Using her new court ordered authority, Suzanne immediately cut off all contact between Anya and myself. A few days later, I filed my own petition for custody, and she responded, the same day, by filing a family offense petition against me, obtaining a restraining order again based solely on her unverified claims of harassment and reckless endangerment.

Anya and I, missing each other terribly, and still within the same building, struggled to retain some connection. One evening, as I played my harmonica in the common kitchen, my daughter played back her ukulele in the adjoining apartment. Through the closed door, we communicated our love the only way we could without being detected, musically.

After a Family Court hearing, Anya was assigned an attorney by the court and I was given visitation of one hour a week at 7 a.m. on Saturday mornings – visits that were monitored, preemptively treating me as a child abuser.

At this time, I filed several motions in an attempt to keep my connection to my daughter intact. One was to change the temporary sole custody – awarded on the mother's word alone – to shared custody until the final determination.

Family Court denied this commonsense request, stating that for the court's administrative convenience, temporary custody would be awarded to one parent. This expedient due process enabled Suzanne to continue her campaign to break the bonds between myself and my daughter.

Another motion I put in was to restrain Suzanne from taking Anya from the house we shared, a situation that permitted Anya and me at least some physical proximity. That motion was denied as well with the assistance of my child's assigned counsel, who claimed that the order would violate Suzanne's parental rights. Anya's lawyer, who was supposed to advocate for my daughter's wishes, had in fact opposed them and instead advocated for Suzanne.

The court again assisted in Suzanne's imposed estrangement between my daughter and me. Taking full advantage of the court's permission, a few days later, Suzanne moved out, taking Anya to an unknown location and obtaining an order of address confidentiality, against the tearful wishes of my child to remain near me.

Around this time, further utilizing the provisional custody granted her, unbeknownst to me Suzanne brought Anya to the local mental health agency and promptly got her a prescription for an antipsychotic medication to quell her angst and objections. The drug (Geodon) was not approved by the FDA for children or adolescents, was indicated for adult schizophrenics, and is one that causes permanent Parkinsonism in 20% of patients.

Court documents later showed that Suzanne could not control our daughter's temper tantrums. Her own parenting inability set Anya on a path of drug dependency and damaging side effects, taking these actions while excluding me from serious medical decisions about our daughter.

At this point, one of my motions took, and I was "granted" 8 hours of unsupervised visitation with my child on Sundays. During these visits, we took boat-rides, visited zoos and museums, saw movies and went swimming together. To memorialize our wonderful all-too-brief moments together, I was an avid videographer, creating home movies of Anya singing to me, us laughing together, playing with the dog, and our restaurant outings.

Neither I nor my daughter was very happy with only seeing each other 8 hours a week. We had previously been with each other almost all the time, and this artificially constrained time was suffocating and rushed.

We never had any relaxed downtime or enjoyed the nighttime rituals that we'd had together – watching TV, bedtime stories, the cat on the bed, tucking her in, kissing her goodnight before she fell asleep. Although we were very happy to see each other, and did the best we could with the time we had, as the visit progressed toward end-time there was an inchoate anxiety, like the clock ticking toward an execution, and the knowledge that we would be torn apart again until another whole week had elapsed. The visits were thus very happy and joyful, but at the same time stressful and bittersweet. It was emotionally confusing for both of us.

I resolved to try again to get equal parenting time, and filed another petition for increased visitation. When the obligatory month and a half waiting time for a hearing had elapsed, I entered the courthouse with hope in my heart that I would have at least weekend visits with my daughter. Despite all the allegations in court thrown at me by Suzanne, there was no truth to them. There was no legal or factual reason why I should not have equal access to our daughter.

However, I was subjected to a rude surprise.

I presented my argument and facts, the judge took it in, and after I had finished, the judge turned to the opposing side, and with a tone of sheer apology to them, said, "I'm sorry but I don't see why his petition for more time shouldn't be granted. What can I do?"

At that point, both the opposing counsel and my daughter's own attorney argued away at the impropriety of making home movies of my own daughter and the fact that I'd been answering Anya's very natural questions about what was happening to her and why she couldn't see me as we had before – protected speech that was within our civil rights to have.

Then I was handed a motion paper seeking to end my visitation altogether. When I objected that the motion was improperly submitted and never served, the judge ignored me, shouting, "You shall not videotape your child, and you shall NOT discuss this case with your daughter in any way. I will consider terminating your parental rights for this. Respond to this motion in seven days, hearing adjourned."

I did reply to the motion within 7 days as ordered, but was then left waiting months for a court ruling on our hope for weekend visitation that never came. This treatment was one of many that illustrates how, whenever there was a fork in the road for the court to reunite me with my daughter, we were channeled down a path of more alienation, more estrangement, and more disconnection.

Eventually I learned that Suzanne was giving Anya a pill every day, telling our daughter not to tell me. It came out when Anya told me during a visit that she felt terrible. She said she couldn't sleep, was having nightmares, was nauseous, and felt like she sometimes blanked out. She broke my heart when she turned to me and said, "Daddy, please help me. I don't know what to do." I was very concerned, and began to try to find out what pill she was being forced to take.

One afternoon, while Anya was visiting me, she was dancing to disco music. She abruptly stopped, complaining that her heart was beating too fast and was scared. It seemed urgent, so I made a quick decision to discover immediately what my daughter was taking, so as to assess her symptoms. Once she was feeling a little better, we looked up medications on the internet to identify what she was taking. All she remembered was that Mommy had told her the pill would make her "calm and cooperative." Although we were unable to identify the pill, for the rest of the day, I made sure she was not in any distress.

Soon after this event, a neighbor found Anya locked out of her apartment, alone, wandering the parking lot and crying. Suzanne was nowhere to be found. I reported the incident to CPS. They told me a day later that they had investigated it, and found nothing legally significant. However, they informed me that I was now the subject of an investigation on charges of neglect. This was direct retaliation for the call I had made.

The charges they cobbled together and called neglect consisted of: I let my daughter drink sugar-free soda; I took my daughter to McDonald's and let her have McNuggets; I weighed Anya on a bathroom scale; I asked her about the pills she was being given; and that I bought her a Halloween toy with a red liquid in it, which they claimed was an energy drink.

A few days later, I was hauled into court on two hours notice to face charges of child neglect. At that point, what little visitation I had with Anya was truncated. A restraining order, which carried the threat of imprisonment, was issued.

We were now reduced to supervised visits with each other in an austere, concrete room, treated again as if I were a convicted child abuser. My child saw her father body searched by a police officer at the start of each visit, and watched throughout by a CPS officer taking notes on a clipboard on each word we spoke to one another. Anya was also regularly told that they were there to protect her from her father. Helplessly, I watched as my daughter was taught that Daddy was so dangerous, she could only safely see him under the wary gaze of armed guards.

In sum, it was stunning by which the rapidity the system took my daughter away from me, how it was so poised to do so, and with such efficiency. Once the government got involved, not only was I quickly stripped of my child, but Suzanne's position was officially secured as if the trial had already taken place and I was convicted.

During the time I was seeing Anya under CPS supervision, they began taking us to McDonald's for our visits, oblivious to the fact that I was originally charged and chastised for bringing her there. When one Wednesday, they changed the visit date without informing me, and I didn't appear, Anya got very upset. After that, they no longer permitted us to leave the CPS building for visits.

Not seeing an end in sight to this Kafkaesque landscape of control and micromanagement, I hunkered down for the long haul and I was soon confronted with the fruit of all the scrutiny made during my visits with Anya.

I was informed that I could no longer talk to my daughter about our past together, and all the wonderful times and experiences we had shared while she was growing up, and that I was further prohibited from speaking with her about our future together, what we would do when we were reunited, and the good times we would have again when we could regain our relationship.

I was told I could only speak of "the here and now", essentially, only what was in front of us during the visits. I could not speak of her life, her school, her friends, what she did or what places and experiences she had outside of our visits. I was also strictly prohibited from speaking with her about our court case, or strangely enough, conversation about the U.S. Constitution, as they considered that topic too close to talking about the court.

I was told that if I did speak of these things, the visits would end, that I would not see my daughter at all, and that they would charge me again in court with neglect.

Additionally, as further extortion for permission to see my daughter, I was directed into both family and individual therapy. I was forced to undergo both psychiatric and psychological evaluations, and to take a three-month parenting class. I was required to permit CPS workers, unannounced, into my home for ad hoc inspections.

As a carrot, I was assured in court by CPS that once I'd fulfilled all these requirements, they would step out of the case entirely. After I had satisfied all their demands, I chose to continue counsel with the private therapist, who affirmed by letter that my sessions with him were purely elective.

In the next hearing in which I strove to hold CPS to our agreement, my voluntary decision to remain in therapy became CPS's excuse for a complete breach of their commitment to leaving the case, claiming I had not completed therapy. With the approval of the judge, and in violation of the agreement on public record, CPS's oppressive involvement continued, including supervised – indeed, policed — visits with my daughter.

Having done everything the court and CPS had asked of me, only to see every agreement broken, being progressively removed further from my daughter, being told I could not even reminisce with her about our lives together, I concluded the only way to even attempt to get justice was to file a civil rights action in federal court. In December, 2012, I filed a federal lawsuit against CPS, naming my daughter as a co-plaintiff, and charging the agency with violations of my and Anya's civil rights.

A few weeks afterwards, in retaliation, CPS charged me again in court with child neglect, while being supervised, ending my visits with Anya. They suddenly claimed the conversations I had with my 9 year-old daughter about the federal case against them, and our lives together caused her severe emotional distress.

I argued against this charge in yet another Family Court hearing, invoking my constitutional guarantees to free speech and association with my daughter. The judge found that the allegations were sufficient to allow a full-blown neglect proceeding. He disdainfully dismissed all my invoked constitutional privileges, and accepted CPS's unsupported allegation of emotional neglect.

This new neglect action resulted in an additional two more months of reduced visitation than was originally scheduled. However two weeks before the neglect trial was to convene, in July of 2013, CPS dropped all charges against me. Apparently, they recognized they had no case, but achieved keeping me away from my daughter for as long as they could.

Epilogue

My custody case, initiated back on Valentine's Day of 2011, promptly re-ensued upon new petitions filed in April and July 2013.

At that point I actually came through it all legally unscathed, having met, appealed and reversed all charges CPS had levied against me; in the interim Suzanne had been psychologically assessed as having borderline (BPD) tendencies.

But, paradoxically, now that I was not charged or ever found in maltreatment, neglect or abuse, and all restraining orders were lifted with CPS out of our lives, my visits with Anya actually went down to zero.

This occurred because until now, CPS had administered visits between us, ensuring their bare policy minimum of visitation. Now that authority defaulted back to Suzanne, and she made sure that no visitation at all would occur. Whatever harsh administrative role CPS had played in diminishing our visits, at least there had been visits.

Although I brought this inequity to the court's attention, and asked for relief, the judge refused to provide any visitation order, stating that he had no evidence to support an order of visitation, and he would in the meantime continue to credit Suzanne's unproven allegations against me.

Compounding this affirmative inaction, the court scheduled the custody trial's 6 days of hearings so as to be peppered over a period of 7 months, in direct violation of New York Family law statutes that mandate any custody trial must be completed within 90 days.

As of this writing, the court's conduct of the trial has ensured the mother's continued de facto sole custody and estrangement of my daughter from me.

I have been told by my attorney, that these judges had very little incentive to provide visitation where even unfounded allegations were in place.

Denying visitation causes them no risk of legal criticism or sanction, but no judge wants their name to show up in the papers in the rare instance where the allegations may be true. So they all take the pathologically safe path, and ignore any of the pain, and human rights, that such decisions cause the alienated parent and his child.

Anil Kumar · 7 September 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Last week, Indian Men's Human Rights Activists burned effigies of Law Minister Kapil Sibal to protest against the passing of an anti-male no fault divorce law in Upper House of Parliament.

According to this law, a woman can oppose the divorce petition filed by husband on the grounds of grave financial hardship, but a husband has no such rights. This law empowers the courts to give a share of husband's self acquired, inherited and inheritable property to his wife apart from ordering the husband to pay alimony or maintenance. If a property can not be divided, then the husband has to pay the wife an amount equivalent to the share of the property he is ordered to give. Indian MHRAs have little trust in family courts.

According to Transparency International, 36% of India's Judiciary is corrupt. [1] MHRAs feel courts will be filled with property brokers and auction agents once this law is enacted. They also feel men will lose all of their property paying lawyer fees as well as paying additional money to buy peace from false dowry cases filed by wives.

MHRAs from the eastern city of Kolkata gathered together shouting anti-government slogans denouncing the undemocratic, unconstitutional behavior of the Government. According to Article 14 of Indian Constitution, no person must be discriminated on the basis of religion, caste or gender. The provisions in this no fault divorce law clearly violate this article of the constitution.

Most posters in this protest are written in the Bengali Language, the 6th most common language in the world spoken by 2.6% of world's population.

Anya's abusers

Paul Elam · 7 September 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Recently AVFM welcomed Gary Trieste as a new contributor to the site. I wish it had been under better circumstances.

His story left me in tears, even as I was prepping it in the admin for publishing. It is one of the most heartbreaking, outrageous and infuriating stories of family court abuse, including abuses by Children's Protective Services that I have seen.

And I have seen plenty.

It is the story of a father and child bond eviscerated; savaged by the very people entrusted to prevent such damaging abuse. Rather than be what it should have been, the thoughtful restructuring of a broken family, it was a chronology of hubris, arrogance and ghastly depraved indifference, not only by Mr. Trieste's former wife, but by the family court and other state functionaries charged with protecting his child.

There is little I can add to this story in terms of what happened. Mr. Trieste has laid that out courageously for all of us. But the story is not complete without telling you who these people are.

[image]
Amy Greene, just prior to scolding Gary Trieste about healthy nutrition for his daughter.
To begin with, the hostile, officious CPS worker, the obese woman in the purple sweater who held herself up as a nutrition, medication, child psychology and legal expert, all rolled up into one, is Amy Greene of Ulster County Child Protective Services. The other woman is Kelly Whittaker, also of UC CPS.

The judge in case at the time was Marianne O. Mizel, Ulster County Family Court Judge.

Thankfully, Mr. Trieste now has a different family court judge, one we hope works from the bench with more reason, respect for the law and more concern for the well-being for Mr. Trieste's daughter.

The, ahem, mother involved, the one Mr. Trieste asserts is doping his child with powerful psychotropic medications intended for adults, is Suzanne M. Cayley. I note also that Amy Greene as much as confirms that in the video.

I don't have anything further to say about these people, at this time. Their conduct, as outlined in the article by Mr. Treiste, and as amply shown in the video he took of the CPS workers, speaks for itself.

I do want to make it clear that this is a case to which we will be paying a great deal of attention in the future. It is precisely the kind of court tyranny and state sponsored child abuse that typifies the corrupt and abusive nature of our family law system — and that demonstrates the need for organizations like A Voice for Men.

These indignations, so often ignored by an indifferent media, and hidden by the courts' now routine coercion of its victims into silence, must be placed on the public record for examination in all the days that lay ahead.

These bad actors, Judge Mizel, Amy Greene, Kelly Whittaker and the womb donor, Suzanne Cayley, have as much as demanded that the public pay close attention to their actions. If you have any doubts about that, kindly go back and read Mr. Trieste's article and watch that video again.

There is more video on this matter coming, and more articles as our investigation continues. It is a rabbit hole that runs very deep. As much as it is like watching a tragic train wreck, it is a spectacle of injustice from which we must not, in the name of decency, avert our eyes.

Apparently, there's a debate, a discussion if you prefer, within the AVFM's inner circle and MRM circles in general regarding regarding whether a discussion on Femitheist is relevant or not considering her influence.

I must confess that I am still appalled that this discussion takes place to begin with. At the end of the day, there's no difference between the Femitheist business and The Agent Orange files episode. In both cases, some particularly sick individuals advocating mass murder, child abuse, eugenics, genocide and other practices worthy of the Third Reich or the Soviet Union were exposed for the whole world to see what they really think and talk about when they are under the protection of anonymity. So why is this particular case somehow different?

The words of two MRAs that I respect made me write this article. Had it not been for them, I would have dismissed the issue as non-relevant.

One of the two MRAs that I respect told me that Femitheist poses no threat for men whatsoever. But is it really the case? At the moment of writing these words, her Youtube Channel has 11451 subscribers. By comparison, Paul Elam's channel has 9206 subscribers. That's right. The founder of this place, against whom an American national media venue is preparing a hit piece for alleged crimes of eating kittens has LESS influence and less subscribers than the piece of human vermin called Femitheist who, amongst other things, advocated the reduction of male population to negligible dimensions — a goal which she has never abandoned.

According to this woman's own words, she supports a 90:10 female-male ratio and hopes to accomplish this through non-violent means but she does "not endorse achieving this by engaging in any sort of killing, genocide, or any other enactments of violence against anyone."[1] According to her supporters (surprisingly some MRAs amongst them) this statement of hers is supposed to calm me so I no longer despise this piece of human vermin because cute little Femitheist doesn't want to castrate or kill all men (or at least now she says she doesn't want that anymore) – but just happens to hold the same views as other genocidal maniacs of the tormented history of Europe.

At the end of the day, Adolf Hitler didn't always envision concentration camps and mass killings. In 1920, in Salzburg (Austria), the young, dashing and charismatic Adolf was talking only about the eradication of the "Jewish spirit"[2]. Nothing about mass murders that did happen at the end of the day.

In the same period, Vladimir Ilyich Lenin was talking about "peace through socialism and classless society after taking down the bourgeois spirit". Nothing about the Gulags, the NKVD (later on the KGB), the brainwashing through torture experiments like Pitești or Aiud conducted including on children[3]. But these things happened.

Also, more recently, Charles Manson created his own cult of deranged individuals – only this time it was not a Party but a Family – and his creation impressed numerous remarkable people who called this "the whole Charlie Manson package."

What do Charles Manson, Vladimir Lenin and Adolf Hitler have in common? For starters, all three of them were egocentric maniacs. Second of all, none of them killed anybody. Thirdly, all of them are responsible for trying to "change the world" by force whilst practicing the doublespeak of non-violence in their early days. The rest is just a question of nuance and semantics. The tenets are identical.

Is it really far fetched to compare Femitheist with those three? Perhaps it is. But think of it this way: Nobody thought of Lenin in 1914, of Hitler in 1918 or of Manson in 1954 as individuals even remotely dangerous for the society – despite the fact that all three of them had already expressed utopian totalitarian views.

A better example than those three is Nicolae Ceaușescu. The ruthless Romanian dictator even served prison time in his early 20s for spreading Communist agitation and ideas that decades after were to become the tenets of his dictatorship, a dictatorship that was to become the most oppressive in the former Eastern Block which took a quarter of a century to overturn. Ceaușescu also advocated non-violent means to achieve the Socialist paradise. And even now there are some sick individuals who dare to defend him.

How were all these possible? Because as the old say goes, in order for the evil to prevail, it's enough that good men do nothing. Very few (virtually nobody) did anything to stop these maniacs while it was still possible.

After the fall of the Berlin Wall and the fall of the USSR, a significant majority of people declared themselves outraged when very few good men decided to publish all the secret files about all the individuals. The pressure was immense in all the Eastern Block countries. However, good men disregarded the calls for "compassion" and outed the former members of the repressive apparatus. Had it not been for all those good men, the history of the last 25 years in some of the European countries could've been entirely different.

And this brings us back to The Femitheist – an egocentric utopian totalitarian maniac who under the guise of a neotenous face and claims of "non-violence" advocates for nothing less than yet another cleansing of the human population – this time along sex lines, as opposed to religious lines (Hitler), racial lines (Manson) or class lines (Lenin).

And here we are, with a lot of people, including some MRAs, calling us to tone down because "she's not really a danger" or "she hasn't done anything yet". Or, some other people calling "free speech" on what she's advocating – as if AVfM had demanded to shut her up. On the contrary – more free speech to Femitheist, please! And, if possible, with more audience, for the whole world to see the piece of human vermin she is.

Free speech, however, doesn't mean free reign, nor does it mean that her right to free speech trumps the responsibilities that come with it. Just because she has a vagina and an arguably attractive face doesn't mean she's potentially any less dangerous than any other egocentric maniac.

If she really means what she's saying (and I, for one, take her very seriously), then she, and her defenders, shouldn't have any problem with her taking the responsibility for what she's saying.

Let me be more clear: If this piece of human refuse were to be in my community – I'd love to know up front. If she were to be employed in a store from which I buy food, I'd like to know so I can stop buying food from that store until she's either fired or the store goes bankrupt. If she were a teacher in the school where my kids or my nieces are going, I'd love to know that, so I can move them away as soon as possible. Because at the end of the day, not even her defenders would let their own sons to be educated by this individual. At least not as long as they are in their right minds.

Does what I say lack compassion for her? Yes, and I do. Call it my "intolerant nature" if you like. I tend to be highly intolerant with fascists, eugenic maniacs, former members of the Politburo, Communists and other totalitarian-oriented Utopian thinkers. If I had been more tolerant with these kinds of individuals, I'd still be living in hell – so no, thank you.

Another MRA that I respect tried to tell me that she is now redeeming herself and no longer advocates for mass killings. Well, I've seen former torturers in gulags claiming to now be advocating for democracy and/or freedom and at the first sign of trouble came back to their original ideas. So these kinds of attitudes coming from Krista should be treated at the very least with extreme skepticism if not outright dismissed.

Maybe I am too tired for this shit. Maybe I am too much of a grumpy Eastern European to get the nuances of this egocentric, nihilistic psychopath. Maybe. But, at the end of the day, I've seen this film before and each time nobody did anything about it before things went very wrong.

I wish I were wrong but for now it has been the case every single time that human beings learned one thing and one thing only from history: the fact that humans learn absolutely nothing from history.

Saudi Arabia bans (some) domestic abuse

NCFM · 7 September 2013 · Archived copy · Original

[box]
Saudi Arabia's Council of Minister's just outlawed domestic violence at home and in the workplace, that is domestic violence against women. What's missing? Apparently there are no abused men in Saudi Arabia? Not even one man abused by a woman? Wow! Who knew? That's about to change dramatically. The Saudi's just gave women the unrestricted license to abuse men, like they've done in completely Westernized countries, as in America. The Council of Ministers have no idea what they've done, though some will live to regret it. All they had to do was make the law gender inclusive, recognize that relationship violence is not gender specific, and extend protections to their entire population making it illegal for anyone to abuse anyone else. Unfortunately, inevitable reforms will favor women with ever-expanding man hating bureaucracies staffed by man-haters and female behavior apologists, just like they've done in completely Westernized countries, as in America. Eunuchs and Princesses, the fabled land…just like America

Who let the dox out?

Diana Davison · 8 September 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Doxing is an internet term with an evil overtone that covers a variety of events from having just your name and location revealed to having your banking information, credit cards and social security number posted online. Anonymity is part of the appeal of the internet and being doxed is perceived as victimization whereas in many cases it is more accurately the cyber equivalent of a citizen's arrest. While it can happen to anyone it mostly happens to certain types of people: Public figures.

A public figure is defined as "anyone who has gained prominence in the community as a result of his or her name or exploits, whether willingly or unwillingly" and, as such, has lost privacy, being "only protected by knowledge of falsity or reckless disregard for the truth by anyone writing about them." Outside of provable intentional misrepresentation of facts, a public figure has no recourse.

When discussing individuals rights we can't eliminate those which aren't convenient at the time – we must look at all the rights as a unified body. Censorship on the internet is actually a more important issue than anonymity and one that carries more weighted concern. There is good reason for that.

While freedom of speech is the right that most internet users scream about, they decry freedom of the press, which grants other users the right to react and discuss your speech. Having the right to an opinion does not make your opinion right. While people are perfectly correct that they can go online and make videos or write opinions as they see fit, they must also accept that others have the right to disagree or take offence.

You don't have to break a law to get doxed, you just have to do or say something interesting.

The more videos you post and the more opinions you express, the larger the body of work, and then the more likelihood you qualify as a public figure. This is not up for debate. People need to understand that the internet is not some private "Dear Diary" with a key to the lock hidden in your underwear drawer. Your underpants are strewn about the internet on a laundry line stretching from Facebook all the way back to a random comment you made on a news article ten years ago. Not everyone uses bleach.

The right to anonymity is only a protection against government demands for private information from servers, it does not protect you from other private citizens investigating and discovering your identity when they follow the laundry line.

According to police, "private info is legal as long as not used to threaten, steal identity, or access private emails." It's not enough to feel threatened, because that's subjective, the threat has to be specific and show real malice or intention of violence. In most cases of internet doxing, the "victim" is actually only the "victim" of their own words.

If someone posted my name and address after I said something innocuous nobody, including myself, would care. The main threat to having your name doxed is when you've said something that can get you fired. If you are worried about getting fired for what you are about to type, don't type it. This is a concern for most members of the MHRM as what we do and say here is considered hate speech by many.

In a movement that needs to expand and grow, it would beneficial to assure people that they will never be doxed but it's a promise no one can make. Paul Elam has assured members that he will go to jail before handing over IP addresses or private information on members to police or government. The privacy laws actually do protect individual sites but no single site can hide your dirty laundry if you've pegged it all over the internet.

The platform for free speech online, whether you blog or post videos or create a profile on any type of social media site, needs to be approached with a healthy, realistic perspective. Every time the "upload" or "publish" button is clicked it becomes part of the worldwide press. It stops being private information and becomes public material unless you set the information as private. Make sure you use bleach if you don't want to get attention.

Most people writing or vlogging are doing so to make a public statement. If anonymity is crucial then the publisher should avoid saying anything important, offensive, or funny enough to go viral. The tough part is that we can't always know what is going to go viral. Make no mistake, every time you post something online you take a risk of becoming a limited public figure.

A basic guideline to consider is that those who have 'thrust themselves to the forefront of particular public controversies in order to influence the resolution of the issues involved" are making themselves public figures. We need more public figures in the MHRM who are willing to use their real names, who are willing to show their faces on youtube videos and show that we are serious. We can not be dismissed as cowards. We are not just throwing stones then running to hide behind a bush.

Not everyone is ready to publish their own names and it's a serious decision to make. You have to think it through and make an informed choice. If you are not ready, don't do it. Some will decide to never do it, which is an equally dignified decision. If you are not prepared to be recognized, don't put your face on youtube. If and when you are ready, you're still going to struggle when you get negative attention so have your tools prepared and your Stuart Smalley videos preloaded.

One of the hottest topics of contention on AVfM involves doxing. The publishing of personal information about foes of the MHRM reminds members that it can happen to them too.

John Hembling's article about Krista Milburn received over 650 comments in three days. There were differing reasons given by those who objected to the doxing but the fact remains that Krista published a body of work which she acknowledges is aggressive, has resulted in many followers, and prescribes a social change to the world we all share. She made choices which garnered her the exact type of attention she sought: to be a cult leader. In her reply on that article, she claimed to be receiving unwanted attention but bragged about how many followers she has and clarified her intentions with information that she is writing a book. Krista Milburn is a public figure.

AVfM is regularly criticized, from within and without, for maintaining a site called register-her.com which is a wiki site that lists and identifies women found guilty of specific types of crimes. The only ambiguous category on the wiki is bigot, which the site defines as "used to designate individuals whose active ideology is one that results in socially inflicted harm on men and/or boys in the general population." All of the information on register-her.com was acquired using legal methods of search.

The list of bigots includes celebrities, lobbyists, mainstream writers/bloggers, and visible activists. It caused a stir when young feminist protestors were added to the list after attending a protest against a seminar about men's issues. These women chose to go in public and make statements and accusations in front of cameras without shielding their faces and in a manner that intended to garner public attention. As a result they became public figures.

In general, the feminists that are doxed by AVfM are women who make a living, or seek to make a living, by promoting hatred, intolerance, injustice, or violence against men and boys. Having their real names published for this behaviour, whether they've chosen to or not, does not interfere with their lives because women don't get fired for saying that men are evil. Members of the MHRM do not have the same luxury. The criticism against doxing feminists is that they might be stalked or threatened as a result. That is also a risk they take whenever they post online.

There has been a lot of recent mainstream media hype over the perceived threats received by women who use the internet. It's not just women who receive this type of harassment. The internet is loved for its lack of regulation but is hated for the results of that same freedom. The pros and cons can be weighed by each individual who chooses to use this platform of free speech. "Be nice" is not yet a law.

For MHRAs, just being a member of an organization or activist group does not make you a public figure. As the membership grows so does the movement and all of you are valuable whether you get on a soapbox and make speeches or just applaud from the corner of the room. The more people we have who are willing to take that risk and become a public figure the faster we will see results but it is never advisable to do something foolish. Match your level of activism to the level of exposure you are willing to risk.

And stop feeling sorry for these stupid twits who think they can hide behind tears when someone holds them responsible for their actions.

Matty appeal dead on arrival

Men's Rights Edmonton · 8 September 2013 · Archived copy · Original

In June of this year, Men's Rights Edmonton, GirlWritesWhat, A Voice for Men Radio and Tom Matty reached out to the public and the men's rights community to help fund an appeal which, if successful, would get the high court of Canada to consider gender bias in the lower court. This was to be the first step in a sequence of actions aimed at correcting our broken family courts.

The elements of the original case were simple. Essentially, Matty and his former life partner, a citizen of Thailand, had previously started a relationship and had three children. Upon their breakup he was awarded visitation and ordered to pay child support. She returned to Thailand with children against his wishes and he tried to get them back to Canada.

The Canadian Court said, 'Screw you, Tom.'

Like many exploited fathers. Matty ended up with financial problems. He returned to the courts, saying, essentially, "Look, it's cheap to live in Thailand. With what you are awarding her she is living like a queen over there while I'm barely scraping by. Can you lower the payments?"

The Canadian Court said, 'Screw you, Tom.'

So, the mother absconds with Matty's children, moves to another country, robbing them of a relationship with their father, to live a much better life on the exchange rate between Canadian and Thai currency. All at Matty's expense, while he is relegated to life in poverty.

He appealed the courts decision, citing the systematic gender based bias in favor of the mother.

'Screw you, Tom,' came the reply.[1]

That appeal, on which we pinned so much hope, was killed on Tuesday with one swift blow from a Canadian court. Actually, it would be more accurate to say this appeal was dead prior to arrival. The opposition (a cabal of about 6 feminists representing Tom's abusive ex-) didn't even have to make their case. What looked like an open and shut decision was chivalrously waved away with the magic wand of "judicial discretion."

The judges presiding over this appeal gave a couple ridiculous token "arguments" to justify why these rulings were made, and then took ten minutes to unanimously agreed that they would read from a pre-written decision to strike down the claim of bias in the lower courts. They actually demonstrated more gender bias in this court room than anything Matty had seen before.

Possibly the strongest argument we had going into this, was the clear evidence of bias, not just against Tom, but against all men in similar circumstances. Canadian courts repeatedly favor women's interests over the interests of children as well as men, and rule against what is obviously fair and just. In this case it was the destruction of the children's relationship with their father, something known to be highly deleterious to the well-being of children.

The appeal argued that even though one biased decision is not evidence of malpractice, a series of clearly slanted rulings, in spite of evidence a "reasonable person" would consider to be valid, is clearly demonstrable bias. The court dismissed this argument on the grounds that over a period of a few days, as a judge is hearing both sides of a case, it is only natural that they would start to lean towards one side over the other and rule in their favor.

This does absolutely nothing to address the fact that these judges chronically and systematically lean to one sex over the other. What the court said, in essence, is that reasonable judges listen to the evidence and consistently conclude the man is wrong, the woman is right, that the man must be sheared and that children do not need their fathers. It's "only natural."

Judges are supposed to rule based on evidence, according to the law, and in the best interests of children. On that note, the court failed at every opportunity, and did so because of a gender bias against men. They repeatedly blocked evidence from Matty's side which proved: 1) his ex was actually the perpetrator of abuse and therefore should not be granted sole guardianship of underage children, 2) these kids were better off staying in Canada as opposed to being forcefully moved to Thailand, and 3) that Tom's ex (who is not even a citizen of Canada) is not entitled to the taxpayer funded legal aid that was funding her side of this dispute.

There were many other infuriating and despicable aspects of this appeal, but Matty will tell you about them himself via some footage taken yesterday evening, which will be available after processing.

To the MRM community:

As frustrating as this is, we refuse to throw in the towel. If anything, we're more motivated than ever to fight this insanity. We thank you all for chipping in to help and we hope we can count on your support again in the future. We wanted very much to report good news to you all, that together we had effected real substantive changes and struck a serious blow to feminist governance. But I'm afraid we just aren't able to do that. Not this time around anyway. But, let us not forget that we managed to rally together and produce an amazing amount of money in a very short period of time We showed up and give this thing a shot, and we learned a great deal from the experience.

If we can continue to cooperate together in these ways, this movement will see major victories. It is inescapable.

To the feminists who might be reading:

You might think your side has "won" here, but in truth, you haven't won anything. In fact nobody has; there are only losers in this result. Most notably, the children. All that establishment feminism has managed to accomplish here is to keep children out of the arms of a loving father. They have been placed in the custody of an abusive, negligent, and violent woman. Even if you do not accept that assessment of the mother, there is no dispute that the absence of their father places them at higher risk for a multitude of life problems, ranging from drug abuse, to suicide, school failure, teen pregnancy, truancy, delinquency, depression and criminality.

That is what we call a feminist victory.

If you think we're going to take this thing in stride and disappear quietly you can think again. We're just getting warmed up. We are part of a growing army of activists who are fed up with your ideas of victory and we are coming to Fuck Your Shit Up™. The feminist stranglehold on our society, on our families and our children will not stand.

[1]Matty Appeal Decision

The pinnacle of male disposability

Jon Gunnarsson · 8 September 2013 · Archived copy · Original

As the United States seem poised to engage in yet another war, we would do well to remember that contrary to what Hillary Clinton may want you to believe, men have always been the primary victims of war. The entire enterprise of war can summed up like this: men from one country are sent to kill or be killed by the men of another country. It is difficult to come up with anything that is more anti-male than war.

War is an especially severe restriction of the rights of men if it is fought with conscripts, i.e. men forced under threat of imprisonment or execution to join the army. But even those men who join voluntarily, often do so not because it is in their calmly evaluated best interest, but because they were misled by ubiquitous patriotic propaganda or because they were shamed into enlisting by a prevailing societal notion that it is every man's duty to "defend his country." Arguably the best example of the latter is the Order of the White Feather, an organization in Britain during the First World War which shamed men into enlisting by having women hand them white feathers, a symbol of cowardice[1].

And while we should undoubtedly have the most compassion for those men forced to fight by oppressive orders of their government, those merely pressured into becoming soldiers are also victims of war. Growing up in a culture of patriotism and nationalism, going to a government school in which the virtues of the particular nation are extolled, and being surrounded by media which mostly support the nation and her current system of government, it is no wonder so many men are willing to go to war.

The idea that men should sacrifice themselves for the good of the nation, to protect women and children, to protect freedom, to safeguard national interests, or to make the world safe for democracy, are deeply rooted in the culture of most nations, especially the more war-like ones. War is the ultimate example of male disposability. Soldiers cease to be people. In the minds of rulers and generals, they are no longer human beings with desires, hopes and dreams, but merely resources to be employed to achieve strategical and tactical aims. Instead of soldiers' lives being ends in themselves, they are means to achieve the ends of the rulers and generals. They have value only insofar as they are useful to what the rulers see as national interests.

This de-humanization can be seen most readily in how military and civilian casualties are perceived. While the death of civilians is seen as tragic and unjust, the death of soldiers is normalized. The very purpose of soldiers is to kill or be killed. And while the killed soldiers of the victorious nation are honored and proclaimed to be heroes, this does not diminish their disposability in any way. On the contrary, their death is praised as heroic, rather than being lamented as tragic. By this, more men are encouraged to risk death in service of their nation.

There is no good reason to consider the death of a conscripted soldier as any less tragic than that of a civilian. Both are innocent and have no share in the blame for the war. They are the victims of circumstances beyond their control. A professional soldier who understands the risks involved and still signs up is a different scenario. He may be influenced by propaganda and societal opinion, but in the end he has still made the choice of enlisting and thus risking his life. A case can be made that therefore, his death is less tragic than that of the innocent civilian. Still, he remains a human being and as such deserves our empathy, especially if he is defending his country instead of participating in the invasion of another.

Wherever wars are fought, the government tries very hard to steer public opinion through propaganda. A nation intent on invading a neighbouring country never comes out and plainly states its intentions of conquest and plunder. There is always some pretext. Austria-Hungary justified the First World War with the assassination of her crown prince Franz Ferdinand and the claim that Serbia wasn't being cooperative enough in the investigation of the murder[2]. The United States and the United Kingdom justified their invasion of Iraq with the claim that Saddam Hussein was stockpiling weapons of mass destruction. Even Hitler didn't just invade Poland without any pretence, but instead sent German soldiers disguised in Polish uniforms to raid a German radio post[3]. Thus, he could claim to merely strike back at Poland.

All of these excuses sound rather flimsy in retrospect, but those men at the time who were caught up in state propaganda didn't have the benefit of hind-sight and lacked unbiased information. We should not judge too harshly those men who believed the lies told by their by their governments and who voluntarily signed up to participate in these wars of conquest.

The motto of A Voice for Men is "Compassion for boys and men." The very minimum requirement of compassion is not to kill men who—to the best of one's knowledge—haven't done anything to deserve it. Regarding a man as unworthy of life merely for being born in a country that happens to be at war with one's own country is the very opposite of compassion. It is cruel, callous indifference, but this is precisely what is required of a soldier. This is another feature of military disposability.

While a friendly soldier is a resource to be used, an enemy soldier is a threat that must be neutralized. Enemy soldiers, too, are de-humanized. They are not seen as people with thoughts, feelings, and desires, but merely faceless villains against whom any violence is permissible. They are not to be negotiated or compromised with. They are merely to be killed, to be put down like rabid dogs.

Those who have compassion for their fellow men and see them as brothers rather than as dangerous beasts must reject any but the most unavoidable war. Only in an extremity of self-defence can it be justified to de-humanize men in this fashion and to pit them against one another in a deadly struggle.

As advocates for men, we should do what we can to promote peace. War brings out the worst in men, so we should try to stay out of it as far as possible. The military is a supremely anti-male organization and those who value the lives and the happiness of men everywhere should not join it and should advise their friends and family to stay away from it. If we cannot prevent war altogether, we should at least not participate in it ourselves.

It's difficult enough to get the general public to pay attention to men's issues during times of peace. When war prevails, there is no hope of that at all. While men who refuse to sacrifice their own health and well-being for women, for children, or for society are looked at as unmanly losers in peace time, they are branded cowards and traitors in times of war.

In times of crisis it is always men who are expected to step up to the challenge and endure hardship and danger so that women and children can be safer. If there is any hope of ending or at least significantly reducing male disposability and of bringing about widespread compassion for men and boys, it must start with a rejection of war. Only in a state of peace and prosperity will our voices have a chance to be heard.

Caring About University Men
Why We Need Campus Men's Centres in a Time of Crisis

Friday, September 27, 2013, 7:00PM

Sandford Fleming Building, Room 1101
10 King's College Road
Located at the University of Toronto

This year about 35% of university students in developed countries will be male. If the statistically projected steep rate of decline continues, the last bachelor's degree earned by a male will be awarded around 2025. Although that is not likely to happen, the situation for males on campuses everywhere is precarious, yet only a few faculty and administrators are responding to the reality. What is that reality? What is it like to be a young man 18-21 living and studying at university? How did matters come to be as they are? What is being done to care for young men in the current situation?

Dr. Miles Groth, editor of New Male Studies: An International Journal and founder of College and University Centers for Men will discuss why attention is being turned to young men at university and why they need our concern and care. Dr. Groth, an adviser for CAFE, is the author of Engaging College Men: Discovering What Works and numerous articles on the well-being of boys and men. He has addressed this topic in Australia, Canada and the States.

Publisher's note: It is our understanding that there will be a larger than usual contingent of Canadian MHRAs attending this very important event. Given that, and the tendency of gender ideologues to disrupt these lectures, including vandalizing posters that promote them, we have acquired a .pdf of the poster advertising the event. Feel free to print and place it wherever you may find that they have been removed or defaced. PE

Jason Thibeault: rules for thee not he

Jason Thibeault, The Lousy Canuck of FreeThoughtBlogs Rebuts our Article (Where he Outs Himself as a Rapist by Feminist Standards)

Watch how a feminist takes aim straight at his foot, repeatedly – and also confesses that he might have made up a false rape accusation. Plus his wondrous defense of injustice (only for men, mind you) – And a big bonus at the end you must read to believe.

Trigger Warning: More Truth

Jason now treated us to Part 2 of his serialized rebuttal of our article. We couldn't have asked for a more wonderful vindication of what our article stated.

http://freethoughtblogs.com/lousycanuck/2013/09/01/a-voice-for-men-willing-to-publish-libel-to-prove-points-about-fake-rape-claims-part-2-logic-and-language/

One piece of advice, Jason: Quit while you are behind, before you are totally lost.

Our original article can be found here.

Jason's first rebuttal had nothing to do with our article. It's a long convoluted arithmetical tour-de-force, based on assumptions, which (as far as I can see) tries to prove that the number of false rape claims approaches zero.

http://freethoughtblogs.com/lousycanuck/2013/08/30/a-voice-for-men-willing-to-publish-libel-to-prove-points-about-fake-rape-claims-part-1-math/

Now, even a charitable reading undermines his claim that HIS story of a false rape claim is true. It underlines what our article states: Jason apparently leads a charmed life. He's that extremely rare bird who had a false rape claim and miraculously could disprove it with ease. Other people's lives (like Shermer's) are not that charmed.

However, in the 2nd installment of his rebuttal he tries to summarize – and there he shows his real colors:

Far from calling for ways in which men AND women could address the problem, he clearly states that he is perfectly happy if 10 percent of men convicted of rape are innocent. This is jaw-dropping in its moral bankruptcy. It spits on everything the Free World stands for.

Needless to say, the privileged Hausfrauen (or rather Hauspersonen) on FreeThoughtBlogs immediately jumped to Jason's defense, apparently without reading our piece. But, there is deafening silence from the one who should be most interested – the Ueberhausfrau (arm, -person) PZ Myers, their Great Mother Hen. Where's his mighty mop with which he is wont to scour the world of accused rapists? I'm sure he read our piece closely. I'm sure he is very well aware of the mountain of hard evidence in our piece (all based solely on the very words of Jason Thibeault/Lousy Canuck) – while he (PZ) himself has only innuendo and second hand gossip. So far, all PZ could prove about Michael Shermer was that he filled a wineglass. So, PZ, when will we see your potent broom – or has it somehow shrunk, like a certain piece of anatomy, in the face of withering feminist support for Jason?

Sorry, I lied in the last paragraph. Jason tells us an even more heinous crime by Shermer I didn't even know about. I'm not making this up. In Jason's own words:

> ". . . a number of people have even allegedly woken up the morning after to find a copy of Shermer's book, signed, on their night tables."

Now, what are alleged books on alleged night tables proof of? Might it be r-e-a-d-i-n-g?

Most people identified our piece as satire. So did I when I was approached by a friend of my friend outlining the basic ideas. I'm not sure any more if it is satire. When I saw the mountain of clear evidence based solely on Jason's own words at FTB the matter became quite convincing. Particularly the argument based on the different life consequences for the girl and him cannot be lightly dismissed. Why was he believed and the girl disbelieved, especially when, in his second post, he expressly shits on the credibility of the kind of people he uses as witnesses?

Why is he objectifying, shaming and erasing a woman who may have acted out of great anguish (assuming it was a false accusation)? Why would he not even listen to her even when he himself mentions mitigating circumstances for her? Where is his humanity? – But then again, where is his humanity regarding the 10 percent of men innocently convicted of rape?

At that point I saw it as my "ethical" duty to warn others.

Clearly Jason has no clue what our piece was talking about when legal proceedings were discussed. Jason even quotes both our paragraphs. Two legal systems are contrasted – the criminal court and a university disciplinary hearing. The picture drawn of both is fair. In criminal court, cases do depend on evidence and a jury and the judge is not necessarily a feminist. However, the article pointed out what kind of evidence is NOT permitted in a criminal court. It clearly would have helped to convict Jason. Likewise in a University hearing. The article clearly states what is allowed there and who makes the decisions. "Preponderance of evidence" is the standard here. You bet those administrators are steeped in feminist theory! University hearings don't result in criminal convictions – they merely destroy your life. The picture painted is true to life. Jason wouldn't have a prayer.

Jason confuses it all and drags in Law and Order episodes. Yes, I've never seen a single full episode of that putrid show. If Jason thinks that's how the real world works he has a bigger problem than I thought. Even feminist superdreadnaught Stefanie Zvan (in the comments) offers to enlighten him about his misconceptions. How embarrassing.

Jason now may say that he only told fibs for that girl. However, his own words say "I became an adept liar . . ."

BTW, Nobody is asking for the name of that girl.

It does not help Jason that he now says we could assume his whole story was made up. Indeed, in feminist eyes that would make it worse. Can you imagine the fallout? A feminist INVENTING a FALSE rape accusation? You better shut up, Jason, while you are only behind. Surely in feminist eyes the one thing worse than a man who can prove a false rape accusation is a man who makes up a false rape accusation. HA!

In fact, Jason comes pretty close to admitting that the whole screwdriver (and rape) story was made up (by Jason himself):

"""Absolutely possible that she misjudged stabbing me. Absolutely possible that I healed without a scar.

Also absolutely possible that she didn't stab me at all.

Additionally, since that detail was relayed to me through a third party, it's also possible that she never claimed this as part of her rape claims. This is something I did not cover, because I assumed that the person relaying it relayed what most of the other folks in my school had heard."""

Also, Jason, we certainly do NOT assume you are an unreliable narrator. On the contrary, we assume that every single word in your original narrative is true and exactly what you meant to state.

Also, Jason, our argument is not that your story proves that all women lie about rape all the time – on the contrary, we merely suspect that ONE MAN lied about a rape THIS time – and also disclosed the evidence for coming to that conclusion, by feminist standards.

Next: Our article stated "It's quite clear that Jason did most of the eroding . . . [of trust in her]" Jason answers:

"Nope. That's not clear at all by what I wrote, and I should know, as I wrote it. And I experienced all the bits I didn't write, so I think I have the advantage here. I didn't elaborate much on it, but I have now . . ."

Nope, Jason, YOU have the disadvantage, and you just made it worse. As a skeptic it should be blindingly clear to you that later embroideries (as with Bible stories) make a story LESS credible. I'm sorry, but we have to go with the original text.

There is a long section for which Jason really better should have kept quiet since again, in his own words, he confirms that the central arguments of our article fully hold water.

There is a lot more embroidery that asserts now that his original words didn't quite mean what they said. There is also the idea again that he could have made it all up – naively assuming that that wouldn't be worse.

Here are some highlights of Jason aiming straight at his foot:

To our question, "Why did HIS lies not ruin HIS reputation?" he answers, "Possibly because of patriarchy . . ." No kidding! That was exactly our point. The kind of menz that believed you were exactly the kind of men that would (according to your own statement) have believed you even if you had had a gaping wound in your chest. Remember your remark that "those" men will disbelieve even visual evidence when it suits their agenda?

And, surprise, surprise, suddenly, right out of the woodwork, there tumble people who didn't believe Jason even back then. "Most" people disbelieved her, he says – How many DID believe her? And why? In light of the "patriarchy" consideration, that is quite an admission!

After mentioning that we accused him of callousness, he asks why we are so callous? Well, here is my short answer: You, Jason, and your ilk on FTB have forfeited any right to ask for pity. For years your blog has enabled the vilest feminist princesses to get up in the morning and spew their venom. YOU have brought immeasurable pain to untold numbers of boys, girls, men and women. All in the name of a few hateful hornets in your ever-decreasing echo chamber. Look at the Internet at large (if you dare) and see the condemnation heaped almost unanimously on your crimes – and yes, crimes they are. Crimes against humanity.

Your whole rebuttal of our article is one big whining yammer fest. "Oh look what they are doing to poor Jason!" If this came from the other side you would be the first to rush into print with taunts of "mansplaining" and "privilege" and all the rest of the bile at your disposal. Shut up and learn to listen! Maybe you will become a man yet.

And now, as promised, here comes the bonus:

Jason links to one more of his own FTB posts. Oh, Jason, you really should have shut up for your own good!

It contains a further rape accusation made by some woman against Jason. It's hearsay, and Jason denies it, of course. But that is not the bonus. It's in the comments 1 and 4.

As the first commenter PZ Myers (!) chimes in with his own tale. He, too was falsely accused of rape. And then he says:

"I took it very seriously and moved quickly to provide evidence that it was false."

I bet he could. A rich, white, privileged Prof like Meyers surely can move quickly to shut up some woman. You brought it up, PZ, you own the remark, what were the details? Is your proof as "iron-clad" as Jason's? Feminist minds need to know. Let's have the details. Let the Internet judge you, like you want it to judge Shermer.

But that's not all. A mere 3 comments below another staunch defender of feminism (Axelblaster) pipes up with yet another story of a false rape accusation. This one, he says, easily disproved by an "air tight alibi."

There are two things very wrong here. First the smaller of the stinking fish:

Apparently, all these three horsemen of the feminist apocalypse had charmed lives. It looks like all false rape accusations are a cinch to disprove. So never fear, men, even if it happens, you will be fine and safe.

PZ, isn't there a corner in your estrogen-soaked soul where you could concede that men have a hard time proving their innocence? That lots of them get falsely convicted? After all, it is YOU, yes, YOU who tirelessly whine that women can't make their cases heard? Wouldn't men have it much harder?

But this is the big stinking rotting whale:

Think about it – within a few hundred words 3 ueber-feminists converge to tell the same tale of false rape accusation parried with perfect counter evidence. How incredibly, mind-blowingly unlikely is that? A+ keeps whining about ordinary evidence. Now, this is extraordinary evidence of cosmic proportion. I'll leave it to Jason's superior math skills to figure out just how astronomical the odds against this are.

Let me spell it out. There are these three guys who stridently argue that false rape accusations don't happen, that men are putrid filth and that women must always be believed. But all three apparently lead charmed lives. They all tell about that ONE absolutely, definitely, never-happening-to-ordinary-people, event – a false rape accusation. Jason even had 2. That makes four false rape accusations within the space of a blog entry and 4 comments. And that's not where the coincidences end. Each of the accusations could be disproved by "iron-clad" evidence. These people must lead the most blessed lives ever. No Sir, no ordinary fate for them, nothing like a Michael Shermer.

But this incredibly unlikely convergence leaves the three on the horns of an awful dilemma: Either it is true that those were false accusations, in which case they themselves are the best proof positive that false rape accusations must be quite common – or those were NOT false rape accusations, and that makes one or more of them – RAPISTS.

I know what my money is on . . .

Chanty! No, no, not that one!

Paul Elam · 9 September 2013 · Archived copy · Original

I swear if I read one more outraged "report" — aka feverish, paranoid rant — that twists something stupid into "evidence" of a "rape culture," I am going to just lose it. I know, the use of scare quotes three times one sentence is excessive, but we are dealing with feminism here, which is all about "equality," and "gender justice," and "fairness to women."

There, I did it twice. I could do it again, but I would have to charge you.

The latest bit of hyper-hipster-hysteria surrounds some business students at the University of British Columbia who made a chant that leaned a little too far to the rapey side for ideologues to pass it up as an imminent threat to women everywhere.

A student reportedly tweeted the chant right into the interwebs – mind you with not so much as a trigger warning. It went like this:

> "Y-O-U-N-G at UBC, we like 'em young," and went on to talk about underage sisters, sex and lack of consent."

Oh, the horror.

Of course, a massive investigation by the school's Dean has been ordered. Some frosh chair heads are rolling – the sex of said heads are unknown at this time. Professors and students alike, right on cue, are forming huggy-feely groups and wailing for effect.

A quick, decisive statement from the president and vice president of the Commerce society was fired off like a Mike Tyson right cross, even as the ooos and ahhs and lordy-mercys continued to echo down the now shaken hallways of academe.

> "[T]he society will take "all feasible steps" to eradicate unacceptable behavior,"

Amid the promise to eradicate offensive chants and other unacceptable behaviors there was even a condemnation from a female Ph.D. student who alleges she was the victim of a rape. It was not clear, however, if she had ever fallen victim to an unacceptable chant.

So far, "chant rape" does not do much on a Google search, but the story just broke recently and it may be a while before the newly discovered form of rape can be written about, coined and inserted into your nearest gender studies text with statistics from Mary Koss.

These things take time. Sometimes a whole week.

Don't worry. The pro female violence website Jezebel.com is on the case. In their coverage, "'Pro-Rape' Chant at Canadian Universities Sparks Alarm," they inform us that "The chant…has been gaining momentum in Canadian media outlets." By that they mean that other gender opportunists are twisting a college stunt into plague of rapeyness threatening to violate 4 out of 3 college women any day now. They also offer their opinion that the fact that the chant has been passed down for years is "chilling."

Where's my sweater?

The Vancouver Sun reported that Steven Galloway, an associate professor and acting chair of the creative writing department, declared that the chant caused "[H]orror and outrage among staff, faculty and students."

Well, if there was not any horror and outrage over these silly college antics for the years leading up to the current orgy of feigned indignation, there certainly will be by next weekend. These complete fucking idiots will make sure of it.

The students of both sexes doing the chanting will pay for it, too. Well, at least the ones with a penis, as I am sure we will see it postulated that the bearers of vaginas were under patriarchal control. Maybe “Chanted Student Syndrome.”

Seriously, though, this “event” and the histrionics around it are bullshit. I am an older guy. I find it interesting, given that I came from a more “patriarchal” generation, that something like this when I was 18 would have been unthinkable. Why? Because other men, especially older ones, would have pulled those young people aside and said, “Hey, we don’t do that around here.” That would have been that, as they say, if it had even happened in the first place.

We can thank feminists for this. Through policy and governance they have eroded positive male role models, and male authority, right out of the culture. After feminist undermining of the family, removing fathers from the lives of children and demonizing male heroes, we have a population of young people, especially young men, growing more socially feral with each new generation.

And now what do we see? Feminists running around everywhere telling men they need to tell each other, “Don’t rape. Don’t abuse women. Don’t this. Don’t that.” We can add a new campaign coming to institutions of higher learning near you. “Only men can stop chanting.” They will have “Chantwalks” and special ribbons and “Chant a chant with her voice.” People will forget that the chanting was done by both young men and young women, and it will be laid, as with everything else real and imagined, at the feet of men.

Then they will take the same course with this non-problem that academic feminists prescribe for every other over-inflated and concocted malady that they claim disproportionately affects women. They will encourage men to do battle with each other for their protection. They will tell men it is their responsibility to tell other men not to be rapey, beaty or chanty.

They will try to shame men into giving each other the exact same messages men always gave each other before feminists spent 50 years savaging masculinity; before feminism created a culture of men that doesn’t give a damn what happens to women.

Well, guess what? It is too late now. We are not squeezing that toothpaste back into the tube. Write all the agenda laden spin pieces you want. Start another stupid campaign. Call in the high profile white knights; Michael Kimmel, Michael Flood, Chris Kilmartin, even Hugo Schwyzer if he is not in detox or too busy sexting. Have a round table and review their obligatory funding requests. It will do you no good.

You can’t assault the identity of half the human race, marginalize and disempower them, which is exactly what feminism has done, and expect anything in return but what you are getting.

Looks good on ya.

Lucian Vâlsan · 10 September 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Aminata Touré has been appointed as the new Prime Minister of the francophone African republic – Senegal. Macky Sall, the president of the republic (who defeated the 10 year incumbent president, Abdoulaye Wade, in the elections held in March) sacked the former prime minister, Abdoul Mbaye, and appointed Aminata Touré, age 51, to "ensure greater efficiency in the government," according to the presidential spokesman Abou Abel Thiam[1][2].

She is known in African political circles and beyond as an "Iron Lady" because of her tough stances on issues of governmental corruption and the rule of law as well as her actions and decisions as Minister of Justice (a position she held prior to being appointed Prime Minister). See trial of the former Chadian leader, Hissene Habre[3][4].

Touré is also known for three other attributes: she is a football (soccer) fan and former player, a Marxist and a gender feminist.

While in university, Touré worked with the Communist Workers' League of Senegal, a Trotskyist (orthodox Marxist[5]) political party formed in mid 1970s[6] which advocates for strict Marxism-Leninism and looks kindly on the Bolshevik revolution.

After graduating, she took the words of Leon Trotsky[7] and tried to put them into practice. She engaged in "gender activism" in her country and the neighboring ones and she ended up at the United Nations Population Fund (UNFPA) where she was chief of the gender, human rights and culture branch[8]. At UNFPA she was credited by other gender ideologues for her work on the concept of "gender mainstreaming"[9] which is essentially the modern term for what Leon Trotsky advocated back in the days of the USSR – namely let's change everything because (insert Marxist argument here) and let's conduct that change while viewing everything through the eyes of women[10].

Also, during her work for UNFPA she also worked for further dehumanization and demonization of men in the eyes of the UN and the thousands of NGOs that gravitate around this international body. One of her most remarkable considerations with regards to the humanity of men came in the context of migration with men going in other places to find work and send money home to support the family and it goes like this[11]:

> While women at home may need to rely on remittances from males, they may also experience increased autonomy in directing the household. However, women's burden at home may also increase. For example, as a result of soil erosion in the Tambacounda region of Senegal, 90 per cent of men have migrated at least once, leaving many women and children to rehabilitate the land and produce food with fewer economic and human resources.

So, women staying at home while the men travel hundreds (often times thousands) of kilometers to find work to support them and their homes is a burden. Also, notice that men are "males" while women aren't "females." Also, when men aren't around, women have to pick up some of the physical labor. This situation is, according to the new prime minister of Senegal, as we can see, an issue of "lack of human resources." So men are "human resources" and when they're no longer of utility for the gynocracy that she envisions, they are just simply "males."

But perhaps the most egregious stance of hers, one which she takes pride of, is the one according to which access to health is a human right, and that that human rights are first and foremost women's rights.[12]

Whether one agrees that access to health care is a human right, it's a different issue. But the statement that access to health care is first and foremost a women's right is a bigoted stance and yet another revealing piece of evidence regarding the Senegal Prime Minister's mentality.

Will Aminata Touré's Marxist-feminist background reflect in her governance? Only time will tell. But until then, could one really, in all honesty, expect anything else than yet another attempt in yet another country from the State to try to pit women against men for no other reason than “revolutionary” agitation and political goals? Time will tell.

Maybe this time human beings will learn something from history.

Femitheist paradise realized

Angry Harry · 10 September 2013 · Archived copy · Original

The Year Is 2052

It is Angry Harry's birthday.

He is 100 years old today!

Hurrah for Angry Harry!

"Oooo. Aaaggh. Oh, my goodness. My back hurts," he says.

"Well, you are 100!" says his wife proudly.

"Hhhaaahhhh. That's better," he continues, as his wife lovingly props the pillow under him so that he can sit up more comfortably in the bed while he sips his tea.

"Does it still hurt?" she asks kindly.

"Oh yes," Angry Harry replies. "My muscles are sore from all that lifting yesterday. And that twenty-mile run has made my buttocks ache."

"Twenty miles?" says his second wife. "That's nothing for you Angry Harry. You normally do forty!"

"Yes," Angry Harry replies. "But my new fulsome buttocks haven't quite grown fully into place yet. And they are somewhat painful."

"And what lovely buttocks they are," says his third wife, as she starts to massage them tenderly with perfumed oils and cool, soothing creams.

"And they'll be putting in your new pair of lungs on Saturday," says his fourth wife. "So you'll once again be able to smoke your 500 cigarettes a day. That will surely cheer you up."

Angry Harry looks at her benignly.

"Such a pretty thing," he thinks. "But, then again, not much of a brain."

"Yes, that will definitely cheer me up," he says, reaching over to tweak her nipple to remind her to pour him his usual morning whisky.

A voice from down the hallway calls out to him.

"What would you like for breakfast Angry Harry?"

It is his fifth wife.

She is his most recent purchase.

And she is definitely the ugly duckling of his little flock.

But she can cook!

And for 150 bucks, you can't expect everything.

"Hmm. Let me think now," says Angry Harry. "Bacon, eggs, tomatoes, mushrooms, sausages, toast, waffles, cereal, a side of lamb, and a cup of tea," he calls back.

LOL

Well. OK. OK. I got a little carried away with how the world will be in 2052.

New buttocks? Hmmm. Maybe.

New lungs? Hmmm. Probably not.

But, many wives?

Hmm. Well.

Perhaps.

You never know!

But, for the moment, let us just call them ‘companions’, ‘friends’, ‘harlots’, ‘servants’, whatever. (See later!)

Human beings will start to reproduce many more females than males.

You see. When you view the forces that are operating in the world today as ‘organisms’, with lives of their own etc etc, then it becomes very clear that, in the not-too-distant future, human beings will start to reproduce many more females than males.

This might sound highly unlikely to some, but, in my view, it is a near certainty. And the main reason for it being a certainty is because the vast majority of men would very much want it to be so.

It is as simple as that really.

What else is there to say?

Think about it.

The men’s movement is growing in power all the time. Bar some catastrophe, it is unstoppable.

An extremely likely future outcome is the production of loads of women!

And, for the sake of clarity, if you think about the influence of the men’s movement as deriving from a single male brain – an average male brain in terms of its desires, but a super male brain in terms of its thinking and, hence, in terms of its achieving powers – then you can surely see that an extremely likely future outcome is the production of loads of women!

Quite simply, by creating societies in which there are many more females than males, men will be much happier and much more fulfilled.

And this is one very good reason why it will happen.

For example, this is surely what a typical man would like to have.

Good physical and mental health. Food. Shelter. Access to women. Peace. Security. Progress. Justice. Access to information. A world fit for his children. A non-violent environment. Things to interest him. Plenty of leisure time. Plenty of friends.

But this list of goodies is also what a typical woman would like to have – even with respect to the fourth item!

After all, women like women too! – as ‘companions’, that is.

And so who, exactly, is going to object very strongly to the notion that many more females than males should be produced by our species? For example, who would object if we arranged matters so that the male:female birth ratio was 1:3?

What organisms out there would oppose such an idea? And why would any organisms oppose such an idea? Hmm. Let’s think about it.

Briefly!

1. Feminists? Surely not. They would like to see the back of us.

2. Lesbian feminists? Nope. They’d love the idea.

3. ‘Ordinary women’? Well. A significant portion of them might complain a bit; but why should they?

Think of the benefits for them.

a. Less violence, crime and mayhem.

b. Less aggressive competition among men for women.

c. Far fewer relationship crimes; domestic violence, rape etc.

d. Far fewer wars.

e. More help with domestic chores.

f. More freedom to go out to work or to stay at home.

g. Far better job opportunities.

g. Loads of female friends.

Well. Thus far, it is a short list. But the world is already looking a zillion times better.

And what would be the disadvantages?

Hmm. Well. There aren’t many disadvantages that I can actually think of.

Now, you might think, Hold on. What about women who want to have monogamous relationships with men?

Well …

i. The women who are alive today are not going to be very much affected by such things. Even if from tomorrow we started to produce a 1:3 ratio, this would not affect young women who are alive today. The number of men available to them would scarcely diminish. But they would soon feel the benefits of the reduction in crime etc as the children of the near future were mostly female. And they would also end up with a lot of available domestic help – both in their middle years and, most importantly, in old age.

ii. The future generations of women could easily be brought up to be totally at ease with the fact that the men were lesser in number. It would not be a problem for them. Indeed, there are many places in the world where men are already and/or have been very few in number – especially after wars. This does not seem to cause much problem for the women, provided that the women can properly earn their keep. Besides which, very few women nowadays are truly monogamous. They tend to go from one partner to the next.

And it simply is not necessary for a woman to have a monogamous relationship with one man throughout her entire life – especially if her life expectancy soars. But there would be nothing to stop her if she wanted to.

But would women really want to remain with the same man for 120 years?

It seems unlikely.

So, why should ordinary women of the future complain about the fact that there were far fewer men?

Well. OK OK. The above is not the greatest analysis of what might happen if the male:female ratio was set at 1:3.

But it’s not a bad one!

And the real point about this piece is this.

Where is the strong opposition going to come from?

Eh?

The purpose of men was to provide brains and brawn.

In a nutshell: The purpose of men was to provide brains and brawn for exploiting the environment and for protecting their women and children from it. The women were designed to reproduce and to look after their children.

And, of course, to make the tea!

But the men have gradually been replacing their own biological functions with metals. Computers are replacing their brains. And various machines are replacing their muscles. And so, in very many ways, there is much less need to have so many men around.

However, men themselves are not actually becoming 'redundant' because there is no way that females could possibly do as well as men in many of the important jobs that men do – well, not without turning themselves, effectively, into something that is decidedly non-female.

And an obvious way in which to optimise the future situation for our species is to alter the birth ratio so that it has the best chances for survival.

And if we need fewer men than women, then we do!

Hmm.

Still not convinced, eh?

Then listen closely – because we do not really have a choice.

White, western, heterosexual beings are a dying breed.

We white, western, heterosexual beings are a dying breed. Amongst other things, feminism has killed off the birth rates. And so we now also need more females in the future simply to replace all of that lost stock!

(No offence to blacks, browns or yellows intended.)

And by creating more females in the future, we could increase the number of mothers bearing children very dramatically without worrying about women who would rather spend their time doing other things – perhaps following a career.

In other words, women would be far more free to do as they choose.

Oh Angry Harry. Men are not going to use the technologies to increase the number of women available to them. You are dreaming.

Oh really? But it is already happening!

For example,

According to industry statistics, approximately 70 million different individuals per week view at least one adult Web site on a global basis – 20 million view adult pages that are apparently hosted on sites in the United States or Canada.

Also, look at this! (adults only – sex dolls/robots)

In short, we are already creating more women.

Hi Gerald.

1. Let's cut out the idea of society forcing anything upon women. Let's just say that couples are simply free to choose the gender of their own children – which does not seem particularly unreasonable.

On balance, they will choose the gender most likely to bring rewards to the family. If female offspring are more beneficial to them than are males then they will choose to have more females.

Clearly, there will be a long term tendency for some kind of equilibrium to be reached. It all depends on what kind of economy, social structures etc develop in the future. But, whatever they might be, one presumes that if there is a shortage of supply in one area, the value of the gender which provides those goodies will tend to rise.

And, in my view, without going into details, we are heading in the direction of couples choosing to have more females.

My idea of a fixed 1:3 ratio is more of an Angry Harry 'outrage' than anything else, e.g. so that I can fool around with humour about polygyny and annoy the feminists etc. However, having said that, 1:3 might eventually not be quite so far off the mark.

2. "The reason why … feminist evil didn't do well before our modern era is because men were needed much more to survive and women knew it."

Well. That's really the same point that I was making in 1. above.

The 'value' of the gender is important.

And, of course, in certain parts of the world they sometimes get rid of baby girls because they are less valuable long term to families than are boys.

But this situation could soon reverse – especially in the west.

3. "If there are far more women than men it wont change much, men will still not be respected as humans by wicked women."

The wicked women will be perfectly free to remain on their own

Then the wicked women will be perfectly free to remain on their own, while the good women will be able to find themselves a man.

Further, of course, the fewer men there are the more valued they will become. (Hence the equilibrium mentioned in 1. above.)

4. "Good Women want one man for a mate because they want that closeness, that bond."

Yes indeed. But if loads of women do NOT want such relationships this leaves many men effectively out in the cold.

And what about the point of view of men? For all we know, 80% of men might prefer to be polygynous. What about their requirements? Why should they have to pander to what one particular type of woman might or might not want?

5. "A 1:3 ratio will only perpetuate a feminist culture that will lead its society to complete confusion as some will want to live by traditional family values and others will live in their twisted cultural orgy."

This is already happening – increasingly so.

And, personally speaking, I'm not bothered about people choosing to live in a 'feminist culture' so long as that in the process of doing so they do not discriminate against or demonise me or my fellow men, and so long as I can escape – perhaps geographically – into another culture.

And this is one of the reasons why I oppose any 'big government' that attempts to inflict one culture on everybody over a huge area of land – especially mine!

The problem for those who wish to 'inflict' traditional values all over the place is that it requires the kind of authoritarian government which most people would not want, and which is increasingly impossible these days to design.

Men who sit at screens are increasingly going to exert a huge force.

And if you accept, for the moment, that men who sit at screens are increasingly going to exert a huge force, then you have to look at the brains of such men to see what is likely to come about in the future.

And, in my view, some form of polygyny would appeal to most of them – well, to a large percentage of them.

6. “Also even if you propose this idea, even the most feminist nation will not go for it because even women leaders who hate men know that it takes men to win wars, to build cities etc.”

Yes. But with increasingly powerful technology, fewer men are needed for such things.

7. “Women are more than happy to have the men do all the dirty work. Female leaders will probably breed men as clones for war because to a feminist, that’s all men are good for is expendable meat.”

There’s nothing new in that! Men have been treated this way since Adam and Eve.

Fewer women now have the luxury of spending their days at the hairdresser.

But, in many ways, feminists are doing the opposite to what you say – e.g. they are getting women out to work and joining the military etc. Fewer women now have the luxury of spending their days at the hairdresser and at the beauty parlour and pottering around the garden. That’s what middle-class women used to do when I was young.

The ‘traditional’ ways of doing things was extremely unkind to men. I wouldn’t hanker after them if I was you. You seem to have bought into the feminist-inspired myth that western men were treated much better than women in the past. They weren’t!

Most men were treated abysmally in comparison to most women.

8. “The nation that stays with that idea of going to 3 to 1 women to men will certainly falter and become complacent and weak.”

Possibly. But it all depends on the technology, the economics, and the global situation across the planet etc.

Finally, I spent my undergraduate days in a college which was over 80% female.

Take it from me, it was not a problem!

Tonight we have as our guest Gary Trieste, the man recently made famous for having surreptitiously recorded two corrupt New York Child Protective Service officials during a meeting concerning his daughter, Anya. The video, which has now gone viral, depicts him defending himself from two officials clearly clearly acting on behalf of the mother, not the child.

His daughter, age 7, is morbidly obese and on powerful anti-psychotic drugs at the behest of her mother, who has been diagnosed with Borderline Personality Disorder tendencies. Anya has been kept from him by the family court due to a cavalcade of false allegations.

Please take the opportunity to call in and ask Gary questions and perhaps share your experiences with the Family Court and Child Protective Services.

The househusband trap

Dean Esmay · 10 September 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Is there anything wrong with a man who stays home to take care of his children while his wife goes to work and makes all or most of the money for the household? Is he a loser, a joke, a "fag," a "womanly Mr. Mom?"

No. What a wonderful opportunity for that man and his child or children. Children thrive on close contact with their fathers, and despite every stupid lie the culture tells us, men are as a rule excellent nurturers, when they're allowed to be, with massive evidence from the evolutionary record that close father-child bonding goes back hundreds of thousands if not millions of years, a bond as deep and as important as the mother-child bond.

So what's the problem? The problem is that in our current culture, a man who chooses this option may be taking a bigger risk than any other man who gets a woman pregnant. More than one such man has found out the hard way that not only will his woman not respect him anymore, but, even if he is the primary caregiver for the child, the family courts will usually not give a damn and will award custody to the mom if she decides to leave him anyway. In his usual no-holds-barred fashion, Barbarossaa lays it down:

One of the major things I believe many of the more prominent MGTOW thinkers on YouTube miss is the biological realities of fatherhood. There's a lot of myths that run around on that subject even among people who think they're fairly well-informed on the science. For example, the frequently-cited claim that only 40% of our male ancestors but 80% of our female ancestors successfully reproduced is flat-out false; it's a rather destructive woozle. The notion that males just want sex while females seek reproduction is also pseudoscientific nonsense; evidence goes back hundreds of thousands of years showing this to not be true either. Men as a rule want to be fathers, and that is a biological urge and not merely an urge to fuck.

But that discussion can be had another day. Here is the fact gentlemen: there is no good reason for most men to even think about trusting a woman in today's legal and social climate. Being a househusband would be a great thing, and it'd be a choice I'd be proud to make myself if I could have firm reassurances that I wouldn't wind up mocked and scorned by society (and by "society" I mean women every bit as much, if not more than, men), and that I wouldn't find myself out of the workforce, lacking a resume employers would respect, and homeless, destitute, and stripped of my children anyway even though, despite the legal claims that the "primary caregiver" should be the one who gets the bulk of the custody of the children in a divorce, the legal definition of "primary caregiver" is, de facto, "the mother," no matter how much or how little time she actually spends with the children.

Until the laws and the culture change, gentleman, get this through your head: you are a disposable commodity and nothing more. If you make lots of money, maybe your woman will stay with you, or maybe she'll leave and take you for all you're worth anyway. If you stumble and can't keep up your old level of income, maybe she'll be honorable and stick with you and her promises, or maybe she'll kick you to the curb and throw you away like useless garbage. Even if you devote your entire life to actually raising the children yourself, if she decides she wants a different arrangement, the law will back her up and you my friend will still wind up in the garbage dump, and smirked at, called an abuser, a loser, possibly falsly accused, maybe even jailed, because you trusted someone in a climate where "trust" for a man frequently means "playing Russian Roulette."

I have often said this, and I mean it: I consider the growing trend of permanent bachelorhood for young men a tragedy, but not because I think there is anything tragic in the choice of anyone who chooses to go his own way and stay celibate because it's simply in their nature to prefer a solitary life. I don't think a man who makes that choice is a "loser" who "can't get laid" or sad or cowardly or any of that bullshit.

No, I consider it a tragedy because it is a biological fact that most men don't want just sex, they want a biological mate, they have a natural and normal desire for attachment, and most men, consciously or unconsciously, want fatherhood and even grandfatherhood–and we have constructed a social and legal climate in which any man who tries to fulfill those very natural and beautiful desires is playing with fire, having effectively no protection offered by the state, charitable instititions, and frequently, not even family or friends.

And then as a nice little rotton cherry on top of that turd pie, they'll call you "bitter" and a "loser" if you object.

I'm a married man. I love my wife. I trust my wife. I respect my wife. But can I recommend that choice, especially to any man who is young and thinking he'd like children?

No. No I cannot. My own son will be old enough for that soon, and for the life of me I have no idea what to tell him, except to arm him with as much information as I can, and do my best to be there for him if he makes an unwise decision and trusts the wrong woman, whether it be in a long-term relationship or even a one night stand.

Until we live in a social and legal climate that actually makes this sort of thing a safe choice–or at least, a choice that's about equally perilous for both sexes–I can't recommend it to anyone I give a damn about, and I'm not even sure I could wish it on my worst enemy.

Help Harvard girls: wreck Harvard guys

Janet Bloomfield (aka JudgyBitch) · 11 September 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Harvard MBA men are brash, bold, confident, assertive and mad skilled at math. The only way women can compete with them is to squash all those qualities. Oh, okay. That seems both smart and fair.

All right everybody! Stop thinking about Syria and gas attacks and Iowa issuing gun permits to the blind. WTF, Iowa?!?!?. Hey, what can possibly go wrong?

We have a real problem to tackle today: Harvard MBA ladies suck at competing with Harvard men.

The country's premier business training ground was trying to solve a seemingly intractable problem. Year after year, women who had arrived with the same test scores and grades as men fell behind.

Oh dear. Well, that's not very good, is it? What to do, what to do…

[The Harvard MBA class of 2013] have been unwitting guinea pigs in what would have once sounded like a far-fetched feminist fantasy: What if Harvard Business School gave itself a gender makeover, changing its curriculum, rules and social rituals to foster female success?

Look at that statement carefully. You'll note that Harvard isn't interested in fostering the success of ALL their students. Nope. They're doing a gender makeover than only involves one gender. Success is strictly on the basis of Lawful Possession of Labia. Feminist fantasy indeed.

I suppose Harvard might want to consider changing their motto from Veritas to Vaginatas? Maybe add some teeth to the crest or something? Just a thought.

After reading the Times article, it looks to me like the program to engineer the girl's success entails the following:

Teach women how to raise their hands.

Ha! You probably think I'm kidding, right? Nope. Not kidding. Some of the most accomplished, educated, ambitious business students in the country had to pay $100,000 to sit in a class and learn how to raise their hands, because the ladies quavered when confronted with hard thinky stuff like math and that's not fair!

Nearly two years earlier, in the fall of 2011, Neda Navab sat in a class participation workshop, incredulous. The daughter of Iranian immigrants, Ms. Navab had been the president of her class at Columbia, advised chief executives as a McKinsey & Company consultant and trained women as entrepreneurs in Rwanda. Yet now that she had arrived at the business school at age 25, she was being taught how to raise her hand.

Every year the same hierarchy emerged early on: investment bank and hedge fund veterans, often men, sliced through equations while others — including many women — sat frozen or spoke tentatively.

Since 50% of the marks in courses come from class participation, stenographers were placed in each classroom so that women weren't accidentally discounted in marks.

Okay, no real problem with this, but when you couple it with this, a problem suddenly appears.

New grading software tools let professors instantly check their calling and marking patterns by gender.

Hmmm.

So if professor's call patterns are now being tracked on the basis of gender, who wants to bet that professors overlook male students whom they KNOW can contribute better, more nuanced and meaningful comments in favor of women who have less to offer, in order to make certain patterns fall into ideological lockstep? The Dean wants equality over quality, so screw both the male students and the whole class?

There's some genius pedagogy right there. Let's gather all the best business minds in the country and then make sure half of them don't get to speak because penis? Very clever.

Had the professors rid themselves of unconscious biases? Were the women performing better because of the improved environment? Or was the faculty easing up in grading women because they knew the desired outcome?

Gee, I wonder. What, exactly, is the value of a grade you only received because the true competitors are being crippled before the starting gun fires? It's like popping open the champagne to celebrate your gold medal in the 100 yard sprint, and neglecting to mention that you were racing 5-year-olds on crutches.

Yeah, big accomplishment.

The case study method, which relied on cold-calling students about a firm's predicament, was "rounded out" with a collaborative, time-consuming, cover your ass and spread the blame technique called "Field".

Obviously, "Field" allows women to access all their male classmate's strengths and then claim partial credit for them. The "team" worked together to figure the case out. Bullshit, the team did. One guy took a leadership role and everyone else rode his coattails.

Been there. Done that.

True story: In my MBA, I was in a group with a man who had a PhD in Astronomy and another man who was a mechanical engineer. They used to argue about what kind of mathematics to use to solve tricky problems in financial analysis. "Trigonometry is for children", huffed StarDoctor. He worked at an observatory in South Africa that had amazing facilities but paid him shit money, so he used to run guns for the local guerillas on the side. A very interesting guy.

The other member of my team was a Chinese woman with an undergrad degree in mathematics who barely spoke English, so she basically coasted and got the same marks as the rest of us while doing what amounted to jack shit. I, of course, wrote up all our findings and was the keynote presenter for almost everything.

We played to our strengths. Our team agreed from the get-go that "equality" was fucking dumb. We were supposed to take turns doing analysis, writing, presenting, etc., so we would be well-rounded, but we decided fuck that nonsense.

We played to our strengths.

144 students. Six major case competitions. We won five. Actually, bullshit. We won all six, but the awards committee couldn't bear that one team would sweep the medals. It was unprecedented.

And StarDoctor was unequivocally our leader. Me and the engineer kept him on his toes, to be certain. I once disagreed with StarDoctor so vehemently he stormed out of a meeting and got in his car and started driving away and I jumped on the hood of his moving car. He got out of the car, physically removed me from the hood, threw me in the grass and drove away, and refused to make the changes I wanted.

Mr. JB took StarDoctor out for a drink and a chat after that episode.

Turns out StarDoctor's conclusion was right, and we were offered positions at the organization we were analyzing. StarDoctor was unwilling to bow to me to keep the peace and none of us were the slightest bit interested in towing some ideological line about fairness or equality.

We were in it to win.

That's what kills me about initiatives like Harvard's that are trying to alter the landscape so that women can succeed. In order to alter the landscape, you are destroying what makes the MEN such formidable competitors. Now, I'm not stupid. I realize that the men who are in the Harvard MBA program are rich, connected and come into the program with advantages most of us can only dream of, but they cannot parlay those advantages into real world rewards without combining them with boldness, confidence, assertiveness and a total unwillingness to kowtow to political correctness.

What are we achieving when we take our best and brightest men and force them to squelch the attributes that ultimately benefit us all so that women can feel like they won the race? What exactly are the women going to do with their glorious credentials?

Ms. Upton decided to take a far lower-risk job managing a wealthy family's investments in Pittsburgh, where her fiancé lived. "You can either be a frontier charger or have an easier, happier life," she said.

The reality is that most of the women graduating from the Harvard Business School with MBAs will end up housewives, taking care of children in a luxurious lifestyle funded by the men they secured as a result of their fancy degrees.

A surprising number of highly educated MBAs are dropping out of the labor force. Associate Professor Catherine Wolfram, a member of the Haas Economic Analysis and Policy Group, studied surveys taken by nearly 1,000 Harvard undergraduate alumni and found, 15 years after graduation, business school graduates are more likely than doctors and lawyers to leave the workforce. The common factors: being married, being female, becoming a mother.

And you know what? Yay! Good for them! I think those are some damn smart ladies. The women in the 2013 class of Harvard MBAs don't seem to be the slightest bit different. The Dean cancelled the traditional Halloween costumes-in-class extravaganza to prevent the sexy ladies from taking a prime opportunity to market themselves as potential child bearers.

As Halloween approached, some students planned to wear costumes to class, but at the last minute Ms. Frei, who wanted to set a serious tone and head off the potential for sexy pirate costumes, sent a note out prohibiting it, provoking more eye rolls.

No matter. The ladies still found time to deck themselves out in Playboy Bunny costumes, seeing no conflict with the institutional gender transformation designed to give them the leg up over their male classmates and their unapologetic pursuit of sexual market value. The administration might think that's a problem, but the women sure as hell didn't.

Students were demanding more women on the faculty, a request the deans were struggling to fulfill. And they did not know what to do about developments like female students dressing as Playboy bunnies for parties and taking up the same sexual rating games as men.

Here's the part that really, really made me giggle. One woman in particular was intimidated at the sexually charged climate that governed social interactions at Harvard.

"Someone made the decision for me that I'm not pretty or wealthy enough to be in Section X," [Brooke Boyarsky] told her classmates, her voice breaking.

Actually, Brooke, you made that choice yourself when you decided "morbidly obese" was good look for you.

I entered H.B.S. as a truly 'untraditional applicant': morbidly obese.

Owing to the new gender environment that promotes the interests of women over men, Brooke managed to graduate in the top of her class, earning a Baker Scholar award. But what was she really excited about? What made her really happy?

She lost 100 lbs and she is dating now!

"I am super excited to go to my 30th reunion…"

So Harvard is basically Weight Watchers for the upwardly mobile?

Fantastic. What a great way to mobilize our intelligentsia. Men: shut up. Women: lose weight and lock down that man.

It truly baffles me that THE single most prestigious university in the world can fall for this.

And it worries me.

When feminists have infiltrated the very best institutions of learning to the point that those institutions are willing to silence their male students so women can feel “good enough”, all the while ignoring the fact that most of the women are there on elaborate missions to nail down their own personal Mr. Darcy, the time for action has come.

I’m all for gender equality in higher education. Any man, or any woman, should be able to pursue their interests and ambitions and passions without facing down socially constructed barriers based on antiquated ideas about how men and women “are”.

But it should also face reality. Our antiquated ideas are based on centuries of lived experience. Most women love babies, family and men far more than they will ever love a Bloomberg Terminal. And most men love their families and babies and women so much they will spend hours chained to a Bloomberg Terminal to provide for them.

Telling men to sit down and shut up, and teaching women how to raise their hands, destroys the ability of both men and women to achieve their dreams.

And really, isn’t that the ultimate goal? We want all humans to be able to achieve their dreams. Most people have dreams that are very simple. Family, home, food, warm water for a bath at the end of the day. Not that difficult.

The interesting thing about prioritizing the “feminist fantasy” of the world is just how little that fantasy represents the reality of what most people want.

The sadness of the women’s movement is that they don’t allow the necessity of love. See, I don’t personally trust any revolution where love is not allowed. – Maya Angelou

Me neither, Maya.

Why do women go to Harvard in the first place?

To find a husband.

It is a truth universally acknowledged, that a single man in possession of a good fortune, must be in want of a wife. – Jane Austen

Where to find a single man in possession of a good fortune?

Here’s a good place to start:

Raise your hand when you see one you like!

Lots of love,

JB

Denise Ryan is an unskilled liar

John Hembling (JtO) · 11 September 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Denise Ryan is the author of a Vancouver Sun article of September 9, 2013 called “Shock at University of B.C. as investigation begins into frosh rape chant”.

Denise Ryan is also a disgusting liar. She doesn’t even have the decency to practice skillful fraud.

Her thesis is that, during frosh week, a chant repeated by first year Sauder business school students was espousing support of the violent crime of rape.

Denise Ryan, the Vancouver Sun writer, names Lucia Lorenzi as the student apparently championing punishment of this so-called rape advocacy. The Sun features a photo, presumably of Lorenzi, to put a face to the story.

A more humourless, miserable face is hard to imagine:

Readers might be tempted to believe the photo and companion article constitute a heavy-handed satire of the cult of totalitarian campus feminist enterprise in North American universities. However, it appears from coverage elsewhere, including the CBC, that the apparent “threat” of rape advocating chants is being treated as a crime. The very real threat of academic consequences is no joke at all to Sauder business school students and other victims of academic tyranny.

But what about the so-called UBC rape chant? The one every paid hack with a keyboard or microphone working in the mainstream media is claiming supports the commission of the violent crime of rape.

According to Denise Ryan:

[quote]
It began “Y-O-U-N-G at UBC, we like ’em young,” and went on to talk about underage sisters, sex and lack of consent.[/quote]

That’s pretty vague. In a major metropolitan newspaper, in an article about an apparently rape-supporting chant, why are the words of the actual chant only talked around, rather than being explicitly stated?

The CBC also ran a televised segment about the chant, including the complete listing of what the letters in “Y.O.U.N.G.” stood for.

Remember that the mainstream narrative being pushed is that this chant encourages the commission of the violent crime of rape. Buckle your seat-belts.

[image]

Y = your sister
O = Oh so tight
U = Under age
N = No consent
G = Go to jail.

Wait, what? The G stands for “go to jail?”

How can any so-called journalist claim this is a chant in favour of rape? Taken altogether, the message seems to be that rapists will go to jail and therefore ought not to do it.

You’d better strap on your crash helmet now.

In fact, considering the context of a frosh week initiation chant, and considering that even Vancouver Sun writer

Denise Ryan claims similar chants have been repeated at other universities, another interpretation of this chant seems to manifest itself.

Make sure your helmet is on tight, and add some safety goggles, gloves, boots and coveralls.

It appears that the culture of students across Canada and elsewhere have had quite enough of the hyperbolic fear-mongering, hate-cultivating, victim narrative spewing and Orwellian speech/behavior control from entrenched feminist ideologues, and are now openly mocking their rhetoric.

Nobody is supporting or promoting rape at UBC. However, students are wholly sick and tired of politically powerful social justice warriors heaping them with shame and censorship. Students at universities are often young and politically unsophisticated, but they are not stupid, and they are saying in terms of clear mockery that the established practitioners of culture of gender war, political correctness, and intellectual bullying can all go pound sand.

Y- Your lies exposed
O- Our time has come
U- Unfettered fun
N- Not buying into shame
G- Go get a life

Do you get it yet, feminists? The students themselves, the ones you're trying so hard to control and indoctrinate, have had enough of your lies and are telling you, in terms of satire, to get lost.

The G gives it away, which is likely why Denise Ryan, writing for the Vancouver Sun, omitted it in her article. Selling a narrative of threat, danger, and rapey-rapeddy-rape was more important to her than the truth. Even without that revealing nugget, the Vancouver Sun piece looked like it belonged at the Onion.

The CBC's Renee Fillipone is as equally guilty, reporting on the same event under the heading "UBC students have been outed for making a chant advocating the rape of under age girls".

Fillipone was so clown-handed in her selling of this fraud that she forgot to edit out the evidence of her misinformation. The spelled out contents of the chant were posted in the video of her televised CBC segment: The G stands for Go to jail. Every reporter claiming this frosh chant advocates rape is merely pretending to practice journalism. At best it is satire of feminist rhetoric, at worst it is honest acknowledgement that sometimes you can't have what you want.

Knowing what the G stands for, it is impossible to honestly claim the chant has any possibility of being intended to support the violent crime of rape.

That a drunken, froshy chant can be spun into a threat narrative and that fabricated threat can be used to end academic careers, to blacklist, to silence, to marginalize and to coerce compliance with entrenched and establishment gender ideology through the fear of continued political reprisal by campus ideologues says more about modern journalism than university students.

The lie enabling this isn't even being sold with any finesse or skill. It's clumsy and obvious. I find myself insulted more by the lack of artfulness than by the falsehood knowingly perpetrated by so-called journalists. Don't liars and grifters even take any pride in their work?

But it is "reporters", like the CBC's Renee Fillipone, and the Vancouver Sun's Denise Ryan who are unabashedly manipulating and deceiving you. That lie, repeated across the mainstream media becomes the propaganda of a new world where we all concentrate on following the camp rules.

Shame on you Renee Fillipone. And shame on you Denise Ryan.

Item: El Paso TX. attorney uses controversial ad to warn men about the dangers of child support and family law.

The ad reads:

"Ladies, how would you like to make thousands of dollars by staying at home? Just follow these simple steps.

1) Get pregnant and have a baby.

2) Once the baby is born, get rid of the father.

3) Get child support money by using a state-appointed, free attorney to sue the father. 4) Spend the money on trips without the child.

5) Spend the money on drinking, expensive restaurants, and clubs.

Guess what? Its all legal in Texas"

The ad then admonishes men facing a child support order to lawyer up because the odds are stacked against them. Very crafty don't you think?

Item: The Canadian Association for Equality (CAFE) announces upcoming event featuring Miles Groth at the University of Toronto

Get ready for more fireworks people! Senior members of AVFM staff will be attending and we are sure to get more entertaining video. Good luck! And beware the read headed fire spitting beast.

Item: Lawyer argues that fertility treatments are part of the marital lifestyle, and as such, should be paid for after the divorce by the husband.

That's right! If your wife decides she isn't happy any more and wants a divorce she should be able to collect ten's of thousands from him in order to get pregnant with another guy. Sound strange and unfair? Not to New York Times Op-Ed contributor Sarah Elizabeth Richards.

Item: Man pleads guilty to tricking pregnant girlfriend into taking abortion pill

A truly tragic and sad story of a man who tricks his pregnant girlfriend into taking an abortion pill ends with him taking a plea that may land him in jail for 13 years instead of the life sentence that federal law prescribes. However, one cannot avoid the brutal double standard which is best explained buy the most popular comment on the CNN article:

John McKay •1 a day ago

"The root problem here is the inequality in legal system. If a mother wants to abort unilaterally, she can, which is fine. I'm not going to argue that if the father wants to abort unilaterally, that he should be able to. After all, it's the woman's body. However, if the father wants to abort during the legal abortion limit and the mother wants to keep it, and this is documented, he should be off the hook for legal responsibility, specifically child support."

Item: UN survey reveals nearly a quarter of men in Asia-Pacific admit to committing rape

Hmmm…..one in four….that sounds rather familiar doesn't it?

But those conducting the "survey" had a rather round about way of determining whether or not those men they asked were actually rapists. Here is their methodology:

“The respondents were not asked directly whether they had committed rape, but instead were asked questions such as “Have you ever forced a woman who was not your wife or girlfriend at the time to have sex?” or “Have you ever had sex with a woman who was too drugged or drunk to indicate whether she wanted it?”‘

In other words, the men were not asked if they had raped someone but rather asked if they had ever had sex with someone who was drinking or with someone who needed verbal persuasion in the likes of the old song “Baby its cold outside” (yes according to feminists this is rape) in order to have sex with them. Go figure.

Item: Marxist feminist new PM of Senegal

Special thanks to Lucian Valsan for educating us on the ascendancy of Aminata Touré from operative in the Communist Workers’ League of Senegal to the United Nations Population Fund (UNFPA) where she was chief of the gender, human rights and culture branch right on up to Prime Minister of her country.

Congratulations Comrade Touré! Now start hacking off those pesky foreskins!

Canada's future is our future

Paul Elam · 11 September 2013 · Archived copy · Original

AVFM recently posted an announcement from CAFE regarding the upcoming September 27 talk at the University of Toronto by Dr. Miles Groth on outreach to young men in college.

I also mentioned in that post that by all appearances there will be a larger than usual contingent of MHRAs attending that event. Since then the information reaching me indicates that the numbers of MHRAs will be even larger than expected just two days ago.

AVFM is also dispatching Editor-in-Chief John Hembling to Toronto for the event, along with other key Canadian figures in the MRHM to be announced later.

The reason for this response is directly proportional to the importance of the talk by Dr. Groth.

It would be an overstatement to say that any single talk is a make or break moment for the future of men's human rights. However, the topic of this talk can easily be tied to the future of this movement, and I want to assure you that the feminist opposition is acutely aware of it.

Please consider some other recent events transpiring in Canada. There was the now infamous and shameful feminist protest of Dr. Warren Farrell November 16 of last year when he came to address the boy crisis. Similar, if less strident protests were seen at talks by Drs. Paul Nathanson and Kathryn Young and Dr. Janice Fiamengo.

We saw the outrageous preemptive move by the student's union at Ryerson University to brand any attempt to address men's issues outside of feminist control as misogynistic in and of itself, as we saw the two young women and one young man seeking to form a men's issues group summarily denied their request.

Before that Simon Fraser University moved to quash efforts to start a men's center, and the Canadian Federation of Students moved to preempt any efforts to expand men's issues groups across the entire country.

Do not be fooled into thinking that any of this is coincidental.

[image]The efforts in Canada from ideologues to prevent the emergence of men's issues organizations has represented the most intense, vocal and vitriolic activism on the part of gender ideologues that we have seen over any one issue in recent times and there is a very good reason for it.

To fully understand, it is important to realize the threat that is perceived from campus organizations addressing issues of sex and gender when those organizations reject the tenets of feminist dogma and opt to support men and boys rather than reinforce the ideological perspective that they simply need to be managed, controlled and reinvented.

These new men's organizations represent a shift in consciousness that could lead to the academic feminist's worst nightmares, e.g. scrutiny and possible rejection of feminist theory on a wider scale, the subjective pursuit of research on human males that is conducted outside the ideological control of the feminist establishment and the popularizing of the idea on college campuses that feminism has it wrong.

It is not just the ego driven protection of their sacred cows that has them worried. There is much more at stake. And frankly, they are quite correct to be concerned.

If the honest, scholarly investigation of men and masculinity ever happened free of the fact-avoidant constraints of hegemonic feminism the resultant research leaving our schools and finding its way into our media, government and public policy would be economically and politically disastrous for the feminist establishment. Their programs, legislation, organizations, etc., all depend on feminist theory, which has become hopelessly corrupt and easily debunked. Feminist control of academic discourse would be publicly devastated by the research that the non-ideological study of men and masculinity would certainly provide.

Consider the implications. Consider that each convoluted statistic, from the 1 in 4 rape myth, to the wage gap myth, to the Duluth Model and more have all emanated from our institutions of higher learning. There has never been a force within our schools to create and run departments, issue degrees and fund research that directly address the issues of men and boys. Consequently the only data to which media, policy makers and the sound bite hypnotized public became privy has been from ideological feminists.

It is academic feminism's unchallenged control that has spread its ideology and its corruption through the culture at large without opposition.

Groups like CAFE and others represent the beginning of end for that paradigm whether they know it or not, which is the real reason we have seen the violent and vitriolic reaction. Any voice for men and boys on the modern campus is a viable threat to those whose bread and butter is in the demonization of that part of our population. That is the fear driving the feminist reaction. It is the source of energy underneath all the chanting, threats and hyperbole.

[image]

This is why the talk by Dr. Groth, who is also the driving force behind the New Male Studies initiative, is so important.

It is why AVFM is continuing methodical preparations with NCFM on the development of men's issues groups as the most or one of the most important forms of activism we have ever undertaken.

The long term future of the men's movement absolutely hinges on the future success of the establishment of non-ideological study of men and masculinity and the badly needed research that will provide the world with an entirely different view than they have been getting for half a century.

If gender ideologues can keep MHRAs from having a voice in their own education and their own collegiate social sphere, if they can ensure there is no counter-theory to the prevailing dogma, it makes it much easier for them to justify denying the development and implementation of fields of study that will eventually bring some parity back to the realm of gender politics. That parity is their kryptonite, and they know it.

For whatever unique set of reasons, this struggle has come to play out in Canada. Whether it is because Canada has more issues with feminist hegemony, and thus more reason to react, or because Canada happens to have some of the more brilliant minds on men's issues we don't know. But for whatever reason, Canada is now unmistakably the field for this cultural battle.

Canada's future is the future of us all, at least in the west. It is where our struggle to restore sanity between the sexes has begun in earnest.

For those Canadians, and there are many of you, that support the work we do at AVFM, I encourage you to attend this lecture on September 27 and to offer your support for Dr. Groth and those hosting the event.

Our presence there and reporting on their activities has clearly dampened their willingness to engage in more blatant efforts to disrupt these events. However, you can almost count on some effort on their part. Somewhat like Mafiosos, they will do what they can to protect their territory, even if most of the useful idiots acting on their behalf have no clue what they are doing.

As always, please follow the example of those who have showed our presence there in the past. Do not respond to provocations. Always Be Recording. Walk away from their attempts to physically confront and intimidate. Seek police assistance if it is required. Above all, remember who you represent and why. Ours is not the way of thugs and bullies.

We will be watching this event closely, and will be reporting back to you of course with any new information or details.

Lucian Vâlsan · 12 September 2013 · Archived copy · Original

On September 13, Lucian Vâlsan, James Huff, Huffnágel Pista and whoever shall call in will be talking about lies, damn lies and statistics that are permeating our culture and that have now been adopted by the EU is gospel for policy making.

We will tackle the "1 in 4" statistical lie in particular since "1 in 4" is now basically a meme to which not-so-well intended policy makers and advocates are attaching whatever cause or "fact" can be fitted – and those "causes" are usually about women because women is the only demographic that our society and our feminist culture cares about.

1 in 4 women dies from a heart disease (not true, but catchy – despite the fact that the actual figure is anyway significantly smaller than the one for men), 1 in 4 teen girls have an STI or 1 in 4 women and adolescent girls (really?) suffer from something called "vulvodynia" – which is a term that not even those raised in the medical field have never heard. These kinds of "statistics" are not only damn lies but some of them have already proven to be deadly dangerous (particularly the 1 in 4 lies related to cancer figures that have driven funding away from the necessities and towards ideological goals).

We will dissect all those lies, as well as present some real 1 in 4 figures and hopefully have some fun in the meantime.

The subject is tricky so please join us and call in at (001) 310 388 9709, or Skype in, after the news. If you have a 1 in 4 lie (or 1 in 3, or any other sensationalist "figure") tell us about it. Let's promote healthy skepticism to the "statistics" that pop up from various dubious places.

The show will commence at 7 PM GMT (London, Reykjavik and Lisbon time).

That is 8 PM CET (Madrid, Paris, Brussels, Rome, Oslo, Stockholm, Copenhagen, Budapest, Berlin, Vienna, Warsaw, Amsterdam, Bern, Bratislava, Prague, Belgrade, Tirana, Ljubljana, Zagreb, Sarajevo and Skopje time)

That is 9 PM EET (Helsinki, Tallinn, Riga, Vilnius, Kiev, Chișinău, Bucharest, Sofia, Athens, Ankara and Nicosia time)

That is 10 PM FEET (Minsk time)

And, finally, 11 PM Moscow time.

For the listeners in America this means 2 PM EST, 1 PM CST, 12 PM MST and 11 AM PST.

For the listeners in Australia, this means September 14, 2 AM (AWST) in West Australia and 4 AM AEST. (times adjusted in accordance with DST both for Europe and America)

Governor's race highlights father's rights bias

Robert Franklin · 12 September 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Yes Virginia, there really is a father's rights movement.

This article looks reasonably fair at first blush, particularly considering it appears in the Washington Post, not known for being overly friendly toward fathers and their need for greater time with their children or fairer treatment by family courts (Washington Post, 8/28/13). It's part hit-piece against anyone who would have the temerity to oppose the Violence Against Women Act and part decent representation of significant family law issues.

Nominally, the article is about the race for governor in Virginia that's between Democrat Terry McAuliffe and Republican State Attorney General, Ken Cuccinelli. More specifically, it's about Cuccinelli and his relationship to fathers' rights groups. That makes it possible for Post writer Ben Pershing to either get it right or wrong on what fathers' rights organizations really stand for, and, to an reasonable degree, he does the former. Pershing does a decent job of saying, without editorializing, what fathers' rights organizations stand for. He then refers to what our opponents say about our various points of view, again, without taking sides.

Unfortunately, Pershing's take on VAWA devolves into a he said/she said performance rather than a substantive analysis of the law or its effects. VAWA's problems are legion, including radical anti-male sexism, financial support for groups and programs that use the Duluth Model to "address" domestic violence perpetrators, the erosion of due process of law in the issuance of no-contact orders and the assessment by Department of Justice analysts that there's no evidence it's reduced the incidence of DV. Pershing looks into none of that, preferring to depict Cuccinelli, and by extension anyone who opposes VAWA, as in some way beyond the pale of rational public discourse.

But beyond that, the article brings fathers' rights issues to the forefront of debate in a major electoral campaign. Although Cuccinelli isn't rushing to embrace fathers' rights groups outright, he's aware of the issues and that awareness brings them into mainstream discourse as the governor's race enters the home stretch.

> Cuccinelli does not have a position on the fathers' rights movement and does not think divorce and custody laws discriminate against men, campaign spokeswoman Anna Nix said.
> "Study after study clearly demonstrates that children are better off with two parents and that children who do not live with both parents are next best off with regular, healthy contact with both parents," Nix said. "Like millions of Virginians, Ken's commitment to these values and principles are steadfast."

When was the last time you heard that in a major statewide electoral campaign? That's right, never. Nix not only gets her facts right, she's not afraid to speak the truth. There's no hiding or obfuscating. She's not intimidated, and, by extension, neither is her boss.

Another issue you rarely see articulated in an electoral campaign is that of no-fault divorce between spouses with children.

> "If you are sued for divorce in Virginia, there's virtually nothing you can do to stop it," Cuccinelli said in 2008 to the Family Foundation, a socially conservative Richmond-based advocacy group. "This law has everything to do with the breakdown of the family. The state says marriage is so unimportant that if you just separate for a few months, you can basically nullify the marriage. What we're trying to do is essentially repeal no-fault divorce when there are children involved."

I've mentioned the concept before, although not with much frequency, but I do favor making divorce more difficult when there are children involved. The problem is, I don't know how.

No-fault divorce conceives of single-parent childrearing as "just another lifestyle choice," when it's anything but. If two spouses without children want to divorce, I say let them. But if they have children, it should be entirely different. Married with — and married without — children are two totally different things and shouldn't be treated as the same by family courts, but they are.

No-fault divorce first started to become law when psychology was in the grips of the idea that a child just needed a firm bond with one parent to become an emotionally healthy adult. That's turned out to be false. In fact, as Nix said, kids need "regular, healthy contact with both parents" post-divorce, and preferably to be raised in an intact home with both their biological parents. As I've said many times before, family law needs to advance to the level of the social science on parents, family structure and children.

The fact is that children bond with both parents at an amazingly early age. Within the first weeks of life, a child can distinguish between its mother and its father. That bond is all-important to the child and can be shaken by prolonged absence.

No-fault divorce also assumes that, when a court orders visitation by the non-custodial parent, it'll happen. But all too often, it doesn't, and the same courts that made the orders refuse to enforce them. That, plus the fact that non-custodial parents typically get to see their kids only about four days a month renders them little more than babysitters or, in Dr. Susan Stewart's words, "Disneyland Dads." That means children gradually lose their fathers, courtesy of family courts.

If we'd fix the way child custody is handled, we wouldn't need to curtail the rights of husbands and wives in divorce matters. Yes, an intact biological family is best for kids, but equal parenting is the best we can do once parents divorce. And my guess is that there's not much political will for telling married parents they can't divorce. We used to limit divorce by requiring a showing of fault, but that just resulted in the comedy of married couples agreeing to divorce and then manufacturing the evidence required for it.

The point is that it's difficult, as a practical matter, to construct laws that would restrict parents divorcing and at the same time not force parents, who truly need to be apart, to remain together. I applaud the idea of keeping married parents together for the sake of the children, but don't know how to accomplish that legally, particularly in a culture that's grown used to easy divorce.

Whatever the case, it's good to see an article about fathers' rights, children's well-being, divorce and child custody, and related topics that's remarkably even-handed, with the sad exception of its VAWA coverage. More importantly, it's good to see that our issues have gained enough traction to be of significance in a major electoral campaign.

MR-E helps establish Men’s Rights Calgary

Men's Rights Edmonton · 12 September 2013 · Archived copy · Original

On Labour day long weekend, members of Men’s Rights Edmonton took a road trip to Calgary Alberta, where we met with local MRAs and helped establish MEN’S RIGHTS CALGARY. That’s right, Alberta is now host to two real world men’s rights activist groups. Fuck yeah!

MR-E is currently working with the members of MR-C to help them find their legs and get their website (MensRightsCalgary.com) up and running. We hope to have that website online very soon.
Out of sheer coincidence, the day we happened to be down in Calgary was the same day they held their gay pride parade. So the streets were alive with people either participating in the parade or making their way out to view it. One enthusiastic gay Indian, who went by “El Dink”, was decent enough to volunteer himself to be a walking human billboard for MR-E in the pride parade. We spray glued one of our posters to his chest and he dawned that sucker the entire day. We know this because we ran into him again in the evening shortly before we left and he was still wearing the poster on his chest. You can find that footage above.

The members of MR-C are great guys. We sat with them for an extended lunch and spoke about potential projects they would like to get underway and all of them sounded like winners. Man, do we have some exciting times ahead of us. And of course, it wouldn’t be a proper visit unless we got some postering done, & poster we did. A lot. Members of MR-C and MR-E worked together for the first time to poster all along one of Calgary’s busiest streets. As we were postering, we handed out our business cards to passers by who expressed an interest in what we were doing. We were surprised at the amount of positive feedback we received. The people of Calgary welcomed us with open arms and we had a blast while we were down there.

So our thanks go out to our generous hosts in Calgary, here’s to many years of FTSU.

Honey Badger Radio: Feminism's Pimp Hand

AVfM Radio · 12 September 2013 · Archived copy · Original

"Are the Vagina's in the house!" Eve Elsner screams to a cheering audience of feminists.
Yep. All us women? We're just vaginas.
And that's all that we are.
You know who else reduces women down to their genitals?
Pimps.
Specifically pimps reduce women down to what the pimp can extract in terms of benefit from their vaginas.
Sorta like feminists.
Except for feminists it's not the vagina's use that's of interest, but it's abuse. And whatever can be twisted into abuse of vaginas.
Make no mistake, like the pimp, all they care about is your vagina. If you didn't have a vagina, they wouldn't really care what happened to you.
You're a whore in their stable, pimped out for their benefit. And if you refuse to be feminsim's whore, watch out for their pimp hand!
The instant you say no, you'll see just how deep sisterhood goes.

Rape jokes of the 1980s

Every feminist loves a good rape joke.

"Women never lie about rape" and "women cannot rape men except with objects" are their two favorites. When feminists deliver these side-splitting witticisms they are sure to get a hearty LOL from any informed normal person in earshot.

We present here three accounts of false rape accusations dating from the 1980s. Andrea Cohen of New York failed to do her homework before targeting her victim with her lies and it cost her ten grand. The thriving metropolitan center of Okaloosa County, Florida, population 110,000, actually had a mini-epidemic of false rape accusations reported in a newspaper due to the fact that instead of closing the cases after it was discovered that the male victims were innocent the Sheriff actually arrested the criminals who had targeted these men.

In the case of Nebraska false accuser Irene Richardson a great hullabaloo was made over the judge's requirement that Ms. Richardson take measures to restore the reputation of her victim. A civil rights group saw such a demand – that she tell the truth – as cruel and unusual punishment. Telling the truth about rape was, to be fair to the lady, certainly unusual for Ms. Richardson, but who would regard a false accuser being required to tell the truth as cruel, but a feminist?

STORY # 1: Andrea Gordon's Hairy Rape Tale – 1980

FULL TEXT (Article 1 of 5): Mineola, N. Y. – A New York City employee won $10,000 in state Supreme Court after he gave a convincing demonstration of his argument that he had been falsely sued for rape.

Jeffrey Gordon, a 30-year-old accountant with the New York City comptroller's office, was arrested last year and charged with first-degree rape. When a grand jury refused to indict him, Gordon sued the woman who brought the charge against him, 29-year-old Andrea Cohen, for $2.5 million for alleged libel and slander.

Miss Cohen testified Wednesday during the one-day non-jury trial that when she was raped, she had pulled at Gordon's hair.

At that point in the testimony, Gordon stood up [and] removed his toupee.

Justice Angelo Roncallo directed the $10,000 settlement, saying he didn't believe the alleged rape ever happened.

STORY # 2: Okaloosa County, Florida's False Accusation Mini-Epidemic of 1981

FULL TEXT (Article 2 of 5): Shalimar – In an unusual twist, three Florida Panhandle women have been charged with filing false rape complaints.

“It’s a real switch for us to arrest women who said they were victims,” says Deputy Shirley Boles, a rape investigator for the Okaloosa County [population 110,000] authorities. But sheriff’s agents say four of the complaints were phony.

“We’ve arrested two women on charges of filing false reports to law enforcement officers,” Ms. Boles said. “We’ve charged a third woman and we’re working on the papers in the fourth case.”

Filing a false complaint is a misdemeanor, the deputy said. Ms. Boles and her partner, anti-rape specialist Jo Hunter, said women who falsely accuse men of rape should be punished.

“This type of thing isn’t only a crime, it sets women back light years in their attempts to bring the real rapists to justice,” said Ms. Hunter, also a deputy.

“It not only hurts the men who are falsely blamed and face life prison sentences, but it hurts all women everywhere. It’s like the boy who cried ‘wolf.’”

Motivations for filing false rape complaints vary, but the investigators said some women are misusing rape laws because they feel upset about sex or are just spiteful.

In one case, a young woman was miffed because she thought her boyfriend had a date with another woman, deputies said. She accused the boyfriend of rape.

Another case involved a woman who performed a sex act after she was offered money. When the man refused to pay, she accused him of rape, Ms. Boles said.

STORY # 3) When Telling the Truth is “Cruel and Unusual”

[image]

FULL TEXT (Article 3 of 5): Omaha, Neb. – A woman who falsely accused a man of raping her was ordered to run radio and newspaper advertisements apologizing to him. But the man says the sentence will not undo the damage.

“You can’t change a wrong to a right,” said Gary Nitsch. “I lost a job. I had to get a lawyer. The kids at school were saying to my kids, “Your dad’s a rapist.”

And the ads may never be printed or aired.

Elizabeth Irene Richardson, 24, is considering appealing the sentence, which the Nebraska Civil Liberties Union says may be cruel and unusual punishment.

Richardson accusing Nitsch, 44, of Overton, of raping her in September 1988. she reportedly told police that he raped her when he came to her housed in search of a painting job.

Nitsch was arrested and charged with sexual assault, but the case was dropped in February this year for lack of strong physical evidence.

Word reached authorities that Richardson has told friends the rape was a hoax. Her attorney, Todd McKeone, said Richardson admitted she made up the accusations to get attention from her husband, a trucker who is often away from home.

Richardson pleaded guilty to perjury in April and was sentenced June 8, according to press reports.

A judge ordered Richardson to apologize to Nitsch in half-page advertisements in every newspaper and on commercials on each radio station in Dawson County, a country of about 22,000 in central Nebraska.

The media campaign was expected to cost about $1,000, her attorneys said. She also was sentenced to 180 days in jail and was placed on two years' probation.

A panel of state civil liberties union attorneys who reviewed the case said the sentence may violate Richardson's rights under the Eighth and 14th amendments.

[image]

The Eighth Amendment protects individuals against cruel and unusual punishment and the 14th Amendment ensures due process.

The organization is "concerned about the scarlet letter approach in sentencing," said Bill Schatz, NCLU executive director. "Suppose someone is arrested for shoplifting. Are we going to make him wear a sign saying he's a convicted shoplifter? Is there such a thing as punishment fitting crime?"

If the case is appealed, the organization will offer research services and may file a friend-of-the court brief, Schatz said.

Nitsch said he was still puzzled about how his name came up in the rape charge.

He said he met Richardson once during the spring or summer of 1988 when he went to her house inquiring about the painting job she had advertised.

"I would just like to have someone tell me how I was named," he said.

He said his ordeal has taken a toll on his family.

He said his wife, Naomi, "doesn't like to come to town and face people." His 18-year-old daughter quit high school in March because of the was she was being treated, Nitsch said.

"We've lived in a trailer house since 1973," he said. "We're saving for a home, but when you have attorneys' fees, it's hard."

Nitsch said he was fired from his job as a driver after being questioned at work by authorities and jailed for three days. He's now a part-time construction worker.

He said he wants a full-time job but "people want clean help. They don't want somebody that's been in trouble with the law."

"I used to go into town and drink coffee and joke with people, but everything just kind of turned sour," Nitsch said.

"The first year, I was so depressed I didn't want people to see me," he said. "If I went into town I had to have somebody drive me so I could scoot down in the seat so nobody would see me."

Nitsch said he is also bitter about the way authorities handled his case. His attorneys are suing four sheriff's deputies for $100,000, claiming he was arrested and his home was searched without cause.

"Mr. Nitsch is apparently the victim of some lies. But that is not the fault of the sheriff's department," said Randy Goyette, an attorney representing the Dawson County Sherfiff's Office.

Jim O'Rourke, now a district court judge, was Dawson County attorney at the time.

"I believe that the case was very professionally and accurately handled," O'Rourke said. "We went with what we had and we did the best we could."

O'Rourke said Richardson decided not to pursue the case after he told her the trial would be difficult for her without corroborating evidence.

FULL TEXT (Article 4 of 5): Lexington, Neb. – A woman sentenced to apologize in radio and newspaper ads to a man she falsely accused of raping her won't appeal the sentence to the state Supreme Court, her attorney said Friday.

An attorney for Elizabeth Irene Richardson said he mailed a dismissal of the appeal to the Nebraska Supreme Court on Thursday.

Ms. Richardson, 24, did not want to risk having a judge gave her a longer jail sentence if the Supreme Court decided she could not be ordered to pay for the advertisements as a condition of probation, said defense attorney Tod McKeone.

"There's still some possibility of not having to run them (the ads)," he said.

He said the defense was considering alternatives to appealing the sentence to a higher court, including possibly filing a motion asking the district court for a sentence reduction.

"It would have been an interesting case to test this kind of sentencing to see if it would send up under constitutional grounds," McKeone said.

Ms. Richardson, a former Lexington resident, was sentenced June 8 to 180 days in jail and was placed on two years probation for perjury.

A Dawson County District Court judge also ordered Ms. Richardson to apologise to Gary Nitsch in a half-page advertisement in every newspaper and a primetime spot in each radio station in Dawson, a central Nebraska county of about 22,000 people.

Ms. Richardson now lives in Overton, had accused Nitsch, 44, of Overton of raping her in September 1988. he was arrested and charged with sexual assault. Ms. Richardson told friends the rape was a hoax. She was convicted of her perjury last February. County attorney John Marsh said the woman's was trying to get the attention of her husband, a truck driver who was often away from home.

Authorities later learned that Ms. Richardson told friends the rape was a hoax. She was convicted of perjury last February. County attorney John Marsh said the woman's was trying to get the attention of her husband, a truck driver who was often away from home.

Nitsch, who said he had met the woman only briefly when he went to her house inquiring about a painting job she had advertised, has said that as a result of the false charge, he lost his job and his family was harassed.

FULL TEXT (Article 5 of 5): Lexington, Neb. – A woman who falsely accused a man of rape apologized Sunday in court-ordered radio ads, saying she hopes time will heal the damage to the man's reputation. Elizabeth Irene Richardson, 24, was ordered to run radio and newspaper ads throughout Dawson County in central Nebraska as part of her sentence for a perjury conviction last February. She was later to begin a six-month jail term for falsely accusing Gary Nitsch, 44.

"I want the public to know that these allegations were not true and that I made up the story for personal reasons," Ms. Richardson said in the radio ad. "While I realize there is nothing I can really do or say to repair the damage I have caused, I sincerely pray that time will heal the wounds my false allegation have inflicted on Mr. Nitsch and his family," she said. Ms. Richardson accused Nitsch of raping her in September 1988. He was charged with sexual assault, but the case was dropped for lack of physical evidence.

Welcome to 2.1 and beyond

Paul Elam · 12 September 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Greetings! If this is your first time to A Voice for Men, allow me to say welcome. If this is not your first time to A Voice for Men, you are probably having a WTF moment!

Indeed, as you can tell right now a lot has changed around here. And hold on to your seats, a lot more is about to change in the days ahead.

While we have all gone about our normal routines, our team has been hard at work re-envisioning and rebuilding AVFM from the ground up. And when I say from the ground up I mean that literally.

We have gone through some real trials recently, testing our patience and our budget to update the aesthetics and functionality of AVFM in order to freshen up the place and to bring you an enhanced user experience. There have been some harsh learning experiences. One web developer, OSS Media, took two thousand dollars of our money and accomplished exactly nothing. I have begun to look at web devs like I look at lawyers as a result – apologies to the handful of decent attorneys out there.

The frustrations have led to some rethinking. The team recently brainstormed and came up with an innovative approach that brings all of you into the fold on what happens as it happens.

What you are experiencing right now, as you read this, is a new technology platform for AVFM that was licenced with only one thing in mind.

Functionality.

The current visual "design" is nothing more than a template; one that we have invested heavily in, and one that we can change effortlessly, at will and instantaneously in real time — which we will be doing in all certainty as we rebuild this place in front of your eyes.

It is AVFM 2.1, a living springboard to AVFM 3.0, which will be a seamless, feature rich environment that will take AVFM to the next level in functionality and appearance. And it is coming to you courtesy of a team of individuals who wish not to be named, but who have provided the resources to do the things we have always dreamed of for this site.

It starts with the bones. The page you are reading now loaded 220% faster than the pages loaded the last time you were here. The beauty of this is that whatever additions and changes we bring to the site, and there will be many, it will retain the same speed and smoothness of operation.

As I said, there will be many changes to come. The site you are looking at now will not have the same look as the site you will see when we are finished. So if you hate this design, take heart, it is just a canvas over which a lot of painting will be done.

You can expect some awesomeness in the days ahead. Private messaging between registered users, self-hosted streaming video and radio, seamless integration with a new forum that Al Martin is developing as we speak, and an individuated news department that will bring your MHRM related news in a much more distinctive "newsy" presentation.

Soon you will be able to actually personalize AVFM according to your own taste, your location, and with the coming multilingual feature, your native language.

The site is also being redesigned with community building in mind. This will take FTSU to a whole new level. Each time you come to the site, you will see actionable items, from your selected location, and you will have ways to instantaneously connect with others that share your desire to get things done for men and boys.

The beauty of this is that we will not have to ask for a lot of your patience as we hammer and saw and kick up dust in the process. With the priority of functionality having been set from the beginning, all the changes should happen right in front of your eyes without so much as a hiccup.

I am very excited by what you are about to see, and I think you will be, too. Feel free to leave your comments and suggestions. We will be reading all of them and doing what we can to respond to your wishes for this community.

Congratulations, AVFM supporters, on another step forward for the Men's Human Rights Community.

World suicide and the World Happiness Report

Steve Brulé · 13 September 2013 · Archived copy · Original

The World Happiness Report (WHR) was released on September 9 2013, the day before World Suicide Prevention Day.

Suicide is tragic regardless of the race, sex, or age of the victim. The tragedy, and this burden of guilt must be carried by our entire culture, is that some among us feel so hopeless about their future that they feel their only option is to die. Suicide affects everyone close to the victim, often destroying the lives of the survivors.

If suicide is to be addressed effectively, it needs to be understood. That means openly talking about victim demographics; who they are and why they commit suicide, for starters. And yet even on World Suicide Prevention Day, the media chose to be evasive about the truth.The CTV news piece about World Suicide Prevention Day mentioned the many suicide cohorts, the complexities of suicide, that individuals have differing motives, that differences occur within each age group. In fact they went to considerable trouble to touch on these complexities.

But the CTV commentators avoided the single biggest and most significant statistic surrounding suicide: Male victims outnumber female victims 4 to 1. Almost everyone knows this fact, and this statistic only represents the confirmed deaths by suicide. The true number of male suicides is likely much higher: men drink themselves to death, essentially self-medicating to avoid intolerable emotional pain, and men engage in extremely risky behavior, often leading to premature “accidental” death as a form of distraction from the reality of their lives.

Most of the website posts that I found about World Suicide Prevention Day also deliberately avoided the fact that suicide disproportionately affects males, for example here, and on Wikipedia. The Centre for Addiction and Mental Health goes so far as to mention Teens, Soldiers, and Aboriginal Communities as having disproportionately high rates of suicide. But no mention of Males as a cohort group.

Not even Suicide Prevention Canada mentions the extraordinary fact that suicide is completed mostly by males, even though the statistical significance of the male suicide rate is so great that “being male” should be added to the list of risk factors for suicide.

But the opposite is happening. This truth is being minimized or even ignored, as if the male cohort is really not important. And that’s the crux of the matter. It isn’t important because, as courageous researchers like Warren Farrell and Michael Gilbert have shown, males are considered disposable in our culture.

It’s not that the suicide researchers are shy to point out special victim cohorts. The International Association for Suicide Prevention (IASP) lists several special interest groups and task forces including Suicidal Behaviour in Adolescents, Suicide and the Workplace, Suicide and the Media, Suicide in Older People, Suicide in Prisons. They simply refuse to consider “Suicide in Males” as a cohort; the single largest and statistically significant cohort within this entire topic. In fact I could not find any mention of the gender-disproportionate nature of suicide anywhere on the IASP website.

This is the 20,000 ton elephant in the room: suicide is overwhelmingly committed by males. Why is that? The media in our culture have no reservations about identifying a male cohort when identification is negative, like crime or violence, or even creating false negative images of males, like men are clumsy, insensitive, less capable parents, or even promoting the discredited assertion that perpetrators of domestic violence are almost exclusively male. But when males are the overwhelming victims, that topic suddenly becomes gender-neutral, or even reversed using some twisted assertion like when Hillary Clinton claimed that “women have always been the primary victims of war.”

The only site I found that has the courage to state the truth about male suicide up front and center was the UK government, which openly states that suicide is the leading cause of death in young men.

The American Foundation for Suicide Prevention (AFSP) leads with the neutral statement that “90% of people who die by suicide have a diagnosable and treatable psychiatric disorder at the time of their deaths." Dig into their website and you will read that 4 times as many males than females commit suicide but this next statistic is particularly revealing: as a race, white people have the highest incidence of suicide, higher than Native Americans by a considerable margin. At first glance this is surprising, because most people believe that Native Americans have a suicide problem. But the hard cold fact is: the cohort group with highest incidence of suicide in North America, and possibly the world, is White Males, the very same group that feminists claim are oppressing everyone else.

Why is that? Why would a group of "privileged oppressors" feel so hopeless about their lives that they kill themselves? This led me to the World Happiness Report (WHR), and more importantly, what the media is not telling us about the WHR.

The countries rated as having the happiest people in the world are all industrialized countries. This shouldn't be too surprising, and that's about as deep as the media coverage went on this report. But the report itself is exhaustive, and goes to great pains to extract useful and reliable estimates from the mountain of collected data and the factors that affect happiness.

Big Media ignores a very significant finding: "In most advanced countries women report higher satisfaction and happiness than men." Then, in a stunning example of bias, the researchers rationalize their finding with this mind-bending statement: "women are relatively happier in countries where gender rights are more equal." Not that women's rights might exceed men's rights in these countries, for example in family law and employment law, but that they are "more equal." It doesn't occur to them to ask why women are happier than men in the industrialized world. They merely claim, out of thin air, that it must be because gender rights are "more equal" in these countries.

The WHR report also emphasized such things as health and educational opportunities as critical to happiness. In North America, spending on female-specific health greatly outpaces male-specific health spending, and females now also outnumber males 2 to 1 at university. Is that "more equal" enough for you? If we get any "more equal" we won't have any male university students at all.
Another study, Gender and Well-Being around the World (GWBW), found the same thing: "Women around the world are happier than men, regardless of which happiness question is used." Furthermore they, too, use double-speak: "the findings suggest that the gap is greater (e.g. women are happier) where gender rights are more equal." Where on earth do they get the nerve to offer such a facile dismissal of such an overwhelmingly significant finding?

The finding is simply not important to the authors. Would it be important if the genders were reversed? If women were less happy than men, would the researchers be concerned?

We don't have to speculate on that. The authors of the WHR conducted a case study on Bhutan, one of the very few countries in the world where men were found to be happier than women. The authors conclude: "The fact that two-thirds of deeply happy people are men is of clear policy interest," whereas of course the fact that men are less happy than women in EVERY INDUSTRIALIZED COUNTRY IN THE WORLD is of no interest, or worse, it is evidence that gender rights are "more equal" in the industrialized countries.

The World (un)Happiness Report parallels the 4 to 1 suicide gender-imbalance, an imbalance also found in every industrialized country. That's a whopper of a coincidence! But, inexplicably, this is of no interest to the "scientists."

And this finding extends into marriage as well. The GWBW report concluded that "Married men are less happy than married women in all three income regions, although the happiness gap between married men and married women is smallest in the low income countries." Could this possibly be a reflection of draconian anti-male divorce laws, and the fact that married men know how screwed they are if the wife gets angry enough to file for divorce? Could it be a reflection of the relative lack of resources devoted to men's health, or the emphasis on hiring and promoting women over men due to Affirmative Action, or the stampede to label and medicate young boys for ADHD, or the rise in false sexual assault charges? Well that herd of elephants is probably too big to fit in any room on this planet.

The status of men in North America, and their disadvantage in the gender war, is so bad that a new group calling themselves MGTOW, short for Men Going Their Own Way, has sprung up. To varying degrees, these men opt for a life without a woman or a family of their own. A similar trend spontaneously started in Japan, they call themselves "Grass Eaters," and it's causing concern among women and employers.

These men have decided that the risks of being involved with a woman, like presumption of guilt in DV accusations and the likelihood of losing house, paycheck and kids when the marriage runs into trouble, have led them to the conclusion that dropping out is the best solution. Can you blame them?

This week Big Media reported on World Happiness, but hid the most significant finding of all: men are less happy than women. Some of this unhappiness is the hopelessness that leads to suicide.
The next day was World Suicide Prevention Day and the most extraordinary fact of all about suicide was not mentioned: that suicide victims are overwhelmingly male.

We've got to get a handle on suicide, male and female, and the World Happiness Report has handed us a big red flag that could point us in the direction of some of the causes of suicide, and therefor help us address the problem. We should you use it fully, even if the results are politically incorrect. Lives are depending on it.

It has become so rare to see males portrayed in a positive way in TV advertisements that I want to end this blog post with this absolutely wonderful Guinness basketball ad. Men need to help men. Big Business, Big Media, and Big Government are not going to do it. They are too busy making gender rights even "more equal" than they are now.

Ideology of Hate: Feminism in 1972

It was forty-one years ago to date,

Libbers spewed out choice words of hate.

Now their style is but a stream of bile,

When they bark we must salute them: "Heil !"

On September 13, 1972 a public conference (no men allowed) was held by the women's liberation organization named Feminists of New York. The following news report describing its proceedings helps to give proof to a blatant fact that most grown-ups know quite well by now: that feminism is a hate movement."

Yet today disingenuous disclaimers abound in writings distributed by the now immensely powerful gender ideology establishment:

"The old myth that feminism is linked to the hatred of men is one that still permeates much of society, and is an active hindrance in the long-overdue acceptance of feminism as simply the rational belief that men and women are equal, and should be treated as such: feminist and misandrist are not synonymous." [Helen Charman, "The GenderAgenda: why misandry has no place in feminism," Varsity (Cambridge University, UK), Oct. 18, 2012]

We are not fooled by the lie.

The viciously misandric 1972 quotations of Ms. Pat Mainardi which appeared in the daily papers have since become famous, yet in their original context of the convention her words take on a greater weight when it is understood that she was engaged in a calibrated and collaborate effort to alter the focus of the feminist movement from equality to hate. The rhetoric of "equality" survived of course, as a convenient cover for innumerable statistical hoaxes (the "pay gap" fable; the "war against women" fiction; fake rape statistics along with expensive (ie: profitable) "rape culture" propaganda and newly-minted regret-rape and brewsky-rape categories), and the ethos of hatred has, over time, grown. Hatred, we are now led to believe (sometimes characterized through the vogue-word, "rage") is "empowering."

It was only three years following this 1972 convention that a prominent but overly optimistic scholar, Midge Decter, noted that "hatred of men is a feminist doctrine" and predicted its eminent downfall. Decter was dead wrong. There was just too much money to be made, too many careers to launch, by means of the shakedown tactics and shrill demands (which, curious as it might seem, were always promptly met by the oppressor class) of those who claimed a fundamental and permanent victim status.

FULL TEXT: New York – And now there's a new topic of debate about women's liberation that's bound to make at least one-half of the population a bit uneasy – man-hating.

While more than 200 women cheered several speakers gave their personal views on why hating men was an essential subject related to women's equality. The conference, closed to men, was organized by the Feminists of New York, who had a similar speak-out on rape several years ago.

"We have a moral cause for hating men for they have taken away all our power," said Barbara Mirnoff of the Feminists, by way of introduction. "Men have imposed their minds and bodies on women and our hatred is a natural response, a rational and political hatred developing from centuries of male rule."

The women in the audience, mostly young, dressed in jeans and T-shirts, knitting, taking notes, or holding hands, had paid up to $2 to hear speakers like Robin Morgan, editor of an anthology of feminist writings, "Sisterhood is Powerful."

She read some of her favorite man-hating poems from her new book, "The Monster."

"I want a woman's revolution like a lover. I lust for it. How I wish that my tears were bullets to kill what terrorizes in men."

Janet Bajan, a member of the New York Radical Feminists, drew applause when she said that man hatred was "a protective reaction, a survival mechanism to change the situation in favor of women."

[image]

Pat Mainardi, married, the author of "The Politics of Housework," and the editor of the Feminist Art Journal, said, "Man-hating marks a turning point in the movement. We have been defensive long enough."

"People often ask me how women can be man-haters," she added. "And I wonder, how can we be anything else." The women cheered.

"We sleep with the enemy to find out his secrets and we pass them on to our allies," she said, but the audience hissed.

"The only way to win liberation is to make men miserable so they will have no peace until women are free. Married women invented man-hating," she declared.

[image]

One member of the Radical Lesbians claimed that the Lesbians were the original man-haters. But Jill Johnston, a Lesbian who writes for the Village Voice weekly newspaper, said that Lesbians were women lovers, not necessarily man haters. "I don't really want to waste my energy on encountering men and hating them," she said, though she expressed some admiration for a Lesbian friend who had physically assaulted men on the street.

The conference almost came to a standstill when one speaker announced, "All you Lesbians out there – in 10 years you'll be married to some man."

Men's human rights at Kennesaw State University

Sage Gerard (Victor Zen) · 13 September 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Kennesaw State University (KSU) is a relatively small university in Northwest Georgia, U.S.A., roughly thirty miles north of downtown Atlanta. KSU has been over capacity for the better part of the seventeen short years it held university status. The bustling student population supports at least 226 formal organizations representing a wide range of different interests, and many more organizations not listed in the previous link. Despite KSU's diversity, they consistently neglect the needs of men.

Let me show you how KSU treats its men and women.

Gynocentrism

About 60% of KSU's students are female, and a number of opportunities offered by campus and state organizations are given exclusively to these young women. For example, the Georgia Executive Women's Network offers a scholarship to women age 24 and up, and Women In Electronics offers supplementary funds that stack on existing financial aid to female students [1][2].

Campus organizations like Kennesaw Women in Mathematics (KWIM), promote the participation of women in mathematics. KSU and its student organizations have never hesitated in connecting women to opportunities from a plethora of programs. There is nothing wrong with offering opportunities to female students, but they are harder to justify when you compare the status of the KSU woman to the status of the KSU man.

There are scholarships, programs and courses available to all students, but women are the focus in promoting each. The most disturbing example is KSU Security's Rape Aggression Defense (R.A.D.) course. The KSU security department's page for R.A.D. mentions that men are allowed to attend a men's only R.A.D. course near the bottom.

> Resisting Aggression with Defense for Men is a new program being offered this year, to address the many requests from our male population for basic self-defense options. RAD For Men (RFM's) goal is to provide responsible information and tactical options of self-defense for men who find themselves in confrontational situations. For a male self-defense program to be an empowering experience it must contain a few key elements. These are: to educate men about their roles and responsibilities in reducing violence, to instill an understanding of reliance on others, to understand the responsibility and importance of making different decisions, and to obtain self-realization of the power of controlling one's emotions.

Scroll back up to the first paragraph of the same page and you will see this.

> Rape Aggression Defense (R.A.D.) is a simple yet affective [sic] self-defense class for women only.

In addition, the periodic email blast for R.A.D. not only leaves out all mention of R.A.D. for Men, it also explicitly tells you only women may attend. The email shown below was sent to me on September 4th, 10:44 AM. allstudents@groups.kennesaw.edu broadcasts a message to all students, assuming you are sending the message from an authorized address (If you try to send something there, it won't work since you are not authorized to broadcast anything). This alias makes it easy to promote events.

10:44 AM is an odd time for automated system to send emails, so I suspect a human being typed this email. This means (s)he had a chance to see the hypocrisy of offering a unisex course while claiming that it is exclusively available to women.

AVFM member Eriu pointed out that an FBI Uniform Crime Report (UCR) for KSU shows that only twelve rapes were reported on KSU from 1995 to 2010. From 1995-1999, not a single rape was reported [1][2][3][4][5]. One rape was reported in 2000, and then we drop again to no rapes for 2001 and 2002.

The R.A.D. course was founded in 2002.

At time of founding, one rape report was all they had to demonstrate need. The highest number of rape reports totaled a whopping 4 in 2009 [1][2]. R.A.D. cannot feasibly take credit for the low numbers, since even prevented rapes would be reported by frightened, would-be victims.

When R.A.D. for Men was introduced, KSU Security Officer Trudi Vaughan had this to say about what the course offers in the Sentinel (the campus paper):

> "It doesn't insult or diminish your ability to be a man if you walk away," Vaughan said.
> RAD for men was developed from the Rape Aggression Defense for women, a course offered by KSU PD since 2002.
> "It focuses a lot on what your responsibilities are as a man," Vaughan said. "When women say 'no,' it doesn't mean 'no until you talk me into it'; it means no."
> The RAD for men mission statement is "To provide responsible information and tactical options of self-defense for men who find themselves in confrontational situations."

Men are offered "tactical options for self-defense" such as walking away from violent confrontation after being reminded that "no means no."

R.A.D. simulates a live attack on students executed by the "R.A.D. Man." The R.A.D. Man can be played by either a man or a woman (where the woman is still informally called the R.A.D. Man in promos). If you look at the email, you will see that women are expected to inflict injury and pain. In the Sentinel, men are encouraged to not fight back, and are given a reminder to not rape.

Outside of security, the KSU Gender and Women's Studies department offers a masculinity course (see GWST 3080) with required readings including Michael Kimmel's Guyland. The original course proposal has a red flag on page 3:

> The course will be regularly evaluated through the ongoing assessment of the gender and women's studies program faculty according to university guidelines.

Students are regularly evaluated by the people who endorse Kimmel and the kind of environment KSU provides. Women are the focus for numerous campus benefits, and even a unisex service for preventing a traumatic event is marketed to women alone. Men are not considered important enough to communicate with, even though some programs have become unisex in response to male demand.

Men have silently fought for representation, only to have it reluctantly granted with a gynocentric twist.

Facts are facts. KSU plays favorites.

Haphazard Support for Men

On February 20th this year, I attended the first meeting of The Gentlemen's Club (TGC), a self-described "safe haven" for men founded by two KSU counselors. I was impressed and excited about the group after hearing about the philosophy of its founders, but started to back away when I learned of its policies.

The founders, Dr. Faust and Dr. Griggs, claim to follow the methods of Dr. Miles Groth. After the first meeting, the group sounded too good to be true. Quote Dr. Faust at 1:02:15 of the first meeting:

> [We will be] a group of guys who will get together and talk about real issues that we face everyday. We can't do it out there. There's people out there who don't understand. They humiliate us. They talk about us. They embarrass us. That will never happen in this particular safe environment. [I want to] create an environment where people can be themselves. That's all we're asking for. It's not complicated!

I reacted positively, and the doctors asked me to help recruit new members. I offered the doctors a chance to talk to the staff at A Voice For Men (AVFM) for exposure. The doctors declared AVFM "militant" and backed away from it. They declined me the opportunity to record our second meeting, so I cannot prove what they told me next. I must therefore simply ask you to take my word for what I learned. All members had to sign a contract giving the doctors consent to monitor intermember communication.

When I questioned TGC's founders about their invasive policies, they responded with a bitter psychoanalysis of my outlook on society and how men fit in the grand scheme of things. Dr. Faust said that there are broken men that needed to be "fixed," and he never clarified what that meant. My take is that many men are just fine the way they are, but need a place to be themselves without carrying the burden of unwarranted guilt and bottled up emotions.

I thought that TGC was the sanctuary men deserved, but I was wrong. TGC was meant to be a group therapy session where the members were not allowed to socialize with one another outside of the group. Unsurprisingly, Dr. Groth was confused by this approach when I emailed him to ask about it. It is safe to say that TGC does not follow Groth's methods as closely as it first claimed.

My suspicions were correct: TGC was too good to be true. But I must say through gritted teeth that TGC was the best thing for men I could find on campus. A full log of my relationship with TGC can be found on MarZ.

Kennesaw State University is a school where men are struggling for relevance. KSU enforces anti-discrimination policies just enough for men to get representation, so long as it's all for the grace of women.

KSU does not respond to men's issues with violence or resentment. Instead, KSU greets men with tense silence followed by reluctance, a small cookie reward and some PR hand-waving, in that order. Once KSU feels like men are satisfied enough to shut up, the benefits KSU and its student-run subsidiaries just that second gave to men are reoriented to focus on women.

It would be wrong to say that no one on KSU cares about men. There are signs of life in the student body showing interest in men's issues, but these people always come second to gynocentrism. R.A.D. as it exists today demonstrates exactly what KSU is willing to let their own police department get away with.

Would you attend Kennesaw State University?

June Ann Olsen's hatred in 1960s Miami

Robert St. Estephe–Gonzo Historian–is dedicated to uncovering the forgotten past of marginalizing men. "Gonzo journalism" is characterized as tending "to favor style over fact to achieve accuracy." Yet history – especially "social history" – is written by ideologues who distort and bury facts in order to achieve an agenda. "Gonzo" writing is seen as unorthodox and surprising. Yet, in the 21st century subjectivity, distortion and outright lying in non-fiction writing is the norm. Fraud is the new orthodoxy. Consequently, integrity is the new "transgressive."

Readers of A Voice for Men are familiar with some of the more notable and articulate present-day adherents to gender ideology of the SCUM Manifesto variety such as Josefin von Zeipel Segerberg, Pamela O'Shaughnessy ("Vliet Tiptree," pseudonym), Krista Leighanne Milburn ("Krista Jane Heflin" pseudonym). Many people erroneously suppose, however, that the eugenics-inspired, genocidal ideation-styled, violent authoritarian types of feminist utopian philosophy find their source exclusively in ideology. The fact is that the mentality called misandric fixation (see "What is Misandric Fixation?") need not arise through the influence of ideology or deliberate intellectual cogitation of any sort. Further it can be observed that ideological misandry has existed long before the explosion of radical feminism in the 1960s.

June Anne Olsen needed no theory, no cult of hatred to inspire her 1960s-era fiery reign of terror in Miami, Florida, yet the manifestion of her personal style of misandry was just as fanatical as one might find in the fantasies of the most celebrated tenured professor in the trendiest Ivy League university in the land.

(Article 1 of 6) EXCERPT: Take June Ann Olsen, a fresh-faced blonde who once burned down an entire Miami city block [in 1962]. She would lure men, including a famous TV producer, into motel rooms. After they were undressed, she would slosh lighter fluid onto the bed and torch it. "You ought to see them run," she told [Pulitzer Prize-winning reporter, Edna Buchanan].

Next time I saw her name, it was on a police report; she was dead. Though many amateur arsonists die trapped by their own flames, June Ann Olsen did not. She was struck and killed by a train. Nothing about arson is funny — or harmless.

(Article 2 of 6) FULL TEXT : Miami – June Ann Olson, a 41-year-old blonde who once said she lured men into hotel rooms and then set fire to their beds, is back in jail on a charge of arson.

She was arrested Wednesday when she was found wandering in a section of northeast Miami where six fires started within 90 minutes.

The fires, all within a four block square, were put out before much damage was done. But a 50-year old man was slightly burned at an apartment house, and two elderly women had to be rescued from their second floor rooms.

Fire inspector Franklin McCrimmon, to whom Miss Olson surrendered in 1962 after she escaped from the South Florida State Hospital, said he found her wandering in the area looking a little dazed.

Miss Olson was charged with three spectacular fires in 1962.

"I just hate men," she said then, according to police. "They ought to stop the world – and push them all off.."

After she escaped from the hospital in 1962, she was sent to the Lowell State Prison for women where she spent 25 months.

She was paroled last year and worked for a time at the Salvation Army center in Ocala. Her employer said she was very capable.

The six fires all started among clothing, magazines or trash.

Three other fires were reported blocks away, nearer downtown.

(Article 3 of 6) FULL TEXT: Nine fires broke out in two sections of Miami early today [January 26, 1966] and police quickly nabbed suspected firebug June Ann Olsen, who once confessed she set fires to get even with men.

The 41-year old blonde was taken to Jackson Memorial Hospital for further investigation. She is a former inmate of the South Florida mental Hospital and of the state prison for women at Lowell.

One man was slightly burned in the biggest fire, in an apartment building at 246 NE 33rd St. Heroic rescue efforts saved other occupants. Two elderly women were taken down ladders from their second floor apartments.

Miss Olsen's last connection with fires in this area was in 1962 when she was charged with setting three spectacular blazes. Police said at the time she would pick up men and take them to the rooms with a promise of romance. Instead, she would set the bed on fire, they said.

Joes Mazanek, 50, of NE 33rd St., ran out of his house when he heard screams next door and rescued Mrs. Eleanor Hose with a ladder from the burning building.

Fire Chief Charles Jones of Miami District 2 climbed a ladder to rescue another occupant, Mrs. Mary Harrison, who was sitting on the ledge of her window.

Five other fires were reported in the same area. At 3300 Biscayne, a pile of papers blared up behind an apartment building. At 337 NE 33rd St., a mattress burned in a garage apartment. At 250 NE 32nd St., and ironing board and broom burned in the utility room of an apartment building. At 247 NE 31st St., papers burned in a rear garage. And at 3115 NE 2nd Ave., the rear room of a barber shop was damaged by a fire that was started among clothing and magazines.

Meanwhile, District 1 firemen downtown got busy. Their first call was to the Pink Flamingo Hotel at 28 NE 5th St. where they put out a minor fire.

A vacant and condemned house in the path of the expressway at 350 NW 9th St. was gutted by fire a few minutes later. And at 29 SW 6th Ave., a rooming house at the rear of Robert's Drug Store was severely damaged.

(Article 4 of 6) FULL TEXT: Dade's Incendiary Blonde, June Ann Olsen, was arrested on arson charges after a series of closet blazes early today.

Miss Olsen, 41, who once confessed she set fires to get even with men, already was out on $500 bond after being arrested here Jan. 26. Nine fires broke out in two sections of the city that day.

When four fires broke out in a short time early today, and a woman was reported seen in the area, police started looking for Miss Olsen.

Patrolman Louis Kirchoff spotted her strolling along Biscayne Boulevard at 48th Street at about 2:30 a.m. she was arrested on charges of first degree arson and booked into Dade County Jail.

Found in her purse were $38 cash and a bottle of 100 barbiturate (Nembutal) tablets.

The fires started at 1:55 a.m., when firemen were sent to an apartment building at 311 NE 14th St to quell a blaze in a hall closet. Five minutes later, the fire-fighters were called to another closet fire in a building a block away, at Bayshore Drive and NE 13th Street.

Then, about 15 minutes later, they were off to a building at 310 SE 1st. Ct. this time, there were two close fires – one on the first floor, and one on the third.

The man-hating blonde also is wanted by Fort Lauderdale police for questioning about a fire Sunday at a senior citizen's apartment. She fits the description of a woman who was laughing and singing outside the apartment after the fire started.

Miss Olsen has undergone psychiatric treatment for pyromania and once served a prison term for arson, she said she set fires to get even with men for making passes at her.

She has a history of picking up men with a promise of romance – and instead, setting the bed on fire, police said.

Greg Canning · 14 September 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Most would have heard that there has been a change of government in Australia from incumbent Labor (Socialist Left), Green (Socialist Environmentalists) and allied independents to a Liberal National Coalition (Center Right or Conservative) who have swept to power in a landslide victory.

Regrettably this is unlikely to lead to any significant change in policy or laws relevant to men's and boys' issues at least in the short term.

One interesting outcome is that the balance of power in the Senate (our upper house or house of review) will move from the Greens, to a group of independent and minor party Senators including the new Palmer United Party (formed by Mining Magnate Businessman Clive Palmer after splitting from the Liberal Party), the Motor Vehicle Enthusiasts Party, The Australian Sports Party, The Family First Party (Traditional Family Values), The Democratic Labor Party, and Liberal Democrats.

Some of the new Senators may be receptive to submissions from residents in their respective States on male related issues, so I encourage you to write to them and ask about their stance on issues such as family law, family court, child support, and men's health reforms.

Whilst the Rudd/ Labor Party campaign machine tried to make gender an election issue, as Gillard had done previously for Labor, it did not gain traction. Prime Minister-elect Tony Abbott's supposed gaffe describing one of his candidates as having sex appeal and the mainstream media repetition and commentary on it provided the candidate concerned, Fiona Scott, advertising visibility and brand recognition money could not buy. She won easily in her electorate.

In the wake of the election everyone's favorite rape culture promoting, slut walking, gender-bigot, Clementine Ford, has a huge dose of sour grapes. The election has not however cured her of her feminist cognitive dissonance and hypocrisy. She has launched an online shop selling T-Shirts promoting sexual violence toward the new PM. This is the same Clementine Ford who vehemently denounced reasonable criticism of Julia Gillard's incompetence in office as offensive sexism targeting Gillard's gender. Surprise, surprise! Apparently only female Prime Ministers holding the high office of PM are deserving of respect.

On a brighter note the Australian National Men's Health Gathering will be held at the Brisbane Convention and Entertainment Centre from 22 to 25 Oct 2013. The event will host many well-known local and international authorities on men's health and issues including Warren Farrell and Glen Poole. Greg Andresen and Greg Milan will be presenting on behalf of the 1 in 3 Campaign, which aims to draw attention to male victims of family violence. I will be in attendance and will report further in due course.

Cheers

Party in Toronto!

"What the feminist driven student unions are doing is classic abuse 101: Isolation.

Isolating a target or a group of targets makes the target(s) more vulnerable and easier to control and abuse. It obstructs the target(s) from sharing their experiences or identifying similar experiences, supporting one another, reality testing, educating themselves and fostering a sense of community.

Heaven forbid the slaves learn how to read or (gasp) convene and talk! They might start smoking the ganja weed and get all rapey with the white women folk! Or find out what a shit deal they're getting.

I've considered Shrink4Men, NCFM, AVFM and my practice as an underground railroad of sorts for quite some time now. At this point, it would be more honest if certain feminist "scholars" traded in their caps/tams and gowns for white hooded robes. Frankly, I'm waiting for them to set a wooden penis aflame outside of CAFE." ~ Comment from Dr. Tara Palmatier on A Voice for Men

This comment came up in a recent discussion I had with the Good Doctor. I was filling her in on many of the recent events around here because her work schedule has taken her out of the loop a little. I would also like to share a couple of those things with you here.

First, I will be out next week. I am traveling to the west coast to begin the filmed interviews for the documentary being made about AVFM and the MHRM. I will also be meeting with Warren Farrell while I am there — discussing the recent momentum in the MRHM and what is to come in the days ahead.

One thing for sure is that a lot more activism is on the horizon. Some of it I cannot go into at this time, but I do have one very important thing that I can share with you now, particularly with Canadian MHRAs.

On Saturday, September 28 at 11:00 AM local time, the day after the lecture by Dr. Miles Groth at the University of Toronto there will be a Rally for Men and Boys in Crisis at Queen's Park in Toronto, hosted by A Voice for Men and several other organizations invested in understanding the issues faced by men and boys.

Attila Vinczer, a well-known and respected MHRA is doing the lion's share of the leg work and preparation for this event.

A Facebook page has recently been created for it. As of this writing 31 people have pledged to attend with 18 maybes, but the promotion has just begun. A conservative estimate at this point is that there will be over 100 people for the rally, which of course means I am going to work as hard as I can to see that over 200 show up.

Make that 300.

It is unfortunate that I will not personally be able to make this event, but there will be several Canadian MHRAs associated with AVFM who will be present. Of course, I urge American MRHAs who can attend the rally to do so in support of our Canadian fellows. We have word that media interest in this event is already popping up, and there may be a surprise or two in store for everyone.

As a reminder of the importance of what is happening in Toronto and across Canada, I refer you back to the comment by Dr. Palmatier.

Right now the voices of men and women in Canada who are concerned about the issues faced by men and boys are spreading. Efforts are underway to form more men's issues groups at Canadian Universities; groups that are free of the ideological puppeteering of academic feminists.

For those feminists, this is quite literally like teaching slaves to read. It is spreading the idea in a marginalized, demonized group of people that they deserve better than what they are getting. It is breaking the spell of 50 years of propagandized hate and malicious disinformation designed to keep men in a state of shame, ready to absorb whatever blame and mischaracterization is assigned to them.

It is the beginning of the end for the intellectual stranglehold that feminists have enjoyed on the culture at large.

Dr. T's comment is not hyperbole or dramatics. The analogy of an underground railroad is spot on. And what did many freed slaves do when they made it out of bondage? That's right. They dedicated time to freeing more slaves. And to exposing slavery for the morally bankrupt evil that it was.

They eventually wiped slavery, and any justification for it, completely off the map.

If you plan on attending the Groth lecture and the rally, please visit the Facebook event page and register your intent. If you can't make it, please stop by anyway and offer your words of support to Mr. Vinczer in one of the comments.

Will feminists try to crash the party? I seriously doubt it. We have seen them roundly tamed at more recent events, and those were actually on the college campus; their ideological safe haven. Even where their ideas are most widely accepted that have taken to wearing masks and resorting to clownish tricks. Personally I don't blame them. If I were spreading their message I would want to hide my face, too.

The bigots at Rabble.ca may post some more bilge-water, but they won't make a difference, either.

In another, less monopolized environment, I don't much expect they will have anything to say. My guess is that they will stick to attempts on campus to pull fire alarms, chant lies like they were ordering Cheese Covered Wacky Fries™ at a drive through and scream personal insults at people going in to attend the lecture. Thus far these kinds of actions have proven to be their complete repertoire of tricks aimed at stifling the free expression of ideas.

You can expect regular updates and a few more surprises to come your way between now and the Party in Toronto.

Whatever they want to do, I have another quote, just for them. I don't know where it comes from. I saw it recently as signature line in an email or a forum post, I don't remember which. But I remember the quote well.

"When the truth is your enemy, you're going to lose. It's just a matter of when."

Posters needed for Toronto protest

Paul Elam · 15 September 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Greetings all. As most of you know a growing number of MHRAs are converging on Toronto on the weekend of September 27 to attend the lecture by Dr. Miles Groth and to conduct a rally and protest the following morning at Queen's Park.

Word is getting out, and many are planning to attend. But in getting in touch with our feminist side, good is not good enough.

We want to produce flyers that a team of people are waiting to distribute across Toronto as we speak. Thousands of them will be printed and passed out/posted at several colleges, high schools and other gathering places across the city of Toronto. You can help make that happen.

If you can make a poster in .pdf format you can help spread the word of this important event.

Here is the specific text content we are looking for.

Audrey Tautou: Victim

Diana Davison · 15 September 2013 · Archived copy · Original

"Feminism ruined my Hollywood dream." This is what The Independent Online would have you believe Audrey Tautou said in an interview. Aside from being manipulative, the headline actually turns out to be quite ironic.

Though making it sound as if feminism was the thing that caused Audrey's problems, the article body explains that "The 37-year-old actress believes her feminist attitude towards roles in Hollywood has limited her career options because most female characters simply aren't 'interesting' enough for her to be bothered to play."

The dreams Audrey might have, which she may have watched die, and whose fault it was, is not really of global importance. The hook of the story is the oppression of women. The premise of the article is that women like Audrey still face a sexist world which blocks women from achieving their goals. Investigation quickly reveals this claim to be a fabrication by the journalists involved, one which so grossly misrepresents the facts that they should be embarrassed.

The article by The Independent Online was originally acquired from a central celebrity news site called Bang Showbiz. From there it was printed in about a dozen news sites on September 10, 2013 under the headline "Audrey Tautou: Men think I'm a pain" until The Independent changed the headline to "Feminism ruined my Hollywood dream" the next day. The use of the word "my" in that title is outrageous. Not only is this quote an invention, Audrey Tautou never used the word "feminist" or "feminism" in any of the source material.

The Bang Showbiz article being mirrored mentions that all quotes came from Audrey's talk with the Metro newspaper. BS states that "the French star claims all the men in her life see her as a challenge because of her strong personality and reluctance to submit to please the opposite sex."

That sounds terrible. Poor Audrey!

Note the use of the words "submit" and "opposite sex" to inflate the drama of her supposed conflict with men. Now lets look at what the Metro printed in their Q&A formatted article:

> Metro: "You've described yourself as a 'pain'. How come?"
> Audrey Tautou: "All the boys I have known say that I can be a pain. I have a very strong character and just because I'm a woman doesn't mean I'm going to do what the man wants."

There is no actual connection between Audrey's statement and her career. On the surface it was a random personal question thrown in with the more appropriate queries about her recent film Thérèse. The film is the reason Tautou was being interviewed and it's likely the only reason she agreed to do the interview in the first place.

One of the few things that Ms. Tautou has been very clear and consistent about is that she doesn't want her private life to be the subject of news stories. She only does interviews as a publicity requirement for her job. She has also been very clear that her decision to not move to Hollywood was based on her rejection of their lifestyle not their rejection of hers.

The Metro victimized Audrey Tautou. Not only did they take her reply to a personal question and make that the title and focus of their article about her film, they don't seem to have actually asked her that question at all.

A search for the quote online shows that the quote Metro inserted into their article in 2013 actually came from an article written by James Mottram for Metro Life in January 2005. The eight year old source for this year's headline was hideously but more accurately titled "The Very Talented Mademoiselle Tautou; Audrey Tautou Became an International Star in 2001 with Amelie. but She Rejected Hollywood Hullabaloo in Favour of a Quiet Life in Paris. Now She's Back in the Wartime Drama A Very Long Engagement, Directed by Amelie's Jean-Pierre Jeunet. She Talks to James Mottram"

Since the Metro had no morality about stealing a quote from a very old article and printing it as if it was just said to them, it's not surprising that they omitted the part which said "Tautou is determined to avoid the subject of her love life. 'I don't want to be this public person,' she groans." The conclusion of the article explains "she has no interest in heading to Hollywood. 'I don't have that ambition. I don't want the sacrifices that come with it."

The reporters publishing these stories have exploited a statement Audrey made about her private life eight years ago, ignored her wishes to protect her private affairs, making her private life the headline, and have created a political identity for her as a feminist when, in fact, there is no evidence she's ever used that word.

Feminism truly did ruin Audrey's Hollywood dream; after they created it for her.

It is a sad example of rhetoric and lies, fabricating Audrey's dream then ripping it away from her with patriarchy theory before she even had the chance to enjoy the dream. That this particular example is "just" celebrity gossip does not reduce the significance of the lie. It is mostly read by women who will take Audrey's plight to heart and grab their signboards.

"I need feminism because I'm an Audrey Tautou fan."

What starts out sounding like a trivial matter becomes bigger as it enters the narrative. Gossip writers are sloppy and lazy and lie without shame. What they've done with their professional misconduct is to glaringly expose how social narratives are created and reinforced.

When people discount the power of the written word they are being dangerously naive. James Hillman, an underrated psychologist who specialized in archetypal psychology and myth, explained in the Puer Papers how current events and history are actually "story first and fact later." [1]

"Nothing can be revealed by a newspaper, by the world's chronique scandaleuse, unless the essence be grasped from within through an archetypal pattern. The archetype provides the basis for uniting those incommensurables, fact and meaning. Outer historical facts are archetypally ordered so as to disclose essential psychological meanings. These archetypal orderings of historical facts are the eternally recurring mythemes of history and of our individual souls. Through these meanings history affects our psyche, while at the same time history is the stage on which we enact the mythemes of our soul." [2]

When writing articles or books, the "facts" that are being reported are the starting point but, on their own, do not make a story. Stories are built and the facts are inserted in the places where they can add the most drama. Current events and news stories are actually a form of art and, if performed with skill, will become history.

Mythemes are what feminists employ to entrench their narrative into society. In the news, the myth is the framework into which the facts are carefully placed. When the myth of the news article remains consistent with a currently accepted social narrative people are more likely to treat the story as factual without investigation. Building that social narrative is what takes time and effort. Afterwards, the myth is easy to maintain. News that presents an uncommon narrative will have to work much harder to be accepted as factual.

Jonathan Potter studied social narratives in his book Representing Reality. He came to the conclusion that "factual discourse, even in casual, mundane settings, such as in an argument between a husband and wife, is organized in enormously fine detail and with great subtlety." [3] He explains the various methods of fact construction employed in rhetoric and news reporting and how factuality can be de-constructed.

The Everyday Sexism Project is a great example of what Potter calls "out-there-ness." By creating an external source outside of themselves the writers solidify their story as fact "by drawing attention away from concerns with the producer's stake in the description." [4] Fact is created by eliminating any appearance of writer bias.

By encouraging as many women as possible to collect their subjective experiences in one place they can create a fact by removing accusations of personal manipulation. That all of the events, taken separately, are not proven facts gets lost when all the stories amass together into a leviathan that won't be argued with. They encourage submissions of events that are “minor” or so “niggling” they hardly qualify as an event.

The site goal is very clear: “By sharing your story you’re showing the world that sexism does exist, it is faced by women everyday and it is a valid problem to discuss.”

The project isn’t worried about reality, its focus is to create facts to reinforce their narrative.

Audrey Tautou’s statement that men find her “a pain” has now been incorporated into the feminist myth as proof of patriarchy and sexism. That she never actually said or even implied that men ruined her career, the feminist industry nevertheless happily drew her into their web of deceit. Audrey’s career is exactly what she chose, her dreams are intact, and she claims to be extremely happy with her life. Unfortunately for Audrey, the feminist social narrative wants her to be miserable and they won’t rest until she is “ruined.”

What Audrey Tautou said eight years ago was silly, considering she was in a happy relationship at the time and claims to adore the male directors she works with, some of whom have invited her back for multiple projects. She also admits that she’s shocked when she finds out that someone likes her.

Yesterday in Michigan an appeals court refused a man's request that a paternity test be performed on a child that was conceived during his engagement to his now estranged fiancée. The Times Herald reports that John Sprenger, 30, of Traverse City MI. claims he's the biological father of a boy born in 2011. He and Emily Bickle, 33, were engaged, but the engagement ended and Bickle remarried her former husband before the child was born.

Under Michigan law if a child is born when the mother is married the husband is assumed to be the biological father and his name goes on the birth certificate by default. Additionally, even if a paternity test it performed and Sprenger is found to be the biological father of the child he still would not be able to assert his rights as a father simply because the mother was married to someone else at the time according to Judge Elizabeth Gleicher and Judge Amy Ronayne Krause in their concurring opinions.

"When married parents choose not to explore the paternity of a child born during a marriage, a putative father has no right to meddle with their decision," Gleicher stated in a separate opinion.

The case was tried under an older Michigan law that had weaker protections for fathers wanting to establish fatherhood. Sprenger filed a separate lawsuit under the new law as well but lost that case in Benzie County Circuit Court. He'll likely take it again to the appeals court.

"Justice fails when the truth is made subservient to procedural rules," Sprenger's attorney, Eric Phelps, said. While Emily Bickle's attorney, Paul Jarboe, declined to comment on why his client doesn't simply allow a paternity test he did state :"If you don't have legal standing, that's where the discussion stops."

Lucian Vâlsan · 15 September 2013 · Archived copy · Original

On September 9, the population of Norway repeated the process of Iceland[1] and voted out the feminist left from power. The most feminist faction of the leftist coalition that will resign in October, Sosialistisk Venstre (SV – The Socialist Left Party), barely avoided falling under the national election threshold of 4%, getting 4.1%[2] from the popular vote. This means that some of their representatives will still be in Storting (the Norwegian Parliament).

However, whilst SV has managed to save itself from being put out of misery, the hardcore feminist ideologue in the Norwegian government, Inga Marte Thorkildsen, will have to go, hopefully for good.

Inga Marte Thorkildsen served (and still serves until October when the incumbent government will resign) as the Minister of Children, Equality and Social Inclusion (Barne, likestillings og inkluderingsministeren) in the leftist Coalition government. She was an MP for Vestfold region for three terms and she has not been reelected for this term[3].

She started attracting a tremendous amount of criticism last year in April when she personally intervened into a custody dispute and tried to push the police's investigation of an allegation of child abuse towards the ideologically correct outcome of the feminist ideology – women good, men bad. Basically, a custodial father was being dragged into courts after the mother made allegations of incest and severe beatings – none of them true. Business as usual in Europe and especially in the impeccably "progressive" Norway.

After being exposed for the "help" that she offered to the Police (read: pressure for them to get to her desired outcome) she went even further and utterly refused to admit that she had done anything wrong. She saw herself as the savior of the "poor mother" and felt an imperative to "help" the child escape from the father[4].

She even went so far as to "conclude," in total defiance of the factual reality, that the Police and Barneværnet(Norway's CPS) were wrong to give the child to the father because the mother says that he abused the father. Both the first and the second investigation (the second being ordered personally by her in STASI style) lead to the conclusion that she was completely wrong.

But this didn't stop Inga Marte Thorkildsen and she went on to publish sensitive and private information about the case on her Facebook account and Twitter account. When asked for explanations from the father and from the public opinion, she refused to offer any explanations and claimed that the demands for her to get out of the case were "insults" directed at her[6]. Her political party and the Government also agreed that she has done nothing wrong and claimed that if the public believes that, then the public should decide[7]. Fortunately, the public didn't forget, albeit the public had to wait over a year to make the decision.

One of the reasons the public did not forget about her misconduct is because in October 2012, she went so far as to try to change the law (The Children's Act – Barneloven) to make it legal for a divorced parent (custodial or not) to deny visitation rights to the other parent simply on a whim[8].

Basically, her legislative proposal stipulated that if the other parent or one of the grandparents of the child say that they have a "real fear" (and this was the exact terminology) that the child might be abused, then that's reason enough to deny the other parent's access to children. All the accuser has to do is say that they have a real fear – no evidence needed and no courts ought to be involved (as opposed to the original law which required evidence of misconduct and a judicial process).

So, in the case in which Inga Marte Thorkildsen legally (but immorally) bullied the police, the false accuser (the mother) would have got the right to simply seize the child based on her words alone that she has a "real fear" that the father is an incestuous abusive parent. Another egregious case was also brought up in the debate – namely the case of a little boy named „Christoffer" for the media – who got however an abuse experience at his mother's house, when his scull was cracked open (17 cm) with his windpipe stuffed full with paper. So much for "protecting him from his father" and the mother was eventually charged for aiding and abetting a child-abuser (her new boyfriend)[5]. When this case was brought up, it was pointed, that her law would not have helped nobody in the real life.

This decision of hers attracted a tremendous amount of criticism across the Norwegian society. Some journalists wondered since when a subjective feeling (like the one of "fear") should be the standard of legal decisions. Moreover, how does the accused disprove that her "real fear" assertion is false?[9] Others reminded the Minister that Norway was already convicted once in 2007 at the European Court of Human Rights for breaching a father's right to visitation[10] in a similar case in which the Norwegian Court of Appeal blessed a flagrant abuse of the law which sided with a mother that popped up a torrent of false allegations. In the 2007 case, the State had to pay roughly 9000 euros (70,000 norske kroner) in reparations to the victim (the father). Hardly relevant but the precedent is already set so if the law proposal of Inga Marte Thorkildsen would have been approved, the Norwegian State would have become liable to huge amounts of payments to the fathers that were being disenfranchised by the misandric State.

To make it more clear how radically misandric was her behavior and her proposals as minister, one must notice that even the feminist-oriented "men's group" Reform – the group that proposed nothing less than outright banning and censorship of anti-feminist speech[11] – had objections to Inga Marte's proposals[12].

The debate regarding the Children's Act may finally come to an end once Inga Marte will be gone. But the fact that she has not yet been held accountable legally for what she did, and considering the fact that the Norwegians tend to trust the State excessively, creates a worrying precedent for the Norwegian fathers and generally for the wellbeing of Norwegian families. Let us hope that the new government won't bring its own Inga Marte Thorkildsen.

Norwegian people are usually very polite. So they use ha det bra! (literally: have it good!) for "Goodbye!" We are not so polite, especially with feminist bigots like Inga Marte Thorkildsen, so we will simply wish her Adjø! (Adios!)

Men’s Rights Edmonton confronts fascists

Men's Rights Edmonton · 15 September 2013 · Archived copy · Original

From the Men’s Rights Edmonton Youtube Channel

On Saturday, September 14, 2013. Members of MR-E were out postering when we caught two individuals tearing down said posters. Camera in hand, we confronted them for clarification on why they feel censorship is an acceptable substitution for an argument.

MR-E would like to know the names of these two women so that charges of destruction of property can be laid against them. Also, the world should know the identities of those who seek to silence and censor messages advocating for human rights.

Publisher’s note: Great work continuing in Edmonton by activists dedicated to challenging the feminist inspired hate in their community. I also note that a woman who vandalizes man’s property and then flips him off when he confronts her about it on a dark street at night only acts in this manner because she is certain she has absolutely nothing to fear. Feminists terrified of MHRAs? My ass. PE

20 Million missing Indian men

Burt Phoenix · 16 September 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Yes, you have read it correctly; over 20 Million men are missing from the working population of India based on the data tabulated for the past 15 years. The results are shocking, the death rates of Indian men increase once they are born. The number of deaths of Indian men over a 5 year time period from 1995 – 2000 in 5 year age groups are given below [i]–

(in '000)
Age Group	2000	2005	2010
15-19	364.3	327.2	295.0
20-24	477.8	438.4	399.5
25-29	575.3	549.1	501.4
30-34	608.9	632.9	579.6
35-39	670.3	706.2	680.3
40-44	719.1	766.3	762.9
45-49	828.5	863.7	876.8
50-54	1,048.0	1,080.9	1,116.0
55-59	1,333.0	1,386.0	1,447.2
Total	6,625.1	6,750.8	6,658.7

The data above is further substantiated by the Census 2011 data. It is the reduction of the male population which is increasing the Female to Male Sex Ratio[ii]. The census data below shows[iii]–

Year	Sex Ratio in Age 0-6	Overall Sex Ratio
1991	1058	1079

Can you spot the dichotomy above; the birth rates of males is increasing (ie. in age group 0-6) whereas the overall sex ratio of males is falling. The birth rates of males have increased from 1058 per thousand females in 1991 to 1094 in 2011. The overall sex ratio is fallen from 1079 to 1064 during the same time period.

If more males are being born as compared to females, then how come the overall sex ratio of males is decreasing? The answer lies in the first table, ie. the death rates of men in India for the age group of 15-59 is high as compared to women.

This is a point of concern and calls for immediate action. The reasons of the high death rates could be –

- Inadequate Health Care facilities for Men
- Inadequate Personal Safety
- Higher Suicide Rates
- Gender Biased Laws (Link1 and Link2)
- Mindset of Male disposability in the society

For example, deaths in age group 20-25 in year 2000 is calculated as a difference in population in age group 20-25 for year 2000 and population in age group 15-20 in year 1995.

Call to Action for KSU Men

Sage Gerard (Victor Zen) · 16 September 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Goal Progress: $515 of $500

Fundraiser is now closed

Addendum: The fundraiser was only online for a few hours and the goal has already been reached! Thank you all so much for your responsive, enthusiastic support! You can stay up to date on KSUM developments on MarZ. Your contributions will go to the development of better representation for men and boys on college campuses.*

My name is Sage Gerard. You know me as Victor Zen. I am an IT specialist, an entrepreneur, and a human rights activist that specializes in the issues faced by fathers and sons in modern society. There are people who hate me for what I stand for, but I'm proud of what I am, and I think anyone else who cares about decency, compassion, and fundamental human rights for all should be proud, too.

I am organizing a men's group on the gynocentric Kennesaw State University called KSU Men (KSUM), and I need your help promoting it. Promotion is the next step to getting officers, members and the remaining petition signatures needed to propose the student organization for approval by committee.

KSU allows organizers to set up a 6'x3′ table exactly two times for events.

The first event will take place at the Commons, a popular cafeteria. The second event will be held in the social sciences building, home of KSU gender studies. A timeline will be set when materials are in order.

[image]
KSU Commons and Social Sciences

Risks Worth Taking

KSUM's survival can be threatened by administrative intervention, feminist co-option and student protest. But there are signs of MHRA life on campus, and we have to try to reach those who are passionate about our cause. Still, the fundraiser has been kept small to minimize potential loss. Even if KSUM is denied a place on campus, MHRAs everywhere will benefit from watching what happens. KSUM is not just a organization, it is a transparent experiment with results that matter. Your voice needs to be heard in a discussion on building an organization that men and boys deserve. KSUM is not just for KSU students, it's for all of us. It's for you. During the promotion, I will be reporting from a live Twitter feed. Updates on the KSUM's growth will be reported on MarZ or KSUM's blog.

Materials

Prices rounded to the nearest dollar:

1. 250 two-sided color handouts [Front][Back]. $165 (Quote from local printer).
2. A custom tablecloth to make the table easy to spot. $220 (Verbal quote from same print shop).
3. A GOPRO 2 chest mount. Frees hands to work with paper. This is also less annoying than pointing a phone camera at people at all times. The mount makes the camera harder to grab or break in case someone decides to get physical. $40.
4. Petrol, shipping and processing fees: $75

Total: $500

I will provide records of purchases to prove funds are being used as shown on MarZ.

I will be monitoring the funds donated and when the $500.00 goal is attained I will disable the donation button in this post and add an addendum announcing that the goal has been reached.

I risk taking one for the team in order to provide live data on the pragmatics of organizing MHRAs in an academic environment. Should there be any problems, MHRAs will learn from them as much as I will.

We all have skin in this game. Both you and the men you love need representation. If you have $5 or $10 to spare, consider contributing to the promotion of KSU Men via Paypal. Note that these donations are not tax-deductible.

With your support, we can organize MHRAs on KSU. I cannot guarantee any particular outcome, but I do know we will not be left empty-handed, and we will not be silenced without a fight.

Psychiatrist defends drugging my child

Gary Trieste · 17 September 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Just letting all know that I released a new Youtube video of a meeting with the child psychiatrist who drugged my child with Geodon, w/o telling me.

This video is little more cerebral and less obviously shocking than the last video I posted, after all it is with a psychiatrist who learn how to moderate their conversation.

But the subdued affect of our meeting understates the violence being done to my child, by drugging her with a substance not approved for use in children, only for adult schizophrenia, and that causes Parkinsons disease in 20% of people treated it, among other horrible 'side' effects.

Please all view and give me your comments, and share the link on to all you know who might be interested.

Privileged or Oppressed?

Mark Trueblood · 17 September 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Editor's Note: Social. Justice. Warrior.

Taken as individual words these are all things that humans can find admirable. Put them together and they become something entirely different. A Social Justice Warrior (SJW) is a passive-aggressive entity that claims moral high ground over the surrounding infidels by competing over who is more ethical.

It is passive because they accept everyone with love and understanding. It is aggressive because no one can ever be as humble and as loving as them: and that means YOU! No matter how kind and giving you are you are scum because someone else has it worse. If you can't understand that to be true it makes them really happy because your idiocy is more fodder for their self-righteous rant.

This is a race to the bottom that no self-respecting person can win and they designed it that way. The only way to defend yourself against an SJW is to fashion a sword of self loathing and plummet from the depths of your despair so that you may be reborn as a martyr on someone's Facebook page. The battle will never end until we are all slobbering fools with no dictionary.

Social Justice Warrior (SJW) : All right folks, line up in single file and I will look at you to decide if you have privilege. First person, step up!

Leo: Hi, how are you?

SJW: White. Male. Privileged! Check your privilege!

Leo: I'm from Argentina, and my family was left destitute by the monetary crisis…

SJW: I said, check your privilege!!!! Wait…are you queer?

Leo: Well, yes…

SJW: My mistake. You're oppressed!

Leo: Actually, I've never felt…

SJW: You. Are. Oppressed. Next!!!

April: Hi!

SJW: Black Female. You're an oppressed victim!

April: Uh, excuse me? I've been on the Cleveland police force for ten years and I am nobody's vict…

SJW: Next!!!

John: How are you, ma'am.

SJW: White. Male. Privileged! You've had everything so easy!

John: Lady, I grew up dirt poor in western Kansas.

SJW: Are you queer or disabled?

John: None of your damn business.

SJW: Check your privilege white male oppressor! Next!!!

Janice: Nice to meet you!

SJW: Asian. Female. Oppressed. Stand over in that corner, with the feminists.

Janice: Uh, I'm not a feminist.

SJW: You're a woman. You are feminism and feminism is you.

Janice: I'm a Christian, and my husband and I believe in traditional gender roles.

SJW: You're brainwashed and need feminist enlightenment. Get in that corner!

Janice: I have a master's degree in Russian Literature and speak three languages; do I seem brainwashed to you?

SJW: (Pause) War On Women! Smash the Patriarchy! Check Your Privilege! My body my choice! Next!!!

Kylie: Hey there!

SJW: Hispanic…and transgendered. Oppressed! Your opinion matters a lot!

Kylie: Actually, I was born in Greece. And what gives you the right to judge people based on their appearance? Don't you think that's kind of discriminatory? Why not treat people like human beings and let everyone have a say? You sound like one of those flaky Social Justice Warriors on Reddit.

SJW: Stop stereotyping me!

Pray men never take a day off

What would happen if no men showed up for work today?

Yesterday's post got me thinking about what would happen if no men showed up to work today. For certain, the trains would stop running. But before we get into that, I want to tell you a bit about how I came to be – how I came to think the way I do.

I credit my father, first and foremost.

My father failed in so many ways, but one thing he did perfectly was provide. He could coax food out of the barest patch of earth; he could collect a swarm of wild bees and turn them into gallons and gallons of honey; he could take a bush and make it flower; he could take a cow or a goat or a chicken and make the foolish creature love him. My childhood was blighted by religious-based violence centered on the concept of breaking a child's will so they might better accept the will of God, but that is not the reason I am atheist. If God had been presented to me in a better light, someone who wasn't keen on beating children unconscious, I still don't believe I would be one of the faithful. God makes no rational sense to me.

http://judgybitch.com/2013/06/16/first-i-feared-him-then-i-loathed-him-then-i-forgave-him-and-now-i-take-care-of-him-the-story-of-my-father-and-me/

And if I am one thing, it is rational.

What my father did was instill indelibly in my mind that his role was to provide. I never thought of that in terms of love. Only in terms of material goods, which amounted to food and shelter and clothing in our sparse, dirt farm existence, and my Dad was a genius at providing those things. My mother and I turned the goods of his labor into "value-added" products, to be certain, but we would have had no flour to mill, no butter to churn, no eggs to collect, no firewood to burn, no cookies and cakes and breads and loaves to sell without him.

My most basic understanding of men is that they keep you from starving or freezing to death.

My three brothers played a key role in that they made me appreciate my chores were so much easier. At no point would I have ever traded churning butter or kneading bread with pitching out stalls or baling hay.

From my brothers I learned that men do the hard, shitty work, and tedious is nothing compared to physically brutal.

My husband's grandmother played a curiously central role in who I am, too. The Queen was the sort of woman who showed up for Sunday dinner dressed in elegant suits with her hair perfectly coiffed and pantyhose and heels and lipstick exquisitely applied, and I really, honestly, expected her to hate me with my worn denim and flannel shirt and practical flat shoes and penchant for the saltier forms of the English language.

But she didn't.

While Mr. JB and I were still dating, she gave me two pieces of advice that are with me to this day.

Friends of the family were expecting and everyone was all excitement and anticipation, which is utterly lovely. A discussion about the mother and working and how to get the baby sleeping through the corporate night ensued, and the Queen blessed me with two morsels of wisdom.

On the subject of maternal guilt, she said, "People hardly ever feel guilty about doing the right thing, now do they? Let guilt be your compass, letting know you are headed in the wrong direction".

And gazing upon a sturdy tome of Popular Childcare Manual, she said, "Honey, the baby IS the book. If 50 000 years of evolution isn't good enough for you, then I don't know what is. You do what the baby tells you to do and you can't go wrong. It's important to have an open mind about scientific advances, but not so open your brains fall out onto the sidewalk."

The Queen passed away before our first child was born, and I will never forget the look on her face when we left her in the hospital, after a devastating stroke left her immobile and uncommunicative. She was tied to a bed with her hair disheveled, wearing one of those awful gaping hospital robes, and the look in her eyes was so very clear:

No. Please no. Please kill me. I do not want to live like this.

And I knew then I loved her. The Queen was gone, although her body was present. I would have killed her, had the law permitted it.

Obviously, I didn't.

It made me realize that even though the Dowager, the Queen's Daughter and Mr. JB's mother has been no peach to deal with, I will never let her spend her last years in a home with messy hair and crinkled clothes. I won't kill her, obviously, but she will spend her last moments looking like herself, surrounded by the people she loves and no "career" in the world will make her comfort and care irrelevant to me.

And obviously, the same goes for Mr. JB's father, and my own. They will end their days in the company of those they nurtured into love, no matter how clumsily they effected the emotion.

Mr. JB's mother and grandmother made me realize that the single most important thing I can contribute to the world is love. If every family made loving one another a priority, then the bonds of family would become the single most important "wealth" we can pursue. It used to be that way. It can be that way again. But families aren't families without men.

And that is where we have gone off the rails.

The birth of my son is what brought that home to me forcefully. Our first child was a fearful, cautious child by nature. She was born clinging to me and it took more than a year before she stopped freaking out every time the phone rang. Her baby brain took any sudden sound to mean the world was surely coming to an end, and she responded appropriately: by screaming her head off.

LittleDude is so totally different. He was born calm and curious and totally open to anything the world had to throw at him. It took a long time before Pinky would let Grandma hold her for any length of time, but LittleDude was happy as long as there were warm arms around him.

As a toddler, he would go up to any man in the park, and ask to be picked up when he got tired.

"Daddy, pick me up". He called them all "Daddy".

I used to joke with my husband that I was the "single mom whose kid got no male attention" at the park, because LittleDude just loved men and he showed no fear of them whatsoever. He would happily snuggle up with the homeless guy with the puppy, which forced me to face some uncomfortable truths.

I would try to coax LittleDude away from these men, who never behaved in any way that alarmed me, other than simply being men. Who were they? I don't know. War vets. Chronic alcoholics. Men whom society had discarded, and the confusion I could see in my son's face when I would try to pull him away made me examine where I was getting my ideas from.

I've never been the hysterical "someone is gonna kidnap my child" sort of person. That happens so rarely, it's not a rational belief. It would make more sense to worry that he might be struck by lightning or swept away by a tornado. I was afraid of those men because they were men.

And I didn't want my son to grow up thinking that men are something bad. I lived through parental alienation and had the poison of feminist inspired man-hate poured into my soul every day, thanks to my mother, and I refused to let her anger and bitterness and venom affect my life.

So that is how I began.

Commenters have often mentioned that if men didn't show up for work one day, the entire world would screech to a halt, and today, using data from the US Department of Labor, I want to take a look at just how true that is. Hearing about "male privilege" is so common in the media, but what is hardly ever mentioned is just how many of our own privileges are a direct result of the work that men do.

Perhaps the reason men have historically had the privileges they do is because they EARN THEM BY MAKING OUR LIFE POSSIBLE?

Just a thought.

And in the same breath, women have historically had the privileges they have because they CREATE LIFE.

Modern, feminist inspired liberal democracy has destroyed women's role, by and large, with plunging birth rates across the developed world, but they cannot destroy men's traditional work, or we all perish. What they want is for men to do the work silently. With no acknowledgement. For no reward.

There's a word for that: slavery.

Let's see what happens when the slaves revolt, shall we?

All information taken from Bureau of Labor Statistics, United States Department of Labor, 2013, except where noted.

http://www.bls.gov/cps/cpsaat11.htm

First up, the entire power grid is down. 100% of power plant operators, distributors, and dispatchers are men. Now, it's possible that there are a few women working in these occupations, but however many there are, they do not make up even 1% of the total workforce, so statistically, 100% of the workforce is male.

91% of the nation's electrical engineers are men, and if they don't show up for work, there is no one to monitor and manage the nation's electrical supplies. Assuming some automation (designed by men, naturally) kicks in for the day, we had all better pray there are no problems. 97.6% of electrical power line installers and maintenance workers are men.

Lights out, ladies and gentlemen.

Don't bother turning on your taps, either. Or flushing your toilets. 95.5% of water and liquid waste treatment plant and system operators are men.

Think you might be able to get out-of-town for the one day the men don't show up?

Think again.

Planes are out.

95.9% of aircraft pilots and flight engineers are men. If you happen to find a plane with a female pilot, don't get too excited. 98.4% of aircraft mechanics and service technicians are men. You can, however, be assured of your comfort as you sit on a pilotless aircraft that has no mechanic for pre-flight clearance, because 77.6% of flight attendants are female.

Should you be lucky enough to find a female pilot and a female technician to clear you for take-off, you still have some praying to do. Statistically, 0% of air traffic controllers and airfield operations specialists are women.

Of course, that doesn't mean there are ZERO ladies working in air traffic control. There just aren't enough to constitute even 1% of the workforce.

Trains, of course, are also out.

100% of locomotive engineers and operators are men, as are 100% of the workers who operate railroad brakes, signals and switches. 94.4% of railway yardmasters are men, but if you chance upon a female yardmaster, it won't help you much. She can't operate the trains.

You might have better luck with bus drivers, almost half of whom are women.

But the streets are likely to be chaos. And there won't be anyone on hand to help you navigate that.

87.4% of police and sheriff's patrol officers are men. 96.6% of firefighters are men. 68.8% of Emergency Medical Technicians and Paramedics are men, so if it all goes tits up and you get hurt, there's a small chance you might make it to a hospital.

I hope you don't get too badly hurt, though. 65.7% of all surgeons are men.

Maybe you should just work from home? In the dark, mind you. With no running water.

Uh-oh. Looks like that might be a problem, too.

For all computer and mathematical occupations combined, 74.4% of the workforce is male. Computer network architects, who design and implement all our computer based communications systems are 91.9% men. And 94.2% of radio and telecommunications equipment installers and repair technicians are men.

Looks like that plan is fucked.

Hope it doesn't get too hot, or too cold the day men don't show up for work. Even if you had power, which you don't, you would be hard-pressed to get anyone in to take a look at your wonky air-conditioner or furnace.

98.4% of heating, air-conditioning and refrigeration mechanics and installers are men.

Oh well. Guess you'll have to mosey on down to the local café, which has no power either, but what's logic and consequence anyways? Be careful when you step over all that accumulating garbage! Remember that most EMTs are men, and they've taken the day off. Don't want to get hurt now.

Most garbage collectors are men, too – 93.4%, to be exact.

You'll need to stop at the ATM first, for a little cash injection.

Oops. Don't bother.

The machine hasn't been filled with money today. 81.5% of security guards and gaming surveillance officers are men. It's unlikely the banks would be functioning anyways, with no men at work. 72.1% of all securities, commodities and financial services sales agents are men. 72.6% of the nation's CEOs would be taking the day off, along with 70.9% of all the general and operations managers.

Don't count on getting a weather report today. Statistically, 0% of the nation's atmospheric and space scientists are women.

Actually, don't plan on acquiring pretty much anything today. The workers in the entire production, transportation and material moving occupations are 78.2% men. Not only will no goods be moving on the day men go on strike, they won't be made, period. 82.4% of all the industrial production managers are men.

Nothing will be built or extracted from the earth in terms of raw materials. 97.5% of that workforce is male.

Nothing will be installed, maintained or repaired. 96.8% of that workforce is male.

If men took a collective day off, we would instantly be without power, without the means to communicate, without protection, without water, without trucks bringing us the food and products we take for granted, because men are the ones who provide all those things.

Where in our culture do we EVER see that acknowledged? If women took the day off, with the sole exception of NURSES, nothing would happen. No one would die. The world would continue to function. The hair salons and primary schools and retail clothing stores would close, and the male management structure would have to find some way to answer their own phones for a day, but essentially, nothing would happen.

You will often hear feminists barking on about male privilege, usually in a well-lit room, comfortably warm, with her iPhone close at hand, buzzing with updates from her latest #mensuck Twitter feed, with zero awareness that every single one of those luxuries is provided by men.

Male privilege is the idea that men have unearned social, economic, and political advantages or rights that are granted to them solely on the basis of their sex, and which are usually denied to women. – from http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Male_privilege

UNEARNED?!?

The Department of Labor says otherwise, bitch. It is women who have failed to earn their privileges. We live in a world powered and created and maintained by men, and yet feminists have created a whole philosophy and ideology that insists women and men are equal.

We are not equal.

We do not need to be equal.

http://judgybitch.com/2013/02/05/the-genius-of-women-or-the-capacity-to-love-others-more-than-you-love-yourself/

We can't be equal.

What we can be is grateful.

And we can pray men never, ever take a day off.

Lots of love,

JB

Men’s Rights Sasktoon and some thoughts

If you’re in the Saskatoon area, please drop us a line. We’d love to hear from you and potentially suck you into our nefarious activities.

http://www.mensrightssaskatoon.com

Here’s a link to the article on the Yemeni girl who allegedly bled to death from sex during her wedding night:

http://news.yahoo.com/child-bride-yem…

I’m not saying this didn’t happen or doesn’t happen, but I wish people would think critically and ask questions. All the evidence in this case is one activist’s statement and two people contacted by Reuters (where did their contact info come from?) Why didn’t they interview the medical staff if they were so sure the authorities weren’t trustworthy?

Finally, the answer to why men still marry and have children despite the social and legal ruin they risk in doing so? Because they are instinctually compelled to pair bond and raise offspring, that’s why our society can put such a steep price tag on it.

(Which makes you wonder why society has to incentivize and subsidize motherhood so much. I mean if motherhood was so instinctive, why do most women have to be paid to do it? Women need bonuses to be mothers; men will take penalties to be fathers.)

EU aims to ban anti-feminist speech

Editorial update: This article was originally worded in a way that implied to many readers that the EU has actually passed a resolution banning anti-feminism as "hate speech." The article has been updated to reflect that this is being considered by EU officials, and may be brought to a vote in the future, but this has not happened as yet.–DE

The vacation of the European Union's institutions is over. Consequently, the Eurocrats are now back at trying to stamp out more individual rights from the population and increase the power of Brussels over the peoples of Europe.

Right before the vacation, we covered the EU's attempt to literally stamp out economic freedom in the name of feminism[1]. The vote on the matter of gender quotas will take place in the JURI and FEMM committees on October 14[2], though the final vote will be next year in the Parliament and it's unlikely to pass as a measure since several countries (including Germany and the UK) have united their efforts to repeal it[3].

However, it won't matter. The EU is a constant generator of totalitarian measures so even if the resolution that attempts to stamp out individual economic freedom will fail, the next attack on individual freedoms is already drafted.

The EU's latest document is a called: "The European framework national statute for the promotion of tolerance"[4] which is a document elaborated with a view to being enacted by the legislatures of all the 28 unfortunate nations that are members of this club. This document was elaborated by the ECTR (European Council on Tolerance and Reconciliation), an NGO that gets public funds and they were invited at the express request of the LIBE Committee in the European Parliament to come in and make their case.

What's wrong with "promotion of tolerance" one might ask. As you will see in the following lines, "promotion of tolerance" means something entirely different than what it means to reasonable people. And basically the entire document looks more like a statue of the Thought Police and the Ministry of Truth.

In the Section 1 of the document, the EU defines its terms. So terms like "hate crime", "group" and "tolerance" are being introduced. Of particular interest is the EU's definition of "group libel"[5]:

> "Group libel" means: defamatory comments made in public and aimed against a group as defined in paragraph (a) – or members thereof – with a view to inciting to violence, slandering the group, holding it to ridicule or subjecting it to false charges.

As we will soon see, feminists are also de facto part of the "group" notion – so holding feminists to ridicule, as they deserve, will now be a crime. We know this from the Section 2e of the document which says[6]:

> The purpose of this Statute is to: […]
> e) Take concrete action to combat intolerance, in particular with a view to eliminating racism, colour bias, ethnic discrimination, religious intolerance, totalitarian ideologies, xenophobia, anti-Semitism, anti-feminism and homophobia.

Yes, you read it correctly. The European Union is dedicating an entire law to force the governments of 28 nations to take concrete action to combat anti-feminism. The other elements of the list should also be looked with suspicion despite the fact that they seem well-intended. For instance, campaigning against male circumcision can bring you criminal charges of "Islamophobia" under this law. Campaigning against female circumcision, though, will bring you a big pat on the back from the politically correct Eurofanatics, despite the fact that the practice is illegal everywhere in Europe. Also, the "totalitarian ideologies" is quite vague and contradictory, given that the EU itself sponsors Communist organizations, it's being lead by a Maoist and now attempts to deem feminism as a State truth.

In the Section 3, the one dealing with the guaranties of rights, the EU explains us clearly that it wants the State to make sure that no individual dares to be an anti-feminist[7]:

> Tolerance (…) shall be guaranteed towards any group (…), especially in the enjoyment of the following human rights:
> Explanatory Notes:
> Guarantee of tolerance must be understood not only as a vertical relationship (Government-to-individuals) but also as a horizontal relationship (group-to-group and person-to-person). It is the obligation of the Government to ensure that intolerance is not practised either in vertical or in horizontal relationships.

Therefore, not wanting to hire feminist ideologues, which tend to be competent at exactly nothing, can now bring you a criminal lawsuit. Also, the rights allowed under the Section 3 of this document can be limited under the Section 4 of this document if they happen to create inconveniences to the sexual trade union of feminism. But they are perfectly fine if they destroy men's lives though. Section 4d explains it quite clearly[8]:

> The rights guaranteed in Section 3 are subject to the following limitations, applied in a proportionate manner as necessary in a democratic society:[…]
> Explanatory Note:
> Examples: tolerance does not denote acceptance of such practices as female circumcision, forced marriage, polygamy or any form of exploitation or domination of women.

What is not explicitly forbidden means it is implicitly allowed. And since the explanatory note of the Section 4 states that the list is exhaustive – the only logical conclusion that one can draw is that tolerance means acceptance of such practices as male circumcision, polyandry or any form of exploitation or domination of men and this is even necessary in a democratic society. You can't make this stuff up!

And if this amount of feminist privilege isn't enough, here's some more. The Section 6 of the document, dealing with implementation explicitly tells us that the State must make female privilege the rule of the land. The section 6a reads:

> To ensure implementation of this Statute, the Government shall:[…]
> a) Be responsible for the special protection of vulnerable and disadvantaged groups.
> Explanatory Notes:
> (i) Members of vulnerable and disadvantaged groups are entitled to a special protection, additional to the general protection that has to be provided by the Government to every person within the State.
> (ii) The special protection afforded to members of vulnerable and disadvantaged groups may imply a preferential treatment. Strictly speaking, this preferential treatment goes beyond mere respect and acceptance lying at the root of tolerance (…). Still, the present provision is justified by the linkage between historical intolerance and vulnerability.

Does this kind of rhetoric sounds familiar? Because it sure does to the World War II veterans who fought for the freedom and the independence of several European nations in order for now to be told that they are privileged for having seen their fellow men being killed or tortured by the State.

It is an act of extreme naïveté to think that this provision will not be used to advance the cause of the long march through institutions of feminism and its connected ideologies. The EU makes it perfectly clear that this is the case. Section 6b reads:

> Without prejudice to existing control mechanism, set up a special administrative unit in order to supervise the implementation of this Statute.[…]
> Explanatory note:
> ii) The special administrative unit should preferably operate within the Ministry of Justice (although the Ministry of the Interior is another reasonable possibility).

It is a chance of one in 30 billion for such a body not to be lead by a politically correct ideologue. Also, the Ministries of the Interior are the ones managing the secret services in most (if not all) European nations. In Sweden there have already been reports of the FRA (the Sweden's NSA) closely supervising Fathers' Rights Activists in a STASI-like manner. What makes you think that this might not come to your country next if this law is passed?

Section 7 deals with penal sanctions and basically opens the door to criminal charges and arrests for people who dare to disagree with the politically correct ideologues that run the European Union. Section 7a reads:

> The following acts will be regarded as criminal offences punishable as aggravated crimes[9]:
> (i) Hate crimes (…)
> (ii) Incitement to violence against a group(…)
> (iii) Group libel as defined in Section 1(b).
> (iv) Overt approval of a totalitarian ideology, xenophobia or anti-Semitism.
> (vi) Public approval or denial of any other act of genocide the existence of which has been determined by an international criminal court or tribunal

So, basically, ridiculing feminism shall be regarded as a criminal offence punishable as aggravated crime. This is exactly how the Criminal Code of Romania looked like during the Marxist-Leninist dictatorship. In the 1950s, one could get up to 10 years of imprisonment for speaking against "the social order." The social order was Stalinism back then. Now it's Marxism-Feminism. The differences between them are becoming increasingly harder to notice.

Also, the EU itself is in violation of Section 7a(ii) and Section 7a(vi), considering that class warfare is openly promoted by various committees and subcommittees of the European Parliament and considering that the crimes against humanity committed in Europe by the Communist regimes are publicly denied by the EU[10].

If you are a minor and dare to hold anti-feminist views and express them, the Big Maoist Brother has a special place for you designed by the Thought Police – an indoctrination camp. Well, they don't call it like that but the purpose is identical. Section 7b reads:

> Juveniles convicted of committing crimes listed in paragraph (a) will be required to undergo a rehabilitation programme designed to instill in them a culture of tolerance.

So if a 14 year old boy dares to notice that women are not oppressed in Europe and that the education system in which he is forced to go is centered around girls and girls only, the boys will be sent to a "rehabilitation programme" to instill in him a "culture of tolerance." The Soviet Union had a similar program for those who dared to disagree with the Marxist-Leninist approach. It was considered that those who disagreed must be mentally challenged or something else has to be wrong with them to disagree with the wonders of scientific socialism. The same line of reasoning is used here as well. Since feminist ideologues know all too well that their ideology is so thin that even a prepubescent child can see through their lies, they are deeming all dissenters as being sick and in urgent need of "rehabilitation."

This is how totalitarianism consolidates itself!

And since some people might be reluctant to send people to jail or to "rehabilitation programs" for speaking the truth, the EU takes care to introduce a carrot as well to stimulate the allegations to skyrocket. Section 7f reads[11]:

> (f) Free legal aid will be offered to victims of crimes listed in paragraph (a), irrespective of qualification in terms of impecuniosity

So, basically, one can sue anyone for holding anti-feminist views, demand money, claim to be a victim, send the "offender" to jail and all this on taxpayers' money. Isn't the EU a wonderful place?

Section 8 deals with "education" and basically demands that everyone be subjected to politically correct propaganda starting with 7 year old children in elementary school and ending with judges and lawyers.

The last section of the document, Section 9, deals with mass-media and demands that all mass-media be remodeled using the ideological lens of the statists that run the European Union and kindly makes another subtle suggestion that the Internet should be regulated – for your own safety, of course. Because heaven forbid you might see something you don't like on the Internet!

The problems with this document aren't only related to feminist ideology being shoved down the throats of 28 unfortunate nations since it also contains provisions that basically grant special privileges and entitlements to immigrants over the taxpayers. It's like me coming into your house without your consent and then have the State put you in the bathroom while granting the rest of the house to me.

Also, the first Section basically makes satire illegal – even satire of historical figures (if those figures happen to be non-white men). The whole document is a mess for any person that doesn't subscribe to political correctness. But even for the feminist-oriented content alone this document is worth opposing fiercely.

Our most basic right – freedom of speech and conscience – is severely under threat right now and, as usual, the mainstream media remains silent about the issue.

What's next?

The good news is that we found out about this fairly early so there is a decent amount of time to engage in activism.

The European Union, albeit a totalitarian body, is a very slow institution. Consequently, it takes a lot of time for such nonsense to end up on the voting table of the European Parliament and it can be dismissed at any of the bureaucracies that goes through. This process can take up to 2 years, and sometimes even more. For instance, the proposal to stamp out economic freedom has first been made by the European Commission (the only body that has the right to propose legislation – just like in the USSR the Politburo had the sole right to summon a vote in the Supreme Soviet) in 2011.

If we are to follow the EU's usual protocol, sometime this month another meeting regarding this document will take place after the ECTR presentation that took place on September 17[12]. At least one more meeting with FEMM committee[13] (and yes, the European Parliament actually has a committee called FEMM) must take place though it is not unlikely to have this document also go through another judicial committee, even though the September 17 LIBE meeting is said to have included the opinion of "Group of Eminent Legal Experts" and this could be deemed enough.

After these committees, the next big step is have it go through the Council of the European Union (also known informally as the Council of Ministers). These long names and acronyms might seem complicated (and arguably they are) but the main idea is that after the ideologues in the small committees are done putting their totalitarian worldview on paper, this document needs to be seen by the Ministers of the 28 nations that are members of this club.

The Council of Ministers doesn't have clear standing members and its membership varies depending on the topic discussed. But its composition is always the same: one minister from each country that belongs to the EU. Most likely, this document will be discussed when the Council will meet to discuss social issues – which means that each country will be represented by a Minister from the social issues (Minister of Welfare, Minister of Women – for the UK and Germany -, Minister of Labor, etc.). Sometimes a secretary of State is sent to represent the country in the Council though these situations are rarer.

What can you do now?

Since the next step in the foreseeable future is the discussion of this document in the Council of Ministers, the most effective thing that you can do is to start contacting members of your government, especially those that deal with social issues (who are more likely to represent your country in the Council when this document will be discussed) and tell them why do you think this document should be rejected altogether. We will also publish various scripts but it would be even better if you'd write them in you own words.

Also, check the official directory of the European Union[14] to get the name and the contacts of those officials from your country that regularly attend the meetings of the Council of Ministers and start with them.

There are countries that are due to hold elections (Germany comes to mind now). If you live in one of these countries that will hold elections in the next 12 months, do no hesitate to let your elected officials know that you will purposefully campaign against them if they uphold this document. Politicians don't care about your freedoms or about men – but they do care about votes!

These kinds of documents are usually passed without the national parliaments even being asked. However, the national parliaments, if they're notified by the citizens, can pass a resolution forcing the government to adopt a certain position under the threat of a censure motion (a motion that can sack the government). This is unlikely to happen in big countries such as Germany and France or in impeccably progressive countries like Sweden. However, in smaller countries, such as Estonia, Latvia, Lithuania, Hungary, Slovakia, Slovenia or Luxembourg, this is quite feasible. This is an option for you to consider if you live in a country where this kind of activism has real chances of success. If this kind of activism succeeds even in one country – that's a huge deal because in the Council of Ministers (unlike the European Parliament) each country gets an equal vote, as opposed to the European Parliament where countries have unequal numbers of representatives depending on their population.

Also, probably amongst the first thing that you should do is to familiarize yourself with the way the Council of the European Union (or the Council of Ministers) works[15].

Civil disobedience. Make a blog with anti-feminist content. You can start by making this issue known in your native tongue. This is crucial for the success in defeating this bill. Also, if possible, make flyers with anti-feminist content (preferably by making this bill known) and distribute them. Read the bill carefully. You will find enough things to make non-MRA individuals join your efforts. Adapt your material to every subset of audience you wish to appeal. It is important for opposition to this bill to appear in as many languages and countries of the EU as possible.

If you cannot do street activism for various reasons, make sure you make your newly created blog known. It doesn't matter if you fell you are not a good writer. Just start writing and spamming everyone with your newly created blog. For more efficiency and increased appeal to audience – you can even make the blog to be single-issue, strictly for opposing this bill.

Speak publicly as much as possible against the bill. The power of words is unimaginable, that's why the powers that be want the words banned. You don't have to be a good public speaker. Just open your mouth in casual circles whenever the situation is fit. For instance, if you hear someone in a store saying "a woman came to rob my house" tell them that they might end up in jail for saying that and direct them to this article or your blog or any other resource that talks extensively about this bill.

Join us this Friday on The Voice of Europe where we will be talking more about this bill and will suggest more ways of activism. Also, if you have other ideas, feel free to let us know in the comments or, even better, call in this Friday on the radio program.

This has to be stopped! And its demise starts with you!

Robert Ecob, Early MHRA – 1927

Robert St. Estephe · 18 September 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Robert St. Estephe–Gonzo Historian–is dedicated to uncovering the forgotten past of marginalizing men. "Gonzo journalism" is characterized as tending "to favor style over fact to achieve accuracy." Yet history – especially "social history" – is written by ideologues who distort and bury facts in order to achieve an agenda. "Gonzo" writing is seen as unorthodox and surprising. Yet, in the 21st century subjectivity, distortion and outright lying in non-fiction writing is the norm. Fraud is the new orthodoxy. Consequently, integrity is the new "transgressive."

Welcome to the disruptive world of facts, the world of Gonzo History.

All the early Men's Rights organizations in the United States were focused on combating the epidemic of alimony racketeering. The American Alimony Payers' Protective Association was founded in New York City in May 1927. A month later the Alimony Club of Illinois was founded in Chicago.

FULL TEXT: Alimony, for many years, has been the goal of disgruntled wives, the material of the professional joke-smiths, and the weekly or monthly bête noir of all the ex-husbands who had to pay it.

Alimony, for many years, has been taken for granted as fine, progressive American institution.

But now no longer. For just the other day in New York a very earnest man appeared at the State capital with papers and a speech and all the legal requisites, to form the very first association of its kind in all America. [Chicago was to follow with the second, The Alimony Club of Illinois, in June 1927.]

~ The A. A. P. P. A. ~

The gentleman was Robert Gilbert Ecob, New York architect by profession, alimony fighter by avocation. Mr. Ecob is the founder and executive secretary of the first American Alimony Payers' Protective Association, duly incorporated and now grown to 750 members. When Mr. Ecob launched his "Alimony Club" he explained its purpose and the reasons which prompted him to found it.

"The American institution of easy alimony," said Mr. Ecob, "is responsible for the largest share of wives gone mad, marriages wrecked, husbands ruined, unscrupulous divorce court lawyers unscrupulously enriched. Alimony, in our country, and all that goes with alimony have become a menace to our children, our homes, and our law courts.

"Polite blackmail is committed every day in the name of alimony, perjured testimony is suborned in sadly too many instances; unscrupulous women, in our state of New York, have actually contracted marriages with wealthy men of wistful affections, just to bring about a speedy quarrel and collect the alimony ever after.

"If we are to protect our marriages, we must fight this easy alimony. That's why I and the other founders of our association, have taken off our coats and started in to work."

So much, Mr. Ecob says, by way of explanation. Then he elaborates, giving facts, details, specific cases which came to him when he had studied the matter of legal separation, alimony, shyster divorce court lawyers and disgruntled wives.

~ Some Do Not ~

"First," says Mr. Ecob, "our association admits that the wife whose marriage is hopelessly wrong is entitled to alimony. But our association urges that many a reconciliation after an early quarrel would result, did not the average judge award alimony so easily. Now the women's rights women will tell you that even with the vote women don't have equal political rights. They don't. they have political rights far, far ahead of any a man has. The husband in court is too generally judged and ordered to pay before he has adequately defended himself.

"But let me tell you of one or two pathetic cases we turned up in our study.

"There was Raphael. He was just a laborer, speaking poor English. His wife told a lurid tale to the judge, which our investigators later proved was made out of whole cloth in the office of her rascally divorce court lawyer. Raphael's wife had learned American ways; she wanted to be rid of Raphael, but she wanted to keep his support.

"The poor wretch, on the strength of her story of abuse which never happened, was ordered to pay her $30 of the $40 he made weekly. He was also ordered to put up a $500 bond, to insure the regularity of his payments. That poor devil hadn't $500! He had no lawyer, nor any means of procuring such a bond. He was promptly clapped into jail for contempt of court. When he had been in jail three months, he was ordered to pay three months arrears in alimony. 'How can I?' he asked, 'when I haven't worked, having been in jail?"

~ Poor Raphael ~

"'Very well,' said the fine legal system of our State of New York, 'then you go back to jail again, for contempt of court and for arrears in alimony. In addition, we impose a fine."

"Now, our association contends that this procedure is violating the constitutional rights of this American naturalized citizen, since it seems to our advisors, very much like imprisoning a man and finding him for what is practically, the same offence. At any rate, Raphael's is to be made a test case.

"But, as we studied the haphazard administration of the alimony laws, we were amazed and chagrined by the fashion in which those laws played into the hands of wicked, unscrupulous alimony hunters. We uncovered the case of a young woman more beautiful than she was good or virtuous.

"While still on the sunny side of 30 she had inveigled an elderly man into marriage. her husband has comfortable means. Two months from the date of the marriage, she filed suit for separation and alimony.

"Now the things the wifes charged her husband with were – our investigation disclosed, absolutely false. They were all unpleasant sex charges, which had they been made public in a court trial would have ruined the man, professionally and socially.

"His lawyer heard the wife's accusations. 'You can fight it, of course,' he said, 'but the girl is pretty. If it's a jury trial – and besides, it will be a public trial. She is not asking for a hearing in chambers –'

~ He Had to Give Up ~

"The result was that this respectable elderly gentleman whose life had been meticulous before his marriage, made over to this young adventuress more than half of his fortune to save his name and that of his children by a first marriage. a few days after the transfer was effected we found out that this young woman had been divorced by a previous husband who had named five correspondents. We told the husband. 'It would not have mattered,' he said. 'I could not had lived through the public disgrace.' It was just another instance of easy alimony. And the superior powers of women in domestic litigation."

But not only in such cases, the "Alimony Club" declares, do innocent husbands suffer because of the system. There's the question of human happiness and a husband's right to a home and children – when he pays out his money for a home and children.

~ A Slight, Costly Tiff ~

"We have a case of a wife her husband because of some slight tiff which most any couple might have had in the early, shaking-down process of marriage. had she met some sensible well-wisher, who would have given her a little sensible old-fashioned advice, she might be a happy wife today.

"She fell into the hands of a specialist in divorce and alimony, who began filling her up with an idea of her wrongs."

“Then what did he do?”

“The husband had a good business, real estate, money in the bank. The lawyer clapped liens on everything he could lay his hands on. The husband, having money, begged the court to be allowed to use a little of his own funds to defend himself. Litigation dragged, shockingly expensive. After five years the wife had brought 31 actions, of various sorts.

“The husband’s business was quite ruined; his assets poured out to his lawyers, his wife’s lawyers, in alimony and other fees; the wife had collected just $1500, which had cost the husband $250,000 in litigation and business depreciation, first.

“Today that professional man is working for less than $100 a week – a ruined, unhappy citizen, all because he loved his wife, wanted to convince her of her folly, and trusted to the laws of his country to bring her back to reason. Again and again we see our present system kill the goose that lays the golden egg, without enriching the wife. The only party that often profits is the lawyer.

“But there are some ugly facts we should face. It is because of these facts that our association will be made country-wide, with a New England branch, a Middle Western branch, a Far Western branch and a Southern as well.”

~ Women Joining ~

So the only association of its kind in the world [the writer was unaware of the Austrian Liga für Menschenrechte, founded in 1926], has started to work. And each day it adds to its membership goodly numbers of women. “But women do not pay alimony,” you will say, quickly, “why, then, women?”

Ah, brethren and sistren, these women are the devoted mothers, sisters, maiden aunts and cousins of men who do. These devoted female relatives have now and then mortgaged a piece of real estate or taken money from the savings account to “buy out of jail” a male relative clapped there for alimony troublers. These women, so says Mr. Ecob, have greatly helped the cause already.

On September 20, Lucian Vâlsan, James Huff, Huffnágel Pista and whoever shall call in will be talking about the "European framework national statute for the promotion of tolerance" which is essentially a document that can arguably be thought of being written by Orwell himself.

Amongst other things, the document wishes to force all the 28 unfortunate nations that are part of the European Union to take active measures (i.e. coercive totalitarian measures) to combat anti-feminism. Basically the document argues that the hateful gender ideology commonly known as feminism should be established as State-truths through State institutions. They should call them Ministries of Truths!

We will discuss the document itself, the totalitarian practices of the EU and ways to take action against this nonsense. This is a war against free speech.

The subject is tricky so please join us and call in at (001) 310 388 9709, or Skype in, after the news. Everyone's position is welcome as this thing needs to be rejected as soon as possible.

The show will commence at 7 PM GMT (London, Reykjavik and Lisbon time).

That is 8 PM CET (Madrid, Paris, Brussels, Rome, Oslo, Stockholm, Copenhagen, Budapest, Berlin, Vienna, Warsaw, Amsterdam, Bern, Bratislava, Prague, Belgrade, Tirana, Ljubljana, Zagreb, Sarajevo and Skopje time)

That is 9 PM EET (Helsinki, Tallinn, Riga, Vilnius, Kiev, Chisinau, Bucharest, Sofia, Athens, Ankara and Nicosia time)

That is 10 PM FEET (Minsk time)

And, finally, 11 PM Moscow time.

For the listeners in America this means 2 PM EST, 1 PM CST, 12 PM MST and 11 AM PST.

For the listeners in Australia, this means September 21, 2 AM (AWST) in West Australia and 4 AM AEST. (times adjusted in accordance with DST both for Europe and America)

Dr. Stasia calls the Garneau Sisterhood cowards

Men's Rights Edmonton · 19 September 2013 · Archived copy · Original

We predict that Dr. Cristina Stasia of the University of Alberta will have neither the guts nor the intellectual integrity to acknowledge forthrightly that it is she and the sisterhood who have refused to debate, and that she's lied about saying we won't show our faces when we have repeatedly shown our faces and challenged to open debate.

Nevertheless if she is simply mistaken, here again is her invitation: come and debate us in a live format no one can censor, or on a prerecorded debate that you have a full copy of as well as us.

We urge all Men's Rights Edmonton members and A Voice for Men supporters to tweet this to Dr. Stasia @ActionFlickDoc – further links below.

Please use these banned posters!

Update: Please see update at bottom of this article. The ban discussed below has apparently been lifted. We continue to encourage people to circulate these posters in all forums they can.

Recently a number of great Men's Human Rights Activists answered the call for help. But the online fascists are attempting to stop even that work. I kid you not, the very first of the below posters we produced, arguably the most heartrending of the lot, was posted on Facebook–and promptly banned for violating their "community standards." And of course, my account was suspended:

[image]

The others were going to go up over the next few days, I just picked that one as my personal favorite to put up first (others have their own favorites, I'm not saying it's necessarily the best) and was going to post another one every day for the next week or two until my account got suspended and it was removed.

Well gentlemen and ladies, we see the type of hateful ideologues we're really dealing with, don't we? Anyway, here are the posters. Please spread them as far and wide as you can, in any forum you can–just please do not alter them in any way. Click on the images to download PDF versions.

Just click the links to get the full sized, rasterized PDFs, which you can print out and put anywhere you want that you think won't cause you any legal trouble. We thoroughly expect fascists to tear them down of course–the one thing they hate more than men and boys is free speech after all–but in any case, it's FTSU time: we hope everybody can get to Toronto on Saturday the 27th and 28th if they can, and either way, we hope you'll use and re-use these posters (in unaltered form please) to promote this event anywhere and everywhere where it's likely to do some good.

Thank you to all who helped make these posters happen!

Update*: As of this afternoon, some 8 hours or so after noticing that the poster had been removed from Men and Boys in Crisis event page (which you should join if you can), I noticed that the graphics reappeared there. They also appear to have been restored to a couple of other Facebook groups where I had posted them. They had simply disappeared and I got notice that my account was suspended, then, when I filed a complaint, I received no response, but the material reappeared with no notice or explanation either in my mailbox or any public forum. I'm going to have call this a… good? Positive? Not-horrible…? mild thumbs-up for Facebook. It would have been better to see them write* back with an explanation, an apology, or whatever, but the fact is that the posters are back. So, thank you Facebook. I think. I still encourage everyone to disseminate these everywhere you can on Facebook and on any other forum that you can put them in. Thanks. –DE

Update 2*: Oddly enough, my account is still on 12-hour suspension, 2 hours to go according to this screen shot I just took.*

AVFM News week in review Sept 10 – Sept 17 2013

Robert O'Hara · 19 September 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Busy news week this week, everyone – lots to report!

Item: Student arrested for using iphone ap to "shoot" classmates

A student at H. L. Bourgeois High School in Gary LA accused of using a mobile phone app to simulate shooting his classmates was booked and jailed in Terrebonne Parish.

The app is called "The Real Strike" and simulates a first person shooter game, except the battleground is real life.

Police say the 15-year-old was arrested after posting a video on YouTube using the Real Strike app to shoot other kids at school, "He said it was a result of him being frustrated and tired of being bullied. He said that he had no intentions of hurting anybody. We have to take all threats seriously and we have no way of knowing that without investigating and getting to the bottom of it." Said Major Malcolm Wolfe of the Gary Police Department.

"You can't ignore it," says Wolfe. "We don't know at what time that game becomes reality."

Arrested and charged before any crime is committed. Hmmmmm, sounds like something out of a Phillip K. Dick novel. But of course this is a boy we are talking about here so his classmates were in eminent danger.

Item: Sussex University Student Union in the U.K. considers separate student elections based on gender Supposedly more women will run for student government office if only women are allowed to vote for them. That's gender equality for you!

Item: False Rape Accusation and Fallout Continues in Dallas, TX.

The rape accusation continued even after the accused was cleared by DNA tests four times and the tests implicated another man. The accuser has not been identified nor charged with making a false report. See also, here.

Item: University Park, Texas woman gets 14 years in child porn case

In a stunningly appalling case, 42-year-old wealthy socialite Erika Susan Perdue is sentenced to 14 years on a plea bargain, pleading guilty to child porn trafficking which she engaged in every day for over a decade. Something tells me that they would throw away the key if it were a man. Warning! THIS STORY WILL PISS YOU OFF!

Item: Op ed in Kenyan publication indicates that the red pill is starting to be distributed over there

Great read from Kenya's Standard Digital concerning domestic violence. Perhaps we may have an African News Director soon!

Item: Change.org to add Men's Rights section

Everyone go sign now!

Item: Men's Rights Edmonton at it again with a new round of posters

This time targeting Edmonton mayoral candidate and Lise Gotell, chair of women's and gender studies at the University of Alberta, as 'bigots'.

Iveson, the mayoral candidate, is quoted as saying: "I said I would debate them on a neutral ground and on a reputable media source, they refused to do that."

Ahem. Actually, Mr. Iveson, I was the one who invited you to the debate and here is what you actually said in your response:

"Unfortunately, I cannot take part. Thanks for the invitation."

Just when you think the Gender Ideologue hatemongers can't get dirtier, they get dirtier. AVfM Contributing Editor Karen Straughan explains: the Miles Groth lecture sponsored by CAFE is under threat, and need help:

I can tell you that we are already planning not just how to get them the money but also how to challenge this in court on CAFE's behalf. Fuck these people for pretending the issue is the advocates for men and boys, as opposed to the real problem: the violent thugs calling themselves feminists who barricade doors and try to stop a non-violent human rights movement that gives a shit about men and boys.

Update: More on the assault on CAFE right here.

Circumcision in Africa not preventing HIV

Robert O'Hara · 20 September 2013 · Archived copy · Original

On Tuesday of last week the Standard Digital News of Kenya reported that the prevalence of HIV AIDS was rising in its central provinces despite the aggressive campaign to circumcise men of sexually active age in that country.

According to the Kenya Aids Indicative Survey released by the Health Cabinet Secretary, James Macharia, HIV and Aids rose in Nyanza and Central provinces. But central provences 3.8 per cent prevalence increase from the previous 3.6 per cent is a mere fraction of Nyanza's 15.1 per cent up from 2007's 14.9 per cent. Nyanza's prevalence is big enough to double the national average prevalence. Clearly, the massive circumcision campaign is doing nothing to stem the epidemic in that country, the same country that hosted one of the famed Orange Farm studies that claimed getting circumcised reduces your risk of contracting HIV by 60%.

Even more disturbing are the reports that compensatory behavior is occurring among women when it comes to circumcised men. As the SDN reports:

> "According to Ruth Achieng, a 22-year-old accounts student in Kisumu, many of her "peers today prefer circumcised men because they are perceived to be safe and HIV-free."
> As a result, the tendency not to use a condom during sexual intercourse is high."

Supporters of the circumcision campaign were quick to react:

> "Voluntary Medical Male Circumcision Programme Manager at the National Aids Control Council, Dr Athanasius Ochieng', is quick to allay the fears.
> "The 2001 and 2013 figures are statistically the same and is proof that male circumcision has actually stabilized prevalence by preventing new infections," says Dr Ochieng."

Dr. Athanasius fails to note here that the circumcision campaign did not start in earnest until the past several years, and this means that, in fact, circumcision is doing nothing to stop the spread of HIV AIDS.

It is important to point out that at no time has there ever been a follow up study of men who were actually circumcised. All studies only track the over all prevalence of HIV in the population and not the men who have actually gotten circumcised.

Indian girl uses acid for revenge

Anil Kumar · 20 September 2013 · Archived copy · Original

In recent times, the western media and feminists are growing crazy about acid attacks on women in South Asia, though the actual reality is such attacks are very rare and the victims can be both male and female. The paranoid Western people think of helping out without realizing that with 1.5 billion people living in South Asia, some 500 cases in a year are miniscule. The feminists blow this issue out of proportion to collect funds to break families and sending innocent men and women in prison in India. This year, a movie on Acid attacks was even given an Academy award.

A typical story of acid attack on a young woman appears in media as below:

http://www.ndtv.com/article/south/acid-thrown-on-20-year-old-college-student-in-andhra-pradesh-413502

A 20-year-old college student was attacked with acid by two men in Anantpur town of Andhra Pradesh today. The girl, studying in final year B.Com in Anantpur, tried to dodge the attack, but still suffered burn injuries on her body.

The accused are two men from her native village in Mudigupa mandal of Anantpur district, some 70 kilometres from the town. One of the accused, Raghavendra, had reportedly been harassing the girl for some time. Three months ago, he got married but continued to pursue the girl.

The girl told the police in hospital that the accused had threatened to pour acid on her and she had brought this to the attention of the police but no action was taken. Police sources said the accused, Raghavendra and his friend Venkatesh, will be arrested shortly.

Now, such a story will melt hearts of a lot of white knights, who will immediately call of hanging or castration of her attackers. In India, often the communist-run student unions mobilize students to unleash violent protests.

Now, in the above story, as the police investigated, they found that the woman was upset due to rejection by her boyfriend, who married another woman. So, she asked a few youth in that village to arrange some acid. Then, she poured the acid on her body to teach him a lesson.

This news video talks about how the police investigated the case and found her story to be inconsistent. Then by tracking her cell phone call records, they caught hold of the youth who gave her acid and the youth spilled the beans.

Video (in Indian Language Telugu)

Most Western People are brainwashed that India is a patriarchal society and Indian women live like slaves. The false propaganda about Indians burning young women for dowry is also propagated for decades. Indian feminists thrived from the funds sent by Western Governments and Taxpayers, who believed their lies and hoaxes. In this particular case, this criminal woman is not from any big modernized city, but from a relatively small place from rural India. This dispels the myth that rural Indian women can not be vicious and treacherous.

Its time, taxpayers in West stop believing lies and stop wasting their hard earned money by funding criminal minded Indian feminists.

Paul Elam · 21 September 2013 · Archived copy · Original

The University of Toronto administration is rolling out security forces and charging CAFE for their presence, in anticipation of a protest at the September 27 lecture by Dr. Miles Groth; a protest that has neither been announced nor referenced in any online resource we know of. In fact, there seems to be no evidence at this point that there is to be any protest at all, either at the lecture or at the Rally for Men and Boys in Crisis the next morning at 11:00 at Queen's Park, Toronto.

If that is the case, we are happy to hear of it, and will consider it a positive sign that the University of Toronto Student's Union and other Far Left elements in Toronto have simply figured out that their protests expose them to richly deserved and self-inflicted ridicule – as well as doing nothing whatsoever to accomplish the abridgement of free speech they seek.

In other words, the inevitable is happening. The unruly children of privilege in Toronto are learning to mind their place, on the sidelines, which is where they belong until they can grow up and learn how to interact as and with adults.

Looks good on 'em.

And, their absence from the event allows us to focus a lot more needed attention on what this talk is about to begin with. The issues faced by men in college and the need for university level men's issues groups.

With that in mind I am pleased to announce that the film crew that is now doing the documentary on the MHRM is going to be in Toronto to cover the lecture by Dr. Groth and the Rally for Men and Boys in Crisis.

I am more encouraged by their work than ever. I spent four hours sitting side by side with Dr. Warren Farrell on Wednesday as we were questioned by the documentarian about, get this, the issues. Yes, you heard that right. All the questions, and I mean all of them, were about the issues. Not only were they about the issues, they were intelligent, incisive and critically challenging questions designed to get directly to the heart of those issues.

I spent several more hours by myself being questioned on Tuesday, and more on Thursday before returning to Houston. All of it was the same; an honest documentarian who by all appearances is striving to make an honest movie about a controversial subject with no tricks and no games of "gotcha."

I am glad they will be coming to Toronto where they intend to speak to some of you, and where they also intend to let the feminists who will speak have their say as well. Just as it should be.

And by happenstance some schedules have been arranged and rearranged, allowing some people to make it who did not anticipate the opportunity. People like Dean Esmay, Suzanne McCarley, Karen Straughan, Dan Perrins, John the Other — and yours truly.

We will all be there, at the lecture and at the Rally for Men and Boys in Crisis. We will be there with perhaps a surprise or three that I can announce in the near future.

People, if you can, come to Toronto. It is time that we put the icing on the cake and establish once and for all that the public discourse on sexual politics and human rights is no longer a monopoly owned by bigots and morally bankrupt fascists.

We are going to gather, peacefully and in numbers, to take your story to the streets. We will not act like the thugs and bullies that have given us the likes of Vanja Krajina, Danielle Sandhu and Chanty Binx. But make no mistake, come the next weekend we will be heard, and so will all of you. We are not going to settle for anything less.

Any efforts to stop or silence us will be quickly and lawfully crushed.

In my back yard

Dan Perrins · 21 September 2013 · Archived copy · Original

I believe it's time for me to string together a few words about the upcoming events in Toronto, part of my back yard.

Actually I'm a little late. The reason? I've been busy in my back yard. Hell of a lot of work to do, and my back yard is a fair size. It's full of feminist gender fuzzy-science-pseudo-logic narratives.

Here is some of the FTSU (Fact Their Shit Up) I've done over the last bit of time in my immediate back yard:

Those two videos were in preparation for Hamilton Ontario's rendition of the verbal lynching media-slut march, complete with feminist claims of boogeymen lurking in every shadow. But not a whisper is heard about the boogeywomen who also inhabit those dark recesses of humanity during the "Inflate The Fright" (aka "take back the night") marches.

Something else was happening for this one: our old friends from the White ~~flag~~ Ribbon (WR) organization were going to be in town giving a "male allies" lecture.

I've made a call to those folks in the past. It was embedded in an article here on AVFM. Apparently someone didn't like White Ribbon being recorded lying about the facts of gender violence and had the recording removed from the hosting site.

So I made a video gift for those gender studies edumikated folks from the White Ribbon Campaign in honour of their ~~infecting~~ visiting Hamilton.

And then I went to the event, bringing some post cards with facts on them, and filmed the t-shirts and watched curiously as Hamilton Police Services showed up.

Advocacy for addressing of issues men face is my back yard and it doesn't end where the fence-line begins. It doesn't end when I have a talk over a coffee about issues facing men with a neighbour. I wish it was that easy to fix this treacherous misandric quicksand that men find themselves in these days. So my activism doesn't end at the fence-line.

My back yard goes as far as my eyes can see, and as far as I can get my carcass shipped. Toronto is one of those places I can easily travel to, and that makes it part of my back yard.

The seeds of male human rights are planted in Toronto, I've watched over them as best I can, encouraging that truth to grow. And that part of my back yard is growing beautifully.

On the 27th & 28th of September it will be time to harvest some of the fruits of those seeds. Time to harvest the effort and work all of us in the MHRM have put into exposing feminist hypocrisy and bigotry. Time to bring the harvest of those silenced male voices to the public banquet table and broadcast it as loud as need be in Toronto, my back yard.

To prepare for that banquet I've begun some work.

But it's not really my back yard, its everyone's.

I am only one of the groundskeepers, and so too are you!

So with that in mind I am putting the call out for posters folks and as I stated in the text of my video preparing for the weekend of the 27th:

"Hang 'em High,

Hang'em Often,
Hang'em in Feminism's Face."

And on that note me and my AVFM wingman Jeb (who now has the call sign of 'Jebernaught") have a busy week ahead of us. Those posters don't hang themselves.

Hey, where will you be hanging yoursS? They are right here you know.

U of T Administration extorts CAFE

Paul Elam · 21 September 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Update*: Note that thanks in part to all our efforts, CAFE has met its goal. Now let's hope they issue a legal challenge to get the extortion money back.–DE

It has recently been announced here that the administration of the University of Toronto has decided to impose a fee of $964.00 on the Canadian Association for Equality (CAFE) in order to cover the additional security needs caused by criminal elements within the University of Toronto Student's Union. This is in relation to an upcoming lecture by Dr. Miles Groth on September 27 on the need for men's issues groups in colleges.

As we have seen in three lectures on issues affecting men and boys since Warren Farrell spoke at U of T November 16 of last year on the Boy Crisis, the student's union has planned, organized and executed multiple illegal acts including vandalism, assault, blocking doors, verbal harassment of lecture attendees and pulling fire alarms.

The university administration has decided that the way to handle this problem is not to pursue disciplinary and criminal actions against the students and others committing these acts, but to actually fine the victims — namely CAFE and those seeking to attend their events and participate in the peaceful and lawful exchange of ideas.

AVFM Contributing Editor Karen Straughan posted a YouTube video announcing this abusive, extortionist outrage by the University of Toronto Administration, asking her viewers to contribute funds so the event could take place. Many thanks to Karen for that and I hope she does not have to deliver the cash to university officials in a brown paper bag.

I also have it through the pipeline that legal action against the university is all but certain. We will provide more details on that as it becomes available and publishable.

Given that the bases appear to be covered, i.e. the payoff is on the way and the appropriate legal action against the university is being planned, it leaves nothing in the way of the talk next week by Dr. Groth going forward…so far.

[image]
Hate: Now sponsored by the University of Toronto Administration
This presents, rather it creates, an opportunity to make two points, both of which I hope are well noted by members of CAFE and members of the Men's Human Rights Movement, generally speaking.

First, and I state this more pointedly to the members of CAFE, I hope this serves as what I respectfully suggest is a needed wake-up call. I hope that your experience in the realm of trying to address the issues of boys and men takes you to a better understanding of the fact that you are not in a debate, but in a war. So far, very early in your efforts to do something as noble as educating people about the many under-recognized and ignored issues facing men and boys, you have been attacked in almost every way imaginable.

Police have been assaulted. The people you serve have been harassed and bullied. The speakers you have invited have been demonized and subjected to character assassination and campaigns of lies. Considerable energy is being invested at this very moment to ensure that you are further demonized and that future attempts to replicate your work in other schools are preempted by whatever means are necessary.

And they are succeeding.

Attempts to react to all of this with genteel political delicacy will invariably fail. As it will fail other concerned students who sincerely desire to emulate your very important work. It will result only with where you now find yourself — paying out money to an administration that would rather force you to spend yourself out of existence than to take appropriate action against those who are actually the problem.

I also hope this series of events serves to illustrate a point to the MHRM in general, as well as to the student body at the University of Toronto and every other similar institution across the western world.

Feminism is not a movement. It is the establishment.

It is the institutionalized and systemic hatred of men and boys and, just as the U of T's administration now puts on shameless public display, it is driven by the depraved indifference to finding solutions to problems faced by that population. In fact, it is a system hard-wired to ensure that such solutions are never explored, or even imagined. And those who try will pay for it.

In short, feminism is the man. If you have any illusion otherwise, you are not equipped to be an effective advocate. You are not having problems because you are dealing with a bad element in a good system. You are having problems because you are the only good element in a system that can't be called anything but bad. The only cooperation you are going to get is the cooperation you force with peaceful defiance, speaking the truth without relenting and the willingness to fight back with vigor.

A reminder for those able to attend: On Saturday, September 28, 2013 at 11:00 AM EST there will be a Rally for Men and Boys in Crisis at Queen's Park Toronto. If you plan on attending, please visit the Facebook Page for the event. Thanks.

Update*: Note that thanks in part to all our efforts, CAFE has met its goal. Now let's hope they issue a legal challenge to get the extortion money back.–DE

John Hembling (JtO) · 22 September 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Greetings to my friends in the men's rights movement. As we approach the CAFE presentation of Dr Miles Groth on Friday, and the Saturday Toronto Men's Rights rally a few thoughts have crossed my mind, which I will now share with all of you.

As you are all aware, each of the CAFE presentations over the last 2 years, featuring the speakers Dr Warren Farrell, Dr Janice Fiamengo, Dr's Nathanson and Young – each of these events have been attended by protesters from the feminist and socialist camps of the U of T Student's Union, Communist Collectives, radical students organizations and others of similar violent demeanor. The "protesters" have established a persistent pattern of violence, censorship, threats of assault, as well as direct violence against both conference attendees and Toronto's police force.

Approaching the upcoming presentation by Dr Groth and the Saturday rally, I will share a few imperatives with all of you.

All of this should already be understood, but I'll say it all again anyway.

Number 1

Do not, under any circumstance use violence or the threat of violence, or violent rhetoric at, near, around, or in relation to the upcoming events.

ANYBODY advocating, initiating, or participating in violence with be video-recorded and doxed, and we will (JtO (John Hembling), Paul Elam, Karen Straughan, James Huff, Suzanne McCarley, Allison Tieman, Dan Perrins, Dean Esmay, Fidelbogen, Diana Davison) all of us, hand you on a platter, with a pink ribbon tied around your balls, to the Toronto Municipal Police should you decide to participate in violence of any kind.

Your affiliation with the men's movement, or the MHRM will earn you no quarter, reprieve or forgiveness. We will not tolerate violence or violent rhetoric from anyone, friend or foe.

Number 2

Sexist, racist, bigoted and otherwise hateful rhetoric will not be tolerated, either.

We will be recording, and if you don't like this, or can't handle it, stay at home.

To be clear, if you are assaulted at either of these events, or leading up to these events, DO. NOT. RESPOND. WITH. VIOLENCE. Simply leave. If you find yourself assaulted, and you can't leave, lie down on the ground, curl into a protective position and protect your head and neck with your arms.

We will be recording, and you will be the star.

Now, take a deep breath and let the previous paragraph sink in. I am telling you, that if you are assaulted by feminists or other protesters at or around the upcoming events – you must either remove yourself or endure it while protecting your vital parts without fighting back.

Do you have a moral right to defend yourself? Certainly. But don't do it, because you will undermine the work of this human rights movement by asserting that right.

IF YOU CANT HANDLE THIS, DO NOT ATTEND.

One other thing, anyone who'd like to pose as an MHRA and attempt to initiate violence against feminists, or against us, we will have you on video, and hand your sorry ass to the police, too.

Thank you all for your kind attention, and have a lovely day.

AVFM Fall 2013 Fundraiser is here

Paul Elam · 22 September 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Well folks, we are moving from the Summer of 2013 to the Fall of 2013 on this very day. And of course that once again marks the time for the launch of the AVFM Quarterly Fundraiser.

It is an activity that I do not much enjoy doing (few people like asking for money), but one that is nonetheless a complete necessity for the continued survival of our work, especially as we look into a future that now seems brighter and more promising.

The long standing members here will bear with me as I point out to newer people that AVFM started from humble beginnings and has grown into the most influential website on the internet as it relates to issues affecting men and boys. In the course of our growth, we have begun to change the cultural dialogue about sex and power and have attracted a growing, impressive pool of talented thinkers in the process.

Recently many of you saw the teaser video of a discussion between Dr. Warren Farrell, Tom Golden and myself on the future of the men's movement. The full length version of that will soon be posted, but you heard enough in that one to know that coordinated activism among many more people is now in the works.

In other words, this exciting coming together does not signal the end of our growth and cooperation with other key, influential persons, but the beginning.

Unfortunately, all of this comes with a cost: Dedicated servers, image royalties, legal fees, internet radio premiums, various kinds of computer and media hardware — and now traveling to different locations, like Toronto, in order to do what has been in the plans all along. That is to take the largest web-based men's advocacy group in existence, put boots on it, and put it in the streets.

That is what we, the management and staff of A Voice for Men, have every intention of doing.

I said early this year, on these very pages, that 2013 would be the year of the MHRM. I don't want to brag, but here we are in September and I already get to say that it proved true. We have come further, faster than at any other time ever. With all respect to the many organizations doing fine work on behalf of men and boys, that is largely true because of AVFM and your support for it. We, you, have finally laid a true, solid foundation on which the future of men's rights in this culture will be built.

As 2014 approaches I want place the gauntlet at your feet and at my own. Let's make 2014 the year we put a structure on that foundation; a fortress and a testament to the countless disenfranchised and disaffected men and boys who are counting on us to be their voice, and to force change in this god-awful system.

We can absolutely do it. We can expand our operations and increase our share of the cultural consciousness by a thousand fold. We can build the men's issues groups in our colleges and universities. We can force the world to recognize that the issues for which we advocate must and will be addressed.

We can't can fix every problem, or heal every hateful heart, but we can foster a new consciousness in which the agents of hate that perpetuate so much evil realize fully that their days are numbered.

And then we can start X-ing off the days on the calendar until they are gone.

We are already witnessing it to a certain degree as gender ideologues become more and more desperate and stupid in their attempts to silence us. And as we document those acts of desperation and stupidity and put them on full display for the world to see.

I am now estimating that there will be a turnout of over 200 people in Toronto for the Rally for Men and Boys in Crisis that we are sponsoring. Note: this is not a just another family court or a father's rights demonstration, but a general demonstration protesting the treatment of men and boys in our culture.

It is a historical first, a landmark moment that we will, in retrospect see as a tipping point in the times.

Men's rights are human rights, and men and boys are human beings long treated like they are anything but. It is high time the society at large is shaken from the coma that prevents it from realizing those simple truths.

I invite you once again to be the solution to that problem and to help us carry this message to the world for the sake of our sons and all those who follow in our footsteps.

Criminal charges for Pauley Perrette crew forthcoming?

Suzanne McCarley · 22 September 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Season 11 Premier of NCIS, A Voice for Men files complaint with LA County Grand Jury; Perrette, and some of her pals might be residents of LA County Jail before season's end.

For those of you who have been following the "Hollywood" melodrama in Los Angeles County Courtrooms, you are well aware that A Voice for Men and the National Coalition for Men have extensively covered the stories of the false restraining orders and the silly and manufactured alleged criminal actions of Mr. Francis "Coyote" Shivers – all of this at the hands of his vengeful ex-wife, Ms. Pauley Perrette, one of the stars of the highly rated television program, "NCIS", which debuts its season 11 just a few days from now.

Well TV fans, this organization is not just a reporting blog. On July 31, upon a cooperative effort, a 250 page formal public corruption complaint has been filed with the Los Angeles County Grand Jury. The complaint also contains nearly 90 exhibits that contain public records, court files, declarations, trial and deposition transcripts, photographs and audio and video recordings. The attachments encompass more than 1,500 pages. A copy of the cover letter to the Grand Jury can be found here.

In addition, another ten (10) governmental oversight and regulatory bodies and political committees have also been notified, and those notifications, all sent via U.S. Certified Mail with tracking numbers, have been included in publicly recorded court declarations by Mr. Shivers. They can be found here.

After an extensive six month review, encompassing over 1,000 hours of research, investigative effort, interviews, and line by line reviews of court records; the evidence is overwhelming, staggering and factual that Ms. Laura Pauline Perrett, aka "Pauley Perrette" has indeed demonstrated that she is a master at the art of the false restraining order, and a master at the compromise and corruption of legal professionals and public officials to achieve this goal.

The evidence reveals that not only have public officials been compromised, they have been romanticized in a nearly pornographic way to accommodate the wants and wishes of this seriously disturbed celebrity.

The combination of the abuse, misuse, manipulation, and exploitation of the restraining order process by Perrette and her cohorts, combined with the compromise of public officials is perhaps the most egregious example of the abuse of this process in the history of the State of California and should be the catalyst for legislative change and complete reform of the restraining order process in the state. This is restraining order abuse on "steroids."

A Voice for Men has received a staggering amount of responses and emails both on and offline to the articles that have been posted and we have purposely waited until this time to release this information to see what kind of response was received from all of the governmental bodies notified. The hornet's nest has been stirred up and it seems now that the jig is up everybody is in crisis and "cover our ass" mode. It makes you wonder, who will be the first to "snitch" especially when presented with such overwhelming evidence.

As you can see from the cover letter to the Grand Jury, this kind of abuse of the restraining order system can only happen with the compromise of public officials, thus the main reason for the complaint to the Grand Jury which is a complaint of public corruption, and secondarily the goofy unlawful antics of Perrette and her paid cohorts. Yes, I did say "paid" and besides the dozens and dozens of examples of perjury, we also include conspiracy as well as a host of other federal crimes, state crimes and various professional rules and policy violations.

Also explicitly clear is that what happened to Francis Shivers has happened in many other similar cases, and the same names come up with the same M.O.. Many others frustrated with the indifference and retaliatory actions of law enforcement, prosecutors and the courts, and frivolous civil actions by less than ethical legal professionals, have inundated AVFM with pleas for help. For all of those who we could not address or assist, it is recommended that you print out a copy of Mr. Shiver's public record court declaration Mr. Shiver's public record court declaration and file similar complaints.

Although the sheer size of the Grand Jury complaint is massive, it is only the tip of the iceberg. There are still many more issues to address with specific agencies and oversight bodies. More complaints will follow and many more articles on this site and others will provide readers with facts and helpful information.

One of things that should anger every taxpayer is the waste – the waste of hundreds of thousands and perhaps millions of taxpayer dollars – that have been issued to the City and County of Los Angeles under the auspices of the Violence Against Women Act in state and federal grants to pay for police, prosecutors, and judges to go after people with frivolous and manufactured actions. All of this just to satisfy some disturbed and delusional celebrity or wannabe celebrity.

Another thing that should concern anyone is just how vulnerable you are when you get in the crosshairs of a celebrity or wannabe who uses a very powerful legal tool that requires no proof with zero chance of sanction even when evidence of perjury, conspiracy, and fraud have been provided. It also helps to have a slime ball lawyer or two or publicist in your corner and a handful of corrupt star struck public officials in your pocket as well. Just last week, a prosecutor from the LA City Attorney's office compromised a criminal case when she approached actor Tom Hanks in a courtroom hallway to thank him for his jury duty service. That's a big no-no; the defendant in that case pled to a lesser charge, as was extensively reported by TMZ.

Hopefully this action will result in Perrette and her band of clowns spending some time in the slammer – and it should, given the mountain of evidence we have gathered. For that, I don't think anyone would object to the use of their tax dollars in such a manner. Since we're talking about wasted tax dollars; when, not if, some of these folks get convicted, let's hope that restitution is ordered. A check by Perrette for a million or so dollars should cover part of it, and the rest can come from the pockets of the corrupt legal and criminal justice personnel.

Probably the worst outcome of this whole circus is that the gross abuse by one person, one person, aided and facilitated by those in the public trust. The biggest losers they create will be those actual and true victims of intimate partner violence, both men and women.

It is suggested that anyone who reads this post, all over the United States and in other countries, take it upon themselves to write to the same agencies that have already been notified; write to your local elected representatives, your congressional representatives, your U.S. Senators; hell even the Easter Bunny if it will help, and tell them that the time to completely reform the restraining order laws is a decade overdue; it is time, using this example, to completely reform this process with an eye on not just protecting victims of intimate partner violence, but also on punishing false accusers and those who facilitate them, including lawyers, police, prosecutors and judges.

Putting it plain and simple: prosecute false accusers. Perjury already is a crime in California and every other state; start using it, yesterday.

We completely support anyone; man or woman, actual victimized by intimate partner violence. On the other hand, those who falsely use this as a tool must be sanctioned and that includes petitioners, lawyers, especially lawyers, and the judicial officers who issue these false and ridiculous restraining orders in order to protect their own jobs and asses, not…protect the children…or…err on the side of caution, like they like us to believe.

The case of Pauley Perrette and her abuse of the restraining order is one thing; the compromise of public officials is something else and should concern everyone. It is very sad and disturbing that the vast majority of law enforcement, prosecutors and judges are ethical and honest public servants, and when a few corrupt and compromised public officials engage in these kinds of actions it poisons the whole barrel.

The bottom line: the restraining order process, in its original intent, was a good idea, but that is not what is happening now. What is routine; what is common; what is the norm in this legal culture is that the restraining order process has been twisted and distorted so that it does not resemble its own legislative intent.

We can thank Pauley Perrette for shining a light on this. Maybe a legislative change proposal calling for civil and criminal sanctions for false accusers and their lawyers can be called "Pauley's Law." Maybe when that happens, Ms.

Perrette and a few of her cohorts, including some recently fired public officials, will testify before some type of legislative committee, properly attired of course in a “County Jail” or “U.S. Department of Corrections” or some other appropriate facility name printed on orange jumpsuits.

Despite all of this negativity, we also have to look at the bright side. Maybe the producers and writers at CBS and NCIS will use this scenario and re-write this season’s ending, with character Abby Scuito suffering some type of psychiatric breakdown; similar to her publicly revealed lengthy stay in the Cedars-Sinai psychiatric unit; then the end of the show, forever.

“Pauley,” you blew it; the first one would have gone under the radar, but like any big league ball player, no matter how good you think you are, there is always somebody else who is better. Do yourself and everybody else you have dragged into your mess a favor: claim your brain was taken over by aliens, rat out the grease ball lawyers and others you pulled into this, rat out the corrupt public officials that you “schmoozed,” repay the millions of taxpayer dollars you wasted, publicly apologize to all of those who you have hurt, including your ex-husband who has been terrorized by you and corrupt public officials for a decade; give him restitution for a decade of terrorism, and simply go away into celebrity obscurity. Maybe you could sell used Dodge Caravans or bake muffins.

To CBS and the NCIS producers: sorry, folks; you all bought into this; your little money-maker squeaky clean star is, well, not so squeaky clean. Hey, every good thing comes to an end at some time. Too bad for the other actors, the crew, and the fans. This could have been stopped a long time ago. It wasn’t, but now, the cat has been let out of the bag. The civil rights of a man and the integrity and honesty of our legal system is more important than television ratings.

Anyone disagree?

Blame feminism

Diana Davison · 22 September 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Jessica Valenti wants to talk about responsibility. It's about damn time.

In her article for The Nation on September 20, 2013 Jessica scoffs that "feminism has been blamed for everything from killing the family to traffic" as if it's absurd to think that an ideology might affect society when implemented. Certainly when women conceived of feminism they expected to see a change. That was the goal. After a hundred years, if there had been no visible effects it would be a sign of a major flaw in their technique if not full blown incompetence.

Feminism has indeed become so integrated into the fabric of our existence that it has government funding, organizations that cater only to women, female specific loans, grants, programs, charities, health services, and university degrees that make a woman an expert on nothing other than what it's like to be a woman: you need help to survive. Surely the granting of solipsistic degrees in the study of oneself will have effects upon the society in which these intentionally narrow-minded bigots will live.

Of course it is difficult to foresee all the negative consequences of our choices before giving them a try but only feminists wish to claim immunity from all unintended results. Just like children.

Perhaps feminism is not to blame for the items on Jessica's list but we are not given a chance to find out because feminism declares all critics misogynistic, patriarchal, rape apologists. If Valenti is so sure that feminism hasn't contributed to the increase in single parent homes or traffic congestion she should welcome studies and discussion. If nothing else, it might help get her shopping done faster.

There are three questions feminists can ask to clear up the matter: Who are the people blaming feminism? What are the roots of the complaints? And could they be right? Of the top five issues Jessica chose for discussion three were queries made by women. Certainly feminism must care what women are worried about. It's their basic mandate. Unfortunately, the core of the issues are never explored because Jessica cares more about being popular than being right.

Here are the top five things Jessica wants to laugh about:

1. Laura Sessions Stepp wrote an article for The Washington Post in 2006 about the increase of erectile dysfunction in young men and one of the factors of consideration was the increased sexual demands of young women. The article references studies done in universities and therapists that counsel young men. Laura seems to care about the happiness of both the young men and women in the case studies presented. Aside from the obvious trauma to the men, most women take it very personally when a man can't get aroused to have sex with them. Jessica's level of concern? "Because if there's one thing that kills straight guys' boners, it's girls that want to have to sex with them." Apparently Ms. Valenti thinks mockery is the best solution to a clearly identified and devastating problem.

2. A group of women who are so passionately anti-feminist they formed a group called Concerned Women of America (CWA) to challenge feminist dogma. In 2005 the topic of concern was the dramatic increase in women being incarcerated for drug crimes, violent crimes, and fraud. The increase is an established fact. The CWA felt that women in a more sheltered, married environment were better off than modern women encouraged to be independent. While there is no reason to expect men to save women from themselves, we are still left with a nasty fact: Women have either become more criminal since feminism began or they are being held more accountable for their crimes. If it's the first, then feminists should be concerned. If it's the second then feminists should stop claiming that women behave better than men and celebrate our equality in being held accountable for our acts. Jessica should care which answer is correct. If women are not the innocent little doe-eyed beaten creatures that they pretend then we need to put more women in jail.

3. The next mockery is the perspective of Charlotte Allen regarding the Sandy Hook school shooting and wondering why there had been no men working at the school. While I disagree with Allen for expecting men to act more bravely than the women, who were quite valiant during the crisis, she does bring up an interesting point: Why were there no men? Allen calls the school a feminized environment and, instead of considering the question honestly, Valenti quips "Guns don't kill people, feminized settings kill people." Considering that feminists insist that women are vulnerable and should live in fear of attack at any moment, I find it interesting that Valenti now claims women aren't walking targets. Which is it Jessica? Charlotte Allen is actually representing the feminist point of view.

4. We move on to an annoyingly fact riddled article by environmentalist Jack Cashill. Apparently Jessica doesn't like inconvenient truths. She implies that his list of reasons feminist changes to society have impacted the environment is a statement that women should stop working or having careers. That simply is not the case. He's only stating the facts, just like Steven D. Levitt wasn't supporting abortion when, in his book Freakonomics, he linked Roe vs Wade to the decrease in crime. Some people, unlike Jessica Valenti, are curious about cause and effect. I'm fairly convinced, after reading Cashill's article that feminism has increased pollution. The only reason to mock the facts is if you are unwilling to face unexpected problems. Real leaders are solution oriented.

5. The final entry on Jessica's "silly list" is Weinergate. Fox News supposed that Anthony Weiner was being held to a double standard because women are becoming more sexually provocative and men can only be expected to respond. Valenti doesn't agree. While supporting her friend, Jaclyn Friedman, who wrote an article called My Sluthood, Myself, which calls for all women to support slutty behaviour of their fellow females, Valenti can somehow still object to men acting the same way. In the words of Jessica's co-editor on "Yes means Yes!: Visions of Female Sexual Power and A World Without Rape":

> "Sluthood isn't just a choice we should let women make because women should be free to make even 'bad' choices. It's a choice we should all have access to because it has the potential to be liberating. Healing. Soul-fulfilling. I'm telling you this because sluthood saved me, in a small but life-altering way, and I want it to be available to you if you ever think it could save you, too. Or if you want it for any other reason at all. And because even if you don't ever want sluthood for yourself, you're going to be called upon to support a slut. I'm telling you this because when that happens, I want you to say yes."

Say "yes" to Weiner, Jessica. If Anthony Weiner is the only one accountable for his slutty behaviour perhaps you should tell that to your friend, Jaclyn, as well. But that will never happen.

Within three hours of Jessica's article we had a promotional piece (one can hardly call it writing) to let everyone know that Jessica Valenti was starting a Twitter hashtag to mock anti-feminists or anyone who has some interesting questions the feminist gang don't want to answer. Katie McDonough published the announcement in Salon with some selected tweets showing people how to #blamefeminism for killing their house plants or spilling their coffee.

Katie either knew about this article in advance or has lightning fast reflexes.

I'm tossing a coin. I'm going to say it was co-ordinated. Silver flipping in the air… Heads I'm right… Tails who cares? If Jessica and Katie really want to know what people think about feminism and the accountability they've shirked thus far it's time to let them know. Instead of cherry picking the arguments they think can be laughed off, though most of them turn out to raise good questions, I suggest that MHRAs and other concerned citizens use this opportunity to let Jessica and Katie know what issues you really blame on feminism.

To make sure they hear you, include #blamefeminism and @JessicaValenti or @kmcdonovgh in your tweet.

I'm really glad that Jessica has opened up this conversation. It's time to actually talk about the negative side effects resulting from women being taught to focus only on their own needs. It's time for a real dialogue in which feminists don't get to stomp around, cry, and call people bully names. I'm a woman so it seems only appropriate that Jessica, as a feminist, will care what I think.

Jessica Valenti titled her article “Blame a Feminist: The Top Tragedies Feminism Has Wrought” but she failed to mention herself as one of those travesties.

Breaking Bad

Clayton Craddock · 22 September 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Spoiler Alert: I will be revealing a major portion of Breaking Bad's final season. If you have not seen it or plan on seeing it, stop reading here and click on other links. For those who have seen the show, I have a little commentary on the episode called "Ozymandias."

In one of the final scenes of this episode, Walt realizes that he was cornered and his capture was imminent. Walt's wife and son turn on him after a terrifying knife fight. With the knife in hand, he stands up and yells, "What the hell is wrong with you…we're a family!! At this point in the series, Walt realizes that everything he had been working on is lost. Walt picks up their 18 month of toddler Holly out of her crib in a fit of rage, walks out the front door, puts her on his lap in the front seat of his truck and drives off recklessly.

Later, Walt feels ashamed after the kidnapping when the toddler asked for her mother while he was changing her in a bathroom. Walt calls back to the house. During the conversation, Skyler says, "You took my child." Walt responds with, "Because you need to learn!" Skyer shouts, "You bring her back!" The last we see of Holly is the toddler in a car seat at a fire station. At this point, we know the child will be safe.

If you saw the scene, how did it make you feel when you saw Walter kidnap Holly? Were you shocked? Were you enraged? I'm positive that the mothers who watched this scene felt strongly about what they saw.

The feelings of despair we saw in Skyler as she was crying helplessly on her knees as the truck turned the corner is similar to the range of emotions many men feel after a visit to family court. Fathers usually have a profound feeling of loss after so much is taken from them due to outdated laws that govern domestic relations. One day we could be in charge of our surroundings and family, the next, the state has power over the father and all of his assets…and children. It is quite fitting that the title of the episode is called Ozymandia because it is a poem about loss. The mighty king has literally fallen, and so has everything he accomplished.

The knife scene is one of the most intense ones I can remember in the entire five seasons. I don't want to get too deep into the plot of the show and its deeper meaning. Other people write about this show on a daily basis much better than I ever will, but I do feel a few things from this episode really stood out.

When Skyler tells Walt he took HER child, I wondered how amnesia took hold of her brain cells. She suddenly forgot the little fact that Walt helped with the creation of this little human being. Many women seem to feel that a child is theirs when things fall apart in a relationship. The father of their children suddenly vanishes from the entire creation process, especially when they plead their case in court for custody.

The other thing that plucked a nerve was the fact that Holly was used as a pawn. This time however, it was the father who took the child. I thought it was an interesting twist on the tale of the mother "taking" the kids away from the father. What are people really thinking when they use children a pawns?

Here is a little fact that many people probably don't know. A spouse can take their child anywhere at any time for any reason. I found out the hard way during my divorce. I came home from work one evening to our apartment with no future ex and no children after an intense fight. No, it wasn't nearly as intense as the one I described above. My ex-wife took our children to her mother's house in Philadelphia from our home in New York City. There was very little I could do except go retrieve them, or file for a writ of habeas corpus. I chose to wait until our court date two weeks later. But, the range of emotions I felt after I realized my wife took our children away from our home, and the helplessness I felt, was similar to what I saw on Skyler's face on Breaking Bad.

My ex did not fare too well after the supreme court judge in our case realized what she had done. The judge was visibly angry and put the hammer down on her lawyer. She used our kids as pawns in a futile attempt to manipulate the outcome, but I saw the long term goal and won the chess match. Our kids are better off because of it because I am a major part of their life.

Did you notice how I used the word OUR children in the preceding paragraphs? I had to remind my ex of this fact during the entire time we were in court. They were never her children, and never will be. This is one of the reasons we have joint custody and I pay her nothing in child support and alimony. I remind her every day that these are our children and we will share them. It seems that many parents get extremely possessive during custody battles and lose all sense of reality.

I know from several stories I have heard over the years of mothers taking children away from fathers. As we all know, our family court system is still biased in favor of mothers. It seems that we still have an uphill battle when it comes to custody issues but fortunately, the tide is turning.

Watching a father doing the kidnapping and hostage taking of a child was pretty remarkable, especially on a show as popular as Breaking Bad. I hope more people felt Skylar's pain as they watched this show. Perspective taking requires humans to exit their self-centeredness and egocentricity to see the real world from another's vantage point. What I liked about the fight scene was that I know it caused many mothers to gasp once they saw Walt run out the door. In the heat of a battle, our emotions tend to get the best of us. It is clearly not wise to make major decisions in this mindset.

The decision Walt made in that moment had potential long-term consequences. Fortunately, he realized his mistake as soon as Holly asked for her mother. Most people never see the mistake they make until it is too late. The long lasting effects of rash decisions in family court rear its ugly head every day. The evidence is the epidemic of widespread fatherless homes in our country.

It's true that when it comes to custody and divorce, some people are clearly pathologically narcissistic. At times, there is little one can do but to hope an adversary comes to their senses or a judge on a higher level than family court sees the truth. Some people are just not compassionate and there is little that can be done to change their mind. But the truth is this; fathers love their families just as much as mothers do. We do not want to be manipulated and have our children used as pawns.

Breaking Bad is arguably one of the greatest TV shows ever made. There are many details that are discussed about this phenomenal show on a daily basis. Writing a scene where a father kidnaps his own child to use her as a pawn was one detail many followers might have overlooked, especially since the exact opposite that occurs every single day.

Random encounters in the sea of pain

I remember the first email I got about men's issues. It was a man pouring out his story of grief as he told me how he came home one day to find his wife of 7 years or so to have left with most of the family possessions and leaving a note telling him that she was gone and never coming back and oh, by the way, the child he had spent years raising was another man's child and not his own.

This had been a private response to a public message I had posted in something called the SFRT group on the old GEnie network, where a bunch of people had been talking about the "backlash against feminism" and women's oppression, and I had tried to speak about men's issues, only to face scorn and derision and deep contempt for having the audacity to question anything regarding women's behavior.

That was, what, 25 years ago? I count it as the moment of my awakening that there was a very serious problem. I'd had arguments with feminists and others in the past about various issues, but it was all intellectual. I thought there was just some mild cognitive dissonance that we could fix by reasoning with people and making a few adjustments. But it was here I think that I realized that men were afraid to speak. I was being bullied by a bunch of men and women in public for daring to suggest that I believed in equality but that what some feminists were saying wasn't fair or right at all. I was kicked around just for saying "I support feminism, BUT." They hated me just for that. Meanwhile, another guy felt so afraid to speak up he had to write me privately about it–me, a stranger, someone I'd never heard from before and haven't heard from since. Afraid to speak in public of the way he was raped psychologically and financially, because he knew he'd only get abuse if he talked about it.

Since then, in decades of writing and activism online and off I have heard so many stories. Most recently I had a friend tell me he was thinking about breaking it off with his girlfriend because they were arguing a lot and he thought she was taking advantage of him and his generosity in giving her a place to stay and not demanding she pay her fair share of the bills. I told him "don't let that girl get herself pregnant." He looked at me like I'd said something shocking and ugly. He said she wouldn't do that. I told him not only could she do that, but many women do, and he could even wind up losing his house and in debtor's prison if he didn't watch his back, and that she would have 100% of the power in the relationship if that happened. He told me that was a "myth."

When she turned up pregnant, he claimed it was his fault since he should have worn a condom (never mind that those aren't reliable and he won't hold her accountable for lying about taking her birth control pills). Anyway, he thinks it's going to work out OK between them. I hope they do, but I know he has only a glimmer of what can happen if it doesn't: not just a broken heart and possible loss of a child he already loves, but loss of his house and possibly even jail await. He doesn't believe me. Not yet anyway.

Another friend of mine has been in a crippling depression because some years ago his wife declared herself a lesbian. He'd decided it was a "phase" and eventually she would get over it and come back to him. And what do you know? She did come back. For a few years. Until he found the texts on her phone recently telling her girlfriend she hated having sex with him and found him disgusting and was only staying with him because she needed his money. He tells me no one can possibly understand, nobody's ever experienced something so cold and hateful and awful.

To be honest, I can only listen with half an ear.

I've got another friend who even now struggles to get by every week and who uses various ways of hiding his ID in case the police find him; he owes back child support to an ex- who also got pregnant as a way to keep him; she'd lied and said she was on birth control after he said he wanted out and was leaving her. He's a father now of a child he loves but never wanted, and she wants him in jail for not giving her enough money. Mind you, I didn't say some money: he's always given her whatever he could, but she wants more and wants him in jail for not coughing it up on-demand, never mind that he's in a profession where work is sporadic and where no minimum-wage job will supply him enough to pay her what she wants let alone support himself. He has to keep his car in someone else's name and run furtively afraid of being pulled over by the police as he runs around trying to find various temp jobs just to pay off her and Friend of the Court.

I've got a fourth friend who got lucky. His violent and abusive ex-wife abandoned him and his child. She used to beat and abuse them both. He's physically handicapped and has to scramble just to keep him and his daughter's noses above water financially, and lives in constant terror that his ex- will show back up and try to take his daughter. He refuses to even read AVfM, says he thinks feminism is what we need more of, and anyway, we should stop being rude about all this stuff.

These last four are just guys I know. None of them are very interested in the Men's Human Rights Movement. They think their situations are rare, or unique, and anyway, we should never be loud rude or abrasive about any of this. It's hard not on occasion not to grab them and shake them until their teeth rattle.

It must be that I'm just massively unlucky to know so many guys in these situations, right? I got a fifth friend who was raped by envelopment as a teenager–it's how he lost his virginity. No one he knew thought there was anything wrong with that. They told him he "got lucky." They laughed at his discomfort. He's been nervous about women and sex his whole life since then.

But none of these stories could be commonplace, could they? Anyway, most of these guys must have been asking for it in some way or another, right?

I've got other stories I won't even tell you from my personal life. But I think I've made my point. What about outside my personal life?

Now that I'm open and out as a member of the movement, damn never every day I hear from someone. I'll get a YouTube message from a guy showing me video of how his ex-girlfriend is not only slapping him around when he's nearby, but in the habit of holding their infant child like a shield while she does it. If he defends himself he might hurt the kid and either way would go to jail. I tell him this and tell him he and his child's only hope is to document and get the hell out of there. He doesn't want to hear it, he wants me to magically fix it somehow.

Just in my recent inbox, I've gotten a few emails like the below (names and emails removed):

> Message: My name is , I am in the US airforce and am an A1C. I have been accused of rape by a military female because after a one night stand I blew her off and refused to date her. Now she is saying she was too drunk to consent (she is underage and her intoxication level was low to moderate, no where near incapacitated). The stress of this thing and the fact that my mom and brother are victims of rape pushed me to the edge, my friend pulled me back but now im scared ill get to the line again and no one will pick up the phone…
> I dont have faith in the military justice system and im scared the decision on me will be made political because of the DoD's push on sexual assault.
> im scared and not sure what to do with the stress. I have no one to talk to and im alone.

And another:

> Is there any place that I can go to, to help my son out. We had all the proof that he did not rape the girl, but the Judge and DA had him crucified before he was even sentenced. He got 3 1/2 yrs for the girl lying.

And another, a long one:

> I am a father currently residing in Australia since 2005. I came over here to marry a Australian women who I thought was a decent person.
> I came over here on a visitors visa, but was assured by the now wife all would be right. She will help sort it out later. Well, a few months passed and I sought to get my paperwork in order. I filled out all the forms and hers, got statutory declarations and much more to help. Still, the wife made excuses when all she merely had to do was sign it. Then around a year into being here, she started to be abusive. It started off me thinking it was just in my head. Women do not abuse people I thought to myself. I was wrong. She refuse to have a joint account to allow me to use what funds we had. She refuse to allow any bills in my name or let me be apart of the balancing of what funds she made. The wife refuse to allow me any say in anything. If I was allowed the off chance to use her debt card I would be required to give a receipt. The wife would knowing she held the power to keep me here legally by signing, would mock and belittle me for not working. Would call me lazy and worthless when she had the power to change that. I was made to clean and do chores which I did as I felt bad for not being allowed to work so I had to do my part. Well, even when I did chores I would be told I did it wrong or mocked for the chores I did not do.

After a year and about six months or so I had plans on just leaving as she clearly was insane. She drink like 8-10 beers a night mind you the whole time and still does if not more. Complete drunk. Until she told me she was pregeant with our child in 2007. My fate was sealed. I was determined to stay to make sure our child was raised by one decent parent. I do not drink, smoke, do drugs or anything else. I am pretty boring. I served around nearly 10 years in the Armed Forces. I assumed things would get better now she was near due to give birth. I was so wrong, they got worse. Around 3 months before she was due I moved to the couch because I woke up a few nights like a MAC truck just hit me. The wife had attacked me in my sleep. I thought ok, female hormone issues or whatever….fine. I moved to the couch to assume to give her room.

The couch was my place to sleep until she left with the child on Nov 9th 2012. When the child was born the wife stayed off work for a month or so but was back to work. Raising the child fell on me. I was the one that was 99% of the time getting up at night feeding and changing him. I was the one who feed him and bathed him. I was the one who taught him to talk (first words were daddy), to walk, to read, to write and much more. Our child took walks everyday around the blocks and/or to the parks. We went to the local library to get books and dvds. We would go fishing and I would be the one who raised him totally. The wife would spend her nights after work sitting outside in the patio drinking and smoking until midnight, eat and then go to bed. On weekends she would go to friends or family to drink or do activites without the child and I.

I was never allowed to have any car in my name or money without asking her permission. When her mother pasted away and left her money the wife spent most of it on herself to events like renting a house boat, going deep sea fishing, going to football games and more. All the time the child and I was left at home. In this time my wife was spending this extra money she was also cheating on me with a coworker who lived in Ballarat, Victoria. In that time she made trips to that town which was around 5 hours drive away each or every other weekend that year.

Her abuse also increased as she was openly attacking me on the couch at night while I tried to sleep when she alllowed it. Keep in mind that our child loved sleeping near me even after three years old when he had his own bed. He would always find his way to my side at night. Even when I would go to lengths to put him back in bed. The wife would attack me in front of the child, she has even threaten to kill herself and cut my throat as a slept. All in front of our child. She would mock and belittle me in front of him. I even records alot of this as well. I tried to inform her mother before she pasted away, who in turn had no answer for me. I tried to get help from a online call in called PANDA who took my report but could only offer useless information. If I was a women there was plenty of services, but since I was a man Victoria offers no help for targets of DV and family violence. I was left alone. Her family and friends would not listen, no one would listen to my cry for help.

Then around Sept 2012 the wife quit her job with no mention of what we would do for money. I had no idea if she spent what her mother left her either. On November 9th 2012 around 9am she starting putting a few items in the car and said she was going to her sisters in Melbourne to see her and bring her mothers ashes to be released for December. I told her I felt she was lying as that was a full month away to be going early was suspect to me. I was assured over and over as she packed the child in the car…she was only going to be gone for 3-4 days. That was the last time I was his father. From then on I became non-important. I was forced to > miss Christmas eve/day with our son, his 5th birthday 2 days later. News Year eve/day and even his 1st day of school which I was not allowed to decide on. I am never allowed to decide anything. After 2 months I was tossed on the street to fend for myself in a foreign land where after 8 years I was unlawful to be in. I had to beg for shelter any place I could get. I had to beg for food to the point I was starved out and lost 30-40 lbs. Meanwhile my wife had the child free and clear simply by driving off with him and withholding him for months at her boyfriends.

> The courts simply do not care what she has done or still does. I am graced with 1 call a night at the mothers whim. I am only allowed 8 hours a month that the child lawyer who I thought was independent decided 8 hours a month was enough time for one parent. They only make orders that benefit the mother at all times. They make orders for me even though they know I am forced poverty, no house, no car, no job. They do not care she is the one who tossed me into a spiral of pure hell.
> Keep in mind the Department of immigration and Citizenship are also on me with trying to decide if they will toss me out of this country even though I was the one who pleaded for the wife for years to sign, I am the one being pursued. I have pleaded to the Minister for help but had 3 in the last 6 months come and go. My heart cannot take anymore of this. My son deserves me back in his life and not merely 8 hours a month. My son is slowly breaking away from me from this women who from the day she decided he was only hers….is now bent on destroying what relationship we have left. She allows her boyfriend to abuse me on the phone with the child. She is allowed to keep both cars. She is allowed to withhold information in her court case which I filed for parenting orders. She does as she pleases and has disregarded me as a parent. I am sure you get alot of pleads but you have to take my story, my son cannot speak out for himself he is 5 years old. No one will listen to me and I cannot take much more of this nonstop abuse. Please get back with me if this can be brought to the US attention as my child is a American as well. He is a dual citizen and deserves all the rights and liberities as our founders fought so hard for. Please for the love of my son, please help me or give me some advice.

Practically every day, something like this comes my way. I get messages from people telling me they know a guy who's suicidal and they want my help. They've been thrown out of their homes and lost their children and are sleeping on a friend's sofa. They or someone they care about has been falsly accused. And they all want to know what I can do to help.

You have no idea how much some days I want to cut my ties with AVfM, cut my ties with the movement, change my name, and go back to playing video games just so I can squelch the cries of pain and anguish that are part of my everyday existence. Or how much I want to tell my Blue Pill friends to shut up and just take their fucking because they think they're unique and there can be no widespread systemic problem against men and boys, or that being nice and using calm reason will fix all this.

Or that feminism will fix it.

Or that "if this country would just get back to traditional values" that would fix it. Yeah, because getting back to "traditional values," whatever those are, will get that kid out of jail or that child his father back or that female sex predator put in jail.

Or Jessica Valenti and Amanda Marcotte will fix it for us, if we just let them.

And you know what I also get? Letters like this:

> I'm interested in becoming a financial sponsor of the MHRM.
> I have considered making Paypal donations, however, I would rather provide finance towards specific projects, as opposed to general donations to AVFM.

Do people not get that there is a society wide, culture-wide, systemic problem? Do they not understand that raising awareness and changing the culture are a necessary part of getting anything changed? No, apparently they do not.

And they even think that if we fix their personal issue but no one else's, why somehow that will change the world.

What do I say to the people who are genuinely suffering in pain and want help? I can send them kind words, but have to give them the bitter news that there are almost no resources to help them. Maybe join our AVfM forum and seek some emotional support and advice there. But what else? Can I give a list of decent attorneys? I don't have any, and in my years of experience what I've seen is 99 out of 100 attorneys are useless on these matters, some outright harmful. And if you can't afford an attorney in the first place? Get ready for to get fucked over good and hard, with the solace that maybe you'll be better off than the person who had the attorney, since the person who had the attorney probably got financially raped by the attorney and still got raped by the system and society, whereas without the attorney you may only get raped by society and the system.

The only thing I know that will help is changing society. It's the only thing I know to do, and it's the only thing I know how to do: raise awareness, shock people into recognition of the problem, make them aware of what's going on, make them demand change, pick individual politicians to go after for those who've got the ability to help us identify those politicians and give us the resources to do it–and to, for God's sake, get everyone to start giving a damn about men and boys as if they are human beings worthy of our help our sympathy and compassion.

Here's the rude thing I so often want to say to these people: "You should have listened all these years instead of blowing us off."

But here's what I try to say: I can't fix it by myself. But you can help. The solution is changing people's minds, changing their attitudes, and forcing the general society at large to acknowledge the issues. There is an absolute sea of pain and injustice and horror out there, and if more people aren't made aware of it, and more people don't have the guts to step forward and say something, if more politicians and community leaders and members of the mainstream media aren't made aware, forced to be aware, and forced to respond, nothing in the long run can or will change for you or anyone else. So you can either make yourself into a weapon, and join the fight, or, you can sit quietly and take your fucking, because I have no magic solution for you. I put in 60-100 hours a week on this, giving up substantial income I could be making doing something else, because I give a damn about people like you and your problems. But I am one man. So when are you going to start giving a damn about other people in your shoes, and do something about it yourself?"

We're having a fundraising drive. Why? So we can keep doing what we're doing, which is protesting, lobbying politicians for change, pissing of the feminist establishment, pissing off the "conservative" establishment that talks a good game but does nothing but shame men for not "manning up," pissing off judges, pissing off mainstream media, pissing off academics, raising awareness, raising hell. It's what we do here.

Because what we've found in decades of doing this kind of work is that nothing has or ever will get better until we start raising hell.

That's why we work to Fuck the establishment's Shit Up. Because being nice didn't work. Screaming at the top of our lungs has been the only thing to get attention in the popular culture and the mainstream press and in the universities. And we need your voice to add to the scream–and if you can, to help us with your dollars to amplify that scream.

If not us, who? If not now, when?

AVfM Radio · 24 September 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Tonight we have as our guest, Iain Dwyer of CAFÉ. He will be talking about the upcoming Miles Groth event at the University of Toronto on Friday where the subject will be on the need to establish men's issues groups in colleges and universities. We will also discuss the unexpected bill CAFÉ got from the administration of the U of T for event security. We will also be talking about the AVFM rally scheduled for the day after. CAFÉ has been in the center of a firestorm at the U of T for nearly a year now since inviting Dr. Warren Farrell to speak there in November of last year and since then there has been very little let up of feminist backlash.

The show starts at 8PM Central Time.

Pauley Perrette schmoozes the police

Suzanne McCarley · 24 September 2013 · Archived copy · Original

"Schmoozes Police" is a direct quote from Pauley Perrette's handwritten outline for "Star Crazy," a script or screenplay she wanted to develop, based on her own step by step plan of action for a female TV star who would combine her fame with restraining order abuse, and use them as weapons.[1] The supposedly fictional plan laid out in "Star Crazy" is clever, effective and amazingly realistic. No doubt Ms. Perrette knew this, since during her separation from then husband Francis "Coyote" Shivers she threatened to "Star Crazy" him if he divorced her, on at least two occasions. [2] She followed through in a big way, so big she has been living out her script for a decade.

Other phrases from Star Crazy include "Sugar sweet," "Press Darling," and "Goes on TV/gives huge donation to charity," "Stalks (guy)" and "Gets restraining order." There's also "Goes to journalist w/ story," but we covered that one a few months ago.

Pauley Perrette is not stupid; she knows how to use her status, her looks and her charm. Pauley knows that schmoozing the police requires more than merely looking vulnerable and flashing puppy dog eyes at the cops who are working her "case." (Then again it's pretty clear that detectives in the Threat Management Unit are likely in the business of schmoozing, and being schmoozed by, some powerful and profitable "victims" and accusers – and their lawyers of course.) Being a bit of an overachiever though, Ms. Perrette schmoozes the entire law enforcement community. An example of this occurred earlier this month, in the form of a public appearance as Honorary Spokesperson for Cops 4 Causes; she co-hosted the charity's "Heroes Helping Heroes" 9/11 benefit. She schmoozed police and went on TV for a charity. How's that for efficiency?

By all appearances Cops 4 Causes is a good and reputable organization. It was founded in 2005 by a group of peace officers who wanted nothing more than to help people in need; they've been fundraising ever since. There's no reason for such a charity not to ally itself with an extremely popular media darling who stars in TV's most popular crime drama. And look! See how much she loves cops?

[image]

Management at Cops 4 Causes has recently been made aware of the allegations against Perrette and of the complaint filed with the LA County Grand Jury, but this is Hollywood after all, and rumors abound always, so it's still reasonable that they continue their association with her until they have some solid proof that such an association would do them more harm than good.

By all accounts however, it will only be a matter of time before the facts are just too many and too strong, for even Pauley Perrette's most ardent supporters and enablers to ignore. Thanks to her brazen hypocrisy and arrogance, Cops 4 Causes will soon have egg on its face. Very public egg, not something a budding young charity can easily afford. Ms. Perrette's actions this past decade or so, specifically her misuse of the criminal justice system, have made a mockery of these very people – decent caring cops. The investigation leading to the recent Grand Jury complaint found evidence indicating that she has been using corrupt cops to assist her in a criminal campaign of harassment and intimidation, against Mr. Shivers. Is it any wonder she loves cops? It seems they make such fine dupes.

To heap hypocrisy onto hypocrisy, Perrette co-hosted the 9/11 memorial benefit nine years after making false accusations against a 9/11 survivor! As we have previously reported, Blair Barnette and another witness who videotaped the incident, had served Ms. Perrette with divorce papers in 2004 at LAX Airport, after which Perrette accused her of stalking and assault. Perrette also reported to airport security that Barnette handed her a "mysterious package." Of course video footage proved the accusations to be false. Perrette's blatant disregard for all first responders, and all airport employees and customers; at an international airport, not long after "9/11," making a claim of an unknown person handing her a suspicious package, when tension and fear are extremely high, is testament to her depravity. She would place an entire airport in crisis mode (#I love #FirstResponders indeed) rather than admit that it was her husband who filed for divorce, not her. She went even further and included this event, under oath, in one of her many petitions for a restraining order against Shivers. Blair Barnette, the woman Perrette accused, was at the World Trade Center on September 11, 2001.[3]

So just how does Pauley Perrette "honor" the victims of 9/11? Does she host fundraisers for them, or does she falsely accuse them of crimes? Apparently she does both, according to her immediate needs. One can only hope that Cops 4 Causes will find a way to quietly distance itself from its Honorary Spokesperson, as more and more of her illegal and amoral actions come to light. The last thing a reputable charity needs is to lose credibility in the eyes of its donors.

Another unfortunate patsy within the law enforcement community who has been taken in by Pauley Perrette's squeaky clean "sugar sweet" persona is John Walsh, of America's Most Wanted. As most people know, Walsh himself is not a cop. He has however, done a great service to law enforcement, and his motives are painfully sincere. After his own son's was brutal murder he devoted his life to finding violent offenders and putting them behind bars, via his TV show.

Pauley Perrette has appeared on America's Most Wanted, and Entertainment Tonight "reported" on the relationship between her and Walsh. During one chatty little tête-à-tête segment on ET, John Walsh once said of Perrette, "Cops love this woman."[4] Apparently her enthusiasm for law and order (and her fame and her donations) inspires people to look a little harder for criminals. Or something. During that segment she bragged that she had put up $10,000 each to fund two rewards, for the apprehension of the killers of two little girls. According to Perrette, those girls touched her heart.

There is a "touching" little side story to the appearance on ET, one rife with coincidence. You see, also in that video, Perrete and Walsh discuss the death of Pauley's "personal friend" Lisa Williamson. Perrette had been in Detroit working on an episode of America's Most Wanted, and a few days after she left, Ms. Williamson's house was firebombed. She survived and moved next door to her parents' house, which was promptly firebombed as well. She died in the second bombing. Interestingly, Ms. Perrette wasn't entirely honest in the ET conversation. Lisa was not her friend. Lisa was appalled and disgusted with EX-friend Pauley, and she was in the process of documenting and exposing Perrette's abhorrent criminal behavior toward Mr. Shivers and others. Williamson had already published an online journal and sent numerous emails detailing Perrette's crimes and intentions. She was also set to be the star witness against Perrette, testifying for Shivers in court hearings back in LA. Her death just so happened to save Pauley Perrette a great deal of embarrassment, and possibly a few criminal charges. Yet instead of telling that sordid little tale, Ms. Perrette mentioned gang activity and the general decline in Lisa's neighborhood. Lisa's death, and her letters and journals, are a story for another day, one I look forward to sharing.

But speaking of coincidences,

"Schmoozes police."

"Sugar sweet"

"Press Darling"

"Goes on TV/gives huge donation to charity"

Is that a screenplay or is it Pauley Perrette's "Star Crazy" life?

Agnes McHugh's crusade against chivalry – 1917

Robert St. Estephe–Gonzo Historian–is dedicated to uncovering the forgotten past of marginalizing men. "Gonzo journalism" is characterized as tending "to favor style over fact to achieve accuracy." Yet history – especially "social history" – is written by ideologues who distort and bury facts in order to achieve an agenda. "Gonzo" writing is seen as unorthodox and surprising. Yet, in the 21st century subjectivity, distortion and outright lying in non-fiction writing is the norm. Fraud is the new orthodoxy. Consequently, integrity is the new "transgressive."

(Article 1 of 7) HEADLINE: Women Say Only Woman Can Stop Women Killing Off Their Husbands – With 20 Chicago Women Acquitted of Slaying Husbands or Lovers, Feminine Lawyers Ask for "Justice Instead of Sympathy" of Men.

FULL TEXT:

SAYS MISS M'HUGH:

* Chicago husbands seem to live merely by courtesy of their wives.

* Idle hands are the hands that usually grasp revolvers. The woman who has responsibilities in life does not hold life lightly.

* To protect MANY women, we must punish SOME women.

* Chivalry is inborn in men. The instinct to protect the woman at the bar leads jurymen to forget it is their duty to protect society.

* If woman, the life giver, takes life wantonly, she should be held responsible for her crime.

BY HONOR FANNING.

Chicago, Sept. 26. – That uniquely Chicagoan pastime—the killing of husbands without the paying of penalty—is going to stop. And it is the women themselves who are going to stop it.

Since 1907 twenty women have been acquitted of the charge of murdering their husbands or lovers.

The "affinity murder" is almost as familiar as burglary or bank robbing.

In almost every case the woman at the bar was young and attractive and she came into court with her bowed head crowned with a halo of romance.

Women lawyers now are demanding that a woman prosecute the latest case – that of Mrs. Iva Barnes, accused of shooting her husband, James R. Barnes wealthy business man twice her use.

They have petitioned the state's attorney to appoint Miss Agnes McHugh special prosecutor.

"A man jury will not convict a woman murderer in this county," says Miss McHugh, "if the prosecutor is a man."

"I think this leniency may be traced to the chivalry latent in every man. The jurors see two or three big strong men sitting at the prosecutors' table, and subconsciously feel that these fierce prosecutors are attacking the frail, pretty woman in the prisoner's chair. Their instinct is to defend her."

“Perhaps their pity would not be stirred so profoundly if a woman was in the prosecutor’s chair.”

“I believe the leniency of juries with feminine slayers is responsible for the wave of ‘affinity crimes’ sweeping Chicago.”

“The woman criminal will receive justice only when there’s a woman in court to prosecute her. We demand justice for women — not maudlin sympathy or leniency.”

Here’s the long list of Chicago women acquitted of killing husbands or lovers:

Mrs. DORA M’DONALD, wife of the ate Michael C. McDonald, the gambler, acquitted of murdering Webster Guerin, a young business man.

LUCILE M’LEOD, acquitted of slaying; man while he was asleep.

MISS ESTELLE STOUT, freed charge of killing Henry Hornberger.

MRS. JAKE QUINN, acquitted of killing husband, John M. Quinn.

MRS. RENE B. MORROW, freed of charge o£ slaying her husband, Charles B. Morrow.

MRS. SADIE BLAHA, acquitted of killing Morris Sturm.

MRS. LOUIS VERMILYA, charged with poisoning Policeman Arthur Bissonette, R. T. Smith and others. Jury disagreed. Charges against her dropped. She will not be tried again.

MRS. HARRIET BURNHAM, acquitted of murdering husband, Herbert B. Burnham.

MRS. FLORENCE BERNSTEIN, freed of charge of killing husband.

MRS. LENA MUSSO, acquitted of killing husband, Peter Musso.

MRS. ALICE DAVIS SING, acquitted of murdering her Chinese husband Charlie Sing.

STELLA CZEMEROWSKA, acquitted of the slaying of Frank Kosczynaki, her fiancé.

MRS. AUGUST DIETZ, State’s Attorney Hoyne dismissed charge against her and George Numbers, accused the murder of her husband, because of lack of evidence.

MRS. MARY KOZICKI, found, not guilty of murdering her husband.

MRS. LOUISE VAN KEUREN, tried on charge of murder of her husband, John B. Keuren; acquitted.

MRS. BLANCHE MURPHY, tried for murdering husband, Patrick Murphy, acquitted.

MRS. NELLIE HIGGS, tried for murder of W. AV. Willis, acquitted.

MRS. BELLE BEASLEY, acquitted of murder of her husband, James Bensley.

MAUD OBERG, acquitted of killing Edward Breach.

HELEN KELLOGG, acquitted of killing James Stokes.

(Article 2 of 7) FULL TEXT: Mrs. Iva Barnes broke down today and confessed killing her husband, Jas. R. Barnes, who was found shot to death at her feet in Washington park last night She said she did it because he refused to live with her.

Barnes' suit for divorce was to be heard by Judge Gibbons, today. He filed a bill after returning home late in July and finding Roy Schellheimer, a bartender, in their flat at 356 E. 58th st. with Mrs. Barnes. A few days later he moved to the Hotel Warner. Mrs. Barnes said Schellheimer had tried to attack .her. According to the story told by Mrs. Barnes, she met her husband by appointment last evening and he suggested a stroll in the park to talk over the details of the divorce suit Barnes was 49 years old. He was connected with the New York Dry Goods Co.

(Article 3 of 7) FULL TEXT: Preparations are already being made by attorneys for Mrs. Iva Barnes to put up a stiff court fight in the belief that a woman cannot be convicted of murder in Cook county. Mrs. Barnes shot her husband, Jas. Barnes, four times when she met him in Washington park Tuesday night.

The odd angle is that Mrs. Barnes will use her widow's share of the $40,000 the murdered man left to defend herself against charges of killing him.

The police say she shot him three times after he fell to the ground with a bullet in his spine. She says she shot to save herself; the police think she killed him because he refused to withdraw divorce suit against her.

Barnes sued after he returned home one day to find his wife in the kitchen with a strange man. She said she had invited the man in after he did some work for her and protested, wrongdoing.

(Article 4 of 7) FULL TEXT: Chicago, Sept. 10. – While State's Attorney MacLay Hoyne considered the advisability of appointing a woman prosecutor [Agnes McHugh, who was not in the end appointed] in the case of Mrs. Iva Barnes, indicted for the murder of her husband, Chicago women attorneys rallied today to the support of the accused woman and offered to act as defense attorney.

The fact that a jury composed of Chicago men has failed to convict a woman of murder in many years caused the suggestion of a woman prosecutor.

Miss Florence King, president of the Woman's Association of Commerce and prominent members of the Women's Bar Association, tonight declared that she would gladly assist the defense.

"I will aid the accused woman all I can," she declared. "Women of Chicago are judging and declaring this woman guilty of murder even before she has been held by the grand jury. They are very unfair.

(Article 5 of 7) FULL TEXT: Ray Shelhammer, husky bartender in Righeimer's saloon, on today told about his share in the tragedy of the Barnes family, which wound up with the murder of Barnes and the trial of his wife, now on.

How he met Mrs. Iva Barnes in Washington park as she was sewing, climbed a tree to catch her parrot, which escaped, and then went to the Barnes home to wash up. Shelhamer testified. When he came from the bathroom after washing up. Mrs. Barnes embraced him, he says then Mr. Barnes came in and Shelhammer went out.

Barnes sued for divorce; Mrs. Barnes tried to get him to annul it; she shot, and killed him in Washington park, Sept 15, when he refused to come back to her, according to the claims of the prosecution.

Shelhammer's story stood up well under a hot cross-examination. In answer to questions of the defense he admitted he did not have intimate relations with Mrs. Barnes, but said they were on a bed when Mr. Barnes surprised them.

Capt “Paddy” Lavin of the Hyde Park police station introduced a “confession” signed by Mrs. Barnes on the day after the tragedy. A second paper written on the day following was also brought into the case.

In neither did Mrs. Barnes confess killing her husband. But the act is indicated.

She said that Barnes stuck his hand into his pocket in a manner that frightened her.

An attempt by Ass’t State’s Att’y Barnhart to introduce details of the estate left by Barnes was stopped by Judge Fitch. This was supposed to lead up to a contention that the motive for the alleged slaying was to secure Barnes’ money. He was a well-to-do linen salesman...

(Article 6 of 7) FULL TEXT: Mrs. Iva Barnes took the stand this morning to defend herself against the charge of killing her husband. Jas. R. Barnes, in a broken voice she sketched over her meeting with Barnes, the result of a flirtation in a loop cafe. She was dining with her father Barnes, at a nearby table, smiled. She returned it. He dropped his card on her table as he passed out. She called him up next day. They met at Marshall Fiend’s. Rapid courtship. So they were married.

Adjournment interrupted Mrs. Barnes’ story. Before she took the stand Mrs. H. Ingersoll, her sister, testified to seeing Barnes strike his wife on two occasions. Mrs. Louisa Thompson, a friend, said Barnes very often came home drunk.

Equity without equity: Universities' love-hate relationship with men

Warren Farrell · 25 September 2013 · Archived copy · Original

As our sons and daughters return to campuses, we pay for them to learn about life, and know that for better and worse they will also learn about love. We may fear, though, that the love part is more likely to be by ecstasy and heartbreak than by curriculum—since we can't recall women's studies focusing on the promotion of love.

Has that changed? Since women today are exceeding men at every academic and most emotional levels, has the anti-male anger of women's studies' early years been replaced by a concern for our sons' "failure to launch"? Are men's studies curricula helping us understand what has created that failure to launch? Are gender studies teaching both sexes compassion for the other?

Answers: no. Good causes often create bureaucracies that become more a part of the problem than the solution. As the only male three-time board member of the National Organization for Women in New York City — in the early '70s — I've seen the world change from college-women–as-minority-group to college-women-as-majority-group (57%) even as the universities themselves are still giving scholarships to women as minority groups, and painting males as the "patriarchal oppressor." Two snapshots in time will give us some reference points:

Back Story, 1972:

In the picture below, I am leading a protest in support of the Women's Strike for Equality. One banner barks, "Men's Liberation: Men are More Than Success Objects." (I'm the object under "Objects"– I can't recall anyone accusing us of being success objects!)

[image]

Back Story, 2012:

I am invited to speak at the University of Toronto by the Canadian Association for Equality (CAFE). CAFE is among North America's first attempts to transform the discussion of gender on campus from a monologue into a dialogue. I am speaking on the Boy Crisis.

Or am I?

The Socialist Workers Party (SWP) feminists combine with other feminist groups to rip down hundreds of posters advertising the event—most within hours of posting. The SWP has labeled CAFE an MRA (men's rights activist) group. They label all MRA events as hate speech, creating the rationalization for not a protest, but a blockade of the entrances to my presentation.

Approximately 100 protestors form this human blockade, preventing many students and community members from attending my talk, subjecting those who pursued to endure vicious insults, and, by forcing an hour delay, exhausting the patience of still others.

The protesters alleged police violence. Fortuitously, Steve Brule was filming a documentary. He documented the police restraint and protestor violence—protestors shoving and swearing at police ("you f…ing scum," etc.). Brule's video went viral (a third of a million views). It needs to be seen to emotionally absorb what has emerged on our campuses.

Often protesters have a point—if they are protesting hate speech, while one can argue freedom of speech, we can nevertheless see the hatred in the speech, and empathize with the sentiment of the protest. It's fair, therefore, to see whether there is in fact any hatred — or even insensitivity — in the speech. Here's the boy crisis speech the feminists blockaded–in its entirety: http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=P6w1S8yrFz4

The Atmosphere of Misandry Your Son Faces

That was November, 2012. What's happened in the ensuing months is a veritable documentary of the atmosphere your son faces as he enters a college campus in North America, Australia, and most of Europe.

In the first week or two, he is required to attend a program on date rape, but nothing on date communication; by October, he encounters Breast Cancer Awareness Month, but never hears of a "prostate cancer awareness month." If your son becomes involved in student governance, he has access to significant student funds for women's centers and speakers on women's issues, but no student money for men's centers or speakers on men's issues.

If your son is heterosexual, he may soon express an interest in a woman who is taking a women's studies course or degree, and see her assiduously researching papers on how the patriarchy consists of men who made laws to benefit men at the expense of women — but for him, there are no men's studies courses, programs or degrees. He may learn she is on a scholarship to encourage women in engineering, math or the other STEM professions; if he's observant, he'll note that despite few men majoring in the social sciences, he hasn't run across even a single man with a scholarship designed to encourage men to enter social work, psychology or the other social sciences.

Your son will soon meet many women who will be working on papers and theses on women's special interests (e.g., women's suffrage), but virtually none on men's special interests (the boy crisis; fathering; custody rights). If your son is a good guy, he'll review their papers on women's problems (e.g., domestic violence against women), but probably never see a paper on men's problems (e.g., suicide; life expectancy; disposability; "mancessions"; domestic violence against men; false accusations; being psychologically adrift).

Cumulatively, this creates an atmosphere of prejudice against men, recently known as misandry. Devoid of this misandry, none of the following events could have developed following the feminist blockade…

The Official Canadian Castration of Men's Issues

The Canadian Federation of Students (CFS) is the largest student organization in Canada, and the national coordinating body that oversees most of the Canadian student unions. There is no U.S. equivalent. In 2013, the CFS passed a resolution that prohibited either men's issues or men's rights groups or clubs on their affiliated Canadian campuses.

The real-life consequences? First, this Fall, your son or daughter is unlikely to even discover the option of these clubs—and therefore their ideas–because they will not be able to recruit students by setting up a recruiting table on campus. (Such clubs exist in only one major U.S. university—Montana State at Bozeman.) Second, if he or she does find one, it is likely to be ineffective because it cannot receive student activities fees to help fund its activities; and third, their club would receive no support in the promotion of its activities (e.g., creating posters). The cumulative effect? Your son would experience the group's lack of legitimacy. Especially in your son or daughter's first year, lack of legitimacy can be a potent force.

Suppose, though, you have a daughter who is a maverick and she wishes to start a club that incorporates a compassion for men. Sarah Santhosh and a womanfriend, Anjana Rao, appear to fit that bill: they applied to start a student group–the Ryerson Association for Equality–at Ryerson University, a large career-oriented university in Toronto. In their application, they mentioned their group would reflect sensitivity to men's — as well as women's — issues.

Response? The Ryerson Student Union's Board of Directors immediately convened and passed a pre-emptive resolution that any group examining gender that was inclusive of "the concept of misandry" would be considered "negating the need to centre women's voices in the struggle for gender equity"…and therefore prohibited from the campus.

Translation? Yes, women's voices must be heard above all –except for those women's voices concerned about sexism against men; those women's voices must be silenced. The point wasn't missed on Sarah Santhosh: "The ironic thing is my voice is being silenced."

Was this Ryerson Student Union Board's resolution the idea of some student—perhaps a radical feminist? No. The primary advocate was Marwa Hamad, a faculty member. Her position at Ryerson? The Vice-President of Equity. Did the Board, at least, allow for a debate? There was no debate, no discussion, and no dispute. The resolution passed unanimously. All this took place with no input from Sarah and Anjana, the applicants. It pre-empted Sarah and Anjana's scheduled meeting with the Student Groups Committee.

This made me ponder. In that 1972 "success object" picture, we were a bunch of hippies marching in the street in the hopes of a gender equality that would benefit both sexes—what I called a "gender transition movement" that would free us from the rigid "success object"-type roles of the past, allowing more flexible roles for our futures.

From "day one" the leading universities' women's studies' departments had skipped right past that—and into Marxist feminism with its paradigm of males-as-oppressor/females-as-oppressed. Over the past thirty years that model expanded from the politically correct gender framework at the leading universities, whose professors are typically more radical, into more vocationally oriented universities such as Ryerson, who in the past were barely affected by Marxist-type feminism.

Most recently, though, what Ryerson represents is the expansion of radical feminism from professor-approved to institution-approved. Thus a Ryerson radical feminist as a Vice President of the University—representing, ironically, Equity. And, like syrup in the institutional pancake, once the syrup had soaked in, it could not be removed without the institution being bent out of shape. In this case, by silencing women in the name of giving voice to women. All of this is taxpayer supported.

The Response of the University of Toronto

In the Spring of 2013, the Canadian Association for Equality invited a women's studies professor who favored a more male-positive approach to women's studies. The feminist groups interrupted her presentation by setting off a fire alarm. Take a listen…

http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=OFy0HMxsn4I

The University of Toronto Student Union responded to the cumulative stimuli with a "Townhall on Sexism." So far, so good?

First red flag: not a single representative of any group with a male-positive perspective was invited to speak. To the contrary, the only invited speaker, Danielle Sandhu, immediately supported an audience member who said, "we know there are infiltrators…"

Sandhu then challenged any members of an MRA group to identify themselves, saying, "they should just leave, I could point fingers…." Sandhu had sway, not only as the only invited speaker, but as the former president of the University of Toronto Student Union, the event sponsor.

The University of Toronto Men's Issues Awareness Society (UTMIA) had, in fact, sent two representatives, with the understanding that as an open, public, Townhall on Sexism sponsored by the Student Union and paid for by student fees, that they had not only a right to attend, but an obligation.

Sandu's support of the "infiltrators" comment, and her challenge for them to leave or be pointed out, apparently incited audience members, who shouted, "point them out" and "make them uncomfortable."

When the two representatives did not leave, a Vice President of the student union, Guled Arale, described by the UTMIA reps as tall and large, approached the reps, and, the reps report, intimidated them by moving into their personal space and repeatedly asking them to leave. When one rep said he was just trying to listen, he was told this wasn't a dialogue; it was to plan strategies to stop the MRAs, and their presence made the organizers uncomfortable. One rep left immediately. The other rep was informed he really had no option but to leave, and after protesting this was an open student event, he nevertheless abided.

What was this "strategizing" about? A representative of the Ontario Public Interest Research Group (OPIRG) suggested a “militant approach.” Although OPIRG is funded by mandatory student activities fees, the woman suggested “making this campus inhospitable to these people.” How? By finding out “where they live.”

Is the U of T administration in some way disciplining the protestors—for example, by at least charging them for the increased burden of the protests on campus security? To the contrary. The Office of Vice Provost Students just decided to charge the UTMIA—not the protestors–a mandatory pre-emptive security fee of $964 should their events be protested again.

The U of T is not just blaming the victim by fining the victim. It is giving the perpetrator the incentive to continue the protests to defeat the UTMIA by bankruptcy since the UTMIA receives no student activity fees. The administration’s approach is akin to the administration fining the women’s center for an increase in rapes on campus.

What’s the Status of Gender “Equity” on U.S. Campuses?

To update myself on the status of gender “equity” on U.S. campuses, I reached out to activists on both the men’s issues side of the aisle, and to Michael Kimmel, the dominant force on the men’s issues-as-defined-by-feminists side of the aisle.

It’s a rich man-poor man gap. Only the feminist-defined men’s issues are receiving funding of any significance from their university or a foundation. Both Stony Brook University and other foundations will be adding additional funding to a $300,000 start-up grant from the John D. and Catherine T. MacArthur Foundation to establish the first Center for the Study of Men and Masculinities. The center will be headed by Michael Kimmel, a male feminist and a Distinguished Professor of Sociology.

Michael Kimmel’s perspective is indicated by the title of his forthcoming book, Angry White Men. As a sociologist, Michael would, were the context different, doubtless be the first to spot the extraordinary wealth of the feminist machine vs. the virtual homelessness of men who wish to define and redefine themselves without the control of the Marxist feminist prism.

Although Michael himself has some empathy for fathers’ issues, the Center’s advisory board is thus far almost 100% the country’s leading feminists—feminists such Gloria Steinem, Jane Fonda, and Eve Ensler. Perhaps the fame and ubiquity on college campuses of Eve Ensler’s play, The Vagina Monologues, symbolizes the gender monologue on campus. As Guled of the U of T’s Townhall on Sexism made crystal clear to the young man requesting a dialogue, “It’s not a dialogue.” It is, precisely, a vagina monologue.

How are men’s issues as defined by feminists different from men’s issues as defined by other men (e.g., suicide, and the other issues mentioned above)? Feminist-defined men’s issues require acknowledging patriarchy and the power bias it gives men; it encourages men to forfeit their power. Once men are seen as having the power, domestic violence is seen as the expression of male power, leaving women off the hook when they initiate (hence the Violence Against Women Act, but no Violence Against Men Act). Through this feminist prism, it expands the definitions of date rape and heterosexual rape but ignores prison rape; it emphasizes women’s greater contributions to housework and child care, but treats men’s greater contributions to income as male privilege rather than male contribution.

To my knowledge, no person who has taken a non-feminist perspective on these issues has received significant university or foundation funding, or reached Michael’s level of Distinguished Professor in any social science department at any university in the U.S. or world. Neither my contacts nor my emails from readers around the world were able to identify a single men’s studies course—and certainly no program or degree—that was not under feminist control.

There are seven scholarly journals in the field of feminist masculinity studies, and one — a recent one — in the field of men’s studies that is not feminist controlled. That one is New Male Studies. Its editor is Miles Groth, a Wagner College professor who built his reputation on the existential philosophy of Martin Heidegger. The connection between Heidegger and gender studies?: both felt the original truths being sought got lost in the seeking.

Is a Transition from "Men-as-the-Problem" to "Men's Problems" Possible?

If feminism's focus is on "men-as-the-problem" is there a way to make the transition to men's problems?

There's are two potential paths: one financial; the other, legal.

Financial first. Lakeland Community College in Ohio, and Pierce College in Washington State, found that men's problems could get attention if couched as an issue of retention. James Shelley at Lakeland explained that the new Ohio funding formula is based on success rates, including graduation and retention. And since men are more likely to drop out, the issues putting male students at risk might be more widely considered if it meant more money from the state.

Similarly, after Pierce College's Bret Burkholder elicited data from colleges throughout Washington State, and discovered male students about four times as likely to be dismissed as women at all of Washington state's colleges, he got no traction when he presented it as a male problem. It too had to be presented as a retention problem.

Burkholder and Shelley face a problem similar to that faced by people trying to find a cure for AIDS. Only when it was reframed as a disease that could be also contracted by heterosexuals and women was empathy catalyzed and funding materialized.

Learning from this, Burkholder has framed his work less as about men per se, and more, for example, as about veterans, which clears through the patriotism filter; or work with single dads, since the beneficiaries are children.

This approach, while gaining traction, is still slow. As Shelley puts it, "the premise is still, 'Men are the problem," rather than "Men have problems." And this from the man who directs one of only three university men's centers. (The others are at the U of Oregon, and the Houston area Lone Star College-Kingwood, just approved in 2013). And as far as men's rights organizations with college approval, the only one I'm able to identify is the new affiliate of the National Coalition for Men at Montana State University in Bozeman.

The Legal Path

When I completed a tennis match with the man who was at the time the president of Northwestern University, he expressed a fascination with my introduction to him of the foreign land of men's issues. Our subsequent dialogue went like this:

Warren: You could make Northwestern the first university in the world to pioneer a program defining men's issues.

President: Ha. I'd be annihilated by the feminists before I got to first base.

Warren: Is there any way you could create such a program without being annihilated?

President: (Pause) Hmmm, well, actually yes. If the University were sued as being in violation of Title IX by not balancing women's studies with men's studies… then I'd be able to support something in the name of saving the university. I'd be more a hero than a villain.

Empowering women, whether in the workplace, sports, or internally, is a virtue. But demonizing men and undervaluing the family undermines that virtue. Male-female relationships are not about oppressor and oppressed. Men and women have worked together and died together in the family boat that navigated the waters of survival. When either sex unilaterally wins, both sexes lose. The family boat sinks.

We don't need a women's movement demonizing men, nor a men's movement demonizing women. We need a gender transition movement to transition from the rigid roles of the past to more flexible roles for our future

Stu passes the hat

Stu · 25 September 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Well it is that time again. I can hear the sighs from here that came with seeing my name on this article. Yes, it's time for another of Stu's rants about the importance of funding for the MHRM, and more specifically, AVFM.

I haven't been around very much of late, at least not commenting much, like I usually am. I have however kept up with what is happening, and conversed with several MHRAs about recent developments. So I am up with most of what has been happening, and there is no doubt about it, the movement is going forward and a lot of what is happening is due to the activists who are part of, or affiliated with AVFM. There is no doubt in my mind, that the many thousands I have given to AVFM, and associated individuals has been put to good use.

I've had a very hectic and horrid few months since the last fundraiser. I'll tell you all a bit about that in order to give some insight into my feelings about the MHRM, and AVFM, and specifically the importance of the continued growth of both. This includes the growth of funding, without which I'm sure the growth of activism and effectiveness of our movement is not even possible.

The biggest change in my life recently is that I am no longer in a defacto relationship. Fortunately for me, my ex is a strong, independent woman and an anti-feminist. She is also a supporter of the MHRM and AVFM. No lawyers, no courts, not even verbal arguments. A big part of the reason for the split is the increasing feminist innovations to family law, which now strips men of practically all rights in their homes, and to their financial independence and autonomy in favour of giving women ever increasing control over everything in the relationship.

Although my partner would never make use of these draconian laws, I felt increasingly uncomfortable merely being in a position where they applied to me, or could be applied to me. Basically I will not live in a cage, no matter if that cage is left open and unlocked, no matter if the cage is constructed by my partner or by others, like the government.

I also envision that the laws are going to get much worse and that the net will be cast ever wider in order to net more and more phoney victims and phoney perpetrators for the meat grinder that is the bullshit abuse industry. This industry now employees tens of thousands of beneficiaries who rely on abuse farming in order to secure their careers, pensions, enabling the parasitism that defines their lives.

The other reasons involve a change of heart on her side, on some long held future plans which I had worked towards for many years. This was so disappointing to me that it left me feeling very depressed and was basically the nail in the coffin.

Like I said, no lawyers, no courts, no arguments, just an agreement reached on our own and a fair split and clean break. But just because there is no lawyers and courts involved does not mean there is no cost. By the time things were split up, and I brought the house I live in now, the buying costs, and selling costs of the sale of some other assets to put towards this place, and the many repairs and renovations I need to undertake to bring this god forsaken dump up to standard, I would say I'm at least $200K poorer then I was at the last fundraiser.

It's pretty much been one thing after another for me lately, almost like I have been cursed. Numerous unexpected bills and expenses seemed to just keep popping up from nowhere. Then there was the car accident I had during moving house, then realizing that with everything that was going on, I had forgot to renew my insurance, and thus, had to pay for the lot out of my pocket. A few days after moving in here, I got robbed. It's just gone on, one thing after another. I've been haemorrhaging money like you wouldn't believe.

This all sounds like an excuse for why I am not able to donate anything this fundraiser doesn't it? It is not, and I will be haemorrhaging some more money before the fundraiser is over, although, perhaps not as much as I would have liked.

To be sure, there are many things right in front of me that I could spend that money on to make myself more comfortable. The carpet is going threadbare in places, the vinyl tiles have cracks running through them from age, and movement of the floor boards that they no doubt were laid directly on, many years ago. The heating system failed, there are fences that need replacing, the curtains are dog shit, there are roots growing in my sewage pipes, and many other repairs I will have to make. But if everyone was to wait until they had everything they wanted before giving to the movement, there would be no money at all.

Maybe after I upgrade my TV to that 100 inch 3d model, then I can spare some money, or maybe then I'll get that new lounge suite I want and leave it until after that. Then again, there is the home theatre system I could save the money for. How about a lifetime supply of cheese covered wacky fries?

Yes, there is a never ending list of wants that you can spend the money on. But donating is about forgoing stuff you want, to get something else you want. In this case, more activism for men and boys, and more hope that things can be better in the future.

For all those men and women who are writing great articles, making great videos, and partaking in feet on the ground activism, I salute you, and would never ask you to donate your money on top of what you are already doing, although many of you are. What you are doing comes at an opportunity cost in time, effort, etc.., that could see you make more money if that time was spent on activities that generated income.

For all those that do not have the time, skills, talents, or will, to do those things, there is a way you can turn some of whatever you do for a living, into activism for men and boys. It's magic really. It's like turning lead into gold. It doesn't matter if you pick up garbage for a living, or build roads, or work on a production line in a factory. You can turn some of the labor that you do, into A grade activism for men and boys. This is what I do. It doesn't' matter if it's a few bucks, or a few thousand bucks, it all counts, and it all goes towards the activism you see covered on this site. So you don't think you can make a difference because you're just a taxi driver, or a construction worker, and don't have the skills or charisma of people like Paul Elam, Dean Esmay, Karen Straughan, John Hembling, Dianna Davison, or any of the other great activists here at AVFM.

If you think that, you are wrong. Your labor, no matter what it is, can be turned directly into great activism, great articles, and great videos, by supporting those that can do, and are doing those things with whatever you can donate.

There are many thousands of viewers watching judging by the page views for the site. And there has been quite a bit to watch and get excited over recently. The lecture at the U of T next Friday, and the protest at Queens Park next Saturday are just two examples of how the MHRM and AVFM are bringing men's issues into the public spotlight. There is also the documentary that is being produced which promises to be a very positive and informative view of our movement, focusing on AVFM. There is Paul's 20/20 interview which has been recorded and is yet to air. We are attracting more writers, more speakers, and affecting public opinion everywhere as evidenced by the growing opposition that feminists are receiving in response to their MSM articles and various blogs where they sprout man hating rubbish and women as victim propaganda.

I'm asking all of you spectators to do more then watch, and cheer from the sidelines. Be part of the growing movement you are watching. Own a piece of the action. Help make things happen. And then watch though the eyes of someone who has been part of what you are watching. Watch the Toronto footage, knowing that your donations helped send the activists there. Read about the Perrette debacle, knowing that your dollars helped to pay for the investigations that needed to be done to have the information to write about, and bring to public attention.

For my contribution to this fundraiser, I pledge $1,000 dollars, which will be paid before the fundraiser is finished.

Call to action for fathers and families

Michael Sharron · 25 September 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Consider the following fictional Memo sent from the Chief Executive Officer of a major corporation to staff company wide:

Starting today, I will arbitrarily pick 50% of staff at this company (who will just happen to be composed of a majority of women) and those selected will no longer be allowed to have company-provided health insurance.

For those that are no longer allowed to have health insurance, you will be removed from the company staff directory and you will now appear under a subsection called "contributors", even though you are expected to continue to perform at staff levels.

Because you will no longer have health insurance, any illness you contract may place those of us who do have health insurance (staff) at additional risk of contagious illness, and therefore $500 will be deducted from your paycheck to help subsidize our health care premiums.

In addition, contributors may no longer use the company gym, lounge, and other benefits given to staff.

Five months later, because of the lack of health insurance, five contributors go to the CEO and say they cannot work because they are sick. The CEO calls them deadbeats and reminds them that they have to work because the CEO needs to take $500 out of their pay to help make sure staff have access to health insurance and company benefits.

If these contributors still are not able to work, they will be terminated, imprisoned, and their pictures will be posted in the company staff newsletter.

The CEO will use the Staff's children – those poor hungry children of staff – to elicit an emotional response from the public to focus outrage at contributors.

In reading the first scenario above, it should be clear to anyone the unfairness of this system and if this were to happen at any corporation, school, university, or other organization, the federal government and the media would have agents/reporters at their doors and the CEO in court. The contributors of this company would revolt and the company's financial prospects would be dim.

Now let's consider this:

"Starting today, I, as a Judge, will arbitrarily pick 50% of a child's parents (who will just happen to be composed of a majority of men) and those selected will no longer be allowed to have equal access and parentage to their child.

For those that no longer have equal access to your child, you are now called the non-custodial parent even though you are expected to perform at custodial parent levels.

The custodial parent will need financial help in caring for the child you no longer have access to, so $500 will be deducted from your bank account and put into a system that helps cover these expenses for custodial parents.

In addition, non-custodial parents will no longer have access to state medical insurance, educational assistance, job assistance, food assistance, housing assistance, and tax credits offered by the State."

Five months later, five non-custodial parents go to the State and say they can no longer work because they are sick and need help. The State calls them deadbeats and reminds them that they have to work anyway because the State needs to deduct $500 a month from their bank accounts so that custodial parents and their children have access to State benefits.

If the non-custodial parents are still unable to work, they will be imprisoned and their pictures will be published on government supported websites.

It this second scenario, there is no outrage, no closure of the state, no lawsuits, and no federal agents or media reporters coming to your aid.

The State will use custodial parents' children – those poor hungry children of custodial parents – to elicit an emotional response from the public to focus outrage at non-custodial parents.

In scenario one, thousands of groups would come to the aid of the contributors to call out the CEO for his/her divisive policies – policies that actually led to the problem in the first place.

In scenario two, one or two groups would come to the aid of non-custodial parents to call out the State for their divisive policies.

MNI – Misandry in Psychological Research

Tom Golden · 25 September 2013 · Archived copy · Original

The last study we will examine in this series will be the Conformity to Masculine Norms Inventory (CMNI). (Development of the Conformity to Masculine Norms Inventory published in Psychology of Men & Masculinity, Vol 4(1), Jan 2003, 3-25.)7

This inventory purports to measure the conformity or lack of conformity to what it considers the masculine norms for this culture.

The first problem I see in this inventory is that the norms they have chosen as being masculine norms don't seem like norms at all. Here's a list of what this inventory considers masculine norms:

Power Over Women
Violence
Disdain for Homosexuals
Playboy
Winning Emotional Control
Risk-Taking Self-Reliance
Primacy of Work
Pursuit of Status Dominance

It's the first four that I find most off target, Power over Women, Violence, Disdain for Homosexuals, and Playboy. I just can't see them as masculine norms for our culture. These four actually seem more like negative stereotypes which is hardly the sort of thing that will be effective in a professional inventory. My initial reaction was to think this inventory is painting masculinity in a very poor light. These "norms" are clearly negatively charged and not what one would expect. Why would any inventory choose such negatively charged words? Are they claiming these are generic masculine norms?

The study clearly states that it is studying the reaction to the masculine norms of the dominant culture of the US. It says:

The inventory was constructed to assess the extent that an individual male conforms or does not conform to the actions, thoughts, and feelings that reflect masculinity norms in the dominant culture in US society. (page 5 Development of the Conformity to Masculine Norms Inventory)

This sounds very much like they are examining generic norms. The article also states:

Gender norms also operate when people observe what most men or women do in social situations, are told what is acceptable or unacceptable behavior for men or women, and observe how popular men or women act (page 3, Development of the Conformity to Masculine Norms Inventory).

So they are claiming that violence, power over women, disdain for homosexuals and being a playboy are all norms in the US and men are encouraged to act out these behaviors? That seems to be a very outlandish claim given that the norms for men are usually based on the ideas of provide and protect. Many normative messages received by males include things like "never hit a girl" or some other imperative that says the opposite to what this inventory is claiming are cultural masculine norms.

The CMNI is not claiming to study some arcane aspect to masculine norms but instead is stating they are interested in the basic masculine norms as described above. That is pretty straight forward but the researcher throws in another twist and claims that the norms the inventory wants to study are only the norms of white heterosexual middle and upper class males. The reasoning, according to this researcher, is that these white males are the "dominant" group and other males would be affected by this dominant group. So this inventory is not just about male norms for the United States, it is specifically about white heterosexual middle and upper class male norms. Here's the explanation from the article:

> "The construct was chosen because Mahalik (the researcher) posited the gender role norms from the most dominant or powerful group in a society affect the experiences of persons in that group, as well as persons in all other groups. Thus, the expectations of masculinity as constructed by Caucasian, middle- and upper-class heterosexuals should affect members of that group and every other male in U.S. society who is held up to those standards and experiences acceptance or rejection from the majority, in part, based on adherence to the powerful group's masculinity norms." (page 5-6 Development of the Conformity to Masculine Norms Inventory)

This inventory seems to assume that white heterosexual male middle class norms impact the rest of men in our culture. This seems a bit off to me when you look at the sorts of things that young men are looking up to and emulating. It seems to me that hip hop, word choices, language styles, and dress styles, and behaviors of black males are having a greater impact on young men then stuffy middle class and upper class whites. Furthermore, aren't the rates of violent crimes much higher for blacks than whites? Aren't the violent crime rates for lower socioeconomic groups much higher than the middle and upper class? If this is correct why are they ascribing violence as a prominent norms for middle and upper class white males? It doesn't add up.

So this inventory clearly states that it is not attempting to gauge the norms of all men, it is looking to isolate the norms of a very specific group, the white heterosexual middle and upper class males of the US and then labels them in a very negative fashion. This is beginning to remind me of the way white males are isolated on TV as being recipients of bashing and shaming and sidesteps the problem of voicing any sort of negative comments about women, gays, blacks or other minority males.

Let's have a look at the four categories that seem most ill placed in this inventory.

1. Violence

Is violence a masculine norm? I don't think so. In 2008 99.82% of men in the United States were not arrested for a violent crime. That leaves about 0.18% who were. Very far from being a norm. Of the men you know how many are violent? How about your father, brother, nephews or other male relatives, are they violent? Probably not. And if they were, do you look up to their violent behavior? Do they model what you would like to be? Saying violence is a masculine norm in this culture shows a hateful attitude towards men and masculinity. In actuality, violence occurs when the role for men breaks down. Men's roles have traditionally been to provide and protect. Are men sometimes violent while protecting others? Yes. But that is far from lumping all men into a norm of violence. Yes, some men can be violent, but no, violence is not a descriptor of men in general and to imply that violence is a norm for men goes beyond being anti-male and moves into being a hateful attitude toward men and masculinity.

Just imagine that we are creating a scale of norms for women. We know that women commit child abuse more often than men and that women initiate violence in intimate relationships more often than men.4 Knowing this, should we add to our norm scale that women are child and spouse abusers? Or that women are violent? Of course not, and anyone who tried to do this would be laughed at. Only a small percentage of women abuse children or initiate domestic violence. In 2001 243,000 women were labelled child abusers by HHS. Out of the population at the time of about 143 million women that comes out to about .17%. That is about the same percentage abusers per capita as there were males convicted of violent crimes and yet we wouldn't dream of saying child abuse was a norm for women would we? Of course not. So why is it that no one objects when researchers try the same thing on men and even boys? This double standard, I suggest, is a strong indicator of misandry.

Disdain for Gay People

Some men and some women surely have disdain for gay people, but is this even close to being a defining characteristic of masculinity? Again, if this were about women, the offenders would be thought of as witless. The idea that most men have disdain for homosexuals is simply nutty. Implying or outright claiming that this sort of characteristic is representative of a birth group is again misandrist.

Power over Women

The norm of power over women is as perplexing as the previous two. Where is the data showing that most men have a tendency to want power over women or that that behavior is frequent enough to consider it a norm? I could find nothing to support this. This may indeed be the case in a tiny minority not unlike the female child abusers mentioned above, but hardly the frequency to call it normative. There are likely some men who do want power over women, just like there were indeed some men who were violent, but I see no reason to believe that most men do. Making a claim that one birth group wants power over the other birth group seems to be on very shaky ground. It seems to me that this is just another way to shame and stereotype men. Again, there is no evidence to support such a claim.

Playboy

Is playboy a norm for men? It seems like the same problem with this one as with all the others. Yes, some men are interested in continuous and multiple relationships and behave in a way that would be consonant with the playboy role but is that the norm for men? I don't think it is even close.

I wrote to the creator of this inventory, James Mahalik, and asked him about these four "norms" and the reasons for their inclusion in this inventory. He referred me to the journal article being discussed here and claimed the article might explain this for me. I went back and re-read it. I was not surprised to see that the only reference to how these norms may have appeared was a list of articles dating from 1975-1995 that Mahalik claimed were used for his search of the literature. One of those he cited was a book by I. M. Harris written in 1995 and titled "Messages Men Hear: Constructing Masculinities."9 I found this book and discovered that "Playboy" was one of the roles the book mentioned. It was one of four roles under the category of men's ways of loving. The other three in that category were "breadwinner, faithful husband and nurturer." Each of those sounded complimentary as opposed to playboy which seemed more judgmental. As I went through the book I found that the book's author stated that the playboy role was only chosen by 1% of the men surveyed as their dominant role. This leaves us with the obvious question of why would Mahalik choose playboy as a norm when the source he claims to have used to find those norms listed playboy as a very infrequent choice for men? It just didn't add up and it looks very suspicious.

These four "norms" violence, power over women, playboy, and disdain for homosexuality seemed to pass harsh judgment on men and boys and seemed much more like stereotypes than norms. But questions arose in my mind. Was I overreacting? More specifically, had no one done this before? Was naming norms of men as being very negative new or was it a continuation of earlier research? To answer this question I pulled together examples of words that had been used as norms for men during the period of 1974 to 2003 and the CMNI. The chart below offers examples of the terms that have been used to describe masculine norms.

Notice that the norms that were used prior to 1990 seem to be neutral. Examples included competency, level headed, independence, aggressive, forceful, suppressing emotion, willing to take a stand, assertive, and self-contained. All of these could be seen as being close to neutral with some like "level headed" or "self-confident" seeming even a bit complimentary. Someone could have some of any of these qualities, like some aggressiveness, some forcefulness or some assertiveness and depending on the situation would be considered okay. Now think of having some violence. Nope, you can't even have a little bit of that before you are judged harshly. Same thing with power over women, playboy or disdain for homosexuals. A little bit of any of those and you are sunk. These four categories from the CMNI seem quite different from all of those from 1970-1986.

The Shift In Thinking

Why would any academic psychological inventory be willing to place such negative labels on a birth group in this manner? In order to even partially answer that question we will need to momentarily divert our attention away from this inventory and take a quick look at the ideological shift that has occurred since the late 20th century in the academic psychological community.

Prior to the 1980?s the psychological community thought of sex roles in terms of traits. Men and women were seen as different but not seen in terms of one being better or worse then the other. The trait theory was in its heyday and different traits were assigned to each sex. Norms such as strong and aggressive went to the men's column, norms such as nice and nurturing went into the women's column. Very simple and obviously inadequate as a measure of both masculinity and femininity. After the 1980's feminist writings started gaining influence in the academic study of men and masculinity. It's not a big surprise that with this shift men/masculinity started being seen as "the problem." Prior to this time men and masculinity had been seen as a group of traits, now this perception shifted and instead men and "masculinity" starts catching blame for the world's ills. I know that is hard to believe but it is true. Feminism, which had found men to blame through "patriarchy" for many of women's problems now was beginning to become dominant in the discourse about men and masculinity. One of the influential writers in the late 20th century was feminist R W Connell. It was in the mid 1980's that Connell began writing about "hegemonic" masculinity. Connell's book on Masculinities and specifically hegemonic masculinity came out in 1995 and was considered a top resource by academic psychologists on the study of masculinities. Since that time these ideas about hegemonic masculinity have become entrenched into academic psychology. But just what does Connell mean by hegemonic masculinity? According to an article in the Journal of Clinical Psychology in 2005 Connell defines hegemonic masculinity as "the dominant notion of masculinity in a particular context which serves as a standard upon which the "real man" is defined. Connell claims it is built on two legs, one being the domination of women and the other the hierarchy of intermale dominance. It is also shaped to a lesser extent by the stigmatization of homosexuality."

Now in the academic psychology world masculinity through its perceived domination is seen as THE problem. We have gone from an overly simplistic trait view to an even more overly simplistic view of masculinity as being bad, as being responsible, as being the problem. It is amazing to me that so many educated people can take such a misandrist viewpoint. Masculinity is obviously very complex, there are multiple models pushing multiple norms, some violent, some peaceful, some yin and some yang. "Never hit a girl" or "girls first" were surely messages that most boys received loud and clear. But they were among many. It is very complex and to try and boil it down to men being bad seems incredibly simple minded. So many different voices it is preposterous to claim that only one very negative voice defines the masculinity that all other males will follow.

It is worthwhile noting that R W Connell changed sexes from male to female in 2006. He was Robert W Connell and then became Raewyn W Connell. I have heard that Connell went to a professional conference after this change and presented a paper as a woman, Raewyn Connell, without giving any sort of notification to many of his peers of his profound change. I understand there were more than a few dropped jaws at the professional meeting. Yes, what many academic psychologists believe about masculinity was drawn directly from the writing of someone who at best had an ambivalent perception of what it is to be a male. Someone who decided to cease being male. Hard to see this viewpoint as anything near fair and balanced.

Apparently academic psychologists in the U.S. have taken Connell's theories of hegemonic masculinity and siphoned out the negative traits and distilled it down to what they now call "Toxic Masculinity" which is characterized by: ruthless competition, violent domination, inability to express emotions other than anger, unwillingness to admit weakness or dependency, devaluation of women and all feminine attributes in men, and homophobia.

It should be getting more clear about the origin of those four categories of the CMNI. (Violence, Power over women, Disdain for Homosexuality and Playboy) They are the basis to the ideas of hegemonic and/or toxic masculinity. It seems that Mahalik must have liked the idea of hegemonic masculinity and toxic masculinity and liked them so much that he just inserted those into his inventory as norms not because there was any research that backed up those choices, but because they were the foundation of the latest and hottest theory among his peers.

I can personally testify that the ideas of toxic masculinity are alive and well in the American Psychological Association's one place to study men and masculinity, APA's Division 51. It's a hotbed of feminism and attachment to the ideas of toxic masculinity. I was on the mailing list for this group for some time (until I was unceremoniously tossed out) and was continually shocked at the adherence to these ideas. The basic unvarnished theory is that masculinity is the source of our problems and that men need to learn to be more mature which is "code" for men need to act more like women. One of the list members actually wrote a message where he stated just that. Men needed to be more mature like women and the world would immediately improve! This is the primitive feminist lens through which they see the world. They don't even seem the least bit aware of the ideas and psychological theories around mature masculinity. Here is what the mission statement of the APA group that studies men and masculinity says:

> "Acknowledges its historical debt to feminist-inspired scholarship on gender, and commits itself to the support of groups such as women, gays, lesbians and people of color that have been uniquely oppressed by the gender/class/race system."

I don't mind professionals being interested in this or that theory but what I do mind is when that theory becomes a sacred cow which limits open discussion. On the mailing list of Division 51 feminism was that sacred cow. It was highly discouraged to question anything about feminism. It was also not a good idea to make any references to possible biological factors in masculinity, or to consider men worthy of choice and compassion. None of those flew very well. Actually a man, a PhD, was banned from the list for bringing up male victims of domestic violence too many times. Hard to believe but in the wackie wonderland of the feminist Division 51 it is totally true.

During my time on this list I would receive emails from other list members who did not post to the list but wanted me to know that they appreciated my willingness to question the feminist ideas and stand up for boys and men. They all said the same thing. "I wish I could post to the list and support you but I fear for my professional career." They were worried that the bullies on the list, which included a number of very prominent psychologists, would blackball them. This tells the story of this list. It is run by bullies who try and force messages to the list to conform to the feminist standard. Many list members are very aware of their power and simply lay low.

It is of critical importance that every person interested in the MHRM knows that our professional psychological community routinely blames men and boys and expects them to change and be more like women in order for the world to advance. Much of the research being done has this underlying attitude as do the "experts" that are called on by the mainstream media, and also many of those who are doing therapy with men and women. It will take a great effort to expose the misandry that is embedded in their ideas and related practices. The more these ideas can be challenged publicly the better. We need our helping professionals to have concern and love for both sexes, not just one.

Now that we have a better idea of the origins for these four categories let's get back and take a look at more of the ways that misandry underlies this inventory.

The Focus Groups

How had Mahalik come up with these categories? Were variables such as "power over women" and "violence" pulled out of thin air, from the ideas of toxic masculinity, or was there some other rationale behind their selection? Had there been any attempt to choose norms that fit with white heterosexual men of all age across the United States? The article states that the researcher first reviewed the professional literature on masculine norms and then started two focus groups to discuss and refine them.

The groups met for 90 minutes each week for 8 months with the researcher. The curious part of this is that of the nine people in these two focus groups, only 3 were white men! Five of the nine were women. Here is the demographic composition of each focus group: (Group 1) 1 Asian American man, 1 European American man, 2 European American women; (Group 2) 2 European American men, 2 European American women, 1 Haitian Canadian woman.

Notice that men are in the minority and that white men make up only 1/3 of those in these focus groups. Importantly, white men are in the minority even within each focus group. This is odd, to say the least, considering that the overtly claimed goal was to develop norms of European American men. Why include so many women? Why have the group that you want to study be the minority? I started to wonder if the researcher had some pre-conceived ideas that he wanted to propagate. I wondered if having too many men and especially too many white men, after all, might foil his attempt to plant the seeds of his favored ideology? Who knows but it is a gaping question why white males were so underrepresented.

To see the absurdity of having white males be only 1/3rd of the focus group participants let's try an exercise. Imagine that the same researcher is studying African American norms. He puts together focus groups to try and refine these norms. He has 3 African Americans, 4 whites, 1 Korean, and 1 Hispanic. These nine people form two focus groups where the African Americans are in the minority of both groups. It's simple to see how that could be considered racist and intentionally marginalizing African Americans. It's simple to see that groups such as that would be less likely to come up with an accurate representation of norms for African Americans than a group that solely consisted of African Americans might be able to provide. I hope it is also simple to see the misandry of this researcher's using a minority of white males in the focus groups.

It's worth noting that these focus groups included only grad students in counseling psychology. According to an e-mail from Mahalik, moreover, all were in their mid-20s. In a nutshell, the groups lacked diversity in age. Hardly the sort of group one would want to make decisions about the norms for all ages of white American boys and men.

Inventing the CMNI, supposedly an academic enterprise, were young men and women who relied on their own moral and ideological judgments about masculine norms. A better name for the result would be the Conformity to Adolescent Masculine Norms Inventory. Some of the conclusions that it presupposes do make sense when applied to immature and adolescent boys. Middle school boys may exhibit similar sorts of immature behavior. In some ways that is normative for that age group. Perhaps the authors are simply unaware of and have little experience with the mature masculine? We simply don't know that at this point. What we do know is that the inventory, whatever its origin, is misandric.

Mahalik also created an inventory for women, the Conformity to Feminine Norms Inventory. It gives us a way to understand the CMNI more deeply by comparing it to the related CFNI. That is what we will do next.

CFNI Female Conformity to Norms Inventory

When I first saw the CNMI, I was a shocked at the misandric content but wondered if that was merely a millennial shift for the 21st century toward examining the shadowy, unconscious aspects of life. That thought was dashed, though, when I saw the companion inventory for this the CFNI (Conformity to Femininity Norms Inventory), which the same researcher had created. I wondered if this version, for women, would contain similarly negative and judgmental "norms" for them. Would it refer to gossip, relational violence, the queen bee, or the gold digger as norms? What I found was that these norms were almost completely positive, all sugar and spice. Here is a list of them:

nice in relationships
thinness
modesty domestic care for children romantic relationship

investment in appearance.

All of these “norms” are either flattering to women or neutral. There is not a hint of judgment towards women in the naming of these feminine norms. All of them could be manifested robustly without causing harsh judgments. A woman could invest greatly in her appearance and be very concerned about her sexual fidelity or children or her modesty and she would be considered fine and dandy by our culture’s standards. Contrast this with the men’s “norms” such as violence where even a little of that “norm” is a horrible thing that deserves scorn and harsh judgment. I won’t argue if these feminine norms are right or wrong, only that they are distinctly different from the norms for the men and are much more positive and non threatening towards women.

It seemed to me that the researchers were reluctant or even afraid to make any negative claims about traditional feminine norms. Even more interesting was the way in which Mahalik established these norms for women. He created focus groups, as he had done for men, but this time he included students of only one sex, only women. These focus groups had a wider range of ages, moreover, and included middle-age women. The mean age was 32 with a standard deviation of 10 years. This means that most of the group members were likely between 18-46. Indeed, the women were asked to join not two but five focus groups. Several groups included mainly young women. Two included adult women from the community. Unlike the male focus groups, these represented more than the adolescent population. Somehow Mahalik switched gears and only chose women for the focus groups for the CFNI. I wonder what sort of reaction might have come if women were in the minority of each of the five focus groups?

Comparing the CMNI and CFNI

Both inventories used focus groups to refine the norms that would be used. In the masculine version (CMNI) the focus groups included many women. In its counterpart, the feminine version (CFNI), these groups included only women. One would think that if you wanted to get a clear idea of the norms of a group you would want members of the group under study to make those assessments. To create a group deliberately with most members coming from outside the group almost defies explanation. I e-mailed Mahalik about this. He never responded directly to my question.

Focus groups for the CFNI had a greater age range than those for the CMNI. It is easy to assume that the older women would have a markedly different perspective on feminine norms from that of the younger women. The younger men and women in focus groups on masculine norms would be likely to have a very similar perspective: that of an adolescent.

The two inventories contained remarkably different “norms,” with the masculine ones being negative and judgmental and the feminine ones either flattering (despite being, according to feminists, inconvenient) or neutral. Why didn’t the feminine norms include any negative stereotypes, just as the masculine ones did? I found a hint about the reasons behind this from Mahalik in a section of the journal article about the CFNI.

In addition, because the CFNI is intended to measure conformity to traditional norms of femininity in the U.S., we thought it should also relate to women’s development of a feminist identity. In describing women’s feminist identity development, Downing and Roush (1985) proposed a five-stage model in which the first stage, passive acceptance, reflects acceptance of traditional European American, North American, gender roles, beliefs that men are superior to women, and that these roles are advantageous. The second stage, revelation, is in response to a crisis or crises that lead women to question traditional gender roles and to have concomitant feelings of anger toward men. Sometimes women in this stage also feel guilty because of how they may have contributed to their own and other women’s oppression in the past. The third stage, embeddedness-emanation, reflects feelings of connection to other women, cautious interactions with men, and development of a more relativistic frame of life. The fourth stage, synthesis, is when women develop a positive feminist identity and are able to transcend traditional gender roles. (page 425 Conformity to Feminine Norms Inventory)

This quotation is very different from my earlier one about the culpability of white men. The women are described as developing a “feminist identity” and learning that they have been living in a world that oppresses them. This is the first time identity has been connected to social norms and is only found in the CFNI, not in the men’s CMNI. The women are told that men and their traditional roles are what has been holding them back because of the belief that women are inferior. It is clear that the researchers frame women as “good” and in need of space to grow while at the same time framing men as “not good” and needing to change. It is also worth noting that good is now conflated with victim in the CFNI. The assumption is that women are inherently good, and this goodness manifests more robustly when they can transcend the oppression they have suffered at the hands of males. This creates a picture of a good human being who is perpetually victimized by “the way things are.” It is this sort of characterization that allows feminists to paint women as good and also in need of protection and special services. Sadly these two inventories boil down to the creaky dichotomy between good women and evil men. Cartoons, in short, have made their way into academia.

Let’s just look briefly at the norms chosen for women and the norms chosen for men and compare the two: [image]

I am going to avoid comparing these and will leave it to the reader to draw their own conclusions. I will say that the Nursery Rhyme for each seems to describe the contents fairly well. How far have we come since the days of Nursery Rhymes?

It was obvious to me that a part of the misandry of this inventory was in the choice of names for the different categories. But it dawned on me to examine whether the actual questions on the CMNI were connected to the names. The first one I thought of was disdain for homosexuality. I found myself wondering what questions you could ask in a questionnaire such as the CMNI that would allow you to determine if someone truly had disdain for homosexuals. I found the actual questions of the CMNI and guessed at which ones were related to the disdain for homosexuality category. You will see them below:

1. It is important to me that people think I am heterosexual
2. Being thought of as gay is not a bad thing
3. I make sure that people think I am heterosexual
4. I would be furious if someone thought I was gay
5. It would not bother me at all if someone thought I was gay
6. It would be awful if people thought I was gay
7. I like having gay friends
8. I would feel uncomfortable if someone thought I was gay
9. If someone thought I was gay, I would not argue with them about it
10. I try to avoid being perceived as gay

Each of those questions seems to ask about a man’s worry and fear over being seen as gay. Please note that none of them are remotely related to a man’s “disdain” for homosexuals. Disdain is defined as having to do with contempt, scorn, or some might even say hatred. But do those questions in any way evaluate the respondents contempt, scorn or hatred? I would say no, but somehow the researcher seems to ask that series of questions and then label those who answer that they are indeed fearful of being seen as gay that they have disdain for homosexuality. This is ridiculous. Someone can be afraid of tigers and not hate them. They can be afraid of lightning and not hate it. The two are very different and this is one more example of this inventory’s questionable construction. It seems to me that it would be like asking a group of people if they were afraid of bumblebees and then labeling them bumblebee haters if they answered that they were afraid.

Yet another questionable part of this inventory can be seen when we compare the questions of the CMNI with those of the CFNI. If we look at the questions for the Playboy section of the CMNI and compare it to the questions in the Sexual Fidelity portion of the CFNI we find that the two sections have almost identical questions. Here they are:

PLAYBOY – CMNI

1. If I could, I would frequently change sexual partners
2. An emotional bond with a partner is the best part of sex
3. If I could, I would date a lot of different people
4. I would only have sex if I was in a committed relationship
5. I only get romantically involved with one person
6. I would feel good if I had many sexual partners
7. Long term relationships are better than casual sexual encounters
8. Emotional involvement should be avoided when having sex
9. A person shouldn't get tied down to dating just one person
10. I would only be satisfied with sex if there was an emotional bond

SEXUAL FIDELITY – CFNI

1. I would feel extremely ashamed if I had many sexual partners
2. I prefer long-term relationships to casual sexual ones
3. I would feel guilty if I had a one-night stand
4. It is not necessary to be in a committed relationship to have sex
5. I would feel comfortable having casual sex
6. Being in a romantic relationship is important
7. I frequently change sexual partners
8. I would only have sex with the person I love
9. When I have a romantic relationship, I enjoy focusing my energies on it
10. It would be enjoyable to date more than one person at a time
11. I would only have sex if I was in a committed relationship like marriage

Some of the questions are exactly the same and some are simply worded differently but are asking very similar sorts of things. But the titles are very different. Calling one of these categories sexual fidelity and the other playboy seems very suspect. Why not call them both what they are, an assessment of sexual fidelity? Either call them both sexual fidelity or change the female title to something that matches the playboy title. What is a female who has lots of relationships called? Well, a hussy or a slut. Name it sluts and playboys! I bet that would have gone over very big with the feminists but the playboy label doesn't seem to draw much ire does it?

Conclusion

It seems clear that misandry is embedded in this inventory. When I wrote messages on the APA mailing list for men and masculinity that questioned this inventory and pointed out many of the things you have seen in this article I was told that there was no misandry. I think this article clearly shows their claims are indeed false. There is misandry in this inventory and it is clear for all to see. That these professionals were unable to admit to this is yet more proof of the academic psychological community being enablers of females and feminism in the worst sort of way. The problems started as feminist writing and thought started to influence the thinking of psychologists. This resulted in the adoption of feminist thinking about men which then resulted in rigid and misandrist attitudes about men and the resulting misandry we see placed in this inventory. I simply can't see any other explanation for the willingness to lump an entire birth group into such negative categories. If this sort of thing were done to any other group of people, the result would be immediate negative reactions from the groups involved and the press with multiple calls for apologies. However, when it is done to men we hear nothing of the sort. The problem can be likened to an ideological infestation. It is not merely popular culture, which everyone likes to attack, but also elite culture—that of academics, lawyers, politicians, social workers—and psychologists. We need to move to a point where we can see both men and women, masculine and feminine as having positive and negative qualities and learn to value each individual. We have a long way to go. You can help things along by speaking out.

Final Word on This Series

The three research articles that have been discussed in this series have one thing in common. They all rely on an ideological assumption, which the researchers try to bolster and confirm. In the process, they ignore the needs of men and boys by heaping contempt, either implicitly or explicitly, on masculinity, maleness or both. In the first study, on teen dating violence the questionnaires offered convincing data that boys were victims. But the researchers ignored that. Instead, they relied on a preferred ideology, one that assumes the primacy of female victims and therefore (despite the non sequitur) the primacy of their need for more care than male victims (if, so goes the argument, there are any male victims at all). In the second study we examined on reproductive coercion, researchers relied on the ideological belief that women are victims and men perpetrators, and their study showed just that, but they used an impoverished population that in no way generalizes to the population at large. Even though the researchers were aware of this limitation, the press release and articles by journalists ignored this limitation and treated the study as if it were indeed generalized. This was a huge boon for those researchers who wanted to "spread the word" of their chosen ideology. I can hear them saying, "Well, it was not exactly portrayed correctly but, you know, it was for a good cause." In other words, the end justifies the means. Then the third article on the CMNI showed distinct signs of misandry in psychological research. The researcher believes that masculinity, or at least the version of masculinity that he considers prevalent in our society, is to blame for our problems. Consequently, the CMNI becomes a way of promoting an ideology.

The problem is that these researchers are standing science on its head. Real science requires astute and unbiased observers, who are eager to find the truth wherever the search leads them. This stands in stark contrast to ideologically based "studies" that use science as a means to some political end. This is very dangerous, in my opinion, but not enough people are aware of what is happening. Confidence in scholarship must be earned, continually, by scholars themselves. Even my confidence in my own field has declined. Scholars must be vigilant and not allow those who grind political axes to promote their own ideologies in the name of scholarship. But that's not all. Journalists, too, must wake up. In fact, everyone must participate in the renewal of intellectual and moral integrity in academe.

A certain member of AVfM made a promise – if donors to the AVfM fundraiser reached the first $5000 in 72 hours or less, then he would dye his amazing beard a bright, vulgar, Chanty Binx Red for the Rally for Men and Boys in Crisis in Toronto.

You came through…and this man kept his promise.

We’re halfway home in our fall fundraiser – thank you for all your support, and please keep it coming, so that we can keep our agents Green and our beards ruddy.

AVFM News week in review Sept. 18-26th

Robert O'Hara · 26 September 2013 · Archived copy · Original

A very big week for news with upcoming events in Toronto and more pickings from the world wide news media. Special thanks to everyone in the AVFM News Department and AVFM staff for sending some of these my way.

Item: Feminists re-define "Objectivity" on Wikipedia

Previously AVFM News reported a massive effort by university feminists to inculcate into Wikipedia their views and ideology. Their efforts are bearing fruit. Now, according to Wikipedia, objectivity means only what feminists say it means. But only in a round about way, you see, they differentiate between other forms of objectivity and what they call "Strong Objectivity." I guess their next target will be the Weak and Strong forces between subatomic particles. Someone alert the physical science community!

Item: Circumcision campaign in Africa is not reducing the prevalence of HIV AIDS.

Gee, who would have thought that this hateful exercise in male genital mutilation based on critically flawed studies would fail? Go figure.

Item: Article in the Guardian tells male college students how to behave

This includes treating women as human beings (funny how women are not given the same advice about men) and to wear a condom. As if women do not have unprotected sex, get pregnant and spread venereal disease as well.

Oh, and don't forget to "check your privilege" as a male college student.

Item: Father of Sydney boy who died after prolonged abuse says authorities 'failed' his son.

Grandmother of the boy who died at the hands of his mothers partner after being denied custody by the father says: "Hire more people to protect our babies, protect our loved ones, they are always the innocent parties in this world."

Actually, you have this wrong lady. If children would have equal access to their fathers this thing would happen a whole lot less often.

Item: Tennessee: Obamacare will triple men's premiums, double women's

You mean that men will have to pay more for healthcare under Obamacare then women? Whaaa?

Item: Boy suspended from school for playing with toy guns at home

Scenario: Neighbor calls police in a panic to report that a child is playing with a toy gun in his own front yard, police report it to the school then school suspends him and recommends expulsion as well. It just gets better all the time!

Item: RSU among worst in Canada for free speech

The Canadian Centre (darn french Canadian always messes up my spell check) for Constitutional Freedoms rated the Reyerson University Student Union the second worst student union in that country for preventing the establishment of a men's issues group. The University of Toronto Student Union got a big fat "F" as well. Nice to know that there are watchdog groups sticking up for us.

Item: National Parents Organization reports Massachusetts father awarded $40.25 million judgment against former wife

Egyptian mother takes kids back home and denies father visitation while he racks up travel costs and kids are neglected and indoctrinated in radical Islamist ideology. He sues and gets $40,250,000 bucks. Boohlya!

Item: This goes without mentioning but please tune into the live radio show on Saturday for the latest updates on what is happening in Toronto!

Honey Badger Radio: Party in Toronto!

The Canadian Association for Equality is hosting yet another lecture on men's issues at the University of Toronto tomorrow evening. The speaker, Dr Miles Groth, will be talking about why men's centers are needed on university campuses, and highlighting some of the biggest problems young men face in educational attainment. This is gearing up to be a major event, with a rally in Queen's Park for men and boys in crisis on the roster for the following day, sponsored by a number of advocacy organizations, including NCFM, AVFM and CCW.
Planning to attend are Paul Elam, Tom Golden, Dean Esmay, myself (Karen Straughan), Raz (the head of MRE), and even Nick Reading, Edmonton city council candidate and founding member of the Patriarchy Party. A documentary film crew will also be there, to record this historic event, and we hope members of the mainstream media will also be in attendance.

A number of feminists are also expected to… heh… attend the event. It's going to be like one big party

Join Alison, Della and Karen tonight on HBR while we discuss the event and its implications, as well as chat with guest Nick Reading about his upcoming election campaign on the Patriarchal Party ticket as well as his personal philosophy, his political views and his wiener dog.

All of that and more, tonight, on HBR radio.

Live coverage of events in Toronto

Dean Esmay · 26 September 2013 · Archived copy · Original

The city of Toronto is so beautiful, and as I sit here waiting for Paul's plane to arrive, I think, "we should give people a heads-up now." For those of you who can't join us, you should know there will be live coverage on A Voice for Men Radio of both the protests in Toronto on Friday night and of the Rally for Men and Boys in Crisis on Saturday!

There will of course also be a radio show tonight from the Honeybadgers (announcement for that forthcoming), but tomorrow and Saturday you'll want to watch out especially for two shows:

Friday night, James Huff and Lucian Valsan will be taking calls from known activists attending Dr. Groth's lecture at the University of Toronto. In between calls, the hosts will cover news from around the world and discuss events as they unfold on the campus.

We will only be taking calls from known activists during this show.

Tune in and listen to live perspectives on events as they happen.

The show starts at 5PM Central time on Friday – one hour before Dr. Goth's lecture – and will continue for a full three hours.

After that, on Saturday morning, Erin Pizzey, along with James Huff and Mike Buchanan of the UK's Justice for Boys and Men (and the women who love them) Party will be broadcasting about, and with live coverage from, the Men and Boys in Crisis rally in Queen's Park (notice how the Facebook page is under assault from fascist thugs, but the information you need is there).

We expect the show to run a full three hours as we talk about all the issues facing the men and boys in our lives who we love and care about, and the crisis so many are undergoing in Canada, the UK, the United States, Australia, India, and so many other parts of the world. We'll be featuring call-ins from the rally as well as general discussion of events, past and present, as they relate to the anti-male movement and our efforts to fight against it!

I'm already loving Canada and the lovely city of Toronto, Paul will be here within an hour, and I can't wait to meet more of you in the next couple of days. Nothing like this event has ever happened in history, so if you can come, please do, and if you can't, be sure to join us in spirit and listen or call in to the shows as we do our best to provide live coverage and commentary!

This is not just an event for Toronto, or Canada, or even North America. This is for the suffering boys and men of the entire world. I hope to see you there.

August Løvenskiolds · 26 September 2013 · Archived copy · Original

INTRODUCTION

The following are my raw notes (and the notes of others) regarding the anti-MRA event held at the University of Toronto on 9/23/2013. This is not intended to be a coherent article, but rather, a compilation of information for anyone who wishes to review, research, post, and/or comment on this event, which was entitled What's Wrong with the MRA? The Problem of Men's Rights.

In the MHRM, we have a near constant mantra. Always Be Recording. The thinking is that this keeps everyone honest and above board. The event organizers for this meeting had a decidedly different approach. No Recording Allowed. The intent, of course, being deniability of their words and actions. Another one of the many differences between the MHRM and feminists.

So, being the community minded people that we are, we decided to help the good feminists realize the value of transparency and openness.

The first hour of the meeting was organized around several different speakers; the rest of the meet was a Q&A period.

Our Agent Green infiltrated the meeting and captured an audio file of the approx. 2 hour event. I tried to upload the audio file of the meeting (VN810047.mp3) into these notes but it is too big – this website's limit for media uploads 64 MB, and the mp3 is 175 MB. It can be downloaded here:

The first 7 minutes can be skipped – to avoid detection, Agent Green activated his recording device well before entering the meeting.

Event Description/Speaker Bios

from James Huff:

What's Wrong with the MRA? The Problem of Men's Rights Organizing Speakers: Steph Guthrie (Academy of the Impossible), Jeff Perera (White Ribbon Project), Ashleigh Ingle (Graduate Student Union, University of Toronto), Michael Laxer (Rabble) Ontario Institute for Studies in Education, room 2211 252 Bloor Street West

Speaker Bios:

Jeff Perera is a Community Engagement Manager for the White Ribbon Campaign, the world's largest effort to engage men in re-imaging masculinity and help end gender-based violence. Jeff also founded Higher Unlearning, an online space to explore how ideas of gender & masculinity play out in everyday life.

Steph Guthrie is a feminist advocate and community organizer who uses social media and interactive events to spark and sustain conversations about gender justice, labour, politics and education. She is a faculty member and lifelong learner at Academy of the Impossible.

Ashleigh Ingle is a feminist and an anarchist who organizes with working people and students at the University of Toronto and in the community. She is the current chair of the Women and Trans people caucus of the U of T Graduate Students' Union. She participates in grassroots feminist organizing at the University and hopes to see the response to the presence of MRAs to be the creation of a militant feminist movement capable of responding to the manifestations of white supremacy and patriarchy faced by students and workers at the University of Toronto and beyond.

Michael Laxer is blogger for rabble.ca, a two-time former candidate and former election organizer for the NDP, was a socialist candidate for Toronto City Council in 2010 and is on the executive of the newly formed Socialist Party of Ontario.

“God and I are tired of men” – 1956

TIRED OF MEN—"God and I are tired of men taking advantage of women," declared Beatrice Adams, 33, Thursday from her jail cell in New Orleans where she is being held in the auto slaying of Max Jernigan, 39, auto salesman.

Robert St. Estephe–Gonzo Historian–is dedicated to uncovering the forgotten past of marginalizing men. “Gonzo journalism” is characterized as tending “to favor style over fact to achieve accuracy.” Yet history – especially “social history” – is written by ideologues who distort and bury facts in order to achieve an agenda. “Gonzo” writing is seen as unorthodox and surprising. Yet, in the 21st century subjectivity, distortion and outright lying in non-fiction writing is the norm. Fraud is the new orthodoxy. Consequently, integrity is the new “transgressive.”

Welcome to the disruptive world of facts, the world of Gonzo History.

Readers of A Voice for Men are familiar with some of the more notable and articulate present-day adherents to gender ideology of the SCUM Manifesto variety such as Josefin von Zeipel Segerberg, Pamela O’Shaughnessy (“Vliet Tiptree,” pseudonym), Krista Leighanne Milburn (“Krista Jane Heflin” pseudonym). Many people erroneously suppose, however, that the eugenics-inspired, genocidal ideation-styled, violent authoritarian types of feminist utopian philosophy find their source exclusively in ideology. The fact is that the mentality called misandric fixation (see “What is Misandric Fixation?”) need not arise through the influence of ideology or deliberate intellectual cogitation of any sort. Further it can be observed that ideological misandry has existed long before the explosion of radical feminism in the 1960s.

Louisiana-dweller Beatrice P. Adams was up-to-date in the latest 1950s feminist ideas. She had learned from the sisterhood that God was female. That spiritual knowledge came in handy when she set out to publicly murder her ex-boyfriend in the most dramatically brutal manner she could imagine.

Beatrice Adams seems to have been a sort of beatnick “Femitheist Divine” (as Krsya Leighanne Milburn fashions herself in her online persona).

HITS, BACKS UP, HITS AGAIN

Spurned Woman Slays Ex-Lover With Auto

BEATRICE ADAMS
'I Feel No Remorse . . . I'd Do It Again'

FULL TEXT: (Article 1 of 4): New Orleans – A jilted woman crushed her ex-boy friend to death Wednesday beneath the wheels of a car because, she said, "God and I are tired of men taking advantage of women."

Beatrice P. Adams, an attractive 33-year-old stenographer fatally injured Max Jernigan, 43, a 300-pound automobile sales man, and was booked tentatively on charges of attempted murder.

She did the job in the presence of another car salesman who leaped beside the moving car to rip out wires and finally bring the death vehicle to a halt.

"It was the most cold-blooded exhibition I've ever seen," the salesman, Jack Holland," said.

Jernigan died early today from injuries that included fractures of the left leg and both arms and a crushed right leg.

"I feel no remorse over having killed him," Miss Adams said. "I'd do it again. God and I are tired of men taking advantage of women."

Holland, the salesman who ripped the wires to stop the driver, said:

"God knows how many times she ran over Jerrigan. She would hit him, back down the drive into the street and get another running start."

"She would take off up the drive, swerve over to the body and hit it again, I mean run over it. There were tire marks all over the drive, the street, the sidewalk and the ground."

Miss Adams said she had been married once for three weeks to a man whose name she doesn't even know. She said he was a bigamist.

Police learned that Jernigan had had an affair with the stenographer, but that he had broken off with her and had become reconciled with his wife.

TIRED OF MEN—"God and I are tired of men taking advantage of women," declared Beatrice Adams, 33, Thursday from her jail cell in New Orleans where she is being held in the auto slaying of Max Jernigan, 39, auto salesman.

FULL TEXT (Article 2 of 4): New Orleans – Beatrice Adams, the Bible-reading woman who killed her lover by running him down with a car, entered her eighth day of fasting in prison Wednesday.

Dr. E. A. Eigenbrood, prison doctor, said there was no evidence of malnutrition.

Miss Adams, a 35-year-old secretary, has admitted running down Jack Jernigan, 39, May 3. She ran back and forth over his body, screaming:

"Mack, you better ask God to forgive you before you die." She said Jernigan had jilted her to return to his wife. Miss Adams was charged with murder.

FULL TEXT (Article 3 of 4) – New Orleans, La. – A criminal district judge declared Beatrice Adams insane and therefore unable to stand trial for slaying her former lover by repeatedly running her car over his body. Judge J. Bernard Cocke committed the slim, 35-year-old former woman Marine to the East Louisiana mental hospital in Jackson. Miss Adams was charged with killing Mack Jernigan, 29-year-old car dealer, with her automobile on busy Canal St., last May as he stepped from the curb.

She drove the car back and forth over his body, urging him to ask God's forgiveness for having abandoned her after he'd promised to marry her. At the time she told police Jernigan planned to return to his wife.

Dr. Nicholas Chetta, Orleans Parish coroner, testified Miss Adams "has a definite personality degeneration."

"She is a menace not only to society but to herself," the coroner said.

Dr. Chetta described Miss Adams as a Schizoid, a person with a split personality.

Shortly after her arrest. Miss Adams told newsmen and officers "God and I are tired of men taking advantage of women."

EXCERPT from a 1971 article (Article 4 of 4):

"Just pray to God, She will provide"

It appears that Beatrice P. Adams was expressing her resentment against male chauvinism in the only way she felt lay open to her. "I feel no remorse over having killed him," Miss Adams is reported to have said. "I'd do it again. God and I are tired of men taking advantage of women."

Note the partnership. It required only one further step to reach what some leaders of Women's Lib are proclaiming today, that God is female. "Just pray to God, She will provide," the ladies are saying. It is to be hoped that they do not mean She will indiscriminately provide male targets for their automobiles, she allegedly did for Miss Adams.

It may seem extreme to extend the Women's Liberation Movement into the area of homicide, but the record is crowded with relevant examples. A recent one leaps to mind, that of Andy Warhol, artist of the silver hair, blue contact lenses, leather jackets, Campbell Soup can paintings and nudie films. [This article goes on to tell the Valerie Solanas story and others. This article contains the first appearance of the term "homicidal hate-the-man syndrome."]

EPILOGUE: "After treatment, she was found to be sane and was returned to?Orleans Parish Prison in late 1959 to stand trial. On Feb. 24, 1960, the jury found her not guilty by reason of insanity. She was returned to the hospital for about a year before she was again declared sane. This time the judge released her." [The Best of New Orleans]

The Campus False Accuser Support Act

Hannah Wallen · 27 September 2013 · Archived copy · Original

I recently wrote to several federal legislators about issues with the current policy the federal departments of Education and Justice have foisted onto America's post secondary education institutions. This included criticism of the policy pushed by the Education department's "Dear Colleague" letter, and a request that my state's federal legislators work with Senator McCain to get some answers from the Justice department regarding their settlement with the University of Montana-Missoula.

It's been a while, and I've received a reply from Senator Sherrod Brown. It looks like yet another autoreply (that's mostly what I get from Senator Brown,) but it tells you exactly where he stands on the issue.

Ohio voters, take note – men's rights activists will get no help from this senator. He belongs to the feminist lobbyists who advocated for the discriminatory law and policy in the first place.

Senator Brown responded to my concerns regarding the way current policy compromises due process, and creates an environment which encourages false accusations…

Actually, no. He didn't. His office responded, probably in the form of a volunteer. The volunteer also didn't respond to my concerns, but instead to my gender, apparently assuming that because I'm female, my concern would be satisfied by the same sloppy lip service the senator's feminist constituents have been willing to accept.

The letter I received:

> Dear (my actual last name:)
> Thank you for getting in touch with my office regarding sexual harassment on college campuses.
> Today, one of out of five women [sic] will experience sexual violence while attending college. In too many instances, sexual harassment or sexual assault cases are left unreported or the assaulter is exonerated of any charges.
> The Campus Sexual Violence Elimination Act or Campus (SaVE) Act would ensure colleges and universities are doing their part to minimize sexual crimes on campuses. It would require all institutes of higher education participating in a title IV [sic] program, except foreign schools, to include their policies and procedures for > handling sexual assault, domestic violence, dating violence, and stalking in their annual security report. Additionally, the legislation would promote awareness and prevention across campuses by requiring schools to provide transparent information to their student body on programs and assistance related to sexual crimes.

> We have a solemn responsibility to protect young people from harm and to ensure those who are guilty of a sexual crime are held accountable. Should the SaVE Act come before the Senate, I will keep your views in mind.
> Thank you for your advocacy.
> Sincerely,
> Sherrod Brown
> United States Senator

In other words…

Me: Dear Senator Brown, I've noticed some serious problems with certain federal policy. The policy is bad. I see that Senator McCain is doing some investigation. I'd really like to see my state's senators support him in that investigation.

Senator Brown: Dear Mrs Female, Yeah, we're making that policy federal law. Isn't that great?

Having read "Should the SaVE Act come before the Senate," one would think this bill was still under discussion. After all, if it has yet to come before the Senate, then the Senate can't possibly have voted on it yet.

One would turn out to be wrong.

The Bill passed in March, and it takes effect in March of 2014. The reason it slipped by unnoticed is that it wasn't an independent bill. It was part of the Violence Against Women Re-authorization Act.

This is the law:

Campus Sexual Violence Elimination Act text

Campus SaVE act summary

This pretty much goes along with what the Department of Education had tried to mandate using threat of denial of federal funding. The difference is this makes it federal law.

It significantly changes the wording of the Higher Education Act of 1965, adding stipulations requiring colleges to substitute college disciplinary boards for courtrooms in cases of allegations of sexual misconduct. It also mandates both the use of the "preponderance of evidence" standard instead of "beyond a reasonable doubt" as a standard, and that these institutions allow the accuser to appeal a not guilty verdict.

In other words, it reduces the standard of evidence, and allows for double jeopardy.

The law also increases the list of offenses that universities must report among statistics on campus crime.

There is absolutely no good purpose for this design. The only thing this will do is allow accusers the ability to railroad through at school accusations which would not hold up in court due to lack of evidence.

This is a false-accuser support bill, with a built-in stat-counter to assist in the manufacture of evidence for its own support.

Senators Sherrod Brown and Robert Portman will be receiving letters and phone calls from me on this topic, as will the House representative for my area, along with a few other representatives.

I recently wrote to several of you about federal policy related to post secondary education institutions' handling of accusations of sexual misconduct. My letters stated my concern over the way federal policy compromises due process, specifically citing issues with the policy laid out in the Education department's Dear Colleague letter to colleges and universities all over the U.S. I also encouraged everyone I contacted to support Senator John McCain's investigation into the Justice Department's actions toward the University of Montana-Missoula. I had hoped to see some investigation into the obvious abuse of power exercised by that department, but instead it seems that the effort has quietly stalled.

One senator's office responded to my letter, but not to its contents, touting as a solution to my concerns a federal law which further enforces the most troubling policy changes the federal government has tried to push on colleges and universities. The Campus Sexual Violence Elimination Act presents significant danger to anyone seeking higher education. If this law is allowed to take effect, it will apply the following mandates to post-secondary educational institutions

- That there be an investigation and on-campus disciplinary hearing whenever there is an accusation of sexual misconduct.
- That the hearing must be held using a lower standard of evidence for conviction than is used in a court of law, even though heavy penalties with long term effects (such as being kicked out of school and banned from campus) may follow a guilty verdict.
- That accusers be notified of a right to not contact actual law enforcement regarding the accusation.
- That in the event of a not guilty verdict, an accuser can subject the accused to effective double jeopardy by appealing the verdict

This combination provides would-be accusers with a means to bypass law enforcement, bypass the legal system, bypass the laws against bringing false charges and committing perjury, bypass the right of the accused to due process, and use college disciplinary boards as an easier means to secure conviction and potentially seriously life-impacting punishment. This will include false accusers who can get friends to testify, and it will include accusers who can look convincing while bringing a word against word case.

Instead of protecting students from a dangerous environment, this bill will create one. It will place students in jeopardy of having their academic careers and their future employment prospects easily destroyed by false or exaggerated accusations. It will also protect at least some sexual predators from the criminal penalties that they should face.

The first thing to understand about sex crimes and false allegations is that we are never going to eliminate either the incidence of innocent people being penalized, or guilty people escaping the justice system, because sex crime cases can be subjective, lawyers can be sneaky, and mistakes can be made with any case.

What we can do is ensure that the reason innocent people sometimes get penalized is not because they were denied their right to a fair trial, and the reason guilty people sometimes get away is not because their initial conviction didn't have to be based on any real evidence and a deserved conviction was overturned because the initial handling of the case didn't involve a thorough investigation… or because victims were satisfied with the kangaroo court and mock punishment supplied by their school, and decided not to pursue criminal charges.

We have a legal system for a reason. We would not want a law dictating that university curriculum be written by trained chefs, or that restaurant menus be designed by doctors, surgery done by attorneys, criminal cases argued by civil engineers, or city infrastructure designed by interior decorators. Why should we accept a law dictating that legal and law enforcement issues be handled by educational institution administrators? This is not their job. They do what they do because that's where their expertise is. It is ridiculous to cut the police and legal system out of the equation when there is any accusation of sexual abuse. Crimes as serious as the various types of sexual misconduct should be investigated by trained law enforcement officers, and should an investigation lead to charges, those charges should be heard in a court of law.

> Even if we decide that these administrators are so qualified, the procedures laid out in this bill would deny those accused on campuses across the U.S. the right to a fair trial. Instead of having their cases heard before a qualified judge and/or jury, students accused of sexual misconduct will be subjected to investigation and trial by educators, with a reduced standard of evidence, and even if found innocent, they'll face double jeopardy as their accusers will be allowed to appeal the initial decision and force them to go through the experience a second time.
> In addition to increasing the chance that falsely accused students would be found guilty and face penalties, a legitimate victim's choice to substitute a school hearing for a real trial would effectively protect perpetrators of sex crimes from the legal penalties they should face. While having one's academic career wrecked by a false allegation is terrible, getting away with only having one's academic career wrecked following the commission of a rape is equally terrible.
> It leaves the rapist free to rape again.
> This law is a major departure from the constitutional guarantee of due process, and a violation of student rights. It will create on post secondary institutional campuses a legally hostile environment which can interfere with students' focus on their studies, and their ability to obtain their education in peace.
> I strongly urge you take action to prevent the Campus Sexual Violence Elimination Act from taking effect. Do not stand back and allow the attack that this law is; an assault on the U.S. justice system, and the right of citizens to due process when accused of a crime.

Part of that letter is taken from my Breaking the Glasses post, "The Nature of the Allegation."

I'm hoping others will join me in writing to your senators and state reps about this issue, before this law takes effect. I don't mind if people copy mine verbatim, but if you write your own, I'd love to see them posted in the comments section under this post.

You can find your state's senators' contact information here:

You can find your state's house representatives' contact information here:

If you happen to write or call and get an interesting response, please feel free to share that in the comments here, too. I think everyone interested in the outcome of this bill would also be interested in knowing what their representatives have to say about it.

Historic MHRA rally in Toronto huge success

Robert O'Hara · 28 September 2013 · Archived copy · Original

At 11am today (28 Sept 2013) in Toronto's Queen's Park, for the first time, men's human rights activists (MHRAs) gathered together as men's human rights activists from A Voice for Men and other organizations to show their support for men and boys and to raise awareness of the crisis so many of them are facing today..

The rally followed a presentation given by Dr. Miles Groth at the University of Toronto the night before, where counter-protesters from the U of T Student Union were expected but failed to materialize. During previous events hosted by CAFE, there were strong showings of disruptive and sometimes violent protesters who pulled fire alarms and wielded ax handles and bull horns. CAFE was fined by the U of T administration for police security just days before the event.

The number of MHRAs at the rally numbered just around one hundred and fifty people, mostly men in their mid 30s. There was a counter-protest numbering around twenty-five people – again, mostly male, calling themselves "Bash Back" who heckled the MHRAs with charges of homophobia and misogyny. There were about 20 Toronto Police officers who, early on, separated the two groups in order to prevent an altercation and allow the MHRAs to conduct their rally.

"The police acted admirably and discharged their duties professionally," said Paul Elam, who was a keynote speaker at the rally.

Attila Vinczer was the opening speaker, with Paul Elam following. Dean Esmay, Karen Straughan, Tom Golden, Suzanne McCarley and others spoke to the crowd, which convened for over two hours.

For most attending, it was the first time they had met in person since getting involved in activism. The centerpiece of the event was a pre-recorded speech given by Warren Farrell in which he outlined his history with feminism and his eventual development as an MHRA.

"This was one of the greatest things I have ever done in my life," said Elam. "Meeting all of these people and talking to a crowd that was five times bigger than the opposition was a remarkable event."

Press from Vice Magazine and the Ryerson Student Union were present and interviewed several principal staff from A Voice for Men (AVfM) including Elam and Straughan. AVfM Radio broadcast live coverage of the event with James Huff, Robert O'Hara, Erin Pizzey and Mike Buchanan providing commentary.

"This is the first time I can remember men's rights activists gathering together and protesting," said Pizzey, a forty-year veteran of men's human rights advocacy.

More details of the event are forthcoming. AVFM thanks all those who attended the event and all our supporters around the world who made this day possible.

Defending freedom with bricks of logic

VFM News and Commentary · 28 September 2013 · Archived copy · Original

The Men's Human Rights Movement is building a solid wall using bricks of logic and compassion as fortification against Gender Ideologues in Toronto trying to tear apart fundamental human rights and civil liberties. We hope you'll help us do that.

Events kicked off on Friday, the 27th, where Professor Miles Groth delivered a "controversial" lecture on the "terrifying" topic "Caring About University Men – Why We Need Campus Men's Centres in a Time of Crisis." His presentation came off smoothly – for all their bluster, feminists were a no-show. Expect more on this event as our folks process the video and audio recordings.

Very shortly, A Voice for Men, in collaboration with other organizations,

Show link: http://www.blogtalkradio.com/avoiceformen/2013/09/28/revelations-with-erin-pizzey-rally-in-toronto will cover the Men and Boys in Crisis rally in Queen's Park in Canada's beautiful city of Toronto. We'll also be joined by the UK's own Mike Buchanan of the Justice for Men and Boys (and the women who love them) Party. We expect the show to run a full three hours as we talk about all the issues facing the men and boys in our lives who we love and care about, and the crisis so many are undergoing in Canada, the UK, the United States, Australia, India, and so many other parts of the world. We'll be featuring call-ins from the rally as well as general discussion of events, past and present, as they relate to the anti-male movement and our efforts to fight against it!

“All men are potential rapists, and definitely sexual deviants!” “Yeah! Those creeps!”

“Men are no longer necessary.” “Damn skippy! Those useless slobs!”

“Men are dominating privileged patriarchal oppressors, rule the world, and own all corporations.” “They oppress women! Smash the patriarchy!”

“Men are stoic and emotionless. They don’t feel things like women do.” “Why won’t they listen to me!?!?!?”

“Men are poisoned by testosterone and their chromosomes are going extinct.” “Good! Who needs them anyway?”

“Boys won’t sit still in the class and are hard to control.” “So annoying! Why can’t they be more like girls?”

“Men are sexually selfish and don’t care about pleasing their partners.” “Of course not! They’re men!”

“Men pollute Mother Earth and plunge penis pumps in her to extract oil to fuel male privilege.” “Yeah! Women are more sensible and compassionate!”

“Men are violent thugs, and start all wars.” “Yes! If women ruled the world, there would be no war.”

“Men are unnecessary for the raising of a family.” “That’s right! Women can do it all!!!”

“Husbands and fathers beset their wives and children with marital rape, domestic violence, child abuse, and neglect.” “Those assholes are sick!”

“Men force women into restrictive gender roles.” “Yeah! Down with patriarchy! Women hold up half the sky!”

“Men abandon their children.” “Men are boorish and insensitive.” “Men don’t know how to treat ladies anymore.” “Men are failing in school.” “Men have Peter Pan syndrome.” “Men should act more like women.” “Men are afraid of commitment.” “Men think with their dicks.”

“Women have a serious lack of respect for men’s humanity.” “NOT ALL WOMEN ARE LIKE THAT! Stop generalizing!”

Hyperbole aside, does this not sound familiar?

Here’s how it goes: misandrists and other ignorant jerks utter bigoted nonsense, a few people agree, and everyone else just silently accepts it. Except for a few who protest, and are quickly shouted down or told to “man up.”

But woe betide any man or woman who dare speak a less-than-flattering thing about women. “Not all women are like that” (NAWALT) is the least of the recriminations.

I understand some of the criticisms of generalizing, and the spirit behind NAWALT. While I think the human race would have died out long long ago without the ability to generalize, and to a certain point it is intellectually necessary, I get that we should treat people as individuals as much as possible. Women and men are human beings. Some of them are saints, some are pure evil, and most are a balance of both. And we’re all just trying to live our lives.

But it is also glaringly obvious that when it comes to gender issues, it is regarded as hunky dory to generalize men in a horrible fashion. This should go without saying, but if Not All Women Are Like That, then Not All Men Are Like That.

If you’re reading this, you probably already speak against misandry and other forms of bigotry. And if you say NAWALT, or warn against a generalization, you should be taken seriously. But if you don’t speak against misandry and other bigotry, or you join in, then you have no right to utter NAWALT. That reveals a lack of courage and a broken moral compass. You can do better.

Remember: If NAWALT, then NAMALT.

* “Not All Women Are Like That”, or NAWALT, is the phrase/acronym for a very common phenomenon in gender-related discourse. Whenever anyone says something less-than-positive about a woman, or a group of women, some version of “Not All Women Are Like That” is uttered as a non-answer to stop the conversation, or to deflect an obvious truth from acceptance.

Women don't own sex

Diana Davison · 29 September 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Hardly a week goes by without the public being told how rape culture and victim blaming are being perpetrated by 'the patriarchy'. Monday, September 23, 2013 offered us the mother lode of mythical feminist thinking in the form of Una Mullally in The Irish Times.

It's not that Una said something unique, it's that she managed to fit so many fallacies into one article that really makes her applause worthy.

Una begins with criticizing police for advising people to "protect yourself from violence" by exercising caution when meeting people online. The reason for this advisory is that a woman's bones were discovered and the missing woman seems to have met someone via a dating site on the internet before turning up dead. Apparently this is 'victim blaming'.

I used to get emails all the time from female friends who wanted to forward me the latest warning on how a man might kidnap me by hiding in the back seat of my parked car at the mall. The warnings always came from female friends and they always had my best interests in mind. I never once emailed them back "how dare you blame me for parking my car!" I did start sending all emails to spam if they had "fw:" in the message line but the proper, civilized response is "Thank you. I'll pass the message along to everyone I know."

Una, and her ilk, also need some basic lessons in Crime Solving For Dummies. If you watch television at all you might have come across shows like CSI or Criminal Minds in which they portray rather likable, well-meaning detectives who investigate crimes. The first thing they do is ask apparently bizarre questions like "Who, what, where, when, why… and how?"

The answers to these questions help solve crimes.

When a police force investigates someone's online dating habits it can lead to information, like the identity of the killer. They can also help divulge the method of death, which can help police link one murder to other murders. While they do this investigative work they sometimes have microphones shoved in their faces asking for a public statement in order to inform the people who write and read the news.

The reason police offer warnings to the public are because the public wants to know how they can avoid showing up as a set of bones on the next news report. They get scared. This information is intended to help them feel safer.

"Societies are in a crisis over how men treat women," Una claims. Now, this is news to me. Society is in a crisis over international wars, terrorism, bank fraud, the resulting economic collapse, and a general lack of faith in either the press, politicians or 'God'. Most of the women I know are far more concerned with having a bad hair day and failing to look attractive than in having a day where too many men show them unwanted attention.

She claims "potential attackers are rarely instructed to exercise vigilance." Yes, Una, they are reminded every day by the fucking law. It's as illegal to commit a crime today as it was yesterday. They are told to not be violent by being faced with jail if they break the law. If we were to instruct them to "be vigilant" we'd be telling them to not get caught. Yelling at him "that's illegal, you know!" will not solve the problem. You moron.

"Men, don't rape" is Una's next solution. This is part of the whole rape culture myth. For some reason, women, like Una, think that other men are in a unique position to give each other rules about sex. They aren't. If men want sex from women, women are in the unique position to tell them how to go about achieving their goals. What feminists are doing when they tell men that only they can stop rape is basically like a teacher telling a class of inferiors that she will punish the whole class if they don't tell her who put tacks on her seat.

According to international law, collective punishment is wrong.

The sentiment embedded in the demand for men to fix women's problems is the idea that men are the problem. The error of this idea, and it's not Una's fault for believing this because feminism has ingrained it into her mind, is that men do not live in this world within a cocoon. Boys are born as helpless babies, just as girls are, and we are mostly raised by women.

Though men appear to rule the world, that is because women treat them like gophers: Go get me stuff.

A man's worth in our world is not assessed on how much wealth he possesses, it is based on the level of happiness of his woman. Every politician knows he'll do better if he has a happy wife at his side. Don't be shallow, ask better questions. Why do men commit crimes? I'll posit this: because they need more stuff to make a woman happy or because they have been rejected by a woman shaming them for not being good enough and feel they have nothing left to lose. Committing a crime has a penalty. They need a reason to risk that penalty. It's going to be primal. Think… think… are you with me?

The man is the head of the house but the woman is the neck and she can turn the head any way she wants.

Feminists claim that men objectify women but it's women who think that men are just walking, magical penises and that the penis has the mystical quality of getting them stuff. We're less concerned with how they get us our stuff than in making sure we get the shit we're after. One of those things is security so the problem for women is not in how to get men to stop being aggressive, it's in how to get them to be aggressive but stay out of jail so they can keep providing the stuff that makes us happy.

The problem is not men. Men just want to be loved and respected. What women make them do for that respect is what drives some of them crazy.

"Men, stop hanging your threat of rape over dark streets." This is Una's impassioned plea. The streets are only dark if you decide that you have no agency, no power, to affect the world around you. The threat in walking out your door every day exists for both men and women. I'm sorry to inform you, Una, but you could die at any moment. Men face a much greater risk of physical assault every day than women do but they still keep walking out that door.

Being that women are equal, I think we should meet that threat on an equal basis.

What Una claims makes men more culpable is that they all know someone who is "dubious" and goes to strip clubs or pays for sex. Strip clubs are not illegal and I know quite a few women who married for money, so buying sex is apparently quite legal, too, as long as you get the proper paperwork. Una, you and I both know someone who had a baby to avoid having to get a job. You and I both know someone who married a man they didn't love. Isn't that just a little bit shady? 'Dubious behaviour', perhaps?

Saying that men can stop rape is like telling a driver they can stop all car accidents or investors that they can stop all fraud. Just because men enjoy sex or do it from time to time doesn't place them in a unique position to police all other participants. Just like Una can't stop other writers from saying things she disagrees with.

Una claims that "women should be free to talk to whomever they choose and go wherever they want without threat of assault." That's bullshit. No one is free to do that. A person is free to leave their home every day and enter the world of the unknown and they should be assured that if something bad happens society will come to their aid to help them heal. Unfortunately, women are not given this freedom because feminists are hell bent on maximizing the pain and trauma of every female experience.

They are busy convincing women who don't even know if they've been raped to call it rape. If you aren't sure: it didn't happen. If the woman doesn't know, how the hell is the guy supposed to have known? They tell women it's a terrible thing and that they should go to support groups where they relive the pain over and over and over again until all they are is a rape victim. Some of these girls didn't even know they were raped and could have moved on but now it's their lifelong identity and they'll never get over it. What kind of sick fucks are you?

We have become indoctrinated to believe that rape is the worst crime that can be committed. How the hell did that happen? I can think of a bunch of things that are worse: Murder, having my fingers cut off one at a time while I watch, having my limbs disconnected, waking up in an abandoned house with a tape recorder saying "Hello, Diana,

I want you to make a choice…" The list can go on. I've seen a lot of films. I've been raped so that's not fiction, but my mind (perhaps more creative than that of feminists) can imagine worse scenarios.

Some rapes are extremely violent, leaving women beaten and in hospital with damage to their reproductive organs. These crimes are not just rapes, they are brutal physical assaults that never go unreported and no one laughs. A man can end up with lifelong damage from getting kicked in the groin yet this is comedy to women. While feminists claim that a woman who is drunk can't consent, they don't want to address the problem that drunk women can become so sexually aggressive they assault men. I have a friend who has serious problems after a fall-down drunk friend he was trying to keep safe by taking her home grabbed his testicles in a sexual advance, squeezing so hard he had to go to the hospital. This guy wasn't trying to rape her, he was trying to keep her from having sex.

Drunk girls are not fun and they are not weak.

Drunk women are responsible if they decide to drive themselves home and get in an accident while doing so. They are equally responsible if they make the decision to have sex. I hear Mothers Against Drunk Driving (MADD) is a crazy ass bunch of sisters if you try to challenge them on that.

While feminists claim that a rape culture exists which 'normalizes' rape, I insist that a feminist culture exists that 'rape-ifies' normal sex. The definition of rape has now been expanded to include when a woman doesn't say no but thinks it, when a woman decides that sex didn't go the way she wanted, when a woman has had a few drinks, when a woman is woken up with sex after falling asleep next to a man she has previously had sex with and decided to stay in the bed… The list will continue to grow until we stop it.

Perhaps this is too much information but, for me, sex is my favorite way to wake up. Men have every right to believe that a woman sleeping in the bed next to them is going to be happily awoken. If you don't want sex, don't sleep in their fucking bed. We are not children here.

Women don't own sex, it's something people do together. It requires communication. Women don't like it when men lie to them to get sex and men don't like it when women lie either. It happens both ways. "Yes, I'll use a condom" or "Yes, I'm on birth control." There is no one-sided game, it can happen to either gender. If a woman lies with her body language and her actions she is raping the man. Sex is not a written contract. It is something that only the people present can attest to, it happens organically, intuitively and it is something over which people can make mistakes. Men don't need need an 'emphatic yes' to avoid rape, you need to give them an emphatic 'no'. If you think you didn't have the option to say 'stop', you are wrong.

The original case in discussion with Una Mallally's article (before she made it a rape culture issue) was a woman who decided to go to a fetish site (note that a woman 'normalized' SM fetishes with her book Fifty Shades of Grey, probably influencing the dead woman's choices) and met with someone who ended up killing her. What we don't know, and don't need to know, is whether or not the murder was the prime objective or whether the fetish scene accidentally led to her death and the partner tried to cover it up. That's a job for the police. What we do know is that meeting people in real life whom you only know from online is a dangerous prospect and that the police warnings are extremely good advice.

Women are not free to exit their doors and expect to return safely any more than men are. Every day you wake up and exit the house be happy that you are alive and be happy when you return safely. In the meantime, there are many things you can do to reduce your anxiety: choose to be fearless, choose to be cautious, choose to not leave your house… or the fifty shades of grey in between. The choice is yours and no one is taking that away from you. Women and men both face this risk but, for some reason, only women seem intent on blaming men for all their problems.

…but fortunately she had a rape whistle, so instead, we just talked about stuff like rape hysteria, false rape allegations, racism, history of the gay rights movement, and related issues in the aftermath of people in Toronto who declared us "racist, anti-woman, anti-gay," Community of the Wrongly Accused, To Kill a Mockingbird, Tom Robinson and Atticus Finch, and other things.

Thanks to Shawn Sutherland and his friend whose name I didn't catch (the guy who ran the gurney) who got this beautiful footage. We look forward to seeing more of Shawn's work.

Watch for other footage of the recent events surrounding the Miles Groth lecture at University of Toronto and CAFE in the coming weeks. This was shot on Saturday the 28th after the Men and Boys in Crisis rally.

Reflecting on Toronto

It was, in the most literal sense, surreal.

I was sitting at a table. A proper, creamy black glass of Guinness sat invitingly in front of me. I looked to my left and there sat Tom Golden; to my right, Vladek Filler. At the far end of the table was Attila Vinczer. In front of me, in the open part of the room, stood Dean Esmay having a chat with Karen Straughan. Suzanne McCarley passed between and a moment later Dan Perrins. Documentarian Steve Brule of StudioBrule was at another table, as was the dynamic team from Men's Rights Edmonton.

These people were not the only faces in the crowd. The room was buzzing with people; some of them members of CAFE, who had reserved the entire second floor of the tavern we were in for the soirée.

Someone tapped me on the shoulder. "Hi, I am (name) I go by (username) at AVFM. I Just wanted to say hello." It happened again and again and again.

I had a buzz and my Guinness was still full. I felt much the same way the entire, late September weekend as one person after another, many of whom I had talked to and worked with — admired — online for years, materialized right in front of my eyes as genuine, flesh and blood people that occupied space in the "real" world.

And then there were the "strangers." There was a man who drove 1,500 miles straight from North Dakota to attend the event, and who was getting up the next morning to drive straight back. Another man, a mechanical engineer from Toronto handed me his card and we ended up chatting about his writing for AVFM. Others just walked up and handed me cash, insisting that I add it in to the war chest.

All of them, to a man, and woman, wanted to help. They either wanted to give or to work or both. I made plans to talk in the days ahead with several of them.

Of all the things that happened in Toronto that weekend, between the talk given by Miles Groth and the Rally for Men and Boys in Crisis, this particular moment, on a personal level, was the most profound for me; the most compelling, and the most deeply emotional. And it hit me in the midst of all the gentle camaraderie that filled the air, the handshakes and hugs, that we just took a vital and important next step in the right direction for the MHRM.

Please allow me to shift gears a little and pull you with me through a somewhat circuitous overview of the rest of the weekend. It was one of mostly ups, and a couple of downs that I would prefer to characterize as learning experiences more than mistakes. That is not semantics. We are indeed new at much of this. Opportunities to learn abound.

The "mistakes" come honestly. We still have too few people forced to do too much, as evidenced by Attila Vinczer strapping a boulder to his shoulders and dragging it up the side of a mountain to organize and execute the Rally for Men and Boys in Crisis.

We will need more help for him and others early next year when AVFM Contributing Editor Karen Straughan, aka Girl Writes What, steps up to the podium at the invitation of CAFE and delivers a lecture I am sure we will all remember. And the help should be there, as the AVFM team will be there in greater force, and earlier than we were this time.

There were some oversights in planning on the part of AVFM (read: Paul effed up) regarding our participation in events where police have been charged with maintaining distance between us and counter protesters. My inexperience and subsequent lack of foresight in this area showed. As I will be addressing with the AVFM management team in the near future, we will be taking measures to make sure that NO ONE from AVFM crosses lines and engages with counter-protesters for any reason when we have assured police that the boundaries set will be respected. No exceptions.

We will encourage other MHRA groups to conduct themselves similarly, but of course we have no authority over any other group; only our willingness to publicly affiliate.

There were other areas for improvement and learning that are best left for the management meeting before we make any declarations on site.

There is one other matter that needs to be addressed here, and it too is a matter where we are still finding our way and learning the ropes.

At the lecture given by Dr. Miles Groth, he addressed the vital need for the establishment of men's issues groups at colleges and universities throughout the United States and Canada (and I am assuming other countries as well). As usual, Dr. Groth spoke with the authority and authenticity of a man who has been a genuine advocate for men and boys far longer than many of us have even been aware of these issues. CAFE makes excellent choices for engaging and informative speakers and Dr. Groth is no exception.

There was however, a statement from Dr. Groth that I found to be of concern, and I know many others in the audience did as well.

He said at one point, and I am paraphrasing as accurately as memory will allow, 'Programs like the White Ribbon Campaign and Walk a Mile in Her Shoes are worthwhile and important.'

Even with my deep and continuing respect for Miles Groth, I must make a public statement objecting to this in its entirety.

Programs like the White Ribbon Campaign and Walk a Mile in Her Shoes are not only not worthwhile and not important, they are the epitome of the slanted, sexist, gender-based view of violence promulgated by disingenuous, corrupt ideologues that now infest academe like a disease.

They are programs of control via shame, targeting men as an oppressor/abuser class in the false model of patriarchy. Both of these programs are primary examples of the academic and cultural misandry that we are pledged to combat.

As such, they should be rightly and unambiguously condemned and exposed, as well as the hate-driven agenda they represent.

I am forced by my values and my knowledge of these programs to speak publicly in dissent of Dr. Groth's remarks, and to respectfully encourage him to revisit those programs and consider revising his views.

That being said, this is where another valuable lesson comes in for all of us, I think.

Our history in this now real world emergent online movement for the human rights of men and boys has been understandably harsh on those, even among our friends, who get it "wrong." It takes a lot to understand these issues, and frequently we (including myself especially) can be unforgiving on those who from time to time miss the point, even for a moment. Going forward, I do not think this will serve us. We need to recognize our allies and stick with them, even through what we think to be their mistakes. Our dissent should never be silenced, but should be respectful and should recognize the immense value of people who skillfully support the cause of men and boys.

Miles Groth is such a person, a man who has dedicated years of hard work, and who continues to do so, providing an alternative for young men to the current ambiance of hate on modern college campuses.

I venture to speculate, as I have not yet discussed this with Dr. Groth, that his intent was to project what we all know to be true. There is no problem in this community with programs that address the needs and concerns of women. We support them when not steeped in hatred and when not leaving tread marks on the backs of innocent men and boys.

In fact, I have no doubt if women's groups were interested in pushing non-gendered programs to address any social malady, including rape and other forms of violence, we would be among the first to speak up in support of them.

But we are not so anxious to prove our support of women's organizations that we will endorse work that is rooted in hate and ignorance.

My disagreement with Dr. Groth's recent words, however, is offered with the utmost respect for him as a scholar and an advocate for men and boys. He has certainly earned that much many times over.

In the days ahead there will be much more written about the event in Toronto on this website. And we will also look forward to early and more diligent preparations to visit there again to support the appearance of our very own Karen Straughan on the University of Toronto campus.

In the meantime, I want to say thank you to all those who supported this event, who came in person, and all those who sent in their well wishes and who followed events as they happened. We felt your support there to the last man and woman who actually got to go.

Finally, there are now just two days left in our current fundraiser. We have made good progress toward meeting goal again, yet we do have some distance to cover before it is over.

I would like to encourage those who have not yet donated to please do so now. AVFM is working hard to take activism to the next level, and we are getting there. But we can't do it without you. Please make a contribution, in whatever amount, to help us reach the goals we need to reach in order to help men and boys.

Addendum, with my apologies to James Huff, Robert O'hara, Erin Pizzey, Mike Buchanan, and David King, who took time out of their schedules to do a special edition of AVFM Radio, covering the rally live and reporting on it afterward so that anyone who wanted to could come as close as possible to being there. Thank you all for what was another great example of the work you do on a regular basis for men and boys.

Industries for the destruction of men

If you are a father in the United States who has experienced divorce, then you know that the family courts want nothing to do with you except for you to participate in the system which helps make lawyers rich, submit to being a marginalized parent, and paying child support via the government so that women and children have access to government help once the mother disposes of you.

What you may not realize is that all U.S. state governments have become dependent on court-ordered alienated fathers who pay greater child support which, in turn, triggers Federal Title IV-D money that states then use to replenish money for welfare and other programs. But, this can only happen once paternity is established.

With this in mind, it may seem apparent to you that the biggest opposition to this industry is father's rights and shared parenting groups who are demanding increased time with their children and supporting them directly instead of via the government program of child support enforcement.

If you put your money on father's rights groups, I want to introduce another flourishing industry that has crept up in the past decade that is in direct conflict with child support enforcement and their need to establish paternity of children and bringing fathers under Federal enforcement. In fact, this industry desperately opposes the establishment of paternity of the roughly 46% of children in the United States being born to a mother that is single or married to someone other than the child's biological father.

Introducing the adoption industry

In just about every U.S. state, there are laws that govern who is deemed to be the likely biological father when the mother of a child is unmarried. Furthermore, laws are setup in each state that say that these putative fathers have absolutely zero rights to their children unless they establish paternity, or have paternity decided via the courts. While the establishment of paternity is good news for child support enforcement, it is devastating to the adoption industry which wants an adoption to happen without there being a legal father who could oppose the adoption. And trust me, U.S. states are going to great lengths to make sure this happens, much to the dismay of the Federal program of child support enforcement that keeps women- and children-centered programs running. Let's take a look at Oklahoma's law on putative fathers:

[quote] "A birth mother is under no obligation to inform the putative father of her pregnancy. In fact, if a birth mother creates an adoption plan during her pregnancy, she is not required to serve the Notice of Plan for Adoption on the putative father. If a putative father is served a Notice of Plan for Adoption, he must follow one of the options outlined in the notice. If he fails to act upon the Notice of Plan for Adoption, his failure to act will be seen by a court as a denial of interest in asserting parental rights and will be sufficient grounds to terminate those parental rights." [/quote]

Furthermore, Oklahoma law states that…

[quote]"Oklahoma law places the burden upon the putative father to learn if a pregnancy resulted from a relationship with the birth mother."[/quote]

In short, what Oklahoma is saying is that mothers can legally conceal pregnancy and adoption plans from a father, but puts the burden on the father to somehow discover this and stop it within 90 days.

If the father is unable to stop the adoption, the adoption industry, their lawyers, and their lobby groups win. But child support enforcement loses because that is one less purposefully marginalized father paying child support.

Either way, what is important for men and fathers (along with women in their families) to remember is that there are industries everywhere forming to capitalize on the destruction of men and fathers.

Equally important to remember, is that you are helping to fund these industries via your decision to get married and participate in creating motherhood. When are we going to stop arguing with feminist and feminist-controlled industries and finally launch a fatal shot into their battleships by going our own way?

If you are tired of being disempowered by feminist governance, then stop getting married. This will end alimony and the loss of property. It will also lessen your chances of having a false allegation of domestic violence brought against you.

If you are tired of being disempowered by feminist governance, then stop creating children. This will cripple child support enforcement and state governments' ability to order your marginalization via social services. This will also end the adoption industry. Also, no more babies means no more children going to universities where academic feminists are waiting to turn them against you.

Gentlemen, you have WAY more power than you realize.

In His Own Words: Living a Nightmare

Dr. Tara J. Palmatier · 1 October 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Welcome to Domestic Violence Awareness Month on Shrink4Men and A Voice for Men. Men comprise approximately 50% of domestic violence victims, but we rarely read or hear about this. In this respect, men are invisible victims.

In an effort to raise public awareness about male victims of domestic violence, we will publish an In His Own Words account every day in October. If you would like to share your story, please review the submission guidelines at the end of this article.

Today's In His Own Words is written by "Gerald Kensington" (not his real name). Thank you, Gerald, and much strength to you and your children.

> Even as I start typing I am fearful that she will somehow figure out I wrote this and I will, again, be subjected to her spite and vindictive behavior, which knows no bounds. But I also believe writing this will be somewhat therapeutic for me. I am living a nightmare and she has, and likely will continue to, successfully manipulate those who can validate her role as "victim", as well as those who can influence such important things as child custody (e.g., evaluators), leaving me as the "villain."
> I am beyond frustrated at the complete lack of resources available to abused men. I've been looking for self-help books online and find nothing geared specifically towards men. I have considered getting one of the hundreds available to women as the abused and just switch gender roles, but it's hard to believe there are no books and other resources for men.
> I have been with her for over 13 years. I ignored all of the red flags, of which there were many. She would fly into fits of rage over seemingly simple and/or minor things. For example, she berated me for over an hour once because I went to the bathroom and did not open the window in anticipation of her coming in later. From the moment we met I felt she was "the one." She liked everything I liked, said everything right, and seemed to be exactly who I was looking for in a spouse.
> I made the mistake of telling her this. Once I voiced my beliefs of her being "it," I was constantly asked "When are you going to propose?!" I ended up proposing before I was ready, but I knew it would get her off my back. Little did I know it would be replaced with "When are we going to have babies?!"
> She grew up in a broken home – her dad has been divorced three times. I've never seen it, but she often spoke of his uncontrollable temper and throwing plates (and their cat) against the walls, over something as small as the phone ringing during dinner. He cheated on her mom. She "thinks" she was raped in high school. She has had two abortions from two different guys, one in high school and one in college. She had bulimia. She, admittedly, has been through a lot. Apparently, she thought it only fair I be as unhappy as her.
> We "unexpectedly" got pregnant just two months after our wedding. She tells people she told me she was going off birth control and that I was "fine with it," but that is not the case.
> We had two more babies, also unplanned (by me). During our first pregnancy she developed severe OCD, all revolving around "something bad happening" to the pregnancy. When nothing "bad" happened, it then turned it to obsessing over our baby daughter.
> Our lives became a living hell. I read as much as I could about OCD, trying to learn how it was affecting her and how I could better relate to her. Nothing helped. We were both miserable, but we both loved our kids beyond comprehension.
> She began telling me that I was "100% responsible" for our marital problems. I believed her. There was such unbelievable anger and resentment. How could I continue upsetting her so much? I was a bad person. She began calling me names, and the yelling/swearing worsened, though now it was happening in front of the kids.

Doors were being slammed and objects thrown at me. She came after me once, fists flying, and I had to grab her arms to hold her back, leaving a mark on her forearm. "Look what you've done to me!!!" she yelled.

For a period of almost four years she spent nearly $8,000/mo on her credit card (despite me not making that much). Once I pled with her to stop the spending and she yelled at me for being "controlling." We were in massive debt.

She kicked me out of the house all the time for upsetting her; sleeping on a couch or at my parents' house was commonplace. She threatened divorce probably 38 times if she didn't get what she wanted from me.

I told her I didn't feel comfortable having a fourth baby, and she started calling me "Dream Crusher." She bribed me with sex to get what she wanted, and would withhold it if she didn't.

Her erratic behavior only got worse when she was drunk. One night she was so uncontrollable I actually considered calling the police, but I couldn't make myself do it. I always felt (and still do, somehow!) this need to protect her. I "escaped" her by going into the room where the kids were all sleeping, hoping she would leave me alone. She did not.

As I was lying down I had a pitcher of water dumped on me. I later heard her describe to her mom how she "had to dump water" on me because I was "acting so crazy." I was losing my mind, and she validated it by saying things like, "You have absolutely no concept of reality." I doubted my own thoughts, feelings, intentions, beliefs – everything. I doubted myself to my core. My three beautiful kids were the only reason I stayed as long as I did.

After four years of her abuse, I finally told my parents, fearful that no one else would believe me. After all, she is "so sweet" and very intelligent. Everyone likes her! My parents, being religious, are against divorce; though, over a period of years, they would consistently urge for me to "get out" of the marriage.

One day, after being yelled at, I finally broke down. I told her I couldn't take it anymore. I told her I didn't know what was going on, but something was very wrong. I was losing my mind. That afternoon, in my home office, she shared with me something I'll never forget that she later conveniently "forgot."

She admitted to setting me up to fail, putting me in "no win" situations, and something she called "checks and balances." When things were going "well" she would intentionally make them "bad" in an effort to control when the bad would happen. It was crazy talk, but it explained so much. I recently brought this monumental (to me) conversation up to her, and she completely denied it ever happening.

She filed for divorce in April 2013. She has falsely accused me of molesting our daughter. She originally got this idea by, when snooping through my phone, seeing texts between a friend and I wherein my friend referred to attractive adult women as "baby girls." This nightmare began in January 2013 and it has progressively gotten worse.

She has now, through lies, distortions, and half-truths, insinuated to the child custody evaluator that I must have also molested my boys. I was the primary caregiver for all three kids, while working full-time, during her four years in professional school. I now have no custody and only supervised visits.

My world has crumbled and I have nothing left. My kids are my world and we miss each other tremendously. She controls when I talk to them on the phone and for how long. She monitors all conversations via speakerphone. I have been all but removed completely from their lives. She has removed my immediate family from their lives. She has removed their favorite nanny of three years from their lives, because the nanny spoke the truth to the evaluator about her crazy behavior.

Meanwhile she spread lies and half-truths all around town. I am losing friends. I have no life left and each day is miserable to wake up to. I used to be an incredibly happy person, despite being married to her.

Her abuse has lasted 13 years. I never realized it was abuse while we were together, and still somehow deny it. It feels like abuse. I just can't believe I allowed myself to be treated like this. Anytime I tried to bring it up it > was turned around on me.

> She cheated on me with a woman. She told me it was because I had recently told her how unhappy I was. One night she got drunk and drove somewhere while I was kicked out, leaving the kids (ages 4, 3, and 1) at home alone.
> The next morning she told me she drank so much because I had upset her so much. I am such an idiot. Only now, away from it all, can I see things more clearly. Yet she has taken the only things I care about – our children. My denial and "devotion" has led to my demise. I am an empty shell of the person I once was.
> By no means am I free from responsibility. Despite being told I was 100% responsible for all of our problems, deep down I knew I should accept 50%, and I do. I became so detached and disengaged from her early on that there was no hope for us; I began despising her.
> Her unpredictable moods, temper, and inability to control her emotions, among many other things, were too much to handle. Her 13+ years of abuse led me to do some things towards her as a way of "getting back." I am extremely regretful and sorry for my actions and how they may have affected her, and in no way do I attempt to justify my behavior as it relates to her. My point is I started changing as a person. I am not a bad person, but she has led me to believe over all of these years, and particularly now, that I am.
> Years of pent up frustration, confusion, anger, and resentment began eating away at me. I developed gastric issues and had not one but two separate surgeries for two unrelated afflictions in my gut. I also developed an autoimmune disease, one that will plague me off and on for the rest of my life.
> How I wish I had the strength and fortitude to leave her so long ago, but I stayed "for the kids." Instead of modeling a loyal husband and father who would do anything for his family, I am afraid I taught them that it's acceptable to be treated the way I was and that you just have to deal with it.
> And now she is keeping us apart and my disdain for her grows everyday. I hate who I've allowed myself to become. I am not this person.
> If you are reading this and even vaguely see any of this in you, get out. Get out! My therapists told me to leave her. My parents told me to leave her. What I wouldn't give to have heeded their advice then.
> These people are TOXIC and, when push comes to shove, they will shove you so hard you won't know what hit you; and they'll keep doing it. I never thought something like this could happen to me. If it can happen to me, it can happen to you.
> Don't allow your life to be ruined anymore than it has been already. If you think you are being abused, it's very likely that you are. Trust your instincts! I shoved mine aside. Don't lose yourself to this person. They'll keep taking and you may never get it back.

Much gratitude to Gerald for publicly sharing these very painful experiences. I am sure I'm not alone in wishing him and his children the best in overcoming his soon to be ex-wife's malicious lies. You're not alone, Gerald.

Paul and Dean will be describing events from a personal prospective and we will discuss what this event means for the future of the MHRM. Also to be discussed is what this means for the opposition and how it will force them to change their strategies for countering the MHRM.

The beginning of an abusive relationship

It is important that I rehash everything. It is all I have ever been doing since I discovered that I was in a scary ride with a person suffering from a personality disorder. The proverbial grabbing of a tiger's tail comes to mind. Grab a hold, hang on for the dear life and try not to get ripped to shreds when the tiger turns around and swats you. Let go? Seems scarier than I can ever imagine. Let go and be a sitting duck to face the full wrath of the tiger head-on? Standing there with my knees quivering in fear while the tiger slowly circles regarding its helpless prey, getting ready for the perfect time to lunge.

That's where I am; on the cusp of letting go. I've been hanging on to the tiger's tail now for 15 years, but I have to get out. I can't hold on any longer, I must not. How did it all start? This has been the million dollar question that has been on my mind. What did I ever do to bring this life upon myself? I think I've analyzed it to the best of my layperson abilities and I've come up with a theory. The "Be Careful What You Wish For" theory; I will explain. You see, I grew up separated from my parents. My dad was offered a job abroad and left when I was about 4 years old. What I would have expected to happen would be for my mum and I to remain where I grew up so we could stay together. This didn't happen. About a year after my dad left, my mum left to join him. So I was left to grow up with my maternal grandmother.

I remember this. I remember going to the airport to drop off my mother. I also remember at 6 years old, I flew to the country my dad and mum lived in, alone; the first trip I ever took on an airline. I remember the apartment; it had Terrazzo tiled flooring, it was cool and it smelled wonderful. It was devoid of furniture and had 2 bedrooms and a long corridor that I used to play with a blue and silver Mack truck that I don't remember who gave to me. I don't remember going back and leaving my parents. I remember my grandmother dropping me off in school and waiting to pick me up again. Bits of memories of school flash through my head. Possibly until I was about 9 years old. My mother wasn't in them. I knew my parents as a distant phone call on a bad line that I received every month at a neighbor's house since we didn't own a telephone. I remember being coached by my grandmother in my responses to my parents. I remember the call I received when I was 8 years old where everyone seemed happy; I had a new born baby brother who was thousands of miles away. I felt nothing.

If you ask me where it began, I'd say it began with feelings of being alone. Of being with people who didn't understand what I was thinking or feeling. Of growing up in a house where it was the norm to bottle up your feelings. Of being abandoned. I was abandoned. This is how I really felt and how I really feel to this day. Later on in life, whenever I interacted with my parents, I always felt that things were a bit forced. I really had no closeness to my parents. So this is where it started. I felt abandoned, I felt unloved. I really didn't know how to express this feeling, but it was there. Like a splinter in your finger that you couldn't reach and couldn't remove. Something that caused you pain when you touched it in a certain way. So I carry these feelings with me throughout my life until I turn 21 years old.

Since 18 I longed to have a girlfriend, but was too timid, didn't know how to interact and was afraid of rejection. I would fantasize at night before I slept about this faceless girl who would be in my life and love me. It wasn't sex, she would just love me. I would try to let this imaginary feeling of love wash over me and lull me to sleep. It was great and it was all I ever wished for–and then I met her. The girl in my dreams.

I married her when I turned 22. I've often asked myself why I did it and the only conclusion I came up with was that I needed love. I needed to not just be loved but also to be taken care of. I needed someone to take care of me and she was the perfect one. She was strong, independent, and caring. I needed her, she was just like this magical being sent to take away my pain. Let's call her Jess.

We had a tumultuous courtship. My savior instinct kicked in on high alert to save her from her mother. Jess' mother was moody, unpredictable, threw tantrums, and often used the threat of shaming or guilt to make her children do her bidding. Jess gradually taught me about her mother and all about her ways and moods. I can't really remember much about the day I met Jess' mum, except that it was unremarkable. Jess' mum was pivotal in my role as knight in shining armor. I had to rescue Jess and the only way was marriage. I plan to write more about the courtship at a later stage, so I will not go into much detail now. If I were to sum up our courtship until marriage however, the most apt word would always be tumultuous.

Looking back at all this, it would be accurate to say that at this point, I was in way over my head. I was just a spectator in this perfect storm being manipulated into making decisions that I didn't know the consequences of. All I knew was at the time I had to get married to hold on to this wonderful girl and I had get married to save this wonderful girl. The decision was wrong. Horribly wrong.

When the marriage started, things changed. First, it was the feelings of not being worthy enough. I was running my own business at the time, but I was constantly being made to feel like the money I made was not sufficient. I was compared with an ex-boyfriend of hers who had a large family fortune and multiple family businesses that he just inherited. I was constantly compared with this person and made to feel inadequate for not being able to provide a luxurious house. When he bought Jess an outfit, he bought not just the dress, but the shoes, bag and other accessories to match. Jess would accept the gifts I gave her with a wistful smile that I had been trained to recognize as the "I'll accept your pitiful gift but I am not happy and my ex-boyfriend would have given me much more" look. I was always on my toes and constantly trying to elicit a genuine smile of appreciation from her.

The sex slowed down. A lot. While battling the constant feelings of inadequacy, I tried to gain affection and ultimately sex. I was refused both. I was told that I had to ask for sex when I wanted it and that Jess was unable to read any of my signals as she was just an innocent girl who didn't know much about sex. She really didn't, for she had grown up in a puritanical, Catholic household where sex talk was taboo and masturbation would be treated with priority boarding to the aircraft that flew you straight to the gates of hell. So I had to ask for sex. I don't know how many of you have tried to do this, but it isn't easy. On your guard, feeling inadequate for not giving enough, you also had to find a way to put your raw, animal, male desires into words. Do I say, "Can we have sex?", do I say, "I want to have sex?", what about, "Shall we go to bed?", maybe. "Let's f!". I tried many different ways to do this. Whenever I asked I felt lesser and lesser of a man. Sex was either given up grudgingly, flatly refused, or promised but never given. When it was given though, I was made to feel like I was receiving something that I didn't deserve and that if I worked hard enough, then maybe I would be deserving of this. It was humiliating.

It was year 1 of marriage and I felt really low and I think things spiraled out of control from this point in. It would lead me to a life of alienation of friends and work colleagues, a life of getting into a significant debt, one of sorrow, misery and constant anxiety. A life I wouldn't wish on my worst enemy, yet a life people from afar deem as one of the most perfect ever imagined. I will write more about my life and what I've learned in subsequent blog posts, but for now, this is how it began. With a boy that grew up without firm direction, without parents, in a guilt and shame based society, with possibly a mother that suffered from Narcissistic Personality Disorder. A boy that jumped out of the frying pan to land into the fire, a boy forced to grow up feeling worthless, inadequate and anxious. Maybe this is how it started for some of you; maybe not. I just want to tell my story so that I can continue to gain the strength to leave. To go out and live a life where I can truly be happy.

Dean Esmay · 1 October 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Men’s Rights Edmonton had an arguably unwise but very funny discussion with the “Bash Back” reactionaries who were there to disrupt the Men and Boys in Crisis rally in Queen’s Park on September 28th of this year. When I saw Nick jump in there I ran to make sure he was OK and asked a few annoyed questions of my own, but then we were asked to leave and so we politely did just that.

Once again we see one or two of the reactionary anti-men protestors trying to be reasonable, which is a nice sign, even as they were completely drowned out by their more obnoxious and fascistic (and one apparently outright communist) friends.

In the meantime, in the aftermath of the event, Attila Vinczer (who you will be hearing a lot more from here on AVfM in the coming weeks and months and, hopefully, years) had a nice talk in the aftermath of this historic event… and so did his son.

Thanks to Men’s Rights Edmonton for the first video and to Shawn Sutherland and his unnamed camera-gurney assistant for the second two videos, as well as the video I did with Girl Writes What on the same day.

Domestic Violence Awareness Month: The Invisible Victims

Dr. Tara J. Palmatier · 1 October 2013 · Archived copy · Original

October is domestic violence awareness month. In the true spirit of raising public awareness, Shrink4Men, AVoiceForMen and DAHMW (the Domestic Abuse Hotline for Men and Women) would like to shine a spotlight on a group of individuals who comprise approximately half the victims of domestic violence. A group who is afforded very few resources and are typically ignored and/or ridiculed when they speak out about their victimization — often by the very individuals seeking to raise public awareness about the insidious social malady of domestic violence.

Who is this invisible and marginalized group of domestic violence victims pushed to the periphery of public awareness?

Men.

[If you are already aware about the difficulties male victims of domestic violence face, please scroll to the end of this article to find out how you can help.*]

Men are turned away from most domestic violence shelters. Men do not meet eligibility to receive aid from most domestic violence support organizations by virtue of being men, which is nothing short of overt discrimination, sexism and bigotry.

To the best of our knowledge, there are no court advocacy programs for male victims of domestic violence. Men (and their children) are not eligible for state and federal stipends for safe housing from their female abusers. There are no free or subsidized counseling programs nor are there free legal services/legal aid for male victims of domestic violence.

In the United States, there is only one shelter for male victims of domestic violence (the Valley Oasis Shelter in Antelope, CA) out of the approximately 1,800 shelters available to women and their children nationwide. Canada also used to have a domestic violence shelter for men that was run by the late Earl Silverman.

Mr. Silverman committed suicide this past spring after succumbing to a state of learned helplessness and hopelessness after years of begging for funding and assistance for his much needed shelter. Essentially, Canadian women's domestic violence organizations locked arms and blocked Mr. Silverman from the funding trough. The same thing happens to organizations like DAHMW in the United States.

The repeated message to organizations that want to help male domestic violence victims seems to be, "Be grateful for the few scraps of government funding that drop from the table and if you complain about the disparity, you won't even get that." The reality is that most governments are willfully blind to and/or profit from the suffering and victimization of their male citizens. Since men are currently the most underserved group of domestic violence victims, one would think funding the few organizations that help this population would receive priority from state and federal programs. Instead, male abuse victims are begrudgingly acknowledged, that is if they are acknowledged at all.

According to RADAR (Respecting Accuracy in Domestic Abuse Reporting), less than 10% of the United States OVW's (Office of Violence Against Women) funding is used to help male victims. A big part of the problem lies in the very names of the OVW and the VAWA (Violence Against Women Act). "Violence against women" is exclusionary and ignores half of all domestic violence victims. Even worse, it demonizes men as perpetrators and women as victims in the majority of domestic violence cases, which simply is not true.

It also doesn't help that the U.S. Department of Justice refuses to fund research about male victims of domestic violence. On page 6 of the DOJ's solicitation for proposals on intimate partner violence and stalking, they have a section that explicitly states what kind of projects they will not fund, including:

> Proposals for research on intimate partner violence against, or stalking of, males of any age.

It is hard to imagine in this day and age that any victim of domestic violence is ignored, scoffed at or denied support, but this is precisely what we do to male victims. It will come as no surprise to many of you reading this that men are approximately 40% to 50% of domestic violence victims. Sadly, most people are still woefully ignorant about domestic violence in large part due to persistently dishonest and misleading public awareness campaigns, data gathered via unscientific methodology and woozles like the 1 in 4 woozle about rape on college campuses.

Despite the abundance of peer-reviewed research on male domestic violence victims and female perpetrators, most domestic violence awareness campaigns focus exclusively on female victims as if our society isn't already well aware that women can be victims of domestic violence. Many domestic violence organizations persist in publishing long ago debunked statistics that portray women as the victim and men as the primary aggressors in the majority of domestic violence cases.

Raising Public Awareness about Male Victims of Domestic Violence

In His Own Words

In an effort to bring attention to the pandemic of male domestic violence victims and female abusers, we will concurrently publish an In His Own Words post on both AVoiceForMen and Shrink4Men every day in October. These posts will be from men who are or have been victims of domestic violence.

Heterosexual men aren't the only invisible domestic violence victims. The two other populations that are also egregiously ignored are individuals in same sex relationships and the transgendered. We welcome your stories, too.

If you would like to share your story about domestic violence, please send it to shrink4men@gmail.com. We are looking for written narratives and/or audio or video recordings that describe or illustrate the abuse you have suffered. If you have an audio or video file of your wife, girlfriend, ex, etc., in the midst of an abusive episode, we will publish those as well.

> Please adhere to the following guidelines:
> 1. Limit written testaments to no more than 2000 words and send as a Microsoft Word Document.
> 2. Use paragraph breaks, spellcheck, etc.
> 3. Please send video/audio recordings in a format that can be readily uploaded to YouTube.
> 4. If you send and audio/video recording, also provide a written description of the file (i.e., the circumstances leading up to the abuse episode).
> 5. Edit out identifying information before sending Word, video or audio files.
> 6. If your abuse case is already a matter of public record (e.g., in a newspaper or online publication), you may use identifying information.
> 7. Use DV AWARENESS SUBMISSION in the subject header of your email.
> Due to time constraints, we may not be able to use submissions that require a great deal of editing, so please try to have your materials in the best shape possible before sending.
> Additionally, please consider including some of the following in your submissions:
> - Who is or was your abuser? Wife, girlfriend, fiancée, ex, grandmother, mother, sister, grandmother, aunt, etc.?
> - How long did the abuse go on?
> - What kind of abuse? Emotional, physical, parental alienation, financial, smear campaigns, stalking, false allegations of abuse, sexual, falsely obtained restraining order and other abuse via the courts and law > enforcement, etc.?

> - When did you realize what you were experiencing was abuse?
> - Did you have difficulty believing you were being abused? If so, why?
> - Did you tell anyone you were being abused? Friends, family, therapist, clergy, police? What was their reaction?
> - If you were physically abused and called the police, what happened? If you did not call the police, why didn't you?
> - What is your message to other men and boys who are being abused?

The time has come for men's issues groups

VFM News and Commentary · 2 October 2013 · Archived copy · Original

As I have referenced here many times over the past several months, A Voice for Men has been working in conjunction with the National Coalition for Men (NCFM) to develop the infrastructure for assisting college students with the creation of men's issues groups on campuses across the US and elsewhere. Well, we finally get to show you what we are talking about.

This video, created and narrated by Tom Golden is the first in a series designed to reach out to college students everywhere; to find those who see the need for men's issues groups, who want to start them in their own schools, and to help them do that. Please feel free to download this video and mirror it on your Youtube Channel, or to embed it on your blog.

Also, you can post it to your facebook accounts and tweet a link or use any other form of social media to help spread the word. Let's make this happen. PE

Michael Bolen gets it right – and wrong

Dean Esmay · 2 October 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Michael Bolen of the Huffington Post was apparently at the Miles Groth lecture so many of us went to. I'd say he gets a C+ for his reportage, which is better than the usual reporting we see on men's human rights issues, where D- or F are the more usual grade.

First, let's start with what Michael got right:

- He decided not to call us stupid
- He admits to finding himself agreeing with some things
- He noticed there are men on the margins
- He admits there is a culture of male silence
- He talks about shared custody of children, unhealthy perceptions of masculinity, declining rates of university enrollment, spousal abuse, and suicide as if hey, men may have legitimate concerns in these areas as something other than as feckless or violent brutes.
- He acknowledges a general lack of sympathy for men.
- In probably his biggest breakthrough, he acknowledges that suicide is overwhelmingly a male issue.
- He includes a HuffPo video wherein AVfM contributor Warren Farrell is allowed to speak at length without interruption or mocking, and where others speaking unapologetically about men's issues are also not mocked.
- He looked for misogyny and admitted he didn't find any

So Michael, thanks for all that. Seriously. But, here's what you got wrong:

Dan Perrins had a reason for that pink beard you were mocking: he raised over $12,000 for A Voice for Men and CAFE by offering to do various things to his beard, one of which was to dye it red (it came out pink). Oh, and he jokingly offered to let a feminist shave him for $20K, not $20. He didn't seriously believe anyone would take him up on it, but given his treatment by feminists in that very same place he was standing, it would be a dangerous thing for him to offer, which is what made it so funny. Here's a video of him taken very near the spot where you guys snapped that photo of him:

Maybe if you'd talked to Dan and asked him a question or two you would have learned all that, and realized what the inspiration was, instead of just mocking him for his appearance.

By the way that video features the same Dan Perrins and the same feminist who sang "Cry Me A River" when Dan tried to tell her about a fellow MRA's husband who threw himself under a train because of family court abuse. Screaming and taunting and singing in Dan's face. Dan's a man who's suffered serious abuse at the hands of an ex- and has PTSD from mistreatment by her and the Canadian legal system, but like most abused men he just sat there and took it from the psycho who was publicly abusing him without provocation. It's all right there in that un-edited video taken from my very own personal camera, Michael.

Michael also noted the presence of women there at the Miles Groth lecture, but didn't appear to want to talk to any of them. If he'd looked around maybe he'd have encountered an MRA named Brenda, who is close friends with that pink-bearded Danny, and had this message from a few months ago about her dead husband:

If you didn't find Brenda, you almost certainly would have found a woman with a story about as tragic as hers. There are plenty of them out there.

Now, we shouldn't just look to women to discuss men's issues–why shouldn't men have a voice, without the necessity of women being present?–but what we find is that guys like you, Michael, will tend to listen to women a little more attentively on these things. So you know, maybe what a female MRA like her (again, her name is Brenda) has to say above will penetrate for you and some of your readers.

This leads to another thing wrong, Michael: your headline. Now, I know writers don't always get to write their own headlines, but you imply in your article that you had some choice about it, so for now I'll put you at least partly to blame for this bizarre opener:

- "The Men's Rights Movement Doesn't Have To Be Anti-Feminist"

You know what? Tell it to the feminists.

If you'd just said "The Feminist movement doesn't have to be anti-MRA," maybe we'd even agree with you. They don't have to be, but they choose to be. In our experience, they almost unfailingly oppose us. And they have chosen to be anti-MRA for decades–yes, decades. If you'd asked us we could have told you that, and provided you with proof.

Those of us who've been in the trenches fighting for the interests of boys and men, some of us likely before you were born, have found that while feminists are not the cause of all our woes, and feminists are not the only issue or only problem, feminists have routinely shown themselves to be contemptuous, dismissive, and abusive, and to frequently be the first to oppose us when we ask for simple things like equality under the law.

If you want us to stop being anti-feminist, here's a suggestion: get all your feminist buddies to start owning it when feminists lie, when they make unsubstantiated claims, when they marginalize victims, when they blame victims, when they mock and shame the wounded, when they abuse, and when they excuse murder–yes, murder. (By the way, how many men do you think get away with murder with the excuse of "I was abused" like Hedda Nussbaum or Nicole Ryan? Just curious.)

We have heard the "Not All Feminists Are Like That" line so many times it's pathetic. Our standing answer now: prove it. We don't think you can. We think all you'll find is feminists who either (A) are genuinely misandrist, or (B) accept toxic, misandrist ideas unthinkingly and uncritically, empowering group A knowingly or unknowingly.

And if you want to know why we think so, walk up to one of us–you know, one of us who's actually well-studied and versed on the issues and not just a random person who may not be prepared with a lot of information off the top of their heads–and ask us. We don't bite you know.

Now on to other things you got wrong, Michael. Let me quote you again:

…And while there were certainly some hateful people in attendance…

You don't bother to name any of them, although after mentioning a sinister "dark undercurrent" with no specificity, you did mention the evil kitten-eater Paul Elam, who is apparently hateful because he wrote an article which you'd think anyone who believes in equality would agree with: he said that hitting someone in self-defense should be, but often isn't, considered justified.

You also claimed that women are far more likely to be sexually assaulted than men are, and used a summary report from StatsCanada on that. Positive points for sourcing. Negative points for not thinking to ask any of the numerous men's activists there about it. As it happens, I was there in Toronto, quite near where Dan was standing when you got that picture of him. And as it also happens, I talked about some of the reasons why you shouldn't uncritically accept such numbers in an episode of Huffington Post Live about a year ago. No really, check it out:

If you and your readers are interested, Michael, I could give you an entire essay on why you shouldn't take that number at face value. Or if you aren't interested in me, I can hook you up with people with more credentials who can tell you more. Just ask, you've got my Twitter, and I'm easy to find otherwise.

But even if you do accept those StatsCanada numbers at face value, what does that say about a whole host of issues that have little or nothing to do with sexual assault? Hey, here's something by one of your fellow Canadians, about an obscure nation called "Country C," that may help you understand why there are issues other than sex crimes to talk about:

See if you can guess where “Country C” is before the video is over.

So anyway, where was the dark undercurrent, where were the hateful people? Or was it all just evil Paul Elam who thinks self-defense should be OK, and the goofy pink-bearded guy who raised over $12,000 with that funny beard and little joke of his?

Oh, and there was the final thing you got wrong, in my eyes. You said:

> Men are still the dominant sex in our society.

Let me share with you one final video. It’s by another contributor to AVfM, Glen Poole. Like you, Glen tries to avoid bashing feminism. He even bows to feminist sensibilities now and then. But watch this all the way through and then tell me you can, with a straight face, say men are the “dominant” sex. in our society, and women by inference at the bottom:

Oh, and note this: Glen tends to refuse to be mean to feminists. Their response, when they don’t do their best to ignore him completely, is to mock him. Is there some reason the rest of us should not take a lesson from that? He gave that lecture a few years ago, but why am I pretty sure this is the first time you’ve even seen it?

Still Michael: props. You did a much better job than most people, you showed some open-mindedness, and you demonstrated that you could listen and learn.

Now as it happens, I’ll be in Toronto again for the CAFE-sponsored lecture by A Voice for Men’s Contributing Editor Karen Straughan, aka Girl Writes What, in January. Maybe, since she’s a woman, you’ll be more willing to listen to her and what she has to say on these things. But I’ll give you an open invitation: find me, and I”ll tell you more about what I think you’re missing in the Men’s Human Rights Movevement, why men are not the “dominant sex” any more than women are, and why feminism has repeatedly proven to many of us that despite its nice words it is frequently toxic when it comes to men’s issues.

I don’t drink so I won’t buy you a beer, but I will shake your hand, buy you a coffee, and answer as many questions as you’d like.

It’s an open invitation. You know where to find me, here in the “dark underbelly” among the “hateful people.”

In His Own Words: Violent alcoholic wife attacks

Dr. Tara J. Palmatier · 2 October 2013 · Archived copy · Original

In His Own Words is a joint effort between DAHMW (Domestic Abuse Helpline for Men and Women), Shrink4Men and AVoiceForMen to help raise awareness about the invisible victims of domestic violence: Men. If you would like to submit your story, please follow the guidelines at the end of this article.

Abusive personalities are bad enough sober. Add alcohol to the mix and it can exacerbate their cruelty and craziness, often to the point of physical violence. The man featured in today's In His Own Words experienced this firsthand. He didn't walk on eggshells with his ex; he dodged flying beer bottles.

"Gabu" joined the Shrink4Men Forum a few years ago because he was at the end of his rope trying to protect himself and his son from his wife's abuse. He used his journal to document what he was experiencing to create a reality-checking mechanism in the face of some very extreme gaslighting, projection, drunken rages, name-calling and physical, emotional and sexual abuse.

I strongly recommend that anyone in an abusive relationship DDD (Document! Document! Document!) and ABR (Always Be Recording) for the same reasons Gabu documented the abuse he suffered. This is especially important if you are a man who is being abused by a woman. You may not be believed (especially by law enforcement and the court system) if you do not have evidence.

> Violent Alcoholic Wife Attacks
> March 22nd. Wife, 12-year old son and I meet my mother and her fiancé for dinner. Once we're at the restaurant, wife orders a Cosmo "strong." I think to myself, "Oh, great," because of her problems with alcohol.
> Wife and my mother split a carafe of wine after her Cosmo and we go to my mom's house to share photos of our holiday last month. All is going well until wife opens another bottle of wine. Soon after, I hear her pushing my mother about selling some property. I mean she just keeps on riding her about it. I don't see why as it's none of our business.
> Finally my mother says, "Well, it's not my decision, so that's where we are on this." Son, mom's fiancé and I are in the other room. I hear wife and my mother whispering and it sounds heated. Then the two of them go upstairs. We all follow to make sure they're okay. It's also getting late and we have an hour's drive home.
> Wife is staggering around and is in my mother's face yelling at her. My mother is also visibility intoxicated and the two of them are re-hashing past incidents when they've felt slighted by each other. They're accusing each other of causing so much pain, how they both have tried to be accepting of one another for my sake, etc. Wife gets more boisterous, calling my mom a bitch and other names as my mom's fiancé, our son and I stand there in disbelief. I let wife go for a bit, as I decided to stop "saving" her when she does this stuff. She is an adult and can pay the consequences for her actions.
> Finally, I get wife to stop and we leave. For most of the ride home she's belittling me, saying that I chose "Mommy's side" (not true as I was completely neutral during this).
> Once we're home, wife goes upstairs and I go to our son's room to explain that what happened is a good example of how NOT to behave. He understands and gets ready for bed, as it's really late now. Wife enters the kitchen and I go upstairs. I hear our son go down to the kitchen and beg wife to stop drinking.
> It just kills me as she cannot, or will not see what she is doing to him. I can't imagine how uncomfortable that must have been for him when that was going on! "Please just do it for me," he says. "Please stop drinking." My heart hurts hearing him say that to her.
> Wife comes to bed and asks if I'll hold her. "No thanks," I say. Then she starts more of her crap, so I get my pillow and head downstairs to the couch. Five minutes later she comes out of the bedroom, flips on the lights and tries to get me to go upstairs. I had the blanket over my head, as I knew she would come out and do her classic flip on the lights move.

She sees that she's not getting anywhere and heads back upstairs leaving the lights on. A few minutes later she comes back and tries the "nice guy" routine. I don't respond and she changes tactics — the "bad guy" routine. That's the one where I ruined her life and she tells me about all the men she's going to f*ck after I'm gone, no one will want me, etc. She transitions back and forth between the two routines a few more times. I continue to ignore her, so she escalates and punches me on the top of my head.

At this point, I've had enough, get up, sit her down on the couch and ask her to stop the nonsense. She jumps up and punches me in the head again. I go upstairs, get dressed, pack my overnight bag, grab my workbag and laptop and head for the door. Wife blocks the door and says all kinds of things in a desperate attempt to get me to stay. She loves me. She's just sick of my mother's sh*t. She'll do anything if I don't leave. She'll f*ck me if I want, etc. At this point, I'm thinking to myself that she's already f*cked — in the head!

I leave and she grabs onto my coat. I pull away and get in my car. She screams, "I hate you!!!" (the neighbors will love that at 1am!) and slams the door. I head to the hotel to get some sleep.

April 23rd. Came home asked wife if she wanted to talk after the most recent fight when she complained I wasn't "reaching out to [her] enough." She said nothing, so I went to read the paper in the kitchen. After awhile, she joins me and says she feels inadequate compared to me. I'm good at my job, successful, etc. I say it's not a competition; our marriage is supposed to be a partnership. She gets miffed and says it is a competition.

Then she tells me nobody likes me because I am so obnoxious and sarcastic to everyone. She tells me our son doesn't like me for the same reasons. Then she says she isn't sure if she wants to be in this relationship and that she sought out someone else for an emotional affair because I wasn't close to her. I again say that I can't feel close to someone who belittles me when they get upset about ANYTHING.

I go to the grocery store. When I return she says she is so surprised and hurt that I have not reached out to her. I reminded her that she just told me she's not sure she wants to be in this relationship, so the onus is on her to make that move.

Out of nowhere, she claims that after I go out with my friends I am horny the next day and that proves I'm gay. I tell her that it's because I had a break from her and forgot what she was like for a little while. She replies that I should go f*ck (my best friend). She also says that I should go fuck my ex girlfriend (a woman I dated 20+ years ago!!) because she "knows I want to." This comment is made immediately after she told me I'm gay?! She kicks the footstool at me; I put it back onto its legs. She grabs the glass of microbrew that I had just poured and throws it against the wall. Beer and glass now cover the area where our son plays his Xbox. Very nice.

She makes joking comments about my manhood and penis size then grabs the glass coffee table and goes to throw it at me. I grab her in self-defense and push her onto the couch to stop her. I can tell she's drunk again. I go upstairs, find her stash and dump the bottle of wine and the small bottle of Jack Daniels. I go to check on her and see her dumping my other 5 microbrews into the sink, I guess in retaliation for getting rid of her stash. I watched to make sure she didn't chug them as she's done in the past.

I go to the basement den to try to relax. She stands at the top of the stairs and, in between other nasty, mean and disgusting comments, says that she did cheat on me. She says it in much in the same manner when she initially confessed she had an emotional affair by spending up to 2 hours a day instant messaging a co-worker. Then she went out to the garage to smoke.

I followed to make sure she didn't do anything to my car or the overnight bag still in my car from the hotel last night. Nope, all secure, so I head back to the den. She returns to the house and says I broke her toe when I stopped her from throwing our glass coffee table at me and is hobbling around complaining about it.

Despite her "broken toe," she goes out to buy more beer for herself. I stay in the basement den in order to avoid her for the rest of the night. She tries a few more times to try and impress her "views" on me, which I ignore. At one point, she is explicitly going off on how she wanted to be f*cked. "Bent over the couch with a > thumb up her ass," she says. Our son's bedroom door is right next to the basement door, so I'm sure he heard whole thing. At 9pm I come up from the basement and watch some TV. At 10pm I try to fall asleep on the couch.

> At 10:15pm she comes out of our bedroom to use the bathroom and goes back to bed. At 10:30pm she comes back out of the bedroom, flips the lights on, uses the bathroom, comes out, stops, turns the bathroom fan on, leaves the lights on and goes back to bed. She knows that the bathroom fan drives me crazy and leaving the light on is also in her top 10 list of favorite ways to torture me. I go upstairs and shut them both off.
> At 10:45pm she is moaning and complaining loudly. I offer her aspirin. She is looking for compassion, but I have little because she was fine enough to go out and get beer for herself. I go back downstairs and she starts knocking loudly on the bedroom wall.
> I'm afraid her selfish tantrum will wake our son, so I rush upstairs and offer to put a pillow under her foot. She starts ripping me a new one. I look her straight in the eye and tell her that she is indeed filled with pure evil.
> Then she starts yet another rant accusing me of being gay. Time for the hotel again. She follows me out making these disgusting sounds with her mouth (simulating a blow job), and when I turn around to face her she has a large ceramic sconce in her hand raised over her head ready to throw at me.
> I duck into to dining room and put on my coat and shoes. She comes down, sees what I'm doing and yells that I'm wasting more money on a hotel again. She says she'll stop (the abuse) if I don't go. I leave and get to the hotel around midnight. Glad that I planned ahead and had an emergency overnight bag with clothes for a couple days in my car while she went out for beer.

Post-script: Gabu's divorce is almost finished. Toward the end of the marriage, he was able to obtain a protective order against his wife and had her arrested after she tried to push him down a staircase. She is still awaiting the criminal trial, which she's been able to have continued three times now. Unfortunately, she has been able to completely alienate their son from Gabu thus far, which I suppose isn't difficult when you have a family judge who doesn't enforce his own orders.

Thank you Gabu for sharing your story. I truly hope you are able to undo the damage your abusive ex has done to your son. I also hope the criminal court throws the book at your ex.

Pauline Hopkins waxes pathetic

Paul Elam · 2 October 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Pauline Hopkins is an editor who works for the Melbourne based publishing house, Spinifex Press; ironic employment given her apparent difficulties with reading comprehension.

That irony is softened, however, when you consider that Spinifex is a feminist publisher and Hopkins is just another indoctrinaire who blurs the already meager line between being ideological and being intellectually impaired.

Case in point, her recent article in Daily Life titled, "The group that believe [sic] violence against women is a conspiracy."

I am sure you can guess which group that would be.

Hopkins was inspired by a sticker recently found on the entryway door to Spinifex that read, "False rape allegation: will your son be next?" It also displayed the URL of a certain website dedicated to the issues of men and boys, false rape claims being among them.

Daunted by her inability to contend with that message, she set about digging through the pages of AVFM until she felt like she had something to attack.

Her deflecting topic of choice was our take on the ideologically governed domestic violence industry, and the idea that those who professionally and financially profit from a distorted, gendered model of violence might just benefit from an abundance of female victims and male perpetrators.

I know, it's crazy, but that's how we roll.

To support her point, Hopkins takes a few glancing shots at AVFM Australian News Director Dr. Greg Canning. She attempts to buttress her attacks by mocking the idea that feminists have sought to unreasonably expand the definition of domestic violence to include highly misguided definitions.

Her problem, however, is that this is exactly what has happened.

To begin with, let's take a look at how violence is defined, hopefully without the help of the Feminist Fictionary™.

According to the World Health Organization in 2002, violence is defined as:

> "[T]he intentional use of physical force or power, threatened or actual, against oneself, another person, or against a group or community, that either results in or has a high likelihood of resulting in injury, death, psychological harm, maldevelopment or deprivation."

The bold text is mine.

With that in mind I just spent a few seconds doing a Google search on "What is domestic violence Australia." The first non-sponsored return was some nifty definitions of domestic violence from Reachout.com. To be fair, they did actually start by defining violence based on whether or not it involved someone being, uh, you know, violent. From there, however, it takes the feminist footpath and wanders into Spinitopia.

They inform us that violence is defined by things like, "pretending not to notice someone's presence, conversation or value."

There you have it. Husbands, if you don't listen to your wife, it is domestic violence. So is not "noticing her value."

Lack of compliments = domestic violence.

Of course, I am using the terms husband and wife in this context as we all know that women never fail to pay attention to their husbands. They also always listen to whatever he has to say, even during football games. And of course they are loathe to not notice his, uh, value.

From there Reachout moves on to even more egregious forms of domestic violence.

Ladies, a man "keeping you financially dependent," or, as we used to say in saner days, his going out and working every day to support you, is domestic violence. Of course we all know that women never choose to be financially dependent. So many of them would gladly turn in watching daytime television in their pajamas for a shovel and life on a road crew, but some bastard is always holding them back.

That is violence.

He is also being violent if he is "making you ask for money unreasonably." Now, Reachout did not say exactly who got to determine what was reasonable when asking someone to give you money, but I am guessing here it is the person asking for it, as the person having to cough it up might have funny ideas to the contrary.

He might also be a he.

What is most fascinating here is how the rules switch. First, if you have to depend on him, it is domestic violence. But if he does not allow you to depend on him when you think it is reasonable, it is also domestic violence.

Dependence = domestic violence.

Arrest all parents immediately.

It is enough to make your head spin. Well, unless you're a grammatically challenged editor for a feminist publishing house.

Reachout goes on to cover a broad (I do not mean that in a sexist way) range of things that are violent without actually being violent, including spiritual, social and other forms of non-violent violence. They are very thorough.

They are also very full of shit, just like Pauline Hopkins.

Just how full of shit she is, Hopkins seems deliriously intent on proving. She continues her carnival of canards with the standard suspect sources:

> "The most recent statistics from the Department of Justice in Victoria showing that 80% of domestic violence victims are female and more than 90% of perpetrators are men. But this data, as well as the VicHealth data showing male intimate partner violence is found to be the leading contributor to death, disability and illness for women aged 15 to 44 years, is dismissed by Canning as lies."

It is probably because they are lies. But again, we roll kinda funny around here.

Feel free to read through the "report" for yourself. You might notice rather quickly that it is not focused on domestic violence, but rather on violence against women – two entirely different subjects.

That is the whole point of the report, all the way down to the impressive list of feminist ideologues who provided "research," e.g. Michael Flood.

Flood has been caught with his hand in the gender cookie jar on more than one occasion. For instance, he claimed the following:

> "Women are far more likely than men to experience a range of controlling tactics and experience violence after separation. Women's perpetration of violence is much more often than men's in self-defence. Men are more likely to perpetrate… for instrumental reasons."

The truth about this whopper is provided by Australia's 1 in 3 Campaign:

> The Australian Institute of Family Studies (1999)15 observed that, post-separation, fairly similar proportions of men (55 per cent) and women (62 per cent) reported experiencing physical violence including threats by their former spouse. Self-defence is cited by women as the reason for their use of IPV (including severe violence such as homicide) in a small minority of cases (from 5 to 20 per cent). After analysing for verbal aggression, fear, violence and control by each gender, husbands are found to be no more controlling than wives.

Also, as reported by 1 in 3, "Men's Health Australia contacted Dr. Flood to ask for references to back his claims but he was unable to provide any. These 'statistics' remain uncorrected."

Pauline Hopkins
For the sake of dear Pauline and a few grins, let's consider some actual, sweeping research on the incidence of domestic violence by gender . Martin Fiebert's bibliography examines 286 scholarly investigations: 221 empirical studies and 65 reviews and/or analyses, which demonstrate that women are as physically aggressive, or more aggressive, than men in their relationships with their spouses or male partners. The aggregate sample size in the reviewed studies exceeds 371,600.

I will do what Hopkins and Flood, et al, can't and won't; include valid citation.

http://www.csulb.edu/~mfiebert/assault.htm

What is that you say? Fiebert is too American for you? OK, fair enough. Let's look at Australian research. The following is from the Australian Bureau of Statistics Personal Safety Survey (2006), the largest and most recent survey of violence in Australia. It found that:

> 29.8% (almost one in three) victims of current partner violence since the age of 15 were male;
> 24.4% (almost one in four) victims of previous partner violence since the age of 15 were male;
> 29.4% (almost one in three) victims of sexual assault during the last 12 months were male;
> 26.1% (more than one in four) victims of sexual abuse before the age of 15 were male.

Also, the SA Interpersonal Violence and Abuse Survey (1999) found that:

> 32.3% (almost one in three) victims of reported domestic violence by a current or ex-partner (including both physical and emotional violence and abuse) were male;
> 19.3% (almost one in ?ve) victims of attempted or actual forced sexual activity since they turned 18 years of age were male (excluding activity from partners or ex-partners.

Keep in mind that this is survey data, and males are proven to significantly under report.

A British Crime Survey (BCS) found that only 19% of male victims would tell someone in a professional organization that they had been a victim of domestic violence– less than half the number of female victims (44%). It also found that 28% of male victims do not tell anyone–more than twice the proportion for women.

http://www.theyworkforyou.com/wrans/?id=2010-12-08b.29433.htm

A Canadian study reported that women are four times more likely to report partner violence to police than men.[1]

Of course, all this is elementary to those interested in evidence based solutions to social problems. It has been an established fact for decades that domestic violence is not a gendered problem. It has also been proven that men and boys suffer from a lack of services and sex-based discrimination from a domestic violence industry with an agenda to maximize profits from disinformation about the very victims they purport to serve.

Hopkins scoffs at these ideas, even as she offers herself as personal proof that the problem exists. Nowhere is her agenda and her bigotry more obvious than in the following:

> "[M]ale intimate partner violence is found to be the leading contributor to death, disability and illness for women aged 15 to 44 years."

Even a cursory glance at the data (real data) on causes of injury and death from the Australian Bureau of Statistics, dismisses this for the bullshit that it is.

More importantly, Hopkins making this statement can only lead to three possible conclusions. One, she is a liar and can't be trusted. Two, she is too ignorant to have a valid opinion on domestic violence, or, three, she is both. I am betting three is the lucky number.

The data, which is well qualified in the study quoted by Hopkins, infers a positive correlation between illness, injury and death with domestic violence, not a causal relationship. It implies, among other things, that women who are victims of domestic violence are also likely to be smokers, and to have alcohol problems, and colds.

In that light, it is no more accurate to say that "[M]ale intimate partner violence is found to be the leading contributor to watching television, eating rice cakes and having toenails in women aged 15 to 44 years."

It is complete and utter bullshit. It is also bullshit that Vic Health has been called on publicly. Here is their response to being called out on their distortion, reported by the 1 in 3 Campaign:

> "As the media release relates to a past event, no correction will be made to the document on the website. However we will ensure more consistent wording is used in the future"–in other words they are happy for their website to continue to mislead the public.

And so is Pauline Hopkins.

The remainder of her article was a mishmash of feminist whines du jour which pretty much boil down to the idea that there are not enough rich, powerful women to make them happy, with nary a notion of the idea that being rich and powerful often requires the presence of a brain and the willingness to use it.

Should we add dumbing women down to the list, alongside creating victims of domestic violence in order to profit from them?

We absolutely should.

The domestic violence industry and the avaricious prigs who run it require stupid, victimized women with no personal agency. That's what they need in order to line their pockets and maintain control. And that is precisely what they work to manufacture.

As I took a read through Pauline Hopkins' article it was more than clear that she is a good faith player on team bullshit, taking any woman she can for a long, slow, stupid ride as long as it ends up with a little cha-ching for Spinifex Press — and consequently, herself.

Oh, and that sticker? The one she reacted to without writing about? It is not representative of A Voice for Men wearing tin foil hats and obsessing on conspiracies.

It is just KARMA.

Judge Kelly craps on First Amendment

VFM News and Commentary · 2 October 2013 · Archived copy · Original

West Virginia's corrupt Judge Michael Kelly has issued a blatant 1st-amendment defying order in order to protect the secret kangaroo courts he presides over:

IN THE FAMILY COURT OF PUTNAM COUNTY, WEST VIRGINIA

IN RE: THE MARRIAGE OF:

DOLORES JEAN HALBURN MARTIN, Petitioner

and Civil Action No. 11-D-556

MARK VANCE HALBURN, Respondent

ORDER RESTRICTING ACCESS TO FAMILY COURT WING OF THE KANAWHA COUNTY JUDICIAL BUILDING BY MARK V. HALBURN

Given that Mark Vance Halburn has recently brought a camera into the Family Court wing of the Kanawha County Judicial Annex Building, where confidential proceedings are held, and has entered the wing without any of his matters being scheduled for hearing that day, and because special security arrangements must be made when he enters the wing, disrupting the normal flow of business and duties, it is hereby ORDERED that Mark Vance Halburn is RESTRAINED AND ENJOINED from entering the Family Court wing of the Kanawha County Judicial Annex Building except on days on which a matter in which he is a party has been properly scheduled for hearing by the Court. On such days, he may enter the wing no earlier than fifteen (15) minutes before the scheduled hearing time.

Furthermore, Mark Vance Halburn shall at no time communicate with the Court or its staff by phone, fax, email, text message or any other electronic means.

The Clerk of the Court is directed to mail or provide certified copies of this Order to each party and/or counsel of record upon its entry.

Entered into before and approved by me this 10th day of September 2013.

Mike Kelly

Family Court Judge Mike Kelly

Publisher Appeals Unconstitutional Order

[image]

"This order is further proof that Judge Michael J. Kelly is insane," says Putnam*LIVE*.com Publisher Mark Hallburn. "You can't ban a reporter from a courtroom hallway. It's a blatant violation of The First Amendment of the United States Constitution. The Halls of Justice belong to the people, not to the Cretins in Black Dresses. Send Kelly to Leavenworth-for life!"

Kelly issued the order, September 10th, 2013, after Hallburn brought his camera into the courtoom hallway and attempted to take photographs of the above portrait and KISRA brochures on the bulletin boards. Another brochure was placed under the glass covering of the Respondent's table in Kelly's courtroom. Hallburn says cameras are banned there. "Another First Amendment violation."

The First Amendment reads: "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances."

"Kelly sits on KISRA's Board of Directors," explains Hallburn, "And orders people to go to KISRA for anti-Domestic Violence programs. This is a conflict of interest."

[image]

Of course, Hallburn has reported Kelly's conflict of interest. And, since Kelly sits on Hallburn's divorce case, (another conflict of interest) Hallburn has to appear in court, and observed that much of the KISRA material has been removed since Hallburn reported about the issue.

"He apparently reads Putnam*LIVE*.com," says Hallburn. "That or the West Virginia Supreme Court of Appeals slapped him on the wrist and told him to remove the KISRA material."

This is not the first time Kelly has retaliated against Hallburn. In 2012, Hallburn complained about Kelly to the West Virginia Supreme Court. Kelly used that as an excuse to keep Hallburn from taking his son, Matthew, out of West Virginia. Kelly also retaliated by refusing to let Mark's son, Matthew, visit Mark's mother, Nancy, before she died, August 5th, 2012.

When Hallburn protested Kelly's improper interference into his family's rights to visit, Kelly called Hallburn a "disgrace" to his mother. "Kelly is a disgrace," says Hallburn. "I can't wait to publish that video." (The video has been ordered and has yet to be delivered.)

"Kelly's ongoing misbehavior is a classic example of the daily corruption in the West Virginia court system," says Hallburn. "A lawsuit against Kelly was tossed by Judge Hatcher who lied about documents that we filed and he says were not. The West Virginia Supreme Court rejected the appeal. This corruption is appaling!"

Hallburn has filed an Emergency Motion to Overturn Kelly's ban on Hallburn's presence in the courtroom hallways to Putnam Circuit Judge Phillip M. Stowers. Hallburn cites The First Amendment's protection of Freedom of the Press. As of this publication, Stowers has not ruled on Hallburn's appeal.

In addition, Hallburn plans to file a complaint, about Kelly, to the West Virginia Judicial Investigation Commission.

“They will likely come up with any excuse to let Kelly off the hook. They always have. The JIC is just a group of ‘Good old boys’ covering the backsides of corrupt ‘Good old boys,'” says Hallburn.

“Kelly is a vindictive jackass who should have been tossed from the bench years ago,” says Hallburn. “But there isn’t enough integrity in the West Virginia Supreme Court to get rid of Kelly. Rogue and corrupt judges, including Kelly, need to be held accountable for their misbehavior. Since the supreme court has failed to remove Kelly, the voters will have their chance, in 2016. I hope they kick his sorry carcass to the curb.”

Gender Pay Gap – Between numbers and propaganda

There was a time when there was still an open market of ideas. Feminism was not the establishment (or the man) and thus it was still open for questioning. One of the first arguments that appeared on that (still) open market from the feminist camp was the argument that is generically called the gender pay gap (GPG).

To be fair, in the meantime, even some of the feminists have stopped using that argument and some feminists have actually taken steps to dismantle it[1]. However, as has always the case with feminism, those voices were just silenced or shunned into conformity and the pay gap myth keeps rearing its ugly head more often than a rational human being can bear. This argument is particularly thrown around in the European Union, especially when preaching to populations that, until recently, had been exempted from feminist propaganda by the Iron Curtain, and those populations also have a more limited understanding on how a market economy works thanks to the undoubted impact of 50 years of Communism.

In this article, we'll try to dismantle the GPG myth by using the same evidence and studies as those feminists who claim that the GPG is real, and we will confirm, one more time, that many ideologues (including feminist ideologues) are not reading the documents they present as evidence for their position.

1. The argument and the basic principles

The GPG argument, in its full version, sounds like this:

> Women are paid X% less for the same work because of systemic gender discrimination.

"X" is a variable that can be assigned a value between 10 and 30, depending on the agenda of the ideologue that is throwing the GPG "argument" around, and it also depends on the degree of indoctrination that that particular ideologue has been subjected to. X also varies on the degree of knowledge that the ideologue has regarding the way in which a market economy works.

"X% less" is a claim without context (not necessarily a false claim) and it also ignores the quite many cases in which "less" becomes factually false since there are quite a lot of instances when women earn significantly more in the same field. We placed the rest of the argument in italic because of the following reasons:

1. Because it's false.

2. Because "the same work" does not mean "the same experience, the same background, the same education and the same individual abilities" and all the other relevant factors that need to be taken into account when one wants to study the validity of such claim.

3. Because it implies the acceptance of a rather conspiratorial way of thinking which can only make sense in feminist circles. However, these kinds of assertions need to be proven in the real world and proof regarding the supposed "patriarchal oppressive gender structure" has failed to appear and one can safely wager that it will never appear because it's a made up concept.

One basic principle that we take into account during this article is that people are different from one another. Not only men and women are different – but all people are different from one another. It is a fundamental principle of logic – the fact that the individual A cannot be completely equal with the individual B, unless B is just another notation for the same individual A.

Given that we're talking about different people, trying to grant equal chances amongst all of them is a cute ideal, albeit impossible to accomplish in the real life for the simple reason that people are born with different capacities. But, trying to enforce identical (or equal) results between them is not only a Marxist ideal but also a highly utopian ideal that cannot be accomplished even partially, no matter how much pressure one might apply.

Another basic principle that we will use is the different economic productivity associated to different works. No matter how much some individuals would love for us to live in world every individual earns exactly X dollars and everyone is equal – this not only will never happen, but even if one were to force it through coercion, it will still collapse back to market economic and thus in different economic productivity associated to different works.

Why is that? Because if one million individuals earn exactly X dollars per month for one year – at the end of the year, some of those individuals will have savings of X-N dollars and some of them will have debts of X^2 dollars. Perpetuating this system for 10 years, for instance, will lead to individuals that will have $X^{2\circ}$ dollars in savings and open a business, whilst others will reach a level of $10X^2$ in debts. Why will this happen? Because people are different and they invest differently.

Back to the real world, this aspect is being translated through the fact that some areas of work are more economically relevant, whilst others are less relevant and, consequently, some people will earn more and others less. And this will happen no matter some might feel regarding the issue.

That being said, we will analyze the situation starting with Romania, continuing with the entire EU and then proceed towards the US and Asia in looking for the GPG and explain why the GPG argument is false. After that, we will refute some more side-claims about the issue and then recap.

2. The situation in Romania

The feminists laughed with an eye and cried with the other when they claimed that the GPG in Romania is 12.1% which is still "good" since the EU average is 17%. The feminists were unable to explain the difference because it did not fit the narrative that Romania is a patriarchal oppressive nation instead of being the fluffy heaven that Sweden allegedly is.

But the explanation is simple: The labor market in Romania is much less regulated and, although taxed to a high degree, it's still less taxed than most EU nations. The workers in Romania support an average of 42% tax burden, whilst in Sweden, for instance, they support a 62% tax burden when adding all the direct and indirect taxes that working individuals pay.

Moreover, the feminists tried to emphasize that in the "information and communication" sector, the differences in wages between men and women go as high as 16%. Where did they get these numbers? From a communicate of the National Institute of Statistics. The report they cite compares the average salary earnings for October 2011 for the people that worked full time for at least 21 days in that month.

And we go to the 7th page of the communicate[2] in the second table and we see that the report in wages between women and men is 86% in the "information and communication" sector – so the GPG is 14%, not 16 as the feminist propaganda machine claimed. We also see that in the entertainment industry the GPG is 9% and in the healthcare industry the GPG is 12.5%. Well, then the feminists are right, right? Wait a minute…

On the same page, we see that the report between women and men in the "administrative services and support service" is 127.3%. In other words, for every dollar a woman makes, a man earns 72.7 cents. On the same page we see that in the "transportation and storage" industry the report is 111.1% and also on the same page we see that in the construction field the report is 124.3%(!!). Something's rotten in the (former) Kingdom of Romania and the Romanian feminist narrative.

Should men in constructions, support service, transportation or other fields in which the report is over 100% march on the streets? If you think "yes" then you probably have issues regarding understating an economy.

The feminist idea of "gender pay gap" has now become what can best be described as a trope since it implies that it's always women (and always women as whole – because heaven forbid consider individuals and personal choice!) who get the short end of the stick – which we already noticed that it is a false consideration.

If we look closely, we will notice that the top of discrepancies are closed to one another and within the margin of error. The highest discrepancy favoring men is 28.8% and the highest discrepancy favoring women is 27.3%. What does that tells us? It tells us exactly what we mentioned in the introduction: That people are different form one another and there will always be individuals and groups of individuals who are better professionals in one field and worse professionals, as a whole, in another domain.

So, according to this report, women are great at support services, outperforming by over a quarter their male counterparts and men are great at financial services, outperforming by over a quarter their female counterparts. So? What's wrong with that?

The main problem with the GPG argument is that it never takes into account any other aspect than strictly the wage – which is completely unrealistic. Therefore, when we have sensationalist numbers like "women earn X% less than men in the domain Y" – we get a simplistic calculus that doesn't take the real economic dynamics into account. What they basically do is add all the wages that women get and do the same thing with men's wages and compare them. After comparing them, they conclude that "we have systemic gender discrimination" and then they shut down the discussion.
But it's not that simple because macroeconomics is a little bit more complex than that. As we see in Romania (and we will see that this is the case in other countries), there are domains in which women are significantly better and domains in which women are significantly worse – and the same is true for men.

In front of this undeniable reality, the gender ideologues come with a side-argument, arguing that women have "two jobs" because they take care of the house, which cannot be said about men.
One might have gotten away with this argument in 1930s Romania, but after 50 years of communism that literally forced women to go to work – whether they wanted or not – this argument is no longer realistic.

This argument is flawed for two reasons: First of all, it implies that men live with women in the same house almost all the time – which is simply not true. On the contrary, the number of men who refuse to live with women is on the rise and Romania, just like Germany, is facing an ever increasing number of men who simply refuse to play the game or they play it only after severely altering it.

Secondly, this argument presumes that someone is forcing women collectively to do domestic labor. Which is again false. If that were to be true, the number of criminal trials on grounds of forced labor would skyrocket – and not only in Romania, but everywhere, since this argument with "domestic labor" is used everywhere.
Besides, the Romanian market offers entrepreneurship for the "domestic drudgery". Sure, one needs to think about it – but some women already thought of it and now make a lot of money from ironing men's shirts[3]. But beyond the example provided by Oana from Bucharest, it is of high importance to always consider what and how much individuals choose to invest in their human capital and also the individuals' ways of seeing things.
Another reason why the GPG will be reported as being bigger and bigger in Europe is because Eurostat changed its calculation method. This is also the reason why the differences between the numbers reported by the National Institute of Statistics (which gets its data straight from the Labor Ministry) and the Eurostat numbers are different.

For instance, Eurostat claims that the GPG in Romania is 15%[4], even though we already proved that's wrong.

The Eurostat link was provided to us by a feminist academic who tried to argue that the GPG is bigger than 12% and that Romania is a country that "economically oppresses women" – and this was her response to our main argument that GPG is not an adequate number since it doesn't take the whole dynamic into consideration and that GPG is also not exclusively a thing describing females.

Also, the discrepancies between national numbers and Eurostat's numbers is explained by Eurostat themselves[5]:

> According to the new methodology, the indicator concerning the unadjusted gender pay gap covers all employees (there are no restrictions for age and hours worked) of enterprises (with at least ten employees) within industry, construction and services

So, in other words, the Eurostat is comparing the miner that stays 10 hours per day underground with the hotel receptionist.
You don't have to be an economist to realize that such comparison has absolutely no relevance and that it is more than natural that the miner or the rolling mill operator to earn more than the hotel receptionist or the waiter.

We'll come back to the dubious ways of calculating the GPG and looking at the economy through ideological lenses.

3. The situation in the European Union

Just like in the case of Romania, we will use links that we received from feminists who send us those links to prove that the GPG is about women and oppression. We will also use data from Eurostat (and especially their explanation).

We stated earlier that women are wonderful in support services (according to the data available) and also the fact that the GPG favors women in the construction field (which definitely is a hit to the narrative that men conspire collectively to oppress women – since construction is a 90% male profession).

Well, according to Eurostat, the female-favoring GPG in constructions is happening in many other nations – so it's not an anomaly of the patriarchal Romanian economy.

Eurostat reports read[6]:

> While not less than ten Member States registered negative pay gaps in the construction industry, the highest gap (19 %) was observed in the United Kingdom. A negative gender pay gap means that on average women's gross hourly earnings are higher than those or men in that particular sector.
> In 2011, the GPG was negative in 8 Member States: Bulgaria, Italy, Luxembourg, Hungary, Poland, Portugal, Romania and Slovenia.

These numbers prove once again that judging by superficial and ideologically-driven perceptions is rarely leading to a correct judgment.

The feminists were "appalled" that the GPG in education was +9% even though it's a "feminized field" (these were exactly their words). By that rational, men should be "appalled" that the GPG in construction is -24% in Romania because it is a "masculinized" domain.

But things don't work that way. Whilst being a construction worker is definitely a tough job that it's mainly practiced by men, the construction sector doesn't include only trowel, hammer drills, mortar and concrete mixers – but it also includes architects, yard chiefs, interior design experts, etc. The latter are usually better paid. And it is normal to be that way. And, more important, the latter category does not necessarily have to be able to carry bags of cement – which means that those jobs are definitely more welcoming to women who are less physically capable. And, according to official data, women are coming to the field – in such great numbers that they are visible in macroeconomic statistics in 10 nations of Europe.

So what? What's wrong with that? Well, there's certainly nothing wrong with that – but as long as we're being told only half of the story, we are being pointed only towards half of the numbers and we get a lot of misleading propaganda about half of the economic dynamics while giving us the impression that that half is the whole story, myths like the GPG argument will never die. And, unfortunately, very few are willing to actually look at the numbers and use common sense.

An interesting aspect for feminists and statists in general to consider is that the less a market is regulated, the more equal and fair it tends to be. Case in point: Romania is the freest country in the EU regarding telecommunication. This aspect allows Romania to lead the charts in Europe[7] when it comes to internet speeds, internet coverage, lowest prices and any other technical indicator and be the third worldwide in these respects (lagging only behind South Korea and Hong Kong). Another aspect is that Romania is the only country that has a negative GPG in the telecommunication industry[8].

Also, one can notice in the same table[8] that deregulation from a field correlates with a smaller GPG. Case in point: Finland, which has one of the freest energy markets in the EU has a significantly smaller GPG than Romania and Estonia, which are the most regulated energy markets in the European Union. We will explain some of the reasons why this correlation exists.
The same Eurostat reported mentioned earlier says that the GPG is insignificant when it comes to employees aged 30 and below.
Another factor that skews the GPG numbers is tendency of women to massively seek employment in the public sector and running away from the real economy – which is the private sector. This isn't a bad thing in itself – but the bureaucrats themselves are often guilty of suppressing the European economy and the deindustrialization process that's taking place these days thanks to the aberrant "green" regulations imposed by Brussels.

International Labor Organization (ILO) – which is a think tank paid by a highly feminist-oriented and misandric in action institution – the UN – admits, though only with half of the mouth, that the private sector's accomplishments are corrosive to the GPG propaganda and that only the do-nothing and make-work "jobs" in the public sector are coming with very low GPG. In the real world economy (in which performance is being rewarded) GPG usually has two digits, both negative and positive as we already showed earlier. The ILO report reads[9]:

> Across Europe, women are better represented in the public sector than in the private sector, due to the provision of higher salaries, as well as to the existence of a higher proportion of skilled jobs which require a better educated workforce.
> In the UK, 28 per cent of women in the public sector are considered "better educated," compared with just 18 per cent in the private sector. In Lithuania, the number of better educated women working in public sector jobs is double that working in the private sector.[…]
> Even for low-skilled jobs, public service wages generally have been higher than in the private sector and have played a role in reducing gender pay discrimination, particularly in countries with low or no floors for wages in the private sector.
> The progressive replacement of this wage premium for those working in the public sector by a wage penalty, as witnessed in a number of European countries like Hungary, Romania, the Netherlands, affect women in the public sector.

There is one problem with this line of reasoning: It is unnatural for the wages in the public sector to be higher than the private sector. Why? Because the public sector exists thanks to the private sector – not the other way around. As for the "superior education" argument brought forth by ILO – the explanation is quite simple: The diploma factors. Every EU nation has at least one university whose sole purpose is to print diplomas as they don't teach anyone anything. And since in the public sector the wages increase depending on the amount of diplomas and qualifications certificate you can produce – and not depending on your actual performance on the job – it makes perfect sense for the public employees (both women and men) to seek to buy themselves a new diploma.

But ILO says nothing about the countries which have smaller public sectors (like Poland, for instance) and about the fact that the GPG is virtually non-existent (meaning that it is within the margin of error of +/- 2%) in most fields of the private sector. Sure, there are domains in which the GPG is +20% and domains in which it's -20%. And it's normal to be that way (see the second principle in the introduction).

Moreover, ILO's argument regarding the drops in wages in the public sector in Romania and Hungary that would allegedly increase the GPG is not supported by factual reality. Any number you take – be it from the National Institutes or Eurostat – one can clearly see that this is not the case at all. But again, ILO is funded by the UN and the UN has always been eager to make women appear to be victims even when it's blatantly obvious that this is not the case.

But the problem with the ILO report is not only that it is a propaganda piece – but also the fact that it includes lies and distorted views regarding reality. Like this:

> Diane Elson, an Emeritus Professor at the Department of Sociology of the University of Essex, agrees that further cuts would harm gender equality, but believes that many European countries could soon abandon austerity policies.

No, Mrs. Elson. Most European nation will not drop these policies until the EU, or at least the euro currency that's keeping them in an economic prison, will be dismantled. Any half-decent economist can confirm that the financial situation of the EU is horrible, at least – so it's just intellectual masturbation to think that nations could just start go in a governmental spending spree without risking complete default. Even the European Commission, lead by the Maoist Jose Manuel Barroso, admits in a report that the GPG is not really a relevant number regarding gender equality and also admits that counting employees in bulks, without considering the number of hours they work, their age, their experience and other dynamics, does not paint a realistic image. Page 5 from the Commission's report reads[10]:

> The gender pay gap is not an indicator of the overall equality between women and men since it only concerns salaried persons. It must be looked at in conjunction with other indicators linked to the labour market such as different working patterns of women. In most of the countries in which the female employment rate is low (e.g. Malta, Italy, Poland), the pay gap is lower than average, which may reflect a small proportion of low-skilled or unskilled women in the workforce. A high pay gap is usually characteristic of a labour market that is highly segregated (e.g. Estonia, Slovakia) or in which a significant proportion of women work part-time (e.g. Germany, United Kingdom, the Netherlands, Austria). Institutional mechanisms and systems on wage setting can also influence the pay gap.

This report was given to us by a feminist as a "proof" regarding her statements concerning the GPG. Why don't people read their documents before throwing them around? Or perhaps they hope nobody actually does the reading?

Normally, the discussion regarding the legitimacy of the GPG argument should end right here, right now. But it is important to thoroughly evaluate the issue so we can demolish it once and for all.

The report from which we quoted above then continues with claims for which it brings absolutely no evidence. For instance, it insists on the "fact" that there are labor markets strictly segregated by sex through coercion in Europe – but it offers no evidence to back the claim.

Moreover, the Commission's report shoots itself in the foot when it starts quoting the results. For instance, the report writes a lot about the "patriarchal conservative nations" (and brings Slovakia as an example) and then the Commission's propaganda becomes null when they have to give Italy's example.

There is little to no doubt that Italy is probably the second most social conservative nation in the EU, after Poland – though some might argue that Romania and Slovenia are also in the vicinity in this regard.
Well, in Poland, the average GPG is 2% (so within the margin of error) and in Italy, the GPG is -30%. In other words, an Italian man earns 70 euro-cents for every 1 euro earned by a woman. To illustrate the hypocrisy of the European Commission and how it shoots itself in the foot each time it confronts reality, let's read some more from the same report from page 4[10]:

> In every single EU-country women earn less than men.

Then, we roll towards page 7 and see that the report offers us updated numbers according to the International Standard Classification of Occupations. And we read in the page 7 from the same report:

> Italy is the only country where men get paid significantly less (30%) than women

So, just 3 pages later, the EU faces reality and the whole Gender Pay Gap Oppression narrative falls like a house of cards which feminism really is. And again: this link was given to us by a feminist who wanted to convince us that the feminist interpretation of the GPG is a real thing.

Also, this report also confirms, though indirectly, the correlation between small GPG and minimal regulations. On the page 11 we notice that the EU countries with the smallest GPG on the corporate sectors are, in this order, Romania, Cyprus and Bulgaria. In the same time, Sweden and the UK – countries that are suffocated with affirmative actions and feminist culture – are moving further and further in terms of GPG.

Also, in the pages 12 and 13 of the report, one can notice that the -30% GPG in Italy is consistent in almost all domains – thus demolishing for good the statements and premises expressed by the European Commission's report in the first pages.

4. North America and Asia

Many times it has been claimed that whenever a "male superiority on top" is pointed out, there is also a "male superiority" on the bottom. In other words, we usually have mostly men at the bottom, mostly men on top and women somewhere in the middle. This statement is not always true – but it applies perfectly when it comes to GPG and labor force occupation rate in the USA.

From the Federal Reserve Bank's report The Unemployment Gender Gap During the Current Recession we get to find out that men have been (and they still are) the main demographic affected by unemployment – and the recession contributed negatively to further this trend, thus widening the gap. These conclusions are more than important to counteract the feminist propaganda machine that never stops claiming the nonsense that financial crisis is affecting women more. It doesn't. Page 2 from the report reads[11]:

> A breakdown of the employment figures shows that men have been affected more adversely than women during the present economic downturn. Male and female unemployment rates were around the same levels in December 2007, 5.0% and 4.8% respectively. Since then these two unemployment rates have diverged significantly. In August 2009, the male unemployment rate stood at 10.9% while that of females was 8.2%. This 2.7 percentage point difference is the largest unemployment gender gap in the postwar era.

And, whilst men were losing jobs in millions and a quarter more than women, the American culture was talking about giving free contraceptives to… women. The report goes on and in the page 3 reads[11]:

> A closer look at the gross labor flows by gender reveals that men had a significantly higher unemployment inflow rate than women, causing the unemployment gender gap to widen.

But despite these undeniable facts, the propaganda continues that the GPG is about "systemic oppression" and not about more complex factors and about the dynamics of a market economy. And, also, the feminist propaganda machine never ever sees, or at least it turns a blind eye, when pointed to the fact that the GPG goes both ways in most cases. And precisely because it goes both ways, the "systemic gender discrimination" argument is utter rubbish. If male privilege and patriarchy would indeed be real, then why are always more men who are unemployed than women? Also, if patriarchy exists to benefit men, why are men losing jobs in millions (at significantly higher rates than women) in every single recession?

But beyond the raw numbers who leave no room for feminist interpretations, even some reports written by feminist lobbyists are forced to admit that the GPG, if it is to be considered a relevant number at all, is not a good argument to support the thesis of systemic discrimination.

We will now read from the OECD report – The Price of Prejudice: Labour Market Discrimination on the Grounds of Gender and Ethnicity. Starting with the page 8, the report slowly deconstructs the arguments that the same ideologues were using 10 years ago and that even they have come to the realization that those arguments lack substance. Page 9 reads[12]:

> Several researchers have suggested that gender differences in individual characteristics that are usually not available in standard datasets can account for the large unexplained portion of the gender wage gap[…]. These include factors affecting gender differences in the quality of the labour supply such as the quality of education and field of study, as well as personal traits including expectations and motivation. For example, using recent UK data on a cohort of graduates, Chevalier (2007) shows that differences in motivations, expectations and field of study can explain up to 70% of the observed wage gap.

In other words, even the French organization of statist orientation admits that when it comes to the behavior on the labor market, there is no such thing as "men as a class" and "women as a class" as feminists are trying to convince us. On the contrary – the statistical differences cannot be largely explained when it comes to big groups or classes, but strictly at an individual level.

This article was also brought to us by a feminist as "evidence" that the GPG is about discrimination.

On the same page, the report admits that the differences are rather random and they cannot be correlated neither with the local culture, nor with other social factors except for small measures – such small measures that they would practically explain nothing even if they can be correlated.

In Asia, the average GPG has been static for over 10 years at around 18%, according to the International Trade Union Confederation's report called Frozen in time – Gender pay gap unchanged for 10 years[13].

Before reading the article, let's look one more time at the 18% figure and let's compare it with the progressive feminist heavens like the UK, Sweden or France. In this regard, one could say without mistaking that the Asian nations are much more egalitarian with men and women when it comes to wages than Sweden. I guess that's a bad news for ROKS (The leading force of feminism in Sweden). Saudi Arabia or Iran pays women closer to a parity with men than Sweden does. Ooops!

Just like in the EU, in most countries, we can notice that there are domains in which men are significantly better paid than women and vice-versa. We look at the page 23 of the ITUC report and we see that Indonesia (Muslim patriarchal, boo-hoo), the GPG on fishing is -19.8%. In absolute numbers, women earn on average 4660 rupies per hour whilst men earn 3890 rupies per hour. Sure – they both do the same work – they fish. But, although it's the same work – they don't have the same results – hence the GPG. Apparently, women are luckier in catching fish (or better at selling it). It's nothing wrong with that – but we never hear that on TV. We only hear how women are oppressed throughout Asia.

Also in Indonesia, we see that the construction sector is similar with the one from Romania or Luxembourg, with a GPG of -29%. Another interesting aspect is that if in Europe men are significantly more performing in real estate – in Indonesia, it's women that are better on this. The GPG on real estate and business is -18.6%.

These numbers are only confirming that not only men and women are different, but people in general are different. This is the reality that those who use the GPG as an argument for "systemic discrimination against women" are refusing to grasp.
The raw numbers are clear, though: Men in Romania are better at business than the men in Indonesia and women in Romania are worse at mining then women in Philippine (see table 14, page 24 in the ITUC report – the GPG on mining in Philippine is -24%).
Moreover, in Philippine, the GPG in construction is -46%(!!!). These numbers speak for themselves about the fact that it is an intellectual masturbation to come with the GPG as an argument for anything.

Also in Philippine, women in telecom are earning 153% of what men earn. And in almost all domains where data is available, the numbers are similar in Philippine. But yet we don't hear news or see headlines like: "Philippine is a matriarchy" – yet somehow this "logic" becomes legitimate if the report of wages between men and women is smaller than 100%.

In the real world, Philippine is not a matriarchy, even though it has a negative GPG in many fields and Indonesia is not a patriarchy because it has a positive GPG overall and comparable with Romania's GPG. Why? Because the GPG is not an indicator for anything.

We recommend the readers to consult the ITUC report on Asia even in more detail. You will find a lot of interesting things that we don't hear in the news – or we hear them only in half stories, with relevant parts and context taken out of the picture and usually depending on the political agenda of that particular mainstream venue.

So, in conclusion, the GPG is an irrelevant number when talking about the existence or inexistence of "systemic gender discrimination." At best, the GPG figures are good at understanding general trends between men and women from different areas of the world. But that's pretty much where the utility of these figure ends.

If you truly believe there is a patriarchy and a systemic gender discrimination system – you will have to find other arguments and other data to try to prove its existence because the Gender Pay Gap argument cannot possibly explain the hypothesis. In fact, the fact that the GPG goes both ways, pretty much demolishes the entire premises on which the GPG argument is being built.

This is a shorter version of an extensive study regarding gender pay gap and women and men's behavior on the labor market that I wrote for the Romanian media one year ago. The original version, in Romanian, is available on my blog.

In His Own Words: One brownie, hold the nuts

Dr. Tara J. Palmatier · 3 October 2013 · Archived copy · Original

When a woman's act of violence toward a man is actually covered by mainstream news publications, you usually don't have to wade too far into the comments section before stumbling upon some variation of, "Well, he must have done something to deserve it."

Catherine Kieu Becker cut her husband's penis off because he asked for a divorce and an entire audience applauded and laughed as Sharon Osbourne cackled and joked about the incident. Female victims of domestic violence are taken seriously and treated with a kind of reverence. Male victims of domestic violence are typically invisible unless they become an object of ridicule.

The reality is that abusers, male or female, don't need a "reason" to abuse. Some abuse their spouse and children because a co-worker slighted them and they know enough not to act out at the office. Some engage in abusive behaviors to maintain a sense of control. Some abuse because they never learned healthy, adult problem-solving skills. Some abuse because they're sadistic psychos who enjoy inflicting pain.

Today's In His Own Words illustrates this perfectly.

[In His Own Words is a joint effort between DAHMW (Domestic Abuse Helpline for Men and Women), Shrink4Men and AVoiceForMen to help raise awareness about the invisible victims of domestic violence, men. If you would like to submit your story, please follow the guidelines at the end of this article.]

> One Brownie, Hold the Nuts
> I was married to an abusive woman, whom I left in 2007. The effects of living with her for ten years perfectly match what Dr. Palmatier describes on her website, Shrink4Men. She was and is a master manipulator, able to turn reality on its head.
> The day after I left, my ex filed for an EPO (emergency protective order) falsely claiming domestic abuse. Between getting served with notice and the hearing, which was set for a few days later, I hired a lawyer and prepared divorce papers. Before the hearing she called me repeatedly and said she would make it "go away" if I would agree to work things out with her.
> Fortunately, the judge decided at the hearing that there was no basis for her claims and denied the EPO petition. That was the only correct decision that judge ever made on my behalf though. The EPO hearing was also when we notified my ex that I was filing for divorce. She virtually ran from the courthouse, went home, piled all of my clothes into my other car, cancelled my credit cards, email access, checking account access, etc., and thus began a legal fight that cost me more than $50k, and I still got screwed in the end.
> Shortly after we divorced, she began a new relationship with a man she met online and, according to her, no one has ever made her happier, and he is unselfishly going to mend her broken spirit. She also told me that the new guy wants to meet me to ask me one simple question, "How did I let such a wonderful woman get away?"
> Really the only thing that is getting to me right now is how easily she jumped into bed with a complete stranger the first time they met in person — which was only two weeks after meeting online and texting, etc. This is after years of telling me I'm a pervert for wanting to have sex once a week, and while we were getting divorced quoting Bible verses to me regarding the immorality of sex outside of marriage.
> I shouldn't have been surprised because she did almost the same thing with me when I met her ten years ago. It was instant honeymoon to start, and then hurricane, calm, hurricane, calm, hurricane, ad infinitum. When I told my 87-year old Dad about her instant lover, he responded, "What, did you think you were special?" Apparently so.
> I have two sons from a previous marriage (mother is deceased) and a daughter with my ex. She has been working hard to alienate our daughter with some success, but I cannot afford a custody fight and the thought of stepping foot in family court again makes me want to throw up. She used the system to out maneuver me every step of the way just like she controlled everything while we were married.

As despicable as this woman is, I still get jealous when she drops my daughter off and she's off to meet her boyfriend (I know because he lives over an hour away and she always takes the dog with her to spend the night). She's 45-years old but looks much younger and has lately been dressing like someone in her 20′s or early 30′s. I guess it all goes back to the self-esteem beat down I took for so long with comments like, "You're not the type of guy I'm normally attracted to," and many others relating to appearance and other perceived inadequacies. And there's always this irrational fear that that she'll somehow become great and normal for this guy and it was me all along just like she has said so often.

It helps to remember some of the slightest and strangest things that would set my ex off. In stark comparison to "normal" moments and moods, she raged and/or threatened divorce over:

- Washing silverware and non-stick pans with the coarse side of a sponge;
- My son taking "too small" bites of a pizza;
- A male friend asking me to go watch a game with some other guys at a sports bar;
- The kids not making their beds correctly with the multi-size decorative pillows she bought for each;
- My pre-teen and teenage sons not leaving their bedroom doors open as she instructed;
- Me asking to listen to anything besides country music on cross country road trips;
- Me wanting to make my kids from a previous marriage (whose mother died when they were very young) beneficiaries of a life insurance policy. Even though I offered to take out a separate policy for her worth even more;
- The fact that I did not cry at our wedding (this one came up time and time again and each time it would take hours and sometimes days to get her off the subject);
- Me not remembering: her favorite color, flower, ice cream flavor, etc., etc., etc.;
- And many, many more.

Her last rage episode, the one that inspired me to tell my boys to pack their bags we are leaving and never coming back would be hilarious, if it wasn't so absurd, was over a brownie.

That's right, a brownie.

My son, who was thirteen at the time, had asked if he could make a pan of brownies. She said yes, but on the condition that each of the three kids have no more than one before dinner. While she and I were outside arguing over the quality of the landscaping job the boys and I had just completed for her after two full days of hard labor, my son cut the brownies and arranged them on a platter. He came outside and offered her one.

When we went in the house a little while later, she took all of the brownies off of the platter and started to re-fit them into the baking pan to make sure no more than three were missing. Well, they didn't fit because someone had eaten more than one (not really, she had eaten the fourth one).

She began to interrogate, accuse, and threaten a whipping (with a belt) for whoever was lying and she was going to make everyone stay in the room until someone confessed. I tried to reason with her and explain the math but I knew from a thousand previous incidents how this would end. She was queen of making mountains out of molehills and this one was well underway.

Long story short, we left and never went back. She has never apologized for any of these incidents, claiming they were my fault or the kids' fault for upsetting her. But as our marriage counselor told me, it's not up to me > and the kids to control her anger, it's up to her.

> I know down to my bones leaving was the right decision, but my self-esteem is shot and self-doubt is ever present. Meanwhile, my ex, who I think is more NPD than BPD, has blissfully moved on to the next victim. I know I should be happy about this, as it keeps her occupied and away from me, but on some deep, disturbing level, I'm disappointed that I failed to make her happy.

> If I had a dollar for every time she said "If you really loved me, you would" — fill in the blank here with whatever, from the really mundane like "not use the scratchy part of the dish sponge to wash the silverware" to "let me buy a horse," "buy an investment property," "convert to Catholicism" even though she wasn't Catholic, but a house painter she hired convinced her it was the one true religion and we better hurry or we were all doomed – I'd have a lot of dollars.
> When I told our marriage counselor about the "If you loved me…" comments during one of my last lone visits, as she had dropped out by then after the therapist told her something she didn't like, he told me to say "Well I guess I don't love you that much then."

> I never got the guts to do it, but wish I had. I spent ten years trying to prove to her that I loved her. All the while her abusiveness made it increasingly more difficult and finally impossible. But now, the new guy of approximately 6 weeks has made her "happier than I ever did." Part of it she says is because of his looks, he's "more my type and you were not the kind of guy I'm normally attracted to as all my previous boyfriends were gorgeous," and part of it is because "he's going to help me with my trust issues and help me heal."
> Good luck, fella.
> Oh, and she says he wants to ask me one simple question, "How did I let such a wonderful catch get away?" I've come up with a thousand different answers in case I ever get the chance, but my latest favorite is "Give her your credit card for a week and you'll know."
> I think we all tend to remember the good times and romanticize how wonderful they were, especially when we're lonely, but the reality of my relationship at least, was that it was way out of balance and I had to continually agree to a distorted viewpoint in order to keep the peace. My kids suffered as a result and so did I. Her new knight in shining armor can have at it.

Thank you, Ted, for sharing your story. I hope you have been able to undo the damage of your ex's alienation efforts and that any remaining nostalgia for her has long since passed. You and your children deserve better. (Ted shared his story of abuse on Shrink4Men in 2009*).

Is USA Today afraid of young men?

Sage Gerard (Victor Zen) · 3 October 2013 · Archived copy · Original

On September 29th, I got a tweet from USA Today Collegiate Correspondent Monica Vendituoli. Monica wanted to interview me as a male college student. I opted for the email interview to keep a record of the conversation.

Monica asked two questions:

1. "Do you feel more males studies or men's studies programs are needed?"
2. "Have you ever felt discriminated against as a male college student and if so how and if not why not?" (sic)

I say yes to both. My full answers are on MarZ for easy reading, but the source of the email conversation is also available. Monica's email address is public, so I have not removed it from the source. I did remove my email address because it is not public.

Monica responded about a day later saying that she did not have time to include my answers in the now published USA Today article.

> I received [your answers] around 10:30pm and my article was due at 8am the next morning, so by the time I had received them I was already halfway through writing. I am very sorry!

Apology accepted. Journalism is a demanding, time-critical industry and not everyone can make the cut. I am disappointed about being one less voice for male students in the mainstream media, but deadlines are deadlines.

We're not quite done, though.

The USA Today article has a clear bias. The article presents solid evidence of male suicide and dwindling numbers of male students, but evidence of discrimination against male students is framed as anecdotal. Monica was given evidence of male discrimination that was not anecdotal at all.

The one male student quote is framed to support the article's suggestion that men only feel oppressed, as if there is no evidence they actually are. While I admit some of my own evidence was anecdotal, not all of it was. I offered my report on Kennesaw State University to show that some campuses play favorites, and Jonathan Taylor gave Monica links to plenty of data. Before Jonathan started throwing his bricks of logic, Monica emailed him the following introduction:

> I am writing an article about whether there is a need for men's centers at colleges in the United States after recent discussion on the subject in Canada surfaced. I am trying to get opinions from men's rights activists, as well as feminists, women's studies, and gender studies activists/academics and women's centers.

The bolded sentence assumes men's centers should only exist if they are needed. In my KSU report, I show FBI reports from 1995 to 2002 proving only one rape was reported on KSU. We don't know the sex of the victim, nor do we know if a conviction came of it. Apparently one rape report is enough demonstrable need for a gynocentric self-defense course to get funding, but when there is talk of a men's program, all of a sudden we put our due diligence caps on. What did men do other than distract women from the massive rapist horde that doesn't exist?

Sorry, I'm victim blaming again. We should obviously spend more time listening to the interviewee holding men responsible for all rape, without being "anti-male" about it.

> Jackson Katz, a pro-feminist male filmmaker and author, agrees men can be held accountable for sexual assault in a way that is not anti-male.
> "It's just like racism. It's like, are white people guilty of being white? No, but they … have a responsibility to > work to end those unfair advantages," Katz says.

How does this relate to the thesis? How did we even get here? Weren't we just talking about men's studies programs? By this reasoning, feminism's control over gender narratives in academia gives feminists a responsibility to help men organize their own social science programs. But that's patriarchy, right? Obviously holding women responsible for child abuse would be considered anti-woman, so why is Katz saying that holding men responsible for rape is not anti-male? What planet is this? With all the hot gas, I'm guessing Venus.

Quotes like Katz's were used to suggest that men's groups are bothering women, as if that is enough to show that men's groups aren't needed. Monica had access to information showing male students were discriminated against. She opted to suggest men only felt that way, right before moving on to give the teach-men-not-to-rape brigade some time in the spotlight.

While Monica may not have had the time to fully digest her interview answers, glossing over clear evidence of discrimination is not just a question of time, it is a question of ethics. Monica has also been tweeting people for interviews way back on September 22.

[image]

Granted, not all of these offers may have resulted in interviews, and not all of the interviews might be for the same article. But one thing Monica did make sure to do was talk to MHRAs. MHRAs, including myself, giving her a mix of anecdotal evidence and hard facts with which to work. Assuming she was researching back on September 22, she had more than enough time to say, point blank, that men are discriminated against. Monica still chose to make men's issues look isolated and circumstantial by selecting male quotes that looked anecdotal. This way, the grim statistics cited are not tied to any identifiable cause like misandry or gynocentrism. Monica uses the word "roles" to describe the problems affecting men, which lightens the blow of the article further.

This weak representation for male students in the mainstream media demonstrates the necessity of men's programs on college campuses, if not the necessity of better representation for men in general.

The fact that bigotry is a two-way street needs to be acknowledged. There is nothing admirable about choosing to present evidence in a way that marginalizes college men. We need the mainstream media to acknowledge that men don't just feel discriminated against, they are discriminated against.

USA Today, what are you afraid of? Does your logo with the one blue ball symbolize anything about your stance on the sexes?

Say that male students are discriminated against. It's the truth, and it's newsworthy. Imagine the ad revenue from the traffic spike, if that helps.

Go on. Say it.

Feminists don't care about having men dominate them. They care about having men walk away. They don't care about men being stronger than women. They care about men being seen as more vulnerable, or vulnerable at all. Feminists don't care about losing rights. They care about losing wrongs.

When Feminists engage with traditionalists it's in a flirtatious mood of "no but really yes."

That's why Feminists are more threatened by men's rights activists. We don't play their game; we won't play their game.

But Traditionalists will.

You two deserve each other. After all, you created each other.

Join Alison Tieman, Karen Straughan and Della Burtion as we discuss the unsettling links between traditionalism and feminism tonight Thursday the 3rd of October on blogtalk radio.

A male-positive approach to literature

Dennis Gouws · 3 October 2013 · Archived copy · Original

The new male studies offer an affirmative alternative to traditional gender scholarship on boys and men.

Unlike pervasive men's-studies research, Male Studies inquiries are essentially male positive: their methodologies not only celebrate men who embody different masculinities, but also critique —and suggest strategies for overcoming— systemic inhibitors of masculine affirmation.

Misandric constructions of masculine identities in gynocentric educational environments have resulted in males experiencing serious education deficits. This paper reports on a qualitative study undertaken in a British-Literature course on Victorian Manhood that offered students a male-positive approach to understanding the texts and their contexts and that solicited their written feedback on what they had learned from this experience.

The Victorian Manhood Question

Since the fourteenth century, men's identities and conduct had been conceived of as a question of manhood; manhood had elucidated men's difference from women and boys, men's sexuality, men's duty to society, and men's courage. Manhood, moreover, had traditionally been contingent, a reputation that a man had to attain and maintain. In newly industrial nineteenth-century Britain, the manhood question considered traditional and new ways a man might grow into and sustain a meaningful, productive, and commendable type of manhood.[3]

My Victorian Manhood Question course examined these traditional and new ways of attaining and sustaining manhood within four topics:

- Contending Manhood Identities in George Eliot's Adam Bede, (a novel set in the early nineteenth century when proto-industrial manhood began to contend with gentlemanliness as the measure of a man);
- Industrial Manhood (which examined debates by Thomas Carlyle, Thomas Babbington Macaulay, and Karl Engels about the consequences for men of submitting themselves to be labor as manufacturing tools);
- Artistic Manhood (which examined works by John Ruskin, Matthew Arnold, D. G. Rossetti, Walter Pater, and Oscar Wilde that explored art's role as moral edifier, social unifier, or antagonist to industrialization), and finally
- Imperial Manhood (including W.E. Henley's "Invictus" and Kipling's "If—" which encouraged male stoicism in the name of empire building).

Throughout the course students were encouraged to consider the extent to which the question of manhood had changed or stayed the same for men in the twenty-first century.

What Students Claim to Have Learned from the Course

I offered an end-of-the semester summative assessment that asked the twenty-two participating students to write about their most important lesson, concept, or experience gained from the course, and I used their papers as the basis for a qualitative study of what they had learned from this male positive educational experience.

To encourage the students to express themselves freely, I graded this assignment only on whether the work had been satisfactorily completed, not on what was reported: students who adequately completed the assignment were given full credit for it.

For the study I grouped their papers into three categories:

- first, those safe, stock responses that merely reiterated either points made in class or traditional gender-studies commonplaces (five students chose to write those);
- second, those papers that demonstrated their authors' ability to undertake a male-positive approach to understanding manhood in both the texts we read and broader socio-historical contexts (thirteen students wrote such papers);

- and finally, those works that bore witness to their authors' decision to embrace aspects of a male-positive philosophy, one that celebrates masculinities, critiques their construction, and potentially resists pervasive gynocentric and misandric representations of men (four students' work provided such evidence).

I will only discuss those student responses from the latter two categories because they offer clear evidence that this course successfully enabled more than three-quarters of the students to understand and apply the salient concepts of the course to the literature, its respective contexts, and their lives.

Among the respondents who successfully applied a male-positive approach to the texts and their broader contexts, both women and men commented on the normative gynocentrism they experienced in literature classes.

Janey, for example, marveled that the course enabled her, "to look at gender roles in a different way." Moreover, she noted that "literature… isn't all about women," that after "analyzing women's roles in literature for the majority of the time [she] has been studying English, it was refreshing to focus on something new."

Mickey similarly noted that "it is refreshing to have the male gender" studied "in a positive light," that "the texts… read throughout the course… were a refreshing change from the norm."

Both genders also commented on how misandric assumptions pervade our society: Elsie remarked that the course successfully "allowed [her] to see that men shouldn't always be seen in a negative way as today's society tells us we should" and Roger noted that Kipling's advocating for stoicism in the face of adversity in "The White Man's Burden" "stands for the greater burden of all men [commonly and regularly] portrayed in the media."

Women and men, however, differed in their reactions to this misandry: the former were surprised at the profundity of the social pressures and the responsibilities inherent in the manhood question and the latter felt vindicated that their experience was being afforded dignified recognition.

Ella appreciated learning about the "the duties and pressures different cultures and time periods put on men"; moreover, she came to appreciate that "men have always displayed tremendous effort to help others besides themselves."

Christine acknowledged the inadequacy of her "stereotypical view of men" to account for the complexity inherent in male-positive criticism: she concluded that as a result of examining "the manhood question, and defining manhood," she now understood that "a man is very multidimensional."

Among the male students, Theo remarked on the "enormous pressure on men to live up to [society's moral] standards"; in addition he appreciated that "respecting these pressures and treating men with dignity" was inherent "in a male-positive approach" to literature.

Sam also noted that "very few people take the time or effort to consider how the men in society are perceived and the pressures that are placed on them"; he was grateful that the course afforded him "a deeper and more cultured understanding of [manhood and masculinity]—something he "thought" he had "figured out." Sam concluded with satisfaction, "that is all you can really ask for from a class." These male students clearly felt pleased that the course had respectfully addressed their educational needs.

Unique to the men's responses to the course was an appreciation of both the male-appropriate content of the course—evident in those readings that sought better to understand men's experiences— and the interest that the course stimulated. after remarking that "there is a lot of pressure put on a man to fit [socially determined, changing roles], Kelvin, for example, discovered that "it's through literature that we can understand the thoughts and feelings [a] man has [when] he undergoes scrutiny which truly defines [his] manhood and masculinity," and Adrian concurred that the central issues of the Victorian Manhood Question, "are qualities we [men] still hold onto [and] try and mold ourselves accordingly… because of all of the success" that accompanies them.

These men certainly understood that the course encouraged a greater understanding of men's experience of the social pressures inherent in the manhood question in both the Victorian era and the twenty-first century.

Three students praised the male-oriented literature and male-positive approach to it for effectively generating interest in the course topics: Charles remarked that the course "was more interesting to [him] than most literature courses" because it "focused on… masculinity and literature" and this "allowed [him] to learn more because [it] avoided the drollness of most literature course" and "allowed [him] to think more open-mindedly about literature than most courses offered" at the college. roger concurred, praising the course for offering "something more relatable [to him], mak[ing] things much more interesting and keep[ing him] engaged."

Among the three men who valued the course for being interesting was one who saw similarities between the male-positive aspects of this approach to manhood and his personal struggle with his work ethic and self-confidence.

Collin noted that the topic of Victorian manhood "gave the course an interesting twist that made it enjoyable." He candidly acknowledged: "I have struggled with self-confidence in all areas of my life," and in the process of working hard to improve [his] self-confidence, he came to "agree with the Victorian concept that hard work and confidence prove a person's manhood." Collin clearly saw the benefits of a male-positive approach to understanding his own experience and was one of four to adopt aspects of its philosophy as his own. Like Collin these students understood that there are similarities between the laudable struggles of Victorian men to attain and sustain manhood and their own twenty-first-century struggles.

Nat, for example, noted how lessons learned in the class —and particularly the strong male character in Henley's "Invictus"— will "allow [him] to be a better man" and "attain manhood." Two students, however, took their male-positive involvement further: choosing to commit themselves both to adopting a male-positive philosophy in their work and their lives and to critiquing and resisting the misandry they encountered.

Ted recognized how the gynocentric nature of his education had caused him to internalize misandric ways of thinking about men. He remarked that misandry, "is similar to the mindset… present in previous courses [he had taken]"; moreover, he felt, "finally to take a class that focused on the elimination of [misandry] was [both a relief] and enlightening." Ted shared the following reflection: "I was very interested to see how my thoughts about men had been tinted/shaded from past classes, and I was eager to try and eliminate this type of thought process. This aspect of the course educated me on how to look at men and comment on their actions without coloring my thoughts with a bitter tone."

Alex similarly adopted a male-positive attitude to his educational experience and his extracurricular life, striving for a persistent healthy resistance to the gynocentrism he had encountered in class and at home. "Throughout my life I had never really thought about a male positive approach to anything" Alex remarked; "this class has really taught me to look at stories through multiple lenses because I will always read and analyze stories with a slight male-negative view out of habit, but now I know to stop and look at the same story from a male-positive view in classes and in life."

In sum, Alex committed himself to becoming what he succinctly expressed as "a better me based on what I want and not on what others project onto me." Collin, Nat, Ted, and Alex demonstrated through their thoughtful work that carefully accommodating male students in literature courses can have profoundly positive impacts on their lives.

Conclusions

From this teaching experience I offer two interesting observations: first, men of varying levels of academic preparation and commitment to studying literature (reflected in their final course grades) benefitted from a male-positive approach to Victorian literature. The students who either successfully undertook male-positive readings of the texts and their context or chose to adopt a male-positive philosophy represented various levels of academic achievement (their course grades ranged from A though D+).

Indeed, those male students who had found the concepts taught in this course sufficiently useful to adopt a male-positive philosophy were men who experienced different levels of academic success in the course.

Second, only male students were in the latter category of male-positive adopters. No women in the class demonstrated a commitment to future allied behavior.

This qualitative study suggests that a male-positive approach to teaching literature —and other courses— could beneficially engage men in exploring their identities through literature and in all aspects of their lives; this approach could also help them build the confidence to demand environments that would succeed academically. Doing that would require them to challenge the gynocentric bias they encounter in academic environments. Moreover, adopting a male-positive approach would not disadvantage women students; they performed as well as the men on the assessments in this Victorian Manhood course.

Although none committed herself to male-positive allied behavior, the women in the class gained a better understanding of men's identities and an appreciation of the costs and benefits inherent in males' negotiations of the manhood question.

Addendum: The New Male Studies and a Male-Positive Approach to Reading Literature

The New Male Studies offer an affirmative alternative to traditional gender scholarship on boys and men. Unlike pervasive men's-studies research, which is fundamentally informed by feminisms, Male Studies inquiries are essentially male positive: their methodologies not only celebrate men who embody different masculinities, but also critique —and suggests strategies for overcoming— systemic inhibitors of masculine affirmation.

Moreover, the precepts informing male-positive methodologies also differ from customary patriarchal assumptions: rather than concerning themselves with what men want for women and for other subordinated men, Male Studies explore what men want for themselves.

The practice of Male Studies involves acutely attending to how masculinities are inscribed in texts, textual criticism, and pedagogy. In much Western culture, misandric and gynocentric value judgments have profoundly hindered boys' and men's wellbeing; for example, reductive chivalric and patriarchal stereotypes; which regard males as little more than pleasers, placaters, providers, protectors, and progenitors; have designated the male body primarily as an instrument of service rather than lauding it as the dignified embodiment of a sentient boy or a man.[1] Similar misandric constructions of masculine identities in gynocentric educational environments —particularly those that imagine maleness is in crisis or in need of a cure— have resulted in males experiencing serious education deficits.[3]

Men are increasingly underrepresented in higher education: Peg Tyre reports that, "[in] 2005,… 57.2 percent of the undergraduates enrolled in american colleges and universities were women," that "women are [now] better educated" than men, and that "[at] present, 33 percent of women between twenty-five and twenty-nine years of age hold a four-year degree compared to 26 percent of men" (Trouble 32).

Data from a 2010 report published by the National Center for Education Statistics (NCES) updates these percentages to thirty-five percent of women and twenty-seven percent of men (aud et al. 214).[4]

A 2008 American Association of University Women report on girls' performance in education notes that women have earned more bachelor degrees than men since 1982, and that women earned approximately fifty-eight percent of all the bachelor degrees conferred in 2005-2006 (Corbett et al. 55, 62). In 2007-2008, women earned sixty-two percent of associate's degrees, fifty-seven percent of bachelor's degrees, sixty-one percent of master's degrees, and fifty-one percent of doctoral degrees (aud et al. 216).

At recent conferences and in the recently launched New Male Studies: An International Journal, scholars have begun to challenge misandric stereotypes and to remedy gynocentric educational biases by applying male-positive methods to textual analysis and teaching practice. I recently designed and taught a course on the Victorian Manhood Question that adopted celebratory and critical male-positive teaching strategies; most students demonstrated that they had understood how misandry and gynocentrism adversely influence not only representations of men and manhood, but also males' lives; in addition, some even resolved to resist these negative representations whenever they encountered them in literature and in their lives.

A note about this paper

Affiliated with the Modern Language Association of America, the Northeast Modern Language Association (NeMLA) hosts an annual conference primarily for scholars working in the Northeastern United States and Canada.

Papers are presented on topics concerning various languages, their literatures, and their pedagogies. In addition, NeMLA supports special-interest caucuses that both investigate certain challenges faced by those working in academe and organize conference panels that address these challenges. among these groups is the Women's and Gender Studies Caucus that, according to its web page, "welcomes members interested in feminist scholarship, women's and gender studies, and the status of women in the profession at all stages of their careers."

NeMLA does not currently maintain a men's caucus. Above is one of three papers presented by members of the staff of New Male Studies at the 44th annual NeMLA convention held in Boston, Massachusetts, on March 22, 2013, hosted by Tufts University. The other two papers are included in this issue (see NMS issue below).

Each paper offers practical examples of male-friendly strategies that enhance critical inquiry and teaching methods. They comprised a panel, "The New Male Studies in Praxis: Male-Positive Criticism and Classroom Practice," that was initially proposed by one of the presenters (Dennis Gouws) as either a pedagogy or a women's and gender-studies panel and was accepted as one among nineteen pedagogy panels. Twenty-eight women's and gender studies panels were accepted.

Footnotes

1. Nathanson and Young's examinations of assumptions about men in western culture persuasively demonstrate how misandry and gynocentrism collude to disadvantage men in popular culture, legal discourse, and contemporary spiritualism.

Although written more than a decade ago, the first work in the series, Spreading Misandry, effectively models an acute critical attentiveness to negative inscriptions of masculinities in popular culture. In spite of differing on the importance of literary texts to the development of chivalry, Nigel Saul and Maurice Keen acknowledge the influence of gynocentric values on Chivalry.

Keen observes "The conception that chivalry forged of a link between the winning of approbation by honorable acts and the winning of the heart of a beloved woman also proved to be both powerful and enduring; western culture has never since quite shaken itself free of it" (249-50); Warren Farrell explores the contemporary remnants of this conception in his discussion of The Chivalry Factor. The chivalry debate in recent popular essays by Emily Esfahani Smith, Mark Trueblood, and Peter Wright offers vivid testimony of its topicality in the twenty-first century.

2. In addition to Peg Tyre's work discussed below, see Christina Hoff Summers, Chapter Seven, "Why Johnny Can't, Like, Read & Write." The updated and revised edition of this book; due to be published in August, 2013, pays more attention to the male-hostile educational environment and offers some suggestions to make the educational experience more boy friendly.

3. Herbert Sussman and John Tosh have produced thoughtful, but not necessarily male-positive, scholarship on nineteenth-century British manhood. This field offers many productive opportunities for New Male Studies research.

Toronto “Shrew Culture” scampers to failure

August Løvenskiolds · 3 October 2013 · Archived copy · Original

The fearful Feminist “Shrew Culture” of Toronto has been tamed and Thanksgiving arrived early this year – even for Canada.

The manicured fingers that once disrupted peaceful lectures by pulling one fire alarm after another are now stuffed into linty pockets – or maybe, other warm places.

The fiery hair has been scalped and the chanty lips have gone silent – and a blessed silence it is. The feminist leisure class has gone into a deep hibernation to lick their wounds with Miley-Cyrus-sized tongues of shame and inglorious whimpers.

I guess those mean old boys have won yet again.

Those of you who have gone through the agony of a harsh relationship breakup with a malicious woman know that towards the end, the fighting and aggression of the woman seems to decrease. Those experiencing this decrease can misread it through a sense of relief and thoughts of triumph, as times less rancorous seem like times of improvement. Seem. In reality, the fighting has ceased because the woman has stopped caring and is preparing to move on without you.

Is that what happened in Toronto?

The Puzzle Pieces

I’ve been collecting ideas and theories about the opposition’s meltdown as a part of my review of the Toronto Triumph for a couple of reasons: I’m curious about why’s of what happened, and if the results were due to something the MHRM did (or could do in the future), then we can use that to disarm feminist opposition in upcoming MHRM events.

As amusing and even helpful as it is to have the shrews battling us at every turn, the ability to shut them down at will would be a powerful asset to our cause.

1. The Distraction.

The Friday morning just before that evening’s Groth Lecture, a nice fellow named Professor David Gilmour, a literature professor (NOT the musician for Pink Floyd) experienced a protest against him at the University of Toronto. His rape-y, beat-y crime? He prefers good male-authored literature to shitty girly crap, and he said so out loud.

Of course, the students and administration were outraged that Prof. Gilmour failed to lie and pretend as if women other than Virginia Woolf could write loveable stories, too.

The college’s principal, one aptly named Angela Esterhammer, hammered home the point that by exercising his right to speak freely about his personal tastes in literature, “Mr. Gilmour expressed his views…in a careless and offensive manner. He has since apologized to students and colleagues, and in the media, for his ill-considered comments.”

The feminists went after Gilmour because he was a slave who had unwittingly slipped out of his chains of servitude to female privilege, and it was important for them to whip him back into line. Those of us in the MHRM can no longer be controlled by the lash, and so the feminists lashed out at the one lone man their hatred might still control.

The conclusion from this point is that feminists are cowards who prefer weak, isolated and vulnerable targets for their attacks. The befuddled Prof. Gilmour actually believed he could exercise free speech in isolation without repercussions.

If we want to encourage feminists to assault us in the future, we should bait a trap with nice guys like who

Professor Gilmour is and Dr. Warren Farrell used to be, and leave the trap looking vulnerable enough for them to engage. Likewise, if we want to deflect a feminist assault, a sacrificial lamb should do the trick.

2. The Turnover.

Every Fall a new crop of potential frosh feminists sets stiletto heel onto University, replacing the hardened, hoary and barren crotchbeard feminists who graduated in the Spring. The Groth lecture happened very early in the academic year, perhaps well before the indoctrination of she-ep was up to specs. So, the feminist failure might have been due to something as simple as they hadn't had enough time to harangue their own followers into submission. Yet.

This suggests that if we want to avoid feminist protests at meetings and lectures, scheduling them as early as possible in the new academic year should mute the protests. Likewise, if we want to encourage protests, a late Spring date would be ideal.

3. The Metaphors in the Meeting.

My notes on the Secret Feminist Meeting about MRAs have been up since last week and looking over them, the tactics of the feminists are so scabrous, and the underlying metaphors so poorly chosen, that had I been a feminist in the audience, I would've had severe doubts about both the capabilities and the sanity of the organizers of the meeting.

It was announced repeatedly that recording the meeting was forbidden. Of course, in academia openness is valued, and secrecy is usually associated with oppression, cheating, crime and consensual human fucking. The only reason for secrecy at a feminist meeting like this would be if M(H)RA's represented a genuine threat – something which Ashleigh Ingle explicitly denied at about 44:50 into the meeting. Realizing the stupidity about holding a secret meeting to plan a protest for a non-threat, Ashleigh caught herself, and then corrected herself to say that Men's Rights folks could become a threat.

This just dug the bullshit deeper – a "threat" is by definition a possible future bad thing. At the risk of being accused of manslaining, a "potential threat" is exactly the same thing as a "threat" – both are possible future bad things. If something is not a threat, then it is not a threat EVER. If you can become a threat, then you already are a threat.

Wanting it both ways is such abject stupidity by Ashleigh – "they're not a threat, except when they are" – that listeners had to call into question the competence of the entire group of speakers.

As a listener, I would have thought, "why bother with a protest if these guys aren't a threat, and why am I wasting my time in this meeting?"

But Ashleigh's poor choices just kept on coming – after her lengthy rant about how the administration wouldn't protect feminists and that women faced an epidemic of rape and sexual harassment in male-dominated (likely STEM) fields at UT, she then claimed that women weren't victims at all (52:00).

Again, Ashleigh wanted to have it both ways – women at UT are victimized, but they're not victims. Perhaps I should mansplain again the central contradiction here – either you are a victim, or you are not. If the women at UT are indeed warding off their attackers (as Ashleigh suggested), then I salute them, and wish them continued success in all their victim-blaming efforts.

Because of course, if you try to protect yourself, then according to feminists, you are victim-blaming.

And it just keeps coming – Ashleigh concedes that feminists use inflammatory quotes stupidly – things like "Kill all men", I suppose – and that, in doing do, they "normalize" the MHRM – in other words, feminist protests make feminism look evil and stupid, and the MHRM look honest and just.

That one statement alone likely killed any desire in the listeners to mount a loud, sound bite-driven protest.

And there's more! At 54:00 Ashleigh conceded that men have real problems (but are wrong to blame feminism).

This slip betrays a deep divide among feminists – some, like Amanda Marcotte, routinely deny that men have problems at all. They have to do this so they can avoid being accused of victim-blaming – and furthermore, if a man has a problem, then the notion of the patriarchy crumbles. Indeed, asserting that men's problems are men's fault is…wait for it…VICTIM BLAMING!

Even if the listeners didn't make this precise connection, the idea that you should go out and protest victims who have legitimate issues – even if they are men – had to make the listeners squirm. An earlier speaker had identified the MRM as a radical movement (18:00) – so, by painting us as radicals with legitimate issues, the feminists accidentally framed themselves as the real oppressors fighting free speech.

Mercifully for Ashleigh, she finally shut up, and the Q&A period began, but not before it was announced that white men would be forced to move to the end of the Q&A queue so that their betters could speak first. This bit of hate underlined the point that maybe men do have issues after all – and that feminists try to erase and silence them.

What this all shows is that the more feminists attempt to engage us (and us, them), the more the truth of our claims will undermine their lies.

4. The Manly Men and Women of the MHRM.

Yes, the folks we had at the rally were smart, cool, and awesome. If I had a feminist gang to face the tag team of just Paul Elam and Karen Straughan, I'd want at least a year to prepare and even then I'd lose badly, but the comprehensive MHRM band on hand for the event could manage just about anything, if through their confident swagger alone.

It is possible that our fearsome group alone scared off the major feminist players, but it is more likely, I think, that Ashleigh, Big Red and their crew were still limping from shooting each other in their come-fuck-me pumps.

Conclusion

These are but some of the factors that were in play in Toronto. They help explain not only our success but also why feminists prefer safe spaces and secrecy, and avoid debate, comments, and criticism of any sort – a house built on lies cannot withstand even the smallest challenge.

Robert St. Estephe–Gonzo Historian–is dedicated to uncovering the forgotten past of marginalizing men. “Gonzo journalism” is characterized as tending “to favor style over fact to achieve accuracy.” Yet history – especially “social history” – is written by ideologues who distort and bury facts in order to achieve an agenda. “Gonzo” writing is seen as unorthodox and surprising. Yet, in the 21st century subjectivity, distortion and outright lying in non-fiction writing is the norm. Fraud is the new orthodoxy. Consequently, integrity is the new “transgressive.”

It’s Domestic Violence Awareness Month again: posters, TV ads and “awareness” events galore. But let’s take a little break from the barrage of fake statistics, bogus history, and recitations of scientifically unsound and reductive ideological “gender” theories. It’s time instead to pour yourself a big cup of strong hot Gonzo history.

Here are seven cases dating from 1900 to 1955 you can be sure are not alluded to (nor any cases like them) in any college in the world.

►• 1900 – Rutter

FULL TEXT: Hackensack, N.J., Jan. 5. – Louise Rutter, who was convicted here yesterday of husband beating, was to-day sentenced to serve two months in the county jail as punishment. When she was called to the bar for sentence Judge Zabriskie said:

“Mrs. Rutter, if I am not mistaken, this is the fourth time you have been before me charged with offense.”

“We’ll, it’s five times too often,” said the Judge, “and I want to know if you intend to stop having to come before me on this charge.”

Judge Zabriskie looked at the woman for fully a minute without speaking. Then he shook his head as if admitting defeat and murmured: “Two months.”

The prisoner was led away not altogether cast down.

Mrs. Rutter is thirty-two years of age, strong, and muscular. Her husband, whom the law is trying to protect, is fifty-five.

FULL TEXT: The wife of Oscar Smith gave her husband a public whipping on the streets of Shelby, Wednesday night. Today she was arrested and her trial set for 4 o’clock this evening. The streets were thronged at the time of the whipping because of the band concert that was being given. When the fight started some one raised the cry “a fight” and the crowd began to push toward the scene of action. They fell back, however, when they noticed a woman trimming up her husband in the latest approved style. The husband and wife happened to meet on the street and held a short conversation in which the wife seemed to have the most to say. The answer of the husband did not suit the occasion evidently and she gave him a stiff jab in the neck straight from the shoulder as one reads about in championship battles. He did not attempt to strike his wife but immediately made an effort to recover his hat which was knocked off in the first round. His only desire seemed to get away from the punishment and he succeeded pretty well but not until he had received several upper cuts.

FULL TEXT: [Chicago] – Anna Poppert, according to witnesses who testified before Judge Walker during the day, believed she had a right to beat and kick her husband. John H. Poppert, whenever it pleased her so. The husband held different views and set them forth in the divorce bill on which Judge Walker gave a hearing.

In April, 1906, Poppert asserted, the defendant struck him on the forehead with clothes brush and threw a pair of scissors at him, striking him on the arm. At another time, he said, she kicked him in the stomach, and, when asked concerning this by Andrew Wolski, 353 Cornell street, a friend, she said: "I have a right to kick him or beat him if I like."

FULL TEXT: Youngstown, O., Aug. 11. – Alleging that his wife put cayenne pepper in his bed, threw carbolic acid in his face, put morphine in his coffee, burned his clothes, hid his shoes and compelled him to go to work in his house slippers, hit him on the head with a hatchet, locked him out and had him arrested, David J. Lodwick today asked a divorce from Jennie I. Lodwick.

►• 1948 – Amyx

FULL TEXT: Tacoma, Wash., Marc. 28 – Justice Charles Westcott ruled today that it is sometimes legal for a wife to beat her husband on the head with a piece of kindling wood. He dismissed third degree assault charges against Inez Amyx who told the courts she struck her husband because he "called her names."

►• 1953 – Devlin

FULL TEXT: New York – An unremorseful wife was held by police yesterday for methodically stabbing and beating her husband with a hammer over an eight hour period following an argument.

"He deserved it," said Mrs. Myrtle Devlin, 36, a Negress, when arraigned on a felonious assault charge before Magistrate Amedo Lauritano. The attack occurred Saturday.

Mrs. Devlin weighs about 100 pounds, her 35-year-old husband, James, about 180.

Police said the woman told them she stabbed him first in the chest and body when he accused her of infidelity after 15 years of marriage. He crawled into another room where she followed and struck him repeatedly over the head with a hammer.

Afterwards she fell asleep, according to the police resort. When she awakened she found the bleeding man had crawled into bed, so she got a larger kitchen knife and cut his throat.

The husband's condition was reported serious by hospital officials, who said almost his entire blood supply had to be replaced.

Pushback unnecessary? Try the Redstockings Manifesto

Janet Bloomfield (aka JudgyBitch) · 3 October 2013 · Archived copy · Original

If on-campus men's centers are a push-back against feminism, what exactly are they pushing back against? Let's look at The Redstockings Manifesto.

Friday afternoon, I tuned in at BlogTalkRadio to listen to the events taking place in Toronto, where Miles Groth was presenting at the University of Toronto, and making a case for why universities need to start funding academic and social centers that consider the needs of men and boys from the perspective of …. men and boys!

http://www.avoiceformen.com/updates/action-updates/historic-mhra-rally-in-toronto-huge-success/

I know! Shocking, right? Previous attempts to discuss the topic ended up with screaming women's studies protesters and pulled fire alarms and riot police and it was just a huge mess! Everybody remembers the delightful serenade of "Cry Me A River" from our Big Red Friend, right? Her empathy couldn't have been set to a better soundtrack. In anticipation of the planned lecture, the Canadian Association for Equality (CAFÉ) was forced to pay a pre-emptive security fee, as a "militant response" was promised from the Nazi feminist protesters.

http://www.citynews.ca/2013/04/16/the-inside-story-mens-rights-group-causes-controversy-at-u-of-t/

I followed a few news crews on Twitter, who had posted images of themselves with cameras at the ready, waiting for all hell to break loose.

And they're still waiting. In the face of some organized opposition, the feminist brigade surrendered unconditionally. The subsequent media coverage was pretty meek, although several reproduced a quote from a woman's studies prof who claims that the movement to discuss men and boys is really a backlash against feminism.

Annalee Lepp, associate professor and chair in the department of women's studies at the University of Victoria, said she believes the issue of violence on campus has broadened from a discussion solely centred on women to encompass other targets of potential attacks, such as gay and trans students.

Lepp said while she has nothing against the creation of men's centres on campuses, she questions the politics behind it.

"I think there has been a lot of work done by men who align themselves with feminism that have been doing the kinds of work that feminism has been doing for many, many years and becoming allies of the movement — or actively calling themselves feminists," said Lepp, president of Women's and Gender Studies et Recherches Feministes.

"In some segments of the men's movement, it's definitely a backlash against feminism as if feminism has created a context where something has been taken away from men."

Gee, ya don't say, Annalee!

Has feminism created a context where something has been taken away from not just men, but women, too?

Let's take a look at this little charming polemic, written back in 1969, that explains just what the goals of modern, second-wave feminism are, called The Redstockings Manifesto. The manifesto is in italics, and I've interspersed some comments and observations of my own, in an effort to reveal what we are pushing back against, and who has paid the price for this cultural re-imagining.

http://www.redstockings.org/index.php?option=com_content&view=article&id=76&Itemid=59

I After centuries of individual and preliminary political struggle, women are uniting to achieve their final liberation from male supremacy. Redstockings is dedicated to building this unity and winning our freedom.

This right here is the central reason why we need academic centers focused on the needs of men and boys outside the feminist ideology of gender studies. What male supremacy are you talking about? Which men? All the ones thrown away in countless wars? Men of color? Poor men? Gay men? Unmarried men? Infertile men? Disabled men? Homeless men? All the men dead by their own hands?

What supremacy did those men have? Over whom?

Beginning with the idea that all men experienced the untold luxuries of being born male and that all women suffered under their boot heels is exactly why feminist ideology cannot address the needs of men and boys in any meaningful way.

The rich are the ones with supremacy. Men and women alike. Confusing "patriarchy" with "aristocracy" is exactly what makes feminism so ineffective as a method of inquiry. An entire philosophy that rests on a mistaken assumption about men will never lead to any conclusions other than men are bad and get what they deserve.

II Women are an oppressed class. Our oppression is total, affecting every facet of our lives. We are exploited as sex objects, breeders, domestic servants, and cheap labor. We are considered inferior beings, whose only purpose is to enhance men's lives. Our humanity is denied. Our prescribed behavior is enforced by the threat of physical violence.

Again, which women? Rich white ladies? Oh, they're exploited, are they? All those women with nannies and housekeepers are treated like so much domestic labor? In truth, there ARE women who are exploited as sex objects, breeders, domestic servants and cheap labor. Sex workers, women in fundamentalist religious sects, actual domestic servants and poor women with no job market skills.

Guess what? Male sex workers are exploited as sex objects, too. And furthermore, all sex workers can be complicit in their "exploitation", the same way accountants are complicit in having their numeracy skills exploited. Being a sex worker doesn't make anyone an automatic victim, and it doesn't make them blind or stupid or ignorant or in need of special protection. Men who are in fundamentalist religious sects are breeders, too. Women don't have babies all by themselves. Plenty of men are domestic workers, too. Gardeners, handymen, repairmen, drivers – men with few job market skills get paid shit wages to do crap work, too.

Everyone's proscribed behavior is enforced with the threat of physical violence. Follow the rules or you will meet the police, who, if they are inclined towards gentleness at all, will most likely mete gentleness out to WOMEN and not men. Try resisting arrest as a man. The "threat of physical violence" is exactly what most women depend on not having to confront. Those protesters at UofT who physically assaulted men counted on no retaliation, and they counted on the police to ensure their safety.

Because we have lived so intimately with our oppressors, in isolation from each other, we have been kept from seeing our personal suffering as a political condition. This creates the illusion that a woman's relationship with her man is a matter of interplay between two unique personalities, and can be worked out individually. In reality, every such relationship is a class relationship, and the conflicts between individual men and women are political conflicts that can only be solved collectively.

Men = oppressor

Personal = political

Those two untested and unproven assumptions are again the reason that feminist gender studies CANNOT honestly and accurately reflect the interests of men and boys. If you begin with the assumption that men are oppressive, you will invariably ignore all evidence to the contrary because it contradicts the most basic premise of the philosophy.

III We identify the agents of our oppression as men. Male supremacy is the oldest, most basic form of domination. All other forms of exploitation and oppression (racism, capitalism, imperialism, etc.) are extensions of male supremacy: men dominate women, a few men dominate the rest. All power structures throughout history have been male-dominated and male-oriented. Men have controlled all political, economic and cultural institutions and backed up this control with physical force. They have used their power to keep women in an inferior position. All men receive economic, sexual, and psychological benefits from male supremacy. All men have oppressed women.

All men have oppressed women. All the inventions and accomplishments and achievements of men's work to make all our lives easier, safer and longer are in fact just tools that men use to oppress women. All men. Antibiotics, electronics, the flush toilet, washing machines, advanced cancer treatments, potable water, food, heat, houses, clothing – all just tools to oppress women.

And all the men with no power, they oppress women, too. Doing the dangerous, dirty unrewarded work that we require to function as a society, like digging coal out of the ground or hauling sewage or collecting trash – all of that is just a tool to oppress women?

All power structures through history have been male-oriented. Well, except for primary education, the aristocracy, traditional peasant marketplaces, and every informal avenue of power, which is where women's command resides.

http://judgybitch.com/2013/04/14/there-never-was-a-patriarchy-and-there-isnt-one-now-in-related-news-mr-jb-cant-do-shit-without-running-it-by-me-first/

IV Attempts have been made to shift the burden of responsibility from men to institutions or to women themselves. We condemn these arguments as evasions. Institutions alone do not oppress; they are merely tools of the oppressor. To blame institutions implies that men and women are equally victimized, obscures the fact that men benefit from the subordination of women, and gives men the excuse that they are forced to be oppressors. On the contrary, any man is free to renounce his superior position, provided that he is willing to be treated like a woman by other men.

Men are forced to be oppressors? How about the vast majority of men aren't oppressing anyone at all, and certainly not women specifically. And you know, it's true that men and women are not equally victimized by particular institutions: men are generally MORE victimized.

The judiciary? Men are sentenced more frequently and more harshly for their crimes than women are.

http://judgybitch.com/2013/09/11/newlywed-woman-kills-her-husband-after-8-days-of-marriage-by-shoving-him-off-a-cliff-from-behind-and-still-only-gets-a-second-degree-murder-charge-because-she-totally-didnt-mean-to-kill-hi/http://judgybitch.com/2013/05/12/life-and-death-and-the-curious-case-of-ariel-castro/

The health care system? More money goes to fund women's health concerns than men's and that is on a GLOBAL scale. Of the 8 United Nations Millennium Goals, one is specific to women alone (maternal health) and all the others "touch on essential aspects of women's well-being, and in turn, women's empowerment is critical for achieving the goals".

Number of goals targeted at men specifically?

Zero. Not one. The UN won't even throw the dogs who do all the work a bone.

And that's despite the fact that of the top ten health problems around the world, most are far more common in men. Don't be afraid, guys, to renounce your superior position of being allowed to die. If the price is being "treated like a woman", well maybe that's not so bad? It would be kind of nice if the world acted like men's health was at least as important as women's, no?

http://www.npr.org/blogs/health/2013/05/17/184771915/the-unsafe-sex-should-the-world-invest-more-in-mens-health?sc=ipad&f=1001

How about the institutions of education and advanced training? How's male supremacy working out there? Oh, boys are dropping out of school in record numbers and failing to acquire advanced training and education? Now why is that?

How dare you even ask such a thing, you evil, oppressive misogynist! You must hate women! That is essentially the response Miles Groth got when he asked that very question. Why are boys and men missing from our educational institutions? Where have they gone?

The idea that feminism, which assumes all men have oppressed women and that all cultural and political and economic institutions benefit men at the expense of women, could possibly answer this question is laughable.

There is a reason that foxes don't guard henhouses.

We also reject the idea that women consent to or are to blame for their own oppression. Women's submission is not the result of brain-washing, stupidity or mental illness but of continual, daily pressure from men. We do not need to change ourselves, but to change men.

Not often you see the idea expressed so boldly, is it?

The women who wrote this manifesto want men gone. The problem is men and they need to be changed.

Into what, pray tell?

And these are the women who are going to decide how to handle the challenges facing boys and men?

The most slanderous evasion of all is that women can oppress men. The basis for this illusion is the isolation of individual relationships from their political context and the tendency of men to see any legitimate challenge to their privileges as persecution.

Let's think about this statement in context of what comes next. What constitutes a "legitimate challenge"?

V We regard our personal experience, and our feelings about that experience, as the basis for an analysis of our common situation. We cannot rely on existing ideologies as they are all products of male supremacist culture. We question every generalization and accept none that are not confirmed by our experience.

There we go. Personal experience, and women's feelings about those experiences are what is to constitute evidence and the basis for legitimate challenge. Feminists accept no theories that are not confirmed by experience, which probably goes a long way towards explaining why there are so few them studying particular physics. Cry me a river, indeed.

Darn little quarks are so hard to see! Guess that proves they don't exist.

Actually feminism has a big problem with empiricism and the scientific method itself, which are obviously tools of the patriarchy.

Science, it would seem is not sexless; she is a man, a father and infected too. – Virginia Woolf

No doubt, Virginia probably wrote that sitting in a comfortable armchair built by men, covered in sturdy brocade developed by men, sporting a delightful profusion of colors from a dye process invented by men, using a fancy new ballpoint pen created by men on crisp white paper produced by men.

The irony.

Most feminist critiques focus on the practice of science. That is, they criticize both "the ways in which women are inhibited from entering into science professions" and the ways in which science has, and is, being used (by men) to oppress women.

Some feminist philosophers of science, however, focus on the scientific method itself by criticizing the classical desiderata of the scientific method. Special focus is paid to the notion of objectivity. Objectivity, claim some, is only “ostensibly [the] non-involved stance.” In actuality, it is the male stance. Therefore, the story goes, our respect for the scientific method is simply an outcome of our traditional (sexist, hence, male-biased) political inclinations.

http://www.reasonpapers.com/pdf/18/rp_18_5.pdf

They really aren’t kidding. Personal feelings are what constitutes evidence and legitimate challenge. Objectivity is sexist.

We’ll pause for a moment to bang our heads against our desks in frustration.

And it’s playing out in #rapeculture in particular, isn’t it? If she feels it was rape, then it was.

Gee. What can wrong with that approach?

Our chief task at present is to develop female class consciousness through sharing experience and publicly exposing the sexist foundation of all our institutions. Consciousness-raising is not “therapy,” which implies the existence of individual solutions and falsely assumes that the male-female relationship is purely personal, but the only method by which we can ensure that our program for liberation is based on the concrete realities of our lives.

Get together and share those feelings ladies, not just to get it all out and feel better, but to harness the collective hurt-feelings and mobilize them to affect all the institutions and organizations of the culture.

It’s kind of amazing how well feminism succeeded in making the entire culture about their own feelings, isn’t it? But I have a feeling that it worked the same way the first set of protests in Toronto worked – because the men didn’t push back.

And when they do, some “feelings” are gonna be in for a big shock!

The first requirement for raising class consciousness is honesty, in private and in public, with ourselves and other women.

Yeah, let’s base the whole program on honesty, shall we?

Being a slut is awesome! All women should be sluts!

VI We identify with all women. We define our best interest as that of the poorest, most brutally exploited woman.

Oh, except for you women over there! Yes, you! You will need to pick up all the slack and do all the shit work caring for our kids and cleaning and making food and keeping this shit organized, so we can out to work caring for other people’s kids and cleaning and making food and keeping shit organized.

Makes sense.

We repudiate all economic, racial, educational or status privileges that divide us from other women. We are determined to recognize and eliminate any prejudices we may hold against other women.

Oh, except for you women. Yes, you. Whores! Prostitutes are an unacceptable threat to women's control over male sexual choices. And all you housewives? Yeah, you're just whores dressed up in aprons and houseslippers.

It's your body and your choice, unless it's the wrong body and the wrong choice – then screw you, traitor!

We are committed to achieving internal democracy. We will do whatever is necessary to ensure that every woman in our movement has an equal chance to participate, assume responsibility, and develop her political potential.

See how they snuck that caveat in there? Every woman in our movement. Those of you who don't agree can go fuck yourselves.

VII We call on all our sisters to unite with us in struggle.

Hey, why not? It sounds like ever so much fun!

We call on all men to give up their male privilege and support women's liberation in the interest of our humanity and their own.

Yes, please give up the privilege of doing all the work that makes the world go round, dying earlier than women as a reward for that and yet being blamed for everything that hurts women's feelings, which now constitutes evidence of unrelenting male oppression. Black men in particular should be surrendering the privilege of dying way before anyone else. Black men have the lowest life expectancy in the US, unchanged since the 1950s. White men live, on average, 2 years longer than black men, and black women live about 2 years longer than white men. White women beat everyone, living 1.4 years longer than black women, gaining 5.4 years of additional life over everyone else.

http://www.prb.org/Publications/Articles/2008/racialdisparities.aspx

Poor, poor white women. So oppressed, they live longer than anyone else.

http://judgybitch.com/2013/09/17/what-would-happen-if-no-men-showed-up-for-work-today/

In fighting for our liberation we will always take the side of women against their oppressors. We will not ask what is "revolutionary" or "reformist," only what is good for women.

Exactly, Princess and that is why you should NEVER be in charge of any study that concerns what is best for men and boys. Feminism has men's issues covered? Yeah, sure you do.

http://goodmenproject.com/ethics-values/solution-mra-problems-more-feminism/

The time for individual skirmishes has passed. This time we are going all the way.

Bring it. That's all I can say. If the "militant response" we had in Toronto is what you mean by going "all the way", then by all means. The militant response looked a lot like waving a white flag. If you ignore it, it will go away, right? Good strategy. What else ya got?

Bring it now.

We're ready.

Lots of love,

JB

In His Own Words: another VAWA success story

Dr. Tara J. Palmatier · 4 October 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Our judicial system is supposed to protect the innocent and punish the guilty. In family court, innocence and guilt seem to be based on one's sex instead of actual evidence. Worse yet, family court and restraining order court often use a woman's feelings as evidence.

Today's In His Own Words is one of countless examples of how broken the system is and how biased it is against men, the invisible victims of domestic violence. "Alexander" has been removed from his home, his business and his child based solely on his abusive, lying, cheating wife's word. The only violence that occurred was perpetrated by his wife, yet Alexander is the one being treated like the dangerous criminal.

October is Domestic Violence Awareness Month. Please help us raise awareness about male victims of intimate partner violence and share these stories in your social media networks. Men comprise approximately half the victims of domestic violence and it's time to acknowledge this and do something about it.

> Another VAWA Success Story
> I never could figure out why she did the things she did to me. There was never a fight or argument that wasn't hung on my shoulders. After a while, I started apologizing for everything just to avoid fighting with her.
> I prayed every night before going to sleep in case she stabbed me or beat my head with a statue. Before marrying my wife, I never understood why or how some men could physically abuse women. But when a woman throws objects at you, hits you and damages property in a rage, well, it freaked me out. I never knew how to respond. If she was a man, I'd have throttled her.
> Locking myself in the bathroom or office was not a solution. She broke more than one door off its hinges to follow me. Leaving the house was not a solution either. The few times I left, she called family members and told them I was crazy and attacked her. She totally reversed what had actually happened and made me out to be the bad guy (DARVO). Each time I left to avoid the abuse; she went out the next night until 6am the following morning to punish me for leaving the night before.
> I am at a loss for words. I feel like the rational part of my brain doesn't think straight anymore (FOG). We were together for 3.5 years. In that time she must of threatened to leave or packed her things as if she was going to leave maybe 20 times. I never knew the true reasons, but 95% of the things she accused me of doing to her were things she had actually done to me (projection).
> I heard more profanity, screaming and hate from her in the 3.5 years we were together than I'd heard in my entire life before marrying her. I didn't understand why she would start huge fights over nothing and then blame me for causing the fights later on. I now know that she deliberately picked fights to use as a reason to leave the house because she had dates scheduled with men she met on some website.
> She was a stay at home mom the whole time we were together. She would tell me over and over how hard it is to raise a baby and then accuse me of not helping with anything. In reality, as soon as I came home from work around 7pm each night, I did most of the chores and cared for our baby – feeding her, changing her diaper and playing with her. No matter how much I helped her, she told her family and my family that I did nothing to help her or to care for our baby.
> I have a small landscaping company with two employees. I work from 7am to 7pm in the field, do the paperwork, invoicing, taxes, bids and designs. After coming home, there was a window of 3-5 hours. There was only so much more help I could squeeze into that time. I didn't understand how she was home all day yet seemed to accomplish nothing. I understood after installing webwatcherdata software on the computer to see what she was really doing while I was at work, supporting her and our child.
> She had 5 different Internet dating website accounts and 9 different emails that she used daily. I found her > chats, emails and pictures she'd been exchanging with multiple men. She told me over and over again that she was a "perfect wife" and that it was difficult for her to even look men in eyes because she was so shy. In reality, she was dating, screwing, chatting and emailing naked pictures of herself to other men for exactly 2 years.

> I confronted her with everything and she finally admitted to what she had been doing and why. She begged me not to divorce her and told me she would delete all of her accounts and give me her passwords, but that was a lie. Instead, she started opening new accounts and hiding things even more. Once I figured that out, I told her I wanted a divorce and there was no going back. She agreed and made me promise to divorce without attorneys and to keep things amicable. This was another lie.
> She beat me to it, filed for divorce and had me served with a restraining order. What's odd is everything in the restraining order is what she has done to me. Anyways, it has been 10 days. I am living in a hotel and awaiting a court date. I operate my business out of home, so I have no access to my clothes, tools or anything else. I have not seen our daughter in 10 days either.
> She moved into my home with 3 bags of close and $7000 in credit card debt, no car and no cash. Now she is living in my house that I built and driving a BMW I bought. I am still paying all bills in fear of ruining my credit and she wants alimony, child support and wants me to comply with the ex-parte restraining order and not see our daughter. I am about to lose my mind.
> I live second by second now. I keep asking myself why? I understand she wants to keep the lifestyle she has, but without me in it (hostile dependence). Okay, but why get so low and mean especially after I found out about her deceit and traps? Our 2.5-year old child is with her. I haven't seen both of them for going on two weeks. I am lost and I just don't see any light at the end of the tunnel.

A small taste of the Fempocalypse

August Løvenskiolds · 4 October 2013 · Archived copy · Original

The U.S. Government has shut down.

Well, much of it has, sort of.

On the first of October, the government ran out of spendable money because of a budget impasse in the U.S. Congress related to the Affordable Care Act (Obamacare) and the eternal struggle between the two main political parties (Democrats and Republicans) to see who can be the biggest white-knight mangina.

Our favorite man-hating peg lady, Amanda Marcotte, has her underwire all scrambled over this government shutdown because Vaginas are Hurting – since the government exists to transfer money from men to women, a government shutdown means that the ladies are in DANGER.

The shutdown means the WIC program ("The Special Supplemental Nutrition Program for Women, Infants and Children" – but not for starving men) will have to be funded through the states, at least until the Federal government is functional again.

Likewise, college financial aid, which goes disproportionately to women in Women's Studies indoctrination classes, will be delayed, restoring some of the balance to men who work to pay their own way through school (like I did). Women are going to love flipping burgers all night so that they can snooze through their physical chemistry classes – there is nothing like Eigenfunctions, Eigenvalues, and orthogonality to get your blood pumping.

And on and on it goes – in the evil Rape Culture Patriarchy, the government resources – taxes paid mostly by men – all go to – women? Wouldn't that be more the characteristic of a Matriarchy?

Karen Straughan, aka GirlWritesWhat, in one of her early videos (she was still wearing makeup!) entitled Fempocalypse!!, discussed what will happen when enough men walk away from a feminist society – that society breaks down and crashes:

http://www.youtube.com/watch?feature=player_detailpage&v=w__PJ8ymliw

Now, such speculations about societal breakdown often sound scary to the point of delusional paranoia – except when you consider that the U.S. Government has now shut down over money.

I wonder what all those anarcho-communist feminists think about their free ride on the cock of Patriarchy coming to an end – will they be out celebrating their impending starvation?

Slate's exclusive video about how the shutdown will affect the space program NASA applies equally well to how feminists must feel when their calls for government aid go unanswered.

This is but the smallest taste of what will happen when enough men opt out of society – become Grasseaters – become MGTOW ghosts – whatever you want to call it.

Watch the story grow in the U.S. over then next few weeks and months. (On October 17, the US will run out of money to pay creditors.) Notice how the appeals to restart the government will focus on the harms to women – far out of proportion to the harms to men, if indeed men are mentioned at all.

What a shame, that.

Anil Kumar · 4 October 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Bangalore is known as silicon valley of India. Within couple of miles from my house, there are numerous multinational software companies starting from IBM, Microsoft, Oracle to Intel and Accenture. The guys working in these companies earn a lot of foreign exchange for India, which keeps this predominantly poor country running and helps it buy crude oil. Recently, the Indian Rupee crashed 30% against US dollar creating panic all around and then recovered slightly. Bangalore contributes to 33% of India's software exports or 22 Billion US dollars. In spite of this, the Indian Government loves to harass and torture the young men working in these multinational companies by using false dowry cases. The police often goes to these companies to arrest the men, on a mere complaint by wife without conducting any investigation or collecting any evidences.

Till now, the Indian men's rights movement runs predominantly by the steam provided by the men facing abuse and false cases by wives, though a few men anticipating false rape cases from their girlfriends have also started approaching us now. The Indian legal system is almost dysfunctional which takes couple years for the trial to start mostly due to huge number of pending cases. The Indian lawyers rarely provide reliable service to men. So, many men decide to learn the laws themselves so that their lawyers can not take them for a ride. Many of these men prepare their own legal strategies, as lawyers almost always use fixed templates, which often damage cases of litigants.

Last month, the Confidare Men's Rights Community Center at Bangalore conducted a legal seminar for Men facing marital disputes. 15 men participated and it was conducted by noted men's activist Virag Dhulia. The topics included the various laws related to marriage, the domestic violence laws and the criminal laws like dowry laws and section 498a of Indian Penal Code. A few details about criminal procedure Codes and civil procedure codes were also covered. The behaviour of the courts and police in different scenarios were explained. A reputed lawyer from Bangalore High Court (equivalent to Supreme Court of a State in USA) was also invited to answer a few queries of the participants. The fees for the seminar were 498 India Rupees, which is about 8 USD. If we use purchase power parity, it can be a fee about 30 USD in USA. The figure of 498 was used instead of 500, because 498 is synonymous with India's notorious law Section 498a or the law against cruelty to wives. Any man, his parents and siblings accused of this cruelty are presumed guilty until proven innocent. This law is actually an addition to India's law against dowry demand by husbands and husband's parents. Last year, more than 120,000 cases of section 498a were filed in India. This law is designed specifically for facilitating blackmail and extortion of husbands and their parents.

As India is a predominantly conservative country, when a marriage breaks the society almost always blames the man. The angry parents of the woman then try to file a couple of false cases on him, which we MRAs call as "The Package". A typical package consists of criminal cases of cruelty against wife or section 498a dowry harassment case under dowry prohibition act. This is followed by similar allegations with demands for compensation and restraining orders under the civil domestic violence act. Then, the woman goes to a family court to seek maintenance or alimony. So, a typical package contains 3 cases in three different courts. The man and his family have to apply for bails in the criminal cases. Often, the trial of criminal cases and also family court cases take 5 to 6 years. The men lose a lot of money and time running around courts for all these days. They mainly have to go to each court date just for showing their attendance to the judges. It gets worse if the wife moves to a different city or a city where her parents live and files the cases there.

One way men can escape from these long drawn court battles is by negotiating an out of court settlement with wife. However, most women seek pound of flesh here. Its not surprising to see a woman demanding huge alimony, which is many times more than the income of the husband for the duration of marriage. Often, women also expect money or property from in-laws, as culturally the family of the husband is expected to be responsible for providing for the woman. So, if the parents of a man have 2 houses and 10 acres of agricultural land, the wife may demand one house for herself or half of the agricultural property, even when the duration of marriage is just 2 or 3 years. If the husband and his parents do not comply to these extortionist demands, then they risk criminal cases of cruelty to woman and false dowry harassment cases.

The lawyers and police often seek a piece of the pie for themselves in that out of court settlement amount, as the entire system is highly corrupt and insensitive. So, either men and their parents give in to extortion or they choose to get ready to fight a bitter court battle. The MHRAs generally suggest men to fight their way out rather than surrendering to the extortion process facilitated by law enforcement and the court system. So, the men who learn about the laws, and read citations and judgments, get empowered to fight back in the court system. Then, the slow dysfunctional system extracts a price from the women as well.

Nowadays, a lot of men are suing their wives for perjury, often defying the advice of their own lawyers. The lawyers generally do not try to fight aggressively for their male clients, as they do not wish to annoy the judges by being pro-male. In Indian family courts, a man can represent himself without employing a lawyer.

The legal awareness seminars help men learn the whole life cycle of marital problems and court battles that last from a year to almost a decade. If a man has high Legal Quotient, he will most likely reduce his lawyer fees, his financial losses, any risks to his health, and is likely to be much more peaceful being free from all confusion and uncertainties. He is also less likely to panic and he will not give in to all the stress that he is subjected to by police or courts during his marital problems.

Recently in Bangalore, a Software Engineer stabbed his wife 49 times killing her, and then committed suicide by jumping from 13th floor of his apartment. If such men approach MHRAs, these unfortunate incidents could have been avoided. Sadly, men themselves live in denial of men's issues in India and most do not seek help until it is too late. Bangalore has a population of 9 million people who live in about 500 square miles of area, which tells us there are potentially hundreds of thousands of men in need of help.

David Cameron's absurd medical policies

Mike Buchanan · 4 October 2013 · Archived copy · Original

David Cameron: How do you see the moon – is it through a telescope, or a microscope?

Justice for men & boys (and the women who love them) has reported at length about the disastrous impact on the National Health Service of the decades-old policy to increase the proportion of doctors who are women. Today, 70% of medical students in the UK are women.

Dr Vernon Coleman, a veteran campaigner and writer, was pointing out in his books 30+ years ago that the policy would in time create chaos, and he's been proven right. Female doctors are far more likely than male doctors to:

– quit the profession altogether (very few male doctors have partners willing to finance this option)

– work part-time rather than full-time, whether or not they have children – refuse to work unsocial hours, including weekends

– refuse to work in the most demanding environments, including Accident and Emergency

It's widely accepted that large parts of the NHS is in crisis, and spending out of control. The government knows that the prime cause of the problem has been the feminisation of the service, but cannot admit as much publicly. The government's strategy to 'solve' the crisis is to train more doctors, and doubtless 70% of them will be women. It costs £250,000 to train a doctor. British men collectively pay 72% of the income tax collected in the UK, and women only 28%. To borrow a phrase once memorably employed by Janet Bloomfield, the strategy is batshit insane.

And what of another field in which female representation has been increasing for decades, education? It's widely accepted that the standard of state education has been in decline for decades, despite 'grade inflation' being used to hide the stark reality. One of the few occasions I've cheered a statement made by David Cameron during Prime Minister's Questions was on 27 June 2012. Liz Kendall, a Labour MP, had asked him if he planned to bring back O-levels and CSE-style exams, the forerunners to the more recent GCSE exams, generally taken when pupils are 16 years old. He replied:

> What my right hon. Friend the Education Secretary explained in great detail in yesterday's debate is that we want to have in our country an absolute gold standard of exams that are about rigour and high standards. The tragedy is that we inherited from the previous Government a system that was being progressively dumbed down, where Britain was falling down the league tables and GCSE questions included things such as, 'How do you see the moon – is it through a telescope, or a microscope?' Government Members think we need a rigorous system, and that is what we are going to put in place.

Time will tell whether a rigorous system is put in place. I won't hold my breath.

There's been a considerable debate over many years with respect to the impact of increasing the proportion of female teachers in the education system. The consensus appears to be that female teachers focus more effort on girls than boys, as do male teachers, albeit to a lesser degree. They mark them more highly when given the opportunity to do so. They also make greater efforts to stoke the ambitions of girls, and the assessment systems – with more of an emphasis on continuous assessment, less of an emphasis on formal exams – tend to play to girls' strengths rather than boys' strengths. It's clear that many female teachers struggle to cope with the natural boisterousness of boys, as evidenced by the relentless increase in the number of boys diagnosed with Attention Deficit Hyperactivity Disorder ('ADHD') and medicated accordingly. These and a host of other factors have led to a situation where for every two men in tertiary education today, there are three women.

I recently submitted a Freedom of Information Act request to the Department for Education concerning the gender balance of the teacher population since 1970. The following tables have been created from the data received today:

The picture is one of a steady decline in the proportion of male teachers. Men now constitute about a quarter of all teachers in the UK – one in eight primary school teachers, and three in eight secondary school teachers. In parallel with the increase in the proportion of teachers who are women, we've witnessed the mass introduction of classroom assistants – overwhelmingly female, it need hardly be said. Classroom assistants were unheard of when I attended school (1964 – 1975).

The field of education has strong parallels with the field of medicine over the past few decades:

– increasing female representation (although four out of seven unemployed people are men)

– declining standards

– increasing burden on the taxpayer

Channel 4 has recently been running a fascinating series about a state school, Educating Yorkshire. The differential treatment of the boys and girls has to be seen to be believed. In one programme the focus was on two pupils – a very volatile girl of about 16, and a generally mild-mannered boy of about the same age. The two of them had a fight one lunchtime, and their treatment at the hands of the teachers couldn't have been more different. When describing the girl, the teachers would say she was 'a character', she was 'feisty' etc. She received no punishment with respect to the incident, while the boy was sent to an 'anger management class' which consisted of a 1:1 session with a female teacher. His spirit had clearly been broken by the incident, and yet he blamed himself entirely. The female teacher appeared happy to let him carry on doing so.

A small anecdote. The civil servant at the Department of Education who processed my inquiry happened to be of the female persuasion (they usually are). As is my custom, I emailed her to thank her for supplying the information. She replied:

> 'Your very welcome.'

In His Own Words: Dangerous crazy bitch ahead

Dr. Tara J. Palmatier · 5 October 2013 · Archived copy · Original

It is day 5 of Domestic Violence Awareness Month. Today's In His Own Words is an example of what can happen when you ignore warning signs, red flags and, most importantly, the Crazy.

"Disconnected" thought he was was reuniting with his middle school crush. He did not get the moonlight, roses and happily ever after he hoped for, but rather stalking, harassment, suicide threats, 911 calls and a restraining order.

> Dangerous Crazy Bitch Ahead
> Q and I met in middle school, back in the 80s. Zoning districts sent us to separate high schools, but we stayed in constant contact. In college we talked about dating, but various commitments conspired to keep us as friends. We lost touch in the early 90s, but in my mind Q was still a very dear friend.
> Years later, I was facing the end of a 10 year marriage to a wonderful woman. As this story is not about her, I will only say we had a very amicable divorce and remain close friends (and yes, she has said "I told you so.") Over the years, I had moved across the country, but would research Q, hoping to reestablish contact.
> One night, while poking around on line, I found a profile belonging to Q. I was so excited at the possibility of catching up; and catch up we did. We shared stories about the intervening years; we talked about our current relationships. We were both at the end of long-term situations. Having someone with whom to talk was a great comfort.
> As we were catching up, she told me of a tragedy that had happened to her and her child. In the interest of anonymity, I will only say this event made national news, though the names were changed to protect the innocent. When she talked about the situation, she made a point to tell me that she had never really let it upset her. Any emotionally healthy human being would have been devastated. I felt so terrible knowing anyone had to suffer that way. I rationalized it as she was simply dealing with denial, even 10+ years later.
> Q was "engaged" to an abusive man (they had been engaged for about a decade, if you can call that an "engagement.") Late one night, Q called me during a heated domestic dispute. She had been drinking and had allowed her teenaged child to be pulled into the middle of a drunken fight. At the time, I told myself she was a victim and drinking was a way of coping. I found myself thinking, "She is a victim, and I need to be there for her."
> I separated from my wife and moved closer to home. Q and I continued talking, still as friends. Late one night, while I was working, she sent an instant message, asking why I was still up. As I was busy, I did not immediately respond. She repeated the message. Then she started sending more and more desperate messages:
> "Where are you"

> all within the space of a few minutes. Then my phone started ringing. She called several times in rapid succession. Putting my professional responsibilities aside, I answered, assuming there must be some emergency. She started by accusing me of being involved with someone else. She accused me of lying and trying to hurt her.
> We had yet to see each other since being back in touch and no talk of "a relationship" had occurred. She admitted that she had been drinking, and I told myself it was an isolated incident. This event repeated several times before we met again "face-to-face," (and several times after.) Somehow, I convinced myself that she was upset; that given her situation, "Who wouldn't be?"

After filing for divorce, Q started talking about a future relationship. She was still "engaged," but swore she would end it before we got involved. As time passed, I let her push further and further into my life. When I asked her about her "engagement," she told me I was using her as a "safety net." She accused me of lying to her about my life. She accused me of lying to her about everything. She even suggested that my divorce was a lie.

At this point I tried to break it off. Her response? She told me that she had ended things with the abusive ex and had returned the ring. A few days later I ran into her in public, the engagement ring was still on her finger. When I asked her about it, she became irate with me, accusing me of lying and using her.

[Obviously, by now I was aware that many of the examples above were clearly "red flags." Yet, I told myself "my friend needs me." "She needs someone to show her…" well, you get the idea. It was the search to understand why I allow myself to think that way that brought me to Shrink4Men.]

RED Flag #5

Despite recognizing the issues, once she moved out I decided to start seeing her. Immediately she saw everyone in my life as a threat. She accused me of sleeping with my friends, her friends, strangers. If tried to talk to her about it, she accused me of twisting the facts to "blame her." If I told her that it upset me, she said I was acting like a child.

Late one night, she showed up at my house drunk accusing me of sleeping with her friend. She pushed her way inside. I politely asked her to leave. She accused me of all types of crazy things. I stopped being polite and told her to leave.

When she refused, I tried to call 911, as I know better than to try and forcibly remove someone like that. My phone died as I was dialing. She was very animated and screaming by this time. She screams, "That's right, call the cops, you pu$$y, you're not even man enough throw me out of your house!"

Around this time, I discovered that she was again living with the "former fiancé." When I approached her about it, again she blamed me. She accused me of trying to twist the facts to make it sound like her fault. I tried to cut off communication.

The final straw was when she entered my home (using a keypad) against my direct objection; I was not at home at the time. She refused to leave until I spoke to her "face-to-face." I called the police and met them at my house. They removed her without the "face-to-face" conversation; I chose not to press charges. Later, I discovered that during her time in my house she went through everything I own, personal correspondence, bills, journals, etc. She stole several items that belonged to me, to my family, and to my former wife.

Over the next two days I received literally hundreds of phone calls, texts and email messages. I blocked as many phone numbers as my provider allowed, I blocked her email addresses, and she found new ones. Again I called the police, and again I tried to be the "nice guy" and did not press charges. I received one final message, a suicide threat.

At the police officer's suggestion, I filed for a "Domestic Injunction" (i.e. restraining order), as that seemed the most appropriate course of action. In court, she told the judge the sad story of being a single mother targeted by an abusive man who promised her and her child the world, only to yank it out from under them. She explained that she was worried about me after I stopped talking to her, and that the "visit," calls and emails were only to ensure my safety.

I had everything well documented, including the police reports, texts, emails and call logs. Had the judge bothered to even scan the available information, it contradicted everything Q told the court. The judge did not > allow me to speak. He said my petition was all I was allowed to present. I was not allowed to question her or even ask the judge to please read her emails or texts. The judge treated me like a monster and her like the victim.

> In the end, the judge said to me, "You are a despicable human being and as much as it pains me to do this, as Q has not denied the stalking behavior that you have alleged, I am forced to grant this petition. However, I will only allow the minimal time possible, which is 6 months." Then to Q, he said, "I do not know why an attractive woman like yourself would even be seen with such a horrible person. Surely you are smart enough to stay way from people like him in the future."
> As I looked at the judge with complete and utter dismay, I said, "Thank you, your honor." He said everything she needed to hear to validate her behavior. In her mind, it was everyone but her.
> I have not heard from Q since that day in court. Looking back, this is what I would like to tell myself:
> 1. Do not ignore "red flags."
> 2. A bad situation, does not excuse bad behavior.
> 3. Press Charges.
> 4. If you go to court, expect to be treated as a monster.
> Ironically, Q was the first one to tell me about BPD. Her mother had been diagnosed with the condition. I guess it is true what they say "The sh!t don't fall far from the bat."

AVFM News week in review Sept. 26-Oct. 3, 2013

Robert O'Hara · 5 October 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Definitely a week to remember for the MHRM!

Without a doubt, the two biggest stories were the Dr. Miles Groth lecture and the subsequent MHRM rally both taking place in Toronto last weekend. This was an historic time for our movement and will be remembered as a turning point.

Item:

Item: USA Today covers the Miles Groth event at the U of T.

USA Today publishes a piece written by Monica Vendituoli, who does a good job of covering the event and the views of Dr. Groth. However, she cant seem to resist the temptation of making the Men's Issues subject……well……kind of rapey.

Item: Canada's National Post weighs in on the Men's Groups on campus

The National Post foils all other biased reporting as usual.

Item: Massive gender gap exists online says the U.N. OH MY GOD WHAT ARE WE GOING TO DO?

The United Nations spends lots of money and time trying to figure out just who is using the internet and finds, surprise surprise, that more men than women use the internet. Of course, they interpret this as a major gender inequality and do not even consider that men use tools like jackhammers, pole straps, weapons, plows and the internet to provide for and protect women who don't like doing such things for themselves very much. You would think that performing a study on the death gap in the workplace and in war would pique the U.N.'s interest but it doesn't.

Item: Boy suspended after using finger as pretend gun

As I said last week, it just keeps getting better and better.

Item: 28 year old man in jail for having sex with his 21 year old stepdaughter

Yes, according to W Va. law, of all places, having sex with someone you are not genetically related to is incest. Both are charged. But who is in in jail on $70,000 bail? The man of course. Wonder how both trials will turn out.

Item: Ousted Australian PM Gillard divulges her "murderous rage" at Tony Abbot

In a packed hall at Sydney's Opera House Gillard talks about Tony Abbot's charge of sexism made her so angry she wanted to cry.

Item: Newly revealed brief discusses Gillard's rather cynical policy, that didn't work by the way, to hold on to her job.

Hmmm, there seems to be a disconnect here.

Patriarchy caught in the act

A typical victim of violence against women. Truly shocking violence perpetrated by brutal domineering men.

To those who claim that women use false allegations as a tool we say: for shame! Women don't lie about abuse, and women would never abuse a legal system that automatically believes them. –DE

Reasonable Doubt

Diana Davison · 6 October 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Every time a rape is reported a crime has been committed. The crime was either a rape or a false report and police need to determine which one. These crimes don't sound of equal weight but they are, and here's why.

Rape can affect the sexual life of a victim for the rest of their lives. A false accusation can affect the sexual life of a victim for the rest of their lives. Rape can cause an innocent person to feel like they are living in a virtual prison. A false allegation can cause an innocent person to live in a literal prison. Rape can cause extreme physical damage or be part of a murder. A false accusation can result in death. Rape can result in post traumatic stress disorder (PTSD). A false accusation can result in PTSD.

The reason we are asked to listen with compassion to anecdotal evidence of a rape and not anecdotal evidence of false rape accusations is the premise that a woman's life is more important than a man's. There is no way around that fact. We are asked to suspend the human, civil right to be presumed innocent because somewhere some woman might be hurt and that chance outweighs the equal hurt that might be done to a man by the accusation. The discussion is cut off by claims that false rape accusations are extremely rare but the reality is that no acceptable empirical studies have ever been done.

The 2% myth and the extended 6-8% mythical allowance are based on guesses. The only attempts at studying the reports with any sort of methodology have resulted in 40-60% false reports. It's astounding that feminists haven't conducted proper empirical studies to contradict the best evidence we have. You'd think they'd want proof and they seem so damn sure of themselves so it's rather telling that they resist making it a fact.

A false accusation of rape is one of the few crimes against which the victim is offered no protection by our current society. In fact, feminists who have lobbied for anonymity of accusers have no interest in providing anonymity for the accused. By insisting that all rape accusations be automatically believed feminists also show they have little regard for presumption of innocence or reasonable doubt which pits feminists against the very foundation of our legal system.

Presumption of innocence is a legal protection offered to all people, and men are people too, which is based on the idea "that most people are not criminals" and "requires that the trier of fact, be it a juror or judge, begin with the presumption that the state is unable to support its assertion." There is no clause in the constitution that states "unless you are charged with rape."

Freethought Blogs recently entertained an anecdote that appeals to us to disregard the chances of false rape allegations even though we know they happen and even though we know the rate of false reports is undetermined. This was offered to them as a comment on another member's blog and it so impressed a member that she featured it with admonishment that 6-8% false report statistics are wrong. I agree they are wrong, but I'm prone to move the number in the higher direction while this person appeals to consider it lower.

Let us have a look at the story.

EEB is the witness. She says that she was raped but forced to say she made a false accusation, arguing that although she was raped the false accusation stat is elevated by cases like hers. In her story she tells us that police dismissed her because she has a mental illness and "I 'claimed' I had been sexually assaulted in the past." EEB does not claim that the other accusations were true only that this particular story is true. By omission, we can assume the others claims were not true and that she is a false accuser in the past so still a legitimate part of whatever stats may exist "when they wrote their reports." (There are, as yet, no official reports… but we're working on that.)

She doesn't want to tell us what "very flimsy 'evidence'" they had that she was lying for the reason of not "go[ing] into it because it's both complicated and ridiculous" but feels like the rest of the story deserves detail. She tells us that the police officer accusing her of lying has a personal history with bipolar women that tainted him against her but she doesn't think we should be concerned with people's personal histories, like hers. She tells us that a public awareness campaign was launched after her attack was reported and that they spent months questioning her but also asserts that they never believed her claim or took her seriously.

Here is her claim:
EEB was assaulted by a stranger while walking home. She was left "dripping blood," torn from vagina to anus and having burns on her labia, and somehow made it home to call the police instead of an ambulance. Her father is apparently a cop so she might have had that number on faster than 911 speed dial.

She recounts that instead of sending an ambulance they sent "detectives." These detectives told her that the hospital "wasn't ready" for her and, instead, made her answer questions about her rape and what medication she takes. Though she was in shock and "not thinking much" she had the presence of mind to ask for a female "detective" which they denied her, and then asked for a "rape counselor[sic]" when they finally took her to the hospital. The inflatable hospital that just finished getting ready for her only had one black light to look for evidence and it was broken. They also refused to give her any emergency birth control.

My first suggestion to EEB is that she move out of Twin Peaks.

This is truly a monster rapist on the loose. A perineal tear of the third degree usually only happens in childbirth. It should be easy to find a rapist with a cock the girth of a baby's head and who likely has singe marks on his trousers indicating a penis so hot it can burn labia. Of the copious details given, EEB leaves out the part where she got stitches. You'd think she'd want us to know how many it took. When she was being driven home, the same night, it was by the same "detective" who drove her there. So they released her within the time frame of a work shift.

While claiming that, outside of police, she only told two friends and her family, she states that when the bully cop called the papers because "the community needs to know there was no threat to public safety" it was a form of "public humiliation". She tells us the police made her re-enact her rape with the bully cop playing the part of the rapist and then the bully cop made her give him a hug after she admitted she made it all up. Her rape counsellor, kept outside of the interrogation room, appeared to be angry with her but, as fate would have it, she ran into said counsellor two years later only to find out that the woman was mad at the cops instead. We all love happy endings.

This counsellor is credited with previously having "kicked major ass. And really helped me through the process; I don't know what I would have done without her." Ass kicking just ain't what it used to be.

EEB says the police questioned her more about her mental illness than about the rape while complaining that "they made me go through what happened" and that she "described the rape more times than I can count," and "even got on the ground and acted out the rape for them".

I agree with EEB. I think this case is "both complicated and ridiculous." The reason that she told this bizarre story is because she wants us to know that false rape statistics are not accurate. Again, I agree with her. EEB would like her anecdote to convince you not to question rape accusations or to consider how many of them may be false but I think she's accomplished the opposite. I think we need to come up with better tools of analysis and, meanwhile, keep a close eye on all men who have a cock with the circumference of a pineapple.

Anecdotes are the life blood of feminism. They usually contain words and phrases like "shock," "it never crossed my mind," "excruciating," "invasive," "terrible pain," "submitted," "horrific," "I almost died," "accusations," "living hell," "angry men," "panic attack," "humiliation," "terrorizing," "he made me," "over and over and over." And "I'm not the only one."

Well, yes, you are.

Surely nobody else knows what it's like to be EEB. We don't know why she does the things she does, we don't know what special false rape accuser support group she goes to in which so many of her friends share the same fate. I've never heard of such a group. I'd like to read their minutes. I'd also like to thank EEB for sharing what must have been an extremely emotional story to write. It has given us many reasons to demand a proper method of investigation into all accusations. Something thorough, public, well documented, fair, and respectful of all parties involved.

The law is there for everyone's protection. It states if there is a reasonable doubt we must not convict.

In His Own Words: BPD Mom and a recently divorced custody evaluator walk into a courtroom . . .

Dr. Tara J. Palmatier · 6 October 2013 · Archived copy · Original

It's day 6 of Domestic Violence Awareness Month. Today's In His Own Words features "Thom" — yet another father and child casualty of the family court meat grinder.

Thom could no longer take his Borderline Personality Disordered wife's abuse and filed for divorce. Even though Thom had overwhelming evidence proving he is the better parent and that his wife is incredibly troubled, it didn't matter. The freshly divorced custody evaluator, his former sister-in-law (a social worker), his lying ex-wife and an impotent family court judge saw to that.

> A BPD Mom and a Recently Divorced Custody Evaluator Walk into a Courtroom…
> I always knew something wasn't quite right with my ex-wife. I had a visceral reaction to her comments and interactions almost daily. For example, "Men are scum. I don't believe in monogamy. I can take care of myself." In hindsight, she exhibited most, if not all, of the borderline personality disorder traits from early on.
> She played the victim role to a "T." I am a people pleaser-hero-rescuer type, so I foolishly felt a need to help, protect and love her since she was misunderstood and treated so unkindly by all the men before me, or so I was told. I also grew up with high expectations to follow in my very accomplished father's footsteps. I was always trying to be perfect, to make others happy and that's what I did with my ex. I continually made excuses for her and purposefully didn't tell my friends and family what she was saying and doing behind closed doors.
> I felt trapped because we had a child on the way. A few of my friends (who are counselors) mentioned they thought my then wife exhibited many borderline characteristics. I talked her into going to couples counseling, but she lied at every session and tried to recruit the counselor as a negative advocate.
> During our time together she:
> - Systematically isolated me from my friends/family.
> - Took control of our finances, set a budget for us and then didn't follow it putting us $10,000 in debt.
> - Called me all kinds of names.
> - Accused me of wanting to sleep with her sister if we hung out without her.
> - Accused me of cheating on her.
> - Slapped me.
> - Threatened to leave and take our child away from me after every disagreement, no matter how small the disagreement.
> - Our marriage counselor asked her not to threaten divorce for 6 months. Once we left the session, she yelled at me and stated that she didn't want to be married to me any more.
> - Moved my belongings into the guest room numerous times after a disagreement – saying we should just be friends.
> - Called me evil, said she hated me, said I made her pregnancy unbearable, that I was a terrible husband and father and that she would never have a second child with me.
> - Told me I was not the man she fell in love with almost daily.

- Secretly maintained contact with her exes, yet cried and made threats and ultimatums if I hung out with a completely platonic female friend.
- She grew up poor, so I went into debt buying her a Tiffany's engagement ring.
- We had the wedding she wanted. It was a small ceremony – none of my family and friends were allowed to attend.
- We had the birth she wanted – a home birth with all her family in the room. I wanted an intimate/private symbolic birth of our new beginning free of her family's constant intrusions.
- I traded my car in because she couldn't drive a stick shift to get something we could both drive.
- At the end of our marriage, she claimed there was no reason for her to stay because I "did nothing" for her.

When she slapped me, I stopped, sat back, and said in a very calm, but direct tone, "Please never touch my face or hit me like that ever again." I explained that I had been blindsided in a bar once and had my nose broken and that I had a girlfriend shove me in the face once and her ring scratched my eye.

My ex said that I couldn't hold her accountable for the events that happened earlier in my life and now that I asked her to stop, she was going to slap me more whenever she had the chance.

She had sexual hang ups from day one. She cried when I touched her, said it hurt when I stimulated her, that her nipples were too sensitive to touch, etc. Through all the weirdness, somehow we got pregnant.

We had no sex for 9 months, and she used the pregnancy as an excuse not to be intimate and to explain her drastic and violent mood swings. If I tried to be physical she said I was being insensitive. If I didn't touch her then I was told, "You don't find me attractive" or "You think I'm gross" or "You think I'm ugly." After an argument, she would run off with no discussion with our child to live with her sister.

I finally had enough and filed for divorce.

We had comprehensive psychological evaluations done. We both took the MMPI and the MCMI. She was found to be clinically histrionic (96th percentile), to be "incapable of sustaining interpersonal relationships" and "overly dramatic to a point that her behavior causes severe problems with family, friends, and ultimately our marriage." Our marriage counselor reported that my ex exhibited traits from all the cluster B disorders (Narcissistic Personality Disorder, Borderline Personality Disorder and Histrionic Personality Disorder) and also believes she was sexually abused. All of this information was presented to a custody evaluator along with 200+ emails and 43 recorded voicemails that included all of the above abuse.

The judge initially ruled that I was to have "temporary legal custody" since I was the "more fit parent to make medical decisions." My ex failed to bring our child to the doctor when she was throwing up for 2 days straight, refused to get her vaccinations, refused to give eye drops for a severe case of bacterial conjunctivitis, etc.

I am an educator and have impeccable relationships with my colleagues, students and their families. During our custody evaluation, the following people spoke to the custody evaluator on my behalf:

- My school's principal;
- My school's two vice-principals;
- 15 teachers from my school;
- Our pediatrician (my ex didn't believe in modern medicine or vaccinations and caused scenes at numerous baby check ups and shots);
- The behavior specialist at my school;

- Two special education teachers at my school;
- Two ESL teachers at my school;
- Three groups of parents of former students;
- Two marriage counselors; and
- Two school counselors.

All of them told the custody evaluator about their concerns regarding my ex and described my positive attributes. In sharp contrast, my ex had her younger sister (a social worker) and a family friend speak to the evaluator. That's it. She has no one else. And I discussed that fact with the evaluator.

The custody evaluator, freshly out of her own divorce, dismissed all the information and claimed there was "absolutely no sign of emotional abuse in our relationship."

All of my character witnesses got a 2-sentence paragraph in a 29-page evaluation document. It read, "XXXXXXX is a well respected professional. He has numerous friends and coworkers that confirm he is an excellent teacher and friend."

The custody evaluator also said that I have "little to no understanding of early childhood development" and that having "limited time" with me was in our daughter's "best interests." I found this quite odd since I have a Masters Degree in Education with 12 credit hours of undergrad course work, 10 hours of graduate course work and almost 10 years of teaching experience.

My ex even lied on the witness stand in front of the judge and had her sister (the social worker) lie to the custody evaluator. She faked tears and told an hour's worth of BS stories claiming I was the abuser and that I did all of the things she was guilty of and what we had talked about her doing to me at our numerous counseling sessions. She stopped just short of accusing me of child abuse, using the words "neglectful" and "uncaring" in regards to my daughter and me.

In the end, the custody evaluator overturned the judge's ruling and cleared my ex of any wrongdoing. She said that she is "fine" and that I "made everything up." The psych evaluator suggested that my ex get into an intensive counseling program, but my ex refuses saying, "I'm fine. You are the one who is fed up."

She now has full legal and physical custody.

Towards the end of our time together, she would cry during intercourse or oral sex, so I stopped trying. My body shut down and for the first time I experienced impotence and premature ejaculation. Since the divorce, she has asked for back rubs and has sent me sexually explicit texts/pictures. She is back to her old ways dating numerous guys simultaneously. She drops hints about her "friends" or tells stories about her latest guy. Last week at the custody exchange she mentioned that all she wants to do lately is have lots of sex.

Recently, our 3-year old daughter was on the toilet and was patting her legs. She looked up at me and said, "Mommy says I have big fat legs." When my ex picked her up that evening she said, "Hurry up and get in the car. We need to get home since mommy hasn't eaten all day." I wrote my ex a very factual, polite email about eating disorders (ex had both anorexia and bulimia when she was a teen) and suggested that she choose her words a bit more carefully around our daughter. In response I got a page long email about how it's none of my business, how I don't support my ex's vegan lifestyle and that she was "only teasing" our daughter, etc.

My daughter has also said that mommy cries in the bathroom a lot and yells and puts her in time out all the time. I get her for 2 hours on Wednesday evenings and from 7:45am on Saturdays until 5:30pm on Sundays. When it's time to hand her back over, she refuses to go out to meet her mother every single time. She throws her shoes behind the couch and runs upstairs and hides in her room. She grabs my clothes and cries and verbalizes that she doesn't want to go to mommy's house.

I will just have to wait it out until my daughter is old enough. Maybe the courts will listen to her about what is > going on in her mother's home. Hopefully, her mental/emotional state will not be irreparably damaged by then.

> Divorcing my BPD ex and trying to exercise my parental rights has been a 3-year, $30,000 battle. A battle in which all I wanted was 50% of the time with my daughter and for my ex to assume 50% of our marital debt (we were married less than a year and she managed to rack up $10,000 in credit card debt), which is generous seeing as she took every piece of baby furniture, clothes, accessory, etc., and I am forced to pay $700 a month in child support.
> I guess I am just lost in all this. I am stuck here and will need to interact with this woman for the next 15 years. I don't want anything to do with her and don't know how to successfully deal with her when she tries to instigate a fight or sex. I know I don't want our daughter to grow up to be like my ex and her family. They are all divorced, on welfare, bankrupt, have removed children from their fathers and are completely enmeshed.
> It kills me. But there is nothing I can do.

Student facing possible sex offender registry commits suicide

Robert O'Hara · 6 October 2013 · Archived copy · Original

On the evening of Friday, September 27th in the small town of Harvest Alabama, a community of just over 5,000 souls, a fifteen year old boy took off his clothes and ran naked across a football field where the Sparkman High School Senators were playing against a rival team in front of a large crowd. His friends cheered, old women blushed, young children pointed their fingers and asked "Mommy why is that kid running around naked?" leaving parents flustered while trying to hold back their laughter. Someone had even recorded a video and placed it on Youtube. By the end of the night Christian Adamek had become legend by pulling a prank performed by countless pranksters before him on countless playing fields in front of countless millions in the past.

Last week, on Wednesday October 2nd, Christian hung himself and it was announced Friday morning in AL.com that he had died from his injuries.

Adamek's suicide followed a public statement made by Sparkman High School Principal Mike Campbell on Tuesday of last week to WHNT News 19, the local Television Station, in which he stated the incident could bring Adamek major repercussions. Adamek had been disciplined by the school district, though details of that discipline were not made public, and he faced legal charges. School administrators recommended that Adamek have a hearing in the Madison County court system to determine if formal charges would be filed, WHNT reported. "There's the legal complications," Campbell told the news station. "Public lewdness and court consequences outside of school with the legal system, as well as the school consequences that the school system has set up."

The "legal complications" Campbell was referring to included having to register as a sex offender.

When asked if this was nothing more than a simple prank Campbell responded: "This situation was totally different, something not related to that at all."

Adamek's sister indicated on Twitter that her brother was facing expulsion.

The publicizing of his troubles with the school and the legal system were orchestrated by Campbell before any legal hearings were scheduled and shortly after administrative actions by school officials. It is not known now to what extent the family had been involved in preliminary hearings or to what extent they were even informed at all about the length to which Campbell would take the case before he spoke to the local press.

Campbell is new to the school, having only started work there on July 1st. However, he has been in secondary education for over thirty years with most of that time being spent in Fairfax County, Virginia. He started in athletics coaching basketball, football and girls softball before going into administration. Last year he left Centerville High School, a large school in Northern Virginia given high marks by the Virginia Department of Education. It was the second ranked school in Virginia by Newsweek in 2011.

"Redditor"AndrewLevin posted the original story from AL.com on r/MensRights Friday shortly after it was published. "Feminists will never wash the ocean of blood that they have on their hands. I remember Chris as a little boy. Like many little boys these days, Chris was born with two strikes against him: (1) He was a boy, and (2) his battery was too big for his body. Too much energy, too much masculinity, the perfect feminist scapegoat," he said in the comments.

Comments on AL.com's original story share AndrewLevin's rage. Some are calling for a mass streaking during the next football game and others are already publicizing details for future school board elections, coming up in November, upcoming hearings and contact info.

Attila Vinczer joins AVFM management team

Paul Elam · 6 October 2013 · Archived copy · Original

It is with the utmost pleasure and honor that I am able to announce that Attila Vinczer has been offered, and has accepted, the position of Director of Canadian News and Activism with A Voice for Men.

In this position, Attila will oversee Canadian news reports from the MHRM within the borders of Canada, but even more importantly he will be coordinating events (with our dedicated support) as the official head of all AVFM sponsored Canadian activism.

As no doubt most of you know, Attila recently organized and coordinated the wonderfully successful Rally for Men and Boys in Crisis in Queen's Park, Ontario on September 28.

As the head of Canada Court Watch, Attila has extensive experience with activism that targets many of the same issues that we address here at A Voice for Men. He is, at least in my observation and opinion, a remarkable blend of hard work, no-nonsense pragmatism and warm, genuine concern for the struggles faced by men and boys.

In short, he is a hard-edged activist driven by compassion. He is the right man for the job and he will serve as a critically important bridge between Canadian activists and activists from other countries. All of us are proud and excited to add him to the leadership team of A Voice for Men. His acceptance was passed by our board with a conspicuous and enthusiastic lack of dissent.

I ask you to please join me in expressing gratitude to Attila Vinczer for the work his has done and now the work yet to come as a member of the AVFM management team.

These are already exciting times that just got a little more amazing.

Misandric Fixation in 19th Century Europe

Robert St. Estephe · 6 October 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Robert St. Estephe–Gonzo Historian–is dedicated to uncovering the forgotten past of marginalizing men. "Gonzo journalism" is characterized as tending "to favor style over fact to achieve accuracy." Yet history – especially "social history" – is written by ideologues who distort and bury facts in order to achieve an agenda. "Gonzo" writing is seen as unorthodox and surprising. Yet, in the 21st century subjectivity, distortion and outright lying in non-fiction writing is the norm. Fraud is the new orthodoxy. Consequently, integrity is the new "transgressive."

Welcome to the disruptive world of facts, the world of Gonzo History.

Readers of A Voice for Men are familiar with some of the more notable and articulate present-day adherents to gender ideology of the SCUM Manifesto variety such as Josefin von Zeipel Segerberg and Pamela O'Shaughnessy ("Vliet Tiptree," pseudonym). Many people erroneously suppose, however, that the eugenics-inspired, genocidal ideation-styled, violent authoritarian types of feminist utopian philosophy find their source exclusively in ideology. The fact is that the mentality called misandric fixation (see "What is Misandric Fixation?") need not arise through the influence of ideology or deliberate intellectual cogitation of any sort. Further it can be observed that ideological misandry has existed long before the explosion of radical feminism in the 1960s.

The following article published in 1901 documents famous European misandrists of the late 19th century: Marie Irrgang of Austria, Gretchen Marie Schultz of Germany, and Marie Lenoir. Fraulein Marie Irrgang, who claimed to be the premier man-hater of her country, was a member of a formal misandrist organization, society called the Jungfrauen Verein [Virgin's Association.

FULL TEXT: News comes from Vienna of the death of Fraulein Marie Irrgang, who claimed to be the "champion man hater" of the world. The fraulein was should be allowed to take part in her funeral procession. An early disappointment in love is believed to have been the cause of Marie's hatred of the "mere man." She was a member of a society called the Jungfrauen Verein [Virgin's Association], an association of old girls and young girls who had been converted to the antiman views of Fraulein Irrgang. Though the fraulein decreed that no man should take part in her funeral she could not prevent men and the streets the procession passed with the male animals she so much detested, gazing curiously at the unique sight. The procession was composed of an immense throng of women of all ages and all social conditions and of deputies from every woman's society in Austria. But Marie's directions were not carried out to the letter after all, for the banner of the Jungfrauen Verein was so heavy that no woman could be found who was strong enough to carry it. So it was born aloft by one of the hated sex, who marched along, the only man in the procession.

Fraulein Irrgang had a rival in Fraulein Gretchen Marie Schultz, an old maiden lady of Berlin who was known throughout Germany as "the man hater." Having had an unfortunate love affair fifty years ago she vowed that she never would speak to or, if possible, look upon a man again as long as she lived, and, being a woman of wealth, she was able to keep her vow until her death not long ago. She bought a retired house about a dozen miles from Berlin and equipped it from basement to garret with furnishings made by the hands of women. She surrounded herself with a band of women, each of whom took a similar vow of perpetual hatred of the opposite sex, and so skillfully were things managed that for fifty years the fraulein neither saw nor spoke to man or boy.

Another man hater, and one who carried her hatred beyond the tomb, was Marie Lenoir, who died in Paris a few months ago. By her will she left her whole estate, valued at $15,000, in trust to two women of her acquaintance holding similar views with her self regarding men, “to be used in waging warfare in such ways as may seem fitting to them against the selfishness and tyranny of man.”

[“They Hated Men. – Three Women Who Waged Lifelong War Against the Sterner Sex.” Syndicated, The Piqua Daily Call (Oh.), Nov. 26, 1901, p. 6]

The French writer who called herself Arria-Ly (1881-1934) had a similar philosophy to her earlier counterparts and wished to found a movement promoting universal virginity on the part of women for the purpose of eradicating the male sex. It remains unclear whether “virginity” referred to heterosexual intercourse exclusively.

•?••?•

EXCERPT: Still more extreme [in her anti-male views than Louise Deverly-Dupont] was Arria-Ly (Josephine Gondon, 1881-1934), who along with her mother campaigned for women’s suffrage in their home town of Toulouse. From her youth both parents had instilled in her a revulsion against the flesh and sexuality. Something of a latter-day Cathar, she aspired to found a new cult of “arrialsme” which would be a perfect expression of her hatred of the male sex, whose ultimate extinction she envisaged by the practice of universal virginity on the part of women – a cause which did not endear her to the villagers of the Ariège where she regularly repaired for health reasons. Her short-lived newspaper Le Combat féministe had just forty-four subscribers and, following the death of her mother, whom she called “sister,” in 1934 she took her own life.

Parker vs The Man: Empower yourself, learn jury nullification

From Caleb Leverett's Youtube channel.

I have a dedication for this video, but first I want to thank a lot of people for their unbelievable support of me and my kids, Parker, Hayden, Blaine and London. First, my parents, Shane and Debbie Leverett for loving the kids and me through thick and thin and always being there, along with my sisters Hillary and Randi B. I love you all.

Many thanks to my Liberty movement community and your kind words and support and/or influence; Jordan Page, Michelle with Oath Keepers, Cil Malik, Tracy Diaz, Christopher Cantwell, Tripp and Proctor with Liberty Movement Radio, Derrick Broze, Adam House, Kristen Meghan, Glenn Horowitz, John Bush and Catherine Bliesch of Sovereign Living, Antonio Buehler, Paul Elam, Pete Eyre, Nathan Coffey, Johanna, Derrick J., Ben Farmer my former co-host and dear friend, Nichole Rosado, Gazi Abdulla, Ken and Gigi Bowman, Matthew Short, Stefan Molyneux, Debbie Sturgeon, Amanda LaPlante, John Wainman, Ben Vonderheide, Shannon Sealy, Carrie, all the good folks at gardap.org, Jarrod Eicher, Bobbie Seale of the Black Panther Party, Tatiana Moroz, Landon Hanks, Mike Gunger, Janelle Lang, Wayne Walton, Ross and Ashli Groening, Valerie Sargent Martin, Jim Funke, Teshia, Lea Kelly, Barbi and Brian Castillo, Jeffrey Phillips, Rob Pepe, Kristen Meghan, Mark Bunch, Danny Anderson, Brandi Lee (love you, babe), Danny Panzella, and about a thousand others that I'm forgetting at the moment. Also, BIG thanks to the TeamParker fans from all over the world from countries like, Canada, Mexico, Japan, England, Saudi Arabia, Scotland, Ireland, Sweden, China, Denmark, India and a few others… It is so humbling to read all of your kind letters.

Not to forget, my attorney, Will Doonan and his lovely wife, Jennifer.

I'd also like to thank my second former wife, Samantha, along with her family, Mike, Gigi, Mimi and Popo. I will never forget what you did to help my kids and me and I love you all.

A special thanks to the beautiful and goofy Marinda. I don't know how I would have made it through the daily grind without you. I love you so much.

And finally, I dedicate this video to my dear friend Adam Kokesh. Adam is not perfect, but neither am I. For that matter, neither is Parker. Adam is currently being held as a political prisoner in Washington, DC. He did not create a victim. Basically, he is accused of exercising his second amendment right, (along with holding an illegal plant, which is not even mentioned in the Constitution). Parker and Adam have some things in common. Both are being held against their will and neither have threatened anyone or created a victim, but at least prisoners are allowed a phone call.

To quote Adam Kokesh, "They don't consider things that don't immediately affect their quality of life or the moral implications of their actions". Adam is more than a friend. He is a teacher and I have learned so much from him, as has Parker. Even before Parker came to live with me, he would go over to his friends' houses on weekends, gain internet access and watch Adam's videos.

Parker looks up to Adam. I wrote to Adam in prison. and told him about the video you just watched. He wrote me back on 8/27/13 and in the post script he said, "PS tell Parker I said he's a bigger badass than I am. Seriously. I don't know if I'd have the guts & perspective & wisdom to do what he's done at his age. At his age, I KNOW I wouldn't!"

It is quite easy to look into Adam's past and my past. Our lives are pretty much an open book. I assure you that you will not agree with everything either of us has said or done, but I also assure you that you will find that none of our actions have created a victim or threatened anyone. If we truly live in the "land of the free", then should not Adam be out of a cage and Parker be living with me?

I implore you to please look up “Jury Nullification.”

> The primary function of the independent juror is not, as many think, to dispense punishment to fellow citizens accused of breaking various laws, but to protect fellow citizens from tyrannical abuses of power by government. The Constitution guarantees you the right to trial by jury. This means the government must bring its’ case before a jury of the people if it wants to deprive any person of life, Liberty or property. Jurors can say no to government tyranny by refusing to convict.

This is printed on fija.org I’ve got much more to say, but YouTube won’t allow the length.

It’s about time...

In His Own Words: Princess turns into a poisonous toad

Dr. Tara J. Palmatier · 7 October 2013 · Archived copy · Original

It's day 7 of Domestic Violence Awareness Month. A Voice for Men, Shrink4Men and DAHMW are committed to raising awareness about male victims of domestic abuse, the invisible victims.

Today's In His Own Words is about a man who kissed a princess only to watch her turn into a poisonous toad shortly after saying, "I do." He thought he was marrying the woman of his dreams. In reality, she is the stuff of nightmares.

> Princess Turns into a Poisonous Toad
> In the beginning:
> I planned to treat my bride to a tropical honeymoon full of adventure including, hikes, snorkeling, sandy beaches, exploring and animal watching on the Galapagos Islands. We didn't have much money at that time, so I planned the second part of our trip on a yacht called the Darwin. It was not a Carnival cruise ship, and its cabins were rather narrow with bunk beds drilled into the starboard hull and no mattresses thicker than two feet.
> The first night of the cruise, my wife's displeasure at my 'poor' job in choosing a cruise with suitable conditions was evident. She constantly complained and criticized my planning ability to provide for a 'proper' marriage.
> Soon the comparisons to daddy started. Daddy would know how to treat his girls on a trip. He would plan properly to make sure everyone was taken care of. How dare I not know that the boat I chose would be subpar for her! After I softly and unwittingly suggested that, while it's not perfect, it didn't mean we weren't going to enjoy our honeymoon, I was able to assuage her temper that night.
> The following morning while getting ready for the day, my wife had the misfortune to drop a contact lens. This event triggered a narcissistic rage episode. While rehashing my inadequacies in a loud, aggressive and tearful tone, she slapped me in the face and demanded that I help find her contact.
> I was really bewildered. I did not know how to react.
> In the end, in order to assuage her, I helped her find her Pure Optical contact lens and calmly reassured her that everything would be OK. A voice deep-down told me I should divorce her. However, given that we'd been married for less than a week, I allowed myself to rationalize away the incident.
> I thought, "What about the fortune her daddy just spent to put on a spectacular wedding? My family just spent a fortune on travel just to support my wedding. I can't leave her now. She was just upset, and rightly so. This cabin is a bit small. I probably could have researched it a little more and done a better job to make her happy, etc."
> I started to withdraw some that day from her. My wife then apologized to me, while still blaming me and said that that wouldn't happen again. Since my image and reputation as a newlywed was vested in that, I happily accepted her apology and tried to forget the incident.
> A few months later:
> My wife was very 'family oriented' and "needed" to be around her family very much. I pointed out that I wanted to be respected as an autonomous person and balance that with her need to be with her family. My desires were secondary to those of her family and their plan and vision for my life.
> One day, I had another engagement to attend to and was trying to hurry the family visit along. This upset my wife very much. While driving to pick up some food, she started in on how I was disrespecting her family and slapped me in the face while I drove. How dare I have my own schedule and desires! It's important that the family leave the country club together and be together!
> I rationalized this one away as well. I told myself we'd be moving to Florida soon and I'd be rid of that influence. Once in a new environment, she'd grow up and be a rational human being. She just needed to change her environment.

A few months later:

My wife and I were 'happily' adjusting to a new life in Florida. However, the loss of her family was too much to bear. My wife couldn't function without them. I was a terrible thorn in her side for marrying her. She had many other suitors, but she chose me and I was making her unhappy. I had no career, no family, nothing for her.

I tried to ease her pain by staying with her, comforting her and making friends for her. I found other newlyweds from similar backgrounds and befriended them. Naturally, my wife was jealous that I was making friends and accused me of cheating with the married women I thought would be good friends for my wife and me.

In public, she can be quite charming and we arranged some double dates. On one double date, she didn't understand a direct question our new friends were asking her. I didn't come to her immediate aid and she felt stupid and humiliated. On the ride home, I got slapped again. I still felt terribly for her and tried all the more to make her assimilate and fit in. I felt I needed to 'raise' her into adulthood.

As the years pass:

My wife decided I was no good working menial office tasks with no future. She preyed on my desire to make something of myself, after firmly projecting how worthless I was to her. I wanted to finish my college education and be a 'professional' for her and give her the life she deserved. After all, all her friends were married to professionals.

She was 'slaving' away at a clerical position for me, while I was bumbling around. My previous college credits didn't transfer, but it didn't stop me from going from clerical position, to pizza delivery driver, to busboy, to server to eventually, a chemical engineer.

During this time, my wife became pregnant with our first daughter. The resolve to be a good father came over me and so did my wife's tyrannical behavior. This is when the mask started coming off completely. After all sorts of verbal abuse on how I don't care enough, I'm not a good father, etc. It further cemented my resolve to be the best father I could be.

Eventually, there were more episodes of violence. I was slapped for asking her to be quiet while talking to her sister on the phone. Our daughter was sleeping. There were episodes of broken glass and then it happened, the first suicide attempt.

She was yelling about how all I cared about was our daughter and smashing stuff up. After trashing the house, she ran into the kitchen and pulled out a knife. I screamed, "No!" and wrestled the blade from her and calmed her down. I just had a kid with this woman. The psychological torture was horrible.

I asked her to get professional help. She replied, "I was never like this until I met you. I don't need any help." At that point, I I retreated further into my studies and fatherhood.

The verbal abuse, and sometimes physical abuse (not slapping anymore, but pinching and punching), continued up until I was about to graduate college. Then for a month, it stopped. She was kind, nice, sincere and lavished praise on me! I did it! I had earned my BS in engineering! We should have another kid! Are you kidding me!

I had sex one time and she was pregnant. Once the pregnancy was confirmed, she went right back to being worse than before. There was, yet again, a second suicide attempt. This one occurred after another episode of domestic violence. What triggered it? I didn't take her to the beach she wanted to go to, I took her to a nicer one. This caused a rage episode in front of her sister who I was taking care of because of poor school behavior.

I was ready for this attempt. I scooped up our two-year old, ran out of the house and called the police. Naturally, the police found the house trashed with broken glass and took her to the mental health facilities. She then put on the charm and played the pregnant card. I stuck with her because she was carrying my baby. She knew I felt a strong obligation to our children and used it against me.

Next, she was diagnosed with a common pre-cancer in the cervix. How she milked that one. The awful conditions I was making her live in caused her cancer. Though I showed her report after report that it's common and has a rather simple procedure to fix, it was high drama for her. In the end, a healthy baby girl was born.

End Game:

After my daughter was born, I finished college and looked for work. I had an internship across the country in California. Though I asked my wife to continue working until I gained full-time employment, she decided she had worked enough and the children required her undivided attention. This included taking the children out of the country to visit her family for my entire internship, despite my logical explanations as to why this wouldn't be healthy for the children. My eldest was completely lost to me once I got her back.

After my internship, I got a job in California and we moved as a family. Once there, I made every effort to acclimate my wife to a new life. It didn't take long for her to hit me again, accuse me of cheating on her and try to throw me out of the house. Two weeks after buying the house I was never good enough to get for her, she staged a third suicide attempt.

Again, I pulled the knife from her hand after a long and deliberate campaign to 'prove' to the kids what a jerk I was. I comforted her and took her out for ice-cream. I was bewildered again, and had decided that I had done everything she demanded of me, worked my tail off to give it to her, but she would never be satisfied.

I asked her for a divorce the next day.

That put her into high gear. Divorce! No, never! How could such a good man like me divorce the mother of his children!? She promised she'd do counseling. I was exhausted at this point and told her my mind was made up, but she wore me down for counseling.

She went to see a therapist for depression. I came in two sessions later and the therapist told me, "You need to get out as soon as you can!" I was so relieved it wasn't the same "communication and understanding" garbage I'd heard at the church after her second suicide attempt.

However, I was very afraid to pull the trigger. I knew what kind of a tyrant she was, and thought about my children. I knew that I had never held her accountable for her behavior, and in many ways enabled it by not knowing how to stand up for myself. Believe me, I tried to do it logically, but I fear the only language she understands is drama and craziness. Eventually, after six months of therapy, I worked up the courage to serve her.

When she was served, she had another narcissistic rage episode. I was fixing a child's car seat for her so she could go out. She punched me twice. I threatened to call the police. She said, "Ouch, you just hit me! Who are the police going to believe?"

With this taunting and craziness, I got really, really scared. I tried to leave with my children, but my eldest, who is the emotional caretaker of her mommy wouldn't leave with me. My wife demanded I hand over the children and threatened to take golf clubs to my car and call the police.

Her threats worked and she hung up on 911. 911 called back and my wife said there was no problem. She then took the kids and put them in her car and told me, "You'll never win them. They'll always love me!" With that she left.

I called the police to give them my side of the story. I was still in shock and feeling guilty — guilty for giving her divorce papers. I told the police, it's not necessary to arrest her, she didn't hurt me, but she did hit me and I don't want her making false accusations. Essentially, I was still trying to be a white knight and excused her behavior. She ended up going to jail, but was released the next day.

Currently:

I'm still living in the same house with her as we go through the divorce. If I leave the house, I lose my kids and > the house. My finances are gone. Everything I've worked for is gone.

> My oldest feels the need to reject me completely, especially when her mother is present. She is a miniature version of her mother. All of this has happened because I tried to love my wife and make her happy.
> If anyone reading this is in the same boat. Stop protecting her. Tell somebody. Don't keep it in and rationalize it away.
> Chances are, most folks won't believe you or care. But, you may find somebody who can really help. If you have kids, you will feel trapped. However, you still need to find help and find a way to protect yourself and your kids and get them out if you can. Find a good therapist to help you and read Shrink4men!

If you are in a relationship with an abusive woman and have considered leaving, but are still hopeful, for whatever reason, that you can make it work, please pay attention to these stories. Each of the men featured In His Own Words held out hope, tried their hardest to make their partners happy and were still brutalized, often with the help of law enforcement and the courts. Here are the lessons:

1. Do not ignore, rationalize or minimize the red flags.
2. Once the mask slips, do not ignore the crazy. Get out and get away as far and as fast as you can.
3. If you "love" her and just "can't" break it off, do not have children with these women. The children will become hostages and weapons. They will also likely become the next generation of Abusers and Codependents.
4. Tell your friends, family or a therapist about the abuse. You might think you're "protecting her," but in reality you are enabling her. Get help and support for yourself.
5. ABR (Always Be Recording) the abuse and DDD (Document! Document! Document!) the abuse. If you don't, you may not be believed. Even if you record her abuse, you still may not be believed in our misandrist women-can-do-no-wrong culture.
6. If she assaults you, don't be a "nice guy," be a smart guy and press charges.
7. If she makes suicide threats, call the cops. If she's serious, she needs psychiatric help. If she threatens suicide/makes a parasuicidal gesture, she still needs psychiatric help.
8. It won't get better. Develop an exit strategy and GTFO (Get the F*ck Out).

In His Own Words is a joint effort between DAHMW, Shrink4Men and AVoiceForMen to help raise awareness about the invisible victims of domestic violence, men. If you would like to submit your story, please follow the guidelines at the end of this article.

Those who believe fatherhood is a social construction rather than a deep biological reality that begins from before birth have much to answer for, as do those who continue to promulgate the myth of the Stern Violent Brutish Father.

Asshole of the Year: Principal Michael Campbell

Paul Elam · 7 October 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Those of us in the MHRM work in a world that at times seems to be full of assholes. There are gender ideologues who insist that all men are potential rapists and other kinds of abusers. There are politicians that pass all manner of corrupt and oppressive legislation in order to pander to an ill informed and misled electorate.

There are countless academicians that churn out one mendacious line of agitprop after another disguised as scholarly pursuits and valid research. And of course there are legions of twisted commentators on blogs and more mainstream outlets everywhere fueling the fires of this rampant sickness.

So, one must assume, it is not an easy job to sift through all these assholes to find one that somehow rises above the others; one whose actions somehow distinguish him or her as specially deserving of our recognition and repugnance. We might argue endlessly, comparing the relative damage they have caused and measuring the level of depravity in their indifference to it.

For me, however, there is no argument needed. If we are to look through the hoard of possible candidates and force ourselves to name one person, one asshole that is a shoe-in for such recognition, we need to look no further than Sparkman High School Principal Michael Campbell.

I will vote for the asshole with blood on his hands every time, and Mike Campbell's hands are soaked in it.

As most all readers here will know, fifteen year old Christian Adamek, a young man in the educational care of Principal Campbell, hanged himself a week after streaking through a high school football game.

What started, and should have ended, as a mischievous – but largely harmless — prank by a somewhat impulsive youth, became a tragedy that snuffed the very life from him; that cut a swath into the soul and spirit of his family from which they will never recover; that sent a community spiraling into the depths of grief and confusion.

Michael Campbell could have prevented all of this. Instead he stands out as the primary reason that it happened.

What do we expect from an educator with thirty years of experience with the well-being of young minds and young lives? Well, I for one expect wisdom, forbearance and the sensible comprehension of compassionate justice as it applies to molding young lives. I know that is what Christian needed; that he deserved, and he certainly did not forsake his right to it with a simple lapse in judgment, even if what he did could be called that.

What he needed was a measured and appropriate response by the adults responsible for his life. What he got was a career administrator playing the gender politics of the day, taking part in an administrative witch hunt — building a public altar on which this boy was to be sacrificed. And sacrificed he was, in the most literal meaning of the word.

Michael Campbell had the choice to teach this young man a lesson; to help him grow into adulthood. He could have issued thoughtful and instructive consequences for something that in my youth did nothing more than raise eyebrows and cause laughter. Instead he gave statements to the press and implied the coming criminal prosecution that could have branded this young man forever. Instead he persecuted a young life, and that young life was lost.

His willingness to speak to the press stopped for some reason at the same time Christian's heart did the same.

I understand, we are not in the days of my youth any more. What was once considered the normal antics of adolescence is now, at least where it concerns boys, considered vile and predatory. We have hung a target directly on their young backs, and Mike Campbell, seeing the opportunity, recklessly took aim and fired. In doing so, he robbed Christian Adamek of the future for which he was supposed to help him prepare.

Campbell might have imagined he was doing heroes work in the new gender zeitgeist. Perhaps he was going to show all his contemporaries that he was abreast of the times; that he was aware of the threat, particularly sexual, that all young men represent. Maybe was going to show the world that he by God knew how to deal with this sort of thing, and Christian was going to serve as the example to prove it.

One has to wonder, though, at what point in Mike Campbell's mind did Christian Adamek cease being a student for which he was responsible and start being his professional convenience, or if he was ever anything else.

Though Christian's family will never have the luxury of forgetting, the rest of the world sadly will. In time, pitifully short at that, he will just be another stone marker in a world that does not tarry long on the untimely death of young men no matter how egregiously or senselessly we lose them.

Mike Campbell will undoubtedly have the condolences of those who love or fear him. Well-wishers and sycophants will stroke his back and assure him there was no way for him to know. Undoubtedly he will hear many such lies. He will swim in them, even as they lower this young man into the ground.

Perhaps in time Campbell's work will garner more recognition for excellence. His schools have already been the recipient of such accolades. He might, as he nears the end of his career, even receive some sort of lifetime achievement award.

A lifetime. How short and fleeting that can be in the wrong hands.

What law will be named after Christian Adamek?

Scott Greenfield · 7 October 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Streaking. It was a fad for a while in the 1970′s, funny, harmless and certain to piss off the grown ups. At the Harvard-Yale game in 2006, a nostalgic MIT hacker reminded them which school had the best sense of humor.

This isn't to be flippant about what follows in this post, but rather to provide context to the seriousness of the offense with which 15-year-old Sparkman High School student Christian Adamek was charged. From AL.com:

> Christian Adamek, 15, hanged himself Wednesday and died this morning from his injuries, Madison County Coroner Craig Whisenant said today. Adamek's death came less than a week after he was arrested for streaking across the Sparkman High football field during the Senators' Sept. 27 football game against Grissom High School.

What was an immediate "legend" among his classmates on twitter turned swiftly into a nightmare.

> The conversation on social media took the situation lightly in the first few days, with some students calling Adamek a "legend" and laughing off what he had done.
> The school district was taking the incident much more seriously, however.

After all, schools have rules. To protect the children, you know.

> "There's the legal complications," [Sparkman High Principal Michael] Campbell told the news station. "Public lewdness and court consequences outside of school with the legal system, as well as the school consequences that the school system has set up."
> Adamek's sister indicated on Twitter that her brother was facing expulsion.

When a teenager commits suicide because he felt bullied by others who said mean things about him, there is invariably a law passed to make sure it never happens again. In the pursuit of a perfect world, no child should ever feel so badly as to do himself harm. What law will they pass for Christian Adamek?

The streak was caught on video, which remains up for now.

http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=9JT0Y28fe4g

Horrible? Was it of sufficient moral turpitude that it cost a life? There are many things that can be said about the streak, that it was immature and stupid. No doubt someone will cry that it created a sexually hostile environment, as seems to be the cry with all things involving nudity. In response to those who call this a juvenile prank, someone will passionately explain the grave harm this does to the moral fabric of society.

So what if society survived the Harvard-Yale streak of '06. That was a bunch of northeastern atheist sexist elitists. This was Alabama, and they don't take kindly to such things in Alabama, where God and Country come first.

And so the Sparkman High School powers of saving grace decided to drop every bomb they had on Christian Adamek. They'll show him. He'll never do anything like that again. And indeed, he won't.

There isn't sufficient information about this young man to delve into his psyche, why he felt incapable of withstanding the punches being thrown at him. Maybe he had dedicated his life to his education, and saw this as the end of any possibility of going to Harvard or Yale. Or maybe he was more MIT material. Whatever, between expulsion and criminal charges, and whatever other influences existed in his life, he took a rope and put it around his neck. It's a horrible image. It's a horrible way to die. It's always a horrible loss when any teen takes his own life.

So did you show him, Principal Campbell? Are you pleased that your rules served their purpose? When you decided that the "legend," the laughter, the applause would destroy the decorum of your school, did you consider that the price would be one young man's life?

It's hard to imagine how the official rule-makers will spin this to find external blame. Maybe it will be Youtube. Maybe it will be videogames. Somehow, the internet is always involved in whatever tragedy befalls high schoolers.

It's always some other evil that compelled a young person to take his life. Because it could never be the school rules that create the perfect environment for children to thrive and grow, and shield them from the harm of a cruel harsh world.

In His Own Words: The monster behind the beautiful mask

Dr. Tara J. Palmatier · 8 October 2013 · Archived copy · Original

It's day 8 of Domestic Violence Awareness Month. Shrink4Men, AVoiceForMen and DAHMW are committed to raising awareness about male victims of domestic abuse, the invisible victims.

Today's In His Own Words is another object lesson in what can happen when we ignore the warning signs and our gut instincts. It is also the sad tale of "George," a man who very much wanted a woman to love and with whom to build a family and a life together. Instead he got Harry Potter porn characters interacting with facsimiles of his children and is now lucky if he sees the kids once a month.

> The Monster Behind the Beautiful Mask
> I never thought I would be the victim of emotional abuse. I am an attorney and deal with people in adversarial setting everyday. I am a strong Type A man, but one who is humble and puts others before myself.
> My giving nature and desperation for a family and kids made me vulnerable to being victimized. Even once I knew I was a victim, it took a lot for me to take action, leave my 8-year marriage and file for divorce the same day I moved out of my home.
> I met my wife 9 years ago when we were both in our early to mid-30s. She was exactly what I wanted in terms of physical appearance. I ignored the fact she had been married before for 8 years with no kids. She claimed she was forced into BDSM sex acts by her husband and hated them, but did it to please him.
> Our sex life was poor. I began to doubt myself and my performance, even though I didn't have sexual difficulties in past relationships. I had also never met a woman that showed no emotion — good or bad — about anything. Previously, I had dated successful, goal-oriented women, but their careers took more priority than marriage, at least with me. My wife told me marriage and family were her priorities, so after 6 months of dating I ignored the warning signs and moved her into my house.
> We talked very little about anything serious. I ignored the red flags that should have told me not to marry her. You cannot marry someone you don't have a good physical and intellectual relationship with. Opposites do not attract either. Once she moved in, things were okay, but not as good like as you would expect in a new relationship. I helped get her off depression medication and then we married six months later.
> She got pregnant with our first daughter one month after we were married. She soon quit her sales job and we agreed she would stay home with the baby. I helped with the baby every day. As the baby got older, my wife made new friends, many of whom were not quality people. A new neighbor moved in next door who tried to act like my daughter's grandma and way overstepped her bounds. My mother, who had helped my wife throughout her pregnancy and after the baby was born without being intrusive, was slowly cast aside and ignored by my wife. I now suspect it was because my wife could get away with her lies and victim playing with this woman.
> We had our second daughter 3 years later and she became much worse. We used to spend our weekends together. Over time, she made sure she had plans to do things with other people. She liked being around people who would look up to her and put her on a pedestal and shunned the few quality people we met. I now realize that healthy, accomplished people with integrity caused my wife to feel insecure and exposed, not because of anything they said or did to her, but because my wife has neither integrity nor decency.
> She began to destroy many of my personal belongings. She refused to clean the house. She started staying up late at night on the computer. She was coming to bed anywhere from midnight to two in the morning. Her new friends were her priority. Anytime I was at home, she had something planned to get out of the house. We did nothing alone together or as a family. If I had any kind of problem or issue, she didn't want to deal with it or offer emotional support.

I finally accepted the marriage was over 2 years ago when we took my kids to their dance recital. My wife's new best friend, the nosy neighbor, came to the recital and as soon as I got the kids out of the car, yanked them from my hand and walked up to the entrance like they were her own grandkids, waiting for no one.

My mom was in tears thinking she would at least get to walk with the kids. I finally showed some anger and stood up for my mom, saying I was sick of the neighbor sticking herself into our lives and acting like the kids' grandmother. My wife got angry, blamed me for causing the situation and spent the evening comforting the neighbor at her house and leaving me to stew.

This is when I finally realized that my wife didn't care one bit about me. I would have left that day, but I knew my wife would keep the kids from me. I didn't want to leave the girls while they were still so young (a 4-year old and an 18-month old at the time). I knew they needed more time to bond with me and know me, so it would be more difficult for their mother to lie and portray me as a villain.

I spent the next two years basically living in a house with a stranger, so I could bond with our girls. I saved as much money as I could in anticipation of the divorce. I made one last ditch effort to go to counseling with my wife, which she had suggested. It was a waste of time.

I told her that we needed to get divorced and she said we were not quite there yet. I responded by saying I would no longer tolerate her abuse and lies. That did it. She wanted me out immediately, but set it up in a way that she could play victim to all our neighbors and friends.

She started recording my phone calls with her and recording me in the home. She was hoping I would snap and physically assault or threaten her so she could keep the kids from me despite I had not yelled at her or threatened her during our 9 years together. I accidentally stumbled on the recording device when I tripped over the longstanding mess in our dining room. I also found two flash drives on the kitchen counter. I opened them thinking they were pictures of our kids. Instead it was over 10,000 pages of fan fiction porn my wife had written.

It seems that my wife had been staying up late writing porn featuring Harry Potter characters and two other characters named after our daughters. The characters named after our children, while not depicted having graphic sex, interacted with the other characters prior to the sex scenes. The sheer volume of porn fan fiction she amassed seemed to indicate that she'd been writing day and night for years.

I didn't confront her with it because I was afraid of what she might do. After refusing my offer to have me move out on friendly terms because I would not give her a bunch of money, I ended up moving one day when she was out with the kids. She called the cops.

She has since refused me equal time with the girls, offering me one weekend a month. She signs them up for all sorts of activities that have no real structure to use as an excuse for why they can't see me. The legal process is a joke and there seems to be no way I can have a chance at equal time with my girls until we get our court date, which was scheduled for 9 months after I moved out.

I have not spoken with my wife since moving out. She is alienating our daughters and it is working. The kids refuse to get in the car with me on my one weekend a month. They say things like, "Daddy is going to lose all his money." I just bought a house 5 doors down from my old house and my wife is angry about it. Was that stupid?

I bought a place near by, so it would be easier to spend time with our kids. My wife won't let me drive my oldest to school even though it is on the way to my office. She makes her get up early and ride the bus instead. My wife's family has no idea she writes porn featuring Harry Potter characters and her kids. They just think I am a gloomy, angry guy. Should I send them copies of her pornographic writing?

The abuse I suffered at the hands of this sociopath goes beyond explanation and have only gotten worse since I have moved out. I am expected to keep working and earning so she can stay at home and not work despite the kids both being in school full-time and her college education and work history.

> While we were married, I gave up evenings and weekends so she could go back and get a nursing degree (she already had a 4-year degree and was a school teacher). Because of my success during the marriage, I will have to give her my house that I bought before I met her.
> If I had written all that porn with Harry Potter characters having sex surrounded by child characters named after our daughters and their cousins, I am sure I'd only be allowed supervised visitation, that is if I got any visitation at all. Because she did a good job taking care of the kids' physical needs, she suffers nothing in terms of custody from such behavior.
> My lawyer says I am not likely to get permanent 50% custody. The fact I built a business before I met her does not seem to help me in equitable distribution. Her net worth will be equal to mine post-divorce if I am lucky despite all the school loans and hard work I put in prior to marrying her.
> I should have seen the big picture from her lack of ability to perform sexually, fake intimacy, lack of empathy, desire for her own needs over anyone else's, as well as the mind games she played as the marriage progressed. The better a woman looks, the better her destructive skills seem to be.
> Leaving was the hardest thing to do, but I had to do it for my own sanity. I stayed two years too long for our girls. The misery and abuse during that time amped up because my wife saw me reject her and she knew I was gone. It was just a matter of when.
> I have come close many times to offering to sign my parental rights away, but even two days a month with our girls gives me hope they will get older and want to stay with me. As upset as I am about all of it, I doubt I even know the entire truth about who my wife is and what else she has done.
> This abuse went on for about 4 years where it was open and obvious. I now see the abuse was from day one, even when she was putting a positive spin on her personality to get her hooks in. She is so attractive she could get any man to marry her, but sociopaths prey on the nice guy. Add in some success and decent looks and you are the ideal victim. I always wondered why her first marriage ended. Now I wonder if she did the same things to her first husband that she has done to me.
> I would simply tell anyone in a bad relationship to get out, kids or not. You can't be a good dad in a bad marriage even if there is no violence or yelling. You will destroy yourself the longer you stay. You can't fix this type of woman.
> It's a hard hit to take from an emotional and financial standpoint, but I would rather take it at age 44 than 54 where I would owe lifetime alimony and maybe not be as physically strong. Stress will kill you and getting old is not fun when you do not have support from your spouse. I can't do life over, but I hope by letting our daughters know that I am here that they will want a relationship with me. Right now, the oldest is an emotional mess and I don't know how to help her.
> I was emotionally and financially destroyed by a sociopath whose true past and motives will never be known.

There are lots of lessons to be gleaned from today's In His Own Words. George writes, "The better a woman looks, the better her destructive skills seem to be." Instead, I would say that the more attractive a woman is the more willing some men are to overlook, ignore or minimize the Crazy and the abusive behaviors. Additionally, you don't give a sociopath a head's up about divorcing them; you get your ducks in a row and then pull the pin without warning. Warning them just gives them the opportunity to turn the tables on you.

In His Own Words is a joint effort between DAHMW, Shrink4Men and AVoiceForMen to help raise awareness about the invisible victims of domestic violence, men. If you would like to submit your story, please follow the guidelines at the end of this article.

Holding Japan hostage

Jack Outis · 8 October 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Note: This article is also available in Romanian.

Your house is on fire and you have 3 options before calling the firemen:

1. Throw water at the flames
2. Run inside the house and wait
3. Not calling the firemen because you need time to make up your mind

It is not a tough choice, yet Japan's birth rate is on fire and they are choosing a mix of options 2 and 3.

One of the nations with the brightest minds on earth is facing its self inflicted extinction by making the dimmest of choices. The main reasons for Japan to commit this paradox of slow economic-seppuku-by-demographic-starvation are, to my eye, the following:

1. National Racism in the guise of Cultural Pride

Japan will not accept immigrants, not in the past, not now, not in the future. Simply because they either stay Japanese or nothing. No way around it, it is part of their culture to segregate the non Japanese. Today, even if born and raised in Japan, the children of Korean parents are not always issued Japanese citizenship and usually referred as Zainichi, not as Japanese. Japan has a long history of repatriating Zainichi Koreans found to be "Incompatible with Japanese culture.". Logic does not matter as much as the pride of being one of the very few genetically and culturally pure Japanese parents because Japan would rather isolate itself than accepting reproductive defeat. This collective denial reached sci-fi levels in recent years when Tsukuba University showed the media their powered exo-suits for caretakers, who are expected to be overwhelmed in the near future with the needs of the disproportionately elderly population. In other words, instead of even thinking of the possibility of immigration, the Japanese would rather brace themselves to take care of the geriatric tsunami they themselves are creating.

2. Children of Karoshi

Japan has long had a tradition called Karoshi: males working themselves to death to serve a master. Things did not improve after Japan's acceptance of defeat after WW2. It was either suicide to avoid shame or accepting defeat and a lifetime of shame. Japan chose the admission of defeat and national shame simply because the delusional tradition of the disposable warrior does not extend to the untrained, unbrainwashed population. The masterless Japanese nation and its admission of defeat was a collective cross-generational searing trauma inflicted upon an already post-apocalyptic culture. This national psychological defeat created an unbearable void to be filled desperately with something else, something where the lost pride could be found, something else but suicide which, paradoxically, ended up being re-purposed slower suicide in the form of overwork. In a stark demonstration of overcompensation mixed with a misplaced need for a sense of worth, the post war generations of men in their early 30's and 40's, rebuilding their atomized national pride, would work shifts of 12, 14 or even 16 hours for weeks, months or even years, slowly building the tradition of using as few vacation days or none at all to give their co-workers and superiors the clear message of compulsory collective sacrifice-dedication.

The result a few decades later?

A widespread social anomaly affecting multitudes of otherwise healthy men without a family history of disease, dying of stroke, heart attack, chronic fatigue or a combination of the 3. The phenomenon was fittingly baptized "Karoshi".

The Japanese Ministry of Health, Labour and Welfare has been tracking this phenomenon since 1969 and over the years things are not improving: in 2007: 189 workers died, many from strokes or heart attacks, and about 208 became ill due to overwork. Those who die are not surprisingly, mostly male. Karoshi in and of itself may seem trivial as more than 189 people die on road accidents every year but if we consider the impact of those who commit suicide during formative years, the overall heavily reduced lifespan of males in management, the absent fathers due to either work or work related death, the problem is clearly not trivial at all for those affected by it from birth and the resulting incomplete and dysfunctional social structures with missing family members. This has created a social phenomenon with the more recent generations of males who tend to despise the traditional obligation of males slowly working themselves to death and have instead, embraced more herbivore lifestyles that not surprisingly, those lifestyles go directly against the fundamentals of the older generations: older gen chose academic excellence and sacrifice? then newer gen chooses little or no school. Older gen chose competitive high stress high karoshi-risk management jobs? Then newer gen chooses low wage unambitious low stress jobs. Older gen chose family and multiple responsibilities? Then newer gen chooses as few responsibilities and no family. That last choice is crucial to Japan's future demographics: No family.

Many of those now young "herbivore" (or "grasseater") men may or may not realize they are the byproduct of growing up in a fatherless household-culture, yet, the crucial point is that the new generation is unlikely to marry and reproduce. Despite the herbivore movement, Karoshi is still alive and actively killing men to this day, conveniently, it is never a surprise that the male aspect of Karoshi is never brought up by feminists. Why would they even mention the male primary victims of their own death if they want to take that credit without dying at all? Dead disposable men are a banality when compared with the injustice of not "empowering" women for "progress" in the workplace.

3. Feminism by western proxy

The analogy of the house on fire is perfect to describe what is happening to Japan, while the house is burning, the feminists want to sit down and "empower" women at the work place which is akin to sitting down and voting to decide what to do with the fire instead of just throwing water at it. At least that is what Lillian Cunningham at the Washington post blindly and unapologetically proposes. The nuggets of fools' gold in said article do not come from Cunningham only but also from Japanese feminists such as Kuniko Inoguchi (Japan's former gender minister) who is quoted as saying the following,

"In this country [Japan], we have never had a real radical feminist movement like many countries have, lacking that, I think we have not been able to make a dramatic change in mindset."

Inoguchi not only proposes radicalism but also developed a gender target to be imposed upon Japanese corporations to place women in 30% of their senior manager positions (not unlike the gender quotas to be imposed in the European Union). Let that sink in: the best solution for a looming demographic collapse is to radicalize and "empower" women for "gender progress" instead of asking them to get pregnant. Statistics show the higher the level of education the woman has, the fewer the children she will have. Consequently, enforcing gender quotas and using feminist pseudo-logic will only keep women at school then work and lower the birth rate. No need to sugar coat it: Cunningham and Inoguchi are just playing stupid because if they plan on keeping women mostly at school and work, the result will be they just won't become mothers. Cunningham even defeats her own argument in her own article with the following quote:

"Right now, however, [Japanese] women don't seem to be very empowered in the bedroom or the boardroom. The average Japanese woman has 1.3 children, one of the lowest numbers across the globe. She is also far less likely than her male counterparts to work full time. According to Goldman Sachs's research, 70 percent of Japanese women quit their jobs after having a child."

Women lack "empowerment" but quit 70 percent of the time? That is cartoon-like feminist pseudo-logic trying to ask for both having the cake and eating it (or rather have the cake of children and eat the cake of work in a state of desperate demographic emergency) which makes no sense. Cunningham conveniently, as most feminists do, cherry picks a favorable number to whine about (70% pregnant women leaving their jobs for not being "empowered enough") and downplays the inconvenient ones (1.3 children per woman) the number of pregnant women is abysmally low but she conveniently focuses on the whining aspects of lacking empowerment by that magical 70%. Unlike Cunningham, let's focus on the inconvenient productive aspects of that number. 70% is a gigantic majority to accommodate. How about the lost productivity every time a woman takes a job away from a productive male or female just to get pregnant the first or second year on the job? How about the places that woman took away from higher education for a degree she will not use? No, Cunningham knows the cartoon-like lie she is trying to sell, she is an excellent hypocrite and is just playing the part, Cunningham understands that women taxing the system with fake childish ambitions for a degree they will discard as soon as they have their first child is not too different from the scene in Disney's "Lilo and Stitch" where a little girl forces an adult ready to pay at the counter to give her the money only to put it back on the counter and take credit for "paying". Their demands make as much sense as a fairy tale where the castle is on fire and the princess in the tower but wants a new dress or she won't come down and marry. Is it so difficult for the princess to realize that if she does not save herself no one will marry her corpse? Even a fairy tale princess would realize, no one is that stupid.

Why then, does Cunningham keep talking if she is aware of her verbal string of absurdities?

That is why it is so important to read in between their lines: Gender ideologues like Cunningham and Inoguchi are not as asinine as they seem, rather, as Mykeru defines them in his "Creepy Clowns" video analysis: "They are like jackals that roll on carrion for camouflage. In reality, they are predators that want to roll on a real victim to pass as something else." Cunningham and Inoguchi clearly understand the issue at hand but as opportunistic predators, they really do not care about helping the authentic victim, that is, the comatose Japanese birth rate. Not at all. What they see is an opportunity to hold a victim ransom and make self aggrandizing demands.

Think about it: they understand Japan needs women to get pregnant but since they do not control Japanese women and their reproduction, they declare themselves glorified self-appointed imaginary representatives of all females and ask for a gender quota ransom. Is akin them wearing white t-shirts with a bright pink message saying "We can reproduce but you can't. Pay us or we will kill Japan's future. Note: We offer no guarantee. Donate now." They claim they may have the solution but first you have to pay the ransom but even if you do, it may be too late because the patriarchy will get in the way of all the things they do not intend to do anyways. It is dishonesty and plausible deniability at an international level through the sponsorship of feminist intellectual dishonesty, it is all about not promising anything but asking for as much as possible. When the Japanese demographic-economic collapse takes place, they will just blame something the evil men did that prevented the poor women from achieving full potential, while feminists like Cunningham et. al. laugh from their retirement mansions in the Bahamas (bought with all the money they made out of glorified feminist hypocrisy).

Feminists like Cunningham and Inoguchi tend to find a movement, pretend they want to fix a problem by demanding the moon & the stars, make the problem worse, and then get a great deal of personal gain along the way. Their approach is dishonest but effective; it is like knowing a toddler has gone missing, and you already saw the body floating in the water but instead of telling the rescue team what you saw, you join them, lead them away from the corpse and portray yourself as a heroine for the cause for maximum camera time quite "luckily."

In this case, it is Japanese demographic carrion offered to feathered feminists.

AVFM News and Activism FTSU: Remove Principal Campbell!

AVfM Radio · 8 October 2013 · Archived copy · Original

This week we will be dedicating our entire show to last week's tragic suicide of Christian Adamek, a fifteen year old student at Sparkman High in Harvest Alabama. We will be talking about Sparkman High School principal Michael Campbell's actions after the now infamous streaking incident and before Adameks death as well as activism efforts to get him removed from his job. We will also be talking about misandry in education and how it affects boys. We invite those who knew Christian to call in and share their thoughts and memories of him.

Undoubtedly this will be a difficult episode to listen to and participate in. However, it is important that the issue of suicide and misandry facing young males today be tackled and dealt with.

The show starts at 8PM Central Time

“Stay Safe” = “You deserve rape”

Thunderf00t makes a perfectly rational and thoughtful video on risk minimization and, predictably, gets accused of being an apologist for male rapists and blaming female victims. Never one to give up, he gives a smackdown to his irrational critics.

We would wish to see more discussion in all this about the gross underreporting of female-on-male sexual assault, which has been an unacknowledged problem for far too long, but we can’t expect Thunderf00t or anyone else to cover everything all the time. Props for standing up to the intellectual bullies, anyway, Dr. Mason. –DE

Robert Franklin · 8 October 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Maine's Governor Paul LePage has long been in the forefront of the fight against domestic violence. In that way, he's the state's version of Vice President Joe Biden; domestic violence is his pet issue. There are other ways in which he resembles Biden too, like his frank willingness to ignore male victims of DV and female perpetrators. I've read many of LePage's remarks as well as Biden's, and if either has ever so much as mentioned the possibility that a man might be a victim of intimate partner violence, I've never seen it. I've seen extensive interviews with both men and neither has ever said a word about male victims.

As of this article, not much has changed in Maine (Bangor Daily News, 10/6/13). There's LePage hauling out the same old chestnuts. For a man to be this wrong and misleading about an issue that's as close to his heart as DV, it's hard not to conclude that he's just playing politics. LePage clearly wants to keep his fences mended with the DV industry in the state, so he carefully toes the party line. He does so at the expense of real opposition to intimate partner violence. That again is just another play out of Joe Biden's playbook.

LePage is right when he says "'We can have all the strict laws in the world, but we have to make [domestic violence] socially unacceptable.'" I've said the same thing myself. Laws are fine and necessary, but they're no substitute for teaching people how to behave. Until the culture changes on any number of issues, laws will be largely unavailing.

So you might think LePage would actually do something to try to change cultural perceptions about domestic violence. After all, that's what he rightly says is needed. But he doesn't. In fact, he does the opposite; he trots out the same tired, disproven, misleading claims. If those things worked to stem the tide of DV, we'd have eradicated it years ago, but as one researcher for the Department of Justice said in 2006, there's simply no evidence to suggest that our approach to DV has reduced the incidence of violence in the home.

That's why I conclude that LePage is just playing with DV like it's a political football.

> "We, the men, have to help to eliminate abuse," Lepage continued. "We are 80 percent of the perpetrators, and we have to find a way to stop people from doing this, and we can't expect women to fight this battle alone."

No, actually men are not "80% of the perpetrators." In fact, men are about half the perpetrators or maybe a little under that. Literally hundreds of studies have concluded that men and women perpetrate DV equally. Analysis of thousands of studies of DV recently completed by the Partner Abuse State of Knowledge project once again showed the same thing: men and women are about equally likely to perpetrate and be victims of DV. Women are more likely to start a fight and about twice as likely to be injured. Those are known facts, but LePage ignores the truth in favor of claims more agreeable to the DV industry.

That makes his admonition to men that they need to solve the problem of domestic violence all the more ironic. Believe me governor, men know we're supposed to stop domestic violence. The lavishly taxpayer-funded domestic violence industry has been telling us that for decades now. What no one's yet said is that women need to stop their violence too. In fact, if they did so, it would result in fewer men getting hurt, of course, but it would have the same effect on female victims. That's because, in cases in which both a man and a woman are part of a fight, there's a 70% probability the woman started it. That information comes from a 2006 study done for the Centers for Disease Control. Clearly, if women were taught not to start fights, they'd be less likely to be injured in one. But Paul LePage, Joe Biden and all the other true believers in the DV establishment wouldn't dream of asking women to change their behavior in the least.

And of course the notion that we can just tell men (or women, for that matter) to not commit domestic violence and they'll all stop is about as absurd as it gets. Domestic violence is a pathology that certain members of both sexes suffer from. For the most part, people who commit DV as adults were abused as children. So Job One is to get parents to stop hitting their kids, but again, LePage, et al prefer to ignore that constructive approach to curtailing DV.

Rather, they prefer the Duluth Model of domestic violence intervention, an approach that's been shown time and again to have little to no effect on DV perpetration. It doesn't affect rates of DV for the perfectly good reason that it conceives of the problem as something it isn't. The idea that all DV consists of men who resort to violence in order to keep the little lady in her place is absurd to the point of madness.

In the first place, very little domestic violence has control as its object. The vast majority of it consists of isolated or rare instances of minor violence associated with periods of high stress in the relationship. The great majority of that is non-injurious or results in only "a minor cut or bruise," in the words of a 2009 survey in Scotland. In short, the great majority of what's called DV has nothing to do with exercising power over one's partner, irrespective of the sex of the perpetrator.

Mental health professionals have some pretty good ideas about how to deal with adults who commit domestic violence, and it has nothing to do with the Duluth Model of DV intervention. So what did Maine do?

Earlier this year, LePage signed into law a bill aimed at ensuring that courts can require that offenders convicted of domestic violence complete batterers' intervention programs as part of their sentence.

Here's a promise: those programs will have zero effect on rates of DV in Maine.

But LePage didn't stop there. He went on to connect DV not only to homicide, but suicide too.

> Of the 17 homicides in Maine this year, six were related in some way to domestic violence, he said. He also said many people who commit suicide did so after being plagued by violence in their homes.

What he scrupulously avoided mentioning were the two DV homicides committed by women, Gail Judd and Arline Lawless, who respectively stabbed and shot to death their male partners. Again, the mention of female perpetrators or male victims is not part of the LePage playbook on DV.

Perhaps worse is his suggestion that suicide victims in Maine are (a) women and (b) victims of DV. Neither is true. In fact, as this site shows, men made up 92% (145 male suicides, 12 female) of suicides in Maine to date this year and that, for men between the ages of 34 and 44, suicide is the number one cause of death. How many of those result from domestic violence? We don't know, but it would be strange indeed if more female than male victims came about because of intimate partner conflict.

LePage doesn't care. He's happy to overlook every one of those male suicide victims for one simple reason – to acknowledge them might mean fewer votes and less money from the DV industry.

LePage is right that we have to change the culture if we're to reduce the incidence of DV. Too bad he can't admit that he's part of the culture that perpetuates it.

In His Own Words: Dodging a bullet

Dr. Tara J. Palmatier · 9 October 2013 · Archived copy · Original

It's day 9 of Domestic Violence Awareness Month. Shrink4Men, AVoiceforMen and the Domestic Abuse Helpline for Men and Women (DAHMW) believe that male victims of domestic violence, the invisible victims, are just as needing and deserving of our care, help and attention as female victims of domestic abuse.

Today's In His Own Words is different from the accounts we have shared thus far. "Jason" saw the red flags, but he did not ignore them or his better judgment. He ended the relationship and got out before his abuser could make hostages (i.e., children) or extract The Precious™ (i.e., the wedding ring that signifies you are no longer a couple, but a menage à trois — a husband, a wife and the State).

Jason's story is also proof positive that educating boys and men about female aggression and abuse does make a difference and can save lives.

> Dodging a Bullet
> I am newcomer to AVFM. Through that wonderful community, I have discovered the equally excellent website, Shrink4Men. Your numerous red flags articles have helped me to dodge a bullet, and for this I am extremely grateful.
> Shrink4Men helped me get out of a 3-month relationship where red flags were dotted across the horizon like a game of Minesweeper gone to hell. Yes, it was only 3 months, thank god. Had I not discovered your website, Dr Tara, it could have been longer or even turned into a marriage or children. I can only imagine how bad that would have been.
> I ask myself why did I put up with it for 3 months if it was so bad ? That's probably my fault. I met this girl through an online dating website and after seeing each other for 2-3 weeks we headed straight into it like a couple of fools.
> Initially, my gut told me to end the relationship after only a week of officially being a couple. Her drama was already over the top, enough to cause me pause. I put up with it, however, because a) I liked her despite the drama, b) the sex was good and c) I rationalized maybe it was just a one-off thing.
> It was not a one-off thing. There was drama of all sorts from the very start. The simplest things like not changing my Facebook relationship status after our first date caused her to take offence. She said it meant that I was "ashamed of [her]." In reality, I just didn't want to trivialise anything (e.g., declaring I was "in a relationship" when we were still dating and getting to know each other). But I did it anyway to appease her.
> A couple of weeks after we were official she was out at a bar one time to meet a male friend of hers. Her friend came onto her at the bar but was refused by her. Apparently she gets a lot of male attention she has to turn down. This douchebag then proceeded to create a fake Facebook page and dating profiles to attempt to destroy my character so he could hook up with her.
> Of course my new girlfriend didn't believe my claims of innocence and was I accused of being a cheater and vermin, but proved myself with evidence and heart felt pleas. Despite warning her that he may attempt something again, when her friends discovered a fake online profile of me (which was created by him) a couple of weeks later – she then believed this and accused me further of cheating. This again took some pleading to get her to realise it was bunkum.
> A general lack of affection was prevalent throughout. There was hardly any hugging or kissing (and I am an affectionate person), and apparently I didn't know how to be romantic despite all the dinners, ignored and unappreciated poetry, flowers and otherwise.
> There were personal digs and jibes to me all the time, sometimes they cut deep, but for the most part I ignored these and didn't let it get to me. Sure there were good times, and on occasion she could be a beautiful and loving person. But as time progressed they were few and far between.

She was also an extremely stressful person, who took her work home with her and allowed it to poison her life. She would constantly update me on the stressors of her life from her incompetent boss to family issues of her divorced parents and her dad. That stress would sometimes filter through to me from her moods.

She was on edge a lot and I had to tiptoe around her to be careful not to cause offence about the simplest of things. There were plenty of arguments. One time she thought it would be funny to amuse herself by throwing pillows at me – despite my lack of appreciation. When I told her I didn't appreciate it and that perhaps we shouldn't be together she stormed off down the street at night in her bare feet threatening to go to her ex's house 10 miles away.

I chased after her to stop her, concerned for her safety at being out at night and the distance. My heart was racing and that night was probably the most stressful of my life.

She could also be a very jealous and irrational person. When we went to a lovely restaurant to enjoy a wine and some nice food, I commented that I thought the waitress was doing a great job and the customer service was great. I was accused of flirting with the waitress and fancying her – and then "checking out" the waitress when she had simply walked through my sight line. It was pathetic jealousy at its finest.

The stress she created through her drama and irrational behavior got to me. I became depressed and the stress was so bad at times it would make me vomit. This in turn affected our intimacy and my health. She could also be emotionally and physically abusive. There wasn't outright physical abuse, but she would throw pillows or objects at me, and engaged in what she called "play fighting" with actual punches. [Note from Dr T: Actually, Jason, this is physical abuse. If a man would be arrested for doing the same to a woman then it's also abuse when a woman does it to a man.*]

At this time, I had stumbled through a couple of Dr T's red flags articles on the AVFM website and they pretty much described the person that my girlfriend was. I'm not sure what she would be classified as NPD, BDP or what, but there was definitely some major issues on her behalf.

She was a poor decision maker as well. There was one event that caused me to be extremely distrusting of her loyalty and judgment. One night she was supposed to go to a work training function for dinner and drinks and said she would remain professional despite the alcohol. I trusted her because I'm not a jealous type and thought she would remain professional.

I was phoned at 2AM by a drunken girlfriend, who then told me one of her male workmates promised to safely carry her to her room later on in the night to "look after her." I feared the worst would happen, which was realised during a phone call the next day.

She claimed the male co-worker apparently had always had a crush on her and tried to kiss her and sleep with her after taking her back to her apartment. She told me she rejected his advances a few times, but they eventually shared a "short kiss." She insisted she didn't sleep with him. I appreciated the honesty from her but the damage had already been done. I was not surprised by her story as I suspected something would happen.

I effectively saw this as the end but we had a holiday the next week, so I thought I would stick that out to see what would happen and maybe end it after we got back. What a mistake that was.

The holiday was miserable. It was nine days of her whining, being uncooperative, irrational, demanding and some major arguments in public – including one on a tour bus. We discussed ending it, but decided to keep going. I knew ending it would be the best thing, but I still had feelings for this girl.

One night during our holiday, I had gone to sleep earlier and left her on the couch. She woke up later and joined me in the bed. Apparently I was hogging the bed, so she thought it would be okay to kick me with disdain to wake me up and get me to move. I told her the next day how disgusted I was with her domestic abuse, but as usual she made excuses for herself and always avoided taking responsibility for her actions.

Yesterday, after all the bullshit and red flags galore and the stress and emotional and physical abuse, I ended it.

> We spoke on the phone and I could tell her ego was majorly hit by my actions. She had always been the dumper throughout her life and had an overvalued sense of her own self-worth. She was taken aback by me dumping her and attempted to salvage her ego by insisting that we had ended it on our holiday weeks ago – despite there being no clarity of finalisation of this. It was quite ridiculous and laughable, as she had just helped celebrate my birthday a week or so ago and she told me she loved me at the time.
> I didn't really care anymore. I just let her think it was a mutual decision and we ended things civilly. I have sworn to myself not be in contact with her ever again. I just hope that's the end of the bullshit. I don't think she is psychotic enough to pull pranks or try to play hell with my life considering the short lifespan of our relationship and that we have no more shared commitments.
> So I guess you could call that my red flag realisation success story. Phew! Bullet dodged.
> Thanks Dr T 😀

Well done, Jason! Now block her from contacting you via phone, text and email. If she turns up on your doorstep, do not open the door. Turn on a recording device, ask her to leave and, if she refuses, walk away from the door and quietly call the police to ask them to remove her from the premises. Have a recording device going the entire time and make sure to get a copy of the police report.

Welfare wymmin: Death to the Goody God

Paul Elam · 9 October 2013 · Archived copy · Original

There is a growing cultural showdown between feminists and people who think. As we get close to high noon we are seeing the increased use of media to dramatize differing points of view between the thinkers and non-thinkers.

A recent example of this is in a video on Tumblr that Typhon Blue responded to on her Youtube Channel.

Note in the first video, resources (illustrated metaphorically by scoops of ice cream) come out of a spout, apparently from an Unseen Dispensing Machine (UDM). It has the feel of each scoop falling from the sky like magic; like there is a Goody God above us keeping the UDM full and ready to deliver our favorite flavor with no more effort than it takes to stick a cone under the spout.

But men, bullies and brigands that they are, are hogging the UDM and wailing out "Misandry!" every time someone with a vagina gets a Goody God scoop of ice cream for which no one had to labor or suffer in order to produce.

Don't complain. I warned you this was the non-thinking video.

Next came Typhon with her video response. I am sure it will not surprise you to hear that this one fell into the "thinking" category. It was not just thoughtful, it also made me laugh. In fact, I was still laughing even after I had liked it, Tweeted it, commented and posted it to the AVFM Facebook page. I was laughing so hard that I lost it for a second and let a woman sneak past me at the UDM and get her cone filled with the Goody God's magically made ice cream.

Pwnage are funny.

Typhon accomplished that pwnage by simply asking where the ice cream came from, and pointing out that resources don't just appear, at least in real life. They only materialize like that in cartoons made by people who don't spend much time thinking.

That was all she needed to do for the pwnage to be complete, but if you will allow me the indulgence I would like to borrow from/steal her original idea and expand on it a bit. It's worth it because everything that is just insanely thoughtless about the core of feminism's worldview is shown in the first video, and everything worthwhile and corrective about Typhon's is shown in her thoughtful response.

Mind you, I say this knowing that Typhon may well see things differently. I am shamelessly ransacking her closet of ideas, but taking them in my own direction.

And where that takes me is not going to be a popular place with some, though I will wage those who dissent from it won't be able to come up with an argument any more logical than alleging MHRAs scream "misandry" because they want the UDM all to themselves.

Simple premise: Women (collectively speaking) have the right to complain about anything they want to in this culture. It is a right, along with all their other human rights, that I will defend to my dying breath. That is true, however, because they have been given those rights, not because they have earned them. That reality is an indelible part of our history.

Historically it was conventional wisdom in most places, and for damned good reasons, that those who had to fight in wars also got the political power to wage them. Those with the responsibility to protect and provide for women, who by the way demanded that protection and provision in every way they could, also got first "choice" on education and employment that would enable them to do that.

Those who bore the brunt of satisfying society's survival needs figured they had a natural right to social authority and that mere consumers should not have the same decision making power as those who produced the goods and paid the bills.

I suppose all this was before cartoons.

History also shows a clear pattern of men making those decisions selflessly and responsibly, as they were expected to do by their fellows. That is how we got the modern incarnation of chivalry, which put women out of harm's way and subsidized their needs at the expense of men as a matter of routine.

That legacy lingers still in the modern zeitgeist, the one, you know, all obsessed about "equality."

Men still earn their right to vote via selective service. Women are still exempt. That particular bit of equality, we'll call it naturally equal, is a flavor of ice cream that our UDM still does not dispense.

But we still have worked on other flavors of equality, namely those most palatable to women. I know, only choosing equality that tastes good is kind of a contradiction, but stay with me, we have to bring the thoughtless with us.

So, we opened up education and employment to women, and even empowered men with guns to make sure they were treated equally when it tasted good.

What happened?

Women ran in hoards like it was Black Friday at Macys, flooding low risk, low hardship, low expectation jobs. Then they collectively screamed discrimination because low pay came with it.

Because patriarchy.

Meanwhile men still took on the lion's share of danger, exposure to the elements, workplace mortality, harsh working conditions and longer hours. In other words, men continued making the ice cream, much to the dismay of the Goody God.

And that fact alone leaves us with an unassailable point that is likely to be the most assailed point in history:

As a class, women have not earned equal scoops of ice cream. They were gifted with the right to stand at the UDM and complain, which they have done with much greater efficiency than actually producing anything.

The answer to this, of course, is not to withhold their ice cream. It is simply to insist they earn the right to eat it.

We can start with the basics. Either abolish selective service or force women to register. Drop all the nonsense of giving military women the "option" to serve in combat. Give them their orders and give them a less than honorable discharge if they don't follow them.

For the men that scream about this, too bad. Quit thinking with your dick and be prepared to see women just as mangled and just as dead as men. Anyone who can't or won't fight, and alongside anyone else in the same uniform, should stay the hell out of the military.

Make vocational training, like construction trades, mandatory for all high school students. No one graduates who can't pour a foundation, roof a building, hang a 5/8" board of sheetrock, cut the beads and float and tape the walls and ceiling.

What's that? Ice cream is bad for you? Right. Got it. Moving on….

The point is that women, as a class, won't ever be fully functioning members of modern society until they start producing ice cream alongside men, scoop for scoop, which means designing and building the machines that make it, processing it, producing the milk, sugar and other ingredients from the ground up, driving it in trucks and then designing and building the machines that package and dispense it.

Teaching women to stand on the roadside holding up a "Corner Office or Bust" sign only creates another need drawn directly from the history we are supposedly trying to overcome. It means we need to train men to pull over and give them a ride.

Which, of course, is exactly what we are doing.

I would never deny women access to the Corner Office flavor of ice cream, but I do have the crazy idea that it has to be paid for. The consumer is the sensible choice to pay the tab.

I also have no problem with men enjoying the rewards from their own labors, even if it means they have to tune out someone's powerless wailing while they make quick work of a bowl of ice cream. If a lot of women, and men for that matter, don't like it, they need to stop whining and start producing.

We have another word for it when women have as much right to resources as the men who produce them (or who underwrite women's ice cream purchases though the enforcement of sex roles).

It is called welfare. And the women insisting on partaking of it are little more than thinly disguised layabouts.

We have worked, rightfully so, to extend women every opportunity that men have to be equal participants in fulfilling society's needs. But we have turned those efforts into a joke by telling women their job is done if they are standing there with an empty cone wailing for someone to put a scoop in it.

As a society we have refused to face the cold truth, that in striving to attain a standard of equality, women by and large have failed to pull their own weight. It is feminism's great disservice to women, and it has tagged the greatest majority of them as social losers.

That was not the case in a time where men and women cooperated to raise families; when families were concerns where all members participated in its growth and success. Under that arrangement, the ice cream got spread around and shared…perhaps not with mathematical equality, but the disadvantages were as likely to have a negative impact on men as they did women.

It was, in that sense, fair and just.

But now, with what remains of the family smoldering and on its way to cold ash, the contracts that bound us together and formed the basis of our mutual expectations have been similarly torched. All that is left now is to have women compete with men. They are finding that in too many cases they can't.

So we create the UDM, and hide from our collective social consciousness where the goodies always have and still come from. With the help of elected white knights (and more than a few self-appointed ones) we make everyone afraid to point out that ice cream does not come from cartoons; that there is no UDM and no Goody God. And that those doing all the wailing about being treated "equally" are in reality asking us to pretend that men aren't bleeding for their laziness instead of asking themselves to share an equal part of the load.

Do women need power?

Zara Faris · 9 October 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Editor's note: this submission, which we were delighted to accept from Zaria Faris, originally appeared on her web site. AVfM management does not endorse any religious or anti-religious point of view. Zara Faris' view is of interest because it calls into question the widely-held belief that women, but not men, are automatically oppressed in certain parts of the world, or that women play no part in said oppressions, and where we routinely ignore the suffering of the supposedly privileged men. While we do not endorse any particular solution, we know the solutions we oppose, and we think any solution which leaves men out of the conversation as anything other than brutal oppressors is unlikely to ever make this a better world. Below the article we've also included a video of Ms. Faris giving a speech with similar themes. –DE

It is commonly claimed by feminists that women need economic or political power in order to safeguard the interests of women, but this call to "empower" women is a highly misguided one that is propagated by feminists under the guise of justice. The feminist call for power is not really about representing the interests of the people, not even just the interests of women. Rather, it is the call for increased autonomy without responsibility (i.e. individualism), which serves only to empower the status quo of competing self-interested groups without empowering justice for all.

1 – Empowering women does not automatically empower justice

Power should represent all people – not just one faction. Feminists allege that women need power because they are "underrepresented in positions of power and influence"[i]. They claim that increasing womens access to power is a matter of "social justice"[ii]; if women are not so empowered, feminists claim that men will continue to dominate decision-making to the detriment of women. The feminist Fawcett Society states, "women as a group are missing from the top tables of power […] if you're not at the table, you're on the menu".[iii]

Such feminist rhetoric ignores the fact that if the top tables of power have women on the menu, they also have every other man on the menu, too. Men are far from equal amongst themselves – there are differences of intelligence, responsibility, strength, wealth, looks, class; and only a select elite get to sit at the top table; it would be ridiculous to claim that the small class of men in power is actually representative of all men – it is therefore equally ridiculous to claim that a small class of women in power would represent all women. Instead of turning the tables on this injustice, feminists are merely demanding a seat at the table. If feminists were sincere in their call for justice, they would not be seeking to recreate this class oppression amongst women. Rather, they would seek an alternative system altogether.

Instead, feminists add fuel to the flames by perpetuating the sexist idea that men are bound to conspire against women, just because they are men, and women would be bound to be more just, just because they are women. In other words, feminists advocate suspicion of men, claiming that men are the problem, whilst women are the solution. Not only would feminists be outraged if such sexist generalisations were made against women but, in reality, it is untrue that men always discriminate against women if there is not a critical mass of women present. For example, earlier this year, the 'Counting Women In' coalition produced a report called 'Sex and Power 2013 – Who runs Britain?' claiming that 'the exclusion of women from positions of power damages both women and men'. The report laments the fact that only 15.6% of High Court judges are female. And yet, a man is far more likely to be sentenced to prison by these 'male dominated' courts than a woman who has committed the same crime.[iv] The report also complains that only 14.2% of University Vice Chancellors are female. And yet, according to HESA Statistics (Higher Education Statistics Agency), women are far ahead of men at university – in 2010/11, more women than men were studying for degrees – they accounted for 57% of first degree graduates. 66% of first degrees awarded to women in 2010-11 were either firsts or upper second class, whereas the figure was 61% for men.[v] There's that inescapable patriarchy holding women back, again!

So, are empowered women bound to be more just, just because they are women? Whilst it is a highly sexist idea, let's entertain it for argument's sake. When it comes to parliamentary representation, Rwanda, Algeria, Iraq, Tunisia, Afghanistan, Pakistan, Bangladesh, South Sudan and Uganda – countries which are regularly cited as examples of the impoverished state and poor treatment of women – each have more women in government than the USA[vi]. Furthermore, in Rwanda, women outnumber men in parliament, and yet 45% of the Rwandan population – both men and women – are below the poverty line. Consider that Rwanda's Minister of Women's Advancement (a feminist activist) was convicted of genocide when she offered rape as a reward for murdering thousands of refugees. So being a woman does not guarantee even a modicum of humanity, let alone justice. India, Pakistan, and Bangladesh have all likewise had female rulers; but this did not equate to the improvement of the standard of living for women or men, but only in the improved lives of the elite class of women in power. So there is clearly no positive correlation between justice and the number of women in parliament.

Not only did the USA rank behind these countries in terms of female representation, but this is despite the USA having a female majority of voters (53%)[vii]. It is no surprise then, when women choose not to elect women and vote for candidates of the 'wrong gender' (i.e. male), that feminists resort to undermine the women they are supposed to stand for, by campaigning for fixed female quotas in parliament.

So women do not need power to obtain justice, because merely empowering women does not equate to empowering justice.

2 – Empowering Women Reinforces the Status Quo

Feminists claim that empowering women is about increasing women's choices. In reality, it tries to restrict women's choices to what feminists think those choices ought to be, and tries to subject them to the same oppressions that men have suffered. If Jack goes tumbling down a hill, does Jill really have to go tumbling after?

Feminists like to claim that women would redefine power. The female editor of Forbes 100 Most Powerful Women 2013, said she wanted to select women that brought fresh ideas of power, instead of reflecting the same old political and economic might. Yet her so-called "fresh" list bragged about 9 heads of state with a combined GDP of $11.8 trillion, 24 CEOs controlling $893 billion, and 14 billionaires valued in excess of $82 billion. Beyonce (#17), Angelina Jolie (#37), and Sofia Vergara (#38) also all came out ahead of the Queen of England (#40); but in front of all of them was Michelle Obama (#4), by virtue of marriage to Barack Obama, the most powerful man! So, these women's concepts of power look suspiciously exactly like male concepts of power!

Feminists do not want real change, but simply to take over the same oppressive ideas of power that they have long attributed to men.

Feminists also claim that male dominated capitalism has long prevented women's economic achievement, forcing them to rely on men to be providers (because men obviously want as many financial responsibilities as they can get, right?). Feminists say capitalism leaves women only one man away from welfare – yet men, too, are only one job away from welfare! It is clear that capitalism is not about men oppressing women, but the rich oppressing the poor. Yet, rather than standing for social justice and challenging the economic system that has enslaved millions of men in debt, feminists have simply served up women for exploitation, too, by making it a necessity for women to work. Now, the powerful elite gets to enslave, exploit and tax the female half of society, too! Progress!

In empowering women, capitalism and feminism go hand in hand in the divide and rule of the family unit. Simone de Beauvoir, who catapulted the feminist movement, explained: "No woman should be authorized to stay at home to raise her children […] Women should not have that choice, precisely because if there is such a choice, too many women will make that one. It is a way of forcing women in a certain direction."

So, feminists clearly do not care about campaigning for what women want or increasing their choices, but rather about realigning women's choices to what feminists think women should want.

Feminists complain about the handful of men dominating positions of leadership – but make no mention of the fact that almost every single human being has been moulded by a woman – the mother that raised them. Take a moment to consider that this includes every so-called patriarchal male – every so-called patriarchal male was raised by a woman. Feminists are keen to demand reproductive rights, but what about the responsibilities? What greater responsibility is there for women who want to raise children? What more fundamental role is there than shaping the generation that you will, with your own eyes, see to mature and live out the good or the bad that you teach them? Women are often the highest human authority in the home – how many men are the highest human authority in their work place? Feminists ignore this because it acknowledges that women by and large already have power, perhaps even more power than men; it also acknowledges that true power does not mean autonomy, but responsibility.

Forcing women out of the choice of full-time motherhood, has not only deprived many women, but it has enabled the state (by way of increased childcare) to have greater exposure and influence in shaping children's thinking toward the state's own goals. Women do not need power in such a flawed system, where empowering women only reinforces that status quo.

3 – Power is a Duty, Not a Right

The major flaw in the thinking of feminists, indeed in the thinking of many in West, is with their conception of power. Power is a burden not a virtue, it is a responsibility not a right, and, being "magnetic to the corruptible"[viii] and in constant need of restraint, power should be given and never taken. In a truly just system, a leader should look after the best interests of all individuals – not specific factions. In a just system, a leader should not govern according to their own fancies, but according to an objective code that is higher than them self; an objective code that guarantees the rights of both men and women, regardless of who is administrating them, and that the leader is held accountable to. The one who asks for this power should be disqualified from it. In such a system, a leader is bound to serve, not rule. And this is the concept of power or leadership in Islam.

In Islam, both men and women are welcome to work in politics and the decision making-circles of government. Both men and women are allowed to be court judges and Islamic scholars of Prophetic traditions (hadith) and jurisprudence. Islam mandates that both men and women are obliged to account and speak out against an unjust ruler. Islam mandates that a woman's oath or pledge of allegiance to the ruler is worth the same as that of a man. Pledge and consultation are the basic principles of Islamic governance and women share in that on an equal footing. So much so that if a woman grants sanctuary to someone that is considered an enemy, the leader has to stand by the guarantee that she has given based on her judgment.

When it comes to being the head of state in Islam, neither men nor women have a right to this power. Rather, men have a duty to discharge this burden, whilst women are granted an exemption from this burden. The head of state in Islam receives no privileges or wages for such a position (unlike present world leaders), but is only paid an amount in compensation based on what they would have earned had they not been inducted to carry out this public service. In this way, Islam considers the role of head of state to be like that of compulsory military drafting, where women were not expected to shoulder the burden of defending the state – only men were.

If women really want justice for society, and the implementation of the rights guaranteed by their Creator, we should not be ensnared or distracted by the feminist rhetoric that tells us we need more and more women to claw their way to economic and political heights in order to improve our lives. Rather, we should fulfill our duty to God, in implementing the laws of Allah (swt); a system that promises to empower justice rather than people, and has an historical precedence of protecting men, women and minority groups from poverty, exploitation and abuse. Without accepting the objective values provided by the Creator, mankind has no recourse to justice. Women do not need power because empowering women does not automatically empower justice; women do not need power because empowering women does not change the status quo; and, ultimately, women do not need power because power is not a virtue for men or women – power is the virtue of our Creator, leaving only duty as the virtue of mankind.

NCFM on circumcision

NCFM · 9 October 2013 · Archived copy · Original

NCFM NOTE: On September 22, Mr. Svoboda sent a letter to Canada's leading newspaper, the National Post, and to Slate, in response to Mark Joseph Stern's horrific article, "'Intactivists' Against Circumcision." Below is the text of the letter. The letter sent to Slate is virtually identical.

We need to let children reach the age of majority and let them decide whether circumcision is right for them.

There are facts about circumcision — but you won't be able to learn any of them from Mark Joseph Stern in his article for the National Post ("'Intactivists' Against Circumcision, September 19). Instead you will find an astonishing compilation of outright falsehoods about thousands of dedicated, unpaid volunteers from many walks of life who are working to protect children from an unnecessary and irreversible surgery that many of them grow up to resent.

Far from dismissing science, individuals committed to protecting children include leading scientists, pediatricians, public health researchers, and medical ethicists in countries around the world. Recently a team of 38 European scientists wrote in Pediatrics that the only possible medical justification for circumcision is reducing urinary tract infections (UTIs), which are not only rare for boys, but can be effectively treated with antibiotics—just as they are for girls.

Even the American Academy of Pediatrics—which has been criticized by these same experts for having a pro-circumcision bias—agrees that medicine does not justify routine circumcision. The Royal Dutch Medical Association found in 2010 that the foreskin is "a complex, erotogenic structure that plays an important role" in sex, concluding that "circumcision of male minors is a violation of children's rights to autonomy and physical integrity."

In 2011, a paper by Frisch in the Oxford International Journal of Epidemiology found that "circumcision was associated with frequent orgasm difficulties in Danish men and with a range of frequent sexual difficulties in women…"

That same year, the Journal of Law and Medicine published a detailed survey of the numerous fatal flaws in the African trials that purported to support male circumcision as a preventive measure against HIV infection. Simply put, empirical data does not support the proposition that circumcision improves child health outcomes.

Far from being the concern of "fringe" activists, circumcision has caught the attention of renowned experts in child welfare and human rights. The Journal of Medical Ethics, the world's top journal in medical ethics, recently published a special issue on circumcision including several articles by leading scholars who are opposed to the nonconsensual removal of healthy, erogenous tissue from children's genitals.

"Intactivists" are winning because more and more people are investigating the issue for themselves and are coming to realize that a pre-Enlightenment religious ritual has no business masquerading as medicine in the 21st Century. Countless men are extremely dissatisfied that a part of their body was taken away from them without their consent.

The false information and worst ideas mentioned by Stern are in fact coming from him and, sadly, from one of Canada's premier newspapers.

Thousands of boys die or suffer serious consequences every year from botched circumcision.

What's wrong with letting boys make their own decision when they reach adulthood. It's their penis.

Shouldn't circumcision be their choice?

AVFM News week in review Oct 3-10, 2013

Robert O'Hara · 10 October 2013 · Archived copy · Original

A sad news week this week with AVFM News reporting on the tragic death of Christian Adamek, a 15-year-old high school student in Harvest, Alabama. A memorial service was held for him Wednesday at a local science center. AVFM News and the entire AVFM community extend their deepest sympathies.

Item: Ryerson Men's Group to be established on campus

After much resistance from the student union and many members of the faculty and staff, the very first Ryerson University Men's Group is to be established this year. AVFM News will be watching progress closely. Great job guys!

Item: New Zealand woman wins 70% of all assets in divorce proceedings

Of course the poor thing stayed at home with the kids and had all of her bills paid for as well as some rather lavish jewelry so she gets….not half…..not 60%…..but 70%. It's because the income disparity of course. Another reason to not get married and become financially responsible for them.

Item: American Apparel marketing "Period Power" T-shirt

You have to see it to believe it. But be careful, you may not want to look.

Item: Florida man denied mammogram because , well, he's a man.

This man's insurance didn't cover mammograms. Why would his insurance company cover mammograms for men silly? So when he develops a painful lump under his left nipple he hears of free mammograms at a local clinic. He is turned away because, yup you guessed it, he's a man. Fortunately the local TV station took his case and he was able to get the help he needed. Kudos to WFTX in Fort Myers Florida!

Item: UK Ministers roll out new proposals to have more people placed on sex offender registry even if they have never committed a crime. Places restrictions on travel and personal activities.

So, if these people get their way you can be denied travel outside of the UK and be restricted from working around children as well as a host of other things even if you have not been convicted of anything. Furthermore, if you are convicted of any kind of sex crime anywhere, even having been put on the sex offenders registry here in the U.S. for, let's say, urinating in public, you would get the Royal (pun intended) in the U.K. Things are getting scarier and scarier all the time.

Item: Rabbis accused in plot to kidnap, torture husbands in order to get them to divorce

Under orthodox Jewish religious guidelines only the husband can grant a religious divorce, not the other way around. That does suck and I can't understand why any woman would get married under those circumstances. But not to fear, just talk to the Rabbi and he has some buddies that will take care of business for you. It will cost you a couple of bucks, though.

Item: Sugar daddy websites flourishing during government shutdown.

What's a girl to do when she can no longer rely on Big Daddy Government to pay her bills?

Item: Viagra maker has more cash on hand than U.S. Government.

The folks at Slate just can't help themselves – they have to find a way, however irrelevant and tangential, to link the government shutdown to the penis.

Item: Philosophy professor doomed by false sexual harassment charges.

What's a girl to do when she develops a warm relationship with an older man who expects her to do the work he is paying her to do?

In His Own Words: Sex, lies and videotape

Dr. Tara J. Palmatier · 10 October 2013 · Archived copy · Original

It's day 10 of Domestic Violence Awareness Month. While men comprise approximately half of all domestic violence, they receive very little attention, support, compassion and resources. Men are the invisible victims of domestic violence.

Today's In His Own Words is a case of "sometimes the truth is stranger than fiction." "Michael" was betrayed, violated and traumatized by his wife all so she could impress and titillate her lover and accomplice. It's 50 shades of WTF.

> Sex, Lies and Videotape
> My story begins in August of 2008. After years working the same job, I decided to take a calculated risk and start a business of my own. My wife and I discussed it constantly that summer. She seemed to understand the risks involved, supported it and agreed that it was worth the risk.
> Two months later, the business was up and running. In my industry, it would be difficult to find a worse day to do what I did. I struggled that year and ended up making a little less than the salary my former job provided. It had been a terrible, extremely stressful year that somehow it came together at the very end.
> Sadly, the second year was much worse than the first. By the third year, things were blowing up. Adding to the extreme stress, we had two children during this three-year period. They're both under 5 now and I love them dearly. They have been the most wonderful gift, but came at an "all or nothing" time in my life.
> I wish I could have had better foresight, but on the other hand, having children was never part of the discussion about my going into business for myself. Having kids when we did was not my choice. Having children was her lifelong dream and not up for discussion.
> As the daycare bills began to mount, the business fell apart. The stress became overwhelming. Before we ran out of money, I was fortunate enough to be able to go back to work for my former employer. It was still extremely stressful and we could barely afford our expenses, but I was happy we had a little stability.
> Unfortunately, things at home had become very volatile despite the added financial security. I had been through stress before and felt I was holding up, but sadly I didn't see what was going on with my wife until it was too late.
> Her behavior changed. At times she would burst out at me in a rage and throw degrading insults and criticisms at me. I was worthless. She did everything and I did nothing to support the family. At one point, I literally begged her to stop insulting me.
> As wonderful as the kids are, they added a lot of stress as well. Kids require everything you have. I went to bed every night feeling like I had given them everything I could. I made sure of that and always will.
> Despite my wife's overt hostility and degrading criticisms, our sex life had never been better. It was very confusing. She would scream at me one night and then I'd find myself in bed with her the next night.
> I tried and tried to figure this out, and I concluded that while the stress was extreme, we were getting through it despite the hurtful things she did and said. I kept telling myself that for all the hurtful things she did, there were good things as well if I looked for them.
> Also, I took my marriage vows to heart. I was committed through thick or thin and wanted to be the husband she wanted. I kept telling myself it would get better as soon as the kids got a little older. I told my parents the same whenever they voiced concern over the way she treated me. Yes, once the kids were a little older things would get better.
> A few weeks after my 40th Birthday in the autumn of 2012, I was setting up a new network and logged my wife's cell phone into it. As I did this, my thumb swiped her mail button by mistake. To my surprise, I saw an email address belonging to my wife that I didn't recognize.

Feeling like a creep, I clicked into the account to see what was there. I found a very clean account except for about a dozen emails in the deleted items folder. My heart started to race as I saw all of the emails were from the same man.

The first email I read hurt so much. The subject line was "It's a chilly day" and the body of the email said, "This should warm you up." Below his words was a short porn video.

The rest of the emails were equally upsetting, but none of them explained what was really going on or how extensive their relationship was. There was a lot of talk about sex, high-heeled shoes and other "apparel," and several emails with a link to tumblr.com. The link went straight to a page requiring an ID and password to gain access. I tried to get past that page, but couldn't figure out the id and password.

I started to panic. I couldn't control myself. I had to talk to my wife even though the emails really didn't explain much at all about what was going on except that she was having sexually charged conversations with another man.

I apologized to her for accidentally discovering her new email address and the emails in the deleted items folder. My heart sank as she said in a shaky voice, "Honey, there is nothing going on at all."

She went on to say that she and this man, a former co-worker, had somehow ended up having some fun talking about sex and how to spice things up in their love lives. She said that she knew what she was doing was wrong, but that it never went further than a little joking around about sex, things to do and wear to create excitement with each other's spouses.

That was it. End of story, she said.

I tried to believe her and put it behind me because she seemed desperate to keep our marriage together and I took my commitment to our marriage seriously. I forgave her and tried to put things back together.

I trusted her and believed in her more than I have anyone in my life outside of my parents. I felt it was important to treat her the way I would want to be treated. So I gave her the benefit of the doubt that she would never do anything to intentionally hurt me.

Yet I was tortured by where all the details seemed to lead. Two things kept eating away at me. First, she said that it had gone on since February 2012, nine months. Second, she created a secret email address for him. Nine months is a fairly long time. I knew it was graphic, and she took extraordinary steps to hide it.

I couldn't contain it in my mind and kept interrogating her. By the end of the year, I still didn't know anything else, but I knew she wouldn't do the things she did if there wasn't something to hide. There had to be more to it.

Finally, one day I sent her some articles about emotional affairs. To my surprise she seemed to take what she read to heart and said that a lot of the things she was doing fit that description. She apologized profusely and said that she would be honest with me about the things they did. I started asking questions and slowly she started to unlock a little information at a time.

By Christmas, she finally admitted that she had made videos of herself for him and had sex with him on FaceTime and Skype. The next morning, I was sitting outside bewildered and wondering how I never saw any signs of what she was doing.

Then I remembered a special date night we had that past spring and my heart caught in my throat. It was one of those nights I thought meant everything was okay in our marriage despite everything. She asked my parents to spend the night with our kids and we went downtown to stay at a nice hotel.

It was a wonderful night. We had a nice dinner and some wine and went back to the room for a quiet romantic evening together. As I recalled that night, I began to feel paralyzed. That night she said she wanted to record our lovemaking. I agreed, happy and relieved that our relationship seemed to be on the mend.

> We made our first sex movie that night. We recorded ourselves over and over again in the months that followed. As I remembered these moments, I realized they occurred concurrently with her "emotional affair."
> Now I wondered if my wife had been making movies of us for her lover, or whatever the hell he is, to watch? I confronted my wife again. I lied and said I knew what she had done. I told her I knew that she was recording us and sending the videos to him. She nodded her head and said she was so sorry.
> She tried to explain it by saying he told her he wanted to "see her in action" before the two of them slept together. To this day, my wife is adamant that she did not have sex with this man, not that it matters. It would have been better if they'd just had sex and not used me as a prop in their sick games. It would still have been hurt and devastated, but I suspect not as much.
> I believed our lovemaking was a sign we were mending our relationship. In reality my wife used me to make sex audition tapes for another man. To say I feel violated and betrayed is a gross understatement.
> It is approaching a year since that day my wife told me the truth, or at least some of the truth. I am sure there is more that happened that I will never know. It's been almost a year and the pain feels just as sharp and fresh.
> I looked into filing criminal charges, but the police refused to get involved. I consulted with attorneys to try to file a civil suit against this man and my wife for damages, but none of them would take my case. I am fairly certain that if I had done the same to my wife, I would be lucky to have supervised visitation with our kids, that is, if I was allowed to see them at all.
> The professionals say I am making progress since then, but I don't feel like I am. I am still depressed. I feel like I am on the sidelines watching my life happen to me. Aside from my parents and a few friends; I don't know whom I can trust anymore.
> I feel profoundly and utterly alone. She is out of my life as much as possible and I have a 50% custody agreement for the children. What happened still occupies my mind and I do my best to get through each day. I have struggled over whether or not I should tell the other man's wife about what he and my wife have done, and, I suspect what he has done with other women. I don't know if this is right thing to do or not.
> The financial stress is worse than ever, but I can't really think about it right now. I wake up and desperately want the day to be over. My wife used me as a human sex toy to put a show on for her secret friend with benefits. And there seems to be no way to obtain justice or move past it.

If there is a positive side to this sordid mess, it is that Michael's divorce attorney was able to get his wife to agree to 50% shared custody, even against her attorney's advice. You see, she doesn't want her digital sexcapades coming out in family court. If there are any attorneys reading this, do you know of any charges or legal actions Michael can take? If there are, maybe he could regain some semblance of control in his life and begin to climb out of the depression. While it's true Michael is better off without his ex, it's cold comfort in the face of the betrayal trauma he has suffered.

As a woman involved in the Men's Movement, I'm often asked how it is that I came to be interested in men's issues. Sometimes the question is asked with skepticism, because, after all, why would a woman be interested in the rights of half the sentient beings that share the planet with her? Sometimes it's asked sincerely since the movement that's billed itself as women's voice in the world is also a movement that is virulently anti-male. And it's not like many women are correcting that perception. So why did I get involved? Why did we–that is the women who make an effort to bring awareness and engage in activism for men's issues–why do we get involved?
Join me, Karen Straughan, Della Burton, Alison Tieman and special guest, Diana Davison as we discuss why we're involved in the movement for men's human rights.

QUEEN'S PARK is pretty old. It was built in 1860, and, for the most part, is bordered by the University of Toronto campus. The park is really more of a garden than a park and features a pretty neat hub pathway system that radiates from the centre of the park to the street. In the south-western corner, sits an unusual, but nonetheless beautiful and striking monument – the Ontario Veteran's Memorial.

[image]
A soldier stands guard by the Ontario War Memorial
The Ontario Veteran's Memorial is a 98ft long, gently curved granite wall that features laser-etched images of past conflicts – as well as inscriptions from authors and military historians. The wall is a symbol of Canadian freedom and self-reliance – and commemorates those that fought in Canadian uniform, beginning with the Fenian raids of 1867, to more modern conflicts.

It is commonplace, both here in Canada and in many other countries around the world with extensive military histories, to celebrate those that put themselves in harm's way, and to commemorate those that made the ultimate sacrifice. Overwhelmingly, it is men who made, and continue to make those sacrifices. Society shows its appreciation in a number of ways; parades; veteran appreciation days; poppy campaigns; and, of course, with memorials.

The city of Toronto is no exception in this regard, peppered as it is with such monuments. On University Avenue, just north of Queen Street, is the impressive and imposing South African War Memorial. At its base are three standing figures – with one more standing atop an immense column. Erected in 1910, the South African War Memorial stands as a reminder, a thank you, to those who fought, and died, in the Boer War.

There is also the Victory Peace memorial in Coronation Park, built to commemorate the 50th Anniversary of the ending of The Second World War. Unfortunately, this memorial was vandalized in 2012. George Murphy, 72, whose father fought in the Second World War, described his reaction while choking back tears to the Toronto Sun last year: "I think it's terrible to see them destroy what these veterans have done for us," he said. "It's like stepping on them. These people wanted to protect our lives. My father would be very upset over this."

And he'd be right to be upset. Throughout history millions of men have given their lives in the cause of assuring our freedom; freedom from oppression; freedom of association; freedom of speech.

Indeed, freedom of speech has become a very contentious issue of late. Censorship is en vogue again. North American college campuses, in particular, are becoming increasingly hostile to dissenting voices. In the E.U., legislation is under discussion that will make holding anti-feminist positions a criminal offence. There has been a severe ramping-up of censorious and shaming language on the internet. We are now at a point where the discussion of certain topics such as rape has become almost impossible.

Radical feminists have hijacked these conversations, imprinting upon them their own rules for engagement; "men's groups are hate groups – no exceptions; women are not to take responsibility for their own personal safety – no exceptions; women are the oppressed, men are the oppressors – no exceptions. There is no such thing as men's rights – no exceptions."

Yet, despite these attempts to stifle free speech, people are speaking out and people are banding together to come up with solutions to further understanding of complex issues such as rape, and complex issues that pertain to equality.

On the weekend of the 27th and 28th September, 2013, Toronto played host to an historic weekend of events. The Canadian Association For Equality (CAFE) hosted a talk at the University of Toronto, by Dr. Miles Groth on the male crisis in education. According to Dr. Groth (and, it should be pointed out, Everest-sized mountains of independent evidence) it is now an established fact that more and more young men are missing out on university education and that those that are able to avail of such an opportunity often face an anti-male environment.

Because of the preponderance of mandatory freshman courses on date rape and consent, it is now commonplace for young freshman to be inculcated with the notion that all young men are potential rapists. Additionally, there are no places or organizations for young men to go to as a group and discuss what it means to be branded in such a way; they are actively discouraged from challenging this obviously biased, hateful ideology.

Of course, none of this was news to the many in attendance that evening. Members of A Voice For Men, CAFE and associated MHRAs already knew this. The event to them was more about coming together and expressing solidarity with one another – of defying censorial behavior – of trying to overcome bigotry and rampant ignorance.

Nowhere was this more evident, than at the next day's rally, at Queen's Park.

Early the next morning, activists gathered at the provincial legislature in recognition of the crisis facing men and boys. They had come in greater numbers than anticipated. They had come from not just Toronto, or Ontario, or Canada – but from around the world. They had come with a unity of purpose – to stand up, and to proudly, unashamedly, speak their minds.

They weren't however, the only group there. Shortly after the rally began, a gay rights advocacy group, Bash Back, gathered behind the rally. Their numbers were small – indeed they were dwarfed by the much larger MHRA rally, but they still managed, despite their diminutive size, to make a lot of noise. They yelled obscenities through bullhorns. They accused those gathered at the rally of sexism, fascism, rape apologia and homophobia. They did so while Dean Esmay, a gay rights campaigner in former years, tried to reason with them. They did so while Karen Straughan, a non-straight female MHRA tried to reason with them. They did the same while Adam McPhee, a tireless LGBT community worker and member of CAFE, tried to reason with them.

Attila Vinczer, wearing a poppy and in playful mood with his two sons.
Esmay, Straughan, and McPhee despite their appeal to reason, inevitably failed. However, McPhee fired a scything parting shot at the screeching mob. Addressing the gang below McPhee pointed out to them that they were jumping up and down on top of the Ontario Veteran's Memorial, a war memorial erected in honour of those that fought and died for Canada over a period of more than 150 years. A war memorial in honour of those who fought and died so that groups, such as Bash Back could assemble, free from harassment and speak their minds.

And this is how they repaid that debt – not by acting in a civil manner and protesting in a dignified, peaceful way, not by listening to the other side and coming up with a counter argument – and certainly not by accepting the offer of Attila Vinczer, organizer of the rally to address the gathered MHRAs and to voice their concerns. No – they chose to trample all over something sacred to spew their hatred and lies.

When the Victory Peace memorial was vandalized in 2012 the artist, John McEwen, 67, was asked what he thought. Mr. McEwen took a stoical approach. He began by pointing out that the monument symbolized the diversity of languages in Canada while recognizing the 50th anniversary of the Second World War and the military contributions of Canadians. Speaking to the Toronto Sun he said:

"Do I take it personally? No, and I don't think the veterans should take it personally," he said. "Stupidity isn't even politics. Stupidity is ignorance and ignorance is an indulgence in a place where you don't know what's going on.

"If you had any political agenda you were trying to serve, it's just wasted."

Bash Back then, as stupid as they are, as ignorant as they are – aren't the real opposition to the MHRM. Their rhetoric, their ignorance of what we stand for and their vile behavior is proof enough that they don't really know what they're doing. Put bluntly – they are idiots.

[image]
An MHRA holds a sign, and confronts Bash Back with questions they can't or won't answer

The real enemies are the ones who weren't there. The real enemies are the ones behind closed doors, cowering in anonymous gender studies departments – filling young minds with bigotry, and hatred. The real enemies are the Lise Gotells of this world, who seek to demonize young men for no reason other than the fact that they have a penis.

We'll be back in Toronto in January – and we'll be back in bigger numbers – despite the cold weather, despite the longer travel times, despite being broke after Christmas. We'll be back, and we're going to keep coming back. We won't be silenced by bigots. We understand the price paid by others for our freedom to associate, and to speak our minds. It may take some time, but eventually, others will too.

Equality revisited (early 1900s)

Robert St. Estephe · 10 October 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Robert St. Estephe–Gonzo Historian–is dedicated to uncovering the forgotten past of marginalizing men. "Gonzo journalism" is characterized as tending "to favor style over fact to achieve accuracy." Yet history – especially "social history" – is written by ideologues who distort and bury facts in order to achieve an agenda. "Gonzo" writing is seen as unorthodox and surprising. Yet, in the 21st century subjectivity, distortion and outright lying in non-fiction writing is the norm. Fraud is the new orthodoxy. Consequently, integrity is the new "transgressive."

Welcome to the disruptive world of facts, the world of Gonzo History.

Here are three newspaper articles, one from France and two from the United States, that addressed early 20th century questions of equality between the sexes. If you believe in equal rights, you must believe in equal responsibility. If you believe in equal "empowerment," you must believe in equal agency.

?Equality considered in 1901 USA

NOTE: At this time Delaware's law provided that wife-beaters be punished with the whipping post, which remained on the books, and was used for decades to come.

FULL TEXT: While Mrs. Carrie Nation [anti-alcohol activist], exulting in the security of her womanhood, is sweeping the East with a besom and raising something like a riot in every town in the State, the legislators of Delaware have under consideration a bill which, if enacted, will startle her worse than the sight of a gin mill in open working order next door to her own house. The Delaware measure is nothing more nor less than a proposition to equalize punishments in that State and to treat vicious wives in the same way that vicious husbands are treated.

According to the reports that come to us the bill provides that "if any person, being the wife of any man, shall, by physical violence, abuse" maltreat or beat her husband, she shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by being whipped at the whipping post with not less than five and not more than, thirty lashes by the Sheriff, or by her husband, at his election."

To the people of California such a bill will appear nothing more than a legislative josh; but they are treating it seriously in the East. The New York Times notes: "There is a subtle touch of grim humor in the phraseology of the bill, which makes it optional with the wronged husband whether he or the Sheriff shall administer the disciplinary castigation to the virago under correction. There is reason to fear that the Sheriff, having no personal interest in the matter, would discharge his duty in a more or less perfunctory manner; whereas the husband of the person being the wife of any man, who has rendered himself amenable to the penalty of the husband-beating misdemeanor would certainly apply the scourge with no sparing hand, if moved to apply it at all."

There a reasons for fearing that husband-beating is a too frequent practice; in that part of the country, and that few husbands are safe when their wives are infuriated. There is a tradition that even John L. Sullivan, in the height of his career, once complained in a Boston court that his wife was in the habit of beating him unmercifully whenever he went home too drunk to put up a fight and defend himself. The Delaware bill may therefore be in the' interest of wholesome household reform, but all the same the ht and who sends his wife to the whipping post will have a just claim upon the sympathy of the world as soon as the dame gets home again.

?Equality enforced in 1912 USA

FULL TEXT: Binghampton, N. Y., May 31. – Mrs. Mary Dubal of this city is said to be the first suffragist in the United States who has been given a penitentiary sentence for husband beating. She was arrested on a warrant obtained by Mr. Dubal.

City Judge Albert Hotchkiss found her guilty and declared if women desired men's prerogatives they should also have men's punishments when found guilty of law. He always dealt severely with wife beaters, he said, and accordingly he sentenced her to three months in the penitentiary.

?Equality considered in 1913 France

FULL TEXT: The French suffragettes are now fighting for the right to be guillotined.

A recent murder trial in which the prosecuting attorney, when asking for sentence of death for a woman, added that such a verdict was merely a matter of form, since custom was against allowing women to be executed, has raised much discussion regarding this question of sex distinction, and now the foremost feminists are agitating for the "privilege" of equal punishment with men, regarding this as a step toward their ideals.

A symposium just held by L'Eclair shows that among the leading upholders of women's rights the majority of them think that by being exonerated from death on the scaffold, when they legally deserve it, women are treated as irresponsible beings, and they protest against this attitude as a humiliating outrage.

Mme. Aubert, The General Secretary of the French feminist society, Le Suffrage des Femmes, says:

"Since woman is as competent as man to exercise her rights and account for her actions, the two sexes should be equal both before the polling booths and before the guillotine. Not to execute women criminals while the death penalty exists is sensitiveness of the hypocrite who classes women with lunatics and despoils them of their rights."

Says Mme. Dr. Pelletier, the Director of La Suffrageste, the principal women's rights newspaper:

"The gallantry of the guillotine is an insult to the feminine sex, as is gallantry in general."

"To answer this question," says the Duchesse d'Uzes, "is very simple. Crime has no sex."

Similar views are held by several other prominent representatives of the woman's movement. Only two women express the contrary opinion. Daniel Lesueur, a novelist, says:

"I have never dreamed of demanding the equality of sexes as far as the guillotine. I do not think that the most furious feminist should regard as a victory for her theories the fact that one of her sex had her head cut off. Let us at all events leave old French courtesy a free hand on this last ground."

In connection with the death penalty opinion is now unanimous that public executions should be discontinued. This sentiment is expressed in an editorial article which has just appeared in Excelsior. The writer points out that the custom of public guillotinings, far from having the expected deterrent effect on criminals, has only given condemned men a chance for making theatrical appeals and teaching embryo assassins who may be gathered around the scaffold how to die with a swagger and leave behind a reputation for heroism among their comrades.

"The question," says the editorial article, "to-day presents itself with less hypocrisy than formerly. It is no longer a matter of setting an awful example to the public, but merely getting rid as quickly as possible of persons whose existence is thought dangerous to society. The operation should be carried out privately before the Court of Magistrates in charge of the case, with the jury and a few journalists."

It is thought that this reform will not be long in coming. [Editors note: And those who thought this were dead wrong.]

In His Own Words: Summer from Hell

Dr. Tara J. Palmatier · 11 October 2013 · Archived copy · Original

It's day 11 of Domestic Violence Awareness Month. Men comprise approximately half of all domestic violence victims, but receive very little attention and support. In this sense, men are the invisible victims of domestic violence.

Today's In His Own Words is yet another tale of what can happen when a lonely, vulnerable man ignores his better judgment and gets involved with an abusive, toxic woman who, in this case, was also a raging drug addict and violent criminal.

> Summer From Hell
> I was in an extremely vulnerable state of mind at the end of April 2010. I had been carrying on a "friends with benefits" sort of relationship with an ex-girlfriend for a year. She constantly promised that she would "kick the father of [her] child out, SOON, and then we can finally be together. But it is not that easy! He just lives here, it's not like we are together or anything!"
> After being fed this nonsense for over a year, I had enough and yearned for a real relationship. I dated a couple women who turned out to be quite unstable, but I always managed to catch it after a couple weeks and pulled the plug immediately. I was an expert at weeding out the "crazies," or so I thought. Boy was I mistaken.
> I made a profile on an Internet dating site and eventually received a message. I checked out the woman's profile and responded, which turned out to be the biggest mistake of my life.
> She was an attractive woman, but not my type. She had lots of tattoos, piercings and dyed hair, but I thought, "Oh, why not?" "Megan" and I began talking. She seemed funny, witty, and intelligent. I was intrigued.
> She asked if I wanted to hang out and have a few beers and I agreed. "What's the harm?" I thought. I picked her up in a town about 45 minutes away, went back to my place, and we had a few drinks and a chat. She seemed so intelligent, so friendly, sweet, and compassionate. Nothing seemed amiss and I didn't want her to leave.
> We agreed to be in a relationship and she moved in. It all happened so fast. She had made it clear in the very beginning that she had nowhere else to go. I don't know what I was thinking. I wasn't thinking, that was the problem.
> I was coming off of a bad relationship where I'd been strung along. Prior to that, I was a 6-year relationship. I was lonely, vulnerable, and not thinking clearly.
> The first month, everything was wonderful. She immediately got a job, the sex was amazing, and she spoiled me rotten. Then, like the flick of a light switch, things started to change. She no longer wanted to do anything with me or go anywhere. She claimed to have "fibromyalgia" and said that she had "flare-ups" that caused her to be in severe pain.
> Pretty soon she just wanted to stay in bed all day. She told me she needed some painkillers, but that doctors won't prescribe them for her "condition." She coerced me into making several calls for her to try to get a prescription. Then we went to the emergency room where she pretended to have a urinary tract infection to get a prescription for painkillers. This was my first real hint that something was amiss. I wondered, "Does she really have this condition, or does she have a drug problem that she's trying to hide from me?"
> Turns out she had a MAJOR drug problem. Before I knew it, she was setting up "meetings" with strangers on Craigslist to score whatever she could get her hands on — ecstasy, painkillers, heroin, and cocaine. She threatened, bullied, and manipulated me into driving her to these drug deals, and I paid for all of it.
> I was so completely blindsided by this behavior and so caught off guard that I went along with it without opposition. When I would say "no," she would literally have a fit like a child or threaten to hit herself and call the police and have me arrested.

She quit her job and became a complete parasite. She belittled me, called me names, told me I was fat, ugly, not her type, told me that she doesn't like muscle, which lead me to wonder what the hell she is doing with me then, because I am an extremely muscular man, and told me I was an asshole just like all her other exes.

Cocaine became her major vice real fast and she was snorting hundreds of dollars of it a week. MY dollars.

Like a fool, I let her do it. When I didn't, she would steal my money or debit card while I was asleep. She had "pity parties," where she would sit on the couch, snort cocaine for hours, and proceed to bitch and complain about how her past is so screwed up, her exes all screwed her over, the death of her father damaged her, her family treats her so badly, BLAH, BLAH, BLAH.

It was the most pathetic thing I have ever seen. And yet, like a fool, I tolerated every minute of it. I wanted to help her. I wanted to change her. I wanted to be different than all the rest.

She started cutting her legs, made suicide threats and acted paranoid. She begged me not to call the cops, saying that she will be thrown in a mental hospital where they treat people like dirt. Like a fool, I listened to her. I had no experience with this kind of drama. I was paralyzed.

Finally, someone she had been texting god knows what called the police. I begged the cops to get her psychiatric help. She managed to manipulate her way out of that, too. Until they discovered she had a warrant for her arrest, much to my surprise. She had been scamming people online into "trading her makeup for other brands of makeup," only she never sent them anything in return.

This was my ticket out! I would be free from this nightmare! This was my opportunity — my opportunity to be a sentimental fool and bail her out. Right back to square one we went. I was too kind, too naïve, and way too stupid.

For the next couple of months, it was more of the same — severe drug abuse, emotional abuse, and physical violence. She sucker-punched me several times in the face, full force. Every time she did something, I would call the police, and she would run out the door and hide like a coward.

The police were completely useless and didn't put any effort into tracking her down. Every time she ran out the door, she grabbed one of my valuables — my laptop, wallet, my car keys — just to ensure that she had a way back in.

This insanity went on for three and a half months. I refer to this period in my life as the summer from hell. During this time:

- She completely drained my bank account. Every dime I had went into "keeping her happy" (i.e., supporting her drug habit and other extravagant desires).
- Any time I said "no" she would break up with me and bullied me emotionally until I did what she wanted.
- Manipulated and bribed me with sex. "Let's make a deal. I'll have more sex with you if you do this and this and that for me."
- She physically assaulted me countless times, throwing objects and punching me in the face.
- I came into contact with dozens of shady, unsavory characters. One of them even flashed a pistol while the drug deal went down. I am a licensed firearms carrier, but this freaked me out to no end because I'm sure this guy wasn't and I was unarmed at the time.
- I had some of my belongings stolen by a stranger she met online and invited over my house while I was at work.
- Flipped through her phone to discover that she had performed oral sex on a stranger for cocaine. I never touched her after this. She claimed that she was just having "phone sex," even though it was crystal clear what had actually happened.

- Dealt with bizarre and irrational lies. She created fake Facebook profiles, hit on herself and sent me threatening messages, told me things her friends were supposedly saying about me just to get me angry, hid my car keys and then miraculously found them in places I know I looked and then expected praise for it, etc.
- She threatened to kill my cats.

This episode nearly landed me in jail. I completely lost my temper, grabbed her by her hair and threw her to the ground and told her if she hurt my animals I would end her. I am still amazed that I managed to scare her enough to not call law enforcement on me. Or maybe she just knew that without me she'd have neither financial support nor shelter.

This doesn't even begin to cover all the manipulative and outright bizarre lies she told me and the abuse she put me through. I wanted out, but being a kind hearted man I didn't want to just throw her out on the street. What a fool I was.

My way out eventually came along. She missed a court date, which meant there was another warrant issued for her arrest. I called the police and asked what I should do if there's someone at my house I don't want there. They told me all I had to do was call them and they would remove the person immediately.

I told Megan, "As of tonight, you are either homeless, or you are going to jail until your case is resolved. Either you leave on your own, or I will have you removed." She completely freaked out and began chasing me around the apartment and begging, "I'm sorry! I don't want to lose you! I will change! Please! No." She offered sex and anything she could think of. I wasn't having it. I wanted it to end. She left, but not without stealing a silver necklace my grandmother bought me.

Even after she was gone, the manipulation didn't stop. She sent nude photos, pictures from the beginning of the relationship, dirty texts and emails. Then she made a fake Facebook profile and sent repeated messages saying that Megan had killed herself because she was so devastated by the breakup. I wasn't buying that either.

Then she sent me a picture of her with another guy, pretending like she meant to send it to her girlfriend. I wasn't having any of it, and told her if she doesn't stop messaging me I would track her down and have her jailed. Eventually, she found other victims and stopped bothering me.

The three and a half months of that relationship damaged me more than I can put into words, but it has also taught me so much and made me stronger. I survived. She didn't.

About 6 months ago, I learned she died sometime in March 2013. She was only 26 years old.

The damage she did to me was so extensive that I still hate her and feel as though she is out there ready to strike at me, even though I stood right over her grave and know she is gone. Today, I am doing much better, but the scars are still there. They are a reminder of my injuries and a testament to my survival.

My advice to other men in abusive relationships is:

- Never, ever abandon who you are for a manipulative woman.
- Never go against your own good judgment and common sense.
- If you have a way out, TAKE IT. Things will NOT change! This is who she is! If there is no way out, make one!
- Do not, under any circumstances, ever put up with a drug habit! It makes a person with a personality disorder even more crazy and unstable.
- Be strong, and stay strong! There are people out there who love you and don't just want to use you.
- Don't be a "white knight" and try to save women with personality disorders. Ride off into the sunset alone or find a woman who deserves your efforts.

- Learn and recognize the signs of manipulative behavior, and never tolerate it.
- Listen to your friends and family. They have your best interests in mind, unlike your abusive partner.
- Start every new relationship with a clean slate. Keep in mind this is a different person, but always remain vigilant.

NCFM advisory to university fraternities

NCFM · 11 October 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Recently, there were two alleged incidents of sexual assault at Montana State University Bozeman frat houses resulting in the university temporarily suspending both fraternities.

Universities and national fraternities frequently suspend fraternity chapters in similar situations to prevent future allegations and occurrences if indeed there were actual occurrences in the first place, quell public demonization, minimize risks, appease feminists, cower to the onerous oversight of the Federal Department of Education, and above all, protect their funding.

However, simply banning women from the implicated fraternities until investigations were completed and any corrective steps were taken would have protected the rights of all involved without condemning entire fraternities through guilt by association, nor should doing so conflict with the radical feminist ideology which drives related laws, policies, and regulations.

Regardless, many young men and their families have suffered life-altering and pain-filled experiences when as college students the young men became targets of false accusations. Witness the inexcusable harm done to Duke University lacrosse players who had their lives horrifically disrupted by vindictive false rape accusations and vigilante justice.

The National Coalition For Men and affiliated organizations will monitor MSU Bozeman closely, insisting on a fair and thorough investigation and, if necessary, fair judicial process.

New Federal Department of Education directives from the Obama Administration are specifically targeted at men even though many college-age women are sexually aggressive, sexually harass, and sexually assault young men and women on campus.

Unfortunately, these new Department of Education directives expanded the definitions of sexual assault and virtually destroyed due process rights. Male students are presumed guilty and can be labeled sex offender for merely inviting someone on a date. The accused cannot testify, present evidence, be represented by an advocate or attorney, or otherwise defend themselves.

We hope the truth is uncovered about the incidents at MSU Bozeman and any guilty parties, such as culpable men or false accusing women, if applicable, are properly punished and such incidents stop. We also hope the university administration and others refrain from branding the accused as “sex offender” unless the accused men are convicted of these serious allegations.

We encourage the wrongly accused to stand for their rights and sue the university to recover their reputations — many wrongly accused men have been fully vindicated by our legal systems, including the young lacrosse players at Duke and former Xavier point guard Dez Wells who just filed suit against Xavier to regain his reputation after a false accusation of sexual assault.

In 2012, Chris Thompson and the National Coalition for Men established the first officially recognized men’s rights student organization at a state university in the United States, NCFM-MSU Bozeman. His wife Nevada is chapter President. Chris, Nevada, NCFM, and many others are working hard for the equitable treatment of men, men like you …

We encourage you speak out and stand up for your rights. Join NCFM, participate in our MSU Bozeman chapter, and help us make the world a better place for all of us. Please contact Christopher Thompson, PO Box 1504, Bozeman, MT, 59771 – telephone 406-599-0382.

Did Feminism pick the wrong target?

Jalon Cain (aka Aaron Sleazy) · 11 October 2013 · Archived copy · Original

The first time I encountered “feminism” was due to activists at university. I learnt that women were oppressed and that there was a patriarchy that “rapes” women with their codices, no matter whether they were passed as law or upheld as mores. Any kind of social norm was seen as being disadvantageous for women, even when it benefited them. For instance, if you take a woman out on a date and buy her dinner it doesn’t matter that she got a free meal. No, what matters is that you objectified her and tried setting up an economic transaction that ultimately objectifies and disempowers women. Isn’t this completely obvious to anybody?

In short, I quickly realized that feminists didn’t quite live in reality. I also got the impression that instead of attempting to understand the big picture they were too focussed on particulars. If needed, they would just come up with ad hoc explanations that have an air of the desperate, at least if you’re versed in “tools of oppression” like mathematics or logic.

Let’s now talk about one of the big issues, and the misguided interpretation of feminists. We’ve been told that there is a patriarchy that subjugates women, while all men have it oh-so-good. Now, looking at my lot as a man, and at my friends, or at basically any guy I see, I don’t think that we all have such a great life. We all struggle to get by, and if not financially, then emotionally because a well-compensated job might undermine our emotional well-being. In short, we men make many sacrifices, and if there is a “gender pay gap”, it’s not because someone pays us 20 % more just because we’ve got a dick, but because there’s a sound reason to pay us a bit more money than someone else. In the end, it often boils down to skills and experience.

We men didn’t collude to keep women down. Ask any guy who busts his ass in college or on the job, and he’ll tell you that he makes sacrifices. Many of our choices were not due to some short-term gain, but in the hope of a potential long-term payoff. This might also explain why there aren’t so many men studying Communications. So, if you look at the “gender pay gap” from the angle of skills, it suddenly evaporates. This is not all, though. Somehow I get the idea that ideologues want the “gender pay gap” to disappear without women stepping up their game. This was certainly an impression I had when I skimmed a recent pamphlet of the European Union with the promising title, “Tackling the Gender Pay Gap in the European Union”[1], which seemed to neglect that some jobs are simply better paid because they require a certain education, or great devotion. However, they are just as open to women than men. Nursing is well-paid, and certainly a valid option for men. On the other hand, nothing keeps a woman from coding. The software came preinstalled on her shiny Apple MacBook Air already.

All this talk about the “gender pay gap” is a big fuss about nothing. The problem, instead, is due to income inequality, and the dramatic differences in social class they beget. If you’re from America, you’ve probably been told that you live in a “classless society”, and that everyone can make it if he just tries hard enough. This completely ignores the fact that in the US wealth is more unequally distributed than in many third world countries, with the top 1 % owning more than 1/3 of all wealth. 45 million people live in poverty. You could make an effort and look up pay scales, and you’ll find that for the most part income differences aren’t so dramatic. The poor are equally poor, the average well-off are averagely well-off, and the top-earners make top dollar. Everything changes once you have a look at the people who own all the land, and all the money, and hide their assets in an off-shore tax shelter.

When feminists now argue about the “gender pay gap” that doesn’t even exist I wonder why they just don’t reflect a little bit longer and ask themselves why society allows such an enormous agglomeration of wealth of just a few individuals. I don’t want to ramble about some social utopia, but when I think of the amount of money that was used to bail out the banks that caused the ongoing global recession I can only shake my head. If this is too far-fetched, then think about why it is that there is universal health care in Europe but not in the US. This is an example of everybody being better off in the end, and it’s also one of the reasons why pundits on American TV dislike Europe. Socialism for the rich is fine and dandy, but socialism for everybody is a big no-no.

If you don’t want to tackle big problems, you can of course set up Potemkin villages and harp on about the minor inequalities between men and women, while ignoring the dramatic inequalities between the few people at the very top and ordinary people. The distribution of wealth is a far greater problem than the alleged gender pay gap. With regards to the latter, though, it also seems that women want something for nothing. Instead of rewarding the engineer who put decades into his education, the goal is to equalize pay no matter what. Here's a quote from the pamphlet of the European Union, which I mentioned above[1]:

> Women and men carry out different jobs and often work in different sectors. In the health and social work sector alone, women make up 80 % of all workers. Sectors where women are in the majority have lower wages than those dominated by men.

But is the comparably lower pay in those sectors due to the work itself being compensated less than some other occupations, or due to most of the workers being women? After all, it's not the case that a male nurse makes more than a female nurse just because of his sex. I'm quite certain that pay will be quite comparable. It's simply questionable reasoning. Besides, I don't think work in health care is so poorly paid, and if it is, by some standard, I'm sure it will be easy to find an occupation in which men dominate that is poorly paid as well, but never the topic of a glossy brochure.

Is the male nurse oppressed? Well, I don't think so, and neither is the female nurse. You could only make the claim that the "system" oppresses both because they are both forced to work for a living. This would be an entirely different debate, though. However, even if you raised the income of the female nurse, and the male nurse, too, to the level of a well-compensated mechanical engineer. Sure, they would now be better off. You'd also change some incentive structures, which might lead to unintended consequences. The enormous difference between the super-rich and the common worker would be basically unchanged. This might be why there is no mainstream opposition to feminism. For the people who own the media, it's a rather convenient ideology.

Timeline of gynocentric culture

Peter Wright · 11 October 2013 · Archived copy · Original

That we live in a gynocentric (woman-centered, woman-elevating) culture is not rationally disputable to anyone who looks around with open eyes. Many thinkers believe this elevation of women–and the intensification of misandry that so frequently results from it–is genetic and inescapable. Male disposability, rather than being a nominal reality that is little more than an escape hatch for extreme emergencies, is said to be central to the species. Protection and provision of women first and foremost and putting men's interests dead last is supposedly just a built into our core natures and is thus inescapable and inevitable, with only a tiny handful of people able to see this for what it is: marginalization of and contempt for the vast majority of men, especially men who stumble and fail in their "duty" to destroy themselves for women. But for some time now, Peter Wright–a Man Going His Own Way for many many years now–has been doing tireless work exposing how foolish this genetic fatalism is, and how the gynocentrism that pervades our popular culture today has a distinctly traceable origin going to about the 11th Century in Europe, spreading from there to other societies through literature, art, music and, eventually, Hollywood movies, influencing other cultures throughout the world. Gynocentrism and Its Cultural Origins is a site still in development, but already filled with must-read material. If you're an MHRA (or even just a MGTOW) who is convinced that most of what we face is just plain inevitable and can't be fixed culturally, you should make Gynocentrism.com one of your regular stops on the Internet.–DE

The following timeline details the birth of gynocentric culture along with significant historical events that ensured its survival. Prior to 1200 AD broadspread gynocentric culture simply did not exist, despite evidence of isolated gynocentric acts and events. It was only in the Middle Ages that gynocentrism developed cultural complexity and became a ubiquitous and enduring cultural norm.

1102 AD: Gynocentrism meme first introduced

William IX, Duke of Aquitaine, the most powerful feudal lord in France, wrote the first troubadour poems and is widely considered the first troubadour. Parting with the tradition of fighting wars strictly on behalf of man, king, God and country, William is said to have had the image of his mistress painted on his shield, whom he called midons (my Lord) saying that, "It was his will to bear her in battle, as she had borne him in bed."[1]

1168 – 1198 AD: Gynocentrism meme elaborated, given imperial patronage

The gynocentrism meme is further popularized and given imperial patronage by William's granddaughter Queen Eleanor of Aquitaine and her daughter Marie.[2] At Eleanor's court in Poitiers, Eleanor and Marie completed the work of embroidering the Christian military code of chivalry with a code for romantic lovers, thus putting women at the center of courtly life, and placing love on the throne of God himself – and in doing so they had changed the face of chivalry forever. Key events are:

-1170 AD: Eleanor and Marie established the formal Courts of Love presided over by themselves and a jury of 60 noble ladies who would investigate and hand down judgements on love-disputes according to the newly introduced code governing gender relations. The courts were modelled precisely along the lines of the traditional feudal courts where disputes between retainers had been settled by the powerful lord. In this case however the disputes were between lovers.

-1180 AD: Marie directs Chrétien de Troyes to write Lancelot, the Knight of the Cart, a love story about Lancelot and Guinevere elaborating the nature of gynocentric chivalry. Chrétien de Troyes abandoned this project before it was completed because he objected to the implicit approval of the adulterous affair between Lancelot and Guinevere that Marie had directed him to write. But the approval of the legend was irresistible – later poets completed the story on Chrétien's behalf. Chrétien also wrote other famous romances including Erec and Enide.

-1188 AD: Marie directs her chaplain Andreas Capellanus to write The Art of Courtly Love. This guide to the chivalric codes of romantic love is a document that could pass as contemporary in almost every respect, excepting for the outdated class structures and assumptions. Many of the admonitions in Andreas "textbook" clearly come from the women who directed the writing.[3]

1180 – 1380 AD: Gynocentric culture spreads throughout Europe
In two hundred years gynocentric culture spread from France to become instituted in all the principle courts of Europe, and from there went on to capture the imagination of men, women and children of all social classes. According to Jennifer Wollock,[4] the continuing popularity of chivalric love stories is also confirmed by the contents of women's libraries of the late Middle Ages, literature which had a substantial female readership including mothers reading to their daughters. Aside from the growing access to literature, gynocentric culture values spread via everyday interactions among people in which they created, shared, and/or exchanged the information and ideas.

1386 AD: Gynocentric concept of 'gentleman' formed
Coined in the 1200′s, the word "Gentil man" soon became synonymous with chivalry. According to the Oxford Dictionary gentleman came to refer by 1386 to "a man with chivalrous instincts and fine feelings". Gentleman therefore implies chivalric behaviour and serves as a synonym for it; a meaning that has been retained to the present day.

1400 AD: Beginning of the the Querelle des Femmes
The Querelle des Femmes or "quarrel about women" technically had its beginning in 1230 AD with the publication of Romance of the Rose. However it was Italian-French author Christine de Pizan who in 1400 AD turned the prevailing discussion about women into a debate that continues to reverberate in feminist ideology today (though some authors claim, unconvincingly, that the querelle came to an end in the 1700s). The basic theme of the centuries-long quarrel revolved, and continues to revolve, around advocacy for the rights, power and status of women.

21st century: Gynocentrism continues
The now 800 year long culture of gynocentrism continues with the help of traditionalists eager to preserve gynocentric customs, manners, taboos, expectations, and institutions with which they have become so familiar; and also by feminists who continue to find new and often novel ways to increase women's power with the aid of chivalry. At first glance it appears the modern feminist movement has rejected some chivalric customs such as opening car doors or giving up a seat on a bus for women; however they continue to rely on 'the spirit of chivalry' to attain new privileges for women: opening car doors has become opening doors into university or employment via affirmative action; and giving up seats on busses has become giving up seats in boardrooms and political parties via quotas. Despite the varied goals, contemporary gynocentrism remains a project for maintaining and increasing women's power with the assistance of chivalry.

The Voice of Europe: Forgetting history

Lucian Vâlsan · 11 October 2013 · Archived copy · Original

On October 11, Lucian Vâlsan, James Huff, Huffnágel Pista and whoever shall call in will be talking about the process of forgetting history.

We talk a lot in the MRM about how the dark history of the totalitarian regimes that tormented Europe seems to be repeating itself with the European Union only this time with feminism and political correctness used as the vanguards.

These kinds of connections aren't hard to make if one has minimal knowledge regarding the history of the last 100 years in Europe but the problem is that that minimal knowledge is slowly fading away since more and more European schools are more interested in teaching the recently disproved global warming theory as an ill created by the male sex than teaching the valuable lessons that individuals could and should draw from the tumultuous history of Europe.

One way or the other, setting the record straight is a must for the success of this movement and the truth in general because as long Europe is willing to forget women like Nexhmije Hoxha, Elena Ceaușescu, Erna Petri, Johanna Altvater or Irma Grese, there is little to no chance to convince the culture that women are human beings with faults and issues, just like men are.

The subject is complex and we will definitely not be able to cover it entirely but please do join us in an effort to discover new ways for setting the record straight. Call in at (001) 310 388 9709, or Skype in, after the news.

The show will commence at 7 PM GMT (London, Reykjavik and Lisbon time).

That is 8 PM CET (Madrid, Paris, Brussels, Rome, Oslo, Stockholm, Copenhagen, Budapest, Berlin, Vienna, Warsaw, Amsterdam, Bern, Bratislava, Prague, Belgrade, Tirana, Ljubljana, Zagreb, Sarajevo and Skopje time)

That is 9 PM EET (Helsinki, Tallinn, Riga, Vilnius, Kiev, Chisinau, Bucharest, Sofia, Athens, Ankara and Nicosia time)

That is 10 PM FEET (Minsk time)

And, finally, 11 PM Moscow time.

For the listeners in America this means 2 PM EST, 1 PM CST, 12 PM MST and 11 AM PST.

For the listeners in Australia, this means October 12, 2 AM (AWST) in West Australia and 4 AM AEST. (times adjusted in accordance with DST both for Europe and America)

In His Own Words: A real time cry for help

Dr. Tara J. Palmatier · 12 October 2013 · Archived copy · Original

It's day 12 of Domestic Violence Awareness Month for Men and Boys. Today's In His Own Words is a real time cry for help.

"Miguel" has been involved with an abusive borderline personality disordered woman on and off for 15 years. He is depressed and has thoughts of suicide. Miguel, she is NOT worth it. Get out and get help. (*Please note: English is not Miguel's first language.)

> A Real Time Cry for Help
> It was 1998. My mother began minding a cousin's baby while she was at work. She was in the process of being divorced. We knew each other when we were little children, and she returned to my life as a beautiful woman. She used to spend her days off with my family, because we lived very close to each other at the time.
> It began two years later. One day, I returned home after work and she soon arrived with her three-year old kid. I greeted her with a hug and asked, "How are you?" She replied, "A little sad."
>
> That hug triggered it all. We began dating. It was the most romantic time of my life. I used to call her "My Heaven."
> Like many of the men who have shared their abuse stories, I ignored some really big red flags. For example, one day she'd tell me, "I love you so much." The next day it would be, "We have to split up, this is no good." And the next day it was, "I'm so in love with you." It was really confusing.
> Before we made our relationship "official," we had lots of kissing, hugs and sexual foreplay. It lasted for about five months. We were so in love.
> We started a secret relationship. It was a beautiful time in my life with lots of love, mutual support, great sex life, and the adrenaline of this forbidden relationship (we are first cousins). It was like that for two years. I also took care of her little boy. I love him like a child of my own, and we would spend time together every afternoon.
> Our families disapproved of our relationship. My mother staged some big dramas because we decided to live together. We were stressed because of the family issues. I told my mom, "Please stop creating drama. She deserves respect. If you want to say something about this, talk with me. Leave her alone."
> Sometime later, things began to change for the worse. Her borderline personality disordered behaviors slowly began to emerge once we began living together.
> She became violent for whatever reason. I gave her money every week. It was supposed to be used for buying some food. But at the end, there was nothing in the refrigerator and she became mad when I told her about it. It triggered a rage episode from her. I couldn't believe that such a beautiful soul was transformed into a violent woman.
> One day, I felt very tired. I turned on the radio and laid down to rest after helping her son with his homework, like always. She returned from work, opened the door and became really angry. I said, "Calm down."
> She took some scissors and threw them at my face. I was barely able to avoid the hit. She cried and begged me not to leave. She became terribly sad and I stayed with her.
>
> In the next stage, she was blaming me for everything and began to bully me. I was dirty. I wasn't good enough. I was mean. I was a momma's boy, etc.
> On Christmas Eve 2001, she decided to spend the night with a couple who were long-time friends of hers. I decided to visit my family to ease things between us, and stop the hate towards her.
> She was very angry at my decision and refused to listen to my reasons. She told me, "Get out of my house!"

She punished me and made me feel incredibly guilty.

It was a really painful experience. I was desolated. Some months later, I began psychiatric treatment and discovered some of her secrets. Her father used to beat her mother until she was unconscious and bleeding. My ex had made suicidal gestures while she was married and was seduced by an uncle when she was 15-years old.

I thought, “That’s why she became like this! It’s not her fault!” I was so addicted to her (and had some death wish at the time because of my feelings of guilt). I was on a mission to save her and our relationship.

She was in therapy and all of her demons from the past emerged. She went from victim to aggressor. I resisted her borderline episodes. I found a better job and proved that my intentions towards her were serious. We were together again and my stability made our lives easy for some time.

We had broke up and reunited on a regular basis. I used to forgive and forget all the time. I never felt she was stable enough to live together again though. When she kicked me out of her home it was traumatic. I told her and myself that I would move back in only if she was totally recovered.

We went on this way for more than ten years. In 2008, I had to move to another city (1 and a half hours from her). I did my best to spend more time with her. She hit me in the face. By 2011, things began to get even worse. Sometimes she looked at me with real hate and her violence escalated.

There were insults, humiliations and unpleasant sexual intercourse. Sex was more like a hate thing with rude language from her. At first it was exciting. Later it became ruder with even more insults and nastiness. She encouraged me to insult her while having sex, which made me feel very uncomfortable.

In October 2011, she called me and said, “I miss you so much.” I drove 1 and a half hours to see her that night. We hung out and then returned to her apartment to have sex. Afterwards she told me, “I have other options. Don’t think you are everything in the world.”

How could she be this cruel?! The next day I felt sad. She went to work and we had sex and slept together again that night. In the morning, she told me, “I don’t want anything to do with you anymore. It is over. Get out and take this like a man.”

I began to cry and begged for mercy. She was so insensitive and cruel. I left her home in immense pain. She called me and contacted me in the following months, but I refused to return to her.

She called again in March 2012. She said she was devastated by guilt and sadness, and I forgave her. 2012 was kind of stable, but things soon began to deteriorate at high speed at the beginning of 2013.

The violent episodes returned. I began to lose interest in seeing her because I knew it would likely be a bad time. She complained about my lack of interest, but I was exhausted because the violence had returned to our bedroom.

One night she told me if I didn’t spend more time with her, she would find someone else to “fuck” her. She asked, “Is that what you want?”

She did this only once. I stopped our foreplay, shocked and sad. She asked, “What happened?” I explained how terrible I felt because of her words. She apologized and it never happened again. But the damage was done. It was devastating!

The next time we had sex, she was in ecstasy telling me that she was mine and only mine. “I don’t want to make love with anyone else, only with you! I love you so much!”

She would minimize the most aggressive things she did, claiming her behaviors “were not that serious;” while my mistakes were terrible sins. She also justified her abuse of me. According to her, I deserved her aggressions and insults. She told me that I was only good for sex. She became verbally abusive, and it hurt so much.

The physical violence also returned. She threw some punches at me. I took her arms and said, “Calm down.” I didn’t feel secure while sleeping next to her. I didn’t know what to expect with each visit.

I don’t know if her therapy helped her. Things seemed to get worse despite her therapy group. Honestly, she > seemed better before the therapy. Sometimes when she returned from a session, she was terribly depressed or really angry.

> She found also new excuses for her abusive behavior thanks to therapy. She said her therapist told her I'm a passive-aggressive individual. And my loving, supportive, and caring actions were controlling and violent? They were empty excuses to justify her aggression. Her main complaint was my lack of commitment, but how could I possibly be expected to commit and legally bind myself to her with that kind of behavior?
> In April 2013, I had a depressive episode and we split up again. Some time later, she called and told me that she was at the bus station. She came to my city because she wanted to be with me. I welcomed her and we had a romantic afternoon like the old times!
> I returned with her back to her city and spent a few days with her. I didn't want to leave, but had to return for work. I agreed to visit the next weekend, but I was unable because I was unwell.
> On Monday, she called and was really angry and insulting. She wouldn't listen. On Friday, I travelled to her city and arrived at 10:30 PM without calling her prior to my departure. It was like an emergency to me. I called her several times and had no answer. Her family lives in another province and I thought that she might be with them.
> I made more phone calls and sent messages with no response. This was another kind of violence. She was ignoring me. This triggered a terrible depression episode instantly for me. The consequence was a huge gastritis. My stomach swelled and oppressed my lungs. I was monitored for a possible heart attack because my chest was killing me. The depression was overwhelming. I told myself no more of this hell.
> Since my 20s, I have experienced depressive episodes. Some of them have come with no reason. Suddenly the depression appears, I am stunned and it's really hard to cope with everyday life.
>
> A month and a half later, she called to my home just like if nothing had happened! She tried to fool me by saying that her cellphone didn't register my calls and messages. BIG LIE!
> She admitted that she was ignoring me in the calls that followed and blamed me for everything. We talked twice and I told her it was over. I was really pissed off and ignored two of her calls. I was sad and angry.
> One month later, my depression was really bad and I called her. She ignored me again. I felt horribly guilty because I had ignored her last calls. She answered and told me there was nothing to talk about anymore. I called her at work. I was broken and crying and begging for help. She was merciless.
> I never treated her that way when she was that bad. Depression is terrible. I feel really weak. I'm shaking and feel sick, too. I have a terrible void and feel that it's over. I have self-destructive thoughts.
>
> Her ex-husband has been hospitalized several times. Perhaps not so surprisingly, he's a depressed person as well. Their son has told me his father hasn't had a girlfriend or another woman in his life since the divorce. This scares me. I don't want to end up that way. Some of our friends and family told me she treated him really bad while they were married.
> She went from aggression to real hate against me in the last year. And now I feel guilty. I wonder, what if I stayed with her? What if I answered her phone calls? What if I had taken better care of my depression and not bothered her with it?
> I feel like I was never was good enough for her. Guilt and sadness are annihilating me.

Miguel, if you are reading this, you need to stop. Stop right now and get help for yourself and fuck Chica Loca and her issues. If you were sitting across from me right now, I would have to resist the urge to give you a good shake and tell you to snap out of it. This woman is poison. Continuing any kind of relationship with her is equivalent to feeding yourself great big spoonfuls of arsenic.

I strongly encourage you to:

1. Get some psychiatric help. You need to treat your depression and codependency issues. If you are seriously considering suicide, go to a hospital. Don't end your life over some selfish, fucked up woman.

2. Stop communicating with this woman. Period. No contact, no contact, no contact, no contact, no freaking contact! Think of Chica Loca as if she is an addiction. She is an addiction. You know she is dangerous and harmful to your health, yet you still crave her.

I don't know if your country has Codependents Anonymous meetings. If there are CODA groups, you may want to consider attending. The sooner you go "cold turkey" (i.e., no contact), the sooner you will begin to heal. Continuing to engage with this woman will only delay your recovery and bring you more pain.

3. Unplug the Hoover and Crazy-proof yourself. Expect that she will contact you again andprepare yourself.

3. Quit romanticizing this woman and your life with her — even the good times. Abusive borderline women are not special snowflakes. They are a dime a dozen. She is not thelove of your life. With any luck, she can become one of the great lessons of your life.

If a relationship with a borderline serves any positive purpose, it is to wake you up and help you recognize what is broken and needs healing within yourself. Quit worrying about her and start taking care of you.

4. Connect the dots. Figure out what attracted you to this woman. Are there similarities between Chica Loca and your mother, your father or some other important childhood figure? Are you pissed at your mother and/or family because they were abusive to you when you were a child? Was having a romance with your cousin a way to get back at your parents? Do you believe you cannot be happy unless you are making someone else happy?

Try to figure out why you tolerated Chica Loca's crazy nonsense and why you yearned for her even when she was shitting all over you. Individuals with a healthy sense of self-respect and self-esteem don't put up with that kind of behavior for long, if at all. You need to love yourself enough and respect yourself enough to show the Chicas Locas of this world the door as soon as they pull any crap. Do not tolerate anyone in your life who does not treat you with the same kindness and respect that you afford them.

Three New York "Acid Queens" of 1901

Robert St. Estephe · 12 October 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Robert St. Estephe–Gonzo Historian–is dedicated to uncovering the forgotten past of marginalizing men. "Gonzo journalism" is characterized as tending "to favor style over fact to achieve accuracy." Yet history – especially "social history" – is written by ideologues who distort and bury facts in order to achieve an agenda. "Gonzo" writing is seen as unorthodox and surprising. Yet, in the 21st century subjectivity, distortion and outright lying in non-fiction writing is the norm. Fraud is the new orthodoxy. Consequently, integrity is the new "transgressive."

Welcome to the disruptive world of facts, the world of Gonzo History.

Acid throwing is in the news these days due to the prevalence of this crime in South Central Asia. Reported statistics show victims to be about 80% female. Statistics on the sex of the perpetrator are much harder to find (and have not been located by UHoM yet). The epidemic of acid attacks started, we are told, in the 1980s. These crimes are, every reasonable person would agree, are of the most cruel kind and are deserving of the most extreme condemnation. Yet the specialists who make an effort to publicize this horrible crime epidemic are classifying it as a "gender issue." The term "gender" when used in such a way universally connotes "women," specifically in the sense of "victimization of women by men." Perhaps this classification accurately represents the proportion of each sex in the victim category, but it does not accurately disclose the fact that a huge number of the perpetrators are women, women who choose to commit atrocious crimes on other individuals.

Let us try to overcome the confusion caused by the distorting lens of "gender" rhetoric by looking at a few cases remote in both place and time from those which are currently being, correctly, publicized.

Acid attacks were in the past a common crime in the US and occurred in Europe as well.

Since female criminality has been severely under-served by researchers ever since the beginning of criminology it is worthwhile to examine a sampling of such cases. The most overlooked category of criminal violence in terms of sex of perpetrator and sex of victim is, of course, female against female.

The three cases of female acid attackers presented here, all occurring in the same city in the same year are each quite different: one perpetrator threw acid on another woman, one threw acid on a man and another who threw acid on herself and then falsely accused someone else (an example combining self-mutilation and relational aggression). Studying long-forgotten cases such as these will assist those who wish to understand what the historical record reveals about the veracity of VAWA architects and their fallacious "belief in the inherent non-violence of women" (Barbara Hart, 1986).

For additional cases, see Acid Queens, a summary of over 70 cases dating from 1865 to the present, on The Unknown History of MISANDRY. It should be noted that large share of acid attacks by women involve what nowadays we call "stalking" another hot topic which is deceptively labeled as a "gender (connoting male against female) issue."

FULL TEXT (Article 1 of 3): Made desperate by the complaint of her neglected daughter, Mrs. Kate Hayden, whose address is unknown, went to the home of Mrs. Ruth Murphy, at No. 615 East Eighty-first street, and attempted to destroy her beauty by throwing acid upon her face and neck. Mrs. Hayden is a fugitive from justice.

Her daughter Is Mrs. Joseph Cawfold, of No. 322 East Thirty-fifth street. She is delicate and subject to melancholy. When Mrs. Hayden went to see her last Tuesday night she was crying. She said tier husband had not been home all day, and she feared he, might have gone to the home of Mrs. Murphy with his brother Nicholas, who is engaged to be married to Mrs. Murphy's sister. This story and the suspicion that her daughter was being slighted by Mr. Cawfold made the mother angry. Leaving the house in a rage, she bought a bottle of carbolic acid.

Mrs. Murphy and her unmarried sister live with Mrs. Catherine Manning, another sister. The women are refined and educated. They were school teachers in Dublin till they came to America four years ago. One is a music teacher and another has written magazine articles. The sisters say that Cawfold has called on them only three times and has never shown any attention to Mrs. Murphy. But the fact that his wife is plain, while all of the sisters are beautiful, made his mother-in-law suspicious.

"The vague complainings of her daughter seem to have turned her head," said Mrs. Murphy yesterday, "for she came in here demanding, that I return her son-in-law. My husband is not at home. He is a bookkeeper at Ward's Island. Nicholas was here sitting on the sofa with my sister. Mrs. Hayden burst in the door and exclaimed: 'I'll teach you to steal another's husband. I'll disfigure you for life!' She threw the acid from the bottle at me. It burned my neck and back.

"Nicholas sprang to save me and was burned on the face. My sister's little children clung to the woman's skirts, but she followed me through the flat trying to hit my face with the acid. Then she fled."

When Nicholas Cawfold and Mrs. Murphy went to a corner drug store to have their burns dressed Mrs. Hayden rushed in and risked if they were so badly burned they would be marked for life. Then she disappeared and the police have been hunting for her since. She has always been passionately jealous of her son-in-law's attentions to other women than her daughter.

FULL TEXT: (Article 2 of 3): Mamie Sheehan, of No. 206 Baltic street, Brooklyn, and Patrick Lane, of No. 55 Van Brunt street, were at a dance last night in the Brooklyn Dancing Academy, in Fulton street, opposite the Borough Hall. They has formerly been sweethearts, but during the evening Lane did not dance with her. After midnight, when the dance broke up, Lane went out on the street and met the girl, who then threw acid in his face. Then she ran away.

The other girl was with Lane when the acid was thrown, and when the Sheehan girl ran away she followed. Opposite the Municipal Building she caught up to her, and there was a fierce struggle between the two, the blond girl yelling for the police all the while. Roundsman O'Brien heard her cries and placed Mamie Sheehan under arrest.

Meanwhile Lane's friends wiped the acid from his face and took him to a near-by drug store At first he denied that he knew who threw the acid, and in a careless way asked those around him to have some soda water. He was firm in his denial about the girl when the roundsman brought her in. It was only after long persuasion that he agreed to make the complaint. His eye sight will probably be saved.

When taken to the police station the girl admitted her guilt.

"He threw me over for another girl," she said, "so why should I not disfigure him? I do not remember throwing the acid, though. I seem to have been some other person.

"I saw Patsy dancing with a blond girl, who was smiling at him. He should have been dancing with me. I had never done anything to deserve such treatment, and the sight of Patsy dancing with the other girl made me crazy.

"I am not sorry for what I did, and it is right that he should suffer as he made me suffer.

The girl, who is twenty-one years old and pretty, was arraigned in the Adams Street Court this morning, but for some hours Lane did not show up to make a complaint.

When Miss Sheehan was arraigned was arraigned in the Adams Street Police Court, Mr. Lane appeared as a witness. His face was badly burned and he was wearing smoked glasses.

Magistrate Steers asked if he could identify Miss Sheehan as his assailant. He said that he could not.

“There were twenty persons in the crowd,” he said, “and I do not know who threw the acid.”

“Do you think we should hold this girl longer?”

“Well, I she should be held until I can get witnesses.”

The policeman who had made the arrest said that he had no complaint to make, so the Magistrate dismissed Miss Sheehan, saying:

“I do not see why she was arrested.”

Before leaving the court-room Miss Sheehan, who is twenty-one, small, black-haired and pretty, admitted having thrown the acid, and said that she did it because she could not bear to see Lane with another girl.

Miss Sheehan left the court-room in company with her mother and sister. After consultation with his friends Lane returned to the police station and asked Magistrate Steers to issue a warrant for the arrest of Miss Sheehan.

FULL TEXT (Article 3 of 3): After being foiled in an attempt to rob her aunt for the benefit, the police say, of her lover, and after disfiguring herself for life with carbolic acid in trying to bolster up a false story of robbery, pretty Amelia Fleming, of No. 642 Evergreen avenue, Williamsburg, has left her home for parts unknown after making a full confession of her duplicity to the police.

The girl is only twenty-one years old and very good looking and bright. She has worked as a governess for some good families in Brooklyn, but when she lost her last position, a few months ago, went to live with her aunt, Mrs. Louisa Siebel, at the address given.

Ten days ago Mrs. Siebel missed a dollar bill and found that somebody had ransacked her bureau. She questioned her niece, but the girl denied taking the money and suggested burglars.

Mrs. Siebel, however, feared for the safety of a roll of about $500 that she kept in her trunk, and put it in the bank without the girl’s knowledge.

~ Burned With Acid. ~

Last Thursday Miss Fleming was found in the hallway of her aunt’s home by Hilda Schubert, a neighbor, badly burned with carbolic acid about the neck, face and hands, and apparently in an exhausted condition. She said a masked woman had entered the house and thrown the acid on her when she tried to prevent her from breaking open her aunt’s trunk. She said the woman had ransacked the place and stolen from her a gold watch, which had been a gift from her mother. She showed a mask which, she said,

~ Confesses to Police. ~

The police concluded that the girl’s whole story is false and last night Sergt. Relfcucider, of the Ralph avenue station, went to the house with Detective Mitchell and received a full confession from the girl.

The girl said she had lost her watch and $15 dollars a week ago, and fearing to tell her aunt had thrown the acid on herself and feigned the assault of the masked woman. She admitted that she alone had ransacked her aunt’s rooms.

At Mrs. Siebel’s home this morning, an Evening World reporter was told that Miss Fleming had gone.

“Is that the man she is engaged to?” was asked.

“I don’t know anything about it,” said Mrs. Siebel. Then she said she did not know where her niece was and refused to give any further details of the queer story.

In His Own Words: The making of a knight in shining armor

Dr. Tara J. Palmatier · 13 October 2013 · Archived copy · Original

It's day 13 of of Domestic Violence Awareness Month for Men and Boys. "Disconnected" is back to explain In His Own Words how his childhood experiences helped to make him a prime target for abusive women like his ex, sociopathic stalker extraordinaire, "Q."

> The Making of a Knight in Shining Armor
> Sitting at the conference table, I looked around at my fellow engineers. Of the five of us, I was the least educated. My two bachelor degrees fell short of the PhDs and Masters degrees held by my colleagues. They were discussing their educations and how their family supported their professional careers. As I listened, I let myself drift away from the moment. Then it happened, they turned to me and asked about my family.
> Some people have natural abilities, others of us train our whole lives for something. Without even knowing, I trained my whole life to be a white knight.
> My parents divorced when I was young. The custody battles went on for years, not because my sister and I were "wanted," but because neither parent wanted the other to "win." My sister and I were nothing more than unsuspecting weapons used to inflict as much damage as possible.
> At the age of 6, I remember finding my mother at the kitchen table crying, her head buried in her hands. Terrified, I asked why. She never lifted her head, but only said to me, "Because my children are such horrible children." At a time when "Mom" is synonymous with "Deity," those words were crushing. I had no idea what terrible thing I must have done.
> As the court battles went on, my mother told me in chilling detail of the physical abuse that awaited me with my father. When he would pick us up, I was always afraid of the monster that my mother described; a monster that never reared its ugly head.
> We lived with my mother's family. As my father's antics escalated, her family became increasingly involved. As a child I was shielded from a lot of the details, but I have very clear memories of the fistfights and the screaming.
>
> One night stands out above the others. My father had a friend run a story in the local paper about how successful he was as a single parent. The day the paper was published, my mother's family was visibly upset. My mother was crying and her parents wanted blood.
> That evening, my father was scheduled to pick us up. When he arrived, my grandmother grabbed a handgun and ran to the door. There was a fight; my mother's boyfriend wrestled the gun from her hands. All the while my sister and I watched in horror. In the end, we were loaded into my father's car, fearful and confused.
> Shortly after that evening, while on the way to school, my mother explained we would be moving to a new place, far away. She told me this was a big secret; that I was not to tell anyone. She told me that if my father found out, he would beat me. I asked about seeing my father and she said he would be allowed to see me if he wanted (there was an implication that he had no interest.)
>
> At school, I spent most of the day crying. One of the teachers sat me down and talked to me. I told her what my mother had said. I told her as much as I knew about her "plan," and that it had to remain "secret."
> My mother picked me up early that day. Her boyfriend waited down the street with a U-Haul. We drove the rest of the day and into the night. My mother tried to make the trip fun. She tried to tell me I was enjoying it.

We stopped at a hotel for the night. I asked repeatedly how long the trip was, how many days we would be driving, where we were going, etc., etc. That night, we were startled awake by a sheriff deputy pounding on the door. My mother took my sister and I and hid in the bathroom while the boyfriend confronted the sheriff.

It seems my teacher called my father the minute I left the school. By chance, he happened upon my mother's car when he pulled off the interstate to get gas. There was a fight in the parking lot. I can still hear the shrill voices. I can feel the cold night air and the arm of the man who held me like a football.

In the end, my father took me and left my sister with my mother. I was scared of my father. I had been taught that he was cruel and abusive.I was literally thrown into his car, as I cried for my mother, the only one I thought would protect me.

I am not sure how long my mother and I were separated, but it was more than a year. During that time, I did not hear from her. My father, who fought so hard to get me back, dumped me off with friends, relatives, anyone who would take me for a few days. I spent the time largely without adult care or supervision, and of course, without affection. Having me wasn't about spending time together; it was about hurting my mother.

When my mother returned, the custody battles resumed. She won full custody of my sister and I, despite the previous kidnapping. I was only allowed to see my father 2 weekends per month. Even with my father's lack of interest in my life, his house had become "home;" if not home, at least "safe."

The thought of living with my mother now scared me. She tried to act supportive. She repeatedly said, "Anytime you want to go live with your father, just say the words and I will help you pack." Of course, as a child having to tell one parent that you choose the other is not easy. I was very careful to wait until a relatively chaos-free week to finally ask.

We were driving to school; with tears in my eyes I said, "Mom, I really love you, but I think I want to try living with my father for a while." The car swerved off of the road and slid to a stop. A barrage of fists came hurling down upon me as I retreated into a ball against the car door. As she wailed on me, she screeched, "How dare you! That is the meanest, most terrible thing anyone has ever said to me." I did not bring it up again.

My mother quickly remarried. He was an abusive, angry man with children of his own. They worked menial labor jobs and did not make enough to feed and clothe us. They relied heavily on child support and handouts.

The first few years were not so bad. Things at home were strict, even "abusive" by today's standards, but this was a different time. I cried often, as I hated to see people hurt one another; something that happened daily. My step-father made sure I understood that crying was a weakness. When the screaming started, so did my tears. Then, out came the fists. His favorite word for me was "pussy."

[If you read my account of 'Q,' she was aware of this, which was why she chose that specific word to attack me.]

My mother and step-father were the fodder of the retail world. They held minimum wage jobs, with no hope of advancement. The financial stress and lack of self-worth eventually found its way home. Punishments were doled out daily. Fists were used to force compliance to ever-changing rules.

In the morning I was told that performing a chore would take no more than 15 minutes. By the afternoon, I was being hit because "no one can do that chore in under an hour." One night I was going out driving with a friend and my mother said, "Be home at 11:00." I returned home at 10:30 and she started hitting me. I was turned over to my step-father for "punishment."

When I asked why, I was told that I was supposed to be home by 10:00. The next time I asked to go out, I thought I would be clever. I said, "Mom, I have a really hard time remembering what time I am > supposed to be home. Can you write it down for me so I don't forget?" After they stopped hitting me, I was sent to my room for 2 weeks for "being a smart ass."

> The worst of the abuse was not mine; that belonged to my step-brother. Actually, in the hierarchy of physical violence, I was at the bottom of the list. Still, I was forced to watch the worst of it carry on around me.
> I learned not to cry, not to draw attention to myself. Though, like a good pawn, I often sacrificed myself so that my step-brother would be spared. The reasoning was, "I knew they would go easier on me, and besides he had been through so much."
>
> One night, we were in our room as we heard angry voices from down the hall. My step-brother and I tried to be quiet, as we looked for some distraction. Then his name was heard followed by silence. We pretended we did not hear it. The door opened. His father stood there and calmly asked, "Did you lie to me?"
> There was no answer that was going to avoid what we knew was coming, so we both sat there in silence. "Answer me," he demanded. Then he picked up his son by the throat and pressed him against the wall. The ground was several feet beneath him. "Answer me," he demanded again.
>
> The boy couldn't speak. As his father began punching him repeatedly in the face, I curled up in a ball in the corner and wished this away. I loved my stepbrother, but I was not about to get mixed up in this.
> After what seemed like an eternity, he threw the boy into the closet and stormed out of the room. My stepbrother's face was swollen and already bruising. Before I even moved the door flew open again. This time, my step-father had brought a plate full of food. He threw it on top of the boy and said "There! Eat off the floor like a dog."
>
> By this time in my life, I was old enough to make changes. I moved in with my father. What my father's house lacked in physical abuse, it made up for with emotional abuse, but that's another story for another day.
> I went to college against my family's wishes. They regularly insisted that I "drop out and get a real job with a future." During those first college years, I tried to live at home. My father's health was waning and I was terrified to leave him alone with his wife.
>
> She had been threatening suicide, even threatening to kill him. Eventually, she made it clear that I was no longer welcome. I had to accept the fact that my father was an adult, and had made his own choices. I was 20 when I moved out.
> It is funny how abuse can make us feel responsible for the abuser(s). It is a fiendish trick. Still, even armed with that knowledge, it was no less devastating to receive that phone call, "Your father was found dead this morning."
>
> Turns out, the wife's new beau was tired of waiting for a divorce, so she "helped" things along. That was the last piece I needed to complete my armor. That was the piece that taught me what knighthood was truly about.
> I went on to finish my education. I spent years learning to recover and to trust people. In many ways, I have over compensated. Still, I cannot help but to feel drawn to those in need. After all, if I can rescue myself, I can surely rescue another.
> As the echoes of my past rang in my head, I was back at the table. I wondered how long my colleagues had been waiting to hear my response. I polished my armor and donned a smile as I said, "Where would any of us be without family."

Tim Tolka: #badass, or complete ass?

Diana Davison and Paul Elam · 13 October 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Alas, chivalry is not dead.

This month, A Voice For Men forums was blessed with our own Don Quixote. Tim Tolka gallantly galloped onto the scene having, like his literary counterpart, read so much fiction (feminist rhetoric) that he has become delusional– convinced he is a knight. Riding a horse named Amanda Stevenson, Tim is prepared to slay the giants of the Men's Human Rights Movement (MHRM). Unlike Quixote, Sir Tim is lacking Sancho, his squire, to tell him when he's just tilting at windmills.

Tim wants to redefine what makes a man "#badass." He claims "the time is ripe to rock these social structures to their foundations with violent speech." Of course, the first thing Sir Tim did on arrival at AVfM Forums was to tell men to stop sounding so angry. Though Tim has "hatred pulsing through [his] veins" and claims "the masculine menace" in his hometown scares him and "makes [him] feel a sense of dread" he criticizes AVfM for what he calls "hatred, insecurity, and angst." He claims to despise and condemn Paul Elam "above all else."

Tim Tolka is a male feminist, a fact which he is compelled to remind us in case his actions haven't made that clear. He is "the primary support provider to a survivor of gang rape." While that is a title that would look good on a grant application, perhaps the first thing Tim should do is to get an identity of his very own.

[image]This is the part where we start to wonder if Sir Tim is riding his horse or the horse is riding him.

This knight in shining armor, defender of all women, and protector of wives, is on a mission. In the wake of the Steubenville rape case in August, 2012, Tim encouraged his "close friend," Amanda, to use the available media attention to publicize her own story — now twelve years old. It is a tragic tale of a young teenage girl, drugged and gang raped, abused; seeking desperately to find justice in any way possible except cooperating with a police investigation.

Never fear, Tim is here. He rode in like Roy Rogers and taped off the crime scene of her life in pink ribbons. His "selfless" support even resulted in marriage to the princess damsel. We can watch his transformation from friend, to fiancé, to husband in the few, short months of their media exploitation campaign.

Given that Tim's choice of social justice cause and his belief in "rape culture" is a deeply entrenched aspect of his marriage, some may think that Tim is too emotionally invested in his point of view to be objective. To those people, Tim has words of warning: "For those who would try to steal that intimacy by force and pervert that adoration into a fetichist delirium which terrorizes, depersonalizes, and silences the victim, I have no sympathy."

We don't expect Tim's sympathy but we would like to offer him some advice.

Don't claim to be a journalist after writing a couple of blogs. When writing, try to be more careful with your wording. Saying that rape "leaves the victim like a shell-shocked soldier, who must then learn to cope with the loss of an integral part of themselves and a fracturing of their moral conscience" doesn't make them sound weak and broken — it makes them sound like psychopaths.

A disoriented soldier with no moral conscience would be a danger to public safety and should be properly contained.

Emotional words are the currency of feminist narratives. They are the trump cards. In the social justice warrior world an emotional two-of-hearts beats your logical ace-of-spades every time. You can see this skewed game at work in the threatening, vigilante rhetoric of Tim and his friend/fiance/wife/vaudeville partner Amanda as they take on the evil patriarchy donning straw hats and canes.

The reason Amanda's rape case has gone twelve years without resolution is not, according to them, because she refused to tell the police the names of her rapists. It's the fault of patriarchy.

Though she didn't press charges, the police acted on her behalf with no help from her or her family. She and Tim condemn the Hocking County Ohio Police Department for daring to conduct interviews with the students of her school who may have witnessed the rape because it destroyed her "anonymity" and caused her further distress. Amanda explains that the girls at her school were already calling her a slut and that she lived in a small town which would have known about the investigation no matter where it the interviews were held, but it is her contention that the police are at fault for a brick thrown through the window of a family car.

Of course the interviews could have been more targeted and discreet if Amanda had told them the names of the rapists, but that's not her fault.

It was only 2001 then and now that it's 2013 Amanda, with Tim at her hooves, is finally ready. To her disgust, the police had trouble immediately locating Amanda's unsolved case file twelve years later on the day she chose to show up on their doorstep. It wasn't because so much time had passed, nor that the police station had moved, been vandalized, and was located in a small, hick town in the first place. All of these factors are mere excuses justifying Tim and Amanda immediately turning to the hacker group Anonymous to bring them the vigilante style justice that captures headlines.

In her letter to Anonymous, Amanda claims to be getting a migraine just by putting her story into writing. We wonder if Amanda actually knows what a migraine is, or if those who have to deal with her are brought to the same condition. Most people would stop writing and wait until their migraine was gone before returning to the keyboard.

Anonymous responded. They took the names Amanda gave them and published them on the internet. This plan did not go so well for her and Tim. Anonymous does not have the discretion of the police and published so much personal information about Amanda that gallant Tim unsuccessfully begged them to take it offline.

The Hocking police explained to Amanda and Tim that the couple had compromised the investigation – but, despite the inadvertent damage that Anonymous did to Amanda's case, Tim remains a staunch supporter of the group. That Amanda chose to trust a group of vigilantes instead of the people trained in law enforcement is not her fault, it's a result of rape culture and a migraine.

Amanda Stevenson used to flinch at the word "rape" and now, thanks to Sir Tim and the victim mongering of online feminists, it's all she wants to talk about. She is training to be a rape crisis counselor, wants to open a non-profit organization to help rape victims and her "ultimate goal" is "to establish a network of attorneys from every state that specialize and will work with such cases-to help these women strategize and grow from victims into plaintiffs against their rapists."

All, we must assume, without the benefit of police or the criminal justice system because Amanda doesn't trust cops or cooperate with them. But that is fine. We assume Amanda keeps copious amounts of hay in the barn to fuel her hick sensibilities and keep her strength up.

When she finishes her counsellor training Amanda might decide that the ultimate goal is to help victims of rape move forward without letting their victimhood define them as a person – regardless of whether the criminals are ever caught. One of the things Amanda might teach them, once she's figured it out, is that co-operating with the police helps them put rapists in jail.

Until then, she is planning on applying to law school to help women use what she thinks is a broken justice system. It would be a lot more cost effective if she just taught them how to write impassioned letters to Anonymous.

Amanda can only accomplish these goals because of the courage she gets from Tim. Tim's courage comes from Amanda. Tim's everything comes from Amanda. Indeed, without Amanda, Tim does not seem to exist in any substantive way. It's a true love story with no financial agenda.

So what can we learn from Tim about how to be a #badass?

Tim, struggling to carry Amanda on his back, trotted in to the forum area of A Voice for Men, where men share their personal stories of pain. He informed these men that women's pain is more important and more severe than their own. In Tim's narrative, though men experience trauma they heal faster than women. That the Post Traumatic Stress Disorder (PTSD) Tim attributes to female victims of rape is most commonly found in men returning from war unsurprisingly doesn't get in the way of his claim that women suffer more pain than their male counterparts. Social Justice Warriors rarely have bricks of logic in their arsenal.

Tim claims that women heal slower than men emotionally and instead of helping women heal more quickly real men should sympathize with and cater to the emotional sluggishness of the female. For those women who do say they heal fast, Amanda is busy telling them that they are wrong and should slow down. Silly women, there is no cha-ching in healing!

Healing might not be good for Tim's marriage either.

Who will Tim be when he's not the primary supporter of a rape victim? He says he's a journalist but there is little evidence of that. In reality, he is someone who has enmeshed himself in someone else's alleged trauma, and wrote a couple of blog posts about it.

To be fair, the mainstream frequently offers less credible examples than Sir Tim, but they do have their jobs, at least, to qualify them.

Tim says he knows what makes a man "badass" and it includes anger and violence yet he is here to fight the imaginary dragons of violence and anger in the MHRM. He also knows better than others what makes them 'real' people. Tim believes in equality but, for men, that means supporting women, adoring their frailty, and helping them to blame men for their own lack of participation in solving crimes committed against them.

One thing is certain. As with most dissent we have seen to AVFM, Sir Tim's critique is a muddled mess of emotion and illogic; attacks, admonishments, threats, and empty rhetoric. Sir Tim is just another wayward fool asking us to prove that the sky is blue and the world is round.

Why Sir Tim ever came riding into AVFM is only one, scantly relevant question. The real question here is whether Tim is just a talking horse with Amanda's arm shoved up his backside or if he just finds it easier to get attention by using her pain as his vehicle? These are questions that only Amanda and Tim can answer or need to know.

Perhaps Tim's real work is in keeping her traumatized; mired in her wounds. Heaven knows she would have little use for him if she actually healed, or if she actually needed to. We are betting Tim knows this and it is scarier to him than his so-called "masculine menace."

In an ironic and comical way, when Sir Tim, after announcing he was writing an article on AVFM, was informed in advance that this article was on the way, he said, "That's cool, just please don't mention my wife."

It's a little too late for that, Tim.

Tim Tolka should get off his horse (or perhaps quit being one) and find a Sancho; a faithful squire. The Patriarchy and Rape Culture aren't real. They are just a feminist dream of windmills that look like giants. [image]It's an illusion that takes form when you are asleep — and it's time for Tim to wake the fuck up.

When asked what a squire does, Don Quixote's sidekick Sancho Panza replied "Well, first, I ride behind him. Then he fights. And then I pick him up off the ground." A Voice for Men and the MHRM is not going to be that sidekick that Tim so desperately needs because we do not share his delusions and are too far ahead to notice if he falls. Besides, while we cast the occasional sympathetic eye at the pack animals that wander in here, we prefer not to keep their company.

So, ride your hobby horse, Sir Tim, even if you don't hold the reins. Ride it like a #badass.

Intersectionality: How proxy violence works (like magic)

Robert St. Estephe · 13 October 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Robert St. Estephe–Gonzo Historian–is dedicated to uncovering the forgotten past of marginalizing men. "Gonzo journalism" is characterized as tending "to favor style over fact to achieve accuracy." Yet history – especially "social history" – is written by ideologues who distort and bury facts in order to achieve an agenda. "Gonzo" writing is seen as unorthodox and surprising. Yet, in the 21st century subjectivity, distortion and outright lying in non-fiction writing is the norm. Fraud is the new orthodoxy. Consequently, integrity is the new "transgressive."

Welcome to the disruptive world of facts, the world of Gonzo History.

"Intersectionality" is a popular word among the adherents of command-and-control social engineering. Here is a definition of the term as it appears on Geek Feminism Wiki: "intersectionality is a concept often used in critical theories to describe the ways in which oppressive institutions (racism, sexism, homophobia, transphobia, ableism, xenophobia, classism, etc.) are interconnected and cannot be examined separately from one another. Third Wave Feminism, especially, thrived on the concept of intersectionality in order to redefine Feminism as inclusive. The concept first came from legal scholar Kimberle Crenshaw in 1989 and is largely used in critical theories, especially Feminist theory, when discussing systematic oppression."

Well, I'm no certified "critical theorist," but I can spot a useful concept when I falls in my unregenerate patriarchal lap. Presented in his post is a remarkable murder case involving a Ouija board , a once-famous siren beauty wife, a naive teenaged girl, an equally naive husband and an innocent-bystander handsome cowboy. It seems to me that the Turley murder case exemplifies the possibilities of this type of "intersectionality" critique when applied to a form of oppression that, admittedly, it was never intended to elucidate, that of female privilege.

Here we see a case illustrating the 'intersectionality' of quite a few oppressive institutions: proxy violence, relational aggression, refusal to accept responsibility for one's actions, the e*thos of male disposability,* plus "a woman's prerogative to change her mind."

Throughout the course of this story, the anti-heroine, Dorothea Turley, demonstrates a notable consistency in her deployment of abject personal privilege of the feminine variety: in her refusal to accept the tiniest sliver of responsibility for her actions. Her oppressiveness was, as you will see, impressively systematic and chillingly thorough. This clever beauty, like so many other lovelies before and after, got away with a particularly vicious kind of premeditated murder.

FULL TEXT (Article 1 of 4): A Ouija board can get you into trouble, but, it cannot get you out. So don't trust a ouija board. This was recently demonstrated in the courts of Arizona.

Because a ouija board under her fingers assertedly "ordered" the death or her husband, pretty Mrs. Dorothea Irene Turley, once voted the most beautiful girl in America, has been convicted of intent to murder. Thereby bringing one of the strangest cases of the year near its conclusion.

The woman's husband was killed, so the testimony showed, in order that she might be free to marry n handsome cowboy whom she had met a short, time before. The husband, Ernest Turley, was shot twice in the back on the afternoon of November 18, 1933, and died a few weeks later.

But the wife herself did not do the shooting – that's what makes the case doubly weird and involved.

Mattie Turley, 15-year-old daughter of the Turleys, raised her own shotgun given to her by her dad and killed him as he carried a pail of milk from the cowpen, she testified. Having no animosity toward him, she did this tragic thing solely because the ouija board had commanded her to, and because her mother had assured her that edicts of the ouija spirits must be obeyed. Mattie understood, she declared, that “mother must be freed in order to marry the handsome cowboy.”

The girl herself pleaded guilty in juvenile court and was sentenced to an Arizona reform school. The mother, after fighting long and futilely for dismissal, was tried in the county court at St. Johns and convicted. Penalty for intent to murder is five years to life.

During the course of the investigation, which extended over six months, a young fellow identified by the County Attorney as the “handsome cowboy” in question also was brought up for lack of hearing. But he was released for lack of evidence. His name was Kent Pearce, and he had all the outward appearance of a movie-type cowpuncher, big hat, neckerchief, tight pants, bow legs and all. A very frightened young man, he denied any untoward associations with Mrs. Turley.

It was at Crestwood, N. J., in the hectic war year of 1917 that a newspaper chain concluded its national bathing-beauty contest. This chain had set out to find the girl most deserving of the title, “American Venus.”

[image]

More than 50,000 entries came in – exquisitely beautiful maidens from every corner of every State. The judging could not have been easy, but in the end everybody was satisfied with the selection made. Dorothea Irene Kelynack, of Astoria. N. Y., who had been singing on the stage after studying music abroad, was as nearly perfect as a girl could be. She tallied to the fraction of an inch with the proportional measurements of the classic Venus de Milo.

The Nation was almost literally at Dorothea’s feet in worship of her surpassing beauty. Every sort of acclaim came to her, including many hundreds offers of marriage. She typified all that was desirable. But a young man of the United States Navy, Ernest Turley, wooed most ardently of all. His dash and brilliance won her; and America thrilled; then they eloped.

The daughter, Mattie, was born to them in Boston in 1918. Next year a son, David, was born, and in 1921 the family moved to California, settling at Coronado. Everything seemed rosy for the next decade, but poor health then began to claim its toll. Also, the adulation that Dorothea had known was now denied her; Mr. Turley’s navy salary was not quite in keeping with her “American Venus” style.

Sinus trouble caused Mrs. Turley so much suffering that the family began to cast about for a climatic change.

“The air is high and dry and delightful there. Many persons are relieved from nasal pains by going there.”

It. was true and, besides that. Arizona’s expansive mountains offered a fine, vacation outing, anyway. Son David and daughter Mattie especially were elated. They demanded of daddy it they would be allowed to go fishing and hunting; David hinted that, with a real gun, he might even bag a mountain lion.

THEY chose a spot high in the White Mountains They couldn’t possibly have pickerd a more romantic one. The only people to be seen are relatively uncultured but fine-charactered cattle ranchers. One of them stalked up the first city they arrived, knocked at their ugly rented cabin, and said he understood they were newcomers and if possible he would like to have a job.

“We will let you know,” smiled a very pretty woman in answer. “My husband is away from the house just now. What is your name?”

“Reckon It’s Kent Pearce.” he answered. Then his face, too. broke In a wide, appreciative cowboy smile.

Maybe it was the isolation, maybe it was the illness, maybe it was the longing for applause and admiration that girlhood days had known, but something in Mrs. Dorothea Turley began to breed discontent.

They had come to Arizona in August of 1933, and by September she was having frequent seances with her ouija board, seeking whatever comfort its alleged “spirits” could give. One day she found some odd picture rocks nearby, designs scratched by some prehistoric Indians which even archeologists could not fathom now. She consulted the ouija board about them.

The board informed her that the rocks were over buried gold! Therefore, she prevailed upon a rather disgruntled husband to do extensive searching. He dug and dug, even used dynamite, until his back was breaking. Eventually she went to ouija again, and the board admitted so Mrs. Turley said, that some mistake had been made. Mr. Turley never quite forgave her for this “tomfoolery.”

Often she and her husband had little spats and quarrels. Twice, it was revealed later she even threatened his life. “Every time I look at you I want to kill you!” she screamed at him in a rage one time.

On another occasion, so the trial testimony later showed, she inquired of her husband about his life insurance, learned that he had two policies totaling $5000, and asked him how she could collect it if ever occasion arose. On still another occasion, she and Mattie asked him one day how far away Mattie’s gun would kill a deer. He told them about twenty yards. They, of course, never mentioned to him about the ouija board seances which pointed to his death.

ON the night of November 17, 1933, a skunk got under the Turley cabin and had a fight with their cat. The noise and odor so disturbed them that they could sleep no more that night. They maintained a watch for Mr. Skunk, but he wouldn’t come out.

They kept the watch up all next morning. After lunch, however, Mrs. Turley and David said they would go to the village store for groceries to have a dinner that night in honor of David’s birthday.

“I won’t help catch him, but I might shoot,” Mattie replied. The two drove away, leaving Mattie holding her loaded shotgun and eating an apple.

Before they returned, Mr. Turley got his bucket and went out to the corral to milk their new cow. Mattie followed him, still holding her gun. Soon he came out through the gate and started toward the house. She still remained behind.

With no warning at all, two quick shots rang out. Mr. Turley, hit in the back, tumbled down, and glanced around to see Mattie’s gun smoking, she herself being on her knees.

“Oh-h-h-h, Daddy, have I hurt you?” Mattie screamed, and ran to him. He was in great pain, but he sent her rushing for help. As she left he told her, “You should be more careful. Let this be a lesson to you.” He assumed that the shooting was accidental.

Mattie met her mother and David returning and told them the news. In a few hours the doctor and a number of neighbors had come in. Kent Pearce himself held the lamp that night, while Mrs. Turley tended her husband. Everybody was sympathetic for the hysterical Mattie, who said she had stumbled and that her gun had gone off as she fell. But Mr. Turley was expected to get well. Many people came in to offer sympathy, and, of course, the officers of the county had to make some inquiries, as a matter of customary form. One of these officers, though, developed a curiosity.

HE LEARNED that the bullets traveled downward, not upward, through Mr. Turley’s hip. That was funny, reasoned he, when Mattie said the gun went off as it struck the ground. It would seem more like he had been shot while he was still standing, maybe with the gun at her shoulder! How about it, Mattie?

That blew up the story. Mattie did a complete about-face, and admitted she had deliberately shot her dad in obedience to the ouija board. She said she raised the gun first as he passed through the cowpen gate, but lacked the nerve to pull the triggers.

“Then I remembered how important it was to Mother for her to marry her handsome cowboy,” testified Mattie, “so I raised the gun quickly again and shot both barrels.”

The seance with the ouija board was described in detail. It had taken place, she said, in a dim, almost dark room at their home. She and her mother had had their fingers on it, sure enough. The board had spelled out that she was to kill her daddy.

“I asked Mother if I had to do what the ouija board said,” Mattie explained, “and she told me there was no escaping its command.”

When Mrs. Turley heard of this confession by her daughter, she became enraged. She accused the officers of browbeating Mattie so much by third degree methods that the girl would have confessed to anything.

Asked about this “mistreatment,” Mattie said calmly that she hadn’t been mistreated ac all, but had only done what she felt she should. Mrs. Turley however, stuck firmly to Mattie’s first story that, the shooting was accidental. Mattie went before the Juvenile Judge and he sentenced her to the reform school until she reaches maturity of 21, which means six years.

Meantime, Mr. Turley got no better at McNary, and a United States Marine Corps plane from San Diego, Calif., flew over and carried him to the naval base hospital there. There he died on December 26. That made it murder, and Mrs. Turley then was jailed in default of bond, on a charge of intent to murder.

When The Ouija Board Spelled ‘D-a-d-d-y M-u-s-t D-i-e – With the Acquittal and Release of the Beautiful Woman Who Once Won National Fame as the “American Venus,” the Epilogue Is Written to a Sensational Tragedy of the Arizona Mountains

FULL TEXT: Nervously, the girl closed her eyes. Her shoulders began to sway a little.

The room was dim, and the two women were alone in it. Mother and daughter, both strikingly beautiful, they faced each other across a small table. Upon this lay a Ouija board. Arms outstretched, the two of them rested their fingers lightly upon the little planchette – that tiny table which slides on the board’s polished surface, to stop and spell out “spirit messages.”

The girl was only fifteen – but in her smooth oval face, tilted upwards, and in the gracious mood of her form, a precocious maturity was evident. Her eyes remained closed, but the eyes of her striking mother were open. They rested sometimes on the board, sometimes on the girl, with a sombre, inscrutable gaze.

The little planchette moved, and the women’s shoulders swayed gently together, as if they were dancing to slow music. It stopped. The girl opened her eyes, and looked at the board.

Again the child-woman’s eyes closed, and the eerie game went on. And as the planchette picked out letter after letter, a look of terror and misery grew upon her smooth face.

“D-A-D-D-Y M-U-S-T —” spelled the letters. And then: “D-I-E.”

“Oh!” the girl gasped, looking at her mother. “Who – who must kill him, mummy?”

Such, according to testimony later given in an Arizona court, was the sombre first act in a tragedy which shocked the world – and which, universally came to be known as the “Ouija Board Murder.” And just the other day, the epilogue of that true-life drama was written, when the courts of Arizona freed a woman from prison.

BACK in the year 1917, Dorothea Irene Kelynack’s pretty little head contained no thoughts of Ouija boards – nor, possibly, of much else. But that didn’t matter, for Dorothea was only 22, and had just won, over 50,000 girls in a nation-wide contest, the title of “The American Venus.” Her figure came closest, by actual measurements, to that of the classic statue the Venus de Milo.

For a little hour, she was in the very center of the fierce white spotlight of national attention. Exploding flashlight powder illuminated her path. Celebrities who to her had been only names beamed upon her. Every mail avalanched this laughing, happy girl with proposals of marriage – proposals from lumber-jacks, professional men, farmers, actors and even a cracked millionaire or two. Men tried to force their way in to woo her – rich men and poor men.

Among the men who craved to win this perfection of physical womanhood was a spruce young sailor – Ernest J. Turley, who appeared in the uniform of the U. S. Navy, He was a handsome, two-fisted, go-getting sort of fellow, and he put up a whirlwind wooing that made paunchy millionaires, in Dorothea’s eyes, seem just funny. So she gave in. They eloped early in 1918 and were married. In December of that year a baby girl was born, whom they named Mattie.

During these months, Dorothea and her Ernie were excitedly happy. The lovely young woman’s “public” had not deserted her, despite her disappearance from public life. When her baby was born, thousands of letters and telegrams of congratulation poured in. Who could blame the girl for getting the idea that she had become a permanent national institution – a sort of Statue of Liberty in the flesh?

And then the years began to get in their wearing work. People no longer stopped to point Dorothea out on the streets of Boston, Massachusetts, where the Turleys had made their home. And who can blame Dorothea, now, if she felt bewildered, hurt at no longer receiving the adulation which publicity had taught her to regard as her due? But she had her baby girl Mattie, who was growing up to adore her mother. And soon a son, David, was born. And a little later Ernie Turley’s business – he had retired from the Navy – took them all to Coronado, California. So with domestic concerns and a change of scene Dorothea was not too unhappy for several years.

But in time she began to brood. She became interested in the occult – bought a ouija board. Since life was not fulfilling the dazzling promises it had made to her, Dorothea was turning to the dark recesses of her own subconscious mind, to seek consolation. Then she became ill – asthma – and the doctor advised a change from the damp sea air to the dry and tangy ozone of Arizona.

Turley, who loved his wife devotedly, gladly agreed that they should take a prolonged vacation. They would go in the car and camp out. He immediately went to buy supplies for their trip. That night he brought home two gleaming new shotguns – and gave one each to Mattie and David.

“When we get to Arizona you’ll be able to shoot,” he said, knowing nothing of the ominous nature of his words.

The family motored the 600 miles into the mountains of Arizona in August of 1933. They drove right into the historic cattle land where romantic cowboys long have roamed.

DOROTHEA TURLEY thought that cowboys were very romantic indeed.

An especially romantic one, named Kent Pearce, made himself very obliging when the four Turleys finally stopped near the village of St. Johns. He was a rancher, young, athletic and handsome – and he looked upon the two Turley women with frank and open admiration. Mattie, the daughter, though only fifteen, was a lovely young creature, whose figure already was revealing how much she had inherited of her mother's beauty. As for Dorothea, though now about 40, she had retained much of her beauty of form and face.

Ernie Turley didn't object to the rancher's obvious admiration of his wife. On the contrary, it pleased him – for a man who marries a woman publicly acclaimed for her beauty very quickly gets used to the adulation which other men's glances offer her, and in time comes to look upon it as his wife's due. And besides, Kent Pearce was such an obliging sort of fellow. He offered to show the Turleys around, and he helped them find an inexpensive cabin so that they didn't have to live in tents.

"I like this place,' said Dorothea Turley to her husband. "Very pretty. Let's stay here."

Of course, they slaved. And Dorothea proceeded to enjoy the famous mountain scenery. She enjoyed it so much that she spent hours – days even – examining it driving the Turley car. And for a guide she had the handsome and accommodate [sic] and to keep her company, Pearce had got alone. Lovely little Mattie went along – and to keep her company, Pearce had got a young friend of his, a happy-go-lucky "apprentice" cowboy of 16 named Pollard Wiltbank. A couple of times this foursome even stayed out overnight –with good explanations each time.

'THERE wasn't very much for Ernie J Turley to do – but Mrs. Turley's ouija board fixed that She still consulted it faithfully, and it told her – she revealed to her husband – that certain queer picture-writings on rocks nearby actually showed the location of a vast, hidden treasure.

The fact that scientists for decades have been striving in vain to decipher these strange rock-writings meant nothing whatever to Dorothea Turley. Ouija had spoken. Ouija never lied – and – ouija must be obeyed!

What the little planchcite had commanded, Dorothea said, was that Ernie should take a pick and shovel and go off into the bush to a certain spot, which she would designate, and there and he would surely find a buried treasure.

Nothing could more clearly reveal Ernest Turley's profound love for this woman, and his complete faith in her, than the fact that he not only borrowed a pick and shovel, but actually bought several sticks of dynamite. Thus equipped, he blasted a great hole at the spot Dorothea showed to him.

Of course, there was no treasure – and for once, the doting husband got road. He blew up thoroughly and told his Astonished wife just what he thought of her blankety-blank ouija board, and of her, too, for fooling with such an idiotic contraption.

A day or so later, Turley took his two children – with their two nice new shotguns – to hunt game. As they were leaving, Dorothea calmly said to her daughter:

"Don't forget your promise, Mattie."

"Yes, mother, I won't forget," the girl recited. And that night, when the three of them returned, she again spoke enigmatically to her mother:

"I'm sorry," she apologized, "that I fell down on my promise."

"No matter," her mother said gently, smiling. "You'll have another chance."

Young David's birthday. came a few days later, and Dorothea took her son in the car to the village to get supplies for a family party. Mattie was left with her father.

Half an hour passed.

Suddenly the roar of a shotgun shook the still November air. And then screams – Mattie's hysterical screams, ringing the echoes.

"Oh – I've killed him! My father! An accident – I tripped."

Help was brought and Turley, horribly torn with shot, but still living, was rushed to a local hospital, then by airplane to the United States Naval Hospital at San Diego, California. There he died – but first he said that he had caught just a glimpse of his daughter behind him, her shotgun in her hands.

Everyone was very tender and sympathetic with little Mattie – until an old time deputy sheriff asked her how it was, if she had tripped firing into her father's back by accident, that the shot had traveled downward in his body instead of upward.

The girl then became hysterical.

"It was not an accident," she confessed.

"I did it on purpose, so mother could marry her handsome cowboy. I had to do it! Ouija ordered me to—and when ouija commands, it must be obeyed."

In a seance with her mother, Mattie revealed, the board had spelled out: "Daddy must die." And when the girl had asked who should kill him, the obliging board seemed to reply "M. T." That meant, her mother said (as reported now by Mattie) "Mattie Turley."

MATTIE was sent to reform school, to stay there till she turns 21 – but Mrs. Turley's trial was a world sensation. Mother and daughter faced each other across a crowded courtroom, and Mattie stuck to her story. Young Pollard Wiltbank, the "apprentice" cowboy, swore that Kent Pearce and Mrs. Turley spent most of their time together, on outings, in each other's arms. A neighbor woman testified that the accused had said she loved Pearce and wanted to marry him. Pearce, on the stand, denied hopes of marriage – but Mrs. Turley was sent to prison for 20 years.

That was less than three years ago. But just the other day, granted a retrial, the former American Venus almost broke down with joy when she was acquitted. Today she is a free woman – but no mention has been made of freeing her daughter from reform school. [This is an error. Mattie was paroled on Nov. 30, 1936.]

What will Dorothea Turley do with this unexpected gift of freedom? Will this publicity-haunted woman, who has been posed by the press both as heroine and as criminal, at last find the oblivion of obscurity? Or with her name again blaze in headlines of romance or tragedy?

Only time – and perhaps her Ouija board – will tell.

FULL TEXT (Article 3 of 4): Phoenix, Ariz., Nov. 30. – Arthur N. Kelley, secretary of the state board of public institutions, said today Mattie Turley, 18, convicted of the "Ouija Board" slaying of her father, Ernest Turley, three years ago, had [sic] been paroled.

Mattie, accused of shooting her father in the back with a shotgun, was sentenced to a state school was abandoned a year ago, she was removed to the convent of the Good Shepherd in Phoenix.

The girl's mother, Mrs. Dorothea Irene Turley, whose conviction of assault with intent to commit murder was intent to commit murder was recently reversed by the state supreme court, was released in September. The charges against her was dismissed.

Kelley said the girl had been paroled to Judge Levi S. Udall of the Apache county superior court, where Mattie was tried.

"I have nothing to say regarding the matter," Judge Udall said from Holbrook where he was reached by telephone. "This girl has received too much publicity already. She has her life to live, and I think she should be left alone."

The parole order was signed by Gov. B. B. Moeur, Mit Simms, state treasurer, and Kelley.

Kelley said Judge Udall asked for the parole, expressing the belief it was to the best interest of society.

Mrs. Turley, hailed by sculptors as the “American Venus” during the world war, had tried twice to tree the girl. Mattie told her mother at the time she thought they “should never see each other again.”

The state charged that Mrs. Turley, during a Ouija board reading, directed her daughter to kill Turley.

In His Own Words: Heeding childhood lessons

Dr. Tara J. Palmatier · 14 October 2013 · Archived copy · Original

It's day 14 of Domestic Violence Awareness Month for Men and Boys. While men comprise approximately half of all domestic violence, they receive very little attention, support, compassion and resources. Men are the invisible victims of domestic violence.

Today's In His Own Words is a little different. "Mellaril" was able to avoid repeating some of the same patterns in his marriage by heeding the lessons he witnessed as a child.

> Heeding Childhood Lessons
> As a child, I don't remember domestic violence being frequent in my home but it was consistent. My father was a World War II vet who followed the plan, going to college on the GI Bill, getting a good job, marrying a local girl. My mother was the prototypical stay-at-home wife/mother of the 50s.
> She looked like Laura Petrie in The Dick Van Dyke Show. She worked off and on as a commercial artist, and model for a wig shop and trade shows. She never learned to drive a car. An aunt later told me, "It really cramped your mother's style when you came along."
> On paper, we looked pretty good. Behind the walls, it was different. Both my parents were alcoholics. Dad was a functional one, Mom, not so much. My mother was often asleep and I was left to fend for myself until my father got home from work. She'd rouse herself long enough to accuse him of "taking three tries to hang up your suit."
> I don't remember witnessing the start of any event. It was usually the commotion that brought me out of wherever I was. I remember my mother standing in front of the door so my father couldn't leave.
>
> More than once I stood on the porch as my father tried to talk my mother into getting out the car after she'd grabbed the keys and locked herself in. I remember my father ducking down the basement stairs as my mother launched a coffee cup through the window of the kitchen door.
> My mother once told me that my father had called to tell her that he was having dinner with a client and would be home late. She said she took the Cornish hen and threw it in the snow. She said the next day she thought about it, fished it out of the snow, and gave it to him that night for dinner. I don't know that he ever knew.
> However, the worst one was when I came out of the bedroom to see them struggling in the bathroom. My mother was off the wall ballistic. My father was trying to restrain her, I think he was trying to get something out of her hand, but I don't remember for sure. I only remember at the time, I sided with my mother and told my father I wouldn't go camping with him. It wasn't until later when I learned about my mother's alcoholism that I was able to put things in a different context.
> I don't know how my father coped. What I know is that he left and he took me with him.
> For a man to get custody of a child in the 60s was unheard of. The public line was my mother knew he could provide a better life for me. That was true, but from what I learned growing up, I think he had something on her. I don't know what my life would have been like had my mother gotten custody. I only know that things turned out ok because she didn't.
> They say we marry someone that reminds us of a parent. I think that's true.
> I married a woman with a temper, but a pretty long fuse. Within a year of the marriage, I lit it. She picked up a coffee up and wound up. I don't know if she was aiming at me or not. I told her if that coffee cup landed anywhere, but where she picked it up from, the marriage was over.
> She later asked if I was serious when I said the marriage would be over. I told her I was serious and that I'd never put up with the things my father went through. She's never picked up another one.

If You See Jezebel in the Road, Run the Bitch Down

Paul Elam · 14 October 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Ed's note: This article, originally published on October 22, 2010, is a satirical response to a piece that appeared on the feminist site Jezebel ("Have you Ever Beat Up a Boyfriend? Because, Uh, We Have") and to media trivializing the physical abuse of men and boys. It has been brought back to the front page after a recent uptick in mainstream media attacks on the intent of this piece.

For their advance edification, we provide this link to the following wiki page, which provides definitions of Horatian and Juvenalian satire. We do with the instruction this article is an example of satire of the Juvenalian variety. Eds.

Juvenalian satire, named after the Roman satirist Juvenal (late 1st century – early 2nd century CE), is more contemptuous and abrasive than the Horatian. Juvenalian satire addresses social evil through scorn, outrage, and savage ridicule. This form is often pessimistic, characterized by irony, sarcasm, moral indignation and personal invective, with less emphasis on humor. Strongly polarized political satire is often Juvenalian. Also see: Satires of Juvenal.

It's domestic violence awareness month, folks, and we are now in the latter half of another month long national circle jerk, the entire domestic violence industry masturbating to a frenzy of trumped up stats and sadistically titillating lies.

We have flying spittle in the halls of congress, the antecedents of hysterical demands that we take on the worldwide cause of defending helpless women across the globe from their sorry lot in life as victims. We have grown men donning themselves in drag couture and walking a mile in "her shoes," a sort of trendy, new age and humiliating self flagellation by men who want to atone for all bearers of the evil penis.

And we have a resurrected article from August of '07, from the women at Jezebel.com (tip of the hat to the illustrious Dr. Snark) demonstrating how violent and unrepentant they really are — how much they seem to enjoy it.

Senior writer Tracie Egan Morrissey penned the article, which addresses research findings reported in Psychiatric News that, "In fact, when it comes to nonreciprocal violence between intimate partners, women are more often the perpetrators."

Morrissey reacted to that oft ignored reality, after a query of her female staff and readers for those who have beaten their boyfriends, with the following:

> "…well, let's just say it would be wise never to fuck with us."

And of course the comment section that follows the article backs up her pro abuse attitude toward men. It is replete with women regaling us with stories of how they kicked, hit, smashed and bloodied their boyfriends for doing the sometimes annoying things that men do. One women reported that she punched her ex in the face for having the audacity to get another girlfriend after they broke up.

The editor summed up the general attitude about these women physically attacking their significant others and then glorifying the abuse.

"They had it coming," she said.

That's it. In the name of equality and fairness, I am proclaiming October to be Bash a Violent Bitch Month.

I'd like to make it the objective for the remainder of this month, and all the Octobers that follow, for men who are being attacked and physically abused by women – to beat the living shit out of them. I don't mean subdue them, or deliver an open handed pop on the face to get them to settle down. I mean literally to grab them by the hair and smack their face against the wall till the smugness of beating on someone because you know they won't fight back drains from their nose with a few million red corpuscles.

And then make them clean up the mess.

You know, we used to have a name for people who only hit those that they knew wouldn't fight back.

Bullies.

And we all know that bullies are cowards. Put a hurting on one and they go find someone else to pick on every time. It's what cowards do.

Now, am I serious about this?

No. Not because it's wrong. Self defense isn't wrong. Every one should have the right to defend themselves. Hell, women are often excused from killing someone whom they allege has abused them. They can shoot them in their sleep and walk. Happens all the time. It'll even get you a spot on Oprah and feminists will lionize you.

In that light, every one of those women at Jezebel and millions of others across the western world are as deserving of a righteous ass kicking as any human being can be. But it isn't worth the time behind bars or the abuse of anger management training that men must endure if they are uppity enough to defend themselves from female attackers.

The better option is to kick her to the curb, figuratively speaking, and hopefully move on to some better choices. Besides, violence in self defense should be in some way commensurate with the violence of the attack.

I will say this, though. To all the men out there that decided to say "Damn the consequences," and fight back, you are heroes to the cause of equality; true feminists. And you are the honorary Kings of Bash a Violent Bitch Month. You are living proof of just how hollow "don't fuck with us," rings from the mouths of bullies and hypocrites.

In the spirit of feminists everywhere, you GO, boy!

Note: once again, for those who missed it, this article is a satirical response to this piece on Jezebel ("Have you Ever Beat Up a Boyfriend? Because, Uh, We Have") and to common media "jokes" about women physically assaulting men and boys. –Eds.

The end of rape culture in the United States

Paul Elam · 14 October 2013 · Archived copy · Original

The UK's Mail Online ran an article six days ago on a subject that was just as attention getting as the headline they gave the story. "More men are raped in the US than women, figures on prison assaults reveal."

This is definitely shocking, not because anyone who frequents this site is unaware of the fact that men are more frequently rape victims than women, and not because it took a British publication to report a vastly important piece of American news, but simply because any mainstream outlet came out so bluntly and said it. They supported that headline by including inmate populations in the total number of rapes.

How hopeful. If they are starting to imagine that convicts are human beings, men can't be that far behind.

What also stands out about this article is that Mail Online closed down comments after just six people had responded. I suppose they sensed the FTSU Brigade would soon be on the way and decided not to let the cultural bloodbath, or the corrections to what they got wrong, happen on their pages.

Comments were not shut down, however, before a couple of morons got in their shots.

This one from Leavenworth (assuming it is still in Kansas) found little approval among subsequent readers who rated the comment.

[image]

Uh, it is easy, CBC9249, since rape isn't defined geographically. Just click your heels together and repeat after me, "There's no place like school."

Someone else, unfortunately from Houston (which brings me eternal shame) also chimed in with their two cents (adjusted for inflation). This person got greater but not majority approval from subsequent readers who voted.

[image]

We will pass that along to the Innocence Project, and maybe some of the thousands of men the Innocence Project did not have the resources to help. And then we will hopefully find a way to teach Nini the Ninny what is obvious. Incarceration is a valid part of the criminal justice system. Rape isn't.

Let's see what happens if we apply the same message to people, the ones that happen to be female, who are raped outside of prison.

Stay out of seedy bars, wild parties and other high risk areas. Rapists are likely to be there. Simples.

Oh, and if someone handcuffs you and drags you there against your will, it's still your fault. You should not have been in an area where they were handcuffing people.

Simple? No, just simple-minded.

I need to back up a moment and actually offer a word of thanks to Mail Online. This is some heavy duty myth busting in which they have engaged. It is to be lauded as groundbreaking, and the article should be Tweeted and Facebooked till people leave blood on the keyboard.

Were parts of the article lacking? Very much, and it is sad that they closed comments before some of the bad data could be challenged by readers. For example, they supported their headline with the same shopworn fallacy of excluding male rape victims who were assaulted by being made to penetrate. They relied just on the victims of rape by penetration, which of course presents a very misleading picture of both victims and perpetrators, as well as the actual numbers of rapes that happen.

The more complete picture is critical.

When all is said and done, it is very likely that we will find that not only are women the minority of rape victims, they are likely not near as relevant as once assumed in understanding the big picture of sexual assaults in this culture. Just like the referenced article said, rape victims are overwhelmingly male, more than two to one over women, even by the United States Department of Justice and Mail Online's convoluted reckoning.

And that, folks, is how we end "Rape Culture." All we have to do is keep hammering the fact that rape is primarily not a women's issue (except, in some cases, as perpetrators). People will quit giving a damn overnight.

Of course, I am being facetious. Feminists show skillful acumen for taking problems that affect women less than men and putting them in a pink limelight. Tim Tolka and his #badass crew are more than happy to pitch in with the expectation of some scraps being tossed their way.

I do hope, that as this information continues to infuse the cultural consciousness, along with our corrections and clarifications on the data, that we do not lose our sense of compassion.

We must remember that women, too, are sometimes raped; just as they are sometimes the victims of domestic and other forms of violence. We should not be like feminists. We should not, in good conscious, turn away from their pain just because the majority of them enjoy protection and exclusion from the brunt of these issues.

Another step toward femocracy

Jon Gunnarsson · 14 October 2013 · Archived copy · Original

In my article Germany's Quota Politicians, I showed how much influence feminism already asserts in German politics. Since then, the only party solidly opposed to women's quotas has been voted out of the Bundestag[1] and it is likely that the next government will push for women's quotas in private companies. And as if that weren't bad enough, the feminists have now won another victory over democracy.

As the Frankfurter Allgemeine Zeitung reports[2], in the state of Rhineland-Palatinate, the ruling coalition of social democrats and Greens have passed a law to manipulate local elections. According to the law[3], the ballot paper for local elections must contain the following quote from the German constitution:

> Men and women are equal before the law[4].

Further, it must list the ratio of men and women for each party as it was two months before the vote as well as the sex ratio of those candidates nominated in the top half of the suggested list of each party. This is a none-too-subtle hint to voters that they ought to vote for more female candidates. It's also intended to shame those parties who dare to have more male candidates. The suggestion is of course entirely fallacious. The constitution only mandates Gleichberechtigung (equal rights), not Gleichstellung (equal standing or equal outcome), but in public discourse the two entirely different and incompatible terms are frequently conflated.

It's hard to say how successful this attempt at influencing voters will be, but even the threat of possibly being seen as anti-woman may induce parties to nominate more female candidates, thus taking politics one more step away from meritocracy. But not content with this, the new law also contains the following passage:

> Women and men should be equally represented in the representative councils (gender parity). When assembling the list of suggested candidates, the parties and voters' groups are advised to strive for gender parity[5].

This does not forbid parties from having lists that violate gender parity, but at the very least strongly discourages it. It creates the definite suggestion that there's something suspicious and possibly illegitimate about a party that nominates more men than women. This of course entirely ignores the fact that many more men than women are interested in participating in politics. But pesky things like uncomfortable facts are conveniently ignored by the ruling femocrats.

It's also rather arbitrary that this measure singles out sex as the sole characteristic deserving of such treatment. If gender parity is so desirable, then why not also educational or intelligence parity? Surely we wouldn't want to deprive uneducated or unintelligent people of representation. Why not also proportional representation based on religion, race, ethnicity, income level, marital status, number of children, sexual orientation, and a host of other categories? If we apply this principle consistently enough, we won't even have to vote any more, we can just determine who gets to be in councils and parliaments based on group membership. And while we're at it, then we can also do away with such old-fashioned notions as individual achievement and merit.

Right now, this law only affects local elections in one Bundesland. But similar attempts have also been made in Baden-Württemberg. Right now we can still hope that laws like these will be struck down as unconstitutional, though I'm not very optimistic about that prospect. But if they stand as they are, they could be a mighty weapon in the hands of those parties who already have a higher ratio of female members and internal women's quotas.

In any case, this is another step on the path to absolute feminist rule: femocracy. For while feminists have infiltrated all major parties, the chains of constitutional democracy still hold them to some extent and can only be loosened gradually. But in the long run, only popular opinion can avert the course we're currently on. Thanks to the PR debacle that is modern feminism, a recent study in Germany (commissioned by a women's magazine, no less!) has found that 64% of men are fed up with what passes for "gender equality" these days and 76% say they've been discriminated against based on their gender[6].

This vast number of people is currently being ignored by all major parties in Germany. Instead, the powerful feminist forces in politics and media treat them either as confused and helpless manlings who've been overwhelmed by all the progressiveness of our age and who need to re-educated to join the feminist cause, or else as dangerous Neanderthal machos who need to be put in their place. We can only hope that soon enough, some party will wake up and realize the great number of potential voters it could gain if only it had the courage to openly oppose the feminist hegemony. Until that happens, things are only going to get worse.

Notes:

[1] Lest there be any misunderstanding, I hasten to point out that the failure of the classical liberal FDP at the recent election very likely had little or nothing to do with their stance on women's quotas or feminism.

If You See Jezebel in the Road, Run the Bitch Down

Paul Elam · 14 October 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Editor's note: This article, originally published on October 22, 2010, is a satirical response to a piece that appeared on the feminist site Jezebel ("Have you Ever Beat Up a Boyfriend? Because, Uh, We Have") and to media trivializing the physical abuse of men and boys. It has been brought back to the front page after a recent uptick in mainstream media attacks on the intent of this piece.
For their advance edification, we provide this link to the following wiki page, which provides definitions of Horatian and Juvenalian satire. We do with the instruction this article is an example of satire of the Juvenalian variety.

Juvenalian satire, named after the Roman satirist Juvenal (late 1st century – early 2nd century CE), is more contemptuous and abrasive than the Horatian. Juvenalian satire addresses social evil through scorn, outrage, and savage ridicule. This form is often pessimistic, characterized by irony, sarcasm, moral indignation and personal invective, with less emphasis on humor. Strongly polarized political satire is often Juvenalian. It's domestic violence awareness month, folks, and we are now in the latter half of another month long national circle jerk, the entire domestic violence industry masturbating to a frenzy of trumped up stats and sadistically titillating lies.

We have flying spittle in the halls of congress, the antecedents of hysterical demands that we take on the worldwide cause of defending helpless women across the globe from their sorry lot in life as victims. We have grown men donning themselves in drag couture and walking a mile in "her shoes," a sort of trendy, new age and humiliating self flagellation by men who want to atone for all bearers of the evil penis.

And we have a resurrected article from August of '07, from the women at Jezebel.com (tip of the hat to the illustrious Dr. Snark) demonstrating how violent and unrepentant they really are — how much they seem to enjoy it.

Senior writer Tracie Egan Morrissey penned the article, which addresses research findings reported in Psychiatric News that, "In fact, when it comes to nonreciprocal violence between intimate partners, women are more often the perpetrators."

Morrissey reacted to that oft ignored reality, after a query of her female staff and readers for those who have beaten their boyfriends, with the following:

> "…well, let's just say it would be wise never to fuck with us."

And of course the comment section that follows the article backs up her pro abuse attitude toward men. It is replete with women regaling us with stories of how they kicked, hit, smashed and bloodied their boyfriends for doing the sometimes annoying things that men do. One women reported that she punched her ex in the face for having the audacity to get another girlfriend after they broke up.

The editor summed up the general attitude about these women physically attacking their significant others and then glorifying the abuse.

"They had it coming," she said.

That's it. In the name of equality and fairness, I am proclaiming October to be Bash a Violent Bitch Month.

I'd like to make it the objective for the remainder of this month, and all the Octobers that follow, for men who are being attacked and physically abused by women – to beat the living shit out of them. I don't mean subdue them, or deliver an open handed pop on the face to get them to settle down. I mean literally to grab them by the hair and smack their face against the wall till the smugness of beating on someone because you know they won't fight back drains from their nose with a few million red corpuscles.

And then make them clean up the mess.

You know, we used to have a name for people who only hit those that they knew wouldn't fight back.

Bullies.

And we all know that bullies are cowards. Put a hurting on one and they go find someone else to pick on every time. It's what cowards do.

Now, am I serious about this?

No. Not because it's wrong. Self defense isn't wrong. Every one should have the right to defend themselves. Hell, women are often excused from killing someone whom they allege has abused them. They can shoot them in their sleep and walk. Happens all the time. It'll even get you a spot on Oprah and feminists will lionize you.

In that light, every one of those women at Jezebel and millions of others across the western world are as deserving of a righteous ass kicking as any human being can be. But it isn't worth the time behind bars or the abuse of anger management training that men must endure if they are uppity enough to defend themselves from female attackers.

The better option is to kick her to the curb, figuratively speaking, and hopefully move on to some better choices. Besides, violence in self defense should be in some way commensurate with the violence of the attack.

I will say this, though. To all the men out there that decided to say "Damn the consequences," and fight back, you are heroes to the cause of equality; true feminists. And you are the honorary Kings of Bash a Violent Bitch Month. You are living proof of just how hollow "don't fuck with us," rings from the mouths of bullies and hypocrites.

In the spirit of feminists everywhere, you GO, boy!

Note: once again, for those who missed it, this article is a satirical response to this piece on Jezebel ("Have you Ever Beat Up a Boyfriend? Because, Uh, We Have") and to common media "jokes" about women physically assaulting men and boys. –Eds.

In His Own Words: Mother or Monster?

Dr. Tara J. Palmatier · 15 October 2013 · Archived copy · Original

It's day 15 of Domestic Violence Awareness Month for Men and Boys, the invisible victims of domestic violence. "David" shares his childhood memories of his mother, who was more monster than parent. The image Axis II is an original work by David.

> Mother or Monster?
> [image]
> Axis II by David
> In 1962, my Dad met my Mother. After they married, he worked as a mechanic at a reputable dealership and provided a good living, but they had problems. My Mom wanted a baby and a child was the one thing that would finally make her "happy."
> In late 1963, my older brother was born. Pregnancy was hard on my Mom. She had complications. My older brother was "puny" and had a lot of health problems. At this time, Dad said Mom started having "seizures" and uncontrollable fits of rage.
> Due to complications, she was prescribed medication. The pain medications were very addictive and easily obtainable. Dad said the bickering escalated into a regular ordeal. Mom blamed Dad for everything, claimed he didn't love her and was obsessed with worry that he'd leave her. Things became violent (against him) and she threatened suicide regularly.
> In 1964, she reluctantly checked in to a State Hospital and was subjected to two very intense weeks of "shock therapy." After leaving the hospital, she appeared comatose and unaware of her surroundings.
> According to Dad, she eventually "came back around" and seemed to be doing well. Unfortunately, it did not last and things began to unravel quickly. The medical bills started accumulating and Dad had to change jobs in order to keep up financially.
> In late 1965, there was a psychiatrist who was known for "doing wonders." Dad arranged for Mom to see him. After several "unsuccessful" sessions, she refused to go back. She would not answer any of his questions and would turn her anger on my Father and then the doctor.
> Around this time, she would disappear for days on end, leaving Dad to find her and bring her back home. For the next couple of years, he bought nicer cars, homes, clothes — anything and everything she said needed to be happy. The drug use continued.
> For every financial or material gain, Dad was inevitably told, "Not good enough. If you loved me I would have what so-and-so's wife has." Once Dad found a way to get Mom what wanted, she would change the rules on him. She was very adept at twisting situations, so Dad was always wrong. This kept him in a constant state of argument in which he had to defend himself against her accusations.
> I was born in 1968 and was the spitting image of Dad. I believe this was the reason I received more of her anger as I grew and matured. Mom complained that Dad was always working, so he went back to his original job in order to be at home more. The medical bills started to pile up again in addition to more drug use, more fighting and more confusion.
> My younger brother was born in 1970. He, like my older brother, was "sickly" and Mom had pneumonia during his delivery. Dad took a better job and moved us into a nicer house. We were the "Perfect American Family."
> That same year, Mom pointed a single bolt action .22 caliber rifle at Dad's chest. She became enraged at some insignificant incident from years back. She pulled the trigger, but it failed to fire.
> Dad started talking to lawyers about divorce and getting custody of us kids. In those days, a man getting full custody was rare, almost as rare as it is today. The lawyers all told him the same thing — it's a waste of time and money. Divorce meant leaving his children. Dad was afraid we'd end up in a home with a man who may have been abusive to Mom and us. He was trapped in a "Catch 22," so, he kept working, harder and harder.

In the following 5 years, Mom's prescription drugs and medical bills exceeded $75,000. In today's economy that's approximately $400,000. This was only year 5 of a 25 year marriage.

Around this time, Dad started sending us to our grandparents for the summer as a way to shield us form the unstable situation at home. This became an annual trek for the next 12 years. Looking back, those 3 or 4 months every year may have been the only thing that kept me sane.

Although it was a good for us kids, it made things harder for Dad. Mom became afraid of losing her kids. She accused my Grandmother of trying to take us away from her. She told people that my Father and Grandmother had "mental problems."

We moved again in 1975 after Dad purchased a business. He worked all the time. I have memories of seeing Mom chain-smoking late at night on the couch while staring into the distance. The low hiss and flickering of the black and white static haunting the room like a ghost. Some nights, she wouldn't "see" you. Other nights, she would pull you close until you fell asleep. Insomnia combated by sleeping pills.

Then came that night. I was awakened by the sounds of screaming and arguing. It was very late. Then there was a gunshot.

I got up and walked into the hall. My older brother shoved me back in the room I shared with my younger brother and told us, "don't you dare come out."

The only words I recall from that night were, "I hope you fucking die!"

I was curled up in the corner of the room when, what seemed like days had passed, the lights of the ambulance and police cars started reflecting off the opposite wall from our window. I went to the door, opened it and walked down the hall.

Our kitchen was classic 1970s avocado green. Blood was everywhere, the floors, the refrigerator, the phone, the counters. Red on green makes black. I was 7-years old. I watched them put my Dad in the back of the ambulance. The neighbors, in bathrobes and pajamas, had lined the block.

My dad had worked late that night (trying to catch up on bills) and accidentally woke my Mom upon his return. An argument ensued and in a fit of rage, she took a .25 caliber pistol, from the cash register he had sat on the counter, and shot him. My older brother ran to the neighbors' house and had them call for help.

I don't remember seeing my Mother that night, she was locked in her bedroom, I think. Detectives visited the hospital to pressure my Dad to change his story. He lied to the police, saying he dropped the gun and it went off. My Mom pleaded with him to lie and told him she would "get help," which never happened.

Her only concern was not going to prison. This was, according to Dad, the ONLY time she ever apologized for ANYTHING.

Within three weeks, after almost bleeding to death in his own home, he had no choice but to do what he did best, go back to work. We went back to school and were expected to bring home good report cards.

The move to the country came in 1976. Our family's embarrassment was never-ending, Mom and Dad decided we'd be better off without neighbors. Dad had a house built. Their bedroom and bathroom was designed, down to the last detail, for Mom. Late one morning, she complained of "stomach troubles," chaos commenced and Mom was rushed to the hospital.

I went to their bedroom and pushed open the bathroom door. It was a blood-bath.

The tub, toilet and floor, all light blue, were saturated with dark crimson red. Years of stress, drugs and poor nutrition had ulcerated her stomach and it ruptured. She fought for her life for a long time. She lost a lot of blood and they had to remove a large part of her stomach.

When we were finally able to visit her in the hospital, she was the closest thing to a living corpse I have ever seen. I was 8-years old.

She was forced to come home early. We were broke. Dad bought a recliner for the living room and that is where she recuperated for what felt like an eternity. The smell of healing flesh after such extreme surgery is indescribable. To this day, I can still recall it.

She battled infection after infection. There was no trash collection in the country. We burned all the clothes and rags that were used to clean her up. The smell of burning infected rags was awful. Things were eerily quiet for several months.

In 1977 after my ninth birthday, I witnessed Mom's first threat of suicide. Fighting with my Dad in the kitchen, she pulled a steak knife from the drawer, placed it to her wrist and screamed she was going to kill herself. I cried and begged her to stop. Of course, she blamed it on my Dad. "See what your Father has done?"

She would get physical with Dad and slap and claw at him. Dad defended himself as best as possible, never doing anything to hurt her or strike back. Once he would leave, either to work or just to "let things cool off," she would show us her bruises and claim he was abusing her. If you denied her claims, she went into a "spin" routine to make you doubt your own memory and perception.

She told others the same lies. People believed her the majority of the time. All those years, Dad had to face people who thought the worst of him. If "Gaslighting" didn't work, Mom gave you the "cold shoulder" treatment, not speaking to you for days. Or she resorted to aggressive behavior either becoming physical or taking away your things.

Dad moved us back to town in 1978 in another attempt to please Mom. Now Mom added threatening to leave my Dad to her repertoire. More than once she emptied a bank account, packed our things, took us to an unknown city or across town, checked into a motel, ate pills and engaged in what's known today as Parental Alienation — the act of turning you against the other parent through programming and brainwashing with hate, fear and aggression.

She always went back home once the money or drugs ran out and ordered us to not say anything about what had happened. We didn't. Everyone pretended like nothing had happened. This was a regular occurrence over the years.

Overspending was always a problem. On one occasion, she bought a really expensive coat on credit. Dad said he was going to take it back. She went to the kitchen, got a large butcher knife and shredded it. Even though her closets were full of the best clothes, shoes and jewelry, she accused Dad of not wanting her to have "nice things." Yet, I can remember her throwing my father's clothes off the front porch late at night, while screaming for him to leave and never come back.

Of course, the minute he tried to leave, she'd stand in the doorway, push his buttons in hopes of him becoming physically aggressive, berate him and yell that he was abandoning his children. It was the classic "I hate you, don't leave me" shtick and hitting Dad where it hurt the most to keep him confused and engaged in an argument to keep him from leaving.

I had my first case of kidney stones during this period. After spending a night at the hospital, I came home to find Mom eating my pain medication. We remained at this location for quite some time. Dad took a job on an off-shore drilling rig where he worked 30 days on and 30 off. It was another work-related move in an effort to make Mom happy.

Without Dad as a target, Mom eventually turned on us kids. Emotional blackmail was frequently employed. To keep us from telling Dad about doctor's visits (drug seeking), purchasing drugs or ungovernable spending, she held things over our heads for weeks at a time. If you got out of line, she held it over your head. If you didn't misbehave, she'd make something up. "This is the way it is and this is what you say, if not, your Father will be told this." Or, she'd play the "good Mother" and buy us off with gifts.

> Looking back, I remember my younger brother and I accompanying her to doctors' offices and pharmacies as much as we were at school or playing. Although, I'm sure her health was an issue (no one can keep up with stress levels that high and addiction without being adversely affected), hypochondria was another way to feed her drug addiction and constant attention-seeking through sympathy.
> Dad was making a very good living, but Mom pressured him to spend more time at home. Eventually, Dad quit the oil rig and purchased another business in the mid-1980s. Jealousy defined this marital era. Mom constantly accused Dad of infidelities. It got so bad he couldn't even look at another woman without an episode. It was ridiculous.
> Mom's drug addiction was also escalating and things were really spiraling out of control. There is nothing like having to clean up your Mother's vomit after an overdose or removing cigarettes from her hand that had burned down to the filter as she laid unconscious on the couch at 4am.
> I defended my Dad a lot as I got older. When I did, I was compared to him. I can't count the times I heard, "You're just like your damn Father" or "You're as worthless as your fucking Father."
>
> By 1987, Mom spent the family into near ruin again. Dad faced financial bankruptcy like so may times before and was forced to sell his business. In 1988, he got a job as a truck driver and I was about to leave for college. We moved into a small rental house.
> Dad took me aside and told me that us kids were now old enough to make it on our own. I knew he was finally going to divorce Mom. She guilt tripped me several times before I left for college and it always ended in arguments. She feared everyone was going to leave her and seemed very solemn and sad.
> On December 8th, I got the call. My Mother had died of a heart attack, or that is what we were told. I still wonder if it was an overdose or suicide. She was 44-years old. During their 25 year marriage, Dad made millions of dollars. When all was said and done, he had to borrow money to pay for her funeral and headstone, so he could finally lay his wife to rest.
> To this day, friends and family tell me how my Mom was the nicest lady they ever knew or wished they had a Mom like mine. You can only smile. They never saw that side of my Mother.

Amanda Marcotte's still holding out her cup; still no ice cream

Robert Franklin · 15 October 2013 · Archived copy · Original

I'd like to add to a piece written by Paul Elam a few days ago. His added to a video by TyphonBlue that in turn commented on a video that appeared on Tumblr.

The cartoon video Typhon lampooned purported to illustrate the MHRM. It depicted a machine that doled out scoop after scoop of ice cream. The male character devoured almost every scoop to come out of the machine, but occasionally the female character managed to get one. When she did, the male character screamed "MISANDRY!" The point being that essentially all the goodies of life go to men, rendering us spoiled brats. When we don't get every last bit of everything, we go into a pout. That's what the MHRM is, you see, a bunch of pouters.

What Typhon said and Paul expanded on was the simple idea that ice cream doesn't fall out of the sky into the hands of greedy men. Ice cream, being a metaphor for "stuff," "goods," "assets," doesn't pop magically out of the ether, someone has to make it. If people don't make it, no one gets to eat it. The same is true of essentially everything that we consider makes life better than it otherwise might be. So ice cream is a stand-in for, say, computers, clothing, running water, flush toilets, super markets, electricity, anti-biotics, the music of Charlie Parker, the painting of Vermeer, the scientific advances of Darwin and Einstein, etc. The list is, for all practical purposes, endless.

None of those things fell from the sky. They exist and make our lives easier and fuller because somebody – usually many somebodies – made them, discovered them, invented them, developed them, imagined them, refined them. And the people who did all that and so much more didn't just snap their fingers and – bingo! – there was modern medical science. No, everything we rely on to make our lives abundant and good came about through long sacrifice, blood, sweat and tears.

It still does. The food in the super market didn't get there on its own. The swordfish were caught by commercial fisherman, were cleaned and packaged by human beings working for little money and was trucked to market by drivers who don't earn much more. The house or building you live in didn't build itself. It was built by hard work and considerable know-how out of materials that also required hard work and know-how to find their way onto your house. All of that required a considerable degree of risk. Commercial fishing and building construction are two of the most dangerous jobs going.

In a nutshell, that's what Paul said in his piece, plus the fact that just about all of the "ice cream" in our lives was provided by the labor and genius of men. More than once I've asked misandrists to spend just one week of their lives going without everything that was invented, discovered, developed, built, etc. by men. Think about what your life would be like without all that. I see animal skins and sharp sticks. So far, no one who takes such pleasure in denigrating men has yet agreed to my little experiment.

As luck would have it, Amanda Marcotte has thoughtfully provided us more fuel for the fire the Tumblr video started. Here she's in full whine about this article written by Sarah Lacy, who's the founder of PandoDaily, an online site for start-up companies, and serves as its editor.

It seems that feminists have gotten well and truly lathered up about the revelation that Twitter has no women on its Board of Directors. Lacy defended Twitter CEO, Leo Costolo and Marcotte leapt to the barricades to attack Lacy.

And what do you think their dispute is about? If you guessed "where ice cream comes from," go to the head of the class. You see Lacy, having actually raised money and started a company, knows where ice cream comes from and Marcotte, well, you can guess.

Marcotte thinks that ice cream – in this case, positions on corporate boards – falls like manna from heaven. In her understanding, you don't need to achieve anything to deserve ice cream. She's the classic spoiled child who's used to getting whatever she wants… just because.

Now, Marcotte's whine about Lacy really isn't about what Lacy wrote. That's because she truly has no answer for Lacy's basic point that ice cream must be earned. So, in the tried and true feminist fashion, Marcotte pretends Lacy said or implied all sorts of things she never did. She claims Lacy suggested that there just aren't any women with the talent Twitter requires, but of course Lacy did no such thing. Indeed, she listed numerous successful women in the Valley and only said that Costolo needed to be able to pick people he knows and feels he can trust in advance of the company's IPO.

Then she claims Lacy says that sexism is a good thing because it weeds out people who can't cut it in the corporate world. That's utterly false. Lacy's clear and simple point is that, in Silicon Valley as elsewhere, you have to prove your mettle. If you don't, don't expect people to ply you with ice cream. If you do, it's likely because you have the requisite brains and drive. The idea that Lacy's plumping for sexism is absurd.

An 8th-grader reporting on Lacy's piece who turned in Marcotte's article would get an 'F.' Her descriptions bear little-to-no resemblance to the article itself, but again, that's because she's got no honest criticism of it. Lacy attacks feminists who are understandably nervous about successful women because their very existence contradicts cherished feminist beliefs. According to Marcotte, Lacy and those like her can't exist; the patriarchy won't allow it. But they do and they're not content to play the oppressed little woman feminists ironically would prefer.

After all, Lacy's entire piece can be distilled down to something like this: women can and do compete perfectly well in Silicon Valley, but, just like men, they have to work their asses off in order to do so. Lacy's made a good pile of ice cream herself and she's not taking any grief from someone like Marcotte who's never done anything except spell "patriarchy" correctly.

> But you know what I also got to do the past two years? Raise millions of dollars and hire amazing talent to start the company of my dreams and give birth to two beautiful children that make me smile every day. If that balance is the ravages of our modern sexist world, bring it the fuck on. Because I'm pretty happy with how it's all going…
> Furthermore, none of this is limited to tech. There is still progress to be made, but quotas and witch hunts don't solve the problem. And, frankly, I feel like having to work hard to prove myself made me more resilient and more successful. I do my best work when everyone expects me to fail. I've been doing it my whole career…

That's the attitude a woman needs to survive in a male-dominated industry and, it just so happens, that's precisely the attitude an entrepreneur needs to survive too. Male, female, immigrant, or minority: Building a company is brutal. White men fail all the time if they have a bad idea or execution.

Yep, it seems there's nothing like actually doing something to make one appreciate others who've done things. It makes you understand that plenty of "white men fail all the time," for example. See Amanda? White men don't succeed in life just because they're white and male. If the competition beats you, you lose. Period. The business world, like the professions, politics, STEM fields, etc. isn't ice cream spilling out of a machine.

Lacy's not naïve. She understands that connections count, and some people can get a cushy post on a Board of Directors somewhere even though their qualifications are limited. But few respect those people and none of them get very far because they don't have anything going for them beyond their frat-boy connections.

(What Lacy doesn't mention is that Marcotte thinks connections are grand, just as long as they benefit women and not men. Marcotte apparently believes that Costolo should appoint women to Twitter's board because they're women. Qualified women, to be sure, but Marcotte's plaint isn't about qualifications, it's about the sex of Twitter's board members. She wouldn't be satisfied if Costolo fired a couple of current members and replaced them with qualified men. She'd only approve if the new hires were women, i.e. people who come to be connected by virtue of their XX chromosomes.)

Lacy isn't addressing Marcotte personally, but she might as well be.

It's not a surprise that many of the people complaining are the people who literally wake up every day looking for a women's issue to be outraged about…

See, people whose media attention or careers live or die by banging the SEXISM! drum don't know what to do when they encounter examples of women who have raised funding and started companies and seem to be doing okay as women in the Valley…

> These people can't be happy that there are many signs things are starting to change in the startup world. And as a woman in this industry, I'm sickened by the leagues of people twisting facts and jumping on convenient bandwagons to further their own careers and stay relevant, while doing nothing themselves to create jobs and opportunities for women…

Lacy names several women in Silicon Valley who've made successes of themselves and adds,

> Note, these women aren't the ones waking up every day and trying to manufacture some new feminist outrage. They are simply working hard to lead by example and "change the ratio" by actually building companies and hire diverse and qualified senior teams in their image.

Hmm. "Actually building companies…" What a concept – one that the likes of Amanda Marcotte would never dream of. No, Amanda's spending too much time holding her bowl out the window and wondering why it never fills up.

The absurdity of creep shaming

Jalon Cain (aka Aaron Sleazy) · 15 October 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Imagine you went down to the bar at the corner and had a beer. It's a hipster bar and you pay for the atmosphere, so it's 5 bucks, just like it's printed on the menu. Business as usual. But let's imagine the place gets a new owner. To you everything looks the same. It's still self-service, the guy at the bar still looks as if he wants to sell alcohol to you, and the prices on the menu are the same. You're readying yourself for a long night. First beer: 5 bucks. Half an hour later you get another one. Strangely enough, it's ten bucks now. You have no idea what's going on, but you are too meek to stand up for yourself and you pay ten bucks for a beer that should cost five. It doesn't take long until you get thirsty again, but this time around the guy at the bar tells you that you should be ashamed of yourself because even though he's selling alcohol and looks as if he wants to sell alcohol it doesn't mean that he wants to sell any to you.

Does this sound absurd to you? Good! It sounds absurd to me, too, so I would like to discuss a phenomenon that is just equally absurd: creep shaming. Of course, creep shaming is only tangentially related to alcohol consumption. It plays out quite similarly, though. I'll continue with the thought experiment: After downing a couple of beers for whatever price, you get adventurous and think that it sure would be nice to get your dick wet again. Looking around, you can't fail to notice that some women seem to aggressively advertise themselves by wearing short skirts and tight tops. One of the girls seems to be glancing over, so you decide to try your luck. But wait, Broseph, not so fast!

You know, you have to understand that just because she is flirting, or maybe even cock teasing guys, she isn't necessarily available. Maybe she is, but maybe she's not. Thanks to prevalent social norms it's the guy's job to make the first move. This wouldn't be so bad if women indicated clearly that they were interested in you in particular. Sure, this does happen on occasion, but normally they cast their net wide and hope to catch the attention of some guy they find attractive. They would only rarely walk up to him directly, because then their Prince Charming might just laugh at them. Maintaining the phantasy that they would eventually get him is apparently better for their self-esteem. So, they don't walk up to guys because they don't want to feel rejected. This is an experience women much prefer to reserve exclusively for guys, and they happily put the burden of the approach and of initiating a conversation on you. That's not all. You also have to move the entire interaction from "hi" to the bedroom so that she can then tell her girlfriend the next day about all the things that "just happened".

Okay, the burden is on you. This time you're quite sure, though. I mean, just look at her! She's flicking her hair and smiling at half a dozen guys, all in an attempt to get some attention. Still, until you actually make a move, you won't know whether she wants to hook up, or just likes to feed off the attention she's getting from all the drooling guys. You think it's your lucky day, and you say hi. Everything goes well. She giggles when you tell her that you're an electrical engineer since she believes it's a word you just made up. This goes on for half an hour, and eventually you tell her to get her coat, and you take her home. Well done!

But this is not the only possible outcome. If she really just wanted to feed off the attention of some random guys, then her behavior would have been the very same. Of course, if the guys knew that she wasn't really interested, they'd ogle some other chick instead. This is a situation she wouldn't like either. All you do notice is that she seems rather flirtatious. Just like in the last scenario, you're confident so you make a move. She's not interested. Bummer. And what happens next? Well, if she's got a modicum of decency, she would just turn away. Yet, it just so happens that some women love to play "hard to get" and feign disinterest, fully expecting the guy to read her mind and still go after her. But maybe she's really not interested. Not so easy to know. You can't be bothered, so you say to yourself, "fuck it!", and hit on some other girl who is hopefully more mature.

However, let's say she's one of the more frustrated women and looking for an outlet for her pent-up aggressions. I seem to dimly recall that such women exist, too. If you're unfortunate enough to bump into one of those, then your friendly, "Hey, what's up?", would be met with a facial expression of disgust and the words, "Ugh…. Creep! Go away!", followed by her loudly complaining to her girlfriends how you "creep" could even have dared approaching her. This might happen to you. It's not because you're an insensitive asshole, but because she does nothing more than inviting attention, and then picking one of her suitors. Women just don't clearly indicate when they are interested in a particular guy, and even showing disinterest is not a clear signal. Don't laugh! If you've got female friends and talk with them about their romantic life, you'll hear the most bizarre stories, like women sincerely claiming that by "actively ignoring" a guy they'll get his attention. Heck, they might even start to wonder whether that guy was secretly gay — just because he never ever spoke to her, even though she was ignoring him so hard all the time.

You're dealing with women who act in a very deceptive manner. She is not clear about her intentions, and she probably wants to maintain some plausible deniability in case she ends up going home with you. They just don't like admitting to themselves when they're behaving like sluts, so everything has to "just happen." If you're logically inclined, you might assume that X implies Y, but when you're dealing with women, then X can imply anything. This is because you're playing a game with incomplete information.

Note to fuming feminists: this is a concept from game theory. The upshot is simply that in a game of incomplete information you don't know about the payoff. Maybe it's zero, or negative, or positive. It could be anything. Again, dear feminists, "payoff" is a term used in game theory, so don't tell me I'm "objectifying women". However, since women do prefer playing a game of incomplete information, it seems quite obvious that they are in no position to "creep shame" some poor guy who just so happened that he wasn't able to read their mind. A woman who shows no interest could have been pining for your cock for months. You can't tell from her behavior. On the other hand, a woman in the club who acts as if she's ready to jump your bone could quickly turn a cold shoulder to you.

The solution would be so simple. I mean, if you go out you can clearly see that most guys aren't that intimidating, and they understand the meaning of "no". Women would just have to either "grow a pair" and not send indiscriminate signals, or, heaven forbid, dare to approach a guy they fancy. If this were more common, then they would probably learn that men don't think as highly of her than she's thinking of herself, and that many are not interested in hooking up with her. This is not the kind of game women would want to play, so they prefer a strategy of ambiguity if not deceit. Didn't approach her even though she showed "active disinterest" for an hour (in the club) or for weeks (at work or university)? It's all your fault! Approached her because she was behaving like a bitch in heat, but you didn't know that she only wanted to feed off your attention? Too bad, man! It has got to be all your fault. You probably recognize this pattern: no responsibility for women, and putting all the blame on men. It's a convenient world view. It's also a nonsensical one.

US Government: Time to punish the innocent

Robert O'Hara · 15 October 2013 · Archived copy · Original

As I just reported on the AVFM Newsfeed, there has been a disturbing twist to the controversy surrounding the Department of Justice's agreement with the University of Montana — known as the "Blueprint Letter." The university's president, Royce Engstrom, denied last Friday he had any knowledge of the requirement that the school must provide a list of faculty and students who did not attend special training classes on sexual harassment.

If Engstom did not know, it is not because the government did not make it threateningly clear.

The resolution reads like the formation of a target list:

> [T]he University will provide [the United States Government with] the date and duration of each student training session required by this Agreement; … and a list of any students who have yet to participate in the online or in-person training required by Section VIII.D.

The agreement has been criticized, and rightly so, for its broadening (yet again) of the definition for sexual harassment and its unmistakable contempt for due process. The agreement includes provisions for punishment even if no wrong doing has been demonstrated.

You heard that right. The United States government wants to insist that innocent people face punishment by university officials, many of whom have blatant ideological agendas that are hostile to men.

Says the government:

> "The University may also take appropriate action if it does not find discrimination or harassment that creates a hostile environment or results in a tangible employment or educational action, but (a) the University found that the respondent engaged in disruptive behavior or (b) to prevent the creation of a hostile environment."

"Set aside the illiteracy of that for a moment," said Michael Mayer, a history professor at University of Montana who spoke to the Montana Kaimin. "[W]hat they're saying is [that] you can be found innocent and still have an action brought against you … in some way suffer repercussions for being found innocent. "…that isn't really even the Soviet Union — it's just Orwellian."

It must have feminist ideologues in the throes of ecstasy.

According to Mayer the faculty was told that names were to be provided in order to "compile statistics" to prove the school was in compliance with the DOJ agreement.

Engstrom has pledged to make the agreement more palatable to faculty who are already complaining that they are afraid to share learning material or discuss issues that may potentially offend someone. He has also acknowledged that the main motivations for accommodating the DOJ was title IX money coming from the federal government.

Wives with whips

Robert St. Estephe · 15 October 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Robert St. Estephe–Gonzo Historian–is dedicated to uncovering the forgotten past of marginalizing men. "Gonzo journalism" is characterized as tending "to favor style over fact to achieve accuracy." Yet history – especially "social history" – is written by ideologues who distort and bury facts in order to achieve an agenda. "Gonzo" writing is seen as unorthodox and surprising. Yet, in the 21st century subjectivity, distortion and outright lying in non-fiction writing is the norm. Fraud is the new orthodoxy. Consequently, integrity is the new "transgressive."

Welcome to the disruptive world of facts, the world of Gonzo History.

Once upon a time there was an oppressive patriarchy. This nasty "archy" was, for members of the inherently non-violent sex, one huge day-in and day-out 24-hour living hell In this Great Age of the Oppression women were thwacked by husbands wielding sticks no wider than your thumb-drive. Police and courts (because laws were made by men only for the purpose of benefiting men) looked the other way. This Dictatorship of Male Privilege did not take domestic violence seriously and arrests were just never made. Phallocrats of the court treated domestic violence as a "private matter," and callously turned their black-robed backs on the victims (which of course were, by definition, women). Why? Because society found domestic violence to be socially acceptable behavior. On very rare occasions, in those scary olden times, a battered wife might hit back, but only, of course, as a last resort. Just like nowadays, these sorrowful, ill-clad, and over-worked damsels never ever would think of initiating violence (due to the self-evident fact they were members the non-violent sex).

Hey there, dear reader! — Do you realize how many billions of dollars, or pounds sterling, or francs (etc.) have been coerced from you in the form of taxes to pay the fraud purveyors who told you this lie — indoctrinating you from your infancy onwards and are still doing it? The financial cost as well as the social cost of fraudulent "gender studies" has been enormous and threatens to increase now that social engineering aims have replaced intellectual integrity. You are entitled to a big apology for the fraud and the slander and to a restoration of your stolen money and your stolen due process rights. Post-modernist jurisprudence — based on the principle of "guilty as falsely accused" — must be thrown into the trash, where it belongs.

Here we present an intriguing little sheaf of newspaper clippings which offers a hint at what the true history of domestic violence contains when it is not censored by tax-payer supported fraudsters from the "gender studies" industry. Among forgotten old news reports there are a lot of husband-beating cases to pick from, so what we offer here is a specialized selection — featuring stories of violence by wives whose weapon of choice was the whip, an implement always at hand in the days before the automobile.

FULL TEXT: James D. Cochrane, who has been on the staff of the Examiner and Chronicle, a religious publication, for many years, was severely horsewhipped at midnight on Friday by his wife. The assault took place in front of 100 Leonard-street, Brooklyn, Eastern District, in the presence of Miss Sadie Jacobs, a handsome young lady, who was the cause of the trouble. She resides at 100 Leonard-street and was on the way to her home with Mr. Cochrane on Friday night, when Mrs. Cochrane sprang from behind a tree and began to beat her husband about the head with a small whip. Miss Jacobs ran into the house, while Mr. Cochrane disappeared around the corner, and Mrs. Cochrane, overcome by excitement, went into hysterics. A gentleman who knew Mrs. Cochrane took her to her home, at 28 Broome-street.

Yesterday Mrs. Cochrane was very willing to talk to reporters. She said her husband had been too attentive to Miss Jacobs and for that reason she whipped him. He had not been home since the scene of Friday night, she said, and was not wanted there. Mrs. Cochrane declared that she would not apply for a divorce from her husband, with whom she had lived for 20 years.

Mr. Cochrane was found at Miss Jacobs's home, but he would not talk. Miss Jacobs said he had been a friend of her family for 10 years, and called as much to see her father as herself. She denied that Mrs. Cochrane had any cause for jealousy.

FULL TEXT: Henderson Cass, Lexington, Ky., aged 76 years, a veteran of the civil war, was horsewhipped in public by his wife by the order of Police Judge Riley. The woman had lodged a complaint against her husband, claiming that he was squandering his pension money and was drunk a great deal of the time. He was brought into court and told Judge Riley that he wanted to have a good time. The Chicago Chronicle correspondent says the judge asked the abused wife why she did not whip him, and she said she could do it all right if he said she might. Judge Riley replied:

"Well, I will get you a whip and see that you do it."

He told Patrol Driver Wallace to bring him a buggy whip, and, arming the woman with the whip, he told her to march her husband into the station-house lobby and lay it on him until she got tired. The woman did so.

The husband at first took the matter as a joke and laughed, but soon he began to realize, after the woman began laying on lick after lick with full force that she was in earnest and he begged her to stop. He promised to be sober and a good husband and she stopped.

FULL TEXT: Oakland. Jan. 22. – "Of course I horsewhipped my husband and I will do it again whenever I meet him if the law refuses to supply a whipping post to punish men who ill-treat their wives, the women must take the law into their own hands."

That was the startling manner in which Mrs. Emelie Bedot, her teeth clenched and her dark eyes snapping, admitted this afternoon that she had chastised her erring spouse in the public streets of Oakland. Mrs. Bedot thinks there is no disgrace attached to the publicity of the whipping, she is a wronged wife, she declares, and since the law will not avenge her wrongs she is privileged to seek her own method of punishment.

The whipping of Henri Bedot by his wife was the second instance of its kind in Oakland within twenty-four hours. Saturday night a woman supposed to be Mrs. Mallory horsewhipped a man who said his name was Schwartz in front of Fred Ohe's saloon at Fortieth street and Ban Pablo avenue.

This was followed last night at Twenty-Fourth street and Broadway by the whipping of Bedot by his wife. When seen at the home of a friend on Sycamore street, where she is staying temporarily, Mrs. Bedot to-day said:

I came with my husband from our farm in Glenn County two weeks ago. We quarreled at the farm over a servant girl that I think my husband was paying too much attention to although he declared that I was neglecting his meals. We went to San Francisco and took rooms on Third street, between Mission and Howard.

It was our idea in going to San Francisco to sell our property interests and separate. But my husband was reluctant, about coming to a settlement and I learned that he was spending his money on a woman who lived in Oakland. I followed him over here last night and saw him go into a house in Piedmont.

I am not familiar with the streets and don't know just where it was but I waited for him a couple of blocks away and when he alighted from a car to transfer at Twenty-fourth street and Broadway accented him. When he said it was none of my business what he was doing there I grabbed a whip from an express wagon and gave him a good thrashing.

I'll repeat the chastisement every time I meet him until he makes a settlement of our property interests and we are legally separated.

Our farm is worth about $15,000 and he has several thousand dollars in a bank at Willows. All I want is justice. I have no fear of arrest, as my husband would not dare to have things I know told in court.

NOTE: The following article describes Mrs. Irene Marsh's April 1906 attack on her husband, but Mrs. Marsh was a well-document violent woman. On August 13, 1902 she fired four shots at Alice Murray, and on January 29, 1907, again tried to kill her, firing three shots and wounded a male bystander, Hugo Carr.

FULL TEXT: San Francisco, Apr. 9 – A feature not down on the program occurred at the Orpheum Theater in this city last night. The performance had hardly started when a woman entered the theater and made her way down the center aisle, carrying a riding whip. Suddenly she produced the dainty lash, and without a word of warning brought it down vigorously on the shoulders and across the face of John W. Marsh. He fled with all the alacrity at his command, and the irate woman turned her attention to the young damsel who occupied the adjoining seat. The whip descended upon the latter and the angered madam followed the man up the aisle. At the door both were requested to step outside which they did. The woman with the whip was Mrs. Alice Murray, upon whom he has lavished his affections.

?• 1908 – Christian

FULL TEXT: Berkeley, March 3.—"You will steal my money, will you?" shouted Mrs. M. D. Christian, wife of a salesman for the Eilers music company, living at 2142 Sutter street, San Francisco, as she took a horsewhip from the folds of her skirts and showered blows on the head and shoulders of her husband, who, was standing talking with Otto Putzker, an automobile dealer, in front of the police station at 3 o'clock this afternoon. Christian, putting up his hands to protect his face, ran into Putzker's store at Shattuck, avenue and Allston way, crying with pain. Bystanders, seized the whip from Mrs. Christian, and she and her husband were placed under arrest.

Christian, who has been a salesman for the Eilers company, recently was transferred to the Berkeley office. He was engaged in conversation with Putsker in front of the town hall at Shattuck avenue and Allston way at 3 o'clock, this afternoon trying to sell him a piano. He mentioned, in passing, that he was in financial difficulties and expected trouble with a woman.

"Without warning Mrs. Christian, who had come toward her husband from behind the two men, was seen by bystanders to take a small blacksnake from the folds of her skirts and belabor the shoulders of her husband.

"You will steal my money, will you?" she shouted at the top of her voice as she vigorously applied the whip on the head, shoulders and back of Christian.

She continued to strike him until Otto Putzker seized the whip and allowed Christian the opportunity to escape to the back of Putaker's store, which is next to the town hall.

Aroused by the disturbance, Policeman J T. Jones rushed out of the police station and placed the couple under arrest and booked them on charges of disturbing the peace. They were released later on the payment of $10 bail each.

Neither would be interviewed at the police station, although Mrs. Christian volunteered the information that her husband was about to leave her and make her pay a number of bills which he had contracted. She admitted that they had frequently quarreled and that she came to Berkeley for the express purpose of horsewhipping him.

FULL TEXT (Article 1 of 2): White Plains, N. Y., Sept. 20. – Mrs. Nellie Eickenhorst, 42 years old, of 145 West Lincoln Avenue, Mount Vernon, took the law into her own hands this morning, and horsewhipped her husband, Frank, 40 years old, in an effort, she said, to make him awaken to a sense of his responsibility toward her. The whipping occurred when she met him in front of Police Headquarters.

A charge of abandonment preferred against Eickenhorst by his wife was dismissed by City Judge Bernstein in Special Sessions Court this morning when Mrs. Eickenhorst admitted that their husband was living at her home. He would not work and support her, she said, and she had been compelled to work as a saleswoman.

Following the dismissal of the charge, Mrs. Eickenhorst went to a hardware store where she purchased a three-foot whip. With this she slashed her husband about the face and body when she met him in Valentine street. Policeman Charles Roehl ran from headquarters and warned the woman to stop. She continued to beat her husband, and finally struck him in the face partly blinding him.

By this time a crowd had gathered, by the sight and by the cries of Eickenhorst, who endeavored to protect himself from his wife's blows by covering his head with his arms as he lay on the ground before her. Mrs. Eickenhorst was persuaded to stop and surrendered her whip, after which she was arrested on a charge of disorderly conduct. She was released in bonds of $250 for hearing tomorrow morning.

FULL TEXT (Article 2 of 2): White Plains, N. Y., Sept. 21 – City Judge Jacob Bernstein gave a suspended sentence this morning to Mrs. Nellie Eickenhorst, 42 years old, in front of Police Headquarters yesterday morning.

Mrs. Eickenhorst was warned by Judge Bernstein that her activity with a whip must cease.

The whipping followed the dismissal in court yesterday of a charge of abandonment brought by Mrs. Eickenhorst against her husband. she had admitted that he was living with her but asserted she was forced to support herself and that Eickenhorst sat around the house all day. When the case was dismissed she appeared upset and left the court room, going to a nearby store where she bought a very heavy dog whip.

Meeting her husband she warned him that although he might escape punishment in court he would suffer at her hands and lashed him about the face and body.

Mrs. Eickenhorst appeared penitent this morning in court. Eickenhorst said he was not anxious to press a charge against his wife.

In the following case there is no whip involved. By 1937, at least in New York City, whips were obsolete. But Mrs. Seymour was adaptive; she used a dog leash with which to attacker her husband instead.

FULL TEXT (Article 1 of 2): Mrs. Tuppie Seymour (above) whipped her husband with a dog leash when she saw a pretty blonde sitting near him in a fashionable New York restaurant. She was booked on a disorderly charge – and her husband posted bail for her. The café manager said a table was upset and expensive dishes broken. FULL TEXT (Article 2 of 2): Spring being what it is, for "sentimental reasons" charges of disorderly conduct were withdrawn yesterday against Mrs. Tuppie Seymour, who achieved a certain fame by dog-whipping her husband in a fashionable restaurant.

The charges were withdrawn in Jefferson Market Court, where Mrs. Seymour, 37, of 75 E. 55th Street, was arraigned with her sisters, Mrs. Edith McNab, 55, of 320 E. 57th Street, and Mrs. Robert Adams, 47, of 435 Park Avenue. The elder sisters stood grimly by as Mrs. Seymour flogged her husband William R. Seymour Saturday night after finding him with a blonde in La Rue's at 45 E. 58th Street.

"The case has been closed for sentimental reasons," said Sanford H. Cohen, counsel for Peter Ogiletti, manager of the restaurant. "It might have interfered with the relations of husband and wife and caused friction."

Said Mrs. Adams, "Finis la guerre. Everything is lovely at home."

My name is Alison and I am a survivor of rape hysteria

Alison Tieman (Typhonblue) · 16 October 2013 · Archived copy · Original

What makes rape a special kind of violence? It's not the physical damage, which can be very minimal; it's the emotional damage, which can be catastrophic.

Rape makes you afraid; it taints your trust in the world and twists how you see it. It drives you into a prison of fear.

But all other violence does that as well. What's truly special about rape is simple. It takes a bludgeon to your ability to bond with others in the most intimate way.

Rape robs you of your ability to see innocence.

"Get rid of men and you get rid of rape."

The sexual exploitation of women by men is the greatest taboo in our society; there is nothing more stigmatized than being a rapist of women. Rape is a call to action; today it's dressed up in new terms but it still harkens back to that primitive urge to protect female sexuality from foreign interlopers. Modern gynocentrists did not invent rape hysteria; they inherited it and they are using it the way everyone throughout history has—as a tool to grind away at things they don't like.

For the woman on the street, rape hysteria is shoved down her throat over and over till she vomits it up without thinking, all over herself and her life. It seeps into every interaction, every step she takes into the outer world. 'Is this man going to rape me? All men are guilty! I'm never safe and it's their fault!'

That's where rape hysteria wants all women to be. Frightened, helpless… impotent. Calling upon a higher authority to save them. And, of course, robbing the men around them of their innocence.

"All men are responsible for rape culture."

But rape isn't something that happens to women; it isn't something done to women by men. It's a human problem and it's a human problem that does not know gender. More men are raped in prison a year than women in the general population. More boys in juvenile facilities are raped than girls. And they are raped by women. There are surveys that show just as many men are raped in romantic relationships—date-raped—as women.

That leaves stranger rape; 26% of all non-institutional rape. It may well be that most stranger-rapists are men; but it does not follow that a vast majority of their victims are women. An argument can be made that men under-report; and studies have shown that rapists who are heterosexual in their consenting relationships will rape based on vulnerability not sex.

Statically women are not more vulnerable to rape.

And there is something else; in reading about the victimization of men by women, another story emerges.

Female potency.

Male victims, teens and adults, are changed by having been raped by a woman—they are suicidal, addicted, dysfunctional, unhinged, helpless, hurting. In the background of many male rapists of adult women is sexual abuse done to them by women. The vagina employed as a weapon can carve and twist a man so badly he defies society's most fundamental taboo—male on female rape.

The vagina is a weapon every bit as potent as a penis.

It can steal innocence.

"All sex is rape."

A child does not see innocence. To a child the world is good and bad; the good pleases the child, the bad displeases her. The world is made of good and bad people. Good people benefit the child; bad people do not.

Innocence, to a child, if it is seen is seen as weakness and a threat. Someone else's weakness threatens the child's absolute claim to the attention and effort of adults. In the child's calculus need equals worth and other's needs lessen the child's worth. The only eyes that can see innocence are those that know they can take it away. Or protect it.

Innocence is inspiration. A call to protect and provide, to be strong. It may be passive but it is powerful. It's why someone will brave flames—literal or metaphorical—to save another. Like children, many women expect men to fill them with passion. But passion only exists in those who can bear the sight of innocence.

"The personal is political."

Before I started to read about men's rights I was, like every other woman, bound by rape hysteria. Men in my eyes bore their burden of guilt and I, in turn, bore my burden of fear.

But I was lucky.

I stumbled upon the men's rights movement and saw things—statistics, studies—they pulled up from the depths of our society's subconscious—things that would silently slip down into the deep if it weren't for them.

All the evidence I've seen against rape hysteria is not good enough for those who profit from keeping women in a prison of fear; but it's good enough for me to question my obligation to stay.

I realized women have sexual potency. And if women are equally responsible for rape, then they have an equal responsibility to be responsible. Because women can take away men's—and boy's—innocence. There was no need for men to carry a burden of guilt; nor was there a need for me to carry a burden of fear.

A weight lifted from me in that moment; a weight I never knew I carried till it was gone.

Before I had always seen my husband—and every other man—as either a good man or a bad man; but never innocent. His actions were always deliberate, if he did me harm he was a villain with the blackest heart; if he did me good, he was a knight-in-shining armor.

After, he became innocent.

"The fear of rape limits women's potential."

Women infected by rape hysteria will meet bad men, creepy men, evil men. And they'll meet good men, real men, strong men.

But they will never meet an innocent man.

They are poorer for it.

My name is Alison and I am a survivor of rape hysteria.

It's day 16 of Domestic Violence Awareness Month for Men and Boys, the invisible victims of domestic violence. Today's In His Own Voice combines the usual physical, verbal and emotional abuse with a special subset of Crazy — animal hoarding.

Animal hoarding is not only abusive to other family members, it is abusive to the animals. "Heart Broken Geek" has put up with a lot of abuse and horseshit during his marriage. Figuratively and literally.

> Animal Hoarders Edition
> My soon to be ex-wife and I were together for 12 years, 9 of them married. We have two beautiful children. I adopted my stepson three years ago when he was 12.
> Before I finally left, we tried talking things through. For the first time in our marriage, I didn't give in. It didn't matter though. She refused to stop with the animal stuff. She boards horses, owns horses and runs a horse rescue. On top of that, she has goats, chickens, dogs, cats and the occasional cow.
> If you were to hear my ex talk, I "all of a sudden pulled the rug out from under her" in June 2012 when I sat her down and told her how unhappy I was and that I'd probably be leaving. This was not all of a sudden. In reality, I had been trying to get her attention every way I could since 2006, maybe earlier.
> Everything was "fine" for us, as long as I suffered in silence. However, anytime I voiced a concern, she would go off the deep end and it would be my fault.
> I was tired of our bank accounts being $700 overdrawn and getting blamed for it. I gave her 100% of my paycheck and only took $40/week for lunch and gas money while we were together. I was tired of her horses being fed while we struggled to feed the family.
>
> I was tired of the stalls being immaculate while the house was a pigsty. She is content to live in filth. If I didn't clean the house, it didn't get done. Unless we had company coming over, then she would flip out and scream at everyone.
>
> But most of all, I was tired of being alone. Always.
> She claimed she was home "90% of the time." While that was true, she was either at the barn for 4-5 hours a night or on the computer looking at rescue horses, emailing, buying, selling or texting about horses.
> If you've ever watched an episode of Hoarders, you've seen the anger when the hoarder is confronted with their behavior. My ex has the same attitude. Whenever I tried to talk to her about her out of control animal rescue, I got "How DARE you question why I do this! It isn't MY problem, it's YOUR problem!"
>
> Two winters ago, I had acute bronchitis and needed medicine badly. She told me we had no money for it. I told myself, fine, I'll man up since the family is broke and go without medication. That same night, while I'm wheezing and coughing, she bought an $80 fake horsetail for one of her horses to wear to a show because the horse "needed it."
> Another time, I was so sick I couldn't drive myself to the doctor's office and asked if she could take me. She said she couldn't miss work. Her horse got a sick stomach later that night and she took the next 3 days off work to care for it.
> In March 2012 she told me, "I need to cancel the cable, so we can get caught up on bills." At first, the child in me screamed, "Fuck that! All I have in this house is my chair, the TV and my Xbox!" The adult in me said, "Ok, man up, you have bills and she said she'll have it turned back on in August."

Two weeks later, I went to the barn and the Port-a-John was still there from the barn fire the week before. I asked, "When does that have to be back?" She ignored me. Her friend, who obviously didn't realize I wasn't supposed to know answered, "They come and empty it twice a week."

I asked, "Why would they do that? Why wouldn't they just take it back?" Her friend replied, "For $80 a month, it's the least they could do." I looked at my wife and said, "You cancelled my cable, so you could have a crapper at the barn?" Her attitude was once again, "How DARE you question me?"

She also boards dogs, even though they destroy our property. For example, two years ago she called me at work and asked, "What's a good way to cheer up Daughter?" I asked what happened to upset Daughter. My wife informed me that the three Jack Russell terriers she was boarding had killed our daughter's kitten in front of her. I raised my voice, which I try not to do, and asked, "Are you fucking kidding me?!"

My wife was silent and then said, "I don't see how raising your voice will help."I took a deep breath and said, "I'm sorry, I just don't understand why you keep bringing in animals to do this to our family." More silence and then she yelled, "You need to call a lawyer because I'm sick of this shit!"

Three hours later, she calls again, "What can we do to cheer up Daughter?" I was taken aback. " I buy her a dozen roses or carnations once or twice a year, it makes her happy." When my wife got home that night she gave our daughter the flowers and said, "Mommy was thinking about you."

One time when we were arguing about the marriage and separating, she started to sob and rock back and forth like a child. Then she started clicking her fingers together in the air and her eyes rolled back a little. I told her I was terrified of her and that this (I pointed to what she was doing) is not how an adult discusses things. "This shit is creeping me out," I told her. She accused me of being a heartless, horrible man and a freeloader (she earns more than twice what I do, but takes the bulk of my pay to pay household bills and spends the bulk of her earnings on animals.)

At one point, the bank threatened to foreclose on our home. That didn't stop her from buying two more horses and retaining a lawyer to sue some other idiot over horse related crap (breach of contract).

Before I was diagnosed with Sleep Apnea, I slept a lot, but it wasn't restorative sleep. One day, I came home after work and laid down on the bed. She woke me up by raining blows down on me and screaming, "You're not a man! You're no kind of man!"

That's not the only time she's hit me. She's also told me I'm a horrible provider, a horrible dad – usually when she was frustrated or not getting her way. Later, when I would mention how hurtful her behavior was, she'd deny doing and saying these things or I'd get some version of, "I was in a bad mood" or "I was really upset." As if being "really upset" makes hitting your spouse or saying nasty, cruel things to your spouse ok. It doesn't.

We attended a few couples therapy sessions toward the end. The therapist told my wife (after listening to me) that I felt discounted, unloved and ignored. During this session, I told her I would no longer support her crazy horse antics. The therapist suggested my wife spend less time on the horses and more time on the marriage.

The day after our session, what did my wife do? She brought a pony into our house and gave it a bath in the family shower where, of course, it shit all over, tore up the place, etc. When I reminded her this was not what we agreed to in therapy, she told me I was a selfish dick. The horse had a photo shoot the next day for one of her horse rescue projects and it needed a bath, biohazard and property damage be damned.

Every single time our relationship has been on the ropes, "we" fixed it. And by "we" I mean I had to keep my mouth shut and just accept that's how she was. She never changed a damn thing. Of course, when I mentioned this to her once, she just started at me blankly, like a dog does when you try to discuss philosophy with it.

She's told mutual friends in front of me that she "resents being married and having kids" and that she "never got to be single." Well, she's about to get her chance.

My weakness was/is I hate to see her cry. It tears me up inside and breaks my heart. We cannot, nor could we ever, have a rational adult conversation. As soon as I expressed unhappiness about anything, she exploded into tears. I now believe her tears were nothing more than a manipulation.

Toward the end, she asked what I wanted from her. I said, "No more animals. Enough!!!" That weekend she decided to board 3 dogs, rescue 5 bottle-fed kittens with diseases and bought two new ponies.

We decided to stick it out through the holidays for the kids. For the ensuing 6 months, every day of my life was a 16-hour argument. She started texting at 7:30AM and kept going until bedtime. I now wonder if she ever really loved me, but rather took pity on me and "settled."

After I told her I'd had enough in June 2012, she posted an ad on Craigslist looking for male "insight" into our situation. Why see a therapist when there are plenty of well-meaning men on Craigslist, right?

The funny thing is, even though I know divorce is for the best, I still feel guilty about putting my happiness and safety first. I am also very worried about our kids. I feel empty and any energy I have is just going towards surviving and getting through the day. I still feel like the bad guy she makes me out to be, and like I am being too hard on her. My rational brain knows this is ridiculous. I can see now how my mom groomed me to put up with my wife and her horseshit – literally.

My mom was . . . not normal. I often wonder if the extremity of my mother's abuse makes my wife's abuse seem like "no big deal" in comparison. My mother beat my brother, our father and me with everything from fists to ladles to boots to brooms to baseball bats. She put cocked guns to my head and put lit cigarettes out on me. Her father was an abusive alcoholic, so by my mom's definition, since she didn't drink, she was a way better parent.

I know I am a codependent. I learned how to entertain mom in order to keep her calm or diffuse her anger. My mom used to go on beating frenzies and actually beat some of my friends, too. I stopped playing little league sports because I got tired of looking at the bench and seeing her rolling in the dirt with some other parent.

She once punched out my third grade teacher in the middle of class. The teacher wanted a conference to discuss my poor penmanship. My mom worked second shift at the time. Instead of scheduling an appointment with my teacher, she took off work and came to the school unscheduled.

She walked in and said, "I'm here for my conference." The teacher said she needed to schedule one. My mom replied, "You wanted a conference, here's your conference" and punched her in the face, over her desk. This was in the middle of the school day. It was humiliating.

I don't know how my mom was never arrested. I honestly think she had the whole small town bullied. She even threatened the goddamned mayor once and nothing happened.

I remember in 6th grade I got an "F" in Math. At the Parent/teacher conference, my mom took one look at my grade and backhanded me over my chair, busting my nose. I still kinda laugh at the teacher's expression, who had no idea what to do and started apologizing for giving me the "F," even though I deserved it. No one really knows what to do when confronted by "crazy." I think it makes sane people recoil and go some place in their minds until it's over.

When I was 19, my mom was snooping through my stuff, which she did on a regular basis, and found the receipt for the engagement ring I bought my then girlfriend (not the horse lady). My mom swore up and down that I bought this $100 ring because my girlfriend and her mom coerced me and wanted to steal my credit. She then beat me with a baseball bat and tossed me out into the mud. That was the day I left my mom's house.

> It has been over a year since I moved out of the house I shared with my wife and our children. In that time, she has made numerous threats and has been trying to alienate our kids, but not with much success. She is now targeting the kids, even going so far as to assault our son, and is using them as unpaid farm hands.
> She has also moved in one of her Craigslist men. This guy has a rap sheet and has been inappropriate with my kids (tickling our 12-year old daughter even after she asked him to stop and using corporal punishment on our 15-year old son). I expressed my concerns to my ex. She went into one of her rage episodes and made threats. Then she and this dirtbag retaliated by lying to my boss (about something that was very easy to disprove) in an attempt to get me fired. It didn't work.
> I reported these incidents to CPS. They wouldn't open a case, stating there wasn't enough evidence — even with this guy's rap sheet. My attorney looked into getting a protective order, but our county is in the Dark Ages when it comes to female abusers — even when they're endangering and abusing their kids.
> I have recently ended contact with my mother, who, despite her advanced age is still a horribly toxic and abusive woman. I know I have made the right decision and am slowly healing, bit-by-bit. But there are days when I am still overwhelmed with feelings of guilt, and still take on more than my share of blame. I still struggle with anxiety, panic and depression. I don't know if it will ever end.
>
> Right now though, my priority is taking care of my kids and making sure they're safe. We haven't been to court yet, so the future is uncertain.

Men's suicidal life

Tom Golden · 16 October 2013 · Archived copy · Original

This video offers a great description of a basic thread of the MHRM and it does so in a very polished, eye catching and professional manner. We have numerous youtube channels such as my own that have been doing videos on men's issues for some time but this one stands out as being remarkably…well, you watch it and add your own adjectives. I think it is perfect to send to people who are completely unaware of men's issues in any way.

If they have an ounce of compassion they will be moved by what they see.

The vidoeographer of this wonderful piece is a man from India named Jerald Santhosh. He works in motiongraphics, kinetic typography, and does posters, artwork and more. He is a part of the men's movement in India and we welcome him to AVFM. He is planning to open a web site and to do more videos so stay tuned and please do subscribe to his Youtube channel after you watch the video. –TG

Transcript of video:
Married men commit suicide at a higher rate in our society.
A married man lives his life supporting his wife and children.
When he faces abuse, we as society are indifferent to him.
A man is severely assaulted by his wife or girlfriend every 14.6 seconds.
When a man is battered by his spouse there is no shelter which would take him.
The government which should protect him, will imprison him even if he is falsely accused by his wife.
He will lose his job, and will be subjected to social shame.
Family courts incentivises his abuser by extorting money from him.
Divorce alienates him from his children, takes away his house, and his money. A man who has lost his children, house, and social image receives no help from the same government which he pays tax to.
All this helplessness leads to drug and alcohol abuse which also makes him depressed and suicidal.
This is a global phenomenon.Lists of various suicide statistics per year of men, which far exceeds women's rates:

- America 24,672 – 5950
- India 63,343 – 31,921
- Canada 2,989 – 901
- Australia 1,727 – 546
- UK 4,552 – 1,493
- Russia 35,608 – 7,247
- Lithuania 952 – 186

So many men are killing themselves every year..

What are we doing about it?

AVFM on 20/20 update

Paul Elam · 16 October 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Many of you thought that ABC News 20/20 had decided to drop the story they had started producing on AVFM. I was right there with you. After the time I expected the show to air had passed by several weeks, I figured they had dumped the idea.

However, show producer Steven Schnee phoned me yesterday saying he wanted to send a camera crew to my home to get some more footage, and that they were aiming to air the episode this Friday.

He said they wanted to get material that would show me in a more "human" light.

Uh, yeah.

In for a dime, in for a dollar, I agreed and their two man crew (very nice fellows) came in this morning and spent two and a half hours filming me doing very important stuff like making coffee and looking contemplatively out the window.

Oh, and typing. Lots of typing.

My take on this? Well, considering that this is clearly going to be a hit piece, I am assuming the storyline will be something like the following.

Here is a seemingly average man in Texas, living in an average home in an average neighborhood, making an average cup of coffee and sitting on his average sofa.

(Cut to shot of me looking contemplatively out the window as the music gets more intense)

Fade to black.

Then, there I am again, typing at the keyboard, smoke lifting up from the keys and horns sprouting out of my head. Screams of women in the background as a demonic fiddle wails away.

Narrator: BUT…JUST…HOW…AVERAGE…IS…HE?

Dun-dun-dun-duuuuuun!

OK, may not so melodramatic, but you get this gist.

And to be fair, I have no way of knowing exactly what 20/20 is up to. There are only a handful of certainties that I can refer to in playing what is admittedly a guessing game.

One, Elizabeth Vargas, when she interviewed me in New York, was overtly hostile. She avoided the issues doggedly, quoted me out of context repeatedly and indeed insisted that she was the arbiter of whether my satire was satire, even the satire that I took the unusual step of informing readers was satire when I wrote it.

Schnee also engaged Editor-in-Chief John Hembling in a phone interview. Four of our female writers were brought in to that call, and Schnee refused to even acknowledge their questions about why 20/20 was not interested in the opinions of women who write for the site.

And then there were the follow up questions emailed me today by 20/20 production assistant Alyssa Pry, mostly having to do with site finances and wanting employment particulars on my girlfriend.

I will spare you the almost obligatory pun.

To size it up, 20/20, while they might still surprise, probably won't surprise. At any rate, we may find out Friday, if they actually air the show.

Why they have delayed so long is also a matter of conjecture. My guess is that they were waiting for the Newsweek piece on the MHRM to come out so the two stories would have media synergy.

As it turns out, and just by circumstance I am sure, the Newsweek story, which I had also assumed at one point to be dead, is going to come out relatively soon I am told. The story on it is less complex.

Soon after the story was written, Newsweek was bought out in a deal that severed it completely from its former online counterpart, The Daily Beast. That left the actual ownership of the piece on the MHRM in question. That apparently is getting resolved, and it will run on one, but not both, of those outlets in the not too distant future. I am betting within scant days of the airing of the 20/20 piece or vice versa.

Purely by coincidence, mind you.

Stay tuned folks. It looks like things are about to get a little more interesting around here. Then again, maybe not. In a way, it is just business as usual. Someone in the media chants:

Racist! Sexist! Anti-gay! MRA go away!

Of course they say this while ignoring all the women and gay men that support and write for this site.

Then they add that we eat kittens, push people in wheelchairs into traffic, beat up old ladies and take their food money and generally promote evil across the planet.

In doing so, they send people to the site, some of whom figure out rather quickly they have been duped, and we get a little bigger. The only difference this time is that the scale is a little larger.

Addendum: Well, it is on. Here is the ABC Promo.

The spirit of chivalry (1818)

Peter Wright · 16 October 2013 · Archived copy · Original

The following description of gynocentric chivalry is from Sir Walter Scott's 1818 piece in Essays on Chivalry, Romance, and the Drama. As you read Scott's words you will begin to see how chivalry serves as the mainstay of both traditionalism and feminism – the factor that makes them both possible. Modern feminists claim to have rejected some chivalric customs such as opening car doors or giving up a seat on a bus for women, however they continue to rely on 'the spirit of chivalry' to institute new privileges for women: opening car doors has transformed into opening doors into university and employment via affirmative action (ie. same chivalry different doors); and giving up seats on busses has transformed into giving up seats in boardrooms and political parties via quotas (ie. same chivalry different seats). Despite the differing privileges sought for women, traditionalists and feminists share a dream of entitled women; traditionalists seek to maintain conventional entitlements for women, while feminists work to extend the range of women's entitlements. The description by Scott below details the permissive force that makes all this entitlement possible. PW.

The main ingredient in the spirit of Chivalry, second in force only to the religious zeal of its professors, and frequently predominating over it, was a devotion to the female sex, and particularly to her whom each knight selected as the chief object of his affection, of a nature so extravagant and unbounded as to approach to a sort of idolatry. The original source of this sentiment is to be found, like that of Chivalry itself, in the Customs and habits of the northern tribes who possessed, even in their rudest state, so many honourable and manly distinctions, over all the other nations in the same stage of society. The chaste and temperate habits of these youth, and the opinion that it was dishonourable to hold sexual intercourse until the twentieth year was attained, was in the highest degree favourable not only to the morals and health of the ancient Germans, but must have contributed greatly to place their females in that dignified and respectable rank which they held in society.

Amid the various duties of knighthood, that of protecting the female sex, respecting their persons, and redressing their wrongs, becoming the champion of their cause, and the chastiser of those by whom they were injured, was represented as one of the principal objects of the institution. Their oath bound the new-made knights to defend the cause of all women without exception ; and the most pressing way of conjuring them to grant a boon was to implore it in the name of God and the ladies. The cause of a distressed lady was, in many instances, preferable to that even of the country to which the knight belonged. Thus, the Captal de Buche, though an English subject, did not hesitate to unite his troops with those of the Comte de Foix, to relieve the ladies in a French town, where they were besieged and threatened with violence by the insurgent peasantry. The looks, the words, the sign of a lady, were accounted to- make knights at time of need perform double their usual deeds of strength and valour. At tournaments and in combats, the voices of the ladies were heard like those of the German females in former battles, calling on the knights to remember their fame, and exert themselves to the uttermost. "Think, gentle knights," was their cry, "upon the wool of your breasts, the nerve of your arms, the love you cherish in your hearts, and do valiantly for ladies behold you." The corresponding shouts of the combatants were, "Love of ladies! Death of warriors! On, valiant knights, for you fight under fair eyes? Where the honour or love of a lady was at stake, the fairest prize was held out to the victorious knight, and champion from every quarter were sure to hasten to combat in a cause so popular. Chaucer, when he describes the assembly of the knights who came with Arcite and Palemon to fight for the love of the fair Emilie, describes the manners of his age in the following lines;

"For every knight that loved chivalry,
And would his thankes have a passant name,
Hath pray'd that he might ben of that game,
And well was him that thereto chusen was.
For if there fell to-morrow such a case,
Ye knowen well that every lusty knight
That loveth par amour, and hath his might,
Were it in Engellande, or elleswhere,
They wold hir thanked willen to be there.
To fight for a lady! Ah! Benedicite,
It were a lusty sight for to see."

It is needless to multiply quotations on a subject so trite and well known. The defence of the female sex in general, the regard due to their honour, the subservience paid to their commands, the reverent awe and courtesy, which, in their presence, forbear all unseemly words and actions, were so blended with the institution of Chivalry as to form its very essence. But it was not enough that the "very perfect, gentle knight," should reverence the fair sex in general. It was essential to his character that he should select, as his proper choice, "a lady and a love," to be the polar star of his thoughts, the mistress of his affections, and the directress of his actions. In her service, he was to observe the duties of loyalty, faith, secrecy, and reverence. Without such an empress of his heart, a knight, in the phrase of the times, was a ship without a rudder, a horse without a bridle, a sword without a hilt ; a being, in short, devoid of that ruling guidance and intelligence, which ought to inspire his bravery, and direct his actions. The least dishonest thought or action was, according to her doctrine, sufficient to forfeit the chivalrous lover the favour of his lady. It seems, however, that the greater part of her charge concerning incontinence is levelled against such as haunted the receptacles of open vice ; and that she reserved an exception (of which, in the course of the history, she made liberal use) in favour of the intercourse which, in all love, honour, and secrecy, might take place, when the favoured and faithful knight had obtained, by long service, the boon of amorous mercy from the lady whom he loved par amours.

In these extracts are painted the actual manners of the age of Chivalry. The necessity of the perfect knight having a mistress, whom he loved par amours, the duty of dedicating his time to obey her commands, however capricious, and his strength to execute extravagant feats of valour, which might redound to her praise, –for all that was done for her sake, and under her auspices, was counted her merit, as the victories of their generals were ascribed to the Roman Emperors— was not a whit less necessary to complete the character of a good knight.

On such occasions, the favoured knight, as he wore the colours and badge of the lady of his affections, usually exerted his ingenuity in inventing some device or cognisance which might express their love, either openly, as boasting of it in the eye of the world, or in such mysterious mode of indication as should only be understood by the beloved person if circumstances did not permit an avowal of his passion. The ladies, bound as they were in honour to requite the passion of their knights, were wont, on such occasions, to dignify them by the present of a scarf, ribbon, or glove, which was to be worn in the press of battle and tournament. These marks of favour they displayed on their helmets, and they were accounted the best incentives to deeds of valour. The custom appears to have prevailed in France to a late period, though polluted with the grossness so often mixed with the affected refinement and gallantry of that nation. Sometimes the ladies, in conferring these tokens of their favour, saddled the knights with the most extravagant and severe conditions. But the lover had his advantage in such cases, that if he ventured to vencounter the hazard imposed, and chanced to survive it, he had, according to the fashion of the age, the right of exacting, from the lady, favours corresponding in importance. The annals of Chivalry abound with stories of cruel and cold fair ones, who subjected their lovers to extremes of danger, in hopes that they might get rid of their addresses, but were, upon their unexpected success, caught in their own snare, and, as ladies who would not have their name made the theme of reproach by every minstrel, were compelled to recompense the deeds which their champion had achieved in their name.

There are instances in which the lover used his right of reprisals with some rigour, as in the well-known fabliau of the three knights and the shift; in which a lady proposes to her three lovers, successively, the task of entering, unarmed, into the mêlée of a tournament, arrayed only in one of her shift. The perilous proposal is declined by two of the knights and accepted by the third, who thrusts himself, in the unprotected state required, into all the hazards of the tournament, sustains many wounds, and carries off the prize of the day. On the next day the husband of the lady (for she was married) was to give a superb banquet to the knights and nobles who had attended the tourney. The wounded victor sends the shift back to its owner, with his request, that she would wear it over her rich dress on this solemn occasion, soiled and torn as it was, and stained all over with the blood of its late wearer. The lady did not hesitate to comply, declaring, that she regarded this shift, stained with the blood of her "fair friend, as more precious than if it were of the most costly materials." Jaques de Basin, the minstrel who relates this curious tale, is at a loss to say whether the palm of true love should be given to the knight or to the lady on this remarkable occasion. The husband, he assures us, had the good sense to seem to perceive nothing uncommon in the singular vestment with which his lady was attired, and the rest of the good company highly admired her courageous requital of the knight's gallantry.

It was the especial pride of each distinguished champion, to maintain, against all others, the superior worth, beauty, and accomplishments of his lady; to bear her picture from court to court, and support, with lance and sword, her superiority to all other dames, abroad or at home. To break a spear for the love of their ladies, was a challenge courteously given, and gently accepted, among all true followers of Chivalry, and history and romance are alike filled with the tilts and tournaments which took place upon this argument, which was ever ready and ever acceptable. Indeed, whatever the subject of the tournament had been, the lists were never closed until a solemn course had been made in honour of the ladies. There were knights yet more adventurous, who sought to distinguish themselves by singular and uncommon feats of arms in honour of their mistresses; and such was usually the cause of the whimsical and extravagant vows of arms which we have subsequently to notice. To combat against extravagant odds, to fight amid the press of armed knights without some essential part of their armour, to do some deed of audacious valour in face of friend and foe, were the services by which the knights strove to recommend themselves, or which their mistresses (very justly so called) imposed on them as proofs of their affection.

Sometimes the patience of the lover was worn out by the cold-hearted vanity which thrust him on such perilous enterprises. At the court of one of the German emperors, while some ladies and gallants of the court were looking into a den where two lions were confined, one of them purposely let her glove fall within the palisade which enclosed the animals, and commanded her lover, as a true knight, to fetch it out to her. He did not hesitate to obey, jumped over the enclosure ; threw his mantle towards the animals as they sprung at him; snatched up the glove, and regained the outside of the palisade. But when in safety, he proclaimed aloud, that what he had achieved was done for the sake of his own reputation, and not for that of a false lady, who could, for her sport and cold-blooded vanity, force a brave man on a duel so desperate. And, with the applause of all that were present, renounced her love for ever. This, however, was an uncommon circumstance. In general, the lady was supposed to have her lover's character as much at heart as her own, and to mean by pushing him upon enterprises of hazard give him an opportunity of meriting her good graces, which she could not with honour confer upon one undistinguished by deeds of chivalry.

Outrageous misogyny against poor innocent grrl!

Bret Vanders · 16 October 2013 · Archived copy · Original

A horrible rape-culture embracing man in this video humiliates a girl by suggesting she is influenced by his wealth. As any right-thinking person knows, real womyn don't think or act this way, this is the old Straw Feminist cliche, and any suggestion otherwise is a blatant example of the rampant cultural misogyny of our times! http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=n_v_wOxfyI0

What's that sound I hear? You're laughing? Stop laughing! There is nothing funny here! This man victimized this poor girl who was only showing her open-mindedness. He tricked her! Trickery is misogyny!

Grow up you louts!

NCIS Pauley Perrette's pals: Daniel Luis Rivas

Suzanne McCarley · 16 October 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Come on over and have a seat; I have another story to tell. Scoot a little closer so I can whisper, because I think this one's supposed to be a secret. Of course it's been documented in the public record so it's hardly a well-kept secret, but I suspect its principals are still hoping nobody will pay attention.

Heh, heh, heh. What's a little more drama in the life of a Star Crazy star?

Remember when we first started writing articles about Pauley Perrette's penchant for restraining order abuse? This article by Paul Elam:

http://www.avoiceformen.com/misandry/star-crazy-the-dark-side-of-pauley-perrette/

…included links to a handful of court declarations written and signed by people who knew our dear Pauley quite well. If you didn't read or don't quite remember them, don't feel bad; I'll be quoting a couple of them at length.

As I mentioned in my last article, the late Lisa Williamson was a former friend of Pauley's whose life changed quite radically — not long after she started to tell a story that Pauley had reason to want not told. In fact, Lisa's life ended, suddenly and tragically, apparently firebombed randomly in her "deteriorating" neighborhood. More details on Lisa's untimely death are in the hands of several people who are anxious to share them. Those details will be coming soon in another article. The point for now is that I mention Miss Williamson because she's one of a handful of Pauley Perrettes' associates whose lives are full of amazing, dramatic and sometimes tragic coincidences.

Ex-boyfriend, and more recently co-star, Daniel Rivas is another. Let's take a look at the roller coaster his life became with Pauley in it. It's a bit like a Hollywood script. At one point, Perrette and Rivas were a couple. Why they broke up is uncertain, but I do know what Perrette claimed. According to (yet another) ex-friend, attorney and private investigator Jason Fishbein, Pauley said "[S]he broke up with Danny after she caught him having sex with his sister…I recently was told this was also untrue. Again, I do not know why Ms. Perrett would make such defamatory statements."

Gosh, do you think that might have affected his reputation and maybe his ability to get work in Hollywood?

Also at the time the relationship ended, Pauley arbitrarily decided that Daniel's cat would be better off with her. So she stole it. In 1998 Rivas filed a Small Claims suit for his kitty's return. Not unexpectedly, Perrette counter sued him for some money she claimed he owed her. One would think this would give her, say, a 50/50 chance of being permitted to keep the cat, but my guess is that 50/50 odds aren't quite good enough for our girl Pauley. She knows a thing or two about stacking a deck in her own favor. While preparing her Small Claims counter suit, she filled out forms for a restraining order that she probably never intended to use, but no doubt would if necessary. (Perhaps back then she was still concerned about the possibility of getting into trouble for making false accusations; she wasn't even famous enough to add that last "e" to her surname.) Here is a copy of her "Defendant's Claim."

Click to enlarge
Note the handwritten words just below the two claims for cash: "I am requesting court's assistance to make plaintiff leave me and my cat alone." And on the subject of the non-existent restraining order, Perrette lied about that, too. (Still yet another) former friend, Lisa, Lynch discussed it in paragraphs 3, 4 and 5 of her 2006 court declaration:

> "3. In particular, I recall her stealing the cat of her ex-boyfriend Daniel Rivas, and then when he wanted to take her to court about this Ms. Perrett filled out the paperwork for a Restraining Order in retaliation. 4. To be perfectly clear about this, I lived with Ms. Perrett and Mr. Rivas at the time, and I would describe him as extremely docile. There was absolutely NO fear of him on the part of Ms.

> Perrette, and the Restraining Order paperwork she filled out was for the sole expressed purpose of manipulating the court in the issue about his stolen cat. It should be noted that the cat belonged to him even before he met her. 5. Ms. Perrett also made a point of using the supposed "Restraining Order" to tarnish the reputation of Mr. Rivas, by telling people she had a Restraining Order against him. Even I believed her story until recently when informed that she had never actually filed the paperwork. In retrospect this made sense, as its sole purpose was to manipulate the court in the "cat" case, and to influence the opinion of people about Mr.Rivas."*

Fast-forward a few years, after Coyote Shivers divorced Pauley Perrette and subsequently became her next Fraudulent Restraining Order victim. Danny Rivas knows Shivers of course, and the following screen captures are an email and a PM about Pauley, both supportive of Shivers:

Said Rivas, "I am open to discussion."

Well, back then he was. He never committed to making a Court Declaration. It is hard to blame him. Considering what Perrette did to him when she was a struggling, little known actress/waitress it would probably be best not to draw more of her ire now that she was rich, famous and influential. Apparently that turned out to be a wise move on his part; if he'd had the nerve to cross her, do you suppose she ever would have lobbied for him to get his recent gig as Abby's brother on NCIS?

I almost forgot. I have one more image for you – another page from Pauley Perrette's handwritten outline for her "Star Crazy" script!

Well now, isn't that a strange and dramatic coincidence? Whodathunkit?

News week in review Oct. 10-17th

Robert O'Hara · 17 October 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Needless to say it has been another big news week for AVFM News, but as usual we try to bring you stories that you may not have been exposed to in addition to the big ones.

Item: ABC news announcement of upcoming 20/20 broadcast draws intcredible traffic as well as criticism.

An article titled "Women Battle Online Anti-Women Hate From the 'Manosphere'" which featured an accompanying video of Paul Elam being interviewed by a not so covertly hostile journalist got lots of attention today. It is clear that the producers of 20/20 are seting up Elam for a hit piece to be broadcast tomorrow night and readers were quick to let them know how they feel about it. Over 1300 comments so far with the highest ranking one posted by one PlainOldTruth, in which he states:

"Paul Elam tells the truth. His project assists all people who are exploited by callous ideology-addled social engineers and control-freak bureaucrats. He is no post-modernist. Anita Sarkesian is a typical busybody attempting to profit from bossing others around. Her offer of supervision is unwelcome. If you want to see what kind of harassment happens when misandrists get going just look into the story of Ms. Erin Pizzey, one of the most important and brave human rights activists alive."

329 upvotes. Very nice PlainOld Truth!

Item: Australian dad battles child supports system for justice in paternity fraud case

Men in the U.S. have it the worst it seems when it comes to paternity rulings in child support cases, with paternity being unchallengeable after a short amount of time in most states. But in Australia it is the bureaucracy that makes it bad for duped dads. This video is a good expose of the challenges down under when it comes to paternity fraud.

Item: Video surfaces of alleged rape incident at Ohio University, she seems to be having quite a time

A woman has alleged rape in this incident and the man is facing expulsion even after a video surfaces clearly showing that, while it was in public, it was quite consensual. She is not facing any consequences….yet.

Item: Punishment only for male students in bomb hoax

A bomb threat was found in a boys room at a Idaho high school and as a result only male students are subject to closed campus rules as punishment. It doesn't matter that previous bomb threats were made by female students who did not face such exclusive punishment. Jonathan Taylor gives us the real lowdown here.

Item: American Society of Reproductive Medicine Report shows circumcision has no significant association between circumcision status and sexually transmitted diseases.

A study performed by urologists at the ASRM has concluded, as has been concluded many times before, that circumcision does NOT prevent the spread of STDs. Now if we can just convince the World Health Organization before their circumcision drive in Africa results in millions of deaths.

Item: Christian Adamek suicide receives international attention

Since last week hundreds of news sources around the world have reported on the tragic death of Christian Adamek. Perhaps MHRAs had something to do with the publicity. We would like to think so.

In His Own Words: Surviving Crazy

Dr. Tara J. Palmatier · 17 October 2013 · Archived copy · Original

It's day 17 of Domestic Violence Awareness Month for Men and Boys, the invisible victims of domestic violence. Today's In His Own Words is from Jim Muldoon.

Jim prefers that his real name be used rather than an alias. He tells yet another tale of a corrupt, misandric and feminist-governed family court. In other words, the status quo.

His description of how the mental health field largely enables abusive disordered women is bang on.

> Surviving Crazy
> I'm not going to tell you Crazy's name. The fact she doesn't get any limelight, if she ever gets to read this, will piss her off. She craves attention. She would rather have a crowd questioning her sanity than go unnoticed.
> That's the kind of whacko she is.
>
> Domestic violence isn't limited to the home, and it certainly isn't limited to physical violence. Crazy, by herself, did a lot of damage, but not enough to destroy the family. In desperation, Crazy turned to the Australian government for help. With the power of the state, the social engineers did what Crazy couldn't.
> They tore my family apart.
>
> All she had to do was to play her part of the victim, and the lawyers, judges, psychologists and social workers would do the rest.
> What makes her Crazy? That is a bigger question than you might think.
> She went to see psychologists and psychiatrists. She went to self-help groups. She went on medication. She stopped the medication. She got positive. She got real. She took a holiday. She got a job. She quit. She took up a hobby. She wrote down the whole story. She saw another psychologist.
>
> Round and round.
> When I looked at the various checklists for various mental disorders, I could see how Psychopathy, Borderline Personality Disorder, Obsessive Compulsive Disorder and many other "Disorders" and "isms" might apply.
> In short, there was plenty wrong with her. Therefore, it was easy to find yet another label and try yet another "cure." And every time Crazy emerged still Crazy, but now worse because she had a whole new litany of excuses.
> "I can't clean the house because cleanliness triggers my depression."
>
> Also, clinical diagnosticians tend to focus on their subject. They asked Crazy lots of questions about her past, her feelings, her hopes, ambitions and disappointments.
> Crazy loved it. Her past grew more traumatic with each telling. For the professionals this meant more areas to explore, more conditions to discover, more sessions and more money. Certainly more money than they would have got if they told her to stop lying. No matter the clinical name, front and centre of the cure was that I should remain with her, support her and encourage her whilst taking up the slack.
> Implicit in this was if she didn't get better, maybe I didn't try hard enough or maybe the fault was mine all along. But diagnosis isn't about lab coats and clipboards and multi-syllable terminology. It's about identifying and defining the problem.
>
> The problem was Crazy.
> Crazy's contribution to the home was to turn an everyday hurdle seamlessly from an issue through to a problem and onto a crisis with monotonous regularity. She also ensured that every crisis was that much worse by blaming anything and anyone else. The terms used by psychologists deliberately leave out any moral judgement. This, they say, helps with treatment. Treatment that was never effective.

But the lack of moral judgement has two distinct disadvantages. The first is that it relieved Crazy of the responsibility of ensuring her behaviour did not harm others. In fact, she felt entitled to behave in certain ways because her afflictions were official.

The second is that it denies the humanity of those she harmed. Their problems are considered a mere by-product of the real issue. They are second tier, and therefore second rate. It also removes many potential avenues for justice, an injustice in itself.

But, while a moral vocabulary may be unhelpful for the shrink, it is certainly of value to those being harmed. And not just for name-calling. It gives simple and accurate labels for predicting future behaviour. Consider some of the moral terms I believe apply here: dishonest, arrogant, selfish, lazy, greedy, vengeful, jealousy-ridden, gluttonous, and wasteful.

When I met her, Crazy had two kids to two separate fathers. She assured me that she was on the pill because the last thing she needed was yet another child to yet another father.

She lied.

When informed that I was going to be father number three, I wanted to provide and protect, etc., for my child. Like many men in that situation, I thought “Surely I can make this work.” Crazy told me she, too, would “make it work.” She told me she had even stronger parental instincts, being a mother. She also had another, deeper reason to “make it work:” she loved me.

She lied.

On all counts.

A few years, and two more children later, and Crazy walked out, leaving me with all five children. I’d stayed for the kids, but I was not a doormat. I confronted her about her behaviour and ensured she wore the consequences whenever possible.

Crazy’s response was to up the ante and leave. I think she was hoping that I would crumble under the pressure of single parenthood. Then I’d have to beg her to come back and would learn just exactly who was in control.

But, no Crazy meant no chaos. Things got better.

I did some study, got my career going again, and moved to a better house. Even better, I met and married the wonderful Linda. When Crazy heard about this she went on the warpath. Only this time she brought the cavalry.

To single out individual events or institutions would take too long and the trees would get in the way of the forest. Therefore, when I talk about the Australian government, I am not just talking about those directly employed by the government. I am including those “independent” groups and bodies, like lawyers, who suck on the teat of government for their livelihood.

Feminist ideology is the dominant feature of Australian government bureaucracies. Whilst not always at the forefront of every department, scratch the surface and it soon arises. There are numerous fallacies have come to be accepted as gospel truths thanks to the Feminist influence.

Chief among these is the oppression of women, for which all men, past and present, are guilty of. Closely related, in their minds, is an issue they call violence against women, which they claim explains all domestic disputes.

Therefore, the government tried to translate the madness in my life into a story of Crazy being oppressed by me. To do this they employed what Orwell called doublethink.

Take, for example, her walking out like that. There were times it was portrayed as a symptom of her depression. On other occasions it was my oppressive ways, like keeping the money for rent and groceries, which forced her out.

Had I walked out like that, it would have been called abandonment.

One conversation between a Feminist drone and my son paints a thousand words. He was trying to tell the drone that his mother, Crazy, was the problem. The drone wanted to blame me.

Son: Mum is manipulative, goes into rages and is sometimes violent.

Drone: Did your Dad hit you?

Son: No, Mum hit us much harder and more often than Dad ever did.

Drone: So, you've just admitted that Dad did hit you…

This bigoted approach was there in every aspect of my dealings with them. Anything that she did wrong was ignored, excused or minimised. Any fault on my part was exaggerated and referred to repeatedly, no matter how irrelevant it might be to the topic at hand.

"Both parents are to blame," was said repeatedly, especially when Crazy's behaviour was clearly wrong and indefensible. And while they were blaming "both" they were always looking at me.

The game here, of course, was to bait me. Any angry response would then have been used to justify the doublethink.

"I don't care about the parents. I'm concerned about the children," they also said. This was the same as "Both parents are to blame," but somehow nobler.

Were they concerned about the children? When the authorities decided to stick their nose in my family's life, the eldest boy had left home. The other four children lived with Linda and I and saw Crazy regularly and often. All five children were close.

Here's how it washed up:

Her three eldest children have disowned Crazy completely. They have also disowned the other two kids.

The eldest boy, who is not my son, brings his son around to my house. Yesterday I got to watch him doing his new trick called walking. We've still to decide on a name for me, but I think I'm settling with "Grandpa".

Crazy has never met her grandson, and, despite living just a 15 minute car ride away, never will.

At age nineteen, Crazy's second eldest (also not my biological son) asked Linda and I to adopt him. This we gladly did to give him some sense of normalcy. He calls us "Mum" and "Dad".

When she turned eighteen, my eldest daughter also asked Linda to adopt her, formalising her position. She's twenty now, and also calls Linda "Mum".

The two youngest children decided to join their mother in her hatred and contempt for me. What caused me pain was the way they lied knowing that the big bully government would protect them.

They will pay a terrible price for their choices, because now they are stuck with Crazy.

I am not seeking any contact with them. I certainly would never be in physical proximity to them without a witness or a camera. I will never trust either of them again.

So when I talk about surviving Crazy, I am not talking about walking away without scars. But I did walk away with more than Crazy and the Australian government wanted.

I came away with my sanity, my identity and my dignity.

And make no mistake about this. At all times, I was the intended target. My wife Linda, my other step-sons, my children, mother, sister, and other family members, who were all hurt, were just collateral damage.

For Crazy, it was to bring me undone. My diagnosis is jealousy because I have a better life; but also a sick need to dominate anyone in her life any way she can – she has to be the centre of attention.

For the Feminists, it was a chance to dominate a man, while the rest just made sure that the dominating force > was aimed at anyone other than themselves.

> Every year, this is happening more and more. Every year, more men will be in similar situations. Here are some lessons I learned along the way.
> Self-esteem is an iterative thing. The more self-esteem I have, the more I will stand up for myself, which will give me more self-esteem. Similarly, not standing up brings self-loathing and doubt, which leads to less self-esteem, and therefore not standing up.
> Therefore it was crucial that I stood up for myself.
> I also needed support. Luckily for me I have a supportive wife in Linda. She has given me tremendous strength, courage and comfort. As have the rest of my family and my true friends. And yes, it's times like these when you find out who your real friends are.
> It was also important to know the truth.
>
> Without getting bogged down in philosophical debate, everything can be questioned and therefore doubted. This is something they use to their advantage. Everything I said was questioned, again and again. "But how do you really know that?" or "But what if your memory is wrong?"
> Everything they said was stated with absolute certainty.
> Doublethink is a terrible weapon. The iron certainty that they are right is difficult to stand up to, particularly when you know that the power of the state is behind them. It took a real belief in my own worth and a real understanding of my values.
> I also needed to know my limitations and cut my losses. Early on, I realised that I had lost the youngest daughter. I still reached out to the youngest boy for a while longer, but in the end had to let him go too.
> My sanity matters. I will not lose it for anyone.
> I matter.

Radfem Hub: The underbelly of a hate movement

Robert O'Hara · 17 October 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Imagine that you are a fly on the wall of a private meeting. The attendees include a legislative lobbyist, an arts council member, a political writer, a bestselling novelist, a communications assistant for a national chamber of commerce, a web developer, a special education teacher and a child care worker.

What do you imagine you would hear in that meeting? Maybe plans to improve children's education, especially those with special needs? Perhaps a call to mobilize resources to ensure school kids are not attending class hungry, or that they are safe from abuse and exploitation? Maybe you would hear concerns about the quality of education and school budgets during the global recession, or other problems faced by the upcoming and developmental generation of world citizens.

Well, one such meeting has been happening, conducted by well-placed individuals who fill the job descriptions listed above. But educational and welfare improvements were not the topics they discussed. The agenda of the meeting was the shared desire to abuse and murder children, to trap people in wooden buildings and blow them up, to throw children from, through, windows, to pursue infanticide and forced eugenics, and to seriously entertain and secretly pursue ways to exterminate half the population.

If you are waiting for a punch line, don't.

Radfem Hub (Radfem is short for Radical Feminist), is a website featuring articles from well-known activists, many of whom are in significant real-world positions of political and social influence. The site has been the focus of some attention since Simon and Schuster novelist Pamela O'Shaughnessy, posting under the name Vliet Tiptree, penned an article there advocating human scientific experimentation and forced eugenics, in order to "extirpate" certain aspects of masculinity.

The publishers of Radfem Hub frequently profess and promote philosophical solidarity with the late Valerie Solanas, author of The Scum Manifesto, a violent ideologue who advocated the extermination of men. She also gunned down artist Andy Warhol, maiming him for life.

Some well-known figures are closely associated with the Radfem Hub. Loretta Kemsley, publisher of Moon Dance Magazine, which was given an award by the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization, is listed as having a "board presence" on her public profile there. Sheila Jeffreys, feminist author and professor at The University of Melbourne has a public presence there and frequently provides articles. Julie Bindle, author and columnist with The Guardian, a well read newspaper in the U.K., has also posted there. (see Wikipedia Links Below).

Underneath Radfem's veneer of social consciousness, however, and hosted on the same website, is a private forum; the underbelly and engine room for the site as a whole. The discussions there, assumed to be out of the public eye, are virulent and hateful; often peppered with calls for violence. For a long time, they have been successful and maintaining both secrecy and anonymity. Until now.

Over the past several months an operative, who will only be identified as Agent Orange, has successfully infiltrated the group and has collected a trove of information, including over a hundred screen shots that document what can only be called the most shocking evidence of extreme hatred in the feminist movement seen to date.

Not only have these conversations been documented with screen shots but Agent Orange, with the help of an investigator, has tracked down the identities of several of these individuals. The confidence level of the information is compelling, and more is on the way.

Here is a portion of the individuals identified, along with some of their statements.

Danielle Pynnonen (screen name "Allecto"), a child care worker whose employer is unknown;

click to enlarge

Kat Pinder (screen name "Amazon Mancrusher"), a community development coordinator for the City of Perth in Australia and former U.K. Game show Big Brother contestant;

Isabelle Moreira (screen name "Izzie"), a web developer in Curitiba, Brazil;

Click to enlarge

Mary Syrett (screen name "Mary Sunshine"), a writer and member of the City of Kingston Arts Council in Ontario, Canada;

Click to enlarge

Julie LeComte (screen name "Rain"), a communications assistant for the French-Australian Chamber of Commerce and Industry in Australia;

Click to enlarge

Lorraine Allen (screen name "White Tiger"), a special education teacher at The Center for Discovery, Hurleyville, New York;

Click to enlarge

Laila Namdarkhan (screen name "yabawife"), a well known feminist activist who was instrumental in passing legislation in the U.K. regarding the mental health of women in prisons;

Click to enlarge

And of course Pam O'Shaughnesey (screen name changed from "Vliet Tipree" to "karma"), an established writer, publisher and lawyer. In this post, the complete depravity of O'Shaughnessy's ideology shines though with a clear willingness for mass murder as a "last resort."

I like it a lot, Luckyniki, I agree basically with your analysis, though I have a different emphasis so far in the evolutionary biology stuff I'm looking at. You're more radical than I ATM, though who knows where I'll be in a year - but your proposal to exterminate the male entirely a la Solanas is to me more of a last resort. I would like to hear more about your thoughts on this as they develop. I sense that both you and I are non-biological scientists - but I'm pretty good at wading through scientific journals and getting the gist and I bet you are too. We can get quite a ways, is what I'm saying. We should only do this in these closed threads, obviously.

I read about a scifi writer - I'm trying to remember her book - who did a novel about a woman geneticist, I think it was, who discovers that men are going to die off a lot faster than we're hearing. It's a Y chromosome thing but I haven't read it yet, just reviews. The novel is about the hostility and rage she engenders, etc. Anyway, to prepare herself she worked intensively with a woman geneticist, so the book came off authoritative in many ways. I'll post the novel name as soon as I can find it.

I assume you object that lowering testosterone levels would not necessarily end the oppression. You may be right, I'm trying to figure that out, in which case your theory will look better than my line of thought.

I think you are right about how the violence, domination, and hierarchy has been heightened and tightened over the past ten thousand years. I have just

Click to enlarge

These screen shots represent just a sample the images and other data that document real people engaging in what can only be described as an orgy of gender hatred. What's more, these are not individuals who live on the fringes of society. They are people who hold public offices, positions in academia and the media. Their voices and ideas are heard in legislatures all around the world and even in the chambers of the United Nations.

In the very near future, the complete body of data collected by Agent Orange will be made available to the public at large. This means that anyone interested learning more about these people and publicizing their own analyses on their blogs, YouTube channels or other media will be able to do so. It also means that interested members of the general public can voice their concerns regarding these individuals to the press, as well as anywhere these individuals may pose a direct threat, particularly to the welfare of children.

For a long time men's advocates and others have tried to point out to politicians and the public that feminism was, at its heart, a movement rooted in hate. Those contesting this point of view claim that radical feminism isn't recognized as legitimate by most feminists and that radical feminists aren't taken seriously. This new information demonstrates those assumptions are false.

This data, and the mountains of it to soon follow, reveal that radical feminists with bigoted, violent leanings are thoroughly entrenched in the media, governmental and education systems worldwide, and that they are exerting their influence to further legislation and policy that reflects not only their hatred of men and boys, but a desire to put themselves in a position to inflict as much harm on them as possible.

Addendum: Since the release of the Agent Orange Files in December 2011, the forums from which the screenshots were gathered, "Women's Lives Matter & Women's Life Matters", have since been disabled indefinitely, and the Radfem Hub project has been shut down and archived.

The Agent Orange Team has since cleaned up the original version of the release. Being the civic-minded individuals they are, Agent Orange and his team have compiled the AO Files into a much more manageable format, complete with highly detailed, searchable .pdf's.

Janet Bloomfield (aka JudgyBitch) · 17 October 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Well, the ABC 20/20 piece on the "Manosphere" sure looks likely to be a trainwreck. Two reporters for ABC news, Alyssa Pry and Alexia Valiente, recently had a fascinating piece on A Voice for Men and the Men's human Rights movement… and had one of the biggest journalistic fuckups we've seen in quite some time.

Not only do they conflate "people who are mean on the internet" with "members of the men's movement," but, when they quote something from A Voice for Men, they lie about it. Can you believe?

But first, let's start with two of our intrepid "reporters", shall we?

Alyssa Pry is a journalist, creative writer and photographer in the New York City area. She is currently working as a production assistant for ABC 20/20. Her recent projects with 20/20 have included breaking news specials on the Japan tsunami and death of Osama Bin Laden, longer form pieces like Children of Hoarders, and celebrity profiles on Jennifer Hudson and Demi Lovato.

She has previously worked as a researcher for NBC News and has held internships at ABC, Harper's Bazaar and NBC Universal. Her work has appeared on ABC, abcnews.com, gurl.com and abroad in The Prague Daily Monitor as well as other local publications. She is also the author of the blog workinggirlsmiling@wordpress.com

Alyssa graduated with a Bachelor of Arts in journalism and sociology from New York University. Originally from New Jersey, Alyssa has traveled around Europe and hopes to someday work abroad.

Well, she sounds qualified, no? She profiled Jennifer Hudson, people! Maybe Alexa Valiente will be more promising?

Guys, she worked at Abercrombie & Fitch and she has a degree in Diplomacy! Off to a promising start, no?

> Deep in the underbelly of the Internet is a hidden corner known as the "Manosphere"— a collection of websites, Facebook pages and chat rooms where men vent their rage and spew anti-women rhetoric.

Deep in the underbelly, huh? Last I checked, A Voice for Men had an Alexa Ranking of 12,241 in the US. That puts them ahead of Zerlina Maxwell and her crew at feministing.com who come in at 17,098. Guess "feminism" is hidden deep in the underbelly, too?

> Protected by the anonymity of the Internet, men feel free to post hateful and violent comments. Posts such as "I really wouldn't mind shooting a [expletive] dead in the face, they are evil, all of them," and "Women are the natural enemies of men" are commonplace on sites like "A Voice for Men," a Manosphere blog run by Paul Elam.
> I really wouldn't mind shooting a [expletive] dead in the face, they are evil, all of them,"

Yep, only commenters at AVFM use anonymous or pseudonymous monikers. It's never happened anywhere else on the internet, ever. And of the thousands of articles on AVFM, that's the thing they're gonna highlight, is it? No relevant articles on issues like child custody or suicide or workplace deaths or boys struggling in school or male victims of sexual assault or male genital mutilation.

Those must be hidden deep in the underbelly, too

Oh, and guess what? Here's the killer: not only is this hysteria over anonymous comments stupid, they couldn't even quote that right. They got that quote from a 2010 article by Paul Elam specifically calling out such comments and making it clear that anyone talking like that would get the Instant BANHAMMER. That's right, these people actually quoted an article that specifically condemns that kind of talk and forbids it–and plays it like it's typical for what's here. Can you get more bizarre?

Well, ABC has more for us: Watch the full story on "20/20? Friday, Oct. 18 at 10 p.m. ET > Elam told ABC News' "20/20? that while he may not agree with some of the comments that are made on his site, he believes men are society's victims and need a forum to vent.

Oh come on now Paul. You don't agree with everyone all the time about everything? That's so weird. It must be hard being human like that.

> "There has been a change in the world, especially in the last 50 years. Women's roles have changed drastically," he told "20/20." "What a lot of us in this area find is that men's roles have not changed very much. Many find now that they have to react."

Men's roles haven't changed at all. Yoo hoo! Reporters! Ask him a question about that! Go ahead! Ask him what he means! Dig into that topic! No really! Go for it! Or, you know, just focus on what you've already decided is the issue. That's what you call "objectivity".

> Elam explained that men leave these comments in the Manosphere to get people to listen.

Which is quite possibly the entire point of all communication everywhere? Just a guess.

> "It's … very much designed to get someone like you to sit down and ask me questions," he told 20/20?s Elizabeth Vargas. "We are addressing a group of problems that this society ignores."

> Elam said institutions like marriage and corrupt family courts have become dangerous for men.

> "Marriage has become unsafe ground for men, because we have corrupt family courts that practice bias against men and fathers routinely," he told 20/20. "And men are waking up to this, that they don't get a fair deal."

Okay, this is better. We're actually talking about men and some specific issues again. [Oops. Spoke to soon.] Let's make it all about women again!

> While Elam told "20/20? that his site does not promote violence or hate toward women, some of his writing appears otherwise. In a post on his website, Elam wrote that women on welfare are "little more than thinly disguised layabouts."

Wow. That's your example of "hate"? Women on welfare are lazy? Yep. First time in human history that sentiment has ever been expressed. Clearly, this new manosphere thing is taking hate to a new level.

> Elam claimed it's not anger but satire and social commentary. "What I do is reflect and study what the attitude is in the culture," he told "20/20." "I am not creating the problem, I am documenting some of it."

Fuck Their Shit Up is satire, a direct statement of "Your ideology is shit, I'm done arguing with you and am just going to fuck your bullshit up." The rest is social commentary. Some of that commentary is bound to be angry. Some of it is despairing. Some of it is sarcastic. Some is really judgy and bitchy. Wait, you mean all the men are humans, capable of the full range of human feelings and emotions?

> But experts like Mark Potok, from the Southern Poverty Law Center, believe this rhetoric is problematic. "The Manosphere is an underworld of so-called men's rights groups and individuals on the Internet, which is just fraught with really hard-line anti-woman misogyny," Potok told "20/20."

Wait a second. Anti-woman misogyny? Is there another kind I'm not aware of? Calling out misandry is not misogyny any more than supporting civil rights for Hispanic workers means you hate gay people. Those are mutually exclusive topics. Pay a little closer attention, and you might notice that what the manosphere criticizes is a particular ideology: feminism.

People who support equal rights for men do not hate women. Some of them ARE women!

> And when a woman is on the receiving end of this misogyny, the Manosphere is unflinching in its attacks.

Yeah, and when feminists disagree with something someone in the manosphere writes, they NEVER threaten sexual violence or mutilation. Ask Matt Forney about that one.

> Miss Poppy Leigh ?@SoFullOfSht 29 Sep @CozworthGrind
> I really hope he meets someone who chops his dick off and feeds it back to him in his food

But let us get back to ABC…

> "Women who are targeted by these sites get a tidal wave of hate mail with rape threats and death threats," Jaclyn Friedman, founder of Women, Action & the Media, told "20/20."

All my best death and rape threats are from other women!

> Anita Sarkeesian, a media critic and blogger, learned this the hard way after campaigning on Kickstarter to raise funds for a web series on the roles of women in video games. The attacks from the Manosphere were swift.

Swiftly outed her as a con artist, you mean.

http://www.reddit.com/r/gaming/comments/1l6lsw/internet_sleuths_uncover_anita_sarkeesians_past/

Oh but wait, what evidence is there that this was all or even mostly or even a significant percentage of MHRAs? None, honeybunnies, and you know it!

> "It was … thousands of people coming after me," Sarkeesian told "20/20." "Threats of rape, threats of death, threats of violence," she said.

Possibly because they were really pissed you basically stole money?

> "They would Photoshop and manipulate pornographic images and put my face on them," Sarkeesian said. Her fellow gamers even designed a special video game about her named "Beat the [expletive] Up."
> "Players were invited to click on the screen, and an image of me would become increasingly battered and bruised," Sarkeesian said.

Oh my god, are you saying that people beat up other people in games on the internet? Shut up! I totally don't believe you. Gamers only play with kittens and herd sheep and grow vegetables. There is no such thing as a violent video game.

> Friedman was also the subject of a cyber attack after campaigning on Facebook to remove photos and groups that promoted hate speech toward women.

Right. But all the images of beheaded men on wedding cakes and women slapping men were A-OK? How about people were disgusted by your hypocrisy?

http://judgybitch.com/2013/06/06/awwww-facebook-doesnt-wike-us-boo-hoo-go-fuck-yourself-facebook-what-a-pack-of-raging-hypocrites/

> "I got emails and tweets and posts on Facebook that say, 'You are disgusting. You are fat. No one would ever want you. You should be raped," Friedman said.

Yeah, yeah. I get those too. From my feminist fans. I especially love it when comments come in back to back:

> "You're an anorexic bitch and I hope you get killed."
> "You're such a fat bitch you would be lucky to get raped".

Both comments from, that's right, you guessed it… women!

> Friedman said the Manosphere is not satire as Elam claimed, but a space for people to cause damage to women.

Can you point to that damage? What damage has the Manosphere done to women? Did you wittle feelings get hurt?

Boo hoo hoo. I feel so bad for you.

> "If you look at what they actually do, it's all hateful rhetoric," she told "20/20."

Please, 20/20. Come and look at what we actually do.

> "And it has real impact in the real world."

Count on it.

Lots of love,

Feminism and the disposable male

Karen Straughan (aka GirlWritesWhat) · 17 October 2013 · Archived copy · Original

The #1 video on YouTube on the subject of feminism for two years has been "Feminism and the Disposable Male" by A Voice for Men Contributing Editor Karen Straughan, also known as Girl Writes What. If you don't believe it, just go to YouTube and type in the word "feminism" and if it's not at the top it likely will be very near it, some two years after its release. And unlike most videos that "go viral," it has seen not an explosion of views but a steadily increasing number of views. It has ignited a firestorm of hatred against its author. People have put up pictures of her face battered and bloodied to show their hatred for her. She's called a right-wing extremist, a "back to the kitchen" traditionalist, a misogynist, a woman-hater, a traitor to her vagina–she's even been called the "Tokyo Rose of feminism." Much of this is rather amusing since she's a bisexual, genderqueer atheist who writes erotica professionally, and often doesn't even vote–not because she thinks women shouldn't vote, but because, like Penn Jilett, she thinks it's often a waste of time. Amusingly, she's also often been called a "feminist extremist" (often laced with many more vulgar epithets).

The fact of the matter is that I personally agree with everything she says in this video. I mean it–every word of it, I agree with. I've thought these things for many years. And I'm used to being shouted down and told to shut up for saying these things. But it appears to be even worse when a woman says them. Perhaps that's because those opposed to what she says particularly hate it when a woman says them? Or is it because they fear that if a woman says them, they can't dismiss her as a "whiny loser" like they do to men who say these things? I leave it to you to decide.

Although she's approaching 800,000 views on this one video alone, and has over 47,000 subscribers and growing, some people tell me they want to read her essays rather than listening to them. So in accomodation, I asked Karen for a transcript, and when she said she'd lost it, I went ahead and transcribed it for her in exchange for permission to reprint it. And so, here I present, proudly, my friend Karen's "Feminism and the Disposable Male." I hope you like it as much as I do. –Dean Esmay

Not too long ago I had it out with a feminist who had come into a male-safe space from a feminist blog just to scoff at the idea of male disposability. She basically said that the entire concept was a myth, that men's lived experiences were completely wrong, and that they were just a bunch of whiners who were complaining over nothing.

That got me thinking about the concept of male disposability and how that interacts with the feminist movement. Male disposability has been around since the dawn of time, and it's based on one very very straightforward dynamic: when it comes to the well-being of others, women come first, men come last. This is just the way it has always been. Seats in lifeboats, being rescued from burning buildings, who gets to eat: really, society places men dead last every time, and, society expects men to place themselves dead last every time.

Humans have always had a dynamic of "women and children first" and that has not changed at all. The 93% workplace death gap has to be evidence of this, if only because there's nobody with any kind of importance or power who's interested in changing it at all. In fact I remember reading an article in a British Columbia paper not long ago that described the increasing proportion of female injuries on the job as a huge problem, and the insane thing was the change reflected a decrease in male injuries rather than an increase in female ones. Men's injuries on the job had gone down because the economic downturn had put so many men out of work in the resource sector that there just weren't as many trees or pieces of heavy equipment falling on men as there had been before. And yet, this was framed as a huge problem for women that required immediate action to solve. It's like if men aren't dying at work that 20 times the rate that women are, we must be doing something wrong as a society.

Back when we were still living in caves that attitude was necessary for human survival. Nature is a really harsh mistress, especially when you think of all the animals that never get to die of old age. Things were a lot different for humans through most of our history on this planet than they are now. Life was dangerous, human settlements were small, isolated from each other, and one big disaster that took out a lot of women pretty much meant the end of the entire shebang for that group of people. So really, the level of importance that a human settlement placed on the well-being of women and children reflected almost always how successful that settlement was. And that can be expanded to encompass entire societies.

I keep hearing from the feminist camp that femaleness has always been undervalued by society and that maleness is preferred. But I've always contended that it's the exact opposite: the feminine is intrinsically and individually valuable, simply because females are the limited factor in reproduction. When it comes to producing babies, every woman counts, whereas biologically one very happy man could probably do the work of hundreds in that regard. So the level of instinctive importance we humans place on the safety and provisioning of women and their children is one of the main reasons why we've been able to be so successful that we've come to dominate this planet.

While I will concede that this drive to keep women safe from all harm has often resulted in extreme limits being placed on women's mobility, their agency, their power of decision to direct their own lives, all through history and many cultures, and in many cultures even today, I think it's telling that those cultures tend to be the most backward. When you consider the restrictions placed on women in places like Afghanistan, and then you consider that if we "bombed them into the stone age" it might be progress, I think you could conclude that the most successful societies had a good balance between allowing women freedom and the ability to choose and direct their own paths in life, and the need to protect them and provide for them.

However, feminists will insist that these kinds of restrictions being placed on women in those kinds of societies are the ultimate form of objectification. You lock up your possessions to make sure they will never be lost or stolen or harmed. Honestly, if I were a guy on a battlefield I might appreciate being objectified in that way. I think if I was going to be an object, I'd rather be a sexual one or somebody's prized possession than an object that can simply be thrown in the trash or smashed into pieces in the service of somebody else's purpose.

Feminists also have a very simplistic idea that our willingness to absolve women of their crimes, slap them on the wrist, spare them punishment, comes from a deep disrespect society has for women's person-hood—not seeing them as full human beings capable of looking after themselves, that we see them as children who don't know any better. And while there are parallels there in our desire to protect both women and children from not only their own poor decisions but the full consequences of their shitty behavior, it's really not as simple as they try to make it out to be.

Seriously, even today—even today in 2011!–we fully expect that if it comes down to a man and a woman in a burning building and you can only save one, the expectation is that you choose the woman every single time. So honestly, whose humanity are we placing above whose here? We're not talking about going to work, we're not talking about getting an education, we're not talking about freedom to decide what you want to be in life. We're not talking about getting to take Tae Kwon Do. We're talking seats in lifeboats here. The person in the lifeboat is going to survive, no matter how capable or incapable they are of managing their own life, and the person going down with the ship is going to die, no mater how independent, self-sufficient and awesome he is. That's the equation: one life, more valuable than another, and the woman wins every time.

So honestly, is there any argument, anywhere, that women's humanity has always been held in higher regard by society than men's? To be important to society, a woman merely has to be; a man has to do in order for his life to have any meaning to anyone other than himself. I think it was ManWomanMyth who said our society reduces men from human beings to human doings. I really think that's an apt analogy. We measure a man's worthiness to wear the title of "man" and therefore the title of "human," through how useful he is, either to society or to women, and one of the most useful things a man can do even now in the eyes of society is to put women and children before himself.

While I think there is plenty of argument that this attitude is at least partly innate—the way most survival traits are, even collective ones—if it starts in the chromosomes we really do everything we can as a society to reinforce this dynamic. Studies have shown that even though baby boys tend to cry and fuss more than baby girls, parents are quicker to attend to or console a baby girl than they are a baby boy. Even just the level of acceptance of infant male circumcision in our culture, when female genital mutilation was banned pretty much the first afternoon we all heard it existed, really says a lot about the differing expectations we have for males and females. Speaking as a mother, the last thing I would ever have wanted was to hear my child cry, especially when they're at an age when they're completely helpless, completely at the mercy of outside forces, and utterly dependent on the adults in their lives for every last thing, and yet even knowing how painful that cut is, we expect baby boys only days old to just suck that up.

Just think about what these very first interactions and experiences, these differences in how we nurture our babies depending on what gender they are, what this teaches them: What do we teach baby girls when we attend to their crying so quickly? We teach them to ask for help because their needs are important. We teach them to let us know when they're afraid or in pain because it's important for us to know when they're sick or in danger or hurt, so we can do something about it. We teach them that when they're sad or lonely to summon comfort and comfort will be there. We teach them that they're important. Their needs and well-being, both emotional and physical, are important just because.

And what are we teaching baby boys when we leave them to cry? We teach them that there's not much point in seeking help because it will be grudgingly given if at all We teach them that they should become self-contained in their ability to deal with emotions like fear, helplessness, loneliness, sadness, pain, distress: we teach them stoicism. We teach them to suck it up. We teach them that their fear and their pain are things that are best ignored. We teach them that their emotional and physical well-being are just not as important as other things.

Given all that, is it any wonder it's like pulling teeth to get a man to go to the doctor when he's sick?

What we're teaching that baby boy is all the things a man needs to know and feel and believe about himself if he's going to stand in front of a cabin with a rifle while his wife and kids hide inside. We're preparing him for the day he has to fix a bayonet to a rifle and charge a hill under enemy fire, and we're preparing him to make a decision to resign himself to an icy fate while women and children escape in the lifeboats. We are teaching him to internalize his own disposability.

And baby girls? By attending to her crying so quickly, by letting her know that she's inherently important to us, we're preparing her for the day she has to think of her own safety first, even if it means the man she loves is left standing alone with a rifle in front of a cabin. We're preparing her to take that seat in the lifeboat. We're training her to not allow guilt or empathy or acknowledgment of a man's humanity, or any sense that he might deserve it more, to convince her give her seat to him. Because for millenia, the human species absolutely depended on her feeling 100% entitled to that seat.

And that brings me to feminism. You know, the patriarchy smashers? Those righteous avengers of equality? Dogged dismantlers of every single gender role? What exactly is feminism doing to dismantle this traditional role of the disposable male?

Feminism's greatest victories have only reinforced in everyone that society still owes women provision, protection, help and support just because they're women. In its collective dismissal and abandonment of male victims of domestic violence, it only reinforces in men that it's pointless to ask for help, because men's needs are of no relevance, and their fear and pain don't mean anything to anyone. Feminism teaches us to put women's need at the forefront of every single issue, political or social. Whether that issue is domestic violence law, sexual assault law, institutional sexism, social safety net, education funding, homeless shelters, government funding for shovel-ready jobs—jobs that didn't stay shovel-ready once women got wind of them.

Everywhere you look—everywhere you look!–there are feminists pushing their way to the front of the line demanding women's "fair share" of all of the goodies, the good stuff, the loot, the booty, the cookies. Even if women don't need it. Even if women don't deserve it. And even if somebody else needs it and deserves it more.

And they get it, because we give it to them.

Feminism has done nothing but exploit this dynamic of the expectation on men to put everybody else before themselves. Especially women. Women's safety and support, women's well-being, and women's emotional needs, always come first. This is the most stunning piece of society-wide manipulative psychology I think I have ever come across. Feminism has been down with old-school chivalry right from the start. They might seem like strange bedfellows, but they're not. Because both concepts are built on a firm foundation of female self-interest.

We made our way as humans through a really harsh history and we became the dominant force on this planet. One of the reasons we were so successful is because we have consistently put women's basic needs first. Their need for safety, support, and provision. It was in humanity's best interest for women to be essentially self-interested, and for men to be essentially self-sacrificing. But we don't need that dynamic anymore. Our species is in no danger of extinction. We're 7 billion people clogging up the works here!

What's the worst that could happen if we all just collectively decided that men were no more disposable than women, and women were no more valuable than men? In fact the greatest danger I see to us right now is that in our desperation to bend over and give women everything they want and everything they say they need, we've unbalanced society to the point where we're in danger of seriously toppling over.

And really? The only difference I see between the traditional role and the new one for men with respect to disposability is that maleness, manhood: it used to be celebrated, it used to be admired, and it used to be rewarded, because it was really necessary, and because the personal cost of it to individual men was so incredibly high.

But now? Now, we still expect men to put women first, and we still expect society to put women first, and we still expect men to not complain about coming in dead last every damn time. But men don't even get our admiration anymore. All they get in return is to hear about what assholes they are. Is there any wonder why they're starting to get pissed off?

This article updated slightly in February 2013. Karen Straughan's YouTube channel can be found here and her blog can be found here. I am enormously proud to call her my friend, and while at first the hatred and irrationality directed at her sickened me, I now view that as to be expected: people who question society's most basic assumptions are often hated, ostracized, and demonized.–DE

Black man's burden: myth of the deadbeat

Dr. Umar Johnson · 18 October 2013 · Archived copy · Original

You've heard the rumors, for they are everywhere, and although unproven, they still resonate as "facts" throughout much of American society. The untruth that Black men don't want to care for their children has become a staple in American folklore. Even sadder is the fact that these rumors are not only postulated by the numerically dominant white majority of this country, but are actually created, maintained and reinforced by the Black community itself.

Even President Obama, who rarely makes mention of the unique and unparalleled conditions facing Black men in this country, couldn't help but join in on the carnage of the Black man's image by telling Black church audiences during his first bid for the white house that "Black men need to take care of their children." Obviously, trying to woo Black female voters, the Senator turned President is also guilty of reinforcing the image of the Black man as a "dead beat dad."

The question put forth to you today is whether or not this unsubstantiated rumor is true? The answer is a resounding "No!" Not only do Black men love their children, and want to be with their children, many go to great lengths trying to secure their "state guaranteed right" to participate in the lives of their offspring, only to be met with constant betrayal at the hands of the all-too-racially & gender-biased family court systems that make up these United States.

As a therapist and facilitator of support groups and training programs for African-American men, I have seen first hand how so many Black men attempt to establish a relationship with their children only to have the proverbial door slammed in their face, even after being guaranteed "paper rights" to see their children, which are rarely enforced by the courts. The illusion and hypocrisy of unenforced "paper custody" decisions made by judges and hearing officers is made evident by the fact that, in many states and counties in the U.S., there is no credible enforcement process to ensure that men see their children when mothers decide otherwise. In other words, as long as primary custodial parents can evade the law by preventing non-custodial parents access to their children, without having to burden themselves with fines, warrants or transfers of custody by the courts, the Black man's fight to play a meaningful part in the lives of his children will continue to be an uphill battle.

Most Black women love their children and are willing to put personal sentiments to the side for the sake of God's greatest gift. Nonetheless, there is a growing population of Black mothers who are manipulating the family court system and/or are blatantly in total disregard for it, in an attempt to keep so many well-intentioned fathers from being a part of their children's lives. The fact that Black parents cannot work out their problems in private without having to resort to intervention from the racist court systems, in the first place, itself is a significant indication that our relationship culture needs to be totally overhauled and reconstructed.

When we talk about the War Against Black Children, we cannot exclude the primary role that their parents play in the psychosocial destruction of our youth. Developmentally and spiritually, the mother, within any species, is usually the main advocate of protection for her young. However, after years of mental conditioning through slavery, today we have some Black women who will consciously deny their children the affection of a loving father for personal selfish reasons.

Behind closed therapy doors, I have had scores of Black mothers, benefiting from years of hindsight and maturation, admit, although all too late, that "yes, I kept my children from their father and I was wrong." Although any admission of honesty must be granted its blessing, unfortunately, the years of damage created by this cycle of ignorance and emotional neglect cannot go unmentioned. So many Black children are literally being destroyed by their custodial parents, and way before the mis-education machine, and psychiatric exploitation cartel, has a chance to get their hands on them.

What are some of the unjustifiable reasons mothers keep their children away from their fathers?

1) Out of Sight/Out of Mind: The pain of relationship rejection causes many Black women to prevent the man access to his children in order not to repeatedly have to face the very person who rejected them.

2) Jealousy For What They Never Had: Yes, I have had mothers admit that not having a loving father in their lives can create a subconscious envy for their daughters leading them to disrupt the father-daughter relationship that they never had themselves.

3) A Woman's Scorn: Revenge is often at the center of disrupted paternal emotional bonds. So many Black women lack the mature understanding that they and their children are not one and the same person anymore. Many women continue, for years after birth, to hold a pathological belief they what's good for them is automatically best for their children; In other words, "If I don't need him in my life, then he/she doesn't need him in their lives."

4) Child Support: Obviously if a man can find a job he should provide for his children. However, with so many Black men being undereducated and incriminated with felonies, it is quite difficult for many of them to find work. What children need most is the loving affection of their fathers. Although it costs to raise children, it doesn't help to keep a father from his child for financial concerns alone. Unfortunately, in many municipalities the court systems have effectively separated custody issues from support matters which now gives mothers the right to collect the father's finances and at the same time continue to keep his children at bay.

5) Keeping the New Man Around: Although I find younger mothers much more guilty of this than older ones, it is also growing in prevalence amongst older mothers as well. So many Black women suffer from the emotional dependency of always having to have a man around to validate their womanhood (a condition often created by their own fatherlessness) that some will go to great lengths to guarantee "the new guy" a place in the sun by keeping the biological father on the outskirts and then trying to force the paramour upon the child as the replacement dad.

Getting revenge against their ex-lovers, at the children's expense, is a frequent theme in many family therapy sessions that often leads to broken relationships later in life after adult children learn that their mothers were the true reasons behind the absence of their fathers from their lives. Many mothers are able to effectively disguise their oppressive tactics against Black men under a false mask of innocence, projecting victimization by the father when in fact they are the victimizers; playing the helpless victim in public who is raising children without the benefit of the father, but is a merciless oppressor in private, deliberately keeping the father from his children.

This Black child custody crisis is not without its impact upon Black marriage. Many Black men, having friends and family already involved in this trifling state of affairs, are fearful of being caught up in a similar situation and are electing instead not to have children, are refusing to get married, and are unfortunately opting for a lifetime of serial monogamy, rather than risking possible divorce and complicated child custody disputes. In fact, even older Black men, many of whom are still married, are beginning to advise the younger generation to consider a life of serial monogamy or companionship with African women who are not American born. The reaction of Black men towards the pain and agony of having their children used against them is also not advantageous towards building and maintaining strong Black families. Thusly, many Black men are rejecting Black women altogether, as poor advice from older men is feeding the stereotype of Black women as vindictive "gold diggers" and "control freaks."

Unfortunately, an increasing number of Black women, spurned on by the "We Don't Need A Man To Raise Our Children" Movement that is growing in popularity in the Black community, are contributing to the war against Black men by spreading untrue myths and rumors about "dead beat dads" while at the same time knowingly being guilty of "hiding the children."

Unfortunately, the dead beat dad myth is so powerful that when others notice the peculiar absence of a caring father from the lives of their children, electing to ask why hasn't he been around, mothers can readily put the "dead beat dad" myth into play by saying "he just gave up," "he met another woman and forgot about my children, or "he doesn't want to be bothered." These lies are often enough to deflect suspicion. Since most already assume that the "dead beat dad" myth is true, a manipulative mother can benefit herself from the myth whenever necessary. The fact that she interrupts visitation, prevents telephone contact, and disobeys the partial custody agreement never figures into the equation. I have found, through therapeutic experience, that when a mother says the father doesn't want to be bothered, this usually means he doesn't want to be harassed with her particular "rules and regulations" that are often designed to complicate the custody arrangement (i.e., visitation on days when he works, visitation only when its convenient for her, cancelled visitations at the last minute when he had plans scheduled with the child, birthdays, holidays, etc.)

However, this behavior is not without its sometimes dangerous consequences for the women who enter into this game of manipulation and deceit. As a prison volunteer, I am increasingly encountering men who are being jailed for breaking under the pressure of having their ambitions to see their children maligned at every turn, and with an apathetically racist court system that couldn't care less, issuing visitation orders with no teeth behind them, are instead choosing to seek vigilante justice against the guilty parties.

Although unacceptable, many Black men find it difficult to "turn the other cheek" and are putting hands on women, and their property (cars, homes, etc) as retaliation for being kept out of their children's lives. Still further, many grandparents and relatives are standing by and watching this game of cat and mouse, with tongue in cheek, and are putting their relationships with custodial parents ahead of the best interest of the growing children. Even professional Black men, who have so much to lose, are suffering from psychological breakdown, and are being charged with domestic abuse and battery. Attacking any woman should and must never be tolerated, under any circumstances. When Black men resort to physical enforcement of paper custody orders, by attacking Black mothers, this perpetuates another myth, that of the "Angry & Violent Black Male," which is used as cannon fodder by the mother's family as further proof that he shouldn't be allowed to see his children.

Being a felony charge in most states, even threats of retaliation for violation of verbal or legal custody orders is enough to give a Black man a felony record, which doesn't sit well with his child support responsibilities. As you can see, this is a dangerous cycle of revenge and hostility that only affects our children and leads to disastrous psychosocial outcomes for the children involved. It is time for the Black community to stand up in defense of non-custodial parents, whether they be male or female, and fight for their God-given rights to participate in their children's lives. Until we do, the collective community karma of Black America will continue to bring us more unhappy and violent youths.

Women do not benefit: the science

Alison Tieman (Typhonblue) · 18 October 2013 · Archived copy · Original

The most basic gender role in our society is this:

Men act; women are acted upon.

This paradigm is old; it is also vast. It shows up in every culture on Earth and during every time period. We may, ourselves, have inherited this essentially patriarchal construct of reality from our cultural ancestors, the Romans. C J Cherry writes, in her primer on Latin:

> First of all, not every human born thinks in the same order. […] Let me show you the Latin thought pattern.
> <ACTOR /ACTED-UPON> <ACTION>

Right there. That's it. Which sex do you think Roman's saw as naturally 'acted upon' and which as natural 'actors'?

Modern science has also identified this deep dichotomy. Gray and Wegner write in Moral Typecasting: Divergent Perceptions of Moral Agents and Moral Patients:

> Moral agency is the capacity to do right or wrong, whereas moral patiency is the capacity to be a target of right or wrong. […] Across a range of targets and situations, good- and evil-doers (moral agents) were perceived to be less vulnerable to having good and evil done to them. The recipients of good and evil (moral patients), in turn, were perceived as less capable of performing good or evil actio

> Across a range of targets and situations, good- and evil-doers (moral agents) were perceived to be less vulnerable to having good and evil done to them. The recipients of good and evil (moral patients), in turn, were perceived as less capable of performing good or evil actions. Moral typecasting stems from the dyadic nature of morality and explains curious effects such as people's willingness to inflict greater pain on those who do good than those who do nothing.

People are type cast into moral agents and moral patients. Moral agents do things, moral patients have things done to them. What's really important to note is that we think people are one or the other, not both. Also important is that a villain is typecast in the same 'classification' as a hero, they're both moral actors. In fact we see villains as closer to heroes then either are to victims.

Now that we've taken a quick look at just how deep and pervasive this paradigm is, what are its effects?

Let's look at some findings about smart girls. Heidi Grant in The Trouble With Bright Girls[1] writes about Carol Dweck who studied fifth graders in the 1980s and how they approached new and difficult material.

> She found that Bright Girls, when given something to learn that was particularly foreign or complex, were quick to give up; the higher the girls' IQ, the more likely they were to throw in the towel. In fact, the straight-A girls showed the most helpless responses. Bright boys, on the other hand, saw the difficult material as a challenge, and found it energizing. They were more likely to redouble their efforts rather than give up.
> At the 5th grade level, girls routinely outperform boys in every subject, including math and science. So there were no differences between these boys and girls in ability, nor in past history of success. The only difference was how bright boys and girls interpreted difficulty — what it meant to them when material seemed hard to learn. Bright Girls were much quicker to doubt their ability, to lose confidence and to become less effective learners as a result.

> Researchers have uncovered the reason for this difference in how difficulty is interpreted, and it is simply this: More often than not, Bright Girls believe that their abilities are innate and unchangeable, while bright boys believe that they can develop ability through effort and practice.

Notice how the boys Carol Dweck describe believe their actions are what count, not their current level of abilities. They know if they work at it, they'll achieve results. The girls, on the other hand, are convinced that their actions are meaningless.

This phenomena is just another reflection of moral typecasting. The girls see themselves as passive, unchanging moral patients whose actions have no effect; the boys recognize themselves as dynamic moral actors whose actions have results.

Remember again that moral actors are not villains or heroes, but both. Both villains and heroes capable of doing bad and good.

Ms. Grant continues:

> We continue to carry these beliefs, often unconsciously, around with us throughout our lives. And because Bright Girls are particularly likely to see their abilities as innate and unchangeable, they grow up to be women who are far too hard on themselves — women who will prematurely conclude that they don't have what it takes to succeed in a particular arena, and give up way too soon.

Women have been taught their actions have no real consequence either to their lives or anyone else's. They've internalized the gender role that women don't act, instead they are acted upon. Because of that when women encounter something challenging, say, inventing a new type of music, trying to understand calculus, negotiating a raise, they simply give up.

As a species we really love this particular dichotomy and there are some benefits to women in engaging in excising their own agency (it's all in the finding that people prefer to cause moral agents suffering then moral patients) but when it comes to achievement, women will always find themselves on the short end of the stick.

The wage gap? Yep. The last female getting a nobel prize for theoretical physics in 1963? You bet. The lack of women in STEM fields? Better believe this is why.[4]

Promoting the moral typecasting of women as victims diminishes their ability to rise to a challenge and overcome it. It chains them to a system in which they always must appeal to their betters, oops, I mean moral agents to save them. It excises their agency, and with it much of their belief in their own potency and self worth.

Moral typecasting women as victims is toxic.

Every time we knee-jerk seeing women as "acted upon" absent evidence or in the presence of evidence that refutes it, we are engaging in furthering this archaic gender socialization that limits and belittles women. Every "but women are hurt more" or "women are the real victims" or "women and children first!"

Traditions are very hard to change and this tradition is carved deep into our collective psyche, so deep that the people who defy it are very few. The people who promote it, on the other hand, are loud, powerful and many.

[3] The Trouble With Bright Girls. Bright Girls and Math.

[4] Yes there may also be biological causes, however until we live in a society that doesn't engage in these particular shenanigans, we won't know for sure.

In His Own Words: ABR saved my kids and saved me

Dr. Tara J. Palmatier · 18 October 2013 · Archived copy · Original

It's day 18 of Domestic Violence Awareness Month for Men and Boys, the invisible victims of domestic violence. ABR (Always Be Recording) is advice every man or woman in an abusive relationship should follow – especially abused men!

The family court system is extraordinarily biased in favor of women and female victims of violence enjoy special protections that male victims of violence are not afforded courtesy of VAWA (the Violence Against Women Act), an unconstitutional and sexist piece of legislature.

ABR has helped many men avoid wrongful arrest and restraining order abuse due to the false allegations of an abusive wife, girlfriend or ex. It has also helped some men obtain custody of their children. Today's In His Own Words is an example of how ABR helped to save one man and his children.

Here is "Max's" story:

> ABR Saved My Kids and Saved Me
> My wife and I were together for over a decade. We had a whirlwind romance and were married 6 months after we met, even though there were several things I now recognize as red flags.
> Bright, burning red flags.
> For example, she told me about how she had a car chase with an ex-boyfriend to "make" him talk to her. She confessed that she faked a suicide in order to try to manipulate him. Then there was the drama. There always had to be drama. She was attracted to it and created it when there was none to be had. And the biggest red flag of all, she actually told me, "You really shouldn't keep seeing me, I am going to destroy your life."
> Despite these red flags and others, I was smitten. She was beautiful, fun and smart. Plus there was always something to get stirred up about in her life, and while it wasn't fun, it was satisfying to be her "knight in shining armor," to be the hero for a pretty girl.
> Unfortunately, a professional victim must have a villain.
> Though it took years to recognize it, things were bad, and kept getting worse. About 3-4 years into the marriage, things were bad enough that I felt very confused, but couldn't talk to anyone about it because I just didn't think anyone would believe me. She was so confident, capable and calm in public! I was certain no one would believe what she was like behind closed doors.
> Plus, I never talked to anyone about it because I was embarrassed to admit to my own groveling behavior just to keep her appeased. I was embarrassed to admit that I spent a lot of time reassuring her that all her ex boyfriends (and current boyfriends) still loved and missed her. Yes, I actually did this.
> I was embarrassed that I would put up with someone who was always breaking cupboards, dishes and other things on purpose during tantrums. I was embarrassed that I spent so much money on her just to keep her from acting on the threat, "Well, if you can't buy it for me then I am just going to go get a job stripping!"
>
> She wasted away our first child's pre-school years messing around with boyfriends on the Internet and obsessing over them, sneaking away to meet with them, etc. It only got worse after our second child was born.
> Day after day, I would return from work to an unkempt home, household shopping that wasn't done and the baby strapped into a highchair, parked in front of the television with a bloated unchanged diaper, usually the one I put on in the morning before going to work. Once, our baby broke her arm trying to get out of the highchair (according to my ex). Did my ex take her to the hospital?

No, she put our baby in the crib with the OBVIOUSLY broken arm and let her lie in agony for several hours with the expectation that I would take care of her after I got home from work. Our two kids were mostly on their own. As time went on, our oldest child started to assume the responsibilities of parent to my wife and our youngest, or what psychologists call parentification, which is a form of child abuse.

Through it all, and year after year, I kept hoping things would get better. She would be better after she graduated from college. A new therapist would help her. New medication would make her better. A new house. More money. Fancier clothes. A bigger house. More time at home. A new baby would make it better. Different medication. Different therapist, etc., but it just kept getting worse.

She started to beg me to help her commit suicide, and even begged me to agree to a murder-suicide pact. She would talk for hours about how easy it would be to turn the cars on and leave the door open to the house. She said we should just drop our youngest off at the hospital and never come back. She would scream for hours, mad raving screams until she was literally frothing at the corners of her mouth.

She kicked, scratched and slapped me regularly. As time passed, her physical violence escalated and became more frequent. The objects she threw at me became bigger, harder and heavier. She started to physically assault me in my sleep. Nothing is more startling or unnerving than being hit with something heavy and hard in your sleep. Try falling asleep with this thought in your head, "Is tonight the night she finds the baseball bat?"

But I was scared to leave, scared to divorce. No way I could abandon my kids to live alone with someone like that. I couldn't let them be her next target. I was stuck because, as I mentioned, she was FINE in public. She was wonderful in front of her family. All the awfulness would disappear the moment someone was there to observe.

Worst of all, she can tell a lie better than most people can tell the truth. She believed her lies. To her, her feelings were reality. If she felt you were a villain then, suddenly in her mind, she had a whole villainous backstory for you, things you had done. She was clever enough to weave in dates and places and whatever she knew about you to make it seem more real. She would tell me things that I knew were lies, yet I would believe her or feel chilled by the fact it that she believed it.

She wasn't lying. She thinks she is telling the truth. If she felt like you did a bad thing, you did that thing even in the face of overwhelming evidence to the contrary.

I was also afraid to leave because she described the lies she would tell the police about me and anyone who would listen. She would describe in rich, vivid detail, stories that would get me barred from ever seeing the kids again, if not put in jail.

Somewhere toward the end of our marriage, I was in a bookstore with my wife and caught sight of a psychology book. Reading the title made my hair raise on end and my blood run cold with an odd recognition. "I hate you, don't leave me." Oh how often I had heard those words screamed at me in exactly that way and in so many other variations. It's an odd, impossible phrase I thought no one would ever believe. [*THIS IS BORDERLINE PERSONALITY DISORDER]

Around the same time, I got my first smartphone with video and audio recording features. It occurred to me that I should ALWAYS have it on me. That my only chance of getting the children and I out of that hell was if I had proof.

I switched to pajama pants with pockets. I always had the phone on me. I bought many other little audio and video recording gadgets that could be turned on with a simple switch. I left them around the house and my car, ready to go in case something awful should start to happen.

> I started to catch things here and there, sometimes a little video, usually some audio. Helpful things, but nothing that would be a slam dunk in court. I missed a lot of things that would have been even more helpful. It's not always easy to Always Be Recording and it's tricky to be discrete about it sometimes, but I kept at it.
> Then one day, the nadir of our marriage, my ex had a full blown psychotic rage episode. She raged, screamed, broke things and hit me with enough volume, intensity and duration that our oldest child called a relative for help. Once my ex realized our child had "ratted [her] out," she went nuclear.
> She chased our child around the house until the child hid in the bathroom. Then she grabbed a 9-inch butcher knife and tried to break down the door of the room where our child was hiding. I was able to intervene at this point, and got her to back away from the door to the other side of the room while I backed away to another corner of the room.
> She was frothing at the mouth and screaming at our child, "Come out here and see what you did! Come out here and watch! Watch what you are making me do!" as she raked the dull side of the knife across her own legs. She demanded that our child come out to see his mother stab herself.
> Eventually our child came out for a moment and my ex continued screaming. Then she lunged at our child and chased him back into the bathroom, still with the 9-inch butcher knife in hand and froth on her lips. I intervened again and got a small cut on my hand for the effort.
> I knew I could disarm her without either of us getting seriously hurt. However, I was pretty sure it would leave a bruise on her arm, which would, of course, play into the lies she threatened to tell the police. Then it occurred to me, "This is what the police are for." So while she was looking away, I took the house phone off the cradle and dialed 911.
>
> Next, I loudly started saying, "WIFE'S NAME, please put down the knife" and repeated it over and over. She continued raving for what seemed like an eternity, then the doorbell rang. Like a light switch being flipped off, my ex immediately calmed down, put down the knife and began arranging her hair. She calmly asked, "Oh, who is at the door?"
> I opened the door and five very anxious looking policemen with weapons drawn were standing there.
>
> My ex began to lie to the police, but her lies didn't work this time. I got it all on video. And my children and I, we got away.
> Sometimes people tease me about how much I love my phone, how much I love little recording devices and that I buy so many. I just smile and nod. I don't explain. How else am I supposed to feel about something that saved my life and rescued my children?
> Always. Be. Recording.

News week in review Oct. 10-17th

Robert O'Hara · 18 October 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Needless to say it has been another big news week for AVFM News, but as usual we try to bring you stories that you may not have been exposed to in addition to the big ones.

Item: ABC news announcement of upcoming 20/20 broadcast draws incredible traffic as well as criticism.

An article titled "Women Battle Online Anti-Women Hate From the 'Manosphere'" which featured an accompanying video of Paul Elam being interviewed by a not so covertly hostile journalist got lots of attention today. It is clear that the producers of 20/20 are seting up Elam for a hit piece to be broadcast tomorrow night and readers were quick to let them know how they feel about it. Over 1300 comments so far with the highest ranking one posted by one PlainOldTruth, in which he states:

"Paul Elam tells the truth. His project assists all people who are exploited by callous ideology-addled social engineers and control-freak bureaucrats. He is no post-modernist. Anita Sarkesian is a typical busybody attempting to profit from bossing others around. Her offer of supervision is unwelcome. If you want to see what kind of harassment happens when misandrists get going just look into the story of Ms. Erin Pizzey, one of the most important and brave human rights activists alive."

329 upvotes. Very nice PlainOld Truth!

Item: Australian dad battles child supports system for justice in paternity fraud case

Men in the U.S. have it the worst it seems when it comes to paternity rulings in child support cases, with paternity being unchallengeable after a short amount of time in most states. But in Australia it is the bureaucracy that makes it bad for duped dads. This video is a good expose of the challenges down under when it comes to paternity fraud.

Item: Video surfaces of alleged rape incident at Ohio University, she seems to be having quite a time

A woman has alleged rape in this incident and the man is facing expulsion even after a video surfaces clearly showing that, while it was in public, it was quite consensual. She is not facing any consequences….yet.

Item: Punishment only for male students in bomb hoax

A bomb threat was found in a boys room at a Idaho high school and as a result only male students are subject to closed campus rules as punishment. It doesn't matter that previous bomb threats were made by female students who did not face such exclusive punishment. Jonathan Taylor gives us the real lowdown here.

Item: American Society of Reproductive Medicine Report shows circumcision has no significant association between circumcision status and sexually transmitted diseases.

A study performed by urologists at the ASRM has concluded, as has been concluded many times before, that circumcision does NOT prevent the spread of STDs. Now if we can just convince the World Health Organization before their circumcision drive in Africa results in millions of deaths.

Item: Christian Adamek suicide receives international attention

Since last week hundreds of news sources around the world have reported on the tragic death of Christian Adamek. Perhaps MHRAs had something to do with the publicity. We would like to think so.

For those of you who are new to the Men's Human Rights Movement, here's a great video on the domestic violence industry and the corruption of basic civil rights it is for all Americans (and much of the rest of the world).

Video: Men tell their story

VFM News and Commentary · 18 October 2013 · Archived copy · Original

From Australia's "1 in 3" campaign:

Brave men step forward to tell their stories in Australia, where it's no better than in the United States. Will anyone listen or, more importantly, take some sort of action? Or will they still be laughed at, smirked at, or marginalized as irrelevant or a "tiny minority?"

Video: Friend of the Court

VFM News and Commentary · 18 October 2013 · Archived copy · Original

We recently found this gem of a song, apparently first recorded in 2001 by a punk group called “Pure Spun Evil.” We thought A Voice for Men’s readers would relate to it.

Why should taxpayers suffer from feminist social experiments?

Anil Kumar · 19 October 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Editor's note: This article is also available in Romanian.

I am a brown man from India and I am a Men's Rights Activist. There are more than 30,000 brown men and women in Indian subcontinent, who call themselves the men's rights activists and they are talking about misandry and zero sum win-lose games played by political feminists. As far as we are concerned, there are two types of feminists. One is academic feminists and the other the political feminists. These two groups play good cop and bad cop games to fool the innocent straight thinking males. They have fooled men for too long and now the time has come for these feminists to be questioned and held accountable for their activities, because they are operating using tax payer's money of different national governments. As I am an individual paying tax and from which a portion goes to fund the feminists, the gender studies courses and also many Government welfare programs, I have every right to question how my tax money gets used. I would not like any of my taxes are used for propagating hate, promoting a gender war or for promoting criminal activities including propagating misinformation, lies and hoaxes.

> "Instead of targeting feminists as the problem, they should be targeting what feminists call 'the patriarchy' and become allies of feminists, said Guthrie." [1]

If the feminists are spreading myths and hoaxes like pay gap myth, anorexia myth, super bowl hoax, bride burning hoax and if they are showcasing people's sufferings due to poverty in third world as gender oppression by men, then it is unethical and irresponsible on my part as a human being, if I do not question them. If questioning a feminist, her views, her fake statistics, her unscientific theories leads to any feminist accusing of me of being a hate mongering demon, then there are no bigger bigots that feminists. The only other categories of people who do not tolerate criticism or questioning are religious bigots and Taliban etc. So, either feminists get ready to face criticism or they get prepared to be treated in the same way we treat bigots and fanatics. Only a bunch of intellectually dishonest people can behave like fanatics and in turn accuse anyone questioning them of being a fanatic.

Now, lets me come straight to recent claims made by feminists in Canada and USA in media and on the internet. They claim that Men's Rights Activists are predominantly white men and men's rights movement is a racist movement. I am a brown man and a men's rights activist from India with 30,000 other brown people from India are collaborating and operating with AVFM and other Men's Rights Activism NGOs. This proves that feminists are irrational people with no clue about what they are claiming in the first place.

Of course, feminists can accuse us Indians of living in a patriarchal society. Now, even if I assume that patriarchy theory is a valid scientific theory, still feminists can be considered uneducated, irrespective of some of them holding faculty positions in some Universities. Feminists have not studied something called Set Theory in their school or college. If we use fuzzy set theory, can a society still be revealed as 100% Patriarchal and 0% Matriarchal at a given point of time? Where does patriarchy end and where does matriarchy begin? Do patriarchy and matriarchy overlap? Can any feminist or gender studies champion give me a study which quantifies patriarchy and matriarchy in any society from year 2000 to 2012? No, because no such study exists and feminists never even thought about such a simple study. If these people are so intellectually challenged, then why should anyone allow them to dictate the lives of our children or grandchildren? No one wants his son or daughter to grow up intellectually impoverished with no connection to reality.

Feminists have forced a gender war on the world, and they have instituted affirmative actions and positive discrimination policies which harm men. This is a simple zero sum win-lose game. Now, the feminists in Canada are upset that we are discussing this win-lose game. On one hand they claim patriarchy is giving men privileges and on the other hand they claim patriarchy is oppressing men. It is like claiming Nazis oppressed Jews, but under Nazism, Jews thrived because of all privileges.

Challenge to Feminists:

If feminists believe Patriarchy means traditional male and female gender roles, which oppress men and women, then I have a challenge for them.

I call up on men across the world to stop playing their traditional patriarchal male gender role on 19th of every month. That day, no man will protect, rescue or help any woman. No man will fix any woman's car tyre. No man will be an unpaid bodyguard, rescue worker, porter or driver that day. It is just one day in every month and let the woman and girls arrange their life around this day. Men are on strike from all patriarchal and chivalrous gender roles on that day.

If women and girls do to not want men to participate in this strike, then they have to take a very simple action. They have to come out in open and protest against feminists and tell Governments to put an end to the gender war and positive discrimination forced on men by feminists. This is a choice for all women. If they choose to remain silent, then they deserve a one day strike by men every month. Let us see if they want men to remain under patriarchy or outside. It is a simple fact that feminism sleeps with patriarchy at night and in the morning it cries discrimination. Feminists can not survive without patriarchy and support from patriarchal alpha males in positions of power.

The society has tolerated obnoxious bigotry by feminists for too long. If women do not want to play traditional gender roles and women want men to be subjected to positive discrimination, then it is nothing but declaration of a gender war.

On Male Studies:

The feminists and the media love to propagate misandry. For every problem in the world, they have found only one cause; and that is patriarchy and men. If its crime, then they say men are responsible. If it is bad economy, they blame men. If it is a marriage or relationship failure, only the man is judged and blamed.

If men are such a big problem, then why the hell you are not starting male studies programs to study men independently without linking the research to women's issues or feminism? It is like someone insisting on studying orthopedics to learn to operate brain tumor. Imagine if someone said, if we wanted to operate on a brain tumor, that we must only study orthopedics and there is no need to study brain surgery.

Now, if Eve Ensler, Gloria Steinen et al are experts on men and masculinity, then it is like orthopedic surgeons trying to do a brain surgery. That is what went on at Stoney Brook University recently.

In the end, I must say, the Arts Departments in Universities across the world are spreading stupidity. They have great commitment to tolerate unscientific theories and they are forcing all kinds of unscientific social experiments on our societies. Why should we tax payers and our children and grandchildren suffer for the stupidity and lack of responsibilities of Arts and Humanities departments?

The Arts disciplines in Universities must make a choice. Either they make these gender studies and humanities departments set their house in order or they intervene and clean these departments up.

In His Own Words: Narcissistic Woman

Dr. Tara J. Palmatier · 19 October 2013 · Archived copy · Original

It's day 19 of Domestic Violence Awareness Month for Men and Boys, the invisible victims of domestic violence. Falling in love with an abusive, personality disordered woman is like living a fairy tale in reverse.

A man falls in love with what he thinks is a beautiful princess or damsel in distress, only to watch her morph into the destructive, devouring witch. In today's In His Owns Words, Peter shares the story of how the beautiful girl he thought he fell in love with turned into a raging, violent narcissistic bitch.

> Narcissistic Woman
> "A happy wife is a happy life." Whoever coined that phrase must not have been married to a narcissistic woman. You fall in love with Sleeping Beauty only to discover she is the witch once you kiss her awake.
> I met my future wife during a very intense summer camp, and, yes, we fell in love. She seemed perfect in so many ways, absolutely charming and self-assured. We had similar interests; our educational paths were almost identical and both of us wanted to live a life of creativity.
> After camp ended, I went back to my country and she went back to hers. We kept in contact via mail and telephone. I spent part of the following summer with her. We had a great time, and the following year she moved in with me.
>
> For the most part, things were good. There were red flags, but I did not recognize them as such at the time. I tried to be the perfect spouse and took charge of most of the family duties. At this point it was just the two of us and we were on my home turf. Also, I had seen all that my dad didn't do and how hard it had been on my mother.
> Two years later, we decided to move to her home country because there were more job opportunities. The transition to her country worked well; although there were struggles in setting things up and getting jobs. I did my part and then some to compensate for the fact that I was under-employed for a few years.
> Two years after we moved to her country, we had our first child and then a second child two years later. There were more red flags at this point. In particular, her reluctance to go back to work to make sure we could maintain the lifestyle she wanted.
> She said I should get a summer job or an evening job, so that she could stay home. The best suggestion was that I should get a job as a tree planter up north. When I did get small jobs to bring extra money during the summers, she complained that I was ignoring the family.
> I spent full days with the children and completed the majority of the house work, trying to do all the things that an equal partner is supposed to do. It didn't seem to matter what I did, it was wrong. Her family was not much support either. They have often told me:
>
> - "She has always been like that."
> - "She has always had a short temper."
> - "She was a strong-willed child."
> Our relationship was (is) a constant power struggle.
> Eventually, her employer gave her an ultimatum, continue to stay at home and you will lose your position. At this point, she had been at home for four years. She went back to work, but was incredibly resentful having to do so.
> We interviewed a lot of childcare providers and none of them were good enough. She was constantly addressing my parenting skills or the lack thereof. We are both educators and I had worked in the childcare sector for 10 years prior to getting a teaching degree.

I asked why she was so critical of my parenting. She claimed she was the superior parent because:

- My education and experience was from a different country, therefore, it was not valid.
- I had not read as many books as her, and since she had read more she should be referred to as the expert.
- By the virtue of being of being a woman, she had better parenting instincts.

She informed me that because she's a "naturally gifted teacher," she had the right to steer me in the proper direction. She also said I should "thank God for putting [her] in my life," so that I could become a "better person."

She was constantly undermining my role as a parent. She corrected me in front of the children when she thought I was wrong, which was often. She would frequently stand outside the door when I read night time stories. When the children asked questions and I answered, she would sometimes interrupt because she thought I was wrong. Or, once I was done she would lecture me for an hour about what she perceived to be my inadequacies.

She also told me that if I left her she would make sure that I was deported and would not see the children again. This was prior to me getting citizenship. My home country didn't accept dual citizenship for the longest time. Back then, I had landed immigrant status sponsored by her.

We often sat down and discussed strategies and rules for the family. I would try to follow them, so at least we were consistent even if I didn't agree with all of them. It didn't matter, ultimately. One day she would praise me for using the agreed upon strategy, and would yell at me the following day for using the same strategy for the same situation. Also, she wouldn't stick to the rules and strategies herself. When I asked her why, she would say, "To be a good parent you need to know when to break the rules, and you are too rigid. Try to be more flexible."

As the children grew, she became more and more critical about what she called my "lack of communication skills". She made comments about me being ESL in front of the children. When I pointed out that I communicate for a living, she mocked in a variety of ways.

To be fair, she did teach me a lot of new English words, none of which I can use in a professional setting. It is hard to communicate with a person whose most common response to a difference of opinion is, "Why do you always try to start a fight?" or, "Bullshit!"

As the children grew and the demands on her became greater, she did not cope well. The attacks became more frequent and nastier. They also became physical, which shocked me. Who in their right mind would attack somebody who is stronger, taller and heavier and has close combat training? The fact that I was bigger didn't concern her.

The first time she physically attacked me, I instinctively pushed back. When someone is winding up to take a swing at you, you protect yourself. I quickly realized that I would lose if I defended myself, and should just take the beating. She told me if the police were called, they would not believe me. "Just look at you, you are so much bigger than me." The same logic that Dr. Phil uses.

I was under constant stress and walking on eggshells. She would spend half an hour yelling at me for not wiping the counter top, but I could not comment on her overspending. She frequently told me,"You should be like a knight in shining armor that takes care of everything" and "You should put me on a pedestal and worship the ground I walk up on."

It was not good enough that I did 75% of the housework and some times more, I still had to give her presents and arrange to take her on dates. I had very little time just for me and there is very little money for dates.

I hypothesized that the reason we couldn't get the finances to work were because we were both incompetent, things cost more than I thought and/or we didn't make enough money. What I discovered over the years was that initially we were incompetent. I worked on it and learned how to budget and do bookkeeping, so that we could run a family.

The reason things cost more is because my wife refuses to cut back, and wants things her way. She told me that "no man can tell her what to do." Explaining the difference between needs and wants was futile. She would also deliberately make budgets fail, just to prove that I was wrong and then accuse me of not knowing how to handle money because my budget failed.

I frequently broke down my earnings and our expenses to show her what we had to live off during any given pay period. She would stamp her foot on the ground and tell me, "I don't like your budget! Re-do it!" and then storm of like a three-year old.

I tried to explain that you have to live within your means. She said, "You only think about money, whereas I think of what is in the best interest of the family! I should have seen this earlier!" It took me several years to explain that the adage, "It takes money to make money" does not relate to personal consumption.

I have cut my spending down to next to nothing, and when she realizes there is money she manages to spend before I can use it for bills and other necessities. We are always behind and the stress is unbearable. When I try to bring this up, she tells me it's the wrong time or place, I'm putting her under stress, I can't talk about anything but money, I am using the wrong tone of voice, she is tired, I need to learn to just "deal with it" and/or I need to be on medication.

We are both well paid, so finances should not be an issue. She seems to be aware that the finances are something I need to have under control. Since she does not have the threat of deportation any more, she messes up the finances.

On numerous occasions when she has overspent, she will tell me with a straight face that I am to blame because I didn't stop her. The fact that I am usually not present when she overspends is irrelevant.

My wake-up call happened when I developed Diabetes and gastrointestinal problems. I'm convinced the stress she causes was a contributing factor. When I was diagnosed with these conditions, she spent two hours yelling at me about how stupid I was and made an extremely vicious physical attack, one which could have cost me my eye.

As she helped to clean up my injury, she told me, again with a straight face, that she did not realize how mentally unstable I was. I had to explain to colleagues why my face looked like it did. It was humiliating. I told them I biked into a tree. On a later date, she said she wished she had done more damage.

My family doctor asked if she was projecting her emotions onto our oldest child. I didn't know what he meant, so I started to do some research and a new world opened up for me. Even though most of the text I found was based on men being the perpetrator, I was able to talk to my doctor about my situation.

One day, I found a card in my work mail box stating all of the benefits we had as employees, and counseling was one of them. I decided to go for it. At this point, I thought I was rapidly losing my mind. I told my wife I needed assertiveness training, which she agreed that I needed.

The counselor was very good and helped a lot. She gave me two options which were to divorce her or learn to manage her behavior. In hindsight, I should have gone for the divorce, but at the time I couldn't leave the kids with my wife because I was afraid she would turn on them without me present.

Around the same time, a sibling gave me a book about divorcing high-conflict people. It, too, opened new doors. Several years later, I came across the article 10 Signs your Girlfriend or Wife is an Emotional Bully and it all fell into place.

We are still married, but now I'm engaged in a variety of activities, several of which are creative. She has chosen not to be a part of it. I'm finally looking after my health, exercising regularly and putting myself first.

Our oldest child is over 18 and the second one will be 18 in two years. Hopefully, all of the major financial issues will be resolved shortly and I am planning to leave after that. She has begun to turn some of her attacks on our oldest, since he is growing up and ready to separate from her. He has started to question her behavior.

She will work on him and when he has had enough and swears at her, she then becomes the victim, and starts > lashing out at me. “No man would let their son swear at their wife, his mother! You are taking his side by not punishing him!”

> Our daughter has asked if I can divorce her, so that she can live with me and get some peace and quiet. My family has been completely alienated by her, they will not come and visit me while I’m still married to her, nor is she welcome to visit them.
> Friends and acquaintances frequently ask, “How is your charming wife doing?” It’s hard to go to social gatherings and see how she turns on the show, when I have seen behind the mask.

The Good Meme Project

Paul Elam · 19 October 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Memes are a way of spreading messages in a world that has a short attention span and little eye for substance and depth. Nonetheless. they are effective at getting attention. A good example of that is the following meme from the United Nations Council on Women:

Fair enough, if you think Google autofill's prove a problem.

Let's try one on for ourselves:

Fair enough? Still?

Please feel free to join A Voice for Men in the Good Meme Project. Send us your meme that addresses the issues of men and boys, as well as anti-feminist and anti-misandric offerings. We will take the best ones and post them here, and to the AVFM Facebook page.

In His Own Words: Another Beautiful Sociopath

Dr. Tara J. Palmatier · 20 October 2013 · Archived copy · Original

It is day 20 of Domestic Violence Awareness Month for Men and Boys, the invisible victims of domestic violence. Today's In His Own Words is yet another example of the meat grinder men find themselves in when they don't have an understanding of abusive, sociopathic women.

The following is just a fraction of what "Matt's" ex has put him, their children and his family through. She is still playing games with custody and using others to commit proxy violence against Matt. The UK family court system has enabled much of it.

> Life with the Missus
> It began at my workplace. She was younger than me and married, so we were friends and nothing more. After 8 months of friendship, she announced out of the blue that she told her ex-husband she was leaving him. She quickly added the disclaimer, "My leaving him has nothing to do with you."
> I had absolutely no idea she was having any problems with her marriage, and the way she spoke about her husband, it was as if everything was fine. I asked, "Why have you left him then?"
> She claimed she'd been sleeping on the couch for months, and that he'd had sex with three of her 'friends' 5 years ago. She went on to up to say he was a 'useless father' to their 2 kids, and that he was 'lazy.' At the time, I felt very sorry for her, thinking what kind of person could do a thing like that with her friends?
> That was back in 2006.
> A month or so later, she moved into another property with her kids. Shortly thereafter, she invited me to a BBQ she was having and I accepted. At the BBQ, her behaviour was somewhat manic/erratic, but I put that down to the fact she'd had a couple of glasses of wine. Two of my friends who accompanied me told me the next day that 'something wasn't quite right' about her.
> I shrugged their concerns off. I guess that was the beginning for me in making excuses for her behaviour. I felt so sorry for her having such a' rough ride' with her ex. The more she said about him, the bigger a monster he became in my eyes. She also claimed he'd hit her a few times.
>
> That night, we started a relationship and I stayed the night. By morning, my intuition told me I should not get involved, so I distanced myself from her. I didn't see her for a couple of weeks until I 'bumped into' her at work. In fact, she saw me arrive at work, and approached my car before I had got out of it.
> ' Hi,' she says. 'How have you been? I haven't seen you for ages.' We chatted, she seemed a lot different than she was before, and came across as much nicer. We arranged to meet up in the daytime and go for lunch. She was apparently very 'into me' and made me feel like I could do no wrong.
> The relationship blossomed. By this time, I had dismissed my friends' remarks and my initial intuitive feelings. As far as I could tell, I had this gorgeous girl who was extremely nice and made me feel fantastic.
> Things got better and better. Soon she began pushing to make the relationship into something more permanent. I was helpless to resist, and let her move into my home.
> She was very sociable, and wanted us to go out regularly as a couple. In fact, she insisted we not go out anywhere alone, as that's how mistrust begins. To be honest, I was ok with that, as I enjoyed her company very much. At this point, I hadn't realised the true implications of her intent.
> I have a craft hobby, one that I have always done and like to spend the odd few hours, now and again, pursuing. Prior to our romance, she had never expressed any objection toward my hobby. In fact, she seemed to be enthralled by it, and positively encouraged it.
> One day, she playfully said, 'Attention please.' Well, we spent pretty much all of my spare time practically glued together, always wanting close contact, cuddles on the couch, watching TV, etc. I had never met anyone who had wanted such close contact on a regular basis as she.

I didn't mind and actually found it quite flattering, at first. However, it soon became clear that she wanted more and more closeness. I generally have no problems with intimacy, but realised it was becoming too much. Soon the time I spent on my hobby and myself had become extremely limited. Time spent on my hobby or any time spent without her was met with derision, to the point I felt guilty about wanting to engage in any pastime that didn't include her.

She then discussed the possibility of having children. To be honest, I welcomed the idea. I'd had a family some years before, which crumbled when my first ex-wife resumed a relationship with a man she dated before me. After we divorced, I lost everyday contact with our kids, which hurt me very much. Seeing them every other weekend may be long for a family again.

So when the opportunity arose to have another family with this woman, who I loved very much, presented itself, I gleefully took the offer. Shortly after, she was pregnant with our first child.

We married when my ex-wife was 7 months pregnant. When our daughter was born, I was like a man possessed. I could not hide my happiness, and felt like the cat that got the cream. Here I was, with a beautiful, charming, funny, attentive wife, and a beautiful new baby. I was so happy, words cannot describe!

This is when another red flag reared it's ugly head. I noticed that my wife was becoming jealous of our baby. One day, she said, "I can see the love in your eyes when you look at her, why don't you look at me like that?" Her words burnt into my memory. This really shocked me. I rationalised her comment by telling myself it's probably my fault, and maybe it was true, maybe I did show her too much attention, and had somehow neglected my wife to some degree in the process.

Time went by, and the bond with my child grew stronger. Every day, I would think how lucky I was. I just couldn't stop smiling. I have a DSLR camera. I put it to good use taking lots of pictures of my wife and baby together, and lots of my little one as she began to make progress in her early life. Stuff I believe most normal dads would do.

Over time, the jealousy toward our infant child got worse and worse. My wife was becoming upset, and I found myself reassuring her that I loved her as much as always, but was just excited to find myself in the position of being a daddy again.

Things started to settle (or so I thought) and we had minor problems as most couples do. My wife decided that it would be wonderful to have another child. From the outset of her pregnancy, my ex became more irritated by little things, which I attributed to pregnancy hormones. She began a pattern of packing her things and driving our daughter to her mother's house, saying I 'don't love' her, and that she was leaving for good.

She'd return the next day, and I pulled out all the stops to show her that I loved her. Sadly, she just became more convinced that I didn't love her. I was becoming more and more stressed. She left a total of 5 times, returning the next day. When she left for the fifth time, she was 5 months pregnant with our little boy.

As usual, she was screaming and crying, saying I don't love her over and over. As she went to leave, I decided she was going to stay. I locked the front door and removed the key. I didn't want her driving with my daughter and unborn baby in such a state of upset. My ex had had 5 car crashes of varying degrees in the past, but on this occasion her mental state was far worse. I wanted her to stay put until she calmed down.

She went for the front door again and tried to kick me in my testicles (I was standing in front of the door). I deflected her leg with mine, and my knee gently brushed over her abdomen. The argument got heated. I tried to put her on the couch in a vain attempt to get her to calm down. She pulled the telephone receiver above her head and dialed the police emergency number.

I took the phone from her hand, and ended the call. She was still crying and screaming and lashing out with her arms. I restrained her arms to stop receiving blows. Around 10 minutes later, an officer from the traffic division knocked on my door, I went to the door and unlocked it to let him inside, he observed that I had to unlock the door, and obviously I suppose, guessed I had locked her in, making me look like the bad guy.

He stated he would be leaving soon and that the regular uniformed police were coming to take over. Ex was crying on the couch. The regular police officers arrived, and the traffic cop left. Two more police officers arrived, one male and one female. The female officer very quickly assumed the worse when my wife told her I had 'kicked' her in the stomach.

I was arrested and taken to the Police Station in a police car. It was very humiliating, as I my neighbours, who must have heard the noise, saw me being taken away in a police car. Before locking me up, they took a DNA swab from my mouth, photographs and my fingerprints. This was easily the most humiliating experience of my life.

I was trying to protect my ex and the kids (one unborn) by keeping her in the house. She is an awful driver at the best of times, has a history of five accidents. She once smashed into a stationary car claiming she 'forgot to brake,' so you can see why I was concerned for my kids' safety.

My wife was examined by a Police Doctor, while I was detained in the cells. Eventually, I was herded into another room for a taped interview. I told the officers that I'd reached the end of my tether. I was frustrated, and,yes, I shouted at her as she did to me. I told the police I was desperate to keep her at home because I was worried about her driving in that state with my children in the car.

After a couple of hours, I was taken to the desk sergeant. He told me I was free to leave with a letter declaring NFA (No Further Action). They informed me that they found no marks on her body, and that our unborn baby was fine. The female police officer told me she had spoken to my wife, who had described our relationship as 'passionate' and that she loved me very much!

My ex-wife later said her 'hormones were to blame' for her behaviour. That was in December 2008.

Time passed and things were generally better, but she still accused me of varying different crimes like having affairs at work. She would always ask who I was working with, are there any new girls on shift, and what are they like, etc. She would phone during night shifts at the hospital where I work, usually around 2 AM. My colleagues asked why she called in the early hours of the morning. I can only assume it was because she wanted to see if I was actually at work, and not at some woman's house having illicit relations!

Our son was born in April 2009. It was a very difficult time. My ex had started arguing again, accusing me of having affairs, saying I didn't love her, and that she was leaving. By this time, I was worn down. These accusations occurred on a regular basis and no amount of logic or reassurance worked.

On the morning the Health Visitor was coming to check on our son, I was getting more and more upset, as she was preparing to leave me yet again. By the time the HV arrived, I was in a terrible state, shaking, frightened and confused. My wife was calm, and to all intents and purposes, appeared ok. The HV lady quickly picked up on my emotional state and thought that I was mentally imbalanced.

In fact, she was correct. I had suffered months upon months of incessant emotional abuse and was close to breaking point as she was about to leave again, taking our children with her. The HV asked if I was ok. I didn't want the her to know that my ex was leaving. I replied that I was depressed. I was pacing around a lot, as I always do when I'm upset.

The HV asked me to sit down, and I started crying. My son started crying in the HV's arms. She asked me if I would like to hold him, but I was in no fit state to comfort him, so had to refuse. She asked, 'Does his crying make you angry?' I said everything was upsetting me, meaning my whole home situation. The HV later told my ex-wife that she was 'worried' about my being around him.

I felt so much shame that my wife was yet again leaving me, that I couldn't discuss the reasons why I was so upset. I said I felt depressed and the HV referred me to book an appointment with my GP.

I have no idea whether that HV told my ex-wife that she had concerns over me being with the baby or not.

Whether it was true or not, my ex repeated it over and over to make me feel bad, as she really seems to love hurting me in anyway she can. To this day, she maintains I told the HV I don't like our son. I never uttered those words, and have since heard she has told anyone who will listen the same thing.

Adding to my stress and depression, our household bills were being paid, but not the mortgage. It was 2 months in arrears. My wife had a habit of buying and consuming 4 litres of Coke drink per day. She'd had this habit since we first met. I tried in vain to wean her off of it. The convenience store across the street was her preferred purchasing point for the Coke, being expensive at £1.50 per bottle. That's £84 per month on Coke alone, plus her 40 cigarette per day habit, equating to (most days) £8/day= £150-£200 per month (some days she smoked 20, most days she smoked 40).

Incidentally, she smoked all the way through both pregnancies, even though she assured me she would quit before the second pregnancy (she didn't). Our daughter has severe asthma, and needs medication to keep her well now. My ex also has asthma, poorly controlled. She won't use her inhalers regularly, particularly the steroid based inhaler, which is designed to stave off further attacks if used daily. Despite doctor's advice, she wouldn't use it, as she was fearful the steroid content would make her 'fat.' It would be impossible in such small doses, but she knew better.

One day I found a packet of Prozac. One of its possible side effects is weight loss. She had either lied or coerced her GP to prescribe it. She was hardly eating and taking swigs from a bottle of 'Effico' tonic to lose weight. She was a size 6, at just over 5′ tall, that is skinny, but insisted she was fat. She probably asked me 30 times a day if she looked fat (no kidding). If we were ever going out for an evening, she would try on at least 8-10 different outfits (dresses). She would ask me, and anyone else who might be present, if she looked fat, over and over.

My ex had many, many dresses. She would come home most days with new outfits, saying she bought them from charity shops. In reality, they were NEW dresses, so no wonder the mortgage was falling behind. At the beginning of our relationship, one of her friends remarked that my ex was 'High Maintenance.' I thought she was just kidding, but that's exactly how she is.

When our son was 6 weeks old, she finally moved out for good. My father had just passed away from cancer. She and I had been looking after him for some time. He and my mother divorced 20 years before, and he purchased a mobile home/trailer. My wife started a friendship with my father that had dark dynamics.

She had worked on my father, playing the victim and generally taking him in. She pretty much destroyed my relationship with him. He even gave his collection of expensive shotguns to her ex-husband before me. I know, it's all very, very weird. When he died, he left his home to her. He made a will, essentially leaving 5K to each of his grandchildren upon the sale of his home.

He specifically asked my ex not to sell the home back to the site owner, as he knew he would only offer around 5-6 k maximum (the home was worth 18-20k on the market). She sold it about a month after his death to the site owner, for a mere 5k. The grandchildren lost out, and she wasted the money in a few weeks.

By this time, my ex had rented a property in a village about 8 miles from me. I was still living in my home, working long hours, and negotiating with the mortgage company to clear up the arrears. One day she brought the children to the hospital restaurant to meet me for breakfast.

All seemed well and she was in a good mood for a change. I went home to bed. I woke around 4pm, and sent a text asking how the kids were. She replied, 'Leave me and my children alone'. I text her back, no reply. I tried calling her, she wouldn't pick up, so decided that I must go there as I had no idea why I had received that text, and needed to know.

When I arrived, she wasn't home. I so sat in the garden with a drink to wait. She arrived 15 minutes later and saw me in the garden. She opened the door and shouted very loudly, 'Fuck off!! What the fuck are you doing here!!!!" She slammed the door and locked it. I didn't say a word, and just continued to sit there.

Ten minutes later, she opened the door and yelled, 'I thought I told you to fuck off, now fuck off and leave us alone!!' She went back inside, leaving the door open. I gingerly went in behind her saying 'I can see you're angry, but honestly I have no idea why you sent me that text. Please just tell me and I'll go.' She said, 'It was your son's eye appointment today. He could be blind and you couldn't be bothered to come along, now fuck off and leave us alone!!!'

My daughter was in another room. She caught sight of me and ran towards me saying, 'Daddy!' with a big smile across her face. My ex literally pulled our daughter by one arm into the air and caught her. 'He's not your daddy! I'm going to find you a proper daddy, now FUCK OFF! you are no better than a piece of shit on my shoes, die, die, DIE!!!!!!' Our baby boy looked terrified at his mother's outburst.

I went to comfort him. When she realised what I was about to do, she pulled him out of his walker by one arm, flung him into the air, and caught him in her other arm. I was astounded, confused and utterly speechless by this uncontrolled demonstration of staggering venom. Our children were frightened and I was powerless to help, as I knew anything I did would make her worse.

Moments later, her phone rang. It was a friend. Her demeanour and tone instantly changed from vile, loud, violent abusive fisherman's wife into 1000% victim. In a crocodile tear voice she says, 'Can you please come around? Matt is here and I don't want him here. He's frightening the children.'

Maybe I should have left at this point, but I know my ex too well. I knew she would twist things around and blame me for her actions. I thought leaving would make me look guilty, so I went into another room and waited. Her friend and her friend's boyfriend arrived minutes later. Ex is now in full victim mode and doing it very well.

Her friend's boyfriend (a part-time 'special' constable) said I had to leave. I calmly explained I was there to find out why I got the text that afternoon and to sort things out. I said I had no intention of leaving, as my children had been abused. Next thing I know, he swiftly put my arm up my back, as police officers do, and I'm unable to move. His girlfriend called the proper police, obviously believing I'm the aggressor.

The police soon arrived. They could see I was a concerned father, wanting to get to the bottom of the horrible text message I received. Yet, they believed her, and told me to leave. The next day, she texted saying the police installed alarms within the property and that I must keep away!

One week or so later, my mother was due to collect the children for an access visit with me. I had no intention of going to my ex's after the police visit. I asked my mother to tell her that I'd had all I could take and I wanted a divorce. After hearing that I wanted a divorce, my ex cried to her mother (who was also there), saying, 'But I love him!!!'

The next week, I received a text asking me if I would meet her at my dead father's now empty mobile home. She claimed she wanted to talk about kid access arrangements and that she had something she needed to tell me face to face. I agreed, and went to meet her.

When she arrived, I asked what she wanted to discuss. She never once mentioned the children. Instead she told me she was 'seeing someone.' I replied, 'Ok, good for you. Now have you anything to say about child access?' She persisted, 'A (ex-husband) is fuming as D is his best friend (new boyfriend).' She even smirked as she was saying it.

I said nothing. As I was about to leave, she pulled a brand new expensive phone from her bag, not to use, but to show it off to me 'That's nice,' I said . 'Yeah, it's a present.' 'Nice,' I said and turned to leave. Then she said, 'You scare me, Matt. I'm taking out an injunction (non-molestation order) against you.' Thinking she was trying to be funny, I laughed and said, 'It's me that needs protection from you!' I'd heard enough and left, not paying any attention to her comments, as there were no grounds, or indeed, evidence.

Four days later, I was at home when someone began banging very loudly on my front door. I looked down from an upstairs window and saw a huge body builder type guy pounding on my door. He saw me, too.

'I can fucking see you up there with a white shirt on, come down and open the fucking door.' Of course, I had > no idea who this guy was and stayed put. He put something through my letterbox and left. To my shock and surprise, it was an affidavit with pages and pages of alleged domestic violence, carried out by me! It was painful to read. No wonder the guy delivering was so aggressive. My ex had made me look like Attilla the Hun!

> It was surreal. Here I was reading about scores and scores of alleged abuse, when in fact, she was the abuser. I was in shock. If I was such a dangerous and violent abuser, then why meet me in an isolated place (my dead father's mobile home) to tell me she has a new boyfriend???? Huh? Am I missing something???
> Her defence to that was, 'I had 999 ready to dial on my phone, so if you attacked me, I could call the police.' Crazy, just totally and all consumingly nuts. I went though months of hell for that, not seeing my children, and being subjected to further abuse from her, using Facebook.
> She coerced friends of mine to come over to her house one Saturday for a BBQ. She then got a friend to photograph her with my friends and her new boyfriend, cuddling him and looking so happy happy. She published these photos on Facebook, along with more abusive pictures over the following weeks. Pictures of her new boyfriend holding our son in his arms with a feeding bottle, him standing over my son as he takes his first crawl, and other photos designed to hurt as much as possible.
> By this time, I had a lawyer to get access back to my children. I printed the Facebook filth to show her. She said it looked like my ex was trying to get me to break the terms of the injunction, but, of course, I could already see that. I didn't take the bait and stayed out of her way, no texts, nothing, no contact whatsoever. Just one text, or email and I could've been arrested.

The criminal injustice system in the United States

The Criminal Injustice System in the United States

When we consider the truth, that The United States has less than 5% of the world's population, yet has more than 25% of its prisoners, it does not sound right to any of us. How do we hold ourselves out to be the standard of justice and freedom in that statistical quagmire? How did we get to this point – and how do we get to a better place?

Like all complex problems the answers are not simple. Somewhere we forgot to notice what we were doing to ourselves. Fear seeped through the cracks in our societal confidence and we began to legislate in reaction to our fears instead of legislating in support of our inherent Constitutional equality. Our government began to work for the powerful elements in our society against the powerless among us. Privilege was given preference over those without privilege. It became more important to protect those with privilege from the real needs of the poor.

The operation of the justice delivery system became an expensive bidding war. Those with more money could afford more justice than the rest of us. The result was the imprisonment of the poor. Law enforcement translated that largely into race: Poor = Black and Hispanic in various parts of the country when applied to the "War on Drugs." That made it easy for racial, ethnic and class disparities in courts and prisons. Another complication was every session of every state's legislature adopted the philosophy that the solution to every problem was to craft a new criminal law or enhance the punishment of an existing law. The police powers of every state, local and even the nation itself became more like those in a different form of government than the democratic republic we hold ourselves out to be.

But even with the racial angle, we should remember a little-noticed fact is that so-called "white trash," poor whites, were and are targeted too, that the most vulnerable men are usually men who grew up without fathers in the home, and that while it was once an industry that depended on poor minorities, now it just depends on locking up men in general. In hindsight we could say we should have cared about all this sooner, but the bottom line is if you're interested in the welfare of men and boys, then the prison-industrial complex in the US should be something you give a damn about.

We have too many men (and yes, some women) locked up, for too little reason, for too much time, it's not working and we cannot afford it.

Those we send to prison come out less able to live in our neighborhoods than before they went in. Locking people up for drug use and possession in a very Pavlovian sense only conditions them into associating freedom with access to drugs and/or alcohol. Prisons become revolving doors of high rates of recidivism and the few that do not return to prison have limited opportunity to earn a living for their families and are foreclosed from much of the housing and almost all of the public assistance afforded others.

Treatment for drug users works much better and is much less expensive. The same can be said of those who steal. Probation is far more successful than imprisonment. Most theft is driven by poverty and if we hope to reduce the incidence of theft, we could perhaps create jobs convenient to those who need them.

The sole purpose of prisons should be to contain those who would do others harm. We can no longer afford to lock up those we do not like. All sentences in almost all states reflect our desire to "get even" and not any notion of an effort to rehabilitate. We should devote the time in prison to training and education not to slave labor and warehousing inmates to deteriorate in our custody.

We should open the institutions up so they are not isolated from a normal society. How do inmates learn to live in a normal world if we cage them in a contained predatory and aberrant society? There are ghettos, barrios, and trailer parks out here where the residents have adopted the social norms of prisons because those places are the only places former inmates can return to.

Prisons too are warehouses for those with treatable mental and emotional problems. If anyone behaves differently, we tend to want to get them out of sight so naturally we send these most vulnerable people to institutions designed to abuse them randomly. It would actually be less expensive to build and staff institutions that could treat their disabilities but we would rather punish them for being different than help them get better.

Under the rubric of the “War on Drugs” the whole idea of mandatory minimum sentencing was created and became a fad fashion in legislative art. Every act that could be criminalized could be enhanced and improved with a fresh set of mandatory minimum sentences. It was madness, rhetorical revenge. It sounded good at the time but made no sense in application.

The new fad fashion is electronic imprisonment. Ankle monitors, sex offender registration and variations on that theme. It seems easy to let the electronics do the work so we write those laws with such a wide brush that we waste energy watching those who are a danger to no one. The consistent reports from those whose job it is to do this supervision is they could easily supervise those who may need watching but their case loads are such that any careful supervision is not possible.

So, what do we do? We start with a serious effort to undo what we have done wrong over the last four decades. We start by bringing the War on Drugs to an end. We reexamine all the legislation that passed to build and enhance that war, removing much of it from the books entirely. We look at the rest of criminal law for things that have hurt more than helped and eliminate or recompose those sections with the objective less imprisonment and more solving the problem or its underlying causes. We restore mental and emotional problems including sexual laws and drug addiction to a treatment model to correct harmful behavior more effectively.

We tell the private prison business to stop planning to make more profit from locking people up in their warehouses and invest in treatment modules that better suit the new thinking.

Most importantly, we as a society must deal with our racism, ethnic prejudices and class divisions. We can live in a better and safer world, if we all decide one is worth the effort.

Leaving the sisterhood: A recovering feminist speaks

Elly Tams · 20 October 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Note: This article is also available in Spanish, Swedish and Romanian.

[dropcap]T[/dropcap]here is a recently published book by a group of feminists in the UK, entitled The Lightbulb Moment. It is a collection of accounts by women about the precise moment they "saw the light" and became feminists. Religious, Road To Damascus style imagery aside, this book's title resonates with me. I have experienced quite a few "lightbulb moments" myself with regards to feminism, especially in the last two years. But my realizations and illuminations have been of a quite different nature to those described in the book. For I am writing this after having been raised, educated and – yes – indoctrinated in feminist dogma for over 40 years, but my "journey" has involved leaving the sisterhood. And the sisterhood, that lovely, touchy-feely, all-girls-together, "feminine" club has punished me severely for my decision.

In 2010 I began writing a blog, using the pseudonym Quiet Riot Girl. I have been a participant in a few online communities over the years, and I have always enjoyed the way they give us the opportunity to play with our identities, develop personas and explore ideas and practices we may not have done under our "real names." But when I created Quiet Riot Girl, I had no idea just how life-changing my explorations would be. I was still a feminist when I started blogging (and tweeting) in 2010. As a critical feminist, I was aware how divided and sometimes incoherent feminists are on important issues such as sex, economics and bodily autonomy. But I was a "sister" nonetheless. If you take a look at my first QRG Blog you will see how clearly I identified as a feminist back then. But only a year later I had completely split from feminism and was writing as an "anti-feminist," for example in my controversial essay, Against Feminisms.

So what changed? And why? My rejection of feminism (and its rejection of me) is not just about choosing to use different labels to identify myself and my politics these days. This has been a dramatic sea-change on my part, which means I see the world completely differently now. There have been quite a few twists and turns in my personal 'revolution'. Here are some of the key ones.

1) Rape Culture And Other Feminist Myths

The feminist blogosphere is full of articles and discussions describing what feminists call "rape culture." According to them, women are not able to walk down the street or enjoy a drink in a bar without the fear of being hit on, harassed, and raped by men, those dirty dogs. When I first began engaging with feminists online, I was immediately struck by the fact that I did not recognize the phenomenon of "rape culture" they were talking about. And I certainly did not recognize men to be villains, as they were portraying them. I noticed that both men as a whole and individual men were being demonized by feminists. Julian Assange for example, still has not even been charged by the authorities, but feminist bloggers have already branded him a "rapist."

In 2010 I wrote a piece called Why Rapist Is A Dirty Word and the reactions from feminists were telling. Some (as you can see in the comments) said I had no right to speak about rape as I have never been raped. Others called me a "rape apologist" or said I was "rapey!" My status as a woman was put into question, and "sisters" called for my feminism card to be revoked. When I tried to get my work on rape culture published by feminist websites and publications online, I was met with stony silence. It seemed as if I had broken a "taboo." Undeterred, I continued to explore the issue and in September 2011, having given up on challenging the concept of rape culture within feminism, I had my article Rape Culture And Other Feminist Myths published at the Good Men Project. In that piece I said:

> When I hear the word "rapist" I think of a man, and not a man who is capable of change, of reflection. We have to speak about and talk to men who commit sexual assault as if they are able to change, and we also must acknowledge men are not the only perpetrators, if we want to reduce sexual and intimate partner violence in society. Rape Culture is a myth. I reject it outright.

As a result of my stance, feminists, who still see “rape” as primarily sexual violence done by men to women, rejected me.

2) The Sex Wars

[quote style=”boxed”]When I did finally realize how badly feminism treats men and masculinity, I was not able to identify as feminist anymore.[/quote]

Sex is of course universal, and universally complex. My own sexuality and sexual politics have shifted over time. One of the reasons feminism and I parted company, is the “sex wars.” For all the puritanism that comes out of feminism, those girls are remarkably interested in sex! And especially the evils of heterosexual men.

Back in 2010 I wrote a post called Sex For Sale. Though I now disagree with my former self about much of it, the piece is important to me because it shows how I refused even then to accept the feminist panic over sex work. As I say in the article, “When I talk about sex work I include myself in the picture. And I include you too. If we don’t talk about it as participants, then we are “othering” the women who overtly exchange sex for money. (And now I would say “men and women!”)

The term “othering” is key here. Feminists LOVE to talk about sexual objectification, by which they mean the sexual objectification of women. But I know that in the 21st century, men are also objects of desire, and young men in particular are splashed across billboards and TV screens wearing next to nothing. But this metrosexual masculinity is ignored by feminism. Feminists maintain that it is women, not men who are objectified in our culture. And they love to blame the sex industry, and heterosexual men’s desires, for women’s “othered” status as “sex objects,” as victims of the “male gaze,” and ultimately as victims of sexual violence by men. But in my view it is feminists who objectify men and women the most. Whether they are “sex positive” feminists or “anti-sex and anti-sex industry” feminists, they simplify and objectify people into caricature portraits of “victims” or “perpetrators.” I refuse both labels and therefore I don’t fit the feminist mould.

3) No, Seriously, What About The Men?

The first time I remember hearing the term misandry was only a few years ago. I was a director of a feminist non-profit providing training for women in the music industry. We were at an “equal opportunities” training day and a man there suggested my organization might be sexist. I was angry, and incredibly dismissive of him and his views. I thought the “misandry” that he spoke about didn’t exist.

I don’t want a medal for realizing it does. I am recounting this anecdote to underline just how rare it is for feminists to take sexism against men seriously. During my PhD gender studies program I referred often to a “dictionary of feminist theory.” The entry for “misogyny” was long and detailed. There was no entry for “misandry.”

When I did finally realize how badly feminism treats men and masculinity, I was not able to identify as feminist anymore. In an article at the Good Men Project I wrote about the awful jokey retort feminists and their allies use when anyone brings up men’s issues in a discussion: “whatabouttehmenz?”. Incidentally, I do think I deserve a medal for the fact I was banned from the website called No, Seriously, What About Teh Menz?. NSWATM is supposedly a forum for people who care about men, misandry and masculinity, but I was banned for challenging Sady Doyle, the prominent American feminist blogger, activist and, er…man hater!

The list of well-known feminists who spend a good deal of their time and energy demonizing and putting down men is long. We all have our “favourites” – Amanda Marcotte, Melissa McEwan, Cath Elliott, Jill Filipovic and Gail Dines spring to mind. But I have found myself identifying the UK Guardian journalist Suzanne Moore as particularly guilty of misandry. In one of her weekly columns, Moore relayed a story about her young daughter asking her why she is a feminist. Her reply?

“Because men do horrible, horrible things.”

4) Who Is Silencing Whom?

Feminists, especially online, often talk about Silencing. They claim that men attempt to shut feminist women up using a variety of nasty techniques. These include “mansplaining,” “gaslighting” and “sexual bullying.” I won’t explain the concepts – A Voice For Men readers will be familiar with them, as I am sure they have been used against you in many an argument with feminists. In a rather strange discussion on Feministe blog a while ago, I was accused of all the things men are supposed to do to silence feminists. In fact they called me a man and awarded me an “honorary penis” which I treasure to this day.

The lovely ladies at Feministe also banned me from commenting on their blog. In April 2011 I made a list of all the people who ban and block me online, named after a feminist blog of the same name, called 101 Wankers. I have now reached and surpassed my “target” and have stopped counting. But this didn’t shut me up, so in March 2012 Julie Bindel the well-known anti-sex industry UK feminist, along with some of her friends, “outed” me. My pseudonym Quiet Riot Girl was revealed to belong to me, Elly Tams, and I was labeled an “anti-feminist,” “homophobic,” and a “troll.”

The term “troll” is particularly effective, because it is so generally accepted, way beyond the feminist blogosphere, as a word meaning someone “bad,” “untrustworthy,” “subhuman” even. I have been called a troll on many occasions, and even though I know it is used politically, the label hurts. When there are TV programmes about “RIP trolls” who trawl Facebook for tributes to recently deceased people and then deface them and abuse grieving relatives, it is difficult to be called a troll and stand tall and proud. But overall, in the light of my treatment by feminists and others who don’t like what I have to say, I am left with one question.

Who is silencing whom?

5) Lies, Damn Lies and Statistics

One of the things I have found hardest to accept about feminism is just how incoherent it is, and how it often uses dodgy data and – well, actual lies – to promote and justify its statements. I studied gender to PhD level and beyond, and so have based a lot of my own work on feminist theory and feminist-influenced research. Was it all wrong? The answer is yes and no. In my Against Feminisms essay I show that I reject ALL feminist assumptions and basic positions. But I do not claim everything written by a feminist to be useless. Feminist theorists and writers whose work I have not abandoned altogether include Camille Paglia, Judith Butler and Gayle Rubin. But I think they all still focus too much on women, and women’s issues, which weakens their arguments. I need another article, or maybe a second PhD to demonstrate how feminists are inconsistent in their views, and how research they use is often very poor. But here are a couple of recent examples:

In her recently published book, The Sex Myth, Brooke Magnanti, more famously known as Belle de Jour, showed how anti-sex industry feminists use bad data and poor analysis to come up with what I can only call lies about adult entertainment and “misogyny.” Magnanti shows how feminist campaigners have based some of their activism on wrong stats about the relationship between the number of lap dancing clubs in an area, and the level of rape in that same place. UK based feminist organizations such as Object UK and the Fawcett Society often present "facts" about violence against women that on closer inspection are not facts at all. Or are only part of the story.

The Fawcett Society provide us with another example of feminist dodgy data. They currently have a campaign about the way women are economically hit harder by the recession than men. I find the figures they use to be particularly insulting to all of our intelligence, because they ignore the "fact" that we all know from our own lives, that in the vast majority of cases, men and women live together, are in families whether nuclear or extended, and support each other. Another fact ignored by feminists is how fathers who do not live with their children, and who often don't even have much access to see their children, tend to pay the mothers of their children considerable amounts of money in child support.

6) The Bigger Picture

The issue of fathers and fathers' rights is one which brings me onto my last point. In my recent conflicts with feminists, particularly on the internet, I have found them to be incredibly small-minded, insular and unaware of wider issues in society that don't affect them directly. The feminist blogosphere is dominated by young, white, middle class women who do not have to worry about whether they are allowed to see their children or not, if they are likely to be called up to fight in a war, or where the next meal is coming from. Globally, when it comes to major crises such as famine, natural disasters, armed conflict and unemployment, everyone, not just women, suffers. Even in America, the military draft is compulsory for young men, not women, but feminists have dismissed that as an important gender issue.

The constant whining by well-heeled feminist women about so-called male privilege, was probably the final straw for me as far as my relationship with feminism was concerned. Privilege? What privilege?

In the title of this piece I call myself a "recovering feminist." Whilst I don't think I was "addicted" to feminism, the phrase was deliberate. Giving up the dogma that has dominated my life thus far has not been easy. There are even parallels between how alcohol or drugs, say, can serve as a "prop," a "safety net," a way of trying to avoid some of the harsher aspects of reality and what feminism offered me. Without the comfortable delusion of feminism I am more vulnerable now. Without the "gang," the "club" (the "cult?") I sometimes feel alone. Sometimes I am alone. But I have no regrets. Apart from feminism's misandry, lies, silencing tactics, and oppressive sexual politics, in writing this I have been reminded that even when I was still a feminist, who happened to think for herself, I was cast out and derided. Being a feminist, for me, was often being in the sisterhood without any sisters. I will never go back.

Thanks to Dean Esmay for encouraging me to write this. And thanks to my own sister who was never convinced by feminism, and is enjoying saying "I told you so!"

NB: My spellcheck does not recognize the word "misandry." Maybe my PC is a feminist.

Men, and patriarchy in the church

TyphonBlue and JtO · 20 October 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Patriarchy is a word we're all familiar with, often used in the context of cultural dogma of "The patriarchy". This implies a hidden social structure threading through history, elevating men and suppressing women.

One institution, in particular, is singled out for feminist ire. The Christian Church. According to feminists; Christianity, like all Abrahamic faiths, elevates men above women.

But does it?

The existence of a male priesthood, and a male-headed nation state (the Vatican) both seem to support the feminist conception. But we are all aware of the frontman fallacy; because there is a man in the front, it does not follow that the frontman uses his power to benefit other men. Because Christianity has a male priesthood, is headed by a man and uses masculine language to refer to the God and humanity's savior, does it necessarily follow that Christianity is male favoring?

In Christian tradition of the last two millennia, the books of the New Testament provide a foundation for the spiritual identities of men and women – based on the life of the son of the creator of the universe, born of a virgin mother, and redeemer of all human beings who accept him. Of course, the apparent son of God, who in some variations of the doctrine is the human incarnation of God, fathered by himself on a virgin mother – this is a male avatar of the God on earth.

The masculinity of the Christ is usually taken as evidence for male supremacy fostered through the church and it's long influence on Western culture.

However, simply acknowledging the sex of God's son, or his avatar doesn't justify automatic assumption of male elevation. For men, spiritual identity is tied to service in the form of conformity to the doctrine of the Christ. While men may find a model for identity in the character of the son of the God, according to the books of the new testament, figure had no sexual life. This absence leaves no spiritual connection between the masculine body and the divine.

The Christ is sexless; presumptively masculine, but never actually engaging in any activity unique to his masculine body.

This stands in contrast with the story of the Virgin Mary. She, unlike the Christ, was a human woman who had a relationship with the divine mediated through her own feminine physicality. The Virgin conceived, gestated, gave birth and nursed the Infant Jesus. Absent a human father, Mary's conception, pregnancy and birth of God's avatar on Earth are all deeply and supernaturally rooted in the female body. As the mother of the Christ, Mary was the one human being who came closest to God.

The implicit stricture of making the female body the vessel of Holy Spirit while offering no corresponding connection between the divine and the male body creates a spiritual caste system with women on top and men on the bottom. But this is not the only or even the worst form of virulent misandry in Christianity.

The birth of Christ is without sin because, quite simply, it did not involve a penis. The entire mythology around the birth of Christ implicitly indicts male sexuality as the vector of original sin from generation to generation. This is not explicitly stated, but the conclusion is inescapable.

Saint Augustine of Hippo (354–430 C.E.) was a principal theologian and philosopher of the early Christianity, and credited with responsibility for the merging of Greek philosophical tradition with Judeo-Christian religious and scriptural traditions[1]. A seminal member of the early church, Augustine denigrated male sexual desire and turned the Fascinus[2] into the demon rod.

"the organ was a lever of sin: "the demon rod." Semen itself was a toxic glue, effectively damning both men and women to a state of sin, a neat one-two punch that rendered sex dirty by definition. Erections were less spiritual highs than demonic jolts, an interpretation that was to ripple through much of Western culture."[3]

Augustine's wrote City of God to discredit and undermine existing pagan traditions which did not denigrate male sexuality and were in direct competition with the Church for the hearts and minds of the citizens of Rome. In City of God he stated:

"when sexual intercourse is spoken of now, it suggests to men's thoughts not such a placid obedience to the will as is conceivable in our first parents, but such violent acting of lust as they themselves have experienced."[4]

Forget Eve. Forget the fruit of the tree of knowledge of good and evil and the Serpent. If all human women, tomorrow, conceived and gestated and gave birth without ever coming into contact with a penis, our race would be purged of original sin.

Would anyone care to speculate where Radical Feminists got their ideas from?

Indeed even mainstream feminists cling to their insistence in blaming all the world's ills on men. Not just patriarchal oppression, but domestic violence, rape, child abuse, war, financial crises; all original sin can be laid at the feet of men. Or their penises.

In Christianity a woman's experience of her body's uniquely feminine characteristics (sans male influence) brings her closer to God; a man's experience of his body's uniquely masculine characteristics drives him into damnation.

By contrast, the pagan traditions displaced by Abrahamic monotheism provided a path to spirituality for men and women through the experience of their own bodies. Women, quite obviously had then, and still retain a naturalistic spiritual identity as creators of life through the act of childbirth. This is preserved in the mythology of the Virgin Mary. But in most pagan traditions, men also have a connection to the divine through their own bodies, semen and the penis itself were both seen as symbols of divine generative power. It is this aspect of the spiritual masculine which is excised by the mythology of the Church.

"We speak of things which are now shameful, and although we try, as well as we are able, to conceive them as they were before they became shameful, […] For since that which I have been speaking of was not experienced even by those who might have experienced it—I mean our first parents (for sin and its merited banishment from Paradise anticipated this passionless generation on their part)—when sexual intercourse is spoken of now, it suggests to men's thoughts not such a placid obedience to the will as is conceivable in our first parents, but such violent acting of lust as they themselves have experienced."[4]

Christ, the asexual model of male virtue did have a female disciple, specifically Mary Magdelen. However, the gospel of Mary although it exists today in fragmentary form, was excluded from cannon. The gospel of Thomas, also excluded mentions that Mary was the favored and closest disciple of the figure we know as Jesus. Why then would the testament of both Mary and Thomas be omitted? If Christ had a scripturally acknowledged intimate relationship with a woman, this might represent a recognition of the acceptability of male sexuality.

Our culture's war against masculine identity, male sexuality and fatherhood is an old one. That war arguably began as we adopted a faith which marginalizes the role of men in procreation, idolizing a story that removes them completely from the process. The exemplar of male virtue in this theology is a man who had no natural sexual expression, although his character is designated as male. And his primary purpose was to be flogged, literally tortured for the "crimes" of others, and then bound and nailed through his limbs, still alive to an erected cruciform scaffold, to die from shock and exposure on a hilltop. And we somehow manage to claim that this religion elevates men over women?

Rather than supremacy, Christianity provides to men the role of asexual stewards of women's benefit, and sacrificial penitent, preaching the gospel of a female-deifying, male-demonizing faith. It is true that women have not historically been allowed to front this farce, but mostly because that would make the message too obvious.

But we continue to ignore all of this, and we entertain the farce that our religious institutions constitute a maleelevating, female oppressing patriarchy.

Yeah, tell us another one.

A meme and a link to FTSU Central

Paul Elam · 20 October 2013 · Archived copy · Original

I fell in love with this meme the second I saw it. So it is serving me well as I wanted an excuse to bring you a link to the Daily Beast article by R. Tod Kelly on the MHRM that just came out.

http://www.thedailybeast.com/articles/2013/10/20/the-masculine-mystique-inside-the-men-s-rights-movement-mrm.html

I sense a bit of commenting will be happening over there.

I just emailed Kelly a thank you. He got some stuff wrong for sure, and I will be addressing that in an upcoming piece, but for now Mr. Kelly has done exactly what I intended mainstream writers to actually do when I set out to provoke the mainstream into reacting. He attacked us, but actually spent some real time being in something other than in a drunkards denial about many of the issues for which we advocate. He even nailed a couple of them. He doesn't get a pass on the mistakes, but credit due is credit due.

I am all smiles here. The worm is turning, and AVFM is turning it, if you will allow me to say so.

Oh yes, the meme. Please pass it around and while you are at it, maybe click on over to The Beast and do some FTSU on the feminists who will certainly be coming there to wail and gnash teeth.

In His Own Words: Quiet lives of desperation

Dr. Tara J. Palmatier · 21 October 2013 · Archived copy · Original

It's day 21 of Domestic Violence Awareness Month for Men and Boys, the invisible victims of domestic violence. Today's In His Own Words is yet another all too common tale.

For many male abuse victims, it is both painful and humiliating to admit they are, in fact, being abused. Men are supposed to be "strong." Therefore, acknowledging the abuse is akin, wrongly, to being "weak."

It's often easier for men to acknowledge physical abuse as abuse. A plate flying at your head or a kick in the nuts are obvious assaults. Emotional abuse, particularly covert emotional abuse, is much more insidious and difficult to identify — especially if you've been told and believe that men cannot be abused by women.

"SWM2010″ was married to his abuser for 15 years. After two kids and a nervous breakdown, he finally found the courage to leave his emotionally abusive wife.

> Quiet Lives of Desperation
> I originally wrote this in 2009 on another website that didn't appreciate my gallows humor, so I stopped going there when I found Shrink4Men. I am 4 years past my divorce and happy. Recalling my life with Crazy and how far I allowed myself to sink has set me back emotionally. It now makes me sick that I once lived this way.
> I lived with a borderline personality disordered spouse for 15 years. When we first got together in 1992, she was fun, the straw that stirred the drink. She was a professional when we met making 60k a year, I had a high school diploma. She saw my potential, the potential my parents never nurtured and got me through college.
> She essentially did a hard sell job on what an ideal partner she'd be for me, so I asked her to marry me. During our engagement, I saw what should have been the first sign of things to come. I attributed her pre-wedding anger/frustration to the stress of planning the event. I was wrong. After the wedding, her behavior became worse, not better.
>
> On the second day of our marriage, she actually said, "I feel like you think you made a mistake and are looking for a way out." Great way to start a marriage. Now I know that this was a sign that she had abandonment issues. Her pathology began to emerge more and more as I finished my college degree.
> I wanted to be a social worker. Needless to say, my career choice was perceived as a threat. I started keeping things to myself regarding my career, like volunteering at an agency for a year that I would later work for. I simply interviewed, came home and told her that it was what I was doing. She did not support this, even though it put me on the path to make as much money as she did and gave us better benefits. She resented that I chose my career, as her father had chosen her academic major. If she'd followed her interests, he would not have helped her financially. He's a prick, but that's a story for another day.
> "Arguments" (at least that's what she called them) would come out of nowhere. I quickly became a non-participant in her rants because they made no sense and left me completely bewildered. It would usually end with me apologizing just to get her to shut her mouth and give me a moment's peace. I would hug her and tell her I would change.
> I became so conditioned to expect a rage rant every time I came home, that I soon began to dread coming home. I developed physical symptoms from the non-stop stress. I felt a physical sensation in my head. I didn't feel right, it was a block. It went on like this for 15 years.
> Her rages would come and go. Oftentimes, they weren't about anything in particular. Or, she would rage about money, money that she complained we never had, but still found ways to spend. We refinanced two or three times, took out two consolidated loans for credit card debt and she borrowed against her 401k at least that many times. She'd had financial problems during her college days, too. Back then, her parents bailed her out. After we married, it was my turn to do the same.

We had our son in 1996, and our daughter 16 months later. She insisted on becoming pregnant with our son while I was still in school. School was my time, once it ended she let me know it was “her time” again.

Our daughter had a bad case of colic and my ex took it personally. She would say our infant daughter “hated” her because she was colicky. I was up with our daughter just about every night for almost a year trying to comfort her. I was exhausted. One night after coming to bed at approximately 5am after two hours of our baby daughter crying, our son jumped into our bed and woke us up.

I groggily said, “What am I, in hell?” BAM! She hit me in front of our son who didn’t say anything because he was too young to say anything. I didn’t say anything either. I laid back down and pretended to sleep. I spent the rest of the day pretending like it never happened.

At least three or four times a year she would ask, out of the blue, if I was leaving her. I could feel the blood literally leave my body when she asked this. In my mind, I shouted, “Yes!” but I was so afraid of her reaction that I would blow sunshine up her ass and tell her she was the “one” and I knew it the first day we met. I know I wasn’t being sincere and I own that.

I was accused of having numerous affairs over the years. If I got home 5 minutes late, I was banging my boss or this woman or that woman. Any time I had to work late, whenever possible, I’d call home using an alternate phone that would show up on the caller ID, such as a police station or hospital, just so she’d know I was working. It got to the point to where my focus became returning home on time instead of doing a thorough investigation.

Looking back, I see how she manipulated me into staying with her by making me dependent on her and her approval. She maintained had the upper hand. She paid the bills and never let me see the books. She took out credit cards without my knowledge. We weren’t able to save for anything while I was with her. Delayed gratification was not in her vocabulary.

She would actually get pissed off when I suggested saving for a trip or a piece of furniture. “No worries,” she’d say, “I will work extra to pay that bill.” She would work extra, but that became “found money” and it never went where it should have gone.

She claimed that she never lied to me ever, but she did. Lies by omission are still lies. I did lie to her. I lied in order to survive living with her. I put my happiness aside in order to keep her happy. I let her think I concurred with all of her opinions. What a stupid co-dependent I was! She will tell you that this was one of the reasons that we got along so well, we never fought. To an extent that was true. I didn’t fight with her because I didn’t want to deal with her borderline rage. I surrendered my sense of self to keep the peace, but it quickly took its toll on me.

In 2000, she told me I needed to go to therapy because I seemed depressed. She was right, I was depressed. The “block” or detachment I employed as a defense was still in effect. I did this to numb myself as I decided it was safer not to feel anything. I tried to keep our kids on the “safe” side of the fence with me, but that proved to be too difficult and I detached from them as well (I was able to work through this eventually).

I was diagnosed with mild depression and prescribed Prozac. I told her the medication worked; it didn’t. It didn’t work because my depression was not the problem. It was a symptom of the problem — us. At that point in our marriage, I was defeated. I was too weak to confront the issue. She had taken the fight out of me and continued to slowly erode my self-esteem.

Six months into our marriage, I was taking a nap. I was on winter break from college and she was working. Typically, she would call me two to three times a day, which I now know was about her abandonment and control issues. She was checking up on me even then. She called, heard the grogginess in my voice and literally ripped me a new asshole. “How dare you take a nap while I’m here hard at work?! You are such an insensitive, selfish prick!” I apologized, again, just to shut her up.

When our son was 3 months old, she had a 60-mile commute home and a bad snowstorm was on its way. I told her not to take the risk and to either spend the night at a hotel or at a friend’s house. She refused to do either of these things. She became angry and let me know she was not going to be told what to do.

She drove home in our Honda Civic, calling me every 30 minutes or so, terrified by the hazardous road conditions. With each call, I became a little more amped up. I practiced the speech I was going to give her when she, hopefully, made it home. Over the years, I had countless arguments with her in my mind where I would win.

I thought I had a good case that time. We had a 3-month old son and she put her life at risk. She was being completely irresponsible. She finally arrived, opened the door and I couldn't get the words out. I experienced the blood leaving my body (like an all over pins and needles sensation) and felt sick to my stomach.

She went on a tirade that still gives me flashbacks to this day every time it snows. She blamed me for her decision to drive home in a blizzard. It was my fault again, naturally. She derided me, my job and my salary. It was my fault I didn't earn more money, so we could have a SUV. If we had a SUV, she wouldn't have needed to put her life in danger. Given how screwed up I was at the time, this made sense. Now I just feel emasculated whenever I think about it.

Things that should have been non-issues, were issues — even something as mundane as grocery shopping. I eventually stopped grocery shopping. According to her, I always screwed it up. If I forgot something? "What is the matter with you?!" If I couldn't find something? "You didn't look hard enough!" She would often come home from shopping trips without everything on the list, but did I give it back to her? No. I wanted to — I fantasized about handing all of her shit right back to her, but I couldn't do it.

I have helped countless numbers of children of abusive and neglectful parents. I can write the most compelling affidavits with evidence that clearly indicates that children are unsafe, which are then signed by Judges. But I can't make a god damned decision in the fucking grocery store. Want to know what finally killed it?

In February 2009, she made a grocery list and I lost the list. I went into a panic and left a pre-emptive voice mail and text message. "I'm sorry, honey. I lost the list." I was 39-years old and sweated losing a fucking shopping list. After almost 15 years with her, I knew what was coming my way and she did it again. She ripped me a new one for losing the list. She left me crying and humiliated with even less self-esteem and self-worth!

The never-ending list of gaslighting and nonsensical arguments are too long to list. These are just a few examples of what being married to her was like. We had the typical domestic violence cycle of peace, tension and explosion. I could always feel it coming.

She never supported my career. At one point, I had about 10 interviews for a promotion. I tanked the first few and did she support me or offer me encouragement? No, I got, "You'll never get promoted! Why don't you quit your stupid job and get your Masters?! What, are you going to be a child abuse investigator when you're 50?"

What I wanted to say to her but didn't is, "Yeah, maybe I will. I love what I do. I've saved lives and I know it. How dare you take that away from me? I have been in places that you wouldn't have the guts to even drive by in the safety of your car. Drug dealers, gang bangers, baby rapists, psycho nut jobs, drug addicts, hookers an junkies." I had anxiety attacks right before every interview because I knew I'd get more of her shit if I didn't get the job. Eventually, I did get promoted.

I finally worked up the courage to leave, but couldn't make it stick. I returned after one day and that's when things came off the rails for me. I ended up in the psych ward for a week. I was suicidal, drinking, taking narcotic medications, Ambien, Xanax — anything to get to sleep and block out my nightmare of a marriage.

She found a therapist and we went in for a joint session. I told the therapist everything. My ex apologized for being abusive for the past 15 years. Shortly thereafter, she recanted it all and told me to grow a pair of balls. Nice huh?

It all clicked for me after that. I work for CPS. I know what abuse is. I know the psych medications my clients take are the same ones that she is prescribed. I saw it all very clearly in my professional life, but not my personal life — a typical conundrum and also ironic as hell.

> I started to see a therapist who got it. Thank god for her. I left one day when she went to work. I signed a lease that I had in my back pocket and moved my stuff out. I waited until the kids got home from school and, with the support of my brother, showed them the place where I'd be living.
> Neither child was happy. Contact in the beginning was strained and controlled until things were put into a legal agreement. The divorce was uneventful. I told my attorney that my ex could have the house, on the condition that she take the 20k in credit card debt. If she disagreed, then we would split the credit card debt, she would buy me out of the house and I would get 100k from her retirement.
> I had no retirement because we couldn't afford it given the way she handled our finances. I heard from my attorney twice and went $62.50 over my retainer. That was in July 2010. Life is good now and my kids are good when they are here with me. Our daughter, who is now 15, has told me more than once that my house is less stressful and more relaxing than her mother's.
> Mission Accomplished.

Paul Elam · 21 October 2013 · Archived copy · Original

As we enter the new week, all I can say is “whew!” It has been quite a ride of late. Things have been so busy that I have not had time to attend to the writing I normally like to do.

I am overdue to do a piece, but as I look at all the many options in front of me for a project, my head and heart keep coming back to one thing.

Gratitude.

Men generally die slow deaths (or more expeditious ones) from work. Even taking a red pill does not change that in most of us. Men feel useless when doing little, even when they are unable to do a lot through no fault of their own. Without offering citation it just seems to be in our nature.

Since I cannot escape that any more than most other men, I have to count my blessings that I have been afforded the opportunity to become a slave to something I love; something for which I have unending passion. Few people are that unfathomably lucky, and I know it. I have the MHRM and the people that support this website to thank for it.

I have you to thank for it.

So while there is certainly a smorgasbord of possible topics for me to address today, particularly considering the current media buzz, I just wanted to thank a few people. I know fully that I will neglect to mention some. When I say there are too many people to thank, it is not a cliché. Please accept my apologies in advance for any oversights.

In offering these thanks I want it to be clear that it is not just for helping me, but much more importantly for having the passion to help this organization take on one of the most thankless, uphill battles imaginable in order to put a previously little-known option on the table for men and women alike.

I want to thank Dean Esmay, who constantly juggles full time work elsewhere with full time work here; who has worked through sickness and personal hardships to stay on top of AVFMs many needs. And I want to thank John Hembling for carrying a huge load of rock on his back to help build this place at great personal expense, and for sometimes doing so while working three jobs and going to school. It was a school he had to attend, by the way, because one of the many things he sacrificed for this cause was a career.

I want to thank Suzanne McCarley, who has done more work than anyone knows about, trudging through the tedious, really thankless and crappy assignments; things that have to be done and no one really wants to do. I want to thank her for hanging in there with us, even as devastating personal tragedy struck her life.

Add Dan Perrins to the list, a one man army that never quits, that never seems to take a break. I watched in amazement yesterday as he and Suzanne tracked the thousands of comments to two high profile articles on this website, reading all of them, commenting on more than I can count and casting votes. They made sure that all the lies were challenged and that dissent was registered like two machines.

I want to thank Al Martin, who expertly manages our forum, and who contacted me recently, after his house burned down, not to look for sympathy, but to say that he had to attend to it but wanted me to know he did not want to lose his job running the forums.

Fat chance, Al. You are stuck with us.

I want to thank Alek, who works endlessly for all of us, and who cares so little about recognition that he will be probably be pissed that I mentioned him here.

I want to thank David King, for willingly stepping up to turn our server and security needs into a near bottomless pit of demands on his personal life.

I want to thank the editors of AVFM, who keep the skype window humming around the clock with their work.

August Lovenskiolds, Peter Wright, Alison Tieman, Robert St. Estephe, Della Burton, David King and James Huff.

I am sure you will notice the double-duty and sometimes triple-duty names in that group.

I want to thank the AVFM News Department. Robert O'hara, Lucien Valsan (who has been unimaginably productive) Anil Kumar, Dan Perrins, Greg Canning, Della Burton and Attila Vinczer.

I want to thank Europa Phoenix, Dr. F, Rodger O'Thornhill and Typhonblue(Alison Tieman) for the stunning artwork that has graced this site in article headers, radio show announcements and contributor portraits.

I want to thank people like TyphonBlue(Alison Tieman), for fundamentally changing the way we envision men and women; Girl Writes What for leading the way on the devastating smack downs of gender ideology.

And a very sincere thank you to Angry Harry, for pioneering online activism, and for literally transforming us from a media culture that could not discuss the issues of men and boys, and could not dissent from feminist dogma — to a media culture that can and now does. Thank you, Harry, for making all of this possible in the first place.

Did I say that there were too many people to thank? Yes, and I was not kidding. There are. Numbers of them can be found in the comments on this website, and in the bylines. They can be found moderating the forums and doing the radio shows. They can also be found scattered across the internet, challenging feminism one lie at time, and defending men and boys, one heartbreaking story after another.

If this sounds like some sort of award acceptance speech, it isn't. This movement has grown to such a level that what I have personally done is obscured by the sheer mass of it. I could walk away now and it would easily continue; not because of what I have accomplished, but because the need for action against misandry has reached the level that good people are starting to wake up and put their foot down.

No, this is not Oscar time. It is more like "I Have a Dream," time. I can't compare to the likes of Martin Luther King, but as a matter of fact, I really do have a dream.

I say this to misandrists everywhere, whether you are a feminist, an ersatz and rigidly obtuse social conservative, a gushy, mindless liberal or just one of the great masses of ignorant people that watch men and boys go down the tubes without really seeing it.

My dream is simple, and it is the dream of a rapidly growing number of people who will not be denied. We dream of the day when a near eternity of hate, exploitation and indifference to the suffering and abuse of males will be rocked to its illicit foundation by an unstoppable backlash against your ideas, and, equally, your ignorance.

And we dream of the day that the parasitic use of male energy and accomplishment will be replaced with compassion and honor.

We have no way of knowing how far this dream will spread or how many men and women will embrace their own human dignity by joining us, but we do know it is a dream that is being realized for a rapidly growing number of people fortunate enough to have vision.

I hope, as we move ahead with these ideals and ambitions, that this small offering of writing will provide one place where people can look back and find some of the people they have to thank.

To the women lurking on the fringes

Aimee McGee · 21 October 2013 · Archived copy · Original

I don't know how you found us. Are you a student at University of Toronto who heard about the Warren Farrell lecture and protest, or you have read the notices about our being blacklisted by powerful forces on the Internet? Or are you in a relationship with a man who has been dragged through the family court by a bitter ex? Or have you come to worry that your son is doing poorly at school or is opting out of society, and you are trying to understand? Or has your brother been falsely accused of rape or domestic violence? I know you are lurking there, as I did for a couple of months.

This place is a bit of a shock to the system. There are a lot of reasons why you might be afraid to identify as part of the Men's Human Rights Movement (MHRM). Lets talk about those:

Some of these guys are so angry

Yes, some are. Many of the men who get here have been through some pretty nasty experiences. Some are women angry about things men and boys they love have gone through. They are understandably angry. Despite what a you might have been told growing up, being angry is a normal and healthy human emotion. Maybe if you are honest with yourself, you are here because you are angry about how a man or boy in your life is being treated.

I found my way here because I was trying to get my head around the experiences of my Beloved, as a man who experienced abuse in a marriage and is experiencing misandry in the family courts. Get me to speak about the damage done to him and to his daughters by the "family terrorist" and her enablers in the family court and you will quickly pick up I am pretty angry myself. You've got to remember, these guys are angry but it is not directed at you personally.

Some are pretty pessimistic about women as a whole, and if we respect that their mistrust comes from experience, instead of shaming them for it, we may learn things we need to learn, sometimes painful things but important nonetheless.

I'll be flamed for saying something stupid

Possibly. If so, learn from it. It feels pretty crappy to get flamed, but if you can get past the feelings, some of the things said in response to your words will help you see things from different angles. The discipline needed is to separate feelings from thoughts: it's something you can learn with practice, but you got to start by interacting so you can learn. [image]

These guys are anti-relationship, anti-family – I want both in my future

This isn't a dating site. But as the Men's Human Rights Movement continues to gain followers and gain traction, odds of you finding a man who's interested in these issues will go up, whether you stick around here or not.

I wouldn't worry much. If you get into a relationship with a Zeta Male you are probably lucky. You will find most of these men to be caring, compassionate, gentle, and honest souls, who are pretty up front about what they want or don't want, even if they are still wounded in some areas.

On the other hand, there are some guys – and I don't even want to hazard a guess at the percentage – who are Men Going Their Own Way (MGTOW), and looking at the bum deal most men get from the legislation and court system that surrounds marriage and divorce, and they don't want a committed relationhip with a woman. I don't blame them, when you realize what can and does happen to many of them.

But there are guys here with children, with partners, with wives even. There are young guys here who I am sure want children and want partners. The big thing if you are going to go into a relationship with a guy who refuses to let others define him, and who believes he has all the same rights you do, is there can be no assumptions as to your respective roles and duties within a relationship. It needs to be negotiated and discussed.

Who knows, your Zeta coupling might end up looking quite traditional to those looking in on it, but it may not. It will be your own matter and your own concern, but it needs your care, respect and attention if you are going to maintain integrity as a Men's Human Rights Advocate. In any case, this site is not about your personal relationships, it's for those of you who care about the men and boys in your life. And it is about their issues, not yours.

I believe women can do anything, I don't like some of the attitudes towards gender I see here, particularly when issues such as women serving in the military or getting places in STEM courses.

I also believe women can do anything – within biological limits. I'm shorter and have less muscular strength than probably 95% of the guys on here. I wouldn't be able to do 1/2 of what was expected of me to be in a combat role (laying aside I am a committed pacifist and would be a conscientious objector), so I am prepared to accept from a physical perspective I can't meet the standards needed for soldiering.

There are some things women can do better than men, but there are plenty of men who can do those things as well. As for the rigorous academic standards required of STEM programmes – yes, we can achieve them, if we are prepared to make sacrifices like the men and women who have made it there already. I know too many female doctors who once they get to the point they have specialized, doubt their choice to have gone into medicine in the first place. The thing those women have in common: they are trying to be a consultant, and a mother, and they are constantly fighting against the thing that got them into their training in the first place.

The unhappy women I see had to be single minded to get into medicine, and by trying to be several things at once they can't be single minded – they can't be the best. I am not saying women who want to be in STEM fields should not have children. What I am saying is we need to accept that if they have children their career paths are going to be at a slower trajectory than when they don't–or, accept a partnership with a man who takes on most of the duties at home and thus makes less money than you, and not think less of yourself, or more important, think less of him, because of that choice. Yes, workplaces can accommodate working mothers – in my own family there have been two women who have had "job share" roles during their children's younger years.

My eldest sister took this along with her partner taking time out for some of the child raising. She and I have very similar professional responsibilities at this time, yet I've been working 10 years less than her – but the 10 "missing years" were the years she was part-time, and she has no regrets. If we women are going to have self-respect, we need to work out what we want and be prepared to sacrifice – and that might involve making choices that run contrary to society's message of "I can have it all." No you can't. No one can.

What if I get hit on by one of these guys?

That will probably happen less here than elsewhere. But you might I suppose get lucky and land a guy who is as great as my Beloved. No, seriously, sexual interest and attraction happens between humans as they get to know each other. Equal relationships, be they friendships or something more intimate involve both parties making choices. If you don't want to "spoil a good friendship" then it is OK to say "No, thanks". In my experience (and I have recent experience of this), your "no" will be respected. It might even make the friendship stronger.

Is it safe meeting fellow MHRAs in real life?

I've met a few. I hope to meet more. Standard operating procedure based on anyone I meet online applies. Neutral public venue, independent transport and my escape route planned. That's just common sense for anyone of either sex. After a while, you might meet in each other's homes, spend time in more private spaces, and so on, but that's after you get to know someone. That shouldn't be different for men or women, and isn't.

I like being feminine, I get the feeling that's not OK around here

What do you mean by feminine? If it means expecting female privilege and special treatment because you're a woman, you are out of luck. If it means celebrating your femininity, you are probably in for some pleasant surprises. Once we stop demonizing men, and start valuing masculinity, we start being able to explore femininity, not the pseudo-feminine competitive crap that passes for "femininity" in society.

I really struggle with the whole "register-her.com" thing

Honestly, I struggle with some of it too. But many, like Harriet Harman deserve to be there with spades on, and there are countless men on "sexual offender" registries around the world who've done far less than what the violent protestors at the University of Toronto did in late 2012.

That registry is for public officials who've said and done horrible things, or individuals who have a) acted in an unlawful manner, and b) they had public profiles including boasts about things they had done – so they were already "public property." Their names are public information, not secrets.

I don't get the "sammich" jokes

Don't worry – it is because us female MHRA's are thought to be traditional women serving their men sandwiches and waiting on them hand and foot. Since being in a relationship with a Zeta man, I've been more nurtured and pampered than I ever was in a more traditional relationship. In that loving and secure partnership, there is space for humor around our respective roles. I see the whole "sammich" humor as an extension of this – we get these jokes because we are valued as individuals and equals, not to be denigrated.

What if my female friends/boss etc find out I am an MHRM supporter?

Although there has been a recent increase in the number of MHRAs writing and being active under their actual names, some of us still use pseudonyms. I do, not because I would mind people finding out, but because at the time I started becoming active in the movement, I was dealing with a narcissist who decided I was a threat and was out to smear my reputation.

I had to make a calculated decision over the risk to my career if this person found out I was an activist with a "notorious" group, and decided that the risk was too great. I will keep reviewing this and perhaps one day, I too will write in my own name. As for female friends etc finding out – one of the most rewarding conversations on the MHRM I have had is with my mother who was an active second-wave feminist.

Don't pre-judge people's reactions, and be prepared to accept that if people don't like your choices, perhaps they are not your friends.

I've got only a limited amount of time to contribute to the MHRM – I'm not going to be much use Sending an email to your political representative doesn't take much. Challenging misandric stereotypes in your own household doesn't take much time. Sticking up the odd sticker (I would love to see some AVfM stickers in women's toilets!) or reposting something on Facebook doesn't take much time. But perhaps that action will bring another person to the Men's Human Rights Movement, and then you've changed the world.

Remember, this is a human rights movement, and real human rights movements almost always are mis-characterized and almost all have some extremist elements within them. But this movement not about superior rights for one or the other. It's about the same fundamental rights for everybody. And the responsibilities that go with those equal rights. And you can be a part of making it grow.

In His Own Words: Restraining Order Abuse

Dr. Tara J. Palmatier · 22 October 2013 · Archived copy · Original

It's day 22 of Domestic Violence Awareness Month for Men and Boys, the invisible victims of domestic violence. Today's In His Own Words shines a spotlight on what has become a national disgrace — restraining order abuse by women, lawyers, the courts and law enforcement.

"Anthony" knew firsthand how the system works and took every precaution available to him and still got screwed with the help of a crooked feminist cop and his lying, abusive, personality disordered ex-wife. In the end, he was unable to undo his ex's parental alienation campaign, but only after extreme personal and financial loss.

> Restraining Order Abuse
> You cannot escape the black hole of family court, even when you take preventative measures. I am sharing my story to let the readers know that even though I took preventative measures before a disastrous divorce, it didn't matter. I will explain how a false restraining order, law enforcement corruption and judicial incompetence changed my life forever and facilitated the severe emotional and psychological abuse (parental alienation) of my kids.
> I will also explain how I was abused both emotionally and, to a minor extent, physically. I am by no means a passive or "wimpy" individual. Nevertheless, I stayed in a toxic marriage in order to shield and protect the most important thing in my life; my kids.
> I was married for 22 years. About a decade before everything turned to horse manure, I noticed some strange behaviors on the part of my wife. Thing started to get contentious and became progressively worse approximately four years before the split. Virtually everything I said was argued to the nth degree by my ex and she escalated most discussions into arguments.
> Whenever I could I took part in my kid's school, sports and extra-curricular activities, despite working long hours, long commutes, and little sleep. This became another contentious issue, as my wife seemed perturbed that I was such an active Dad in our kids' lives. Many times was angered by my mere attendance and participation in their activities. She told me repeatedly, "You don't need to be there." It was becoming ever more clear that she just did not want me, the father of our kids, to be a part of their lives, with the exceptions of bringing home a paycheck and doing chores and repairs around the home.
> Roughly three years before we divorced, her behavior and anger became a daily occurrence. Discussions were one-sided, as she would usually interrupt me after the first syllable of the first word of anything I had to say. Over time, communication of any kind became impossible.
> It got to the point where I gingerly tiptoed around very delicate eggshells in an effort not to set her off. She berated me for everything I did — the way I opened the refrigerator, the way I chewed my food at dinner, the way I opened a door. On one occasion, she accused me of being violent when I pressed a sticky garage door opener several times to get the door to open.
> Anything and everything I did was subject to criticism. Everything and anything I did was wrong. I literally became frozen. Her delusions became worse and worse. The very few times I was able to get a word in edgewise, her response was entirely different from the question I asked. I explained it this way, "I say the word blue, and you hear the word green." Communication was impossible.
> I tried to get help from immediate family members without success. I could see divorce on the horizon. While I felt relief about the prospect of ending the marriage, I was concerned about how much damage she would cause, which later turned out to be a level five hurricane.
> A couple of years before the split, she repeatedly said, "I never pay attention to anything you say or do, and you are nothing more around here but a piece of furniture." She often did this when the kids were present or within earshot.

A little over a year before the split, her psychological condition worsened and her episodes of anger and rage escalated. On one occasion, I was the recipient of a flying coffee cup or plate and the occasional slap. I took it. I sucked it up, and never hit back.

By this time, I was paralyzed with fear — not so much fear for myself, but fear for my kids. I thought about walking out, but that would mean leaving the kids in the primary care of a raging, flaming psycho. In due course, she began making threats of false allegations of domestic violence stating, "All I have to do is go down to the police station and tell them you hit me." I asked why she would do such a thing and lie in such a manner. Her response was, "To make your life miserable."

I began writing letters to her personal physician and to the county mental health department describing her behavior, anger, rage, and her threats of false allegations of domestic violence. The letters were certified with follow-up certified letters of phone conversations, including cell phone records verifying the calls.

This process started over a year before she obtained a restraining order. I described my wife's pattern of immediate interruption followed by instantaneous intense anger to the doctor and the mental health department. Neither her doctor nor the county mental health department did anything. Even though I begged and pleaded for help and intervention, their response was that they could do nothing.

About the same time, she had a few medical procedures, which she kept quiet from me. When I asked her about it, the anger and rage flew faster than the speed of light. I later discovered that she depleted more than 50K from a special savings account for the kids' college education expenses to get two breast lifts and a tummy tuck.

That was my own fault for not watching the finances better, but there were only so many hours in the day. By that time, sex had stopped a couple of years prior to her cosmetic surgeries, so she wasn't improving her appearance for me. In all honesty, by that time I no longer cared that we weren't being intimate. I had become repulsed at the thought of having sex with that whacko.

About the same time she had her boobs done, she secretly filed for divorce. I did not find out until more than six months later when I discovered a letter from her attorney that she hid from me.

I was in a Catch-22 situation. I was being abused, I knew it, I hated it, but what choice did I have? Do I walk out and leave the kids in the sole custody of a loon, or do I try to endure her lunacy to protect the kids? I made a conscious decision to stick it out to protect the kids.

By this time, they only had about nine months to go before they graduated high school and left for college. I figured I could take it another nine months. We even talked about divorce at one point. I suggested we wait until the kids graduate and begin divorce proceedings nice and quiet.

She was opposed to this and got angrier by the day. Almost daily, she would open all of the doors to the house and garage door, walk out to the driveway and, in full view of all of the neighbors, would shout and make a scene about how I was abusing her. Her allegations were absurd. By this time, I had barely spoken to her in a year, other than the usual stuff about the kids. I didn't dare utter a sentence in my defense.

One day, she had a complete breakdown. She flew into a rage because I left a dirty skillet in the sink after cooking the kid's breakfast before they went to school. She left for work, burning rubber in the driveway, and came within a few feet of running over a four-year old girl who lived next door, which was witnessed by the girl's mother and me. I apologized to the woman for my wife's behavior. Her unbridled rage and anger reached a point where I sent a fax to the local police department's domestic violence unit asking for help.

To make a long story short, a neighbor and wife of another police officer of the same department (I am retired law enforcement) called my ex to warn her that I was planning to get her committed to a mental institution. On a school night when the kids and I were at a football game, she called the kids and told them to meet her at a local hotel after the game. I came home at 11pm to find everyone gone and called the police. Several hours later, I was told they were at an undisclosed hotel and my kids were okay.

Over the next six days, I had a few conversations with your typical angry, man-hating female domestic violence investigator. She ignored everything I had to say, ignored more than a year's worth of my attempts to get help and intervention, and I subsequently complained to her supervisor for her incompetence, lack of objectivity and professionalism.

In an obvious act of retaliation, she encouraged and facilitated the issuance of a temporary restraining order and committed perjury in court. I later found out the cop told my wife that the restraining order can be used as a "De-facto eviction notice that you can use to kick your husband out of the house."

My ex bragged about this to over a dozen co-workers, some of who were my friends, including the neighbor cop. Eventually it got back to me.

My wife was now empowered beyond belief. The temporary restraining order was her license to take everything she could get her hands on. She then went full throttle in alienating the kids. I was powerless to do anything about it. I went through three different attorneys. The first two basically took my money and accomplished nothing. The third attorney was more detailed. His primary concern was documenting his billable hours instead of documenting what I was telling him. All three of these "respected law professionals" were useless and I ended up spending over 100K to walk away with nothing.

More catastrophic than anything else was the parental alienation. Having our kids tell me they hated me and wished I were dead was worse than being held captive by the Taliban. I would have rather been held captive by terrorists; at least I could have fought back.

I bounced from dirty motel to dirty motel, stayed on friends' couches and, for a couple of months, lived in my car for the year and a half plus that the divorce dragged on. I subsisted on gas station hot dogs — 2 for 99-cents — while she stayed in the 800K house.

The parental alienation paralyzed me with pain; I couldn't function. Ninety percent of our mutual friends and neighbors didn't want to have anything to do with me. In their minds, they believed I'd done something wrong in order for my wife to be able to get a restraining order against me. I was automatically assumed guilty.

In the end, I walked away with nothing.

Everything I had ever saved or earned in my life was gone. I did achieve some success. First of all, I have since reversed the effects of parental alienation and now enjoy a healthy and loving relationship with our kids who are now young adults. I also learned how to write and submit my own court declarations and petitions. After disproving the lies on my ex's restraining order and proving the man-hating female cop's perjury, I was able to obtain a court order to seal all records of my temporary restraining order, which is a first in my state and a precedent.

I reversed the parental alienation on my own, without any help from counselors or programs. I now live in peace, free from a psycho, and free to enjoy my life with the kids.

In the end, it cost me everything. My story is an example that even when you do things to protect yourself, it often doesn't work in our anti-male family law system. Did I allow myself to be abused? Yes, I did, but it was for a good reason. I stayed to protect the kids.

A good friend later commented that I should be awarded the Congressional Medal of Honor for Fatherhood. I don't know about that. I just know that I love my kids without conditions and I believed it necessary to put myself in harm's way to protect them.

For my psycho ex-wife who may read this someday, I say, FUCK YOU!

Conception by deception: Amanda Holden rapes her husband's choice

Peter Lloyd · 22 October 2013 · Archived copy · Original

British TV personality Amanda Holden sunk to a new low, this week. The 42 year-old, who is a panelist on Simon Cowell's Britain's Got Talent, confessed via her autobiography, No Holding Back, that she tricked her husband, Chris Hughes, into fatherhood.

The former actress didn't make the revelation as an act of redemption or apology. Nor did she do it to highlight the error of her ways and teach others that men have rights too. She simply did it to shift copies of her tacky book. Unsurprisingly, she has received little criticism from British media for her confession. In fact, most journalists – who fail to see the scale of her violation – have been sympathetic.

Counterculture

Paul Elam · 22 October 2013 · Archived copy · Original

As everyone in the Men's Human Rights Movement knows, there has been a literal explosion of mainstream media attention focused on this website, on the movement, and even some limited acknowledgement of the issues in recent days.

Oh, and there have been attacks that rely heavily on quote mining, mischaracterizations, taking things out of context, ignorance and outright lies. In other words, other than the fact that there have been minor attempts at balance, it has been business as usual for the mainstream media.

All of this is designed to silence us and shut us down. All of it is having the opposite effect; all of it according to our plan, not theirs.

I think it is time for a refresher here at AVFM; a return to the basics if you will, especially as we have so many new readers courtesy of our friends in the mainstream. For regular readers it is perhaps time for a deeper exploration of just what is happening in the men's movement, and why, even though it is not that complicated.

Most of this is my personal opinion, some of which could be and probably is less than perfect. Some of it is indisputable fact. You decide which is which.

Let me start with something fundamental. I won't bother with digging out the original quote, but in the article by Tod Kelly at The Daily Beast, one of the main points he was attempting to raise was whether a movement so prone to taking the gloves off, and attached to the unfettered use of anger and provocation, could ever find acceptance in the average person's mind. He questions whether AVFM's approach will ever pave a way for us to break into the mainstream. With all due respect, it's a dumb question.

Tod, we don't want to break in to the mainstream. We just want to break it. And even that is somewhat of a misstatement. The mainstream is already broken. It is the mainstream that is the problem. We are not dumb enough to think it holds the solutions. As honestly hard as Tod worked at understanding the problems we address, his articles were proof that he ultimately failed at that understanding.

In his own words, "I have held both the red and the blue pills in my hand, but I have swallowed the blue."

Anyone who understands the red pill analogy knows that this is a statement admitting chosen ignorance and blindness – as if he did not make that obvious enough in his articles. And I say that as someone who actually likes this guy. That's OK, I like lots of blue pill people, even when I know how dumb they can be.

R. Tod Kelly proves something obvious to members of the MRHM but comically elusive to many in the mainstream. The fact is that we don't need the mainstream. The mainstream needs us.

The mainstream is now populated with millions of men who have been fucked over by gynocentrism, even though 99.9% of them don't even know what the word means.

It is populated with millions of women; mothers, second wives, daughters and sisters whose beloved male counterparts have been fucked over by gynocentrism, even though 99.9% of them don't know what the word means.

Yet.

If anyone wants an explanation of our meteoric growth, it is simple. We have improved the vocabulary of some people in the mainstream. And we have done that by making the mainstream media our bitch.

We set out to provoke an obtuse, downright stupid media apparatus into sending people our way. They graciously and obliviously complied. They could not help themselves. Pissing on their sacred cows is just too much for their propaganda addled minds to handle. Their outrage and indignation, just like ours, had to be vented.

In jumping when we poke them, they have become our dogs to walk – and are now begging us to tighten their collars – which we will do.

It is an added bonus that they actually think they are fighting against us and doing damage. If we gave a damn about acceptance from people who can thoroughly investigate the issues faced by men and boys and react by giddily swallowing another blue pill, then it might matter. But we don't, so it doesn't.

The mainstream is just a big fruit tree with a lot of apples ripe and ready to drop. Along comes ABC, Tod Kelly and a lot of other useful idiots to shake the branches and help us fill our baskets.

Result? We need more baskets.

For a better understanding of why this method is so effective, I can only recommend an examination of counterculture. From the Romanticists to the Bohemians to the Beats to the Hippies we have very instructive examples of the very same phenomenon that is happening right now with a rapidly growing number of men and women.

The great countercultures of modern western history all have some very telling things in common. One, their members did not give a shit about the mainstream. Quite the opposite, their raison d'être, in part, was a fundamental refusal to identify with or accept mainstream sensibilities.

The counterculture refuge from the problems that the mainstream inflicted on society was intellectual, emotional, artistic and literary. It was not in mainstream politics, mainstream jurisprudence or mainstream values. It was the kind of freedom only available in the confines of the human mind.

Do we support people who are trying to change laws and seek political solutions for men? Sure, if it adds more apples to our basket, but we also note that the abysmal failure of those efforts is not unexpected for the time being.

Another common denominator between the countercultures is that there was no viable way to fight them. They were all reviled and demonized by the establishment of the times, just as we are reviled and demonized now by establishment gynocentrism. Public derision is pretty much all anyone can do to us. Sure, they persecuted some, exacted even harsher measures on others, but in the end the establishment cannot fight new ways of thinking that are born of necessity, and when they make the attempt to wage that fight all that happens is that they cause those ways of thinking to become more popular.

It is a Catch-22, repeated throughout modern history, in which the establishment is just beginning to get mired again.

And then there is the most promising feature that all countercultures have in common. They made an irreversible impact on the culture at large, not the other way around.

Love or hate hippies, they changed the mentality of people in drastic ways. Does anyone think that Burroughs and Ginsberg are not still reverberating through the consciousness of the culture? Just the opposite, it is that kind of mentality, that fresh voice, that is due for resurgence and we are witnessing it happening in these very days.

The mainstream, the establishment, has become dysfunctional, myopic and self-destructive under gynocentric rule. It is even possible that on some unconscious level the mainstream is creating us to bring them the correction that they cannot bring to themselves.

Regardless of whether that is true, change is coming. Indeed, it is already here, which explains all the wailing.

We are not changing the mainstream by changing law or customs, though, as with all countercultures before, those things will happen. We are changing the mainstream by changing ourselves, by openly ridiculing their foolhardy ways, and by simply providing a place to exist for the countless victims they have created with their raw stupidity.

All we have to do to grow, is to be. These mindless fools will do the rest for us.

Take Two Red Pills, Call Me In the Morning

Tod Kelly · 22 October 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Editor's note: R. Tod Kelly, whose piece on The Daily Beast has been massively popular and commented upon in recent days (with an awful lot of gender-feminist trolling, unsurprisingly) recently penned a followup article on his piece for Ordinary Times, which you can find right here. He was gracious enough to grant us permission to reprint it here. We think he gets a lot wrong and a lot right but we think he's a pretty stand-up guy to let us reprint it for analysis and commentary here. –DE

The Sudden and Surprising Rise of the Men's Rights Movement

Everything I am about to tell you is, to the best of my knowledge, 100% true.

Everything I am about to describe comes from texts I have read with my own eyes, interviews I have heard with my own ears, conversations where I was both present and engaged. All that I write here, I write accurately – or at least as accurately as I am able.

But before I say anything – before you hear what I have to say, before you judge my actions, before you decide the degree to which I am right or wrong – know this:

I have held both the red and the blue pills in my hand, but I have swallowed the blue.

This summer I was commissioned to do a story for Newsweek on the Men's Rights Movement. I had pitched the idea after having received dozens of mysterious emails from men I had never heard of who all encouraged me to "take the red pill."

At first, I had no idea why I was getting the emails. I knew the red pill reference to The Matrix, of course. If you haven't seen the movie, at one point the protagonist is given the choice between swallowing a blue pill, or a red pill. If he chooses the blue, he will wake up and realize that the world is run in the same humdrum fashion he had always assumed. If chooses the red, he will be shown the Truth, and understand that his reality is an illusion, that he is a slave, and that a revolution is needed to overthrow the entire world order.

As it turned out, the emails were a response to a post I had written on Ken Hoinsky, the guy who got kicked off Kickstarter for funding a book on how to bed women for the 23-and-never-been-kissed set. The men who had written me were all part of the Men's Rights Movement (MRM), which is perhaps best described as a confederacy of somewhat disjointed causes that share a deep-seated hatred of feminism. The Red Pill/Blue Pill reference is the way that many inside the MRM both self-identify and identify those outside the tribe. The actual email that got me hooked was the one that came with this message:

> "All you know is the BLUE PILL. Until you KNOW the RED PILL you exist in the world of SHADOWS and LIES. You are a SLAVE to the MATRIARCHY. Break your CHAINS, join the FREEDOM-FIGHTING men LISTENING and SEEING, and you will learn the TRUTH and be FREE."

The email came with about a dozen links to various MRM sites, which of course I immediately began to explore. (Seriously, how could I not?)

What started out as a quick article on the movement's cause célèbre last June — (Facebook's policy change regarding offensive images) — turned into something larger and entirely unexpected. To a great degree, much of this is thanks to the first person I interviewed, someone who doesn't even show up in the final Daily Beast article at all, a young man named Victor Zen.

I'm not sure what I expected when I reached out to Zen, but whatever it was, he surprised. An earnest, college-aged man, Zen is as gentle as he is thoughtful. Those hoping for Zen to turn out to be a crazed, violent brute that hates all women would be disappointed, I think.

"I'm going to apologize in advance," he said sheepishly when we first talked, "but I may have to step away during the interview. My mom just had surgery, and sometimes she needs help with… stuff." He didn't say what "stuff" was, but he didn't have to; I've had to take care of infirmed parents myself. Trust me when I say it's not the kind of thing you'd graciously do for a woman if you hated her.

My experience with Zen that afternoon mirrored a lot of the interviews I would later have with other MRM members. Each ended up being polite and professional, and almost all were thoroughly likable individuals. Most (but not all) had gone through some horrific life experiences that had led them to becoming committed to the movement. In Victor's case, it was a shockingly acrimonious relationship between his parents. W.F. Price, who plays a fairly large role in the article, traces his activism back to a particularly nasty custody battle. One interviewee described being physically abused by his mother. His horrific description of her use of cigarette butts was disclosed in a casual, matter-of-fact tone. He only choked up when speaking of the indifference people show when he reveals his trauma. He now identifies himself as a Man Going His Own Way, an MRM descriptor for male separatists who wish to cut social ties with women in general. Another middle-aged man described having trusted his once-fiancée enough to make her a co-signer on all of his bank and investment accounts. She ended up being a con artist who liquidated most of his assets before disappearing.

The other common thread was this: each MRM member I interviewed made a variety of sensational-sounding claims that required fact-checking. Most of those claims were debunked by research. Some examples: Four people I spoke with told me that married women don't qualify for welfare, and because of this working class women have no choice but to leave their husbands in order to qualify for public assistance. Three told me that college orientations today give detailed instructions to women on how they can pay for college tuition by trumping up rape charges and following them up with a civil suit. Two told me that a divorce attorney who doesn't advise a female client to lie on the stand and fake a physical abuse charge is liable for malpractice. One told me that feminists have forced Webster's and Oxford alike to change their dictionary definition of rape to one that is gender-specific. Another explained that not only is the United Nations encouraging circumcision to fight AIDS (true, it turns out), it is telling circumcised males they don't need a condom to protect themselves against STDs (actually the opposite of true, it turns out). Yet another told me that the BBC airs programs that advocate the elimination of men in society. Pretty much every one of them believes that sexual harassment law states that your employer has to fire you if you say anything a woman colleague does not like. Everyone, it seems, had at least one (but usually many, even as much as a dozen) outrageous-sounding claims that were easily debunked.[1]

But here's the thing: A lot of the outrageous claims proffered by MRM activists actually turned out to be true.

The Daily Beast article deals with quite a few such claims (and I will be writing about these issues in more detail in the months to come). Notable examples of things I was sure would turn out to be false but ended up being true include:

- In the United States, more men are victims of rape each year than women.
- In many parts of the U.S., men who are victims of domestic or sexual abuse have no access to resources such as safe houses; in many places (including, as it turns out, my home town of Portland, OR) the laws and policies that enable resources for at-risk victims are written in such a gender-specific way as to only apply to women.
- If you fall behind on your child support payments because you have lost your job, you can be sent to prison – and in your trial you are not entitled to legal representation.
- If an adult woman molests a male child, and that molestation results in a pregnancy, that boy can be forced to pay child support for his offspring once he becomes a wage-earning adult.
- As I noted above, the U.N. is pushing for mandatory circumcision in third world countries – and this push has been publically applauded and encouraged by Democratic Presidential hopeful Hilary Clinton.

As it turns out, most the MRM's opponents actually agree that there are a lot of cracks in the system where men (especially low-income men) are at risk at having their civil rights and safety violated. However, no one aside from the MRM seems willing to actually run with any of these balls. Which means that if you are, for example, a male at risk of sexual assault looking for a political white knight, the MRM isn't just your best available option — they're your only available option.

Unfortunately for that at-risk male, the MRM might just have the single worst political instincts of any civil rights groups I have ever encountered. In fact, as you will see if you read the Beast article, the movement's insistence on pushing aside its more moderate leaders in favor of its most comically vitriolic makes it untenable for a mainstream politician or policy maker to align themselves with MRM causes. (Imagine if you will the effectiveness of the 1970s feminist movement if it had publically rallied around its Andrea Dworkins and marginalized its Gloria Steinems. Or if the Civil RIghts Movement had bet all of its chips on Stokley Carmichael and left Martin Luther King, Jr. as an unknown without a flock.)

Many of the MRM's critics (and believe me, there are a hell of a lot of them) worry that having the MRM in the public spotlight might be damaging to women. I highly doubt this, if only because I question the movement's ability to persuade anyone outside of its own sphere. Which isn't to say I don't worry that the movement might be damaging; I do. I worry that the MRM might be doing the most damage to the very people it sets out to help. Public policy changes need either mainstream public support or heavy political clout. As it stands, the MRM has neither, and, worse, does not appear have any interest in taking even the smallest steps to change that fact.

Indeed, the piece over at the Beast is largely the story of two men, who most of those I interviewed identified as the ones most likely to be leading the entire movement ten years from now, as the MRM's old guard begins to step aside. Both these men, I must say, are incredibly fascinating – though they are so in very different ways. Each is equally committed to the same cause, but the actual paths each takes in the name of that cause could not be more disparate. As it turns out, there really are a lot of at-risk men that need the MRM to succeed in making meaningful changes to public policy. Whether or not the movement is able to accomplish this, I believe, depends largely on which of the two men the movement's rank-and-file ultimately decides to follow.

The story was actually filed and originally scheduled for publication in August, and by then was slated to be published simultaneously by both Newsweek and The Daily Beast. Then, before it was to be published, Newsweek was purchased by IBT Media and the Newsweek-Daily Beast relationship was severed. So for the past few months my story has sat in the freezer, so to speak, while the wrangling of who actually owned the story was worked out behind the scenes. (In a way, it sort of felt like my story was the child in a divorce custody hearing.) The Beast won out, which is fitting. The editor I worked with, Katie Baker, was from the Beast side of Newsweek/Daily Beast; furthermore, she was the article's champion early on and was unbelievably awesome throughout the entire experience. She even gave me access to Newsweek minions to help dox people so that I might interview them, and to run down the barrage of claims that needed to be fact-checked for the story. (Note: No one we doxed internally was outed; these were purely fact-finding searches.)

Speaking of Katie being super space awesome, I should take a moment to thank some people whose help was pretty invaluable. And believe me, help was definitely welcome: In the course of researching the story, I spoke with over a dozen of the movement's members and leaders, as well as many of their friends, family members, and co-workers. I consulted with professional advocates for male causes, social workers, media executives, law enforcement officials, family law attorneys, and government statisticians. I heard from many of the women who have been individually targeted as enemies of the movement and who have faced its wrath, and a few women who are among the movement's most ardent supporters. Along the way I racked up over forty hours of recorded interviews, watched over twenty hours of video tape, read eight books recommended by MRM activists, pursued hundreds (maybe thousands?) of online posts, and read every single Reddit comment going back five years by one of the article's main subjects.

When I look at all the hours that went into the piece, I'm not sure it could have been written at all without the help of Katie, the staff at Newsweek and the folks at the Daily Beast, as well as OT's own Conor Williams and my own personal editor of choice, Jason Kuznicki. There's not a person on that list that doesn't get a beer the next time I see them.

If you would like to read the final Daily Beast piece, you can find it here.

[1] Zen told me that if you put up a picture on Facebook that advocated raping a woman it would be taken down by the moderators, but if you put up one that advocated castration for men it would be allowed to stand. I had seen Zen make a similar claim in a post on the website A Voice for Men. I actually tested that one out by finding a Facebook post that joked about castration (an hour of my life I'll never get back) and reporting it to the moderators. When I checked back in less than an hour, the castration joke had been removed. I followed up with Zen later with my findings, and to his credit he admitted he had been wrong; to his major credit when I looked back at his own post about Facebook later, he had updated it with the new information. All of which is to say that if the MRM is smart, it will recognize it needs more Victor Zens in its ranks.

Both The Daily Beast and The Raw Story have recently grossly misreported John Hembling (aka John The Other) . One of many errors in these stories was to take a very old video Hembling did and hold it up as exemplary of his work, which is ludicrous on multiple levels. But let's have John explain it:

In His Own Words: Violent Alcoholic Wife Attacks (VAWA), Part II

Dr. Tara J. Palmatier · 23 October 2013 · Archived copy · Original

It's day 23 of Domestic Violence Awareness Month for Men and Boys, the invisible victims of domestic violence. Gabu's saga, Violent Alcoholic Wife Attacks (VAWA), continues in today's In His Own Words.

This selection of journal entries depicts how Gabu was able to obtain a protective order and have his alcoholic, undiagnosed borderline personality disordered wife removed from their home.

> Violent Alcoholic Wife Attacks (VAWA), Part II
> 06/24/12. I got home and assessed the bug infestation in the basement. Our son did a good job handling it and I mentioned it to wife loud enough for him to hear. She replied, 'I guess so, but I told him over and over not to leave food down there when his friends come over,' thereby destroying my attempt to build his confidence.
> Dejected, I said nothing and walked away. We managed to have a decent dinner with our son, even though she consumed wine throughout the meal. After dinner, she wanted to 'talk.' For the rest of the night, she repeatedly asked me not to leave her.
> She kept repeating that as long as I stay in the house, there's hope, which means I don't want to leave her. She's driving me nuts. While professing her love for me out one side of her mouth, she made threats out the other. She said she'd contest the divorce, stretch it out for 2 years and drive us into bankruptcy.
> How can she possibly think that threatening to destroy me is an enticement to come running back to her? She followed me around the house, barraging me with the same questions and circular arguments over and over again. I recorded some of it, but the batteries were nearly dead.
> Around 9pm, she pounded down a full glass of wine in three gulps. She alternated between watching TV and harassing me with same threats and empty promises to change. I held firm, told her I don't believe her, that she lied about getting help, she still has no job, is still making fun of my mannerisms and the way I talk and is still drinking! I repeated this at least 20 times over the course of the evening. It is so incredibly frustrating.
> She also said our son doesn't want anything to do with me; that he doesn't want to live with me or see me. After telling me with a smirk how much our son hates me, she switched gears and asked me to take a half-day tomorrow to celebrate her birthday. WTF? I called her out on her abusive behavior. She ignored me, went into the dining room and came back with my laptop.
> I got up, took it from her and told her that after all the crazy-making tonight, she will not be using my computer. She whined, 'I thought it was our computer!??!' I replied 'No, it is MY computer. I worked a SECOND JOB to buy this for myself. A SECOND JOB! Go get yourself a single job and buy whatever you want.'
> She started in on how she knows I'm cheating on her, and asked why I have the computer programmed to log off every night at 11pm. I replied that's the way I want it and reminded her she's the one who has a history of cheating, not me. I brought up the emotional affair she had last year with a manager at work.
> She tried to justify it by saying her behavior was my fault because I don't provide her with what she needs and he treated her 'nicely' and was 'interested' in her. I said, 'Well sure, he's not the one who gets to deal with the crazy antics, rage and alcohol abuse.' She changed the subject again. When I tried to get back on topic, she went outside to smoke.
> I password protected the guest account on my computer and went to bed at 10:45pm. She came up about an hour later, drunk. She spent the next half hour fidgeting, tossing and turning. I asked her several times to stop, as I had to work in the morning. She started in on how perfect I think I am and other unfounded insults. I half expected her to lose it and clock me in the face. I almost wish she had. She lied back down and whispered how much she loves me and how she just knows that we'll be able to resolve this. I can't describe how creepy that is to hear after a night of her crazy-making.

06/25/2012. I received the following message from Dr. T:

'Gabu, what if you tell your wife in order for you to consider staying in the marriage; she needs to check herself into a 14-day or 30-day alcohol rehab first? Would she do it? Then, while she's out of your hair, you take care of the business of divorce.

This advice might seem Machiavellian, however, she's psychologically torturing you — it's a reasonable measure given the siege-like circumstances of your current situation. She sounds like she should be in a treatment program, so it's not like it'd be a bad thing for her and she just might have some psych evals done while there that could help your custody case. Having a documented history of her alcohol abuse also might help you down the road should you need restraining orders, etc.

If she doesn't go, it can be one of the reasons for divorce. Either way, you might want to consider it. Even some of the most uterus loving judges will not give custody to an active substance abuser — especially one who becomes abusive (or in your wife's case, more abusive) while under the influence.'

I like this idea and am going to implement it.

06/26/2012. I got home from work and flipped on my digital recorder before going inside. She had a nice dress on, which is strange because she usually wears oversized shorts and a stained t-shirt. I asked why she's dressed up. She said she felt like looking pretty. I know she was expecting to go to dinner tonight for her birthday, but I'm not pretending like nothing's wrong anymore nor am I going to reward her crazy behavior.

I asked if we could talk outside as our son was in earshot. I told her I'd thought about her request to work on the marriage and the only way I'd consider staying in the relationship is if she checks herself into a 2-week alcohol rehab program.

Her face sank. She started yelling she thought I was going to make up with her tonight. What planet is this woman on, seriously? Finally, she admitted she looked into a program and told me about it, but needs to think about whether she wants to go. All the while, she had a full glass of wine in her hands.

After a few quiet minutes passed, she announced she was drunk. She went off about how fat she thinks is, "117, 117, 117! I should be 112! I'm obese! Fat at 117!" After that, she started hammering me to see if there is another way I'll stay in the marriage without her going to rehab.

She said she'd stop drinking on her own. I told her I don't trust her. She blew it months ago when she promised to go to AA and never did. She kept hammering away until I tired of the merry-go-round-from-hell and hopped off. I asked what she planned for dinner. She planned nothing. I said I'd order take-away and asked if she wanted anything. No!

I called and ordered subs for our son and myself. As soon as I hung up the phone, she yelled that I'm a bastard for not ordering a sub for her, too. Okaaaaay. I called back and added a sub to the order. After I picked up the food, our son and I sat on the couch and watched TV while we ate.

She was in the kitchen loudly and drunkenly wishing herself happy birthday, saying how it was the worst birthday ever, etc., etc., blah, blah, blah, blah, blah. After she finished eating, she burst into tears and said she'll go to rehab. I asked if she wanted to talk.

Once outside, she asked what we'd tell our son. I suggested the truth. She was adamant that we not tell him. I pointed out that he's seen her drunken behavior for years and it might be good role modeling to see her take responsibility and work towards overcoming her addiction.

She insisted she didn't want our son to know and then went on an on about what his friends, other parents, etc., would think. 'How come your mom's not here? How come your dad's not here?' Then she added one of her old chestnuts, 'Well, your dad's never here anyway!' I thought to myself, 'That's right, because I do not have the LUXURY of being home all day because I AM AT WORK, something you refuse to do!'

I declared the conversation over, telling her I won't have a discussion with someone who's making fun of me. I went into the house and she stumbled in after me, begging me to 'talk.' I kept my composure and continued to refuse, stating that she made fun of me so the conversation was over.

She kept going and I robotically repeated over and over, 'This behavior is unacceptable. You are drunk. Go sleep it off.' She kept begging and grabbed my arm. I asked her not to touch me. I sat on the couch. She sat right next to me, still begging me to 'talk' to her.

Our son was uncomfortably watching TV on the other couch through all this. At one point, she bellowed into to living room at him, 'See how HE treats meeeeeee?!?!?' Yeah, refusing to cave into the terrorist-like demands of someone who is drunk and verbally abusing you is a bad thing! After another 30 minutes of stalking me around the house, she made a big dramatic production about going upstairs and finally went to sleep. I have no idea if she will go to rehab or not. I hope so for her sake and our son's sake.

06/27/2012. Wife left a note on the counter for me this morning. She went on about how much she loves me, wants our marriage to work and wants the two of us to be able to 'smile again.' WTF? She completely omitted her abuse of our son, me and her alcohol abuse/going to rehab.

Dr T suggested the following response to my wife's note:

'Dear Wife,

As I stated last night, I will not consider remaining in this marriage unless you seek treatment for your alcohol abuse. This is non-negotiable. I want you to be well and the kids both deserve a healthy, functioning mother.

You need to check yourself into a treatment facility within 30 days for me to consider giving our marriage another chance. Otherwise, it will be clear that you are not serious about getting help and making the necessary changes in our relationship.

Gabu'

Dr T further explained:

'The part about the kids deserving a healthy mother is essential. A judge will not care that an adult male is being abused by an alcoholic wife, but a judge will care about kids being exposed to it. Also, stating you want her better for the kids can't get twisted into you trying to control her. It's you trying to protect the kids.

This should help you cover your ass, re: the claims she'll likely make about you being the controlling, abusive alcoholic spouse once the DARVO starts. 'Oh, pooooor me, he abandoned me because of my drinking problem. He didn't do anything to help me. He has no compassion. It's a sickness.' My proposed email response shows you tried to help; she refused.

I wouldn't let her engage you in any more convos on this topic. Your response is, 'You have x amount of time to get into rehab. I will not discuss this further.' And Gabu, quit sharing the bedroom. If you don't have a spare room, tell her she is to sleep on the couch until she goes to rehab and then lock yourself in. No more late night drunken groping/torture.'

06/28/2012. I sent an email as Dr T suggested. When I got home last night, she left a note on the door saying she's on the deck and can we 'talk.' Argh. I met her on the deck and she asked why I'm being so mean. I said, 'I'm not being mean. I'm tired of being walked on and lied to, so I've decided there are only two paths forward. One, we divorce or two you go to rehab.'

She pushed me for a guarantee that I'll be here when she finishes. I told her I wouldn't make any promises. She kept pushing, trying to get me to promise and then she tried to weasel out of going to rehab. She again said she'd stop drinking on her own and go to AA meetings. I stuck to my guns.

After more back and forth about how she didn't want to go to rehab and me countering repeatedly that I no longer wanted to be subjected to her rages, she snapped, 'Fine, I'll go to rehab!' Out of nowhere, she told me her sister invited us to play board games at her house. I declined. She went and ended up sleeping at her sister's, presumably because she got too loaded to drive.

07/29/12. I went to a family BBQ at my mom's today. Wife could've gone, but still hasn't made up with my mom after her drunken rage incident last year. I arrived home at 9:30 pm. She was intoxicated on the couch with the TV blaring. I turned on my digital recorder.

She started ranting about how she KNOWS I'm cheating on her (I'm not), and demanded to see pictures from the BBQ. I didn't take any, which is proof in her mind that I wasn't there and, therefore, cheating on her.

She stumbled into the dining room and got my camera, which is worth about $800. She scrolled through the pics, saw there weren't any from the BBQ and started ranting like a lunatic again. I remained calm, which made her even more pissed.

She threw the camera across the room. It bounced off the carpet and hit the lower part of the couch. I told her, 'That's it,' and grabbed the phone to call the cops. She picked up the camera, ran into our bedroom, then came back downstairs and begged me not to call the police.

I told her I wouldn't call the cops if she went to bed and slept it off. She recommenced ranting until I threatened to call the police again. While she was still spewing her venom, I went to our room to see how badly the camera was damaged. She'd hidden it, of course. She followed me to our room. I asked where she put the camera and she claimed she couldn't remember.

I knelt down to look under the bed and she started hitting my back. I jumped across the bed to retrieve the camera on the other side. The auto focus no longer worked, making a horrible clicking sound and the lens was cracked. I told her she'd crossed the line and that I was calling the police. I headed downstairs. She followed, grabbed my shirt collar and tried to rip it off.

I broke free, got my wallet and keys and headed to my car. I passed our son in the driveway and two of his friends who were spending the night. I drove to the police station, talked with an officer and told him what happened. I made a point to tell him I had it all recorded!

While he took my statement, my wife was blowing up my cell phone. Two patrol cars went to my house to check on her. They reported that the doors are open, but no one was answering. I followed yet another patrol car to the house to let them in. Our son brought his friends to the basement (smart kid).

I led the police upstairs to our bedroom where wife pretended to be asleep. Two officers spoke with her while the other stayed downstairs with me. She was belligerent, quite obviously drunk and accused me of lying. The officer told her he knew she was lying and that I recorded the entire incident.

That forced her to change tactics. She began telling them how horrible I am to her and other lies. After 10 minutes, they came downstairs and asked me to leave because she was drunk and couldn't drive. I had no problem with that. The officer told me if she'd been sober he would've asked her to leave.

I followed the officer back to the station to finish writing my complaint. He showed me the report and asked if I want to press charges. I know I made a mistake, but I declined to press charges. That was stupid, I know. They told me a domestic abuse counselor would call to follow up with me. I went to my usual hotel for the night.

I went home the next day and she'd hidden the camera again. I asked her where she put it, she claimed she didn't know. After a few minutes of this game, she went and got it. What that proved I have no idea! She went back to bed for a few hours, got up and wanted to 'taaalllkkk.'

I told her she fucked up again. She tried to blame me for her recent crazy episode, saying she gets 'angry' because I'm 'so distant.' I held my ground and told her this is about her drinking problem, her abuse and her violence. I told her I wasn't budging from our conversation 4 weeks ago, and wouldn't put any effort into our relationship until she went into an alcohol rehab program.

She finally admitted she messed up and apologized. At this point, her apologies made no difference to me. I told her she's incredibly lucky I didn't press charges, that I'm not taking anymore of her shit and the fact I was willing to call the cops when our son's friends were at our house showed how serious I am.

> I contacted a lawyer the following day. I'm going to try to get an order of protection (OOP). The officer said it would be easy to do after what she did. Two take away points from this weekend: 1) I am so glad I had that digital audio recorder! 2) I should have pressed charges. I really didn't do her any favors by not holding her accountable for her behavior.
> 10/24/2012. I had dinner with a friend after work and arrived home around 7pm. The house was quiet. Son was in the basement on the computer, wife was upstairs. I went to the living room to watch TV. She came downstairs and seemed to be slurring her words. She went out to the garage to smoke. I checked her secret hiding spot and found a fifth of vodka with about ¼ left in the bottle – so much for the rehab program she started 3 weeks ago!
> I started playing Xbox, she wanted to 'talk.' I told her I was busy. She persisted, so I told her we'd 'talk' after I finished my game. I went to the bedroom. She was sitting on the bed with her laptop and a plastic cup with what appeared to be Pepsi.
> She started telling me how much she loves me. I took a sip of her drink, proving what I already knew; there was vodka in it. I reminded her the order of protection forbids drinking in the house while our son is present. She tried to weasel her way out by saying I was drinking, too. I am a grown adult male. I had 2 beers at dinner over an hour before I came home. I was far from drunk and would not do ANYTHING to jeopardize the court case.
>
> Also, I did not drink in the house or around our son. She started making fun of the way I talk. I gave her an out and told her to stay in bed, sleep it off and not bother me. She started in on me again. I walked out of the room, closing the door behind me.
> She started swearing at me and followed me out to the landing. I stood there and listened to her banter for a few minutes, until she started in on me again. I turned on my heel and started walking downstairs.
> Suddenly I felt her kick me in the back! I grabbed onto the railing to steady myself, so I wouldn't fall down the stairs. I regained my balance, walked downstairs, pulled out my cell and dialed the police.
> She started freaking out, begging me not to call the cops. I told her, "Fuck that. You have an OOP against you, you've been drinking and you assaulted me! I'm calling the police." I called and they arrived within minutes.
> I told the officer I have an OOP against her and what happened. Another officer walked in and they cuffed her. She started freaking out, making up lies about me and things I supposedly did to her. They paid her no mind and took her to the squad car.
> I told my son that she broke the OOP, the police were taking her to the station and I would be back. He, of course, was not happy. On the way out, she actually accused me of molesting her adult daughter! WTF?!?! They are keeping her overnight and a judge will arraign her in the morning. So we'll see what happens now, but I'll bet the judge in our divorce case will not look to kindly on her recent actions. Nor will her alcohol rehab!

As it turned out, the judge didn't care. He ignored Gabu's wife's alcoholism and history of violence and gave her temporary primary custody and ordered her not to say anything disparaging to their son. Yeah, right, judge. Naturally, alcoholic BPD mom cranked up the alienation campaign, Gabu's son still refuses to see him one year later and the impotent, incompetent, piece of shit legal system has enforced none of the court orders Gabu's ex has violated. Must be that "benevolent sexism" we've heard so much about in recent days.

Why do juries acquit women? – 1922

Robert St. Estephe · 23 October 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Robert St. Estephe–Gonzo Historian–is dedicated to uncovering the forgotten past of marginalizing men. "Gonzo journalism" is characterized as tending "to favor style over fact to achieve accuracy." Yet history – especially "social history" – is written by ideologues who distort and bury facts in order to achieve an agenda. "Gonzo" writing is seen as unorthodox and surprising. Yet, in the 21st century subjectivity, distortion and outright lying in non-fiction writing is the norm. Fraud is the new orthodoxy. Consequently, integrity is the new "transgressive."

Welcome to the disruptive world of facts, the world of Gonzo History.

This post is dedicated to R. Tod Kelly of Daily Beast, Alyssa Pry, Alexia Valiente and Elizabeth Vargas, the Three Damsels of Men's Rights Distress of ABC 20/20, the group of mainstream journalists who managed to miss the point of the Men's Human Rights Movement in their frantic efforts to turn this major civil rights movement into a gossip and personality-obssessed festival of hit-piece hack journalism. — RSE

There is a problem. Here is my assessment of it: Its the "Herstory," stupid.

That is my explanation of much of the messy unproductive argumentation I see between conformists indoctrinated in orthodox "social justice" dogma, interwoven with the propagandistic fake (cherry-picked, misinterpreted, gap-ridden, ideologically biased, "social constructionist theory"- dependent) historical narrative they have been subjected to since toddlerhood by their dumbed-down teachers, and later, by their officious utopianist professors.

The critiques of the Men's Right Movement and AVfM produced by this collection of august personages and part-time interns suffer from a woeful lack of mastery of the ideas and facts germane to the subject they claim to wish to explore. Central to the knowledge-gap observed in their works is an absence of familiarity with plain old ideology-free factual history pertaining to the relationship between the sexes preceding the 1960s. The authors might have, if they were more inclined to do broad research, to examine the texts selected by Mr. Elam for special attention in the Mission Statement. There is a short list and a long list. It could not have been made easier. But the journalists missed the scoop. Ranking number 2 on the long list of fundamental reference reads is this humble Gonzo author's own effort entitled "Setting the Record Straight," an essay designed specifically to undermine a copious number of historical falsehoods and to introduce quite a few large facts that somehow our educational overlords forgot to tell any of their students about. The article is long, but there is a lot of bang for the buck there: its a last-minute-before-the exam crammer's dream come true. It ought to have been read and digested by our critics before, not after, publishing their celebrity-gossip style screeds. But that's life in the age of mainstream university-produced journalistic flabbiness. They might have learned that the Men's Rights Movement has been in existence scores of decades preceding the Great Age when Joan Baez warbled folk songs in barefoot for big bucks — and rich-kid Bill Ayers, the infamous Weather Underground advocate of social justice, planted bombs and cohabited with Charles Manson's biggest fan while dreaming of establishing death camps for tens of millions of American "reactionaries."

Perhaps these folks will note the present post and try to get all caught up on their knowledge pre-1960s happenings. One might hope so.

In any case, this post you're looking at right now is dedicated, with full ceremony and honors, to that fearsome foursome, — hook, line and sinker. Its their big shiny prize: a sort of "participation prize," if you will.

The following text reproduces an article published in 1922 that explores a question that had in the early 20th century been very much discussed for many years in the United States: "Why do juries keep allowing women to get away with murder over and over again?" It is recommended that the reader take a look at another 1922 item on the same subject offered on AVfM, but with a different treatment: "Woman's Right to Kill." The article quotes the most prominent female judge of her time, Florence Allen and celebrity lawyer Clarence Darrow, defender of guilty-as-hell murderers and murderesses (such as Leopold and Loeb and Mrs. Emma Simpson). Contrary to what we are led to believe, female judges of the 1920s were proud of their merit as equals in the art of law and were equally condemnatory of the excesses of women who practices the excesses of long-standing privilege. Indeed Chicago lawyer Agnes McHugh (featured in a post on AVfM) was, in 1917, one of the most eloquent opponents of misandry. Yes! there were indeed female lawyers in practice way back then before the marxist-feminist stampede of the post-Redstockings Manifesto era.

The 1922 discussion, "Why Do Juries Acquit Women," is in the form of three interviews with some of the leading experts on criminal behavior in the United States of their day. Though the term misandry does not appear the related term "chivalry" does. And despite the claims of present-day gender ideologues, it is female privilege and the principle of male disposability that comes to be the explanation for woman's de facto right to kill, not the idea that their wantonness, cynicism and unaccountability is the product of brutal patriarchal oppression.

The forgotten words of these authorities — Cleveland Judge Florence Allen, Chicago lawyer Clarence Darrow and Los Angeles Prosecutor Thomas Lee Woolwine — are more than worthy of the close attention of today's witnesses of the "gender wars": especially those witnesses who wish to publicly speak about it from prominent pulpits.

WHY DO JURIES ACQUIT WOMEN?

Judge Prosecutor and Defender Tell Reason

FOUR OF THESE WOMEN RECENTLY WERE ACQUITTED BY JURIES. THE FIFTH, CLARA PHILIPS, WAS FOUND GUILTY OF SECOND DEGREE MURDER IN THE RECENT "HAMMER SLAYING" CASE AT LOS ANGELES. THE WOMEN ARE, LEFT TO RIGHT, MRS. J. W. GORMAN, FORMERLY CLARA SMITH HAMON; MRS. CATHERINE ROSIER OF PHILADELPHIA, CLARA PHILLIPS, MARIE PEGGY BEAL OF KANSAS CITY, AND MISS OLIVIA STONE OF CINCINNATI.

FULL TEXT: Why is it almost impossible to get convictions of women in murder cases?

The NBA Service put this question to three of the foremost jurists of America — a judge, a prosecuting attorney and a famous, defense attorney.
Judge Florence E. Allen of Cleveland, the first woman ever to sit on a state supreme court bench, speaks for the judges. Judge Allen won wide commendation for her handling of several murder cases when a common pleas judge.
Thomas Lee Woolwine, nationally famous for his prosecutions of women in famous murder cases, and who recently convicted Clara Philips of second, degree murder in the "hammer slaying" case, gives the prosecutor's opinion.
Clarence Darrow of Chicago, preeminent as defender in many murder cases, tells the reasons from the standpoint of the defense.

~ ~ ~ HAS BASIS IN RACE PRESERVATION ~ ~ ~

By CLARENCE DARROW, Famous Defense Attorney.

Chicago, Nov. 25. — It is idle to talk about judging men and women alike. Nature does not do it. Man cannot do it. For hundreds of years, in what are called the civilized nations of the world, women have been looked upon somewhat as children.

A feeling of what is called chivalry has grown, as a consequence of this attitude. Men are taught many courtesies and considerations which men do not give to each other.

Every one with common experience knows that in every way, the law has been both made and administered to give women privileges which men would never claim. If a man kills his wife he is almost sure to hang. But a wife can kill her husband and run little risk of punishment.

If a man strikes his wife, he is a brute and no sentence is too severe. But let a woman strike her husband or nag him or make his life unbearable, and the public applauds her conduct and says he deserves it.

~ Sex as Cause ~

Most all murders committed by women grow out of sex relations, whether in the family or outside. Is there any biological reason for this, or would the indiscriminate hanging of women restore equality and prevent this class of murders?

Nature seems interested mainly in the preservation of life, and in its preservation women are the most important. Both as to the bearing and rearing of children, women necessarily take the responsibility and must take it.

This is not, only true of human life, but it is a law that reaches all animal life us well.

Neither with men nor animals does the newly barn offspring make any strong impression upon the male. Whereas with the normal female, in most cases, she is ready to give, up her life for an offspring that is not even of sufficient age to appeal to her on account of association.

~ Maternal Instinct Strong ~

It is then quite beyond question that the strength of the maternal instinct is fundamental to the preservation of the species. All normal life, and most abnormalities relating to sex is based upon this primal feeling.

With a woman, her relations to man, whether conscious or unconscious, means the preservation of the species, and the love of the man is really the love of the child born or unborn. To most women this is almost all of life. No other instincts interests, feeling of customs stand against it.

When it is interrupted, either directly through the child or indirectly through the male, it means to her an interruption of life, it means that the fundamental law of being is raised in protest. Laws, customs, institutions, and even common kindness are, of no effort to control conduct.

~ Equality Impossible ~

For these reasons equality of justice between the sexes is impossible. If men and women could be judged alike, it, would ultimately mean the extinction of the human race. Human laws and human customs cannot undo the innate, feelings and instincts which are. the basis of life.

If human institutions could be evolved where complete justice would be melted out to all, then every person would be judged not only according to his actions, but according to the physical and mental makeup of his machine, and according to full considerations of time and place.

If this were done, probably no one would condemn another. There are very few women who commit murder who could be deterred from it, or in any way influenced, no matter what the consequences might be.

A general crusade, or a general feeling in favor of visiting severe penalties on women who slay, would simply result in sorrow, disgrace and misery to thousands of women and their families without in any way changing the conditions of life.

Not only is it unscientific, and cruel to judge men and women alike, but it is really unjust to judge any two human beings alike, and the safest way is not to judge at all.

~ ~ ~ JUST BECAUSE THEY ARE WOMEN ~ ~ ~

By THOMAS LEE WOOLWINE, Los Angeles District Attorney

Los Angeles, Nov. 25.— There can be no question that it is more difficult to convict a woman for any offense than a man.

My office has had unusual success in establishing the guilt of women charged with crimes of violence. Within the past two years we have convicted Mrs. Louise Peete and Mrs. Maybelle Rowe of first degree murder, Mrs. Clara Phillips of second degree murder, two other women of manslaughter and one of deadly assault.

The reason it is well night impossible to punish women for crimes of violence in particular is simple: It is because they are women, and because sex plays a vital part in every such trial.

~ Chivalry Plays Part ~

Men are innately loath to punish women. Women naturally arouse a feeling of false chivalry in men which allays and tempers their judgment upon the evidence.

It is more difficult for a prosecutor to overcome this powerful factor than it is to convince a jury upon the state of facts presented.

This sex advantage, under the circumstances, is as natural as that we breath and eat. It no doubt always has obtained and always will, and there is no way to avoid it.

I have seen no indication that this fact is being modified by the mixed jury as though I have never known of a case where the jury was composed entirely of women, and can only speculate on what the result might he in that circumstance.It may be said that even the prosecutor himself, being a man, cannot by nature fight a case against a woman defendant with quite the force and vigor he would exert in appearing against one of his own sex.

~ ~ ~ "WOMEN ARE MORE CLEVER" ~ ~ ~

By JUDGE FLORENCE ALLEN, First Woman Criminal Court Just Elected in Ohio Supreme Court

Cleveland, O., Nov. 25.—There are a number of reasons why women are so often acquitted in murder cases. Here are some of them:

1. Men have always sat on juries and men instinctively shrink from holding women strictly accountable for their misdeeds. Now that women sit on juries I expect the percentage of convictions in cases of women to be greater.

2. Women are more clever than men in arousing sympathy. I had one woman, a hardened criminal, stage a terrific fainting spell in my courtroom after the jury found her guilty. It took four men to carry her to jail. She continued having these spells, so long that I had to defer pronouncing sentence. Finally I sent her word that the longer she acted so, the longer she would be in jail. Within a few moments she sent up word that, she would be good and received her sentence meekly, with no trace of feeling.

3. Cases in which women are tried for murder usually involve circumstantial evidence only. A man may be tried for murder arising out of a robbery, or some case in which direct evidence of the past crime may help to prove the murder.

But when a woman murders someone it is apt to be through jealousy or some personal reason. Women have murdered for life insurance, but in general, personal reasons are involved oftener than with men and, because motives and the workings of the human heart are so hard to trace, the murder case against a woman is really harder to prove than the case against a man, which so often arises out of some other crime.

NOTE: The 20/20 TV report on the Men's Rights Movement by Elizabeth Vargas, "Marriage 'Unsafe' for Men, Says Men's Rights Activist," was scheduled to air October 18, 2013, but it was pulled. It is not presently known whether it will be broadcast. An excerpt featuring a brief dialog between AVfM publisher Paul Elam and Elizabeth Vargas is at this date still available for viewing. It shows Vargas in a disapproving school marm mode as she officiously interrogates the man whose activism she so sternly condemns.

Andybob's Corner: 20/20 Foresight

andybob · 23 October 2013 · Archived copy · Original

One of my favorite (and our most strongly upvoted) commenters at AVfM is a mysterious fellow named "Andy Bob" (or sometimes "AndyBob"). Funny, bitingly insightful, a joy to read – it is always worthwhile to slow down and read his thoughts carefully – and more than once.

Every now and then we like to round up some of Andy's work for your enjoyment, and ours.

AndyBob has been on something of a tear of late, particularly concerning the ABC show 20/20's episode about Paul Elam/AVfM that was postponed for reasons that are not entirely clear.

Here follow some of AndyBob's comments about the matter. Enjoy! – A.L.

From the-Spearhead blog, in response to a post about Paul's 20/20 adventures.

Did you get a load of 20/20 presenter, Elizabeth Vargas? She all but blew a gasket at the very idea of a man having the audacity to discuss the rights and welfare of men and boys.

Nothing could illustrate the sneering dismissal of men's humanity more powerfully than the hostility emanating from Ms Vargas' every pore. Of course, feminists are going to lap it up – but not everyone's a feminist. Many of these non-feminists will see it as the dishonest hatchet job it is, and will want to know more about AVfM and the so-called MHRM.

Those still able to exercise their capacity for logical thinking will realize that expressing concern over issues such as male suicide rates does not make a person a rape supporter/enabler/apologist. These are the people Paul Elam was reaching out to and connecting with.

This had nothing to do with the cliché that all publicity is good publicity. It was about getting a foot in the door and establishing a presence – a door which can never be closed, regardless of how shrill feminists scream at us to get out. It was foolish of them to invite us in, and even more foolish to flout their lies, shaming tactics and bigotry so shamelessly on prime-time TV.

I'm stunned that so many people who claim to care about men's issues are so scared of media attention – or was it the disapproval of scowling feminists and their enablers? Lucky there are men like Paul Elam who never expected to be welcomed and adored by the feminist-led MSM (Mainstream Media).

Surely no-one is actually suggesting that he should have waited until feminists stopped hating our guts before venturing forth to promote men's issues through the MSM. They're probably the same people who whine about us never making progress.

Paul Elam took that step and faced the misandric bigots alone. He got the hatchet job he expected all along – a hatchet job that proved more about the reality of feminist hate-mongering than anything any of us could ever say or do.

That is a victory that deserves more than the vitriol he is receiving in this thread. When men put their petty resentments and fragile egos ahead of our common good, it explains a great deal about why feminism has wrought so much devastation in our lives.

I expected a hit job from 20/20, but not from a fellow traveler. Disappointing.

From AVfM, regarding the (now delayed) episode of 20/20 about the Men's Human Rights Movement.

http://www.avoiceformen.com/a-voice-for-men/alexacaliente-alyssapry-anitasarkeesian-jaclynf-abc-reporting-standards-at-2020-are-interesting/comment-page-1/#comment-188085

Of course, it will be a hatchet job.

Like Dr Elam, my first preference would be for the 20/20 piece to be an objectively honest presentation of the issues confronting men and boys, and the role that organizations, like AVfM, are playing to draw attention to them. However, I would be slightly more gob-smacked if this happened than if Dr Elam were to be crowned the new Miss Texas. I am sure Dr Elam would be too.

My second preference is that 20/20 cobble together the most dishonest and hostile hatchet job in the history of current affairs television – complete with outrageous examples of feminist lies, shaming tactics and invocations of threat narratives. The parade of misandry will validate every point we have ever made about how men's issues are aggressively marginalized and ignored, and reveal the methods used by those most responsible for it. The sneering mug of Elizabeth Vargas will illustrate society's contemptuous dismissal of men's humanity more accurately than anything I could ever write.

This is one of the moments that Dr Elam has worked so hard for: vast numbers of curiosity seekers who have learnt long ago to distrust the MSM, and its interpretation of issues that affect them, and have decided to Google the site. It is why he publicly distanced himself from the PUA industry; emphasized how imperative it was for AVfM to remain above partisan politics; welcomed and respected such an unprecedented diversity of contributors and supporters; and, wielded the ban-hammer wisely (much to the ire of those who simply didn't 'get it'). Accepting 20/20′s offer will prove to be his smartest move ever.

'A Voice for Men' has nothing to fear from a hatchet job because we have nothing to hide. The same cannot be said for the Radfemhub, whose generous donations to the SPLC bought a hate-group label that stuck for about 24 hours. Nor can it be said of Anita Sarkeesian, that chirpy cyber-bully 'survivor', whose ordeal left her drowning in funds, but otherwise, miraculously unscathed. It says a great deal about the integrity of 20/20′s reportage that they had to haul out this cast of shady and corrupt bigots to help sell its agenda. After all, they couldn't have hung the whole segment on Jaclyn Friedmans's clit – though I'm sure she wouldn't have objected.

It is very fortunate for us that perky researchers, Ms Pry and Ms Valiente, are blissfully ignorant of the old edict that you can't fool all of the people all of the time. The fact that the MHRM is being discussed at all on a popular MSM programme is a disaster for feminists, but they're too busy salivating over the anticipated hatchet job to realize it. David Futrelle's Boobettes have all but wet themselves with excitement. Dr Elam's artful positioning of AVfM into the MSM means that the days of ignoring us are now officially over, and that the battle has moved into the public arena. David Beckham couldn't have bent it better.

If feminists sincerely believe that a hatchet job by 20/20 will silence AVfM, and make the MHRM disappear, they are in for the shock of their subsidized lives. In fact, feminists, and their enablers, are about to be made rudely aware of just how many people have been hurt and alienated by their cruel and vindictive abuses. Once the finger is out of the dike, there will be no stopping the deluge of anger and resentment that will eventually overwhelm them.

Paul Elam has bravely put himself on the line to defend the rights and protect the welfare of men and boys everywhere. He has got the balls rolling, as it were – his. He has my everlasting respect and admiration.

From AVfM, a couple of posts in response to a White Knight who claimed that JudgyBitch Janet Bloomfield shouldn't have revealed details of a pair of women writers:

http://www.avoiceformen.com/a-voice-for-men/alexacaliente-alyssapry-anitasarkeesian-jaclynf-abc-reporting-standards-at-2020-are-interesting/comment-page-1/#comment-188088

Big guns?

Invoking a threat narrative on behalf of a pair of twits is not what I call bringing out the big guns. It is what I call donning white knight garb to defend two people who failed in their responsibility to provide honest research about AVfM's fight for the rights and welfare for men and boys. Instead, they believed that it was more important to promote their ideology by presenting dishonest information about Paul Elam, AVfM, and the MHRM.

If you genuinely believe that the glaring inaccuracies of their 'research' are a result of mere incompetence, then you are as disingenuous as they would like you to think they are.

I have no doubt whatsoever that the only consequences of highlighting Ms Pry and Ms Valiente's lack of scruples will be offers of executive positions at NOW. Rest assured, they will remain as safely unscathed as every other damsel who has been disgraced on the pages of AVfM.

Ms Bloomfield's obsession with the truth does not make her 'like feminists'. It makes her exactly the opposite: a MHRA – one of the very best. I doubt she has either the time, nor the patience for this kind of pearl-clutching nonsense. Jezebel's that-a-way. Don't trip on your jousting utensils on the way out.

http://www.avoiceformen.com/a-voice-for-men/alexacaliente-alyssapry-anitasarkeesian-jaclynf-abc-reporting-standards-at-2020-are-interesting/comment-page-1/#comment-188173

One of the glaring differences between the capable reporters of yore and the botoxed talking heads of today is that those capable reporters actually did most of their own research. Surely no-one actually believes that Elizabeth Vargas does any of her own her research – she doesn't even do her own nails.

The researchers responsible for feeding La Vargas the misinformation that had her fuming in righteous indignation (and almost succeed in furrowing her brow) are Ms Pye and Ms Valiente. Therefore, it is entirely appropriate and justified for us to find out exactly who they are and what they're about.

They have actively participated in derailing an opportunity to promote issues concerning the rights and welfare of men and boys. So, no, I will not issue them passes for their irresponsibility just because they are young, relatively cute, and juggle their research duties with fetching Ms Vargas' morning latte and picking up her dry cleaning.

It is imperative that AVfM continues to disabuse the likes of these women from their assumptions that no-one will ever call them on pulling this kind of crap. The University of Toronto protesters proudly boasted of their violent criminality, until the AVfM spotlight sent them scurrying chaotically for cover. Even an abrasively clueless pinhead, like Chanty Binx, managed to rub enough brain cells together to realize that reprising her tuneless celebration of male suicide was probably inadvisable. AVfM helped her reach that epiphany, without charging her a dime – and she never even sent a thank you card.

The only damage Ms Bloomfield's post will do to these women will be to the cover which has hitherto protected them from getting busted for 'creative research' – otherwise known as 'making shit up'. That cover has been blasted to kingdom come, as indeed it should be. I wonder if some commenters would be quite so concerned if Ms Bloomfield had taken male researchers to task. I doubt it.

Really guys, you have to stop this chivalry crap. It's one of the reasons we are in this mess in the first place.

It seems like a regular event for me these days to make some kind of announcement or another about the latest advance or addition to the AVFM ma-cheen. Here in the wee hours of October 23, 2013, I get to do it again.

Janet Bloomfield, also and much more popularly known as JudgyBitch, the straight-shooting destroyer of feminist nonsense with a red-hot keyboard and zero tolerance for bullshit, has herself in a bit of a dilemma.

You see, doing things like being a wife and mother of three children, earning a Ph.D., writing a novel and devoting time to write rants on a daily blog can just plain put a stress on your daily schedule.

Something had to go, and we are pretty sure it was not going to be Mr. JB, her children, her education or her novel. So, to my eternal sadness, she decided she had to give up the rants on her blog.

Damn, I thought, what good is being Judgy or a Bitch if you are not sharing it with the rest of us? I felt cheated.

Not to worry, though. We struck a compromise. Or actually, she made an offer and I said yes.

Starting this Friday, and generally every Friday thereafter till she is really old and has to be put away, Janet Bloomfield will be writing articles for AVFM exclusively. I still think she could do her blog rants Saturday through Thursday if she didn't put all that time into her dissertation, but that is just one man's opinion. Fridays will have to do.

She is even taking writing assignments from the editorial staff. We paint a target on someone's stupid ideas and then point her toward said stupid target. She does the rest. Well, someone on staff will take care of the remains.

Works for me.

Tune in on Friday, when she will be discussing the criminalization of the male gaze. (Gee, wonder what kind of person could be behind something like that?)

And please join me in welcoming Janet Bloomfield to the staff of regular AVFM writers. We are always happy to add another counterculture Smart Bomb to the arsenal.

In His Own Words: Victimized by victim support advocates

Dr. Tara J. Palmatier · 24 October 2013 · Archived copy · Original

It's day 24 of Domestic Violence Awareness Month for Men and Boys, the invisible victims of domestic violence. Today's In His Own Words is an example of the systemic abuse to which men and boys are frequently subjected. It is an egregious example of sexism and misandry. It is also an example of how many women use victimhood (real or imagined) as a form of "street cred" and/or social status.

"My ex-boyfriend cheated on me. Yeah well, my husband beat me and I had cancer. My adopted third world son has soooo many behavioral issues, we have to give him meds that make him morbidly obese, it's soooooo hard on me. That's nothing, I was raped by my college boyfriend. Big deal, I was molested by my father and gang raped by the marching band and have a deadbeat husband."

I have personally witnessed this kind of "victim off" in academic settings, clinical settings and, most recently, at a friend's birthday party — women trying to "out victim" each other. In other words, not in a therapeutic setting. These are women who were superficial acquaintances, colleagues and/or classmates, not intimates. It's disturbing. Healthy individuals don't want to be seen as victims, even if they have, in fact, been legitimately victimized.

"Tim" wanted to give back to his community by volunteering with a victim advocacy support agency. In the end, he became a victim of their bigotry and sexism. If this is how a victims advocacy organization treats male volunteers, just imagine how they treat male victims. Is it any wonder there are precious few services for male victims of domestic violence and sexual assault?

> Victimized by Victim Support Advocates
> In my mid twenties, I was a shy, naïve, introverted, but equally idealistic young man. I had a steady job, but I was still finding out who I was and what I wanted out of life. I decided that there was more to me than technology, and I started looking for a more human way to contribute to society than mere economic activity.
> Somehow, I found out about the work done by Victim Support, a volunteer organisation that helps victims of crime to recover from their experiences. They seemed a noble organisation, and volunteering my time to them seemed like a good way to do something positive for those for whom I felt empathy and compassion. So, I wandered down to the central police station (where their offices were co-located) and signed up.
>
> First, I was interviewed to screen for unsuitable candidates. I was asked questions concerning my motivations and attitude towards crime. Memorably, I was asked whether I would be willing to work with victims of rape. The idea struck me as being singularly inappropriate: a man is likely to be the last person a freshly raped woman would want to talk to and, never having even heard of the red pill, I said so, but also that if that was what a victim wanted, then of course I would do what I could. Their response was that, "Well, men get raped, too".
> A charitable reading of this question and their reply was to check that I didn't have anything in my past (such as sexual abuse) that dealing with rape victims might trigger though, cynically — especially in retrospect — I wonder if this wasn't some sort of shibboleth to gauge how 'rapey' I was myself.
> I was duly accepted into the next intake of basic training seminars, which involved three or four intensive weekend-long, 8 hours a day seminars. Most of it was lecture format with socialisation between sessions, but there were group activities as well. I was by no means the only male there but, at 25, I was certainly the youngest one, and the women outnumbered the men by something like 3:1.
> The first sign that something was amiss was when I approached the convenor about the source of a passage that had been handed out the previous day. "Our deepest fear" so caught my attention that I looked it up to find out more and I discovered that, where the convenor had attributed it to Nelson Mandela, the original passage is to be found in Marianne Williamson's book, "A Return to Love." (That book and its related work, "A Course in Miracles" is deeply new-agey stuff that is somewhat extreme, even for most new-agers, and is a whole 'nuther story.)

I felt that Williamson deserved to be correctly attributed, not least so that others whose interest it might catch could find out more, but the convenor wasn't remotely interested. She certainly didn't care for what was actually true, and I got the distinct impression that she was more concerned about not losing face in front of her class than accurate course materials (even though I spoke to the convenor privately between sessions rather than draw attention to the error in front of the rest of the class).

Still, 'not that important,' I thought, and I dismissed it as just a matter different priorities. Looking back, though, I wonder if there wasn't something else going through her mind.

One of the group activities was an exercise in exploring our own pasts and, if I wished to be uncharitable, just a hint of a parade of victim credentials. Many of those there described experiences of domestic violence and sexual assault themselves, and I recall feeling 'outclassed,' almost as if I didn't deserve to be there because nothing particularly bad had happened to me. The task was to draw a few symbols representing certain events in our past in each of the four quadrants of a shield-like thing on a piece of flip-chart paper which was then to be pinned up along with everybody else's. These were then discussed as a group, and then we paired up for further discussion.

It's not that I had no bad things in my past, but my father's stroke and subsequent death (when I was aged 7 and 17 respectively) seemed fairly ordinary and unremarkable compared to some of the horrors described by the other students. What this was all in aid of, I'm unsure (particularly as the point was repeated time and again that support work is emphatically not therapy), but I am certain of the effect: it made me feel extraordinarily vulnerable, it brought unprocessed grief to the surface and tears with it, and I see no reason this would not be true for the other students.

I don't remember much more detail of this except that the guy I paired up with, and who saw my grief, was a middle-aged, softly-spoken Canadian gentleman. I never did quite shake the feeling that we were constantly being evaluated, especially in that particular activity.

I think I got through most or all of the class work, and the next weekend we were scheduled to meet at the hospital for a tour of the areas and procedures we would be expected to know in the course of this work. At about 10:30am one weekday morning, I got a phone call from the softly-spoken Canadian. He said that he had something he needed to discuss with me, and could I meet him at the police station (VS' base, and where the training sessions were held) at noon? Since it was only a 10 minute walk away, I agreed.

Immediately, I knew something was wrong. Why was a fellow student phoning me up and asking to meet at the police station? What was it that he couldn't discuss over the phone? How, indeed, did he get my phone number, private information protected by law?

The softly-spoken Canadian gentleman turned out not to be a student at all, but rather a member of that chapter's management board. He led me into a small room and baldly stated that a complaint had been laid against me by one of the women on the course. He would not say by whom (or even how many complaints), what the complaint was or what I was supposed to have done, only that my presence made the women 'feel unsafe.' I was given two choices: 'voluntarily' sign the provided letter of resignation (in which case the whole matter would be dropped and forgotten about, with no record made), or face official (but unspecified) proceedings, which would inevitably result in my being expelled from the course and other, implied, unspecified consequences.

What is a young man, in a police station, accused of unspecified perversions to do? I had not read Franz Kafka's Der Prozeß (The Trial), but I instinctively knew that I could not win, so I yielded. I intuitively knew that I would stand no chance of getting justice done without a long, expensive and most likely very public legal process, and even then, not necessarily.

[image]

> Empathy for the suffering of others is, for the INFJ (personality type), second only to their sense of integrity. That integrity was now being besmirched by the most egregious of means, and suspected of unspeakable wrong that anybody with even a passably adequate sense of empathy and compassion for others would not do. In tears, I signed the paper bearing that one, bald line, and I plead to be told what I had done wrong, whether there was anything I could do to make it right, and whether there was any chance of being able to try again at some future date.
> I was told that now that I had resigned, the matter was closed and he could not divulge any further information. Reluctantly, though, he did add something about my having followed a female member of the course to her car, but would not elaborate.
> I spent months afterwards trying to fathom what he might have been talking about. I could think of only two possibilities: I did, indeed, walk with a middle aged lady to her car, deep in conversation after one of the course days, but it evidently wasn't that, for by chance I met this same lady in the street some time later. She greeted me warmly, and said that she was sorry that I left the course so suddenly, and that she and the other students had "missed my thoughtful contributions".
> The other possibility is that I happened to follow another course member along an arterial route in my car a short distance away from the police station after one session because that was the direction I happened to be going in. "Followed to her car" is not the same as "followed in your car," but it's the only thing that makes any sense.
> This woman happened to be a feminist and a lawyer who, I think, specialised in indigenous rights.
> The story does not end there. I tried to appeal the decision, but was told that the matter was closed. I wrote to the national oversight body, but was told that there was no case, and anyway, their policy was to back up the decision of the chapter's management committee. They did, however, refer me to a counsellor to help me deal with the aftermath (at my own cost, naturally).
> This counsellor was a piece of work. In our first meeting he reached over while listening to my story and pulled a piece of tape in its dispenser and stuck it to the knurled edge, but did not tear it off just to see, apparently, how long it would take for me to get annoyed and do it for him. Later, he complained about being a counsellor and said that he was probably going to quit the profession. He also said that he thought I might have Asperger's Syndrome (of which the IT sector has more than its fair share), even though one with this condition would be exceedingly unlikely to volunteer for this work for the reason I did — out of empathy for the victims of crime.
> Not only is it a gross breach of professional standards to offer even the suggestion of a diagnosis that he was not qualified to make, this counsellor, it turned out, was an advisor to the very same Victim Support chapter that perpetrated this sorry mess in the first place, but neither he nor the Victim Support guy who referred me told me this beforehand. If I knew then what I know now, I'd have demanded that this guy be struck from the relevant professional register but, as I said, I was young and naïve.
> It has taken me over a decade of therapy and time to heal these wounds and although the episode doesn't haunt me as once it did, I still feel the shame for something I did not do. To this day, I still do not know what provoked all of this. The only reason to speak publicly is the chance it might help other boys and men. That, and because I can't expect others to be vulnerable and talk about their pain if I'm not prepared to do the same.
> Sexual assault is a crime, but naïvety is not.

Men Going Their Own Way “just like the feminists?”

VFM News and Commentary · 24 October 2013 · Archived copy · Original

There are people who insist that Men Going Their Own Way as a philosophical movement is a “radical separatist” movement (false) or that it’s misogynist (false). Although you will find some in those ranks who think that way, most are just making a rational choice based on fact. RazorBladeKandy explains, in a recent video response to well-known Man Going His Own Way, Barbarossa.

RazorBladeKandy is one of the most distinctive and interesting YouTubers in MHRA circles. Some people hate his style, but we tend to find him highly amusing and thought-provoking.

Also by the way, RazorBlade Kandy was recently sabotaged with false flag complaints on YouTube and had to start a new channel. You can find his new channel right here.

A real man pays child support?

Clayton Craddock · 24 October 2013 · Archived copy · Original

There is one thing you should know about me. I feel the way court-ordered child support is handled in our culture is ridiculous, and is a really bad idea. As some members of the GOP would say, it should be "defunded," but there is no need to shut down the government – maybe. I wrote extensively on my thoughts and experiences with family court and child support HERE, but I want to expand on it a little bit.

Recently, I have been reading online about manhood. When I ask people what a "real man" is, I get all kinds of answers. While reading a few things online, I stumbled across an image that said, "A Real Man Pays Child Support." When I saw the image, I immediately had to write my thoughts down. I subsequently wrote a blog post about it. A few hours later I got a comment on my blog from a woman who said:

> "There are no great answers in the case of divorce or out-of-wedlock conception. Every case is different. I have worked with children of divorce and their parents for 23 years. There are no pat answers, but this one thing is true. If the law says pay child support, you pay child support. A real man obeys the law, even if he is feeling mistreated. Usually everyone in a divorce feels mistreated. Until a person puts his or her children first, whatever it costs, the children are the biggest losers."

My reply went something like this:

Yes, no one should disobey the law, but the way child support is set up today immediately marginalizes fathers from the beginning. I refused to pay child support to my ex-wife. I would suggest to any man even remotely thinking about having a child that they understand the law as it is currently written in your state. If you don't, you are putting yourself in a terrible position and possibly setting yourself up for financial ruin.

It is truly risky having a child with a woman here in the United States. It is an uphill battle for fathers to fight for equality with regard to parental rights. I have decided to spend the rest of my life doing my best to fight for changes in domestic relations law so we can finally see laws that reflect life in modern America.

Do you want to know what a REAL MAN is?

A real man does not get into a situation where he has to pay tens, if not hundreds of thousands of dollars to lawyers just to see his own flesh and blood on a regular basis. A real man does not subscribe to the mentality that the mother gets custody of the kids post break up or divorce and resign himself to the fact that he will see his kids only every other weekend. A real man assumes from the beginning that no one has to pay child support or alimony because both parents share equally if the relationship ends. Shared custody is the only way to begin the post-relationship parenting process. A real man files for divorce FIRST when he finds out his partner broke the marriage contract and cheated. A real man does not play defense…he plays offense…because he loves his children more than a woman who cheated, lied, stole, was abusive or was in the partnership for reasons other than a long-term equal partnership.

THAT is a real man.

A real man is responsible. A real man is honorable and loyal. A real man loves his children unconditionally. A real man chooses a woman after a long courting process and quickly eliminates any woman who has not had a good relationship with her father–he does not need a woman with daddy issues, he needs a wife. A real man does his due diligence to find out a potential mate's past dating history and spot patterns before he falls head over heels in love; therefore not allowing sex to cloud his judgement. A real man kicks a woman out of the house when she is violent or emotionally abusive and is not afraid to call the police at a moment's notice. A real man works hard on his own life to make it better for himself and his children. A real man does not cower in fear when some women tell him he is being "misogynistic" when he points out inconsistencies in extreme radical feminist ideology. A real man loves his female children, his female sisters, his female girlfriend and even still cares about the well-being of his female ex-wife…..therefore making the “misogynistic” rubbish spewed at him look silly.

THAT is a real man.

The assumption that real men pay child support is as outdated as a woman at home in the kitchen barefoot and pregnant; bringing her husband his slippers and newspaper after work every day. It’s 2013, not 1953!

Child support has NOTHING to do with children. NOTHING!!!!!! It’s all about supporting and subsidizing mothers. It is all about the transfer or wealth from fathers to mothers. It is a system that does not take into consideration the accountability for how the money is spent to care for the children. It’s also a massive game between the Federal government and the states that is only getting more and more convoluted. It is a subsidy for single motherhood.

I’m glad I stood up to the nonsense I saw in family court and did what I had to do to free myself of the financial slavery that state ordered child support really is. It’s time more men either understand the game before they get in it, or stop playing altogether.

Re-read these posts and you’ll understand my points a little better:
Deadbeat Dad Dilemma
Victims have rights. Here, the victim also has responsibilities
The Best Financial Interests Of The Child Or State
Debtors Prisons Are Alive And Well

After you get done with all of that, or anything else on my blog (socraddockmethod.com), tell me if you feel the same about the statement “A Real Man Pays Child Support.” After you do more research on the subject, tell me whether you still feel that fathers should pay into this racket or should there be another way? Tell me how you feel after you discover the reality of the poor outcomes stemming from single parent led homes? Tell me then, how a system dedicated to breaking up families is good for society? How is child support making anything better for our society?

Be a real man and avoid state-sponsored court ordered child support at all costs.

In His Own Words: Married to a Borderline

Dr. Tara J. Palmatier · 25 October 2013 · Archived copy · Original

It's day 25 of Domestic Violence Awareness Month for Men and Boys, the invisible victims of domestic violence. Have you ever wondered why we view men's violence as criminal behavior and women's violence as mental illness? Have you ever considered the ramifications of doing so?

Male abusers are seen as bad men that women and children would do well to avoid. Female abusers are seen as "troubled," and in need of our compassion and help. Female abuse victims are told to end their relationship with their male abusers. Male abuse victims are often told they need to learn how not to trigger their female abuser and be more sensitive, understanding and accepting of her feelings. Male abusers often go to jail. Female abusers typically go to counseling.

This is especially evident in the way a large percentage of the mental health field approaches women with Borderline Personality Disorder and their victims, which often include the spouses/partners and children of the BPD. It is one of the worst double standards in the mental health profession. These therapists are culpable for enabling domestic violence and child abuse.

I suspect many men who fit the classic male batterer/emotional abuser archetype likely have borderline, narcissistic and/or sociopathic traits, just like their female abuser counterparts. Yet, the mental health field has compassion for disordered female abusers and treats disordered male abusers as criminals. Benevolent sexism?

It's time to hold female abusers to the same standards of accountability, including pressing criminal charges when indicated, to which we hold male abusers regardless of how shitty their childhoods may have been and/or their mental health diagnoses. A personality disorder may explain a woman's abusive behaviors. It does not excuse them.

Today's In His Own Words is written by "MarriedtoaBPD," a man I know via my work on Shrink4Men. His wife received a sort of BPD diagnosis from a former therapist. She rejected the diagnosis, fired the therapist and has kept on with her denial, borderline rage and abuse of her husband, her children and his children from a previous marriage. MarriedtoaBPD began an anonymous blog to journal the severe emotional abuse he experiences regularly from his BPD wife. He has given me permission to share his story in order to help raise awareness for male victims of domestic violence.

Married to a Borderline
What you are about to read is the first time I have had anyone look at this blog. I have to admit I'm scared. I'm scared my wife is going to find this and rage on me. I'm scared because I have to lie to her and tell her I don't think she is borderline when we fight because she will go apeshit on me.

I'm mad at myself because I can't be honest with her about this. I'm scared because her family knows she is a 'little crazy,' but thinks I'm the best thing that's ever happened to her. I'm scared that if we divorce that everyone that knows her as the nice, earthy, vegan, holistic mom will think I'm a major screw, an ass and a cheater.

But mostly, I'm scared for her daughters she brought into the relationship two years ago when we married. They're 7 and 9 now and they aren't doing well. How can you when your mom yells at you, 'I don't have any time for myself and it's your fault! Why are you doing this to me? Why are you stealing my life?!'

My eldest child graduated from high school this past summer. My second child will graduate in early June 2014. I plan to divorce then if things don't change. I have mixed feelings about leaving because I don't want her girls to turn out like their mom, with abandonment issues about men. It's like I'm watching a runaway train careening toward the slope of puberty where it will most assuredly become a fireball of a wreck, destroying anything in its path.

I am also mad at myself for being deceitful, that, as much as I need to write and share this with other men, I am hiding and keeping secrets from her. During her borderline rages, she accuses me of keeping secrets and being a liar. I insist over and over again that I'm not keeping secrets. In reality, I am keeping secrets and I am a liar, because she doesn't know that I am in individual therapy, or publishing anything.

So having said that, I seal my fate to eventually being outed. Welcome to my world.

10/18/2013. I'm sitting here with my headphones on, being called a 'prickless little man' by my wife. This is so frustrating.Her daughter was slamming a door because because they were fighting. Wife said she was going to take the door off its hinges. I asked what I could do to help.

In the ensuing conversation that led up to our fight, I said, 'Sometimes it feels like the whole world is off-kilter.'

I went to the bedroom to work on some stuff and she followed. She asked why I was crying about a little girl being angry. Things started to escalate in a tone that I've become accustomed to. I felt like something bad was coming and said, 'This is not what we are supposed to talk about this week.' She continued to rant about me and the girls. I said the safe word the therapist gave us, 'Prism.'

She got angry, came over and started insisting that I argue with her or have what I call a high-conflict engagement. I said I did not want to talk and asked her to step away. She would not leave my space on my side of the room. I said I did not want to talk again and she said I was a prickless little man and needed to stop running and hiding.

I told her I wanted to go to my private place. She continued to stand over my shoulder, insisting that I talk to her. She said that me listening to headphones and trying to disengage was making her angry and I was responsible for it. I put the headphones on and was told I was not allowed to do that.

I said I wanted to journal. She stood over my shoulder and tried to read what I was typing. I asked her to step away. I had the headphones on and had not found a song on Spottily yet, so I could hear her. She kept saying, 'I know you can hear me. Why don't you act like a man and talk to me?!'

I kept asking her, 'Step away please.' I said this five times. She would not leave my area, so I finally lowered the lid on my laptop and turned to face the wall once the music started. I listened to a song or two and then looked over my shoulder to see she had left the room. I took the laptop off the desk and turned so the screen could not be seen from the room and continued to journal.

She went down the hallway to check on the girls. She came back a few minutes later saying about her daughter, 'I can't even believe it's impossible for me to touch a toothbrush without her freaking out. I can't deal with this fucking disease or a person who fucking can't get over it,' and walked back out.

After a few moments, she came back into the room and started folding laundry. She said something like, 'Why are you messing around, you know this is over, so you should just leave. You can't stand us.' I can't remember it exactly because I was starting to get angry. I had removed my headphones when I saw she was not in the room and put them back on. She crossed around the foot of the bed and attempted to get a sideways glance at my computer screen. She stood on my side of the room and asked/accused, 'Oh what lies are you writing about me now?'

I decided I wanted to leave the room. I unplugged my laptop, got up and walked to the door. She blocked my way again, 'again' as in she's tried to block my egress many times before. I asked, 'Please move.'

She did not move.

I asked again, 'Please move, I would like to leave.' She insisted that she didn't have to move until I answered her questions. I asked again, for the third time, and was told I had no right to leave until she got what she needed.

I held up my right hand and started to count on my fingers how many times I was asking to leave the room. I made sure not to touch her or shove past her. I continued to ask to leave and when I got to six, I started over on the same hand. She continued to block me from leaving the room.

When I got to eight, she reached up, grabbed my hand and closed my fingers. I said, 'I want you to stop touching me and I want to leave the room.' I continued to say these two things as I counted on my right hand.

She taunted me, wanting to know why I was counting. I replied that I was counting so I could accurately journal how many times I had asked to leave the room and was being blocked.

She said the time to journal was when I was at work and this was not the time for it. When I got to the twelfth time I said, 'I have asked a dozen times to leave my room and you are preventing me from moving freely and this is a right I have.' She replied, 'Oh I see how it is. Well you might as well start packing,' and she finally stepped aside.

I went to the front room, sat down with my laptop and started to journal again. She followed and stood by the front door, trying to get a sideways glance of my screen again. I stood up again with my laptop and walked downstairs, so I could be alone and type. After a while, she sent me a text message. It contained a picture of a Maggie Smith quote which said, 'Speak your mind, even if it makes your voice tremble.' I replied, 'When we have had the next session and our therapist says it's time, then we can discuss. Until then, I am going to journal what is happening. Please do not text or message me. I would like some privacy please.' She sent me three more messages:

'You understood her wrong.'

'If you would like a separation for a week to get away from my amazing children and I, go right ahead! That's the only way this will work for you.'

'Pack it up!'

Then, I was on Facebook trying to coordinate a deal for an engine and she sent a message on Facebook:

'Hmm, you've ben on here a long time.'

'Someone more interesting than me?'

10/23/2013. So right after our last couples therapy session, my wife sent me a text saying, 'That was pretty slick.'

I replied, 'What was slick?'

During the counseling session, the counselor asked point blank about any history of diagnosis with mental health issues. Two marriage counselors ago, we had a counselor ask if she had ever been diagnosed with Borderline Personality Disorder. My wife went into a rage about that and to this day calls that woman a quack and someone who shouldn't have a license.

I decided to drive around and think about things. She called. I took a few minutes to ready myself, then I called back.

*Note. This is pretty overwhelming, I'm going to take a break and journal some more later.

As an aside, I last journaled at lunch. More has happened since this afternoon and I had to leave the house this evening. I'm typing this at a Starbucks nearby.

So when I called her back, I was surprised to find out something odd. She said, 'So I have one question to ask and I want an honest answer. Did you talk to the counselor without me there? Have you been in communication with her?'

I replied that I hadn't and would not do that. What she said next was no surprise because this is the siren call of my wife's BPD.

'I know you're lying and I can tell you have talked to her because of what she asked in counseling today.'

Absolutely, unequivocally, as soon as the words, 'I can tell…' have been uttered, I know I'm in for a ride on the roller coaster of emotional insanity. What is even more bizarre is the twisting that happened around the stuff our counselor told us to do.

After last week's episode where I was prevented from leaving the bedroom, the counselor flat out told her she needs to stop preventing me from leaving. I was glad for this because it's a small step in the right direction. The counselor told her the things she was doing would be considered abusive. This was great also.

Right now at Starbucks, she's constantly texting and calling trying to get me to come back to the house. It's very frustrating because she was told to leave me alone when I want space and for me to leave the house if things were feeling confrontational. I'm told I'm being 'vicious' right now because I said I would be home when I was done instead of coming right home when she told me to.

She is insisting I come home under the guise that I have a cold and she 'wants to take care of me.' I'm not sure how this will continue to roll on, but I've just got to be strong and ignore these rants. The only way they are eventually going to stop is if they no longer create a reaction in me.

So to back up a little bit, the reason I'm down here is that she told me the counselor said we need to be separated for two weeks. What the counselor said was that we need to separate the conflict from our relationship.

In a previous session, we also decided on a safe word to use when things got out of hand. I used that word just now in a text message response to her accusing me of being vicious because I asked her to stop. I used the word and she isn't stopping. Now she is going on about how her shoulder is messed up and she needs to go to the chiropractor and get taken care of and why won't I take care of her. Interesting turn from the ploy of trying to get me to come home to take care of me.

Ah yes, here they come, the staples in any borderline's text routine, multiple question marks "???"

Now she's calling again, but I have to honor the safe word from counseling and not break the communication or give in to the urge for her to suck me into conflict or a manufactured emergency.

The Trouble Box

John Ribner · 25 October 2013 · Archived copy · Original

No one wants to hear about your domestic violence conviction. It's better kept hidden deep inside your "Trouble Box."

We all have a Trouble box. It's the place deep inside our minds where we put every embarrassing and disgraceful life experience… such as your arrest and conviction for domestic violence. After living with "wife-beater" stigma for so long, you know this is one shameful secret that can never see the light of day. So you open the box and cram that painful truth inside of it, way down deep where all of your humiliation resides, then you slam the lid shut and lock it tightly. This makes for a rather heavy Trouble Box, of course, and carrying it on your shoulders will take its toll. Do you dare relieve yourself of this burden by sharing it with others?

Once you're over the shock, pain and betrayal of being falsely accused, you'll eventually want to start dating again. While there's no need bare your soul right away, that domestic violence conviction might want out of the Trouble Box once things start getting serious with someone special. You want to tell her, too, because she has the right to know about your past, and honesty can be a good thing. (If only your ex would've been more forthright about her Borderline Personality Disorder!) But just when you're ready to tell your new girlfriend about your past, she tells you about the pain her ex put her through. The pain of that is still fresh in her mind, and you know she'd never believe that you plead guilty to a crime you know you didn't commit. Instead of getting the understanding you've been yearning for, you fold up your erstwhile confession and cram it back down inside the Trouble Box.

If anyone deserves some friends it's you. After all, most of your old ones abandoned you after your arrest. If you're fortunate enough to make some new friends, then good for you! Let's just hope they don't invite you to go hunting or target shooting. You might beg off with some lame excuse the first couple of times, but eventually you'll have to tell them that you can no longer own, use or possess firearms or ammunition. Confessing such a thing might sound good in your private thoughts, but actually doing it is a different story. You might remember the threats you received from these so-called friends who wanted to beat you up because you hurt a woman. Or how about all those unreturned voicemails, email and text messages from those you thought would stand by you? And then there were the sideways glances you got from their wives/girlfriends who didn't want their man hanging around a "wife-beater."

Not wanting to go through all that again, the truth goes right back into the Trouble Box where it belongs.

Your past will really come back to haunt you when you're trying to find a new job. Some employers ask if you've ever been convicted of a crime, and not answering honestly will blow your chances when they get the results of the background check. The ones who don't ask you outright do background checks too, and others ask about it during a pre-interview phone screening of potential applicants. You decide to come clean in hopes that the person on the other end of the phone – usually a woman – can overlook a 15-year-old misdemeanor. But why should anyone hire a "wife-beater" when there are hundreds of other applicants with clean backgrounds? After each missed opportunity, you'll have plenty of anger, frustration and hopelessness will take up residence inside your Trouble Box. At least the Domestic Violence conviction will have some company.

As taxing as it can be, be glad you have your Trouble Box. Nobody wants to hear about what really happened – that you just pushed away a woman who was punching, kicking and scratching at you to keep you from leaving the house. Nobody wants to hear that the Violence Against Women Act is a gender-biased law that encourages police and prosecutors to arrest, detain and convict a man based on nothing more than the word of angry, emotionally disturbed woman.

Most of all, nobody wants to hear you say you're innocent, not after you stood in front of a judge and proclaimed your guilt. Your little "plea bargain" traded 90 days in jail for a lifetime of suffering in silence, shame and regret. Regret for that decades-old injustice you'll carry until the day you die.

Does this seem harsh? Tell it to your Trouble Box.

Unraveling the myths of gynocentric culture

Peter Wright · 25 October 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Did female-centered culture begin in the prehistoric era?

This question is sometimes asked by people who feel that gynocentrism has been around for the entirety of human evolution. The answer to that question is of course yes – gynocentrism has been around throughout human history. However it's important to make a distinction between gynocentrism (that is, individual gynocentric acts, customs, or events) and gynocentric culture (a pervasive cultural complex that affects every aspect of life). We will never be precise enough to make sense of this subject unless we insist on this distinction between gynocentrism and gynocentric-culture.

Gynocentrism:

It's easy to overstate the import of specific examples of gynocentrism when in fact such examples may be equally balanced, culturally speaking, by male-centered acts, customs, or events which negate the concept of a pervasive gynocentric culture. Here we are reminded of the old adage that one swallow does not make a summer, and that likewise individual gynocentric acts, or even a small collection of such acts, do not amount to a pervasive gynocentric culture.

Individual examples of gynocentrism are sometimes misconstrued as representing a broader culture, as seen in the discussion around ancient female figurines which some people claim are indications of goddess-worshipping, gynocentric cultures. Not only is the import of the female figurines vastly overstated, the quantity discovered is potentially exaggerated according to leading feminist archeologists:

> "Quantitative analyses of Upper Paleolithic imagery make it clear that there are also images of males and that, by and large, most of the imagery of humans-humanoids cannot readily be identified as male or female. In fact, no source can affirm that more than 50 per cent of the imagery is recognizably female." [Ancient Goddesses]

Even if the majority of these figurines had proven to be female, this wouldn't indicate a gynocentric culture any more than would statues of the goddess Athena, and the Parthenon built in her honor, indicate that ancient Athens was a gynocentric city – which it clearly was not.

Archeologists discovered stencils of female hands in ancient caves, created by the practice of spraying mud from the mouth onto a female hand. Some were led to surmise, without evidence, that those same hands served as authorship of the animals that were also painted on the cave walls. Additionally, these archeologists assumed that the presence of female hand images not only meant that women painted the cave art but that the entire ancient world “must have” consisted of a completely gynocentric culture. These assumptions show the dangers of allowing imagination to depart too far from the evidence.

Further examples of overreach are the citing of fictional material from classical era, such as Helen of Troy (a Greek myth), or Lysistrata (a Greek play) as proof of gynocentric culture; unfortunately these examples are about as helpful for understanding gynocentrism as would be the movie Planet of the Apes to future researchers studying the history of primates.

Gynocentric culture:

A cultural complex refers to a significant configuration of culture traits that have major significance in the way people’s lives were lived. In sociology it is defined as a set of culture traits all unified and dominated by one essential trait; such as an industrial cultural complex, religious cultural complex, military cultural complex and so on. In each of these complexes we can identify a core factor – industry, religion, military – so we likewise require a core factor for the gynocentric cultural complex in order for it to qualify for the title. At the core of the gynocentric cultural complex is the feudalistic structure of lords and vassals, a structure which eventually became adopted as a gender relations model requiring men to serve as vassals to women. C.S. Lewis called this restructuring of gender relations ‘the feudalisation of love’ and rightly suggested that is has left no corner of our ethics, our imagination, or our daily life untouched.

The feudalisation of love was not something seen in pre-medieval times, let alone in the Paleolithic era when feudalism simply didn’t exist. For example, we have not yet seen a cave painting equal to this art from the Middle Ages showing a male acting as subservient vassal to a dominant woman who leads him around by a neck halter.

In summary, it appears everyone agrees that examples of gynocentric acts have existed throughout human history. The question is not whether an act occured but whether or not it was part of a more dominant culture of gynocentrism. The answer sought is not when a gynocentric act was recorded but when the gynocentric cultural complex (GCC) began, on which point there appear to be three main theories:

►Ancient Genesis
►Medieval Genesis
►Recent Genesis

At the moment all evidence favours a Medieval genesis, as there is simply not enough evidence for it in ancient culture beyond scattered examples of gynocentrism. In fact what we do know of classical civilizations appears to favour the reverse conclusion – that these were patently androcentric cultures that held sway globally until the 12th century European revolution.

AVFM News Week in Review Oct 17th – Oct 24th

Robert O'Hara · 25 October 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Whew, it gets better every week doesn't it! Another big big news week for AVFM readers.

Item: 20/20 fails to broadcast piece on AVFM.

After a highly criticized article written by two rookie ABC journalists was published, 20/20, decided not to broadcast the much anticipated episode featuring Paul Elam and A Voice for Men. The reasons for this are still a mystery but it is a clear indication that the mainstream media will be thinking twice about sloppy assumptions about the MHRM.

Item: Ms. Magazine declares that feminists won the last election for Obama.

And it appears that they may be right. According to them, the number of women identifying as feminists increased by nine percent since the last presidential election. Furthermore, it wasn't just women but feminists who decided the elections. From the Ms. Magazine blog:

> "Political pundits declared the day after the presidential election that women voters had decided the outcome in favor of reelecting Obama, but that was just part of the story. The polling, conducted by Lake Research Partners for Ms. magazine, the Feminist Majority Foundation and Communications Consortium Media Center (CCMC), documents the existence of a strong "Feminist Factor."
> We've long talked about the gender gap–the measurable difference between how men and women vote–but now, says Feminist Majority president and Ms. publisher Eleanor Smeal, "As we move forward after the elections of 2012, it's time to acknowledge that it wasn't just women who made a critical different in reelecting President Barack Obama, but feminists. It's time to add another metric beyond the gender gap to our post-election analysis: the Feminist Factor." We define that as the proportion of voters who self-identify as feminists across various demographics–race, age, religion, region of the country and more–and their subsequent voting behavior."

Item: Elle re-brands Feminism

The old school feminism that preaches "equal opportunity" and for the "sexes to unite" doesn't quite cut it for today's young women according to Elle, a popular woman's publication. So, in order to insure that feminism maintains it's popularity it is to be re-branded to satiate women's need to consume by employing advertizing agencies to make feminism seem cool, sleek and…well… more consumer driven.

Item: Plea bargain struck with sexually sadistic child molesting and torturing mother

In a horrific case of sadistic and incomprehensibly cruel child abuse perpetrated by a mother, a plea bargain has bee struck between prosecutors and Christine Gelineau of Concord CT. She was sentenced to nine to thirty years. The ABC article does not say when she is eligible for parole but it is assumed that it will be within the nine year period. Details of the abuse are featured in the article.

Item: Police shooting of mentally ill man prompts police probe

A 911 emergency response to an incident involving an argument between a mentally ill man and his mother over a picture results in a man's death. There was no provocation just a phone call alleging domestic abuse.

Item: UN launches anti misogyny campaign against search engines.

The United Nations, in a startling swipe of genius, exposes feminism on the internet by placing terms such as "women shouldn't" and "women can't" and comes up with misogynistic prompts in Google's search engine. Interestingly, when you type in "men shouldn't" or "men can't" you come up with similar results.

Item: Christian Adamek's father speaks out about his son's mental illness and the need to give more support to young adults who suffer from depression.

Many call for apologies to Principal Campbell.

Strictly directorial comment: We agree that more attention needs to be paid to adolescent and young adult mental health issues; most especially that of boys and young menn And no, we will not let up on Campbell.

Item: Patriarchy Party in Edmonton Alberta Canada declares victory! Even if they didn't win.

That's right! A man won so that is all that matters to patriarchy. Right?

By the way, are you looking for a petition to sign? Left/liberal stalwart MoveOn.org has a petition asking ABC 20/20 to end their gender bias against men. Is something in the air?

In His Own Words: Pretty Little Liar

Dr. Tara J. Palmatier · 26 October 2013 · Archived copy · Original

It's day 26 of Domestic Violence Awareness Month for Men and Boys, the invisible victims of domestic violence. "Kenneth" had an abusive, borderline personality disordered stepmom.

Children with an abusive parent(s) are essentially groomed to tolerate and accept abuse. They are often told that the abuse they experience is their fault. This can create the faulty belief system that it is their job to "fix" and protect their abuser. It may also foster the equally faulty belief that if only they "do everything right," their abuser will finally see what a good person they are and stop the abuse.

This a recipe for disastrous, abusive adult relationships. Today's In His Own Words is an example of this.

> Pretty Little Liar
> I just ended a 6-month on again/off again relationship with a woman who I think fits the description of Borderline Personality Disorder. A lying, manipulative, crying, sniveling, deceptive and, above all, self-righteous human being.
> First off, I am no saint, okay. Second, until recently, I always believed that woman could never set out to intentionally be selfish and abusive (probably comes from being raised by a physically abusive BPD stepmother and henpecked dad), so excuse me for looking like a dumb ass for not leaving this witch sooner.
> I met her through work and, by all accounts, it seemed like the most normal relationship I ever had. We went for walks in the park, had coffee together and spent hours on the phone talking about everything. We both had very rough childhoods and shared that with each other. She seemed to really struggle with forgiveness and letting go of the past. I found that disturbing.
> She had a lot of hatred towards her mother and all her past boyfriends seemed to be bastards. Everyone was out to get her and the world never gave her a fair shake. These were warning bells, but I ignored them because I thought we shared something deep and meaningful. And, hey, I'll admit it, THE SEX WAS THE BEST I EVER HAD.
> Then the lies started. One night, after she knew she had my affections (we'd gotten a little physical by this point — kissing, touching, etc.), she confessed that she was seeing her friend's boyfriend. She said it was just sexual, nothing else. She also said she wasn't going to end her relationship with him, so I ended our relationship. I should've told her to go to hell, but I was trying to be open-minded. Once she knew I was hitting the high road, she ended it with this guy and that's when things got fun.
> Turns out the affair was was more than just sex. He was in love with her. She lied to me every step of the way about this guy. Long story short, it was a drama-filled 2 months, with her blowing hot and cold. I got blamed for everything.
> It was my fault she had a $400 utility bill. It was 14 degrees centigrade in her house. I asked her to turn the thermostat up to at least 18, so I could sleep. I only stayed over 6 times that month. It was my fault she gained ten extra pounds. She said her eating habits changed when she was with me — what a load of shit. I mention these things because they are ridiculous, but there is much more.
> The first meltdown was lovely. She screamed and yelled that she didn't have time to comb her hair and it was my fault. I ended up grabbing her hands to make her stop as she was tearing her hair out in the car with a pick comb. The next day was my birthday. She called me and seemed to sincerely apologize.
> She invited me over to her place for dinner and said she bought me gifts. I said something innocent that set off her pathological jealousy. She went off the deep end again, screaming and yelling. She made outlandish paranoid accusations, accusing me of lying and infidelity, and threatened to break up with me. I was not ready for that.

> Worst birthday ever.
> We broke up. I changed my telephone number and my work shifts (we're both tech support) and did everything to avoid her. I got blamed for going through her purse and for hacking her computer. I was starting to get scared because this was nuts. I found out later that she even went to my manager and accused me of doing these things.
> Here is where I am a dumb ass. Two months later, she wrote me out of the blue and gave me the affirmation that I so desperately wanted and needed. She acknowledged everything I had done for her and that I made her feel so good when we were together.
> I cried. I called her. The next day, we're back in bed together.
> Two weeks later, she started making more paranoid rantings. She accused me of being a lying, cheating bastard again. I was not a bastard to her. Everything I did for her and the way I treated her while we were together proved I'm not a liar and I'm not a cheater. She is the one who had the history of lying and cheating, which put her in no place to stand in judgement of me.
> Then her cat died. Guess whose fault it was. Go ahead, guess. If you guessed it was my fault, you're right! She said I stepped on the cat and caused it internal damage. In reality, I accidentally stepped on the cat's foot. She twisted it in to something else and I swear she honestly believed her version of events.
> She was going to show me, so she got an autopsy done on the cat. Turns out the cat died of cancer.
>
> By that point, I'd had enough and I ended it. I can't fit in all the other craziness I experienced with this woman, but one question begs to be asked.
> What the hell is wrong with me?
> I know there is something wrong because I chose to be with this nut. I chose to allow myself to get close to her and that is something I have to deal with. I am going to make an appointment to see a therapist this week. If I don't fix this, I know with my abusive childhood I will likely end up with another nutter down the road.

The FreeThought Blogs sinking ship

Dean Esmay · 26 October 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Whether you're an atheist or not, I certainly hope you embrace the idea of rigorous skepticism, questioning authority and thinking for yourself, always remembering that the niggling sense of doubt you have that you may be wrong about something is the sign of a free mind. If you embrace those values then you almost certainly are pleased to see the cesspool of irrationality known as "FreeThought Blogs," (which, fair disclosure, has viciously and irrationally attacked AVfM many times, and has also personally attacked and misquoted me on non-men's related issues multiple times in the past, so I don't have a lot of sympathy for them) teetering on the edge of complete collapse.

Thunderf00t's latest video is, I make no bones about it, a source of great schedenfreude for me. When you've been viciously savagely lied about, quoted out of context, accused of believing things you don't, and more, it's pleasant to see others recognize that the bullies who did it to you are, indeed, irrational bullies who've done it to many others, and to see the bullies increasingly become a laughingstock.

I hope you will subscribe to Thunderf00t's channel and, if you do go there, keep your comments thoughtful, on this or any of the other issues he makes videos about.

Feminism: A hierarchy of entitlement

Diana Davison · 27 October 2013 · Archived copy · Original

In 1963 Betty Friedan started "second wave feminism" by identifying the woes of women as "The problem with no name." The reason it had no name is because it wasn't really a problem. Well, okay, it's a problem for people who don't have actual problems.

Twenty years earlier, Abraham Maslow developed his Hierarchy of Needs theory which provided a ranking system placing types of human development on a pyramidal scale. The base of the pyramid consists of survival or physiological needs which must be met before the next level, safety, can be sought and so on up through the progressive levels that follow; love/belonging, esteem, self-actualization, and self-transcendence at the apex.

Betty had a degree in psychology but it seems she missed the lectures on Maslow. Either that, or she was unable to grasp the concepts because he avoided "crippled, stunted, immature, and unhealthy specimens" like her when he chose subjects to construct his theory.

Here is a graphic of Maslow's hierarchy to explain what sorts of problems normal humans face.

This chart is not an escalator that only moves in one direction. A person might find themselves, as we do, thinking they have achieved love and belonging only to find themselves looking for food and shelter the next day… because their wife "left" them by making them move out, and filed for child support and alimony where possible.

A person might be about to realize their life's ambition then find themselves suddenly driven off the road in a random car accident, trapped in a car under water and struggling in the red zone. They might be about to get a promotion at work then suddenly find themselves in jail on a trumped up accusation of a felony just praying they can prove their innocence. Shit happens to all of us and we can only choose what path we take get back on the ladder. The chart is a handy way to assess where we are at and try to focus on reaching the next level up.

In The Feminine Mystique Betty Friedan's problem is that, after providing her with the first four levels in the pyramid, men hadn't given her the fifth.

Second wave feminism was kick-started on the premise that housewives who had safety, security, resources, family, health, sexual intimacy (if they wanted it), confidence in their bundt cake baking skills and interior decorating choices, and peer respect from the PTA committee, were horrendously lacking that top tier on the hierarchy of needs called "Self Actualization." Betty proposed this callous lack of concern for women's self-expression meant oppression from the evil patriarchy. She was incapable of concerning herself with the fact that most men function below her purple world because they are busy paving the way for her to sit back and worry about such fuckery.

The aching need for self-actualization, for that guru moment in which you come to terms with your own battle between ego and the world around you, of being recognized as a person of worth and significance in a world of meaning, of feeling capable of dealing with a spilled cappuccino that ruined your designer dress because when you tweeted it all your facebook friends simultaneously told you that you still look stunning in brown… doesn't mean you are oppressed. It means you're spoiled.

This is not to say I don't feel Betty's pain, it's just to say "fuck your pain, you narcissistic twat!"

And I'm not just talking to Betty, may she finally rest in peace.

Feminists, when entering a discussion or debate, need to look at the level of need their opponent might be addressing. For Friedan, she was bemoaning a lack of fulfilment while her husband was busy paying her bills. For Friedan, she was mourning the psychology degree that she didn't make use of while writing for most of the major women's magazines that existed at the time and pursuing her political goals under her maiden name.[1] While Betty's self-expression was used to decry her lack of self-expression she never stopped to ask what more her husband was getting out of his day. They got divorced.

So that's a summary of the fraud of Betty Friedan. But it doesn't mean that the women she purported to speak for were also living a wild, and wonderful life of free expression, it only explains that the woman credited with initiating the second wave of feminism was a complete cunt.

A lot of feminists feel the same way about Betty. One of the feminist criticisms of The Feminine Mystique is that it only dealt with the problems of middle class white women. It's true. That being said, they still use it as a staple text in Women's Studies. Choose your degrees carefully.

While regular people worry about banking fraud, global economic collapse, the military industrial complex, over population, and the privatization of prisons, feminists are campaigning to get Jane Austen on a ten pound British note, bikini models off page three of the newspaper, and worrying about how to re-brand feminism so more women will like them again.

A twitter trend called #solidarityisforwhitewomen opened up a potential dialogue with mainstream feminism recently that doesn't take the issue far enough. It's time for feminists to stop comparing just women's "problems" with other women's problems and start comparing them with the problems of men. The next hashtag should be #allfeministsareentitledbitches

While feminists declare sexism against women by men makes the female life miserable, studies show that sexism is subjective. It's only bad when it doesn't feed a woman's sense of entitlement. In a study called The Allure of Sexism: Psychological Entitlement Fosters Women's Endorsement of Benevolent Sexism Over Time, [2] it was found that women themselves are quite content to cultivate a narcissistic environment which treats women as superior and caters to their needs.

Betty Friedan set the bar for entitlement and third wave feminism has not sought to reconcile the disparity in the hierarchical need concerns of women vs men. Betty was right about one thing: there are a lot of bored housewives who didn't decide how to fix their own toilet, learn how to drywall the addition they want, or write a best selling romance novel based on all their repressed desires. It's indisputable that many women wish to have a fulfilling career but what women really want is to know that their career is optional. It's so much more fun when you choose to do something instead of doing it because you have to meet a need at the bottom of the triangle.

While some women are homeless, men make up 75-80% of that demographic. If you want to know which gender has a "problem with no name" ask which gender is killing themselves. That's a good indication of who is lower on the pyramid of needs. Answer: It's not women.

You can use Maslow's hierarchy to understand many arguments in life that pass your way and leave you thinking "what the fuck just happened?" In a personal relationship, check to make sure your partner is meeting you on the same level of need.

If you are asking how to pay the bills this month and your partner is more concerned with why s/he doesn't feel loved you've got a Maslow problem. If you are asking how you are going to drive to work without falling asleep at the wheel and your partner is complaining that s/he feels unappreciated, you've got a Maslow problem. If you're working every day at a job that is slowly killing your body, mind, and soul and your partner is complaining that they want a new sofa, you've got a Maslow problem.

I'm all for self-actualization. If you can do it: great. I'm happy for those that have the time and comfort to indulge their inner wish fulfilment. What I won't do is feel sorry for pansy ass feminists and fuel a system that funds their narcissistic agendas while the rest of us go about wearing the work boots that put them in a position to fret about the meaning of life.

The modern world seems doomed to pander to self-indulgent cretins but it doesn't have to be that way. There is a growing sense of social unrest and a lot of self-interest groups are busy pointing at each other. Oppression can continue for a long time but it runs afoul when those who support it have nothing left to lose by fighting. That's where the majority of men are at.

Tyranny requires the co-operation of the masses. Don't co-operate.

In His Own Words: Namaste Bitches

Dr. Tara J. Palmatier · 27 October 2013 · Archived copy · Original

It's day 27 of Domestic Violence Awareness Month for Men and Boys, the invisible victims of domestic violence. "Luke" thought he had met the love of his life — a mother of two, a writer and a yoga instructor. On the surface, she seemed to have it altogether. Then, on a once in a lifetime holiday to Asia, she went from Sun Salutation to Downward Facing Crazy Bitch.

> Namaste Bitches
> I met her in 2006 when I came to her yoga class. Yes, you read that correctly: she is a yoga teacher. Someone who is supposed to be an example of peace, serenity, and kindness.
> I'll never forget the day I met her. She seemed so kind, so put together, a breath of fresh air, a departure from the other women I'd dated. It felt so great at the beginning, so perfect that I'd happen across this person.
>
> Little did I know that I had just gotten on the biggest rollercoaster of my life.
> Things progressed relatively quickly. We went on trips together, made passionate love like there was nothing else in the world to do, everything was a joyous occasion. We spent so much time together.
> Two months in the relationship, she told me she loved me: looked deeply into my eyes after sex and said this.
> I had planned on taking a trip around the world by myself. I realized that I wanted her to come. I asked her if she'd accompany me.
>
> That was a huge mistake.
> The trip went as such: on a regular basis, she accused me of "not acting like a man" on a regular basis, for any arbitrary reason she could find. We would see other couples happily having meals and she'd get angry we weren't like them. We fought constantly and afterward she would be angry that I wouldn't approach her and initiate sex. It got to the point where we'd go to bed angry, she'd refuse my advances, and then be furious in the morning we hadn't made love (this became a major part of the relationship in the future).
> It got so bad I broke up with her. In a foreign country. I was miserable. She seemed miserable. I couldn't figure out why it wasn't working, but it certainly was not good for the either of us. She didn't want to go along with any of my plans, she constantly was belittling me and chiding me, and I felt that I was seeing her true colors – and it wasn't pretty.
> We agreed to be amicable the rest of the trip. It was agonizing. On a trip I'd waited years to go on, I was counting the days to my flight.
>
> At the airport, she broke up with me, with much finality. I welcomed this. We were getting on different flights to different places so I found myself nursing a beer in an airport bar wondering just what in the world had just taken place, half thankful for dodging a bullet, and half sad because I had liked her so much.
> I got off my flight a dozen hours later to countless emails from her. Apparently on the way back to the states she'd had an epiphany – and that epiphany was that we were actually meant to be together, and she admitted that she'd been out of line on the trip.
>
> I returned home soon after that, and things progressed. We got back together. Everything seemed to be going swimmingly.
> I really let some behaviors slide that, in retrospect, were absolutely asinine. She had a close relationship with a male friend that was completely inappropriate, and once we broke up and he shared his feelings of love with her. When we got back together (the breakup was a total of two days) she didn't sever or change this relationship. In fact, she kind of kept it on the back burner as a bargaining chip whenever things got messy with us "I feel like HIS love is unconditional, HE understands me, etc, etc"

I spent the majority of my time trying to patch up our relationship and figure out if it was something that was long-term, or just a really big mistake. I had fallen in love. I told her I loved her regularly. It was never enough. Nothing was ever enough. She would state exactly what she wanted and needed from me in reference to affection, attention, and support. But she wouldn't do the same with me, she stopped doing all the sweet and thoughtful things she'd done at the beginning of the relationship.

Jealousy became the theme of the entire relationship. Waitresses, friends, mutual acquaintances, women in general – they all were potential objects of my affection. I learned to not let my eye stray EVER when she told me that I had a "wandering eye", and was always ogling the opposite sex.

Then the writing started. She was a talented author and had a blog with a relatively considerable following. I was overjoyed for her at first that she was so successful in this realm, and then it got strange. Every time we got in a fight or she found something she disliked about me, it somehow made its way into her newest blog post. It seemed that she'd indirectly attack me publicly through this new means of leverage she'd gained. People couldn't believe what an awful, unsupportive, unloving boyfriend she had. They validated and supported her. I began to realize people who hadn't met me and followed her writing easily put two and two together (like I did): I was the subject of these writings.

I put my foot down. I asked her never to write about me. She feigned concern, told me that I was ridiculous for thinking that anything she ever published was even indirectly about me. Everyone I knew acknowledged it was, of course.

But the unfounded accusations continued. Anything I did, anyone I talked to, how I spent my time: they all were questioned.

I became perpetually shell-shocked. My family began to worry about me. They asked me to distance myself from her for my own sanity and safety.
Months later came the last straw for me. An entire weekend was spent with her talking about all the women she knew I'd cheated on her with in the past, all the lies she perceived I'd told, and how I hadn't done "what a man needed to do" to make her feel loved, feel beautiful, feel needed in the relationship.

What did I do? I should have just let go right then and there. I was so exhausted. But I so desperately wanted to make it work, it seemed like that woman I fell in love with was just around the corner, I just needed to prove myself. I asked her out to dinner. Maybe a date would help the situation.

It didn't. After she started drinking she began berating me again, this time with me starting to raise my voice, and her likewise, causing a scene in a restaurant we frequented. The night out ended in her screaming at me across a parking garage that I was "not a man".

I told her it was over, asked her to get out of my car as I dropped her off. She wouldn't get out. I was totally taken aback at this point, because she was totally unreasonable. At one point, a close friend had suggested I record her whenever she flew off the handle so I knew that it happened and didn't just ignore it anymore. I started the voice recorder on my phone.

She saw from a distance that I had my phone out. "Who are you texting?" she screamed. She promised to finally exit my car if I came inside and talked to her. Inside her house, I tried to leave several times since the argument grew more heated and she'd push me and force the door shut. "You aren't leaving" she'd say, physically blocking the door. I tried to leave over and over until she finally stole my phone, screen still lit, out of my pocket, and ran to the bathroom.

I beat her into the bathroom before she was able to get the door shut. But she started shoving me, hitting my chest, and pushing me out of the door – to the point where I was so taken aback she was able to get me out of the bathroom and the door locked.

There I stood outside her bathroom door as she perused my phone. As you can imagine, this was greeted with an extraordinary amount of screaming and name-calling.

> I absolutely lost it. As a man who has never been in a fight, hit any human nor animal, broken anything on purpose or damaged property – I kicked down the door.
> She was so startled by what happened that I was able to pry my phone out of her hands and sprint out of the house, get in my car, and leave.
> I called my parents, my brother, my sister, everyone, hysterical. I had never felt that way in my entire life.
>
> I started getting voicemails from her, ranging from "I love you, please come home" to "I called my ex and told him everything, he wants me to call the police and have you arrested".
> I tried to pay for the door and told her I never wanted to speak with her again. She varied wildly in our conversations after that, moving between saying that I had violated the sanctity of her home, and that I needed to get help, that I was "violent"….all the way to saying we needed to go to counseling, and there was hope for us yet.
> I shut down. I couldn't ride the rollercoaster anymore. I put in my month's notice at my apartment, packed my things, and left. In one of her past conversations she'd promised she'd never tell anyone about the night with the door, that was way too damaging to my character.
>
> As you can guess she wrote an article about it for everyone we knew to see. Anybody who knew her personally was able to identify who I was. She wrote about how I am an emotionally vacant man, someone who isn't able to provide anyone with a decent relationship. The article currently has tens of thousands of views, with dozens of comments validating how great of a person she is, and how much of a saint she was for putting up with this awful, abusive, violent excuse for a man.
> The prologue of this long-winded journey is this: trust your intuition. You really can identify these people immediately – not by the things they say or the way they act – rather, your reaction to them. If you find yourself constantly scrambling, defending your honor, trying to please them – all while they sit back and reap the benefits – YOU ARE IN AN ABUSIVE RELATIONSHIP.
> I wish I knew then what I knew now. I hope my saga helps someone.

Feminist archeologist accidentally destroys feminist theory of Patriarchy

August Løvenskiolds · 27 October 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Feminist Archeologist "HeatherN" bills herself as "Evil Feminazi from Space" and claims that she has "an MA in Archaeology from Durham University".

She recently blogged about Peter Wright's (Tawil's) post "Unraveling the myths of gynocentric culture", taking issue with the question "Did female-centered culture begin in the prehistoric era?"

HeatherN's specific objection was to the notion that "culture" can be used as a singular – according to her, There is no singular culture to which you can refer. To use that phrase glosses right over the fact that, even if multiple cultures today are female-centred, the history behind those norms will be different for each of them. Heck, even the feminist term "rape culture" falls into a bit of the same trouble and would probably be better phrased "rape cultures." But, I digress.

But HeatherN did more damage to feminism than just explicitly throwing the notion of "rape culture" under the bus – without realizing it, she fell into a cleverly set trap – she implicitly undermined her own feminist ideology that supports "Patriarchy Theory" as an article of ideological faith.

According to feminism – and I mean ALL of feminism, except for a tiny number of heretical ifeminists – the so-called "oppression" of women comes from the Patriarchy, the nutty conspiracy theory that says that human culture is dominated by men who privilege themselves at the expense of women.

Feminists claim "The Patriarchy" is systemic: Feminist theorists have expanded the definition of patriarchal society to describe a systemic bias against women.

Feminists claim "The Patriarchy" is universal: "Some societies are more patriarchal than others, but patriarchal social traditions are universal in human societies…"

Feminists claim "The Patriarchy" is crucial to feminism: "Patriarchy, despite its varying degrees of importance and attention has still been highly crucial in the development of a feminist analysis of society.'

Feminists claim "The Patriarchy" evolved from ancient times: "As mentioned before, the modern world today is evolved from a patriarchal society. We cannot pinpoint the origins of patriarchy as there are many ongoing debates regarding this issue. However, as JS Mill wrote, since "the very earliest twilight of human society", the patriarchal order was assumed as the natural order of society. But if we do have to place the earliest milestone in time, the Bronze Age (3500BC- 1100BC) in the Ancient Near East (in today's term, the Middle East) would be the starting point of patriarchy.

So, the Feminist notion of Patriarchy is kind of a Big Deal.

Unless you talk to HeatherN, of course: Prehistoric cultural norms are not direct [sic] antecedent to modern western culture(s). As I already explained, drawing a through line between past cultures and the modern day is reductionist.

Now, feminism is more than happy – they are insistent, in fact, on "drawing a through line between past cultures and the modern day" when they insist on the universal, ancient, ongoing nature of Patriarchy.

HeatherN concludes her post by upbraiding Peter to "educate yourself a bit about the subjects you are discussing."

HeatherN might want to educate herself on the basis of the idiotic feminist notion of "Patriarchy" before she erroneously calls herself a feminist in the future.

When I pointed out to her that her cultural theory undermined the myth of the patriarchy, HeatherN replied that "Actually, you'll find that most feminist thinkers will often talk about the shifts in gender norms throughout history."

Setting aside the fact that “feminist thinker” seems like an oxymoron, it would be interesting to know how said “thinkers” reconcile ancient, universal, ongoing and crucial Patriarchy to “shifts in gender norms” across the whole of history.

Since documentation of such shifts would wreck Patriarchy theory further, I’m guessing that HeatherN will be reluctant to provide them, since feminists like her have little regard for historical truth, and intense fears about what other feminists will do to them once their heresies become public knowledge.

Criminalizing the male gaze: giving female narcissists the upper hand

Janet Bloomfield (aka JudgyBitch) · 27 October 2013 · Archived copy · Original

The US cosmetics market is the biggest market in the world, worth an astonishing $55 billion in 2012, and forecasted to just keep on growing.

http://www.statista.com/topics/1008/cosmetics-industry/

If you eliminate all women under the age of 14, the female population in the US is around 124 million, suggesting that each and every woman in the US spends $443 per year on cosmetics.

http://www.census.gov/prod/cen2010/briefs/c2010br-03.pdf

Okay, men buy a few cosmetics, principally in the category of "skin care" products (which includes sunscreen), but jesus that is a lot of money.

I wonder why $50 billion dollars is being pocketed by the makers of lady face spackle and prettification? Why would women do that? Ask a feminist and she'll say PATRIARCHY OPPRESSION UNREASONABLE BEAUTY STANDARDS OBJECTIFICATION MISOGYNY, but ask a scientist, and you'll get a different answer.

"As women, we don't have the choice to engage with the beauty industrial complex: it's so ever-present in our lives that women who don't wear makeup are commonly taken as defining themselves against it. To not wear makeup, for many women, is to invite misunderstanding or, worse, judgment."

Oh, good heavens, no! Not judgement! Women are judged on their appearances? Appearances convey information about who you are and what you value?

http://jezebel.com/5972605/when-is-wearing-makeup-a-choice

Luckily, men escape that whole boondoggle, don't they? Ask the 75% of men who shave their faces every day about that one. Well, that's according to Glamor magazine. Curiously enough, I couldn't find an official government department that tracks men's shaving habits. That's very sad. Think of all the liberal arts graduates being denied citizen funded salaries and benefits! Won't someone please think of the liberal arts graduates?

http://www.statisticbrain.com/shaving-statistics/

Let's try asking a scientist why women are so enamored of cosmetics. According to two researchers at Gettysburg College, women use make-up for a very simple reason: it makes them look younger. And looking younger is something women care about, very much.

> Looking older or younger than one's age is associated with health and environmental factors such as body mass index (BMI), depression, marital status, and social class . Indeed, perceived facial age is a clinically useful biomarker of aging, and looking older than one's age is a sign of poor health, and mortality. Though poor health surely contributes to appearing old for one's age, there is evidence to suggest that appearance may also cause diminished health and psychological well-being, because of reduced social contact and social touching that results from having skin that no one "loves to touch", including the possessor. A person who appears older is perceived as more autonomous and dominant, which discourages touching. Though the benefits of touch increase with age, the opportunities to be touched decrease significantly.
> Maintaining a youthful appearance is of great importance for many people, perhaps because of the relationships between the appearance of age and health, and between the appearance of age and beauty. Many people are concerned with reducing the visual signs of aging, and this supports the existence of the multi-billion dollar cosmetic and cosmetic surgery industries.

It's super-cute that the researchers use the word "people", but a closer look at their experiment reveals that only women were digitally manipulated to test characteristics relevant to perception of age and beauty.

Experiment 1: 289 women

Experiment 2: 150 women

Experiment 3: 30 women

No men at all.

http://www.plosone.org/article/info%3Adoi%2F10.1371%2Fjournal.pone.0057985

Why do we care about this? I'm providing evidence for the argument that women spend, literally, billions of dollars every year in an effort to draw attention to their physical appearance. And from whom do they hope to garner this attention? To a certain extent, women use cosmetics and their appearances to compete with other women, in a strategy called mate-guarding. Women ward off more physically attractive rivals by enhancing their own attractiveness.

http://homepage.psy.utexas.edu/homepage/group/busslab/pdffiles/Human%20Mate%20Guarding.pdf

But for the most part, beauty serves as function to attract high status males. The key words being "high" and "status".

http://www.researchgate.net/publication/255692691_Mate_Preferences_Do_Predict_Attraction_and_Choices_in_the_Early_Stages_of_Mate_Selection

So what happens when the $443 dollars Princess spent on her face trying to attract a high status male backfires, and instead she attracts the attention of lower status men?

Hannah Price decided to photographically document those results in a series the media dubbed "My Harassers", but which Hannah herself calls "The City of Brotherly Love".

http://www.philly.com/philly/blogs/entertainment/Hannah-Price-photographs-cat-calling-on-the-streets-on-Philly.html

Before we take a more careful look at Hannah's photographs, I think we should at least give her credit for demonstrating a nuanced, rational account of what she was trying to do. Hannah does not consider the men she photographed to be "harassers". She admits that sometimes it was only a glance in her direction that prompted her to request a photograph.

Ambiguity might be one of this project's most prevalent themes. It's been mistakenly referred to as "My Harassers" on some blogs, which Price does not like. Her series doesn't take an aggressive stance on catcalling; it's not meant to incite social action, she says. Rather, it's an observation, a way to react behind the camera lens.

Hannah also discusses the conditions under which she would like to be approached by men.

> "The nonportraits are more of how I would like to be approached. I would like to be approached in a respectable manner, or I would definitely like to fall in love," she says. "The nonportraits are more sort of how I envision a romantic encounter. I don't know if catcalling is necessarily romantic, it's more of like an instant in a situation."

And the charges that Hannah is racist seem a bit premature, given that she explicitly selected subjects that intersected with her own identity.

> My background is I'm mixed-race. … I'm Mexican and black, and I grew up in white suburbia and so I've photographed stereotypes of the black race and the majority [of the recent work has been] mostly about men.

http://www.npr.org/blogs/codeswitch/2013/10/17/235413025/a-photographer-turns-her-lens-on-men-who-cat-call

No matter. The mainstream media picked up the story and ran with it. Brotherly love turned into menacing thugs.

Read through the comments, if you have the stomach for it, and you will hear men called every version of sleazebag, scumball, creep, pig, asshole – words specifically meant to deny/dismiss/deride sexual attention from low-status men. Sexual attention from high status men is still a welcome compliment.

Even Anna North, a regular contributor at Jezebel writes "I'd be lying if I said I'd never in my life been flattered by a catcall."

Sexism: acceptable when it works in your favor.

Let's talk for a moment about the concept of the "gaze". In feminist theory, which I had ample opportunity to study during my Barista of Arts days, arises from an observation Laura Mulvey made about certain Alfred Hitchcock films. Using a technique called shot/reverse shot, Hitchcock will show the man looking at something, reverse the shot to show that he is looking at a woman and presto voilà the man has objectified and controlled the woman with his gaze.

No, really. That is how the theory works. She then notes that when a woman does look first, she ends up dead.

In Alfred Hitchcock films, a lot of people end up dead.

You can take a look at Mulvey's Visual and Other Pleasures here, although I warn you, it's a typical piece of academic writing, dragging a sentence worth of ideas out to pages and pages of obfuscating, deliberately confusing nonsense

http://imlportfolio.usc.edu/ctcs505/mulveyVisualPleasureNarrativeCinema.pdf

To my knowledge, no one has ever exhaustively confirmed that when a shot/reverse shot shows the women looking, the women always end up dead, nor has anyone ever demonstrated that when the man is shown looking first, he is narratively powerful and controlling over anything, never mind the woman he looks at.

Of course, that would constitute actual research, and that's a no fly zone when it comes to feminist theories of knowledge. Facts are sexist anyway. Gravity: just another male theory that holds women down.

Feminists ran with the idea that the gaze has the power to control and that only men get to deploy it (despite any evidence). Women who look will be punished and therefore men control women by looking at them. Is it any wonder that some women actually claim they can be raped by a look?

Recap: women spend billions of dollars to get men to look at them; when men look at them it's either flattering or rape, depending on…. the status of the man.

Let's go back to Hannah Price. Hannah, who grew up in a white suburb, probably knows a thing or two about being looked at. Moving to Philly introduced her to something she had never encountered before: sexual attention from low-status men. Beginning with the assumption that regardless of their social status, these men were all still human beings, she decided to capture their humanity in a portrait.

It's kind of amusing, but kind of not, that so many feminist writers seemed completely astonished by the fact that men are, gasp, human beings! Even men they don't want to fuck!

> Price's photos remind us that these men are human. Their behavior is disgusting, their view of women is appalling, but they're not monsters. They are complex, confused humans.

http://www.thefrisky.com/2013-10-15/photographer-takes-portraits-of-men-moments-after-they-catcall-her-the-results-are-mesmerizing/

Oh, you need reminding, do you? Good to know what your basic assumptions are. Well, I suppose when you consider having (the wrong status) man look at you or talk to you "disgusting" and "appalling", a reminder is in order.

When Hannah approached the men in these photos, she did two things: she demonstrated that the gaze does have power and it depends not on the gender of either the wielder or the recipient, but rather on the status of both, and that women have agency and are actually capable of perceiving themselves as something other than victims.

Men who cat-call women on the street are playing out the script that women continue to insist upon: women draw attention to their appearances and highlight the features of their bodies that convey youth and fertility, and only object when the wrong man notices.

Status, of course, is relative, and there is no real way for any individual man to know if he meets any given woman's criteria. What he does know, invariably, is that he is expected to make the first move. Both men and women expect and prefer men to be the pursuer. Dr. Michael Mills at Loyola Marymount actually went ahead and got all patriarchal and conducted some empirical research into that phenomenon.

> A great majority of women, 93%, preferred to be asked out — only 6% preferred to do the asking. The majority of men preferred to do the asking, 83%, while 16% preferred to be asked out on a date. It is interesting that more men preferred to be asked out (16%) than there were women who preferred to do the asking (6%). That difference suggests that 10% of men may be waiting quite a while for a woman to ask them out on a first date.

http://www.psychologytoday.com/blog/the-how-and-why-sex-differences/201104/why-dont-women-ask-men-out-first-dates

Cat-calling a woman on the street is hardly an elegant approach, but it does fit the dominant cultural narrative: women get all pretty and wait for men to make the first move.

The idea that women are somehow harmed by attention from men requires two assumptions: that women, and only women, have the right to control the expression of sexuality, and that women are always, always victims. Hannah demonstrates that neither of those things are true. Her photos are an expression of her status, which is a result of how she interacts with her environment and the other humans in that environment, and not just something she gets to unilaterally declare. And they demonstrate that she can easily turn the tables and objectify men. If anything, a lot of these men look intensely vulnerable.

Indeed, there is a great deal of power in the "gaze". And despite the protestations to the contrary, organizations like Hollaback! are seeking to criminalize that gaze. But only one side of it. The male gaze. And not just any male. Low status men. The ones who happen to have brown skin are in for some amplified lady hate.

> The problem, among a great many here, is the FACT that despite whatever Ms. Roy [Deputy Director] does or does not believe or advocate, and despite whatever the powers-that-be at Hollaback! itself does or doesn't believe or advocate, taxpayer monies were indeed given to the organization to develop a smartphone app for > use in the City of New York, in Adria Richards vigilante fashion on largely Black and Brown lower class Men – full stop.

http://www.theurbanpolitico.com/2013/10/hollabacks-final-solution-open-letter.html

Because they're not marginalized and criminalized enough, right?

The issue of street harassment contains so many of the central contradictions of feminism. "Hey baby, looking good" is NOT harassment. The use of powerful words to describe "things I don't like" is endemic to feminism. "Rape" can now be used to describe how a man looks at a woman. "Domestic violence" can be invoked when a woman is being ignored.

Harassment

Rape

Violence

These words describe actions, and not feelings.

Women continue to expect all the benefits of so-called "benevolent" sexism, while accepting none of the downsides. They continue to demand all the privileges of the feminine, while refusing the costs. They accept all the rights, and reject all responsibilities.

Well, wake up, bitches. You can't have it both ways. If you are going to demand the right to shove your tits into push-up bras and unbutton your shirt to the waist and go sashaying down the street trying your best to attract high status men (however you define that), all the while expecting him to be the pursuer, then guess what?

You're gonna get some blowback. Some of it will come in the form of men mocking your efforts, and some will come from men who understand they are expected to initiate.

You know what you call a woman who thinks the entire fucking world should revolve around what she wants? Who thinks she is the star of her own universe? Who has a grandiose, inflated sense of her own self-worth? Who is convinced only her desires and her needs and her wants have any currency?

N A R C I S S I S T

There is a really easy way to deal with "street harassment" ladies. It will require you to consider the point of view of someone other than yourself. It will require you to envision the person talking to you as human. It will require you to envision a world in which what you want is NOT the governing principle. It will require you to acknowledge that other people exist and they have different motivations than you.

"HEY BABY, NICE TITS!"

What do you say? How do you respond?

Listen carefully. Two words. You can't go wrong.

T H A N K Y O U

You're welcome.

Lots of love,

In His Own Words: Just Another BPD Mom

Dr. Tara J. Palmatier · 28 October 2013 · Archived copy · Original

It's day 28 of Domestic Violence Awareness Month for Men and Boys, the invisible victims of domestic violence. Like many men featured in the In His Own Words series, "Jimbeaux" fell in love with and married a woman with Borderline Personality disorder.

She abused him and their son. She made false allegations. She tried to alienate their son from him. When the son was finally able to tell the judge that he wanted to live with his father and his reasons for doing so, BPD mom rejected the boy in retaliation and embarked upon a costly legal campaign undoubtedly fueled by borderline rage.

While Jimbeaux and his son were able to get away from their abuser, they paid a price. Jimbeaux is in debt thanks to a corrupt family court system that time and again enables and empowers malicious, abusive women bent on destruction. His son suffers the scars of having a BPD mom, as do most children left in the sole care of a BPD parent for any significant period of time.

> Just Another BPD Mom
> I have been following the In His Own Series and have also experienced similar problems and situations with my ex. A few years back, I learned about a mental disorder called Borderline Personality Disorder. My ex could have been the poster child for BPD.
> It was frightening, confusing, and eventually devastating to my life. I, too, lost almost everything… the house I paid for, custody of our son, friendships, my church fellowship, and so much of my income that I literally went tens of thousands of dollars in debt just to keep up with child support – while working full time, making good money, and living very frugally. In all the years my ex had custody, I remained calm (for the most part) and reasonable in discussions with her, even when she acted erratically and treated me with cruelty and disdain.
> She cancelled doctor's appointments for our son (including mental health counseling when he was angry, depressed, acting out, and failing school), threatened to have me thrown in jail, falsely accused me of physical abuse, and called friends and family in an attempt to convince them that I was pure evil.
>
> In her heart, she believed it – she truly believed that I made the devil look good in comparison. That's all part of the disorder (black and white thinking, or "splitting" someone). Fortunately, most of my friends and family knew me well enough to completely dismiss her accusations.
> Throughout this ordeal, I made our son a priority. I never missed a school event, sports practice, or ballgame. For years I went to his school once a week and read books to his class and ate lunch with him (until he reached high school, at which time he was embarrassed to be seen with me, as is typical for kids that age). I had extended weekends with him (Thursday after school until Monday morning) every other weekend, and only missed one weekend in 15 years.
> I was a stabilizing influence for our son, as was (and is) my current wife, whom I met seven years after the divorce. My son felt more comfortable at our house than at my ex's, and frequently said so. When things deteriorated at her house, including emotional and physical abuse, our son signed an election form indicating he wanted to live with us. This was after the police had to be called to her house on several occasions.
> My ex and I had been to court numerous times, almost once a year, as I was forced to enlist the court's aid in protecting my paternal rights and to enforce the various stipulations in our divorce papers. When our son told his mom he'd signed the form, her response was, "I'm not going to fight your dad over this. Go ahead and move out soon. I'll see you a couple of times a year at holidays. I'm moving away." Despite that declaration, she did fight me in court, saying such ludicrous things that the judge didn't hesitate to transfer custody to me (after having a private chat with our then 15-year old son).
> Once our son moved in, he immediately distanced himself from his mom. In the past 16 months, he's spent two > nights with her – and those didn't go well. He immediately began to improve, getting good grades and slowly letting go of his anger issues, his belief that he was a "fuck-up", and his depression lifted.

> He sees his mom occasionally, usually just for dinner, and even then many times things don't go well, as she attempts to lay a guilt complex on him or she begins to bad-mouth me. He won't tolerate either of those things and does not back down from her. He knows that I will always be there for him, he knows how much I love him, and he respects me as much as any 17-year old can respect his father.
> On the other hand, between the child support debt and the seemingly endless litigation, I'm horrendously in debt – well over $50k – and my financial future looks bleak. I have no retirement, no savings, and will soon be 55. I have no regrets about the course of action I had to take, but like many of the other men featured in the In His Own Words series, I now recognize that I ignored all the red flags I saw in our relationship, and I know that had I not married her, my life would be (financially at least) much better.
> Getting involved with her was the worst decision I ever made, and the second worse decision was not spending every dime to get full custody of him from the beginning. He's been damaged, I've been damaged, and even my current wife is suffering because of my bad decisions. I have many regrets I'm haunted by, but I take much solace in knowing that I showed my true character by fighting for our son and by doing everything I knew to do to be the best father I could be. It's a privilege to be his father – even though he drives me effing crazy with his 17-year old self-absorption and his habits around the house.

A “guilty pleasure”: Ignoring the feminist narrative

Robert St. Estephe · 28 October 2013 · Archived copy · Original

There’s something weird going on in cable-TV land. Something way, way off-script – in comparison to your standard “girl power”/”men are the source of all evil” TV fare.

Discovery ID is TV’s fastest-growing network. “ID” (as the network calls itself in short-hand) offers in their latest roster 37 shows, a mix of reality-TV and true-crime re-enactments which one reviewer uncharitably describes as “melodramatic, campy, and even cheesy.” Discovery, whose audience is mostly female, bills itself as “America’s favorite guilty pleasure” and in its programming guide calls its viewers, which at the moment number close to 800,000, by the cheeky denominator “ID Addicts.” In their line up, which includes shows such as “Pretty Bad Girls,” “Fatal Encounters,” “Wives With Knives,” “Frenemies: BFFs Gone Bad,” the second most popular offering – and among the top 30 in ad-sustained primetime shows – is Deadly Women, a re-enactment show featuring in each 30-minute weekly episode three woman-perpetuated homicide cases.

Deadly Women, with 273 cases in 91 episodes to date – a new one appearing each week and rebroadcast on a revolving basis – is racking up an impressive body count. 61 of these murderesses are serial killers, a category of female criminal still widely, and incorrectly, believed to be less common than the male counterpart. Yet there are, in fact, over 700 known female serial killers, according to our own independent research.

Deadly Women, along with other sensational ID offerings that splash lurid stories of predatory women across the screen, provides, in its idiosyncratic and not-quite-respectable way, a rare relief from the standard politically correct TV-narrative of “woman as perpetual victim” and “woman as empowered heroine.” As ID itself tells us: “Deadly Women fuses bone-chilling story-telling, sumptuous period drama and forensic fact in a bid to explore history’s most alluring female killers.”

Fact is, Deadly Women, in all its low-brow glory, is an oasis of non-feminist storytelling.

Does this sound like hyperbole?

Just take a look at Deadly Women’s Facebook page. It has more than 105,000 “likes.” On our recent visit to the page it showed avid real-time activity, with “2,918 talking about this.” Take a browse through the show’s promotional episode blurbs and you will find such blatant and unfashionable expressions of domestic violence as these nuggets:

- “Not every woman’s heart is filled with love and light. For these women, romance truly is dead, they possess ‘Dark Hearts.'”
- “Tonight’s Deadly Women think their desires matter more than lives.”
- “She was looking for trouble. She wanted to hurt someone.”
- “When a woman thinks her feelings are all that count, she doesn’t care who suffers. A new episode of Deadly Women tomorrow at 10/9c examines these heartless souls.”
- “Tonight’s Deadly Women are smart and cunning. These ladies think that they are ABOVE THE LAW!”

Now, these are not the sort of insights about the possibilities of female agency that those who make their living aggressively pushing “gender theory” on a passive public want us to be mulling over.

The network’s press office is not even a tiny bit shy about treating women as equal to men as potential evil-doers, as we see in their most recent press release issued July 19, 2013:

Femmes Fatales Return with a Vengeance on Season 7 of Investigation Discovery’s Hit Series “DEADLY WOMEN”

Hell hath no fury like a woman scorned, especially when she's on a mission to murder. There's no shortage of these tempestuous DEADLY WOMEN in season seven of Investigation Discovery's signature hit series about women who have been driven to kill, premiering Friday, July 19 at 10 PM E/P.

While male murderers are often motivated by anger, impulse, and destruction, women usually have more complex, long-term motives. Jealousy, revenge, desperation, and greed all play their devilish hand in driving these daughters, sisters, mothers, and wives to commit the ultimate sin. Former F.B.I. criminal profiler Candice DeLong helps viewers distinguish between the emotionally-charged impulses and sociopathic intentions that lace each story.

"Sociopathic intentions"? Now, is that appropriate language to use when describing some poor victim of patriarchy driven to lash out against the burdens of millennia of institutional oppression by wielding an antique Japanese sword and slashing her sleeping husband 97 times after smothering her two sons*?

You bet it is.

[image]

The show's hostess, the steely-eyed former FBI profiler Candice DeLong, pulls no punches in her pointed descriptions of womanly wantonness. This is a woman who has seen much and has no qualms about calling a predator a predator. Week after week Ms. DeLong serves up an impressive hard-boiled slam-down of the show's featured women-out-for-blood, never degrading her presentation of the over-the-top of the empowered women in question with any "gender theory" woman-as-victim-and-only-victim twaddle.

Sure, this is lurid tabloid true-crime fare, not the sort of thing that would appeal to the standard AVfM reader, but it is nevertheless worth a hard look. Nearly 800,000 viewers, mostly women, are eating up this outside-the-gender-studies-box stuff with both hands and demanding seconds. These watching women are just not buying the feminist sugar-and-spice propaganda pushed at them by the standard media sources. Not one bit.

These "ID Addicts" may not be approaching this material with a rigorous "cultural critique" mind-set, yet they are nevertheless profoundly aware of a gaping disconnect between reality and ideology (a false reality) that most people of a more intellectual cast delude themselves into embracing. Politically correct utopianists, convinced that they have the power to construct a superior future by means of their overbearing "planning" schemes, are terrified to face the fact that the message hawked everywhere (and at all times) in our culture – in our schools and in our media – by the gender ideologues, is a bold-faced bloody lie. It might sound bizarre, but the fact is that your typical "ID Addict" gal has her feet placed more formerly on the ground than any typical gender-theory-addled university professor from any English, or Sociology, or Gender Studies department.

Deadly Women's viewership is certainly going to grow – and there is certainly no shortage of cases of wanton woman-perpetrated violence to select from. There are more and more women (who, perhaps, shall be ridiculed by high-falutin' eggheads as tabloid addicts) that are saner, more credible witnesses to the reality of women's agency and responsibility for their own actions than a smugly politically correct population drunk on the Kool-Aid of official "gender" dogma. Perhaps a long sit-down in front of a run of Deadly Women episodes ought to be Step One in a 12-Step program for these Kool-Aid-on-the-brain ideology-lushes.

Homicide is far from the only way to destroy a life. Yet murder cases are among the best-documented varieties of anti-social incidents, thus homicide cases provide us with a window into the souls of those who lash out at others. Sociopaths do not always act directly; indeed, proxy violence – using others to do violence, the manipulating of courts to destroy others, the use of children to mentally torture a co-parent, the deployment of false allegations to destroy another – is an area of sociopathic behavior that finds favor with hate-filled females. This type of "relational aggression" is harder than direct aggression to identify, document and describe. So the more accessible stories of murderesses help us see the female sociopath mind-set in a more general way.

In such a "bad women project" as Discovery ID offers in Deadly Women – and so many other reality-based TV productions – you will find a great deal more accuracy with respect to the psychology of the relations between the sexes than you will find on such conformity-porn middle-brow organs of social engineering orthodoxy as The Good Men Project, a "respectable" publication that out-cheesies Deadly Women by a million miles. Deadly Women is worth a look-see and is most certainly worth further discussion within the likewise-growing Men's Human Rights Movement.

Discovery ID, a $11 billion Godzilla of a media empire, is on a rampage, stomping unceremoniously all over the sacred cows of the "gendered" landscape. And for this, if for nothing else, ID deserves a hearty top-of-the-lungs "Brava!"

Letter to Temple University administration

Jonathan Taylor · 28 October 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Summary: a student at Temple University was expelled and has his life in ruins over a false rape claim. After providing this brief backstory, the remainder of the submission is my "friendly" email to Temple University administrators. The primary purpose of this submission is to expose the names of those involved and highlight for the public how and why administrators like them do what they do.

Since this is a large university (26th largest in the US), they have many administrators who handle student affairs, making it hard to pinpoint which one worked with the Title IX Coordinator on this particular case. However, they only have one Title IX Coordinator (Sandra Foehl). Since she must oversee all accusations of sexual assault and is the overarching authority on gender equity compliance, we know she had a hand in this. That is why I call her out by name, and why we can nail her to the wall on this one.

Praise Martin-Oguike, who emigrated from Nigeria in 1999, was a student at Temple University. After being accused of sexual assault in 2012, he was expelled, stripped of his scholarship, kicked off the football team, and nationally vilified. In early October 2013 the charge was immediately dropped when the judge allowed the accuser's text messages to be entered as evidence.

ABC News characterizes it as a false accusation in their report at the beginning of this video:

This email is addressed to the following people at Temple University:

Board of Trustees
trustees@temple.edu

Dr. Neil Theobald – President president@temple.edu

Hai-Lung Dai – Provost
provost@temple.edu

Sandra Foehl – Title IX Coordinator
sfoehl@temple.edu, sandra.foehl@temple.edu

Stephanie Ives – Associate Vice President for Student Affairs/Dean of Students stephanie.ives@temple.edu

Andrea Caporale Seiss – Senior Associate Dean of Students andrea.caporale@temple.edu

Rachael Stark – Associate Dean of Students
rachael.stark@temple.edu

Rebekah Rhodes – Assistant Dean of Students
rebekah.rhodes@temple.edu

This is a letter I sent. You may want to think about sending your own letter. Thank you for your time and consideration. My submission is as follows:
Why did Sandra Foehl of Temple University, et al, destroy Praise Martin-Oguike?

This is primarily directed toward those who had a hand in the decision to expel Praise Martin-Oguike from Temple University – especially Title IX Coordinator Sandra Foehl, the overarching authority on gender equity compliance at Temple University and overseer of the university's adjudications of sexual assault accusations. It is also meant for those who sat idly by and thought that a system which produced such a result was anywhere near the embodiment of justice. Also, I figured some of you may find this interesting, so I emailed it to you for both your pleasure and mine.

My name is Jonathan Taylor. I am the founder of A Voice for Male Students, the motto of which is educational equity for men and boys. Part of its mission statement [1] is to raise awareness of the structural and cultural barriers men and boys – and in particular male students – face in receiving an equitable education, and to advocate the equal human rights of men and boys in academia. One of those human rights is due process.

What can at best be called the incompetence and ineptitude of your administration has been on display this week in the national media [2]. As you should know, the rape charges against Praise Martin-Oguike, the student who was accused of sexual assault last year at your university, who you expelled, who was kicked off the football team, who was stripped of his scholarship, and who was nationally demonized in the media, were dropped shortly after judge Denis Cohen allowed evidence from the accuser's phone to be submitted [3].

Although this proved to be damning evidence that immediately shattered the accuser's case, it has done very little to repair the wreckage of this young man's life. You will note that, according to ABC News, Praise Martin-Oguike is a native of Nigeria who emigrated to the United States with his parents in 1999 [4]. Perhaps his family brought him to this country under the assumption that doing so would open up wonderful new opportunities for him. They indeed opened up opportunities, but not the kind his parents wished for their son.

The public is increasingly acquainted with this travesty. Unfortunately, they are not yet fully acquainted with the names and faces of those responsible for it. I aim to remedy that. That is why I am posting this letter online for public exposure. So whenever someone Googles your administration or your names, they will know your work, whether it was your choice to wreck the life of this young man on such a flimsy accusation, or your choice to stand idly by and watch.

If you doubt me, Google Title IX Coordinator Michele Vieira of A&M-Commerce and see for yourself [5]. When I interviewed her last year about her university's decision to adopt the preponderance of evidence standard in adjudicating matters of sexual misconduct – the standard by which administrators need only be 50.01% sure that the accusation was true – I looked her in the eye and asked her if the policy was justified. After a long and heavy silence, she responded – unaware that she was being recorded – with the bureaucratic equivalent of "I can't answer that" [6].

That was the same standard of evidence by which you cast out Praise Martin-Oguike. I know this because the April 4, 2011 Dear Colleague letter from the Department of Education compels you to adopt this standard [7]. Not that it absolves you, of course.

I'm sure at this point the mental hamsters of your administrators – especially that of your Title IX Coordinator – are busy at the wheel, spinning out not reasons, but rationalizations as to why Temple U administrators are undeserving of such criticism. If nothing else, the public may expect the usual deflection of "I'm just doing my job," the same argument by which many have gone down on the wrong side of history.

We may also expect some of you to hide behind the most fraudulent statistics sexual assault statistics that are yet popular within certain academic circles, as if the supposedly high rates of sexual assault on college campuses lend justification to a due-process-be-damned approach to adjudicating sexual misconduct. In particular, we may expect the all-too-predictable claim cited in the Dear Colleague letter that "1 in 5 college women are raped," and which Russlynn Ali – former assistant secretary of the Department of Education's Office of Civil Rights – used to rationalize the preponderance standard within the letter itself.

We may also expect that, in hiding behind this statistic, you would neglect the fact that despite having ~19,000 female students [8], you have an average of 5 sexual assault accusations a year [9]. Even assuming all those reports are true and that only 1 in 10 are reported – both of which are generous assumptions at this point – it would still be the case that 1 in 380 students report the matter, an extremely far cry from 1 in 5.

We may also expect the dishonest and self-serving subterfuge that your policies are not truly discriminatory against male students because the wording of education policy does not single out men and boys per se, it only singles out and reduces the rights of those who are accused – 99% of whom just happen to be men and boys. You would, of course, forget that in so doing you would be using the similar reasoning as those who not too long ago claimed that they were not discriminating against blacks per se, but rather discriminating against those whose ancestors did not own land prior to the emancipation proclamation.

I have seen such rationalizations time and time again in a wide variety of areas. I archive these rationalizations and teach others how to identify them. While they vary endlessly, in the end they are all cosmetic variations varnished upon one simple message: fuck men and boys.

Message received. Admittedly, it took some of us a while. But we finally got the message.

As to those who were not central to the expulsion of Praise Martin-Oguike and merely stood on the sidelines, perhaps you think you are being treated unfairly by being included in this cloud of condemnation. Perhaps you think that while you sit and watch the enforcers of the politics of collective guilt – much of what gender politics in academia is premised upon nowadays – that you yourself should be spared the same methods of accountability by which you seem to be all too content to see them destroy the lives of your students.

I see things differently.

We will always have people who are happy to be the functionaries of injustice, and who are happy to roll the dice on this or that member of this or that group, whether it is against blacks, or gays, or men, and so forth. Even more so if it procures a crisp dollar, a comfy office, and a shiny nameplate. That does not change from age to age. What does change, however, is the degree to which everyone else accepts them within their midst, and accepts the system and the institutional culture which produces them.

According to various news sources, your university is refraining from publicly commenting on this case. In addition, Praise allegedly wants to return to Temple University and attend medical school. I have no idea if that will happen. But if it does, allow me to make a recommendation. If he returns there and faces an atmosphere of retaliatory harassment, bullying, and intimidation from the Temple community, you might try stepping outside normal education protocol for a brief punctuation of time by applying Title IX protections regarding retaliatory harassment to Praise, just as you would do without question and as a matter of course if he were a woman.

To be more specific, although the April 4, 2011 Dear Colleague letter from the Department of Education directs administrators to crack down on retaliation against accusers (that would be on page 5, for your convenience of reference), it says nothing about retaliation against those who are wrongly accused. So please just go ahead and assume that it was an “honest mistake” that they left that part out. You know, like all those other “honest mistakes” we have witnessed at Duke University [10], or at Hofstra University [11], and so forth, regarding how our academic institutions treat the wrongly accused.

As you no doubt realize, this is not a dialog. True dialog with the possibility of substantial change is impossible given that the continued employment of far too many in academia depends upon the exact opposite. No, the purpose of this email is to teach the world – including the next generation which will replace you – where the status quo is messing up, what needs to change, and in what spirit the public should address you for the present. It is also to show parents whose sons might one day consider going to Temple University exactly what kind of university Temple is.

And if you still think this email is in any way inappropriate or harsh, you may console yourself with the fact that you are not Praise Martin-Oguike.

Jonathan Taylor

Women in the Indian work force

Burt Phoenix · 28 October 2013 · Archived copy · Original

The working population in India is typically classified as 15-59 years age group. As a general philosophy every able bodied person is liable for their own upkeep and maintenance. Which implies every able bodied man and woman should ideally work and contribute to the society. This is to ensure there are no free riders and the economy prospers.

A very important element in the growth for the economy is the participation of women in the workforce. The Labour Force Participation Rate[i] for men and women in India, taking into account the principal activity status (ps) and subsidiary economic activity (ss) workers, is given below.

From the above table we see that Labour Force Participation Rate (LFPR) for women has reduced over the years as India is progressing towards development. Implying that more women choose to stay at home and not have an economic contribution.

One of the reasons extended for women not working is that they take care of the household which should be considered as an economic activity. As per the NSO survey[ii], women spend about 2.1 hours cooking food and about 1.1 hours cleaning the house and utensils daily. In essence, women put in a total of 3.3 hours a day working within the house as compared to around 11 hours put in by their counterparts (ie. men). Hence, this justification does not hold water.

Another reason cited is that women leave the work force because they need to take care of the children. The justification seems logical but is without merit as –

- Did women not have to take care of children in 2004? [see graph above] Were women not taking care of children earlier and therefore working and have recently realized over the past decade that they need to take care of children?
- The proportion of children to the total population of India has reduced in the past decade, implying that lesser women-hours are to be spent on taking care of children now as opposed to a decade ago. Therefore logically their participation in the labour force should have increased as opposed to decreasing.

As per the census of India[iii], the proportion of children in the age group 0-10 years has reduced from 26.5% in 2001 to 22.3% in 2011. This means that more women should now have free time as they do not have to take care of the children.

Another justification given for women going out of the work force is that they join the part time labour force. If we analyse the labour force taking into account the current weekly activity status[iv] (cws) of workers, even then number of women participants has reduced by 20%.

What could be the reason for this disturbing trend? Do feel free to share your thoughts on the same.

[iii] Census of India: 2011 and 2001

[iv] The current weekly activity status (cws) of a person is the activity status obtaining for a person during a reference period of 7 days preceding the date of survey. According to the CWS approach, a person is considered as a worker if he/she has performed any economic activity for at least 1 hour on any day of the reference week, and is obtained from the daily activities or in-activities performed in each day of the last seven days prior to the date of survey. Man gets beat with a belt by two women

This happened, reportedly, after he “got caught cheating.” Even if true–and we have no reason to believe it is–would it be relevant?

http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=7-JbQ35umAc

No, we do not think it would be relevant.

The woman laughing in the background is particularly gruesome isn’t it?

But remember kids, women aren’t violent, and misandry isn’t real.

The Ryersonian did a surprisingly good job, at least better-than-the-usual-piss-poor job, of covering the Men's Human Rights events in September of 2013. We thought you'd want to see it for yourself. These are the journalists of the future.

In His Own Words: FUBAR

Dr. Tara J. Palmatier · 29 October 2013 · Archived copy · Original

It's day 29 of Domestic Violence Awareness Month 2013 for men and boys, the invisible victims of domestic violence. "Christopher" is married to an abusive alcoholic woman whom he suspects has borderline personality disorder.

Christopher, my advice to you is stop trying to protect and help her, and focus on protecting and helping yourself instead. Otherwise, she is likely to drag you down with her. You are very fortunate that the police believed you this time. They may not believe you the next time and there is almost always a next time with this type of abusive personality. Seriously, if you have no minor children with her, it's time to GTFO.

> FUBAR
> I thought I could help an obviously troubled and deserving woman, but was blind to the difficulties my wife is presenting with her emotional life. I finally called the British Police who have been very helpful and have cautioned my wife about her violent behavior. I am leaving the relationship as I now realise I cannot help her with her probable BPD difficulties. Her preoccupations with issues of abuse and control are simply fear inducing.
> Since our marriage, there have been a series of bizarre, impulsive and aggressive acts by "J" that have increasingly alarmed and concerned me. J has punched in the face for no reason when she is drunk. She also engages in other impulsive and aggressive behaviour. She called the police to accuse me of domestic violence in May 2012 only to retract it and admit I had done nothing upon their arrival.
> In September 2012, J attacked me whilst was sleeping at 3am on a Sunday night before work. I was awakened by blows to my head, and J painfully grabbing and squeezing my testicles. This assault came completely out of the blue. J was drunk at the time, having stayed up drinking 3 bottles of wine that evening.
> J pinned me against a shop front whilst I tried to walk her home early one Saturday evening. She punched me 7 times in the face and would not come home. She has also punched and kicked me in the street on other occasions when she is drunk and does not want to return home.
> There have been various verbally abusive incidents over the years and threats to call the police to have me evicted or to change the locks and never let me back in the house. She has told many people, including our close friends, that she has the " bruises" to prove she's married to me. She has refused to answer requests regarding why she would say such spiteful untruths to my friends and our mutual friends who like both of us.
> J has committed other sundry disturbing behaviours. She has asked to be taken to the train station in the middle of the night when we stay in hotels, actually packing her bags and going to the hotel foyer. She has suddenly run out of restaurants for no discernible reason. She has thrown friends out of our house on the coldest night of the year, necessitating they find other accommodations.
> On June 6th 2013, we were to meet for a quick after work drink. After she was 20 minutes late, I rang her phone. She did not answer. I went to look for her and found her standing in the street kissing another man and being held by him. She was very drunk and wide-eyed. She claimed he was a long lost friend and that he had been away for a couple of years.
> She later admitted this was a lie. She had been drinking in a local pub. He picked her up on the street and suggested they go drinking. She followed him. This was at 3pm in the afternoon on a work day. She became abusive to me, drunkenly told me it was ok, he had a family and they had not had sex. I left and drove home.
> Once home, I became very panicked when it crossed my mind that this may not be the effects of alcohol, but a possible date rape drug. I went back and found her in the town centre with the same man standing by a bus stop. She became abusive again and then started to walk home. At home, she carried on drinking — refusing to talk about it and being very abusive.

She blamed the event on me, accusing me of being controlling and emotionally abusive. I caught her later that night having an extended conversation with him. She has subsequently changed the lock on her phone. She will not discuss the situation.

About 3 weeks prior, I noticed a change in her mood at home. I seemed to be filling notable silences with support and quips. I became more and more conscious of having to be there for her. She lost an ability to be affectionate and was noticeably quiet and withdrawn. She looked depressed and torn over some issue. She was made redundant in January by a major bank, but was about to begin a new care job she had always wanted.

Previously, I discovered a significant clinical history of physical, sexual and emotional abuse, including an unreported rape by an older man when she was 22. Her relationship with her mother is torturous and ambivalent. She has a history of using alcohol. She was drinking an average of 5 large glasses of wine every day, until I requested that she stop when I became alarmed by her subsequent aggressive mood swings.

After 4 or 5 glasses of wine, she undergoes a change and rages, runs off, lashes out and refuses to move, refuses to come home and commits physical assaults. It can take up to 12 hours for her mood to swing back again to that of a normal, calm and reasoned person. She never talks about these incidents, but rather talks over me when I try to have a reasonable discussion about them after they occur. She will not go to see a doctor with me. I am blamed for everything all the time.

I have become increasingly affected by her behaviour since the man in the street incident. I feel dumbfounded and very alone. She is now saying our marriage is over, and being very cruel about it. Requests by me to talk are met with sadistic, cold responses.

On 2nd September 2013, I was cooking when J appeared in the doorway carrying a pizza. She was drunk and immediately became verbally abusive and physical by using her body to push me into the work spaces whilst telling me I was ” horrible” and that she hated me. She told me I was fat, ugly, bald and useless. She pinched the fat on my stomach whilst repeating her words.

She is quite forceful and strong when in a state of animation and very intent to make it a physical and and verbal episode. I am very careful at these times to remain clam and deadpan, trying to say as little as possible and gently steer her away with validating statements.

After her assault in the kitchen, I walked into the front room to eat using a tray. J followed and tried to push the tray on to the sofa. I steadied the tray to protect the food and avoid a mess. J then sat on my thighs and pinned me down on the sofa with her body weight. She proceeded to spit abuse at me in a very angry and alarming fashion.

She kept saying I was fat, bald, ugly and useless. She said she used to love me, but I had let her down, was just like all the other men and that she hated me. She was very animated and had a red countenance. Her face was contorted and her eyes looked crazed. Her pupils were wide, probably from the alcohol, but she was really very frightening to behold.

I got up and took the plate to try to eat on the other sofa. She hit the plate and it fell on the ground. She pushed me back on the sofa and sat on my thighs again, screaming at me to pick up the plate. She picked up the fallen food of sausages and red sauce and started smearing it across my face whilst continuing to taunt me about being fat and ugly, simultaneously pinching my stomach.

The food went into my mouth, up my nose and over my shirt. She got up and shouted at me to pick up the remnants of the plate. I was really quite scared about J’s behaviour and demeanour. She then pinned me on the other sofa and started to taunt me sexually, saying in a strange, sing-song tone that she knew I wanted her, really wanted her, but could not have her and, indeed, would never have her again even if she wanted me. At this point I could no longer deny that J has profound mental health issues. This was the most alarming and disturbing incident I have experienced with J thus far.

> I believed I was in the middle of a psychotic episode and feared for my safety. I was finally able to remove myself from her and went to the bedroom. J presented with a very aggressive and alarming state of mind. She followed me to the stairs and continued to taunt me, stating, “Who shall I call tonight? The police or social services? They always believe the woman!”
> By this time, I was more afraid of J than the police. I told her I wanted the police in the house immediately. I was very scared by her actions. She ignored my request to call the police.
> Then, one of my step daughter’s’ s friends unexpectedly came to the house to pick up a bag she left there a few nights before. J was surprised, looked at her and said, “Look at him” and motioned to me as if nothing was wrong. I told her her I was very alarmed and was going to call the police. The girl got her bag and left. J had her finger poised over the police button and said she would call and tell them all about me.
> I called her bluff and told her to call. She called the police and started talking to someone. I said I needed to speak to them as I wanted them here immediately for my safety. She would not let me speak to them and hung up. I told her the police would come any way as the phone number would be traced to our house and they are duty bound to attend.
> I then took the phone, rang the police back and asked, as a matter of urgency, that they attend us as I was very alarmed and had been advised by the Colchester mental health team to call the police should J’s behaviour ever scare or worry me. I told the police I feared for my safety.
> I related the evening’s events to a PC and told them a little of our previous history. I also told them I believe that J is suffering form borderline personality disorder and that her alcohol use is only part of the real problem. They asked if I wanted J arrested that night, but I declined as I truly believe the best way forward is for J to have a clinical diagnosis and treatment for BPD.

I hope not pressing charges doesn’t end up costing Christopher his freedom or his life. Just because a person has BPD doesn’t mean they should be exempt from facing consequences for their criminal behavior. Fellas, if she commits a crime, do your level best to have her arrested. She can get “treatment” after she’s released from jail. You are not, I repeat NOT, helping a BPD or any abusive asshole, by protecting them from the natural consequences of their behavior. All you are doing is enabling them to abuse you some more. What’s more, BPDs often bite the hands that help them. If you have the option to have them arrested, check your chivalry and do it!

Our so-called "Rape Culture"

Dr. Tara J. Palmatier · 29 October 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Editor's Note: US News & World Report has recently published a story revealing what Men's Human Rights Advocates have known for a long time: there is no epidemic of rape of women in the United States. In light of a mainstream news publication having the audacity to state the simple facts on such an important matter, and to help illustrate just how damaging rape hysteria has become, we thought we'd republish this classic by Dr. Tara Palmatier. Ladies, if you believe we live in a "rape culture" that targets women, you're being abused by people who want to scare you in order to line their own pockets. Don't fall for it, and stop letting the men in your life be abused by this lie. –DE

The following article includes unpublished excerpts from my interview with HuffingtonPost columnist Vicki Larson for her article, Are Men Society's Scapegoats?

Ms Larson's article was published soon after Nafissatou Diallo was found to be an uncredible witness regarding the rape allegations she made against Dominique Strauss-Kahn. The New York DA has since dismissed the charges against DSK.

Ms Larson asked: Women often live in fear of men. They're stronger than us, they can hurt us, they can rape us. Some say we live in a "rape culture." Is our fear unfounded? Why or why not?

According to Wikipedia:

> Rape culture is a term which originated in women's studies and feminist theory, describing a culture in which rape and sexual violence against women are common and in which prevalent attitudes, norms, practices, and media condone, normalize, excuse, or tolerate sexual violence against women. Examples of behaviors commonly associated with rape culture include victim blaming, sexual objectification and rape-apologism.

While I do not read every news item nor do I watch every talking head on cable news, I honestly cannot remember ever hearing anyone excuse a man for raping a woman in my lifetime. Ever. Not in the United States. Not once. Not ever.

Our culture portrays rape as one of the most heinous crimes that can be perpetrated against women and girls by men and boys.

Meanwhile, no one ever discusses adult male rape victims who, believe it or not, do exist and in far greater numbers than female rape victims, well, that is unless they're telling a prison rape joke. When a teen-aged boy is raped by an adult woman, for example, by a trusted female teacher, many people shrug it off and act as if the teen-aged male victim just won the statutory rape-molestation lottery.

The reality is that more men are raped every year in jail than women in the general population, which is a statistic you won't see mentioned in any Slut Walk or Take Back the Night literature. The number of U.S. female rape victims is approximately 240,000. Approximately 300,000 male inmates are raped each year in the U.S. We don't know how many men and boys are raped in the general population. However, if you combine that number with the 300,000, male rape victims far exceed the number of female victims.

http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=rdxu23EG-a4

YouTube Direkt

By the way, the male victim in the above video is handicapped, not that the crime would've been in way excusable if the boy had no disabilities. No expulsion for the girls, though, since they didn't violate the boy on school property. No juvie hall for the girls either, which is where they ought to be.

Imagine what would happen if three teen-aged boys did the same thing to an 11-year old disabled girl.

No one laughs at acts of domestic violence against women and girls in media and television, well, not if they want to keep their jobs.

Yet, commercial after commercial, talk show after talk show and sitcom after sitcom portray men and boys as objects of cultural ridicule. Violence against men in television and film is a common punchline.

When's the last time a man who murdered his wife or children had his crimes reasoned away and excused by Gloria Allred because he was abused as a child or because he suffered domestic violence? Men are rarely let go with a slap on the wrist and the oh so severe "consequence" of counseling. (Seriously, counseling is not a consequence!)

What's more, when a woman is proven to have made false rape or abuse allegations, our culture is ever quick to make excuses and protect her. And what about the man whose life she destroyed with her lies? Up until very recently, news outlets wouldn't even disclose the names of false accusers in order to protect the false accusers.

Aren't we supposed to protect the victims of crime and not the perpetrators of crime? The true victim of a false allegation is the falsely accused, not the lying accuser nor theoretical potential future rape victims per the old feminist chestnut, "If we punish false accusers of rape, it will discourage actual rape victims from coming forward." No, it will discourage false reports of rape you half-wits. Enough with the backwards logic already.

It's more accurate to say that we live in a culture in which violence against men and boys is common and in which prevalent attitudes, norms, practices, and media condone, normalize, excuse, or tolerate all forms of violence against men and boys. Examples of behaviors commonly associated with rape culture include victim blaming, sexual objectification and rape-apologism and false rape allegation-apologism.

In reality, men have far more reason to fear women in our culture than women have to fear men.

All a woman has to do is say, "I'm afraid," provide zero evidence other than her feelings, and she can obtain an ex parte restraining order that forces a man out of his home and his children's lives. Young men on college campuses who are accused of sexual assault have lost the right to due process and legal representation in the collegiate equivalent of star chambers, in which they can be found guilty and expelled from school with a "preponderance of evidence" (certainty of 50.01% that the accused is guilty) instead of "beyond a reasonable doubt" (98% certainty) or "a clear and convincing" standard (80% certainty). Family court are notoriously biased against men and fathers in favor of women. The Violence Against Women Act protects female victims of domestic violence, but not male victims. And these are just a few examples.

On a personal level, I don't live in fear of men. Do you?

I don't quake in fear of the guy in cargo shorts, a Polo shirt and Havaianas behind me in the supermarket check-out line. I'm fearful if I'm in a strange part of town by myself at night, but not because I'm afraid of men. I'm afraid of criminals, some of whom happen to be men.

I don't want to live in fear of 50% of the world's population. It's irrational, it's paranoid and it's unhealthy.

The pervasive fear of men in our culture is unfounded; in fact, it's an absurd hysteria that's a by-product of calculated political theater and feminism, which has become an ideology of hate. Unfortunately, there are certain groups that profit from perpetuating the fear of all things male, so it persists.

Many men are physically bigger and stronger than the average woman, but physical strength and body size have nothing to do with abuse. This is a myth perpetuated by the Domestic Violence and female sexual grievance industries . . . and Dr Phil.

Many men are abused and assaulted by smaller women. These men don't hit back — even in self-defense.

There are some women who feel free to slap, kick, push, punch and scratch men and hit them with objects because they know the man they're attacking won't hit them back. Most men have been taught from a very early age that it's not okay to hit women and girls no matter what — even when they're under physical assault by a woman.

"Don't hit girls" is a message that has been drummed into our society for a few decades now. Where is the equivalent message for girls about not hitting boys? Tween shows like iCarly use their male characters as punchlines and punching bags for their female characters. Imagine a children's TV show that featured a boy hitting a girl followed by the applause and guffaws of a laugh track. There would be tremendous public outrage from moms. Where's the outrage for boys who are hit and ridiculed?

Predators prey on those they perceive as weak. Predators are distributed equally among the sexes, if not the prison populations. Male predators go to jail; female predators go to counseling.

In this respect, female predators have an advantage over male predators. Sociopathic predators of both sexes are highly treatment resistant, so why do we send female predators to community counseling and male predators to the state penitentiary? Why?

Because when it comes to gender equality in our culture, we live on a one-way street paved with double standards.

Men have the ability to hurt women. Women have the ability to hurt men. Neither sex has a monopoly on the ability to hurt others. Some of the worst emotional beatings I've experienced were at the hands of other women. Almost all of the workplace bullying I've experienced in academia and the mental health field, was perpetrated by other women. This is just one of feminism's dirty secrets.

Research shows that women excel in relational and psychological aggression. In fact, women engage in psychological aggression more than men (Muñoz-Rivas, et al, 2007) and their use of physical aggression is nearly equal to men (Parity, 2010). A 2000 meta-analysis found that women are slightly more likely to commit physical aggression while men are slightly more likely to injure their partner overall (Archer, 2000). Two-thirds to three-quarters of aggression in relationships is bi-directional (i.e., both partners are aggressors).

However, in the minority of relationships with one-sided aggression, women are two times more likely to be the aggressor (Straus & Ramirez, 2007). Severe physical abuse of women in marriage and dating has decreased significantly since the 1970s, but severe abuse of men in marriage and dating has held steady or increased (Straus, 1995; Hampton, et al., 1989; Mallory, et al., 2003). Furthermore, two studies found that women attributed their male partners' physical aggression to self-defense (Follingstad, 1991; Sommer, 1994).

As a society, it's time to accept the fact that both men and women are equally capable of hurting each other. I don't want to be seen as a victim because I'm a woman. I'm sick and tired of the way certain groups portray women as victims. I want equal rights; not special rights.

Women can and do hurt and rape men and boys. Just click on any one of the following names:

Sylvette Barretto, Ashley Jo Beach, Tracy Conley, Stephanie Draper, Amy Ellsworth, Michelle Francoeur, Eraelia Glisson, Georgiana Helmboldt, Abby Kramer, Adrienne Laflamme, Michelle McAdams, Naomi Perez, Elizabeth Raedeke, Angelic Roberts, Carrie Shafer, Leisa Ward, Melanie Yusko, and Heather Zeo.

Women can be just as violent as men: Brianna Broitzman, Theresa Craig, Nicole Doucet, Agnieszka F, Susan Falls, Sherry Fleming, Senobia Flemister, Kathleen Folbigg, Vicki Gillig, Chytoria Graham, Erika Gutierrez, Quantasa House, Melissa Huckaby, Katherine Knight, Ashton Larson, Deborah Littler-Parsons, Aset Magomadova, Stephanie McMullen, Carmen Montenegro, Pamela Rowley, Sarena Sherrard, Dallas Smith, Johanna Vera, and Sharron Watson.

Should we live in fear of women as an entire sex?

Women have the unthinkable power of destroying a man's life by simply pointing a finger at him and crying, "Rape!" Men have no such power over women. If a man claimed a woman raped him, he'd be laughed out of many a police station.

These women made false allegations: Temitope Adenugba, Jacqueline Barkley, Emma Blunden, Faye Branighan, Jade Brooks, Leoni Campbell, Vanna Chief Eagle aka Vanna Fast Wolf, Katherine M. Clifton, Louise Creighton, Andrea Davio-Michaud, Christina Dallison, Helen Dalby, Jennifer Day, Jessica De La Vega, Tracee Deane, Danielle Deichman, Liselle Ellis, Chloe Dolton, Melinda Denham, Roseanne England, Cheryl Fleming, Felisha Hardison, Kay Hoofe, Kirstie Hodgson, Sarah-Jane Hiliard, Sarah Hunter, Leyla Ibrahim, Louise Johnson, Heidi Jones, Rebecca Knight, Bernadett Kore, Amanda Lang, Michaela Lodge, Amanda Little, Aisha Mather, Samantha Merry, Tamara Moonier, Samantha Morley, Amanda Moyes, Louise Ndikum, Danmell Ndonye, Eloise O'Donovan, Hannah Patenall, Biurny Peguero, Jessica Perry, Victoria Salter, Deanna Taulbee, Emma Wallace, Elizabeth Wilkinson, and Kate Woodhead.

If not for evidence, the innocent men these women falsely accused would have spent years in jail and been labeled sex offenders for the rest of their lives and for what? Because a young woman failed out of college and claimed she was raped, so her parents wouldn't be angry with her? Because a woman was upset a man didn't call her after a one-night stand? Because a woman cheated on her husband and called it rape, so her husband wouldn't divorce her?

Ladies, how would you feel if your sons were falsely accused of rape? Would you want the woman who tried to take away your son's life to go to counseling or would you want her to go to jail for her crime?

I don't live in fear of men. I live in fear of violent criminals and pathological liars of both sexes. Although, I can certainly understand why many men live in fear of women. It's justified.

If we live in a rape culture, it's one in which violence against men and boys is normalized and excused, and not the other way round.

Robert St. Estephe–Gonzo Historian–is dedicated to uncovering the forgotten past of marginalizing men. "Gonzo journalism" is characterized as tending "to favor style over fact to achieve accuracy." Yet history – especially "social history" – is written by ideologues who distort and bury facts in order to achieve an agenda. "Gonzo" writing is seen as unorthodox and surprising. Yet, in the 21st century subjectivity, distortion and outright lying in non-fiction writing is the norm. Fraud is the new orthodoxy. Consequently, integrity is the new "transgressive."

Retired Army Major founded his organization in 1960 as Divorce Racket Busters in California. When, in 1961, the organization was incorporated in California the name was changed to U. S. Divorce Reform, Inc. Kidd's organization was similar to earlier efforts such as American Alimony Payers Protective Association and Alimony Club of Illinois, both founded in 1927, and many others that sprang up in intervening years, but U. S. Divorce Reform, Inc. was the most successful of any that came before.

Kidd and other activists, including the second wives of divorced men, naively believed the passing of no-fault divorce laws would result in better outcomes for divorcing men and their children. They invested great energy advocating the reforms they expected to reduce incivility and broken child-father relationships. It would not be many years before the evidence proved otherwise. In fact, the tactic of false accusations of child abouse and domestic violence served to replace the excised "fault" standard, thus introducing even more complicated, costly and emotionally devastating scenarios for many "divorced children" and divorcing men.

FULL TEXT (Article 1 of 6): New York – The "Divorce Racket Busters" are after me – and I'm not even divorced.

They're after every man that's got a wife and want to warn him of the doom they claim is awaiting him.

They're trying to free husbands from alimony slavery. Especially in California. Where, they claim, it's scandalous.

They've got headquarters on Citrus Heights, Calif., and Reuben P. Kidd writes that "We need to impress upon all ‘happily married men’ that their freedom is in jeopardy and is entirely dependent upon the whims of their wives.”

They’re circulating a cartoon titled “The Alimony Joy Ride” which shows the ex-wife, her lawyer and the judge celebrating her divorce, with the poor husband pushing the car in which all three having their joy ride.

“Don’t be a pushover,” says the cartoon. They then want to change the California laws.

I’d like to show this to my wife – but I’m afraid to.

FULL TEXT (Article 2 of 6): Sacramento, Calif.— Former Army Maj. Reuben Kidd who survived four years of military combat and came home to face a divorce action, has opened a nationwide attack on alimony, community property and women’s right to custody of the children.

He says he is encouraged by “at least 1,000”’ sympathizers in California and “hundreds” elsewhere in the nation, and adds be has begun the initial mailing of membership applications for his new organization.

It is called United States Divorce Reform, Inc. (USDR), and was chartered Nov. 20, 1961, by the California secretary of state.

Kidd contends that divorce laws in many states encourage marital breakups by making them easy, if not downright profitable for women. He is not opposed to divorce, but he favors enforcing “responsibility” on the female partner.

USDR was conceived early last year in a Sacramento attorney’s office. There, Kidd learned that his wife’s divorce action would enrich her by $22,500, or half his total wealth.

He started modestly with letters to the editors of local newspapers, and said he gradually found supporters in California, Nevada. Michigan, Wisconsin, New York, New Jersey, Massachusetts and the Panama Canal Zone.

Kidd said most supporters are men like himself who believe themselves victimized, by a divorce settlement, but he said “many, many” women had written to him.

Kidd said that USDR would seek changes in current law with the usual political tools: letter writing, lobbying, financial support for sympathetic candidates. Basically, Kidd wants:

—Community property laws that give each partner the property that he or she brought to the marriage.

—Eventual abolition of alimony.

—Recognition of a father’s equal right to custody of the children, based on the father’s equal ability to use modern child care services.

DIVORCE REFORM

EXCERPT (Article 3 of 6): Alimony payers are collectors of injustice stories. They seem to derive some black enjoyment from tales of legal maltreatment. Reuben Kidd, for instance, a big dark-haired man with a vague resemblance to Robert Ryan, begins his bitter narrative by mentioning he was awarded a medal for combat heroism for World War II. “I fought for freedom,” he says. “Freedom for almost all Americans, including my wife – but not including me.”

Kidd consulted a lawyer when his childless marriage began to break up. Listen, said the lawyer, “whatever you do, don’t bring the money question to court. California courts will murder you. Negotiate a private settlement with your wife beforehand. Whatever she asks for, take my word, it’ll be less than a court would award her.”

Kidd’s wife asked for, and got, a substantial share of Kidd’s property. What seems to have stabbed Kidd most deeply is the fact that his settlement included some Army pay he had saved during the war, before marriage. “One of the things we were fighting for in that war,” he notes gloomily, “was the right to own property – freedom from legal confiscation.” Reuben Kidd came out of this experience howling mad and promptly organized U.S.D.R.

FULL TEXT (Article 4 of 6): (Charleston, W. Va.) – Mrs. Henry Christy of Camden Drive is fighting for men’s rights “against women who are making a racket out of divorce and lawyers who are getting benefit out of this racket.”

An assistant director of the East Coast Woman’s Division for U. S. Divorce Reform, Inc. Mrs. Christy spends a good deal of time studying the problem of divorced people and writing and speaking on their behalf.

“There is no equal justice for a man at all the way today’s laws are written. Just because the law says the man is in the wrong or the wife says so doesn’t make it so. There are always two sides to every story and one can be as bad as the other,” Mrs. Christy said.

Of course, there are times when men aren’t any good at all but laws are ridiculous when they allow a woman to take everything.

“Why should a man pay a penalty for the rest of his life because he has made one mistake? Why should an innocent second family starve because of a grasping ex-wife?

~ RIGHTS AREN'T RIGHT ~

"Why should a man support children he is not allowed to see? Visitation rights aren't upheld, especially in Kanawah County. A father can't be a father to a child if he doesn't see it." Mrs. Christy continued with fire in his eyes.

Just because a mother is a mother and a woman doesn't mean she is a good parent and it's not necessarily right for her to have the children. A father can pay a babysitter just as well as a mother can.

"I don't say men are always right, but I do say decisions should be made on facts in the case and not because she is a woman and he is a man.

~ NEED FAMILY CENTER ~

Mrs. Christy believes, along with the organization which she represents that "The biggest need in divorce reforms is a family center to which a couple may go when they are faced with the possibility of divorce. The center should have specialists in human relations, psychologists, social workers and clergymen of the couple's faith. The board would take time to investigate and see if the marriage is workable. Ample time should be taken for consideration. Many demanding divorces are angry and upset and say, 'I'll just get a divorce! Rather than say 'Let's try to work things out.'"

Mrs. Christy is the daughter of the late H. B. Sheets, a city fireman for 23 years. She likes mixing with people and reading books about children and child psychology.

Her husband works for DuPont's Belle plant and loves to fly planes. She met him when he asked her son, Roy, if he would like to take a plane ride. Roy and their own son, Scottie, share Dad's enthusiasm about flight. Mother's an earthling.

When Mrs. Christy ran for the legislature, Mrs. Christy campaigned right along with him. "We lost this time but we'll try again," she said.

Mrs. Christy has been active in the fight for divorce reform for about three years and a director since the women's division was organized in January, 1964.

She answers mail from people with problems from at least 13 states, Pakistan and Canada.

"Not all people who have joined the fight have divorce problems," she said. "Many who work with us are happily married and interested in preserving the American home."

FULL TEXT (Article 5 of 6): San Francisco – Divorce American style, described by its opponents as "trial by combat" and "lawyers' blackmail," would go out the window under a proposed amendment to the California State Constitution.

Court actions with their personal battles, high law fees and headline publicity would be replaced by decisions of a state department of family relations run by six elected directors.

Backers of the proposal announced Thursday a drive to get the required 468,259 signatures by April 12 to qualify for a June 7 ballot.

The amendment is sponsored by United States Divorce Reform, inc., an organization with chapters in 43 states, Australia, Germany and West Pakistan. Many of its leaders are losers in state divorce courts.

G. J. Winterfield, 50, California director of the reform group, told a news conference that California was chosen as the pilot state because “it leads the civilized world in divorce.”

“We have got to stop this slaughter of our homes if we are to survive as a nation,” said Winterfield, a doctor of chiropractic medicine and divorced father of four children.”

“We are destroying homes to get rid of relatively minor problems.”

Under the proposed amendment the Department of Family Relations would have exclusive jurisdiction, subject to appellate court review, over divorce, annulment and separate maintenance proceedings.

PHOTO CAPTION: COURT PICKETS – Lee Blincoe, left, national director of American Marriage and Divorce Reform Inc., and Paul D. Mitchell, U. S. Divorce Reform Inc., picket Pasadena Superior Court to call attention to organizations' efforts to reform divorce laws.

FULL TEXT: (Article 6 of 6): Pasadena – A nation-wide movement to reform divorce laws gained impetus over the weekend with picketing at the Pasadena and Pomona Superior courts.

Pickets from American Marriage and Divorce Reform and U. S. Divorce Reform, Inc., demonstrated in two cities and throughout California while representatives of similar organizations protested in 20 other states.

Paul D. Mitchell of Eagle Rock, a member of the USDR, and Lee Blincoe of Chatsworth, a national director of AMDR, carried signs here critical of divorce practices.

~ Attorneys Target ~

Chief target of the groups is attorneys, Blincoe said. He charged that the lawyers' fees are greater when divorce cases go to court.

He urged that marital problems be handled through a family relations counselor, with the parties required to cooperate for a certain period of time.

“If this fails then the divorce proceedings should be carried out similar to a small claims matter in which the issue is settled with the judge and the principals taking part, without attorneys,” Blincoe said.

“And in all divorce matters,” he continued, “the welfare of the children should be given first consideration.”

The organizations urge also that an hour-a-week course in creating a happy marriage should be required in grades seven through twelve.

Blincoe denied a frequent charge of a “sour grapes” attitude toward marriage by members of the organizations. While many have been through divorces, it is far behind them and few if any would gain from changes in divorce laws, he declared.

For a detailed history of Reuben Kidd’s history, see: Dads America, “Founding Fathers”

Gone with Jaclyn's wind

Diana Davison · 30 October 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Preamble: In the midst of the stirring tornado of ABC's pending 20/20 article on A Voice For Men, Paul Elam, and the Men's Human Rights Movement (MHRM), feminist Jaclyn Friedman, who was also interviewed by the ABC show, blew in on the coat tails of a Daily Beast article to weigh in on the subject of how she has been digesting events.

In Jaclyn's habitat, there is a foul and ominous odour beneath the sheets. Since, according to her, the MHRM are all dogs, it is easiest just to blame the stench on them.

There are many canards in the coal mine of Jaclyn's article about the MHRM that quite quickly die of gas. She starts by declaring that "the rise of men's rights activists is hurting women – and men." The next trouser trumpet is her insistence that the MHRM is an attack of men against women, and she finishes with a melodramatic avowal to "make a peaceful human chain to blunt [our] hate and counter it with love."

Above all else, Jaclyn emotes that the most "particularly insidious" thing the MHRM does is what she calls a "canny co-optation of social justice lingo." Yes, there are scary men out there who are… gasp… using words! And, according to her, they've stolen these words from women.

Jaclyn's difficulty in accepting that men are permitted to use a dictionary is meant to cause us concern. The MHRM's terrifying ability to use words effectively even caused The Daily Beast to "[paint us] as a legitimate movement." Oh, the horrors.

Jaclyn claims that the MHRM is hurting men because men in "real" need of help will be distracted by sites like A Voice for Men and google will somehow suddenly stop functioning normally. It would take an intellectual and philosophical behemoth cursed with a tragic deficiency of internet skills to reach this conclusion honestly. Jaclyn is none of the above.

In a stunning act of mental gymnastics, Jaclyn manages to admit that Men's Human Rights Advocates (MHRAs) have a long list of grievances which "deserve a thoughtful response and the force of an organized movement to address them" acknowledging that the internet has provided a public square for MHRAs which functions as a "combination of locker room, group therapy, and organizing" while simultaneously maintaining that the MHRM is disorganized and not a legitimate movement. She notes that "there has been a worrying uptick in offline activity" while insisting that the movement isn't actually doing any real activism. Jaclyn must find the postering campaigns disturbing because we use such "insidious" words. She'd likely faint on the spot if we put words on sign boards and actually marched down the street with them. Only terrorists do such violent things.

Jaclyn, and many others, claim that the MHRM is trying to silence women.

The best way to reinforce this lie is to silence the women in the MHRM. ABC and Jaclyn dutifully play their part in that ruse by insisting on calling the movement "the manosphere." A producer from the 20/20 program was offered the chance to talk to four female MHRAs on a conference call and refused to engage with any of us so that they could retain the show title "Women Battle Online Anti-Women Hate From the 'Manosphere'"

In Jaclyn's article, she provides many links (via donotlink.com) but intentionally omits both a link to what was written about her on AVfM and the fact that it was written by a woman. Puff! and I'm gone with Jaclyn's wind.

I feel so silenced.

Since Jaclyn chose to mention the article I wrote about her but not provide a link so people could verify her summary I'm going to address each of her concerns in this reply.

The article was called "Jaclyn Friedman: clit as big as the world" and it was based on a lecture she gave called "How feminist digital activism is like the clitoris" When I tried to point out to her on twitter that I wasn't calling her a clit, I was quoting her own analogy used to describe herself and her friends, she blocked me so that she wouldn't have to own her responsibility. Silenced again!

Jaclyn claims I called her "a bad feminist (for criticizing Naomi Wolf)". How silly. I think all feminists are bad so if I'd said she was being a bad feminist badly it would be a compliment. What I actually said was that "Jaclyn's seminar about the clitoris tries to explain why the resulting attack on Wolf is both hilarious and a result of not understand how the clit works." I thanked her for the information.

Jaclyn says I accused her of "demonizing male sexuality". Well, this is true. What I more specifically said was that "Friedman wants to brand male sexuality as evil" and should have provided a link to Jaclyn's Prospect article "Toxic Masculinity". I think that's a fairly accurate summary of her words.

Jaclyn complains I "[suggested] that [her] bisexuality means [she hasn't] slept with enough men to have a valid opinion about them." I didn't just suggest it, I gave a link to where she tells us that herself. Her attempt to make it sound like I, a bisexual woman, am judging her sexual choices is patently ridiculous. I'm merely stating the facts as she provided them for us.

It's also interesting how Friedman whines that "Pick Up Artists are perfectly plain that all they care about is using women for sex" because Friedman's article, "My sluthood, myself", clearly shows that her involvement with men has been on the exact same level. Jaclyn is a female Pick Up Artist who defends her actions passionately claiming "it's a choice we should all have access to because it has the potential to be liberating. Healing. Soul-fulfilling."

Jaclyn purports that I called her "fat and ugly." What I actually did was to post a picture of her next to Andrea Dworkin remarking on how much they look alike. That Jaclyn finds Andrea Dworkin fat and ugly is a very unkind thing for her to say. Even I wouldn't do such a thing.

I also didn't say that Jaclyn is "a miserable slut", I said "she eagerly announced herself a slut and begged women to support sluttiness and become slutty themselves whilst explaining how unhappy she is with her own life as a result." That, again, is a pretty accurate summary of the article Jaclyn wrote for Feministe. It seems that Jaclyn isn't upset with the article, she's upset with reality.

She concludes her complaint about my article by mentioning some comments left by AVfM users suggesting that someone stand up at a lecture and say some words within the proximity of her hearing range. Jaclyn tells us "threats like this shake me almost physically." The words that have her so terrified? "I think a dude raping you is the least of your fucking problems." Apparently Jaclyn is even frightened by men who state clearly that they don't want to rape her.

Jaclyn's main focus in life is her belief in "rape culture" and the idea that rape is worse than murder. I'd pause to feel sorry for Jaclyn's delusion but we just don't have the time. Jaclyn's problem (among the myriad other obvious issues) is that she doesn't understand the level of violence that men face on a daily basis because she lives in a gynocentric world which supports her perspective: a woman's pain is more important than a man's.

While Jaclyn is crying "rapey, rapey, rape, rape!" all over the internet and television, men are voicing their concerns about "death, dead, not breathing anymore!" and she's upset that anyone is listening to them.

We've heard her argument many times before. Her feminism is "fixing it." Jaclyn claims that the Violence Against Women Act (VAWA) reduced domestic violence incidents by 64% and that the reduction "is distributed evenly between male and female victims." The fact is that men are incarcerated more often in domestic violence (DV) cases because the Gender Paradigm and the Duluth Model require that men be assumed guilty in domestic violence situations–yet this legal reality somehow leads her to believe that such anti-male policies reduced DV crimes against men. It didn't. It only turned male victims into wrongly-labelled perpetrators.

Male victims have been taken off the grid and are no longer represented in any gathering of statistics. Feminists have shown that their idea of "fixing" men's problems is by erasing them from the equation. The MHRM is putting men back into the picture and we plan on using many more words to do it.

Jaclyn ends her drama with a decree – She declares that feminists should show "love" towards MHRAs by “continuing to work to improve the lives of both men and women”. This is what happens when people are invested in their own perspective: They turn into raving lunatics.

We don’t want your kind of love, Jaclyn. As Rhett Butler said, “You’re so brutal to those who love you, Scarlett. You take their love and hold it over their heads like a whip.” The MHRM is done with feminist gaslighting. Our scary words are coming soon to a signboard near you, Jaclyn. She can complain, feign emotional distress, faint, and stomp her feet all she wants, but this movie always ends the same:

“Frankly, my dear, I don’t give a damn.”

WCCO Radio Minneapolis: Hell just froze over

AVfM Video Source · 30 October 2013 · Archived copy · Original

There are first times for everything. Some of us in the MHRM suspect that is just urban legend; an overblown myth that we disprove in the course of our daily lives as activists. As it turns out, however, it is true. There is indeed a first time for everything.

The truism now includes fairness from the mainstream media.

Today I was interviewed by Chad Hartman on his WCCO Radio show in Minneapolis, Minnesota. As you will hear in this interview. Hartman did a great job of remaining impartial. He asked incisive, pointed questions, but did not in the least sound like he had been swallowing criticism of this site and this movement ala The Daily Beast's Tod Kelly. It actually felt like I was being interviewed instead of interrogated. – PE

In His Own Words: Reflections at the end of an abusive marriage

Dr. Tara J. Palmatier · 30 October 2013 · Archived copy · Original

It's day 30 of Domestic Violence Awareness Month for Men and Boys, the invisible victims of domestic violence. "TI85″ reflects upon his marriage, his behavior and his soon-to-be ex's behavior as he begins the divorce process. He experienced several kinds of abuse while married, including gaslighting, emotional abuse, physical abuse, jealousy, rage, passive aggression, blame shifting and others.

> Self-Reflections at the End of an Abusive Marriage
> I am getting divorced. Looking back on my marriage, I wonder are there warning signs we can observe? Are we capable of observing them?
> My marriage was more work than I ever thought it would be, and I can't tell if I should have seen this coming. Before we were married, she was uniformly cheerful and happy. After we were married, her cheerfulness waned — at least at home. At work or otherwise in public, she maintained the same outward happiness that originally attracted me to her. But when we would get home, it was apparent that she was bottling some frustrations. Our time alone was characterized by emotional meltdowns, usually over things that would otherwise be completely insignificant.
> In my weariness from observing her put on a happy face for the outside world and then consuming most of our private time lamenting things (or expressing ugly anger towards people), I once asked her, "Why are you crying about that?" I asked this in what could rightfully be characterized in a not-so-supportive way.
> Ever since, there has been a lot of anger thrown in my direction, all about little stuff, incessant nagging and infrequent sex (not none, but can-count-on-one-hand-in-a-year). This would lead to fights, something she "never thought would happen in her marriage." My behavior would revert to the worst aspects of my personality — including the yelling and name-calling that I grew up with. When we discussed that anger (alone or in counseling), from her perspective, mine was simply wrong and must stop, but hers was justified because she had lost trust in me.
> Over the years, I have noticed the following things about my wife:
> 1. The need for praise. My wife has LOTS of friends. None of whom she sees on a daily or even weekly basis or live anywhere near us. They all love her . . . for that time they spent together in college (more than 15 years ago). She is a prosecuting attorney who focuses on victim-crimes, and she is very good at her job. She loves to repeat stories of the praise heaped upon her by judges, colleagues, opponents, supervisors, etc. She is very, very nice to people and has carefully cultivated her personality so that even causal acquaintances are fascinated by her and drawn to her.
> That said, in the confines of our home, she was absolutely vicious in her criticism of certain people. Her grudges against people are deep and the things she will say about these people (only to me, I think) were rather disturbing. She hates. I didn't see this until we had been married for a couple of years. I'm personally pessimistic about things, but in a practical way. I don't actually hate anyone, not even my wife. Imagining holding on to the kind of hate I saw my wife display privately was very upsetting to me.
> There is a small group of people who criticized my wife after witnessing small glimpses of her bad behavior. She either let these people go as friends (including people who she were very good friends with for more than 10 years), or suffered them at family holidays (because they are my relatives). There is a third group of people who have seen her bad behavior, too. These people are her immediate family.
> They don't discuss any of this with her. Her mother exhibits the same behavior, as does her grandmother. The bad behaviors are discussed in hushed voices and acknowledged with askance glances, but nobody actually approaches any of these three about their behavior. Strangely, my wife will be critical of her mother's behavior, her mother critical of the grandmother's behavior, the grandmother of my wife's behavior, etc. But nobody ever addresses the person acting badly. Ever. It's like they are afraid.

2. Correlating her job and my alleged responsibility for her emotional well-being. I've heard my wife complain that she can't understand why I argued with her at home, for example, about how I was not cleaning something "the right way," because I told her that I admire and support her career choices. It made no sense to me or anyone else I've asked, but it apparently made sense to her.

3. She is always right. After years of experience, all I can say is, yes, she actually believes this. I'm firmly in the camp that this makes her somewhat unbalanced. They were right in kindergarten — nobody's perfect. Don't believe anyone who tells you otherwise.

Therapists suggested she needs to believe that she is always right because it's a coping mechanism for some unknown early childhood trauma. That may be true. But my wife was not the least bit curious about digging through the alleged defense mechanism to get to the trauma at her soft gooey center. So I was married to the defense mechanism who thinks that she's right all the time. So, really,it became a question for me about whether I was ever going to married to the person I thought was my wife, rather than this alleged defense mechanism. Like I said, I'm getting divorced.

4. Good time cycles. I went to counseling (marriage and individual), grew my backbone back, and started voicing my opinion about my own wants. It quickly became a simple numbers game. The frequency of our minor disagreements about things like which movie to see increased, and since I was not automatically capitulating, friction increased. The Good Times quickly dropped to zero.

5. Transactional. My soon-to-be ex viewed our relationship in a very transactional way. She also frequently mentioned how, as she was growing up, she intentionally copied her father's skill at salesmanship, and how she combined that skill set with a careful and conscious adherence to her mother's advice to "always kill them with kindness."

It all sounds so harmless on the front end, at least to people like me. And, if one was going to be killed, what better way than by kindness?

But then you get to the back end — the place in a marriage where, on whatever small issue, neither person is going to get the precise outcome he or she wants. I had been told that these are the places for compromise. I had been raised to see that one person expresses a desire and the other acquiesces as he disassociates himself from whatever independent desire he may have held. Of course, I wasn't around for the early years of my parents' marriage, the years when friction may have occurred, the years before the pattern was set. I also failed to fully appreciate that my in-laws' relationship was, from my perspective, vicious. Not overtly, but passively. Being around them remains one of the most uncomfortable feelings I have experienced.

So, in my own marriage, my wife and I mapped out our first areas of compromise by my wife expressing her preference for things, and me agreeing to it. I learned my role so well that, in those early days, I always thought each little thing wouldn't be a big deal. I always assumed that, eventually, there would be some reciprocity. I would want something, and she would agree even though she didn't necessarily agree.

But that didn't happen.

It took a couple of years for me to recognize that my marital happiness was within my control, just as long as I could choke down my disagreement with a multitude of little, petty things. Everything would be fine if I expressed agreement to her desires, even if I did not agree. Nothing was fine if I expressed disagreement.

During those early years together, I was only intuiting the problem with this arrangement, and then I was acting out on that feeling. In those instances where I expressed my disagreement, it was typically met with passive aggression, and we would begin to argue and fight. In those arguments, we would each run through our full arsenals of persuasive techniques. Hers is a variety of passive-aggressive techniques that eventually evolves into a cross-examination against the transcript she prepares, in real-time, in her mind. I would engage in that for a while, but I would always end up shouting, which is how we resolved things in my household growing up.

We would exhaust each other, both figuratively and literally. Hostilities would cease when I submitted to her wishes about whatever inane, pedestrian thing it was that we were arguing about in the first place. For years, I defined the end of our arguments as the point when I would offer an apology, always for my shouting — that was the thing she (rightly) took issue with. But, now, I suspect that my thinking was incorrect.

She never offered her own apologies, nor would she reciprocate after I offered mine. She also never accepted any of my apologies. Rather, her approach was to claim the need for time to process her feelings. Now that things are over, I can also say that she never let me know when that process concluded. Honestly, and even though it is a strong word — never. It seems to me that, for her, reconciliation was not a factor. My apologies meant nothing. I doubt that she even heard them.

In my experience, my wife can control herself, but only when she wants to. Her desire for self-control seems to exist only as a means to an end; that is, if she wants something. And, in that regard, part of controlling herself included letting herself loose on me at appropriate times. She only seems to lose complete control at the moment when it becomes clear that her sales pitch is not going to get her what she wants. Then it's just all-out war.

Throughout all of this, she is not even negotiating. She is selling. Compromise is just not in her vocabulary.

6. Rage when she doesn't get her way. Towards the end, I stopped shouting. This, amazingly, seemed to cause her to shout. I pointed this out, but she had an argument for that,"You taught me how to do it." The first time she did that, I told her it was wonderful that she had only recently picked up the habit — because that meant she should be able to kick it in no time at all. After all, I was raised to be a shouter, and with just 6-8 months of work I had gotten it under control. I thought that was the end of her shouting. It was for that evening.

But it wasn't the end of her shouting.

The second time I heard her tell me that I taught her to shout, I just stopped arguing with her. About everything. If I disagreed with something she wanted, I told her so. When she started in with whatever fighting technique she wanted to employ, I just calmly insisted that we needed to find a compromise. This invariably pushed her alarm button, and the raised voice and shouting would begin. When that happened, I calmly told her that we could discuss it when she could stop shouting, or being rude, or calling names (or all of the above). This invariably pushed her nuclear button. Then I would walk away. This invariably pushed her global-thermonuclear-war button.

For a while, I was confused about how doing what I was asked to do (stop shouting) could make things worse. I focused on the behavior, and quickly found that (a) I gained a better understanding of her objection to being shouted at; and (b) I won't put up with that crap. So it only took a couple of months for me to ask for a divorce.

7. Blame shifting and abdication of personal responsibility. It wasn't until very recently — and in no small part because of the Shrink4Men website — that I noticed in our arguments in the waning days of our marriage, we never came to an agreement on the things we were disagreeing about. Or, to state it more precisely in terms of our original relationship dynamic, I didn't cave.

That's when things started to get really bizarre. I recall her mentioning at one point, with a small degree of self-awareness, that I needed to understand that I had established a pattern of acquiescing to her wishes, and therefore shared in the responsibility for her emotional outbursts now that I was changing the dynamic. Again, she had a chastened tone when she said this. But she still said it, and she stood by it.

She followed it up with a comment about how, when we were starting out, she had told me that she had trust issues (she did tell me that, and it was obvious), and that she didn't really trust me (she actually told me the opposite of that). Recently, she equated my request for a divorce with "[my] evasion of the consequences of my deplorable behavior." In other words, she has decided that I am solely responsible for the unworkable state of our marriage, and therefore I am honor bound to refrain from asking for a divorce. This all seems nuts to me, but I digress.

8. Jealousy. I was regularly accused of having affairs with co-workers. This could not have been further from the truth. She freely admitted that her accusations were baseless, and were prompted by her own irrational jealousy. I asked her to stop. She shifted to making jokes about it. I told her they weren't funny, and asked her to stop. She did not stop. We would fight about this. I eventually decided that I don't need to put up with this.

9. Gaslighting. My wife has pushed me and punched me. Not often, but it has happened. I was never in any physical danger — she is smaller than me, and my head was cooler than hers when she was doing this.

But here's the thing that is odd — she denied that these things ever happened. She is very emphatic in her denials. If I ever brought up these events (either in private or in counseling), her reaction was uniformly one of two things: (a) overly sarcastic and condescending ridicule, "Come on . . . you KNOW that's not what happened!"; or (b) violent shouting, "I would never! And I can't believe I'm married to someone who would accuse me of that!"

What is even stranger is that, normally, she presents a very calm, even, cheerful demeanor to the outside world. I have come to recognize this as a protective mechanism she has developed to keep others at a sufficiently safe distance and simultaneously give them reason to praise her, which is something she very much enjoys, and seems to need. However, she was incapable of doing anything but acting in an obviously rude manner or simply flying off the handle when I brought this up.

Oh, and I only brought it up to the counselor, and then by expressing my sincere concern that this type of behavior was dangerous — notwithstanding my statement above about not being in any serious physical danger, what if I did react? I was scared to death of possibly facing a criminal record because my wife came at me. My wife literally laughed this off. The counselor acknowledged that this was something to be worried about, but didn't go very far beyond that (there were tons of other issues to deal with).

I know this stuff happened. I get the impression that my wife was trying to make me think that it didn't.

10. Profligate spending. Before we married, my wife lived beyond her means, but told herself (somewhat reasonably) that she was doing good, low-paying work in a high-cost area at the beginning of her career, and she'd pay it off later. She got the better-paying job in a lower-cost area when we got married. Extravagances weren't many, but $400 purses became a regular item on the Christmas list.

All of her friends' children started getting regular gifts in the mail, because children like getting stuff in the mail. We had a budget, but agreeing on it was like pulling teeth, with my first attempt at discussing my need to live within my means quickly breaking-down to a fight about whether I actually loved her or not. We eventually compromised, but it wasn't pleasant getting there. And, somehow, we always ended up spending the same amount over our budget each month. This didn't put us further in debt, but it did ultimately delay us from getting into the black by almost a year.

While this was going on, I said almost nothing about it, which was my error. Because, when I did try to say something, I'd see flashes of that first fight when she found a way to steer the discussion from, "Husband really does not want to live in debt, especially when we don't have to," to "Husband doesn't emotionally support Wife, because he's not being sensitive enough about her bad feelings about her massive debt." Or, "Husband is so unhappy with himself that he doesn't know that it's OK to treat yourself sometimes, and he's not frugal, he's cheap, and this is something that is wrong with him."

I swallowed my own discontent, and pressure built. Money that I used to save or spend on my hobbies was consumed with household expenses such as makeup, boutique wrapping paper, nicely decorated tissue boxes, $6/gallon organic milk, etc. She would ask if each nickel ($5) and dime ($10) item was ok to buy with household funds (as opposed to our own allowances), and I'd always agree because disagreeing usually resulted in some sort of pouting, withholding, etc. At home, I was either (a) a grumbly jerk, or (b) emotionally inconsistent and unpredictable. But I didn't realize this until I had been this way for quite some time.

We have been apart for a few months now, and I'm cooled off a little. But I'd be lying if I said I wasn't still blaming her (partially) for the pressure and frustration that I felt. But now the pressure is gone (we split up our > finances), and, somehow, I'm saving more than I was when we were together, and I'm even paying proportionally more rent than I used to.

> Oh, and I also saw her bank summary. She's already got more on the credit cards than she has in the bank. I know it's childish, but sometimes, when I'm spending a full Saturday on the golf course (and I'm not at a farmer's market), I think about that.

Men On Strike: Dr. Helen Smith on Fox & Friends

AVfM Video Source · 30 October 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Probably the single most important book published on men's issues this year is Men On Strike, by Dr. Helen Smith, which you can and should buy and share with all your blue pill friends. You can get it here or here or from any decent bookseller.

Dr. Helen Smith was recently interviewed about her book on Fox News Network. Fox in general has had both positive and negative things to say about her book and message, but she handles things masterfully, we find.

Birdshit for brains at Birdee.com

Jim Muldoon · 30 October 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Why do I do it to myself? Haven't I banged my head on the keyboard enough?

My son tells me about some feminist online magazine Birdee.com and their latest piece on a man not getting a job because he has a penis. He said the article was something along the lines of "now we know how women have felt all along."

So, I have to look, don't I? It's like an aching tooth that my tongue just won't leave alone. And yes, there it is, the sacred babble in all its glory: "No job for a fella." It is stupidity at such a level that I think it has to be cultivated.

Toby Dixon, the author, couldn't get a job with his degree (profession unspecified) so he tried to get general office work. This also proved to be unsuccessful. He began to suspect that it was because he was a man.

So far, so good. You might be encouraged that there is some independent thought in a feminist website happening here.

He leads us further up the garden path with the idea that "female-friendly" employers might, just might, not look so kindly on the likes of him with a dangler.

And yes, when he finally got an interview, the female interviewer dropped this bombshell:

"Why are you applying to do a woman's job?"

Tantalisingly, he even offers this insight:

"But it's everyday experiences like this that are poignant reminders that sexism affects men, too."

He was so close, so close to the real world, and then the sacred babble kicks in. He realizes that, "…as a man, I am better off when women are treated as equals."

Equals?

And, to show his sincerity, he put the last line in bold font:

"That feminism isn't about women: it's about people."

You fucking moron, Toby! Feminism is precisely why you didn't get the job. Feminism is why being a "male-friendly" employer is illegal and "female-friendly" is not just legal, they'll actually get some government funding for it.

Equals?

Had a woman been asked the question "Why are you applying to do a man's job?" she would be the cover story in Time magazine. She would be interviewed on all the morning breakfast shows, her autobiography would be out next month and next year she'd get a gig on Celebrities Walking Backwards or whatever the next TV craze will be.

And the best Toby can get is a sympathetic ear on a magazine that supports a cause that fucked him over. And to do that, he has to say what a wonderful cause it is.

Equals? Moron!

And so, shaking my head to dislodge the backspace and enter keys from my skull, I clicked on the next article: "So feminists hate dudes, right?"

Here we have Samantha Bradley explaining that feminist don't hate men, they hate patriarchy. And there are some wonderful insights.

She had a discussion with a male friend, whom she thinks is a dick. Exasperatedly, she has to explain to him that feminism is about equality. It's in the dictionary, dick.

But here, her female friend chimes in with what she calls "an interesting infuriating contribution":

"Yeah, [equality is] what feminism is meant to be, but in practice it's something different and is often about oppressing men."

Can I just stop here and make a suggestion, Samantha Bradley. Listen to your female friend.

No, don't think that by putting "Feminism is about gender equality" in empowering all caps with a fiesty bold font that you've just proved your point. Saying it twice and saying it louder doesn't make it true.

Listen to closely to what she is saying. Maybe even ask her why she thinks that.

Maybe also have a word with Toby. If oppression is being overlooked for a job because of your gender, have a read of his tale.

Instead, Bradley patiently explains to us the tired old reasons why she is a feminist. As long as there are wage gaps, she is a feminist. As long as there are less women on company boards, she is a feminist.

And, presumably, as long as there are more men killed in workplace accidents, Samantha Bradley couldn't give a shit.

What gives her away is the following lie:

"As long as one of the highest causes of death for a woman, both in Australia and the world, is violence at the hands of a man, I am a feminist."

I've left the link in, if you want to follow it. I did. This is what Murray Strauss kindly calls "evidence by citation".

The ruse is that most people would see the link and assume that the statement must be backed up by some serious study. Those who did follow it would find a CDC page that doesn't say any such thing, but contains more links to more data than you could point a mouse at.

No one would click on all of those links, and again, most would assume that one of the reports would back up the claim.

But no matter how many of them you pour over, you will not find any evidence for that claim.

Instead, let me tell you what the Australian Bureau of Statistics has to say about the leading causes of deaths. For Australian women, the top 10 are all diseases.

In fact, in 2011, the number 10 cause of death saw 1,804 women dying from diseases of the urinary tract. Can you imagine how low the 70 women killed by assault was in the ranking? Too low for the Australian Bureau of Statistics to be bothered to give it a number.

And that doesn't mean that they were all killed by men. That's 70 in total.

As long as more women are being killed by falling over (950 in 2011), and accidental poisonings (301 in the same year) than are being killed by "violence at the hands of a man", then you are a liar, Samantha Bradley.

She concludes that anyone who even refuses to call themselves a feminist is "inadvertently implying that women don't deserve gender equality."

No, don't ask me why she says "inadvertently". I don't know why she is blaming people for doing something, but says they're doing it accidentally. It's the sacred babble. It doesn't have to make sense.

And, for the same reason, let's not ask what "gender equality" might mean, never mind what anyone must do to "deserve" it. Perhaps Toby might think he "deserves" a "gender equality" chance at a job.

Let's not ask any of these questions and this battered keyboard might last another week, and I won't have any more dents in my forehead.

No, Samantha, I refuse to call myself a feminist because I cannot speak the sacred babble. I refuse to call myself a feminist because I cannot tell the lies you tell so passionately.

My integrity is too important to me.

Nothing but organizers at Men’s Rights Rally in Toronto?

AVfM Video Source · 30 October 2013 · Archived copy · Original

We have been amused recently to read from multiple sources that the only people who were at our Toronto Men and Boys in Crisis rally were the organizers.

While most of our critics are irrational and beneath contempt, this short video by Shawn Sutherland–which by the way does not capture everyone who was there, it represents a 1-minute snapshot of some of the people who were there–should tell you all you need to know about such stupid claims.

When it comes to the critics of the Men’s Human Rights Movement, does the stupidity and the dishonesty ever stop? (Don’t answer that, the question is rhetorical.)

We have several more gigabytes of footage of September’s events in Toronto that no one’s had time to do much with. But eventually, eventually, someone will have the time to do more with it, although another great source on the events there is Studio Brule’s channel. –DE

In His Own Words: Fake pregnancy, fake miscarriage, pwned!

Dr. Tara J. Palmatier · 31 October 2013 · Archived copy · Original

It's day 31 of Domestic Violence Awareness Month for Men and Boys, the invisible victims of domestic violence. If you've been following the In His Own Words series all month, you know just how heartbreaking and gut-wrenching these men's stories are. Many of you have undoubtedly found these accounts painful and triggering to read, especially if you or someone you love has had similar experiences.[image]

These men's tales have run the gamut from physical violence to emotional abuse to substance abuse to mental illness to sexual abuse to sociopathy to child abuse to abuse by law enforcement and the family court system. Hopefully, In His Own Words has helped put a human story to men's domestic violence statistics and helped illustrate that domestic violence perpetrated against men and boys by women isn't "funny" (Sharon Osbourne, I'm talking to you) nor does female perpetrated violence occur due to feminist fairy tales like rape culture and patriarchy. Abuse can usually be attributed to the multi-generational transmission of violence and dysfunction.

Today's In His Own Words is a little different, in that we get to hear a manipulative, deceitful, abusive woman get her comeuppance.

The video, Always Be Recording? Better Believe It, is an audio file from Houston's 104.1 FM The Roula & Ryan Show. Roula and Ryan periodically do a "revenge" segment in which they invite listeners to come on the show and confront their tormenter on the air live. Enter Josh and Jen.

Josh dated Jen for 6 months. He broke up with her after her behaviors became increasingly "manipulative, angry, crazy, jealous and psycho." Approximately 2 months later (after Josh began dating another woman), Jen resurfaced claiming she was pregnant — oops!

[image]

Josh decided to "do the right thing," broke up with his new girlfriend and got back together with Jen. (*Marrying Crazy just because she traps you into fatherhood is not the right thing — retaining an attorney, establishing paternity and securing your parental rights is the right thing). Play the video below to hear what happened next.

As I was listening, I couldn't help but have the following reaction as Josh and Roula held Jen accountable:

http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=cOmVILOvmfA

I mean in a non-sexual way, of course.

The alternate title for this article was How a BPD Says I Love You. Jen lied about being pregnant, having a miscarriage and being forced by Josh to get an abortion in order to destroy his relationship with his next girlfriend. She claimed she did it, "for [us]," because "God wanted her to" and "out of love." In other words, deceit and manipulation are a-okay if it staves off feelings of "abandonment" and gets her what she wants — regardless of what the person being deceived and manipulated wants and regardless of how the person being deceived and manipulated feels. Sociopathic much?

The typical narcissistic, BPD lack of empathy is evident when Jen asks Josh, "How could you do this to meeee!" Also evident is her complete lack of remorse for her actions. She's not upset because she realizes what she did was wrong, she's upset because her sociopathy was publicly exposed. She's not sorry for what she did; she's sorry she got caught.

There are probably other mental health professionals who think I'm being unprofessional for making moral judgments about Jen's character. These "professionals" would probably be quick to rationalize and excuse her behavior, chalking it up to a fear of abandonment or childhood abuse, the poor, poor dear.

Pffft.

Jen's actions are wrong. She shows herself to be morally bankrupt. If she's ever going to become a decent human being, that's where her therapeutic work needs to begin. Jen very well may have suffered abuse as a child, but she is no longer a child. She is an adult and she is accountable for her behavior as an adult. Jen needs to experience shame for her shameless behavior.

Sadly, Jen's behavior is not uncommon. It happens all the time. Ryan and Roula claim they received texts from other male listeners who were also lied to by other equally desperate, unscrupulous, self-centered, selfish, crazy assholes. There are a couple of high points in this segment; one being when Jen thinks Josh is going to propose to her. The other being when Roula, the female radio host, blasts Jen and gives her an accountability smackdown, which brings me to my next point.

Women need to start holding other women accountable for this kind of crap.

There seems to be some kind of unspoken pact amongst a great many women, "Thou shalt not speak out against thy fellow woman, no matter how batshit crazy, amoral or sociopathic she may be." Think I'm exaggerating? Think again.

A few months ago, someone shared an article I wrote, "Accidental" Pregnancies, Entrapment and Children as Weapons on CafeMom.com. One of the main points I make in this piece is that self-respecting, psychologically healthy woman do not force or trick men into fatherhood. This shouldn't be a provocative or inflammatory statement, right? It should be blindingly obvious, shouldn't it?

Wrong.

The majority of CafeMom commentators were outraged. Actually, the comments would be a laugh riot if the insights into these women's belief systems weren't so frightening. One woman condemned me for not "sticking with my own kind," as if we're living under some man-woman apartheid. Another woman hypothesized that I'm really Paul Elam masquerading as a woman (Surprise!)

I am not bothered by the attacks on my character, the accusations of misogyny or the questions about my very existence. What bothers me the most is the high percentage of women who think lying about being on birth control and trapping a man with an unwanted pregnancy is a perfectly acceptable thing to do. If you can stomach it, I encourage you to "peer behind the veil." It will give you a sampling of how a lot of women view this matter and, frankly, it's fucking disturbing. You can read the comments here.

One woman became so unhinged by the idea that's it's not okay to lie about birth control that she started another forum thread, Just "Who" or "What" is Dr. Tara J. Palmatier. She writes:

> Okay, ladies, this is a spin-off of Future Shock's post about women entrapping men by getting pregnant.
> I wanted to know WHY this supposed "woman" shrink was so one-sided against women— SURELY, a Wiki post somewhere existed that would explain why. I have found some images that are supposed to be her, but cannot be sure…
> I propose that this "woman" is a fake. At least with Ann Coulter, you know she WAS born… This entity, well, do a little searching with Google, Bing, etc., and let me know if you find any REAL info other than blogs or articles purported to be written by her..
> Here is an example of her "work". I did not slog through all of the videos, but the ones I watched were enough to tell me I didn't want to waste my time watching women hating on women… WHERE did they get these women? PAY THEM???
> http://www.avoiceformen.com/womens-voice/

Nutbag.

Think the CafeMomsters are just a small subset of whacky stay-at-home-moms? Think again.

ABC's 20/20 (remember them?) periodically does a segment with John Quinones called What Would You Do? They did one not too long ago called, He's Not the Father, Would You Tell?

Not one single woman told the male paternity fraud victim he was being duped. Not one. Not even the women who acknowledged that lying about the paternity of the baby was wrong in the post-interviews.

What does all of this have to do with raising awareness for male victims of domestic violence?

More women (and let's not conflate women and feminists) need to start speaking out against female batterers, paternity fraudsters, fraudulent restraining order abusers, parental alienators, able-bodied adult women who are capable of working but jack their exes courtesy of the state, entitled princesses, female teachers who screw their students, and false rape accusers, etc., etc. If you speak out when men behave in a similar fashion, you are a hypocrite if you don't speak out against women who do the same.

Evil flourishes when good men and women do nothing.

To this end, I will announce the In Her Own Words series in the coming days. We want to hear from women whose husbands, sons, fathers, brothers, grandsons, nephews and male friends have been abused and/or victimized by a woman and/or abused by proxy at the behest of a woman. Domestic violence is not a gender issue. It hurts all of us, either directly or collaterally.

Thank you to all the fine men who shared their stories this month. I appreciate your willingness to make the time to do this. I know that dredging up these experiences was painful for many of you and admire your courage for doing so. We want to keep hearing from you and continue In His Own Words as a regular feature on both AVoiceForMen and Shrink4Men, which I will also address in the forthcoming announcement.

Thanks again.

Twerking and sexual independence?

Michael Sharron · 31 October 2013 · Archived copy · Original

So I just read an article by a feminist writer that basically says when you see the likes of Miley Cyrus, Rhianna, and millions of girls all over Facebook and Twitter twerking, dressing with minimal clothes, and expressing their independence and validation in being a sexual equal to boys and men, it is not an invitation to men and boys to objectify and have sex with them.

As the father of two girls, I certainly get that if either of my daughters ever decided to twerk, it should not be taken as a invitation for any boy to have sex with her. But is that really what the article linked above is saying–or is that the only message?

I think not.

To me, and I am certainly hoping to be challenged in the comment section, what the feminist writer in this article is asking all men and boys to do is validate and love women and girls who do this as equal people rather than as slutty girls asking for attention sexually. I do have some concerns that the typical 15-25 yr old boy will have a hard time trying to decipher whether a bent over girl thrusting her hips and genitalia against his genitalia is just "Mary being a equal human being who should be validated as a woman" as opposed to her wanting to have sex. But this is what the feminist writer is asking society: to force men and boys to morph into such that the only actual sex between men and women is achieved when the women gives loud verbal enthusiastic consent, screw body language, screw touching, screw inarticulate moans, or anything else: she screams "let's have sex!" or you're a rapist in waiting.

But here is where you hear crickets or the shattering of glass as the feminist house of equality comes crumbling down. Do these theories apply to boys and men as well? Of course not.

Here is what the feminist writer is asking for society to accept: if a principal or teacher witnesses a girl in high school wearing booty shorts, bent over, putting her ass into the air and wiggling HER clothed genitalia against HIS genitalia, then it is just her validating herself as an equal sexual creature and we must embrace that. However, it is pretty clear that if we witness another boy in high school with his girlfriend and she bends over and HE starts thrusting his clothed hips and genitalia against HER clothed genitalia, feminism wants him addressed as a sexual deviant and rapist.

If feminist theory was about equality, this little boy should be validated as a beautiful independent and equal human being by principals and teachers as long as he obtained "enthusiastic consent" by the girl who bent over on her own choice. But again, that is not what we will ever see from teachers, principles, or feminism.

Using feminism's own standard against them, I think it is very clear that Robin Thicke was sexually assaulted by Miley Cyrus–unless we take a second look at the video from the VMA awards. If we do NOT hear Robin Thicke giving verbal "enthusiastic consent," then Miley Cyrus should be in jail as a rapist.

Right?

In short, it sounds like feminism mandates that it is okay for there to be a double standard when it is against boys, but there better never be any double standard anywhere for women and girls. Which, come to think of it, sounds a lot like feminism's definition of "The Patriarchy."

If we are going to start encouraging scantly clad women and girls to gyrate their hips and genitalia against men and boys absent consent, but apply sexual deviant and rape connotations to boys for the same behavior, then mothers of the world who have sons need to start preparing their sons for prison, while feminists smile at each other and clap.

Rosalind Wiseman calls for society to “Listen to boys”

Ty Henry · 31 October 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Sometimes within a group, the focus can be so intense on events within its own immediate focus that it can miss an event that constitutes progress, especially if there is no direct nexus to the group and its idioms.

As we busied ourselves battening down the hatches for the 20/20 assault starboard, and simultaneous Daily Beast port side approach, we can be forgiven for missing the neutral merchant boat behind us, willing to provide us much-needed supplies if we only asked. That boat was the release of Rosalind Wiseman’s book, Masterminds and Wingmen, and more importantly, the tone of the discussion about our boys it demands.

On October 17, on the Al Jazeera-America program Consider This, educator and author Wiseman and host Antonia Mora discussed the book, which centers around how parents, siblings, teachers and educational staff (3 of the 4 being mostly women) miss opportunities to meaningfully communicate with our boys, in favor of simplifying them as “simple creatures” who just “move on” from emotional trauma and daily difficulty, thus isolating them to their own “deeply emotional lives” that certain sectors of society presume don’t exist. She points out, among other things, that we “box boys in” to always looking for a sexual angle with women (predator paradigm), and that we erroneously label almost all taunts and calls for physical tests as “bullying” behaviors, when they are usually bonding exercises that boys should not be shamed out of. Many of the same bullet points are discussed in an interview by Hope Reese in The Atlantic and this piece by Bonnie Miller in the Chicago Tribune.

The most impressive part of Wiseman’s method? In compiling the research, she took a revolutionary approach. She actually sat down with 200 boys and listened to them, even allowing them to vet her information for accuracy.

The part of the Al Jazeera interview that left me most impressed was when Wiseman observed that while we have armed girls with the vocabulary to combat toxic messages, we have not similarly armed boys. Of course, we have been endeavoring for years as a movement to create and foster that idiom, particularly how to combat shaming language, so we share common cause and common ground there.

This is not to say that the pieces were not without their hiccups. Like several Al-Jazeera shows, Consider This has interactive element, and the junior co-host Hermela Aregawi repeated a nugget from the comments section of the Atlantic piece, from a male sycophant named David, trotting out the well-worn “in this male dominated society, its hatred of women, not of men, that inhibits boys” trope.

Rosalind Wiseman is, of course, not affiliated with the MHRM. Indeed, as an accomplished martial artist, she wrote a book entitled Defending Ourselves about defense tactics from, and recovering from, date rape. Her book Queen Bees And Wannabees, which took on the problematic social dynamics of teen girl culture, was the basis for the 2004 film Mean Girls. She approaches her subjects from the perspective of an educator, counselor, and most of all, a mother of two sons approaching adolescence. But therein lies the pleasing paradox; some of our most valuable allies are those unaffiliated with our movement, whose research or experiences independently reinforce the basis for our advocacy. We don’t have an “industrial complex” churning out rubber stamped clones and hacks like Mary P. Koss parroting our party line. Folks Professors Denise Hinds, Emily Douglas, and Sonia Starr, Researcher Elaine Zahnd, Justin Vacula, John Quinones (he who hosted the 2006 “What Would You Do” piece on how we respond to public displays of female-on-male violence) and others who do not self-identify as MRAs come to their conclusions independently, and thus are anodized to a large degree (though not completely) from ad-hominem attacks on their findings and views.

You can read the pieces and the book and judge for yourself what she gets right and wrong. What can’t be denied is that Wiseman has poked a new hole in Pandora’s Box, and the discussion on our suppression of boys’ basic humanity is now part of the popular discourse. Let’s help it spread, by both encouraging host Mora and Ms Aregwani to expand the discussion, and thanking Ms. Wiseman for her contribution.

Reclaim the Night – James Cook Univeristy style

Greg Canning · 1 November 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Reclaim the Night (RTN) marches have been a feature of the feminist landscape since the 1970s. In the city of Townsville in Queensland, in recent years the attendances have been limited, mainly comprising the same core group of radical feminists, and generally the event passed with minimal interest or public acknowledgement.

This year the traditional event organisers, the Women's Centre Townsville, were ready to cancel the event because new government funding arrangements require that they spend a specified part of their budget on helping clients directly rather than spreading feminist propaganda at government expense. The ball was passed to the hotbed of feminist dogma, the James Cook University Social Work Department. An organising committee of social work student's feminist-fundamentalist indoctrinates took on the challenge with gusto. They established a Facebook page replete with many examples of man-hating, gender profiling, all men are rapists type rhetoric and gained a modest online following.

One of their first posts was a recycling of the "classic" stop rape poster, with 10 tips for men, including "don't rape," "if you are in a lift and a women gets in don't rape her" and "when you see a women walking by herself leave her alone," etc. It's a sad but unsurprising reflection on James Cook University and their education of social workers that these students show so little understanding of basic human psychology, psychopathology, and behaviour. Just as it is little comfort to victims, that his type of rhetoric forms the core of their approach to the serious issues of sexual assault, which modern gender inclusive research shows affects both women and men in considerable numbers.

It is highly unlikely, for example, that these students would have read When Women Sexually Abuse Men: The Hidden Side of Rape, Stalking, Harassment, and Sexual Assault by Philip W. Cook and Tammy L. Hodo, let alone be aware of the sound research on which it is based. Nor are they apparently aware that in the cohort of school and university students to which they belong, both Australian and international research shows high levels of bidirectional IPV, female-perpetrated IPV and significant rates of "unwanted sex" (always rape in the feminist mind) reported by males (1 in 3).

Amongst the posts on the page were those clearly advocating violence or sexual violence as a remedy for male rapists or potential rapists (but not female rapists who are not acknowledged as existing).

[image]

For example a quote from Billie Joe Armstrong encourages "Ladies, if someone touches you and you don't want them to, feel free to punch them in the fucking face." The idea of crushing the testicles of male rapists" was posted with the moderator asking for thoughts and getting several likes but no condemnation as a barbaric practice best left to its place in ancient history:

[image]

In early September a troll posted a rape threat against the organiser on their Facebook page, and later the organiser alleged that a threatening note was placed on the windshield of her car. The incidents were reported to the police and by the media and you can read about it in this PDF file.

[image]

Surprisingly, our police, who have an exceptional record with identifying cyber crimes including paedophile rings, grooming activity and hate attacks on sites such as Facebook, have yet to identify a culprit for this trolling. The personal distress of the young women targeted aside, these events were fortuitous in terms of publicity and raising the public profile of their site/cause.

James Cook University's involvement prompted me to survey the Reclaim the Night Townsville Facebook page. The patent misandry emanating from JCU Social Work Department via Professors such as Betty McLellan (of Radfem Hub and Perth SCUM Conference fame) has been previously documented here, here, here and here.

I wrote in response to the media coverage to the local newspaper:

> I hope that whoever is responsible for threats against the JCU student organinsing the Reclaim The Night event in Townsville is identified and prosecuted.
> Reclaim The Night and the discipline of social work are grounded in ideological feminist theory, which holds that all men are collectively responsible for the criminal actions of a tiny minority whilst minimising or denying that some women also perpetrate sexual abuse and rape.
> It is claimed that we live in a rape culture where toxic masculinity encourages and condones the sexual assault. Males are by default rapists and must be taught not to rape.
>
> The Townsville Reclaim the Night Facebook page infers that this scenario has become the "social norm." I don't see it that way, any incidents of sexual assault being widely condemned by men and women alike.
> The event focuses only on men's violence against women. Male victims and female victims of other women's violence are excluded. Why in a society that promotes gender equality should any victim be less deserving of compassion?
> The extent of sexual abuse of boys and young men in the military and religious institutions in Australia has recently been exposed. Prison rape where victims are predominantly male is laughed off as adding deterrent effect to imprisonment.
> Reports of female care givers and teachers engaging in sexual acts with underage boys are increasingly common. In such cases social norms promote a view of the victim as lucky to be abused. Female perpetrators receive significantly lighter sentences than men. False accusations of sexual harassment or assault are an increasing problem that impedes the quest for justice for true victims.
> The Secondary Students Survey of Sexual Health 2008 reported that among young people who experienced sex when they did not want to, one third were male.
> Reclaim The Night's anti-male rhetoric is in my view counterproductive to dealing with the very serious and non-gendered issues of violence and sexual assault. One post on their page promotes sexual violence as a remedy for sexual violence by canvassing the idea of crushing the testicles of male rapists.
> Men of Townsville are apparently equal enough to attend the Reclaim The Night rally but women and children only are allowed to march. Perhaps there's a message in that and it's not one of inclusivity or equal compassion for victims regardless of gender.
> Dr Greg Canning
> Hermit Park

The Townsville Bulletin is to be commended for publishing the letter under the headline "RAPE HAS NO GENDER":

[image]

[image]

Unlike the previous media coverage, my letter did not rate a mention on the Reclaim the Night Facebook page, but did without any comment lead them to remove the violence promoting posts mentioned above, as if that makes any real difference to the general demeanour of the page!

Certainly the same cannot be said following the news about an AVFM sticker appearing on the front door of the Spinifex Press office. Indeed the Reclaim the Night Facebook page posted about this on their wall, complete with the same image that appeared in the DailyLife story well before the story made the mainstream media and later shared the links to that story via a post on "Destroy the Joint."

[image]

This is not surprising as the ties between Spinifex and JCU are close, Susan Hawthorne is a director of Spinifex Press, Adjunct Professor in the Writing Program at James Cook University, and was also a Perth SCUM Conference presenter and Radfem Hub Contributor. Betty McLellan has had a number of her works published by Spinifex.

What is surprising is that these posts have now been removed from the Reclaim the Night Facebook page.

The amount of hate mail I receive increased sharply after this exposure and along with the usual comments suggesting the world would be better of if I were dead or had my testicles removed, one inventive hater felt that everyone in local area should know that I was a "misogynist grunter" and by doing so she could see my business destroyed and me forced into poverty.

Although I missed the action, apparently there was quite a bit of anti-male hate expressed on the page in the aftermath of rally and march, with several complaints voiced by more well-intentioned followers. Although now deleted, some posts of apology remain in the "posts by others section."

[image]

Cassie Chadc (an alias for Cassie Watter) who was one of the keynote speakers at the Reclaim The Night rally and according to her Facebook page is the owner of the Child Health and Development Centre, a "Multi-disciplinary allied health team" catering for children here in Townsville posted her views on me to the group.

[image]

Following the Regain the Night rally photos of the event were shared on Facebook. Watter shared an image of 2 men who attended the rally who were standing at the back listening, with the caption: "Please look at this photo. Do you know these men? If so, please let me know. If not, please share widely!!.,"

[image]

Given the rally was a public event to which men were invited I can only assume Watters motive is one of gender profiling; after all. was not the reason for the rally to have people listen? She did not respond to a private message asking her to explain her intent in sharing the image with that question, what she would do if able to identify the men, or why this particular image should be shared widely.

Personally I find the idea of having a gender ideologue such as Watter, with ties to the underbelly of the radical feminist hate movement, being responsible for young children, especially male children, very concerning. The number of such ideologues in areas such as health, welfare and teaching is growing, as is the anti-male bias in these areas and disconnect between the sexes generally.

Breaking the stranglehold of feminist influence in education in general and higher education in particular is a key aim of the growing men's human rights movement, the importance of which is illustrated by events such as this and those regularly reported occurring in Canada, the USA and elsewhere.

Interestingly at the recent National Men's Health Conference I had the opportunity to talk to many male social workers and several male and female psychologists who confirmed the entrenched anti-male sentiment experienced during their undergraduate studies in these disciplines, as well as the very low representation of males in these courses.

One social worker related an incident where another student, tired of his trying to give a male perspective in class, called out "you just don't get it do you, we don't fucking care about men". The comment was applauded by the mostly female group and not questioned by the lecturer. A current mature age social work student needed to approach the department head to be reluctantly “allowed” to undertake a project on male victims of domestic violence, his proposal being rejected by the subject and course coordinators.

The New Male Studies courses starting next year will be a key driver of the process of injecting some gender inclusivity and unbiased academic rigor into Australian higher education around gender issues. Regrettably, bastions of radical feminism such as JCU Social Work are likely to remain impervious to inclusivity, evidence and common sense for many years to come.

He co-developed the Princess Margaret Hospital Prostate Cancer Rehabilitation Clinic/Program designed to assist couples adapt to sexual changes and urinary incontinence post cancer treatment.

Prostate Cancer and Survivorship

I'd like to say I'm unfamiliar with this topic but I'm not. Here is some of what I experienced when in 2004 my father passed away from cancer. It started off as prostate cancer metastasized and spread throughout his body. He ignored the signs and symptoms like so many men do. Toward the end he signed a DNR (do not resuscitate) order. The hospital, by that time had taken a fair amount of his innards 1 piece at a time. A foot of intestine here, a lump of liver there a pinch of pancreas, a sliver of spleen.

I remember being hurt by him signing that DNR, but it was his life, his journey, his choice on how to end that journey as he saw fit. I expressed my concern about giving up or giving in.

It was a tough talk, but the cancer had done what it was intended to do and spread throughout his once robust 6′ 1" frame, which in his retirement had developed a bit more with a spare tire addition round his waist. That however, had disappeared when he had signed the papers. Removing various internal organs and or parts of them will do that.

Being forced to eat hospital food in palliative care doesn't help either.

Nor do the offerings of chemotherapy and radiation that so many diagnosed with cancer go through.

I remember his last days. I spent as much time as I could with him. One day he asked me to shave his face for him, he had gotten so bad he couldn't do it himself. It was a slap in the face from reality. We would not be permitted much more time together on this mortal plane. We made light of the situation and joked around as best we could.

I hid my profound sadness as best I could and he did the same. We did it for each other, not because The Patriarchy demanded we do so. We did it as we both wanted to make the best out the situation. We always did enjoy a hearty laugh.

I took 2 weeks off of a job I had just started to get as many of those sometimes strained laughs in with him. "Just a few more" I would whisper to myself everyday after visiting hours were over.

He was still my father through it all and was concerned about whether my job would be secure, because I took time off to be with him. I assured him nothing would happen, In reality I didn't give a shit what my new employer had to say on the matter. My Dad was dying. The man who advised me when times were tough and smiled with me when things were grand, was wasting away in a hospital 3 hours away from where I lived.

He was half right. My Dad was a smart man.

I was penalized for taking the last 2 weeks of his life off by that employer. It was another Red Pill moment for me now that I think about. I didn't lose the job but I was denied a raise at my quarterly review because of me spending those last 2 weeks of my Dad's life with him.

I took 2 weeks and 3 days bereavement after the visitation and services were done.

I packed my tool chest and walked away from that company in an hour and a half because of that. I had no wish to work for a company that would not show compassion for an employee who just went through the agonizing process of losing their father to prostate cancer.

17 days was enough to penalize a son for loving his father. I won't say my Dad was an angel but he certainly was not the devil. He had his flaws as we all do. He did his best for the 36 years of his life that I had been a part of.

He was my Dad for all of it.

There are two lessons I hold dear from that time in my life;

1) Never regret being there as much as possible for your father.

2) Never put money before family — EVER

In the end he became another statistic.

He was 71.

For that year my father made up 1 of the more than 4200 men who died in 2004 from prostate cancer in Canada.

With Movember here its time to put away the costumes and get ready to learn about another male issue that has been bumped to the back seat of society's compassion.

Yet, in the 21st century subjectivity, distortion and outright lying in non-fiction writing is the norm. Fraud is the new orthodoxy. Consequently, integrity is the new "transgressive."

Back in 1893 Colorado passed a law granting women full voting rights. The following year, three women were elected to the Colorado House of Representatives (Clara Cressingham, Carrie C. Holly, and Frances Klock). Did this new political development put an end to the fair sex's unconscionable and constant suffering under the iron domination of the legendary force of patriarchy with its hordes of merciless phallus-bearing agents?

I'll let you decide for yourself. For now, I offer but a hint: a small bit of anecdotal evidence to spur your own research on this burning social question. As you are well aware, the empowered independent women of today is to be seen constantly scratching her head, wondering out loud: "Just what are men good for anyhow? Are they even necessary*?"

Ask any present-day career woman, be she electrician, math professor, construction worker, fighter pilot or trash collector and she'll tell you how she stays up at night and – between the broadcasts of her favorite reality TV shows – in a state of profound pensiveness, mulls over this dark (and somewhat scary) mystery of the ages.

Sarah Prather was a resourceful woman. Despite the horrors of patriarchy she managed to learn to think for herself and figured out what, in her "way of woman's knowing" the answer to what the ancient "gender" conundrum might be. Following is an account (partial one at least) that shed some light on this empowered woman's still-inspiring early discoveries in the science of gender philosophy and gender practice.

Many other American women, the records indicate, conducted their lives in a manner producing similar results, yet this Colorado heroine was the one who turned instinctive art into an industrial science. Indeed, Sarah was not a woman to settle for untested theories, projections and speculations. Visionary that she was, this Colorado trail-blazer conducted her experiments repeatedly and thoroughly to make sure her science was founded on strong and verifiable principles – and that they really worked in everyday practice.

FULL TEXT: Pueblo, Col., Mar. 1. – The suit of Mrs. Sarah Prather against Frank Prather for absolute divorce was thrown out of court this morning when it was found that contrary to the laws she had married Prather only three months after obtaining a divorce from her previous husband.

Up to this time the suit had developed considerable warmth and interest. Mrs. Prather had secured her husband under false pretense. She had not told him that she had been married three times previously and that therefore he was only No. 4. the couple were made one Aug. 3, 1901. Husband no. 3, whose name was T. Crudgington had been dropped only three months earlier, unknown to Prather. What the dates of the previous marriages and divorces were he has not yet discovered.

~ Thrashed Husbands. ~

The story of the conjugal bliss previous to the filing of the suit is a sad one. Prather says that his wife was tyrannical and cruel. He is physically a small man and has never enjoyed good health. The wife is, on the other hand, big, handsome and strong. She has also two daughters of good physique. Singly and together he claims, that they would beat him. Sometimes they did it because he had no money to give them, at other times just for the mere pleasure of it. Two months ago they put him out of doors after midnight and he had to seek shelter to keep from freezing. He claims to have been always patient, to have never lost his temper, and after getting the worst possible thrashing he would only gently remonstrate. Last summer Mrs. Prather opened a restaurant. This was the beginning of the end. She soon fell into the habit, says the husband, of bringing the male waiters home with her, right into the home he had himself bought, and to show them preference. In his own presence she made love to them. when he remonstrated, and he always did so gently, she alleges, she would forcibly eject him.

~ Spent Night Elsewhere. ~

But one night when she returned after midnight with a man the long-suffering worm turned. Prather lost his temper and became violent. He insisted that she would have to give up the company of other men entirely. The wife, still accompanied by the waiter, thereupon left the house and spent the night elsewhere. The following morning she swore out a complaint against her husband for creating a row and had him brought before the police court, where he was fined because he would not expose his shame and defend himself.

An October to remember and learn from

Paul Elam · 1 November 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Dr. T has done something remarkable for all of us. She went through a daily grind, 31 times in a row to capture, edit and present personal accounts of abuse for the "In His Own Words," (IHOW) series as a part of Domestic Violence Awareness Month for the unseen victims of domestic violence.

I want to express a very sincere public thank you for this, for the dedication it takes to face that every day and get it done. It is an amazing gift to this community and I am sure that many here are as thankful as I am.

Her intended purpose was to give a voice to men who have suffered at the hands of abusive partners and then usually abused a second time (at least) by a malicious system that most frequently denies or trivializes their experiences. She also intended to use those stories to reach other men with similar experiences who could identify with these personal tragedies.

She succeeded.

There was also a secondary benefit. In my mind, the IHOW series also served as a barometer of sorts; a way to gauge how well the community at AVFM had done in striving to create an environment rich in what we claim to embrace around this place: Compassion for men and boys.

I am pleased to say I think we have done well.

I have noticed a lot about the reactions to different kinds of material on men's websites over the years. I am an avid writer and reader of that kind of literature. I see those reactions in the comments, where threads can extend into the hundreds, especially from a particularly provocative or incendiary piece of work.

The same holds true when we do a particularly good job exposing the worst of what feminism has to offer, or when they are their most outrageously stupid.

It is true, however, and I make no personal judgment about this, that when we cut close to the heart of men's pain; when we peel back the exterior veneer behind which most of us find some measure of comfort and get to the rawness that so many of us feel or have felt, our enthusiasm to add to the discussion wanes.

True to the stereotype, many of us aren't so enthusiastic about the open expression of our wounding. Again, I am not expressing an opinion on this one way or the other. I carry a lot of feelings myself that I am not much prone to put out for public examination. And I don't think that is a bad thing. I just handle my pain differently.

That being said, I was also very happy, proud if you will, to see the level of support for the men behind these stories that came from this community. I was thankful to see the encouragement and grateful for those who spoke up about how they connected to those stories; how they too knew the teller's pain.

More simply put, I appreciated the compassion for men and boys being expressed in a place dedicated to that very thing.

To be more complete in the assessment, though, there is something else that I also have to address. We did have, upon occasion, comments that I can only describe as disappointing. Perhaps embarrassing is a better word.

They amounted to just a handful that I noticed, but it was a handful that clearly demonstrate, just like with progress on our basic human rights, there is room for improvement.

The temptation, as is always my temptation, is to react with some anger about it. But hey, I am working on that these days (some days more than others).

I have to admit that working on it or not, anger is part of what I feel. Let me give you one example, and I will keep it to one as I am not in the mood for overkill.

[image]

Yes, for sure this makes me angry. All misandry makes me angry. It is a big part of why I am here. That comment with four up votes represent part of the problem we are trying to address at this website.

Don't get me wrong. I am a proponent to the point of preaching at times that men must learn from their experiences and take responsibility for mistakes. It is the only way anyone learns anything, and it is the only way to prevent these kinds of things from happening again and again.

There is a time to hold men to account. I have met few men who ever needed to be told that. There is also a time to stand with them without judgment or scorn, a less common skill though more in practice here than most places. Few here find any benefit in going out of their way to tell any man who has been through a rough patch in life that they lack compassion for him.

It is true, and I have made it no secret, that I have grown frustrated with hearing from men who never even made a comment on AVFM, but who suddenly show up in my inbox insisting that everyone at the website stop everything they are doing and dedicate their lives to correcting injustices against them; the same injustices that they ignored as long as it was happening to someone else.

It is also true that I have encountered men who tested my available compassion by foolishly making the same mistakes over and over again. But I never saw any reason in serving up my unsolicited indifference when they had taken the risk to lower their guard and spill their guts about the most vulnerable moments in their lives.

Especially in a place like this.

Sadly, I have found in every crowd of men, there is always a small percentage who always seem to have all the answers; who would never, ever be fooled by a woman, or so overcome by love or dependence that they would make bad decisions, or who would, out of their upbringing, struggle mightily past the point of reason to keep a relationship or a family together.

These are the men that never fear loss; that always know just how to handle a woman. They are in control at all times. They have Game, for sure. They know it and will not hesitate to tell you.

I have also found that these are the same men, in almost every case, that casually dismiss and demean the pain of fellow men not so gifted with their superhuman powers. They quickly, and sometimes sadistically go out of their way to make that known, too. They will happily chime in, at the drop of a hat, to tell anyone in pain that they feel absolutely nothing for them – save perhaps some contempt.

I also doubt if these men have ever been meaningfully connected to anyone or anything in their lives, and I wonder of all things what they are doing here. I wonder how, in a place that points constantly to how men are ridiculed and rejected by a domestic violence industry that produced Earl Silverman, they can make comments that emulate the same depraved indifference that left him at the end of a rope.

That is not an invitation for them to leave. I hope they stick around till the humanity rubs off on them, or at least till they learn to fake it. But in the meantime I have to ask, if you cannot offer support to men then kindly offer nothing at all.

In the case of our minority of resident supermen, nothing is much better than what you have to give.

To everyone else in this community, thank you once again for proving that misandry can be broken by compassion. And thank you to those who shared their stories, for helping us break the code of silence about the pain of men.

Epidemic of gold-digging whores – 1928

Robert St. Estephe–Gonzo Historian–is dedicated to uncovering the forgotten past of marginalizing men. "Gonzo journalism" is characterized as tending "to favor style over fact to achieve accuracy." Yet history – especially "social history" – is written by ideologues who distort and bury facts in order to achieve an agenda. "Gonzo" writing is seen as unorthodox and surprising. Yet, in the 21st century subjectivity, distortion and outright lying in non-fiction writing is the norm. Fraud is the new orthodoxy. Consequently, integrity is the new "transgressive."

Welcome to the disruptive world of facts, the world of Gonzo History.

Comedian Bill Burr is right when he says there is an "epidemic of gold digging whores," but he is wrong to think it is a new phenomenon and that it applies only to male targets who are wealthy. The epidemic started in the late 1800s in the U.S. and has never abated. The misandry bubble of the 1920s, a period when alimony racketeering became a national scandal, appearing in the news on a daily basis was matched by public outrage towards the Heart Balm Racket (breach of promise lawsuits which were shakedown scams) and endless parade of women who committed murder with impunity – due to juries made up of chivalrous men. Here is an article that offers an insider's look at the gold-diggers' large scale court-sanctioned thievery.

FULL TEXT: Cleveland, Feb. 3 — Marrying for alimony as a profession, has reached enormous proportions in the United States, if nearly $1,000,000 paid divorcees last year, in Cuyahoga-co, in which Cleveland is located, is any indication, Arthur J. Eyring, alimony clerk, recently remarked.

The women who make a business of collecting alimony here have increased 340 percent in the past 10 years, Eyring revealed. In 1917 only 81 women drew checks from their former spouses. Today the number is so great that the divorced women are often obliged to stand in line.

Local alimonees received $222,923.05 in cash in 1927 and nearly $750,000 in property and money settlements were made, Eyring showed in his annual report.

~ SOME ARE DESERVING ~

Eyring who has paid out alimony for many years declared that although many women are deserving in being supported by their former husbands, it is unbelievable the number of women who are receiving checks from two or maybe three misguided former husbands

He said these divorcees have developed a highly skillful technique of marrying, divorcing and suing for alimony, then remarry some wealthier man, divorcing and suing again for alimony.

Where there are children, Eyring believes it is no more than light for the former married man should aid in supporting his former wife and "kiddies." It is contended, however, that the familiar "gold-diggers" far outnumber all other alimony receivers.

~ LIFE CONTRACTS ~

Most judges, Eyring declared regard marriage as a life contract and thick that if the contract is broken thru the fault of the husband or not, the wife is fully justified in taking alimony as a fair return for her investment.

However, it is said, that more modern justices feel it a great injustice for a right-minded woman to accept support from a man she has ceased to love and live with.

The psychology of hate

Paul Elam · 2 November 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Years back, in another life, I presented at seminars and conferences that provided continuing education units for professional re-certification. In one particular module, I used a portable grease board in a room in front of my waiting audience. Without introducing myself or saying anything else, I used a grease pen to write the words “Men are…” at the top of the board, and then silently invited the audience to finish the sentence.

Almost invariably, “pigs” or “dogs” was the first offering, accompanied by a room full of good-natured chuckles. I would nod my head and write it down on the board and return to the audience, still silent, for more.

“Controlling,” says one. “Afraid of commitment,” says another. “Aggressive.” “Macho“ “Afraid of intimacy.” “Violent.” “Sexist,” and “Power hungry.” More of the pejoratives, and almost only pejoratives, would come from the audience till the board was full.

I then flipped the board to the other side. “Women are…” was the cue, and the answers were even more rapid fire than they were with men. “Strong.” “Capable” “Empowered” “Sensitive.” “Nurturing,” and the like would fly from the audience to the grease board like a barrage of arrows, till that side too was full.

“What do you imagine,” I would ask, taking a strategic pause for a sip of water, “that these answers tell us about the real nature of sexism in the way we view men and women?”

Asking them a question with actual spoken words must of thrown them for a loop, because the stock response to that question was almost invariably a room full of nonplussed, cognitively dissonant faces. And that confusion usually gave way to irritation, clearly at me, though every answer on both sides of that board had come from them. And by the way, the participants in the crowd? They weren’t accountants or nurses or teachers or financial advisors.

They were mental health professionals.

They were counselors, psychotherapists, social workers and the like; the very people we love to imagine possess the objectivity to rise above the mindset of bigotry and sexism. And the people, despite our want of faith in their work, least likely to actually do it.

I wanted a little more pressure so I asked more questions. “How could this affect our therapeutic alliance with clients?- Could it make our relationships with females enabling?- Punitive with men?” And always, the final question I asked was “Do we carry sexism, against men, unconscious or conscious, into our work with each and every client?” With that question the anger usually intensified.

In one talk, a female participant, a social worker, jumped out of her chair and threw her papers everywhere. “You’re the sexist!” she hissed at me, and stormed out of the room. She later wrote letters of complaint both about my topic and the fact I would not sign off on her attendance.

Welcome to the wacky world of mental health.

It is a telling study in the psychology of hate. Indeed, as we peel back the layers of fantasy from the profession, we are forced into a most disturbing conclusion. Psychology is hate. At least as it is practiced in western culture.

It’s most evident in the junk psychology market. Since the mid-eighties, get-rich-quick psychology gurus have often made their way to bestseller lists. Books like Robin Norwood’s Women Who Love Too Much, Susan Forward’s, Men Who Hate Women and the Women Who Love Them and others have been runaway hits, all predicated on rigid stereotypes of men who hate and women who love; all just more additions to the already crowded grease board.

Some time ago Karen Salmansohn appeared in a Fox News segment on women executives. She was given a nice plug for her new book, Bounce Back. They could have, and probably should have in the interest of balance, given her credit for her previous publication, How to Make Your Man Behave in 21 Days or Less Using the Secrets of Professional Dog Trainers. I don’t make this stuff up. Unfortunately, I don’t have to.

Currently, male bashing monarch Phil McGraw reigns in the ratings, and it won’t be long before another emerges, fighting to be top dog in dogging men. All you need is a warped worldview and a nod from Oprah. And these are just the media hucksters. At least we can say that the men and women who embrace their misandry-for-profit schemes are just another dumbed-down group in a dumbed-down media culture.

The more culpable and dangerous are the ones with the air of legitimacy. These folks don’t write, or don’t just write. They teach, do research, and most dreadfully, hang out their shingles and help infect the world, one gullible client at a time.

The world of psychology in academics and practice has become a weapon in the realm of gender politics. Almost all pretense to objectivity and academic integrity has been forced aside by ideologues with an ax to grind against men and who are using the loathsome disguise of helping professionals to further their agenda. If you think that is extreme, read on.

Allaboutcounseling.com is purportedly an information and referral resource for people seeking mental health services. What it is in reality is a portal, a conduit that induces women into the mentality that it is the vile scourge of manhood at the root of their problems. And they offer feminism as the solution before the first session is booked.

Some tidbits from their site include some detailed hype about the fundamentals of feminism and some reassurances that not all feminists are lesbians. I suppose they figure heterosexual women need such basics. And it's good pre-sell to overcome objections before they are raised. Ask any used car salesman.

They even have a nifty section promoting a new masculinity. These people have the key to re-engineering men for the better, with the implication, of course, that the way men are now is defective and in need of an overhaul.

Part of that overhaul is a gag. This is just one of the standouts, as it appears word for word on the site.

Openness– To others (especially to women) criticism of our behaviors and attitudes, listen, listen some more, and only speak if the critic wants feedback.

This isn't even speak when spoken to. It is shut up and take it. Speak with permission only, from whichever woman is attacking you at the moment. Ah, the finer aspects of mental health.

They have much more there. Enough bogus stats on domestic violence, rape and sexual abuse for a N.O.W. convention, and staunch defenses of feminism tied in directly with the counseling message. Their ultimate point is clearly that sound mental health for women depends on embracing feminism, and with it the hatred for men. Sound advice for those seeking love and intimacy if I ever saw it.

At this point, the grease board is showing more grease than board.

I wish I could say that this was the bottom of the pit; that the infection stopped there, but we are still dealing more with the symptoms than the actual disease.

Enter the American Psychological Association, and it's Division 51 group The Society for the Psychological Study of Men and Masculinity. (SPSMM)

Here are two of the bullet points from their Mission Statement:

- Endeavors to erode constraining definitions of masculinity which have historically inhibited men's development, their capacity to form meaningful relationships, and have contributed to the oppression of other people.
- Acknowledges its historical debt to feminist-inspired scholarship, and commits itself to support groups such as women, gays, lesbians and people of color that have been uniquely oppressed by the gender/class/race system.

Aye, there's the rub, and with it goes the last remaining bit of room on the grease board. Men are defective, pernicious banes to civilized society, incapable even of healthy love and connection. Feminism, of course, the ideology that so maligns them, is the answer.

Even our most revered experts in human nature are saying as much.

And this is how it worked in the old Soviet Union. It is wise to consider that in the Solzhenitsyn era of gulags and iron fisted reaction to political dissent, that most of the dissidents were imprisoned in "mental health facilities," the logic being that if you disagreed with the state, there must be something wrong with your mind.

It was also a strategy of, and yes, I will say it without reservation, the Hitler regime, to poison the minds of the populace with disinformation about Jews, prepping the people to look the other way while they were dispatched in the name of a master race.

The plans for men may be less extreme and of longer duration, but it is happening nonetheless. Men are being marginalized year after year. Their numbers in college graduating classes are waning. 42% at last count. They have lost over 80% of the jobs in the current recession. They are dying by suicide and all other manners of death at rates that make women's lives look like vacations in Fiji.

It's hell having all this power. It is a wonder how we find time to oppress the world with it, much less twirl our moustaches and snicker while we do it.

But the anti-male hate machine keeps grinding away. SPSSM and others would no doubt classify the men's movement as a mass shared psychosis, and men's human rights activists individually as detrimental to society. In fact, it is already happening.

I used to remember that social worker who threw the tantrum in my class with a smile. It was a funny image. But that was some years ago. At the time, I knew the sexism was there, but it was not entrenched as deeply as it is today. And I naively thought it would go away.

I am not smiling about it any more.

An overview of misandry in the USA

Paul Elam · 3 November 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Publishers note: The following article is not a typical article for AVFM. The material in it will look familiar, even fundamental. It is presented here as a part of a special project we are undertaking to provide an interactive site feature designed to educate people about modern misandry on a global scale.

There will be many more of these articles to come, each from a different country. We will also be soliciting readers in different countries to submit articles similar to this one. Over time we hope to gather an overview article from every country affected by modern misandry. PE

The United States is one of the world's leading nations in what has been called the sexual revolution. In this country, feminism – a movement claiming to be about equality between sexes — has flourished and grown in power and influence quite impressively over the past fifty years.

While focused on social and political advances for women, proponents of feminism also allege they are invested in freeing both sexes from historically imposed sex-based constraints and disadvantages. The idea is that by freeing one sex from the limitations of gender roles, you invariably must free the other.

True to some of those claims, feminism has fostered many advances for women. Those changes are apparent in the degree of freedom and opportunity now afforded women in this culture; in reproductive rights, education, employment and in the ability to be full participants in the governance of their own lives and in the country in which they live. There is very little, if any, systemic discrimination against women remaining in the United States any more.

Unlike feminism's claim to embody equality, however, it has done little to nothing about sex role based disadvantages faced by men. Those problems, fifty years after the advent of popular feminism, remain unaddressed and in many cases have significantly worsened. Men continue to be the primary victims of suicide, violence, homelessness, educational failure, legal discrimination and a startling array of other issues too numerous to list here. You can view a much more complete list of the problems, with sources, at the following link.

http://www.avoiceformen.com/activism/about/

How did we get from a movement for sexual equality to a society that only paid attention to the problems of one sex?

As the women's movement became more popular and powerful, it also became more narrow, ideological and punitively anti-male. The movement has shifted from an agenda to promote the issues of women, to an agenda that actively thwarts efforts to identify, measure and solve problems faced by men and boys.

That counterproductive agenda is a product of what we call misandry, or the hatred and/or fear of men and boys.

Ironically, feminist misandry is exacerbated and amplified by feminists first distorting, then exploiting and capitalizing on traditional gender roles, rather than ending them.

Men have been trained and socialized for uncounted centuries of human history to sacrifice without complaint, to shoulder the lion's share of responsibility for protecting and providing for families and the society around them. They are trained, quite literally, to be willing to die if that is what it takes to accomplish those objectives.

Rather than push for women to truly break free of their gender role and to equally share this burdensome weight of social responsibility with men, the feminist movement has become one of privilege and abject opportunism, seeking only the benefits of newfound political and social power while clinging tightly to benefits already conferred on women from the practice of chivalry and other traditional female-only entitlements.

They have revised and rewritten the social contract between men and women, to one driven by misandry and dependent on men staying true to their gender roles while women singularly avail themselves to the benefits of the sexual revolution. This lopsided arrangement comes at an extreme cost, and it is men and boys who are paying it.

If you return to the AVFM World Map of Misandry (available soon) and hover over the flag of the United States you will find another list of links, all of which point you directly to examples, articles and research that illustrate the presence and negative consequences of misandry in American culture.

Actually, we are all rapists

Michael Sharron · 3 November 2013 · Archived copy · Original

I had some downtime today and was thinking about “enthusiastic consent,” and how feminists define rape and came to the conclusion that we are really all rapists. And by all, I mean feminists too, even though I expect they exempt themselves and their financial supporters, and just want the definition of rape given below to include just heterosexual males.

Here is how I reached the conclusion that every single person on the planet is a rapist. We know the following about the definition of rape from the many articles written by feminists lately who are concerned about rape on university campuses.

- If a female has any alcohol in her system, then she cannot consent to sex even if she says yes.
- If a female has any medication in her system that could alter cognition, she cannot consent to sex even if she says yes.
- Absent any of the criteria above, if a woman says yes to sex, you need to get enthusiastic consent because she may just being saying “yes” due to patriarchal pressure.
- Just because a woman says “yes” to a kiss or some other touch, that does not mean you have permission to kiss or touch her after the fact because she could have changed her mind during the course of the same sex session.

With this in mind, here is what healthy sex will look like among heterosexual couples as defined by feminists, and the university officials who cater to the demands of feminists:

him: Hi honey, I’m home from work.
her: Hi dear, did you have a good day?
him: Yes I did thank you, can I give you a kiss?
her: Yes you may.
him: OK, is that yes or an enthusiastic yes?
her: It’s enthusiastic.
him: OK great, have you had any alcohol or taken your anti-depressant today?
her: No.
him: OK, now are you just saying yes because you feel like you have to because of patriarchy?
her: No.
him: Can I give you a breathalyzer to make sure and can you provide a witness to you not taking your medications today?
her: Yes.

At this point, we can assume that a healthy kiss can occur. Now, let’s look at what happens if the kiss turns into sex.

him: Can I have another kiss?
her: Yes.
him: Is that an enthusiastic yes? OK, I want to make sure you are not just saying yes because of patriarchy or changed your mind since the last kiss 45 seconds ago.
her: Kiss me again.
him: Can I touch your breast?
her: Yes.
him: Is that a enthusiastic yes?
her: Yes.
him: Can I kiss your neck?
her: Yes.
him: Is that a enthusiastic yes?

her: Yes.
him: Can I touch your breast again?
her: Yes.
him: Is that an enthusiastic yes, and you are not feeling pressured by my patriarchy because you said yes to the last time you said it was OK to touch your breast?
her: You can touch my breast again.

Now we can assume that the remaining acts involved in sex HAVE to play out the same way for there to be healthy sex that is not rape. ANY deviation from the scenario above is grounds for a man to go to prison or be expelled from a university.

Sounds overly dramatic, right?

Unfortunately, I'm not being dramatic. This is exactly how feminists define healthy sex where heterosexual males are involved. It is this standard that is leading to men being kicked out of universities and publicly shamed all over the world today.

And, I suspect that in the very near future it will be this standard in criminal matters.

Who — among all the heterosexual university chancellors, university police, politicians, and even supporters of feminism who are accepting these standards — are in their own lives following them?

Does anyone believe that feminists behave in accordance with these standards when they have sex?

If not, then we are all rapists, as defined by modern academic feminism. I encourage you to email your local male university chancellor a link to this article so that he can bring himself under investigation.

Man Up, Japan!

AVfM Video Source · 3 November 2013 · Archived copy · Original

The majority of young Japanese men are uninterested in marriage, a tough competitive career, or catering to the desires of women. There is much cultural handwringing about it, but the only apparent solution most can see is to try to shame young men into being idealized constructs made up of Hercules, Cyrano, and Donna Reed. Is there any wonder most young men aren't particularly interested in that when there's nothing in it for them?

The language of misandry in academia

Jonathan Taylor · 4 November 2013 · Archived copy · Original

A collection of quotes by faculty members, students, and administrators

Here you will find a warehouse of quotations by faculty, administrators, and students who display moderate to extreme forms of misandry – contempt or hatred toward men and boys.

This collection should be a useful resource for those new to men's issues in academia. It should also be useful to advocates as a "go-to" resource for identifying and referring others the kind of hostile learning environment that has become pervasive in certain academic circles.

To clarify, this post is focused on misandry as it occurs in the spoken or written word only, but stops short of where misandry is presented visually on banners, posters, and so forth. If you would like examples of that, see the post "The Face of misandry in academia: a collection of banners, posters, and other visual aids."

The list is meant to be extensive, but not exhaustive. There is no feasible way to contain all the examples of misandric language in academia in this post. That being said, if you would like to add any that are not included on the list, feel free to do so – with citations that can be independently verified – in the comments section.

As we go through the quotes, there are some things I would like you to bear in mind. As I said in the post introducing the basics of institutional bias in academia, misandry in academia is not merely a collection of infrequent and disassociated anomalies arising from individuals uninfluenced by supportive or acquiescent peer groups. On the contrary, it is culturally pervasive in academia in a way that cannot be reasonably characterized as incidental or coincidental.

In addition, while misandry may most often be identified by examining others' statements, it is important to remember that the deeper problem with misandry is not the singular or occasional statements by faculty members, administrators, or students, but rather the attitude and the worldview behind them. For that reason I advocate looking at this collection of quotes holistically where each quote is a part of a larger tapestry, rather than getting hung up on one or two statements.

For the detractors

Not only is misandry pervasive in academia, the denial of it is as well. Some may dismiss these quotes out of hand by presuming that they are taken out of context. Never fear; I have provided the sources for every single one of these quotes so that they can be independently verified.

While most of these quotes are recent, some are older. Some may be tempted to dismiss them out of hand for that reason as well. What they may not consider is that many of these older hateful quotes have been reprinted in more recent humanities textbooks and presented as though they are gems of virtue. I have provided some of those newer sources as well, where appropriate.

Lastly, it bears mention that virtually nothing has been done prior to the publication of this post to take a substantial stand against misandry in academia by the academic community itself. The attitudes and worldviews expressed in more recent quotes bear continuity with those expressed in older ones, demonstrating that misandry in academia has not diminished over time, but rather has become the moral bedrock of an entrenched academic subculture.

Let us begin.

Misandry via rape hysteria

Rape hysteria – one of the most common manifestations of misandry in academia – takes a variety of forms. It is primarily seen in the practice of seeing rape everywhere (including and especially where it does not exist), advocating an extreme reduction or elimination in due process for accusations of sexual misconduct, always taking the side of the woman regardless of the evidence, and suggesting that false rape accusations are acceptable – if not a social good. Some people in academia even believe that since we live in a society where "men rule" that it is not possible for women to consent to sex, making all heterosexual sex rape by default. Here are some of the quotes I have compiled:

"They [victims of false rape accusations] have a lot of pain, but it is not a pain that I would necessarily have spared them. I think it ideally initiates a process of self-exploration. 'How do I see women?' 'If I didn't violate her, could I have?' 'Do I have the potential to do to her what they say I did?' Those are good questions."

"I'm really tired of people suggesting that you're somehow un-American if you don't respect the presumption of innocence, because you know what that sounds like to a victim? Presumption you're a liar."

– Wendy Murphy, adjunct professor of law and sex-assault victim advocate, commenting on the Duke lacrosse false rape case. Source: National Public Radio.

"Stop with the presumption of innocence. It doesn't apply to Duke. When they make administrative decisions about student behavior they don't owe them any due process."

– Wendy Murphy, adjunct professor of law and sex-assault victim advocate, commenting on the Duke lacrosse false rape case. Source: NBC news.

"If a woman did falsely accuse a man of rape, she may have had reasons to. Maybe she wasn't raped, but he clearly violated her in some way."

– Ginny, college senior interviewed by TIME magazine (source here).

"So many women get their lives totally ruined by being assaulted and not saying anything. So if one guy gets his life ruined, maybe it balances out."

– Oberlin sophomore Emily Lloyd, after Feminist students were criticized for placing posters around campus that bore the title "Rapist of the Month," and below that heading a name of a freshman male drawn randomly from the campus registry. Source: the Toledo Blade.

"A lot of people are very upset by it, but I think if a man was secure he wasn't a rapist, he wouldn't be threatened by this list."

– University of Maryland senior Erin Lane, after Feminist students were criticized for placing posters around campus that bore the title "NOTICE: THESE MEN ARE POTENTIAL RAPISTS," and below that heading the names of hundreds of male freshmen drawn randomly from the campus registry. Source: the Baltimore Sun.

"There is no clear distinction between consensual sex and rape, but a continuum of pressure, threat, coercion and force. The concept of a continuum validates the sense of abuse women feel when they do not freely consent to sex."

– Dr. Liz Kelly, The Hidden Gender of Law, p. 350.

"Rape is perhaps the foremost male fantasy in our society."

– Dr. Andra Medea and Kathleen Thompson, Against Rape, p. 14

"And if the professional rapist is to be separated from the average dominant heterosexual male, it may be mainly a quantitative difference."

– Dr. Susan Griffin, Rape: The All-American Crime; Ramparts Magazine, p. 30, 1971. Quoted thirty years later in Making Sense of Women's Lives: an Introduction to Women's Studies, published in 2000, p. 451-452, among others.

"Rape is indeed an extreme form of behavior, but one that exists on a continuum with normal male behavior within the culture."

– Dr. Mary Koss, "Football's Day of Dread," Wall Street Journal, Feb. 5, 1993. Cited in Who Stole Feminism, p. 210.

"Politically, I call it rape whenever a woman has sex and feels violated."

– Dr. Catharine MacKinnon, Feminism Unmodified, p. 82.

"The American dating system, which constitutes a primary source of heterosexual contacts, legitimizes the consensual purchase of women as sexual objects and obliterates the crucial distinction between consent and nonconsent."

– Drs. Margaret Gordon & Stephanie Reiger, The Female Fear, p. 60.

"Then there are the wolf-whistles, unwanted hugs and pinches – what the authors of one book call "mini-rapes" – which continually remind women they are vulnerable, sexual victims."

– Professors Margaret Gordon & Stephanie Reiger, The Female Fear, p. 6.

Notes to the above quote: while it is clear by reading their book that Drs. Gordon and Reiger support this view, it is also clear that they are referencing a chapter called "Little Rapes" (see here) on page 49 of Dr. Andra Medea's book Against Rape. In addition, in an interview among Dr. Christina Hoff-Sommers, Camille Paglia, and Ben Wattenberg on the PBS show "Think Tank" (source here), Dr. Hoff-Sommers says,

"I interviewed a young women at the University of Pennsylvania who came in in a short skirt and she was in the Women's Center, and I think she thought I was one of the sisterhood. And she said, 'Oh, I just suffered a mini-rape.' "And I said, 'What happened?' And she said, 'A boy walked by me and said, `Nice legs'. 'You know? And that — and this young woman considers this a form of rape!"

"Sexual violence includes any physical, visual, verbal or sexual act that is experienced by the woman or girl, at the time or later, as a threat, invasion or assault that has the effect of hurting her or degrading her and/or taken away her ability to control intimate contact.'"

– Dr. Liz Kelly, Surviving Sexual Violence, p. 41.

"Can we not, therefore, conclude that general consent sometimes equals rape because of the harms that it brings to the consenting woman? These harms include the loss of the sense of selfhood, for by consenting to sex which is not pleasurable; the woman is using her body to further the interests of her man, thereby treating herself as a means to that men's ends."

– Dr. Mangena, Fort Hare Papers, vol. 16, 2010, p. 52.

"Under conditions of male dominance, if sex is normally something men do to women, the issue is less whether there was force than whether consent is a meaningful concept."

– Dr. Catharine MacKinnon, Toward a Feminist Theory of the State, p. 178.

"Many feminists would argue that so long as women are powerless relative to men, viewing 'yes' as a sign of true consent is misguided."

– Dr. Susan Estrich, Real Rape, p. 318.

"Consent as ideology cannot be distinguished from habitual acquiescence, assent, silent dissent, submission, or even enforced submission. Unless refusal or consent or withdrawal of consent are real possibilities, we can no longer speak of 'consent' in any genuine sense.'"

– Dr. Carol Pateman, "Women and Consent," Political Theory, vol. 8, p. 149.

Notes to this quote: Dr. Pateman isn't talking about consent in a situational context, but the very concept of consent itself. What this means is that she is not referring to consent regarding a singular person, but women as a political class. That's why she does not refer to "consent"' in unqualified terms – like normal people do – but instead as "consent as ideology."

In other words, to Dr. Pateman consent is a concept that only exists in the minds of ideologues. By referring to consent as "an ideology" and placing herself in opposition to it, she is disagreeing with the concept of consent itself. Only "ideologues" believe consent is possible in a patriarchy, and she's not one of them.

"Consent–agreeing to something–is usually not a hard concept to understand. It may at first appear more complex in the context of rape. One reason is simply its unexpected presence. There is no other crime defined in terms of consent. Only in rape is the victim asked, 'Did you agree to it?' Compare: "Did you agree to be punched in the face?" "Did you agree to be mugged?"

– Professor Carol Sanger, "New Perspectives on Rape," Los Angeles Times, April 25, 1991, p. B7.

"Ask the students to close their eyes. Once they've closed their eyes, say 'Imagine that the woman you care about the most (your mother, sister, daughter, girlfriend) is being raped, battered, or sexually abused. Give them at least thirty seconds to think about the scenario before asking them to open their eyes."

– Classroom anti-violence program for 7th grade middle-schoolers, who are then asked to write about their feelings. The program is titled Gender Violence/Gender Justice and is referenced in The War Against Boys, first edition, p. 57.

"Men are a good deal more likely to rape than to be raped. This forms their experience…almost half of all women, by contrast, are raped or victims of attempted rape at least once in their lives."

– Dr. Catharine MacKinnon in Toward a Feminist Theory of the State, p. 176. Also quoted in Applications of Feminist Legal Theory to Women's Lives, p. 475.

"The point of recapitulation in the first movement of the Ninth [Symphony of Beethoven] is one of the most horrifying moments in music, as the carefully prepared cadence is frustrated, damming up energy which finally explodes in the throttling, murderous rage of a rapist incapable of attaining release."

– Dr. Susan McClary, Minnesota Composers Forum Newsletter, 1987.

"Traditional historians and philosophers have said that these [rape and torture] metaphors are irrelevant to the real meanings and referents of scientific concepts. But when it comes to regarding nature as a machine, they have a quite different analysis: here, we are told, the metaphor provides the interpretations of Newton's mathematical laws: it directs inquirers to fruitful ways to apply his theory. But if we are to believe that mechanistic metaphors were a fundamental component of the explanations the new science provided, why should we believe that the gender metaphors were not?

"A consistent analysis would lead to the conclusion that understanding nature as a woman indifferent to or even welcoming rape was equally fundamental to the interpretations of these new conceptions of nature and inquiry. Presumably these metaphors, too, had fruitful pragmatic, methodological, and metaphysical consequences for science. In that case, why is it not as illuminating and honest to refer to Newton's laws as 'Newton's rape manual' as it is to call them 'Newton's mechanics'?"

– Dr. Sandra Harding, The Science Question in Feminism, p. 113.

"When someone says 'I was raped,' BELIEVE THEM! It is not your role to question whether a false accusation occurred."

– The website for The Clothesline Project, an event in support of sex-assault victims on many campuses.

"In this book we will be using the term victim to refer to people who claim to have been sexually assaulted."

– Drs. Carol Bohmer and Andrea Parrot, Sexual Assault on Campus, p. 5. Throughout the book the authors never consider the idea that any man accused by a woman might be innocent, and take the accuser's side every single time. This leads to statements with contradictory and convoluted logic later on in the book. For example, in describing a trial court acquittal they say on page 29, "The victim said she did not consent; the jury did not believe her." How do we know she's a victim if the jury acquitted?

"Feminism is built on believing women's accounts of sexual use and abuse by men."

Misandry: men are bad, useless, or disposable

"In politics, if you want anything said, ask a man…if you want anything done, ask a woman."

– Margaret Thatcher, quoted by The Network of Enlightened Women (NeW), a traditionalist women's college group, in their group's introductory video (source here). This video was also featured on their website.

"Good Guys" in the patriarchy are harder to find than the Loch Ness monster in a desert. But according to many people I hear and talk to, "good guys" are everywhere. The propensity to acknowledge the shortcomings of men, overlook them even in obvious examples (such as gang-rape) and excuse their moral responsibility with the magic words, "But he is a good guy," is an epidemic phenomena at the very least.

"I am amazed continuously with the amount of forgiveness people are willing to grant men, as if the majority of rapes aren't committed by them, as if the majority of businesses aren't owned by them, as if they majority of pornography isn't consumed, produced, and profitable to them, and, as if they aren't somehow affected by the extreme privilege granted to their gender class.

"By existing as men, men directly aid in the oppression of women.

"Every time a man uses pornography, beats his wife or coerces a woman or dismisses or laughs at her, he is simultaneously denouncing her humanity and reaffirming his own. He does not just do this to amuse himself; her subjugation is a vehicle necessary for his continued existence. That is why men accepting responsibility and acknowledging their complicity in women's oppression is so extremely uncommon. It is also why there is no such thing as a 'good guy' in the patriarchy."

– University of New Hampshire student Whitney Williams, in her article for the campus newspaper titled "The Universal Myth of the 'Good Guy.'" See the AVFMS post on it here.

"Most people know the tragic tale of the Titanic, and one part in the movie and true story always struck me as a NeW lady: "Women and children first." Chivalry is not about superiority or inferiority, and it does not trample equality. Chivalry is on a completely different level – acting out of concern and respect for those who you believe should be respected.

"Even biologically and anthropologically, the male traditionally acts on behalf of the female because she is important – perhaps more important than himself. Being a gentleman is a selfless and natural way of life, not one that diminishes women or elevates men."

– The Network of Enlightened Women (NeW), a traditionalist women's college group, on their website.

"Boys in a 'crisis'? in my grandmother's day, only men could vote. When I was a girl, only boys could play sports. In the Roman Catholic Church, only men can be priests. In certain societies today and throughout history, girls can't attend school, and women can't work or show their faces in public. In China, girl babies are discarded because boys are favored.

"In America, glass ceilings block females from access to power, money and leadership. On playgrounds, a common taunt among boys falls along these lines: 'You cry/act/talk/throw like a girl.' So for the fraction of a nanosecond in human history that boys are perceived to be on the short end of the stick compared with girls, you call this a 'crisis'? C'mon, guys. You take a turn at second-class status for once."

– Sandra J. Anderson, former professor of law at Ohio State University, Board of Trustees member at OSU from 2013-2016. Comment on the online version of Peg Tyre's 2006 Newsweek article "The Boy Crisis" (now removed). This quote is referenced on page 11 of Peg Tyre's book The Trouble with Boys and is reproduced on the iFeminists website.

"I have a great deal of difficulty with the idea of the ideal man. As far as I'm concerned, men are the product of a damaged gene. They pretend to be normal but what they're doing sitting there with benign smiles on their faces is they're manufacturing sperm. They do it all the time. They never stop. I mean, we women are more reasonable.

We pop one follicle every 28 days, whereas they are producing 400 million sperm for each ejaculation, most of which don't take place anywhere near an ovum. I don't know that the ecosphere can tolerate it."

– Dr. Germaine Greer, at a Hilton Hotel literary lunch, promoting her book The Change – Women, Aging and the Menopause. Reported in "Greer Mocks Men's Misses" in the Sydney Morning Herald, 11/14/91.

"The proportion of men must be reduced to and maintained at approximately 10% of the human race."

– Dr. Sally Miller Gearhart, in her article "The Future – If There Is One – Is Female," ironically featured in a later book promoting nonviolence: Reweaving the Web of Life: Feminism and Nonviolence, p. 266

"I think it's not a bad idea at all. If life is to survive on this planet, there must be a decontamination of the Earth. I think this will be accompanied by an evolutionary process that will result in a drastic reduction of the population of males."

– Dr. Mary Daly's response when asked what she thought of the above quote by Dr. Gearhart, in an interview called "No Man's Land" conducted by EnlightenNext Magazine, 2001.

"As long as some men use physical force to subjugate females, all men need not. The knowledge that some men do suffices to threaten all women. Beyond that, it is not necessary to beat up a woman to beat her down. A man can simply refuse to hire women in well-paid jobs, extract as much or more work from women than men but pay them less, or treat women disrespectfully at work or home.

"He can fail to support a child he has engendered, demand the woman he lives with wait on him like a servant. He can beat or kill the woman he calims to love; he can rape women, whether mate, acquaintance, or stranger; he can rape or sexually molest his daughters, nieces, stepchildren, or the children of a woman he claims to love. THE VAST MAJORITY OF MEN IN THE WORLD DO ONE OR MORE OF THE ABOVE."

– Dr. Marilyn French, The War Against Women, p. 182, her emphasis.

"Everybody wants to tax somebody else: Tax the rich, tax the fat, tax the bald, tax pet owners, gum chewers and those who like manicures. I would like to offer a different solution: Let's tax men. In fact, let's tax men a lot, more than they're already being taxed, and let's not tax women at all.

"Sound fair to you? Good. Me too.

"After all, women are not the ones wrecking the nation's infrastructure. We're not the ones shooting at the "No U-turn" signs on rural highways. It's not women who are trying to make our names as graffiti artists. You'll rarely find a bunch of broads gathered together attempting to create weapons of mass destruction or figuring out how to really get ahead in next year's arms race.

"We're not the ones running Fortune 500 companies into the ground or manipulating the stock market. As many people have noted, had the firm been called Lehman's Sisters it might not have gone down the fiscal toilet, taking Wall Street's profits with it."

– Dr. Gina Barreca, in her article "Send Men the Bill – They Made the Mess" in The Courant, 10/6/11.

"To be a feminist, I believe, requires another ingredient: the felt experience of oppression. And this men cannot feel because men are not oppressed but privileged by sexism. To be sure, men do feel oppression, but are not oppressed as men."

– Dr. Michael Kimmel and Thomas E. Mosmiller, Against the Tide, p. 2-3. Quoted in Dr. Amanda Goldrick-Jones's book Men Who Believe in Feminism, p. 80.

Robert St. Estephe–Gonzo Historian–is dedicated to uncovering the forgotten past of marginalizing men. "Gonzo journalism" is characterized as tending "to favor style over fact to achieve accuracy." Yet history – especially "social history" – is written by ideologues who distort and bury facts in order to achieve an agenda. "Gonzo" writing is seen as unorthodox and surprising. Yet, in the 21st century subjectivity, distortion and outright lying in non-fiction writing is the norm. Fraud is the new orthodoxy. Consequently, integrity is the new "transgressive."

Readers of A Voice for Men are familiar with some of the more notable and articulate present-day adherents to gender ideology of the SCUM Manifesto variety such as Josefin von Zeipel Segerberg, Pamela O'Shaughnessy ("Vliet Tiptree," pseudonym), Krista Leighanne Milburn ("Krista Jane Heflin" pseudonym). Many people erroneously suppose, however, that the eugenics-inspired, genocidal ideation-styled, violent authoritarian types of feminist utopian philosophy find their source exclusively in ideology. The fact is that the mentality called misandric fixation (see "What is Misandric Fixation?") need not arise through the influence of ideology or deliberate intellectual cogitation of any sort. Further it can be observed that ideological misandry has existed long before the explosion of radical feminism in the 1960s.

Michigan champion misandrist Sarah Hunt needed to take out no student loans, study no opaque critical theory texts, to come up with a thorough and practical way to live in an exclusively feminine bubble. She was an independent woman who minded her own business. Had there been an enormous industry (feminist governance) in place during her 19th century girlhood perhaps she might have grown up to be a high-salaried social engineer policy maker. A Janet Napolitano clone perhaps. But Sarah Hunt was a private control freak, not a public one. Stories of such primitive misandrists as the solitary Hunt woman are highly instructive reminders that misandry of the most intense variety of can grow naturally out of the hating soul without the prompting or inspiration of any formal ideology.

FULL TEXT: Secluded for twenty years from every male creature, Sarah Hunt, of Lapeer county, Michigan, at 65 years of age, leads a life such as no woman ever led before.

And it is from choice, for this practical man hater has living a husband and two grown sons, who love her and would gladly abide with her. She, however, leads the life of a recluse and relentlessly proclaims and pursues her determination to deal out death and destruction to every male thing, man, beast, or fowl, that dares trespass upon her female domain of 40 acres of pine stump land in Deerfield township, Lapeer county, Michigan.

There is not a male creature on this tract of farmland, unless it be of the bug or reptilian family, or the birds that fly over the place. All of the domestic fowls and animals are female. There is not a rooster, a drake, or a gander in Mrs. Hunt's barnyard, although she keeps a large flock of all kinds of fowls. As for man, not one has dared enter her premises *i*n many years.

Six years ago the woman's dilapidated old cabin caught fire from an overheated stovepipe. It was a bitterly cold February night and the blazing of the clapboard roof attracted the attention of the neighbors, who turned out eagerly, not only desiring to do Mrs. Hunt a neighborly turn, but also finding in the occasion an opportunity of testing the antipathy she had so long shown toward men. Rushing to the house with buckets and ladders, they set to work without heralding their coming. The recluse, who invariably retires for the night at sunset, was all unconscious that the roof over her head was a mass of flames.

~ Rather Roast Than Have Men Near. ~

“What devil in the form of a man is there?” was the first sound that came from within the cabin and the ladders crashed against the eaves.

“Your house is on fire, Mrs. Hunt, shouted back Frank Dockham, a neighbor. “You’ll be burning in hell if you don’t get put of this,” retorted me frenzied woman. “I’d rather roast in my bed than have any human devil of a man desecrate my place.”

But the men were on the roof, chopping away at the burning rafters. Others were passing palls of water. They heard the occupant unfasten hurriedly the heavy bars on the door, and in another instant it creaked on its hinges. Bang!” A rifle cracked and a leaden ball whizzed close to the head of Uncle George Cole, Mrs. Hunt’s nearest neighbor, who was wielding the ax. Hurriedly the volunteer firemen scrambled away as the enraged woman rammed another charge home in her old muzzle loader. They disappeared into the night and the recluse turned her attention to the fire, by that time nearly extinguished. The next morning passers-by read with avidity the following, scrawled, on a piece of paper flour sack and tacked on the front gate post of the Hunt dooryard:

This Here House is Old Sarah Hunts Ef It Burns Down Its Nobodys Bizness But Hern. So All You He Men Jest Keep Awa.

They have, since then.

The recluse attends to all her farm work herself. She plows and harrows and harvests her crops, as a rule, with her own hands, but occasionally will hire a woman to assist her with such “work as she cannot well handle alone. When female help is hired, the mistress of the place prefers a young single woman, her aversion to everything male extending in some degree to married women.

~ Can Tell Rooster Before Hatching. ~

How she manages to keep the 40 acre farm devoid of every male thing, even to farm stock, was for years the marvel of all who knew the strange woman, but she has practiced the plan so assiduously that her method is reduced to a science. Cats she has galore, but Sir Thomas [meaning a tomcat] is conspicuous by his absence, and many an interesting feline of the male sex has given up his nine lives on the Hunt place, falling a victim to the mistress’ rifle. Mrs. Hunt buys eggs for hatching. When chickens hatch she is able to tell the male from the female at an age so early as to be the envy of “chicken cranks.” Better than this, the neighbors say, Mrs. Hunt can in the majority of cases distinguish the eggs that will hatch pullets from those that will hatch roosters. This skill extends to the products of other fowls. Ganders are especially hard to distinguish from geese, but the male goose is barely out of the gosling class before the man hater has it spotted for sale or slaughter.

In her dealings with the outside world Mrs. Hunt never speaks to a man nor does she look at one. When she goes to the country store two miles away she has her business all reduced to writing, so that, in case the wife of the storekeeper is not there to wait on her, there need be no occasion to talk with the grocer or his clerk. She seldom, however, leaves her domicile. Most of her business is transacted through the wife or daughter of a neighbor. She has not visited the county seat in fifteen years, and has never been on a railroad train. Ten years ago, when she was stricken with typhoid fever, neighbor women tried to induce her to call a physician.

“If you find a woman doctor, it’s all right,” she said. “If not, I’ll die rather than have one here.”

No woman doctor could be secured, and Mrs. Hunt was nursed through her long illness without a physician.

~ Her Antipathy Result of Dream. ~

The woman’s strange attitude toward men and things male was first manifested twenty years ago. She has said that it came to her in a dream as a command from heaven. At that time she was still on good terms with her husband, two sons and a daughter. At the breakfast table one morning she told of the “command” from the Lord. She was laughed at by the family, but as the days passed she talked more and more of the “spirit injunction,” finally demanding that her husband and sons leave the place. After every means to disillusionize the woman had been tried in vain and life on the little farm became unbearable for the husband and the boys, they departed, obeying the command never to return. Soon afterward the daughter died, and is buried near the house.

Mrs. Hunt has confided to women of her acquaintance that she has never regretted the strange turn in her life. Her desire is, she has told them, when she dies, to be buried beside her daughter on the little farm she has so long guarded jealously against masculine intrusion. She has begged that no men or boys attend her funeral, that her grave be dug by women, and that all the offices to the dead be performed by feminine hands.

By the people of Deer-field township, Mrs. Hunt, despite her strange conduct, is not regarded with fear or aversion. They say that she is a good woman, kind of heart, and ever willing to do what she can to help others, provided she can do go without violating what she calls “the pledge to myself.” Though lacking education, she is a woman of no ordinary intelligence, reads the newspapers, and keeps well posted on the affairs of the world.

"We live in a rape culture, and don't you ever forget it, not even for one minute!" A lot of money has been spent on the rollout of this thought product and the campaign keep going and keeps getting placed in larger markets. It is quite impressive. The entire enterprise is classic Edward Bernays "by the book" (the Bernays book being Propaganda, 1928, Horace Liveright, N.Y.). This "We live in a rape culture" trope is so widespread by now that we can confidently say that it is now the biggest rape fantasy the world has ever known.

We might ask, just how exactly does this biggest of all rape fantasies fit in to the psychological typologies of rape fantasies as understood by social science researchers? According to Michael Castleman, M.A., in his 2010 Psychology Today article on the subject these imaginary scenarios when fantasized by women can be either erotic ("I'm being forced and I enjoy it.") or aversive ("I'm being forced and I hate it.") or, they can belong to a third – and intensely intriguing category – mixed. The incidence (among those women who engage in such a pastime) of these three types break down, according to Mr. Castleman, to 45% erotic, 9% aversive and 46% mixed. This makes things rather complicated, if we try to understand the popularity of women's daydreams of the sort that can be characterized as "I'm being forced and I enjoy it and I hate it."

These fantasies are not rare. According to data collected from 9 separate surveys conducted from 1973 to 2008 about one in four women claim to have rape fantasies, the median frequency of occurrence being around one per month. Mr. Castlemen believes the rates may be higher due to reluctance of some respondents to be forthcoming about their guilty pleasures.

"We live in a rape culture" has now become a standard slogan in the gender ideology industry. Feminists like saying it, they like writing it and they like getting everyone they can to listen to it. They like this "rape culture" talk a great deal, this cannot be doubted; yet it is an equally unchallengeable fact that feminists who like to talk about "rape culture" are adamant, universally so, in their vocalization of their dislike of the act of rape itself. Now this might not seem so interesting a point to make were it not the case that gender ideologues are constantly caught lying about rape statistics, lying about the matter of false accusations of rape and are in essence perpetuating a fantasy of a "rape culture", rather than identifying and reporting on any authentic rape crime wave or a widespread tolerance of rape.

You see where I am going with this. There is a big fat rape fantasy going on in the perfume-filled back rooms of the feminists and when we look at the nature of the fantasy it turns out that the "rape culture" fantasy falls into the category of "aversive," and when we compare this propagandized group fantasy (which hopes to become a universal mass fantasy) to the incidence among individual women we can see that "aversive" is the least popular kind by far (estimated 9% versus erotic at 45% and mixed at 46%). But origination (among professional gender ideologues) and promulgation (by the same, but with assistance of others, perhaps less involved and informed as to the specious origins of the claim) and reception are not the same as one another.

Those members of the general public, those who receive the advertised fantasy ("we live in a rape culture") may not be having quite the same fantasy experience as those who cooked it up in the first place. My guess is that the popularity of the "rape culture" fantasy, a popularity I believe does indeed exist among large numbers of the receivers of the message, is quite possibly going to be of the mixed variety.

A large share of the public apparently likes to hear about there being an ever-present rape scenario for them to mentally involve themselves in and it is expressed overtly as aversive, but since, for the female portion of the public, the way they elaborate it in their individual fantasy scenario is mixed: they, a large proportion of them, may just have an erotic component to the message they are told to like to hear but which they are told is supposed to be an exclusively aversive message. The public does not, after all, typically follow orders strictly the way the propaganda producers intend them to.

Whatever the case, "rape culture," a fantasy invented by professional gender ideologues as a propaganda campaign that exploits fundamental psychological aspects of the mind is to some large extent now a popular rape fantasy, a constant imaginary rape going on inside the mind at a rate of frequency exponentially higher than that which would ordinarily occur among individuals (one per month). A rape fantasy must have a victim and a rapist, I'm assuming. The fantasy rapist is by definition not a real one. He (when fictional rapist is male) is a made-up idea of a rapist.

A fictional (fantasy) rapist is a false rapist figure, much as a real person falsely accused of rape is a made by the accuser/fantasist into an imaginary rapist (yet real person) who is standing in as a figure for a fictional scenario. A real person who thus, in a sense, gets "invited" into a fake-rape fantasy (except in those cases where rape actually occurred but the wrong person is identified as perpetrator). Perhaps this invitation of a flesh and blood actor into the fantasy adds to the fantasist's excitement. It most does certainly add excitement (of the unpleasant kind) among all those drawn into such a spill-over from fantasy world to real world.

This specific type of rape fantasy, in which no intercourse at all – let alone any rape – actually occurred, but a fantasy did occur and a real person comes to be selected retroactively as the starring actor in the rape fantasy is what prompted me to start dwelling on this murky borderline cross-over between real crimes and the fantasy of crimes that is represented in the "We live in a rape culture" meme. A blurring of reality is encouraged or, rather, it is forced upon the public. The "rape culture" propaganda campaign makes a sort of command: "You shall have a rape fantasy right now and you shall think about inviting the real men around you into the scenario by identifying them as real rapists starring in this prompted fantasy." Whereas the share of all women who, according to the study cited above, engage in self-initiated rape fantasy is only about 25% (and quite possibly a larger share), the ubiquitously advertised product of "rape culture" induces — as it was designed to do — a rape fantasy (of some sort or other) among all women (plus men as well).

The "We live in a rape culture" campaign, I would argue, sends a decidedly mixed message, one that operates both on a conscious and unconscious level.

All my rumination on the topic of rape fantasy has been with the aim of trying to better understand just what is going on in the heads of women who make false rape accusations. Whether the examination above is helpful in clarifying the question or not it does show that the question is a complicated one — one that cannot be explained through examining strictly conscious thought processes at the exclusion of unconscious ones. The less-than-conscious realms of erotic fantasy life must be brought into the analysis if we are going to try to comprehend the phenomenon of the false rape accusation.

Presented below are two cases from a period preceding (by many decades) the introduction of the currently ever-present "We live in a rape culture" propaganda campaign that, given available evidence, fit the type of the rape fantasy in which no intercourse occurred, and in which a stranger is "invited" into the rape fantasy — without any forewarning by the imaginatively active accuser/fantasist.

The first of these two cases, which took place in 1952 in Chicago, involves a chronic schizophrenic, Mrs. Barbara Latimore, who "invited" a stranger she picked out on a bus, Harold Miller to take a real-life role in her rape fantasy world. He was convicted of the imaginary crime and spent four years in prison before family and friends were able to demonstrate that the mental patient accuser's word should never have superseded the testimony at trial of multiple witnesses giving Miller a clear alibi and the medical report showing there was no sign that any rape had occurred.

The second, from 1954 in New York City, involves an at-least-partly alcohol-fueled rape fantasy on the part of a Mrs. Mary Gillen which collared two teenage boys before it became clear that no rape had actually occurred and that the boys never had any contact with her. They were in jail five months before matters were cleared up by an industrious and conscientious member of the prosecution team.

It seems to me that understanding thinking and behavior of false rape accusers will be made easier when we apply what can be learned from the study of the psychology of rape fantasy, and further, that we can better understand the phenomenon of aggressive "rape culture" propagandizing and its effects on individuals' conscious as well as subconscious reception of it and the distortions it may be causing in public policy if we look into thew nexus of rape fantasy/false rape accusation psychology.

There are far too many non-consenting individuals who are receiving the unwanted invitation of "Welcome to my rape fantasy." And there is far too much promulgation of the gender ideologues' fantasy that "Women don't lie about rape." The creation of a grand scale scenario involving an entire sex (the male one) being the subject of a non-consenting conscription into a mass rape fantasy is what we are confronted with in the "We live in a rape culture" public fantasy. This is what seems to be the aim of ambitious and well-funded gender ideologues, and my response to their "welcome," their "invitation," is a firm and permanent "No thank you."

No, I do not consent (enthusiastically or otherwise), to be dragged into your fantasy which states that "we live in a rape culture." Your mixed erotic/aversive fantasy has no appeal to me. I recognize it for what it is, an attempt to tap into the unconscious of a population in order to manipulate that population to serve the agenda of the propagandists who created it. No, I do not wish to participate in your fantasy. Keep your rape fantasy to yourself, in the private realms of your conflicted erotic/aversive mixed-up minds. And keep your delusions of social control power-grabbing to yourself while you're at it. I refuse to participate. I refuse to cooperate. After all, I am the possessor of my own agency, not your object to be acted upon. You, gender ideologues, have, of your own free will, chosen to live in an erotic/aversive rape fantasy sub-culture of your own making. The operative concept is "choice."

Barbara Latimore's rape fantasy: Chicago, Illinois, 1952-1956

Man Wrongly Jailed Four Years Starts Life Anew

Harold Miller, Chicago

FULL TEXT: (Chicago, Illinois) – Life for Harold Miller this week took on all the sweetness of the candy he used to mix before he spent four years in prison for a a crime of which he was falsely accused and convicted – a crime which in all likelihood was only the figment of a tortured mind.

Before his four-year nightmare began, Miller, who is now 31, was a chocolate mixer at a candy company. Quiet and unassuming, he lived with his mother, relaxed after work with his friends and engaged in the usual activities of any normal Chicagoan.

~ RIDING A BUS ~

One fall night in 1951, Miller was riding on a bus, unaware that a woman passenger was pointing him out to her husband as the man who had raped her four nights before. When he left the bus he was trailed by the husband of Mrs. Barbara Latimore, while she rushed to call the police.

Arrested, Miller was accused of having accosted Mrs. Latimore in a vacant lot, dragging her to the rear porch of a house at 3429 S. Indiana ave., and attacking her.

The testimony of free friends – who took lie detector tests – that the accused man had been with them at the time of the alleged rape bore little weight with the police.

Miller was brought to trial, and on May 2, 1952 was sent to prison.

~ HAD FAITH IN HIM ~

But there were people who believed in his innocence. Jim McGuire, Sun-Times Reporter; Roy Woods, Millers stepfather, Charles Lieman, his attorney; and Ken Doughty of the Civil Liberties committee worked tirelessly to clear him.

McGuire died, but the others persevered. They found that Mrs. Latimore was a chronic schizophrenic, who was capable making even the most fantastic lies sound plausible. Two years after the after the alleged attack she was committed to Manento [State Hospital] for a series of shock treatments.

She was released conditionally in Feb. 1954, and her discharge became permanent one year later.

~ NEW TRIAL PLEA ~

On November 10, armed the information about Mrs. Latimore's mental condition, and with the fact that a medical examination had failed to substantiate the claim of rape, Liebman asked Judge A. Sbarbaro, who had sentenced the claim of rape, Liebman appealed to the Illinois Supreme Court, which ordered a new trial.

Last week, three psychiatrists and a psychologist explained to Judge Sharboro the mental delusions under which Mrs. Latimore was suffering at the time of the accusation and pointed out that Miller had been convicted on her testimony alone.

~ AN INJUSTICE ~

Judge Sbarbaro said he would hold a new trial and declared that the conviction had been "an injustice to the individual and to the community."

Miller would not have to endure the ordeal of the new trial, because Assistant States Prosecutor Francis Riley said the state will not re-open the case.

With tears in his eyes, Miller thanked the people who had worked to free him – all that is, except Jim McGuire. But Mrs. McGuire knew how her husband would have felt. She said:

~ JIM NOT PRESENT ~

"It is wonderful. I am sad to think that Jim was not present, but I feel that he won from the grave. This is the third man he had gotten out of prison."

As for Miller, he has no ill-feeling toward anybody. He summoned up his ordeal this way:

"I believe that God and trusted Him all the way. At times, when everything seemed hopeless, I lost faith, but each time it was quickly restored."

Harold Miller was the unfortunate victim of a sad miscarriage of justice. Back home with his mother at 7325 South Parkway, he is adjusting himself to the fact that the future holds more for him than the prospect of life in prison.

He does not know if he will go back to making candy, but of one thing he is certain – life itself had never been so sweet.

Mary Gillen's rape fantasy: New York, N. Y. 1954

FULL TEXT: (New York, N. Y.) — An assistant District Attorney conscientiously switched from public prosecutor to public defender and won vindication yesterday for two teen-age boys falsely accused of attempted rape. They had been released from jail ten days ago after five months imprisonment awaiting trial.

Peter D. Andreoli, of District Attorney Frank S. Hogan's staff, was scheduled to prosecute Enerio Santo, sixteen, and Victor Caban, seventeen, on a four-count indictment charging rape, assault and violation of the Sullivan law.

In studying the case against them, based solely on the testimony of the alleged victim – a fifty-one-year-old woman – the prosecutor came to the conclusion that parts of her story "did not fit."

After thorough investigation. Mr. Andreoli came into General Sessions with new evidence yesterday showing that the woman, Mrs. Mary Gillen, of 44 W. 86th St., had been intoxicated and "had imagined it all happened."

As a result, Judge Harold A. Stevens dismissed the charges against the boys, praised Mr. Andreoli for "excellent work in the highest tradition of the District Attorney's office" and tongue-lashed Mrs. Gillen for "one of the most reprehensible things that the court has experienced."

The boys, both unemployed restaurant workers, were arrested at 2:10 a. m., June 25 in Central Park near W. 88th St., when police found Mrs. Gillen "almost naked" lying on a path near them. Mrs. Gillen charged that they accosted her, forced her into the park at knife-point, tore off her clothes and attempted to rape her

~ Lodged in the Tombs ~

The boys were locked up in default of $10,000 bail each and were lodged in the Tombs waiting trial, scheduled for next week. Mr. Andreoli began working on the case and questioned all concerned.

He obtained from police records the name of a man who had been strolling on Central Park West at the time of the alleged rape. He was John J. Brady, of 58 North Lansing St., Albany.

With the co-operation of Albany police, Mr. Andreoli had Mr. Brady returned to the city. He questioned him and later had the witness confront Mrs. Gillen, Mr. Brady, the prosecutor said, told him that he was helping a crippled woman that morning when Mr. Gillen, whom he described as being drunk, approached him and tried to kiss him. Mr. Brady said he pushed the woman away and watched her “stagger toward the two kids.”

~ Admits Visiting Bars ~

Mr. Adreoli said he then questioned Mrs. Gillen, who admitted she had visited several bars that night and that “her recollection was not too good.” She admitted that Mr. Brady looked “familiar” and then, according to Mr. Andreoli, “admitted that the story she told police was what she imagined had happened as she could not see why she should be in the park with these two boys.”

As a result of his findings, Mr. Andreoli moved on Nov. 30 for parole of the two boys pending of the two boys pending completion of his investigation. Judge Stevens acceded and asserted he did not wish the youths to “spend another minute in jail” if they were innocent.

Judge Stevens dismissed the indictment on Mr. Andreoli’s recommendation and told him:

“When we find an official who not only accept the allegations but, when some occasions arise which create a doubt in his mind he uses all the facilities and resources at his command to ascertain the truth, we feel that he is deserving of the highest commendation, and we do so commend you.”

The feminists' great "equality" lie

Hannah Wallen · 5 November 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Ask a feminist what feminism is about, and the answer you're most likely to get is a statement about fighting for equality. Look carefully at the combination of stances which mainstream, established feminist groups take on intimate partner violence, and "feminism is about fighting for equality" is quickly exposed as a bald-faced lie.

In response to discussion on reciprocal intimate partner violence, and men defending against assault by a female partner, the feminist position is that there is never any circumstance that justifies a man "hitting" a woman. For context, I should point out that in this type of discussion, any use of any kind of physical force or resistance by a man ends up getting described by feminists as "hitting," regardless of the context of the action. If a woman throws a punch at a man, and he puts his arm up to take the punch with his forearm instead of his face or his chest, that's him "hitting." If she jabs at him with a sharp object, and he takes it from her, that's him "hitting." If he can't flee from her assault without going past her, any touch she feels or imagines as he goes by is him "hitting." If, to stop her attempt to hurt him, herself, or anyone else, he physically restrains her with a bear hug, that's him "hitting."

The sheer hypocrisy of the assertion that there could be any reason men should have no right to physically defend themselves from female abusers is evidenced by the use of "battered women's syndrome" as a defense for women who kill their partners. Place the two assertions side by side, and reduce them to their most basic nature, and you have,"it's acceptable to escalate domestic abuse to a more violent level, as long as the person escalating to greater violence is a female claiming self-defense."

Adding to that hypocrisy is that part of the battered woman argument is based on treating the woman as if she's trapped in the relationship. Feminists do not afford abused men the same consideration, even in light of the gender difference in ability to escape an abusive environment, where women arguably have it easier. Abused women (or even allegedly abused women) who decide to leave an intimate partnership have resources every step of the way, especially in the U.S. where domestic abuse law is based on the idea that abusers are men, and victims are women.

Even without alleging abuse, a woman has advantages in leaving a marriage or a partnership which has produced one or more children. In the legal arena, the default standard for her to get at least primary residential custody of the children, and there are many areas in which a divorcing man is expected to at least in part continue to financially support his ex-wife after she no longer lives with him even if there are no children (alimony).

Once abuse is alleged, she has additional support from police, criminal courts, and domestic violence victim's advocacy organizations, who are all geared to think of the accuser as "the victim" from the moment she states her accusation. A woman with victim status is afforded leniency regarding her own behavior, and aggressively protected from conditions to which she might be averse. In the U.S., she is even provided an advocate paid for with federal funding, to see her through the process of prosecuting her alleged abuser.

The combined resources dedicated to abused women will provide her with legal protection, recourse within the criminal justice system, shelter, and financial assistance where needed. Many domestic abuse victim's advocacy organizations will support an accuser in her effort to get custody of and financial support for her children. Her case will be addressed from the position that she is a victim recovering from trauma, with related needs and quirks that must be taken into account. She'll be offered therapy to help her in her recovery. In other words, there is plenty of government-sponsored support for an abused woman to gain freedom from her abuser.

A man doesn't get the same benefits. In addition to the bias against him in civil court which translates into a woman's ability to punish him financially if he chooses to abandon a marriage, as a direct result of feminist activism in the area of domestic violence, despite existing evidence that intimate partner violence is not a gendered issue, systems intended to assist victims are designed to exclude those who are male. Policy at these organizations and agencies is built around a male aggressor/female victim model. Resources are dedicated to accommodating female victims, with little or nothing left for male victims. Instead of the consideration and compassion that gets offered to female victims, the male victim faces marginalization and false labeling. He has a strong chance of being told that victim's advocacy organizations are funded and designed to serve only women, and being given a number for a hotline for men that leads to a system designed to handle abusers seeking psychological treatment, where he'll be treated as such instead of offered assistance for his actual situation.

Organizations which do offer help to men do not offer them assistance that equals what they offer women. Men cannot stay in the same shelter because as men, they're considered dangerous. If housing is offered, it's usually a short stay in a hotel room, which doesn't help men trying to escape abusive partners with their children in tow. Abused fathers who don't want to leave their kids with abusive mothers are shit-outta-luck. They may receive some legal assistance if they're poor enough to qualify, but they won't receive the same level of support in establishing custody of and support for their children as is offered to abused mothers. If that lack of support leaves the abuser with custody of the children, then the burden of making child support payments will be added to the hurdles the abused man faces in his effort to leave the relationship.

Law enforcement is often no help to them, and can even present added danger. In the U.S., mandatory arrest and primary aggressor policies lead police to respond to female-perpetrated partner violence by arresting the victim. In many counties, mandatory prosecution policies guarantee that the injustice begun by arresting the victim will continue with dragging him into court, and putting him through a trial in which he will be accused of violence and face potential jail time.

It's rare for a man abused by his female partner to find adequate assistance within either system, and the law enforcement and justice system may actually add to the abuse instead of helping him to escape from it.

Feminists support the battered women's syndrome murder defense as if violence were the only option available for an abused woman to escape her abuser. The same group has fought to create an environment that punishes men for leaving a relationship with a female partner, and to deny assistance to male victims of female violence. After all of that, now they argue that an abused man genuinely trapped in his environment should not have the right to defend himself from his abuser, and they call any statement to the contrary "apologia" and "endorsement of violence against women."

If the mere suggestion that a trapped male victim of female violence should be allowed to defend himself is endorsement of violence against women…how much more is the effort feminists have made to establish a woman's "right" to abuse her male partner with impunity, with the power to make him stay and take it, an endorsement of violence against men?

But of course, feminism is about fighting for equality…as long as we all understand that some people are more equal than others.

You should really pay attention to Constitutional cases to see how quickly your rights are being cast aside. Hell, it's common practice for today's Court to refer to the government's powers to do x, y or z as the 'right' of the government and to refer to your 'rights' as privileges. For a case in point on this notion of a Constitutional protection being relegated to a privilege, see Salinas V. Texas.

Flight: Robert Zemeckis takes a nosedive

B.R. Merrick · 6 November 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Regular readers may have been wondering where I've been. Well, I've been watching a long, long, terrible movie.

You may have heard of Denzel Washington, an actor who should have gotten his second Oscar for "Malcolm X," a cinematic masterpiece about a flesh-and-blood, complicated, fascinating man. At least he got nominated for it. He was also nominated last year for "Flight," a movie that I was unaware had come out until I curiously checked out Washington's IMDb profile. If you get rid of television, it's amazing what you miss. It's also amazing what you don't miss. If you missed "Flight," you missed a horrific airline disaster sequence that Zemeckis will no doubt be remembered for (as he also directed the plane crash in "Cast Away" which was thankfully free of man-hating). And as you may have guessed from that previous sentence, you also missed the culture of misandry at work. ("Cast Away" is so 2000.) I'm only bringing this movie up so that I can beat on last year's dead horse.

If you sit through the amazing crash scene at the start of the film, one in which Washington's character Captain Whip Whitaker deftly saves more than 100 people from certain death, you may get the idea that you're going to be watching an action thriller, or a movie where the little guy sticks it to The Man, whose cost-saving negligence led to more than 100 people being put into a pile of junk. No, no, dear reader. This is a movie about alcoholism.

Every single goddamned element of what is assumed and expected of men in society, both ancient and modern, is on nauseating display throughout the film, including the good captain giving everyone a thrill by flying a broken plane upside down so that they can pull out of Satan's Own Nose Dive and live.

If you are a typical, modern, heroic male (not one of those cruise liner captains), you can't just try to stop mass death calmly and deliberately. You also have to think about those you're about to leave behind if you don't succeed; and the thoughts and feelings of the women who are about to die with you. Whitaker calls for Margaret, one of the flight attendants, to assist in giving him manual control of the craft. And then, he remembers:

WHIP: Margaret, what's your son's name?

MARGARET: Trevor!

WHIP: Say, 'I love you, Trevor.'

MARGARET: What?!

WHIP: Black box. Say, 'I love you, Trevor.'

MARGARET: I love you, Trevor! You've been a good boy! Mommy loves you!

The good man thinks of everything. He has to. It's even more astounding when you consider that this particular good man did all of this while drunk on vodka and high on coke. Then he rolls the plane upside down to level it parallel with the ground. In reality, there may actually be no way, especially for a passenger jet, to come out of a nosedive and be righted at the last second to land (roughly) on the ground. This should make the event that is central to the first half hour become central and integral to the entire film, shouldn't it?

But let's talk about drinking and snorting. You see, you're not supposed to do that. It really doesn't matter that more than 100 people are still alive thanks to you and only you. How could you do something so disgusting and dangerous? Tell me about your relationship with your father.

I'm not kidding. That's basically the rest of the film. There's a scene in the middle where the suited, overweight airline owner is bitching about how he never wanted to own an airline. The viewer is never introduced to the suited, overweight owner of the manufacturing company, who no doubt only ever wanted to crochet. And not that it should ever be expected, but the women attached to those fatties are non-existent, unlike Ang Lee's masterpiece, "Lust, Caution." None of them is never held to account. I guess that's because they don't drink and snort.

The majority of the movie is swallowed up in Whitaker trying to figure out how he's going to hide his alcoholism and his drug habit in the hearings so that he is not denied his license to fly and is not sent to prison. I'll give away the ending since I have a keen interest in spoiling movies that are already rotting: He gets sent to prison, where, of course, he learns how to deal with his alcoholism. Now he's ready to save more than 100 people from certain death.

He meets a woman: a poor, heroine-addicted redhead, who has an abusive male landlord, groping and assaulting her since she's late with the rent. Whitaker saves her. (Great. Now save your*self*, dude!) This woman also has a father who just magically disappeared. That's more and more typical in our society, but the reasons for this particular disappearance are never explained, leading the viewer to think that her father is just one more deadbeat dad. The real reasons for disappearing dads don't exist in lefty-femmy Hollywood. Don't worry about the redhead's mother, though. She was a saint. Why, she even died a martyr to breast cancer! Anyway, this woman becomes Whitaker's angel, confronting him about his alcoholism since that's far more important than honoring his achievement.

He meets Margaret again at the funeral services for one of their coworkers who didn't survive the crash. Margaret, standing with Trevor, looks incredulously at Whitaker as he implies that maybe she could just lie at the hearing concerning the two empty bottles of vodka that the crash investigators found in the plane's trash container. Well, thanks for getting her back with Trevor, but geez! You want her to lie to a bunch of liars who get in bed with lying, corporate airline owners and lying, corporate manufacturers about your drinking? Tell me about your earliest days in school.

He goes to speak with the squeaky-clean co-pilot in his hospital room, a man who was close to useless in two critical moments due to a virtually unprecedented failure of the aircraft. The man's body now broken, a brief word about his piloting days over forever, his robotic Christian wife spouting "PRAISE JESUS!" every other line; and we hear very little from either one of them again. In spite of Whitaker's amazing maneuver that allowed the co-pilot to live and build a new life with his family PRAISE JESUS!, he is also disgusted with Whitaker's drug taking.

Is there anyone who is not concerned with it? Not his ex-wife or his teenage son. They are both aware of what their ex-husband and father did. They are aware of the fact that he was probably high and drunk while doing it. They are aware that more than 100 people were saved. But he's not even wanted through the front door. Why? Because he showed up a little drunk. Not abusively drunk. Not rampaging. Not accusatory. Not mean-spirited. He yells that his wife is living in a house that he still pays for. She has one son. It's a huge, capacious home with far more space than a single woman with a grown son needs, but the landlord is not welcome. Still, the landlord tries to throw his arms around his son to hug him even after his son becomes violent. He never threatens or assaults either of them, but the hero of the story has to stop being a happy drunk. Come back when you're sober and sad. Then we'll celebrate the wonderful, amazing, impossible thing that you did to save people who don't drink and snort. When they're piloting shitty, corporate, government-regulated jets.

An entire community of characters surrounds Whitaker in this film like a gigantic AA meeting (one of which he attends) to completely ignore the fact that he should probably be awarded The Presidential Medal of Freedom, if that award actually means anything. How about a promotion? How about a body of experts who can actually pay out some justice to the traumatized survivors and the victims' families; by holding to account for their negligence the people who are actually responsible for the deaths of eight other people? How about a ticker tape parade for Whitaker and an appearance on the OWN network?

That'll happen. Once we tweak this one man to make just one thing about him just a little bit better.

Whitaker's lawyer, played safely but ably by Don Cheadle, actually gets to the heart of what a sensible, intelligent person would conclude when given all of the facts of the story: he reveals what the entire film should have been about. It could easily have been a far more objective, and hence better, work of art if the following exchange had been somewhere near the climax of the film, so that the viewer could decide for herself whether Whitaker should be praised or damned:

LAWYER: You know, when I first met you, I couldn't believe what a drunk, arrogant scumbag you were.

WHIP: Oh really?

LAWYER: Yeah.

WHIP: Oh, thank you. Thank you.

LAWYER: But I did the research, Captain Whitaker. I heard the expert analysis, and I gotta tell you, I'm in awe of what you did. The FAA and the NTSB took ten pilots, placed them in simulators, re-created the events that led to this plane falling out of the sky. Do you know how many of them were able to safely land the planes? Not one.

If none of them was doing a line at the time, I don't think a crash simulation has actually recreated events, do you?

To paraphrase PRAISE JESUS!, we apparently now live in a culture that strains at gnats while swallowing camels. To translate what He said into modern English, we live in a culture that clearly has it ass-backwards.

For example: Firemen are blue collar to the core. Blue collar work is hard. I've done it briefly. I detest it. I'm not very good at it. They are stronger and tougher. Even when they're lazy, they get the work done far faster than I.

Physical strength and toughness come out in grunting spurts, even when you're dealing with a super-intelligent tough guy. You will even find the quieter or dumber ones bolder and steadier. It's what makes them sexy and a little dangerous. Our culture takes that and exploits it for political and monetary gain.

Then, when those firemen run up the stairs in a useless attempt to make themselves seem useful in an impossible situation, they are rewarded with makeshift road signs and horn honking. And then: "Now stop looking at my boobs!" He stopped looking when those buildings exploded, dear. Now he is consigned to the memorial plaque like all the men who went before him. And he left you the house. You're welcome.

I simply can't believe that this movie was that transparent. What is also crystal clear is the culture's opacity in this regard, as the film did quite well worldwide. They simply don't see it, either.

This is because humans come out of women. They are tiny and helpless when they emerge. In order to survive, someone bigger and smarter must really want them around. How about the one that made the baby inside of her? Women, when separated from the convenience of modern machinery, are far more likely to be seen with children attached to various anatomical parts. How does this not automatically lead to a greater propensity for collective thinking?

The man has no children attached to him. He is also far stronger physically and hairier so that he can deal with wind and cold for longer. How does this not automatically lead to a greater propensity for individual thinking, since, even though there is a dependent collective with adequate adult intellectual support on the home front, he still has to think about the fact that he will be alone for longer to retrieve whatever is required back there? Therefore, after a few weeks of silent deliberation, our distant ancestors got on with the business of determining who should do what. They called it "sex roles." It was turned into a very popular musical in 750 BC.

Well, since the kid will die without breast milk, maybe you should stay with him. I'll go chop down the trees, remove the branches, remove the thorny thistles, step in the gunk, chop the tree into logs, remove the logs, branches, and thorny thistles, then I'll spend the evening chopping the tree stump out of the ground.

While I'm doing that, could you clean this? And this? And this? And make one of these? Thanks, babe. I'll be thanking you good and hard when the moon rises over the mountain.

Now to remove the rocks. A domesticated animal would help. So I'll find something to feed it, shovel the shit, and deal with its bad attitude. Get dinner ready, because this is going to make me hungry.

After several months of this repetitive, seemingly fruitless labor, something that can be eaten will start to grow out of the ground. Wait a minute. Oh my god, are you smoking pot??!! Forget it. I'm tired of explaining world history. And Robert Zemeckis movies.

I've had it. Next time, I'm whipping out my Pierce Brosnan. Not a review of the actual film I'm talking about, but

How “Game” turns you into a joke

Jalon Cain (aka Aaron Sleazy) · 6 November 2013 · Archived copy · Original

One of the biggest problems of our gynocentric culture is the constant pampering to the erratic behavior of women. The dating arena is a prime example of this. I won’t ridicule mainstream dating advice. That the “walking wallet” strategy is dubious at best should be common knowledge by now. Instead, I want to attack a particular corner of the Internet that proclaims that they have the solution to the dating problem: the so-called seduction community. A lot of the criticism applies to the “manosphere” as well, though.

What struck me always as absurd was that those alleged seduction gurus didn’t teach men to “man up”. No, not in the “be a real man and marry some washed up chick in her late 30s”, but for real. They just don’t tell you to stand up for yourself. No, instead you are supposed to become an expert on astrology, religion, gossip, and all kinds of frivolous nonsense. This alone should make any reasonably smart man very skeptical. Even if this stuff worked — wouldn’t you want to have an at least halfway intelligent woman instead?

That’s not all, because mainstream seduction gurus also tell you how you should react to her boorish behavior. They call it “shit tests” when she’s acting rude towards you, and tell you to “just keep plowing, bro!” Do you know what any guy with an inkling of self-respect would do? If she’s unfriendly, you just move on, but if she’s rude to you, you can just tell her to go fuck herself. Amazingly, some women are so screwed up that they’ll get turned on by that and start chasing after you.

The women you’re interacting with are supposed to be adults, but if she behaves like a spoiled teenager, you have the choice of either confronting her or trying to change her behavior. Have fun with that! What also works is to not bother with her and looking for a more mature woman instead. By “mature” I don’t mean some woman past 30 who desperately tries to get pregnant or married or both, but a woman with a modicum of mental maturity. Mental maturity doesn’t depend so much on age. There are plenty of shockingly immature 40 year old people — men and women — around.

Let me just dwell on this topic a bit longer. Probably any guy who ever asked a girl out on a date, or asked her whether she wanted to “hang out” will have experienced that some girls just flake on you. No, they don’t cancel. Instead, they just don’t show up. A smart way of dealing with this problem is to schedule your dates so that your loss of time is at an absolute minimum. Let’s say you keep your gym bag in the car, and if she’s ten minutes late, you hop in your car and are on your way.

It is not the case that women are unaware that they flake on you. I guess the “patriarchy” keeps them down so that they can’t pick up their phone and text you, or just say “no” in the first place. What do those ridiculous dating coaches tell you, though? They talk about “contingency plans”. You’re supposed to keep sending her text messages to “build comfort”, and if she flakes on you, you’re supposed to act as if nothing happened or even pretend that you (!) missed the date, and tell her that you’re sorry and would like to meet up some other time.

I mean, whom are those “pickup artists” kidding? Even if you managed to eventually win such a girl over, what kinds of precedents did you set? If anything, the girl now knows that she can walk all over you, and that you’ll happily take her abuse. She knows that you’re a complete fucking idiot who happily gives up his self-respect for the remote chance to get some pussy. As if pussy was the solution to anything! Instead of calling her out on her bullshit, you invite her to abuse you some more, and you even make excuses for her shitty behavior. This is nothing but absurd. Congratulations, you’ve turned yourself into what they call a “mangina.” Yes, this — “game”, they call it — is the supposed alternative to mainstream dating advice. It’s laughable.

Moms can't be dads, too

Suzanne Venker · 7 November 2013 · Archived copy · Original

I could never raise my son without his father. I'd have to, of course, if my husband died. But it would be very, very hard. When it comes to my son, my husband is simply indispensable. (He's indispensable to me, too, but that's a different post!)

I wish every boy in America had a father like my son's. Without strong fathers to guide, instruct and discipline them, boys lack purpose. And that's what we have far too much of in America today: boys who lack purpose.

According to the Census Bureau, 24 million children in America live in biologically father-absent homes. The results are mind-boggling. "Virtually every major social pathology has been linked to fatherlessness: violent crime, drug and alcohol abuse, truancy, teen pregnancy, suicide. All correlate more strongly to fatherlessness than to any other single factor," writes Stephen Baskerville in "The Politics of Fatherhood."

Fatherlessness hurts sons and daughters, of course. But I'm focusing on males for several reasons. (1) Our culture spends enough time on women and girls and not nearly enough on boys and men. (2) Males are different from females in that they have a propensity to act out on their personal pain, and society suffers as a result. Women's pain is more internally focused. (3) Boys are 'men in the making' and are therefore harmed by fatherlessness in a primal and unique way.

The reality is, I can't be Dad. No matter how much I love my son, I can never identify with his masculinity. I can't know or feel it the way his father can. I can't teach my son what it means to be a man. I can't help him navigate puberty the way I can my daughter. Boys need men.

The first time my son attended a sports camp run by men (as opposed to a basic day camp run mostly by women), his entire face lit up. He was engaged. Excited. Interested. He felt an immediate sense of purpose—as if to say, "Now this adult gets me."

Still, even father substitutes can't be Dad. The consequence of boys who grow up without fathers is so severe I don't think any woman should divorce her husband unless he's a chronic adulterer, addicted to drugs, a wife-beater, or just a really bad parent. Sometimes a so-so father can be better than no father.

When my son is with me, I know he feels loved beyond measure. But when he's with his dad, he feels loved and he feels understood. And purpose-driven—that's key. What my husband brings to the table that I don't is immeasurable. I try hard to be the best mom I can be. But no matter how hard I try, I can never be Dad.

Street Harassment: Reality or feminist hyperbole?

Jalon Cain (aka Aaron Sleazy) · 7 November 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Feminist blogs tends to give me the impression that those people live in a fantasy world. Of course, the automatic response is that due to all the white male privilege I enjoy, I'm not able to perceive the plight of the oppressed. Yet another one of those tools of suppression is the recent phenomenon of "street harassment" that leads to the consequence that instead of running errands, women nowadays run the gauntlet whenever they leave the house because there are hordes of men harassing them.

Never heard of "street harassment"? Don't worry, you're in good company, because before a few years ago Google didn't know much about it either.

There is certainly a lot of excitement online nowadays about "street harassment". I don't have to link to Jezebel, but other sites you may not be familiar with include Hollaback!, Stop Street Harassment, or a relatively active Tumblr blog with the all-caps title HOW MANY WOMEN FIND STREET HARASSMENT FLATTERING?

I can only encourage you to check out some of those sites since they make for a bemusing reading. Don't be surprised if something doesn't make much sense to you. You might even be surprised that "street" is interpreted rather generously. As a warmup, read how Laura was "channeling her inner wonder woman", not on the street but in a bar:

> "There was one night when one of the wait staff a friend of mine had a drink poured over her head by a guy because she didn't get it to him fast enough. So I was already pissed off. Then as I was making my way thru the crowd to take orders without a huge tray of drinks and some guy grabbed me in the crotch and gave me a "hey baby". Really? Without much thought I turned on the asshole, channeled my inner wonder woman, grabbed him by the front of the shirt and slammed him against the wall. I remember yelling something about "don't you ever" with my finger in his face, and I don't know who was more surprised- him, me or his friends. Felt good, and a little bit scary."

Oh, I totally believe you, Laura! Probably she's been using steroids, because otherwise I wouldn't be able to explain how she was able to "slam" that guy against the wall. Please note that she was in the middle of a crowd, so she presumably grabbed that sucker, levitated, and flew him right into a wall of bricks.

Sure, I get it, sometimes men are a bit too aggressive when they fancy a woman and do something inappropriate. It's just the same with drunk women who grab your ass or rub your chest. This tends to come out of nowhere because you weren't even paying attention to those women to begin with. They are simply invisible. To deal with it, you either ignore her or you say to her that she's probably been drinking a bit too much, and that's it. Women are used to rejecting men, too, but normally they aren't quite as polite.

However, the problem is that women do not communicate specific interest, but instead tend to present themselves so that they are appealing to men in general. So they doll themselves up, grab one of their single girlfriends, and spend three hours at a bar, standing there and hoping that one of the guys there will like her. It's all well and good if the dude looks like the hunks she has threesomes with in her wet dreams. If not, then she has the option of drinking a bit more, or to turning the guys down and complaining to her girlfriends that men are "such pigs."

In the curious case of "street harassment" the same principles apply. She dolled herself up, and maybe she was even planning to "go shopping", and for hours went through the clothes racks in her favorite boutiques, hoping that some guy will zoom in on her obvious hints. Of course, it had better be the right guy. If Brad Pitt told her she's got a nice dress, she'd feel flattered. However, if those words come out of the mouth of a guy she finds repelling, for whatever reason, it'll then be a case of sexual harassment. Needless to say, this double standard doesn't make much sense if you think about it for a minute or two. But thinking is hard, and two minutes is an awful lot of time.

To me this hullabaloo about “street harassment” looks like a thinly veiled attempt by feminists to get attention. However, if you asked any halfway good-looking, popular, or wealthy guy how often he got hit on by girls he didn’t fancy, he’d have quite a few stories to share. I can’t even count how many times women pinched my ass or rubbed my abs in the club, in the most inappropriate ways, like sneaking up sideways and trying to cop a feel. The percentage of those women I found attractive was a low single-digit number. Still, in those few cases I appreciated that they made things very easy for me, but the others I just ignored. There is no need to be a dick about it and humiliate those homely women who hit on you just because they’ve had a drink too many.

Even worse, if you’re a reasonably good-looking man you not only get hit on by women that make you puke. No, you’ll also have to deal with guys who feel insecure about their own sexuality. I don’t think it’s common at all that guys shout “slut” at random girls. I’ve been called “gay” or a “fucking faggot” by guys plenty of times, though, and also by girls who felt offended by my lack of interest in them. Of course you’ve got to be gay if you don’t show any interest in a woman that looks like a dog. People can be pretty rude, and women are often as bad if not worse than guys. None of this has to lead to any kind of “trauma”, though. Oh, and we guys don’t have the need to create attention-seeking websites about our poor lives because some dude called us “faggot” or some ugly chick at the bar tried grabbing our junk.

Having established that both men and women can be assholes, what does this leave us with? One conclusion is that maybe, just maybe, feminists blow those incidents way out of proportion. I’m not saying that “street harassment” does not exist. For instance, there are clearly cultural differences, and foreigners living abroad may not always adhere to local customs. I don’t want to single out particular cultures or races, but I certainly had the impression that in some area in, say, Berlin or London, foreign men approach local women in ways that are quite inappropriate. Discussing this issue would mean that I’d have to open an entirely different can of worms, though.

Another problem are “pickup artists.” If you dig around online, you quickly find stories of guys who got banned from shopping malls or college campuses. Sure, if you walk around hitting on three dozen girls in an hour, no matter how disinterested they may look, most if not all won’t be pleased. This is an issue of a lack of social tact among “PUAs,” though, and shouldn’t be held against regular well-adjusted guys. In that case, a failed attempt at flirting with a girl is just that.

There is no need trying to attempt to publicly shame normal guys. Girls, think a bit further ahead: what if all your campaigning led to men not hitting on you at all anymore? I mean all men, not just those you for some reason don’t like. It’s not as if we can read your mind, just like you can’t read ours. Surely, being ignored by all men isn’t what you wanted either. This seems to happen to more and more women, though. Just Google for a phrase like “where have all the good men gone”, and you will get to read countless sob stories. Campaigning against “street harassment”, which doesn’t seem to deserve the attention feminists think it should get, will only make even more women wonder where all those good men are. Chances are they didn’t bother paying any attention to you in the first place.

Job-Hunting in Germany? Better be a Woman.

Jalon Cain (aka Aaron Sleazy) · 7 November 2013 · Archived copy · Original

There is rampant discrimination against men in Western societies, and a lot of it is has been discussed here on AVfM. Let me continue this tradition by giving an example of institutionalized pro-female bias in Germany. Obviously, since women have it so tough and not only live longer and retire earlier, they all also deserve nice cushy jobs. What better place to look for than any job related to the government?

If you've got a minute or two, then copy and paste the following line into Google, and look at hundreds of thousands of results:

> Frauen werden bei gleicher Eignung, Befähigung und fachlicher Leistung bevorzugt berücksichtigt, sofern nicht in der Person eines Mitbewerbers liegende Gründe überwiegen.

Roughly translated: "Women will be, given equal ability, competence, and professional achievement, preferred." The other part of the sentence is pretty vague. In fact, the entire statement is pretty nonsensical since there is just no way that two people will ever be assessed to be exactly equal. This would only happen if you used very crude metrics. "Human resources" departments often do that, but they then normally proceed ranking applicants on an ordinal scale, from most to least desirable. If this happens, it is just not possible that you'll end up with two candidates that are "equal" since one of them will rank higher than the other.

As I'm typing this, Google returns 274,000 results for the phrase quoted above.

If you think that this is a lot, then you should know that this sentence is a legal requirement for all job ads that related to the government. We're talking about an enormous number of jobs here, affecting administration, almost the entire education sector from elementary school to university, the social security system, and a very large part of the health care system, among many, many others. In short, if you're looking for a job in Germany, you are very likely to encounter this example of discrimination against men.

Needless to say, there is no preference whatsoever in fields where there is only a minority of men. Nobody cares about equality in those circumstances. I didn't have to spend much time until I found an ad by a nursery college that counts zero men among its faculty

Of course even there they have to preferentially consider women. They're legally bound, after all.

[image]

The hypocrisy is staggering, considering that I've never encountered a phrase along the lines that given equal qualifications men will be preferentially hired. I'm pretty sure that if you are an employer in Germany and dared to write in your job ad that you prefer men, you'll find yourself in several lawsuits.

This is just one aspect of the anti-male bias that is common in Germany. Of course, Germany isn't the only place we're seeing things like this, but it does serve to remind that discrimination against men is a growing and global phenomenon.

Kennesaw State University Men: a success story

Sage Gerard (Victor Zen) · 8 November 2013 · Archived copy · Original

On November 6th, KSU Men (KSUM) has been approved by the Student Activities and Budget Advisory Committee (SABAC) of Kennesaw State University. The video above plays a recording of the speech I gave to SABAC. Representation for men and boys has now spread to academia in the Southeast United States. I will be serving as the president until December 2014, and KSUM will outlive my time on campus. I have three awesome people helping me run the organization, and I could not ask for a better lineup. KSUM's administration is split 50/50 between men and women, and the students who support us are diverse.

I want to thank both the staff and membership of AVFM, NCFM, and AVFMS for all of their gracious support. None of this would have happened if it were not for your confidence in me.

As Promised

I will now deliver what was promised in the KSUM fundraiser. Here are receipts for the major purchases made for KSUM promotion. If you have been following me on my blog, you have seen these already. Since there was nothing in the budget for hiring designers, the print graphics are of my design.

1. GOPRO Chest Mount
2. KSUM Banner [reciepts][print graphic]. Originally I was going to get a printed tablecloth, but that cost twice as much. The banner fulfilled the same function.
3. KSUM Handouts [receipts] [front][back]

The rest of the money has been dedicated to gasoline for the car and food for upcoming meetings. Since everything was local, I spent more time on foot than in the car. That's why the gas costs were so low even though a lot of time was spent on this project.

I also promised you all knowledge in exchange for your support. I will now present you a log so that you can learn from my experience. Be warned, this is a lot of information so please bear with me. If you are a MHRA enrolled in college, I will be telling you some things to expect when starting an organization. Note that this article is breadcrumbs in a forest. Your experience will be unique, and there are no guarantees. By observing what I have done, my hope is that you will get some idea of how you can navigate your own circumstances.

What to Expect

1. Hard work. You will be running around everywhere, and your patience will be tested every day.
2. The law. Read your university's student handbook and any relevant state, province or national code to learn the ropes. When you read legal code, do NOT skim. You cannot afford to misconstrue anything. Don't read cover to cover, just check the books before making important decisions. Take any legal questions to your campus' legal council. If you are a student, you should not be charged if you keep things quick.
3. Bullshitters. Forget about people who do not return your calls or live up to their word. They don't care about you.
4. Rivals. Some people will face you with red tape or worse. If you have done nothing wrong, use the law and a recording device to your advantage. Accountability is your sword.

The Story of KSUM

All times are in EST (GMT-5) and are recorded in 24-hour format.

The Gentlemen's Club

On February 20th 19:00, I attended a men-only meeting called The Gentlemen's Club. Only three men were present, including myself. I reacted to the meeting positively. Dr. Faust, the counselor facilitating the discussion, asked me to meet him and his colleague Dr. Griggs. A week later I take questions from the AVFM community to bring to the counselors. On March 11th 18:00, I met the counselors to discuss TGC. We talked about TGC policy, and I learned that the counselors wished to regulate member communication. Members had to sign a paper agreeing to not socialize with other members outside of the meetings. TGC was essentially a locked-down group therapy session, and the doctors wanted me to "recruit members" (in other words, find patients). TGC wanted nothing to do with activism. They only wished to "fix broken men," in the words of Dr. Faust. They declared AVFM and my own activism "militant" and started to ask me invasive questions about my personal life.

I dropped contact with TGC even though TGC seemed to be the best KSU had to offer men.

Getting My Shit Together

I decided to make the change I wanted to see. At first I thought I wanted a safe space for men, but then I realized that wasn't going to help much in the long run. What I wanted was to squash gynocentrism in any local policy, and I knew there were men and women out there who wanted to help. On May 31st, I interviewed Paul Elam on starting a men's group and on the MHRM. On July 8th 17:15, I spoke to NCFM Campus Coordinator Chris Thompson for advising. Chris suggested targeting fraternities for signatures, while warning me of the kind of backlash to expect. [1][2][3] I did not get any good results from KSU fraternities or sororities. On August 1st 18:43 I saved an early draft of what would become the KSUM constitution. The KSUM constitution is heavily influenced by Chris Thompson's NCFM chapter bylaws. By this day, I have collected all needed documentation from KSU to start obtaining signatures from the Kennesaw State University Student Life offices.

For those of you looking to get started, this should tell you to go to your campus student center and start asking about forms to fill out to start an organization. If you don't know where to go, just ask anybody behind a desk. Chances are good that someone who cannot help you will know someone who can. I got a packet with a student petition and some forms identifying co-founding officers. Most of my signatures came from asking friends, which meant the table events I held in the future were dedicated more to officer recruitment.

By August 13th I got some cheap posters up asking for volunteers to act as officers. Lots of them were torn down because that always fucking happens. Later I wandered around "The Cubes," a set of cubicles where student organizations work. I took my time until the 26th to learn about campus policies and the law. AVFM forum members were a big help on this front.

I started to get nervous about the lack of student concern over men's issues. I made an appointment with a faculty member on August 29th 15:52 and learned about setting up a table to promote KSUM. I went back to the AVFM forums on September 2nd 08:45 to bounce ideas off people on how to make good use of a table for a promotional event. A fundraiser for KSU Men's promotion started on September 16th 9:34 with Paul Elam's blessing. The $500 goal was reached at 16:40 the same day.

Some Asshole Grabbed Me for No Reason

To give the donors an idea of where things were going on, I went to KSU to film The Commons, a cafeteria on Kennesaw State University. I was grabbed by the shoulder by a staff member who told to stop recording. This person did not work in security, but I complied and asked where I could get permission to record the campus. I went to the University Relations office to get permission to record students for my table events. The lady I spoke to was okay with it, so long as I had permission from the offices nearest where my events were being held.

On September 16th, I stopped by the KSU Social Sciences and Humanities building to ask about recording the second table event. My email was CC'd all over the place and I got several responses from staff on the 17th. They even roped in the campus attorney. I was told that I could not record anyone without every student's explicit written consent. This turned out to be false. There was no campus policy stating this. I live in Georgia, USA. O.C.G.A. §16-11-62 states the conditions in which I can or cannot record people. Since I was a student on a public university in the middle of a high traffic area, no student had a reasonable expectation to privacy since we were all in public view. I needed no consent. I approached the campus attorney about the situation and told him that a staff member who did not work in security grabbed me to enforce a policy that did not exist. The attorney commended my correct reading of state law and explained that I was told not to record so that the school could avoid frivolous lawsuits filed by oversensitive students that expect privacy in public areas. Such cases were almost always thrown out, but it takes time and money to do that.

KSU had a valid concern, but their concern did not excuse how they handled me. I was told a lie that affected my rights as a student. The attorney and I came to an understanding that I could record the event if I left a warning that the event was being recorded. To the attorney's credit, he was remarkably understanding and supportive of the group.

Things to note:

1. If you are right, do not back down.
2. Know the law, and know campus policies.
3. If someone who is not in security lays a hand on you without just cause, raise all nine circles of Hell. If your university tries to force you to follow policies that do not exist, you can make a harassment claim and report anyone involved in the harassment.

By September 24th, I had obtained all materials for the table by going to a local print shop to get the banners and the handouts produced. The chest mount was purchased from Wal-Mart (no sense paying for shipping/handling). On September 28th 9:00, the first KSUM table was hosted in front of the Commons. Since I was still alone at this point and did not want anyone messing with the stuff on the table, I sat out there for the full six hours with no lunch or bathroom break. The response was positive, yet underwhelming. The second event was held in the social sciences building, which had more interesting results (more on that in a moment).

The GOPRO I was wearing on my chest was enclosed in a case, so the video footage has muffled audio. The fact that the GOPRO died while the phone was still recording audio made it impossible to piece together a complete video. However, I do have valuable footage of how to set up an awesome table for you all to use as a reference. Check it out, and make sure you can see annotations on YT videos because they provide a lot of good information. You won't see these annotations on many mobile devices, so watch this video on a laptop or desktop.

http://youtu.be/xcgC0ej7P_c

Learn from my mistakes:

1. Find friends to help you before campaigning. Have someone around to hold a camera or watch your stuff if you need to wander off. While I did have your moral and financial support, I spent most of my time working alone in my community, which really sucks.
2. If you use a GOPRO, note that the microphone can't hear things more than three feet away very well. Closing it in a case on a chest mount does not exactly help matters. You need a condenser microphone like the Sony ECM-DS70P and a skeleton case for the GOPRO if you want good sound quality. Be warned that bootleg microphones are sold on Ebay, and may not actually work (If the price seems too good to be true, it is).

I published available officer positions on KSU Men's blog on October 4th. Jonathan Taylor graciously helped get the word out. The second KSUM table event was hosted in the KSU Social Sciences and Humanities building on Monday, October 21st. I was alone again, but thankfully not for long. The man who is now my VP approached the table and said “I’m in. What do I do?” His cool wife also came by and signed up as the treasurer. Interestingly, as the treasurer and I were talking, a feminist approached the table and tossed down a folded, hastily-written hate note before storming off without a word. The paper was crumbled, the side was torn and the grammar was, in a word, “special.”

Look at a picture of my table —which is all the feminist saw—, and please explain to me the logical connection between my table and her note.

[image]
Feminist: “Patriarchal, white supremacist, motherfucking fuck fuck…”
The girl threw justification for KSUM right into my lap, so naturally I got the note laminated.

[image]
Insanity, now in plastic!
The constitution was ratified on October 28th, and on November 6th, KSUM was approved as a new entity.

What Now?

KSUM is the result of almost ten months of research and work, and we are only just getting started. We have fundraisers to hold, food to cook and meetings to host. There are still standing threats to the organization, such as feminist co-option, student protest and other forms of administrative intervention. After all, KSUM is going to try and change policy. We hit a milestone, but shit can still go wrong and we have to be ready for that. When officers leave KSUM, others will be elected to maintain the organization. I cannot prevent gynocentrists and misandrists from taking the helm during future elections, but I will do my best to make it hard for them to steer the ship off-course.

Supporting KSUM

Your support is what got this organization started, and your continued support can only help KSUM grow. A new donation page is available if you want to help us feed members, hire speakers and organize local activist projects. I plan to approach the KSU Security Department to talk about their R.A.D. courses, and approach the gender studies department about their required reading.

Conclusion

Let’s recap. If you are a college student, we need you to start organizations on college campuses to help men. The bottom line is three-fold:

1. To love and respect men as human beings.
2. To presume a man is innocent until proven guilty.
3. To reverse any policy that does not like #1 or #2.

Once you start the process of getting an organization ready, you will gain experience and naturally see the options available to you as you go. My experience generated a lot of content to absorb, so I invite you to leave any questions you have in the comment section below. Your experience will differ, so if you still don’t know what to do, that’s okay. I did not know what to do when I started, either. To be honest, to some degree I still don’t know what to do now. You simply can’t know everything in this game. Accept that the results are uncertain and move forward anyway. When you go out and make something happen, the fear that paralyzes others like you will weaken. Even if you fail, the worst case scenario is that we all learn something. And even then, the failures you experience will most likely not stop you from trying again. Failure and mistakes are just things that show up before success, so don’t let them stop you. Keep losing until you win.

But let me tell you “a thing,” to borrow a phrase from my brainless friend: you need to get over fear. Any worry you may feel about taking on the system is understandable, but that worry is exactly what keeps things the same. No one is expecting you to change the world, but you need to do something. An organization is no small task, but the current war against the gynocentric powers that be is in academia. Plant your foot on campus, read the policies, decide what needs to change and do what you need to do to change it.

Get up, get out, and do what is right. I will root for you.

GMP: Fathers are not important

Paul Elam · 8 November 2013 · Archived copy · Original

The Good Men Project (GMP) recently ran an article by Suzanne Venker about the importance, indeed irreplaceability of fathers in the lives of children. Venker supported her contentions by pointing to the spectrum of psychological and social maladies which are inarguably much more likely to befall fatherless children than those whose nuclear family remains intact.

She also conveyed a deep sense of appreciation for her husband and his importance in her life and the life of their son. The tone of the article was upbeat, affirming and positive about the importance of men and masculinity, particularly in the lives of children.

Of course, GMP quickly realized their mistake and took the article down.

And now, if you click through a link to the article you will get the following message where the piece on fathers used to be:

> Editor's Note: We have removed the content of this article.
> The content that formerly appeared here did not reflect The Good Men Project's views or position and rest assured that we will work to ensure that a mistake like this won't happen again.

I am not even going to pretend to be shocked by this. I won't trot out the almost obligatory "WTF" or "wut." I won't use feigned surprise to speculate on what could possibly possess GMP management, on a website allegedly dedicated to the goodness of men. to decide that an article actually about the goodness of men did not reflect their views, and was, in fact, a mistake to publish.

I won't do any of that because GMP is showing, which it rarely does, 100% complete and transparently pure honesty about what their message is really about.

Bookmark that page for posterity.

For those who don't understand what GMP is up to, which is to say those of you who have never read it, you first have to wade through at least some of their bullshit. The first and most glaring of pile of said BS is that the Good Men Project is a publication that openly explores, from a diverse group of writers and thinkers, what it means to be a good man.

Hell, GMP is not for or about men at all, much less good ones.

No, if you want to understand what the Good Men Project is about you have to look past their blatantly misleading title, scrap their about page, which is hysterical when you know how fallacious it is, and pretty much ignore what anyone associated with the publication will tell you about their intent.

Just as it is in so many other things in life, to understand the real picture you have to follow the money, which is to say in this case follow the audience. If you want to know what the Good Men Project is about, all you have to know is who it is written for. You have to know who reads it. And that much is pretty easy to answer.

Let's take a quick look at their demographics, supplied by alexa.com.

[image]

Funny what a little information, sans the spin, will do for achieving some clarity.

What are we to make of a publication, man-obsessed in appearance and content, but with the pesky little sticking point that it has almost no male readers?

The answer to that is in the content, both what is present on its pages, and what has been expediently torn from its archives when things got a little too real; when its female dominated and patently pro-feminist audience cried foul.

At GMP, amid a handful of milquetoast offerings that contain politely phrased and questionably sincere objections to the treatment of men in modern culture, you will find a deluge of feminist propaganda, manhood advice from women, pablum on how to have hot sex and features on assorted forms of victim politics.

If you check out the current numero uno Editor's Pick, you find Dale Thomas Vaughn mindlessly pontificating about how feminism has cured war, pestilence, toe fungus and masculinity in just forty years. His only remaining question was where women would send men in the future and if facial hair and being white would be allowed.

The Good Men Project? Nah, it's COSMO with a dick painted on the cover and the "sensibilities" of modern feminists flatly trumping anything real or positive about men.

It is a publication for women who hate men but are probably still looking for Prince Nutless to show up at the door and validate every psychotic thought in their ideology-addled heads forever after. And it is for a very small minority of men so spineless and obsequious that they will happily take the regular beatings that come with the occasional pat on the head and a "good boy."

Sorry, but it has to be said: It is not the Good Men Project. It is the Good Boy Project. Management knows their bread and butter and won't have it any other way.

The removal of Venker's article was anything but surprising. Fathers are essential? Irreplaceable? Not to a hoard of entitled consumers, most of whom have already completely shortchanged their children by selfishly running their fathers far, far out of their lives. And you can bet they blazed a trail to write in and complain about being reminded of it. The avoidance of richly deserved shame can produce missionary zeal.

What Venker really reminded these women of is what they are not. She reminded them of the fatherly love that cannot reside in their hearts and the paternal human connection that cannot exist in their lives. I have no doubt that more than a few women who read that article were already witnessing the harsh consequences of their decisions playing out in the increasingly dysfunctional lives of their sons and daughters.

All that is enough for a death knell in a place like GMP, but Venker also committed the worst of all sins. She demonstrated to these women that indeed, not all women are like them. I lay dollars to doughnuts they hated her guts for it. They wanted her discredited and denounced. But most of all they wanted her gone so that they could return to the comfort of their bitterness and denial.

The promise by GMP that they would never, ever, ever make such a terrible mistake as to run that kind of article again said it all. And they are right. If they do not continue to support the delusions of the apoplectic losers that flock to their pages every day, they won't have an audience at all.

What most black women think about black men

Painlessrisen has a look at what he's seen of how black women often treat black men.

http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=O8WXDRw7za0

I think the only argument we might have with him is that there are plenty of white and brown men who face similar experiences with women in their own racial/ethnic group, although in many communities it's more frequently behind closed doors. But if you got to the right areas of the country or world, you'll find men getting this type of treatment who are so white you could lose them in a snow bank.

MGTOW and female disapproval

Anja Eriud · 9 November 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Yes I know: what would I, a female, know about the myriad factors that go into a male decision to Go His Own Way, or a male orientating his life to minimise or lessen, if not outright avoid, any engagement with women? It's a fair point and the answer is: I don't know. I can respect that decision and acknowledge that this man has the right to live his life anyway he chooses, but I really cannot get inside his head and feel what he feels or has felt.

Okay, having said that, this is not what this is about, this is about shining a bit of a spotlight on why some women, sometimes feminists, sometimes not, seem to have this visceral negative reaction to MGTOW, why some females take it upon themselves to pour scorn and vitriol on the heads of these men.

Actually the clue is in the acronym – Men Going Their Own Way. Now whether or not women will admit it, the fact is for a lot of women there is no male "way" because men only live by the grace and favour of women. Without that grace and favour men will be made feel the full force of female disapproval, which manifests itself in many ways, from the violent to the relatively benign – ever seen a women convey her disapproval of a male action by a slight pursing of her lips, a slight stiffening of her body? I am betting we have all seen this happen to a man or boy, and have noticed an immediate change in the behaviour of that man or boy.

Of course female disapproval can and does manifest itself in much more direct, abusive and violent ways, but the point is that women feel they reserve the right to arbitrate and exercise approval of male actions, male behaviour, and in fact male autonomy.

Our modern society is now exclusively orientated towards achieving, obtaining and accommodating this female approval. MGTOW comprehensively rejects and delegitimizes any necessity for female approval or sanction. MGTOW is men thumbing their noses, giving the finger to the notion that men live by the grace and favour of women. It literally pulls the rug out from under the feet of women who, whether consciously or not, have internalised the idea that men are a resource for women, that men live and die to serve women's needs, wants and whims, that men have no other function but to be at the beck and call of women, but only if and when a woman decides she had some need that a man is obliged to answer and/or fill.

MGTOW quite clearly asserts that there is a male "way" and that the default female "My way or the highway" cultural norm is now being rejected, dismissed as basically a mirage, an illusion.

The universal pedestal that the vast majority of women believe they stand upon is crumbling beneath their feet, the illusion that they occupy some rarefied higher plane of existence in relation to men is shattered, and the self absorbed and egotistical belief that men live for and in service to women is… a joke.

MGTOW is literally a slap in the face for women. It is saying to women in clear unequivocal terms – "you are not really all that!"

Of course there is another deeper and more subtle message that MGTOW conveys that is precipitating the current spewings from female voices, feminist or otherwise: MGTOW is a manifestation of male disapproval of female behaviour, actions, etc. It is saying, "we've seen what you have to offer, we've watched the way you present your 'goods' and… nope, not buying!"

Oh dear Lord, men rejecting females, men giving women the once-over and not snapping up one of these delightful creatures! Heaven forfend! All this female spluttering in rage, hurling of epitaphs, heaping of scorn, is the female equivalent of a spoilt obnoxious brat throwing the mother of all tantrums at not being picked to play the princess in the school play, because… well because I am a princess!

The notion that men choose to reject women – it is simply not to be borne!

There is yet another underlying subtle message that women who have an issue with the whole MGTOW phenomenon tend to raise – men left to their own devices will turn into, if they haven't already, uncouth violent barbarians without the "civilising" influence and monitoring of women. Wonder how that stacks up in the face of numerous YouTube videos of females (usually drunk) causing mayhem in city centres on weekends. Here in Ireland, in Dublin, we get a lot of "hen parties" around the Temple Bar area, and the behaviour of these females is jaw-droppingly loud, violent, abusive and not to put too fine a point on it, disgusting – urinating and vomiting in the street being a big problem. Hmmm, I simply cannot fathom why men would be "turned off" by that!

Really! Boys, lads – what ails ye at all? Don't ye know that there are wimmin out there ready and willing to rip your heart out, itching to use, abuse and reject you? Literally foaming at the mouth to squeeze every last penny out of you, give birth to your children then taunt you for 18 years by holding those children hostage, to ransom?

Lads, MGTOW is just mean, it's not playing the game – sorry – what did you say? The game is rigged? Nooooooooooooo! Really? Ah, well then, off ya go, have fun, and for goodness sakes lads – mind yerselves – them wimmin are very very sneaky.

The other provinces seem to make it as hard as possible to find information on waiting times. But I'd bet they have similar numbers seeing as my grandfather recently died of prostate cancer after 2 years of "don't worry its not malignant, we'll wait and see" and 1 year of excruciating pain and "sorry, it's too late now, nothing we can do".

Fuckers.

All the while women get the express lane as soon as they think they feel a lump (which is ok, but men not getting the same service is not, even when its a man with breast cancer too)

When is it illegal to make reproductive choices for others? When you're a man.

Janet Bloomfield (aka JudgyBitch) · 10 November 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Over the past few months, this same story has played out over and over again in the media: men confronting an unwanted pregnancy slip their partners abortion drugs and end the pregnancy. You can read it here, here, here, here and here.

These cases all have some interesting things in common: none of the men were married to the women carrying their children and in all the US cases, the men were originally charged with either murder or attempted murder.

Hmmm. So when a man kills an unborn baby it's murder, but when women kill unborn babies it's just "a reproductive right". It's not a baby anyways, right? Just a clump of annoying cells. A "fetus".

Except when it's not.

> Abortion: it's only a baby when she says it is.

My intention today is not to discuss abortion, but rather to look at the idea of "reproductive rights" more carefully. Two high profile media sources have recently featured stories that question whether men actually have any rights when it comes to reproduction. Back in June, Laurie Shrage, a professor of philosophy and women's studies (!) posed the hypothetical question Is Forced Fatherhood Fair in the New York Times, and Anna March followed that up with an article at Salon demanding that we Make Fatherhood A Man's Choice!.

It's heartening to see the conversation turn towards even considering whether parenthood should be voluntary for all adult humans, and I think New Media sources like AVfM can take the credit for that. It certainly has not been feminist media, with their oft-repeated commitment to "equality" that have expressed any interest in equal reproductive rights. Quite the opposite. Websites like Jezebel hilariously trot out the exact same arguments anti-abortion activists use against women to deny men reproductive rights – don't have sex if you don't want a baby!

A typical comment goes like this:

> Gentlemen.
> IF YOU PUT YOUR PENIS IN A LADY THERE IS A CHANCE YOU MIGHT MAKE A BABY. THERE IS ALWAYS A CHANCE UNLESS YOU GET A VASECTOMY. IF YOU DON'T WANT TO TAKE THAT CHANCE, DON'T PUT YOUR PENIS IN A LADY.

http://jezebel.com/forced-fatherhood-yeah-okay-whatever-513168822

Oh really now?

> IF YOU ALLOW A PENIS IN YOUR VAGINA THERE IS A CHANCE YOU MIGHT MAKE A BABY. THERE IS ALWAYS A CHANCE YOU MIGHT MAKE A BABY UNLESS YOU GET A TUBAL LIGATION. IF YOU DON'T WANT TO TAKE THAT CHANCE, DON'T LET A PENIS IN YOUR VAGINA.

How's that work for ya, Jez? No abortion, no adoption, no escaping the consequences of sex. Fair is fair, right?

crickets

I've discussed the lack of reproductive rights for men before and although I suspect I hardly need to spell them out for regular readers of A Voice for Men, there may be some new faces around the club who aren't familiar with the options that women have, and men don't, when it comes to unplanned or unwanted pregnancy. Women have three choices when faced with a child they do not want and do not wish to assume legal or financial responsibility for:

1. Women can abort the child before it is born

2. Women can surrender the child for adoption

3. Women can surrender the child under Safe Haven laws and walk away

Men have none of those rights. The Jezebel article spells it out quite clearly:

> Boo fucking hoo. At the end of the day, the only thing the government, and society, requires fathers to do is pay money.

Charming. The only thing fathers have to do is pay money. And the accusation that feminism reduces men to mere utilities is unfair because: why again?

What would reproductive rights look like for men?

The right to legal parental surrender, in a time sensitive window (allowing for early abortion if the woman so chooses). Just as no woman can be forced into motherhood against her will, no man should be forced into fatherhood against his.

Legal Parental Surrender. It's not that hard.

But since we do not in fact have laws that protect the rights of men who wish to choose fatherhood rather than have it shoved down their throats, some men are taking the matter into their own hands, administering abortion-inducing drugs without the knowledge or consent of the pregnant woman.

I think we can simultaneously condemn the practice and comprehend the reasoning behind it: in the absence of reproductive equality, some men will take drastic steps to level the playing field. John Welden, facing a murder charge for making a reproductive choice for someone else, was ultimately convicted of product tampering and mail fraud–and there is something very interesting in that conviction:

I'm no lawyer, but if John and other desperate men like him can be charged, convicted and jailed for fraud and product tampering, is it possible that women who trick their male partners into pregnancy can face the same charges? Is it always illegal to tamper with products and make reproductive choices for other people, or is it only illegal when men do it?

Birth control sabotage is a frighteningly common reproductive strategy that both men and women engage in. Men are generally resoundingly condemned as brutish, controlling, misogynist pigs when they do something as despicable as birth control sabotage, but what about women who play the exact same game? "Forgetting" to take pills? Purchasing ineffective pills? Poking holes in diaphragms and condoms? Oh, there are plenty of strategies to get pregnant without the knowledge or consent of a partner, and ladies don't hesitate to share those. But really now, you must be thinking, how common is that? Do women really tamper with birth control products for the purposes of getting pregnant without a partner's consent, or are we just talking about a few outliers?

According to "Jody", in an interview with Details Magazine, it's not only common, it's normal!

> Jody (not her real name), a 32-year-old account manager for a major New York ad firm, decided to speed things along with her boyfriend two years ago by getting pregnant without telling him. "It's not about trapping the guy," Jody says. "That's kind of old-fashioned. Yeah, you want him to be into it, but there are other ways to get a guy to commit. If you're smart and in a good relationship, it's just about the fact that you want a kid." Even in her circle of young, urban, and gainfully employed friends, Jody says, this particular brand of subterfuge isn't exactly condemned the way one might expect. In fact, it's sort of, well, normal. "I see and hear people talk about it, and I understand. I get it," she says, "and I don't even think it's that manipulative. It's more like, 'Hey, the timing is right for me. I got pregnant—oops! Well, it's here, let's have it.' I think that's more the way it is now than it was back in the day when you had to marry someone before you got pregnant. Marriage doesn't matter now."

Why aren't these women facing criminal charges for making reproductive choices for other people? If men who administer abortion drugs without the knowledge or consent of their partners can be held criminally liable for that action, then why aren't women who engage in product tampering and fraud (telling someone you are taking birth control pills when you are not) held similarly liable?

Reproductive rights include the right to decide if you will be a parent or not, and they exclude the right to make that choice for anyone else.

As it stands, only women have the right to choose parenthood, and only women have the right to make reproductive choices for other people.

> Equality: you're doing it wrong.

Oh well now, that's a surprise, right?

Nope. Not when it comes to feminist double standards.

Lots of love,

JB

MRAs in India Community Group meeting

Anil Kumar · 10 November 2013 · Archived copy · Original

The family courts in India operate with extreme levels of anti-male bias. Most men have little hope from these courts. The Indian feminists openly call for discrimination against men by family courts. For example, they do not want men to be protected from domestic violence by women. More recently, feminists and communists together passed a bill in parliament for dividing matrimonial property during divorce. According to this bill, women's self-acquired property and inherited property will be considered her personal property, while all property of s man acquired before marriage or to be inherited in the future will be considered as "marital property", which will be divided during divorce.

Most often these Feminists argue that, under "patriarchy," men always support other men, while discriminating against women. In the media, Feminists accuse the family court judges of practicing pro-male bias, even though Indian family courts are extremely anti-male. For example, a recent survey has shown that family courts take an average of 24 months to pass an order for child visitation for fathers, even though this is a simple and straightforward judgment. Often, the family courts send unemployed men to prison, because they are unable to pay maintenance to an able-bodied wife.

In last decade, we Men's Human Rights Activists in India have used weekend meetings in parks and men's community centers to organize ourselves, mainly to fight against discrimination in family courts and false domestic violence cases.

Most of these meetings focus on educating men about the laws and the behavior of courts and lawyers. Though no direct solutions are available for men's problems, this basic education helps men protect themselves from the system and minimize their losses. This education then also reduces the possibility of being led astray by a lawyer. Many men facing domestic violence approach our men's rights groups. Often, they are advised to move to a separate house so that they can recover first. In India, police refuse to take any complaint of domestic violence by wife seriously, though a lot of men record the abuse using audio or video recording devices.

One big benefit of the men's community centers is that men feel that they are not alone and millions of other men are facing similar situations. So, they stop hiding as a solution and they stop worrying. The fear of going to a prison is much more painful that the real experience of being in a prison for couple of days. We often say to ourselves, our battle is 80% psychological and 20% legal.

Our motto is, irrespective external circumstances, a man must enjoy every moment of life. Only a man who can cherish every moment of life can be a real fighter against a discriminatory family court system.

In a way, we have no victims in our meetings. Victim-hood is just not allowed to pull us down. This victory over our minds in our community meetings has created a die-hard attitude towards life and the system.

The weekend community meetings are also used for planning and coordinating events for awareness of men's rights issues.

We hope you enjoy this video about our issues and our activism. You can find more videos about men of India right here.

The danger of male celibacy (1707)

Peter Wright · 10 November 2013 · Archived copy · Original

The following discussion between two women Eliza and Mariana was published in 1707 AD under the title Female Grievances: Dialogues between two Young Ladies concerning Love and Marriage. The discussion shows that even back in the 1700's women were trying to limit men's freedom and stop men going their own way. – PW

THE BACHELOR TAX

Female Grievances Debated
IN SIX DIALOGUES
Between Two YOUNG LADIES, CONCERNING
Love and Marriage.
VIZ.
I. Proving that Women, as well as Men, are Inclin'd to LOVE, and equally desirous of Propagating their Kind.
II. Shewing what Love is; its Sorts & Power, and the difference between Love & Lust.
III. How to discern whether a Man or Woman be in LOVE.
IV. Directions for Young Ladies prudent Managing the Affairs of LOVE.
V. Of MARRIAGE: That it is the Duty of every Person to Marry, unless there be a Lawful Impediment.
VI. The Unreasonableness and Injustice of Marrying for MONEY; and the great Misfortunes that frequently attend such as do.
To which are added,
Proposals for an Act to Enforce Marriage & for Taxing such Batchelors as refuse to Marry.
WITH THE Danger of Celibacy to a Nation.

Eliza: Amongst all the female grievances we have hitherto debated there still remains one we have not yet touch'd upon. There are an abundance of bachelors who, thro' a cowardly apprehension of the cares and troubles of the marry'd state, are so fearful of entering into it, that they would rather run the hazard of damning their souls with the repeated sin of fornication, than they will honestly engage in Wedlock to procreate within those reasonable bounds which the united laws of both God and man have both religiously appointed: Therefore methinks it would well become the care of a Parliament to redress this grievance, so very hurtful to the Kingdom in general, as well as to our sex in particular, by some compulsary law that should enforce Marriage upon all single sinners who otherwise will never keep a cow of their own whilst a quart of milk is to be brought for a penny.

Mariana: I'll assure you i like your thoughts very well, for if we consider rightly, we can allow bachelors to be no other than drones in the great-hive of the Common-wealth, that enjoy without reason, the advantage of marry'd peoples labours, in having their liberties and estates secur'd by the loss of other men's lives, and will not be industriour to repair from their own loins the native strength of the Kingdom, for tho' they have not continence enough to forebear the pleasure, yet the liberty they take is with such common strumpets, who by their debaucheries and distempers, are render'd wholly incapable of producing any serviceable fruits of their sinful labours. Therefore pray let us lay our heads together and consult of some proposals that might move our Senate to a wise consideration of this weighty matter.

Eliza: Pray, cousin, do you begin and propose one clause and I another, and so we'll proceed till we have digested our project into so many several heads, that may be an ease to the Senate if ever we should hereafter petition the House to bring in a Bill for the Advancement of the Church and the supression of Vice, and the improvement of the native strength of Her Majesties Kingdom in a lawful way.

Mariana: With all my heart; you would have me begin, so accordingly I'll proceed to the business, vis:

> That every bachelor above the age of twenty, and childless widower under the age of fifty, shall be obliged to marry within the circle of one year, commencing from the date of the Act, or else be liable to be press'd into > the Sea or Land Service (after the expiration of the Term limited) when ever Her Majesties Forces shall need a further recruit.

Eliza: That their personal effects shall be all sequester'd by the government, and be distributed by an Almoner for that purpose, into the hands of so many trustees, chosen out of every Parish, for the better supporting and maintaining all such poor children as have lost their fathers in defence of the Kingdom, and the overplus to be disposed of amongst those miserable husbands who are plagued with scolding wives and smoky houses.

Mariana: That an alms house shall be built and endow'd for the reception of all such childless widowers and bachelors as shall, by reason of their low stature, crookedness, weakness, or any other infirmities whatsoever, be judg'd unfit for His Majesty's Service; and that every such widower or bachelor shall be allowed one warm frize gown every year with a yellow badge upon the right arm, upon which shall be stamped an Ape in a string, and under shall be engraven this motto:

Who dies an old maid leads apes when she's dead;
But he that hates wiving shall lead 'em whilst living.

That every single member shall have a convenient apartment to himself, with a bed, two pair of coarse sheets, one leathern chair, one earthen candlestick, a green chamber-pot, and a little grate, and every ten of them shall have an old woman to wait upon 'em, and to hand 'em their water-gruel, barley-broth, turnips, carrots and potatoes; for that they shall not be allow'd any other food than soop, herbs and roots, because they have forfeited the Liberty of an Englishman, by not loving the flesh in a righteous way, therefore they ought not to indulge their vicious appetites.

Eliza: O sye, Madam, should we put such a cruel article upon the poor gentlemen it would be constru'd as downright tyranny, beyond all president.

Mariana: I am sorry to see you so tender of those who are so cruel to us, whoever refuses out of obstinacy to comply with the Term has resolved himself into a state of insufficiency, choosing rather to suffer than to marry; therefore we ought to consider them as much superanuated as to our sex, as if he were fourscore, but no infirmity ought to be allowed a good reason against a man's marrying; for tho' he is unable to get children, he is nevertheless able to father 'em; therefore, I think, all those that stand out in contempt of wedlock, cannot be dealt with too severely.

Eliza: Truly, cousin, upon second thoughts I must agree with you that they cannot be use'd to hardly. But, I doubt the Parliament will expect we'll be setting forth the danger of celibacy to a nation as the chief motive to induce 'em to take our other proposals into their wise consideration.

Mariana: That's well thought on; but we must be very brief, for the Members of Parliament hate long things, tho' we women are said to love 'em; therefore let us begin and help one another to concisely set forth the dangers of celibacy.

THE DANGER OF CELIBACY

Eliza: In the first place it would be a means of greatly impairing the glory of the established Church of this Kingdom, by lessening the interest of the Bishop's courts, which depend much upon marriage licenses, and consequently the grandure of prelacy must be reduced, not only so, but it would prove a great disadvantage to all the inferior clergy should the people once shake off the Church-shackles, and get a habit of falling to without grace.

Mariana: Secondly, it would be a means of ruining all families, dispeopleing the Kingdom to nothing, and leaving our posterity unable to defend themselves against the insults and invasions of their foreign enemies; for no copulation must bring the Kingdom to nothing; and universal liberty would beget distempers instead of children, and force the nation to turn their colleges and alms-houses into sick-hospitals.

Eliza: Thirdly, it would cause rapes and murders, for if both sexes were in common, both would contend for enjoyment where they could have no claim; besides, the care and education of children would be totally neglected, for what man would be burden'd with the charge of those brats, that another might have the liberty of getting as well as himself.

Mariana: Fourthly, it would be a means of introducing a beastly use of sodomy, making every timerous leacher turn a R——y for fear of contracting that filthy distemper in a minute that may'nt be claw'd off in a twelve-month.

Eliza: I find we shall be able to dispatch our undertakings to a nicety, a few more of these considerations, when we have more time to think, will certainly prevail, but the lateness of the evening now calls us to be marching.

Movember Grows On Natrel

Dan Perrins · 11 November 2013 · Archived copy · Original

ON MOVEMBER 1st, dairy company Natrel did an amazing thing: they showed genuine concern and support for a serious men's health issue. Natrel pledged to donate $5.00 for every picture of a mo, or a faux-mo, to Movember Canada.

[image]

Their only request is that participants add one of two hashtags, #NatrelMo or #NatrelFaux. They've also provided a few ways for us to take part. You can post your picture on their Facebook page, on Twitter and Instagram by tagging Natrel at @Natrelmilk (on Twitter) or @Natrel (on Instagram).

You've probably heard of Movember while wading through the countless pages dedicated to uncovering the issues faced by men in society but if you haven't, here's a quick run through of how it all started.

In 2003, men in Melbourne, Australia were enjoying a beer at the Gypsy Bar on Brunswick St, Fitzroy. Travis Garone and Luke Slattery spoke about a number of things – including fashion trends. This led to them to question aloud "where the moustache had gone" and the two joked about "bringing it back."

Soon after, Garone and Slattery's innocent fashion musings grew into an idea and eventually into a cause. Their first attempt at Movember produced 30 participants so in 2004 the group got serious and decided to formalize the concept. Garone registered the name 'Movember' and created a website. Garone was helped by fellow campaigner Justin Coghlan who ran the campaign in Queensland. The group researched men's health issues and decided that prostate cancer would be their formal cause. And the rest, as they will surely say in future, is Mo-Story.

History (or Mo-story) aside – it's clear that Natrel is going far beyond what is normal in helping to raise awareness for Movember and men's health issues (although honourable mention must go to Campbell's Canada who raised $10,000 with their own Movember campaign.) All you need do is post just one pic along with a hashtag and $5.00 will be donated.

Why, it's so simple that even my buddy Jeb did it.

Won't you?

Also, not interested in the carrot

John Hembling (JtO) · 11 November 2013 · Archived copy · Original

We all understand motivating other people's behaviour through selective rewards and punishments. This is often expressed in the metaphor of a carrot and a stick. Entice with the carrot, beat with the stick. The image springing to mind is one of a draft animal, yoked to a cart.

If you're a part of this human rights movement, or even if you're simply male, then you also know the present culture believes that for those beasts of burden called "men," a persistent climate of attack is just about perfect to keep those unruly animals in line.

I have not included examples, because anyone who claims to need examples to understand the point is either lying, or too willfully stupid to bother explaining to.

If you are a man, you are a bad person. You're stupid, you're unworthy, probably a creep, potentially a rapist, certainly violent, emotionally stunted, sexually inadequate and/or sexually predatory, you smell, you have no style, and you're a controlling oppressive untermensch. Unless and until you conform exactly to what the women around you want you to do, to say and to be, then you're maybe an okay dude. Provisionally on your continued good behavior, of course. Oh yeah, and most of all you're utterly and totally disposable – never forget that, bub.

Obviously, the various lame-stream channels of public reinforcement of the blue kool-aid that we all swim in spins endless variations of this: "y'all no-good man-boys who should do what you're told".

And then, every once in a long while, somebody broadcasts or publishes a piece addressing the male subset of the human race in a positive light. Hey guys, you're okay. Hell, we like you. You're even human beings, by golly, with feelings and everything. Hug!

The stick, and then the carrot. The most recent example of occasional positive coverage being a HuffPo article presently being praised by some of the readers of the men's rights subreddit. "Dear Men: You Are Already Good Enough" [1] is an article written by Kate Bartolotta.

Taken by itself, it's not a bad article. In fact, it lists a number of the very same complaints about the public climate of male vilification that writers at AVFM (including me) have frequently discussed.

Some of the comments in the men's rights reddit posting of this particular article include the following:

- "I needed this, thank you."
- "Beautiful article – nice to have something positive here [smiley face]"
- "Nice article. Now if only we can fix the biases men face in courts, I may actually want to risk getting involved with women. Too much to lose as it stands."

Paul once famously said most MRAs were one blowjob away from back-flipping from the high-diving platform through three elevated flaming hoops back to 115% indoctrinated blue-pill slavery.

In the comments thread of the HuffPo article itself, as I wrote this, the top-most comment was something so craven I was about to call a "pathetic dog" until noticed the commenter's own username. What he calls himself: thatdogguy.

"Kate, thank you, thank you, thank you! By the way, will you marry me?"

Am I being too harsh to call this character a pathetic, approval-seeking dog?

Anja Eriud, writing for this site pointed out only 2 days ago: "..that women feel they reserve the right to arbitrate and exercise approval of male actions, male behaviour, and in fact male autonomy."[2]

The point, for self-defining men of loudly disdaining engagement with the public firehose-torrent of male shaming, male villification, male-marginalizing rhetoric and ideology is not to coax some sort of positive feedback from that ideological public who until now have used the stick to coerce compliance, rather than the carrot.

The point is not to win some slivers of sympathy or praise from those who have, until now, shoveled scorn and contempt onto you, your brothers, your fathers, your sons, or your male colleagues and friends.

The point is that, whether enticed by the carrot of praise and recognition, or driven by that practiced "stick" of pain, shame and degradation; you – a man – are not a motherfucking draft animal. Neither are you anybody's dog to be petted or swatted with rolled-up newspaper. You are a human being.

At what point did any of us agree that who and what we are, what our public identities as humans should be, would be appropriately decided by the self-interest of narcissists, overgrown toddlers, and collectivist ideological solipsists? My choices are: I'm a decent human being, or, I'm a bad man based on the self-interested opinions of members of our society's leisure class?

No.

Which is why, besides my open contempt for the populist male vilifying narrative so pervasive it becomes the air we all breath, I have an equal disdain for praise, sympathy or affirmation from any voice in that same public discourse.

Kate Bartolotta, the author of "Dear Men: You Are Already Good Enough" might even have meant it. On the other hand, the article was originally published at the "good men project" website, a feminist site created explicitly to undermine the men's human rights movement, so maybe we're right back to carrot and stick.

In case anybody reading this is a slow learner, the carrot and the stick are both metaphorical tools of coercion.

So somebody in a mainstream channel has something nice, or kind to say about you if you're male? Watching the backflips of joy from affection-starved dogs demonstrates that those fools still haven't realized their identities do not belong to the public to be conferred on them by consensus.

"I needed this, thankyou."

I don't know if Bartolotta's motivation was benign or otherwise when she wrote: " Dear Men: You Are Already Good Enough." However, whatever her purpose was, I don't care. The metaphorical carrot, no less than the stick, is a tool of manipulation. Bartolotta and every other commentator looking for a lever can take their stick and their carrot, and stick them both right up their own lower alimentary canals.

Dear Kate Bartolotta: it is not your prerogative to tell me, or any other man, he's "good enough". His identity is his own, and if you're lucky, when he's decided, he may tell you who and what he is. He also might not tell you, because that's his prerogative too. And, don't take this too personally, but fuck off, Kate. And of course, whatever your motivation was, thanks you for your kind attention.

But in all seriousness, you can still shove it.

And one more thing: responding to this missive by Ms. Bartolotta, the first 5 conformist dolts to repeat item 1 from the shaming tactics catalog can each donate 1000 dollars to

Callout to Australian, British, and Canadian men for help

Dean Esmay · 11 November 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Last week I was contacted by researchers in the UK who are taking part in a multinational study of heterosexual men who are or have been involved in abusive relationships with a female wife or partner. As regular readers of A Voice for Men know, even though men are half the victims of domestic violence and women are half the perpetrators, both research on and services for male victims are underserved and often ignored or even mocked. If you're a man who's willing to step up and share your experiences confidentially with these researchers, you will be helping the Men's Human Rights Movement and your fellow men in a very direct and tangible way.

The researchers inform me that their US-based contingent is full up and needs no further subjects, however, the Australian, British, and Canadian teams are still looking for subjects So I sincerely hope that if you're in one of those countries, you respond to this notice.

Note that once the researchers have gotten sufficient volunteers they will let me know that they've got all the subjects they can handle, and I will post an update here letting people know that the call for volunteers is closed. But until that happens, please read the below notice and act on its directions if you qualify. Thank you!

What follows below is the verbatim notice the researchers sent to me. –DE

Men are needed to take part in a study that aims to listen to men's voices about their experiences of abuse from a female intimate partner.

We are looking for volunteers to participate in a 90-minute online discussion group. We are trying to learn more about men's experiences of victimisation from a female intimate partner in different Western countries (UK, ~~USA~~, Canada and Australia). This is an under-researched area and we hope that by allowing men's voices to be heard we can contribute to the understanding and development of prevention, services and funding for this issue in addition to raising international awareness. We do recognise that homosexual partner abuse is an important study also, but as resources are limited we have to study one thing at a time on this occasion.

We are currently looking for men to take part in the UK, Australian and Canadian study (the US part of the study has been completed for now). We want to speak to men who live in these countries who have experienced some form of abuse in a current or past intimate relationship and who are willing to discuss their experiences with a researcher and other men in similar situations. This abuse does not have to be physical. We recognise that people can experience other forms of abuse such as psychological, emotional, sexual or controlling behaviours and we are interested in all of these forms.

The discussion group will be held virtually; that is, we will use an online facility to speak to each other. This will allow men who live in different parts of the country of interest to get together and talk to each other. We will interview men together with other men from the same country. Groups will be small, of approximately 5 men and two researchers. This facility will have to be private – for example a home PC or iPad, or mobile phone in a private location – this is to make sure we uphold the confidentiality for you and other participants in the group. Therefore, you could not carry out the group in an internet café, for example.

Requirements for participation are that you are over 18, are proficient in the English language, experienced some form of abuse from a female intimate partner whilst living in the country of interest at some point, and you are willing to share your story with a small group of men in similar situations. You will need access to an email account, the internet and a webcam.

Participation is voluntary. You may decline to answer any question you do not wish to answer. If you wish to drop out of the study at any time, you are free to do so. Your answers will be kept fully confidential. This research is being conducted by Dr. Louise Dixon from the University of Birmingham, UK; Dr. Denise Hines from Clark University, USA; Dr. Emily Douglas from Bridgewater State University, USA; Dr. Alexandra Lysova from the University of Toronto, Canada, and Dr. Elizabeth Celi in private practice in Melbourne, Australia.

You do not have to tell us your name at any point in this study. If you are interested in reading more about this study you need to email the researcher (details below) who will email you back with detailed information. If your email address identifies your name clearly you are free to create and use a non-identifiable account – you can do this easily online using Gmail or Yahoo, for example. When the researcher emails you back she will provide you with a made up name (Bobby, for example) that you can use in communication throughout the entire study. However, we will be able to see your face in the discussion group – we believe it will be easier to talk to each other online about sensitive issues if we can see each other, it is sometimes difficult to gauge what people really mean or feel without seeing faces.

Please note – if you are currently in an abusive relationship you should think very carefully about whether your participation in this project can be carried out safely. For example, will your partner be able to read your emails to us and from us? Will your partner be aware of you participating in the online discussion group?

Remember, unless a website has been set up in a specific way people can trace your history on the computer – that is they can see what sites you have been logged onto. They will be able to trace that you have accessed the weblink to our online group unless you know how to effectively delete this history. Think – would taking part threaten your safety in any way? Please do not take any further part in this study if it does.

If you are interested in participating or have questions about the study, please email Louise Dixon at l.dixon.1@bham.ac.uk and she will make sure you are sent more detailed information about the study so that you can consider further if you would like to take part.

Thank you!

Come the Revolution

Kalan Chinuck · 11 November 2013 · Archived copy · Original

It seems clear from the attention recently directed toward the M(H)RM, its flagship websites, and its spokesmen, that a significant number of people are being motivated to at least take a look and see what all the fuss is about. This fact alone informs us that more and more people perceive the existence of a problem and (hopefully) want to find a solution they can be part of.

The problems have been thoroughly described and well-analyzed – no mystery there, although they bear considerable further dissemination, discussion and publicity.

But what's the solution?

Dr. Gene Sharp's 1993 book From Dictatorship to Democracy offers extensive advice on the most successful methods for deposing an illicit regime and substituting something more reasonable in its place. Although he casts the struggle primarily (though not exclusively) as one of freedom-loving democracy-seekers in their fight against totalitarian dictatorships, in truth the M(H)RM might well take some lessons from his work.

It is probably wisest to avoid terms such as 'revolution,' 'rebellion,' 'overthrow' and 'deranged despots,' but there is no doubt that those most heavily engaged in the men's issues battle are indeed revolutionaries of a sort, attempting to upend the status quo of regimes which routinely violate the basic human rights ensconced in the U.S. Constitution, the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, and other similar documents.

It's worth bearing in mind too that the enemy, as such, needs to be clearly defined. Herbert Spencer, in The Man Versus The State (1884) reminds us that the state always proceeds in the direction of greater control and money for itself, at the expense of citizens and individuals. Gustav Le Bon in The Crowd (1896) calls "the progressive restriction of the liberty of the individual" one of the two great dangers of even the ideal state (the other being financial waste). Frank Chodorov's 1959 book The Rise and Fall of Society describes the state's "proclivity for expansion… its inherent compulsion toward the acquisition of power (which) cannot be inhibited by law," and shows most importantly that "state power can grow only at the expense of social power."

An obvious ancillary conclusion must be that partisan politics is irrelevant in the face of abusive state power: no government, no form of centralized authority with a monopoly on violence, has ever escaped these expansionist tendencies. The notion that these tendencies can be magically restrained is a part of our political mythos which many still accept as legitimate.

In Western capitalist democracies, we are now witness to a psychotic agglomeration of quasi-fascist right-wing policies coupled with hard-left collectivist regulatory regimes which serve to aggregate financial and political power in an oligarchic and bureaucratic ruling class while stripping the general populace of power, money, liberty and justice.

Ideologues and populists can and do provide support to the state, but in fact are only the justification, the useful idiots, for the relentless and inescapable march to state dominance – it matters little which particular ideology is employed, so long as the interests of the state are preserved. (Consider that during the recent U.S. 'financial crisis' the number of government employees increased by 22,000 persons). In democracies, right, left and centrist governments are statist: that is to say, they withdraw power, money and freedom from individuals and accrue it to themselves and their institutions.

Dr. Sharp begins his analysis of successful campaigns by commenting that "in extreme cases, the social, political, economic, and even religious institutions of the society — outside of state control — have been deliberately weakened… . The population has often been atomized (turned into a mass of isolated individuals) unable to work together to achieve freedom, to confide in each other, or even to do much of anything at their own initiative. The result is predictable: the population becomes weak, lacks self-confidence, and is incapable of resistance."

Sound familiar? Lest you doubt the viability or intent of such tactics, bear in mind that a record 27% of America's households are now solo occupant, a dream come true for radical feminists and rulers alike. In Tokyo, the average number of persons per household is less than two. In Canada the number of people living alone is at an all-time high and continues to rise. This socially destructive trend is occurring all over the Western world.

So what can be done? The bad news first: not every revolution is successful. But rather than lay down on the sofa, turn on the PS3 and dial up the porn channel, however, men should note the corollary: many struggles against oppressive authority are successful, and there are damn good reasons for that success.

Violence is clearly not the answer. In addition to moral and ethical implications, violence means attacking the state in its area of greatest superiority, which is hardly a winning strategy. In addition, violence often has the effect of mobilizing support against the initiators.

Elections are generally useless as well – the state is clearly not going to create and promote any electoral system which leads to its own demise. A quick look around the world should substantiate this point – with only very rare exceptions, the effective, underlying status quo does not change much, regardless of election results.

Negotiation has its own pitfalls, from serving to legitimize the oppressive regime to co-opting the resistance. And on fundamental issues, such as human liberty, negotiation is a path to failure. Negotiation is not based on the ability of each side to recognize the relative merits of the opposition's position and then compromise, it is based rather on an assessment of the power relationships involved. Guess who wins.

The arguments of such as R. Tod Kelly, who want men to engage in reasonable dialogue in order to correct "civil rights discrepancies," are those of a person who misunderstands both the fundamental nature of the state and the goals of the M(H)RM.

Understanding and exploiting the weaknesses of the state are key to undermining its power. As well, activists must strengthen the oppressed population in their determination, self-confidence, and resistance skills; strengthen their independent social groups and institutions; create a powerful internal resistance force; and develop a strategic plan and implement it skillfully.

For a wide variety of reasons, Dr. Sharp contends that political defiance is the alternative of choice for activists. It enables attacking the status quo where it is weakest, undermining the state's sources of power, and it is difficult to defend against. Political defiance also helps distribute effective power across society, rather than leaving it solely in the hands of the state.

The strategies and tactics of political defiance need not involve breaking the law, harming others, or sacrificing oneself martyr-style to no purpose. Dr. Sharp describes 198 methods of nonviolent action which can be applied effectively – these are listed at Methods of Nonviolent Action.

In response to a legitimate and successful battle against abusive authority, societies can change in one of four ways, these being conversion (rare), accommodation, nonviolent coercion, and disintegration. Strategic planning is critical in attaining the desired outcome.

But success can have its own difficulties and risks as well. Le Bon, also in The Crowd, summarizes the leading danger: "The idea that institutions can remedy the defects of societies, that national progress is the consequence of the improvement of institutions and governments, and that social changes can be effected by decrees — this idea, I say, is still generally accepted. It was the starting-point of the French Revolution, and the social theories of the present day are based upon it. The most continuous experience has been unsuccessful in shaking this grave delusion."

There is a certain bitter irony to this notion as applied to Dr. Sharp's work, since he envisions the attainment of constitutional democracy as the end goal of political struggle. What happens when constitutional democracy itself is the problem? History is providing the M(H)RM with an opportunity to help write a new chapter to this story. Let us prove ourselves worthy of the challenge.

From Dictatorship to Democracy is considerably more nuanced and comprehensive than can be conveyed in one short article. Dr. Sharp has placed his work in the public domain, so it's free to download and read. I recommend all serious M(H)RAs read it carefully.

Veteran's Day: 22 will kill themselves today

Paul Elam · 11 November 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Check what time it is wherever you are. Then wait an hour. Chances are by the time that hour has passed, another US military veteran will have taken his life. Yes, his. The victims, checking out 22 times a day, one every 65 minutes, are overwhelmingly male; just like the ones that die in combat.

Forbes Magazine ran a report on this back in February of this year. In it they showed an image of a lone veteran standing in a clearing wearing a sandwich board that was not quite up to modern realities at a mere 18 suicides a day.

This is not counting the active duty suicides, which happen on average of once a day, according to data released by the Pentagon.

And of course the Veterans Administration is handling the epidemic with its usual efficiency. According to a recent report in USA today, it takes longer than VAs targeted two weeks, an abhorrent goal for the circumstances, to initiate psychiatric care for veterans with mental and emotional problems, including those that are contemplating eating a gun. It is more than a month before they can get these troubled veterans in to see a psychiatrist.

As a veteran, I quit letting the VA anywhere near my body after experiencing their quality of care a few times, which is to say after they nearly killed me. But as a civilian I could be in front of a psychiatrist to complain about feminists or bad service at a restaurant if I wanted to within a day or so. All it would take is the insurance card from a civilian provider in my wallet or some cash.

The military has taken some measures to help veterans while they wait to be seen. They set up a hot line, and according to Forbes they claim to have saved 26,000 lives on the telephone. I am sure it was at comparatively nominal expense to taxpayers, though we have to assume that we are talking about taxpayers gullible enough to believe that a phone center actually prevented 26,000 men from killing themselves.

May I suggest that despite the valiant and very economical efforts of our federal government to do the equivalent of handing out aspirin for brain tumors, there may be another way? There may be a viable plan to help men who are serving their country, and the corporations that run it, at their tragic expense.

It is called peace. Yes, peace. Such a notion is only pollyannish if you think American wars are waged for noble reasons or to save democracy.

If, on the other hand, you think wars are waged over money and power and that there are probably options for world commerce that don't require acts of genocide and destruction, then it should make you wonder a few things, like how many soldiers who did not have to walk over the bloody, scattered limbs of children in the course of their day job might come home with less need for a suicide hot-line.

How many soldiers would later commit suicide if they did not have the gory deaths of their brothers-in-arms, friendships forged in heat of battle where brotherhood gains desperate meaning, burned into their memories so badly that they cannot escape the images even in their sleep — or in the bottom of a bottle?

How many men would not be dead, right now, if they did not return from a war they did not start to find divorce papers waiting for them and their children calling some stranger "Daddy"; to being branded as a risk, to their children, to society, and relegated to being worth nothing more than a paycheck as a direct result of making sacrifices for "their country"?

How many men have served and served and served, till they were served up?

We have made a national pastime, not just of illicit, imperialist wars, but of sitting through government propaganda smiling like bobble-head dolls, faithfully listening to public relations hacks tell the American public how we care about veterans; of all the lives we are saving with a fucking telephone, as the bodies piled up on our own shores, and at our own feet.

There were protests? My ass. Modern Republicans never saw a coffin that did not look better draped in a flag. Democrats only raised a slight stink until their guy took the oval office. Since then they have either become hawks or very, very quiet doves. This country cares nothing about our veterans. It cares a lot more about the politics of these wars than the men dying in them.

And here we sit with the answer to all of it that almost nobody wants to hear. We will repeat this indecency and repeat it again and again and again until the MHRM finds a way to catch fire and help people understand, force them if we have to, that the soldiers we so cheerfully offer up to the meat grinder of American politics are human beings that have better things to do than be torn to shreds and tossed to the curb.

I have heard some Americans bemoan the way our government treats veterans. They will tell you that we should spare no expense in taking care of their shattered bodies and minds when we are done using them. I am so sick of their phony concern and false, empty rhetoric.

When we find a way to actually have a man's life be worth one shred more to the average person than the selfish use they imagine they have for it, then we will have found a way to take human civilization to the next level of being human.

Until then, forget about it. People will find their reasons. They will pontificate on matters of resources, and world politics. They will hide behind alliances, even with tyrants and terrorists, as a reason that more American men should suffer and bleed.

Or, as with most Americans, they will decide whether men should suffer and die based solely on whether whichever whore got their vote wants a war to happen.

And of course they will speak of glory and heroics and patriotism and every other tried and tested mind-fuck with which men have been duped into killing and dying for centuries.

To our national disgrace they will spend this day paying homage to the carnage and the pure human evil that created it.

If you are interested in my Veteran's Day message, and even if you are not, that is it from me as a veteran. Tear it to shreds with petty politics and other foolishness if you will. But please do me the favor when you are done. Kindly wipe the blood from your hands on something other than the back of this movement. The movement to which I belong has no blame to bear, and nothing to celebrate on this day. Only the hope that compassion for men will lead to something better.

Ally Fogg goes native

Elly Tams · 12 November 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Ally Fogg is not a feminist, allegedly. But maybe he is worse than that. His apparent attempts to be 'reasonable' and 'balanced' and separate from the battling factions in the gender wars are increasingly unconvincing. I can see the benefits, to Ally, and to feminism, of his fence-sitting stance. He avoids the personal cost of being a 'male feminist' and never pleasing the sisterhood enough (see Hugo Schwyzer). And the feminists get an – um- 'ally' who speaks feminism, acts feminism, supports feminism, but lets the girls rule the roost. The Guardian (as an outpost of feminism) also benefits, as they have a man writing about gender to wave around as an example of their 'diversity'. But a man who says exactly what any feminist woman journalist would say.

Fogg's latest offering to the feminist goddesses is particularly awful. He starts by anticipating and undermining any criticism, and implies it will come from unthinking, crass individuals. I guess he'll file my response as a 'hit blog'. He writes:

' This is an article about angry white men and their galloping sense of aggrieved entitlement. It is at least partly inspired by feminist theory and analysis of structural racial supremacy. Before I've finished my third sentence, I've probably already contributed to a minor epidemic of hypertension among a certain section of Comment is free readers. I can anticipate the comments, the hit-blogs and the hate-mail already: by even mentioning white men, I am the real racist. I am the real sexist. Why doesn't the Guardian take a pop at the angry brown men over here or the angry black women over there instead?'

Ostensibly, Ally is reviewing a book by someone who does own his identity as a 'male feminist' – Michael Kimmel. I am not a fan but what I think is troubling is how Fogg hides behind Kimmel's brand of misandry. Fogg doesn't say he supports everything Kimmel says but quotes him uncritically. So Kimmel's comment that:

> 'the penis should carry a sticker saying: "Warning: operating this instrument can be dangerous to yours and others' health."

…is given 'airtime', not challenged, and is a juicy bone thrown to Graun feminist editors and readers.

The article gets a little confusing as it progresses. Fogg mentions Kimmel's criticism of 'angry white men' and puts the examples of 'the men's rights activists of cyberspace' and 'the high school spree shooters of parental nightmares' next to each other in the same sentence. He then says 'the thesis can only really be made to work by means of tortuous logic' , but adds 'nonetheless there is more than a jingling ring of truth to his argument' and goes on to agree with Kimmel enthusiastically. Fogg supports Kimmel's notion that white men are responding badly to social change and growing gender equality, due to their sense of 'entitlement' and an inability to move with the times.

This is a clever ploy in a way. If men's rights activists, for example respond angrily to Fogg's article, he can say 'I told you so' and cite their sense of 'entitlement' again. Fogg's article also ignores the 'angry white women' of feminism, who don't like it up 'em. He fails to mention how feminism has always celebrated 'female' anger. Sometimes that anger gets violent:

I don't think I am angry with Fogg. I have got to the point of being jaded and a bit depressed by his collusion with a politics that belittles and demonises men, their problems and their opinions. Ally is a 'white man' too. I don't like the implication that he is somehow 'better' than the men he derides, more 'enlightened', 'nicer'.

It's business at usual at the Graun. But it's a rather nasty business. And any challenges to this type of misandry are in my view, more than needed.

So Paul gets an email from three high school girls

Paul Elam · 12 November 2013 · Archived copy · Original

I get a lot of interesting emails. It is one of my job perks. This morning, I woke up to find an email from three young women, British high school students, who wrote to get some opinions on sexism in the media.

I thought I would share my answers with you, as I have with them.

First, their email:

Dear A Voice For Men

Our names are [names redacted], and we are year 10 students from [redacted]. We are conducting an investigation to find out whether sexism in the media destroys society on a global scale – and we would like to find out your opinions on our topic.

In our group we believe that sexism in the media does destroy society globally in ways such as young individuals feeling outcasted[sic] because they do not look like the 'perfect' and 'skinny' women they see in the media leading them to starving themselves just so they can be like them. It can also make men feel that they should be 'sex gods' because of how they are presented in magazines and on TV. Could you please answer these questions as we value your opinion.

1) What do you think about sexism in the media?

2) How are men and women presented in the media?

3) Does sexism in the media destroy society globally?

Thank you for taking the time to read our email, we would appreciate if you could get back to us as soon as possible. We look forward to hearing from you.

Many thanks,

[names redacted]

My response is as follows:

Hello [redacted], I will do my best to answer your questions.

1) What do you think about sexism in the media?

I think sexism in the media is real, and it is driven by the desire to sell products, mostly to women, which makes some measure of sense because women are the primary spenders of income in society.

2) How are men and women presented in the media?

Men are presented inaccurately in several ways. The first is that they are portrayed as bumbling fools, inferior to women and unable to cope with life without women's help and guidance. They are also portrayed as evil abusers of women and other men. And lastly they are portrayed as sacrificial heroes and invincible tough guys, which are pretty close to the same thing. These are men who disregard their own safety and well-being, or who are so tough they don't have to risk, in order to fulfill women's romantic fantasies of what they want men to be. Seldom are men portrayed realistically or fairly.

Women are similarly misrepresented. One way they are presented is as much more powerful than they actually are. Think Laura Croft, Batgirl, etc.

The less overt version of this is television shows and commercials where they are cast as superwomen who perfectly balance professional and family life, while making sure their bumbling husbands stay out of trouble.

They are also presented as the damsel in distress; unrealistically innocent, helpless maidens who need a man to risk his own sacrifice to help them.

Woven throughout most of the representations of women are the issues your group is concerned with. Women having perfect bodies is symbolic of their sexual power. Women naturally gravitate toward this message because being physically perfect gives them more real life power over men and with other women. Pursuing the “perfect” body is an easy way to suck women in because innately that is what most women aspire to have. Media does not create this drive in women, it just exploits it.

3) Does sexism in the media destroy society globally?

No, sexism in society destroys society globally. Media makes its money not by creating human consciousness, but by understanding it and SELLING to it. Media is not “a thing.” In the end it is people, just like everything else that people create.

The misrepresentations of men and women I mentioned above are good examples of that. Women are the primary consumers in world culture, especially in western nations. So women are the chief targets of messages that come from media. Women want to see men played as fools and idiots (men certainly don’t want that), so that is how the media portrays them.

Women, particularly ones that are hostile to men, want to see them played as evil and abusive, so that is what they get as well. Women also want to see themselves, when not super powerful and capable, as damsels that are sexually desirable enough to have men risk and sacrifice to save them, so that is what the media gives them.

Damsels and heroes. Superwomen and idiot men; all to satisfy female consumers and the men who want to please them.

Very sad, actually. People, I mean. Not the media.

To create a better media that gives both men and women healthier messages, we don’t need to look at advertising, television or movies. We need to look in the mirror. Media is by and large an apparatus to sell people their own fantasies. When those fantasies change, so will the media.

I hope this helps and best of wishes with your project.

A short guide to the Men's Rights Movement: Emily Shire's generalizations

Dean Esmay · 13 November 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Emily Shire of The Week has written a Short guide to the Men's Rights Movement. While this writeup appears to be part of a growing trend of reporting somewhat more accurately and less hyperbolically and hysterically about the Men's Human Rights Movement, we still must fault Ms. Shire for several critical oversights. We believe these should be (politely) pointed out to her:

- Shire states that the MRM started in response to the growth of Second Wave Feminism.

As the work of historian Robert St. Estephe shows, this is not the case, although there can be no doubt that the rise of so-called 2nd-wave feminism was a contributor to the movement's growth. She is correct, however, in noting that many of the 1970s and 1980s Men's Rights Activists considered themselves feminists. Many current MRAs were feminists at one time, including Paul Elam and much of the AVfM editorial staff. The publisher of The Spearhead (an unaffiliated but generally respectable, if more right-leaning and sometimes more incendiary publication) is himself married to a feminist.

- Shire describes Warren Farrell as "moderate," insinuating this "moderation" is a stark contrast to AVfM.

In reality, when it comes to the issues, it is difficult to find anyone at A Voice for Men, the largest men's rights publication in history, who disagrees with anything Farrell has ever said or argued, not to any substantive degree anyway. Farrell is a supporter of A Voice for Men and has given us written contributions, statements, and interviews. The only major difference between AVfM and Farrell is that AVfM is more inclined to use harsh tones and tough language. In terms of advocacy, equal rights before the law remains our core issue and our most fervent desire, as our resounding and sincere call for revival and ratification of the Equal Rights Amendment attests.

Shire implies that we have somehow changed from the position that all human beings regardless of sex deserve equal treatment under the law. That's the exact opposite of the truth. Indeed, our "Fuck Their Shit Up" mentality comes, as we have often stated, from the abysmal failure of polite people meekly asking for their human rights to be granted. We realized after decades of advocacy that being polite didn't work. We got ruder about it. Now you notice us, Emily, and you find us troubling? Did you find us even worth noticing before we started demanding instead of asking for our human rights? Did you find us worth noticing when we ignored the hateful bigots instead of calling them out?

- Shire uncritically accepts claims and characterizations by feminist Jaclyn Friedman while failing to acknowledge any of the spiteful, hateful, volatile, or just plain wrong things to come out of Jaclyn Friedman or her feminist "sisters."

Indeed, Shire fails to even acknowledge that the most harsh criticism of Jaclyn Friedman has come from female contributors to our site, most notably Diana Davison, whose work exposing Friedman as a mean-spirited and hateful ideologue has been either ignored or quoted without attribution so people might not notice the dirty little secret that Shire and others appear to be unaware of: the Men's Human Rights Movement is full of passionate women who support the cause and deplore hateful and censorship-minded demagogues like Friedman.

- Shire makes the common error that there is any one unified "Manosphere."

This is like implying that there is a "ladysphere" and it is owned or controlled by feminists, and that everything from Ms. Magazine, Cosmpolitan, Feministing, Good Housekeeping, Jezebel, and Mothers Against Drunk Driving are all part of it–or even like implying that Shire herself is part of some so-called "ladysphere." This is utterly incoherent. Publications like A Voice for Men have no more to do with the likes of Peter Nolan (whom we have specifically condemned) than we do with GQ or Playboy. As has been repeatedly pointed out (and which Shire could as a researcher have just asked us about, since our contact information by phone and email are readily available), AVfM long ago disassociated from anything called the Man-o-sphere, precisely for the purpose of distancing ourselves from multiple elements that we find irrelevant or outright repellant–although we do carry multiple links to sites whose work we find noteworthy. But even then, we don't claim to be affiliated with them.

- When referring to AVfM as more than "just…a platform for misogynistic rants" she makes no effort whatsoever to acknowledge the brazenly misandrist nature of prominent feminist web sites.

I mean, she quotes Jaclyn Friedman. Without irony. What more can we say?

- She suggests AVfM posts "contact information" on women we claim male false accusations in rape, pedophilia, and divorce.

AVfM has never posted "contact information" (which we take to mean phone numbers, email addresses, home or work addresses, etc.) on any person we have accused of making false allegations. When we do identify an individual we do not give out that sort of information. We don't believe our standards on what information we release on individuals we identify are substantively different from what any mainstream newspaper or news magazine would when giving out information on public cases.

Also, by putting us in the same class with Peter Nolan's web site, she fails to inform her readers, as mentioned earlier, that we repudiate Nolan's work and his methods.

- Shire mentions a so-called "smaller branch of MRM" that is trying to "tackle real problems."

She does not identify who this "smaller branch" is, except to link an article on The Huffington Post which mentions one group, CAFE. Fascinating. While we have no direct ties to CAFE we have often supported their fundraisers, interviewed their principles, promoted their work, and even donated money to them. She also appears to have missed the multiple specific issues AVfM has been directly involved in, including direct help in establishing men's groups on North American campuses, interviewing prominent researchers in areas like Domestic Violence and sexual violence, successfully advocating for specific men wronged by the criminal justice system (such as Gordon Smith and Vladek Filler), projects to lobby state legislaturs, or much of anything else we've done that is substantive and direct activism, leaving her readers with the impression that we do nothing but spew hate at women and publish names and addresses of women we don't like, neither of which is true.

- She recycles Cathy Young's tiresome allegation that we don't need a men's rights movement and that we just need a "humanist" movement.

Meanwhile, she doesn't seem to be aware that not just the men but the women of this movement have taken Young to task for inaccuracy and faulty logic. Indeed, whether intentionally or on purpose, Shire has continued to feed into the myth that we are "misogynists," and contributed to the continuing practice of mainstream media of ignoring and marginalizing women–that is, the women of the MHRM and what they have to say, even though it's hard to get through a day on AVfM without encountering one or more of them.

Emily Shire, I have to ask you: why is Jaclyn Friedman's opinion more important than Diana Davison's? Why is Cathy Young's opinion more important than Aimee McGee's? Is your opinion more important than Tara Palmatier's, Suzanne McCarley's, Janet Bloomfield's, or any of the other women in this movement you failed to acknowledge even though they are quite prominent around here?

For that matter, were you even aware that the Don't Be That Lying Feminist and Don't Be That Bitch were the brainchild of one of our female senior editors? You know, if you'd contacted us during the course of your research, we would have told you that, and told you which one (hint: she's on our masthead).

Also, how did you get through an entire piece where you mention Men's Rights Edmonton but didn't mention that their most prominent spokesperson is a woman named Karen Straughan?

Here's our suggestion for Ms. Shire: since your position is "researcher," we would like to suggest that in any future research on us you contact and consult us before putting words in our mouths or accusing us of doing things. As I've mentioned, our contact information is startlingly easy to find, and if clicking on that link is too much for you or any other reporters or researchers, the news desk's phone# is (202) 738-1456 and the editorial department phone# is 313-334-4887.

We'll be looking forward to your call, Emily, or the call of any else who wants to do an honest and well-researched piece featuring us or our work.

In the meantime, we would like to suggest that AVfM readers check out Emily Shire's short guide to the movement, and politely–politely!–let her know what she got right and what she got wrong. And thank her for at least linking the site in an honorable fashion, so readers could come here and see and decide for themselves what they think of the content, which is something the likes of Jaclyn Friedman were not honest enough to do.

In the meantime, we'll look forward to Ms. Shire's call.

La dictadura de género (The Dictatorship of Gender): a book review

Lucian Vâlsan · 13 November 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Judge Francisco Serrano Castro joined the judiciary in the year 1990 and was, until recently, judge at the First Family Court Instance number 7 in Seville and a judge on tax issues. He is also a professor and speaker for various public and private training organizations on family rights, child protection and counseling and family mediation. He is usually named the director and coordinator at family law seminars with the purpose of training judges organized by the Supreme Judicial Council both at the state level and the territorial level of the Andalusia province. He is also a regular speaker at the universities of Barcelona, Madrid and Seville.

We will summarize the content of his book: "The Dictatorship of Gender – a menace against Justice and Equality". Right from the title of the book, it is clear that the content of the book is close to the views expressed by people who defend the human rights of men and children. One of these people is the lawyer Juan Ignacio de Moron who had this to say:

> The most radical feminist ideology got in power and more than one million men have been accused of violence, deprived of their homes, their children, their income, marginalized by the state and treated as plague spreaders. A small fraction may indeed deserve condemnation, but the great majority of them are innocent victims of defamatory falsehoods taken at face value by the judiciary. The saddest thing is that the consequences are paid by hundreds of thousands of boys and girls who deprived of their fathers. Is it just an ideology? Of course not, it's a business.

On A Voice for Men, we described in the past at length what happened in Spain with the rise of the Zapatero government, how misandry became the de facto law of the land and activists from the ground came and offered further explanations on The Voice of Europe(starting from the 64th minute).

Now, for the first time, a judge demonstrates the courage in his book to expose what the hateful gender ideology of feminism did in Spain.

Unfortunately, while in 2010 Paul Elam was writing that "what we need desperately are judges with integrity and a passion for justice," feminists were working to eliminate such a judge. The way in which this has been (so far) achieved justifies the title "Dictatorship of Gender" that Judge Serrano gave to the book

Part I. False accusations: the food of the octopus

> The PSOE government squandered 4 billion € (5.34 billion US $) in gender politics, and the murders of women increased by 28%.

The Strategic Plan for Equal Opportunities between 2008 and 2011 swallowed 3.699 billion euros. To put the number into perspective – that is 5.8 times more than the Ministry of Labour. In the midst of economic crisis, employment policies were almost 6 times less important than gender policies for the Socialist government, and only a small part of these gender policies were indeed destined to help abused women.

The main part of the fund was however used for implementing a delusional ideological perspective.

For example the program "Support for the Program of Gender Mainstreaming" was founded with 388 thousand Euros. "Gender Mainstreaming" is the same "concept" in which the new Marxist-Feminist Prime Minister of Senegal is also specialized. The program "Thinking and implementing Equality Actions" was founded with 405 thousand Euros.

The judge writes (p. 152): "Taxpayers' money were used to finance the PSOE foundation" (PSOE stands for Partido Socialista Obrero Español, and it is the party that put the feminists in power).

A portion of the funds have been funneled to literally help false accusations become the norm. The law established as a criterion for granting public funds "the number of accusations of women against their partners" and "the number of women who say that they are abused." The most profitable accusations were precisely those that did not require feminist associations to provide protection, including especially the patently false accusations.

By just making an accusation, a Spanish woman would get 426 Euro per month. Even when the accusation is false the State does not ask the money back. Judge Serrano tells that a woman said when the victim allowance expired that: "I'll just make another complaint to the poor men." In some cases, the spouses agreed mutually in making a false complaint, and then ignoring the subsequent removal order.

The benefits for accusers include: a house of the institute IVIMA at reduced price, citizenship for illegal immigrants, taxpayer-funded professional courses (to which in most of the cases students do not even bother to attend), recruitment in the public sector, a reduction in working hours, subsidies for obtaining a driving license, paid vacation and retirement pensions. To get this, a woman simply needs to file a complaint against an ex-husband. A social worker reported that women knocked at her office asking upfront:

> Where do I go to make an accusation to obtain the pay?

The Ministry of the Interior keeps a list of the accused men, and they remain on that list even after acquittal thus creating further problems for these men in customs, airports or employment. The judge writes: "This was a fraud that paid dividends in elections: 65% of the votes for PSOE were from women." (In the next elections after the publication of the book, the PSOE experienced the worst electoral defeat in its history).

When the feminist "gender violence law" (La Ley Contra la Violencia de Genero[1]) was under discussion, jurists who recognized that such laws "violate some of the basic principles of judiciary" were attacked by feminists. The Constitutional Court also recognized that, "the assumption that any abuse is always a manifestation of sexism is incompatible with the right to the presumption of innocence." But with political maneuvering the law was passed in 2004.

And so, the judge writes: "many of the accusations were found to be unfair, totally disconnected from a situation of domination. Many aggressive women were converted into victims, and the current legal situation allows this. It is virtually impossible, with the current law, given the violation of the principle of presumption of innocence, to determine when a complaint is false, unless the woman does confess."

When a woman wanted to get rid of her husband, who in the past suffered injuries becoming 84% paralytic, she accused him "of having threatened her with a spoon": under the feminist law the man was removed from his house and jailed. Another woman, who suffers from paranoid schizophrenia, accused her husband because "he put the salts in the bath." The man, removed from his house, was the caretaker of the lady. Another woman married an elderly suffering from Alzheimer's and accused him of "gender violence": so she got the money and his house (the children of the man eventually kicked her out).

According to the protocols imposed on hospitals by feminists, the symptoms of "gender violence" include: headache, gastrointestinal disorders, anxiety and eating disorders. It means that if a woman goes to a hospital for an ache, doctors can start an accusation without even asking her. Judges say that 80% of the accusations are "ridiculous infringements that they should not even get to court."

The feminist law also forbids family mediation. This increased the murders of women and especially the suicides of men – often separated dads who struggle to save their children. The judge acknowledges that "a disproportionate or unreasonable or false accusation can trigger a suicide or a murder of the author of the accusation."

False accusations also damage the economy. An entrepreneur falsely accused by his wife was kept away from his house, and consequently from the nearby industry: he had to close the business, and when he was finally acquitted even their children were reduced to poverty. More than 100 workers lost their jobs and another accusation ended with a surprise: another entrepreneur had secretly recorded his wife and her lawyer trying to extort one million of Euros (1.33 million US $) in exchange for the withdrawal of the false accusation.

Many complaints are based solely on the word of the accuser: this allows judges to judge whether they are credible, and consequently to have power over people's lives. Judge Serrano notices that the techniques used by judges to establish whether the accuser tells the truth have limited effectiveness, and to make matters worse, such techniques are known, so organizations who teach women "techniques of credibility" have developed.

The main victims are the children: "the current law is used as an instrument and weapon of alienation and victimization of children, deprived of the right to receive paternal affection. By making an allegation, one achieves the goal of removing children from their father, thus the accusation is an easy instrument of alienation.

The Judge proposes a legislative reform based on: family mediation, joint custody, penalties for false allegations, respecting constitutional rights, redefining what is abuse, punishing parental alienation as child abuse, and closing the special "courts of violence against women" because they are a "spurious system used for other purposes and a constant source of conflict".

In conclusion for the first part, Judge Serrano writes that:

> […]centuries ago there was the witch hunt, today it is the witches who hunt. The gender ideology hides a dictatorship based on deception, perversion and moral fraud. You have to decide whether you are for or against this dictatorship. And one has to do that not so much for us, but for our children's generation.

Part II. The gender ideology and its implementation in international organizations

We live in a society alienated by the Big Lie – the Gender Ideology – supported by the State which is the most hypocritical counter-reaction to the authentic feeling of Justice and Equality. It is a reactionary ideology that contaminated and poisoned all institutions and most centers of power.

The ideological foundations of the gender ideology are:

a) Women are universally oppressed

b) Gender is a social construct

Based on these two foundations, 6 big objectives of the gender ideology could be seen clearly in Spain:

1. The suppression of family and marriage. In line with the Marxist theory (according to which the workers must control the means of production) – women must control the reproduction independently from the universally oppressive male.
2. Deconstructing the concept of femininity. "The female sex is inferior because of the male interest of keeping it opposite." (Kate Millett)
3. The radical rejection of maternity. According to the gender ideology, women must become emancipated from their own bodies by rejecting maternity. Therefore, this ideology has supported widespread abortion, the institutionalization of as many children as possible and generally tends to refuse to care about the well being of children – especially about their need of a father.
4. Considering the male-female couple relationship as an arena of "class struggle" – thus further fueling rivalry and hatred against men.
5. Women must also be free from the sexual "repression" which were subjected to by morality. The more extreme ideologues (like Shulamit Firestone and Kate Millet) are going so far as to say that childhood is a social construct and "children need to be liberated through female pedophilia."
6. All heterosexual relationships are abusive. "The abolition of the heterosexual system is not only the lesbians' job but all feminists must participate in that and this has to be the primary objective of the feminist revolution"

(Adrienne Bogat)

Examining the implementation strategies of this ideology as they have been playing out in Spain, we get to find out that in the feminist mindset there is no such thing as a false allegation, there are no alienated and manipulated children, there are no men wrongfully imprisoned and, generally, there are no men who are abused.

In the face of the obvious failure of the "gender policies" in Spain – which determined an increase in the number of murdered women, the ideologues are now blaming the incorrect application of their ideology – mainly blaming the Judges who weren't "properly formed". The only escape they seem capable of now is an increase in the perversity of the system, more promotion of toxic messages and hypocrisy, more "gender campaigns", more mass-media intoxication and more limitations to the rights and liberties of individual people. Because, according to them, everyone needs to be re-educated: the journalists, the police officers, the teachers, the psychologists, the lawyers, etc.

Numerous authors of the gender feminist ideology have been through psychiatric facilities, have attempted to commit murder against men and had no problem in preaching overt hatred against men. How was it possible that their way of thinking to become the official ideology of international organizations?

Judge Serrano sees the answer to this question in a side effect of the Cold War which was mainly about capitalism versus communism and less about any other issue.

From 1969, feminism received a tremendous amount of funding in the capitalist West. The first "feminist studies" department in the US, according to Judge Serrano, was financed by the Ford Foundation and since then it continued to receive funding throughout the years from other foundations of influential people like the Rockefeller Foundation, Carnegie, Turner, McArthur, Bush, Bill and Melinda Gates Foundation, Kellogg, the Hitachi Corporation, György Soros (George Soros) and many others.

According to Judge Serrano, feminism was of interest for the West because it promoted abortion – which was considered a necessary policy in reducing poverty and other pressing issues. In this context, even the worst feminists, the gender feminists, who saw maternity as a "woman's worst horror" received an avalanche of subsidies and open doors to implement their ideology in the international centers of power. The other feminists who were interested in sensible issues, Judge Serrano writes, became virtually extinct from the forefronts of the movement, just like Christina Hoff Sommers writes in "Who stole feminism?":

> Equity feminism is simply the belief in the moral and judicial equality of the two sexes and aims towards achieving a fair treatment for everyone. Gender feminism however is an ideology which claims to cover everything and claims that all women everywhere are oppressed by a patriarchal system.

In 1975, in Mexico, the First World Conference of Women was organized to open the UN towards the feminist organizations. Soon after UNIFEM (United Nations Development Fund for Women) and INSTRAW (International Research and Training Institute for the Advancement of Women) were started. In December 1979, CEDAW (Convention on the Elimination of all Forms of Discrimination against Women) was also started.

In the initial phase, there was a little struggle between the Western feminists who wanted to use the UN to "change the stereotypical sociocultural behaviors of women and men" and the rest of the women in the UN who were interested in making "maternity a social function and acknowledgment of the joint responsibility of men and women in the act of raising children." Needless to say, the western feminists won the little struggle and in the third conference held in Nairobi, in 1985, they eliminated all the provisions regarding the family and redefined maternity as a sole individual right of women.

However, the Cold War ended with the sudden fall of communist dictatorship, and this equated almost with the end of the world for the socialist and communist leaders. They loved the comfort and the privileges of the strong capitalist economy but they could no longer lead the class struggle.

So many hateful intolerant ideologically-driven individuals were suddenly left without an objective and without a job. Some of them recycled in environmentalism and polluting that movement with central planning. Some others moved towards anti-racism and transformed that concept into an odious political correctness, and others reinvented feminism based on Engels' writings.

> The first class opposition that appears in history coincides with the development of the antagonism between man and woman in monogamous marriage, and the first class oppression coincides with that of the female sex by the male. [2]

The Marxist ideology, Judge Serrano writes, is in great accord with the gender feminist ideology, according to which "in order to eliminate the sexual classes, the oppressed class (women) needs a revolution through which to re-get the control over reproduction."[3]

With this ideological platform, on December 20, 1993, the United Nations General Assembly finally capitulated to the feminist ideology by adopting the plainly false doctrine according to which:

> violence against women is a manifestation of historically unequal power relations between men and women, […] and that violence against women is one of the crucial social mechanisms by which women are forced into a subordinate position compared with men,[…]
> The term "violence against women" means any act of gender-based violence that results in, or is likely to result in, physical, sexual or psychological harm or suffering to women[4]

These are no longer the illusions of some random woman who hates men. These are international documents who led to absurd convictions. It may sound as joke to some, but a Spanish man who farted in front of his wife was charged and convicted. A fart can cause "psychological harm" in UN terms so it was considered to be "gender based violence".

The final capitulation of the UN in front of gender feminism came during the most disputed World Conference that ever took place – the conference from 1995 from Beijing about "Equality, development and peace". The delegates from the Western countries, deep followers of the gender ideology, did not talk about equality at all, or about development or peace. All that mattered for them was the furthering of the gender agenda. The female delegates from the developing nations protested by shouting:

> This is not a conference about making a sexual revolution! If the European women want to talk about that, then they should make a different conference of their own!

When the western feminists wanted to introduce their new concept of "gender" in the documents, most of the delegates were opposed to the measure. However, they succeeded in their attempt by self-victimizing and claiming oppression. Judge Serrano writes that the western feminists claimed that not using the term "gender" instead of "sex" is an offensive and humiliating attempt to deny the rights of women and to intimidate the poor little Western feminists.

In front of this allegation, Judge Serrano writes, nobody dared to say anything. Since then, an entire feminist attack commenced over the international bodies: no more family, maternity support, and billions to promote abortion (sold as a defense against "gender violence" or by promoting "confidentiality" which meant that girls as young as 12 could seek abortion without parental consent and on taxpayers' money) were spent. On top of that, a huge number of international feminist organizations appeared (GEAR, DAW, OSAGI, UN Women, etc.) all of them filled with public servants paid with huge salaries.

A short search of the term "gender" on the World Bank's website gives 31,932 contracts and 1484 credit agreements. Judge Serrano writes that these represent money loaned to third world countries to push for adopting gender policies. After introducing the magic word “gender” in the international treaties, the feminist organizations just had to write “gender means of aquaculture in Cambodia” to get funds to promote the gender ideology instead of actually teaching fish farming.

Marvelous people like Kofi Annan (UN) and Irene Kahn (Amnesty International) benefited from scholarships paid by the Ford Foundation. Nowadays, however, these organizations are all about implementing Gender Feminism. Even the EU is now in serious danger of becoming entirely about feminism – especially if the Istanbul Convention is ratified, in which case this calumnious ideology will become the law in at least 28 nations.

Part III. The elimination of Judge Francisco Serrano Castro

Franciso Serrano Castro was the first Spanish judge to issue a protection order for a woman. For that, he received the AMUVI 2001 prize, an award granted by a feminist organization.

However, he became a target of the feminists when he was interviewed by the newspaper El Mundo on December 13, 2009. The newspaper titled: “A judge dares to break the taboo regarding violence against women.” In that interview he denounced the unidirectional manner in which the law is applied and explained that if a man files a protection order request, that man is denied protection for having the incorrect sex. He also mentioned that the law established higher punishments if the perpetrator of violence is a man and that over 90% of the “gender violence” allegations are rejected or end in acquittal and because of the application of this law, an immense number of men suffered an irreparable moral trauma.

He also mentioned in the interview that thousands upon thousands of men were imprisoned following the false statements made by women and yet no case of libel was allowed to pass. He also advocated for re-establishing the equality of punishment regardless of the sex of the perpetrator of violence and the abolition of the discrimination of men who were seeking protection from violence.

For daring to express this opinion, Judge Serrano was slandered by the feminists who engaged in a full-force character assassination campaign by calling him a “violence-friendly masculinist” and similar names.

An internal inquiry was started by the “Gender Violence Observer” who was a feminist, and she denounced Judge Serrano for expressing his ideas and accused him of being the president of an organization advocating for joint custody!

He was subjected to several disciplinary procedures which ended with the acknowledgment of the fact that the disciplinary procedure should not have started in the first place.

However, in the same time period, a complaint from a feminist was also filed. That feminist happened to be a secretary at the Ministry for Equality (Ministerio de Igualidad). Then another complaint, the third, came in which it was claimed that the judge had advocated terrorism. These were also rejected as ludicrous.

In this context, on March 30, 2010, the episode that would lead to the feminists’ success in eliminating Judge Serrano happened. A 12 year old child was presented in the Court accompanied by the grandfather requesting to be heard. Despite the parents’ divorce, the child wished to participate at a religious event that was due to take place two days later and the child wanted his father to be with him, just like he had been in previous years.

Since the mother had filed a “gender violence” complaint, the competence of the case had been taken by the special “women’s court.” However, the special judge was on vacation so the child got to be heard by Judge Serrano who conceded that in a normal world, this shouldn’t even be asked to a court of law and the kid should just go with the father at the religious event. The judge’s decision reads:

> According to the article 158.3 of the Civil Code, I order that the minor X be returned to the mother on Friday, April 2 at 11:00 AM, thus prolonging the vacation period with the father in order to make sure that the child can go early in the morning at the religious procession. The minor and the parents shall immediately be notified of this decision.

The child went to the ceremony and then returned to the mother. However, the mother filed a complaint claiming that the judge was responsible for psychological damages, purposeful mal-administration of the case (the Brotherhood of the Saint Friday is a religious procession considered to be an instrument of the Patriarchy), faking documents, conspiracy, etc. and she demanded 72,000 euros (over 96,000 US$) in reparations. In a normal world, this would be a joke – especially since in a previous case another judge had granted the right to take the child to a religious procession to a divorced mother.

The internal inquiry established that judge Serrano was correct to take responsibility for the case (given that the assigned judge was on vacation) and that what he ordered was proportional to the interests of the child. However, the feminists kept on pressing to end the procedure and went to the court culminating in an absolutely stunning result.

The story of a child who wanted to go to a religious procession went up to the Supreme Court of Justice. According to the Spanish jurisprudence, a conviction for the crimes investigated in the Supreme Court can only be secured if all the 5 judges unanimously decide that the defendant(s) is guilty. The rationale behind this is that if even the Supreme Judges can't agree regarding the guilt of the defendant, then it means that the matter is objectively questionable. This used to be the standard. But not in this case.

With a vote of 3 to 2, Judge Serrano was convicted at 10 years of inhabiltation (meaning that he cannot be a judge for this period of time). The three judges who voted in favor of his conviction are named using political criteria – namely by feminists who were in power in the times of the Gender Dictatorship.

The two judges who voted against said that the sentence Serrano got in the child's case cannot be considered unjust either morally (since everyone agreed that the child wanted to go to the religious ceremony) or juridical.

Judge Serrano filed an appeal at the Constitutional Court, and his battle to prove not only his innocence but that the principles of the feminist Gender Ideology are completely unacceptable in a European nation continues to this day.

Editorial note: If you can speak Spanish, buy Judge Serrano's book. This is review provides the contexts of the Spanish society in which the events of the book take place (which are not completely explained in the book), but the book itself explains how deep the feminist rabbit hole goes in Spain and is described in great detail by Judge Serrano. It's worth reading. If only we could have 4000 judges like Francisco Serrano, feminism would be completely out of Europe in less than a decade.

Also, the European News Department wishes to pass special thanks to Pasquale Binelli, Roberth Pascal and the other collaborators who wish to remain anonymous.

Movember is the month where men around the world grow a mustache to help raise awareness of health issues affecting men. And while some people claim that this is just symbolic, it does seem to make a difference in some lives.

Jeff McArthur of AM640 claims most sexual crimes committed by males

Attila L. Vinczer · 14 November 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Daddy Daycare? Not in Canada. A number of newspapers and radio show hosts spoke about an interesting story where a man, Guillaume Christen, experienced bigotry and androphobia as clients turned away from his daycare business in Quebec, Canada. Why? Simply because he is a male, fully qualified to run a daycare.

I caught Jeff McArthur, a talk show host on AM640 in Toronto interview Guillaume Christen. It was a good interview up to the point when Jeff made this statement at 4:20.

> "Sadly that we do have child predators, child sex offences in this country[Canada]. The majority if not all of them are male, male based, the convictions here…."

You can listen to the entire interview here.

I commented on the AM640 Facebook page which led to his response as follows. Please send Jeff McArthur your view about him alleging that majority if not all child predators and child sex offenders are males in Canada. jeff.mcarthur.169@facebook.com

- Attila Vinczer Jeff McArthur you need to publicly apologize for your offensively slanderous remark made on the radio about males. Yesterday, within the here above interview, you stated, "Sadly that we do have child predators, child sex offences in this country. The majority if not all of them are male, male based, the convictions here…." Where did you get this information? You are so off base, so incredibly wrong!

  This statement is grossly wrong and inconsistent with facts, putting men and boys in negative light and in fact is the reason why males have the ill negative stigma attached to them that has all males perceived as potential predators, rapists, child molesters, sex offenders who harm women and children. Statements like this are a big part of the problem and the reason why males are struggling in society, such as Guillaume Christen who you interviewed.

  I respectfully ask that you do some research, get the facts and report on the facts as they are. Please do not purport fallacious hearsay as fact.

  Jeff McArthur Attila Vinczer you do realize you are doing exactly what you are accusing me of, right? If you have data that shows the majority of charged and convicted child sex offenders in this country are in fact women I'd be happy to make the correction.

  Attila Vinczer Jeff McArthur, I am not merely accusing you of slander, you are culpable thereof. Please do explain how I am doing exactly the same as what you did? I am not a sophisticated man and simply do not understand how you came to your conclusion Jeff.

  The statement you have made is wrong and you will never find data to support your statement about males. I pointed out an error you made, perhaps inadvertently. An error that adds to the negative stigma attached to males. I would and have never made a statement as you did, about men or women, because I know there is no data to support it.

Rather than addressing the issue at hand, you point your finger at me. The onus is on you to provide evidence supporting your statement that, “Sadly that we do have child predators, child sex offences in this country. The majority if not all of them are male, male based, the convictions here….” If you can not provide evidence to support your statement, then you ought to apologize for slandering every male in Canada. I hope you realize and understand the mistake you have made.

- Dean Esmay Jeff’s actually right that the majority of charged and convicted sex offenders are male. Where he’s wrong is in assuming this means sexual predation is a mostly-male problem. The data overwhelmingly shows that this is not true; the authorities just rarely investigate or even take seriously reports of female sex predation. References for this right out of Canadian as well as other sources are readily available if Jeff is interested.

- Attila Vinczer I agree with you Dean, but Jeff’s comment on the radio did not revolve around the numbers of men being charged and convicted. He clearly asserted that the majority of child predators, child sex offences in Canada are male based and that is patently wrong and slanderous.

- Jeff McArthur Attila Vinczer according to Stats Can as of 2011 98 percent of those charged with level 1 sexual assault, child porn or sexual violations against children were male. So, my comments are neither wrong or slanderous. Furthermore, your incorrect argument obscures from what’s really at debate here. That this man is unable to pursue his goals or livelihood because of an unfair stereotype. Which many callers admitted they subscribed to. I would encourage you to listen to the full discussion to gain some insight and perspective.

- Dean Esmay Jeff, you keep using the word “charged.” This seems rather odd when Attila’s calling upon you to look at the actual victimization rates, and who victims report to be their predators.

  Your listeners would, I suggest, be well-served if you told them the truth: that the research shows clearly that Canadian government officials are by and large ignoring most female sex predators.

  References for this available upon request. Interested?

- Attila Vinczer I have listened to your piece live on air and a number of times at home in its entirety. Had you stated that the majority of those charged with level 1 sexual assault, child porn or sexual violations against children were male, my comment to you would have been quite different. You still have provided NO proof that,

  “Sadly that we do have child predators, child sex offences in this country. The majority if not all of them are male, male based, the convictions here….”

  That statement makes it appear there are no female child predators or child sex offenders which is as untrue as your statement intimating that only males are child predators and child sex offenders.

I agree with you and it is my argument that, as you say, “That this man is unable to pursue his goals or livelihood because of an unfair stereotype.” What you have failed to either acknowledge or understand is that you are attributing to that stereotype by making comments on air as you did.

I would strongly encourage you to attend the Toronto Domestic Violence Symposium scheduled for late May, 2014 that I am hosting by the Canadian Maltese Charitable Service Trust. We will have an array of MDs and Professors dilating on these matters and the very serious ill stigma attached to males that they are responsible for DV, rape, and sexual crimes. The keynote speaker will be Prof. Marty Fiebert. We will also have people such as Dr. Miles Groth, Erin Pizzey, and many others presenting and debunking the stereotype that males are branded with.

As an advocate for the rights of children and families, it is clear to me that women are not held to the same account when committing the exact same crime. It is also clear to me that decades of propaganda that men are evil while women are angels attitude has had the effect of men being vexatiously and maliciously pursued with many innocent men going to jail for crimes they did not commit. Moreover, these men are often charged, convicted and sentenced without any evidence and based on hearsay alone. William Mullins-Johnson is an excellent example of that abuse. False rape, DV and sexual assault by women is at an epidemic level. just ask people like Monti Hannona.

I will take your comment to [be] debated and see what response will come of it.

Her chief defense was really “I am a woman”

Yet, in the 21st century subjectivity, distortion and outright lying in non-fiction writing is the norm. Fraud is the new orthodoxy. Consequently, integrity is the new “transgressive.”

During the early decades of the 20th century in the United States , and other countries, such as France, it was well-known that women were not subject to the same accountability in cases of homicide in which the victim was male as members of the opposite sex were. That women had a “license to kill” was recognized by a large number of juries. Chicago was the most notorious of all cities in the us for this chivalric practice of routinely allowing women who kill to go free with little or no punishment. Such was the situation in this period that those cases in which a woman was actually found guilty and given a sentence appropriate the her homicidal crime that it was, in itself, a newsworthy topic.

The case of murderess Paulette Saludes, is one of these. she was found guilty of murder despite her pleading “emotional insanity,” the standard procedure for murderesses expecting to cox the jury into endorsing her right to kill. Mrs. Saludes lawyer stated plainly, according to news reports, that his client’s defense boiled down to that one principle that had such a storied reputation for melting the hearts of juries confronted with deciding the fate of a jealous woman who murdered a man whom she felt had betrayed her. That defenser was: “I am a woman.”

FULL TEXT: New York, March 8. – For the third time within a few weeks, the defense “I am a woman” has failed in a murder trial in New York and vicinity, and today Mrs. Paulette Saludes, pretty French woman of thirty, is lying in the Tombs awaiting a sentence of from 20 years to life imprisonment for the killing of Oscar M. Marttelliere, insurance broker.

Mrs. Saludes made a spectacular attempt to kill herself by taking arsenic and cutting her wrists as she was led across the Bridge of Sighs after hearing the verdict, but did not hurt herself much, the prison physician decided, later, when she attempted to smash her head against her cell wall, she was bound to her cot. Her condition was not serious, it was reported last night. She was hysterical, however, crying out in French to be permitted to die.

New York had almost become accustomed to seeing women have killed men turned loose. There were Nan Patterson, who was accused of killing Caesar Young; Mrs. Jack DeSaulles, the pretty Chilean, who slew her husband; Mme. Jacques LeBaudy, who killed her mate, “the emperor of the Sahara,” and many other cases.

~ Same Old Defense. ~

Mrs. Saludes’ lawyer, who had pleaded “emotional insanity,” the old plea that freed many women in this jurisdiction, stated plainly in his defense that his client’s chief defense was really “I am a woman” inferring that a woman whose love has been scorned and trampled by a man, as Mrs. Saludes claimed had been done to her by Martelliere, should not be held responsible for killing him.

While the pretty little French woman stood up unflinchingly, at first, to hear the verdict against her, another woman, the widow, holding tightly to her flaxen haired six year old daughter, who had been made an orphan by Mrs. Saludes’ pistol, slumped down and cried, but looked pityingly at the convicted woman as she was led away to the Tombs. Mrs. Marteilliere would not talk about the verdict.

New York has shown unusual interest in the Saludes trial, both because of its spectacular and dramatic incidents and also by reason of the recent conviction of murder of two other women who killed men. They were Mrs. Lillian Reizen, who killed Dr. Abraham Glickstein, in Brooklyn, and Mrs. Ivy Gilberson, who killed her husband at Tom's River, N. J. The city now looks forward to the trial of Mrs. Mary Wells, pretty housekeeper at the Massapaqua Inn on Long Island, who is charged with killing Captain James Pettit, proprietor of the inn.

Barret Weber, sociologist from the University of Alberta, coward

Paul Elam · 14 November 2013 · Archived copy · Original

When I first watched the video by a handful of young men, apparently from Edmonton, Alberta, it did not come as any surprise. Still, I sat through it, and listened to the hyperbolic accusations of misogyny, rape apology and victim blaming. I also listened to the smug "suggestions" that A Voice for Men change its name, because it was not a voice for those men.

Aside from the fact that it is A Voice for Men, not The Voice for Men, and the fact that no one at this site has ever even claimed to speak for all men, even men in the men's movement, much less men across the board, I still sat and listened attentively, wondering if there would be anything new. Of course there was not.

That includes the fact that the video posted on YouTube as a "response" to the work of Men's Rights Edmonton had comments and even ratings disabled to prevent the listening public from expressing their opinions about what was said.

Well, I have suggestions for the men in that video. One, the word "response" is not a word you should be using with a straight face. A response implies some sort of dialog. A response indicates some sort of exchange of ideas. Your blanket censoring of any opinions other than your own betrays the fact that dialog and exchanging ideas are not concepts you have picked up along life's road. Either that, or those ideas have been stripped from you courtesy of your "education."

Also, if you don't understand the difference between "a" voice and "the" voice, something as complicated as the open vetting of conflicting ideas in the arena of public opinion is probably too much to pile on your already taxed minds.

Or perhaps something else is the problem. Perhaps in order for A Voice for Men to qualify to speak for men like you, we actually do need to change the name. A Voice for Cowards, maybe? That is, after all, exactly what you are. And so is anyone who stands on the platform of social media with such defiant bravado, but then calculatedly preempts any dissent or dialog before it even has a chance to be expressed.

And in that I am speaking most pointedly to you, Barret Weber, sociologist from the University of Alberta.

I have a bit more understanding for young college students, eager to please both women and their professors, parroting the ideologically tainted teaching of concepts like rape culture and male privilege. I am also well aware of the academic and social peril faced by many who might otherwise stand up to challenge such ideas in the very environment that should be fostering and encouraging dissent and passionate debate.

You have them quite literally over a barrel. And in this video, which you now have laughably listed alongside your dissertation and other academic papers, you demonstrate the only way to keep those boys on the farm is have them emulate your cowardly control of the discourse.

I understand your fear. And you do have every reason to be afraid. What will become of these young men's minds should they too often see the reasoned rebuttals and challenges to concepts like rape culture, male privilege, patriarchy theory and other fanciful feminist concoctions that can't even survive the scrutiny of a YouTube audience?

My God, would they start to think for themselves? Would they perhaps come to the conclusion that they have been sold a bill of goods by a system ruled by insulated and arrogant academicians?

The shame is that they will find out anyway in due course. The first time one of them winds up in a family court fighting to retain some of his income, or a shred of his relationship with his children, he will get a dire and different view of male privilege, Mr. Weber.

His view of the matter might be so stark and disturbing that he becomes one of the men who kill themselves at a rate 11 times that of women during divorces in your country. If he is strong, though, and perseveres, by the time the divorce is over he can return to the norm, which is to suicide at only four or five times the rate of women.

Perhaps one of these young men will get a glimpse of real power by being falsely accused of sexual assault or intimate partner violence on your campus. I am sure your disciplinary proceedings will be quite a lesson on due process and justice, on where terms like presumed innocence do and do not apply.

Perhaps it will be just a matter of time before you can hold hearings on YouTube, where you can control evidence the same way you do opinions.

Better not to speak of these things, though, eh? After all, if these young men really started looking at the realities faced by men and boys in the culture in which they live, they might do something really terrible.

Like counting.

They might just start looking at how many of them are even on that campus to being with. They might notice just how disproportionately they are outnumbered by women, and seeing it as something more than increased opportunities for sex.

If they do that they might also do some checking and find how the numbers of male students are dropping across your nation at an alarming rate. Just knowing this might make some of them question precisely why they are being coercively indoctrinated into placing all the focus and concern on the negative experiences of women, and why indeed the frequency and severity of those experiences are so often manufactured by ideologues like you.

Admittedly, it is likely not going to happen with this particular group. They look well trained and obedient; primed to lift their “I need feminism because…” cards for the camera seeking only a nod of approval.

That, however, brings me to the real reason for this post, professor. While you have them now, the writing is on the wall that the days of ideological scumbags owning the sexual discourse, and the academic bullying to maintain that hegemony, are finally within reach of seeing the curtain close.

As I am sure you are aware, there is a great controversy brewing in your country, and now in mine, over the establishment of men’s issues groups in institutions of higher education. Not men’s issues groups of your vision, but men’s issues groups with the vision of men like me and others who have had enough the poisonous orthodoxy and demagoguery from those of your ilk.

These are men’s groups that actually focus on issues that affect men; that see them as human beings worthy of attention and worthy of more than obediently reading cue cards for people who could not be less interested in their well-being.

And that is why you and your kind are so completely and totally fucked.

You see, any objective analysis of the lives of the men on your campus reflects the reality that they do not have privilege, at least not compared to the women on your campus. That examination also reveals that people like you have demonized them and indoctrinated them into self-loathing and shame in order to further your own agenda. You have convinced them that they are all potential rapists and abusers, congenitally defective because of their sex, and in need of paying homage to your personal worldview in order to find any sense of worth or redemption.

It has worked for quite some time because sycophants like you owned the discourse; because there was no counter-theory available to these young men to help pull them from the mire of disinformation; because there was no milieu available for them to provide support, a route of escape and an intellectual safe haven.

And now that alternative is emerging. You see it happening. Everybody does, which is why this subject is starting to draw obsessive attention from the media. It is the only reason why you set these young men out to make their impotent statement on your behalf.

Do not think for a moment you have fooled anyone. The days are gone when your lies go unanswered, and you cannot stop it by getting boys to speak for you and disabling comments on your propaganda.

Not only can you not stop it, you just accelerate the process. So please, professor, continue. Round up your student puppets again and again. Make a hundred more videos and tell a thousand more lies. Each lie you tell and every student you use strengthens us more than you know. We will run them on this site every time. And we will use your actions to grow this cause, which is dedicated to flushing your insane ideas down the toilet.

The poster campaigns will continue. The men's issues centers, run on a philosophy that recognizes the toxicity of gender feminism, and geared to correct it, will continue. The activism done by this website and other men's groups will continue. We are going to burn your sick ideas to the ground. Then we will paint our faces and dance circles around the fire.

There is nothing you can do to stop it.

David Cameron's government is a wretched hive of scum and misandry

AVfM Video Source · 14 November 2013 · Archived copy · Original

British Prime Minister David Cameron, a Conservative (also known as a Tory), recently declared himself a feminist. In the meantime, here's what other members of his coalition have to say about men:

What this says to us is what we've always said: the whole notion that men and boys' issues are "left vs right" is bonehead stupidity. All major parties in the English-speaking world are openly misandrist. At least, that appears to be true in the UK, the US, and Canada. We've heard a few nice things about the Liberals recently elected in Australia but we aren't going to be shocked if they disappoint.

If you're male, you're disposable motherfucker. That's the message. Take it to the bank, and fuck them all until they're shamed out of this despicable behavior.

Tips for sociologist Barret Weber and his captive students

AVfM Video Source · 14 November 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Recently, sociologist Barret Weber of the University of Alberta appears to have put together a video in which they condemn the Men's Human Rights Movement without even talking to us. We find this both comical and commonplace. AVfM Senior Editor Alison Tieman has some helpful tips for Weber, his students, and his like-minded cohorts.

How not to look like the Undead: a lesson for male feminists.

We hope that Weber will learn how to listen to women, and will teach his students these lessons that a Woman's Voice is trying to teach them. Open your heart and listen to the wisdom of women, Barret!

Bonus: here's a few other women you might want to open your mind to. We offer this in the spirit of loving compassion and tolerance.

The myth of rape myths

Diana Davison · 15 November 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Are we are all living in a world of mythical delusion? Is the world that you subjectively experience so far removed from reality that you can't be trusted to sit on a jury? This is the question that vexed Helen Reece, a Reader in Law at the London School of Economics and Political Science (LSE).

Feminist discourse asserts that "rape myths" are rampant in society to the effect that they disable the average person from being able to either understand or ascertain the seriousness of the crime of rape. According to feminists, the public is so deeply immersed in "rape culture" or "rape supportive attitudes" that we have trouble recognizing when a crime has been committed. This suggestion is a serious accusation and Helen is a very serious woman willing to tackle this question with logic instead of just agreeing for the sake of getting along.

In July, 2013, the Oxford Journal of Legal Studies published a summary article of Helen Reece's paper entitled "Rape Myths: Is Elite Opinion Right and Popular Opinion Wrong?" In the article Helen Reece presents a challenge to how feminists are corrupting logic, law, and language.

> The claim that rape myths are widespread may be challenged on three grounds: first, some of the attitudes are not myths; secondly, not all the myths are about rape; thirdly, there is little evidence that the rape myths are widespread. To a troubling extent, we are in the process of creating myths about myths, or 'myth myths'.

While the feminist rhetoric currently shaping the existing "rape myth" studies have had significant influence upon the court system thus far, feminists simultaneously declare that their efforts have had no impact on a "rape supportive" society. By denying their results feminists are able to avoid responsibility for the negative impact that their changes may have caused and to decry anyone, like Helen Reece, who questions the reasonableness of feminist demands upon the legal system as a comprehensive institution that also has a duty to protect the accused.

When the Rape Myth Attitude (RMA) surveys were administered they did not yield the high results expected so researchers decided to "expediate" their process of proving "rape culture" by manipulating the questions. It was their assumption that people taking the test were recognizing the politically correct answers and responding in the presumed "correct" manner, thereby skewing the results. To make the test results match their expectations, RMA surveys made their questions more ambiguous and bell curved the results.

Helen points out that "This is as fallacious as making the driving test practically impossible to pass, then treating the resulting failure rate as evidence of appalling driving." While bell curves can be useful at times they are particularly problematic in determining "the awfulness of people's attitudes."

Academic studies require peer review and RMA surveys have not been properly scrutinized because the manipulated results adhere to popular myths about rape myths. If we are to let these studies influence the legal system, as they demand we do, Helen presents important concerns to be addressed about the research being submitted as fact.

A specific point of RMA survey questioning involves asking people if a woman inviting a man to have coffee means sex. Not only is the wording a key element to the absurdity of this question it begs the question of what normal, every day people use as an indication of sexual receptivity.

Helen suggests that the more people who respond to state that asking someone to have coffee with you is a sign of sexual interest, the more weight it gives to the social norm of an invitation of coffee being a legitimate pickup line.

Surely Skepchick would agree.

The media attention given to "elevatorgate" and Rebecca Watson's insistence that a man asking her to have coffee with him was sexual harassment, lends to the credibility that asking someone to have coffee with you is an understood euphemism for wanting to fuck. The public should now agree that coffee invitations are, in fact, a sexual invitation. Interestingly, the only people who agreed with Watson were the feminists, seeking to demonize the man who offered the coffee.

The public rejection of this feminist notion, that coffee equals sex, indicates that feminists are more likely to believe this rape myth than anyone else and they have projected their own absurd ideas onto the general public.

Despite the effort to make consent appear black and white, Helen argues that signs of consent in the real world are very messy and that considering the context around a person's actions is much more important to legal analysis than we are being asked to believe. Due to a lack of proper research in what consent looks like when it goes right and exclusive focus on what it is like when it goes wrong, she feels that "participant's answers should be treated with respect: the best evidence we have of how women show consent to sex is how people say women show consent to sex."

Context is everything.

One of Helen's concerns with feminist methodology in "rape myth" research is the removal of the requirement that rape myths needed to be "demonstrably false." Without this stipulation we end up with "the oxymoronic 'true myth'." This is a case where something is oddly declared to be a myth but it may be factually accurate.

Problematic to the RMA studies is that the surveys purport to show how many people "blame the victim" when, in fact, none of the surveys use the word "blame". The moral judgements inferred onto the results are actually just a result of researchers injecting their own moral values onto the responses. The only thing determined by the surveys is that a number of people, who may be factually correct, did not hold the same ethical opinions as the researchers.

The law, by design, is intended to deal with facts.

This slippery slope of interpretation by moral comparisons was tobogganed into our narrative by researchers riding on surrogate words for blame, such as "responsibility". Helen questions whether or not "responsibility" is a good substitute for the word "blame." Some of the public, including rape victims themselves, will attribute a portion of their actions as having contributed to the circumstances that led to a rape. This is fact. It is quite established that drinking excessively in public contributes to vulnerability. What the survey doesn't establish is whether or not the public feels that a responsibility factor attributes blame to the victim or whether they were merely agreeing it contributed to vulnerability.
