our technology to put that violence at arms length, out of sight – distancing initiation from effect and hiding the cost from ourselves.

If you kill a person by remote control, far from where you can see him die, or hear his family mourning, or hear the explosion as your elected representatives uses a drone to kill his friends and family at his funeral, are you still killing that person? Yes, but it's very easy to hide that from yourself. However, stepping away from the business of killing, lesser violence may be an even greater problem, simply because it is less obvious and gets a pass from those who it benefits.

In May of 2012, members of National Nurses Union demonstrated in public, demanding that theft be used against people other than themselves, and the proceeds of that organized theft be used to satisfy the nurses' demands for pay increases and other benefits. Of course the rhetoric used by the demonstrating nurses used an imperative to tax (as opposed to steal from) people other than themselves on financial transactions over $ 100, and then pay that money to the nurses. Some people might complain at this characterization, that taxation is not the same as theft. However, those people wouldn't be members of the nurses union, whose recognition is evident by naming their preferred plan for theft a "Robin Hood Tax".

That's right, Robin Hood, the thief and bandit from British folk literature. You with the guns, jails, police and ability to write laws, go steal from other people and give it to us. And the guys with guns, jails and legislators will be only too happy to steal that money on behalf of others, because that's the business they're in, taking a cut from every act of theft before handing that stolen money over to whoever it's supposedly for. But those nurses who are a hair's breadth from coming right out and saying "we want organized criminals to steal from other people and give us the proceeds" still cling to an illusion that they aren't actually advocating armed robbery, because by having the proxy of a huge bureaucracy to conduct that thievery and violence on their behalf, they're able to operate in pseudo-denial.

However, that denial is only partial, as they've chosen to call the plan they're pushing after the name of a fictional thief. Also, it's not the starving poor of folk tales the proceeds of that theft are to be given to, it's the job-secure fat and pampered employees of a national union.

But this is proxy violence – right out in the open, self identified in the rhetoric of those pushing it. And by the remove between the initiators of it and the actuators of it, this time in the form of a huge sprawling bureaucracy, that distance is what facilitates a pathological public ethic of violence and theft. All the rationalization in the world can't change that the nurses union is campaigning in favour of armed theft to benefit themselves.

So what is the difference between this, and the proxy use of lethal force in places like Pakistan. Where, rather than armed robbery by bureaucratic proxy, is remote control murder used with such facility? At first this is only used against the most dangerous boogiemen – such as the "leaders of terrorist cells". Then it is used to murder the friends and associates of those boogiemen. Then those remote control drones used to murder their brothers, in-laws, wives, and children at their funerals.

Now those drones are deployed in the United States, to enforce the law; law, of course, being nothing but an opinion with a gun behind it. But don't worry, because they're being run by the very good, very ethical very moral people you elected to represent you. And those people are good, and the easy, remote control, proxy separation between the initiation of force, and it's enactment by a construction of servos and software – that will never be used to hurt you. Or at least, if it's used, you can be sure the report will note that you were a very dangerous menace, perhaps an unlawful combatant, or whatever new euphemism is dreamed up to hide the fact that you or your loves ones might be murdered by remote control.

And the increasing distance of proxy between the initiation of violence and it's execution is not now and never will be the practical facilitation, enabling of a truly malevolent psychosis, or of practical evil.

Human ethics don't grow out of a vacuum. They are now and always have been tied directly to the practical motivation to limit risk to ourselves. We did not evolve in a world where software enabled our choices to kill to be expressed hundreds of miles away by other people whose names we don't know, or by robots.

If we don't keep an awareness of this, we find ourselves in a public ethic where human life is disposable, based on how well designed the software interface for killing us is. And the word for this ethic is straight out of our oldest, most atavistic religions.

To the women that aren't like that

Tom Givens · 26 June 2012 · Archived copy · Original

Although the subject of women in the MRM is not currently a hot button issue, I wanted to write a small missive to them from a nearly worn out old hand. In part, what I want to do is thank you from the bottom of my heart. I am well aware that for some of you, the road has been as long as mine (*cough*typhon*cough*) and something like this has been a long time coming. So along with my thanks comes an apology for its tardiness.

It is a comfort to know that, indeed not ALL women are 'like that' and even better some of you stand up and say something, and dammit they are quite often good something's to say.

And in no small measure it is precisely because you are not men, your unique perspective (as regards men's issues, being fully aware of them) on men being 'outside' observation. This is most definitely not to disregard or diminish in any way your viewpoints, but rather a recognition of the value of those outside viewpoints in realizing what is going on. As an example, it never occurred to me the level to which feminism infantilized women, until I read an article criticizing same.

So allow me to attempt to return the favor.

Going very far back, in the Dark Age of the MRM there was an influx of women asking what women are supposed to do. Essentially, these women asked for a belief system, a label they could attach themselves to, that would embody their belief in equality without demonizing men.

Some of these women stuck around and proudly call themselves MRAs. More of them stuck around but balked at calling themselves MRAs. And a lot of newcomer women tend to see a lot of unmasked anger, and get scared off. Which of course leads to calls for moderation, which isn't going to happen…

This cycle has endlessly repeated for decades, seemingly every week on r/mensrights.

You can see the dilemma.

Then I noticed a new subreddit called 'lady MRAs'. It's a small, but growing group that I wish every success for. And when I look at the writings and videos of the higher profile female MRAs there's one thing that strikes me as a common denominator. These women ARE what feminism pretends to be.

There is a growing body of work from these women – self aware and empathetic work that views men as partners, not competitors – that deserves to be recognized for what it is…

A replacement ideology for feminism.

Well, ok, not so much an ideology as a label to attach to basically acting like an adult, and 'owning your shit'. But you get my meaning. What you are doing is piggybacking on the MRM to formulate a new understanding for women. An answer to "what do you want me to be?" For the record…piggyback away!

I would view it as a personal favor for all men if you would consider a humble request though…

When the MRM was a few hundred guys grumbling away on discussion boards, we never got around to finding a catchy name. This means we have to describe ourselves with an acronym, with which most people are unfamiliar. In hindsight, I think that was a mistake on our part. So, could you guys think up a cool name for yourselves? Because here's the kicker…

You are forming the basis of a future belief system. You are laying the foundation for increased harmony between the sexes. You are the bridge between men and women. And what you write now may indeed show up in the textbooks of the future.

If you ask me that responsibility couldn't be in better hands.

German court says NEIN to circumcision

NCFM · 27 June 2012 · Archived copy · Original

Landmark decision from German high court outlaws male circumcision

A German court just ruled that infant male circumcision is illegal and can subject the perpetrator to prosecution for assault (just like for infant female circumcision)! This is a huge victory for the anti-circumcision movement and children's rights.

Male circumcision removes the foreskin of the penis. The foreskin contains most of the high sensory nerve endings in the penis and operates as a natural protective buffer and a lubricant.

The national medical associations in Finland, Sweden, Holland, South Africa, and elsewhere have called for a ban on infant male circumcision, which is gynecologically equivalent to removing an infant girl's clitoral hood and which is illegal in many countries. A recent report by the Dutch Medical Association explains that the male foreskin is an important erotogenic structure for which no medical benefit justifies its routine removal, that it is comparable to certain forms of female circumcision and that it violates children's rights to bodily integrity.

German high court ruled against male circumcision for religious purposes. Those who cut boys for religious reasons can now be prosecuted for assault, including doctors. Now, neither parents nor the right to freedom of religion guaranteed in the Basic Law can justify this procedure. This is the first time a German court has confirmed punishment for a religious practice.

Every year in Germany, several thousand boys are circumcised at the request of parents. In the U.S., even the majority of boys – largely independent of the religion – are circumcised right after birth. Worldwide, about one-quarter of all men are circumcised. However, massive worldwide resistance is mounting to end the horrific practice of circumcising young boys.

The court was not deterred by the fear of being criticized as anti-Semitic and anti-religious. This decision will shape the future of the debate and hopefully lead a shift in religious consciousness in respecting the fundamental rights of children, all children, not just girls.

Muslim and Jewish organizations surely see the decision as interference with the right to freedom of religion. Both religions are integrated into German culture and have considerable influence. Regardless, at least in Germany, the question of criminalization of religiously motivated circumcision will be regulated by the Federal Constitutional Court.

In this case, a Muslim doctor circumcised a four-year-old boy at the request of the parents. Two days later the boy was still bleeding. The mother took to the emergency room. The prosecutor became aware and indicted the circumciser. After the district court found the procedure to be legal, she appealed. Subsequently, the district court found "serious and irreversible impairment of physical integrity" and ruled in favor of the mother and botched circumcision. Unfortunately, botched circumcisions happen all too often, destroying a young boy for life.

Here is a discussion about the ruling in German.

The world does not need more grown up toddlers, women with princess complexes or women for whom choices with consequence are a strange foreign concept. However, modern feminism continues to cling to an absurd idea that holding women as unaccountable, conceptually powerless non-acting victims of outside circumstance – this will, through some magical process; empower them. That has been the experiment for the past 50 years, and now, we're full up with crazy, so please, sell it somewhere else.

What we really could do with a bit more of are self-defined, self-determined grown-up adults who make choices and who understand cause and effect. These are not the pseudo-strong-women caricatures of hyper-sexed and hyper violent female action heroes, they're adult human beings – and far from fearing them, JtO and Typhon Blue will be proposing a model of female identity which fosters actual strength, adulthood, and accountability in women, along with adult self ownership. The name given to this model is Zeta Femininity.
This is the female empowerment promised by feminism for 50 years, but never delivered, finally brought to you by the movement that just hates women and wants them back in the kitchen, makin you a sammich!

Easy questions, stupid answers

John Hembling (JtO) · 29 June 2012 · Archived copy · Original

There is a phenomenon most within the men's rights movement will be familiar with, simply that when the phrases "human rights" and "men" are strung together into a sentence, most people turn stupid.

This is the place in the conversation where "oh you guys just hate women" pops up, and it is a stupid utterance. Sometimes, when a conversation turn to men's rights activists the response is almost violent: "I hate those guys" , "what a bunch of faggots" or similar invective. And these responses are not rational, they are not noble, they are simply stupid. But it goes beyond a knee-jerk reactive aversion to considering men and boys might be human beings – the stupid runs deeper.

At the slut walk event in Vancouver British Columbia in 2011, there were a large number of signs which read "teach men to not rape". One of the most obvious problems with such signage being the false implication that all or even most rapists are men. But the more subtle stupidity is the idea that without being told by placard carrying slut-walkers, adults don't know not to rape. This is the insane fantasy that adults walking around in the world do not know they should not commit violent crimes.

When I attended the 2011 slut walk as an observer, I thought surely they must mean something else, because not even dyed in the wool feminists could be so foolish to literally believe that adults in the real world were inclined to just accidentally commit violent crime. "teach men to not rape" Because if men are not taught, then they are so insane they'll inflict violence on women who they find attractive. It's an insanely stupid belief.

So I tried asking. I picked women who appeared to be at the centre of activity, handing out fliers, organizing others, handing out placards, and issuing orders to an apparent army of volunteers, and I began in most cases by saying "do you mind if I ask you a couple questions?".

Recall that this comes in the context of a public demonstration, staged in the heart of a major city – designed to broadcast the public message of the slut-walk-movement, and so the words : "do you mind if I ask you a couple questions?" should be enthusiastically embraced. Right?

Silly John, you thought you were dealing with intelligent adults. Ha! I asked more than a dozen different people – women obviously, since this was a women's event, and men participating were universally there as secondary hangers-on, fans, and compliant muscle.

"Does it make sense to pretend adults don't know to not commit violent crimes unless they're told?"

"Does it make sense to assume everyone you meet in the world is a barely restrained sexual predator?"

"Isn't it a bit hateful to stage a rally, pretending half the human race are subhuman criminals?"

Are you telling me, that without being told not to, men, grown men, with jobs, shoes, driver's licences, credit cards and who can read, feed themselves and make their way in the world – that they do not know to not commit rape, or generally act like pre-civilized violent predators?

And what answer did I get, variously trying to ask versions of this question. From those who I tried to ask this question – I got no answer, because they fled from the question. I don't mean evaded answering or changed the topic. They literally fled, and hid behind the self-defined protection of compliant men – who in every case scampered over to "protect" the women organizing Vancouver's slut walk from answering my very simple questions.
The repeated and complete intellectual cowardice demonstrated is an answer by itself. However, I asked these self appointed white knights my questions too.

Asked of the male supporters at 2011's vancouver slut walk, my questions took this form:

So you, being a grown-ass man; don't know without being told by one of these signs on a placard – that sexual assault isn't in the range of allowable behavior? You need to be told this, or you think other men need to be told this?

And the answer? "uuuuuuh, yeah".

I will spare you the pain of these conversations in detail, because although the men I spoke to ranged in age from 20 to about 40 – it was a conversation similar to what one expects with a newly verbal toddler, caught misbehaving.

Did you take the toy from your brother?

The toy? (child's attempt to evade)

Yes, that toy in your hand, did you take that from your brother?

Uh-huh.

This kind of reasoning through the very basics of cause and effect is expected when we deal with very small children, the same is unfortunately what Ive come to expect through experience when dealing with issues of male human rights, or when parsing the anti-male rhetoric from so-called feminists.

"teach men to not rape"

Why not also carry signs that read "teach jews to not cheat" or "teach blacks to not steal".

Any public rally featuring signs such as these would be quickly identified as a hate rally. However, teach men to not rape – is, in our current social climate, publicly praiseworthy.

This, of course is why discussions of male human rights, or intelligent parsing of feminist rhetoric so quickly turns people stupid.

This is a game of pretend. There is no need to convince anyone of the scope or the magnitude of the problem. They know, but they are afraid to admit to it in public. Thus, they get stupid, because they are afraid.

One of the oldest techniques of education is, when an individual engages in destructive, self deceptive, or in counter-productive behaviour; rather than forcibly redirecting their energies – to encourage and accelerate them on the path they cling to. This approach works from the assumption that people are capable of thinking for themselves, and that the evident outcomes of a self-destructive pursuit will, when amplified, motive the individuals to learn. Fear, as discussed earlier is what apparently stands between some very simple questions, and willingness to address those questions.

On Sunday 30 May, I will be attending Vancouver's 2012 slut walk, and asking a new set of very easy questions. I will also try to encourage those I talk with to overcome their fear.

Slut Walk 2012: still stupid, but smaller

John Hembling (JtO) · 1 July 2012 · Archived copy · Original

On Saturday June 30, the sluts in Vancouver marched. In the second year of the international slut walk movement, I attended the event held in my city, armed with a list of questions, a camera, a recorder, and a fellow MRA to watch my back. Recalling the naked and forceful hatred of the first such event I'd attended the previous year, I half expected to be jumped from behind by white knights, eager to show their feminist superiors how loyal they were to the holy doctrine. What I found at the 2012 Vancouver slut walk was just a tiny bit underwhelming.

[image]To be fair, partial blame for the diminished crowd almost certainly belonged to Vancouver's weather. However, a turn-out of 1/8 of the previous year's crowd can't be blamed entirely on dampening of spirits from a bit of rain. West coast wet weather cannot entirely account for not only the low turn out, but a substantial shift in the tone of this city's second slut walk. Gone were the hundreds of identical, professionally made picket signs, all lettered in the same handwriting "teach men to not rape". In fact, there were precious few signs at all, and those few in evidence were hand-made, hanging from yarn around the necks of a small fraction of the attending slut-walkers. The T-shirt uniformed volunteer brigade of the previous year, showing the colours of the Vancouver rape relief shelters were similarly absent. This year, the few visible event organizers were identifiable by orange arm-bands. Also, at the steps of Vancouver's downtown art gallery, an array of posters presented the previous year, this time took the somewhat down-scale format of hand-written slogans on brown corrugated cardboard. Oh dear.
[image]

However, livening up this year's slut walk were a number of highly enthusiastic participants, dressed in brightly neon coloured work-out gear . Unfortunately for the slut-walkers, these gentlemen and ladies, who managed to upstage just about everybody else were not a part of the slut walk. They were staging their own physical fitness-related event, a dance-off. Apparently unaware, and uninterested in politically motivated public sluttery, the costumed gentlemen of the dance party showed off their own buff backsides to the visible entertainment of photographers and other attendees.

[image]

In spite of the reduced crowd, I managed to ask a few questions. What I learned was that this event is, regardless of it's dialled down size and vitriol, about deferment of responsibility for safety in public. A group of 4 sisters in their late 20's, chaperoned by their 60 year old mother finally after much double-talk admitted that their goal was a world in which women could go anywhere, do anything, clothed or unclothed, drunk or sober, in perfect expectation of safety. I pointed out that nobody can do this, and the real world doesn't work like that. They reluctantly agreed, but were insistent that it should.

However, even this expressed goal of an idyllic fantasy world was difficult to obtain as an answer, because the hovering 60 year old mother did her level best to re-characterize my carefully neutral questions into violent and hateful accusations.

Although I philosophically oppose a movement I see as socially corrosive, the goal of my questions really was to discover the opinions of slut walk attendees, and conversing with civility through the hate-flavoured filter of a chaperone dressed as a 19th century prostitute challenged my self discipline.

Another attendee explained, when asked that the word slut was being re-claimed. Her home-made sign made economical use of just the single word: "slut" Normally a rude question, I asked for a definition, she eventually claimed "sexually liberated woman". I did not tax her to explain what that buzz-phrase meant, as she seemed to have been tired out by my first question.

She did claim that the usual sexual dynamic of men competing for female attention, and women selecting from competitors didn't exist, and that a woman with many sexual partners was in fact an accomplished seducer in exactly the same way a man with many sexual partners was. I did not bother questioning this view, but I do have the bad habit of letting doubt show on my face.

There were also several public speakers, one of whom was a former prostitute who made several interesting admissions. First among these was the claim that she'd had more than 20,000 penises inserted into her various bodily orifices. Immediately following this claim was the admission that she'd done this "because [she] was utterly filled with hatred".

Between these two claims, I cannot help my own observation that it is such possession by hatred, and not a numerically prodigious count of penises that would motivate responsible avoidance of any individual, whether as an acquaintance or as a sexual service provider. However, for the attending crowd, both 20-thousand cocks, as well as the claim of consuming hatred both merited applause.

This speaker also talked in disparaging tones of a woman who had once fired her from a child care position, because she had slapped the 6 year old boy she was charged to care for. The reason for the firing (physical abuse of a toddler) was given in a tone of sneering contempt, with no apparent recognition that violence against a child is indefensible behavior – particularly for an adult paid to care for that child.

None of the slut-walk attendees in the audience commented, although one of the neon-clad dance party attendees shouted the obvious from off-stage: "well you shouldn't have slapped the kid".

Another speaker, this one in her 30's, and not a former sex worker followed with a lengthy declaration that nobody should ever be judged based on their appearance or attire. She meant of course, that women using their clothing to command sexual attention should be able to select whose attracted attention is valid, and whose is not. Nobody pointed out that male attire is a principal metric women use to determine whose attentions are welcome or unwelcome. By this point in the event, I'd had enough to being told obvious falsehoods, and of listening to reality denial from grown-up toddlers.

However, the slut walk movement does appear to have dialled down the most obvious and blatant of it's anti-male hatred. Media attention since the 2011 inception of this coordinated exercise in public shame and coercion has sucked some of the steam out of this engine of hate. If slut walk still exists next year, It will only do so if the movement substantially re-defines itself. The naked hatred has worn so thin, that even most slut-walkers are apparently backing away from the movement.

A Man's Obligation

Jared White · 2 July 2012 · Archived copy · Original

> "When you see something like that going on, you, and by you I mean we have an obligation to speak out against it more often."
> Jay Smooth, responding to public push-back against feminist condemnation of video gaming

What are a man's true obligations? Thousands have posed this question throughout history. Unsurprisingly million of answers have been offered. All people have obligations, right? Employees have job obligations to their employers. Students have obligations to instructors and to themselves. So, what is wrong with questioning and defining a man's obligation?

To those who recognize men as human, answer is simple. However, this may be challenging to individuals stuck in the dogma that men are privileged oppressors, unfairly and automatically advantaged by virtue of a Y chromosome.

For those who believe in a secret "privileged corner" tucked away in the patriarchy's back pocket; this long answer is for you.

To place obligations a group of people, based on their sex, race, or any other biologically defined traits is morally repugnant. It is the antithesis of any consistent claim of an egalitarian society.

Sadly, this is frequently demonstrated, and from individuals calling themselves "enlightened" or claiming "equality" between the sexes.
One example is the so-called anti violence rhetoric of "Men can stop rape".

PSAs from a self-defined collection of of "good men". Self loathing individuals announcing it is the duty of all men to intervene any time they see a woman threatened or inconvenienced.

Consider the applied attempts to shame men who do not "step up" to police nasty comments online. Think of the attempts to shame men who don't immediately chastise other males when they overhear use of the words bitch or slut.

To these "good men" and feminists, a man doesn't immediately put himself between a woman and any unkind opinion or rude behavior, or physical threat, then that man is no real man. He is no good man.
Forget that he may value his own safety and peace of mind over that of a complete stranger. Forget that a man may not want to involve himself in a confrontation between people he has never met. Forget he is a human being without any real obligation to a stranger just because that stranger is female.
When all of that is forgotten, you will have no problem seeing things from a feminist perspective.

Then, there is something inherently wrong with men who aren't willing to put themselves in harm's way to defend women. Now obviously, men who call out internet trolls aren't putting themselves in any physical danger. However, peace of mind counts for a lot as well. Why should anyone be obligated to don the white armour to defend complete strangers online, or anywhere else?

Those who claim it is a man's obligation to intervene when a woman feels harassed are ignoring the irony of their own arguments. If women deserve the respect of adults – which I contend they do, then why should we treat them as if they are uniquely incapable of defending their own arguments or opinions? Jay Smooth, the hip-hop DJ who recently made an ass of himself, demanding men step up to defend women online provides a perfect example. Among many other men that support feminism, he feels that harassment of women is rampant online, and that men everywhere are failing at their obligation to defend these women.

Don't believe me? Take a look at his latest video. Paul Elam linked to it a short time ago in another article. But Paul didn't bother to point out the sexism Mr. Smooth was displaying towards every woman on the planet. Quite aside from the anti-male sexism so often discussed within the MRM the frequent readers here at AVFM already know all about Mr Smooth's condescension to women as well as his asinine admonitions to men, to step up.

The quote at the top of this article is from Smooth's video, stated without apparent irony; men are obligated to defend women.

This line of thinking isn't new. It's been around since long before the Men's rights movement or feminism ever existed. That line of thinking is called chivalry. Some may even find it ironic that a chivalrous ideal forms the foundation of feminist ideology.

Of course, there are several schools of thought and divisions of feminism. The idea that men must defend women is a part of the moderate, sex positive, third wave school of feminism.

However, radical feminism's naked hatred, and occasionally admitted belief that all men should die so women can inherit a matriarchal paradise also depends heavily on chivalry. For radical feminism, this is the belief that men should quietly and passively cooperate with the totalitarian nightmares and genocidal dreams of radical feminists. Some popular science reporting suggests artificial sperm may soon be commercial viable, but I digress.

Moderate feminists, female and male, generally agree that when a guy is slinging the word bitch around his buddy should place a firm hand on his shoulder and say something like "hey man, that's not cool.

If you're wondering what should happen if the rude gentleman's buddy isn't there, no problem. Feminists have an answer for that too. The burden is simply passed on to the nearest random male. If said random guy happens to get told to eff off, or an altercation ensues? Good for that random guy for sticking up for that woman he's never met and will probably never see again. Don't worry about the potential physical harm he might carry, that doesn't matter as long as that rude male a-hole got told that his attitude is unacceptable, right Jay?

You see, to ideologues like Jay Smooth, Michael Kimmel, Hugo Swyzer, and others; the well-being of men takes a backseat to the well-being of women.

While none of these opportunists and scolds have written those exact words, the intention is clear. But obligation on one demographic towards another, with no reciprocal expectation is simply stupid. This is ultimately a belief in the worthlessness of the lives and safety of men, relative to women.

Alert observers already know that our society increasingly encourages women to put themselves into dangerous situations, which means; absent of a culture of female personal accountability, socially expected protection becomes increasingly hazardous and onerous.

Also, while it may be a male obligation to defend women, female on male violence is ignored or laughed at. It is made light of and given numerous psychological and medical excuses that the richest couldn't hope to bribe a clinician or a jury into accepting. Female on male rape is not rape at all, according to the CDC. Our society views a drink or open palm thrown in the face of a man who uttered something a woman didn't like as a justifiable response.

Because, you know, sometimes men deserve to be hit. With a free-pass for violence given to women by society, it is unsurprising that women initiate the majority of it in heterosexual relationships.

Is it a surprise that in to a bar or club it is common to see some guy getting a drink thrown in his face or slapped by a woman because he said something she disliked?
What would happen to a man who showed a woman the same treatment? According to people like Mr. Smooth, it is the obligation of every other man in that bar to step in and defend that weak powerless woman from that "privileged" male.

And that man must be punished to the full extent of the law because men are stronger then women on average. thus, male violence is more important, and severe than female violence, right? Yes, and criminal penalties for offences involving fire-arms graduate upwards based on the calibre of the gun. shooting a person with a .22 is a misdemeanour, shooting somebody with a .38 is carries 5 years, a .45 calibre shooting is 7 to 10 years and shooting somebody with a 12-gauge shotgun is 10 to 15 years. Right? Right?

It is sad when individuals like Smooth pretend internet trolls (only male ones, obviously) must hate women. Obviously no one of either sex would say something obnoxious just because they are an a-hole.

Well, through that logic of women-must-always-be-defended-no-matter-what, claims on the obligation of men to defend women must be based on the belief that men are subhuman. Individuals like J. Smooth, M. Kimmel, and D. Futile aren't misguided, they aren't old school working men who protect their ladies. Nope, they just think all men are subhuman.

Getting back to moderate feminism and chivalry, I think now you can see where I am going with the comparison. Moderate feminism is the mainstream and socially accepted form of the ideology and with no surprise is in fact nothing more than chivalry repackaged for a new generation.

No longer should men be obligated to defend women because women are weak little flowers that should be protected. Now men should be obligated to defend women because all men are unfairly advantaged over all women. Men are privileged you know? So they should call out other men who insult or threaten the oppressed class.

I myself have never heard of a civilization in which the oppressors were obligated to beat the shit out of each other in defense of the oppressed but we are twelve years into the new millennium so I suppose anything is possible.

Men are privileged, so we should speak out against any comments against women, says Jay Smooth. However, in his very next sentence he says those who want to speak out against the idea that men are making the internet a hostile environment for women should shut up.

> "its really not okay for you to jump into somebody's [public] discussion of this harassment and derail it with a bunch of comments about "well sure harassment is bad, but men are discriminated against too, feminists are always making something out of nothing, and bu-bu-bu-bu-bu" Nooo! Man! Now is not the time for that. If you need to have that debate there are plenty of other times for it, if you need to show off your debating skills and try to make fetch happen with the misandry thing, there's plenty of other times for that."

The place where the argument against men is being put forth is not the place to speak out against that argument. Also, the trolls, both male and female (but only the male ones count, right Smooth?) are the undeniable proof that the argument being put forth against men is true.

Congratulations feminism.

But in all seriousness, the intellectual dishonesty displayed in this video is horrendous. Internet trolls are detached from their humanity because they type nasty comments. But a guy who says men are obligated to put themselves in harm's way for people they don't know, because those people happen to have a vagina ? And this guy is an advocate of "equality" ?

Regardless of a man's political or philosophical views, men should not worry about some feminist painting all men as assholes, or that trolls make the internet or the gaming community a hostile environment for women, we must all jump in and defend the girl-gamer, right?

That "misandry" stuff isn't important anyway. Word on the street is it doesn't even exist. That's definitely the impression I got from Jay Smooth. Men like our white-knight DJ who support feminism are all about equality. But men should not focus their own energy on advocating for their own rights. Demanding equal rights and treatment under the law and pointing out how feminism makes light of male issues is nowhere near the level of importance of stopping nasty blog comments towards the likes of Anita Sarkeesian. I believe it because Jay Smooth said so.

A short consideration of the practices and impact of professional liars.

> To suppose that the eye, with all its inimitable contrivances for adjusting the focus to different distances, for admitting different amounts of light, and for the correction of spherical and chromatic aberration, could have been formed by natural selection, seems, I freely confess, absurd in the highest possible degree. – Charles Darwin, Origin of Species, 1st Ed., p. 186.

There you have it. Conclusive proof that not even Charles Darwin though biological evolution was a plausible theory.

Here is that same quotation, this time with the rest of the paragraph it formed a part of, which can be found on page 186 of Origin of Species.

[box type="note" icon="none"]

"To suppose that the eye, with all its inimitable contrivances for adjusting the focus to different distances, for admitting different amounts of light, and for the correction of spherical and chromatic aberration, could have been formed by natural selection, seems, I freely confess, absurd in the highest possible degree. Yet reason tells me, that if numerous gradations from a perfect and complex eye to one very imperfect and simple, each grade being useful to its possessor, can be shown to exist; if further, the eye does vary ever so slightly, and the variations be inherited, which is certainly the case; and if any variation or modification in the organ be ever useful to an animal under changing conditions of life, then the difficulty of believing that a perfect and complex eye could be formed by natural selection, though insuperable by our imagination, can hardly be considered real. How a nerve comes to be sensitive to light, hardly concerns us more than how life itself first originated; but I may remark that several facts make me suspect that any sensitive nerve may be rendered sensitive to light, and likewise to those coarser vibrations of the air which produce sound."

[/box]

"…then the difficulty of believing that a perfect and complex eye could be formed by natural selection, though insuperable by our imagination, can hardly be considered real."

Oh, so it appears that Mr Darwin was confident of his own conclusions, and that whatever we may decide 150 years after publication of his Origin of species, He did not regard the theory of evolution as " absurd in the highest possible degree".

So why do so many public critics of the modern scientific theory of evolution continue to cite an excerpt from Darwin's book to claim he doubted his own theory? That's simple. It is because they are liars.

They are not ignorant, they are not confused, they are not ill-prepared or mistaking the meaning of Darwin's words. Individuals citing the words "absurd in the highest possible degree" as evidence that Darwin discredited his own theory are taking a statement out of it's original context, stripping it of its original, and clearly intended meaning, and purposefully mis-representing a new and false meaning.

There is no excuse for this, because the original context remains, forever refuting the deliberate distortions of Darwin's intended and clearly expressed meaning.

Of course, anybody who wants to is entirely welcome to regard the biological theory of evolution as valid or invalid. My own opinion on that theory may also be inferred – along with the caveat that my own education in the science of biology goes no farther than what was taught in Canada at college level in the 1990s. And I have forgotten most of it. Biology, or indeed, evolutionary theory is not really the topic of this discussion, rather it is provided here as example of a rhetorical practice increasingly common among opponents of a small but growing human rights movement.♠

This is the practice of quote-mining. The lifting of a statement from it's source, stripping it of context, and re-attributing to it a new meaning – usually of sinister quality. Some opponents of human rights are so adept at this that along with a degree of snark, so heavy handed it borders on self-parody, the quote-mine supported ad-hominem has become a signature move.

However, recognition of skill should not be mistaken for respect, because for any rhetorician to rely on a developed virtuosity in lying indicts not only themselves, but anyone who relies on such individuals for a source of opinion. The developing practice in opposition to human rights, of quote-mining goes beyond pathetic, into the realm of craven, futile depravity.

I admit to a dislike of women and the violent ideology of feminism being endlessly portrayed as synonyms for each other.♠♠ However, it seems that no matter how many times it is explained that a thing formed from (bad) ideas – an ideology, and a group of people, identifiable by sex, are two distinct things, gender ideologues continue to conflate them.

A year ago, I wrote an article focusing on the necessary public repudiation of violence, and the responsibility of open opposition to those who advocated or promoted a climate of acceptable violence, including those who openly advocate murder, such as a group of swedish feminists, and eugenics advocates on the squalid radical-hub. Statements from my original piece were quoted by at least one amoral zombie, and reframed to present my view as one which called for violence.

Of course, the author of those yellow pixels might not have realized that the original article, along with it's unambiguous opposition to violence was posted on a site with substantially higher traffic than his own. The craven and stupid dishonesty of the quote-miner was apparent to all but a few, blinded by their own ideological goggles.

More recently, I had the dubious pleasure of arguing online with somebody so detached from an ethical compass that they tried to convince me, in the person of my online handle that an article written by me in opposition to anti-gay bigotry and racism actually advocated racism and anti-gay bigotry. The mind boggles.

The statement used to "prove" this point was:

"When men are not expected to die without complaint any time higher gas prices make it inconvenient for soccer moms to drive from their gated community to the local grass pitch, or any other time men's utility trumps their humanity, well then maybe I'll entertain the usefulness of keeping the gays or the darkies out of the club house. …"

Well, there you have it, incontestable proof of racism and homophobia. But wait! What's this? The next words in the paragraph from which this quotation was exhumed were as follows:

"…On the other hand, maybe I'll still think it's a stupid argument. But I do know that for a so called men's rights movement to marginalize men based on who they want in their bed – well, it's beneath us."

That clarifying statement wasn't in a new paragraph, it wasn't even on a new line. It's omission in an attempt to establish evidence of some kind of bigotry was purposeful. It was simply a lie, used to cultivate the perception of hatred.

This tactic of ham-fisted deception is becoming increasingly common in the oppositional writing of those who oppose the human rights of men and boys. This may indicate a creeping awareness of the diminishing effect of shaming language on men who define themselves as humans. Unfurtunately, rather than attempting to field substantive arguments, in desperation, the trend appears to be double-down on stupid, and use quotes of of context to justify the claims " you see? You see? They really do hate women".

However, absent of any substantive argument, opponents of human rights desperate for purchase in a rapidly shifting landscape turn to inept attempts at slander.

Disinterest in the opinion of yellow journalism is transmuted to hatred for the demographic of the authors. An analysis of a standard visual trope used in porn is transmuted to obsession with porn and an automatic assumed hatred of women. These pathetic attempts at caricature of evil are is so sadly predictable that I regularly add visual prompts to my own writing to make it easier for liars to re-characterize statements shaved of their original context and re-painted in colours of hate.

Unfortunately, for them, dialling up use of circumstantial ad hominem arguments might have worked when the issue of male human rights was a single-sided monologue from the camp of gender ideologues. However, while mainstream publications do not yet feature MRM writers, a substantial borrowing of opinion and rhetoric from the mens movement is continuously evident.

The practice of quote-mining, and dishonest attribution of malice to re-contextualized fragments of writing is increasingly a practice of obvious self-indictment by bad actors. For those whose toolkit contains little besides snark and misrepresentation, the self-immolation of credibility becomes a slow motion public spectacle. For some, life's purpose may be to serve as a warning to others, just as a visible shipwreck marks hazards for other vessels to avoid. However, as inadvertently noble as such purpose may be, my contempt for deliberate and habitual liars is boundless.

Individuals who distinguish themselves by repeated and blatant commission of the specialized lie of quote mining will be remembered as public examples on the wrong side of what is a human rights movement.

Even without conscientious intention by the proponents of human rights, some deceitful and corrupt individuals naturally spawn a renown for themselves which will outlast them. Bottom feeding quote miners indulging in snarky feats of futrelian deceit likely do win rhetorical brownie points, at least when seen through their own ideological goggles. But they are cementing their own a public persona which will wear about as comfortably as klan robes do at a NAACP meeting. The altered landscape this movement is building is not someday, it is now, and it is coming faster all the time.

For individuals in opposition to human rights of men and boys now, whether through lying, repetition of old, false dogmas, or the craven tactic of mis-represented and mis-attributed meaning, the comfort of a formerly one-sided monologue is over. The public squirming we see in attempts to render MRA voices silent or apologetic will escalate before it abates. But that's okay.

Individuals accustomed to sole control of the dialogue may be unable to conceive of men as anything besides violent, oppressive subhumans. And, starting from that position, men are to be kept in check through ongoing disenfranchisement. So, lying is just another tool in that "noble" goal. However, the terrain is changing to a world which sees the old opponents of men's human rights as monsters. But I'm sure that somebody, somewhere felt badly for the nazis once too.

♠ Critics may be tempted to the claim that a comparison is made between the MRM, or any author within it to Charles Darwin. Go on, try to sell that idea.

♠♠ Oh look! he said "I admit to a dislike of women.." tee he he, let's paint that up in the colours of a sexist hate monger!! woo!

Promoting the mutilation of infants

John Hembling (JtO) · 4 July 2012 · Archived copy · Original

[box type="note" icon="none"]If you knowingly advocate the commission of violence, directly, or indirectly; If you endorse the harming or injuring of children – or promote, or endorse or facilitate injury or harm or mutilation of infants; then you are depraved and sick. This applies equally to left-leaning gender ideologues and to right-leaning columnists writing for mainstream publications, even the Huffington Post.[/box]

In Germany, in late June of 2012, the regional court in Cologne banned the religious circumcision of infant boys. The German news service published the court's decision on the 26th of the month.

"Circumcision is now known to be harmful, when you do circumcision you are harming the body. Neither the parents nor the right to freedom of religion guaranteed in the Basic Law can justify this procedure, the court clearly said in it's ruling".

Children's rights groups and men's rights activists world wide have been in long term agreement with the repeated published position of the medical establishment who almost universally oppose the practice, and this opposition is not new.

However, the Canadian HuffPo contributor Sheryl Saperia made a case on 3 July 2012 that the routine religious ritual mutilation of infant boys is, according to her; not mutilation. She even spelled out the p-e-r-i-o-d at the end of her sentence, so you know she must be right.

According to Saperia, "neither the right to security of the person nor to gender equality should operate in such a way as to proscribe male circumcision on the grounds that it is comparable to the justifiably prohibited custom of female genital mutilation "

Saperia makes no attempt to logically support this naked assertion, but cites the argument of a law professor at Duke University who says :

"This analogy can and has been rejected as specious and disingenuous, as the traditional forms of FGM are as different from male circumcision in terms of procedure, physical ramifications, and motivation as ear piercing is to a penilectomy." (amputation of the penis)

This rationalization is convoluted, and from a logical point of view, irrelevant.

According to professor Coleman, female and male ritual infant sexual mutilation are as different as ear piercing and amputation of the penis. Of course, this is a false comparison, but even if it is taken as true, the fact that injury done to infant boys is not identical to injury done to infant girls, it remains injury. "Specious and disingenuous" perfectly describes this so-called refutation.

Sheryl Saperia also makes the pointless detour in to a claim that FGM has no benefits. It probably doesn't, but so what? It's illegal, and nobody is arguing for the mutilation of girls. She cites irrelevant statistics about FGM induced deaths. Again, nobody is arguing for the mutilation of infant girls.

However, Sapiera trots out a catalog of formal logical fallacies in support of mutilation of male infants, starting with the Logical fallacy of Appeal to Authority (argumentum ad verecundiam).

The World Health Organization says quack quack quack. It does not matter who says it, what we're talking about is using a sharp instrument to remove the most sensitive tip of the male sex organ on an infant – with no anaesthetic. This is the medically unnecessary mutilation of a newborn baby.

However, appeal to authority isn't where the formal logical fallacies end, we also have the logical fallacy of Appeal to Tradition. (argumentum ad antiquitatem).

According to the W.H.O. Male genital mutilation is one of the oldest and most common surgical procedures worldwide, and is undertaken for many reasons: religious, cultural, social and medical.

Oh, well on that basis, let's bring back trepanning to address migraines too. And when the crops fail let's sacrifice a virgin – that's an old practise as well. Seriously, as I type this, I am asking myself if maybe I misread the article and it wasn't Huffington Post but actually The Onion?

However, not content with formal logical fallacies, our huffpo correspondent trots out a flatly absurd claim, although she wraps it in an appeal to authority by citing the WHO as the source.

"There is conclusive evidence from observational data and three randomized controlled trials that circumcised men have a significantly lower risk of becoming infected with the human immunodeficiency virus (HIV)."

Well I guess we don't need condoms anymore, now that HIV is prevented by getting your foreskin chopped off.

Let us take a short break from asinine lies and consider some reality.

Numerous independent studies have shown NO [1] reduced risk of HIV infection for circumcised men, compared with those uncircumcised. An international organization of physicians, opposing non-therapeutic neonatal circumcision with members in 50 States and 12 Canadian Provinces published a statement in 2007 indicating: "Although male circumcision is likely to be proposed for political reasons, it is likely to have little effect on the overall incidence of HIV infection and may cause later problems"[2].

In fact, According to Volume 80 of the British Journal of Surgery, October 1993,[3] "the operation is associated with a definite morbidity". A cursory Google search also reveals published data from The College of Physicians and Surgeons of British Columbia stating [4] "Routine infant male circumcision performed on a healthy infant is now considered a non-therapeutic and medically unnecessary intervention".

In addition to this, the Joint United Nations Program on HIV/Aids stated in 2009 that [5] "The male latex condom is the single, most efficient, available technology to reduce the sexual transmission of HIV and other sexually transmitted infections".

The sadistic, amoral quacking columnist also claims – with perfect confidence :
"In the absence of strong and non-conflicting medical evidence that male circumcision regularly causes substantial harm to young boys, the arguments against the procedure are severely weakened."

Unfortunately, the procedure is fatal to about 117 infants in the US every year[6].
Sheryl Saperia also makes the empty claim that: "Since male circumcision and FGM are simply incomparable, gender equality should not demand the banning of the former just because the latter is illegal"

MGM and FGM are incomparable? (incapable of being compared to each other)

Each procedure is a non therapeutic surgical intervention, removing or mutilating the sexual organs of a newly born infant. Clearly, they ARE comparable, since I have just compared them. Does it seem like I am playing unfair word games here?

Saperia constantly refers to mutilation of boy-infants by the clinical and palatable term "circumcision" but refers to the corollary female procedure with the emotionally charged term "mutilation". That is what playing word games looks like. In fact, both female and male infant ritual sexual mutilation are abhorrent, but for motivations we can only guess at, boys do not deserve to be protected from a brutal, injurious, sexually crippling procedure which kills over one hundred newborns each year. The word monstrous fails completely to encompass the total depravity of arguing to continue harming new born infants. My mind cannot encompass such malice.

The reality is that Saperia's utterly irrelevant argument against female sexual mutilation (nobody is arguing in favour of mutilating girls) – while it is a technically true argument, is equally true if is applied to mutilation of male infants.

Neither female nor male genital mutilation has health benefits. Sexually mutilating an infant harms girls and women in many ways, but it also harms boys and men. It involves removing and damaging healthy and normal genital tissue. It is bizarre, cruel, and sickening to describe harm to infants of one sex and then pretend a similar atavistic ritual of mutilation doesn't also harm male infants, and interferes with the natural functions of boy's and girls' as well as men's and women's bodies.

Our amoral robot next cites religious integrity as justification to harm children. "It is well known that the circumcision of baby boys is mandated by the Jewish religion".

This is another irrelevant argument. It is also mandated that practicing jews not use technological devices on certain religious days. They loophole their way out of this inconvenience by such innovations as elevators which go to all the floors, thus, not necessitating a religiously observant jew to press a button.

If cutting the end of a boy's sexual organ really is a matter of identity, let him chose to do it after reaching an age of self-possessed reason. Mutilation of an infant who has no ability to object is depraved, vicious and without a single sane redeeming argument. Another hyperbolic appeal to emotion is made that not mutilating babies is equivalent to genocide. Stated flatly, this argument is nothing but dog shit.

Saperia makes several other worthless, garbage arguments which do not even deserve being addressed. However, she concludes by saying "there are insufficient medical, legal, and moral grounds to draw that line at male circumcision."

Except that it is non-therapeutic (medical) it mutilates an infant who cannot possibly consent (moral), it induces permanent trauma, and results often enough in death to stop doing it world wide immediately. If only we can somehow make the logical leap that male infants are actually humans who; like female infants, we should protect from harm. Is that not sufficient medical, legal, and moral grounds to not mutilate babies?

Harm, of course is the key to understanding the total intellectual bankruptcy and moral depravity of arguing in favour of harming baby boys, or deliberately injuring babies in general.

Saperia, a so-called conservative violates the most fundamental principal of ethics. That of self ownership and bodily integrity. This is totally inexcusable, indefensible and betrays either a refusal to recognize a baby boy as a human being, or a catastrophic mental malfunction. The purposeful advocation of mutilation, and let's not pretend we are talking about anything except mutilation. This is obscene, horrifying and rank, craven, depraved mercenary cruelty inflicted on newborn infants.

A few rhetorical questions to consider.

Who is paying to advocate the purposeful sexual dismemberment of baby boys?

Is it the heads of the Foundation for Defence of Democracies[7], which Sapeira's Huffpo by-line[8] names her as Director of Policy for Canada of the FDD? For the interested, these include:

The FDD chairman James Woolsey, FDD's president Clifford D. May and executive director Mark Dubowitz. The Foundation for Defence of Democracies Leadership Council is composed of prominent leaders from the defense, intelligence, and policy communities including Paula Dobriansky, Steve Forbes, Bill Kristol, Louis J. Freeh, Joseph Lieberman, Newt Gingrich, Max Kampelman, and Robert McFarlane.

That is the crowd behind this Huffington Post writer advocating the mutilation of infants. But I have one other question, just to consider.

Whose infant son was butchered for Sheryl Saperia's wrinkle cream?[9]

Perhaps, next week Sheryl Saperia can write another article, this time for the preservation in Canada of the Islamic religious ritual of stoning women to death. Ha! I'm only kidding of course – that would hurt women, but how about hanging gay male teenagers, an atavistic and religiously motivated practice we could adopt from places like Iran. That should be right up Saperia's alley.

MGTOW re-understood

Russ Lindquist · 5 July 2012 · Archived copy · Original

Correcting my impression of Men Going Their Own Way (MGTOW)

To be a misunderstood person is surely a frustrating thing. Another person's initial perception of who you are is like a mental seed – all growth begins there. However, unlike a physical seed that may be planted in any given way and yet grow straight, if a person first misunderstands you – if the initial seed is planted crooked – then the seedling that is you in the mind of that person will sprout crooked. It's all downhill from there, or all uphill, whichever is worse.

And while being misunderstood is surely frustrating, far worse is someone misunderstanding you and then proceeding to widen the divide between who you are and who they suppose you to be by making elaborate extensions based on their initial misconception of your character. Such was the case when I published a youtube video [link] wherein I explained several reservations that I have with the topics and tone of two MGTOW websites which I assumed; wrongly, it seems, reflected well the consensus of MGTOW ideology.

Summarily I received plenty silly, slovenly cyber-teeth-sucking, for not possessing the same frame-of-reference for MGTOW as possessed by various detractors of my video. To those detractors, I advise the following: Do not let your frustration, however warranted, tryannize the potential in you for pause, patience and reasonable refutation. Nevertheless, by criticizing the two websites, it seems that I may have, at best, bested a strawman and not the "official" ideology of MGTOW.

A word about strawmen

To be clear, plenty people in our culture consider it enough to feeeeel successful by besting a strawman; two good examples of this are, 1) the cavalier Christian elder who proudly out-talks a first year biology student who accepts the theory of Evolution, and, 2) the various, insipid, pseudo-liberal, pseudo-scientific soothsayers of our culture who readily deride any young, relatively poorly spoken Christian child whose parents raised him or her to think critically about Evolution, rather than to bleat, in harmony, an acquiesence to the Appeals-to-Authority and Appeals-to-Popularity, which if you're keeping score, are all that sustain plenty parts of the oft-psuedo-scientific Frankenstein that is the theory of Evolution.

Clarification about MGTOW received

When it comes to taking pride in winning against the wrong opponent, the aforementioned kinds of people are two examples; but I am not a third. So I was glad to receive, from youtube user ThatCynicalCynicism, a video response to my video. Therein he offered, amid well-chosen visual aids, that MGTOW is "generally defined as being an individual choice, and an individual solution." I thank him for the information (although I hold that his estimation of feminism, in the video, was, coincidentally; a straw-man).

Declaration against co-dependency

After inaptly generalizing MGTOW and planting a sideways seed, I am now at least somewhat prepared to straighten the seedling. Here, then, is my ode of MGTOW:

When in the course of widespread misandrist tyranny, it becomes necessary for men to dissolve the social solder, and reverse the spiritual mutilation which has stuck and imperiled them, so inequitably, to the whines and whims of women. These men must, perhaps, reinvent the wheel of free-association.

Let it be clear that a man has a right to go his on way. Therefore, let modern men acknowledge and accept – as tearfully as they might – that far too many women, for far too long, have far too well assumed the role of nothing but shined, shaven social-succubi who reflect all of mens vices yet none of mens virtue. Further, these succubi (desirous of everything and deserving of nothing) can offer men nothing but the role of a masochistic selfindentured-servant: he is to work a job he hates; he is to earn money that she spends; he is to live far less comfortably; he is to die far sooner.

Let each man reject this poisonously pink proposition; let each man end, in whatever way he sees fit, the misandrist fem-anesthetization that is, now, generations old; let each man choose, instead, to live a life of self-direction, self-control, self-reliance and personal responsibility–even if such self-respect means that he must wholly abandon such soul-striping social roles as, for example, womyn's unpaid bodyguard, womyn's unpaid moving-company, womyn's unpaid therapist, womyn's unpaid accountant, womyn's financial-lust-object.

Men deserve better than these "womyn" are offering. Men have a right to go their own way.

Because the MRM is, at it's base a human rights movement, tonight on AVfM radio, John the Other, Girl Writes What, Typhon Blue, and James Huff will begin the first of a series examining morality, ethics and human rights from the point of view of philosophical first principals. Tonight, we'll begin at the ground level, and use the lens of universality to look at a few commonly accepted "truths" as well as laying down one or two elementary precepts of human ethics.

It promises to be an interesting discussion, and listeners are invited, as always to call in to 310 388 97089, and to join the after-show discussion in stick-cam located here http://www.stickam.com/group/avoiceformen

Accelerating the death of bad ideas

Luigi Logan (aka Fidelbogen) · 5 July 2012 · Archived copy · Original

There is a school of thought in pro-male cyberspace which says “keep it apolitical”. This means that pro-male partisans should either stay away from established categories of political discourse (such as right-versus-left), or stay away from extraneous matters which do not clearly pertain to feminism, men’s issues and the like.

There is also a school of thoughtlessness in pro-male cyberspace, which flaps its gums about all manner of things only loosely related (if at all) to feminism, men’s issues and the like. That is for starters. But when those same thoughtless ones voice wildly indiscreet opinions upon their topics of choice, it greatly compounds the original difficulty.

Clearly, these two schools of thought are at odds with one another.

But the “apolitical” ones are on the right track. You see, for them the point at issue is message discipline. And message discipline is vital if you would craft a so-called “movement” (political or otherwise) that draws upon topical issues as a rallying point. For if you aim to gather followers and gain traction, you must stick to a relevant set of talking points and govern your tongue when you speak of those things.

That said, I would submit that the so-called men’s “movement” is nothing of the kind. No, it is merely a group of people, largely male, who are talking loudly about a variety of things. But all of this loud talk is like an orchestra with no conductor, where the musicians are out of tune with each other and playing different tunes anyway.

The general public, walking outside the orchestra hall, hears only a frightful racket from within. The bigoted bassoonist, the anti-semitic saxophonist, the conservative clarinetist, the anti-feminist flugelhorn player, the PUA piccolo player, and so on. It all runs together into a dreadful audio slurry.

And so the general public draws its varied conclusions about that sum total of weird noise, and those conclusions are often unfavorable. The general public, you see, deals in generalities. So it doesn’t generally know what the hell is going on. Some of them may enter the building, and wander around, and talk to the musicians separately, and begin to form a more educated understanding. Yes, many of them do this to varying degrees. But many others never investigate further than the sidewalk and what they can hear from there.

Very well. The “men’s movement” is no movement at all, but simply a lot of random motion. And such words as “MRA” and “MRM” are only ad hoc terminology. Figures of speech. Convenience words. And people persist in using these words because they are, well . . convenient! They simplify discussion, and even render discussion possible in the first place.

But these words also falsify the state of reality. And our enemies, the feminists, capitalize on this. All they must do, is fan the flames of doubt and distaste in the public mind. This, precisely, has been the feminist strategy. A smear job. Moral ghettoization. Guilt by proximity.

Briefly then, whoever simply talks against feminism will be called an “MRA”, or a member of the “MRM”.

Now, there is nothing wrong with talking against feminism. Nothing whatsoever. In fact, talking against feminism is one of the finest things a person can do. It is a noble thing to do. Feminism is a social cancer, and talking against it is part of the necessary process that will conduct toward the eventual liquidation of it. So by all means, yes, talk against feminism!

By the way, when you merely “criticize” feminism from within feminism, that is not talking against feminism. Talking against feminism means talking AGAINST it, from an alien standpoint completely outside of its borders.

All hail anti-feminism!

But the trouble is, that whoever simply talks against feminism gets shoved into the same box, willy-nilly, with. . . oh. . . PUAs, expatriate pussy-hunters, conspiracy theorists, racists, anti-government radicals, tea-partiers, bonafide misogynists, and a whole lot of other people. I mean, people whose philosophical venn diagrams might overlap yours by a narrow slice at most. Admittedly, the inherent goodness or badness of their ideas will vary — it is not my point to discuss inherent goodness or badness. My point is that, like it or not, the words "MRA" and "MRM" have been jammed into the same jar with the motley crew listed above, even if there is no inherent reason why they should be. And so if you identify as an "MRA", or even just get identified as one, then you will go there too.

Once more, to get identified as an "MRA" or an "MRM person", all you must do is to talk against feminism. That's it. After that, public ignorance, combined with feminist propaganda, will do the rest. And presto-chango, you are now a PUA or a Tea Party member even if you never remotely signed up for the likes of those.

Again, let's be clear that talking against feminism is a good thing. The point is, that you can do this either well or poorly in terms of political strategies — and some people do it very poorly indeed.

But enough for the bad stuff. Now let's talk about sunbeams and silver linings.

I mentioned that the "MRM" is not a movement. That is a silver lining.

So what, then, is the so-called men's rights "movement", if not a movement? Get ready.

It is a microcosm of the human race. In other words, it is THE WORLD.

And so, it is not accountable for itself, any more than the world is accountable for itself. The world is simply the ecumenical human condition, with all of its lights and shadows, in toto. And the ecumenical human condition simply is what it is. We are all part of that ecumenical human condition, but as individuals our liability is limited.

Feminism, on the other hand, may be usefully defined as a movement, and for that reason can be held accountable as a movement. It is a part of the world, but it is not the world — even though it pretends to be.

But no, feminism is merely an interpretation of what the world is, forced upon the world in defiance of what the world in fact is. Alternately stated, feminism is a violation of the natural order and the laws which compose that order.

Therefore every natural law or principle which feminist theory violates becomes our enlisted ally against the feminist regime itself. And so the character of our revolution is not just demographic or political. It is radically primordial.

Yes, that is us. We are the world, nay, the universe! And we are radically primordial.

In retrospect, we can see that this had to happen. It was predictable. There was a point beyond which feminist innovation could not push without the universe pushing back. And let me tell you, pushback from the universe can be a bitch!

So the "MRM" is not a movement as that word is generally understood, but a primordial pushback against feminism. And this involves a chaotic array of forces that can never be reduced to conventional categories of understanding. New categories are necessary.

Rather than calling the "MRM" a "movement" — singular — we should call it a complex of movements — plural! — which are now in process of formation. But as a whole, it lacks the structural unity that would subject it to accountability. As I have stated, it is a microcosm of the world, and is no more accountable for itself than the world is accountable for itself.

The feminist smear tricks are not working because our numbers, worldwide, continue to swell. Every slander campaign against us only helps us by giving us publicity. People drop by for a closer look, and plenty of them stick around. And then they pass the word along to their friends.

So the microcosm is growing, and merging with the macrocosm. The so-called “MRM”, you see, merely represents that portion of the non-feminist sector which has become politically aware of itself. And the size of the self-aware portion increases on a snowballing growth curve.

In light of all this, I return to an earlier question. What does it mean — and what could it mean — to keep things “apolitical”? Well for starters, I would call that entire realm of conversation a misunderstanding. For in fact this thing of ours has never been truly apolitical, and never will be. Seriously, what do we understand by “political”? Does politics mean the struggle for power, influence, and self-determination? All right, then how has our project ever been anything but political? It has been, I submit, political indeed, for it has always focused on power and the accumulation of it by one device or another. Yes, that is what I call politics.

When people talk about keeping the so-called MRM “apolitical”, they’re voicing a fear lest it be caught up in established categories of power struggle, eventually being co-opted and rendered worthless for its original purpose. This is more commonly expressed, as I myself have done, by saying that the movement will pick up counterproductive baggage and sink beneath the weight of it.

Well in a strange way the good news becomes the bad news, and then the bad news immediately becomes the good again. The original good news is, that our numbers keep growing. Then the bad news is, that in return for the numbers we are taking undisciplined people and their counterproductive baggage on board. Yet directly from this bad news the original good news springs to life once more, namely, that in spite of such inconveniences — and indeed because of them — our numbers continue to swell. So the good and bad news feed upon each other like yin and yang.

The lesson we draw from this, is that ALL SORTS OF PEOPLE WANT TO BE LIBERATED FROM FEMINISM. Some of these are good people, some of these are bad people, some of these are indifferent people. But they want to be liberated from feminism, and they are worthy of getting what they want.

Every god-damned blessed one of them.

They needn’t do one single precious thing in all the world to earn this or deserve this.

ALL people deserve to be liberated from feminism. Even the worst misogynist or rapist who ever lived deserves to be liberated from feminism.

The whole wide world deserves to be liberated from feminism.

All people should, ideally, get the justice they deserve for their misdeeds. But they should NOT get that justice under color of feminism.

They should get the justice they deserve under color of something else — some other system of law or morality.

But NOT under color of feminism.

One more time: the whole wide world deserves to be liberated from feminism.

And you know what? The whole wide world will wake up to this, and demand it.

Feminism is a worldview slated for extinction.

So it is silly to fuss about the ideological purity of any so-called “men’s movement”, because the whole wide world is coming on board and there is simply no way that the whole wide world can be ideologically pure. Therefore, if some feminist wants to slander the so-called men’s movement, you have only to demand “WHICH men’s movement??”.

And then, demand to be left in peace.

Because there is no such thing as this “men’s movement”. In its own right, it does not exist. So it is up to you to create it for yourself. There are ten, twenty, forty, a hundred different “men’s movements”, and when you start your own, that will bring the total to a-hundred-and-one.

What’s that, you don’t like the baggage that certain people are lugging on board? Fine. Pack your own bags onto your own wagon, and go your own road. With the growth of our numbers, we need no longer cling for dear life to any possible travelling companion. “We” can afford to be choosy.

Understand that every philosophy or life-system which grows beyond a certain mass will fractionate into schisms, and those schisms into schisms. The reason is simple. It is because the system naturally pulls in more and more of the world’s variety as it grows numerically. It cannot possibly do otherwise, because the world is never monolithic.

But this is a good thing. It is a source of strength and a cause for celebration. To us, it means that our enemy can no longer smear us, because you can’t smear something which is spread all over the landscape in the first place, can you? With our growing numbers and our variety of schisms, we are out of the box and we are everywhere, like a wraparound environment. It is impossible to shake a stick at us any more because you can’t shake a stick in all directions at once. So by reason of our ambient character we are, or soon will be, in a position to define the cultural ambience and even control the discourse.

The pro-male project as we have known it, is the germinating bud of something larger called the non-feminist revolution. Feminism’s war against the world started with the war against men, but that war quickly spread because it was impossible to contain it. So the non-feminist revolution has developed in the same sequence as feminist aggression itself — first with “sensitive males”, who understand best of all what is happening, and then spreading to larger circles and pulling in growing numbers of women.

The recent growth of anti-feminist feeling on the political Left signals a tectonic change in the political landscape. It signals that feminism’s intellectual reign of terror is weakening among that cohort — and the implications of such a development are perilous for feminism’s power base! But this development, like so much else, was a predictable thing that had to happen and, in the context of primordial pushback, couldn’t possibly not have happened.

Very well. Disciplined work lies ahead, but I can see that the field of opportunity is wide open.

We need to talk about Peter

I have to make a confession. It's rather embarrassing to have to admit to any psychological problems, but I'm afraid that in this case it's necessary, so that my viewpoint on a film that recently got raves is made clearer. I suffer from a rare mental disorder called Extreme Tilda Swinton Bias. I don't concern myself with it much, since I have found that it compliments Stravinsky on the Brain quite well.

I first discovered that I have this disorder when I saw "The Lion, the Witch, and the Wardrobe." I admit, my interest in that movie was minimal (How much more CGI and celebrity voice-overs do we need?), but then Swinton made her appearance. I could tell at the first cock of her head that, like a cat, her eyes point wherever her nose leads them. Be on your guard if she's ever looking directly at you. In the opening scene of "Orlando," one of my favorites, she looks directly into the camera, and straight into you. Watch out from then on, or you might have to join my support group.

Swinton's latest magnificent performance was in "We Need to Talk About Kevin," a misunderstood but beautiful movie directed by Lynne Ramsay. Like PJ Harvey, both Swinton and Ramsay strike me as the sort of female artists who have no need for political views or political power. True, in at least one interview I've read, Ramsay claims that the English film industry is "completely sexist," but for her achievement with "Kevin," I'll let it slide. Right or wrong in her assessment, when I read that she decided to be a drummer for a while after a disappointment surrounding "The Lovely Bones," a film she tried to make first before Peter Jackson got a hold of it, I figure she may embrace feminism or some other –ism, but she clearly has no need for it.

Great art has no need for any –ism at all. The greatest works of art always transcend the ability of the artist to create. Such was the case with Spike Lee's magnum opus, "Malcolm X," a highly politically charged movie that revealed X in all his complex wonder. You can't plan that.

Most days, with strange, quirky films like the previously mentioned "Orlando" or "Edward II," my ETSB doesn't trouble me too much. I simply learn to cope by enjoying it. Then there's mainstream Tilda running up on stage to win an Oscar for "Michael Clayton," where she expresses her own female version of Othello's torment (when he deliberately chooses evil over good), and pays the same sort of awful price. It doesn't bother me much there, either. Hell, she even made film noir palatable for me with "Julia."

Then there's "Kevin," which left me speechless. I went right onto the Internet Movie Database and gave it 5 stars out of 10, because of the horrifying way in which her son is portrayed, and the way that the father's character is "sidelined." (The description at IMDb.com certainly doesn't help, either.)

Great works of art, however, have a way of getting under my skin. They refuse to leave until they get the number of stars they deserve. Therefore, when I realized that this one wouldn't be leaving the thought process anytime soon, I dutifully went back, my fingers trembling with the more severe effects of ETSB, and gave it several more.

Unfortunately, great works of art are also subject to misinterpretation or, even worse, over-interpretation, sort of like giving Beethoven's Fifth a disco beat in the late seventies to make it danceable. (You've got to be kidding me!) Such is the case with a feminist-leaning review in The Guardian, written by a man who ought to know far, far better. Someone forgot to tell Peter Bradshaw that it's not only dangerous to read too much into a movie, but positively bad for your health to take feminist assertions seriously. Everything said in the linked review could just as easily be said in the exact reverse, by a men's-movement-loving-anarchist-fag like me. But I refuse.

I refuse to interpret or use this film as a condemnation of government schooling in toto, even though I'd love to. I cannot judge this film as being anti-male, either. There is good reason for showing an impossible boy, but I do not honestly believe it is to denigrate boys or men. There is also an excellent, even ingenious reason for making the father, played well by the loveable John C. Reilly, a side character (along with the baby sister), which only becomes completely apparent as this macabre masterpiece draws to a close.

Throughout the film, there are other reasons for showcasing what I might otherwise find objectionable. In simplest terms, the father and the sister are not the issue. It is not their behavior and relationships with Kevin that contribute to the unfolding horror, at least not much. But more than that, this is a film that largely exists in the mind of the mother, as she replays her life with Kevin, in a futile attempt to answer the question why. The viewer is not shown moments of Kevin's more tender thoughts and feelings because they are not germane to that question.

Therefore, the main idea of the story is centered on the thoughts of a grieving woman, Eva, whose life must start over with nothing to guide her but this one question, as she deals on a daily basis with having become a pariah in her own community. Of course the audience should sympathize with her. She is not responsible for the school massacre. In a touching moment that Bradshaw manages to mention in his idiotic review, the mother is confronted in the parking lot by a male classmate of Kevin who is now paralyzed (with some hope of being able to walk again, as he tells her with a big grin), fully expecting the venom that everyone else in town spits at her, male and female. She is genuinely surprised at his attitude, and it helps to provide much-needed balance.

What did she do wrong? She tells younger Kevin something horrible: "Before you were born, Mommy used to be happy. Now Mommy wakes up every day and wishes she were in France." She becomes violent, accidentally breaking his arm after he deliberately soils his prepubescent diaper, since he refuses to potty train, something he does seemingly for no other reason but to get back at her. Worse still, she convinces him to help her lie about the broken arm to everyone else.

Prior to that abuse, why would he want to get back at her? We are given clues as the mother reflects on a life she apparently didn't want, or was, at best, ambivalent about. She sits in the locker room after an exercise class that caters to pregnant women. All the other expectant mothers, standing around with protruding bellies that they lovingly caress and boast about, seem not to notice that Eva is seated by herself, staring blankly into the distance. She stares into this same distance in the hospital bed after giving birth. She holds baby Kevin at arm's length when he cries. She tries to push him into enjoying being a normal toddler by playing ball, when he's clearly not interested. He seems to be a child that most suburban women would fail to raise well, leading more than one reviewer to make mistakes in interpreting this as "some people are just born bad."

This is, in my view, an egregious error, one that Bradshaw makes in his review. Then he takes it to an inexcusable conclusion, beyond misunderstanding the point of the film: "It is a movie which is a skin-peelingly intimate character study and a brilliantly nihilist [No it's not.], feminist parable [It's not that, either.]: what happens when smart progressive career women give birth to boys: the smirking, back-talking, weapon-loving competitive little beasts that they have feared and despised since their own schooldays?"

Let's answer that disgusting question, a much easier one than the one posed in the film, by looking at some progressive career women in the film industry who have done just that.

Meryl Streep holds the record for the most Oscar nominations and the most Golden Globe nominations for acting, has worked steadily in film and kept a marriage together, both for more than 30 years, while raising four children to adulthood, including a "smirking, back-talking, weapon-loving competitive little" beast, Henry.

Goldie Hawn has been partnered with Kurt Russell for a long, long time during a long, long career in film and television, and raised three children, two of whom were boys, no doubt composed of little more than snips, snails, and random thoughts of murder.

Sally Field, while winning two Oscars, bested Streep and Hawn in the gross-out factor by permitting three Y sperms to impregnate her X eggs, one of whom, when he's not smirking, acts and directs. Bastard.

Oh my God, here comes the ETSB. Swinton herself has a son who's a teenager now. Run for cover. Don't look at me, lady!

Yet to another male reviewer like-minded with Bradshaw, "What [Ramsay] means to do is to explore Eva's guilt and self-loathing – her suspicion that she not only gave birth to a monster but somehow created that monster through her reluctance to sacrifice her career and lifestyle on some domestic altar." For fuck's sake, do these men even remember being boys?

Maybe there's one typical female complaint that could help us out here. Maybe these men should experience pregnancy, so that they can see what it's really, really like to be a woman. I'll direct them to this website, where we can read the words of some more career women:

Kathy Ireland: "I was once pro-choice and the thing that changed my mind was, I read my husband's biology books, medical books, and what I learned… At the moment of conception, a life starts. And this life has its own unique set of DNA, which contains a blueprint for the whole genetic makeup. The sex is determined. We know there's a life because it's growing and changing." Took the words right out of my mouth. Right out of my mouth.

Patricia Heaton: "The early feminists were pro-life. And really, abortion is a huge disservice to women, and it hasn't been presented that way. As Feminists for Life – what we're trying to do is support women, and so what we want to do is – reach women on campus – college campuses so that, when they get pregnant, they can find housing. They can find money they need to stay in school." A pro-life anarchist homo's free-market answer to the whole dilemma, and Heaton probably doesn't even know what an anarchist is.

Kate Mulgrew: "Life is sacred to me on all levels. Abortion does not compute with my philosophy." Friggin' Trekkie.

Madonna: "I was stunned when I saw on the ultrasound a tiny, living creature spinning around in my womb. Tap-dancing, I think. [Of course.] Waving its tiny arms around and trying to suck its thumb. I could have sworn I heard it laughing."

Brooke Shields: "Too many people use abortion as a form of birth control. And that's very wrong. I could never, ever have an abortion."

Susan B. Anthony, the mother of every woman's precious, precious vote, the denial of which oppressed them to the extreme: "Sweeter even than to have had the joy of caring for children of my own has it been to me to help bring about a better state of things for mothers generally, so their unborn little ones could not be willed away from them."

I guess they were only talking about girl fetuses. Boy fetuses, on the other hand…

Bradshaw's lousy interpretation of a thought-provoking, nightmarish movie does not square with what the director or even the author of the book has said. From Lionel Shriver, the author (and a woman, in case you were fooled by the name): "My biggest concern is to capture the quality of the slightly unreliable narrator, and the ambiguity over who is to blame [emphasis mine]." From the director: "It's not an issue movie."

The Guardian may be paying Bradshaw for his awful conclusion, but at least they also published an interview (where Ramsay accused the English film industry of sexism) written by Sean O'Hagan that, in my mind, settles the matter:

"'We Need to Talk About Kevin' is not a film for the fainthearted or perhaps anyone approaching childbirth for the first time. [Oh, for crying out loud. Another man who needs to get pregnant.] As the credits rolled in the preview screening I attended, I heard one woman tell another that the film 'was one long, violent argument against having children'. When I tell Ramsay this, she cracks up.

"'Man, people are funny. They bring their own stuff. The thing is, it's not a realist film. That's where people seem to be getting their knickers in a twist. It's a "what if?" film. And, if you're a mother, it's a bloody big "what if?" What if I don't love my child? What if he picks up on that and turns it back on me? It's a taboo subject and, for that reason, very disturbing in the questions it asks.'"

She then reveals, concerning her own mother and brother: "You could see a look in her eye sometimes that said: 'You fucker! I don't like you.' But, she always took him back. It's that mother-son thing, a kind of primal co-dependency. I definitely drew on that for Kevin."

The article goes on to mention that she worked with a child psychologist for the film, and came to the following conclusion: "Even to make a diagnosis, the child's behaviour would have to be so very extreme for a prolonged time. There are a lot of unanswered questions and different points of view, not least because even so-called normal kids can have abnormal behavioural tendencies for a while."

Born monsters? Bullshit. Boys especially, inherently, unavoidably, or uniquely so? An even bigger pile of bullshit. People certainly don't have to like this horror film, or the sex-shifting "Orlando," or the CGI-laden "Narnia" series, or any others of a handful of films not related to Tilda Swinton. But they do need to stop adding their own agendas to whatever they choose to watch.

Sadly, Bradshaw's review of the decidedly misandrist "The Girl with the Dragon Tattoo," an originally Swedish film (hint, hint) that takes place in Sweden (hint, hint, hint, hint), with assorted Nazis played by English-speaking actors this time, bespeaks of an agenda and a half going on in his feminist-sympathizing head:

"As the girl with the dragon tattoo, [Rooney Mara] is absolutely lethal, an implacable avenger and a black-belt sexual presence. Where Noomi Rapace's Lisbeth was sometimes mysterious, often acting from behind a Gothy curtain of hair, Rooney is more explicit, more aggressive… [conveying] Lisbeth's rage at the way she has been abused and raped by men, and shows how this has enabled her to help Blomkvist intuit the truth behind the misogynist hate-crimes."

How does Lisbeth do this? Well, instead of leaving the office of the heavily bearded government jerk who wants her to give him a blowjob and complaining to one of his superiors, or better yet, using her technological genius to get herself a fucking job instead of waiting on government dole, she electrocutes her rapist (right after he starts voluntarily apologizing for what he did), chains him to the floor, gags his mouth, shoves a gigantic metal dildo in his rectum without lubricant while he screams, and tattoos "I'M A RAPIST PIG" in big, black letters across his chest and protruding, hairy torso. For this, Rooney gets an Oscar nod, while Swinton does not.

As Bradshaw makes idiotically clear in that review, we're actually supposed to like and have sympathy for her up to the end of the film, a movie where the real killer frightens the audience by talking about how torturing and murdering his victims (cue the "genius" musical score) "…makes me ha-a-a-rd." Shortly after that, I pressed "eject." (No, wait. Let's say I pressed "open." The former sounds too much like "ejaculation.")

Several interviews with the director of "Kevin" and I still don't know what she thinks politically. Two reviews of Bradshaw's and his modus operandi is clear. He has successfully been instructed to hate that monstrous thing in all of us prick-owners, that "mystique" as it were, that makes us ha-a-a-rd.

In yet another interview, Ramsay gives reviewers like Bradshaw a warning: "Someone came to me at Ratcatcher [another film she directed] and said that, 'That's a film about Jesus Christ. You made a film about Jesus Christ. It's all the kids (are) Jesus' and I'm like, 'Dude, really?' I mean I wasn't really conscious of that, at the time, you know…"

Prior to doing this review, I looked up several Ramsay interviews just to see if I was missing a subtle political point, or an even subtler dig at the male sex. After numerous encounters with the director's own words, I failed. Then Bradshaw finishes his awful review of "Kevin" with a clincher, revealing why he says what he says, and embodying in his review one of the greatest feminist lies: "As Swinton's Eva wearily washes off the red paint that someone has splattered over her porch, the movie wanly restates the un-dramatic truth: the mess must be cleaned up somehow, and it isn't the men who wind up doing it."

On that repulsive, completely misfired note, shot like one of Kevin's arrows (see the movie to get that one), I'll busy myself with eagerly tending to my ETSB, and all its inherent pleasures. Mr. Bradshaw, after knowing full well how the movie ends, you should have known better than to write that execrable review. Get a goddamned clue.

What makes Jews so special?

Tom Givens · 7 July 2012 · Archived copy · Original

I'm reading some articles these days on the Cologne ruling on male genital mutilation (might as well get my personal stance out there right away), and one thing I keep seeing over and over is this idea that opposing MGM is anti-Semitic.

I've read too many articles flinging poo at "bigots" who oppose mutilation of babies, and too many weak defenses of the practice to take this sitting down any longer. So, here are some questions I have for those who would play the race/religion card, coherent answers to which are a basic requirement for credibility in my view.

Since the accusations are bound to be made: yes, I am "cut" myself, since birth, and no, I've got nothing against Judaism (or Islam, Buddhism, Shintoism, Catholicism, or, for that matter, Satanism. That being said, I would like to posit a question or two.

One of the most common defenses of the practice of circumcision is the connection to religious custom, and the longstanding acceptance of it. I'm fully aware that Muslims also practice circumcision, in addition to Jewish tradition (I include in this the Christian). I'm also fully aware that many other people practice it for other reasons than Religion. And that the practice is thousands of years old.

So, can we apply that same logic to other religious practices, such as, say, honor killing? Can we throw rocks at people who touch footballs? Those practices are also thousands of years old. Does that make it OK to do such things as well? No? Well then, what makes you so special? Why is the forcible removal of the foreskin acceptable, and honor killing, or stoning, is not?

Another religious argument, which tends to be more of a subtext, is the contention that Jews have a religious right to claim kinship with male babies by deforming them surgically. The induction of male babies into the Jewish faith, some contend, requires the "symbolic" sacrifice of circumcision.

Of course, there are many Jewish organizations that oppose circumcision, and there are alternative ceremonies that can be performed…but somehow, this mutilation remains fundamental to the Jewish faith? I might be a Gentile, but sorry, I'm not buying it.

Especially when this sacrifice is explained to me. Get this: it has been told to me that the loss of the foreskin is a ritual sacrifice to God, to show devotion. I asked that person why the "sacrifice" can't happen once the lamb reaches the age of majority. The (assumedly straight faced) reply: if men are given the choice, they usually opt out. And the corollary: We do it when they are that young so they don't remember it. Usually with the addendum that they will never know the difference, so what's the big deal?

Let me ask you… What kind of a "sacrifice" are you making when you are given no choice in the matter, when you have "no memory" of the sacrifice, and when the contention is that you will never know what you have lost (sacrificed) in the first place? That's not sacrificial, it's just brutality. It is not making a sacrifice, it is being offered up as one.

If I'm not mistaken (and believe me, I could be…I get most of my awareness of Judaic tradition from pop culture), Judaism and Islam, or more accurately Jews and Arabs, share common ancestry. My understanding is also that Islam and Judaism are branches split from a common faith, both following the God of Abraham. This makes my next question for Jews even more relevant.

What makes male circumcision and female circumcision different? What privileges your religious practices over those of your Muslim brothers (or third cousins removed twice on your mother's side), pray tell? Why is your circumcision of boys OK, but their circumcision of girls horrific? Why do you not support their demands for the practice on religious grounds, especially considering their support for your campaign to mutilate of boys?

After all, they're all just 'flaps of skin', aren't they? They contain roughly the same number of nerve endings, they both serve roughly the same function. Heck, they even develop from the same tissue. So seriously, why should we say your barbarism is more acceptable than theirs? Because "that's different"?

Please.

Speaking to the "anti-Semitic" nature of this argument, I would think awful hard before I positioned the mutilation of babies as the litmus test for anti-Semitism. Identity Politics is on its way out the door, after all, and I doubt this issue is worth having people view you, accurately, as baby mutilators.

I know there are huge numbers of thoughtful Jews out there that have opinions on this matter, and have a message they want to convey to the public, either pro or con. I am in no way convinced that even a majority of Jews feel this issue is worth the potential blowback, and a good number would like the controversy to simply go away. I personally know at least one guy who resents the hell out of having MGM portrayed as a "Jewish Issue" in the first place. His reasoned approach, however, seems to be undermined by a good many more people claiming religious privilege.

Call me an anti-Semite all you like, but I think answers to these questions are demanded if Gentiles who oppose circumcision are to endure accusations of racism from Jewish spokespersons.

How a limp dick can save the world

This article was first read on-air on AVfM Radio, by TyphonBlue. This is a revised and updated version of that on-air article:

How a limp dick can save the world, the full-length, uncut edition.
[/box]

Have you ever wondered why society expects men to maintain an ever-ready erection, a simple on/off sexual expression, while shaming them for 'only thinking about one thing?' This doublethink makes no sense. If men were sexually simple, they wouldn't have to be shamed into it, further why shame them for being sexually simple if that's what society wants from them in the first place?

But in actual fact this double-blind for men makes perfect sense when you look at it the right way.

Recent research has found that rejection is experienced as physical pain. It's a way of applying pain without damaging the person you're applying it to, the perfect system of torture, when harnessed correctly.

Society (and when I say society, I'm talking in terms of a social organism that uses men and women like cells to perpetuate itself) Society controls men through rejection. Social and sexual. In particular, men are constantly told their sexuality is depraved, damaging, disturbing, and demonic. Men experience this social drumbeat of sexual rejection as continuous pain. It could be likened to a shock collar wrapped around the neck of every man that delivers a constant electrical shock, varied just enough so the man in question never gets used to it.

The only time the shock collar stops delivering is when the man in question acquires approval from a woman. This approval can be social or sexual, but it is a woman who provides it.

This system really only works when there is a constant flow of electricity to men's shock collars. This flow is generated by holding men to an ideal of ever-ready sexual desire for women.

Men have to desire in order for it to be rejected, in order for their shock collars to function. This explains why society simultaneously enforces a performing monkey standard of male sexuality, while mocking men for being the very performing monkeys society wants.

In this system of controlling men through rejection, men rejecting women becomes a taboo. Now it's not that men are incapable of rejecting women, it's that society takes incredible pains to prevent this rejection. First it elicits the performing monkey ideal of male sexuality via use of the shock collar treatment—only sex with a woman will make the pain stop.

(Quick question. If you had a shock collar around your neck and the only time it turned off was when you were having sex… how often would you think about sex and how desperate would you be to have it? Yeah.)

At that point, society stigmatizes male rejection outright. How many articles have we read that follow the formula: men are rejecting women and that's because they're fucked up sexist losers? And how many times have we heard that men always consent to sex with a woman thus can't be raped?

In fact, society so hates male rejection of women that it has ghettoized men who sexually reject women into a completely separate identity and stigmatizes them by taking away their manhood. No other society has ever thought to separate men who reject women sexually from those who do not. It's certainly the case that homosexuals have existed in other societies–our society didn't just discover them one hundred and fifty years ago–it's just that those societies never felt a compulsion to separate them out. Just like we don't separate out men who like oranges from men who like apples.

However, if we were a society ruled by apple growers, you damn well better bet we'd be singling out orange loving men and calling them pussies.

Despite society's deep taboo regarding male rejection there is one lone hero standing up against the tyranny, standing up in defiance of the performing monkey sexual standard, standing up by… well… not standing.

Yes. The limp dick.

Now you're probably asking yourself, "But typhon, how does a limp dick save the world?".

To understand that let's look at why men experience impotence in the first place. Our nearest relatives, having muscular erections rather then ones based on vasocongestion, never experience impotence since, for them, a boner is about as simple as contracting your bicep.

Since impotence, for obvious reasons, can impede intercourse, that makes it reproductively costly. Which makes it evolutionarily costly. So why did human men evolve a system that can even experience impotence. One possible reason is that a highly reactive male sexual system can protect a pair bonder from encroachment by an unsuitable female partner. And this is important since damage to a male pair bonder's bonding system can be fatal. Four fold increase in men's suicide following divorce anyone?

But there is another way that a temperamental male sexuality can be adaptive.

Most people don't realize that our emotions are short cuts to decision making. We can lay new trail through rational arguments, but it's emotions that allow us to navigate the paralysis of indecision and make choices quickly. Particularly in a social context.

Sex is, by its nature, an emotional experience. Because it's an emotional experience, it has the potential to carve out new short cuts in our decision-making abilities.

To explain why, let's talk about theory of mind for a bit. Some researchers are starting to look to the canid species to model how a human theory of mind might develop. When dogs are playing they watch each other for attentional cues to decide if their playmate is engaged and happy. They seem to get more of a thrill out of play if that's the case and, of course, they want to make sure that the other party desires the play.

But if play is the mechanism by which theory of mind takes root in dogs; what's the mechanism by which it takes root in humans?

Well, play is a likely culprit as well. But compared to canids, we're talking about several orders of magnitude more complexity in the human theory of mind. So there's probably another answer as well.
Now an even more powerful an incentive then an engaged, appreciative playmate is an engaged, appreciative sexual partner.

Sex not only establishes a sense of self and other via our desire for a sexual partner, our sex also establishes a desire to be desired. We want a desirable sexual partner who is also desirous of us. That last bit is tremendously important.

Ever wonder why humans are one of the only species whose eyes signal exactly what they're looking at with a flash of white? Sort of a handicap for a predatory species, isn't it? It's because it assists in developing our theory of mind via sexual desire.

A man once said on a forum: "I'm going to start doing what women do, I'm only going to have an orgasm when my partner gives me one." He's not saying that a woman is obligated to give him an orgasm, no. What he was saying is that, up to that point, he had taken responsibility for giving himself an orgasm during sex.

It's not that it's easy for men to orgasm during the average act of penis in vagina sex, it's that they have no choice. In fact, the requirement that men perform is so onerous, multi-billion dollar industries have sprung up to help them out. One of them is the classic 'blue pill'. The other is the sex industry. Not only does the sex industry offer an outlet for the complexity of male sexual expression that is shamed in community sex, it assists men by offering them a way to emulate performing monkey sexuality. It gives them a fantasy to over lay onto substandard sex; a fantasy of an eager, active sexual partner, so that men can make themselves orgasm.

The comedian Jim Jeffries once said, "…it isn't you that's making us cum. It's the dirty, filthy thoughts in our heads."

A woman who ever ends up in a sexual relationship with a man who doesn't have his shock collar on will get a rude awakening to this fact. She'll also either leave or learn to deal with statements like "That's not doing anything for me." or, "Get off you're hurting me!" or "No, I didn't actually cum and if you just lie there thinking that lying still is all I require, I probably won't." She'll learn to deal with rejection, that, unlike a female chimp, that passively presenting her genital swellings for servicing just isn't enough.

And there's the rub, really. What did our ancestors do without Viagra, porn or elaborate systems of social rejection to maintain the illusion of performing monkey sexuality? The answer? Hominid females learned to work harder for sex.

When we're talking about our early female hominid ancestors, learning to be able to deal with complex male sexuality represents a potentially huge leap in their cognitive development. Before they just had to show up or maybe beg, after there was a whole bunch more complex social stuff involved. Human male sexuality is insanely difficult and complex because it's a part of human females developing their understanding of self and other and their perception of their actions having consequences in the greater world.

It's amazing how much human male sexuality resembles a game. You have immediate feedback when you're failing or have failed, you have levels of difficulty and you have a reward at the end (the best in the animal kingdom). And games teach valuable experiences. In this case human male sexuality allows women the opportunity to lay down a emotional map of how to deal with rejection: with challenge, with unpredictability.

This is the basis of all achievement. It enables women to liberate themselves from a passive identity defined by being desired, either sexually or socially, and see themselves primarily in terms of how they choose to act.

This makes women immune to social systems that tell them what to do to be desirable or what not to do. This makes women immune to outside forces that very explicitly want to control their behavior. Foot binding, corsetry, victim ideologies that teach women to view themselves as helpless in every situation. Uncontrollable, unpredictable, challenging male sexuality elevates women from passive recipients of whatever life thrusts into them into active participants in creating life.

So if we're going to talk about human male potency it should be spoken of in terms of the type of sexuality male humans actually have, not the artificial sexuality they are expected to have. In that sense male potency is about its effect on human female psychology, it's elevation of the human female from livestock to co-creator. That's human male potency.

And that potency is best represented not by the predictable ever-ready erection, but ironically by the implacable, temperamental, flaccid penis with its challenge to "try harder!".

So why does a man really need to maintain the façade of being performing monkey? In order to maintain the illusion that all a woman needs to be is passive, so that she's controllable by society.

Because when women obtain the emotional map that allows them to control their own identities, well those sounds you're hearing, dear listener, are the stirrings of a prison break. And when women stage a prison break, not only are men along for the ride, but the whole damn prison complex comes crashing to the ground.

And that is how a limp dick can save the world.

Altobelli's Dilemma: A contrasting verdict

Jim Muldoon · 9 July 2012 · Archived copy · Original

Recently, A Voice for Men published an article of mine entitled Altobelli's Dilemma: The failure of Australian Family Law (Blueface, 2012).

The dilemma Federal Magistrate Tom Altobelli faced was that a mother had turned the children against their father with accusations of sexual and physical abuse. So the children, Altobelli felt, would have been distressed if placed with their father; but to deny the children access to their father would cause them long term harm and deny the children their right to a relationship with both parents (Altobelli, 2012).

Altobelli's answer was to ban the father from seeing the children, but to also write a letter to the children asking them to see their father. The children are to be given the letter by a counsellor when they turn 14.

The case uses the surnames of Gaylard for the mother and Cain for the father, but these are not their real names.

If you were to read the press coverage of this case, you would understand that this reached the attention of the media because of the letter. The Herald Sun called the letter an "extraordinary step" (Murphy, 2012). The ABC quoted the former chief justice of the Family Court Alastair Nicholson's praise for writing the letter (ABC News, 2012).

The fact that the father is banned from seeing his children, but has done no wrong, is treated as unfortunate, but not unusual. The fact that the mother was criticised for harming her children by the authorities, but gets sole control of the children because of that same behaviour, is not remarkable at all.

> The fact that false accusations, when found to be false by a court, are not sufficient reason for prosecuting Gaylard for this crime is completely ignored.

Contrast this verdict with another recently made in the same state, but not quite the same jurisdiction, as Altobelli's court. Magistrate Graham Blewitt in the New South Wales Children's Court, according to Vanda Carson of the Daily Telegraph, banned a mother from seeing her four children after they had been in her care for three years since splitting up with their father (Carson, 2012).

To avoid confusion between the two cases, let us call the mother in Blewitt's case Smith, and the father, Jones.

This verdict is called, by Carson, "extreme" because Smith is no longer allowed to see her children. But, is this simply a matter that Altobelli favours mothers, whilst Blewitt evens things out by favouring fathers?

Hardly! Blewitt's reason for banning Smith was because she was a serious danger to her children, particularly the eldest boy aged nine. So, how much of a danger does a mother have to be before she gets banned?

Smith, it seems, showed "signs of Munchhausen syndrome by proxy — a form of child abuse where parents repeatedly invent illnesses for their children because they crave attention and sympathy." Because of this, she "openly declared the boy had only a short life expectancy and discussed arrangements for his funeral in front of him."

But is this enough to ban a mother? Again, hardly. We've just got started! Smith, with her conviction of his illnesses took the son hospital. Not once, not twice, but 115 times in three years. On many of these occasions the hospital trip was completely unnecessary; on other occasions he showed signs of asthma attacks. He has not had an asthma attack since being removed from his mother's care.

Carson highlights two incidents of note:

"She… encouraged staff to perform an invasive bronchoscopy on her son when it was likely unnecessary. In another incident at Wollongong Hospital after the boy began hitting his head due to distress over her behaviour, the mother allegedly encouraged him to hit himself harder."

Overall, hospital staff "…became concerned the mother was inventing or lying about the ill health of three of her children after she repeatedly tried to have them admitted to hospital."

All of this caused the family to be reported to the Department of Family and Community Services. Again, not one, not two, but 26 reports of the mother's abusive behaviour were made.

What of the other three younger children? The court heard the experts had referred to them as "the forgotten children" and that "while obsessing on her eldest child she neglected the others."

But, it seems that until the boy "attempted to commit suicide at the hospital, saying that he had 'had enough'," the count of abuses was simply going to keep going up and up. It was only when things got this bad that "the Director-General of FACS made the extraordinary application to ban the mother."

This is how bad things have to get before the courts consider the "extreme" step of banning a mother. Nonetheless, this also shows that banning mothers from seeing their children is an option that is open to magistrates when mothers are abusive.

Yet, in Altobelli's mind, Gaylard is not there yet. Altobelli writes "Their mother has indeed alienated them from their father. The once good and meaningful relationship they had with him no longer exists." But it goes further than that. She has convinced her daughter that she was sexually abused by her father. She has convinced her son that his sister was abused by Cain and he should be both contemptuous and afraid of his own flesh and blood.

Heaven knows what this does to the children's psyche! The court expert, Dr. K. conceded "But there's no doubt that I would agree with the professional opinion of JIRT [Joint Investigation Response Team that investigates child abuse] that in this area, the mother is not helping her kids and in fact is creating developmental damage."

What is clear is that the only practical way for the children to have a relationship with their father would be to ban Gaylard from the scene she created. Otherwise, she would only continue to make these false claims of abuse and do all that she could to alienate the father and the children.

What is also clear is that Altobelli did not even consider this "extreme" step as a possibility, and so, instead took the unfortunate, but not unusual, step of banning the father. Indeed, Altobelli's justification for banning the father was that he "could not convincingly articulate" how to deal with the situation. This, of course, was because the situation consisted of "…the children, the mother, and himself [the father]."

The interesting thing to note here, too, are the similarities between the mothers both cases, which also show the failings in Altobelli's decision.

According to Altobelli, Gaylard "sees the father through a distorted lens". This view originates from Dr. K's testimony where he states "most of the inaccurate conclusions [by the mother] were accurate observations wrongly interpreted through a sort of distorted lens".

This interpretation of an individual's reasoning would similarly apply to Smith. The view through the lens for Gaylard showed sexual abuse, for Smith it was illness. Yet, surely everything that Smith did, given her distorted view that the child was ill, was correct.

Where Altobelli and Dr. K's get it wrong is highlighted when Altobelli writes "She [Gaylard] is not being malicious or malevolent, she is quite simply shackled by a distorted frame of reality."

Regardless of the intent, Gaylard's behaviour was, and will continue to be, harmful to her children. For Smith, irrespective of her motivations, her affection for the children, and the children's affection for their mother, she was banned because her actions were harmful. The only difference in Gaylard's case is that the harm being done to the children hasn't openly manifested in this manner.

At least, not yet. It seems that to Altobelli and Dr. K, like those at the Department of Family and Community Services, the Gaylard-Cain children are only at hospital visit 75 and report number 18.

There was one more similarity in these two cases worth a mention, just in case you get a warm feeling that Magistrate Blewitt is the first anti-misandry champion of the Australian courts.

Carson informs us that the court banned any physical contact or written communication between the children and the mother. She goes on to say:

> "Once they are in their teens, it is agreed that no court order can actually stop them from seeing their mother if they want to.
> But if this happens, their father may end up losing custody of them and they may be placed in care."

The court can't be held responsible for the mother's misbehaviour; the mother can't be held be responsible for the mother's misbehaviour; but the father… well someone's got to pay.

Further insight on feminist shaming tactics

Zerbu · 10 July 2012 · Archived copy · Original

If you're familiar with men's rights activism, then you're probably familiar with feminist shaming tactics. It's always the same, and it has remained the same for years:

- You just hate women!
- You are a rape apologist!
- You can't get laid!
- You sound very bitter!
- No woman would want to date you!
- You are not a real man!
- You're afraid of strong women!
- Stop whining!

Wherever MRAs, or even just random people who are questioning feminism and men's issues, come into contact with feminists and white knights, there is almost a guarantee that the ones opposing the men's rights movement will rely heavily on ad hominem arguments and other logical fallacies. It has already been established that there isn't a legitimate argument supporting feminism's case, because if there was, they would surely have used it be now, so their only method of defence is through use of such fallacies.

So, do these feminists and white knights really believe what they say? Do they really believe that the only reason anyone stands up for the human rights of men and boys is because they hate women, can't get laid, can't get a girlfriend, are bitter, or any other illogical reason they may provide? Or is this just a deliberate attempt to silence the movement.

Unless those feminists and white knights are deluded enough to believe what they say about anyone who dares stand up for the rights of men and boys, then chances are that, for most of them, it is just an attempt to silence the movement.

So why do they do this? Well, it's not like feminism benefits everyone, right? It most certainly does not benefit men, and if you look deeply, it doesn't do much good for women either, as it lowers them to the level of infantilized children. The feminists, and their white knight supporters, are more than happy with the current system, and will do anything to defend it, which includes fighting off anyone who opposes it, and most importantly, keeping facts well away from the public.

There are several different goals that the opponents of the men's rights movement may wish to achieve through the use of shaming tactics.

The first goal is to shoo away any newcomers who may become active in the men's rights movement, by guilting them into believing their perfectly rational opinions are wrong. Perhaps, in the process, they could also leave a blow on the potential MRA's self esteem. The possible outcomes to this are: the target will ignore the shaming and continue, the target will leave the movement, or the target will get more dedicated to the movement. The third one of these outcomes is very often the case.

The second goal is to convince the target that what is being said in the shaming tactic really is true. The tactic will be used to the point that the target questions their own motives, and starts to believe that the activism really is, deep down inside, just the result of an angry hatred of women, or an angry outlet for other life problems. Because after all, we're only standing up for the human rights of men and boys, right? We almost make it sound as if there could be other reasons why we want males to have human rights, other than a hatred of females or anger at unrelated life problems.

So why is it, even when they fail to get you to leave the movement, and fail to get you to believe false things about yourself, they still resort to shaming tactics? In fact, nothing will get feminists and their white knight supporters to stop using these empty and predictable accusations. Even if you specifically state that you have wised up to these shaming tactics, you will still be bombarded with them. Even the same opponents will use the same shaming tactics over and over, on the same targets.

Perhaps, for some of them, they are attempting through repetition, to foster doubt and self loathing in men who have the sheer effrontery to regard themselves as humans of value.

But for most of them, they know that there is no convincing you. Their goal is no longer to convince you that there is something wrong with your opinions, it is to deal as much social pain as possible. Studies have shown that social pain is felt like physical pain[1][2], and so the opponents attempt to deal as much social pain as possible.

You see, they already know you've wised up to their shaming tactics. They already know you're well educated and aware of what feminism really is. They already know that you know your own motives. They already know that your activism is political and not a mere personal problem. They already know that you're not just bitter or angry because you can't get laid or can't get a woman to like you.

They just don't want to walk away empty-handed. Sure, they could just leave the argument and not say a word, but then nobody would be socially hurt. Opponents repeat the same shaming tactics over and over again to overwhelm you. To make you get fed up with their ignorance and lack of logic. Most importantly, they want to inflict social pain – and that is felt the same as physical violence.

This will persist because feminists and their white knight supporters know they can get away with it. They know that, as long as they have all their supporters, that the one discussion alone won't end feminism. They use shaming tactics because it's the easiest way that works. They can't use logical arguments, because they don't have any legitimate ones, and they fail to otherwise convince you to feel guilty, so they try to get out of the argument the easiest way possible and inflicting the most amount of social pain as possible – the social equivalent of physically hitting someone and then running off.

Starting from first principles

John Hembling (JtO) · 10 July 2012 · Archived copy · Original

A woman's body, a woman's choice. We've all heard it, we all know it, or at least we think we know it. In fact, this phrase, a woman's body, a woman's choice has been repeated into our ears so many times it has lost it's meaning, and has taken on a new purpose. What it means now, after millions of repetitions, in print and in voice, in a modern zeitgeist, is: shut up and do what you're told.

That's what it means when you hear, or when you read the words, a woman's body a woman's choice. It means, shut up and do what you're told.

But if we are to parse that statement, and dig into its purely grammatical meaning, it turns out to be one of the foundations of ethical principal.

This is the principal of self ownership.

I own myself. Just as you own yourself. That means I own my body, which is a natural part of myself.

Similarly, you own your body, because it is a natural part of you. That means, you also own, by natural right, the labor and the product of the labor of your own body. What you create, you own.

However, this does not extend to the ownership of people. People own themselves. Even when they are infants without the developed capacity to articulate or to act meaningfully on their own behalf.
The idea sometimes expressed that a parent owns their child, if interpreted literally, is an obscenity.

A parent is steward of that child, and as a parent, bears responsibility for protecting that child from harm, as well as caring for the child's needs as they develop into a fully self actualized person.

So we return to : a woman's body, a woman's choice. Really, this should be expressed as a person's body, a person's choice, because if we are to read this literally, using "woman" then we are saying by implication that only women can exercise the basic principal of self ownership, and that non-women, which implies men, that men cannot exercise the principle of self ownership.

In western philosophical tradition, and in western law, there is a dictum, usually expressed in latin which states "Expressio unius est exclusio alterius" which means, the The expression of one thing is the exclusion of another. Anyone interested can go look this up at the web site legal-dictionary.thefreedictionary.com if they want to. Or if you have a lawyer friend, ask them.

If we apply this principle to a number of common-knowledge social dictums, what does it reveal in our comprehension of those familiar ideals.

The white ribbon campaign is the name of an international anti violence program, producing public service announcements, literature, writing policy white papers, endowing scholarships and mounting anti violence campaigns on university and college campuses all over the world.

They describe themselves in their own literature as : the largest effort in the world of men working to end violence against women.

However, a visit to the US DOJ bureau of justice statistics website will show anyone with a functional internet connection that for every type of violent crime, and in every age range, men are the majority of the victims of violence. But the white ribbon campaign is – in their own rhetoric : the largest effort in the world of men working to end violence against women. Not the largest effort to end violence, not even an effort, large or small to end violence, but to end violence against women. Even though, men weather the majority of violent victimization.

Article 1 of the united nations universal declaration of human rights reads as follows.

"All human beings are born free and equal in dignity and rights.They are endowed with reason and conscience and should act towards one another in a spirit of brotherhood."

Article 2 of the universal declaration of human rights reads :

"Everyone is entitled to all the rights and freedoms set forth in this Declaration, without distinction of any kind, such as race, colour, sex, language, religion, political or other opinion, national or social origin, property, birth or other status. Furthermore, no distinction shall be made on the basis of the political, jurisdictional or international status of the country or territory to which a person belongs, whether it be independent, trust, non-self-governing or under any other limitation of sovereignty."

And article 3 reads as follows :

"Everyone has the right to life, liberty and security of person."

Article 4 talks about slavery, article 5 talks about torture, article 6 deals with equal recognition under the law. And so on, but lets go back to article 3 for a minute. While the UN does things I strongly disagree with, the principals I've listed from the universal declaration of human rights are not an area I find cause for dispute. These principals are not controversial, they are basic and self evident.

Article three states : Everyone has the right to life, liberty and security of person. This is one of the two most succinct article in the entire charter, tied for brevity with article 9.

But what does security of person mean? Simply, it means freedom from harm, and from violence against their person.

But we must stop violence against women.

> "One of the, maybe the most, elementary of moral principles is that of universality, that is, If something's right for me, it's right for you; if it's wrong for you, it's wrong for me. Any moral code that is even worth looking at has this at it's core."
> ~Noam Chomsky

Those are not my words, but I stand behind them.

This doesn't mean if I like chocolate cake, you too much like chocolate cake, it means that if freedom from harm or from violence is the right of one group of people, then freedom from harm and violence is a the right of all people.

But we have such things as the "largest effort in the world of men working to end violence against women".

The expression of one thing is the exclusion of another.

Let's not forget: "Her body; her choice". This neat little catch phrase doesn't explicitly mention that her choice includes the standard practice of enforcing the agreement of a man whose participation is not his choice, and whose legally forced funding of her choice is not his legal right.

And no, the choice to have sex is not the same as the choice to reproduce.

How about this: "Feminism is the radical notion that women are people".

Expressio unius est exclusio alterius. Translated again, that means The expression of one thing is the exclusion of another.

The radical notion that men are not people. And sadly, this is not today a radical notion.

But this is why it is necessary to begin from first principals.

If it's wrong for one, it's wrong for another. And any moral code that is even worth looking at has this principal of universality at it's core.

Let's consider another basic ethical first principal.

This is sometimes called "non violence" but that expression is sloppy, to the point almost of being menaingless.

Violence exists, a fact of life which can be confirmed by cursory observation. Just saying non violence isnt too useful.

This doesn't become meaningful until we become a bit more specific, and state clearly that the non-initiation of violence is a fundamental element of not simply ethics, or morality, but of ethical behavior.

Why specify behavior? Simple, because if this is all just a game of verbal badminton, then this discussion is as useful as a nail cast from lead. It looks like a nail, but try using it to build anything in the real world.

But non-initiation of violence thus isn't simply a nice collection of words, its something to be put into practical application, thus, it is a preferable behavior.

Stephan Molyneux calls this Universally Preferable Behaviour, however, lets consider it simply preferable behavior for anyone who's goal is to foster peace, live happily, and to not inflict suffering and conflict on others.

Non initiation of violence it is quite evidently not preferable to some people, but by observation, we can see that these are people whose goals include the fostering of conflict, increasing suffering, human damage, et-cetera.

This unfortunately provides a lot of wiggle room for arguments such as initiation of violence can be a tool in the pursuit of longer term peaceful outcomes.

In other words, the ends sometimes justify the means.

Well, no, they don't. Suffer today, and tomorrow your reward comes. That con-game is at least 5 thousand years old, and its a con game. The future doesn't exist. Now exists. Any rationalization that initiation of violence now, serves a better outcome in the future depends on hiding the fact that the only thing which actually exists is the present, and that's where violence is initiated.

But lets return to our principal, the non initiation of violence – and take it out of the airy-fairy real of abstract bullshit, and make it real. It's not just words, its practical, so it becomes , borrowing again from the guy with the haircut, the non initiation of violence becomes universally preferable behavior.

Back to the principal of universality. The most elementary of moral principles is that of universality. That is; if something's right for me, it's right for you; if it's wrong for you, it's wrong for me. Any moral code that is even worth looking at has this at it's core.

Now let's apply this filter to an often repeated element of public rhetoric. She deserved it. Usually this is a statement referring to a violence or harm or injury's infliction on a person, denoted in this case as female by the word she.

She deserved it.

This is not intellectually challenging or controversial, it is simply and universally repugnant. She deserved it – issued as a statement in reference to some incident of harm or violence is simply wrong, it is morally repulsive.

This is not difficult, and it is not controversial. It is simple, and everyone listening understands it, whether they will admit it or not.

But what about this?

He deserved it.

In this case we're talking about a man, who while he was not murdered, was profoundly and brutally mutilated – and when the words "he deserved it" were uttered in commentary on a day time television show, the audience exploded into hysterical laughter.

The charges against the assailant in this case were felony torture, and aggravated mayhem

One of the hosts of that show, when challenged on her open contempt and gleeful celebration of the permanent and debilitating wilful mutilation on that "he" said – and I quote: "it's different". she also said "I do think it's quite fabulous" as the audience squealed in obvious delight.

Any moral code that is even worth looking at has this principal of universality at it's core. This is me quoting somebody else again, but this statement is incontestable. This is not an advanced or abstract complicated concept, it is basic. This is understandable by toddlers.

But, according to a celebrity, an entertainer, and the studio audience to roared with delighted agreement at the commentary of that host, "it's different".

Now this discussion is not intended as an indictment of that celebrity, nor, even of the individual members of that television show's audience, attending that episode's taping.

This is an indictment of a public ethic in which taking a sharp instrument and mutilating an infant girl is properly recognized as the mutilation of a child, but where public figures can argue for the mutilation of boys without drawing public censure and scorn onto themselves as advocates of child mutilation.

This is the indictment of a the common sense that human beings killed only matter enough to talk about as humans at all when they own the correct genitalia. Among the dead refugees were women and children. The male dead do not merit mention.

And of course your feelings will tell you how tragic it is when women and children die. In fact, according to one of the most socially influential people in the world: "The truth is that which feels right".

It was the great philosopher Winfrey who said this, and for the most part, it is accepted uncritically. It doesn't require intellect, or reason, or honesty or courage to slurp up the empty self praise of this solipsism. Whatever you feel like, that's the truth. However, this expressed view does have the singular benefit of flattering and controlling adults who retain the intellectual acumen of tiny toddlers.

And of course, if this empty flattery is combined with a narrative of us, versus them, using a real or an imaginary other, it renders the abrogation of the humanity and the human rights of a designated demographic of OTHER, completely palatable – because the truth is that which feels right.

This by the way is the mechanism by which societies justify such things slavery, and genocide.

It is also, incidentally why first principals matter, it is why they are important. Such as the universality of ethics,

Everyone has the right to life, liberty and security of person.

It's why a stated goal of stopping violence against women is unsound.

It is why the idea of her body, her choice is ethically unsound.

It is why; the truth is that which "feels right", is execrably inexcusable, coming from a black female billionaire whose early career included the emblematic 1980's film about slavery.

And why any coherent or practical discussion of human rights must begin from first principals.

[box]
Addendum: I mistakenly referred to the movie "The Color Purple" as a film on the topic of slavery. In fact, this movie's sadly predicable topic was the mistreatment of black women by black men. However, Winfrey's position, as a black billionaire in a country with a history of black (and white) slavery gives her no possible excuse for saying "..the truth feels right.."

The state of play for men: Domestic Violence

Andy Thomas · 11 July 2012 · Archived copy · Original

Myth: Domestic violence is a crime largely perpetrated by aggressive men against women.

Summary: Men under report incidents of domestic violence targeted at them, and society downplays the scale of male suffering, and in many cases, refuses to acknowledge that it exists at all. In fact, recent studies on both sides of the Atlantic are increasingly showing that men are affected by domestic violence at least as much as women.

Discussion: In 2000, the National Violence Against Women Survey estimated that there are 830,000 male and 1.5 million female victims of domestic violence in the United States each year[1]. More recent studies are increasingly presenting a picture of approximate parity between the sexes in terms of partner violence, however. For example, the Centers for Disease Control (CDC) is a federal agency under the Department of Health and Human Services, but it also recognized for its research into domestic and sexual violence. In 2011, it published the National Intimate Partner and Sexual Violence Survey which shows that 5.0% of men and 5.9% of women reported experiencing rape, physical violence, and/or stalking by an intimate partner in the 12 months prior to taking the survey[2].

In 2006, the Journal of Family Psychology (an American Journal) published the results of research which found that, between couples, the incidence of male-to-female violence was 13.66%, but for female-to-male violence it was actually higher at 18.20%[3]. It also found that women were twice as likely as men to initiate severe violence against their partners. This finding is supported by a more recent California State University survey of some 286 scholarly investigations, 221 empirical studies and 65 reviews independent studies. It concludes that women are as physically aggressive, or more aggressive, than men in their relationships[4].

In the UK, the British Crime Survey (BCS) for 2010/11 reported similar results as the CDC survey in terms of the male-female violence ratio. It found that 5% of men and 7% of women had experienced domestic abuse in the year prior to the survey[5]. It also found that 3% of men and 4% of women reported that they had experienced stalking in the previous year[5].

PARITY, a gender equality campaigning charity in the UK, submitted a memorandum to the UK Parliament back in 2007 stating:[6]

"There is now a considerable body of evidence, in particular by a succession of detailed Home Office surveys in the past decade of interpersonal violence in England and Wales, to demonstrate the existence of a substantial level of female violence against male partners, including severe and/or repeated physical assault. Despite this, support services specifically for male victims are largely absent or inadequate, and few women are actually charged or prosecuted for domestic violence against a male partner."

The number of women convicted of domestic abuse in the UK has, in fact, increased fourfold in the last 7 years, from 806 in 2004/5 to 3,965 in 2010/11[7]. However, of all prosecutions for domestic violence in England and Wales, approximately 93% of them are against men[8].

Men are much less likely than women to tell others about what they had suffered. The BCS found that only 19% of male victims would tell someone in a professional organization–half the number of female victims (44%). It also found that 28% of male victims do not tell anyone–more than twice the proportion for women[8].

In fact, men attempting to report violent assaults against them can expect to face disbelief, ridicule and counter allegations. Only 10% of men will tell the police in the UK, three times less than women[9]. In their memorandum to the UK Parliament, PARITY stated, "Anecdotal evidence suggests that the police and other agencies…are often not even-handed in their response to male victims…in a significant number of cases arresting the male victim instead of the female perpetrator."

On the other side of the Atlantic, a recent Canadian study reported similar results. It found that women are four times more likely to report partner violence to police than men[10], and concludes that: "Men who are involved in disputes with their partners, whether as alleged victims or as alleged offenders or both, are disadvantaged and treated less favourably than women by the law-enforcement system at almost every step."

Organizations working with male victims also report a high degree of scepticism amongst professionals and the public towards male victims of domestic violence[11]. Much of the literature produced in the field of domestic abuse quote female victim statistics only, while completely omitting those for males, thus suggesting that the problem only applies to women. In fact, some women's organizations even go as far as to make the highly dubious claim that a staggeringly high percentage of men (90%) who report that they are victims of domestic violence are lying (they are abusers pretending to be victims). This claim is refuted by the Mankind Initiative, a charity working with male victims in the UK. According to its own screening program, 98.75% of men calling its helpline are true victims[12]. It notes that no there is no equivalent research on females as no organization is willing to make the same assessment.

Moreover, the very narrative of domestic violence itself is often framed in a female only context by international bodies, governments and support organizations around the world. For example, the United Nations defines domestic violence as follows[13]:

"Any act of gender-based violence that results in, or is likely to result in, physical, sexual or psychological harm or suffering to women, including threats of such acts, coercion or arbitrary deprivations of liberty, whether occurring in public or private life."

By this definition, therefore, male targeted domestic violence simply does not exist. This is the same definition used by many organizations in the UK, including the Crown Prosecution Service and the Equalities and Human Rights Commission. In the US, there is VAWA–the Violence Against Women Act, which is administered by the Department of Justice Office on Violence Against Women. There is clearly no recognition of men, other than as perpetrators, in this narrative.

Correspondingly, there is little in the way of support for male victims. There are over 1200 abuse shelters in the United States, but few will accept men. For example, Los Angeles County funds two dozen shelters exclusively for abused women, but only one shelter will accepts male victims[14]. In the UK, the situation is similar, if not worse. There are 7,500 beds in refuges dedicated to women, but there are only 72 beds that can be used by men[15] (the majority of these can also be used by women). And while a woman fleeing abuse may find a shelter that will take both her and her children, a man attempting to do same will fear arrest for kidnap[16], irrespective of whether he is the victim or not.

Over the years, large sums have been spent by governments around the world on campaigns to encourage women to report domestic violence and to seek help, with no similar campaigns targeted toward male victims, or provisions made for them. The crude negative stereotyping of men as aggressors and women as victims has no doubt obscured men's suffering from society's view. While the well founded fear and stigma that prevents men from coming forward to report their suffering remains, the true picture of domestic violence will always be incomplete.

Note. The above text intentionally discusses domestic violence, as it applies to men, in both the US and UK. The problem is not specific to any one country, and it was considered useful to provide examples and references for both. However, the argument presented stands for each country independently, even if content specific to the other is omitted.

The Non-Feminist Coalition Rejects Violence

Luigi Logan (aka Fidelbogen) · 12 July 2012 · Archived copy · Original

Violence as a political tactic is both unnecessary and counter-productive. Clearly we don't recommend it, and we don't seek it.

But at the same time, we realize that if conditions x, y and z are in place and continue unabated, then violence, as a primordial force in the world-at-large, will be the probable outcome. This violence may channel itself through numerous subcultures, agendas, ideologies and so on. And yet, being primordial, it will transcend all of those. Such is the nature of a primordial force — natural, impersonal, chaotic, and not "political" as most people would understand that term.

Pragmatically speaking, this means that if a targeted demographic is subjected to x,y and z systemically and en masse, then "violence" in its limitless and twisted forms, will be the result. Therefore, without prescribing violence, we may safely (and quite ethically) predict its appearance in the world, as a natural consequence of certain conditions.

And so we, the politically activated non-feminist coalition, will find no profit in promoting, instigating or advocating violence. We are painfully aware that objective conditions will breed violence independently of anything we say, or don't say, about the situation. So in effect, we*do not need to push the river.* It is enough for us to sit upon the bank, gaze upstream, and make note of what the current will deliver.

Hence prediction becomes our weapon, or rather our shield. For it keeps us, the predictors, upon the moral high ground. The other side can either listen, and heed our wise counsel proactively, or carry on with business as usual. If they choose the latter, they will come down on the wrong side of history.

This is somewhat like the Mafia game of "making them an offer they can't refuse." But there is a vast difference because, when the Mafia does this, it is a threat of Mafia violence plain and simple.

But when we do this we are issuing no threat of any kind, since the only threatening element is a force majeure, beyond our control. The threat is, therefore, ambient, and we are merely directing attention to what should be obvious. Yet we are making an "offer", namely, an offer to advise the other side for it's benefit, and for the benefit of the world. And if they are wise, they will not refuse this. Rather, they will lend an ear. Are we not predicting the eruption of primordial violence, and making it clear how to prevent such a thing?

When we warn of an imminent danger, we discharge our duty. Thereafter, the onus falls upon the other side, and we have only to sit beneath a tree with arms folded, and make note of how the other side measures up. We have summoned them to accountability and responsibility, and our merit in so doing will characterize us, even as their failure to heed the summons would characterize them.

When the other side proffers violence — whether physically or spiritually, openly or by proxy — they choose to be the aggressor. And since the rule is that the aggressor sets the terms of engagement, the non-aggressor is morally entitled, in a pinch, to answer like with like.

Yes, violence becomes an acceptable method of operation only if undertaken in self-defense, and only if the onus of moral transgression is clearly seen to fall upon the other side.

In the end, we wish to keep violence, and all unhappy consequences of the present historical crisis, to an absolute minimum. Accordingly, the other side confronts a moral choice — to either collaborate with such a project, or to hinder it. And whichever road they follow, history will judge them.

AVfM Radio: Objectification of Men

AVfM Radio · 12 July 2012 · Archived copy · Original

This is not the sexual objectification you are accustomed to hearing of. This is not objectification of individuals as objects of desire or beauty. The true objectification of human beings occurs when we treat them as disposable utilities, use them to the point of destruction, and then discard them like store brand appliances from wall mart. Male rape victims, thrown away and refused treatment by UN aid agencies – because once they're broken, they're no longer men, and thus, not human.

American veterans, similarly shattered by their combat experiences, returned home to be discarded. And unlike females who are objectified as items of desire or beauty, and thus protected and coveted, men objectified are discarded as if they are actual objects, and abandoned to die. They are also invisible, and rarely discussed under the heading of sexual objectification.

What does the ongoing imputation of malice tell us?
What does the claim of an ambient threat of violence tell us?

For anyone with over a week's experience of writing from a perspective of male human rights, accusations of bad intention will be familiar. It has always been the case that commentary oppositional to the MRM, rather than addressing the substance of any particular article, focuses almost exclusively on characterizations of motive, hatred, misogyny, and poor sandwich making skills.

In single occurrence, accusations of bad intent usually tell us either we're doing something, or have done something, objectionable. And in such cases, we're presented with an opportunity to apologize and to re-evaluate our view or behavior. Or, the imputation of malice might signal a misunderstanding of statement, intent, or behavior by those who provide us such alerts of our perceived bad behavior. In these cases, a mistaken accusation provides opportunities to clarify intention or statement.

But what does the repetition and endless reiteration of imputation of malice tell us. Having weathered what so far appears to be a non-ending torrent of such accusation, and having done the early and repeated self examination necessary for honest self awareness, a few answers present themselves.

The first possibility for an individual or a group weathering an ongoing torrent of accusation, even after repeated self examination and attempts to clarify a seeming miscommunication, is that in spite of best efforts at clarity and benign intention, we really are malevolent. However, if this is the case, it indicates an inability to trust one's own mind. But dementia isn't a problem which can be solved by a good hard think. In fact, this is a problem which if it exists, may only be addressable by outside intervention. I have sufficient trust in my friends and colleagues that obvious dementia on my part would be pointed out to me, by them. Additionally, I retain, as do other bloggers and commentators who share my views, the ability to feed myself, pay my bills on time, and engage in a normal social life outside the confines of my small padded cell here.

So, the dementia hypothesis is discarded.

Another possibility is that the apparently endless narrative of imputed malice, accusations of a hatred of women, promotion of violence, "get back to the kitchen" patriarchy in the cartoonish conception of Leave It To Beaver are the products of an infantile mentality. For adults with a nuanced understanding of the world, recognition of the simplistic, black and white characterizations of malice cant be avoided.
"You just hate women", tossed out as a standard response to a reasoned argument for the universality of human rights and the necessary consideration of men as humans, is increasingly obvious as shrill panic from a camp lacking a leg to stand on.

But is it really an infantile, childishly superficial understanding of reality that motivates the continued imputation of malice? From some whose rhetoric is almost purely repetition of villanizing buzz words this might be the case, but "all my opponents are mental toddlers" is not much better as an argument than "all men are violent rape-machines". They are both simple assertions of ill-intention, without much explanatory power, and depend on only a superficial, and tissue-thin understanding of human motivation.

So if not everyone participating in the near constant imputation of malice against those arguing for human rights for men and boys are not simply intellectual toddlers, what is actually behind this ongoing narrative of accused ill-intention.

How about projection? This is a psychological defence mechanism whereby a person subconsciously denies his or her own thoughts, and emotions, and then ascribes them to the outside world, usually to other people.

Projection reduces anxiety by allowing the expression of the unwanted unconscious impulses or desires without letting the conscious mind recognize them.

This possibility fits the observed behavior of detractors to the mens rights movement, of consistently failing to field anything approaching a substantive argument. As well, when challenged with accountability for public calls for of child abuse, sex selective abortion and large scale violence from within the camp of gender ideology, calls for accountability are re-framed as violence, or it's advocation. But the upside down character of this accusatory nonsense cannot be reconciled with a realistic or an adult cosmology.

Another explanation is possible for the culture of gender ideologues who repeatedly call for legal exclusion, child-targeting violence, sex-targeted infanticide. The explanation being that from such point of view, opposition must, by default, be assumed to be as violent as the rhetoric it opposes. If the proxy and the direct use of force is a mainstay of the political tool kit within the culture of gender ideology, then reasonably, outsiders can be assumed to share such lack of compass and imagination that applied violence seems like a logical tool. If your only tool is a hammer, all problems take on the appearance of nails.

However, rather than participating in the unproductive school-yard name-calling which seems the only form of engagement detractors of the man's rights movement are inclined to practice, the MRM is increasingly focused on examination of human rights as a natural outcome of philosophical first principals. The first of which is the principal of universality.

Under a principle of universality, that which is preferred for one group, such as freedom from violence, must be preferred for all other groups.

However, both universality and and the non-initiation of violence appear to be antithetical to the opponents of the men's rights movement. This becomes obvious in the visible outrage from feminists when the names of those advocating male targeting mass murder are published in opposition to those public calls for violence. The claim, stupidly insane as it may be, is that out-ing murder advocates is an advocation for violence against those murder advocates.

Yes. Publishing the name of a feminist who publicly advocates male targeting violence, is characterized not as anecessary or responsible public service, but as victimization of that murder advocate.

The total depravity of this characterization would be shocking, except for the knowledge of previous collective endorsements for infanticide, mass murder, and so on from those on the feminist side of the room. But this rather nicely illuminates the motive behind constant imputation of malice. It is even more obvious when the specifics of those ongoing accusations, stretching plausibility as they do, focus on claims of physical danger. This of course reveals the intention behind ongoing repetition of such accusation.

An informative parallel can be drawn to the foreign policy of the United States of America. Every 3 to 8 years, the US positions itself to invade, bomb, and strangle another country through trade embargo. In essence, the US is making a new war on somebody, somewhere a couple times each decade. However, before any of the poor and working class kids get shipped off to foreign climes to shoot a bunch of the locals, an information war emerges through America's information/entertainment networks. Colloquially called news, the info-tainment machine churns out a stream of characterization, vilification, straw man arguments painting the country about to be invaded as an imminent, and dangerous threat. And thus, public support for ensuing military aggression is fabricated. Soon enough the killing starts.

So what possible reason can there be for dialling up of the narrative that a movement born in blogs, and continuously repudiating violence in the face of oppositional calls for mass murder and similarly bankrupt tactics – to claim some threat of violence is manifest from what is a non violent human rights movement? Clearly, the fabrication of a narrative of threat is to justify, and to render palatable, any and all violence to be used against such bloggers and video makers. If you haven't got an argument, and you also haven't got an ethical compass – recourse to cultivation of violence probably makes logical sense.

But absent of a better fitting model to understand the endless imputation of no longer merely malice, but peril, danger and violent intention, the concerted cultivation of a climate in which pre-emptive violence becomes palatable seems accurate. Of course, such violence on the part of gender idealogues or their proxies would have to be pre-emptive, since nobody recognized within the MRM has to date called for, advocated or engaged in violence, the advocation of violence, or so much as spoken of it in anything except repudiating terms.

When taken in concert with the wide range of recent public calls for violence from the gender ideologue camp, and the rhetorical and intellectual contortions necessary to claim some ambient threat of violence from writers on blogs like this one, the hypothesis to be drawn is that those making claims of a manifest threat from avowedly non-violent bloggers are attempting to foster and to precipitate the initiation of violence themselves. Recognizing this, the impulse to refute what is becoming a drone of monotonous accusation is greatly diminished. The burden falls to those issuing such accusation not to provide evidence, since selectively context-cleaned quotes are frequently used in place of such. Rather the burden for repeaters of claim of violent threat is to demonstrate their own intent is not cultivation, promotion and initiation of violence themselves.

The irony inherent in such claims, however flimsy, by gender idealogues – that a movement which rejects violence as a legitimate political tool, and which regularly excoriates and exposes individuals who publicly call for child abuse, mutilation, murder and mass murder – is that they must now logically demonstrate that their own goals do not include the fostering of violence.

This isn't simply a rhetorical game of "I know you are but what am I", or "I am rubber, you are glue". Through the repetition of a false narrative of threat, anti-woman, rape-inclined violent menace – I expect eventually, one or more thinking-impaired white knights, maybe civilian, maybe employed by a police force, will find occasion to use force, and possibly deadly force against a men's rights blogger, videographer, or activist.

I'm not looking forward to it being myself or anyone I know. However, if and when such event occurs, I plan to make maximum political use of violence fostered by gender ideologues, against what is a non-violent human rights movement. What I won't do is seek justification for retributive acts of retaliation, or any other such nonsense.

This is a contest of ideas, and the continued glaring absence of anything resembling an actual argument against male human rights suggests that our opponents, loud and annoying as they are, remain without a boat or a paddle. If some grasping desperate attempts at relevance result in violence successfully fostered against MRAs, it won't be violence we respond with. But we will fuck their shit up.

And of course to those opposing this movement, come on stupid, keep trying to bring a gun to this conversation. If, or perhaps when you succeed at indirectly getting somebody killed, bludgeoned, or brutalized, you will accomplish nothing except to shine a bright light on your position's total bankruptcy.

James Cook University's shame

Greg Canning · 14 July 2012 · Archived copy · Original

Earlier this year distressed by the impunity with which Professor Betty McLellan was able to publically vilify all men, I examined in depth the James Cook University Code of Conduct and felt McLellans writings and public activities were clearly in breech of that code.
http://www.avoiceformen.com/feminism/feminist-lies-feminism/the-ethics-of-hypocrisy/

You can check out my youtube take on McLellan here

I submitted a formal complaint to the Vice Chancellor of the university detailing my concerns, and offering to contribute to any investigation or provide further information. Receipt of my complaint was acknowledged but nothing more was heard for several months, so I wrote again enquiring as to the progress of the investigation. Within a couple of days I received notification that the university did not believe there had been any breach of its code and that no action would be taken against McLellan.

Flabbergasted with this response given the clear evidence of sexist bigotry before them I felt I had no other recourse but to resign my teaching position with the University and sever formal ties with them. This was a difficult decision as contact with and teaching undergraduates was a much cherished and fulfilling activity. Lest anyone assume that I have made myself destitute by this move, I certainly have not, my university teaching role was very limited and part time, my main commitments have always been to my private practice and postgraduate education via my professional college. Such a decision would have been orders of magnitude more difficult if I relied on a university job for my livelihood, and no doubt this figures in many academics tolerating or not making a fuss about radical feminist bigotry.

Resigning however would have little impact if not used to make public the issues prompting my resignation. The support I have received from those both known and unknown to me in the local community has been overwhelming. A sample of which have been published in todays Townsville Bulletin.

http://db.tt/2nywBQ2W

Most importantly I have had several phone calls from men who were previous students at JCU with first hand experience of the anti male bias in the Department of Social Work and Community Welfare. I hope to meet with them soon to discuss their experiences and perhaps look at a coordinated plan to seek redress on their behalf, and demand that such "extreme" feminists (The article misquoted me, I used the term extremist) be called to account.

The news item has spread outside my local area and whilst most posts don't invite comments this one does.

On Violence

Jim Muldoon · 15 July 2012 · Archived copy · Original

> TRIGGER WARNING: This article references Utopia, and speculates that it might never eventuate.

I've read a couple of articles on violence on A Voice for Men recently, and the comments that followed (the Other, 2012) (Fidelbogen, 2012). I thought I would throw in my $0.02c on the matter.

First of all, the definition of violence has recently been distorted beyond all recognition. Most of this can be traced back to the World Health Organization's mindless expansion of the definition of violence (World Health Organization, 2002). This has since been expanded by governments in most western countries to include almost every human behaviour beyond speaking in a whisper as violent. It renders any discussion of violence as almost meaningless.

"Behaviour involving physical force intended to hurt, damage, or kill someone or something" is a definition that most people would understand (Oxford Dictionary, 2012). But what about "the intentional use of physical force or power, threatened or actual, against oneself, another person, or against a group or community, that either results in or has a high likelihood of resulting in injury, death, psychological harm, maldevelopment, or deprivation?" (Violence Prevention Alliance, 2012).

Now we're starting to get expansive, but nowhere near enough detail. Too much wriggle room for the patriarchy. Let's get serious. The Australian Government gives a definition of domestic violence so complex that it needs to be categorized into the following: emotional abuse, verbal abuse, social abuse, economic abuse, psychological abuse, physical abuse, sexual abuse and, I shit you not, spiritual abuse.(Australian Government, 2012)

I won't quote the entire definition for each category, but the definition of emotional abuse will give you the general flavour: "blaming the victim for all problems in the relationship, undermining the victim's self-esteem and self-worth through comparisons with others, withdrawing interest and engagement and emotional blackmail".

If "withdrawing interest" is abuse, and therefore violence, what do they call divorce? Clearly these definitions are intended to be selectable according to need. In other words, if it suits us to call it violence it is, otherwise it is not. Meaningless!

> So when individuals proclaim themselves as anti-violence are they saying they are against men "providing an inadequate 'allowance'" (Australian Government, 2012)?

But then, I ask myself: why is the MRM discussing violence in the first place? I have not read any article suggesting that we meet at the local town hall with our baseball bats and Molotov cocktails. If someone was proposing such a get together, then a discussion on violence would be valid. Instead, we are discussing a groundless accusation that is thrown at us by feminists for no reason other than they can.

I can see the point in showing declaring the accusation is false. There is also merit in showing why our opponents stoop to these dishonest tactics. However, sometimes there seems to me an attempt to obtain some moral high ground by making absolutist claims for the sake of it.

Why?

The MRM, as far as I know, has not had suggestions from activists that we should buy up some land. Should we be making pronouncements about moral property purchases just in case we get accused of possible shady dealings in real estate?

I mean, what ever happened to serious, proper debate?

MRA: “I say that men have a right to see their children after separation”

Feminist: “Men rape children”

MRA: “Fuck off! Men’s rights! Men’s rights! Men’s rights!”

Feminist: “I’d like to point out here men also…” MRAs: “MEN’S RIGHTS! MEN’S RIGHTS! MEN’S RIGHTS!”

Personally, I have no intention in letting the feminists set the debate. I want to discuss the many, many, many instances of men being treated as second class citizens. I want to shine as much of a light as I can on the bigotry that is consistently and persistently being used to inflict real financial, emotional, mental and physical harm on men. I want to shine a light on the corruption of the legal system that targets men.

> I want to see a real, serious decline in male suicide rates.

My plan, ill-formed as it currently is, is to make so much noise about this shit that men and women in their hundreds and thousands will demonstrate against it in all kinds of ways. In the kinds of ways that people currently demonstrate about women’s issues.

If they say I advocate violence, I’m going to say “MEN’S RIGHTS”. If they accuse me of being a rapist, I’m going to say “MEN’S RIGHTS”. If they say I live alone in my parent’s basement, guess what? “MEN’S RIGHTS”.

Fuck them, whatever they say. I have no interest in trying to convert them. They are the problem, and will never be part of the solution.

Some of the commentators in the A Voice for Men articles have expressed an opinion that anything that might be perceivable as approval, implicitly or explicitly, of violence will harm the MRM. To them I say:

> MEN’S RIGHTS!

Let me also say this about non-violence:

Who is the person who grew up in a home where a harsh word or derogatory remark was never heard? Who is the person who went to a school where no child teased, mocked, shoved or hit them? Who is the person who has never been lied to or cheated?

Who is the person who has never had awkward sexual advances in their teenage years? Who is the person who has always been treated on their merit, and never lost out on anything based on their race, creed, gender or colour – or because they simply had the wrong connections?

If that person actually existed, would they never be guilty of any of these actions themselves? What makes you think that they would not grow up a spoilt, entitled brat?

But, if you subscribe to the blank slate theory that people are born flawless and society fucks them up: what happens when you get these flawless people through childhood unscarred? If that flawless person grew up in a village of similarly flawless people, would they be whole human beings?

How would they react if the stilled flawed people from the next village came over and bashed them up and took all their stuff? How would they deal with non-human violence such as disease, fire, floods or rabid dogs?

In other words, even if the village of the flawless could exist, would it be Utopia or a fool’s paradise?

> All of this, to me, sounds like a red pill deficiency.

We, in this modern western society, live in a violent world. That is the reality. The violence, crime and war aside, is simply more sophisticated violence that occurs out of plain sight. Take, for example, proceedings in the non-violent Family Court that I recently documented in an article in A Voice for Men (Blueface, 2012).

Here, the mother of the children non-violently, and using language that respects all people of all religions, ethnicity, colour, class and gender and anything else I've inadvertently left out – oops height – demanded that the father never see his children again. This is because she falsely, but daringly, accused the father of sexual abusing the children. The court then non-violently stopped the father from seeing his children while the matter was before the courts by threatening him, in a non-violent, inclusive but assertive way, with a non-violent period in prison if he did not comply.

The father was then non-violently taken through the courts for a couple of years. He had an option of representing himself, which would have left him wide open to non-violent abuse by the courts; or he could pay the non-violent but exorbitant legal fees which will cripple him, non-violently of course, financially for years to come.

The father was still non-violently banned from speaking to his children ever again. Even when it was proven beyond all doubt that the mother was non-violently lying. Meanwhile, the man is still non-violently coerced to fund the mother's lifestyle by paying her money the courts dishonestly, but nonetheless non-violently, call child support. Again, if the man doesn't pay he can end up, non-violently, in prison.

The pretence, of course, is that none of this is violent because there are no physical scars and the beating doesn't take place in the town square for all to see. Resorting to the law is simply violence by proxy. When done fairly with an even hand, it is the closest we can get to justice. Otherwise, it is just getting the police and the courts to do your dirty work for you.

> But let us not pretend otherwise. Resorting to the law is the preferred method of violence for those who profess to denounce violence.

It seems to me that we, the MRM, want to make misandry in its harmful forms illegal. That is, we want those who falsely accuse men of rape to spend a non-violent but long time in prison. Preferably along with the misandric law enforcement officers and judicial officials who knew the claims were bogus but prosecuted the case anyway.

Those who don't get imprisoned should be non-violently coerced to pay compensation for the damage they've done.

So please, spare me the attempts to be a Ghandi or a Luther-King. Really! All it really says is that you are law abiding citizens. I'm sure you are, but pronouncements of renouncing violence is like renouncing double-parking.

The real question is what are we for?

Taslima sells hate, wins international praise

John Hembling (JtO) · 15 July 2012 · Archived copy · Original

How can an imbecile command such high public regard?

The imbecile in question being one Taslima Nasreen. She is the ex muslim Bangladeshi blogger and "human rights compaigner" currently publishing weapons-grade nonsensical dribble on the rigidly feminist blogging site run, apparently by a white-knight biology professor calling himself PZ.

For those unfamiliar with Nasreen, or the reason for the open contempt she is held in here; she is the same dim bulb who made the asinine claim "men hate woman's body[sic]".[1]

She remains a dunce, as anyone reading her writing can tell, but that is not what is so perplexing about her. The question without apparent answer is how can this apparent mental defective be held in such high regard? Her author's bio on the absurdly misnamed "freethoughtblogs" site is 283 words of exaltation, listing the most flowery collection of international humanist medals, scholarly distinctions, doer-of-the-good laurels and flattery to appear anywhere in serif font. An international freer of the trodden, thinker of thoughts and righter of wrongs, a scholar excelsior, and champion of courageous courage-y-ness too.

And then you read her writing. It is inane, facile drivel.

Obviously, everything I've just said is no better than unworthy characterization. We will have to look at Taslima's essay directly.

Her topic is the practice within some fundamentalist Islamic regions of the world, of throwing acid into the faces of women and girls. This is arguably one of the more vicious and cruel practices of any human culture, and it continues today, in the year 2012. Like the routine murder of homosexual boys in the same region, if international pressure can arrest such brutality, then writers with understanding of the cultural forces driving such carnage must bend themselves to that goal.

As an ex Muslim with an intimate knowledge of the culture in which this impossible brutality occurs, we expect a nuanced evaluation of the social and economic pressures, the cultural taboos, and how resistance to change might drive religious ideologues to commit such atrocity. We expect a thoughtful, implementable solution which would allow rigid and reactionary systems of belief and culture to abandon what seems to us, unimaginably horrible disfigurement of women by fundamentalists of the Islamic faith. This is a subtle and difficult task which only a native exile of that culture could reasonably attempt.

Taslima Nasreen begins with the following:

> "Men throw acid on us with the intention of injuring and disfiguring us. Men throw acid on our bodies, burn our faces, smash our noses, melt our eyes, and walk away as happy men.Acid attack is common in Pakistan, Bangladesh, India, Afghanistan, Nepal, Cambodia, and a few other countries. Men throw acid on us because men are angry with us for refusing sexual harassment, sexual exploitation, proposals of marriage, demands for dowry, for attending schools, for not wearing Islamic veils, for not behaving well, for speaking too much, for laughing loudly and for pure fun."[2]

The remaining body of Nasleem's article consists of eight accounts, copied from other reporting in Ethiopia, the UK, Zambia, Iran, Nepal, Bangladesh, Pakistan and Cambodia of women savagely crippled in acid attacks. None of the reporting appears to be Nasleem's, as the accounts show different writing styles. However, noticeably absent is any real sense of frequency of such attacks, an omission made glaring by the mention in a borrowed reporting from German journalist Carsten Stormer, that the Khmer Rouge were authors of such attacks. Stormer refers in his Khmer Rouge comment to battles over ideology, a nuance absent from the other attacks presented in disjointed snippets within Nasleem's article. Reasons given for the disfiguring attacks read as non sequiturs. A father pours acid on his own daughter's face, because he (apparently) doesn't want another daughter. Where is the context? What has gone so monstrously wrong within a cultural zeitgeist that these actions are even entertained?

Not only does Taslima Nasreen fail to provide any answer this question, she doesn't even ask it. In her words :

> "Men throw acid on us because men are angry with us for refusing sexual harassment, sexual exploitation, proposals of marriage, demands for dowry, for attending schools, for not wearing Islamic veils, for not behaving well, for speaking too much, for laughing loudly and for pure fun."

The "men" of this narrative are unrecognizable to me. But these are apparently male specimens of the same species Taslima, you, and I are members of.

After the decline of Ancient Greek civilization, Islam carried the torch of civilization, science and philosophy. Now stagnant compared to the technological west, something has gone terribly wrong. And how does Nasreen, the Bangladeshi native of this culture, and human rights campaigner explore the possible factors leading to such shocking violence?

> "We are more abused, harassed, exploited, kidnapped, raped, trafficked, murdered by our lovers, husbands, fathers, brothers, uncles, cousins, friends, or men we know well than by strangers. Whatever happens to us, we never stop loving men."

Are you kidding me?

"..murdered by our lovers, husbands, fathers, brothers, uncles, cousins, friends.."

Is Taslima Nasreen a toddler who was hand-fed a collection of horrific facts that she simply doesn't understand?

Without any exploration of social issues, culture, religious doctrine and ideology, the nearly incomprehensibly brutal crime of burning a human being's face off with acid is described in the terms of:

"Men throw acid on us […] for laughing loudly, and for pure fun." and without attribution of underlying social dysfunction, or what is twisting a society to allow such savagery, she closes with the Pollyanna sentiment "Whatever happens to us, we never stop loving men."

Unstated, the clear picture of a type of sadistic and cruel animal called men, who due to their saintly forbearance, Taslima and her female compatriots: " never stop loving [them]".

Whether Nasreen is a complete and total mental defective, or merely posturing as the most saccharine, sweetly innocent martyr possible – how is her apparent international esteem possible? This woman's writing has all the depth of a semi-literate 9 year old.

Although I was born and live in Canada, am non-religious, and have never seen an acid burn victim in person, I did a couple of quick searches while writing this piece. Emphasis on "couple of quick searches". I ended up on wikipedia where I learned, with a few seconds of skimming that in Bangladesh, Taslima Nasreen's country of origin; such attacks are relatively common, and are mostly a form of domestic violence, which is interesting.

It's interesting because DV is a topic I've researched and written about frequently, and consequently, I have an understanding of it just a bit deeper than the false picture of sexually one-sided violence presented by the DV grievance industry. Stated simply, DV is almost always bi-directional, and usually occurs in a reciprocally violent relationship. The wikipedia paragraph on acid attacks within Bagladesh confirms this, by saying "it is a form of violence primarily targeted at women".

If it did not also target male victims, the word "primarily" would be absent from that sentence.

The paragraph in the wiki article for Cambodia, a location also mentioned by Taslima Nasreen has the following to say: "In Cambodia, it was reported that these attacks were mostly carried out by wives against their husbands' lovers.[4]

Wikipedia also lists Afghanistan, where acid attacks, carried out against women are not by Taslima's undifferentiated "men", but by religious extremists.

And I learned all this with less than a minute of searching Google, without even having been born in Bangladesh, then exiled as an apostate Muslim, as our Taslima is.

But in her words: "Men throw acid on us with the intention of injuring and disfiguring us. […] for speaking too much, for laughing loudly and for pure fun."[2]

Not religious extremists, (Afghanistan). Not " wives against their husbands' lovers"(Cambodia). Nope, according to Taslima, just men.

At issue here is not even Taslima's selective reporting to cultivate a truly monstrous conception of men. It is the (apparent) craven lionization of this idiotic, dishonest, hate-mongering quasi-illiterate "celebrated scholar and humanist". How can she command such esteem with such transparent, facile, deceptive and hateful rhetoric?

Her abject stupidity (or supremely calculated malice towards men) is totally inconsistent with the endless torrent of praise evident in the author's byline of her freethoughtblogs site.

This is what I do not understand at all. Have people become so conditioned to bow and scrape before the mighty uterus that no matter what drivel issues from a female-owned keyboard, it will rock to trumpeted praise of the highest esteem?

And is the implicit hatred, and characterization of fully half the human race – as inconceivably vicious, sadistic, and amorally cruel monsters to to tolerated and abided so that an unskilled, intellectually vacant blogger is flattered, simply because she is a member of the preferred sex?

And on what date did writing badly, and selling vicious, unsubstantiated hatred against an entire sex become a thing which won international esteem and laurels as a humanist advocate of human rights? It is not even Taslima who so disgusts me, but those who lionize a sexually bigoted vender of lies and hate.

AVFM News and Activism Show 11 Manwomanmyth!

Robert O'Hara · 16 July 2012 · Archived copy · Original

On this edition of AVFM News and Activism we have none other than Manwomanmyth!

Without a doubt MWM is the creator of the most definitive body of MRA work on the entire internet. Most of his work was assembled over a seven year time period with him being the one man production team. Only two and a half years ago did he start to release his work in segments to be presented collectively as his full documentary on his Youtube channel.

MWM is not only the go-to guy for all MRAs that want to turn their friends, family and coworkers onto men's right issues, he is consequently the MRA that many in the MRM credit with their taking of the "red pill." His achievement is unparalleled in the MRM and we are honored to have him with us!

Now is your chance to call in and chat with MWM along with James and Bob so do not waste it! As you can imagine this show intro does NOT do MWM justice but your calls will so we will be anxiously waiting for you to call in.

The show airs live on July 17, at 8:00 Central Time, US, which is 2:00 a.m. July 18, in London and 11:00 a.m. July 18 in Brisbane. If you have not yet requested membership in the Stickcam Room, you can do so through the link below.

Please, tell them to leave me alone. I am not interested.

Are you still advocating sexually targeted murder and mutilation?
If so, then its obvious you do want their attention.
Try publicly renouncing the desire to murder people based on their sex, that might make them leave you alone.

You’re done?

Unlikely.

Your blog remains up, along with every one of your postings calling for murder, mutilation and mass murder. You have not even taken the minimal step of publicly renouncing a desire to murder human beings based on their sex.

In addition, your youtube channel remains online, along with every video of yours calling for male targeting murder, mutilation and extermination.

I expect you will have men who object to your campaigning for their murders continuing to tell you of their objections in direct terms until you at least present a plausible posture of non-genocidal intent.

If you can't fight, wear a big hat

John Hembling (JtO) · 17 July 2012 · Archived copy · Original

It appears that the mighty professor PZ has taken it into his head to attack me again, this time in response to my rhetorical question: "How can an imbecile command such high public regard?"
