And think through it I did. So permit me to share the results.

The first thing to point out about a utopia in which robots do all of our labor and we loaf around like Roman emperors is that it is never going to be possible. Human labor will still be required for tasks that robots are just not ever going to be capable of. Most obvious of which is who will program, build, and maintain the robots? Relatedly, robots not being sentient and incapable of identifying a need in the market will not know what robots to build in the first place to meet the ever changing and evolving demands of humans. Also, robots are incapable of trouble shooting and doing complex diagnoses such as a "ghost" in your motorcycle, a medical problem, or an active crime, let alone coming up with the solution to fix such problems. Finally, humans also want the human touch. This could be anything from a massage, spa treatment, or waiting tables to books, movies, art, and umm....ahem the eldest profession.

Because of this, the best of my thinking leads me to believe that there will be at least THREE general types of human labor that will never go away:

1. Programmers and builders of robots
2. Tradesman that require non-programmable skills that can solve randomness (surgeons, plumbers, lawyers, mechanics, etc.
3. Personal human or "vanity" services

There could certainly be more and no doubt we could debate about the above, but in the "Robot Economy" one thing is for certain - what human jobs do exist will be classified into two general cateogies:

High skill

and

Low skill

You will either decide at the age of 15 "Eh, I just want a life of leisure and will live off of my mandating income, maybe working a shift as a waiter" or "No, I want to go the extra mile and become a surgeon." This will result in a heavily skewed or asymptotic labor market with two very distinct classes within:

So far there is nothing technically wrong with this theoretical economy. If robots and technology are efficient enough you only need a small percentage of "high skilled" workers to support the robots which in turn supports the much more numerous "low skilled" workers. Matter of fact, this would indeed be ideal and I'd be all for it.

There just a couple problems...as there always is with ideas coming out of academia.

1. Some Humans Breed to Resource Capacity

If we could be assured that humans would only have a certain amount of children, this idealistic economy may work. Unfortunately, humans have a tendency to breed to the point their resources are stretched. Admittedly, not ALL humans do this, some living within their means, but noticed how I said, "some" humans and not "all." The reason why is that it only takes SOME humans to outbreed past the productive capacity of the entire roboticized economy. And before you jump to conclusions about which humans those are, I would say nearly all of them.

Africans are the most obvious of this example. Trillions of dollars in aid didn't increase the income per capita of Africa in large part because just more capita were made. It is NOT a coincidence that the poorest countries have the highest birthing rates. Regardless, more money doesn't result in increased standards of livings with some humans, just more capita.

But what of those responsible suburbanite SWPL people only having 1.4 children per couple? See they're not breeding past the productive capacity of said roboticized industries!

Oh, you mean the people who "have to" buy McMansions they can't afford, lease cars that cost more than my mortgage, wear clothes that will be out of fashion in 6 months, and keep those monstrosities of debt-fueled spending frenzies called "malls" in business all while majoring in sociology thinking that career will pay for their outlandishly expensive dreams?

You mean those fiscally austere and responsible people?

Yeah, right, they'll NEVER out-consume the productive ability of the roboticized economy.

In short, it really doesn't matter your race is. The point is even if you come from the poorest classes on the planet or hail from the richest, it is human nature to consume to the point your finances are stretched. This will put pressure on not just the roboticized economy to constantly produce more and more, but insane demands on the humans on the back-end of said economy to keep up with the insatiable demands of the low-skill class.

2. The Human Ego Will Not Abide a 95% Low Skill Class

If there's something I've learned in the past 4 years about humans, it's that they need ego just as much as they need food, clothing and shelter.

Let's say you magically get it to where 5% of "high skilled humans" can build, manage, and maintain a roboticized economy that supports the remaining 95%.

In that 95% what percent are going to accept a life and career as a waiter, a backrubber, a smiley hotel bell boy, or just nothing? Can you see the DudeBro's being told they aren't going to become investment bankers? Can you see the 30 something independent single woman being told she is not going to have a career in social work? Can you see the Millennial kid being told he's not going to be needed as a lawyer?

They'd all throw temper tantrums.

What you need to realize today that nearly 40% of the employment we have today (most of which is in government, non-profit, and academia) is NOT for some kind of productive purpose that serves society, but is there SOLELY to benefit the ego of two full generations of adult children who are talentless, but are too emotionally fragile to accept it. The HR ditz, the social worker, the teacher, the fireman, the life guard, the non-profit director, you name it. But not only are they too emotionally fragile to accept this reality, they are also too egotistical. They will NOT sit idly by, getting the "High Skilled Person's Test" in this theoretical utopia, finding out they failed, and are condemned to merely collecting a check or being a spa person.

In other words, not only will the Roboticized Economy need to produce enough to provide for the basics of the 95% low-skill class, it will have to have a surplus production of (what I'd estimate to be) an additional 40% GDP to create entire faux "Ego Employment Industries" so millions can make believe and play pretend "professional worker person"...much like we do today.

3. Class Envy

If you think income distribution, class warfare, and class envy is bad now, just wait till the robots take over!

The irony is of course those who clamor for such a roboticized economy and things like "guaranteed income" would be the first to be protesting the "unfairness" and "economic injustice" that those surgeons and robot programmers were making so much more than they were.

Never mind that their food, clothing, and shelter is paid for.

Never mind no human in the history of the world has enjoyed such a life of leisure. Never mind the above-mentioned system would be as close as humans could get to a genuine "Utopia."

It would be a matter of nano-seconds before the leftists' human nature of envy, greed, and hatred would forget their enviable life of leisure, and start coveting what the high-skill class of humans have.

The truth is that while this utopia is impossible to attain, society has constantly been moving towards it asymptotically the entire time. The West has made amazing, jaw-dropping advances that would no doubt seem magical to people alive just 200 years ago. People back then would have killed and been thankful for what we have today and wouldn't care that they live in the lower skill class. But as is human nature, particularly of the leftist variety, if you grow up surrounded by it, you tend to envy and then villainize the productive people in your society. Ergo, the roboticized asymptotic curve will always forever move towards a perpendicular right angle, providing the masses ever increasing standards of living, but they'll only focus on what the producers have and they don't. Thus, while technology and innovation may in theory make such an economy a possibility (one can say it already has), it is human nature that will prevent it from being realized.

Enjoy the decline.

She'd Make a Damn Good Economist

June 25, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

I hereby award Kate the "She'd Make a Damn Good Economist Award."

Christian Men Having Problems Dating Christian Women

June 25, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

A secularist PK's view:

If you need guidance, wisdom, or just a guy that knows everything, contact Asshole Consulting!

More HR, MBA, Management Genius BS

June 25, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

"Open Office" and no, we're not talking the computer software.

The Real Rate of Return of Stocks

June 26, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Follow young Cappy on this financial and intellectual endeavor and learn something you just aren't going to find in the MSM.

Understand that there is no such thing as capital gains when it comes to stocks.

Yes, I know there IS such a thing and that it is proven everyday day, but theoretically there shouldn't be any capital gains, let alone an entire retirement industry based on capital gains because, in theory, a market would be efficient enough to price all future profits into the current day price of a stock leaving no room for capital gains.

So why would you own a stock?

Dividends, my good boy. Dividends.

The reason why is that dividends are THE ONLY THING THAT IS PRODUCED BY A CORPORATION THAT IS ACTUALLY PAID OUT TO ITS SHAREHOLDERS. And this is a very important reality to understand if you wish to understand the value of stocks, because when you buy a stock you aren't "buying the right to vote"

or

"purchasing a percentage of the firm's assets" you're not even getting

"a percentage of the firm's profits."

No, you get a proportional percentage of the dividends that are paid out, if any.

That's it. That's all a stock is. A right to a proportional percentage of future dividends the company may pay out.

Ergo, it is ONLY dividends that matter and drive the value of a stock.

So how do stock prices stack up against the dividends they pay? What kind of percent rate of return can you expect from dividends? Well historically you could expect a rate of return around 5%. But with retirement dollars and QE money flooding the market, stocks have been driven so high without a commensurate increase in dividends that you get are you ready for it?

a WHOPPING 2% rate of return!

But are you really even getting that?

I was listening to the Kerry Lutz show and he had Danielle Park on who made the very astute point of "what about inflation?"

Indeed what about inflation and so with my SAEG I went and calculated the dividend yield going back to 1914 and adjusted it for inflation. And shucks howdy, look at that!

Stocks really haven't been providing a positive rate of return since about the mid 70's.

A couple points, however.

One, the negative rates of return from 1974 on are obviously caused by the oil embargoes and inflationary days of the late 70's. However, ever since then, rates have more or less remained marginally negative, stocks never really beating out inflation. It behooves the question why are stocks going up at in real terms since their ONLY driver of value (dividends) is effectively providing negative rates of return?

Two, the retirement bubble got it's official kick off in 1978 when we had our first ordained retirement plan (the 401k). Since then the stock market has been flooded with dollars which may have driven up capital gains (and made everybody happy on paper), but driven the real rate of return on dividends below zero.

Three, despite the dramatic increase in the stock market since 2008, you'd think inflation-adjusted dividend yields would be driven into negative territory. However, oddly enough, they're positive in the fraction of a percentage point range.

Why?

Inflation is very low...or so we're told.

The question is if you believe the official CPI numbers being churned out.

The larger point is not one of whether inflation is being manipulated or retirement dollars are flooding the market or QE-X is driving prices higher, but yields lower. It's just what a lousy investment stocks have been post - WWII when you look at the only thing they produce - dividends.

We don't get excited about bonds that only pay 3%
We whine about our savings accounts and CD's only paying 1%

But by god and shucks howdy, we'll plow trillions into a stock market that pays -.5% because...capital gains.

I just hope when Economics 101 classes are taught in the future, right along side the "Holland Tulip Bubble" some kind econ prof will cite this post.

Enjoy the decline.

Why Men Don't Want to Have Children

June 26, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

In response to this article where the old broad is just "so confused" as to why none of her sons want children:

40 Year Old Women with 13 Year Old Excuses

June 27, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

From our Pheonix Agent in the Field.(names deleted for privacy):

My observations will be kept short and succinct because it's Friday and I don't feel like working.

1. We all need to step back, clear the gunk from our eyes and look at this for what it truly is. We are allowing full grown adult women to grow in this society to the point they reach the age of 40 and still think this bullshit not only flies, but think this is perfectly acceptable adult behavior. It is NOT adult behavior, it is insulting, it is childish and it is all too common.

2. While some people will make claims this whole "manosphere/red pill" thing is a bunch of sour grapes basement dwelling virgins, it is stuff like this that proves it is not. There IS something wrong with the male-female dynamics in this society and (while men do have their flaws and are certainly to blame) the blame is disproportionately and deservedly laid on women.

3. Before you assume something about this guy's physique because he's a software programmer, I have met this agent in the field. Hiked with the guy. He is in GREAT shape and good looking too. Add to that him never being married, no kids, no baggage, you'd think a 40 year old woman would be THANKFUL to find this diamond in the rough.

No, no. "My friend's car broke down."

Ladies, I know "you" don't do these things. And I know your friends don't do these things. That's because you're good women and you only surround yourselves with equally good women. But you have to believe us men when we recount experiences and episodes such as this as you aren't the majority of women. This stuff is bullshit, it's all too common, and apparently, given this is a 40 year old woman, it ain't going away.

Durrrrr… Why is Tuition So High???

June 27, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

You idiotic leftist college students deserve nothing more that what you bring upon yourself.

Man from UNCLE 2015

June 28, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Hellz yes.

Saturday Roadside Linkage

June 28, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

The Captain's Prayer.

IQ by major and gender. aka "Math is tough. How do I math? WHY IS THERE A WAGE GAP DAMNIT!!!!????"

"Math is Tough" part 2

The "Hotel Desk Picture"

July 2, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

In the past three years I've had the fortunate luck to be able to travel. Admittedly within the US and on a shoe-string budget, but still, travel none-the-less.

As you travel you start to notice some common recurring themes or "traits" during your travels.

Like how you constantly end up with a Kia Rio rental because you're cheap.

How your diet goes to shit because you're travelling out west and out west there are no people and therefore no decent restauarants and therefore your diet consists of gas station food.

Or how you strategically plan your travels around Wal-Mart because your plans change and you need new gear to meet your changing plans.

However, out of all of these "eccentricities" of American Bachelor Travel (TM) there is one that keeps popping up in my travels that I've decided to document henceforth.

The "Hotel Desk Picture."

The Hotel Desk Picture is a recurring visual I see every time I travel. It is an empirical testament to what happen during the trip which tells a story unique to that particular travel. It first started when I was in Grand Junction, Colorado about a month ago. There, without me knowing it, was the perfect set up for the "Hotel Desk Picture." I had driven from Minneapolis to the western reaches of Colorado. I was at a shady hotel, but the ideal hotel. This resulted in me putting my loaded pistol on the bedside table, but not without me first putting my laptop on the lonely beige desk in front of the window. The combination made me feel like Hunter Thompson wherein I could write all I wanted on my laptop (whilst looking into the multi-colored cliffs of the Rocky foothills), and reach for my gun in the statistically improbable case a leftist sent a hitman after me in these western remote regions a la "No Country for Old Men."

I didn't write anything like Mr. Thompson, and no leftist goon made an attempt on my life. But after that I have henceforth decided to take a photograph of the desk or bedside table during my travels to document what I (personally) think is a pretty cool phenomenon.

.For example, this is my latest "Hotel Desk Picture"

JIM BEAM
BOURBON

The picture tells a thousand words, but let me cut them down a bit.

1. The Jim Beam is there because I had driven a motorcycle through weather conditions that consisted of consistent Seattle-like rain, sheer winds of over 40 MPH (to the point I'd have to draft off of semi-trucks), and 30-degrees-below-average temperatures of 55 degrees. I wasn't drinking, until god decided to be a total dick and screw me over on my ride to the Bakken. Thankfully the Devil made Jim Beam and my nerves were calmed upon reaching my hotel.

2. Speaking of weather, did I mention it rained like Seattle? Not hard, not soft, but a constant piss of rain that made you think god had drank gallons of water, put a sprinkler spout on his unit and said, "Hey! Let me piss consistently all over I-94 in North Dakota for 6 hours straight!" So consistent was the rain that it soaked through my jacket, the liner, and the pocket that my 9MM got wet. So I had to clean it. Which leads us to...

3. "Remington's Cleaner." That yellow and green can? Yep, that's gun cleaner freshly bought from the Dickinson Wal-Mart. And let me tell you what a fine and upstanding clientele that Dickinson Wal-Mart has.

If you ever think it's just minorities outbreeding their capacity to pay for said ~~parasites~~ children, in addition to Casper Wyoming's two Wal-Marts, now add Dickinson for pure, 100%, USDA Grade A white trash sucking off the government dime. Idiocracy was not a work of fiction, it was a documentary about Dickinson's Wal-Mart.

Anyway, I had to get gun cleaner to clean my gun. Disassembled it, sprayed it, cleaned it, scrubbed it, and reassembled it to its current state in that picture.

4. The gloves? Those are just drying there on the table. Behind the scene my clothes were all scattered about to maximize the surface exposure to air so they'd dry and I'd have dry undies the next day. Truthfully the gloves are the first to dry because they're immediately exposed to windsheer while driving. But still, the larger point is all of my clothes were soaked. I was standing in nothing but a towel when taking the picture.

The moral of this post is that you should take the time to look at your surroundings while you're on an adventure as it will tell a more telling story than perhaps the adventure itself. I have my pictures from Grand Junction somewhere, but until that time, I suggest the next time you're out traveling,

stop
take the time to pull out the camera and take a picture of what is sitting on your hotel desk.

It may prove a better story than the trip itself.

From the Bakken

July 2, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Made it back to my humble Minneapolis in one piece. Some pictures from the Bakken oil field (specifically a rig I visited).

UMP I ACOCI

Outstanding

July 2, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Outstanding.

Life During Peacetime - Book Review

July 3, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

"Life During Peacetime" is an essay by Matt Forney about his exploits with a blogger groupie. It is a short piece, which is why I'm thankful he calls it an essay and not a "tome" or a "book," but just so you know up front, it's about 30 pages or so.

The e-book version is only 99 cents and the paper back is $8.99. Whether it is worth the money depends on your tastes and preferences, but I would say definitely for the e-reader, not so much for the paperback. For $8.99 you can get a real book that will consume more of your time.

Costs and pricing aside it is a very well written book. I keep forgetting that Matt is younger than me because he is such a good writer. When I read his stuff, it usually sounds like it's coming from a 45 year old. However, his youth shines through with a wee-bit too much crassness and vulgarity. Naturally, you all know I like to curse, but I try to eschew crass sexual topics, of which there are many in this book.

Still, if you're looking for a short read too kill part of an afternoon or this kind of book is up your alley and I'd recommend buying the book. But if you want a book length work of fiction or have a weak stomach like I do for overly gross sexual details, I would not advise it.

Mandatory Podcasts

July 3, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Stefan Molyneux's "Truth About Che Guevera" is an absolute must. I knew the guy was a commie, but I didn't know how much of a crusaderist he was. Spoiled brat, rich parents, and those motorcycle rides he did? Yeah, all financed on mommy's dime. Listen to it if for any other reason than to see the predictive qualities and traits that I laid out in my Crusaderism series.

Penn Gillette has Richard Dawkins on who has an amazing discussion about genetics, evolution, and epo-genetics.

Book Review - The Long Way Home

July 4, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

The Long Way Home by Sanne Wikjer is a short, but action packed sci-fi book about a soldier/mercenary who goes through an inordinate amount of fighting, war, politics, and espionage in an adventure that has more twists and turns than my salsa dancing.

When Sanne approached me about reading the book, I will be truthful and admit that I said to myself, "Shit, not another sci-fi book, I don't like sci fi." But after reading it, let me tell you…

I still don't like sci-fi.

It's on some foreign planet, there's weird funny names, everything that comes with sci-fi is in this book.

That being said, I couldn't put my finger on something that was gnawing at the back of my mind about the book. It was only 162 pages, but moving incredibly fast. Still, I was able to stick with the story and there wasn't anything abbreviated or missing from it. Then it dawned on me what I was reading.

I wasn't reading a book for 40 year old economist curmudgeons.

I was reading a book written for 13 year old boys.

Ergo, while I personally wouldn't recommend this book to colleagues, I would DEFINITELY recommend it to any colleagues who had 13 year old boys.

The plot is engaging and entertaining, as well as complex. But not too complex that a young person couldn't follow it. It also uses the occasional 50 cent word that would challenge the vocabulary of a young person, but not enough to deter them from the book. There are elements of economics and international trade that are boiled down simply enough a younger person could understand them (and coincidentally get a lesson in economics) And finally (the primary reason I read through it) is that it was fast paced and succinctly written. You can't go a chapter without a fight, a betrayal, or pirates running contraband. You want to see what happens to the hero in the next chapter. Naturally it would be outlandish for a mature man whose age has beaten the imagination out of him to read or "get into" this book, but it would be very entertaining, perhaps even inspiring to a young boy on the cusp of manhood or his teen years.

So if your son or a boy in your life is a sci-fi guy and likes to read, I would definitely recommend buying this book. The will be entertained and come away with an improved vocabulary, a moral lesson, and perhaps an economics lesson to boot.

Auctioning Off My Ex's Tits

July 4, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Greetings all,

A long time ago, when Cappy was in his gallivanting, bachelorhood years, one of the many girls he dated fancied herself an "artist." So much so she plastered her naked front with pink paint and then pressed it on a black canvas, giving it to the young Captain as a gift.

It was fine when I had my bachelor pad in Wyoming, but since I've moved back it's been sitting tucked away in a closet for two years (that and my girlfriend would kind of frown upon it being hung up somewhere).

Anyway, I've decided to auction it off to get rid of it, the proceeds of which will be donated to my favorite charity - me. I will then take said proceeds and put it all on red at a roulette table.

Bidding will start at $1.
Bidding will close at the end of the month.
Make your bids in the comment section below.
I will announce the winner at the end of the month.

Payment will then be made to my paypal account.
Shipping costs will be paid by me.
No, I will not put it on E-Bay so don't say, "Dude, you should put that on E-bay"

Forward to anybody who might be interested.

Sincerely,

Cappy

Dear Millineals, Your Dreams Are Stupid

July 6, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

From a loving Gen X'er that was fed the same bullshit:

Sunday Afternoon Linkage

July 6, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Alcohol, time to give it up.

Yep, those evil men.

An important insight into human psychology that will come in handy later in your life.

An absolute must speech by Stefan Molyneux. He has a score of zingers in the speech, but my favorite is:
"You know, if you pick the wrong guys to sleep with, can't close your legs, and are too stupid to use one of the 18 methods of birth control out there, then MAYBE parenting isn't for you!"

Another damn fine podcast by The Black Brigade.

Alton Brown I already hold in very high regard. Pilot, motorcyclist, gun guy, musician, oh and that whole cooking thing. Now add to his list "Interviewed by William Shatner." Damn Alton Brown, outdoing me in every category of cool.

And remember the auction is still on for this piece of Cappy Cap paraphernalia. The current bid is $12.02.

Bold and Determined

July 7, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

New sponsor ladies and gentlemen. Bold and Determined, but specifically Victor's book "30 Days of Discipline."

Here's the deal.

If you haven't worked out before, dieted properly, or made lifestyle changes to improve your physique and mind, you really don't know where to start.

Yes, you know to eat meat and veggies.
Yes, you know to hit the gym.

But you don't know what to eat precisely, what kind of regimen you need, and you likely don't have the swift kick in the ass you need to prompt you to commit to doing so.

30 Days of Discipline does that for you.

I read the book a couple years ago and it is what prompted me to hit the gym regularly and religiously. I owe Victor my improved physique and diet. And though I'm not ripped Herculean god, Victor actually is (I've met the guy and yeah, you want him on your side during a fight).

Anyway, consider visiting Bold and Determined and buying Victor's book "30 Days of Discipline." Short read, but very helpful.

Adventures in Housekeeping

July 7, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

reviews Bachelor Pad Economics.

How "Nice" Destroys Countries

July 7, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

a motorcycle ride to the Bakken, auctioning off my ex gf's tits,
ladies, ENOUGH WITH THE MAXI DRESSES
"I don't live my life for men," pregnant isn't beautiful, neither are tats,
Phil and his dog living the American dream, hairy armpits for extra credit

and MORE

in this Episode of The Clarey Podcast!

Why You Want to Be Like Bill Burr

July 8, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Bill Burr is no stranger to those of us in this little corner of the internet. He is very likely the funniest comedian of our generation with an edge that speaks directly to us. However, after being a fan of his podcast for coming up on two years now, I've realized that behind the public image he presents to us is a man of great accompishment that should be admired and emulated.

First, Bill Burr is humble. If you listen to his podcast he's always ripping on himself. Admittedly to be funny, but deep down inside this is not an arrogant man despite a track record that would certainly permit him to be. He does not think himself better than any other person and is always looking to improve.

Second, he's always looking to improve. Anyone familiar with his podcast knows he's always looking to come up with new material and improve the material he has. Not that we'd all be comedians, but do you vette, criticize, strain and improve your own work, career, or profession to the level he does? The man aims for excellence and it shows in the final product. You should too.

Third, he's a hard worker. Teaching ballroom dance I'm familiar with what it takes to drive every night through rush hour to teach for three hours a night, while effectively dancing the entire time. The energy you get from the people in class keeps you going, but the travel, the scheduling, etc. is demanding and takes its toll. Bill Burr, in addition to an even more rigorous schedule which includes flights, goes back home and then works on new material and he's been doing this since he was in his mid 20's. Now add to all this his podcasts, recording, homeownership, taking care of the Lovely Nia, not to mention everyday chores you and I got and he's doubling the work week of the average American man.

Fourth, all this hard work inevitably pays off allowing him to achieve the true American male dream - independence. Bill Burr answers to no one. Yes he has to play nice. Yes he can't offend managers at comedy clubs, but there is no boss in Bill Burr's life. Bill Burr can turn down a sponsor to his show because he doesn't need the money and has enough employment security from other sources. Very few men have this enviable position. But then again, very few men are willing to work for it.

Fifth and finally, self discipline. I envy Bill Burr because in addition to his hectic work schedule the man still is able to religious adhere to lifting weights, working out, dieting correctly, abstaining from booze for lengthy periods of time, not to mention pounding out a podcast REGULARLY AND RELIGIOUSLY every week.

I'm lucky if I bang out a podcast every 2 weeks, abstain from booze for 3 days, and go without Mexican food for a week. And I have nowhere near the hectic work schedule, and therefore excuse, that Bill Burr does. To steal a quote from Bill Burr he often uses to criticize himself, "Ahhh, I'm such a fucking cunt." But whereas such criticism would be called for for most of us, Bill Burr is actually one person the criticism doesn't stick. The man just simply walks the walk.

Ergo, while we all like listening to Bill Burr for his comedy and ADHD-laden podcast, I suggest for any young man (or old) to look at just how much effort the dude puts into his career and life and inbetween jokes, pull some important lessons about effort, discipline, work, achievement and excellence.

Read about other men "you want to be like"
Walter Matthau
Alton Brown
Mike Rowe
Cary Grant

Bachelors Degree Required to Be Secretary at Coffee House Press

July 8, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

From our literary agent in the field.

Apparently you need a bachelors degree to file, fax, fetch water, transfer calls and all these other things that only college graduates can do.

The Sad Fate of Stacey Hacker-Hessler Professional Crusaderist

July 8, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

You may not know who Stacey Hacker Hessler is, and neither did I.

Not until somebody posted this article on my facebook (though dated from 2012). Short version, she ditched her husband and kids to go protest at the OWS in 2012. Got an $80,000+ divorce settlement and then...never heard from again.

But when I say, "never heard from again," I mean from the MSM or heck, even alternative media. I had to search her name and after finding her newly hyphenated name was able to track her down.

What is she doing today?

Well....this.

I want to highlight this because there's a couple important lessons to pull from it.

1. Look at the money raised and their pleas for money. Also look where it goes to. It goes into just basically supporting themselves. These aren't professional activists. They're panhandlers on the internet pursuing some sad pathetic crusade they've been told to by media, leftist professors, and yes, even the government.

2. Precisely what is their crusade? To take selfies on Monsanto's signs out in the middle of nowhere as they hold up craptastic home made signs? Not only is the crusade itself pointless and ultimately mentally-egotistically self-serving, but they're not even doing it right.

3. She is obviously with child. If they only have $160, guess who's going to pay for her birthing expenses! That is the least of our concerns though. Any body want to place odds on the kid growing up right?

I could go on, but the larger point is this is ultimately where crusaderism leads. A dead end wasted life of delusion and no real practical or meaningful achievements.

I do feel sorry for Stacey's kids (both present and future). I feel bad for her ex too. But I cannot think a more fitting punishment than squandering one's only finite and precious life on meaningless crusades, while begging and pleading for handouts to help in that squandering. I'm almost half tempted to donate just to keep the delusion up.

Daring Your Boss to Fire You

July 9, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

It is a rare instance, but EVERY not "most"

not "the majority"

but

EVERY time I've heard of an employee standing up to his boss, even daring him to fire him, it has worked out in the employee's favor.

This may sound counter-intuitive, but the empirical evidence I have witnessed thus far does not lie. EVERY time I've heard or seen an employee stand up and get in the bosses face, sometimes even yelling at them, they have won and the boss has lost.

The reasons are a bit convoluted and certainly theoretical, but permit me to posit some.

1. Because of the progressively decaying nature of our population, the majority of people are at minimum flawed, if not, outright impaired. The problem is, especially if you are younger, you are conditioned to think people in positions of authority are not. That they are somehow "special." That they are somehow unique super-humans that are more intelligent, more experienced, more logical and wiser than you. That they are immune to this decaying trend.

Not by a long shot.

The truth is they are no smarter, better, or wiser than you. Just older. So convinced of this, I believe nearly 80% of American bosses today are merely bluffing the entire time and engage in such petty office politics antics to hide that fact so you dare don't peak behind the curtain and realize their ineptitude.

However, inept incompetent management can only last so long before driving underlings insane. It's not only illogical, but damaging, not to mention bad management makes employees' jobs impossible to do. Soon the stress is too much to take for some and they barge into their boss' office reading them the riot act. The boss, rarely if ever facing an angry and more competent underling, buckles and the employee gains some concessions (but never enough to solve the fundamental problems plaguing the firm).

2. Another reason is that deep down inside most bosses know they're bad and incompetent. Their ego and frontal lobes will work wonders to convince them otherwise, but deep down inside that 50 year old, gray-haired, 30 years of experience man was promoted to a level that is seriously challenging his abilities and competences. He's barely treading water. And just like a drop dead gorgeous 24 year old is insecure that she may not be the hottest girl on the block, so too are there underlying and constantly nagging doubts in your boss' head about his competency. If you challenge them, especially with superior intelligence, factual data, or a different vantage point, you may pierce their thin veil of confidence.

3. Exacerbating this doubt is the fact that most bosses get promoted not through achievement or excellence, but rather compliance, obedience and politicking. While that makes for "good" employees, those traits are not those of a good leader. This leads to an irony where the "best" employees are promoted, which is like promoting the most obedient sheep to the position of shepherd. This results in bosses who are out of their element, again, insecure about themselves, but more importantly really susceptible to an employee whose flown off the handle. They are the most COMPLIANT people by "natural corporate selection," ergo the last to say no and therefore the quickest to cave.

4. Finally, most corporate cogs in America are deathly afraid of violence. Even though you may not have the intention of causing your boss physical harm, a person (even a woman) going livid and ripping the boss a new one is such a traumatic event it will shake them to their Darwinistic core. The worst they've seen is maybe a motorist giving them the bird as they suffer their 90 minute commute in their SUV back to their SWPL suburb to watch the Kardashians and watch Jr. in the school play. I guarantee you it's a once in a 3 decade career where a furious, violent-ACTING human is screaming 3 inches in front of their face. Admittedly, sometimes they may choose fight over flight, and that presents a serious legal (and physical) risk. But again, I've only seen them choose flight.

Admittedly, these are only theories and I really don't know why employees who have it out with their bosses are batting 1.000. The sad truth is, however, daring your boss to fire you, threatening to go on welfare/unemployment, reading him the riot act, or tearing him down in front of the entire office to see will not achieve anything as you cannot fire your boss. Your boss will still have his/her position of authority. And though they may make some concessions, like a drug addict, they are incapable of fundamentally changing and your job will still suck.

This means if you have a job with an incompetent boss it pays to mentally check out, not worry about what he says, do your best, and collect that check. However, if you're like many people where the boss barks contradictory orders, is intolerably inept, and really makes it impossible to do your job, then that job is impossible and ripping your boss a new one called for.

Just be prepared to lose your job...and go on the government dole as you live off of his taxes.

Polar Vortex Economics

July 9, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Finally got off my lazy ass and looked up what Canada's economic growth rate was during the first quarter of 2014.

"Why the first quarter of 2014?" you ask?

Because that's where the US economy just completely tanked posting a -2.9% economic growth rate.

BUT,

what was the excuse Washington gave us for this poor performance?

"The weather. It was the polar vortex."

And since Canada suffered it worse than we did, I figured they too must have tanked in economic growth.

Apparently not:

Why Most Activism is Evil

July 10, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

$23.01

July 10, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Is the current bid on this fine piece of Cappy Cap paraphernalia I'm looking to get rid of.

Get your bid in for this wonderful bachelor pad or man-cave artwork before the end of the month!

Post post, the highest bid is now $30.

The Boring Economics of the Next Recession

July 10, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Polar Vortices, weather,
non-compliant consumer confidence, and just an utter lack of appreciation for what Obama has done for us aside, excuses for the last quarter of -2.9% growth don't really focus on the boring fundamentals of economics.

One of those being (one of my favorites) the "Inventory to Sales" ratio.

This ratio compares corporate inventories to sales. But before you fall asleep, allow me to explain why this is one of the better ratios you should be paying attention to.

Inventories are made by humans, namely employees. Ergo inventory levels is a great predictor of employment. If there is a glut of inventory you can expect companies to lay people off. If there is a shortage of inventory, you can expect companies to hire people. But how do you determine if there's a glut or a surplus?

You compare your inventories to current sales.

This shows you how much demand there is for a product (sales) versus how much is currently available (inventories).

Naturally you'd like this ratio to be as low as possible. You want inventory (the numerator) to be very low, not just because it would suggest future employment, but because it costs money to store inventory. And you want sales to be high so that companies are profitable and there is demand for what is being made.

But an interesting thing has happened with the inventory to sales ratio in that it is perpetually decreasing. This is because of improvements in inventory management, supply chain management, the internet (you don't even have inventory), JIT methods, and just generally improving managerial methods. Ergo, you should not be concerned only when the inventory to sales ratio spikes, but you should be concerned when it flat lines or does not continue to decrease for a significant period of time, and that's what we have today.

Naturally you see just how crushing the Great Recession was where everybody just cut back on spending, causing inventory levels to soar. But that outlier aside you can see jumps in this ratio correlate with recessions (and economic slow downs which aren't highlighted in gray) and, more pertinent to today, the slight and stubborn trend upward for the past 4 years.

It is here my Keynesian inferiors would demand more government spending, get that aggregate demand up, we haven't done enough, etc., etc. But I will once again defer to my theory that these Keynesian geniuses fail to account for human psychology. Namely the "smart money," consisting of people who pay attention the finances, budget, and economics of the country are scared stiff to spend, let alone invest, given the undermining of the country's finances. Throw in a financially crippled 20-30 something generation that normally WOULD be buying houses, consumer goods, and starting businesses, but can't because of student debts and an insulting job market, and it's no surprise this ratio refuses to obey according to historical trends.

Sadly, ratios like the inventory to sales ratio are not sexy, exciting or make for good yellow journalism. But if you are truly interested in how the economy works and want to predict the next recession, it's boring statistics like these that will help in that endeavor.

"Nice Guy Game" < "Felon Game" < "Nazi Game"

July 10, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

I remember when me and my buddy went to the bar and tried different types of "Career Game" to woo the ladies. There was "Lawyer Game," "Accountant Game," and "Student Game," but nothing beat "Felon Game." Yes, that's right, when we told the girls we were flirting with that my friend was a felon and I was his lawyer, and I just got him released, the response was stupefyingly positive, if not outright giddy. Felon Game HANDS DOWN beat every other type of game out there.

Ever since, I thought "Felon Game" was the way to go. That's until I heard of "Nazi Game."

When Good Money Has Nowhere to Go

July 11, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Tis Thursday night.

And Thursday nights are just as good as any to get rip roaring drunk as you look upon this once-great society and, after much deliberation and thought, come to the same conclusion you have previous Thursday nights that this country is completely screwed and nothing can be done about it.

By the way, pour me another Rumpie.

Anyway, something that has been bothering my economic mind is why has the stock market constantly been going up?

Naturally logical theories are abound, many of which I subscribed to out of laziness and cynicism, but inevitably that damn thing called "intellectual honesty" gets in the way and makes you want to PROVE your suspicions true.

So off I went to the FDIC where I fully expected to see in the aggregate banking reports TONS, MILLIONS, BILLIONS, nay, TRILLIONS of dollars being flooded into our stock markets because our inept, incompetent, and bail-outtable-affirmative-action case bankers:

1. Had gotten bail out money that they
2. Had nowhere to lend because
3. The economy isn't booming and ergo
4. There's nowhere left to invest it but the stock market.

So I thought.

But the truth is anything but.

Banks have not been increasing their marketable securities holdings and so the boom in the stock market does not come from there.

This perplexed me because I was sure the bail out money was being parked there. But since it was not true (now leftists, pay attention to this), I accepted it as fact and looked elsewhere for the real reason for the boom.

My logic led me to two places or "institutions" that could explain the massive cash inflow into the stock market and thus its ludicrous valuation.

1. The central bank which has been printing off a ton of cash because....WTF not and "where do we put it?"

and

2. Profitable non-financial corporations that had nothing better to do with their cash

And shucks howdy if I'm not the Sherlock Holmes of economics!

My first guess about the central bank dropping money into the stock markets proved false. They're too busy ~~bailing out the parasitic class, welfare bums, bankers, loser liberal arts majors, single moms, and other degenerates~~ ahem investing in "government bonds" to invest in the stock market. Politicians need money to bribe the masses to vote for them, and the wise use of money a la a genuine "investment" doesn't achieve that. So all that QE money is NOT ending up in the stock market, but the EBT cards of fat, bloviated trailer, ghetto, and barrio fatherless trash the single mom matrix keeps spewing out. So that money does not boost stock prices as much as obesity rates in the lower classes.

However, I DID find the true cause of inflated stock prices after sampling Apple, Microsoft, and other "cash cows" of the corporate world in their "marketable securities" holdings (read "stocks). Said holdings have skyrocketed as their profits are up but they have no real genuine NEW investments to reinvest said proceeds.

Since we hate corporations, profits, innovation, success, etc., profitable corporations today face a conundrum:

Do they invest in a new venture? A new company? A new innovation?

or

Do they just "park" the money somewhere in an already existing company with political and cronyistic connections that guarantees them a rate of return?

And now you know (at least in part) why the stock market keeps skyrocketing.

Who, precisely, would invest in a new venture in this county? What idiot would dare to invest in a virgin endeavor that has no political connections, lobbyists, or other scum to secure the ordainment of the government?

The sad truth is that any genuinely new invention, endeavor, innovation, venture or business faces such obstacles as regulation, taxation, labor law, not to mention corruption, why would you invest in something new? An old, established, networked, and connected company, with nowhere near the potential, is a more reliable and provides a higher rate of return than some idiotic young go-getter. Worse still, even if said corporate monies were to be REINVESTED in their own plants, why would they invest here?

Obama and the NLRB effectively nationalized Boeing for daring to set up a plant outside union control.

Seattle just passed a $15 minimum wage.

To hell with the hassle, bother, and politics of setting up a new shop, a new plant, or a new facility.

Corporations would rather just take their trillions and park it in the boring ole stock market where NO NEW INVEMENTS OR COMPANIES ARE MADE, and therefore NO NEW JOBS, but at least you get a 2% dividend yield.

hey

Again, I no longer care where this country is heading. Matter of fact, I've so thoroughly thought it through I now fully appreciate and enjoy the suffering Americans have brought upon themselves.

I just want to be like Voltaire and write for posterity. Enjoy that freaking and well-deserved decline kids. Enjoy that freaking decline.

Progressive Credentialism and Genuine Racism in Law Schools

July 11, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

I love this article in that it highlights two things:

1. The ABA forcing students to jump through (and pay for) unnecessary hoops ergo financially benefiting the law school profession, not the legal profession

2. My observation that bubbles hurt minorities and women the most because they are usually late to the party while (in this case) whites and Asians see the writing on the wall and are bailing.

The irony is that the lefty law professors actually believing closing the "lawyer gap" between minorities and whites is a good thing.

It's like saying "we need to close the Soldiers at the Front Line Gap in WWI between whites and minorities."

Keep charging into law school my fine minority friends. And when you're done through the meat grinder, don't say you weren't warned.

What the Maxi Dress Tells Us About Conformity, Architecture, Individualism, and Negative Externalities

July 11, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Conservative and Libertarian Outfitter

July 14, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Howdy All,

I'm a big believer that if conservatives and libertarians just simply consolidated their purchasing power and bought only from "conservative, libertarian, and pro-freedom" companies, then the rest of the companies in America (which go whichever way the wind blows) would stop bending over backwards and kowtowing to leftist causes.

Would you not like to see the elimination of every idiotic company's "CSR" department?
Would you not like to see the elimination of lip-service they pay to "diversity" and "community reinvestment?"
Would you just like to see a company that says, "We love America. We love profit. And we're not ashamed?"

Well, let's start right here and right now.

I know a lot of you are outdoorsmen, hunters, fishers, and hikers. I would very much appreciate if you would visit and patronize the outfitter for conservative and libertarians - DaWabbit.

DaWabbit has pretty much everything you need in terms of hunting, fishing, hiking, camping, survival, prepping and everything you're going to find at Cabela's. Don't get me wrong, I love Cabela's, but I have to drive there and spend money on gas. With DaWabbit you don't have to AND you know that 100% of your sales will go to support a conservative and conservative causes.

No liberals are employed by DaWabbit
No feminists are employed by DaWabbit
No American haters are employed by DaWabbit

It is 100% pro-American, conservative, and libertarian beneficiaries.

Let's keep the money in house and let's do it by starting with DaWabbit.

The Economics of Caloric Return

July 14, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

I have two buddies. Both are in their 40's. Both recently divorced/broke up with their significant others. Naturally the course of conversation invariably comes around to "you looking to date any girls?" And the answer is...

No.

Not out of recency from the divorce/break up.
Not out of time to let the wounds heal.
Not out of time to get their head straight or figure some things out.

The real reason?

They're just too damn tired.

I don't know about you but when I broke up with/got dumped by a girl in my 20's the very next NANOSECOND it was go find another. There was no down time, there was no "time to heal," it was an immediate, OK, what lucky girl is next? But fast forward 15 years and men in their young 40's who recently find themselves single are in no rush to go back to the bar, back to the night club, spruce up their POF profile, let alone gather the courage to make an approach in broad daylight. They're just too damn tired.

The first excuse would scramble to find would be age. The next would be healing. The third might be "losers." And the fourth might be "lack of choice." But the reality (as we're often finding out) does not lay in psychology or biology, but rather economics. The real reason they're too tired is one of a cold economic calculation.

A cold economic calculation of what?

A cold economic calculation of caloric ROI.

Recently, I've been giving more and more credence to biology, genetic programming and Darwinism to explain human behavior and decisions. And when you analyze these thoughts through the lens of economics you start to make some interesting discoveries. And this is one of those instances.

Understand that while money has been used in society for thousands of years, human evolution, genetics and biology has been evolving for 2 million years. Ergo, while we'd like to think our frontal lobes (the most advanced part of our brain) makes all of our decisions in a logical and rational manner, the remaining 65% of our brain is driven by instinct, survival, and raw desire and still (more often than not) overrides the most advanced part of our brains. Thus,just because money is a (relatively) recent human creation, doesn't mean the laws of economics and limited resources didn't apply to pre-currency humans (let alone EVERY creature on this planet). Therefore, even before the grain receipts of ancient Egypt served as the first currency, there was the ultimate currency that has governed all creatures on this planet and is the prime directive the governs 65% of our brain:

Calories.

Until agricultural advances made food a non-issue, the vast majority of human-kind's experience has been finding food. Finding calories. Finding the energy to stay alive. It's why, despite having adequate food, we simply can't "turn off" the natural, darwinistic, survivalistic desire to eat more. It's been there for 2 million years (2 billion if you consider us descendants of previous creatures facing the same problem) while adequate agriculture methods have only been around for 300 years.

However, while the main problem with human's genetic programming to maximize caloric intake in a time of plenty is obesity, there is another problem. On the OTHER side of the cold caloric economic decision is one of expending calories of energy. Or more so, conserving one's energy.

View it from the perspective of an American Indian 10,000 years ago.

Tonto has a choice. Chase after the antelope with his bow and arrow or not. However, it's not one of whether he'd like to hunt, it's a 100% purely economic decision. Specifically, is it worth Tonto to expend 1,000 calories of energy to MAYBE get 4,000 calories of energy in antelope meat? Because if he chooses poorly too many times he won't have an adequate ROI on his caloric investment and will mathematically starve.

Naturally, over time humans developed less-caloric consuming hunting techniques that yielded more calories in return. Traps, spooking buffalo to run over a cliff, guns, and agriculture. But that still doesn't change the fact that for nearly 2 million years humans have had it beaten into their brains that calories expended damn well better result in a surplus of calories returned. Again, starvation was the other consequence.

Now return back from 10,000 BC to revisit my two 40 something buddies. They are no longer Tonto facing the decision as to whether they want to chase after antelope. They are two men who have to decide whether to expend the calories of energy chasing women. And when faced with the caloric demands of:

Going on line for 2 hours a day to "wink" at girls
Go to the night club to chat girls up

Go to a "Meet up" group and learn a new social skill (dancing, crafts, etc.)
Making approaches 10 times a day not to mention the 8 year vetting process wherein they have to date 100 women to find "one"

you can see why they're "too damn tired" and are just shutting down.

Admittedly there is of course other reasons as men age they just don't go out clubbing anymore. They're getting older, a decrease in testosterone, a decrease in energy, the novelty of dating wanes, their 18 year old idealistic naivete about dating expectations was crushed with the drama, flaky, reality of dating, etc., etc., But I contend there is a Darwinistic aspect as well. One where the hindbrain is making astute economic calculations, demanding an adequate return on its dwindling supply of calories and time, and sadly coming to the conclusion that it just isn't worth the chase.

So light up those cigars instead,
Pour yourselves a glass of scotch that won't "flake" on you
And head out on the boat and go fish, because the caloric rate of return on those things are 100% guaranteed, ensuring you
Enjoy the decline!

Feminist Librarian Discovers "Bachelor Pad Economics"

July 15, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

And all hell breaks loose.

You can purchase your copy of Bachelor Pad Economics, and thus advance the patriarchy and peeve lefty feminist librarians, here.

Let Max Temkin Be a Lesson to You Boys

July 15, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

You boys paying attention? Are you? Good.

Because the last person you'd want to be is Max Temkin.

Straight, Hetero Sexual Men Determine the Beauty Standards for Women

July 15, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

I love how women just "decree" that they will determine what is beautiful and men have no say.

Yeah, have fun with that and let us know how that works.

And an aside. This isn't cute, or funny, it's a truly psychotic delusion, a GENUINE mental problem women are having if they think they can just "decree" what is attractive absent of men.

Again, have fun with that.

You're Not Being Discriminated Against. Life is Just That Tough

July 15, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

A very important video for everybody, especially the younger folk:

Men Really Do Compete Against the Government for Women

July 16, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

In an indirect manner of course.

Paypal, Not Patreon

July 16, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Hello,

Many people have asked, if not, insisted I put up a Patreon account so that people may support my work.

While I certainly appreciate it and I do take donations (as you never know when Google or Youtube or whoever is going to pull the plug and independent bloggers like myself, who really ARE the only source of true journalism and 4th branch of government left), Patreon is frankly a rip off. They charge 10% of the donations while Paypal only charges 3% AND...

Paypal has "pretty much" the same monthly donation option that Patreon has.

ALL DONATIONS go 100% to me and my hedonistic lifestyle. Well, not directly. The donations actually do go to hosting costs which helps me generate income, and THAT income goes 100% to me and my hedonistic lifestyle. However, my primary concern is if there ever is a concerted effort to shut me down (either by banning my sites, getting me banned by Amazon, google, YouTube, etc.) my income would dry up and I would then have to rely on donations (or be forced to go back to working in banking).

So if you were concerned, want to make sure I can remain independent, REMAIN HERE, and don't have to worry about going back to working in banking to make ends meet, consider signing up for a monthly donation option on my PAYPAL account.

You can either click on the cute pin up girl where it says "DONATE!" (for one time donations) or click on the icon below to become a MONTHLY "Patreon-equse" donor at varying levels:

Donation Options

Option 1 : $1.00 USD - monthly ▼

Subscribe

REMEMBER IT IS MONTHLY, IT WILL AUTOMATICALLY BILL EVERY MONTH! So make sure you don't OVER donate.

Many thanks,

Cappy Cap

My Response to Librarians Banning "Bachelor Pad Economics"

July 16, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

My response to this is simple because the reality of this situation is simple:

If you want to "fight back" I suggest buying copies of Bachelor Pad Economics. Already these librarians caused a little rumble on teh interwebz that has bumped up sales. I would just like enough in sales to rationalize sending a thank you card to the librarian in a very smarmy and Cappy-esque manner.

How Do I Math?

July 16, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

I don't like The Maths. The Maths are tough!

I'll let its own idiocy speak for itself.

When the Stock Market is Divorced from Reality

July 16, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

This is hands down the best article on economics and the current state of the financial markets I've read this year. Arguably the past three. It explains many different things that are going on, but key above all of them is how central bank intervention in interest rates and quantitative easing distorts nearly all pricing in the financial markets guaranteeing them to become bubbles.

The stock market is no longer a "market" wherein investors try to find companies to finance. It is now a tool of multi-billion dollar companies to purchase back shares (because of a lack of any genuine new investment), a place for QE dollars to inevitably be parked, and a retirement vehicle for mindless-zombie-money for mindless zombies who think capital gains is what retirement planning is based on.

I am already getting ready for the people who say after a crash, "well how did you know!!!??? There were no signs!!!!"

I suggest you all stop watching state-endorsed news and go with genuine independent thinkers.

They Found Peggy Joseph

July 16, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

And she admits she was wrong.

Thanks Peggy. We could have told you that. But thankfully you have children and they will pay for your ignorance.

Yes, Bob, American Bankers are Still Idiots

July 16, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

What primarily invigorated me to write "Behind the Housing Crash" was the unbelievable levels of stupidity on the part of bankers.

Seems things haven't changed in the past 8 years.

The Left Has Officially Become "The Man"

July 16, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

And I think it's about time to take them down.

The Pornification of Jesus

July 17, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

I had this sent to me and I originally scoffed at it, dismissing it, thinking it was cute.

Then I realized,

"Holy shit, there's like millions of naive, young, Christian, but hornier-than-hell,dudes out there who are constantly compared to this perception of Christ by the "only" women they're allowed to sleep with - Christian women."

So as a gesture of goodwill and faith between us secularists and our religious brothers, I thought I'd provide my two cents about this to perhaps maybe advance their cause to ~~nail some hot Christian ass~~ breed more Christians.

Boys, this is the key problem you face with modern day "Christian" women - the pornification of Jesus.

Look, you're already a nobody compared to Jesus. I got it beat into my head I was not Jesus. You got it beat into your head you were not Jesus. We all got it beaten into our heads we were not "perfect in the eyes of God." However, while this should not have an effect on your romantic relations, there's a disturbing trend amongst young Christian girls where Jesus is not just their spiritual "savior," but their:

husband
boyfriend provider soul mate
gigilo
and, crass as this may be, masturbatory material (any takers that this is not the case sometimes?)

So how precisely do you compete against that?

The answer is - you don't.

You cannot compete against perfection.

And it is here that I humbly request that you consider a humble secularist's opinion. Primarily that:

1. These self-proclaimed "Christian girls" really aren't Christian and instead use the religion as a tool to leverage power over you

and

2. If you choose to be ignorant of their un-Christian intentions you will be taken advantage of by fraudulent, faux, fake Christians

The truth is that most 20 something girls (and boys) are not capable of the mature, adult, indepdent thinking that is required to fully vette and think through something as soulful and important as religion. Ergo, nearly 100% of the self-proclaimed "Christian" women you're trying to date really do not deep down inside believe what their parents have shoved down their throats the past 20 years. Ergo, my humble, evil, heathen, secularist opinion is, that any women, especially under 30, who adamantly proclaims to be a Christian does not do so out of geniune deep and ponderous thought, but rather manipulation and self-advancement. Perhaps not consciously, but it IS DEFINITELY not for Christ. The social benefits that come from joining a religion, the mental calm not having to ponder a godless universe, and the mental stability in having an always loving, always forgiving father/husband figure around.

While these things ancillary benefits to religion can be considered "good" things, the problem is there's a dark side to believing in a religion for ulterior purposes. Namely to view/abuse Jesus/Christianity as an excuse, a perpetual forgiviness, but worst (and most tempting of all) a tool by which to abuse, extract resources from, lord over, and control naive people who actually believe their claims of faith.

No doubt many of you young Christian men have ran into arguments where your logical and well-reasoned points were mooted, if not, completely dismissed with a mis-interpreted quote from the bible. No doubt many of you have been told "they just don't see Christ in your heart." No doubt you've been compared to Super-Alpha Jesus. And, like everybody out there who's dating a Christian girl, you no doubt have a story where she "just couldn't date you" citing religious reasons, but then went out with some guy who violated thrice the rules she had placed on you (mine is one who got drunk, made out with an illegal alien, then complained to me he was calling her. But we couldn't kiss after a second date because we weren't engaged).

The larger point is that I simply request you stop, take off the Christian goggles for a second, step back and look at what is happening empirically.

Are the majority of Christian girls you date using religion and Christ as a means to enhance your relationship? To be a better person? To make your time together more enjoyable?

Or

Are they using it as a tool, if not a weapon, to constantly keep you on edge, criticize you against Christ, lecture you, berate you, and ultimately control you making the relationship painful and like pulling teeth?

Perhaps you can see it from this here secularist's viewpoint.

42, Female, Unmarried, Professional…Miserable

July 18, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

How's that feminism thing working out for you ladies?

On a sad related note, perhaps it's because you put a career and material items ahead of human relationships and interaction.

I'm going to say it again - feminism is a mental disease. And that's not hyperbole or rhetoric. It's a warning to younger women and girls.

Respect the "Weasel Whiskey"

July 20, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

From Mr. Aurini who drinks the swill known as ~~Wisers~~ Weasel Whiskey:

How to Analyze Your Girlfriend's Finances

July 20, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Stay frosty, boys. Stay frosty.

Getting Fired for Your Political Views

July 21, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

In this episode we interview the Great Matt Baldoni and talk about:

Getting fired for your political views
Why Laughlin, NV is the future of America
Taking a Kia Rio off road into the desert
Striving to succeed as self employed
Behind the scenes of Las Vegas
The Las Vegas DJ Bubble

AND MORE!!!

Visit the archive here.

True Independence

July 22, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

With an aside about the burrows of Oatman, Arizona:

The State of Minnesota Destroys Aspiring Students' Dreams

July 23, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

By launching a lawsuit against two degree mills who advertise "Criminal Justice Degrees."

Oh, I know, I know, ADULTS know the state is actually doing something good here to protect the naive children, but since it's "been their dream" to major in "Criminal Justice" that's all that matters. They're just getting in the way of these poor kids' dreams!

The Only Way to Close the Wage Gap

July 23, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Language warning:

"The Red Pill Bible"

July 24, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

A review I found very humbling:

I am a currently in my late 20s and discovered the red pill about a year ago after a bad breakup (typical right?). As I've stated in other reviews, I'm building a red pill library and have read every single book Roosh V has published, The Game, The Predatory Female, The Way of Men, The Manipulated Man, Men on Strike, The Rational Male, and Now Bachelor Pad Economics. I suggest you add all the books I've named to your library as they are all 4 or 5 star in what they aim to achieve. I will say that I previously stated that "The Rational Male" would be the 1 book I would purchase a friend If I could only pick 1 out of my red pill library....But then I read this book! I found out about Captain Capitalism aka Aaron Clarey and quickly watched all his Youtube videos over the span of a week and shared them with friends I knew would appreciate it. We all came to the same conclusion: Aaron Clarey is THE MOST UNPLUGGED MAN ON THIS EARTH! He's so unplugged that sometimes he's annoying because he's telling you truths you are not ready to accept. Bachelor Pad Economics is the most comprehensive book of any Red Pill book I've ever read (Though the other books are not necessarily attempting to be Red Pill Bibles). This literally is THE RED PILL BIBLE. Buy this book first if you are trying to unplug. Buy this first, then buy The Rational Male, Then buy Bang and Day bang from Roosh V then the others previously named and you will be a very smart and well rounded individual. My only complaint is not about this book but that I wish Aaron would advertise this book on Return of Kings or somewhere because if this book could touch 100,000 men or become a New York Bestseller (by some odd twist of fate) we as men could take this world back. Thank you Aaron Clarey for caring so much about other men that you took your time to comprise a 500 plus page book that will help men like myself reach our full potential. I'm forever indebt to you and best believe when I reach my level of success you as well as the other authors will receive a nice check in the male because the $9.99 price doesn't justify the invaluable knowledge you have given me.

It's Called "Capital Flight"

July 24, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

and it's a feature, not a bug of ~~ignorant, business-hating socialist retards voting~~ socialism.

Economic Growth Without Government Spending

July 24, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

An interesting thought piqued my economist mind:

What if we measured economic growth without the government component of GDP?

And so I did and the results on the face of it are "good."

You'll note that ever since recovering from the depths of The Great Recession, GDP without government (ie - the private sector) has been outpacing the component of growth coming from the public sector. This is good in the sense that the private sector is growing faster than the parasite that lives off of it. Theoretically, if this kept up, government would shrink relative to the rest of the economy, even to the point it would consume less than 1% GDP.

But there's a problem.

The government component of GDP does NOT include income transfers which account for the majority of the budget at both the state and national levels.

So here's the riddle intrepid aspiring, junior, deputy, and otherwise economists:

If GDP does NOT consider income transfers, how do you make an "economic argument" to incorporate income transfers into the calculation of GDP, primarily that they should be SUBTRACTED from GDP to measure the true economic production of a nation? Specifically, just because a bunch of old fogey Keynesian economists said GDP should not subtract income transfers, what is the argument and rationalization that we should?

I know the answer, but I'd be curious to see if you do.

(answer will be provided in the next post!)

A New Cappy Cap Book Babe!

July 24, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

We have the good fortune of having another pretty young lady willing to grace this ugly blog with her beauty, providing some much-needed scenery amongst all the charts and data.

There are more to come, but in the meantime buy Bachelor Pad Economics because...ummm...well....hot chicks!

(Also, any girls interested in modeling with the Ole Captain's books, please let him know. You get the books for free and, well, that's about it).

Subtracting Government from GDP

July 25, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

In my previous post I wanted to see what GDP looked like when we took out the government component of GDP. It made for an interesting observation, but as many of you know that component of GDP does NOT account for the majority of government spending. The majority of government spending is on social programs aka "income transfers," or by it's real name "theft".

I then posed the challenge to create the argument why government spending in its entirety (most of which really is theft) should be DEDUCTED from total GDP. Keynesians have logically and traditionally argued that government expenditures on goods and services should be considered part of GDP in that they DO indeed result in additional goods and services being created. However, us slightly higher-caliber of economists know that there is something fishy about just "assuming" government spending translates into higher economic output and thus higher standards of living. So allow me to explain.

First, there is the broken window fallacy that many of you are familiar with. Missiles and bombs built here in America only to be exploded on the Iraqi population does NOT indeed improve standards of living here. Over-paid government contracts handed out to connected cronies in Washington DC to do make work job to "improve diversity" or "study connectedness" does NOT improve standards of living. Ergo, you can assume the "G" in the C+I+G+(E-I) formula in GDP is most likely completely overstated.

Second, how does one account for the theft euphemistically called "income transfers?" The Keynesians rightly point out that income transfers do NOT result in additional GDP. Parasites (and that's what they are) receive money in exchange for NO labor, NO production, and NO economic product. Ergo, no increase to GDP. However, while Keynesians would argue that there is no increase in GDP and "that's it," I would argue that the money blown on "income transfers" is a lost potential of economic productivity.

In a free market where there would be no parasites, that money would "command" genuine economic production from somebody. Ergo, the $3 trillion we piss away annually (never mind local and state budgets) on theft/income transfers COULD HAVE GONE TO PURCHASE/DEMAND GENUINE ECONOMIC PRODUCTION.

In other words "income transfers" are like steroids. They boost nominal "economic performance" but do not speak to the genuine economic productive capacity of a nation. Therefore, I argue to subtract out ALL government spending to see what the core productive capacity of the country is.

When we do this, the results are interesting.

It takes a keen eye, but what we suspected all along was true. During the depths of the recession TRUE economic growth was much worse than what the obfuscation of government spending attempted to convince of other wise.

However, in all intellectual honesty, economic growth in the private sector has outpaced government spending since 2011 and has posted gains in excess of government spending. Further research shows that this is indeed the truth as government spending has indeed stagnated:

What this shows is an important lesson for any real economist or person who desires to be intellectually honest. It doesn't matter what president is in office and what his political affiliation is. It only matters what POLICIES are effected by the entire government.

If you look at the chart you'll see that the ONLY president to reside over any modicum of fiscal discipline was President Clinton. There (again, partially enforced by a Republican congress) the OVERALL government restrained spending and enjoyed an economic Dotcom boom. This resulted in a non-government economy growing at a rate much faster than government spending AND a drastic reduction in our nation's debt. But since Bush Jr, and most certainly Obama, you see economic growth below governement spending and the resultant crushing national debt.

The recent restrain of government spending is a good thing and a sign of genuine hope that has never really existed in the Obama presidency. I would like to say that if current trends continue private sector economic growth will outpace government spending and the US would inevitably pay off its debts, outgrow the national debt, and we'd be on our way to a glorious future.

Sadly a visit to your:

Local public university
Public school
Wal-Mart
Ghetto
Barrio
Trailer park

will tell you this is merely a fleeting economic condition and our general plunge into 3rd World-ism will continue.

Enjoy the decline!

Another Ugly Girl

July 25, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Whatever you do, don't buy Enjoy the Decline. Because if you did then there'd be more pretty ladies like this portraying their beauty on my web site. And we certainly wouldn't want that now would we!!!???

Book Babe #2

July 26, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

The next in a series of pinup themed babes helping advertise the book and boost morale here on Cappy Cap.

Like the pretty lady above you too can Enjoy the Decline!

And for all the libertarian and conservative beauties out there, free books if you're willing to pose with them.

Best,

Cappy

Geeks for Consent - Feminists Invade Another Male Place

July 28, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Interesting story.

While I am against groping and blatant acts of sexual harassment, not having geek girls dress in alluring geek outfits would kill any Comic Con convention. ie - Comic Cons would end.

Now many would say that that wouldn't happen. That just because groping and blatant acts of sexual harassment would be banned or socially ostracized, doesn't mean men won't show up with the original intention of doing so.

However, as is always the case, it's in the gray details where feminists operate.

Is cat calling at a convention with purposely hotly-dressed chicks harassment?
Is taking pictures of them also considered harassment?
What about having hot models on staff to parade and advocate new products?
What about a false claim of harassment? (because they never happen)

Well, as far as Geeks for Consent are concerned - yes.

At this point you are now starting to wonder what kind of people would ruin all the fun?

Yes, we don't want groping.
Yes, you don't want stalking.
And you do not want approaches when clearly shot down.

But NO Princess Leias??????
NO hot Nazi chicks auctioning off Wolfenstein - NWO???
NO various anime girls all dolled up???

You may as well ban leather chaps in Sturgis. Who would advocate such a thing?

Well, let me answer this.

Feminists.

You see the three ladies who are launching this crusade I gander are first and foremost feminists and not genuine, true geeks. If you read through their profiles their primary interest is a religious adherence to feminism. Their degrees do not indicate geekery or anything IT. None of them mentioned hobbies aligned with a Comic-Con. And the ONLY thing that could be considered related to Comic-Con culture is one of them has an online comic.

While there may be a tangential and minority interest in geek culture, its obvious this is a blatant and obvious assault on a primarily male-institution in an attempt NOT to do anything as noble as prevent groping and make it more inviting to women, but rather to destroy it be making acceptable and inevitable behavior unacceptable and banned. And in doing so ruin everybody's fun making others as miserable as they are.

I cannot convey enough how important it is that you understand that envy, jealously, hatred, and crusaderism (ie-ego) are the key drivers of modern day feminism. And that you absolutely CANNOT take their stated intentions at face value as it is almost always 100% guaranteed to be nothing more than a ruse to hide their ulterior agenda. If you do, you misdiagnose the problem and let evil, despicable people lessen your life.

Horses Want to Kill Humans

July 28, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

See? What do I keep telling you about horses!!!!????

Why Never Being Able to Reach Your Full Potential is the Real Cause of Grief Among Conservatives and Libertarians

July 29, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

It is without a doubt that conservatives, libertarians, and other generally "pro-freedom" people I categorize as "Real Americans" suffer from a malaise, depression, sadness and grief as they watch this once great nation decay under socialism. They see the country they grew up with turn on them, breaking all the premises and social contracts by which they based life decisions on in the past. They look to their futures now with complete uncertainty and distrust where there was once complete confidence and serenity. They look at their American legacy that not only looks like it will be vilely shat upon by future generations, but is currently and constantly mocked, ridiculed, and criminalized today. And making it all worse is the maddening fact that it is their fellow Americans who ignorantly and blindly believe the bold faced lies told to them by politicians, and mindlessly vote to undo the greatest thing that has happened to this planet.

In short, everything they've worked for, stood for, believed, and advocated will be moot, making it seem their and their childrens' entire lives were wasted. That this great good of freedom and Western Civilization that took humans 2 million years to achieve, will be wiped out by the idiocy and mental weakness of socialists in 50 years. And that humanity will be plunged back into the darkness as we trade things like reality, truth, excellence, independence, individuality and freedom for false gods such as commune, egalitarianism, diversity, affirmative action, environmentalism, dependence and responsibility-free lives.

Yes, it is crushing indeed.

But merely admitting this fact does nothing to assuage our concerns, let alone solve the problem. Thankfully, I believe I have happened upon something that will at least provide some relief, if not alleviate most Real Americans' grief to the greatest extent possible.

It is here we may have some disagreement. whereas I personally think all is lost and that we should "enjoy the decline," others still hold out hope, thinking Western Civilization can be turned around. But whichever camp you fall into (or hybrid thereof), neither does anything to address or identify the true, singular psychological cause of Real Americans' grief. Therefore, if we can at least identify the primary cause of our malaise we can at least address it, deal with it, and lift this depression that plagues us. And that problem is:

That you'll never be able to reach your full potential.

No matter how you look at it, be it psychological, secular, religious, darwinistic, or genetic, humans have always wanted to take this one life they have and make the absolute best of it. They not only want what's best for them, but they want to achieve some kind of greatness. The problem is that while everybody wants greatness in their lives, not everybody is willing to work for it. And with the replacing of republics with democracies we have put an end to forcing meritocratic behavior on the population, and instead given the power to the masses to legally steal other people's wealth.

This transformation has broken (or at least seriously weakened) the relationship between effort and success. Worse still, it has destroyed the incentives that would inspire and propel those willing to work toward greatness. But even worse than that, is when society no longer aspires towards excellence and greatness, nearly every aspect, institution, organ and component of society is corrupted and decayed, no longer allowing those who DO want to achieve greatness the opportunity to do so. And it is that aspect of decline that has stolen the birthright of greatness from all Real Americans.

Consider how every major aspect of American life has been compromised to suit the benefit of socialists and lazy people at the expense of greatness.

Education - Education is epitome of this. Are you kidding me? We need to have 19 YEARS of schooling before you train a human with enough skills to be considered employable in today's labor market? K-12 is not enough? We need a bachelors degree AND "masters preferred?"

If there is an example where standards have been so lowered to benefit a corrupt network of lazy socialists at the expense of potential greatness the public schools and university system is it. Imagine what greatness has been;

squelched destroyed beaten out of beleaguered dissolved eliminated bored to death
and just plain drummed out of the hundreds of millions of kids that had to listen to a talentless, inexperienced, 23 year old "education major" drone on 8 hours a day. And not only "drone on," but to take genuinely interesting topics exciting (the American revolution, science, math, history, etc.) and fail so spectacularly at making them interesting to their students, that their students fall asleep. How many future Bill Gates were "Ritalined" out of greatness? How many Milton Friedman's feel asleep because their history teacher couldn't teach economics to save his life? How many Thomas Edison's never materialized because they were sat in front of somebody thrice their age with 1/3rd the IQ?

Additionally, this says NOTHING about the politics most public teachers are more concerned with than genuinely educating the children and creating greatness. No it's more important Little Jimmy learns about global warming than the American Constitution. No, it's more important he learn about diversity than financial planning. And no, it's more important he be held back in the same class with the problem children of single mothers than be allowed to accelerate at his own pace and graduate at 13.

It is mind blowing to think of the millions of child-geniuses there may have been over the past 40 years whose potential was completely lost to this society because we insisted in sending our children through mindless, indoctrination baby-sitting camps designed first and foremost to benefit the teachers unions and a daycare boon to dysfunctional families.

Sadly, that's just K-12. If the education bubble has shone a light so bright even your average ignorant American idiot can see it, it's the outright scam higher education has become. As if fleecing parents $150,000 for 13 years of property taxes wasn't enough, no, we need to fleece their children for $150,000 more. And can anybody sit there with a straight face and say that colleges and universities offer anywhere near the education they once did, let alone an education that warrants the usurious tuition they charge?

It's not so much that the higher education system failed to identify and promote child geniuses (those were all destroyed in K-12). It's that higher education went on to cripple the finances of most normal kids as well, ensuring they never reach their full potential in life. In the end we don't have 14 year olds capable of work and innovation, but rather 34 year olds who are still living at home.

Careers - Education is not the only institution putting hurdles, if not, landmines in front of Real Americans and their desire to achieve greatness. Most employers are too. Gone are the days of hard work, innovation, loyalty and excellence. Instead we have politics, ass kissing, brown nosing, and lobbying. And don't forget diversity training, sexual harassment training, sexual harassment suits, force donations to charities, quotas, affirmative action, CSR departments, mandatory employee "community service," and progressive credentialism.

Even if you were a child genius, and even if your genius was honed and sharpened for those "mandatory" 19 years of education, in 98% of the instances it would all be for naught in that most employers place more value on ~~people skills~~ kissing ass and ~~not rocking the boat~~ lying than any vaccine or new technology you can create. It's why the likes of Schiff were mocked and ignored and books like these didn't do any damn good. In short, corporate America is so corrupted by the incompetents that populate the country the ONLY way you'll ever come even close to your potential is through self-employment.

Economic Standards of Living -A study I did showed that if the economy had grown like it did from the 1940's to the 1960's income per capita would be around $99,000 per person.

Imagine the implications for standards of living.

We wouldn't have a social security/medicare/pensions crisis.
We wouldn't have the national debt we do today
We wouldn't have any employment problems
We wouldn't have anywhere near the divorce rates we have
We wouldn't worry about paying for college
And we wouldn't be worried about affording health care

But such an opportunity cost doesn't speak to what such excess capital could afford us.

With so much money there'd be tons more innovation. Diseases that could be cured, life expectancies would increase, technological advances would accelerate (imagine the Internet in 1973 and XBox 360 in 1981 and smart phones in 1994), whatever we have today imagine we had it 10 years ago.

But no, it's more important to slow down societal progress and blunt excellence so welfare bums can collect a check and spit out more children.

Family -And finally family.

You are never going to have June or Ward Cleaver.

For all the fun and mockery mindless, ignorant Americans made of them for being "square" and being "SWPL," in the end most Americans would kill for a loyal, beautiful, skinny wife and a handsome, wise, reliable, fatherly husband. Instead today you're going to get what you sow, and sadly, that SEVERELY limits your potential in life in that it limits the most important thing in your life - family.

Today's selection of modern day spousal candidates have:

Psychological issues
Financial issues
Familial issues (you know, already divorced, 3 kids, 3 different moms/dads)
Drug issues
Obesity Attitude
Student loans
Worthless degrees

Poor job prospects
Credit card debt
Car debt
Household debt

and a never ending litany of other deal-breaking baggage that makes a Leave it to Beaver family a 1 in a million chance. Sadly, this is the single biggest cap on reaching your potential in life in that family and loved ones are the most important things in life. But hey, at least some angry 70's feminists got to make 3 generations of Americans wallow in their own misery.

We could address other aspects of potential-limiting in America, but you get the point. Our general inability to achieve our best is limited as we celebrate and invest in our worst. Had we not squandered our money on the losers of society we wouldn't have millions of youth mired in under/unemployment, but rocketing towards their best career potential. People would have enough excess income they could pursue their dreams, resulting in new musicians, artists, innovators, authors, and the commensurate works and creations that would come with it. Families would be more stable, resulting in a lot happier of a population. And nearly every one of us could take our one finite life and nearly be guaranteed it would not be wasted, ensuring we'd have no regrets on our death bed. Sadly, this reality was just barely whisked out of our grasp, and this is the kernel, the nucleus, the true cause of the grief of all Real Americans.

The question is how do we cope? How do we deal with this?

There are no universal answers, but if you're willing to listen to somebody who has given it some thought, here's my suggestions:

First, realize it's not your fault. You didn't control being born into the filth of the hippie generation and the successive filth spawned after it. You were just really unlucky. You must accept this, but more importantly FORGIVE YOURSELF and NO LONGER TAKE RESPONSIBILITY. You must realize and accept you cannot fight stupid and there's just too much stupid in this country.

Second, come up with FEASIBLE goals you can achieve. You may not get that skinny wife or the employed husband. You may not get that career as a cop. But find out what you can do and do it.

Third, realize that the most important thing in life is other humans. Family, friends, loved ones. I personally refuse to waste my time on leftists, socialists, feminists and other mentally damaged people. Life is too short. Additionally, think about the likes of Hillary Clinton and John Edwards. Miserable people that nobody loves while they or their spouse fucks other people. Most leftists live in a delusional world and very few are truly happy. I say that not to make you feel better, but because it's true. They have surrounded themselves with leftists. How happy can a human in that environment truly be?

Fourth, stay physically attractive and have sex with good looking people. While excellence may not be permitted in terms of finance, success, or your career, there is very little the left can do to stop you from being in good shape and attracting good looking people. This strikes at their core (envy), but gives them no way to get "retribution" in that you can't "tax" or "confiscate" beauty. The best they can do is things like "fat acceptance" or try to shame people for being sexually attracted to what they are. Nothing pisses off a weak, limpy male leftist or a fat, angry female feminist than two hot conservatives or libertarians enjoying each other.

Fifth, collect as much government cheese as possible. This may sound counterintuitive or at least immoral, but realize this is a democracy and society in its infinite ignorance has voted for bread and circuses. These ARE the new rules AND THEY ARE FORCED ON YOU. Ergo, you do yourself a great disservice and disrespect adhering to some inapplicable, higher-caliber moral code. Play by the rules they gave you.

Sixth, consider buying the book "Enjoy the Decline." It is EXPRESSLY written for all conservatives, libertarians and Real Americans and is designed to relinquish you of as much of your anger, grief, depression and malaise as possible so you can move on and enjoy the life as much as you can. Life is too short to be angry, sometimes it just takes a little nudge or a different viewpoint to understand how to let go of the anger...or at least not let it ruin your life.

Aaron Clarey is an author, ballroom dancer, economist, motorcyclist and minimalist. You can purchase his books here and visit his consulting page here.

America Is Getting What It Deserves

July 29, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Again, the America you are fighting for is NOT the 1948, hard working, honest, freedom-loving country of decent moral caliber.

It's this.

"I Deserve a Child, Even Without a Husband"

July 29, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Forcing yourself to take time off
18 months not knowing you had a dishwasher
50 shades of gray the movie
Feminists invade comic-con
The bar Aaron could never attend closes
And hands down the BEST RIPPING APART of a female troll who insists she deserves children even though they won't have a father.

and MORE

in this latest episode of The Clarey Podcast.

You can find the archive here!

You can also find more ranty goodness on my Youtube Channel here!

Why We Just Can't "Print Off More Money"

July 29, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

A simple explanation for your friends if they ask or if you're having trouble during an argument with liberals:

Why Stephen Smith is Proof Men Need to Ignore Political Correctness

July 30, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Let me be brief.

We here in this "hate-filled," "mysoginistic," blabbity-blah-blah-freaking-blah sphere of the internet known as the Manosphere, are about the only "baseline" of reality and sanity that exists.

We don't have the billions of dollars that the MSM has.

We don't have the TRILLIONS of dollars that the government has.

But we have something that trumps them all. And that is the god damned truth.

And when push comes to shove the people are going to be desperately searching for the truth.

And Stephen Smith DARED to speak about it.

Here's the deal men (and any women capable of intellectual honesty).

If you can't speak honestly, truthfully, and realistically about what is happening in society without getting:

fired reprimanded ostracized ridiculed sued
etc.

Then there is no society worth fighting for. And that's the plain truth. If you can't speak your honest, truth-adhereing mind without getting punished, then that society is over with and no longer worth fighting for.

So what are you going to do about it?

The reality is that this backlash and predisposition against the truth comes from the left. I don't hear any conservatives, libertarians or tea partiers demanding the heads, firings and suspensions of people for speaking their minds. It is SOLELY THE MONOPOLY of the left that comes in with the political correctness and DEMANDS people be fired for exercising their first amendment rights or having independent thought.

So let's see if Stephan Smith, who is black and that DOES play a role in this, starts to appreciate the a-racists (meaning non-racist) defense of his right to merely point out the truth?

Because the sooner everybody realizes, regardless of their skin, that it's the socialists (euphemistically called "democrats") that will throw anybody under the bus to gain power, the better this country is going to be.

In the meantime, enjoy that freaking decline.

What Did I Tell You About Modern Day Christian Girls?

July 30, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

They abuse the religion for their own selfish aims.

And what a shock, she's a lawyer.

Wednesday Night Wanderings

July 31, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Never send a woman to do a man's job.

Never attend or send your kids to the University of Wisconsin.

Never attend or send your kids to Harvard University.

The Case for Impeaching Obama

July 31, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

I would say the IRS scandal would be enough, but there are other reasons as well.

And They All Voted Democrat

August 1, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

but they'll blame Bush.

JBly is the Winner!

August 1, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

With a bid of $75 JBly had the winning bid.

JBly contact me via my e-mail found in my profile below (or any other social media means) and we can get details.

Thank you all for bidding on my Ex Girlfriend's tits!

Why You Really Aren't "Investing" In the Stock Market

August 1, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Important economics lesson here boys and girls!

What does it mean to "invest?"

Well, if you're leftist it means to take other people's money and piss it away on worthless social programs, typically headed up by connected cronies in the non-profit world. For example we "invest" in our children in the schools, but they don't learn anything and are ranked near Mexico in terms of standardized test scores. We "invest" in communities by building (Mark Dayton's favorite) "community centers." they don't do anything but provide a place for bums and poor people to stay warm during winter or have social workers baby sit other people's kids during summer. In every case, the people who "invested" the money never see a dime of return because...well...the truth is those REALLY AREN'T INVESTMENTS!

You see, an investment has to have some kind of rate of return. Something where you take the money, you INVEST it in something, and that something provides you MORE than what you invested over the course of its life. If you use this (reality based) definition, you would think this would apply to the stock market. Your 401k's, your IRA's, your mutual funds! Those are all REAL investments, right?

Oh, you sad, sad goodie, two-shoes, obedient suburbanite conservative SWPL people.

So sorry, it is not.

You see, the INITIAL trade, the VERY FIRST TIME a brand new stock is sold on the stock market, that is INDEED an investment. We call this "initial" first time sale an "IPO" or "initial public offering." This is when a company is looking for investors to finance it. The company decides to sell some shares in its equity and various institutions, banks, hedge funds and other financial firms pony up the billions of dollars to get in on this "IPO."

The proceeds from these IPO's then go to the company which in turn then TRULY AND REALLY invests it. They buy assets, they buy equipment, the hire people, they build plants. They and their original financiers make the REAL investment. But what happens after that?

How do you good obedient 401k Clergy people "invest" if the large financial institutions did all the "real" investing already?

Well, the answer is - you don't.

You see, for a brief moment in time you may accidentally and indirectly hold some original IPO shares through a mutual fund, but over time (quite rapidly actually) those original IPO purchasers do something with those shares they bought directly from the company.

They sell them.

To who? You, them, each other.

Anybody who will pay them more than what they paid for it.

Once that happens those shares are no longer actual "investments." They are merely speculation.

This has two ramifications.

1. This means the entirety of the US retirement planning system is based on speculation. It's not about "investing in a new company" or "investing in an upstart." The vast majority of retirement dollars are based on the hope that a savvy analyst or mutual fund manager has found a 10% pricing error in a stock that allows him/her to purchase it and ride that 10% increase up before selling it (and charging you 3% managerial fees). Of course this says nothing about how now that the share of stock is so far removed from the company that it's economic variables that account for the majority of price swings, and so with QE-291 and artificially low rates prompting companies to leverage up and buy back their shares, OH, and let's not forget you 401k mindless zombies throwing trillions into the market every couple years, the stock market has skyrocketed when there's been no real underlying reason for it to.

2. The stock market and economic growth no longer have anything to do with one another.

I love it when liberals desperately point to the stock market as if it is some barometer of economic growth, standards of living, or well being in the country. Nearly everyone under 35 is under/unemployed, we've lost real, fulltime times on a nominal and adjusted for inflation basis, economic growth is lethargy, but hey hotdiggitydoooo! Dat der stock market broke 17,000! Obama's a genius!

In there's any explanation why the stock market is NOT the economy, it's that the ONLY economic growth to come from the stock market came from those IPO's. After that money was invested, there was NOT A CENT MORE of economic growth due to the sale of those stocks. Thus, any price increases (once again) have absolutely no bearing on any new investment going into the real economy.

Now, I know, I know. I'm just a party pooper.

I was a party pooper before the Asian currency crisis.
I was a party pooper before the Dotcom crash.
I was a party pooper before the housing bubble
And I was a party pooper before the education bubble.

My question is simply this.

For all of you who got angry at people who said stocks were overvalued in 1999, that housing was overvalued in 2006, and that liberal arts degrees were worthless in 2009 (and there most certainly were VICIOUSLY and FURIOUSLY angry people I had to contend with back then) were the subsequent crashes and economic recessions worth it? Would you have preferred to have the crashes over me and people like me trying to tell you the truth? Or would you have preferred to avoid those recessions and collapses by maybe opening up your thick skulls to entertain something that wasn't bread and circus bullshit spoon-fed to you by politicians, bankers, Oprah, media and all the other "feel good, everything is awesome" establishment types?

Wait wait wait.

Lemme guess!

"This time it's different!?"

Enjoy that freaking decline.

For more of Aaron's cheerful tirades, consider visiting his Youtube channel

He Rested On the Sabbath Linkage

August 3, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

In case you were wondering, yes, I'm trying to take weekends off. Noticed that I was working non-stop, all week, all day without a clear delineation between work and fun. And further noticed that if you don't stop and make a clear mental break from work, it starts to have negative effects on your mood and happiness.

In the meantime, some lazy Sunday linkage for you:

The Black Brigade has another damn fine podcast.

Stefan Molyneux has an interesting podcast on "The Truth About Israel and Palestine"

Food - it's what makes men happy because it's life, survival, security, and love all wrapped into one.

Couldn't happen to a better city.

Might have to watch this.

Roosh releases his new book with a title I'm shaking my head at.

The Baby Boomers will reap what they sow.

Victor Borge v. 2.0

How many private sector workers does it take to support a ~~parasite~~ government worker.

Daddy Popp explains math to welfare queens, but they won't be able to do the math.

"Royal Order of the Water Buffaloes"

Why You Should Never Go to STEM Grad School

August 3, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

From our STEM Advanced Degreed Agent in the Field:

I just read your book "Bachelor Pad Economics" and discovered your other work; I thought it was great. I've done pretty well for myself so far but I still wish I had that book years ago. I would like to share my story about grad school in STEM. Don't worry, there's a happy ending – sort of – but I wanted to share my experience with others and invite you to comment.

I grew up in a blue collar family in the mid-west and didn't have much of money to go to college, so for my undergraduate I went to the satellite campus for a larger university that was about an hour from my parent's house. I decided to study computer science and I had won some great scholarships that covered the cost of tuition. I did very well in the program and despite not having attended a big name school, I was able to score some paid internships with a large and prestigious tech company. In my senior year I had great grades, more than a year's work experience in the field, more money in the bank than when I started, and a sunny and idealistic outlook. All of my professors said that I should go to grad school though and so instead of going to work upon graduation I went over to main campus to pursue my master's degree.

First thing first, never go to grad school just because you are smart and hardworking enough to get in. In grad school you need to focus on a narrow subtopic of your field and do "original research" so that you can publish journal papers that hardly anyone reads and beg the government for grant money. You do this research under an adviser, who is basically a manager. Your adviser provides you with lab space, finds sources of government funding, signs off on your coursework and thesis, tries to micromanage you, and then takes credit for your research despite not knowing the first thing about it. You should start looking for an adviser before picking a grad school to make sure you are actually interested in the research the lab is engaged in. In my case, my adviser sold me on a bill of goods about applying artificial intelligence to medical research being done at a more prestigious university. In reality, he didn't have a clue what these medical researchers were actually doing, he just had a friend who was doing a postdoc – that's when you have a PhD but instead of finding a real job you work under a professor doing research – in that lab, and they were willing to accept me as free labor. By the time I realized that I wasn't going to be working on anything like what had been described to me, it would have been politically difficult to back out because my adviser had already bragged to the dean that he had established a collaborative research project with this other university. Basically, I ended up finding some little niche where I could write computer programs that processed some data that the MDs couldn't. The work was incredibly tedious at times, and it wasn't anything like what I had been sold on, but at least I was able to squeeze a thesis out of it and get the hell out of dodge.

My adviser used various forms of manipulation to pressure me to go get a PhD. He even asserted that it wouldn't overqualify me for any jobs, which I knew for a fact to be utter nonsense. If you have a PhD that focuses on an area that isn't applicable to the job you're applying for, most big companies won't consider you. I decided to find a job with the company I had interned with as an undergrad. When my adviser found out, he added a requirement that I write another paper before he would allow me to defend my thesis*. This delayed me by several months, resulted in me spending my last couple of weeks in grad school basically homeless and crashing on other people's couches, and forced me to spend my last summer before starting work cooped up in a windowless room trying to throw together some nonsense paper.*

It's not to say it was all bad. I actually enjoyed being a teaching assistant. I would routinely get comments from students that I explained the material much better than the professors. I lost something though, and not just the two years of my youth it had taken me to complete the program. The whole thing made me much more bitter and cynical. I got to see how professors really spend most of their time begging for grant money rather than teaching students or doing research themselves*. I got to see how a lot of these professors care more about prestige than actually advancing the frontiers of human knowledge. I got to see how universities will spare no expense in building and updating facilities that parents and prospective students see during their campus tour but never seem to have enough money to buy quality equipment for student labs. By chance, I actually got to overhear a conversation about hiring a new faculty member in which the only thing that was discussed was the* effects on the department's diversity rather than the qualifications of the different candidates*.*

Now that's all over though, I'm making plenty of money and living comfortably. Yes, I still deal with the typical corporate bullshit and I have to put up with Orwellian pandering to women and minorities. A great example of this is the time when I was struggling to secure approval for necessary business travel while the company was flying women from around the world down to some "women in engineering" event – which from what I could gather consisted of a bunch of ego-stroking talks about how victimized they all are followed by a trip south of the border to party and shoot tequila. It doesn't help that I'm now living in a liberal namby-pamby state either, but at least there is still the internet where people are willing to talk plain truth. All I need to do now is get to a point where I'm financially independent and finally say "fuck you" to all of this nonsense.

Thanks for being out there.

Why Keynesianism Is Immoral

August 4, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

A recent intellectual epiphany I had was that to debunk religion one cannot look "forward," but rather "backward." What this means is that if you are going to try to debunk a religion (or philosophy or ideology, etc.) you cannot further argue within the context of that religion (philosophy, ideology, etc.). You merely abide by the rules laid out by said religion and in doing so get into semantical arguments that never resolve anything.

No, one must go BACKWARDS and ask basic elementary questions about the entire religion (ideology, philosophy, etc.) itself, challenging the PREMISES by which the entire religion is founded upon. And once those premises are proven to be false or at least unfounded or immoral, then the entire belief system itself can be called into question, if not, completely debunked.

And I believe Keynesianism is one such ripe candidate.

Let us say that Paul Krugman is 100% correct.
Barack Obama is 100% correct.
Janet Yellen is 100% correct.
And John Maynard Keynes himself was 100% correct.

My question is simply - so what?

And the reason my question, in spite of them all being theoretically 100% completely correct, is "so what" has nothing to do with being right or the efficacy of their policies. It has to do with whether their actions, claims, or demands upon an economy are moral. What right do they have to demand such behavior from other individuals?

Take smoking for example.

Right now private property rights are being violated across the globe because some people believe that just because they're right, their "rightness" trumps people's individual liberty and choice. Thus, now, even though people "own" their property in the form of bars and restaurants, those people have no rights as to whether or not to allow smoking, not to mention smokers who would like to smoke on private property where it would have otherwise been allowed.

Does smoking cause cancer?

Absolutely yes.

Should you not smoke?

Absolutely yes.

Are the anti-smoking Nazi's right?

100% right.

Still does not give them the right to tell other people what to do with their bodies.

And it is here that is the core to Keynesianism's immorality - they deny people's right to self-determination.

Let us be clear what Keynesianism is.

It is the belief that the government has the right to intervene in the economy (read-individuals' lives) to "make things better."

Noble or not Honorable or not RIGHT or not

that one belief transgresses the individual and makes Keynesianism a true evil in that it violates people's individual choice, individual freedoms, and individual decisions. It forces the will of a few government bureaucrats and politicians on the masses because "they know better." It dares to suggest some people know what's best for you AND GRANTS THEM THE AUTHORITY to intervene.

The problems and threats with such an economic religion (and that's what it is) are obvious to anybody with half a brain and an ounce of intellectual honesty.

1. In the Keynesian World nobody learns from their mistakes.

Spit out more kids that you can afford?
Lend to douchebag cronies who are connected to the banking system?
Major in stupid ass liberal arts suburbanite chicky girl studies?

Never fear! Government bailouts are here!

Understand that with a philosophy of Keynesianism any mal-investment that results in a crash or a recession is "magically" undone by merely pumping more money into the economy or (more the more vote-getting solution) bailing out people from their spectacular mistakes. This means that nobody can fail, and in nobody failing, nobody learns from their mistakes. The consequences are disastrous as amply displayed by the black community. The "hot stove" in the form of "illegitimate children" is never seared in pain with the bearing the full costs of rearing one's own child. Keynesian bailouts merely moot the pain, denying 70% of the black population a much needed lesson in profitability, finance and survivability, and sadly condemning them to a life of poverty. And before you get all pissy and set your phasers to "accuse of racism" it's functionally no different than the denizens of lily white bankers who got bailed out just the same.

2. Keynesianism Is Too Easily Abused By Politicians

Hmmm....let's think this one through.

"Unlimited government spending"

WITH

"the power to bail out people for their mistakes"

COMBINED WITH

"a democracy."

Oh, no. No potential for amoral politicians to abuse this economic philosophy by

1. Spending money till the cow come home to
2. Bail out and thus bribe the idiot classes of society to vote for them because
3. In a democracy every person, welfare queen or not gets the vote

No, no politician would EVER sacrifice the future integrity of the country's finances and economy to win votes now at the expense of a mortgaged future. No, would never happen.

And finally...

3. They're Completely Wrong Anyway

I'd like to say the Keynesians were right, but truthfully that was just a handicap I gave to what is nothing more than the biggest frauds, shysters, intellectual weaklings and parasitic academians currently heading up our government, media, and educational institutions. If there's one thing to learn from the Obama administration it's that Keynesianism

just

does not work.

Forgot the moral argument that Paul Krugman has the right to tell you how much money you should earn, keep, save, spend, invest, be taxed upon, etc., because according to his wee-little academic econometrics model it's "what's best for society"

they're all wrong and (worse still) they all know it (and worse still than that) they don't care.

They are nothing more and nothing better than the modern day Catholic church killing people for reading the bible or being literate. They wish to retain their power by keeping the masses ignorant about economics. But unlike Europeans during the Dark Ages, most Americans are willing to be fattened and satiated watching The Bachelorette and getting some "great apps" at Applebee's. Just remember come next fourth of July our founding fathers aren't rolling in their graves as much as you're merely pissing on them.

Yeah, It's Like "Swingers"

August 4, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Had the honor of meeting Average Married Dad and this was the results. And yes, it is kind of like the movie "Swingers."

He has a book out which I will review later.

Latest Podcast Is Out!

August 5, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

In this episode:

Two funny jokes,
my awesome grandma
blaming the border problem and lack of US sovereignty of females voting democrat
The Royal Order of the Water Buffaloes
The Mecca of Grunge and Hipsters (Uptown in Minneapolis) has officially been taken over by frat boys

And more!

The Newest Cappy Cap Model

August 6, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

While I know you guys all clamor for more charts and graphs, unfortunately, we here at Cappy Cap have to get serious every once in a while and make you look at pretty conservative and libertarian girls.

Now, I know, I know, I don't like it any more than you do, but it's got to be done and the sooner we do it, the sooner it will be over with.

We only have like 4 or 5 more of these, so just be patient and we'll get through this. In the meantime buy Worthless.

Oh, she also said you should listen to The Clarey Podcast.

Why Every Young Man Should Consider the Bakken Oil Field

August 6, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

The Problem With Wisdom

August 6, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Sadly, all of us "older, wiser men" have to admit we have no way to "force" you to accept and incorporate our wisdom. We cannot guarantee that had you pursued that career in music therapy you would NOT have become successful. We cannot guarantee that had you tried to get into investment banking you would NOT have become a millionaire. And we cannot guarantee that had you tried to become a basketball star you would not have become the next LeBron James. But if we were to switch it, focusing instead on the risks and consequences of you FAILING, rather than what idealistically "may have been," perhaps these severe costs will make you heed our words.

Stupid People Lending Money to Stupid People

August 7, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Again, how dumb are you to lend to Argentina?

and consequently don't deserve the republic, let alone can be trusted with a democracy.

OK, I'll give you the abbreviated version of this.

A restaurant in Stillwater, MN puts a "surcharge" listed as "minimum wage tax" to cover the recently increased minimum wage.

Now you,
me,
and anybody with half a f*cking brain knows that this is merely a play on words

That no matter how they break down the bill ALL OF THE EXPENSES HAVE TO BE PAID BY THE CUSTOMER!

It's always been that way.
It will always be that way.
And if it stops being that way, then the company goes bankrupt because it's NO LONGER PROFITABLE.

But oh no. That's too complicated for the "brilliant" American people.

No, read the comments and take in the galactical stupidity of some of our brothers and sisters.

Cripes, I need a book babe to lower my blood pressure.

Road Tripping to Seattle

August 7, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

In my life mission to enjoy the decline and pursue leisure over labor, I will be road tripping it to Seattle. No real route is planned and no itinerary set but if you are in the Dakotas/Montana/Wyoming, Idaho/Washington area I may be coming through and more than happy to grab a beer or a coffee or shoot guns. Will be leaving tomorrow morning so give a shout out here if you're around. I do know I am VERY likely to be staying in Missoula, MT and hiking Trapper's Peak near Darby, MT. Then off to Seattle, return trip is eehhhhhh...TBD.

Anyway, let the ole Captain know if you're around.

New Sponsor - Talon Bottle Opener

August 8, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Greetings All!

We have a new sponsor. A reader is raising funds via Kick Starter for his own little entrepreneurial venture. Looking to raise a modest amount of $2,500 so he can manufacture and sell the "Talon Bottle Opener" which serves as a bottle opener, but also as this kind of Swiss Army knife sort of thing that organizes keys, making key chains unnecessary. Getting my copy in the mail and will do a review later, but in the meantime if you want to help a fellow entrepreneur out consider going to his Kickstarter page and tossing the guy a couple bucks.

Thanks for your readership and support,

Cappy

Thursday Night Linkage

August 8, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

No amount of protests will change reality and truth. Also note the hyphenated name.

More insight into the psychology of leftists.

Suing Breitbart's widow.

Why the university system hates America and is nothing more than an arm of socialism.

Oh, the Irony

August 8, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

And just 5 years ago Kirchner and Obama were best of buds.

An Economist Explains Russia's Sanctions

August 8, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Jerry Robinson is an economist who I reference frequently because he is one of the economists I keep learning from AND he's younger than me. Saw this while loading up the ole podcast in anticipation of my road trip and thought many of you would enjoy it as well.

My apologies for the fewer amounts of posts during the summer, but I am trying to enjoy summer while it's here and avail myself of the excellent weather. Normal blogging will return to a more normal level in late August. In the meantime I strongly suggest you also enjoy the summer and not read up too much on economics, politics, etc., during these waning days of summer.

Cappy's Great Montana Adventure

August 10, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Hello Lieutenants, Economics, Cappy Cappites and Chillldren!

Currently in Seattle, but yesterday was just south of Darby, Montana hiking "Trapper's Peak." Pictures below:

Leif - "Seattle's Royal Enfield"

August 10, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Met up with a fan Leif from Seattle who drove a Royal Enfield motorcycle. The motorcycle is about 4 times older than he is, but he still allowed me to sit on it.

Why You Must Suffer

August 11, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

and put up with yet another horrifying, painful picture of the most recent Book Babe.

"Behind the Housing Crash" was written quite some time ago, and though sales have obviously dwindled, for some reason I think there may be a slight resurgence.

Seattle to Billings

August 12, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Howdy Lieutenants!

Made a rocket run from Seattle to Billings, Montana, and after sleeping in, I shall head out and hunt down some moss agates as well as fossils in SE Montana.

In the meantime wanted to share a couple pictures with you all. One is a picture of a bridge in Washington. I thought the state of Washington was all trees and mountains, but instead it's truthfully mostly prairie and desert, interrupted with the occasional Columbia river or random lake. Also included is a picture of Lake Coeure d' Alene (which I only drove past during night and never had time during the day to swim in, which I did) and the bar in Kellogg, Idaho where my "Staph Infected Hippie Chick" story was from, that is now closed.

Sunshine
BAR
CAFE

"Tampon Journalism" of The Guardian

August 14, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

The REAL story here is not the click bait of a hopeless dependent and childish feminist who demands tampons be made free for all women.

It's that The Guardian would even consider publishing such pointless trash, which belies just how obsolete the MSM has become.

Why Most People Just Can't "Go Galt"

August 14, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

I was listening to The Black Brigade's latest podcast whilst hiking Trapper Peak. And among their topics de jour was the recurring theme of "going Galt." This particular instance however, was prompted by local radio show host Jason Lewis walking off the job claiming he had had enough and was no longer going to serve as a host to what is nothing more than the parasites of society.

They applauded his decision, as do I, but they then went onto ask the question, "Why don't more talk radio hosts" or "leaders" in the conservative/libertarian movement provide a how to, or actually go Galt themselves? Matter of fact, why don't just 10% of conservatives, libertarians or as I like to call them "Real Americans" go Galt, crashing this entire corrupt system?

Well, lieutenants and economists, I already had the answer before I made it back to the trail head.

Understand that the number one thing preventing conservatives and libertarians from going Galt and "starving the beast" is that they are saddled with debt. This may at first sound odd that conservatives and libertarians would have such finances, but consider the fact that most people incur debt when they are younger which consequently means made those decisions to incur debt when they were statistically likely to be more liberal and you can see why even "savvy" conservative/libertarian types just can't "go Galt."

If you look at the decisions that result in life's major debts, they are typically made during their "dumbass 20 something leftists phase" ie - before one turns 30.

Student loans
Credit card/consumer spending
Car loans, and of course the biggest ball and chain of them all Mortgages

This results in an irony, if not a fiscal tragedy, where future and theoretical "Galtists" who would love nothing more than to go Galt, can't, simply because they are saddled with too much debt FORCING them to remain in the work force till their debts are paid and their mortgage gone. You add in marriage and children, and your average male "Galtist" can only wistfully pine about going Galt just as much as he can "buying a motorcycle and heading to Sturgis without permission."

The result is a phenomenon the Manosphere calls the "Wage Mule" or "Debt Slave." Stupid decisions made in the past condemn the rest of your life to severely limited choices and potential, effectively ruining your life, and certainly making lofty, idealistic political maneuvers such as "going Galt" an impossibility.

There is however, good news.

While Gen X may have been the last generation to partially swallow the "House

College Wife
Kids"

propaganda, Gen Y/the Millenials didn't. Additionally, a good percentage of Gen X also postponed marriage, or avoided it all together. In other words, Americans, despite their horrendous stupidity, are actually starting to learn from their predecessors, and with the breaking of the social contract between men and women and default and unconscious "going Galt" is already occurring.

Men just aren't proposing as much as they used to and if they do, they wait till they're well into their 30's to do so. Also, unless you're an illegal immigrant or are too stupid to do basic division and understand the concept of income per capita, people are having less kids. Thirdly, the economy is so poor, an entire generation has had the forced lesson of minimalism forced on them. And finally, if you look at labor force participation rates, people are wising up (even feminist-fed women) and realizing that yes, work indeed sucks. In other words, society is slowly "going Galt" as they respond to the perverse and country-destroying policies socialists have enacted upon society. This may not be the "rapid" "starve the beast TODAY" sort of strategy idealistic Galtists want, but it is to show them that what they wish for is already happening naturally. Perhaps not at the pace they wanted, but it is happening and it cannot be stopped.

The real issue, however, is one of hope. Galtists (theoretical or not) deep down inside want to starve the beast TODAY with the hopes that a new society would emerge from the ashes so quickly that they would be able to participate and enjoy said new society during their lifetime. The problem is that society is too glacial, America too entrenched economically and globally, and our citizenry too fat, stupid and endebted that this will never happen. Most people alive today will die watching a declining America, not a phoenix from the ashes. It will be future generations that will witness a reality-forced destruction of socialist America, and a resurrection, if there ever is one.

When Robots Replaced Liberal Arts Majors

August 14, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

If you really want to be on the cutting edge of economic thought, the concept of robots making human labor obsolete is the place to be.

This does not really threaten people who are willing to expend the calories of energy to learn skills and trades that either cannot be replaced by robots or that are in the fields of developing, building, maintaining and programming said robots.

But if you're a talentless "liberal arts" major working as a barrista

or

An idiotic customer service worker in Seattle who thought the minimum wage of $15 was a great idea you may want to rethink you're grand strategy of just "forcing" employers to pay you more when your lack of genuine skills can be automated at a fraction of the cost.

But, you know, hey, you go and "major in what your heart tells you" and see how well that poppycock strategy developed in the 50's works for you. The rest of us will be preparing for the 2020's.

Tasing Fat People at the Minnesota State Fair Episode

August 14, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

In this episode of The Clarey Podcast Aaron is in Seattle where he and his friend discuss;

Cappy's aggressive driving
Idiots who stand in line for 2 hours to get coffee at the original Starbucks
Ruining his reputation by helping a kid
Trying to remember the lyrics (and meaning) to the Frasier theme song while in Seattle

and

Cappy's dream of being airdropped into the Minnesota State fair armed with tasers where he goes on a tasing rampage

(You'll also note we've switched from Box.com to Podomatic. The download button IS THERE on their online player, but it is not obvious. I apologize in advance. Swear to Christ these programmers do not think of user friendliness when laying out their web sites. HOwever, this will allow for RSS feeds, iTunes and Stitcher radio in the near future)

Post post - Davis Aurini found out the meaning behind the lyrics to "Tossed Salads and Scrambled Eggs"

Rural Revoltion

August 15, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

"Declaring a worthless major is simply shouting out to the world, 'I'm a parasite and have no intentions of working for a living. I want to do what I want to do and I want the rest of you to pay for it. I ultimately want to produce nothing society wants, but in return I demand other people slave away to make me MP3 players, computers, video games, as well as engineer hybrid cars and whatever else I want. I also want society to create some make-work job for me so my ego isn't bruised and I can make-believe I'm a real-world-live adult too. And if you dare point out what I'm doing in the real world is nothing more than parasiting off of others, I'll cowardly hide myself behind some altruistic crusade and accuse you of being a racist, a misogynist, or a hater of children.'"

Rural Revolution was kind enough to do a review. She is also now on the blog roll.

Two 20 Something Western Crusaders Get Their Comeuppance

August 15, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

I love it when "multiculturalism" and "social Marxism" eat their own.

But you know, never listen to that stale, old, boring Euro-centric wisdom that managed to create everything good in this world. No, no, go on your crusade so you feel good about yourself and how open-minded you are.

A Political Analysis of ISIS

August 15, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

I think it sums it up actually quite nicely and accurately:

The Epitome of Leftist Bias in Journalism

August 17, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Every once in a while you get a photo or a picture that embodies EVERYTHING wrong with an entity, an ideology, a group, or a movement, etc.

This is one of those pictures which shows the:

ignorance
stupidity bias political agenda crusaderism
and narcissism

of modern day leftist journalists.

Thank you Ryan J. Reilly, you epitomize everything that's wrong with modern day journalism and ensure us bloggers are the real 4th Branch of Government.

Book Review - The Great Deformation

August 18, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

The Great Deformation, by David Stockman of Reagan admin fame, is a detailed and precise account of how (among other things) socialism, central banking, monetary policy, and corruption in the financial service sector has so warped and distorted the pricing mechanism of the financial markets that it has ultimately impaired and crippled the free market from functioning properly. Lacking this VITAL economic tool, the economy has since mal-invested in many bubbles resulting in a stagnation of our economy and no real economic growth, as well as no real hope for the future.

Ironically, those two lengthy sentences also epitomize the book because it is both lengthy and (unless you're an economist) doesn't make a lot of sense to the average person - thus the tragic and paradoxical nature of this otherwise excellent book.

There is absolutely NO DOUBT as to the quality, precision and workmanship Mr. Stockman put into this book. His ability to explain precisely what was going on, who was responsible for it (the financial crisis), as well as his masterful use of the English language to explain it, is unrivaled. The problem is that this brilliant piece of work has no obvious audience.

If you are an average person trying to understand the financial problems of the US and western civilization in general, this IS the book for you to read. The problem is that it's written at such a high level of "economicness" you won't understand half of it and would have to commit to further educating yourself about economics that it would take a SOLID two months of DEDICATED self-education in the field.

Ironically, if you ARE educated in the field, and managed to be one of the few economists with his head out of his ass and Keynes' dick out of your mouth, you will certainly understand it, but it will be nothing new to you. Mayhaps some details or observations you didn't know about (there are plenty in the book), but again, if you have the slightest bit of intellectual honesty and a drop of Austrian economic blood in your veins you will be fully aware of Mr. Stockman's points and positions.

Thus the tragedy about Mr. Stockman's book.

I would love to recommend it to beginners in economics as it is the veritable bible and account of what caused our current financial woes. But it would be speaking in tongues to them.

And I would strongly recommend it to my economic colleagues...it's just they already know what Mr. Stockman wrote.

The true value of this book is sadly what many of us do so on a day to day basis:

Writing for posterity.

If there is a "primary" reason to own this book it is because it is a brilliant and detailed account and accord of what PRECISELY happened during the build up to, and the consequences of, the financial crisis and future crises that are about to happen. It is not a novel to be consumed and then discussed at an intellectual light-weight "book club" in the suburbs sipping on $7 cup of Joe's at Starbucks pining when your sugar daddy husband is going to buy you another Range Rover, but rather a reference guide to consult when having serious discussions, and certainly policy issues if saner heads are ever elected into office. In short, it is as if you took "50 Shades of Grey" and multiplied it by -1.

Not very exciting, but infinitely practical and helpful to society if they ever cared to give it two shits about it.

Thankfully, Mr. Stockman has a very good outline where, though titled eccentrically, chapters are labelled (more or less) categorically allowing you to consult topics specific to your interests/needs. I would NOT recommend anybody read it cover to cover (which I did effectively while driving to Seattle and back via audio book), but instead purchase it and use it as a reference book for any point in time where discussion or debate requires an authoritative source as to the causes and consequences of the country's current finances.

You can find Mr. Stockman's book here and his other literary works here.

RSS Feed Available for The Clarey Podcast

August 18, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

With many thanks to our Eastern European Tech Guru in the Field The Clarey Podcast now officially has an RSS feed and will (hopefully) be on iTunes soon as well.

Celibate Boyfriend = Celebate Husband

August 18, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

It's always fun to watch Christian women date.

Fun Times Guarding Saudi Princes

August 18, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

I can't think of a more deserving group of people than Saudi princes to get robbed for a quarter million. However, this story made me realize something.

Most of those Saudi royalty people are grade A, arrogant, aloof, assholes. They believe you are inferior to them and they have absolutely no appreciation for their wealth, their luck and their fortune. They also are more than willing to play mind games, using Islam as a means to make your job of protecting them harder just for entertainment:

No men guards can watch over our women
Do not look at our women
No booze on the floor we stay on, even if it's other people that have nothing to do with our party
We need Muslim compliant food, fetch us some.
Etc.

Thus, while at the time I thought it was pretty cool to be providing security from one of the Saudi princes, in truth I was just putting myself in danger for a professional hit like this. No job, no money, and certainly no Saudi royalty is worth being in harm's way.

So for any young men out there across the world who are approached with the opportunity to play security guard to a Saudi prince, yes the pay might be good, but you're likely putting yourself in a situation where you might have to fire a gun (and suffer the legal consequences) of protecting what amounts to nothing more than one of the biggest douches in the world.

Let the spoiled brat Saudi princes protect themselves.

Communism + Super Fastfoward = Capitalism

August 19, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

The thing that stuck out most to me in this video is how the director HAD to fast forward the video to make the city look like it was bustling. But if you were to play it at normal speed, you'd notice the SEVERE and DRAMATIC lack of human (and therefore) economic activity in the country.

The ONLY thing of economic noteworthiness was the DHL truck which I was amazed to see in operation. The rest, if you can slow it down to normal real life speed, is actually depressing.

The Clarey Podcast Now on iTunes

August 19, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Our Eastern European IT Genius in the Field has also managed to get The Clarey Podcast on iTunes for all you ~~communists~~...errr....ummmm..."Apple users."

Next step will be to get on Stitcher, which I have no clue what it is or why I'm trying to get on it, but the kids nowadays say it's all the rage.

If there are any problems downloading or accessing the podcasts please let me know.

Many thanks,

Cappy

The Common Thread Between Elliot Rodger and ISIS

August 19, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

A superficial survey of the masses murdering Elliot Rodger and the mass murdering ISIS may only draw one, maybe two common threads. They're both murderers and they're both crazy. After coming to this conclusion most people whilst sipping on their $7 cup of lattes in the unaffected suburbs will then continue on their life, more concerned with whether they should pick up a copy of People magazine to catch up on all the pointless Hollywood gossip.

However, as my brain is wont to do, it wanders and thinks during my roadtrips, adventures and hikes, coming up with epiphanies that people stuck in cubicles and rush hour never have the opportunity to. And my latest great western road trip was no different as I discovered the key thing Elliot Rodger and ISIS have in common (heading south bound on 79 out of Rapid City no less). And if we take the time to identify it, think it through, we can prevent the likes of Rodger's rampage and ISIS's, even radical muslims thirst for blood.

Understand the most powerful force in the universe is not gravity, it's not electromagnetic radiation, and it's not nuclear power.

It's the human male.

Yes, yes, I know physicists will disagree as to the pure mathematical energy that can be measured, but in terms of what has come under control, managed, and been directed towards accomplishing the most amount of good it is not the non-sentient energies that be in the universe, but rather the human male.

It is without a doubt that nearly everything on the planet has been built by men. Civilization, math, engineering, capitalism, chemistry, literature, surgery, vaccines, nuclear power, electronic, communications, flight, space travel, you name it, men have built it. Matter of fact men are so energetic they've managed to master and control all the powers of the universe, bending them to our benefit and will, forever increasing the standards of living and life expectancies for all. This makes men not only the most interesting creature on the planet, but the nucleus and bedrock of society.

Where this limitless energy comes from is very simple - women. Men are programmed to want, desire and procreate with women. Many men also want to see their genetics cast out into the future in the form of children. Ergo a loving, beautiful, and loyal wife along with loving children are the batteries that power these amazing machines of innovation and progress.

But wives and children also serve a very vital role when it comes to the issue of men and their energy. One that puts their role in society on par with the importance of men - they channel men's energy.

Channel it to what?

Channel it to productive uses.

Without wives and children, mens energy has no ultimate point or purpose. And sadly, just because a man does not have a wife or child does not mean that energy goes away. It's still there, it just now has nowhere to be invested in nor a purpose to be invested wisely. And it is here where the dangerous side of men lies.

Imagine, if you will, a single man as if he were the plutonium used in the Fat Man atom bomb. This 6.2 kilograms of plutonium had 21 kilotons of potential energy. Also know that that energy MUST be expended. The man is going to burn that energy one way or another over the course of his life. So what is the best way to expend it?

Well, like nuclear power it can be expended in a very helpful way...

or a VERY destructive way.

The helpful way would be like a nuclear reactor providing nearly limitless energy and power to cities and society. It can heat homes, power industries, light the night and make life incredibly better for all of us.

Or it can be used to destroy and lay waste to society. Level cities, kill millions, wage war and end human life on this planet.

And now you see the importance of having women and family in life, as well as the commonality between Elliot Rodger and ISIS.

Without going into a great and detailed psycho-family analysis of the two, both Elliot and ISIS lacked the guidance, familial structure, and incentive to properly and productively channel their energy. The guidance coming from fathers who were either effectively absent (in Elliot's case) or dead/brainwashed by Islam (in ISIS members' case), never existed. Thus, the PRIMARY individual in their lives that would have taught them about how to go about getting a wife and children (their dads) were either not there or so impaired by a religious ideology things like "game" "wooing" and "charm" were never conveyed to their sons. Without these tools the Rodgers and ISIS's of the world were unable to attract women, denying them wives and families, thus denying purpose and agency to their lives. Worse still, with no children or loved ones in their lives, they had no incentive to be good stewards of the future, and thus no incentive to channel their energies productively.

Naturally, many of you will point out that just because a man does not have a point or purpose in life, does not mean he will use his excess energy for evil. Why not channel them for good? Why do you so pessimistically assume men will default towards destruction and evil? And while that is certainly true and there are many examples of philanthropists and altruists abound, the sad truth is that human psychology will typically default towards ego and laziness. And this is where the Destruction Principle and Crusaderism come into play.

Ever so abbreviating both, understand the human mind wants to belong to something and have SOME KIND of value. But if either through society, a recession, or a lack of interest from women, etc., no such opportunities to belong to something good and productive exist (a career, a family, etc.), people will go and create it out of whole cloth. Thus "crusades" that claim to be "helping" society, that are in reality nothing more than havens for worthless, talentless people to give themselves some kind of "faux" meaning or purpose in life:

Going green/Environmentalism
PETA
Born again Christians
African aid/mission trips
Feminism
Anti-fracking/Keystone pipeline
Etc.,

Where these "crusades" become particularly evil is on two accounts. One, participants in these crusades do NOT care about society as much as they do themselves. They don't care about the whales, they don't care about "the poor," they are doing it first and foremost for their ego. And whether or not their crusades and their demands actually hurt society (by increasing poverty, lowering unemployment, confiscating other people's money, etc) does not matter to them, because making society suffer (either through higher taxes or lower future performance) is less important than making their egos feel good.

Two, in pursuing crusades that are not based in reality, but rather ego-masturbation, they are diametrically put against reality. This means any success society has had in the past 5,000 years by adhering to reality has to be criminalized and villainized, and ultimately destroyed by these people. Capitalism, freedom, nuclear families, individualism, success, excellence, men, patriarchy, etc. any pillar of success is one that needs to be torn down. Thus, the majority of "successes" and "accomplishments" these type of people point to on their resume is NOT one of "building something" or "creation," but rather destroying something, stopping something, or preventing something.

Now, this mental disease of The Destruction Principle and Crusaderism is nothing "too" dangerous on its own. Wimpy effeminate men will join hairy armpitted women on a whole host of whinny and complaining campaigns, voting for socialism, economic justice and whatnot as they join OWS and protest in cardboard boxes. The worst outcome is they vote for socialism and slowly destroy the underlying economic infrastructure of society.

However you add The Destruction Principle and Crusaderism to men who still have testosterone and combine it with a lack of purpose and agency, and you now have the most dangerous and volatile cocktail for young men. And with nowhere else to go, and no productive use for their energies, these men will not lash out in a form of amazing production and charity, but rather death, mayhem, destruction and terror all in a self-aggrandizing way. Thus your Elliot Rodgers, ISIS, Al-Qaeda, James Holmes, Tsarnaev brothers, etc.

The solution is one that modern day western civilization is not willing to accept today. We need to put men at the center of society, ensuring they are raised right to ensure their energies are used for good and not evil. This unfortunately means making fathers head of the household and championing the nuclear family as the bedrock of civilization. It also means women (if they wish to have a family) will have to actually be wives and mothers first and foremost instead of temporary incubators for human children that are to be outsourced to the state for raising so she can get back to her career as a "non-profit marketing director."

Until that time the most powerful force in the universe will continue to go increasingly unchecked and unhoned to the risk and detriment of the world.

Aaron Clarey is a mean, evil jerk and writes mean things that hurts weaker people's feelings frequently. He is the author of "Enjoy the Decline" and "Bachelor Pad Economics" among other literary works. He hosts The Clarey Podcast and his Youtube channel where he does stupid "white-maley" things like using statistics, logic, math, facts and the truth because he's a jerk. He's also a racist, mysoginist, sexist, homophobe that hunts kittens and kicks puppies for fun, when he's not too busy stealing the oxygen tanks of nursing home patients.

Idiocracy - Another Reason Not to Breed

August 20, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

I love how universities are actually unintentionally lowering IQ's.

"What If Your Parents Decided Not to Have Children?"

August 20, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

In a language-warning rant I debunk the argument "What If Your Parents Decided Not to Have Children" which is also the same argument as "What If YOur Mom Decided to Have An Abortion?"

"Sliming Her Vagina Across the Video Gaming World"

August 23, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

I have put a call out to The Bechtloff to explain to us lay folk what the big deal is with this Zoe Quinn girl. He agreed to write a piece for later this weekend. However, what prompted my interested in this was listening to Honey Badger Radio's recent podcast.

However, the most gut busting laugh I've had in a long time came at the 1:11:45 mark. You do not want to piss off the Honey Badgers.

On a related note, Davis Aurini and a partner of his are raising money to put together a documentary about the "Sarkeesian Effect." Essentially an expose of these leftists, feminists and varied sorts of social justice warriors that have purposely targeted the video gaming/comicbook/geek industry in an effort to co-opt it for their own political purposes and to bring it down out of desire to pursue The Destruction Principle. They're looking to raise a decent amount of money and given that the frauds they're trying to expose damn well got near a quarter of a million dollars to make "political games" it might be worth throwing a couple bucks there way.

Why Every Worker is a Veritable Slave for 14 Years

August 24, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Uncle Bernie did a preliminary review of Bachelor Pad Economics and intends on doing a more lengthy one in the near future. However, he did cite a quote from the book that in simple math explains why anybody stupid enough to work hard is really a slave to socialist and leftist parasites for 14 years of your life.

The only way to win is to starve the beast and make the grocery store shelves empty.

Zoe Quinn for Non-Geeks

August 24, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

As mentioned in a previous post, I did not fully understand the "conflict" that has arisen in the gamer/geek/comicon/video game industry with the likes of Anita Sarkeesian, Adria Richards, and (most recently) Zoe Quinn. Even though I am an avid gamer and 80's nerd, I still was not able to understand why there is so much hubbub about a bunch of feminists trying to ruin a good time in geek culture. In my layman eye I didn't see any true threat or scandal except for a bunch of hate-filled feminists wishing to either capitalize or vainly attempt to destroy an otherwise happy and predominantly male-enclave of society so they could boost their egos without the rigor and effort of accomplishing anything of genuine merit or worth.

However, because of the sheer volume and visceral backlash against these women, I knew there must have been more than what my novice eye was seeing. And thusly I requested our resident expert in all things Geekery, Chris Bechtloff, to connect the dots for us non-geeks so we can understand the threat these sub-humans pose to society.

I personally know Chris and his podcast is one I tune into regularly. I'm not recommending it because "he's a friend and I'm just trying to help out a friend," but because the dude has a GREAT geek podcast and has the ability to translate the happenings in geek culture to how it affects "normal boring us" culture. You may find his podcast here and the traffic would be appreciated.

Hello there Lieutenants, this is The Bechtloff and the good Captain has asked me to step in and explain, as simply as possible, who the hell Zoe Quinn is, what this controversy is all about, and most importantly, why you should care.

Zoe Quinn is the feminist social justice warrior who made a little video game called Depression Quest on an independent video game distributing site called Steam. Depression Quest is a text based game about having depression. If that sounds like a terrible idea for a video game, it's only because it is. Ms. Quinn's game was, as you might imagine, mocked by many a gamer. A fact that Quinn was able to use to able to use to garner sympathy and even donations via crowd funding. So to recap, Zoe Quinn's original claim to fame was making a terrible excuse for a video game, and then playing the professional victim.

Now recently Zoe Quinn's ex boyfriend published a very lengthy blog in which he accused her of cheating on him with at least five different guys, which is where she earned her new nickname of "Five Guys Burgers and Lies". Now it seems most if not all of these men were fellow video game developers and video game journalists who worked at sites that were giving her favorable coverage as well as covering up negative stories on her that came out. So obviously serious questions regarding journalistic integrity have been raised. All of this is covered extremely well in videos by the Youtuber Internet Aristocrat. I would suggest checking them out for more on it.

Now I don't want to go into extensive detail, but there are a lot of factors here. The identity of all five of these men, or even if it is indeed only five are unknown as of now. Also a staunch Zoe Quinn defender by the name of Phil Fish is claiming his website has been hacked by Zoe's enemies, although there is considerable evidence that he faked that. I'm struggling with how much to even mention here because I really want to keep this as brief as possible. As I said, there is a lot going on here, and this story continues to unfold even as I type this. But what is clear is that geek and gaming sites like Kotaku are desperately trying to sweep things under the rug on this. In a very Nixon like turn of events the cover up is rapidly becoming far worse than the crime.

Now the real question is why does this matter. Well, this is far more important than the whorishness of Zoe Quinn. This is about how unbelievably corrupt and bias the geek and gaming media has become. Put simply, we have allegations that gaming developers were sleeping with game critics in exchange for positive coverage, and the response from those in charge of these sites has been "Move along, nothing to see here folks.". We have journalists literally in bed with the industry they are charged with covering. It is clear that the gaming and geek media have become completely overrun by corrupt whores who care about nothing but pushing their insane liberal agenda and scratching each others backs in the process, or in this case, scratching each others naughty bits. And if Zoe Quinn and everyone else involved can get away with this, then that means these people can basically get away with anything. Now some of you reading this might think this doesn't matter. Maybe you don't play video games, or read comic books, or indulge in any other aspect of geek culture. But it still matters. Geek culture is the imagination of our culture. It is from geek culture that so much of our technological innovation and our art and entertainment spring. We cannot afford to let these soulless liberal whores snuff that flame of creativity out.

Thanks folks. And now back to your regularly scheduled Cappy Cap blogging.

We Don't Need No Stinking Fathers

August 25, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

You just have to read the last question.

By all means gentlemen, please be absent in your child's life. We need a constant supply of strippers, porn stars, and escorts. And ladies, please, by all means, choose men to procreate with that will be absent in your daughter's life. We need her to grow up insecure and with daddy issues so that we don't have to work too hard to get some play.

Corporate Taxes Are the Dumbest Thing You Can Do To An Economy

August 25, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Yes, language warning.

The Truth About the ALS Ice Bucket Fad

August 26, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

I think I speak for everybody:

"Yeah, But the 50's Were Racist!"

August 26, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

When debating economics, nothing angers me more when a human mind purposely chooses to ignore the precise, specific argument at hand and pulls something unrelated to the debate, and presents it as germane.

The perfect example of this - pointing to the 50's as ideal economic times.

If you ever bring up the 1940's and the 1950's as an example of what an economy "should be," you will be guaranteed 100% or your money back, leftists will un-thinkingly knee jerk and parrot two arguments they had spoon fed to them.

1. Oh yeah, well the top income tax rate was 99.8%

and

2. Yeah, but the 50's were racist!

I'm not going to go into the argument about the top marginal tax rate (which so few people paid) as it's been debunked.

But I am going to address the "Yeah, but the 50's were racist."

My counter-argument is simple:

So what?

Not that I am for racism.
Not that I had no problems with Jim Crow laws.
Not that I wanted blacks intimidated from voting or lynched.

But because IT IS NOT RELEVANT TO THE TOPIC ABOUT ECONOMIC GROWTH DURING THE 50's!

During the 20 year period which most would consider the halcyon days of America (1940's-1960's) economic growth was nearly twice what it is today. Unemployment a half. Underemployment, non existent. And debt decreasing. Practically all economic measures showed the economy firing on all cylinders and everybody, and I mean EVERYBODY (blacks included) benefited from this great general economic climate.

But to take an irrelevant sociological phenomenon such as racism and use it to besmirch or debunk an economic phenomenon is intellectually dishonest and...well...the epitome of leftist.

The truth is that the economic growth during the 50's was so great, it was able to OVERCOME what negative effects of racism there were. Blacks and black families we infinitely better off based on a wide array of economic statistics during "those evil, racist, oppressive 50's" than they are today in Unicornitopia Diversityville Obama Land. Unemployment, crime, real wages, illegitimate birth, divorce, etc. And while things such as Jim Crow laws and other specific instances of truly oppressive racism existed, it wasn't until economic policies changed from that of capitalism and free markets to "The Great Society"/socialism did blacks' economic AND sociological lot start to severely deteriorate. Ironically, this meant outright racism wasn't anywhere near as damaging to the black community than "well intended" socialism.

What I want to see, though, is taking the precise same illogic the left uses when deriding the 50's and reverse apply it today.

So there was a lot more racism back in the 50's, and there's less of it today.
But back in the 50's the black community (as well as all communities) had better technology adjusted standards of living, healthier families, and the economy was growing much.
Ergo, racism is good for economic growth!

Whether the leftist is smart enough to see you merely did what they did - dishonestly substitute the sociological scourge of racism into what was an economic debate - would be left to be seen. Though my money would be on their heads spinning.

Episode 61 of The Clarey Podcast

August 26, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

The "Three Hour Podcast of Hell" which includes:

How back to school sales ruin kid's summers
English teachers have rarely written anything of literary worth Test your IQ!
A review of Wolfenstein NWO
A review of Sin City 2
How I'd murder Steve Balmer
"I'm Majoring in Reconciliation"
My enemies were the key to my success
When Cappy read the riot act to a real life high end whore (and paid the price)
And Aaron takes down a sanctimonious single mom like no other and more in this episode of The Clarey Podcast!

And for you communists posing as "Apple Product Afficionados" you can find The Clarey Podcast on ~~Pravda~~ errr....uhhh....ahem...."iTunes" as well.

My Ex Found a New Home

August 27, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

The purchaser of "My Ex GF's Tits" has found her artwork a new home. Specifically a frat house in front of a beer-pong table.

I cannot think of a better home.

How the Left Murders the Individual

August 28, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

I did a spoof video asking why there isn't a "White Male Appreciation Month." And though I knew it was tongue and cheek, it wasn't until a handful of of people, who were offended by it, made me have to go and think through why I found it funny. And after a little scratching of the surface and kicking it around in my brain, I finally realized not only why I found it funny, but why it truly is funny:

ANY "Appreciation Month," no matter which class or race or gender it celebrates, is stupid.

Permit me to explain.

In the video I (rightly) point out white males made, "well...everything." But the punchline is that deep down inside, I am not a single one of those white males.

I didn't invent electricity.
I didn't invent flight.
I didn't invent any medicine or vaccines.
And I didn't invent the auto-mobile.

Matter of fact, like most white males, I haven't invented or done much of jack with my life.

But if we are to follow the logic of any race's "Appreciation Month" that shouldn't matter. It shouldn't matter if we personally, individually didn't achieve anything. It shouldn't matter if we sat on our asses all day drinking beer and playing video games. It shouldn't matter if we're collecting a check, getting bailed out of our mortgage, or having illegitimate children. All that matters is the color of your skin, your gender, your sexual preference, and BOOM! You "magically" are entitled to just as much pride and respect as the individuals in your respective group who actually did do something of merit and worth.

So because I'm a white male, I'm some how responsible and deserve respect for the accomplishments of Albert Einstein, Neils Bohr and John Oppenheimer.

And if you're a black male you are somehow responsible and deserve respect for the achievements of Duke Ellington, President Obama, 50 Cent, and the Tuskegee Airmen.

And both of us could be drugged out methheads with 4 illegitimate children and criminal records.

Naturally there are several things wrong with this logic.

First, why is it only the good accomplishments? Shouldn't it go both ways? Germans should have a huge complex right about now because not only are they responsible for jets, rockets, the auto-mobile, nuclear power, and space travel, they're also responsible for the Holocaust, two world wars, and the Nazi human experimentation projects. Thus, just as it would be stupid for a German today to take pride in German achievements 50 years ago, it would be just as stupid to blame him for German atrocities 50 years ago.

Second, what if because of history, geography and things outside of your "group's" control, they didn't achieve much? I'm still waiting for the day the NAACP and various other black groups cite and celebrate STEM heroes in the black community instead of the litany of never-heard of "civil rights leaders" or "Maya Lou Angelo" subpar-"artists." Couldn't you cite Thomas Sowell? How about Dr. Benjamin Carson? Herman Cain? In part you don't see these genuine heroes of the black community cited is because of politics. In part it is the political nature of these "appreciation months" to paint the group as a victim to beget additional taxpayer monies. But (sadly) another reason is that due to slavery, history, geography, etc., many people in many groups did not have the opportunity, and thus no track record of great achievers to point to as mentors and models.

Ergo, what? Are some groups condemned to really lame heroes? Are the real heroes going to be hidden for political reasons? Are aspiring youth in different groups going to have lower bars and standards?

Only if you make them think their heroes MUST be of the same group they are.

And this gets to the truly disgusting, criminal, even outright evil aspect of these "appreciation months" - It destroys and murders the individual by replacing individual accomplishment and achievement with a trait you were born with.

It's important that all people of all groups understand this because there is a genuine evil out there that wishes to destroy the one thing you have in life - yourself. And if you don't understand this and realize the threat this poses to your life, you will waste your one precious life on this planet. Thus, it is vital you pay attention to the next couple paragraphs.

If you're like me or any other human your "self," your "consciousness," what you experience in life is not affected by your gender, your skin color, or your sexual preference. Like me you wake up and your brain says, "Hey, I'm here." It sees the world through the same way mine does, through our eyes, and the electrical chemical impulses shooting through your brain cells result in the same physical and mental experience every human has. This experience is universal across all humans of all types. It isn't until you take the time to purposely look at your arm do you notice a different in the color of your skin or bother to look down your pants do you notice a difference in sex.

However, those "traits" are things you were born with. You did nothing to earn a "vagina" just as I did nothing to earn "white skin." They define your physical self, but not your life, your accomplishments, your adventures, or your experiences that ultimately will go into and make up "you." Thus these physical traits have no real value and to place value on them is stupid. This is why I don't wake up every morning and look at my arms and say, "My goodness, look how white I am! I am so awesome!" Nor do I wake up, look down my pants and say, "Shucks howdy! Look at how male I am!!! I'm totally ahem 'blessed'." Nor do most of you because, well, you're sane.

But the same cannot be said of many other people. Professional race pimps, feminists, "Appreciation Month" professionals, the "Privilege Clergy," and people otherwise psychotically (or politically) obsessed with traits they were born with and never their accomplishments. And not to simplify it (though it is that simple), but these people can cumulatively be identified as the left.

Understand precisely how evil and despicable the left is when they demand more emphasis and value be put on traits than they do individual accomplishments. They tell you that you only have value because of characteristics you were born with. Something completely out of your control. And that conscious you, the person inside that skull of yours with dreams and hopes and desires, the one thing that is the true you and identifies you, is worthless.

It doesn't matter if you achieve anything great or unique.
It doesn't matter if you want to experience a different life.
It doesn't matter if you want to think differently and make this one shot at consciousness on this planet truly and uniquely yours.
And it doesn't matter if your brain has the capacity and ability for greatness.

No, you are black and condemned to a life of failure and racism.
No, you are female and condemned to a life of pay gaps and sexism.
No, you are gay and condemned to suffer at the hands of "straight-privileged" Christians.

The real issue is whether you're going to believe them or not. If you identify them for the political scum they are, dividing and pitting difference groups of Americans against one another for political gain, you will not waste this one precious and finite life you have and will achieve your own individual greatness. But if you fall for it and actually believe you're "oppressed" and "discriminated against, " so much so to the point you actually put more value on your skin color or sex than your accomplishments, then the left has won, they stole your life, and you as an individual have been murdered.

There's Always a Catch With Women

August 29, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Village of women looking for single men.

Just have to "follow their rules."

Funny…the article doesn't mention what those rules are.

How much you want to bet they stay a man-less village forever?

A Very Cappy Job Posting

August 29, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

A reader of mine has a job that is akin to the Bakken oil field - hard work, but great pay and something young men can probably do.

Consider pursuing it if you're looking for something different and want to lead a different life. Remember to tell him "The Captain Sent Ya!"

The World Needs More Assholes

August 29, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Remember kids, if you're having problems and can't find a solution, you have a choice;

Hire a nice person that will take ten times as long, and thus, ten times the expense to beat around the bush and MAYBE get to the truth

or

Hire and asshole who doesn't give a shit about your feelings and will just tell it like it is for a fraction of the time and cost.

Asshole Consulting
When you want to be lied to, hire an MBA.
When you want the truth, hire an asshole.

Why Defaulting on the US National Debt Would Be Moral

August 29, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

To simplify my banking career, my primary job was assessing the likelihood and probability that people we lent money out to would pay us back. Of course this was a pointless task because management and bankers were paid by commission so they really didn't care about the quality of the borrower, just that the loan got approved and they got their commission. This, naturally, led to me ramming heads with management (where I would almost always lose), but on a macro-economic scale also led up to the housing bubble and subsequent crash and Great Recession.

However, in my pursuit to find genuine, real silver linings to our current economic state, it didn't dawn on me until very recently that my experiences in banking also provided the 100% legitimate sincere unbiased logical

rationale to default entirely and completely on the US national debt.

Permit me to explain.

While most of us would put the blame of our financial woes on the idiots who couldn't do 3rd grade math and borrowed way more than they could afford, it has to be pointed out that there were idiots that lent to such morons in the first place. There will ALWAYS be math impaired entitled lazy cry-babies thinking they deserve a McMansion and a luxury car. It's whether there are saner heads in the banking industry that would lend to these idiots. This is called "due diligence" and was primarily my job back in my banking days. Thus, while we certainly (and rightly) place blame on the idiots who borrowed more than they could afford, we must also place blame on the banks who were so stupid to lend to these idiots in the first place as well.

Here were have no argument from any side of any political aisle. Everybody was against the bankster bailouts. Everybody hates the banking industry and those that populate it. And nearly everybody agrees that the banks should have taken their losses, never gotten bailed out, gone belly up and died never to be seen again.

So, riddle me this, riddle me that, why do we hate the bankers so much, but love our nation's creditors to the point we still concern ourselves with paying them back?

Understand they are one and the same AND they made the exact same mistakes.

Bankers lent money to people who couldn't afford to pay it back.
Lenders to the US government lent money to a government who couldn't afford to pay it back.

Bankers failed to do due diligence on the borrowers it was lending money to.
Lenders to the US government failed to do due diligence on the borrowers it was lending money to.

Bankers created a bubble that inevitably crushed the US economy
Lenders to the US government have DEFINITELY created a bubble that will DEFINITELY crush the US economy.

If that doesn't convince you, let's view lending to the US government much in the same terms as bankers view or analyze lending to regular banking clients.

First, who are these idiots lending to?

Well, the US government or the "American people." But I think a better personification of this would be our chief representative to the world, Barack Obama.

Obama has never worked a real job in his life. He has been an academia, a spoiled brat with his grandma paying for everything, who immediately went into politics and because of his youth, looks, and race won the lottery in the democrat primary to be president.

His political platform has been to bribe voters with money that he borrows, while seeding envy and hatred against the only assets in the US that have the capacity to pay us back (entrepreneurs, hard workers, corporations, private sector, etc.)

But again, it is not so much Barack Obama US creditors are lending to, but the people who put such an idiot in office. He is merely a proxy to the caliber and character of the country as a whole, and that country seemingly has no intention of paying anybody back, let alone concerning itself with government finances.

Second, what is the money being invested in?

Understand that banks don't just "lend out money for shits and giggles." The proceeds of the loan must be invested in some kind of asset or business that generates an income. AND NOT JUST AN INCOME, but MORE INCOME THAT WHAT IS BEING CHARGED IN INTEREST. However, this is entirely a moot point because the proceeds of the loans lent to the US government do not go into ANYTHING even remotely resembling an investment.

1. 70% of government spending is income transfers, which is nothing more than bribes to the parasitic class to vote for democrats.

2. What money does make it to "education" is wasted on indoctrinating youth into socialism and not providing them the skills and jobs they need to support themselves, let alone work up the excess cash to pay back the national debt. Worse still children are so removed from labor market realities they'll blow a trillion in federal tax dollars getting masters degrees in egos and hobbies before considered a trade.

3. Health care spending is, sadly, but factual, mostly spent on people who will never work again and are just going to die soon (so again, mathematically just throwing money in a hole).

4. Wars, no matter how called for, usually are not profitable for either side. Even if the US went into the mid east "for oil," they've done a spectacularly bad job of profiting off of it.

In short, I'd rather lend to a cancer-ridden, faux 55 year old "DudeBro" "businessman" whose Beemer is leased, his house mortgaged to the hilt, and who has a trophy wife with a horse hobby farm that wants to start a bar, because at least a BAR is somekind of an investment.

Welfare bums, single moms, dying old people, tanks, and socialist indoctrination camps are NOT investments.

Third, how are we getting paid back?

You're not! Any basic financial analysis of the government's finances already tells you it is loth to run a surplus. And, once again looking at the caliber of the people in charge of the government, they have no intention of voting in fiscally conservative and astute people into office. The American people are no different than the spoiled suburbanite children and trophy wives of the beleaguered and insolvent failing "businessman" who desperately comes to the bank, begging and pleasing to be lent more money so he can keep the facade up for another 6 months.

Since repayment is not an option, banks naturally then look at the repossession of the collateral.

Fourth, what do they have for collateral?

Creditors to the US government have "the full backing and faith of the US government" for its collateral.

Translated into English?

"Nothing."

There is no collateral.

And the reason there is no collateral is because if any creditor dared tried to repossess say a piece of land or some islands or some other form of US assets a la "South Beach Tow" the full might and strength of the US military would come crushing down on it.

In other words, simplifying it a lot, people who lent money to the US government were just as spectacularly stupid and naive and negligent in their lack of due diligence that they fully deserve the US government to default on it and never pay them back.

The Chinese and foreign creditors? You were just as dumb lending money to an Obama America as you were building all those ghost towns and ghost malls that populate your landscape.

Pension funds, mutual funds and 401k plans? You were just as dumb lending money to Americans as you were actually believing social security was a great way to retire.

And even you parents who thought "teaching your little children about interest" by having them invest in a Series EE bond, are going to instead teach them a much more advanced economic lesson on government bond defaults.

My simple economic take on this is why not make it easy? Simply acknowledge the emperor has no clothes, default on it now and be done with this once and for all. Creditors to the US government will get what their ignorance deserves, and we'll all be free of the national debt...that is until you idiot creditors lend this country of spoiled, entitled brats more money and start the whole cycle over again.

Enjoy the decline.

Academic Credentialism: The Pyramid Scheme Inside a Pipe Dream

August 30, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

A guest post from our Agent Alex.

Let me start off by saying that if you're a reader of Captain Capitalism, you don't need me to tell you that the whole academic gig is a scam. Heck, you might have even realized it before you even stumbled upon his works. It's really not that hard to pick up on. You go to class, and it seems like the professor isn't even there. Chances are good that he's an adjunct, commuting between three different campuses a day and earning less than minimum wage, ruing the day he decided to waste seven years studying Medieval English Poetry. Say he's not one of the growing army of "professors" making burger flipping wages. Still, the lucky bum getting a living wage looks over the classroom and sees fifty to a hundred people who really don't care about what he has to say, and distract him from his need to publish or perish, or conduct far more interesting graduate seminars.

The first college I ever attended was one of those crappy for-profit degree mills they advertise on daytime television in between reruns of "Little House on the Prairie" and Judge Judy. The kind of school that a person who sells his plasma for money or needs a pay day loan goes to, or in my case a naive kid just wanting to get out of the boondocks and into the city. The first day of class, the English professor goes up to the podium, introduces himself and says "I am a playwright. Unfortunately, no one gets paid for being a playwright in Arizona, so I am paid to stand here and teach you how to write papers on books you'd rather not read. If you want to get your degree in computer programming or electronic engineering, you will listen, you will write, and you will get graded on it. Maybe you might use this later in your career, but most likely not. However, it's the hoop you have to jump through. Let's try to make this whole thing less painful for the both of us by just accepting that." Of course my bad luck started when I found out I liked reading books and writing about it better than crunching C++ and Java, but the tale of how I became an academic ghostwriter, or as I prefer to call it; "a phantom of the Ivory Tower" is a story for another day.

The fact is, most professors don't give a shit. They're going through the motions just as much as the students are. So what does that mean for you? Well, unless you're a tradesman or one of the lucky guys who figured out it was going down the tubes before you had a family and all the financial obligations that it comes with, you're likely stuck in some sort of office job that requires certifications to climb one more rung up the side of the crab bucket. Certifications means taking classes. Taking classes means… you guessed it; jumping through hoops. Here's the thing. Jumping through those hoops takes time.

Say you're a systems administrator who wants the certs to add information system for business operations to your resume. Is it really worth your time to take those classes on business writing seriously, when it has nothing to do with what you're really aiming for? Take it from me. Even if you're good at writing papers, good enough to get paid to do it for others, it's still hellish to look out that window and realize you're trapped inside in front of a screen while the sun is shining outside. Life is finite. Go out, play with your kids, have a nice cigar, and go to the beach. Why waste that weekend agonizing over a paper that doesn't matter to you, doesn't matter to the person grading it, and is ultimately pointless to the world at large?

It's all pretty much a sign of the decline. Professors teaching things they don't care about to students who don't need it (and in the case of the aforementioned degree mill 2/3rds couldn't comprehend it), all so that... well... what, really? We're educated? Well, if you're smart, you do learn something, but it has nothing to do with the pointless lectures and time wasting papers. You learn that academic credentialism is nothing but a pyramid scheme inside a pipe dream. It's a demoralizing soul-crushing grind for everyone involved, in which money and time is extracted in return for meaningless pieces of paper, which, if you're smart enough to choose pieces of paper that serve as a marker of desirable skills, leads to future monetary returns. In better times, education used to be about enrichment of the mind and of the character.

It sure as hell ain't that anymore.

So why not let one of us phantoms do the heavy lifting for you along the way, hmmm?

Some Outstanding Empirical Research and Data

August 31, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

The day is near where a camera will be able to assess within an adequate amount of precision the "Sausagefest Factor"

Still, this data is precisely what ever guy needs to see when debating whether or not to make night clubs part of their strategy when pursuing women.

Today's Location Independent Office

September 2, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

is brought to you in part by;

Socialism! With taxes like that why work at all?

Debt Slaves! Why work hard when people with mortgages, car loans and spend-happy spouses have to work hard and pay taxes?

Corporate America! We'll lie about the job description and everything else!

HR! Degrading people with real skills by forcing them to interview with 24 year old ditzes since 1975. HR-when you really don't care to recruit the best!

Book Review of Roosh's Latest Book

September 3, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

The reason I don't mention the title is because that's my primary complaint about the book (and a lot of books/writing in general in the Manosphere/Alt Right/Red Pill world) - it's too crass. It's titled "Poosy Paradise."

If you read through it you can see how it couldn't be titled any other way. It's the latest chapter in Roosh's life as he allows you to vicariously live through his as he travels Easter Europe chronicling his exploits and adventures in getting laid. However, what originally started out 5 years ago as a random adventure to ensure his life was going to be different (starting with a trip to South America), Roosh's experiences are rapidly coalescing into an actual professor/career - that of an international playboy. This evolution and honing of his life/career naturally leads him to the more esoteric and philosophical aspect of the book - precisely what do you do after you create your own job getting paid to travel the world and seduce women?

This is where I think Roosh's future lies and where I wish he put more emphasis on in the book. Like the Voyager spacecrafts, he is pushing the limits and boundaries literally going where no one has gone before. And I say this not out of worship or ass kissing, but because it's true and I predict others will be following his lead. Understand, he and MANY OTHER modern day men who dared to think out side the box, insist on better and different for their lives, are not only becoming very successful and leading lives of luxury and interest, but at too young an age (Roosh is 33) are being forced to ask questions rich men retiring in their 60's are asking. And this fact shows in Roosh's logic following his behaviors and actions, leading him not to conclusions, but questions that most likely cannot be answered.

Sadly, as mentioned before, this is a small minority of the book, essentially the last chapter. The rest is what you've all come to know and love Roosh for. Detailed and entertaining accounts of his daily and nightly expeditions to find girls and get laid. I personally enjoyed the tactical and strategic discussions as he would explain why he did something (sit next to a plant) and how he would interpret a text. But then this high-level discussion would quickly deteriorate when he'd go into unnecessary, almost Harlequin Romance Novel level of grotesque detail about the sex he was actually enjoying.

Perhaps that is why his books do so well and he has the followership he does. It is just my personal opinion his future does not lay in writing male-harlequin fantasy porn, but philosophy and pushing the limits of human existence.

Yet Another Reason the Stock Market Is Overvalued

September 4, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

In my online stock valuation class I teach, The Analysis and Valuation of Stocks[image], I have my students grab the annual report of a company of their choosing and use it for analytical purposes in the class. Over the now 12 years I've offered this class, I've seen trends in the different companies they've chosen.

Garmin, remember them?
Palm? Those were fun times!
Blackberry? Ah, the early 00's.

However, of even more interest was the financial trends that were spotted when we'd get into the nitty gritty of it. Most recently two trends that are related

1. "Cash Flow from Operations" continually exceeding "Cash Flow from Investing"

and

2. A almost nearly always guaranteed repurchase of shares.

Before you fall asleep let me explain these things to you and why they are very relevant to everybody today.

First, "Cash Flow from Operations" (CFO) and "Cash Flow from Investing" (CFI) are two "boring" financial statistics that all companies have. Most people focus on "net profit" or the bottom line, but savvier analysts know to look at CFO and CFI.

The reason is (without going into a long and boring detailed explaination of non-cash accounting) CFO is the amount of actual cash the company is generating while CFI is the amount the company spends on maintaining and expanding it's operations. Ergo the "cash from OPERATIONS" goes to pay for the "cash expended on INVESTING."

These two numbers I believe tell you more about a company than any other financial numbers. First, it tells you if the company is profitable and not just on paper, but actual cash (CFO). Second it tells you if the company is expanding or contracting (CFI should be a negative number showing the company IS expanding and investing). And third, it tells you if it can finance its expansions and operations with the money it generates internally. Ergo, if CFO generated exceeds the amount spent on CFI this is a GREAT thing because the company neither has to borrow money or issue new shares to expand. It is SO PROFITABLE it can do it in house.

There is a problem, however.

As I noticed most of my student's companies were generating a lot more CFO than they were expending on CFI. Yes, profits have recovered from the depths of the Great Recession, but this economy wasn't booming. And most of the profits I knew came from cost cutting, not investing in new plants and equipment, expanding operations, and thus employment. Ergo, what the financial statements of these companies were telling me was the reason for such excess CFO over CFI was not because of healthy CFO, but rather low expenditures on investments and CFI. This is why corporations can have these "record profits," but employment growth and private investment is not forth coming.

Second, now enter in stock repurchases.

Say you're a CEO of a corporation that is generating a lot of cash flow, but not expanding or investing a lot. Well, you're left with the enviable position of having a lot of extra cash on hand. But if you're not going to invest that cash, you have to do something with it. So what do you do?

Stock repurchases.

Repurchasing a company's stock is NOT investing and does NOT show up in the CFI. Additionally a company repurchasing its shares does NOT create any ACTUAL investment. No factories are built, no facilities constructed, no people employed.

It does however boost the price of your stock because it "undilutes" the amount of shares outstanding. This not only boosts the stock price and makes your shareholders (who indirectly vote you into your executive position) happy, but also makes your stock options much more valuable.

Ergo, the trend you see of companies with excess CFO who like to repurchase their shares.

It is here I would like to show you the S&P 500's "statement of cash flows," but unfortunately you have to pay for such research. Instead I'll merely pull some key, large companies we're all familiar with and highlight this phenomenon on their cash flow statements.

CONSOLIDATED STATEMENTS OF CASH FLOWS
(In millions)

	Years ended
	September 28, 2013	September 29, 2012	September 24, 2011
Cash and cash equivalents, beginning of the year	$ 10,746	$ 9,815	$ 11,261
Operating activities:
Net income	37,037	41,733	25,922
Adjustments to reconcile net income to cash generated by operating activities:
Depreciation and amortization	6,757	3,277	1,814
Share-based compensation expense	2,255	1,740	1,168
Deferred income tax expense	1,141	4,405	2,868
Changes in operating assets and liabilities:
Accounts receivable, net	(2,172)	(5,551)	143
Inventories	(973)	(15)	275
Vendor non-trade receivables	223	(1,414)	(1,934)
Other current and non-current assets	1,880	(5,162)	(1,391)
Accounts payable	2,340	4,467	2,515
Deferred revenue	1,459	2,824	1,654
Other current and non-current liabilities	4,521	2,552	4,495
Cash generated by operating activities	53,666	50,856	37,529
Investing activities:
Purchases of marketable securities	(148,489)	(151,232)	(102,317)
Proceeds from maturities of marketable securities	20,317	13,103	20,427
Proceeds from sales of marketable securities	104,130	99,770	49,416
Payments made in connection with business acquisitions, net	(496)	(350)	(244)
Payments for acquisition of property, plant and equipment	(8,165)	(8,295)	(4,260)
Payments for acquisition of intangible assets	(911)	(1,107)	(3,192)
Other	(160)	(48)	(259)
Cash used in investing activities	(33,774)	(48,227)	(40,410)
Financing activities:
Proceeds from issuance of common stock	530	665	831
Excess tax benefits from equity awards	701	1,351	1,133
Taxes paid related to net share settlement of equity awards	(1,082)	(1,226)	(520)
Dividends and dividend equivalent rights paid	(10,564)	(2,488)	0
Repurchase of common stock	(22,860)	0	0
Proceeds from issuance of long-term debt, net	16,896	0	0
Cash generated by/used in financing activities	(16,379)	(1,698)	1,444
Increase/(decrease) in cash and cash equivalents	3,513	931	(1,446)
Cash and cash equivalents, end of the year	$ 14,259	$ 10,746	$ 9,815

COLGATE-PALMOLIVE COMPANY

Consolidated Statements of Cash Flows

For the years ended December 31,

(Dollars in Millions)

	2014	2013	2012
Operating Activities
Net income including noncontrolling interests	$ [illegible]	$ [illegible]	$ [illegible]
Adjustments to reconcile net income including noncontrolling interests to net cash provided by operations:
Depreciation and amortization	439	422	421
Restructuring and termination benefits, net of cash	182	35	103
Venezuela devaluation charge	172	—	—
Gain before tax on sale of non-core product lines	—	—	(207)
Voluntary benefit plan contributions	(161)	(131)	(170)
Stock-based compensation expense	128	120	122
Deferred income taxes	71	42	38
Cash effect of changes in:
Receivables	(97)	[illegible]	(143)
Inventories	(97)	(71)	(143)
Accounts payable and accrued liabilities	74	[illegible]	109
Other accounts receivable and liabilities	14	[illegible]	[illegible]
Net cash provided by operations	[illegible]	[illegible]	[illegible]
Investing Activities
Capital expenditures	(978)	(936)	(917)
Sales of property, plant and equipment and product lines	16	[illegible]	304
Purchases of marketable securities and other investments	(469)	(373)	(519)
Proceeds from sale of marketable securities and other investments	305	171	174
Payments for acquisitions, net of cash acquired	(6)	(39)	(496)
Other	6	[illegible]	(43)
Net cash used in investing activities	(898)	(956)	(1,514)
Financing Activities
Principal payments on debt	(7,464)	(1,811)	(1,175)
Proceeds from issuance of debt	7,976	1,437	1,814
Dividends paid	(1,882)	(1,775)	(1,704)
Purchases of treasury shares	(1,671)	(1,514)	(1,806)
Proceeds from exercises of stock options and transaction fees paid	459	476	414

[illegible]	[illegible]	[illegible]
[illegible]	[illegible]	[illegible]
[illegible]	[illegible]	[illegible]
[illegible]	[illegible]	[illegible]
[illegible]	[illegible]	[illegible]
[illegible]	[illegible]	[illegible]
[illegible]	[illegible]	[illegible]
[illegible]	[illegible]	[illegible]
[illegible]	[illegible]	[illegible]
[illegible]	[illegible]	[illegible]
[illegible]	[illegible]	[illegible]
[illegible]	[illegible]	[illegible]
[illegible]	[illegible]	[illegible]
[illegible]	[illegible]	[illegible]
[illegible]	[illegible]	[illegible]
[illegible]	[illegible]	[illegible]
[illegible]	[illegible]	[illegible]
[illegible]	[illegible]	[illegible]
[illegible]	[illegible]	[illegible]
[illegible]	[illegible]	[illegible]
[illegible]	[illegible]	[illegible]
[illegible]	[illegible]	[illegible]
[illegible]	[illegible]	[illegible]
[illegible]	[illegible]	[illegible]

Though your eyes may be glazing over, if you look at the highlighted (red) sections you'll see these companies (Colgate, Exxon, and Apple) making tons of money (CFO), but not fully reinvesting it (CFI). The remaining cash is (primarily) used to repurchase shares (and sometimes pay dividends) or buy other stock's shares (highlighted in blue).

These corporate actions not only speak volumes as to what the "holy trinity" of corporations, investors and employers (all 3 in 1) think about investing in the US, but also have serious ramifications for US stock valuations.

First, they're saying, "Are you nuts? Invest here? Sorry, we're going to spend what we have to to ensure our current investments don't rot, make what meager investments we see that are truly profitable, but sorry, economic growth and the investment climate is just not worth it. We're just going to repurchase shares because THAT'S OUR BEST USE OF OUR MONEY."

Second, in doing so they further inflation a stock market bubble that is already inflated with trillions of 401k, IRA, 403b, and other pension/retirement fund money. This has driven the S&P 500 well beyond it's historical PE of 15 to a now dizzying 26 implying a 73% overvaluation that only idiot Americans would cheer for and IRA Zombies invest in.

Source: Robert Shiller

Ultimately, though, there is a hidden lesson corporations and investors are indirectly telling the American public (and western civilization citizens in general). And that lesson is one of:

"Fuck you."

I don't know how long it will take "corporation hating" Americans to realize that those same corporations who they love to loathe and blame their ~~laziness and lack of work ethic~~ problems on are also the primary source of:

1. Jobs
2. Careers
3. Economic innovation and growth

and

4. Retirement wealth in this country. And the fact they have made it so inhospitable financially, politically and socially to be a corporation here that corporations would rather

1. Spend money repurchasing their shares
2. Spend money buying other companies' shares
3. Open factories overseas
4. Bribe/lobby politicians

5. Pull a Medtronic or Burger King than hire and invest in the US should be a wake up call to all the Obama-supporting college graduates working as barristas for $9/hour. i.e.- even the dumbest of leftists should have the mental capacity to understand these basic lessons of economics and human incentive.

Sadly, however, western minds have been so damaged and polluted with self-pitying victimization and laziness they'd rather sit and mope, feeling sorry for themselves, blaming those "white-male-ly" corporations, and thusly condemning themselves to a life of poverty and mediocrity, than spend the energy it would take to get a basic education in accounting and economics. But, hey, at least they "weren't part of the system man!" and stuck it to those "corporations, man!"

Regardless, for all those Americans who hate corporations and are too busy to be bothered with cash flow statement accounting, enjoy listening to "Rage Against the Machine" when you're 50 and maybe, MAYBE, making that last payment on your student loans.

Another Leftist Lie About the 1950's

September 5, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

As you all know the 1950's by every technology and inflation adjusted measure was not only better for everybody, but was hands down the pinnacle of US achievement and capitalism.

Because of this the left does its best to rewrite history, besmirch it, criminalize it, villainize it, and (as if it's not the most tiresome and broken record in their playbook) is remind us just how sexist and racist it was. The 1940's and 1950's just simply cannot exist accurately in the history books for it is everything that the left hates and the most compelling and damning empirical data that proves socialism wrong.

Because of this I like to bring up the 50's occasionally, citing data and statistics and presenting logical, unemotional arguments as to why it was indeed the best decade in US history. And today's leftist argument we're going to debunk is;

"Oh yeah!?? Well...umm....you know what...the WORLD WAS DESTROYED after WWII and the US was the ONLY country left to build stuff for them. That's the only reason the 50's had such great economic growth. It wasn't capitalism! It was because the world was our bitch! So..umm...yeah, so there!"

So young lieutenants, economists, Cappy Cappites, and book babes, let us do what the left refuses to and look at the actual data.

To see whether or not the true cause of the booming economic growth in the 50's was due to the rest of the world being destroyed, I decided to look at exports as a percentage of GDP. To be honest, I truthfully thought there was "some" credibility to the left's claim, and so I was more than willing to adjust US economic growth to account for exports. However, after pulling the data, I realized I didn't have to bother:

Exports as a percentage of GDP have actually GONE UP SINCE WWII.

Yes, during 1947 exports were at a relative high, but after a 2 decade decline and stagnation, exports have consistently been going up since the 1970's. Keep in mind a lot of this has to do with services (which were not as prominent in international trade as today), but the argument that the whole world was "just destroyed" and was helplessly dependent upon US exports which explained the booming economic growth we enjoyed in the 50's is just a lie. And if we consider exports are nearly TWICE the percent they were back in the 50's, it's actually a damning testimony against the creeping socialism we've had since the 1960's (as well as American spending habits that we IMPORT even MORE resulting in a trade deficit).

The primary lesson to take from this though, ladies and gentlemen, is that you can almost always assume the left has never bothered to look up the "facts" they spew. You, sadly, just have to assume whatever they say is either intentionally or unknowningly false and be willing to spend the 5 minutes to look up the actual data.

A Serious Request for International Readers

September 5, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Greetings All,

After a summer of hiking, road tripping, Vegas....Vegas....and Vegas once again, it's time to get back to work (only because everybody else is) and get serious.

Posts, as you may have noticed, have taken on a more serious and meaty tone, projects have been achieved, and things have been tidied up. Since this "house cleaning" is done, now we can move on to "strategic planning" which I promised myself this year would be expanding or at least making inroads into different countries.

I know the majority of my readership is from the US and Canada, but I also know we have a fair number of lieutenants in Eastern Europe, the MidEast, Asia, Russia. Heck, we even have two schmoes running around Morocco.

My simple request is this.

If you are a reader of Cappy Cap and know of sites in your home country that are similar or conducive to our various "beliefs" or "platforms" here, I would very much appreciate it if you would post their links in the comment section below.

DO NOT just send me "My friend Bill's" page. I want significant players in your respective countries as I don't think a lot of effort has been made to puropsely seek out and network different groups in different countries.

I know this sounds "hokey pokey" and "touchy feely," but it is quite strategic and purposeful and any help would be greatly appreciated (especially from you Aussies and Kiwis down south who think you're special because you're in the southern hemisphere)

Anyway, you recommendations and suggestions are greatly appreciated,

Sincerely,

Cappy

New Lieutenant - Bearded Backyarder

September 6, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

You will visit. You will read. You will enjoy.

Compliance is mandatory. Conformance is not optional.

You will obey.

College Is Not a Means Unto Itself

September 6, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

A realization I had about a month ago was that children, most of their parents, and a scarily high percentage of the rest of society view college not as a tool or a way to improve one's career, but rather a means unto itself. That college itself is the goal and whether anything comes after that is irrelevant.

If this isn't bad enough, I fear it's gotten much worse. For while there's no limit to the "you can't put a price on education" type rationalization coming from liberal arts majors, any time I've tried to talk reason, sense, logic, foresight and math into young kids today (and many of their parents) about the risks of majoring in a worthless subject the response is typically vehement if not violent.

This leads me to believe that media, the education system, government, and (yes) parents have convinced children college is not only meritorious unto itself, but an entitlement, a life-purpose, a life-dream and a birthright. Every child/student/young person DESERVES an college education and that education is the most important thing in their lives.

And that's not hyperbole or rhetoric. It's true.

Consider your own personal experience when you were about to attend college. 20 years ago in my case I was led to believe that college was the solution to all of my problems. That when I got to this magical world called "college:"

Everybody would be more mature
Girls would throw themselves at me
I'd go to great parties and make great friends
My degree would guarantee me a job
My then 18 year streak of poverty and lower-middle income existence would finally be over

No doubt your expectations of college were equally bullshitty.

But also go back to when you were 17 and ask yourself what else did you have to look forward to in life? What else was there in life? You were just as ecstatic to go to college as your entire educational life up until that point was to make it to the Holy Land of College.

Now imagine today's kids, with thrice the amount of ass-kissing, "you can do anything-ism," "you're all winners" and the elimination of trophies, GPA's, valedictorians, and any other form of competition and you can see how college is all they have in life. And anytime anybody dares to critique their dreams or deliver a dose of reality, their rabid reaction belies their insane obsession with college.

Sadly, no matter how psychotically and irrationally wedded to college they are, does not mean we don't at least owe it to society to point out the truth. And scream and pout and stammer their little feet all they might, somebody has got to stand up and point out the obvious:

College is NOT a means unto itself
College is NOT meritorious unto itself
You CAN put a price on education
And that price is when your investment in time and money does not result in more of the same in return

College is a TOOL to advance your career first and foremost. And the second you treat it as anything other, especially a luxury good or an entitlement, you only serve to destroy the 70% of your life you have yet to live post-college.

Naturally I speak to the choir here on this blog. I don't think anybody here is going to disagree that with tuition running at $70,000 you should demand a fiscal return on your investment. But the sad truth is this message will fall on deaf ears because those who so desperately need this lesson are not sane. They are fanatics. They are junkies. They are as zealous as ISIS is to Islam as they are to college. And nothing will get the way of achieving their dream.

To that end there is not much left to do than what we're already doing. Mocking people who major in the puppetry. Laughing at people who are $120,000 in debt with women's studies degrees. Telling the MA in Music that yes, we would indeed very much like fries with that. And in short, living better lives than them. But I hope that in your own realm, within your own sphere of influence, that there are some youth or some friends or some family members who are at least receptive to reality, sanity, and math. That they haven't been fully duped and brainwashed into thinking their lives are so worthless a "college degree" is the best thing they can achieve. That the college degree is tool to help them achieve greatness, and often and optional tool at that. And if you can get them not to destroy their futures like the College ISIS Fanatics then you've done a world of good in genuinely saving some lives.

How American Women Could Pay Off the National Debt in 5 Years

September 7, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

I am happy to announce I have found a simple, easy and painless solution to our national debt problem. Easily the largest economic problem we face is officially over. Everybody can relax, the US and by extension the world economy will be saved and, frankly, we can look forward to very bright economic futures across the globe. And it will be women who lead the way into this glorious future no less!

I happened upon this solution walking through the mall and realized that nearly all of the stores are for women. I fused this observation with the fact women spend the majority of their money on things that are really

truly

just not needed.

So instead of blowing their money on Jimmy Choo shoes, hand bags, flirtinis and the cornucopia of other worthless trinkets they like to stockpile in their unnecessarily large apartments, we force them instead to cut checks to Uncle Sam that would immediately go to debt reduction.

Looking at consumer spending data from the BEA I estimate that women waste around $3.2 trillion annually (estimates will of course vary). Dividing the current $17 trillion in debt by this means we could have the national debt paid off in a mere five years. But better yet, it's without any genuine suffering or real decrease in standards of living.

Naturally there will be some resistance to this brilliant economic plan. However, since women disproportionately vote for democrats and to "help others," I'm sure they'll find it within their charitable nature to "do the right thing" and help save America's future for the children.

What's funny is this REALLY would work. And it really would be painless. Sadly, that frivolous spending is just too addicting and women place more value on competing against other women than the country's finances.

Oh well, Enjoy the decline!

The True Risk of Rape Culture

September 8, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

As I've said before, it pays to step back, clear your vision, and look at something with fresh eyes And one such instance that required me to do this happened recently. Namely, how my view of rape has changed.

I personally have not gotten all that much into the "rape culture" thing because there's enough people covering it and it's also too "dramaticy" for me. The feminists lie about the "epidemic" of rape on campus, saner heads point out to the obvious risks men face with false rape claims, add to that I'm viscerally repulsed by rape so I have a natural predisposition to avoid the topic. However, with the "Yes Means Yes" legislation being pushed through California's legislature, I was more or less compelled to address it or at least look into it because of the obvious increase in false rape claims and its potentially disastrous consequences for men.

I made a link, mentioned it on a podcast I believe, addressed the obvious slippery slope such legislation presented, etc., etc,. But it wasn't until I read this article did I realize how my view of rape had changed. And not for the better.

My reaction to the article was what you'd expect of my typically dour and cynical nature:

"Oh yeah, right, you were 'raped'."
"Oh wow, what are the chances she's doing that just for her thesis."
"Uh huh, more attention whoring."
"Worthless degree."
"Oh! There it is! The 1 in 4 lie!"

But that's just it. Think about it.

20 years ago had I heard about a girl being raped I would have been appalled and angry. I would have been concerned if she was alright. I'd be demanding the guy be tracked down and castrated. Heck, I'd probably go and hunt him down myself.

But today my natural, default reaction is...

disbelief and distrust.

And this is the VERY important point I'm trying to make. Because feminists in their desire to create a false "rape epidemic," to make every man on campus a potential threat and every woman a victim, to get to the point they are intervening in innocent private sexual lives to this extent has so alienated most men (and saner women) that they are suffering from "false rape claim burnout." So much so people no longer focus on rape, but whether they're LYING about being raped.

The consequences are typical of feminism and leftism - they harm the people they claim they're trying to help, specifically in this case, GENUINE rape victims. The TRUE victims of rape can no longer rely on immediate support from the community and sane minds. Thanks to leftists, feminists and their gender politics, real victims of rape are immediately greeted with cynicism and disbelief. In some circles the trust has been so eroded people just assume every rape claim is false.

Sadly, this is where many of us need to step back, rub our eyes and look at things clearly. Just because feminists and their "rape culture" have tainted the reputation of self-proclaimed victims of rape, you need to remember that rape does happen, it is a horrifying experience, and there are genuine victims that do need help and support. The trick is to reserve judgement until the facts are in.

In the meantime men, get that "after sex text" and avoid university campuses that are insane enough to instill a "Yes means yes" policy.

Why Tesla Never Married

September 9, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Amazing. Jaw dropping prescience. Over 100 years ago and Nikola Tesla was more or less accurately predicting what is happening today.

Feminism and Feminists Are Doomed to Failure

September 9, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

My latest piece at ROK.

Monday Linkage

September 10, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

No, Bill, you don't get it. I don't like any religion.

The left is evil while the republicans are stupid.

Uncle Bernoo's poker story.

Aurini has a good podcast up about socialists, crusaders and the video game industry.

Corporations will start to ask, "where have all the good men gone?"

The Tables Have Turned

September 10, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Your dose of Wednesday humor:

Let's Affect a Poll

September 10, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

MSNBC's poll about gun rights goes horribly wrong!

How Do You Make a Miley Ray Cyrus Song Sound Good?

September 10, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Simple, you don't have her sing or be around:

The sound is unreal.

Waaaaa!!! Why Can't I Find a Maaaaan?????

September 10, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

There’s no door-holding, no hand-holding and definitely no free drinks. There’s no taking off hats or courting through invitations. There are no smooth moves, no jackets to dinner. There are no flowers, no tables by candlelight. But, most importantly, there are no dates.

Ummm...that's because there's no women left. But by all means, misdiagnose the problem.

In the meantime gentlemen, carry on. Carry on gentlemen.

Best Rant Against Sports Addicts Evah

September 11, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

You all know my personal disgust not with professional sports, but rather the people who base their vicarious and meaningless lives on them. I've had a good rant or two in my life about it, but nothing like this most recent podcast from Bill Burr. Starts at the 14 minute mark and lasts a good 20 minutes.

Asset Prices Outstripping Economic Growth

September 11, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Two of my favorite charts (and I'm sure they're yours) is the S&P 500 PE ratio and dividend yield. It is the basic comparison of what you're paying for a stock relative to what it pays you.

But every once in a while I like to go really macro and compare the country's economic growth to its asset prices. In theory (bar international investments and trade) asset prices should not be increasing faster than economic growth in that all profits must come from economic growth. Therefore, both asset prices and economic growth should grow at the same rate, otherwise we know there's either a bubble or a (well...it's been so long...what was it again we call stock markets that are cheap....um....oh! That's right!) steal.

So I took it upon my beleaguered economist ass to go and pull the data comparing the annual returns of the S&P 500 and subtracting out from it nominal economic growth which should in theory always be 0.

Heh, yeah right.

Naturally there's going to be oscillations and bubbles and troughs in any economy. But given what we know about the PE ratio now being 70% higher than it should be, I just wanted another data set to view this from a different angle. And this one didn't disappoint.

We see, during the economic crash, stock prices crashing even more sending the net difference between asset prices and economic growth into negative territory. This meant asset prices were growing slower (crashing faster, actually) than economic growth was. However, this only lasted one year (2008) and in 2009 where the economy contracted on a yearly basis by 2.9% the stock market punished this performance by awarding this slowing economy with a 25% increase in valuation.

This is like your kid coming home with straight F's and you increase their allowance by a a full fourth.

Since then the disconnect between economic growth and asset prices has continued as asset prices have averaged annual gains of 15% while the economy has managed just under 3%.

I'm going to say it again for the cheap seats and hope to god some future historian looks this up and sees it, but this is just another bit of proof that Americans are more interested in baloney asset bubbles than they are actual economic growth. It is the modern day epitome of American psychology where we want all of the rewards, but without having to expend any of the work.

Does it matter that stock prices are being driven by retirement dollars and not profits?
Does it matter that equities are being driven by QE and low interest rate monetary policies which prompt corporate buy backs?
Does it matter economic potential in this country is so low corporations would rather buy back shares than invest and create jobs?

No, because prices are up and that's our super happy fun juice!

I know the federal reserve is powerful and that the world economy is already structured around a US dollar reserve currency. But neither are more powerful than the forces of math and reality. I just hope to see that reality manifested before I die. In the meantime, Enjoy that Decline!

If I Were to Do It Again, I'd Become a Leftist Politician

September 11, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

aka "It Doesn't Pay to be Moral" aka "Be Immoral, But Not Illegal"

Thursday Constitutionals

September 12, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

If you want to play a joke on some friends of mine (The Black Brigade) "like" this page. It's an inside joke and if you listen to their podcast you'll laugh your ass off. Otherwise, if you just want to participate in a little prank "like" the page, but DON'T tell them I sent you.

Negative interest rates is like a hot chick coming up to you and asking you to go home and sleep with her. It isn't natural and you know there's something wrong.

Diversity! Imported from a third world country near you!

Oh come on Ed!!! Play some video games!!!!

Grandma hasn't paid off her student loans yet for her Masters in Social Work.

Mississippi Mayhem

September 12, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Heading to La Crosse Wisconsin for "Mississippi Mayhem.". Posts will be sparse over the weekend, though i might get a podcast in.

Mississippi Mayhem

September 14, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Tee Hee, Math is Tough!

September 15, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Why, oh why is there a wage gap?

The Captain Is Once Again Victorious

September 15, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Good news everyone! I entered the dance competition at Mississippi Mayhem with my dance partner and took first place.

Of course, we were the only people who signed up...
And they had to pull teeth to get two elderly couples to compete as well...
And the trophy was a hodgepodge of welded 1940's auto parts with a shoe...

But hey! Still placed first!

Anyway, some additional pictures.

New Book Babe

September 16, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

It is once again that time where we have to leave economic charts and graphs and instead look at pretty girls posing with my books.

I know, I know. I don't like it any more than you do, but we're going to "have to" look at this Chicagoan beauty. I promise, we'll get back to the charts and graphs shortly, but in the meantime this HAS TO get done.

Also, for any of you ladies out there that want to become a Book Babe it's very simple. Contact me and I'll send you free books. Your pictures help brighten the days a thousands of men across the world who appreciate old school, traditional beauty.

Cappy Comes to Europe

September 17, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Howdy All,

Going to be heading to Europe for the first time for two weeks. I have no major plans except to spend most of it doing nothing and relaxing primarily in Italy. However, I'll be in Switzerland as well and maybe roadtripping it to France even.

Anyway, I know a lot of you are in Eastern Europe and we even have two schmoes running around Morocco, but if you're around and in the area, let the ole Captain know.

Won't be landing until the 24th. Will obviously post pictures whilst traveling around Europe.

Cappy

Why the Death of Small Town America is a Good Thing

September 17, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

My travels and adventures largely circle around mountain climbing and hiking. This means I must traverse the great expanses of the great plains, inching my way to the Rockies and the thousands of miles of geologic beauty that lay to the west. Aside from Denver and Salt Lake City, there are very few large metropolitan areas so the majority of time you're either crashing at a hotel or getting gas it's in a small "traditional" American town.

Unconsciously, this meant I was not just pursuing the latest greatest hike, but conducting a near-10 year study on small town America and its corresponding economy. At first my observations were simple ones, primarily noting, even ruing, the demise of these small towns. You typically have a "main street" where old buildings from the 1880's to 1920's have the date they were built etched into the headstone. Their architecture is beautiful, usually brick or stone and it doesn't take much imagination to see what a bustling town it was over a century ago. But by my last back-of-napkin estimation nearly 70% of these gorgeous buildings are empty or up for rent. And the towns I revisit because they're on common throughways I use, you can usually bet at least 20% of the buildings that were occupied have switched tenants. It's a sad sight to see, a quaint little town that was once a genuine, tight-knit bustling community, now approaching ghost town status, but in the demise of these small towns there is hope as it is a testament to genuine progress in America, as well as a lesson for our economic future.

The first thing to realize about small towns is that they were largely built based on an agricultural economy. There were enough farmers and ranchers in a certain area that there was enough economic demand for a town that provided wares, equipment, machinery, banking, etc. (notice how a lot of small towns, though decimated, still have a John Deere dealer?). However, as time went on and technology advanced farming techniques become multiples more efficient, not only increasing yields, but requiring a lot less labor.

Overall this is a good thing for the country. Food becomes cheaper, the bane of hunger and starvation that plagued human kind since 200,000 BC is defeated, and farmers don't have to toil as much as they used to in the mule and ox days. However, the town itself suffered. With farmer Joe able to do thrice the work with 1/10th the labor, demand for labor fell and with it the population of these small towns. Couple that with transportation technology and the managerial efficiency of large retail stores (Wal-Mart, Costco, etc.), not only was your population decreasing, but the local hardware store, grocery and butcher were no longer needed. Thus why those beautiful buildings sit empty in small town America, and anybody born there usually leaves for the city.

While we may lament this natural horse-replaced-by-car death of small town America, there was another thing I noticed about these small towns. The businesses that WERE in business and replacing the grocer, the butcher, the mechanic, etc., were a testament to how these advances in technology, farming methods, and other general improvements in economic efficiency were making the lives of everybody easier. People were no longer running hard businesses like "butchering animals" or "repairing tractors," but "fun" businesses like opening a coffee shop, an art store, or (my favorite) the small town dive bar.

I didn't fully connect the dots until I started taking pictures of the various small town bars I was visiting as kind of a hobby. But the more time I had on the road to sit and think it through, the more I realized that technological advances were making it so people in these towns today could live more leisurely and enjoyable lives than their ancestors did 100 years ago. And that the empty brick buildings on main street that were being replaced with antique stores, bars, and restaurants was a good thing and not a bad thing.

There is just one "thing," however. And that is what this trend in small town America portends for the rest of the country. And most Americans are not going to like it as it directly addresses and destroys what they hold most dear - their egos.

Realize that what is ultimately driving this change in small towns is the replacement of labor with machines. I've addressed this before in a post about the Roboticized Economy, where more and more humans are rendered obsolete as they are essentially replaced by robots. On the face of it this seems like a great thing. Robots doing all the work, humans just kicking back doing nothing. It's so utopian it has inexperienced, leftist academian morons orgasming over their latest half-baked idea of a "minimum guaranteed income." But there's a problem with this new economy. While it may feed the human stomach, it won't feed the human ego. And people, especially Americans, value their egos above all else.

Realize this new REAL WORLD economy and what the latest generation has been brought up to believe about itself are like two runaway trains heading towards a horrific collision. Because of technology the new economy does not need unskilled, untalented human labor. It needs technicians, engineers, programmers, doctors and all related professions that go into supporting the increasingly-roboticized economy. However, kids today are increasingly brought up to believe the world bends to their wills and desires. That they can "follow their heart and the money will follow." So they major in the most worthless and un-intellectually-challenging subjects. And upon graduation when their skills (or lack thereof) do not match up with what is in demand in this new economy, they sit their, their dreams destroyed, unemployed and with a crippling level of debt. They may have been a runaway freight train, but the real world economy was a much strong, faster, and powerful one.

Naturally, this does not sit well with a generation brought up to be the most spoiled and entitled of them all. They protest, they demand student loan forgiveness, they demand other people's money, anything and everything, whatever it takes, they demand their pound of flesh because they've been brought up to believe they're entitled.

But understand the real reason for their anger.

While the real world economy demands doctors, engineers, specialists, programmers, etc., to keep this roboticized economy going, and all these people work hard, attend school, and study rigorous subjects to make this technological miracle reality (AND make it so NONE of the talentless people go starving or without shelter) this new economy still has SOME demand for unskilled labor. However, since technology has advanced so much (and will continue to do so) the jobs that remain for the unskilled/overeducated class are deemed "insulting."

Barristas
Food service
Nanny/baby sitting
Etc.

And given the overeducated mindset of today's latest labor market entrants it's like slapping them in the face. They have no real skills. They have no real achievements. The only thing they "have" is their education. And in refusing to hire them for jobs they think they're entitled to, but rather give them the only jobs they're qualified for, you insulted the only thing they have in their lives - their worthless educations.

This is why I don't mind seeing the local coffee store, art store, antique store or dive bar taking over beautiful small town America. Those people actually get it. They don't know how to program a tractor to self-reap a 100 acre field. They don't know how to repair a diesel engine on a John Deere. And they don't know how to route a computer network for the local feed lot. But they can pour a decent beer, cook a quality stew, and provide decent customer service.

The question is whether the vast majority Americans today have the intellectual temerity and honesty to realize and accept the same thing. That their "Masters in English" is not of any value, that they have no sought after skill, and that their future is not one of greatness or participation in the cutting edge of economic development, but rather one of customer or "vanity" services servicing other humans. And if they don't like that, then they need to let go of the ego, work harder and go into fields where they will be in demand.

Of course that would require a genuine work effort, a passion for rigor, and...dare I say it...math.

But wait, let me guess. "You're just not good at math?"

I'll have fries with that.

Thursday Day Happy Hour

September 18, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Since I've been busy with "Repair and Auto-Maintenance Hell" this past week some REALLY good links were sent my way.

My interview with Wall Street for Main Street.

I'll say it again for the cheap seats - The US is NOT a capitalist economy.

Amazing how monopolies look like government. But you know, more government is always the solution.

Forcing the Canadian taxpayers to subsidize worthless people with worthless degrees.

Spot the Beta.

What on earth made people think this was a legitimate field and study will forever elude me.

Video game geeks should replace the Federal Reserve. (it's actually QUITE GOOD)

Paul Krugman has been cashing in on this since forever.

Janet Yellen says something stupid.

Job Post for Cappy Cappites

September 18, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Alex over at Academic Composition is looking to hire some marketing staff to sell his services on Craig's List.

Not glorious work, but you don't have to commute, it can be done from home or the coffee shop, and it's a great way to make ends meet if you're in need of immediately employment. Here are the details (you can contact Alex for more information):

Requirements

A. Create a Gmail account
B. Set up the forwarding features of that account so all incoming messages are re-directed to Academic Composition
C. Use that gmail account to post CL ads

Compensation: You will be paid for each day that your ad stays live on the forum and it usually stays live up to a month.

You will also be paid bonuses for each person who will reply to your post. If the prospective clients signs up, you will receive an additional bonus.

1. Honolulu, HI
2. Houston, TX
3. Dallas, TX
4. Denver, CO
5. Los Angeles, CA
6. San Franciso, CA
7. New York, NY
8. Hartford, CT
9. Philadelphia, PA
10. Pittsburgh, PA
11. Atlanta, GA
12. Raleigh, NC
13. Chicago, IL
14. Phoenix, AZ
15. St. Louis, MO
16. Minneapolis, MN
17. Boston, MA
18. Toronto, ON

19. Vancouver, BC
20. Ann Arbor, MI

Aleksey Bashtavenko
Academic Composition
Owner & Principal Writer
(540) 300-1253
academiccomposition@gmail.com
www.academiccomposition.com
www.linkedin.com/pub/aleksey-bashtavenko/25/7b8/323/

Lust in the Time of Heartache

September 18, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Davis has finally released his short video that he submitted to a "short film" competition and won funding. For a rookie it's actually quite good and the $10,000 budget he received can only go so far.

Naturally, to follow up on this he and a colleague are raising money for another film, but this one is a documentary about the various forces of the left trying to invade and ruin the video game industry. If you're trying to figure out why this might be something you'd want to donate to, I recommend listening to the latest Bechtloff Podcast where he interviews Davis about the project.

We Beat the Marxists

September 19, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Between long distance road trips, mountain climbing, working out, semi-daily runs, and pre-winter maintenance on the house, I insist on keeping my brain fed. And the way I do this is by downloading and consuming an inordinate amount of podcasts. I recently devoured about 5 hours of documentaries on WWI and am always on the hunt for more. However, since I switched the hosting service for my podcast to "Podomatic" I discovered if you sign in through facebook you can scour their selection of podcasts.

This new trove yielded some interesting podcasts like Sooper Mexican, among others, but there was one that I listened to that was just HORRIBLE. I couldn't immediately understand why as I was pre-occupied installing a new door, but whatever they were saying was mind-numbing, academic pablum. Even if I wasn't pre-occupied I doubt my mind would have been able to pay attention to it. But soon I understood why, even with undivided attention, nobody would have been able to stay awake listening to it, when one of the hosts said,

"Well I'm a marxist."

That jarred my frontal lobes enough to now pay attention and I wished it hadn't. For what I was now paying close attention to was a podcast between two marxists who specialized in "advanced intellectualism."

My brain was then treated to two self-proclaimed intellectuals agonizing over concepts and ideas that were so removed from reality and practical application to the real world that it was only in their theoretical world that such concepts could be discussed. They used words that I had never heard of before, but knew could only exist in a philosophy that existed only to serve itself. And all of this discussion was with the arrogant air of pseudo-intelligence that would even put NPR hosts to shame.

It was the epitome of everything wrong with academia and lefter leaning "intellectuals:"

Dumb people
Using made up words
In a fabricated philosophy
With no real world practical application
Solely for the purpose of Making themselves sound smart
And rationalizing the theft of other people's money

(You know, kind of like religion without a church.)

Anyway, the whole reason I sampled their podcast was because they were the highest ranked podcast in Podomatic's "philosophy" category. And though I rued wasting what time I did on listening to it, I do have to emphasize a silver lining.

They WERE the highest ranked podcast.

To all my listeners - MANY thanks for your support.

If you want to listen to The Clarey Podcast (which you do, you just don't know it yet) you can download it here or get it through iTunes here.

Beware the Girl Who Actually Likes You

September 19, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

An interesting observation.

What if the vast majority of your experiences with the opposite sex when trying to court them is largely one of you fooling cajoling convincing arguing and teeth pulling

them to go out with you?

That you always operate from the premise the girl does not on her own, willingly want to go out with you? That such a fuss, fight, and resistance is put up, that you accept as premise women are incapable of liking men on their own.

Well, two very sad and tragic things will happen.

1. You'll believe that it's not possible for girls to just "like you." That they'll always need to be convinced or tricked otherwise. And

2. You'll fail to recognize the few girls that actually do genuinely like you, misdiagnose them, respond erroneously to them, and they will likely be "the one that got away."

Regardless, this thought is more thoroughly thought out in my latest piece at ROK. (Also, I recommend reading the comments. No limit to the number of virgins doing their academian, theoritician Monday Morning Quarterbacking tough talk.)

I'm Majoring in Whore

September 20, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Some dark humor for you this weekend.

I Am Not Responsible for Sexual Assault

September 20, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Boys, I don't know about you, but I'm getting awfully peeved at getting lectured for shit I didn't, never have, and never will do. I'm also sick and tired of the fake "sexual assault" epidemic and the outright lie about 1 in 5 women being sexually assaulted on campus which, intentionally or not, slippery slopes into painting all men as potential rapists, sexual deviants, not to to mention, dramatically increases their chances of a false rape accusation.

Want to fight back?

Well, if you notice the downvotes on this video that is fully endorsed by

Hollywood
The Democrat Party
The MSM and even President Obama

is getting a full 1/3rd downvote.

That's impressive. This was a professionally orchestrated piece that has the FULL BACKING of ALL THE INSTITUTIONS (media, government, academia, etc.) of the United States, and it STILL is getting a full 1/3 down voted.

Let's make it at least 1/2. Visit the video, watch it, and if you get the feeling you're being accused of being a rapist or are somehow part of the problem, down vote it. It would be a rare triumph of the voice of the people over those who wish to be our moral superior and dare to have the gall to lecture us about a problem that is completely political and not our fault, and therefore, not our problem.

I'm Calling Bullshit on All The Fake Mental Disorders

September 21, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Yes, language warning. do not play at work or in front of children.

Weekly Sponsor

September 21, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

This week's sponsor is Andro-Plus.

If you are looking for a testosterone supplement, but don't want Obama's permission via your doctor to get it, consider trying Andro-Plus. It is a fraction of the cost it would take for you to get it via 3 doctors visits and a trip to the pharmacy, and you'll find out whether testosterone supplements even work for you on the cheap.

However, be aware that there are lawsuits being filed (as there always is) that claim there are negative side effects OR no effects at all. In short you take this stuff at your own risk.

Again, I've used Andro-Plus and saw no effects (good or bad), but others have used it and swear by it, so see if it isn't for you.

Paypal vs. Patreon

September 21, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Let me tell you of a dream I have.

I have this dream where the amount of work that is to be done is finite. And I got it in my head that if I just:

knock out one more e-mail make one more video cut up another chord of wood replace one more brake pad

the work will end, I'll cross the "finish line" and will be able to play video games and goof off until I'm done.

While I'm consciously aware that this is a dream and the real world doesn't work that way, unconsciously my work ethic drives me to race towards that finish line that never gets closer. So i'll burn through 10 hours of "work," only to have the next day be filled with unexpected chores, repairs, and the cornucopia of shit I have to do that never ends.

But if there's a particularly irksome "never ending chore" in my "career" that I have, it's keeping up with the latest social media fad/craze. Just can't stick with blogger, nope you need a youtube channel. Can't just have a youtube channel, nope you need twitter. Can't just have twitter, nope you need instagram. And you fool, you just can't have instagram, you need tumblr!

Add to this list of perpetual painassery - Patreon.

First exposed to it by Davis Aurini's project, a fan suggested I look into it as I would make more money on my youtube videos if I were to use Patreon. Somewhat confused how it works, he was kind enough to explain it to me, essentially saying I would be looking for "patrons" to sponsor my work. This would allow me to work on my "work" and not worry about making ends meet. However, I was more interested in it because, frankly, when you go down this path you ostracize yourself forever from any kind of "normal" employment, not to mention anger people who are prone to launch political "campaigns," "lawsuits," "firing missions," etc. in an attempt to destroy your personal finances. Ergo, if people wanted to "thank" you for doing the work they can't while you put your own self at risk defending their beliefs, they could become "patrons" and help you out.

So I looked into it, always happy to take a new source of money. But upon further review (unless I'm missing something) Patreon just doesn't make any sense. If for any other reason, paypal and other crowd funding sources already exist and do what Patreon claims to be doing. Not to mention Patreon just highway-robs you in fees.

Patreon charges you 10%

While Paypal charges around 3%

And if you want to be technical, Bitcoin effectively charges 0%

Again, I may be missing something, but I don't think so. And if I'm not, then I'm slightly miffed in that I wasted, yet again, another 20 minutes of my life chasing after that finish line that can never be crossed.

Regardless, the point is if you want to help a blogger you like, a youtuber you're a fan of, or just an artist whose art you enjoy, forget Patreon. Just donate to them via Paypal and make life a lot easier for every one.

The Week Leftists Got Their Heads Out of Their Asses

September 22, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

I don't expect this to be a trend, but

Example #1 of a leftist getting his head out of his ass

and

Example #2 of a group of leftists using the free market to get their heads out of their asses as well.

Who knows! In 6-700 years maybe they might learn something from economic history and finally flesh out the rabbit hole to realize just how wrong they are!!!

Latest Podcast!

September 22, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

How women pamper you when you're sick...or not Cappy prepares for Italy
Sick of the virgin posers in the manosphere/redpill community
Roundhouse kicking chick cop show
All men love a motherly woman

AND MORE

In this latest episode of The Clarey Podcast

The Ass Kicking of "It's On Us"

September 23, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Not that you had a choice to notice it or not, but if you or anybody with even the most elementary of "social media" accounts, you no doubt had the "It's On Us" ~~nazi propaganda~~ "PSA" shoved down your throat.

Did you rape anybody? No?

Tough shit, we're lecturing you.

Did you make an unwanted advanced on a person of the female persuasion? No?

Tough shit, we're chartering you with the responsibility anyway.

The good news, and this is GOOD NEWS, is the response "It's On Us" has received.

It's be negative!

Despite all the money, funds, celebrityship, and even THE PRESIDENT OF THE FUCKING UNITED STATES, the American people took this trash and threw it back in the faces of the verminous leftist socialist scum.

Just look at the "like/dislike" ratios of the following videos.

Video 1

Video 2

Video 3

Video 4

You can continue and view all the videos but what you'll invariably see is the American public upchucking the shit that was shoved down their throats. NOBODY, and I mean NOBODY is swallowing this piece of leftist propaganda whole. They're revolting against it!

Now, if you wanted to tell the originators of this evil posing as "leftist moral crusaderism" you can't. "It's On Us" has no "comment" or "contact" section.

But oh my god

by golly
look at big titted Molly

THEY HAVE A "DONATE" button!!!!

Seriously.

You don't have to "kill" or "assassinate" or knee cap some leftist douche to fight the fight against the socialist onslaught on this country. You just have to vote against all those videos and mock and ridicule them.

I mean, think about it. These videos have the "cover" of being against rape and sexual assault.

Which EVERYBODY is against.

AND STILL!!!!

It's SOOOOOO fucking obvious they have a political motivation that people are voting them down.

For once, just ONCE, take the minute or two to vote these verminous leftist, Hollywood scum down and put these fuckers in their place.

The Father Could Not Be Reached for Comment

September 23, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Cripes

The Key to Success

September 23, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Is simply not to screw up

(language warning)

Greetings From Switzerland

September 25, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

I have no idea where I am or where these pictures are. Switzerland, if you haven't been here, is basically an entire country of small interlinked villages that even with a map I am getting lost in.

A Plague of Dunces

September 25, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Aussie executive speaks the blunt truth about the utter craptastic quality of "graduates" colleges are graduating today.

Now all of you thin-skinned college graduates do your knee jerk thing and tell us how he's mean, how you can't put a price on education and all the other preprogrammed stuff you've been brainwashed to say.

Stay Frosty Boys

September 25, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Stay the freak frosty.

Tee Hee I'm a Cute Conservative Girl!!!

September 26, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Afuckingmen

IQ vs Insonomia

September 26, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

I present this for my readers not as ass kissing but for genuine concern and intellectual digest

I also present it because its 4AM in Switzerland and I'd arrogantly would like to think myself a genius.

Montreaux, Switzerland

September 26, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Visited Montreaux and what I'm learning about Switzerland is that I would likely get arrested in a place like this. Not because I wish to break laws, but because there's so many to break. It explains why the ENTIRE country (that I've seen so far) is like a large library. Quiet, obey by the rules, don't act out. There is nearly complete SILENCE even though there are people everywhere. It's quite eerie actually.

Anyway, some pics just to remind you of how much western culture sucks:

"Can't Leave the Country Without It Going to Pot" Linkage

September 27, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Fed has their own Snowden now. How much you want to bet it's a bunch of Keynesians desperately trying to keep their faith?

Drop her off with ISIS. She'll lose weight.

Female conservatives finding out they're NOT obliged to have children. Oh noes Sean Hannity! Who will fight your unwinable culture war in the future!!???

It is easier to join ISIS become a "glorious, exciting rebel" than it is to hit the books, study calculus and become an engineer. Besides women find dangerous men more sexy.

World's Most Useful Degree

September 28, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

More powerful than any liberal arts degree ever.

More Fear and Suffering In Europe

September 28, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Greetings All!

Today was adventure in a genuine Citadel in the town of Besancon, France. It was also an adventure because my host is a pilot and I got to fly a plane around the French country side. And yes I did get to fly the actual plane!

However, sadly, I must provide one bit of editorial. The citadel that I visited, which was once a mighty and nearly impenetrable fort in this French town, has since been converted into a zoo.

Yes, a fucking zoo.

So where once proud French soldiers stood defending the town against various assaults, they have now turned their barracks into housing quarters for kangaroos, pigs, rats, roosters, rabbits, and other creatures that are now shitting where they slept 300 years ago.

It frankly pissed me off to see such an achievement of engineering and militarism reduced to being a tourist trap that relies on captured animals to draw the crowds. Ergo, I took no pictures of the animals because I thought it beneath the men that served there.

But on a happy note I did tell a French, street punk, millineal, tatted panhandler to "fuck off" when he came begging to ask me to forfeit some of my life in the form of currency so he wouldn't have to. He understood me quite clearly, and was actually shocked and irritated that somebody would refute him so boldly. Still, after a bit of bravado, he stood down, moving on to parasite off of some young naive females who believed he was genuinely disadvantaged. They poured out their finite life blood in the form of their finite time in the form of their finite currency because...well... they never studied economics too seriously or perhaps were intimidated. But still, it's good to see leftist women taking care of leftist men.

They deserve each other.

My New Mission in Life

September 28, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Absolutely this.

Lake Maggiore and Gotthard Pass

September 30, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Some more pics of Europe for those interested. As always embracing the suck. Drove from Zurich over the Alps into Italy over the "Gotthard Pass." Was allowed to hold, but not shoot, a European gun. And then the picture of Lake Maggiore from my hotel in Stesa. More pics on the way.

Now while I'm gone I want all of you good hard-working Americans to work extra hard and pay those taxes so I have nice, smooth roads to drive on when I get back.

The Ludwig Von Mises Airforce

October 1, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Many people don't know this, but the Mises Institute in at Auburn University has its very own airforce. I am actually a pilot. As proof here is a picture of me and my co-pilot as we bomb UC Berkeley.

That or it may just have been a friend of mine in France letting me fly his plane. I can't remember.

The First and LAST European Clarey Podcast

October 1, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

In this episode:

Aaron delves into his economic observations of Italy and Switzerland,
As well as some historical and sociological observations about Italy's fine highway system and all the painassery it entails.
He also notes how diversity is spreading in America in terms of Ebola and beheadings
Wonders if leftists value diversity more than their lives
And reads a letter from a listener about what he would have done differently at the age of 15.

All that and MORE in this episode of The Clarey Podcast!

Book Review - Average Married Dad's Guide

October 1, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Alex Peck of Average Married Dad fame has come out with his book "Average Married Dad's Guide to Health, Wealth, and a Sexy Marriage - for 30-40 Somethings."

I met Alex a while ago when he was working in my neck of the woods. He was sport enough to meet with me and my friends at Mancini's for drinks and food. Sure enough, like most people you've known over the internet and Manosphere for a while, he proved not to be a poser or a fraud, but the genuine article. He's married, he's ripped, he's good looking, he's an engineer, and thus, there is no doubt in my mind he has the authority to author a guide book.

But before you think he's perfect or lucky, let's be clear about this book. A lot of the advice comes from trial and error, a lot of error. He wasn't born with good looks and physical strength. He had to diet and exercise. He didn't have the perfect marriage. He had the marriage every man has with the equally poor tools and training to manage it. And he wasn't the greatest father. He learned on the job. In the end what the man has is wisdom. And he earned it the hard way - by stumbling through life like the rest of us.

Thankfully, as is per the theoretical "mission statement" of the Manosphere, his goal is to make your lives easier than his by getting the wisdom it took him until he was 40 to learn into your hands and brains in your 20's and 30's. Even then, a man in his 40's with a wife and children could benefit from this book as it would only serve to make a marriage stronger and family better. And thus arguably one of the largest benefits of his book - it addresses an underserved group within the Manosphere - married/older men.

A huge (the largest complaint actually) of my books is that they are only beneficial for younger, single men who don't have children. While I disagree with that, that is the reality. However, where my or other men's books (Roosh, Rollo, etc.) fail, Alex's succeeds. This book covers everything, especially topics such as marriage, children, being a father, and being a husband. It covers child rearing, reigniting your passion in marriage, and does so in a clear and effective manner.

About the only complaint I have about the book isn't really a complaint as much as it is a trait of the book. It's not opinionated or terribly political. It's very much a literal guide/instruction manual. Alex does not cause any controversy or challenge philosophical thought. This tone of writing might come off as a bit sterile or cool, even dry, but he is not here to pioneer new lines of thought or fillet the latest absurdity of feminism. He is here to help 30-40 something men with their lives through discipline, observations, experience, wisdom and failure.

I would strongly recommend this book to the underserved masses of men in the Manosphere who either are married, wish to get married, or don't immediately feel like tirading against the evils of women and marriage when the topic is brought up. As I've said before your wife/partner and children are the most important people in your lives and are the single greatest source of happiness for you. But if you botch it up, they will be the equally greatest source of pain, misery, and strife.

Ensure it is the first and not the latter. Buy Alex's book before you marry.

"Why Can't I Find a MAAAAAN????"

October 2, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

You don't need a man. You have government!

Now go sleep with it, marry it, and raise children with it.

Dirty, Rotten, Scoundrels

October 3, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

One of my favorite movies is "Dirty, Rotten, Scoundrels." I found it slap stick funny in the 8th grade, but find it a brilliant work of art in my adulthood.

Naturally, out of all of Italy, I wanted to visit where the fictional "Beaumont Sur Mer" existed, but came to find out it was indeed fictional. There is no such place as Beaumont Sur Mer." However, there were real towns and general areas referenced in the movie that do indeed exist, one of which is "Portovino." And thusly, I decided to visit this town in the hopes of seeing where the infamous Freddy Benson, aka, "Randy Bentwick" walked.

Naturally, the results were very Cappy. Prosecco is quickly becoming the replacement for Rumpleminze, swimming in the Mediterranean was more pleasant than expected, saw a Ferrari convoy come through town, and more or less felt like a poser in what has the claim to fame as being the "richest" part of all of Italy. Of course, Freddy Benson was a poser, so I find it merely fitting I was the low brow lower-middle income American middling in their midst.

Add Hang Gliding to the Mix

October 7, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Some pics from the final touristy spot, "Lake Annecy." It's south of Geneva by about an hour or so. Here I actually got to "captain" a "ship," but also found a new passion - hang gliding. If you zoom in on the mountain pic you'll see some hangliders. This will be my next sport starting next year.

The Production Paradox

October 7, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

It is becoming a daily, if not an hourly event that I receive an article, a post, or some other such media wherein a crusader or some group of social justice warriors are championing some damaging and self-serving leftist crusade to bolster their egos. I've delved into this before at great length with my "Crusaderism" seminar, but one aspect of it I would like to expand upon is the "Production Paradox."

Many years ago the young Captain made an observation about his education, career, and work. While skilled in math, finance, and statistics, he also very much enjoyed working at the police department where he was a wee little campus security guard. He entertained thoughts of becoming a police officer, but beside that temptation he noticed the choice between going into banking versus becoming a cop was essentially a question of:

Are you better at producing good or stopping evil?

Any member of society who wishes to be productive and not a parasite has to answer this question for themselves. Are they better at creating good stuff or stopping bad stuff. Some people have the traits to be cops, lawmen, soldiers, doctors, while others have the aptitudes to be entrepreneurs, inventors, mechanics, engineers, programmers, and chefs. But regardless of which of the two contributing-to-society categories you choose, in both cases you are helping advance society.

Enter in one minor problem - human advancement.

In general we can say that human kind has advanced. And since it's been around for a long time it's advanced a lot. We certainly have a long way to go, and there are certainly cultures stuck in the past, but if you live in the 1st world, the economy and science has been advanced so far that it takes significant time, effort, and rigor to not only learn what has already been discovered, but get to the productive edge of the envelope so that you may be truly productive.

But, "uh oh, Aaron! Did you say 'time, effort, and rigor?'"

Yes, yes I did astute young economist. And you know what that means.

Since to be a genuinely productive member of society takes a lot of effort, training and specialization, that is going to run counter to the (now running) three generations of westerners living (more or less effort free) off of the laurels of their predecessor generations. And when given the choice of being a producer of good or a preventer of evil, a lot of lazy people will pick....

neither.

Yes, some will become cops (which is in part why cops have a mixed reputation). Some will become lawyers (again mixed). But a significant percentage of them will not even be willing to take on the efforts and rigors it takes to be part of the "evil-stopping" contributors of society. Instead, they will become the most evil people in society:

The Crusaders or Social Justice Warriors.

The reason they are the most evil people in society is because they choose a path that does nothing to advance society, neither producing anything of value or prevent anything of evil. Worse, they take a look at what has been produced, what humans have worked so hard to achieve these past 5,000 years and instead villainize and attempt to destroy these achievements and progress. This is thinly veiled as a "career" in the form of getting degrees in "Social Justice," "Sociology," religion, career politicians, activists, non-profits, and the whole panoply of faux/bogus "professions." When in reality it is just selfish, maniacal, lazy ego maniacs who have no problem destroying the achievements of others and parasiting off of the genuine producers in society.

I know it is hard to choose the path of production. I know that it takes a lot of studying and time to become proficient in today's increasingly technologically advanced economy to get to that "production-envelope." But for the Patron Saint's Name of Frick, if you choose not to go down that path, at least choose the path of stopping evil. Otherwise, you yourself are at best a parasite on society, if not a genuine and cowardly evil that hides behind false crusades.

Amazon is BACK Baby!

October 8, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Hi All,

For those of you who are relatively new readers, I had an Amazon Affiliate program which many people used and incidentally helped support Cappy Cap. Naturally, as all commie, socialist scum like to do, our governor and trust-fund baby of the Target/Macys/Dayton's empire-extraordinaire, Mark Dayton decided to force Amazon to pay sales tax, which prompted the closing of the affiliate program for all Minnesotans. This resulted in a loss of significant revenue (but did prompt the birth of Asshole Consulting as a means to compensate for this loss).

However, Amazon has built a facility in Minnesota which allows them to be profitable under the current tax structure, which means the Amazon Affiliate program is BACK!

If you are unaware of how it works, basically, all I ask is that if you're going to buy something on Amazon do it here via Cappy Cap. By clicking on the Amazon banner ON THIS BLOG you attach a "code" or "ID" to your shopping session. This code then tells Amazon that your purchases were referenced from the Ole Captain, and the Ole Captain in turn gets a cut/commission.

You do NOT pay higher prices, we are simply keeping (roughly) a 5-7% commission within the Cappysphere.

Anyway, if you were looking for a way to support this blog, but don't like any of the wares offered by our advertisers or sponsors, you can now still support the site AND WITHOUT CHARITY by simply making your Amazon purchases from here.

My many thanks for you yahoos out there who read and support this blog.

Cappy

High School Marxists and Anarchists

October 8, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

When genuine intellectual thought is replaced with labels:

Language warning

Darwinism Poetic Justice

October 8, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Good, hope it was painful. Deserves much worse for threatening so many people's lives.

Book Review - "Best Supplements for Men's Health" by Dennis Magan

October 9, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Flights, especially ones that cross entire oceans, allow me to catch up on reading and a short little guide I read was Dennis Magan's new book "Best Supplements for Men's Health, Strength and Virility."

Even though it did not really knock off a lot of hours on my flight, it was an EXCELLENTLY written book that was succinct, practical and very helpful. Like "30 Days of Discipline" it re-kicked my ass into not just eating right, but cut through all the BS about supplements, vitamins, pills etc. It also explained (without going into great detail) so the average man can understand why he should take certain supplements, why they have a positive effect, and the simplified biological processes that were involved.

Even if you didn't want to read all the details, the book still serves as a very simplified "instruction manual" or "vitamin list" where you could just take the supplements listed at the beginning of each chapter, go to the pharmacy and be done with this aspect of your diet in under 10 minutes.

It is only available in Kindle (I believe) for the low and affordable price of $2.99. You will likely spend more money on a single bottle of vitamins than this book.

How Inflation Explains Violence in the Middle East

October 9, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

If you dare to spend the few calories of energy it takes, the average person can increase their understanding of inflation (and thus economics) once they understand the concept of "flooding" a market with money. Once you comprehend that money has no value and if you shovel a ton of it into a "market" with a finite amount of goods it only results inflation (not production), you've promoted yourself above nearly 95% of the population in terms of economic knowledge.

However, while most economic focus is on money and the markets it inflates, there are other forms of "currency" that have similar bubbly (and disastrous) effects on various countries and populations. And military support is one such example.

We (at least here on Cappy Cap) all know the effects of flooding a market with money. The stock market is overvalued by about 60% because of mindless-zombie-retirement dollars and QE money seeping in through buy backs and institutional investors. College tuition, also a bubble, has increased in lock step with government grants, scholarships, student loans, 529 plans and all the other sources of financing the sheeple use to pay for increasingly worthless degrees. The housing and Dotcom bubbles the same. Investors, banks, lenders and borrowers all flooded that market. But take that exact same concept of individual dollars flooding a market and replace it with guns, weaponry, and military support.

And now you can see the "bubble" that exists in the middle East.

Between the US, China, and Russia (and for various political reasons) the Mid East has been flooded with a ton of weapons and military wares for decades. Add to that mix a religion where a significant percentage of its followers is radicalized. Also add to the mix that two general sects within the group loathe each other. And in the end you have a region full of wars, violence, murder, mayhem, etc. However, ask yourself the question, would it be as bad had the powers that be just not involved themselves in the first place?

This is not a criticism of guns or various countries' policies in the Mid East, but merely an economic observation that the EXACT same thing that is happening in the college bubble or stock market is also happening in the Mid East through ISIS, Iraq, Syria, Israel, etc. Just instead of inflation and higher prices being the unit of measurement by which people suffer, that unit of measurement is instead death.

The mathematical/economic solution is a simple one - simply stop supplying the area with guns and weapons. ISIS would not have existed without US support and training, not to mention all the fine equipment and military grade hardware we left in the Iraqi's hands for them to take. Lord knows how many people would have been saved had Russia not flooded the region with AK 47's. And over time these weapons would wear out to the point of uselessness, and they would forced to resort to poorer and inferior weapons with less killing capabilities. You would not so much get peace in the Mid East, but deaths would go down and maybe a modicum of safety and stability would ensue.

Alas, something tells me the ego of raging Shiite and Sunni are very much like the egos out of suburbanite teenage masses who view college as their birthright. And sadly, the pushers of both weapons and worthless college degrees are more than happy to provide the supply.

Oh well, Enjoy the Decline!

Men Refusing To Marry, Women Getting Pissed

October 9, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Here's the latest and "cutest" claim about men not wanting to marry:

They're "immature."

Replete with maps!

The Clarey Podcast #65

October 10, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

"Immature men" refusing to man up and marry
A listener bribes the ole Captain not to swear in one podcast
Cappy tells the story of returning the rental car in Zurich and then running 6 miles to the airport
The left may win, but are incapable of enjoying victory because they deep down inside are not a happy people and the Troll of the Weak questions Cappy's notch count

in THIS EPISODE of The Clarey Podcast!

You can also find The Clarey Podcast on iTunes and Stitcher!

Blood Is Not Thicker Than Water

October 10, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

A video request for Asshole Consulting that ended up being a video that may benefit some younger folk out there:

Beware of Made Up Words

October 13, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Something that I hadn't had time to fully think through was why people (especially in academia) who used made up words gave me the heebee jeebees. Any perusal of a women's studies course description or the a powerpoint presentation from a "diversity consultant" will leave (the sane) reader not only befuddle and perplexed, but asking the question, "WTF?" More so the sane reader's survivalist instincts will kick in in the back of his brain saying, "Something ain't right here. What are these people up to? There is something nefarious going on." And your instincts aren't wrong, because there is indeed something nefarious going on.

Take for example the handful of new vocabulary words I've learned thanks to Mr. Aurini.

Agency
Misanthrope
and Catharsis

Very hoity toity words. Very high brow philosophy, and one might even conclude these terms are just as bogus as many made up academian ones. However, just because they're high brow and not commonly part of most people's vernacular, doesn't mean they're not real words. And the reason they are real words is because they describe a phenomenon that is naturally happening in the real world. "Agency" is in part responsibility or purpose in life, a very real force that drives men's psychology today. Misanthrope is a person who hate humanity. And catharsis is basically an excuse for you to take all your frustrations out on a whipping boy.

Because these words describe real world phenomena they are practical. They are useful. They serve a function in describing something in the real world, allowing humans to identify, understand, describe and discuss them.

However, the same cannot be said about the ever-increasing faux-vocabulary that the left is manufacturing.

Take for example the words/phrases:

Intersectionality Privilege
Raise awareness
Pangender
or any one of these 812 other gender types

These words are, frankly, made up words. And the reason the hair on the back of your head is being raised when you hear them is because their primary goal is NOT to define something that is real in the real world, but rather to serve two ulterior purposes (as far as my thinking takes me).

1. The Ego

If there is one thing I want to get across to other people about leftist psychology it is that it is driven by LAZINESS and EGO. Intellectual weaklings who are too lazy to work hard, try hard, and engage in studies of true and genuine rigor find it fanciful to create "studies" out of whole cloth. This serves two purposes - it allows them to avoid any actual hard work, BUT also allows them to fool themselves into thinking they're actually intelligent and on par with truly accomplished individuals. Humanities professors love nothing more than being called "Professor" or "Doctor" when the effort they put into their studies was a microscopic fraction of the work real doctors in real fields forfeited. This is not only why they're typically pompous about their fabricated position in life, but also dismissive of people who ~~"just don't understand"~~ don't believe their poppycock profession is real.

2. Making You a Slave/Stealing Your Life

Well, technically they want to steal your money (which is LITERALLY nothing more than making you a slave to them) but the larger point is that ego and laziness tends not to produce anything of value in the real world. And since the left is typically not productive they need other people's money.

Here, these made up words serve a great function because they manipulate the only way humans communicate. While you're trying to figure out what the heck a leftist is saying, or trying to understand what these words mean, deep down inside you can't know what these words mean because they aren't intended to describe anything real. This provides the smoke screen for a leftist to essentially say, "You owe me more of your money because of (fill in made up word/concept here)_____" and if you disagree or don't know what they were trying to say, too bad. You're a "simpleton" "uneducated," or (more typically) a racist, bigot, homophobe, etc.

But understand such linguistic manipulation was by design. Since these words do not adhere to the laws and rules of the real linguistic world, it's as if they become a supernatural word amongst normal words much like Superman amongst normal human beings. It can be used for any purpose because it is not anchored or handicapped to having to be a real word that describes something TRUTHFULLY, ACCURATELY and REAL.

It is here you commonly see words that at one time WERE real and DID describe something in reality, but have since been co-opted for political and theft-purposes.

Racist
Misogynist
Bigot
Community Diversity
Appropriate Dialogue Empowerment and others

No doubt when you hear a politician, an activist, a non-profiteer, a media type or a professor using these words you immediately do not trust these people.

The larger point of this entire post, however, is to get you to identify these individual for what they truly are (using real words)

Cowards
Liars
and Theives

No matter how clever or complicated they think they're being
No matter how much of a ruse they throw up to make themselves seem smart (again faux degrees in the humanities fields attracts these charlatans)
And no matter how much they bluff about their intellectual superiority, they are nothing but

Cowards,
Liars,
and
Thieves

They want your money, but dare not have the courage like a street thug to come up and try to take it from you. Ergo they employ the most cowardly, elongated tactic to rationalize stealing it - the liberal arts and indoctrination. And after brainwashing enough youth through the education industry to believe in things and concepts that aren't real, they "peaceably" steal your life from you through when these brainwashed dolts go and vote as they were programmed to, allowing idiocracy and the state to steal your money/life.

That is why when you hear these words your instincts tell you not to trust such people.
That is why when you hear these faux words the hair on the back of your hair stands up.

It's just now it's gone from an instinctual suspicion of a parasite and thief, to a full blow frontal lobe identification and knowledge of this clear and present threat.

Aaron Clarey is a mean, republican jerky-head and says truthful thinks that hurts people's feelings. He also wrote a lot of mean books that crushes dreams and destroys souls with devastating facts, reality, and economics. He also heads up a consulting division called "Asshole Consulting" where people pay him to tell them the truth. And rumor has it he kicks kittens and slingshots puppies. You can visit his Youtube and Podcast channels if you want to hear more from this jerk.

Truth Cannot Be "Sexist" Nor "Racist"

October 13, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

What I always get a kick out of (and more or less how I make my living) is how merely speaking the truth will get you accused of all sorts of "ists." I'm already 60% dead and will not waste my remaining life living lies or abiding by them. I've already danced around politically incorrect eggshells for far too long. So I find it very cute, but intellectually conflicting when people claim merely speaking the truth is "sexist" or "racist."

This otherwise fine review of BPE is one such an example.

"I'm going to have to agree that there are a few things Aaron writes about that are sexist*. However what his critics don't address is the more important issue of whether or not what he writes is* true*.*"

So am I to understand that the Victim Industry and Politically Correct Nazis have been so successful in brainwashing people that it is better to LIE than to speak the truth? It's scary that people's logic are so preprogrammed this way that it is better to lie than to be considered sexist or bigotted, etc.

Let me tell you the path this is going down.

When people start telling lies, believing in lies, and (worst of all) making decisions based in lies, society begins to falter. Growth falters, standards of living decrease, nearly every aspect of life will get worse because you're NOT living in the real world. What's worse is that people would prefer to hear pretty lies than harsh truths, and this gives genuinely evil people, posing as politicians, carte blanche to tell you whatever they want, and whatever you want to hear, so they can score your naive vote.

You people wonder why economic growth is 1/2 of what it used to be?
You people wonder why you can't find jobs?
You people wonder why there's a national debt 105% GDP?
You people wonder why after trillions spent on "The Great Society" women still earn only 77% of what men do and black's standards of living have not closed the gap with whites?

Well how about you grow a fucking spine and start accepting, living with, and basing your decisions in....(GASP!!!!)

reality.

Enjoy the decline, boys and girls. Enjoy the freaking decline.

The Clarey Podcast Episode #66 - "The Stalker Paradox"

October 14, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Asking girls out before cell phones
"The Stalker Paradox" and flaking out in the 90's
"She got hit by a truck" aka "The Night Cappy Was Stood Up"
Troll of the Weak exposes herself through shaming language
The pen IS mightier than the sword
It's better to lie than be called an "ist"
How minorities should be lynching the left for how they're ruined their lives

AND MORE!

In this episode of The Clarey Podcast.

Also remember the podcast is available in iTunes and Stitcher.

And for all you Apple users, for some reason people who also have their podcast on iTunes keep asking to "vote up" their podcast on iTunes. I don't know what that is, I'm sure there's some benefit, so if you'd be so kind, I'd appreciate it.

The Real, Statistical, Factual Causes of the US Deficit and Debt

October 15, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

A very common and very KEY argument I came across when debating the left is the true and underlying causes of the national deficit, and by consequence, national debt. Those of us on the right claim it is excessive social spending, those on the left insist it is military spending. After studying the budget and public finances tangentially, I intuitively knew it had to be social spending. BUT, I did not know for a fact. And so I decided to spend my coffee session pulling data from the White House's federal budget data and FRED database to find out, once and for all, what are the true causes of our national deficit/debt.

The issue is not as straight forward as one might thing. For example, how far back do we go? 1790? Post WWII? What percentage of today's debt is caused by which years of deficit the government has run. In the best efforts of intellectual honesty I looked at the historical "deficits as a percentage of GDP" aiming to find when we started running chronic and serious budget deficits. I also went post WWII because of the obvious warping effects a global war has on budgets. And I also chose post WWII because adjusting for inflation and population growth (ie - the majority of today's debt was caused by more recent society, not the 10 million people that lived here 200 years ago).

This resulted in a starting point of 1971. If you look at deficits as a percentage of GDP it was 1971 that start not only chronic, but significant deficits (and it is here, no doubt, leftists will focus their arguments because the math henceforth is unassailable).

However, before we move forward it is imperative that I issue a trigger warning for any socialists, leftists or democrats reading this. The following information is factual, math based, and real. I know these things cause great stress, emotional harm, and psychological damage to leftsits, not to mention are insulting to the leftist community. If you could have your government-paid therapist or counselor on speed dial, that may help before continuing reading through this article.

So here is the basic data. The sum of all government spending, by general department from 1971 to 2014, along with their corresponding percentages.

	$	%
050 National Defense:	13926044	21.87%
150 International Affairs:	833259	1.31%
250 General Science, Space, and Technology:	669800	1.05%
270 Energy:	209627	0.33%
300 Natural Resources and Environment:	922712	1.45%
350 Agriculture:	727441	1.14%
370 Commerce and Housing Credit:	362995	0.57%
400 Transportation:	1858984	2.92%
450 Community and Regional Development:	598500	0.94%
500 Education, Training, Employment, and Social Services:	2249879	3.53%
550 Health:	5784207	9.08%
570 Medicare:	7655378	12.02%
600 Income Security:	10089404	15.85%
650 Social Security:	14146393	22.22%
700 Veterans Benefits and Services:	2068136	3.25%
750 Administration of Justice:	936501	1.47%
800 General Government:	635971	1.00%
Total Spending	63675231

You'll note standard battle lines to be drawn as libertarians and conservatives cite Social Security as being larger than Military spending. You'll also note the left immediately (and predictably) pointing out "Veterans Affairs" is not included in military spending. However, the above data needs to be simplified as there are multiple accounts across the general two categories that are being debated as to the cause of our chronic deficits and debt - Military spending and Social spending. I simplified this chart into four categories.

1. Social spending
2. Military spend
3. Governance (which is appallingly low) and
4. "Other" (where it wasn't governance, social spending, or military. Namely space agency)

The results confirm what nearly 2 decades of research and common sense would tell you - social spending is by far to blame for the deficits and debt we have today.

	% Cause of Deficit & Debt
Military	25.12%
Income Transfers	64.78%
Governance	5.96%
Other	4.14%

But before leftists now scramble to find an excuse (or call their therapist) to explain this reality away, let's us hold on before taking that step and address a tangential issue to this debate that may solve it for both sides - psychology.

You see, in the early days of this blog (and my career) I naively spend hours, if not months, crunching numbers, calculating statistics, and doing so in an intellectually honest manner because I truthfully was concerned about what was truth. I did not want to have an ideology or a political position and then "force" data to fit my preferences. I wanted the facts and data to form my political ideology. However, when presenting data, such as the above, to those on the left, no matter how right it was, no matter how solid and unbiased my ideology, and no matter how apolitical the data was, people on the left simply refused to believe it.

It soon dawned on me the true debate between right and left is not one of facts, data, statistics or reality, but one of psychology. The left is delusional and puts their religion above all else, including reality.

Therefore, let us cut to the chase. I know I just wasted the past hour crunching numbers, making charts, and uploading them here. I know this is going to be as effective as DayQuil on cancer. So my question to the left is NOT "will you please finally admit you were wrong." It's going to be;

"Please humor me and entertain me with the mentally ill and cognitive dissonance acrobatics your going to use to explain away this one. I always get a kick out of watching mentally damaged people ignore reality."

Enjoy that freaking decline.

The Importance of Having a Study Den

October 15, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Not "Man Cave."

Study Den.

(my latest piece at ROK)

Please Stop Begging for Higher Rates of Return

October 16, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

A common question I get in my "alternative" financial life style is

"How can I get a higher rate of return on my investments?"

People are sick of the barely existent interest rates on their checking or savings accounts. People don't like the rates on T-Bills or government bonds. And people are also tired of the whopping 3-5% on high quality corporate bonds.

Isn't there ANYWHERE I can get a better return? Why, I need my 401k to magically constantly forever unabattedly perpetually infinitely grow at 10% in order to retire at 62!

The charlatans come in and say "stocks."

But let me beat this dead horse one more time in case you didn't get it the first 40 times.

What is the REAL rate of return of stocks? And when I say REAL I mean what kind of income do stocks generate? I know everybody has formed a circle jerk around capital gains and believe that magically constantly forever unabattedly perpetually infinitely increasing stock prices will solve everybody's problem, but what drives those capital gains? What gives stocks their value?

The answer is -dividends.

It's not "earnings" because ultimately a life long share holder never SEES all the earnings. They are ONLY paid dividends (and a final cash out should the company be acquired or their shares be purchased), but even that final cash out is dependent upon the future dividends those acquired assets will generate.

So what "rate of return" are stocks truly providing? What is the real "interest rate" you are earning on stocks?

Well my fine 401k Zombie Lemmings, here it is:

I strongly recommend you plan on working till you're 75.

Today's Self Employed Office Brought to You In Part By

October 16, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Taleo Brass Ring - Yes, we know you gave us your resume. Yes, we know we have parsing technology. But we want to see if you'll jump through these hoops like a good little monkey so we know we can take advantage of you later. Taleo Brass Ring, making life hell for job seekers.

and by

Diversity Training - Do you do your job well? Do you work hard and produce? Do you go that extra mile? Well fuck you, you're still a racist sexist! And we're going to remind you every year. Diversity training, treating adults like children because socialists need to brainwash you.

and by

Meetings - Yes, you have important work to do, but we need you to sit in a room while middle aged incompetents blather and act like they're leaders. Sit there, be quiet and listen to things that have nothing to do with your job, all while wasting precious time that could be used to expedite your job. By the way, you need to come in on the weekend to make up for this lost labor. "Meetings" - it's how idiots manage!

Anyway, just wanted to show you guys my office view today:

Oh, and for any of my ex bosses, please feel free to post what the view looks like from your office! I love pictures of cubicles and parking lots!

What Batman Teaches Us About Agency, Morality, and Life

October 17, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

I was paid to do a movie review of "The Dark Knight Returns 1&2." Ended up being a much deeper and philosophical movie than I thought it would be (given it's animation). Regardless, some of the lessons pulled from it may be of benefit or use to you lieutenants, economists, and Cappy Cappites. It's a longer video and yes, some minor cursing.

What Ebola Tells Us About Obama

October 17, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Wake the fuck up people.

Related

Gotta Love Large Liberal Cities

October 18, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Another reason not to live in Chicago.

However, given traffic, it's nearly impossible to speed, let alone go the speed limit in the town.

"I'm On Birth Control" WINK

October 18, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Stay frosty, boys.

Stay the freak frosty.

Lazy Sunday Linkage

October 19, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

The most depressing podcast ever from The Black Brigade.

1950's grade distribution at Princeton.

Obama's ~~crony~~ czar won't start the ~~made up position for his crony~~ job for 5-6 months.

Parents can pay for their childrens' college, but can't find out about their grades.

Daddy, what's a Social Justice Warrior? Well…they're scum, son. Just verminous scum.

The 1950's were better because of the people, not that they needed only one income.

Oh noesies!!! Eliteist book publishers are being destroyed by Amazon. Oh noesssss!!!!!

Another Book Babe

October 20, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

A southern belle sent in a pic.

Making Money Off of Stupid People

October 20, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

This was quite predictable.

The Deflationary Spiral is a Lie

October 21, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Rick Newman at Yahoo COUGH COUGH WHEEZE WHEEZE "News" wrote a piece recently about the horrors and catastrophes of "deflation."

Yes, this economic scourge is so dangerous, so devastating that people unfortunate enough to experience it suffer:

Higher standards of living
An increase in the value of their money
Increased purchasing power
and
a stable currency

Sarcasm aside, you don't need to be an economist to figure out that the "deflationary spiral" is a Keynesian canard because the WHOLE POINT OF ECONOMICS AND SOCIETAL ADVANCEMENT IS TO MAKE THINGS CHEAPER! It's the SOLE PURPOSE of economics. Increasing standards of living through efficiency. So already you know when somebody warns about the "horrors" of "deflation," you know they're either

1. An ignorant journalist who doesn't know jack about economics or
2. A politician or political operative trying to dupe you

(Mr. Newman is the first, despite his degree in economics, which was no doubt dripping with Keynesianism)

However, this simple logic to find out if believers in the Deflationary Spiral are devils or dupes, does not expressly explain or disprove their claims. That claim being that deflation lowers demand by delaying purchases as people "know" prices are going down and simply postpone those purchases indefinitely into the future. And while it may seem logical on the face of it, that's all it is - logical. Not empirical.

First, in order to believe the Deflationary Spiral exists you have to believe that Americans are financially conscious and savvy enough to know about prices, inflation, etc.

ARE YOU KIDDING ME?????

The average American doesn't even know who's in congress or where Canada is, let alone what the CPI is doing!!!! They are so stupid and so doped up on bread and circus BS that the last thing they're doing is reading Federal Reserve minutes. They are the most economically ignorant population in the history of humanity (but they're experts in the Kardashians and ESPN post game shows).

Second, since the average American is clueless about finances and economics, they spend money like...well...Americans. They save practically nothing, and (despite enormous debt forgiveness during the financial crisis) have managed to rack up cumulative household debt back above 100% GDP.

Third, Americans lack the capacity for delayed gratification. In the now now now me me me mine mine mine society, nobody is conscious, let alone psychologically capable of budgeting, conserving or postponing purchases.

And finally, women. (Yes, sorry, we're going there, because it's germane and true). Depending on what statistics you want to use, women account for anywhere between 55-80% of all household purchases. And most of them are on worthless and unneeded trinkets and crap. I have NEVER, EVER heard a woman utter "deflationary spiral" because it has never occurred to a newly wed wife to postpone purchases of curtains for her new home, a power tripping NYC marketing executive to postpone purchases of her Pravda shoes, or a naive and clueless college student to postpone the purchase of her $200,000 "Masters in Latina Transgendered Anthropologic Poetry Unicorn Studies."

But the ultimate argument against the Deflationary Spiral is simply one of empircism.

It does not exist.

While I know economists, journalists, politicians, and everyday sheeple just like to repeat things they heard in college or the news, it doesn't make them true. And if you look at spending versus inflation, THERE IS NO RELATIONSHIP.

This chart shows the velocity of money (the rate at which a dollar is spent and re-spent, indicating demand). It is juxtaposed against inflation. To the untrained eye you might be tempted to detect a pattern or relationship between the two, and according to the Deflationary Spiral believers as prices go down you should see a decrease in the velocity of money.

However, THERE IS NO RELATIONSHIP BETWEEN THE TWO. When correlated against one another the correlation coefficient is -.04, meaning no relationship at all.

2011-07-01	1.653	3.7
2011-10-01	1.647	3.3
2012-01-01	1.634	2.8
2012-04-01	1.625	1.9
2012-07-01	1.611	1.7
2012-10-01	1.584	1.9
2013-01-01	1.574	1.7
2013-04-01	1.567	1.4
2013-07-01	1.569	1.5
2013-10-01	1.562	1.2
2014-01-01	1.533	1.4
2014-04-01	1.535	2.1
		-0.0370650978

Naturally, I don't expect my little blog here, let alone this little post to correct the thousands of erroneous pages in economic textbooks. I don't expect this FACT to change politicians' or journalists' thinking (or incentives). And I doubt that anybody at the Federal Reserve will remove their lips from Keynes' dead ass long enough to consider this data. But I do expect my readers and anybody who really cares about politics and economics to know the Deflationary Spiral just doesn't exist. And that the next time you hear somebody trying to "scare-tactic" you using the "Deflationary Spiral" to know it's a calculated political move to allow for more government debt and printing of money.

Why Big Oil Should 86 Their CSR Departments

October 22, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

"and replace them with me."

Language warning:

Social Security and Medicare Simplified

October 23, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

From our resident artist Jorge (who intends on drawing several more political cartoons)

Baby Boomer Vampires

THIS IS What Feminism Looks Like

October 23, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

For all you young naive girls who think feminism is "just the equal treatment of women" its time for you to wake up.

The Truth About Executive Compensation

October 23, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

A common ~~whine~~ complaint from unions and the left is about executive compensation. That these evil, fat cat, mean, rich executives make too much money and if that money were instead to be paid out to the "real" workers in corporations, then all would be well and every child would have a pet unicorn.

Like many, if not all, arguments of the left it is based in idealism and not reality. What people want, versus what the labor market can possibly mathematically deliver. Hope and not reality.

Because of this, their arguments are founded on weak clay foundations, and it doesn't take much research or empiricism to prove them wrong. So after (literally) 5 minutes of research I was able to pull some quick statistics and facts, do a little bit of 3rd grade math and debunk this leftist pipe-dream of an argument that has been around for decades.

Once again, I'm going to go with the most

EVIL VILE
DISGUSTING
GREEDY
HORRIBLE

corporation that ever existed - Exxon Mobil.

Executive compensation, which is now required to be filed in the 10K/annual report to the SEC, can more easily be found on Morningstar which does a nice job of presenting it annually.

As you note, those evil, mean (and no doubt) 100% white male corporate executives at Exxon Mobil make on average $85 million annually in compensation.

Now, what if we were to take all of it and spread it fairly across all the "real" employees at Exxon Mobil? How much would it help those poor, disadvantaged near-slaves that are being taken advantage of by these evil executives?

Well a little google searching will find that Exxon Mobil employs 75,000 employees. You do a little 3rd grade math and you come to find out that if we stuck it to those evil, greedy (and don't forget White Male) capitalist pigs, each and EVERY employee would get a raise of (drum roll please!!!!)....

$1,133.

Giggity freaking giggity.

Now, let's do something I like to do to save time and advance the conversation along - predict the knee-jerk counterarguments from the left.

Did you include stock options? - Yes, the SEC considers stock options, grants, and other forms of non-cash compensation in it's calculations.

Well, that's just Exxon Mobil. It's probably worse at other companies! - Then you do something for the first time and research something rather than blather.

Still! That's better than nothing!!!! - Oh shut up.

The whole point is that this myth of if we "just took executive compensation and spread it across the employees, then everybody would have higher standards of living" is precisely that - a myth. The MATHEMATICAL REALITY IS that there just aren't enough executives out there. Yes, they make a lot of money, but given the ratio of employees to executives, it's too high to make this dream reality. Worse still for the left, this says nothing about their ultimate goal - taking executive compensation and giving it to EVERYBODY - employees, poor people welfare recipient, students, single mothers, etc. etc. If you included the millions of dependent parasitic classes, confiscating ALL of Exxon Mobil's executives' compensation would result in an increase of just PENNIES to the average democrat voter.

The truth is that relying on other people and pursuing a life of parasitism will NEVER get you to the standards of living you want. And wasting your life lobbying, debating, and arguing for other people's money is precious time that could be otherwise spent improving yourself, your skills and your own lot in life, much more so than waiting for the democrat party to eek out an added tax "on the rich."

So argue all you want.
Protest all you want.
Whine all you want.
Stammer your feet and pout.

Even if you got everything you wanted, your life would still suck because (and here's the sad truth) you suck.

So stop sucking at life and do something with it instead of sticking your hand out.

California Institute of the Arts

October 24, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

I had an agent send this to me. He attended the California Institute of the Arts (where these fliers were from) and I think any young man considering this college should rethink given its politically hostile environment towards men and how "rape" is now defined as "regret."

This isn't bullshit boys. You need to be VERY WELL AWARE AND WARNED just how much of a risk it is attending colleges like these, especially in California, where they are so far deluded, so far gone, that mere "regret" is grounds for a rape accusation.

Choose schools wisely boys. You landing in jail or having your tuition confiscated while you're expelled because you had sex with a drunk girl is just not worth it.

The Black Man's Guide Out of Poverty

October 24, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

I was interviewed by Kerry Lutz recently and made the announcement and title of my next book official. I'm going to aim to have it done by Christmas selling season, but that's about to start in a week. Regardless, should be ready before Christmas.

Last Night's Hotel Stand

October 25, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Remembered in addition to dive bars across the unpopulated American west I also intended to take pictures of my bedstand before going to bed. This was last nights:

Saturday Linkage

October 25, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Businesses don't create jobs. Golddigging wives who ride off of daddy's money, then hubby's political career do.

Dear MSM, Thanks for your lunch, and yes, I am eating it.

Gamergate for Non-Virgins

October 25, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Confused about Gamergate?
Wondering why this is breaking into the MSM?
Should you care? Should you not care?
Never fear, the Captain explains Gamergate here!

Stay Frosty Boys

October 27, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Stay the freak frosty.

Dear China, Here's Where Your Money Went

October 28, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

In a previous post I calculated the statistical causes of the US federal deficit and debt. It was to answer the debate, once and for all, whether it was military spending or social spending that was the primary cause of our financial woes. When the statistics were tallied it turned out nearly 2/3rds of the deficit/debt was caused by social spending and only 25% military spending.

However, while this addresses the budgetary issues facing the country (which will be summarily ignored), it does nothing to address the counterparty to this deficit spending. Namely, our creditors. Specifically China.

The whole idea of "lending" money is that you do so expecting to not only get your principal back, but some interest income as well. And the way your debtor will pay you back is by taking the proceeds from the loan and investing it in a venture that will generate a rate of return in excess of the interest rate being charged.

However, let's focus on the key word of that sentence - "invest."

To sane people or people who care about getting their money back the quality of the loan is based on the quality of the investment that money is used to finance. Therefore it behooves the lender to analyze where the proceeds of the loan are going to go. This was my primary job during my 15 year tenure in banking. My job was to take loan applications, analyze their creditworthiness and determine whether they proceeds would not only be invested wisely, but generate a rate of return that would satisfy the debt obligations.

Out of the thousands of loans I analyzed a majority of them were bad investments. Another real-estate development in an already-oversaturated market. A loan to my boss' buddies with no collateral. Sports bars for ex-jocks going through midlife crises. And horse hobby farms for the trophy wives of insolvent faux "businessmen." There was even the famous "cereal bar" where our money would be used to purchase milk (which does not make a good form of collateral). But out of all these horrendous and idiotic investments, they are nowhere near as bad as the US government bonds you Chinese got suckered into buying. And the reason is simple:

The majority of the money you lent us was not invested. It was merely pissed away.

Consider a statistical break down of where your money was "invested" here in the US.

The Military 26%

One of the largest components of the US budget, your money was used to buy weapons and pay soldiers. Sadly, the military is not an investment. Matter of fact, it's quite the opposite. The military is PURPOSELY designed to destroy things. Not build them. You will not get a return on your investment from the US military.

Social Security/Medicare 33% combined

The reason I combined these two is because of the delicious irony of how your money was "invested." Social Security is paid to people who are retired or are disabled. In other words, they don't work. You are merely paying these people to live with no expectation of a return on your investment. Worse still (and doubly ironic) is Medicare is basically paying to keep old people alive who are about to die anyway. Instead of investing in the "youth" who might have the capacity to earn the money to pay you back, you are investing in old people who not only DON'T work, but will die soon.

Income Security 16%

Oh, you know how I said if you invested in the youth you'd at least stand a shot at getting some modicum of return on your investment? Yeah, well there are some young people out there who could work, but they're lazy and just don't want to. That or they so spectacularly screwed up their lives by having children they can't afford or some other such life-destroying move that they're too pre-occupied living off of others to be concerned about paying you back. Besides, this is the dumbest segment of our society and they frankly probably don't know the different between China and Japan.

Health 9%

Remember those lazy people I was telling you about? Yeah, the ones that don't work? Well they tend to have children at higher rates than their responsible citizen counterparts, and so they need health care. You could make the argument that these kids will grow up and maybe get jobs, thereby giving you a slim hope you might recoup a fraction of your investment, but a visit to one of our fine trailer parks, ghettos or barrios will show you the cycle of poverty these unfortunate children are condemned to.

Education 4%

You may have your final hopes pinned on that a small percentage (4%) of your money went into education and training. This should make people more productive, get them higher paying jobs, and thus provide the tax base to finally pay you guys back.

Sadly, your hopes are misplaced, because unlike our Chinese and Asian counterparts, the majority of American education does NOT go to productive endeavors, but worthless frivolous ones, specifically the humanities and liberal arts. The result is not only an industry that indoctrinates our youth into socialism and sloth, but gives them no real practical skills that will help generate economic growth. You won't get your money back here, but at least Tina the Suburbanite Princess got her Masters in Transgendered 13th Century Sculpture Fairy Studies. Thanks hard working Chinese people!

We could go on, but that accounts for nearly all of the money you've lent us. And as you noticed none of these things even come close to "investments."

The sad truth is that America did not "invest" the money you lent us. It bribed. It bribed our parasitic class to vote for democrat politicians, keeping them in power and preventing them from having to work real jobs (perhaps you are aware of our president's complete lack of real-world work?) Oh sure, our leftist politicians say they're "investing," but that is nothing more than a co-opted word used to hide their true intentions.

The issue is what are you going to do about it? I personally am shocked China, let alone anybody in the world lends the US government (and by association) our parasitic class money. What is literally happening is we are essentially enslaving hundreds of millions of Chinese. We have you work the menial jobs Americans are too lazy to work themselves, while ~~stealing~~ borrowing money to pay for those goods and services. Thus the welfare mother doesn't work, but she still gets Chang at the Samsung plant to build her a nice new smart phone, bought and paid for with money you gave her via the US federal government.

What the Chinese people and its government have to understand is that it is unlikely you will ever be paid back the money you lent us. Not because the US government chooses not to pay you back, but because the population of the US is decaying and declining to the point they are incapable of working up the economic growth to pay you back. I can only hope (and grant permission to anybody who wants to) to translate this into Cantonese and/or Mandarin, and would love to hear arguments why the Chinese people are making such a horrible investment.

This post is now on Reddit. Land of "This Guys An Idiot Because He Disagrees With Me." Would be horrible if a Cappylanche were to happen and it gets voted up.

Obama and the Magic Gini

October 29, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

If you don't know what the Gini Coefficient is, that's alright. It just means you have a life. But for the sake of efficiency, the Gini coefficient is a number between 0 and 1. A country with a Gini coefficient of 0 means all income is distributed equally. And a country with a Gini coefficient of 1 means one person makes all the money. This measure was created to show just how skewed income distribution was and, truthfully, to make disparity income distributions "evil" or "bad" in the eyes of a naive public.

Sadly, despite Obama's ideologue-strength desire to redistribute income, he's only managed to (in the classic sense) make the rich get richer while the poor gets poorer. The Gini coefficient has been going up as it always has.

Technically that bold faced lie (the richer get richer and the poor gets poorer) is a lie. Both rich and poor are getting richer over time. It's just that the rich get richer faster because they have the majority of monies and can therefore capitalize on early investments in successful ventures. But still, as a relative measure, the poor continue to lose "relative" ground to the rich. And if you couldn't get an American-hating communist like Obama to lower the Gini coefficient, you're not going to find anyone to do it.

The World Needs More Assholes

October 29, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Remember, real consultants will lie to you.
Assholes tell you the truth.

If you got a problem in life, or just a question you want a second opinion on, visit the ole Captain's consulting division:

Asshole Consulting.

What Corporate Taxes REALLY Are in the US

October 30, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

As you know I tire of debating with people who are not only uninformed, but ideologues who have no problems lying in order to advance their cause. This is one of the reasons I no longer listen to the news, and instead pull data as my primary source of information and opinion forming. One such debate was the issue of "what corporations really pay in taxes."

The right screams bloody murder pointing at the stated corporate tax rate of 40%.
The left screams "loopholes," talks about GE and Google's 0% tax rate, and then claim the "effective tax rate" is 12%.

I know both sides of the argument, and know what is the correct approach to it:

"You shouldn't even have a corporate tax you idiots. You want jobs. You want to attract investors. Get rid of this cancer that is holding the US back from its full potential."

Regardless of philosophical arguments about whether there should even be a corporate tax, I decided to look up once and for all the REAL corporate tax rate. I'm not listening to the right fretting over the statutory 40% rate. And I'm CERTAINLY NOT listening to some bogus academian study made of whole cloth by biased socialists "professors." I simply took "Corporate Profits BEFORE Taxes," subtracted "Corporate Profits AFTER Taxes," divided it by the former and calculated the REAL AND TRUTHFUL tax rate the US has had since 1929.

Got it?

Before taxes. After taxes. Subtract and divide.

"I get the disks, you drop Walsh."

So here it is ladies and gentlemen.

The Real Corporate Tax Rate
Source: FRED Database
100.00%
80.00%
60.00%
40.00%
20.00% 0.00%
-20.00%
-40.00%
01/01/20
01/01/30
01/01/40
01/01/50
01/01/60
01/01/70
01/01/80
01/01/90
01/01/00
01/01/10

So that's it. That's what all the hubbub is about. The current effective tax rate is about 22% and has been trending down since the 1930's.

Naturally the left (if they ever read this blog) would seize on this claiming that corporate taxes in the glorious 50's was around 41% and we were booming then. And naturally the right will seize on this saying 22% is more than the 0% leftists would like everything to think corporations pay.

But I'm going to try to introduce some reality into the situation as to why corporate taxes have been going down so that we MIGHT actually leave a better economy to our future;

Foreign competition.

And we're not talking about foreign competition from manufacturing or other economic competitors. We're talking about competition from other governments. Specifically, governments are competing for investors and corporations as they ALL lower their corporate taxes to lure them.

This is why you have Burger King merging with Tim Horton's. This is why you have Medtronic leaving for Ireland. This is why corporations have trillions parked overseas in Bermuda, the Caymans, Singapore and elsewhere. Because there ARE greener pastures.

I'm not going to call for the argument that the US eliminate its corporate taxes forever. It will fall on deaf ears of the left that are either too lazy to think this through or are too wedded to their ideology to have an independent thought or intellectual honesty. It is also an argument that doesn't need to be preached to the right-wing choir.

I will point out however a rare phenomenon that you won't see very often - governments competing.

In this one rare instance, governments are acting like private sector companies and actually serving their customers well. Governments want money, they want a tax base, they want a booming economy and some of them are waking up to what Hong Kong and Singapore woke up to nearly 50 years ago. MAKE IT ATTRACTIVE FOR INVESTORS TO MOVE AND INVEST THERE. Because of this some companies are scoring jobs. And not just "jobs," higher paying white collar jobs that typically come with relocating a headquarters there. This, like free markets always do, benefits the customers. The customers of which are the citizens of the countries lowering corporate taxes.

This is not complicated, complex, high end economics.

This is simple 3rd grade logic.

And the fact the left in this country is blinded with envy and hate of "corporations" to the point they can't see the benefits of getting rid of corporate taxes means half the population we're dealing with are not as smart as 3rd graders.

related

The Father Could Not Be Reached for Comment

October 31, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Again, I'm always concerned about whether the advice I give is dated because its origins come from the 80's and 90's. Then I see this and that she has two children that will continue to wreak psycho behavior well into the future and I know that the future of my career is secure. The world will desperately need Asshole Consulting well into the future.

MGTOWgate, AKA "Sorry Ladies, MGTOW Isn't Binary"

October 31, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

There's Gamergate, Elevatorgate, Atheism+, and to continue the overuse of the word "gate," let's just call this observation I've had "MGTOWgate."

Of course there really isn't a "MGTOWgate" in the normal sense of the suffix, however I have noticed something similar happening to various MGTOW sites that parallel the concern troll attacks of the aforementioned "gate-scandals." Specifically, a spurt of feminists and some non-feminists writing about MGTOW's and the MGTOW movement, even claiming there's a WGTOW movement.

Regardless of their individuality, their central "thesis" or argument is one of questioning the veracity and commitment of MGTOW's. That men can't and therefore never really do "give up women completely." Sure enough they point to the MGTOW's that have women in their lives, admit they do find women attractive, occasionally "crack" and ask a girl out, etc. And sure enough they say, "LOOK! LOOK! SEE!!! THEY'RE NOT GOING THEIR OWN WAY!" And with 100% predictability call hypocrisy on the movement, hoping to convince others it's fraudulent.

There's just one problem ladies.

MGTOW isn't binary. It's a spectrum

What I mean by that is that if you go your own way you don't COMPLETELY eliminate women out of your life. It's not like one day you're chasing after women non-stop and then the next quit cold turkey ne'er to see the tatas of a woman again. You simply re-prioritize your priorities where women are no longer a...well...priority. ie. - they're not COMPLETELY off the list, they're just knocked down the list some.

The result is something more of a scale or a spectrum. Yes you do have men who have truly given up on women and really don't have them in any capacity in their lives. But the majority of them (I would surmise and have observed) are not going to pass up an easy fling, a true love of their life, or a date that happens naturally and with little effort. The real issue is the effort men put into the pursuit of women and that is where most critics (authentic or not) in "MGTOWgate" are operating on a flawed premise.

To provide you with empirical evidence of MGTOW's being a scale and not an binary designation, consider three bits of data.

The first one is an informal survey I did with readers about what percent of their free time they spent pursuing women at 5 year intervals across their lives. My theory was that as men got older, they tired of the chase, not to mention learned they were led on about the quality of women available in the population, thus becoming disincentived. My hunch proved true as men spent a peak of 25% their free time at the age of 25 chasing girls and in 3 decades time spent only 2%.

The second thing is the decline in the rate (or increase in the age of) marriage. People can blame it on the recession. People can blame it on student loans. People can blame it on whatever they want. The truth is since it is men that do 100% of the proposing the demand for marriage has dropped and men have statistically and empirically gone their own way at least partially.

And the third bit of data is a little anecdote from last night when I went swing dancing for the first time in nearly 6 months. 10 years ago you would have seen me and my crew out at least three nights a week asking no less than 15 girls each to dance. Nearly half of those women would be asked out. And as statistics would have it, it was very common several girls would be asked out by multiple guys in my crew the same night.

But not last night.

It was just me and one other buddy of mine.

I mustered up the strength to ask three girls to dance and had the intention of asking out none.

My buddy looked around, but was not inspired enough by any gal to ask them to dance (and he's single!).

He hasn't sworn off women. And I certainly haven't either. But the effective reality women get to face is that it's MGTOW none the less. Interest in women was 10% of what it used to be as we were more interested in our smart phones and grabbing dinner later that night than dancing or dating.

The point is, so sorry ladies. So so terribly sorry. MGTOW is not like becoming a born again Christian, quitting drugs cold turkey, or joining AA. It's not a yes or no, an either or, a 1 or 0. It's the sad reality that men are making logical and economic choices as to how to spend their finite time, and putting women down further and further in terms of life's priorities when history and empirical data show they don't provide an adequate rate of return. However, women are rarely kicked off the list completely. Therefore when you see a MGTOW on a date, getting some play, or has some broad on the back of his motorcycle he isn't a fraud or a hypocrite. He's a guy who's living his own life on his terms and STILL slaying it with the ladies.

Which is what women have always found attractive in the first place.

Remember MGTOW's. Life is more more than just getting a motorcycle and "going." You need to plan for the future. Consider purchasing "Bachelor Pad Economics." The financial bible 4 out of 5 MGTOW's swear by!

Economics Proves Women Do Not Like Sex as Much as Men

November 1, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Aaron's Church of Debauchery and Awesomeness
The Black Man's Guide Out of Poverty
Why security guard is the greatest job in the world
Cappy's failed radio show "Ask Whitey"
Stop being a lazy ass and stop looking for short cuts in life
How economics proves women DO NOT like sex just as much as men Troll of the Weak has a "Masters in Statistics" but doesn't know how to use it

and MORE

in this episode of The Clarey Podcast.

Related to the show for reference:

And Happy Halloween from the Captain!

Conservative Idiots Who "Protest the Vote"

November 3, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

My brief and curse-laden political analysis for 2014;

The Benefit of the 67% Dead Club

November 4, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Many of you care/cared about this midterm election of 2014.

I didn't.

And this was the first election I truly didn't care about.

Want to know why?

I'm already dead Blythe. 67% dead to be precise.

Like my stepdad who is about 90%, I also realized that I am on the opposite side of 50%. My family's genetics is not that great. Nearly every male has died of cancer, alcoholism or stroke, and if any of us Clarey's make it past 60 it's a god damned miracle. And thus at 40, I'm 67% dead.

This permits me a huge amount of levity, freedom, and intellectual honesty because I no longer have to care. Naturally, the fact I have no children allows me this levity, but in the end, it is a benefit. My time on this planet is for the majority, over. And since I have no children I have no long term vested interest in it or what happens to it. So I'm allowed the precious gift of merely watching it without the attachment or concern that most of you other people have to it.

I enjoy people suffering.
I enjoy people suffering their mistakes.
I enjoy watching the limitless single moms and dead beat dads of my generation try to scramble and salvage their lives that are beyond repair as they live vicariously through their underperforming children.
I enjoy the liberal arts majors PANICALLY realizing their financial lives are fucked.

It's great! I cannot think of a better, more poetic justice and gift that life could grant me.

But the issue is simply this. How many of you are part of the "50%+ Dead" crowd?

You see, I know a lot of you still hold on, still believe, still hope that western civilization will recoup, recover, and hopefully repopulate this country and other European countries, to bring back some kind of "glorious" industrial empire era of revitalization, but it isn't going to happen. This one awesome, incredible, TRULY "miracle" of western civilization will be a mere blip in the grand scheme of human history as the savages and ideologues and religious fanatics out-populate us and your (beloved) children. It's merely a fact, it's merely a consequence, it's merely an actuarial reality.

But, while you're here and there's nothing you can do about it. Why don't you at least permit yourselves the favor of enjoying the decline?

Seriously, if you're already half dead, I think you're in the clear. The United Sates is still strong enough to last another 40 years or so because of the herculean efforts of the WWII generation. And before we get too down on ourselves, let us remind ourselves that most of the world is nowhere near as grand as we are. China may be growing, Russia may be invading, but in the end, both countries are incredibly corrupt and therefore their currencies flawed. In short, the US dollar will not suffer a "quick death," but rather an elongated one that you can (hopefully) more or less "bank on."

It's the younger generations that have to worry as they're the ones that are going to be left with the bag. My non-fellow baby boomers will die in 10 years. I'll be dead in 20. But that's only after we've collected TRILLIONS in social security and medicare from their naive asses. And for once I'll grant the baby boomers a bit of forgiveness. It was the Millennials that voted Obama in twice. It was them who were pro-socialism.

I say take advantage of them!

They voted to give you more money at their naive expense. You might as well take it.

Ergo, it's great to be 67% dead. You lived a great life in a great country, with standards of living supplicated and inflated due to government borrowing. The brilliance is that the youth voted it upon themselves and will pay for our mistakes and their ignorance.

Enjoy that decline people. Enjoy that freaking decline!

American Bachelors' Financial Legacy Problem

November 5, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Friend #1.

Multi-millionaire, 52 years old, drives a POS import like I do. Maybe spends $200 a week on social activities. Gets his clothes from goodwill or the veterans store. His only goal in life is to enjoy coffee with his older friends while teaching himself French and Mandarin on the internet.

Friend #2.

My pilot buddy you are all familiar with. Probably worth a couple million. 43 years old, no wife, no kids, and is completely dedicated to his company. Mentioned something about a family...maybe...probably not...but he's more obsessed about cigars and buying a boat that a wife or rugrats.

Friend #3

Senior pilot who makes over six figures and consults on the side in the aviation world. No wife, no children, 46 and just hits the gym while traveling the world on his perks. Owns a nice house in a fine suburb, obsesses over his cash flow even though he is in better financial shape than most any one I know.

Which leads me to my observation.

With more and more men refusing to marry and breed, there is a permanent "Bachelor Class" forming. However, an interesting aspect of this "Bachelor Class" is that they are without a doubt the most "wealth forming" class in the world.

They have no children.
They have no wives.
They have no divorce.
They have no alimony.
They all make damn good money and with all that free time
Are pursuing entrepreneurial ventures

And alas, all those variables and traits mean...

They have a ton of cash.

I am not rich by any means, but even with my meager earnings, the fact I have no children or wife means I at least have SOME savings. Pro-rate that into the future and when I die, heirless, there will still be some significant funds to be bequeathed.

Thus, while everybody is focused on paying off their student loans, getting out from underneath their mortgage, finally closing their alimony, etc. etc., there is this "elite" and "numerous" bachelor class that I (conservatively) estimate will have easily $4 trillion in wealth when they die to pass on.

So who, precisely, will inherit it?

Well, that depends.

I personally plan to split my "estate" between my girlfriend who has treated me kindly and a little varmint like creature that has endeared me to her childish antics.

My millionaire real estate friend is so indifferent and complacent he intends to let it fall to the state.

My pilot buddy hasn't thought that far, but that's the whole point...

You bachelors need to think about what you're going to do with the wealth you've obviously built beyond what you can consume.

This is one of those rare problems you "wish you had," but still, your decision today on how to bequeath that money will have an affect on a world that will be after your death. Ergo, any moral man will want to make the right decision, ensuring his life-time-currency would be put to the most noble use. Do you donate it to the local "pink ribbon campaign" that has yet to solve...anything? Do you donate it to the local food shelf to feed people too incompetent to support themselves? How about your alma mater that will brainwash the youth on rape culture and socialism? Or do you donate it to some third world African country charity that has never yet solved one problem on that continent?

The answer is very simple.

Give it to close, loved ones you genuinely cherished in life or burn it.

I don't know about you, but there are very few people that deserve my money, let alone the excess money I've earned through the pain and agony I spent learning to earn such money. And bar a GENUINE charity like St. Jude's Children's program, I'm going to give it to loved ones in my life who were noble, honest and true. Since this is such a small list of people and said monies run the risk of spoiling them, that means there would still be a significant amount of money left over. And with no obviously deserving heir to it, I will most likely burn it.

You must look at what you suffered as an American bachelor. You're privileged because you're male. You pay more in taxes for children that aren't yours. You're accused on sexual harassment if you merely look at a girl. And you're supposed to work all the hard, risky, dangerous and math-impaired jobs while the opposite number complains about a "wage gap." It's not just the ungratefulness, but hypocrisy and parasitism of society that disqualifies them from deserving any of this $4 trillion so it's upon you (and all bachelors) to set up a will that ensues the money only goes to deserving people, leaving none for the society that viewed you as a personal financial slave and whipping boy.

It may sound wasteful and insane, and certainly you could find enough deserving people of your post-mortem estate. But if it comes to it I'd rather have my money burn than give it to some welfare WIC receiving single mom of 4 who thinks she's entitled to 4 decades worth of my toiling. You must also consider your future finances as such.

Aaron Clarey is a mean bachelor who has the gall to spend all of his money on him. He thinks just because he worked hard he deserves all of his money when it was purely white male privilege that got him where he is today. He wrote really stupid books for men including "Bachelor Pad Economics," "Worthless" and "Enjoy the Decline," all patriarchal and math-based. You can also listen to his hate filled, sexist, racist, bigoted podcast here or watch his politically incorrect youtube videos here.

Politics Simplified

November 5, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Just had to share this one:

Calling All Black Lieutenants and Agents in the Field

November 6, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Greetings Lieutenants!

As many of you know I'm writing "The Black Man's Guide Out of Poverty" and it is coming along "swimmingly."

That being said I'm at the part of the book where I cannot speak from authority about economics, finance, politics, etc., and need the advice, recommendations, and input from black men.

Specifically, I am interested in what it is like growing up in the black community and what the blow back is like if you dare to espouse conservative thoughts, libertarian values, question whether socialism is working, etc. etc. Is there social ostracization, are you accused of "being white" or an "Uncle Tom." What is done to keep you in line and in check?

I've heard merely anecdotes and stories, but nothing approaching multiple, in depth testimonials that would provide me some information to competently work from.

If you'd be so kind, please feel free to post your thoughts in the comments section or if you wish to remain private, e-mail the ole captain at CAPTcapitalism (not CAPTAINcapitalism) *at yahoo

Your efforts and observations are appreciated.

Many thanks,

Cappy

Viva Pinochet!

November 6, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

A warm fuzzies stories when a capitalist put a loud mouth leftist college student in her place.

Book Review - Welcome to the Divide

November 6, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Welcome to the Divide by SP Daley is without a doubt the most unique book I have read in a long time. It was given to me by Mr. Daley, and like all books I get in the mail I was suspicious if this was going to be a good book, or somebody's half attempt at a book with no clear point or purpose. It wasn't until I had a flight and knew my cell phone would not last the trip that I broke it out and started reading it. And I was thankful I did.

At first I was annoyed with his writing style which consisted of the narrator using "etc., etc. etc." excessively and other oddities such as referring to himself in the third person. Also at the beginning the hero refers to himself as "we" when it is only one person. If you were under the impression Mr. Daley was a first time author, you'd be within your rights to think he was a 24 year old trying to be "cute" with these antics. But they are not antics at all, but very much planned and key to the development of the rest of the book.

Once you "get it" and realize the role it plays, the book takes your mind on a truly intellectually engaging exercise. Not only are you reading a story about a near future-bordering-economic-collapse sort of tale, but one of incredibly deep and heavy philosophy, science, technology, economics and politics. It also has action which moves the story along, and an incredible amount of creativity when it comes to plot, character development, and surprises.

If this description still leaves you wondering what this book is about, it's because it is that unique and hard to describe. It is about individualism. It is about freedom. But it is also heavily meshed in with psychology, technology and philosophy, making your mind say, "wow, just fucking wow! I had never thought of that before!" I also do not want to ruin your reading experience by even running the risk of spoiling any part of the book for you, so am also being purposely vague. Yes, I did like it that much.

Still there were two drawbacks to the book.

One, sometimes the author gets WAAAAY too in depth about his "binary" theory. For the reader it's too detailed, but then you have to realize, "holy cow, this guy had to come up with this idea as the author and thought it through to this extent!" Still, this impression aside may it a bit Ayn Randy with a bit of excessive detail.

Two, the author is too smart. This meant I had to reread things several times to truly understand what the hero or the antagonist were saying or what was going on. Between the philosophy, the author's own personal theory, and the neural-networking of human communes that was going on in the book, I at least reread 40 pages of the book to make sense of it.

These minor problems aside, the book is one I recommend as a "must" if you want your brain to be challenged and imbued with new ideas and thoughts. It may not be for everybody as you might have different tastes than I do, but I have not been that intellectually challenged since college. You can find "Welcome to the Divide" on Amazon and visit Mr. Daley's site here.

Male vs. Female Savings

November 7, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

In Bachelor Pad Economics I flat out state that women are worse with money than men. They spend more, they spend more on worthless stuff, and they invest less.

And ohhhh the hell did I catch.

Of course I was expecting this because Bachelor Pad Economics was a book based in truth. And there's no point in time you'll catch more hell than when speaking the truth.

The problem though was that I was going based off of my now-approaching 20 years of researching and studying economics. Not only does this present the problem that I may have recalled some information incorrectly (and women may actually have been the ones better with their money...HAR HAR HAR!!!), but that this fact may have changed in 20 years. And so, being the good economist that I am, I went online to the St. Louis Federal Reserve to look up the savings rate for men and women.

Just one minor problem.

They don't break it down between men and women. Could have swore they did.

This then required that I track down the data that I could have sworn was out there. And as is many things on the internet, whatever data series I once found was now lost to the fates of time.

Thankfully, I found some relatively new data that proved what I believed to be true. Women are indeed worse than men when it comes to savings and preparing for retirement. However, if you're the visual type, here's some nice little charts making the point.

There were other charts they threw in that were irrelevant but purposely made to make women feel better, but the moral of the story is two fold.

1. Women need to save more (which I'm sure most female readers of Cappy Cap already know, and probably are doing much better than the average bear when it comes to finances)

2. For everybody all upset that I dared to say in Bachelor Pad Economics that women had worse finances than men, I'm sorry, it's true. And I'm not sorry in the slightest truth upsets you. I find it refreshing actually.

Absolutely Brilliant

November 7, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Best political cartoon ever.

Silver and Gold are NOT Investments

November 10, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Originally set out to make a video to point out how gold and silver are not investments, but it become a much more important overall lesson about precisely what is an "investment" versus what is speculation.

What Snow Days Tell Us About American Education

November 10, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Arguably my greatest rant against teachers and the public schools. (language warning)

Emotional Prostitution

November 11, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

A very interesting interview/podcast by Matt Forney where he interviews Chloe Luv, a phone sex operator about her profession. What's particularly interesting is how men use her services more for emotional and psychological support than sex, providing a unique psychological insight into the world of quasi-prostitution.

On a related note, original posts will be a little sparse until I'm done writing "The Black Man's Guide Out of Poverty." Regular hate-filled ranty charty economic goodness will continue once the book is done.

Feminism Thrives on the Absolute Value of Attention

November 12, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

It is now a daily event, if not twice a day event, I get an e-mail about the latest antics of feminism and female leftists. It is so common and so bizarre that not only am I no longer shocked, but I come to expect it. I also tire of writing about it because it's as if you're getting bum rushed with a tidal wave of non-stop, never-ending, feminist crazy and hate. Merely pointing it out and citing it as an example of just how evil and damaging these people are seemingly does nothing to stop them, let alone raise the country's awareness to this genuine and real cancer in society.

Because of this I've eschewed highlighting the latest "crazy feminist" and dedicated my time to more productive things. However, as my brain is wont to do, I looked past the crazy and finally figured out what is driving it. And it is the female desire for attention.

Take a look at the latest or more common "antics" of feminism.

There's your standard slut walks.
There's the obsession with creating new genders
There's Lena Dunham's child molestation which feminists have the gall to defend.
And let's not forget the "zaniest" antic yet, menstrual painting.

Any sane person who can remove him/herself from the political horseblinders, step back and look at these things will accurately and truthfully assess these things for what they are - a mental illness.

These are not sane women "expressing their opinion," or "liberating themselves." They are mentally damaged individuals that need (but are perhaps beyond) help. The only reason they get away with it is they hide behind "feminism" and people's fear if they criticize them they'll be accused of (GASP!) sexism. And so society must tolerate this scourge on itself.

However, if we look under the hood we see what's really going on.

Women, feminist or not, are driven primarily by one thing - attention. Attention from society so that it may secure them social acceptance and security within society as well as the resources from a male provider.

Mentally healthy women do this by being good at socializing, perhaps pursuing a career in a legitimate field, but when it comes to finance and romance, they secure a husband by being as pretty as possible, staying in shape, and using their beauty. This take effort and hard work.

Working out
Dieting
Being attentive to her husband
Offering something of value to anybody who would court/marry/interact with her

They know it's an exchange and if they're to succeed in life, they will have to work at it, offering something of value that is in demand.

However, mentally UNHEALTHY women fail to do this. They do not want to put in the effort to be beautiful, attractive, productive or just generally offering something of value to society. They are narcissists believing they are entitled to the same standards of living and success as their mentally healthy, harder-working counterparts. And this goes a long way explaining why:

Feminists tend to be ugly
Feminists tend to be angry
Feminists (despite their claim of independence) invariably demand some form of government support or charity

They are just too damn lazy to work out, work hard, let alone be altruistic enough to think about what other people want.

Now, the problem facing feminists, despite their demands (and relative success in getting) for government money, is that society, especially men just refuse to go along. Yes, the government can tax me, but I don't have to hire you and your worthless Gender Studies Degree. Yes, the government can make me pay for your fatherless child's school lunch, but it can't make me date you. And so while they may receive a government check, that is all they get. The rest of society rejects them.

The problem for feminists is that deep down inside, no matter what they tell themselves and how many mind-warping classes they take, they're still women. And women are genetically programmed to live off of attention. And since society is not giving them any "good attention" (in the form of men being attracted to them, being invited to clubs, getting job offers in real careers, etc.) they have to go and get "bad attention." And thus their insane, mentally-ill antics.

In being so outlandish with their demands, actions, behaviors and antics, they automatically beget attention from society. Of course it's not of a healthy or good variety - it's disgust and revulsion. But at least it's attention. Add to it the fact this attention is critical of their antics, it plays directly into their deluded world of being "oppressed" and "patriarchy," giving credit and agency to their one and only thing they have in life - their religion, feminism. But no matter what elaborate mental acrobatics they execute, let us be clear what all this is - nothing but attention whoring.

This leads me to the final conclusion of my little epiphany:

What if we were to just not pay any attention to the latest disgusting, "cutting-edge" attention-whoring gimmick feminists come up with next? Instead of ROK, and Uncle Bern linking to or talking about some idiot article at XO Jane or Salon we just talked philosophy instead? Instead of me linking to another spoiled, delusional 25 year old Manhattan nepotist daughter feminist writing for NBC, I just threw up some economic charts instead? What if we just took out all the oxygen in the room and deprived these feminists of the attention they so desperately desire?

No doubt this is impossible as in a country of 300 million "menstrual painting" is going to prove too tempting to resist criticizing for 275 million. But my larger point is one of accurately identifying the problem so that we may find an effective solution. Shaming them only fans their flames and allows them to self-rationalize being a "victim." Ignoring them, however, deprives them of the only interaction they get from the rest of the sane, healthy, and happy world. Leaving them with a government check and each other to squander their lives on.

Episode #71 of The Clarey Podcast

November 13, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

When girls say, "they say." Who is "they" and why should I listen to them?
How Giada is the founder of "They Say"
A review of the movie "Interstellar" where (surprise, surprise) the one black astronaut dies
The psychology and economics of the phone sex operator industry
50% are posers who abuse the Manosphere
Cappy receives a "mysterious" $100 donation
Troll of the Weak exposes how people really do have mental illnesses
Menstrual painting is all too common 73 year old "drama teacher" busted for porn past

AND MORE

in THIS EPISODE of The Clarey Podcast!

IMPORTANT! - Podomatic is having issues with their servers so try iTunes or Stitcher!

From Our Black Agent in the Field

November 14, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

In my research for The Black Man's Guide Out of Poverty I get some consultation and commentary from our agents in the field that I deem worth sharing. This is one of those instances where you get to see the trail a man has traveled and appreciate the thought process, but also the adherence to intellectual honesty and reality.

My beliefs did not change until around 2012 when I was around 26. It wasn't a Road to Damascus type of moment, rather it was gradual. I have the personality type of always wanting to be logically consistent, wanting to be right, open to differing beliefs and finding the truth. However, I was always open to the possibility of being wrong about something and was willing to change my views. Therefore, while I had left wing views, I tried to logically defend them and limited name calling of opponents.

I was interested in economics as a college student and was always critical of Marxism and state ownership of capital. My left wings views gravitated more to left wing anarchism. I knew that Marxism didn't work, however I thought there was something better than the free market.

After being exposed to the manosphere and reading "The Myth of Male Power" by Warren Farrell and "Who Stole Feminism?" by Christina Hoff Sommers, I learned about the flaws of feminism. I thought to myself, "if The Left is wrong about Marxism and Feminism and these are two of the leading ideologies of The Left, what else are they wrong about?" The answer to that question is almost everything.

As previously mentioned, I liked to read so I decided to read writers on The Right. I started reading Thomas Sowell, who has a reputation in the black community as being an Uncle Tom and an apologist of racism. The first books I read by him were "Basic Economics", "Civil Rights: Rhetoric or Reality" and "Economic Facts and Fallacies". His arguments were persuasive and I finished reading those books thinking to myself "holy shit, he's right!" I read other free market economic books solidifying in my mind that the free market was the best economic system. If anything, those books demolished popular notions of the left e.g. we are tabula rasas, differences in outcome are solely due to discrimination, government is the solution, etc.

It also seemed to me that liberal policies did not work. Every 2-4 years the Democrats would come along call the Republicans racists, blacks would vote for the Democrats and after Election Day, Democrats would not care about issues affecting the black community. It was a predictable cycle. However, blacks would not vote for Republicans because they were seen as racists. Nothing really changed their minds since Republicans did not seem interested in getting the black vote anyway. I still cannot think of three liberal policies that have actually improved the lives of blacks.

I also looked at the results. The most liberal cities in the United States were all upper middle class and white with high rents (due to rent control) ensuring that the poor and minorities couldn't live there e.g. San Francisco, Washington DC, Seattle, or lower income, filled with crime, poor schooling and mostly if not virtually all black or Hispanic, Detroit, Gary, IN, Chicago, etc. Cities under Democratic control the longest (e.g. Detroit) had the worst results. Liberal policies did not create the diverse, crime free, equal utopias that they promised. They seemed to care only about intentions. I had a debate a year ago with my white liberal roommate about the minimum wage. I argued that the minimum wage caused unemployment. He did not seem to care about the actual impact, only about the good intentions. And that is how liberals argue, based on their intentions, they do not care about the actual impact of these policies.

It is my belief that there is no such thing as an honest liberal, because if an honest liberal exists, then over time, he will eventually become libertarian or conservative.

I'm just ranting now. I hope that helps.

But How Do I Math?

November 15, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Yes, math is tough.

Another Damn Fine Podcast from the Black Brigade

November 16, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Another damn fine podcast by DT and the Man.

Plus some lazy Sunday linkage:

American Liberalism in particular has become nothing more than a secular religion based on so many leaps of faith it makes Islam and Christianity seem rational by comparison.

And another one from Ed.

Keep lowering the bar instead of treating them like equals.

A Russian American Alliance in response to my video of the same.

Undermining Private Property

November 17, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Permit yourself a bit of intellectual freedom.

And when I say "intellectual freedom," I mean for once just let your mature, logical, intellectually honest adult mind enjoy some thought without

1. Worrying about how leftists would respond
2. Worrying about how you'd defend this against leftists
3. Pulling up arguments tendered by the left that I would have to address should I wish to waste another second of my finite life doing so.

Just, for once, enjoy a true intellectual experience in economics where you are allowed to dedicate 100% of your thoughts towards the topic at hand, allowing us to have an adult conversation uninhibited or impaired with the childish and regressive brains of socialists.

Got rid of those concerns?

Good, here we go.

Private property, without a doubt, is one of, if not "the" most important thing when it comes to having economic growth and success. The reason is very simple - in order to incent people to work hard and thus produce economic growth they need to be allowed to keep the vast majority of the fruits of their labor. If they aren't they have no incentive to forfeit their finite and precious time in the form of labor because, frankly, it's nothing more than slavery.

We can see this not only in something as obvious as slavery, but even in communist or near-communist states. If I am taxed at 100% then what incentive do I have to work? And even if I'm taxed at 0%, but can't buy property or own anything, then I might as well have no income. This simple 5th grade logic is not only understood by...well...5th graders, but it has also played out empirically in the history of the world with the handful of communist regimes coming into existence...putting their populations into decades-worth of misery...before collapsing...but not without first killing more people in peacetime than any war ever could.

Because of this private property presents the greatest economic threat and greatest economic potential to the world's free societies. Do you protect it, enshrine it, defend it and advocate it as much as possible? Or do you punish it, destroy it, confiscate it, criminalize it, excoriate it and tax it as much as possible? The difference is the unrivaled economic success of the west and, well, the rest of the world.

To those of us capable of long term planning, delayed gratification, post-stage-one thinking, morality, or who just give a damn about the future of society (not to mention, know a little history), we are obviously huge champions of private property. But for those incapable of delayed gratification, post-stage-one thinking, morality or long term planning, the temptation of merely confiscating other people's property for their own personal advancement is just too tempting. And thus the problem facing democratic countries today - there's just too many of the later with the right to vote.

This has resulted in an interesting phenomenon where there's a tug of war between what I like to call the "producers" and the "parasites" because that's what they truly are. The "left" votes for more of other people's money, while the "right" merely votes to keep what's theirs. And thusly taxation levels ebb and flow in the western world from between 33% on the low end to 60% on the high end.

But before you celebrate paying "only" 36% of your property here in the US, it's important to clear the gunk from our eyes and take a fresh look at precisely what is "private property" and precisely how it is being undermined here in the US and elsewhere.

First, to any self-respecting individual, forking over nearly 40% of your life, wealth and labor to a state where 70% of it merely goes to bribe the parasites into voting for more of it is enraging. Emotional and intellectually dishonest arguments from the left aside, you don't owe 14 years of your 50 year career being a literal slave to other people too lazy to work. So right off the bat, the fact 36% of your life is being confiscated is enough to show you property private is being undermined.

Second, the sheer amount of effort that goes into obfuscating just how much of your property is being taken. When people think "property taxes" they usually think real estate. And usually this is such a finite example most people understand the fact you don't technically own your property because you perpetually rent it from the state (worse still, even the presumedly conservative North Dakotans went full-sheeple and refused permit themselves to TRULY own their own homes). But the truth of the matter is people do not understand precisely what property is. For it is not your house or your land or even the assets within your home.

Property in it's purest form is your time.

I've addressed this before, but there really is no such thing as your house or your XBox or your car. These are things merely composed and purchased with human time. You exchange your time in the form of labor for some "money." This "money" is nothing more than a tool, a claim on other people's time. You then pay various people to build you a home, a car or an XBox One. In short there would be no property, there would be no assets, if there was no human time. Ergo, "property" IS your time and what you do with it. Typically "what you do with it" is either generate income or purchase assets.

Therefore the cash in your bank account, the stocks in your brokerage account, the food in your fridge, and the house the fridge is sitting, EVERYTHING you've earned, made or saved by forfeiting your time is property.

What this means is that ALL taxation is on property. The divisions between "capital gains tax," "income tax," "sales tax," "dividend tax," and "estate tax" are merely semantics, obscuring and obfuscating the truth - that all taxes are taxes on your finite and limited time on this planet. All taxes are on your life via the tangible property you converted that life into. However, because people rarely think of property as they way they should, they remain clueless as to just how much their private property is undermined (much like normal people are clueless how withholding taxes work).

Finally, even if you did own your property outright, and there were no taxes on its creation, ownership, purchase or sale, the state further undermines private property in one huge regard - regulation.

Tell property owners who were willing to sell "their" to the Keystone pipeline they own it. Tell Duluth Metals they owned the $100 billion mine in Ely, Minnesota when the regulators constantly denied permits to drill.
And tell any home owner in the "republicanny" suburbs that they can build their own home without having some bored, tyrannical soccer mom or trophy wife city council member force a million unnecessary codes down their throats.

Even if you could theoretically and economically "own" your property good luck being able to use it as you see fit with a state that ultimately deems it "theirs."

The consequences of all this undermining and destruction of private property are what most of my readers can guess. There is slower economic growth. Less domestic investment. More capital flight. Lower labor force participation. And a general stagnation in standards of living. But it is important to know precisely, economically why, especially in the most simplified of terms - taxation in all of its forms is ultimately a tax on your ultimate private property - your finite life. And when people's lives are taxed, especially when used to pay for other people's lives, the deterrence to economic production is great and the economy suffers as it should.

Aaron Clarey is an evil, mean-spirited jerk who doesn't guard his words or care about people's feelings when writing or speaking. He's especially mean because he uses statistics, data, facts and empiricism, which causes many micro-aggressions and trigger warnings among social justice warriors and other parasites of society. He also has a hate-filled podcast, a hate-filled You Tube channel, and has lots of books specializing in White Male CIS Gendered Hate. When he's not oppressing minorities, he's running buses of nuns and pre-schoolers off the road with his large carbon-emitting SUV.

Look! I Made a Meme!

November 17, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Yes, yes, 4 years of college is all it took.

Glorious Hat!

November 18, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Many of you know I have "Glorious Hat!" However, you can get your own too and it's about that time because Christmas is coming up and they ARE REALLY NICE HATS.

I know you may be reluctant to wear it because it's political, but those placards are removable, making it a warm hat perfect for winter.

Anyway, Glorious Karl is selling them at a 2 for 1 in the build up to Christmas. Consider purchasing one for yourself or as a gift!

Who Started It?

November 18, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Again I ask the simple question - who started it?

"Single Mom's Ministry!"

November 18, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Well, be it "Jesus," "Obama" or "The State," long as it isn't a real man that holds them to standards, but just "forgives," doesn't judge, and just hands out money.

As the Patron Saint Name of Frick would say, "Cripes"

The "Joys" of Dating Christian Girls

November 18, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

I love Garfunkle and Oates

(language warning)

My Opinion on Shirtgate

November 18, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

This.

Japan - Keynesians 25 Year Wet Dream

November 18, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Japan really should be debunking every Keynesian and modern day economist out there from academia to government.

But I know, I know, it was never about economics. It was about politics.

Trouble at Harvard

November 19, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Oh nosies!

That's Not a Real Hike

November 19, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

A cute story about hiking a (HA! GET THIS!)

3 mile

2,000 foot peak!

Ooooo! Scary!!!!

Book Review - "The Uncivil War" by Taleeb Starkes

November 19, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

In preparation and research for my upcoming book "The Black Man's Guide Out of Poverty" I knew full well that even though I knew enough about economics, poverty, finance, and investing, I did not have the sociological, psychological, political or philosophical experiences of your average black man. To that end I enlisted the help various Black Agents in the Field of the Capposphere, but also purchased a book that was recommended by an individual I can't remember, "The Uncivil War" written by Taleeb Starkes.

I was looking forward to reading it because it had what seemed to be the combination of what I need. A black author, who grew up in the ghetto, who saw the light, and could convey to me not just the black male perspective, but the path of his thinking that led him out of poverty. This would then allow me to write some of the "transitional chapters" of my book from an educated standpoint, making a compelling argument that was relateable to my intended audience.

There was just one minor problem - it is the harshest thing I've ever read, making it overly harsh even for my extreme tastes.

The author makes no bones about it and purposely wrote it as such. "Nigger" (and nearly a score of permutations of the word) is by FAR the most common word in the book (and even in the subtitle). He mocks, berates, yells at, ridicules, and antagonize the segment of the black population he considers not blacks, but "niggers," and continues on for another 240 screeding and screaming pages. There were certainly segments and sections that were helpful for my purposes, but it quickly became obvious he doesn't care to solve the problems through an olive branch, but by identifying, villainizing and shaming the "nigger" subsegment of the black community out of existence. In other words, it is a damning testament and outright attack against ghetto or thug culture, indifferent if they actually listen, turn themselves around, or improve (he even has a letter at the end of the book dedicated as a "Memorandum to Niggers" where he explicitly says so).

While this may not have terribly helped in my research, it did provide some interesting ancillary benefits. One, you really do realize just what a show or a farce the ghetto/thug culture is. From believing your "independent" while collecting government checks, to buying designer clothes with money you don't have, to spending a prerequisite time in jail to earn "street cred" and "keep it real," it isn't anything to be glorified or envied. It's just a parasitic culture living off of the rest of the community. And the great lengths these delusional people go to convince themselves would be funny, if it were not so pathetic. Two, you realize the helplessness of it all. People are consciously choosing this life and not only choosing it, but protecting it even if it hurts them. Mr. Starkes cites multiple news articles in his book where a shooting, a beating, or some other such crime SPECIFICALLY WITHIN AND AGAINST the black community occurs, but "magically" there are no witnesses. Alas just as there are no "public witnesses" that corroborated the officer's account of the Marcus Brown killing, and thus many good people get to fear lawlessness living in the likes of Ferguson. But, three, even though many aspects of the book were depressing, hearteningly, there were some optimistic insights into the book. For example there IS definitely a group of people (simply referred to as "blacks" by Mr. Starkes) who are law abiding citizens. They want a better life, they do not hate whites or males, they are willing to work, and they LOATHE the costs they pay in terms of "black on black crime" or the "The Black Tax." Another example is how despite all their bravado and puffing of chests, thugs are indeed afraid of well armed, law abiding citizens in safe neighborhoods simply because such citizens WILL call the cops and WILL defend their territory. And yet another example was how thug culture is not "misunderstood" or "disadvantaged", but is indeed evil, deserving of hate, giving rise to the hope the rest of society might shame it like we do cancer or any other scourge of society. It was insights like these that made the book worth reading.

Still, these observations and insights aside, the book falls short if there was any underlying attempt to win over blacks who are sitting on the fence, and will certainly win no converts from Starkes' "nigger" category. It will simply enrage them. But, again, Starkes writing indicates he'd rather exterminate the thug culture than convert it and that's where his and my aims differ. Perhaps "The Black Man's Guide Out of Poverty" may win a few more converts than his book...perhaps even some converts that are merely younger versions of him. For Mr. Starkes admits that he too was once part of that ghetto culture.

You can find his book here at Amazon.

Episode #72 of The Clarey Podcast

November 19, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Cappy's "Southern Planation" story
Which Minnesota hospitals have the hottest nurses
A naughty nurse who played "Halo"
"Why don't podcasters like money?"
Will the blog/podcast/youtube world be destroyed by SJW's?
All the news is about government
Ignorant well-intended democrat voters
Two non-profit schleps are given The Clarey Test
The left will hold society back for their own sake

AND MORE

in THIS EPISODE of The Clarey Podcast

The Time Cappy Got Stuck in a Poetry Slam

November 20, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

(This is a book review, but the story I use to introduce it might be of some entertainment value)

There are only a few things I genuinely loathe and hate in this world.

One is split pea soup. No matter how much bacon you put in it, you are not going to get me to drink that 70's carpet green slop.

Two is theater. I do not like theater. I've attended more than several at the behest and begging of women and without fail they merely made me wish I hadn't wasted my life attending.

And the third is poetry.

I remember a long time ago an elderly Jewish friend of mine who would pay me to be his sober cab and I'd chauffeur him around the Twin Cities in the pursuit of younger women and booze. We were reasonably successful because he was charming and had decent game, but his skills unfortunately landed us in, of all things, a....

poetry slam.

He had hooked up with some young 20 something liberal arts type girls and they invited us to see them and their colleagues perform at some fleeting shithole some idiot artist tried to make a profitable "art business" out of on 1st Avenue in DT Minneapolis. We walked in and sure enough every imaginable stereotype was confirmed. Women with pits you knew weren't shaved. Men who would lose a fight against the women if there were to be a "Wrestlemania" in the venue. And above all else the poetry.

Oh the poetry.

I'd rather drink the 70's green split pea soup slop.

Nothing intelligent. Nothing insightful. And always, always, always political.

Add to that these 20 somethings (who no doubt were still living off of a subsidy from their parents) waxed poetically in such an arrogant, self-absorbed manner over garbage that would thankfully never be remembered by the world, and it was the biggest waste of time I ever spent trying to chase tail. Never would I ever attend a "poetry slam" again.

Inevitably I couldn't take it anymore because it WAS torturing my brain. So I excused myself, told my elderly Jewish buddy to call me when he needed me to pick him up, and headed to Lee's Liquor Lounge in the hopes of finding an ingot of a babe I may have missed the past 40 times.

Regardless, the point is I HATE poetry. I've never liked it, and I doubt I ever will. So you can imagine my joy when I was asked to review "The End of Ideology" a book by Blair Naso of ROK fame.

I was honest with him saying my time would have to be compensated for reading poetry and that I was not a fan of the genre at all. But still, he agreed and I read through a sampling of the book he sent me. And for split pea soup, it ain't bad.

Naturally if you're like me and DON'T like poetry, this is not the book for you. But if you are more of the artistic nature and DO like poetry, you will certainly want to spend the money on this instead of the cover charge for SJW, leftist, feminist, emo infested poetry slam.

It is written by a young man, and thusly many of the poems will relate to men. His "Online Dating" poem is pretty funny, "Daddy's Little Girl" is hilarious though dark, and I did enjoy the "Story from the Tavern." But there are also some dark and effective poems such as "I Killed a Man Today" the somberness, directness, and lack of emotion I very much appreciated.

Still, not my cup of tea, but if there are any poetry aficionados out there of the male persuasion, I'd strongly recommend Mr. Naso's work.

Racism in the Minneapolis Public Schools

November 20, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

But it's against whites, so it's OK.

Seriously, if you are a parent of a child and live in Minneapolis

GET OUT OF MINNEAPOLIS!

Here's How You Stop Rape, Ladies

November 20, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

I didn't wait 15 years, or 25, or 45. I got in my car and drove immediately over to the police station and told them what happened. I had a rape kit done, photos taken, and gave my statement. He was arrested, and eventually jailed. He is still in jail, thank goodness. He wasn't hard to find. Everyone knew him. I guess he didn't think that I would go to the police, and do so as quickly as I did, because when they arrested him he still had remnants of my DNA on him.

I'll just say it again for the cheap seats because I know the current hubbub about rape is not about "rape" as much as it is a power-grab from miserable feminists to fund their "women's shelter" programs on various campuses.

GO

TO

THE

COPS

ASAP.

Do not pass Go
Do not collection $200

You need to get your ass to the cops ASAP.

20 years ago when I worked at the campus cop program during college they drilled that into our heads. And I got new for you,

The police department cares a lot more about you women than the "Women's Studies" Department.

Another Reason Not to Breed

November 21, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Apparently the state is deeming it necessary to FORCE parents to pay for their childrens' college tuition.

Explaining the Corporate Tax Debate

November 21, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

As you know I like to take complex subjects and boil them down to their most basic elements.

Remember, if you're looking to hire an artist, consider our resident artist Jorge Gonzalez!

American Education for Foreigners, Not Americans

November 23, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Though I can't blame them. American students study stupid shit today anyways.

New Sponsor - Prevail

November 24, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Howdy Lieutenants!

New sponsor "Prevail!"

[image]

Presumably you can drink this before you...well...drink and your hangover will be prevented...unless you go crazy and drink way more than you should anyway.

Regardless consider purchasing some the next time you plan on going boozing.

History Podcast Treasure Trove Discovered

November 24, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

And now I have what seems to be at least week's worth of brand new listening material!

Dear Muslims, Thank You for Invading Sweden

November 24, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

They obviously have become a society with REALLY nothing better to do.

What's Really Driving the Basic Guaranteed Income

November 24, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

I happily discovered a new treasure trove of podcasts. They focus primarily on the history of the UK, but also delve into world history, wars, etc., allowing me to further educate myself in an arena I am woefully ignorant in. But something interesting happened while listening to a podcast.

During one of the interviews you could clearly hear the interviewer and interviewee. But in the background you could hear a woman singing. Turns out the interview was being recorded at a cathedral of some sort and as part of the ambiance they had a woman singing. But then my rapid economic mind started thinking, thought through, and then concluded a thought in less than a second:

"Is that really a woman singing?
In the olden days I'm sure it was, but with technology it's likely just a recording being played on a stereo system.
So that woman only had to record he singing once.
I wonder what she does with all of her free time now.
God do I hate San Fransisco taxi cab drivers."

The last bit of logic may not make sense, but it does if you allow for a little bit of economic hand holding. For the woman singing in the church (either past or present), the taxi cab drivers in San Francisco and the call for a "Basic Guaranteed Income" are all highly related and provide for us a great lesson and insight into the economics and political motivation of the basic guaranteed income.

The argument for a "basic guaranteed income" (BGI) is that as technology and science progresses, more and more human jobs will become obsoleted and replaced by automation and robotics. This presents the paradox that goods and services are still being produced, but without jobs people have no income to buy said goods and services. Therefore, as robots replace humans (leaving them no income) we should guarantee all humans with a "basic income" allowing them to afford the basic necessities in life.

However, for this argument to have integrity there must be absolutely NO JOBS available for the displaced human labor. I've argued before that this simply isn't true as no matter how much technology advances there will be two forms of employment:

1. The "vanity services" where humans serve other humans (waiters, masseuses, prostitutes, authors, entertainers, servants, etc.) and
2. The robotic support industry (the STEM professionals who keep this progressively roboticized economy going).

However, my argument aside, history provides enough of an argument to debunk the pro-BGI claims. No matter how much technology advances, there are always completely new industries, replete with jobs that replaces the old ones.

Horse and buggy manufacturers were simply replaced with auto-manufacturers.
Phone manufacturers were replaced by smart phone producers.
And employees at the vinyl shop were merely replaced with IT employees allowing for MP3 recording.

In other words, this "creative destruction" didn't replace humans as much as it forced them to be innovative and creative in other endeavors as it replaced and obsoleted previous technologies.

But that's the key thing - forced humans to be innovative and creative. And a lot of humans plain don't like that.

Some humans, when facing obsolescence simply do the adult thing and accept this reality. They move on, learn a new skill or trade, start over again, reinventing themselves earning living. Some humans go so far as to become entrepreneurs, capitalizing on ideas and revolutions in the economy, providing employment and higher standards of living for others. But then there are some who are so delusional, so arrogant, so self-centered, they actually believe that the real world should not advance without their authorization. And if the world "dares" to progress to the point it obsoletes their careers, then the world indeed "owes them a living."

These people constitute a parasitic class that can only be described as lazy and entitled. The union worker who demands his pension despite the company going bankrupt. The person who gets laid off and decides to go on the permanent government dole. Or the pouty school administrator that gets fired by a gracious and generous early retirement severance. These people are economically worthless individuals, providing nothing of net economic value to society at all.

But while these people may be economically worthless, at least these people have the good graces to get the hell out of the way and let society advance. They just want their check and they're happy (or at least as happy as these miserable humans can be). Sadly, there's an even more despicable group of people that make these veritable economic parasites look noble as they are so arrogant, so self-centered, and so egomanical they not only demand recompense, but they demand the rest of the world stop and not advance without them.

And that's where the San Francisco taxi cab drivers come in.

Technologies like Lyft and Uber have obsoleted taxi cabs. They are now officially an inferior service. Like the record companies, the book publishers, and the horse and buggy industry they should accept this fact and either adapt by becoming Uber/Lyft providers themselves or find a new industry to work in.

However, taxi cab drivers are not only entitled, they're evil. And I'm not saying that as a pejorative, but as a descriptive. San Francisco taxi cab drivers are evil because instead of letting society advance, letting the people of San Francisco enjoy higher standards of living (which is what the whole point and purposes of technology and economic advancement is), they threw a temper tantrum and held the city hostage by causing traffic jams with their cars. In no uncertain words, these few people view themselves MORE IMPORTANT than the rest of society and have no problems holding back, nay punishing these people for daring to aspire for a better life.

Of course taxi cab drivers are not the only example of this. Chicago's infamous toll roads with their manually stationed tolls were so heavily unionized that the metro population of Chicago was held hostage WAAAAY past the point in time traffic scanning technology made such tolls obsolete. The public schools and higher education are another example of unneeded, worthless, obsoleted humans that have no moral qualms holding children hostage in ransom for "more money for schools." And I never tire of the dinosaur publishing houses stammer their little feet as they (futilely) try to stop self-publishers.

Regardless, the point is that human nature is pathetic. And the proponents of the BGI know this and are banking on it. For if a soon-to-be-obsoleted-human is given the choice:

a. Start anew, learn new skills and participate in the new and revolutionized economy
b. Collect a check
c. Not only collect a check, but demand society never be allowed to advance so I can save my ego by keeping my unneeded job most humans are so lazy, and some so egotistical, they'll choose either b or c.

And that is what truly is behind the drive for the BGI.

The BGI is not something that is "noble" or "compassionate." It is not something that is "caring" or "kind." It is a blatant attempt by socialists and leftsits in academia and government to buy votes by placating the laziness, ego, and self-centeredness of a progressively worthless human population. They are merely presenting the false premise that "creative destruction" does not exist (ergo, there will be "no jobs"), while knowing full well the average American schlep is to proud, too ego-filled to work the menial service jobs that will exist, and too lazy to train for the STEM jobs that would also exist.

But where the real evil comes in is where I predict there will be a "third category" of jobs - "ego employment." Jobs that are not only unnecessary, but hold society back by either denying society the ability to progress, or at minimum taxing them to create make-work jobs, ALL of which are simply to save the ego of a voting constituent.

It does indeed make the parasite who merely collects a government check look noble.

Post post - a reader recommended this. "Player Piano" a book where in the near future everything is mechanized and there is a struggle between the scientific and management classes that keep the machines running and the unskilled people who have no jobs.

Post post post - looks like there's going to be some automation in the Bakken oil field with drones and roboticized trucks following a lead truck. How much you want to bet the teamsters will get in the way of you getting cheaper gas?

Australia White Ribbon Campaign-Absuing Abused Women

November 24, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Disgusting. Just disgusting.

Not only does the Australian White Ribbon campaign make absolutely NO effort to ameliorate abuse against women, they simply use domestic violence as a way to merely profit for themselves. I don't even see a god damned expense for "cause expense" or "charity." There's like NO MONEY making it into the hands of abused women. It's damn well near 100% expenses just to keep the non-profit going to pay their salaries.

You may hate "evil corporations."
You may hate "big oil."

But for the love of god is there anything more sick than using victims to profit off of it ALL WHILE CLAIMING TO BE HELPING THESE VICTIMS?

You non-profit people are scum.

Spot the Beta

November 24, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Long-exasperated-SIGGGGHHHHHHHH!

Boys, and by "boys," I mean liberal men,

Acting like you're a liberal and placating women's leftists tendencies does not get you laid, just as submitting this law will not get you laid.

There Is Nothing to Say About Ferguson

November 25, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

My time is finite and precious. Therefore I don't waste it.

I've had several inquiries about my opinion about Ferguson and it basically boils down to the Alcoholics Prayer where "grant me the wisdom to know what I can and cannot change." And Ferguson cannot be changed.

A thug was killed by a cop.

That thug happened to be black and the cop white.

The black community in Ferguson, programmed to hate and view everything in terms of race did not see it as one less criminal in their neighborhood, but an act of racism. They viewed last night's verdict as additional proof to their oppression and went to the streets to protest, destroying their own neighborhood, looting things that weren't theirs, ensuring no serious employer or business ever sets up shop there again, further condemning themselves to a life of secondary citizenry.

My political analysis of this is

YAAAAAWWWWWNNNNN.

When something new or interesting happens, let me know. Ferguson was entirely predictable, but more importantly, not solvable. Ergo, I don't care how many thousands of hours of political coverage and analysis ensues, not one minute of it will be anything new or productive. You might as well be watching Maury Povich or Jerry Springer. Matter of fact, my little piece here is about the only thing you really need to read about Ferguson.

So I recommend you view Ferguson like I do - your life is too short and too valuable to waste a second on it. Do something else instead like watching a good documentary, spending time with your family, learning a new skill or teaching yourself how to enjoy the decline.

New Blogroll Addition - Freedom Outpost

November 25, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

You will visit here. You will obey. You will conform. Compliance is mandatory.

How QE Money Ends Up in the Stock Market

November 25, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Sometimes I like to connect the dots for my readers or for those of you who "know" something is happening, but don't know precisely how. So today we'll be looking at how QE money ends up in the stock market, thereby increasing PE ratios and making nothing worth buying!

So the first step is where the federal reserve is faced with the fact that Keynesian stimulus is failing, specifically monetary policy only affects inflation and prices and not real economic growth. Egos and heads explode at the fed because they're "economic geniuses" so they can't be wrong! So they lie to themselves and say they just "didn't do enough of it" and go onto fire up the printing presses.

But what to do with the money? They don't want to cause "inflation" but they still want to "boost the economy." So what they do is buy US treasury bonds, sometimes directly from the US treasury, but other times from banks and other financial institutions that are looking to get rid of that paper. But it's not just US treasuries they sell to the ~~sucker~~ fed. They unload their crappy junk mortgage backed securities to the fed, as well as their overprice stocks.

Factors Affecting Reserve Balances of Depository Institutions and Condition Statement of Federal Reserve Banks

1. Factors Affecting Reserve Balances of Depository Institutions

Millions of dollars

Reserve Bank credit, related items, and reserve balances of depository institutions at Federal Reserve Banks	Averages of daily figures
	Week ended Nov 19, 2014	Change from week ended Nov 12, 2014	Change from week ended Nov 20, 2013
Reserve Bank credit	4,462,332	+ 14,768	+ 605,134
Securities held outright[1]	4,237,848	+ 18,658	+ 602,966
U.S. Treasury securities	2,461,614	+ 19	+ 318,071
Bills[2]	0	0	0
Notes and bonds, nominal[2]	2,346,713	0	+ 306,851
Notes and bonds, inflation-indexed[2]	98,469	0	+ 8,490
Inflation compensation[3]	16,433	+ 20	+ 2,730
Federal agency debt securities[2]	39,700	0	- 18,773
Mortgage-backed securities[4]	1,736,533	+ 18,637	+ 303,668
Unamortized premiums on securities held outright[5]	208,826	+ 281	+ 1,621
Unamortized discounts on securities held outright[5]	-18,610	+ 33	- 9,131

The proceeds of these purchases go into the coffers of the commercial bank and other financial institutions that sold those ~~worthless pieces of paper~~ securities to the fed. And what do they do with these hundreds of billions of dollars?

Why they invest it in the stock market!

And yes, it really is that simple junior, deputy, aspiring, official and otherwise economists!

Of course the increase in stock prices is not considered "real inflation" because...well...fed economists said so. So you go right ahead and max out your 401k contribution buying overpriced stocks with a PE of 27 and a dividend yield of 2%! It's patriotic!

The Children's Wing of the Libertarian Party

November 26, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

I am a libertarian. And like most libertarians, I'm too lazy and into my own life to bother running for politics or "doing anything about it." If I'd partake in a libertarian meeting it would be to find like-minded fellows and enjoy interesting and engaging conversation.

But while I believe there is a silent majority of libertarians who are basically socially liberal conservatives, there's a loud, vocal minority within the libertarian party. And they're getting annoying.

Unlike the real libertarians, this vocal minority is more of the crusaderist variety. More focused on "protesting" and being part of some underdog crusade against "the man." This results in them voicing protests that are no different than what comes from leftists and socialists.

Hyperbole over police brutality.
All war is evil.
Soldiers are murderers.
It's all about oil.
The Illuminati.
The legalization of pot
"It's the corporations MAAAAAN!!!!"
They even have a god damned Wikipedia entry for "libertarian socialism" which is the epitome of contradiction.

In short, they really aren't libertarians as much as they are college kids who maybe read a pamphlet and now deem themselves "libertarians" since it's "cool" and "edgy." You might as well lump them in with the token high school "anarchist" or "marxist," both parodies of themselves as they Venn diagram with "emo" and "wears mascara."

Now if it were just faux intellectual kids choosing to be different instead of displaying genuine intellect, I'd be fine with that. Pat them on the head. "Yeah, man, 'socialist libertarianism.' What evs" as the youth like to say. But they can't just "be" libertarians. No, their egos get in the way.

No, they go the pastoral route and become the self-declared "majority whip" of the libertarian party, proselytizing, lecturing, and berating the majority of libertarians for their sins of (GASP!)

being OK with legitimate war liking cops

having beers with soldiers not believing in conspiracy theories pro-corporation/business and thinking pot is stupid

And so I think it's about time to slap them down.

I'm henceforth calling these type of crusaderist libertarians the "Children's Wing of the Libertarian Party." They like to make noise, view themselves in a self-aggrandizing and holy way, they're typically younger and inexperienced, and like children, should be seen and not heard. Perhaps if I ever do attend a meeting and join, I could make a motion for them to have their own little "Kiddies Table" at libertarian conventions where we can give them mascara and nylon and trench coats as well as copies of Das Kapital and a couple bags of pot. And when they get real nice and high, and think they have the solutions to the world's problems (not to mention the political platform of the libertarian party) we'll give them crayons and some paper and maybe they can spell it out, signing it at the bottom with their name and age.

Then I'll take it home, put it up on my fridge and my girlfriend will ask,

"What's that dear?"

And I'll say,

"Nothing dear. Literally nothing."

The Contemporary Art Bubble

November 26, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

An amazing article from a classically trained artist who is predicting the collapse of the "contemporary" art bubble. He uses some interesting statistics, one in particular where there is five times as many galleries displaying art made in the past 60 years as there are galleries displaying art in the past 4,000.

Anyway, I am not art collector, but my general rule of thumb is, "If I can do it, then it isn't art." And sadly, that's most art today.

Wednesday Linkage

November 27, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

This is true when you hike mountains.

Aurini comes up for air!

Round House Kicking Chick Cop Show!

November 27, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Writing books during security
Leadership comes from those who have nothing left to lose Crossfit is a cult
"State of Affairs" a new ROUNDHOUSEKICKINGCHICKCOPSHOW!
"Clit lit" and "Clit flicks"
A woman author divorces her husband for a fictional character she created Cappy's drug addiction to "progressive adventure" and how it will ruin him.

and MORE

in THIS EPISODE of The Clarey Podcast!

OPEC's Not Torpedoing the Bakken…Yet

November 28, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

A big concern right now is that the Saudis and OPEC in general have been flooding the market with oil, driving prices down in the hopes of driving Bakken (and other) US oil firms out of business. The Saudi's can pump oil and remain profitable at a much lower price than their American counterparts, and it is speculated that the recent and dramatic drop in gas prices has been due to OPEC flooding the market.

The opposite is quite true. It's American oil flooding the market that threatens themselves;

Source

You combine this with fears of slowing global economic growth and ~~crusaderist wimps~~ green-conscious-fuel-saving Americans and Europeans, demand for oil has also gone down, driving prices down.

OPEC is planning a closed door meeting in which they will collude like the monopolies you'd all like to think "Big Oil Companies" collude like in an attempt to cut oil production and jack up prices. Thankfully they all hate each other almost as much as they hate the US, so they will unlikely cut oil production despite what they say.

The real issue is whether fracking technologies can be improved that American oil producers can still remain profitable at lower oil prices, and I believe since they largely employ the last vestiges of real, innovative and industrious Americans, they can. Better yet, the good news is that "peak oil" or a "post oil world" has been postponed beyond our lifetimes. We will not run out of oil in our lifetimes AND even if the mideast runs out, we got enough here in the US to last.

It is one of the rare bits of good news to enjoy in today's world, especially given this reality will continue to piss off environmentalists for the rest of their lives.

You are Free to Kill Yourself at Any Time

November 30, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Nobody is stopping you.

And ladies, I do not want to hear about how "feminism is just the equal treatment of men."

On a related note of arrogant whites who think themselves better than everything.

Episode #74 of The Clarey Podcast

November 30, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

A 20 something ditz Clarey "Just Rub the Wrong Way"
Getting in fights because you didn't wear Cavarrici pants in the 80's
Getting in fights because you wore velcro K-Mart shoes in the 80's Cappy rips apart his entire high school as Facebook proves they all turned out to be losers
"My amazing children"
When "Harley ownership" is the "pinnacle" of your life.
Cappy kicking around starting a charity
Torturing yourself over purchasing luxury shampoo
The Left's new strategy of accepting and deserving punishment because you're white or male.

AND MORE in THIS EPISODE of The Clarey Podcast

Also listen to The Clarey Podcast on iTunes and Stitcher!

New Sponsor - British Beers

December 1, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Howdy All,

New sponsor - "Always a Favorite"

It's an online beer seller who specializes in and sells only British beers.

For those of you who like the occasional sip now and then and are even getting into home brewing, consider purchasing some British beer especially as a gift to yourself (or others) for Christmas.

You can find them here!

What Every Husband and Boyfriend Wants for Christmas

December 1, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

And it's FREE! Just trying to help you ladies out:

Monday Lazy Man's Day Linkage

December 2, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

This is how a culture collapses.

A feminist pines for men to pay for her date...and JB takes her down.

Tickity tock, ladies. Tickity, freaking, tock.

Do not rebuild Ferguson.

New podcast treasure trove - The 405 Gang

And new blogroll addition - Night Sky Radio!

Yes, the picture does describe it all.

How Cold is a Survivalist's Friend

December 2, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

There's one thing the Minneapolis police department rely upon to keep their budget in line - winter.

For when winter hits, crime goes down because, well...cold.

Much easier and enjoyable to steal a car or go shoot up a hood during July than it is during January so all the criminals, thugs and parasites stay in because it's too cold to commit crime.

Thankfully, however, this is very telling of the criminal and thug mindset in that it belies something about their true nature - laziness.

Of course criminals and parasites are lazy by their nature. They don't want to work, but still want to enjoy higher standards of living so...theft. But you add the cold in and they don't even have the work ethic to steal.

Thus why this is very heartening.

To support yourself, let alone be a survivalist, takes work and effort. Things criminals and thugs don't have. But if the vermin of Minneapolis can't even work up the effort to steal and rob during the cold, imagine just how disincentived they'll be to survive or leave the city if the shit were to hit the fan. Do you think they're even capable of knowing how to keep water liquified for livestock? Or how to insulate shelter? Let alone how to build shelter? They're so dependent on government subsidy or victims for their crimes I doubt any of the criminals have ever thought about what to do if the heat were to go out or how to survive for more than 2 days in a below-zero post SHTF scenario.

Therefore, while many of you may be thinking about heading south to where it's warmer and nicer, perhaps consider Montana, Idaho, or just rural Minnesota when it comes to surviving a SHTF scenario. Old Man Winter will have your back at least half the year and may have the good graces to kill off the parasitic class for you, allowing you to enjoy the decline.

It's Not About Race, It's About Mentally Unstable People

December 3, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

This more or less wiped away any remnant thoughts I had there was an element of race with Ferguson. It really is just mentally impaired people using color to excuse feral behavior, theft, and destruction.

Glorious Karl Suffers a Heart Attack

December 3, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Glorious Karl of "Glorious Hat" fame recently suffered a heart attack.

He is "alright" but if you wanted to help Karl I know that he was stressed with the entrepreneurial endeavor he took by selling "Glorious Hat." He's trying to get rid of his inventory so consider purchasing Glorious Hat as a way to help out a vet, a conservative, and a true American this Christmas season.

Wednesday Constitutional

December 4, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Jesus is my boyfriend and you can't compare to him! ht

Tee hee! I want to STEM too! But I don't like the maths! Tee hee! Let's just add an "A!"

Men in STEM made this possible. Feminists, welfare recipients, liberals and humanities majors did not.

The Real Meaning of "It's a Wonderful Life"

December 4, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

I'm actually quite impressed. DT and the Man made me think about not just the true meaning of "It's a Wonderful Life" but advanced my understanding and appreciation of life. (first segment, so you don't have to wait long)

How Keynes Destroyed the Bakken

December 4, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

I wanted to believe that it was only going to be the banking industry that was destroyed by the "Dudebro Frat Boy Jocks from the 1970's." Middle aged men who couldn't do math and were too lazy to become engineers, so instead got their MBA's and relied on ~~lying~~ "sales" as a way to enrich themselves. Slowly, but surely, they rose through the ranks so by the time 2005 rolled around they were thoroughly ensconced in positions of power in the only industry that would promote such idiotic scum - banking. Sure enough, their greed and idiocy caught up with them, the banking industry imploded, but not without the taxpayers bailing them out. Today they merely work at the bank down the street, thankfully relegated to the banking industry and not pouring out into and corrupting other sectors of the economy.

Or so I thought.

Enter the Bakken oil field.

With gas prices high investment into alternative means of pumping oil were produced. One such technique was fracking and as luck would have it practically the entire middle part of the North American continent had oil reserves that were conducive to this technique. An oil boom occurred resulting in quite literally the only silver lining to Obama's economy. Hundreds of thousands of jobs were created, there was a cap put on the price of oil, not to mention it turned out the US now had a such supply of oil that it no longer needed to rely on or answer to OPEC.

Now, not that I was thinking we'd become the next Norway where their entire population is effectively millionaires due to their oil reserves, but I did think this oil boom would be more permanent. At least not certainly a bust. For while Dotcom and the Housing Bubbles were caused (primarily) by idiot investment bankers and banks, this was an oil boom. Started by much smarter and saner engineers, scientists and geologists. This was a STEM industry, not a cock-sucking, ass-kissing "dudebro" east coast cronyismfest.

Add two more ingredients.

Engineer naivety about economics and Keynes.

Engineers, god bless 'em, are not economists. I've known this because during most of college the engineering majors wish they could study more finance and economics and the finance majors wish they would have studied engineering. Even after college many engineers go back to get their MBA's with a concentration on accounting or finance. But at their core they're still engineers. They're on the rigs, in the design room, or out exploring. They're not reading up on OPEC or EIA reports about the glut of oil hitting the market. And it wasn't OPEC that's been driving prices down as much as it was themselves.

Once I saw there was trouble in Bakken Land, I prayed, PRAYED,

"Please don't let them have a ton of debt on their books
Please don't let them have a ton of debt on their books
Please don't let them have a ton of debt on their books."

Annnnnnd they have a ton of debt on their books.

Once again, Keynesianism and the ignorance of how central-bank-induced artificially lower interest rates result in companies and governments loading up on debt, has now caused a credit bubble in the Bakken oil field. And while some companies maintain a nice margin of equity on their balance sheets, many do not. And with the price of oil going down, it doesn't matter how low of an interest rate they have on their newly acquired debt, they are going to shut down and file for bankruptcy.

The lesson to pull from this is you don't need lazy, middle aged MBA, Dudebro Salesmen to destroy an industry. You just need a central bank, ZIRP monetary policy, and a dash of economic naivety on the part of industry leaders and ANY industry will be inflated and then destroyed. Alas who knew Keynesians would be the ultimate economic "Dudebro Douches?"

Master X Reviews BPE

December 5, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

A fine review from a fine fellow who read Bachelor Pad Economics!

HR is BS

December 6, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

I'm drunk, beligerent and indifferent in this video, but it's the best ripping apart of the HR industry there ever was.

And yes, a language warning

Capitalism is Reality

December 8, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

From my latest piece at ROK:

Ergo, capitalism is not some kind of fanciful political theory concocted by a delusional, pontificating trust-fund baby elitist (that would be Karl Marx). It's merely the economic manifestation of human nature.

Sponsored Linkage

December 8, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Ed is writing a future history book about a 2nd civil war in the US.

A spherical Earth is insulting to this particular Muslim, and thus the movie Gravity must be banned.

"The Girl Who Cried Rape"

December 8, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

I don't know about you guys, but I'm getting mighty tired of getting accused of rape. Felt this rant was necessary (use the link in case the video doesn't embed below)

Yes, language warning:

Europe's Standards of Living Are Overstated…Especially for American Bachelors

December 9, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

I had meant to write more economics pieces during and post my European trip. Then Asshole Consulting took off, I had to winterize my house in anticipation of the Minnesota winter, and now it's the holiday season. It wasn't through anything but sheer luck I have a glimpse of time at this moment and I fully intend on using it to write about my most important observation about Europe - that it's standards of living are overstated, and especially so for bachelors.

Admittedly, I did not travel all of Europe. I visited Switzerland, Italy and a bit of France. But in sampling those three countries (not to mention practically scouring all of Switzerland and Italy) I can say with reasonable confidence in at least those three countries standards of living are overstated. Of course in the Eastern European Empire of Roosh things may be different, and northern Europe I left untouched, but I believe even the regional differences aside there are some European wide structural differences that not only puts it at a disadvantage compared to the US, but costs its people a lower standard of living.

The first and most painfully obvious reason was the cost of food. I know food does not account for anywhere near a significant percentage of GDP, but since it stimulates one of the five senses and is kind of a "necessity," I was shocked how expensive the food was.

In Switzerland a Big Mac (just the burger, not the meal) on average cost $12. If it cost cheaper somewhere else, I was unaware of it, but I was HONORED to pay "only" $8.50 for a Burger King Big Whopper. Even that was a "deal" because twice I paid over $120 for dinner for four. Admittedly once was in Montreaux (and expensive resort town on Lake Geneva), but it was certainly overpriced.

Second, and related, was the quality of food.

I don't know what idiotic 16 year old suburbanite American girl came up with the lie to make her trip to Europe more exotic than it was, but the food absolutely sucks. The two times I paid $120+ for dinner the food was on par with gas station food, and not even good gas station food. Mac and Cheese, a panini sandwich so toasted you'd lose a filling, and with a stingy thin slice of "prosciutto" (which I believe is Italian for "one atom-thick slick of pork"). And I think my girlfriend had the leaf sandwhich with three-eye-droplets of Diet Coke. If you factor in the quality and quantity of food, Europe probably costs quadruple what it does in the US.

Third, gas.

Yes, I know gas is more expensive in Europe. Yes, I am also aware "well, but tuition and health care are free there!" That does me no good. Unless you're old or in college, these offsetting social programs don't benefit the majority of people who have to endure it. But it is not the mere nominal costs of gas that lowers the standards of living as much as it is when you combine it with the fact 1960's highways were built on the towns' 500AD European infrastructure. So not only do you get to pay more in gas, you get to use more as you meander through indirect highways and clogged city streets that were designed for cattle.

Fourth, housing.

Unless new construction, the vast majority of housing in Europe is inferior to the US. This is not an insult to the European peoples or their carpenters as much as it is a result of the majority of their housing being before the US even existed. A "nice house" is jammed right next to others with roof spines sagging and shared yards. Every castle I saw looked like a home-owner's fixit nightmare. And the prices are so high you never own your home as much as just pay the interest on the mortgage. Simply because the US is/was less densely populated and the majority of its housing stock built with updated technologies, the quality of housing (and thus your living/dwelling experience) is much nicer.

Finally, the hotels.

I was very much looking forward to finding a quiet, hidden Italian village where I promised myself and girlfriend we would "sit and do nothing." I just wanted to find a nice hotel next to the ocean and get drunk on vino.

Never happened.

Not just because to drive from one town to another in Italy will make you so stressed out and weary you can't enjoy a wine, but because the hotels are really not that nice and neither is the wine. We stayed at great, high end hotels in Stresa, Bellagio, and Florence and NONE OF THEM beat something as average as the Crowne Plaza in Billings, Montana. Again, some of this has to do with the outdated technologies these "premier" hotels were built with, but the furniture and fixings are literally no better than a Hotel 8. In short, even their most luxurious hotel in Bellagio (on Lake Como) comes nowhere near the quality and caliber of the Bellagio in Las Vegas.

There were many other things, but the point is whether it's something basic as food or luxurious as a hotel on Lake Como, the costs are twice that of the US for goods and services that are a fraction of the quality and quantity.

However, shocking and appalling as the costs and economic lower standards of living were, there was one thing that was even more cumbersome and "standards-of-life-dropping."

The culture.

Not that Europe is "uncultured." It certainly is, and in many regards, more so than the US. But the European culture is absolutely antithetical to the freedom-loving, American bachelor.

Understand that the American bachelor is arguably the freest person in the entire world. We can get up when we want. Do what we want. Eat when we want. Go when we want. And go wherever we want. This isn't to say that in Europe there are Nazi guards at the borders checking your papers, preventing you from enjoying these freedoms, there isn't. But it is to say the European culture is not conducive to providing the support structure for this level of freedom.

And it's maddening.

Most obvious is that you do not have the "Freedom to Eat Whenever You Want."

Why?

Because every freaking store closes down at siesta for 1-2 hours and then permanently for the day around 7PM. Yes, there probably is one or two places on the continent that might be open till 10PM, but I didn't see them. The problem this presents, however, to the American bachelor is that he no longer has the luxury of not worrying about when to eat. After three days without a host the PRIMARY determinant of where we went, what time we left, and what town we'd get a hotel in, was not determined by our traveling desires, but at what time we could get food, specifically diner.

You may be laughing, but consider the drop in standard of living this presents to a bachelor. Time and freedom are the only things that matter. And if you can get food 24-7, a vital and key necessity is taken care of, allowing you to travel wherever, whenever you want. However, without 24-7 access to food, you are no longer entitled to 100% of your free time. Some of it, now needs to be dedicated and thus restricted based on the operating hours of food providers.

Closely related to this culture of "close when grandpa goes to bed," is the highway system. Bachelors like to travel, especially American ones. And key to this travel is the US interstate system COMBINED WITH gas stations that are not just open, but serving food and other staples of life (toiletries, oil, aspirin, etc.) 24-7. But without this amazing infrastructure, the concept of taking a midnight road trip on a whim across the country/continent just isn't possible in Europe. There were times that (despite a much higher density population than Wyoming) I was more worried about running out of gas in Europe than in Wyoming. Not that there weren't gas stations, but they weren't open.

This meant we had to travel knowing full when and where we'd get gas if we were traveling at night. It also meant buying food before hitting their "highway" system, but having to wait till it was open...but not too late or we'd hit "siesta." This may sound "whinny" and "complainy," and it is. But it is still a dramatic drop in the freedom-go-now-don't-worry standard American bachelors are accustomed to.

Finally, there are no Wal-Marts, Perkins, or any other large 24-7 facilities where you can buy other wares or food.

I remember traveling across the American southwest many years ago and pulling into Alamogordo, New Mexico, where in BRILLIANT and ILLUMINATED glory was a Wal-Mart open and operational at 3AM. Not only could I buy the food and camping equipment I needed, but a bottle of Jack Daniels an X-Box

ammo guns

and everything else that can be found in a Wal-Mart.

Not only does Europe suffer a dramatically lower standard of living because they have no such thing, but the bachelor particularly so. The bachelor is not only forced to buy from the same overpriced local village "family stores" families are, but they also have to abide by these companies' restrictive hours of operation.

In short, if you go to Europe as an American bachelor prepare for a culture shock. And not just "oh they wear different clothes or their toilets are funny," or $12 Big Macs. But for what is going to be a dramatic decrease in your freedom of mobility and the convenience you've grown accustomed to here in the US. Yes, the US has it's issues, and certainly Europe has it's benefits (somewhere I'm sure), but you will come back infinitely more appreciate of the US, its infrastructure, how it operates 24-7 for its people, and the freedom that allows you to, at the drop of a hat, just get in your car and go.

Iforgetday Linkage

December 10, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Iforgetday is a problem that has been increasing ever since I entered self employment. And not just self employment, but where I have nothing even remotely approaching a schedule to adhere to and only know if it's a weekday or a weekend if my girlfriend is in the bed when I wake up.

Thus I've come up with "Iforgetday." Unlike "Tuesday" or "Friday" it's always, "Iforgetday" in Cappyland. And seriously, right now, I have no idea what day it is. Therefore, today's linkage will be "Iforgetday" linkage. Enjoy!

A white guy who write about white privilege and racism for the SLPC is suspected of being murdered by two black men.

Stupid people want to be thought of as smart. This is why leftists pursue worthless and advanced worthless degrees. This is also why, when arguing with these same leftists, they never agree to take an IQ test. They need to hide behind their piece of paper that says they are smart.

I didn't even know there was a debate about how Amazon/self publishing is or is not going to bring better books into the market. All Amazon did was make it a free market. I've yet to hear that bringing about a worse result.

The Bakken Bubble.

Today's Horribly Offensive, but 100% True Joke

December 10, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Female rape claims are becoming an awful lot like female orgasms - fake.

Ba dum bum!

Anyway, on a serious note, the mental acrobatics these scum go through is criminal.

Girls "don't know" that going to the cops is an option? They're not "guided" by the college to report rape to the police?

No, how about Occam's Razor? They majority of these claims are fake and that's why girls don't report it to the police.

This fake rape culture bullshit IS bullshit and is a sick and psychotic (and desperate) power grab on the part of hate filled feminists and socialists to beget money from the government, maintain victim status, all at the expense of falsely accused men. It amazes me how there is NOT ONE WORD written about the panic, pain, and agony men falsely accused of rape go through. And never mind the air of fear that college men must be living under now should they dare ask a girl out.

It's gross, it's disgusting, and we're going to continue to point it out until the masses realize just what an evil is festering in academia and the government.

Episode #75 of The Clarey Podcast

December 10, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Cappy discovers a great time saving device - Chinese delivery
The cold wants to kill you
What your parents really meant when they accused you of being "crabby"
Commenting in the Manosphere is NOT a life to envy
James Bond is now more sexist than ever
The Shelby GT Mustang Super Snake Charity
Hot women want positive attention. Feminists will take ANY attention.
What's going to happen when today's pathetic, victim-whoring college students get into the working world?

AND MORE

in THIS EPISODE of The Clarey Podcast!

The Father Could Not Be Reached for Comment

December 11, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Remember, we don't need no stinking fathers!

Dear Mozilla, FOAD

December 11, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

The gall of these nazi, anti-free speech assholes who dared to fire an employee for making a political donation, now go begging for money. I literally would rather donate to the nazi party before donating to these fuckers.

Good too see they're having financial troubles at least.

Anita Sarkeesian Plagiarizes the Captain

December 15, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

I have largely avoided mentioning Anita Sarkeesian because:

1. She's an attention whore and any attention is good attention in her eyes and
2. There's more than enough people exposing this fraud.

About the only thing that irks me is how she gets $160,000 (or whatever it was) for what is nothing more than politically-correct whining and real people with real talent go unfunded.

But this crosses the line - plagiarism:

Discover

Genetics Guarantees That Feminism Will Lose

By Cpt. Capitalism

Share on Facebook | Tweet

I know many, if not all, of the articles here on ROK are original pieces of work. However, I read this article and feel compelled to share it with you for there is an important lesson here that EVERY man (and women) must know and understand. And that lesson is:

Feminism and feminists will lose in the end.

I say this not out of idealism, wishful thinking, hope or what I'd like to see happen. But rather a cold, clinical, unemotional statement of truth. Feminism and feminists WILL lose in the end. And the reason for this is that the entire movement is antithetical to their human and genetic programming.

Feminist Frequency

"Feminists WILL lose in the end. The reason for this is the entire movement is ANTITHETICAL TO THEIR HUMAN & GENETIC PROGRAMMING." #hatemail

I do not take kindly to having my literary works being used, plagiarized and then taken out of context.

For the record I have never contacted or e-mailed Anita. I really do have better things to do with my life. I merely wrote this piece which she obviously then co-opted and used to make it seem as if I have sent her hate mail.

The only thing I will say about Anita Sarkeesian and all the media attention surrounding her is simply this:

The real story about Anita Sarkeesian has nothing to do with any of her "work." It has everything to do with how the media, the gaming industry, video game developers, and other institutions are so dumb and blinded about this evil person that they give her the attention, funding, and platform they do.

And that really is all that has to be said (and will ultimately be the legacy of) Anita Sarkeesian.

Monday Trudge

December 16, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Hey parents? You know your SJW kid you raised who is a pan-sexual? Well grandchildren were overrated anyway.

1 in 5? No, try like .03 in 5. Uncie Bern Bern does some math. (but the maths are tough!)

"Micro-aggression Reporting Service" - I wonder if the kids who set it up realize just how nazi-esque, and thus, hypocritical they've become.

And finally, remember to get Christmas shopping in before it's too late.

The Hero's Journey

December 17, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

The Black Brigade makes a heck of a philosophical podcast drawing parallels between the book "A Hero of a Thousand Faces" and consuming the red pill.

And yes, I am on vacation. And yes, it is difficult to blog from the field...especially while driving. Posts will resume at a normal level in a week.

SJWing to Rationalize Your Worthless Degree

December 18, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

not to mention your worthless self.

Actually, I take that back. SJW's aren't worthless human beings. They're parasitic. I keep forgetting that they always need other people's money to survive.

Just aiming for 100% accuracy here folks!

Rescuing the Millennials

December 18, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

To be blunt there is no such thing as the "Great American South East." It's nice, but it lacks mountains, a sin city, and is too heavily populated to give you any sense of adventure or risk. Thus, unlike my "Great American South West" adventures entailing mountains, deserts, rattlesnakes and gambling, this has largely been a road trip with all the comforts of 24-7 Waffle Houses and Wal-Marts.

However, I did manage to drop in an visit Kerry Lutz in his schwank bachelor pad down in Florida and did a short interview that started out as a an inquiry into Asshole Consulting, but morphed into a pretty decent discussion about the Millennials, what's plaguing them, false self-esteem, and how this is a lack of fathers in families.

Raleigh and Atlanta are the next stops, let the ole Captain know if you're around.

El Sooper Mexican Podcast

December 19, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Howdy All,

Many of you know my frustrations with "teh interwebz" community when it comes to the lack of business focus and orientation on profit. You have scores of people with a great product (be it a podcast, a blog, a youtube channel, etc.), but they never capitalize on it. Me being of an entrepreneurial mind knows the potential of teh interwebz, especially when it comes to the blogging community and so, when I approach an online media personality with the offer of MONEY, it enrages me that they never get back to me.

Not because they don't want my sponsorship.
Not because they don't like money.
But because they lack hustle or just plain fail to appreciate the earnings potential their online presence has.

Enter in Sooper Mexican.

Sooper Mexican (henceforth "Soop") has a hell of an online media empire going on. Web site, podcast, you name it.

And it only took 4 weeks of hounding and brow-beating to get him to finally run ads for Cappy.

And while I am joking, sadly, I'm not. Most podcasters of significant note, just plain don't have the business acumen like Tom Leykis to get back to you the next day, let alone the next month like El Soop.

Still, Soop got back to me and I wanted to introduce his podcast to all of you. I am a regular listener and believe that if you like my rough-around-the-edges podcast you will also like his. It is definitely an above-average podcast that will replace your talk-radio listening and MSM consumption.

Plus he has a loud-mouth guy from Wall Street or something on, not to mention some Texan hick from a trailer.

Regardless, great podcast, something to download...that's if he'd up his bandwidth and not get cut off by his provider because he underestimates his popularity.

Atlanta tomorrow, St. Petersburg the day after, normal operations by the end of the week.

A Brilliant Podcast

December 21, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

I'm not joking when I say this, but this episode from Matt Forney was arguably the best single podcast I've listened to. It covers everything from SJW's to Batman vs. Joker philosophy to Chris Bechtloff making his Dennis Millerish observations and parallels. It's 2.5 hours, which I am fine with because it is like being at a bar with some great conversationalists.

3 more days of vacation and posts will resume as normal.

The Clarey Podcast Episode #76

December 21, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

William Shatner is god
The Captain rides a mechanical bull and breaks the record
Cappy also discovers the American South East is much larger than he first thought Kids puke!
Partying in Atlanta with some readers
The eulogy of a Social Justice Warrior
ISIS meets US troops, not Iraqis, and hilarity ensues!

AND MORE!!!

In THIS EPISODE of The Clarey Podcast!

The Eulogy of a SJW

December 22, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

A life of avoiding work and accomplishment, placing value on traits you were born with and did nothing to earn, while playing the victim card all the way to your grave, ultimately wasting your life.

Bad Blacks Hurting Good Blacks

December 23, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

This is the reason hard working, honest, legitimate and honorable blacks must suffer the "Black Tax."

It is also a reason black men should consider joining the Republican or Libertarian parties so as to (not just join for moral and philosophical reasons) send a clear signal to potential employers you're not a worthless, whiny human being, prone to lawsuits, ineptitude, entitlement, and problems.

This Is Why You Don't Hire Women With Liberal Arts Degrees

December 24, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Especially "journalism."

Scratch that, "Child Psychology."

OK, scratch that. "International Relations."

Christmas Listening

December 24, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Remember while you're on your travels to load up on podcasts should you end up driving through a state like Wisconsin, or worse, Iowa!

The 405 Media
Sooper Mexican Tom Leykis
Uncie Bern Bern
Sandman
Honey Badger Radio
Free Domain Radio
Follow The Money
Kerry Lutz
Matt Forney
The Black Brigade

I'm 50/50 on doing a Christmas podcast. May or may not be up tomorrow. Regardless everyone have a good Christmas!

Tonight's Hotel Bedside Table

December 25, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Forgot to do this the last couple of times:

Anyway, merry Christmas all!

Cappy's Adventures - Savannah

December 25, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Finally made it to Savannah, which is a town that has largely escaped my escapades because of it's remote geographic location relative to the entirety of the US. I was kind of let down, not as many rows of plantation mansions with willow trees as I had thought.

Why Retirement Planning for Millennials Won't Be ANYTHING Like the Baby Boomers

December 26, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Before You Become a Doctor

December 26, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

I received a video request from a doctor through Asshole Consulting. However, it was soon apparent he was the one doing me the favor in sharing his experiences and what EXACTLY was required when it came to becoming a doctor. It was a much more arduous and expensive process than I originally thought, and it just makes one want to reconsider becoming a doctor (especially with Obamacare). Anyway, thought this would be of benefit to any of my readers that are contemplating going to med school.

Economics of becoming a doctor and the situations where it's actually worth it: I'll start with an overview of the time and money required to become a physician to provide context for the economics discussion. Then I'll focus more on the costs. PreMed: -4-year bachelors degree is required to APPLY to almost all medical schools. Medical schools don't care what that degree is in as long as the following prerequisites are met: 1 year biology + lab, 1 year general chemistry + lab, 1 year organic chemistry + lab, 1 year physics + lab. Some medical schools also require 1 year of calculus, 1 semester of a writing/literature class, and additional humanities. This depends on the particular medical school. High school AP credits can substitute for certain prerequisites, although some Medical schools will require advanced science classes from those applicants who got AP credit for basic sciences. Let me reiterate that medical schools don't care what the actual degree is as long as the prerequisites are met and up to 1/3 of medical students have a Bachelor's in Bullshit. -During their college years, students must take MCAT (em-cat) test which is a standardized test. MCAT:med school :: SAT:college. When I took it, it cost $300+ to register. -GPA and test scores aren't enough. Having significant community service and lab research experience are also required. Over 20% of medical students have Master's Degrees and PhD's to supplement their application. Applying to Med school: Medical school classes start in August-September and the application process begins in July the YEAR BEFORE and entails the following: -Primary application: performed online through a national company known as AMCAS. When I applied it cost a few hundred $$ to register and covered a dozen applications, additional applications cost more $$ per application. -Supplemental application: SOME (not all) medical schools will require applicants to fill out a second application (if they like your primary application) and I've been charged $30-$80 for secondary applications depending on the school. My application process ended up costing me $1000-1500 -Interview: if schools like your application(s) then they invite you to an interview. It is up to the applicant to cough up the $$$ to travel out to the school. Since interviews start before 9AM, most applicants have to arrive the nite before and pay for their own hotels (some schools can help applicants get a discount at nearby hotels). I have heard of extremely "competitive" (affirmative action-enhanced) candidates who get flown out to interviews and have their lodgings covered (a friend of a friend who is Inuit, grew up in an Alaskan village, and happened to have REALLY GOOD scores). -Overall one can expect to shell out $5-10 for the interview process alone. Med School: -Another 4 years and there's no way to cut it short by taking extra classes. 1.5-2 years of classroom learning (depending on the school) where basically everyone has the same classes and runs on the same schedule. This is followed by 2-2.5 years of clinical training where everyone rotates through a certain "core" of specialties (general surgery, general medicine, general pediatrics, psych, ob-gyn, ER, etc). There's some slack here since students will get 3-4 months to do extra rotations in their desired specialty that they want to pursue post-graduation. -When I was a med student (2006-2010) Private Med schools cost an average 35-50/year for tuition. When adding room & board, meals, health insurance (required), transportation (go to different hospitals for clinical training), books & computer the total ends up being $45-60 per year. Costs for medical school have been increasing on a yearly basis so I don't know the current costs. -During this time some medical students get dual degrees: MD-PhD's, MD-MBA's, MD-MPH (masters public health), MD-JD's. These are required for people who want to go into medical research, administration, get involved in healthcare policy/law, etc. This adds 1-2 years to time & tuition. -During medical schools students must take their Licencing Exams which are administered by a national organization. A total of 3 exams are required to obtain a medical licence. Only 2 of those exams can be taken by medical students. These exams cost $500-$1000 to register for. Internship/Residency: -The MD degree is actually worthless since we can't work as a physician. Another 3-7 years of post-graduation supervised training (with progressive responsibility). -The interview process for residency is similar to med school. I spent $5K-6K on my most recent interview process (I switched specialties from surgery to radiology). Also in the past 5 years medical schools have increase class sized to cope with the medical demands of an aging population in the US however the residency programs (which are funded by medicare) have not increased their positions accordingly and in 2011 the number of residency applicants exceeded the number of positions available. BTW, foreign medical grads and people who pursue a DO medical degree (rather than MD) get lower preference for residency programs). -After completing 1 year of residency one may register for the 3rd licencing exam (another $500 for me) and get a full medical license which will allow one to perform VERY BASIC medical services unsupervised. However insurance companies won't reimburse more "advanced" services (any kind of procedure/surgery, making "advanced" diagnoses) without completion of residency. Work hours range from 40/wk (psychiatry, peds, family medicine) up to 80/wk (general surgery, neuro/brain surgery, orthopedics). Most residency programs 55-60 hrs per week although the particular hours depend on seniority (1st years/interns stay in the hospital the longest) as well as whether the resident is assigned to hospital duties vs clinic/outpatient duties (clinic has shorter hours). Also certain programs are more malignant and brutal in terms of work-hours (any program in New York city). FYI, prior to 2003 there were no work hour restrictions and residents could be kept in the hospital up to 120 hours (my father is also a physician and used to work 90-100 hours/wk during residency). BTW, any hours worked from home (made possible by electronic medical records) are not necessarily counted toward the work week. Let me also add that depending on the program and specialty, residency programs can legally require a resident to routinely work up to 28 consecutive hours (and longer in exceptional cases where a rare disease/procedure is taking place). -Residency's saving grace is that residents are PAID a stipend ranging from $42K-$65K per year, depending on the program & specialty & seniority. Mind you the stipend often matches the cost of living in the area where the program is located (there are a few exceptions). Additionally the hospital will provide temporary sleeping quarters for the residents who are working shifts longer than 16 hrs (we can't live there though, we do have to pay for our own apartments). Surgical-based residencies last longer (5-7 years) than medical-based residencies (3-4, rarely 5 years). Fellowship: -Residency only covers limited fields. Many fields (intensive care, transplant surgery, hand surgery, cardiology, many more) require a resident to complete an additional 1-3 years of training (pay $55-70K/yr) before they can actually start working. Work: -We still have a free market. Salaries can range anywhere from $100K-$1 mil depending on whether one joins a private group vs an academic center. It also depends on whether one takes a job and becomes an employee vs starting one's own business. Some practices will employ young physicians and give them the option of working their way into becoming a business partner. For physicians who open their own clinic (i.e. don't join a pre-existing group), startup costs can range from $80K to over $1 mil depending on the scope (seeing patients, doing scans, doing minor procedures, etc). The minimal age to become an MD is 27 years (unless skipping grades in high school), assuming the following: 6-year joint undergrad-Med program (RARE), get into med school on 1st try, get ideal residency and don't switch careers later, don't do fellowship. In reality the most people will be 31-32 before hey become a doc (4 yr undergrad, 4 yr med school, 4 yr residency, 1-2 yr fellowship because the market is horrible for generalists). For a neurosurgeon, don't expect to be out of training until 34-35 years. THEN you can start paying off debts (which can exceed $300K as I outline below). This will usually take 2-3 years assuming a truly minimalist lifestyle. That doesn't address people with multiple degrees or who take multiple attempts to get into med school or who have other jobs before changing their mind and becoming doctors. Economics: -College: You have covered the costs of college as well as private vs state schools extensively so I won't bore you with details. That being said a few medical schools who are affiliated with colleges offer joint programs where students can perform their college prerequisites and go straight to medical school without needing to complete the full 4-year degree or go through the interview process (that's one thing Europe does right). Tulane University (where I graduated med school) started such a program. These schools are the exception though. Lesson 1: Do college prerequisites at a state school. Only go to a private school if a joint-program is offered. - Medical Schools: When I was a student private schools can cost $45K-$55K/yr when all was said and done. Even public schools will average $20K-40K/yr when including ALL expenses. The Carribean medical schools cost even more (I've heard some are up to $70K/yr). Scholarships are rare during med schools since doctors "earn so much and can pay back their loans". The first $34K of my loans qualified for Federal Subsidies, i.e. they don't accumulate interest until the start of residency. Anything beyond that amount accumulates interest from day 1, even though payments don't have to be made until the start of residency. I used a total of $190K of loans for med school. By the time I graduated the interest had grown my debt to $210K. My loans accumulate interest at a rate of 6.7% per year although I've seen figures range from 5% to 9% depending on the particular lender. I had a total of $45K scholarships and grants during med school BTW. For people who don't have any scholarship/grant and/or people who pursue dual degrees can end up with medical school debts exceeding $300K, not including undergrad costs. Even people in public schools aren't immune (one of my buddies who graduated from Louisiana State ended up with $150K). Some scholarships do exist. The National Health Service Corps provides full scholarships to students who pursue a career in primary care (i.e. lower reimbursements) and commit 3-4 years in a designated under-served area (rural vs inner city vs reservation) where reimbursements will be lower than in a well-off area. Failure to comply results in financial penalties (you pay your loans at a MUCH higher interest rate). The military is also another option where everything is paid for but a time commitment is also required and the salary is lower than it would be in the private sector. The clinical rotations during the 3rd and 4th years of medical schools can require 40-80 hrs per week in addition to reading assignments. The studying during the 1st and 2nd years of med schools is time consuming so a meaningful job that can make a dent in the costs is pretty unlikely. Lesson 2: Try to attend a state medical school. Private med schools should be a second choice unless one is offered significant grant/scholarship. Foreign (i.e. Carribean) and DO schools are a last resort and in many cases aren't even a good alternative since there is open (sometimes justified) discrimination by residency programs. If considering the military or National Health Service corps to pay off loans then realize that the reimbursement during the "pay back" phase will likely be significantly lower than if one bites the bullet, takes the loan, and ends up in a high-reimbursement field and working in a well-off area). Residency pays $45K (small towns in the south) - $65K (New York) per year. Subtract the cost of living a minimalist lifestyle and that still leaves at most $35K per year. Remember the interest rates of the med school loans range from $5K/yr (assuming 5% loan and $100K debt) over $25K/yr (assuming 9% interest and $300K debt). My interest rates were $12K-15K per year at the outset (they're lower now because I've paid off ~$65K in debt in the 4 years I've been in residency with the help of family). Some residents simply choose to "live a little" and defer payments on their loans until post-residency by citing "financial hardship". This included people who want to marry and start a family (because they're in their late 20's and sometimes early 30's). The loans still accumulate interest during this time and those residents will have yearly interest rates exceeding $20K and their total debt (med and undergrad combined) can exceed $400K. BTW, most residency programs will not allow residents to take "moonlighting jobs" (working in a nurse or physician assistant capacity in Podunk Urgent care/ER center for extra $$) and some of the Surgery-based residency programs won't leave enough time for residents to moonlight regardless. Lesson 3: Don't expect to pay back loans during residency (or fellowship) unless you had significant financial assistance/scholarships during medical schools. However certain residencies (family medicine, pediatrics, psychiatry, pathology, and a few others with "easy hours") will allow residents to take on additional jobs to significant extra $$ on the side. I know a few who added up to $10K-15K/year working nursing/PA shifts because their residency only required 45-55 hrs per week. Docs who have minimized their education costs can except to make significant dents in their loans during residency but they are RARE exceptions. Lesson 4: Keep an open mind initially but develop a clear picture of what field of training to pursue and include lifestyle and reimbursement in that decision. I switched fields entirely from surgery to radiology (x-rays, mri's, etc) because I started med school wanting to be a surgeon and also didn't research the residency program where I ended up (malignant shit hole of a hospital, might've stayed in surgery if I had taken a residency spot at a better hospital). Over 1/5 residents will end up switching programs (surgery-based programs have the highest attrition rate). The 1st year of residency is very similar regardless of specialty, however as residency progresses the knowledge becomes specialized. Therefore switching fields means that most people only get "partial credit" for their previous residency and essentially have to repeat years and have a longer training period. I have concluded that it is only FINANCIALLY (I don't address "personal satisfaction" worth being a physician if the following criteria are met: 1. Do undergrad at a public school or MAYBE at a private school that offers joint enrollment. 2. Get into med school on 1st try. 3. Don't get master's degree or PhD unless you plan to start out in another job and you only pursued medicine because you had "calling" to be a doctor later on. One of my colleagues worked as an engineer but became inspired to be a doctor after he was hospitalized following a car-wreck, so these things do happen. 4. Don't go to a private med school unless you plan for military career or do primary care in an underserved area, have other significant scholarships, have rich family helping with school costs, or have saved money from a previous careerr. 4. Don't pursue an MD-JD, MD-MPH, MD-PhD, MD-MBA. 5. Don't pursue a Surgery-based specialty unless you've met the above criteria and have minimized your undergrad/med school costs. 6. Don't pursue any specialty unless you do you damn homework so you don't have to switch residencies (I addressed the shortage of residencies earlier) or unless you've met the above criteria to minimize education costs. 7. Forget about starting a family before the age of 30 unless you meet the above criteria (which is incompatible with peak biological years for reproduction). 8. If you enjoy a truly minimalist lifestyle (Aaron, you're ability to take vacations is too extravagant for the degree of minimalism I refer to) then the above information is irrelevant.

This Week in Stupid

December 27, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

There is no future in this country. Just a lot of really, really, REALLY, dumb kids.

What the Beer and Radio Industries Portend to Talk Radio

December 28, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

While driving the crotch rocket from Buffalo, Wyoming to Phoenix, Arizona and back, I decided to go down one side of the Rockies and up the other on the return trip. However, it was without fail that as I would enter a small Colorado town the gas station attendant or hotel concierge would inform me, immediately, about the new "brew pub" that had just opened and how I had to check it out. Not being a fan of beer, I usually eschewed these pubs, but the sheer number of them compelled me to think about them from an economics standpoint, especially whilst navigating the various mountain passes and switchbacks.

My original thought was stained by my previous experience in banking where desperate middle aged men would mortgage their house, close out their 401k, and then approach us for more money to finance their mid-life-crisis bar. And so I thought this was just the latest incarnation where a new generation of dude-bros would start a brew pub and within a year file for bankruptcy.

It didn't happen.

Matter of fact, quite the opposite has happened. Not only have thousands of micro-brew pubs opened up, but they make better, higher quality beer than the swill being mass-produced by Busch, Budweiser, Miller, etc. Add to that fact they usually attach a bar to their brewing operations and an element of community and "walking to the neighborhood pub" ensues, and paying the extra $1 for a pint of special brew makes it impossible for the large producers to compete.

However, it is not only the beer industry that this "specialization" is happening. Enter in our beloved internet. Specifically radio.

It is no secret that I have a general disdain for the radio industry. It is a cutthroat industry I "fell into," but was naive about. Ergo, thinking it may had been my calling, I made changes in my life and career to pursue it, only to have the format of my station change to (my favorite) "sports talk radio" 5 months into my gig.

However, like publishing or the music industry, the radio industry and the elitists that controlled it are getting spanked, primarily through podcasts. Radio stations are EXPENSIVE things to maintain. Not only do you have radio towers and insane electric bills, but you have sales staff, HR, lawyers, producers, secretaries, etc. And the free market being what it is, owners are driven to streamline their operations, cutting expenses as much as possible. This resulted in a phenomenon similar to "Big Beer" - a mass produced product that is sold nationally. However, instead of a can of "Bud Light" or "Budweiser," radio stations nationally syndicated Sean Hannity, Rush Limbaugh, Dennis Prager, and Michael Medved.

Unfortunately, for both radio stations and listeners, this meant (like beer) talk radio hosts had to play to the largest common denominator. This meant bland, not-to-risque, polite talk shows. Not that there's anything wrong with that, but it did take away the Mischke's, Savages, and other eccentric talk show hosts that had smaller, but much loyal followings.

However, some ironic and incredible timing occurred. While radio stations were laying off local talent in the drive for leveraging national syndication, the cost of bandwidth and storage on the internet was plummeting. And it was no longer text or nudie pics of your girlfriend that could be sent over teh interwebz, but audio and video. Early adapters capitalized on this. Chris Krok (a fellow radio show host who enjoyed an equally brief radio career in Minneapolis) I remember getting canceled in 2006. He said he was going to work on some "Blogtalk" project, of which I more or less dismissed, borderline scoffed. However, a couple years later, the feasibility and (thus) threat podcasts presented to talk radio became apparent. And it's the exact same threats that specialized brews present to "big beer."

Today, I rarely listen to Rush Limbaugh, and maybe tune into Garage Logic. Four years ago I would easily spend 3 hours a day listening, now, not more than 5 minutes. The reason is that I can download podcasts, listen to them at ANYTIME, AND (this is the real threat)

LISTEN TO A SHOW THAT IS VERY SPECIALIZED IN MY INTERESTS.

Yes, Sean Hannity, I got it - "Republicans Good. Democrats Bad!"

But have you ever done a deep analysis on Tribalism and its intellectual ramifications like Stefan Molyneux?

Yes, Joe Soucheray, I got it. What is the mystery? Who are the mysterians?

But the mystery was solved nearly 6 years ago by a vlogger/podcaster.

And yes, Michael Medved, got it. "Losertarians." Ho ho ho. That's funny.

You'll forgive me while I listen to women explore and pioneer a completely different and new world called the Manosphere. Slightly more intellectual stimulation.

The truth is that talk radio was already dying without the internet. And I mean that literally - the hosts are old and are going to be looking at death in the face in 20 years. Rush Limbaugh is over 60, Dennis Prager in his 50's, and Joe Soucheray is pushing 80 (just kidding). But who is being groomed to replace them?

The answer is nobody.

Which is fine. Like most industries in America today, the youth have found it easier to go their own way, using the internet to pursue success, instead of asking for permission through their aged and obsoleted bosses. And while there may not be another manufactured "block buster star" like Rush Limbaugh or Sean Hannity, there will be hundreds of much smaller, but infinitely more interesting and specialized "micro-talk-show-celebrities." And thank god, because micro-brewed beer is an infinitely better product than Miller.

This post was inspired by Tom Leykis who is hands down THE Podcast Pioneer. Please consider visiting his show.

"Lloyd and Joe" for President

December 29, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Here's a foreign concept.

The Republican party goes on a recruiting campaign to hire NORMAL AMERICANS to run for president instead of their blue blood, brother-and-son-of-a-president, billionaire elitists.

How much you want to bet the Democrats steal this idea because they're smarter than the Republicans?

Parents Forcing Their Kids to Go to College

December 31, 2014 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

A disturbing trend where some of my clients' parents are forcing them to go to college under threat of disownership, pulling support, and other forms of punishment that are nothing short of abuse...and a sure fire way to make sure you never get visited in the nursing home.

(language warning)

Remember, both Worthless and Bachelor Pad Economics are available on Amazon.

How Minimalism (Ironically) Might Make You Rich

January 1, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

My guest piece at AVFM.

The Nicene Creed of MGTOW

January 2, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Put together this video request.

Which insulted some people in the MGTOW community, prompting this response video.

I don't like getting bogged down in technicalities, semantics, details, let alone being misquoted or taken out of context, so I put together this final "Nicene Creed" of MGTOW.

I then walk away because I refuse to get bogged down in semantics, technicalities, details, and sophistry, and have said my peace.

Post-post - Paul Elam chimes in with some reasoned, ahem "veteran" advice.

Immigrants and the Future of the US

January 5, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

A video request that had some interesting observations:

Episode #78 The Clarey Podcast

January 6, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

In this relatively curse-free podcast Cappy talks about

A review of the movie "The Gambler"
Escaping depression as a conservative or libertarian
Leaving the blood stains on the guy he shot who burglarized his house
Sheeple and lines
How the Holidays screw with you
Your sad friends who bred more children than they could afford
Guilt about being successful
How CONVERSATION is the most valuable commodity in the world
Private sector powerful successful women who hate their lives

and MORE!!!!

In THIS EPISODE of The Clarey Podcast!

Before You Become a Doctor

January 7, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Another e-mail I received from one of our Doctor listeners. He too also is skeptical about whether it's worth becoming a doctor again. Something to consider for those of you lieutenants in the field that are contemplating becoming a doctor (his writing is a bit rambly, but good advice none the less)

Dear Captain Capitalism-

I also put this on the Before You Become A Doctor posting.
I graduated Med School in the early 1970's. I trained into a subspecialty- 6 years total post med school. During my training I married and my son came along. Then I went into solo private practice. I also joined the US Army Reserve. Two more children arrived. I was always the sole breadwinner. Any solo businessman has good and bad years. The taxes were stupidly high on a sole proprietor. The little bit from the USAR was very handy- I had help paying the social security (and later the added medicare).

I also worked as an independant contractor emergency dept doc when business was slow, plus insurance physicals and other income I could hustle. Note about ED doc- you had better be a gunfighter betting your malpractice you are better than anything that comes in the door- only one doc in ten has the guts for it. I have been in my one town 35 years (more or less- keep reading). The 3 kids turned out good. When they were all in school, my wife oversaw the books. The insurance companies were consistantly shorting me the contractual payment- never over. Forget about getting diligent (or grateful) help. I have owned my house three times. The first working 6 months 2 or 3 nights a week in the ED as well as the office.I walked out of the ED 1 Jan 1980 with my house paid off (and the government).

Then that bastard H Saddam invaded Kuwait in August 1980, I was making a major's pay and the bank had my home (equity loan) to keep the office recurring bills paid. When Kuwait was liberated I went back to my town and started the grind to get my house back. Back to working office, Army, EDs and insurance exams. Got the house back and stopped the EDs and insurance. A few years later my daughter (who had instate scholarships) went out of state to stand on her own two feet and my money. When the Air Force ROTC reneged on her 'promised' scholarship, I was holding the bag for almost 20K. The bank got the house again. Back to EDs and insurance but now I am in my 50's with kids' car insurance plus college. Then 9/11. Sure enough, the USAR two years later promoted me and put me on full time with spending a year or more at various forts. At least I could afford my office overhead on a colonel's pay. I got my house back and so far still have it. Did I mention my 17 month or my 15 month tours in Iraq? Obama was elected when I was over there. When I got back the great recession was in full swing. Solo doctors don't get paid by medicare- who knew? My insurance payments for patients I saw were frozen at the level 15 years before. You know about that 80 year doctor still practicing and getting $10 a vist- yep, you are locked in. Unless a doctor moves states every 3 or 4 years, his insurance reimbursement is frozen.

Women docs don't work the hours of men. They take SABBATICALS. .for years! I went to cash but my accountant told me to expect an audit because the gov is using audits to punish docs on cash. I could go to a hospital group but these are soulless- given to superficial questionnaires, give a smug answer during the meet'em and street'em and limit or 2 or 3 prescriptions- more than that requires another visit. Plus you are never producing enough. My accountant recommended cutting to 10 hours a week (45 hours a month- I get social security, thank you), keeping up my education, and wait for the crash. I was bitching about this to a friend (blown up in Iraq and partially disabled). He told me I would consider these 'the good old days' when I was treating wounded in a barn on the run from government forces. But if you are younger, forget about medicine.

This was long already but there are even more downsides to becoming a doctor at this time I did not include.. I would like to know- does your Smith & Wesson retirement plan include involuntary early retirement of aholes such as in 4GW? Thanks and my great respect for you and what you write and do- COL Doc

Book Review - "Going Your Own Way: Understanding MGTOW"

January 8, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

"Going Your Own Way: Understanding MGTOW" is a new book released by Paul Elam and Peter Wright, and (as far as my research shows me) is the first serious publication that attempts to define, explain, and introduce MGTOW to the general public, as well as become sort of a "constitution" of the MGTOW movement.

It is incredibly well written, clear, and succinct, and necessarily so as it attempts to lay down the theoretical foundations for an embryonic concept that will only be damaged if more concrete measures were made to define it. This immediately debunks Mr. Elam's and Mr. Wright's critics (who claim the authors are trying to claim MGTOW for their own and that it can't be defined) as nearly two full chapters are dedicated to explaining how MGTOW is similar to an open source software wherein nobody can claim rights to it. After much explaining and intellectual honesty, I believe they manage to best define it as "male self-determination" and am inclined to agree.

With definitions out of the way, the book then delves into many aspects of traits of MGTOW laying down the logic, reason, empiricism, history, psychology, economic and other causes for the MGTOW phenomenon. I was particularly impressed with the amount of research that went into the historical (sometimes, ancient) study of "bachelors," "bachelor theory," and the bachelor lifestyle, providing not just historical perspective, but a shocking insight into society's past psychological relationship with bachelors (for example "bachelor taxes" and the presumption bachelors some how owed it to society to marry and breed). I was also very impressed with the time dedicated towards pair bonding and attachment. The reason for this is that the same critics who berate Elam and Wright for daring to write a book about MGTOW, are also the same people who in a very hypocritical way insist on a rule that "no real MGTOW" would have anything to do with women. This false believe, unfortunately, presents a huge risk to the younger and disaffected men who search and find the MGTOW community, as they are consequently tempted to dismiss women altogether, women that may actually be of great benefit and contribution to their lives.

About the only real complaint or concern I had about the book was what I believed to be the overly liberal use of excerpts from various books, texts, and periodicals. Entire pages of "The Odyssey" and "The Art of Courtly Love" are quoted, where I would have just preferred some key quotes and then more analysis and commentary from the authors. There were also some philosophical and technical differences and disagreements that I had with the book, but nothing that would get my panties in a bundle, unlike many of the authors' critics.

Besides that, I believe because the book is the first of its kind and is (more or less) introductory in nature, a glossary would be helpful to young men (and women) who are first being introduced to the concepts therein. "Gynocentrism," "VAWA," "hypergamy," etc. are all terms that the average person does not know, and because of this may be misled into thinking it's one of those "faux" studies like "women's studies" where academians create made up words and acronyms to sound smart.

Overall, however, the book is a very good, thorough, and HONEST summation of what MGTOW is, easily digestible by the beginning reader or a people more involved and aware of the MGTOW philosophy. I would STRONGLY recommend it as a primer to anyone looking to understand or research the topic. I would also STRONGLY recommend ignoring all the fake reviews on Amazon as many in the MGTOW community viewed Mr. Elam's and Wright's writing of this book as "sacrilege" and have since been voting it down with faux votes.

If People Didn't Have Debt

January 9, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

$15,000 is an interesting number because it is one I estimated with my head, but then also empirically proved out for several years of frugal, minimalist living. Specifically, it's the lowest amount of money a person can live on comfortably in the US.

This assumes a lot of things.

That you don't have an insane commute.
You only have yourself to support.
You eat in and host at home most the time.
You go out occasionally.
You take a cheap road trip once a year.
The primary form of your entertainment is friends and conversation.
You never buy a new car.
And, you never buy frivolous (read-luxury) items.

When it's all said and done a single person can get by in the US, comfortably for $15,000 a year and enjoy a full and wonderful live.

Of course when I published this figure in various books, people would challenge me, questioning whether it was possible, even daring to doubt my veracity. But trust you me, I went through the hell and penny pinching. It's possible and it's well within everybody's ability to do it.

But $15,000 also happens to be a very interesting number in another regard. For while sitting at my other bar I noticed an advertisement for a mortgage company. And then an ad for a car. And so I quickly hit the internet, found some online calculators, and started crunching some numbers. Specifically, the TOTAL debt payments one makes over the course of their lives.

Naturally, this varies person to person so I assumed what I believed to be the "average" American who takes on debt for these specific things at these specific terms:

House
$250,000 mortgage
30 year term
4.5% fixed rate

Cars
$20,000 auto loan

5 year term
7% fixed
12 cars over the course of your life

Student Loans
$80,000 (includes what you paid without loans)
20 year term (or whenever the hell people get around to paying those things off)
6% fixed

Credit Card Debt
$4,000 balance assumed in perpetuity
Forever term
16% fixed
Balance nominal from 15 till 75

Now, when you calculate the total loan payments for these four items you get:

House	$456,000
Cars	$280,368
Student Loans	$137,554
Credit Card	$33,600

And when you add them all up you get:

$907,000

Now a funny thing about that number is if you take it and divide it by the number of years you're expected to live as an adult (60) you get $15,125.

And what do you know? If you just refuse to take on debt for things like cars, education, houses, credit cards, and crap, you'll save yourself the necessary amount of money needed to support yourself for your entire life.

Of course, astute economists will point out that the numbers do not account for inflation. And normal everyday Americans will point out who wants to live a life making $7.50 an hour Valid points, but let me address them.

First, while absolutely 100% right, those figures don't count for inflation, they actually kind of do. Cars you are constantly buying at higher and higher prices so we could just assume that $280,000 is adjusted for inflation. Credit cards, well those balances will also rise with inflation, thus, adjusted for it. And how many people buy just "one house," never buying newer or better, never refinancing, never taking equity out of the home to improve the kitchen? Yes, that's what I thought. About the only that isn't adjusted for inflation is tuition, but even that I wonder about given how corporations and employers are now all just so pro-"continuing education" forcing people a life long financial burden of never having to stop paying for education and training. The point is, even if we were to adjust for inflation, that number would still come darn close to the $15,000 mark.

Second, the life style $15,000 a year affords.

Yes, who indeed wants that? Why men with used cars that need repairing, living in studio apartments, never enjoying fondue at the latest and hippy trendy restaurant, who go to (GASP!) Goodwill to get their clothes!? What kind of a life is that?

Certainly not one where they commute 500 hours a year, in a car they can barely afford the insurance on, to a job they hate, while they finance the hockey equipment for the children they can (also) barely afford, forcing both parents to work, while alienating their children in day care (also, barely can afford), driving the wife to divorce the husband, but not first without her racking up $20,000 in credit card debt for trinkets and bobbles she just needed to have, while dad buys himself a new Corvette to cope with the destruction of his family, and now two ex's who hate each other both fork over $50,000 a piece for lawyers so they can squabble over the remaining $5.83 in equity in their palatial McMansion.

You're right, they most certainly CANNOT afford that. They can only afford books, conversation, coffee with friends, fishing, and black and white movies on Netflix.

The point is simply this (and one I think we already know). If Americans simply got by with what they needed and not what they wanted, they would never have to take on any debt of any kind in the first place. This would not only result in much easier and less stressful lives, but lives where you would not have to waste 4-8 years of your youth in college, making college obsolete for many. The real issue many people have to solve for themselves is whether having "nice, but ultimately, pointless" things in life is worth the hell, struggle, strife, burden, stress, and pain the required debts to afford those things will foist on them. And given what I've seen of average Americans and their obsession with "late model German cars" and "brand designer jeans," it most certainly is not.

Enjoy the decline!

I did want to make the note that while the technical age for reaching adulthood is 18 (and when you subtract 18 from 78 years of life expectancy you get 60 years of effective adulthood), this is functionally wrong for Gen X and Millennials. Since they do not move out of the house or stop fully receiving subsidies from their parents until the age of 43, the total number of effective adult years is really only 35 years. When you take this into account the average annual savings of not going into debt results in an annualized payment of $26,000, much more than the original $15,000. Perhaps this is why endebted and parent-dependent Gen X'ers and Millennials still have nice things despite negative net worths and multiple bankruptcies.

Why Feminists Choose Victimhood Over Work

January 10, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

This is (to date) what I believe to be my best rant against the hypocrisy of feminism and "empowered women." Specifically, how they purposely choose to focus on "sexism" and "victimhood" instead of other, more effective actions they could take that would improve their lot immeasurably and actually close the wage gap, belying their true motives - theft and parasitism.

I also throw in a bit about what the sex life of a feminist must be like sleeping with the Pajama Boys of the world.

Language warning, as always:

A Generation of Men Advancing Too Quickly

January 12, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

For all the benefits the manosphere has had on men, the male population, and male psychology, an unfortunate drawback is that it is so efficient and effective that men are advancing intellectually "too" quickly. So much so that I predict MILLIONS of men are going to advance so quickly, and so efficiently, they will be forced to face the the "void," the ultimate "blackness" and the end of life.

From my latest piece at ROK.

The Economics of the Education Bubble

January 15, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

This was a request, but it came out better than I thought. Was able to link "Chang" in China directly paying "Tina" in Suburbanite SWPL America to major in something stupid because US Dollar Reserve Currency:

When Hippies Try to Do Economics

January 16, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

It's like liberals trying to run a business.

Bachelors Degree in "Event Planning"

January 19, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

For the Patron Saint's Name of Frick. Event planning.

And I thought, "no, no way. Nobody majors in this. It must be a scam."

But after searching "I'm majoring in event planning" there are people who actually spent money (and worse) schools that offer this bogus degree.

This is What Happens When you Choose a Government Check Over a Husband

January 20, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Language warning, but 100% true.

I Have Officially Defined MGTOW

January 20, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

While I know there is much debate about MGTOW and who has the rights to this open source concept, I have finally decided that I, being a veteran MGTOW Level 26-c, am the foremost authority and outrank anybody else who either legitimately or falsely claims to be MGTOW. Thus, after much contemplation and thought, I have finally decided what MGTOW is, means, and will continue to mean into the future.

BEHOLD!!!!

Thank you, thank you, and buy my book!

Why the Left Hates Nuclear Families

January 24, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

For once, I don't think there's a language warning in this one! Still, it's important to know why the left hates nuclear families and especially fathers - it's competition!

There Are No Such Things as Financial Markets Anymore

January 26, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Let us take a very simple concept.

Bill wants to raise money for his new company that he, personally, does not have enough money to launch. Bill goes to the "financial markets" which is no different than the fruit market or "farmer's market" except instead of fruit or veggies, he is looking for capital.

Providers of capital (called "investors") meet and bid over Bill's business through a slightly complicated process of "going public" which is assisted by investment banks and brokerages. Still, this market operates no different than any other. There is a demander for capital, there are suppliers for capital, and they haggle and negotiate on a price.

Now in the farmer's market or even the grade-school-play-ground-baseball card market the only things to affect the prices, supply, and demand would be items that are relevant and pertinent to those markets and the wares traded therein. And so too should it be the same with the financial markets. But just because something "should" be doesn't mean it is, and thus welcome to our modern day "financial markets."

The truth is the financial markets no longer represent the news and information that is relevant to stocks, bonds, and other forms of financing new or to-be-acquired businesses. And the reasons for this are multi-fold.

First, the majority of money being supplied into the market no longer comes from interested investors, keen on launching new companies. It comes from retirement planners who are socking away their monies in the idealistic and outlandishly naive hopes of retiring by 65 (33 if you're a government worker or teacher). Matter of fact, these sheeple aren't even investing their money in new business ventures. They're buying stock on the secondary market, looooong after investment banks and hedge funds have gotten the majority of equity and capital gains out of those stocks.

Second, you have speculators who have no real legitimate business being in the financial markets in the first place. Oh yes yes, I know, they do make markets more efficient, except when they don't. Their mere existence moots and destroys the concept of a financial market in the first place. Now, instead of just investors looking to supply budding entrepreneurs with capital, you have some idiot in California using an ECN to make .0005 cents per share profits on a butterfly, triple lindee, hybrid spread (if you don't know what that is, that's alright, you're not hip like all those people on CNBC).

Third, machines. Yes, machines. Specifically machines that execute trades based on algorithms perhaps maybe even programmed by humans.

Are these machines there to provide business opportunities with capital?
Are these machines there to fund entrepreneurial ventures with much needed funds?

No, they're, once again, there to speculate, even manipulate prices, driving them up and then driving them down.

Now we can go on, but I didn't really realize how fully divorced today's "financial markets" were from its literal namesake until I was driving down I4 near Orlando listening to "A Finance Podcast."

The host of the show had followed me on Twitter and said, while he does like what I say, he cannot tolerate the cursing or swearing. Fair enough, but I, always with a road trip in front of me and hours of time to fill, downloaded and listened to all of his podcasts. It wasn't until I was just outside Orlando did I realize something about his podcast.

The majority of his commentary and interviewees did NOT discuss the actual financial markets as much as they were:

Government moves
Government legislation and Central banking

And it is this that is the proof that the financial markets are anything but, and should be named something else.

If you look at the media currently dedicated towards covering the "financial markets," you have to ask yourself the question:

"How much time do they spend addressing/responding to moves by the governments and central banks, versus the factors that actually should affect the companies and the industries therein????"

And at least in this little trial balloon, I realized that the majority or at least the plurality of time was spend addressing governments and central banking.

This proves just how far from free markets we've moved. When the "financial" markets move, nay, hinge on every word and move from the central bank and monetary policy, and dismiss all that annoying "background noise" of what's actually going on with the individual company, you need to ask precisely what does this "market" represent.

Does it represent the investors looking to fund the entrepreneurs like it was intended to?

Or has it morphed into this multi-trillion dollar, amorphous, cross-breed Frankenstain monster between government, the retirement planning industry, central banking, crony capitalists, and politicians?

Because one can be reasonably measured, studied and pursued as a discipline by students of finance and economics.

The second is one where even the greatest financial and economics minds are merely observers whose guesses are purely that - guesses. Because by that time, they all might as well become political scientists and everybody knows that is not a real nor legitimate field of study.

The Father Could Not Be Reached for Comment

January 27, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Though I would absolutely love to see Target get dragged into court on this, I cannot help but notice things like "suicide," "Aspegers," and employment problems tend to correlate when there are none of those lousy stiiiiinkinnnng fathers around.

Still, I'm sure it was Target that drove this poor soul to suicide and not the lack of a father. Because, as we all know, we don't need no stiiiiinkinnnnng fathers.

Enjoy the decline!

Tuesday Night Linkage

January 27, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Remember, there are no consequences for false rape accusations.

DT tells his boss to shove it when the boss changes the rules. Why can he do this? Because he is a real man and he has gone Galt.

I don't lose sleep over the slaves I never owned, nor benefited from. I wish Germans and other innocent westerners who were not part of any oppression had the same self-respect. Oh well.

Some interesting economic statistics from WWII.

How Whites Are Playing the Victim Game Too

January 28, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

If there is one thing I hate it is the "victim game" that various groups of people play.

The reason I hate it so much is not because it's theft, but it's such a cowardly, hypocritical, and (above all else) KNOWING act these thieves put on. For when you take away all the lies, hypocrisies, falsehoods, and flawed premises, the person mugging you is not just stealing from you, but telling you it's your own fault. Sometimes, so outlandishly they claim you're unaware of it, which is nothing more than the epitome of cowardice and hypocrisy - ie - accusing people of "privilege."

But no matter how much wool they try to pull over people's eyes, I know thieves and parasites when I see them. And when I'm accused of "privilege" or that somehow a group is "disadvantaged" and the solution (surprisingly) is always "more of my money" I know it's just a ruse that less-intelligent and less-self-respecting people succumb to.

But the "Victimhood Game" has taken a very nasty turn. One so crafty I almost didn't see it when it was staring me in the face. And one so disgusting it makes me even angrier than when minorities fake-claim they're oppressed (because they at least have a tangential line of logic to their reasoning):

Spoiled brat suburbanite white people.

At first you may say,

"Cappy, how do spoiled brat suburbanite white people play the victim game? By the fact they're white, spoiled, and suburbanite, they can't possibly be victims in any capacity or another!"

But,ohhhhhh, my fellow lieutenants and economists, they have indeed, and this is where it is particularly dishonest, disgusting, disingenuous, and pathetic, as well as pure genius. For while you are correct that a white male who grew up with all the advantages of a upper middle class upbringing and the "correct" color of skin cannot claim to be a victim, he can if there's something wrong with him.

Welcome to the world of fake mental illness.

I wasn't able to connect the dots on this one until two seemingly unrelated events occurred in my little online media empire in close proximity to each other. But once they did, and once I connected the dots, not only was it painfully obvious what was really happening, but it was enraging as to just what level of sloth, laziness, cowardice, and parasitism these humans had degraded to.

The first one was when my e-mail started lighting up with readers and viewers saying the "Amazing" Atheist had done a response video on my video about fake mental illness. He (and thousands of his followers) were very much enraged that I dared to say I was sick of all the fake kids claiming they had "ADD," ADHD," "Aspergers," and lord knows whatever the latest flavor of made up psychoses the American Psychiatric Association, the public schools, and Big Pharma were concocting. But despite these diseases obviously being overdiagnosed and despite legitimate concern about their veracity, the fact I dared to say they were people falsely claiming they had these diseases threw the 660,000 strong Amazing Atheist community into a tizzy.

True to their self-proclaimed form, they went psycho.

Death threats.
Incoherent tirades of cursing and threats.
"Cut your balls off and shove it down your throat."
Even the host (a 6'7" hybrid "bully-nerd") bravely said he'd kick my 5'9" ass if he ever saw me in public.

But for all the saber-rattling and indignation, I failed to realize what was going on. I thought I had just pissed off a community of basement-dwelling nerds, was somewhat shocked a guy like the Amazing Atheist had the following he did, but in the end said "Meh, oh well, time to go write a book."

It wasn't until the second event did I see clearly what was going on. This event had a similar origin and pathology.

I once again made a video.
The video was questioning about many men who claimed to be MGTOW's (Men Going Their Own Way) were men who were too cowardly or lazy to try to date girls in the first place and opted instead to claim to be "MGTOW" when in reality they were just afraid of rejection and failure. In short they really weren't truly independent minded men who consciously chose to "go their own way," but were cowards who either didn't have a choice or never tried in the first place, and abused the MGTOW concept as an excuse.

And, like the fury from the Amazing Atheist cult, the backlash I received was equally vocal and ferocious.

"Kick your ass."
I'm a pussy.
I don't own MGTOW
How dare you "X, Y, and Z"

etc. etc.

However, unlike the Amazing Atheist community (which I largely ignored and just quietly accepted his traffic) because I was closer to the MGTOW community, I went and attempted to defend myself. And this proved to be the key, the link between the two groups that opened my eyes to what was really happening.

In nearly ALL of the debates, discussions, and arguments I had, NOT ONE person was intellectually honest, listened to or digested what I said, purposely took things out of context, even outright lied about what I said. It soon dawned on me I was not arguing with mentally sane, mature adults, interested in advancing a discussion or figuring out reality, but rather people who had mental problems and lived in a delusional world. And the reason for their passion and blind rage over what I had stated was that it assailed the one mental lie they told themselves to keep themselves sane. It shined a light onto their hypocrisy. It forced a mirror in their face and told them the truth.

And nothing pisses off delusional people like the truth.

It took a while, but within a week of (futilely) battling it out on discussion boards and receiving concurrent residual hate-mail from the Amazing Atheist crowd, I put it together. The butt-hurt, enraged poser-MGTOW community was the opposite side of the same coin as the hate-mailing, Amazing Atheist community and the copper-nickel-clad they shared in this coin was...

mental illness.

Think of it this way.

Say you are a white person who grew up in the suburbs. You've had every advantage handed to you. But, like all other humans, you have an aversion and distaste for work and labor. Nothing wrong with that. Laziness was a great calorie-saving survival strategy for 2 million years of humankind's existence. But thanks to western civilization, technology, and economics laziness and sloth are an outdated and obsoleted survival strategy. You need to work no matter what your aversion to it.

However, for some groups of people (specifically anybody not "white" or "male") politicians have fed them an outright lie of victimization to protect their egos and get them work-free money, all in exchange for their votes. However, the human brain is not dumb. And either consciously or unconsciously, "privileged" white kids and their SWPL parents started to realize that they/their children were not "victims." Matter of fact, they'd by logical default become the hosts to parasites. You combine this subconscious premise with the innate human aversion to work and the ego and pride that comes with modern day Americans, and there's a pressure, if not full-blown race to become a victim.

But left with no physical trait that would visually make them a distinguishable victim, an entire generation of weak-ass Millennials raised by equally pathetic Gen-X parents went SCRAMBLING to find a flaw. To find a disability. To a find a weakness that would also grant their children the much-coveted "victim status" and all the excuses from being a responsible, reliable, self-supporting adult (not to mention all of the socialist financial perks).

Enter fake (or at least) overly-diagnosed BS mental illnesses.

ADD ADHD
Civilian PSTD
Dyslexia
Aspergers
Thighdogs
and Cheekfillets

And thus what we have today and the "fad" of either claiming you have a disability or your dumbass child does.

Of course, this merely addresses the financial incentives humans have to play the victimhood game and attain some kind, any kind of "victim status." Claim you're a victim, claim your oppressed, have society lower standards for you and sometimes just give you free money. But what it doesn't address is the emotional, violent, angry, and hate-filled reaction you get for daring to point this scam out. If a thief is a thief, at least he admits it, takes the money, and doesn't care. But if you point it out to the Professional Victims they get more enraged at being accused of being a thief than Hans Gruber.

Enter ego.

Understand people who play the victim game (who are indeed not genuinely "disabled," suffer from a real mental illness, or have anything wrong with them) are parasites. And parasites, by definition have no core, no purpose, no value, and no agency. Thus, with nothing of real and genuine value, they instead double down on the only thing that defines them - their fake victimhood status - and wear it like a badge of honor.

You see this in the real world a lot.

People who instead of defining themselves by their trade or profession tell you they're a "pan-sexual, transgendered, dyslexic" (no doubt getting their "masters in Gender Studies.")

The high school kid that within 3 minutes of conversation cannot help but force into the conversation they are dyslexic or suffer from ADD.

The parents who almost say with pride that their child suffers from some mental disease or another (but still reads at a 7th grade level, despite being in the 4th grade).

And it's the only way I can think of somebody unmentionable like the Amazing Atheist garnering 660,000 followers.

But if you dare come out of left field and call BS on them, claiming it's all an elaborate ruse to avoid work and the rigors of the real world, you not only take away, but destroy the ONE and ONLY thing they have in their lives (no matter how much of a lie it is). You destroyed their core. you destroyed their religion.

And thus the violent reaction.

Violent reaction or not, however, we need to be very clear what is happening in society and the US. Weaker minded people, who eschew work and the rigors of the real world are cowardly scrambling to find any reason, any excuse to do so. Vile leftist politicians have already capitalized on dividing the country across racial, sexual, gender, and religious lines, typically pitting all groups against the convenient bogeyman of "the White Male." But do not think this has anything to do with race, sex, or sexual preference. It is a HUMAN trait, a default setting to be lazy. And ALL humans will be tempted to scramble and find a "weakness," a "disability" and play the victim as long as there's money and the avoidance of work in it.

White kids in the suburbs capitalizing on having a "mental disability" is merely the latest poison in this trend.

Enjoy the decline!

End College Degrees, Institute Certifications

January 28, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

I received a rather helpful list of IT certifications that provide efficient, self-respecting people a great alternative to the scam that is becoming known as "college education." Certainly, some degrees still have merit, but if you are a logical, self-respecting person who just refuses to be scammed for 2 years of liberal art pre-reqs that have nothing to do with your major, and would prefer to get working instead of indoctrinated, then this list may be of benefit to you. The reader's e-mail is below, following a link to the certification list (in PDF file format on my Box account):

Dear Aaron,

Please find attached an article which is a comprehensive listing of IT certifications. I would imagine different authorities would re-arrange the list somewhat, but it gives a good overall picture. I attended a private-sector IT training school called 'MyComputerCareer' and those who were dedicated students made it work for them, gaining at least a couple entry-level IT certificates and an entry-level job. I managed to get four of the 'Microsoft Technology Associate' certificates (the four in the infrastructure track), and the MTA exams are strictly for entry-level familiarization. In the opinion of one instructor, they are primarily for the first 12-18 months of IT-related employment, and there is little need to pursue more of them after that point. Also, the program centered around the A+ and the Network+ certs, which are both offered by the CompTIA organization (Computer Tech Industry Association). They are both 'generalist' certificates, and are frequently referred to in tandem. I think you had mentioned this: anyone who asks for specific advice, this is obviously a field where independent study goes a long way. Personally, I cannot see an 'Associates in Applied Science' (A.A.S. degree) being a necessity. Proficiency with the needed skills seems to be more compelling. I cannot clearly see an A.A.S. being compelling resume material, unless it leads the way to a bachelor's degree in a related subject (but then there are higher level certs. where those who start in their early 20s can be earning close to 200K per year by their late thirties, and they do not involve having a bachelor's degree). 'MyComputerCareer' provides its graduates with a 'certificate of completion' which has limited utility. The school has limited name recognition, and thus the certs are that much more important. Please let me know if you have any questions, and thanks for getting the word out!
regards,
XXXXX,

List found here.

(the list was somewhat cumbersome to copy and paste the text so I thought it easier to just link to it. There is also additional information included about each certification that may be of use to you).

Alex Looking to Hire Cappy Cappites

January 29, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Howdy All,

Alex over at Academic Composition is looking for some sales people to load up want ads on Craigs List. Not the most exciting work, but can be done from home and it can pay some bills. See the details below:

"Want to earn a little extra money on the side working from home? All you need to do is put up ads on Craigslist, you'll make 5 bucks for each person who'll respond to your ad. You'll also make a buck for each day your ad stays live on the forum. No, this isn't one of those "get rich quick" scams, but it is a reliable way to earn anywhere from $50 to $200 per week in less than half hour of work. The college semester is just starting out and lots of students will be looking for people to write papers for them, so it's certain that you'll be able to generate plenty of leads every week. Contact Alex at academiccomposition@gmail.com and he'll get you started. "

"Austerity" - It's Greek to Me!

January 29, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Austerity in both the dictionary and in real world economics means cutting government spending so you run a surplus, usually in order to pay down or at least stem ballooning government debts.

However, "austerity" has a different meaning to communists, socialists, leftists, democrats and other varied sorts of the same Marxist political spectrum - "bloody murder."

Had you been paying attention to Greece (or even some of the lefter leaning parties in the western world) an orchestrated, purposeful, and intentional assault has been made on the word "austerity." The left (as they like to do with many other words) has targeted the word "austerity" and now intend to redefine it and villainize it so a lemming-like population of sheeple will vote against it, no matter how necessary and required it is. And so like "anti-biotics" or "emergency heart surgery" or "CPR," the left (at least in Greece) has managed to avoid taking it's much necessary medicine by making the word "austerity" a pejorative.

But was what Greece was going through really "austerity?" Did the government "tighten it's belt," run surpluses, and give a much needed, reality based, come to Jesus meeting, rah-rah pep talk to its citizens about knuckling down, doing their share "so we can get through this and see the dawn of tomorrow?"

Ha!

Like all leftists you are nearly guaranteed that what comes out of their mouths is 100% false.

First, the Greek government came nowhere close to running a surplus. Deficits as a percentage of GDP are still laughably in double digits which, for normal countries, could indicate they were engaged in a war.

Greece Government budget deficit

AdChoices ▶ Deficit ▶ GDP ▶ Greece Flag ▶ Percent

‹ Ghana Government budget deficit up Grenada Government budget deficit ›

Greece: Deficit evolution

	Millions $	% GDP
2013	-7,659 $	-12.20%
2012	-15,825 $	-8.60%
2011	-27,958 $	-10.10%
2010	-32,444 $	-11.10%
2009	-50,359 $	-15.20%
2008	-34,095 $	-9.90%
2007	-20,823 $	-6.70%
2006	-16,351 $	-6.10%
2005	-13,560 $	-5.20%
2004	-17,108 $	-7.50%
2003	-11,144 $	-5.60%
2002	-7,225 $	-4.80%

Second, leftists always looking for an excuse will muster their almightiest of mathematics and make the 4th grade level observation that it could have been REVENUES that were decreasing faster than spending. Really?

Admittedly the chart is missing its past two years (thanks for being on top of that one OECD!), but let's not kid ourselves. Greek deficits were NOT caused by a revenue problem, they were caused by a spending problem.

And finally, as the leftists are against the ropes, painted into a corner by reality and facts, we can reliably predict their next move because it's the same damn move they've always made before. They're going to blame government spending on the always reliable, always evil "corporate tax breaks," "military spending," and "give aways for the rich."

However, unfortunately this is not America, and (as is always the case with leftists) it's not true. The Greek budget (which is actually quite difficult to come by) shows what those of us who insist on being informed already know. The majority of the spending binge went to darlings of leftist spending.

The budget is rather lengthy and detailed, but if you look at table 3.18 you'll notice three things.

1. If you add up all the leftist/socialist/social programs, for 2014 they add up to 66 out of the 88 billion Euro budget. This is roughly 75% of the budget. Not "defense spending." Not "money to rich people." Leftist, socialist programs are the primary cause of the country's financial woes.

2. There are some issues with the "general state expenditure," since it accounts for 37 billion Euro. But since the states do not have defense, etc., I am assuming the majority of that money as well goes to leftist social programs.

3. Government employees. Even if you don't look at the functional purposes of each budgetary group, each group has a shockingly high percentage of their expenses going to "salaries and pension." Indicating AGAIN a leftist, socialist preference to overpay government employees.

In the end, I am fully aware that none of these charts is going to convince a single leftist, let alone the professional activist parasite who's avoided a real job all his life (like our president) who is now the Prime Minister of Greece. But that is not the point of this post.

It is to point out that these people are delusional. They literally have a mental problem and that is the inability to live in the real world. However, unlike other instances where there is a working class or a productive class to bail them out, thereby keeping the delusion up, Greece does not have that. It is at the mercy of the EU. And this will be one of the first (of what I predict to be several more) instances where socialists and leftists will be told "no" and for the first time in their lives face the economic reality that you can't have a society of "professional activists," "teachers," "professors," "government workers," and other parasites because in the end they produce absolutely nothing of real economic value.

And we, my friends, are going to have a front row seat to watch these communists explode with cognitive dissonance.

Stay Frosty Boys

January 30, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Stay the freak frosty.

Sponsor - Fancomics.net

January 31, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Howdy All!

A young man is starting a funding campaign for a fanfiction website wherein (if I understand this correctly) fans help participate in creating works of fiction (books, video, comics, webcomics) etc. He is in the beginning stages and needs money for setting up the website, servers, other IT stuff, as well as spreading the word and getting some talent and fans.

The reason you may be interested is the theme of the site which is Anti-SJW.

I know a lot of Red-Pillers, freedom lovers, capitalists, Manospherians, and other sorts of people are out there and this is a way to fight back against the SJW's as well as maybe exhibit your artistic flair.

Again, he's only at the fund raising stage of this project. But if you wanted to help fund him AND get in contact about potentially become a contributor to his site visit his fund raising site here.

Thanks

Cappy

Some Saturday Linkage

February 1, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

I predict suicide will continue to increase and I also predict life expectancy increases will start to slow, perhaps even decline for men within our lifetimes.

Men will find agency and purpose in their lives. Even if it means finding it in video games.

The Man of "DT and The Man" is forced to go to diversity training. I will simply say this - if you have a mortgage or debt or a car loan, then you need to suffer this blatant leftist, anti-white male hatred. If you don't, then you can tell your employer to FOAD if they dare to force you to attend this propaganda.

This is a house I could live in.

Understanding the Economic Concept of "Wealth"

February 1, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

"Wealth" or being "wealthy" is well understood by most people in society. We know "wealth" when we see it. We all know we want to be "wealthy." But when it comes to having a thorough and fundamental economic understanding of wealth, most people (even economists) fail. The reasons are many, but most people just don't have the time or intellectual desire to fully think through "wealth." However, if you take the time to do, not only do you drastically improve your understanding of economics, but you also dramatically increase your chances of being happy. And that, ultimately, is the point and purpose of economics and life.

The first "stage" or level of understanding of wealth people have is money. I remember a friend of mine and I in college walking across campus on a blustery fall day. The wind was blowing and somewhere upwind somebody must have dropped some cash because soon $1 and $5 bills were blowing right across our feet.

For a nanosecond we were stunned because, well..."there's money blowing across our feet." But soon our innate, human instincts kicked in and we were scrambling to grab as much cash as we can, pushing each other out of the way in a spirited friendly competition of enrichment. After grabbing all we could see we were each about $15 "wealthier," but what I remember most about it was the IMMEDIATE and RAPID genetic response we both had to chase and push each other over bits of green colored paper.

The question is why were we so excited about paper?

Obviously it wasn't the paper as much as it was the stuff the paper could buy. And if we could grab that money it would allow us to buy stuff that would directly help support and enhance our lives. And this is the second "stage" of people's understanding of wealth. It's not about the money. It's about the stuff.

This is a key epiphany to have because what you realize is that economics is not about the "money" a nation prints. It's about how much stuff it can produce. This is why, again, Adam Smith wrote "The Wealth of Nations" not the "Money of Nations."

However, what precisely is stuff? Yes it is goods and services that can be used to help extend, maintain, and enhance your life, but does just having more "stuff" necessarily make you wealthy?

Well, yes and no.

Everybody needs a certain amount of "stuff" to survive. We all need a certain amount of food. We all need a certain amount and quality of shelter. And we all need a certain amount of clothing. But for the vast majority of mankind's 2 million year existence on this planet just scrounging up this basic level of "stuff" was incredibly challenging. Again, it was no more than 300 years ago that hunger was the number on thing humans were battling against for survival. Thus it is very much hard-wired into our brains to scrounge and consume as much stuff as possible for survival (which is why dogs will not stop eating just as humans won't either and we have an obesity problem despite the "food" problem being solved). Ergo, human's drive to be wealthy is not so much about the stuff itself but to have the peace of mind, sense of security, and psychological benefit that comes with being wealthy. i.e. - you never have to worry about starvation, survival, shelter, or work again (notice how immediate and happy people are when they win the lottery).

Now, in a literally sense to be wealthy, this would mean you would have to store up all the food you're going to eat, have a house you will live in forever, and have all the other material items and "stuffs" collected at some massive depot. Then, slowly, but surely, you'd eat through these resources, dying fat and happy.

But "stuff" doesn't work that way. Food rots. Milk spoils. Even houses deteriorate and collapse without maintenance. So how does one get wealthy without owning that actual stuff?

Well, welcome to the third stage. Time.

At first you'd be tempted to say, "well I would just store all my wealth in the form of money to purchase future stuff!" And this is true. You could store your wealth in the form of money in a bank account, silver or gold in a vault, or some other form of economic medium that stores your wealth.

But (bar winning the lottery) how did you get so wealthy in the first place? Where does this "wealth," the ability to buy future stuff (and so much of it you don't have to worry about it anymore) come from?

Well, the answer is time.

Again, barring winning the lottery or inheriting wealth, you have to understand what wealth really is and what its origins truly are. For while wealth is just "a lot of stuff" stuff at its "economic-atomic level" is created with human time.

I've mentioned this before in several of my books because the concept is so important, but everything you see around you ONLY exists in its current form because human time went into it. The computer you are reading this on right now was sand, metals, and minerals in the ground. And that sand, metal and minerals would remain there had it not been for humans to dig them up out of the ground, refine them, and then assemble them into this computer. The walls and sheet rock in the room you are currently in would still be timber and rock somewhere had it not been for humans who cut, hauled, and built the building around you.

In other words, yes, stuff is the true source of wealth, but stuff does not exist unless humans exchange their time turning raw materials into usable, consumable stuffs.

Thus, when we look at this or any other economy, it is no so much various tradesmen and specialists exchanging their wares, products and services as much as it is an exchange of time. I will give up my time producing a car in exchange for money. This money will allow me NOT to buy groceries, but rather to pay for the time of the thousands of people involved in producing groceries.

This then puts the onus and origins of wealth in the only place it can be - your time. Specifically, how valuable is your time relative to other people whose time you are going to exchange yours for.

If you are going to become an "English major" or an "aspiring rap artist" or a "professional activist" let us be very clear what you are saying. You are saying,

"My time is worthless. One minute of my time has little to no value because nobody will exchange one minute of their time executing their profession for me executing mine."

HOwever, if you were to become a doctor, an engineer, a pharmacist, or a tradesman you are saying,

"My time has value. One minute of my time will command MULTIPLE minutes of other peoples' because my trade, my skill is that much more difficult, specialized, and in demand."

And it is this disparity, this difference, this deficit between how many minutes of other people's time you can command with a mere minute of yours that builds wealth.

This is why the "Masters in Pansexual Horned Frog 19th Century Literature Studies" makes $9 an hour serving fries to an electrician who makes $50 hour wiring the house of a surgeon who charges $90,000 for 5 hours of open heart surgery. However, don't think of it in terms of "dollars per hour" think of it in terms of "minutes of a skilled person per minutes of an unskilled person."

If I do the math right, just ONE MINUTE of the surgeon above can command 2,000 minutes of the Pansexual Horned Frog Literature major. And since it is human time that ultimately makes all stuff, you can see with such an huge ratio how skilled people can accumulate and command such wealth.

This, technically explains to the atomic level what wealth really is and where it comes from. However, this is only on an economics level. There is one final stage to truly understand wealth, and this also involves time.

Understand there is a law of diminishing returns to wealth. That once you get enough of it, you derive less and less benefit from it. So when Bill Gates made his first billion, no doubt he was very happy. But what about the next billion? And the next billion? And that one after that? For all practical purposes the "first" billion took care of most of his material needs, desires, and wants. But as fun and awesome it is to have lots of "stuff," stuff is not the most important or sought after item in the world.

It's other people. Specifically their time.

Yes, you can command people through money and the labor market to give you 4 minutes of their time in exchange for 1 of yours. But they are working for you and in the end are giving you the finished product of "stuff." But what humans truly value is the time and company of other people who do not give them a "product" or a thing in the end, but companionship, love, friendship, and intellectual stimulation. It is (again) why playing video games is fun, but playing against your friends online is even better. Going to a movie is great, but watching it with friends is better.

In other words the ultimate form of wealth is other people WILLINGLY deciding to spend a percentage of their finite and dwindling lives hanging out with you. Not in the expectation there will be "stuff" at the end, but simply because they want to.

This then changes the focus of wealth from "skilling up" or "leveling up" so your time is more precious than other people's time in the labor market, to that of being a good and enjoyable person. A good and enjoyable person that people willingly spend their time on.

Are you honorable?
Are you honest?
Do you speak the truth?
Are you interesting?
Are you funny?
Are you selfless?
Are you altruistic?
Do you have standards?
Do you have ethics?
Are you charming?
Are you entertaining?
Are you interesting?
And are you humble?

In other words, to be truly wealthy you need to command other people's time in two different ways. One, economically so you can accumulate enough wealth all your material needs are taken care of. But, two, socially so other humans willingly spend time with you and you have good social, familial and romantic lives.

This final "stage" or epiphany is arguably the most important economic lesson humans need to learn. Because once realized not only does it makes people happier, but it has a drastic and amazing effect on your personal finances. For once you realize that true wealth comes from friends, family, and loved ones, your need to make a ton of money for material wealth disappears, or at least is severely lessened to a minimalist level. And if all 315 million Americans realized this, imagine what would happen to our finances.

Nobody would be borrowing money to buy a fancy car they can't afford to impress people.
Nobody would be buying designer jeans or bags to impress people they hate.
Nobody would be slaving away to pay for a mortgage on a McMansion next to the Joneses.

Nearly all consumer and personal debt would be wiped out (or severely lessened), people would adequately save for retirement, and a level of sanity and economic knowledge would pervade the entire population that no doubt would lead to a much more stable, brighter, and happier economic future.

But something tells me more people will tune into Kim Kardashian's derriere than read this article.

Oh well, enjoy the decline!

IBM Baby Boomers Actually Get It

February 2, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

I didn't believe it when I saw it, but there is ONE company and ONE group of baby boomers who know how profitable it can be to get rid of all that damn office space and allow your employees to telecommute;

IBM.

Read to the part where they gained $1.9 billion when they sold their unneeded office space.

What savvy, charming, handsome, and clairvoyant economist, gifted with SAEG(TM) no less, saw this coming years ago?

Hint - it's not Janet Yellen.

Durrr, I'm a Libral Arts Majer!

February 4, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Facts! Gotta love me some facts!

Also no surprise the business majors are bottom barrel too.

The $10 Billion Blackmailing of the Democrat Party

February 5, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

100% serious. You can make it more serious by buying copies for your fellow black male friends.

Your Taxes 2015

February 5, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

As our prodigal son returns (because, well, he has to because it's his nature), Child Elkins returns with his 2015 Tax Guide.

It's tax season folks, and whether you're an individual or a corporation or a self employed contractor, it pays to pay for Elkin's guide.

You can find it here and make money on this purchase because the price you pay will more than adequately pay for the price you paid in tax savings.

So stop screwing around thinking you know better trying to read all those damn IRS rules and regulations. Just buy Chad's guide already!

Cover's Done!

February 5, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Still waiting on my $14.4 billion from the Democrat party and Amazon to finalize the book. In the meantime, here's the cover. The model is also the photographer and he did a hell of a job.

What Single Parents Should Say

February 5, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

I made this comment and realized that it is more profound than I originally thought:

I've never seen, "I'm sorry to my children and I humbly thank all the people who are paying extra taxes and sacrificing extra parts of their lives to afford me and my children a better life. I will dedicate my life to pay you back."

Never. Never.

Always, "you owe me more" "don't judge me" "you don't know what I've gone through."

Fuck 'em. Not even their children will visit them in the nursing home. Their best friend will be a government check. They wasted their lives. Let them suffer it.

Thursday Night Linkage

February 6, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

A hottie redheaded wifey explains how to avoid Valentine's Day. I wasn't really paying attention to what she said.

"Journalism" was never a real profession to begin with. I think the baby boomer infested MSM proved that and removed it far far away from being the "4th branch of government." But hey, you get your Masters in Journalism all you want. Real people will just start blogs.

Before you become a mechanic.

Your funny ha ha for the day.

" I Like to Travel, Tee Hee!"

February 6, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

"Lousy Western medicine and their lousy culture and all their damn patriarchy! I'll show them!!!"

You sure did sweetheart. You sure did.

How Laziness Explains Everything About Politics

February 8, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Breaking it down for ye'all

Sunday Linkage

February 9, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

This is another reason the US dollar has maintained its reserve status.

"Feminist Choir" proves my law that laziness drives all of leftism.

Affirmative action on parade. I shall not attend.

Why Corporate America is not your friend either.

QOTD - "Envy drives leftism. The beautiful, never claim EQUALITY with ugly people. Intelligent people do not claim equality with dumb people. Equality is only claimed by those who feel inferior."

I would merely add "are inferior."

Dear Seattle, This Is Your Future

February 9, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

You socialists are so dumb.

Stupid Americans Not Playing Keynesian Ball

February 9, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Given the largest stimulus post WWII, many-a-Keynesians are (secretly) very upset their academic and government economics models are no longer working.

Never mind economics isn't a real study in the first place.
Never mind their flagship economic model (Keynesianism) is based on data only going back to 1947.
Never mind their Lord and Savior (John Maynard Keynes) explained ONE economic phenomenon in his life (the Great Depression)
And never mind every "great" contemporary economist today has failed in their job to get the economy going.

No, we're just going to sit and pout and (scramble) to find/concoct reasons our economic models aren't working and the economy is remaining stagnant despite trillions in stimulus spending.

But while they live-up to the phrase "those who can't do teach or work for the government," real economists are going to try to rationally explain why, despite trillions of dollars in stimulus spending, US economy growth is stagnating.

Enter - "Animal Spirits."

Animal Spirits is an economic term that is used to describe humans' natural "instinct" of sorts to capitalize on economic opportunities to (primarily) enrich themselves. And what is perplexing the ~~world's dumbest economists~~ Keynesians now is "Why aren't those gosh darn animal spirits resulting in more growth, investment, and spending!" We currently have relatively low taxes (if you use government revenues as a percent of GDP) and we also currently have relatively high spending (as a percent of GDP). And interest rates are at an all time low. So why aren't those people blowing their life savings on investments, opening up businesses, and buying consumer crap they don't need!?

Well, there's some problems. While many on the left will point to consumer confidence, the commensurate spending is just not materializing. THis has resulted in a divergence between confidence and the velocity of money (the rate at which a dollar is received and then respent).

But if we look at another chart, you start to see something that is really killing those ungrateful, disobedient Animal Spirits - debt.

(it should be noted the chart only has data going back to 2009, but generally correlates with the velocity figure. The US FRED database for some reason only goes back to 2009 and I'm too damn lazy to go hunting for the data)

You see, that whole housing crash has had a lengthy effect on people's memories and thus psychologies. Gen X was obliterated during the housing crash, having whatever equity that may have been built up in their homes destroyed. And Gen Y is currently saddled with their student loans, not to mention the worst job market (for them) since the Great Depression, prohibiting them from spending money even if they wanted to.

The result?

Throw all the Keynesian stimulus you want at this population, it's been trained to become minimalists, eschew debt, and not play Keynesian ball.

The truth is that effectively two generations' faiths have been destroyed in their futures and the American dream. And when you take that away from any person, they have no real reason to mobilize as labor, let alone be foolish to start a business.

That sad truth for the charlatans posing as academian and government economists is that when your beloved leader does nothing to boost the economy and spews hatred against investment, success and private property (you didn't build that, not paying your fair share, 14% taxes on overseas profits, Obamacare) it scares away Animal Spirits no matter how much money you piss away on government deficits and no matter how low you set interest rates and no matter how much QE money you print.
You completely failed to instill ANY faith in the future of America, and worse, instead of painting a picture of a future America where success, profits, riches, and wealth are championed, you painted one where such things are criminalized and confiscated.

Your laziness, love for socialism, and envy of others has blinded you from practicality, effectiveness, and reality. And so you can print off all the money you want. Promise single mothers all the free housing you want. And make all the worthless community college degrees free to all 315 million Americans. None of this Keynesian poppycock will result in genuine confidence among the American people, especially the innovators, entrepreneurs, investors, and other non-parasitic classes who are your only hope of growing the economy. Ergo, you can expect that velocity of money to stay nice and low and perhaps while you're down there try to scrounge around for some other lofty, theoretical reason your grand, master economic theories are failing.

"The Black Man's Guide Out of Poverty" NOW AVAILABLE!!!!!

February 10, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Happy day all! The Black Man's Guide Out of Poverty is now available on paperback! Kindle will be following shortly when I get around to it tomorrow after recaulking the seams in my wood burning stove pipe that decided to start belching out smoke earlier this morning.

Cowardly, Lazy, and Typical, Communist Greeks

February 10, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Yep, this is not surprising at all. The ole "reparations" gambit.

Anything to avoid real work, eh Greeks?

The Extermination of the Individual

February 10, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Uncie Bern Bern delves into the sick and evil world of communist Russia.

Episode #81 The Clarey Podcast

February 10, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

The symphonic scores of Spaghetti Westerns
Cappy's childhood memory of his backyard going on forever
The sad realization adventures have a limit and end
Where humans never set foot in America
Cappy refuses to pay a ticket in Switzerland
Cappy refuses to ever move to Switzerland
"Look it up in the dictionary" vs. "Google it"
Parents who'd rather read Danielle Steel that spend time with their kids Allowing your dogs to piss in your house
Fan mail

AND MORE

in THIS CURSE-LADEN EPISODE of The Clarey Podcast.

The NPV of a College Degree

February 11, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Oh no! Maths!!!!!

Dating Problems of Men in the Bakken

February 11, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

I received this Asshole Consulting request earlier this week and after I thought about it, the video warranted to be a post unto itself. The reason is not just because of the interesting dating dynamics that result from an environment where men out-populate women 10-1, but the 21 YEAR OLD kid who made the request is every woman's dream come true circa 1950 (makes six figures, owns his own house, got promoted, etc).

However, the tragedy is that it's not 1950. And what would have been a SUPREME catch back in the day, is eschewed by young women today as they are too busy chasing after their liberal arts majors and the commensurate poor careers that come along with it. Thus, the next time you hear a woman say, "Where have all the good men gone?" I want you to point them here:

Uh Oh! The Truth About Female and Male Professors!

February 11, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Brilliant little chart program here where you can type in a trait or word and see (based on major) whether men or women professors in those fields are described as such. It is based on RateMyProfessor.com and the data is just too funny and telling.

I've tried the follow search terms:

Entertaining
Funny
Pointless
Rambles
Fell Asleep

the best one, however is hates men/hates women.

Also, do not just look at the sex ratio, also look at the difference between STEM and non-STEM.

And the Pretty Lies Continue

February 12, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Whatever dipshittery you aging women who blew your chances years ago have to tell yourself.

My favorite is how it's all about inner beauty....

but she still has to wear heels, eyelash extensions, and learn the "beauty pageant walk."

Enjoy the decline, ladies. Enjoy that decline.

Remember the Aggregators

February 12, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Sure, the aggregators send us traffic, but how often do you send back the love?

Viva La Manosphere
Delusion Damage
Manosphere 24/7
Libertarian Zebby
Instapundit

The Race Whore Industry Scared Stupid…Literally

February 12, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Everybody knew and warned me that in publishing The Black Man's Guide Out of Poverty I would face a ton of backlash. To that I responded,

"Tis Christmas, Theo. It's the time of miracles."

(Bonus points if you can guess the movie and connect the dots)

However, I didn't think the backlash would start so quickly and so STUPIDLY. Below, a fake review of my book by a fake account. I highlighted the date it was posted for a reason.

2 of 28 people found the following review helpful:

★☆☆☆☆ A Narcissistic Waste Of Time

By Wendelex Wallace on February 10, 2015

Where should I begin with this nonsensical attempt at guiding the black man out of poverty? I'll start with Clancy's flawed premise that all or most black men are actually impoverished. Sure, a disproportionate amount of us are mired in poverty, but there is a healthy and growing subset among us who are investment bankers, attorneys, and self made millionaires. It is us in this latter group that find the title both humorous and condescending at the same time.

Clancy also tends to underestimate the strong cultural pull away from success in many black male lives. If you grow up in a family, community, and culture which values social defiance and "keeping it real," a conscious decision to turn over a new leaf as a clean cut, polished, speaker of the Queen's English would earn you derision, scorn, and possibly even personal harm. It is easier said than done when the culture of defiance and hip hop is your world and the only one you have ever known. Aaron.

Finally, Aaron offers no clue how to handle delicate issues like finessing job related bigotry, bias, and hostility. Clancy has no clue how to manage encounters with law enforcement officers. Clancy has no clue how to use the civil legal process to redress concerns instead of resorting to violence.

While I think this is a well intentioned attempt to advise poor black men out of negative circumstances, Clancy's superficial understanding of the complex issues poor black men face make this more of an ego-boosting project for Clancy than a treatise on detailing how to break the cycles of poverty too many black men are born into.

That reason being I published The Black Man's Guide Out of Poverty at around 6PM February 9th and had sent out NO pre-published copies to anyone.

Either FedEx is super fast and this guy is a very fast reader, or he's just a pimp from the Race Whore industry, not to mention a genuine racist for trying to block a book that would help out a minority group.

It's very simple. If you want to strike back at this blatant racism and evil, you can buy The Black Man's Guide Out of Poverty here or simply tell friends about it. They are scared and it's not even been out 72 hours yet.

Hellz Yes - Man from U.N.C.L.E.

February 12, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

If you want to know why this is a great thing, you need to purchase this and then be as cool as me.

I should warn you though. Owning such a cool DVD series in an attache case has been known to make women misbehave themselves.

Debbie Turrentine and the Child Outsourcing Industry

February 12, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Debbie Turrentine is a 35 year day care veteran in the Springfield area. And she's upset! And the reason she's upset is because the State of Illinois is likely to ~~cut~~ not give as much money as they did last year to the Child Outsourcing Industry.

But what is the Child Outsourcing Industry you ask?
And why should we care?

Well young lieutenants, aspiring economists, and agents in the field, pour yourself a cocktail and let Uncie Cappy explain.

It all started long ago in the late 60's and early 70's when two variables or trends were taking place. One was the 2nd wave of feminism that was educating (then) young girls about independence, equality, and (for some of the more extreme elements) how they did not need a man. Women could do anything men could do. And not only could they do that, they could "Have It All" (TM) - a career, an education, a retirement, a husband, and children. Of course even though this was a trebling of the amount of work that would be required to technically have "everything," the number of hours sadly, did not treble. Which meant an increase in one of these "things" would necessitate a decrease in another.

The second thing was no-fault divorce. This allowed husbands and wives to divorce without there being any wrong doing by one of the parties. In other words, you could divorce for any reason. So frivolous could the reasons be, people often called it "frivorce." This resulted in a BOOM in divorce for the first generation to be married under it - the baby boomers. And just as Jackie Robinson made baseball a hallmark of black athletes, the baby boomer generation made divorce an Olympic event. Divorce rates skyrocketed to where 1 in 2 marriages ended in divorce, and worse, it now seems this "All American Pastime" has passed onto Gen X and Gen Y.

Now these two trends or "variables" at the time were likely well-intentioned. Why wouldn't you want women to have all the opportunities and successes of men? Who wouldn't want to have it all? And why ruin or even inconvenience your life if your marriage is no longer working? On the face of it, they seem very logical, even libertinely American. But sadly they were quite myopic. For there was one insy, winsy, teeny, weeny, nearly borderline microscopic problem.

Children.

For while the people at the time were very much focused on their own lives, they failed to account for what the two aforementioned variables would do to any would-be ~~mistakes~~ children that would have been brought into this ~~psychotic, dysfunctional, narcissistic environment~~ world.

You see, the problem with children is apparently they take not only resources but TIME as well. And to deal with these inconvenient parasites society, in nearly ALL parts of the world, naturally evolved a familial structure or system based on the division of labor.

ONE parent would work to earn the resources to support the family, while
ONE parent would stay at home and take care of the children.

This system worked for 2 million years, 3 billion if you include preceding evolutionary relatives of humans, and still works for the vast majority of mammals on the planet today. However, the people of the 60's and 70's were too busy focusing on themselves to have an ounce of foresight, selflessness, or just plain common sense about how this would affect children. And so the two aforementioned variables delivered a one-two punch to the families, but mainly children, of America.

By the mid to late 70's children were being brought up under broken homes. By the mid 80's any social shame in being a single parent was expunged. And today, it's gone so far that the nuclear family is mocked, while women turkey basting themselves are celebrated as "heroic." Never mind that children from single parents or broken homes do worse and suffer more on pretty much every other variables. Society was adhering to the two aforementioned variables and that trumped all.

But there was a problem, especially for the women.

Precisely how were they supposed to "have it all" with these damn parasites running around? Apparently, you can't just leave them to fend for themselves. They need to be tended to, taken care of, fed, and entertained. And what if there's no other spouse in the house? By golly, that just really throws an inconvenient crimp in one's career and social life, doesn't it?

But never fear, the Child Outsourcing Industry is here.

The Child Outsourcing Industry was originally just a loose network of grandparents, friends, families, and loved ones that would occasional watch over your inconvenient parasites should you and your spouse need a night out and a little adult time. In its undeveloped and unenlightened stage, it operated from the premise the people who brought the parasites into the world would be responsible for said parasites. However, such naivety and ignorance was quickly abolished as the desire for "women to have it all" and parents to get out of inconvenient marriages trumped the needs of their children.

And thus, over the past two decades the Child Outsourcing Industry went from mere baby sitters and grandparents to a multi-trillion dollar, government subsidized industry, full of professionals, social workers, and babysitters-posing-as-teachers who would take those nasty, disgusting parasites off of your hands, and raise your kids for you while you pursued a career and filed for divorce.

Of course, this industry does not come cheap.

With the job of parenting now outsourced to the state, the full cost and burden of rearing these unwanted parasites falls on the taxpayer.

Baby sitting masquerading as "daycare"
Baby sitting masquerading as "pre-school"
Baby sitting masquerading as "elementary school"
Baby sitting masquerading as "before/after school activities"

And shucks howdy, let's not forget all the other euphemistic ways the Debbie Turrentine's of the world help take care of your parasites

Special ed "teachers"
Social workers
Guidance counselors
Nutrition specialists
Community centers
Summer program coordinators
School lunch coordinators
School breakfast assistant diversity counselors

When you ad that up, by gosh that's some serious dough!

But thankfully in a very Keynesian way, this is a BLESSING, not a curse. For you see, people like Ms. Turrentine with their worthless liberal arts degrees in ~~"Baby Sitting"~~ "Education" or "Early Childhood Development" or "Social Work" would normally not be employed, for their degrees were more "hobbies" and easy ones that avoided math and practicality. But now they can find ~~ego~~ meaningful employment for their ~~worthless government make work job~~ profession. And they are only to happy to do so.

There is however, one slight, minor drawback.

In order to finance all of the Child Outsourcing Industry the taxpayers need to shell out around $2.5 trillion annually. This necessitates that BOTH parents work to pay the extra taxes needed for the Child Outsourcing Industry. Thankfully, women wanted to have it all, which means instead of suffering at home raising their own children, they are enjoying a rich, rewarding life, hard at work being "equal to men," stuck in traffic, commuting 2 hours a day, working soul-sucking jobs, bucking for that promotion, kissing their boss' ass, and paying that much needed 50% tax rate (of course, don't let the fact the majority of women major in and pursue careers to merely raise the children of other women, and thus are still being mothers, making this whole industry redundant, kick you in the teeth).

So, as you see, Ms. Turrentine is right. If the taxpayers don't shell out more dough, some people may actually be FORCED to dirty their hands parenting their own parasites. Parents would have to look away from Narcissus' pool and contemplate such distasteful things like altruism, selflessness, compassion and love for their ~~children~~ parasites. And since we all know that men and women are entitled to "have it all," have the right to divorce at any time, and are the most important things in this world, it is vital the government step in and make sure something as inconvenient as children does not interrupt their perfection.

Enjoy that decline, people. Enjoy that freaking decline.

Aaron Clarey is an evil, right-wing, libertarian, racisthomophobesexistCISgenderedwhitemaleophile, who believes in Western-civilization-centric concepts like empiricism, morality, independence, self-supportation, reality and other hate-based concepts. He is the author of a lot of mean books, a podcast that should be banned, and a YouTube channel where he spreads his hate. He even charges for his hate with his consulting division "Asshole Consulting." He lives in his mother's basement and oppresses people different than him.

Victor Borge Now Ennio Morricone

February 13, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

I was talking with The Great Matt Baldoni about music. I often run my amateurish musical tastes past his to ensure that my ears do indeed have a good taste for good music and I'm not accidentally going pop. So when I confessed an appreciation for the Spaghetti Western's symphonic scores, specifically the works of Ennio Morricone, I was happy to know that not only did he highly approve, but that Mr. Morricone was still performing.

I thought the man was dead.

This upset me because there are still some stubborn greats that have given death the finger. Victor Borge was one of them, and I was fortunate enough to see him twice before he inevitably passed. But did you know Don Rickles is still alive? And so why not see Ennio Morricone? There are many truly great legends that still live and PERFORM to this day that we either assumed were dead, or our parents lacked the cultural tastes to inform us of their existence in the first place, leaving us to discover them on our own, only to assume they were dead.

Ennio's performances are relegated to Europe now. And though I generally loathe the continent, I do believe I am going to have to fly out there to see this great musician before he passes. Besides, he has the hallmark of a great man that very few modern day ones can match. And to that, I think we should get a rag tag band of Cappy Cappites to wear tuxedos and rendezvous to see this man perform at least once in our lives.

Things Liberal Arts Majors Can't Do

February 13, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Leave the awesome to the STEM, IT, and geek professionals.

PS - No liberal arts majors were hurt, nor used in the production of this video or any of the awesomeness you just witnessed.

Episode #82 The Clarey Podcast - Road Trip Edition

February 14, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

I wont lie I recorded this podcast drunk and half of it was not up to my standards after listening to it sober. Ended up cutting out half of it. Regardless!

GWAR, KMFDM, Ministry, Revolting Cocks
Emulating people versus being yourself
Naive, idiot Cappy buying flowers for his dates in the 90's
Complete douche moves Cappy did as a youth
Ennio Morricone is still alive and we're all going to Europe
Fuck Switzerland
World's hottest flight attendants? Mexicana Air!

AND MORE!

In this road trip episode of The Clarey Podcast!

I will be road tripping for the next two weeks out west and to the south in celebration of my 40th birthday party. Posts and podcasts will depend on internet access and free time.

Outstanding

February 15, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

From our Grunge Girl Agent in the Field.

Road Trip Linkage

February 15, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

A ranger goes to college and runs into…hipsters.

You will never replace the nuclear family or a real life father. No matter how much money you throw at it.

Your first mistake was to assume non-profit people were there for anybody other than themselves.

Two crappy Minneapolis law schools merge into one big crappy law school.

Dalrock is kind enough to cite me in his post about how HR women view the hiring process like dating.

Why the Left Will Never Stop

February 17, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Language warning, but a true observation:

Misogynist MGTOW's

February 18, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

This won't be controversial at all (slight language warning):

Episode #84 National Parks Podcast Edition

February 19, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

In this surprisingly curse-free podcast:

Observations about the US National Park Service
"Retract the broom stick from my ass"
What Cappy would do if he went back to corporate America
The Priest, the Marine, and the Mountaineer Cappy hung out with in Denver
Cappy's just another, normal, guy
A dad gives up his high paying career to raise his daughter

AND MORE!!!

I Didn't Even Know the Oscars Were On

February 23, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

It's nice to see America is losing its tastes for watching Hollywood masturbate to itself.

Embracing the Suck Part 1

February 23, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

As many of you know it is my 40th birthday party and I rewarded myself for living this long with a 2 week trip out in the wild west. The first part was a trek to what (invariably) led to Las Vegas, but entailed exploring the southwest corner of Colorado. Specifically, visiting Mesa Verde national park and a wonderful hike though "The Canyon of the Ancients" which has similar Ute Indian dwellings from the 1100's. Just wanted to share some pics and prove to my loyal readers that I am not "goofing off" or "having fun," but am hard at work ensuing that I am as Cappy as I can possibly be.

However, I did want to explain one of the pictures below because it is pretty cool. It is the cemetery from a true western town that did exist called "Pahreah." Not only was it a real western town, it was also a movie studio location for various western shows, and a couple of movies. Not least of which was the final scene in "The Outlaw Josey Wales." I will simply make the statement that "adventure is out there" and all you have to do is leave your home to discover it.

Embrace the Suck Part 2

February 25, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

More pictures from this lousy life. These pictures include scenes from our hike in the Red Rocks state park, a hike down to the Colorado River from the Hoover dam, Cowboy Aurini who is taking well to his new Nevada home, me and the affable Sergeant Rumpie Fluffalo summiting Turtle Peak, and a trip out to the Valley of Fire north of Vegas.

Tonight's Bed Stand

February 25, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

The Simplicity of Capitalism and Freedom

February 27, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Some cursing:

A PhD In Gardening

February 28, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Honest to god. I thought it was:

1. A spoof
2. And if not a spoof, a bogus degree offered at a bogus school.

It's the University of Michigan.

Which I guess is now a bogus school.

Kansas Snow Storm Road Trip Linkage

February 28, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

The costs of falling in love - payment one way I assure you.

And the bubble goes "POP!"

Isn't this the same MSM entity that purposely edited the audio to make Zimmerman sound racist?

When leftists try to "do economics." (note, she's ugly too!)

What, wait? WHO just did WHAT!!???

DT and the Man will keep me company on my trek back home. YOu should listen to them too.

Aurini opens business for his philosophy consulting venture "Aurini's Insights" Consider visiting him if you have a question about philosophy and everything Davis.

Episode #85 of The Clarey Podcast

March 1, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Why driving through an ice storm in Albuquerque is like Return of the Jedi
The ideas you come up with in Kansas
The "Those were good times" Joke
Shorter to look it up on Google
Venezuela's president blames the US for his screw ups
We'd, sadly, have to kill all North Koreans
What if Whites/Males/Jews/and other boogeymen actually committed the crimes they were accused of?

AND MORE!!!

In THIS EPISODE of The Clarey Podcast!

There's No Such Thing as Capital Gains

March 2, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Alex is Looking to Hire Again

March 3, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

For anybody out there looking for a job (that admittedly is boring, but you can do it from a beach drinking rum and cokes) Alex at Academic Composition is looking to hire. Information is below:

Want to earn a little extra money on the side working from home? All you need to do is put up ads on Craigslist, you'll make 5 bucks for each person who'll respond to your ad. You'll also make a buck for each day your ad stays live on the forum. No, this isn't one of those "get rich quick" scams, but it is a reliable way to earn anywhere from $50 to $200 per week in less than half hour of work. We're now in the middle of mid-terms and lots of students will be looking for people to write papers for them, so it's certain that you'll be able to generate plenty of leads every week. Contact Alex at academiccomposition@gmail.com to get started If you reside in the United States, you will need to post in the CL sector allocated for the metropolitan area near you. If you reside in Canada, you will need to do likewise, but post on Kijiji instead. Please feel free to apply if you reside anywhere on the Continent, however, the following regions are the most likely to bring in the highest number of leads. 1. Los Angeles 2. Denver 3. Minneapolis 4. Vancouver 5. Dallas 6. Austin 7. Atlanta 8. Boston 9. DC 10. Toronto Aleksey Bashtavenko Academic Composition Owner & Principal Writer (540) 300-1253 academiccomposition@gmail.com www.academiccomposition.com www.linkedin.com/pub/aleksey-bashtavenko/25/7b8/323/

Helping Blacks is Now "Racist"

March 3, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

I swear, the insanity political correctness has caused:

STD's - "Student Loan Debt"

March 4, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Remember to vaccinate your children against STD's. Buy them Worthless.

Gov. Mark Dayton Found to Be Stalking His Wife

March 5, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Gov. Mark Dayton is seeking a meeting "as soon as possible" with his wife about her decision to go out with her girlfriends Friday night without his knowledge.

Dayton told reporters Wednesday that he did not get advance warning about her going out as it is customary for his wife to inform him of everything she does, thinks, and says. He says he wants to hear directly from her about what she did, why she did, and who she was with.

In a statement, Mrs. Dayton said she looks forward to working with Mark and other Minnesota elected officials to inform them about her intentions and whereabouts last Friday.

Mrs. Dayton told friends Tuesday that she would "do what she wanted because she is her own person and Mark did not own her as a slave." Governor Mark Dayton called this display of self-ownership "tragic."

Original article here.

My take on it here.

Were the Nazi's (the National SOCIALISTS) Socialist?

March 5, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

I faced a problem.

I had found another one of those "universally known economic assumptions" that everybody assumes is true, but did not know for a fact whether or not it was. We all know these economic assumptions, and even we are guilty of assuming they're true every day:

Capitalism is the best economic system there is (proven true)
"The rich don't pay their fair share" (proven false)
"Sexism is causing the wage gap" (proven false), and "Housing always goes up" (absolutely proven false)

However, this one was going to be a little bit harder to prove:

Whether the Nazis (the National SOCIALISTS) were indeed socialist.

The reason I was interested in proving this right/wrong is because it often surfaces when people are debating ideologies and many conservative/libertarian/freemarket types will point out that the "Nazis were socialist" in order to show that not all socialists are "nice" and that Hitler wasn't "right wing". However, it wasn't simply going to be a matter of going to the FRED database, pulling two data series, correlating them in Excel and then giving the proverbial statistical finger to the left. It was going to be more problematic.

First, I'll buy you a beer if you can find the actual Nazi's budget. And I'll buy you a chaser if you can find them going back to pre war Germany. AND I'll buy you a martini if you can get me their GNP/GDP figures!

They just don't seem to exist.

It's either been too long ago or the actual documents have been destroy or they're buried in some CIA warehouse next to the Ark of the Covenant. So I couldn't conclusively point at numbers and had to find some other means.

This brought up the second problem. Without actual budget figures, I had to rely on academic research. Unfortunately, this academic research largely focused on military spending and not non-military spending or the overall political-economic philosophy of the Nazi party. However, it did provide some great insight into what Hitler was "thinking" in terms of economics, as well as precise and specific actions the government took during pre-war and wartime Germany. Some of these actions included:

Price controls
Establishing a national labor group
Massive deficit spending (however no obvious data was available)
Massive public works (like our CCC, the autobahn, and other Keynesian things)
Rationing
Nationalizing industries
Banning large retail stores (though due to their primarily Jewish ownership)
Government issuance of securities rising to 90% of total securities issued (ie only 10% private sector)
And a corporate tax reaching 98%

All of these are obviously and blatantly socialist, and conservatives may think they've won the debate about whether the Nazis were socialist here. But you know the left and you know merely citing actions Nazis took is NOT going to convince them.

You need data.
You need charts.
You need irrefutable proof.

That's the only way to get leftists to stare blankly at your data, be speechless, then shrug their shoulders, dismiss your data, and call you a racist (which is the only form of victory you can get over leftists because they are so delusional they think they can never be wrong).

So inevitably, I knew I would have to find data. And after a solid hour of researching, I found two datasets, pre-war Germany, that though NOT GDP and the actual Nazi federal budgets, still allowed me to do a little bit of Algebra (that's "math" for you liberal arts majors) and come up with the precise numbers I was looking for:

Nazi military expenditure as a % of GDP

and

The pre-war budget of the Third Reich

When I put them together I could infer the dataset I universally use to determine whether or not a country is "socialist" or "capitalist."

Government spending as a % of GDP

	Military Expenses	Total Expenses	Non Military Expenditures	Military Spending % GDP	Implied GDP	Total Spending % GDP	Non Military Spending % GDP
1935	1.9	10.4	8.5	0.05	28.73	43.8%	35.8%
1936	4	12.8	8.8	0.13	30.79823077	41.6%	28.6%
1937	5.8	15.8	10	0.13	44.61538462	35.4%	22.4%
1938	8.2	20.1	11.9	0.17	48.23529412	41.7%	24.7%
1939	18.4	31.8	13.4	0.23	80	39.8%	16.8%

And when we look at the actual numbers we can conclusively say that the Nazis were indeed socialists.

Government spending as a percentage of GDP averaged around 40% pre-war. Additionally (at least in the beginning) 80% of the budget was spent on social programs, not the hallmark of an "evil, right wing, capitalist economy." And when combined with the blatant socialist moves of nationalization, government work projects, price controls, and other forms of government intervention it is very clear that the effective economic philosophy of the Nazis was socialism.

However, in intellectually honesty (as well as intellectual interest) there are some interesting observations that need to be pointed out.

One, there was not much time to witness or study Nazism's economic policy that wasn't obscured or masked by Hitler's war ambitions. Matter of fact nearly all of the academic research on "Nazi Economics" was about Hitler's drive for re-armament. Ergo, to see the default state of a "peace time Nazi economy" you maybe get that in 1935 before Hitler ramps up the military spending.

Two, the "Nazi miracle" (where Hitler gets Germany to full employment faster than any other western nation out of the Great Depression) is actually quite misleading. Yes GDP was growing at double digit rates. Yes, "full employment" was attained. But it was all due to an overly aggressive rearmament. So "overly aggressive" that actual standards of living decreased. The military took so much in terms of resources civilians had to suffer rationing, consume less consumer goods and in general sacrifice for the military. And this was NOT even during the war.

Three, ironically the same could be said about the US. Once we entered the war we essentially did what Nazi Germany did during pre-war. Build up our military at all costs. Food and fuel rationing. But in a Keynesian dream come true we "got that dem der GDP figure nice and high and got dat dem der employment rate to full" even though people will still sacrificing. About the only thing that could be said that was better in the US was that pre-war we were getting out of the depression by supplying the Europeans the materials they needed to kill each other. This once again shows the obfuscating effect war has on an economy making it difficult to discuss whether that economy is indeed "capitalist" or "socialist."

Finally, the father of Nazism himself, Hitler, actually didn't seem too interested in economics. He was not consistent in different economic stances, first claiming one thing, then contradicting in another. And though I did not read Mein Kampf, his overall effective actions (in my research) were to outsource the economics of Nazism to his financial leaders (Schacht, Funk, and Goering). Here (once again) the focus shifted almost immediately from rebuilding Germany to preparing it for war.

In the end, however, whatever Hitler's and the Nazi's ultimate philosophical economic aims were, the actions and numbers were effectively socialist. Certainly during "peacetime" and especially so during war (as military spending is still state spending, akin to North Korea). Thankfully, it is a theoretical debate about what a post-WWII Nazi economy would look like.

They're Only Human Afterall

March 6, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

I would have guessed,

"Young men who put becoming heroes over finding something worthy of becoming heroic about" as to why young men become terrorists, but sexual slaves makes just as much sense.

Socialists Wonder Why People Aren't Breeding

March 6, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Ug, the level of stupid in this is amazing.

Governments becoming more and more desperate to get younger people to breed ~~so they can have future slaves to fund their social security~~ eerrrr...."continue the culture and population."

Sorry socialists.

You let every other culture into our countries.
You CHEERED THEM ON and PREFERRED THEM TO OUR OWN
You pay parasites and punish producers
And good lord, don't even get me started about what your feminist division has done to men's desire to pro-create.

No, you created this problem and our future would be children will not be the solution to it. This is where the game ends and any (unfortunate enough children) born to socialist parents are the ones who are going to pay for your idiocy.

Enjoy the Decline.

For Our Military Men

March 7, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Never happens, right?

Cappy on the Black Brigade

March 7, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Drove down to visit DT and The Man as they had me on a guest for their podcast.

Here is part 2.

We talk about defeatism within the freedom movement, is it possible to "save America," the "podcast biz," how a YouTube channel is NOT a podcast (enter stuffy elite "cough cough" here), "Charolette Johanssen," "ask Davis Aurini," misanthropy, and more!

Just so you know, I do NOT control how many sounders are put in there. Take it up with DT.

Why Investing Is No Longer Possible

March 9, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

In one of my classroom discussions (in a class I teach online), I answered one of my student's questions about dividends and whether it's possible to find an "undervalued stock" in today's market. The answer ended up being a bit more profound and insightful than I anticipated and thought it might be of benefit to you yahoos:

"As for the art of picking stocks (or any other investment), correct. The art is finding the undervalued ones, in spite of whether the overall market is overvalued or not.

However, in the past 30 years, ESPECIALLY the past 6-8, the markets no longer reflect the value of investments or the securities they're supposed to. This is largely due to:

retirement plans flooding the stock market low interest rates prompting companies to borrow at low rates to repurchase shares HFT
and quantitative easing money ending up in the stock market

In other words, to pick stocks one can no longer look at the individual company or underlying assets of the investment. You need to predict government policy, federal reserve moves, international monetary flows, and people's investing habits.

Unfortunately, all of that renders traditional analysis moot and (frankly) makes the entire process of stock valuation even more impossible than it was before. All that being said, it only reinforces the importance of finding an UNDERVALUED stock relative to its dividends or earnings ESPECIALLY given the trillions of NON-investment dollars that are flooding the market and distorting prices."

US Money Supply as a Percent of Global GDP

March 9, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

If you don't know what a "world reserve currency" is, allow me to explain it in terms of non-economists (ie-normal people who have sex).

Not all countries are created equal. Many are corrupt, either through their leaders, their people, or both. And so if other countries, people or businesses would like to conduct business with one such country (say, Greece or North Korea or some other unreliable crap hole) you would like to receive payment not in Drachma/Euros or North Korean Won, but something more stable. This gives rise to demand for a third party's currency, a third party whose currency is reliable and trustworthy.

Enter in the US dollar.

After WWII it was pretty apparent that the United States was "the last man standing." Yes, many countries on the Allied side of the war "won," but their economies and infrastructures were devastated. It was only the US that had the economic productive capacity to make their green pieces of paper valuable (not to mention the Ward Cleaverly-Dwight Eisenhowery-US was infinitely more reliable and trustworthy than the murderous Stalin). And so the US dollar became the world's "reserve currency" which allowed international commerce to be conducted in a reliable and trustworthy medium of exchange.

Fast forward many decades later and you might ask, "Now that all these countries have recovered, why do we even have a global currency?" And that is a good question. Nearly all the participants of WWII have recovered, rebuilding their infrastructures and economies, producing economic value that provides their pieces of paper worth, so why not let all countries' respective pieces of paper trade against each other on the international currency markets?

Which they do, but, there are two things that keep the US dollar as the world's reserve currency.

1. There is still demand for international transactions to be made between two different countries in a currency that is largely deemed reliable. The US dollar (more or less) has and continues to more or less fit this bill. Countries trust it, view the United States with confidence and believe our green backs have intrinsic value.

2. Habit. Though I am not a huge international traveler, it is amazing how many countries accept US dollars. Cut across the border to either Canada or Mexico, they take US dollars. Take a boat to nearly any Caribbean island, they take US dollars. The Jamaicans at the (only) tropical resort I ever visited, very happy to take dollars.

But just try the reverse.

No Canadian can buy anything with their "fancy schmancy" "plastic" currency here in the US.
I don't even know what a Jamaican dollar looks like, let alone would be willing to accept one.
And Mexican Pesos I view as a novelty that I can more or less assume will lose value as what few I've collected sit and inflate away in my desk.

Now most people (both Americans and non) don't think twice about this. They merely accept it as fact that "yes, my US dollar will likely be accepted in most countries" and "hell yes, I'll take that dirty, filthy Yanqi money off of your hands Americano!"

But if you think about it, the economic ramifications of this agreement are immense (if not, outright insane). And if you figure out what these ramifications are you will not only more thoroughly understand what a "reserve currency" is, but be able to understand a lot of what is going on with the US economy.

The primary "epiphany" you should realize from this is that through mere TRUST, through mere RELIABILITY one currency can replace all others. But infinitely more impressive than that is that in replacing all other currencies you exponentially improve that currency's purchasing power (and thus the lives of the people who live in the country that is home to the world's reserve currency).

In other words, each "normal" countries' respective currency can only buy goods and services within that country.

Jamaican dollars can only purchase what is made in Jamaica.
Japanese Yen can only buy what is made in Japan.
And Australian dollars can only buy what's made in Australia.

But US dollars can buy nearly everything in the world.

In other words, if you can get your currency to become a world reserve currency, your purchasing power goes from the mere domestic production of your lowly, single country to that of the entire world. And all without lifting a finger or providing the slightest bit of additional economic production.

In the case of the US dollar, this means Americans (or anybody holding a US dollar) can not only buy the $17 trillion in US made goods and services, but (more or less) the $76 TRILLION in world GDP.

Did Americans work harder?

No.

Are Americans smarter?

No.

Did "The Lord Our Savior Jesus Christ" look favorably upon us?

No.

All that happened was 60 odd years ago millions of US soldiers came over to Europe and Japan, helped destroy what remained of the majority of the world's economic producing countries, while the US homeland remained relatively unscathed, giving us and the US dollar the much-coveted "world reserve currency status."

And now, instead of just being able to buy goods in these here United States of 'Merica, we can and have bought whatever we damned well pleased simply because "we're Americans."

However, there is an additional benefit to being the world's reserve currency. Not only do we get to buy everything in the world, but nearly all of our financial sins are bought and paid for by the work and toil of others.

Consider two countries - Greece and the United States.

Both have unsupportable debts.
Both run chronic deficits.
Both have increasingly lazy and slothful people.
Both support their parasites over their producers.
And both are headed up by spoiled socialist children incomprehensibly ignorant of economics.

So how is it Greece is going through tumult and chaos, while the US is enjoying is getting away scot-free?

Well, perhaps a chart will help.

Below is the M2 money supply of the US dollar divided by US GDP and World GDP.

US Dollars Per Dollar of WORLD GDP and US GDP
(Source: FRED and some other place on the internet I failed to bookmark)
0.70
0.60
0.50
0.40
0.30
0.20
0.10
-
US Dollars/World GDP
US Dollars/US GDP
1981
1982
1983
1984
1985
1986 1987
1988
1989
1990
1991
1992
1993
1994
1995
1996
1997
1998
1999 2000
2001
2002
2003
2004
2005
2006
2007
2008
2009
2010
2011
2012
2013
2014

What this essentially shows is how much money there is relative to the amount of stuff that money can purchase. Normally you would compare the US dollar to US economic production (the red line), however, since the US dollar is the world reserve currency, it pays to compare it to what it can really buy - the world's economic output.

This results in an interesting divergence between the two numbers. The red line shows what most Americans are concerned about. An increasing amount of money being printed against a stagnating amount of economic production. There was roughly 51 cents for every dollar of GDP circulating, while now it's 65 cents - fears of inflation and a run on precious metals expected. However, the blue line shows something quite different. Almost an "ideal" increase of the money supply along with the economic production that said currency can buy, resulting in practically no change and no inflation. And when you consider that the US dollar is the reserve currency of the world and that it is not solely affected by domestic production (but fear of other countries' inferior currencies) then a lot of other things make sense in this seemingly economically insane world.

One, this is why the United States can behave like Greece, but not suffer the consequences. Americans are by all means just as spoiled and petulant as the Greeks. We just happen to have the world's reserve currency...so nanny nanny boo boo on them.

Two, this is why our deficits and debts seemingly don't matter to anybody. If the US was an individual applying for a loan, no bank, even the crappy ones I worked at, would touch him. But since it's the "US" and we have the magical currency, every other country out there is more than happy to lend our insolvent and irresponsible government money.

Three, this is why precious metals haven't gone up (as much as was anticipated anyway). By every sane, reasonable, and empirical logic, gold and silver should be rocketing against the US dollar. But this would, once again, assume the US dollar could only purchase US goods. It also assumes nearly every other country out there sucks even worse than the United States. Ergo, with things looking worse in other countries, combined with the US' already-established world reserve currency, it is just too convenient for people to pile into the dollar, giving it more purchasing power, and driving precious metal prices down against it.

There are other economic phenomena that having the world's reserve currency explains (and masks). But there is one thing I do want to point out about it. It moots and obsoletes nearly every form of traditional (and sane) economic analysis. One of the things I loathe about leftists and Keynesians is the intellectual dishonesty they flagrantly display proclaiming their policies (which have failed in nearly every other country) works here in the US. While marginally true, it's completely contingent on an incredibly lucky economic technicality - we have the world's reserve currency. You take that away and the US would be no different than Greece, Japan, Spain, Portugal, or any other heavily indebted, non-producing nation. The truth is modern day Keynsian economics and the leftist faux-economists it has spawned are miserable failures that owe the delay of their demise to millions of WWII soldiers and two very large oceans that blessed the US with a world reserve currency. And to stand there, hiding behind this fact, while having the audacity to claim they know what they're doing, while the rest of the world proves they don't, is the epitome of cowardice and hypocrisy.

Aaron Clarey is a normal guy who just happened to become an economist. He does not have his doctorate in economics which makes him superior to most others. He has authored several books about finance and economics that are actually interesting, insightful, and digestible by the average person. You can find his rantings and tirades on his You Tube channel as well as is "whenever he feels like it" podcast. You may also contract his services by visiting his consulting division Asshole Consulting.

"The Black Man's Guide Out of Poverty" Now Available in Kindle!

March 10, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Finally available!

And don't forget my other awesome books, the worst of which is better than the best of "Oprah's Book Club."

The 10% State

March 10, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Bernard Chapin, if you are unaware of, is a micro-celebrity of You Tube fame who generates about 2-3 short 10 minute videos each day and is also a daily stop for your beloved Captain. The majority of Uncie Bern's material covers the daily news, with a focus and specialization on chronicling the efforts of marxists, feminists, and others to bring down the United State and destroy freedom.

However, while the majority of Bernard's focus is on exposing these scum, he does occasionally wander into the realm of philosophy and economics, a common refrain of his being the "10% State."

Bernard's argument is quite simple - that the entirety of the state should cost us no more than 10% of our production. That if we got rid of income transfers, forced people to support themselves, and government merely provided true public goods and services, our final tax bill would only be 10%. Naturally, he receives guff from the parasites that rely on the taxpayer to support them, but parasitism aside, he's 100% right.

The state really only does cost 10%.

If you look at the federal budget (which I know for some leftists is going to be a virginal experience), and add up ONLY the government services that are truly part of "governance" you'll find out that the 2015 federal budget really needn't be more than $1.1 trillion.

Take out social security.
Take out Medicare and Medicaid
Take out the EPA, Department of Education, Department of Agriculture, NASA and all the other unneeded bureaucracies and (if you did it right) you'll come up with a bare bones budget of $1.1 trillion.

Divide that by the roughly $17 trillion economy we have and you get 6.5%. Well below the 10% state Bernard portends.

Of course, this does not account for state and local spending which historical and on average run about 1/3 total federal spending. Add an additional 2% (or even 4% for Californians!) and you're still well below the 10%.

Naturally, this is merely an intellectual and academic exercise about what "could have been." The 10% state will never be revisited (we were there once) as the American public is too spoiled, too dumb, and too satiated by government goodies to appreciate what a potential future we could have. But I did want to at least validate and prove that what Bernard Chapin is calling for is absolutely and 100% feasible. A 10% state would and has worked.

Sadly, this is a democracy. And sadly, the masses are the most spoiled and idiotic in American history. And thus the 10% State will remain where we last left it - in history.

(Author's note - No wandering cauldrons of politically incorrect commentary were hurt in the writing of this post)

English Majors of the Math World

March 10, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

As you know I largely loathe and despise English teachers. It is nothing short of child abuse that we force millions of children every year to essentially sit in a prison, 9 months a year, and learn a language they already know.

Yes, I know grades K-4 are necessary to learn to read and write.
Yes, I know things like penmanship, reading and writing are necessary to become effective communicators in the real world.

But the mental abuse (post 4th grade) of forcing children to learn obsolete, unnecessary, and idiotic things like "dangling participles," "dipthongs," and diagramming sentences is mere make-slavery-work-child-labor to employ (largely) 20 something girls too lazy to do math and instead chose to become English teachers.

But before we get too riled up about the all-too-common liberal arts teachers, we need to focus on math teachers.

Oh yes.

For while they may (and for all practical points and purposes do) deliver a real and needed education to the children, there is one subsegment of math that is as obsolete as learning the difference between an adjective and an adverb.

Integers
Whole Numbers
Rational Numbers
Irrational Numbers
Natural Numbers
and any other vocabulary terms anal retentive math purists foisted on otherwise unsuspecting and innocent child math geniuses

Not once, in all of my math studies, was it necessary for me to know what the hell those aforementioned things are/were.

Multivariable regression was used to program models that would predict GDP growth.
Correlation coefficients and other statistical measures used to test relationships with different economic and financial phenomena.
I've even used trig to measure the side of a roof for a shed I was building.

But never, EVER have I or anybody else ever had to know what an integer was or what a "natural" number was.

The truth is the only thing these "things" serve is to lower the test scores of math geniuses and give math teachers who can't do math something to belabor their children over for a week's worth of material and lesson plans. No doubt there's going to be some idiot "professional educator" that's going to parrot the reason why we teach such unneeded poppy cock, and I'm sure some mathematician is going to explain the "importance" of differentiating between and integer and a "whole number." But in the end we all know it's an unnecessary hoop we make children, math textbook publishers, and teachers jump through, wasting calories of energy that could be used studying and teaching math that actually matters and has real world applications.

The Reason for America's Demise in One Video

March 10, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

It's graphic, not because of cursing, but because of grotesque insanity.

The Three "Shitties" of Public Schools

March 11, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Minneapolis Public Schools had a cute outright lie they advertised on KBEM FM 88.5 (a radio station they run, because we all know public schools should be running radio stations).

It went something like

"Good Teachers,
Great Kids
Great Schools."

I had to laugh because I knew the opposite was quite true. Minneapolis had the shittiest teachers the shittiest kids and the shittiest schools.

But it made me think. Precisely what are the ingredients that go into making a school shitty, good, or even great? And I think the Minneapolis Public Schools were very close when it came to ingredients, they just had very poor quality ingredients to throw into the pot.

So I developed a new and revised formula for the Minneapolis Public Schools with one caveat. The formula is:

Parents
+
Teachers
+
Children
=
Schools

And the caveat is that only two of the three ingredients have to be shitty in order for the whole school to be shitty.

For example you can have great kids, but horrible parents and horrible teachers. Doesn't matter how great the kid does, his parents are losers, his teachers are losers and the kid is likely condemned to failure.

Another combination, shitty teachers, shitty children, but great teachers. Much as I loathe teachers I do know there's a handful of them out there who truly do care about education and are indeed great teachers. Unfortunately, that's rendered moot when you have shitty students and equally shitty parents who believe their children can do no wrong (though that is more of a trait of elitist suburban schools, and not the inner city). Regardless, the kid is condemned to failure.

And then there's shitty teachers and shitty students. The parents could have the greatest intentions in the world, but unfortunately the state now effectively raises your children from 5 years old on. You are merely to feed, clothe, and house them until they can be returned to the state indoctrination facility for an amount of time that nearly quadruples the amount of time you get with your own flesh and blood. Again, failed school.

We can go on, but the point is as the moral decay of America has progressed and higher and higher percentage of these three pillars are being corrupted, increasingly becoming "shittier," a higher and higher percentage of our schools are becoming "shitty." And it doesn't matter how much money we throw at them, it's going to require personal resolve, character and dedication to excellence of ALL THREE GROUPS to improve public education.

Until that time you can expect increasing amounts of:

Single/incompetent/absentee/outsourcing parents
Misbehaving children, and Poorer quality teachers

all resulting in the laughing stock that has become public education. And it will only be a joke until these poor kids are dumped out into the real world.

But hey, at least you didn't have to raise your own kids
And at least you got summers off.
And at least you got your GED.

Why Women Do the Majority of Housework

March 12, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

There is usually a lot of anger and confusion among both sexes, especially when social engineers tinker with genetics and society, forcing social roles that were largely already hashed out over billions of years of evolution. And housework is one of those things that most men "meh" at, while women grip, whine, complain, moan and scream bloody murder over.

So let ole Cappy explain why the debate about "who does the majority of housework" is not only stupid and moot, but solve it with a health dose of reality and realism.

Whoever wants the cleaner house does the cleaning.

I'll say that again.

Whoever wants the cleaner house does the cleaning.

You'll notice that this rule (based in reality) is not sexist or biased. It is an asexual statement as it can be a man who is more cleansely, or a woman who is more cleansely. However, it is usually women who have the higher standard of cleanliness.

This then revisits that good old fashioned world of economics. Specifically, supply and demand. If somebody has a higher demand for something, then they are the ones not in the position of power and the ones that must compensate and compromise.

A guy who isn't as interested as dating a girl as she is in him.
Why men must do the majority of asking out and not vice versa.
An employer who has 100 applicants for one job versus the starving, debt laden college graduate.
The man in need of a kidney versus the man with one to spare.

And people who want a cleaner house than their spouse get to do the cleaning.

This has largely (though not always) been the case with myself. I keep my abode "biologically clean." That means toilets, dishes, laundry, and anything else that has the potential to spontaneously spawn Ebola gets cleaned. But vacuuming, dusting and cleaning out the microwave? Not a weekly event. But I'll be damned if it wasn't 9 out of the 10 girls I dated who would start doing dishes (that didn't need doing), complain about the dust, and whine about clothes on the floor, all while I was in perfect health and the world still continued to turn.

Like most women, nearly all of them would try to negotiate and get me to do more of the household chores or at least at a higher frequency. But unlike our Swedish male counterparts I used a word that has since likely been lost in the Swedish language - no.

There was also not an argument, an explanation, or a lecture that followed, but a declarative statement.

"I will clean to my standards of cleanliness when I deem it necessary. If you wish to clean to a higher standard AND more frequently you may. But that is your choice and not something you will hold over me or keep track of on some kind of 'chore scorecard.'"

And everytime, EVERY TIME it has worked because not only was I being a real man, but it's true.

The person who wants a cleaner house cleans.

Of course, the truth is this whole drama over housework is precisely that - drama. A Western Civilization-wide shit test feminists and unconscious females are programmed to administer to test the mettle of their (increasingly failing) men. And a mere dismissal of this test will allow you to pass with flying colors.

But if they insist or do not relent. Actually being serious about housework, to the point they threaten to leave or end the relationship, then all you have to do is walk them out to their car, take a look at the oil change sticker they got at Jiffy Lube 8 months and 6,000 miles ago, hand them a socket wrench set and a jack and say,

"You're overdue for an oil change. Have fun dear."

And when she invariably asks you "what kind of oil," "how much oil," "how do I get the lifty thing under the car," etc., etc., you merely break out your lawn chair, pour a nice scotch, light up a cigar and answer,

"Google it, Google it, Google it."

And that one oil change will end the debate of "who does the housework" forever.

When Ego and Fear Trump Truth

March 13, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

You can visit the Clarey Podcast here.

Gen X Moms - Doe Eyes of YouTube

March 14, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

In my previous podcast there was a segment where I warn younger generations (Millinneals) that my generation (Gen X) never really matured or grew up. And that if you operate from the logical, but highly flawed premise that "older people know what they're talking about" then you are in for a world of hurt, much like my generation was when we assumed the Baby Boomers knew what they were talking about when they were in their 40's and 50's.

Of course, this tangentially touches on a concern I always have running in the back of my mind. Namely, that the wisdom and life experiences I have may become obsoleted or moot as society changes. Ergo, the wisdom I got through living in the 80's and 90's, may not apply to younger people of the 00's and 10's.

Thankfully, (or sadly depending on how you look at it) it seems the advice us "elder brothers" of Gen X is needed now more than ever, because things have not changed, let alone improved as Gen X has taken over. Matter of fact they've gotten worse. And this video shows it.

I wanted to highlight "Doe Eyes" because this is a woman that is in my generation and you can tell at one time she was the hottie girl in her school through her 20's. But what should be blindingly clear, as well as outright scary, is how this full grown woman, who is a mother, is still acting like a 15 year old child.

And this is the threat and the problem that I cannot emphasize enough to younger generations.

Because she is older she not only thinks she can dispense advice to younger generations, but you younger kids out there are predisposed to believe her simply because she's an "elder." Young men are going to listen to her advice, assume it's correct because "she's an adult," and waste an estimated 2 decades pursuing a flawed chick-getting-strategy. The result will not just be failure, but frustration, mental stress, confusion, and insanity.

Thankfully, however, that's why you have the Red Pill/Manosphere/internet community.

Roosh was the original discoverer of the video and has since sent traffic there. I am retweeting it and addressing it as well. And I'm sure you will share and downvote this veritable and arrogant cunt's video (since she has taken comments down). Whatever it is, we owe it to out younger boys and girls out there to identify, highlight, expose and destroy such propaganda and lies so that they may not be misled by frauds like Doe Eyes, and may have better, saner lives that are based in reality.

Post post - somebody pointed out the kid wrote a girl a poem and that this was viewed as a "bad" thing. Ladies, if you wonder "why don't men do nice things like write poems anymore," there's your answer.

Gen X Moms v. 2.0

March 15, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

RamZPaul finds that the DoeEyes Gen X mom is not only telling boys how not to approach her daughter, but she also has a video on how to give blow jobs (obviously not intended for young boys).

I'll say it again, they are the adults now, and young people would be wise to know they are insane.

Might Want to Hold Off On Going Galt

March 16, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Economists with souls and normal people with brains would look at the twice elected Obama and the people who put him into office and say,

"This country is not going back to the greatness it came from and is permanently headed towards a more common, and uninspiring European socialist model. Ergo, the great American Experiment is over, democracy with its idiot masses are forever here to stay, and it's now time to buy up silver and go Galt."

And you'd be right.

True to form Obama and a more-or-less democrat congress voted in the highest levels of peace-time spending in the country, ran the highest levels of peace-time deficits, resulting in the highest peace-time national debt (which is about to eclipse our all time record war-time debt during WWII). Throw in Obamacare and a couple extra trillion in crony-owned Solyndras and lord knows what else in socialist pork, and you have a political and economic environment where the rational and logic thing to do would be to scale down, work less, and go Galt.

Except for one thing - deficit spending.

While our politicians obey the idiot masses and just spend spend spend, they also want to be re-elected. So the last thing they do is force the true cost of these social programs on the population. Instead they keep taxes artificially low and borrow the money to finance these vote-bribing programs, resulting in huge deficits and a huge national debt.

Federal Spending, Revenues and Deficit % GDP
Source FRED Database
30%
25% 20% 15% 10%
5% 0% -5%
Spending Revenue
Deficit
1947
1949
1951
1953
1955
1957
1959
1961
1963
1965
1967
1969
1971
1973
1975
1977
1979
1981
1983
1985
1987
1989
1991
1993
1995
1997
1999
2001
2003
2005
2007
2009
2011
2013

But what this means for you and any other American who is thinking about going Galt is that the true tax rate has merely been deferred into the future. Our tax rate TODAY (disagreeable as you may find it) is actually quite low. Unsustainably low. And at some point in time in the future, it's going to have to go up (especially given this doesn't even account for $127 trillion in unfunded liabilities).

So what's a young aspiring "Galtist" to do?

Work your ass off and build up some cash if you can.

The reasons are multi-fold.

First, as mentioned before, the current tax rate is artificially low. Take advantage of it. If you can make money today, do so, because you're unlikely to keep this high a percentage of your income for the rest of your life.

Second, you'll have time. Not just because our deficit is decreasing ("only" 5% of GDP today), but more importantly because we have the world's reserve currency - the dollar. I've explained it before, but in having the world's reserve currency we can keep borrowing for quite some time no matter how many socialists we elect and no matter how poor our nation's finances. This reserve currency status will essentially allow us to keep overall taxes lower than they need to be, effectively forcing other nations to pay for our spending.

And finally, third, assets are harder to tax than income. Your income has to go through your employer. Your employer has to report this to the IRS. And matter of fact, forget reporting, they just take out the taxes before you see it. However, if you were to work up the cash now at these lower tax rates and purchase assets to be saved into the future, it becomes a little harder for Uncle Sam to come in and take those assets.

What if you just misplaced that gun collection you had?
What if all that cash was blown on strippers and booze?
Shucks howdy, I slipped, fell and ended up living in Singapore with an asset protection trust!

Oh sure, they can confiscate your house and jack up property taxes, but there are other valuable assets you can store your money in today to avoid the sure-as-hell-guaranteed taxes that are coming tomorrow.

Regardless, the point is that tax rates today are very low not relative to history, but relative to what is likely coming in the future. And while it may put great distaste into your mouth to work hard today, it's likely your best move because the distaste tomorrow is going to be on par with tax rates averaging around 60%.

Enjoy the decline!

What Is Private Property?

March 16, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Delving into precisely what is private property and why it is the key to economic success, as well as what happens to economies when you take it away:

According to DudeBroWallStreetFratBoys the Stock Market is Never Overvalued

March 17, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

A new generation is upon us and I know this not only because of common sense and basic demographic information, but because there's been a recent spat of college age/20 somethings who have critiqued my earlier work about the stock market being overvalued. Naturally, my criticisms go back to even before the financial crisis, but this was when most of these finance-majoring DudeBros were all of 10 years old. And now, equipped the little, microscopic, and misleading information that comes with a degree in finance today, these know it all FinanceMajoringDudeBros are going to set the ole Captain straight about how his predictions have not come true, and that they are going to somehow be smarter and better than their baby boomer and Gen X bailed-out bankster counterparts.

Ahhhhh youth.

So let's beat this dead horse one more time.

There are two measures we use to gauge whether a stock is worth the price. Price to Earnings (or the "PE" ratio) and the Dividend Yield.

The PE ratio is simply that - the price per share divided by the earnings per share. It shows you what you are paying in stock price per dollar in earnings. The higher it is the more overvalued a stock is and vice versa.

The dividend yield is the same concept, except we flip the numerator and denominator AND replace earnings with dividends (because you technically only receive dividends, not the total earnings per share of the company). Instead of a ratio (like the PE) you get a "yield" or "percent rate of return" on your investment.

And so when we look at both you can PLAINLY see that the market is severely overvalued.

S&P 500 P/E Ratio
Source: Robert Shiller
50
45 40 35
30
25 20 15 10
5 0
1881.04
1886.08
1891.12
1897.04
1902.08
1907.12
1913.04
1918.08
1923.12
1929.04
1934.08
1939.12
1945.04
1950.08
1955.12
1961.04
1966.08
1971.12
1977.04
1982.08
1987.12
1993.04
1998.08
2003.12
2009.04
2014.08

The historical average PE for the S&P 500 has been 15. It is now trading at 27. If you are a DudeBroFratBoyGoldmanSachsFutureBailoutRecipient, ask yourself a simple question. Is it worth paying nearly $800 for the PS4? Is it worth paying $7/gallon in gas? And is it worth paying $50,000 for a new AVERAGE sedan? Because paying a PE of 27 for a share of stock is no different.

The dividend yield is even worse. The historical average for the dividend yield has been 5%. You could expect to receive a 5% annual rate of return in the form of dividends. Today it is 1.8%, a 277% overvaluation.

Now your PS4 costs $1,108.
A new average sedan $69,000.
And a Big Mac $12.50.

Of course, before we pick on future DudeBroFratBoysofAmerica we have to look at ourselves in the mirror. For while the DudeBroFinanceMajorsofEternalDudeBroness merely parrot what they're told by their charlatans posing as business professors, at least they're not investing in the stock market because they're poor college kids.

The same cannot be said, however, for the millions of obedient, conformist, non-thinking Americans who year after year throw trillions of dollars into their precious 401k and IRA retirement programs. For they are the financially-illiterate zombies that do not take their advice from the likes of Shiller or Schiff, but the 24 year old HR generalist who "strongly recommends" investing in the company's 401k plan tee hee! And in doing so inflate the stock market beyond all sane and reasonable measures of valuation, not to mention price out younger generations (if they are smart enough to read articles such as these).

The point is that there are three major things driving stock prices higher than their fundamental warrant.

1. Quantitative Easing

With the Fed printing off money so it can buy treasuries, mortgages, and other unwanted securities off of the banks' hands, the recipient banks of these monies invariably invest said monies in the stock market driving up prices.

2. Fed-Induced Low Interest Rates

With interest rates very low, it becomes profitable for corporations (ie-shareholders and executives) to borrow at these low rates and repurchase the company's shares. This drives the value of their shares up more than the interest expense the company would have to pay on its debts. Of course, this leveraged buyout ignores whether it's worth paying a PE of 27 for its own shares, further fueling the bubble, AND it ignores what would happen if the economy were to tank while they have so much debt on their books, but hey! We drove the stock price (and thus our stock options) up another 200%, and that's all that matters!

and

3. Retirement Plans

This is the deadest piece of the horse I've beating since 2004. Why, oh why, did the government just magically decide it was "the stock market" that would serve as the primary vehicle for 300 million Americans' retirements?

Why not property?
Why not private businesses?

Matter of fact, what business was it of the government's to provide tax incentives for people to invest for retirement anyway?

Pfa! Who cares, it was "well intended" and that's all that matters. Distortion of the stock market be damned.

In the end, the same mentality that occurred in 1998 for the DotComs, in 2006 for the housing market, an in 2009-present for the education bubble is reappearing again today in the stock market.

"The market keeps going up!"
"You can't afford NOT to be in this market!"
"You need to save for retirement!"
"What do you mean 'earnings'?"
"What do you mean 'dividends'?"

and my all time favorite

"This time it's different."

And while yes, this time it is different (as the Fed has now made the stock market a place that is a viable long term hedge against inflation, NOT a place to invest in an actual company), let us be clear. It's precisely the exact same shit that happened before. And the reason it keeps happening so frequently is because the exact same people it happened to before are too damn ignorant and uneducated about economics, not to mention stupid, to learn from their past experiences.

It drives nearly every real economist in the world to pour a glass of scotch and enjoy the decline.

Cappy's "Retirement Planning in 10 Minutes"

March 17, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

You don't need a Masters in Finance to plan for retirement. You just need this 10 minute video the ole Captain put together with sweat, tears, toil, care, and love.

Also, yes, I am aware the whole video is MORE than 10 minutes, but the actual lecture is under 10.

Regardless, please feel free to forward this if you find it helpful. I'll be using YouTube to create higher quality videos this year as a platform to launch the next book.

Help a Fellow Manospherian Who Has Cancer

March 18, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Kid Strange Love of Manosphere.com fame has unfortunately been diagnosed with cancer at the age of 30. Hodgkin s Lymphoma, but it is one of the more curable forms of cancer.

Regardless, it just plan sucks to get cancer and I thought what would be better than if Kid Strangelove were to wake up to a ton of new traffic to his site as well as a couple thousand new followers on his twitter account.

Anyway, his site is here and his twitter handle is @kidstrangelove

Take a couple seconds to make his day and boost his immune system to fight off cancer.

QOTD - "The Fed Helps Poor People"

March 18, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

From my Veteran Chicago Agent in the Field:

I was walking by the Fed the other day, and there was a Father & Mother taking a picture of their probably 6-7 yr old son by the "Federal Reserve Bank of Chicago" sign.

The mother said, "Now when you grow up you can look at this picture and work for the Fed to help poor people."

I just chuckled, shook my head, and walked past.

Asshole Consulting One Year Annivesary!

March 18, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Happy day all!

Today is Asshole Consulting's one year anniversary!!!

And unlike most American businesses, it was profitable in the very first year!!!

To celebrate I'm having a VERY SPECIAL and VERY ASSHOLELY *0% OFF SALE for all Asshole Consulting requests today! So spread the joyous mirth and happiness of the world's only company that specializes in truth at all costs (and charges for it)! Tell family, friends, and morons who desperately need the services of Asshole Consulting!

The Liberal Arts Have Lost All Validity

March 18, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

I'll say it again for the cheap seats:

The liberal arts are no longer a valid or legitimate study in college. They are nothing more than hobbies in activism and socialism, serving only as functional tools of brainwashing and employment of worthless, talentless leftists in this and other western countries.

I will NEVER hire a liberal arts major (unless they have seen the light)
And I will NEVER trust a liberal arts professor with anything.

Deb Hollingstad - Woman With Horse, Will Spend Money

March 18, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

I'm not going to editorialize, but instead we're going to play a game. A game called

"HOW MANY CAPPY CAP THEMES CAN YOU COUNT IN THE STORY!?"

There's at least 7 in there.

Here's the original story.

Here is Ms. Hollingstad's background.

Discuss!

Narrative Uber Alles, Leftism Uber the Children

March 20, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

I had read an article somewhere where a lesbian mother was confessing she desperately wanted her daughter to become a lesbian. I had tried to find the original article (and if you know of it, please link below), but instead found this more disturbing one from 2011 where the lesbian parents are treating their son with hormone blocking drugs to "give him more time to determine if he wants to be straight or not."

Then there's this article that cites a study that claims to have debunked the "Single Mom Myth." It shows that a mother's education overcomes whatever her marital status she may have when it comes to the efficacy of raising her children. Never mind the sample size they chose was highly dubious. And never mind it was done by an all-woman's college. And never mind the sociologists have a blatant conflict of interest in promoting education to women at the expense of their families. The ends justified the shoddy methodological means.

Now the point I'm going to make is not that this study is proof that academic studies can no longer be trusted, or that lesbians somehow make bad parents. The point is the common variable that connects these two articles together:

Narrative Uber Children.

No matter what the left claims about wanting to help the children (or whatever pet cause they cite), it's instances like the two mentioned above that they belie their true colors. And when you get a glimpse into the true hearts of these leftists you can understand just how evil and vile they are. For they are so wedded to their political ideology that they are not only willing to:

Parasite off of society's producers
Lie to society
Legally steal from others
and Bankrupt the nation, but they will do so at the expense of children, even their own.

This isn't to say that all lesbian mothers put their politics and sexuality above their children. This isn't to say that all sociology doctorates seek to fabricate a "study" that will undermine the upbringing of millions of children. But if you look at the actions of the left, particularly when it comes to forcing them to choose between their ideology, their politics and the leftist narrative or their children, a scary percentage of them will throw their children under the bus.

The reason is simple - ego. They simply value themselves and their ideology more than their children. They are no different than their "right leaning" counterpart families where they have children, only to outsource them to daycare, and are twin siblings of the occasional vegan parents stories where their child dies because the parents valued their faux-vegan-religion more than their children. They are simply vile and evil.

The question is what to do about it?

There's not much that can be done (bar legally in the case of child abuse and neglect), however their arrogance does expose one of their flanks. Society has moved so far to the left and political correctness instilled so many lies, they don't realize their abhorrent behavior is on display for all to see. Worse, they're not even aware their behavior is abhorrent. They think it's noble. It's just. It's admirable. Because it's advocating the leftist narrative, and the narrative is uber alles. So when they proudly display their leftist credentials, while at the same time throwing a generation of children, even their own, under the bus, all one needs to do is highlight it, point it out, and make it very clear just how sick and wrong these people are.

And yes, they will scramble, cowardly hiding behind their victim trait of being "lesbian" or "female" or whatever. And you will be accused of being a racist or a bigot or a homophobe for daring to criticize their priorities and religion. But in the end you are merely and genuinely standing up for the children. Something leftists seem to have a hard time doing.

The Truth About Corporate Taxes

March 22, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Uncie Bern Bern Reviews The Black Man's Guide Out of Poverty

March 23, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Bern was kind enough to review my book and highlighted some excerpts that were particularly powerful. It's written review, but included are two videos.

All Those Smart College Students and Professors

March 23, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

and yet none of them can do The Maths!

(Also note, they have horsies!!!! Yeaaaaaa! Pretty horsies!!!!)

Katherine Byron Meet The Patron Saint Name of Frick

March 24, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

The safe space, Ms. Byron explained, was intended to give people who might find comments "troubling" or "triggering," a place to recuperate. The room was equipped with cookies, coloring books, bubbles, Play-Doh, calming music, pillows, blankets and a video of frolicking puppies, as well as students and staff members trained to deal with trauma.

I'll say it again.

I will NEVER hire a liberal arts major from any college unless they admit they were idiots and are repentant for being so.

"I Thought Age Was Just a Number"

March 24, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Uncie Bern reviews three articles about western women who married their third country lovers. The hilarity that ensues is the entertainment you are entitled to for enduring 40 years of feminist drivel.

The Underrated Gift of Sanity

March 24, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Permit me these examples three.

First, the closing of the all-women's college, Sweet Briar. Sweet Briar last month announced that it would be closing this year. This was greeted with screams and vitriol, claims dreams have been destroyed, and repleted with threats of lawsuits and protests from current day students, as well as alumni and professorial staff.

Never mind the mathematical reality that the liberal arts bubble is bursting.
Never mind they have 1 employee per 5 students.
And never mind this college runs horse stables, indicating insane financial mismanagement and mathematical ineptitude.

Reality doesn't matter to those affected by Sweet Briar's closing. All that matters is what they were told, believed, and wanted. And thus these two irreconcilable forces result in grief, anger, confusion, frustration, and stress.

Second, "girls hate jocks."

Or at least that's what my mother told me when I was a youngin'. Couple that with the 90's decade long propaganda that women wanted kind, caring, sensitive men, and a generation of boys-now-men expended considerable energies during their teens and 20's pursuing women using strategies that were (in part) based on these flawed premises.

The results were entirely predictable - failure. And not just failure, but failure with the same commensurate grief, anger, confusion, frustration, and stress that is currently plaguing the clueless people of Sweet Briar.

And finally, third, "age is just a number."

This is a precious quote from a British woman named Patricia who, despite being 64, thought her marriage to a 26 year old Tunisian man was going to last.

And why wouldn't she?

She was told by feminists, media, professors, and leftist politicians, that 50 is the new 20. Age and beauty are merely social constructs. And men who chase after women for looks are not just shallow, but flawed.

The only problem is reality did not care what politicians, feminists, media types, and professors told her. 2 million years of human evolution prompted the young Tunisian man to leave her, resulting in, once again, grief, anger, confusion, frustration, and stress.

We could go on, but the above three anecdotes point towards a crisis the United States and Western Civilization are slowly, but unavoidably wandering into. A crisis of a deluded population crashing into the impenetrable wall of reality.

How our civilization became so deluded is somewhat complicated, but in hindsight explainable and understandable. With unrivaled economic success due to free markets, freedom, and capitalism, Western Civilization advanced so quickly that the majority of the economic and biological problems that plagued humanity for the past 2 million years were resolved. Hunger was eradicated. Poverty was eradicated. Even certain diseases were completely eradicated that entirely new ones were discovered because humans rarely lived as long in the past. This resulted in a spoiled population that never really endured the hardships of true life, and worse, gave people with a lot of time on their hands, even more.

Idle minds are the devil's workshop, and go to work he did, for instead of being thankful for a life of ease and ample free time, people's egos got in the way and demanded more. Now people were no longer satisfied with a good home cooked meal, they sought out the "injustice" of who precisely cooked that meal. No longer were people satisfied that a rich guy invented a device that allowed them to communicate with people around the world for nearly free. They were obsessed about him having more money, even obsessed about the color of his skin and the fact he was a man. And no longer were people satisfied. And no longer were people thankful for companies that created life saving devices and drugs, but insisted they were oppressed by these engines of innovation for they dared to charge for their services and dared to move to greener pastures. In short, Western Civilization slid into becoming a spoiled brat, narcissistic, envious society where all that mattered was feeding their ego without the required work and accomplishment that would warrant it.

This insatiable desire to feed the ego without the commensurate work resulted in a group of opportunists who were only more than happy to feed society's ego at seemingly no cost. To do this they created, out of whole cloth, false narratives and religions that the naive masses would swallow whole:

Sexism
Racism
Class warfare
"Evil corporations"
"You can't put a price on education"
"You go girl!"
"You can have it all!"

"Lean in!"
"Empowerment/Raising Awareness/
White/Male Privilege
Single moms are heroic
"50 is the new 20!"

and other outright lies

Worse, these charlatans put themselves in key points and positions within society effectively allowing them to brainwash and profit off of the rest of society:

Politicians
Media
Hollywood
Journalists
Professors
Feminists
Teachers
Activists
SJW's
Non-profits, and NGO's

And so even with the benefit of stable and sane parents, even with the benefit of grounded peers, everybody, and I mean EVERYBODY within Western Civilization succumbed, one way or another, to at least ONE bit of erroneous and false propaganda. One bit of false, erroneous propaganda that cost them precious years of their lives.

Millions of students, brainwashed by public school teachers, wasted trillions on stupid, worthless, and completely unemployable degrees.

Millions of children were raised in divorced or single parent homes because feminists convinced women that was just as good an environment as a nuclear family.

Three generations of blacks were brainwashed to believe their last place socioeconomic position was the fault of white males, delivering a tragic mentality of defeatism that led to a self-fulfilling prophecy (but at least ensured democrat politicians had life long careers).

And three generations of women were led to believe their careers and government checks were more important than the human beings in their lives, only to find out too late upon their death beds that they had wasted their one shot at life (but again, at least some democrat politicians got their vote).

We can go on, but you get the point. Everybody in Western Civilization in one capacity or another, was brainwashed to believe in a lie that just wasn't true. And even though they may have believed the lie, it didn't change the fact reality doesn't care. And this conflict between what they were told, what they believed and what reality ultimately delivered has caused nearly everyone untold grief, suffering, confusion, frustration, and anger.

But enter two coincidentally timed events:

1. The development of the internet
2. The Great Recession

The internet is amazing unto itself. However, it has a unique trait that has the potential to undermine the charlatans and con artists posing as politicians, professors, teachers, feminists, etc. It not only allows anybody to write anything they want, but it allows everybody in the world to view it. In other words, the internet side steps the establishment guardians and censors of the MSM media. This allows ordinary people to expose the corrupt people of our society and hopefully "wake up the masses"as to just how brainwashed they are, and to just what a tragedy is being perpetrated against them.

However, people in power do not give it up lightly. And to protect themselves against the internet they have made it socially, professionally, politically, and economically for anybody to speak directly and bluntly about the truth. And this "political correctness" is no joke. With Mozilla, DongleGate, and doxxing, people (primarily on the left) only need to take public statements of a person, found on the internet, tell his/her employer about it and ruin their careers and financial livelihood forever. Thus, even with a powerful tool like the internet at their disposal, most people obey like the sheep they are and dare not speak what they truly think in fear of losing their jobs.

Well…that was until The Great Recession anyway.

For while many people have a career or a family to worry about, The Great Recession made it so millions would never have a career and family to begin with. So devastating and drawn out was this recession nearly 1.5 generations never succeeded much past college, and when you combine its severity with the fact the solution to the recession was to bail out those that caused it, any faith in "authority" or hope in a meritocracy had vanished. And now an estimated 100 million people not only have nothing to lose, but a hatred for those who ruined their lives.

And they've taken to the internet.

The red pill, the Manosphere, the alt right, you name it, millions of people with millions of blogs, YouTube channels and podcasts have formed as the only, but growing beacon of sanity, empiricism and reality. Everyday they highlight and point out the insanity they see, but the rest of the world doesn't as they're too absorbed in themselves and protective of their egos to do so. And these internet rogues also point out the perpetrators who are responsible for it, profiling and shining a light on the endless list of politicians, feminists, professors, deans, activists, and others who are scrambling to save themselves.

However, in being the only bastion of truth, reality and sanity, this part of the internet faces a Herculean challenge. Decades worth and trillions of dollars in brainwashing and lies have been propagated and incorporated into the minds of millions of people. So successfully so, that even if you're trying to point out the truth to them, their egos have been so pampered and protected, their response is not only disbelief, but one of rage, anger, hatred, even assault (imagine telling a liberal arts major their degree is worthless, or telling a wimpy, but reliable chemical engineer male most women will pass him up for a drug dealing thug with muscles). But this daunting challenge aside, it still doesn't change the fact that these people have to face a choice no matter how thorough and complete their brainwashing:

Continue to live in your deluded dream world, continue to chase and pursue after dreams that will never be,

or accept the cold harsh reality that reality is.

To a sane person the choice is obvious, because there is no choice. Reality is reality. By definition choosing not to accept it is delusional and proof of a mental problem. But if you've been brought up your entire life under lies and propaganda, and you value your ego more than the rest of society and the real world, and above all else, you're an intellectual weakling, you will likely continue to live the lie.

But as tempting as it is to stay in the warm, but false, comforts of pretty lies, there is one benefit to "taking the red pill" (as it were) and it's more valuable than all the promises of the charlatans and con-artists.

Sanity.

Understand no matter what the politicians, feminists, journalists and professors tell you, it's not true. Their promises and your dreams that were based in them are never going to come to fruition. So no matter how comforting and ego-protecting it is today, if you believe them and make life decisions based on them, you will ruin your life. And not just by failing to achieve dreams that were never achievable in the first place, but the sheer torment you'll endure that is caused by the anger, confusion, frustration, stress and grief of living a lie (again, imagine the daily torment people with "Masters in English" are suffering in the labor market or women who believe they could "have it all" are suffering in the dating/marriage market)

But if you give up your deluded dreams and accept to live in reality, you get the gift of sanity. The KNOWING why things happened the way they did in the past, the knowledge of how things are likely to work in the future, and never being confused, frustrated, or angry again. Imagine if you were told what women REALLY liked when you were 13. Imagine if you were told how corporate America really worked. Imagine if you were told about the economic realities of choosing the right major.

To have that you only need to give up your dreams.

Which is a good thing because those dreams were worthless because they were never going to happen anyway.

Daddy Government and Corporate Boyfriend

March 27, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

What Daddy Government can't offer you is wisdom.

Daddy Government will subsidize your babies, but he won't tell you which men to avoid. He'll lock up anybody you accuse of raping you, but he won't tell you how to avoid rape in the first place. He'll help you get that scholarship, but he won't warn you about the trade-offs required for a full-time career. He'll indulge his baby-girl… but he won't help her grow into an adult woman.

Why Liberals Never Start Businesses

March 28, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

They're too lazy and they're not intelligent enough to.

And yes, it is that simple:

They're too lazy to work that hard, AND they just plain don't have the brain power to do so:

UC Berkeley Study Shows 2 in 1 Women Raped

March 30, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

From MSNBC

"When it comes to the uncomfortable topics of sexual assault and rape, there seems to be a lack of consistency when it comes to statistics. Is it 1 in 5 women on college campuses who are raped? Is it 1 in 3? Or are they under-reported and it's actually closer to 1 in 2?

The truth is even more shocking.

2 in 1 college women are raped on American campuses every year.*

The discovery of this shocking statistic was due to a joint study between UC Berkeley's Women's Studies Department and the Department of Sociology. Headed by Dr. Madison Jones-Pheeters and Dr. Jane Tallakson-Smith (respectively), the study took on the difficult task of authoritatively assessing what percentage of college women were raped. However, to achieve this, the study boldly abandoned traditional researching and measuring methods and replaced them with newer, out-side-of-the-box ones. This not only allowed them to accurately measure how many women were being raped on campus, but achieve completely new and previously-thought impossible statistics.

"We really didn't like math and logic," said Dr. Jones-Pheeters. "Both were social constructs forced on us by the patriarchy. So if we were able to unshackle ourselves from these tools of oppression, we would finally be allowed to see for the first time just how much of a threat campus rape and sexual assault really are. I couldn't believe it at first, but there it is. 2 in 1 women, 200% of college-going women are raped every year."

Researchers in academia generally agree and concur with the findings, even if the statistical methods were unconventional.

"We have to appreciate what these two women did here. They are boldly defying male-created traditions such as math, logic, reality, and fact, allowing us to truly see reality for the first time in our researching lives," explained political science professor, Tanner Sylvensen-Anders. "And I'm glad they did. Now we know just what kind of danger and what kind of victims American women are!"

While they have yet to disclose their full methodologies, Drs. Jones-Pheeters and Jane Tallakson did provide some explanation as to these non-patriarchical statistics.

"Well, if we redefine rape to mean unwanted advances, and count each instance as an individual rape, even if it is still only one woman this is happening to, she has in essence been raped 2, 3, 4, even 20 times over the course of the year. Throw in a woman who suffers from multiple-personality disorder and each instance of rape is magnified thrice or four-fold. Ignoring logic then allows us to prorate these atrocities to each individual woman (or personality), giving us the figure that 2 in 1 women are raped every year."

/sarc

Sadly, I do actually see this in the future.

Economics 101 - Women Do NOT Like Sex as Much as Men

March 30, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Some more of my SAEG (TM)

Book Review - The Way of Men by Jack Donovan

March 30, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

"The Way of Men" by Jack Donovan is one of those books that if there ever was to be a "Manosphere Bible" it would be a "must" to be included, just as the Book of Matthew or Exodus. It encapsulates some of the key tenets of being a man in today's world, and compiles and succinctly presents millennia of wisdom from our forefathers. I would consider it to be "required reading" for anybody out there traipsing upon this realm of the internet and not to procrastinate in going to buy and read this book.

Of course, it was only until now I read it, but my procrastination and hypocrisy aside, the above paragraph is 100% true. This is an ABSOLUTE MUST-READ book.

The reason is simple - it provides men of all ages an explanation of what it means to be a man.

At first this may sound a bit esoteric, even a bit effeminate. Who asks themselves "what does it mean to be a man?"

But without answering this very basic and fundamental question, most men are condemned to wander this world and waste their lives. It is a question that needs to be answered because it not only identifies you in respect to this world, but explains to you your basic function here. This book not only answers that vitally important question, but provides guidance, context, and wisdom about how to live your life given that you have the answer to that question.

From here Mr. Donovan goes into the four basic traits of what it means to be a man:

Strength
Courage Mastery and Honor

I did not particularly like this part of the book in that through empiricism and age I (at the risk of sounding arrogant) "already knew it." But this does not lessen the part of the book's value to younger men or men who have yet to find their way in life. Jack goes into logically-supporting detail as to what each is and how men can attain those traits.

From there the book goes into what I would consider it's general premise:

That men, and thus our psyche, have largely evolved outside of civilization. And that with the relatively recent advent of civilization the purpose of men, the way of men, is becoming obsoleted no matter how hard our frontal lobes may try to adapt.

This results in a BRILLIANT comparison of true masculinity that was required (and thus gave men their true purpose in life) in pre-civilization days to today, where technology and the state have largely replaced men, and we now go vainly looking for "substitute masculinity." Specifically, there are three forms of substitution:

Simulated Masculinity - Sparing, rolling, UFC, sports, etc.
Vicarious Masculinity - Watching sports, war documentaries, playing video games, etc.
Intellectualized Masculinity - Focusing on yourself, self improvement, within the confines that society allows

But regardless of how men cope with their obsolescence, it doesn't change the fact that they aren't wired to do so, and that the civilization that has replaced them is flawed and not feasible in the long term. This has resulted in an identity crisis for men, as well as a full blown assault on maleness and masculinity. What worked in the past and allowed civilization to form was manliness, strength, and men. However, now that civilization exists, technology serves our every need, and the state has supplanted men when it comes to women, there is nothing for men to do but play video games, read about WWII and jerk off to porn. Worse still is the criminalization on all things male and masculine by various political forces as their obsoleted skills are not only no longer needed, but a threat to those in power. And making matters even worse, the masculine skills of foresight, logic, and common sense makes the collapse of society perfectly predictable to most men, but because of democracy and civilization, they are powerless to do anything about it, rendering them "Mythical Cassandras" and causing untold amounts of frustration and insanity.

But Jack Donovan knows civilizations collapse. No empire lasts forever. And Rome did fall. And in preparation for that, his book becomes instructional.

His last few chapters focus on what can be done despite an insane, and largely, anti-male civilization. Working out, finding purpose, finding agency, etc. However, the very last chapter is titled "How to Form a Gang," in that a gang was the original unit of society that not only survived in a non-civilized world, but is the origins of the way and meaning of men. This was particularly useful and insightful in that it spoke directly to my experiences that I was happiest NOT when I was richest or had the most amount of money, but when I was absolutely my poorest, but had the most amount of male friends in the exact same horrible environment I was in. Yes, food was an issue. Yes sleep was a problem. But the mental sanity that came with having my own crew and own team is one no amount of money or financial stability can replace. And it is this last chapter that explains why that is.

So if you are confused or need guidance. If you are a young man looking to understand your place in this world, or an old man who could never find it. Or you still have a lot of questions about society, where it is going, and why certain groups of people seem hell-bent on villainizing you, I cannot recommend enough that you read The Way of Men.

You can find Jack Donovan's website here.

Drunk Tuesday Afternoon Linkage

March 31, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Why I Hate the 60's (The truth is NOBODY liked them!)

Leslie gives me some love.

The fun you have with a shitty world reserve currency.

Chris Betchloff accepts a fight challenge from Rich Stanton. I predict Rich will chicken out.

Governor Pence Has No Balls Podcast

March 31, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

In this relatively curse-free podcast

Bottleneck people strike again
Never buy a Google phone
The end of talk radio
How the baby boomers never helped, but hindered younger generations
Does anybody attend baby boomer funerals?
Kids faking they have mental diseases
Murdering Aaron Clarey
Indiana's Governor fails the leftist shit test

AND MORE!

in THIS EPISODE of THE CLAREY PODCAST!

Wally The World's Greatest Economist

April 1, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Hi-freaking-larious.

And this is exactly how we did it at Norwest (purchased by Wells Fargo back in the 00's)

Foreigner STEM Uber American STEM Workers

April 1, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Giving our outsourcing to China under Clinton, Obama's rejection of the Keystone Pipeline, and now STEM jobs under Bush/Obama, I believe you can assume, going forward, politicians will always sell out Americans and do what's worse for them.

How to Analyze Mutual Funds in 3 Minutes

April 1, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

"My Child Goes Well With the Drapes"

April 2, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

You see, a narcissist does not have children because they want to love and nurture little humans so they can grow into healthy individuals and be successful on their terms. Rather, a narcissist has children because they need reassurance in their own self, they need to feed their ego, and because they want someone to unquestionably do their bidding; so say I, the lackey gas-pumping, errand-running, house-cleaning daughter, but I digress.

Who Watches "The Daily Show?"

April 2, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Good catch Ed.

French Nails and Capitalism

April 2, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

I looked at The Girlfriend and said, "Girlfriend!"

She said, "Yes, Boyfriend?"

"I have decided I like French nails!" I decreed.

"Really, why is that?" she asked.

"Because it goes well with your white lingerie numbers, plus they just look classy."

And sure enough within 48 hours she was downstairs with a French nail kit trying to do her own French nails.

While the operation to get my girlfriend to do something for me went smoothly, the same could not be said about her endeavor to do her own French nails. For not only had she never done them before, but doing one's own nails requires that one hand, by necessity, not be used. At best they came out "average." Lines not perfectly geometric, depth not perfectly uniform, the coating not perfectly applied, etc. But they were still cute and the fact she did it for me is all that really mattered. However, she was not personally satisfied with the results, and when the varnish and nail polish chipped and deteriorated away within 10 days, she went and had them professionally done.

I wasn't expecting anything much different, but when she returned the difference was jaw-dropping. The shine and sheen were perfect. The color spot on. And the craftsmanship in terms of precision and uniformity was obvious. The difference was blindingly obvious even to a boorish bachelor such as myself.

Curious as to how much this cost I said, "What did that set you back?"

And to my shock she said, "$30."

Immediately my SAEG(TM) mind went into action. The materiel The Girlfriend purchased to do her nails the first time was at least $10. Then a solid hour was spent doing them, followed by at least 20 minutes of incapacitation because she couldn't "touch anything" as they dried. But in what was no more than a 40 minute professional job, and for a mere $20 more in price she had far superior French nails when all was said and done.

But the amazing French nails did not stop amazing there. A full MONTH had passed and they were STILL in perfect shape, showing no signs of wear or chipping. And it is here my economic mind noticed just what testament to the powers of capitalism French nails were.

To simplify this important economic lesson we will do away with things like wage and opportunity cost (that will follow in the sequel to this post) and focus solely on the only unit of economic value - time.

The original outlay of time The Girlfriend had to spend on doing her own French nails was this:

26 minutes of labor earning the money to pay for the materiel
60 minutes actually doing the nails
20 minutes running around with a gay-esque hand pose as they dried

Total Investment - 106 minutes of life

The outlay of time needed to afford a pro to do her nails for her was this:

79 minutes of labor earning the money to pay the pro
40 minutes sitting time while her nails were done
0 minutes waiting for them to dry because they have an infrared drying device that cures the varnish

Total Investment - 119 minutes of life

However, while at first it may seem it's still better to "DIY," keep in mind when she did it herself, it only lasted 10 days. The professional job lasted three times that long. So assuming The Girlfriend would have to do her nails three times a month, the real effective costs are:

318 minutes (for a marginal job I might add) vs. 119 minutes for a professional job.

It is here we plainly see what is arguably the most important and powerful aspect of capitalism - the law of specialization. In allowing people to specialize in a trade or skill, not only do prices dramatically drop, but the quality of the goods and services dramatically increase. This increases people's purchasing power, as well as improves the quality of the goods and services we consume, increasing overall standards of living.

However there is a problem with specialization. It requires you be really good at something. It requires that you "excel" in something. And excellence is increasingly becoming a four-letter word in today's ever-more socialist society. And as society has decided to lash out, punish and tax excellence, it has ignorantly also lashed out, punished, and attacked one of the key engines of economic growth and human advancement.

The consequences of which are the topic of our next post.

Avoid ObamaCare by Getting Beaten By Your Wife

April 2, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Heh, always a way around government.

A Sad Day in Cappy Land

April 3, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Howdy All,

Bad news every one.

Some of you may or may not know of "The Girl That Is Not Mine" that I reference in my podcast. This is a little child of a friend of mine I've known since she was 6. I take a particular liking to her because she comes form a divorced family, is a tough little booger, and when I pick on her she not only can withstand it, but kind of throws it back. We have very much an antagonistic older brother/younger sister relationship, and though we SWEAR we are "sworn enemies," clandestinely we "may" not loathe each other that much.

Sadly her house burnt down and among half her worldly possessions, she lost two dogs.

I'm not much of one to ask for charity (and frankly am waiting for the day for a lawsuit or free speech issue to come down the pipe, and THEN I'll be asking for your help), but in the meantime if any of you wanted to help the little kid out, I'd sure appreciate it.

I would like to raise enough money to replace two dogs, get her some flowers, and ice cream, as well as any excess funds that would go to replace her material stuff she lost in the fire. Any additional money raised will probably go into a college fund or something.

So if you want make a donation using the button below (or the pinup girl "DONATE" button on the side bar) please do so. ALL FUNDS WILL GO TO THE KID, not me!

Because PayPal doesn't make things easy,

1. PLEASE PUT "VARMINT" (that's the nick name I gave her) in the description box
2. Then the amount you want to donate in the "Item Price" box.
3. Hit "update" and then off to your right you will have to click "Pay With Debit or Credit Card" to use a credit card to make a payment
4. You will also have to provide some personal information, and THEN YOU NEED TO:
5. Decline signing up for Paypal and other painassery to make the payment go through.

In short, make sure you get to the page that CONFIRMS the payment went through.

Anyway, if you know anybody else that would like to help certainly feel free to forward this to them.

Many thanks for your help!

Cappy

(PS - If you wanted to leave a kind message for Varmint below, please do!)

Stay Frosty, Boys

April 3, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Stay the freak frosty.

ht

The DIY Poverty Trap

April 3, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

In my previous post I explained how allowing people to specialize in a trade or a skill drastically increases the standards of living for society by allowing us to produce not only MORE, but higher quality goods and services. However, such specialization, by necessity, requires superiority and excellence, both of which have been under increasing attack since the 1960's. These attacks have economic consequences, which is the topic of today's post - the "DIY Poverty Trap."

Because of what amounts to nothing more than rank parasitism and envy, America's pillars of excellence, superiority, achievement, accomplishment, and success are all under attack. The attacks come from all fronts, be it political (the rich don't pay their fair share), educational (privilege, sexism, racism, and all the other childish pablum of academia), corporate (CSR, diversity, etc.), racial (stop acting white, Oreo), or social (27th place trophies, not keeping score, fat acceptance, etc.). However, while this results in a general, society-wide hatred of those who wish to pursue excellence, the economic effects fall into two general categories.

The first is that it deters those who have already achieved excellence and production in their respective fields. A doctor, an entrepreneur, an engineer, etc., somebody who is making good money stops and asks him/herself,

"Why the hell should I work more? Why the hell should I pay more in taxes? Why am I working for these parasites, ESPECIALLY when they villainize me and blame me for all of their-largely-self-inflicted problems? Screw that, I'm going Galt/on vacation/moving the headquarters overseas/etc."

The result is less economic growth than what would have been had these people not been as progressively taxed or politically and socially stigmatized. Medtronic would not have moved overseas. Google and Apple wouldn't be parking their money in the Caymans. And people might be willing to invest in the US. It's hard to estimate what economic growth would have been had we championed success, rich people, and excellence, but in merely getting rid of corporate tax rates an estimated $2 trillion alone would be repatriated over night into the US economy. Regardless, because success and excellence are under attack, those capable of it choose to scale back or not participate at all.

The second economic effect is a consequence of the first. With all those "nasty" productive, successful specialists leaving or at least not investing in the US, economic growth has dropped to about 55% of what it used to be back in 1940's-1960's. Naturally, employment has suffered both in terms of UNemployment and UNDERemployment, especially amongst the younger generations. So instead of being contracted right out of a high school metals program to work at Boeing in 1948, you are begging and pleading to get a job at Starbucks with your Masters in Nutrition in 2015, replete with $70,000 in student loans. Regardless, they too are not achieving nor pursuing excellence. They are merely getting by because of the lack of economic opportunities.

But while both groups are not producing specialization and excellence, the reasons are quite different. Group 1 is capable of it, but CHOOSES not to. They have no incentive, they have no desire. They are opting out of gracing society with their excellence. Group 2, however, doesn't have a choice. They are not CAPABLE of providing excellence and specialization either because they lack the skills or there is no economic opportunity for them to do so. Thankfully, for Group 1, it doesn't matter. They've largely "got theirs" and can afford to merely scale down. But because of the lack of economic growth it is the young generations stuck in Group 2 that fall into the "DIY Poverty Trap."

To understand the "DIY Poverty Trap" you have to think of it as the opposite of The Law of Specialization. With specialization, as evidenced in the previous post, you are allowed to trade your units of time for other people's units of time so that you may specialize and create superior, cheaper goods for them, as they in turn create superior, cheaper goods for you. It is why it's nearly 300% MORE EFFICIENT for my girlfriend to work in her specialty (accounting) and pay for a professional who specialty is manicures and nails, than try to do it herself.

However, this hinges on one very important assumption that was (purposely) kept out of the previous post's discussion - wages.

The only reason it was economically efficient for The Girlfriend to outsource her French nails to a pro was because her wage was adequately high enough to afford the specialized services of the salonist. Had she no SPECIALIZATION or EXCELLENCE in her field of accounting, she would only be making $8 as an unskilled laborer/nanny/barista and instead of 119 minutes of her life spent on getting French nails, it would have cost her 265 minutes.

Thus the importance of CHAMPIONING the specialization of labor and achieving excellence in a specific field, and NOT CRIMINALIZING IT, PUNISHING IT, OR MOCKING IT IN SOCIETY.

However, it is sadly not just merely an issue of getting a "specialty" in something and then "boom" the problem is done. Different economic and sociological variables have conspired that has resulted in a perfect "economic storm" that creates an effective "event horizon" that keeps people in poverty and in the DIY trap.

When you take the:

1. Low economic growth
2. Few economic opportunities
3. Worthless degrees the majority of young people have earned
4. The crippling debts they took on to buy said worthless degrees, and (heaven help you)
5. Any illegitimate children they might have had they are stuck in the DIY poverty trap and will likely never achieve the "escape velocity" needed to get out of it. The reason why is that they can't even afford to go back to college to retool themselves and learn an actual skill or trade that is specialized enough to pull them out of it.

In short, since they don't have a specialization or are excellent in anything, they cannot barter for other people's highly specialized (and infinitely economically more efficient) skills, condemning them to this effective "lower tier" part of the economy.

And this is where the DIY Poverty Trap comes in.

Since they can't afford specialized services, nearly everything has to be done on their own because it's "cheaper." Of course, financially it may be, but not time wise. This ends up costing them more of their time, denying them the ability to spend that time specializing in something.

For example, no more than two years ago, it largely "financially" paid me to fix my own motorcycle. One time, in what seemed was going to be a "simple fix," I had a piston misfiring, which led me to believe it was time to change the spark plugs. While my diagnosis was correct, my estimation of what it would take to fix my motorcycle was woefully inadequate.

The spark plugs were underneath a stubborn airfilter and carburetor and very leaky fuel system. But none of those could be accessed until I removed a very NOT intuitive gas tank. After many tries, I still couldn't get the motorcycle to turn over correctly, until I realized that in taking off the gas tank I had damaged the starter wire.

When all was said and done it took the following amount of time:

360 minutes of amateurish mechanical work
1,220 minutes of working up at $15 an hour to pay for the $280 mechanics bill

Total life lost: 1,580 minutes.

However, that was when I worked as an UNSPECIALIZED, NON-EXCELLENT security guard. Well before I discovered I had a god-given talent at being a SPECIALIZED and EXCELLENT asshole and started billing out $100/hour at my new company Asshole Consulting.

Now of course, I don't work 40 hours a week making $100/hour, but for the sake of analysis, assume I did. And let's also assume instead of trying to be macho, I admit I would probably make things worse and outsource my motorcycle repairs to a professional. My new "total life lost" would not have been 1,580 minutes, but rather...

108 minutes.

Now this of course assumes the pro would not have severed the starter wire and that I was a full-time "professional asshole." But they key point is that it shows you just what a DRASTIC and POWERFUL gravitational pull the DIY Poverty Trap is. It is (in this instance) 10 TIMES LESS EFFICIENT THAN SPECIALIZATION. A 10 fold "time sink." And forget motorcycles, consider that nearly every aspect of your life has to be "do it yourself."

Cleaning
Oil change
House repairs
Computer repairs
Cooking vs. eating out
Grocery shopping

The list is endless and the damage is incalculable to your economic life.

The larger point is to realize NOT just how insane it is that our society, politicians, teachers, professors, racial groups, and media types punish and ridicule excellence, achievement, and specialization, but to realize just what an economic price is paid, especially by those who are in the poorer classes and trapped by the DIY Poverty Trap. Not only are they kept in poverty by the gravitational pull of low wages, but are lied to about how to get out of it simply so certain leftists political parties and academians may stay in power.

And whereas normally I would feel pity and sadness for people stuck in such a position, when they viscerally and enthusiastically accused me and other people who pursued excellence as "privileged," hate us and call us "racist" or "sexist," and dare to demand that I pay more in taxes to bail them out of their mistakes...I just kick back and say...

Enjoy the decline.

Leftists Are Incapable of Art

April 5, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

For art requires skill, talent, patience, and investment.

Leftists have none of these things.

For All Finance and Economics Majors

April 5, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

I posted this a while ago and noticed it has over 50,000 views. That's very rare for a video of mine, but after revisiting it I realized that it's very important this message gets out.

DO

NOT

MAJOR

IN

FINANCE OR ECONOMICS

Please retweet or forward or whatever is necessary to prevent you or a loved on from making such a horrible mistake:

Help "The Varmint" Weekend

April 5, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Howdy All,

I'll be keeping the "Help the Varmint" donation campaign up until Monday at which time I will close the donation page and give "The Varmint" all the donations you have charitably given.

Ergo, if you wanted to donate but haven't yet, then do so NOW because it closes on Monday.

If you want to make a donation (or have no clue what I'm talking about) go here and read through the instructions.

Thankfully, a woman has already volunteered to buy Varmint two new dogs at the Humane Society so we do not need any more offer to buy/donate dogs. She also has had her computer replaced. Basically, the money raised will be going to replace stuff like clothes, toys, etc., and any excess funds will go into a college fund.

MANY THANKS to all of you who have donated already, I'm keeping the amount secret so as to have it be a surprise later on.

Best,

Cappy

Why Business Schools Are Bullshit

April 6, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Language warning...obviously, but very rantalicious:

Episode #89 of the Clarey Podcast!

April 6, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

"You're a sell out!"
Do Millennials like money?
What the Harlem Globetrotters teach us about childhood
Downtown hotels are overrated
Women only offer sex once
Helping out The Varmint
Athiests and Agnostics are not discriminated against Fan mail!

and MORE!

IN THIS EPISODE of The Clarey Podcast!

Video Games No Longer for Adults

April 8, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Sunday was a sad day because I had to admit to a reality I just didn't want to:

Video games are no longer made for adults.

Yes, yes, I know you may be past the proverbial age of 18 and you may find video games still interesting, but the truth is with the latest generation of consoles and the games that have (thus far) been made for them, they just aren't made for people who have jobs and certainly not those people who have children.

Again, at first I didn't want to admit it. Desperately hoping I just had a string of "bad" video games. But the empirical evidence was too numerous and damning.

First, Assassin's Creed Unity, aka "You Like Pirate Ships? F@ck You!" I was desperately hoping it would be an improvement upon Assassin's Creed Black Flag. But after spending damn well near 2 hours just getting the basics down, finding a weapon, and finally getting into the "world" I would be operating in, I found out that world, frankly, sucked, the fighting was not the same as Black Flag, and, oh yeah, no pirate ships.

Second, Call of Duty Ghosts. Solid FPS, not terribly steep learning curve, but the movie was childish and boring. Matter of fact, I would have preferred they just load up the game with three more missions and cut the entire "backstory" out.

Reversely, third, Wolfenstein NWO. The story was great, but the utter lack of crazy uber-Nazi experimented enemies was a let down. Still, a solid game, but not worth the $60 I dropped on it.

Fourth, thank god I learned my lesson to wait for reviews to come out because I had dodged a bullet in not dropping another $60 on The Order 1886. And dodging this bullet took some effort because I so wanted to believe this would a revolutionary game, or at least a solid one.

Nope, horrible. Just horrible. So bad were the reviews I don't even have a timid curiosity to try it.

And finally, Bloodborne.

Thinking I'd be crafty and buy the most highly rated video game, I had done all of my chores, done all of my work, and purposely set aside an entire weekend to veg out on this 9.5 out of 10 video game.

Things seemed to be going well. The fighting was a little obtuse, but I'd get used to it. And after 2 hours of slogging through a bunch of enemies, I got killed,

respawned

back where I started 2 hours ago with all the enemies I just slew, revived as well.

F@ck you, "Form Software." F@ck you.

Here's the sad economic truth about this latest generation of video games and nearly every video game developer better start paying attention.

This isn't 1988 where we were nerdy kids with an entire summer to blow away to get past that one impossible stage of "Ghouls and Ghosts" or "Ninja Gaiden 2." We don't have the time or the luxury anymore to "learn" whole new ways of fighting or button combinations as if we're the Asian engineering students playing Mortal Kombat at the college arcade. And, sadly, we have built up enough self-respect to know when you are giving us a digital finger when you ammo starve us or put save points 2 hours of game play apart.

Additionally, who can afford $60 a pop for video games?

The last time I really spent that much money on a previous console was Pitfall II for Atari 2600 (adjusted for inflation). And I got months of play out of that. Now a "Red Dead Redemption" or "Black Flag" is the exception, not the norm for these multiple-hundreds of millions of dollars-in-development-costs games. And I just don't have the finances to buy 5 $60 games in the hopes one might be good.

Admittedly, a lot has to do with generational changes. Gen X is now "responsible adults" with things like jobs, mortgages, and children. But who do you think are the ones in charge of the purse strings? Gen X is the "richest" generation that plays video games, but still have budgets (both of time and money). Today's kids are subject to this same budget as they are now relying on their Gen X parents to buy these COUGH COUGH WHEEZE WHEEZE "block buster" games. And you can't even rely on the Millennial gamers as they're besieged with student loans, student budgets, and lousy employment prospects.

So maybe game developers and the people who review them need to get out of the "video game echo chamber." They need to realize that while their lives of creating, reviewing and playing video games, are not representative of the largest segment of the gaming market. Sure, if I was a game developer or reviewer and my job was to play and review video games, I could go back, restart Blood Borne, and waste another 2, 4, even 6 hours getting to the next save point. But I had wood that needed splitting, clients that needed consulting, and a girlfriend that needed sexing.

Of course, I could be proven wrong. Gen X'ers may still blow $60 per game in the vain hopes one is worthwhile. Millennials may continue to make equally bad decisions in purchasing games as they did worthless degrees. And kids may convince and cajole their parents to buy them the latest heavily-marketed video game, until they bore of it quickly and retreat to the world of social media.

But if my economic spidey senses are right (and they usually are) this latest generation of consoles are facing a huge underlying problem and it's making games that appeals to developers and full time professional gamers/reviewers, and not your regular, normal people who just like a good freaking video game.

Related:

Women Are Wedded to the Government

April 8, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Like school teachers
Social workers
and all the other government make-work jobs, women disproportionately have easier, but overpaid and completely unnecessary make work careers at the expense of the taxpayer.

And feminists still complain about it.

Today in Oxymoronics

April 8, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Guys, Just Do It

April 8, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Seriously, best money I ever spent. Help me, help you. Help me, help you!

You will thank me later.

Republicans - Apple's and Starbuck's Favorite Bitch

April 8, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

It's alright Republicans and Conservatives. It's all OK. Everything clear now. You can go back to buying the products of corporations that hate you and then at the same time complain, "we must do something." We know your precious little suburbanite princess' demands to own the latest Apple product outrank the future freedom of this country and the protection of liberty, and so we are giving you the green light to go ahead and fund these companies with additional billions because you're, frankly, all a bunch of hypocrites who can't be "inconvenienced" with something as "tragic" as a boycott.

Enjoy your lily white SWPL suburbs...you know...while they last:

I Love Me More Than My Child

April 9, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Enjoy that decline people. Enjoy that freaking decline.

When the "Good Men" Retire from The Game

April 9, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

I was on the south side of the metro. Was no reason to try to battle my way back home during the depths of rush hour, so I drove around, stopping in on different southern-metro friends, even got myself a cigar at one of my favorite cigar lounges.

The GF wasn't getting back till later as she was working for a side client that evening, so I decided to stop by and visit my buddy Craig. It wasn't much past 8 PM, but you would have thought it was 3 AM when he answered the door. He was in his plaid pajamas, wearing his old man slippers, and a fleece sweatshirt, I think he even had a cup of tea in his hand.

Regardless, he was awake and not about to go to bed so we stayed up and chatted a bit. Talked about his various business ventures, any new ideas he had or was pursuing, and what his financial game plan was for the next 10 years. We spent nearly an hour discussing nearly every other social, political, career, and entrepreneurial aspect of his life, until I almost forgot that he recently became a bachelor and I never inquired about his dating life.

"So, any word from the girly girl front?"

And all he said was, "No, I have absolutely no energy for that. I just want to pay the mortgage and go hunting."

And that was it. That was the summation of his past year of dating life. "No, I don't have the energy."

It wasn't an editorial comment. It wasn't one of "I tried, but dem womenz be crazies." It had no passion or emotion in it. It was merely a statement of fact:

"No, I don't have the energy for it."

And though I had intuitively known this for a while, it was once again one of those things that had yet to make its way to the frontal lobes, turning itself into a concrete observation.

Men do burn out.

I had speculated about this before. A theory about whether men have "unlimited energy" when it comes to the pursuit of women, or if there's a finite amount of energy and men will inevitably stop their pursuit. And though speculate I did a few short years ago, in that time I've gained the experience, observation, and wisdom to realize the later is true. Men only have a limited amount of energy. And my friend Craig was proof of it.

Of course, while the fact men do burn out had consequences for my friend Craig, they also have consequences for women in his market. For while Craig was sitting at home in his PJ's, sipping away at tea, preparing for a speech he had to give the next day at 8PM, it also, by necessary default, meant he wasn't at the bar or the club or online trying to pine for the affections of women. He wasn't asking women out. There was one less man on the market. And one of those proverbial "good men" women are always looking for.

This made for an interesting juxtaposition, for while Craig was sitting there, comfy in his plaid PJ's and old man slippers, he conveyed to me the story of when he last went out socially. He met up with some old high school buddies of his, mostly of the female persuasion. They were all in their mid 40's, but while he was focused on work, his career, and various professional associations he joined, the women were all divorced, all had their children at the baby sitters and were living it up like they were 24 again. Boozing, drinking "woooing." He said, "I just don't get it. I did that shit when I was 24. It's the last thing I'd want to do now! And here they are thinking it's fun or something." He didn't leave in disgust, but because of boredom and having "been there done that."

However, the utter lack of anything genuine or intellectually stimulating ultimately led him to the observation and an explanation why he stayed in and had no incentive to even try to go out to date:

The amount of investment required to be successful in dating was not worth what he'd get in return. And that is why this "Good Man" (TM) was at home with his tea, instead of out there looking in the dating market. It is also why many 40+ women "can't find a good man."

In the eternal quest for women to "find a good man" and then immediately complaint of "why can't I find a good man" the answer, as always, can be found in economics.

Today, millions of 40 something men like Craig have to face a decision. Do they spend the time, money, and resources pursuing women or do they invest those resources in something else. And while at the age of 18 with hormones raging and economic opportunity costs near $0, the decision was a simple one - chase girls, at the age of 43 things are different.

At 43 men have garnered more and more economic success and more and more economic opportunities. They have also likely develop hobbies, skills, and intellectual endeavors that also provide a positive rate of return on their lives. And let's not forget they're no longer 19 year old horn-balls raging around the prairie.

So when they look at what it precisely takes to get a woman on a date, let alone in bed, the costs are daunting:

10 hours a week hitting the clubs/dating sites/"hunting" in general
4,000 calories of energy being witty/funny/engaging to convince a girl to go out on a date
1/4 dates will flake, bail, cancel at the last minute
What dates you do have only stand a 30% chance of leading to a second
The second dates of which only have a 30% chance of leading to a third
And then the "lovely" last-minute-resistance of having sex

All in all you're looking at 2 weeks of labor, time, and money to "maybe" get laid, and that says nothing about whether the girl would qualify as long-term quality girlfriend material.

And while at the age of 18 when you literally had NOTHING else going on in life, no real man of any significance is going to have that much time to piss away on an investment with such a low expected rate of return in his 40's.

In other words, ladies, the men are just plain burnt out. They're spent. When presented with the required investment to "maybe" be successful pursuing a girl, most men post 35 will scoff at it and do something else, hoping something lands in their lap. And while you may not like that, or may find it "insulting," none of that changes the fact it's true. The "good men" you are looking for are at home or at the office, and just plain don't have the energy any more to pursue you.

This means, as all major economic upheavals in markets do, that its participants change their actions. "Wooing" it up at the bar, getting hammered at 43 while your dad subsidizes your child and mortgage is not a product that's going to get an industrious middle aged man to pursue you. Going to the same old bar and club where the same old guys and men from 1994 using the same old "can I buy you a drink" tactic is going to result in the same results you had the past 20 years. And wearing the same old clothes, whoring it up, will result in that one night fling you'll fakely claim you regret, but certainly not the "good man" you're looking for.

Ultimately, you're going to realize that you get to live up to the feminist dream of being truly equal to men now. You get to hunt, you get to strategize, you get to trial and error your way into finding a "good man." And while you'll rapidly point out that men are thirsty at the bar for you, and your POF profile is full of e-mails (and that is all certainly true), we all know those aren't the "Good Men" you're looking for because you would have snagged one of them by now and would CERTAINLY not be complaining about the "lack of good men" today.

So sorry girls. Once more unto the breach....well, for you it will be the very first time.

Varmint Gets Her Money

April 11, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

I delivered the check to "The Varmint"

Thanks to everybody who donated. You have to keep in mind she was not going to go crazy because I was there and we are "sworn enemies" so the reaction was a bit subdued.

"Cougars" Getting "Catfished"

April 11, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

I love this woman. She comes outright and says it. Women in their 50 are getting desperate. And scamming them has never been easier.

Barack Obrony

April 11, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Hi-freaking-larious.

Brilliant Keynesian Ideas

April 12, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

The Father Could Not Be Reached for Comment

April 12, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Did you notice how everything is OK because government checks ensured this man had no problems?

About Joining the Military

April 12, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

One of our Veteran Agents in the Field was kind enough to put together this very lengthy and detailed piece about his opinion and knowledge of joining the military for any of you Cappy Cappites out there who are kicking it around or wanted more information. It's very lengthy, but very thorough and just wanted to put it up here in case it would benefit some of you:

I know that you've mentioned the merits of going into and staying in the military in light of the shitty economy and, especially in the case of men, to have a solid purpose and direction in their life. As a veteran myself, I know these merits personally, for I was in a somewhat similar situation over ten years ago when I found myself without a job and struggling to find something substantial after my IT job at a severely dysfunctional and corrupt non-profit (the United Way . . . wink-wink) went belly-up and I was faced with a slack job market soon after the one-two punch of the 1999-2000 tech bust and 9/11. Fed up, I did something radical and joined the Army at the age of 31. (At 18 years old, I could have done it, but didn't. But, back then, I still operated with the belief that college was the key and that there were plentiful jobs out there.)

Now, I work for the government in Washington, DC and have excellent pay and benefits. Being a veteran certainly helps in this day and age because there are many more resources out there for them to where being a vet puts you in a special and, dare I say, somewhat protected class. If you know how to exploit these resources, you can do fairly well for yourself, but you have to be creative because, especially when it comes to the government, lethargy, apathy, and bureaucratic friction are the order of the day. It's not all that different for the private sector, where, even if you find a good mentor who can point you in the right direction, he or she is likely limited in what they can do where they work because HR still rules the roost in several cases – and we all know how HR works. Creativity and persistence, as well as patience and a high tolerance for bullshit, will yield some good fruit.

I wanted to share some of my experiences with the military below, outlined in the following points. I'd like you to share these points in a video for those guys, especially younger, out there considering joining the military so that they're forearmed with substantial knowledge from a guy who's smarter than the average bear (I do listen to you, after all) and who was there on the ground seeing this unfold. However, I want to caution that, at the time I enlisted, I was older than the average recruit and so had some biases going in. But, I counterbalanced that with my own innate smarts and hustling to create my own luck to get what I wanted. My cousin did the same thing at a slightly younger age in the late 90s when he was stuck with a marine biology degree, debt, and no job. He came out decently on the other side and now works for JP Morgan as a VP, since JP Morgan is very vet-friendly and there still are fairly plenty of jobs on their side. Vets' preference, baby.

With that, I'll begin. Take everything I say here with a grain of salt, realizing that this is my own opinion, and do your own homework by talking with other vets. Keep in mind that I enlisted in early 2004, almost one year after the Iraq debacle kick-off, and before the waves of PC bullshit started infiltrating the military (e.g., women allowed in combat roles and the sexual assault witch-hunts). I also was in the Army, so everything I say here references my experiences in the Army. I can't speak to the Navy, Air Force, Marines, or Coast Guard, or to the Reserves and National Guard, though I can bet money that many points here can be applied to those other services. Again, do your own homework and make your own decisions. The key point here is to make an INFORMED decision, based on facts and not on emotion. When you join the military, you're taking a risk and one that you can't back away from so easily as you would just up and quitting a regular job.

INTRODUCTION

Understand that the Army is run like any other large and bureaucratic government, or even corporate, organization in this day and age: badly and wastefully. Add in Congress's relentless dysfunction despite Republicans still loving the military as a pork project, and you have hemorrhoid pain. Add in PC bullshit, and you have a witch's brew. Some will, rightly so, describe the Army as "faux socialism" since you do get goodies (e.g., health care, educational benefits, a pension) in return for signing your life over for a certain number of years. If you refuse to give into patriotism, a sense of "duty and honor," and adopt a somewhat mercenary mindset, those of you that are using the Army as a less-than-stellar option to get more wind in your sails for your life are on the right foot. This is what I did when I enlisted. I needed more momentum in my life and sucked it up with the Army's bullshit.

Now, as with any organization, there are smart people, good and decent people, mediocre people, functional illiterates, and psychopaths. Politicians are the routine mediocre and psychopaths. So are your fellow soldiers, senior enlisted, and officers. The more you devalue yourself and the more you drink the Kool-Aid, the higher you can go in the ranks. If you want to do 20 years and get the pension, this will likely be your path. If you're a short-timer to get the goodies, you can retain some of your mind, personality, and dignity. In the Army, you can meet some cool and downright incredible people, and some of these people could turn into lifelong buddies. You'll also meet many dysfunctional and evil shitbags. Don't be one of them, if possible. (The Army, generally, doesn't attract the best and the brightest.) Work with them, but don't hang out with them. You're not required to. The only thing you're required to do is follow orders, follow regulations, and respect rank. You might get a shitty situation or you might get a cake situation. Consider yourself very fortunate if you get the latter. If you get the former, work with it and get what you can out of it. Most of the time, you'll have a bit of both.

(See the last section for more on this.)

TOTAL MILITARY TIME

Understand that, on the day that you go to your MEPS (Military Entrance Processing Station) and raise your hand to take the oath to defend the Constitution (uh-huh) you incur a total EIGHT-year commitment in the military.

Let me say that again for the cheap seats: EIGHT YEARS.

You could spend these 8 years either totally on active duty in one service (e.g., Army), or in the Reserves or National Guard. You could also be in the Army for a few years and then maybe go into the Air Force either on active duty or Reserve or National Guard. You could also do 2-3 years of active duty in one service and then not be in anything for the rest of the 8 years or for up to 20 years and then get a pension. This non-active duty time is called the Individual Ready Reserve (IRR). While in IRR, you have to check in periodically so that the military knows you're out there, at the ready. This wasn't a bad gig for many people until 9/11 happened and then Iraq kicked off. Then, they found themselves called up and retrained to be in jobs like infantry or military police (MP). These were guys who might have worked clerical jobs in the past while on active duty – and, these might have been guys in their late 40s and early 50s just waiting to put in their 20 years. No matter. If the military has tabs on you, they can call you up in the event there's another war. All of these people, including those in the National Guard, especially, were called up because there was a severe shortage of personnel due to the massive draw-down that happened (and is currently happening, though to a lesser degree, because of sequestration, which are the automatic budget cuts that Congress was too spineless to stop) in the late 80s and early 90s, after the Cold War and under Bill Clinton.

When you come off of active duty and go into the IRR, you won't receive your official discharge paperwork until your IRR time is over. Until you get that official paperwork, you'll be in a "separated" status. Keep this in mind. Also understand that, you'll be in the IRR from the day you raise your hand to take the oath until you ship out to basic training/boot camp. I was initially unaware of this until I checked my enlistment paperwork after my first deployment. I enlisted in July 2003 and didn't ship out until January 2004, so that gave me a good six months of IRR time, which applied to my total 8-year commitment. Consequently, I had 1.5 years to wait until I got my official discharge paperwork in July 2011. I'm now no longer in the military's grasp.

Lastly, if you should decide you get out before you hit the 20-year mark, you'll meet recruiters again who will try to entice you to stay in. If you want to stay in, that's your choice. But, it's better to WANT to stay in to get more of what YOU want or try again to get what you want if bad luck befell you during your first term of enlistment. I remember when I was in Germany just six years ago listening to a recruiter try to entice one of my buddies to stay in, saying that he'd be promoted and get a bonus, yadda, yadda, yadda . . . My buddy, when asked, said that he had something like $90,000 in the bank, so he was good financially. The recruiter sat their dumbstruck and didn't say anything except, "Um, well . . . so I think you're good." I couldn't help but smile because my buddy had the military equivalent of fuck-you money.

RECRUITERS AND THE ASVAB

Get it in your head that recruiters don't give one corn-enhanced shit about you personally. They're there to meet their quotas and make it easier on themselves because they might be recruiters in your particular area since the Army allows you to do recruiting duty for up to three years, usually to create stability (maybe in their own hometown) and to get out of deployments for that time period. After their duty, then they have to go where the Army sends them. True, there are some "nice" recruiters who are generally aboveboard and are more helpful than others in answering your questions, but they're all salespeople trying to get you in. Don't fall for the allure of being in the service and let yourself be swayed by false promises or, more charitably to the recruiters, their incomplete and/or distorted knowledge about what things are like in areas you have an interest in. (For comparison, think how many job descriptions don't match with the actual job.) Recruiters aren't the smartest bunch, too.

To get what you want in the military, you have to go in with a mercenary mindset and hustle to get it. Once you enlist, you're government property, even though you get meals, a roof over your head, clothing, training, free medical care, and a chance to travel. As the CO (commanding officer) of my first unit said to me once, "The Army will gladly let you work as many hours as you want without one more ounce of what they're required to give you." Also, if you don't take charge of your career, then the Army will gladly do it for you.

The way you effectively deal with recruiters is to go in there with a no-bullshit attitude and know what you want. You do the latter by researching the positions that the Army has available (you have the Internet now, so no excuses for not doing this) and telling this to the recruiter. For example, in my case, I had two positions in mind: IT specialist (which was fairly new at the time in early 2004) and a linguist, with a concentration, I hoped, in Arabic. I wisely chose the former as this would set me up better once I came off of active duty after six years, which was the length of my initial enlistment. If the recruiter doesn't give you what you want, you walk and can go to another recruiter, or come back later if there are other slots open. Never, ever be desperate to enlist, if you can help it. If you can't get your first job, but you want to ship out right away, then have another job you want to do, with a solid payout once you finish your first enlistment. Remember that the military isn't twisting your arm to enlist. There's no draft (except maybe a "poverty draft") and you're free to enlist or not to enlist.

One way you have leverage over recruiters to get what you want is to score well on the Armed Services Vocational Aptitude Battery (ASVAB) as well as a high school diploma. For the Army, a 31 composite score is necessary for enlistment, and a minimum of 50 is required for specialized jobs, like the technical fields, and for enlistment bonuses. Generally, the higher you score on all areas of the ASVAB, the higher your score, and the greater the likelihood that you'll get the job of your choice, excepting barriers like how many slots are open, enlistment times, etc.

BASIC TRAINING AND TECHNICAL TRAINING

Every Army enlisted soldier has to go through Basic Combat Training (BCT). This is where you learn to "be a soldier" – which is less intense than it was about 20 years ago, so some people told me. Typical length is 8 weeks long, where you do lots of PT, do weapons training, do drill and ceremony, etc. Check out YouTube videos for some insight into this.

The following are the Army bases where you'd be assigned for BCT:

- Fort Benning – Columbus, Georgia
- Fort Jackson – Columbia, South Carolina
- Fort Leonard Wood – St. Robert, Missouri
- Fort Sill – Lawton, Oklahoma

At the time I was in, there were one or two others, but I guess those have since closed down. Also, I understand that all four now have females, whereas Benning accepted only males. (Better, in my opinion, because the problems you have with Army females start earlier when they're in BCT with you.)

Understand that, because of PC influences, BCT is watered down – and it has changed to reflect what the Army decided had to be done in light of the outdated Cold War tactics and how they didn't serve soldiers in dealing with "asymmetric warfare." (Look it up.) Because of this, BCT, especially with females, is a big head game. Take nothing personally and get your shit done to get through this. Take the opportunities with PT to get in better shape than you are now, because you'll be doing a lot of PT. Keep on the straight path and keep your nose clean. If you're lucky, you might make some lasting buddy-ships, some of whom might go with you to Advanced Individual Training (AIT) after you all are done with BCT. If you have the right attitude, you should do fine. A big plus, especially when it comes to weapons training, is if you came from a gun-loving family and started shooting when you were younger. I didn't and so sucked at marksmanship. But, that wasn't why I went into the Army in the first place.

AIT is where you receive your job training. In your research for what job you want before you enlist, check out how long the training is going to be. My job was IT specialist, and my AIT was six months, one of the longer ones. By far, the longest AIT is for a linguist, especially if the language you'll be studying is difficult like Chinese, Arabic, Korean, or Persian/Farsi. Language training itself, done at the Defense Language Institute in Monterey, California, could take up to a year or slightly more. Then, afterward, you might be trained to do intelligence (likely) for another few months. I remember a guy I used to know many years ago who enlisted in the Army in the early 90s and wound up being trained as a Korean linguist and then in intelligence. Adding up the time he spent in the IRR before shipping out to BCT, his BCT time, his language training (at least one year), and his intelligence training, he arrived at his first duty station in Korea with almost half of his four-year enlistment over. Yes, gents, this is so. Though you have a total 8-year commitment, whatever training you receive while on active duty counts toward your total active duty time.

On that note, I also want to underscore the following. Unless you don't really care what happens to you during your Army time (and there are people like that), take every opportunity you can to take training on the Army's dime, especially technical training that will help you get a job in the civilian world when you get out. You want to get IT certifications? Use tuition assistance to pay for it. You want to get your EMT certification? Make sure you enlist as a medical specialist and get that. You can also use some of your GI Bill money WHILE ON ACTIVE DUTY to get a degree, including a master's. Again, in my case, I used it to get a master's degree because I already had a bachelor's. If you want to position yourself well before you get out, and already eliminate the hurdles of having a degree and the certifications, you have no excuse not to start working on this after you get to your first unit. Admittedly, there were many active duty soldiers in Iraq and Afghanistan who were working too much and dealing with other shit at home (e.g., cheating girlfriends or spouses and the damaging fallout from them) where they couldn't apply themselves to degree programs or other training programs. Now that things are relatively calmer, you should have some more free time. Yes, do your partying and enjoy yourself here and there, but DO NOT piss away your time and not get out with nothing less than an associate's degree and a few certifications. To take it one step further, you could start an online business while on active duty. This is something I wish I'd done while I had the time, but I was more focused on study and traveling in Europe, which I did a lot of, to my satisfaction.

Finally, do online courses for your degree, and do them with an accredited non-profit university. Do not take out any loans if possible and take your time if you have 4-6 years. All of this saves you time. Having that bachelor's, unfortunately, is still a must in today's over-credentialized world. The sooner you knock it out, the less headaches you'll have later on. I can remember some of my old unit-mates telling me not long after we all transitioned off of active duty how they regretted not getting at least an associate's. Now, they're stuck, unemployed, and trying to attend school full time, even with the GI Bill.

ENLISTED vs. OFFICER

Generally, it's better to be an officer, especially long-term. You get better pay, deal with less bullshit (e.g., clean-up and landscaping duty), and are more respected when you get out because you're seen as "management material" by private-sector employers. But, all is not a bed of roses and you have to be circumspect in deciding to go down this route.

First, if you have a degree, regardless of major, you'll already qualify to be an officer. (Even better if you have a medical degree because you can come in at a higher rank like Captain or Major if you're a nurse or doctor, respectively.) This is what happened to me, and my recruiter was trying to push me in this direction. But, something in the back of my mind told me to be cautious, especially since I didn't have all of the facts before me and, at least in my mind, wouldn't be making an informed decision. So, I chose to go enlisted instead, with the intent of maybe becoming an officer later if I wanted to reenlist. It wasn't until later when I could give shape to my doubts.

Understand, firstly, that officers are trained to be generalists – managers. Enlisted are trained to do a job and, given the job, will do that job for the duration of their active duty and maybe their Reserve and National Guard careers. With the Army, both officers are enlisted are trained to fight or to lead others to fight. No surprise that the core of the Army is the infantry and combat arms. (Same with the Marines, though there's greater stress on combat training ("you're a rifleman") first. All other jobs are secondary and are in support of combat arms. As enlisted, you're trained to be on the front line. As an officer, you're trained to lead these front-line soldiers.

Whether you begin your initial enlistment as an officer or become an officer later, you attend Officer Candidate School (OCS) at Fort Benning, Georgia, where you have your weapons training and do other things like land navigation. At the time you begin OCS, you create a "dream sheet" of three branches, one of which has to be combat arms (e.g., Infantry) if you're male. You hope that, at the time you get out of OCS and are assigned your first unit, you have your first choice. Don't count on it. "Needs of the Army" will trump most things. If your first choice was Signal (i.e., communications), you might instead wind up with Air Defense Artillery (combat arms). The only way you can change this is if you find someone in your class with the branch you want and he or she wants the branch you have. You do a one-to-one swap. If not, then you're stuck with what you're assigned – for the duration of your first enlistment. When Iraq and Afghanistan were full force, you, as a privileged and patriarchy-benefiting scumbag of a male, could have wound up with Infantry and then be on the front lines with your men. Nice – not.

Some of the worst officers I've seen have been early 20-somethings coming straight out of college or ROTC and who have no real-world, or otherwise, leadership experience, with the entitlement attitude to boot. Not all are like this, of course, and I've seen some shitbag officers who were shitbags prior enlisted, but who lucked out and went to OCS to get a better job. In general, though, prior enlisted (and older) tended to make better officers because they knew what it was like to be enlisted and knew what jobs in the branch entailed. Think of the civilian world – an IT project manager, for example, would, in general, be more effective if he or she worked as a network administrator or programmer for a time before taking management courses, or even daring to consider himself or herself a competent manager.

Next, many agree that the best of both worlds (for the Army) is being a warrant officer (WO). A WO is a technical subject matter expert who runs a shop or a section. He or she is a commissioned officer, but doesn't deal with running a battalion or division unless necessary. Think project or program manager instead of "general management." Less bullshit and more focus on the technical side of the house. You especially find WOs as helicopter pilots and Signal officers. WOs were prior enlisted before they became WOs. You don't become a WO straight out of the gate like you would a commissioned officer. The downside of being a WO is that is takes much longer to attain the next rank because you have to know your technical area solidly and because of time-in constraints. This is why you find many WO4s and WO5s (two of the highest ranks) in their 50s and 60s, with at least 20 years of total service. It's also about slots, which I'll address below.

Finally, back to being enlisted. In my view, there's no shame in being enlisted, even if you have a degree. (Case in point, during both basic training and my tech training, there were many people who had worked in IT and had some college credits, which meant that they had a higher rank going in. They enlisted because they had shit for job prospects and wanted to better themselves.) Going the enlisted route makes perfect sense if you're going to be a short-timer and are very focused in what you want. I was in the Signal branch and I went enlisted because I wanted to work to get that hands-on experience and maybe a certification or two (which the Army, and the other services, could pay for). When it comes to IT, as many of you out there know, experience matters more than education. After six years (my initial enlistment term), I came out having done networking, a bit of programming, and working with databases. With my general demeanor, many people have mistaken me for an officer, and are surprised to learn that I was enlisted. I didn't take the certifications, though, but that didn't hinder me in getting my present job. But, I certainly used my GI Bill benefits while on active duty to help pay for a master's in IT, which has been much more valuable in the long run.

Also, with being enlisted, as I mentioned with the recruiters, unless you get the exact job you want, you could be stuck with a shit job for at least four years, then have to reenlist to "reclass," as they call it, to something you want to do, for another four years or so.

ASSIGNMENTS

As is the case with OCT, at the time you enlist, you can create a wish list of where you want to be stationed when you're finished with BCT and AIT. Don't assume that you're going to get your choice. At the time I enlisted (and it probably is still the case today), the only way you could get a choice is if you chose OCONUS (Outside of the Continental United States), which is anything other than the 48 states. OCONUS, regarding duty stations outside of deployments, means Europe, Asia, Hawaii, Alaska, or the territories like Puerto Rico and Guam. Two main choices are Germany and Korea. If you choose CONUS (Continental United States), you won't have a choice with your first enlistment. You go where they assign you, and that's based on "needs of the Army" and you'll probably end up on a larger base like Fort Benning or Fort Stewart in Georgia, Fort Hood in Texas, or Fort Lewis in Washington State. Them's the breaks, but if you have a mildly positive attitude, it can work out. Some bases really suck and others are rather tolerable. Do your research on the base and the surrounding area, keeping in mind that the nearest city to an Army base is heavily dependent on the base itself. So, expect to see lots of tattoo parlors, check-cashing places, bars, and assorted welfare recipients. (Plentiful with somewhat effortless single-mother pussy, but wear a rubber.)

If you happen to get Germany or Korea, you did have a choice, but, as is also the case with staying CONUS, you don't have a choice with WHAT UNIT you'll end up in. Again, "needs of the Army." In my case, for example, I did BCT at Fort Benning and then went to Fort Gordon, also in Georgia, for my AIT. My first duty station, which I learned not two weeks into AIT, was Benning. Kind of funny when you look at it, because I wound up crisscrossing the state. When I arrived at Benning, I was first to go to a transportation unit but then got moved up to the HQ unit because they needed my skills there. This was a logistics battalion of which the transportation unit was a part. I deployed with this logistics battalion for one year. In early 2006, I got in touch with my branch manager (Signal) at Army HQ and requested a transfer to Germany, which I then did in November 2006, being stationed in Mannheim in the southwest, one hour south of Frankfurt am Main. I wound up in a Signal unit and then deployed with them in late 2007. A buddy of mine from AIT with the same job, in contrast, wound up at Fort Stewart in Georgia with the 3rd Infantry Division, a large, cumbersome, and moderately dysfunctional unit. He stayed there for all of his six years and deployed three times. He was unable to get out of 3rd ID and Stewart. That happens. To get away from 3rd ID, he'd have had to reenlist (which is when you truly do have a choice as to what BASE you go to, but not unit) for another 4-6 years or get out. (He got out, and is now working for Oracle in San Francisco as a software developer.)

The upshot to this is: you have little choice where you go, but you have a choice in what to make of where you're at. In my case, I spent my entire Army career in two places: Benning in Georgia and Mannheim in Germany. Each had their respective merits and demerits. The unit at Benning was run better and I did my job all during the two years I was with the unit, both in garrison and deployed. But, Columbus, Georgia was lacking in things to do, even though I had a car and took some day trips to Alabama and Atlanta. The unit in Germany was run a bit worse and I didn't do my job except when deployed.

But, I was in Germany and near two main train stations and one major international airport. You can bet your sweet ass that I took advantage of that, traveling to France three times, Switzerland once, Italy twice, Greece once, Malta twice, Turkey once, Austria once, and all over Germany. It was all about seeing and seizing the opportunity. After all, in garrison, you work 9 to 5 and have your weekends free, and have four-day weekends whenever there's a major US holiday like Memorial Day and President's Day. If you're stationed in Italy you can do the same thing with Europe. In Korea, you can travel all over Asia, though if you're in the north near Seoul, you'll probably be working your ass off with field exercises and, consequently, won't have that much free time.

Final note: I touched on the fact of doing your research with bases and the surrounding areas. Understand that, with most bases, one or two units are the major force there. All other units are classified as either support units or "tenant" units. For example, as I mentioned, 3rd ID is the main unit on Fort Stewart. If you get assigned there, you might wind up at the division level, or at the battalion or company level of a unit supporting 3rd ID. If 3rd ID deploys, then all or mostly all of the support units will go with it. If you get assigned to a "tenant" unit, you might not deploy, though that's not set in stone. (Case in point: with the logistics battalion, the battalion JAG clerk, a black single mother, found a way to get out of the deployment and so the battalion had to scrounge to find a JAG clerk, which they found in an early 20-something, nerdy and pimply-faced guy who thought that he was set with his desk job in garrison. "Needs of the Army," baby.) Also, realize that getting assigned to a plum base might not be it's all cracked up to be. "Plum" might be Japan (very hard to get unless you luck out or reenlist and get some strings pulled), Spain, or it might be one of the bases near Washington, DC (e.g., Fort Meade, where the NSA is) to include the Pentagon. DC area bases are stuffed with top officers and senior enlisted, so as junior enlisted, you run the risk of being someone's bitch in a more political atmosphere –though you'll be doing a desk job and not out in the field pitching tents. (Higher brass is also someone else's bitch, as a major could be the secretary and dog-walker to a one-star general.) You also have to deal with DC traffic and the high cost of living, and plenty of government employees with their own entitlement mentality. Given that, you might be better off, cost of living-wise, at a place like Fort Bliss near El Paso, Texas, though you'd have to deal with another kind of Shitsville entirely.

REGULATIONS

If nothing else, read up on and understand deeply Army regulations, especially those that govern solider appearance and behavior. Many of these regulations are online, so you can access them much easier than you could in the past, when soldiers tended to be more ignorant because of lack of information. Knowing the regulations better than anyone else means that you can protect yourself when you encounter a shitbag who won't let up on you.

For example, in Germany, I had a higher-ranked supervisor who I didn't get along with because I could tell that he was a self-serving shitbag who could get what he wanted because the battalion leadership needed him for deployments. The guy was Indian and came from a somewhat well-to-do family. (However, unlike the stereotype, this Indian wasn't the sharpest bayonet in the drawer.) He enlisted in the Army to get his American citizenship, but was going to do his 20 years so that he could also get a pension. This guy wasn't well-liked by many people in the battalion, and fate conspired to make him my supervisor.

One thing he did early on was to get on me about my haircut. According to regulation, all males' hair must be short and off the collar. You could either shave your head bald (which I did) or do a high-and-tight. (Look it up.) I usually kept my hair blocked off in the back, as I had been doing for many years. Mind you, no one either in BCT, AIT, or at my first unit said anything about this, as I usually kept my hair very short and they probably didn't care. Not so this Indian guy. The regulation, I admit, said that, in the back, the hair was to be in a taper instead of a block. I couldn't argue with him about this, but I managed to put it off until things got busy with the pre-deployment preparations. Then, after my unit moved from Germany, it fell by the wayside. I never heard about it again, either from him or anyone else.

The point here is that anyone, including you, can circumvent or flout regulations when necessary. Regulations exist for a reason, but there are many that have been there on the books for a long time, and in my opinion, make little sense today. Yet, everyone has to follow them, or suffer the consequences. One thing to keep in mind is that all leadership is required to maintain current regulations and not take away from current regulations. They can also add to existing regulations as they see fit, but "within reasonable bounds." For example, a unit commander can push to have all soldiers starch and press their uniforms even though this isn't necessary and can damage said uniforms. This is frivolous, but you'll run into trouble if you don't follow it. On the flip side, if a shitbag is trying to get you to do something dangerous, you can pull out the regulation and shove it into his (or her) face to get them to back away, even going up the chain of command to get him or her to stop. You'll still suffer some consequences, but at least you can shove back and stand your ground.

This is the Army guys – when you signed on the dotted line and raised your hand, you gave up some of your rights as a private citizen for the goodies. If you're not ready to do this, then you have no business being in the Army.

WOMEN

A crucial subject since many of you out there are younger clueless men with raging hormones. Pay close attention because, as it is in the civilian world, the stakes are high and you could SERIOUSLY lose your ass, over a piece of ass, and dignity in this minefield if you don't know how to navigate it.

First, understand that there are fewer women than men in the Army, so you're dealing with a pre-existing unfavorable sex ratio. There are certain fields, mind you, where there are generally more women than men (e.g., medical and clerical, though clerical jobs have all but disappeared). In general, the easier the job, the more women you'll find. This was also, until recently, mandated by the ban on women in combat roles.

In my experience, many Army women, whether they're white, black, Hispanic, or Asian, are both unattractive and low on the intelligence scale. After all, even in the case with men, the Army and the military won't attract the best and the brightest. There are outliers, of course, but don't expect to find them. Also, with Army women, since many Army guys are thirsty, the women's attitudes tend to be horrible because of entitlement mentality – which also existed before they went in because of feminism, etc.

Case in point: note the phrase "queen for a year." This refers to a chick on deployment, usually a 5 at best, where she might be the only Slot A (hat tip to Terence Popp) of maybe 50 or more men. You can do the math on that one. In my case, I remember during my second deployment to Iraq being at a small outpost of at least 150 mostly infantry guys. We had one female MP who would stay at the base for a few days every month or so. At best she was a 6 – in the face, but not in the body. Though she was a competent MP, imagine her near-effortless pick of dick. It sucks, boys . . . and she certainly wouldn't be sucking you if there are officers or senior enlisted around . . . wink-wink.

Of paramount importance is the following. If you have the urge and it's too strong to ignore, jerk off or, if you're over in Asia or Europe, put aside some cash and avail yourself of hookers. Because many Army chicks are both entitled and mentally disturbed (daddy issues, physical or sexual abuse at home, low self-esteem, substance abuse), if you avail yourself of the Slot A (and B and D) and she has remorse, you can rightly assume that she knows she can sashay her fat ass over to the MP station at any time and file a sexual assault charge. You'll then be yanked aside and have to go through an investigation. Very stressful and potentially life-upending.

I'll give an example. At the start of my second deployment, one of the senior enlisted (an E-6, staff sergeant), who had a girlfriend in Germany and was tapping ass on the side occasionally, suddenly disappeared from our unit while we were in Kuwait for in-processing and training. I didn't find out until two months later that a chick he had banged once or twice in Kuwait filed a rape charge against him. The Army removed him from Kuwait and our unit and sent him to Fort Sill, Oklahoma to sit in limited confinement while his trial, which could have led to a court-martial, was going on. I later found out that he was at Sill for a good seven months. Eventually, they found out that the chick lied and had filed two other sexual assault charges with two other men. She had a history of mental illness. The E-6 was cleared, he was reinstated on active duty, and got his rank back. (But, we never saw him again in Germany.) He could have been court-maritaled and received a dishonorable discharge, which would have fucked him. He escaped this fate, though I'm sure that he definitely was shaken because of it. In general, though the guy should have kept it in his pants, especially since he had a girlfriend who was in his corner, what he went through was unnecessary. But, if you stick your dick in crazy, this is what happens. Don't say you weren't warned.

On another note, dealing with Army women is often a challenge because of their entitlement mentality and because they're given a lot more slack than the men are, which then creates work problems and fosters resentment from others. For example, there was one blonde chick in Germany – quite the looker, at least a solid 7 who was thin and had a nice ass – who routinely ducked morning formation and didn't get disciplined for it because her supervisor let it slide. She missed formation because she often had been drinking the night before and woke up hung over. (Yet, she swore she didn't have a drinking problem.) She also had three tattoos and had been getting British dick while deployed, so go figure. Another example was a whiny, sometimes belligerent, and all-around insufferable black chick who talked back to supervisors when they required her to do physical labor. While in Kuwait, she conveniently got herself knocked up by a senior enlisted dude and then was sent back to Germany to wait out the deployment – because, of course, how could you deploy a pregnant slut to actually do work? So, she did clerical work and probably stayed in for a few more years while she got free health and pre-natal care. Great while you can get it, but then the kid is going to be yet another single-mother raised kid. God bless America!

My advice: avoid these chicks and only work with them when necessary. If you choose to fuck them, get a vasectomy and freeze your sperm first. Then, make sure to record the two of you making the beast with two backs, to protect yourself against a sexual assault charge. The witch-hunt is now greater than it was when I was in, so you have to tread very, very carefully in this area. And, as I said, if you're in Asia or Europe, then just go to the brothels. The attitude toward prostitution is more favorable in these places and the quality of pussy is that much better. Army women, even if attractive, tend to be sluts or might be tempted to be sluts. If you had your choice between a fat Hispanic chick, at best a 5, in the barracks, with the risk of her going to the MPs if you didn't "satisfy" her right, or a brunette 8 Ukrainian in the red-light district in Amsterdam, where you pay her 100 euro for one hour with no hassle, which would you prefer? I know which one I'd choose.

Lastly, I strongly advise against being married while in the military unless you choose to do your 20 years and make a career of it. If you're a short-termer and doing only one enlistment, you have shit to do, so get it done. The fewer distractions you have, the better.

Never marry an Army chick because of the risk of getting a psycho (and a petri dish of prior dick STDs) and because deployments, if they happen, can stress and tear apart a marriage, with any kids being collateral damage. You're better off finding a non-Army chick who is very patient and understanding and who will be in your corner for the long haul. Not a given, mind you, since there are plenty of younger uneducated chicks looking to get their hooks into an Army guy to get his sperm and spousal benefits. This also applies to Germans, Italians, Asians, etc., wherever there's an Army base and are looking to capitalize on young dumb Army guys. (Pussy for resources – remember that.) I've seen this one too many times and it doesn't turn out well, for either the guy or the girl. For example, one 19 year old dumbass on my team during my second deployment gave his wife complete access to the bank account before he deployed. A few months in, she went incommunicado and, in tandem, had drained the bank account. He was calling frantically, from Iraq, via Skype every day to find her and eventually found out that she had left town and went back to stay with her parents in another state. Subsequently, they divorced – and then he was back on Skype cyber-stalking this redhead he knew from his hometown. Eventually, the battalion pulled him from our side after six months because he had too many personal issues at home. Good riddance. Then, there are the other stories of Army chicks or Army wives "forgetting" their birth control. You know the story.

Bottom line: if you want to get married, do it AFTER you get out and after you set yourself up. Then, apply the necessary protections and countermeasures as the fine Mr. Clarey and other Manospherians have enumerated.

SHOULD I STAY OR SHOULD I GO?

About whether you should stay in or get out once your first term of enlistment is over, that's a decision that only you can make. Sure, there are many benefits of staying in, not the least of which are the continued benefits that you'd get from a highly structured environment (especially, that you continue to get paid even when you're doing nothing or shoveling shit) and a pension (if it's still around nearly 20 years later). However, I can say from experience that, the longer you stay in, the more "Army-unized" you become. First enlistments for shot-termers are always the best in terms of flexibility, especially if you get the job you want and set yourself up well by the time your enlistment is over. Next best is if you do under ten years, correcting whatever mistakes you made in your first enlistment, and doing better by the time you get out. Doing the full 20 (or over) isn't for everyone. I've seen former infantry, Special Forces, and combat arms, for example, who retire after 20 years with severe health problems and a sense of bitterness about them. They reached a point where they decided, "Eh, fuck it . . . I'll just do my 20 since I'm already invested in this too deep." Don't get to this point. Stay in because you WANT to – not because you have to. Those that stay in because they have to have more or less the same problems as those in the civilian world do: cunt of a wife to support, kids to support, health problems, etc.

Recently, the military pushed for the Temporary Early Retirement Authority (TERA), called the "15-year retirement." This allows you to shave 5 years off of the total 20 if you so choose. You could do this, but you'd get only 35% of your base pay in retirement (based on the rank you were at retirement) vs. the up to 50% of your base pay for the full 20. The Department of Defense did this to try and thin the ranks to get people out to save money. Again, it's up to you, but knowing this for the future will help you in your decision-making. Always do your research.

Some are cut out for the 20 and do well. Many more aren't cut out for this, and so get out earlier. Remember as I said in the beginning, the military is "faux socialism." Sure, you get the benefits, but what are you giving up to get those benefits? Since 9/11, military pay has gotten better, but historically, career military people typically couldn't do anything else in the civilian world and so chose to be a professional solider, cook, tank driver, pilot, etc. You can do this, or choose to do something else. Just make an informed decision.

BENEFITS

Finally, a word about the bennies both on active duty and when you get out. I want to note first that you will get all of your bennies if you get an honorable discharge only. Get a dishonorable discharge, and you've fucked yourself over in many ways. Get a less-than-honorable discharge (LTO), and you get some bennies, but not as many as you'd get with the honorable one. In short, you really have to fuck up to get a dishonorable discharge, so it happens fairly rarely. More common is the LTO, so be careful in what you get yourself into. Case in point: a guy from South Carolina I was stationed with in Germany got an LTO not two years into his first enlistment. He was a mechanic who, admittedly, was working for some shitbags in the motor pool who had it out for him. But, the guy, rather than learn how to play the political game and keep his nose clean, chose to fall back on his "redneck" (his words) ways and cause trouble. Eventually, the motor pool guys found a way to fuck him over and which resulted in a LTO. Almost a year I transitioned off of active duty, I heard that the guy was in SC, degreeless, working at an auto parts store, and living out of his truck. Not the one you want.

Back to the bennies . . .

First, I mentioned the GI Bill, which is maybe the most valuable one of the suite of bennies. I said that you can use the GI Bill while still on active duty, which I wholeheartedly recommend for short-timers, especially, to get a jump on getting your degree and/or credentials before you get out. No time to waste, so get cracking on this. There's also tuition assistance while on active duty, but recently, because of sequestration, there's some concern about how much has been cut and how long this might be going on. Best to do your research. (Now that there are online course offerings through Udacity, Coursera, etc., you can offset this.) With the newer Post-9/11 GI Bill, there's the Yellow Ribbon program that some colleges participate in, where you might get all of your tuition paid as well as a living stipend, based on the military's Basic Allowance for Housing (BAH). Do your online research on this as there's a ton of information. That's all I'll say about that.

Second, there's the Veterans Administration (VA) medical benefit. Admittedly, if you can get a decent job with decent medical benefits, use those instead of the VA. The VA, in general, is shit because of the bureaucracy and because it's a political hot potato. The VA is best used if you have a service-related injury. For example, did you get your limb blown off from an IED during deployment? The VA would cover that. Did you hurt your back lifting too much shit during down time? The VA can cover that. However, I can't stress enough that, before you come off of active duty, make sure to DOCUMENT every ache and pain that you think is service-related BEFORE you transition. Get it in writing from the military doctor's (and dentist's and specialist's, if connected) office, along with any medication (other than the ubiquitous cure-all for the military, ibuprofen) that you were taking for it. After you transition, make sure to go to the nearest VA clinic or hospital in your current town or city and get into the system. As of right now, current Iraq and Afghanistan vets are entitled to five years of free(-ish) medical care from the VA, even if you don't have a service-connected health issue. But, again, don't use the VA unless you absolutely have to. The last time I used the VA was over 2.5 years ago when I went for an MRI for my lower back, since I have microtears in two discs because of overexertion while on active duty. I got it done and didn't pay a dime. Why? Because I had this documented and it's service-connected. I'm also thankful that I didn't get royally fucked up in any combat situation. These are the really pathetic bastards that really need VA medical care. And, given how the VA is one, the troubles they have in getting medical care is really tragic.

Third, there's the benefit of having a security clearance. When I enlisted in 2004, the job I chose required me to get a Secret clearance because I'd be working with sensitive information on computer networks. The process began shortly after I was in BCT and, because I had a clean record (i.e., no drug use, no arrests, no jail time, paid off my debts in a timely fashion, etc.) I was able to get my clearance before reporting to my first duty station. Yay for me. Others weren't so lucky, and got stuck in AIT for a few more months while the clearance process chugged along.

The benefit of having a clearance is twofold: (1) you have access to jobs that not everyone can get, especially government jobs like in the Department of Defense; (2) it shows to certain employers that you can be trusted with sensitive information and that you're, at least on the surface, and upstanding person. Having a clearance is a nice feather in your cap, especially if you already have your degree and your certifications. Also, having the highest clearance you can get (which, currently is the Yankee White one, which give you access to the White House) moves down the chain to the so-called "public trust" designation. In other words, the highest clearance you can get means that you can do anything below you, so to speak. If you have a Top Secret, you can work in a Secret position, for example.

However, let me counter the benefits by giving the negatives. I speak from experience on this one, since I've held both a Secret clearance and a Top Secret clearance for a total of 11 years. Yes, having a clearance gives you access to jobs that the great unwashed masses can't get, but you won't be special in a smaller lake of thousands of clearance holders. Not long after 9/11, the Federal government suddenly needed lot of people to work in the defense sector, both on the government side and the contractor side. If you had a clearance during that time, you were like the hot 20-something chick and all boners were pointed at you. You could more or less write your own ticket, especially with contractors. Well, those glory days are behind us. With the Iraq and Afghanistan wind-down and budget cuts, many of these jobs have been eliminated and contractors are left scrambling for other work, while their clearances expired in the process. Not a good position to be in. Also, if you don't have a certain type of clearance at the time you apply for the job, you most likely won't get it.

For example, the clearance called Top Secret with Secure Compartmentalized Information and a Full-Lifestyle Polygraph enables you to work at places like the CIA and the NSA. I have one step below this clearance and so would have to have my clearance upgraded to the Lifestyle Poly to qualify for them. It hasn't happened. Why? Because it takes time and money to run the investigation and upgrade the clearance. Few contractors seem willing to do this now, in this slack market, and the Federal government is hamstrung by its own stupidity in upgrading clearances. Shortly after 9/11, there was a critical shortage of clearance holders. Now, you have a glut of clearance holders, made worse by more stringent hiring practices. And, if you're trying to apply for a job that requires a clearance and you don't have one, you might as well forget it. Again, takes too much time and money to get it working. The government has overclassified documents and facilities too much and is now feeling the pain. Compare this to what the good Mr. Clarey has said about progressive credentialism. It's like constipation and impacted shit. Until the system flushes this out, it will just hurt more and more as time wears on.

So, the upshot is, especially if you want to work in the defense sector, make sure to get a job that requires as high a clearance as you can get. Then, when it's almost time for you to get out, start negotiating with contractors (if that's the route you want to go, instead of the Federal government) to bump up your clearance if the job requires it. If you have software skills, you'll likely bet a job faster than if you have other skills, since software engineers are always in high demand. Whatever you do, DO NOT come out with just training in very specific Army (or Navy, or Air Force) systems designed by defense contractors. That is, if you just know a system the Army uses, you're severely limiting yourself to what jobs a contractor might be bidding on with the Fed. The contractor, especially if it's a smaller one, probably won't get the contract because the giants like Lockheed Martin and General Dynamics will have the market sewn up. I wonder sometimes about those dumb-asses who worked just in radio and microwave who are scrambling for jobs now. When the money was flowing, they could find work. Not now, I'm sure.

The Truth About Conspiracy Theorists

April 13, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

In being a libertarian I often run into the faux-libertarian crowd that is largely libertarian because it sounds "cool" or "fashionable." They usually give themselves away with a few "tell tale" traits, but one of my favorite is whether they believe in "chem trails." Once you got a true believer in "chem trails" then all sorts of fun and entertaining idiocy soon follows.

Fluoride was put in the water to make us all behave!!!
Everybody in the military are murderers!!!!
The illuminati/bilderberg!!!
9-11 was an inside job!!!

etc., etc.

However, whereas I am largely bemused with the standard fare of libertarian conspiracy theorists, their existence Venn diagrams into the world of conspiracy theorists in general. And "conspiracy theorists in general" I believe will prove increasingly useful in the future when it comes to understanding politics, economics, and human psychology.

Understand everyone is seeking a religion. And though I may have my disagreements with the world's established religions, at least they call it that.

Christians call themselves Christians.
Muslims identify as Muslims.
Jews claim to be Jewish.
And Buddhists claim to be Buddhists.

Even the Scientologists have the gall to call themselves Scientologists.

The same intellectual honesty cannot, however, be said for the majority of modern day Americans. Especially, those who "doth protest too much" when they hate on religion. Leftists, for example, provide the most numerous examples of people who "hate" Christianity, but immediately replace it with equally false religions (global warming, socialism, feminism, activism, racism, sexism, and all various forms of SJWing, etc.). Atheists, of the quiet variety, are intellectually honest followers of their beliefs, but their closely related "Atheist-cult" cousins who pride themselves on being Atheists (and not much else) again (and quite ironically) simply substituted one religion for another. And I have also pointed out what I believe to be the latest religion the sheeple are swallowing whole - fake mental illnesses. According to the CDC 1 in 5 children have some form of mental illness, and according to MedCo 25% of American women are on some kind of medication or another (if you believe that). However, which is more likely?

That high a percentage of the population REALLY has a mental problem?

Or

That high a percentage want an excuse so they don't have to try as hard in life/can excuse their failures in life?

The larger point is that I don't care what form the "religion" takes, even if its adherents swear up and down it "isn't a religion." Everybody seeks out a religion. For it is human nature to find some kind of meaning and purpose in life because without it, it really is hard to find some kind of incentive to live (not to mention most people are too cowardly to face the likelihood they are finite, there is no "afterlife," and they will truly cease to end).

The problem, however, with religion, is that it is always based in falsehoods, or at least unknowns. This is what gives it its "amorphous," "intangible," "religious" qualities. However, in not being provable, empirical, or scientific, this leaves ALL religions susceptible to misinterpretation, abuse, and, inevitably, self-servitude.

And this is where the conspiracy theorists come in.

Conspiracy theorists abuse their religion of "conspiracy theories" because they're not only too lazy to think things through, study, and prove their theories right or wrong, but because they also have a bit of an ego and want to think themselves intellectually "superior" or "fancy." And whereas serious study of any topic, to the point one is well-versed, perhaps even an expert on the topic, will yield legitimate and valid intelligence on the topic, conspiracy theorists are too lazy and too impatient for such empircism, study, and research. They want validation and faux-intellectual discussion NOW, and are more than happy to substitute outlandish and controversial poppycock for the truth in order to get it. Ergo, conspiracy theorists don't really believe in their theories, they simply mentally get off on advocating them.

This results in a parallel, even some significant overlap, between conspiracy theorists and leftists in their respective religions.

Nothing has to be verified.
No logic or reason needs to be adhered to.
Reality and sanity themselves can be ignored.

Because all that matters to the conspiracy theorist is the "shock-jock-esque" controversy he or she stirs up while seeming so much more "knowledgeable" than you ignorant commoners, just as the leftist religious zealot only cares about being made out to be a victim, and thus rationalizing the theft of others (while also snidely accusing you of "ignorance" or "racism" or "sexism" because you dared to disagree with them).

Alas, why the "10 Commandments" of these religions are not just insane, but usually outright wrong, and repeated mindlessly as NOBODY ever ~~bothered to~~ cared to confirm their veracity:

1. Chem trails
2. It's the "corporations maaaan!"
3. 9-11 was an inside job
4. The rich don't pay their fair share.
5. The Illuminati
6. 1 in 5 women are raped
7. The Holocaust didn't happen
8. White/Male privilege
9. Frankenfood
10. Women make only 77% what men do

However, there is a price for such ignorance and ego, and that price is the cost that all religions have historically had - it forces non-believers to suffer.

But whereas in the past this suffering largely manifested itself in the prevention of science and all the technological advances that it could have provided to humanity, today it is a sheer attack on sanity, logic, and economics. And whereas human advancement was halted due to belief in a deity, an afterlife, or simple tribalism, today we are bringing our society's to a screeching halt for things as petty as the:

ego
greed laziness sloth, and arrogance

of spoiled, Americans and Westerners.

Alas, whether it was the Sultan rejecting western medical advances for his people.

Christians burning "witches" at the stake
Feminists fighting for "fat acceptance" or Jenny McCarthy-esque parents rejecting vaccines for their children.

All their decisions and beliefs were based in lies.
These lies were forced on society through theocracy or democracy.
And humanity will pay the price of achieving nowhere near what it could have.

And that my friends, is why you enjoy the decline.

Two New Blogroll Additions

April 13, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Black Dragon and Good Looking Loser have been added.

You will visit. You will conform. Compliance is mandatory.

Getting Your Revenge on the Left

April 14, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

You can buy the book here.

How the Government Ruined Black Women for Black Men

April 15, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

You can purchase more hurtful truths here.

The Father Could Not Be Reached for Comment

April 15, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Gosh darn it, how come government checks aren't preventing this! Don't people know the government is superior to men and fathers!?

The "Signal Values" of Credentials is Eroding

April 16, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

It's hard to believe, but employers (and pretty much everybody else) are starting to realize that having a college degree means absolute jack crap. This in turn means the value of degrees is going down AND that the charlatans in academia may actually have to find real jobs.

Hey! Shoot That Kid! He's Escaping the Plantation!

April 16, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Uh oh!

CEO Dan Price & the $70,000 Minimum Wage

April 17, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Decided to sober up the discussion of executive compensation with some (GASP!) MATH!

The Bakken/Williston, North Dakota's Unemployment Rate

April 19, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Williams County is the county that is ground zero to the Bakken oil field boom. Of course with the collapse in oil prices they've been laying people off, but I always like to see the visual consequences of it. What is particularly interesting though is I've never seen an unemployment rate of below 1%. It's a testament to just how insanely hot that labor market was, and could be the target we aim at for the US labor market as a whole.

Math Proves the Left's Obsession With Corporate Taxes is Futile

April 20, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

It is coming up on 5 years now that I have avoided getting into debates or arguments with leftists in person or at social settings. I sit there, ignoring them at parties, knowing full well the BEST outcome is them saying "agree to disagree" and the worst is me being asked to leave as I offended the effeminate and weak sensibilities of Minneapolis' effete and aging Gen X intellectual class. However, while that is how I handle myself in personal situations, I am not unaware of the general political pulse of the nation, as I am constantly reminded of society's ignorance online.

Be it comments sections, links, articles, news, or posts I am acutely aware that nothing has changed and have likely gotten worse. College students and their professors are hard to discern as they throw equally childish and victim-whoring temper tantrums over adult-world realities. Democrats don't even try anymore to come up with convincing lies about national debts and e-mail servers. And every soccer mom is seemingly rushing to have her precious (and otherwise completely normal) child diagnosed with the latest mental disorder to excuse her and her husband's lack of parenting. It's an insane world, and I take solace in that I no longer care and am just going to watch the show as I imbibe in as much Rumpleminze as possible before it's over.

However, every once in a while a leftist choir will sing a chorus that is so parroted, so knee jerk and so Goebbels that it compels me to dust off my ole Economist hat, fire up by economist spidey senses, and do a little research that will debunk the lie indisputably. Not because I want to have the research to point to at a later date should I be debating a leftist and need it. Not because I wanted to know for a fact what the truth of the matter was. But merely to piss them off and force their brains to the uncomfortable brink of cognitive dissonance as quickly as possible. And chorus the choir was singing this time was "evil corporate tax breaks."

Now this chorus has many variations:

If corporations paid what they did in 1950 all our problems would be solved Corporations get all this "corporate welfare" and the always bland, non-discript and completely void of any intelligence whatsoever

Corporations don't pay their fair share!

So I did a little bit of digging, pulled the national data on corporate profits and corporate taxes going back to 1947, and have more than enough data to put an end to this debate and the above claims once and for all.

First, corporate welfare.

Unfortunately, this isn't a matter of facts or statistics, as much as it is the left's complete ignorance of basic accounting. Because there is no such thing as "corporate welfare" UNLESS you want to consider the bank bailouts and grant money to solar companies welfare. In that case, yes, that IS corporate welfare and it is wrong. But sadly most leftists confuse merely giving corporations a TAX BREAK with a HANDOUT like welfare.

The truth is that all taxes (corporate or individual) are based on there being a profit to tax in the first place. This is the concept of "before tax profit," the amount of money left over after a company deducts all of its operating expenses from its total revenues. This "before tax profit" is the amount taxed because taxing a company on its revenue would be like taxing a father of five on his gross salary. Certain expenses need to be deducted so that the individual/corporation can pay for vital expenses to merely exist and run a business.

Now the stated corporate tax rate is 40% in the US (and most states). However, sometimes local and national governments will give a corporation a tax break if they invest in a certain town, build a plant in an impoverished area, etc. etc. However, this is NOT welfare. It is merely LOWERING the tax the company has to pay to the government. So instead of paying 40% the company pays 35% or 30%. The company did not "collect a welfare check" that required the taxpayers to bail it out. It was already self-supporting itself and NOT parasiting off of society. It is merely just a lowering of its tax bill.

Understanding this fact allows us to move onto chorus #2, "Corporations use tax loopholes to lower their taxes!"

You damn right they do. And it's all legal.

Historically, the left was right. In one year (1951) the effective tax rate was 50% for US corporations and yes the economy was booming back then. However, this had more to do with the fact the US was the only industrialized economy remaining in the world and our corporations were the sole suppliers of goods to the world. That argument aside, the effective corporate tax rate has since gone down to today's rate of 25%.

Effective Corporate Tax Rate
Souce: FRED Database
60%
50% 40%
30% 20% 10%
0%
1947-01-01
1949-07-01
1952-01-01
1954-07-01
1957-01-01
1959-07-01
1962-01-01
1964-07-01
1967-01-01
1969-07-01
1972-01-01
1974-07-01
1977-01-01
1979-07-01
1982-01-01
1984-07-01
1987-01-01
1989-07-01
1992-01-01
1994-07-01
1997-01-01
1999-07-01
2002-01-01
2004-07-01
2007-01-01
2009-07-01
2012-01-01
2014-07-01

This effective rate of 25% (whilst the statutory rate is 40%) proves corporations are indeed using whatever loopholes they can to park money overseas and lower their tax bills.

However, while the left will jump to say, "SEE!!! SEE!!!!!!" they need to realize it's a Pyrrhic victory. The reason why is that corporate taxes are out of their control. Many other countries have found that instead of hating and villainizing corporations, they'd rather woo them (and their jobs) to their home countries. And they do this by LOWERING, if not ELIMINATING corporate taxes. This has given rise to rich nation states such as Hong Kong, Singapore, Bermuda, the Caymans, Lichtenstein and Luxembourg, as well as corporations (who are global in nature) simply moving their HQ's and operations to tax-friendlier countries. And no matter how desperate you are to get them to pay those 50% tax rates they did back in 1951, the more you squeeze them, the more they flee.

Alas, just like I have to accept the fact it is outside of my control to get leftist faux-intellectual Minneapolitans to adhere to logic, leftists have to accept the fact forcing private companies to pay more in taxes is increasingly outside of theirs.

But let us say corporations are not like wet soap, and the harder you squeeze them, the faster they slip out of your hand. Let's just assume we "magically" could wave Paul Krugman's "magic wand of Keynesianism" and force ALL corporations to ALL pay 50% of their profits to the state. And let's ALSO assume corporations would not move their investments or even be slightly disincentived by you stealing 1 out of every 2 dollars they earned.

Well that's the leftists' dream come true, isn't it?

If corporations "just paid their fair share" then all of the country's financial problems would go away?

Right?

So sorry. It's that damn ~~reality~~ math that keeps getting in the way.

In a make-believe Keynesian Dreamworld where Robert Reich and Paul Krugman run through daffodils, holding hands, while wearing speedos, the additional money raised if we retroactively applied a 50% tax rate to all corporate taxes going back to 1971 (when our national debt started its upward climb) would amount to:

$7.9 trillion.

A full $10.2 trillion short of our national debt.

I'd even be more than willing to throw in a couple extra trillion to account for inflation and savings in interest, but I'm terribly sorry leftist speedo worshipers, it's MATHEMATICALLY IMPOSSIBLE TO SOLVE THE COUNTRY'S PROBLEMS THROUGH TAXING CORPORATIONS! In order to do that, we'd need a tax rate closer to 80% and that would just send companies screaming offshore.

The reality is that the US has a spending problem and not a revenue problem. But complicating this problem is that the left in this country is too lazy to do some basic math to even determine whether their ideas are feasible, and complicating it even more is that the left is mentally impaired to the point they would rather believe in their religion of socialism than the reality of math.

The real issue is how do YOU react to these people?

Like I said, I gave up 5 years ago trying to convince them. When I pointed out simple things like the above math I was called a racist, a fascist, etc. etc., and it finally dawned on me there's no reasoning with insane people. The only thing to do is make your case, mock and ridicule those who believe in these lies, and then enjoy watching reality destroy these delusional peoples' lives as the reality socialism promised them never materializes. It's my new favorite past time and sadly, about the only one left to truly enjoy.

Enjoy the decline!

Aaron Clarey is a mean guy who uses math and other tools of patriarchy and privilege to bring (only!) minorities and women down. When he's not busy oppressing people or kicking kittens he hosts The Clarey Podcast as well as runs his consulting division, Asshole Consulting.

Chloe Love is the 1940's PinUp of the Conservative American Movement

April 21, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Chloe Love, who is a nice and sincere darling of a girl, only has 600 followers on twitter.

I find this completely unjust in that this woman, who is at heart a hardcore American loving Libertarian, does A LOT for many men on the righter side of the political spectrum.

If you want to help support a girl who is:

pro-sex pro-men pro-America pro-freedom
pro-individualism

Do her the kindest of courtesies and simply follower her on twitter.

And yes, this is a personal request from me and YES it is for ultimately a good cause. So I would very much appreciate it if you'd double her twitter followership overnight and give her a big surprise in the morning.

Episode #91 The Clarey Podcast

April 21, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Arm powered bikes
Crippling yourself playing dodgeball
POWERWALKINGWOMAN!!! Lookout here she comes!
Respect to fat people who start running
People who point out technicalities
Christopher Columbus discovered America according to written history - get over it
5 year old "transgendered" kids

And MORE!

In THIS EPISODE of The Clarey Podcast!

The Summer of "Fuck You"

April 23, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

I had originally written an intro chapter for The Black Man's Guide Out of Poverty titled "The Summer of Fuck You." However, after finishing it I didn't think it was "ideal" for an intro chapter and opted to write a new one instead. That being said, it's perfectly fine writing and I decided to save it and use it as a separate post. Ergo I present to you "The Summer of Fuck You."

Booze, Repossession, Cursing and Cigars

The Great Recession had hit me on all fronts in life. My job (which was in banking at the time) was constantly under pressure to find business, any business, otherwise we'd have to lay people off. My part-time job (moonlighting as a dance instructor) was suffering from attendance that was half of what it was two years previous. I couldn't refinance my mortgage at a lower rate because it was underwater and banks wouldn't refinance rental property. And what money I was making on the internet qualified more as a hobby than any serious source of income. I was staring bankruptcy right in the face, and with no solution under my control the dread, fear, and helplessness that ensued shortened a fuse that was already way too short.

Then, one Tuesday, my morbidly obese boss called me into his office and wanted to have a chat about a loan I had written up. I had spent nearly 6 hours writing the report for this loan. These 6 hours were completely unnecessary as even a quick skimming of the applicant's basic financials proved he would not be able to pay back the loan. But I knew what was coming. So desperate was my boss for new business he would lecture and berate me for being “too harsh” and that I should go and rewrite the entire report to his liking which translated into English meant “lie your ass off and make this loan look good so I can make a commission.”

Sure enough I was proven correct. My boss started going into how I was too harsh in my analysis. That things were not always black and white. That the numbers I calculated (though mathematically correct and precise) were still “unacceptable,” and I “better learn to become a better team player” etc., etc. However, he went an extra step further, this time criticizing my ability to do my job. How I wasn't a team player. How my writing skills were not up to par and a bunch of other things that I knew just weren't true. He was lying and trying to get a commission on a loan that he knew would never be paid back. He was being dishonest and effectively trying to steal from the bank. He was the epitome of the “bankster scum” liable for the destruction of the US economy. And this scum bag dared to have the gall to lecture me for getting in the way of his commission.

After the lecture I returned to my desk. Because of the precarious nature of my finances I had already developed the skill of letting this stuff roll of my back. I had developed the skill of ignoring it and not letting it get to me. But something inside my brain broke. Something snapped. I mentally could not tolerate the impossible situation I was in. And for the first time in my life I made a decision that was decidedly bad.

I grabbed what few things I had on my desk.
Called up my boss' boss.
Told him my boss was a criminal scum bag.
And then I quit.

I walked off the job and returned to my shitty duplex. Grabbed one of the few remaining cigars in my humidor. Poured a nearly full glass of cheap whiskey. Unfurled a lawn chair out back and permitted myself to do something I hadn't in nearly 3 years.

Enjoy life and relax.

A couple hours later my (now ex) boss called. By this time the alcohol had amply made it into my blood stream, making me an even more colorful conversationalist. And so, despite being hammered, I delivered what was arguably the greatest “fuck you” speeches ever delivered to a boss. He was more or less speechless. He murmured something about me being unprofessional, but in the end I told him he was fired...and may have followed up with something about his weight. I hung up on him, returned to my cigar and vat of rail-quality whiskey, and proceeded to pass out in my backyard.

The next few months that ensued was what I like to call “The Summer of Fuck You.” Since things were outside of my control, why would I worry or work so hard to futilely do nothing about it? My fate was cast, nobody was going to help me, there were no jobs to have, the situation was truly helpless and this was all inspite of “doing the right thing.” And so instead of “doing what was right” I decided to do what was wrong. I refused to apply for jobs, I committed myself to letting the house go into foreclosure, I got drunk nearly every day and, when sober enough, played video games all day long.

Then something interesting happened.

Out of nowhere I received a call around 2 in the afternoon. It was from a recruiter. I had slept till noon that day and had only been drinking for 2 hours, but was still drunk enough to be belligerent. The recruiter said,

“I have your resume here and you have a very impressive background!”

“Oh yeah?” I semi-slurred. “What about it?”

“Well, you have nearly a decade of credit analysis experience, you've programmed models, and the writing sample you left here was exemplary,” he explained.

“So, what, you got a job or something?” I asked flippantly.

Somewhat intimidated he said, “Well, yes, we actually do and we're looking for someone with your background.”

I said, “What bank?” and he proceeded to tell me

I knew the bank he was talking about. It was what was considered a “community bank.” Small banks that are bottom feeders in the banking industry and were the WORST when it came to credit and quality control. They employed ex-bosses like mine, middle aged scum bags who were just in it for the money and didn't mind driving the bank into bankruptcy as long as they made bonus. Knowing full well what laid in store for me if I decided to to work for this bank I bellowed out, “Fuck you! What? Another shitty ass community bank that doesn't have it's shit together?!!! Let me guess, your president was captain of the local high school football team back in 1976 and doesn't know jack shit about financial statement analysis or ratio calculation!!! But you know he's a 'great salesman' and can play golf?!? And let me guess, you got a problem loan portfolio the size of Texas! Made loans to fucktarded midlife crisis men so they could run a bank into the ground. Yeah, I totally want to come out there and help you guys clean up your shit!!!!”

There was a moment of silence on the other end, “....so what do you charge per hour?”

Somewhat shocked he didn't hang up or tell me to fuck off, but still drunk enough not to give a shit, I bluffed.

“$75 and hour!!!”

Silence again at the other end, “....how about $65?”

Not being drunk enough to turn that down I said, “Fine!”

After some additional and more sober discussion we agreed upon a starting date and duties. But when I hung up the phone and the weight of what just transpired hit me, I looked around my dumpy basement office and said to myself, “What the fuck just happened?”

Surprises during “The Summer of Fuck You” didn't stop there. Because I had given up all hope of any success in nearly all aspects of my life, I had changed my behavior correspondingly in all of these aspects. Naturally, when I changed my behavior I got different results, usually for the better.

A girl once flaked 20 minutes before a date claiming “her friend just broke up with her boyfriend and needed her.” I read her the riot act telling her that shit didn't fly in the 7th grade and sure the fuck didn't fly at 30. Sure enough she was at my place a week later in lingerie....um...”cooking” for me.

A carpenter quoted me $1,200 and then delivered me a bill for $1,500...until I went into a rage, cut him a check for $1,200 and threatened to see him come after me for the extra $300 (which he has yet to do till this day).

A bartender once tried to short-pour me a drink. Once, and he didn't do it again after I said, *“Hey, hey, hey. Did I say pour me an 'eye drop' of Rumpleminze?”*

But the most dramatic effect my attitude change had was not on my career, my dating life, or price negotiation skills, but rather my insignificant hobby – blogging and self-publishing books.

Before I quit my job I made sure to keep my writing life separate from my professional life. My blog was (and still is) quite controversial. And a huge risk in today's politically correct world was that if anybody found out about it I could easily be fired for “hurting somebody's feelings,” “offending somebody's sensibilities,” or being accused of various sorts of “isms” (sexism, racism, homophobia, etc.). However, with no career to care about, a house I couldn't care less if repossessed, a genuine indifference about the future, the philosophy of all of which was drenched in booze, there was nothing left to lose. And since there was nothing left to lose I could go full throttle and speak candidly, bluntly, indifferently, not giving a one damn about who was insulted, who was offended, or whose feelings were hurt.

The results were like everything else during “The Summer of Fuck You” - unexpected and beneficial.

Readership started growing at a rate faster than ever. Loyalty increased as readers were not only more entertained and engaged, but knew I was speaking my mind (no matter how much they may have disagreed with me). And while certainly my political adversaries were even more appalled at my crassness, bluntness, insults and harsher hate-filled tone, ironically the more I “insulted” them the more self-published books I would sell.

But the biggest irony was not how the popularity of my blog increased with the controversial, rude, impolite and extreme nature of my writing, but rather what was quickly becoming the fastest growing demographic in my readership – young black males.

Based on every sort of traditional political analysis or “conventional wisdom” black males would be one of the last demographic groups that would have an interest in, let alone agree with, my blog. I, being an “evil white male libertarian conservative” could not relate to such a demographic, not to mention because of my “privilege” would be clueless, and therefore could not relate to young black men. Furthermore, because of the incredibly direct, indifferent, and politically incorrect nature of my blog it would almost be a guarantee I would be seen as a racist and dismissed as such.

The opposite was happening.

It took a bit to figure out why, but I believe it's because what young black men experience today is very similar to what I experienced seven years ago during “The Summer of Fuck You.” An impossible situation, one where there seems to be no hope, there is nothing under your control that you can do to improve it, and an impossible situation that is just too much to take. You crack and simply give up.

However, in the case of young black men “cracking and giving up” is not as destructive as becoming a daytime alcoholic, daring banks to repossess your home, cursing at job recruiters, and giving up on all hope. Rather it is much more productive in that you finally tire of doing “what was right” and instead start to search for “something that works.” And it is this search, this desire to find something that works that has driven both you and me to this same crossroad.

The Potential

At this crossroads it is my sincere belief we both have the perspective and experience to fundamentally and permanently change and improve the standards of living, enjoyment, riches, happiness and lives of all black men. Our unique, but similar experiences, combined with my background in economics and finance allows us to chart the clear and guaranteed path for all black men out of poverty and into a better life. However, it is going to require more than just similarly shitty experiences and a desire for something better.

It's going to require strength.

Specifically it's going to require the strength to commit to discovering and accepting the truth. The resolve to letting go of previous beliefs that have no empirical proof of being true. Predispositions, biases and falsehoods that your life is just too short to believe in. And lies that may feel good to the ego, but are essentially the true chains that keep black man down. You must set aside your feelings and what you'd “like to be true,” and instead accept the fact that a successful life can only be achieved by abiding by what is true. If you can do that, not only can black men achieve the success of their white brothers, but surpass them, even beating out their Asian brothers.

Feminazi Cartoon

April 24, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

This was hilarious.

Until the MRA's came in.

Then it was gut busting.

The False Rape Accusation Bubble Bursts

April 25, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Uh oh leftist man-hating academia is in trouble.

Why America Needs Bruce Jenner

April 26, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

It gets pretty good ranty at the 4:20 mark once I lay down the premise:

What "Six Figures" Means Today

April 27, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

"Six figures."

Hadn't heard that term in a while...that was until I was the unfortunate bystander to a "dude-bro-douche wedding" as I sat in my hotel lobby availing myself of the free internet.

Upon hearing that, sure enough, I looked up from my laptop, and there was your stereotypical frat boy about to ~~take the first step towards getting divorced~~ get married, drunkenly slurring to the security guard about how much he made and she didn't (there will be a VERY interesting story about this in my upcoming podcast).

"Dude, you know how much I make!? SIX FIGURES! How much do you make 'Ms. Security Guard????'"

So the ole Captain decided to do a little research on the FRED database at the federal reserve to see just how much "Six Figures" was nowadays in terms of "Cappy Dollars."

This presented some minor, but technical problems as there is not universal year in which "six figures" actually meant something. But since your ole Captain knew that was a lot of money when he graduated from college (in 1997) he decided to arbitrarily use that year as a base and make some calculations and observations from there.

First, "six figures" which was no doubt a princely sum back in 1997, is worth no more than $67,700 today. Certainly a decent wage for a late 20's/early 30's douche, but not what it meant back in 1997, and certainly nothing to be bragging about to a security guard protecting your drunk frat boy ass at his own wedding.

Second, if you felt compelled to actually make what the equivalent purchasing power of six figures meant back when it meant something, you would have to make $147,500 today to earn those bragging rights.

But the two charts above also point out some interesting observations and the effects of inflation.

As a returning WWII vet, if you made "six figures" in 1947, you were boss. It would be like making $743,000 today.

If you were a baby boomer, making "six figures" during Ford's administration, you were pulling down the equivalent of $300,000 today.

But sadly, with the effects of inflation, compound/exponential math, today's young "go getters" and "business leaders," "six figures" really doesn't mean anything anymore as it is now an obsolete metric of success, wealth, and income. You only make $67,700.

So today, if you're going to brag to people about how you make "six figures." Realize that's like saying to all generations and people before you,

"I'm solid middle management."

You aren't rich.
You aren't special.
And you certainly don't have the right to be degrading people who make less than you.

Episode #91 "Why You Should Never Listen to the Clarey Podcast"

April 28, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Clarey's tippy top super secret "women's body project"
"www.goodguys.com" and why it would fail
You should so date your students
A girl forces herself on 26 year old Cappy
What Cappy wants to see under the dress
Displaced Bottom Feeder College Students
Why Basic Income is stupid
80% of welfare recipients are lying sacks of parasitic scum

AND MORE!

in THIS EPISODE of The Clarey Podcast!

Ranking Schools by Value Added

April 29, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Of course, most liberal arts majors have no intention of adding value to anything, so this report will be moot, but if, you know, you were interested in becoming a contributing member to society then you would be very interested in this report.

Debating the $15/hr Minimum Wage Debate with Leftists

April 29, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

A video request, but some economic goodness within:

We Need a Nationwide St. Scholastica Day Riot

April 30, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Whilst the media whips up racial hatred and division by focusing on ~~Ferguson v. 3.0~~ Baltimore, I think we should focus on a different riot I learned through the History Extra Podcast - the St. Scholastica Day Riot.

Apparently, back in 1355 at Oxford two students went to a bar, had a disagreement with the bartender, and then assaulted him. After the mayor requested the university punish the students, which he refused to do, some students gathered and started rioting in the town assailing locals. People from the region ended up coming to town to exact revenge and did precisely that killing 63 scholars.

Of course, this would not happen today, but there are times given how both the students and staff of modern day academia act I would love nothing more than a St. Scholastica Day Riot of our own.

Why the Left Co-opts Society's Awards

April 30, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

If I were to say:

"Oscars"
"Grammy's"
"The Nobel Peace Prize"
"Pulitzer" and
"Ivy League"

chances are most of you would have a twinge of a slimy, snakey, oily type of feeling in your stomach. The hair on your neck would likely be rising. And your eyes would squint, showing a hint of distrust. This is a good sign because it shows your instincts, which have been honed over the past 2 million years to detect BS, are working just fine. Because as time has gone on, these "prizes," "awards," and "clubs" that were once signs and proof of being the best and elite in our society, are now nothing more than obsoleted and meaningless status symbols that have been co-opted by the left to serve and advance their political agenda.

The Oscars no longer measure what was the best film or who was the best actor.
It's a platform for clueless (but culturally commanding) celebrities to vomit their leftist ideology.

The "Ivy League" is no longer where the best and brightest of our country go to study.
It's a club for rich, incompetent children to network with other rich, incompetent children.

And Mr. Obama's Nobel Peace Prize? Heh, it might as well be the prize in a Crackerjack box.

But why does the left want to infiltrate, take over, and then use these institutions to merely award themselves awards? What's in it for them? And why are the hairs on the back of our necks going up when we hear about these awards?

The reasons be these answers three:

One - False Proof of Authority/Superiority

While you, me, and anybody else with half a brain have our BS detectors go off when you mention these awards, the majority of people do not. They really still believe that if it won a Grammy, then it must be the best song. If it won an Oscar, it was the best movie. And that if you graduated from the Ivy League, you're really smart.

So if the left can control the electing or governing bodies of these institutions they essentially can "prove" to the sheeple of society that they are indeed right, correct, superior, authoritative, smarter and better than everybody else.

This is the best book to be reading.
This is the best musician to be listening to.
This is the smartest person in the class.
This is the best journalist in the country.

Of course, none of that is true. President Obama (both a graduate from the Ivy League and Nobel prize winner) is neither smart, nor a noteworthy peace maker. But that doesn't matter. The left has won over the key voting boards to give him these now-plastic trophies which dupes enough Americans into voting him (and other talentless leftists) into office.

Two - Lowering/Eliminating Standards

Leftists hate only one person more than somebody who has more money than they do. A superior person.

Superior at what?

Superior at anything.

Looks Physique
Atheletics
Smarts
Work
Entrepreneurship
Art
Beauty

The left cannot simply abide it. So to ensure NOBODY is better than them at anything, they try to change the actual definition of "good," "bad," "excellent" etc., resulting in behavior that has just become simple insanity:

Fat acceptance
Elimination of the honor roll
Elimination of keeping score
Trigger warnings
The beach body protests
27th place trophies

The protests against Page 3 models and let's not forget the outright circus that "victimhood" has become as professional victims claim oppression because of race, sex, ethnicity, privilege, 37 different genders, and lord knows what else.

Regardless, the aim of this insanity is very simple. If they can eliminate standards, then they can hide their true selves - lazy, worthless, inferior people who (typically) live parasitic lives.

However, merely "surviving" is not enough for these people. And though they do their best to hide in the elimination of standards, their psychology still needs to be the best at "something," ergo...

Three - Egos

More than masking their true nature, leftists need these awards, institutions, etc., to feed and protect their egos.

Making money isn't enough.
Being in power isn't enough.
Having complete victory over the United States isn't enough.

They need to be recognized and honored with trinkets and awards no matter how worthless the brand name of those awards have become.

You see this especially with Hilary Clinton. The woman has more money than she could ever need. She owes ALL of her success to her rich father and her philandering husband. But instead of divorcing the guy and moving on her merry, luxurious way, she still needs to be in the spotlight. She needs to run for president. She needs to become a senator. She needs to become the Secretary of State. And she needs all those people fawning over her when she delivers speeches for $500,000 a crack.

The reason why is because deep down inside she knows she hasn't done anything of value truly on her own. But she is so afraid of the toil, work ethic, and slavery required of that would be required of such real accomplishment, that her fear is stronger than the shame she has in taking the plastic trinkets, playing "make-believe powerful woman," imagining herself to be an accomplished individual.

And so not only do they award themselves awards to fool people into thinking they're the "best," they do it so they can fool themselves as well.

Unfortunately, this facade is not going to last. And the reason is very simple. The internet.

The internet is breaking the left's grip on the scams these awards have become. Nearly all forms of media and art are now directly marketable to the consumer, doing away with gate keepers such as editors, guilds, publishing houses, and record companies. People are also allowed to effectively vote, not just with their dollars, but likes, follows, retweets, traffic, etc. And while the dying dinosaurs fight desperately to insist that they are the only true "chosen ones" to determine what is "best" in society" with these archaic and outdated awards, the true democracy that comes with the internet is proving empirically otherwise and identifying society's real champions.

It's why fewer people are watching the Grammys.
It's why fewer people are watching the Oscars.
It's why nobody cares that you went to Cornell.
And it's why everyone knows Obama winning the Nobel Peace prize made the prize a joke.

The truth is, this is one of the few bright spots in society I see. Previous to the internet everything was filtered either through a MSM network, an editor, or a publisher. And people really didn't know if "X" was the best movie or "Y" was the most deserving candidate for the "Presidential Medal of Freedom." Now, not only do we have the ability to know just what a farce these awards have become, but nearly every award has been replaced with a digital judging system wherein all people get to determine who and what is the best in our countries. Enjoy that decline!

New Sponsor 02DA Battle Academy

April 30, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Looking for fire arms training, battle training, both remotely or in person. Then visit our new sponsor:
[image]

The Father Could Not Be Reached for Comment

April 30, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

We don't need no stiiiiiinnnnnnking fathers!

Miles Franklin Is Back

May 1, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

After some confusion, kinks have been worked out and Miles Franklin is back as an official Cappy Cap sponsor. Still waiting on a banner image, but if you were in the mood to buy precious metals RIGHT NOW, here is the official link.

Just remember if you buy through Miles Franklin tell them Aaron Clarey aka Captain Capitalism sent you so the ole Captain gets his commish!

Friday Day Linkage

May 1, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

A feminist political party is like a green party - it shows they don't care about the population and are just a special interest group.

When liberals try to run and business and do math at the same time.

The consequences of artificial wombs.

Most people celebrate Christmas or their anniversary or have lives wherein spending time with their loved ones and families is what they look forward to. This is what professional leftists look forward to in their lives.

Can Feminists Ever Divorce the Government?

May 4, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

An interesting question/request from a client of Asshole Consulting.

Is feminism a psychological backlash wherein women want equal rights, and "then some" for all the oppression in the past, or does something else drive them?

Something else, son. Something else.

The Federal Reserve: Good, Bad, or Just Plain Stupid?

May 5, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

A video request that proved to be a good historical and economic lesson of the Federal Reserve and central banking in general:

Why Charlize Theron Threatens "Fury Road"

May 5, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Fury Road is coming out and I'm on the hinges as to whether I even want to review it. Despite the trailer's explosions and pure awesomeness, the one thing that keeps me from fully committing is Charlize Theron's character who seems to take the entire leading role. Terribly sorry, I'm done with fake, never-will-happen, female propagandist advertising.

Charlize Theron is a 5'4", 115 pound woman. A reasonably aggressive, medium sized dog could outdo her and have her for dinner. But yet, I'm supposed to sit here and accept the possibility she is the leader of a group of women and is on par with Tom Hardy's character who is the presum-ed replacement for Mel Gibson.

No, not buying it.

I don't care how many explosions and tornadoes you put in your trailer.

I don't care how many "extreme" Aussie characters you have saying "WHAT A LOVELY DAY!!!!"

This entire movie reeks of a politically correct, leftist, feminist propaganda trap to sucker me in, pay my $10 for a ticket, only to walk away saying "WTF, no woman could do that!" as you then include my purchase and millions of other dupes' purchases to say "Fury Road" is the #1 movie in America.

Sorry, not falling for it.

I'm going to wait until the suckers go and see it, read the reviews, and THEN MAYBE contemplate parting with my hard earned money to see it.

In the meantime, I recommend all of you do the same.

Hollywood has desperately tried to court the female audience to the point it has alienated the male audience. I suggest you men grow a pair and wait for the reviews to come out before wasting 3 hours of your life and $20 in tickets to see another "sermon" from Hollywood about "strong, powerful, independent" women.

Monday Late Night Linkage

May 5, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Chris Bechtloff has a great podcast addressing many things, but I disagree about the disparaging remarks about gays.

All that empirical street smarts and you still major in stupid shit with the charity and kindness of strangers.

Genuine art where sound replaces words and you'll regret not clicking on this.

Is he sexy now you dumb ass ignorant young American bints?

Episode #93 of the Clarey Podcast "Homeless Baby Boomer" Edition!

May 5, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

How hot conservative females have life long employment as YouTubers
It's impossible to help people
Increasing population of homeless baby boomers
Will feminism ruin "Fury Road?"

AND MORE!

In THIS EPISODE of The Clarey Podcast!

Joss Whedon Proves Agreeing With Leftist Women Won't Get You Laid

May 6, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

There was a big kerfuffle going on as the Millennial generation of spoiled children (primarily girls) got all upset because Joss Whedon killed off a female character in the (largely) crappy movies series "The Avengers." Because Joss dared to kill off a female character he received a torrent of hatemail, accusations of sexism, misogyny, not to mention death threats.

To that I say,

boo

freaking

hoo

Joss Whedon, though a talented director, is unfortunately a very common and typical non-thinking denizen of Hollywood, espousing leftist, liberal political views, feminism of which is included.

And now the nerd-come-popular director is suffering the fate of his own voting.

This isn't a lengthy post, because it doesn't have to be.

Joss Whedon supported socialism, leftism and feminism. And now he is suffering directly for it. Despite his support, the petty women that constitute today's modern leftist, feminist Millennial generation are angry he KILLED OFF A FICTIONAL CHARACTER IN HIS OWN GOD DAMNED MOVIE. So much so they are threatening his life.

I doubt this political lesson will penetrate his head or force him to change his beliefs because ego and leftist religion will trump any person's frontal lobes. But his pain and suffering should prove a valuable lesson to those willing to pay attention:

Agreeing with Kissing up to Brown nosing and Parroting

what feminists and leftist women say will NOT increase your chances of getting laid.

If anything it will merely get you in trouble.

So do the right thing that men learned looooong ago.

Stand your ground.
Tell women "no"
And do NOT agree with them thinking it will curry favor with them.

Women like men.
Not supplicant, ass-kissing betas like Joss Whedon.

I'm Officially Predicting Recession…But…

May 6, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Settle in young junior, deputy, aspiring, official or otherwise economists! For we're going to have a quick lesson in economics that will help advance your understanding of this here US economy.

The "Inventory to Sales" ratio is a seemingly boring measure. It takes the inventory of all the companies in the US and divides it by all those companies' sales. You might ask, "why would they do this?" and the reason is very simple:

To predict recessions.

The reason this ratio has a decent track record of predicting recessions is because it measures future demand for labor.

How?

Well to produce inventory companies need to hire labor. And as these products are sold, the inventory goes down, requiring said inventory to be replenished, demanding further labor. But if demand is low or sales are down, that inventory has a tendency to build up. And when inventory builds up that is bad news for employees because with excess inventory why would you hire any additional labor? Worse, if you have too much inventory, you might as well lay people off because you don't even need to replenish your inventory.

And so to measure this relative demand to inventory they came up with the inventory to sales ratio. And it's not good:

The first thing you'll notice is the huge spike in the ratio during the Great Recession. The other thing you'll notice is the general downward trend in this ratio. This does not mean we are in a constant state of lower and lower risk of recession, but rather inventory management techniques and technologies have improved lowering this ratio over time.

But what is particularly concerning is the recent trend upward in the past 2 years, along with a spike in the past 3 months. Technically speaking, this is the second worst spike in the ratio's history and rarely does the economy NOT fall into recession when inventories build up this much.

Some of this has already come to fruition. GDP for the first quarter of 2015 was a paltry .2%. Labor force productivity is down this month. And job growth is sclerotic. But we haven't technically entered recession territory yet. Why?

Well, many people in this realm of the internet would claim we never recovered from the Great Recession. And such cynicism is validated when you look at labor force participation, lower wages, and the lack of booming economic growth that usually follows a bust. However, while we effectively may be in what "feels" like a recession and politicians brag about "green shoots" (but never full grown trees) in this economy, there is another reason we just "aren't crashing" like logic and reason would suggest.

The US dollar is the world's reserve currency.

In having the world's reserve currency this allows us to borrow and spend like Greeks, but without suffering any of the nasty economic consequences. This allows the government to keep taxes artificially low, while pumping the economy full of government spending. The result is a stale, uninspiring, and "blah" type economy where the real producers and innovators in the economy are not incentived to produce GDP, but steroid government spending artificially inflates economic growth figures. Throw in the fact said government money (be it social spending or Federal Reserve QE) ends up NOT in genuine investments, but asset bubbles (housing, stock market, education, etc.) and now you can see why we have an economy with effectively 0% real economic growth, but a stock market that is on its way to trebling from it's 2008 lows.

The problem this presents to economists, however, is one of prediction. By all measures and means we should be in recession. And if we were to take away the broken-window-fallacy spending of Obama's entire tenure, I almost guarantee you we never left the Great Recession. But now that the government has limitless spending due to our reserve currency status, it can artificially pump up GDP, masking the real economy.

Ergo, I am predicting recession next quarter. But don't expect to see two serious negative quarters of economic growth. Like Japan the US will spend the next 20 years never giving its people incentive to produce GDP, but never letting the economy go into full blown recession.

Silver Dollar Bikini and Race Relations in the US

May 7, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Was interviewed by Kerry Lutz yesterday where I announced my newest project: The Silver Dollar Bikini.

I am waiting on a model for pics and other media to start effectively advertising it, but the website is up and functional (though incomplete).

Should have a couple photos of it up soon.

Why Robots Eliminating Jobs Is a Good Thing

May 8, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

And "basic guaranteed income" is dumber than all hell:

Le Cordon Bleu Scam School Finally Ending

May 8, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

This is one of the scam colleges I taught at. Good to see the education bubble claiming such a worthless and evil victim.

Bad News for "Round House Kicking Chick-Cop Shows"

May 9, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Oh no, "State of Affiars" got the ax along with some other ~~female dramas~~ Round House Kicking Chick Cop Shows.

Could it possibly be overkill maybe?

No, no, never can have too many shows about a strong, independent 43 year old woman portrayed by a 31 year old actress, who can beat up 6'4" Russian mafia body guards with a cool government job, and a license to kill, but a soft side as she is torn between the rich oligarch silicon valley billionaire, and the strong, dangerous, ripped automechanic who does underground racing to raise the money for his cancer-ridden 6 year old daughter.

I miss Hogan's Heroes.

I'm Majoring in Bowling

May 9, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

For the Patron's Saint Name of Frick.

I'm not joking guys. I'm just not joking.

Fake Rape! It's Fun!

May 9, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Tee hee! I'm a rape victim! Tee hee! Pay me attention!

I love how they still paint her as a victim and is in need of help.

"In the Hands of 16 Year Olds Everywhere"

May 10, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Yes, yes, I do sound like Randall from "Clerks"

From an Amazon review of Bachelor Pad Economics:

This book is one of the most practical life guides that I've had the privilege to read. Aaron Clary does not mince words, and I love that he addresses the idea that having kids is a CHOICE, not a necessity. He gets really gritty and if you're overly sensitive he just may ruffle your feathers. Literally every aspect of life is covered, from worthless degrees to the decline of western civilization. He is a true man in a wilderness of wildly feminine life advice. His podcast is amazing, as well, so I'd highly advise that you check it out. He sounds like Randal from Clerks and he is just as hilarious, but also mixes in solid economics and live advice. 10 thumbs up. If this book could be placed in the hands of 16 year olds everywhere, civilization might have a chance to survive.

What Precisely Is Quantitative Easing?

May 10, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Well this!

Mad Max: Feminist Road

May 11, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

But let us be clear. This is the vehicle by which they are guaranteed to force a lecture on feminism down your throat. This is the Trojan Horse feminists and Hollywood leftists will use to (vainly) insist on the trope women are equal to men in all things, including physique, strength, and logic. And this is the subterfuge they will use to blur the lines between masculinity and femininity, further ruining women for men, and men for women.

from my latest piece at ROK.

Monday Night Linkage

May 12, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

You're putting the cart before the horse. You have replaced men with government. Men now have no agency in the real world, so they will seek it in a digital world.

An older man gives a younger girl some advice...and she actually listens!

Matt Forney interviews a girl about living in Chicago. She inevitably gets to the point.

Putin, the privatization of Soviet assets in the 1990's, the oligarchs, and how it's the west to blame.

Department of HHS defines fathers to include "men living with your mom." Heaven help us.

"Special needs" is the new vehicle by which a whole new victim class will be forming.

Episode #94 of The Clarey Podcast is Out!

May 12, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Beard hairs caught in chest hairs
Independent contractor is superior to being an employee
Silver Dollar Bikini and why it means conservatives have better sex lives
Kanye West and American college students deserve each other
St. Louis Park wants to ban plastic bags

and MORE in THIS EPISODE of The Clarey Podcast!

Hiring Writers

May 13, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Howdy All,

Alex over at Academic Composition is hiring writers. It's a great way to work on a beach in Thailand or traveling Europe while making decent coin. Here are the details:

1. Considerable experience writing college papers. While a college degree is not necessary, I'll need some evidence that they are capable of doing quality academic work. 2. Ability to write over 50 pages per week on any subject other than STEM. 3. Willingness to thoroughly with all of the professor's requirements. What's in it for the writer? 1. Minimal compensation: $10 per page, but my full-time writers generally earn between $600 and $700 per week. 2. Flexible work hours, no rigid schedule. All it matters is that you complete all of the work you take on. Yes, I would prefer to have a writer who outputs 50 pages per week, but quality writers are hard to find. Hence, I am willing to work with anyone who does good work on time. 3. Prospects for a higher pay-out. Full-time writers have been the pivotal factor behind the recent growth of Academic Composition. Hence, it is very likely that my per page rate compensatory rate will soon increase. 4. Managerial responsibilities. Full-time writers can procure additional compensation by managing part-timers. Aleksey Bashtavenko Academic Composition Owner & Principal Writer (540) 300-1253 academiccomposition@gmail.com www.academiccomposition.com www.linkedin.com/pub/aleksey-bashtavenko/25/7b8/323/

Some Damn Fine Economics Work

May 13, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Steve Sailer does some damn fine work indeed.

My Response to the "Fury" Over "Mad Max: Feminist Road"

May 13, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

If you didn't know, a piece I wrote at ROK went viral and now I am of course being accused being a misogynist, woman hater simply because I refused to see Mad Max: Fury Road in fear of receiving yet another unwanted feminist or social justice lecture from Hollywood. Instead of answering all the requests for interviews (which no doubt would be butchered), I'm simply putting this video up as my official response to the media

However, despite the hubbub and drama, I am rapidly being proven right. The movie is increasingly looking like a feminist film, and so to (if you'll forgive the term) "raise awareness" to this fact I started a hashtag on twitter that I hope catches on. #madmaxfeministroad Hopefully, (unless the movie proves otherwise) we can save a lot of people a lot of money and a lot of time, and again, I am more than happy to watch the movie if it proves NOT to have a lecture on feminism or SJWing, etc. in it.

(I might also add that this is how you handle the liberal media, in case any spineless conservative politicians needed a couple pointers.)

Why Entrepreneurship May Be the Only Feasible Retirement Plan

May 14, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

I had faced a problem.
For the first time in a while, the ole Captain had enough money saved up that he could start thinking about throwing some money in the ole IRA.

You might at first think this is not a problem. But it is, young aspiring economist. It is.
For the problem facing anybody under 65 who still has a bit of life expectancy left is:

Precisely what do you invest your money in?

All of you know my general concern that money coming from:

1. Retirement dollars of baby boomers and Gen X
2. Quantitative easing money being injected into the financial markets and
3. Low interest rates prompting a trillion dollars worth of buy backs is jacking up stock and other asset prices that there's effectively no good deals out there.

The PE ratio shows the stock market overvalued by almost half:

This results in a dividend yield of LESS THAN 2%

Housing only pays a whopping 4% today (and that's if you don't consider repairs and expenses)

And even an investment like education increasingly fails to generate the returns necessary to validate it.

Alas, today's investor is faced with the following effective REAL rates of return:

Stocks 0%
Savings -1%
Real Estate 2-3%
Education - HA HA HA HA HA!!!!!

Now naturally, many of you are saying,

"Wait! 0%??? The stock market has been booming!!! How do you get 0%?"

Well, inquiring young mind, I'll tell you.

You see, there is no such thing as capital gains. The real rate of return stocks (or any other investment for that matter) provides is the income or profit is generates.

Housing generates rents
Bond generate interest
And stocks generate dividends

However, ever since we thought it'd be a grand idea to designate stocks, bonds and other marketable securities as the default investments for our IRA's and 401k's back in 1978, stocks have gone up NOT based on their profitability, but by simply how many trillions of dollars-worth of mindless sheeple's money they throw into their 401k's accounts every paycheck.

Microsoft hasn't paid a dividend since it's existence?
Screw it, buy more. The price might go up!

The S&P pays less than a Kaazaa account?
Screw it, buy more! The price might go up!

Tinder or Twitter don't generate income at all!!!???
Screw it, buy more! The price might go up! IT'S AN IPO!!!

And so why we see the above ABYSMAL and PETTY REAL rates of return for the various asset classes.

So where precisely is somebody who demands an adequate rate of return to invest their money?

Sadly, it looks like entrepreneurship may be the only place to go.

It wasn't until I was having a conversation with my dad while running did I notice that even with all the tax benefits and government incentives to invest in IRA's and 401k's, the best use of my money is sadly to reinvest it in my various ventures.

If I drop $500 advertising my books on the Tom Leykis Show, I on average double my money.
If I drop $100 advertising Asshole Consulting on Viva la Manosphere, I get about a 60% rate of return.
And if I drop $200 running ads on Marginal Revolution for my books, I get about a 70% rate of return.

Naturally of course, I don't enjoy any of the tax benefits on these investments that come with the government ordained IRA's and 401k's.

But so what? Even adjusting for taxes, investing in your own private ventures generates MUCH higher rates of return than the government approved investments for your retirement account.

Tom Leykis post tax rate of return = 75%
Stocks (still) = 0%

Viva La Manosphere post tax rate of return = 45%
Bonds = 1.2%

Marginal Revolution post tax rate of return = 50%
Real estate = (post property taxes, repairs, insurance, etc.) -5%

Now naturally key to all of this is to get a product or a business in place where expending such money on advertising, equipment, etc., would generate such returns. And I will be the first to admit that that is not easy. For every successful business I have, I have at least 2-3 that have failed, and that says nothing of the labor put into researching, trying and deploying these ideas. But all those drawbacks aside, returns are so non-existent in today's financial markets, you may not have a choice. It is a mathematical impossibility to rely on today's conventional retirement planning tenet of "compounding rates of return" when those rates are effectively at or near 0%. Ergo, it practically behooves you to have your hand at entrepreneurship and see if you can't make up your retirement from scratch.

Of course, most people will point out and say, "Not everybody can be entrepreneurs! If we all became entrepreneurs there'd be no workers or economy!"

Thankfully, nowhere near "everybody" reads Captain Capitalism.

Now if you'll excuse me, I'm going to go and work on my next business idea.

But Is Mad Max Fury Road Feminist?

May 16, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Naturally you all know about the international hubbub I caused by daring to say,

"I don't want to watch a movie that has a feminist lecture in it."

However, no matter how much cursing and swearing and calling me an international professional misogynist occurs, it doesn't moot the question - Is Mad Max Fury Road what I feared it would be? A feminist film?

I have a couple buddies who are going to see the movie, but I know some of you have as well. So for those of us on the fence (or just curious as to whether I was right and called this one like I did the housing bubble) please report back in the comments section below.

40 Degree Monday Morning Linkage

May 18, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Because of my obtuse travel schedule, I am up Monday morning before 9AM. Unfortunately, it is a balmy 40 degrees here in Minnesota, and I'm going to have to fire up the fireplace in the middle of May. In the meantime here's some linkage:

DT and the Man make a point I hadn't thought of - of all the work, research, thought, philosophy and strategem, the world is so petty it focuses on the fact a guy doesn't want to see a feminist movie.

The Damnit Janet Podcast Archives (which I would have linked to earlier had Janet informed me she was putting together a podcast, but NOOOOOOOO, nobody keeps the ole Captain informed!)

DIE YOU ACADEMIA SCUM!!!! DIE!!!!!!!!

Remember Democrats, keep telling yourself "deficits don't matter."

When lefties start businesses.

Mr. Muir gives me a hat tip.

New podcast on the Podcast Roll.

Like father like daughter. Don't ever tell me that race whore represents black people.

Latest Podcast! Max Mad Feminist Road Recap Edition!

May 18, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

38 degrees in Minnesota
The Clarey Family Reunion
The Economics of Wood Cutting
Cappy is objectified by women…and he loves it
People need better sex lives
The Mad Max Feminist Road Drama
The media is no longer the 4th branch of government

AND MORE!

in THIS EPISODE of The Clarey Podcast!

Finance Industry as a % of GDP

May 19, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Time for a simple economics lesson we can all enjoy. So gather round and listen to ole Uncle Cappie.

The finance industry, technically produces nothing of value. Yes they provide banking services. Yes they keep your money safe. But in the grand scheme of things the finance industry merely supports the production of stuff. It in it of itself produces nothing of value.

Because of this you would like to see the finance industry account for as small as a percentage of GDP as possible as it would indicate the industry is being "efficient" by supporting the "real" economy consuming as little as possible in terms of resources. Matter of fact, you'd like to see it shrinking as this would indicate efficiency gains allowing the finance industry to support increasingly more real production while consume the same or less amount in terms of resources.

So what has happened to the US finance industry as a percentage of GDP? Well this.

While at the end of WWII the finance industry only accounted for 2.5% of GDP, today it's now over 7%, almost reaching 8% during the height of the housing bubble.

So why is this happening and why should you care? Because it explains a lot about the global economy and portends things for our future.

First, the US economy has gone from an industrial one to one where we are increasingly more service based. The decline in industry and manufacturing was caused by outsourcing our industries overseas as labor (and taxes) were typically cheaper. This helped increase services as a percent of our GDP, partially explaining the tripling of the finance industry's size relative to GDP.

Second, manufacturing is hard and math based. If you had the choice to work on an assembly line, doing manual labor for 8-10 hours a day, or sit in an air conditioned cubicle farm clicking a mouse, most people would prefer the air conditioned cubicle farm. And so as economies grow they prefer to pursue these "easier" industries as they are not only likely more profitable, but just plain "easier." Alas, this is why we have "Tina the 25 year old social worker" and "Chip the investment banker" while China has "Jing the suicidal iPhone assembler" and "Chang the coal miner dying from black lung." Modern Americans would just prefer not to get their hands dirty, and there's really no dirty hard work in banking.

This results in a sort of "tail waging the dog" as a flood of labor into banking and finance bloats the industry's size relative to the rest of the economy, while providing less and less value to the real economy. Alas, this is why most finance positions are sales and not providing services that help the rest of the economy grow.

Third, as the world economy becomes more integrated and globalized, different countries specialize in different things. And so instead of merely serving and selling products within your borders, you sell your goods and services around the globe. This results in some countries becoming the manufacturing plants of the world, while other countries (notably the UK, the US and Switzerland) become the "financial centers" of the world. In other words the US finance industry is no longer serving the US, but the entire globe, and thus its share of the domestic economy grows.

But then there is the fourth reason. And the fourth reason is reason enough to worry. And the reason you should worry is because here the finance industry provides absolutely NOTHING in terms of real production or value for the rest of the economy.

The retirement bubble.

You all know my opinion that the stock market is highly overvalued due to the trillions in retirement dollars that have flooded it. However, do not expect people to start becoming savvy investors who start asking questions about PE ratios and contemplate how dividends ultimately drive value. Too many commission addicted salesmen and mutual fund managers need Americans to keep buying stocks, bonds, and mutual funds. And the "401k Clergy" in the finance industry need you guys to keep mindlessly investing in your IRA's for "retirement." This means that instead of:

financing a new plant raising money for a new mining company or providing the capital to expand Stark Enterprises' robotics division the vast majority of the finance and banking industry is focused solely on selling you assets.

And merely selling stuff does not help contribute to GDP.

It is here I get a little chuckle because 9 out of 10 times when I run into your standard leftist they immediately point to the booming stock market as evidence that "the economy can't be doing that bad." But of course when I cite the actual measure that measures the economy (GDP) they ignore that, preferring instead to think asset prices "are the economy." But the divergence from economic growth and asset prices is not a good thing, because all profits (and thus all the value of all assets) ultimately has to come from economic growth. And right now we have fantastically high prices, with slow, sluggish, lethargic economic growth.

In the end, however, the two will have to converge. We can certainly postpone the inevitable with having a world reserve currency. We can play currency wars and borrow till our heart's content, creating entire industries out of borrowed money to keep our precious liberal-arts majoring princesses and princes employed. But in the end, there needs to be economic growth to warrant forever increasing asset prices.

In the meantime, keeping tabs on how big a non-producing industry like finance grows as a percent of our overall economy is a pretty good way to tell if the country and its people have any intention of growing up, putting work gloves on, and starting to produce things of genuine economic value,

or,

if we want to continue living in Lala Land where we can all be bankers, we can all be life insurance salesmen, we can all be teachers, and we can all retire on full pensions with forever increasing asset prices at 55.

Enjoy the decline.

What Precisely is a "World Reserve Currency?"

May 20, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

A video request that turned out to be a pretty good lesson for those new, young, aspiring economists here on Cappy Cap.

If Blogs Were Stocks, We'd All Be Millionaires

May 20, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

An outstanding point by one of my commenters:

What's the point of trying to save $300,000 in a retirement plan paying 2%? That's only $6,000/yr in income... so, does that mean if you start up a website that generates $500/month income that it also is worth $300,000?

If so, I'd say it's a helluva lot easier to start the website than to save $300,000 - especially since it will take 36 years to double your capital with interest compounding at only 2%.

This was in response to my original post that given the insane valuation multiples of the stock market, I can get a higher rate of return by investing in stupid ideas like this. Yes, it's not as liquid, yes, there are no perpetual, magical "capital gains," but the cash flow (which once again is the ONLY thing that drives the value of any investment) is a lot more than a paltry 2%. Ergo, if you really want to look forward and not be part of the 401k Clergy Sheeple Congregation, in addition to your 401k or IRA you may want to put forth a little effort into starting a little business on the side.

Help a Fellow Cappy Cappite Find His Lost Son

May 21, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Bad news every one. A good friend of mine's son has gone missing.

The kid's name is Danny/Daniel Domres and he is a soldier based in Colorado Springs that has gone AWOL. The details are here, but the kid could be anywhere.

Anyway, keep an eye out for him or if you know about his whereabouts please contact the ole Captain.

"The Truth About George Washington" by Stefan Molyneux

May 21, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

I thoroughly enjoyed this lengthy podcast/investigation about the rise and competency of George Washington. Even if you think George Washington was god, it is still interesting to note the effects of connections and cronyism in Colonial American politics. I would be curious if anybody from the UK or US would be able to corroborate it on account I trust Stefan Molyneux's intent and veracity.

Cappy's Adventures with John Wayne

May 25, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Visiting the Duke's birthplace:

Society vs. The Individual Part 1

May 25, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

I originally intended this to be a short video, but the more I thought about it, it was so detailed and important, I decided to make it a post. Then once I delved into the rabbit hole, I noticed it really is a two part post. Problem and then Solution sort of thing. Anyway, if you would be so kind as to forward this to anybody you know that would appreciate it or benefit from it, I would be very grateful as I think in these two posts are the PRACTICAL key for improving many people's lives and the condition of the country.

The relationship between society and the individual, by nature, has to be symbiotic. Society is made up of individuals and it would logically follow that strong individuals make up a strong society. However, over time and under different environments the relationship between society and the individual is not always mutually beneficial. And if that's the case it's almost always society benefiting at the expense of the individual as the many can conspire against the individual and not the other way around. It's simply "there's 8 of us and only 1 of you, guess who we're having for diner!"

We see this "society taking advantage of the individual" throughout history as well as today. Mob-rule democracies using government to force individuals to pay for the masses' mistakes. Religion telling its adherents to donate to the church or burn in hell. Even the unconscious psychology of tribalism effectively enslaving the individual for the benefit of the commune. There are many instances where the individual is right, and society is wrong.

But aside from the time and monetary costs the individual pays for the benefit of society, there is another egregious cost that is often ignored, but the individual must pay - his sanity.

While paying taxes, being forced to donate to a church, or getting beat up because you dared to "act white" and get good grades are clear and identifiable prices the individual pays, in order to keep the individual from going into full revolt or Galt, society needs to brainwash the individual so they don't dare question the parasitic nature of society's relationship with them. To that end a whole host of lies, narratives, political correctness and propaganda are shoved down individuals' throats to keep them from asking questions and keep them from independent thought. However, this "brainwashing" is nothing as simple as merely disseminating lies and repeating it enough that people "start to believe it." It's a masterful, elaborate, and purposefully designed strategy, starting when the individual is all of 4 years old and never ending until that individual is dead and society has used him up as much as possible.

But as "masterful, elaborate and purposefully designed" it is, this brainwashing is above all else thorough and incredibly effective. If I were to estimate it right now, nearly 95% of westerners are brainwashed and believe in what are nothing more than outright lies. And not only do they believe in these lies, the brainwashing is so effective they have an emotional investment in these lies so that if any of you were to dare question the veracity of those lies, most people would react violently, at minimum, angrily. However, no matter how emotionally vested these people are in these lies, it doesn't change the fact they live their lives and base INCREDIBLY important life decisions on these lies which results in the aforementioned true price they pay - sanity.

The examples are limitless.

"The Nice Guy"

How many millions of men suffered decades of insanity believing the lies SOCIETY told them about what women wanted in men? Here you have what is no doubt the STRONGEST and MOST IMPORTANT biological drive young men have in their lives and did society tell them the truth about what women wanted? Did society tell them, "Hey, women want:

"A physically strong man."
"A leader."
"A man who will not be dissuaded or deterred"
"A provider who can support a wife, mortgage, and children?"

No, society LIED to (now three) generations of young men telling them women wanted

"A nice guy."
"A sweet guy."
"A sensitive 90's guy."
"A guy who listens."

The ultimate end result was a 50% divorce rate, sexually frustrated women, weak, effeminate men, destroyed families, and (now three) generations of men who have ruined financial and romantic lives. But all of that pales in comparison to the INSANITY these men suffered because they "did what they were told" and had absolutely no success to show for it. The sheer madness that ensued when you attempted to be successful at what was arguably the most important thing in life, only to constantly fail, but only to constantly be told to redouble your efforts on the same plan is a psychological pain many men can testify to.

But still, no matter how much destruction these lies caused or how many men in their 20's it drove mad, at least society (in the form of government, divorce courts, the psychology profession, and feminist intelligentsia) benefited.

"You Can Have It All"

Before we paint men as the sole victims, women have suffered too. And not in the "glass ceiling" or "wage gap myth" sort of way. The lies society told women was that "they could have it all" and "you ARE the exact same as men." And so (now three full) generations of young women went out and instead of pursuing families (like they had for 99.995% of human existence) they believed society and all tried to be:

Mothers
CEO's
Doctorates
PTA officers
Yoga attendees and
Race car drivers

And ALL AT THE SAME TIME NO LESS!

And forget the mathematical impossibility of doing all of this effectively with only 24 hours in a day. The real coup de etat was society actually got women to believe that work is fun or something to be desired!

The result, again, is divorce, destroyed families, ill-reared children, regret, and single-parent homes. However, the true price paid is the INSANITY women have suffered "doing what society told them to do," but being less happy than generations past.

Still, it doesn't matter. Society (in the form of government, feminist intelligentsia, and corporate employers) benefited from increased tax rolls, misery-loving company, and a labor market flooded with new and cheap labor.

Education

If there's a perfect example of the individual suffering insanity because they believed society's lies, today's labor market for college graduates is it. For you could not have a more textbook example of thoroughly effective and successful brainwashing than today's Millennial college graduates.

Fed spoons' full of lies since kindergarten, today's latest generation actually believed in what their Gen X peers proved wrong - "do what you want and the money will follow." "Any degree is a good degree." "It doesn't matter what you get a degree in, it's what you do with it." Add to that the ass-kissing lie that "they were the future" and these deluded sheeple actually thought majoring in Sociology would land them a job.

But sadly, after 4 years undergrad, 2 years in a masters program, another 2 for a doctorate and voting for Barack Obama twice, your average Millennial has $78,000 in student loans, a lousy labor market, no skills and lives with their parents. Can you imagine not just the insanity, but the terror and fear these poor kids have now that it looks like their lives are ruined forever and will come NOWHERE NEAR to what they were promised?

Oh well. No matter. Democrats got their votes, academia got $1 trillion every year this generation was in college, and employers now have MILLIONS of new and ESPECIALLY DESPERATE people begging for jobs. Again, society won at the expense of the individual.

Careers

And finally careers.

If you were like me, you too believed the lies society told you about what it took to succeed at a career.

"Hard work, an education, loyalty, creativity, and innovation!"

So there you went, believing the lies, majoring in a hard and seemingly practical subject. Studying day and night to get that 3.8 GPA. Going that extra mile working an unpaid internship to "improve" your resume. Taking extra classes to get extra certifications with random acronyms. ("I got my DPT and my EGS certifications! But I'm still working on my XKT cert!") And dancing like a trained dog to perfect your resume, answer HR's frivolous questions, and "score that job." You may have lowered yourself to reading books on the topic and endured "mock interviews."

But sadly, in the end, to be successful in Corporate America you need to lie, cheat, scam, manipulate, even threaten. You need to be borderline criminally aggressive, preferably a highly functional sociopath...that is of course assuming you're not the boss' son, or performing fellatio on him. Then you just be you.

Regardless, once again, think of the billions in cumulative lives that were wasted by aspiring "loyal corporate men and women" who believed the shtick, sacrificed their families, friends, and lives for a career that was never going to be. How much insanity did they endure "doing what they were told," deteriorating in 2 hour daily commutes, only to deteriorate more for 10 hours a day in a cubicle, for decades only to never get promoted or get that dream job?

Doesn't matter. Society wins again. Employers dupe stooges into becoming effective slaves on the cheap. Governments take in more in taxes. Banks make a fine profit off of the interest on that house you can barely afford. And the day care provider industry is only more than thankful you decided to outsource your children.

We could go on, but I think you get the point.

The moronic yuppie couple trying to afford the McMansion and sports SUV's who believed in the rat race only to benefit society in slave labor, more taxes, credit card companies, and mortgage interest.

The impoverished black male who thinks his lot in life is because of "evil white men," when it's his new slave masters he's benefiting, namely Al Sharpton, the police, and the Democrat party.

Or the "heroic single mom" who actually believes she's heroic (when in reality she's ruining her and her childrens' lives), but at least she'll fork over the money to Oprah, watch "The View" and vote for more government money.

Nearly everybody in the western world believes in, and lives their lives by, lies that society told them to simply take advantage of them. The lies are very sweet, and often times assuages you of any guilt or responsibility for your mistakes in life (which often times explains the violent/angry response when the lies are pointed out as it is forcing a mirror into people's faces). But let us be clear.

THEY

ARE

LIES

They're not true.

And if you live your life by these lies, you will suffer because your decisions are not being made in reality.

Part 2 will address the herculean effort it takes to no longer believe these lies, as well as the punishment society will unleash upon you if you dare to no longer believe them

Rainy Day Linkage

May 26, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Chris and Aurini do the work that the MSM won't.

One of my old haunts is being sold, hopefully remaining the same.

Which is why I got to the Black Hills often.

70% of you can't think you're above average and 80% of you can't think you're special. But don't let reality get in the way of the "Self Esteem Movement."

Traditional universities replaced with rooms full of servers.

The top 9 gods liberals worship.

Dr. Helen makes a funny!

Harland Williams makes the note that Mad Max is not about Mad Max. And no, I still haven't seen the movie.

Attacking the wrong degenerates (though I do wish Mr. Aurini would not use the word "faggot")

Inferior vs. Superior People

May 26, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Just stating the obvious which too many people lack the spine to state:

I Am Friends With Muslims, But…

May 27, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

I vette them very thoroughly.

I Got Your $15/Hr "Right Here!"

May 27, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Oh noesies!!! What are liberal arts grads going to do for jobs now????

The Clarey Podcast "You're All Not Having Enough Sex" Episode

May 27, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Taking out the motorcycle
The story of 19 year old Cappy buying his girlfriend lingerie
Clarey's "Forced March Wedding in the Desert"
Taking two weeks off from your wife/girlfriend
"We didn't have the internet when we were young!"
Oregon mileage tax and why you don't want to live there Online accredited classes offered at ASU
and MORE!

In THIS EPISODE of The Clarey Podcast

Social Workers Love Other Women's Children More Than Their Own

May 28, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Glorious Thursday Day Linkage

May 28, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

This is one of the many reasons I don't believe in global warming.

I knew I liked Chris Pratt for a reason.

Robert McCain chimes in on Feminist Road, pointing out there's a "Moby" in our midst.

You don't listen to fat people giving advice on dating, just as you don't listen to European politicians giving advice on economic growth.

Exxon grows a pair.

How Can We Have "Negative Interest Rates?"

May 29, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

I received this question from one of my students and the answer I thought would help advance all you aspiring, junior, deputy, official, or otherwise economists out there:

Well, the short version is that countries lie to their people about how the real world economy works.

People believe they can have their cake and eat it too, which ultimately means borrowing more than they can ever hope to pay back for both individuals and governments.

This leads to debts that become impossible to pay back and asset bubbles like the stock market or housing markets which inevitably crash.

Once the economy crashes, governments scramble to get it back on foot, NOT so much to grow the economy again, but to prevent people from paying the price of being so stupid as to borrow more than they could afford or for voting in politicians who spend more than their respective countries can afford. To do this governments print off more money to pay for both the private and public debts, which is done through their central bank. THis money does not pay back the debts directly, but rather buys those debts off of the people who foolishly made them:

TARP
Mortgage Backed Securities
Asset Backed Securities
and I predict in the new future student loans

This money does NOT end up in the economy (which would cause inflation), but ends up simply recapitlizating (or "shoring up") the poor finances of the banks and lending houses that made such stupid loans. This, coupled with a harsh and recent memory of the financial crisis or latest bubble bursting, makes people reluctant to borrow this new money and so the financial system is awash with money that nobody wants to borrow.

In the end banks do not make money if they don't lend out their money. But people want their money deposited and held safely in a bank account. This means that banks would be providing a service (depository services aka "safe keeping") but have nowhere to lend it out to. Thus, instead of paying interest on those deposits, they start charging.

This occurs especially acutely, however, to banks or countries where they are deemed "more reliable" than others. ie - Switzerland.

Everybody wants to deposit their money in a Swiss bank because it is safe. Additionally, people want to own Swiss Francs as opposed to Euros (which would be destroyed by Greece), US Dollars (which would be tanked by a housing bubble or student loan bubble, or just massive government deficit spending) or Chinese Yuan (which would be ruined by corruption and their own debt problems).

Alas, Swiss banks and Switzerland cannot simply be everybody's banker, and they must charge (ie - negative interest rates) on their depository accounts.

And that IS about as simple as I can make it and that leaves a lot on the ground.

Your Mission, Should You Choose to Accept It

May 30, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

is to follow the Ole Captain on twitter this weekend. (frankly, just trying to see if I can get 1,000 new followers in a weekend)

"Marginally Employed"

June 1, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

The U6 unemployment rate is the total of:

Unemployment
Marginally employed
Part time employed
And people who are way more capable than of the job they're working at.

In short, the "under-employment rate."

I occasionally like to keep my eye on it to see how it's going, and shucks howdy, look at that! It's FINALLY below it's previous high back in 1995!

Great work guys!

Now just remember. Don't go asking about those nasty 40's and 50's when you could get a full time job right out of high school and that job would support you and a family. Those were nasty, evil, racist, sexist times.

Again, Leftists Tend to Be Ugly

June 1, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

I've said it before, but now Roosh has said it again. Leftists tend to be ugly.

Society vs. The Individual - Part 2

June 1, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

I suggest reading part 1 here if you haven't already.

Be you 20, 30, 40 or 50, the point in time will come in your life where you will stop and realize,

"Hey, I've lived 40, 50, 60% of my life and I'm still not anywhere near where I thought I'd be."

This epiphany won't happen to every one, but for those of you who are intellectually honest and have the intelligence to realize AND APPRECIATE the fact you're finite, you WILL make this observation. This is a good thing because it's simply true.

You are finite.
You are going to die.
You've likely already expended 65% of your life.
But your life hasn't gone the way it was "supposed to."
So what do you do to ensure you don't piss away the remaining, precious 35%?

Unfortunately, answering this very vital and single most important question in your life won't be easy.
For in answering this question you are going to have to pit the most important thing in your life (your remaining time on this planet) against the single largest and most-well-financed force on the planet.

Society

You see, most people are indeed good people with good intentions. They WANT to do go. They WANT to succeed and therefore MOST people will do what "society tells them to do." Unfortunately, as demonstrated in Part 1, we realize that society is NOT here to help the individual but to take advantage of the individual to advance society. But, again, society and the institutions therein are SO effective at brainwashing people into thinking they're "doing the right thing," not only do they trick most people to sacrifice their finite lives for the "commune," they get people to become emotionally and psychological vested in these lies.

So be you,

20, 30,

50,
70,

you not only have to overcome DECADES of your own brainwashing, but face the inevitable backlash from society for daring to be an individual and doing (what is in their eyes) "wrong."

Alas, this task is herculean on two different levels.

First, the individual must make the most ARROGANT of assumptions and dare to let himself think that maybe, just maybe, ALL OF SOCIETY is wrong, and that s/he is right. The statistics alone of one person being right while the remaining 300,000,000 citizens in the country are wrong prove the audacity one must have to think such a thought, but have we not see this multiple times before?

If it was 1998 and you were one of those "fools" that said there was a "tech bubble" you were an outcast, a pariah, an idiot who "just didn't understand the internet." Sure enough the individual was proven right, and society wrong.

A short 8 years later and the same idiot sheeple masses fell for the same damn trick again. Except instead of tech stocks, it was housing. Again, if it was 2006 and you dared to suggest there was a housing bubble, you were an idiot, a moron, and a party-pooper raining on every late 20 something's McMansion house warming party that was purchased on an ARM. But sure enough, society was wrong, and the individual was right.

And think of the pre-internet 20 something man in the dating world who was constantly told:

"Maybe you just attract the wrong type of woman?"
"Maybe you need to try a new fishing hole?"
"You need to become more sensitive to women's needs"

yet had the balls to stop and say,

"Wait a minute. What if there's nothing wrong with me? What if there's something systematically wrong with the way American girls are being raised?! What if I'm perfectly fine and these girls are all batshit insane?"

Imagine the arrogance and gall it took WITHOUT THE CORROBORATING EVIDENCE WE HAVE TODAY ON THE INTERNET to believe in such a statement. But yet once again, the individual is right and society is wrong.

We could go on, but you get the point. In order to live your life for yourself and not society, you need to have the balls and the courage to dare to think that you on your little lonesome may be right, while the rest of society is wrong. It goes against, "conventional wisdom." It's the epitome of hubris and arrogance. But it is the only logical conclusion you're left with when you've "done what society told you" and have nothing to show for it.

The second herculean task is unfortunately impossible to complete. For it's more of a new "status" you get to endure rather than a simple finite chore that can be completed in a couple of minutes. And that is society is going to hate you. And hate you on multiple levels.

The immediate hate you're going to receive is that you will be viewed as a borderline criminal. You no longer believe in "conventional wisdom" and therefore aren't breaking any codified laws, but are breaking many social norms and morays. Friends will leave you. Family will lecture you. And you'll likely never have a stable career. You aren't OBEYING, you aren't CONFORMING. You're "not a team player" and have "anger management issues." It isn't that you're personally assailing or assaulting these people, it's that you are directly triggering their "tribal survival instincts" and at a subconscious level are indirectly threatening their livelihood. Alas, you will just "rub people the wrong way" because you insist on being a genuine individual.

The second wave of hate you'll receive is that you'll be viewed as arrogant, cocky, holier-than-thou. Again, you won't be lifting a finger to hurt or harm any one, you'll just be living a life that is based in reality. And after you do that for a while you'll start to do better than your peers. You'll date more women/men. You'll make more money working less hours. You'll enjoy more hobbies and have better mental health. You'll have a better family life with children who actually love you. The high-powered-corporate couple, who are on the verge of divorce, have everything leveraged to the hilt, and can barely afford the nanny for their children they really don't love will secretly envy you as you hop on your motorcycle for a two week American west roadtrip replete with reading books, fishing, and hiking.

And the final (and most visceral) form of hate will result from you essentially making others question their own lives. In living your life based in reality and not what society wants, you are empirical evidence, a mirror that forces people to wonder if they haven't pissed away their own lives. Some people respond positively to this, going down the path of independent-mindedness, salvaging what remains of their lives. But most will merely see red and hate you.

The reason is sad.

Deep down inside these people KNOW they are too lazy to do what is necessary to live a truly enjoyable and accomplished life. And instead of putting forth the mental and physical effort, they choose instead to believe the lies told to them by society. However, without any real, genuine accomplishment in life, all they have is the lies they believe.

"I have my MASTERS DEGREE! I'm SMART!!!"
"I'm a VEGAN!!! I'm MORAL!"
"I'm a BORN AGAIN CHRISTIAN! I'm SAVED!!!!"
"I'm a (fill in victim class here) _____!!! I'm ENTITLED!!!"
"I'm a feminist!!! I'm EMPOWERED!!!!"
"I'm a MGTOW!!! I don't NEED WOMEN!!!"

So when you come along and prove that their false gods and their false religions are just that, you are an unintentional megaphone screaming into their ears that they are wasting their lives, have no value to society, but above all else, are cowards who'd rather live lies than live life.

Naturally, you can predict their response.

Name calling (racist, bigot, homophobe, sexist, misogynist, etc.), feigned indigence, accusations of oppression, death threats, and let's not forget good old fashioned "the world getting its tits in the sling."

But the fact they resort to these methods of "debate" only proves you're right and they're wrong.

Regardless, if you're willing to do these two things (dare to think you are right and society is wrong, AND endure the guaranteed backlash and hatred that will ensue), going down this path in the long run is worth it. And the reasons are three.

1. You won't waste your life.

I don't know how many leftists and other lie-livers are going to be on their death beds wondering and regretting the one shot in life and consciousness this universe gave them.

Could that MGTOW have hit weights and not died a virgin?
Could that feminist tried her hand at STEM and not lived on EBT and government grants?
Could that inner city kid left the ghetto and become the next Ben Carson?
Could you have been a stay at home dad and spend time with your children instead of at the office?

Probably, but that's not our concern.

When we die there will be no regrets. We'll be comfortable with dying because we lived. We didn't sit there and mope, whine and complain, and blame all of our problems on other people. We went out there, got our asses kicked, but kicked even more ass in the process. And in the end we didn't waste second of our lives. They weren't ordinary lives. They weren't lives lived by "what we were told to do." They were unique lives, filled with the successes and mistakes that were 100% owned and defined by us. And that's an experience no liberal arts-majoring hipster, professional victim, SJW, feminist type will ever experience.

2. Sanity

I don't care how much flak I get from how many millions of people. In the end the life I lead right now is INFINITELY better than what I was living before simply because it makes sense. It's logical. It all adds up.

I don't sit awake at night wonder how to excel in my career or impress my boss. I don't get frustrated wondering "what do women want and how can I give it to them?" And I don't spend one calorie of energy worrying about encroaching socialism or the future of western civilization.

I sat down, removed emotion, feelings, and desires from all of life's questions, and simply asked, "what is reality? What is real." And upon answering those questions, and accepting the empirical evidence as fact, knowing and living in the real world provides more stability and sanity than one where you "major in your heart and the money will follow" or "maybe you just attract the wrong type of woman."

Admittedly, a lot of people may not like you. But the serenity and peace that comes with living in the real world is worth all the hate in the world.

3. Progress

In living and basing your decisions in the real world, success is inevitable, even if accidental. You're not throwing $75,000 on a "Creative Writing" degree you "hope" pays off. You're accepting the reality that you should drop $10,000 on a welding program certification. You're not going after the hottest babe at the night club, but meeting that solid B girl at the Beartooth rally who can clean her own carburetor. And you're not believing that president Obama is going to provide for you forever, but you're going to take matters into your own hands, make sure you don't get somebody pregnant, and ensure you don't end up in the poorhouse.

You may not be living the life society promised you (if you "did what you were told"), but that life was never going to happen anyway. And that's the reason the individual's life will always be better than the one society told you you could have.

So the choice is really yours. You can do what society tells you:

Get a worthless degree
Followed up by an MBA or masters
Further burdened with a mortgage and car loans
With children you can barely afford
Plus a spouse who is likely to divorce you
With two "power careers"
Replete with 2 hour commutes Cubicle soul-destroying jobs
and Children in day care who hate you

or

Do what you want:

A simple trade or skill
Frugal minimalist budget
A QUALITY spouse
With a focus on family, friends, and loved ones
Time with the children
Fishing trips out west
No debt
and
A reliable used car

But the truth is, this isn't an editorial. There is a right and wrong answer. The issue is whether you can give up caring what society "thinks" about you.

It's "Worthless Degree Awareness Month!"

June 1, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

I am happy to say that today marks the start of WORTHLESS DEGREE AWARENESS MONTH!

If you really want to help the "children" June is the month where we ramp up the "raising of awareness" of the financially crippling dangers of worthless degrees! So since all those young adults are graduating from high school and about to go to college, June is the PERFECT month to have "the chat" with your kids about this very important topic.

And if you're a coward and never told your kid "no" but don't know how to broach the topic, buy them this book to do the job of parenting that you failed to do!

"I Can't Sleep" Linkage

June 3, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Let vets use the GI bill to start businesses, not attend college.

People should not be allowed maximum freedom. I disagree, and will respond later.

Baaaaah Baaaaah! Sheeeeeeple. The SHEEEEEPLE!

Yep, "White privilege" is your main problem there.

AKA those who produce and those who merely serve what's being produced.

Vince Vaughan won't work any more. But at least him and Corolla have their sanity.

Aurini does some DAMN FINE editing work. The trailer for The Sarkeensian Effect is out.

Bernard Chapin tells his story which is not only entertaining and interesting, but very insightful as to what happens when a man who deals with drama, gets engaged, then divorced, gets older, and would rather read books of Russian history than date another 24 year old ditz. It filled in a lot of gaps about Uncie Bern and I hope you listen to his newly launched podcast.

The "Gaia Democratic School" for Kids

June 3, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

This private ~~cult~~ "school" took 11-13 year olds to a sex shop for "sex ed."

Here is their web site.

Here is their facebook page (note the pictures of the teachers)

I don't have to editorialize. The pictures tell all you need to know. But it will be on my upcoming podcast which you can find here.

School is No Longer Conducive to Human Biology

June 3, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

A funny exercise I like to run your average endebted American through is the nearly impossible time-line the American labor market forces on its employees in terms of education vs. retirement.

You are supposed to:

Go to k-12 from the ages of 5-18, then...

Attend college from the ages of 18-22, but...

Today's modern economy demands some form of progressive credentialism, so a bachelors degree no longer cuts it. So you need at LEAST two more years of schooling or certification...22-24, however...

Even with all that education, the labor market is flooded with poorly-financial-planning baby boomers who can't retire and millions of other recent college graduates desperate for work, so you work crappy, low paying jobs "earning your stripes" and "proving yourself" doing work you could have done at the age of 13. You never make any real money to significantly pay down your student loans, so at least 5 more years wandering in this job-desert before your now-2 decades of education might be put to work...24-29, STILL...

You're an American! You gotta keep up with the Jonses! And not just in housing, but cars, McMansions and other crap you ~~don't need~~ can't afford. So you sign away your life on a 30 year mortgage...29-59.

Did you promise your kid's you'd pay for their equally worthless Masters in Puppetry Degree, taking out a home equity line to pay for it?...59-64

And so NOW, at the age of 64 you decide it's time to "get serious" about retirement planning, except, OOPS! That's right, the patently INSANE demands of the labor market in terms of education and certification (combined with vanity-induced debts) make it nearly impossible for you to ever successfully and mathematically retire.

But whereas this fun little exercise is one of finance and investing, there's another ENTIRELY different aspect of life that is now quickly being made impossible by progressive credentialism and arrogantly-demanding employers - human biology.

You see, for the human race to continue on, we need to breed. And in order to breed successfully, mothers and fathers need to be earning the resources necessary to raise and support children DURING THEIR MOST FERTILE YEARS. Biologically speaking, this means anytime from puberty (12/13) to the late 30's (for women). However, while biology says we "can" start breeding at 13, society through historical trial and error has developed the wisdom to know that you shouldn't. And so now we wait until we're at least 18.

This "optimal age" for breeding was at its pinnacle during those (hated and evil) 40's and 50's. Young men and women would graduate from high school, land a job here or there, and within a few short years of dating and courting, start marrying and having children while still thoroughly ensconced in their 20's. Women were optimally healthy to be birthing children. Men strong enough to toil at the factory. And both young enough to have the energy needed to tend to the children on very little sleep.

But keep in mind this was possible because a young men and women could graduate from high school and find gainful employment. And not just gainful employment, but enough employment that you could raise a family on just one person's income (albeit a tight budget).

Still, the point is that the educational system and the labor market adhered to this biological reality. You would not only be educated adequately to perform a job, but there were jobs available (and high paid enough) that you could go and support a family while in your most fertile years.

But today a similar clash between education and biology is forming as is the clash between education and retirement. Employers and the labor market are demanding more and more education, to the point it's starting to "push out" the ability to have families.

Simply look at the similar demands mentioned above in terms of family planning:

K-12 is spent learning how to hate capitalism and white males instead of learning skills.

Since you didn't learn anything of employable value in K-12, you need to learn it all over again in college, (plus women are heavily lobbied to eschew families and husbands).

But today you don't graduate when you're 22. It's more like 23 or 24 after your "studying abroad," taking a year off to "find yourself," or heck, just taking a year off so you can afford the next year of tuition.

So you do your obligatory 2 additional years of getting a masters or certifications (because no employer will touch you otherwise) and you're finally deemed "employable" by our employer overlords at the not-so-young age of 26.

Of course, keep in mind just because you're employable doesn't mean you'll actually find a job. Remember that labor market sucks for young people. And you've likely accrued at least $40,000 in student loans. So even if you're lucky and land that $38,000/year job with (giggity!) benefits, your average 26 year old man is having NO thoughts of marriage, let alone kids. Which is alright, because nearly every woman in his age bracket is so obsessed about their careers they're deaf to the "tick tick tick" that biology is futilely screaming at them.

So everybody slaves away, slowing chipping away at their insurmountable student loans, and with pure, 110% corporate stooge dedication (and "continuing education" of course), and a 2 hour daily commute, our 20 something heroes finally pay off their student loans and earn enough now to consider, maybe, potentially starting a family.

Just one problem - they're all 34.

Now this is fine according to feminist math. Which, if I understand correctly means, women will earn their doctorate at 28, completing a total of 23 years of schooling, all so they could work a whopping 6 years, before finding their future husband in the 4 months, 2 weeks and 5 day window that remains before their bone-dry eggs ensure an 83% chance their child has Down Syndrome.

But if you don't believe in "feminist math" (and most sane people don't) the reality is that it's more or less too late. Demands for an absurd and unnecessary amount of education, combined with:

Usurious tuition rates
Crippling student loans
Anti-family propaganda, and A lousy labor market is quickly making it impossible to form and start families in the US.

But here is the rub.

What you have are two massive and unmovable forces heading towards each other. Human biology on one hand and human socio-psychology and politics on the other. Human biology is not going to change, and our economic and social structures we've created are not going to change either. People will want to have families, but they're not going to because society, the labor market, academia, and American employers have made it financially and time-wise impossible to. So there will be a lot of late marriages and a lot of sex, but a lot of birth control, and thus a lot of childless families. The two massive forces will essentially neutralize each other out. Our population will decline, but corporate America as well as Academia will have no new bodies to sell their wares to in the future.

Or won't they?

For you see, all of the above hinges on one important, but highly flawed premise. That every person is responsible and will wait until they are financially sound enough to have kids and WON'T if they can't.

This, as we all well know, is simply not true.

For you see there is another group of people who do not wait until they pay off their student loans to start a family. A group of people who don't bother breaking out an Excel spreadsheet to see if children are in the budget. A group of people who just spread their legs or don't wear condoms "cause it feels good." A group of people who don't bother worrying about whether they can support and afford their own children.

Government subsidized families.

By definition if you can't afford your children and take a government check, you are a government subsidized family. You need other people's money to support your family because you (frankly) made a stupid mistake, didn't care about the best interests of...well...anyone, and have no moral qualms about being a parasite. And it is this group of people that will continue to breed.

Alas, I'm no fortune teller (well, actually, yes I am), but if I had to put money on it I would say these are the makings of a culture that is hell-bent on becoming an "Idiocracy."

Which makes you wonder if it's even worth bringing children into this world at all.

Enjoy the decline!
****
If you wish to help the Captain make sure he can keep writing and never has to go back to working a banking job ever again, please consider purchasing something through his Amazon Affiliate account. Besides which, he can't go back to the working world even if he wanted to. Nobody would hire him as that's the price for writing the truth.

"I'm Majoring in Selfies"

June 3, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

For the Patron Saints Name of Frick.

Only idiots (and there are many of them) would defend modern day American colleges.

Bonus Debrief

June 4, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Some late night listening pleasure for you guys at DT and the Man have a bonus debrief!

Episode #97 of The Clarey Podcast is Out!

June 4, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

"Insto-Sleep!"
Don't drink or smoke when climbing mountains
The John Chism Theme Song
David Niven drops in for a spell
Why you don't want to be an investment banker
"Transabled" shows the left DOES indeed have a mental problem
Roosh and how beauty is ideology
Fan mail

AND MORE, in THIS EPISODE of The Clarey Podcast!

Link to Tony DeMarco's music:
https://gumroad.com/l/cappy

Communists Hate America, They Hate You, and They Hate the Family

June 4, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

A classic that I think new readers (and old) need to review.

New Addition to Blog Roll - Andy Hoffman

June 4, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Andy does work for Miles Franklin. Yes
Miles Franklin sponsors the show and wants you to buy their stuff. Yes.
But all that aside Andy does write a great blog and has more insight and a finger on the pulse of the global economy, especially when it comes to currencies and precious metals.

You may also want to sift through Kerry Lutz's archive where he interviews Andy and make yourself a little bit smarter than you were before. Incredible interviewee and speaks very competently. You can learn more from just one interview with Andy than an entire college class in modern day academia.

Adventure Break

June 7, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Howdy all, going to be on a "Very Cappy Western Adventure" for the next couple of days. Not a ton of posts will be forth coming. In the meantime feel free to click on the links to the left for the podcast archive and YouTube channel. Cappy will retirn...unless he's eaten by a mountain lion...then he won't be returning.

Why Men Must Become Cary Grant

June 7, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

My latest piece at ROK about living life to ensure all your critics are liars.

Job Posting for Academic Composition

June 8, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

We appreciate all of the inquiries we've received regarding academic writing. However, the Spring Semester has just ended and the Summer semester will be starting in a couple of weeks. Therefore, most of our clients will not have have many challenging assignments until later this month. However, July is usually a very busy month and we'll need even more writers for the Fall. We apologize for our inability to provide opportunities for some of the writers and we can assure you that this problem will soon be corrected. Anyone who is interested in writing is more than welcome to expedite their integration into Academic Composition by posting ads. You may either collect compensation for your efforts or receive access to all of the assignments that will be provided to us through your ads. We will provide you with the advertisement material and the full instructions. If you opt to collect compensation, you will earn $5 for each lead you'll generate and a buck for each day your ad stays live on the forum. Contact us at academiccomposition@gmail.com for further details Aleksey Bashtavenko Academic Composition Owner & Principal Writer (540) 300-1253 academiccomposition@gmail.com www.academiccomposition.com www.linkedin.com/pub/aleksey-bashtavenko/25/7b8/323/

Jobs In the Liberal Arts for Women

June 9, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Cappy's Adventures Out West!

June 9, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Pics from Mt. Charleston and Snow Canyon Utah.

Remember, work hard, pay taxes, borrow gobs of debt, and buy mcmansions.

Zion National Park - The Narrows

June 10, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Just sending all the lieutenants and economists some post cards from my adventures!

Why MGTOW Is Unsalvageable

June 11, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

It is now a nearly daily event where I will get a comment on my YouTube channel from some naive late teen or early 20 something girl who parrots the simpleton and naive argument she was programmed to parrot:

"Feminism is just the equal treatment of men and women!"

Like all of you, I find it funny, but disheartening because in throwing her lot in with "feminists" or "feminism" she is associating herself with a movement that entails:

Menstrual knitting
Menstrual painter
Spitting on priests and Catholic men
False rape accusations

and a cornucopia of other outright insanity, hate, and genuine bigotry against men.

However, such a young girl can hardly be blamed. Not only is she young and inexperienced, she's naive. Additionally, feminism is sold to her as "simply" the equal treatment of men and women (while its darker hate-filled side is very often hidden). So when presented with this proposition, that men and women should be treated equally, then who (male or female) would reject feminism?

The problem, however, is while young women may be predisposed to look at the self-proclaimed moral virtues of feminism, because of the internet young men see the uglier and truer side of feminism. They see the slut walks. They see the fact acceptance. They see their dad's getting divorced. They see their buddy's worrying about getting sperm-jacked or being falsely accused of rape. And so when a young woman proudly (though cluelessly) claims she's a "feminist" you might as well proudly be telling a Jew your a Nazi.

And that same thing, I'm afraid, is happening to the term "MGTOW."

MGTOW in all of its original intent was as noble and just as feminism. It was simply men choosing to leave the rat race of careerism, marriage, dating, etc. behind, and go live their one life on this planet as they saw fit. They abandoned tradition, choosing to refuse the offer society currently left them on the table as a cost benefit analysis more often than not proved the old social contract just wasn't worth it anymore.

However, like all good ideas, especially ones that rebuke convention, it attracted not practitioners or genuinely independent men, but genuine social rejects and outcasts. And soon within a couple of years a concept of individualism, freedom, and independent thought was turned into a religious cult that served more as a haven for cultists to commiserate with one another and hate on women.

This presented genuine MGTOW's a conundrum I'm sure many legitimate and original feminists faced;

Do you keep claiming to be a MGTOW/feminist when radicals, bigots, and losers take over movement and thus redefine the term?

Originally, I thought the percentage of cultists in the MGTOW community was a minority. Just a bunch of loud nerds or unemployed losers who had all day to play a keyboard jockey, pontificating about the "religion" of MGTOW as if they were doctoral seminarians and academics. But when I did a video to differentiate us real MGTOW's from the 17 year old who couldn't find a date to prom, I realized soon they were both too loud and too high a percentage of the community. MGTOW, no matter what its validity and benefits as an idea, was effectively hijacked by the cultists and their behavior would make it a four letter word.

Alas, I have come to the same conclusion the originator of the term MGTOW (Rob Fedders) came to. The term MGTOW is not salvageable. MGTOW today is about as manly as feminism is feminine. It no longer represents strong, independent men who under their own intellectual volition decide to go out and strike out on their own way. It is a bunch of self-proclaim internet professors who can only study and speculate about what real life MGTOW's are doing in the real world.

Are their real world MGTOW's out there, real men, genuinely going their own way? Yes, of course. But they're too busy actually being MGTOW to write about it, let alone care if they're labelled "MGTOW."

Ergo, it's up to every man out there which they'd rather be.

A practitioner with no label:

Or a theoretician "Level 53F" MGTOW:

The choice is up to you.

Seniority Uber Ability

June 12, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Ah, the benefits of a unionized education system.

Again, Leftism IS a Mental Disease

June 12, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Note she's also an academian.

I'm Majoring in Beyonce

June 15, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Worthless Degree Awareness month continues with this latest bout of stupidity.

Only to be outdone by this latest bout of stupidity.

Remember to inoculate your children or yourself against stupidity. Buy Worthless.

Ahhhh, the Baby Boomers

June 15, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

How does half the people 55 and older not have anything saved for retirement?

Seriously, it is stuff like this and the hubris by which this generation insisted on telling us "we know better" that not only makes me dismiss them, but angry they misled now nearly two entire generations down the wrong path because they frankly had not freaking clue what they were talking about.

On the up side, Asshole Consulting would have never been the success it is today without the Baby Boomers completely botching up the country, so maybe I should be grateful.

But She Was in Wuuuuuuv!

June 15, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Ah the benefits of:

Affirmative action
Ignoring the differences between men and women and Putting politics and affirmative action ahead of the safety of the public

But it's OK. A couple more people dead is a small price to pay so we can imagine women are the EXACT same as men.

YouTube Reinstates the "Inferior vs. Superior Humans" Video

June 17, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

I don't know what you guys did, but the Inferior vs. Superior Humans video is back up and for public consumption. Originally YouTube had taken it down citing it as "hate speech" when in reality it was quite the opposite. I was going to contest the decision when I got back from vacation, but it seems enough of you gave them an earful they re-published it. However, I don't know if I am still on their "Double Secret Probation" list where I can't upload videos in excess of 15 minutes. If that is the case, you can find all 15+ minute videos on my Daily Motion channel (which at this time is only serving as a back up for Asshole Consulting clients as well as a contingency plan should YouTube ban my entire channel).

Regardless, thanks for sticking up for me. I appreciate it as well as does the thousands of young men and women who come to my channel for the hurtful truth, instead of sweet, pretty lies.

The Clarey Podcast #98

June 17, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

The Grand Canyon was Fogged Over
Software Nerds Can Leave Well Enough Alone
YouTube Thought Police
Female Prison Guards falling in Wuv
I'm Done With "Stupid Young Girl Does Stupid Thing in College" News

and MORE

in THIS EPISODE of The Clarey Podcast

Clarey and Hobbes

June 17, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Visiting our Agent in the Field, Atham:

Maximum Freedom, Maximum Responsibility

June 18, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

It is with understandable frustration that Roosh recently wrote this post on his site claiming that people do not deserve the freedom they've been given. And when you compare what western civilization has become against the 4,000 years of intelligence, independent thought, sacrifice, war, morality, and altruism our forefathers paid/thought/endured/suffered to make such freedoms possible, you can understand his point.

Pajama boys of modern day America demanding an increasing state compared to the WWII soldiers who fought against a forever growing state.

Girls obsessed with taking selfies when Galileo was ostracized for daring to insist the Earth orbited the sun.

And the years of precious and finite life the likes of Edison, Ford, Saulk, Bourlaug, the Wright Brothers, etc. sacrificed all so a generation of navel-gazers could concoct reasons of how they were oppressed and cheer on the "bravery" of Bruce Jenner.

It is no doubt sickening how the sacrifices and prices paid by generations past have resulted in the most spoiled and worthless generations of the Baby Boomers, Gen X and Millennials of today. However, while Roosh's logic is sound, and his visceral disgust with humanity 100% valid, his argument against freedom for people is flawed. Not by any fault of his own, but by the faults inherent in democracy and the society we live in today.

Understand that previous to democracy and even modern day civilizations, there were automatic punishments built into the world that people would pay should they make stupid decisions.

Did you poke a saber tooth tiger with a stick?
Did you spook a herd of mammoth into stampeding the village?
Did you eat berries that you saw no other animal eat?

If you did any one of these stupid things, you would die and your stupid genes along with it.

However, even within civilization stupid decisions were punished.

Did you breed without being married, thereby forcing the tribe or village to support your mistake?
Did you parasite off of society insisting on being a talentless bard instead of an industrious farmer?

Did you commit crimes, stealing from people precious food and items that were in short supply?

Well at best you'd be ostracized, and at worst, you'd be killed. Again, taking your inferior genes and decision making ability out of the gene pool.

The point is that yes, you had the personal freedom to do many things. But neither society nor nature was going to protect you from the costs and consequences of making bad decisions. In other words, yes you had maximum, 100% freedom, but you also had maximum, 100% responsibility.

Enter democracy.

Through trial and error, 4,000 years of war, and a little philosophy along the way, government has evolved to its most advanced state - "democracy." And while it certainly has some benefits, the primary drawback of democracy is that it gives people the right to vote to enslave and live off of others.

This not only gives rise to politicians who simply run on a platform of wealth redistribution, but also one that bails out the stupid at the expense of the smart. And so now, today, 70% of the state, local, and federal budgets are NOT spent on public goods that benefit all, but are nothing more than TARP-like bailout programs, bailing people out of their spectacularly stupid mistakes.

Did you breed more children than you could afford?
That's alright, Roissy will pay for it with more taxes.

Did you major in a stupid subject, borrowing $120,000 in student loans which you can never hope to pay back?
That's alright, Roosh will pay for it with more taxes.

Did you fail to save for retirement because you were too busy partying in the 1960's, smoking pot, telling your WWII generation parents they were "squares?"
Don't worry, Rollo's got you cover with extra taxes to bail you out.

In other words, we aren't so much giving people money for bribery for votes (though that is true) as much as we are inoculating and shielding them from the full cost and consequences of their mistakes. And that is why people don't deserve the freedom they've been given. Not because they don't inherently deserve maximum freedom, but because they've never suffered or endured the negative reinforcement lessons that life teaches you.

The argument then, for limiting people's freedoms is compelling. For a society incapable of learning through negative reinforcement and fatherly love will suffer and ultimately destroy itself in three major ways.

One, nobody will ever grow up to become competent, self-supporting adults. They will forever remain post-pubescent children. This is no more apparent than the laughing stock that is known as Millennial College Students. Yes, some are self-supporting. Yes, some will become contributing adults in society. But never has there been a higher percentage of not only fully-dependent pariahs, but equally psychotic ones as well. They are not obsessed about accruing enough in savings to retire successfully, as much as they are beating themselves up over their "white privilege." They are not concerned about attracting the opposite sex as much as they are blaming them for all the ails in the world. And they are not concerned about the $18 trillion in debt they voted to enslave themselves into (most of them don't even know what a trillion is), as much as they are "going green" and their "carbon footprint." In other words these are completely dysfunctional and worthless people to society who will come nowhere near to producing the economic production necessary to support themselves and will become an ever bigger financial burden on society than the baby boomers.

Two, constantly bailing out people from their mistakes prevents the economy and society from purging the cancerous humans from our institutions and engines of economic growth. Nearly every banker scum bag who had a hand in creating the financial disaster is still employed in their same capacity. Nearly every college student today will be bailed out of their by a soothe-saying politician either directly or by creating make-work programs that only further tax society. And it is my humble estimation that the next generation of children to be raised by single moms will be the final straw that breaks the economy's back as government checks may put food on the table, but they do not raise strong, independent, law-abiding, economic-powerhousing men.

Banksters will still be crippling out financial system.
Liberal arts majors will still be parasiting off of the non-profit, academia, public sector world.
And the quality of children will NOT be improving, but rather worsening, providing no hope for a future recovery.

And finally, three, demographics.

Sorry, the fact of the matter is that stupid people breed. And my further apologies by pointing out the additional truth that stupid people tend to breed stupid people. Idiocracy is not a work of fiction, but a documentary.

How did this come to be?

Well, democracy, once again, allows us to bail out all the stupid people who made the most idiotic mistake they can make - breeding kids they can't afford. Of course this taxes the smarter, more responsible people who would have other wise had children (should society be more merocratic), which further delays their breeding to the point they may never have kids. And alas, since it's too impolite to force the losers of society to bear the full cost of the illegitimate children they spawned, they will not only fail to learn their lesson, but breed more, ensuring society has a critical mass of stupid people who simply are not capable of supporting society.

However, while the consequences of letting people have unlimited freedom may mean the ultimate demise of the world's greatest society, it is not in letting people have freedom that is the problem. It is in shielding them from the full costs of their mistakes. It is preventing them from taking 100% responsibility for their actions where the problem lies. And if we were to take action and enact policies that no longer bailed people out (be they bankers, liberal arts students, single moms, or public union pensioners), those natural laws of negative-reinforcement, punishment, and tough fatherly love would do the work for us, relieving us of the duty of "determining" which freedoms people should or should not have.

Of course, this is all very academic and fanciful, and equally so in both camps.

Roosh's theoretical advocation of rescinding the voting rights of unmarried parents would be equally lead-balloony as my advocation of the immediate elimination of all income transfers. Not only is the cat out of the bag (in the fact it is no longer property owners who can vote), but society is so stupid we would both likely be accused of being "bigots" and "haters," and ran out of town. However, since this is all in "Shoulda Land" there is one more compelling reason humanity, no matter how long it is in the future, should never have their freedoms limited as opposed to their responsibilities fully enforced:

Who, precisely will determine what people are allowed what freedoms?

Sadly, the answer is the state, as it is only the state that can enforce such things. And sadly the state is not only completely incapable of determining with reasonable morality and justice who should have what freedoms, but it is also highly corruptible with ideologues and politicians only too happy to oppress and destroy those citizens who disagree with them, further ensuring their own power. In short, going the route of limiting people's freedoms is not only impossible, but it will only end in complete tyranny and totalitarianism.

Ergo, the only answer in this mentally stimulating but completely theoretical debate is to enforce responsibility.

Did that aging dudebro-banker douche make $45 million in loans to his buddy who had no intention of paying him back?

Let the bank collapse and with it his career.

Did that single mom have another kid with yet another man that "all of the sudden became a real jerk" .0002 milliseconds after she gave birth with no signs whatsoever?
Too bad, there's the shelter and here's an adoption agency.

And did Madison McMillennial get her 3rd doctorate in Women Afro Cross-Sectionality Studies at that prestigious small liberal arts college in Massachusetts with $200,000 in debt?
Too bad, hope you know how to make Big Macs, serve coffee, and like Ramen noodles because that' is the rest of your life.

Alas, you don't need to "punish" people by taking away their freedoms. You simply need to reintroduce the responsibility politicians have taken away from it over the past 50 years. And trust me, bearing the full costs and consequences of the mistakes people have made in their lives, simply making them be fully-responsible adults will be an unbearable and insufferable punishment that nearly none of them would ever be able to endure.

Worthless Degree Awareness Month Continues!

June 18, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

You warn people about the risk of STD's.
You caution your children about the dangers of smoking.
But do you warn loved ones about the perils of worthless degrees?

Spread the good word! June is Worthless Degree Awareness Month! Help "raise awareness," but unlike most movements that "raise awareness" this one will actually help!

California vs. Saudi Arabia

June 19, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Remember when America "just did it?".

Neither do I.

Dylann "Reddit" Roof

June 19, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Turns out Dylann Roof was an active member and contributor to Reddit. Not that that means anything or somehow means Reddit is a "bad" thing. But it does provide an additional little bit of evidence to a theory I've been unintentionally developing over time - that various discussion forums and social media outlets are serving not just as safe havens, but accelerants to cultists and psychopaths to form.

Imagine back in the day you were just your ordinary psychopath. You were a loser, a loner, and aside from your job that barely kept you alive, you had no social circles. But with the internet, and especially forums like reddit, you can actually find "like minded people" who only serve to confirm and validate your bias/psychosis.

Sadly, as Davis Aurini pointed out, this means discussion boards or forums that once hosted new and advancing philosophical thought are taken over and democratized by its more radical elements (who are typically unemployed and have time during the day to obsess over these topics), driving people away and out of the forums. The founders leave as cultists glom onto, and then overtake the "uniting principles" of the board, co-opting them for their own personal agendas and validation, rendering the discussion board nothing more than a bunch of extremists and cultists commiserating in each others misery.

Again, this isn't to say scouring Reddit forums is going to find the next serial killer, but if you were to ask me and I was in charge of the FBI I would be looking for two things;

1. Discussion boards where
2. The majority of posts are made during the day as it indicates the participants have no job and no life, leaving them looking for agency and purpose, likely in the harm and destruction of other people.

Ayn Rand for the $10 Bill

June 19, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

You can sign the petition here

If I Could Go Back In Time and Talk to My Younger Self

June 20, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

A review about Bachelor Pad Economics:

I graduated high school in 1973. I suspect Aaron Clarey was not around then :-) If I could pay $500,000 and mail a copy of this book back in time to myself, I would do so in a heartbeat. Growing up, I made just about every mistake decribed in the book except fathering a kid. I wasted years slaving away for uncaring scum employers who rewarded extra effort with insults. I spent man years wondering WTF was wrong with me, when my view of how the world really worked was wrong. I gave up on the corporate grind, started a business, and work a basic job for healthcare and extra money. My life is way better now. Buy this book or make all the life mistakes yourself. I beg you not to waste your one precious life in one of the many life traps of the modern world.

Making Debt Payments Tax Deductible for IRA's & 401k's

June 22, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

The left and the right will rarely agree on anything in that their ideologies are simply and fundamentally diametrically opposed to one another. The result is two parties that are trying to install their own version of "utopia" and we get a dysfunctional hybrid mix of both (eg. Obamacare). Naturally, the people are not served best they could be, but every great once in a while there is an issue all people from all political stripes can agree upon as it would benefit everybody in the nation.

And I have happened upon one of these rare ideas.

Make any principal payments of debt (specifically on mortgages and student loans) qualify as legitimate contributions to people's IRA and 401k accounts.

The arguments for this are so simple and so compelling that I will be putting together a petition in that I truly believe all congressional members and President Obama would sign this into law. However, my optimism no doubt will be rebuked by some naysayer in Washington or some mortgage banking industry lobbyist. However, hear me out and tell me precisely how this could possibly fail, and if you agree, I would appreciate spreading the word as this will genuinely help the country.

First, it will provide an incentive to improve nearly everybody's personal finances. As it stands right now Americans are woefully prepared for retirement and have horrible personal finances. Paying down debts earlier and faster will only help to shore up their finances making it easier to squirrel away money for retirement at a sooner point of time in the future than if they just kept "borrow borrow borrow."

Second, if you look at nearly all the various asset classes that do qualify as a tax deductible investments for IRA's or 401k's, they provide very LOW AND POOR rates of return. I am ignoring capital gains on this, as once again there are no such things as capital gains. However, if you look at what type of interest rates bonds and savings accounts are paying today (0% when you adjust for inflation) and what kind of rate of return dividends are paying on stocks (2%, again, 0% when you adjust for inflation) you'll see these asset classes are so overvalued that there is no real rate of return (except for dem der "magical" capital gains). However, there is a MUCH better rate of return when it comes to paying off your mortgage or student loans. Both roughly average around 4%, twice the average of what nearly every other security is paying out there.

Third, it's risk free. When you invest in a stock you could be investing in the next Enron.

When you invest in a bond, you could be investing in the next ~~Greek oops, I mean US, oops I mean~~, Argentinian swindle. However, since it is YOU who are the one that is at risk of not paying back the loan, there is no risk in you paying off your own debt early. That rate of return is guaranteed not by the "full backing and faith of the US government," but rather the irrefutable laws of mathematics.

Finally, it's moral. Businesses get to deduct R&D and construction expenses as a cost of doing business. But today we ask young kids to load up on tens of thousands of dollars in debt just so they have the right to maybe apply to maybe be considered to maybe be contemplated to maybe be called into an interview to maybe...maybe, that is, get offered a job. However, while young college students are merely doing what businesses do (building up a product - their skills - to sell to an employer/client) they do not get to deduct these crippling expenses from their taxes, while businesses do. If there was any morality in the country (not to mention a desire to win the youth vote while not alienating conservative voters at the same time), allowing principal payments on tuition to be tax deductible would be on every upcoming presidential candidate's platform.

In short, all I am pointing out is that another asset class (paying down one's debt) should be added to:

stocks
bonds mutual funds options
ETF's, and REIT's

as a qualified tax-deductible contribution for people's IRA's and 401k's.

Admittedly, no asset would be purchased and thus "stored" in these retirement accounts for later, however, I contend providing the same tax treatment to such principal reduction payments will go a lot further in improving people's personal finances and helping them adequately prepare for retirement.

Please sign the petition here and please also forward this to others as we need 100,000 signatures and I truly believe this is such a no-brainer it will actually get implemented.

About That Military Pension

June 22, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

A warning from our Naval Agent in the Field about aiming for that military pension:

Background: I spent almost 8 years in the US Navy as an Avionics Electronics Technician (Navy rate AT). Basically I worked on all the electrical systems on aircraft. I spent my first 4 years after basic training working on helicopters. I went on 4 deployments in those 4 years. My last 3.5 years I worked at a test and evaluation base. There I worked on all aircraft from helicopters to fighters. After seeing the retirement problems my supervisors were facing in those last 3.5 years, I decided to get out of the military. I was Honorably discharged in 2014, and have completed 1 year of school towards a STEM degree in Electrical Engineering.

Retirement: In my last 3.5 years, I watched as 7 sailors in my shop reached 16-17 years of service in the military (my shop consisted of about 100 sailors through that time, for reference). From this time frame they can sign the contract to enlist up to the 20 year mark. This as you know, guarantees a military pension. However, 5 of these 7 sailors were denied reenlistment through a program the Department of the Navy called "Perform to Serve" (PTS). This program would take sailors reenlisting in rates(jobs) that were over manned and evaluate them. The military spending cuts of 2013 were in full force and many were denied reenlistment. They were given the option to either change their job or be discharged and receive an involuntary severance package (usually a monetary sum around $15,000). Changing your job in the Navy requires a paygrade drop approximately 95% of the time. This can sometimes force a sailor out of service simply because they have limits on how many years of service you can have per rank and still stay in (called High Year Tenure). Also, since your retirement is based off your 3 highest years' pay, this loss of rank and pay often means the retirement you were expecting to receive will be lowered as well. A similar program was also instituted about 15 years ago, under a different name. The program back then compared your service record against everyone else in the same rate(job) and kicked out the lowest performing percent based on the government's needs. The new system however, Perform to Serve, compared all people requesting to reenlist in over manned jobs against all sailors who joined in the same year. For example, if I joined in 2006, I was compared to everyone else who joined in 2006. This could be a problem because if the Navy needed SEALS or Nuclear engineers badly in 2006, they would offer incentives to people to join in those fields. So if in 2006 they had 30% who were in these fields, then you would be automatically fall below these non-expendable assets. These 5 sailors who were denied to reenlist in their field had good records. 3 had just come back from Individual Augmentee service (temporary assignment working with the Army or Marines). This always looks good on a Navy record and often leads to an early promotion for sailors. The Perform to Serve program was started in 2013 and is no longer in effect, but expect that it will be implemented again when they need to cut military spending.

Summary: I understand it is a financially intelligent decision to cut off those close to retirement before you have to pay them for the rest of their lives. It spells huge savings for the government. But it also sucks seeing guys who have spent 16 years in the service get involuntarily separated. So if your clients are looking to join the military, I would advise them to go into the military as a non-expendable asset (special forces) or in a field that easily translates to the civilian workforce. (vehicle mechanic, welding, information technology, nuclear engineering, etc.) Thank you for your time. If you have any questions about Perform to Serve feel free to email me.

He also provides a link here detailing what he is talking about above.

Arguing Past Their Narrative

June 23, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

If you are like me, you don't like to waste time. Not only because you don't like to "waste your time" in a classical sense, but you also likely had the epiphany you are going to die and any precious moment in your life that is wasted either not entertaining you or serving you in some longer term capacity is in an economic sense tolerating partial suicide.

To that end you've likely made some (very important) changes in life that have not only saved you time, but led to a happier and more content life.

- You no longer tolerate a commute insisting on working from home or living next to work.
- You stopped watching TV realizing no amount of mindless sitcoms will replace one quality conversation with your loving, but ailing grandfather.
- Or you have given up on MSM, instead reading alternative media, or perhaps giving up on media altogether knowing you won't change this batshit insane world.

Whatever it is, you've realized your life is too short to waste on things that either don't matter or things you can't do anything about, and have instead opted to spend that time on things that actually matter in life and will make you happy.

And debating with leftists (and politics in general) should be one such thing you also strike from the list.

It took me a while to realize this, but after nearly 15 years of providing undeniable economic and empirical proof socialism just plain doesn't work and that free markets provides a morally and empirically superior society and economy, ONLY to have every single leftist I was trying to convince dismiss it with some weak or cowardly form of flawed logic ("well, perception is reality" was my favorite), it dawned on me I was not reasoning or arguing with intellectually honest or rational humans.

Quite the contrary.

It was like 1981 where I was arguing with my teachers I had in parochial school.

They were ideologues.
The were zealots.
They were cultists and fanatics.

No amount of fact, truth, reason, logic, or empiricism was going to convince them. And that the key to "winning" the debate was not found in economics, history, or facts, but through psychology, emotion, mockery, and insult. And even then, most would still adhere to their false religion, rendering all my efforts wasted, and thus a "partial suicide" of my infinitely more important life.

So I made a change. I no longer debated economics or threw up charts. I no longer tried to reason with people on the left. And I rarely bothered ever pulling data. I hopped on my motorcycle, went riding, climbed mountains, hiked national parks, went dancing, drank, fucked pretty girls, panned for gold, ate sushi, lived life, and if I EVER got into it with leftists I immediately went emotional and personal. Mocking and ridiculing them, pointing out their degrees were worthless, agitating feminists that they were ugly, telling single moms their market value's been halved, and other arguments/tactics I would have largely regarded as "sophomoric" or "beneath me" all of 5 years ago, but now realized these are their "modern day equivalent weapons" by which they fight, and are the only tactics that they're aware of and affect them.

However, (though it feels good) merely agitating them and angering them about their reality of life does nothing to "win" the war many of you are still trying to wage against them. And while I don't expect many conservatives or libertarians to just give up the fight, get vasectomies, tell their boss to shove it, go Lester Burnham on life, and join me on my next motorcycle trek out west, I do know for those of you insist on staying in the fight need to change your tactics because it is not working, will never work, and not only will you lose the war, but your children (if you foolishly decided to bring some into this world) are going to pay the price. Thus, the importance of "arguing through their narrative."

Understand one simple thing about "socialism" "leftism" "liberalism" "communism" or whatever you want to call it.

It is nothing more than the lazy of society demanding the hard working and industrious be their slaves.

It is NOTHING more complicated than the parasites of society demanding the producers support and pay for them.

I don't care how many pages "Das Kapital" is.
I don't care how many millions of hours the thousands of liberal arts professors lecture.
And I don't care how many trillions of words they and the MSM write in journals or "research studies."

In the end, when you boil it down, ALL leftism is is a group of lazy people who don't want to work for a living and want to live off of other people.

That's it.

That's all.

That one sentence summarizes the libraries worth of socialist literature throughout all of history

Socialism is parasitism.

Naturally this stance (parasitism) is untenable and indefensible. NOBODY is willing to be the host in this relationship, and no-would-be-parasite's ego is willing to admit they are a parasite.

Thus, the majority, if not, all of the effort put forth by the left is NOT merely taking other people's money, but coming up with reasons, rationalization, and excuses to steal other people's money. And you see it in nearly all of their arguments/political platforms:

I'm discriminated against by white males because I'm _____.
We don't spend enough on education
We don't spend enough on health care
We don't spend enough on the poor/Social Justice
College isn't all about the money
War on women (glass ceiling, rape culture, wage gap)
Corporations/the rich control everything
We need to tax producing countries to stop global warming

I could go on, but all of the arguments above, ALL OF THEM, no matter how "noble sounding" serve only one purpose and one purpose only - to transfer money from the producers of society to the parasites.

"We need more money for education for the children" when translated DIRECTLY into English should read:

"A bunch of us lazy people who decided at 17 we didn't want to work hard so we chose "education" as our majors want the rest of you hard working people to pay for our cake and 9 months a year cushy jobs. And if you don't then we're going to claim you hate children because we don't want you to even think about just what parasites we are."

When you hear "College isn't all about the money" you should translate that DIRECTLY into English to read:

"We are a bunch of worthless parasites who don't want to work real jobs and found government academia to be a place where we are overpaid professors, who are simply paid to indoctrinate your children to simply vote the parasite class more money while charging $400 per credit for tuition and $400 for our book that is constantly underrevision so used books can never be used again."

And when you hear "I need money because I'm discriminated against because I'm (fill in your choice de jour)

Hispanic
black female transgendered Asian
gay, (or the newest victim fad)
"have ADDHDHDDDHHHD"

that should translate directly into English to read:

"I'm a coward and am going to hide behind a trait I was born with to claim I'm a victim because claiming to be a victim will get me additional funds and special treatment throughout my life at the expense of others. I will also be doubly cowardly and disingenuous claiming anybody who dares to suggest my personal decisions resulted in my status in life is a rac/sex/misogyn/ist."

In short, nearly all of the left's argument is a spectacularly HUGE strawman that few conservatives and libertarians realize is one. And if they fail to realize it's a strawman, their efforts are misdirected and no progress is made on winning the debate.

Once a leftist claims they need your money because "you can't spend enough on our children" conservatives and libertarians foolishly think that is their argument! And off they go, rushing to pull data that shows more money on education doesn't equal better schools.

Or when a feminist claims "rape" is an epidemic on college campuses, again, conservatives and libertarians think THAT is their argument. And once again, foolishly rush off to pull the factual data that college women are raped at rates less than the general population.

And heaven help you if you're accused of racism or sexism or any other "ism." Again, soooo predictably, the conservative or libertarian will scramble to prove they are NOT a racist or sexist, completely abandoning the original argument, and now debating a completely new and irrelevant one.

The reality is they just want your money, and will stop any no dirty trick or lie to get it.

"You can't spend enough on our children" is "give us teachers more of your money."

"Rape is an epidemic" is "we women's studies professors can't find jobs and need government grant money. Give us some because we don't want to get real jobs and we don't care how many young men's lives we ruin with false rape claims."

And "Give me more money because you discriminate against me" is "I'm the true bigot and have no problem falsely blaming people of your sex and skin color for oppressing me because not only will it get me more of your money, but it will assuage me of any personal responsibility that my shitty life is the result of my own horrendously stupid decisions."

To quote Charles Grodin from "Midnight Run"

"It's all about the fucking money!"

Alas, this presents conservatives and libertarians who want to "win this war" a choice. You can keep arguing against the false premises even the left doesn't believe in or start arguing against their true motives and incentives. This is easier said than done because the left (and its accompanying entities of the government, academia, and the media) is so hardwired to play victim that any direct accusation will IMMEDIATELY result in accusations of you being an "ist" AND attempts to dox you, ruin your career, and ruin your name. So just imagine a single, black mother of 5 with 4 different fathers starts blaming ("that ole classic") "White Males Keep On Oppressing Me" and you publicly come out saying,

"No you stupid slut, it's not white males. It's because you can't keep it in your pants or go on birth control. And it is you who is the racist and sexist blaming white males for your incomprehensibly stupid decisions."

If you did that, nearly every brainwashed, sheeple facet of society (and conscious leftist agent in the government, media, and academia) would post what you said on the internet, misquote you, and misconstrue your words to the best of their ability to paint you as a bigot, racist, blah blah blah. And whatever career you may have once had is now gone because you are forever "googleable" henceforth.

And THAT is the real reason your hands are tied.

I can be flippant about this because in an ironic sense that is how I make my living. If I could summarize my business model, I sell the truth which has been so villainized by the left that it is effectively an outlawed drug. This not only makes truth a rare commodity, but I can charge a premium for it. The only price is I have to endure is that I will never have a "normal" life again (you know the one with a cubicle career, commute, taxes, a mortgage, children I can't afford, and divorce).

Most republicans, conservatives, and non-conspriacy-theorist-liberatarians cannot afford this as they have kids, a mortgage, a career, etc., that would be ruined by arguing past the narrative and pointing out the emperor has no clothes. But until that time comes, until the vast majority of conservatives and libertarians get the balls and courage to basically just say, "no, you're a parasite who wants other people's money and you're hiding like a coward behind children/your skin color/gender/etc to get it" we will all just be spinning our wheels responding to their red-herring arguments:

"No no, I'm for the children! I just think we can spend the money better!"
"No no! I'm not a racist! See I have this sort of 1/8th black friend!"
"No no! I don't hate women! I just think more of them should major in STEM!"

In the meantime, those fortunate enough not to need "the system" will simply boil down leftists and make the only argument that matters:

"You're a bunch of cowards and parasites, and all you want is for me to be your slave to support you."

And no progress is going to be made until we all do the same.

Cappy's Analysis of King v. Burwell

June 25, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Howdy from the Bakken

June 27, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Why We All Can't Work for "Non-Profits"

June 29, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

A nice Monday morning rant for all of you'se guyz

5,000 Miles in 5 Days

July 2, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

After a very lengthy mad dash to Lake Havasu and back (in a car without air conditioning no less) I am finally home. I did not take a ton of pictures because I have been to most of these places before, but I did want to share these videos of two "scenic viewing areas" right off the side in Utah. These aren't even STATE PARKS. Just "scenic areas." Anyway, will be putting together some 360 panoramic photos later, but hope you enjoy the views and consider making some travels out west;

Built Up from Vacation Linkage

July 2, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

How gay marriage will affect my marriage.

An analysis of human breeding strategies r vs. k by Stefan Molyneux. Part 1 of a 4 part series and I strongly recommend you download and listen to it.

This is the epitome of "Those Who Can't Do Teach." Talentless people attending an "academic conference" on heavy metal.

As the parasites go hyperbolic.

College degrees are the new fiat currency.

Good for him.

No matter what, women do talk more than men. However, letting the guy speak once in a while leads to successful relationships. So ladies, STFU once in a while.

"Why Do You Carry a Gun, Aaron?"

July 3, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Because you never know when some idiot is going to shoot up a movie theater
Some kid is going to start blasting away people at church
Or a swarm of idiots decide to get violent.

Self Employ or Die

July 3, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

It is now approaching 8 years that the country suffered the 2007 financial crisis and has since been stuck in the slow-growth doldrums of Keynesian mediocracy and "new normalcy." Despite trillions in stimulus spending and QE monies, the (largely) left's attempts to spur economic growth have failed. During Obama's administration GDP has grown around a paltry 1.8% per year, unemployment (if you believe the official figures) is just now below a recessionary 6%, and labor force participation has dropped to its worst measure since the last worst recession (The Volcker Recession).

However, while the macro-economic picture is bad, it doesn't tell half the story for younger people. And that story is a horrible one.

Unemployment for youth is double that of the national average. Labor force participation hasn't be this low since the FIRST oil embargo in the 70's. And (depending on which measures you want to use) UNDERemployment for the "most educated" generation in the history of America is anywhere between 30-50%. And this says nothing about the trillion+ dollar student loan albatross hanging around their necks.

The irony of course is that this generation did it to themselves. They voted for Obama. They "hated" on corporations. They launched the OWS protests. And they Venn diagram heavily with the parasites of society who euphemistically call themselves "SJW's." There is no generation that hates capitalism, economic growth, economic progress, and success more than today's young. However while they did pull the trigger and it is is "technically" their own fault, it wasn't as if they weren't completely brainwashed into doing so. The young did not grow up in a vacuum, uninfluenced by parents, teachers, media, politicians, and TV. They are a byproduct of the previous generations. And so while they did indeed vote against their own economic interests twice (and with Bernie Sanders, maybe a third, even fourth time) you can't blame them too much given the leftist indoctrination and complete lack of economic and financial fundamentals Gen X and the Baby Boomers failed to teach them.

However, the Millennials are no longer the doey eyed 18 year olds they were when they first voted for Obama in 2008. Nor are they the infatuated 22 year old female masters student with the VT's for Obama when they voted for him again in 2012. They are now a generation completely lost because all the promises and guarantees the previous generations told them are not coming true. And for the first time in their lives they are facing the full costs and consequences of being led to make the stupid decisions they did in the past. It is here they are finding out they've been living a lie and the real world is completely different than what they were told.

It is here there is a fork in the road and an important one for them. For they have the choice to start listening to the Knowledgesphere-harsh truths, facts and reality evil, blunt jerks like me spew on a daily basis, or simply double down on their indoctrinated religion of leftism, stick their heads in the sand, and continue to live the lies they were told to believe, consequently ruining their one, finite life on this planet forever.

And I think if you're here, you're thankfully in the former.

If that's the case then there is an important lesson you need to learn. For it's about your only shot at happiness, true financial success, and a life that was infinitely better than the one you've lived thus far. However, it requires that we look back and admit that what you were told was wrong. And not only was it wrong, but the people that told you it had no clue what they were talking about. We need to realize these people are living lives just as sucky as yours AND ALSO admit taking "conventional wisdom" that applied in the past does not apply into the future. We need to be forward looking, proactive and realistic, and develop strategies and make decisions based on these real world observations, all to salvage what remains of our lives.

In short, you must self employ or die.

On my latest western adventure I had lunch with a friend of mine on a main street in a small Minnesota town. He was telling me the story about how his dad worked for one of the largest airlines in America, until it went bankrupt. It emerged out of bankruptcy, but the pension he had worked so hard for was wiped out. The poor man is now underwater on his mortgage and relies on my buddy to support him.

On a less personal note, one of my most hated cities, Detroit, has gone through a similar such scenario. Not necessarily the actual city of Detroit, but its delusional and spoiled brat government workers who were promised insane pensions on the financial back of a dying leftist town. No matter what promises were uttered by the latest criminal-cum-mayor, in the end math and reality reigned supreme and thousands of former city employees are facing a fraction of what they were promised for pensions.

I could go on, but the points are clear.

1. The traditional life cycle of employment previous generations lived by no longer works and is no longer in effect. You will NOT find that life-long job at the local factory where you put in your 30 years and get your golden watch and pension. You are lucky to be working as a barrista and often for many young people today Uber and Lyft are the best employment options you have.

2. The previous generations have absolutely no freaking clue what they're talking about. Not only did they lead two full generations towards the path of life long poverty, debt, and underemployment, they themselves have so piss-poorly managed this nation you now have a country with 110% debt to GDP, a 7 year old recession, a housing bubble, a Dotcom bubble, a retirement bubble, and oh yeah, they're still blindsided by pensions not being funded AND no more than 10% of them have adequately saved for their own retirement.

And finally,

3. No form of employment is safe. It's one thing if a traditionally leveraged and risky industry like airlines file for bankruptcy. But when government pensions can't even be honored it shows you there is NO employer who can be relied upon to pay for your retirement, let alone keep you employed. You are just one CEO's-trophy-wive's-demand-for-a-horse-farm away from getting laid off. One moronic bankster-inflated asset bubble bursting away from losing your job. And just one rating-agency's-downgrade-of-your-municipal-employer's-bonds away from losing your pension.

In short no place in America today is a consistent and reliable source of employment.

But dire as America's labor market is today for young people, this only speaks to the reliability of employment. It says NOTHING about the working environment that results when you have such an oversupply of desperate labor juxtaposed against weak demand for it. Specifically, an intolerable and hostile work environment where employers are becoming increasingly petty, controlling, manipulative, and sadistic.

Forget requiring an MBA and 5 years experience for an entry level job. Forget 5 stages of interviews, 2 with HR ditzes, and 3 with increasingly incompetent levels of management.

What if you actually get hired?

So untenable and fragile is your employment today it isn't enough that you merely perform well at your job. You need to navigate the insane and illogical labyrinth of office politics and managerial pscyhology. You need to walk on eggshells. You need to anticipate and forecast the inconsistent, psychotic, and always changing demands of all "stakeholders" You need to "kiss the ring" of your employer and dance like a good little monkey.

Alas, merely showing up on time and giving 110% isn't enough.

You need "diversity training."
You need to donate to the United Way.
You need to commute to the new office 90 minutes away.
You need to attend company functions on the weekend.
You need "sexual harassment training."

You need to "walk to raise awareness for ADHDHHDDHDDDD"
You need to "give us your facebook password."
You need to "smile more at work."
You need your "flair."
You need to "come in on the weekend."

And above all else, you need to avoid right leaning politics. Either through donations, public forums, or your right to freedom of association. Otherwise you will be doxxed, you will be fired, or magically a "sexual harassment case" will be made against you. And your career, no matter how far along you are to retirement, will be ruined.

It is these two traits - the mathematical/economic impossibility of a traditional career, combined with the literally psychotic and totalitarian environment employers have become - that makes the only acceptable form of employment in your life self employment. You must self-employ, or you will mentally die.

Of course a lot of people don't think self-employment is for them. They're not the "entrepreneurial type." They like the "comfort" of working for somebody else. And to that I say "tough." Because you are operating under the premise that you have a choice. Yes, technically you do have a choice, but so bad has the employment prospects and employment environment become, that it practically forces you into self-employment. However, if you consider the pros and cons of self-employment against traditional employment, it will hopefully at least make a convincing argument for self-employment and at least provide you the incentive to "get into the entrepreneurial mindset."

First, you eliminate the issue of reliable employment. You are your own boss and thus you have your own best interests at heart. You will be the best boss you ever had and will treat yourself better than any boss you will ever have. You will not outsource your job to India. You won't sue yourself for sexual harassment. You won't "choose to go another direction" when times get tough.

Second, mental health. In being your own employer you won't have to endure the petty Baby Boomer boss antics of "predict my mind or else we'll fire you." Or "I told you this, but I really wanted you to do that." Or "I'm a 20 something brainwashed girl and am offended by everything and will file harassment complaints all the time." Or (my all time favorite game) "I Know We Said Your Job Would Be X, But Now that You Signed a Year Lease and MOved Here, It's Going to Be Y."

In short, all the mental BS, lies, and gimmickry is gone.

Third, efficiency. Closely related to mental health is the fact that most employees want to do their best. However, because more value is placed on conformance and ass-kissing than ass-kicking, being an efficient and productive employee gets you nowhere. When you're the boss it is all efficiency all the time. No games, no politics, no chicanery. Every decision you get to make is 100% efficient AND 100% IMMEDIATE. There is no "waiting for approval" or "waiting for the green light" from your boss. The mental health alone that comes with the feeling of "getting stuff done" is amazing and rewarding.

Fourth, no commute.

I know the aged, Baby Boomer powers that be who are desperately clinging onto the reigns of power believe this is a myth, but you don't have to commute. Matter of fact, most jobs can be done from home (unless of course you pursue a trade type form of self employment). This not only frees up time but drastically improves your mental health, your physical health, AND dramatically improves your family life. More time with the kids, more time with the wife, more time on the boat, more time playing catch. And its amazing how if you get rid of a commute you get rid of your chances for divorce.

And finally, five, better finances.

In being self employed you can write off a whole host of things you normally can't as a wage slave. Travel, computers, office space, insurance, etc., it usually compensates for the fact you have to pay your full social security tax. However, the tax write offs are not the key financial benefit of self employment. It is the long term asset you are building up that cannot be confiscated nor stolen from you (unless the communists take over).

The government can rescind the tax benefits,, even confiscate your 401k or IRA.
The government can inflate away or just refuse to pay your social security.
And your employer can (as we noted before) just go bankrupt and not pay you your pension.

However, your company, your network of clients, your expertise and everything else that goes into generating income from it cannot. In building your own company you create a system that is mobile, non-confiscatable, and unable to be rescinded like a pension or social security. That system can continue to generate income no matter what happens to social security, and (if done right) can be sold for more money than what 95% of Americans have in their "retirement accounts." If you're self employed, you won't have to sit there for 30 years post retirement worrying about whether "Montgomery Wards" is "going to make it" for the next 30 years. You just need to know that "Bob's Roofing" is running well under your son, "Bob Jr." as he pays you your 30% cut of profits and you retire down south on a beach.

But for all the pros (nay, compunction) of self-employment, there will be one final predictable argument against self-employment. And that is

"We all can't be self employed."

And you're right. We all can't.

Thankfully, despite the pure awesomeness of me and this blog, we are still a small minority when it comes to the general American population and interwebz. Because of the statistics of the bell distribution curve the average reader here is smarter than 93% of the population who are too busy being lemmings, watching daytime TV, Ellen, The View, Sports Center, Meet the Press, CNBC, The Kardashians, and "24/7 Bruce Jenner Saga Drama Show." They lack the intelligence, ingenuity, incentive, drive, rigor, and determination to become successful entrepreneurs and (thankfully) will serve as those tortured wage slaves at Initech or McDonald's so we don't have to,. And better yet, they will indebt themselves to that miserable existence TO BUY OUR STUFF.

Alas, we are compelled to become self-employed. Not just because economics and reality mandates us. Not just because it's the most basic self-respecting thing you can do for yourself. But because if not us, then who?

---

http://aaron-clarey.podomatic.com/
http://www.assholeconsulting.com
https://www.youtube.com/user/AaronClarey
https://twitter.com/aaron_clarey
http://www.amazon.com/Aaron-Clarey/e/B00J1ZC350/

Adam Kotsko - Why White Professors Sometimes Hate White People

July 5, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Add Adam Kotsko to the growing list of professors (both white and non-white) who are blaming white males for all of the world's problems. Their solutions range from demanding reparations (from people who had nothing to do with any of the world's past grievances) to calling for white males to kill themselves. Of course Mr. Kotsko claims his demand white males commit suicide was a "joke," (and I'll let you be the judge of that), but it is clear that Mr. Kotsko is for effectively enslaving innocent white males for past transgressions (both real and made up) that they had nothing to do with.

In short, Mr. Kotsko hates white males...ironically, of which he is one.

Is Mr. Kotsko a worthless degreed academian with no real world experience?
Yes.

Did he major in a worthless subject ensuring he never works a real job and only anti-male, anti-white, leftist authoritarian 4th tier degree mills will hire him?
Yes.

Is this just another crusaderer leftist who is too lazy to work a real job and is just biding what little remains of his pointless, worthless life on this planet acting like he's morally superior to others?
Yes.

But while this type of behavior is entirely predictable and expected among non-white racist professors, why are there white professors that seemingly hate themselves, even calling for their own race's enslavement or even suicide?

Well, strap yourselves in there fine lieutenants, economists and agents in the field, and pour yourself a hefty drink. For the ole Captain is going to explain it to you.

A while ago I knew this guy called "Bob." Bob had mommy and daddy pay for his masters in computer engineering and thusly never knew poverty, strife or what it took to make society work. He was spoiled and consequently lived on the "top decks of the Titanic" never seeing the dirty, sweaty engine room below that made his luxurious life so possible. Because he was never where the rubber hit the road in society, he was a staunch leftist. He believed that taxes should be raised, George Bush was evil, blah blah blah. However, when I asked him,

"What's it like forking over 50% of your income to people who don't work for a living?"

as he made well into the 6 figures he said,

"I prefer to pay them so they don't riot or revolt."

And that was the god's honest truth.

Go back considerably further in time and there's another similar example - danegeld.

"Danegeld" was simply money paid to the vikings in viking times so that they wouldn't raid northern mainland Europe. It was "protection money," nothing more, nothing less, to protect then Holland, Belgium, Normandy, and Denmark from viking raiders. And just like ~~that wimp~~ my old colleague "Bob," they'd rather effectively submit themselves to slavery than fight the parasites that were attempting to live off of them.

Now while the two aforementioned examples may not have any obvious link to Mr. Kotsko's hatred for the white race, there are some similarities and a shared seed between the two that explain why the likes of Mr. Kotsko call for/hate on their own race. And that commonality is laziness.

I will say it again for the cheap seats.

All socialism and leftists are is lazy.

The ENTIRE doctrine of socialism, communism, liberalism, feminism and leftism can be summed up in one word - lazy.

They simply do not want to work and if given the choice between self-supportation or parasitism, they will choose parasitism. This is why the vast majority of leftists are in academia, government, non-profits, or just on the government dole AND is also why the majority of their efforts are merely concocting reasons and lies as to why they are entitled to other people's work.

They are

JUST

PLAIN

LAZY

And Mr. Kotsko (and the increasing number of - surprise surprise - leftist worthless liberal arts academians) are no exception.

However, laziness presents a problem for people who are defined by it and live by it.

It's hard to survive with that mentality.

Again, the majority of leftists' work is simply rationalizing and coming up with reasons you're entitled to other people's time in the form of money. It is rationalizing slavery. It is rationalizing their parasitism.

This is all well and good when there's a healthy host full of a lot of blood you care to leech off of. But what if there isn't? What if the host is dying or dead? What if the host just plain doesn't have any more blood to give? Or the host is under threat of being taken over and replaced with a new entity?

And this is where the laziness is combined with cowardice on the part of the left.

It is my humble opinion that these leftists professors' survivalist instincts are kicking in. And because they are soooooo steeped in viewing the world through academically induce racial goggles, they see their own race "demographicing out," and non-white demographicing in. By 2047 whites are expected to NOT account for half the population, and given the political movement to criminalize whites, blame whites for all problems, and use them as the scapegoat, these cowardly professors see the OWN WRITING on the wall and will gladly throw away any self respect they have, as long as they're on the "winning side." This will hopefully "curry favor" with their new "overlords" and since they will have a track record of calling for the suicide of whites (and sometimes males) in their sad pathetic minds, their sad, pathetic, parasitic lives will be "spared."

There is however one problem.

In not even having the slightest bit of self-respect, and being so lazy you'll "submit" yourself to a new "tyrant," what kind of life will you live? I mean, I know being a liberal arts profession at a worthless school in an industry that is bursting like the Dotcom bubble must suck. But I cannot help but conclude your life will be like "The Toadie" from Mad Max 2.

Who is "The Toadie?"

Well, this guy who tries to catch the boomerang:

It doesn't matter how degrading the environment or his/her position in life is, leftists are so lazy they will accept ANY POSITION, as long as it avoids real work. The Toadie is a weakling. The Toadie doesn't care to work out. The Toadie does not care to become a road warrior. But that's OK. Even if The Toadie's fingers get cut off and he is the butt end of all jokes, perhaps even Lord Humongous' bitch, it beats having to work a real job. And that ultimately means having no self-respect, valuing yourself at 0, to the point you'd call for the suicide of your own kind.

The truth is this really has nothing to do with race. This is 100% psychology, psychopathy, cowardice, and self-loathing. These professors, who by their own "profession," are unconsciously admitting they do not care to be real men and women in this society, are the true and genuine fools in this world. They are the weaklings that would rather enslave themselves by paying danegeld to perceived-future vikings than lifting weights, taking up arms, and training to fight them off. They are the modern day incarnations of "Bob" who would rather bribe the parasitic masses than refuse them, fight them, or face them. And sadly, they are the true racists for deep down inside they believe their own leftist, hate-filled propaganda that there's some knid of race war brewing or (more idiotically) "whites should commit suicide" when in reality most minorities and whites get along just fine and we'd miss some friendships and loved ones if half the population just up and killed itself.

So do yourself a favor.

Don't pay the danegeld.
Don't pay the protection money.
Don't be an Uncle Ruckus.
And don't suffer from "The Toadie Syndrome."

---

http://aaron-clarey.podomatic.com/
http://www.assholeconsulting.com
https://www.youtube.com/user/AaronClarey
https://twitter.com/aaron_clarey
http://www.amazon.com/Aaron-Clarey/e/B00J1ZC350/

Germany, Not Greece Should Leave the Euro

July 6, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

I had faced a problem.

The new laptop I got SPECIFICALLY for being able to conduct business whilst adventuring was not recognizing the videos from the sim card I used with my camcorder. This was quite problematic as the majority of my consulting division's business is via video and not e-mail. I then started calculating how many hours it would take to trouble shoot this problem (do I download a codec, how long is it going to take to find the answer on google, what if nobody has had this problem before), until it dawned on me that the solution was NOT to somehow force my current system to work, but to simply use the built in camcorder that came with my new laptop.

Another instance, I was at a swing dance joint. I was feeling pretty good about myself, dapperly dressed in a suit fresh from my banking gig, and with no commitments for the weekend, was quite sure I'd land a couple phone numbers, perhaps even a girl back at my home that evening. However, there were very few attractive women at the club and those that were, were very stingy with the dancing. Even those that said yes were a bit standoffish. At first I thought maybe it was my approach or I had bad breath or something to do with me. But then I realized it may just be the joint and not me. I soon left to go salsa dancing and met a Russian ballet dancer (which is another story for another time).

I could go on, but there have been instances in my life where the solution is NOT the one you think you should be looking for, but one where you need to step back, take off the horse blinders, look at the problem from a wider scope and realize there is usually a much simpler, better, efficient, and cheaper solution.

And thus is the case with the current soap opera surrounding Greece.

Recently Greece voted to reject austerity measures that were insisted upon by the EU in order to continue to ~~have the right to suck the blood out of hard working Europeans~~ receive a bail out and further financial assistance. However, polls also showed 74% of Greeks wanted to remain in the Euro ~~so they can continue to parasite off of other countries~~ for reasons that are not too clear and ironic.

Naturally, the balless EU and its largely pansified, socialist member nations didn't dare play hardball, delivering rightly-due punishment to the communist Greek government. They instead said the door "still remained open for negotiations" which will continue to go forever and ultimately be like collecting on a mortgage of a $30,000-naire "Dudebro" and "Ditzytrophywife" American couple who bought a McMansion in 2006 on an adjustable ARM with their "part time sales" and "hair stylist" jobs.

So what is the solution my fine aspiring, young, deputy economists?

Is it to kick the can down the road again (and again, and again ^n x infinity?)
Is it to kick Greece out of the EU, forcing it to print off quintillion of "drachmas" and have the idiot bankers who lent them the money bite the bullet?
Should you send in tanks as would have been the norm back in 1800's?

How about something much simpler?

How about Germany leaves the EU?

While everybody is focusing on the screaming spoiled brat child in Europe, throwing its temper tantrums (that would be "Greece" if you didn't know), nobody is focusing on the one sole adult in the room, and that would be Germany. Germany, by nearly all measures is a superior, more responsible, more productive, and more intelligent country when it comes to economics than Greece is. It has only ran a deficit of 2% GDP the past 15 years (while recently balancing it) while Greece has ran a deficit averaging around 10% (halving it to "only" 5% today). Germany's labor force participation rate is (a still laughable) 60.3% today, while Greece barely has half it's able bodied people LOOKING for work (52%). And Germany's government spends (again "only") 44% GDP while Greece's spends 59% (while still screaming bloody murder over the "draconian" calls for austerity).

We could go on, but you get the point. You can look at nearly every economic measure at the OECD comparing Germany against Greece and see that one country is a reliable, responsible, productive adult and the other is a petulant little spoiled child.

However, there's another interesting thing about Germany.

Germany, is the ONLY adult in this daycare center euphemistically called the EU. Again, Greece is merely the loudest child, but if you look at the finances of nearly every other EU member, they're no better than Greece. France, Italy, Portugal, you name it. They all have debts approaching the point of being unpayable and populations that are just as delusional and just as entitled as their Greek siblings. And what this ultimately means is that the only real net-economic producer in this Euro-zone is Germany, making it the host to all the other parasite nations.

Alas, the solution is clear.

We can focus all the attention and negotiations and can-kicking and bail outs on Greece all we want. But Greece is merely one of many more countries that will be going through the same thing. It would be much easier for the EU's sole economic producer to abandon it's position of "host to the parasites," and let a Germanyless EU suffer its own fate. Germany could start the printing presses tomorrow, re-releasing the Deutschmark and at a rate I'd say around 2 Euros to 1 DM. There'd be international demand for it, and given German speed, intelligence and efficiency, they would lose at MOST 1% of GDP making the adjustment (which would save them the roughly 3-5% GDP the Greeks have been leeching off of them via bailouts).

But most importantly of all,

We Americans would no longer have to listen to this BS, soap opera drama where you European idiots ACTUALLY LENT MONEY to a socialist nation and thought they'd pay you back.

We can get on to much more important things like talking about Bruce Jenner or the Kardashians.

As they say "Auf Deutsch"

"Genießen Sie den Niedergang!"

---

http://aaron-clarey.podomatic.com/
http://www.assholeconsulting.com
https://www.youtube.com/user/AaronClarey
https://twitter.com/aaron_clarey
http://www.amazon.com/Aaron-Clarey/e/B00J1ZC350/

Higher Priced Weddings Correlate with Increased Divorce Rates

July 7, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

As do pricier engagement rings.

In short, if you blow more than $20,000 on a wedding, your chances for divorce go up 350%.

Still trying to find a study that shows the correlation coefficient (not to mention a study about the rate of divorce amongst women who insist on hyphenating their names, though I've heard studies have been squashed on that topic).

Tuesday "I Lost My Boxer Shorts" Linkage

July 8, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Interesting "4th of July" dates in American history.

The Fourth Power.

DT of DT and The Man decides to join the ole "Let's Repair Our Livers Bandwagon" in this episode of The Black Brigade Debrief.

I love the chart at the bottom.

Why do you run everyday?
So I can do it tomorrow (links to a lengthy video that you may want to have time to view)

Well, so much for Cos. Now that we have evidence you can form your opinions.

Ahhh diversity.

My son was stupid. Make a law!

I get a shout out by Mr. Cotto!

The three types of dads. Which one are you?

Federal Reserve: "Student Aid/Loans Cause Tuition Inflation"

July 8, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

To which I say, "No shit Sherlock!" (language warning)

Economics 101 Quiz

July 8, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

OK, lieutenants, economists, and agents in the field. What's wrong with this picture?

Chinese stocks were suffering huge declines prior to the New York Stock Exchange shutdown due to an alleged "technical issue," fueling concerns whether the NYSE was actually halted due to the free fall in China.

Companies in China fell 20% from a May high and, right before the NYSE shutdown, the Hang Seng Index plunged its most since the 2008 financial crisis.

"The Hang Seng Index fell 5.8% to 23,516.56 at the close today, the biggest drop since November 2008, after slumping as much as 8.6%," Bloomberg's Kana Nishizawa wrote.

Overall, China's stock market plunge has wiped out around $3.2 trillion since June 12.

"Investors are disappointed and afraid that the Chinese policy makers lost control of the market," Mari Oshidari, a Hong Kong-based financial strategist, said. "With no end in sight to the plunge, sentiment has turned cold."

"With liquidity drying up in the mainland, the Hong Kong market is being sold instead -- the only thing it can do is just quietly take the storm."

Source.

Episode #100 of The Clarey Podcast

July 9, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

The Racist Running Game
"Senior Frogs"
Old dudes who can kick your ass
How mansions are works of art and not homes to live in Greece, Cosby, and the idiot who killed himself with a firework
Stop making more fucking laws!
And fan mail

AND MORE!

in THIS EPISODE of The Clarey Podcast!

(Just to let you know it has to download the MP3 first and then play as my hosting service decided to "change" things because we all know "change" is always better)

Understanding Ownership

July 9, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

On a run around one of my favorite routes, I ended up listening to a podcast from Bernard Chapin. Uncie Bern had wandered into the discussion of whether the Nazi's were indeed socialist (which by most mathematical, economic, and political measurements were). While one would think with the full name "The National Socialist German Workers Party" would leave little doubt, Hitler was a such a bad man that the left desperately has (and still needs to) paint him as a right winger (while still have heart palpitations for Mao, Stalin, and Che). This has resulted in a painfully childish debate of semantics about who owned what, were the means of production owned by the state, did the state tell the corporations what to do, were they "corporatist," blabbity blah blah freaking blah.

Alas, I believe it is high time to do away with semantics and discuss precisely what is "ownership" so that before we all get caught up in the minutiae and technicalities of ideologue-infested debate, we can let you, the individual, think for yourself as to whether or not the Nazi's were indeed socialist (not to mention, be able to identify who is and is not an advocate of socialism).

First, one must ask "why do we own any assets" in the first place?

Is it pride? Is it power? Is it consumption?

It can be all of those things, but we have to delineate between a consumable good/asset and an investable asset.

A consumable good (or asset) is precisely that. It can be consumed.

An apple.
A bottle of scotch.
A movie.
A video game.
A car.

All of these things, sometimes immediately, some times over the course of years, are inevitably used up or "consumed" by the "consumer" and no longer serve any purpose or value. They feed a person, comfort a person, make life convenient for a person, but in the end they are consumed.

Contrast that with an investable asset, where that asset is not to be consumed (like a Milky Way bar) but rather employed in a process or business to generate INCOME aka PROFIT aka EARNINGS.

The computer you use to run your company.
The factory used to build widgets.
Even the trucks (which can also be considered a consumable asset) is considered an investable asset as long as it is used in such a capacity.

These assets are used to generate further earnings by which you can live off of and thus are considered "investments." Alas, "assets" in this particular economic sense of the word typically imply there is some income generating potential of those assets and are what are traditionally referred to by communists as the "means of production."

Now what the left and communists will do to "prove" the Nazi's were not socialist is point to the fact that under socialism it is the state the owns the means of production while under capitalism it is the private sector or individual who owns the means of production. And since the Nazi state did NOT own Germany's corporations, but rather said corporations were still in private hands, the Nazi's=Capitalists=Ronald Reagan=White Males=Kill Them All.

However, like most arguments of the left, they are disingenuous, deceiving, and intellectually dishonest.

The reason why is that while "officially" under Nazi Germany corporations were largely in private hands, the state still effectively told them what to do, what to produce, and how much of it. So sure, the deed to the plant had "Hans Fricktenstein" on it, and the deed to the factory had "Heinrich Gorsternstoppen" on it, but it was only in name. The Nazi state controlled it, not the individual "owner," rendering "official ownership" moot.

Of course, faux leftist intellectuals and libertarian conspiracy theorists will then pull out the term "corporatist." The leftists do this to throw you off track, while libertarian conspiracy theorists do this so they can use 50 cent words to fake intelligence. But whatever name they call it, it's still the STATE that effectively controls and owns the factors of production. Merely slapping "corporatist" on it does not change it's economic nature.

However, thinly veiled and politically-incentived semantics aside, there is a more compelling, fundamental economic reason that ultimately governs what precisely is "socialist" vs. what precisely is "capitalist." And it is not whose name is officially on the deed, nor even who effectively "controls" the assets.

It's who owns the profits of these investable assets.

You see, the ONLY reason people go into business is because they want to make a profit. It's very cute and funny how naive college students, as well as their older (yet pathetically not wiser) professor counterparts think "profit" is some how evil or unnecessary. When in reality NOT ONE THING in ANY economy would ever have been produced without the prospect for profit. You go to work because you intend to earn more than the gas and car maintenance you expend working there. I write posts and books because I intend to make money on them. And Warren Buffett gives up his money when buying companies not for S's and G's, but because he wants the profits of the companies he's buying. Thus, the real reason for assets even to be considered "investments" or "means of production" (and thus, sough after) is because of the profits they MAY potentially generate.

Alas, ownership is not determined by the deed, nor even the dictates of what is to be produced by the state, but who receives the profits.

At first, leftists and other ignorants of society will rush to point out "who receives the profits." The evil rich people. The illuminati. The bilderberg groups. "Big Oil." "Big Pharma." But there is ONE entity that that is a bigger shareholder than all the interconnected, multinational corporations and hedge funds combined.

The state.

You see, with a 36% federal corporate tax rate, combined with a ever so roughly 4% state tax rate, the rough average corporate tax rate is 40%. This means your state and federal government combined are the single largest shareholder of US corporations.

They did nothing to earn that money.
The states nor the federal government risked their own money in purchasing any investable asset.
Even Barack Obama didn't build that.

They merely through law declared that they are the default owner of 40% of all US corporations.

Throw in dividend taxes and the statutory rate is 50% (arguments of effective rate duly noted).

Ergo, the economic REALITY is that the United States is not an "evil greedy capitalist" nation like the left would have you believe, but a half owned, state entity where the government is the defacto 50% owner of all US corporations.

Now, of course it is not only corporations and companies that produce all the economic production in the nation. There are individuals, small businesses (who are not in the 50% tax range), and (as many leftists are no doubt spewing vehemently) just because the STATED tax rate is 50%, doesn't mean corporations pay that rate (the EFFECTIVE rate, sans dividends, is closer to 32%).

But we all know that the government taxes these entities as well. We have sales tax, property tax, personal income tax, gas tax, nearly everything is taxed. So it is ALL forms of profit that are taxed one way or another.

So how do we measure this, and thus define, whether a particular government or political party is "socialist" or not?

Government spending as a percent of GDP.

I've hit this one on the head before, but not from the angle that taxation is nothing more than a percent ownership in private ventures. And while you may "own" your house, or may "own" your corporation, or may "own" your stocks, you only own the percentage that the government does not tax away.

What is that percentage in the US?

Well, it depends on the state, but on average 40%.

When you combine state, federal, and local spending, the cumulative "state" is a default 40% shareholder in all American economic activity. This is certainly not the totalitarian Soviet Union or today's North Korea, but it is also NOT the "evil, heartless, capitalist" nation the left successfully ~~dupes the perennial idiots of our country into thinking it is~~ paints it to be.

The larger point is not that the US is "40%" socialist. Nor that a "communism-socialism-capitalism-anarchy" spectrum more aptly describes today's economies (although it does). The key is to understand that it is ownership of PROFITS that determines the true ownership of the assets. And that any debate that ignores this should be relegated to the societal garbage bin where it belongs - academia.

Now, just ask yourself this question.

What does a 40% socialist state say about who owns you and your life?

That is for another post at another time.

Read a Book, Read a Book, Read a Mother Fucking Book

July 9, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Hey, I got a book in mind!

Self Employ or Die

July 10, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

I'll say it again,

Trust no one but yourself.

Don't Blame "Capitalism" for China's Collapse

July 10, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

And don't blame it for our own collapse either:

Helping Out Blacks is Now "Racist"

July 13, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

To give you the short background on the story. Mumia of Obsidian Radio did a two part episode (part 1 part 2) on my book and whether it was racist or not. Specifically, he read the complaint of a reader "Vector 313" that claimed The Black Man's Guide Out of Poverty was racist and that the Manosphere was eschewing black men. Naturally, I disagreed, but sadly Vector 313's views are not uncommon. Many (though I estimate only 40% based on book reviews thus far) of black men will view a book that is SPECIFICALLY and PURPOSELY designed to help them as "racist." Because of this (and wanting to thank Mumia for covering this topic) I have put together a much needed response that points out the INSANITY (not to mention bigotry) of refusing help simply because of the race of the person it comes from. I sincerely hope it reaches the ears of Vector 313, changes his mind, as well as any black man who agrees with him.

"Hello Mumia,

I was humbled to find out my book (The Black Man's Guide Outof Poverty), and the issue of whether I was a racist or not were topics for two episodes of Obsidian Radio. Obviously, because of the efforts I put into writing the Black Man's Guide Out of Poverty as well as that whole minor thing of being called a racist, I wanted to defend myself against your listener Vector 313 (and those who may agree with him).

In short, I need Vector 313 and everybody who agrees with him (that I am a racist for writing this book) to, step back, clear your minds, and ask themselves a very simple question:

"A guy wrote a book titled

THE BLACK MAN'S GUIDE OUT OF POVERTY

AND HE'S RACIST????"

Do you hear yourselves?

This wasn't

"How to Make the Black Man Down."

Or

"How to Keep the Black Man in Poverty."

It’s

“The Black Man’s Guide OUT of Poverty.”

You are accusing an individual, who wrote a book that is intended to help black men, which is the antithesis of racist, a racist.

Another minor complaint I noticed from Mr. Vector 313 was that the Manosphere does not care or is not for black men. That it’s largely a white boys’ club and black men are neither welcome nor allowed.

But when one of the more prominent members of The Manosphere (that would be me) takes the time to combine his expertise in economic and finance, with the consultation and advice from man young black men, to author a how to manual with the express purpose of helping young black men lead a better life than he did, just because the author is white, THAT DOESN’T COUNT????

What more was Mr. Vector 313 looking for? Perhaps a donation of 5 pints of blood and a kidney?

Here is the sad truth. I can’t argue with the Vector 313’s of the world because they’re insane. They have racism on the brain. They are trained to see racism, even when there is a genuine and sincere offer to help, a genuine and sincere olive branch of comradery, a genuine and sincere attempt to help a fellow man. And while I’d like to say that Vector 313 is in a small minority, unfortunately if I use book reviews as a proxy, nearly 40% of black men view a book that is designed to HELP THEM, as racist simply because it was written by a white guy.

Of course, I predicted this, but it still doesn’t make it any less pitiful and sad. 40% of the black population is going to reject help simply because it comes from a white guy (which, by the way, IS the epitome of racism). But that’s fine. Because while 40% may continue on the ways of the past, doomed to repeat it, and ignore potentially successful ways to enrich themselves and escape poverty, 60% won’t. 60% are at least open-minded enough to “give anything a try.” 60% are thankful that a (GASP!) white guy took the time to write a book specifically for them. 60% are going to read it, and 60% of them are going to improve their finances, not to mention their mental health, romantic health, family lives, and racial relations with other races.
So to the Mr. Vector 313’s of the world, who are very offended and are (predictably) used to guilty, SWPL, white people rushing to grovel, beg, apologize and ask “what they did to offend you?”

Fuck off.

Obviously, being nice, sincere, and giving two shits about you doesn't work with you. Trying to help only results in an accusation of racism (because you disagree with the message) which is not only unjust, but insulting. So fuck off. Don't want help? Fine. Nobody's forcing you to read the book. You hack away at life using that same ole same ole "wisdom" that has FAILED to close the

Wealth
Income
Employment and Life expectancy

gaps in the past 60 years.

Keep thinking doing the same thing over and over again will result in different results.

And keep viewing the world through racist glasses that makes you so ignorant you refuse help just because its origins are white.

Because as I've said before "It ain't my life you're ruining. It's yours."

Ergo, I kindly and humbly ask you to reconsider, reread the book IN ITS ENTIRETY, and at least permit yourself the right to entertain ideas you may find disagreeable ESPECIALLY if they are designed and intended to help you.

Sincerely,

Aaron Clarey
http://aaron-clarey.podomatic.com/
http://www.assholeconsulting.com
https://www.youtube.com/user/AaronClarey
https://twitter.com/aaron_clarey
http://www.amazon.com/Aaron-Clarey/e/B00J1ZC350/

Why It Could Very Well Be President Bernie Sanders

July 14, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Like any good economist admits he cannot predict what will happen to the economy, I also admit I cannot predict politics. However, my spidey senses are tingling and sadly I have to admit that if I were to put my money on any one of the current candidates it would be...

Bernie Sanders.

Oh laugh as you might. I know he is a bona fide socialist and endorses policies that are even "too left" for most leftists, but hear the ole Captain out.

First, I cannot see why nobody else (at least to my knowledge) has pointed out the more-than-one parallels between Mr. Sanders and Mr. Obama. I say this not to be hyperbolic or because I hate Mr. Obama, but simply because it's true-

They're both socialists.

Sure Mr. Obama ran and presented himself as more of a "lefty independent," but his actions, words, and deeds in office (and his entire political career if you cared to study it instead of listening to his pablum speeches) is that of a socialist.

Tax the rich
Spend more money on the poor
Socialized medicine
His hatred for private property
His hatred for Western Civilization
Not to mention all of his affirmative action efforts to advance minorities and women at the expense of whites and males, which gives his version of socialism a particular racial and sexual flavor.

You combine that all together and you have a socialist who is no different in action, policy or voting that Bernie Sanders.

Ergo, so what if Bernie Sanders is a socialist? Our president is one too.

Two, socialism is no longer a four letter word. The Millennial generation proved that beyond a doubt in 2012. And so we must tip our hat to the long-LONG term strategy of the left to slowly but surely brainwash a generation through the schools into thinking that something like socialism is a "good thing." Ergo, while you, me, and our Baby Boomer counterparts either grew up in the 80's (knowing socialism was evil) or grew up in the 60's (only to have the Volcker Recession kick your ass into adult economic reality) and know the evils and drawbacks of socialism, the Millennials don't. They're SO brainwashed, they can't even put it together and realize that is was socialists (in the form of their teachers, professors, and leftist politicians) who have completely screwed them over in terms of tuition/student debt/worthless degrees a lousy economy/labor market

AND

that whole minor social security/medicare thing

Ergo, just as the Millennial idiots voted against their own best interests in 2012 (and 2008) they will most certain vote again to shoot themselves in the foot come 2016. And Bernie Sanders is the most qualified candidate to help them do that.

Three, brainwashing and politics aside, the real reason I believe Bernie Sanders will win is (once again) something similar to why Obama won the nomination in 2008 - he's not an insider.

Well, yes, of course Mr. Sanders IS an insider. The loser is the epitome of career politician never working a real job in his life and immediately going into politics in his mid 20's. BUT the fact he runs as a socialist means he has something nearly no other politician has - honesty. And it is this honesty that effectively makes him an outsider and not part of the "established political class."

Consequently, because he's honest and forthright about his politics he at least STANDS FOR SOMETHING.

Something I disagree with wholeheartedly
Something that will continue and accelerate our decline.
Something I would thoroughly enjoy watching being implemented as it would just destroy the Millennial generation and the baby boomer retirements that heavily rely on them.

But at least something more than the self-serving pablum that is spewed from the mouths of Obama and Clinton.

And it is this, combined with the aforementioned traits of Mr. Sanders, that I believe he will get the nomination and win.

If Sanders is nominated the democrat party will be presenting PRECISELY what about 60-70% of the population wants.

1. A (reasonably) HONEST politician who
2. STANDS FOR SOMETHING and
3. That "something" is more free money at the expense of the "privileged class."

With such a candidate you'll win about 80-90% of Millennials, 80% of women, 90% of minorities, and 50% of men 30+, making it impossible for the republicans and whatever spineless, ball-less, SWPL establishment putz they decide to throw at the wall and hopes sticks.

Of course, the republicans could nominate their own equivalent of Bernie Sanders. An individual who speaks his mind. A individual who is honest. And an individual who isn't establishment republican. But republicans are already too busy shooting themselves in the foot and dumping Trump.

Alas, don't worry fellow conservatives and libertarians. The republicans will, as they always do, f*ck it up. They'll pick a nerdy SWPL square that has no spirit or character. A boring, connected establishment patriarch who's not the best candidate but "whose turn it is." And a sheepish individual who cannot handle the media and DARE doesn't get dirty and fight back.

So pour yourself a drink,
Make plans to vote with your feet
Participate in capital flight
And enjoy the decline. http://aaron-clarey.podomatic.com/
http://www.assholeconsulting.com
https://www.youtube.com/user/AaronClarey
https://twitter.com/aaron_clarey
http://www.amazon.com/Aaron-Clarey/e/B00J1ZC350/

Why Women Make Less Than Men

July 15, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Thanks to a VERY deep undercover agent in the field (in academia!), I think I have found the perfect, singular and AUTHORITATIVE source to point young women to when they claim there's a wage gap, women earn less than men, glass ceiling, etc. etc. etc.

Here.

It's a PDF file, but in short it is a 182 page paper on earnings potentials for different degrees. You needed read the entire document (obvious) as much as just peruse the charts in the first few pages. It's DAMNING as to just how clear it is that women simply choose:

Easier
More popular and thus
More supplied/flooded majors which (if they ever bothered to pay attention to economics 101, but "math hard") explains not only the wage gap, BUT PROVIDES THE THE KEY IF THEY WISH TO CLOSE IT! (but again, I know, I know, "math hard") Anyway, book mark this page and merely link to it anytime you get into this tiresome and obsolete argument that there's a wage gap.

NASCAR is Next

July 15, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Look closely at the first pic.

Why Whites Are Cowards When It Comes to Talking Race

July 15, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

"An accusation of racism is like an accusation of rape. Even if it isn't true, it can ruin your career."

(Language warning)

http://aaron-clarey.podomatic.com/
http://www.assholeconsulting.com
https://www.youtube.com/user/AaronClarey
https://twitter.com/aaron_clarey
http://www.amazon.com/Aaron-Clarey/e/B00J1ZC350/

Picking on Greeks Will Be the New Racism

July 15, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

I predict (as leftists are predictable) that they will claim picking on Greece and Greeks is "racist." They will do this because it will divert and deflect all legitimate attacks against this nation's parasitism into one of "you hate Greeks," further hiding their ideology's spectacular economic failure (socialism) and allowing them to keep their pride (no matter how mentally-acrobaticy they had to be to have any pride in parasitism).

This now presents all self-respecting westerners the opportunity to nip this in the bud and prevent the left from creating another entire new "victim class." Thus we have an option. We can say,

"No, no, this is NOT racism. We are justifiably picking on a stupid and idiotic people who voted in the world's most evil and worst political party, not to mention shaming deadbeats and parasites who simply refuse to pay back what they borrowed. You will not turn this into a debate about race, which it isn't, as we have the self-respect to refuse to be hosts to another group of parasites."

Or we can fall for the ruse, abandon the argument against Greek socialist theft, and rush to grovel beg and plead for forgiveness

because we were accused of "racism."

Of course, I don't have a lot of faith in our guilt-laden-brainwashed westerners to grow a spine and tell the left to shove it when this accusation comes. But in the meantime, here are some jokes that were originally Latvian in origin, that now apply to Greece. Enjoy!

Absolute "Must" Economic Lessons to Pull from Paul Krugman and Greece

July 16, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Language warning, but seriously, this is something to watch if you are trying to understand the economics of the Greek debt crisis...not to mention how the minds of "leftist economists" work...or don't.

http://aaron-clarey.podomatic.com/
http://www.assholeconsulting.com
https://www.youtube.com/user/AaronClarey
https://twitter.com/aaron_clarey
http://www.amazon.com/Aaron-Clarey/e/B00J1ZC350/

College as the Fourth Layer of Government

July 16, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

I find sleep hard to come by. To aid in this I do many things, one of which is listen to podcasts as I go to bed. As long as they aren't terribly cerebral or detailed, they usually send me off to slumberland. But while half awake and about to make the jump last night, it was Bernard Chapin's podcast that jilted me out of my slumber. The reason why was because he started quoting an article about yet ANOTHER female college student complaining about some sort of injustice or another.

I can't remember even precisely what it was, nor was I able to go back and find the article. But I do remember my brain kicking in saying,

"WTF? ANOTHER college drama? ANOTHER complaint filed about harassment or trigger warnings or what have you? Why is this happening? Why can't college students get their act together and just go to school? Why all the made up drama?"

And then it dawned on me.

I learned over to the bed side table, grabbed my notepad, made a note, and though the brain juices were stirred, I managed to fall back to sleep.

When I woke up this afternoon and looked at my notepad the note read "College is the 4 Layer of Government." And I realized, despite being half awake, this epiphany was dead on. For not only is it true, it also explains why we can't go one day without some sort of "news article" about some petulant little child filing some complaint in the world of Academia.

Understand the current three layers of government exist for one logical reason or another.

Federal handles all things national and international. Defense, roads, trade policy, etc.
States handle regional issues, roads, national guard, interstate commerce, etc.
And local handles issues closest to home. Schools, parking regulations, police, fire department, etc.

And between these three layers of government the US people have ENOUGH (if not more than enough) governance to make sure society works. However, whereas governments typical form out of a requirement by the people to either regulate, legislate, or provide a certain public service, additional layers of government may evolve simply because an organization has enough power or is put in an effective position of power over a large enough group of people.

For example, most people really don't have the freedom of speech in the US. The reason why is that employers act as a defacto 4th layer of government.

You can't make politically incorrect posts on facebook.
You can't participate in politics publicly, lest you be fired by Mozilla.
What's your Twitter password?
Pee in this cup.
Were you out late last night? You look tired at this morning's meeting.
You can't date at work.
And (my all time favorite "law" one of my employers told me) you can't teach dance class.

And the reason employers can get away with this is because they have power over you in the form of employment. You need their money to survive.

However, a new and even more Orwellian fourth layer of government has formed and that is colleges or "Academia." But whereas the power of employers come from the fact you need a job, Academia's power comes from the fact you need a degree to even get a job! (or so they say). Ergo, entire futures of young people's careers are literally balanced in the hands (and whims) of the unelected officials of Academia.

And who are these unelected officials?

Professors, administrators, diversity officers, and other worthless academic bureaucrats who most certainly, if not entirely, hail from the left.

This has resulted in a defacto tyrannical government forcing their own leftist, socialist, feminist, and anti-white anti-male ideology on the unfortunate and unsuspecting student-citizens of Academiaville.

No longer can "Bill" just show up, get his degree in engineering and go on to work for Boeing. No he needs "diversity training" before he can graduate.

No longer can "Amy" just show up, get her degree in accounting, and go work for Peat Marwick. No, she needs to have 20 credit hours in "Corporate Social Responsibility" before she gets her degree.

And no longer can "Bob" just show up to class, flirt with "Jessica" (who he had the hots for on the first day of class) and nail her a month later after a couple dates. No, Bob needs to worry NOT ABOUT THE COPS, but about how the City Council of Academiaville have revised the definition of the word "rape" to mean "regret."

You combine this all together and you get nothing short of a propagandizing, tyrannical, leftist, Soviet, Orwellian nightmare. And Mr. Chapin's recent podcast was just one example of the many instances of this hell young people must endure.

The Duke lacrosse team was a perfect example where the fourth layer of government didn't care about police reports, facts, or justice. They (frankly) hated white males and used their effective government power to punish them for, well, being white males.

The fraternities of UVA were shut down by this fourth layer of government because Rolling Stone magazine wrote a story about a rape that was found out later to be false. Again, facts, police reports, forensics, and reality be damned. The leftist, feminist ideology of UVA's City Council was the effective law of the land there and they don't like fraternities. Shut them down!

How about Mattress girl at the Soviet Socialist Republic of Columbia University? Again, a provably false rape accusation where the unelected officials of Columbia university made the life of Jean-Paul Nungesser not only hell, but made it very likely he'd never have a career. It wasn't until Mr. Nungesser provided proof (in the form of texts) that the sex was consensual and that Mattress Girl (and Columbia University) was proven wrong. (He is now suing Columbia University, good for him.)

And how can we forget when they turn on their own? Laura Kipnis, a feminist studies ~~hack~~ professor enjoyed the experience some lampreys enjoy when other lampreys attack their own. After writing an article decrying the "sexual paranoia" she witnessed on college campuses two complaints were filed by (you guessed it) two ~~lampreys~~ feminist college students against her. After circus court ordeal where college administrators wouldn't even tell her what the complaint was about, she was exonerated.

But what makes the drama in college campuses today so frequent and "news worthy" (not to mention laughable) is not so much the Orwellian nature of leftist college administrators as much as it is their own success. Through nearly three generations of leftist brainwashing in both K-12 and media, the (predominantly) aged, baby boomer leftists of the 60's who run Academiaville are now reaping what they sowed. Thus, their problem students are not the "evil" "Straight Laced White Boy McGee" who comes in, wants to major in Actuarial Studies (who they desperately wanted to punish because of whitey-malelyness). It's the professional victim-monsters they've created that are now the citizenry of their domain. And they couldn't deserve these little self-created Frankenstein monsters more.

19 year old spoiled brat children from the suburbs who have NEVER been held to a standard and have ALWAYS been told they were right filing complaints against professors.

18 year old adult children who have NO real world experience, but have been brainwashed to believe because they champion the politically correct approved crusades and causes, they are "smart" and know better.

And particularly delicious is the egomaniac hordes of young American female students who have been led to believe that not only are they great, but are automatically victims, constantly under assail and assault, because they have a vagina. And that if things don't go their way, by god, they need to file a report and get people fired.

The result is a circus that belies not only the true intent of these academian leftist ideologues, but shows us what a leftist utopia looks like and the ultimate insanity that would ensue.

Trigger warnings
"Safe rooms"
False rape hysteria
Worthless college graduates with worthless college degrees
Financial ignoramouses who VEHEMENTLY defend wasting $200,000 on said worthless degrees
Fat acceptance
Tuition increases at 8x's the rate of inflation and 5x's the rate of wage increases and ultimately an entire generation of adult children who are not only completely useless and valueless to the rest of society, but are LIABILITIES NOBODY will want to have anything to do with.

The solution, of course, is two fold.

One, you do not have to live in "Academiaville." You can attend conservative colleges like Hillsdale which do NOT have the totalitarian, leftist insanity. You can focus on your studies and side step all the leftist indoctrination that is falsely posing as your "pre-requisite" classes to ensure you're a "well rounded person." Plus girls at Hillsdale will unlikely accuse you of rape if you kiss them on the cheek goodnight.

Two, that internet is coming. Already the IT industry (rightly) places more value on certifications and experience than it does that increasingly worthless piece of paper. Additionally, with places like ASU offering accredited degrees online in conjunction with the likes of Khan's Academy and CourseX, the MOOQ's will be replacing college campuses for a fraction of the cost, and NONE of the insanity. The only thing stopping it is getting American employers to realize it.

And truth be told, the Ole Captain has a little trick up his sleeve that might just make that happen sooner than you think.

But that is another story for another time.

http://aaron-clarey.podomatic.com/
http://www.assholeconsulting.com
https://www.youtube.com/user/AaronClarey
https://twitter.com/aaron_clarey
http://www.amazon.com/Aaron-Clarey/e/B00J1ZC350/

Do Baby Boomers Deserve Nursing Home Visits?

July 20, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

The answer to a question that is wrong:

Defaulting on Debts and Jailing Bankers, Can the Iceland Solution Work for the US?

July 21, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

In this rather lengthy video I review and analyze the Iceland financial crisis of 2008 and explain how their solution to the crisis would and would not work here. I may then go on a tangent about "what President Cappy" would do...which entails a 52 card deck a la Iraq to hunt down banker scum on crotch rockets totting AR15's.

For Your Late Night Listening Pleasure

July 22, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

You may get his album here.

"But the 50's Were Racist!"

July 22, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

It is without debate that the 1940's through the 1960's were America's "golden years" wherein:

Economic growth was nearly double what it is today
Unemployment was half of what it is today
The national debt averaged half of what it is today (relative to GDP)

and

High school graduates could graduate AND GET JOBS without endebting themselves pursuing worthless degrees.

Life was better. The economy was better. And the future much brighter.

Of course, since the 50's were largely the pinnacle economic achievement of free markets, those on the left must attack it. And thus, with the assurance of a ball returning while playing against a wall in one-man tennis, you can reliably predict two common arguments the left will use when trying to tear down those glorious 50's:

1. The highest income tax bracket was 91% in the 50's
and
2. The 50's were "raaaaayccccissss"

The first argument is easily debunked because so few people were in the 91% income tax bracket that its leftist-desired wealth redistributive effects were not realized, nor did it really affect the economy. Additionally, using the REAL tax rate (that would be "spending as a percentage of GDP" for you non-economists out there) shows overall taxation much lower in the Evil Racist 50's than what we have today (25% GDP at state federal and local vs. the 35% we have today, and that includes the Korean War).

But the "But the 50's Were Racist" argument the left uses to chicken-out of this economic debate is particularly obnoxious. For not only is it a non-sequitir a red herring intellectually dishonest cute amusing childish

and ultimately irrelevant to the economic debate (attempting) to be had, it's down right tiresome. Alas, time to take this pathetic canard down.

The first and most obvious flaw with this argument is the fact that IN NO POINT IN TIME in the history of THE ENTIRE WORLD was there "no problems." ANY point ANYWHERE in history there was always something bad going on.

The roaring 20's? Untreatable cancer.
The industrial revolution? Polio.
Roman empire? Slavery.
The Renaissance? Cheating spouses.

You might as well respond to the argument that "the 80's was an economic miracle" with "yeah, but the Challenger blew up."

Bad things existing or happening during an booming economy does NOT moot the economic production that occurred during those times, NOR the variables/policies that lead to said booming economy.

Two, (and you need to follow the logic on this VERY CLOSELY and CLEARLY):

In claiming racism is a valid enough reason to debunk and dismiss the economic boom of the 50's, this MUST mean that the left believes racism had a causal relationship (in part) with the economic boom. Otherwise they would be intellectually honest and aim for "the best of both worlds." They would say, "well, we should look at what economic policies were in place during the 50's AS WELL AS eliminate the racist policies that plagued the day." However, they don't. They associate and thus imply that RACISM CAUSED THE ECONOMIC BOOM OF THE 1950's and therefore we cannot implement those policies.

Let that sink in.

I know leftists and socialists won't, but let that sink in your brain.

The left (albeit naively, idiotically, and unconsciously) is claiming RACISM CAUSES ECONOMIC GROWTH.

I don't need charts, data, or empirical evidence. This is just HIGHLY FLAWED and INSANE logic. Racism is GOOD for the economy??? And that if we wanted to get the economy booming again we should implement RACIST policies???

I know the left does not advocate such a thing, but their unchecked, emotionally driven "logic" does.

Finally, what's worse is it shows just how little the left views minorities (albeit unconsciously). For this argument to be true - that instituting the economic policies of the 50's would BY NECESSITY bring back "racism" - then minorities would have to have net negative economic NPV's. ie - they would have to be economic sink holes. Not just that they would "produce nothing of value" but actually DESTROY economic value (on par with an estimated 2% GDP per year). And the WHOLE REASON for the booming economy in the 1950's was because "whitey" was keeping blacks (and others) out of the economy, because if minorities were allowed in the economy (or treated as equals) then the economy would tank as if minorities were somehow "saboteurs."

Those aren't my words. Nor (admittedly) are they the conscious words of the left. But, again, it IS their logic and what they are effectively implying.

The truth is the "But the 50's Were Racist" argument is just another TIRESOME, REPEATED, and COWARDLY tactic of the left where they hide the failure of their economic policies behind an unrelated social issue. They cannot debate their economic plan of socialism, wealth redistribution and parasitism on economic,

logical,
mathematical,
historical, or empirical grounds,

and thus must take the greatest decade in American economic history and villainize it by tainting it with "racism" (and of course "sexism" as men beat their wives THRICE DAILY and Don Draper banged every secretary in his office in the 50's).

However, foolish as this argument is, there is a STEEP price to pay if Americans turn off their brains and fail to realize the non-sequitur in the left's argument. In dismissing the 50's economic boom "because racism" we REFUSE to look at a point in all of human history where an economy was NEVER BETTER. Poverty was decreasing at the fastest rate in human history FOR ALL PEOPLE. Standards of living were increasing faster than ever. And if we kept this economic miracle up, we would have had income per capita's of over $100,000 today.

The key
The answer
The solution
To nearly all of our economic and financial problems lay in those decades of America's glory years sans, of course, the racism.

Too bad nobody's courageous enough to study them, highlight them, or advocate bringing them back because a bunch of intellectually dishonest parasites calling themselves democrats might falsely accuse you of being a (GASP!) raaaaayyyyyyyccccciiiiiisssss!

And no country with an income per capita in the 6 figures is worth that risk, now is it?

Enjoy that decline.

---

http://aaron-clarey.podomatic.com/
http://www.assholeconsulting.com
https://www.youtube.com/user/AaronClarey
https://twitter.com/aaron_clarey
http://www.amazon.com/Aaron-Clarey/e/B00J1ZC350/

Leftists are Lazy

July 22, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

I'm going to say this again until people get it.

I don't care how many millions of pages of books are written by thousands of political scientists, journalists, or grad students.

If you want to understand leftist politics you need to understand only one thing:

Laziness is the reason for EVERYTHING they do.

Ahhhh, Socialism

July 23, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Yeah, you leftists keep championing this shit.

Why You Are a Slave for 13 Years

July 24, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Time for some basic, simple 4th grade math everybody. The kind of math that debunks even the most complicated and detailed arguments of the left, not to mention, boils things down into very basic, simple, and understandable terms.

Understand that money is nothing more than the physical manifestation of human time. We, as humans, would like to exchange our time because different humans have different specialties that benefit us in terms and quality and extension of our lives.

I don't know how to farm, but Bob the farmer does.
I don't know how to program, but Bill the programmer does.
And I don't know how to do taxes, but Amy the accountant does.

Sadly, neither Bob, Bill, nor Amy want me to spend my time doing YouTube videos for them all day. BUT, if I convert my time into a universally accepted medium of exchange (called "money") which they can use to buy and purchase things they DO want, this allows us then to exchange our time.

So somebody pays me for my curse-laden wisdom. This transforms my time into money, and with this money I buy groceries from Farmer Bob who provides me his time in the form of said groceries.

There is one small minor problem.

Once you convert your time into money, into a physically tangible item, it can be stolen, take, "haircutted" or taxed away from you. And we all know how thieves and governments (but I repeat myself) love to take your money.

Now, in theory, there IS a difference between a government and a thief. A thief merely steals your money and provides nothing in return, thus the definition of theft. But a government TO THE PENNY should be provide you something in return.

What, you ask?

Well, public goods. Goods that directly benefit you.

Roads, defense, judicial system, laws, regulatory services, libraries, etc.

But there is ANOTHER "small problem." Democracy.

Since we live in a democracy, other people get to vote on how much the government takes of your time/money and where to spend it on. And since it is human nature to be immoral, lazy, greedy, and parasitic, the majority will vote to take your money and spend it NOT on public goods that benefit everybody, but them.

This, in it's more literal and linguistic definition can be called "legal theft." But it goes by the leftist euphemisms of "income transfers" or "wealth redistribution."

However, and let us be very clear and literal about this, this transfer of your time/money to other people with no compensation goes by another name - slavery.

Whether you like to admit it or not, whether you'd like to ignore this fact or not (as it will raise your ire) you are a slave to other people in this country. No different than the plantation slaves of the confederate South. No different than the slaves of the Caribbean trade during the 1700's. No different than the slaves of the Middle East (that academians and history revisionists seem to ignore). The only difference is that instead of being kept chained and on a plantation, you are tethered by law (which is enforced with jail time and guns), which (ironically) makes for an even more productive slave. You "think" you're "free" on account nobody is stopping you from going anywhere, but this serves to make you more productive, which generates for income for your slave masters.

Of course not all of your time is confiscated by the government. If they did that, then why work? Why not become a modern day slave master who parasites off of the productive and just collect a government check? But you are a slave to SOME LEVEL and the question is how much?

Thankfully, ole Cappy here has been blessed with SAEG (TM), and can tell you precisely what percent of your life is spent as a slave.

13 years.

The math, again, is quite simple and thus literal and irrefutable.

If you start working at 16 and retire at 65 that is a 49 year work history. The state, federal, and local governments tax us at a rate around 36% (using government spending as a percentage of GDP). However, not all of that money goes to public goods that you benefit from. Truthfully, 75% of it is income transfers to other people, ie- your masters. So if we take a 49 year work history, multiply it by .36, and multiply that by .75 you see that you spend working for other people.

13 years

Now I know the leftist argument that is coming. That this money goes to help "the poor," the "disadvantaged," the "under privileged," and "the children" and every other group of sops the left bribes with your money. But even if I thought these groups of people were truly disadvantaged and deserved the income transfers, it doesn't change the relational fact that these people are parasitic. And in them being parasitic, they are by default making you slaves to them for 13 years of your working life.

The point I'm trying to make is not one of whether there should be a safety net or we should spend money on the poor. It is to clearly identify and explain what is going on - that those who collect a government check are parasitic and should be THANKFUL for those who work extra to ~~bail them out of their stupid ass life decisions~~ support them. They should be humbled that other people are sacrificing a percentage of their lives (13 years to be precise) so that they are shielded from the consequences of their mistakes. They should be grateful so many millions of Americans are working damn well near a quarter of their working lives for others.

Alas, because of human nature, the opposite is true. These parasites are ungrateful, even entitled, demanding more and more, 100% incapable of humility, gratitude, humbleness, and thanks. All they can see is that those who worked harder and didn't make decisions that required a parasitic existence have "more" than they do and instead of looking into the mirror and accepting responsibility, they merely vote in more.

Many of you ask why I'm such a hard ass or such an "asshole" when it comes to helping out the poor.

I merely ask you why you aren't.

---

http://aaron-clarey.podomatic.com/
http://www.assholeconsulting.com
https://www.youtube.com/user/AaronClarey
https://twitter.com/aaron_clarey
http://www.amazon.com/Aaron-Clarey/e/B00J1ZC350/

The Man from UNCLE and Racism

July 24, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Interviewed by Kerry Lutz this week and we talked about the irony of being called racist for trying to help blacks, plus our anticipation of the new movie "The Man from UNCLE"

The Sanctuary Where Men Fleeing Feminist Churches Have Gone

July 27, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

My latest piece from Return of Kings that, in particular, would interest Christian (and other religious) men who are sick of their religion becoming feminist and leftist.

The "Knowledgesphere."

Your "Internet Boyfriend" is Not a Real Boyfriend

July 27, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

No, you don't have a "boyfriend in Italy."

What Cecil the Lion Tells Us About America

July 29, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Cecil, the famous 13 year old lion, who was shot (which increasingly seems to be) illegally has made the news across the planet. As more and more facts comes in it looks like the hunter, Walter Palmer, shot him illegally (though whether he did this knowingly is yet to be determined).

When the news broke and when I read the article, it seemed to me that once again the MSM was going to run with this story and the facts be damned. There were statements made to villainize Dr. Palmer, but nothing confirmed for a fact.

"They lured the lion off of the reservation!" - Is that illegal?
"He paid $50,000 to hunt the lion!!!!" - Don't you usually have to pay a lot of money for safaris?
"You can't shoot a tagged lion!!!" - Really? How do you know?

There were others, but my interest was piqued when nearly the entire planet decided to post his personal information online and protest at his house, many people making death threats. And so naturally like any agitating realistic and principled person I went online, made a YouTube video and told people to stop being sheeple and think about how the media is potentially ruining an innocent man's life all to boost ratings.

Teh interwebz were having none of it.

Now, Dr. Palmer wasn't the only one getting death threats, but so was I. And this of course, bathed in an endless list of brilliant and cogent arguments presented by the YouTube community about me "being a dumbass" or "a stupid fucker" and other arguments of intelligence, thought, and ponderance proving the quality of education the Millennial generation is receiving in college. But it wasn't the death threats or names that forced me to pull the video (that comes with the territory), it was when they started posting the private data of Dr. Palmer that I now had a legal risk. And so unfortunately the video had to come down.

Still, we don't need the video to realize a very important and vital lesson about the mental faculties of your average American. And that lesson is they are no longer capable of logic, reason, empiricism or sanity. Worse, they're so selfish and narcissistic, they happily put their emotions over principles and the rights of others. With no proof (at that point in time) that Dr. Palmer was guilty of violating any law people were already threatening to kill him, ruin his career, and ruin his life. Some were so far gone they said they didn't care about the legality of his kill, they just thought he should be punished for hunting. And it is this principleless, amoral, mindless mob who put their emotions over, not just an individual's rights, but reality, facts, and truth that not only makes it difficult for the legal system to mete out justice, but is undermining our respective societies today.

The real story is not that poor Cecil was tragically shot. It's that western civilization, specifically the younger generations, have lost their collective minds and do not have the mental faculties to be adults, let alone adults in the free world. They are effectively zombies. And there is no reasoning with them.

Plan accordingly.

---

http://aaron-clarey.podomatic.com/
http://www.assholeconsulting.com
https://www.youtube.com/user/AaronClarey
https://twitter.com/aaron_clarey
http://www.amazon.com/Aaron-Clarey/e/B00J1ZC350/

Ivy League Losing Its Luster?

July 29, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

In the end, reality wins. No matter how rich or connected your parents.

Escaping the Insanity

July 31, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

With the outright stupidity (and the implications of having a feral, mindless, zombie society) I decided to load up the car and head out west. Within 2 hours of being in the Black Hills, all the strife and anger went away, and I did not see one SJW or frothing aged 40 something feminist at all. Here is what I saw:

Just remember not to let them or the insanity get you down, and to enjoy the decline.

There Is No Stock Market, Just a Dump for Central Bank Money

August 1, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

I love it. A company posts earnings that dropped 9.3% over the quarter, BUT...

the stock jumps 11%.

No, there's no stock market bubble here.

My Latest Defense for Carrying a Gun

August 1, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

I once had a middle aged elitist woman in a snobby suburb come up to me and ask me why I was carrying a gun. I didn't realize it at the time, but she was one these psycho crusaderists who got off on having the rare opportunity to "display her wisdom and superiority" by trying to stump me with her "impervious" leftist logic.

Thinking she was genuinely interested I said, "In case I have to shoot somebody."

She then followed up, "But when would you ever have to shoot someone?"

I said, "At work. I'm on call for security."

She then stepped back, said, "Oh, well thank you for your service." and left.

It seemed odd, but once I had the hindsight to figure out what had transpired, I got pissed because it was just another worthless human being desperate to lecture somebody to validate her meaningless life.

So now, to prevent that from ever happening again, this is my response.

Xenosystems

August 2, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

New blog added to the blogroll.

You may also be asking, "Hey Clarey, are the posts a little less meaty and kind of more linky?"

Yes, yes they are. I'm traveling. It's summer. And the audio is probably going to suck for this week's podcast because I left the mic at home. WHICH, if you haven't already, start downloading the podcasts because I think two more episodes and I'm archiving episodes 1-100 to free up space on the server. After that I'm charging $40 if you wanted the archives mailed to you on thumbdrive.

Mt. Bierstadt, 14,065 Feet

August 3, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Happy Day Lieutenants! The ole Captain climbed his first 14,000 ft peak, Mt. Bierstadt.

The Return of Cappy Linkage

August 4, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Yes, it's because of "Evil Republicans" that your tuition is so high. Not worthless, bloated, leftist burueacracy.

This is what happens when you can't do math, no matter how pretty you are and how socialist you are.

Dr. Helen suggests a book I may have to look at later.

The "Structure and Genius of ISIS"

This is why I respect engineers infinitely more than their sociologist counterparts.

Chris Bechtloff is HILARIOUS and on fire in his latest podcast. Warning, incredibly foul (but hilarious) statements, some I don't even agree with, but was just rolling.

Posts, podcasts, and general vitriol will return to normal levels since I have returned.

ALSO PODCAST NOTE - Seems EVERYBODY did follow my advice and start downloading the podcasts in anticipation of me archiving them. However, we ate up my monthly allotment of bandwidth (which is pretty awesome). I think it reset on the 8-1-15, so you can continue downloading, but I wanted to say thank you, I'm now ranked consistently (albeit artificially) #1 or #2 in Podomatic's ranking for conservative radio.

Huntington Park, Democrats, and Illegal Immigration

August 4, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

A question democrats who are AGAINST illegal immigration have to ask themselves is if we're not going to bother defending the sovereignty of this nation, then why have a nation at all?

Never mind, just enjoy the decline.

Episode #104 - "Summer Vacation Bible School" Special!

August 5, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Sleeping in your car
Hiking 14,000 foot mountains
What would Davis Aurini do with $1.2 billion?
Gen X Parents force marching their children up mountains
Mission Impossible Rogue Nation review
Back to School sales are child abuse
School is child abuse
Summer Vacation Bible School is DEFINITELY abuse

AND MORE!

In THIS EPISODE of The Clarey Podcast!

Guns Are Bad, mmmKay?

August 6, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Wednesday "Where's My Boxer Shorts" Linkage

August 6, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Cavaricci Jeans Theory

Socialism, what a great idea.

Yeah, keep getting lippy with your "$15 Minimum Wage" demands.

None of this will matter on account an increasing percentage of people merely fake having a mental illness to collect a government check.

Our streets may not be paved with gold, but they are paved with government checks and immigrants don't care about the difference.

Good news! I am one of the writers for the Canadian flagship blog Rebel Media's "Megaphone."

There are No More Calvins

August 6, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

It was within a very short period of time I knew that school, and teachers, were evil.

Oh laugh as you might, but I am not joking. There is no more evil institution in this country than the veritable prison we condemn our children to for a mandatory 13 year sentence. Yes we all turn a blind eye claiming it for "education" and the "future" of our children. But in the end the education system's real purpose is two fold:

1. To outsource children to a large baby sitting operation so (predominantly) women can pursue a career instead of raise their children and

2. Employ generations' worth of talentless, lazy hacks who want an easy way out, 3 months a year off, and are scared stiff of real work - teachers (and the increasing number of administrators).

This is not politics.
This is not hyperbole.
This is not me angry over a lost childhood.

It is the truth.

School is nothing more than child abuse as two distinct groups of adults are using it for ulterior purposes.

Naturally there are some "good teachers," and these teachers believe in education, try their best to educate the children, and genuinely want what's best for them. However, the remaining 98% of teachers are not "good teachers" and are there first and foremost for themselves.

This results in an environment that is toxic for children, and certainly not one that can achieve education. Year after year, children are forced to leave home and sit in buildings that are architecturally similar to prisons. The teachers (who by the way have the lowest IQ's out of most majors) are not only uninspired to teach them, but really don't care. Alas, overtime this combination results in teachers who are not just incapable of teaching, educating, and inspiring the curiosity of young children, but teachers who grow to resent the children, resulting in indifference (reading from the book), if not outright petty and indiscriminate punishment. Sure enough, over time a child goes from being wide-eyed and hopeful kindergartener, to a 4th grade zombie trying to stay awake.

Of course, children may not understand the underlying political reasons why they're sent to a prison-like institution and the country's least competent or caring individuals are chartered with educating them. But they do have genetically programmed within them self-respect and intuitively know when they're getting screwed. Alas a natural animosity forms between students and their prison guard teachers. A healthy distrust between teacher and student. And soon in a very Calvin and Hobbes like way, students and teachers fall into their natural roles of sworn enemies.

Or at least that's how it was in the 80's.

For whereas back in the day this abuse galvanized us into distrusting our teachers, even hating them, the same cannot be said of young students today. For what I see now is NOT the independent minded spirit of a Calvin, questioning why he has to be in school, giving his teachers guff, fighting them at every corner, but instead mindless, conforming lemmings who have plain had the independent thought kicked out of them.

Now this could be due to any number of things.

Teachers becoming BFF's with their students instead of actually teaching (not that they could in the first place anyway)
Ritalin and other drugs destroying the Calvin's of the world making them docile and compliant.
Emasculated husbands breeding emasculated, testosterone deficient boys.
Or the forcing of young female behavior on young boys, turning today's classrooms into compliant, obedient classrooms full of sheeple (and consequently no independent, self-respecting thinkers).

But whatever the cause, there are no more Calvins. There are no more rebels. There are no more independent minded thinkers. And it is a devastation to society.

The reason can be amply seen in what I deem to be the first fully and completely brainwashed generation - The Millennials.

Nowhere can you find a group of people who adamantly insist they are independent minded, but are the epitome of conformist at the same time.

The Millennials all rush to sport hipster fashion to prove their independence...only to look like uniformly interchangeable cattle in the coffee shop.

They all claim to be smart, going to college, getting even MORE education...only to major in the same worthless liberal arts drivel, obviously unable to the 4th grade math that would have avoided this consequential financial fate of such stupidity.

Hey, those tattoos and earplugs are like TOTALLY you giving the bird to the system man! Only to sheepishly get the surgery done to remove them.

And oh yes, politics. The most "independent minded" and "educated" generation ALL, like lemmings, voted TWICE for a man who just mortgaged their futures with incredible peacetime deficit spending. And they were either too stupid, or too lazy to know it.

There are other examples (global warming, privilege, triggers, white males, and "evil corporations maaaan") and CERTAINLY the Millennials are not the only generation to be duped into conformity (grunge in the 90's anyone?), but the larger point is the one thing they claim to be is what they are precisely not.

Independent thinkers.

For while people may claim to be "rebels" or "Calvins" or "SJW/OWS Warriors" fighting against the "system" they don't realize they are 100%, completely owned, programmed, duped and operated by the system.

They actually BELIEVED their teachers.
They actually are BFF's with their teachers.
They not only have no problems going to a veritable prison from 5-18, but then are so hopelessly conformist, they consciously BORROW life-crippling levels of debt to to attend an additional 4-6 years more of the same educational-indoctrinist slop.

They swallowed whole what their government-sponsored teacher-indoctrinators told them and are just too stupid (or brainwashed) to realize it.

Sadly, this has serious costs and consequences to society because without independent thinkers, without genuine Calvins, there are no innovators. There are no creators. There are no geniuses who can look outside the box and come up the next cure for cancer. Technological advancement and economic growth will slow, resulting in lower standards of living than what we could have had. But worse, with nothing but a bunch of conforming sheeple, the "system" can easily manipulate, control, and own society. And that has always been the goal of the leftist education system.

Of course, try telling that to the "independent minded" tatted up, earloop wearing, liberal-arts-majoring "intellectual giants" who vote to mortgage their own futures while all claiming to be Calvins.

Why Can't I Find a Maaaaaan????

August 7, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

I'm going to leave this post up here for several important reasons.

1. To remind everyone that discrimination against males (and whites) exists and that it is not a "joke" or conspiracy theory.
2. To remind you ladies that you have a choice. Like men or hate them. Very simple.
3. To remind you men that it is not worth risking your life, labor, capital or time helping or aiding stranger women you don't know, and that you should ONLY help women in your life you love and cherish. No one else.
4. To remind women who were either like these women in your youth or are like them today so when they ask "where have all the good men gone" they'll have an answer.
5. To remind young college age and 20 something men that, no, there's nothing wrong with you. It's really them.

and finally

6. To remind men that leftists, democrats, and socialists hate you.

Story here.

The Beauty of Having No Employees

August 7, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Outstanding article about just what a pain in the ass it is having employees.

I'll say it again.

Humans are the number one cause of all problems in this world. And you do NOT want a business model that requires a lot of them. They break down, they whine, they complain, they sue, and they just plain suck.

Employ no one, unless you absolutely have to, and even then, you likely have the wrong business model.

The Clarey Podcast Has Been Archived

August 8, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Greetings All,

Well, seems we blew through bandwidth quicker and sooner than I thought and so I decided to archive episodes #25-99.

"WHAT HAPPENED TO EPISODES 1-24 CAPPY?"

They're gone, don't know. Don't ask. And don't complain if they're not on the thumbdrives because I can't find them. Maybe at some point in the future I'll dig them up.

Regardless, NOW if you want the archived episodes you will need to pay. I will burn them to a thumbdrive and mail them to you.

If you live in the US the cost is $40.
If you live in the UK the cost is $50.
If you live somewhere else we'll have to play it by ear.

I'm not trying to gouge anybody, just compensating me for my time, postage, and thumbdrive expense.

Anyway, if you wanted one, please send me an e-mail at CAPTcapitalism at yahoo (which is the same e-mail in my "about" section below). Send me your name and mailing address and I will give you instructions on where to pay. And remember, not only will you get some super awesome podcasts, you'll get a free thumbdrive out of the deal too.

Best,

Cappy

Midnight Run Comedy

August 10, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

NSFW but funny as hell if you've seen the movie:

How Socialism Makes Women Barren

August 10, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Arrogance and cockiness set aside, I would make an awesome dad. I did not forget what it was like to be a child. I know that once I had a child my life would be put on hold and dedicated towards raising "The Spawn of Clarey." I would not brainwash him to be a leftist, a feminist, a rightist or a Christian, but would instead impart upon it logic, empiricism, morality, philosophy, and independence letting it choose its own path in life. And above all else, unlike nearly all my Gen X parental counterparts, I would actually stay at home to raise The Clarey Child instead of outsource it to a government baby sitting farm or "day care" ~~concentration camp~~ facility. It is without a doubt that I would make a great dad.

The irony of course is that this entire discussion is moot since I had a vasectomy 10 years ago. And while the reasons for having a vasectomy was many, the primary one was that I just could not plain support a child, let alone myself. And bringing a child into this world would not only ruin what pathetic finances I had in the past, but would just not be fair to the theoretical Clarey Spawn.

Of course times change and now at the age of 40 I could theoretically afford a child. I work from home, I have a (albeit small) house. And my source of employment is stable (self employment) guaranteeing the income to put food on the table and pay the mortgage. But though this situation is specific to myself the question everybody should be asking as it applies to millions more is

"40?"

Think about it for a second. Biology and nature says I've been ready to have a child for about the past 28 years. Society, tradition, and law says I should have been able to have a child since I was 18. But why, a full 28 years after I'm able to, and 22 years after society says I "should" have children, is it now that I actually COULD have children?

The answer is economics.

I've pointed it out before, but there is a disconnect between human biology and our current political-economic system. Specifically, today's political-economic structure does NOT allow people to breed when nature is telling them they should. I first was MANDATED to go to school till the age of 18. This was largely a pointless exercise in that nobody today will hire a high school graduate, let alone pay one an adequate salary to raise a family on. This then mandated I go to college for an additional 4 years. Of course, this dumped me into a labor market that would be ravaged by the Dotcom crash and I would limp along employment wise eeking out a meager living teaching dance and working security for the next five years. There was hope working in the banking industry, but this hope was quickly dashed as it was so hopelessly corrupt and dysfunctional (not to mention low paying) that the income security needed to raise a child was never there. Throw in the financial crisis, the housing crash, and the Obama economy, and it wasn't until this Earth made 40 orbits around the sun that I would be in a position to support another human being in this world.

Of course, as mentioned before, this discussion is merely academic. But the point I'm making is that our society, economy, educational system, labor market, government, and employers are making it increasingly difficult, if not impossible to PROPERLY raise a family (and by "properly" I mean the 1950's way, not the ghetto culture, Wyoming way where women spread their legs and ask the government to replace the daddy). And this is sad for it is other humans that is the most important thing in life, and it is usually your spouse and your children that are the most important humans.

Now I can sit here and pontificate arrogantly and cockily because I have no skin in the game. Not only can I "not" have children, I still to this day definitely do not WANT them. But, even with a vasectomy if I wanted to I could still HAVE children. It would require either a direct extraction of sperm from the testes or a reversal of my surgery. But the REAL reason I can take this position is that my sperm does not have an expiration date. My sperm can impregnate any woman from here until I'm dead, carrying on the "great Clarey genetic legacy" if I so chose to.

But the same cannot be said for women.

Naturally, we all know by now that women's eggs have an expiration date. Menopause hits by a certain age, and even then the eggs start to deteriorate in quality post 30-32 running the risk of birth defects etc. We don't need to hammer this point anymore, we are all aware of it. But while women are acutely aware of the tickity tock of their biological clock, what they are completely unaware of is the non-biological side of this formula that is also working against them. Namely the same economic, political, and sociological forces that made it impossible for me to have children until the age of 40. And while that number, 40, may mean nothing to men, it definitely means something to women.

After 40, frankly, forget it ladies. It's over. You're not having kids. And if you try, you're gambling not just with your theoretical child's life, but your own. But before you get all angry at me for being the messenger telling you biological truths, you need to look back and ask who and what made it so it was basically impossible for you to have children and raise a family in today's society.

First there was the same mandatory K-12 education I had to take. In all honesty the average education delivered by the K-12 system could be shrunk down easily to K-8, allowing us an addtional 4 years of youth to pursue a career that would support a family. But who do you think is at the core of stretching out this now-economically worthless education to last 13 years?

Republicans?
Tories?
Conservatives?
The Patriarchy?

No, it's your good socialist friends in the democrat and labor parties who need to ~~live off of your entire childhood~~ mandate you go to school until you're an adult so their main political contributors (teachers unions) have jobs. You're now 18.

Then there's college. Remember, K-12 education has been so diluted, so dumbed down, NOBODY will hire you. So now you need to spend another 4, more likely 6 years of your youth getting MORE education.

Who predominantly controls acaedemia and benefits from you postponing your life another 4-6 years?

Leftists. You're now 24.

Of course, unlike the first "13 years" of your education, you get to pay an egregious price for your last 6 years of education - tuition. And with that comes an inordinate amount of student debt. Certainly you can't start having a family until you pay this off. But complicating this issue is that the economy hasn't been growing this slow since the Great Depression, making good paying jobs scarce, and your student loans a monkey on your back for at least 6 years.

But who told you you needed to go to college? Who pushed you to get a masters? And who told you to vote against those "evil" corporations, rich people, investors, and all those other entities that create those JOBS you'd need to pay off your student loans?

Hmmm...that would be leftists. Congratulations, you're now 30.

Now here things are a little different, for while at this age men are FINALLY allowed to start working off their student loans, start a real career, and maybe work up a down payment for a house, women are barraged with propaganda to do something else. Namely, what feminists have been telling them to do for their entire post-pubescent lives - live life, party, you go girl (TM), travel, climb that corporate ladder, have it all, etc., etc., etc.

And so do women starve themselves, live in basements, get out of debt, and start looking for a proper suitor to raise a family with?

Hell no!

NOW it's time to PAAAARTAAAY!!!!!

Let the flirtini's flow, the car payments commence, and the accumulation of shoes begin as you store it all in an overpriced downtown flat you can barely afford! You've EARNED IT GIRLFRIEND!

And so prompted by feminism (not to mention corporate interests of the likes of Vogue, Oprah, etc.) you party another 10 years.

But if I recall correctly aren't Oprah, Jezebel, feminism, and all those writers at all those snarkey cheeky lifestyle magazines are leftist? Congratulations, you're now 40 (but don't worry, you're a "cougar!")

And finally, how can we forget the final nail in your eggs' coffin driven in by feminism? The blatant, bald-faced lie that looks don't matter.

You were GORGEOUS just the way you were girl!
You are BODY POSITIVE!!!!
Big is beautiful!!!
And any man has mommy issues if he doesn't want to sleep with a human oil tanker.
He's also "shallow" and a "jerk."

Of course looks do matter, tremendously, to men. But alas, you wanted to believe sweet lies over harsh truth and lived a lie your entire life, making you not only too old to have children, but physically unable to attract a mate. So super-congratulations! You believed the (again, LEFTIST ideology of) feminism and have now not only ruined any chance of having a family, but attracting a mate as well.

I could go on, but the larger point I want all women to understand is that it is NOT

The "Patriarchy"
The Republican's "War on Women"
"Lad culture"
"Rape culture"
"White Males" or
"Evil Corporations"

who are ruining your lives.

It's the left.

It is the left who wants to enslave you at a school where you learn nothing till you're 18.
It is the left who mandates you into thinking you need a college education to have any worth in this society.
It is the left that tells you you are oppressed and need to be freed, replacing your family with a career.
It is the left that convinces you to ignore the biological programming and demands of the (necessary) half of humanity needed to bring and raise children in this world.
And it is the left that tells you you need to spend money on stupid crap to have fulfillment in life.

In reality, all they are doing is taking your money,

your youth,
your vote,
your love,
your family, and your life

just so they can stay in power and enrich themselves. And once they have sucked as much of your financial and life blood out of you, they will dump your ass into the real world. A world you are WOEFULLY unprepared for, and one you offer nothing of value to.

So please wake up and take the time to identify who your true enemies are. If not, enjoy your masters degree, cats, body-positive "slut walks," and articles about freezing your eggs.

---

http://aaron-clarey.podomatic.com/
http://www.assholeconsulting.com
https://www.youtube.com/user/AaronClarey
https://twitter.com/aaron_clarey
http://www.amazon.com/Aaron-Clarey/e/B00J1ZC350/

Were the Nazi's Socialist? Why Not Ask Them?

August 11, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

From our Agent in the Field (who makes the simple point of "why not go to the source to see if the Nazi's were socialists?")

I saw your article asking about National Socialism and am sending the above link.

The above link is to one of many English translations of the Party Platform of the Nazi party. Once you get to around paragraph 11. you start to see, from the original source document, that especially for the times in question, they were a brand of socialism. I would suggest you simply look for the Nazi Party Platform on your search engine to get other translations of the original source document if you are interested.

To the extent practical politics deviated from party platform, this is a common occurrence in modern times and one suspects it was no different then. Compared to USA at the time, which had no federal minimum wage/ maximum hours laws, no unemployment insurance, no social security, no federal pension laws, no federal welfare benefits, and so forth, these proposals would have seemed far reaching, national and socialist at the time.

Obviously, I understand you are not in favor of this group, its history, and personalities; and I am not a fan either. I hope you find this interesting and a good place to start, in answering your question about the brand of socialism, if any, there was in Nazi Germany.

A Masters in Male Studies

August 11, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

A professor wants to start an entirely new (and worthless) study - Men's Studies.

The problem is it already exists. It's called "history."

A New Breed of Man SJW's Can't Beat

August 12, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

In the spirit of full disclose I must admit that:

1. I know Roosh and
2. I am an occasional guest writer for his site Return of Kings.

Having said that neither my personal nor professional relation with Roosh will affect nor color my analysis of his Canadian trip and the SJW drama that has ensued. The reason why is simple - his actions and experiences in Canada speak for themselves and tell a story that needs no editorializing.

As this post is being written Roosh has completed one of two Canadian speeches in his world speaking tour. The first speech (Montreal) was threatened by some SJW's, notably one who set up a petition to prevent him from even entering Canada, while another (Jessica Lelievre, the epitome of "spoiled brat rich daddy's girl") harassed him in public by dousing him in liquor (and foolishly filming it which has resulted in a lawsuit).

Now I can go on, and certainly the media will cover Roosh's travels through Canada and the SJW circus that will come with it. But instead of chronicling what's happened and then make some obvious observations about the mentally-ill culture of SJW's, I wanted to explain

1. Why this time it will be different
2. Why it is because of qualities and traits of men like Roosh that will make it different and
3. Why the SJW's will lose

What SJW's, leftists, socialists, and other vermin of society are used to is a tired, old, and worn out tactic of silencing somebody they disagree with or threatens to expose them for the parasites they are by accusing them of an "ism" (racism, sexism, ageism, etc.), which in turn then threatens that individual's career and thus livelihood. Mozilla firing Brendan Eich, Dr. Palmer's shooting of Cecil, doxxing and SWATing, even I've had people try to tell my clients I wrote "mean racist things."

Though dishonest, cowardly and tiresome, this tactic works and is highly effective. In threatening and holding hostage an individual's career and reputation, they also threaten that individual, his life, and his family. Alas, they can essentially shut down any social or political commentary from the productive classes, leaving only leftist, SJW and politically approved socialist thought in the public forum.

However, this tactic only works if there is something of value to hold hostage over the person saying things SJW's find disagreeable.

A dentist with a career.
An accountant with a family.
A professor with a 20 year track record.

But what the SJW's and leftists don't realize is that while they may find the world to be such a place of injustice and they "still have a long way to go," their leftist predecessors have made great strides in the past. They have managed to stagnate the economy. They have managed to create an education bubble. They have managed to destroy the labor market for young people. And, above all else, feminists have largely been successful in destroying young women for young men.

And it is from this environment a new strain of men have arisen. A strain of men immune to all SJW's tactics.

Take a look at Roosh and his background and you'll see a man who has nothing to lose, and therefore nothing the SJW's can threaten.

He tried (like all of us) to "do what was right." He went to college, tried his hand at a soul sucking job, and when his employer found out he was blogging under a pen name, they still threatened him with being fired. This not being exactly conducive to having the "freedom of speech" and with no real job prospects that were promised to him like the 1950's, he went on a South American trip which laid the foundation for what would be his career - traveling to different countries and then writing about how to get laid in these countries.

Of course, while that sounds great it wasn't easy. Traveling on buses in South America, constantly going to clubs, learning new languages, and the meticulous level of detail he had to take in terms of notes and writing made it a real (albeit exciting) job. But the larger point is that SJW's, socialism, leftism and feminism had made the US so hostile, if not impossible for the "9-5 job and wife with children and a white picket fence," he was practically compelled to go down this route of self-employment.

But what is doubly ironic is how precisely he makes his money. Most entrepreneurs can still be threatened by SJW's. The cupcake shop that doesn't make cupcakes for lesbians. The pizzeria that theoretically would not deliver pizzas to a gay wedding. They have a product that can still be assailed, assaulted, held hostage, and destroyed.

But what if your job is merely countering the political, economic, social, and psychological environment SJW's created? What if your job is to unplug as many Neo's out of "the Matrix?" What if your job is nothing more than being an SJW hunter? This is why Roosh is simply immune to any SJW's attacks. It's because he not only has nothing they can threaten or take hostage, but because his business is a direct result and response to the environment SJW's and leftists have created.

Alas, this is why Roosh is invincible against the SJW's and there's no way they can win. Unlike Mortimer Snerd, loyal accountant at KMPG for 30 years, with a mortgage, two car loans, a wife about to divorce him, and three kids in college, they cannot threaten Roosh's career or family as it doesn't exist. Worse for them, the more they attack, the more publicity he gets AND the more they get exposed for the psychopath, tyrants they are.

But what's worse for SJW's is there's (what I would estimate to be) millions more Rooshes with absolutely nothing to lose. Men who grew up in and are by products of the SJW/feminist culture, and are thus immune to it. My company, Asshole Consulting, NEEDS feminist, SJW culture to continue to brainwash young men and women into delusion otherwise I'd run out of clients. Jack Donovan NEEDS SJW's to continue to emasculate young boys otherwise nobody would need his books on masculinity. And that's just the tip of the iceberg when it has come to what is nothing more than a full-fledge industry of neo-masculinity that has arisen in the past decade to deprogram, explain, provide sanity to, and provide agency and purpose to MILLIONS of young men (and women) who are slowly waking up and realizing just how badly feminism, socialism, and their goose-stepping SJW's have ruined their lives.

What SJW's around the world need to realize is that Canada is just the first instance where SJW's have met a monster of their own creation in the form of Roosh. And not only can he not be stopped, but there are millions more who also have nothing to lose, are immune to you, and are very, very angry that you not only lied to them about the real world, but destroyed their birthright to western civilization.

And there's nothing you can do to stop them.

Additional Gun Laws I Will Not Be Following

August 13, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

You always carry in National Parks. Even if the burnt out hippie woman park ranger from the 1960's tells you not to. You always carry in the National Parks.

Students Now PAYING to Intern

August 13, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Remember, there's no education bubble here!

Help Our Sponsor!

August 14, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Howdy All,

Wanted to make sure I made a specific post here for Good Looking Loser who has a product called Phenibut that he is marketing. It is an anti-anxiety supplement that calms you down WITHOUT THE USE OF BOOZE. So if you're one of those people who needs a drink to relax, but you want to stop drinking, this here is what you may want to try.

Haven't tried it myself because I am always very calm and relaxed and never agitated at the slightest thing.

Regardless, if you think you could use Phenibut OR you want to visit his site (which has merits unto itself) consider visiting the Good Looking Loser.

Cappy

Late Night Listening with Your Local Podcasters

August 14, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

New podcast out by Davis, but I love how the SJW's are downvoting his podcast. If you want to do him a solid, stop on over, download it, and then upvote it.

Bernard also has a new podcast out over at Male Defender.

Bill Burr has his Thursday Afternoon Monday Morning Podcast.

And DT and the Man...well, they're recording now, but you can check in and maybe they'll have their Thursday night podcast up later.

Episode #105 of The Clarey Podcast 8-14-15

August 14, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Whining about driving in a Corvette
"There's always a gun on my desk"
Capitalism vs. Socialism in terms of Logical Proofs
Running to the airport makes you manly
Coke commercials and the sheeple
Cappy's Global Domination (and world's first trillionaire) Plan
The Goldfinger theme song to be redone as "Cappyfinger"
60 years of the same medicine has not helped the black community

AND MORE

in THIS EPISODE of The Clarey Podcast!

Privatizing Governments

August 15, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Got a couple inquiries about this since I mentioned it on the podcast. Basically, this was a business proposal that I turned into a kindle only short dowloadable "proposal." You can't call it a "book" because it is not.

Still, some people were intellectually interested in how one could go about privatizing governments and not only did I find a (of course, theoretical) way to do it, but a way to profit into the trillions of dollars' worth in the process.

I DID approach several investment banks and even Peter Thiel, but nobody was interested.

BUT! If you got the connections (or are just intellectually curious how a private government would work) here you go.

The Megyn Kelly Effect

August 16, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Howdy All,

The ole Captain is intending to do some research, but needs some data points. Specifically, I need a list of women on teh interwebz who have either a YouTube channel or Twitter account where I can see NUMERICALLY how many "subscribers" or "followers" they have. However, they also have to be:

1. Conservative/Libertarian.
2. Decent looking

I am already aware of Julie Borowski, Katie Kieffer, etc., but aside from those two not much else.

If you could list some women below in the comments section who are on the Twitter or YouTube that are these cutsie "Tee Hee! I'm a Soccer Mom and I Like Sean Hannity! Yea for America!" types, I would greatly appreciate it.

Cappy

Boys, You NEVER Date Girls in Cosmetology School

August 16, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Don't know how this one slipped under the radar:

Proof Young Ole Cappy Had a Heart

August 17, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

A friend of mine started posting pictures from a NYE 2000 party I was graciously invited to. This was of course 15 years ago and in 15 years your forget a little bit of who you were, what you were, and start to question the beliefs you hold today.

This is of concern to me as it makes me think…

"Was it really that bad?"
"Did I really play my cards right?"
"Perhaps I screwed up and I've been wrong this entire time?"

In short, I question myself and my actions in the past as any erroneous thought back then would lead to an ill-informed and erroneous philosophy today.

Perhaps I was in the wrong.
Perhaps I didn't play my cards right.
Perhaps I was indeed a loser and just didn't realize it till now.

But then I saw this picture and one thing jumped out at me and consequently jumped my memory.

Her corsage.

I remember back when I was young I would buy my dates corsages if I liked them in particular and made it to the 3rd or 4th date. I would also take them out on dates that would warrant a corsage and my usage of a tuxedo. In this particular instance I remember BEING EMBARRASSED because my date had no straps on her dress and we had to pin her corsage to her side. But I still had the consideration to purchase her a corsage.

Now, I ask you this ladies.

When's the last time a guy bought you a corsage for a date?

That's right. NEVER.

So in hindsight, and with the use of this picture, I don't ever want to hear American women again about "where the good men are" or "why can't they find a man," because I have empirical proof they did exist, even if they themselves forgot about it. You shot them down, you fucked them over, you stood them up, so much so the entire CONCEPT of buying a date a corsage was not only abandoned but completely forgotten that it ever took place in a man's life.

So, in summary,

Fuck you
Fuck you
Fuck you

You enjoy that decline ladies. You've earned it.

Precisely How Much Silver Do You Need Post-Collapse?

August 18, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

A concept I try to explain to either friends, clients, family members, or random hot chicks I try to seduce with my awesome economic knowledge on the street is that you don't need "that much" silver in order to hedge against an economic collapse.

The logic is simple.

If there was an economic collapse, all fiat currencies (ie - all major world currencies) would become worthless and an alternative currency (nearly practically guaranteed to be precious metals) would HAVE TO rise to replace them. This "last currency standing" would be the default world reserve currency and it's supply would then have to (by necessity) purchase all of the "post-economic collapse" world's GDP. And though that GDP would be less, there is far less precious metals in circulation to purchase said remaining GDP. This increase in the ratio of "production to currency" would increase the value of the world's supply of precious metals and is why you don't need "$1 million in silver" to insure $1 million today's assets.

Of course, this logic does not translate into precise mathematical figures and still leaves open the question,

"Well, if I have $500,000 in assets today, how much silver (or gold) would I need to purchase to effectively insure against an economic collapse?"

So I looked into it and though the numbers are of course VERY back-of-napkin, I think I've come up with a pretty good rule of thumb most people can operate by.

Assume first, that during an economic collapse the world's GDP would shrink by 80%. This would leave only $15 trillion left of the world's current $74 trillion in GDP in annual economic production.

Assume second, that the current world supply of silver of 1.4 million tons does not dramatically change AND that it is preferred over gold as gold is too precious (I know this is not a valid assumption, but just work with me on the math). When converted to ounces this results in 44.8 million ounces of silver, the effective world's money supply to purchase said annual post-economic collapse production of $15 trillion.

Using simple division we get a value of $330.36 per ounce.

As I write this right now, the spot price of silver is $15.10 per ounce. So buying one ounce of silver today would buy (under a post-economic collapse economy) $330.36 tomorrow. Essentially a ratio of 22 to 1.

Of course, this does not speak to the fact that the world's remaining silver supply would not just buy one year's worth of post-apocalyptic world's GDP. It would buy the world's GDP into the future until an alternative currency would replace it. Ergo, if one wanted to be mathematically "correct" about it, you would take the NPV of that ounce of silver's purchasing power. Here it's anybody's guess as to the "discount rate" one would use in a perpetuity calculation (don't worry if you didn't understand that, it's to get the finance nerd-technicalitists off my ass). But applying a heavily discounted rate of 30% that would imply a purchasing power in today's dollars of $1,100. A full ratio of 73.

Meaning for every $1 in silver you buy today you would have a theoretical insurance of $73 in a post-economic collapse future.

Now naturally silver will not be the sole currency left. And naturally the discount rate is not going to be 30%. And naturally, we don't know if global GDP would collapse by just 80%. But somewhere between a ratio of 22 and 73 is likely the value of "insurance" silver would provide in a post-economic collapse world.

I say, for the sake of simplicity, let's just take the average and call it 48.

So to translate all this economic mumbo jumbo into English for normal people, this is the take away:

If you have $500,000 in network and want to insure it against an economic collapse, Divide it by 48, and that's how much in silver you need to buy today.

Again, just a rough measure. But a measure most thinking folk should consider.

And always, remember, Enjoy the Decline!

The Escape Velocity of Poverty

August 18, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

This was for a client, but came out better than I thought it did and deemed it worth sharing. It addresses how you can be so poor you can't escape poverty, making it so ALL your decisions have to be made right and paid off. It also addresses the crippling depression many college graduates have due to no jobs and student loans. Finally, it revisits the "God Complex" I mentioned in my video about suicide.

Also, if anybody out there is willing to hire this guy or is in Pittsburg and can point him in the right direction, that would be great:

How Bernie Sanders Proves "Socialism" is No Longer a 4 Letter Word

August 18, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

A position I've held since I took my first college level economics course was that the democrat party was not functionally a political part that advocated democracy. It was, based on all measures, intents, and actions of its members a socialist party. Of course, I was laughed at when I said the democrats were socialists because "socialism" and "socialist" were pejoratives we reserved for the evil Soviet empire and communism during the 80's. However, there in my economics textbook, was statistics showing the government spending just shy of 35% GDP and the democrats were advocating for even MORE spending. This, combined with my independent mind, convinced me of precisely what the democrat party was.

The next twenty years passed by, and like Overton's Window, we've slowly, but surely moved more and more to the left. Also during this time my friends who once mocked and ridiculed me as "Oh crazy Clarey! You funny Republican you!" started having kids, jobs, and adult responsibilities. And soon I wasn't that "one crazy republican at the party, bringing the buzz down," but a respected economist that even my most ardent detractors of days past had to agree with.

So, as further proof that this country has moved to the left, and quite rapidly so allow me to point out a curious observation. Bernie Sander's poll numbers.

As it stands right now Bernie is the front runner for the democratic presidential nomination. Bernie as you know is an avowed socialist, replete with a lack of any real world private sector experience, 1960's hippie expertise, upper middle class upbringing, and an entire career as a soft-hands, work-free politician. However, what should be shocking to you is that a SOCIALIST, a person who advocates banishing private property, a person who wants to have the same economic system as the Soviets, Venezuela, Cuba, and Argentina, is so warmly welcomed by democrat voters.

This shift, though shocking, was entirely predictable. For while we were told and aware of the evils of socialism in the 1980's, nearly two new generations have since been brainwashed by the K-College government education system. Thus why we've gone from:

President Kennedy willing to go to war with the Soviets in 1962
To Ronald Reagan breaking their backs in 1985.
To Bill Clinton wetting the panties Gen X girls with his saxophone in 1992.
To Barack Obama wetting the panties of Millennial girls (and boys) with his government checks and nationalized health care in 2008 and 2012.

And now, so complete was this brainwashing of the younger generations, Bernie Sanders, an avowed socialist, is the front runner of the democrat party, even beating out Hillary Clinton, no rightist herself.

The larger point is to point out and tip my hat to the democrat party and their various leftist organizations. They have MASTERFULLY taken over the country's key institutions with the conscious and intended purpose of brainwashing America's youth to the point they are so naive and ignorant about history they have NO PROBLEMS voting for a socialist. It is a PR stunt no different than getting two generations to vote for nazis (who actually have a lesser track record of murdering innocents than socialism).

However, to all my friends who patted me on the head 20 years ago dismissing me as alarmist. And to those of you who voted for Bill Clinton or even Obama in 2008 because you thought they were "cool," I just want to say "I told you so."

Socialism is no longer a four letter word.

Enjoy the decline.

The Economics of Waifu

August 19, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

The world, I have concluded, will never cease to amaze me. And thus, once you get to that point you'll say, "nothing shocks me anymore." And so once again ole Cappy went head long, cluelessly into a whole new world where he learned about "Waifu."

If you don't know what "Waifu" is, that's alright. It means you're normal and frankly avoided a sad aspect of humanity. But while it originally meant "favorite female Japanese anime character," (and there's nothing wrong with that) it has also morphed in some circles to mean where men have actually formed imaginary relationships with these fictitious characters, some times even marrying them. This not only explains the inside joke on Archer where Krieger has a pink-haired hologram for a girlfriend, but also explains the existence of "Waifu dolls/pillows."

My initial reaction to all of this was "thank god I'm dying in 30 years," but that annoying part of my brain dedicated to economics wouldn't turn off. It just "had to" do some research, and look into what possible incentives existed for this to even be a thing. And the observations were very interesting.

First, economically speaking, the only way a boy/man would choose to date/court/marry a fictional girl instead of a real one is because the costs required to get a real one is just too high. At first you may scoff at this (and I surely did), but upon running some numbers and thinking about, it IS a very expensive endeavor. If you think back to when you hit puberty on, precisely how much have you spent in terms of

Time Money Labor
Effort Mentality
Stress Strife
Fear Regret

and plain ole other sources of calories of energy dealing with women?

My figures are of course HIGHLY subjective and up for debate, but if you take into consideration direct financial expenses, mental costs, and opportunity costs, the total costs to find a wife ever so roughly hover around $720,000. Enough for most single people to retire on.

		Per Week				Annualized
		13	29
		13-23	24-29	Rate	Rate 2	Youth	Older
per week	Time/hours	42	21	10	18	21840	19656
	Money per week	25	50			13000	26000
	Mentality/Opportunity Cost per week	200	150			10400	7800
					Sum	45240	53456
					Sum Years	452400	267280
					Total Cost of Wife Hunting		$ 719,680

These costs are not insignificant, and only certainly higher for less social or good looking men who (likely) populate the "Waifu Community." So even though they are very UNLIKELY to run and crunch the numbers I did above, intuitively their brain does some kind of cost benefit analysis and concludes it's not worth the $700,000+ in life expense to chase after a real girl. Not entirely irrational.

However, enter in the concept of substitute and inferior goods.

Just because a young man decides it's not worth the total expense to get a girl in the real world, doesn't mean he can't (albeit delusionally) satisfy some of his romantic desires with non-human substitute goods. Sex can be more than adequately (though inferiorly) be replaced with porn. A loving relationship can be replaced with one's imagination (think Wilson in "Castaway"). And a marriage or confirmation of a relationship can be replaced by fake ceremony where you marry a video game character (or in the case of an increasing # of American women, marrying yourself). And so instead of becoming a hermit or a virgin "MGTOW" where you have no relationship with women, some men escape into a fantasy world where they get themselves a Waifu.

Now naturally everybody's mind is focusing on the delusional aspect of this mentality. However, I want to again reiterate and refocus our attention to the economic aspect of this. Whether you agree with them or not, whether you find them sane or not, they are at least being RATIONAL to a certain extent. And we can't deny the fact that they've made the conscious choice to choose a fake girlfriend over a real one. But the fact ANYBODY is making this choice consciously speaks volumes as to the price and costs of finding a real woman today.

Consider not just the various financial, time, labor, and opportunity costs associated with finding a quality real world girl. Consider the lack of drama and the mental pain associated with having an "imaginary girlfriend." Not only do you save yourself $700,000 in explicit and implicit costs, you also save yourself;

Being stood up
Being shot down
Drama
Temper tantrums
Girls cheating on you
Girls leading you on Bi-polar freaks
Feminism
Blue balls

and every other form of scourge and fire-laden hurdles you and every other man had to jump through during his teens and 20's.

Additionally, though it isn't real and it IS delusional, imagine what nice, kind, compliant, and supporting personalities Waifu's have. She isn't a single mom. She isn't demanding you gotta do this and that. She isn't going to cheat on you. She's always happy to see you. She's PRECISELY at your EXACT same intelligence level (because she is you), etc. etc. It's a trait the inferior good has that is superior to the real thing. So when you consider all these factors through the lens of a (likely) unattractive male, you can start to see why they choose to be delusional instead of live in the real world.

The sad point I'm trying to make is that if men are willing to be irrational in the real world by choosing to live in a delusional one, the economics of having a Waifu make complete sense. What's even sadder, however, is that the cost differential between having a real girlfriend and a fake one is so huge in the real world, the concept of having a Waifu (or marrying yourself in women's cases) is actually becoming a real thing.

Enjoy that decline!

---

http://aaron-clarey.podomatic.com/
http://www.assholeconsulting.com
https://www.youtube.com/user/AaronClarey
https://twitter.com/aaron_clarey
http://www.amazon.com/Aaron-Clarey/e/B00J1ZC350/

Announcement: "Cappy's Crap"

August 20, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Howdy All,

Finally getting around to opening up a Cafe Press shop to sell various Cappy memorabilia affectionately titled:

"Cappy's Crap"

Right now there is only ONE item, a bumperstick titled "Enjoy the Decline" but I will be adding more.

On account you are the market, let me know if there is something you wanted in particular and I can likely make it.

Mucho thanks,

Cappy

How Much of an Advantage Do Hot Conservative Women Get?

August 20, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

DISCLAIMERS:

1. I do not HATE anybody in the group of women used in this study (bar Katie Kieffer, who I don't even hate, I just have no respect for). Many of them are intelligent and accomplished, some of whom I do listen to regularly...while many are not. Do not take this personally if you know you are one of those women who are talented*, who do* make original content and do NOT mere regurgitate conservative talking points.

2. I am aware that there are other people on the lists you would like to see. These lists were compiled with what I had and in a non-scientific fashion. I will gladly add others to help the accuracy of the study. But for now, this is the data I had to work with.

3. Data was adjusted for Dana Loesch's insanely high twitter followers. The official "final" ratio was calculated taking an average of all three "final" ratios. Criticize the methodology as you like.

A well known fact about life is that pretty girls have it easier.

That's not an opinion.
That's not a guess.
That's a fact.

However, I was curious just HOW MUCH of an advantage there is.

Specifically, instead of being a super awesome economic genius trapped in a 5'9" average looking male body, what if I was instead a very average mind trapped in a cute 20 something female body with a nice set of perky tits?

So I set out and asked all my agents in the field to send me examples of hot conservative or libertarian babes that had an internet presence. I then averaged both the number of their Twitter followers and YouTube subscribers. I did the same within my professional circle of right leaning MALE internet celebrities and then calculated the ratios of female Twitter followers to male Twitter followers, as well as the ratio of YouTube subscribers.

This was the result:

Men	Twitter	YouTube			Women	Twitter	YouTube
Davis Aurini	2357	12038			Julie Borowski	37500	68126
Bernard Chapin	2601	12285			Katie Kieffer	3023	136
Matt Forney	3636	808			Lauren Southern	8244	11118
Roosh V	15500	15506			Ann Barnhardt	7360	15213
Jack Donovan	3204	1217			House of Sunny		2806
Chris Bechtloff	617	461			Tomi Lahren	68200	24437
Aaron Clarey	3216	18357			Libertarian Girl	12000	3785
					Joanne Nova		3525
Average	4447	8667			Dana Loesch	294000	1574
					Michelle Fields	18100	470
					Kristin Tate	6998	184
Ratio	9.87	1.64			Meredith Ancret	2335
Non Loesch	3.86				Syrian Girl	25100	38694
						482860	170068
Total Ratio	5.12				Average	43,896	14,172
					Avg Non Loesch	17169

In short, when you average it out women are paid a premium of 512% over their internet male micro-celebrity counterparts.

Now, again, this is nothing new. And I'm not even going to argue against it, for it is human nature. A hot conservative or libertarian female is much RARER than an average looking conservative or libertarian male. What I will, however, file a complaint about is the quality of each group's work.

Certainly there ARE accomplished, intelligent, insightful people on both sides. However, when you average it out, it is just not comparable. The sheer number of ditzes in the female list REALLY DO get by on their looks. Again, I don't "hate" anyone on either list, but when a girl is essentially paid 5 times to regurgitate talking points Limbaugh made before they were born, or epiphanies I realized on my blog when they were in grade school, don't tell me all the men in the conservative or libertarian movement are "deep philosophical types." They're just your regular average horny guys who happen to vote Republican. That is the market you are serving. Not your high-minded economic and political intellectuals.

Finally, (and I have mentioned this to my pretty AND SMART conservative and libertarian female friends) if you are:

1. A pretty AND SMART conservative or libertarian female
2. Who is looking for a job,
3. And have the slightest bit of camera presence
4. And are willing to show off some leg and cleavage, you will find no easier career than being a "COLBOTI" (Conservative Or Libertarian Babe on the Internet). You will make 5 times the audience your male counterpart has in 1/5th the time, making 5 times the money. And if you happen to actually be SMART and not just a cute set of tits, you can write your own ticket for the rest of your life.

I know this post sounds cheeky. I know it sounds arrogant. I know it may have insulted some people.

Too bad it's 100% true.

Ladies, take advantage of that 500% advantage.

---

http://aaron-clarey.podomatic.com/
http://www.assholeconsulting.com
https://www.youtube.com/user/AaronClarey
https://twitter.com/aaron_clarey
http://www.amazon.com/Aaron-Clarey/e/B00J1ZC350/

More Cappy Crap

August 20, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

A coffee mug of The Clarey Podcast now available at Cappy's Crap.

However, ladies, I won't lie because you'll be tortured between that and whether you buy a coffee mug with Mr. Brown's epic picture from BMGOP. It IS a tough choice.

More crap coming once I figure out what might sell.

An Economist's Take on the Meaning of Life

August 20, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

and why self employment is vital to it:

The Music School Bubble

August 21, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

A guest post from the Great Matt Baldoni:

My music education began at age 8 in my hometown, when I began taking guitar lessons. It continued through junior high and high school where I was participating in public school music programs for jazz and classical music. I played my first professional gig with a rock band at age 16. Also that year, the guidance counselors started pressuring all of us to pick a major. So, I decided I'd better major in music in college. I had already received a small amount of attention (and even a few bucks) for what I believed was my passion and my talent. It should be noted that the word “prodigy” was NEVER used in reference to me. I don't believe I have any natural gifts or talents, I simply believe that I was able to discover a sort of “natural affinity” and general interest for playing music and practicing hard when I was a young kid.

My boomer parents and everyone else told me that I absolutely had to go to college, there was no other option for me. So, I did what I thought I should, I applied and sent audition cassettes (remember those?) to all of the top schools I was reading about in the magazines: GIT at Musician's Institute, USC, University of North Texas, and Boston's Berklee College of Music. I was offered money by each of these schools to attend, but I did not attend any of them. They were “too expensive and too far away”, but all located in hot music towns where there was a lot going on. I was disappointed. So I took a full tuition scholarship for $2000 per year at a small state college 70 miles from my small hometown and got a degree in classical guitar performance. You see, I “absolutely HAD to go to college”, but it had to fit the criteria of what the boomers were actually willing to pay for, which was next to nothing. That scholarship, incidentally, was for full tuition. College cost my family nothing. I gotta hand it to 'em, they tricked me into doing whatever I could to save them a few bucks.

While in college I tested out of certain curricula like ear training, aced music theory, was a strong reader of sheet music notation by the standards of my peers, and was working my way through school washing dishes and playing in cover bands. By year 2 I could afford to not have another hourly job ever again. I was also eventually teaching a few college courses TO my peers, including the classes I tested out of myself. After graduation I was just anxious to get to work, teaching guitar and playing five nights a week without all the hassle and horse shit of being in class every day when I could've been sleeping or making the girl brekfast I had brought home from the bar gig the night before.

That didn't last long, I accepted a fellowship at USC's prestigious Studio/Jazz guitar program, getting my tuition paid for by teaching undergrads. I arrived there and was absolutely SHOCKED at the high level of playing that the younger guys were exhibiting. But I took a minute to think about it, and eventually I found out why. They went to the top private arts high schools, they were from areas like Marin County, Montauk Long Island, and Beverly Hills, and...here's the kicker...they never had to have JOBS in high school. They all came from highly wealthy families, had access to the best resources, unlimited money for top level equipment and private teachers, and lots of free time to practice. They also had access from their early teens to the best musicians and teachers in large major cities full of working entertainers. My 4 years of hauling dirt and scraping plates in high school had me woefully behind many of these guys. However, I was already making a living.

I dropped out of USC about five minutes after I had some good gig offers. The fact is, I couldn't fucking stand the place. It was impossible to legitimize things like rock and blues music at the ivory tower level, and none of my teachers seemed to be playing that many jobs. None of the commercial styles that were actually making me my rent money were even discussed in passing at a USC music class. The teachers who WERE playing jobs of any significance often got fired for subbing out their teaching hours too much. It was at that point I decided I didn't belong there. See, I never cared what the fuck I had to play in order to make a living, I just wanted to be good enough to make good money, and it was a sad day when I realized that music school can not often give you what you need to actually pull that off. So, I left. Turned down a full graduate fellowship. Everyone was pissed…my parents were pissed because they were more excited about me attending a famous expensive school than they were when I later played for the fucking President. The school was pissed because grad students are free labor. It costs them NOTHING to stick another guy in a classroom when he's giving them the hours of a full time salaried professor in exchange. To this day I feel like a fucking idiot for even entertaining the idea. Let's now look at my music school experiences by the numbers:

This is easy to do these days because we are ALL connected on social media now. It's very easy to see what everyone else is doing. So, I went to undergrad college with 15 or 20 other guitar majors. Number of them who are making a full time living as a live performer? One. Me. These guys play a lot but most of them have to supplement or replace their gigs with a significant amount of teaching. I went to grad school with 56 other guitar majors. Number of those guys making a full time living as a live performer? From what I can tell from the interwebs, about 6-10. Again, there are many, many guys who are teachers full time, or at least teach more than they do play.

See, I believe that being a full time musician who plays live (and/or in the studio) is the greatest badge of honor a musician can bestow upon himself. Why? Because it's proof you can beat the odds. It shows you have no need for the “stability” of teaching music. See, we all think we need to be teachers because that is what MUSIC SCHOOLS tell us. They have a large stock in keeping interest in becoming a music teacher, for it keeps them employed, and the cycle continues. As of today, it's spiraled out of control. Our families all want us to be teachers because they figure it's the closest thing to a “real job” that a musician can have. It's a lot safer than playing in bars, touring, and all of those “lifestyle” things that many people think are part of a music career.

When the recession began in 2007/8, things got interesting. All of the music schools, even the most prestigious ones, lost a lot of revenue and interest from young musicians. They were (are) far too expensive. So, young players began checking out smaller, cheaper, less prestigious state colleges like the one I went to. Well, the A-league schools said “We can't have that!”, so they began slowly lowering their audition and testing standards while their tuition prices have continued to skyrocket, just like their skyrocketing endowments and assistance from state and federal governments. Today, they have more money coming in than ever, and lower audition standards than ever. They are now at their most expensive in history and are turning out the least talented and equipped musicians they ever have. And I am laughing my ASS off, because this whole thing is hilarious. They have literally dug their own grave, and they are a ticking bomb.

The music business itself has also changed drastically in the last 20 years. No one makes money selling records anymore, so everyone has to play live and stay out on the road more than they used to. The steady stream of studio work is gone, it's no longer a requirement to have good musicians on your recording. The computer can fix everything, and the digital world turns talentless hacks into international stars. The ProTools engineer is now at the top of the music business food chain. Every two-bit asshole with a macbook and garage band software can call himself an “artist” or “musician” or “songwriter” or “producer”. The DJ, the karaoke bar, and the football game on large plasma screens now stand where the live band once stood.

Is there still room for highly skilled musicians? Absolutely. There is great demand for a good live band in thousands of places all over the world. Artists need sidemen to play behind them for their concert dates, churches need musicians, people need a band for their wedding or Christmas party, and the list goes on and on. These types of gigs are the bread and butter for a musician's work throughout the year. Does music school teach you what you need to know to get these jobs? Absolutely not. I make a very good living at what I do, and I got 100% of my abilities from the street. I did have a few good teachers, yes, but even they aren't making what I make or playing as much as me. Are there musicians better than me? Faster? Richer? More able to raise a family? Of course there are. But none of them are turning down as much work as I am simply because they're always booked.

The charlatans in the halls of music schools are taking your money and telling you if you do what they say and ace the test, you'll make a living and get a gig. That's a lie. If someone deceives you for their own financial gain, that's committing fraud. If I pay money for a specific service, and that service is not rendered, I should be able to get my fucking money back. Worse yet, the charlatans KNOW they're lying, and they keep right on going. I don't know how they sleep at night. I've been hired and fired a million times over for all sorts of reasons, many of which were actually my fault, just as many were not. It's a tough and shitty business with really great perks and rewards, but you need very, very thick skin to survive it. You need to be able to take rejection WELL a million times over, and then a million more. This makes most of us pretty tough, and many of us skeptical, jaded and cynical. These attributes are bare bones requirement for making it in my business.

That thick skin and the ability to take rejection is another thing music schools will never be able to teach. Why? Because the vast majority of people teaching in music schools never actually had to go through it. They went right from being a student to being a teacher, having spent no significant amount of time in the actual workforce they're claiming to supply with employable candidates.

I just spent last week in Boston. One of America's great cities and a great music town too. While there I was guesting with the renowned Boston Pops, one of America's most beloved groups of musicians. It was a wonderful experience. While there, I ha the opportunity to make a few observations. The first was seeing that a guitar degree from Berklee now costs a quarter of a million dollars. It didn't surprise me when I heard that, but it struck me again what a bad investment it is. If I invest $250,000 in anything, even just put it in the bank, I should expect a return on that investment very soon if not immediately. They'll give any 18 year old punk with a pulse and a guitar case the loans to get the degree, and most of them will never pay it back in their lifetime, no matter how hard they work or how great the gig is they get, if they even get a gig at all.

I also spoke with an old friend who is a professional drummer in the Boston area. He spoke very happily about how busy he was, not in a boastful way, but proud of himself for being able to raise his son and daughter by playing the drums. I know the guy's a phenomenal musician, he's a dear friend and I've worked with him a great deal, but I wanted to hear from HIM why he thinks he's working so much.

He told me that the Boston area is inundated with Berklee grads, everybody's out of work, and they all “play too much”. See, now I'm gonna tell you the other area where music schools fuck up. They're gigantic locker rooms with a bunch of young jocks in them who are constantly measuring their dicks to see how fast and complicated they can play their instruments. My drummer buddy has the ability to do all that too, he has incredible technique and can play anything. However, he just goes in to the job and “bangs out the time”. He just plays his instrument as simply and effectively as he can for the song and the occasion. He's got nothing to prove with his chops. Consequently he's the busiest guy around, while the other cats are playing in ways that don't get them the call back even though they desperately need the money (to pay back that quarter million). But as they were spending the quarter million, the institution somehow forgot to mention to them that they need to shut the fuck up with all the scales and stick control exercises and just simply play the minimum part that's required for each song with the maximum of authenticity and effectiveness. In a way I don't blame these kids for going out and fucking up potential accounts by playing too much, they were not properly prepared. But once again, at some point you gotta blame them for spending that much money on such a stupid investment in the first place.

Every decision I make as a professional musician is an economic one. I remain single and childless and living as a bachelor because I can only have the life, freedoms, and luxuries I want if I am by myself. I only take a gig if it makes economic sense to me, and if it does not, I say no. I buy guitars used or get them on endorsements because I refuse to pay full price for them. And I do NOT recommend going to music school because it's a BAD economic decision. It's an investment in thin air. You might as well burn your money. You'd have a better ROI if you bought a home or just put it in the fucking bank. Even Wells Fargo can guarantee you more return on your money than music schools can.

Here's what I do recommend for young musicians: Get ONE good private teacher who tells you the truth. Find a musician you admire who's making a living you want to make for yourself and begin following him around. I say him, ladies, because most of us are men. It's not sexism, it's a fact. There is not one woman on my list of subs. When people wanna see a rock guitar player bangin' out some notes and screaming some lyrics, they wanna see a dude. And not a fat or ugly one either. Oops, I almost forgot, that's another thing music schools don't tell you: Fat, ugly motherfuckers don't work as much and lean and handsome guys do.

Anyway, find that guy and follow him around. Get on youtube and scan through the billions of guitar lessons on there, or lessons on whatever instrument you choose. Practice your ass off and learn how to play, you don't need to spend money to do that anymore, you just need to work hard. The music teacher I DO know say that's the biggest problems with their students, by the way, they all say they're all too lazy.

If you're gonna pick an instrument, pick the guitar or the keyboard. Why? It gives you the most options. You can play gigs solo, duo, trio, on up to playing with orchestras like I just did. Drummers can't do that. Singers can't do that (unless they also play guitar or piano). Horn players can't do that. If you pick one of those two instruments, learn how to sing, and learn how to read and interpret sheet music, you'll always work. The last thing is most important: KNOWING SONGS. You have to know a lot of fucking tunes to work steady. At this point it's about five decades worth of songs in about 8-10 styles. I'd say I probably know how to play and/or sing a thousand or more.

Choose the minimalist lifestyle, drive the cheapest car and live in the cheapest apartment you can afford. Don't knock anybody up. Don't move your girlfriend in. Don't get married, and don't accrue any significant debt. Above all else, do NOT fall prey to the fraud sold to you by the charlatans that hide behind the banner of the music school or conservatory. It's a dead end road. Get out now instead and just start working.

But, But, But "The Patriarchy!"

August 21, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Oh nosies!!!! The truth!

Episode #106 of The Clarey Podcast

August 21, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Procrastinating writing books
The key to success is execution
Stop majoring in stupid shit ladies
The law school bubble is bursting

and MORE!

In THIS EPISODE of The Clarey Podcast!

(buy your "Official" Clarey Podcast mug here)

Die, Night Club Industry, Die!!!

August 24, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Upon returning from Wyoming and having no real job in hand, I revisited my life's motto of "security is security" and ended up working for a security company a friend owned. They specialized in armed security so most of the gigs were prisoner transport, body guard work, and the infamous "protecting spoiled rotten Saudi Prince brats and his entourage of 120 equally douchy elitists." However, before you were allowed to work one of these easier shifts, you had to prove your mettle working the hated "parking ramp shifts."

These "parking ramp shifts" were really nothing more than "baby sitting the night clubbers" shifts where you would prevent fights, stop people from pissing in the stairwells, watch black women fight over "their man," and even prevent the occasional Russian body builder from kidnapping a pass-out party girl. This was only made infinitely worse in the fact we had to patrol on foot which, during Minnesota winters, made life miserable.

But through all the headaches and hypothermia that comes with baby sitting the Twin Cities' club-going filth, I did notice something those 3 short years ago - there was only a FRACTION of the night clubs that used to be open during the 90's.

First Avenue (a night club) was still the "anchor club" of the Twin Cities and still in business. Same for The Gay 90's. And The Fine Line, another reliable standby, was also open for business. But nearly every other club or bar I went to was now gone. Daddy Rock's was no longer. Banana Joe's gone. Even Old Chicago (not a club, but just a bar) was gone too. And they weren't necessarily replaced with new clubs either. In short, there was by my quick economist eye only about 40% the amount of clubs that existed during my night clubbing days 20 years ago.

Fast forward three years to today and it's even worse.

Solera, gone.
The Times Cafe, gone.
Fhima (a St. Paul club), gone.
"Block E" (an entire BUILDING of night clubs) gone.
And the over-hyped, over-rated "Capital Grille" gone (thank god).

There is just nowhere near the night club life that once existed in the Twin Cities.

Of course, as economists are wont to do, they research things they see happening in real life. And after poking around on teh interwebz the death of the night club industry is an interesting and telling death.

First, there is not so much a "death" in the night life scene as a stagnation and a shift. Revenues for the "bar and nightclub industry" are stagnant, if not slightly dropping if you account for inflation. However, the Minneapolis club scene has not "stagnated," it's cratered. So how do these figures jive? Simple, the data is for the "BAR AND night club industry."

While nightclubs may be tanking, bars are doing quite well. This would explain why nearly every night club I attended during Clinton's administration are gone, but the neighborhood bars are still around.

Lee's Liquor Lounge, The CC Club, Jax Cafe, etc., all neighborhood bars, all still in business.

Second, this is corroborated by the most cited reason for the industry's decline- "The Great Recession." While Gen X may have been whooping it up in the Dotcom days, drinking and partying themselves into oblivion, they at least did not graduate into "The Great Recession." Their modern day Millennial peers have. And not only are the Millennials facing the worst job market since the Great DEPRESSION, they are also saddled with more college debt than any generation in the history of the world. Combine that with their worthless degrees and they plain don't have the money to afford a cover charge and drinks.

This has led to two behavioral changes. One, Millennials now pre-drink at home, getting within one drink of a proper buzz. And two, they avoid cover charges, commuting/parking expenses, and DWI's by walking to their local bar.

The third reason for the nightclub's demise, however, is the really interesting one. Because no professional publication or researcher can speak of it, even though it is the core and the heart of the nightclub business - sex. Specifically women.

When we wipe away all the politically correct "industry research" jargon and cut through the bullshit, night clubs are all about men wanting to get sex from women. And even though they may not come outright and say it, club owners are ACUTELY aware of this and it shows in their business models.

EVERY nightclub knows you have to get hot women into the club, otherwise the men (with their money) will not show up. Therefore you have "ladies night," drink specials for ladies, sometimes women even get to drink for free, and if you're a 20 something female in America you don't even know what a "cover charge" is.

This presents a problem however. Wherever there are hot women, horny and thirsty men are sure to follow. And their constant advances will inevitably scare away women. Therefore, how do you get women to show up AND stay AND return next week?

Make the nightclub environment incredibly hostile towards men and incredibly tailored towards women.

You ever wonder why nightclub music is not only shitty, but incredibly loud? It's so the girl can get you to buy her a drink, but not have to talk to you.

You notice how the music is the most monotonous remixed pop top 40's crap that has not an ounce of talent in it? It's because girls like it and men don't.

And you notice how you have to stand in line, while a cute girl with a short skit gets to jump in line? It's not only because they need her as "seed capital" to "get the party started." They need to wear you out so you don't have the energy to approach (and thus harass) women in the club.

It is this "love hate" relationship nightclubs have with men (and their money) that they must delicately balance where you are encouraged to part with your money, but deterred from actually having any sexual success with women. And if they do it right, you'll have spent at least $50 of your money with them and have no girl to show for it.

Now, for the past 40 years this business model has worked. And using back of napkin statistics men have transferred roughly a trillion dollars worth of wealth to women in the form of drinks, food, cover charges (and flowers if you were stupid enough to fall for that gag where the guy is hocking roses in a bucket). But there has been an incredible game changer as of recent. One that completely obsoletes this model and has completely rewritten the rules for many other industries as well.

The internet.

"Fun" as it is to go clubbing, because of the challenging environment it presents to men, it gets tiring. And even the most ardent of club-going men will burn out and seek for alternative ways to pick up women. So after spending 5 years in the nightclub scene, forking over $50 a night, to maybe, just MAYBE get laid 3 times, the majority of men will inevitably do a cost benefit analysis and leave. However, whereas in the past "leaving" meant giving up and basically staying home (or trying to "meet girls at church" or work, etc.), now men can get what they want (sex) by going online. And the reasons are just too compelling.

First you waste nowhere NEAR the amount of time you do going clubbing. There's no commute. There's no finding parking. There's no waiting in line. And there's no competing against 3 other guys for the same girl.

You fire up your laptop, set up a profile, and start firing off messages.

Naturally, the vast majority of your advances will be rejected and is the primary reason many men say online dating isn't worth it (for example a recently divorced friend of mine complained he had to spend a full hour a night online to get a date for that weekend). But a mere hour a night is NOTHING compared to what 20 something men pre-internet invested daily in their pursuit of women.

Second, the financial costs. Online dating is effectively free. Either by going through Plenty of Fish, Tinder, or meetup groups where you indirectly try to find women, there is really no significant added marginal cost to start online dating. Contrast that with 40 nights a year of clubbing for 5 years at $50 a pop, and you save yourself $10,000 in explicit financial costs merely going online.

And finally, the sanity you save. In going online you avoid the nearly impossible environment that nightclubs have become:

Women who have their "bitch shields" up as they gussied themselves up earlier that evening with their friends in sort of a "pre-game pep talk," making them froth at the chance to shoot men down (and consequently cry themselves to sleep later that night because "they can't find a man.")

The 100%-USDA-Certified-Full-Backing-and-Faith-of-the-US-Government GUARAN-FREAKING-TEE that there will be a fatty cockblocker there to pull ANY girl you're having success with away.

The "herd" you must masterfully penetrate or wait until a weak one separates herself from the herd, only to have the mother hen fatty cockblocker come in and "save her from you."

All while under the constant and never ending assault and barrage of the monotonous bass-beating of hiphop, rap, regatone, or whatever the latest "girl power" top 40's song that came out that week.

No, you just pour yourself a nice scotch, throw on Jazz24.org, and click away.

Certainly, there are economic reasons for the decline in night clubs. And certainly there are sociological/demographical reasons for the decline in nightclubs. But although the data is not perfect (there is a report I found for $1,500, but I'm not going to buy it), the real threat nightclubs face is that they no longer hold a monopoly on (effectively) the only legal means by which men ultimately pay for sex/dating. And in the face of competition from the internet their current business model is too punishing financially, mentally, and time-wise for any young man with the slightest bit of self respect and common sense.

Perhaps, with luck, there will be no need to patrol those parking ramps in the future.

---

http://aaron-clarey.podomatic.com/
http://www.assholeconsulting.com
https://www.youtube.com/user/AaronClarey
https://twitter.com/aaron_clarey
http://www.amazon.com/Aaron-Clarey/e/B00J1ZC350/

Housing Getting Kinda Bubbly Again

August 26, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Figured it was time to take a look at the "Price to Rents Ratio" of the US housing market. For those unfamiliar with this ratio it is basically a "PE" ratio, but for property. It takes the price of a house and divides it by rent (either monthly, annual, etc., as long as you're consistent, you'll get the same shape graph).

Though nowhere near the peak of the bubble, it seems chronically low interest rates has driven money into the market even though rents may not warrant it. Back in 1960 the ratio was 17, now it's 23. Roughly a 25% overvaluation.

Nothing to panic about yet, but more proof it is federal reserve funny money is indeed causing inflation. We're just happy with this because "housing going up is good" even though people have to buy into this market.

Enjoy the decline!

Source:

Why the Federal Reserve Ain't No "Jesus Christ"

August 26, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

If there is a skill I have, it is taking incredibly complex and complicated things in the financial world and explaining it to normal, everyday people who had too healthy of social lives to major in economics. And while today's post is one such article, it is one I had to sit down and think through, because I too had a simple question that I did not have the answer to. Specifically;

How is this all going to end? Can the Federal Reserve just keep "QE-ing" the government out of its debt problems? And what is going to happen to the Fed when all those toxic assets they've been buying up don't pay up? Won't it go bankrupt too? And if it does, what will happen?

Thankfully, despite the complicated nature of central banking, it's something we can all understand.

First we must look at the Fed for what it is. A separate entity that is technically NOT part of the government, NOR is it a private corporation owned by the "Rothchilds" and Illuminati. It is best described as an NGO that is chartered by congress to be the country's central bank.

Second, we must look at the role it has most recently played that is OUTSIDE its traditional role of central banking. Namely, playing the role of "Jesus Christ."

You may laugh, but regular listeners to my podcast know I jokingly sing the tune "Christ the Lamb of God (who taketh away the sins of the world)" but substitute my own lyrics in it to fit it to the Federal Reseve:

"Oooohhh Janet the Yellen of the Fed
Who taketh away the sins of the banking community
Baaailll out these banksters.
Ooooohhh Janet the Yelley of the Fed
Who bails out the scum who bought McMansions
Prinnnnnt off more money"

Blasphemous as that may be, it's 100% true. The Federal Reserve has served as "Jesus Christ" like entity to wash away all the financial problems that were (and continue to be) created by various entities within our economy. Specifically, all the horrible loans made during the financial crisis AND the federal government's insane deficit spending. And you can see this, quite literally, on the balance sheet of the Federal Reserve:

FEDERAL RESERVE BANKS
COMBINED STATEMENTS OF CONDITION
As of December 31, 2014 and December 31, 2013
(in millions)

ASSETS	2014
Gold certificates	$ 11,037
Special drawing rights certificates	5,200
Coin	1,873
Loans:
Depository institutions	145
Term Asset-Backed Securities Loan Facility (measured at fair value)	-
System Open Market Account:
Treasury securities, net (of which $11,144 and $17,159 is lent as of December 31, 2014 and 2013, respectively)	2,596,241
Government-sponsored enterprise debt securities, net (of which $655 and $1,099 is lent as of December 31, 2014 and 2013, respectively)	39,990
Federal agency and government-sponsored enterprise mortgage-backed securities, net	1,789,083
Foreign currency denominated investments, net	20,900
Central bank liquidity swaps	1,528
Accrued interest receivable	25,644
Other assets	29
Investments held by consolidated variable interest entities (of which $1,808 and $1,774 is measured at fair value as of December 31, 2014 and 2013, respectively)	1,811
Bank premises and equipment, net	2,630
Items in process of collection	86
Deferred asset - remittances to the Treasury	667
Other assets	910
Total assets	$ 4,497,774

LIABILITIES AND CAPITAL

As of December 31, 2008, and December 31, 2007
(in millions)

ASSETS	2007
Gold certificates	$ 11,037
Special drawing rights certificates	2,200
Coin	1,379
Items in process of collection	1,804
Loans to depository institutions	48,636
Other loans	-
System Open Market Account:
Securities purchased under agreements to resell	16,000
U.S. government, federal agency, and government-sponsored enterprise securities, net	745,620
Investments denominated in foreign currencies	22,914
Central bank liquidity swaps	24,000
Consolidated variable interest entities:
Investments held by consolidated variable interest entities December 31, 2008)	-
Bank premises, equipment, and software, net	2,539
Prepaid interest on Federal Reserve notes due from U.S. Treasury	-
Accrued interest receivable	6,438
Other assets	1,900
Total assets	$ 914,776

I apologize in advance for the small font of the chart above, but I have highlighted the key figures that demonstrate the Fed's "Jesus" activity.

In the RED are US government bonds that nobody else in their right mind would buy. Remember, especially under Obama, the US federal government has ran the country's worst peacetime deficits. Worse, that deficit spending was not on genuine investments that would produce the profits necessary to pay back the principal and interest on those bonds, but (frankly) just vote-buying from the parasitic, non-economic producing classes for the democrats (welfare, worthless education, WIC, etc.). Because of this traditional investors who would lend to the US government (pensions, the Chinese, Arab nations, retirees etc,) had no interest in lending money to this effectively insolvent entity. Therefore, the ONLY entity that would buy US government bonds was the Federal Reserve. And in the 7 years following the financial crisis, the Federal Reserve has purchased (lent) roughly $2 trillion to the US government.

But before you go hating on Obama and the democrats, look at the GREEN. The GREEN didn't even exist in 2007. However, recklessly lending money just so they could make a commission on increasingly unprofitable mortgages, bankers and Wall Street drove the US economy, head first into the worst recession since the Great Depression. And since they were at the effective "cardio vasculatory system" of the economy (the financial system is VERY much as vital to an economy just like your heart), they needed to be bailed out. And so where you see:

"Federal Agency and Government Sponsor Enterprise Mortgage Backed Securities"

in English that means

"Crappy mortgages nobody else in their right mind would buy that were created by the bankster scum of the Earth, who conveniently made a 2-5% commission on those deals, but we had to buy these things anyway otherwise the entire financial system would collapse."

We could go on, but if you look at the BLUE square you see that the nature of the Federal Reserve has fundamentally changed. It has gone from that of a central bank in 2007 to an effective "bailout machine" in 2014. We bail out incompetent bankers, we bail out irresponsible borrowers, we bail out socialist politicians, and we bail out the parasitic classes that need government subsidies who vote for them (and if you'll permit this economist a minor prediction - you can bet you'll see "student loans" on the Federal Reserve's balance sheet within our lifetimes).

Third, how does the Federal Reserve afford all this?

Very simple, the Federal Reserve controls the US money supply and thus merely "prints off more money."

Of course, it doesn't literally print it off as they did in the Weimar Republic. That would be too obvious, brash, and Zimbabwean. They use the flashy euphemistic technique called "Quantitative Easing" wherein they merely digitally add more money to financial institutions' deposit accounts in exchange for their worthless mortgage backed securities nobody else wants. But whether the money is digital recordings on bank accounts or actual pieces of paper in circulation, the effect is the same. A booming money supply, going from $1.4 trillion before the crisis to $3.1 trillion today.

Now here is the point where normal people, and even economists get a twinge in the back of their head saying, "Hey, something's not right here." Because whereas "Jesus Christ" presumably washed away everybody's sins, that's a religion. Not the real world. And just like physics has the conservation of mass law, economics also adheres to similar such mathematical laws. In other words, we know there's no such thing as a free lunch. A price has to be paid and somebody has to pay it, which leads us to our fourth point.

Logic would suggest that it would be the Federal Reserve that pays the ultimate price. It is a separate legal entity, and since it's been buying up all these worthless assets, like any other business it should go bankrupt. Additionally, nobody really owns the Federal Reserve. They actually DO have shareholders (who own an effective "preferred shares" in the entity which only entitle them to a 6% dividend while the remainder of Fed profits go to the Treasury), but based on the latest balance sheet of the Federal Reserve, they only have $57 billion in illiquid shares. Hardly enough to cause a financial crisis in the US should the Fed "go bankrupt."

However, here is where the "Jesusy Magic" occurs. Since the Federal Reserve is not the government, nor is it the financial industry, it effectively becomes a "sink hole" of sorts that wipes away all of our debts. All the federal government has to do is refuse to honor the bonds the Federal Reserve holds and all of the country's financial problems go away. Matter of fact, we don't even need taxation. We could theoretically just have the Federal Reserve lend money to the government ad infinitum and go bankrupt every year. But for those of us on the righter side of the political spectrum, we know this can't be true. There HAS TO be a price to this, and there is.

Inflation.

Since the Federal Reserve's currency is ACTUAL CURRENCY it spreads or "socializes" the costs or "sins" of society by debasing our US dollars. Now, at this point in time, if you listen very quietly, you will hear Paul Krugman and a bunch of other Keynesian economists nearly going into cardiac arrest as they trip over themselves to rush and point out there is no inflation (don't hurt yourself Paul, I'll do it for you here):

And they'd be right. According to the CPI there has been effectively no inflation. But there are two problems.

One, I'm outright accusing them of telling a half-truth, because (if they're economists) they know this low level of inflation, IN SPITE OF A NEAR TRIPLING OF THE MONEY SUPPLY, is due to a TANKING of the "velocity of money."

Without boring the reader, the velocity of money is the rate at which a dollar is re-spent. So you can theoretically have a low money supply, but if people keep spending (either because of faith in the future or a market bubble) instead of saving, you can trigger inflation still. However, the opposite is happening today, and the reasons are (I claim) the total disheartening and destructive effects socialist policies (primarily under Obama) has had on investors, purchasers, innovators, entrepreneurs, businessmen and other productive members of society. The constant assail and assault against "the rich," "corporations," "success," and the always-available evil and hated "white males" has thrown sand into America's most productive economic engines, tanking faith and hope in the future, and thus the velocity of money. And though this has slowed economic growth considerably, this grants the Federal Reserve's "Jesus Strategy" a reprieve in that their money printing has not caused inflation.

The second problem in claiming there's no inflation is that it's simply false. While the CPI does measure what somebody is going to face in terms of prices at the gas pump or the grocery store, gas and groceries are NOT the largest items on people's personal budgets.

Housing Investments
and Education are

And if you look at these items, they have skyrocketed.

Housing, though nowhere near it's bubbly peak in 2006, is starting to re-inflate again driving both housing prices and rents up. Using the Price-to-Rents ratio, we can see that Federal Reserve money starting to take its toll on the American public, being more costly than any point in recorded time BAR the housing bubble of 2006:

Investments the same. If you would like to retire, tough. Stock prices are LAUGHABLY overvalued. Largely in part due to the trillions in Baby Boomer retirement money that has mindlessly flooded the market since 1978 through their 401k's and IRA's, but more recently through (once again) Federal Reserve money.

Once banks unload their worthless toxic assets on the Fed for an overinflated price, they have to do something with that money. But since the corporate sector is demoralized by the socialist trend of the US, there's no economic growth and thus no demand by businesses to borrow it. This is why the majority of that money does NOT go into new investments, plant, and companies (which would create jobs by the way), but instead merely goes into the stock market either for repurchasing their own shares or taking a position in stocks and bonds to "hedge against inflation." This has resulted in over a trillion dollars (in this year ALONE) of buy backs. But it has also made stocks simply unaffordable to anybody who wishes to retire. This is more than amply displayed in the S&P 500's PE ratio and dividend yield, which suggests stocks are historically overvalued by about 33%.

Ironically, however, people are happy when the stock market goes up. Which would be akin to being happy that the price of gas "jump to $6 a gallon." Regardless, this is proof positive the Federal Reserve funny money is NOT sitting stagnant in some bank's digital account, but is seeping into sectors of the economy, causing real and serious inflation, and lowering our purchasing power.

And finally, student tuition.

It is no coincidence inflation is appearing where there is federal government money and intervention. Housing is backed up by Sallie Mae and Freddie Mac. The stock market is being inflated by Federal Reserve policy and US government retirement policy. And now with Pell grants, Stafford loans, etc., government money is (and has been) flooding into the higher education system. This flood of money, without an increase in either the volume or QUALITY of education, has resulted in skyrocketing tuition costs:

Soaring College Tuitions

College tuition continues to outpace median family income and the cost of medical care, food and housing.

Of course, student tuition, though the single largest expense of nearly every person under 30, is not considered in the CPI. But again, that doesn't mean those student debts and $300 textbooks aren't real. In REALITY students are also paying the tax of inflation to finance the Federal Reserve's "Jesus Bail Out Strategy."

As you no doubt likely surmised, you knew there was a price to pay for all this central banking hanky panky. The only problem is you couldn't put your finger on it because of the complexities and complications of central banking, the US' Federal Reserve system, and the machinations of "Quantitative Easing." But when you strip it all away, it sadly is very simple. It's just printing off more money.

I don't care how many doctorates in economics they have working for the Fed. I don't care how many of them came from the Ivy League. And I don't care how many Clark or Nobel prize ~~participation trophies~~ medals are awarded. The majority of economists are not economists as much as they are overly-degreed-laden charlatans who make things "more complicated than they are" to hide what is their simplistic, childish, and highly flawed understanding of economics.

To quote Holly Gennero, "You're nothing but a common thief" and you "economists" at the Fed, and the majority of the economics profession should be ashamed of yourselves.

---

http://aaron-clarey.podomatic.com/
http://www.assholeconsulting.com
https://www.youtube.com/user/AaronClarey
https://twitter.com/aaron_clarey
http://www.amazon.com/Aaron-Clarey/e/B00J1ZC350/

Episode #107 8-26-15

August 26, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Internet traffic is currency
How bloggers/podcasters/YouTubers aren't entrepreneurial enough Business magazines who run ads on people they promote Why German cars suck
Cappy is forced to take weekends off
Expendables 3 and Aces High
How black markets prove communism is wrong

AND MORE!

in THIS EPISODE of The Clarey Podcast!

Cappy Gets "Strike #1" on His YouTube Channel...Again

August 28, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

You can't make it up, but again, this is why I have a back up account at Daily Motion.

I have received my SECOND strike from YouTube about a video it found violated its speech codes. Just two minor problems.

It's technically a FIRST strike because they rescinded my original first strike on "Inferior vs. Superior People."

AND (here's the good stuff)

This second strike is on THE EXACT SAME VIDEO THE FIRST STRIKE WAS ON - "Inferior vs. Superior People."

I've appealed the strike...again...but just a reminder that if YouTube proves too difficult to use as a platform I will be going over to Daily Motion. And certainly feel free to file complaints with YouTube. The video they're referring to is quite the OPPOSITE of what they think it is.

The "Pay to Intern" Racket Continues

August 28, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

From our Australian Agent in the Field;

4:01 PM (3 hours ago)

to me

Dear

Thanks for your email. The internship search and match program works as follows:

1. We have an initial discussion: Internship requirements analysis to identify your internship industry preferences, location and eligibility for the program.
2. If you decided to move forward with the internship program then you would pay an enrolment fee of $110.
3. We set up an interview for you with the host organisation.
4. If you are successful in the interview then you would pay a placement fee of $880 and you commence an unpaid internship (duration is flexible and can be customised according to your course requirements).
5. If not successful in the interview then we look for another host organisation until a placement is achieved.

If you are interested in this program please let me know in order to have an initial chat.

Kind Regards,

Managing Director | CareerDC Group Pty. Ltd.
Skype: cdc.coordinator |
Suite 7, 235 New South Head Road, Edgecliff, NSW, 2027, Australia
Australia: T: | W: www.careerdc.com.au
New Zealand: T: | W: www.careerdc.co.nz

Name:
Phone
Email
Suburb Arncliffe
State NSW
Country Australia

Is Bond Having Less Sex?

August 28, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

I was having a late night dinner with my buddy Richard and the GF. We were discussing Bond films and the upcoming release "Spectre." This then naturally delved into observations of the various Bonds over time, but when I said,

"I hope he gets laid this time!"

Richard and the GF looked at me quizzically...

and then thought about it...

and then said, "Ooooohhh yeeeaaaah! You are right!"

Which I was. For if you think about it Daniel Craig is the least-laid James Bond out there. The movies do blur together (especially the last three), but I was under the distinct impression he didn't get laid in the first two (Casino Royale and Quantum of Solace) and only got laid in the last James Bond (Skyfall).

However, vague recollections amongst a handful of movies that blur together does not empirical data make. And so, ever so the vigilant economist, poor ole Cappy took it upon himself to study not only how many women each Bond slept with in each movie, but how many lays there were in total and averages for all the Bonds.

And shucks howdy, look at that, the ole Captain was right. Daniel Craig is the least laid Bond both in terms of number of women frequency in sex. He averages only 1.7 women per movie and only 2 lays per movie (he'd only have 1 and 1.5 respectively if it weren't for Skyfall making him practically a virgin).

However, some other statistics of note.

Roger Moore (unsurprisingly) holds the record for most amount of lays (8) and ties with Sean Connery for most number of women (4).

George Lazenby (named "That Other Guy" because I couldn't remember his name) is the all-time stud of the James Bond actors, luckily starring in the one film that would give him the highest average in both categories.

And if Daniel Craig is even going to finish with an average score, the screenwriters better serve him up a record-breaking 5 women and 9 lays in the next two movies.

Keep a notch count for the guy when Spectre comes out this fall.

This post brought to you by Bachelor Pad Economics. It's what Bond would use for a financial advice bible.

Ashley Madison and Fractional Reserve Dating

August 28, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Just too true to pass up:

Only Connected Communists Will Avoid Toiling in the Fields

August 28, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

I'm going to leave this right here for all you idiot socialist, democrat, and communist college students and professors who think you're going to be given a cushy government job, when in reality those jobs only go to the connected cronies.

Episode #108 of the Clarey Podcast

August 31, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Matt Baldoni the Master of Guitars
Captain Lloyd the Master of Guns
Some gun talk
Chris Cantwell is no capitalist
Mozilla continues its nazism

AND MORE!!!

In THIS EPISODE of The Clarey Podcast!

Bonus Podcast #109 9-3-15

September 3, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Cappy revisits Italy
Going to Seattle
Women who clog the toilet
Men don't care about race
Corporate American cocksuckers

and MORE in THIS EPISODE of The Clarey Podcast!

Accounting for Inflation as a Tax

September 4, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

I will say it again for the cheap seats, it doesn't matter how much money a country has. It's how much stuff it can produce. This is the beginning lesson I would always start my economics class with because not only does it simplify economics incredibly well, but it's true. It is the stuff your country produces that determines its economic success, not the amount of money it prints.

However, an interesting, but simple thought crossed my mind. Why haven't we ever incorporated inflation into the federal tax rate? The money IS controlled by the government/fed and since stuff is the only thing that matters then inflation SHOULD DEFINITELY be considered when attempting to calculate one's level of taxation.

Of course we need to define things (so leftists can disagree with semantics instead of grow a spine and deal with the argument) but I think you'll find the results interesting and of course enraging.

First the TRUEST measure of the overall tax rate of a country is taking TOTAL government spending at ALL levels of government (state, federal and local) and then dividing it by the country's total economic production, GDP. Now leftists will argument it should be REVENUE as a percent of GDP because people don't pay the full effective rate at which governments spend. We borrow money from other people and in running these deficits we provide an effective lower rate of taxation.

Which is true....for now.

Because in the end that debt has to be paid back with either:

1. Future taxation or
2. Printing off money/inflated away (which again is nothing more than indirect taxation)

So true and intellectually honest economists look at what has to be paid, now and into the future, to see what the real rate of taxation is.

Second, there is not a lot of data about total government spending (including both federal, state and local) that goes back significantly to provide a decent historical look. Ergo, I used only federal data which goes back to 1960. Still, if you want to be ever so rough about it, tack on another 15% GDP for state and local (47% for California and New York) and you'll get a rough proxy of total tax rates when we include the diluting effects of inflation on our currency.

Finally, what is "inflation?" If you're a Keynesian you (once again) stumble over yourself to cite the CPI. But if you're a technical person you would look at the money supply as any increase in the numbers of dollars, by definition dilutes those already in currency lessening their purchasing power (arguments about what is sitting in banks vaults as capital and not currently in circulation in the larger economy duly noted).

Regardless, when you do the math looking at the annual increase in the M2 money supply (orange) and add it on top of the federal tax rate as a percentage of GDP (blue) the results are quite interesting.

When "inflation is considered you can see it is at times a VERY significant tax, sometimes being even more costly that state/local taxes. The oil embargo/inflation days of the 70's and early 80's are very noticeable as well as the jump in the money supply during the financial crisis. And when you tack on the roughly 15% state and local tax, you're looking at a total government take of about 42%-45%.

Thankfully, the inflation tax (like debt) is a deferred tax that future generations will get to deal with. The US is once again VERY lucky to be the world's reserve currency and we're also very lucky that pretty much any other significantly sized economy is in worse shape that we are. This makes the US dollar a "safe haven" for people who are not so much worried about the value of a dollar, but just want a currency perceived to be more stable than their own. This effectively "ships" US dollars overseas where they can no longer cause inflation in our domestic economy and why is your Apple product still costs as cheap as it does.

But don't worry, either through future taxation or inflation, the aforementioned rates above WILL be paid, and quadruply so by future generations who were nearly completely innocent.

---

http://aaron-clarey.podomatic.com/
http://www.assholeconsulting.com
https://www.youtube.com/user/AaronClarey
https://twitter.com/aaron_clarey
http://www.amazon.com/Aaron-Clarey/e/B00J1ZC350/

Whilst Cappy's Away, Uncie Bern and Davis Will Play

September 5, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

To cover the Cap until the point in time I return consider visiting our good friends Davis Aurini and Uncie Bern. Bern has his latest podcast out (AND HE INSTALLED A STAT COUNTER!) Send him lots of traffic so you can show the love.

And Davis, believe it or not, actually got a REAL podcast, not a YouTube channel you're all supposed to rip the audio off of.

Fed Interest Rates Have No Effect on the Economy

September 6, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Since the day you were born and your parents put an economics textbook in your hand, it was just "known" that lowering interest rates helps boost the economy. Specifically, "the interest rate" the Federal Reserve controls (also called the Federal Funds Rate) was our monetary policy savior in case the economy looked like it was going to go into recession. Ergo, in combination with expansionary fiscal policy, "lowering the interest rate" would help put people back to work and defeat the hated "business cycle" forever.

Or maybe not.

For before I hop in my car and head out to Seattle, I decided to do a little research in aiming to make some pre-made very Cappy economic posts. And one thing I wanted to see was if the federal funds rate had ANY correlation or effect on economic growth.

It does not:

This concludes your pre-made Very Cappy post of the day.

---

http://aaron-clarey.podomatic.com/
http://www.assholeconsulting.com
https://www.youtube.com/user/AaronClarey
https://twitter.com/aaron_clarey
http://www.amazon.com/Aaron-Clarey/e/B00J1ZC350/

The Christian Hour with Chris Bechtloff

September 7, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Chris is getting serious about putting together weekly (Saturday night) podcasts that last on average about 3 hours. This is a "short one" but he has guests on as well as his insights that make for a gut-busting funny broadcast. Consider tuning in.

Episode #106 9-7-15

September 8, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Cappy podcasting from the road. This time in Seattle where he interviews his friend he's crashing with (about some rather crass topics) and James Cue of "recovering MGTOW" fame about why he left MGTOW and focused instead of self-improvement.

Greetings from Lake Coeur d' Alene!

September 8, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Remember to Enjoy that Decline!

World Reserve Currency and the Collapse of the USD

September 9, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Was a guest on Jason Hartmann's show. Had a very enjoyable chat about all things economic and "world reserve currency."

A Revisitation of Scarcity and Why It's a Good Thing

September 10, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

A classic from a couple years back that reminds us that without scarcity there is no value.

Geek Out with The Bechtloff Whilst Cappy's in Billings

September 11, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Making my way back home and posts will go back to a regular schedule. And they're going to stay that way. The traveling will be done for practically the rest of the year. In the meantime may I recommend you tune into The Bechtloff's latest podcast where he talks about murders in Chicago, SJW's, video games, comics and more in his hilarious and engaging demeanor.

From Beartooth Pass

September 11, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Discovered after 2 years my phone has a "panoramic" photo function. Served me well on top of Beartooth Pass in Montana.

Psychology is Bullshit

September 11, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

An excellent take down of pseudo science known as psychology by Mr. Aurini.

Seattle's Lazy..errr... "Poor" Get What They Deserve

September 11, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Ahhhhhh warm fuzzies. And on Labor Day no less.

Your College Job This Year

September 11, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Alex is hiring.

Thank you all for your support, Academic Composition has grown a lot because of you. This summer, we received plenty of help with regard to both, writing papers and posting ads on CL. With your help, we were able to expand the ranks of our writers and regular marketing contractors. Despite this, we still need to replace one of our main full-time writers who has gone off to law school. Although several applicants already look very promising, we just cannot get enough help for the Fall semester. Quite easily, we could well hire at least five full-time writers and dozens of part-timers by the end of the year. Our average full-time writer earns around $3,000 per month and our CL part-timers easily bring in $200-400 per month with less than 10 hours of work. The most regular marketing associates have the potential to earn over a $1,000 per month in near future within 30 hours of work: that doesn't even amount to a full 8 hour day per week. For all of you who have already contacted us, please keep in touch. Most of our clients will be back in school within a couple of weeks, the high-season is just around the corner and it will soon be opportunities galore. Aleksey Bashtavenko Academic Composition Owner & Principal Writer (540) 300-1253 academiccomposition@gmail.com www.academiccomposition.com www.linkedin.com/pub/aleksey-bashtavenko/25/7b8/323/

Why Davis Aurini is Better Than Your 401k: AKA Micro-Equity Investments

September 12, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

I faced a problem I never had before in my life.

After investing in silver, guns, bullets, iodine pills, my house, even body armor,

and

after trying my best to blow the remainder on my version of “hookers and blow” (American west road trips), for the first time in my life I actually had money left over to invest in an IRA.

Now many of you know my personal opinions about IRA's, 401k's, RRSP's and other retirement plans. Not only do I fear the risk they will be confiscated like they were in Argentina, Bulgaria, Poland, and more recently Cyprus, but I also plain just refuse to pay the current prices being demanded in today's stock market.

Today I am expected to fork over $23 for $1 in earnings, which in actuality only entitles me to a paltry 2% dividend yield (ie- the only REAL rate of return, not the magic paper “capital gains” everybody fawns over). And forget bonds as they're offering rates of return as paltry as stocks.

So where, precisely, is the Ole Captain supposed to park his money?

Why, Davis Aurini of course!

At first you may be scratching your head, wondering if Davis has started a new corporation you can invest in or if he's selling himself into slavery. But there is a very good reason I invested in Davis Aurini instead of an IRA. And if I go through some of the numbers you will most likely be guaranteed to agree with me.

First, I didn't invest in “Davis Aurini.” I hired him to do a project for me. Specifically, I paid him $1,000 to record the audio book version of “Bachelor Pad Economics” because not only does he have the voice for it, he is a pro and I know he will get the job done. So it's not like I bought his servitude for the next couple of months and get a percentage of his future earnings.

Second, that investment will likely give me a rate of return that will beat out all the investment pros in Wall Street, Peter Schiff, Warren Buffett, and anybody else who has an impressive track record. If my audio book sales of Worthless is any indication, I can expect to clear $120 a month in audio book sales of "Bachelor Pad Economics." 50% of which I pay out to Aurini for his work. This nets me $720 per year and thus a 72% annual rate of return. Again, beating out the majority of Wall Street professionals by far.

And, third, this is nearly 100% under my control. Unlike stocks, bonds, REIT's or other securities, I'm not throwing my money into some large multi-billion dollar corporation with 100,000 employees and millions of moving parts, effectively casting my fate to the wind.

I pay Davis.
Davis records the book.
We upload the files.
I market the book.
Collect underpants.
Profit!!!

In short, I am getting an infinitely higher rate of return for a microscopic fraction of the risk and it's all thanks to our Canuckian friend, Davis Aurini.

Now, naturally, while a 72% rate of return is phenomenal, on a meagerly principal investment of only $1,000 it's not going to bring about early retirement. Additionally, I am well aware that I am in a unique position able to hock my wares leveraging Davis and the internet to realize this 72% rate of return. But eccentric as my investment strategy is, there are lessons for your everyday Joe when it comes to investing. Lessons you may want to heed.

First, the market is so overvalued for anybody looking into government sponsored retirement plans it's just not worth it. For the past four decades trillions of dollars in retirement money has been flooding the stock market driving up prices WELL above what the earnings and dividends warrant. You throw in the added 2-4 trillion dollars recently in QE money and ZIRP-financed corporate buybacks, and the stock markets no longer reflect an investment opportunity, but irrelevant numbers that speak more to inflation, government policy, and central banking policy than earnings, profits, dividends, and future growth.

Second, this then forces the SAVVY investor (ie-one who looks at rates of return and not just "super happy funny magic capital gains on paper") to look at alternative investments. Ones that provide higher rates of return and compel you to part with your money. But since the public markets are horrendously overvalued, it is the private markets we must look at.

Peer to peer lending.
Lending money to friends.
Investing in a small business.
Taking a crack at entrepreneurship yourself.
Crowd funding.
Hiring out the Davis Aurini's of the world.
And other forms of “micro-equity investing.”

This isn't to say these investments are not without risk, or that you wouldn't risk straining and alienating friendships violating Shakespeare's “neither a lender nor a borrower be.” But the public markets are so overvalued that the only real investments that are worth a damn are these private, micro-equity, entrepreneurial type investments.

Third, these returns are typically so much higher than the rates of return you realize in public investments that they more than pay for the tax benefits you passed up on in 401k's, IRA's, etc.

You didn't get to write off your IRA contribution at the tax rate of 20%?
Good thing that small, private investment pays 30%.

That Roth IRA would have grown tax free at a whopping annual rate of 8%?
Good thing your private investment grows at 20% more than offsetting any capital gains tax you'd have to pay.

Admittedly, there is no guarantee that your private investments will more than compensate for the opportunity costs of tax benefits that come with government endorsed retirement plans, but the difference between returns can be that wide.

Fourth, as I mentioned before, control.

I can't go to Apple's corporate headquarters and talk to their limp-wristed CEO.
You can't go to Starbucks and chat with their American-hating, leftist CEO.
And neither of us have the connections nor the money to vote in even ONE member of the board of directors to reflect our interests.

However, if I lend money to my friend to purchase a rental property, I can put it in the contract that I have significant say and control over the management of that property.

If you invest in the horse farm down the road (though I'd advise against that), you can stop in and check in on the employees to ensure they're doing whatever it is that makes horse farms profitable (glue).

And if we pay Davis to record audio books for us, and instead find out he's blown it all on Weasel Whiskey, we can both go down there and bash his knee caps in.

Again, when you “invest” in a modern day, publicly traded corporation, you are merely casting your financial fates to the wind. Micro-investments you can wield considerable control over.

Fifth, the risk of confiscation.

All the government has to do is flip a switch and your 401k, IRA, Roth or not, is now part of Obama's or Trudeau's “Wealth Equalization Happy Bunnies Act.” All those digital records of you having that hard-saved $540,000 in your RRSP is “poof!” gone, or (a la Cyprus) 50% of what it used to be. And the reason why is because it's so easy since it's nothing but digital and electronic records.

But a duplex you've gone halvsies in with your buddy is NOT a digital record the government can just “take.”

Those silver coins are not the “Silver ETF” the government just took 25% of, but physical silver coins that are in your physical possession.

And that book deal Davis and I signed is not sitting on some broker's account where the SIPC can just come in and nationalize 75% of. It's an accord between me and Davis.

Admittedly, these investments are not as liquid as say the easily-confiscatable stocks, bonds and other publicly traded securities, but you never invested in them for their liquidation. You invested in them for their RATES OF RETURN. Which leads us to the final point,

Sixth, you are actually INVESTING.

Understand that buying stocks, bonds, mutual funds, etc, in your IRA or 401k is NOT investing. The “investment” happened long ago when those companies issued the original shares or stock or bonds, took the proceeds and then invested that in property, plant, or equipment. After that it is nothing more than secondary “investors” trading very expensive baseball cards in the forms of stocks, bonds, and mutual funds. You buying your “Vanguard Index Fund” from somebody else on the NYSE does NOTHING to increase the amount of investment in the country. You merely traded cash for stocks and they, stocks for cash.

In other words, the rate of return is going to remain the same. The company will still be just as profitable and pay the exact same amount of dividends regardless of how many times you exchange your ~~Pokemon cards~~ stocks. The only real difference is if you're paying an ever-increasing amount more for that same string of future dividend payments (which nearly 100% of everybody is).

Contrast that with investing personally in either entrepreneurial ventures, micro-equity investments, peer-to-peer lending, etc., where that transaction ACTUALLY IS INVESTING, not only providing you a rate of return, but creating something of value, not to mention, likely hiring people in the process.

Again, I admit that not everybody is going to have an entrepreneurial idea at their doorstep, waiting to be financed, that provides a 72% rate of return. And I know it would take multiple of these micro-equity investments to compile an adequate portfolio that would support a retirement. And I also am aware that managing all these investments will take time and labor, unlike the convenience of merely setting your monthly auto-pay to mindlessly invest in the S&P 500 Index fund in your 401k. But here's a dirty little secret…

That's what investing has always been.

Financing individuals who had great ideas or were reliable risks you would personally lend to. Not this mindless zombie 401k clergy BS that the sheeple are sucking down whole, flooding the stock market with trillions in IRA monies because "retirement."

So if you want to continue on, worrying about how you're "only getting 1.3% in your CD's" or "Oh nosies! The Fed raised interest rates by .0000005% and the markets crashed!"

Fine.

But if you want to invest, may I suggest my good friend Davis Aurini?

---

http://aaron-clarey.podomatic.com/
http://www.assholeconsulting.com
https://www.youtube.com/user/AaronClarey
https://twitter.com/aaron_clarey
http://www.amazon.com/Aaron-Clarey/e/B00J1ZC350/

How I Accidentally Became Alpha

September 15, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

I didn't notice it at the time, but it was arguably the first time I stood up for myself and said, "No." I was sick of busting my ass off, doing 10 times what the local frat boy douche was doing, and if he could get laid while daddy paid for him, his booze, his roofies, his rent, his insurance, and his condoms, then the least any girl that had an interest in me could do would be to fuck me. I was by all measures and manners a better man than most on campus, but if any girl dared to insult me by saying,

"Lets you and me have a relationship where we cuddle, you pay for shit, spend what rare free time you have with me, but I'm not going to reward all your supreme-kick-ass-edness with sex, but merely my presence," sorry sweetheart. Don't care how blue your eyes are. Go fuck yourself.

And it was this transformation that made me the "accidental alpha."

This is a repost from 2013. Been playing catch up and working on some major projects before winter sets in. New posts will be forthcoming next week.

Episode #111 9-15-15

September 15, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Cappy and DT from The Black Brigade discuss:

IDing hot chicks in high school before they became hot
"Armchair Alphas"
Cappy's hate for humanity reinforced
1980's "death metal" zombie shirts
What economic production would be without idiots http://aaron-clarey.podomatic.com/enclosure/2015-09-15T12_40_26-07_00.mp3
AND MORE

in THIS EPISODE of The Clarey Podcast

Also visit our League of Extraordinary Podcasters!

Chris Bechtloff
Uncie Bern Bern
Kerry Lutz

Japan Closes Its Liberal Arts Colleges, and We Must Do the Same

September 16, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

The "Humanities" and "Liberal Arts" offer nothing of value to society that can't be gotten for free at your local library. Worse, they destroy generations of youth by impairing them with socialist indoctrination and hate. There are very few things on this planet more evil, destructive or worthless as liberal arts colleges:

Minimum Wage, Seattle, McDonald's, Robots, and Basic Guaranteed Income

September 17, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

If anybody starts blathering on about basic guaranteed income or their fears that "robots will take all the jobs" please just show them this:

Genuine Journalism - Why You Should Never Advertise on Facebook

September 17, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

From one of our Agents in the Field. Some outstanding research and TRUE journalism on just what a fraud it is advertising on Facebook.

This explains why I have over 300 likes for The Black Man's Guide Out of Poverty, but effectively no increase in sales.

Boy Ain't That the Truth

September 18, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Never seen Hillary Clinton depicted so well in a political cartoon.

Why I No Longer Trust Academic Studies

September 18, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Arguably the single largest concern I have about the economics "profession" is that the data we use to analyze and study economies of the past has been corrupted and tainted by political forces. Not only because this means there are nefarious political forces at work, more than happy to stunt the economic growth of a nation for their own gains, but because without REAL and ACCURATE data we will be unable to achieve the ultimate goal of economics - unlimited wealth and riches for everyone.

This has not only given rise to sites such as "Shadow Stats," but has also made me question the data I'm using in my own research.

Can I trust the FRED database?
Do I dare trust the figures posted by the BEA?
Has Obama's latest affirmative action hire corrupted the BLS data?

It makes me question the economics profession as a whole as it becomes increasingly obvious the profession is failing to increase economic growth, not to mention blatantly whoring themselves out to socialist politicians.

The problem, however, is one of a submarine without a sonar. How exactly do you analyze and research economics, society, politics, government, etc., without reliable data? And the truth is you have to go back to logic, reason, and common sense because you have nothing else to go on.

But this brings about a problem on its own. Especially if you are arguing against leftists when it comes to wealth redistribution and freedom. For while you are using reason, logic, and common sense, the left has a virtual monopoly on "academic research," and all the "empirical" data that comes with it. This allows them to simply point to bogus "studies" that "show" your wrong, when the most basic of common sense knows you're right.

To reconcile this I do two things. One, I still do empirical research. What I've found is that there are so many sources of economic data out there that they can't all be manipulated to serve (and consequently hide) a political agenda.

Can they tweak GDP? Sure.
Can they revise the methodology of unemployment? Of course.
Can they fabricate lower inflation figures? Yes.

But then they also measure labor force participation, the DOE measures electrical consumption, and I can see the stock markets inflating (showing you there IS inflation in this economy) using those as proxy and alternative economic measures to know the "official ones" don't paint the most accurate picture. In other words, if you dig deep enough you can still find the truth.

Two, I simply dismiss any research coming out of academia.

Of course, this seems the coward's and hypocrite's way out, but academia has been so corrupted it's laughable to think THEY provide real, accurate, and truthful data. All one has to do is step back, wipe their eyes clean and look at what academia has become and ask what is more likely.

First, academia is more biased to the left than journalism. It is chock full of society's lazy and ego-addicted adult children. This means they can't just collect a government check, but need some kind of "faux career" where they play "make believe intelligent adult" and thus become professors, diversity counselors, chancellors, and other worthless persons. However, since they avoid any type of real work, they need to constantly validate their existence in order to get a check. And since the private sector insists on getting something of value in return for its money, they CONSISTENTLY vote for state intervention, forcing the tax payers to finance their entirely fraudulent and unnecessary industry.

You may find my description of them a bit harsh, but there is NO doubt they are biased and have a huge incentive to fabricate data to show a mandate for an increased state.

Second, related to the first, have you ever seen an academic study that concludes there should be LESS government involvement? Have you ever seen a study that shows we should LOWER taxes? Again, step back, look, and think. Isn't it ODD their solution to EVERYTHING is "more government money?" The pure lack of (ahem) "diversity" in their recommendations should prove academics and their studies are worthless.

Third, a conflict of interest.

Since many of these "academics" aim to solve the world's social problems, what happens when those social problems are resolved?

The answer - they lose their jobs.

Ergo, just like charities, their real goal is NOT to ever solve the problem, but stretch it out, propagandize it, and demand ever more resources to TREAT it.

This is why global warming is now "climate change."
This is why the bold faced lie of "the wage gap" persists.

Because "environmental science majors" and "women studies professors" dare never to admit they've solved the problem because then they'd have to grow up, become adults, and get jobs in the real world.

And final, the childish insanity that academia and academics have become.

You can't go a week without some veritable psychopath who some how got a professorship advocating the most insane of things. Calling for the death of white males. Claiming everything is rape. Or (typically Berkeley) offering the most retarded of classes ever.

Academia is NOT the valid institution it once was back in the 1950's, but an insane asylum for society's spoiled and psychotic adult children who offer nothing of value or worth to society.

Of course, me calling professors and academians names doesn't make it so. I could be wrong after all, and they could all be 100% on the up and up. 100% honest researchers with the utmost of integrity, and I'm just an angry ideologue who doesn't like the fact their (COUGH COUGH) "empirical" research proves my world view wrong.

Well, enter in this little gem.

Apparently, in an attempt to test the validity of psychological studies, researchers (real ones) were only able to replicate the same result of only ONE THIRD the original studies. And this ~~suggests~~ proves what I've been saying all along, confirming my suspicions.

The social sciences, especially in academia, is bunk.

It's BS.

It's all a lie and not to be trusted.

Perhaps, at some point in time in the past these studies were valid. Perhaps back in those "hated" 40's you could trust your professor. But given the circumstantial evidence of childish insanity at our universities, their outright and total leftist bias, not to mention the study above, today academia and the professors that populate them are

liars charlatains thieves ideologues
and parasites

on society.

You want society to advance? A really good first step would be to eliminate all taxpayer financing and funding of higher education. But right now let's just settle on not believing one "study" let alone word that is ever uttered out of the mouths of these worthless academians.

---

http://aaron-clarey.podomatic.com/
http://www.assholeconsulting.com
https://www.youtube.com/user/AaronClarey
https://twitter.com/aaron_clarey
http://www.amazon.com/Aaron-Clarey/e/B00J1ZC350/

Women CEOs

September 19, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

I am all for women becoming CEOs through merit. But this is just hilarious where they say women-heades S&P 500 companies "perform great" and immediately follow it up with a chart that proves the opposite.

Manpoints

September 19, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

The Father Could Not Be Reached for Comment

September 20, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

We don't need no STIIIIINNNNKING fathers!!!!!

Episode #112 9-21-15

September 21, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

In this episode

Cappy podcasts from his Jeep while on security
Strategies of patrolling and staying awake
Nobody likes shitty art
Minneapolis taxpayers to PERMENANTLY fund shitty art
DraftKings is the epitome of douche

AND MORE in THIS EPISODE of The Clarey Podcast!

Interesting

September 22, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Very interesting.

Alex is Hiring at Academic Composition

September 23, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Remember, the job isn't not exciting but it pays AND IT CAN BE DONE FROM HOME!

Academic Composition is looking for more help with marketing. All you need to do is post ads on Craigslist. You will get five dollars per lead and given that mid-terms are right around the corner for most students, you will be generating plenty of leads. We will provide you with the advertisements to post and all you have to do is create a new email address, link it to ours and then use it to set up a Craigslist account. Do keep in mind that CL expects you to post in your geographic region. So, if you reside within a 300 mile radius of a major university, your ads will do quite well. Email us for more details. Here are some testimonials from people who have been posting for us for well quite a while now! ""Long story short the guy's cool. You merely do what's asked and I assure you he ALWAYS pays. I got into this in September i believe and as I said the guy's been cool from the start. I have no problems with him, wish I could put this on my resume! Haha. My experiences from the start have been just fine, and I've no complaints." Lawrence, Texas "I've been posting for Aleksey since October or so last year. He always pays on time for the full amount. In fact, usually within minutes of me sending him an invoice. I've never had an issue with the guy with regards to post amounts, invoice amounts or payment timing. " Sean, Calgary "I think this is a great gig. I have been paid on time with no problems. It's easy money, although last week I got no leads at all, but I think that's because it was spring break for most college students. I think the leads are starting to come back though, my last ad had 3 responses. " Jose, Dallas "I've been posting ads on CL for Alex for the past few months and everything has been going great. He pays quickly via paypal when you send your invoice and you're able to track the leads that your ads generate. Posting ads for Academic Composition is a great way to make a bit of easy money on the side. " Evan, San Francisco ""Aleksey Bashtavenko's Academic Composition is known for its high quality services, cheap prices and trustworthiness. I, as a worker for example was given the task of posting Craigslist and Kijiji ads and waiting for people to reply to these ads. Once I amassed a certain number of people, I would always tell Aleksey and that same day I would get paid. Yes, you heard that right, that same day I was paid, almost instantly. Every week was like this, all I had to do was let Aleksey know and boom the money was on my Paypal account, within 1 to 2 hours!!!! If you don't believe I can show you my payment proofs, just email me at petaraki95@gmail.com and I'll send them to you. Overall, this is a very trustworthy organization and with that, I would like to say thanks to Aleksey Bashtavenko because if it wasn't for him, I wouldn't have my beer money!!!! ;)" Nenad, Vancouver Aleksey Bashtavenko Academic Composition Owner & Principal Writer (540) 300-1253 academiccomposition@gmail.com www.academiccomposition.com www.linkedin.com/pub/aleksey-bashtavenko/25/7b8/323/

Book Review: Pushing Rubber Downhill

September 23, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

You can find the book here.

Days of Wine and Roses Are Over

September 23, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

A good piece by Mumia over at AVFM.

"You Don't Have a Real Job"

September 24, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Glendon Cameron had me on his show and the conversation was not only one of the better ones, but just gut bustingly funny and something I think "Clarey Podcast" listeners would very much appreciate. Also a heavy dose of two "older brother" type guys discussing wisdom that would help out younger brothers.

Made It to Day By Day!

September 24, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Everything is coming up Milhouse apparently today!

"Sales vs. Profits" - A Tutorial for Dude Brahs and Gold Diggers

September 24, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Something's Funny With Silver

September 24, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

New sponsor everyone, but it's not so much a product, but a show and a site I think those of you interested in investing may like. Future Money Trends.

Ken sent me a sample of one of the shows and though certainly has a guy plugging his services, the discussion about silver was interesting. Don't know if you've tried to buy silver in the past couple of weeks, but it's GONE, OUT! And I don't mean the funny money paper silver, I mean the real thing.

Oddly though, the price keeps going down making for some interesting market economics.

Regardless, download or listen to the show and see if you don't like it.

Replacing Husbands With Government Checks

September 25, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Actually, the father COULD be reached for comment, but he was in Chicago.

Regardless, this is what happens when the leftist dream is installed where women trade boring, reliable, employed husbands in for sexcapades with multiple losers and government checks.

If You Think the Millennials are Wimps

September 25, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Just wait for THIS generation to circle 18 times around the sun.

Guess I'm in the Plot Line for Day By Day

September 25, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Actually made an appearance in Day By Day! Didn't know I'd be part of a plot line!

I Ask, Did the Victims Vote Left?

September 26, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Because voting left is doing the right thing and that's all that matters.

There Is No Such Thing as "Market Failure"

September 27, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

"Whatever happens, happens."
-Spike Spiegel

"Market failure" (depending on which economist you ask on which day) is when the market "fails" to provide the optimal outcome for society. It is NOT at its peak efficiency, NOT delivering the most utility to the people, NOT delivering its maximum goods and services, and therefore is failing the population.

This then gives rise to the call for (wait for it!) "government intervention."

You see, with this magic medicine called "government intervention" we can repair the market, making it efficient once again. So we lower interest rates here, jack up taxes there, perhaps regulate or deregulate an industry (again depending on which economist you ask and what time zone he's in), and POOF! All better.

Historical examples of market failure are:

The Bank Panic of 1907
The Great Depression
The Stagflation Days of the 70's
The Dotcom Bubble and
The Housing Bubble

Those gosh darn stubborn economies of those times just weren't behaving like they were supposed to damnit! And by gum, the federal government had to go in there and set things right either through inventing a central bank, or implementing the New Deal, price controls, massive expansionary fiscal policy, or good ole fashioned trillion dollar bailouts.

Immediately, leftists, socialists, internventionists, Keynesians, and other varied sorts of parasites are quick to point out the recovery that invariably ensued after these market failures. And if you were to dare ask "well, what if we just left the market alone" they all hold hands and sing in a cappella that old, standby classic tune "It Would Have Been Worse If We Did Nothing."

But while we can debate (impossibly) about whether or not intervention in these various financial crises accelerated recovery and remedied "market failure," I want to pose a different argument that is much less theoretical, much more logical, and simply one of definition. And that is calling into question if there can even be a thing called "market failure."

While true theoretical economists can debate about the technical definition of it, the operational definition of market failure, the one we have witnessed in the real world, has been one not of "a non-optimal use of resources," but rather "the government should prevent bad things."

Great Depression?
FDR will blow billions (by today's standards trillions) on the New Deal.

Inflation?
Nixon will just simply institute "price controls!" See, all better now!

Great recession?
Bush will bail out the banks, while Obama will piss away thrice that amount on poor unproductive people.

But the problem in having the government "just prevent bad things" is that it is antithetical to a free market. The nanosecond the government intervenes the market is no longer a market, but a hybrid, that neither operates nor behaves as it normally would if it were completely void of government interference. Ergo, if the government is constantly intervening, we never get around to finding out if there is such a thing as market failure or that markets can, and will, inevitably heal themselves no matter how severe the "failure."

The real issue, however, is not whether governments should intervene to prevent "bad things from happening." It's an issue of pain avoidance and speed.

Very much like slowly peeling versus rapidly ripping off the bandaid, most humans are cowards and fear the immense and immediate pain of the rip. Therefore they prefer "government intervention" in the form of taking the time to gently and meticulously peel the bandaid away. However, this only delays the inevitable, amortizing the pain over a much longer time period than had you just ripped the bandaid off. But in either case, the bandaid would have come off and you would have gone out to play as you normally would anyway.

Regardless, the exact same scenario played out with the Great Recession.

We COULD HAVE let markets work their magic. CRUSH the bankster scum that deserved to have their fortunes and careers destroyed. Let the banks fail teaching them a lesson they'd at least remember for a generation. Have the financial system go into disarray, and send the economy into a much deeper and harsher recession than we endured.

But prices would have dropped rapidly.
Assets would have become cheaper.
Labor much cheaper as well.

And soon it would be profitable once again to start ventures, business, companies anew, bringing about a quick end to the economic recession.

Instead (again, the cowards that we Americans have become) wanted to believe the lies and poppycock of an "intelligent affirmative action hire Harvard man" who assured us he would pull the bainaid off slowly, and gently, and if there was going to be any pain it would be those rat bastard rich people. And so, now 7 years later (of still-significant economic pain mind you) we are FINALLY getting back to (what can at best be charitably called) "normal" in terms of unemployment, jobs, economic growth, and income....A place we could have been at 6 years ago had we just bit the bullet.

The point is not one of whether Barack Obama's, FDR's, Bush's, Nixon's, or any other presidents' fiscal policies were correct. The point is that if left alone, the economy would have recovered just fine without government interference. Ergo, "market failure" does not really exist. But our fear of paying the full price for our economic sins, and our naivety to think politicians can some how "wash them away" does. And that, my fine young junior, deputy, aspiring, official, or otherwise economists, is the true definition of "market failure."

---

http://aaron-clarey.podomatic.com/
http://www.assholeconsulting.com
https://www.youtube.com/user/AaronClarey
https://twitter.com/aaron_clarey

http://www.amazon.com/Aaron-Clarey/e/B00J1ZC350/

Today's Office

September 27, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Remember kids! If you go to school, get good grades, go to college, heed baby boomers, and follow your heart...

You'll never ever see this in your entire life

EMERGENCY PREDICTION: Peanutizeme.com Accused of Transgenderism

September 28, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

It is a prediction that is too easy to make and one I'm going to do here, because if you can predict people it means you understand them perfectly and know what drives them. And the SJW's, specifically of the transgender variety, are going to go apeshit over the website "Peanutizeme.com"

Why?

Well, psychologically speaking they're worthless people (not transgendered people, I'm talking the SJW's who are going to protest this) and so they offer nothing of worth to society. However, just because they're worthless doesn't mean they want people to know that. Their egos are too big and fragile for that. Ergo, they constantly search for fake injustices to lash out at in a heroic and crusaderist way making it seem they offer something to this world. Of course they're just lazy, spoiled brat children who whine constantly and nobody in the real world likes, but that's what psychologically drives them.

But more specifically, THIS is going to make them see red:

See, for those of us who are normal, we are going to harken back to our childhoods during the 60's, 70's, and 80's and say,

"OH CUTE! I can become a Charlie Brown character!"

But the valueless parasites of our society will purposely look past the fun and innocent intent of this site and attack it because (once again) these people are worthless and need to fabricate faux meaning in their lives.

Anyway, to the best of my knowledge the SJW shitstorm hasn't happened yet.

But it will.

Oh, it will.

Enjoy the decline!

Daughters Don't Need No STIIIINKING Fathers!

September 29, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

As we all know, father's are completely unnecessary and unneeded. They are obsolete given government checks have arrived.

But I'd love to see a government check pull off this.

Warm Fuzzies

September 29, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Ahhhhh.

Robert Stacy McCain, Father of Six

September 30, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Schools feminist-communist 19 year old who obviously has no father.

(I love the picture of the feminist vs. McCain's children. Tell me who is living the happier childhood?)

The Great Matt Baldoni Breaks in His New Guitar

September 30, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

If you didn't know, Matt had a guitar custom made in his honor. Figured some of you (particularly of the female persuasion) would like to see him break it in:

The Big Short

October 1, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

As you know there is a movie coming out about the housing bubble called The Big Short. However, for the new readers you may not know that it was the housing bubble that led the ole Captain to his writing career and his first book "Behind the Housing Crash."

If you were interested in the goings ons of the finance and banking industry back then I cannot recommend a better book. Not because I wrote it, but because it is that good.

Anyway, if you wanted to throw the ole Captain some coppers consider picking up "Behind the Housing Crash."

Blame Women (Disproportionately) for the Collapse of Western Civilization

October 1, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

THE GREATEST GIFT

Human history has basically been the struggle for freedom. And it has been a struggle against two things:

1. Natural elements or "limitations" (such as starvation, thirst, disease, famine, cold, heat, predators, etc.)

and

2. Other humans.

The natural elements that limit human freedom have been fought against (and largely won) with advances in technology, agriculture, economics, and science. We've eliminated starvation and thirst through agricultural technology, cured diseases through medicine, and though we have yet to unlock the secrets of immortality, the majority of people today do not spend their time searching for a clean water source or worrying about where their next meal is coming from.

However, whereas "natural limitations" to human freedom can be solved through vaccines, technology, and other cures found in the physical world, the human-induced limitations to freedom (called "tyranny") cannot. By their very nature they are human, which means in "eradicating" humans would wipe us all out, tyrants and innocents alike, leaving no human history to speak of. Thus, instead of "simple" solutions such as vaccines, farming methods, economic advances, etc., the solution to human tyranny has been 6,000 years of blood toil slavery war tears

torture

and other incalculable amounts of human suffering.

However, slowly, but surely human kind has made advances in pushing back the tyranny that once enslaved us all. First it was fighting against the warlords and tribal chieftains who merely enslaved entire tribes for their own enrichment and pleasure. Then it was against religious theocracies who, again, merely used deities and the threat of hell (or burning at the stake) to enslave entire populations for their own advancement. Monarchs and kings were nothing more than glorified warlords who were "benevolent" enough to let their peasants participate in the euphemism of slavery called "serfdom." And even today, after billions of gallons of human blood has been spilled we have outright dictators and despots who, again, use their people as cattle to live high off of.

But still, after all of this, some humans have managed great advances against tyranny. And after many wars, reformations, revolutions, Magna Carta's, and constitutions, a genuinely free society in the form of Western Civilization formed, arguably with the United States of America as its most refined product. For the first time in history humans can do what they want, say what they want, believe what they want, but above all else, be entitled to the vast majority of the fruits of their labor. They are no longer slaves to a tyrant, slaves to a theocracy, or serfs to a king. They are their own masters who self govern themselves. And it is this - that man has freed himself from not just nature, but other men - that is the pinnacle achievement of human kind.

This freedom, which has cost more than anything else in terms of human blood, time, toil, suffering and sacrifice, is the greatest gift humans have ever given themselves. In letting people keep the majority of the proceeds of their time and have agency over their own lives humans have made the most incredible of advances over the past 300 years (which is roughly when freedom started to become prevalent in Western Civilization). We have solved hunger, we discovered automation, we discovered electricity, we achieved flight, we've eradicated disease, founded computing, unlocked chemistry, and a million things more, all of which have allowed us to create lives for ourselves that are so amazing and rapidly advancing they were incomprehensible to merely a single generation before.

It is the proverbial finger free men can give the past 6,000 years of tyrants.

But all of this, ALL OF IT, hinges on one thing - that people are allowed to remain free and be entitled to the vast majority of their own production and be the masters of their own lives. And if we lose that, we lose everything.

Enter in women.

WOMEN

Women, in a historical context, of course have always been here. They are a part of human history as much as any man. However, they are not the primary actors, participants, or determiners of human history, largely in part because of biology and nature's "natural tyrants." Women are physically weaker, thus less prone to wage war and participate in battle. They also are the ones to get pregnant, again physically limiting what they can do in a world largely ruled by "might makes right." They also are more nurturing, psychologically predispositioning them to stay at home and rear the children. And they also have boobs (which if you didn't know) was nature's kind of authoritative way of saying, "Yeah, you're the one who's going to stay off the battlefield and rear the children."

This is not to belittle or besmirch the role of women in history (of which there are many examples of women in history). It is however to point out that the vast majority of human history has been determined and made by men. Consequently, this greatest gift of freedom, that was so hotly contested for over these past 6,000 years, was bought and paid for by the deaths, blood, toil and suffering of hundreds of millions, if not, billions of men. Additionally, it is men who have availed themselves of this freedom, well beyond that of women. The VAST majority of all scientific advances have (once again) been discovered through the mental sweat and toil of men. And while we can all certainly rush to point out the occasional female scientist or inventor, this fact is blatantly apparent, even today, where the majority of STEM students are men, and the majority of "social work" majors are women.

The point, however, is not a competition as to "who created what" and what the sex ratio of corpses were on history's battlefields. The point is this freedom, and the commensurate AMAZING technology and INCOMPREHENSIBLY easy life that came with it, was available to both sexes even though men largely earned it. And with these amazing advances in technology, life got so easy (in historical terms) that humans no longer had to worry about the natural tyrants that historically oppressed them (disease, starvation, sanitation, etc.), but could now focus their efforts on much lesser problems.

What were these problems? Well, more of the sociological variety.

Egalitarianism
Education
Health
Family
Crime
Psychology
Etc.

However, a very interesting one was the issue of women's suffrage and equality.

Previous to this, and admittedly by nature, women were just plain not allowed into the management and leadership of society. Men had paid the price, literally, in blood, sweat, and toil, and it was laughable at the time that women would have a say in economic and political affairs. However, with technology (invented by men, afforded to them by the freedom they paid a dear price for), pressing matters such as war, famine, disease, etc., were becoming less and less frequent. Additionally, labor saving devices created by the industrial revolution (COUGH, MEN!) allowed women not to be anchored at home, as well as allowed them to work, earning a keep just like men. Furthermore, it wasn't as if raising children and maintaining a home was not work itself. Ergo, there was a good and compelling argument to consider letting women have the vote. And so, in 1920 the 19th Amendment was ratified in the United States and women were allowed to vote.

However, whatever the logical, economic, philosophical, not to mention, MORAL reasons there were to let women vote, you cannot deny there would be HUGE consequences in literally DOUBLING the voting population to include a group of humans who are biologically, psychologically, mentally, and emotionally different than men. And the primary fear that would result from such a dramatic shift in voting rights is that the world's greatest gift humanity gave to itself (freedom) would be undone. Women would vote for more state intervention, reinstating the human tyrants, essentially undoing what hundreds of millions of men had fought for over the past 6,000 years.

Of course, on the face of it, this is laughable. No doubt such concerns were scoffed at during the early days of women's suffrage, just as they would be today. Why would women CONSCIOUSLY vote themselves and the rest of humanity back into tyranny? Who wants to be ruled by a dictator? Who wants to slave away for the government? However, if we are to look at the empirical data and see how women have handled the responsibility of voting we see that is PRECISELY what they're doing. And there is sadly no debate about it.

Again, the vast majority of human history has been a struggle for freedom from its oppressors. It has been minimizing the government that lords over them and maximizing the individual. It has been allowing people to keep the majority of the fruits of their own labor and control over their destiny. And the way you can tell whether somebody in Western Civilization is for freedom or not is quite simply this:

Do they vote for more government?
Or do they vote for less?

This further simplifies into the direct actions of:

Do they vote left?
Or do they vote right?

Do they vote labor?
Or do they vote conservative?

Do they vote democrat?

Or do they vote republican?

And while admittedly, there are certainly flaws with ALL political parties, it is the voting action that belies the intention of the individual. And women's intention has been for more government, a larger state, and less freedom.

Unfortunately, the data is not perfect as it only goes back to the Eisenhower administration (and please provide me better data if you have it), but it will suffice. The best data I could find on voting patterns for women is the presidential Gallup Poll that measures the lead (+) or deficit (-) democrat candidates had among men and women. (This graph takes a bit of thinking to understand, but for the sake of simplicity it's best to read it as (if there's a positive sign) men/women like the democrat +X or (if there's a negative sign) men/women hate democrats -X.)

Gender Gap in Voting for President, Final Pre-Election Polls

	Men	Women	Difference
[illegible]	-8	-17	10 pts.
2008	0	14	14 pts.
[illegible]	-12	-4	16 pts.
2000	7	8	15 pts.
1996	+1	-13	14 pts.
1992	4	8	4 pts.
1988	-12	-4	8 pts.
1984	28	10	18 pts.
1980	-13	-3	10 pts.
1976	18	3	14 pts.
1972	-26	-34	8 pts.
1968	2	2	4 pts.
1964	-[illegible]	+[illegible]	4 pts.
1960	4	2	6 pts.
1956	-[illegible]	-[illegible]	17 pts.
1952	6	16	10 pts.

Figures represent lead/deficit for Democratic candidate among men and women in each election, in percentage points.

GALLUP

But regardless of the complexity and shortcomings of the chart, the point is very clear. Women prefer a larger state and less freedom to men.

However, within this chart there are two other important observations.

One, (you have to read the numbers, not just look at the right column) originally women actually preferred the republican candidates over men, especially during the Eisenhower administrations. They even preferred the ugly Richard Nixon over the hot and handsome John F. Kennedy in 1960 (though not by much margins). It wasn't until 1972, and especially 1976 did women switch to preferring a larger state.

Two, this switch accelerated rapidly from 1976 to 2012, going from just an 11 point preference over men for a larger state to a full 20 point preference with Obama's second election.

This doesn't make a lot of sense since if women were supposed to be the Four Horsemen of the Apocalypse for Western Civilization, then why did they wait a full 50 years to start voting in a larger state?

The answer may be found in a study conducted by Dr. John Lott and Dr. Lawrence Kenny.

D. Conclusion

There is strong evidence that it takes a very long time for turnout to fully respond to major changes in the voting franchise. Between 40 and 54 years are needed after women are granted the voting franchise for their turnout to match men's turnout. The results consistently indicate that there was a greater initial increase in turnout in states with a larger fraction of adult women who were 45–64 years of age. And it takes 16–30 years for turnout to completely rebound after a poll tax is eliminated. Secret ballots reduced voting rates, and the impact of literacy tests was significant only for the estimates without fixed effects.

Just because women were granted the right to vote didn't mean they all went to the polls that day in 1920. A lot stayed home. A lot voted the way their husbands told them. Some of them still didn't find it their place or right to vote. It takes about a generation or so for different groups of people to fully avail themselves of the franchise. This makes a lot of sense in that if you add roughly 50 years to 1920 you get 1970 where women voted "in force" and showed their true "pro-government colors."

But while this may explain the increase from Gertrude voting in 1924 to Janis Joplin voting in 1972, it doesn't explain the increasingly passionate love-affair, nay, stalker-like-obsession women have had with the government from 1972 to today. Why are women increasingly fanatic about having a larger government?

Well the answer can also be found in the dates. 1972. Feminism.

While the Susan B. Anthony's of the 1890's wanted the right to vote, own property, and sign legal contracts, the radical feminists of the 1970's were nothing but outright marxists who cowardly hid behind their genitalia claiming it caused sexism and thus entitled them to a lifelong government check. While for the most part they could be written off as such, unfortunately they largely got into a key position in society that would further influence future generations of women to come. The only place that would take them.

Academia.

And it was from our colleges, universities and other educational institutions that feminists have very successfully convinced two full generations of young girls (Gen X and the Millennials) to vote against freedom and for an increasing state.

Now I could go on measuring the various ways women vote for tyranny over freedom, but the point is that for whatever reason they do. And worse, increasingly so. They vote for the government at the expense of the individual. They vote for dependence rather and independence. They vote a government check before a paycheck. And while we can sit here and debate about whether that's the price we have to pay for equality, or that maybe men were wrong this entire time, and that maybe its time for a different approach, they ARE doing precisely what we feared. They are undoing what all of human history fought for these past and painful 6,000 years. They are undermining freedom. They are destroying Western Civilization.

The question is whether we as a people, both male and female, love the freedoms afforded to us by the countless sacrifices of countless generations before us enough to have the courage to merely state this fact.

THE COSTS OF NAIVETY

But while women (as a group) tend to vote for tyranny, the question is whether they do this consciously. Whether they do it maliciously.

Do women wake up every morning, licking their chops saying, "I can't wait to bring down Western Civilization today!"

Or are they just naive, blissfully believing the sweet lies politicians tell them about free education, free health care, free child care, free food, free housing and free everything?

The answer is rather clear.

Very few people are genuinely evil and wish bad things upon others. And we can safely say that the majority of women are NOT evil people who wish to destroy the best development of human history. And though there are some genuinely evil people who DO wish to destroy and harm others (feminists and SJW's) the vast majority of women are well intentioned, caring people.

The problem, however, is you can be the sweetest woman with all the best intentions in the world. If you're naive or ignorant to the point you're wrong, you'll still have the same effects of being an evil, malicious person out to cause damage. Thus, whether out ignorance or evil, society is going to pay the exact same price no matter what your intentions. And so, as women vote and make other decisions in life about how the country should be run, Western Civilization suffers because of their ignorance and naivety.

The first and most obvious of these is money.

Money is not the root of all evil or some kind of tool of control of evil capitalists. It is your time. It is your life. It is what you get in exchange for forfeiting a fraction of your FINITE life in the form of labor. You then use this "root of all evil" as a means to SUPPORT YOURSELF and KEEP YOURSELF ALIVE.

The freedom of speech is one thing.
The freedom of religion is another.
But the freedom to be entitled to the majority of the money you make is the most important freedom as it is your LIFE.

But women think nothing of voting in tyrants who want to take it.

Readers of my blog are already intricately aware of the amount of money governments take from their citizens every year. They are aware of government spending to GDP. They are aware of government debt to GDP. They are aware 70% of the state's budget goes to income redistribution. They are aware of the difference between a million and a trillion.

Your average Western Civilization female voter is not.

You average female voter is a by product of her evolution, environment, genetics and upbringing. And therefore your average female voter is stuck in "stage one" thinking where she:

1. Wants to solve a problem, but
2. Doesn't know how much it will cost, but
3. Doesn't care because she never looked at the budget anyway because
4. She thinks "the government has unlimited money" because
5. She really doesn't know the difference between a million and a trillion

so

6. Votes for more government spending anyway.

The problem is she LITERALLY does not realize that money just doesn't come from "poof" out of nowhere. And she CERTAINLY does not understand how the government just "printing off more money" would result in hyper-inflation. Thus, in a very naive and child-like way, she will do what is logical to a 7 year old. Vote for more government money, consequently voting the country that inch further into tyranny and enslaving us all that micro-second more in taxes.

Now, you multiply this times 150 million women, over the course of now four generations and you get what we're all familiar with. Debt to GDP of 110%. Government spending as a percent of GDP of 40%. Slowing economic growth, etc. But the larger point is the relationship between women voting and government is not merely one of more "socialists" being elected, but increased government spending which DIRECTLY lessens the amount of money and TIME we have to ourselves.

FIG. 2. Effect of giving women the right to vote on per capita state government expenditures and revenue. The horizontal axis shows the years before and after women were given the right to vote in different states; year 0 is the first year in which women were allowed to vote in different states.

Unfortunately, the costs female naivety does not stop at a simple increase in our tax bill. The consequences cascade horribly from there. For in voting for an ever increasing government, you by default crowd out the people it governs. And with government accounting for now 40% of GDP

"something's gotta give."

The first thing that gave was men, specifically in their role as fathers, husbands, and heads of households. Previous to women's suffrage and the massive expansion of government, men were the nucleus of society and the economy. It was around a man families and society were raised. And it was his economic production that supported them all.

However, as women voted in more and more social spending they effectively replaced men with the government. It was no longer the man who brought home the bacon, but the mailman who delivered the government check. It was no longer dad who would feed the kids, but the EBT card afforded to you by Barack Obama. And it was no longer father who paid the mortgage and kept a roof over the family's head, but HUD and their section 8 housing.

Soon women started asking the question 1970's feminists were dying them to ask all along:

"Why do we need a man?"

And sure enough 73% of black women, 51% of Latinas and 28% of white women agreed. Why did they need a man? And those respective percentages of women went forth and had illegitimate children thinking a government check was a superior substitute to a father.

Sure enough, without purpose or agency in life, and their birthright as a man taken from them by a government check, more and more men lost all hope and started checking out of society. They started marrying less, working less, substituted real women with porn, and lived vicariously through video games. They were no longer the strong and intrepid men like their WWII ancestors, but unincentived lifeless men with no direction and purpose. And with the economic nucleus of Western Civilization disheartened to the point of inaction, economic growth started to slow.

With the engine of Western Civilizaiton sidelined from their original roles of fathers and husbands, the next chip to fall was, naturally, the family. Without a father around the American family started to disintegrate. There were of course pre-ruined families called "single parent" home, denying children from birth the right to a stable nuclear family. But even those children "lucky" enough to have been born to a husband AND wife, only stood a 50/50 shot of having a normal childhood as half of all marriages ended in divorce.

The wife wasn't "haaaaaapppyyyyy"
And she needed to "fiiiiiind heeersellllllffff"

and the feminists were there egging them on every inch of the way.

Sure enough more than half of all children born from the 1970's on would be brought up in non-stable, non-nuclear families. And while this may have been championed by feminists and other true enemies of Western Civilization, it took a devastating toll on those children who were the future generations of America. Depression, suicide, crime, debt, divorce, alcoholism, nearly every single social and psychological ailment you can think of is positively correlated without having a stable, nuclear family to be brought up in. Alas, not only did half of America's future endure this, it left such a bad taste in their mouths the smart ones said, "never again," swearing never to have children, tanking the birthrate and putting an end to American families.

This relates closely to the third domino to fall, lost sovereignty.

Since leftist politicians (as well as rightists) want to stay in power, they will do whatever they can to ensure they are in control of the government. This not only means bribing the naive portion of the population with "free everything," but it also means sacrificing the nation itself. As long as these tyrants don't have to work real jobs they, will do whatever they can to stay in power.

Enter in immigration.

I find three things cute, endearing, and ironically tragic:

1. The "refugee crisis" going on in Europe
2. The illegal immigration debate in the US and
3. The rape epidemic in Sweden

In all three cases men and women, rightists and leftists alike, are against, if not aghast at what is happening in their respective countries when it comes to immigration (and well, that whole rape thing).

In Europe nearly everybody is against the allowance of 2 million "refugees," but their governments still allow it to happen.

In the US 76% of democrats are against illegal aliens and amnesty, but again, our government allows it to happen.

And in Sweden, ahhhhh, lovely socialist, very pro-feminist Sweden. There's a "bit" of a rape epidemic going on due to the immigrant Muslim population there. But nobody dares grow the balls to kick them out in fear of being accused of racism.

Now in all three cases the women, I presume (and especially in Sweden), are against these immigrants coming into their respective countries. However, even with broad support from people all across the political spectrum the governments (leftists ones mind you) ignore the desires of their people and let these immigrants in knowing full well they will never return to their countries of origin.

Why?

Because it will keep the left in power. It will expand and ensure future government control. Those are all future leftist voters who will demand future leftist politicians.

Alas, this is the perfect example of how women's naivety deals another blow to Western Civilization. Even though women are generally against illegal immigration (and I would presume also rape), they never get past stage one thinking of:

"Well the democrats/labor/left is for children/the little guy/the poor/the old/fluffy bunnies, so I'm going to vote for them."

But then are surprised when leftists like Tony Blair or Jack Kennedy sell the sovereignty of their nation to foreigners who plain don't care to adhere to Western Civilization, if not outright hate it, so they can ensure they and their party remain in control of the government.

Again, it doesn't matter what women's intentions or expectations are when they vote. If they vote for the wrong people the effects will be the same as if a malicious and evil person, intent on destroying the country, voted. And allowing a people from a culture that is non, if not anti-Western Civilization is arguably the final blow to the long term survival of Western Civilization.

THE SOLUTION

To be frank there is none. This entire post is merely one for posterity wherein I will be able to say "I told you so" for the rest of my life, as well as an exercise in philosophical and theoretical thought. The left is too heavily funded, well too positioned in education, media, government, and the universities, and have done such a great job of brainwashing women that there will never be a significant percentage of women that will wake up and heed the points I've made above. Additionally, (in a comedic, but still 100% truthful sense), in the wise words of Bill Burr,

"Women are surrounded by this tornado of misinformation [about how great they are], and nobody corrects them because we want to f#ck 'em!"

However, if we are serious about not throwing away the best gift humanity has ever given itself, and we do not wish to dishonor the untold number of men who paid incalculable prices over the past 6,000 years, we need to look at who has the right to vote.

The obvious solution is to rescind women's suffrage. The various leftist political parties in western nations would never recoup from such a loss and we could very easily enact (or rescind) the legislation necessary to put Western Civilization back on the fast track. However, this is not the answer. If we rescind women's right to vote, then why not blacks? If not blacks? Why not Jews? If not Jews, why not dashingly handsome half-Irish economists with a penchant for video games and motorcycle riding? That road merely goes back to the tyranny we're wishing to stave off.

The answer lies in the founding principle of Western Civilzation - Merit.

Admittedly, I've been very hard on women in this treatise (but rightly so). However, while the majority of women do vote against freedom we all know women personally who are not naive, who do not vote with their hearts, who are not stuck at stage one thinking, and actually do know the difference between a million and trillion. We know women who DESPERATELY love their husbands, desperately love their children, and take the time to study the finances, economics, and politics of this nation before ditzily casting off their vote for the politician who promises them the most money. Concurrently, we also know blacks, hispanics, asians, Jews, Madagascarians, gays, eskimos, Indians, Muslims, agnostics, Catholics and lesbians who also earn their keep, study the country's finances, and also desire to vote for freedom and against the state. Ergo, we cannot rely on mere physical traits or religious beliefs, but rather whether they are contributing members of society who have EARNED the right to vote, not merely "spat out of a vagina within the US' borders." And there ARE ways to do that, some of which have already been done.

For example, in the embryonic years of the United States you not only had to be a white male to vote, you also had to own property. The founding fathers had this requirement because not only did they not want blacks or women to vote, but because they also didn't want stupid white men to vote! You couldn't just have been "born a white male." You also had to prove you could work and manage your finances accordingly that you were a productive member of society. And requiring ownership of property was a proxy for that hurdle.

However, while that may have had the intended effect in 1790, today we have the technology that a much better and much more meritorious voting franchise can be given - taxes.

Very simply, if you want to vote you need to have paid taxes.

If you collect a government check. No.
If you're on EBT. No.
Are you on TANF? No.
Disability? No.
Social Security? No.
Housing assistance? No.
Attending a state university and getting a subsidy from the taxpayer? No.

You MUST BE a contributing member of this society, paying into the government to have a say in how the country is ran. You must NOT BE a parasite collecting a government check making you by definition a ward on the state. This discriminates against no one, but ensures those who are paying for the government are the ones determining how it is managed, and is thus far in my economist's mind of thinking the best way to award the right to vote.

Of course, sadly, as I said before, this is all academic. Too many people who are too vested in the demise of Western Civilization already have the vote. And too many people (both men and women) are just plain too damn stupid, ignorant and naive to listen to reason, evidence, logic, and reality. But let it be said and noted that when Western Civilization finally collapses, when Rome v. 2.0 falls, when humanity's greatest gift to itself is taken away it was the female voter and her naivety that was disproportionately to blame. And those 6,000 years of human pain, suffering, sacrifice, blood and war was undone by 60 years of childish, spoiled, petulant feminism.

Enjoy the decline.

_____

http://aaron-clarey.podomatic.com/
http://www.assholeconsulting.com
https://www.youtube.com/user/AaronClarey
https://twitter.com/aaron_clarey
My Books
Amazon Affiliate

Seriously, THIS is Why I Have Guns

October 1, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

These are zombies. Liberals, but zombies none the less. They will be coming for you if society lets them.

Blue Collar Guys are Beneath White Collar Women

October 1, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Even though they make more than them. Oh well. Enjoy you cats.

MGTOW Flow Chart!!!

October 2, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Are you confused about whether you're a ~~VirginTOW~~ MGTOW? Not too sure what it takes to be in this elite group of men? Never fear, Cappy's here with his easy to understand flow chart! Just answer "yes" or "no" to the questions below and find out if YOU have what it takes to be ~~VirginTOW~~ MGTOW! (may have to click to get original size)

Things Liberal Arts Majors Can't Build

October 2, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

One man tanks.

Psychology is BS

October 2, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Just utter BS.

They Were Wrong Because They Were Liars

October 6, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

A cute segment of the ole Captain's audience is young Millennials who are libertarian/free market types, but actually believe in the global warming tripe. I find in amusing in that they obviously have the independent thought to see through their teachers' BS and politicians' BS when it comes to economics, but then fully and whole heartedly believe the exact same liars when it comes to the environment.

So let me help the yoots out there and point out two things that may at least make you want to QUESTION your indoctrinators the next time they say "climate change" is real (and "by the way, vote for more social security")

#1. Laurent Fabius, France's foreign minister said we have "500 days to avoid climate change chaos!" Only problem is that was 504 days ago and counting.

#2. While the baby boomer teacher caste was brainwashing my generation about the ozone layer (yeah, you don't remember that because it proved to be another leftist bogus scare tactic), they were also trying to scare everybody saying there was going to be "peak oil" and that we'd run out of oil by 2015.

Only problem is we haven't. Matter of fact there's a glut of it on the market right now.

I intend on doing a more indepth video about why I don't believe in global warming because there is a significant contingent of my readers who are genuinely curious, as well as intellectually honest about it. And so a reasoned and truth-hunting discussion will be had on it. But I did want to point out the horrible track record these environmentalists have about predicting such things. And not only their bad track record, but also how long they've been with us, in our midst lying to the young, the intellectually weak, and the politically motivated.

Please, apply the exact same critical thinking you used to unbrainwash yourself from your socialist indoctrination. You owe yourself that much.

Legal Insurance for Men

October 7, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Hi All,

New sponsor, for everybody, but particularly men.

Cydonian Signal is offering a product called Legal Shield that basically works like a "AAA," but instead of for your car, it's for your legal protection.

More can be found here, but seriously, consider it. If you're looking for some kind of investment and you don't like the price multiples of the stock market, then things like silver, guns, LifeLock, and Legal Shield make sense. Besides, all you have to do is set down the booze for a couple days and BOOM! You've already paid for Legal Shield.

Regardless, please consider supporting Cydonian in his entrepreneurial ventures if you could use this product.

Thanks,

Cappy

The Over-Supply of Single Moms

October 7, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

I had ran into a buddy of mine earlier this afternoon who I haven't seen in about 2 years. He's a professional, works hard, stays in shape, and is the "in-demand" type of guy that every corporation wants to hire. We caught up quickly because he had to get back to work, but among the standard, job, health, "still riding motorcycles" sort of questions, inevitably the issue of him dating came up.

He said, "Yeah, I'm kind of seeing some one right now. Not terribly excited. Has a 4 year old child."

Without yelling too loud so as not to disturb the public, I said, "Really? Jesus Christ, another fucking single mom?"

He replied, "Yeah, well, at our age (41) most women have children. It's either that or date a 24 year old child and I'd rather just blow my brains out."

He was right, and it's a paradox most of my male friends face. Once you're over 35 or so you can no longer tolerate the mental pain and anguish that is known as "20 something girls." But if you do date older, it's practically a guarantee the women has spit out some other guy's child. And so millions of men every year choose between a rock and a hard place, wondering what it was like in the 50's when you could have BOTH a sane, young, 20 something girl who was NOT towing some other guy's mistake around with her.

But then something dawned on me as I headed back home.

First, this wasn't my only male friend I knew who was 35+ and childless. I knew many more. Matter of fact all my male friends are childless and over +35. And they all had the same complaint - it was practically impossible to find a woman 30+ who wasn't a single mom.

Second, why was it nearly all of my male friends didn't have children? Wouldn't I know one or two single dads??? I needed multiple hands to count the number of single moms I have as friends, but when it came to single dads it dawned on me I know NONE.

This stark contrast made my economic spidey senses start to tingle. And so, once I got set up at my cushy security guard gig, I delved into the world o' teh interwebz, and my my, the information I found.

On the face of it, logic would dictate that there should be an equal number of mothers as their are fathers. It takes two to tango, and by biological necessity one child has ONE father and ONE mother. But the huge anecdotal evidence I had in front of me, where I knew NO single dads, but a ton of single moms, suggested it was possible for there to be more moms than dads. And if you permit yourself the right combination of cynicism, misanthropy, and pessimism, you're mind can easily find the reason why there might be more moms than there are dads, resulting in a mismatched market where there is a flood of single moms, and not enough childless women.

A sole woman having multiple children with multiple fathers. Or another way of putting it, fewer men impregnating more women, disproportionately lessening the number of childless women compared to childless men, resulting in a shortage of childless women (or the reverse, a surplus of single moms).

At first I tried to find some data on the number of childless men and women in America. This proved problematic and there was no obvious data available. However, I did find some data in Australia and extra feministy Norway. For men Down Under, between the ages of 45-59 13% of them are childless compared to only 10% of women of the same age. This 3% difference is not necessarily enough to trigger the drastic price changes that usually come with genuine shortages or surpluses in economics, but leave that one to Norway.

In 1985 only 14% of Norwegian men were without children by the age of 45%.
By 2013 this had increased to 23%.

Naturally, this could have been for any number of reasons. Economics, progressive credentialism, politics, etc., But if you looked at what happened to Norwegian women of the same age, you see it's largely a female decision. In 1985 only 10% of Norwegian women were childless, compared to 13% in 2013. Norwegian women were having roughly the same number of children, but with much fewer men.

However, none of my friends (domestically anyway) live in Australia or Norway. And I kept trying to see if I could find the data to prove whether my hunch was right or wrong. And sure enough I found it in (oddly) the Census Bureau's "Mother's Day" news release and "Father's Day" news release. Alas, I should NOT have been looking for statistics on "childless" men or women. I should have been looking at the opposite side of the same coin - the number of mothers and fathers in the country. And it's about as lopsided as Norway.

As of 2010 and 2012 there were 85.4 million mothers impregnated by 67.8 million fathers. Yes, I know men die earlier, but we are talking a nearly 26% GAP between the number of fathers and mothers. If we take the nominal figures (and ignore deaths of fathers) these 67.8 million fathers effectively took 17.6 million single, childless women off the market by impregnating them. And when you consider there is roughly only 120 million post-pubescent American men in the country, 67.8 of which are already fathers, leaving only 52.2 million childless men, that 17.6 shortage is HUGE! There is an effective 33% SHORTAGE OF CHILDESS SINGLE WOMEN FOR THEIR EQUIVALENT CHILDLESS SINGLE MEN!

The result is nothing short of insulting.

It's not just my buddies' "bad luck" they can't find childless women, but it has been women, consciously and purposely sleeping with men AND bringing their babies to term, who then either file for divorce, or never got married in the first place, returning to the dating market thinking having another man's child is not an insult or repulsive to men who were infinitely more responsible. Worse is the utter absence of shame or responsibility, or even being cognizant of what they've done. I'm all for giving women the green light to slut it up, ride the cock carousel, and do whatever they want to do sexually. But without the traditional norms and social values, specifically shame and the insistence on a nuclear family, women actually think they've done nothing wrong bringing a child into a broken home, and are even insulted when you have a microscopic modicum of self-respect and say, "yeah, I'm not dating a single mom."

Alas, the tragedy is no matter how right we may be, and no matter how much sanity this brings all those responsible childless men explaining "YES, there is indeed THAT MANY SINGLE MOMS," it doesn't change the fact there's that much of a shortage of childless single women. And with such a shortage, the price you are going to pay is immense. So immense, you (as you no doubt have noticed), mathematically you are likely to be forced to date and marry a single mom.

Just do yourself a favor and insist on her knowing who is settling, who is in charge, and who has the final say in all matters adult.

Feminists Pissing Themselves for Feminism

October 8, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Honest to god, you can't make it up.

Shooting Humans…Er…"Fish" in a Barrel

October 8, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Logically it's not complicated.

But when leftists value their political positions more than human life, well then it gets complicated.

But for us sane people, it's not that complicated.

Marvel's Destruction of White Male Comic Book Super Heroes and Why It's Irrelevant

October 9, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Despite the dashing looks, irresistible charm, and much-better-than-average-for-a-40-year-old-physique I have today, in my youth I was a nerd. And not just "the kid who was shy" type nerd, I was a full on, 100%, grade A nerd. I DM'd several D&D campaigns, played Shadow Run, didn't break 100 pounds until I was a sophomore in high school, and still to this day have my dice bag.

I was, and still am to this day, a nerd.

So occasionally I like to geek out and listen to one of my favorite podcasts, The Bechtloff, wherein Chris (the host) hosts anywhere from 2-5 other nerds and discuss all thinks geekery.

Video games
Movies
RPG's
Table top games, and Comics.

However, a common theme that is discussed on his show is the trend in the comic book industry to basically eliminate all white male super heroes and replace them with any one of a number of permutations of non straight white males.

The Green Lantern is now black.
Thor is a girl.
Peter Parker (spider man) is now gay.
But that's if you didn't know he was Hispanic before.
And then there's Ms. Marvel who is now a Muslim Naturally, there is a backlash, but for more reasons than you'd think.

One, you are destroying the original characters as they were originally created.
Two, the obvious ploy amongst Marvel (and DC comics) to placate to leftist politics of diversity at the expense of the franchises (much like James Bond being black) ruins the comics.
Three, it insults true original creators of non-white male heroes such as Static Shock, Blade, Jason Fly (a video game called XIII), and Storm.
Finally, Marvel insults their fans as they're implying their readers are so shallow and stupid they'll respond positively to gender, race, or religious changes and not a good story line OR new original comics that contain new non-white male superheroes.

But while the assault on American comic book classics is under full swing by a new generation of talentless SJW wanna-but-never-will-be's Stan Lee's at Marvel's comic book division,

and

normal, everyday Americans are appalled at this assault

what we all need to do is step back, clear the gunk from our eyes, and look at the comic book industry through a different lens. Specifically that of economics. For if we do, you'll see why this destruction of "evil white male" comic book super heroes is not worth wasting one more calorie of energy getting riled up about.

First you need to know that Marvel is not Marvel anymore. It is part of the Disney corporation which bought them out in 2007. Previous to that it was a flailing company, one of which had filed for bankruptcy indicating Marvel, as a stand alone entity, was worthless and nobody wanted what they were selling.

Second, you need to ask yourself a question. "How big is Marvel compared to the rest of Disney?" And not just Marvel, but specifically the COMIC BOOK SEGMENT of Marvel?

Well, that's not as easy of a task as it seems.

If you look at Disney's 2014 annual report, you'll note that Marvel is accounted for under two of Disney's divisions. One, the "Studio Entertainment" division and, two, the "Consumer Products" division. However, MOVIES are different than COMICS and thus the COMICS ONLY portion of sales would be accounted for in the Consumer Products division:

CONSUMER PRODUCTS

The Consumer Products segment engages with licensees, publishers and retailers throughout the world to design, develop, publish, promote and sell a wide variety of products based on the Company's intellectual property through its Merchandise Licensing, Publishing and Retail businesses. In addition to using the Company's film and television properties, Consumer Products also develops its own intellectual property, which can be used across the Company's businesses.

The Consumer Products segment generates revenue from:

- licensing characters from our film, television and other properties to third parties for use on consumer merchandise
- wholesale revenue from publishing children's books and magazines and comic books
- sales of merchandise at our retail stores and wholesale business
- fees charged at our English language learning centers; and
- sales of merchandise at internet shopping sites

Significant costs include costs of goods sold and distribution expenses, operating labor and retail occupancy costs.

And when you look at Disney's total sales of $49 billion, the consumer products division accounts for a only 8.2% of that (though 10% of gross profits):

(in millions)	2014	2013	2012
Revenues:
Media Networks	$ 21,152	$ 20,356	$ 19,436
Parks and Resorts	15,099	14,087	12,920
Studio Entertainment	7,278	5,979	5,825
Consumer Products	3,985	3,555	3,252
Interactive	1,299	1,064	845
	$ 48,813	$ 45,041	$ 42,278
Segment operating income (loss):
Media Networks	$ 7,321	$ 6,818	$ 6,619
Parks and Resorts	2,663	2,220	1,902
Studio Entertainment	1,549	661	722
Consumer Products	1,356	1,112	937
Interactive	116	(87)	(216)
	$ 13,005	$ 10,724	$ 9,964

But here's the problem. Consumer products include not just comic books but all of the merchandized crap that Disney sells in association with its movies. Dolls, games, video games, music, lunchboxes, backpacks, you name it. And when I walk through Target I can see every manner of merchandise with a super hero or Disney character slapped on it, but NO comic books. So out of that meager 8.2%, it is likely much, much less.

How much less is hard to tell. Because if you search Disney's 2014 annual report you'll come up with 37 instances of "Marvel" but only 6 mentions of "comic books." And there was no data that explicitly stated how much Disney had in comic book sales. It's almost as if Disney is ashamed they even produce comic books.

So off to teh interwebz I went and I found this helpful link that contains some comic book industry statistics from 2012. Specifically, it contains total industry sales ($418 million) AND Marvel's percent of the market (39.06%). This would imply that Marvel's TOTAL comic book sales in 2012 was no more than a whopping $163 million. You know what? Let's be affirmative actiony just like Marvel's SJW comic book artists and give them a helping hand by rounding up to $200 million.

So, in 2014 Marvel sold $200 million in comic books which accounts for (drum roll please)

.4% of Disney's total revenue.

NOT 4%,
.4%
Like FOUR TENTHS OF ONE PERCENT.

And this is the reason why Marvel (and DC) going on an affirmative action campaign, replacing all the evil CIS gendered, white male super heroes with anything but doesn't matter. It's because nobody cares.

While ruining classical comic books' canon may upset comic book readers, in the grand scheme of things Disney just doesn't care. Disney bought Marvel for its ability to make movies, not comic books. And either out of the leftist political CSR bias Disney has, a hope Marvel's comic book team would develop new comics that could be turned into infinitely more profitable movies in the future, or (and I would not doubt this) Marvel put a poison pill into their acquisition from Disney that they HAD to still produce comic books despite being bought out, Marvel's comic book division still remains. Unfortunately it's staffed by talentless Millennial puke whose one trick pony is NOT to create new and exciting comics, but merely ruin previous artists' work by forcing "diversity" on it. But so what? They're irrelevant. They're .004 of Disney's total sales and it's obvious Disney doesn't care what they do.

The truth is that the comic book industry is no different than the music industry or the book publishing industry. The talented artists coming up with NEW and ORIGINAL art are on the internet and selling them directly to comic book fans. The connected, the political, the ideologues, the ass-kissers, the talentless, and the hacks are employed (unnecessarily and charitably I might) by the old and now obsolete guard. This presents a choice to true comic book fans who will determine the future of comic books.

Do you continue to buy what is nothing more than leftist propaganda posing as a comic book just because it has the brand name of "Superman" or "Thor" on it?

Or do you find new and upcoming artists who are creating the TRUE works of comic book art that will become the masterpieces of the future?

---

http://aaron-clarey.podomatic.com/
http://www.assholeconsulting.com
https://www.youtube.com/user/AaronClarey
https://twitter.com/aaron_clarey
My Books
Amazon Affiliate

The Real Reason for Millennial Mass Shootings

October 10, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Given that they're happening at about 1 a day now, I figured society might be concerned enough to entertain unpleasant truths, and thus solutions to "Millennial Mass Shooters"

"But What About Widows???"

October 12, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

What about them? (NSFW - cursing)

Those Damn White Guys

October 12, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

And all their awesome innovations.

But Muh Patriarchies!

October 13, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Oh nosies!

Parents, Please Stop Giving Your Kids Bad Advice

October 13, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

In this video I review the most common bits of bad advice parents have given their children, which usually lands them at the door step to Asshole Consulting. However, in the vain hopes some parents might listen, I compiled this list regardless:

Being a Musician Cuts Your Game in Half - By Guest Writer Matt Baldoni

October 14, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Being a Musician Cuts Your Need For Game In HALF

...but you still need game. Read on, gents.

I've been a pro freelance musician for two decades. In that time I've met a lot of women, and judging by the numbers that other men in our corner of the interwebs have calculated so diligently, I'd say my notch count is in the top 1% of all men. But that's certainly not the reason I do what I do for a living. I do it for girls AND money.

I got started playing music as a kid because I saw how well the athlete boys were doing with female attention and knew full well I couldn't do what they did, so I needed to find something else. Once I discovered that a man with a guitar and a microphone was adored, I knew that was it. I was driven by learning how to play things that inspired me emotionally, and determined to make it my job someday. It worked. But it should be known that honing my skills began at age 9.

Playing music is an incredibly difficult thing to do WELL. It takes years and years of diligence, practice, handling rejection well, and sacrifice in order to attain professional proficiency. It would not be easy for a newbie to learning game if he decided to learn to play music instead. As an adult who has never played music before, I'd vote that it's much easier to follow the advice of our experts here and just begin overcoming your anxiety and start approaching cold. But if you already have interest or experience in playing music, it can eliminate a lot of the work for you.

WHY WOMEN LIKE MUSICIANS

I've talked to thousands of them about this, learned what they like and what they don't, and there are some things that they all agree on. Some of these are: Being good with your hands is sexy. A man who can manipulate a gigantic phallic symbol and create beautiful sounds with it gives a woman tingles in the nether regions. Many women love music themselves, and find it attractive that a man loves it like they do and they like someone who they have that in common with. This happens a lot, as musicians tend to be the BIGGEST fans of music and musical artists. The confidence that comes with being a professional performer is just like any other confidence a man has...sexy. Passionate men are sexy.

When that passion and the sweat generated from it is visible and she can see it and touch it, she wants it. High status as a musician, or performing for large audiences, suggests you have status, money, and can provide resources. If you write original music (I do not), every woman dreams of being immortalized in song. Like Layla. Musicians are “different from the other guys”. Sometimes it's just long hair, other times it's because women see it as a unique job to have.

But the main reasons they like us are the same that drive them to do most anything else they do...ego and attention. We can all agree that there are many different kinds of “whore”, but the one thing women will prostitute themselves for more than any other is attention. Their egos drive their innate need to compete with one another, and musicians are often men that other women want. If they can nab a musician, they win. Also, and this is not often mentioned elsewhere, they are in absolute awe of the attention a musician man can generate for himself. They're even envious of it. Sometimes they hate us for it, but we're like drugs to them, and they can't shake us off without withdrawls.

ORIGINAL MUSIC vs COVER TUNES

I'll mention again that I am NO original artist. I've written some songs, collaborated on others, but let me remind you that my main reason for doing this is money and making a living. Musicians work to serve the public, and the public likes what they get fed. Play songs they know, play songs they like, do it with relative authenticity and accuracy, and you will make money. This formula has worked for me my entire career. I know the songs that women of all ages like, and I play them.

I have in fact written a few songs about women, sometimes just to play it for them alone, sometimes they've ended up on someone else's album or a film soundtrack. But lyrics are very difficult for me to write (not to sing), so I don't do it much. I can tell you that the songs I have written myself for a girl have gone over like gangbusters and dropped the panties in seconds.

Bottom line, in order to get laid as a musician, you need to be on stage as much as possible. In order to do that, you need to play cover tunes. You can get started and get visible a lot faster that way, it opens you up to more professional opportunities, bands, and venues, and you can “cast a wider net” of women when you're working every night playing hit songs, as opposed to playing your own songs once a month at some open mic or club gig for 6 people. Other people's music makes you MORE money and gives you access to MORE women.

CHOICE OF INSTRUMENT

I have friends who do well on every instrument, but in my experience as both a music fan and music professional, there are two that attract more women than anything. Those are 1)singing lead, and 2) playing lead guitar. It's no accident that I do both. All my heroes do both (Clapton, Hendrix, Stevie Ray, etc.) and that's what I always wanted to do too. I also did both because it made more girls notice me as a little kid. I still practice both instruments every single day, even if I'm playing three gigs that night.

Do drummers get laid? Sure they do. Bass players? Yep. Keyboard players?
Sometimes. Horn players? Not as much. That's about where the hierarchy ends from what I can tell. Musicians are always gonna get laid more than guys with conventional jobs, and often times the instrument choice doesn't matter much. But nobody is commanding more attention than the lead singer and lead guitarist in any given band, and by learning both you can not only make more money as a musician, but also meet more women.
Singing in general, no matter what instrument is your first choice, if done in addition to that instrument can really up your chances big time. Even guys who sing a few background harmonies while playing bass, drums, or keyboard do very well. But being the lead singer in a band or principal performer in a show will always win that shitfight.

WHERE GAME NEEDS TO ENTER

Being a musician will eliminate the need for many of those unsuccessful cold approaches. It's my opinion you should ALWAYS go approach a woman that interests you with NO regard for the outcome, whether you're on a gig or not, but having some solid experience as a performer can really give you confidence you can't get in a lot of other places. I learned to hone and sharpen my game after already having been a musician for some years, and other parts of my game came naturally just BECAUSE of being a musician. You'll find this common among musicians.

At the end of the night however, you still need to close the deal. One cannot live on singing sappy pussy songs alone. You need to make eye contact while working, establish a vibe, and then move things forward with conversation on your break or at the end of the show. I should also mention that this is often IMPOSSIBLE when touring, because you have to break down the gear or load up and get right to traveling as soon as you're done playing.
But often we travel in the early morning hours, and you can get a lot of one-nighters under those circumstances.

The gig will also allow you to “read the room” as I call it, and get a good view of many different women in the venue. You can see from the stage where they are, what they look like (sort of), who is buying them drinks, and who they might be fending off or hooking up with. If you can multi task, which most musicians can, you can formulate your talking points/bait-drops/lines/thoughts while finishing a song and be ready to spit as soon as you're off stage.

I would never in a million years take away from the importance that the experts in our internet corner place on game. They're all absolutely correct. However, if solid game is an American V8 motor, being a good musician is like putting twin superchargers on it. Zero to hero in 12 bars.

TALENT AND LOOKS

The 'sphere places huge importance on fitness, strength training, grooming, and other subjects. All incredibly useful and vital shit. NOBODY wants to fuck and/or hire a fat ugly guy and put him on a stage. I happen to have long hair and a beard, which I've had for many years. I did it to deliberately NOT look like other guys I saw out there years ago, I wanted to be the exact opposite of them because I thought they were all douchebags, and these days I get stopped at many places and asked “Are you in a band?” I just sorta have that look by default. It helps, because it's most often women that ask that. I don't consider myself an overly handsome guy, average at best, but I maintain good physical shape and I groom properly. Put an electric guitar and a microphone on top of that and it's your third supercharger.

As far as talent goes, musicians who sound shitty do not get laid as much as those of us who are really good. Am I really good? Of course I am. Does that sound egotistical? Of course it does. I maintain a professional standard of skills that my business requires, and if I weren't any good, I wouldn't be making this much dough. So, if you're in a band and not getting laid yet, you need to practice your instrument AND your game every single day. When they're both proficient at a professional level, they'll start to pay off handsomely.

BEING RESPONSIBLE WITH MONEY AND HEALTH

Most of us are freelancers, and like any freelance career, playing live music has a huge amount of ups and downs. Musicians have an incredibly bad reputation for being irresponsible. I am determined to go against that grain, so I live very minimalist and cheap and watch my money like a hawk. Being responsible with your money in an insecure business promotes discipline, health, and overall well-being. You're a lot more free to scam girls at the gig if you're not so worried about what they're paying you.

Like I said, I tend to eat clean (hard to do on tour), work out, and choose to live alcohol- and drug-free. I'm usually the weirdo on most gigs and tours I do, but I always get laid the most. It's almost comical how much farther ahead I am than guys I play with regularly. Many of them are married, but married guys are sometimes more anxious to hear about your conquests than anybody else.

Always being in control and waking up rested and healthy keeps your musician game sharp. You play better, you fuck better, and you won't make bad choices when it comes to girls at the gig because you're thinking clearly. I ain't saying don't have fun, but this is a JOB and I am running a BUSINESS. People who take their business seriously don't get drunk or high at work, or they lose their jobs.

USING THE GIG TO GET IN A RELATIONSHIP

I just can't let this one go by without acknowledgement. I have never been married or had any children, and I never will. I don't use the gig to find a wife or mother to my future children. But I know guys that have done so with great success. The other guys try to wife up some groupie whore and get totally screwed.

Women and beta pussies will squawk and cackle that only low quality sluts are into musicians, or something stupid that sounds like that. I can say without a doubt that all of those generalizations are TOTAL BULLSHIT. That's just something women and pussies say because the women are jealous of other women who get musicians to fuck them, and the pussy men are jealous of the musicians who get laid easily. ALL straight women have been attracted to a male musician at one time or another, regardless of their “quality”, and there are many we've met that ended up being super cool. A gig has led to several very fulfilling and loving relationships for me.

Sure, you'll meet a bunch of brain-dead skanks, and if you're in a metal band they're ALL brain-dead skanks, but if you work your way up to playing nicer joints, the quality of women go up and you have more choices. I've gotten numbers from medical doctors, six figure lawyers, models, actresses, and athletes, all of them hotties. There will be the normal coalition of chubby broads and ugly broads, ones with too many tattoos, too much hair dye or too many holes in their face. They might be easy fucks, but they're not GF material. Choose wisely fellas.

So, say you DO start dating a chick exclusively after meeting her and hooking up with her after a show. Then you're gonna have a whole other set of shitfights and difficulties. The worst one...other girls. Other girls ALWAYS show up to the gig. If you're GF or wife starts fending them off or getting jealous, it's bad business for you and the band. Also, if your significant other wants to all-of-a-sudden get involved in “band business”, that's a big no no. Bands have fallen apart that way. We jokingly call it “Yoko Ono Syndrome”.
It takes a secure and independent woman to date a musician and put up with the long hours, the traveling, the ubiquitous other women, and the lifestyle. But in this day and age there are plenty of strong women who can handle it, and many of them are dateable. Just because I won't move one in or marry them does not mean you can't either. But don't make the mistake of thinking it's mostly low-quality women in your audience. Nothing could be further from the truth.

BETA MUSICIANS

Just like anywhere else, you'll find that a huge amount of musicians are slobbering little geekboy beta pussies who just happened to be proficient enough on an instrument to get in a working band that generates an audience. This is the last reason I'll give you as to why game is so important. You're not only gonna need to play better than these guys, you're gonna need more solid game than them just like you would on the street. I've seen guys who have no reason to NOT get laid based on their professional position strike out nightly. They may have looks, they may have talent, some women may like them, but they don't have what we all can learn in our little corner of the 'net. Do yourself a favor and continue learning more and more about your game all the time. Being a musician can eliminate a lot of work if you're a good one, but there is still no substitute for the real work laid out by our pioneers. All I am saying here is do BOTH. You can get by on just being a musician, but a musician who has practiced his game as diligently as his guitar will be unstoppable.

IN CONCLUSION

This particular matter does not have to do with gaming chicks and a musician, but it's so important that I couldn't finish this article without addressing it.

We who have diligently ingested the crimson capsule will find that once our eyes are open, our beliefs change. We may lean more politically conservative or libertarian, we may shy away from traditional institutions like religion or marriage, we may become fully involved in the neomasculinity movement. With all this comes a certain responsibility if you choose to make your life in show business.

You won't find a more liberal and leftist business than the “business we call show”. Most of middle management will be either women or gay men, feminism and feminist women run rampant among your professional performer colleagues and superiors, and it seems everybody is a total fucking socialist. In meeting the men on gigs who DO share my beliefs, I find we must keep them very quiet if we want to keep our gigs. Most are quieter than I am, but I often could give zero fucks whether I keep a gig or not, no matter how prestigious it is. It's often this attitude that garners you the respect of your bandmates and colleagues too.

But it should be noted that there are a million guys waiting in the wings who are willing to play music live for FREE, often just for the sake of meeting girls. Yes, our job really is that cool. Being true to yourself and maintaining frame is essential for the happiness of man, but we all gotta eat, and part of being a professional adult is knowing when to keep it to yourself and just do your job, as painful as it may seem at the time. In the meantime, gentlemen, I'm happy to offer more advice and answer questions. As guitar virtuoso Joe Satriani says, “Play on...and keep it alive till you're 95!”

The Empty Containers Economy

October 14, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Details here.

Men Never Married by 40 Have Something "Wrong" With Them

October 16, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Yeah, they're the precious few fiscally responsible people left in the world:

"Captain Capitalism - Reserved" Now Available in Paperback and Kindle

October 16, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

You can buy your copy here!

Fuck You Mark Dayton

October 16, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

You drugged up piece of spoiled, trust fund baby shit.

Yeah, it is time to leave.

Date the A Girl, Marry the B Girl

October 16, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Was interviewed on the Jason Hartmann show where we talked about cars, feminism, and the importance of dating B girls (the ones who aren't 9's or 10's, but have sanity, jobs, and maturity).

Check out the show here for your lunch time podcast.

Book Review: "Women: Theory and Practice" by Bernard Chapin

October 16, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

My review of Bernard Chapin's book.

You may buy Uncie Bern Bern's book here.

The Importance of Lowering Your Expectations

October 16, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

The Expectations Bubble

At 10 years old I believed that I was going to become a Vertitech Fighter. If you don't know what that is, that's fine for it is only something 10 year old boys growing up in the 80's would know. But in fact, the "Veritech Fighter" is an imaginary fighter plane from the Japanese anime series "Robotech." It could convert from a standard fighter for long distance space battles to a humanoid like robot for close quarters combat, typically against the evil "Invid Invasion" that wished to enslave the human world.

Naturally I did not grow up to become a Veritech pilot, not only because no such thing existed, nor that there wasn't an evil alien force called the "Invid," but because of reality. My family was poor so even if there were such a thing as a Veritech fighter we were unlikely to afford it, and I had to focus on more practical means of escaping poverty.

However, while poverty kept my life goals grounded in reality, the same cannot be said for many of my peers and members of future generations. For while it was impossible for anybody of any generation to become a Veritech pilot, it was not necessarily impossible for them to become a famous singer famous celebrity high paid athelete

President of the United States or just plain social diva

Statistically, unlikely?
Yes.

Impossible?
No.

And so what ensued was a phenomenon that was not only insane, but increasingly so as time went on.

Parents told their children "they could become anything" because that was nice thing to do.
Teachers echoed their parents, telling them the same, because it would be mean to crush little Jimmy's dream of becoming the next Michael Jordan.
Did you want to become a world famous singer/celebrity? It was all possible according to the movies, MTV videos, and Madonna.

And come graduation time, before children were shipped off to college, parents would buy their adult children the hilariously optimistic "Oh The Places You Will Go" by Dr. Seuss.

This child-age propaganda did not stop there, nor in its intensity. As time went on it wasn't merely "telling your children to aim high" and "chase their dreams" but to ensure at all expense your children's ego and self-esteem was never shattered. And so the successive generation (Millennials) were treated to an even more potent dose of pie in the sky poppy cock that inflated their expectations.

Participation trophies.
No scores being kept.
The elimination of red markers for grading papers.
The elimination of grades.
Tutors.
Special ed teachers.
"Everybody should go to college" and other outright lies that cowardly parents and teachers told their children/students their entire childhood lives.

One would think it would stop there once these children grew up and went on to college, having their childish dreams and expectations smashed by reality. But the machine driving the "Expectations Bubble" was just firing up.

First media and Hollywood couldn't have young people think they couldn't chase and inevitably realize their dreams. Especially women. Ergo, they created even more movies where the good guy always wins, the girl gets the rich husband in the end, and everybody makes $100,000 a year while serving coffee at the "Central Perk."

Second, academia needed these now-adult children (especially women) to believe that the key to achieving their dreams was a college education. And not just a college education, but preferably an advanced degree through college education. 23 year old girls just couldn't become $250,000/year fashion writers for Vogue in Manhattan without a Masters in Creative Writing. And 22 year old boys just couldn't become the next Kirk Cobain without getting a degree in Music Theory. They needed the guidance (and promise of success) from adult theoreticians ~~posing as~~ professors. But don't worry, once you got your college degree you were GUARANTEED not only to get a job, but FINALLY after nearly 2 decades of schooling, live your dream.

Third, we can't forget this entire time what the fashion/movie/sex industry was telling these kids. Women were entitled to strong, but sensitive, but not too sensitive men, who could read minds, were all millionaires (preferably billionaires) looked like Brad Pitt, voted Democrat, wanted sex, but only when the women wanted to have sex, and wanted to wait until she was ready to have children, and would MAGICALLY show up and be ready to marry when she was ready to take a brake from her "fabulous" writing career at 32 years and 7 months. Boys were fed the lies that women liked kind, sensitive caring men, who voted Democrat, opened doors for girls, and wrote poetry, and as long as you did that you would be guaranteed to have that hot, sex-addicted nymphomaniac that you've come to expect watching increasing amounts of internet porn. Besides, who can blame them? According to their teachers and parents they were the greatest people to ever grace this earth. Besides, they had college degrees and were "going green," and that ENSURED they'd have great love lives.

And finally politicians.

What politician is going to win over this voting bloc by pointing out things like:

"Debt to GDP Ratios?"
"Unfunded liabilities?"
"Government spending as a % of GDP?"
or "Labor force participation rates?"

None.

And that's why there was a lot of talk about hope and "the children are our future" without a lot of hard math and statistics based in reality.

When you threw it all together, it was the biggest lie ever told. Previous generations had so misled their children about what they could expect and were entitled to by the future that nearly EVERYBODY in the entire country had expectations that GREATLY exceeded what reality was ever capable of giving them. But worse, it was about every aspect of their lives:

Career
Education
Love life
Family live
Health
Finances

Nearly every one in the United States of America is so delusional that this "Expectations Bubble" dwarfs that of the Housing or Dotcom bubbles. And like all bubbles, when they burst there will be pain.

Why Did This Happen?

Before we move onto solutions to the Expectations Bubble, we need to know how and why it formed in the first place. And the answer is three fold and very simple.

#1 There's Profit to Be Had in Dem Der Lies!

Oprah's entire career was basically "lie to women by telling them what they want to hear, even though it will ruin their lives in the long run, and charge them the entire time." But before you jump on Oprah, realize she was merely just one figurehead-example of the "Charge for Pretty Lies" industry.

The entire fashion industry is one big lie to women that wearing those clothes (for that year) will make them not necessarily sought after by men, but envied by other women. Make up is the same thing, but it is to make you look "younger and better." But even these industries have a morsel of honesty in them in that fashion and make-up can make you look better. Such a thing cannot be said, however, of the vanity industries of "women's empowerment" books, feminist studies in college, and (my coined phrase) "roundhouse-kicking chick cop show" media.

You see women can't be stay at home moms and supporting wives. There's no money in that. Corporate America needs women to have their own salaries and outsource their children so:

1. They can make billions in ~~child outsourcing prisons~~ daycare center profits
2. They can make billions on fashion sales for vain products like purses and "hand bags"
3. They can make billions on second and third cars
4. They can make billions on the CAR LOANS to pay for those second and third cars
5. They can make TRILLIONS on selling you more house than you need

and

6. They can make TRILLIONS on selling women worthless liberal arts degrees.

So you see we need to mold women's expectations into "having it all" even though not one woman in the history of the world has ever pulled that off successfully.

But before we mock women, men are just as easily duped and to blame.

It may not be a Prada purse he buys, but he'll blow 10 times that amount on a fancy car.
It may not be a "Masters in Gender Studies," but he will blow $50,000 on a "Creative Writing Degree."
It may not be a "$4,000 Italian couch," but it is a $4,000 bet on a DraftKing's "sportsball" event.

And just as women blindly sopped up the lies told to them by all these corporations that their lives would be great if they had these THINGS, men equally naively thought they'd be fat, married, employed and happy if they did the same. In the end, all most Americans really end up doing is LITERALLY mortgaging their lives away in the form of student loans, car loans, and McMansion mortgages to pay corporations and universities till their dead.

#2. There's Votes to Be Had in Dem Der Lies!

Just like corporations, universities, and non-profits will lie to get you to part with your money, politicians will lie so they can get your vote. The consequences, however, are not immediate as you are unlikely to directly pay for what you vote for. Remember, it's only those eeeevil rich people and white guys that pay.

Of course ripping on corporations, males, whites, or people who just plain have more than you is also ripping on employers, innovators, spenders, and investors. Kind of the whole engine of economic growth for the country. So when they're taxed...and leave...or just don't invest...or just work less...or innovate less...or retire...there's not as much economic growth to go around. Oh...and yeah. Less jobs too.

So that "great career" you were promised by those politicians if you did what your parents told you to do and "just go to college" and everything will work out fine?

Yeah, how's that working for you now? Oh, and by the way, how are those student loans you used to pay those leftist professors $300/credit who told you to vote Democrat all the time? They afford those professors a nice house near campus? No no, I know. "You're really smart and educated" and I'm "just a big jerk who doesn't understand economics."

3. You Parents (and Friends) are Cowards

You parents and friends have likely failed you because they dare didn't hurt your feelings by telling you the truth. This is cowardice on their part because whatever temporary measure of ire you may have sent there way for telling you a harsh truth was enough to deter them to idly stand by and watch you go down a path that would ruin your life.

Your son or daughter is going to go to a private liberal art college and major in Social Justice Studies, ending up with $125,000 in debt?

No, no, don't stop them. You're not a real dad. You're a spineless one, soon joining the eunuch trope. Tell them "follow your heart and the money will follow" as you condemn them to a life of poverty.

Your friend just got engaged to an insufferable, spoiled trust fund baby who is majoring in Women's Studies?

No, no. Don't stop him. You're not a real friend. You're a spineless one who has no problem condemning your friend to a life of misery, divorce, and child support payments.

Whether it is real cowardice, laziness in parenting, or an inappropriate amount of "well they're their own adults and I can't stop them" non-interventionism, the result is the same.

"Everybody's a winner!"
"Everybody is happy!"
"You're all going to have wonderful and great futures!"
"Everything is awesome!"

Again, when you combine these three things, they are the ingredients for a perfect storm. Nobody has any financial incentive to tell you the truth. Nobody has a political reason to burst your delusional expectations of reality. And even those closest to you have been so spoiled and made soft by decades of decadence lack the spine to tell you otherwise. With nothing to stop them, multi-billion dollar corporations, multi-billion dollar universities, and multi-TRILLION dollar governments will take advantage of your naivety, inflating your ego and expectations from life, just as long as you enslave yourself to them forever.

What are the Costs?

The costs are what you'd likely expect from the world's largest bubble - the world's largest price. I cannot think of at any point in time, bar maybe the mass starvations caused by communism and the two world wars that would come close to what the United States, and to a larger extent, western civilization will pay for their delusions. However, regardless of the price it will be paid in two ways. Mental and financial.

Mentally we are already paying this price. For those of you who got through high school, graduated from college, did what you were told, and went into debt doing so, you are already suffering for the lies, deceit and delusion that was cast upon you. Like many 20 somethings you are wondering what you did wrong? Why isn't life going the way you were told it would go? Where is your job? Where is your mentally stimulating career? Where are the droves of women/men that you were to date?

And this confusion isn't something simple like "why isn't my car starting?"

This is a life crushing experience as for the past ENTIRETY of your life you have been lied to, and thus PROGRAMMED to think a certain way. It's not like you can just "YouTube" "how to clean a fuel injector" and be done with this this afternoon. It is the most rudest of awakenings in that your entire world view is being shattered and along with it your entire mental programming and life philosophy. You need to rethink everything, AS WELL AS

ADMIT YOUR ENTIRE LIFE HAS BEEN WASTED UP TO THIS POINT! All that schooling. All that education. All that political indoctrination. All that BS about women liking "caring men" were not only lies, but wastes of life, time and money. It is the closest thing to insanity healthy minds will ever endure, and some even crack, going insane themselves, giving some explanation to the recent spat of millennial mass murderers we've seen.

If you manage to get through it you will naturally be angry. You will not be happy. You will want revenge. But there is nobody to get revenge on, because you very well can't take on a corporation, nor the US government, nor the university that just ass-raped you for $50,000 in tuition. It is here you will either double down on your delusional life (like a women's study major getting her "doctorate" and blaming anything on "white men"), or you will admit you DID make these decisions, even if you were misled, and you believed them.

And it is here yet another life-determining decision will be made. Do you pick yourself up and do what you can with only 67% of your life left, and nearly none of your youth remaining? Or do you give up and sink into depression? Many-a-construction workers committed suicide when they went bankrupt when a housing bubble THEY DIDN'T CONTROL burst. But some stuck it out and got back their wealth they lost in 7 years. It will be the true test of a man and woman's mettle to see which of these options they choose.

Regardless, this is the mental price people will pay for the Expectations Bubble. Wasted lives, wasted youth, some will commit suicide, others will pursue the delusion blaming bogey men, and others will limp on in life. But regardless of where they end up, the pure psychological torment of realizing you've been lied to your entire life, and that this has cost you your youth, AND how to control that rage to salvage what remains is the mental price two generations, maybe three will pay for the lies, deceit and cowardice of previous generations.

The financial price is incalculable. We could discuss economic estimates of "unfunded liabilities" which are around $100 trillion in promises we can't keep. We could discuss the national debt, 65% of which was used to buy votes which if interest rates nudge even slightly up, the US is insolvent. We could be theoretical and ask "what could have been" had we adhered to those nasty, dirty, disgusting WASPy principles of the WWII generation. But in the end it is moot.

With now about 80% of the population wasting 1/3rd of their lives getting educated, and nearly 75% of them getting educated in worthless subjects, NOT TO MENTION crippling their financial futures in debt, the entire economic system just plain doesn't have the human productive capacity, ability, nor desire to

1. Honor all our debts

2. Pay for everything else

The herculean economic challenges that face this nation are insurmountable to the deluded, incompetent, incapable, and demoralized population we have today. One can fully expect default (if we lose world reserve currency status), and a long slow decline as the Romans experienced in the 4th and 5th centuries AD.

What Can Be Done?

Just like the Dotcom Bubble, just like the Housing Bubble, and just like the Retirement Bubble, people are so brainwashed and wedded to the bubble, it's nearly impossible to wake them up and effectively deflate it. You now have nearly 90% of the population that is NON-WWII, meaning they lack the hardships, sacrifices, and other real world experiences in life to harden them to the point they prefer harsh truths over reality. You have Baby Boomers, Gen X'ers, Millennials and whatever god-forsaken generation is coming after that, and NONE OF THEM seem to have an inkling of desire to turn off The Kardashians and start reading The Wall Street Journal.

Additionally, all major institutions in the country are too vested in the system as it currently is. The democrats will never forfeit the promises of "unicorns, free health care, free education, you can do anything and if you didn't it's whitey's fault" type strategy. Corporations are too invested in men and women thinking delusionally about themselves, and thus being entitled to all their material goods. Universities and colleges need to also keep up the lie you need college to achieve your dream for what else would the parasitic scum of society posing as professors do for a living? And the media has too much at stake for they are the ones who sell you the lies as to why your life isn't going the way you want it, or at least produce the mind-numbing drugs of sitcoms and Grammy awards so you never question it to begin with.

But all these major obstacles aside, there is at least a THEORETICAL way to undo all the damage that has been/will be done and maybe, put the country back on the path towards greatness and reality. And it starts with that. Reality. Specifically, The Reality Principle.

The Reality Principle is not a theory or concept or an idea. It's reality. And it basically states that your decisions become more and more effective the more and more you base those decisions in reality.

If you work out, eat right, put yourself together, get implants, and grow your hair out long you will abide by the REALITY that men like girls with long hair, big boobs, tight asses, and a pretty face and are practically guaranteed to succeed with men.

If you instead lie to yourself and claim beauty is a social construct as you wharf down your 4th cheese burger, cut your hair short, wear military boots, and pierce your nose on your way to the latest "fat acceptance" meeting, then you will FAIL with men.

But the CRUX of The Reality Principle is not the simple common sense that it implies. It is pursuing The Reality Principle in spite of our wishes, desires, biases, predispositions, wants and preferences.

For example it's very easy for me to acknowledge women want an in shape guy, with big muscles, who makes a lot of money, is charming, talented and charismatic.

It's another thing for me to run 6 miles, lift weights the next day, pursue a degree in engineering, work 60 hours a week to make the money, while picking up dance classes and practicing Cary Grant lines to meet those standards (which I have by the way ;).

Ergo it's not the concept of basing decisions in reality as much as it accepting the criticism and responsibilities it forces on us.

Do you want to have a job after college? Tough luck, you have to study hard disciplines in STEM, engineering, and math.

Do you want to have that hot nymphomanic babe you see on the internet? Tough luck, hit the gym, lift weights, get rid of the carbs, and enjoy the suck.

Do you want to be a social justice warrior that helps the poor and are too lazy to get a real education? Tough luck, you will be poor, nobody will really respect you, and nobody will take you seriously.

While this "responsibility-taking" aspect of The Reality Principle implies a third impossible hurdle to bursting and recovering from The Expectations Bubble, it does something that all the lies, government checks, and warm fuzzies can't do, and that is provide real and genuine hope, a real, tangible and possible solution to most people's problems. For while the sweet lies do satiate most of the sheeple out there, most sheeple do know, deep down inside this is not how they want their lives to be going. They are not satisfied with their lives. They are not happy and they are not hopeful about the future. Additionally, they inevitably tire of a life where the lies and promises they were told are never realized.

How long are blacks going to believe the Democrat lies? Another 60 years?
How long are women going to believe the 60's feminist lies? Another 60 years?

Inevitably, after a couple generations of no success, no progress, and above all else, no happiness, they WILL start to question the lies they've been told (which in part explains my disproportionately high black male readership, as well as loyal contingent of women who want to be traditional housewives).

In other words, lies and deceit do not work in the long run no matter how good they feel. And if we are in a very Trump like way, direct, unapologetic and blunt about it, being HONEST and pointing to REALITY at least gives everybody a realistic and understandable road map to success. It is only those who are truly delusional or so vested in their ideology that they will want to continue to live the lies for that is all they have ever known in their lives.

Ergo, to reach this society-wide level of "epiphany" requires one simple thing. A sustained adherence to and broadcasting of The Reality Principle by various independent media outlets, philosophers, bloggers, podcasters, teachers, and above all else, PARENTS. Again, what we offer is not as sweet sounding as "the glass ceiling" or "you can have it all" or "nobody's too good for my little princess," but it is based in reality. In theory, slowly but surely, people will realize pursuing becoming the next Miley Ray Cyrus only to be unemployed and singing karaoke, is not as good as aiming to be an electrician and actually becoming an electrician. Or aiming to be an elite investment banker at Goldman Sachs only to make it into a 4th tier commercial bank, is not as good as aiming to be a cop and actually becoming a cop. It is simply telling our fellow loved one or even our fellow man that they need to lower their expectations inline with reality, not because we wish to rain on their parade, but because we wish to save their lives and spare their youth from the destructive forces of delusion.

And if that is too hard a sell to the American public. So be it. They will get what they deserve.

---

http://aaron-clarey.podomatic.com/
http://www.assholeconsulting.com
https://www.youtube.com/user/AaronClarey
https://twitter.com/aaron_clarey
My Books
Amazon Affiliate

Why We're All Better Than Steve Jobs

October 16, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

You can listen to the Black Brigade here.

Job Offer in Hawaii

October 17, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Howdy All,

Looks like Alex is looking to hire in Hawaii. Please forward to anybody you might know.

"On behalf of Academic Composition, I'd like to thank all of you for your support. We were able to expand quite a bit lately largely because of contributions from CL posters and writers.

The high-season is starting as most students are about to enter mid-terms and all of our assistants will soon be generating plenty of leads. If you've contacted us regarding a writing position, don't get discouraged, we'll have more work in the next 6 weeks than we did in the last four months combined!

If you reside near a college campus and you would like to post ads, go ahead and send us an email. The more leads you'll generate, the bigger your bonus payout will be.

However, if you reside in Hawaii, your ads will be especially successful. As you know, the region is home to countless students who have no interest in writing their own papers and many working professionals there earn well above national average, especially if they are affiliated with the military or the government.

At the very least, you'll generate plenty of leads from students who can afford our services and are more than happy to pay a fair price. As CL subcontractors, you'll be earning substantially more than CL subcontractors in other states."
Aleksey Bashtavenko
Academic Composition
Owner & Principal Writer
(540) 300-1253
academiccomposition@gmail.com
www.academiccomposition.com
www.linkedin.com/pub/aleksey-bashtavenko/25/7b8/323/"

Your Weekend Humor

October 17, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

40 things college girls say and what they really mean.

Why "Buying Local" Is a Stupid Economic Strategy

October 19, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

On par with the stupidity that was the "Let's Boycott Big Oil" (for one day and then everybody buy twice the amount of gas the next) is the Gen X-inspired, Millennial-endorsed "Buy Local" economic strategy.

With data that is as spurious as a research paper written by a women's studies professor who hates her father, meaningless and unfounded data is thrown around claiming "if just everybody spent $100 locally it would benefit our economy by $3 million!" Perhaps "$4 million!" Heck, why not "$1 billion?"

But for saner heads and those who are GENUINELY interested in enacting economic policies that raise everybody's standard of living, and not just 20 something college kids masturbating their political egos, it is time for the Ole Captain to brush off the dust, put on his ole economist hat, and explain to you how "buying local" is not only stupid, but actually HARMS people economically.

At the heart of these naive people's economic strategy is the utopian idea that if you buy locally then the "money is kept in the local economy" and thus benefits those locally. So instead of going to Wal-Mart and buying everything, you go to the Ma and Pa's store in town, thereby helping them AND their local employees. And while on the face of it this may sound logical and simple, it is. So simple it fails miserably to account for the real world.

First, in order for this to work, EVERYBODY, and I mean EVERYBODY would have to be forced BY LAW to re-spend the money locally until death do us part. Not only would you have to buy from the local ma and pa dime store, THEY would have to buy all of their wares locally as well. Additionally (and I'm sure the economic masterminds behind the "buy local" strategy accounted for this too), they would have to reinvest ONLY LOCALLY to keep the money local. Ergo, not only would all goods and services be bought locally, but all sources of financing and investment would be local AND could only go to local companies. Already you can intuitively see some problems with this as it sounds totalitarian and restrictive.

Second, which is closely related to the first, is the lack of competition and choice.

What if I don't like the Ma and Pa store?
What if I don't like the local ice cream parlour?
What if the clothier does not have the fashion you want?
What if I don't want to invest in the local bean plant?

Well, tough cookies for you. You HAVE TO buy local.

The irony is that the people who typically clamor for "buying local" are usually the same ones who protest against monopolies. However, to a certian level, that is precisely what they're advocating. A monopolistic market. The only difference is merely who is the monopolist?

An "evil" big corporation from out of state that has lower prices and a better product?

Or

A "good" local company, owned by Herb and Bethel in Bisbee, Arizona who charges $14 for a "local organic burger" that tastes like crap?

It belies their true political leanings - they're Nazis, but "for the small people," which I guess in their warped and inferior minds makes it all good.

Third, quality.

In limiting competition and choice, you by default lower quality. Both in terms of allowing people to enjoy specialized products, as well as the benefits that come with having variety. Soon, you WILL get sick of Bisbee's 5 local-only coffee stores. You'll also get sick of the decor and the washed up hippie staff. And you will yearn to have a Starbucks or a Caribou or a Dunn Brothers coffee. But no, not if they can pass an ordinance in town banning any of those "evil, nasty, chain store" coffee shops. So you're stuck looking at an algae infested fish tank that they use to brew their kombucha, not to mention listening to the latest in "indie" music out of Tuscon, when all you wanted was a quality cup of Joe.

Fourth and finally, prices. Specifically, standards of living.

As much as you hate those "national chain stores" or those "eeeevil" multi-billion dollar corporations, the sad truth is that big is beautiful. And by beautiful, I mean cheap.

See, back in the day they had this thing called the "industrial revolution" which among many other wonderous things, automated a lot of processes previously done by humans. This allowed us to mass produce the same goods at a fraction of the time, cost, resources, and on-the-job-deaths than before. However, also key to this was SCALE.

Instead of having everybody make their own cars in their own garages, it paid to make a lot MORE cars for a fraction of the per unit cost in these things called "factories." Additionally, instead of selling a little bit of everything at the small Ma and Pa dime store, where customers would have to pay a hefty premium for square footage, it made immense economic sense to create super stores like Wal-Mart, Target, and malls where the retailing costs were a fraction of what was once before. And so now, not only were goods being mass-produced by these large "evil" national chains or multi-billion dollar corporations, but because they were being made on scale, their costs dropped dramatically. And when costs drop dramatically, that increases people's standards of living dramatically which is the WHOLE POINT OF ECONOMICS.

In short, these large, multi-billion dollar, "chain" stores and corporations like Wal-Mart have done more to PERMANENTLY help out the poor by boosting their purchasing power than any government program or pot-induced "buy local" dipshittery ever did.

The truth is "buying local" is a euphemism for "undeserved charity." If you buy local you are usually paying a premium for a less efficiently made product or service out of political or charitable leanings. Additionally, in insisting on "buying local" you also deny yourself the BEST possible goods and services that world has to offer.

Swiss chocolates? No, not local.
Cuban cigars? No, not local.
Saudi oil? No, none for us, thank you. Not local! We're from Bisbee!

Just what kind of a life would you lead?

And finally what if everybody only "bought local?" Like tourism, you are merely taking away business from one group of people to benefit another group of people who just happen to live in your town. There is no net economic gain in such a strategy for the nation as a whole. But it's even WORSE than tourism. Tourism is a net-zero effect and does not adversely affect any particularly industry. If you insisted on "buying local" only you would wipe out all of the nation's industries and along with it their ability to mass produce and sell on scale. Prices would sky rocket, quality would tank, and you'd be stuck with what meager goods and services your "local" economy could produce.

So please, to all the restaurants, bars, waitresses, college students, city council members professors, and other varied sorts of wanna-be economists who advocate the "buy local" economic strategy, shut up. Just please shut up. You don't know what you're talking about, you're going to hurt your community more than help. Just please shut up and leave economics, production, and standards of living to free people making free choices. I know telling people to "shut up" is not a legitimate argument, perhaps an admission of defeat. But not in your case. You're so ignorant and stupid about economics "shut up" is not only the response you deserve, it's the only one you'd understand.

---

http://aaron-clarey.podomatic.com/
http://www.assholeconsulting.com
https://www.youtube.com/user/AaronClarey
https://twitter.com/aaron_clarey
My Books
Amazon Affiliate

Titillating Tuesday Linkage

October 21, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

She wasn't haaaaaaapppyyyyyyyy.

I was surprised there was still this many smart people in America.

My son will ask, "What was it like when women were women?" And I'll look at him and say, "Heck if I know son. I was born after the 60's and never met one my age."

Silvio Canto talks about the debate, but more interestingly El Chapo on the run again.

Captain America now helping illegal aliens out.

Alternative Media is Winning

October 21, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Let me provide you a little bit of insight.

When I had my radio show at AM 1500 for all of 20 seconds, I was allowed to see and work within the "inner beast." I saw all the radio show personalities. I saw all the behind the scenes action. And I saw how it all worked.

But one thing my eagle economic eye caught is just how normal, if not shoddy people were in radio. Not because "they have a face for radio," but because (after some investigating) how little these people actually made. They were not rich, they were not even well off. And if you were under 30 you were working for peanuts to have the "honor" to work in "show biz."

Of course, now in hindsight we know these people pay a premium in salary to work in an industry that is considered fun, but that still doesn't debunk the "star" or "celebrity" effect they have. Most people think that if you get a radio show gig or a part in a movie you are "set for life." You get a record contract you are "golden." And that if you have your own show you are showered with millions of dollars.

But it's all BS. These people make peanuts.

So it is with a keen interest I noticed this little nugget from the Guardian. Written by one "Kate Iselin" about her feminist problems of trying to find a real man that would...well...be the opposite of what her and all the feminists were clamoring for.

Now laugh as we might, scoff and send her a katyusha rocket barrage of "I Told You So's" the real story, if you're paying attention, is NOT that a feminist is having to sleep in the bed she made, but that Kate Iselin has...the same amount of followers on Twitter I do

This is telling because, well, frankly, I am TECHNICALLY and in ALL REALITY a nobody. I'm just some guy who started a blog a decade ago, ranted and tiraded against all I saw, wrote a couple books and host a podcast like everybody and their brother. So why is it a nobody like me, who had no intention of getting into "journalism" is on par with a "professional" with the establishment and multibillion dollar support of an established media giant?

The answer?

It's because we're winning.

Not that there was a war to begin with, and not because of any particular doing of our own, but simply because of the democratizing effects of the internet an industry that was once the preserve of connected lazy baby boomers who feared math, is now the backyard hobby of millions of rookies. And these rookies are proving better than the "pros" who were unfortunate enough to join this industry as the internet has rendered it obsolete.

Of course, if you were brought up in the past 40 years (which most of us were) you are still under the spell of "oooo Celebrityship, Stardom, and Rockstar!" You see somebody on TV or hear somebody on the radio you think they are "famous" or "rockstars." And while the media may have been able to throw up this veil of "celebrityship" it's becoming increasingly apparent just how fragile and "veilish" their fame was. So much so The Guardian, a presumed premier battleship of left-wing media is now on par with a guy who started a blog 10 years ago and threw up charts.

In other words, the internet has completely removed the veil these "rock star journalists," these "Time Magazine" authors have and exposed them for nothing more than washed up , wanna be, poverty suffering journalism majors and political activists they are. The real journalists are the millions of minds who actually do think independently and take to the internet to voice their opinions or at least call BS on the previous guard's claims. And the fact a guy like me has equal ranking and footing as their "professionals" shows that the American population is slowly refocusing their eyes and recognizing the real media world for what it is.

So the next time you decide to dismiss Roosh or Aurini or Sargon or what have you, why don't you look up the Twitter following, the YouTube subscribership, and other measures of social media and compare them to the "professionals" the likes of "The Guardian" are hiring.

Some people are finally waking up!

Why I'm Better Than Eduardo Porter

October 21, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Continuing on from my previous observation that the MSM is nothing more than a leftist veil of aging and dying baby boomers, enter Eduardo Porter.

This guy is at least 20 years my senior and he works for the New York Times.

The NEW YORK fucking TIMES!

You know, that has-been baby boomer rag that claimed in the 70's it was "all the news fit to print?"

Anyway, he came out with this article about how welfare does not corrupt people and is a good thing.

Now, again, if you believe how you've been conditioned to believe that because he works for "THE" New York Times he is some how an authority figure. Well, just take a looksy at his twitter followers:

Look, guys, again, I'm a freaking nobody. I alone with NO MULTI-BILLION DOLLAR NEW YORK ASS KISSING SUPPORT NETWORK still have 50% the followers "Eduardo" does.

So why would you listen to him?

Which behooves, why would you listen to the New York Times?

I will say it again simply because it advances the focus of the American public to realize that the MSM and the likes of "Eduardo" are NOT the "authorities" they claim they are:

These people are HAVE BEENS! And sadly they were "NEVER WERE'S." They are an obsolete class of political activists that never had any talent and are simply trying to fight against the internet and its democratizing effects on the American public. This guy is a NOBODY! He's just an aged baby boomer journalist who never worked a real job in his life! The only reason you heard about him is because the NYT slapped their stick on him and (sadly) I'm bringing attention to the fact this man even exists.

So seriously, I mean this. We are winning. The dipshits at the bankrupt-only-to-be-bailed-out-by-Carlos-Slim-New York times have to resort to hiring nobodies like Eduardo Porter to write masturbatory pieces for their leftist 50+ readership. They aren't real "journalists." They're wanna-be's. They're hacks. They're propaganda pieces.

Just realize that the next time some idiot out there cites the "New York Times" as a "source."

Winning!

October 22, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Made it to Liberal Logic!

Women Earn the Majority of Degrees

October 23, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Not:

Also, a side video that was actually hilarious.

Actually, a Real Solution to Obamacare

October 26, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Will be looking into this.

Why the Republicans Should Consult Tom Leykis

October 26, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Ever since I've become aware of politics and certainly since I've followed it, the US has generally made a slow, but consistent movement to the left. This is not measured by who was elected democrat or republican, but much more empirical and concrete measures, specifically, government as a percentage of the economy. This measure, though going up and down, has generally trended upwards during my adult years to the point that we now (depending on which state you're in) pay around 40% of your money to the state, 43% if you consider inflation a tax (which it is).

When you compare this to the pre WWI average of 3%, you can see that America is not only nothing like what it used to be or the principles it was founded upon, but freedom, free markets, capitalism, and everything Western Civilization fought for these past 4,000 is also losing.

The only thing in a position to stop this is, laughably, the republican party. And while I see many of the heads and establishment, RINO republicans doing nothing, if not advancing the progress of socialism, there are still some true believers in the party who insist on the principles the republican party theoretically stands for.

The irony, however, is that the establishment republicans, even though they have moved to the left, still keep getting their asses handed to them. This is not Monday morning quarterbacking, but a fact. They are the biggest pussies and pushovers, thinking appeasement and being nice is what's going to win over the American voting public. And even though they failed to stop Obamacare, failed to make him a one term president, failed to protect the integrity of the sovereignty of this nation

AND

Trump's viable candidacy is proof "regularly every day" republicans (and people) are sick of their eunuch politics they still are in such an elitist, blue blood, clueless echo chamber, they still don't know why they keep losing.

Which is why they should consult Tom Leykis.

Tom, largely stays out of politics. He's too busy leading the young boys in this country out of the lies, propaganda, and deceit they were fed as children, helping them salvage what they can in their lives. But some of the lessons he learned the hard way (trial and error) are vital, not just to young men of today, but today's ball-less republican party. Specifically, "There's the door."

Unlike what young men were told their entire childhood and adolescent lives, women do NOT like being pampered, having their asses kissed, and having every whim satisfied. Even more so, women respond more positively to a man who tells her "no" than one you says, "yes dear" each and every opportunity. Ergo, after dating and marrying enough women, Tom finally learned to say, "There's the door."

"Tom buy me more stuff."
"There's the door."

"Tom, I want a cat."
"There's the door."

"Tom, you don't treat me well."
"There's the door."

He learned, although over many years and much pain, that to have a successful, productive, and above all else, respectable relationship with a woman you simply had to stick with your principles, hold your guns, and tell them "no." And it's the precise same lesson the republicans have to learn about the American voting public.

The American voting public has been courted, successfully, by the democrats simply through bribery. "Vote for me and I'll give you free shit." And they fall for it because, in general, people are morons, can't do math, and don't want to do the math. Their survivalist instincts always love free shit and they'll vote for it NEARLY every time. However, the American public also at least respects the left because they get it done. They stand for something. They hold to their principles.

This is why they could get an out and out socialist elected twice as president and can get a publicly admitted socialist in Bernie Sanders elected too.

But the republican's response to this has been a bigger pussy move than one I pulled off buying a girl flowers in the 7th grade:

"We'll give you slightly less free stuff."

Unfortunately since this has no principle, stands for nothing, based in no plan, and is based in MIMICRY it comes off as the pussy move it is by simply confessing "We have NOTHING of value to offer you so we're going to try to be like the democrats." This strategy is flawed in its design and has empirically and historically proven to be so.

Instead the republicans should insist on principle, insist on holding their guns, and simply say to the American people:

"There's the door."

"You don't like balanced budgets?"
There's the door.

"You want open borders?"
There's the door.

"You want free health care, and college tuition for shitty degrees?"
There's the door.

Simply insist on the rule that you will not violate your principles AND be willing to lose a couple elections if the American public is too stupid to insist you do. Let the foolish American voting public vote in the socialists, vote in the democrats, jack up taxes, make everything "free," and let the American people get the government (and economy by the way) it so rightly deserves.

Then, and only then, like a spoiled girlfriend who stammers out the door, only to pay the price of her naivety in the real world, will you win these voters in the long run. The left will NOT be able to deliver what they promised, but more importantly you present a CLEAR and DISTINCT alternative in politics, rather a confused, amorphous, muddled one that looks nothing more than "wanna be democrat."

Finally, and I say this not because it's politically incorrect, but because all politically incorrect statements are true, republicans lose elections because of women. And it is the PRECISE same exact psychology where you tell a girl "there's the door" that she may claim to "hate you" initially, but in the end will at least respect you and inevitably ~~sleep with you~~ vote for you.

Imagine if you had told all these third wave feminists to fuck off instead of cowering like the cowards you are fearing they might call you "sexist?"

Imagine if you dared to cut their funding from the public universities and their women's studies programs?

Imagine if you "republican" "conservative" "traditional fathers" actually grabbed your balls out from your "elementary school teacher" wife's purse and said, "Son, here's how women, economics, and politics really work."

Imagine if instead of kissing illegal aliens' asses in fear you might lose "the Latino vote," you manned up and did what men have done for millennia and DEFENDED THE NATION.

Oh, you'd get heaps of scorn thrown on you, but many other women would admit to having the "voting VT's" for you as you were simply adhering to principle and being the epitome of man.

Of course, you aren't going to consult Tom Leykis. And of course you aren't going to consult me. And of course, you'll keep losing to the democrats. You'll keep listening to Dick Morris and all the other "political analysts" with their masters degrees from the MSM. But at least for some of you this ~~horribly politically incorrect~~ truthful reality will explain why the republicans keep losing, the left gets everything it wants, and why the only real strategy true freedom-loving, "normal" republicans have is to enjoy the decline.

---

http://aaron-clarey.podomatic.com/
http://www.assholeconsulting.com
https://www.youtube.com/user/AaronClarey
https://twitter.com/aaron_clarey
My Books
Amazon Affiliate

Ah, the Fake Mental Illness Bubble Continues

October 26, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

But muh feelz!

Episode #117 10-26-15

October 26, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Faking mental illness for government checks
You can always bet against your fellow man
Choking off the city in post collapse America
Why you never shop with women
The dilution of podcasts
What "20% of pregnancies end in abortion" tells us morally of American women

AND MORE!

In THIS EPISODE of The Clarey Podcast!

British Accent Privilege

October 27, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

To be blunt and direct I put my heart and soul into my new-found "online media empire" career. I cook, I slave, I write, I podcast, and when coupled with my life-long passion for economics and capitalism these efforts have produced society some impressive gifts.

My ability to predict the housing bubble long before it happened.
My ability to warn the youth about worthless degrees long before anybody else.
My ability to foresee the "retirement bubble"
Not to mention my ability to consult and advise the lost youth of today.

Thankfully, these efforts have not gone unrewarded and I am one of the VERY lucky few to have a significant enough of a following that I no longer have to sit in a cubicle, commute, or answer to a boss even again. I have just under 20,000 followers on YouTube, approximately 3,000 weekly listeners to my podcast, the same amount of daily visitors to my blog, and this generates enough income so that I may put food on the table and shelter over my head.

But then my keen economic eye caught something.

While me and my colleagues slaved and toiled as we tamed this new digital landscape, right behind us came some women. And these women had two traits:

1. They were cute and
2. They were conservative.

And so while the likes of me, Roosh, Mike Cernovich, Aurini, and others pioneered this new world, advancing and developing new lines of thought, these women came in and said,

"Tee hee!!! I like Sean Hannity!"
"Tee hee!!! I like America! Go capitalism!"
"Tee hee!!! I support the troop!"

And so for merely parroting very watered-down versions of the great economic, philosophical, and political arguments, concepts, and theories we men created, these girls were rewarded with:

OVER FIVE TIMES THE SUBSCRIBERSHIP AND FOLLOWING.

Naturally, some of us got angry and a bit perturbed as it was simply not fair. We did all the heavy lifting, we did all heavy thinking, not to mention those thousands of hours of research. But this great injustice aside, I fully acknowledge and am aware that it is the nature of the world.

Men (specifically conservative Western men) have a huge, desperate, and thirsty demand for hot, conservative women. Unfortunately, there is a very limited supply of such girls. This results in a classical economic situation of a shortage, predictably causing higher prices for lower quality goods.

However, unfair that 5:1 advantage may be, did you know there was another unearned trait that MILLIONS of men are born with each year that dwarfs this 5:1 ratio? A simple characteristic that dwarfs the benefits given to a cute set of conservative tits?

Enter the hated British accent.

Ever since the dawn of America we have had to fight this global scourge. First in the Revolutionary War, then again in 1812. And today this war continues as men with their perfectly-pitched and perfectly-polished British accents come in and swoon our women, take all the leading roles in Hollywood, and are automatically conferred an additional 15 IQ points during conversation.

But while I thought the plague of "British Accent Privilege" would be largely relegated to tickling the fancies of our women and playing the villains in Star Wars movies, unfortunately it has spread into my back yard. It has hit me at home. It has directly affected my career.

I didn't notice it at first until the internet drama surrounding one "Laughing Witch" exploded onto the scene where presumably this aged, leftist woman who has doxxed several people, ended up getting doxxed herself. I had only been paying a tacit amount of attention to the chaos, but to understand it more fully a friend of mine linked to a video of one of the more prominent YouTuber's she was trying to take down-Thunderf00t.

As I listened it was immediately apparent he had "British Accent Privilege," and was of course refined and polished in his delivery. But it wasn't until I looked at his subscribership did I fully comprehend just what an unfair advantage his British accent gave him over us colonials.

Thunderf00t had 400,000 subscribers. A full 20x's more than me!

Soon my mind raced as my synopses knew I had seen other YouTubers who had British Accent Privilege and orders of magnitude more subscribers than me.

Sargon of Akkad with his 191,000 followers.

And
Stefan Molyneux with his 280,000 followers.

You did some simple math and the benefits of British Accent Privilege was painfully obvious.

These three men averaged 290,000 subscribers. While I, a lowly colonial, only had 20,000. This resulted in a ratio of nearly 15:1, THREE TIMES THE ADVANTAGE HAVING A CUTE SET OF TITS AND THE ABILITY TO SPOUT CONSERVATIVE TALKING POINTS!

And whereas my economic mind is more than willing to accept the economic-sexual-psychological nature of men and their propensity to give a 5:1 advantage to women, what my American blood cannot abide is giving a man with a British accent such advantage and privilege.

Why is it a guy with the name "Thadeus Danglepuss" or "Benedict Cumberbatch" can even be considered refined or theatrically talented?

Why is it a guy with the name "Englbert Humperdink" or "Stefan Molyneux" can even be considered a musician or a (pfa!) "philosopher?"

It is high time the world wake up and realize the OPPRESSION we suffer under those with British Accent Privilege. And it would be equally just for those with British Accent Privilege to admit it, apologize for it, and pay us reparations for their winning the "accent lottery of life."

Han Solo, Trump, the Afghan War and More

October 28, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

In a Chris Bechtloff podcast you HAVE TO listen to (at least the first 15 minutes for the Han Solo psychological break down)

What a 20% Abortion Rate Tells Us About (Roughly) 20% of American Women

October 28, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

I can't remember the reason my curiosity was piqued, but whatever it was it resulted in me asking the question:

"What percentage of pregnancies end up being aborted?"

So off your intrepid economist captain went to teh interwebz in search of the data he needed. And though it took some adjustments and other methodological maneuverings (missing years of data, what about miscarriages, etc.) he was able to suss out the details.

20%

20% of pregnancies end in abortion.

Now before you get all appalled, realize this is an IMPROVEMENT over the women of the baby boomer generation where they seemed to make abortion an Olympic sport. Back in those "glorious" 70's and early 80's it was 30%.

But it's still a pretty atrocious figure that 1 in 5 pregnancies today end up in abortion.

Now keep in mind I am pro-choice. I truly believe a child not wanted or a child unable to be cared for will live a life worse than the 100% neutral life of never being born in the first place. And in all intellectual honesty I can be flippant about it.

I'm not religious.
I don't have kids.
I got a vasectomy (class of '07).
And I'm very thankful the law has made it SOLELY the responsibility of women to make this horrible decision.

So yes, for reasons of cowardice and misanthropic indifference, I really don't care if you abort your baby and will fight for your right to do so.

However, so high was this number not only did I forgot my original reason for calculating it, but it replace it with a separate observation.

How irresponsible and amoral are American women?

Now I know there are already some mathematical problems that could potentially overstate or distort these numbers.

What about women with multiple abortions?
What about the morning afterpill?
What about birth control failing? IT DOES THAT YOU KNOW!!!
What about rape?
What about widows?

And thus it does not translate directly to "1 in 5 women get abortions." But even accounting for these variables, it's still pretty darn close to 20%. Which behooved my question.

How irresponsible and amoral do you have to be that 20% of you use ABORTION as a means of birth control?

You see, the problem I have with this number is not that there's this many abortions going on. It's that it tells me 1 in 5 women are not responsible enough to use the 438 other forms of birth control before screwing around with not only the lives of future innocent children, but their own. That before they partake in the act of potentially bringing in a new and innocent human life into this world, 1 in 5 of them just say "meh" and to hell with the birth control.

But where the morality of this comes in is one that even though I'm pro-choice, I just don't understand.

WHY RISK THE MORAL DECISION TO EVEN HAVE AN ABORTION???

Look, I'm the first guy to admit I don't know if there's an afterlife or if there's a god or whether a fetus is a living human being and whether abortion is murder. But even with my callous indifference to humans, I would NEVER put myself into the position of having to make that decision. It is such a daunting moral (not to mention psychological, biological, physical, and emotional) decision that when I originally set out to do this calculation I thought for SURE it would come under 5%.

Alas, 20% of women disagree with me and don't give a flying flip about the moral gravity and ramifications of having an abortion.

Now the good news is that this is (thankfully) not the majority of women. 80% of women actually have the responsibility, wisdom, and selflessness to make the right choice, use birth control, and bring a child into this world when she's ready for it. And also (if the data is correct) this trend is trending down. But I wanted to point out this statistic not just because it's appallingly high, but to warn the young boys out there. 1 in 5 women are just not responsible and at minimum have a questionable moral compass. And while you may say, "well that means 80% of the women are just fine," true....but have you ever dated more than 4 girls?

Stay frosty boys. Stay the freak frosty.

Remember to purchase your copy of THE BEST of Captain Capitalism, Volume 2, "Captain Capitalism-Reserved!"

Help Our Sponsors

October 28, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Hi All,

Friendly reminder to visit the ole sponsors who keep me out of a cubicle and in my pajamas where I belong!

Phenibut!
Legal Shield
Confessions of an Online Hustler
Academic Composition
And of course....

GLORIOUS HAT!!!!

Laci Green: A Case of Swapping One Religion for Another

October 29, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Originally an Asshole Consulting request, but a lesson we can all learn, not just about Laci Green, but that trading in "traditional" religions for new, "political ones" doesn't make the new ones any more valid.

Should Women Work?

October 30, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

I would have titled this post differently, as I believe women should absolutely have the right to work and we should ban nobody from doing what they wish with their lives, but Roosh still brings up some good points. Precisely how vital are women to the economy? I wish he would have harped on the public sector/non-profit sectors of the economy with some numbers (perhaps something I could do), but precisely what would happen at the office or factory if women weren't allowed? What would happen to government bloat if there were make-work jobs for them? What would happen if you had one strong disciplinarian vice principle in the high school and not a dozen "guidance counselors?"

Again, I am very much against telling people what they can and cannot do. But as an economist I am infinitely intrigued about what they "should" do in theirs and society's best interests.

Everything Wrong With MGTOW

October 30, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

In one simple picture.

I'm going to be brief on account it's Friday and I think we've gone over these topics before, but I think a convenient, consolidated recap here will prove helpful:

1. How Much of it is "Ugly Feminist Who Can't Find a Man" but Reversed?

One of the things that tipped me off to the fake MGTOW movement was the nature of the problems and complaints men had about women. It was confirmed once I started hearing concepts like "Incel" and "TFL." And though you could not "totally" confirm as they hid behind avatars of 17th century philosophers, medieval knights, and anime characters (though I'm guilty of that), you could just tell they were men who did not keep themselves in shape, were not attractive, and instead of doing something about it, rather take the easy route and (just like feminists) shame and lecture women for "liking the bad boy alpha with muscles, money, and a motorcycle."

2. Still Obsessed Over Women

Real MGTOW's have more important shit going on in their lives than to protest a feminist protest. And we certainly do not have the time to make a body of armor out of ducktape to do so. This poor soul obviously still cares about what women think as he spent lord knows how many hours of his precious life to do this. The mere fact he's trying to bring attention to "MGTOW" shows just how much control women still have over him. Closely related to this...

3. Crusaderism/Lack of Purpose and Agency in Life

Again, real MGTOW's are out there doing shit with their lives. They are not going to protest...well...feminists protesting. They will have a hobby, a craft, friends, a business venture, some books to read, a family to raise, mountains to hike, landscapes to paint, girls to nail, even video games to play.

This guy and many other "MGTOWs" do not. They have nothing more going on in their lives than to mire themselves in how they've all gone MGTOW which is no different or lacking in accomplishment than Laci Green claiming she's "pansexual." Inevitably the "GTOW" has to become part of MGTOW. And since that takes effort, sadly, I'd estimate 30% of self-proclaimed MGTOW's (primarily the cultists on the internet) never do. And sadly they never really join the remaining 70% of their authentic MGTOW brothers.

Ultimately, however, the problem is that MGTOW by its nature is a silent movement, a philosophy, a quiet choice. YOu simply "go ghost" and live your life a different way. This leaves the academians, the theoreticians, the wanna be's who pound away at keyboards and throw vitriol on YouTube. Worse, it leaves the likes of the above (who by no means defines MGTOW's) define them to the outside world. And ironically, it accomplishes the EXACT OPPOSITE of what the crusaderist arm of the MGTOW's want as society doesn't take them seriously, but mocks them and writes them off.

Anyway, today I'm going to hit the gym, bang out some miles, listen to the Ancient War podcast, practice a speech I have coming up, go swing dancing with my girlfriend while having dinner with friends, then I'm going to prepare my truck for a roadtrip out east to visit fellow fans and bloggers.

I will not be donning plastic homemade armor and protesting a feminist protest.

Burn Baby Burn!

November 2, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Another scam college goes bankrupt and their idiot students are "enraged."

What I love is most of the people who attend these colleges are too stupid to realize it's a GREAT thing the school went under because it effectively put an end to them continuing to make a horrible and costly mistake.

"But That's Not Fair!!!"

November 2, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

"Alas, not only because fairness is important to society, but as individuals we have the instinctual demand for self-respect, "fairness" is a concept constantly hammered and hounded upon us. At three you are told "it's not fair to steal your brother's candy." From all of K-12 your teachers insist on everything be "fair." And when you're in college your liberal arts professors do nothing but whine and complain about how the world is so "unfair." So when you graduate from college you think the real world should, ought to be, and is fair.

Oh, you foolish man."

More at my latest piece at ROK.

You Are an Idiot

November 2, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Don't be an idiot.

Episode #118 11-2-15

November 2, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

How Silicon Valley nerds ruined video games
A drunk Thee Man hits on Cappy's girlfriend!!!??
How inuring yourself to rejection, blinds you to women who actually like you.
Affirmative Action Star Wars
Cappy is for universal healthcare, BGI, and free housing??? What???

AND MORE

In THIS EPISODE of The Clarey Podcast!

Comic Books Taken Over By Marxists

November 3, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Amen Rocking Mr E.

The "97% Consensus" on Global Warming is Bullshit

November 4, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

I find global warming "cute" because it's not only something the left gets excited about, but many people on the right and in libertarian spheres get excited about it too. Specifically, people on the right think it's all BS and libertarians think it's real and wonder how I (an otherwise rational, logical, empirical human being) don't believe in it.

Well, here (links to MP3).

The entire argument for global warming hinges on this convenient statistic that 97% of scientists believe in man-induced global warming. Only problem is that statistic is pure bunk and made up. Now the lesson to learn from this is one of when to ignore data and let pure, simple logic (not to mention cynicism in your fellow man) determine your position on different things.

If you just trusted your gut and looked at this global warming thing for what it was, it would have become very apparent that it was all a scam. It was just a racket.

You have:

1. Leftists at all levels of government creating a problem out of thin air
2. That the only solution is more government and taxes
3. Wherein the people who could determine if there was a problem were all compensated on there being a problem
4. With holes in research and methodologies, not to mention completely fabricated data
5. With predictions and computer models failing to predict the past and future
6. Oh, and yeah, don't forget about the "brand new religious" element that the mindless sheeple can follow where they can buy indulgences and give their meaningless lives "value" by claiming "they're going green."

The real story about the global warming hoax is just what a high percentage of the west's population is easy marks and fall for this huckster bullshit. That they lack such basic common sense to identify a scam like this, if not race to sop it up, shows just how far gone this society is and that it is going to get what it precisely deserves.

Regardless, my point is that this one was so obvious you didn't have to waste your time pulling data, pointing to research, and highlighting shoddy methodologies. All you had to say was "it's a scam and you're a dupe." Because in all honesty, people who believe in global warming choose to believe in it and will never be convinced otherwise. Alas, why waste your time or get riled up about global warming? It's just the newest state-endorsed religion for the sheep.

The Fucktardery Never Ends

November 6, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

For the patron Saint of Frick.

Why I Don't Watch the "Debates"

November 6, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Sober Saturday Linkage

November 7, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

An analysis of the movie "High Noon."

A good, dense piece on economics and history.

Please don't tell me you socialists care about the children. You just don't.

Was on the Swank Life Podcast.

Chloe Luv started her podcast (and fair warning even I blushed when listening to it! I thought it was going to be more about the industry and business...annnnnnnd....no. Just fair warning!)

New blog, Swords of the Saints.

Lazy Sunday Linkage

November 9, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Stefan Molyneux and Bill Whittle have a great conversation (link corrected)about the r and k breeding strategies. Many things were explained in this discussion that even I was unaware of. Strongly recommend you listen to it.

Wedding loans. For the Patron's Saint name of Frick. Effing "Wedding Loans."

Rich liberals will need to move minorities out of the cities and into the suburbs because they need fancy downtown condos. That and Russia, Syria, and Egypt...all in one post.

Keep exposing Academia for what it is - a depot for America's adult children who cannot work real jobs and must become professors.

Uncie Bern Bern has his latest podcast up.

Correcting Our Own

November 9, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

As many of you know I am a big fan of Stefan Molyneux. His call in shows are a bit emo, but when he does specials or particular research on a particular topic I very much enjoy them as he is usually pioneering a new vein of philosophy or thought.

However a common fact he refers to (not necessarily cite) is that the amount of money in social programs that actually reaches their intended recipients is a mere fraction of the total, implying the majority of it merely goes into the pockets of government workers and administrators.

I had no reason to doubt him as I trust the man is intellectually honest, but it wasn't until my economic spidey senses started tingling with a great economic idea that I found out he is likely wrong.

The idea was that if there was that much government bloat, there would be an area where even the most right wing and left wing persons could get together and have a great compromise. Recipients of welfare, TANF, WIC, EBT, etc., could get an increase in their benefits, while the producers and taxpayers of society could get their taxes lowered. This would be possible by simply streamlining the government bloat used to manage these programs and would be a win win for everybody.

The problem is government overhead accounting for the majority of social program spending just isn't true. Glenn Kessler did some outstanding (and rare) journalism researching the topic, finding a study that shows SNAP's overhead only accounts for 6% of total spending. Media Matters also pulled some data for multiple social programs showing the overhead for these programs ranging from 4% to 17%. And while I don't trust Media Matters to present this data without manipulation or spin, it is in line with Kessler's research (though, not surprisingly their links to the original sources no longer work).

Regardless, the point is that those of us on the right or libertarian side of the political spectrum cannot rely on lies or false data simply because its against our principles. We want to base our decisions in reality since that is the best way to develop policy, theories, and philosophies that work best in the real world. So even though it would have been nice to perhaps balance the federal budget on the backs of overpaid and overbloated numbers of government workers, sadly, it doesn't look that way. We'll just have to find other ways.

POST POST - I spoke with Michael over at Free Domain Radio and he said Stefan already has something in the pipe on this and will present his figures. Some of the things cited in the comments are what he will be addressing, so I'm sure we'll have a good response.

7 Articles Later and I Still Don't Know What Missouri's President Wolfe Did

November 10, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

It kept coming up on my damn twitter and other social media until I finally broke down and said, "Alright, fine, I'll look into this. What thef@ck is going on with this guy "Wolfe" at the University of Missouri?"

And seven articles and 45 finite minutes of my life later, I still don't know.

Oh, I know he resigned as well as the chancellor.
I know the student group 1950 had posted a list of tyrannical and racist demands that would make any self respecting and prospective student refuse to attend.
And I know the college sportzball team was instrumental in getting these events to transpire.

But the KEY question I was trying to answer has still gone unanswered.

Precisely what the hell did President Wolfe do that was so drastic and bad that he AND the chancellor resigned, not to mention the entire university system is now forcing "diversity training" on their students?

I was expecting him to have used a genuine racial slur. Perhaps assaulted a minority student. Maybe got caught banging a freshman during orientation.

Nope.

The best answer I could find was "he didn't respond to some racial issues on campus fast enough." Seriously, that's the official reason for all this hubbub. He didn't handle a CLAIM that a young black man was called racial slurs while on campus and a feces swastika was smeared on a door.

So now I (along with the rest of you) have to ask ourselves, what is the likely scenario?

1. President Wolfe was SOOOO incompetent that he was unaware of the Stasi-level culture of political correctness and race-victimization in today's college campuses that he let two SERIOUS claims like that go unanswered and uninvestigated?

Or

2. Political correctness, victimization, and crusaderism have so infected today's millennial and college campus generations that they are professional and feral victims, constantly on the search for a reason to whine and claim they're oppressed because (ultimately) they're too damn lazy to work and think majoring in real subjects is beneath them?

Any one with half a brain knows it is the later (whether they have the balls to admit that or not, however, is another matter).

Now, of course, I could be completely wrong. Maybe it was in the 8th article I would have read that I'd find out he blackmailed the entire black sorority on campus to flunk them out if they all didn't sleep with him. Perhaps he stalled, or refused to investigate, which I could understand would lead to his resignation. But if all the students and left have is "he didn't handle racial tensions on campus well," FOAD. You're not fooling me. Try your little "woeisme victim game" on John Boehner or some other ballless republican.

The truth is that this is simply another (and ballsy) play on the left to use false racism and victimization to provide the rationalize for further brainwashing and indoctrination of America's youth in the bottleneck of college we force them to go through. It is secondarily a BLATANTLY CLEAR aim for the worthless tranches of academians, professors, professional activities, and worthless-major-graduate students to get more funding to create make work jobs such as "diversity counselors," "professors," "advisors," and "directors."

Again, at any point in time, prove me wrong. I want to see what Mr. Wolfe did wrong and will certainly celebrate his resignation. Otherwise this is nothing more than what the left always does - bitch and whine while excelling at cowardice.

---

http://aaron-clarey.podomatic.com/
http://www.assholeconsulting.com
https://www.youtube.com/user/AaronClarey
https://twitter.com/aaron_clarey
My Books
Amazon Affiliate

"Leftists Only Respond to Violence" Episode of The Clarey Podcast

November 10, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Fan mail!
Christmas shopping at home while wifey is in lingerie
Black Friday is proof America needs to die
Your wife won't let you go to Vegas
No blow jobs? Then no boyfriend for you!
The Nazi Zombies are real at the U of Missouri!
The left only responds to violence
"Horse Yoga"

and MORE

in THIS EPISODE of The Clarey Podcast!

Alex is Hiring for Busy Season

November 11, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

From Alex:

On behalf of Academic Composition, I would like to thank all of you for your continuous support. We've expanded the ranks of our writers and advertisers dramatically. However, some of our new writers are understandably frustrated with the lack of opportunity. This is the high season and we've serviced a record number of clients and we are ready for more. If you would like to earn a bit of supplemental income posting ads on Craigslist, this is your chance to do so. You will earn $5 per lead and one dollar per each day your ads stay live on the forum. Craigslist's posting policies have relaxed quite a bit, so most of you will be able to post ads that are going to stay live on the forum for a very long time. As you know, most college students are stressing out over their mid-terms and you'll be able to make a good bit of money with just leads alone. As you may have inferred from several testimonials we've shared, several of our subcontractors are pulling in hundreds of dollars a month while doing very little work. Contact us at academiccomposition@gmail.com and we'll get you started. If you are a writer or looking to write for us, don't get discouraged just yet. The busiest juncture of the semester is yet to come and we're making a special effort to provide opportunities for everyone qualified and willing to work! Aleksey Bashtavenko Academic Composition Owner & Principal Writer (540) 300-1253 academiccomposition@gmail.com www.academiccomposition.com www.linkedin.com/pub/aleksey-bashtavenko/25/7b8/323/

Who's Piers Morgan Again?

November 11, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Har!!!!!

Today Is the Day You Do Your Christmas Shopping

November 11, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Do not procrastinate. Get your Christmas shopping done now.

This has been a PSA from your loving Captain.

Viewing the Liberal Arts from Another Perspective

November 11, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

A client sent me an e-mail wondering if he should instead major in engineering rather than his current major, construction management. Knowing engineering was the obviously superior major, I was already predispositioned to recommend it until he told me his IQ.

128.

Now, it almost was mandatory he became an engineer.

I remembered vaguely a rule of thumb you needed an IQ of about 115 to be an engineer, but I checked first before consulting and found I was wrong. It was more like 120, with some of the higher level engineers having an average IQ of around 128 (Economics, ahem, ahem, also came in at 128). Regardless, he had more than the raw potential to become any kind of engineer he wanted.

But as I looked down the list I noticed the dramatic drop in IQ as you went from STEM to the liberal arts. Matter of fact if you took the average of the top STEM fields and compared it to the bottom of the humanities your average roughly dropped form 128 to 106, a full 22 point or 1.5 standard deviation drop.

This was interesting to me because I remember when I used to teach statistics I (in a brilliant stroke of retaliatory genius) had my students take IQ tests online and then calculate their percentile rank. The results were predictable, but I recall one of my smarter students all depressed because he scored a 79. I looked at him and said, "79? That's borderline retarded!" He sheepishly said, "Yeah, I guess I'm retarded." I then yelled at him, "John!!! You're not retarded!!!! You just didn't try your best! Matter of fact you purposely had to try to be this bad! Now take it again and try this time!"

Regardless, that number stuck with me, and as it just so happens it's true. 80 is considered borderline retarded.

However, it wasn't until 13 years later today did this little expedition into the world of IQ provide me some insight on the problems we have in academia, specifically as it pertains to the liberal arts. Compared to their STEM peers, liberal arts majors ARE retarded. The gap between a normal person with an IQ of 100 and a mental retard is 20. So the gap between a STEM major and your average humanities major would be like an average person with an IQ of 100 and the average liberal arts major with an IQ of 78. "Officially retarded."

Of course we don't recognize this or view it that way since we are on the "good" side of 100. People between 90 and 110 are "normal" and it is those who are above 110 that are the statistical freaks in a good way. But if we were to not look at absolute scores, but relative scores to your average STEM major (or, cough, cough, economist), dealing with your average "college educated liberal arts major" is indeed as painful as dealing with a mentally impaired adult.

Watching the average person get excited about sportsball to the point they get upset or happy depending on how one group of guys throws a ball against another group of guys?

Painful.

Listening to women gossip at the water cooler about what dress which slut wore to the Oscars?

Torture.

Channel surfing through TV, searching for a morsel akin to "The IT Crowd" or "Sherlock," only to have "Keeping Up with the Kardashians" and "The View" show up?

Bamboo shoots under the toenails.

It's no different than if your average humanities major had to deal with Rupret the Monkey Boy for their entire waking days.

But cultural comparisons aside this may also go a long way in explaining why so many of us on the right have had absolutely ZERO success in getting people on the left, specifically those in the liberal arts, to acknowledge and accept some basic mathematical facts and realities. To a guy with an IQ of 130 the concept of ever-increasing government debt leads to an obvious conclusion of unsustainability and collapse. But to your average early childhood education major, she doesn't even know (or care) about the difference between a million and a trillion. To the woman with an IQ of 140, she understands the concept that there is no such thing as money, only the goods and services it can buy. But to your average "Child Psychology" major he can't understand why pieces of paper don't have value. And to the guy with an IQ of 120, he knows villainizing and punishing "corporations" will simply have the effect of deterring them from investing in the place they are punished. But to your average journalism major, their brain isn't smart enough to overcome simply envy and spouts out "it's the corporations, man!!!!"

This is not to dismiss my theories that the true motivator of leftists is the mere formula of "laziness+ego." But it is to point out they may simply lack the intelligence to understand and comprehend "slightly advanced" economics,

cause and effect,
math, and
advanced logic,

rendering what we think are simple, black and white facts moot and ineffective.

Ergo, it doesn't make any sense to get angry with them if they can't understand "% GDP" or "exponential growth," because expecting that out of a liberal arts major is really like expecting a mentally retarded person to be able to do long division. And while it does not solve the country's myriad of problems, it does lower your blood pressure and provide a little bit of sanity.

---

http://aaron-clarey.podomatic.com/
http://www.assholeconsulting.com
https://www.youtube.com/user/AaronClarey
https://twitter.com/aaron_clarey
My Books
Amazon Affiliate

Batman vs. Terminator

November 11, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

And you guys wonder why I geek out sometimes:

The KKK and Concerned Students 1950 - A Match Made in Heaven

November 11, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

"The Black Storm Trooper Guy"

November 12, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

My Speech to the Minnesota Tea Party

November 13, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Both in video

and audio.

The topic is how to get young men (under 40) interested and involved in conservatism. I sat down and thought long and hard about it and came up with a brilliant strategy that would work.

Only problem is, you're relying on political parties to implement these strategies. Still, some great ideas and insight that will prove useful to all.

France Brought It Upon Themselves

November 14, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

And we will too:

Also, if you want to see how perfectly brainwashed the left is, look at the immediate knee jerk reactions in the comments section where spineless and brainless leftists scramble to blame everything but radical Islam. It is amazing to see them so desperately try to defend a group of people who want to destroy them. Enjoy that decline people, enjoy that freaking decline.

Lazy Sunday Linkage

November 15, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Aurini writes another "boring, frivolous, light read."

Why Millennial college students need the shit kicked out of them.

DT and The Man have a podcast (with behind the scenes info on how enraged I was at the Tea Party meeting)

PBS has professor on to explain "Micro-Aggressions" and the video gets a torrent of well-deserved hate and downvotes. Please feel free to downvote it.

Just discovered a new Podcast Treasure Trove - The History of Russia. 168 episodes so far and they are VERY well done.

STEM > STEAM

November 16, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

A particular ranty rant that you may want to share with your "STEAM" colleagues:

What Would College Be Without Football?

November 16, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

An institution of learning.

Episode #120 11-16-15

November 17, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Cappy likes Jamaica
Wedding loans and wedding whores
How success will destroy novelty and why that is a huge problem

AND MORE!

In THIS EPISODE of The Clarey Podcast!

President Hollande Apologizes to Concerned Students 1950

November 17, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Out East Road Tripping

November 19, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Posts will be infrequent. But if you want me to pass along a message to Chris Bechtloff let me know.

On the Road

November 20, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Aaron

These pictures make me look better than I am in real life. Seriously. Glorious Karl is an amazing man with a camera.

Glorious Karl and Glorious Hat

November 20, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Consider buying one. The redhead DOES come with the hat! I swear!

Road Trip Podcast Special! - Glorious Karl Edition

November 21, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Cappy visits Glorious Karl and Karl disagrees with Cappy!

OFF WITH HIS HEAD!!!

Cappy and Karl discuss abortion, secularism, religion, law, communism, single parents, adoption, the "blogger profession," Laci Green, Jenna Marbles, IQ, and how the masses are too busy watching sports ball or Oprah that their sites will NEVER achieve mainstream status.

Tune in here!

UPDATE - I've switched from that shitbag service known as Podomatic to Soundcloud. This means for all of you with ~~communist devices~~ iPhones will NOT get the new episodes through iTunes until I update the RSS feed. In the meantime, consider buying a device that let's you download directly to your phone without forcing you to join the "Apple Commune." It's what us adults do.

Most American Parents Don't Deserve the 5th Commandment

November 22, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

However, as hellish this guaranteed-to-be-a-nightmare is going to be, it is better that living under an abusive home. You may not have food, but you will have freedom. You may be sleeping on a couch, but you have the right to come home when you see fit. You may be going into debt to pay for tuition, but you won't have your money stolen or be forced to tithe 10% to a ~~defunct state~~ religion. And you may be down and depressed, but you will find your own family either through friends or a spouse, and they will treat you better.

It's the best life you can live, no matter what disadvantages life gave you.

Road Trip Special - Chris Bechtloff

November 22, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

We visit Chris Bechtloff and discuss why America deserves what it's going to get, 20 something feminists unable to have orgasms, his snoring dog, reporting pedophiles, and more in THIS PODCAST ROAD TRIP SPECIAL!

Road Trip Podcast Special - Guest on Bechtloff's SNL

November 23, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Chris was kind enough to host be on his Saturday Night Live Stream. The audio is marginal on account me and Chris were sharing a microphone. But we cover everything from SJW's beating the dead horse of multiple genders, "what if whites turned their focus towards killing people instead of making iPhones," how women are deathly afraid to ask out men, and a man who eats a jar of mayonnaise.

All that and more on The Bechtloff's Saturday Night Live Stream.

I Am Changing Podcast Hosts

November 24, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

As some of you have noticed the Podomatic site does not have the latest podcasts OR it says it does and then there's nothing to download.

Welcome to the retards that somehow got financing to start "Podomatic."

Since then I have switched to Sound Cloud and you can find the new episodes here.

Unfortunatley, for those of you with communist devices (iPhones) you are not allowed to download MP3's directly because you are viewed as children in the eyes of Steve Jobs and are FORCED to go through iTunes. So you will have to download and listen on your computer OR when I get home from my trip and provide a new RSS feed to my iTunes account.

Terribly sorry for the inconvenience, but you may send your complaints to Podomatic.

Road Trip Podcast Special - Isle of Man

November 24, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

I was interviewed by Sam at the Isle of Man podcast. Sam is one of the best interviewers I've spoken with on account he had his questions thought out and prepared, and really did some great follow up questions. We talked about Star Wars going diversity-crazy, philosophy, familial relations, and more!

Posts will return to somewhat normal as there are no more 10 hour stretches of driving for my east coast road trip.

Why You Should Never Attend the Carlson School of Management

November 25, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Remember, the only two reasons you go to business school is :

1. To major in accounting or
2. Because the school is a top ranked business school like Wharton or the U of Chicago.

Road Trip Podcast Special - Marcus Brown

November 26, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

In the final installment of the Road Trip Podcast Special we interview good ole Marcus Brown, the photographer and model of the cover "The Black Man's Guide Out of Poverty." We talk about Marcus growing up on the South side of Chicago, black community "vocabulary," girls, minimalism, and more!

SoundCloud and RSS Feed Download Problems Solved

November 28, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Hi All,

Noticed that the download option was not available from Sound Cloud. Fixed that an also found my RSS feed for those of you asking.

Slowly, but surely making the transition.

Cappy

Better Than Any Day in Banking

November 29, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

I chose the wrong profession.

Weekend Guffaw

November 29, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

The thing that gets me is the order of the family is too perfect from left to right. Makes me wonder if it wasn't a spoof.

Also, if anybody knows the artist please let me know:

New Sponsor Chad Elkins CPA

November 29, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Howdy All,

Tax season is coming up, and heck, forget tax season. What if you are an entrepreneur or just looking to lower your taxes? Then visit our newest sponsor Chad Elkin, CPA.

Remember, the year end is just a short month away, which means tax season is upon us. Make sure to lower your taxes by consulting Chad and asking him about 401k's, IRA's, and whatever else those CPA people do!

You can visit Chad here and tell him "The Captain sent ya!"

Academian Blacks Are Racist

November 29, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

And until I see proof otherwise, I will be assuming, rightly or not, the average black studies professor or black college activist is a racist who hates white people.

Episode #121 of The Clarey Podcast

November 29, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Luke warm jacuzzi's
Cappy's footprints in Michigan
How Jessica Assaf & Hallie Turner show how society uses and abuses its youth for ego (this alone is worth tuning into)

AND MORE

in this ABSOLUTELY MUST LISTEN TO EPISODE OF THE CLAREY PODCAST!

How Jessica Assaf Serves as a Warning for All Aspiring SJW's

November 30, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

In my latest podcast I did a segment on Hallie Turner, an unsupervised 13 year old who at the age of 12 filed a lawsuit against the State of North Carolina over global warming. The over arching point was not that a 12 year old shouldn't be filing lawsuits, or how it was proof the schools brainwash children in socialism, or another lesson in crusaderism

It was how a 13 year old egomaniac does not form in a vacuum and how society (namely, her teachers, media, and parents) failed her, effectively ruining her childhood and bringing up a future megalomaniac who is practically guaranteed to be miserable her entire life.

However, while tirading in a stream of consciousness sort of manner, I remembered that a very similar situation occurred several year ago when I put together my speech on Crusaderism. Specifically, one Jessica Assaf.

At the time she was a mere 15 year old girl, but like Hallie lacked the parental oversight to check her ego. Naturally, she found a "crusade" just like Hallie, and decided she was going to lobby the California legislature about "safe cosmetics." Articles were written about her. How she was so brave and "smart" for fighting what "she thought was right." Look at what a "courageous" girl she was fighting "big cosmetics." etc. But this was now approaching 10 years ago, and so I was curious:

What ever happened to Jessica Assaf?

So while podcasting I looked into her and her fate was exactly what I feared.

Despite hailing from Marin County (the richest county in all of San Francisco) and despite pursuing her MBA from Harvard, in all honesty, Jessica is a failure.

Yes her bio is chock full of "achievements" and "accomplishments," and yes her resume has her heading up all these "beauty activist" organizations, but behind all these (largely) self-created "organizations" and "movements" she has done nothing of genuine significance these past ten years. She has a worthless undergrad degree in "Public Health, Documentary Film and Activism Studies," has no real world working experience, and unless she has a full scholarship or rich parents, she is GREATLY indebting herself (or her parents) for a very pricey MBA from Harvard which, sadly, won't pay dividends because her protesting and litigious background makes her a risk to hire for employers.

But the real reason Jessica is a failure (not necessarily by any fault of her own) is because of what she has lost in heading down the "Social Justice Warrior" path at such a young age. A lost life. A wasted childhood. And an impaired future.

First, imagine what you were doing when you were 12, 13, 14 or 15. I sure as hell wasn't going on political crusades. I was living and enjoying my childhood. Wasting lazy summer days away going fishing, playing video games. Sleeping in class, chasing after girls that wouldn't let me catch them. Everything that every young boy and girl does that makes their precious and all-too-short childhood the magical time in their lives that it is. And to have that ruined and tarnished with the unwelcomed and vile adult disease known as "politics" is a tragedy.

I'll say it again. I will never have children, but if I did, they would NOT ever hear a word of politics or economics out of me until they were 16. That's the LEAST parents owe their children.

Second, in pursuing crusaderism or Social Justice Warrioring as a career, Jessica, Hallie, and any other aspiring SJW fundamentally undermine and destroy their lifetime earnings potential. Naturally, and predictably, they will retort "IT'S NOT ABOUT THE MONEY!" until it is about the money because they incurred $150,000 in student loan debt for worthless, unemployable degrees. Hopefully, they have rich parents to bail them out, but if my generation is any kind of proxy, you can expect to be in your 40's, even 50's, still saddled with student loans, a worthless degree, and a torturous debate about whether you let your ego take the hit, admit you goofed up, and make decisions to salvage what's left of your life, or double down and insist it's the "evil republicans" and "white males" that are oppressing you and your "Masters in Social Activism" degree.

Finally, in going down the Social Justice Warrior path, Jessica and Hallie severely limit their ability to have a family. Not just because they are financial liabilities (as young women are now saddled with student loans and worthless degrees), but because they're not marriage material. Their careers and egos obviously come first, which is antithetical to love, marriage, and children. And they also won't be ready for marriage until they fulfill their career goals and aspirations. This not only means they need masters degrees and years working at some low-paying non-profit or government job, but that they'll be 33, 34, 35, 40, by the time they're ready to settle down. And the sad truth is any man with any quality and any options is just not going to marry a woman that old. Alas, going down the SJW path severely increases the risk you'll trade in the most important thing in life (other humans, typically your family) for a career that in all honesty is pointless, useless, meaningless and unfulfilling.

But the real tragedy of going down the SJW path is that it doesn't deliver what it promises or aspiring-SJW's hope for:

Attention, fame, and glory with little-to-no real work.

Let's be very clear and honest about what motivates young 13, 14, and 15 year olds to go on political crusades and 17,18, and 19 year olds to major in the liberal arts.

Fame, attention, and a shot at riches without having to do math and real work,

Their goal, even though they will vehemently deny it, is to get through life working a cake job,

BUT

secretly pining for fame and attention

BECAUSE

why the hell else would you file lawsuits and protest at the age of 12 unless you are an attention whore (male or female)?

And it is here 10 years down the SJW path that Jessica Assaf serves as a horrendous warning to all others thinking of doing the same.

Despite hailing from the elite Marin County and getting into Harvard and having all the media attention in the world, Jessica's fame just isn't materializing.

First, her YouTube channel has 11 whole subscribers. 1/2000th the amount your lowly non-SJW Captain has. Naturally, she may not be actively pursuing a YouTube channel, but for a "Beauty Activist" ESPECIALLY IT BEING HER CAREER, you'd think she could beat this lower-middle income boy from Milwaukee County.

Second, her flagship website, "Beauty Lies Truth," boasts having "rock star" Alexis Krauss on board, who (though I'm sure a fine musician) is not a "star." More literally, however, since we are aiming for ego, attention, and fame, the Alexa rating of Beauty Lies Truth is 850,000th, while you're humble Captain's blog ranks much higher at 95,000th (and that's without a Harvard MBA).

Third, she was mentioned in a book! She didn't write the book. She wasn't necessarily even the subject of the book. She merely got mentioned in the book. And sadly that book has a paltry 4 reviews putting it on par with my SPOOF book "Boris the Shitting Buffalo. (which makes a great Christmas book BTW)"

Fourth, if you read through her bio you'll note her most notable achievements are HELPING getting some legislation passed and being A participant in a study about cosmetics. Not to be an asshole, but...

Whipdy freaking ding.

So what? THAT'S your life's accomplishments in your SPECIALTY??? 10 years, with an early start to boot and that's your life's work? That's what you're going to point to? That is what you take pride in? It is neither influential nor memorable nor notable to society.

And finally, yet sadly, me merely writing this piece is going to get her more fame, traffic, and attention than she's had since the original article was written about her nearly 10 years ago. It wasn't her protesting, lobbying legislatures, or setting up a ton of fabricated "organizations" or "non-profits." It was some guy still in his boxer shorts, banging away at his laptop who has yet to shower today that saw the risk (and the lesson) Ms. Assaf epitomizes in the SJW crowd.

The sad truth I'm trying to point out is the ironic tragedy that the attention, fame, ego, etc., you seek when going down the SJW path never materializes. The reason is because ever since Gen X millions upon millions of like-minded youngsters came up with the same "diabolical plan" to attention whore on the backs of political crusades they did not fully understand, nor cared to understand, because it was an easier route than becoming an engineer, an accountant, a doctor, a tradesmen or any other productive member of society. And with this many people all trying to be Social Justice Warriors, only a few will stand out, while the vast majority will relegated to unmentionable roles like Ms. Assaf. So while this path may be tempting at the naive and clueless age of 16, 17, or 18, it is one that is JUST NOT WORTH IT, will simply ruin your life, and waste what precious time you have on this planet.

It is not too late for Ms. Assaf to be honest with herself, take inventory of her life, ask herself what she really wants out of it, and GET IT. She can become a wife, a mother, a doctor, an engineer, anything, and I mean ANYTHING would be more productive, meaningful and rewarding than what she is doing now.

And it is certainly not too late for 13 year old Ms. Turner to stop right now, abandon her little SJW-ing, crusader ego trip and got back to being a child.

But once you hit 30, and heaven help you if you hit 40, and you never abandon the SJW path, you at MINIMUM have severely crippled and wasted a significant portion of your life. No cause is worth that. Please find value and meaning in your own life, not the political aims and goals of others.

---

http://aaron-clarey.podomatic.com/

http://www.assholeconsulting.com
https://www.youtube.com/user/AaronClarey
https://twitter.com/aaron_clarey
My Books
Amazon Affiliate

It's So Nice to Have a Wolf Around the House

December 1, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Thanks to the wonders of the internet I was able to find an old cartoon special from my childhood. It's titled "It's So Nice to Have a Wolf Around the House" and while funny when we were children, it is HILARIOUS as well as charming for adults. If you have any children, I recommend watching the two parts (about 7 minutes each). You will not regret it:

Why Women Crying is a Manipulation Tactic that Should Be Ignored

December 1, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

From a woman no less.

Why I Only Protect Those Close to Me

December 2, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

And never open doors for women I don't personally know or hail from the WWII generation.

Ho Ho Ho!

December 3, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Remember kids, all of Cappy's books make great holiday gifts!

Nothing says, "I Love You" more than destroying your childrens' (unattainable) dreams with Worthless, Enjoy the Decline, Bachelor Pad Economics, and other Cappy literary works!

Also, remember to do all your Christmas (and life time) purchases via the Captain's online Amazon Affiliate program. If you don't know how, simply click here and start shopping, it's that easy (make sure your ad blocker is off).

Best!

Cappy

New Comic Added

December 3, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Merc Works.

I Was Going to Bet Crazy White Guy

December 3, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

But apparently it's just members of the religion of peace.

How the Average American Can Deal with Jihad in America

December 3, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Ah Felicia Follum

December 3, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

You sweet, innocent, cute girl you:

"Muh Feelz" Uber Alles: Aka "I Just Solved Philadelphia's Poverty Problem"

December 3, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

A very real paradox I face is one where I can either sell the truth or sell lies.

Selling the truth has merits unto itself. It's true, it will help advance society, and it is such a rare commodity that if you're willing to suffer the slings and arrows of the PC-Nazi's, media, death threats, doxxing, and general hate of the leftist population, you can charge a hefty premium for it because so few purveyors offer it.

However, whereas truth is in very short supply, the demand for lies outstrips any shortage of it. And thus, while I could be one of the few suppliers of truth, there is an INFINITELY larger market for lies. Only so many people demand a book on "male lifetime financial management." Or a book about the hazards of worthless degrees. But MILLIONS of women will fork over money for lies telling them how "big is beautiful." And MILLIONS of men will fork over BILLIONS to have a web cam girl put on a show "just for them." Additionally, in telling people lies you don't get death threats, "strikes" against your YouTube channel, or accusations of racism. Matter of fact you are generally loved by the sheeple masses of the world and likely elected to become president.

So tell me again why they hell would you do something as stupid as market the truth?

Alas, I am increasingly tempted to become like Oprah. Why work hard, doing economic research, mathematics, statistical analysis, and deep, thorough testing of logic to highlight and warn people about the real world threats that exist and could destroy their lives to simply "make ends meet?" When I could:

Tell women they're great no matter what Become a Harlequin romance author
Lie to youth telling them to follow their heart and the money will follow
Or advocate some leftist-ordained political cause and make BILLIONS in the process?

Of course there is a moral answer and then the Machiavellian answer. But regardless of which one I choose (perhaps both down the road), while debating this paradox I happened upon what is arguably one of the most important epiphanies in my life. One that if understood by more would help not only advance the political debate we are having in this nation, but perhaps even solve it, raising millions out of poverty. And that is "feelings" is the most powerful force in the world.

AKA "Muh feelz uber alles."

I happened upon this discovery while driving down Broad Street in the worst town I've ever driven through, Philadelphia. And I'm not joking. Philadelphia is hands down the worst town I ever drove through. The reasons are multiple.

First, the town was built in the 1600-1700's meaning its streets were designed for horses, not trucks from Wisconsin. This would be moot if they had leveled the old houses and replaced them with new ones, but alas, the "historic district" on the south east side of Philly is VERY nice, but nearly impossible to drive through. Chicago, though more populous, is a JOY to drive through by comparison as the great Chicago fire leveled the old town, so it could be rebuilt during the dawn of the automobile.

Second, you just have too many damn people in too small of a space (but nobody there ever leaves Philly because they don't have cars and don't know about the "outside world")

But what really connected the dots and make me come to my epiphany was Broad Street.

Due to traffic I had head north and then come back down south to DT Philly via Broad Street. Unbeknownst to me however, this was the "ghetto." And while at first it just seemed like any ole regular run down part of a major metro down, as I approached Temple University it got worse and worse

and even worse.

So bad was Broad Street that it made the South Side of Chicago and parts of Detroit look clean, and definitely preferable. However, it wasn't the people or donks blaring rap music that made it so bad. It was the state of disrepair the neighbodhood was in.

There were burned out buildings that had not been demolished or taken down. There was garbage blowing in the street because people were littering constantly. Worse, there were garbage bags just laying out in the open, both on the side walks and the streets. And finally there was the occasional guy just sleeping in an abandoned lot or out in the open at 11AM.

In other words it wasn't the crime, or the graffiti, or the drugs that made it so bad. It was the painfully blatant fact that the people of north Philly plain don't give enough of a f@ck to even clean up their own neighborhood. They were walking, living, and sleeping in filth. Shoot, even some businesses were still open in buildings that were partially burnt down. It was no different than a 2nd or 3rd world hovel where you could just tell the people were so lazy, so dispirited they could not even do the most basic of things and simply clean up after themselves.

Now, no doubt anybody with an ounce of intellectual honesty and two brain cells can point to the primary cause of this. Only the socialist policies of a city and neighborhood ran by democrats for the past 60 years can wreak this much havoc and devastation IN SPITE of receiving what is no-doubt billions in aid and taxpayer monies. But what got me and made me realize this very important aforementioned epiphany is just what utterly deplorable and low standards of living these people tolerated. And not just tolerated, but have been tolerating for decades. Why would anybody, in the United States, when you can move anywhere you want, do whatever you want, endure this for a second, let alone decades?

It became apparent to me there was a VERY powerful force KEEPING them there. And that force was "their feelz."

The truth is residents of north Philly CHOOSE this outcome. At any point in time they can move OR they can improve themselves.

How can they improve themselves?

Well, they can stop having kids out of wedlock. They can stop having kids they can't afford. They can stop committing crime. They can get good grades in K-12 and then go to college for STEM or the trades (Temple U is right there). They can set down the booze and drugs and instead open up businesses.

Oh, and they can pick their shit up off the streets.

In short, it is not "whitey" holding them down or "patriarchy" or "evil republicans" making them leave garbage bags in the street.

It's their own damn fault.

But herein lays the problem.

I just literally solved north Philadelphia's poverty problem. At any point in time the community can pursue a path of excellence, achievement, hard work, and entrepreneurship. They could, if they wanted to, make Beverly Hills look like a ghetto. And heck, if they did that, I would have just obsoleted the entire "social work" and "sociology" industries and fields. But the problem is I committed the cardinal sin. I told them the truth. And the truth "hurtz their feelz." And remember…

"Muh feelz uber alles."

So strong is the power of feelings that millions would rather live in a shithole like north Philly than endure the minute or two of pain a truthful constructive criticism would provide. Worse, even though in the long (heck, medium) run said painful truths would GREATLY improve their lives (if acted upon), they still will rebuke it because "muh feelz." Alas, feelings (and consequently ego and pride) are such powerful forces, people would rather live in poverty, wasting their one and finite precious lives than hear the truth that would help them and set them free. It makes you wonder if gravity is indeed the most powerful force in the universe.

But as bad as this is it gets worse. For the second part of my epiphany was one of true Machiavellian darkness.

As it stands right now, we assume the likes of the left, Hillary Clinton, Barack Obama, the democrats, labor parties, Oprah, feminists, Jesse Jackson, Al Sharpton, professors, academians, and the entire stew of socialists advocate what they do either for charitable purposes, altruistic purposes, racial purposes, political purposes, or even purposes of hate and revenge.

But what if they came to this exact same epiphany I did ages ago? What if the ruling elite knew "muh feelz" was the most powerful force in the world? And worse, what if they amorally capitalized on it, KNOWINGLY lying to people simply so they could advance themselves? You, me, and everybody else we know were steeped in a life philosophy of hard work, freedom, independence, and morality this idea may seem novel (as well as abhorrent). But what if great grand father Clinton or the heads of the Ivy League knew people's feelings were the most powerful force on the planet, and simply pass on this hush-hushed wisdom that "to advance in society, lie to people, sell them down the river and blame other people. Feelings and ego are so powerful, as long as you provide a scapegoat, the masses will support you?"

It would certainly explain a lot of what we see.

Of course my own personal opinion is that it varies from politician to celebrity to trust fund baby.

I truly believe Obama's motives are not based in profiting off of people's "feelz" but revenge and a genuine hatred of America and racism.

I truly believe Bernie Sanders is a true believer and is completely unconscious of how his policies directly result in north Philly being a shit hole.

But when it comes to the likes of Hillary, Oprah, Sharpton, feminists, the women's fashion industry, and the legions of spineless deans and professors in Academia there is no doubt in my mind these disgusting and vile people have no problems ruining the lives of millions all so they can profit off of it.

All I ask is for the citizens of north Philly and those who are perpetually "offended" by criticism is to stop look at your neighborhood

ask if you deserve better and entertain the theory that it is not the democrats' policies that are helping you but are precisely what is keeping you down.

---

http://aaron-clarey.podomatic.com/
http://www.assholeconsulting.com
https://www.youtube.com/user/AaronClarey
https://twitter.com/aaron_clarey
My Books
Amazon Affiliate

Rant of the Day

December 4, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Millennials are cry babies and the rest of the world is sick of it.

Episode #122 of The Clarey Podcast!

December 4, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

"He's got a face for podcasting"
Beautiful baby boomer women
What fedoras are and are NOT
The window of marriageable girls 16-19
Never marry women who hate lingerie
There's a reason the "one" got away
Dating a feminists's daughter
Do ghetto blacks have, let alone think of 401k's or IRA's?

and MORE!

in THIS EPISODE of The Clarey Podcast!

This Weekend

December 5, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Remember to do your Christmas shopping through Cappy's ole Amazon affiliate program.

The Father Could Not Be Reached for Comment

December 6, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

We don't need no stiiiinnnnnking fathers!!!

Why Debts and Deficits DO Matter

December 6, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Western Civilization is in the Hands of Women…Heaven Help Us

December 7, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Confusion

If you are a sane, normal person, void of OTC drugs and other mind altering substances, an increasingly frequent phenomenon you may have noticed is one where (typically) leftist women are the victims of their own rabid endorsement of multiculturalism.

The rapes in Sweden can be disproportionately blamed on women voting left.
The rape rings in the UK, same thing.
Refugee rape in Germany, again, women's bleeding hearts resulting in leftist policies that brought them there.
And particularly confusing is when activist women (no doubt of the leftist stripe) are raped or sexually assaulted but refuse to report it because they love their political ideology/religion more than they hate being raped.

It is confusing because to those of us with just average intelligence (not to mention, self-respect) we can't understand why women vote to ruin their lives, home countries, and economies, not to mention are so wedded to their leftist politics they would rather be raped and enslaved than betray their commitment to multiculturalism.

Now there are many possible explanations for this self-hating, self-destructive behavior. Perhaps these women deep down inside hate Western Civilization so much they'd rather be raped, and maybe even view that as fighting "evil white male, Eurocentric patriarchy." Perhaps these people are cowards, see the writing on the wall, know Western Civilization won't make it, and kowtow like cuckolds to what they perceive to be their future overlords. Maybe it's crusaderism combined with the allure of bad boys, prompting young girls to join ISIS even if it means their inevitable death. Or perhaps, deep down inside it's nothing more than good ole fashioned "rape fantasies" influencing the way they vote.

The truth is, it doesn't matter. Because no matter which way you slice it, it simply boils down to…

Betrayal.

Betrayal

Regardless of the reason women vote to destroy themselves and Western Civilization, it doesn't change the fact that they just simply do. The rest of us must accept and adapt to this fact. And call it "democracy," call it "women's suffrage," call it "empowerment," it's nothing more than a euphemism for "betrayal." And the reason it is betrayal is because women are (disproportionately) voting for two key things that go against Western Civilization:

1. Socialism
2. Multiculturalism

When it comes to socialism I've covered this before, but women, in general vote for more state control. They vote for socialism. And while many of them do so out of the naivety of "it's to help the poor/children/old/etc.," it is is a slap in the face to the immeasurable and ultimate price millions of people paid to bring Western Civilization about. Quite simply, the history of the world has been a horrible and costly struggle to free people from the tyranny of government. Going back to the warlord tribal chieftains, to the theocracies falsely claiming to represent "god," to the fiefdoms where the "king" was supported by a slave class of serfs, to wars waged against slavery and nazism, hundreds of millions of lives were wasted, destroyed, committed, and dedicated to bringing about a limited republic permitting the people to govern themselves. And women (along with some cowardly little men), in a short 60 years of spoiled-brat-laden feminism have been able to undo what took about 4,000 years to create. It is arguably the single largest setback to human advancement since the bubonic plague.

When it comes to multiculturalism, here women's naivety betrays us all again. With child-like thinking "I feel the democrats/left/labor is for the little guy" they consciously vote in socialism, while unconsciously inviting the Dracula of "Multiculturalism" into our homes. And this is not necessarily bad if you consider cultures conducive and generally on board with the base principles of Western Civilization. Asians, East Indians Europeans, etc. These are peoples and cultures generally for freedom, innovation. Even self-respecting, independent minded individuals from other non-western-compliant cultures reject their original cultures, demand better, and become doctors, dentists, physicists, entrepreneurs, etc. (for example no doubt many of you know of an Iranian who escaped Ayatollah Khomeini to lead a successful life here). But to wholesale out the best thing on this planet in the pursuit of marxism and multiculturalism by importing those who not only refuse to participate in Western Civilization but go on welfare commit terrorist attacks and advocate Sharia law over the constitution is tantamount to treason.

But these two specific acts that would make Judas jealous are further steeped in a general stew of betrayal that plagues Western Civilizatoin. And that is one where women have replaced fathers and husbands with government programs and checks. And in doing so (admittedly, likely unconsciously) killed the engine of economic growth and innovation that made Western Civilization great. They took away men's reason for living. They took away their purpose and agency in life. They gave them nothing more to live for than merely to be the hosts to parasites they themselves have become, not to mention the new ones they constantly invite in. And thus they have immobilized men.

When you take the fact women are voting to undo all that men have worked for

and are voting to bring in other cultures that want to kill, parasite off of, or just plain destroy Western Civilizatoin

and won't report getting raped by the enemy because "diversity"

but

WILL make false rape accusations against Western men because "patriarchy" precisely how many knives do you plan to impale into the backs of Western men before they give up?

Of course this is already happening. Men are postponing marriage. Men are also majoring in increasingly worthless fields. Consequently they are also unable to earn the money necessary to start a family. Which is alright, seeing most women don't want to start a family until they're 43, if that. The result, however, is (hilariously) what young women complain the most about today. That there aren't any "real men" around any more as they're all too busy looking at porn and playing video games while living at home with their parents (perhaps that's the underlying Freudian reason women don't protest too much about all these "Syrian" "refugees" being young, fighting age men, as well as seem reluctant to report it when they're getting raped by them.) Regardless, how can you blame them? The men of society (as well as some women) are so deterred by having no country, culture, family or agency worth living for, it has resulted in an increasing catatonic state that explains why economic growth has been tanking since we started replacing them with the government.

Just One Problem

While no doubt many real men, not to mention many real women are infuriated by this betrayal, what's worse is the utter helplessness they feel. Most likely you too have felt this helplessness as your brain evaluates all your options, thinking, hoping there's something, anything you can do to help save this country and turn it around.

Perhaps you could write a blog?
Maybe you'd start a political campaign?
Maybe you yell into the internet via a YouTube channel?
Write your congressman?
What about forming a militia?

But if there's a bit of practicum to this post it's that you should not concern yourself with these things. There is nothing you can do.

Understand that since we have devolved into a democracy it is the majority rules. And while there has always been a percentage of men who were idiots, voting to undo what their forefathers desperately fought for, women (be it nature, biology, feminism, hate, ignorance or what have you) consistently vote for socialism and tyranny. This makes the American (and Western Civilization) voting blocs fatedly leftist, guaranteeing a slow, but inevitably slouch towards socialism and the fringe benefits of multiculturalism, thought police, CSR, and political correctness that comes with it. You may be tempted to think about resorting to violence, perhaps even starting a second American revolution, but what would the point be? Western voters ARE getting EXACTLY what they voted for, and you would actually be the tyrant trying to force a minority view on the majority. Alas, your hands are tied in nearly every capacity as the people simply want none of it.

The key is to let go and simply enjoy the life you have. You cannot control that the participants of Western Civilization want to commit suicide. You cannot convince the brainwashed Millennials about the risks of government debt. You cannot convince women that happiness is not in their careers or a government check, but in family and loved ones. You cannot convince porn addicted, video game-playing, red jean wearing hipster "men" about the merits of being manly. And you certainly can't convince leftist women whose hatred for Western Civilization is so great, they'd prefer to be raped by the scum they let in.

It is the end of Western Civilization and these people will CERTAINLY get theirs in the end. But for those of you who are sane, have a bit of morality left about you, and want to make the most of your time on this planet before you pass away, may I strongly recommend you enjoy the decline instead of fretting over it?

Visit Aaron at his other sites:
Asshole Consulting
The Clarey Podcast

Dear English Teachers, Please Don't Give Career Advice

December 7, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Just had to share this Asshole Consulting request.

The 11th grade English teacher of a client told him his pursuit of becoming a dental hygienist was pointless because it wasn't a 4 year degree. I looked up median salaries for English teachers vs. dental hygienists and the dental hygienists make $20,000 a year more than English teachers.

New iTunes Link for The Clarey Podcast

December 8, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Good news ~~commie-Apple-Hates-America iPhone heroin addicts~~ Apple users, The Clarey Podcast has been successfully moved on iTunes. You can subscribe to the NEW feed here.

The Leftists Eat Another One of Their Own

December 8, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

How's that "Early Childhood Education Degree" working for you now Ms. Guaranteed to Vote Democrat All the Time?

Why the Term "Racist" No Longer Means Anything

December 8, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Many years ago because of my political affiliation it was a fear of mine that although untrue, the mere accusation of "racism" would have far and wide reaching consequences for my career and future. Combine that with the internet and the fact any future employers could look me up, it made me doubly careful to demonstrate I was not a racist and did indeed hold all people to the same standard.

Of course, deep down inside we all knew being called a "racist" or a "sexist" was nothing more than a cowardly tactic by leftists with precisely that intent. To taint and paint anybody who advocated free markets, capitalism, freedom and treating people as genuine equals as a racist because it would divert people's attention from the left's ultimate lack of solutions. Ergo, instead of debating you on the merits of hard work, merit, equal opportunity, but not equal outcome, it is simply easier for the cowards to yell "racist" and hope the fear of doxxing or your employers finding out would shut you up.

No longer...well at least not for much more.

For just as sure as the laws of physics, the laws of economics will (if they haven't already) render the accusation of "racism" moot, pointless, obsolete, even the complete opposite - make it a badge of honor.

It's quite simple. To make the accusation of racism "damning" and effective it has to be true. And since the vast majority of conservatives, libertarians and other right-leaning people are not in fact racist, you would think you would reserve this four-letter word for only the rare times it applies. But instead of using it as a descriptive word, the left has relied on it all too often as a political strategy to compensate for their lack of substance, progress, and solutions. So now, if you are against affirmative action (which is by definition racist) you're racist.

Want to get rid of quotas?

Racist.

Hold blacks to the same standards as white?

Racist.

Want to keep your own money?

Racist.

Don't believe minorities are held down and are instead pampered?

Racist.

Want lower taxes?

Racist.

You don't even have to believe in or take a stance on something racial. You merely have to be white and then you are immediately, but unconsciously guilty of the academian-inspired poppy cock of

"privilege" or "institutional racism."

But soon, with all these baseless accusations of racism two things happen.

One, the market is flooded with so many accusations of racism, by the laws of economics each individual accusation means increasingly less. In the 1980's if you were called a racist it meant something. But today, especially with the brainwashed, college-indoctrinated millennials blaming everything from flatulence to paper cuts on "racism" it means nothing. It has become so common to be accused of an "ism" it is now part of the American psyche and it has lost all of its sting.

Two, it exposes the accusers of their true nature. People flinging around accusations of "isms" and "ists" are not "noble, moral people trying to wipe out the scourge of bigotry, allowing for the American ideal of merit, individualism, and judging people by their accomplishments." They are, quite frankly, despicably evil and disgusting people.

The dipshittery that went on at the University of Missouri (not to mention all of American universities) is nothing more than power hungry millennial psychopaths who cowardly hide their despotic desires (not to mention their true racism) behind the color of their skin.

Black Lives Matters is nothing more but the same, with the added agenda of thinking themselves superior as they demand to be above the law.

Advocates for affirmative action, reparations and the welfare state? Nothing more than thinly veiled thieves, once again cowardly hiding behind their gender, color of skin, or ethnicity to demand other people sacrifice their lives and money for them.

And politicians/media types who dare you not to critique the "refugees" or Islam for San Bernadino, lest you be called a racist, and instead demand you make yourself less safe by forfeiting your guns? True bigots against Western Civilization who hate you and want you dead (and yes, that means our Mr. Unicorn President).

In short, the demands of these race-whores and pimps have become so arrogant and blatant even the most brainwashed leftist or cowardly-compliant-please-don't-accuse-me-of-racism cuckservative can see through them.

We're supposed to enslave ourselves financially to minorities?
We're supposed to pay for everything for them?
We're supposed to be born with the "original and unforgivable sin" of privilege and institutional racism?
We're supposed to be accepting of affirmative action because it's "good racism" because it's against us?
We're supposed to resign dean positions in schools because "whitey."
We're supposed to tolerate mandatory classes of indoctrination in our schools?
And
We're supposed to give up our lives and country as we let people into our country that hate us and want to kill us, lest we be called racist?

I know there's a lot of pussies in this country, and you leftists are used to running roughshod over them. But frankly, fuck off. I, along with increasingly more people aren't going to tolerate this attempt to enslave us, and in some cases, outright kill us. And no matter what new and innovative ways academia concocts as to how I'm "privileged," and no matter how compliant the media is in brainwashing the sheeple to believe it, and no matter what the politicians say or demand of me, in the end it's all lies. It's not true. And the real evil is all you cowards who can't come up to me like a decent, respectable robber and say to my face,

"Give me your money or else."

Still, while to me and millions of others the accusation of racism no longer means anything, the fear of this accusation will still carry weight at least for a little while longer even though everybody knows it's bunk because of two things:

1. Corporate employers are still too cowardly and fearful of being accused of racism. Their lips are too firmly attached to the ass of political correctness. CSR, diversity training, sensitivity training, HR departments, etc., far too much effort, energy and resources have been invested by corporate America in the hopes of staving off accusations of discrimination. Additionally, "diversity" has become the "strategy de'jour" of corporations and MBA programs across the country as their business leaders lack any genuine innovation, intelligence, capabilities, or leadership. Ergo, if you are employed by one of these mindless ass-sucking institutions you need to play ball, admit you're a dirty, filthy racist and lecher, or lose your job, if not your career.

2. Debt.

Debt enslaves people to be good wage slaves and stooges. Want that new car? You need that car loan! Want that college experience? You need those student loans? Want a house? Well you need a mortgage for that!

And so (and I want all corporate employers and HR ladies in America to know this), even though nearly every single corporate employee out there wants nothing more than to walk into his boss' office with the HR lady in there and slash both your throats, the only thing holding them back is that they are indeed slaves to the job as they need to get out of debt. Which by default means they can't speak their mind on the internet and tell the race whores to fuck off, and worse, must endure the childishly mockery of "diversity" and "sexual harassment training" you force upon them.

But there is hope.

For you see, while self-employed people like me are immune to accusations of racism (heck, we profit off of it), there's a trend indicating soon your average wage slave will also be as well. And there's nothing you corporate employers, you power-hungry HR/CSR bints, or tyrannical government bureaucrats can do about it.

Because once people no longer have that chain of debt around their ankles, and don't need that job any more, they're going to feel a lot more free to truly speak their mind. And that's the magic moment when the people admit the emperor has no clothes and your little "race-whore-racket" is over. And then your worst nightmare comes true - you're actually treated as an equal and forced to work a real job like the rest of us.

Enjoy the decline.

---

http://aaron-clarey.podomatic.com/
http://www.assholeconsulting.com
https://www.youtube.com/user/AaronClarey
https://twitter.com/aaron_clarey
http://www.amazon.com/Aaron-Clarey/e/B00J1ZC350/
Amazon Affiliate

For You Late Night Viewing Pleasure

December 9, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Episode #123 of The Clarey Podcast - "Can't Sleep Cappy" Edition

December 10, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Can't sleep Cappy is sick
Standards for "hero"
Batman must have safety testedt he hell out of his equipment
Please, just give up Apple products
Basic Guaranteed income won't work in the US Cappy debates a feminist (sort of)
Michelle Obama is hot

In THIS EPISODE of The Clarey Podcast

More SJW Racial Problems for Star Wars

December 11, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

So short story, this Chinese poster for Star Wars has come out and look who is NOT as prominently displayed on the poster?

I'm surprised with his adamance that Star Wars be a multicultural unicorn fart JJ Abrahms is letting this fly...oh wait...that's right, money trumps race in leftist land.

The Best Offshore Banks

December 13, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

New sponsor and one I intend on reading once the fiscal year is over:

Can't Sleep Cappy Podcast Extra

December 13, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Computer genius Cappy
Women hate short men
Getting stuck in politics and ideology
MGTOW and Feminism, one and the same
Why Puerto Rico sucks
Working the overnight

And more in this "CAN'T SLEEP CAPPY" PODCAST EXTRA

And also an interview I had with Crush the Street about Islam, terrorism, feminism, and other politically correct topics.

A Capitalist in Havana

December 14, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Kerry Lutz visits Havana just to see it for himself.

The Real Aim of Islam

December 14, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

"Islam is not like any other religion. Islam is a supremacist racist political and social ideology wrapped in a thin peel of religious rituals. It seeks domination and supremacy over all other systems and religions."

Never mind, she only lives there.

Cos Strikes Back

December 14, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Hmmmm....a multimillionaire man with very limited life expectancy left, with nothing left to lose, and you painted him into a corner. Hmmmm....I wonder what he's going to do.

There's Nothing Wrong With Declining Populations

December 15, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

One of the biggest lies or canards of the left is that we need to import immigrants because if we don't our population will be in decline. And since the word "decline" has a negative connotation with it, the sheeple sop it up thinking it is a fate that must be avoided at all costs.

The problem is, as with many of the left's assumptions, is that there is nothing inherently wrong with a declining population. Sure, in the tribal days you would like your tribe to be bigger and therefore stronger than the other tribes, but since society no longer operates on the premise that "big" is always "better" the growth rate (positive or negative) of a population is moot.

Now of course I will be forced to waste the intelligent and intellectually honest people's time and provide the caveat to address the incredibly predictable claim that RAPID declines in population due to war, famine, plague, ~~or communism~~ are indeed bad. However, what I am talking about here (as this is where the focus of the political debate is) is the primarily western world's inability to get their birth rate at or above the replacement rate, which therefore guarantees an ever-growing population.

First a slowly declining population is nothing to worry about. It doesn't mean you'll go extinct as people will always be willing to fornicate. And it doesn't mean the economy will collapse as there are less people the economy needs to support. Ergo, the focus should not be nominal economic growth, but rather the key and infinitely more important variable, GDP per capita. What are the standards of living the individual person is enjoying. Ergo, lets say Japan's economy shrinks an enormous 25% in the next 50 years. That's great if its population shrinks 50% because those people who remain just saw an enormous increase in their standards of living.

Second, logic would dictate that if a declining population is "bad" then a booming population is "good."

Oh really?

Like how the 2.8 billion people in China and India are all living at first world standards of living?
Like how Hispanics and Blacks have the highest birthing rates and (shock of shocks) also suffer the lowest standards of living in the US?
And let's not forget that sociologist's, SJW's, and social worker's utopian ~~eugenics/socialist experiment~~ dream come true - Africa. Yep, because we all know with Africa's booming population they're enjoying nothing but increased standards of living on par with Switzerland.

Sorry, it's just not true, increasing populations WITHOUT commensurate or better economic growth just means increased poverty, suffering, and strife.

The truth is the left has ulterior motives for increasing the population perpetually. And it has nothing to with the unfounded concerns that "population decline is bad mmmkay?"

First, (though not leftist) companies and corporations want a perpetually increasing population so people buy more stuff. Nothing wrong with that on account purchasing and enjoying material things in life is part of goal of economics. But let's be clear, corporations and companies don't care if it's sustainable in the long run or if it's in the best financial interests of the population. This is why we have slowing economic growth, but booming debts. People are willing to borrow to pay for what they can't afford today. This not only boosts consumer spending (which profits companies), but it slows long term economic growth because said monies are NOT going into investments. Again, though not specifically leftists, this goal has nothing to do with preventing the "horrors" of a declining population, but is merely corporations trying to beat the previous quarters EPS.

Second, very much like how the private sector needs perpetual (though unsustainable) growth to increase their profits, the entire socialist economic/government system the left has installed in the US (and west) depends on future hosts for today's parasites. What I love the most is how the left tells people right to their face "Well we need future children to afford the social programs like social security and medicare!"

Really?

Shouldn't something in your brain be going off saying "Well where the hell did the old people's SS contributions go? Why is it behooved upon the youth to pay for the elderly?"

Of course, Westerners have become idiotic sheeple and just blindly agree saying, "Well yeah! We need more population growth in the future to afford all this sh!t we want to buy ourselves today!" But for those of us with half a brain we realize this is an admission and proof that the socialist's government/economic system is unsustainable and needs to parasite off of the future to make it SEEM like it's working today. Ergo, to keep up the facade they import as many new immigrants as possible with the the hope they'll be the willing slaves that will pay the taxes to support them in their old age (when in reality they don't produce anything as much as they parasite on welfare and other social programs making it laughable they will become the economic juggernaut that will make good on all those government IOU's and social welfare promises).

Third, perpetually increasing asset prices.

Since our entire retirement system is based on capital gains in the stock market, we need to, in theory, increase not only the demand for companies' goods and services (therefore driving up prices), but we need more purchasers of said assets to drive these prices up. This not only plays out in the stock market, but especially so in real estate in that more people directly drive up the rents and value of land.

But imagine if the population was declining. What would happen to asset prices?

Well stocks would tank, as would commodity prices, not to mention real estate. And since nearly every pension, trust fund, and American's 401k is dependent upon those prices why we just can't afford to have those drop now can we? So let's import a bunch of people who hate our guts and want to kills us, or at least live off of us, so our precious little government pensions and IRA accounts stay fully funded.

And finally, the blatant and painfully obvious attempt to stack the voting bloc deck with parasitic immigrants who will vote left because "welfare." Do not be fooled thinking the left is being charitable of kind. They couldn't care less about the immigrants just as they couldn't care less about the black community. They view and use these people as pawns in their political game to remain in political power, thereby avoiding any real work, suffering, or strife in life.

So the next time you have some idiot sociologist, politician, or leftist talk about the "horrors" of a declining population, please show them this little post, tell them they are a liar, and then tell them to have a cup of STFU.

---

http://aaron-clarey.podomatic.com/
http://www.assholeconsulting.com
https://www.youtube.com/user/AaronClarey
https://twitter.com/aaron_clarey
http://www.amazon.com/Aaron-Clarey/e/B00J1ZC350/
Amazon Affiliate

For Your Late Night Listening Pleasure

December 16, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

"After the Drop" from MOH

Project Cuckservative

December 17, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Hello All,

Working on a new project. But I need a list of the top cuckservatives in the US.

Right now my list includes:

Chief Justice Roberts
John Boehner
Jim Jeffords
Arlen Specter

Any others would help. Please list below in the comments.

Thank you,

Cappy

Rich White Liberal Trust Funders Have to Live Somewhere

December 17, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

I love how they say, "gentrification can sometimes displace long time residents of a neighborhood."

The neighborhood is improving.
Housing prices are going up.
Crime is going down.
Said residents were no doubt PAID for their properties.

But no, the leftist virus infects journalism majors and they HAVE TO just find something bad about inner cities improving.

Awww, That's Too Bad

December 18, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Le Cordon Bleu, the fakest of the fake schools is closing it's doors in Minnesota.

Episode #125 of The Clarey Podcast!

December 18, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Do dogs prove god exists?
Why SJW's waste their lives
Le Cordon Bleu closes down
If you're a single mom going to culinary school, nothing good happens.

AND MORE!

In THIS EPISODE of The Clarey Podcast!

"F is for Family" Review

December 19, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

A "tad" more drama, familial abuse, anger, hatred, and "cartoon porn" than I really was expecting.

Sick and in Bed

December 21, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Sorry all, but came down with a nasty cold that I have not been able to kick. Posts are going to be a little slow which is just as well given it is Christmas season.

The Father Could Not Be Reached for Comment

December 21, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

The story is developing, but I'm going to go out on a limb here and say, "the father was not available for comment."

What Would Happen to the Federal Deficit If Interest Rates Increased?

December 21, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

A big, and legitimate, concern is that the monstrous US debt is at such a low interest rate, what would happen to the interest payments of the federal government were to bump up just a little bit? What if they were at historical norms? What if they were to reflect the creditworthiness of the actual government?

Never fear! Cappy's here!

So the ole Captain went online because he couldn't sleep and dusted off his ole Excel skills Downloaded some data series and went to work. And it's basically what you'd expect.

I ran two different scenarios. One where the average interest rate on federal debt was 4%. I chose this because that's what it's been historically and would provide us a good "control" variable. I also chose 8% because if I was a lender that is the MINIMUM I would demand for a bankrupt, insolvent POS like the US federal government. And here are the results.

Under 4%

As you would expect artificially low rates that the federal reserve charges the federal government has understated what would have normally been our national deficit. During the crisis and the "recovery" we could have expected to shell out an additional $200 billion a year on average during Obama's entire presidency. This would have naturally added to the debt, further increasing deficits, but I was too lazy to calculate that.

Of course, this isn't the New York Times, this is Captain Capitalism. An actual reputable source for journalism. So like all good journalists we know that we should convert this to deficits as a % of GDP.

This gives us a bit better perspective showing we'd still be running deficits around 4% GDP had the creditors of the US federal government had the slightest bit of self-respect and demanded more than .000035% interest on their bonds. Let us be clear. It is only the shenanigans of the central bank and the fact that foreigners are even "more sucky" than the US that the federal government can get away with paying such a paltry level of interest.

Finally, what if the federal government was in the real world and did not hold the world's reserve currency? Well, I would at minimum charge an interest rate of 8%. Truth is, I would never lend to an entity in as bad of financial shape as the US government. But let's just humor ourselves and assume 8%. Well, shucks howdy!

What I like about this chart is it really shows you how the interest rate wouldn't have mattered until 2000, especially, since the financial crisis. If there was any sanity in the bond market, the federal government would be running deficits of nearly $2 trillion each year since 2009. That would be an absolutely unsupportable 11% GDP deficit for 7 years running. Obviously, this added debt would be added to the total debt and creditors would have stop lending to us long ago. But let this be a lesson to the LUCK, not SKILL that has spared the US a fate like Greece, Spain, or Japan. It is ONLY because we have the world's reserve currency that we avoided this mess and it has nothing to do with Obama, the federal reserve, Paul Krugman or any other idiot claiming responsibility for this "recovery."

Stay Frosty Boys

December 21, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Stay the freak frosty, but also DON'T GET SO THIRSTY YOU'RE AN IDIOT LIKE THIS MAN!!!

Episode #126 of The Clarey Podcast

December 23, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

1970's claymation Christmas specials
Single moms ACTUALLY DO kill more than terrorists
Gen X fumbled the divorce ball
Naps are a conspiracy concocted by adults
"Overtired" is like "white privilege"

and MORE

in THIS EPISODE of The Clarey Podcast!

Curse of the High IQ and Campus Unfree Speech

December 24, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Another bit of radio for your Christmas traveling. Was on Kerry Lutz's show and we talked about the new book coming out (Curse of the High IQ) and what will happen when today's college kids enter politics and the judicial system!

Review of The Big Short

December 28, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Did a quick review of The Big Short. Glorious Karl also did a review.

"Financial Dominatrix"

December 28, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Two points:

1. Notice where a liberal arts degree will land your precious little daughters.
2. She's one of the successful liberal arts graduates!!!

Hooters Girls Worth More Than Feminists

December 28, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

A friend had posted this picture on the Facebook and while I originally had a good guffaw over it, the more I thought about it, the more I realized there is A LOT more going on that what first meets the eye.

1. The Hooter's girl is employed. That means she's working and contributing to society. You may scoff at her profession or that she just got her job because of looks, but ask yourself this question. What in the Patron Saint's Name of Frick is the feminist doing for work? Protesting??? Holding signs??? Mock the Hooters girl all you want she is getting people to WILLINGLY hire her, not force taxpayers at the end of a gun to fork over grant money to create a never-needed make-work "job" for the vast majority of feminists.

2. Their looks. I've said it before and I'll say it again because it is VERY telling and insightful about leftists, but leftists tend to be uglier than righter leaning folk because staying in physical shape takes EFFORT. And that is the whole principle leftists are against. They are AGAINST hard work and effort. Ergo, the CONSTANT rationalization of how they are entitled to other people's money. Of course, unlike money looks cannot be transferred or redistributed, and thus the feminist is trying to "shame" people for liking girls prettier than she is.

3. The free market never lies. Sadly, ladies, whether you like it or not, the most valuable thing you have is your looks and youth. This is because HALF the WORLD'S POPULATION (we call them "men") demand sex with pretty girls. Doesn't mean they're going to get it, but it is the SINGLE MOST UNIVERSALLY DEMANDED COMMODITY IN THE WORLD. More than oil. More than gold. Always has been. Always will be.

The question is are you smart enough to capitalize on it?

This is why I have absolutely no qualms with prostitution, strippers, or simply women who keep themselves in shape demanding high-earning husbands. It is also why I have quite a bit of respect for the likes of Chloe Luv, Mercedes Carerra, Jenna Jameson, and other women who work in the sex/porn industries. It's not that they're hotties working in porn, but are serious entrepreneurs themselves knowingly capitalizing on this market.

The real issue is who is selfless and who is selfish in the picture above? For that is the key lesson to learn about how to be financially successful. You don't do what YOU want, you do what OTHER people want. You deliver what they demand, not the other way around.

Ironically (though, perhaps not), the "dumb blond bimbo" knows more about economics and financial success than the doctorate in Women's Studies holding the sign.

Again, Before You Become a Doctor

December 29, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

The money is not worth the time.

"How Do I Math?"

December 29, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

The maths are hard.
Tee hee! I'm a girl!
I just like working with children.
But aren't math numbers? Why are their letters?
Tee hee! I like the Kardashians!

Episode #127 of The Clarey Podcast

December 29, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Cappy gets NO PITY from women when he claims he's sick and injured!
Real men can exchange racial jokes
Too many pussies in the Red Pill world
Cappy's favorite coffee mug
Percent of "Pansexuals" that are faking it.

in THIS EPISODE of THE CLAREY PODCAST!

An interesting last segment where I inquire what percentage of people who are claiming to be "pan sexual" are merely just millennial leftoids faking it so they can belong to something.

How Dennis Prager (Unintentionally) Hurts Young Men

December 30, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Every Woman Who Ever Voted Democrat Ever

December 31, 2015 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Why the Economy Hasn't Collapsed Yet

January 2, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Please forward and share because this really would advance and resolve some debates in economics:

How to Become a Successful Economist

January 5, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

The Father Could Not Be Reached for Comment

January 5, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

We don't need no STIIIIIINNNNNNKIIINNNNNNNGGGG fathers!!!!

Episode #127 of The Clarey Podcast

January 5, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Western women voted in their own rape...and Cappy doesn't care
Why hasn't wireless boosted GDP?
Fan mail!

AND MORE!

In THIS EPISODE of The Clarey Podcast!

Related- At any point in time ladies you can call in Speirs.

Why Most of Your Professors are Idiots

January 6, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

"The final price genuinely intelligent people will pay in college is dealing with those who aren't. Specifically, "faux-intellectuals." These are the idiots who aren't intelligent, but since they're on a college campus they desperately try to fake it. They fall into two general camps.

Your professors

and

college graduates.

Like K-12 teachers, most professors are worthless, talentless hacks who couldn't find jobs in the real world. They typically hail from enough parental money (or student debt) that they managed to get a doctorate or masters in their field. Unfortunately, most of the "faux-intelligent" professors majored in worthless subjects that required no intellectual rigor (the humanities, the liberal arts, etc.) so the only real place that will hire them is academia…to simply reteach what they learned 2-4 short years ago. This means you are guaranteed to run into them as you're forced to take their meaningless and pointless classes in "14th Century Lesbian Pygmy Sculpture" or "Diversity and Ethno-Centrism Privileged Studies."

The problem is, very much like your teachers being the "adult," you will assume your professors are smarter than you because…well…they're "professors."

Hogwash."

This is an excerpt from my upcoming book/essay "The Curse of the High IQ"

And yes, it is coming out that good.

HR and "People Skills"

January 7, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

An excerpt from the upcoming book/essay "Curse of the High IQ!"

The HR ditz also Introduces a new aspect of careers and the employment world. One that is the bane of existence for abnormally intelligent people.

"Soft" or "people skills."

In 2012 I had a job interview with a bank in Rapid City, South Dakota. I had not been this excited in nearly a decade in that Rapid City and the Black Hills area is my favorite place in the world, and I was now looking at the prospects of finally living there with gainful employment.

However, on my drive there I ran into the worst snow storm I have ever experienced in my life. Scores of cars were stuck in the drifts, at least five semi-trailers were in the ditch, and invariably it got so bad they closed the interstate down. It was only through some strategic driving, "piggy backing" off of semi-trucks to plow through the drifts, and raw determination did I manage to make it to Rapid City. Unfortunately, I had not arrived until 4AM and only managed to get three hours sleep before my interview. I walked into my interview a bit fatigued.

The interview went very well and I even got the job in the end. But after receiving the job offer my future boss called me and said,

"We need to talk about something."

Curious as to what it was I returned his called and found out he had a concern.

"Well, I noticed when you walked into the interview you weren't smiling. You see, were here at the Rapid City Bank want to give our customers an experience. And we need everybody to be smiling and happy to provide that warm welcoming environment. But when you walked into our office you were frowning and that kind of demeanor can…"

I cut him off and told him I was no longer interested in the job.

Whether it's a bank in South Dakota or a parking lot in Miami employers value "soft skills" or "people skills" more than real ones. And the reason is very simple. Normal and dumb people value feeling good over actual, genuine progress.

A perfect example is Oprah Winfrey.

Criticize her as you may, Oprah is a genius because she realized people would rather feel good than actually achieve good in their lives. And thus, she went out and told millions of women for over 20 years what they WANTED to hear, not what they NEEDED to hear.

You're not fat, you're beautiful inside!
Your husband should love you for who you are!
Follow your heart and the money will follow!
You deserve it girl!

For this she was rewarded billions of dollars in net worth.

The problem is high IQ people (unless they jettison their morals) simply can't do this which puts them at a disadvantage in the employment world.

First they cannot keep up the charade or façade of emotional interest. It just isn't in their nature and it's simply too taxing mentally. High IQ people can plainly see a problem for what it is, what logical decisions need to be made in order to solve it, and can remove any emotional or psychological preferences they might have about it. They offer direct, blunt, emotionless solutions that are guaranteed to solve the problem, but unfortunately step on people's precious little toes.

This then leads to a second problem, because not only does the majority of clients prefer good feelings over production, but so too does the majority of co-workers and bosses. Your entire employment environment is driven by everybody's insistence you place feelings and emotions over reality and truth. This is simply maddening for smart people because what needs to be done in the real world counters what your boss, co-workers, and clients are demanding of you.

A colleague of mine worked at a video game store and was lectured for up-selling a client a $60 boxed-DVD set and NOT getting her to sign up for their "membership card."

During my days in banking I was routinely lectured for being "too harsh" when analyzing and rejecting loans...until I was proven right when they all went into default and bankruptcy.

And no doubt you personally have experienced some instance of contradictory insanity in your own job where reality is telling you "X" and your boss is threatening to fire you if you don't do "Y."

It doesn't matter. Dumb and average people account for the majority of the customer base. Dumb and average people also account for the majority of workers at your firm. Thus, it is feelings and emotions that rule the day, guaranteeing you will suffer this cognitive-dissonance insanity during your entire career.

"Curse of the High IQ" is slated to come out in two weeks! Tell friends! Particularly the smart ones!

What "#WasteHisTime2016" Tells Us About American Women

January 7, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

It's just mean, cruel, and disgusting, but it DOES shed an incredible amount of light on young American women today and just what a mine-field boys get to walk through. It is VITAL if you have any young men in your family or circle of friends to show this to them.

How You Get Revenge

January 8, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

If a group of people came in and destroyed your country, destroyed your family, destroyed your life, and stole your future, your natural, mentally healthy reaction would be simple – revenge. You would hunt those people down and kill them. Unfortunately it wasn't some roving band of post-apocalyptic bandits that did this to you, it was the electorate of the United States. And unfortunately this electorate did it legally under a democracy.

Since this is a democracy, no matter how much damage the electorate causes, you have no recourse. It doesn't matter that it's unlikely you'll ever have a successful career, it doesn't matter that it's nearly impossible to start a family, it doesn't matter you have no future. By living in a democracy you agree to accept majority rule for better or worse. Ideally this rule would be "better." The electorate figures things out, puts 2 and 2 together, and inevitably comes to the logical conclusion a minimal state and maximum freedom is the ideal form of government. But as evidenced recently, the electorate is impaired, it's ignorant, it's naïve, and it's brainwashed. Consequently, the people not only get the government they deserve, the minority gets to unjustly suffer the consequences.

But what makes things particularly frustrating for the minority is one of forced-inaction. Because this is a democracy any form of revenge or retaliation would be considered tyrannical or dictatorial. The people have spoken, the majority got its way, opposing this would be hypocritically forcing the minority's view on the majority. Sadly this leaves Real Americans with no option but to sit and take it. It also makes most of us feel helpless. There's no way to strike back, there's no way to circumvent the consequences, there's no way to turn the boat around. There's nothing we can do but futilely write letters to the editor or start blogs. It is an issue of losing control over our futures and our lives, and there's nothing we can do to avenge ourselves, let alone receive an ounce of recompense or justice.

However, things are not as hopeless as they first might seem. There are legal measures you can take to exact your toll of revenge. There are things you can do that will ensure your life is better than others. And as it just so happens there are much more powerful forces at play that will deliver such a devastating blow of revenge against the people who destroyed the United States, that you could only dream of delivering such a blow. The trick is to open your eyes to see it and savor it when it happens.

Future posts until I publish the new book will be excerpts from my previous works on account I want to finish it as quickly as possible, but not leave people lurching here.

Libertarians Who Vote for Bernie Sanders

January 8, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Um, dudes, you're NOT LIBERTARIANS!!!!!

Trumbo: When the MSM Makes Movies About Themselves

January 9, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Looks like another piece like The Pelican Brief where the daily media dregs need to make movies about themselves.

Islam and Rape

January 10, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Hilarious.

Study…Er Reality Finds Women Can't "Have It All"

January 11, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Gen X women find out they can't have it all and that they were lied to by leftists and feminists.

Yaaaawn. Crocodile tears.

The Post Education Era

January 11, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

A guest post while I put the finishing touches on The Curse of the High IQ.

Why are the Psychologists Psycho?

January 11, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Couldn't help but post this.

Doing my research on the psychological drawbacks of high intelligence and the article above is just precious. Everytime they quote an psychologist or a "professor" in the field, they cannot help but also list all the problems they had in terms of suicide, bi-polar, etc.

I'm sorry, this profession is simply being undermined by its practitioners.

McDonalds, Education, and Leftist Religion

January 12, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Another from Alex.

Western Women Don't Deserve the Protection of Western Men

January 12, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Again, #WasteHisTime2016 Is a Warning All Men Should Heed

January 12, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Guest post whilst I bang away at the keyboard.

The Grandfather Could Not Be Reached for Comment

January 13, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Oh you fucking women thinking you don't need men and they can be replaced by government checks. You fucking scum.

Nature vs. the "Social Scientists" in "What Women Want"

January 13, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

An excerpt from "Curse of the High IQ!"

Finally, the most common complaint I hear from my female clients under 40 is the lack of real, masculine men. While pursuing the ideal of equal treatment of the sexes, various faux-intellectuals and hacks posing as "social scientists" have pushed beyond equal treatment under the law and now demand equal outcomes and equal…well…everything.

Anything men can do, women can do.
Applauding Bruce/Catlyn Jenner more than young girls majoring in engineering Besmirching women for daring to want to be wives and moms.
"Gender is a social construct."
Replacing "he" and "she" with "zhe" and "zhr."
As well as the complete elimination of gender entirely.

This perilously ignores the teraflops of empirical data (not to mention fact) that men and women are different and that these differences cannot be erased no matter how hard you try. It also ignores the obvious point that these differences exist for some pretty damn good reasons and likely shouldn't be trifled with.

Men have penises, women have vaginas. They are designed that way to breed children. Women have breasts, produce milk, and are more nurturing. They are designed that way to take care and nurture children. Men have testosterone, are bigger, stronger, faster and (by some measures) smarter than women. They are designed that way to provide for and protect their families. And forget the obvious physiological differences. Just look at the history of how men, women, and society have naturally organized themselves over the millennia across different cultures. I find it very cute and adorable "social scientists" of the past 50 years think they know more than what nature has figured out over the past 2 million.

Still, the academic and political classes of society thought it best to trifle with these realities, blurring the lines of gender, which has ultimately resulted in pansified, emasculated men that no woman wants. Yes, television says women want sensitive "90's men." Yes, academia says men need to get in touch with their "emotions and inner-selves." And yes, even women say they want that bearded hipster with his red skinny jeans who writes poetry, works at the coffee shop, lives at home, and can't afford a car.

But it's almost as cute as "social scientists" thinking they know more than nature.

No matter what society, politicians, media, even women themselves say, their genes want a talk, rugged, strong, brilliant, charming, clever, brute of a man who can rock her world in bed and crush the skulls of any interloper who threatens her children.

Your Everday, Average, Common Boss

January 14, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Another excerpt from "Curse of the High IQ"

But the reason the entire country is forced to endure a daily commute on traffic-jammed roads is because instead of real leaders we have millions of compliant, obedient, and incredibly average bosses who are not intelligent enough to get past the third grade quandary of

"Well, if I can't see you then how do I know you're working?"

Alas, the entire country is held hostage by a bunch of Peter-Principled, MBA-laden idiot commoners because they don't understand "telecommuting."

Regardless, the example above highlights the difference between a REAL leader and your everyday, common boss. A real leader, a real boss is trying to make genuine advancements and achievements to not only benefit the company, but himself, and society. He or she looks beyond mere compliance and has a genuine intellectual interest in how to not only make things better, but dramatically better. It is these types of bosses that high IQ people can work for in that your brain will be intellectually stimulated and challenged.

Your average boss, however, comes nowhere near this. He is usually so incompetent, so average, and so obedient their "leadership" strategies entail the same tiresome tactics that have never worked in the past 50 years:

Meetings
Motivational posters
Motivational speakers
More meetings
Corporate retreats
Meaningless plastic trinkets as rewards (Wells Fargo is a perfect example of this)
Meetings about meetings
Continuing Professional Education
And whatever other pablum endorsed by the latest "business management" books.

In short, you may not personally hate your boss. He or she could be a great person. But even if they are personable, you will at minimum be limited to their ability to lead and achieve. And the truth is for every genuine leader that is out there, there's a thousand everyday, average, incompetent bosses who don't know they're the butt-end of Dilbert's

Point-Haired Boss' jokes.

Calling All Hot Nerdy Chicks

January 15, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Attention All Female Lieutenants and Agents in the Field,

The ole Captain is coming around the final stretch to finish "Curse of the High IQ" and will move onto the marketing stage. And to be blunt because i'm an asshole and I don't like wasting time, I want to market it with hot nerds. This entails donning some glasses, and aiming for that "nerdy babe" look, and posing with the book (once it gets to production). I know we have some female lieutenants and agents in the field that may not be nerds, but you can always pull off the motif if you want.

Anyway, contact the ole Captain if you're interested, send me a mailing address, you get free book, no money blah blah blah blah, men like to see cute girls instead of charts, blah blah blah blah, help inspire the real men with blah blah blah blah show leftists we have hotter women blah blah blah blah.

Sincerely,

Cappy

The Handicap of a High IQ (Guest Writer Matt Baldoni)

January 15, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

The Great Matt Baldoni was kind enough to guest write as I head across the finish line on "The Curse of the High IQ." Mr. Baldoni is a genius, and I don't mean that in a musical sense. I mean that in a literal sense, and conveys his experiences and thoughts growing up with a high IQ, experiences that will hopefully prove useful for your own lives.

The Handicap of a High IQ by Matt Baldoni

I didn't know my IQ was high until I paid to get it tested three different ways as an adult in my 30s. I had actually underestimated what the numbers would be by a long shot. It doesn't change much in my life now that I know, but it's a nice confidence booster. I sure as hell don't advertise it that much, but it's sorta like finding out you have a huge penis. You can't really tell anybody about it during a business meeting, but it sure helps you feel like a winner, which helps you out in the rest of life. I carefully chose three different standardized tests (The Weschler Adult Intelligence Scale, The Cognitive Assessment System, and Stanford-Binet), took them separately, and waited for results. Depending on who you ask, my numbers fell between 127 and 140. With a mean 100 and standard deviation 15, that puts me in the top few percent. Now, many say that these tests mean NOTHING, and while they don't mean everything, they mean something. Especially for children. Children who measure high on the intelligence quotient scale tend to favor the arts. That turned out to be true for me. High IQ kids also tend to shy away from sports and be more socially active within their comfortable circles. They also tend to develop cognitive ability faster, which makes them good at things like math. These kids also tend to develop self discipline and responsibility at an early age. All this turned out to be true for me. However, it soon became a handicap to have high intelligence in MANY different ways. Here are a few of them, starting with the two things I did to myself the most:

Self-destruction

People with a High IQ are more likely to exhibit self-destructive behavior, including addictive behavior. TRU DAT. When I entered my teenage years as a student and budding professional musician, it wasn't long before drugs and alcohol became a daily ritual. Those daily habits lasted for many years, and were destructive. Science shows us that many drug addicts/alcoholics tend to have high IQ's, which they think allows so many of them to be “functioning addicts”. Other people kill themselves with that shit, but we can function somehow, even while our physiological insides are getting eaten away.

Lying and Manipulation

People with a High IQ are more likely to lie and manipulate. We're also more likely to be sociopathic. I'm no clinical sociopath, or else the two licensed therapists I've seen would have diagnosed me as such. But I did speak with these two professionals about the fact that I have lied a lot. Mostly to get what I wanted or needed. Getting money, getting laid, manipulating a situation to my advantage, throwing someone else under the bus with a lie, lying to get revenge, I did them all.

People with a high IQ are more likely to have vengeful tendencies too, by the way. From teenage years to the bulk of my 20s, lying to women was almost a requirement. I sure did get laid a lot, though.

So...those are the two most self-destructive behaviors I put in to practice that science also says are more likely to be exhibited by subjects with my IQ numbers. Now let's look at how it played out in some other situations:

Immediate Family

One look at my family will tell you that most of them are bumbling idiots. My dad's no doubt the smartest of his entire household, but my mother's a wingnut and a lot of the rest of em couldn't spell some of the words in this essay or do long division if you held a gun to their head. They also reproduce like rabbits, which is a characteristic of lower IQ numbers. Oh yeah, forgot to mention that one, people with High IQ's are less likely to pass on their genes. Shocker. Being smart in my family meant that you were a “know-it-all” or a “smartass” or trying to prove something to everyone else. They always had great animosity to people smarter than them. Now that I've had time to think on it, it handicapped me in a few different ways with the large group of Italian Americans who raised me. They're loving people and they cared for me a great deal, but I did feel like an outsider. To this day, on the rare occasion I visit for a holiday glut-fest dinner, we don't have a whole lot to talk about or relate to. I should also mention my brother in all this. He's a real-life exception to the rule. He was a star athlete who was actually diagnosed as ADHD as a child. Usually great athletes don't exhibit High IQ numbers, but somehow, at age 20, upon graduating from the firefighters' academy in California, he not only scored in the top 5 for written testing, but also in the top 5 for physical agility. He continues to be one of the strongest and smartest firefighters in his world, and has excelled through the ranks with greater speed than anyone he came up with. He's set to be one of the youngest Fire Department Captains in the history of the state this year. According to the science, my brother is an anomaly.

Education

Hindsight is 20/20, and I look back on my K-17 education as a total joke. The absolute worst in leftist brainwashing, from kindergarten through dropping out of grad music school. Grad school was when I finally came to full realization what a bill of goods I had been sold, and I left hastily. I'm embarrassed it took me that long, but again, good science shows us that some with High IQ numbers are more likely to believe bullshit when they're young. I guess that's me too. Being a child of California public schools and the California State University system through the late 80s, 90s, and early 2000s was a recipe for disaster. Although the economy in California was robust for most of that, the system was failing fast and getting more and more and MORE government subsidy all along the way the years I was there. You had to be a blank slate with these teachers (90% of which were women, of course). There were no exceptions allowed. Some weird tests were given to me early on, something called the “gifted program”, and a few others. But for me, getting singled out like that was a recipe to get bullied and get the shit beat out of you at the bus stop, so I turned them down. It was my choice after all. By the time I got to a high-end private university for grad school, I saw that most of my colleagues were not intelligent at all, just simply rich. They had the dough to be there, and they were buying a useless degree in jazz guitar. So I got out. I still, to this day, feel so utterly embarrassed for buying into all of it and spending so much time on music education after public school, when I could have just been working. Thankfully, I don't have any debt from it anymore. I do not recommend it to any young musician with potential, especially ones that I see are very intelligent.

Religion

Okay, more good science, kids! There is a negative correlation between involvement in organized religion and IQ numbers. Dumb people go to church, basically. Smart people don't. I couldn't throw away Catholicism fast enough as a teenager, and what a bag-o-bricks THAT was to set down. I've lived an entire adulthood free of that guilt, and it's been a major component to my success. You can read more about why atheists in particular have High IQ's. It's no accident that large groups of people just hand over their money and their time to gigantic machine-like religions and churchianities. The bell curve of intelligence makes no mistakes. People of average or below intelligence need something to explain things to them, and who better than their imaginary friend Jesus and his dad?

Once you grow into young adulthood and can be responsible and make some of your own choices, being surrounded by religion and having no choice in the matter can seriously handicap you.

Dating

Ah, this one's my favorite. As far as the IQ #'s in men vs. women, we must remember that much of this science is government funded. The numbers have to be often cooked in order to spew out the proper results so the scientists can continue to get their funding. And you just CAN NOT say that men are smarter than women, that's a big no-no, even if it's true. This is a topic of much debate for a long, long time. For centuries before the 1960s or so (when feminism was introduced), the science was pretty ubiquitous on men being ever so slightly more intelligent than women. Things changed, and now we're supposed to be the same. The testing was changed starting in 1974 to equalize the genders. But good science (in the private sector), to this day, still shows us that although gender plays no role in intelligence from ages 0-14, after that the curve bends slightly towards men. Particularly in the areas of math and science. No matter how much they try and cook the books, there is always that one difference between men and women. The general consensus is also that there is a mean difference of 3 IQ points to the advantage of males. That ain't much, but it's something.

How can this handicap a smart guy's dating life? Well, in many ways. First, hotter girls are generally dumber. Although easy to bang, you won't have much to talk about with them if you're dating them at any length or significance. Hot girls are dumber because there's no need for them to be smart. Men don't correct a hot girl when she's wrong because they usually wants to fuck her. Attractive girls can get things provided for them far easier for a far longer time. While it's easier for a smarter guy to manipulate his way into a hot girl's life (using game and general cognitive advantage), she will then likely expect provisions and resources from him, simply because biology and evolution suggest that women are attracted to men with more resources (intelligence and otherwise) for purposes of breeding. There is also a long-held direct correlation between intelligence and income. We make more money than dumb guys do, regardless of field, so we're more likely to have women around because we have more money. The handicap here is that we have a higher chance of getting manipulated out of our resources. After two decades of bachelored singledom and many, many relationships, I've found that the best bet for happiness is to find a 7-8 with lower intelligence than me.

These women are everywhere and can make a smart man very happy, even for a small amount of time. Let's also remind ourselves that we are far less likely to breed, which correlates to being far less likely to marry, which can send women of ALL intelligence levels packing very quickly. I've lost more good women because of my refusal to marry and procreate than for any other reason. Oh well!

Keeping hours

This one turned up a lot of results in my research. Higher intelligence people are more likely to operate best at night. I found this to be true at a very young age, and it's to my advantage now because I live my life in show business. We work when all the other worker bees are off, which is at night, on the weekends, and on holidays. This night-owl type stuff can also lead to depression, some science says. People with high intelligence can often experience frustration with many common interactions on a given day. Say for instance, everyone getting upset when you correct them during conversation. We don't even think about that when we do it, but it makes people very angry. Being called an “egomaniac” or a “braggart” when you're simply excited to share something you've learned. And after all this brow-beating, people still expect you to be a top performer when you're smart. This can frustrate us and make us feel shitty.

More....

A common association in many bullshit studies is that people with high IQ's are “more socially inept or awkward”. It may be true. But not if you associate with other smart people. If I'm in a fucking Wal-Mart or passing through a crowd of women watching the Kardashians, no, I'm sorry, I don't want to talk to any of you and I will act like an asshole to get you out of my face. If that makes me “socially inept”, fine. High IQ also commonly results in the individual requiring a higher amount of solitude and contemplation than the middle of the curve. People will call you socially inept if you like to be by yourself. They'll also call you depressed, lonely, and sad when in all reality you may be perfectly content. Being an “outsider” is very common for people with high intelligence, but thankfully, in this day and age, we are all connected through an insanely accessible network. It's easier today to find other intelligent people than it ever has been in any time before. It's easy to find those people like you, and spend time with them. When smart people hang with smart people, it's not an echo chamber, it's a wonderful exchange of differentiating ideas and yet another learning experience that can contribute to our intelligence. So go find each other.

But E. Coli is Organic!

January 15, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

This is another perfect example where these organic and green zealots think the local ma and pa store down the road beats Wal-Mart in terms of efficiency, emissions, and health.

I know you leftists hate large and successful companies. I know you hate lower costs and genetically modified food that has resilience to disease and plague. I know you all want to live in teepees and get back to one with nature.

But in the end economies to scale, efficiency, technological advancement and (GASP!) CAPITALISM beats, hands down, an irrational zealotry to pursue "green" or "organic."

Besides, just admit it. You don't really care that it's green or organic. That's just marketing.

Any Lieutenants Along I-10?

January 17, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Greetings all,

Your ole Captain may be driving a newly acquired Harley across from Florida to Las Vegas. Most of the route being Interstate 10. If any of you are along the way and mayhaps even have a couch for the old Captain to crash on, let the ole Captain know!

Cappy

Why High IQ People are Down and Depressed

January 17, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Another excerpt from "Curse of the High IQ!"

Maslow's Hierarchy of Needs basically states that in order to advance as a human there is an order in which you do it. Certain needs cannot be satisfied until those under it are taken care of, thus a "hierarchy of needs." So you can't be pursuing your doctorate in finance if you don't have food on the table, just as you can't think about asking Suzy Q on a date if your position is about to be overrun by Al-Qaeda terrorists.

However, whereas Maslow's Hierarchy of Needs primarily focuses on advancement and self-improvement, it can also be viewed in terms of the severity of problems you face in life. And it is through this lens we can start to understand the problems facing abnormally intelligent people.

To be bluntly honest, "mental illness" really is a "First World Problem." They don't have things such as "bipolar" or "social anxiety disorder" or "affluenza" in Pakistan. Your average Ecuadorian does not refer to the village psychologist as "her psychologist" like an American soccer mom who has "her psychologist" on speed dial. And the average kid in Turkey does not suffer from "ADD" or "ADHD." They have infinitely more pressing matters such as poverty, terrorism, death, and disease on their minds.

This isn't to belittle the mental problems people suffer (first world or not), but it is to highlight where people focus the majority of their mental facilities depending on where they are in the hierarchy. It is also to point out that the biggest problems people face in their life is determined by where they are in Maslow's Hierarchy, not how their problems rank in the world.

For example consider two men.

There is a soldier whose wife just sent him a "Dear John" letter, telling him she's divorcing him and taking the kids. He has also been informed by the bank that his mortgage has not been paid and is going to be foreclosed upon. He can't do anything as he's in Iraq and on patrol, when suddenly he is captured by ISIS.

The second man is a retired surgeon. He ran a successful practice for 40 years, has $20 million in the bank, saved many lives, and through hard work has afforded himself every luxury life could offer. He has visited every country he ever wanted, done everything he's ever wanted to do, ate everything he wanted to eat, and now sits there at his Floridian mansion depressed because there really is nothing left to do. His friends are all dead or living in other parts of the country. His wife passed away. And he awkwardly tries to spark conversation with the landscapers who come in weekly to tend his estate, too embarrassed to ask if they'd like to get a beer.

Who has it worse?

Obviously, the poor solider captured by ISIS does. He could die at any moment, and certainly be tortured along the way.

But whose problem is solvable?

Soon, a SEAL team bursts in, takes out all the ISIS members and rescues the poor soldier. Meanwhile, back in Florida the doctor tries to invite the landscaper to a beer, but he doesn't speak English, so the doctor goes back to pour himself another scotch to avoid his loneliness.

But the real question is who's happier?

The poor soldier, despite having horrendous problems at home and still being WAY below the doctor on Maslow's Hierarchy of Needs is ECSTATIC because the immediate problem he was facing (survival) was solved. He's not going to die. He won't be tortured. He can now move on to solve whatever problems he faces at home.

The doctor, despite having all the luxuries the world can afford is alone, has no mental stimulation, and is depressed. The problem he faces is there are no problems to face anymore, and because of the ennui he pulls out a gun and kills himself.

Episode #128 of The Clarey Podcast- Guest Host Chris Bechtloff!

January 18, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

While I'm trying to finish my book, Chris Bechtloff was kind enough to guest host in my stead.

99.9999% of Humans Who Have Ever Lived

January 18, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Another excerpt from "Curse of the High IQ"

This status quo has been completely satisfactory for the vast majority of humans throughout human history. Most people are perfectly happy in having a family, wasting two hours a day in a commute, eight hours a day in a cube, 25 years in school, seven years in a marriage, eight years in a second marriage, feeding their gullet, watching the game, drinking light beers, dying in a nursing home, making no notable or mentionable contributions to society their entire lives. And while this may sound a bit harsh and judgmental it's true, and much more than you realize.

List all the notable humans throughout recorded history that come to mind. Now, grab all the history books or the resources of the internet and come up with a list of every notable person ever recorded in history. Henry Ford, Julius Caesar, Erwin Rommel, Genghis Khan, Gilgamesh, Plato, large and small, you name it. If you're lucky you'll come up with 10,000 people, but let's be generous and say 100,000.

That 100,000 are the humans who have shaped and molded this world. The ones who are 100% responsible for all the successes and tragedies of all of humanity. They are the ones history will remember forever and the ones who will define this planet until it is consumed by the sun.

Now divide that by the 100 billion humans that are estimated to have lived since recorded history.

The number you should get is .000001. Or .0001%.

ONE TEN THOUSANDTH OF ONE PERCENT of the human population has achieved anything noteworthy in the history of the world. That means 99.9999% of the population hasn't, and have lived regular, ordinary lives that will be forever lost to obscurity, commonness, and mediocrity. There is no record of them, nor any trace of them, ultimately meaning their fleeting existence in this universe served no purpose and was wasted. It's as if they never lived in the first place. But we are alive here and now and have the raw intellectual capacity to not suffer such similar fates. Thus, we owe it to ourselves to follow the wise words of Cypress Hill,

"We aint' goin' out like that."

Writing College Papers for a Living

January 19, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

From our sponsor at Academic Composition.

Hey guys! My name is Nenad but most people here in the western hemisphere refer to me as Ned. I just turned 21 years old, my birthday was on January 12th, so happy birthday to me! Anyways with jokes aside, I would like to tell you guys how I found Aaron's blog. It first started I believe in the year 2011 when I got back from my recent trip from my native country in Eastern Europe.

I saw all my "friends" on Facebook partying with cute girls and having fun, in my mind I wanted to be like one of those guys. So, with a quick Google search I found the original MGTOW forum. There I found guys that where similar to me, not good with girls, where not popular when they went to high school and etc.

Anyways as time went on I found Aaron's blog and famous video "Don't Try Until You're 35". I immediately fell in love with his videos and his persona. To be honest I was a lost kid back when it came to life and so on back then, but today I am comfortable to say that I am little less lost then I was before. I will admit I am still not perfect, but damn, I sure learned a lot from Aaron's videos and blogs. He was like the older brother I never had! I just wish I found him earlier!

Anyways as time went on I saw a post for a subcontractor position posted by Aleksey on Aarons blog. The first time I saw it I didn't apply but as time went on and I kept seeing these kind of posts, I said to myself "Why not just apply". Well I applied and it was the best damn choice I made!

I started working for Aleksey back in February of 2015 and I quickly rose up through the ranks. As of today I have been paid on time every Monday close to around 2000 USD. As I look back I find it pretty amazing that I have made that kind of money online by only doing 10 minutes of work a week. To be honest I don't even consider it as work because there are no set hours and I can do it whenever I want! That's the beauty of it!

That amount might not seem like a lot, but trust me it is! Considering I had to work 8 hours a day 5 times a week as a construction laborer and only get paid only 7.5 hours because lunch time didn't count for around 2200 CAD (after taxes, union dues and other things) a month at the local construction company I work for every summer break.

Also, I would like to add that I hope to continue learning from Aleksey and Aaron Clarey so that I may improve my life and because the best version of myself that I possibly can.

Overall, I feel blessed that I found Aleksey and Aaron Clarey and more importantly I consider them as brothers. I wish we could meet one day, I owe you guys lots and lots of beer!

Thank you Aleksey and Aaron Clarey!
Aleksey Bashtavenko
Academic Composition
Owner & Principal Writer
(540) 300-1253
academiccomposition@gmail.com
www.academiccomposition.com
www.linkedin.com/pub/aleksey-bashtavenko/25/7b8/323/

Covers Done!

January 19, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Another estimated 72 hours and all systems should be go for Curse of the High IQ

Why Your Social Life is Unsustainable Post College

January 20, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Another excerpt from "Curse of the High IQ."

For all the drawbacks there are to school, there is one incredible benefit. They congregate a critical mass of young people together in one spot. At first this may not seem like such an incredible benefit. Cliques form, fights ensue, mental trauma is suffered, and childhoods are wasted. But in this gulag-like morass of public education high IQ children enjoy something they will never again upon entering adulthood – enough high IQ peers to form a social life.

If you think about it school is the only time in one's life where all the children within the region are forced to go to the same place and socialize. And while there is everything wrong with today's education system it does bring a critical mass of all types of children together. This creates the environment where friendships, some of them life-long, form which is one of the most important things a human can have in his or her life.

Of course, high IQ children are likely to be mocked as geeks and nerds.
And yes, abnormally intelligent children will get beaten on the playground.
And yes, genius children will be mentally tortured by their teachers for 13 years.

But in the end they meet equally-intelligent peers who are so statistically rare, it would be unlikely they'd ever meet and form friendships had there been no such thing as school.

Unfortunately, school is an artificial environment and once college is done, this artificial environment goes away. And what children (who are now adults) assumed was going to be a constant variable in their lives since the age of five and would continue on forever…ends. And slowly, but surely so too does the number one thing in their lives – their friendships.

This presents the fundamental problem high IQ people face in their social life. What they considered to be a "base" or "normal" social life is not sustainable. It is very much like a stock market bubble, pumped up by temporary forces that will inevitably go away. And when these forces go away (school and college) their social life will "crash" down to where it should be or is considered "normal."

However, the social life that is considered normal for an average person with an average IQ is NOT the same for an above-average person with an IQ of 135. Remember, 68% of the population falls within ONE standard deviation of an IQ score of 100. This means the average Joe can go down to the bar and likely find scores of average Joes equally excited about sportsball and swingystick. But if you are two or (heaven help you) three standard deviations above average less than 1% of the population is at or near your intellect. This sheer rarity of smart people makes having a social life incredibly difficult. It's not only hard to find equals, but nearly impossible to find them in the quantities needed, LET ALONE NEARBY, to have an effective and rewarding social life. Thus, the crash from the artificial social life supported by a fleeting school environment to the base or normal social life supported by the real world is cripplingly dramatic for abnormally intelligent people.

But what makes it worse is the rate at which it happens.

Academic Composition is Hiring!

January 20, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Thank you all again for your continuous support, Academic Composition would not have expanded nearly as much without your contributions.

Marketing is the lifeblood of any organization and ours is not an exception.

Most of our Craigslist subcontractors have been timely, accurate and reliable. That is what we've come to expect from Aaron's audience and that is why we solicit your assistance once more.

All you have to do is receive our ads and post them on Craigslists. This is very simple and you'll only need 5 minutes to get started. After that, all you'd need to do is renew the existing ads until they expire.

You'll make 5 bucks per lead and a dollar for each day your ads stay live. We're just a month away from mid-terms and at that point, you can easily expect to generate 10 leads a week.

That could average out at over $300 per month with less than 30 minutes of work!
Aleksey Bashtavenko
Academic Composition

Owner & Principal Writer
(540) 300-1253
academiccomposition@gmail.com
www.academiccomposition.com
www.linkedin.com/pub/aleksey-bashtavenko/25/7b8/323/

Why I Will NEVER Hire a Liberal Arts Grad

January 20, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Do not even begin to tell me there is ANY value in the liberal arts in American colleges:

Remember, you can vaccinate your children from this bullshit by buying them Worthless.

Curse of the High IQ Now Available!!!

January 20, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Happy Day Lieutenants!

Curse of the High IQ is here!

Tell friends, forward, etc. etc.

Yes, Curse of the High IQ Will be Available in Kindle…Just Not NOW!

January 21, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Holy flipping for the Patron's Saint Name of Frick! YES! It WILL BE available in Kindle! Give me a second!

Why the Left Hates the 1950's

January 21, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Because to achieve this required work, excellence, standards, and effort, all things antithetical to being a leftist.

Still a great picture to see what humanity was capable of. So sad it was 60 years ago and we've deteriorated since.

All comments about "yeah, as the husband smacked the wife around the house" will simply be deleted.

Eich's "Brave" to Take on SJW Mozilla's "Firefox"

January 22, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Fuck you Mozilla!

All of Consulting and "Business Management" is Bullshit

January 22, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

It's just common sense. That's all it is.

Common freaking sense.

Lowering Standards for the Whiners

January 22, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

to the point just like the Nobel Peace Prize, it no longer means anything.

Nothing Good Comes from Women With Horses

January 22, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Seriously, it's better for a woman to have herpes instead of horses.

Friday Night Podcast with DT and Thee Man!

January 23, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Don T Tread and Thee Man have a new podcast out.

"Those were good times"

Essay Contest: "Do Western Women Deserve Ronald Speirs"

January 23, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Greetings All,

Since I'm still in catch up mode from finishing Curse of the High IQ, I had an idea that I think might prove interesting. There is much kerfuffle about Western women voting in socialism and with it, multiculturalism. This has resulted in the predictable results, but it's not until the mass sexual assaults in Cologne did feminists, leftist females, and labor/democrat-voting women get their first real black eye and see where their political naivety might get them.

Also, chiming in are the right-freedom leaning side women who are damn well aware of the consequences of socialism and multiculturalism. Their primary concern is that if men do (as I suggest) stop protecting women, letting them suffer for the first time the consequences of their actions, these innocent women will suffer for the idiocy of others.

The only solution to this is to is to go old school. man up, and go Ronald Speirs on the world once again. For women to start voting pro-Western Civilization, pro-capitalism, pro-free markets, and therefore not only allowing us to simply maintain the simplest of sovereignty of a nation, but unchain Western man and let them do what they do best.

Of course, in my cynical mind, this is academic. I'm checking out in about 20-30 years and I personally don't believe high enough a percentage of Western countries' populations even deserve what 3,000 years of human sacrifice and suffering gifted to them today. And it is CERTAINLY my opinion Western women as a majority do not deserve it, and deserve every PENNY of the socialism and hatred for Western Civilization they vote for.

So ladies, you've had the right to vote these past roughly 100 years and you've only managed to stagnate the greatest civilization ever, bring in genuine rape culture, and grow the state by about 300% at the expense of our personal financial freedom. Oh, and then there's that whole hating men for the past 30 years of feminist bliss.

So humor me and all the real men. Why precisely should we leave our flippant lifestyles, our bachelor pads, our video games, and gyms, and our fine scotches? Why should we abandon our motorcycles, our adventures, and our cigars? Why should we "man up," marry women, bring children into this world, not to mention, arm ourselves, kick the invaders out, with the added nbonus of it being at great physical risk? Why should Western men defend Western Civilization when such a large percentage of women vehemently fight against it? Why, in short, do you deserve us to turn into the Ronald Speirs this country so desperately needs?

I will entertain all essays, publish all that are worthy, and the best one (whether you agree with me or not, I'm looking for the best argument) will win $50 of the Captain's hard earned money.

You can e-mail your essays to CAPTcapitalism@yahoo.com

Do not send attachments. Just write your essay as text and e-mail it.

The winner will be announced when I get around to it and I have a qualified winner.

Why Are Women Always Late?

January 24, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

We here at Cappy Cap used our patented "SAEG" (TM) to finally solve this problem:

Liberranter, Contact Me

January 24, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Liberranter,

Contact me, can't find your contact info on your blog.

Cappy

A Generations of Fathers Could Not Be Reached for Comment

January 24, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

One thing before I attach the link.

It was my policy in high school and middle school to ask out hot chicks. That was about my only policy. I didn't care where they came from, whether they were living in a trailer, whether they were poor, or even if they were dumb. If I wanted to nail them, I would ask them out.

And I remember being universally rejected at the same rates regardless of what class, clique, or social status the girl was. In other words the same percentage of popular girls would say yes as the same percentage of trailer trash.

So what I don't fall for one second is that these women/girls, just because they grew up poor or from a broken home, didn't have good boys/men asking them out and approaching them, and like most women, went with their tingles and not their brains and consciously chose bad men over good. You don't need to be a 4.0, honors student in the debate team to know that the douche with tears tattooed on his eye who can barely show up to school on time and already has a juvie record is bad news.

Still they choose shit over quailty.

Ergo, not only do I award this a:

"Generations of Fathers Could Not Be Reached for Comment"

but also award it

"And Zero Fucks Were Given"

Essay Entry #1 - Do Western Women Deserve the Protection of Western Men?

January 24, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

From "Grumbles." You can read up on the essay competition here.

Do Western women deserve Ronald Spiers? No, we don't. We deserve to be left to our own devices to see if we could survive without men (we can't). But the very salvation of us and all of the West relies on men taking back their masculinity. Men gave in and let us have our play time, it's time for us to give it back. Man giveth and man taketh away. Please, take it away.

The women of today truly know no better. How many notice the sitcoms with the overweight, stupid, helpless husband being constantly beat down and given dirty looks by his good-looking wife? The popular blogs written by whipped husbands, apologizing for not doing enough housework or forgetting to bring home chocolate? The comments from women are typically, 'oh, I wish you were friends with my husband!' Weak men are like sluts for women. We want them now, to use up, but they aren't what we respect in the long run.

We need masculinity. We need our men to put their foot down and tell us what the plan is. Tell. Not ask. Women leave their wussy husbands for assholes. Why? Because they have spine. They can't be pushed around. The women with the hardest heads are often the ones who fall head-over-heels for the abusive asshole. Why? He's even tougher than she is. We WANT our men to be strong, decisive, leaders. We crave it. It's in our evolutionary make-up. It gives us security. When we get hysterical over something stupid, we NEED our men to pull us back to reason and tell us he's got it under control. Even feminists need this.

Now, I'm not saying for men to become abusive assholes. I'm saying that just as men like a wife who is Doris Day in public and Betty Page in the bedroom, women like a man who is John Wayne in day-to-day and Dennis Morgan when no one is looking. You know, that big burly guy who gives a goofy grin and finger wave to babies at restaurants. Even a staunch feminist would melt away if a man stood strong and impervious to her shaming tactics. Don't let them get to you anymore. You're the bosses, men. Don't forget that.

The problem is that we don't know what we're missing. We need our men to show us. Show us what's good for us. Tell us what we need. Pull our reigns in and tell us, 'okay, you've had your fun, but let a man show you how it's done.'

For the sake of humanity, men, please PLEASE take the power and show us how it's done.

Episode #130 of The Clarey Podcast!

January 24, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Cappy's back with topics including

Riding his new motorcycle to Vegas
Celebrating the finishing of the new book
"Let's just go!"
Hallmark Channel Movies
MGM Charging for Parking
The National Review/Conservative Establishment has failed
The need for the Manosphere and Alt Right to move on

AND MORE

In THIS EPISODE of The Clarey Podcast!!!!!

What is Socialism?

January 25, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Nothing more complicated than this:

Send it to your worse-than-nerdy anarchist-socialist-marxist high school/college student colleagues who are all circle jerking to Bernie Sanders when they try to explain what socialism is. I want their heads to explode.

It's 12 O'Clock High for the Traditional Conservative Establishment

January 26, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

The Traditional Conservative Establishment's Obsolescence

The above picture needs a bit of explaining, but when done this post will make a lot of sense and hopefully, unlike the past 20 years, lead to or at least initiate a movement to the political right.

Not amongst Americans. I'm nowhere near that optimistic. But "conservatives" and "republicans" in this country.

The screen shot is from the movie "12 O 'Clock High" from 1949 starring Gregory Peck. It's about the US Air Corps in WWII where General Savage (played by Peck) has to take over a squadron of bombers that just isn't cutting it and getting the job done.

In this particular scene you see General Savage and Lt. Colonel Davenport or "Keith" as Savage and Davenport are friends. You see no animosity between them. They are obviously on the same side. And they are both sincere, intent men who want to get the job done. The problem is the job isn't getting done, so the higher ups replace Davenport with Savage.

The movie goes on where Savage changes the bomber squadron's tactics, coddles no one (punishing the worst by throwing them in with "Leper Colony"), lowers the bombing ceiling, and pushes the men 24-7 demanding "maximum effort" from all of them until exhaustion. Many of the men crack from the stress, all of them file for transfer orders, but in the end, guess what?

The job gets done.

Savage turns the squadron around, bombing raids are more successful, and morale increases, until he himself succumbs to exhaustion and "maximum effort" by the end of the movie.

The same must be done within the traditional conservative movement in America.

For the past 30 years, perhaps time-stamped with the start of Rush Limbaugh's talk radio career, my entire adult life we have had the same conservative establishment, the same conservative leaders using the same milquetoast conservative tactics that have ultimately failed.

Government spending as a percent of GDP EVEN UNDER REPUBLICAN PRESIDENTS has grown during this time to levels on par with Europe.
Our national debt is the highest it's ever been during peacetime, and will soon surpass our WWII peak.
National health care has been implemented.
American women, for the most part, prefer a government check over real men.
We don't have the spine to protect the sovereignty of our nation.
A veritable socialist who loathed the country has been elected twice as president.
And now an admitted socialist stands a good chance of getting elected.

In nearly every aspect and facet of American life the conservative establishment's tactics have miserably failed.

However, like Col. Davenport, this doesn't mean those who populate the traditional establishment are wrong, corrupt, or weren't trying. Rush Limbaugh is 100% right and tried his damnedest. George Will and Charles Krauthammer do pen thoughtful and correct pieces. Fox News does what it can to counter...basically...the ENTIRE media. And our politicians, I'm sure in the demented, warped little minds, are trying to do "what they can under the rules of Washington" to save the greatness that 4,000 years of Western Civilization took to build. In other words, bar genuine cuckservatives, these are good people on our side, who like Col. Davenport did their best.

The job still isn't getting done.

Enter General Savage

With the National Review's hit piece on Donald Trump, it because apparent to me not only how ineffective this group has been for the past three decades, but how out of touch they are from the political reality on the ground. They, eerily similar to their leftist academian counterparts, pine and pontificate haughtily thinking penning one more piece in the WSJ or one more interview on Fox News will somehow convince millennials not to vote in more of their own financial slavery, or get women to realize there isn't a war on them by white male republicans. But the problem is, quite simply, their time is over. And I don't mean that in a leadership way. I mean that in a literal way.

These guys are old. Their lives are over. Ann Coulter like Jennifer Aniston WAS hot. And the battle is no longer about what kind of America THEY are going to live in (they've already lived in it - a failing one). The battle is now ours and what we want America to become. And thus it is time to relieve the traditional conservative establishment.

But who is General Savage? Who will precisely replace the Sean Hannities and his harem of women with pretty legs? And will his tactics work?

Enter in the Alt-Right.

The Alt-Right is by no means defined, organized, or even embodied within one person, let alone a cabal of people. It is the natural, organic growth of conservative and libertarian minded people, predominantly younger ones, who are fed up with the abysmal performance of the poor stewards of the conservative movement these past 30 years. However, whereas most of them had to watch helplessly from the sidelines as kids or young adults via television, talk radio, or the newspapers (National Review being one of them), the internet has allowed them to not only vent their frustrations, but take matters into their own hands and become a force unto itself that rivals the traditional establishment.

I doubt George Will has more readers under 30 than even the most average of Alt-Right blogs.
Glenn Beck's media empire is losing listeners, while scores of much more manly and specialized podcasters are experiencing 100%+ annual growth in their listenership.
I don't know anybody 40 or under who still listens to Hannity, but I know scores of men who listen to Adam Carolla.
And don't even get me started about the precious naivety of thrice-married Dennis Prager advocating young men get married in today's America and what kind of response that evokes from young men who know better.

Regardless, the point is the Alt-Right is more in tune and in touch with the real American people than the cute little Ivy-League-Academian-Crony Club of Hannity-Prager-Medved-Coulter-Krauthammer-Will in DC. Furthermore, they are much more blunt and direct as the urgency by which their future American lives are threatened forces them to be so. They don't cower at being called a racist. They don't preface every statement like "not all women are like this, but," and they simply blast through whatever leftists defenses and attacks come their way because, well, frankly, they never had any hope for anything to live for anyway, and thusly have nothing to lose.

But the real reason the Alt-Right needs to relieve the traditional right is much simpler (and more pathetic) than all the reasons listed above.

We simply have different ideas.

You have to understand just how bad the situation is with the current conservative leadership and establishment. The only group of people who tried MORE than the conservative establishment to make FAILED POLICIES work is the black community. It's just instead of 60 years of pursuing socialist policies for blacks, the conservative movement has been pursuing this spineless pussy-footing strategy of appeasement and reason for the past 30. And unless we want to see if cowardice and being "democrat light" will work on the 31st year, like the black community ANY ideas are by default better because there's at least a CHANCE they may work. Even if they don't, they would at least serve the benefit of experimentation to the point we develop strategies that do.

New Tactics

So what are these new tactics?

Well, I'd love to tell you, but it is here in all honesty I must admit I cannot divulge all my thoughts on the many and infinitely more effective tactics I believe will work in winning over the American people. The reason is simple - I charge for advice. And like the Joker says, "If you're good at something, never do it for free." Additionally, after making several approaches to the republican party, not to mention delivering two speeches to them, their ineptitude and utter lack of action thoroughly convinced me it would be infinitely easier to simply start a new party and obsolete them...or perhaps consult the democrat party instead. Two ideas I actually am kicking around.

Regardless, while I won't throw pearls before swine, I will tell the swine where they're wrong which would provide some insight as to what new tactics the Alt-Right would pursue...but reserving some of my more devastating and effective gems for the highest bidder.

One, grow a pair.

It is APPALLING how the the left with a cowardly tactic of name calling people they disagree with "racist" or "sexists" sends the conservative establishment running. It immediately forces them to abandon their position, change topics, and race to prove they are "not a racist."

I've found treating minorities and women as GENUINE equals, ESPECIALLY holding them to the same standards of criticism and critique, calling them on their BS may not make smiles, but earns more respect and trust in the long run than some ass-kissing "me-too-ism" republican vowing to do "more for minorities."

Two, eliminate the cronyism.

The cabal that currently exists within the conservative leadership is just as corrupt and nepotistic and cronyistic as the Clinton's. From the fact the son AND brother of TWO presidents is considering running for president all the way to the fact nobody at Fox News seems to come from outside the New York-DC Ivy League cesspool costs the conservative movement face and reputation.

Additionally, it's laughable you advocate meritocracy when no effort is made to develop a system that would ID, hunt down, and identify the best candidates that would advance freedom, liberty, conservatism, and American ideas. It shows you place more value on using an ideology as your career than the noble purposes it portends.

Three, no crying.

For all that is sacred and holy, there will be no crying. None. There will from hence forth only be real men in your party, and especially your political and media leaders. There will be no effeminate, pansy-assed Glenn Beck's. There will be no castrated, cry-baby John Boehner's. There will be real men in this party which will do more to win over women as being a real man gets you more women than kissing their asses. You are only allowed to cry upon the death of a loved one and the loss of your dog, and you are NEVER to do it on national television or radio.

Four, win over minorities.

It's possible. WAAAAY more possible than your realize. I'd like to tell you how, but that would lead to the republicans ruling over America for 100 years, not to mention the incredible economic growth that would come with that. Yes, for that gem, you will pay.

Five, win over women.

Again, like minorities, but with a lot more votes. Again, you will pay.

And finally, turn secular.

Religion has no place in politics. Too many millions of people were killed, tortured, and slain ensuring theocracy was relegated to the Mid East crap holes of this world. Certainly, go and practice whatever religion you want, but the republican party absolutely must jettison the religious right that infects it.

There is more. Infinitely more. And the future of America could be salvaged in one election cycle. But given the entrenchment of the conservative establishment, their cluelessness about the real world, their debilitating cronyism, and sadly, their increasing irrelevance, I doubt they are even capable of making any effective changes, let alone in time for them to witness said changes before they die.

Sorry Keith, you're relieved.

---

http://aaron-clarey.podomatic.com/
http://www.assholeconsulting.com

https://www.youtube.com/user/AaronClarey
https://twitter.com/aaron_clarey
http://www.amazon.com/Aaron-Clarey/e/B00J1ZC350/
Amazon Affiliate

The Real Reason I Don't Believe in Global Warming

January 26, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

It's predictors can't predict shit.

Informal Baton Rouge Cigar Lounge Meet Up Tonight

January 27, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Greetings All,

Ole Captain is on the road again and just found a cigar lounge called "Churchill's" in Baton Rouge. Aiming to be there at 730PM would love to see any people who randomly happen to get this in time. Sorry for the last minute nature of it, but didn't even know I'd be crashing in Baton Rouge until this morning.

Regardless, be good to see some fellow economists and lieutenants tonight!

Cappy!

Gingers Demand High IQ's

January 27, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Remember, free redhead with purchase of every book. Scouts honor!

Houston Cigar Meet Up

January 28, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Howdy All Lieutenants and Economists!

Going to have an impromptu meetup/cigar smoking at Cigar Envi in Katy, Texas aka "west Houston."

730PM, please show up if you're around!

Cappy

San Antonio Meet Up

January 29, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Wildfish in the scenic suburb of Stone Oak.

Is it oak?

Is it stone?

The world will never know!

But we will be there at 8PM for drinks and cocktails though it may be an early evening.

Pussy Pass Privilege

January 29, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Here's real privilege.

Episode #131 of the Clarey Podcast!

January 30, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Motorcycle riding across the US
Meeting "Bama the Dog"
Cigar Lounges of the South
Houston is rather large
If you're going to the office after 45 you're doing it wrong
How large cities screw over young people
Women more violent than men

and more!!!

IN THIS EPISODE of THE CLAREY PODCAST!

Some Genuine Journalism Work in Flint

January 30, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

I have to say I'm impressed. DT did some investigative work on the Flint water crisis and actually pegged down who is to blame. You'll need to get to the first segment of the podcast, but it's what you'd suspect. Lazy, parasites (this time as Detroit citizens) wanting other people to pay for their existence.

Cappy's Motorycling Adventures in Texas!

January 31, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Greetings all! Figured I'd post a few pics from my little roadtrip across the Yee Haw state.

First, you have to spray for "little girls." If you don't spray your motorcycle for "little girls" it can become infected like mine here. I'm usually much more professional, but I was in a rush and sure enough, mine got infected and it took more time out of my day to dislodge her with bleach and turpentine than had I sprayed. Just a pointer for you beginner motorcycle riders.

If you're motorcycle gets infected by "little girls," you will have to have your coffee in a Cinderella cup as you wait for your laundry to get done.

You will also be forced to have your motorcycle jacket "improved" with stickers.

Once your clear your motorcycle of the infection you can now enjoy the country side of Texas:

And after 8 long hours of driving they will built an old Spanish-Western type hotel in your honor:

And that is Texas so far.

Why Corporations are Seemingly Leftist

February 3, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Medtronic was (emphasis on "was") a Minneapolis-based company until it decided it would move to Ireland under a "tax inversion" that would lower its corporate tax rate from 35% to 5%. With the savings they had repurchased $5 billion in shares giving shareholders $5 billion in value that would have otherwise been given to parasites via government programs had it been taxed. Abbott Labs did something similar. And Halliburton also moved it's corporate headquarters to Dubai.

These are moves we expect from corporations because it makes sense. It lowers their expenses and increases profits.

But then there are companies, especially those in from Silicon Valley, who do not seem to be the quintessential "right wing, pro-capitalist" corporations. Instead they're actually quite leftist not only taking leftist positions, but donating monies to the democrat party. Naturally lobbying the socialist party of the US is nothing new, but this goes beyond that with companies and their executives taking outright politically left-stands when it would only serve to increase their corporate taxes.

Apple's CEO telling people Apple doesn't want global warming deniers' money (fine by me).
Mozilla's firing of Brendan Eich for making a anti-gay marriage political donation several years ago.
Don't get me started about all the Fortune 500 companies that brag about their commitment to diversity.
And companies like Whole Foods or Trader Joe's that purposely target leftists with their organic and fair trade foodstuffs (though admittedly that's marketing).

Still, it doesn't make sense to most people as to why an increasing number of corporations would advocate and advance leftist political issues when in the end it just means higher corporate taxes. But if you stop thinking logically and instead look at this phenomenon through a different set of eyes it's actually quite apparent what corporations are doing. And what you'll find is that it's a combination of today's Gen X'ers taking over corporate leadership roles combined with a lack of any new ideas or talent.

Welcome to the new marketing strategy of corporate America.

Let us be very clear why there's a seemingly leftist bend in corporations - the current generation of business leaders plain have no new plans or ideas. Gen X is not particularly bright, most business leaders aren't real leaders as much as they are obedient, very average MBA clones. And until the millennials came on the scene we were hands down the laziest generation this country had ever begotten. But worse, Gen X is the first generation and "SJW prototype" to have been brainwashed by leftist indoctrination as it pertains to businesses.

This laziness and ineptitude, combined with the brainwashing they received is now infecting corporate American in full force. And it shows in the often confusing leftist policies FOR-PROFIT corporations endorse and enact. They enact these policies NOT because it's going to help the corporation. They enact those policies because it's the only marketing strategy they can think of. They enact these policies because it (in their minds) improves their reputation with the American people. They pursue these policies because, in short, they think leftism sells. And we see this every day.

It originally started about 30 years ago with "diversity." Diversity was being shoved down college students throats since the late 80's. When we hit college in the 90's it didn't matter, we knew it for the BS that it was. But after three decades of telling people they're special because of traits (and not hard work or accomplishments) that's a sales pitch even Oprah can't match.

Then came "going green" or CSR (corporate social responsibility). A corporation wasn't just a private entity owned by and completely beholden to its shareholders. No, now it was part of society and must put profits below it's "corporate social responsibility" to society. Under this BS was diversity, sexual harassment training, sensitivity training, etc., but it also laid the ground work for the "green" and "organic" fads that rushed through America in the past decade. Of course none of this did anything to improve the bottom line, increase shareholder value, or improve products for the customer, but it was just like the latest business management fad textbook - it provided nothing of value, but took nothing to enact, but still looked like you were doing something. A dream come true for most lazy business managers.

And most recently, and we see this especially so in our entertainment industries, is the rebooting of old shows or movies because we just don't have the creative juices to create another Indiana Jones or Harry Potter.

A new Star Wars.
A new Mad Max.
Call of Duty 57
And now they're rebooting Scooby Doo

It would be one thing if they were just too lazy to come up with new ideas, but these reboots have a particularly cute and leftist twist - replacing traditionally white male characters with non-white male characters.

The Hulk is now Asian.

Ms. Marvel is a female Muslim.
Chris Bechtloff can tell you about all the new gay or lesbian charcters.
The new Ghostbusters is just a blatant pandering to women.
And they even tried floating a balloon to see if they could make James Bond black (please do and launch the "White Shaft" while you're at it Hollywood).

I could go on, but the strategy here is something very simple and one politicians have been using for years - divide and conquer. Of course corporations and their newest generation of "leaders" don't really want to "conquer" anything. They just want to sell their wares. But reliably and predictably, despite all claiming to be "independent minded," the brainwashing in school and college worked. Today's business leaders really do think taking political positions on race, sex, privilege, the environment, etc., is a genuine and effective business strategy. They think bragging about how they hire "minorities" but not "the best" is a long term managerial strategy. They think donating 5% of their pre-tax profit (because a corporate tax rate of 40% just wasn't enough) will win people over.

Alas, this is the newest generation of business leaders. People who use "fads," "political correctness" and "leftism" to sell their products. And if you thought the Baby Boomers were bad business managers, just wait for these over-educdated, political-correct-crusaderist Gen X'ers to fully be at the helm.

Heaven help us.

---

http://aaron-clarey.podomatic.com/
http://www.assholeconsulting.com
https://www.youtube.com/user/AaronClarey
https://twitter.com/aaron_clarey
http://www.amazon.com/Aaron-Clarey/e/B00J1ZC350/
Amazon Affiliate

NDSU's Theater Program is Bunk

February 3, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Everything wrong with academia and further proof the liberal arts is merely a make-work program to hire worthless hacks:

Curse of the High IQ NOW AVAILABLE ON KINDLE!!!

February 4, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Here it is! Sorry for the delay!

Political News Coverage is Just Plain Insulting

February 4, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

My now-approaching 12 years of not watching political news came to an end yesterday as I brought the bike into the mechanics to have them give it the once over before I continued on my cross-country trip. The mechanic informed me there was a waiting room where they had comfy couches, internet, coffee, and TV. As I grabbed my gear, looking forward to park my rear for a while, I was let down to see they had CNN on.

It didn't matter, I had brought my laptop in anticipation of having some down time. But I still could not help but watch the 60 inch TV that was sitting directly in front of my face, and it was one word;

Insulting.

Perhaps I've been inoculated against political news coverage.
Perhaps I've just gotten older and, thus, wiser and can ID BS when I see it.
Or maybe my most recent book made me even more disdainful of what the commoners consume.

But as I watched Anderson Cooper and Wolf Blitzer cover the recent kerfuffle between Trump and Cruz, Hillary and Bernie, not to mention their representative mouth pieces, my mouth dropped not because of what they were saying, but because all of them:

The politicians
The spokespersons
The interviewees and
The CNN staff

treat you people like genuine f*cking idiots.

First the drama (and I use that euphemistically) between Trump and Cruz was soap-opera worthy. Cruz stood accused of telling people during the Iowa caucus that Ben Carson had dropped out of the race, thus begetting more votes for him. Cruz accused Trump of being childish and acting like his daughters. They covered this cumulatively for about 15 minutes of my precious life I'll never get back.

Second, there was also drama on the democrat side. Here the big to-do was Bernie Sanders accusing Hilary of not being "progressive enough." Never mind it isn't a real word. Never mind she'll do whatever the population wants her to. Never mind post-Obama anything more to the left will be 100% socialism. No, Bernie insisted he was more progressive. And that was newsworthy enough for Blitz and Coopy to waste 15 additional minutes of my life.

Then there were the politicians. News clips of them talking to their respective bases, but by god, the idiotic things they were saying. It was worse than any presidential speech (which is what originally made me swear off of political news). Generic pablum that is made for people with low IQ's who are the epitome of those who'd rather hear what they want to hear over the truth any day. Mindless sycophants, with nothing better to do in their lives than take up political crusades, hinging on every word of their politician (who all magically utter thousands of words, but still managing to say nothing).

And then the spokes people. Hilary's spokesperson I wanted to beat. A pretty boy-Floyd from the east coast who did not answer ONE question directly, but always managed to turn his answer into a scripted, puke-inducing, ass-kissing ad for Hilary. A congressman came on for Ted Cruz, and during the interview was the only person who was honest and not rushing to plant his ass on some politician's behind. But this was a fleeting moment of genuine political insight as he was quickly replaced by spokespeople for Cruz, Christie, and Sanders.

In the end 90 minutes of my life was wasted, and I was further validated to have abandoned paying attention to politics for these past decade-plus worth of years.

But as mentioned before, the one thing I could not believe was just how degrading and insulting this entire experience was. It was BARELY better than the fake speeches and drama I watched as an 8 year old watching the WWF. But whereas I could be forgiven at the time for believing Macho Man Randy Savage truly had it out for Hulk Hogan (because I was 8), somebody tell me the excuse millions of full-grown adults have for watching this spectacle of BS.

Not one of these politicians said anything insightful or meaningful. The media (CNN) should be ashamed of itself for instigating, drumming up, and concocting a really lame afternoon political drama that, like all soap operas, proved nothing and only managed to waste billions of human hours. And the spokesmen. Oh, the spokesmen. How do you have no soul and just stand there and lie? How? Doesn't your stomach churn when you have to pull down into the deep recesses of your mind and pull up the slop you think it going to convince the average voter idiot your candidate isn't the scum-bucket life-long career politician she/he is?

Of course, like Amy Schumer stand up or a Will Ferrell comedy, this wouldn't sell if there wasn't demand for it. And so the real culprit is not the politicians, the media, or the spokespeople. It's the average American idiot who is so stupid, so ignorant, they don't realize how insulting and degrading this political news coverage is to them. And so once again, I have to let go, not bother watching this slop, wait for it to get above 60 degrees here in Phoenix, hop on the motorcycle, and enjoy that decline!

Episode #132 of The Clarey Podcast!

February 4, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Why bachelors shouldn't need refrigerators
There's only Waffle Houses in Florida
Cappy's grocery store
Sushi logistics
The pitbull who forgot Cappy
Ybor City and crotch rockets don't mix
Old men shouldn't go to nightclubs
Fan mail
College students develop a $20,000 house...and still feel guilty about the poor.

AND MORE!

On THIS EPISODE of The Clarey Podcast!!!

Do Western Women Deserve the Protection of Western Men - Essay #4

February 5, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

From Jessica:

The women who betrayed the West certainly don't deserve to be protected by it, but Western Civilization itself does deserve to be saved. We cannot just abandon it. However, the only way to do that is likely by simply riding out the storm. The nations of Europe are ripe for civil wars, and only time will tell if America follows, or if the global economy collapses and it's every man for himself. Pick your worst case scenario.
As food and energy grows scarcer or runs out, and the bullets start flying, how much power do you think the Social Justice "Warriors" will have? Academia? All the other annoying leftists more concerned about their feeeeelings than anything else? Social media mobs and hashtag activism won't save them when harsh realities are shattering their rosy little illusions. Who will listen to them if they cannot protect or provide for themselves? Only men who are strong enough to fight and wise enough to lead will be able to get what's left of society back into some degree of order, only they will have any kind of power that actually matters.

And the women will be stuck in the middle of this clash. The government will not be there to provide them with first world security, or extra goodies. Are they going to suddenly toughen up and get a grip on reality during the most cataclysmic point in their lives? Nah. They will look to anyone getting control of the situation and restoring whatever amount of order is possible. If the women want to be protected by the smart people who know what they are doing, they will have to follow the new rules. The old ways of political correctness will be stripped away. After all, progressivism is all about the easy and convenient path. There is no easy and convenient path when civilization is collapsing around you. I suppose one could keep railing on about all the progressive buzzwords (or that Shakespeare was a racist, just because), but no one will care and everyone will tell the moron to scram. Not the best way to stay alive.

The point being that you men may determine to "Enjoy the Decline," and not care what happens, but consider that there may come a time during the decline that will be a very strategic moment to step in, lead, and change society for the better. Or even save Western Civilization. Are you willing to keep an eye out for that opportunity? Or does the West really matter that little to you?

I suspect it still matters to you, the time just isn't right yet, not for everyone anyway.
But it is coming.

Essay #2 Do Western Women Deserve Western Men?

February 5, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

By Unsweettea

The heroics of the "greatest generation" are well documented and used as a standard of what men should aspire. The question we face now is do women deserve men like Ronald Spiers and the other brave men of Easy Company? Women can rationalize all the want, but the honest and simple answer is no. The majority of women today would likely not even appreciate a man like Ronald Spiers. They would look at him and probably call him a misogynist while being confused as to why this misogynist just caused them to soak through their panties. Hell, even in Mr. Spiers' time, women were self-indulgent; some women happily cheated on their husbands or left them while they were deployed overseas. As we know, this still happens today.

I do not believe men should sacrifice their lifestyles, games, hobbies, or gym memberships for for women. These things help define men. They help recharge men's bodies and souls when work or life gets particularly difficult. Men should determine what aspects of their life and hobbies are non-negotiable. If a woman they are courting cannot respect that, plate or next her, but definitely don't reward bad behavior by marrying her. Women should respect men if only on this one thing. If a woman respects you enough to give you space to recharge yourself by doing "manly" things, she may very well be a keeper. Respect is a trait sorely lacking in women. This probably has to do with the indoctrination that women are somehow better than men and men's needs are somehow less important.

This begs the question, why are women so threatened by men's hobbies, gym memberships, games, etc.? How does it hurt them? Easy. It's because they are not the center of attention. Most women today are nothing more than emotionally stunted, overgrown children. When men do their thing either alone or with other men, his attention is on his buddies or the task at hand, not on his woman. As irrational it is, women feel threatened when they are not the center of attention. That weekly poker game with the guys is just as threatening as the hot bartender showing major cleavage while serving drinks. What ends up happening? She manipulates the situation or throws a tantrum. Just like a child, any attention is better than no attention.

Let's circle back to respect and other traits. Men are expected to be stoic, honorable, hardworking and loyal. What are women expected to bring to the table? Maybe be pleasant for short periods of time and occasionally put out? That's a pretty lopsided deal. Men should be under no obligation to give women their best when women do not offer the same in return. Women should contribute the same as men. If she expects a man to be honorable and loyal, she must offer him the same. If she cannot be a contributor to a man's life just as much he is for her life, she is not worth it.

A stay-at-home is not being respectful or loyal to her husband when she allows him to come home from a long day at work to a dirty house. She is not being respectful when she makes him swing by McDonalds to pick up dinner for himself and the family because she just didn't have time to make dinner. She didn't have time last night either, the night before that, and the night before that one, too. Those pesky daytime talk shows and Facebook got in the way, but she will never admit that. She does not respect that he works 50 – 60 hours between two part time jobs to provide for the family. His days off are filled with errands and honey-do items because if he doesn't' do the laundry, it will never get done. She does not honor or respect him in the least to let him have time for himself or with his friends, to let him recharge himself before he starts another week of long shifts. But she believes she is not in the wrong; she is too self-entitled and knows he is trapped. If he leaves her, he will end up with nothing because of divorce rape. The sight of such a beaten man is sad indeed.

It's from real life examples like the above that I understand why men plate women or decide to go MGTOW. I don't believe all hope is lost. It may take either a catastrophic event or many generations to turn this around. There is a small and slowly growing pocket of women who realize the stuff they have been taught about their superiority are all wrong. They are learning the old ways of traditional gender roles in relationships. In having these kinds of relationships, they are having fulfillment they never had previously. They honor their men, subscribe to the "keep his balls empty and his stomach full" philosophy, and quell their inner hamsters without relying too much on him. They give their men space to be men and nurture it.

Until the tides change and more women actually understand what it means to be women rather than harpies, Western men should only defend Western civilization for themselves, for their fellow man, to preserve their way of life. Going back to "Band of Brothers," when you watch the first episodes, the men initially enlist to protect the American way of life and to ensure the war doesn't spread across the Atlantic. After being hardened by several hard fought battles, their intentions change. They still have a patriotic sense of duty to fight, but more importantly, they find themselves fighting for each other, for the brotherhood.

Men should stop protecting and saving women. We don't deserve it and we will never learn if we don't have to pay consequences for our piss-poor decisions. Protect yourselves and each other.

Cappy's "Apache Trail" Adventure!

February 7, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Some pictures from the Apache Trail. And for those of you who will ask, yes, I did the whole loop. Not just to "Tortilla Flats and back."

Of course, remember, I am NOT a real MGTOW. So don't try this at home!

National Forest
Scenic Byway
Apache Trail

Corona
Budweiser
CERVEZA
DOS
LUNAS SALOON
OPEN
Now On Draught!

A Nerd's Ode to the Super Bowl

February 7, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

An excerpt from "Curse of the High IQ"

But before one perceives the above to be largely a female-dominated phenomenon, think again. Because there can be nothing more average, more mindless, more meaningless than sports.

While Madonna is convincing 60 year old women they're still hot, 80% of the American men are glued to a TV set at a bar watching one large group of guys try to get a ball past another large group of guys in the all-so-important hopes of getting it past "the line."

Does world peace ensue if the ball gets past "the line?"
No.

Do we end world hunger if the ball gets past "the line?"
No.

Do we solve the mysteries of the universe, cure cancer, achieve immortality, or find out the meaning of life if the ball gets past "the line?"
No.

But that group of large guys with the blue and white jerseys got the ball past the line more than the group of large guys with the red and orange jerseys and that's worth spending at least 5% of our GDP on.

The truth is, there's nothing wrong with watching sports or enjoying a good game. But if it were only that. Sadly, millions of men (and women) pin their happiness and hopes, their actual mental state of mind, even their identity on whether or not "their" team wins. Severely average men spend hours sitting at Applebee's, eating wings, wearing some other man's jersey, chugging away light beers as they set up fantasy sportsball teams based on real athletes who don't even know (or care) that they exist. And while we mock the billions of women wasting their lives watching day time soap operas, vicariously living a fake life while pissing away theirs, there's just as many men wasting their lives watching pre-game shows, post-game shows, pre-pre-post-game shows, and calling into sports talk radio shows to Monday morning quarter-back men who are multi-million dollar professionals.

But the real tragedy is that despite TRILLIONS of human hours dedicated to these things, be it sports, celebrity gossip, or the slop served on TV, not one intelligent thing was ever said, nor one significant advancement ever made. It is a sad waste of human life that abnormally intelligent people just can’t understand and, frankly, don’t care to.

New Blog - Adam Piggott

February 8, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Pushing Rubber Downhill - The Blog.

Sucky Saudi Economics

February 8, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

With no interest in the presidential election nor Super Bowl, and a growing disinterest in trying to drag the rest of society along into some kind of enlightenment that may not make the future so sucky as it is guaranteed to be, I found myself bored and decided to investigate why Saudi Arabia's credit rating had been cut. Yes, I knew it had something to do with collapsing oil prices, but I wanted to see how severe the ramifications was for Saudi finances.

And mercy, is it!

First we have economic growth. This is NOT GDP, though the graph will look that way. It is YEAR OVER YEAR economic growth, ie- GDP growth. In 2011 and 2012 Saudi Arabia's economy was booming, logging a near one third growth rate for both years. Not 1/3%. 33%. Growth collapsed quickly in 2013 and 2014, entering a NEGATIVE 13% GDP for 2015. Of course, Western nations aren't accustomed to such volatility in their growth rates, but it still doesn't change the fact 2015 was a devastating year for Saudi Arabia.

Since the Saudi government is so dependent upon oil prices, it behooves the question what happened to government revenues and finances. It's hilarious.

In one year the Saudi deficit crashed to more than 13% GDP, worse than even Barack Obama's worst year.

There really is no economic lesson here aside from the importance of diversifying your economy. But it does make me feel good to see a financial source terrorism either directly or indirectly relies upon drying up.

You may continue about your Monday with these additional warm fuzzies.

"Free Shit" Beats " Vagina"

February 8, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Unfortunately Hilary's "I Have a Vagina Campaign" doesn't seem to beat Uncle Bernie's "Don't worry sweetheart. I'll take care of you baby" campaign.

I'll say it again, women are genetically programmed to vote in a larger state. Vagina or not.

Phoenix Cigar Meetup

February 8, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Churchill's Cigar's in Tempe.
730PM.
Tuesday the 9th.
Be there and be square.

Today's High IQ Girl Eye Candy is Cindy

February 8, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Alright boys, pay attention.

Cindy was very kind to volunteer to take this pic to help the Ole Captain out and to give you yahoos something prettier to look at than charts. Kind of like a WWII pinup girl/Rita Hayworth helping the soldiers out on the battlefield against socialism and SJW's.

Anyway, if you'd be so kind to help her out if you have a need for a model to model...well...anything, young Cindy would appreciate it very much.

Oh yeah, and there's a book or something in the picture there too.

Cappy's Adventures in Sedona, Jerome, and Prescott!

February 10, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

And this girl FORCED herself into my bed at the end of the night!

For English Teachers, Grammar Nazis, and Typo Twats Everywhere

February 10, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Please sit down and take this humble note from the master:

Episode #133 of the Clarey Podcast FROM MEXICO!!!

February 11, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Cappy podcasts from Mexico!
Mexicans need to up their game..and speed limits
Concrete-block wielding meth heads
Cappy simplifies the 2016 presidential campaign

AND MORE!!!

In THIS EPISODE of The Clarey Podcast!!!

A Kind Review of "Curse of the High IQ"

February 11, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Many thanks!

Cappy's Adventures in Mexico

February 12, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Took a quick trip south of the border yesterday. Went from Phoenix, Arizona down to Puerto Penasco, Mexico. Lot's of cacti and old people from Wisconsin dancing with trailers!

Remember kids, leave "Enjoying the Decline" to the professionals!

San Diego Meet Up Tonight!

February 12, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

8PM
Sanctuary Lounge in Northern San Diego
12090 Scripps Summit Dr, San Diego, CA 92131
Friday

See youse guys then!

Why I Don't Work for Ernst and Young

February 13, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

And will never open up a division in the UK.

Hmmmm....maybe Ernst and Young could hire Asshole Consulting. They're going to need it.

Mizzou Protestors - Where are They Now?

February 13, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Hee hee!

Celebrate The Black Brigade's 100th Episode!

February 13, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Part 1
Part 2

Cappy's Adventures in Salton Sea and California

February 14, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

My adventures took me from Yuma, AZ, around the Salton Sea, through the back way to Del Mar (San Diego) and then up the PCH 1 to Balboa Island. If you ever want to visit a city entirely based on the meth trade I recommend Bombay Beach. If you want a place where people have all their teeth and aren't collecting a government check, I recommend Balboa Island.

Salton Sea
State Recreation Area
Bombay Beach

This is How You Sell Diversity

February 14, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

I would totally be on board with diversity if they pushed it like this.

This is Why You Want to Work a Government Job

February 14, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Skips work for 6 years and nobody notices!

Why Amy Schumer Is So Popular

February 15, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

It was 2013 and I was road tripping out in the American south west. I was lucky enough to get a car with Sirius satellite radio which meant even in the most remote locales of the country I was able to listen to pretty much whatever I wanted. So there I was, in Canyonlands National Park, far far away from the only civilization in Moab, when a hilarious comedian by the name of Amy Schumer came on the air.

She was funny.
She was hilarious.
She made my trip all that much enjoyable.

And I took a note in my little notepad to look her up when I returned home.

But like many items on my to do list, I forgot to look her up. And whereas normally this would mean the name "Amy Schumer" would likely forever be lost on a piece of paper as I unconsciously threw it in the garbage, I would NEVER forget Amy Schumer because at about that same time the traditional media social media alternative media print media

and
Hollywood

went gangbusters promoting the hell out of Amy Schumer, ne'er letting me forget this woman existed.

Oddly, however, it wasn't her comedy as much as it was just...well...her they were promoting. Not that she had done anything amazing (aside from her comedy), but quite the opposite. She was just your average, obese American woman, and the media had launched a cognizant and purposeful campaign blitz celebrating that fact.

She was Amy Schumer!
She was large and in charge!
She was body-positive!
And she's all about feminism!

3 years later neither you nor I can go a week without seeing her on some social media meme, on the cover of a trashy grocery store magazine, or some other such theatrics blasted over the internet.

She's Amy Schumer!
And by god she's overweight!
And she's in your face about it!
And we're going to celebrate this fact!
HA!

Naturally, this in-your-face-24-7-Amy-Schumer-channel has ruffled the feathers of conservatives, libertarians, or people who just don't like being told what they should and should not find attractive. But in addition to this (intended and planned) revulsion, a common question coming from my conservative and libertarian circles, AS WELL as some associates of mine on the left is:

Why the hell is Amy Schumer so popular?

And it is here a very important lesson lies for us all, regardless of politics, So strap in lieutenants and pour yourselves a stiff one because in understanding why Amy Schumer is so popular you will be able to attain an element of serenity and calm previously not had before.

By all measures of sanity and logic Amy Schumer should be popular because of her comedy and humor. My hatred for her does not blind me to the fact she is an incredibly talented comedian and is one of the funniest people I've heard. But if you look at nearly ALL of the media, attention, and hype Schumer has received in the past couple of years it has NOT been to promote her comedy, her humor, or her literary works, but rather push a political agenda, namely one of fat acceptance (and to a larger extent, feminism).

A sane and logical mind would ask "what gives?" Why would she abandon her true talent of humor to become just another harpy harping on fat-acceptance and feminism? The market is flooded with such women, and it certainly is not as rewarding as being a comedian.

But while you're focusing on her talent as a humorist (and the general hatred that mars the world of feminism), what you fail to see is a market that is MUCH larger than the comedy market, and one that is much more profitable:

Pretty lies.

Currently the largest industry in the world right now is government. Governments are the largest organizations by far, they are the largest consumers of resources, and they employ the most amount of people. But in Western governments in particular the primary service they provide is not defense roads infrastructure cops

or judicial systems

but rather...

pretty lies.

And these lies are told with the sole purpose of getting corrupt politicians re-elected so they can avoid real jobs in the real world/private sector.

You're not poor because you had 6 children from 4 different fathers.
You're poor because you're black and whitey hates you.

You're not making 76% of what men make because you majored in "French Lesbian Communication Studies."
You're making 76% of what men make because "sexism."

And you're not an overpaid union member who drove jobs overseas with your bloated pay.
You're a victim of "The Evil Corporations Maaaaan!"

This racket is a multi-trillion dollar industry and is the largest scam ran on all of humanity....

except for religion.

It is no coincidence that the predecessor to government was religion. Previous to those evil-white-males introducing secular government and ending the pointless deaths caused by theocracies, religion was the state and maintained this age-long multi-trillion dollar racket by providing the same service modern day governments do:

Pretty lies.

"There's an afterlife!"
"You're immortal! You're all going to heaven!"
"You're the chosen ones!"
"You are superior to non-believers!"
"You have the right to kill them all!"
"And take all their stuff!"

It's the same thing governments do today, but with "god" and immortality as the prominent lies.

But while you'd think religion and governments have a duopoly on this market, think again. The human demand for pretty lies is insatiable. There's trillions more to go around! And the private sector also wants its share of this racket.

Enter in:

the media
Hollywood
the fashion industry
Oprah/The View/Daytime talk shows
Reality TV
Academia

and a whole host of other industries designed to lie right to people's faces so they mindlessly part with their money.

And that is the industry Amy Schumer is in.

Sadly, the free market has determined that Amy's skills as a comedian, though impressive, are outshone by her ability to sell lies. Yes there are likely thousands, tens of thousands, even perhaps millions of people who would buy her DVD or buy tickets to her shows. But there is MORE demand from (predominantly) overweight women who want to believe that there is something wrong with society and men for liking and being attracted to skinny chicks. Thus why nobody has heard of Amy's latest comedy tour (if she even has one), but EVERYBODY knows how fat her thighs look.

The result is the confusion (and frustration) we're all enduring over the inexplicable popularity of Amy Schumer. She is not an actress of any type, she isn't funny when propagandizing politics, and I really am sick and tired of seeing her fat ass showing up everywhere on facebook. However, we all have to realize that all of this "Amy Schumer All the Time Show" is not intended for us, but rather the mindless sheeple whose lives are so void of meaning they need to live off of lies.

Schumer's antics are not to agitate conservatives or libertarians.
Schumer's showmanship is not to anger men over what they should or should not find attractive.
Just like People Magazine, the "Schumer Media Blitz" is to tell sad, pitiful women the lie that big is beautiful, all women are gorgeous, and they can "have it all" (TM), etc. etc.

There is of course a problem.

These lies don't come free

Yes there are the few dollars here or there women spend on magazines or any media outlet willing to publish a body-positive piece of propaganda. And yes, anybody using Ms. Schumer as a marketing tool will get those ladies' hard earned dollars as well. But the real price is these women waste their lives in a delusional world thinking:

Big is beautiful!
"Loud and proud" is a noble aim.
And men are shallow for not liking overweight, obnoxious women!

Which condemns them to living in a delusional world, guaranteeing them no real success with the opposite sex, finding a quality man, or having a healthy, functional family. They will have wasted their one shot in life, their minute spark of existence in this universe on lies, and that's a higher price paid than all the taxes paid to governments and all the tithes paid into all the world's religions. If you think about it, it's actually quite precious and full of poetic justice. It almost makes you want to cheer Ms. Schumer on.

"Smart Girls Read Clarey"

February 16, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Yes, yes, they most certainly do!

IQ, Bikes, and Mating Patterns

February 16, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

A review of Curse of the High IQ from Mangan, but also some interesting historical tidbits about how mating patterns changed with the advent of the bicycle.

Cappy's Adventure in SoCal (Balboa Island and Del Mar)

February 17, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

More pictures from the road trip. Finally got to the Pacific ocean. Vegas is the next stop.

Episode #134 of The Clarey Podcast!

February 18, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

A short podcast where Cappy recounts his latest motorcycling adventures and opines about random stuff.

Debt Is the Only Problem

February 19, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Brilliant.

Do Women Want Justice or Drama?

February 19, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Whether it's authentic cases in the case of the feminist being groped, or an outright false rape accusation like Mattress Girl Emma Sulkowicz, or a questionable one like my ex girlfriend, it's nothing more than the dopamine high women get when they stir up drama and controversy, playing the ultimate trump card of "sexual assault" to rally and rile the masses of men to give them so much attention they might OD on it.

And while I wish I could say this was only "demented women," nearly all women will belabor you with their problems, NOT to solve them, but simply to play off of your male instincts for justice or simple kindness as a ploy to hold you hostage to get attention. This is an absolute insult to men and it should never be tolerated.

Say Good Bye to Military Pensions

February 22, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Looks like the military got wise to me and is phasing out pensions. Damn

The Father Could Not Be Reached for Comment

February 22, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Ahhhhh, actresses who raise adopted kids without fathers. A recipe for success.

Why Twitter's Politics Ultimately Doesn't Matter

February 22, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

With the much publicized removal of Milo Yiannopoulus' Twitter account's "authenticity", not to mention the outright removal of various controversial conservative twitterers' Twitter accounts, many on the right are up in arms about what seems to be a purposed, biased, and leftist agenda by Twitter to essentially limit the speech of those on the right.

Does Twitter have the right to do such things?
Yes.

Should Twitter ban anybody?
No.

Is Twitter's bias to the left?
Yes.

Should we form another "alternative Twitter?"
Yes.

But all of this debate and kerfuffle about Twitter and how they seem to have it out for non-leftists is moot because while it is immoral and wrong to let politics influence what is effectively an avenue of speech, the simple truth is...

Twitter is not going to exist much longer.

The cold hard truth is that Twitter is not financially viable. It's bankrupt, it's insolvent, and unless they start making some killer profit in the next 6 months they are either going to have to file for bankruptcy or find a VERY charitable investor to infuse their money-losing operation with tons of cash just to keep it afloat another couple years.

You can look at the details here and here, but after issuing "convertible notes" (which is just a fancy term for "borrow money") on the order of $1.8 billion in 2014, the company simply lost ANOTHER $500 million in 2015 like it did in 2014. This is in addition to the perpetual string of annual losses it has ran since...well..forever, and is proof the company is just not a profitable concern.

But what is particularly interesting about this Dotcom Bomb v. 2.0 are two items.

One, if you look at their cash flow statement the majority of "investments" they make are not in property, plant, or equipment, but marketable securities (stocks and bonds). This would be normal if Twitter were a hedge fund or an investment bank. But since it's a social media tech company, it's a sign they don't have faith in their core business and seem to think dumping the proceeds from that $1.8 billion loan into the stock market is a better investment.

Two, the media's BLATANT attempt to mask Twitter's financial problems as "growing pains" or just "standard operating procedure" for a start up (search any new article about Twitter's finances).

I'm sorry, but NO, this is PRECISELY the same BS I saw in the run up to the Dotcom bubble and the housing bubble as well. Charlatan Wall Street talking heads drowning you with pablum to obfuscate the fact this company is a money-losing craphole and has no value. I don't know how many bubbles we have to go through where a company loses half a billion dollars a year (after year...after year...after year) before sanity sinks into the heads of retail and institutional investors and they realize "Oh, crap! This company is garbage!" but apparently it's happening here again. I'm too tired to find out why this is this time (politics, feel good pretty lies, connections, big money backing, etc.), but buying a company that is losing all of its real equity balance every year is like paying somebody to punch you in the face. It plain doesn't make sense.

Ultimately, my point about Twitter is not one of finances or economics. It's not even one of politics. It's one of philosophy.

Look, yes, I know Twitter may have a bias against anybody not-left. I know Twitter likely has leftists working at its helm and in its ranks. And I know it's dishonorable to ban people for their political opinions. But it ultimately doesn't matter what Twitter does politically because unless it's bailed out by a rich benefactor, it's going to inevitably run out of money and shut down. The only way it can continue to exist is if the democrat party (or a branch thereof) continues to perpetually fund it as a money-losing, but press-releasing media arm (which I would not be surprised if they do).

Otherwise, may I suggest for both of you on the right and left who use it as a social media press-release tool to start finding an alternative? Because that which cannot go on forever, won't.

Aaron Clarey is a mean, hate filled economist who unleashes his hatred upon society by telling the truth and putting reality above people's feelings. You can hire him at his consultancy, Asshole Consulting. You may also buy his latest book "Curse of the High IQ" where he explains why you are surrounded by a world full of idiots.

Thank You Dr. Helen!

February 23, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Of PJ Media fame!

Cappy's Las Vegas Adventure

February 24, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Including Oatman, AZ too!

WELCOME TO LAKE MEAD
NATIONAL RECREATION AREA

DO NOT ENTER

Episode #135 of The Clarey Podcast!

February 24, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Podcasting with the GReat Matt Baldoni
Being on the road and homesickness
Evolution of internet media
MGTOWs and VirginTOWs
Las Vegas night clubs suck
How the internet destroyed fliers

AND MORE!!!

In THIS EPISODE of The Clarey Podcast!

The Epitome of Vanity

February 25, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Seriously, I know the Baby Boomers and the Gen Xer's were vain, but we NEVER named a fucking magazine after our generations.

Unless the owners of the magazines are savvy Boomers/X'ers who know to pander to the egos of the Millennials.

Megyn "With a Y" Kelly

February 25, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

As she approaches President Trump's election to the White House

Kill That Cunt Now

February 25, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

And I don't care if she's "15 and confused."

The Tough and Tortured Life of Today's Millennials

February 26, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

I think I'm going to now officially declare the Millennials now officially more spoiled than the Baby Boomers and Gen X.

Seemingly More Fake Rape Stories Than Real Ones

February 26, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Just noticed something. The majority of stories about rape are about false rape accusations than real rape victims. If this is any proxy, my logical mind is only going to be forced to believe the majority of women are crying wolf and are not to be trusted. Sorry, I just don't have any more fucks to give.

New Pilot Program for Cappy Cap

February 27, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

On account my voice is nasally and not "Sean Connery-esque" not to mention I don't have the patience for scripted readings, I'm entertaining enlisting the help of audio professionals to read posts since I know many of you don't like to read, but rather would listen. Would very much appreciate your input on the young man who was kind enough to offer this as an audition sample:

Welcome Refugees!

February 27, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Fucking hilarious!

Omnipresent Noise of Gen X Bar Owners

February 28, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

My friend called me and said, "Hey, we're going to be near your neck of the woods and a band is playing at one of the local bars. Do you want to join us and attend?"

Naturally, because of the convenience I agreed and was looking forward to my friend and her friends visit.

However, upon walking into the bar I realized they decided to bivouac right in front of the monstrously loud band, in part because the birthday girl of the party rarely got out, and also in part because of this group's naivety about bars. They were of the married-with-children variety and so, of course, ANY bar with ANY music must be a better bar than one without. Still, this did not forgive the fact that the band was so loud and their proximity to it so close that it was literally impossible to have a conversation. It was so bad that for the first time in my life my friend and I were having a text conversation when we were no more than 1 foot away from each other. It LITERALLY was the best way to communicate.

Time warp back a mere two weeks ago and a similar such situation also occurred. I was at La Casa, one of my favorite cigar lounges in Las Vegas. It was Friday night so naturally it was mandatory the lounge hire a loud and amplified band to blare music into what was normally a quiet and serene cigar lounge during the day. The music was so loud that when I was trying to buy my cigar the connoisseur could not hear me and said, "what?" which prompted me to yell (with full intent to imply he fucktardedly hired a band that was too loud)

I WANT A V CUT AND A DIET COKE!!!!

He jumped back because I yelled so loud, but you could see in his eyes that maybe...

just maybe...

he got the fact that the band he hired was maybe...

just maybe...

a weeeeeee bit too loud since people one foot away from him had to blare out his ear drum so he could understand which type of cut his customers wanted on their freaking cigars.

Alas, it is time for a plea to all the bars, cigar lounges, night clubs, and venues in America for one simple thing.

Turn down the fucking music.

I know that as the 50's have faded so too has the quality, caliber, intelligence and wit of your average American. I know the baby boomers lacked the Cary Grant and Walter Matthau charm that was an acquired skill needed to woo and whittle people's fancies, so they introduced Woodstock, concerts, and bars as the usurper to ballroom dancing to meet one's mate. And I know that today your modern day Gen X'ers and Millennials lack any conversational skills whatsoever and are in desperate need of "noise" to cover this gaping inadequacy so they might futilely "grind" or stumble their way to a stable, divorce-proof nuclear family.

But in constantly making venues so loud, so cacophonous, you are denying Americans (and westerners) the much-needed training they need to hone, practice, and develop their charismatic and conversational skills. And by association, their ability to become charming, intellectual, wooing, engaging, interesting, and devastating adults. And that is a price society pays in spades.

I know, I know, it's easier for the mop-headed sheeple inferiors of society to just walk into a sports bar with blaring music to yell at a girl

"I THINK YOU'RE HAWT!!!!!"

or

"CAN I BUY YOU A DRINK!!???"

as they slightly tilt their flat-brimmed cap 3 degrees to the left.

And I know, I know the entire night club industry heavily relies on loud blaring music to make it impossible for a man to get to know a girl, but still enable him to buy her drinks.

I know.

But in the end, this bullshit will end. And here's the reason why.

Teh interwebz.

In addition to buttfucking the snooty east coast New York publishing houses with self publishing

and

In addition to ass-raping the arrogant west cost recording labels with iTunes and MP3's the internet has now usurped the dating/meat market from night clubs and bars to that of online dating, social media, and just general digital flirtation.

I've been out of the dating market for about 7 years, but if I ever had to go back I would NEVER set foot into a night club a bar a discotech or a "hot spot"

ever again.

I'd be on the internet the entire time because....

well...

it's quiet.

And I can listen to jazz or the Cowboy Bebop soundtrack all while trying to land me some play.

That is the impossible competition you idiot "noise pimps" are competing against today.

But at least in the 90's there was a low enough volume level that you could theoretically and practically speak to girls. I know many times at First Avenue (Prince's former club) it was not IMPOSSIBLE to speak with a woman using the English language. But at this latest bar and this latest cigar lounge, forget it. You noise whores have jacked up the volume SO MUCH there was ABSOLUTELY no way to not only woo a woman with charm, wit, and charisma, but I couldn't plain have a fucking conversation with my friends. And while you bar/cigar lounge/night club owners may be 100% right that today's single, inept, intellectually-retarded rejects lack the intellectual capacity for ANY intelligent conversation, blaring music so loud to assist them as a handicap merely drives every one of genuine value and worth away.

We'd simply like to hear what the person 12 FUCKING INCHES AWAY FROM US ARE SAYING, even though you think we're so lacking in intelligence we need your loud blaring noise to absolve us of the "chore" of conversation.

Regardless, it doesn't matter.

The generational migration is moving from the night club to online. This is where the VAST majority of millennials and Gen "Z-er's" interact socially (and romantically) and (since these are the younger, and thus hotter people) soon the stereotypical loud bar will be obsolete, and thus a thing of the past. It will be a museum memorial to the Gen X and Baby Boomer generations. It will be as pathetic as the "our time" baby boomer dating site or Oprah's and the women's magazine industry's attempt to convince 60 year old women they're still hot and "cougars." And the more and more you attempt to compensate for the fact people have no social skills, making the music so loud conversation is impossible, the more and more intelligent and competent people you will drive away.

Soon, just like Florida or Sturgis, you'll have nothing but wrinkly, pruny-boobed Gen X, intellectually-inferior gray hairs coming into your club hoping to get a taste of geriatric Z-Cavaricci ass as they reminisce about the 80's and get nostalgic about "Iron Maiden" and "The Scorpions." Which will be fine.

Because most will be deaf by that age anyway.

So please, turn up the music just a little bit more. I think I could actually hear that fount of intelligence my buddy 10 inches away from me said. And I wouldn't want to hear anything intelligent in a public social setting because that shitty ass band you hired is doing a shitty ass rendition of Kurt Cocaine's crappy ass 90's song so loud it's more important I waste some brain cells listening to that shit than merely hearing music in the background while at the same time....

GASP!!!!!

BEING ABLE TO HAVE A CONVERSATION!!!!

Oh, I'm sorry...

BEING ABLE TO HAVE A CONVERSATION!!!

Redheads in Hot Tubs

February 28, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

All love "Curse of the High IQ!"

Karma Does In Fact Exist…Thank God

February 28, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

The Clarey Podcast - "The Return of Cappy" Episode

February 29, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Cappy returns to HQ and talks about:

His triumphal return, crickets, and wanderlust
The one bad review of "Curse of the High IQ"
Using jail to avoid alimony
Is Oprah losing her influence?
Idiots who wore Raiders jackets in the 90's
1,428 in business finally goes bankrupt
Why is there debt???

And more!!!

In THIS EPISODE of The Clarey Podcast!

Motorcycles, Donkeys, IQ's and More

March 1, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

In my latest interview with Kerry Lutz!

This Would Have Prevented the Housing Crisis

March 2, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

And would have made my job a lot easier.

Improve Upon the Prototype

March 2, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

The tone of this post will at first seem arrogant and pompous. Please read the post in its entirety as that is not its intent.

The past decade of internet access has brought about many revolutions and upheavals in society. And for those of you in Cappyland one of the more notable ones has been the rediscovery, amassing, fine-tuning, and creation of an amazing array of masculine wisdom, philosophy, and empiricism. This amazing array has manifested itself into what we roughly refer to as "The Manosphere" and has, truthfully, saved the lives of what I estimate to be millions of young men (and women).

The founders of this philosophy, frankly, had to build it not only from scratch, but...

1. Through trial and error
2. With no ability to compare notes across the world via the internet
3. All while operating under false premises various political and social forces forced on society through decades' worth of propaganda.

and

4. While having no clue whether it was them or the world that was insane.

This resulted in an enormous mental, psychological, emotional, financial and physical toll paid by these founders. Entailing anything from being shot down by over thousands of women just to prove a correlation, to wasting their youths on worthless degrees and careers, these men spent decades of their lives exploring this new sociological and psychological frontier, laying the ground work and mapping it out so that future generations would not only be able to navigate it successfully, but be spared the pain of having to learn it for themselves.

Normally these "founders" would be called "visionaries," "pioneers," "revolutionaries," and "leaders." And many of you have been kind enough to bestow upon us those humbling titles. However, the truth is that we aren't so much visionaries or pioneers as much as we are...

guinea pigs.

And there's a lesson to learn here.

Previous to the internet it was nearly impossible to overcome and override society's media, governmental, and educational institutions. They had a monopoly on the information network by which nearly all data, thoughts, philosophies, and theories were disseminated to society. This made any development of a counter-theory very difficult because you had no idea of the sheer volume and omnipresence of lies that were being told and maintained. Ergo, if you started trusting your eyes and said,

"You know, I think western girls are batshit insane."

or

"You know, these baby boomer-led corporate American employers seem to be a racket."

society would come crushing down on you calling you a "misogynist" or "not a team player."

This caused an inordinate amount of mental torture as what you were witnessing with your very own eyes conflicted with what society was screaming at you. Not only did this make advancing and achieving success in life nearly impossible (ie-doing what society demanded ALWAYS led to failure) but if you dared to question society, they would ostracize you and ensure you paid a price. Still, for some the insanity and lack of success was invariably too much to bear. And with absolutely no success (and therefore, nothing to lose) some truly bold (and desperate) men started rejecting society, risking the ostracization, punishment, and pain society constantly threatened.

Sure enough, since they were basing their decisions in reality they started finding success in life. More of them were getting laid. More of them were starting successful businesses. And many of them starting to find true happiness in life. But you must understand however, just what a Herculean and ballsy effort this was pre-internet. There was no way to confirm whether they were on the right track until they threw away convention and their entire lives to take this risk...all in the face of SCREAMING opposition. These are the true pioneers and Daniel Boones of our time.

Then came the internet.

Even with the internet, it still took a decade of testing, note comparison, and wandering in the desert to slowly, but surely crystallize the laws, theories, wisdom, and philosophies we have today. But sure enough, just like the pioneers of 30 years past who dared to question convention in the 80's, these "internet pioneers" of the past 15 years achieved the same. They dared to believe their eyes, they dared to think independently, and they dared to give a lying-society the finger. And now, for the first time since the 1950's, they not only had the answers humankind previously spent millennia discovering, but with the help of the internet were disseminating it to the masses.

And because of all that, nobody, from here on into the future, has to endure that hell ever again.

Naturally, you may look favorably upon these "pioneers." Roosh, Roissy, Rollo, myself, Tom Leykis, Cernovich, Molyneux, Paul Elam, and the many others who laid this foundation. You may even view us as "dad" or the "older brother you never had" (which we are humbled for). But the truth is we were just a bunch of guys that were sick of it, had nothing left to lose, and decided we weren't going to go off quietly into the night. We're no different than you, we just happened to have been born before you were.

Ergo, it is a vital and important lesson that every reader in the Manosphere, alt-right, Neo-masculinity, etc., needs to learn that you should not be aiming to become like us, but you should be aiming to improve upon us and surpass us. And not just by a marginal amount, but by leaps and bounds.

The sheer decades of time, labor, money, and mental resources that you will save learning from the wisdom that has been unearthed is astounding.

First, consider education. If it were up to previous generations past, you'd be stuck in a viscous progressive-credentialism black hole, earning your doctorate in "14th Century Transgendered Latino Sculpture Studies" that not only would sap you of all your youth until you were darn well near 30, but condemn you to financial servitude until you were 60. The sheer savings on this alone would be $100,000 in wasted tuition and 20 years in wasted life.

Second, courting, dating and marriage.

The amount of mental pain and anguish young men suffered in the 70's-90's, thinking there was something wrong with them when the girls they were trying to date stood them up,

threw temper tantrums for no reason,
spermjacked them,
played mind games,
and
a limitless litany of other psychologically-draining psychotic bullshit, is incalculable.

But image how much pain and agony would have been saved that if at the age of 14 young boys weren't told:

"It's your fault if the girl's unhappy."
"Just be yourself."
"Maybe you attract the wrong type of girl"

but instead were just simple told,

"Most girls are batshit insane, love drama, and need a strong man to stand up to them."

Hundreds of billions of hours of psychological pain across hundreds of millions of men would have been spared.

And this doesn't even include the incalculable savings young men are spared today being fully warned about the risks of marriage, divorce, alimony, cuckoldry, and child support.

Again, you add to the two decades and $100,000 you saved yourself not majoring in a stupid subject, the $500,000 in alimony and child support, not to mention another decade of your life wasted, you're $600,000 and three decades ahead of your contemporaries.

Third, economics. Specifically, minimalism.

While society and convention is pushing you to get that $100,000 liberal arts degree, followed by a $50,000 car, a $600,000 McMansion, and a wife and children who are likely to beget an additional $100,000 in life-long credit card debt, the "Wisdom of the Manosphere" tells you it can all be replaced with a used car, a skilled trade, a cheap studio apartment, a used motorcycle, and network of loving, caring people. I'll say it again for the cheap seats,

"The most important thing in life is other people."

And once you realize that, you can save yourself an easy $500,000 in lodging expenses, $100,000 in life long car expenses, $100,000 in credit card debt for crap you don't need...not to mention...find yourself a decent quality girl...instead of a psychopath with tits and a spending problem attached to it.

There are certainly many more ways the wisdom of the Manosphere will save you time, money, and psychological pain, but if you add it all up it is amazing the leg-up you have over your pre-internet predecessors.

Well over $1 million in life time financial savings.
Well over 50 years of your life not wasted.
And the psychological pain you've avoided is as priceless as it is immeasurable.

It is from this enviable position, assuming you take the time to study, understand, and incorporate this knowledge into your own lives, that you can blow past all the "pioneers" and "visionaries" who founded this philosophy and leave us in the dust. If you play your cards right you will make more money than we do, save more money than we ever will, work a fraction as hard, endure a fraction of the psychological pain, slay more ladies, and live happier and better lives than what we could ever imagine. You will also be able to advance the philosophy, and thus the progress of men (as well as women), to heights we "founders" will unfortunately not be alive to see. But that in itself will be such an intellectual treat, I predict that will make your lives all that much better.

The most common lament I hear from my colleagues in this world is:

"Had I known back then, what I do now."

But for you guys it is not a lament nor regret. It's a reality if you choose to accept it.

---

http://www.soundcloud.com/aaron-clarey
http://www.assholeconsulting.com
https://www.youtube.com/user/AaronClarey
https://twitter.com/aaron_clarey
http://www.amazon.com/Aaron-Clarey/e/B00J1ZC350/
Amazon Affiliate

Real Musicians Don't Major in Music

March 3, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

The Great Matt Baldoni sent me this article. In short it is the music education industry desperately trying to further convince future students to part with their hard earned money to pursue a degree in music. This, of course, is nothing but a racket by talentless wanna-be-musicians who are so talentless nobody will pay them for their music...but naive 17 year old, aspiring musicians will.

Regardless, I just couldn't let this one go and made the following comment. I'm posting it here on account it's almost a guarantee they won't authorize it.

Heh, way to skew a "study."

First, to take Music EDUCATION majors and claim they work in the music field is misleading. They work in EDUCATION, not music. And stingingly prove "those who can't do, teach."

And 1 in 2 music majors make some modicum of money playing gigs? Really? A hobby they had a passion for, and were likely to pursue regardless of whether they're forked over $80,000 to professors who also could not do, and ergo taught, played anyway?

Then you add these two ratios together and get a 75% participation rate? Hilarious!

Yeah, keep selling young 17 year old musicians those unnecessary degrees in music because all you guys could do was teach and that's all you'll ever be paid for.

Certainly feel free to make a comment to let little ole "Bill Zuckerman" know how the adults in this world know his little racket is up.

Turning Trump into a Perot or Nader

March 4, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

I largely avoid politics as it is pointless, futile, bad for my blood pressure, and frankly, where the pigs wrestle in the mud. However, if you'll permit me this one, well-placed sniper shot, I would appreciate it.

The Republican establishment can yell scream pout threaten

and stamper their little feet

about Trump.

But you better get behind him. Because if you don't, and you dare nominate somebody OTHER than Trump, his voters are the type to vote for him anyway and they WILL split the vote. You'll lose the election (like you always do) and then you'll pussyfoot around hitting up your blue blood donors to "Help Fight the Hillary Express!" and this country will go down like it deserves because there's nobody with balls left.

Feminist Ghostbusters: Epic Fail

March 4, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Despite all the warning signs, the feminists, leftists, SJW's, and the IDIOT financial backers of the film are going to ensure it's the greatest flop ever:

Feminist Ghostbusters Going Bust

March 5, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

There is not much to say about the upcoming feminist movie “Ghostbusters.” For those of us who aren’t in the echo chamber of Hollywood and the media, we see this movie for what it is - a truly inferior, slipshod affirmative action piece that is so blatant in its pandering towards “team woman” it’s pretty much insulting everybody. It’s so bad even avid consumers of “Round House Kicking Chick Cop Shows” aren’t swallowing it, as evidenced by its trailer receiving more downvotes than a Hitler speech in a synagogue.

But for Hollywood, and by Hollywood, I mean Sony Entertainment, they are so blinded by political correctness, not to mention the fad of taking anything men have made and slapping a “woman” sticker on it, they are completely unaware as to the millions of dollars they’re going to lose on this guaranteed-to-flop movie. And it is here Hollywood could stand to learn a lesson about the market it’s trying to sell such slop to, as well as a lesson "The Sheeple Society of America" could learn about how Hollywood views them.

Yes, your average American is an idiot. And yes, you average American woman can be sold a bill of goods if you merely slap the label of “rah rah female” on it. But what Sony did was take a hallmark of American culture, a genuine apolitical cinematic classic that young and old hold dear to their heats, and shit all over it with politics. And even the most ardent feminists doesn’t like to see her childhood heroes defecated upon.

It’s one thing to take obscure comic book heroes, even notable ones, and kill off all the male/white characters. This is done daily by the basement-dwelling SJW nerds in the bowels of Marvel’s money-losing comic book department. And you can certainly float trial balloons about turning somebody like James Bond into a black man. But you NEVER take valued and beloved cultural icons like The Ghostbusters and castrate them, let alone invest money into such a stupid and bigoted venture. And thus Hollywood (and certainly Sony) is about to learn that this dumber-than-hell strategy of merely “feminizing” or “de-whiting” movies that were already made won’t sell if it’s so blatant that even your average American idiot can see what you’re doing.

Turning a secondary character like Felix in James Bond from a blond Texan to a black guy?
Sure. Nobody will notice.

Making a movie about a one-armed woman and calling it “Mad Max?”
Maybe. Just make sure there’s a flame-throwing guitar player to distract the sheeple.

But taking a childhood hero classic like Ghostbusters and smothering it in “vag?”
No, nobody’s falling for it.

In the end Hollywood needs to take a lesson from the democrat party in Washington DC – If you want to sell shit to minorities and women you need to cover it in soft racism and bigotry. It can't be obvious what you're doing because even the most left-wing minority's pride and self-respect will be insulted. But don't worry, over time you will gently nudge Overton's window to the left enough that SOME in society will accept a black James Bond, a transvestite Captain Kirk, and an all female Ghostbusters.

Just don't' expect these copy-cat, affirmative action, wanna-be movies to be anywhere near as good as the originals. And don't be shocked when society revolts because they're sick and tired of you trying to shove political-vag down their throats.

Say Hi to Dutch For Us

March 6, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

And thanks for supporting the country through supporting the best president in my lifetime.

Audio Version of "Improve Upon the Stereo Type"

March 7, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Good Luck to Smart Men Finding Equally Intelligent Wives

March 7, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Dr. Helen's first take on "Curse of the High IQ"

The Father Could Not Be Reached for Comment

March 8, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Not that it would have mattered in this emo Millennial's case anyway.

Remember, Free Redhead…

March 9, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

with every purchase!

Also, just finished making edits and correcting typos in the book. The "revised" version (with the whopping 4 legitimate typos corrected) should be already uploaded and available for sale.

The Triggering Shall Continue

March 10, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Until humans accept reality and truth and no longer require triggering.

BLM and SJW's Defined Perfectly

March 10, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

You may find the artist's site here.

Why You Should Sell Lies to Sheeple

March 11, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

As I go further down this rabbit hole, it is almost no longer a debate as to whether one should capitalize on people's sheepleness, naivety, and insatiable thirst for lies.

Fuck You Mizzou!

March 11, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

20% decline and $32 million deficit at racist school that hates whites.

Surprise surprise.

Cause I Think I Still Might Have a Chance

March 11, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

How Communism Used Feminism and Women to Destroy the US

March 11, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

The audio/video version:

Sex, Drugs, and Finance Reviews IQ

March 11, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Many thanks to our Canadian colleague up north.

The Selous Scouts: A Repost

March 13, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

As you guys know I like to delete lesser posts in an effort to declutter the ole blog. But a professional race-whore complained my link to the podcast about the Selous Scouts was racist because it was about the Rhodesian War, even though the purpose of linking to it was to highlight the Selous Scouts remarkable espionage and infiltration skills. ie-it would be like linking to a post about about mechanic ability of the Tiger Tank, and being accused of being anti-Semitic.

Of course, the professional victim thought the post was taken down because I was fear I'd be called a racist. So I just wanted to repost it as it was not only interesting, but seems to piss off all the right people.

Make sure to give the History Channel's war podcast an extra amount of downloads!

Gravity Defeats Milleannial

March 13, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Milleannial takes photo.

Details at 6.

Why Political Rallies are Now Obsolete

March 13, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Whether it was at the bar when I saw Fox, CNN, and HLN with their breaking news about Trump's Chicago rally, or my phone blowing up with all the social media comments about it, I calmly set my phone down, returned to my coffee, and continued my conversation with my friends because I knew something about political rallies most people don't. And that is...

They don't matter.

And so before we waste precious hours of our finite lives come Monday morning, listening to the talking heads on talk radio or Fox News be "aghast" at the tyrannical behavior of leftist thugs, let the Ole Captain put things in context for you, so you not only save yourself some blood pressure, but hours of your lives you can't be wasting on what amounts to nothing more than never-ending political soap operas.

First, you need to understand that political rallies are very much like concerts. If you think about it, concerts are stupid. You spend your time and money to drive through rush hour-esque traffic, pay for parking, then like cattle shuffle into a euphemistically called "auditorium," where the acoustics are so poor a tinny 1930's radio sounds better. Yes you get to see "your band," but the truth is for a fraction of the cost and hassle, you could have just stayed at home, fired up your MP3 player, with your home stereo system and enjoyed a much higher quality of music than what you'd hear at any concert.

Political rallies are the same thing. You would have done a lot more had you stayed at home, penned off three letters to your congressman, donated what you would have paid for in parking or gas to your candidate's campaign fund, or merely wrote a thoughtful piece to convince your FB friends to vote for your candidate.

Second, political rallies are obsolete. If this were the 1880's, sure. Political rallies would have made sense. Your only form of media was newspapers and a visual display of mass numbers of people may inspire (or intimidate) others to vote a certain way. But with television, radio, not to mention this thing called "the internet," the mass groupings of people to convince the king he was 10 minutes from the guillotine if he didn't change aren't necessary. A flood of e-mails, polls, or just watching the news will inform people and politicians what the nation thinks, much more than a mass of rally goers.

Third, the numbers of rallies no longer mean anything.

Trump claims there were 35,000 people at his rally in Chicago. Which is fine and great, but...

Tennessee, just one state, experienced a 17% increase in primary votes, with a 2-1 margin of those being Republicans (all I'd say due to Trump), before any major rallies.

You do some quick math and those extra 56,000 Tennessean voters, 2/3rds of which were Trump-inspired Republican primary votes means without a rally, just the mere internet and news coverage of Trump, ONE moderately populated state produced 37,000 primary votes for Trump.

And VOTES are what matters, not attendees to a rally.

In other words, just like concerts, only die hard fans attend political rallies. But also just like concerts, musicians don't much care about concert attendance as much as they do album sales, and ergo, politicians should be more concerned about prompting the silent majority to vote (ie - "buy their album") than merely attend their concert.

And Trump has obviously done that.

Fourth, political rallies are horrendously inefficient and horrendous wastes of resources, especially in the internet era.

In light of point #1, I remember attending ONE political rally and it's inefficiency became very apparent to me. No politician saw us, I could not see how we would make a difference, and in the end it cost me about half a day of my time. Had I instead done something else aside from standing there with a sign, it would have gone a much longer way to defeat the legislation I was hoping to defeat.

Now imagine you take that 4 hours (and say, $20 in gas and parking), and multiply that times the 35,000 Trump supporters at the Chicago rally.

Instead of the shit show anti-American, racist, socialist thugs made it, it could have instead been:

140,000 hours of Trump volunteers making calls to potential supporters.
140,000 well-thought pieces written to newspapers, new shows, talk shows, and social media
140,000 hours of people writing counter-pieces against Cruz, Bernie, Hillary, or Move On.org.
140,000 hours of canvassing, postering, etc.
$750,000 in donations ($20 in expenses those 35,000 could have donated instead)

And if you pro-rate those human hours at a $15/hour wage, that's $2.1 million these rally goers could have worked and donated to his campaign anyway.

And that's just Chicago!

Of course, the Ole Captain knows his SAEG (TM) will never be fully realized and to get political candidates to think with this laser like level of precise logic, let alone hire Asshole Consulting as an advisory, is wishful thinking. But that doesn't mean we individuals have to make the same mistake twice. So don't waste your time this upcoming Monday listening to the talk shows analyzing something that TRULY doesn't matter. Spend the time instead defeating socialism in a manner that is useful, practical, and effective instead.

---

http://www.soundcloud.com/aaron-clarey
http://www.assholeconsulting.com
https://www.youtube.com/user/AaronClarey
https://twitter.com/aaron_clarey
http://www.amazon.com/Aaron-Clarey/e/B00J1ZC350/
Amazon Affiliate

How NOT to Get Women in STEM

March 14, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Please don't have liberal arts majors taking photos of other liberal arts majors playing "make believe STEM women." Just buy a girl you care about, who you want to do well in college, this simple book.

Rape: The Police Department vs. The Women's Studies Department

March 15, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

I may be a bit partial. But still....ah-freaking-hem

Pay particular attention to the "rape" statistics.

A Damn Fine Podcast

March 15, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

From our friend Chris Bechtloff.

Those Who Lived Under Communism

March 15, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Can tell you ignorant spoiled American fucks what it was like to live under communism.

Episode #139 of The Clarey Podcast!

March 16, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Drinking because you're bored
Thug notes and Atlas Shrugged
Financial Markets no longer exist
Voters don't choose the candidates
Venezuelan Socialist Paradise

AND MORE!

In THIS EPISODE of The Clarey Podcast!

What You REALLY Ought to Look for in a Woman

March 17, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

An Asshole Consulting request that I found worth sharing.

Leprechaun Economist Explains (again) Capitalism, Socialism, and Communism

March 17, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

The Father Could Not Be Reached for Comment

March 18, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

We don't need no STIIINNNNNNNKINNNNNG FATHERS!!!!

"Before Cappy Was Evil" Special Episode of The Clarey Podcast

March 18, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Too lazy to write a post and wanted to talk about

Stalin, WWIII
Human psychology
and
"Before I was Evil"

Death of the Baby Boomer Journalism Industry

March 19, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

1. You lied to the American people, putting your leftist ideology ahead of journalism.
2. Admit it, you were lazy and didn't want to study math back in 1960.
3. Admit it, you never intended to report news, but wanted to "change the world" as well as force your opinion on it.
4. You will never become David Frost. You could if any one of you wanted to really look at Hillary Clinton,but we know that violates #1 and #3.
5. We Gen X'ers and Millennials thank you very much for letting us have the entire internet to replace your old, outdated, corrupt, and obsolete "journalism" business model. It was awfully nice hearing for decades that "you just didn't understand Excel, computers, or the internet."

Now please go FOAD.

Lazy Sunday Linkage

March 20, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Davis Aurini vs. YouTube - a lesson why you need to diversify outside the monopoly of social media.

Eric Andre exposed.

Adam Piggott reviews Curse of the High IQ

Glorious Karl also reviews Curse of the High IQ

Only 1/3 of "Entrepreneurship Professors" Ever Started Companies

March 21, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

I quit my research early only after 31 data points.

And the reason I quit my research early is, frankly, because "I have shit to do." I run a real business, that no matter how obscure, has paying clients unlike today's topic - "Entrepreneurship Professors."
And since I don't have the time to prophecize, theorize, and pontificate all day to naive 20 year olds, I decided 31 datapoints was enough, as it was time to move on with my day.

In short I took the time to scratch a curiosity itch I've had for quite some time:

Precisely what percentage of entrepreneurship professors have experience starting and running a business?

I knew the whole concept of an entrepreneurship degree was flawed (because you get a degree to get hired by an employer - the antithesis of entrepreneurship). And I also knew most professors are scam artists who could never work it in the real world, and thus sell worthless, over priced pieces of paper to naive millennials. But there was also a piece of me who theorized there MUST be some old timer who retired, made their millions, and just wanted to share their experience to help young, budding entreprenuers.

Oh, foolish Cappy. You had an idealistic thought didn't you?

The truth is 66% of the "entrepreneurship professors'" resumes I searched had NO experience in being entrepreneurs. The vast majority of them, like all their professor brethren, were the epitome of "those who can't do, teach." Merely bystanders, spectators, studiers-of, and observers of real entrepreneurs in the real world making real change. Simply the marching band who lacked the talent, skill, and work ethic required to make it on the football team.

But even those who listed "entrepreneurship" experience in their resumes were questionable. A significant amount of professors claimed they were a "founding partner" of some kind of venture capital group. Or sat on some board of a company they invested in. Another great one was where they run some kind of "consulting company" that advises (you guessed it) entrepreneurs on how to start up their companies! A further layer of dubiousness was added when it was obvious nearly ALL these "real world entreprenuers-come-professors" relied on teaching as their primary source of income and NOT (ironically) their super-awesome successful businesses they started. In short,

NOBODY STARTED A FREAKING BUSINESS AND BUILT IT FROM THE GROUND UP! They simply either consulted or invested, but NEVER "entrepreneured."

In short, my suspicions were correct. Not only is entrepreneurship logically a stupid degree, it is just another field of academia that is populated by a world of losers who couldn't hack it in the real world, and now suck off the blood of naive youth to sustain their parasitic existence.

Were there some genuine entrepreneurs who had a passion for business, made their wealth, and wanted to share their experiences?

Of course.

But they are rare for the real entrepreneurs out there are too busy and too successful making money to piss away 4 years of their lives getting a "PhD" in "entrepreneurship" just so academia will deign them "qualified" to teach about the topic.

It is the epitome of "those who can't do, teach" in the world of "entrepreneurship professors."

Post notes:

Research was done by google searching "professor entrepreneurship".
The majority of datapoints/resumes were selected from the Carlson School of Management (which has a surprisingly high percent of real entrepreneurs), Babson, and some other college whose name escapes me now.
If you doubt my figures, or don't like what I'm saying, or don't think 31 datapoints is enough, then you take time out of your precious day to research it (unbiasedly, I'm sure) and come up with your own damn study. I'm sure you have the time. You're an academic. I unfortunately don't. I'm an entrepreneur.

Liberal Success Defined

March 21, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Tee hee, I made a funny!

Friends of Cappy Helping Out Friends of Cappy

March 22, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

From one of our Agents in the Field:

Not often in your life will you be able to make money with almost no effort. But thanks to Aaron's blog, I found a way. Let me explain.

My name is Florian, and I was born and raised in Germany. Yes. Remember the guy who had a run in with ~~Aaron Clarey~~ John McClane on one of his security shifts? My countryman. If that observation is not nerdy enough for you, let me up the ante:

I was always interested in math and sciences, and in my last years of high school I decided to study biochemistry. I wanted to be with all those cool scientists I had read about and seen in the movies and I wanted to know what held them and the world together, so I was completely sold on going all the way to becoming a professor.
I did a PhD in Dresden (Germany) and then came to the US to do postdoctoral work. After years of study and several original research papers, I was close to my goal: becoming a research professor.

All is well that ends well? Almost…

… if it wasn't for this one detail I had not seen when I started my journey: as a scientist, you work 60-80 hours per week, with only minimal contact to the outside world. And this is the exact opposite to what Aaron is teaching us, namely:

1. Don't fuck up.
2. There is nothing more important in life than other people.

Seems I was en route to disregard both principles.

So I took a step back and a good hard look and decided to create ways to transition out of my job - into financial independence and entrepreneurship. Since I had noticed all these ads about Academic Composition on Captain Capitalism, I decided to finally see what it was all about.

Academic Composition is a ghostwriting agency for college papers. You can either become a ghostwriter yourself – if you have good skills in writing Liberal Arts papers – or place ads on Craigslist. These ads are pre-written, all you have to do is post them every two days. Aleksey, the owner of the company, then pays you $5 for every lead you generate.

I started a couple of months ago and have so far made hundreds of dollars for literally nothing. Here are some of the advantages working for Academic Composition:

1. Getting started is easy. Aleksey gives you exact instructions, down to the text of the ads. You just copy-paste them, hit "publish" and you are off to the races.
2. The work is very flexible. You can post whenever and wherever you want. With your home computer, your laptop, your phone… imagine sitting at Starbucks and knowing that a mouse click on your laptop basically takes care of your coffee, while you have enough time to relax or work on another project!
3. Payment is fast and reliable. You send Aleksey the invoice once a week and within minutes, the money is in your paypal account.

And over time, you can take on larger responsibilities and thus earn even more money, all the while learning about posting advertisements and copywriting.

Working with Academic Composition is easily the biggest return on investment I have ever experienced. It sure as hell beats your 9-5 job. No commute. No abrasive boss. Nobody who wants you to do it "their way" when you know there is a better way. And nobody telling you it would be "nice" if you came in on the weekend.

I am incredibly happy that I found this opportunity as I continue to make money for nothing.

Thanks Aaron and Aleksey!

If you are looking to hire or work for Academic Composition please visit:

Aleksey Bashtavenko
Academic Composition
Owner & Principal Writer
(540) 300-1253
academiccomposition@gmail.com
www.academiccomposition.com
www.linkedin.com/pub/aleksey-bashtavenko/25/7b8/323/

HR Meets The Millennials

March 22, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

I love it when cunts collide. It's like Hitler fighting Stalin. They deserve each other and I can just sit and watch for ages.

Terrorist Attacks Again? Yawn

March 22, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

I officially don't care about the terrorist attacks. It is to be expected when democracy and feminism raise Europe's skirt and values diversity above western civilization.

This concludes the political analysis of the terrorist attacks.

Used Panties Economics and Terrorism Episode of The Clarey Podcast

March 22, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

There's nothing to say about the terrorist attacks
The Economics of Used Panties
Corporate Greed
Fan Mail
Traveling to Iceland

AND MORE!!!

In THIS EPISODE of The Clarey Podcast!

Gawker's Financial Statements

March 23, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

I, like many of you, have been watching as Hulk Hogan has beat down Gawker for the POS brown journalism entity that it is. We all like to see evil people lose. We all like to see the likes of Nick Denton see their empires collapse. And we all like to see some semblance of justice and sanity prevail in today's society.

But while we can cheer, the question is will Gawker finally go away?

Mathematically, yes. Gawker will go away. With revenues of $45 million and a a lawsuit, even when paired down, will wipe them out financially, you can safely say Gawker will die as a financially solvent entity. But there are some problems, and this introduces the world of finance.

Nick Denton, the founder of Gawker has a net worth estimated to be $100 million. Of course a lot of that is tied up in the ever decreasing stock of Gawker, and lord knows what other genuine liquid and veritable assets that networth is tied up in, but Nick is a rather well to do man. There is also the issue of outside interests who just view Gawker not as a viable business entity, but merely a smear engine/tool in which case (like I predict Twitter will become) a money losing operation to be used and financed by political forces. Twitter is not viable. Gawker is not viable. But who cares as long as billionaire politicians and crony capitalists will constantly fund their bleeding balance sheets to basically be a press-releasing operation for their political goals. ie - Twitter and Gawker may be bankrupt a million times over, but who cares? They're merely an expense account for political/financial backers to propagate whatever propaganda they desire.

And that is why we need to identify Gawker (and inevitably Twitter) for what it is (and will become).

A money losing media arm of evil political forces.

Look, Gawker was going to lose in the end anyway. Being the biggest and most complete douche of the internet world will not win you any friends in the long run.

Click bait?
Yes.

Traffic in the short term?
Yes.

But a long term viable entity?

No.

But the value Gawker does deliver is a bersmirching/slander tool that can constantly be sued (and filed for bankruptcy, repeatedly) while convincing the ignorant sheeple masses that "X" person is a very very bad man as their attention spans are as long as Nick Denton's dick. That expendable entity DOES have value for politicians.

In short, Gawker will go away, but not the business model and not Nick Denton. There will always be demand for smut, gossip, and character assassination. And there are deep pocket political interests that will always want to hire the cowardly mercenary pussies like Nick Denton to do their character assassinations for them. The real issue is whether society will wake up and realize the Nick Dentons of the world for who they are, or continue to sop up the juicy lies they sell. And if my experience has told me anything the sheeple will always side with the Nick Dentons of the world.

In other words, Nick Denton and Gawker may be bankrupt, but their industry is infinitely more solid and secure than social security. He won't go away and you will see him again. And it's nobody's fault but society's. And frankly, I can't blame him when he returns and makes a mint off of the lemmings that made a disgusting and pathetic business concept like Gawker a viable business entity in the first place. He'll just have a new and improved version of Gawker that will be swallowed whole by society. And thus, Gawker's financial statements really don't matter, because he has the best finances anybody could ever ask for.

Society's vanity.

Why Leftists Don't Love Their Own Children

March 23, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

To put it succinctly, it wasn't fair.

It just wasn't fair.

You always self-judge yourself, wondering if you have the intellectual integrity to validate your own political opinions, but when I ran into this veritable douche-bag it wasn't fair. It just wasn't fair. He was your typical leftist. An ideologue. And like most leftists didn't know jack about

1. the basics of economics
2. the budget
3. debt
4. math

And so the slaughter began.

I'd go into the detail, but it wouldn't matter. We were at the bar. He started spouting shit. I didn't have the patience, plus, I had the experience to know how to defuse AND capitalize on the situation. So when the blabber mouth started to claim the national debt was BETTER under Obama than Bush, I said, "OK, I'll bet you the finest pour of scotch this bar has to offer you're wrong."

Of course he didn't take, because like every leftist, he's not just a pussy, but a hypocrite and a coward.

The moron didn't know whether the debt was worse or better under Obama or Bush. That would've taken effort and research! And why inconvenience the suburbanite poli-sci major-come-realtor with reality and facts? So he blathered on, obviously emotionally vested in the fact I wasn't at the alter of Obama, and came back at me with...

"The economy has never been better!!!!"

To which I responded

"Oh really??? You want to bet the next beer average GDP growth is less now than it has been for the past 10 years???"

Once again, pablum, blathering, and grandstanding, but the coward still wouldn't take my bet.

We did this many times over.

GDP figures lower than Clinton's/Bush's administrations?
5$ bet? Beer tab bet???
No.

Unemployment higher than 5% average under Obama?
Is your opinion worth a $6 beer bet?
No!!!

Government debt to GDP??? Huh? How's that? Is THAT worth a $5 beer bet?
No!!! (it's because GDP means nothing, you understand, to this leftist. It's all the "corporations maaaaan!!!")

In the end the pussy, like all leftists are, wouldn't take any one of the NUMEROUS bets I offered him to prove his numerous opinions were fact or fiction. And so, since the coward wouldn't even put $5 down for a bet, it proves most leftist's opinions aren't even worth $5.

But if it was only $5. For there was something infinitely more valuable this ignorant man was gambling with.

His childrens' futures.

We can go on about whether leftists have the heart or conviction in their beliefs to put down $5 of their own money or not. It is an academic question. But what is grand is that this particular leftist, like many others made a GRAAAAAVVVVEEEE mistake;

He bred.

He has two daughters.

And ohhhhhh, my friends. Does that make the difference.

For while I was trying to engage this fellow into the world of reality (not to mention score a few free drinks off the ignorant fuck) my other buddy who was at the bar watching this debate, was very much like me.

Single Childless Successful and zero fucks left to give

And we knew precisely what authority, wisdom, and position we had.

The irony was that I (along with him) were trying to get this leftist to understand he needed, ABSOLUTELY NEEDED to understand that he was wrong. Not for my ego. Not for my friend's ego. And not even for himself. But for his own god damned children.

His voting and proverbial worship of socialism was not boding well for his children's futures. And even when i tried to explain it clearly to him, he simply dismissed me in a very millennial way of "wow, just wow! OK! I guess we're all nazi's now!" sort of way.

I stood somewhat agape.

You value your own god damned ignorance and intellectual laziness more than you do your own children? Your politics is more important than your children's futures???

It would be hilarious, if it wasn't so sad.

It only convinced me more that leftists are inferior pieces of scum that are so obsessed with their own egos that they'll sell their children's futures out to their own ideology. That they value their own children so lowly that their children are not worth the time to spend 10 minutes looking at the federal budget and evaluating what kind of a future you're voting in for them.

I may have had a vasectomy. I may personally not like children. But apparently I care more about the children who aren't mine more than leftists do their own flesh and blood.

Enjoy that freaking decline baby. Enjoy that freaking decline.

The DJ Bubble Bursts!

March 24, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Oh nosies!!!! Las Vegas is starting to ditch the loud DJ club and (GASP!) put together a quiet lounge where CONVERSATION IS ENCOURAGED?????

I love the change, but precisely where are you going to get conversationalists in today's Gen X and Millennial generations to populate these clubs?

The Little Economy That Coudln't

March 24, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

"Malaise" is how I will forever describe the economy under the Obama administration. Not because he's a socialist, and not because of any ideological difference, but just because that's what it's been. Malaise. RGDP growth has averaged 1.8% under Obama which is less than half of what it used to be during those evil and hated 40's-60's. Even that hated Bush Jr., with the lion's share of The Great Recession's economic contraction in his figures, posted a 2.0% average growth rate. But then I decided to pull up one of those old, boring economic charts I occasionally like to look at:

Inventory to sales.

And you just can't help but toss your hands up into the sky, for it looks like the malaise will continue.

Inventory to sales, though boring, is a ratio I like to look at because it's telling about what you might be able to expect in our economic future. Specifically, it is the ratio of corporate inventories to their sales and this ratio shows how much "stuff" corporations have on hand relatively to how quickly they're selling it (sales).

A decreasing ratio is a good omen for the economy in that if sales are up, that means there's demand for more goods. Additionally, if sales are high relatively to low inventories, that is doubly good in that it implies corporations will have to hire more people to make more goods.

An increasing ratio however, is a bad sign. That means either sales are low, inventories are high, or a combination of both which means low demand AND companies are likely to lay people off to eat through excess inventories.

Historically, you'll notice two things about the inventory to sales ratio. One, you can see it spike right before recessions, and, two, a general downward trend (as inventory management techniques have constantly been lowering the amount of inventory relative to sales). But during pretty much ALL of the Obama administration this ratio has been going up, especially so these past two years.

This isn't to say that I'm going to predict recession starting tomorrow. Nor, is this to say employers are going to start cutting back on employees next week. The truth is since the TARP bail outs, QE-X, and the fact the US has the world's reserve currency, neither our markets nor economy is functioning how they should, and predicting them is even more laughably impossible than it was before. But I will take one huge gamble. There isn't going to be any booming economic growth nor massive hiring sprees we experienced under Reagan in 1983 or Clinton in 1998 in the near future. The malaise will continue until Obama leaves the presidency, and even then no real recovery will happen unless President Trump and an agreeable congress decide they want to aggressively pursue policies that result in a booming economy.

Regardless, for any of you millennials or young Gen X'ers that wanted that white picket fence, a nuclear family, and a stable career that could provide for them all, think again. That American dream will not be available to you.

The DJ Bubble Continues to Burst - Part 2

March 25, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

When the guy from Bar Rescue tells you it's over, it's over.

Why Too Much Social Media is Toxic

March 25, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Many of you no doubt heard about the AI bot Microsoft let loose on teh social medias and then became a Hitler, racist, conspiracy theorist. But it got me thinking. If this was merely a non-sentient program, then the results were 100% the by-product of the internet environment "she" was let into. Of course I don't know much about AI, but it leads me to an observation;

If this is the default state or "most logical route" of social media, then

1. A lot of people are consciously choosing NOT to become a racist, Hitler, conspiracy theorist and

2. Those that stick in this environment for a long time must, at some level, suffer some kind of psychological toll or pay some kind of psychological price.

In other words, if this is the results on a robot, humans need to UNPLUG every once in a while.

SJW's Hate Women in STEM

March 25, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

This was a bunch of poppycock somebody sent me. An info-graphic claiming if women just achieved equality in the world then there'd be another $28 trillion for us to spend...on a bunch of problems that would never be solved anyway.

Regardless, my favorite part of the entire info-graphic is not the outlandish bullshit and numbers these math-impaired idiots pulled fresh out of their asses.

Nor is the "may" "could" "possibly" put behind every claim they could churn up an additional $28 trillion.

But that in all the ways they proposed to close the gap between women and men STEM WAS NOT MENTIONED ANYWHERE!!!

Which led to me to observe this isn't about actually closing the wage gape as much as it is another opportunity for these worthless SJW's to masturbate their egos while solving NONE of the problems in the world they all ferociously claim they want to solve.

Thankfully, they comment section is open (for now) and you don't have to register or anything.

Why Every Leftist Needs to Listen to Khrushchev

March 26, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

I've been listening to a podcast series called the "Russian Rulers History Podcast" and it has given me a better, more thorough, and more-informed course in Russian History than I'm sure any of the hacks posing as liberal arts colleges would. It has provided me a lot of understanding about communism, its origins, as well as the reason it came about in Russia. However, in this particular episode I am amazed to hear, out of Nikita Khrushchev own mouth, his opinions on communism and economics in Russia.

Not because he is basically admitting the economic policies of communism are failing his people.

And not because (unlike pretty much every previous leader of Russia) he dares to admit it.

But because of his complete naivety and cluelessness about economics.

I would have figured an ardent communist, a former leader of the USSR, when writing his memoirs would have a FULLY REHEARSED, SCRIPTED, and POLISHED explanation as to why there was no food, toilet paper or meat available to the Russian people (especially under his reign). But it is amazing the man who was once pounding his shoe, telling the "Imperialist Western Capitalist Pigs" he would bury us, admits his economic policies are failing.

The thing that really gets me though is how apparent it is he just doesn't get it. Here's a man in his 60's, maybe 70's, who went through the communist system his entire life, from the lowest ranked pledge in the youth communist party, to the premier of the Soviet Union, and if you ask him "why isn't there enough bread?" he has no answers.

He has great observations.
He has great explanations.
His logic about how people reaction and behave in an economy is sound.

But when it comes to solutions, all he can say is "I just don't get it."

Perhaps he was too brainwashed to realize how free markets and free people would have solved all the economic problems of the USSR. Perhaps after serving under Stalin coming up with new ideas was just not possible for his psyche. The point is largely (and tragically) moot since hundreds of millions either died, starved, were murdered, tortured, or at minimum suffered MUCH lesser lives than was necessary simply because the leaders of this idiotic economic religion just couldn't admit they were wrong.

Regardless, these precious words of Khrushchev, which make it painfully clear he was not only wrong, but had no clue what he was doing, is absolute mandatory listening for not just rightists, but especially leftists. Because if the god damned leader of the Soviet Union was so flimsy and weak on economics, then how much more weak and flimsy is your average spoiled brat liberal arts college student?

Seriously, it's like the pope admitting Catholicism is all wrong, yet your commoner Catholics, who never read the bible, would argue that it's still "all right."

Suicide Bomber Free Zone

March 26, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Leftist Teacher Takes in Muslim Refugee

March 27, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

And then ~~murder~~ hilarity ensues!

I LOVE IT LOVE IT LOVE IT LOVE IT!!!!!

The "Street Fighterfication" of Super Hero Movies

March 27, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Twin Peaks, if you were unfortunate enough to waste your precious life-seconds on that derisible show, was based on a simple premise:

Have everybody intertwine with everybody else.

Bob was having sex with Amy.
But Amy was married to Steve.
But Steve was Bob's boss.
Who was Abitha's conjugal visited inmate.
Who was the father of Amy's daughter.
Who was having an affair with Billy's uncle.
And who was Laura Palmer?
And frankly nobody gives a shit.

In short, you wasted the viewer's life watching a show that in reality had no real creativity behind it except for the gimmick of creating false drama by interweaving every character with each on on different levels.

Oh the "wit."

In short, "Twin Peaks" was nothing more than playing a game of "Street Fighter 2" wherein everybody else fights everybody else with no particular allegiance to good or bad, right or wrong, sane or insane, plus not real plot to begin with.

And thus is the EXACT same formula for the upcoming spate of "Super Hero vs. Super Hero" movies. Batman vs. Superman, Marvel "Civil War," and whatever other movies Hollywood execs are concocting but haven't come out with yet, because I (like I always am) am way ahead of the curve on this one.

I knew Batman vs. Superman was not going to bode well because it does/proves two things:

1. It pits two GOOD MEN against one another (which nobody likes) and
2. Proves Hollywood ran out of ideas and now they're just going to have the good guys fight each other.

It's like the WWE in the 1980's where you try every permutation of fight to drive up ratings.

The problem this formula presents to movie makers is you have to make one good guy the bad guy and the other good guy the "more good" guy. This delivers you into a world of murky/gray/foggy/morality drama where a slight disagreement in morality or principles leads to two men/super heroes having a VERY unlike fight.

"You have to ask yourself what's right."
"In times like these there are no heroes."
"But if you don't who will."

I haven't seen the movie, but am I right that these sorts of amorphous, Twin Peakish, WWE-ish, Street Fighter-ish dramatics were in Batman v. Superman?

This will not necessarily be the downfall of superhero movies, but the plateauing of them. You're going to not only force people watch two beloved heroes duke it out (like child watching their divorce-bound parents argue, and hey! how fun is that!!!!???), but you need to at least spend 2/3rds of the movie creating a faux drama/crisis so you can spend the next $200 million on that epic 1/3 of the movie fight! All while watching mom and dad beat the shit out of each other.

Yeah, that's a recipe for success.

The truth is nobody wants to see Superman and Batman beat each other up. And nobody will want to see Captain America and Tony Stark beat each other up. There are plenty of true villains in this world super heroes could battle. Communists, terrorists, Hillary Clinton...which, I know, I know, are protected classes of evil people we can't attack in public. But if Hollywood is so void of ideas they have to have the good guys start fighting each other, they have every right to gamble $400 million on what is nothing more than watching your parents fight. And I'm sure in today's America we can all get that for free at home in AMAZING real-life digital quality with front line seats no less.

Another Damn Fine Podcast

March 28, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

From DT and The Man

Yaaawwwnnn Another Terrorist Attack

March 28, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

My my my. My prediction about terrorist attacks just becoming the "new normal" is becoming true.

Perhaps we can "make some arrests" and "kill the third in command of ISIS!"

Oh oh! I know may be we can fly the flags at half staff (again)

or hold a candle-lit vigil (again)
or put the Pakistani flag on our facebook profiles!

You go Western Civilization!

We Are No Longer Americans

March 28, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

They no longer exist.

Nothing Good Ever Came Out of a Business Meeting

March 28, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Found this interesting. A calculator to measure the cost of a meeting.

I remember one time being so bored in a meeting I was calculating how much money we were costing the shareholders.

Episode #141 of The Clarey Podcast

March 28, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

When the fuck is Jesus coming back?
Cappy is joining Satan!
The Pioneer Podcasters
Do Ozzies hate Yanks?
Muslim kills leftist teacher
Peter Gunn and Herschel Bernardi

AND MORE!

in THIS EPISODE of The Clarey Podcast!

Vote Trump or Die

March 29, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

This is not an endorsement of Trump. Merely an observation about the balance of power in the Republican party.

Denis Tukhmanov: Hero

March 29, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Picture has surface of the Russian soldier that called in the air strike that not only killed a bunch of ISIS terrorists, but himself. Figured he was owed at least some notoriety here on Cappy Cap:

It's a Man

March 29, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Hey! I'm a two legged animal that runs around!

Davis Aurini Launches the Sarkeesian Effect

March 29, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

After much anticipation, Davis finally releases his video.

Cappy's on Engineered Truth

March 30, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Where Matt was kind enough to have me on his show where we discussed what I thought were the 12 biggest lies we tell society:

Emory University Now the Next Mizzou

March 30, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

I will never attend, nor hire, anybody from Emory University.

Never.

More Proof Freedom is the Best Economic Policy

March 30, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Many years ago, and by "many" I mean about 20, I decided to embark on a mission to pull all the data I could and empirically prove or disprove all the economic philosophies and beliefs I held. In short I didn't want a "philosophy" or "belief" or "ideology," I wanted proof. I was sick of arguing with leftists and liberals, sick of wasting logic or common sense on pointless college-student-late-dorm-room-night debates, and all I wanted was some simple, mathematical proof I could point to and say, "There. Now have a cup of STFU."

And about 20 years ago, I did precisely that. Arguably one of my best charts I ever compiled proved me correct - government spending as a percentage of GDP versus economic growth. Albeit boring and now making your eyes glaze over like Ben Stein in Ferris Bueller's Day off, the chart showed a NEGATIVE correlation between government spending and economic growth with a correlation coefficient of around .3.

The problem is that was 20 years ago and the data I had was not the greatest, merely what was available on the OECD at the time. So I figured it was time to pull new data and see if this relationship still held true. And boy howdy has it!

Not only did the relation between government and economic growth continue to be negative, but the strength of the relationship increased to a correlation coefficient of -.55 (-.56 if you only use a decade's worth of data).

Now like all economic studies there are caveats and considerations. The data above does not include Japan, Canada, New Zealand, Mexico, China or Greece. I have NO idea why the OECD doesn't have enough data on these countries to make a 20 year study, but they simply don't (though the 10 year correlation I calculated DOES include Japan). So it's merely the data I had to work with. And of course, the OECD does not include most 2nd and 3rd world nations. Only the nations who have been providing them with their economic data. Still, all these asides, if we are to look at the EMPIRICAL EVIDENCE economic growth is VERY NEGATIVELY correlated with the size of government. Even more so since you'd think SPENDING as a percentage of GDP would correlate positively with economic growth...but that is in a deluded Keynesian wet-dream world.

Regardless, this new data only merely re-proves what we all know to be logical and common sense:

A freer people are a more productive people. If you let people keep the majority of their wealth and fruits of their labor they will work more, create more, innovate more, and your economy will grow more. It's not only logical and empirically proven, it's simply moral. Of course, the parasites of society will whine and contest and complain otherwise, desperate to use the force of government to enslave you to support them, but it doesn't change the fact that a smaller government results in a better and ever-more progressing society. The issue is simply if society wants to vote for parasitism and dependency of excellence and independence.

"Poetry" to Save Detroit Youth

March 30, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

It's stuff like this that makes me knight Katie Couric with the official title of "Baroness of the Bint."

"There once was a man from Nantucket...."

New SURE FIRE Retirement Plan for Boomers!

March 30, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Look! You can "fight the system maaaan" AND retire at the same time! Free food, clothing, lodging and health care!

Big Daddy C Wants!

March 30, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Cell phone transformer gun. I want!

More on Freedom vs. Economic Growth

March 31, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Expounding upon my previous research I wanted to take global economic growth and compare it against the average government take of global GDP in terms of spending. To the naked eye no real trend can be identified, but if you correlate the two you get a CC of -.39. Again, proving the more governments take/spend the less economic growth there is. It's very simple. You crowd out the private economy with an inefficient (or worse) parasitic public sector, expect your economy (and tax based) to shrink.

*Missing from the data as it is not on the OECD is China and Russian, which I would VERY MUCH like to include. If anybody knows where I can get 20 years worth of RGDP data for them AND total government expenditure as a percent of GDP I would appreciate it.

DIY Paternity Kit

March 31, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Uh oh!!!

Misjudging Hipsters

April 1, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

This has now happened three times which compels me to make a meme as an apology.

Though I will plead with these "conservative hipsters" to ditch the salmon jeans, hit the gym, and get a real haircut. You have no idea how much you're wearing the enemy's uniform and confusing the rest of us.

Cappy's Analysis on the $15/Hour Minimum Wage

April 1, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Their fatness belies two facts:

1. They aren't starving
2. The reason they make so low a wage is because they're lazy, not underpaid.

More Eye Candy for You Lieutenants

April 2, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Sponsored by Curse of the High IQ!

Episode #142 of The Clarey Podcast!

April 5, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Don Quixote
Copper ingots!
The history of champagne
Speaking speech
Don't kill your gay dates
Fuck grammar

AND MORE!!!

On THIS EPISODE of The Clarey Podcast!!!

The AltLeft?

April 6, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Seems some white leftists are getting sick and tired of being called racist all the time.

When I Am King

April 7, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

I will ban all money or association with the made-up word "micro-aggression."

I will also cut all funding to all liberal arts department since this is the best use of the taxpayers money they could come up with.

Sugar and Spice

April 8, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

and everything nice.

She shouldn't go to jail or even be in court. But it is a lesson that every young boy out there needs to realize that, yes, yes indeed, these girls not only exist, but exist at a very young age.

Are Feminists Angry?

April 8, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

"I think of when I was three, cuddling into my Granddad Murphy's lap as he stroked my hair and told me I was the best girl and I wonder did he really think that, or did he secretly hate women too?"

No, no, they're perfectly happy individuals

(Warning about this "article," it's horribly written. It's just BAD.)

Episode #143 of the Clarey Podcast (Curse Free!!! …sort of)

April 8, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Never visit your girlfriend at work
The death of letterman jackets and class rings
Amy Schumer doesn't like being called fat
Millionaires leaving France
$9,000 per year AVERAGE cost to maintain a car???
Three car garages the new standard???

AND MORE!!!

In THIS EPISODE of The Clarey Podcast!

The "Texting Killer Girlfriend" Case is the "False Rape Accusation" for Women

April 9, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

If you don't know, the short and sweet of it is that a girl named Michelle Carter is on trial for murder charges as she taunted her boyfriend into committing suicide.

Much ado and hubbub has been made about this, but the ole Captain is going to boil it down to its two most simple elements so you don't waste any more time on it and can move on with your much more important life.

One, the girl cannot (and I predict will not) be charged with murder because the boy had sovereignty over his own decisions and chose to end his life. He also had the right to ignore the taunts of this veritable cunt at any time. I desperately want to egg people on who do "suicide attempts" because I find them deplorable attention whores who torture those closest to them, but I do not pull the trigger at the end if they inevitably get serious and actually commit suicide. Regardless, if the girl is found guilty that now means we are responsible for other people's actions which opens up a whole new can of worms. A can of worms even the most leftist of judges know not to open.

Two, this is the opposite sex-side of the coin of the false rape claim. We drag boys and men through the courts on false charges of rape, ruining their lives in the process, now we're going to drag an equally innocent (though vile) girl through the legal system and see how she/they (meaning feminists) like it. Of course, instances like this (where a boy commits suicide and was egged on by his girlfriend) are much rarer than false rape claims, but it does for once provide an example of "shoe on the other foot," allowing us to point and say, "OK, how do you think she feels?"

All that being said, it is nice to see a precious little princess go through hell. Most men who are falsely accused of rape did nothing more than break up with a girl, triggering the false rape claim. This girl is an evil sadist who enjoys making other people suffer. It's good to see her squirm, but she should not go to prison.

A Lesson About Public Transportation

April 10, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

I find it funny the "best cities to live without a car" also happen to be mostly leftist shitholes where most people can't afford cars (though I will readily admit cost of living in these towns also make it impossible to own a car).

How Does Hillary Rationalize Bill Clinton's Cheating?

April 11, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Frankly, I don't care, but I'm going to capitalize on it.

When Millennials Try to Economics

April 11, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Awwww they're so cute!

The Father Could Not Be Reached for Comment

April 11, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

I like how the grandmother's presence indicates several generations of missing fathers.

Another Chart the Snowflakes Won't Comprehend

April 12, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Masculine Books

April 12, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Reviews Enjoy the Decline!

Many thanks Seth!

How Charity Destroys Price Discovery…and Thus Society

April 12, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

The economic concepts of "markets" and "price discovery" are boring to your average American. Too obsessed about what Kim Kardashian is doing with her ass or the pre-post-post-pre game show of Sportzball, your average American lacks the intelligence and thus interest to appreciate the ramification of things such as "markets" and "price discovery."

But thankfully my readership is not your average American, so we'll actually learn something today.

First, while markets are considered places of exchange where buyers and sellers meet to conduct commerce, and are ultimately where economic production comes to fruition, they also have a very important "fringe benefit." They provide pricing.

While buyers and sellers haggle, not to mention streamline their operations to cut costs so as to maximize their profits, the entirety of their efforts and the accounting information collected along the way results in a "price." This price is very important because it measures, precisely, what the real value (and cost) of a product or service is. Of course, prices are in a constant state of flux because on the supplier's side the inputs are constantly changing (price of raw materials, labor, managerial efficiency, etc.) and on the demander's side their tastes and preferences are also constantly changing (lost jobs, fads, economic conditions, family budget, etc.). But in the end, the totality of EVERYTHING that goes into producing and buying that product is played out in the market, ultimately resulting in that price.

This price is incredibly precious because it tells everybody what it's value is and allows people (either investors, consumers, or businessmen) to calculate and determine whether it is worth buying that particular product or service. It also enables investors and businessmen to plan, allowing them to determine whether they should build a new plant, purchase new equipment, or start another business, ultimately affecting economic growth. Therefore, it is vital that markets produce prices that reflect as accurately as possible their true value, for if they don't, and prices are either overstated or understated, consumers can waste their money and investors malinvest, resulting in lower economic growth.

Again, at first this may seem boring because this is just theoretical talk. But there are two VERY relevant and recent instances of mispricing and failed markets that has struck every American close to home and should be of much more interest than Kim

Kardashian's ass and the opening game of Swingystick:

The housing bubble and the education bubble.

In both instances we have the classic example of where the market failed and there was massive mispricing in both the value of a house and a college education. And like most mispricings, both were caused by an inordinate amount of debt (or "credit") that flooded the market, driving prices way above their real values.

In the case of the housing bubble trillions of dollars in debt were introduced to the market by ARM's, variable mortgages, and other forms of short term lending. Additionally, lending standards of traditional 30 year mortgages were ~~reduced~~ eliminated completely lending money to any dipshit who could sign loan documents. This fabricated demand caused developers to overproduce housing, so much so it outstripped even the debt-inflated demand, resulting in the housing crash of 2007.

This "boring" economic phenomena of mispricing directly affected the GLOBE as so large was the malinvestment, it threw us all, smart and stupid, into the worst recession since the Great Depression. And those times were so bad even they were seared into the memories of the dumbest Americans.

The exact same thing is playing itself out now in the education industry. Millions of stupid children, propagandized to believe "follow your heart and the money will follow," willing sign their futures away by taking on inordinate amounts of student debt to pay for a piece of paper that has even less utilitarian value than toilet paper. Here, however, it is not so much greedy bankers willingly financing the dreams of stupid people, but the federal government lending over $1 trillion to this industry. Consequently, just like housing prices, tuition prices are skyrocketing...and oh...these precious students (of the OWS variety no less) will be bailed out in the EXACT same manner as the banker scum they so loathe.

Now we already know how mispricing has dramatically affected Americans, all for the worse, between these two bubbles. But there's an even bigger bubble growing, and instead of a trillion here or a trillion there, it's roughly a $4.2 trillion PER YEAR bubble. And that bubble is charity.

At first you may find this distasteful. "Come on Cappy, how can you go after something like charity." But remember, for anybody who dared to criticize housing or education, they were equally lambasted because "housing should be a right" and "you can't put a price on education." But need I remind you of the Great Recession and the problems the millennial generation is facing with their un-repayable student loans? And if you think these are/were problems, just wait till the charity bubble bursts. Regardless, the key point to be made about the "charity bubble" is that its origins hail from the exact same origins as the housing and education bubbles. Mispricing.

But the question is "the mispricing of what?"

And the answer is "the mispricing of stupid decisions."

Understand that bar charities for cancer, disease, etc., the vast majority of charity is simply bailing out stupid, irresponsible people from their stupid, irresponsible decisions.

If I took my life savings and invested it in Beanie Babies, I made a stupid decision and deserve to lose my entire investment.

If you were a young man who graduated from high school and bought a brand new car to "impress the chicks," you made a stupid decision and deserve to live in poverty as you try to make the car payment.

And if you were one of those idiot investment bankers who threw money into a "Dotcom" technology you didn't completely understand, only to find out it was IT geek fraudsters talking over your head so they could score the funding to pay themselves bloated executive salaries, you (and your clients) deserve to lose all of your original investment.

But what if you make the most stupid decision of them all?
What if you make the most damaging decision a human being can make?
What if you bring a child into this world you can't afford?

Well then the government, society, non-profit, for-profit, and practically the whole world bends over backward to give you money and reward you for your mistake. And it is this reward for stupidity that causes the cost of stupid decisions to be mispriced.

To boil it down very simply, we spend between state, federal and local governments about $4.2 trillion on welfare, social security, medicare, medicaid, TANF, EBT, WIC, section 8, and a whole host of other programs that go to one purpose and one purpose only:

To bail stupid people out from their stupid decisions.

Historically people who made stupid decisions either died or at least didn't breed more stupid people because, simply, they couldn't afford it. There was no taxpayer-financed "forgiveness," no taxpayer financed "second chances," and there sure as hell was none of this "hurray for single moms heroism" going on in the past. If you made a stupid mistake, you suffered the consequences and, quite literally, were financially prevented from making much others.

But today people are shielded from the true costs of their stupid mistakes.

Had a kid you can't afford? Here's some money! Hurray for you! Vote for me!
Paid $250,000 for an English degree? Never fear! We'll bail you out!
Didn't save up enough for retirement? Vote for me and I'll tax your grandchildren to pay for you!
Bought a house you couldn't afford? That's alright, we'll put together TARP!

And so, like housing, like education, stupidity is not only mispriced, but encouraged and subsidized, resulting in a population where roughly half of us are parasitic.

But the true cost of this "stupidity bubble" is not that the stupid are rewarded by being able to live off of the productive and smart (though that is a cost). It's a dual cost in terms of lives wasted and the inevitable economic crash that always follows bubbles.

First, understand how important it is to suffer the consequences of stupid decisions. Everybody, smart or dumb, makes stupid decisions. And as long as you learn from them you will advance. Matter of fact, that is how most advancement in humanity was made - learning from failures. But if for political purposes and votes, you shield people from the costs of their mistakes, they will never learn and are thus condemned to be fractions of what they could have become.

The single mom of one would have learned from her mistake quickly and maybe salvaged her family by marrying a very charitable man. But with a government-check -get-out-of-jail-free-card she spits out 4 more, all equally condemned to repeat her miserable lives.

The troublesome kid in school who was coddled through special-ed classes and "guidance counselors" will never learn his lesson and forever become a criminal. But perhaps a discreet bathroom beating by the larger bully might have set him straight.

Or the immigrant who comes here from some god-forsaken third world shit hole. Instead of being held to the rigors of traditional America, sink or swim, become an engineer, and live the American dream, he is now trampled by the number of socialist politicians desperately willing to bribe him from his harsh reality all in exchange for a vote...and a sacrificing of his future.

It is the impossible promise of eliminating negative conditioning from people's lives through a government-check-for-your-vote bribe that has turned now nearly 3 generations of Americans into pariahs, denying them a greatness they could have become.

Second, Idiocracy. Like all bubbles this one will crash. May not happen today, may not happen tomorrow, but having a society that is constantly bailed out from their stupid decisions will never learn, never advance, and certainly not produce the economic production necessary to make good on all those gubmint promises. And when those government checks bounce (or more likely, due to inflation, they won't buy anything), the stupid people will revolt, killing whatever few remaining smart/productive ones exist, and then it's all over. Matter of fact, you should pray for Idiocracy as it at least wasn't violent. It will be more like Mad Max.

Regardless, you can only expect something egregious or life-ending to happen to society when you prevent people from learning from, paying for, and living with their mistakes. And since you've underpriced the cost of stupidity, even rewarding it,you have signed the death certificate of western civilization, perhaps accelerating it to the point we may see its end in our lifetimes.

Enjoy the decline!

---

http://www.soundcloud.com/aaron-clarey
http://www.assholeconsulting.com
https://www.youtube.com/user/AaronClarey
https://twitter.com/aaron_clarey
http://www.amazon.com/Aaron-Clarey/e/B00J1ZC350/
Amazon Affiliate

The Authoritative List of Obama's Lying, Law Breaking, Corruption, and Violating the Constitution

April 12, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Had an interesting request from Asshole Consulting. A guy wanted me to plug his book. Said he was offering it for dirt cheap and just wanted to get it out there. He originally wanted to offer it for free, but Amazon made him charge at least 99 cents for it.

Of course I was "yeah yeah, another author who slopped together a pamphlet and thinks they're going to cash in," but when he explained it was a compendium of all the violations of the constitutions, lies, law breaking, etc. of Obama, I was interested. And the reason I was interested is because it's a very important list to have in case somebody says, "Oh yeah, precisely what has he done???"

Well, this.

Anyway, the man has put A TON of effort into compiling and citing this list. If you would be so kind to book mark it, or share it, or at least tell people about it for reference purposes, it would be kindly appreciated.

Episode #144 of The Clarey Podcast!

April 13, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Finally warm in Minnesota
Cappy's idea to eliminate colleges
Cappy predicts the internet will destroy skyscrapers
How do you destory a skyscraper?
You NEVER tell the government you discovered gold coins
Fan Mail

AND MORE!!!

In THIS EPISODE of The Clarey Podcast!

"Aspiring Rapper"

April 14, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Amazing how "aspiring rapper" coincides a lot with "father could not be reached for comment."

A Question for Our Swedish Agents in the Field

April 14, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Howdy All,

Trying to find how men and women vote in Sweden based on polls, research, etc., but for the life of me I can't find anything. It's almost as if the Swedish government/media doesn't let it get out, or they just don't do any polling in the first place.

If anybody in Sweden (or anybody who happens to know where this data is) can provide links in the comment section below I would appreciate it.

Thanks,

Cappy

Tax Havens and the Panama Papers for Beginners

April 15, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Mini Justin Trudeau

April 16, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

He's young.
He's handsome.
He promises to pay for every thing.
And that's enough to cinch the vag-tingle-vote.

College Degrees in Prison

April 18, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Pointer for all you aspiring criminals out there. If you're going to do 25 years in the slammer, don't get your Masters in Humanities.

We Told You So

April 18, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

But "muh feelz" trump the economic reality of a $15 minimum wage, right?

Heather Hackman is a Hack

April 18, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Showing up on time for class I guess is "white privilege" now too.

How to Tell if Your Degree is Worthless

April 18, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

A quick little thing you can do, in under a minute, to convince your children or yourself that their/your degree is worthless:

Why Men Make More Than Women

April 18, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Because you damn well know the majority of people running away from the fire tornado are not women with their "Masters in Communications."

Academic Composition Looking to Hire

April 19, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Remember, if you're a Cappy Cappite looking for a location independent job, consider contacting our good friend Alex at Academic Composition!

From one of his employees:

"I have been posting ads up for Aleksey for over a year now. I send him an invoice for all ad postings and contacts once a month. He pays the same day and most of the time within a couple of hours. Posting the ads does not take much time, once I had everything up and running it is literally a few minutes 3 or 4 days a week to check and renew ads. Aleksey has been easy to work with, knows what he is doing and I would not hesitate to recommend working for him.
Steve"

The SJW/Femnist "Media" Bubble is Bursting

April 19, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Good riddance. What, however, will these talentless "journalism" majors do once this gimmick runs its course?

How to Properly Light and Smoke a Cigar

April 19, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Another exciting episode of Bachelor Pad Theater:

Episode #146 of the Clarey Podcast!

April 19, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Kill your son...just kidding
$1.5 million and Cappy will go to church
$15 million and Cappy will donate sperm
How to kill the Wisconsin Synod
The "sighing" callers to the Stefan Molyneux podcast
Candace Owen, Social Autopsy, and how the milleannials will end America

AND MORE!

In THIS EPISODE of The Clare Podcast!

Why You Don't Understand Trump

April 20, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

OK old people. I'm going to try to explain it to you.

I know it will be like explaining the internet, Microsoft Excel and other technological advances you've steadfastly refused to understand, but were ultimately vain in trying to ignore, but we're going to explain Donald Trump to all you fuddy duddies, especially you establishment republican types.

You may hate Trump.
You may loathe him.
AND you may have every right and reason to do so.

But he is still better than the slop you've been serving since Ronald Reagan took office.

That's 30 years of slop. From the Bushes (both father and son DRENCHED in nepotism) to McCain, to the billionaire white boy socialist named Romney, you have served SLOP to the real, everyday republicans of America and they've eaten it up because it was better than voting for genuine socialists.

But you throw in the shitshow that was known as Boehner and Ryan, and the absolute cowardice that the republican house has been since, not to mention Gen X has seen talk from only Rush Limbaugh, and only massive expansion of government under Bush Jr., it is very apparent the republican party just isn't cutting it.

You're failing.
You're losers.
You couldn't protect the constitution if your wife's loyalty depended upon it.

No matter what you say, no matter what politician you throw forth, you have lost 100% of the GENUINE, REAL republican American constituency, and we are now voting for anybody (and I mean ANYBODY) who isn't a career politician and actually might make a change.

The key thing to understand (and I know that's hard for you lazy, fat establishment types, not to mention baby boomers who are stuck in the Nixon era) is that no matter how much you HATE and LOATHE Trump, the American republicans HATE AND LOATHE you even more. They're sick of your non-performance, they're sick of your corruption, and they're sick of you impotence and incompetence. They are so sick of you they'd rather vote for what is clearly an opportunist over your "best" candidate you present forward because he is at least "different."

And that is how sad and pathetic you've been these past 30 years.

It merely takes somebody who is "different" to beat your pretty boy polished Cruz.

The confusion you have is how can a charlatan like Trump just come in and whisk away the vote. How can somebody with a very grey business back ground, not to mention crass and lewd demeanor, present such a threat to the establishment Republican party.

You need to realize the problem is not with Trump, but that it is with you. YOU are the problem. YOU are the ones who failed. You are so corrupt, but more so, inept and cowardly that the real Americans would rather vote for a potty-mouthed, straight shooter, than any of the "Slop v. 3.0" you're going to serve up this round.

I know most of you purport to espouse "free market" ideals. Perhaps you should for once follow those ideals and listen to the customers and deliver what they want.

Oh, wait, that's right. You're a political party no better than the democrats.

Guess we're just going to have to replace you.

What About "Big Oil" Now?

April 20, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

I like watching the normies and leftists react to the oil industry because it not only shows how completely clueless and deluded they are about the oil industry, but it belies just how fantastically stupid they are. Usually, once every 5 years or so, some journalist will crack open Exxon's annual report and decry that it made "$40 billion" in EEEEVIL profits while kids in Durkadurkastan live off of a nickle every five years and eat flies for nourishment. Naturally the leftists and normies are incensed, and demand something be done about it. But if we're really lucky, once every 10 years they'll parade their stupidity for all to see and float around that deader-than-a-door-nail idea to "boybott big oil" on "one" day.

However, that's usually when oil prices are high and thus, naturally, when profits are also at all time highs. But what about when oil goes to all time lows? Does the left report on the losses or drops in revenue of "Big Oil?"

No, of course not, because that doesn't fit the narrative. And so to keep the sheeple in line, the media will never report how "Big Oil" is doing today, now that oil is about a 1/3rd of what it used to be. But I will.

In short it doesn't look good.

Exxon came out "the best" out of the Big Oil companies I looked at. Their revenues are down about 40% from last year and their profit has been cut in half since 2014.

Summary Statement of Income

(millions of dollars)	2015	2014	2013
Revenues and Other Income
Sales and other operating revenue[1]	259,488	394,105	420,836
Income from equity affiliates	7,644	13,323	13,927
Other income	1,750	4,511	3,492
Total revenues and other income	268,882	411,939	438,255
Costs and Other Deductions
Crude oil and product purchases	130,003	225,972	244,156
Production and manufacturing expenses	35,587	40,859	40,525
Selling, general and administrative expenses	11,501	12,598	12,877
Depreciation and depletion	18,048	17,297	17,182
Exploration expenses, including dry holes	1,523	1,669	1,976
Interest expense	311	286	9
Sales-based taxes[1]	22,678	29,342	30,589
Other taxes and duties	27,265	32,286	33,230
Total costs and other deductions	246,916	360,309	380,544
Income before income taxes	21,966	51,630	57,711
Income taxes	5,415	18,015	24,263
Net income including noncontrolling interests	16,551	33,615	33,448
Net income attributable to noncontrolling interests	401	1,095	868
Net income attributable to ExxonMobil	16,150	32,520	32,580

British Petroleum experienced a similar drop in revenue, but actually posted a loss of $6 billion.

Group income statement

For the year ended 31 December

$ million

	Note	2015	2014	2013
Sales and other operating revenues	5	222,894	353,568	379,136
Earnings from joint ventures – after interest and tax	15	(28)	570	447
Earnings from associates – after interest and tax	16	1,839	2,802	2,742
Interest and other income	6	611	843	777
Gains on sale of businesses and fixed assets	4	666	895	13,115
Total revenues and other income		225,982	358,678	396,217
Purchases	18	164,790	281,907	298,351
Production and manufacturing expenses[a]		37,040	27,375	27,527
Production and similar taxes	5	1,036	2,958	7,047
Depreciation, depletion and amortization	5	15,219	15,163	13,510
Impairment and losses on sale of businesses and fixed assets	4	1,909	8,965	1,961
Exploration expense	7	2,353	3,632	3,441
Distribution and administration expenses		11,553	12,266	12,611
Profit (loss) before interest and taxation		(7,918)	6,412	31,769
Finance costs[a]	6	1,347	1,148	1,068
Net finance expense relating to pensions and other post-retirement benefits	23	306	314	480
Profit (loss) before taxation		(9,571)	4,950	30,221
Taxation[a]	8	(3,171)	947	6,463
Profit (loss) for the year		(6,400)	4,003	23,758

And "hated Halliburton" (which recognized your hate and has since moved their HQ to Dubai, don't worry, you won't be able to tax them soon) also experienced a loss:

HALLIBURTON COMPANY
Consolidated Statements of Operations

Millions of dollars and shares except per share data	Year Ended December 31 2015	2014	2013
Revenue:
Services	$ 17,482	$ 25,039	$ 22,257
Product sales	6,151	7,831	7,145
Total revenue	23,633	32,870	29,402
Operating costs and expenses:
Cost of services	15,900	20,959	18,959
Cost of sales	5,213	6,571	5,972
Impairment and other charges	2,177	129	—
Baker Hughes acquisition-related costs	308	17	—
General and administrative	200	292	333
Activity related to the Macondo well incident	—	(195)	1,000
Total operating costs and expenses	23,798	27,773	26,264
Operating income (loss)	(165)	5,097	3,138
Interest expense, net of interest income of $16, $13, and $8	(447)	(383)	(331)
Other, net	(324)	(2)	(43)
Income (loss) from continuing operations before income taxes	(936)	4,712	2,764
Income tax benefit (provision)	274	(1,275)	(648)
Income (loss) from continuing operations	(662)	3,437	2,116
Income (loss) from discontinued operations, net of income tax benefit (provision) of $3, $(9), and $1	(5)	64	19
Net income (loss) $	(667)$	3,501 $	2,135

Even Baker Hughes (the fracking half brother of "Big Oil") posted a loss for 2015.

I could go on about how this is another example of leftist bias in the media and how Americans are idiotic lemmings sopping up whatever propaganda is put in front of them, but we all know that is pointless. I merely want you to book mark this post, or perhaps share it with people on the facebook or teh interwebz so the next time oil prices go sky high and "Big Oil" has those hated at vilified "record profits" you can pull up this ole post, shove it in the sheeple's faces and tell them to have a cup of STFU.

Black Moms Using Black Boys to Rake in a Payday

April 20, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

I'm starting to wonder if these mothers really love their sons or just view them as a vehicle to sue the police when their "dindu nuffin" gangster son (that they failed to raise properly AND without a father) gets in trouble with the cops.

Yeah yeah, remember, we don't need no STIIIINNNNNKING FATHERS!

Rant of the Year

April 20, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Though it is only April:

Who is Candace Owens of Social Autopsy?

April 21, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Looks like the Honey Badgers are on the case.

The "White Privilege Conference" Shit Show

April 21, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Bunch of white people who hate themselves.

and see what happens.

Last Minute Rapid City, South Dakota Tour

April 21, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Decided to head to Rapid City for the weekend. Any lieutenants, economists, or agents in the field that are either out there or up for some hiking out west, let the ole Captain know.

Why Every Conservative Should Cheer that Harriet Tubman is on the $20 Bill

April 21, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Any woman who hunts, scouts, and kills democrats is a good enough woman for me!

New Blogroll Addition : Director Blue

April 22, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

You will read.
You will visit.
You will enjoy.
Conformance is mandatory.
Compliance is not optional.
You will obey!

The Molyneux Caller "Sigh"

April 22, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

In my latest podcast episode I tiraded against the callers into Stefan Molyneux's show who, when cornered about their hypocrisy or weakness, exhaust the exasperating and patented "sigh" which drives my blood pressure up.

If you listen to this episode of Stefan Molyneux's show you will find exactly what I'm talking about at 1:09:15 (for the next 10 seconds) and the PERFECT example at 2:30:05 (for the next painful wishy washy 20 seconds after that).

Again, I am a big fan of the Stefan Molyneux show, but I just couldn't let this itch go much further without scratching it.

Today in Awesomeness

April 23, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

WWI's stuffed penguin flying mascot pulled from wreckage.

Obama and the Constitution

April 23, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

New sponsor ladies and gentlemen. Daniel Alman has put together a compendium of all of Obama's violations of the constitution, law, and everything else. I find it a very handy reference book to have in case people say, "OK, name ONE time Obama violated the constitution." And since there's been many you are at a loss to conjure up just one.

Well no more, here's an entire list you can simply pull out and go through one by one:

[image]

Remember, Amy Schumer is Not Intended for You

April 23, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

She is intended for low information people.

Cappys Black Hill Adventure!

April 24, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

We Don't Need No STIIIINNNNKING Fathers!!!!

April 24, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Oops...wait.

Declining Energy Consumption in Europe

April 24, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Some charty (and economic) goodness here.

Big Oil Redeux

April 25, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Another little tidbit to bookmark lieutenants and economists.

Remember when leftists call Exxon and BP "big oil" that those are PRIVATE companies. They pale in comparison to the GOVERNMENT OWNED OIL COMPANIES of Mexico, Venezuela, and (the largest one) Saudi Arabia's Aramco. Aramco has a market value of $2 trillion dollars.

By comparison, Exxon only has a market cap of $350 billion.

Now I know "The Maths" are hard for leftists, so don't expect them to understand advanced concepts like "market capitalization," "billion" or the number 3. But all you have to do next time is print off this here little post, put it in front of them, and then walk away. You'll have won the debate and can move on with your life.

Cappy vs. Feminism on "Crush the Street"

April 25, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

My latest interview with Ken over at Crush the Street. We talk about feminism, talking past their "victim game" and calling them out for the liars, thieves, parasites and cowards that they are.

Only Blacks Created Stuff in America

April 25, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

I don't know how long this will last, but I found it interesting that when searching for a mural of American inventors, Bing's search algorithms went ape-shit affirmative-actiony and produced this for an image search.

I took a screen shot for posterity.

At first I thought "Bing was Broken," but then it dawned on me with the universal and omnipresent push to plug diversity, minorities, etc., between academia, the media, and the government, I would not be surprised that the logical search algorithm assumes you are looking for black American inventors and not the traditional American inventors.

Regardless, touche leftist, multiculturalist, revisionist, marxists. Touche!

Prom is "Uneconomic"

April 25, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Provide you useful, helpful SAEG since 2005:

The SJW Black List

April 26, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Looks like Voxday is fighting fire with fire by outing and putting together a list of all the SJW's who like to dox people.

Episode #147 of The Clarey Podcast!

April 26, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Dirty Harriet and stories from Rapid City
White and Asian males fight diversity at Intel
How diversity hurts us all
What REAL minorities heroes are we missing out on?

AND MORE!

In THIS EPISODE of The Clarey Podcast!

Link to "The Real Lone Ranger" aka "Bass Reeves."

From Our Millennial College Graduate Agent in the Field

April 27, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

A relatively recent college graduate wanted to report about how his attendance of college had NO bearing on his future life. This is a guest post written by him and I do want to put the emphasis on MILLENNIAL.

The Reality of Post College Graduates

The reality of college in today's modern world is this: college doesn't do a whole lot.

I'm a living and breathing example of this. In December of 2012, I graduated with a Bachelor's degree in economics. In February of 2013, I took a job as a computer engineer. In February of 2016 (with one additional job in between), I am now a guy who makes his living off the Internet, whether it be via my blog, books, web design, or whatever else floats my boat.

I recently reactivated my personal Facebook account after several years, because I'm now living in Eastern Europe (it's huge here). I was missing social opportunities, so despite my usual protests to engaging in any personal social media, I jumped back into the fray.

When I logged back into Facebook for the first time, what do you think I was greeted with?

Profiles of old friends who were kicking ass in life, using their degrees to their fullest potential and maximizing their college investment?

Or...

Profiles of old friends were who still meandering in the same jobs they had in college, or had become baristas after realizing that their worthless degree was not even worthless - but actually a negative return on investment for their life as a whole.

If you guessed the first option, then go back to reading your Liberal Arts textbook, I wish you the best.

For those of you who chose the second, allow me to elaborate on my story a bit.

MY STORY

I'm now 24 years old, and as I said, I have a degree in economics but ended up working as a computer engineer. This is the first red flag that the collegiate system in America is broken.

In what world can some 21 year old kid with a degree in economics start working on 1 million dollar+ computer systems as his first job? They say it all comes down to connections, and this was exactly the case for me. I had a great friend and mentor in high school - when I started working in a computer shop at the age of 14, he was the head salesman. We struck up a fast bond and he is still one of my best friends to this day, despite a ten year age gap.

He talked me up to his bosses at the engineering job, and I walked into the interview knowing it was mine provided I didn't come off as a total moron.

Needless to say, I got it.

I never was asked what my degree was in. Not once, in a two hour long interview, with four panelists. The piece of paper that I had invested the last three and a half years of my life (and $100k, give or take - and I went to a public state school!) did not matter one bit.

Yet, my entire life I was indoctrinated to think that it was. I should mention that there is some truth to that - they may have not given me a shot if I didn't have the piece of paper proving that I could take orders and listen. However, the proof is in the pudding. You don't need a degree to start a career - but the real lesson to learn here is that you should never get a worthless degree.

To illustrate that, let's look at a few of my other friends.

SARAH

Is a very cute, now 24 year old girl. She left the original university where we started college together after a year and a half to return to her hometown, which is a big tourist hotspot. In school, she was studying Journalism and Media Studies.

In her hometown, she took a job at a large hotel as a check-in clerk. She was making $15 an hour, give or take. Five years later, she has finally finished her degree, and still works in the hotel. She now makes $22 an hour, give or take.

Despite her dreams of being a sportscaster and a writer, I can promise you that I write more on a daily basis than she likely has in the last year.

MAX

Was a good friend of mine for several years. He was a Marine Biology major, and a pretty good one at that. He had strong grades in all of the hard classes like organic chemistry, physics, etc.

Max started working at Petco during our junior year at school. At 24 years of age, after 5 years of study - he still works at Petco.

SUSAN

Is someone I still keep in pretty consistent touch with. She got a Sociology degree. Right after graduating, she moved back home. She then found a job that paid her about $14 an hour as a social worker. She hated it and said it was "too hard", so she took a job at a coffee shop instead.

It was, in her words, "Less stressful and more fun."

Now, she is engaged to be married and will tie the knot at the end of this year. Most likely, she'll be pregnant within a year and never work another day in her life again (provided her future husband has a degree worth that provides more than a barista job).

This means that she threw away all of her parents money and their Sociology for a job making coffee.

WHAT DOES THE BLUEPRINT LOOK LIKE?

Even those who have strong personalities are not immune to society's shames and methods.

From a young age, it is quite clear to any young person growing up in America that you must go to college. Especially as a man - you are made to believe is the only way you can get a girl, the only way to provide, that you are far less of a man if you lack a college degree.

In reality, having a silly Liberal Arts degree in LGBT Studies makes you less of a man.

I'm not going to preach that you should or shouldn't go to college - but what I will preach is that you should think very carefully about throwing down six figures or more on a piece of paper that won't get you a job beyond making a latte (also remember: a Civil Engineering degree from a random state school is likely more valuable than a LGBT degree from Harvard). In addition to that, even if the job is has some prestige and sex appeal to it, if it only pays $18 an hour - is it really worth it? There are plenty of options out there that pay far, far better, won't require four years of your life, won't require a ransom worth a 20% downpayment on a new home, and won't suck you into the system designed to keep you in debt and working for the rest of your life.

Because it doesn't end after the college degree. Next comes the house, and it best be in a good suburb. Then you need the nice cars to look good in the driveway, even if you only drive down the street to work. Then comes the kids and the private school, then ultimately - their college education.

I started to get sucked into this after I started my first job. I bought a nice car, that, coupled with the insurance payments, cost me $600 a month (plus premium gas!). I considered buying a condo that would have meant a monthly mortgage equivalent to half of my take-home salary.

Why?

Because I was told that was just how it was. That this is what it meant to be American.

The best advice I can possibly give to anyone is to think for themselves. Look at me now. I'm now living abroad, writing this from a cafe in Poland. I make my living running my own business. I am my own free man.

And that piece of paper that says "Bachelor's in Economics" has nothing to do with it.

Now that's true freedom.

If all these kids had read Worthless, none of this would have happened....I also want to know if Susan is hot because I have a job for her that pays more than $14 per hour.

What the Heck are "Critical Thinking Skills" Anyway?

April 27, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

"Critical thinking" or "critical thinking skills" come up in two common scenarios.

One, when a leftist defends their worthless liberal arts degree, claiming it provides them with the rare and enviable skill of "critical thinking."

And

Two, when liberal arts professors defend their bogus fields of study by claiming the "#1 thing employers look for in college graduates is critical thinking!"

Of course, I never gave "critical thinking" much thought, writing it off as some kind of worthless, commonsensical skill your average person develops during childhood. But because of the cacophony coming from academia, not to mention, the academic left's complete and utter reliance upon and championing of it, I decided to find out, once and for all, what the heck are "critical thinking skills anyway."

A standard google search will pull up a ton of results, but the first thing you'll notice is that there's NO standard definition of critical thinking skills. You can go to Wikipedia and you'll see two amorphous definitions with pages and pages of text vainly trying to define it. You can even go to the "Critical Thinking Community" (which serves, I presume, as the "professional association" of critical thinkers) and even they have four separate, equally amorphous definitions. But as far as my evil, empirical, logical, and sane mind can tell me, critical thinking closely follows what I set out in my "reality principle" video. It is merely the discovering of reality. A commitment to intellectually honesty. Or what we normal people, with normal jobs, who live in the real world call...

"getting to the bottom of things."

Naturally, leave it to the wanna-be adults of academia to take a simple concept your average 10 year old understands and turn it into an entire 4 year study unto itself. Leave it to inferior-minded people to extrapolate thousands of painful pages from a concept as simple as "be intellectually honest." And do you want pain? Just imagine how anal retentive, unimaginative, and truly void of any intelligence you have to be to come up with a "Critical Thinking Community" replete with:

a bookstore
a library research professional development

and assessment and testing.

But, as are with most things in academia, their championing of "critical thinking" is not merely an intellectually-void, navel-gazing, masturbation exercise to falsely validate handing out worthless doctorates and self-importance in a field that provides no value to society. It is to provide them authority over the rest of society. And it is here their nefarious and malicious intent is exposed.

On the face of it, any introductory video to critical thinking will explain it as intellectual honesty, the pursuit of reality, and (as we commoners call it) "getting to the bottom of things." It is based in sanity, reason, logic, and reality. However, if you delve into the world of academia and critical thinking "experts," you'll start to notice a common refrain. They not only obfuscate a simple concept like "reality" in volumes of unnecessary pablum, but they always include some sort of "social awareness" or "adherence to other people's feelings/thoughts/opinions/culture" political component to that definition. AND usually that component trumps reality. Matter of fact, I rarely saw the word "empirical" or "empiricism" mentioned in these definitions. And all one has to do is take a look at a sample definition from one of these "critical thinking authorities:"

"Critical thinking is self-guided, self-disciplined thinking which attempts to reason at the highest level of quality in a fair-minded way. People who think critically consistently attempt to live rationally, reasonably, emphatically*. They are keenly aware of the inherently flawed nature of human thinking when left unchecked. They strive to diminish the power of their egocentric and* sociocentric tendencies*. They use the intellectual tools that critical thinking offers – concepts and principles that enable them to analyze, assess, and improve thinking. They work diligently to develop the intellectual virtues of intellectual integrity, intellectual humility, intellectual civility,* intellectual empathy*, intellectual* sense of justice and confidence in reason. They realize that no matter how skilled they are as thinkers, they can always improve their reasoning abilities and they will at times fall prey to mistakes in reasoning, human irrationality, prejudices, biases, distortions, uncritically accepted social rules and taboos*, self-interest, and vested interest. They* strive to improve the world in whatever ways they can and contribute to a more rational, civilized society. At the same time, they recognize the complexities often inherent in doing so. They avoid thinking simplistically about complicated issues and strive to appropriately consider the rights and needs of relevant others*. They recognize the complexities in developing as thinkers, and commit themselves to life-long practice toward self-improvement. They embody the Socratic principle: The unexamined life is not worth living , because they realize that many unexamined lives together result in an uncritical, unjust, dangerous world.*
~ Linda Elder, September, 2007"

That's a whole lot of SJW-ing and crusaderism when all we want to do is get down to the truth. But keep in mind this overkill of verbosity is on purpose as they are more concerned about advancing political agendas (not to mention keeping their academic fiefdoms financed by leftist governments) than they are pursuing empiricism. And they obfuscate these ulterior motives by attempting to not only hijack a concept like "critical thinking," but by self-appointing themselves as the final authorities and arbiters as to what is "reality," "truth," and "empiricism." This not only grants them sweeping powers (in their minds anyway) to dictate to the rest of us what reality is and how society should be ran, but why when one of us "commoners" question their politics, their motives, and their incentives, they simply bog you down in minutiae, academic pablum, bogus studies, and of course, the always reliable accusation of "you lack critical thinking skills."

However, rather than fight them in their own turf, allow me to simply debunk, disprove, and destroy them in a much simpler, and sniper like way from the opposite direction. If they are so committed to reality. If they are so correct. And if they truly know better than all of us. Then why have nearly all the liberal arts and humanities failed to improve, let alone solve, any of the social ills they purport to be solving?

The wage gap between blacks and whites has not closed, nor has the wage gap between men and women.

Income distribution has worsened since the academic left's wet dream of The Great Society has been implemented.

Divorce, single-parenthood, and broken families have skyrocketed.

And they never seem to point to any success they've had in solving the social ills they purport to (thus always resulting in a hypocritical clamoring for more money and funding).

It is exactly like the laughable Keynesian economists, whose economic policies have spectacularly failed to combat the great recession, but still have the gall to demand the taxpayer "didn't pay enough, because if they did THEN our policies would have worked."

In short, the irony is that if we were to use GENUINE critical thinking, we'd look at all those academic left champions of critical thinking, see that they have made virtually NO progress in their OWN respective fields, and empirically deduce they not only have failed, but are con-artists, charlatans, and parasites cowardly using "critical thinking" as a means to avoid working real jobs in the real world so they may continue to live off of the rest of us. So the next time you hear an academian, a liberal arts graduate, or any other variety of leftist boast about their "critical thinking skills" tell them the truth. Critical thinking as a skill is no more impressive than wiping your own ass. And sadly, most of them lack the intelligence to do either.

A related somewhat response

---

http://www.soundcloud.com/aaron-clarey
http://www.assholeconsulting.com
https://www.youtube.com/user/AaronClarey
https://twitter.com/aaron_clarey
http://www.amazon.com/Aaron-Clarey/e/B00J1ZC350/
Amazon Affiliate

Minority Women in STEM

April 28, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Oops….those damn fathers. Why are they never available for comment?

What You Show Every Leftist

April 28, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

and when they say "but" you cut them off and say "talk to the hand."

Club Vasectomy

April 28, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Join it before it's too late!

MGTOW 101: What is MGTOW?

April 29, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Decided to rattle the hornet's nest because I was bored. It's always fun to rattle the cages of the MGTOW theoreticians:

Maybe Blacks and Whites Just Like to Hang Out With Likes?

May 2, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

I love the forced "integration" of the races.

I could have sworn America was based on choice and most races would like to just hang out with each other and have amicable relations with other races. But apparently, that isn't what your overlords have intended and they're pissed off we haven't melting into a dipshittery goo that is known as that "financial economic success" known as "Brazil."

Perhaps the left should actually endorse what it champions - diversity. Because in the adult real world of economics "diversity" means "specialization" which means better goods at lower costs and improved standards of living for all.

Oh Nosies!!!

May 3, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Looks like some genuine racists got caught lying to the po po. But remember, they're not white so they "can't be racist."

Bitcoin Creator ID'd

May 3, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Or so they theorize. Would like to have a beer with this guy.

Bureaucrats' Jobs Uber Economic Growth

May 3, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

I'll say it again for the cheap seats. Politicians, professors, bureaucrats, and ideologues value their jobs and their egos more than the progress of the rest of society and its people. It's why they will overregulate an economy and make more laws than is necessary because their ego trumps any sense of "optimizing" the level of laws/regulations.

Millennial Theme Song

May 3, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

HAR!!!

Being Smart Is Like Being Stuck in Traffic

May 3, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

An excerpt from a kind review of Curse of the High IQ:

Pretending IQ doesn't matter might be great for the self-esteem of the average kid, but it also means some of us just don't understand why we go through life feeling like we are stuck in traffic all the time. And when we do understand that, then ways to actually make use of that excess time and energy begins to suggest themselves. Knowing where on the bell curve you sit can help you find new reserves of patience and confidence. Learning that I was in the 99.4 percentile of human learning and processing capability suddenly changed my game, because I realized that I could be doing a lot more, and making much better money… which is leading me to make some serious shifts in how I do business.

Episode #148 of The Clarey Podcast!

May 3, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

The Racist Running Game!
Snow days
Commutes of the Sheeples
Fitting into your college tuxedo
Spouses who die together
Humphrey Bogart no bigger than Cappy!
Naming buildings after you is not a legacy

AND MORE!

In THIS EPISODE of The Clarey Podcast!

How Not to Do It: Vicki Larson

May 4, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

I like to be succinct and expeditious. And so I can tell you girls how to do everything right, in pain staking detail, outlining each step of the way needed to succeed in life....

or

I can just tell you what NOT to do. And this is the resume you should simply NOT DO!

Nearly EVERY single mistake your standard American failure of a baby boomer, has-been, rah rah, 70's feminist, leftist woman is scripted in this resume. I simply could not make it up even if I tried. Do the opposite and your chances of happiness will improve.

The Rise and Fall of Glenn Beck

May 4, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Worth a read.

Trump Announces Presidential Running Mate

May 4, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

It is Ice Bear:

The Only Justice to Meet SJW Justice is a Gun

May 5, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Who Will Pay for Everything When the White People are Gone?

May 6, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

A concern of mine is the slowing rate of not only overall economic growth, but more importantly the stagnation of real GDP per capita (as RGDP per capita is the primary measure of economic well-being). However, another concern of mine was how the future demographics of the US will affect economic growth, because, frankly immigrants and minorities are not as productive as whites or Asians. You may not like this fact, and you may chalk it up to racism, bigotry, or whatever else academia, the media, and politicians tell you, but in the end whites and Asians earn/produce more when measured by economics for whatever reasons may be.

Unfortunately, the larger of the two groups (whites) are projected to decline relative to the rest of the population while pretty much every other group grows. And because of this decline relative to other populations I wanted to estimate what would happen to economic growth, and thus, standards of living (measured by RGDP per capita).

I would like to say my methodology was simple (as simple usually results in better more accurate results), but it was as "simple as could be" due to the inherent complexities in projecting populations by race, applying productivity rates to each, and thereby inferring a forecasted RGDP, population, and thus RGDP per capita into the future. In short I used the population growth figures out till 2060 for the four main racial groups in the US, historical RGDP data from the federal reserve, income per capita as a proxy for RGDP per capita (as what you are paid is correlated to what you produce), and multifactor productivity to estimate future, genuine "Real" economic growth.

And the results were interesting.

RGDP Per Capita Historical vs. Predicted
140,000.00
120,000.00
100,000.00
80,000.00
60,000.00
40,000.00
20,000.00
0.00
RGDP Per Capita Historical RGDP Projected
1947
1951
1955
1959
1963
1967
1971
1975
1979
1983
1987
1991
1995
1999
2003
2007
2011 2015
2019
2023 2027
2031
2035
2039
2043
2047
2051
2055
2059

Historically (since 1947) the US has experienced an average RGDP per capita growth rate of 2% per year. This may not seem like a lot, but when compounded over the course of a lifetime you can expect your standards of living to nearly quintuple. Thus, if historical American economic growth rates continued, we could expect to all be producing about $120,000 in GDP per capita by 2060, contrasted with the current $51,000 we produce today.

However, that will not be happening. As the racial composition of America changes, downward pressure on economic growth will result. Of course, this assumes current production by the four main racial groups remain the same (as well as birthing rates for each group), but if the forecasts are correct (which, as a caveat, in economics they rarely are) we can expect an average annual increase of only .5%, resulting in barely any advances in our standards of living (and before you start making accusations of racism, keep in mind by this time whites will be a minority in the country, so this post is by mathematical reality, to benefit future minorities).

Now, if you have a care for the future, regardless of race, ethnicity, sex, or political affiliation, these figures (guesstimates as they may be) are MATH and have serious ramifications for your children and future Americans. For while it's all fun and games today to blame everything on "whitey" or "males," in the end they are the engine of economic growth that powers this economy AND (as it just so happens) subsidizes the government programs minorities, immigrants (and women) rely disproportionately on. And without them either taxation on minorities would have to increase considerably, or you will simply have to do without your precious government checks (though technically as it stands right now, the current system is not suppoortable or sustainable anyway, but we can keep this up as long as the dollar remains the world's reserve currency).

Therefore, if you care about your children and grand children, economic production of women and minorities need to increase. I have already outlined what is required to close the various wage gaps between minorities and whites/males, however I fear that pride, ego, and self-pity is getting in the way of this success. From kindergarten to college, everyone is brainwashed to believe it's racism, sexism, bigotry or misogyny that is holding them back. It's the "patriarchy," the "corporations," and "CIS gendered white male scum" who actively conspire against you. However, we (and by "we" I mean minorities and women and their children who will take over this country) do not have the time for these lies. Yes, there certainly is token examples of racism and sexism. And yes, if you go looking for it, especially with the 17 years of k-college brainwashing you've received, you'll see "ists" and "isms" hiding in every shadow and every corner. But keep in mind this is nothing but propaganda and lies from the democrat party to spare your feelings, ego, and pride, all in exchange for your vote...and sadly...your future success in life.

To be blunt, while there is nothing you can do about genuine racism, sexism, or bigotry, you can:

Stop having kids you can't afford or out of wedlock
Stop majoring in stupid shit (that goes particularly for the ladies).
Stop spending more than you make.
Stop blaming your own stupid decisions on other people.
And make sure you don't make stupid decisions in the first place.

It won't eliminate racism or sexism, but unlike racism or sexism, these things ARE under your control and will do more to close the wage gaps between minorities and whites/males than any government program or piece of self-pitying, self-defeatism coming out of the public schools or the democrat party.

Finally, one last warning. While this post has been a tough-fatherly-love-inspired criticism of the economic production of minorities, not all of the blame can be put on them. For while "white males" have have traditionally been the engine of economic growth and innovation that have made people's standards of living quintuple over lifetimes, even that engine is succumbing to the same leftist propaganda of entitlements, woeismeism, laziness, easy degrees, and an abdication of responsibility. Note the lack of growth in RGDP per capita that has already been occurring since 2006 (in the green circle).

Some of this can certainly be blamed on the Great Recession. However, how much of it is also the average American white male going from this:

to this:

Not only are white's numbers going to decline, their quality and caliber has already gone to pot.

The day will come minorities will be on their own. Prepare accordingly.

The Pope is a Socialist First, a Catholic Second

May 7, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

When you Catholics decide to start thinking on your own and realize this fraud loves socialism, hates western civilization, and maybe gets around to thinking about religion on a tertiary level, then maybe you'll impeach him or whatever the hell it is you Catholics do to kick heretics out.

Late Night Podcast Listening Pleasure

May 8, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Geek out with The Bechtloff.

Sign up for the Black Brigade Debrief with DT and The Man!

An analysis of Rabbits and Psycho-Pass from Davis Aurini.

May is Worthless Degree Awareness Month!

May 8, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Prevent loved ones from ruining their lives by ensuring they DON'T major in worthless subjects!

Is There an End to Feminism?

May 9, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Ummm....no.

How to Measure Corporate Welfare

May 9, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

A problem I faced is that I am not a leftist. And since I'm not a leftist, that means I just can't pull statistics out of my ass, start my statements with "I just feel," or outright lie because it suits my belief in how "I feel" the world should be.

I need statistics. I need facts. And I need good methodology so I know, as accurately as possible, precisely what the hell I'm talking about. And one of the few economic stones I have left unturned with empiricism has been "corporate welfare." Specifically, how much is there?

This is an important statistic to know because when debating leftists they always claim that if we "just got rid of corporate welfare" then we wouldn't have a budget deficit nor (consequently) a national debt. That if we just stopped giving all those nasty corporations all that government cheese we'd be able to fund everything and everyone, from free education, to free jobs, to free house, and free healthcare.

Of course, when you try to peg them down on precisely how much in "corporate welfare" me and the other taxpayers give to these evil corporations, none of them have any figures. And so, as always with leftists, you can't rely on any kind of constructive debate that advances our understanding and moves us closer to a practical solution, simply because the left has no freaking clue what they're talking about. They're merely regurgitating talking points (usually lies) they heard from some other equally misinformed leftist and the real adult work of getting to the bottom of things and conducting research begins.

To be succinct and save you time, the truth is corporate welfare is poorly defined, and thus hard to measure. Leftists would claim any law or action by the government that would benefit corporations is "welfare." So if a construction company gets a contract to build a road that's "welfare" (even though the company IS building a road). Leftists would also claim any tax break or lowering of taxes is corporate welfare, obviously operating from the premise that all those corporate profits are THEIR money, not those stupid shareholders'. Again, lacking intellectual honesty and not really the definition of "welfare," this does not help us define corporate welfare, nor advance the conversation, let alone nail down a number.

But I believe there is some common ground we can agree upon.

For example I think we all agree that backroom deals and any UNFAIR gains given to connected corporations via political donations or lobbyists IS indeed corporate welfare. The TARP bailouts are no doubt corporate welfare. And the upcoming student loan bail out's is also guaranteed to be corporate welfare (Oh wait, never mind. It's OK when stupid leftist college students get bailed out of their mistakes like banksters.)

Ergo, somewhere between the $19 trillion in corporate welfare (assuming if we believe the leftists and that without corporate welfare we'd have no debt) and the Benjamin of grease that is slapped on the palms of a local councilman, there is the true measure of corporate welfare that reasonable and intellectually honest people would agree upon. Unfortunately, I'm too lazy to economics today to find it. But fortunately I don't have to because two economists have done it for me.

A recent study from the Cato Institute suggests in 2012 corporate welfare was around $120 (at the federal level). Another study, done quite some time ago in 1990 suggested it was $170 billion. If we were to prorate that today to adjust for inflation and the increase in the budget/economy that would be about $500 billion. I'd like to split the difference and call it $330 billion, but I noticed the author of the second study was a professor of social work which I don't believe is a real science or discipline. In short, I don't trust academians over the Cato institution. Besides which, my suspicions were right. He is a life long academic, never setting foot in the real world, and in all intellectual honesty I have to believe his research was biased by his ideological leanings. So with this "mailing it in, back of napkin" economics, I've decided to weight the Cato Institute heavier than the lone socialist academian, I have come up with a cool $225 billion in annual corporate welfare (it should be noted however, this does not include TARP as - hopefully - that was a one time anal raping of the American taxpayer).

Naturally, it is impossible to know how much in corporate welfare there truly is. We can't measure every penny, won't know every bribe, and don't know which of Obama's cronies got which contract to run Solyndra. I'm heavily relying on the intellectual honesty and methodology of both economists mentioned above. And truth is I'd be more tempted to believe when all corruption and inefficiency is taken into account, it may very well be closer to the hippie pothead professor's $500 billion (which would actually make the case for the left for once!). The key thing, however, is to see if the leftist who parrots the "if we got rid of corporate welfare" line as the faintest clue as to what he's talking about. Hopefully, this post help you determine that.

Bachelor Pad Economics FINALLY Available on Audible!

May 10, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Finally f*cking here!

How Radical Muslims Will Get Nukes

May 11, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

They will simply vote themselves in and take over the UK and its arsenal of nuclear weapons.

Emma Watson and the Panama Papers

May 11, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

I already made a video about the Panama Papers and how it was basically leftist journalists hoping for a "gotcha" moment, when in reality it was nothing more than rich people using the tax laws to LEGALLY lower their tax bills

But it's good when they eat their own.

Make a Fortune Selling Lies to Women

May 12, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Seriously, if I ever had a son I would tell him to forget medical school, forget engineering, and just go and lie to women to make your fortune.

Way easier.
Way less capital investment.
Just follow the democrat business model.

Lie to women.

What Would Happen if Trump Defaulted on the US Debt?

May 12, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

If economics were taught this way, every man, woman, and child would be informed citizens and we wouldn't have the financial problems we have today.

Episode #149 of The Clarey Podcast - Huey Ray Fischer Episode!

May 13, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

The Mall of America is blogging dying
Lie to get ahead
Is hate fucking rape?
Austin's leftists fuck over Austin's leftists
Huey Ray Fischer - the epitome of a lazy, millennial, socialist, parasite
SWPL Republicans blow $63 million of high school football stadium

AND MORE!

in THIS EPISODE of The Clarey Podcast!

Why Feminist Ghost Busters Was Doomed from the Start

May 14, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

An excellent analysis.

Another Western Motorcycle Adventure Begins

May 16, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Greetings Lieutenants,

The Ole Captain has decided to retrieve his new motorcycle he purchased earlier this winter and drove from Sarasota to Las Vegas. It had to remain in Vegas until the snow in the upper states melted, which they have, and now it's time to fetch it.

Thankfully my buddy needed his RV transported from Minnesota to Las Vegas, which not only provided the opportunity for a free ride out to Vegas, but made me feel like Jason Statham in "The Transporter"...minus the cool car...and the hot Asian chick...and the muscles. But I beat Statham on hair.

Regardless, expect pictures from the American west as the Ole Captain's tour stops at great places like Kayenta, Grand Junction, Cortez, Steamboat, Denver, Hot Springs, and Deadwood.

Ahhhh Philly

May 16, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

I'll always remember you fondly.

Las Vegas to Moab via Punching Through the Storm

May 17, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Did the first leg of the home coming trip to bring my new cruiser bike back. Started in Las Vegas early this morning and then made it up to Moab, Utah. The problem was, however, that there was a storm...which had just dumped snow in Zion National Park...and hail south of Moab...and was the storm we had to punch through. Because it's now or never to bring the bike back.

Unfortunately the shoddy rain poncho/gear I bought was torn to shreds by cross winds and the ole Captain got drenched and a tad bit hypothermic, but it did provide for some great post-storm pictures (though Monument Valley was "rained out")

Remember everybody, buy ALL of my books so when I get home I can retire.

The Continuiation of Cappy's Western Adventure

May 19, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

More pics, these are primarily from Moab, Utah. Half are "panorama" pics which you need to click on and expand to get the full effect.

The Major Lies of Feminism

May 20, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

An excerpt from Bachelor Pad Economics, which if you haven't read it, you will after watching/listening to this video:

Sony Butthurt Over Feminist Ghostbusters?

May 22, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

So I was going to recommend you Geek Out with The Bechtloff until I saw YouTube has taken down his podcast/video because it had pictures from Sony's Ghostbusters (the feminist one) and thus violated the user policy.

Though, it does make one wonder was it really because some of the background pictures happen to be from Sony's film, or that the podcast, rightly, ripped the hell out of the upcoming shitshow called "We Don't Need No Man Ghostbusters."

In the meantime if you need something for your listening pleasure and still want to Geek Out with the Bechtloff, you can listen to John Steele's interview with him as they talk geekery and politics.

Also, will be making the final leg of the journey back home and posts will return to normal.

Overcoming the Lies of Your Elders

May 23, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

You can buy the book here.

$1 Million Charity to See the New Ghostbusters

May 23, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

You may make donations and share here. If this thing gets funded that would the funniest and coolest shit ever.

Fuck You Minnesota, and Fuck You Mark Dayton

May 23, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Plastic bag bans and now this.

Fuck you all.

South Senior High School in Minneapolis Racist Against Whites

May 25, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

An agent in the field sent this to me. In the vain hopes of helping the students out at South Senior High I put together this video.

I'm sure they'll take down the page now that the "workshop" is over, but I have saved images from the page and will never let the school district forget that they:

1. are GENUINELY racist and hate white people
2. view the children as a means to profit off of instead of actually help them and educate them to be successful in the real world.
3. employ only the most worthless and unemployable parasites who lack the real world experience to teach their students anything of value
4. are the perfect argument to homeschool your children and privatize the schools ASAP

The Gospel of Wealth: Guest Post

May 26, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

The Gospel of Wealth

The West is an ever increasingly hostile environment for those who understand the virtues of capitalism and profit from it. The Occupy Wall Street movement, the growing hatred toward the 1%, the War on Cash, and even Pope Francis' War on Capitalism all send an alarming signal to the remaining capitalists of the world. The free market in the Land of the Free and throughout the West isn't so … well … free, anymore. Too many people mourn the death of the American Dream without realizing that its passing has come as a consequence of their attack on capitalism.

America was once the home of capitalism at its finest. From that era have come some of the greatest rags to riches stories of the American Dream. Andrew Carnegie's story is one of them. Carnegie was a capitalist giant in an age of US history when capitalism was king. The son of Scottish immigrants who moved to the United States in 1848, Carnegie was a hard worker and a passionate learner. Though he began spending most of his days working for $1.20 an hour, his hunger for learning was fed through the books he read thanks to a wealthy man who opened his library of 400 volumes to working boys each Saturday night.

Over the years, Carnegie made his way up the ladder of success. He became superintendent of the Pittsburgh Division of the Pennsylvania Railroad Company at a young age, began investing in his early twenties, and eventually got involved in the ironworks industry. He soon left his position at the railroad, developed a steel rolling mill and built and expanded his company over the years.

Carnegie was an industrial success, a product of pure capitalism, and is recognized as the driving force behind the expansion of the US steel industry at the end of the nineteenth century. While many critics of capitalism would have him demonized in the history books as an industrial tycoon, Carnegie left behind a legacy of philanthropy — one he based on his personal philosophy as outlined in "The Gospel of Wealth."

In defense of capitalism

Written in 1889, Carnegie's "The Gospel of Wealth" still contains financial wisdom any aspiring capitalist should analyze and put into practice — whether they ever intend to become a philanthropist or not. One of the most important points he made was one that many people in the US have forgotten: the benefits of capitalism. He argued that the contrast between the millionaire's palace and the laborer's cottage was merely a measure of the change which comes with civilization. This contrast was not to be deplored, but welcomed and recognized as something beneficial, and even essential for the progress of society. The material development and improved conditions that come in the wake of capitalism — despite the inequality it creates — makes life better for society as a whole.

Yet, all the poor working class Americans of the 21st century with TVs, iPads, and smart phones will never recognize capitalism's general advancement of society because the mentality of entitlement has taught them that they are the victim.
Yes, despite the incredible material comforts that have made the life of even the poorest among us more lavish than that of ancient kings, the advancements of capitalism are still stained by the inequality that so often grows out of the free market.
But Carnegie knew that this inequality was the price society pays for the law of competition, and that it was a price worth paying.

What to do with excess wealth

Carnegie also recognized that those who rise to the top by virtue of the free market will soon have more money than they could possibly ever spend on themselves.His question, then, was what the wealthy were to do with their fortunes, especially when taking into consideration the fact that one day the possessor of such wealth would die. He argued that there were really only three ways to administer surplus wealth: it could be 1) left to the families of the descendent, 2) used for public services (i.e. taken by the government at death through the estate tax or voluntary donation) or 3) administered by the possessor during their lifetime.

Of the first two options, Carnegie was skeptical. He felt that leaving one's wealth to family was more of a disservice than a blessing, and stated that "the thoughtful man must shortly say, 'I would as soon leave to my son a curse as the almighty dollar.'" Man must earn his wealth, not inherit it. And, of the second option of leaving wealth at death for public use, Carnegie argued that this was only an option for those who were content to wait until they were dead before becoming of much good in the world. He also claimed that those who earned such wealth were the individuals in possession of the exact skills needed to administer it. He also pointed out the great waste in so-called charity programs where money was spent so unwisely that it produced the very evils it was aimed at eliminating. Sound familiar?

So Carnegie argued that the best means of administering your excess wealth was to use it during your lifetime. His conclusion was to use it for charitable purposes that aimed at helping those who would help themselves.
By the time of his death in 1919, Carnegie had funded the construction of 3,000 public libraries and either funded and/or founded several universities. In all, he had given away $350,695,653 (roughly $76.9 billion adjusted to 2015) of his wealth.

Your Wealth, Your Decision

Now, I am not going to tell you as Carnegie did that you should spend your excess wealth on projects that will improve the general condition of the human race. Nor am I going to tell you not to if that is what you wish to do with it.
But I am going to agree with Carnegie in his applause of capitalism and his conclusion that you should not wait for your wealth to be used by the government at your death.

Because — whether you want to believe it or not — you will die and the government will take your money.
In fact, the United States government will take 40 per cent of it. And, yes, that's one of the highest rates in the world. The fourth highest to be exact (tied with the UK).

The beauty of being a capitalist, however, is that you are not bound by the borders in which you were born. Countries and the estate tax laws they wield have borders, you don't.

Once you go beyond the lines that are drawn on maps — the lines that make up countries and house Big Government — you'll discover that there is a lot more freedom for you and your wealth on this planet. There are even countries that won't take your money when you die.

Not a cent.

You read that right: there are countries on this rotating chunk of rock that will not charge you a single penny for dying. There are a lot of them, if truth be told; and you can take advantage of that by diversifying your wealth on an international scale. Just since 2000, eleven countries and two jurisdictions have repealed their inheritance or estate taxes. And these are places where you probably wouldn't mind keeping your money while you're alive to begin with — countries like Singapore and Hong Kong. Even tax-happy governments like Norway and Sweden — not shy to use revenue from tax rates as high as 60% for their own brand of social welfare — have done away with the estate tax.

In other words, you have a lot of options.

So don't wait until you're on your death bed to think about the eternal destiny of your wealth. Make active decisions now to ensure that your wealth does what you want it to do and goes where you want it to go while you're here and when you're gone.

If not, the government will decide for you.

Vote for Bernie Sanders

May 26, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

And this is what you millennial dipshits will get.

I Refuse to Defend Western Women

May 26, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

And so should you.

Why I Will End Funding to All Public Universities

May 27, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Our "brightest"

More Smug Leftist Virture Signalling from Target

May 29, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Didn't know this was going on until I just saw the commercial now. The campaign has been going on since 2015, but it's just cementing my decision not to give this corporation any more money.

Dear "Capitalists," Monetize Your F@cking Sites Already!

May 30, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Look, if you're a "right of center" podcaster, blogger, or YouTuber, could you at least not by a hypocrite by asking for "patreon" donations like NPR and at least run ads on your fucking site?

Episode #150 of The Clarey Podcast (For Your Memorial Day Drive Listening Pleasure)

May 30, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Ummm...yes I can say "Happy" Memorial Day you idiots.
Baton twirling, parades, football and soccer.
"I'm gonna stay at home."
Poser PUA, Life Coaches, and MGTOWS
The Lord will not provide for dumbasses.
Asking out the HR lady.
Hate mail and Fan Mail.
It's funny seeing Venezuela suffer.

AND MORE!

In THIS EPISODE of The Clarey Podcast!

Elizabeth Holmes Prediction About "Women's Empowerment"

May 31, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

I know, I know girls. It just isn't fair that you have to actually do the maths and the hard work and the STEM in order for there to be genuine production and thus, genuine value in society. Trust me, I know sister, it's all part of a patriarchy conspiracy called "reality."

But in the meantime, how much you want to bet the professional victim industry is going to swipe this disgraced fraud right up and put her on a speaking/consulting tour about "empowering women?"

The Father Could Not Be Reached for Comment

May 31, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

On a related note, economist in Minnesota thinks he has figured out the magic "Minority Report" formula to ID future millennial mass shooters who kill innocents because they couldn't get laid.

Details at 6!

Why Even Conservatives Don't Deserve America

May 31, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Though I wrote the book "Enjoy the Decline," my 37 years of life previous to its authoring still left some semblance, some nagging ounce of hope, and love for this country. That perhaps, through spectacular luck and unseen natural economic and political forces, the country would wake up, vote against the state, and pursue a new path towards freedom, liberty, and greatness. Of course, I have no genetic skin in the country's future game, but still, it was a dormant hope that kept popping up, and one that (though appreciated) I still managed to keep in check.

Sadly, that hope is now officially gone as I've realized even the majority of conservatives do not deserve America.

This final nail in the coffin came in the form of a new podcast I was listening to over my Memorial Day travels. It was clever, it was intelligent, it was libertarian, it had 35,000 subscribers. And so I was hopeful I could run some ads for my own books on their show resulting in a mutually beneficial arrangement. Of course, when the segment came up where they'd normally run advertising, they did the most non-conservative, non-capitalist, 100% NPR thing - they asked for donations. This then sent me into a tirade as not only were my hopes at future profit and a better life dashed, but this was just one more of the many "conservative, libertarian, pro-freedom, pro-capitalist" social media sites that proved to be only capitalist in theory.

This experience then reminded me of the exhausting, wasteful, pointless, and sometimes outright costly experiences I've had doing business with effectively "not liberals."

When I was on my "Worthless" book tour I was sponsored by a young conservative college group. I took a full week of vacation and a week of leave of absence to tour the country, giving a speech about the risks of majoring in worthless subjects. Hoping this would prove mutually beneficial (I would profit, young college students would invest wisely in their education), I was instead greeted by impossibly inept republican, conservative, or libertarian college students which made the entire tour a waste.

They'd only book the room for 15 minutes, while the speech was an hour.
They forgot to bring an LCD projector, and one time chairs.
Some conservative college groups failed to advertise the speech altogether, and thus...
We'd have a whopping 3-4 people in the audience if anybody showed up at all.

Then there was the two speeches I gave to the MN GOP and Tea Party. Thinking these were wiser, older, more mature people, I expected we would not endure the same youth-caused logistical problems that plagued my book tour. Which we didn't. We did, however, get to deal with a whole new problem. It fell on deaf ears.

Not that the speech wasn't good. Not that the audience didn't love it (they did). But the whole point of the speech was how to get young men interested in conservative politics. At best, both audiences had 20 years left of life expectancy, and they wanted to bring new blood into the GOP. And after delivering a rousing speech, which clearly and cleverly laid out a brilliant strategy to do this....nothing. Not a single thing.

No call.
No inquiry.
No follow up.

I even called MULTIPLE chapters of the GOP to volunteer only to NEVER have a single call returned. I even attended the republican caucus HANDING MY CARD TO THE INTERIM CHAIR, EXPLICITLY STATING I'D LIKE TO HELP only to once again, never hear back. It became apparent to me that this ineptitude and laziness is so rife and complete within the republican party, that its presumed most ardent cheerleaders don't even care about freedom enough to expend the 2 calories of energy it takes to call people back.

Then there's boycotting. Boycotting is very simple to me. If you as a company, an actor, or some other agent in the US is/are going to advocate an action that lessens my freedom and life, I'm not going to give you any of my business, money, or time. I don't buy Apple. I don't shop at Target. I don't buy Starbucks. I don't bank at any bank that took TARP money. And I'd Napster U2's music (if I wanted to listen to very bland, very beige, baby boomer tripe).

But oh no, that's too much of an inconvenience for 95% of the conservatives in America. They will line up for every Leonardo DiCaprio movie, get their daily starbucks, fork over their children's college fund for the newest iPhone, bank at Bank of America, and will support communism directly by getting gas at Citgo. Of course, the hypocrisy is if the 50% of the American public (which is presumably conservative) were to all cut off these agent whores of socialism, then there'd be more REAL change overnight than there was during Reagan's entire administration. But that's just too inconvenient to drive the 5 minutes down to Dunn Brothers, the 6 minutes down to Wal-Mart, and geez, we SWPL republican suburbanites just can't let the neighbors see us with a Samsung!

Then there's my personal experiences with so called "capitalists" in my own life. Related to my frustration over the "non-profit capitalist" podcast that didn't run ads, most conservatives, libertarians, capitalists and free marketers I've meet in my life just lack the hustle and desire to achieve excellence. They just plain lack the work ethic and hunger it takes to push themselves, and thus as a group, society to new levels of success, innovation, achievement, and accomplishment. And so when I try to employ them, either through contract work, reaching out to them to conduct business, or perhaps offering them money outright, the responses I get are...

never calling me back,
6 month delays,
lethargy,
a completely lack of hustle,
a cluelessness about the opportunity that is being wasted, no appreciation for the insane value of time,
no appreciation for the potential of profit, shoddy work, or no work at all

They, like the aforementioned podcast, are merely academian, theoretician, Monday morning quarterback capitalists. They like to claim they are, but never put forth the effort to become actual capitalists.

This, among other things, has forced me to conclude that the majority of conservatives (not all) are very much like most liberals and leftists. They view politics and economics not as the key to unlock and unleash the total potential of human kind, allowing us to drastically improve the lives of future generations, and achieve untold levels of greatness in our own. They view it as a religion, a therapy session, and a substitute for real and genuine accomplishment in life because they're too damn lazy to put any real work or effort into it. This is why after 40 years of Rush Limbaugh and 35 years of conservative talk radio, nothing has been achieved because, just like going to church, it's easier to bitch, whine, lament, rue, and mope, than actually put forth the work and effort. And just because they claim to be conservative doesn't meant they have a harder work ethic or know better. They just happened to be lucky to choose the political model that actually works.

All these drawbacks aside, however, there is a silver lining.

The epiphany that most conservatives are just as inept and lazy as leftists has allowed me to achieve great solace, serenity, and calm in my philosophical and political-psychological-life because, frankly, the vast majority of Americans do not deserve America. Democrat or Republican, conservative or socialist, capitalist or communist, the majority of people are just too damn lazy and incompetent to deserve something as great as America. This should be of great alleviation to both you and me because we no longer have to:

worry
fret
or burden ourselves with the future of this country because...

this country and its people will get PRECISELY what they deserve. It is perfect justice, it is right and correct, and for us to get in its way is not only wrong, but a waste of what few and precious moments of life we have on the planet. Cheer it on and…

Enjoy the decline.

What Do You Call a Marine Reverend?

May 31, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

"Sir."

Introducing a new blog and podcast, Rev. (and Marine) Kenn Blanchard.

You can find his blog here, but you can find his podcast "Black Man With a Gun" (though I prefer "Preacher with a Gun") here.

The Reverend has been kind enough to help me get Black Man's Guide Out of Poverty out there, so please stop in and check him out, especially if you are a gun enthusiast.

What Are Negative Interest Rates? (An Explanation for Normal People)

June 1, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Dear Facebook, I Think It's Time We Took a Break

June 1, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Dear Facebook,

I know we've had our troubles in the past, especially you kicking me out of your life for a 72 hour probationary period. However, thankfully, in those 72 hours without you it gave me time to pause, think, and reflect upon our relationship.

You see, while I love interacting online with my friends, engaging in conversation, and provoking new thought and emotions in others, in the end I find that about 90% of my time spent with you is ultimately wasted. I've been conditioned to automatically click on my Facebook App icon if I see there's a new notification, only to realize it's a picture or a comment that neither advances nor genuinely improves my life. When I hear that "ding" on my phone my heart has palpitations, thinking it may be something of genuine intellectual interest, only to see it's another, of increasingly common, articles about refugees raping their "Refugees Welcome" hosts or Donald Trump p'wnding the media. And instead of going to bed at a reasonable hour, you keep me up at night in the vain hopes you might just say something useful, inspiring, or intelligent to me...and you just don't. When I add it up, I waste a full 2 hours a day with you that is just unrewarding.

Also, to be honest, you're just a bit too controlling. When I'm having a private conversation with friends about sensitive political topics, you seem to think you have the authority to come in and ban me out of your life because of my views. And I fear it isn't even my views as much as it is my language, which makes you even more invasive and tyrannical! My use of the word "faggot" (which I can only surmise is why you wanted to not see me for those ponderous 72 hours, but you won't tell me) wasn't a slander against gays (of which you KNOW I'm pro-gay and pro-gay marriage), as much as it was leftist faggoty pussies that are destroying our nation. And my BFF Chris? You banned him too for equally unknown reasons! Of course, I know I'm under your house and your rules, and you can make up whatever rules you want, but I just thought you were more progressive and open-minded than that, especially for somebody from San Francisco.

Considering all this, I agree with you. I think we do need a break. But unlike your 72 hour probation period, I don't want to see you for 2 weeks. I miss my real friends in the real world. I want it to be like the 80's again where we met in meatspace, played baseball, had lunch, and biked all over town. I want to find myself again so I don't lose myself to a digital world of kitty pics, Daily Mail tabloid articles, and Donald Trump hashtags. I want to go and fish and ride my motorcycle and live life. And truthfully, I want to end my addiction to clicking on the Facebook app everytime I hear a "ding" or see a notification.

I know this may be hard for you...and heaven help you if millions of other people were to do the same thing. Because, unlike "boycotting big oil for one day" if millions of people didn't check into Facebook for two weeks, that might actually have an effect...but I think we both need more than 72 hours off to find ourselves. Me, so I'm not wasting the two hours a day on unrewarding clickbait...and you so you can realize that expending shareholder resources lording over and snooping in on people's conversations probably isn't a good idea.

I'll only be calling when I need to post articles I've written or post a new episode on my podcast. Until then....

Farewell,

Aaron Clarey

_____

http://aaron-clarey.podomatic.com/
http://www.assholeconsulting.com
https://www.youtube.com/user/AaronClarey
https://twitter.com/aaron_clarey
http://www.amazon.com/Aaron-Clarey/e/B00J1ZC350/
Amazon Affiliate

Time for the Nerds to Show Down MassMutual over H-1B Visas

June 1, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Article can be found here.

The REAL Threat the "Quadrillion" Derivatives Market Poses to the World Economy

June 2, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Just keeping it real folks:

Chad Finally Got His CPA Site Up!

June 3, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Our good friend Chad Elkins finally has his site up which you can find here.

Remember, if you're looking for a good accountant, be it for taxes, audit, financial advice, or business accounting, consider contacting Chad.

Friday Afternoon Linkage

June 3, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Aurini vs. YouTube. A compelling case to diversify your social media.

Glorious Karl also chimes in about the censoring in today's social media.

A book review I was paid $350 to do...and it still wasn't enough. It's about Fareed Zakaria's "In Defense of a Liberal Education" and it was TRULY an insight as to just how much of a bubble our educational elite live in.

Eat, sleep, sex. It's so simple but you girls just insist on making it complicated.

Asshole Consulting Sponsors a Race Team

June 4, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

I kid you not! (and no it's not photoshopped)

You may find more about the team, racer, and race here.

Remember, if you have problems and you want them solved AND you don't want Oprah rainbows blown up your ass, visit Asshole Consulting!

Burn Baby Burn

June 6, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Again, I'll explain it to the younger and dumber people out there, if you attend a school that runs advertisements during day time TV that is proof you are an idiot, you have no hope in life, and you shouldn't make it worse by attending one of these schools.

At any point in your history of ignorance you may read my book for a fraction of the cost it takes you to go to a degree mill.

Looking to Hire Pastors and Priests

June 6, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

The ole Captain has a heck of a doozy plan in that little brain of his and I'm in need of pastors and priests. I need GOOD pastors and priests, not morons who wanted to avoid the vietnam war and just signed up at the local seminary because they didn't have anything better to do in their lives. REAL men of the cloth who are passionate about their work, truly believe in what they do, produce good sermons, and are the slightest bit technologically savvy.

If you know any or you yourself are one, please contact the ole Captain below at his "about" profile.

Episode #151 of the Clarey Podcast!

June 7, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Telling your wife "no."
The world will not end if I don't put the glass away.
At least Fred Flintstone put up a fight.
Marrying the ocean.
Podcast pastor!

AND MORE!

In THIS EPISODE of The Clarey Podcast!

Raping the Canadian Taxpayer

June 7, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

The good news is the Muslims will totally take care of this.

Ladies, Do You Want to Close the Wage Gap or Just Bitch About It?

June 7, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Because I'm sick and tired of hearing the whinny complainy bullshit:

In the meantime, if you're serious, you may close the wage gap anytime by reading this book.

Actually, Most Bosses Are Idiots

June 8, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

My dislike of authority or bosses is certainly no secret. People may chalk this up to my personality, my independence, or my ego. But my personal eccentricities that makes W4 work impossible aside, the majority of people do not like having a boss. Additionally, the majority of people think their bosses are idiots and they could do a better job.

"Wisdom" and experience merely writes this off as ego, or the pride of the employee. Sure, all bosses are "idiots" and all of them "suck." Now why don't you suck it up and get your ass back to work like the rest of us. But something got me thinking about bosses, as well as the nature of companies. The vast majority of them fail. And very few last more than 100 years. Meaning, matter of fact, by statistical reality...yes...

most bosses do suck, are idiots, and the employees are very likely right.

After wracking my brain to come up with a formula to calculate what percent of companies fail, and thus, what percent of bosses are incompetent idiots, I realized this was an impossible task because of the nature of businesses.

8 out of 10 businesses fail in 18 months. But those are start ups and not established companies with thousands of middle management bosses.

Also, those entrepreneurs/bosses may start multiple companies.

What if the company doesn't go belly up, but grows? Vindication of good bosses, but then it's bought out and management is cut to save overhead.

Do we include bosses in mergers? How do we track them? They could have helped the company grow, but lack the foresight to avoid getting laid off (as they train in their replacements).

The truth is there is no way to nail it down to a single digital percentage, but in just looking at how few companies actually survive long term, as well as the short term failure rate, the mathematical reality is the VAST majority of bosses are incompetent oafs who really don't know what they're doing. From outright idiotic business moves elucidated in "Restaurant Impossible," to the daily chronicling of Scott Adam's Dilbert, to the bailing out of companies that couldn't see the housing bubble coming, as a whole corporate America and your average employer are freaking morons that usually end up stealing money from their creditors (and sometimes taxpayers). But what's worse is the mental torture they wreak on their employees. Employees who have simple, basic common sense, know precisely what's wrong with the company, but are either disciplined or just outright terminated if they dare to point out the failings of their supervisors or, worse, can't simply live the lies their bosses want them to.

In the end having very average, if not, inferior people promoted based on conformance, compliance and ass kissing spells inevitable doom to the majority of employers. They are not only incapable of management or leadership, but are also incapable of identifying opportunities that would result in a successful company, not to mention threats that immediately threaten its survival. This is why nearly every company you or I have worked for is no longer in business and if you were to look up your bosses, they too have likely been fired, "let go," or are now working for a completely new employer.

But don't worry, they're actively working on bankrupting that company too.

The Difference Between Keynesian and Austrian Economics

June 8, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

A request from an Asshole Consulting client that I thought I'd share:

The Victim Whoring Industry Targets AirBNB

June 9, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Crony capitalist/lobbyists targeting a new and up-and-coming start up that threatens their business model?
Check

Worthless humans who can't be employed pimping out some leftist cause so they can get shake down money?
Check

No empirical proof AirBNB is guilty of racism and it's just thus far hearsay?
Check

Why There Are No High Hopes for Trump

June 9, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

I find the heart attacks and strokes traditional (and typically, older) republicans have over Trump to be entertaining because it is perfectly analogous to your old, square parents just not getting something the younger kids are hip to. And that "something" is the fact that Trump, as bad as he is, is at least not a career politician. He's not been in office, he has private sector experience, he speaks his mind, and even though we may even vehemently disagree with some things he says, it's the fact he's blunt about it that makes it so refreshing.

Still, the fuddy-duddies and has-beens in the republican party, take out their canes, and yell at us like Grandpa Simpson, "Dag nabbit!!! Don't you youngin's know Trump is a wolf in sheep's clothing!!!??? Why he was a democrat before he ran for the republican nomination! Why can't you vote for somebody sensible and who wears good shoes and has a decent haircut like that Kasich fella!!!!????" And to them we roll our eyes, pat them on the head, and say, "there there grandpa." For no matter how many times you try to explain it, they just don't seem to get it.

However, in order to show that Trump supporters aren't naive, foolish children, and that we are fully aware of his dubious background, let me let you old timers in on a little secret.

Nobody has high hopes for Trump.

Oh, I'm sure some people do, but most Trump supporters are fully aware that he is not the absolute best this country has to offer (that would've been Ben Carson). We are aware of his questionable background. And we are sure his personality will ruffle all the right and wrong feathers in Washington. But what the old-timer republicans have to understand is the Bush-McCain-Bush-Bush-Dole-Romney-Cruz legacy of candidates the republican party has given us is even worse. And with such a low (and corrupt....and nepotistic...and elitist) standard Trump, with all of his faults, still clears that hurdle.

So then what precisely are we expecting from Trump?

Well, frankly nothing.

It goes without saying he will effectively be an independent party president as neither the republicans or democrats in congress will work with him. He's also only one man, unable to solve our nation's largest problem (national debt/the economy) as it's beyond solving. He might build a wall, but again, congress would have to fund him. And the psychological indoctrinating foundation has already been laid for 30 years to raise a generation of truly worthless, unreliable, and borderline psychotic socialists who simply won't discover a work ethic once Trump gets elected.

All we are hoping for is a slow down to buy us some more time so that we might see a social security check or two. That maybe we don't let all of Syria, Iraq, and Somalia into our country next week. Perhaps he even keeps taxes from jolting up to pay for all the socialist parasites the republicans were incapable of stopping. So inept and so impotent has the republican party been at stopping America from being ruined, we'd rather take a bet on somebody we don't truly know because doing that same thing over and over again isn't working. And since the republican's track record has been so bad, we really don't have any expectations from Mr. Trump, and won't be surprised if he achieves nothing.

And just keep in mind, that minimal level of quality and caliber is still a better option than the same RINO republican slop candidates you've been serving all this time. Enjoy that decline!

How Democrats Use and Abuse the Black Community

June 10, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

A letter I wrote to one of my favorite radio shows that I thought might be worth sharing:

Dear Joe,

While your efforts to improve the lot and lives of those living in North Minneapolis is certainly noble, altruistic, and admirable, in an effort to advance the conversation to the point there might actually be a solution, an interesting question occurred to me.

Precisely what responsibility is it of the Minneapolis City council, let alone the state, to "fix" things in North Minneapolis? no other municipality in the state has council members trying to "close racial gaps" and "fix neighborhoods." In other words once the city, state, county, etc. supply public infrastructure, roads, cops, etc., their public and civil duty has been met and it is now up to the individuals within various communities to determine their own futures and lots in life.

Assuming this is true, this leads me to believe the various cohorts of councilmembers, state politicians, activists, etc., don't view the black community as a bunch of self-determined individuals, deserving of the same rights, treatment, and opportunities as whites, but rather pawns in their games to attain power, wealth, public office, and ego satisfaction. Worse, they are willing to lie to entire neighborhoods, communities, even races, costing them their lives and futures as long as it helps advance their own self-serving political agendas.

It won't be until true statesmen are elected, who actually put the lives of blacks ahead of their political agendas and have the courage to point out the drawbacks of illegitimate children, self-pity, and replacing fathers with government checks, will the plight of North Minneapolis improve. Unfortunately, most leftist politicians neither have the courage, nor incentive to do this. Deep down inside I accuse them of being fully aware that North Minneapolis is not their responsibility, but instead of just leaving them alone, they take advantage of them.

Perhaps highlighting this cowardice and abuse, or at least accusing them of it in public will wake up enough people in North Minneapolis that they jettison these false leftist prophets and take control of their own lives and destinies.

Good luck,

Aaron

Another Reason Not to Attend Mizzou

June 11, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Because in addition to racism and hatred towards whites, you get to pay inflated tuition because of leftist, academic scum like this.

An Eye Brow Raised

June 11, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Interesting, first time I can remember a government doing something sensible.

Why I Don't Care About the Shooting

June 13, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Because so far, the vast majority of people killed in not just this, but all the terrorist attacks, are those who voted it in upon themselves:

I will be addressing in SLIGHTLY more detail my thoughts on the shooting in the upcoming podcast, but frankly, this isn't anything new and I'm not rushing my day today for something that is going to be a common occurrence (that would be terrorist attacks) every 3-6 months in this country.

Episode #152 of The Clarey Podcast - "Why the Florida Shootings Don't Matter" Episode

June 13, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Why the Florida shooting doesn't matter
Realtors have no hustle
PS4 spells the end of console gaming "Unicorn Rape!" They're not all false accusations!

and MORE!

In THIS EPISODE of The Clarey Podcast!

Is There Another Housing Bubble?

June 14, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Because of the news and talk and social media and anecdotal stories about the return of NINJA loans, people have been asking whether there was another housing bubble and whether we could expect another crash. So, since this has become an increasingly common question, I decided to put some research into it and the answer is "No, not really."

The primary measure by which we gauge whether or not housing prices are sane is the "price to rents" ratio. Very much like a "price to earnings" ratio for stocks, the price to rents ratios does the same thing by comparing the value of a house versus the rents it can generate. And if we look at this ratio today we can see that though a touch above historical averages, housing prices are nowhere near a bubbly as they were in 2006:

Normally I would stop here because this would provide the definitive answer, but whereas the above chart looks at the demand for housing that drives values (rents), I also like to look at the other side of the economic equation - supply. And here, once again, we are nowhere near the insane levels of supply we endured in the mid 2000's:

So while yes, there is technically a bubble, I would not be freaking out just yet about an imminent housing collapse like we saw in 2007. I would be more worried about the collapse of our currency than the collapse of housing prices at the moment.

The Day's Just Keep Getting Better

June 14, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

At least for those of us in the "I told you so" crowd.

Trump is so going to win this one.

A Bet for Mr. Conan O'Brien

June 14, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Ahem...

Here's a Foreigner I Want in My Country

June 15, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Surgeon and sues the TSA.

Buy this man a cigar, some apple pie, and an AR 15!

Obama Just Can't Get It Up...GDP I Mean

June 15, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

With only two effective quarters left of the Obama presidency, I wanted to see what RGDP growth looked like so I could update my famous "Rolling 20 Year Average RGDP Growth Rate." Once again, this takes the past 20 years of economic growth and averages them out to see what kind of long term, "generational" growth rate our country is producing. And with last quarter's GDP coming in at a paltry .8% growth rate, I wanted to see what effect Obama's past couple of years has had on this measure.

And it's what you'd expect.

As you know I have largely given up trying to sound the alarms and toll the bells to wake the American sheeple up to the major economic and financial problems we have. However, this chart is the one I want to be remembered for when I die, because it speaks so directly to the major problem we as a country have. That we are increasingly lazy, slothful, entitled, and incapable of producing the historical economic growth this nation once did. And while the only real solution to our immense financial problems is economic growth, this modern day American economic engine is so replete with:

1. immigrants who go on the government dole more than they work
2. divorce which begets single motherhood which produces more criminals than engineers
3. entitled, spoiled little millennial and gen x brats who genuinely think economic wealth just grows on trees
4. a non-profit/public sector/activist unproductive class that it's just too weak to produce the growth necessary to solve our financial problems.

So the next time you get involved in some kind of economic debate.
Or you are in class and your professor is talking about how Obama saved the economy.
Or some idiot republican says we need to "grow ourselves" out of these problems

Just point to the chart
Pour yourself a scotch
Take a sip
And tell the fucker to have a cup of STFU.

Another Reason Not to Shop at Target

June 16, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

They're just so smug about how open-minded and progressive they are, aren't they?

Interview with Kerry Lutz

June 16, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Kerry had me on his show this week. Remember to visit Kerry if you're looking for your daily dose Financial Survival!

Reconnaissance Man

June 17, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Due out in July/August of 2016

A Very Happy "Don't Piss Off the Penguins" Father's Day

June 19, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

I Hate Teachers

June 20, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Especially the lazy, fat, marxist slobs holding Mexican children hostage as they fake being "educators."

Reason Not to Attend Mizzou #478

June 20, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Too many white people in the crowd.

Episode #152 of The Clarey Podcast!

June 20, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

The Muppets were on drugs
Target and Chipolte are better than you
Qdoba tries to hard to be Chipolte
30 hour days
Percent of professional athletes who go bankrupt
Hot babes who have hustle and a work ethic

AND MORE!

In THIS EPISODE of The Clarey Podcast!!

Michael Steven Sanford - Pushing the Envelope

June 21, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Normally I would say "the father could not be reached for comment," but there is more going on here than the standard scum of the earth that are begotten by the lack of a father.

1. I love how they are pushing "autism/asperbgers" as a reason for pleading mental insanity. Now any one of these idiot emo millennials will be able to plead insanity because of a mental disorder that may exist, but normal people fake-claim to have to get the feelz/attentions/government check.

2. Of course he's here illegally

3. Another pussy of a man without a strong/real father who doesn't hit the gym will have trouble with girls. Since women play the largest role in a man's life at least genetically, failure in this arena will send some of the weaker minded "men" into despair and result in stupid behavior like "killing Trump."

4. I couldn't find it, but how much you want to bet this worthless human isn't majoring in something that will produce a good or service other people want?

It's Come to This: Don't Date Girls On Campus

June 21, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

However, while I was more focused on trying to figure out if he just naturally looked creepy, failed to read their signals, or truly was the victim of an increasing feminist-anti-male-rape-hysteria-drama, a solution recommended in the comments section to my consult hit me as it is a depressing portender of things to come.

"Don't date girls on your campus."

Cappy Explains Brexit

June 22, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

With lot's of cursing, swearing, and simple common sense:

It's Not the Single Mother's Fault

June 22, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

that she married the man who would murder her child.

See, he was just a great guy, so great you just had to exchange vows with him, and then all of the sudden, POOF!!!!! He totally changed 180 and killed her daughter. Out of nowhere!! No signs. No hints. Just BAAAM!!! Dr. Jeykell and Mr. Hyde!

See, so there were absolutely NO warning signs and this woman, who let the murderer of her daughter into their home, is not to have any guilt whatsoever because single mothers are never wrong about anything ever.

All I ask of you fuck up baby boomer (and now) Gen X parents is can you at least not murder your children or step children and leave them alive long enough so they seek help from Asshole Consulting? See my business needs future clients, and you guys have been doing a GREAT job fucking up generations of children. I appreciate it, I really do. But if you kill them then how am I supposed to make money on your shitting parenting job?

Abuse them, beat them, scream at them, steal from them, and give them the WORST advice possible. But for the love of god, don't kill them. I need them alive!

Fan Art!

June 22, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

A young man named Arjay was kind enough to draw this picture for me since he appreciated Bachelor Pad Economics. I sent him an e-mail to see if he had a website in case some of you were interested in hiring him but he has yet to respond. I will post it immediately once he sends it over. In the meantime, consider buying Bachelor Pad Economics since it's now available in AUDIBLE meaning you don't have to read and can do something else while taking in my Super Awesome Economic Genius that has saved the financial lives of thousands!

Job Posting for Pastors and Priests

June 23, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

The Ole Captain is looking to hire. If you happen to know any (especially the kind that get back to you and have hustle). the Ole Captain should would appreciate it.

Friends Don't Let Friends Attend Law School

June 23, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Arguably my biggest and best beat down of liberal-art majoring lawyers in terms of what incentivizes them and how they deserve the financially crippled life they bring upon themselves. Feel free to share with any lawyers you may know! ;)

Congratulations to the Brits Who Voted for Brexit!

June 24, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

And fuck the 49% of you who voted against your own country's sovereignty you traitorous fucks:

The British Pound's "Collapse" After Brexit

June 26, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Yes, it truly was NOT epic, NOR a crash.

Are Government Bonds the Next "Big Short?"

June 27, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

You may worship my SAEG (TM) here:

You may share my SAEG(TM) with as many people as you like in the hopes people actually learn something about economics.

Resident Artist for Cappy Cap

June 28, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Wanted to give due props to the fan who put together the drawing for Bachelor Pad Economics. You can find his site here if you need some artistic talent.

The Perfect Woman by a Perfect Woman

June 28, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Greetings all, currently trying to finish my latest book/guide on schedule which has taken time away from posting on the ole blog. Had a reader kind enough to write a guest post in the meantime about the "perfect woman."

The Captain is busy preparing his next literary regale, and asked me to entertain you with the woman of your dreams...

Real women are nearly extinct. But, as with the fossil record, we do know that they existed and what they are like.

Proverbs contains the full identification of the ideal woman. The book is relatively old, written around 900BC. In chapter 31, the question that plagued men in that time seems even more hopeless now: "An excellent wife, who can find?" A woman of excellence is rare; she is an asset and not a liability. The qualities Proverbs describes her with are: trustworthy, faithful, wise, kind, willing to work with her hands, productive, prepared, conscientious, a good money manager, a financial contributor to the household (yes, really!), caring for the needs of her family - and even the community. She serves her family with every attribute of her femininity - her intellect, body, hands, emotions, and strength. That woman, my dear men, is "far more precious than rubies".

A real woman is proud of who she is - not ashamed of it or striving to be something she is not: a man. This is perhaps one of the biggest ironies of feminism. If womanhood is to be so celebrated, why do women strive so hard to be like a man?

A real woman is conscious of and takes great care of her physique, eating well and exercising for an attractive, healthy body. When I see a man with a fat unkempt woman, the first thought that runs through my mind isn't how fat and nasty she is, that's my second thought. My first thought is: "wow, she must not think very highly of him, I probably won't either".

A real woman loves and nurtures her family with the best food, medical care, and tender affection and makes each family member feel like they are the most important person in the world.

A real woman doesn't mock or degrade her husband. Ever. She builds him up, praises and encourages him in front of others whether he is present or not.

A real woman doesn't try to change her husband. She accepts him fully, including his flaws, and even looks forward with great anticipation at what new and surprising things he can accomplish with a helpful, gorgeous, loving woman cheering him on. Look, if you don't like something about your man, remember no one held a gun to your head and made you marry him. Complaining about him only makes you look like a bitter fool.

A real woman is easily content, prods her husband to work less and encourages him to do more stuff he likes, whether it's fishing, hunting, cigar lounge with the guys, sports, model airplanes, racing, or stamp collecting. Interest, participation, and cheerleading should come from the woman he loves. Making his friends jealous isn't a bad goal either.

A real woman enables him to be efficient. She doesn't drag her feet or dig her heels in. She helps him to complete tasks, to be on time.

A real woman doesn't nag.

A real woman is not just sexually available, she doesn't just try to find creative ways to make his eyes pop out and get him to make that face of indescribable bewitchment, she competes with him to initiate sex more frequently than be does. A man who can brag about being over-satisfied by his wife is a man who is very proud of having her.

A real woman doesn't use sex to manipulate.

A real woman doesn't cheat - she doesn't even flirt except with her husband, she doesn't fantasize with her friends about other men.

A real woman is quick to listen, quick to forgive, quick to ask for forgiveness, doesn't retain bitterness from the past, is honest, and slow to speak.

A real woman knows her husband is human and makes mistakes, just like she does. She knows God is sovereign and isn't surprised by her husband's mistakes. She doesn't expose his weaknesses, but elevates his strengths. She is on his side, is his advocate, and builds him up when the rest of the world seems to grind him down.

A real woman is joyfully submissive and doesn't argue with her husband's leadership, she doesn't see him as the enemy, but as having her best interests in mind. In Ephesians 5:22, "Wives, be subject to your own husbands, as to the Lord." God is exhorting women to voluntarily and actively do this - choosing to put herself under his leadership, choosing to be subordinate in a circumstance or relationship. This is not forced upon her by the recipient. It is impossible to have two competing wills - two authoritative leaders - in a successful relationship. Take ballroom dancing for example. Fred Astaire and Ginger Rogers are breathtaking, not because Ginger went rogue, but because she was incredibly talented and sensitive to Fred's movement, following him flawlessly.

A real woman always prioritizes her husband above her children and never undermines his authority in front of them.

A real woman is hospitable, kind and generous to others. Her gratitude for the kindness and generosity her husband has shown her overflows into the lives of others.

Real women aren't easily offended. Want to get beaten, sued, lose your job or reputation? Call a girl "property" or "chattel". Agree with me about what a real woman looks like or not, I live a better life than anyone I know and have no problem saying that I am my "husband's property", or he "owns me". I'm not insecure or offended knowing my husband deeply values and appreciates me and can honestly say I have never once felt unappreciated or even underappreciated by him. In fact, it's quite the contrary. Like everything else he owns, I am treated with care, attention, maintained, and given the very best of his resources to keep me running smooth.

Real women huff their husbands farts. This is why they are extinct. Okay, just kidding...

Unfortunately, there is a depressing vastness to the ocean of feminist females in this world, and it only seems to deepen every day. They are miserable, fat, angry, demanding, selfish, and impossible to please. I feel so sorry for men. Not with disconnected sympathy, but genuine empathy. It's hard for women who love and serve their husbands to find likeminded girlfriends, I can't imagine trying to find a wife!

~

My name is Kitty and I am the luckiest girl on the planet. I married a 45 year old smoking hot Christian alpha male 16 years my senior. I get to work with him in my own home and garden, wear cute little aprons and no... shoes, research health and make nutritious meals, clean, give my husband massages and other physical therapies, and live next to & hang out on a So Cal beach with him every day.

I admit I am not the unicorn described above, but I truly love being a woman & my husband's wife. I love making good food, seeking to perfect nutrition and flavor - I love feeding him things I know will increase his health, stamina, and longevity. I strive to be his best friend and meet his needs to the best of my ability - we fish, hunt, ride dirt bikes, camp, farm, exercise, mountain bike, spear fish, hike, boogie board, swim, etc. together. I love to save him money. I feel no entitlement to, do not want or need kids.

I love making him my priority, far above friends and family. I even loved him before we met, maintaining physical purity for marriage. In a world of infidelity, divorce, child support, alimony, etc., I love making him feel secure about my intentions in our relationship. Before he proposed, I wrote a three page mock pre-nuptial agreement absolving myself from all of his assets and finances. (We of course had a lawyer draw up a real prenup, which I highly recommend to every man considering marriage).

I love relieving him of the mundane "grunt" tasks he hates, and am good at doing them. I do all of our food shopping and am his liaison/buffer to the general public and all the incompetence and inefficiency in our modern equal-opportunity, affirmative action, liberal, environmental, feminist world, to help keep him sane and happy. I also occasionally accept part time jobs as long as they don't interfere with my job as a wife, and try bring an extra $15-20K/year to help with groceries and buy him gifts.

Not only do I understand and embrace the feminine qualities God designed me with, I love them! I adore my husband and cannot believe I have the privilege of being the one - the only one - who gets to serve his needs with those qualities.

Our marriage is successful (not just in tact) because we are not confused about our roles. Well, that, and we have chosen to be childless minimalists in a failed economy.

A real man leads, protects and provides for his family, and my husband goes above and beyond. A real woman is not afraid or ashamed of her gender and understands she is her man's helpmeet. She simply discerns the painfully obvious differences between genders, and embraces her qualities without trying to be something she's not- her opposite! It's not complicated.

~

My only request from men? Be. Picky. Be very very picky. Don't settle for loneliness abatement. If you can't find a good woman, just enjoy being single. In doing so, you'll starve the nasty women into non-existence, you won't confuse and depress the good ones, and you'll be rewarded with a good life. "A quarrelsome wife is like a constant dripping on a rainy day; restraining her is like restraining a windstorm or grasping oil with the hands." Proverbs 27:15-16

The Clarey Podcast Episode #ThefuckifIknow

June 29, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Women standing men up at the age of 35
Cappy's east Indian buddy, Sadeep!
Road tripping across Michigan
Never date women who won't have sex.

AND MORE!

In THIS EPISODE of The Clarey Podcast!

Sponsored Posts

July 1, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Some guest posts from Glitternight.com

I hope everything is going well with you. If you are kind enough to post links to my blog I sent $25 via paypal. This first one is an Onion-type phony news story about Barack Obama apologizing for all of his own failures instead of things he blames America for. https://glitternight.com/2016/05/31/barack-obama-apologizes/

This second one uses an ancient comedy to point out how the worst of the faux intellectuals of 1960s liberalism stayed hidden in the prolonged adolescence of the academic world, from where they've created their own Cloud Cuckooland. I make it Ivory Towerland in this article, to honor Aristophanes' line "Here in Cloud Cuckooland/ Ivory Towerland things become what they are called rather than being called what they are." https://glitternight.com/2016/05/05/the-birds-414-bc-ancient-greek-comedy-by-aristophanes/

Fisher vs. UT - What Affirmative Action Really Means

July 1, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Stringers

July 1, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

New book from a new sponsor. Please consider a purchase!

[image]

What is Atheistkult?

July 1, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Shots fired!

Former Billionairess, Now Millionairess Because "Horses"

July 1, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Women and their fucking horses, man.

Women and their fucking horses.

Saving 10 Million High School Students at a Time

July 1, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Yes, Worthless should be in the hands of every high school student. And this hilarious video is a damn good first step to make that happen:

Another Win for Feminist Ghostbusters

July 2, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

And remember you're all sexist if you don't see a movie that kids are already pre-emptively rejecting the toys of.

But The Maths and The Stats Hurt Mommy!!!

July 2, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Just a warning, the statistics will hurt lefties' feelings.

Geek Out with The Bechtloff

July 3, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Late night Saturday night cause none of us have dates!

Is Socialism Only for (Really Really) White People?

July 3, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

The latest news coming out of Venezuela surprises no one who has a basic understanding of economics, let alone common senses. However it did jump-start a question that had been lurking in my mind before, and I'm surprised I hadn't thought of earlier:

"Is socialism/communism only for white people?"

And by white people understand I mean REALLY REALLY white people, because if you think about it, the only place "socialism" has worked (sorta), is the Nordic countries.

Latino/Hispanic Venezuela, Ecuador, and Bolivia have all gone through large swings to the left and only have a shortage of toilet paper to show for it. Chinese communism (again, not white) only managed to kill more people during peacetime than any world war ever did. Its smaller oriental siblings of Vietnam and Cambodia certainly didn't make a good go of communism either. Ethiopia (again, not white) needed both Soviet money and easily-duped 1980's American kids' monies to not starve. Greece, hee hee, Greece. And even the Soviet Union, though pretty-darn white and even the original practitioner, was just not white enough to pull off communism successfully.

Apparently, it is only the Swedes, Finns, Norwegians, and Danes who can do socialism the justice the rest of the world can't.

But why?

First, we need to take out the obvious outlier of the group, Norway. Again, the left looooves rushing to Norway as the perfect place to live. It sure is, especially since it has so much oil it sovereign wealth fund makes all of its citizens millionaires. And remember, oil is evil...unless it's under a state owned enterprise, then you never mention it.

Second, are they really socialist? Depending on the country you look at the government "only" spends 45%-60% of GDP leaving a whopping 55%-40% of money in the private hands of those rat bastard people. Not pure socialism by any stretch of the imagination.

And then, let's not forget these "communist" countries not only ALLOW evil private corporations to exist, but they tax them at rates roughly half that of the US!!! Anywhere between 20% and 25%! Those traitors!!!

So in short, even the most successful examples of "communism" aren't communist. They're at best the exception-to-the-rule-mixed-European-model-economies.

Still, why do they succeed where every other non-REALLY-REALLY white country fail?

Well first they are racially homogeneous...for now. Don't worry, diversity and the introduction of non-Scandinavian cultures will prove the myth of magic dirt wrong soon enough. But for now, they are racially homogeneous. This has nothing so much to do with their skin, but more the climate they've evolved in over the years. No sun and cold temperatures result in very very white people. That is a function of the climate. But with such cold temperatures also comes short growing seasons, which forces cooperation, heavy reliance upon thy neighbor, a team spirit, and over the years, trust. You force a people to live in that environment over the course of millennia, they will evolve both consciously and unconsciously to vote in a more socialist economic model than one where fruit and bananas are falling from trees on warm tropical beaches.

Second, this instinctual work ethic makes them unconscious dupes. Even though the United States (and to a lesser extent, western civilization) has made the technological advances that allows the individual to work for himself, support himself, and finally be free, those precious Scandinavians just can't jettison thousands of years of environmental and social conditioning. They are not as individualistic of a people. They put their country and society ahead of themselves and their family. They are genetically most borg-like because that is what resulted in survival in the past. And a mere 250-year American experiment won't simply undo all that programming. Therefore, not only do they enslave themselves to the rest of their own society, they're "dupey" enough they'll enslave themselves to completely different societies that largely hate them, or at least view them for the easy marks they are.

Regardless, this willing "dupiness" is necessary for a socialist economy to work. Everybody has to willingly value society more than themselves in order to work at the slave-like tax rates necessary to finance a communist/socialist state. The Swedes, Norwegians, Finns and Danes on the whole are more than willing to do this, while the Greeks, Russians, Venezuelans...and pretty much the rest of the world are not. This is why "sorta socialism" works best in Scandinavia...and pretty much nowhere else.

But the thing I really get a kick out of is what this spells for our beloved western SJW's, leftists, academians, professional protestors, faux millennial intellectuals, media types, and social ~~frauds~~ scientists.

A world of cognitive dissonance.

Because along with the constant drum beat for socialism and enslaving the world's population, there's nothing more these people masturbate to than diversity and the insistence there's no such thing as culture or race or ethnicity (which ironically would be diversity). And these two things (socialism and diversity) are mutually exclusive.

Unless you're a REALLY REALLY white person, you simply have too much self-respect to vote in your own slavery. You're not working for other people, you're nobody's slave, and you're going to try to keep as much of yours as possible. Of course, this won't prevent you from voting for socialism anyway because you think you're special. That you won't have to actually be the slave and pay the taxes. That's for other people. And thus, unlike our Scandinavian counterparts you'll vote for socialism, but won't put forth the selfless-work ethic to make it work. Alas, socialist hell holes like...well...all of them form.

Venezuela, Cuba, Bolivia, the Soviet Union, North Korea, East Germany, etc. etc.

All people of all colors of the rainbow just won't take communism, but they'll sure as hell vote it in. And thus non-REALLY REALLY white people suffer.

Latinos in Venezuela.
Blacks in Detroit.
Chavs in the UK.
Chinese buried in mass-graves.
Liberal arts-majoring millennials in college campuses.

In short, the number one thing in these elitist leftists' lives, their only god, purpose, agency, and meaning in life - socialism - is bound to fail, and pronouncedly so in non-REALLY REALLY white cultures. This is doubly destructive because not only will their ideology fail, but it will hypocritically and disproportionately harm those the left purports to love the most - non-whites.

Of course, in the end, I seriously doubt any leftist cares about socialism or non-white people. If they did, then they'd be empiricists and bravely deliver whatever socio-economic medicine was required to truly advance their fellow human being no matter how harsh. They instead, are largely lazy, cowardly, self-absorbed ego maniacs who put their egos above the lives of billions, insisting billions suffer, and millions die, all so they can haughtily play "social science god." What's worse, is the majority of humanity swallows whole the slop they're serving.

Oh well, enjoy the decline.

---

http://aaron-clarey.podomatic.com/
http://www.assholeconsulting.com
https://www.youtube.com/user/AaronClarey
https://twitter.com/aaron_clarey
http://www.amazon.com/Aaron-Clarey/e/B00J1ZC350/
Amazon Affiliate

Eat, Pray, Divorce, Die of Old Age

July 5, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Is there any way to prevent this veritable baby boomer poison from ruining the lives of younger women? I mean I know these old hags have really fucked their lives up to the point it's unsalvagable, but for the youth that still have futures, any way to inoculate them against this snake oil? Or does the dream override reality and I should just say, "Fuck it, Enjoy the Decline?"

Google Hates White People…And Minorities Too!

July 6, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

I guess there's just hate all around…Oh! Wait!!! Maybe, if you started treating everybody as equals this shit would all go away!!!

Because a Masters in Human Resources Just Isn't Enough

July 7, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Apparently you need a senior certification to be a gossipy, power-tripping, HR lady. I guess in addition to handwriting analysis and asking "Where do you see yourself in 3 years" this certification teaches you the ability to judge good employees by looking at their shoes and the color of their ties.

I'll say it again for the cheap seats. Ladies, if you want a real job, one where you don't constantly have to be going to school for the rest of your life, getting CPE's and progressive credentialism, you need to major in STEM.

What Nigel Farage Teaches Us About Politics…and Hillary Clinton

July 7, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Brian Michael Bendis and the Black Female Iron Man

July 7, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

I wanted to make this a separate post to ensure that Brian Michael Bendis gets this or somebody who knows him sends him this episode of my podcast. I dedicate an entire segment to him and his decision to make Iron Man a black female.

You can listen to the podcast, but the short version is that Brian Michael Bendis is admitting he has no talent or creativity if all he can do is change the gender and race of an already existing super hero.

This is not only tiring, but an insult to minorities because apparently Hollywood and Disney are so lacking of talent and creativity they're too lazy to create new original super heroes that are minorities. This is not only disgraceful to the already existing super heroes, but insulting to minorities because apparently you guys think minorities don't deserve their own original super heroes.

You are a talentless hack Brian Michael Bendis, and you know it. I, a former banker and now economist/podcaster/youtuber, could create a better original super hero than you ever could.

Now go draw your drawings and enjoy that dying industry of comic books.

Episode #155 of The Clarey Podcast

July 7, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

"I want the prick and so will you!"
Eat, Pray, Love author getting divorced
Lie to women if you want to be rich
The Black Female Tony Stark
Leftists love their religion more than being raped

AND MORE!

In THIS EPISODE OF THE CLAREY PODCAST!!

Dear SJW's, Thick Rimmed Glasses Don't Make You Smart

July 8, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Humans of Start Ups

July 8, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

A new sponsor ladies and gentlemen, "Humans of Start Ups." And it may take a little bit of explaining as to why this would benefit you.

Basically, Max (who heads up the site) is highlighting different up and coming businessmen and women and entrepreneurs. He has a significant following (23,000) because this niche of the interwebz is full of people who are either coming up with new business ideas, philosophies, or products or people who just find this stuff interesting.

I can personally attest to the effectiveness of Max's site wherein I spent $100 for a month worth of advertising one of my books and easily earned back my original investment. If you are like me and have a book, an idea, a product, etc. you'd like to advertise I STRONGLY recommend you contact him (and tell him The Captain sent ya!)

Ed Latimore Reviews Curse of the High IQ

July 8, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

A kind review here by Ed.

New Sponsor - Uncle Nick

July 9, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Do Your Weeknd Shopping Via Cappy

July 9, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

A reminder that if you do your shopping online to please consider going through the ole Captain's Amazon Affiliate Program. Click on the image below (which if it isn't showing, then you have ad blocker on) and I get 7% kickback from Amazon. It costs nothing to you, but it helps keeps the hosting costs paid, and Rumpleminze in the ole Captain's belly.

Conan O'Brien's "Gun Ban" Ratings Fallout

July 11, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Bored as I often am in a car I'm not driving, I was surfing teh interwebz and it dawned on me,

"What the heck happened to Conan O'Brien's ratings after he opened his yap and decided to lecture the country about banning AR 15's." And so off I went searching for the data and found it.

The answer? Not much:

While I was expecting a rather large drop, the truth is his little sermon actually boosted his ratings among both total viewers and the (I guess the "precious" or "important" in the TV world) "18-49 year olds."

Though temporarily. After his little attention-whoring political stint, things went back to normal for Conan.

This further cements two theories I have about people and their behavior.

One, any news is good news aka "Did they spell my name right?" I have personal experience with this as the single best week in my entire career for boosting readership and subscribers came in the same week I received the most death threats - when I theorized Mad Max would be a feminist SJW lecture. This sent the tabloid world into a tizzy and boosted my permanent readership by 20%.

Two, conservative, republicans, libertarians, and even pro-gun folks are just a bunch of pussies when it comes to boycotting. I would have thought Conan had at least an apolitical market. And thus an assault on the 2nd amendment would have taken a noticeable and permanent toll on his ratings. Apparently not because, like Target, you conservative, SWPL republicans just can't be inconvenienced in your life to go without your precious late night CoCo.

In the meantime, I don't want to hear any complaints about the media, actors, Hollywood, Target, etc. from the Suburbanite Right. You're all too soft and pansified to sacrifice the simplest of things for freedom.

Another Example of Leftist Whites Hating Blacks

July 11, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

From this article, these are the people arrested at the Minneapolis Black Lives Matter protest that shut down I-94.

I'm going to explain one thing so we all understand BLM and what it truly is.

Understand the majority of blacks do not support BLM. The reason why is BLM are like ISIS - they're total pricks. They block interstates, they block airports, the block marathons which is indiscriminate and affects all races with their hate. Everybody hates them.

But what these pictures should tell you, especially those of you in the black community who always vote left, is just how much leftists white liberals view you as a tool to advance not so much their political aims, but their egos. Liberal whites do not care about you. They only view you as masturbation tools to inflate their egos.

Which should concern you.

Because when white people start acting like total pricks under the flag of "being black" I hope and wish and pray, the black community starts to realize who their real enemies are.

Again, Curse of the High IQ is NOT for Dumb People Who Think They're Smart

July 12, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

And this review explains that.

Episode #156 of The Clarey Podcast - "Welcome to Country" Special!

July 12, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Volleyball won't cure depression
Jerry Lewis was the original red pill man
Bachelors in Social Media
Why don't they take cash at fairs?
"Welcome to Country" is facials for white Australians

AND MORE!

in THIS EPISODE of The Clarey Podcast!!!

Twin Cities Police Chiefs and Sheriffs are Pussies

July 13, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

The Feminist Dream Realized!

July 13, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

I'm betting:

No husband
No children
No life
No friends

But she's got a career and a ton of you-go-girlism Moxie!!!!!!

Now I Remember Why I Canceled My Subscription to The Economist

July 14, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

It's dated, but somebody just sent me this. "The Glass Ceiling Index."

Remember when The Economist was good?

I barely do and it's increasingly fading away in my memory.

Oldie But Goodie from 2012

July 14, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Nobody showed this to me till now.

Born Again Christians Using God to Forgive Debts

July 14, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

You just gotta love this.

Typically millennial moron liberal arts major, going to go to "the Big NYC," fails miserably, life sucks, and then....dun dun DUUUUUUNNNNNNNN!!!!

FINDS JESUS!!!!

Because "God has a plan!!!" And "Jesus forgives me!!!"

Because, remember, if you believe in fateism, then you abdicate yourself of any responsibility! Because it was fated to happen! And now, the true thing that matters most in your life, your ego, was spared. And that's worth trying to become a nun.

Too bad God can't forgive student loans.

Will the Suburbanite Right Fucking Boycott Citgo Already???

July 14, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Buy my books here and make yourself smart.

What the Heck is the TPP (Trans-Pacific Partnership) Anyway?

July 15, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

My Nice Terrorist Attack Analysis

July 15, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

There's nothing new to say that hasn't already been said in the past 10 monthly terrorist attacks, so this is the only new analysis I will be presenting:

"Welcome to Country" is Bullshit

July 15, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

As I said before, it's a facial to Australians, but here's a real Aussie's take.

Loving Money More Than Your Children

July 17, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

This was a good one:

If you need advice/your ass kicked, OR know someone that does, visit Asshole Consulting!

Affirmative Action Ghostbusters: A Review

July 17, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

It's as bad as you think.

Anshu Wahi - Let Her Name Forever Be Remembered

July 17, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

For she has done so much.

This is "Progress!"

July 18, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

We had the formula to success. A small state that served the individual. But once the left took over education we brainwashed everybody to believe the state was the solution to all our problems, and the next generation will pay for it. And they deserve it.

Traits are No Substitute for Accomplishments

July 18, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

If you've been paying attention, you've noticed an increased amount of insanity in the population. This insanity manifests itself in many ways, resulting in a relentless onslaught of what is seemingly an incoherent potpourri of madness.

31 flavors of pansexual genders.
Why everybody else has "privilege" and should let blood for those who don't.
Interstates blocked by Black Lives Matters (though it is seemingly only white people).
Majoring in the world's easiest, but most worthless degrees...and then expecting a banker-like bailout.
Feminists carrying mattresses as they throw out false rape accusations.
Leftists getting raped by Muslim invaders...and doing nothing about it.
Priding oneself on going green as we ban plastic bags and Styrofoam.
Claiming we're black or native American when we're not.
Blaming your poverty, student loans, illegitimate children, and STD's on "CIS-gendered white males."

And the list goes on and on.

But while to the untrained eye there doesn't seem to be any logical rhyme or reason to this insanity, there is most certainly is. And once you figure that out, it not only grants us sanity by explaining precisely what is going on, it also allows us to actually attack the problem, and hopefully, resolve it.

The first clue you should have is that NONE of this is coming from the political right. Triggly Puff, the student loan crisis, mattress girl, blaming Orlando on Christians, refusing to report your Muslim rapist, and accepting a monthly terrorist attack as "the new normal" are ALL, 100% the hallmarks and patents of the left. You don't see the engineer-majoring sons from nuclear families who likes Ronald Reagan demand the taxpayers bail them out of their stupid mistakes. You don't see the daughters from father-present families who want to perhaps get married and raise a stable family get raped and then not accuse her rapist. And you don't see your recent trade-school graduate who landed a job as welder block traffic on an interstate like his 40 year old leftist counterparts. This insanity, and that's PRECISELY what it is, is all owned by the left.

Now we can simply write them off as being leftists and, therefore because we disagree with them politically, flippantly dismiss them and say, "well, they're just crazy." But the truth is there is something much more pathological happening here. And that is my "Universal Theory of How Laziness Explains Everything in Politics and History."

It is no coincidence the cacophony psychotic behavior of today hails from the left, because...well...quite simply...they're lazy.

They don't want to work.
They don't want to study hard subjects.
They don't want to try at life.

Be it Barack Obama or the spoiled suburbanite Seattle scum panhandling in Pioneer Square, the left is simply lazy and doesn't want to work.

But, unlike a truly indifferent welfare bum, who just wants to collect his government cheese, sleep in and play video games, the majority of leftists cannot abide that fact mentally. Their pride and ego cannot live with the fact that they are nothing more than parasites. But since their laziness and sloth prevents the obvious solution (work), how do they solve this problem?

With the insanity and mental acrobatics mentioned above.

If you look at the list above (or for that matter ANY example of craziness coming from the left) the one thing they have in common is deflecting responsibility.

That black woman isn't poor because she never graduated from high school, or had 4 kids from 5 different fathers, or never gets off her fat ass to attend trade school and make something of herself. Not, it's "racism."

The student with $200,000 in student loans for her doctorate in "Women's Studies" can't find a job NOT because she's a worthless, self-absorbed narcissist who was just too lazy to do math. No, it's "sexism."

And anybody who isn't doing well in life, either because they don't show up to work on time, majored in a stupid subject, can't save money, can't find a second job, etc. etc., certainly DON'T blame it on their lack of work ethic. No, blame it on "the corporations maaaaan!"

These pretty lies they tell themselves spare their undeserving egos the truth that would otherwise crush them. They have no agency or responsibility in their lives. Their problems are ALWAYS somebody else's fault. So all is forgive and they can feel good about themselves. But whereas this mental-trick falsely absolves them of guilt, their egos, pride, and mania can't just settle for a guilt-free parasitic lifestyle. No, they need more. They need a purpose. And not just more, but something that makes them superior WITH the added benefit of not having to work.

Introduce traits.

Traits are an amazing thing. Everybody has them. Each trait is unique to oneself. And you can even identify yourself with traits. But the one thing about traits leftists have seized upon like a lamprey is that....

you're born with them.

In other words, you don't have to do anything to get them.

And that's PRECISELY why the left champions traits over genuine accomplishment. Because they don't have to work for them.

For example; "diversity."

The biggest canard I believe I will ever see in my life is the concept of "diversity." Starting in the 90's they shoved this down our throats claiming that somehow "diversity" had an intrinsic value unto itself. Common senses says it doesn't. Reality says it doesn't. And it's also immoral, racist, and sexist to place value on mere traits one was born with over others without said traits. Still, this hasn't stopped the education system, government, media, even the private sector from capitalizing off of this lie either to garner votes, or use as a faux marketing campaign. The democrat party has masterfully enslaved their voting bloc by dividing the country up via traits. It has also (quite unbelievably) gotten the idiot sheeple masses to blame ALL their problems on white males. And whereas you'd think/hope the for-profit private sector would resist this, they've instead capitalized on it using it as a means to virtue signal their pro-not-white-male credentials to get lazy sheeple to buy their crap.

Another example: "pansexuality."

I lost count after 38, but if you're confused about the ever-increasing numbers of gender, don't be. It's just lazy leftist psychopaths who don't want to work, and instead pin their entire life's value on their recently-made up gender identity. Of course, if you grab a mirror, put it in front of their faces, and point this fact out, they'll throw a temper-tantrum and scream that you're an "ist" of some kind. But their emotional theatrics aside, doesn't make it any less true, just more cowardly.

And then there's leftist religions.

Like a zealot or religious fanatic, leftist fanatics worship and use their made-up religions to fill the hole of nothingness that is otherwise known as their life. This is why you NEVER see the captain of the football team with a 3.8GPA join the "anarchist/marxist/minarchist" trench-coat wearing, movie-theater-shooting, nerd crowd. Or the studious Asian engineering major block the interstate near campus. They have lives. They have meaning. They have purpose. They have agency. They have value to the rest of society.

But again, those things require work, effort, rigor, math, and intellectual honesty.

Ergo, why do all that hard stuff when you can just claim a religion?

You're a feminist!
You're going green!
You eat only organic/non-GMO/gluten-free/whateverthefrickthey'llcomeupwithnextweek!
You're fighting racism!
You're helping the poor!
You're a pacifist!
You have a ADDHDHHDH Autism or Aspergers are bi-polar or whatever you want to tell yourself.

You can claim allegiance to any one of an increasing number of bogus leftist religions and simply wear that trait on your sleeve like a badge of honor. And the best thing about it, so AWESOME in fact that leftists masturbate to it, is...

you didn't have to expend one calorie of energy on work to get it. You simply "declared" you had this trait or believed this religion. And now, not only does your worthless life have faux-worth. You are a more intelligent, superior person to those troglodytes who don't understand "intersectionality."

Of course, there are consequences for being veritably delusional and living a life of lies. The black community has made no progress to close the gaps with whites because they value their egos more than the taxing lifestyle it would take to have legitimate children, keep a father in the house, major in the right subjects, and bear responsibility for their actions. Generations of blacks have now suffered the lowest standards of living in America for living this lie.

Women, notably of the Baby Boomer and increasingly Gen X variety, swallowed whole the "you can have it all" propaganda, throwing away their lives...not to mention shot at having a family or husband...all so they could get that masters degree and become a professional non-profit something or other at the age of 40. These women also voted to replace men with the state, essentially wedding themselves to government. This is all well and fine as long as you remain attractive and your eggs remain fertile. But when that ends, and reality comes crashing down, it's sad how quickly they scramble to validate the feminist lives they've led by simply telling themselves more lies. 40 is the new 20! Test-tube babies! MILF's and Cougars! When, frankly, it just means nobody's visiting you in a nursing home in the end.

But where the delusional lives of leftists run into reality full-force and there is carnage on top of consequences, is when leftists meet diversity in the form of Islamic culture. The monthly scheduled French attacks, Orlando, refugee workers getting raped, Malmo, Cologne - be it merely a butt being groped or 50 innocents slaughtered, leftist voting and leftist delusion is to blame.

But here you see just how deep their mental illness goes.

If you, I, or anybody else were attacked, we'd seek vengeance, retaliation, and justice. I carry a gun, and like Creasy, I'm intending to get at least 6 before I get taken down. But what has the response of the left been?

In the case of Orlando, some leftists (though not all), blame guns, blame racism, they even blame Christians. In the increasing number of cases where some leftist idiot bint is raped they fail to mention who their rapists were. And some politicians are so wedded to their ideology when the perpetrator is NOT a Muslim they use it as a means to score more political points with Muslims. And while certainly some of this insanity could be chalked up to the fact they're more afraid of Muslims than they are non, the truth is even more pathetic and sad than that.

They lack such meaning, purpose, and reason in life,
They are such worthless, pointless people,
That when their ideology rapes them, or even kills them,
They will still stand by it because...

that's all they have life.

It appalls me just how powerful the force of laziness is. Where you see millions of people, entire generations waste their lives, endure hardship, seeth in hatred for white males, even suffer rape and murder because they'd rather do that than own up to their own decisions, take responsibility, and get a job. But there is a silver lining. If you ever think it's hard being a conservative or libertarian is this increasingly parasitic world, just imagine what your life would be as a leftist who is so worthless that they'd prefer getting raped than giving up their ideology because you literally have nothing else in your life.

Enjoy that decline!

---

http://www.soundcloud.com/aaron-clarey/
http://www.assholeconsulting.com
https://www.youtube.com/user/AaronClarey
https://twitter.com/aaron_clarey
http://www.amazon.com/Aaron-Clarey/e/B00J1ZC350/ Amazon Affiliate

Don't Shoot Feminism, Let It Burn

July 19, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

"Terrorism" Now a Biased Word

July 20, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

I swear, sometimes I don't know who I hate more, the terrorists or these schmucks.

Corporate Virtue Signaling is Just Slimy Marketing

July 20, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Virtue signaling, in short, is where you take a position or advocate a position as a mean to signal to others that you're virtuous.

You may not actually be virtuous.
You may not even believe in the position, lying entirely about what you advocate.

But that isn't your main goal.

Your main goal is to convince sheeple that you are a good person, you care about the poor, you care about minorities, you're morally superior, ie - you have virtue.

Of course, in reality, you really don't. You don't care about the environment. You don't care about the wage gap. You don't care minorities. You don't care about the children. And you certainly aren't morally superior. But if you can convince weak-minded people, especially those who also wish to virtue signal, then you can sucker them into do things for you.

For example Target.

I loath Target with all my heart.

Not because of their politics or even that they allowed whoever to use whatever bathroom in their stores. I'm actually for transgendered rights. It's the gallons of smugness they have about themselves and how they just outright lie to their customers about their corporate morality, if not superiority.

They donate 5% of their pre-tax profits back to the community.
They go out of their way to hire waifs of women as security guards.
They're body positive.
Anybody can use whichever bathroom they want.

Oh, and they will remind you of this every two seconds if you're in one of their stores.

Let's be clear what's going on here.

Corporations realize that the socio-political trend in the US is drifting to the left. Not just in terms of economics, but socially as well. Ever since the 90's a huge trend in deriving one's value from any one of a number of approved, leftist, politically correct political stances has occurred. Going green, being a feminist, organic, non-GMO, diversity, the environment, etc. etc. And since now at least half of the population derives their entire life-value from their beliefs (and not their accomplishments) corporations know these beliefs are the only thing a lot of people have in their lives. Therefore, if they virtue signal to these sheeple that they too are (choose your plate of BS)

green organic for the whales
for the snails

these sheeple will buy their product.

In other words when you see Chipolte CONSTANTLY remind you about how organic it is, it isn't because their founders had some moral crusade they truly believed in. They just wanted your money.

The body positive ads you'll see in women's magazine? Yeah, the editor doesn't care that if you're fat...or...unhealthy...of that you're likely to be fat and childless by 50. They got your money.

And the colleges that sell you sheep $150,000 doctorates in some SJW BS crusaderist "studies?" The ones where you'll constantly have to beg charities or the taxpayers for government handouts so you can do absolutely nothing to advance the world? The ones where the student loans will cripple you for the rest of your life? They don't care, they got your money.

I absolutely love it when leftists always claim corporations have all this power to "trick" people into buying their product. But yet, while they're at the trough, slopping up the virtue signaling slop these companies sell them, they have the clueless gall to tell me they're too smart to fall for it.

So carry on virtue signaling leftists! Buy your fair trade (as far as you know) Starbuck's coffee. Buy your slave-labor Apple product. And please shop at Target. Because you're too stupid to see corporations' slimy marketing for what it truly is - virtue signaling euphemistically paraded as "Corporate Social Responsibility."

Episode #157 of The Clarey Podcast!

July 20, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Fan mail
Crazy women are a higher % of the population you think.
Cappy doesn't do "Milo Drama"
Failed liberal art-majoring whores "find Jesus"
Bugs Bunny and Yosemite Sam

AND MORE!!!

In THIS EPISODE of The Clarey Podcast!

A Financial Analysis of Ghostbusters

July 21, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

A little bit of economic theory.
A little bit of case study.
And a little bit of a lesson Sony and Hollywood can all learn in the end.

Forget Monthly, Try Bi-Weekly

July 22, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

I thought monthly terrorist attacks was the new-normal leftists and Muslim terrorists wanted to impose on the West. I guess it has to be bi-weekly now.

The "Don't Know Where or When" Vacation

July 23, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Hello Lieutenants, Economists, Agents in the Field, and respectable others!

Your beloved Captain is taking a motorcycle ride vacation out west. This is the first true vacation I've had since I can remember since there is no itinerary, schedule, or destination. I'm just going "west." I for certain will be in the Black Hills area of South Dakota and Denver, but that's about the only concrete plans for this trip. Don't know where I'm going after that, and I don't know when I'm coming back, and I don't care.

If you happen to be in the "west" let the ole Captain know. He just may be in your neck of the woods and would like to grab a Rumpie or a beer. Regardless, posts may be a bit infrequent, though since I'm in no rush I very well could just hole up in a hotel room out in some small town and just write for a week. You never know.

Cappy

Point Your Motorcycle West

July 25, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Some pics from the trip thus far. Hiking the Flume trail and driving through Badlands National Park.

B A R

The Muslims Can't Invade Fast Enough

July 25, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

And then a piece of me asks, "Does this country even deserve to be around anymore?"

Meanwhile, In the Land of Zero Fucks Given

July 28, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

This was all done in one day. And when you're done excusing yourself for your procrastination, victimhood, or whatever excuse you come up with, you can become a real American man/woman.

WELCOME TO THE CITY OF RIDERS
THIS BUD'S FOR YOU
MR. AL'S
METZELER'S
METZELER'S
SUPER DUTY

Episode #158 of The Clarey Podcast

July 28, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

How political coverage is as dumb and pointless as sports coverage.
Cappy's Indian name "Man Who Walks Through Cow Shit"
Pokemon Go is indeed awesome AND for adults
Hiking in the Black Hills
Oh, that's where Spearfish Creek starts!

AND MORE!!!

In THIS EPISODE of The Clarey Podcast!

Amnesty International And Venezuela

July 30, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

You gotta love it when AI leftists finally get their utopia and then criticize it.

Ghostbusters Officially a Flop

July 30, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

What I love about the left is how they jam and force the feminist Ghostbusters down our throats, and the second it started to show signs it was going to be a flop, ANY criticism was countered with "geez, get over it, it's just a movie, how sad are you."

No, terribly sorry leftist cunts. You forced this issue and now we're going to stay on it until it's ran its full cycle...which it has.

The movie that cost $150 million to make and roughly another $150 million to advertise has officially brought in....

Which means since it can't even cover it's production costs this late in the game, we can officially call it a "flop."

I'm not going to delve back into the political/social analysis of this movie since it's been done to death, but I will point out to Hollywood and Sony that this is what you get when you try to pass on an obvious political agenda as entertainment. Perhaps you can wait another 10 years to try this stint again after Overton's Window has moved a bit more to the left and try again. Who knows maybe an "all female Hogan's Heroes!" But they're gay, and pansexual, and all have bi-polar or social anxiety disorder.

Books Done, Returning to Regular Schedule

July 31, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Good news all!

"Reconnaissance Man" is done and off to Amazon for approval. This process takes 7-14 days, but my work on it is over and so we can now return to a regular schedule.

Rebuilding Sad Hill Cemetery from The Good, The Bad and The Ugly

July 31, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

From our Spaniard Agent in the Field. It's in Spanish, but some of the pictures are cool.

Make Sure to Breed Before Going to Med School

July 31, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

If you're going to breed before going to med school, then you are not smart enough to be a doctor.

Everything Wrong with the Republican Party

August 1, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

This is more common than you think. The real conservatives and libertarians have real jobs and are otherwise productively employed in the private sector. Leaving morons like this to run for office.

Episode #158 of the Clarey Podcast!

August 1, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

John Steele and Ann Sterzinger fill in for the Captain in this episode as he plays catch up from his motorcycle adventure out west.

Ann's Site
www.annsterzinger.com

John's Site
www.youtube.com/channel/UCiMrlFpBpmis8P06sWS_x1w

Latest Book "Reconnaissance Man" Now Available!!!

August 1, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Looks like "Reconnaissance Man" was approved by Amazon and is now available on paperback. Kindle will be coming shortly, and audio will be coming within 4-6 months. In short, the book points out that going to college immediately after high school is stupid, because most young people know nothing about themselves or the world around them. It then advocates all people, young or old, become "Reconnaissance Men" by traveling around the United States to find out not only where they belong, but who they are and what they should study. I then also provide a methodical process by which you can conduct your reconnaissance around the country. GREAT book for teenagers, 20 somethings, and 30 somethings who are wandering around aimlessly in life.

Must Make Wifey Happy

August 2, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

So work 80 hours a week in "Big Law."

hat tip.

Where's the Historical Working Model of Socialism?

August 2, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

A simple, but important question occurred to me as I was driving my motorcycle out to Sturgis:

"Precisely where is the historical, functional working model of socialism that socialists can cite as proof that socialism works?"

You know, where socialists can point to a time in history and say, "Here, here it is. Here is the example of how socialism not only works, but succeeds?"

Something tangible and empirical that would provide economists, philosophers, politicians, sociologists, and even skeptics an actual model they could study and learn from and see with their own eyes how socialism works?

Because if that existed, then I could see where the left might have a point. They'd have empirical proof that socialism did indeed work (well, once, anyway), and we could study and learn from that example to see how and why. But as far as I can tell, it doesn't exist. There is no example throughout all of history that socialism works or ever has worked*. And this simple observation has GRAVE ramifications not only for socialists, but for all of society. Namely, the left is gambling the entire economic future of the world world on a...

theory.

Ignore the millennia of historical and economic proof that a freer people do better than an enslaved one.
Ignore the billions of people who have died over thousands of years and hundreds of wars to grant us the freedoms of Western Civilization.
And ignore the morality of letting people keep the majority of the fruits of their labor.

No, you see some really good theoreticians in Academia over the past 50 years studied the ideas of an 1840's parasitic hack who lived off of his buddy Engel's and never worked for a living. And they have this theory, see? And this theory is to eliminate private property and put everything under the state. Never mind it's never worked once in the history of the world. And never mind that it usually kills more people through starvation than nuclear bombs did in war when implement. The difference is these really smart people have DOCTORATES in the LIBERAL ARTS, and they know more than the cumulative 30 billion people that have lived since the Greeks (and certainly more than you). So let's risk the entire world's population's freedom, futures, and livelihoods on a ~~gamble~~ un-proven theory.

It is this insane risk that not only appalls me, but frightens me. Damn well near half of the West's population (in the form of people who vote left) is willing to risk, basically everything, for a theory. A hunch. A gamble. A pathetic religion, just as unfounded as all the others, all so they can have "teh feelz" and actually fool themselves into thinking there's some magical path to a free lunch.

Of course, I wish it was only people's entire financial and economic futures the left is willing to gamble on an unfounded theory. But sadly, they don't stop there. Oh no. Enter in feminism.

Feminism today, no matter how you slice it, is simply matriarchy. That's cute you've all managed to train young college girls into thinking "it's just the equal treatment of men and women." (Very nice, now go participate in a slut walk and carry a mattress around). But I ask again, where in the entire history of the world does an example of a successful matriarchy exist? Is there any point in time forcing women to be men and vice versa resulted in a successful and longevous society? There's certainly examples of "matriarchies," but most of them are third-world crap-holes that don't have electricity (duly noting "Iceland," the one 1st world country dubiously included on the list, which STILL went bankrupt in 2007). Some might point to the Amazons of the middle east, but they are largely of Greek myth (and obviously short lived). About the ONLY historical account of a successful matriarchy was the AMAZONIANS (not to be confused with AMAZONS) of Futurama. And even there the entire male population was wiped out by Snu Snu.

But despite the absolute absence of a successful matriarchy (or perhaps "genderless society") those really smart, 1960's feminists had a theory, damnit! And that was the world's entire problems were caused by men! And if we could just get women to rule the world, then peace would ensue and we'd all be singing kumbaya together!

Of course, never mind this resulted in divorce rates not seen since ever. A decline in women's happiness. A division between the sexes. A welfare state. The replacement of fathers with a government check. And two full generations of mal-raised children. You see these self-important, upper-class, white feminists had a THEORY, and it was very important that they risk the entire romantic, familial, and love lives of the entire western world to make their socialist utopia a reality.

There's even a third unfounded theory the left insists gambling the future lives, safety, and happiness of the world on - multi-culturalism. Once again, show me where it's worked. Point me to the model where different races not only "tolerate" each other, but thrive and grow faster than they would separately. South Africa I think both blacks and whites agree it's not ideal. I'm sure if you talk to the Swedes in private about Malmo not everybody is happy. About the "best' model we have of true multi-culturalism is Brazil, and that is at best a second world, zika-infested, crap-hole.

But once again, the left have a THEORY. And by gum, despite there being no historical or empirical evidence (and a lot of genuine evidence to the contrary), they're going to shove multi-culturalism down your throats whether you like it or not. Because despite millions of years of evolution, history, and genetics, this time it's different because they're professors and academians from the 60's and 70's. And shucks howdy they know better than nature! (Oh, and by the way, if you disagree with them, then you're a racist).

The point is socialism, leftism, communism, whatever you want to call it, is a religion. It's a groundless, baseless, fanatical belief worthless people have to give their worthless lives faux meaning. And the three largest "tenets" or "principles" of the leftist religion today are forced economic equality, the elimination of the sexes, and the forced integration of the races. However, just like all religions, there is also no empirical proof that these things are preferable, let alone feasible. But feasibility and practicality be damned. It is more important to socialism's followers and zealots that humanity come to heel under their baseless religion than to let society advance, succeed, and live their lives as they see fit. Ergo leftists have no moral qualms about forcing humanity to gamble EVERYTHING, and I do mean, EVERYTHING on an ill-thought out, self-serving, psychotic theory, a bunch of ego-masturbating spoiled brat children from the 60's came up with.

The economic system that provides us the goods and services we need just so we can live?
Naw, let's tinker with it because Maduro and Chavez have a religious obsession with socialism.

The nuclear family which over 2 million years evolved to be the optimal structure to raise a family?
Screw that and screw the mental happiness and health of the children. We 60's feminists need validation for our doctorates in Women's Studies no matter how much it destroys the black community. Men are women, women are men, fish bicycle, exchange the father for a government check.

And the fact that humans naturally separate by race, though can peacefully interact with each other?
Screw that! Bring in a culture honeycombed with radical, suicide bombing, ideologues and let them lose among a population they're sworn to destroy.

In short, the left wants to risk everything that brings happiness, joy, and reason to live to satiate their religious egos. The ability of the economy to function normally and provide the necessities that are required for life. The ultimate happiness and joy that comes from finding love and having children. And the right to be safe and associate with whom you please. You take those three things away and you have the only real model of socialism that ever existed.

The USSR
North Korea
East Germany
Venezuela
Communist China
And the embryonic psycho circuses that Western nations are quickly becoming.

Only leftists could be so narcissistic, ego-maniacal, and evil to take such a gamble with other people's lives in the face of these historical odds all so in their little inferior minds they could play god for a short, mortal 75 years.

Oh well, enjoy the decline.

---

http://www.soundcloud.com/aaron-clarey/
http://www.assholeconsulting.com
https://www.youtube.com/user/AaronClarey
https://twitter.com/aaron_clarey
http://www.amazon.com/Aaron-Clarey/e/B00J1ZC350/
Amazon Affiliate

Admittedly the left loves to run towards Norway, Sweden, and Denmark as the "working model" of socialism. Take away oil, you take Norway off the list. Give Sweden a couple more decades, and they will take themselves off the list. And Denmark highlights something all the handful of "successful" socialist models have - they're not that much more socialist than the US. Our taxation rates (bar Sweden) are all within 10% of each other. Add to this fact that the democrat party, not to mention all leftist/labor/left parties in Europe are still advocating MORE government, then obviously these countries are NOT the model they had in mind. They demand even more socialism.*

The other minor thing is that outside these precious 4 Scandinavian exceptions to the rule, socialism's track record is horrible. For every Norway or Sweden there's 3-4 Ethiopia's, Zimbabwe's, North Korea's, USSR's, East Germany's, Greece's, Venezuela's, Cambodia's, China's, and Vietnam's. And not to mention the largest peace-time, and war-time death tolls. So before leftists come on here and present the "I Know a Tall Asian Argument," there really does not exist proof socialism has worked once in history.

URL: "Ultimate Reading List"

August 2, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

I wanted to introduce a new sponsor "URL" aka "Ultimate Reading List."

I've advertised with this guy before and he does indeed get results. So I'm not just being paid to be a whore, I've used the product AND I'm a whore! If you are an author and are willing to drop $100 for a month's worth of advertising you'll want to visit the site and contact Max. Of course, your book has to be good and of interest to intellectual/righter leaning folk, but it's at least worth one month of advertising on that site.

Remember to tell him "The Captain sent ya!"

Female Labor as a Commodity

August 3, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Most of my epiphanies strike when I'm in the middle of nowhere, driving to some destination or another, where my mind has nothing to do but wander. And I remember precisely when this epiphany struck because it's the only way I'll ever remember the town of Midland, South Dakota. Specifically:

Why is it OK that Hershey's chocolate costs less than Godiva, but the world has its panties in a bundle that women make less than men?

This then sent my brain down the road of pricing, commodities, and efficient market theory, which I all sussed out by the time I reached Phillip, South Dakota. So let me explain.

Different commodities of different quality have different prices. This reflects the value they offer to whoever uses them. Hershey's chocolate, which is about the worst chocolate you can ever buy, is appropriately priced at 3 cents a pound (or whatever it is) because only kids with no palate can manage to eat that stuff. Godiva chocolates on the other hand are priced around $.50 to $1 per piece because they are not only made from superior ingredients, but also taste infinitely better.

Sweet crude oil has a higher price than heavy oil. This is because it's easier to refine and has a higher viscosity making it easier to pump and transport. Refiners and extractors know this and the market reflects this in sweet crude's pricing.

And coffee, of its infinite varieties and blends, has an amazing variation in pricing all based on its quality, where it's from, is it organic, is it fair-trade, and did it come out of a cats ass (not joking).

Matter of fact, nearly everything we buy, commodity or not, has price variation based on it's quality, efficiency, profitability, taste, and all the other variables that ultimately result in value.

Ferrari's versus Fiats.
Bush Mills Black vs. Canadian Windsor
Nordstrom's vs. Wal-Mart
Pure breds vs. mutts
Regular vs. premium

You name it, pretty much everything we buy in the market has gradiated pricing to reflect differing values.

And it's the exact same thing between male and female labor.

While the ~~lie~~ politically correct excuse for the lower pay of women is "sexism," my epiphany forces me to ask a simple question - why is the market efficient at pricing nearly millions of goods and services in the economy, but when it comes to women, it's all of the sudden "sexism?" Am I to believe the market, which prices everything accurately from lumber to licorice, from manure to moccasins, all of the sudden just "fails" when it comes to valuing women's labor?

The truth is the myth of the female wage gap has been thoroughly debunked that any intellectually honest person (male or female) knows and accepts this. They know women disproportionately major in worthless subjects, take more time off, work less, etc. etc. And when you account for these variables, the wage gap disappears. But I am not here to debate the wage gap any further. I know leftists and feminists will forever cling to it because it supports their religion and their profitable victim-whoring industry. I am here, however, to shoot another simple, but logical torpedo into the wage gap myth that the average idiot on the street can understand.

For example, Dennis Prager pointed out that if women made 25% less for EQUAL WORK, all corporations would fire all men overnight and only women would be employed. This is a simple, logical argument that normies and morons can comprehend. Because of this it does more to fight the lie of the female wage gap than any amount of studies, research, statistics, or math that flies over most people's heads. And though my argument may be a bit more nuanced with the concept of "efficient market hypothesis," the average idiot on the street, even your average liberal arts major, can understand that if the market can accurately price the varying qualities of millions of goods, services, and commodities, then it's also likely valuing female labor precisely where it should be.

Still, I wouldn't hold your breath in hope this bit of economic logic ends the ~~professional victim-whoring~~ wage gap debate.

Buy my latest book "Reconnaissance Man!"
And if you really want to close the wage gap, buy my other book "Worthless!"

City Pages Meets the Real World of Journalism

August 4, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

If you don't know what "City Pages" is, don't worry. It's the pre-internet "what's going on in Minneapolis" weekly that you would consult to see...well..what was going on in Minneapolis every week in the early 90's. Of course, they wouldn't just leave it at that. That would be providing a genuine service to society with no pain nor cost nor sermoning. So they attracted a bunch of wanna be, journalistic failures who write (wait wait for it!!!!) LEFTIST (amazing, I know) skewed "articles" so they could feel like they're achieving something.

Never mind the platform was merely advertising. And never mind the only people who read City Pages for the articles are the same Minneapolitan dippy hippy dipshits who fashion themselves intellectuals. No, "City Pages" keeps going on like a zombie because hipsters in our "Uptown" need to read something when waiting for their organic coffee.

So when they came out with an article about Trump visiting Minneapolis, it was, as predicted, soaked with "sarc/snark/talk to the hand/oh snap" level writing. But it was also curiously closing the comments section.

Of course, this is what happens when old, obsolete, outdated, baby boomer media that is used to preaching to the choir comes full head onto the internet which is much more democratic and representative of the people. I guarantee you City Pages was used to its cozy echo chamber of spoiled brat trust funder baby readership, but when it made it into the real world via teh interwebz, the comments were just too "triggering" for its editorial staff to handle. And since we wouldn't want to upset these precious liberal arts majoring failures, the comments section was closed, and their little imaginary journalistic fiefdom was maintained.

Anyway, this is the only time I'll write about the "City Pages" because like the Star Tribune, for 20 years I had to tolerate their leftist slop as it was the only thing available. But now, thanks to the interwebz, City Pages is going down in history for what it truly was:

An advertising platform for bars, clubs, and museums to support the otherwise unsupportable and never-demanded journalistic hobbies of talentless, leftist hacks.

Sponsor: Easy Mode Blogging

August 5, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

New sponsor and one I think some of you may be interested in. Basically "Easy Mode Blogger" sets up a blog for you. You may think "So what, I can set up a blog myself." Yeah, but it's usually under a private company like Google or Wordpress and then you have to abide by their community guidelines and rules.

This then requires you set up your own site AND learn how to program HTML on the fly. OR NOT. You can hire the guys at Easy Mode Bloggers that set it all up for you and all you have to do is start writing. AND you don't have to worry about offending the precious little millennials, SJW's, and other thin-skinned pussies of the world because it's your own site.

Anyway, consider contacting my buddy Pete at Easy Mode Blogger and tell him the Captain sent you!

Reconnaissance Man Now Available in Kindle

August 6, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

In case you're ashamed to be reading one of my books, you can discreetly read it now on Kindle!

New Podcast: "The World of Laurie Zoock":

August 7, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

New podcast to add to the podcast role - Laurie Zoock.

If you're looking for something outside of politics and is more of a variety show. You may want to check her out. She specializes in, however, delving and studying a subject deeply and then bringing on experts. She also owns a dog so extra points there. Anyway, if you're looking for another podcast to sample check her out.!

A Red Pill Analysis of HGTV

August 7, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

An interesting analysis.

Boys Ditching Girls in Real World for Digital Ones

August 7, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

I like how the MSM, religious folk, and baby boomer types get around to discovering stuff the Manosphere did 5-10 years ago. So imagine my chuckle when a study was done and they discovered boys are preferring to play video games and watch porn than work

date get stood up go to school go into debt

and all the miserable shit they saw Gen X go through.

I was to quote John McClane and yell "Welcome to the party pal!"

Davis Aurini is Back

August 8, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Apparently YouTube has given Davis back his full rights to broadcast. Remember, this is why you back up your work and you have an alternative Daily Motion or Vimeo channel.

Episode #159 of the Clarey Podcast

August 8, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Playing Pokemon Go
2 year olds will outlast you in the park
"The hand off!"
Fellatio Cafe
Girls getting dined and dashed by guys

AND MORE!

In THIS EPISODE of The Clarey Podcast!

How Much Does the Stock Market Have to Increase by for Us to Retire?

August 9, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

To be blunt, the entire US retirement system is a ponzi scheme. I'm not talking about social security or medicare (though, those are ponzi schemes as well), but the 401k's and IRA's that the government, the media, Hollywood, our employers, and our educators tell us we "just must" invest in. The reason why is very simple - we are relying on capital gains (ie - increasing prices) to fund our retirements and NOT increasing profits. This is why PE ratios are going up and dividend yields are going down because stock prices are increasing faster than the underlying profits corporations generate and the dividends they pay.

However, this got me thinking. Since the government more or less ordained the stock market as the primary vehicle by which we would retire, what kind of asset price increases would be required to adequately provide for the retirement of the Baby Boomer and Gen X generations? I know it's funny, and you're all laughing at me, but let's just say this crazy ponzi scheme works (or at least keeps working long enough for me to retire). How much would stocks have to go up by in order to provide enough money for each person in each generation to retire?

This mental and mathematical exercise of course requires some assumptions and simplifications, all of which will be proven wrong as time goes on. But just to see how feasible this whole "throw all your money into your 401k's" plan is, I just wanted to get some ballpark figures. Ergo, I assumed each generation retires separately and cycles over/sells their investment to the previous generation. I also assumed younger people accumulate mainly stocks and older people hold onto their bonds. I assumed every baby boomer is retiring today into today's market and that all Gen X'ers will retire 20 years from now. I assumed Americans can ONLY invest in US stocks/bonds. And I also assume a 2.5% annual rate of inflation. Again, none of these assumptions are true, but I'm just trying to do some back of napkin economics to get some ballpark figures.

The first thing I wanted to do is take a look at how much the stock and bond markets would have to be worth to effectively retire the entire baby boomer generation today. Right now there are 77 million baby boomers. Each of these boomers are going to require $800,000 in retirement funds to provide $40,000 per year in living expenses, as well as increased medical bills for the estimated 20 years of their life they'll be living. This means they need a total market capitalization of $61.6 trillion in order to retire. And thankfully the total market capitalization of US stock and bond markets are $23.4 trillion and $37 trillion respectively, for a total of $60.4 trillion, just a trillion shy of what's required.

Normally, this would be welcomed news as there's enough wealth in US stocks and bonds to retire the entire generation. However, there's a problem with the distribution of ownership of stocks and bonds. One, 30% of stocks and bonds are NOT owned by households, pensions, retirement programs, or mutual funds. They're held by other entities that are either institutional owners, brokers, traders, international investors, etc., that aren't likely going to be cashed out to pay for the baby boomers' retirement party anytime soon (bonds are even held by a smaller percent). Also, depending on which leftist rag you want to quote, "the rich" (whatever that means, and they fail to say) own anywhere between 50% and 80% of the stock and bond markets. Unless they're charitably going to "spread the wealth" you can expect the majority of boomers are going to have a shortfall. And then there's corporations like Apple that hold stock in other companies (in Apple's case I think it's up to $22 billion now) that they're not going to be selling (let alone, giving to baby boomers) anytime soon. So when you make the following adjustments/assumptions:

1. Lop off 10% of the baby boomers who are "rich" leaving the main 90% of boomers who "need" 401k's to retire
2. Subtract out the 30% of securities not earmarked for retirement
3. And subtract out the 50% ownership that goes away when you take out the richest 10% you're left with 63.9 million boomers who need $55.4 trillion to retire, but only have....

$22.8 trillion in likely retirement accounts (and even this is a high number).

This results in a shortfall of $33.5 trillion meaning prices would have to double in both the stock and bond markets..umm....basically....RIGHT FREAKING NOW in order for baby boomers to fully retire. Alas, this is why today boomers are still working, relying on social security, and reverse mortgages. In other words, generation-wise, the 401k/IRA retirement system has failed the boomers.

The hypothetical retirement of Gen X, however, provides an even more interesting case in that we have to forecast inflation and infer what kind of growth rate would be required of the stock, bond (or both) markets to adequately provide for Gen X'ers. First there's 99 million Gen X'ers. Assuming they all retire in 20 years, and also need $40,000 a year in today's money to retire, we come up with $1,311,000 in required retirement funds per Gen X'er, which translates into $130 trillion in stock and bond market capitalizations. We of course have to whittle this down just like we did for the Baby Boomers, so we adjust for the 10% of the rich, 50% of their wealth, and 30% of securities not earmarked for retirement and the Gen X generation will need $117 trillion to retire, but will likely only have ...

$46 trillion in their names-a $71 trillion short fall (but hey, at least in 20 years they'll maybe have their student loans paid off!)

Therefore, to make that $46 trillion the $117 trillion NON-RICH Gen Xer's will need to retire, the entire stock and bond markets will have to grow to a combined market capitalization of $329 trillion. A 14 fold increase from today.

Now, is this possible?

If we erroneously assume that Gen X exclusively invests in stocks and they do not rely on bonds (as younger people aim for higher growth, not to mention bonds have no hope of providing the required returns), the stock market would have to grow by 14% per year for the next 20 years to make good on the 401k promise. This is VERY unlikely as it took the S&P 500 33 years to increase the required 14-fold since 1983 that must be done under 20 years starting today. And given the power of compounding, Gen X will be woefully short on retirement funds without those extra 13 years of growth (54% short if we use the S&P 500's historical growth and retroactively apply it).

We can also assume the scenario where both stocks AND bonds are purchased in full from the baby boomers which would change the required rate of growth of 8.9% per year. However, this is just outright laughable with those whopping 1% interest rates on treasuries, not to mention negative interest rates right around the corner.

In short, using these-certainly flawed, back of napkin calculations, this whole 401k, IRA retirement thing just isn't feasible. It constantly requires a "perma-Tulip Bulb bubble mentality" of relying on the religion of "because I can sell it more for latter" to work. It requires an ignorant population that doesn't read financial statements, can't compare prices of securities versus their underlying profits, and has a sheeple-ish mentality that is easily duped by the powers that be. Thankfully, (well, for Wall Street and the government anyway) they have precisely that. So over the past 40 years you've had millions of dupes flooding the market with trillions of dollars...paying trillions along the way in commissions, managerial fees, and taxes.

But sure enough like all bubbles it will burst (or perhaps be inflated away with QE infinity). I'm particularly curious what PE ratios and dividend yields are going to look like if we need 8.9% in annual price increases when the economy can only manage to fart out 2% per year in economic growth. It may even get so bad, like government bonds, the sheep will be paying businesses dividends and not the other way around! Regardless, I do believe it's time for Gen X and perhaps even Millennials to question the same generation that brought us

1. The Ozone Layer
2. "The kids in Africa are starving"
3. The Housing Bubble and

4. "EVERYBODY MUST GO TO COLLEGE!"

about why the hell should we be investing in the stock market for retirement? Because as far as I can tell, it's like all their other advice - not only worthless, but damaging, even life destroying.

---

http://www.soundcloud.com/aaron-clarey/
http://www.assholeconsulting.com
https://www.youtube.com/user/AaronClarey
https://twitter.com/aaron_clarey
http://www.amazon.com/Aaron-Clarey/e/B00J1ZC350/
Amazon Affiliate

Why the Economy Won't Recover Without Men

August 10, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Though a Asshole Consulting request, the video ends up explaining, in entertaining detail how:

Negative interest rates
The lack of economic growth
National debts and
The inevitable collapse of the West is 100% dependent upon men and their sociological/romantic/sexual relationships with women. It is some of my finest (accidental) work and if you TRULY want to understand how economics works and how to get economies to boom, I suggest you listen to at least the first half:

Hollywood Doubles Down on "Feminist Ocean's 8"

August 10, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

In an increasing amount of empirical evidence that Hollywood has a political agenda and presumably no longer cares about profits, it seems they're going to ignore the flop known as "Affirmative Action Ghostbusters" and force another feminist lecture down your throat - Feminist Ocean's 11.

Of course it's called Ocean's 8, but there's nothing new here.

I mean, REALLY nothing knew.

They're plagiarizing a movie that plagiarized another one. And in more ways than one. They are simply taking a movie from the 60's, that was a remake in the 90's, and copy-cating the (oh so clever move) of replacing the entire male cast with women. Dang those creative crafty Hollywood types! How do they do it???

I don't know what to say that hasn't already been said about Affirmative Action Ghostbusters.

1. Hollywood is plum out of ideas if the best they can come up with is "Take 40 year old movie + Women."
2. It's plagiarism
3. It's forcing gender roles that don't work and nobody likes
4. It's the antithesis of feminism if you merely do what men did 30 years later
5. There's no originality
6. It's an admission of defeat that women can only repeat what men do, but can manage nothing original on their own.
7. It's forcing a political sermon on people who don't want it.
8. It's mixing fun with politics.

I really don't care if Hollywood wants to make the next 100 movies all female casts. It's their and the shareholders' money. But the fact they're pushing forward with this in light of the spectacular failure Feminist Ghostbusters was, suggests to me the higher ups in Hollywood view some of the movies they make as nothing more than CSR expenses to virtue signal and (vainly) try to capitalize on the naivety of women.

I wish you all in Hollywood good luck and look forward to the all-female cast remake of The Great Escape.

Super Cappy rant on YouTube here.

What Did You Think Was Going to Happen?

August 10, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

I like how the camera man is saying "Oh my god" as if this was a shocking and unexpected result.

Ahhhh, warm fuzzies.

The Father Could Not Be Reached for Comment

August 11, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Cause Downunder...WE DON'T NEED NO STIIIIIINNNNNKING FATHERS!!!!

Curse Free Episode #1 of The Clarey Podcast

August 11, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Curse free podcasting now.
Cappy hates State Fairs.
Cappy goes to a Sportsball Game.
Bernard Chapin does not heed advice.
Feminist Ocean's 11.
Christians are confused by MGTOW.

AND MORE!

In THIS EPISODE of The Clarey Podcast!

Laurie Zoock and Cappy Cap Walk Into a Bar

August 12, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

and then have a great long conversation about IQ!

Anyway, was on The World of Laurie Zoock! Trust me, you want to listen to this woman.

Couldn't Keep Her Yap Shut

August 14, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Ahhhh, warm fuzzies.

Retirement is Death

August 14, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Kerry Lutz and I talk about retirement planning on his latest podcast.

Episode #160 of The Clarey Podcast!

August 15, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

In this episode we interview Tom from Small Scale Life about setting up a simple garden for lazy bachelor survivalists or people who just want to get started on growing their own food. We also interview Ann Sterzinger and John Steele about the Millennial generation and how much they suck.

Mark Dayton's Economic Minnesota Miracle

August 15, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

For the past couple years I've had the occasional brainwashed Minnesota leftist automaton regurgitate cud it received, pre-chewed by the Minnesota democrat party and say,

"Oh yeah!!! But what about Mark Dayton's economic miracle!!!!???? About how he taxed the rich and now Minnesota is the fastest growing state in the nation? Huh? What about that!!??? Huh huh???"

I'm old and experienced enough to ignore this because 100% of the time...

not 97%
not 98%
not 99%

but ONE HUNDRED PERCENT of the time when I hear anything coming from the left it is either an outright lie or it is a half-truth making the entire statement a lie. Combine this with the fact no leftists (and not that many rightists either) care about empiricism or proof, I don't bother wasting my breath trying to argue, and just let the naive fool continue on his/her doomed leftist career path of non-profit work, academia, panhandling, or slinging Uptown coffee.

But when I heard it the fourth time, it was getting annoying. And so to have the data very handy I decided to look up this "economic miracle" and see for myself just what a great job Mark Dayton (and not the hard working people of Minnesota) did to get this economy booming. And true to form, you find out the left's claim of an economic miracle here in Minnesota, just isn't true.

Right off the bat there is no "miracle" happening here in Minnesota. If you look at GDP figures of Minnesota vs. the United States, we averaged a whopping 1/10th of 1% more than the nation since Mark Dayton has been governor. This right here is not a "miracle." It's a rounding error. Minnesota's economic growth has been IDENTICAL to the nation's.

	MN	US
2011	2.34	1.6
2012	1.25	2.22
2013	2.5	1.67
2014	2.6	2.4
2015	2.36	2.6
Average	2.21	2.098

Of course, then the left immediately cites unemployment as success of Dayton's trust-fund baby socialism, pointing out Minnesota's unemployment rate is much lower than the country's. This is true, but has always been true. Minnesota has always had a lower unemployment rate than the nation. Chalk it up to sociological factors of its people, not the governor:

About the only thing approaching "miracle" status is that of the government budget, which went from deficit to surplus under Dayton's reign. This is hardly shocking that the left would point to a growing state as "success" since they largely parasitically depend on it for their survival, but state finances are NOT the economy. Furthermore, this was the trend NATION WIDE. All states went through the worst recession in 2006-2010, most of their budgets went into deficit, and when the economy (sort of) rebounded, they went into surplus. About the only thing Dayton did was his same ole same ole Trust Fund Baby Socialism or "tax the rich" which may have begotten a healthier surplus than most, but at the expense of driving long term capital and investment away (um for those leftists reading this, "capital" and "investment" means companies who provide jobs).

In short, I would like to say that I am writing a biased or political piece. I would like to say I have a personal hatred for Dayton (which I do). But I don't have to. An empirical and intellectually honest assessment of Minnesota's economic performance will plainly show there is no booming economy here, let alone a "miracle." It's simply a lie that should be a text book case study for any student interested in studying political propaganda.

25,000 Subscribers on YouTube

August 16, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Wanted to say thanks to all of you who followed and made not only my YouTube channel successful, but made Asshole Consulting possible as well!

Amazon Affiliate Trial and Error

August 16, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Hi All,

Without going into a long and detailed explanation, browsers have evolved a lot, so much so that some them are now putting in automatic ad-blockers which, among other things, blocks my Amazon Affiliate banner (top right banner, right below the ad for Curse of the High IQ). I think I programmed a work around, but won't know for sure until I can verify some purchases.

So if you are one of those kind souls who does all their shopping through my banner, please let me know if/what/when you purchased something so I can see if the new banner I programmed is capturing and recording your sales.

Many thanks,

Cappy

PS-If you don't do your online shopping through my Amazon Affiliate program, START!

How the Left Brought Racist and Sexist Trolling Upon Itself

August 16, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Though brash and callous, I draw the line at using words like "nigger," "spick," and "kike." These words have no benefit or upside to them, and while I'm very critical of black, hispanic, American female, and other minority cultures, it is a constructive criticism that aims to improve their lot in life. However, whereas I draw the line at using outright insulting phrases and terms, the same does not hold true for others. For example I wince every time Matt Forney claims he's a Nazi and, frankly, won't listen to Chris Cantwell because of his frequent use of the term "nigger."

However, I know Matt Forney and (after listening to several of Chris Cantwell's shows), am familiar with Chris Cantwell. And if I had to put money on it, I'd wager Matt is no Nazi and I have serious doubts Chris Cantwell genuinely hates blacks. But their flagrant and flippant use of these words, even though deep down inside they likely don't believe a word of it, is an interesting phenomenon. For if you step back and look at it, it's a response, if not outright backlash to the left's obsession with accusing everybody of racism and sexism. And it is here that the left has created a monster that will forever hound and haunt them.

To understand this monster you have to understand its origins. And its origins come from the left's obsession with victim-politics. Without going into the long and belabored psycho-political explanation, leftists are at the core lazy people. They don't want to work. They don't want to do math. And so they approach life with a survival strategy of parasitism and forcing others to pay for them. However, life doesn't pay the parasitic, so leftists must become masters at rationalizing the theft of others. This results in the professional victim-whoring industry where they claim they're discriminated against because of their (choose any one of the following) race

sex gender religion
ethnicity mental illness disability
etc. etc. etc.

And since they're "discriminated against" this gives them the right to your life-labor in the form of extra money and taxes you get to pay.

This pins not only the emphasis, BUT THEIR ENTIRE SURVIVAL on their ability to highlight discrimination. And so not only is every whiff of genuine discrimination highlighted, magnified, and brought to the forefront, but things that aren't bigotry, but can be construed as bigotry, are spun thusly so (and let's not mention minorities faking their own hate crimes). Add to this most leftists have no value, worth, or agency in life, and they trip over themselves to highlight sexism and racism as a faux-profession, notably in journalism.

The result in a constant cacophony of perpetually offended people who invariably blame the boogie man of "white males" for their laziness, sloth, parasitism, stupidity, and utter lack of achievement and success in life. It also results in a world of people (notably whites and males) having to walk around egg shells so as not to offend the precious, fragile feelings of the perpetually offended, not to mention avoid the career-destroying accusation of being a (GASP!!!!) RACIST/SEXIST! And so like the increasing cowards they are, men and whites tuck their tails behind their legs, and tip toe around the land mines the race-whores and sexist-pimps have laid out before them...except for one group of people.

Those (predominantly) white males who have nothing to lose.

The Great Recession had a great effect on the lives, and more importantly, futures of a entire generation. It more or less destroyed them. Saddled with $70,000 in student loans for a degree that land them zero jobs and released into the slowest growing economy since the Great Depression, millions of millennials (and Gen X'ers) have realized they will never achieve the American dream. They won't own a house, they won't have a loving, caring, or supporting wife. They won't have enough for retirement. And they won't have a career they were promised. Adding insult to injury, males and whites of these generations are falsely accused of having "privilege" and are constantly blamed for the failures of others when they themselves have no success to speak of. So with no job to lose, no career to be had, and no financial success to point towards, they simply say "fuck it" and rip apart the entire system.

This has resulted in a large digital, but veritable army of online bloggers, posters, commenters, and trolls with zero fucks to give. From their basements, their buddies' couches, or their local bar they slam and troll the precious sensibilities of the professional victim-whoring industry. Comments sections are filled with racial epitaphs, outright sexism, outright bigotry, and all manner of name calling. They blow through the mine-field of political correctness by jettisoning any pretense of political correctness, indifferent if they're accused of an "ism" or "ist," agreeing-and-amplifying with bulldoze force. And they only increase the ferocity of their attacks when the professional parasites whine about being attacked. In the end, these leftists who insist on being professional victims, are guaranteed to be hounded and harassed when they publicly post their whining and parasitism on line. And since that's how they get their money, they have condemned themselves to an entire life of online harassment, criticism, lecturing, and hatred.

Just one problem.

It's all trolling.

Certainly there are some genuine sexists and racists out there. And no doubt there are bigots and homophobes on teh interwebz as well. But the increasing army of posters and commenters aren't racist or sexist. They're just sick of the constant lecturing, proselytizing, whining, and bitching coming from the professional victim-whiner-whore industry. Even women and minorities are sick of it as they don't want their skin or plumbing to be associated with such a whiny, parasitic, pathetic, and loser class. But since reason, evidence, and empiricism doesn't work, then why not just troll them and increase their blood pressure? Why not mock them and ridicule them, by showing them what real bigotry and racism would look like? This is why the majority of articles from these ist-whores don't have the comments section available. This is why Anita Sarkeesian doesn't allow comment on her channel. They are such weak and worthless people, they can hypocritically (and falsely I might ad) blame others for their failings in life, but can't stand to take the criticism. And criticism is all they ever get in life.

In the end you have to take inventory of who is really winning this battle. Yes, to be a professional victim-whore may sound nice. You don't have to work (a real job anyway). Life is easy. And all you have to do is take whatever handouts you can get. But while that may sound easy, the lack of honor, agency, and purpose in life invariably becomes taxing and destroys your life. Have you seen a happy feminist? Have you seen a content BLM protestor? Just imagine that instead of producing something of value, or raising a family, or working as a mechanic, your entire life was just 65 years of panhandling and concocting excuses as to why you have the right to be a thief. You will have achieved nothing of genuine intellectual, emotional, romantic, artistic, or industrial worth. You're just a parasite.

But if you think that's bad, just imagine that life with millions of trolls harassing you everyday, exposing you for the fraud and leech that you are. And they're not going anywhere because you were so successful in implementing a socialist system you took away any future they might have had, any women they might have married, and dared to blame all of your failures on them.

It's great when Dr. Frankenstein dies at the hand of his own creation.

---

http://www.soundcloud.com/aaron-clarey/
http://www.assholeconsulting.com
https://www.youtube.com/user/AaronClarey

https://twitter.com/aaron_clarey
http://www.amazon.com/Aaron-Clarey/e/B00J1ZC350/
Amazon Affiliate

The Father Could Not Be Reached for Comment

August 17, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Those precious, heroic single mothers. How do they manage to do what they do?

Reconnaissance Man Is Meant for 20 Somethings

August 18, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Glorious Karl of Glorious Hat fame did a review of my latest book "Reconnaissance Man."

However, I did want to dispel some myths about the book, namely who this book is written for. The most common complaint I get about my books is that they're of no use to people 50 or older. And...well...yeah, I can't really help you when your life is 70% done and all major decisions have been made. However, this book is not for high school, or even college aged kids only as people seem to think it is. It's for anybody who is wandering around the desert,clueless about what they want to do, and are contemplating or kicking around either attending or returning to college. Ergo, the target age was 18-35, with kids "ideally" picking up the book at 14.

Regardless, the whole point of the book is to make sure you either choose the right path the first time, OR, leave the wrong path you're on now and quickly identify the right one, easily saving you 10 years of your life, perhaps even 20. Yes, it is for kids about to enter college, but it's for anybody who is either stuck, listless, or directionless in life and cannot see any other way out. This book shows you that out.

When Yellow Journalism Infected Blogging

August 18, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

A very interesting analysis (video) by Bernard Chapin about how the drive for traffic and clicks has jettisoned the pursuit of truth and accuracy, resulting in very few blogs that are genuine vehicles of journalism.

Men Pay More In Taxes

August 18, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Men pay egregiously more in taxes, resulting in a tax gap. I would also be curious to know if we collect less in government money. Wait, never mind, I already know.

15 Lies Single Moms Tell You

August 18, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Looks like the Ole Captain's advertisement made it to Terrence Popp's latest video!

Why Citizens Should Have Access to Fully Automatic Weapons and M1 Abrams

August 19, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Was interviewed on Crush the Street with Ken again, and we discussed my position on the 2nd Amendment. I frankly don't care about obscured gun/death statistics and view the right to gun ownership on a principled level - it was instituted to counter an oppressive government. Ergo, individuals should be armed to the level of soldiers and militias (in my opinion) should not only have access to tanks and other armament, but training in the use of them AND supplied with them.

We then went on to talk about how it's impossible for everybody to retire off of the stock market.

"Captain's Quarterly"

August 19, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Happy Day Lieutenants!

After a three week work binge some of my projects are coming to fruition. And while Reconnaissance Man was recently published, I also put the finishing touches on another project "Captain's Quarterly."

"Captain's Quarterly" is basically backing up the best works of this blog. However, instead of doing that every 3-5 years (which resulted in the 900 page monstrosity that "Captain Capitalism - Reserved" was), I'm backing up the blog every quarter to make it more digestible, thus Captain's Quarterly. I have also added some eye candy to the project in part to give you something more than charts and data to look at, in part because I appreciate the 1950's looking woman, but also to piss off feminists because they hate truly beautiful women. Thus each issue of "Captain's Quarterly" will have a new model dolled up in classy 1950's attire and lingerie (that's if I can keep finding reliable, timely models, so if you know any, send them may way).

The only problem is that "Captain's Quarterly" is made first to be an analog back up of my works, and second as a work of art. Therefore it's in color and it's price is well...rather pricey. Each issue is estimated to cost around $20 an issue, which I hope in the future will go down with advances in technology. That being said, the Kindle version, not being limited by color-printing technology, I set at the lower price I could possible at $2.99 per issue.

Regardless, if you are interested in purchasing a copy, you can find both paperback and kindle versions on Amazon.com. And many thanks to all of you for your support!

Cappy

Curse Free Episode #2 of The Clarey Podcast!

August 19, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

What if college girls dressed like the 1950's?
Captain's Quarterly is out.
Amy Schumer pulls an Obama and writes about herself.
Millennials aren't have sex because they're not sexy.

AND MORE!

In THIS EPISODE of The Clarey Podcast!

A Very Capitalist Weekend

August 20, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Remember to do all your online shopping this weekend via my Amazon link. Costs you nothing, and all proceeds go to an evil white republican male to do evil white republican male things.

Blame the Black President for Once

August 21, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Ho ho ho!

Monday Morning Linkage

August 22, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

I do believe fat women are the least honorable and trustworthy people. It's simply the biggest, boldest, most honest tell about their personality.

Target's virtue signaling backfires.

Meanwhile in Venezuela.

Why Manveer Heir Shouldn't Be (and Brendan Eich Should Never Haven Been) Fired

August 22, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

If you don't know the kerfuffle surrounding Manveer Heir, he is a developer at Bioware games that has made some tweets and social media commentary that some deemed racist. And while I can certainly understand criticizing various races, or pointing out shortcomings in an aim to constructively criticize (or perhaps even vent about) said races, I kind of drew the line at this:

Naturally, whether genuinely racist or not, calls for Heir's head have come forth. There's even a petition to get the man fired (I sent an e-mail to Bioware and as of yet don't know if he's still employed). However, after getting over the visceral reaction of loathing a man that seems to loathe you merely for your skin and gender, a more somber analysis (hat tip to Honey Badger radio) is required. For if we merely insist SJW's get theirs in return, we miss a much larger and more important threat to all of us - the freedom of speech.

Tempting as it may be to get your pound of flesh against somebody who hates you for irrational reasons, the larger issue here is one of the freedom of speech. And disgusting as you may find Mr. Heir's comments, he does have the right to say what he wants (or perhaps not in Canada, given the latest ruling by the Canadian Human's Rights commission). Regardless, simply turn the tables and let us revisit Mr. Brendan Eich. Eich was the former CEO of Mozilla until it was discovered he made a political donation to a campaign to ban gay marriage. For him exercising his right to the freedom of speech he was summarily fired...and we all stopped using Firefox as a browser. But while we can highlight a tit for tat exchange between leftists and rightists getting fired for their political views, the larger point though is that Americans (and Canadians) EFFECTIVELY do NOT have the freedom of speech. Not because of government or a tyrannical state, but because of....

employers.

I have argued before that people either HAVE the freedom of speech or they DON'T. And it doesn't matter if it's the government infringing upon your freedom of speech, but ANY entity in a position of power over you. And so while the government may not care if you ramble off racist tweets, sexist YouTube videos, or controversial Instachats, your employer might, and that effectively infringes on your speech.

We've seen this in another arena as well, not just with employers, but also college campuses. Though colleges are NOT the law and they are NOT your employer, because they are the only way by which you can get a degree, and thus employment, you are effectively answering to a defacto fourth layer of government. This allows colleges to not only force you to attend a kangaroo court if falsely accused of rape and force whatever kind of political indoctrination upon you, but if you violate their speech codes you get punished, expelled, you career ruined, etc. Again, (and TRULY ironically) you don't have the freedom of speech ON A COLLEGE CAMPUS!

In short, because of these "quasi" layers of government in the form of employers, colleges, even social media giants (with their "community guidelines), nobody REALLY has the freedom of speech. And since nobody has the freedom of speech, great ideas, controversial ideas, and ideas that will genuinely advance and progress society (not to mention ideas we'd like to just talk about without the fear of consequences) cannot come to the forefront or be advocated.

This is why, in my humble opinion, legislation should be passed that prohibits employers (and colleges) from firing (or hiring) people based on what they say on the internet or in public. It is none of their business, it does not concern them, and if employers TRULY cared about CSR or "virtue signaling" their liberal credentials they would advertise the fact they do NOT investigate, monitor, or inquire about your internet or social life. The only form of "justice" or comeuppance would come in the form of the market place of ideas and debates on the internet. Racists, communists, facists, homophobes, etc., would all be outed and publicly shammed/ostracized. So distasteful would their ideas and commentary be, they'd have to turn off the likes/dislikes ratio and comments and deal with the hate mail in private. And people would choose with their time and dollars whether or not to deal with these people. Besides which, there is a huge benefit to letting people TRULY have the freedom of speech - they'll show their true colors. And if you can find out somebody doesn't like you because of the color of your skin, or they intend to blow up a building because they don't like a particular religion, it makes you wonder why Facebook, Google, Youtube, etc. have community guidelines at all. Because I for one (not to mention the FBI and CIA) would like to know who these people are. So please let them exercise their freedom of speech uninhibited.

Episode #161 of The Clarey Podcast

August 23, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

#Womenwithdegrees!
Dumping UK husband for Jamaican lover.
Mail order brides.
Target losing business.

AND MORE!

In THIS EPISODE of The Clarey Podcast!

How Women are Truly Oppressed

August 23, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Never have so many
Been duped out of so much
By so few:

Hanging Lake Park

August 23, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Greetings from Colorado:

More Hanging Gardens

August 24, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Craig's Nest, Grand Junction, Colorado

August 25, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Curse of the High IQ Available in Audio

August 25, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

For those of you who insist you get a run in or some work done while taking in a book via audio, you'll be happy to know "Curse of the High IQ" is available in AUDIO now!

Who is the "Alt Right?"

August 26, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

An analysis by Davis Aurini.

Highway 141 Colorado

August 26, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Some pictures from my latest adventure:

Margaret Cho: The Gen X Millennial

August 26, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

This won't be a long one, but one that should be noted.

Margaret Cho, if you didn't know, is a "comedian." Those air quotes are the largest ones I could order from China, but they are currently building aircraft carrier-size ones that they will ship to me once completed. Regardless, the only reason I know of her was a friend of mine, who was gay, said I just "had to see her." So I watched about 10 minutes of a video and had to turn it off when she did a "comedy" skit about eating pussy.

This was about 15 years ago, and I distinctly remember two things about her:

1. She is NOT funny.
2. Much like Amy Schumer is today, she was championed by the pacifier sucking Gen-X at the time as a female comedic genius.

And then she went away.

Perhaps she "went away" much like Saturday Night Live "went away" in my life, because it was only funny to sophomoric 7th graders. ie - it still exists, but you either grow up, or realize it just isn't that funny. Perhaps her career stalled and people had their fill of "eating pussy jokes." But whatever the case, Margaret Cho, in all of her media-hyped "comedy" was no longer at the forefront.

Which brings us to today. For while perusing my facebook, the Talented Mr. Aurini sent me this:

Let me explain something to the young Millennial women, or perhaps even the Gen X women that think Margaret Cho is anything of intellectual value.

This is a now-approaching 50 year old woman. And this is what she's doing.

Let that sink in.

This isn't a 14 year old girl pulling a prank.
This isn't a 24 year old college student protesting something or other.

This is a 67%-life-over woman who's legacy she is choosing to leave is wearing a full-body sweater penis.

If you can't see that Margaret Cho's life's purpose has simply been to serve as a warning for others, then I can't help you. And if you're of the leftist variety to think this is some how "cool" or "edgy" and you're "sticking it to the man," your entire life will be a waste. But if you're a younger woman, who still has her beauty, and still deep down inside would like to get married, have a family, and a shot at a traditional life, you cannot listen to these leftist, Hollywood, viruses. This is where their path leads. This is where you will end up. Choose your path wisely and enjoy the decline.

Curse Free Episode #3 of The Clarey Podcast!

August 26, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Cappy's 20 year regret.
What Metallica teaches us about homeschooling.
Leftist Millennials are The Borg/The Flood.
An 80 year old fan writes Cappy a very humbling letter.

AND MORE in THIS EPISODE of The Clarey Podcast!

Sponsored by "Reconnaissance Man!" Available in paperback and kindle, a must-read for every 20 and 30 something lost wandering the desert in life.

Charity Isn't Necessary

August 27, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Remember if you'd like to support the Captain, donations and charity are NOT needed. Just do your weekend online shopping here (and book mark the URL if you'd be kind enough to).

The Solution to Colin Kaepernick

August 30, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

If you are a true American, at minimum Colin Kaepernick pisses you off. A rich minority millionaire football player who was adopted by white people who made headlines recently by not standing for the national anthem because (exhausted sigh) "racial equality." Such hypocrisy (and unoriginality/conformity) makes any normal person detest such a person, plus deep down inside your darwinistic instincts are scrambling for a "solution" for a traitor to your country.

Ergo, you'll call into the Sean Hannity Show.
You'll tweet it on your FriendFace.
Perhaps you'll get into a debate about him online.

But in the end you know this will have no effect because this is the narrative and the entire media, educational, and government systems are championing that narrative.

So how do you fight back?

Well, there is only one way.

You boycott the 49'ers.

This is an example of a theory I've been working on that there is a universal equilibrium when it comes to political attacks from your enemies. That for every political attack (or even "action") there is a succinct, simple, Occam's Razorish type response that would counter it. Think the laws of physics where for every action there is an equal and opposite reaction. Or in economics, markets are always trying to find equilibrium. It may take some time, but if you sit down and think about it, a clear and obvious solution to any political attack/action DOES invariably exist.

However, there are two problems that exist with the simple solution of boycotting the '49'ers.

One, they are from San Francisco and most people in San Francisco cheer on the ignorant demand of equal outcomes and not equal opportunities. They are for stealing money from white people to give to minorities that fucked up as badly as Colin's birth father (you can look that up). And they are all for replacing meritocracy, fairness, and justice with equal outcomes for a hatred of those who worked hard and earned what they have.

So you're not going to get anybody in SF to boycott Mr. Kaepernick.

Two, thankfully, you can still cause the NFL a sting if fans of any team playing against the 49'ers decide to boycott them. This may (once again) be the simple counter-reaction political solution we are seeking, but alas, remember what I've said before:

Republicans are pussies when it comes to boycotting.

While there is some hope with Target Corporation suffering financially for it's sickening virtue signaling, in general Republicans, SWPL's, RINO's, and suburbanites still give money to corporations and companies that hate them, or at least hate America and freedom. Starbucks and Apple are always patronized by suburban conservative folk because they just have to have their coffee and latest iPhone fashion statement. Lines go out the door at Chipotle as sheeple SWPL's get their "organic grass fed beef." I still, for the life of me, can't understand why people still have leftist MSM rags delivered to their squeaky clean White Fish Bay doors. And year after year, in major metro after major metro, the (predominantly white, republican) football fans bend over and spread their ass cheeks so the NFL can ass-rape them for billion dollar stadiums.

In short, yes, there is a simple solution and one that 50 years ago would have worked. Had some arrogant spoiled suburbanite brat QB failed to stand up for the pledge of allegiance and spew leftist hatred for white people as the excuse, I'd imagine the majority of football going fans would boycott any games he played, forcing the NFL to silence him or bench him altogether (truthfully, the NFL would probably never had let it get that far). Of course, the male football fans of today are pussies compared to the men of yesteryear, and (just like they get ass-raped paying for stadiums), they'd rather have this whinny child spit in their face and indirectly accuse them of being racist, than give up "sportsball" and stand for principle. Their lives are that meaningless and void of purpose, all they have is "the Sunday game" and will submit themselves as inferior men to this self-pitying race-pimp.

Alas, there is a solution, but it requires real men and women to implement it. And very few of these people are real men or women.

Enjoy the decline.

ITT Out of Business

August 31, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Or almost anyway. And awwwww, that's just too bad.

Now when will the public universities go out of business? Or at least end their liberal arts programs?

Episode #162 of The Clarey Podcast

August 31, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Sleeping in the back of a Prius.
Black Canyon National Park and 2,700 foot drops.
Yes, I charge my girlfriend rent…and so should you!
Forcing people to sit-down dinners.
Death by Prius!

AND MORE on THIS EPISODE of The Clarey Podcast!

Brought to you by Captain's Quarterly, the quarterly publication GUARANTEED to piss off feminists! Also available in Kindle!

Pikes Peak, Sand Dunes, and Ouray

August 31, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Some pictures of my adventure these past 24 hours:

Black Canyon and Royal Gorge

August 31, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Last pics from Colorado. These are primarily from Black Canyon National Park, which I would say is a must if you are visiting Colorado. The pictures fail to do the park justice as those cliffs range from 1,500 to 2,700 feet straight down. The "stream" you see there is actually quite a large and rapidly flowing river. Some other pictures include Royal Gorge and Red Mountain.

Operations/posts will get back to a normal schedule...until once again I get stir crazy and decide to randomly leave Minnesota for some other destination I've yet to visit.

The "Wymyn's" Episode

September 1, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

I'm about to board a plane and intend on listening to the Pushing Rubber Downhill podcast. However, you may want to tune into this particular episode of Adam's podast, the "Wymyn's" episode where Adam says, and I quote,

"I love all women. The pretty ones, and none of the others."

Never Lend Money to Liberal Arts Majors

September 2, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

I guess Amazon learned the hard way.

Why Girls Will Never Ask Out Boys - Because They're Not Equals

September 2, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

A reader of mine sent me a post from the Daily Telegraph. In it was the lamentations of a precious British snowflake who was complaining that no men were asking her out. She admitted in the first quarter of the post that women, being equal, should be approaching men as well, but dismissed this on the flimsy grounds that there's a chance approaching a man might annoy him. I was going to dismiss it on the grounds that the Daily Telegraph was a tabloid looking for click-bait like the Daily Mail, but when I looked up the Daily Telegraph, it seemed to be not only a legitimate paper, but a center right one as well.

Alas, I knew what I was dealing with. Another traditional, conservative, suburban "me too" republican type chick who is slowly realizing men are doing exactly what they were told by 60's-90's feminists, and leaving women alone. And it's scaring the hell out of her because deep down inside, no matter what women or feminists say, they want children, they want men, and the death of men approaching them strikes at this visceral genetic and darwinistic core.

Her solution, however, is telling, for it belies a vital and VERY important lesson about women that all men, especially young ones, must learn. So pull up a chair and gather 'round older brother Cappy as he pours himself a scotch and explains this lesson to you "lads."

First, you boys have to realize just what a coward this woman is. Leftist or rightist or not, after the 40 year cacophony of "rahrahfeminism,anythingmencandowomencandobetter," when it comes time to put up or shut up, she tucks her tail between her legs and BLATANTLY LIES saying "she doesn't want to inconvenience men" by asking them out. Huh, funny. Because that's PRECISELY what makes asking out and approaching women so daunting. You don't want to offend them, interrupt them, or come off as creepy or a stalker. Yet, men push through this blockade, and not only push through it, but spend untold mental and creative resources trying to make said approaches, charming, dashing, entertaining and above all else, successful. Still, despite saying they want "X" for 40 years, when it comes time to own up to the responsibility side of equality, they retreat faster than the French. This leads to...

Second, hypocrisy. Like Cafeteria Christians who pick and choose which aspects of Christianity they will and will not follow, your standard western feminists choose which aspects of feminism they want, and which aspects of traditionalism they want. When it comes to hard things, difficult things, or taking responsibility that comes with freedom and agency, they invariably play the "Why I'm Just a Traditional Girl Card." When it comes to easy things like education, cushy jobs, income, etc., then they can't pull out the "I'm A Feminist Who Demand's Equality Card" fast enough. Alas, why women are strangely absent when it comes to studying STEM, but demand equal wages. And why our precious snowflake above wants a man, but doesn't want to do any of the heavy lifting to get one.

This leads to the third point or question - is it just the precious snowflake, or is the eschewing of the responsibility that comes with equality a universal trait amongst women? Naturally, asking people out is just one aspect of equality between the sexes. But if we are to use it as a proxy, in this one regard, yes, MOST DEFINITELY, women as a whole are shirking their feminist responsibilities they clamored for and are RUSHING back to those traditional and hate-filled 1950's standards, insisting men must run the gauntlet and ask them out.

It is here we have to look at this phenomenon of cowardice and hypocrisy and recognize it for what it is:

An example of female inferiority.

Of course, this is nothing shocking to men and women who have intellectual honesty and live in the real world. We know men and women are different, and we know men and women excel at certain things the opposite sex sucks at. But according to feminists and feminist doctrine, this is IMPOSSIBLE. An instance of where women are inferior to men just cannot exist. But it does, and the lack of women approaching men shines a glaring light into the short-comings, dishonesty, falsehoods, and outright unfairness of feminism.

Now, we could write this off as something "cute" and entertaining as the "battle of the sexes" continues on. "How quaint! How precious! When it comes down to it, deep down inside, girls want to be girls despite all that kerfuffle about feminism and equality. They still like boys and want to be chased! OK boys! Go chase them!!! Tee hee!!!"

But there's two major problems with this.

One, though "cute" and "darling" on the outside, who asks who out is arguably the most important part of equality between the sexes, because it speaks to arguably the most important thing in life - sex. Procreation. The continuation of the human race. Family. And dismiss it as you may, all of civilization has been built and created by men pursuing sex and the continuation of their genetic line. There is nothing else men have historically vested and valued MORE than the pursuit, and invariable conquering of a woman. So when a man approaches a woman to inevitably inquire as to whether she'd like to procreate, he is opening his entire (at least genetic and darwinistic) value to her for judgement. And in doing so risks having his entire value, his entire being, his entire life judged as "not worth it" or "worthless."

Men do this at least THOUSANDS of times in their lives. We invariably build up a tolerance and a courage to rejection. Some even lose a bit of their soul and humanity as they've become so calloused to it (and these men move onto become "the players" women claim to hate so much). But regardless of the path, it invariably leads to traits men have that women don't - fearlessness, courage, intellectual rigor, pain-tolerance, and tenacity. And in these regards, men are blindingly superior to women.

But if this still doesn't convince you that "who asks who out" is likely the most important aspect of equality, consider this story. A female friend of mine had a crush on a male friend of mine. She would inquire about me setting her up, inviting them both to the same party, and doing all manners of theatrics to PUT HER IN THE PRESENCE of this young man. This went on for SIX MONTHS where she would inquire, ask, scheme, and plot to constantly be "conveniently" in his presence, all in the hopes he'd inevitably ask her out...which he never did. Inevitably I got sick of her asking me to pitch softballs over the plate and said, "Dude, just ask him out. You've been at this shit for six months! You'd have saved yourself all this time and energy and moved on regardless if he said yes or no." To which she started crying and sobbing uncontrollably at the MERE PROSPECT of having to ask a young man out.

The fact that a mere THOUGHT reduced an otherwise functioning, controlled woman into a sobbing mess suggests "who asks who out" is neither "cute" nor "funny," but flirting with one of the universe's most powerful forces.

The second problem is one of mootness or theoretics, because discuss this all we may, sorry ladies....men took what you said these past 50 years to heart. You know that CONSTANT BARRAGE of propaganda you've been feeding young boys starting in kindergarten through college that women are not only equal, but any expression of romantic or sexual interest can be construed as...well...choose your poison:

sexual harassment creepiness stalker date rape rape
etc.?

You know how you made it illegal to cat-call women and wolf-whistling a punishable offense?

Yeah, actions have consequences. And though most men may have honorable intentions, innocently intending to merely ask you out for coffee, the omnipresent and never-ending lecture that women are equal and approaching them can (and sometimes does) result in criminal charges or expulsion from school makes men somewhat loth to ask you out.

Of course, there is a silver lining to all this drama. And that is for the first time women are actually getting what they want - equality. And this equality is coming in the form of forced-responsibility and owning the consequence of their actions. They told men they were equals in the "who asks who out" game, and men believed them. They told men approaching them could be construed as harassment or stalking activity, and men believed them. And thus a dearth of men approaching women has resulted, lessening the chances these women will marry, have children, and otherwise live meaningful lives. This is cause for celebration, because I know, ladies, you all wanted equality. And by god you're going to get it in spades, whether you like it or not.

Visit Aaron's other sites/books/consulting company:
Podcast
Asshole Consulting
YouTube Channel
Twitter
Books by Aaron
Amazon Affiliate

The Father Could Not Be Reached for Comment

September 2, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

I love how all the single moms just applaud themselves as heroes for merely lying on their back and having a guy ejaculate into them. Meanwhile the kids are chaos and are being groomed as the next generation of criminals, thieves, and future single parents. Oh well, enjoy the decline!

Curse Free Episode #4 - Women Owe Men Reparations Special!

September 2, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Fat people - they're everywhere!
Western Women cost society $150,000 each.
Homeschooled children kick ass...again!
Women own men $18 quadrillion in REPARATIONS!

AND MORE!!!

In THIS EPISODE of The Clarey Podcast!

Brought to you by "Curse of the High IQ!"

Forcing Economics Down People's Throats

September 3, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

This is Cindy. She is a model for "Captain's Quarterly"

Cindy wants two things:

1. That you buy a copy of Captain's Quarterly in either paperback or kindle. To give you an incentive she has kindly provided centerfold shots in various outfits and poses after each article. You WILL read it for the articles and you WILL read it for her pictures.

2. She wants you to do all your online shopping via my Amazon Affiliate program this weekend. That way I can afford to hire her as a model again for future issues.

Please make Cindy happy.

Lazy Sunday Listening

September 4, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

If you are looking for something to listen to, either of the intellectually stimulating or entertaining variety or both, please consider these two podcasts this weekend.

Adam Pigott's - "Why You Never Tell Her You Love Her" episode

And remember, there's always the good ole Captain and his humble curse full AND curse free podcasts!

The Meaning of Life: Religion, Hedonism, Family, and Legacy

September 5, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

A client's request ended up being a bit more profound and, after thought and contemplation, resulted in a very organized and structured approach as to determining what is the meaning of life:

What the Railroad Tells Us About the Economy

September 6, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

The economy ever since 2006 has been "Meh."
When historians and academics look back at Obama's economic performance, they'll say "meh."
We never left the recession as far as I'm concerned and with economic growth BARELY outpacing population growth our increases in standards of living has been "meh."

And since "meh" isn't exciting, I moved onto other things.

But then I hear whispers and rumors, sayings and speakings, and an increasing amount of them are about the economy. And the economy is no longer "meh" like it has been since 2008, but things are not looking too good. Oil prices are down (not just on supply concerns, but demand concerns). The Baltic index is down, showing a global slow down. And then a little birdy in the railroad biz I know said to look at rail car traffic. And 2016 it is very much down.

Now like I said before, I really don't care much about economics anymore. In part because there's nothing new. In part because it's quite a simple social study and not the complex science it's self-promoting whores make it out to be. And in part because the majority of people prefer their parasitic consumption of free stuff over the long term viability of the economy (and their childrens' futures). And so instead of banging my head against the wall, I just go pour another drink, hike another mountain, and buy some more ammo.

But this chart is interesting because (as Alan Greenspan was famous for measuring) rail road car traffic is a statistical measure than can't be fabricated or manipulated by BEA economists. It's a concrete measure that (like the railroad tie replacement Alan greenspan would measure) can be used to measure true economic production and growth in an economy no matter how violently Washington DC economists rape GDP figures.

I still don't think there's going to be a great economic collapse like 2006-2007. The world needs us too much and our reserve currency will protect us from most of the shocks. But don't be surprised if we have a little slow down like we did during Bush's final years in office....just expect the media to claim it's a "minor economic slow down" and not "the worst economy in 50 years" because Obama is in office.

My Humble Thanks for Oshay Duke Jackson

September 6, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

My Chicago Agent in the Field sent Mr. Jackson's video to me where he basically said many and kind things about Black Man's Guide Out of Poverty. I put Oshay's channel on the "podcast roll" and wanted to bring his channel to light for any of you interested in GENUINELY helping our black brothers close the life expectancy, income, and wealth gap through progress and not theft-redistribution:

Episode #163 of The Clarey Podcast Steve Pearlstein Episode

September 7, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

30 days and no booze makes Cappy an angry man.
Steven Pearlstein The Epitome of Baby Boomer.
ITT shutting down its campuses.
Never send your kids to Gonzaga.
Millennial Millie vs. Oshay Duke Jackson, tits vs. smarts.

AND MORE

in THIS EPISODE of The Clarey Podcast!

What Trucking Tells Us About the Economy

September 7, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

After posting the chart about rail car traffic being down, an Agent in the Field suggested I look at the "Cass Index" which is a measure for trucking volume in the country, and by gosh, it too also points to a very weak 2016!

Again, if I cared about the economy, I might look into this further. But this is just additional proof we may be heading towards a recession.

The Father COULD Be Reached for Comment

September 7, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

But he wasn't with the mother.
Nor in a nuclear family.
But his presence was completely unnecessary anyway because I'm sure all those government checks made everything perfect.

A Nickle Says A White Cop Didn't Shoot Him

September 7, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

And a dime says a black male did.

Oh the irony.

Women Reward Lies

September 7, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Download entire episodes of The Clarey Podcast here!

Warning, apparently Daily Motion opens a spam window if you have an Android phone. Looks like I get to go to Vimeo to see if we can find a suitable substitute for YouTube.

How Entitlement Drives Inflation

September 8, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Our Slavic Agent in the Field sent me this:

I've seen this chart before and nodded my head saying to myself "Yep, that's inflation." But it is what she said in her message that piqued my interest:

"I'm no economist and I don't understand inflation, but it seems to me something fishy is going on here."

This confused me because she's a smart gal and I would have figured she'd know precisely what's going on. I wanted to yell

"Money's flooding these markets! There's a fixed amount of goods. Prices go up! What's not to understand???"

But that's what my SAEG economist mind sees, and not your everyday Joe. Alas, it dawned on me that unless you dedicated a significant amount of time to studying economics, most people aren't going to understand this chart, or perhaps, more specifically, WHY certain things go up in price more than others. And that is going to be our economics lesson of today.

The first lesson to pull from this chart is to note the things that have gone up in price the most. Tuition and college are most prominent in the chart, along with childcare and health care. I would also throw in health insurance and stock prices, because those are two other major items that have gone up faster than the rate of inflation. But if you look at the most inflated items vs. the others, something should stand about about them.

That's right, the government is highly involved in these fields.

Government backs up, if not lends directly to students. The government also guarantees and in some cases outright buys (therefore becoming the technical lender) the mortgages of most people. The government has also mandated Obamacare, driving up your premiums and insurance costs. And the government through low interest rate policies, quantitative easing, and the invention of 401k's and IRA's has either lent money to corporations to buy their stocks back in the stock market, or provided people a huge tax break to sock away money in the same.

So let me be a bit of an arrogant economist - why are you shocked these respective markets are the most inflated?

We can talk about inflation merely being "the increase in prices." But to really understand inflation you need to know how prices got so inflated in the first place. And that happens when MORE money is flooded into a market than others.

In other words say the government didn't spend/lend $1 trillion annually on education and left it up to people to pay for it privately? What if Obama wasn't taking another $700 billion of working people's money to pay for the health care of the parasitic classes? What if you didn't have every government guarantee backing up the housing industry? That would damn well take away 75-80% of the money flooding these markets and prices would drop by the same. People fret saying, "Well how can we pay for college/healthcare/housing/retirement/etc. without government help!?" but they fail to realize it's government money that is precisely driving these costs up. If you simply took away this money (be it college, the stock market, healthcare, etc. etc.) prices would drop dramatically because there's be TRILLIONS less in money chasing those same fixed amount of degrees, doctors, houses, and stocks.

The second lesson is one that the Austrian economists keep trying to make, but you idiot commoners with your lips affixed to Keynes dick just can't seem to grasp. Inflation, caused either by government spending, or excessive lending results in bubbles that overprice assets. These assets become overpriced and cannot generate the income to pay off the debts incurred to purchase them. As people default on these assets, closing their businesses and operations down, this then results in a genuine economic recession, until prices go back to where they naturally should have been in a free market allowing for profits (and lower prices I might add) once again. The housing bubble and education bubbles are perfect examples of this LAW of economics.

Idiot Gen X dudebrodouchebags borrowed $800,000 on a $30,000 income to impress their blond bimbo wives back in the 00's by buying McMansions. The government and banks were only too willing to provide them financing via ARM's and NINJA loans. Sure enough, this flood of money drove housing prices up that their prices were no longer worth the rent these houses could generate. And sure enough when Chaz McStevenson the IV got laid off because his dad was embezzling funds at the company AND the ARM reset at .5% higher than he could afford, he defaulted on his mortgage, becoming the first snow flake that caused the avalanche of our worst recession since the Volker Recession.

The education bubble is exactly the same. Millions of idiot millennials (and Gen X'ers) thinking they're smarter than they are, deem themselves entitled to a college education. Combine this with their parents, teachers, counselors, and progressive credentialism, they go off to college by the millions, spending trillions on degrees that for the most part are worthless. This does a two-fer on the education market. It drives the cost of tuition up (as evidenced by the chart above), but also lessens the income generating potential of degrees as the market is now flooded with them. The economic cost is an entire underemployed generation living at home, unable to afford homes themselves, and a postponement of families as the female members of the millennial generation get to worry about menopause striking before they pay off their student loans. We also get to see dwindling economic growth that barely keeps up with population growth, and thus a stagnation of standards of living.

In short, if we did even a half-ass job of educating our population about basic economics instead of the full-ass job we do today, two full entire generations would be able to vote in politicians and policy makers that would have said, "leave it the fuck alone." The housing bubble (and subsequent recession) would never had occurred. The education bubble and a generation of self-absorbed talentless and perpetually unemployable millennials would never have become. And medical care/child care would not be going up as much as it has today. But merely having the wisdom to say, "keep the government out of it" would not be enough. We would also have to be willing to say, "I will do without." And that's the real problem driving inflation - entitlement.

In the real world where people are forced to be self-sufficient, affordability is a determinant of demand. And if tuition or children or a McMansion was not affordable, you would simply do without. However, because we've brought up a generation of spoiled, entitled pussies since the baby boomer era, nearly all of our population thinks they're entitled to...well...just look at Bernie Sander's platform:

Free health care
Free child care
Free mental care
Free education
Free housing
Free food
Free...well...everything

And whereas some of these things are necessities, others are not. But if you still insist on them being "rights," and you invoke the intervention of government to help you pay for them, this then drives prices up to the point you'd DEFINITELY be better off without them. And we all know somebody personally who has endured financial, personal, and psychological hardship trying to buy one of these "rights" they were entitled to.

The college student who the government "helped" by lending her $150,000 for her "Masters in Poetry."

The fratbrodudedouche who borrowed $499,999 to pay for a $500,000 house in 2005.

The ghetto/barrio/trailer trash legions of single moms who "didn't need no daddy 'cause I got me my gubmint check!" and spat out a gross of bastard children.

Yes, congratulations, you sure are entitled to those things, and by gosh the government did help you finance for them. But you ruined your life in the process purchasing assets that will never pay the debts you incurred to get them.

So yes, inflation is boring if you think it's merely "the increase in prices." And if you had your run of the mill economics professors, I can see why you think inflation is dullsville. But if you look at the details of our most inflated markets you witness a wonderful story of avarice, greed, entitlement, and stupidity being punished with a lifetime of debt, pain, poverty, and cluelessness. And that, my friends, is how you enjoy the decline.

Podcast
Asshole Consulting
YouTube Channel
Twitter
Books by Aaron
Amazon Affiliate

Baby Boomer Professors Feasting Off of Millennial Students' Blood

September 9, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Excerpt from the latest podcast:

Related.

Podcast archive can be found here.

Curse Free Episode #5 - Wells Fargo Loves You Special!

September 9, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Eat, Pray, Lies.
Wells Fargo screws you over again.
Millennials pay parents' student loans.
Victim whoring at campus.

AND MORE!

In THIS EPISODE of The Clarey Podcast!

A Free Redhead with Every Purchase!

September 10, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

While the Captain's away for the weekend, remember to purchase Reconnaissance Man and to do all your online shopping via Cappy's Amazon Affiliate program. And as always a FREE REDHEAD with EVERY PURCHASE! Scouts honor!

The U of Chicago Business School Should Be Ashamed…

September 12, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

that they wrote this drivel and are actually suggesting MORE LOANS to lower the costs of college. It's like they don't remember the Dotcom Mania, the Housing Bubble, or the current Retirement Bubble. And then they're actually kicking around a way to make college tuition free, which I'm sure will totally NOT destroy the value of a degree by the law of supply. AND THIS IS PRESUMABLY THE TOP FREE MARKET BUSINESS SCHOOL IN THE US!!!!

Target Corporation Really Doesn't Care

September 12, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

I'll say it again for the cheap seats. You rubes and suckers believing in Target's non-stop virtue signalling better take note, because all it is is marketing to them. They just want your money. And if push comes to shove, they'll screw you over as much as they can to save a buck.

How to Replace Colleges and Universities

September 12, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

A client at Asshole Consulting asked "What would the world of education look like under Cappy?" To which I answered him below. All of my ideas are genius and should obviously be implemented, but pay particular interest to #11. I not only think it's feasible, but if we got enough employers on board we could obsolete college degrees overnight.

OK, here is "The Education World of Cappy"

One, there would be no mandatory attendance past the 5th grade. The state would provide vouchers for students to attend schools until they have the basics of reading, writing, and arithmetic, and after that, the state no longer cares if your kid is in school or not. It would be up to the family to decide if they're going to keep their kid in school past the 5th grade.

Two, there would be no public schools. All schools would be private and the government would provide vouchers for those who are too poor to afford schooling.

Three, any trouble makers would be kicked out. bullies could be beaten by the teachers. Physical discipline would be allowed. Any shit students would and could be expelled. After that it would be up to other schools as to whether or not allow trouble makers into their school.

Four, progress/advancement/graduation would depend on ability, no age. You could in theory pass high school at the age of 7 if you master the subjects and test out of it. There is no reason to keep smart kids with stupid ones for 13 years of education.

Fifth, you would only attend until 16. There is no reason it takes 13 years to educate children this much. We can easily lop off 2 years of unnecessary bullshit.

Sixth, as much education could be done over the internet as possible. If you can pass the test either in person or online, I don't care. You passed the test. homeschooling would be a completely viable option and you could just have to show up to test at the local school to get certified.

Seventh, starting at the 6th grade the school would become military. Drills, exercise, uniforms, discipline. Not mean or beatings or anything like that...unless some kid mouths off.

Eighth, English and writing would be eliminated after the 5th grade and the curriculum would be practical education hence forth. STEM, IT, trades, agriculture, medicine, civics, economics, construction, firearms, martial arts, survivalist training, etc. This would require a fair amount of labs and hands on work. We would also be constantly in contact with employers to see what was in demand and incorporating those skills into the curriculum.

Ninth, mandatory military service. 2 years, have a cup of STFU and then you can vote upon completing those two years.

Tenth, teachers would be required to have 5 years minimum experience in their field. Nobody with a liberal arts degree or "education degree" would be allowed to teach. A bum off the street who has 10 years experience programming, but no degree would be hired over the fuckwit, know-nothing cunt with her doctorate in "education." They can set up private schools and colleges all they want, but you'd be an idiot to pay for attending when there's a perfectly good library on every corner.

Eleventh, colleges and universities would be eliminated (or funding completely cut) and replaced with a national certification board. You would test and get certifications, not degrees. Certifications specifically addressing skills like accounting, programming, supply chain management, welding, etc. etc that would not already be otherwise offered via unions, the various CPA state boards, or IT certification entities. There would be no "4-8 years in college" BS. Just a test you may pay some nominal sitting fee for. This national certification board would be publicly funded, but enlist the help of industry experts to develop the tests and standards to ensure students have the required skills.

Anyway, that would be the rough outline of "Cappy's Education Industry". Hope that helps.

Best,

Aaron

Silicon Valley Slaves

September 12, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

I love it when leftists suffer at their own hand.

Female refugee workers who get raped (and don't report it because they love their politics more than themselves).

Liberal arts majors who go $150,000 in debt for a degree that is nothing more than leftist indoctrination and hatred for whites and males.

And white liberals who are stupid enough to breed white children into a world they created that is sure to hate their offspring.

It's not everyday the left is unshielded from the consequences of their actions, but it does happen. And the Slave of Silicon Valley is another perfect example.

It's no secret young Silicon Valley executives vote democrat. Apple's CEO's are by corporate by-law to vote democrat, you can find any one of a number of articles of tech-start up executives donating heavily to the democrat party, and matter of fact I couldn't find any Silicon Valley big wig endorsing a republican. But the rank and file sheeple of Silicon Valley also vote overwhelmingly democrat. A simple search of voting patterns and maps of California shows Santa Clara county consistently on the left, confirming everybody's on board the socialist A-train.

But at what cost?

The thing about Silicon Valley professionals, executives or not, is they're great at IT, but horrible at economics. Because if they were they would realize just how little they're working for themselves, and how they're veritable slaves to others.

In 2013 the average Silicon Valley employee made $153,000. This was of course three years ago and at the time was rapidly growing, so let's just err on the side of caution and say it's $175,000 today. But, oh, foolish naive recent Stanford graduate. You think that's a lot of money, don't you? Now you get to pay for swallowing whole all the leftist BS you were fed in college.

First, the federal government is going to want its share. That's 28% lopped right off the top for you privileged Silicon Slaves lucky enough to be making six figures.

But, wait, aren't you Silicon Slaves all young people? That's right! You get to pay for the old people who didn't save up for retirement AND voted to piss away any surpluses that would go to otherwise fund social security and medicare. That's an additional 6.2% and .9% you get to pay for voting to be so charitable with other people's money. Throw in another 1% just for good medicaid and other measures, and you're looking at a total federal take of 36.1%.

Second, please don't think it's just federal taxes you pay my fine Python programming friend! Because since you and all the other Californians are just so much more enlightened than the rest of us troglodytes you voted in a socialist utopia of California! And all that virtue-signalling and being charitable with other people's money also has costs! Specially, a state income tax rate of 9.3%, which now brings up the government's take to 45.4%! You good obedient liberal you!

But hold on our MIT graduating friend! Third, you have local taxes!

You see, state and local taxes are interesting. They don't just have "income tax." No, they have a whole potpourri of taxes you pay that make it impossible to measure. Gas tax, fees, property taxes, you name it. There's a tax in every corner! But one of the larger local taxes which should account for at least a plurality of these local taxes you pay would be the state sales tax. And look at that, it's another 9.08%. Congratulations! You're paying an tax rate of 54.48%! Let's just call it 60% because I'm sure there's a couple minor taxes and fees you pay when you cross a bridge or use a paper bag.

So when we tally it all up, the average Silicon Slave forfeits 60% of his/her income to pay for state, federal, and local government services. And I know you are all getting your money's worth over there in Silicon Valley. Why the wide open roads, adequate transportation systems, the local of traffic jams, cheap cost of living, low tuition, affordable housing (well, for illegal aliens and welfare recipients anyway), adequately funded schools, and let's not forget that everything is so cheap out there in the Bay Area. Why it is the epitome of socialist utopia!

BUT IT DOESN'T STOP THERE!

You see, if you're intellectually honest you'll study the federal, state and local budgets and realize that about 70% (give or take a couple percentage points) of the money you just paid into the system...

go to pay for other people's stuff.

Their food
Their health care
Their education
Their transportation
Their psychologist

Fake-make-work government jobs
Their tuition, and
Their housing

NOT YOURS!

You still get to pay for your own stuff, because, well, after all, you are a privileged Silicon Valley slave who didn't earn your position through 4 grueling years of studying IT and STEM. It was just handed to you! So what will that remaining $70,000 buy in Silicon Valley?

Well, I suppose you need a place to live. Congratulations, with leftist "smart growth" policies, people's lemming mentality that "California" is the place to move, and your insistence that "you can't spend too much on education," property taxes and demand has driven rents to $2,500/month on average for just a one bedroom apartment. Lop off $30,000 of your remaining $70,000! And I suppose you need a car...but one that will impress your co-workers so you can keep up with the virtue-signaling rat race...hmmm, a Prius with financing should set you back about $8,000 a year in financing and maintenance costs. And, oh, that's right, pretty much EVERYTHING is twice the cost of what it normally is in Troglodyte country, so after groceries, energy, gas, and all the basic necessities in life, you're lucky if you have disposable income of around $10,000 in effective purchasing power.

Here's the deal. Because of all the minute and many taxes, not to mention every person is different, it's impossible to calculate to the penny just what disposable income will be, let alone what percent of the time you're literally being a slave for other people. However, we do know, at minimum with 60% of your money being taxed and 70% of government money going to other people, you are literally a slave for 42% of your working hours. You then have the secondary effect of leftist taxation and regulation at the state and local levels, and your $70,000 in after tax income, is really more like $35,000 when adjusted for purchasing power and cost of living adjustments.

When you add this up, I have a simple question for you:

Is it worth it?

I don't mean the money. I know suffering Bay area traffic, taxation, and people is DEFINITELY not worth take home pay of $35,000 a year. And lord knows you Silicon Sheeple are working 60+ hours per week. There's no way in hell THAT comes anywhere near equitable.

I'm talking about voting left all the time and by your own hand turning yourselves into slaves. Because I don't get it. You're some of the few students of today who actually majored in something worthwhile, yet you lack such self-respect you'll endure traffic, poor standards of living, a hellish work week, AND a 42% enslavement rate. Was the leftist indoctrination in school so thorough? Do you really feel guilty earning a (somewhat) decent salary after busting your ass off for 4 years in STEM or IT? Do you think you have an obligation to bail people out of their mistakes? And PLEASE don't tell me you suffer and endure things like "diversity training" or "sexual harassment training" at work. Because that would make it all that much richer.

Regardless, for those of us outside of the echo chamber, it sure is fun watching you lefties vote for your own enslavement and demise. Oh, and before you think your Silicon Valley overlords are just as magnanimous, charitable, and virtuous as you, think again. The only ones getting duped are you Silicon Slaves.

Writing Other People's Papers for a Living

September 13, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Once again Alex is hiring in anticipation for the start of the school year. If you're looking for a location independent job that will put food on the table, please visit him and read below:

I'd like to personally thank Aaron and all of you who follow his blog Captain Capitalism, you guys have been the main driving force behind the recent growth of our enterprise.

We are more than thrilled with the quality of personnel we've received for our positions in writing and advertisement. Regrettably, things have been a little slow lately as most students prefer to take some time off before the busy Fall semester starts.

However, we're definitely getting much busier and this may well be our most lucrative semester yet.
Quite a few people have inquired about job opportunities with us and we weren't able to receive help from all of you. Yet, we could definitely use all of the support we can get.
Within a month, we will be entering the busiest juncture of the academic year and it will last all the way through the end of 2016.
Our full-time writers earn over $3,000 per month and part-time work opportunities are always available. Above all, we value quality and it doesn't matter how much work you're willing to do. As long as you meet deadline and complete your assignments accurately, you will always have work with us. Dozens of our loyal writers can always attest to this.

We're also looking to expand our ranks of Craigslist subcontractors. Many of you have been posting for us regularly and invariably, this helped us get to where we are today.
We pay $5 for each lead our subcontractors generate and another $1 for each day your ads have been live.
Contact us for further information and we look forward to working with you!

Aleksey Bashtavenko

Academic Composition

Owner & Principal Writer (540) 300-1253
academiccomposition@gmail.com
www.academiccomposition.com
www.linkedin.com/pub/aleksey-bashtavenko/25/7b8/323/

Episode #165 of The Clarey Podcast!

September 13, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Man wasn't meant to stay in one place.
How is Sully a movie???
Black people talking in theater.
Renting rims means you've got bigger problems.
Fat acceptance is bankrupting Weight Watchers.
Hillary's Clinton - hope the bitch dies.
Why does body-positive Target offer diet pills?
Apple fucks you over again.

AND MORE!

In THIS EPISODE of The Clarey Podcast!

Reconnaissance Man Now Available in Audio!

September 14, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Reconnaissance Man is available in audio. You can listen to a sample chapter which I'm supremely confident will COMPEL you to buy it!

You can find all my audio books here!

Sailing in Puget Sound

September 15, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Remember to Enjoy the Decline otherwise life is not worth it.

Lazy Day Linkage

September 16, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Ever hear of Avery Williamson? No? Because the MSM doesn't want you to.

How much to cosmotology majors make? not enough that they need government checks financed by the chemical engineering majors.

Women like the bad boys.

Abdicating responsibility. Now we'll blame Tesla's for our bad driving.

The Largest Argument Against Women's Suffrage

September 16, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

My official policy on voting rights is that you must own property and receive no government check either as an employee or a parasite on the taxpayer. Beyond that, I don't care who votes as you've both earned the right and you are financially vested in the country. However, there are times....

ooooohhhh are there times....

I really question the wisdom of given women the right to vote.

And it really does boil down to this simple argument - what kind of people read this kind of tripe?

I am 100% serious. The fact that this is the lead on "Yahoo News" and that this utter worthless, pointless garbage is consumed by women AND IN SUCH VOLUMES THAT IT WARRANTS FRONT PAGE WORTH, really makes me wonder if women have the logical and mental facilities to be good stewards of the vote. Of course, by historical voting patterns, women vote for less freedom and an increased state 70% of the time, once again undoing what 4,000 years of western civilization and millions of men's lives fought for. But hey, as long as they get to waste their precious life reading about what some British slut wears when she goes to school (while she's independently wealthy), fuck western civilization, fuck the Magna Carta, fuck the constitution, and fuck the American Experiment.

Hillary has a vag, and it's about time we get a woman president!

Enjoy that freaking decline.

How a Good Wife or Girlfriend Can Help You Go MGTOW

September 16, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Unlike feminism, the red pill community/manosphere advances. We don't dwell in whatever injustices we face. We don't navel gaze, obsessing about ourselves in the mirror. And we sure as hell don't come up with 31 flavors of gender or faux academic concepts like "intersectionality." The true natural state of all real men is advancement, and unlike our feminist counterparts we seek to progress and improve to the maximum extent that our lives, resources, and gile allow.

Part of this relentless march towards advancement is knowing when to close a chapter in our lives, for the wisdom we gained living it opens up a new one. Be it the 17 year old who gets over his first true heartbreak, a 22 year old who dodges a false rape accusation, or a 45 year old who's fresh off his first divorce, it is just as important to move on from these experiences as it is to retain the wisdom they taught us. But one of those chapters most men must invariably close and move on from is one we don't mind reading. One that is actually a happy chapter (or so it seems at the time). One we could very well dwell in for the rest of our lives. And that chapter is your Playerhood Days.

This is not a lecture or a sermoning. This is not a recommendation that you should quit goofing around, having fun, getting laid, and being a player. And it certainly is not a call for you to "man up and marry those sluts." It is merely a prediction your older brother Cappy knows is going to happen to most of you.

For fun as it is, jovial as it is, and exhilarating as it is, you WILL tire of the game. You WILL tire of the chase. You WILL get sick of going to bars. And you will tire of spending ne'er-to-be-recovered hours on social media trying to land a date. The novelty of slaying another piece of ass will wear thin and you will look at all the time you wasted chasing/tolerating/enduring/suffering painfully stupid and unimpressive girls just to get laid, and then ask yourself what greatness you could have achieved otherwise. You will suffer from "player burnout" and thus this chapter of your life will come to an end.

MGTOW or Marriage...or Both?

This results in classical binary choice you must face. Do you go "MGTOW," putting women at the bottom of the priority list, perhaps swearing off of them forever? Or do you settle down, get married, and raise a family, or perhaps just get a steady, long term girlfriend? The two seem mutually exclusive and diametrically opposed, but I contend there is a third option---that they are not only NOT mutually exclusive, but having a quality woman in your life CAN indeed help you truly go MGTOW. Ergo, why not do both?

Understand man's need for sex and female company is not optional. Certainly, harsh enough experiences and hostile enough environs are so punishing that truly going MGTOW can override these hard-wired preferences, making a boycott of women a better option. But it still doesn't erase the genetic programming and hard-wiring you have to want sex and a woman in your life. And to refuse to acknowledge these basal desires is as foolish as feminists saying women need men as much as fish need bicycles. But, in an ironic twist of fate, actually going MGTOW can help you secure a wife/girlfriend that is "MGTOW compatible." You simply set forth to live your life as you see fit and if a woman happens to come along your way AND can keep up, so be it. Therefore, in doing so, it is theoretically possible to find a woman that is loving, caring, supporting, who can not only dramatically improve your life, but really help you go MGTOW and achieve all you can in life.

For example, take all the time you spend and have spent on the pursuit of women. From puberty to today, how many hours, days, weeks and months of time, resources, and labor have you expended chasing (and then dealing with) them? Also, how much psychological pain, torment, and bullshittery did you have to endure with their antics and games? And what was the final life-time financial tab you've dropped on women? How much in total financial resources did you expend on cover charges, drinks, foregone work opportunities, etc.? Now imagine you never wasted this enormous amount of resources on girls in the past, but instead invested it in yourself? Set forth in your own life? You'd likely have a house paid off in cash. A entrepreneurial empire. Perhaps a herculean body and physique to boot. Whatever it is, you'd at least have something to show for it and this is the argument for finding a good, quality woman in your life.

In making a quality, MGTOW-compatible woman part of your life, you satiate your biological and psychological needs for sex and female companionship. You also quell whatever mental strife that comes without having one. And if she is indeed quality, she would be a net financial asset, and not a liability. This frees up your entire financial, mental, and physical resources which you can then focus and dedicate solely towards achieving greatness. You are no longer distracted by women. You no longer have that scratch to itch. And thus, though presumably mutually exclusive, having a good woman in your life could technically allow you to pursue the individual greatness that is the epitome of MGTOW. Admittedly, it statistically unlikely, but to quote Dumb and Dumber, "So you're saying there's a chance!?"

Enter the Cult of VirginTOW and MSTOW (Men Sent Their Own Way)

Of course, you can predictably hear the spergy hearts of millions of VirginTOW's going into cardiac arrest. As you read this right now, they are no doubt tripping over their key boards to bang away saying that getting married or having a (GASP!) woman in your life "is the COMPLETE ANTITHESIS of being MGTOW!!!!" And though these self-proclaimed, purist authorities of MGTOW may have a literal point, you need to understand precisely who these people are so you don't let the Cult of MSTOW ruin the larger, and very important point being made in this post.

First, we know who these people are. These are not real MGTOW's nor real men. These are intellectual weaklings who abuse and use the term MGTOW as an excuse for their piss poor performance in life and their fear of rejection, toil, failure, and effort. They are posers who have no value, and use MGTOW as a substitute for accomplishment, meaning, agency, and worth. And like many professors in academia, they don't actually go MGTOW and do MGTOW things, but spend their time studying real MGTOW's claiming they're experts in the field.

Second, they are stuck in the "Chapter of MGTOW." Every man has the red pill awakening and anger is a natural and called-for response. You've been lied to. You've been cheated. And you should be enraged. But inevitably you have to accept is for what is, and move on. Otherwise that is not progress, nor advancement, nor achievement. It's merely the self-pitying navel-gazing that feminists do as they mire and waste their entire 80 years of life-expectancy on this planet. Sadly, MSTOW's are functionally no different than feminists in this regard, rendering any opinions they have on the matter moot because why on god's Earth would you heed advice from them?

Third, their visceral and hate-filled reaction you will see in the comments section below is proof the above directly strikes at their biggest fear - that they COULD HAVE had a good, quality woman in their life while still being MGTOW...but chose not to. This reality is what really keeps them up at night. That there IS a chance, perhaps even a decent one, they could find a MGTOW-compatible woman if they put forth the effort. But the level of defeatism and fatalism they subscribe to (which I find ironic given a presumably strong and independent philosophy such as "Men Going Their Own Way") is again proof that laziness and fear are the strongest forces in their lives, trumping love, hope, and courage. Deep down inside they still want women and would prefer a life with one, otherwise, why do they constantly obsess about being MGTOW so much?

Fourth, there's already proof women and MGTOW are compatible as genuine MGTOW's are currently married or dating women. Roosh has made it no secret he wouldn't mind getting married or having children. Adam Piggott, a man who has traveled, motorcycled, and kayaked the world, is married and is more MGTOW than the MGTOWiest of MGTOW's. Yours truly has had the same girlfriend for 10 years. And need I even mention veteran Manosphere founder Rollo Tomassi? But wait, let me guess. There's some 28 year old, 280 pound virgin MSTOW Pharisee on a MGTOW discussion board somewhere who's about to tell us we're not "real MGTOW's" and that MGTOW compatible women just don't exist.

The only problem is they do.

And you my dear reader, as an individual, have to reconcile this fact with purported purist MGTOW "doctrine."

The Fork in the Road

The possibility of women being part of the MGTOW life will cause a split that will become more apparent as time goes on. In one camp will be the traditional theoreticians, academics, purist MSTOW's and VirginTOW's, still banging away in their discussion forums about how much they don't need women...just like they did 5 years ago...just like they're doing today...and just like they'll be doing 20 years from now. They will be NO DIFFERENT than the feminists who have done the same since the 1970's because the movement has consumed them and they simply can't move on. Their entire life will be defined, determined, and controlled by "MGTOW," so that in the end, while they're on their death beds, all they will be able to point to is "MGTOW" as their crowning achievement in life. Sadly, that's not only NOT an achievement, it's one they failed to achieve as they never truly went their own way and lived a unique life.

In the second camp you will have the true MGTOW's, married or not, long term girlfriend or not, who are living their lives as they see fit. If they want to get married and have kids, fine, they'll marry and have kids. If they just want to jet set across the world, fine, they'll sip martinis in Macau and bang broads in Bangkok. But where ever they are, and whatever they're doing, they're not going to be banging on their chests about being "MGTOW." They will let their actions speak to who they are. They will live a life that earns them that adjective. And if living with a woman or getting married is their desire, they'll do it because that's what real MGTOW's do. They live their lives as they see fit. Alas, when they're on their deathbeds, they won't be pointing towards a title or a fake religion as their crowning achievement, but actual achievements living a MGTOW lifestyle allowed.

I humbly ask which lifestyle do you want? Do you want to actually be a MGTOW and perhaps incorporate a loving woman into your life? So be it. Do you want to sit, stew, and waste your life in a self-pitying cult whose only definition is the exclusion of women as you award yourself fake awards, merit badges, and acronyms? Fine, it's your life. I merely want to present the case that MGTOW does not mean the exclusion of women from one's life, and that they can indeed (if you find the right one) make your life measurably better. I also want to warn any prospective MGTOW's about the MSTOWs', purists', and VirginTOW keyboard warriors' false insistence women cannot be part of a MGTOW's life. It's simply not true, and you do yourself no favors eliminating the option of having a woman in your life.

Podcast/
Asshole Consulting

YouTube
Twitter
Books
Amazon Affiliate

Curse Free Episode #6 of The Clarey Podcast

September 17, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Cappy and his good Seattle friend yell and scream at each other about "stuff." His blood pressure goes up and nothing is really accomplished. Cappy does his best not to curse, but his friend curses up a storm, in THIS EPISODE of The Clarey Podcast!

And this weekend, why not do all your online shopping through Cappy's Amazon Affiliation program? Costs you nothing extra and Cappy makes 7% off of your purchases. Make Cappy rich, make Cappy happy, BOOKMARK the Amazon Affiliate link and get into the GOOD HABIT of keeping 7% of the money within the Cappy Family!....which if you think about it would be a very dysfunctional family full of yelling, rage, anger, and alcoholism, but eh, those would be good times!

Lake Stuart Near Leavenworth, Washington

September 19, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Suffering the decline as always. Remember, work hard, go to college, go into debt, breed children you can't afford, and carry on:

New York City Deserves Diversity!

September 19, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Keep voting leftist you cool, hip, New Yorkers. Because you know so much more than those hicks in fly-over country.

Vigor and Spirit Reviews "Reconnaissance Man"

September 20, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

A kind review you can find here.

Removing Emotion from Decision Making

September 20, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

This was a response to a client that, after writing, I realized might serve as a good lesson for some of the younger folk out there who've been fed lies and bullshit their entire lives before they enter the real world:

OK, there's how I personally separate emotions from my decisions, and then there's how I'd recommend doing it. Explaining my journey towards "emotionless decision making" this is the route:

One, it wasn't a choice. If you are brought up under reasonable wealth, or at least have parents (or the government) willing to finance/lend you money, you can live in lala land where your emotions can temporarily rule your decisions for quite some time. Shit, you see this with middle aged women who live until they lose their looks thinking they're the greatest thing ever because of "themselves" and not because they're young and guys want to bang them. So in my particular case my poverty made the real world REALLY apparent to me early on. I coudlnt' afford bars or night clubs or time pursuing stupid shit (girls, liberal arts degrees, etc) because such a waste of resources would result in a week without food, no gas, etc. It was hard and crushing (and I remember it to this day), but there was a night where I realized what I was facing in the real world, and it was depressing.

Still, living in the harsh real world, is better than living in la la land, especially the long run. My one night or anger and rage is infinintely better than 30 years of post-menopausal delusion cat ladies go through before they die still thinking "big is beautiful."

Two, this then led to having my dreams crushed and accepting what the real world was. So once this happens, emotions are removed from any decision making. You replace your unattainable dreams with real world goals. And you don't think "wouldn't it be nice or fun to attain these goals," but you look at the world in a cold, scientific, and calculating manner and figure out how to attain those goals in the most efficient and expeditious manner because your life and survival depends on it.

Three, this inevitably leads towards you becoming an adult real quick and quickly develops a hatred for the poppy cock, Oprah's pretty lies bullshit. THis also leads towards a complete disdain, if not outright hatred of the sheeple and morons around you. I truly don't know who I hate more. People who are purposely evil, or the sheep who swallow every line of bullshit from politicians, talking heads, media, Hollywood, professors, parents, etc., and then have the gall to think themselves more noble and moral than you. Regardless, only further reinforces removing emotion from decision making, perhaps replacing hatred and vengeance in where there once was hope. But it also turns you into a machiavellian where you're often tempted to just become a charlatan yourself and legally extort as much as you can from your fellow man (for example Asshole Consulting is an INCREDIBLY RARE blessing where being truthful actually helps people morally. If this were to ever go away nearly all my plans are to lie to the dupes and rubes of society and make as much bank on telling them pretty lies).

Finally, it inevitably just becomes a simple, conscious choice. Even a principle you live by. "Am I going to live in the real world or let my feelings and emotions get in the way?" Seriously, any intellectually honest man or woman can ask themselves this simple question and answer it correctly, and that's how I'd recommend most people remove emotions from decision making. You simply ask yourself:

Does making decisions in the real world or emotional delusion result in better long term results?

However, while it's intellectually easy to answer this question, it's getting rid of the emotional pain that comes with doing what is sane, empirical, and right that's the trick. Fortunately, over time, the real world will punish you, making it more painful to make emotional decisions than logical rational ones. Men typically get to face the full costs and consequences of their decisions earlier in life because society won't shield them from the cost of their mistakes. So we learn quickly. But as Bill Burr famously said, "Women keep patting themselves on their back, thinking they're great when nobody corrects them because we want to fuck 'em." And this permits women to temporarily live in lala land, making emotional decisions more frequently and longer into life. But, still, sooner or later, the real world will punish you for making decisions based on emotion and not reality, and that pain will inevitably remove all emotion from your decision making...whether you like it or not 😉

Anyway, hope that helped.

Aaron

IQ, Prison…Errr…"School" and Idiot Bosses with Laurie Zoock

September 20, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Had my second interview with Laurie Zoock about the problems of having a high IQ. We delve into the world of employment, idiot bosses, prison…errr. "school" and "teeeeeacccheeerrsssss" who are the dumbest of all adults children will run into in their lives.

Million Dollar Extreme Presents: World Peace

September 20, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

The first Red Pill show to make it to the airwaves.

Uh oh, the free market wants to hear what the MSM isn't giving them! Look out!

Didn't Think This Whole Electric Car Thing Through Did We?

September 21, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

A sponsored post, but nonetheless, another head shaking example of environmentalism running aground reality.

Why Silicon Valley Votes Left - Sex

September 21, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

In my previous post, I asked Silicon Slaves why they work in an environment and state that results in them being slaves 42% of their working lives. Thankfully, a fair amount of insiders and former Siliconers responded, explaining to us normies in fly over country why so many Silicon employees willingly vote against their own best interests. The reasons were many and varied, ranging anything from the "excitement" to work in "the" Silicon Valley, propaganda in school that channeled their careers to the Slave Jose area, or outright simple mistakes of failing to account for cost of living adjustments. But while all these reasons were legitimate and I don't doubt a single one, there is one that explains at least why men slave away to...well...slave away at Silicon Valley.

Sex.

Let us be very clear why civilization exists. It exists because men wanted sex. And the way men traditionally got sex was by being good providers to women. This meant a combination of not only providing adequate resources to support a woman and her children, but the ability to defend them and keep them safe. In ancient times this meant being the strongest warrior, or perhaps and biggest barbarian, but as time went on and technologies advanced, accumulating resources wasn't a direct function of your brute strength or power. It was also determined by intelligence, creativity, and innovation. And thus men set out to build...well...basically everything, in the hope of making it rich and attracting mates. And this ages-long genetic ritual is simply playing itself out in Silicon Valley.

There's just a couple problems.

One, while amassing resources and making it rich does certainly help with the ladies, the problem is that women (as well as men) are still genetically programmed to be attracted to what worked the past 2 million years of evolution, NOT the past 200. Yes, nerds, geeks, and capitalists can create the Standard Oils, Microsofts, and Facebooks of the world, but that does not turn on women as much as a tall, strong, aloof jock does. We see empirical evidence of this practically everywhere, but my favorite was the ballroom dance scene where nerds galore would master the art of salsa, tango, swing, and waltz, TEMPORARILY score a hot chick, maybe even marry her, only to have her abscond with the noob 6'2", ripped, good looking dudebro who showed up for one or two classes, and then leave. And this is the exact same problem the male nerds of Silicon Valley face.

Yes, they may be making all the bank.
Yes, they may make those magical six figures.
But in the end, usually it's only the money the women are after, and even then, they're very unlikely to stay with your scrawny nerdy ass till death do you part...especially if they can take you for half.

Two, ironically the leftist policies left-leaning Silicon males vote for obsolete women's need for them. In making sure socialist policies cover women (and men) from womb to tomb, a woman and her children (no matter from how many fathers) simply don't NEED a man. This (if you remember your college economics class) results in a price floor set above the market rate. Men in lefty Cali need to provide more than the STATE AND FEDERAL governments combined do to women. This means only particularly rich or well-to-do men can out compete the state, leaving the majority of Silicon male slaves picking up the EBT tab for the woman who shot him down and is dating his boss' boss.

Three is also a vital lesson in economics male Silicon Slaves may have overlooked - a lopsided sex ratio. While obsessed with landing a job in "the Silicon Valley," I wonder how many men thought it would be any different than their Calc III class with 45 men and 2 Asian girls? Of course, it isn't that bad, but it isn't great either with a sex ratio of 115:100 men to women. And if you thought a generous welfare state, affirmative action, and competition from billionaires wasn't bad enough, just wait to see how picky a Silicon female can be when there's a 15% deficit of them.

And then finally, there's the reason why rich, successful, hard working males of Silicon Valley vote against their interests and will be lining up to pull the lever for Hillary Clinton - they think agreeing with women increases their chances of getting laid.

Understand, that for the most part, young women have replaced traditional religions and values such as Christianity, family, children, husband, home, god and country, etc., with leftist politics. I bet you'll be hard pressed to find a woman under 30, who in addition to her all-important career, does NOT derive the majority of her agency, purpose, morality, and reason in life through some kind of left-leaning political crusade or cause.

Going green.
Feminism.
Leaning-in.
Closing the wage gap.
Organic food.
Dog/animal rescue.
A woman in the white house.
Ending sexual harassment.
Helping the poor.
Supporting the refugees.
Etc. etc.

And in addition to this laundry list of political causes, it's very unlikely they won't shut up about them. They will at minimum have a bumper sticker extolling their beliefs, but more likely will lecture and sermon you to death about whatever leftist religion they have. It will be made PAINFULLY clear that politics is the number one thing in their lives - more important than love, a family, or even their career - and if you EVER hope to date her, let alone cop a feel (over the bra though mind you), you better be on board the feminism-kambucha-socialism-wage-gap substitute-for-real-meaning-in-this-world choo choo train.

The only problem is the majority of these Silicon Valley men believe it. They actually think agreeing with a woman turns them on.

Now, look, any real man over 25 knows agreeing with women never gets you laid.
And any man married knows you never listen to what a woman says, you watch what she does.

But these aren't your normal men. They're nerds. They're geeks. And love them to death, they don't know jack about women. They've spent the past 10 years since they were 13 SOLELY working towards the goal of becoming a great engineer or programmer in the vain hopes of "finally" making it big and attracting hot women with their money. They didn't want to hit the gym, they were afraid of physical toil and pain, and based on lies told to them by their mothers, teachers, professors, politicians, and Hollywood, they actually thought being:

Supplicant Obedient Kind Caring
Sensitive 90's men who agree with women would lead to sex.

It is this upbrining and their complete lack of knowledge of women I believe explains why men in Silicon Valley ignorantly vote for their own demise. They are not only drawn to Silicon Valley because of the "excitement" of being there, or because that's all they were told in school, but because they actually think agreeing with women is what turns them on. And since leftist politics has replaced anything of meaning or value in life for most women under 40, all men MUST agree with their new faux-religions lest they not wish to cop a coveted feel under the bra. Little do they know a high school drop-out, Trump-supporting, motorcycle mechanic could likely come through Santa Clara county and get laid more than the lot of them. But, why try dispensing an ounce of reality into the slave plantation of the left coast?

Enjoy the decline my fine male Silicon Slaves. Enjoy the decline.

For Our Guitar Playing Agents in the Field

September 21, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Greetings All,

We have a new sponsor, Johnny Montoya Guitars, where he offers classes online for those of you who are either beginners or novices looking to improve your game. Not that we will all become The Great Matt Baldoni, but if you're looking to improve and seem to be stuck at your current level, please consider taking a class from Johnny by visiting his site.

Many thanks,

Cappy

Episode #165 of The Clarey Podcast!

September 21, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

The joys of having no schedule.
How politics ruin history majors and history podcasts.
Flying first class is overrated…for short people.
"Tony Prophet- Chief Equality Officer."
Cappy doesn't camp.

and MORE!

In THIS EPISODE of The Clarey Podcast!

Sponsored by Cappy's Amazon Affliate Program. "Here's my product. Go buy my shit. Give me your fucking money."

Cappy's on Instagram

September 22, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Like pretty much every social media platform, I adamantly refused to join Instagram until somebody younger and wiser than me said, "Oh yeah, dude, you have to go online for that because of XY and Z reasons." So apparently on the Instagram if you take a lot of photos people like that. And since I travel a lot and take a lot of photos I uploaded some of my best ones on my new Instagram account. You can find it here.

Lazy Thursday Linkage

September 22, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Former HuffPo writer on how she was sick of the anti-white elitism.

Correct, what could possibly go wrong?

Brad Pitt finds out his politics won't save him when targeted for divorce by the titless wonder.

The Clintons are corrupt. Don't know if you knew that. But it doesn't matter. She has a vag and the vag will save the US.

College accreditor shut down by the Feds! The second thing Obama did right!

And a very humbling development Lieutenants and Economists! A musician by the name of Jesus Guerra dedicated a song to "Enjoy the Decline" on his latest album. Please help out a fellow aspiring entrepreneur and consider purchasing his album!

Everything You Needed to Know About Central Banking, Currency, Inflation, Debt, Prices, GDP, Production and Globalization in 20 Minutes

September 23, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

You may reward me for my economic awesomeness by buying one of my books.

Why We Should Let Women Have Corporate America

September 23, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Women's Take Over of Corporate America

An Agent in the Field of mine, deeply seeded in a large multinational, sent me an e-mail he received from company's Office of Diversity. It was heralding the "great success" of their "initiative" to employ and promote more women in the company. They had an arbitrarily set goal of increasing female employment (in this predominantly IT/Tech male company) up to 30%, and even handed out awards to employees that came up with the "top three ideas" on how to get more women on board (this included a "mother's contract," a blatantly sexist policy of hiring one woman for every man regardless of ability, and - the only sane one - to attract more women into STEM). You couple this with the recent statement from SalesForce.com's new "Chief Equality Officer" Tony Prophet,

"At Ford, quality is job one. At Salesforce, equality is job one." and it is painfully clear that corporate America has abandoned excellence as a means to profitability, replacing it instead with virtue signalling, rent seeking, politicking, and marketing/pandering to racial/sexual in-tribe biases.

This, of course, is not only morally wrong, but blatantly sexist (and racist) as you consciously and purposely give preferential treatment to people based on the color of their skin, or their plumbing downstairs, over the content of their character. And anybody with an ounce of self-respect, intellectual honesty, a work ethic, and an adherence to true fairness should be outraged at this cowardice and evil.

But then the ole Captain's wheels started turning, and in a very Enjoy the Decline-esque way, he make a very important epiphany. Yes, it may be unfair we are giving preferential treatment to women over men. Yes, we are sacrificing a meritocracy for sexism. And yes, this will lead to lower production, lower economic growth, genuine injustice, and a lessening of standards of living. But so what? If you really sit down and think about it Corporate America isn't worth it.

Let the women have it.

It's All Yours, Sweetheart!

If it were the 1950's and corporations were booming and headed up by more fair and meritocratic WWII managerial class, I could see Corporate America being a place you'd want to be. You'd be compensated for excellence and hard work. You'd be promoted for innovation and creativity. It would be a reasonably just system where loyalty was rewarded, stable employment was offered, and corporate corruption was at a minimum (at least compared to today).

But it's not the 1950's any more. It's "the current year" and corporations are a fraction of the equitable places of employment they once were.

Gone are the managers from the WWII generation that led these corporations to their heights and their Jack Welshian logical, but fair management. They are now replaced with legions of inept, MBA-laden Baby Boomer scum whose only accomplishment was halving US economic growth, getting the largest bank bail out in history, and sending the US into the largest financial crisis since the Great Depression.

Gone is stable employment and the goodies that came with it. You don't get pensions, you don't get health care, and you certainly don't get that 30 years of lifelong employment that once made a 30 year mortgage a relatively risk free proposition. Now you can get outsourced, train in your own replacements, be perpetually employed as a contractor, and let go if your job can be done for a fraction of a cent cheaper in China.

And let's not forget the wave of psychotic political BS these past 20 years that has infected Corporate America and just chides the morality and honor of good, honest workers, particularly of the male persuasion. There's the HR lady epidemic where we put power hungry, inept, math-impaired 20 something ditzes at the helm of our hiring process. There's "Corporate Social Responsibility" where we force unrelated and unnecessary political crusades on our employees be it donating to the United Way, mandating weekends be spent on charities, or wearing pink every year. There's diversity, sexual harassment, and sensitivity training where we blatantly treat men like sexual predators, molesters, rapists, and racists, humiliating them to attend said trainings. There's the eggshell environment men get to work in, one mere false sexual harassment accusation away from being fired. There's the invasion of privacy into our personal lives where the politically correct Corporate Abwehr will fire you over a facebook post. There's progressive credentialism where the HR Reichstag demands you have masters degrees for entry level jobs. There's the blatant sexism against males as previously evidenced before with clearly sexist policies favoring less-qualified women for the sake of "diversity." And let's not forget this raw deal is topped off with the number one cause of divorce, marital strife, and problem children - commutes!

I ask one simple question. Who the f*ck wants any part of this rotten deal? Who the f*ck wants to work at Initech?

And I'm not joking.

I'm not saying this because deep down inside I want to work at Corporate America. I'm not saying this because I have this discreet dream to retake and recapture Corporate America for meritocratic males. I'm saying it because it's true. Corporate America is a HORRIBLE deal for any self-respecting man (or woman) who wants to live a free, healthy, happy, sane, and prosperous life. You, at minimum, must attend school for a quarter century, face daunting odds of just landing a job. That job will at best be entry level and mundane. You're then forced to get a masters if you have any hope of "making it" due to progressive credentialism. You are a mere merger away from being let go or laid off. Your compensation is significantly lower with both sexes now flooding the labor market, lowering the wage you can command. You can't have a political or social life your employer doesn't approve of. Compensation and promotion is increasingly based on your skin color and plumbing, not your hard work or effort. And if this wasn't a horrible deal enough, it's all under a psychotic environment where bosses who know they have you by the balls unleash their sadism on their employees simply to get off.

There's just no godly reason to be part of Corporate America.

The real question is, then, why do women seem so desperate and adamant on joining Corporate America? Why do they seem so obsessed over having a corporate career to the point they'll get one via legitimate means or not? And the answer is they've been sold a bill of goods.

The Biggest Lie Ever Sold...To Women

I've mentioned it before, but understand like housing, education or Dotcoms, women are buying into a bubble. Perhaps not a financial one like those mentioned before, but a bubble nonetheless. They go to college (a bubble and increasingly poor investment unto itself) at rates higher than men, earning the majority of worthless liberal arts degrees, also now accounting for the majority of worthless masters/advanced degrees. With these worthless degrees, they then throw themselves onto the Omaha Beach of Corporate America where they forfeit family, children, husbands, a social life, and loved ones, all in exchange for promotions, careers, commutes, and Jimmy Choo shoes. They obsess about "leaning in" and getting the latest certification, credential, or promotion in their lives. And congratulations if they make that magical six figures.

But to what end?

Not only do they have to suffer the unacceptable environment laid out before, basically ruining and sacrificing their lives, but all so they can become "Queen Bee of Shit Island?"

Alas, it's obvious women didn't consciously decide on their own to pursue the hell known as Corporate America. They were duped, lied to, propagandized, and fooled into becoming corporate slaves. And any simple, logical pondering will come up with the main culprits that misled women into choosing such a rotten deal.

First, blame men. Not consciously, or maliciously, but men are to blame because I don't think they ever truly conveyed what they endured in Corporate America, working a real job to support the family. In the past, traditionally, men went to work, brought home the bacon, and in order to have a peaceful and enjoyable home, they didn't bring back their work with them. The wife didn't want to hear about the conditions of working on the railroad, the loneliness of being a traveling salesman, or the politics of a corporate office, and the man frankly didn't want to talk about it either. He wanted to eat good meal, have sex with his wife, play with his children, and enjoy his free time. This then misled women into thinking somehow work was fun. And not only was work fun, it was MUCH MORE FUN AND REWARDING than being a homekeeper, housewife, or mother. They only saw the financial upside of Corporate America, not the labor and responsibility that came with.

Second, feminism. The greatest scam ever pulled in the history of humans was not social security, nor buying Manhattan from the Indians for some beads, nor Seward's Folly. It was the con job bitter, angry, ugly, jealous, contemptuous women from the 60's and 70's pulled by convincing their prettier, younger counterparts that being a mother or a wife was not real work. It was fooling three full generations of women that they didn't need men, and that a paycheck (government or Corporate America issued) could replace a passionate kiss from a loving husband and a swarm of hugs from her children. The fact that women are trying to break into Corporate America, by any means possible, moral or not, sexist or not, while forfeiting a life of staying at home and spending time with their children is jaw dropping once you can remove the hood of leftist, feminist brainwashing. No sane, self-respecting person would do that back in the 50's, let alone in today's sadistic and enslaving corporate environment.

Third, politicians. Like feminists, it is amazing the con job the democrat party pulled on women. By making women jealous of what men had, and not appreciating what they had, politicians created a problem that didn't exist. They thoroughly convinced women they were oppressed, discriminated against, and that sexism was rampant. And the only way to make things right was by voting in these politicians. Politicians would enforce affirmative action, enforce Title IX, give you a never ending litany of PSA's and speeches blasting those evil males for their inherent sexism and privilege, and as an added bonus, designate the government as your sole supporter and provider making those nasty evil men unnecessary and obsolete. This propaganda was so successful, it actually overrode women's genetic programming to the point they actually believed "women need men like a fish needs a bicycle." And if you needed more proof as to the completeness of the job, women look up to and envy the life of one of the world's most miserable women - Hillary Clinton. Women, once again, gave up anything and everything that gave them point and purpose in life, all for a masters degree, a commute, and a cold career in Corporate America.

And finally, there's Corporate America itself. The best thing for Corporate America was women entering the work force. It lowered wages, it boosted demand for their products (now that women had additional purchasing power), and it created demand for a whole new list of products and services. Daycare facilities, additional cars, more gas, more insurance, more dining out, more clothes, more cell phones, more divorce lawyers, more child therapists, more cleaning services, more ritalin, more lithium, more everything - the amount of material goods and services families had to buy now that you had two workers, no parents, and needed to outsource your child rearing easily boosted their sales by 50%. It was a boon in terms of both sales and lower labor costs that only outsourcing to China would outdo. Of course, the family suffered, divorce ravaged three generations, mal-raised children of broken homes drove up everybody's taxes, women we're becoming less happy, and the country's finances went to pot, but it didn't matter. Women had careers in Corporate America. And that's all that matters.

So What Do Men Do Now?

It's a foregone conclusion that with the support of government and corporations themselves, women will inexorably take over Corporate America. And any sober, realistic, self-respecting assessment of Corporate America will conclude we should let them have it. But if men are to give up Corporate America what are they supposed to do for work? What do we do for employment? What do we do for agency? What do we do in order to support ourselves and live our lives to the fullest?

The prospective loss of what has traditionally kept us employed and alive is daunting, and willingly giving it up may seem insane. But giving up on a career in Corporate America is a reality we're just going to have to face. And not only one we have to face, but one we should be welcoming. For while abandoning what has served as our primary means of support may be daunting, we men have a trick up our sleeves that have served us well since time immemorial.

We adapt.

Understand Corporate America is a bubble. It's the Titanic. It's going to burst and sink anyway, so you're better off living in reality and coming up with a Plan B. But while many of you may not see an obvious alternative to Corporate America for employment, millions of men have already blazed the trail to a new, and much better form of employment - minimalism and entrepreneurship.

Though not the traditional corporate career we originally wanted or were brought up to desire, minimalism and entrepreneurship is the only logical choice for any man not already:

1. Steeped so far in Corporate America in terms of his career that it would not be economic for him to abandon it and start down the path of entrepreneurship, or

2. Endebted in terms of student loans, auto loans, mortgages, alimony, child support, etc. that he is a debt slave and therefore needs to be in Corporate America.

The reason why is that minimalism and entrepreneurship is infinitely superior to working for Corporate America. One, in being a minimalist you do not need that much money to survive. You avoid debt, you avoid unnecessary luxuries, and in doing so you not only minimize what you need, but maximize your freedom. This leads to a second important benefit - the ability to insist on employment standards. If the pay isn't high enough, they won't let you telecommute, it isn't enjoyable work, or your client is just a lippy pain in the ass, simple. You fire them. You just quit. You don't need the money and therefore can do without them. This also leads to a third major benefit - you can bluff your way to higher compensation. Unlike your divorced, debt-enslaved, Corporate American wage slave counterpart, you don't "need" the money. You have a choice. You aren't a beggar, you're a chooser. This allows you to demand $100 an hour, because if you don't get it, so what? You don't NEED it. Alas, if done right self-employment can, in the long run, become much more lucrative than a Sheryl Sandbergian corporate slave career.

But perhaps the single largest benefit of the minimalism-entrepreneurship form of employment is the happiness and sanity that comes with it. While you're sleeping in till 10, your Super-Power-Tripping-Corporate-America-Power-Woman is waking up at 6 to suffer her commute at 7. While you're at your local bar getting your morning coffee with Bailey's at 11 to answer e-mails, your rah-rah empowered feminist counterpart is stuck in a meeting, begging the government for more grant money. When you decide you've done enough work at 2PM and it's time to hit the gym, your "You-Go-Girrrrrrl Power-Moxie"(TM) Corporate America counterpart is only half way done with her day. And when your kids come home from school at 4PM, you can take them out for ice cream, go swimming with them, or give them noogies, the strong-independent, divorced, Corporate American "single mom hero" leaves her kids to decay in daycare till 7, and that's if traffic has cleared up.

It's simply a no-brainer.

The sad tragedy, for women at least, is that men are one, small epiphany away from realizing the wise words of Freddy Benson in Dirty Rotten Scoundrels, and switching our historical roles. It was already hard supporting oneself in this world. It's much, MUCH harder supporting a family. But if socialist, sexist (and racist) political forces are going to insist on turning Corporate America into a childish insane asylum like today's Academia with "safe spaces," "mandatory diversity training," and a blatant favoritism for women, forget it. "I say it's time for a change. I say let them give us money. Let's live off of them for a while." And men can do it, not just because we're more capable of minimalism, but (hilariously and ironically) women have also voted in a huge welfare state. And if they want to be the ones to slave and work away in Corporate America, then they can pay the taxes to support men who just, meh, don't fee like working.

Alas, women fought so hard (as well as unfair and dirty) to get ahead in Corporate America, I cannot think of a better fate than to let them have it. And the only way to give it to them is to realize losing Corporate America is no great loss, but a blessing. Let women do the work. Let women drive the commutes. Let women waste their lives in meetings and cubes while the world passes them by. I'm going fishing. I'm sleeping in. I'm working out. I'm riding motorcycles. I'm spending time with friends, families, and loved ones. I'm going to Enjoy the Decline. I suggest you do the same.

You can visit my other hate-filled, but 100% truthful sites below!
Podcast
Asshole Consulting
YouTube
Twitter
Books
Amazon Affiliate

Bachelors in "Applied Shakespeare" at University Colorado Boulder

September 25, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

You are a fucking idiot and deserve to have Big Education steal your money if you think this is a legitimate and viable program.

Will the Anti-Free Speech Nazi's Get Dr. Glenn Reynolds?

September 25, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Remember, universities are places of open-mindedness and thought.

Curse Free Episode #7 - Worthless Professors and Their Background Special!

September 26, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Is it even possible to pass on wisdom?
Motorcycle riding out east.
The "professional" background of a liberal arts professor.
The barn with the face in 1978.

AND MORE!!!

IN THIS EPISODE of The Clarey Podcast!

Black Baby Boomers Hurting Black Youth

September 27, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

I've said it before and I'll say it again, you want to talk about

REAL Uncle Toms?
REAL Oreos?
REAL Traitors to the race?

How about the scumbag charlatans charging young black youth an arm and a leg for tuition for a completely WORTHLESS degree such as African American Studies?

Shoot, show me a group of white people that get young black kids to

1. borrow $100,000
2. Give it to them in return for
3. Nothing, while
4. Crippling those kids' futures for the rest of their lives.

It's good to see hyphenated-American studies are being shut down due to low enrollment. It should also be noted they should be shut down because they're bad for the minorities that "earn" those degrees.

A Lesson About Race for the Video Game Industry: Mafia 3 & Originality

September 27, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

The number of instances where a white comic book hero was turned black, a Mary Jane turned Latino, or a male movie hero turned female is too high to count. It is merely the empirical reality of a wider trend among Hollywood, Disney/Marvel, and (in a more general sense) corporate America to appeal to a wider audience and virtue signal to an increasingly brainwashed leftist society. To any intellectually honest person it's both testament to the fact these people have ran out of creativity, and the true racism they hold against minorities in that they think minorities don't deserve their own original superheroes.

Which is why I was flabbergasted when I saw the trailer for Mafia 3.

Mafia 3 is PRECISELY what America needs, what minorities deserve, and what video game players expect.

Originality.

Though the third in a series of three, Mafia 3 focuses on a black hero who must build his own gang to stave off the Italian mob. It takes place in the late 60's when Motown and black culture was very prominent (if not defining) in America, it allows all video game players a chance to escape into a different world they may be too young to remember (or even be around for), and it delivers a true, ORIGINAL black hero that all races can cheer for.

So I just have to ask:

WTF gives Hollywood and Silicon Valley? Did you finally get your heads out of your asses and deliver a game that wasn't sermoning, lecturing, or driving some ulterior political motive? Did you actually start to think maybe, just maybe blacks deserved their own heroes? Did one of you actually take the time to sit down and think of a new idea that hadn't been done before? Or was it just 2K and the rest of you are still the bandwagoning race pimps who are still fresh out of ideas?

Because let me explain to you how this is going to go down. If more and more movies, games, comic books, and other media are launched with original minority and female heroes (and villains) blacks, hispanics, Asians, women, not to mention whites are going to start demanding (GASP!!!!) MORE ORIGINAL HEROES! And that's particularly threatening to you because that will require what you're just plain out of:

Originality.

What's worse for you is that in due time minorities and women will realize PRECISELY what you're doing: merely co-opting Whitey-Mc-Male-Male characters and putting black face on them (or vag). Which is not only insulting, but nothing more than passing on "hand-me-down" clothes to your less-liked children.

I know talentless hacks and posers like you have no creativity, ability, innovation, or originality within you. But you better get some, otherwise you will be outed for the condescending racists you truly are.

Why the Middle Class is Disappearing

September 28, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

AKA "The Labor Productivity Pay Gap:"

This concludes your Cappy Cap economic lesson of the day.

How Women Can Monetize Their Beauty

September 29, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

You can find other economic genius here.

What the Hell Is Up With Deutsche Bank?

September 30, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Nothing much that we haven't seen before.

Your Majesty

October 1, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

If I'm ever asked this, I'm so doing this.

Your Weekend Humor

October 1, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Driving through Tennessee and North Carolina. Specifically aiming to drive The Dragon's Tail. In the meantime some weekend humor for those of you who have seen Interstellar:

Saturday Night Geek Out with the Bechtloff

October 2, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

He's streaming live now, but if you are listening to this post broadcast his rant against the Beatles is epic.

Cappy's Kentucky Knoxville Adventure

October 3, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Greetings Lieutenants!

Just a couple of pictures from my ride from Cincinnati to Knoxville, TN.

This is the FIRST and ORIGINAL Kentucky Fried Chicken.

There's kind of a mural to the Colonel.

TENNESSEE

That is downtown Knoxville.

And if you're lucky you'll get to have dinner with Dr. Helen and Dr. Glenn of PJMedia and Men on Strike fame.

Episode #169 of The Clarey Podcast

October 3, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Clarey hates the Susan G. Komen Foundation almost as much as he hates breast cancer.
Kentucky may beat Wyoming for dumbest state.
Somalis get free rent in Minneapolis so they can travel home.
Health insurance premiums going up in Minnesota.
Cappy visits the first KFC.

AND MORE

In THIS EPISODE of The Clarey Podcast!

Why Donald Trump is Doomed to Fail

October 4, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

I had just finished a nerd-econo-blogger-podcaster conference in Cincinnati. It was a great time full of booze, poker, philosophy, economics, and all the stuff that makes for the rare addictive fix intelligent people crave. And while there was general consensus among this meeting of the minds, there was one issue where I was the odd man out.

Hope.

Hope for what?

Hope for the future of America, specifically through Donald Trump.

The reason I was in the single-person minority was because my colleagues genuinely believed that not only is there a chance America can be saved from a Soviet-esque 75 year nightmare, but Donald Trump is going to win the election. They would talk about "what needs to be done" or would start off sentences with "we need to do XXX" as if this Titanic was salvageable. Some even made the (rightful) argument that America, freedom, and liberty were the most noble of causes worth fighting for no matter what the odds.

I was certainly on their side and took no issue as to what "should be" in this world, but where I differed with the consensus was in the realm of practicality. I just don't live in "Shoulda Land."

Ergo, given their majority opinion is likely a good proxy for fellow libertarian, conservative, and freedom-lovers' opinions, I wanted to make the argument why I believe Donald Trump not only will fail, but is doomed to fail. And the reasons are two.

First, despite all of The Don's charisma and refreshingly blunt talk, one has to remember the re-election of Barack Obama. A veritable socialist who FAILED MISERABLY to get the economy moving again, I was convinced any self-respecting American would vote his incompetent ass out of office. Leftist or not, minority or not, male or female, people would realize he not only failed to live up to (unrealistic) expectations, but only worsened the long term financial stability of the US. You throw in Obamacare and I truly thought American would wake the f*ck up and vote him out.

They did not.

And what that taught me was that not only can a conservative never win the presidency ever again with 15% (and increasing) of our population being minorities (who tribalistically vote for socialism), but too high a percent of the population (including whites) are wedded to a socialist ideology to such a zealous level their emotions have totally eclipsed any intelligent thinking they're capable off.

The second, and iron-clad reason The Don is not the second coming of Ronald Reagan, is a variable I'm shockingly surprised nobody has brought up or thought of before.

Congress.

Perhaps it's because I remember the Jesse Ventura administration, but the executive branch does not stand alone. This isn't a monarchy, it's a democracy. And the executive branch (gubernatorial or presidential) has to deal with a legislature. And the legislature, BOTH republican and democrats hate Trump.

This is the real reason any discussion about "President Trump," let alone the "saving of America" is moot and a waste of time. I'm sure people are very excited to see the first non-politician get nominated for a major political party's presidential ticket. And as I drive further south past the Mason Dixon line, it becomes increasingly more apparent. But even if he does get elected...

So what?

You think congress is going to work with him to actually improve things? I, sadly, predict this will go down very much like a Jesse Ventura administration and nothing long term, fundamental, nor genuinely hopeful will come of it.

The truth is minorities are too brainwashed, people are too stupid, and congress is too corrupt to "get the government the WWII generation deserves." And while I know there may be some hope, perhaps wishful thinking, in the end you not only have to financially and physically prepare yourself for a decline with silver, guns, and overseas investments, you need to prepare yourself mentally for what's about to come.

Alas, I suggest you learn to enjoy the decline.

Raleigh Meet Up - Cigars and Booze!

October 5, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Greetings Lieutenants, Economists, and Agents in the Field!

If you happen to be in the Raleigh area going to have a meet up at the Angus Barn's "Wild Turkey Lounge" where we can smoke cigars and drink booze. 730PM, Wednesday. If you happen to be in town stop on by and saw howdy!

Can Men Out-Compete the Government for Women?

October 5, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

A better question is "Meh, if it's come to that, would you want to?"

Comparing Economic Penis Sizes for Socialists

October 6, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

Though I've largely given up on trying to convince people about the realities of economics with reason, evidence, empiricism, and logic, for my own personal sake I like to check in on various countries to see which economic models are working. And today I decided I'd check in on the left's favorite exception to the "Socialism Kills Nearly Everything" rule - the Scandinavian model.

To be honest, I was expecting their average economic growth to be slightly better than the US. This was in part because of our pathetic economic growth rate (which does not beat population growth) and Norway's oil (which would not only pull up their average, but is also the single most convenient fact about Scandinavian socialism leftists purposely ignore). But I was surprised to see the left's favorite economic children not even being able to beat the US's already pathetic economic growth:

It should be noted (and the left is already tripping over their organic coffees to point this out) that Sweden is the only country to average a growth rate above 2% (perhaps rape is good for economic growth after all). But that exception considered, the Scandinavian model looks pretty, well, horrible. They're only averaging around a 1% economic growth rate, a rate that is not going to help maintain/realize their socialist utopias, and only 60% their evil capitalist US counterpart.

But before we start breaking out American flags, chanting "USA," smugly assuming this is a point for capitalism, you have to step back and realize...

1. The US is NOT a capitalist nation, but is by all measures a mixed economy model like our Scandinavian counterparts and
2. The above economic growth rates, even Sweden's, still suck.

In short, we're doing a "who's got the biggest economic dick contest" amongst the smallest-dicked economies in the world - socialist ones.

Any visit to the OECD will show there are countries who are much more capitalist than the US and it's socialist sisters. You will also find out these countries have economic growth rates averaging around 4%, 5% even 9%, doubling, tripling, even quintupling the left's lazy economic growth. Russia, China, South Korea, the Baltics, even Mexico, all posting economic growth rates the United States used to.

I've done a much more thorough economic analysis of this, and this development is nothing new or shocking. Lazy people who live and parasite off of a dwindling productive class will result in slowing, and inevitably, contracting economic growth. The government by it's nature doesn't produce anything of value, and as more and more people view it as a source of income, or even employment, any country that pursues this economic policy will end. This isn't opinion, this isn't biased "right wing talk," it's merely pointing out simple economic realities.

Of course, the real problem the West has is not economic, but psychological. We've raised three full generations who are so ignorant and stupid, they actually think they have a right to do whatever they want and food, clothing, and shelter will magically fall out of the sky.

And it will for a time.

But understand this economic "manna from the heavens" is simply other people's work and production being forcefully redistributed by the government. And once the parasitic class out-consumes the productive ability of the productive class, that spigot will be turned off.

And then the real fun begins!

Enjoy the decline!

When Feminism Jumped the Shark

October 7, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Why does Laura Parson have a job? Seriously. If this is what she is paid for, by North Dakotan (and likely) federal tax dollars, why does she have a job?

Informal Washington DC Meetup

October 7, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Howdy All,

Will be making my way north from North Carolina to DC and will be having an informal meet up on Sunday.

McGinty's in Silver Spring Maryland.
Sunday
8PM

Be there and be square.

Cappy

Never Work for Vagina, Inc.

October 7, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Remember gentlemen, let women have Corporate America.

They deserve it.

Episode #168 of The Clarey Podcast!

October 8, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

First Red Pill Album by JR Guerra. Music intro.
Cappy discovers the greatest advancement in motorcycling
Ernst and Young ignoring degrees.
Dragon's Tail and Raleigh.
Conservatives make horrible entrepreneurs.
How to legally fuck with the Sheriff?

AND MORE!!!

In THIS EPISODE of The Clarey Podcast!

Trump Wants to Fuck Women and Talks Like a Guy

October 10, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

My thoughts were already, thankfully, written by somebody else.

I'll say it again:

I'd rather have a truthful sinner
Than a lying saint.

The Knoxville Swing Dancing Association: How SJW's Took Over Ballroom Dance

October 10, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Ballroom dancing has not only served as a key passion and source of income in my life, but is a skill I recommend every young man learn. Not only is it good exercise, fun, and an excellent way to practice discipline, but it is an invaluable skill in order to attract women. So when I pulled into Knoxville, Tennessee on my latest motorcycling adventure, I decided to check in to see if there was any local dancing, and sure enough there was.

The Knoxville Swing Dance Association.

Usually every major metro area in the US has some sort of group or association that lists all the various ballroom dancing activities going on in the area. Dances, lessons, competitions, etc., and I thankfully had found Knoxville's swing dancing chapter. But before I could get excited enough to pull out and iron my crumpled dress shirt from my saddle bags, something caught my eye:

Their "Code of Conduct."

I had never seen a "code of conduct" before listed on any swing, salsa, or tango site. Usually it was just a calendar, some photos, and some links to some social media. But when I read through their "code of conduct" I put away my crumpled shirt and looked for other plans because it was plainly obvious the Knoxville swing dance scene had been infected with people who were not first and foremost swing dancers, but social justice warriors.

Knoxville Swing Dance Association

About Us FAQ Code of Conduct Hagerman

Code of Conduct

At all times be courteous and respectful of everyone while helping to ensure everyone's safety and comfort. This is regardless of, but not limited to, age, body shape, ethnic background, gender, gender identities, life choices, political beliefs, race, religious beliefs (or lack thereof), sexual orientations, skill level, etc.

- Contacting a Community Ambassador in person. These people are identified by their ribbon lanyards. They will be wearing on their wrist. There will be at least 2 of these individuals at any KSDA sanctioned event.
- Calling or texting 865-231-0208
- Emailing contact@swingknoxville.org
- Leave anonymous feedback or otherwise via https://swingknoxville.org/contact

The KSDA reserves the right to take any action which, in its sole judgment, deems appropriate in response to reports of abuse, harassment, discrete, hazardous situations, or other inappropriate behavior (whether or not listed as an example on this page), including but not limited to: warning the individual(s) who appears to be responsible, expelling them from the event, banning them from future KSDA events, and/or notifying law enforcement if there is reason to believe that laws have been violated or there is a dangerous situation.

This is a development that I should have seen coming, as I was already familiar with the boom and bust cycle of ballroom dance scenes. This cycle consists of:

1. A new and unique scene truly independent minded individuals explore and pioneer, which

2. Attracts popular kids, SPECIFICALLY attractive women, to the scene as their primary goal in life is to be popular/scene/be validated.

3. Which in turn attracts men whose numbers (and money) now make the scene "hot."

4. Rumor spreads to commoners, regulars, and the not so pretty people, and soon you have a fad on your hands.

5. Rumor further spreads and because of the nature of ballroom dance, nerds, rejects, creepers, feelers, stalkers, green-card seekers, Single Christian Men, basement dwellers, and other less-than-Cary-Grantish-men flood the scene because it's a (presumably) easy way to meet women.

6. These not-so-hot, awkward, creepy, and otherwise, less-desirable men drive away the hot women.

7. Without the hot women, the fuel which fed the fad dies.

8. The hot/cool/rich/normal men leave

9. Leaving MOST ballroom dance scenes at their pre-fad levels as refuges for nerds, dweebs, 50 something divorcees, and other forms of social outcasts.

It is at this point nobody pays attention to the formerly hot ballroom scene because why would you? There's nothing in it for anybody and it's not until the scene goes ghost and is discovered decades later by those pioneering individualists again does the cycle repeat itself. The cycle is complete. There is no new stage to be added.

Except now.

And the reason I say "except now" is because unlike history past we have the millennial generation. And the millennial generation is the first generation to be fully brainwashed into thinking they can't just

"Be a lawyer"
"Be a doctor"
"Run a company"

or
"Be a housewife."

No, they have been fully convinced they they need to "Be a lawyer" +advocate a social crusade

"Be a doctor" +have a political cause
"Run a Company" +champion Corporate Social Responsibility
or
"Be a housewife" +volunteer for a cause

They simply can't have a profession and that in it of itself is enough to be of service to society. No, they need the ego fix to right some non-existent, fabricated, perceived wrong. They need to go beyond what their career, job, or education is. They need to be heroes, even if they have to make up a problem out of whole cloth, ruining everything good in the process.

And the Knoxville Swing Dance Association has become precisely that.

Why, precisely, is there a disclaimer about "race, gender identities, political opinions, and life choices?" What does ANY of that have to do with swing dancing? Not once in my now 20 years of dancing have I ever struck up a conversation on the dance floor about gender, politics, and a person's opinion about abortion.

Additionally, while I'm fully and ACUTELY aware of "creepers," "stalkers," and "feelers" that plague every dance community, these were largely handled naturally and in house. We didn't need to resort to nominating ~~Gestapo Agents~~ "Community Ambassadors" to wear a ~~swastika~~ rainbow band to go running to ~~the SS~~ the police.

Finally, who died and made these self-ordained shitlords King of the Knoxville swing dance community? I'm aware that events hosted and paid for by the Knoxville Swing Dance Association are under their domain. They can organize an entire SS division and to manage their club however they see fit. But if the first hit you get when searching "Knoxville swing dance" is their site, I wonder if their politics doesn't deter people who just want to....ummmm...swing dance and not suffer a political sermon.

If you operate from the erroneous premise that this club is about swing dancing, then their insistence on bringing politics into dancing is confusing. But if you realize swing dancing is merely a ruse, and they use it to put their egos first, running their little imaginary fiefdoms, then it makes complete sense. Sadly, it is dancing that suffers.

The problem ballroom dancing's SJW infestation presents to normal people who just want to dance (or learn) is two-fold.

One, the politics will drive any normal people away. Not because they're creepers or stalkers, or are necessarily afraid of creepers or stalkers, but who wants to be hawked over by dancing Nazi's or be subjected to a political sermon? I know leftist millennials in charge of this are brainwashed to make politics a mandatory component of everything they do, but normal people (of all generations) don't want politics in EVERYTHING they do. Alas one of the greatest passions a person can have is corrupted.

Two, when the anti-male spin on this Stasi "code of conduct" policy is combined with:

the increasing trend of false rape accusations among the millennial girls

AND

the loosening standards as to what constitutes sexual harassment

AND

the outright threat to involve law enforcement (though I've NEVER seen ANY dance scene come to that!)

it not only puts men in a very grey area, it's enough to send most running for the hills! And the reason is very simple -

No matter WHAT people say, no matter what dancers claim, men learn ballroom dancing to meet, date, get with, court, kiss, hug, fuck, marry (or any combination thereof) women.

Men can act all platonic, holier-than-thou, and eunuch-y they want. In then end ballroom dancing has been, currently is, and always will be primarily a means to meet the opposite sex. But if you're going to lay land mines around for men, making an already challenging challenge more challenging, don't be surprised if men with options don't show up and there's a dearth of leads.

Alas, I believe the introduction of social justice warriors to ballroom dancing will not only break the ballroom dance scene life cycle, but permanently leave it at where it stands today (I'll leave it to my readers to see what I spy with my little eye). The swing dance scene will never recoup its former 1990's greatness. The salsa scene will never see again it's '00's sizzle. Like a supernova being the last stage of a star's life cycle, the social justice warriors swarming around the jettisoned carcass of a once-vibrant ballroom dance scene is its last and PERMANENT stage in life.

Ergo, I suggest no man look for love, romance, sex, or courtship in today's dance scene (unless it's COMPLETELY void of any politics and social justice warrioring). Instead, I strongly recommend you use it to learn how to dance in anticipation of meeting a non-leftst, non-SJW marriage-material woman outside the dance scene who will actually deserve your dancing skills and talents....but if your skills happen to get you laid at a wedding where you're the only ballroom dancer...so be it.

Podcast/
Asshole Consulting
YouTube
Twitter
Books
Amazon Affiliate

Matt Baldoni Has a Q&A Session About the Bee Gees on Facebook, Oct. 12th

October 10, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Well now's your chance ladies. You can converse over Facebook with The Great Matt Baldoni on October 12th!

The Economics of Overpopulation

October 11, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Armchair quarterbacks and overpopulation theoreticians/conspiracy theorists can file your complaints in the comments section below:

SJW's Continue Their Destruction of Ballroom Dance

October 13, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

I would take this apart piece by piece but the fact this video had to be made AND the video says "Sometimes you have to hold hands while dancing because, well, that's part of dance" just made me realize merely viewing it in all of its aspy, SJW, awe will be enough to scare any normal people away from ballroom dance.

Again, for those men and women looking to learn ballroom dance, by all means LEARN. But most dance scenes have become mere nerdy, fractions of their formerly great selves.

The Father and Grandfather Could Not Be Reached for Comment

October 14, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Remember, with Government Check replacing dads, we don't need no STIIIINNNNNNKING fathers!

Precious Metals, Brexit, Negative Interest Rates, the Election, and Currencies

October 14, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Sponsored post, but it's still a good podcast episode if you're interested in currencies and precious metals.

they deserve it.

The Case for Mike Rowe for President

October 14, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

It is no secret that I hold Mike Rowe in very high regard. The man is an entrepreneur, an Eagle Scout, worked and still works a real job, and for what amount he's delved into politics, it has been (truthfully) addressing one of the largest problems facing the US - the education bubble. So when you compare him to the two "best" schlepps the democrats and republicans managed to scrape from the baby boomer barrel this time around for a presidential election, there's just no competition. Mike Rowe would make an infinitely better president than Clinton or Trump.

But before we get our hopes up of a charming, honest Mike Rowe announcing his presidential bid, there's just one minor problem. And the problem is not Mike Rowe himself, but Americans. Americans, frankly, don't deserve Mike Rowe.

As it stands right now, Trump and Clinton are so hated, even within their own parties, I contend any normal, honest person could walk right in and win the election. With financial support form the Peter Thiels of the world, not to mention a GoFundMe account I'm sure would raise millions overnight, Mike Rowe could just walk in in the 11th hour with a clever marketing strategy and steal the election with a write in campaign. But, ironically, that's the easy part. It would be getting Mike Rowe to decide to run that's the hard part.

Think about what Mike Rowe or any normal person would have to give up. Since he is normal that means he likely has a healthy family, normal life, and a job he enjoys. He has his hobbies, interests, and friends. His entire value and happiness is contingent on that life and all of that would go away over night if he decided to run for president.

Instead of working on another documentary like "How Booze Built America" he'd have to deal with the asswipes in congress trying to force some unwanted toxic piece of omnibus legislation into a term limits bill.

Instead of spending time with his dad, he'd have to deal with accusations of racism, sexism, bigotry, ageism, and whatever other "isms" Americans can create as he cuts social spending and tries to balance the budget.

The media would find, if not outright create, skeletons in his closet, ruining his life at home.

Not to mention his prominence would bring out 20 year old (likely false) accusations of rape or sexual assault a la Bill Cosby, Donald Trump, Bill Clinton, etc., running the risk of legal troubles.

And all for a paycheck that is likely not too much more than what he can muster working in film.

The truth is only people who have nothing else in their lives can endure this baptism by fire because "getting elected into office" is the only thing in life they have. Clinton (both Bill and Hillary) epitomize this with a broken family, a miserable home life, murder and rape accusations, and a machiavellian relationship that is designed for political advancement and not love. I don't care how many millions they make in speeches, they'll never come close to what Mike Rowe and normal people have. And that's just not worth risking on a presidential bid.

Ultimately it is the American public and a "fanning-the-flames" media who are to blame for the outright pathetic presidential candidates we have today. In becoming an entitled and spoiled population, the American public get vehement if any politician dares to hold them up to adult standards of self-supportation and independence. In separating the country by race and gender, any attempt to treat people as genuine equals and hold them up to equal standards begets accusations of racism, sexism, and any other form of "ism" professional victim whores can come up with. And the media, with its abandonment of genuine journalism and its duty as the 4th branch of government, would prefer to get clicks and make money by shelling out yellow, if not outright, brown journalism, even if it ruins would-be honest politicians' personal lives (not to mention, the future of the country).

Joseph Maistre said it best when he said, "You get the government you deserve."

And Americans don't deserve Mike Rowe.

Hard Work Beats Talent

October 16, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

A very important point...especially to all you high IQ millennials lying around telling us how you're going to solve the world's problems with your 18 year old pontificating "ideas."

Why Annual Reports are Bullshit

October 17, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

For those of you interested in stock valuation and analysis (warning, very rantilicious):

Book Review of Mitch Berg's "Trulbert"

October 17, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

"Trulbert," which is intended to be pronounced phonetically "true liberty," is a book by Mitch Berg of Shot in the Dark Fame. It chronicles the would-be happenings of a post-economic collapse in winter-bound Minneapolis, following various characters, tribes, families, media personalities, and agency-less government bureaucrats. While the topic may be somewhat somber and macabre, the book can be summed up in one word:

Fun.

What threw me off at first was the seemingly unreconcilable comical nature of the book, its characters, and its tone with what would in reality be a harsh, rapid, and deathly decline in the Twin Cities population. Specifically, the La-La-Land that Mr. Berg paints after the currency collapses is one where cell phone towers and satellites still work, electricity still runs, an effective replacement monetary system is up in a week, and the north side of Minneapolis doesn't revolt immediately when the EBT checks don't clear. However, while my part-economist, part-prepper mind was expecting a much more realistic tale full of rampant disease, an 80% death rate, and cannibalism, Mr. Berg purposely avoids this to tell an economic tale.

Well...he at least slows down the economic collapse a bit.

Well...OK, a LOT.

For in the real world Minneapolis' economic collapse would happen so quickly the vital economic lessons in this book would not have the time to be elucidated. And so Mr. Berg purposely slows this collapse down to show not only what could be achieved in absence of government, but also what would happen in the vacuum of its absence. And here his observations are not only insightful and true, but hilarious because only things that are this tragically accurate, damning, and destructive to humanity are truly funny.

For example, precisely what value do government bureaucrats such as teachers, counselors, non-profit workers, protestors, and social workers provide society? It's a hard question to answer in today's world because we see them and presume their title explains their value. "Teacher," "social worker," "librarian." But through the lens of a post-collapse world we see that these people are absolutely worthless to society, if not easily replaceable with books, a thumb drive, or nothing at all. It becomes PAINFULLY clear society merely pays additional taxes to keep these worthless people pointlessly employed.

Another brilliant skewering Mr. Berg does of a real world worthless caste of people are the academians and media personalities. As the city collapses around them (and the mob slowly takes over), these charlatans maintain their air of fabricated and self-assigned authority as to why the economy and society is collapsing around them (and the two paragraphs where a mobster explains to a former journalist why she was nothing but a whore for political powers pre-collapse, as she vainly points to her worthless awards and degrees, is by far the best piece of excoriation that aptly describes today's media and alone makes the book worth buying). Like most government workers, it becomes painfully clear just how worthless these people are both in the book and the real world.

Particularly funny is the fun he pokes at libertarian ideologues and pacifist zealots whose belief in the "non-aggression principle" gets them robbed, if not killed, especially as they're lecturing wild mobs about the irrationality of their actions. They start off sanctimonious and proud as U of MN professors, only to end up...well...few in number by the end of the book.

And the sportsball and sheeple! Don't even get me started! It's as if Mr. Berg was reading my mind about how the majority of Americans truly are dumb enough to be taken in by bread and circuses. His brilliant weaving of the NFL as a national and dominant force in the country would be laughable if the American public's IQ wasn't so low that a mafioso NFL is a real world, post-collapse possibility.

But what I think is Mr. Berg's pinnacle achievement in this book is the inevitable creation of a mob. Not so much that a mob or gangster form of government would form, that's a given. But how it would form is his true brilliance.

It would form with the legions of disaffected, unemployed, and talentless former government employees.

Without giving too much of the book away, figure heads start to form mobs who demand protection payments from the actual producers in the government-free society. It's only natural government employees, bureaucrats, academians, and non-profit workers would be starving as they offer nothing of value. Ergo, with their careers destroyed and the private sector moving on without them, they would feel entitled (and would be quite hungry) towards taking what wasn't theirs. The rationales given by the mob bosses are the same as today's modern governments, and Mr. Berg draws identical parallels with slogans and department names that are indecipherable from today's democrat and socialist agencies and non-profits. Add to this natural evolution of government employee-turned-mobster thug, that the seed by which gangs form is based about religions and churches (read- tribalism), and I wonder if Mr. Berg realizes how accurate he might be in predicting a collapse in Minneapolis.

There is certainly more to like in this book. The constant digging at stereotypes such as roller derby girls, hyphenated named women, and coffee snobs will make you think I wrote the book. The actions scenes, some spectacularly creative and graphic, will leave you wincing. Slamming on the Green Bay Packers is always fun. And the debauchery of the socialist power heads reminds you of Hugo Chavez's daughter.

About the only things missing are four:

1. I would have liked to see more on prostitution, not only because it would be a very real reality in a post apocalyptic world, but it would have provided the perfect vehicle by which to show how feminism is hopelessly dependent upon good men to protect them, so they can have such a delusional religion.

2. Slavery would at least be starting to form in some capacity or another given the progress of the mob.

3. It's not available in paperback or audio book.

4. There was no mention of "The Clarey Sniper Brigade" that would come in from White Bear Lake and charitably free the Minneapolitans from the clutches of tyranny for a weekly tribute of the city's population of big breasted, poor self-control, redheaded daughters.

But these minor shortcomings I am willing to overlook.

Regardless, if you can get past the somewhat unrealistically slow nature of the economic collapse, Trulbert is definitely a great read. You will learn more about economics than three full semesters at the U of MN, your mind will be opened towards what to expect in a collapsing society, and you will get many-a-hearty guffaws at the expense of nearly every variant of leftist as they are shown to be the worthless, tyrannical scum they are in the world today.

You can find Trulbert on Amazon.com

And In Amy Schumer News

October 17, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Ahhhh….warm fuzzies.

Australia Cuts Loans to Worthless College Classes

October 17, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Oh nosies! What ever will the spoiled suburbanite brats of Oz do without getting dem gubmint checks for their liberal arts degrees???

related.

What Real Equality Would Look Like for Women

October 17, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

From a female oil rig worker who works a real job and has a message for the "too pretty to toil" liberal arts-majoring non-profit-teacher "air conditioned only" office type workers.

Millennials - The Dipshit Generation

October 18, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

It's a real hard toss up who to hate more. The baby boomers or the millennials.

Episode #166 of The Clarey Podcast!

October 18, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Holding women up to men's standards.
Cappy Appleseed spreading the Word of Economics!
Australia gets smart - cuts funding to worthless college classes.
Corporations using non-straight people for ulterior purposes.
Goldfinger was not in Kentucky.
Cappy goes to a business networking event...heaven help them.

AND MORE!!!

In THIS EPISODE of The Clarey Podcast!

Direct MP3 download here.

Did Obama Help Blacks?

October 20, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Friends of mine asked me if I was going to watch the debate tonight. I said, no, I was going to dedicate my time towards something more important instead. Specifically, I was going to provide the answer to the question millions of Americans have been waiting for these past 8 years:

Did Obama help blacks?

So if you care to advance your mind and help make meaningful progress to help improve the economic lot of blacks (as opposed to having your brain cells destroyed by watching Cheech and Chong duke it out), turn off the TV, pour yourself a drink, and let us look at some empirical data.

To be blunt, Barack Obama, "magic negro" as he might be, no longer has the time left in his presidency to do anything meaningful or helpful for the nation. As Americans are glued to the shitshow that is going on between arguably the most corrupt person in America and a man who has diarrhea of the mouth, it is a short 3 months before one of those two is sworn into office, replacing America's first (sort of) black president. Ergo, I think I can safely assume it's OK to start measuring the improvement blacks have enjoyed under the Obama presidency, without too much of a margin of error between now and January 20th.

So how did America's first Kaepernick-esque president do in improving the lives of blacks?

Poorly.

Matter of fact, you wouldn't have thought a "sorta black" guy was even president.

The first and most important measure of economic well-being - median income - not only showed a worsening gap between blacks and whites, BUT OVER ALL NOMINAL DECLINES IN INCOMES FOR BLACKS! In other words, blacks not only lost ground against whites in income, but their incomes fell by 2%!!!

Median Income	2008	2015
White	$57,588	$60,109
Black	$37,669	$36,898
Gap	35%	39%

The second, and arguably second-most important measure of economic well-being - net household wealth - also showed deterioration against a white-measuring stick. At the beginning of the recession (before Obama took over) white wealth was 10 times that of your average black person, while 2013 (the latest data available) showed it worsening to 13x's that of blacks.

Third, life expectancy.

Here some genuine progress has been made. In 8 years (though the latest data is only up till 2014) Obama has managed to close the life expectancy gap by almost 1%. Sadly, this is likely more due to whites drinking more and having more complications of gluttonous behavior, but I guess you gotta take a win when you can get one.

Life Expectancy	2008	2014
White	78.5	78.8
Black	74.3	75.2
Gap	5.4%	4.6%

Fourth, crime. Sadly, like life expectancy, no real improvement either (arguments against incarcerations rates vs. arrest rates duly noted, the data is the best data I could find available AND of a consistent measuring nature).

Arrest Rate	2008	2012
White	4.5%	3.9%
Black	11.5%	9.7%
Multiple	2.57	2.46

Fifth, unemployment. Not only a very important measure of economic well-being, but again, absolutely no progress in closing the gap between whites.

Unemployment Rate	Jan 2009	Sept. 2016
White	7.1	4.4
Black	13.4	8.2
Multiple	1.89	1.86

Now we could go on, and I'm sure as more recent data emerges there will be no surprises, but the FACT is that the plight of blacks HAS NOT improved under Barack Obama. No measurable or significant improvement has been made and the past 8 years HAS BEEN COMPLETELY WASTED in terms of helping blacks (and hispanics too if you care to look at the data) close the wealth, income, employment, crime, and life expectancy gaps.

And this utter failure (not to mention the doubling of our national debt) grants the likes of me, and everybody else who has been saying socialism is not what is going to "save the blacks," the right to start asking some serious questions of everybody who supported this failure of a president.

1. If you'll permit me to plagiarize Donald Trump, "What DO you have to lose?" Be it the more-than-adequate track record of large liberal cities headed up by leftist, liberal mayors (black or not), the academic performance of your children, your job prospects, or the plethora of economic data presented above, when does the black community wake the fuck up and realize the democrats and the socialism they're offering are NOT the solution? This isn't to say Barack Obama, Michelle Obama, or even Jessie Jackson don't care to improve the plight of blacks, but that they are WRONG when it comes to the medicine they're prescribing. And before you start blaming it on other people with "but it's the evil republicans" or "white institutional" or "but but but," I think it's about time the black community start realizing it's not whitey paying the price, but themselves for this constant lying to themselves.

2. Do you know what 11% is?

That's the percent of your life you just wasted, spending 8 years on false hope Obama promised you. This not only goes for the black community (who have shorter life expectancies btw), but the white, hispanic, and all other people who think that socialism, free health care, and, frankly, using the government to bail out people from their mistakes (be it an illegitimate child or bankster scum) is going to help improve the lives of minorities. This unfounded and religiously-stupid belief that government is the solution to people's self-inflicted problems just got debunked (again). But like all experiments with socialism, it didn't come free. It cost another three generations of blacks their youth, their time, and their mortality. But hey, at least some rich, upper middle class academians with their sociology degrees got to feel good and some politicians got re-elected to cushy government positions. And that's worth all the murdered blacks in Chiraq this year.

3. Do any of you white leftists feel any guilt for misleading the black community down the wrong path for another 8 years? Is it because you lack the spine to tell them the harsh truths about escaping poverty and achieving economics success? Or is it because it's just so much easier to tell them pretty lies so they like you, vote for you, and don't call you racist? Or do you make too much money on them heading up some bullshit academic department like "African American Studies" or "Diversity Director" or any one of the thousands of non-profit jobs that fail to ACTUALLY IMPROVE the lives of black people? I know you make money off of selling them into poverty, but hey, better they live in poverty than you work a real job, right?

4. Will you leftists now stop accusing people who disagree with Obama's/socialist policies of racism when it's empirically clear these policies do NOT improve the lives of minorities?

and finally

5. Will the black community have the self respect to set aside its emotion, pride, ego, and tribalism, and instead in an effort to improve itself make an honest and long-term commitment towards empiricism, logic, the scientific method, facts, reason, discipline, reality, and hard work? I understand the sheer scope and consistency of lies told these past 50 years is compelling, completely self-validating, even angering. But with nothing to show for it, with no measurable improvement, how many MORE generations of blacks must live in a dead-last place position relative to whites for these failing social experiments to go on?

ANY self-respecting black person who wishes to improve their (and their childrens') lot in life owes themselves at minimum an alternative strategy, or at least the right to explore other explanations as to their poverty. And I suggest you don't look at the tired and failed policies of socialism for the answer, but an alternative explanation in freedom, liberty, self-ownership, and responsibility.

You can find Aaron's other sites/works here:

Podcast
Asshole Consulting
YouTube Channel
Twitter
Books by Aaron
Amazon Affiliate

Sources:
https://www.census.gov/library/publications/2016/demo/p60-256.html
http://www.cdc.gov/nchs/fastats/life-expectancy.htm
http://www.bjs.gov/index.cfm?ty=datool&surl=/arrests/index.cfm#

The Truth About Professional Sports

October 21, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

You can buy the book here.

I Will Never Hire a Modern Day Liberal Arts Graduate

October 21, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Unless you can clearly delineate yourself from this bullshit.

"MGTOW" Now Officially a Disability According to UN

October 21, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Well VirginTOW anyway.

The Clarey National Debt Plan

October 21, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

In part because the economy was collapsing, in part because I found it easier to analyze economies instead of companies, I made a foray into currency trading about 10 years ago. Analyzing companies was becoming boring, not to mention more of a game predicting which government policy would affect which industry as opposed to looking at fundamentals like earnings, debt, and cash flow. And so, using techniques nearly identical to those I used in commercial lending, I bought some Swiss Francs, Australian Dollars, and Singaporean Dollars.

I did well.

Very well.

And because of the leveraged nature of currency trading was starting to wonder if this wasn't a quick way toward riches and my true calling. That was until....

the Swiss central bank decided it's currency was too strong and purposely started to pummel it's own currency. Once again, I would have to predict government policy and not economics or fundamentals as the currency market was no longer efficient, but merely a reflection of government and bureaucrats.

But then it got me thinking.

"Wait, if countries purposely weaken their currencies because there's a benefit (in this case, their export industry doesn't lose business or jobs because their goods are in higher demand overseas), then there must also be SOME kind of benefit to having a strong currency as well. In other words, in a "equal but opposite force"-type-law of economics (that I truly believe exists) what would be the benefit of a country with a strong currency?"

And then I made the connection.

Purchasing power.

I witnessed this the more I traveled overseas and realized in Mexico, Jamaica, the Bahamas, even Canada, countries would gladly accept greenbacks, saving me and other American visitors the pain of converting currencies. I also remember a John Stossel episode where he could more quickly hail a cab in Russia flashing US dollars (and cigarettes) than the local Rubles.

But then it really dawned on me.

If a country were to have a very strong currency, if it were to adhere to free market economics, then it wouldn't weaken its currency to protect it's export base. It would let its citizens buy world goods AND INVESTIBLE ASSETS on the cheap.

This made me wonder "couldn't the US immediately after WWII just printed off a couple billion dollars and buy all the world's productive assets in 1945?"

Which makes me wonder, "Couldn't we do the same today?"

And this is the underpinning epiphany of The Clarey National Debt Plan.

While other people's national debt reduction plans are based on some combination of cuts, fiscal discipline, frugality, and taxation, my idea is much more international and opportunistic. For while the US may not be in its supreme position it once was back in (the evil, racist, oppressive) 40's and 50's, the truth is neither is the rest of the world. And poor as our finances are, the world's is even worse. Alas, we still have the world's reserve currency and we can (and do) abuse the hell out of it.

For example the money supply (using the monetary base as the measure) has increased 350% under Obama. That should result in inflation of 350%, but it hasn't. The money has been sopped up in recapitalizing banks, bailing out bad mortgages, and bailing out other bad investments, wherein the money sits on a balance sheet or in a vault, never allowed to circulate (and thus cause inflation) in the economy. The money has also been used to finance bubbles such as new mortgages, student loans, and corporate buy backs of their own stock where inflation has occurred, but we don't care about it because we like it when "stocks go up," "housing prices go up," and millennials believe "you can't put a price on education." The third area this money has gone is overseas where countries such as China, Russia, Brazil, and all of Europe are in such WORSE financial shape, our dollar and it's horrible fundamentals are still relatively attractive and act as a "safe haven" investment.

In other words we're like the only girl in Casper, Wyoming with all of her teeth. Hideous, disease infected, and the mother of 4 from 3 different baby daddies, but we're still the best looking horse in the barn.

I say "why not capitalize on this?"

Since printing money does not (directly or immediately anyway) result in inflation, why don't we avail ourselves of this undeserved purchasing power, print off $22 trillion, and go on an acquisitions binge across the globe? I say "acquisitions binge" and not "pay off the national debt" because, while printing off $22 trillion to merely pay off our debt is possible, I do believe the global markets and rest of the world aren't THAT dense and they would immediately dump the dollar immediately causing real inflation at home. But if we instead INVEST that $22 trillion in assets that generate an annual profit not only does that give those $22 trillion in US dollars intrinsic value (and thus hopefully stave off inflation), but the annual profits from these investments could be used to pay down the debt. And that's the twist to the "Clarey National Debt Plan."

I've ran some figures.

There's $44 trillion in publicly traded global equities of the G20 nations. These securities on average pay a dividend yield of 3.156%. You may ask "why would you only print off $22 trillion, why not a full $44 trillion and buy these global equities outright" and the reason why is you don't want the US government becoming majority shareholder of anything. They'd ruin the underlying investment forcing unnecessary corporate social responsibility initiatives, under-performing minorities in positions of power, mandating carbon footprint quotas, and a whole slew of politically motivated leftist slop that would destroy the profit potential of these firms. You want the US government to be a silent, non-participatory, non-intervening partner, and ensuring they only own 49.9% (thus the $22 trillion) of these firms is a way to do that.

A 3.156% annual dividend yield on $22 trillion generates $694 billion in proceeds each year.

Assume there's a balanced budget (which is the LEAST likely assumption in all of this theoretical plan, and sadly, I'm not joking), and the national debt is paid off in a maximum of 28 years, probably less assuming growth in earnings (there's technically a way we could eliminate the national debt in a year or two, but I'm not paid enough to consult on these matters).

Now admittedly there's plenty wrong with this idea.

One, printing off $22 trillion (I would hope) would cause the currency markets to crash (indicating there's at least some sanity left in this world). But here's where the juicy irony lies. We just almost quadrupled the money supply under Obama/Yellen/Bernanke.

I ask you one simple question:

Where did all that money go?

If you look at the federal reserve balance sheet and the federal budget this newly minted money went to the following places:

1. Bailing out unprofitable banks

2. Bailing out other unprofitable financial firms
3. Bailing out unprofitable people who borrowed more than they could afford
4. Bailing out people either via welfare, EBT, social security, etc., ie - parasitic people who do NOT produce a net positive economic production
5. Wars/military (where in once again, the purpose of the military is to destroy things, not make a profit)
6. Forcing the tax payer to bail out millennials from their worthless, idiotic degrees (oops, wait, that hasn't happened...yet)

In other words, NOT ONE PENNY was an actual investment as you expect to get a positive return on investments. These were expenditures on money losing operations, money losing people, money losing wars, and the just plain losers, degenerates, and scum of our society. There was no hope of profits, earnings, dividends, cash flow, or capital gains. It was simply a pissing away of money.

When you realize this you'll see my plan is INFINITELY more sound, logical, and sane because there's an actual profit at the end of this $22 trillion investment. And that's the key word - it's an investment. If markets are as sane as they are now, and consistent, the dollar should (ironically) SURGE compared to other country's currencies because unlike Greece, Japan, Europe, Brazil, and nearly every other country we wouldn't be bailing out our country's losers, but investing in global winners.

This then leads to the second problem - inflated stock prices.

If it were to get out the US government was on a $22 trillion global spending spree stock prices would jump to the point the purchasing price would no longer make this plan viable. Additionally, as it just so happens, central banks are already doing this just the same. But while smaller central banks such as the Swiss, Singaporean, etc., might go and take such actions, they're too small to drive prices up significantly on the global markets. The US is too big. Ergo, kind of like China, they'd have to do it clandestinely and secretly through unremarkably named subsidiaries and shell companies. This would take some time to slowly, indirectly, and discreetly amass a $22 trillion global equity portfolio, but in time it could be done, especially if there are dips or crashes in the market.

There are other problems with "The Clarey National Debt Plan," but truthfully it would be a waste of time further exploring what is already an academic, theoretical exercise. The balls that would be required to execute this plan just do not exist in the US. While Japan and Australia have the spine to end their worthless degree bubbles, our president apologizes when he states the truth about art history degrees. And the student loan bubble is merely 1/20th the size of our national debt problems. However, we can learn something from this intellectual exercise aside from just what a bunch of self-deluding clowns and asshats the central banking/governmental/international finance "authorities" are. And that lesson is the only source by which national debts can be paid off if through the economic production of the people.

In other words, government is not a solution to anything as it is the underlying people who are the ones with not only the power, but the economic production potential necessary to make good on whatever promises their governments made. It is cute that today's international economy is so screwed up that the US could just waltz in, print off $22 trillion, and purchase the productivity of the world's productive classes, which would bail out our parasitic and lazy classes, but it doesn't change the fact that when it all boils down to fundamentals, economic production of the private sector is where ALL economic worth, value, and wealth comes from. And if you really want to build a successful society, civilization, or country, I suggest you found it around this key and vital principle.

In the meantime you central bankers, government bureaucrats, and international bond traders enjoy the decline!

Visit Aaron at his other sites or consider purchasing some of his awesome books!
Podcast
Asshole Consulting
YouTube Channel
Twitter
Books by Aaron
Amazon Affiliate

Curse Free Episode #9 of The Clarey Podcast!

October 22, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Cappy's GF commandeers the Captain's chair!
The Clarey National Debt Plan.
Prostitution in Wyoming for cheeseburgers.
Test tube babies for all!!!
VirginTOW and feminism now officially disabilities!

AND MORE!

In THIS EPISODE of The Clarey Podcast!

Direct RSS feed download here.

AND REMEMBER to do all your weekend (and Christmas shopping) online thru good Ole Cappy's Amazon Affiliate site!

You Think I Joke About Wyoming

October 24, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Ahhhh, Casper, Wyoming. The town that if I ever get movie rights to my fictional book we will start filming "Angry Mass Murdering Killer Economist" there immediately with live ammo and nobody will be acting, but everybody will be a star!

Academia's True Ulterior Purpose Today - Propaganda Ministry

October 25, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Historically college, university, academia and in general "higher education" has served three roles in society:

In the medieval times it was largely a luxurious pursuit of the elite and upper classes. Learning languages, teaching latin, and reading philosophy was the preserve of rich or royal children so they could wear pantyhose (either men or women), powdered wigs, and impress equally talentless bluebloods at parties and balls before heads were put into guillotines.

During and after the industrial revolution, science and the scientific method replaced the liberal arts as academia's new role wherein pursuit of more practical studies would provide the knowledge and skills that would make a man's (or woman's) time infinitely more valuable. From roughly the 1870's to the 1970's western civilization enjoyed the increasing opportunity to postpone work, enter college, learn a valuable trade and then enter the workforce, increasing their lifetime earnings multi-fold for what time they invested in college.

This then gave way to the third role academia played starting circa roughly the 1980's. With now everybody going to college and EVERYBODY flooding the labor market, the value of degrees decreased. Of course this didn't matter to most entitled and spoiled Gen X'ers, plus their baby boomer parents didn't know jack about economics, so the recommended they attend anyway. So even though degrees were becoming increasingly worthless, demand for degrees was at an all-time high, nay, an entitlement to the "college experience." And so the role of academia went from one of altruistic support and advancement of society, to that of maliciously capitalizing off of it. The primary and ulterior goal of higher education was to now transfer as much wealth from younger generations to enrich an entire class of talentless liberal-arts majoring hacks posing as professors, teachers, sociologists and other liberal arts "professionals."

You would think this is the current and final stage of academia's evolution, however, there has been a fourth evolution. And that would be one of becoming a veritable Ministry of Propaganda for various socialist, leftist, and communist political parties throughout the world.

This is not "hyperbole" or Alex Jones' like "conspiracy" simply because it's painfully obvious.

Academia has simply become a joke.

First you have a 2015 study that shows 2/3rds of psychology studies cannot be repeated. We're not talking those cute studies you did in your (mandatory) Freshman Psychology class. We're talking the tippy top, super elite, getting their doctorate, with "peer reviewed" level "authorities" and "experts" in their fields sending in slop and passing it on as empirically proven truth. Given psychology is one of the more "legitimate" fields of the social sciences, it's practically guaranteed the rot is equal-or-greater in the remaining fields. The entire realm of the liberal arts and humanities is debunked (and it's primary job would be re-validation instead of political propaganda). But how much soul searching do you see these "social scientists" doing versus vehemently defending their quackery as today's education bubble spectacularly bursts?

Second is the BLATANT political agenda. Forget that over 90% of ~~stunted-adult-children~~ professors vote religiously left and purposely direct nearly all of their studies towards the rationalization of stealing other people's money, just look at the modern day shit show that is academia today. Genuine black bigots who hate white people demanding segregated housing at UCLA, the tiring and completely fabricated drama of zhe zer and non-binary gender pronouns, and the limitless number of stories where PAINFULLY OBVIOUS socialist indoctrination is passed on for "freshman orientation." The only thing more enraging than this naked grab for youth's minds and our money, is the balless parents who stupidly still pay for their idiot childrens' worthless degrees.

And if none of that convinces you, there is again no limit to the number of stories where you find out your hard earned tax dollars are subsidizing some worthless parasite acting as a graduate student as they pursue research in some popcockery or another. The most recent one that comes to mind is Lisa Jordan Powell, a hack, who is studying how pumpkin spiced lattes cause racism. I'd like to say I'm joking, but academia has become the joke. If you seriously think with this blatant racist, sexist, communist crap that academia still has some merit or is somehow not a parasitic organization here to live off of otherwise hard working people, then fuck you, you're a liar, and I pray for the day the world collapses so there is no law and I meet you for coffee.

Regardless, you combined all of this veritable bullshit and the precise goal of academia's new ulterior motive is perfectly clear - to get the American public to no longer trust their own eyes. The goal is to, through "official academia studies," redefine lies as truth, even though the world around us collapses and everybody is worse off. It is to designate "academia" as the final arbiter of truth, allowing the parasites, scum, thieves, psychos, SJW's, cowards, and tyrants in both academia and politics their continued theft of society's money and hard-earned wealth unopposed and unabated.

To what few eyes remain unbrainwashed it is plainly obvious academia is nothing more than a cowardly, sniveling, Ministry of Truth for global socialism. For the rest of the sheeple, however, whether they're just plain stupid or are conscious worthless, parasitic participants in this game, it's the only thing they have in their meaningless, pointless lives. And since the west is all democracies, you can more or less be guaranteed to be forced to enjoy the decline.

_____

Podcast
Asshole Consulting
YouTube Channel
Twitter
Books by Aaron
Amazon Affiliate

New Sponsor: Rayce Riot Apparel

October 25, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

You're an Idiot for Attending Temple Univeristy

October 26, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Forget whether these attacks are racially motivated or not, just drive up and down Broad street and you'll see the school is situated right in the dirtiest ghetto you've ever been in.

You are a fool for attending Temple University.
You are failing as a parent for letting them go there.

Are There ANY Masculine Millennial Male Role Models???

October 26, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

I noticed something a bit odd.

Tom Cruise and Mark Wahlberg are the two main guys heading up the two main action movies in play right now. Cruise is over 50 and Wahlberg is over 40.

Where the heck are the Millennial male action heroes???

So when I tweeted this out, an Agent in the Field returned this. The top 40 or so actors under 35. And bar Captain American and Thor (both actors are Chris I believe), the rest of them a pussies for god's sake! Seriously, look at those limp-wristed, pansified girly men. Christ, the original Hans and Franz in SNL were more manly than this lot!!!!

Oh well. Millennial girls worship at the altar of feminism. I guess they got their dream come true with the men of this generation.

Episode #170 of The Clarey Podcast!

October 26, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Never get between a man and his work.
Studies and dens.
The world of insomniacs.
Silicon Valley Virgins.
Parents who hate their children send them to Temple Univeristy.
A fat sow on an airplane.
Good to see principals getting punched.
Your teachers hate you and are using you.

AND MORE!!!

In THIS EPISODE of The Clarey Podcast!

Direct MP3 link here.

Why Millennials Need Don Rickles

October 27, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Donning my "Charming as Fuck Tuxedo," I was feeling a bit smug since I bought it when I was 19 and still managed to fit into it 23 years later. After posting a couple pictures on teh interwebz and social mediaz my ego was further vindicated with tons of likes and even the occasional female saying,

"Wow, for the first time I don't want to throw up when I see you!"

But the reason I was donning my rarely-donned tux was because it was a special occasional. I was going to see the (quite literally) legendary Don Rickles, who at the age of 90 is not only still performing, but may not be performing for us much longer.

Being familiar with his work I knew what to expect in terms of comedy and shtick, but what I didn't know was how he would perform physically and whether it would be a short show. At his age he certainly wouldn't be able to repeat his energetic performances from the 60's and 70's. And so I tempered my expectations of a boisterous man, whose loudness was to only be outdone by his laser-guided-precision as he masterfully flayed witting and honored members of the audience.

I was wrong to temper my expectations.

Mr. Rickles is of course very old and naturally he had to sit down most of the time. But his brain was just as fast as it had always been. Pulling happy victims from the audience he would ask what they were ethnically and do everything from goose-stepping if you were German, calling you a fag if you were Swedish, and asking "Why are there Chinks in Iowa" if you were Chinese and grew up in Des Moines. There were no hecklers, but overenthusiastic fans, some of which were women, who when they "wooed" or "hollered" Mr. Warmth would say, "my god they all want my body." Further blasting past any concerns for political correctness he, in the witness of a sold out crowd, plainly, blatantly, and purposely sexually harassed a female drummer in the orchestra telling her to come up to his room after the performance, to which the entire audience and drummer herself laughed.
It was a great time enjoyed by a (much older than myself) crowd and I'm happy as hell I got to see him before he passes on to join Frank and his mother. But that was the key thing. The crowd was much older. Which means it was much more mature. And because of that this crowd got to enjoy a type and level of humor no stereotypical Gen Xer or millennial of today every will because, in what I would surmise Don Rickle would say…

”You’re all a bunch of faggots.”

Understand Mr. Rickles has lived a full life, served in WWII, has been married 51 years, has a career that has spanned 60, has a full family, contributed more to this world than you ever will, and at the age of 90 is the poster child for “zero fucks to give.” He is completely untouchable by today’s thought police, academia’s nazis, and the complete faux-intellectual pussies posing as millennial liberal art students. This position means he is the perfect barometer of truth and reality because he is immune and pardoned from any of the would-be attacks that would come from (what I would predict Mr. Rickles would call) “precious faggots.” The millions of weak-minded fools that parade themselves today as faux-intellectual college students, professors, politicians and journalists would not be able to be in the room with this great legend for more than 10 seconds without their weak and fragile minds being more triggered than there was triggering in all of WWII. And because of their hubris and arrogance these SJW’s, millennials, and perpetual-victim-status-seekers would merely dismiss this genius and jewel of America because “racism” and “sexism.”

Which is ultimately and truly their loss. For in merely dismissing Don Rickles as an outdated “has been” they miss out on not just the humor, but some vitally important lessons his humor teaches us about humanity.

Understand the average American today, with its complete sheeple regimen of 13 years K-12 brainwashing and an extra 4-8 years of worthless academic study, is likely to be triggered just in the fact there was a sell-out crowd enjoying (GASP!!!) RACIST AND SEXIST JOKES, because they have been trained to be Constantly offended

2. Constantly be on the look out to be offended
3. Constantly be searching for ways to be a victim, all so they can
4. Demand taxpayer money because they’re oppressed or disable (link to article on IVF)

This means they not only fail to realize it’s a joke (ARGUABLY some leftists are not even capable of enjoying or identifying humor), but that they lack other important skills it takes to survive in this world.

The first and foremost skill insult-humor hones is the ability to determine if you can trust somebody. Understand only true egomaniacs, people who value themselves above others, take offense at a joke that pokes fun at them. They are so full of themselves and value themselves more than others that they can’t brook an insult, joke or not. This is why racial or sexist jokes are a great determiner of whether a person is humble, doesn’t value him/herself more than others, and has the intelligence to not only be able to identify humor, but appreciate it as well. Irish jokes, black jokes, German jokes, white jokes, Polish jokes, you'll trust your kids more with a guy who can laugh at a joke at his own expense than you will one that gets his panties in a bundle. Matter of fact this is such a good skill to have I implicitly do NOT trust anybody who compliments me or calls me "sir." It would genuinely freak me out and depress me if my friends all of the sudden started treating me nice because it meant I had done something that made them feel uncomfortable and they are now acting disingenuous.

Two, it's a secret tell.

To a charlatan, con man, or anybody trying to get something out of you, logic says you should treat people nice so they like you. But anybody who has tried to date women or make friends with men know that acting nice gets you nowhere. Most people who are trying to screw you over cannot get past this simple logical fallacy because their untrustworthy goals are not long term or sincere, but more immediate. Therefore they don't care about you long term because they have no intentions for you long term. This becomes immediately evident when they treat you nice right away (a bum about to beg for money calling you "sir") and the hair on your neck stands up.

Trustworthy people, on the other hand, have the urge or need to occasionally pick on those they love or care about. Trustworthy people test others occasionally to see if that person can take it, and therefore has the capacity for selflessness, altruism, and above all else, humor, which makes them good candidates for friends and loved ones. In return trustworthy, honorable people can take, will take, AND APPRECIATE a joke at their expense because at either a conscious or instinctual level they know it is a sign of care, consideration, or love. This ability to ID trustworthy and untrustworthy people is arguably a more valuable benefit of insult humor than the humor itself.

Three, it is also a secret tell you're a dick.

If your life support strategy is to:
constantly look for offense
so you can feign victimization so you can demand other people's money this strategy, though you think it's clever and clandestine, stinks to high hell. And so much so it will immediately raise the self-defensive instincts of others, even to the point they automatically disrespect and hate you, but don't know why.

For example, do you like this person even though you don't know him?

How can you? There's physical tells these SJW type of people are evil and fully intend on living off of you.

But in addition to having a very punchable face, these people cannot laugh at themselves, let alone find humor in anything, AND it all stems from their constant attempt to parasite off of others. If this is you, you will NEVER have any real life time friends, you will NEVER have an honest or reliable spouse, your children will NOT grow up to become successful, and you will never have any success or happiness in life. It's all because you look to live off of people and not be friends with them.

Four, constructive, but loving criticism.

The black community is largely in last place because nobody wants to hurt feelings or deliver, blunt force truth. But if you look at black men in the military they tend to do much better in nearly every category. Not only is this a function of blunt truth (of which there is plenty in the military), but the comradery and help from fellow men wherein the constant ripping, joshing, belittling, and besmirching build and forge better, stronger, and more trustworthy men. However, ensconced in this smack talk and insults are hidden bits of constructive criticism. Constructive criticism that's there NOT because the person hates you or is bigoted towards you, but because the person genuinely cares about you and wants you to do better.

"Nice shooting fuck face. Know I can't rely on you to protect my ass in the field."

"No, you didn't scare her with your 50 texts in 24 hours. You just made her call the cops and put your ass on a sexual predator list."
"Hey dicknuts, WTF were you thinking majoring in communications was a good idea?"

But if you're a pampered little civilian (black or not), and especially if you're a precious, spoiled high school or college student with all sorts of ADHD, Asperger's, and social anxiety disorder problems (definitely a monopoly of white SWPL folks), any incoming joke intended as either an initial test of trustworthiness, a genuine sign of care or compassion, or a well-intended bit of constructive criticism couched in humor, you will purposely misread as an insult because you value any potential victim-shekels you can squeeze from that person more than you do their potential friendship or comradery.

And finally, it's funny.

The fact two generations of Gen X and Baby Boomer professors, politicians, and public school teachers have brainwashed your faggoty asses so far up your faggoty asses you can't take a joke means you're denying yourselves one of the greatest forms of humor and the joy that comes with it. The fact that millions of SJW's mental growth is so retarded and stunted that a Dean Martin celebrity roast wouldn't get a laugh is tragic. What young people are missing out on in terms of the ability to laugh at ourselves and the friendship that comes with it is incalculable.

When you add it all up, I cannot imagine a life without these 5 skills/benefits that come from insult humor. I would not have the trustworthy, loving people I have in my life today, I would not have the thousands of hours of joy, laughter and happiness under my belt, and for the life of me I don't know how the SJW, leftist, victim-pimping, millennials live or enjoy life without it. I imagine many of you live a Stalinesque lives where destroying others is all you have in life. Or worse, you're so blinded by your race and the constant victim-pimping from school, you'll never enjoy this humor or the true kindness that is behind it.

If there was any justice in this world, and colleges and universities were truly "institutions of free thought and open minds," they would send their students to see Don Rickles. But since they're more concerned about banning types of free speech that promoting it, it is (in my humble opinion) every Millennial's job to see Don Rickles more for their own sake than his.

And if you just plain have your head out of your ass and aren't a (as I would predict Don RIckles would say) “a millennial faggot,” go see him before this great man passes away.

Podcast
Asshole Consulting
YouTube Channel
Twitter
Books by Aaron
Amazon Affiliate

Why Debt and Deficits Don't Matter

October 27, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

I rarely pick fights. But every once in a while there is such a falsehood, propaganda, or outright lie that comes about it cannot go unanswered. And this is one of those cases.

A client hired me to address an article a man by the name of Mike Norman wrote about how debts and deficits don't matter. I was hoping for a cogent argument, but it was so poorly written and so blatantly false, I along with many others couldn't let it go unanswered.

Mike received such a backlash, that he disabled the comments on the article AND put together a response video to his detractors, presenting an equally cogent counter-argument of "you're all just fucking stupid." (the comments are depressing as it shows you just how easily sheeple believe you can print off more money, certainly vote down the sycophants' upvotes)

I find this odd (but confirming) because the man has a masters in economics and 30 years experience. I was hoping to find an argument that I wouldn't necessarily agree with, but at least a cogent one where I could "see where he was coming from." Sadly the "you're fucking stoopid if you don't get this" counter argument confirms my suspicions most people in the economics professor simply don't know what they're doing if this 4th grade "I know you are but what am I" type response is all we get.

Regardless, the video I compiled for my client I think you'll find valuable because it addresses the issue as to whether or not debts and deficits matter. Unfortunately, because it was in response to Mike's article, it was couched in, and therefore has to cut through, all the smoke and mirrors of purist-Keynesian self-delusion in his article. Still, let this be a valuable lesson.

Reserve currency or not.
Central bank printing presses or not.
Borrowing from Bob to pay Bill or not.
All debts, to have value, must inevitably be paid off with the requisite amount of economic production.

And to contend otherwise is simply lying to, and further endebting, younger generations so people today can live off of the children of tomorrow.

Enjoy the decline!

Post Post

Mr. Norman has responded with a counter argument (see below) that in intellectual honesty I wanted to share with you all. It's somewhat of a complicated and nuanced argument that for those of you without degrees in economics may not understand. However, I believe this higher level debate has shown some light onto Mr. Norman's position on MMT and hyper inflation. Again, if you don't understand the argument, I can break it down into layman's terms for you. Additionally, I wanted to thank Mr. Norman for further expounding on his position so we can all progress towards a higher understand of economics:

Dear Millennials: Stop Majoring in Stupid Bullshit

October 27, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

You may choose a wise major here.

Mandatory…Emphasis on "Man"

October 28, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Listen to me boys (and any women who are looking for something to buy their man)…

nose hair trimmers.

You think I joke, but I am deadly serious and any man over 35 will tell you nose hair trimmers are worth their weight in gold.

Go buy one now. You will thank me for it later.

This has been a PSA from Your Elder Brother Cappy

Run Guts Pull Cones

October 28, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

New sponsor and book from Adam Piggott:

UC Berkeley Allows Racism

October 28, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

I will not hire anybody who graduates from California.

Never. Ever.

A Bit of Economic Advice? Do Your Christmas Shopping Now!!!

October 28, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

I am, first and foremost, an economist. It means I'm efficient and economic. You come here not just for my philosophical insights, but the economic ones wherein you may apply and benefit from them in your own personal lives.

So heed me here.
And heed me now.

Do you Christmas shopping NOW!!!!

Do not delay.
Do not wait.
Do not procrastinate till December when prices are jacked up and you have to fight commoner sheeple on Black Friday or Cyber Thursday and Horny Wednesday or whatever popcockery they come up with this year.

How can you do this? Very simple.

Do ALL your Christmas shopping THIS WEEKEND online using Cappy's Amazon Affiliate. That's it. That's all there is too it. Set aside one measly hour this weekend, compile your gift list, click this link, and be done with it before Thanksgiving!

You'll thank me. You'll thank yourself. You'll have no fret or worries. Plus the Ole Captain makes a 7% commish on all your purposes AND YOU DON'T PAY A PENNY MORE!

So if you want to make the Ole Captain very happy
And you want to support this blog
And you want to help him pay off his mortgage before Christmas
And you want to make Christmas shopping very easy
AND you want to be done of this chore in the most ECONOMIC manner possible

DO ALL YOUR CHRISTMAS SHOPPING NOW!!!

Cappy humbly thanks you.

Cappy

PS-Yes you have to click the link and not go directly to Amazon.com because that way they know I sent you. USE THE LINK!!!!

Why Hillary Will Still Win, Inspite of the FBI

October 31, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Enjoy the decline!

Women Vote for Socialism, Complain Men Don't Work

October 31, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Woman celebrates likely win of socialist, then bitches why men don't work.

Raging Golden Eagle does an AMAZING job deconstructing her.

Like I've said before, let women have corporate America. Let them work. Let them pay the taxes.

Monday Morning Commute CURSE FREE Podcast!

October 31, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Nose trimmers.
Essential oils and "They say."
Die radio industry DIE!!!!
Irish & Muslim music sucks.
Corporations hiring liberal art majors.
Minorities as commodities to corporations.

AND MORE!!!

In THIS EPISODE of THe Clarey Podcast!!!

Direct MP3 link here.

RSS feed here (book mark it!)

Kristine Solomon of Yahoo News, Beauty and Style Writer

October 31, 2016 | by Captain Capitalism | Link | Original Link

---

Remember how in the Ole Captain's podcast I say "The news is not the news. It's what the news is about that's the news."

Well we have just such an example here.

The news is NOT that some douche in Arkansas dressed in black face as Bill Cosby. It's the fact that Yahoo's shareholders paid one Kristine Solomon to waste their money and their readers' time with this story.

"NEWS FLASH! WHITE DOUCHY KID IN SOUTH HAS BAD TASTE!"

Kristine might as well go to Fort Wayne, Indiana and report on a guy who was seen wearing a blue shirt.

Of course, this is CRYSTAL clear proof that the media, and ESPECIALLY "Yahoo News" has a narrative and agenda. If they are so desperate that they're going to write an "article" everytime one of America's 310 million people do something stupid, then they better go and hire a lot more Kristine's. But, this instance of idiocy was racist so we must marshal the media's resources to highlight it and bring it to everybody's attention to remind the country how racist it is (even though we're all largely saying, "he's a douche, so what?")

The real question is who is Kristine Solomon.

Well her profile is what you'd expect.

She has a worthless degree from a worthless college. She's worked in media her entire career, and now she is at Yahoo (Cough cough WHEEZE WHEEZE) "news." She also works at the Huffington Post, though (I'm running out of air quotes here) "works" is debatable because the Huffington Post is availing themselves of the millions of desperate and worthless journalism majors flooding the market and often times not paying them.

Here's what the real news story is.

Online media, in combination with a bunch of brainwashed college graduates from both Gen X and the Millennials, are posing as the magnanimous and noble fourth branch of government. None of these (predominantly girls) wanted to work real jobs or major in real subjects, PLUS they had the added ego of "having to change the world." So instead

