Where the studies report that people hold myths about "real rape," defined as stranger attacks with weapons involved, Helen Reece queries "What does this even mean? Does it mean that people believe 'real rape' is the only sort of rape, the most common sort of rape, or the most serious type of rape? The only strong evidence for any of these propositions is that 'real rape' is more likely to lead to a conviction at the end of a trial. But this doesn't mean that jurors believe the 'real rape' myth — they might just find it easier to convict when the evidence doesn't boil down to whose story they believe."

When rape attitude surveys are more interested in judging other people on their personal moral scales than in actually establishing fact for the pursuit of justice it is important for people, such as Helen Reece, to defend the institution of the law. As it currently stands, the law has an interest in making sure defendants are presumed innocent until proven guilty and making sure they are granted the right to a fair trial.

These surveys declare that the public, the judges, the police, and all individuals involved in the court process are too steeped in myth to be capable of judgement due to "rape supportive attitudes." That is a big accusation and only people within the legal system are in a position to defend against these accusations.

Helen Reece proposes that proving immorality in mass popular culture is not as cut and dried as feminists would like to pretend. If comparative analysis is done, conviction rates for rape are not actually out of scale with other crimes. She remarks that feminist studies do not even bother to compare their myth myths to attitudes about other types of violations.

The myth that many people believe “women cry rape” is unsupportable because “there needs to be a discrepancy between the proportion of women who people believe ‘cry rape’ and the proportion of women who do in fact ‘cry rape’. A problem is the lack of precision in the data on both these proportions.” Until such data is acquired, the “cry rape myth” might actually be a fact.

Quite often, and for good reason, the law is very focused on the meaning of words and how to enforce those meanings. As much as the law is designed to be followed, the law is also intended to be understandable. Feminist inspired changes to the law have introduced ambiguous words that undermine the clarity of what is expected from the public in order to comply with the law.

Feminists have succeeded in increasing reported rapes but the failure to increase convictions is not due to “rape myths” it is due to an inability to be sure “beyond a reasonable doubt” where the complex sexual behaviour of human beings meets the dubious wording of the new laws about consent.

Of the many reforms made to the legal system, rape is now defined by a lack of active consent instead of the presence of sexual rejection. These changes have been made without acknowledgement or research into how people interact with each other in real life. This does not seem either progressive or productive.

Helen Reece has expressed her concern that where the line between sex and rape in drawn is not as simple as feminists purport, not as mythical as they project, nor as dire as they propose. Her line of questioning is not misogynistic, or even anti-feminist, it is the reasonable doubt presented by people who seek to keep the legal system in line with reality. Helen Reece just seems to love the law, and what it represents.

Feminists claim we live in a rapey dystopia. If you don’t agree with them and fail to convict every man accused of a crime against women, you have an “attitude” problem.

Someone needs to explain to feminists how the legal system was designed and for what purpose. Perhaps that person will be Helen Reece.

Sources:
http://blog.oup.com/2013/07/myths-about-rape-myths/
http://ojls.oxfordjournals.org/content/early/2013/03/13/ojls.gqt006.full.pdf+html?sid=abf0e5fb-13fb-4025-9ef6-9b1056e1aaec

Patriarchy blows it again

Robert Franklin · 15 November 2013 · Archived copy · Original

One invariable element of the laundry list of grievances cited by feminists for the proposition that society is a deck stacked against women is the fact that, compared to men, there aren't many women who hold public office. Indeed, I remember many years ago hearing U.S. Congresswoman Patricia Schroeder, D – CO, inform us that it was "outrageous" that the percentage of women serving in Congress was so low. The emphasis in her voice and her "frown and wrinkled lip" gave all and sundry the impression that she was well and truly ticked off.

Back then, I didn't know much about the subject, but my off-the-cuff reaction was "Hey, we live in a democracy. People vote, and women outvote men. So what's outrageous? Does Schroeder really believe that women are biased against female candidates?"

Of course my common-sense approach to the issue didn't hold any water with feminists. When they think they've got an issue, they don't let it go, facts and logic be damned. So, as I said, the comparative lack of women holding elected office has remained a staple of feminist wah-wahing over the years.

In the meantime, we've learned the reason women don't get elected to office. It's because they don't run for office. That's true throughout the U.S., Canada, the U.K. and Western Europe. In fact, France had to pass a law fining political parties if they fail to run gender-balanced slates. That's a significant impetus for the parties to recruit female candidates. After all, who wants to pay the fine when all you have to do is slap a woman's name on the ballot? So what do the parties do? They pay the fine. They just can't seem to recruit many women to run for office.

Now, feminists weren't born yesterday and their long experience has allowed them to polish to a high gloss the art of victimhood. So it's not enough to point out that, in order to get elected, one must toss one's pillbox in the ring. They have a ready-made answer for that, as you knew they would.

The feminist answer is that the business of electoral politics simply isn't conducive to participation from women. It's a key part of The Patriarchy's stranglehold on women that it's convinced people – men and women alike – that women aren't as good as men, not as worthy. So, given that, it's no surprise that women (and men) don't elect women to office. Both sexes look down on women, believing them to be insufficiently smart, tough, whatever, to do the important job of representing We the People.

Therefore, since The Patriarchy has so stacked the deck that women can't get elected, women, not being fools, don't run. Why play a game you can't win?

With that excuse firmly in hand, feminists figure it's a job well done. Once again, The Patriarchy is the all-purpose answer to every feminist complaint and, as an extra added bonus, they don't even need to fudge the figures. What's so inconvenient about things like domestic violence, child custody, violent crime, etc. is that, if you're a feminist, you're always having to make stuff up. But with electoral politics, the data are there for all to see. Women really do make up only a small percentage of office-holders.

But of course they're wrong – again. The problem with the feminist claim that evil men have convinced everyone that women are too deficient to merit your vote is that it's just not true. We know it's not true. We've known it definitively for almost 20 years.

That's when three political science researchers did the obvious thing. Prof. Richard A. Seltzer at Howard University, and Jody Newman and Melissa Voorhees-Leighton of the National Women's Political Caucus looked at election results to find out if female candidates really did find themselves behind the 8-ball on election day.

And they didn't go half measures either. For their 1997 book, Sex as a Political Variable, the three analyzed every single race for the U.S. House of Representatives and the U.S. Senate from 1972 – 1994. They also examined every race for state legislatures in the years 1986, 1988, 1990, 1992 and 1994. That all added up to a whopping 61,603 candidates.

Knowing how important incumbency is to a candidate's prospects for success at the ballot box, Seltzer, et al divided candidates into three types, incumbents, open-seat challengers, and challengers (i.e. those running against incumbents). They divided them further into male and female candidates.

And guess what. The findings were as clear as a mountain stream.

"When women run, women win… as often as men do. Our study found no difference between success rates for men and women in general elections. Based on the overwhelming weight of the data gathered, the conclusion is clear: A candidate's sex does not affect his or her chances of winning an election.

…[W]hen men running as incumbents were compared with women running as incumbents, men running for open seats with women running for open seats, and men running as challengers with women running as challengers, men had no advantage over women; women won as high a percentage of their races as men.

The percentage of women holding office at each level is strikingly similar to the percentage of women candidates who have sought each public office. From 1972 – 1994, 8 percent of the candidates for the U.S. House and U.S. Senate were women, and in 1995, women made up 11 percent of the House and 8 percent of the Senate. Since 1986, 21 percent of state legislative candidates have been women and in 1995 women made up 22 percent of all state legislators.

So, for example, in state house races, male incumbents won 93.8% of the time while female incumbents won 93.6%. In open seat races, men won 53% and women 52.2%. Male challengers won 9.7% of the time and female challengers 10.9%.

In state senate races, it was more of the same. Male incumbents – 92.2%; female incumbents – 90.1%. Male open-seat candidates – 54.9%; female open-seat candidates – 55.8%. Male challengers – 11.6%; female challengers – 15.2%.

And in U.S. House races, male incumbents won 94.8% of the time while female incumbents won 93.6%. Male open-seat candidates – 51.2%; female open-seat candidates – 47.9%. Male challengers 6.2%; female challengers – 4.0%.

Why don't women run for office? Good question. Maybe they're smart enough to avoid the disgraceful clown act that electoral politics has increasingly become. Maybe the public ceremony of false sincerity, false humility and false gravitas sickens them. Maybe the deception of pretending to care about The People while carrying the water for moneyed interests fails to allure. Who knows? But whatever the reason, it's not because they can't get elected if they try.

What a surprise; the feminists are wrong again. It seems the mean ol' Patriarchy has once again failed in its singular goal of keeping women in their place – pregnant and chained to the stove. The men who run things and who daily connive to persuade us that women are lesser beings seem to have blown it again.

People aren't at all convinced that men are superior to women. In the author's word, "overwhelmingly" they ignore the sex of the candidates on the ballot. The simple fact is that sex just doesn't enter into the decision about whom to vote for (or against). Unlike feminists, people respect women every bit as much as they do men, at least in the realm of electoral politics.

I know this comes as terrible news to radical feminists who desperately hope and pray for everyday people to demean and despise women. If only the unwashed masses who've never attended a Women's Studies course would fall into line and behave the way feminist discourse predicts, feminists would have a lot easier time of it. If only their voting patterns betrayed a deep-seated mistrust of women, those radical feminists would have something to point to when they say The Patriarchy brainwashes everyone to devalue women.

Sadly, people don't share the anti-female bias of feminists. Most folks actually seem to think men and women are about equally deserving of respect.

Early morning interview: Dayton, Ohio

AVfM Video Source · 15 November 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Men's Human Rights Activists gather in Dayton for a press conference. In the early morning hours, an impromptu conversation begins.

http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=D39dPDjCl2k&feature=youtu.be

We will be meeting at the Dayton Municipal Court, 301 West Third Street, Dayton, Ohio at 11:30 am.

How the tabloids encourage child abuse

Angry Harry · 16 November 2013 · Archived copy · Original

This article will show you how the tabloid newspapers purposely foment child sex abuse on a massive scale in order to make piles of money from the plight of child abuse victims.

1. The vast majority of child abusers and their victims are intimately related in some way. The perpetrators are usually family members, family friends or adults who are closely associated with the victims; e.g. school teachers.

In most cases, therefore, the victims do not see their abusers as hostile predators. They see them as nice people.

They like them.

This is true in about 95% of cases.

As such, most victims will not want to see their abusers' lives ruined; especially if, for example, they see the inappropriate behaviour as harmless and/or pleasant.

And they will not want to see their abusers labelled as 'disgusting perverts' – as tabloid newspapers tend to portray them.

The upshot is that they are less likely to seek help thanks to the tabloids.

2. Indeed, most victims would hate to see their intimates vilified publicly – particularly given that such vilification would undoubtedly have disastrous consequences for their own families and intimate circles.

For example, the last thing that most victims would want to see is hostile publicity directed towards their own fathers, uncles or boyfriends etc.

Once again, therefore, the antics of the tabloids are going to reduce the likelihood that victims seek help.

3. Publicly identifying abusers very often means that the young victims cannot escape being publicly associated with them. For example, if the abuser happens to be a family member, then the whole family is, effectively, identified.

It must be a deeply unpleasant experience for child victims to have to face hundreds of schoolmates – on a daily basis – who have learned that their fathers, uncles etc., etc., are child abusers.

As such, publicity is most definitely not in the "best interest of the child" but is, in fact, seriously damaging to the child.

The tabloids are messing up the lives of abused children.

Putting it bluntly: In order to make money, the tabloids are, once again, messing up the lives of abused children.

4. Perhaps one of the most disgraceful and disgusting of antics engaged in by the tabloids is the persistent declaration that a child will necessarily be "ruined for life" following sexual abuse.

Apart from being untrue, it takes a significant degree of malevolence to tell children that their lives are now ruined as a result of some incident.

Would you, as parents, ever tell your children that their lives are now ruined as a result of some incident?

Surely not.

And yet this is what the tabloids keep injecting into the minds of victims of child abuse.

In other words, children who have already suffered abuse, are then told by the tabloids (and by everyone else who now believes this nonsense) that they are now permanently damaged beings.

How much more reprehensible can these tabloid editors become?

Surely, to attempt to convince an abused child that his or her life is now ruined, is such an appalling thing to do, that it should be regarded as a criminal offence by anyone who cares about our children.

5. The details surrounding child abuse cases as reported in the tabloids might sound horrifying to some people, but for certain types of predatory paedophiles they are likely to be exciting. Furthermore, such details are also likely to arouse inappropriate sexual thoughts in people whose minds have never previously ventured into such avenues.

The upshot is that, across the country, the likelihood of child abuse by sexual predators will increase.

The hostile hysteria over child abuse causes perpetrators to intimidate their victims into silence much more harshly

6. Persistently and purposely raising the hostile hysteria over child abuse causes perpetrators to intimidate their victims into silence much more harshly; for the obvious reason that the hostile hysteria makes them far more fearful of being caught.

In some cases they are so fearful of being caught that they kill their victims.

Indeed, we know from the testimonies of many perpetrators who have killed their victims that the main reasons for their killings were to avoid being caught – i.e. by eliminating the witnesses to the events.

In other words, child victims are more severely intimidated or even killed thanks to the antics of the tabloids.

As such, the behaviour of the tabloids is unconscionable.

7. It is impossible to believe that the hysteria has not deterred millions of men from engaging in circumstances where children are to be found – particularly given the appalling manner in which men are treated following mere accusations.

As a result, men are turning their backs on numerous professions – teachers, doctors, nurses, social workers, youth workers etc., and they are also more often avoiding contact with any children.

This increasing alienation is not good for men, women, children or society – for many reasons.

Children also have a civilising effect on men

Amongst others things, this alienation removes the influences of ordinary men on our growing boys – leaving our boys somewhat abandoned, unguided and, hence, often anti-social or feral – with similar effects going in both directions – i.e. men also have a civilising effect on children.

This leaves thousands upon thousands of our children living in circumstances and neighbourhoods that are completely infested with anti-social behaviour, violence, crime, drug-taking and inappropriate – often unprotected – sex. Sometimes an underworld of endless nastiness and cruelty.

It reduces considerably the likelihood that men will be able successfully to deal with children, understand them, or be good fathers to them. After all, how are men supposed to learn anything about children if they are too scared to relate to them?

It reduces the chances of single mothers being able to find partners willing to take on their children – or even male friends to help them out – which means that they often have to cope entirely on their own.

It reduces the likelihood that adults will even notice that children are being abused; e.g. see The Damage Caused by False Accusations.

It reduces the number of adults to whom children can turn should they ever want to talk privately about an issue concerning abuse. (For example, if teachers are not close to the children, then the children will not find them approachable with regard to personal problems.)

It reduces the chances of child porn being reported. (The evidence for this is clear. After all, who wants to admit to having come across such a thing in the current climate of hysteria?)

The above factors all increase the incidence of child abuse across the country, and the tabloids bear significant responsibility for all of them.

Young girls who live in homes wherein the tabloids are read are far more likely to be sexualised at an early age

8. It is surely undeniable that young girls who live in homes wherein the tabloids are read are far more likely to be sexualised at an early age.

The Sun and the Daily Mail, for example, are forever lauding and glamorising women (particularly celebrities) for their sexy attire, the scantiness of their dress, their lovely skin, their feminine body parts, their overall shapes and, very often, their lewd behaviours.

The message to the young girls who have this kind of material in their homes is very clear.

Don't be shy. Be sexy. Wear little clothing. Show yourself off.

And people will love you.

This kind of thing will affect girls of very young age.

Youngsters are always trying to look older and to emulate adults.

Twelve year olds want to be like fourteen year olds, who want to be like sixteen year olds, who want to be like eighteen year olds.

The upshot is that these young girls are daily encouraged by the tabloids to behave and dress in a manner that is likely to attract sexual attention – not only from paedophiles, but from any young men or boys who happen to encounter them.

Indeed, there is nothing 'perverted' about men and boys finding young women or girls to be sexually attractive; especially if they encourage sexual attention.

And the tabloids are misleading the public when they are forever suggesting otherwise.

Encouraging young girls to become more attractive sexually to millions of men – i.e. not just to 'perverts' – results in a great deal of child abuse

Putting it bluntly: Encouraging young girls to become more attractive sexually to millions of men – i.e. not just to 'perverts' – results in a great deal of child abuse and child sexuality throughout the nation.

I do not have any doubt that some objective research in this area would show that the children of parents who bring such tabloids into their homes are far more likely to be sexually abused and/or are far more likely to become sexually active at an earlier age.

As such, parents who bring such newspapers into the home should be castigated for doing so.

And I think that the government should be funding such research if it really cares about our children.

Of course, in a free society, one could argue that freedom of speech is hugely important and that newspapers should be entitled to have their readers constantly drooling over young (often celebrity) women.

A fair point.

But it does not address the important issue being discussed here – viz, that these newspapers are increasing the amount of child abuse in the country by encouraging children to behave sexually.

And their editors should be criticised for this.

The tabloids seem to forget that millions of our citizens are little things with sensitive minds and immature thought processes

The tabloids seem to forget that millions of our citizens are little things with sensitive minds and immature thought processes – beings who need to be protected from hostile psychological onslaughts and from temptations to head off into sexual pathways that are difficult to negotiate – pathways which can often lead to serious problems.

And so these tabloids should not be viewable by impressionable youngsters, in my view.

For example, they should not be on display in areas frequented by children, and they should certainly not be brought into homes where young children can read them.

I am not suggesting that their "freedom of speech" should be curtailed, merely that it should not be so readily available to our youngsters.

An oft-used but rather weak counter-argument to this view is that, with the internet, children can seek to access, or stumble upon, such material with ease, so why point a finger at the tabloids?

But this argument fails in practice.

Firstly, it is not true to say that children cannot be protected by using filtering software or various other devices that are being developed. They most certainly can be protected to some significant extent with these methods.

Secondly, responsible parents can ensure that their children aged, say, 12 and under, do not have the opportunity to roam freely on the internet.

Thirdly, even though some children will seek to access, or stumble upon, inappropriate material on the internet, this situation is completely different from them seeing this material lying on the kitchen table on a regular basis – something which would endorse the 'sexy lifestyle' being depicted.

The most popular newspapers in our UK prisons – most popular also among violent prison inmates and predatory paedophiles – are the tabloids

9. The most popular newspapers in our UK prisons – most popular also among violent prison inmates and predatory paedophiles – are the tabloids; with the Sun being #1 in the UK, judging by what one forever sees inside prisons and on Police TV shows.

I do not have any doubt that this is something that needs to be looked at – because it seems to me that the tabloids are far more culpable when it comes to promoting violence, predatory sexual behaviour and criminality than is, say, general porn that can be found on the internet.

But, once again, I am not arguing for a clampdown on free speech. On the contrary, I am saying that we should use our own free speech to counter the continual purposeful hate-stirring of the tabloid press.

The tabloids are far more interested in making money by persistently making a fuss about the few perpetrators who get caught, and far less interested in protecting children.

They strongly discourage the vast majority of victims from seeking some kind of help by threatening them and their intimate abusers with publicity and hostility. They seriously damage further all victims of child abuse by persistently indoctrinating them with the view that they are now damaged for life – which is just not true. They fuel the general public's sexual interest in children and incite fantasies of child sex in the minds of paedophiles.

They encourage child abusers to intimidate, harm or even kill their victims in order to silence them. They cause millions of decent adults to turn their backs on children – with the effects of this causing numerous problems for children and for society as a whole. They go out of their way to sexualise young girls; thus making them – particularly teenage girls – much more sexually attractive to millions of men.

Indeed, if they sexualise 50 girls, 500 men will notice them.

The fact that the tabloids are the most popular newspapers among violent offenders and sex offenders should tell us something.

Lest you think that I exaggerate about the lack of concern for the children that tabloid newspaper editors forever pretend to care about, here is one of their tweets on Twiitter – making a joke about the kidnapped child, Madeleine McCann …

[image]

Following the horrible murder of Bijan Ebrahimi , the Daily Mail continues to incite violence against paedophile suspects with an article headlined, "I beat Saville to a pulp after I heard his sickening boasts about bedding young girls'.

Needless to say, many of the comments below the piece – for which the Daily Mail is responsible – also incite both violence and murder of suspects.

All in all, therefore, one can surely conclude with a high degree of confidence that many tabloid newspapers not only encourage child abuse and paedophilia – as per my article above – but that they also incite violence and murder.

And then, of course, there are the numerous suicides that take place every year by those who have been falsely accused. After all, the public are led to believe that false allegations are rare; and so the falsely accused will automatically be seen as 'guilty' by most people.

These people often lose their jobs, their homes, their friends and their families – with their reputations, their careers and social prospects forever damaged horribly – sometimes even having their faces shoved into the public's consciousness by the media; and splashed all over the internet – with the false accusations never to disappear.

According to the Daily Mirror a few days ago …

A man falsely accused of historical child abuse leapt to his death from a bridge, an inquest heard.

Graham Smith, 56, was accused last November of sexually abusing a young girl more than 20 years ago.

Police exonerated him but the dad-of-one became depressed.

His brother Michael told the hearing in Hull: "He became a hermit."

Mr. Smith, who lived in Hull city centre, left a suicide note before jumping from the Humber Bridge in June.

Verdict: Suicide.

And I also wonder how many people have committed suicide because they were indoctrinated to believe that their abuse had damaged them irreparably?

After all, they would never be normal again.

So there was absolutely no hope for them!

?

Child Abuse – physical, psychological, emotional and sexual

Young/Teen Sexuality and Sexualisation

Paedophilia

Adult Interest in Child Sex

Suspicion -> alienation of men, women and children – false allegations

Violence

Murder

Suicide

All fuelled by the tabloids.

A decent society should not have to put up with this.

Circumcision is a universal horror. So why do some of London's most powerful feminists refuse to save boys from genital mutilation?

Peter Wright · 16 November 2013 · Archived copy · Original

London's feminists have found a brand new hot-topic – and, seemingly, they're not willing to share the stage with anyone. Especially baby boys.

Which is ironic given that their area of concern, involuntary circumcision, is a horror that doesn't discriminate. It effects people from all over the world, both male and female, every single day. Even in a city as progressive as London.

Shockingly, for boys, this includes the state-sanctioned National Health Service.

But pick up a copy of London's Evening Standard newspaper and you could be forgiven for thinking that so-called 'genital cutting' was a procedure which only affected women. Why? Because it's under the feminist guidance of editor Sarah Sands.

Keen to write for and about women, she is constantly reporting on FGM as part of a personal campaign to make it the next human rights battle for Londoners – specifically, female Londoners. And, while this has many merits, the exclusion of men and boys troubles me. After all, while female circumcision is abhorrent and must be stopped, the same must apply for boys.

Not convinced? Read on.

Leading US website Not Just Skin note that: 'Female circumcision is typically viewed as more horrific than male circumcision because it is usually done under unhygienic conditions rather than in a hospital, and because one form of female circumcision, infibulation, is particularly severe. However, both male and female circumcisions are classed as genital mutilation by the International Coalition for Genital Integrity.

'Both forms of circumcision remove functional, normal tissue, cause extreme pain, permanently disfigure the genitals, and permanently damage the sexual response. And in most cultures where female circumcision is performed, male circumcision is also performed with equally unhygienic instruments. Regardless of the child's gender, when done to infants or children, unnecessary genital surgeries violate human rights because they are amputations performed without medical need and without the individual's consent.

'The World Health Organization recognizes three types of female circumcision. Type I removes the clitoral hood and/or the clitoral tip. Type II removes the clitoral hood, clitoris, and part or all of the labia. Type III, also known as infibulation or pharaonic circumcision, involves removal of all external female genitalia and suturing of the vaginal opening. Male circumcision can be compared to type I or II female circumcision. Although the glans is not harmed at the time of circumcision, the loss of protective structures causes it to dry out and lose sensitivity over time. It is also important to note that most of the nerves and pleasure receptors present in the clitoris are, in the male, present in the foreskin and its associated structure, the frenulum. Removal of these nerves constitutes a loss that can be most adequately compared to a partial clitoridectomy.'

Fuelled by this, I addressed the matter with Sarah Sands when we met at an event in September.

There, at a party for The Power 1000: London's Most Influential People 2013 – a list appropriately topped by baby Prince George – she stood up and delivered an unexpected, perhaps shoehorned, speech about female genital mutilation. She'd even invited a special guest to sing about the practice for the entertainment of partygoers.

So it wasn't inappropriate for me to approach Ms Sands and politely asked her to widen her newspaper's stance on circumcision to include men and boys. After all, somebody which such compassion would surely be keen to save every possible victim from this barbaric practice – not just one group with whom she identifies.

Shockingly, she – quite literally – 'shhh-ed' me.

Stunned, I waited, then tried again. But she maintained that circumcision was always, always, always worse for women. After further attempts to draw her attention to the devastating effects circumcision can have on boys, her parting words were that she would consider my views and potentially update her paper's policy.

I was grateful for this. After all, it seemed like a very fair outcome for a busy editor hosting a party.

But, since then, I have sent Sarah Sands several follow-up emails over the past two months. I have even tried to contact her via twitter (her handle is @sandsstandard) but have been ignored.

In fact, every single correspondence has been greeted with silence.

Perhaps she is frightened of offending London's Jewish community. Perhaps she's too busy to reply. Perhaps she simply doesn't care.

Either way, I have been forced to up my game. Yesterday, I started an online petition on Change.org to make her listen and protect both genders from circumcision. I would appreciate it if every reader of A Voice For Men took a minute to sign it – and share it.

After all, I support Sarah Sands' commendable work on FGM – and will continue to do so. But, until she widens her newspaper's stance to include men and boys, there's a very real risk she has blood on her hands.

Sign the petition here:
http://www.change.org/petitions/sarah-sands-editor-at-the-evening-standard-newspaper-to-include-men-and-boys-in-their-opposition-to-involuntary-unnecessary-circumcision-otherwise-known-as-genital-mutilation

Note: This article is also available in Spanish.
Publishers note: To the editors, managers, contributors and readers of A Voice for Men. This post will remain at the top of our featured posts in the most prominent position on the site for a few days or until this petition has 1,000 signatures. Please sign and pass around for others to sign. –PE

Men, free yourself from being rapists by watching this video

AVfM Video Source · 16 November 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Here you go gents and ladies, another fine example the message that in order to break the gender norm for masculinity, all you have to do is not rape someone every time you get a chance.

I know most of you have an opinion on this kind of material. I respectfully urge you to go onto the thread in that video and express it. After all, if you don't go there now and tell them, who will? Thank you. PE

Infanticide: de facto post-natal abortions, but only for women

Janet Bloomfield (aka JudgyBitch) · 17 November 2013 · Archived copy · Original

When British medical ethicists Alberto Giubilini and Francesca Minerva published their paper After-birth abortion: why should the baby live? in the Journal of Medical Ethics they were met, unsurprisingly, with a storm of controversy – even denounced in the House of Congress!

The normal term for after-birth abortion is infanticide, with a special category called neonaticide, which refers to infants killed within 24 hours of birth. Most of these very young infants are killed by their mothers – it is exceptionally rare for a father to kill his newborn.

What the discussion surrounding post-natal abortion and infanticide fails to recognize is that we already have de facto post natal abortion rights in effect: some people who murder their newborns face no consequences even when criminally convicted.

Which people?

The mothers.

Fathers who kill their infants feel the full wrath of the law.

Let's start with mothers. The usual profile for women who murder their infants? They tend to be young, poor, unmarried, with limited social supports, a history of mental illnesses and they have hidden their pregnancies from those around them. When the baby arrives, they panic and kill the child. The population most at risk of being murdered in the United States? Children under the age of one. The most likely murderer? Their mothers. The most likely victim? A son.

That's rather interesting. When a mother kills her own child, she is more likely to kill a son.

Amanda Hein gave birth to her son in a Pennsylvania sports bar, smothered him in a trash bag, stuffed his body in the toilet tank and then continued watching a pay-per-view wrestling match. Pennsylvania has safe haven laws in place that would have allowed Hein to surrender all parental rights with no further responsibilities on her part, but wrestling!

Amanda is not alone, either.

What happens to these women? Legally, the deliberate killing of any human being once born is murder. Amanda is facing a charge of criminal homicide and prosecutors have the option of seeking the death penalty.

The reality? That probably won't happen. For one thing, Amanda is white. And pretty. As with virtually all crimes, pretty white girls get special treatment, and infanticide is no different. According to Jocelyn Lewis, women of color and poor women are filtered through a "bad" framework, and go to jail far more often than middle class white ladies who kill their babies – white women tend to be seen as "mad" rather than "bad".

Michelle Oberman examined 96 cases of mothers killing their infants from 1988 – 1995, finding that an extraordinarily high number of infants are killed within 24 hours of birth, and that no matter how old the baby is when killed, society's response to the mothers who killed them is deeply ambivalent.

In the overwhelming majority of cases, the baby's best protection against being killed is absent from the woman's life: the baby's biological father. As noted, it is extremely rare for men to kill their newborns. The absence of the father is a contributing factor to the death of the infants, almost always. Oberman gives no thought as to why the men are absent, and in her suggestions for how to prevent neonaticide in particular, she does not consider that having the men present in the lives of the pregnant women in a meaningful way could assist in saving these baby's lives.

Not particularly surprising.

Nor is it surprising to discover the reaction of the criminal justice system to women who kill the most vulnerable, most defenceless of victims. And many of these deaths are not pretty. Babies were drowned, strangled, thrown from windows, had their skulls crushed or were stabbed with scissors, and then generally thrown in the trash (p. 30). An ugly business indeed.

Oberman notes the "bad" and "mad" dichotomy, and that mothers defined as "bad" tend to be poor or women of color, and they receive the harshest sentencing. Women who can successfully argue that they were affected by mental disorders either pre-existing or arising directly as the result of pregnancy and birth are sentenced to "treatment" and "therapy" rather than jail time. Oberman notes that even in cases that evoke public outrage, "neonaticide defendants are frequently accused of first degree murder, [but] they are seldom convicted of this crime".

But only when the defendant is a woman.

Let's look at what happens to men who kill their infant children. As noted, it is extremely rare for men to kill newborns, but tragically, not so rare for older infants to die at the hands of their fathers.

Dylan Kuhn is a rare example of a young father being treated leniently by the justice system, receiving only 90 days for accidentally killing his infant daughter in a moment of frustration. Kuhn's youth and inexperience was seen as a contributing factor, as well as his deep remorse and lack of intent. The sentence was predictably met with outrage, with commenters calling for life imprisonment and harsh treatment.

Joshua David Petersen was not so lucky. He received a life sentence with no parole for killing his infant son, while in the grips of a deep depression.

Shamsiddin Abdur-Raheem got 30 years for killing his infant daughter by throwing her in a river.

Reynaldo Sanchez will spend 13.5 years in prison for killing his infant son.

Chris Fitzpatrick was sentenced to life for crushing his infant daughter's head with a cinder block just hours after she was born.

Jennifer Barisse, Fitzpatrick's partner received seven years for the crime.

Yes, you read that correctly. Chris and Jennifer together murdered their newborn daughter and buried her body. He got a sentence of life, and she will be out in seven years.

Dahlia Lithwick writing at Slate wonders why this discrepancy exists.

> ….women who kill their children in this country are disproportionately hospitalized or treated, while men who do so are disproportionately jailed, even executed.

Dahlia identifies one important rationale for our disparate treatment of men and women when it comes to infanticide: we treat children as the property of women.

> We still view children as the mother's property. Since destroying one's own property is considered crazy while destroying someone else's property is criminal, women who murder their own children are sent to hospitals, whereas their husbands are criminals, who go to jail or the electric chair.

So much for patriarchy, huh? Men treat women and children as property? The electric chair says nope!

What Dahlia is missing is the fractured sense of agency and responsibility we assign to adult women. Women, particularly when they are in the process of dramatic hormonal shifts, such as those that accompany pregnancy, labor and birth, have equally dramatically reduced culpability. Women's hormones give them a pass and they are not considered to bear the same responsibility as men, no matter what the hormonal state of the man happens to be.

Indeed, certain screechy, absurdly hateful, dowdy feminist writers have absolutely no problem trotting out the issue of male hormones in order to accuse men of "devolving" into …. well, women, essentially.

> Now it is unstable male temperament that is causing alarm. Male politicians are engaging in sneaky, catty, weepy, ditzy, shrewish behaviour that is anything but reasonable and impersonal.
>
> Women are affected by lunar tides only once a month, after all. Men have raging hormones every day, as we noticed when Dick Cheney rampaged around the globe like Godzilla.
>
> When women rule the world, men will want to avoid riling them.

Dowd goes on to call men "blubbering" and "vamping" as a result of their hormonal shifts, shames them for emotional responses, calls them "dizzy" and "sulky" and issues a vague threat that they had best not piss women off.

Does she know that she has written satire? Dizzy, sulky, catty, weepy, blubbering? Hmmm. Sounds a lot like Rebecca Watson or Adria Richards or any one of the many other strong, independent women who can't hack a dick joke uttered within twenty miles of their fragile selves.

Differential sentencing in cases of infanticide reveals the deep flaws in some of the central claims of feminism. First, there is no patriarchy. Women retain iron-clad control over children as property and have the sole right to choose which humans live and which ones die. Post-natal abortion exists, at the more or less sole discretion of women.

Rich white women, of course. Women of color, and poor women are thrown under the bus. When it comes to choking the life out of the newly born, indeed #solidarityisforwhitewomen. Why any woman of color would ever align herself with a movement that considers her worthy of doing all the shit work white women are too precious to do, and simultaneously denies her any of the traditional female powers and privileges is beyond my comprehension.

http://judgybitch.com/2013/08/26/silly-brown-women-feminists-needs-you-but-they-dont-want-you-solidarityisforwhitewomen-now-run-along-and-take-care-of-those-little-white-babies/

Women are subject to gross hormonal instabilities which renders them unaccountable for the harshest of crimes, including murder. Indeed, in Canada and the United Kingdom, women's reduced culpability for slaughtering the newly born is enshrined in law.

> A female person commits infanticide when by a wilful act or omission she causes the death of her newly-born child, if at the time of the act or omission she is not fully recovered from the effects of giving birth to the child and by reason thereof or of the effect of lactation consequent on the birth of the child her mind is then disturbed.
>
> Every female person who commits infanticide is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to imprisonment for a term not exceeding five years.

http://yourlaws.ca/criminal-code-canada/233-infanticide

http://yourlaws.ca/criminal-code-canada/237-punishment-infanticide

You will of course note that only female persons can be charged with infanticide and only female persons are to receive not more than five years. Male persons cannot, by definition, commit infanticide in Canada.

They commit murder and face the possibility of life imprisonment.

Let's accept that as fair, reasonable, intelligent, compassionate and entirely appropriate. Women who murder infants are not entirely liable for their conduct as a consequence of biological circumstance.

Why then should we have any women in positions of responsibility? If they cannot be held accountable for abdicating that responsibility based on hormonal fluctuations AKA the simple fact of being a woman, why would we ever entrust them with decision-making powers that have the potential to cause serious harm?

How can you argue both sides?

Women should be given special treatment in courts of law for the most heinous of crimes, while men face execution for the same crimes because women are biologically different from men and that serves as justification for leniency.

AND

There are no relevant biological distinctions to be made between men and women and women deserve the right to hold positions of authority and responsibility in equal measure to men.

Okay, which is it?

Ha ha! Just kidding. We know the answer to that question.

BOTH!

The issue of infanticide is extremely revealing: the death of a child is always a tragedy. Is it always a crime? In our current climate, it's only a crime when caused by a man. He has unlawfully destroyed a woman's property.

And that is the issue that requires addressing. Enshrining children as persons under the law that belong equally to their mother and father is ground zero in the battle for equality between men and women. You won't find feminists arguing for that kind of equality.

You'll need the MHRM for that.

> These men ask for just the same thing, fairness, and fairness only. This, so far as in my power, they, and all others, shall have.

Abraham Lincoln

Lots of love,

JB

MGTOW and the big M

John Hembling (JtO) · 17 November 2013 · Archived copy · Original

[box]

"You can be a Man Going [his] Own Way, and also, with a bit of caution and cleverness still go out and get yourself all married up."

Wrong, asshole.

[/box]

In the last week, I jumped, late, into a discussion on the forums of AVfM about the relationship between men going their own way, and marriage as a social and legal institution. It has become apparent that in the various MGTOW and MRM public spaces, an opinion has emerged that men self identifying as MGTOW can also participate in that ancient foundational institution of family and society, the big M. (Marriage)

Something along the lines of:

"You can be a Man Going [his] Own Way, and also, with a bit of caution and cleverness still go out and get yourself all married up."

Uh-huh, please, do tell me more.

What I posted last week on this topic[1] was my personal opinion. Just that, nothing more. Although a long-ish post for that forum, it was just my own private, personal opinion, shared with no more implied authority than simply: This is what I think. This site isn't "A Voice for John" any more than it's "A Voice for Paul (he-who-must-be-obeyed) Elam". It's also not THE Voice for Men. Its A Voice for Men.

However, before addressing marriage and MGTOW again, its useful to recognize one or two things about the nature of MGTOW, what it is, and what it's not.

Some people within the MHRM seem to believe that, within this movement, MGTOW denotes a form of elite status. This is tragicomically incorrect. With the caveat that every man on a MGTOW path is defining his own criteria, one of the common, and important elements of "Going Their Own Way" is a flat rejection of conventional, gynocentric status hierarchy gamesmanship. Indeed, writing this commentary as a practitioner of MGTOW, if that label label becomes a marker of elitism, I will abandon it in favour of some alternative.

It's not a club to join. It's not a badge to wear and find a sense of belonging with like minded brethren.

It is highly individual and self-selected commitment to a fundamental and radical rejection of some of the most deeply embedded establishments and institutions of our present culture. MGTOW is activism on behalf of your own basic humanity and fundamental rights as a human being. It is not just another term meaning the same as MRA, MHRA, Zeta Male, free-thinker, or, guy with his own opinions.

And, while every man forging his own MGTOW path must do so making his own decisions about what going his own way encompasses, there are a few things which are not just incompatible with MGTOW, they run directly against the fundamental nature of MGTOW.

Calling back to the AVFM forums discussion from which the following opinion emerged.

"You can be a Man Going [his] Own Way, and also, with a bit of caution and cleverness still go out and get yourself all married up."

No, you fucking can't.

If you are conventionally married, then, in my opinion, you are not MGTOW. If, on the other hand, you are a Man, Going [his] own Way, and you become married, then, guess what, you are no longer MGTOW.

It really should not require explanation here, but due to what seems the obtuse failure to grasp from some of the parties of this discussion, re-stating a few painfully obvious facts appears necessary.

A man married to a woman in our present culture is his wife's prisoner. His freedom, his life, his livelihood, his reproductive choices, his continued relationship with his children, and his home, all depend of the forbearance of the woman defined in law as his wife.

Certainly, not all, and indeed, most wives, common law or otherwise are not malevolent, or possessed of a will to exercise such destructive power over the men defined in law as husbands. However, remaining is the fact that a married man has a gun pointed squarely at his own neck, and his wife holds the trigger.

Obviously, the entire men's human rights movement is driven by recognition that under law and social convention, men and boys are lesser humans and second class citizens. But, men buying into marriage are actively choosing to support and participate in one of our societies realizations and manifestations of the disposable, lesser-person legal and social status of male human beings.

If you are married, you have already gone the way of this culture's mainstream. You are being a good and compliant follower of the blue pill. Even if you made those choices before taking what we call "the red pill".

I also know that many very real, valuable men's human rights activists are married. Further, I'm aware that being told as a married man that you're a good compliant blue pill believer is a pretty raw and painful offence.

Sorry about that.

However, in defence of married MRAs, it's probable that realization and recognition of the nature of the sub-person social and legal status of males came substantially after the advent of getting oneself married. It cannot be a comfortable thing to wake up to, that the woman you love, and who probably loves you actually holds the power to dispose of you with the full weight of law and culture behind her whim.

I'm also not suggesting that an aware and self-identifying MRA must dissolve whatever marriage he find himself a part of. You wife may love you, and may never exercise her power against you. But she DOES possess that power, and you do not.

But if you are conventionally married, you are not Going Your Own Way.

But what about that already married guy who wakes up to the reality of the social and legal cage he's in, decides that. goddamn it, he's a human, not a slave or a beast of burden, and asserts himself from within that legal union. Who the hell am I to tell him he's not MGTOW if he decides that he is?

Isn't it a foundational point of that "Going Their Own Way" acronym that men on this path define not only their own internal identities, but also define the terms and conditions of their interface with the rest of the world?

Let's imagine a man already committed to legal union between himself, a woman and the state. This man wakes up to the reality of his situation, that he's signed on the dotted line for a butt-fucking by the state, on the seeming behalf of his wife or his future-ex-wife. Absent of his immediate dissolution of his marriage, is this guy simply fucked? Indeed, that hypothetical de-marrying might include the butt-fucking-by-state just mentioned above.

Remembering that for every individual man practicing MGTOW, each must make their own individual choices – it remains that participation in that coercive legal union between yourself, a woman, and the state is antithetical to the basic foundation of MGTOW.

So what is a married MRA looking for the MGTOW path to do? We'll assume here the wife of this potential MGTOW's is benign, is aware, is not crazy, is not a passive sociopath, and both loves and respects him enough to NOT pull the trigger on the gun our society puts in the grip of every woman interacting with a man.

She's still, by family law and by social convention, the arbiter of his freedom, his continued career, his reproductive choices, his continued access to his children and so on. Even, if in good will, let's say she never pulls that metaphorical trigger.

This potential MGTOW must undertake a jail break, at the same time as he shares his bed with his jailer.

Can you run an underground railroad from inside a prison cell?

No.

Well, maybe. But this undertaking is not without some significant problems.

In fact, while I bear only goodwill towards men still falling into that coercive legal and social convention, a married man applying the MGTOW label to himself is actively diluting and subverting the purpose of MGTOW.

I don't like that last sentence. Particularly because it suggests to uncreative minds that MGTOW requires a life of solitude.

Does Going Your Own Way as a man necessitate avoidance of sex, or friendships, intimacy and love and affection towards and from women? Do you have to move into the woods, grow a mountain-man-beard full of squirrels and bugs and live a life of lonely masturbation with only a tree-bark vagina to keep you warm at night?

OF COURSE NOT!!!

So, while I bear only good-will towards men falling into that coercive legal and social convention, a married man self-identifying as both married and MGTOW must be taking some real action within his relationship to his wife to subvert the state's participation in what should be a purely personal relationship between two adults.

But if he's not doing that, and is still calling himself MGTOW, as well as being married, he is very regrettably diluting and subverting the purpose of MGTOW.

[box type="note" icon="none"]

I'm going to let a great big secret out of the bag here. It's probably going to shock and alarm many of the people who've read my writing or watched my videos. I love women.

More than that, I don't even hate them. I don't even think they're naturally evil. Nor do I avoid them, or even use my secret X-ray patriarchy powers to reduce their paycheques to 73 cents on the dollar compared to my own income. I even, (shudder) have one or two friends with boobs and vaginas that I both like and love.

I know, I know, they're going to take away my MRA and MGTOW memberships after this. Paul will add my name to the lists of the damed, and the secret international brotherhood of patriarchs will deactivate my MALE-GAZE [TM] superpowers.

I hope a few of you can forgive me. I'm a bad MRA, and an even worse MGTOW. I even had sex last year. With a woman. I didn't even pay her. Oh god, I feel so empty.

[/box]

As silly as that sounds, the point is that MGTOW as variously practiced is not a life of austerity and self-denial. But it does encompass rejection of conventional marriage, because that social institution escalates the already pronounced legal and social marginalization of men and boys.

But a conventionally married man, self identifying as MGTOW is actively an enemy of not just the Men Going Their Own Way movement. A married man not working on his own jail break with the informed cooperation of his warden, and using the MGTOW label is an opponent of the men's human rights movement.

And a man advising younger men that it's okay to be MGTOW and also go out and get married is not merely irresponsible, advocating something unsound, destructive and dangerous. He might as well just start being honest, and calling himself a radical feminist.

However, as always, everything I've said here is without any authority. This is not a positional statement of this website, or the MHRM, or of other MRAs, high profile or otherwise, and is only my opinion. Also, thank you for your kind attention.

[1] http://forums.avoiceformen.com

DownUnderThink (Part 1)

Jim Muldoon · 17 November 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Q: When is a person not a person?

A: When he is a man.

The legal minds in the State of Victoria here in Australia have set new standards for bigotry and doublethink. Their Feminist mindset has become so warped that they deny the existence of the most basic Feminist tenets in order to advance the Feminist cause.

This three part article examines the extraordinary thinking that is a direct result of the current moral panic to protect women from the scourges of Patriarchy. This thinking is not being shown in some obscure radical feminist website, but from the Victorian State Department of Justice in its bid to bring new laws in.

This doublethink is so tortuous that I decided to call it DownUnderThink.

This first part examines the latest changes to the laws that affect murder cases. The second part analyses some actual cases and how the theories keep misaligning with the real world. The final part discusses the overt misandry being used to propose changes for legislation concerning sexual offences.

In 2005, the social engineers got together to remove the common law partial defence for murder called provocation. The excuse was that men who were killing their wives were using it to get away with murder. Partly in its place, they created a new crime called Defensive Homicide, which was to cater for those battered wives who might kill their husbands in a bid for safety and freedom.

In 2013, the social engineers now want to abolish Defensive Homicide, because it was being applied to men. The legal loophole that gave men access to this was not in some obscure statute found deep in the archives. Section 9AD of the amended Crimes Act, which defines Defensive Homicide, begins “A person who, by his or her conduct, kills another person…”

This fact, by itself, should immediately disqualify the social engineers from employing their spanners in our works. But hang on to your sanity, because the stupidity is only beginning.

Let me explain some of the terms here for those, like me, who are not legally-minded.

Provocation is a partial defence to murder that has developed over the centuries of Common Law. Common Law is the basis for law in most, if not all, English speaking western democracies.

Provocation has always been an uneasy set of compromises. It tries to accept the humanity of the accused whilst condemning, in the strongest terms, the taking of the victim’s life. It is an acceptance that there are situations that enrage an individual to the point where reason, momentarily, is left behind. However, it also must not allow the accused to present the case such that the victim deserved death as a result of his or her transgressions. Rather it tries to acknowledge, for example, harassment or intimidation being felt by the accused, whilst still keeping as a priority the victim’s right to life.

It is also worth noting here that it is a partial defence. It does not condone “lashing out”. The killer still goes to jail for the serious crime of manslaughter and serves serious jail time in a very serious prison.

Perhaps its most significant aspect is that it recognises that a cold-blooded, premeditated murder is worse than a brief, but fatal, loss of control.

The problem with provocation for the Feminists was that it was a defence sometimes used by men who had killed their wives. They complained that this reduction in penalty sent a Patriarchal message that it was alright to beat your wife to death if you felt like it. The Age reported Women’s Domestic Violence Crisis Service Victoria director Rhonda Cumberland as complaining that violent men would use the Provocation ruling to terrorize their victims, “They will tell women that they can say she provoked the violence and all will be forgiven.” This, of course, is just nonsense.

Some arguments had a more valid point, for example in “Provocation Law and Facts: Dead Women Tell No Tales, Tales Are Told About Them” Jenny Morgan points out that, in many instances, the only two persons at the scene of the crime were the killer and the victim. Obviously, the killer has an incentive to produce a story of provocation, and the victim is not available to dispute the tale.

However, we have to wonder at all this attention on murder from the point of view of women. Although women are at the centre of the social engineers’ universe, they are not at the centre of the crime of murder.

First of all, let’s get some perspective on this moral panic. In Australia, a country of some 23 million, less than 300 people are murdered in a year. In the majority of these cases, both killer and victim will be male. In 2011 there were 158 murdered men, almost double the 86 women murdered in the same year.

In 2006/7 in Australia only 18% of the individuals murdered by men were “intimates”. The other 82% were, in order, friends and acquaintances (33%), strangers (23%), family (14%) and others (12%).

What about the vast majority of cases that impacted on men? How does provocation, or its removal, affect those? Did anyone ask? Does anyone care?

Not our social engineers, anyway. The priority, of course, is violence against women. Men, no matter if they are twice as likely to be murdered, simply don’t count.

And do women murder? If you read the social engineers documents, you would think that the only time a woman kills is to get out from under her oppressor.

In that same 2006/7 period 54 women took it upon themselves to murder. Only 38% of the victims were “intimates” with the other 62% being made up of Family (29%), Friends and acquaintances (22%), Strangers (5%) and Others (5%). And yes, mothers are still the biggest killers of their own children.

So, unless women are being oppressed by family members, including their children, friends, acquaintances, strangers and others, then women are killing for more reasons than the Department of Justice would have us believe.

This leads us to the part where the lunacy goes through the roof as we look at Defensive homicide itself.

First of all, this is not to be confused with self-defence. Self defence is not a crime. In legalese it is a complete defence to murder. Prove self-defence means the killer rightly goes free. Instead, Defensive Homicide is a crime in its own right and is intended to be an alternative to manslaughter with similar penalties.

The doublethink in Defensive homicide is inherent in its name. How can it be defensive if it was homicide? How could it be homicide if it was defensive?

The insanity becomes clearer when we look at how Defensive Homicide is defined. The legal definition is that it is when a person kills in what they believe is self-defence, but “he or she did not have reasonable grounds for the belief.”

No matter how many times I read that definition, I cannot process it. How can an unreasonable belief be part of a legitimate argument for reducing the severity of a crime?

Add further to that the question of how this could only apply to battered wives. Here we have to step around even more doublethink.

The general theory here is that women are “trapped” in an abusive relationship to the extent that they believe their only avenue of escape is to kill their husband. This is what they call “women who kill in response to family violence.”

How do we know that there was “family violence”? It’s simple. Just ask the accused.

Let me ask a question that seems to escape the Feminist mind all too easily. What happened to the “Dead women tell no tales” argument? Or is it simply the case that dead men count for even less than live ones?

In Australia today, the “trapped” scenario is more than just a long bow. Not only are there plenty of women’s shelters, there are a plethora of government departments, social workers and police officers all especially funded to deal with such situations. To admit they are still trapped, of course, would mean that many millions of taxpayers’ dollars are being wasted. And the feminists don’t want those funds drying up, do they?

So, instead, this being trapped when they are not is what the social engineers want the courts to make a special allowance for. This is the unreasonable belief of self defence that Section 9AD is referring to. Let us call it the reasonable unreasonable belief.

The new proposals to replace the Defensive Homicide are fraught with the same logic with a different disguise. Now they are looking to a new partial defence, where the court is to assess if “the conduct of the accused was a ‘reasonable response’ in the circumstances as perceived by the accused.” In other words, no matter how unreasonable the perception, as long as she was reasonable with her unreasonable perception then a sentencing discount will apply.

And, just to be clear, it is not reasonable to consider men’s actions due to unreasonable beliefs or unreasonable perceptions as reasonable. If they believe they are trapped when they are not it is their own stupid fault.

No matter how they dress it up, the logic still doesn’t make any sense. If she really was trapped, and really needed to kill him in order to escape, then it was self-defence. If not, then it is murder. If she’s killing based on unreasonable beliefs or perceptions, she needs to be locked up for everyone’s safety.

The Department of Justice’s reason for abolishing the Defensive Homicide says it all:

“It is inherently complex, making it difficult for judges and juries, and the community, to understand and apply.”

It is not “complex”, it is nonsensical.

The twisted logic gets even worse when you consider that, in the eighties and nineties, feminists were arguing that this battered wife scenario should be somehow included in the provocation partial defence.

The problem for that argument was that provocation is only a defence when the killing was done as an immediate response. There has to be that “lashing out” without thought to the consequences. The more time between provocation and reaction, the more it becomes revenge. And whilst this has long been a motive for murder, it has never been, nor should be, a justification for it.

So, if women couldn’t have the Provocation defence (and, of course, they could but not in the way that the Feminists wanted it), then no one could.

And here, of course, lies the real meat of the question. How much of this is to condone revenge? Particularly when we consider that this is to foster “cultural change” in the area of violence against women. It gives rise to that age old saying: Two wrongs do not make a right.

We now get into the Feminist doublethink of the most extraordinary degree.

In Battered But Not Beaten: Women Who Kill In Self Defence, Ian Leader-Elliot begins “Men and women kill for different reasons and in different circumstances.” This idea of essential difference between the sexes is stark throughout the whole debate.

Gone is the “Anything a man can do, a woman can do better, and do it in heels,” mentality. Women are reduced to mere candles in the wind. They are totally powerless (except to kill him) over their fortunes and fate.

The idea of gender being a social construct is also missing. These murderous traits in men are clearly innate, and simply cannot exist in women. Masculinity's associations with aggression and action are clearly the drivers for this, and women's total lack of such traits is simply because of their XX chromosomes.

But what, ultimately, is the point of this whole exercise? This is summed up by one word:

Review.

Yes, eight years ago we had a new law. Now we are having a review. Many of the groups involved are also insisting that part of the plan, going forward, is to have more reviews at more regular intervals.

All of these reviews will require conferences, forums, public consultations and the like. All of these will require, as well as catering, submissions by the legal representatives of the various interest parties and groups.

All of this will be funded by the public purse and the good citizens of Victoria will become playthings of the social engineers. Lives will be ruined and justice will become even more of a lottery as they experiment with the law as they see fit to bring about cultural change.

And, by the way, guess how many battered women have been found guilty of murder in the State of Victoria this century?

None!

Also the ratio of illegal killings being classified as manslaughter between 1993 and 2005 was about 11% (the rest being murder). Since then, and clearly this is as a direct result of the social engineering, the ratio of illegal killings being classified as manslaughter / defensive homicide cases was…

….you guessed it: 11%

References

1. Defensive Homicide – Proposals for Legislative Reform – Consultation Paper Victorian Dept of Justice
2. Section 9AD of the Crimes Act 1958 (2005)
3. Australian Violent Crime Statistics
4. Australian Bureau of Statistics Causes of Death
5. Australian Institute of Criminology Homicide Statistics
6. Morgan, Jenny — "Provocation Law and Facts: Dead Women Tell No Tales, Tales Are Told About Them"
7. Leader-Elliott, Ian — "Battered But Not Beaten: Women Who Kill in Self Defence"
8. Greene, J — "A Provocation Defence for Battered Women Who Kill"
9. Govt Abolishes Provocation Laws – The Age
10. Provocation defence to be removed
11. Ramage Manslaughter Verdict Under Attack – The Age

About Micah's wild little boys

Greg Canning · 18 November 2013 · Archived copy · Original

A person by the name of Micah J. Murray posted a satirical article " How feminism hurts men" on his personal blog and subsequently it has been reposted on Huff Post Canada in the Religion section. As a father of a daughter, 2 sons and a stepson, I have a few thoughts for Miach to consider.

Your trite and simplistic portrayal of the complex debates around gender as one of male privilege versus female victimhood does not surprise me, however that it is proffered by a god-fearing father of two "wild little boys" does.

Rather than focusing on feminist constructs such as "female objectification," "rape culture," and "gender wage gaps," I suggest, Micah, for the sake of your sons, you should acquaint yourself with some of the realities of boys' existence in the early 21st century. After all, isn't that what dads should do?

In every age bracket, male mortality exceeds female mortality. Males in developed countries will live lives on average 5 years less than their female counterparts, yet more funding goes towards research and programs for women's health issues.

Welcome your wild boys to the world of male privilege and gender equality.

From birth girls are protected from genital mutilation by legislation that criminalises any form of genital cutting no matter how minor, yet boys are not granted their right to gender equality in regard to genital integrity. Non-therapeutic genital mutilation of infant boys is a shocking abuse of human rights. Yet the movement that purports to stand for equality feminism ignores its widespread cultural and religious practice. I hope your wild little boys are intact, Micah?

Boys face a paradox in their socialization. On the one hand they are encouraged to be tough, endure pain and suffering without complaint and thus submit to the hero myth of manhood, a willingness to labor and die in the service others. On the other hand their natural vigour, energy, roughhousing and competitive fantasy play is condemned as hyper-masculine violence-in-the-making.

The feminized daycare, preschool and school systems further promote this paradox by beating the wildness out of boys so as to conform to female behavioral and learning styles, whilst popular culture continues to bombard them with imagery of macho heroes, bumbling fools, and men as violent bastards.

Many boys are underachieving in school, they are excluded (expelled) more frequently, and drop out more often. Up to 1 in 5 have their wildness placed under pharmaceutical control to fit the unnatural feminized school environment. How are your wild boys holding up in the system so far Micah?

A third or more of boys are being raised without involved fathers or effective male role models. The consequences of this are well-known in the Juvenile courts, where some 80% of offenders come from functionally fatherless homes. Even those boys lucky enough to start life with an involved father may not continue as such, with biased family courts responsible for excluding many fathers from their children's lives.

Whilst I hope your marriage survives Micah, there is 50 % chance that it won't, in which case you may be lucky enough to gain equal parenting–but sadly, the odds are stacked against you. Even the most wonderful wife in the world today is perfectly capable after a few sessions with a feminist Domestic Violence worker or divorce attorney of seeing you as a mongrel bastard abuser that your children must be protected from.

At age 18 or so young men are required to register for the draft in many countries, but in the spirit of gender equality, young women are not. Hope you explain the privilege of that to your wild young boys Micah!

Should your wild boys complete their school education they will be significantly less likely to gain entry to college or to graduate from college then girls. At college induction they will be branded as potential rapists and told that girls fear them. If they have consensual sex, they still face the possibility of being accused of sexual assault if the girl involved later regrets the encounter for any reason. Regardless of the truth of the matter they can be denied by campus administration their right to due process, to face and question their accuser, to trial by a jury of peers and to the same level of evidence that applies in criminal matters.

Have you started teaching your wild boys not to rape yet Micah? Gotta get in early you know.

Hope you realize how frequent child abuse, including sexual abuse is, Micah, and I especially hope you realize that the most frequent victims of physical abuse, emotional abuse, and neglect are male children, and the most frequent perpetrators are adult women. The rates of sexual abuse of boys by women in also probably greater than previously suspected. Adult women, even at some fine religious schools, prey on adolescent boys for sex, and society sees it as an "affair" not rape, the boys supposedly lucky to be abused.

Hope you will have a healthy skepticism for anyone, male or female, left responsible for your wild boys Micah.

Heaven forbid that your wild boys might at some stage start to understand that their lives are not all privilege and happily wandering about oppressing women. They may come to learn that violence in dating relationships is a two-way street, with as many male as female victims, but little or no help for male victims. Despite the rhetoric about how unsafe the streets are for women, they may view the freely available crime data that shows men are the overwhelming majority of victims of street violence and violence in general.

According to the World Health Organization, men account for 80% of the victims of violent death worldwide. You do know that don't you Micah?

Should a pregnancy result from one of your son's sexual encounters by accident, deception, or otherwise, he may be given no voice in decisions regarding the outcome of the pregnancy, but may have the women's will imposed upon him. He may be denied the opportunity to father his biological child; if the woman wishes to abort he will have no say and if she wishes to adopt the child out he also have no say. On the other hand, he may be forced into paying for a child he is not ready to father. Meanwhile mothers abort, adopt out or dispose of unwanted babies in the trash or safe haven drop-offs without consequence.

You really should warn your wild boys about this Miach. As a god-fearing man how does your sons' lack of any say at all in abortion sit with you anyway? Just asking.

Did you know, Micah, as a father it is your job to make sure your boys develop a balanced understanding of the world in which they live? But at college they will be denied balance on gender matters, and should they dare speak will likely be shouted down as misogynists who need to check their privilege. Should they wish to join with other young men and women to discuss and debate issues they see as relevant to their own and society's futures, they may be denied the right to form a campus association, or even have their efforts stymied by violent and abusive protestors who label their right to free association and speech as "hate."

I guess what feminist governance in education is doing to our little boys is like you describe in your church setting, relegating women to kitchen or nursery but without a voice en masse. Don't you see the similarities Micah? I'm not saying girls have a trouble-free ride through life either, I am well aware of the problems barriers and discriminations that many face. But if you truly want to have an inclusive conversation regarding the transition of the genders to a fairer more balanced and cooperative future, I think your satire is misplaced. Think about it won't you Micah? Your sons' futures may depend on it. As a quick primer on gender equality from the non-feminist perspecitve, you could read Glen Poole's excellent new e-book, Equality for Men. The data is from the UK, but very similar to the US, Canada and Australia.

If you want more data on any claims I have made in this article, please feel free to contact us, check out our facts page, or even check out our wiki. Good luck and let us know if we can help enhance your understandings of the issues faced by your sons better.

Love in Chains – 1952

Robert St. Estephe · 18 November 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Robert St. Estephe–Gonzo Historian–is dedicated to uncovering the forgotten past of marginalizing men. "Gonzo journalism" is characterized as tending "to favor style over fact to achieve accuracy." Yet history – especially "social history" – is written by ideologues who distort and bury facts in order to achieve an agenda. "Gonzo" writing is seen as unorthodox and surprising. Yet, in the 21st century subjectivity, distortion and outright lying in non-fiction writing is the norm. Fraud is the new orthodoxy. Consequently, integrity is the new "transgressive."

Welcome to the disruptive world of facts, the world of Gonzo History.

•?•

Philip Chain is the earliest known example of a father who used picketing to attract attention to his plight as a parent who had been denied access to his child by a malicious mother. It was not until the 1970s that fathers' rights groups were formed and started doing group pickets, usually in front of courthouses. Chain, however, took his signs to his own home which he was legally barred from. Gender ideologues have for decades claimed fathers only try to "see" their children (as if "seeing" were enough) in order to manipulate the "intrinsic victim of patriarchy," the mother.

The true history of child custody proves otherwise. Despite the fashionable social constructivist theories that are dogmatically spewed and sold by professors, claiming that the further back in history we go the less parents (of both sexes) loved their children, history is on the contrary rich with tales of fathers who made great sacrifices to try to retrieve children that ex's, the courts and other entities. A particularly poignant example is that of US Civil War veteran John McCray, featured in the AVfM article "A Father's Undying Love." After the war McCray devoted his life to trying to find the children his wife had hidden away from him.

The story of James Welch, "the father who would not give up," has a happier ending. Two decades before Mr. Chain's modest protest efforts shown here, Welch, an aggrieved Louisiana father of a child held in Venezuela, came to perfect the art of activism, garnering national publicity with dramatic demonstrations in front of the White House in Washington D.C., issuing a newsletter and getting his case into the official government Congressional Record.

The beginning of organized group father's rights protests an be traced back to 1966 in California, where members of U.S. Divorce Reform Inc. and American Marriage and Divorce Reform, Inc. joined forces to picket the court house in Pasadena.

•?•

[image]

PHOTO CAPTION (Article 1 of 4):

PLEADS TO SEE CHILD – Policeman talks with Philip Chain, 38, who is picketing his former wife in Hollywood, Cal., with a sign pleading he be permitted to see the couple's child, Darlene, 3. He told police their divorce decree gave him visiting rights, but the former wife, Esther, refused to let him see Darlene, saying the girl is sick. Police said the picketing broke no law.

["Pleads To See Child," syndicated (AP), The Chillicothe Constitution-Tribune (Mo.), Nov. 5, 1952, p. 5]

•?•

FULL TEXT (Article 2 of 4): "Esther please let me see my baby."

Carrying a placard on which these words were printed, Philip Chain, 38, of 3200 San Fernando Blvd., Burbank, yesterday walked back and forth in the 800 block of N. Edinburgh St. his wife lives in the neighborhood.

Chain alleged that his former wife, Esther, 30 refused to allow him to see the couple's baby Darlene, 3, telling him the youngster was ill.

Chain said that he and his wife were married on June 20, 1948, separated last January and that she had obtained an interlocutory decree in September. He said that he was granted weekly visiting privileges by the court.

Mrs. Chain could not be reached for a statement.

Police called to the scene tried to discourage Chain from his picketing but he refused. Officers allowed him to continue, saying he was breaking no law.

["Man pickets in Plea to See Child," Los Angeles Times (CA.), Nov. 3, 1952, part 2, p. 1]

•?•

[image]

PHOTO CAPTION (Article 3 of 4):

PICKETS FOR PATER RIGHTS — For the second time since being divorced in 1952, Philip Chain, 38, above, picketed the Los Angeles home of his former wife, Mrs. Esther Critichfield Chain, because she was not at home when he came to visit their 4-year-old daughter, Darlene. According to a court order, Mr. Chain explains, he can visit the child on Sundays and holidays, but this Sunday when he arrived there was a sign on the door reading "Not at home," so he put up the placards and started picketing the house.

["Pickets For Pater Rights," syndicated (NEA), The Sandusky Register-News (Oh.), Dec. 23, 1953, p. 7]

•?•

[image]

FULL TEXT (Article 4 of 4): Philip Chain, 38, who charges that his ex-wife will not permit him to see their daughter, Darlene, 4, was back "picketing" yesterday in front of 853 N. Edinburgh Ave.

He said he came to the house to take the youngster out to dinner but was greeted by a "Not at Home" sign on the front door. His former wife, Esther, 31, had taken the child away to a party, he learned.

Her refusal to allow the child to visit her father from 1 to 6 p. m. on Sundays and holidays is a violation of the court order, Chain said, which granted Mrs. Chain an interlocutory degree in September, 1952, and granted him visiting privileges. [sic: a "privilege," not a right!]

~ Fifth Refusal ~

"This is the fifth time she has refused to let me see my daughter," Chain said. "The last time I saw her she said unless I paid $13 a week support for the girl I couldn't see Darlene."

He explained that he is out of work now and has not been able to pay that amount. He lives with his parents at 2426-A N. Buena Vista St., Burbank.

Legends on the signs he exhibited and some which he taped to window screens of the Edinburgh house read:

"Waiting to see my baby"; "Why can't a father see his child?" and "I plead for justice."

The Chains were married on June 20, 1948, and were separated in January, 1952. He said their divorce was not yet final.

["Man Pickets Ex-Wife; Wants to See Daughter – 'I Plead for Justice,' Reads One Legend as Husband Resumes His Sidewalk Parade," Los Angeles Times (Ca.), Dec. 21, 1953, part 3, p. 4]

[image]

How surviving the zombie apocalypse is like MGTOW

August Løvenskiolds · 18 November 2013 · Archived copy · Original

> Ishtar spoke to her father, Anu, saying: "Father, give me the Bull of Heaven, so he can kill Gilgamesh in his dwelling. If you do not give me the Bull of Heaven, I will knock down the Gates of the Netherworld, I will smash the door posts, and leave the doors flat down, and will let the dead go up to eat the living! And the dead will outnumber the living!" – excerpt from Tablet VI of the Epic Of Gilgamesh, written over 4500 years ago (emphasis added)

Marriage used to be something that had great and balanced benefits for men and women, but from the very beginnings of human society both men and women were the reluctant to commit to an unworthy mate.

The oldest known human story – The Epic of Gilgamesh – relates, in part, the fallout from Gilgamesh's refusal to marry the cruel goddess/princess Ishtar. Ishtar responds with a murderous rage, but like modern feminists, she seeks to avoid direct responsibility for her actions, and so uses double-proxy violence to exact her revenge (threatening a zombie apocalypse to her father so that he will release the Bull of Heaven to attack Gilgamesh).

Maybe the God/King Anu found her zombie threat compelling, or maybe it was the gynocentrism of this early culture that turned the trick, but in any case, the Bull of Heaven was released.

Likewise, as far as ancient stories of reluctant brides, my buddy Peter Wright (Tawil) recently related to me in his own words a Greek Myth about a girl named Atalanta whose father was a King. He wanted her to marry but she refused. After much cajoling she agreed that she would marry a man who could beat her in a running race.

Unfortunately, she was super fast, and all the suitors failed. However, one poor runner entered in a race against her and he had a trick up his sleeve – he appealed to her greed by carrying three apples made of pure gold which he would drop, one at a time, throughout the race, making her stop to pick the shiny things up and allowing him to surge forward. He won the race and Atalanta was compelled to marry him.

But nowadays the marriage myths have been twisted all out of recognition into grinding, brutal realities – it is men who are avoiding marriage, and those married men who are being booted out of their families are still being forced to drop three precious things – their wallets, their housekeys, and their children – as the price for their freedom.

To avoid the marriage trap, more and more men are (sometimes unwittingly) adopting a philosophy known as "Men Going Their Own Way" – MGTOW – to protect themselves from the physical, emotional, and financial damages inflicted by feminist-inspired changes to the marriage laws and practices – laws and practices that trample any man unlucky enough to get tangled up in them.

Also more and more, the modern marital landscape is breaking down in ways that resemble the collapse of society depicted in zombie film productions like AMC's The Walking Dead – a TV show now so popular in its 4th season that it comes complete with its own followup analysis show, Talking Dead. I believe that these productions resonate with audiences in part because the stress levels, desperation and suffering depicted among the human survivors are echoes of the same helpless frustrations we all face in our personal, real-world relationships today.

These common frustrations depicted include:

- The widespread destruction of marriage – in the zombie apocalypse your dearest loved ones (spouse, children, lovers, siblings, parents) may transform at any time into mindless automata bent solely on your destruction. Likewise, in the daily October series In His Own Words on domestic abuse published in A Voice for Men, Dr. Tara Palmatier recounted, in story after story after story, the real-life horrors of having a wife turn insane with hatred against her husband. In the zombie world it is expected that one can simply dispatch the creature trying to eat your flesh, but in the real world your zombie wife has an army of defenders and enablers in the form of the police / courts / feminist harpies that will swarm you if you try to stand your ground or protect your kids.

- The loss of our children – in the zombie apocalypse pregnancy is a death sentence; childhood is truncated by death and perhaps even worse: your surviving kids will have lives as a stone-cold killers whose emotions are as blunted as the shambling, rotting corpses that are forever hunger after them. The real-life horror of having your children legally stolen from you by the family courts and turned against you by greedy, ungrateful ex-wives is no less brutal.

- The society-wide erosion of personal security – in the zombie apocalypse the threat of getting gnawed to death is ever-present; in real life a false accusation from a disgruntled woman can wreck your life at any time. The loss of due-process legal rights for men, particularly on college campuses where 2/3 of the students are women, can have life-shattering consequences that can stalk you for decades.

- The death of hope for the future – in the zombie apocalypse each gain seems to be offset by a dozen losses. In the real world, the voices of men crying out for justice are silenced by lies with names like "privilege", "misogynist", "patriarchy", "rape culture", "rape apologist", "male ally of feminists" and "creep".

In some ways, though, and despite its brutality, the zombie apocalypse is a vast improvement for men on both current marriage and society.

- The valuation of male traits – when one is struggling to find the simple basics of human survival – food, water, and shelter – in the midst of rampaging zombies – the strength, endurance, and skills of men become of premium value. The safest place in the zombie apocalypse is standing with the strongest, smartest man you can find, and taking care to let him know how much you appreciate him.

- The utter destruction of feminism – When your stomach is growling you don't have time to worry about whether you are being self-actualized – a Rubenesque slattern like Jaclyn Friedman, well-filled in both belly and nether regions, has the spare time and privilege of wondering whether she is being truly valued as a woman, but in a world overrun by zombies, our indulgence of feminist fantasies is exposed for the silly rotting tripe that it is – there are no Maslow self-actualization problems when minute-by-minute survival is your overriding concern.

The lazy lady leisure class goes by another name in zombieland – lunch.

[image]

Yes, the zombie world is a nightmare, but it is not devoid of hope.

I recently happened upon another view of the zombie world, captured in the little-known film Warm Bodies. (You can watch the first four minutes of the movie at the link, or below.)

In the movie, "R" (played by Nicholas Hoult), a zombie boy, and "Julie" (Teresa Palmer), a surviving human girl (who is the daughter of a military leader), meet and slowly fall in love after R eats the brains of Julie's fading, laconic boyfriend Perry, and thereby assimilates some of his happier memories. Yes, it is a thinly veiled Romeo and Juliet meets the Zombie Apocalypse adventure in lovelorn escapism, but I found the movie weirdly moving nonetheless.

The feminist narrative has been destroyed in that world – getting raped is not a problem, but getting eaten is. As R begins to protect Julie from the other zombies, and then brings her food and water as she hides in the sanctuary of an abandoned jet airliner, Julie's life hangs on whether R's nascent feelings for her can transcend his hunger. Their verbal communication is little more than monosyllabic grunts, but their chemistry blooms despite (or because of) their extreme circumstances.

The human contract – men provide; women appreciate – is reborn.

I won't spoil Warm Bodies further except to say that it takes more than just courage to rout the packs of feminists/zombies. It also takes compassion. It also takes love.

It takes feelings that are impossible in the world that feminism has poisoned.

Feminist zombie outbreak

AVfM Video Source · 18 November 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Sage Gerard (aka Victor Zen) has some questions for the men who say A Voice for Men–and Men's Rights Edmonton, a separate group–endorses and encourages "patriarchy" and "rape culture." We somehow doubt they'll respond to anything he says or asks in a straightforward and non-evasive way, but hope springs eternal and all that.

http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=-eQ45NrCMmU

Have you subscribed yet to Victor Zen, by the way?

I Need Feminism... MANSPLAINED Part 8

AVfM Video Source · 18 November 2013 · Archived copy · Original

http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=kkJm8JMtaTI

Subscribe to SparkyFister here.

Is homelessness a men's issue?

Tom Golden · 19 November 2013 · Archived copy · Original

This week is National Hunger and Homelessness Week.

Is homelessness a men's issue? Indeed it is. Men are the majority of the homeless. But it goes deeper then that. Not only are men the majority of the homeless, but homelessness is the dead end for so many other men's issues. How many homeless men do you think have been raped by the family courts? How many homeless men do you think have been falsely accused? How many homeless men have been victims of domestic violence and ignored? How many homeless men have been severely depressed and overlooked. The sad fact is that homelessness is the end of the road for many men after they have faced years upon years of misandry, people looking the other way, and no services available when they face hardship and discrimination. Nearly all of the issues we discuss and work to bring into public awareness find their dead end in the two male exit points: homelessness or suicide.

This is not to say that the only path to homelessness is misandry. Mental illness surely plays a role as does economics and a host of other forces. It is a complex problem but one aspect that has likely never been considered by the mainstream media or psychological professionals is the horrible impact misandry has upon millions of men.

Just like other men's issues, very few people want to talk about or publicize that men are the majority of the homeless. Search the web for facts on homelessness and you will be hard pressed to find most organizations who support the homeless making a big deal over the fact that most of their clients are male. Even the research oriented groups seem to be leery to focus on this fact. This will likely not come as a surprise to the readers of AVFM. The sad fact is that almost every area where men face hardship, trauma, and discrimination you will see a pattern of avoidance and eye turning. Male suicides, male victims of domestic violence, male circumcisions, male deaths in the workplace, longevity and on and on. All of these areas have something in common. No one wants to focus on the pain of men. People just don't want to see it. Groups who try to help the homeless are probably very aware that if they advertise their client base to be male they are much less likely to receive donations and funding. This is probably why you see the emphasis on homeless families even though they are a minority of the homeless.

What are the percentage of the homeless that are men? I found that the estimate for the percentages of men ranged from 60-80%. The US Interagency Council on Homelessness estimates that of the chronically homeless 75% are male. One third of those are veterans. In case you are wondering 97% of the homeless vets are male.

But aren't these guys just a bunch of drunks? Well, that is the assumption that has prevailed for many years. N'er do wells and drunks. In some ways this attitude continues still powered on by the invisible misandrist expectations for men. But wait a minute. Some folks are starting to understand that there may be some powerful underlying aspects to homelessness that most are simply not seeing. The sad fact is that most every homeless man may have started out his slide into homelessness with a huge trauma like divorce, death, illness, loss of job and probably more than one of these or others all rolled up into one big plate of stink. These trauma overload the system of any person, but they are particularly hard for men. Why? Because no one wants to hear his pain, and no one wants to hear his story. When people see a man in pain they run, when they see a woman in pain they consider it a call for action. So men are left alone to deal with huge amounts of pain. Often they find ways to move through it and sometimes they end up paralyzed and homeless.

Another reason that men predominate the homeless is due to extended families going out of their way to help the women and being much less likely to go out of their way to help the men. Extended families see the women as vulnerable on the street and find some alternative. The men? They are not seen as being so vulnerable. They are left holding the bag and not having any sort of help. He can handle himself on the street….

To complicate matters further men's esteem is generally based on his success, when he fails and is ignored even by his extended family, his esteem will likely plummet like a rock.

He finds himself in a huge dilemma. He is now dependent. This is hellish bind for men who are valued based on their ability to be independent. When men are dependent they are disdained. Peter Marin wrote a powerful article on men's homelessness titled Abandoning Men: Jill Gets Welfare–Jack Becomes Homeless. Here's a quote from Marin's article that focuses on the problem of men's dependency:

"To put it simply: men are neither supposed nor allowed to be dependent. They are expected to take care of others and themselves. And when they cannot or will not do it, then the assumption at the heart of the culture is that they are somehow less than men and therefore unworthy of help. An irony asserts itself: by being in need of help, men forfeit the right to it."

Marin describes a powerful double bind for men. If they admit to needing help they will be disdained and devalued. If they don't admit to needing help they are alone and on their own. So when these men are moving towards homelessness and not getting any sort of help or support along the way what they do get is a sledge hammer of judgement from the culture that since they are dependent they are less then men and officially unworthy of getting the assistance that had, of course, been refused all along.

The amazing thing is that we don't have more homeless men.

Resistance to International Men's Day

Jason Thompson · 19 November 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Editor's note: this is a reprint of an article we first published in October 2012. The information in it remains as timely as ever. While many purple and even blue-pill people have tried to co-opt International Men's Day, they have not entirely succeeded, and in any case the history should generally be known: this international day to celebrate men was started by a genuine Men's Rights Activist. Jason Thompson shares the story. –DE

This article is about how one gutsy MRA started International Men's Day despite attempts to shut him down. His name was Thomas Oaster.

Thomas Oaster was an articulate and passionate men's rights advocate. He was prolific in his work with men's groups, men's issues, and political advocacy both on and off campus where he taught. He had many fine MRAs around him, men and women who helped to improve the lot of males, but what of the man himself? Who was he really, and what is the unknown story of how he inaugurated the first International Men's Day? The following will be about Thomas Oaster and how he put IMD on the map for all who choose to celebrate the event into the distant future.

In the early 1990's Oaster's growing interest in advocating for men (and gynocentric resistance to that advocacy) led him to the idea of creating a globally celebrated International Men's Day. His goal was to create a platform where the stories of men could be told in their own words rather than being interpreted by others.

In a moment of nostalgia about this dream he mused:

"You don't get points in men's groups for flexing your ego, but I'd like it to be known that Kansas City has become the hometown of International Men's Day because a hometown boy got that thing rolling."[1]

As you will read in what follows Thomas Oaster, and Kansas City, can indeed now take credit for being the epicenter of a global movement.

The first IMD event took place in 1992 when small groups of MRAs scattered through 4 continents simultaneously celebrated with Oaster in the first celebration. Today, thanks to his vision, there are millions of people in more than 60 countries celebrating IMD. This achievement is remarkable when we consider it took place 20 years ago at a time when advocacy for men and boys was considered unthinkable.

Thomas Oaster was the Director of the Missouri Center for Men's Studies and employed as Associate Professor at the University of Missouri, Kansas City where he taught classes on men's issues. That's right, classes on real men's issues. He told of how he first became attracted to the men's movement by an intellectual interest, but quickly came to feel persecuted for his association with this politically incorrect subject. "I got beat up, slammed" reports Oaster, "People said, 'What – do you hate women?' The more I got beat up, the more I got drawn in. My Teutonic background took over." [1].

The first IMD event was launched on February 7, 1992 for the purpose of what he said was "drawing positive attention to important [men's] issues." [2] The event was successful both in 1992 and again in 1993 and 1994.[3] People in four continents celebrated and guests at the various events came along to hear speakers talk on topics ranging from the "silent tragedy of men's health" to "man bashing" and to share, talk, wine and dine.

It was a miraculous occasion. For the first time in history people gathered at the same time on four continents to actually speak of such things. On that day, February 7, men and women rejoiced in the company of like-minded souls as they shared intimate stories that ears had never before heard. Oaster spoke at his hometown Kansas event, reminding attendees that discussion of men's health and wellbeing deserved to be heard though the cacophony of misandry;

"We want the bashing to stop. It's not a request. It's a statement. We want it to stop! To give you an example, a woman walked through here and saw the material and said, 'You've got to be kidding. You're not seriously going to have a men's day, are you?'"[4]

Oaster hoped that the day could become a means of education and consciousness raising where the positive cultural accomplishments of men could be celebrated and men might be faced with a better variety of choices about how they wanted to live their lives;

"Women and men should both have options" wrote Oaster, and "International Men's Day is an opportunity to draw attention to the issue of options."[5]

Oaster proposed six core objectives for a men's day, and they were to: celebrate men's positive traits and contributions, improve gender relations, focus attention on men's health and wellbeing, remove misandry, increase life options for men and boys, and to develop a humanitarian-style approach to all men's issues. These six objectives were the foundations that would later be reaffirmed and ratified by a new generation of IMD celebrants, but not before a group of 'anti-Oaster' University women had played their final hand.

After the popular success of the first International Men's Day event in 1992, feminists at his campus became increasingly vindictive. During his planning for the 1994 and 1995 IMD events, a bomb was suddenly dropped by at least 6 former and current female 'graduate students' who collectively complained that Oaster had sexually harassed them and was "hostile" in the classroom. The two most serious allegations put forward by the troupe were that Thomas Oaster had touched the forearm of one student with what she perceived was a "brief stroking motion", and that he had advised another student to dye her hair blonde in response to her question about what she could do improve her poor grade. To drive the nail deeper another student said he had referred to her as "Blondie" at least twice. The curators at the university entertained these shallow and dubious allegations and were quick to respond by imposing restrictions on Oaster's movements and work. [6]

Despite these distractions the next two IMD events went extremely well with several hundred individuals in attendance. However the fourth year of IMD heralded a change in the weather when his antagonists decided to double-down in their efforts to shut him down.

In 1995 Oaster had planned to orchestrate his fourth and biggest IMD event when he increasingly became the target of workplace bullying. He decided to sue the Curators of the University for Infringement of his civil rights as a tenured professor, claiming that he was being denied freedom of speech, salary increases, graduate teaching assistants and the use of university facilities.[6] Naturally the court proceedings took up much of his time and energy and this taxed his ability to effectively organize or advertise the upcoming IMD event.

Due to these circumstances the next IMD event was a flop with few people turning up. After this failure, and feeling drained by a complex court case, Oaster decided to defer future IMD plans and take a well-deserved rest.

With precision, Thomas Oaster had been persecuted for his role in the men's rights movement. [6] Late in 1995 Oaster won his court case against the UMKC and the University was forced to pay him $74,000 plus $15,000 for legal fees. After settlement Oaster resigned from his job as he felt he would no longer have the respect of his students, and he shelved plans to continue celebrating IMD. [6]

General interest in the event waned until 1999 when Dr. Jerome Teelucksingh, a History Professor at the University of the West Indies revived the event and shifted the date to November 19 – the date of his father's birthday.

Jerome Teelucksingh continued Oaster's emphasis on highlighting positive aspects and accomplishments of men. In a 2009 interview Teelucksingh also gave a nod to the work of Oaster when he stated this;

"I could be considered the founder of this version of IMD on 19 November but we need to also acknowledge the pioneering efforts of persons and groups before 1999… They are the ones to be honoured." [3]

In 2009 an international IMD committee was formed with Jerome Teelucksingh as chairman. The group came together to increase awareness about the event and to foster its growth into more nations.

Taking note of the foundational IMD objectives introduced by both Oaster and Teelucksingh, the committee encapsulated the objectives of International Men's Day in six guiding principles that would serve to protect the core values of the day and offer a reliable reference point for future IMD celebrants.[3] The 'Six Pillars,' which are suitably loose and open to interpretation, are now used as a guide by IMD celebrants around the world:

- To promote positive male role models; not just movie stars and sports men but everyday, working class men who are living decent, honest lives.
- To celebrate men's positive contributions to society, community, family, marriage, child care, and to the environment.
- To focus on men's health and wellbeing; social, emotional, physical and spiritual.
- To highlight discrimination against males; in areas of social services, social attitudes and expectations, and law.
- To improve gender relations and promote gender equality.
- To create a safer, better world; where people can live free from harm and grow to reach their full potential

It's my belief that the spirit of Oaster's original vision and that of A Voice for Men have much in common. Both movements aim to create an inclusive international voice for men as free as possible from sectarian distractions. Moreover, both IMD and AVfM reject the notion of a unified men's movement, encouraging instead a diversity of men's voices on a variety of humanitarian issues:

Thomas Oaster said this:

> [T]here is no such thing as a unified men's movement, the phenomena involved comprise a variety of sub-movements, even after analogies to other issues concerning which there are far left, far right, and middle-of-the-road orientations, there is yet another more fundamental point which can be made about the value of respect for all men as human beings. A day of respect should go beyond the current social activities referred to as Men's movements. This is true because the men's movement itself goes beyond the Men's movements. The men's movement, more fundamentally, is a turning of the human psyche and the articulation of this turning through the male voice.[5]

Paul Elam, founder of avoiceformen.com said:

> [C]ontinuing to buy into the false unity of a non-existent entity will only slow us down. I have always taken care, and still do, to point out that AVfM is not synonymous with the men's movement. And after mulling this over one more time of thousands, I am really glad that I have taken this approach. I don't know what the men's movement is, in all honesty. I don't even know that it exists.[7]

While the similarities in the two movements are obvious, there are some important differences. For instance in Thomas Oaster's day there was no internet, whereas today it is a vital medium for all activism, including here at AVfM. Another difference is that IMD focuses the year-long work of activists into one big day of publicity, whereas other activists strive to make 'every day' a men's day via regular online publicity.

. . .

International Men's Day is a grassroots movement with no official management. It does not belong to any government nor is it owned by the United Nations or any of its agencies. We might say that nobody owns the event, or better yet everybody owns it. Any person can self-nominate as an IMD coordinator for a specific region or event and, if desired can form alliances with an international network of individuals working to promote the day. Any current and future coordinators are merely hitch-hikers catching a ride on an international platform that nobody owns.

Nobody needs to gain permission to mark the day. All one need do is be mindful of the spirit of the occasion as laid out in the six pillars which ask us to remain true to the lives of men and boys without allowing that message to be diminished by negative or irrelevant concerns.

In recent years IMD has spread into new regions and attracted some mainstream attention. With this new attention it is perhaps time to remind newcomers that the originators of the event were fighting for liberty and freedom, and that we still have a very long way to go on this front.

With this in mind let us finish with words of Abraham Lincoln's Gettysburg address, itself delivered on November 19- the date of International Men's Day. The words of his address speak equally to the purpose of International Men's Day today and of the great sacrifices made by Oaster and other men and women who fought on the battlefield of cultural misandry;

'Four score and seven years ago our fathers brought forth on this continent, a new nation, conceived in Liberty, and dedicated to the proposition that all men are created equal. Now we are engaged in a great civil war, testing whether that nation, or any nation so conceived and so dedicated, can long endure… The brave men, living and dead, who struggled here, have consecrated [the ground], far above our poor power to add or detract. The world will little note, nor long remember what we say here, but it can never forget what they did here. It is for us the living, rather, to be dedicated here to the unfinished work which they who fought here have thus far so nobly advanced.' [Lincoln]

Despite the resistance, the tradition of IMD lives on. In Oaster's name let's dream it forward.

Sources:

[1] George Gurley, 'Finally, men get their day' (Kansas City Star: Feb 6, 1993)
[2] Fred Wickman, 'about Town' (Kansas City Star: Jan 27, 1992)
[3] Jason Thompson, 'International Men's Day; the making of a movement' (Soul Books, 2010)
[4] James Fussell, 'Men have their say at weekend forum' (Kansas City Star: Feb 6, 1993)
[5] Thomas Oaster, 'International Men's Day: RSVP' (Cummings and Hathaway, 1992)
[6] Cheryl Thompson, 'Complaints surface about UMKC professor' (Kansas City Star: Feb 1995)
[7] Paul Elam, 'Adios, c-ya, good-bye man-o-sphere' (A Voice for Men. retrieved October 2012)

The X%: What feminism is really about and why anyone who values freedom should fight against it

Paul Elam · 19 November 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Note: This article is also available in Portuguese and Romanian.

Italy, The United States, The Congo, The United Kingdom, South Korea, Denmark, Australia, Mexico, India, Japan, Canada and Spain. It is a very disparate (and only partial) list of countries, a blend of east and west; an extreme mix of languages and cultures spanning the entire planet. However differentiated in terms of societal norms and governance, however stark the surface contrast, all these places do have one very powerful and prominent thing that inextricably weaves through the fabric of their very existence, uniting them.

It is the same common thread that now runs through many other familiar entities: The Pentagon, Federal Express, The European Union, conservative political parties, Rock and Roll Music, The Prime Minister of England, nearly every criminal code on earth, The Australian Parliament, Country Music, liberal political parties, all Fortune 500 Companies, Oxford, Fox News, The United Nations, The Salvation Army, The Ford Foundation and The New York Times.

All these institutions, these countries, cultures, corporations and constructs have in common that to a greater or lesser degree, usually greater, they have been impacted by the spread and influence of gender feminism.

We see it in the wholesale acceptance of manufactured research results and bogus statistics supporting the feminist narrative that are parroted without consideration or vetting by media outlets, state functionaries and political candidates (regardless of party) worldwide.

It is visible in the exponential rise in draconian laws that eviscerate canons of law that have stood for centuries; railroading innocent men into shackles and making them the property of a prison-industrial complex that has risen into prominence in the last fifty years.

It shows itself in college “honor courts” that have become star chambers, meting out life-altering consequences without proof, without even meeting the paltry new standards coerced by a corrupt presidential administration.

We are bombarded by it from the media, bombastically pounding us with disinformation and blackmailing us with the shame they have been instilling in us for decades.

We often joke, and with good reason, about the stupidity of feminists. After all, have you ever seen Futrelle in a debate, watched Sarkeesian damsel herself while complaining about damseling, listened to Rebecca Watson try to convince skeptics that an invitation to coffee is a threat and social issue for women, or read a few lines of Ally Fogg just after he tells you he is not a feminist?

In fact, in the realm of feminism, particularly online, stupidity is regarded as good breeding; an asset that will get you to the top.

But the question remains, if feminists are so stupid, then why is feminism now the dominant ideology on the planet, affecting almost every institution, political apparatus, provider of every level of education, as well as every law enforcement agency and corporate entity known?

If feminists are so intellectually vacant, then why are we here, without resources and struggling mightily to skate by on guile and creativity in order to do anything about the supposed idiots?

The answer to that is as simple as it is forbidding.

Feminism is not for feminists. Feminists are idiots, but they are the useful idiots in the description previously reserved for Soviet sycophants in cold war America.

Feminism, in reality, is for governments and corporations. And it is the most effective tool for control of the masses since the riot baton and water cannons.

I think, as we look across the map, from Stockholm to San Diego, from Tokyo to Toronto, we are not seeing a world that has just bought in to the gender dominated ramblings of a bunch of morons that could not cut it in STEM. Nor are we seeing the work of regressive female troglodytes sporting Doc Martins, one eyebrow and lip hair that aspires to be a moustache.

What we are seeing is a chain of governments, and just as importantly their powerhouse corporate interests, that have figured out the "secret" to inflicting whatever serves them on the populace without causing significant resistance.

They have found that the best method for making people toe the government line is not with iron-fisted restrictions on freedom of speech, the press and the right to assembly. Those are old world strategies still at play in some Third World regions, but not in the industrialized world. Much too passé and inefficient.

First World governments, and even some who barely qualify, have discovered that they can control the masses with aggressive gynocentrism.

The method for doing so is not that difficult. All it takes is a little time, a little money, and more than a little basic understanding of human sociobiology. In fact, if you play your cards anything less than sloppy, you can control the masses with enthusiastic help — from the masses.

There are some basic laws that form the foundation for this kind of control. They are based on characteristics that trend heavily in the respective sexes. They are not 100% fixed, and there are exceptions, which of course means they are not laws in the scientific sense. The term law is used illustratively, not literally.

The exceptions are pretty rare, though. There are very few of them comparatively; not enough to get in the way of asserting control if you are committed to it.

Discussing these laws requires some advance qualification. In them you will see many blanket and highly generalized statements about men and women, much of it unflattering. Keep in mind two things. One, these laws deal with specific areas of sexually rooted behavior and attitudes. They are not intended as any kind of complete description of men and women. They are merely microcosms.

Second, the criticism is balanced. Not out of an orchestrated attempt to be egalitarian, but because the behaviors to be found here are more or less of equal proportion in both men and women. I am not painting one as better, more moral or more principled than the other, because that is not the case. When it comes to the human weaknesses that allow and enable this particular kind of tyranny, men and women find themselves in the rare position of being absolute equals.

So let us begin.

The Laws Regarding Men and Women:

Men:

1. Men will not oppose anything perceived to benefit women. Protecting women, and providing for them and their children, is an innate instinct in men. Note that the law says "perceived." It matters not if a particular thing actually benefits women, or if in fact it harms them, if the perception is popular that a particular thing benefits women, men will support it, even at their own expense and to their detriment.

2. Men will attack and shun other men for violating law number one. This relates to enforcement. The perception qualification still applies. In the social, legal and political realms, men will attack, verbally and physically, men who are perceived to either harm women or who oppose anything perceived to protect women. In fact, in the minds of men those two things, harming women or opposing an attempt at their protection, are literally the same thing.

3. Men have almost no limits to how far they will go regarding adherence to laws number one and two. This includes the fact that men will have their own families ripped apart by corrupt courts, in the process suffering false allegations, alienation from their children, loss of home and income, staving off suicidal impulses, and ultimately react to it all by seeking another wife and telling men who experience those problems that they need to shut up, or man up, and take it. They will view a man who does not support VAWA as a man who supports domestic violence and a man who does not support rape shield laws as a man who supports rape. The list goes on.

4. Men will not complain collectively about anything that happens to them as a group. This crucial law is particularly beneficial to achieving complete governmental/corporate control. Attacks and affronts to men as a group will not cause a collective group reaction. Ever. You can imprison them, beat them, steal their property, demonize their sons, psychologically destroy their children, relegate them to the streets, tax them and spend their money on other groups, and as men they will not react. Again, ever. Indeed, men will, in accordance with laws number one and two, assist the state in the furtherance of such abuses as long as the dominant public perception is that it is done under the auspices of protecting women.

Women:

1. Women will not oppose anything perceived to benefit them as a group. On the surface this may seem innocuous and even just human, but it extends into some pretty inhuman areas. As a group, women will not oppose anything, no matter how destructive it may be to others, and ultimately themselves, if they perceive an immediate benefit. They won't, as a group, oppose all male Selective Service, all male genital mutilation, taking the lion's share of resources produced by men and redistributing it to women or any other injustice that works in their favor. They will not oppose clearly oppressive and unConstitutional laws, as long as they perceive a benefit to women. They will not oppose the complete disappearance of men from education and the workplace, as long as they perceive it works to their advantage. That list goes on as well.

2. Women will attack and shun other women for violating law number one. The women who violate that law are frequently considered "traitors" to other women, and they will be marginalized and ostracized. The nature and scope of the attacks against them are generally less extreme than those against men, but they are completely real. Women will attack and shun other women for supporting any ideas that do not include women as the primary and often sole beneficiaries of social services, special legal protections, government subsidies and even deference to opinions. Women, by and large, are women first and women only.

3. Women have virtually no limits to how far they will go regarding adherence to laws number one and two. This includes willingness to see their own children psychologically damaged for perceived personal advantage and seeing male loved ones abused and even destroyed by the state and other entities for the advantage of other women. They may experience outrage over how that abuse and destruction impacts them and the men they hold dear, but it will not translate into a meaningful outrage over what happens to men as a class.

4. Women will complain collectively about whatever happens to them as a group, regardless of whether it is really happening. The only requirement is that some level of perception of a problem be there. Women, as a group, will complain for decades about long debunked injustices against them, and refuse to even entertain evidence to the contrary. Men will do this, too, but for women, not for themselves. The point of law number four for women is that it informs government and corporate entities that in order to create social momentum sufficient to pass laws and justify political policy, all it needs to do is frame information, accurate or not, in a way that paints women as victim class. Sociobiology will take over from there.

These are the laws on which modern tyranny is built. Why? Because these laws determine what people will vote for and what they will tolerate. Again, they are not presented so as to pass moral judgment on men or women. These traits are an innate part of the human condition in both sexes. Faulting women as a class for blindly taking advantage of unfair laws is only as legitimate as faulting men for enabling and abetting the exact same thing.

These laws are passed with both sexes working in cooperation to do it, and failing to recognize that also blinds us to the possible solutions, whatever they may be.

What is important here is to take this understanding of the predictability of attitudes and behavior innate in men and women, and see how those things might be exploited to exert control over the masses and intrude unreasonably into private life, which might just be a clue as to how it has already happened.

What would we do if we wanted a government and/or a corporate hegemony that could work unimpeded toward any end it wanted, and without the nuisance of law or civil rights concerns getting in the way?

A good place to start is to disempower the average man (not the .01% at the top and who will remain there regardless). Make the average man a default criminal, not even fit to sit next to a child on a plane. Turn him into a looming, potential threat that demands some kind of management. Treat him as a potential rapist and an abuser. Tie it all to the protection and advantage of women.

Done.

Set up law enforcement and legal apparatuses that are geared primarily to interdict on masculinity itself, or rather the version of masculinity being sold by those in charge. Use it mercilessly. Throw due process and presumed innocence out the window. Make it socially unpopular to even object to it. This works especially well in minority communities who will complain vociferously about racial profiling, but will fall silent when the discrimination is based on sex and is against men. Count on the silence and enforcement for non-compliance guaranteed by the laws that govern men and women to be in overdrive here.

Check that one off the list, too.

Men are much more likely to challenge authority, e.g. their own governments, when the well-being of their families is at stake. It is therefore essential to strip away male authority and presence in the family home. Make divorce easily accessible, even popular, profitable, and stack the deck against men in family courts. The laws of men and women will ensure they stay largely silent about it, no matter how bad it gets, no matter how much harm it causes, even as it destroys children. And it won't matter in the long run, those children will grow into consumers, too. Money from damaged people spends just as well.

Some of them will grow into criminals because of these abuses, but they can be incarcerated. That too is a business.

Tick the box on this one, also.

Remove men from education and any part of the workforce in which being a man is not absolutely essential. Keep men in ditches, trucks, fishing boats and the unemployment line. Make them as unattractive as possible for the possibility of starting families that they might eventually want to protect from a government out of control with power. Use them to wage war when corporate interests demand it, and if they are married, assist the wives in finishing them off once they return from the front, broken or deemed dangerous. They won't complain. They may kill themselves, but they won't complain. Women won't complain, either. In fact, both will actually feel good about it, or at least act like they do. It is in the sociobiology. Remember the laws.

This one is In progress. Outlook promising.

Systematically indoctrinate women into the mindset that they are victims, feed them disinformation until they feel they are owed the right to inflict whatever harm they want to on the criminal class, and provide the state services needed to assist them. A fabricated wage gap becomes a gender gap. An imaginary glass ceiling becomes a very real glass wall in almost no time. A status as sole victim in domestic disputes becomes a license to attack and then call state functionaries to haul off your victim.

Double check.

Give women a false sense of empowerment.

It is easiest to do this as you make a public display of the disempowerment of men. They will see it happening in front of their eyes and then swear it is a man's world because on some level they know that crazy belief is fueling the actual disempowerment they are witnessing.

Shame women for valuing motherhood more than professional life. Help them view their children and especially their husbands as hindrances, rather than assets. Socialize them to value work and the state over motherhood and family. Push them toward low paying (but taxable) jobs, while binding them to state-provided subsidies like WIC, food stamps, welfare, child support and alimony. Make them obedient taxpaying consumers that support feminist governance because for many of them it will be the difference between just being poor and being really impoverished. Make them financially and psychologically dependent on their own enslavement.

Tell them they can achieve the top, then point them toward the middle and lock them in. Do all this and put a gun in their hand that they can use on men at will, and they will be obedient servants of the state for life. Remember, as long as they perceive they have the advantage, that they are empowered, even sitting there in a corporate cubicle, missing their child with dark bags under their eyes, they will act like puppets on a string.

Done, done and done.

The point here is that feminism is not a sweeping movement for change or a way to liberate women (and allegedly men) from the burdens of their sexual role in the world. It is not a movement for equality or justice.

Feminism is nothing more than a government tool by which governments can roughly double the number of taxpayers; by which civil liberties can be swept aside so that money can be extracted. It is a way to eviscerate freedoms on every level, while getting the population to do the bulk of the work to make it happen. It is a way to insert government control into every possible aspect of modern human life, from the bedroom to the boardroom. It is not stupid. It is fucking brilliant in an evil sort of way.

The most valuable tool to make that happen is the X%.

Who and what are the X%? They are the small percent of men and women that ultimately cause the most terror and the most additional impetus to not violate the laws governing men and women.

The fact is that all women are issued the gun that they can use to cause egregious harm in the lives of men. Most of them don't do it. That is not a blanket pass because most women (and men) will stay silent while it happens to others, but the fact is that only X% of women will beat a man then call the cops on him. Only X% of women will falsely accuse men of rape or domestic violence. Only X% of women will ruin the lives of their children just so they can get back at a man for daring not to love them any more after years of her abuse.

The same holds true of men. In them, the X% are the men who stand up most vocally for injustice and hatred and to help blind people to what is happening. Men like David Futrelle, Michael Kimmel, et al, the occasional rabid white knight that shows up here to tell us that women never lie about rape, the British politician who says men should be put in chains and forced to support women. In their ranks are also the men who will hunt down and beat and sometimes kill other men in order to provide the service of proxy violence to women.

The rest of the human species, the great majority, are just the ones that obey the laws of men and women and thereby ensure that all this shit continues to go down without reaction.

Other than the men who turn violent, the law, the real law, will do nothing to stop any of it. By ignoring the conduct of the X% it spreads a clear message to the others who might just change their minds at some point.

Oh, and by the way, X% is no small number of people in the western world. It is a fuckton of them. They serve as a visible example to everyone of what the rules really are, and who will get away with what.

They advertise the true order of things.

And the true order of things is that governments and corporations are increasingly taking over our lives and our minds. Feminists are not a bunch of nut cases that have taken over the world. They are just a bunch of nut cases that have assisted some really smart and devious people in erasing any impediments they might have ever had at putting a leash on all of us.

And now comes the N%. That would be us. Much smaller than the X%, but growing, even as the X% is shrinking, or at least starting to be exposed to a couple of firsts that they don't much seem to care for.

The truth, and public humiliation.

I'd call that a good place to start.

Privileged white feminists need to STFU

AVfM Video Source · 19 November 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Although we don't even agree that there was ever any "Patriarchy" as feminists describe it, we think The Straight Shooter makes some terrific points here. He demonstrates well that even when inebriated it's pretty easy to take apart the rantings of gender ideologues.

http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=puBDT9AAJsY

Might we add that even if some of these girls grew up in single mother homes they almost certainly had mommies getting child support, alimony, and/or other assistance from the state?

You may want to subscribe to The Straight Shooter for more.

David Cameron, the Porn Minister

AVfM Video Source · 19 November 2013 · Archived copy · Original

In the UK, Conservatives are reigniting the decades-old alliance between conservatives and feminists on the subject of, you guessed it, male sexuality.

Need we add that Cameron is almost certainly mostly concerned about porn made for or by men? Porn for women, some of which isn't even considered porn just because it's by and for women and thus gets tagged "erotica" more often, is usually off the RADAR in these handwringing discussions.

You may want to subscribe to Dan Bull.

Tale of Two Disposable Men – 1930-1975

Robert St. Estephe · 20 November 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Robert St. Estephe–Gonzo Historian–is dedicated to uncovering the forgotten past of marginalizing men. "Gonzo journalism" is characterized as tending "to favor style over fact to achieve accuracy." Yet history – especially "social history" – is written by ideologues who distort and bury facts in order to achieve an agenda. "Gonzo" writing is seen as unorthodox and surprising. Yet, in the 21st century subjectivity, distortion and outright lying in non-fiction writing is the norm. Fraud is the new orthodoxy. Consequently, integrity is the new "transgressive."

Welcome to the disruptive world of facts, the world of Gonzo History.

•••

[image]

In 1915 Clara Schweiger shot her ex-husband to death in the hallway outside a courtroom in Kansas City, Missouri. Her female lawyer (yes, you read that right) got her off with a second degree conviction. Chicago spurned wife Emma D. Simpson shot her husband in a courtroom in front of a judge and her attorney Clarence Darrow made sure she would walk away with a slap on her dainty little wrist.

Clara Pascak chose for the moment she would shoot her husband in the Pittsburgh courthouse the precise time that Pennsylvania's first female judge, Sarah Soffel, was being sworn in next door. But the murdered Steve Palscak is not the only disposable you will hear about in the oddly intertwined news stories to follow. As it turns out lady judge Sarah Soffel, highly respected frequently lauded, was up to a bit of bad business beneath the black robes of office along the course of her stellar career.

It seems that the Honorable Sarah Soffel had been involved in organized crime as was discclosed in the case of a man who had been sent to prison hey her in 1949 on a false accusation of "morals charges" (a euphemism for sex crimes, in this instance, homosexual pedophilia). In the late 1960s, some years after the respected judge had passed away one of the young accusers against Hayden C. Jones Jr. was assigned to the same prison as his victim, Mr. Jones. This encounter eventually led to the innocent man's 1968 release. The series of further outrages committed against Hayden Jones following his original sentencing were of such an enormity that it would be hard to imagine a more harrowing narrative of torment. Insult followed injury time after time even up to the state legislature which gave him the brush-off in 1972 and the Commonwealth court sent him away empty handed in 1975.

Judge Soffel, whose judicial career began with a bang, flowed towards the gutter; and it was the fate of Hayden Jones to be sentenced by her to a life of Living Hell in order to keep her august name squeaky clean. Little information is easily accessible on the career of respectable Judge Soffel apart from the standard fare of praises one would expect for a prominent "pioneering woman" with her long string of honors, awards and appointments. Yet at least some memory of her remains. The disposable man in the story, Hayden C. Jones, whose tossed-away life resembles that of a Vietnam POW, has long been forgotten — until now.

••••••

[image]

FULL TEXT (Article 1 of 4): Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, Aug. 27. – While Judge Sarah Soffel, Pennsylvania's first woman judicial official was being sworn to office here today Mrs. Clara Palscak, 24, shot probably fatally wounded her husband, Steve Palscak in the office of the desertion and non-support court, climaxing the first case on the woman judge's docket.

One of the three bullets fired wife, lodged in Palscak's abdomen. He was reported in a critical condition.

Palscak was in court today on complaint by his wife and his case was to have been the first called by Judge Soffel after taking her oath of office.

Mrs. Palscak, witnesses say, walked into the court's office while the judicial ceremonies were being carried on in another room of the court house and asked Miss Bess Parkin, attendant, for permission to speak with her husband.

After a brief conversation the woman was seen to pull a pistol from her purse and fired three times at Palscak.

[image]

The woman raged and fought with a half dozen officers who rushed in and was finally led to the county detective bureau, sobbing "he wouldn't come back to me."

The couple had been married only recently and had separated once and been reconciled. A few days ago, however, Palscak refused to return to his wife.

Judge Soffel was being sworn in as county judge of Allegheny County following her recent appointment by Governor John S. Fisher. She is the first woman ever to be named to the bench in the Commonwealth.

["Shooting Climaxes First Case Woman Judge's Docket – Deserted Wife Shoots Her Husband Immediately Before Case is to be Called Soffel Was Taking Oath – Scene In Nearby Room," syndicated (INS), Clearfield Progress (Pa.), Aug. 27, 1927, p. 1]

***

PHOTO CAPTION: Appearing in a Pittsburgh court against her estranged husband, Steve Palscak, 24, Clara Palscak; 21, threw the courtroom into a panic when she whipped out a revolver and possibly mortally wounded him. The woman said the gun accidentally discharged when she pulled it from her purse. The case was the first listed for Judge Sarah N. Soffel, just sworn in as Pennsylvania's first woman jurist.

["Courtroom in Panic," The Morning Herald (Hagerstown, Md.), Aug. 30, 1930, p. 1]

***

[image]

FULL TEXT (Article 3 of 4): Hellertown, Pa. – Hayden C. Jones Jr. is asking for $1 million from the State of Pennsylvania because he ii claims his wrongful conviction in 1949 on morals charges cost him 19 years of freedom, his health and the lives of his wife and three children.

Jones says all he has ever received was $7 and a train ticket home from prison, and now only the possibility of a formal apology from the Board of Pardons.

Jones was convicted of sodomy and assault charges in 1949 in Allegheny County after five boys between the ages of 11 and 14 testified against him. In his suit, filed in Commonwealth Court Jones said he was released from prison in 1968 after one of the youths who testified against him admitted he had lied.

"I was convicted on morals charges because I wouldn't get involved in a shakedown," Jones said at a retreat here where he is resting. "Most silly thing I've ever heard, they asked for $300."

Jones explained he was on 10 day leave from the Army at the time and had gone to Pittsburgh. "I went to a movie. The way they do it is that the police bring boys into the movie and they sit on each side of you. The boys put their hands on your legs and then you're arrested on morals charges," Jones said.

He was sentenced to 15 to 25 years imprisonment by Judge Sarah Soffel. A week later he was called back and resentenced by the same judge to 15 to 30 years. His attorney, David Spirit, said no reason was ever given for the resentencing. Judge Soffel is now dead [she remained on the bench until 1962]. Jones was sent to Western State Penitentiary at Pittsburgh then transferred to Eastern State Penitentiary and finally released in 1968 from Huntingdon Correction Institution. While in prison he testified before a Pittsburgh grand jury investigating an alleged shakedown ring.

"That never got anywhere," Jones said, adding that Sarah Soffel was the jury's presiding judge.

Jones claimed he developed emphysema, asthma and a weak heart in prison after spending “five years in solitary at one time.” In 1965 while he was incarcerated at Eastern Penitentiary, his wife and three children were killed in an automobile accident en route to see him at the prison.

“I didn’t know about their deaths until two years later,” Jones said. “They keep it from you in prison. Maybe to keep you from going over the wall. In those days the wardens were pretty bad.” According to Spirit, Jones was in solitary confinement at the time of his family’s deaths and “nobody ever notified him.”

“He had been in prison 15 years and it wasn’t unusual for him not to hear from them for six months or a year or more,” Spirit said. “It wasn’t unusual for him to expect them and not have them show up.”

During that time, according to the suit, the five youths signed affidavits admitting they perjured testimony under coercion by police. Spirit said the affidavits never reached the court. Jones said he did not learn of the affidavits until 12 years later.

“I was in prison taking a shower and I saw this boy staring at me,” he said. “I got all hogtied and he asked me, ‘Don’t you know who I am? I’m one of the boys that framed you. I was forced to lie against you.” The following day Jones was brought before Allegheny Court President Judge Henry Ellenbogan who ordered the sentence vacated and the conviction overturned.

Since his release in 1968, three bills were introduced in the Pennsylvania Legislature to compensate Jones for the years he spent in prison.” None of the bills passed.

Jones recently received a letter from Gov. Milton J. Shapp advising him the case has been referred to the Board of Pardons. But Jones wants more than just a formal letter of apology.

He filed the suit against three state officials and 11 state Senators and Representatives in an effort to receive compensation for his 18 years of “unlawful and wrongful imprisonment.” Jones, who now resides in Philadelphia, turned 51 last May. He thinks his reward is long overdue.

[“Wrongly Convicted on Morals Charges . . . Man Asking $1 Million From State,” syndicated (UPI), Leader Times (Kittaning, Pa.), Jul. 2, 1974, p. 14]

***

FULL TEXT (Article 4 of 4): Harrisburg – Commonwealth Court has rejected an Allegheny County man’s contention that the state must pay him for wrongfully keeping him in prison for 19 years.

Hayden C. Jones Jr., 52, of McKeesport, charged he was falsely imprisoned. He had asked the court to force either state officials or the legislature to pay him an unspecified amount of money.

Jones was sent to prison in 1949 after his conviction for running a crime school for youths and for morals offenses.

He was released in 1968 when three of the five boys who had testified against him disclosed they were told by authorities to the seven-judge panel said the state is protected from such suits by the doctrine of sovereign immunity.

“Under the current status of the law, the commonwealth’s allegedly wrongful incarceration of plaintiff, though abjectly distasteful, offers plaintiff no cognizable relief,” the court said.

Besides, the court said, it has no power to force the legislature to pass a measure compensating Jones.

In 1972, the House passed a bill to pay Jones $133,000, but the Senate refused to agree.

[“Plea Nixed,” syndicated (AP), The Evening Standard (Uniontown, Pa.), Aug. 5, 1975, p. 6]

***

Feminism and the collapsing middle class

Kalan Chinuck · 20 November 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Elizabeth Warren is an outspoken Democratic Senator from Massachusetts formerly occupied teaching and researching commercial law and bankruptcy. In a 2007 lecture entitled The Coming Collapse of the Middle Class, Warren provided a detailed look at the newly dysfunctional reality of life for those who comprise the meat in America's class sandwich. Today's social, political and economic landscape reflects the trends she presciently identified which continue to bear their bitter fruit, that of a downward financial and aspirational spiral for families, for America, and in all likelihood for much of Western civilization.

Warren herself avoided any serious discussion of root causes, largely limiting her discussion to economic and class issues, but the interrelated impacts of feminism, no-fault (read male-fault) divorce and the steady move by women into the work force are obvious throughout her narrative.

The image of heavily indebted consumers racking up their credit cards with unpayable debt while splurging foolishly on iPads, Nikes and Cadillacs is a popular one, but inaccurate, according to Warren. Her research, using inflation-adjusted figures, compared costs for a traditional family (mom, dad, two kids) in 1971 to that same family in 2003.

Surprisingly, food, appliances, baby food, clothing, cigarettes, furniture and per-car expenses dropped, some by significant amounts, when considered as a proportion of household income. Electronics, dog food and liquor went up, but not significantly. The real increase in costs for families occurred in the five largest areas of consumer spending, items which are mandatory fixed costs for any family. These are housing (the McMansion effect was not a factor), health, child care, taxes (due to high marginal rates on the second income) and cars (costs per car decreased, but the number of cars per family increased out of necessity).

These fixed costs rose from 50% of household income in 1971 to 75% in 2003. The modern family also had much greater (almost double) income volatility due to greatly increased odds of job loss, catastrophically expensive health issues, and divorce.

With respect to bankruptcy and the subsequent slide into the lower class, a single male with no children was least likely to go belly up, followed closely by childless single females and married couples – all hover around the 7 per 1000 rate. When children were involved, married couples faced double that rate, while single moms bankrupted at a rate of 23 per 1000 (there weren't enough single dads in her data to form a statistically valid sample). Fifty percent of bankrupts have endured two of the big three predictors (job loss, health issue, divorce), and 20% have experienced all three.

Warren also provides significant data which shows that the costs for parents of launching their own descendants into the middle class have increased significantly through erosion of the safety net and through the transfer of costs. For example, 12 years of taxpayer-funded schooling formerly was sufficient, while at present a college degree and pre-school are mandatory, meaning 1/3 of the necessary educational cost (for those aspiring to the middle class) is a new financial responsibility for parents. Ditto the health care system, which, in addition to shifting costs away from taxpayers onto immediate family, has also become a generator of reduced income.

It's important to note that the greatest impacts of the above shifts have been on the traditional married two-parent two-child family. Other forms of the family and individuals have experienced these shifts as well, but to a lesser extent.

In his lecture on The Collapse of Complex Societies, Dr. Joseph Tainter describes the process whereby societies solve problems through complex solutions (because it works), until the point is reached where the cumulative expense of maintaining all extant solutions overwhelms the nation's ability to pay for them. This mechanism includes the diminishing returns on research (i.e., the ability to devise and implement new solutions) which become prevalent as the low-hanging fruit is plucked, as well as the ever-increasing military costs and currency devaluations which accompany the need to maintain the empire and pay for more and more solutions.

Sevareid's Law, which states that "the chief source of problems is solutions" encapsulates Tainter's work in a pithy nutshell. Senator Warren's research provides an inadvertent glimpse into this virtuous spiral – 'solving' the problems of feminists through female 'empowerment' and the break-down of the family has helped create greater problems which necessitate more complex and less effective solutions which in turn will create further problems and an outcry for yet more solutions. Such a cycle involves ever-escalating complexity and cost, and reiterates up to the point of societal break-down. The explosion of government 'services' such as VAWA, ObamaCare and SNAP, not to mention America's military budget, currently provide classic examples, and there will undoubtedly be more to come.

Perhaps the most important comment offered by Dr. Tainter is that efforts to solve problems, while ultimately leading to destruction, often are ethical and desirable. He points out that the Roman Empire would have collapsed much sooner had its rulers (most notably Diocletian) not taken steps to create complex solutions. (An interesting aside here: the only examples of sustainable, stable societies seem to be prehistoric, so, is a sustainable complex society possible?)

In that sense, it is clear a genuine concern for the well-being of women and a desire to solve their problems, real or not, provided an impetus for some of the solutions currently in place, and will almost certainly profoundly influence the next cycle of solutions. It's worth wondering what those solutions will be, but even more so to contemplate what problems they might bring.

Love, hope, and MTGOW men: you are the party

John Hembling (JtO) · 20 November 2013 · Archived copy · Original

There's a conversation I've heard a few times, between any of several prominent female MRAs and other men within the movement.

"We need more female MRAs; the guys need hope."

Or, as related to me by a female member of the MHRM, it goes something like "we need more women like you in the movement" followed by "it gives the guys hope."

The hope referred to is that of men within this human rights movement that, someday, they might find somebody to love who both recognizes them as non-disposable human beings, and who won't use the courts, or the police, or simply the public court of male-is-evil female-is-good to dispose of them at the first moment of advantage or convenience. It seems like an awful lot of guys, both within the men's human rights movement and outside it, are awfully fond of women, and want to love and be loved by one who isn't malevolent or crazy.

Yeah, that's right: An awful lot of the supposedly woman-hating "hard core MRA types" really just want a stable, committed relationship.

But, being MHRA, they know they can't have that. At least, not as long as they remain committed to the radical idea that men, as human beings, live in a world that treats them as disposable, and face a long list of powerful disadvantages in a society which insists they [men] are the all-powerful rulers of the world, in the same breath as men are told to be quiet, go to the back of the bus, do their duty, pay, provide, and when convenient for others, die.

Stepping outside the context of the MHRM for a moment, I saw a homeless man's sign earlier this year which read: "all I want is to sleep under a roof, and to love and be loved, why is it so hard?"

But getting back to the idea of: "we need more female MRAs, because it gives hope to guys in the movement."

I happen to think we need female MRAs simply because this is a human rights movement, and humans come in two standard models typically identified as "men" and "women".

But what about giving hope to the men in this movement who, deep in their bones, want to love and be loved? What about hope for the guys who wish they could find a nice, not-crazy, not passively-predatory woman to settle down and build a family with? What can we do for them to give them some hope?

Guys, it's time for you to put aside the desire for something that, if it ever existed, no longer does.

Sure, it's easy to find a woman you get along with. It's relatively easy to find somebody you like enough to move in with, sleep with, share breakfasts with and all kinds of other domestic contentments.

But the fact remains that even in a loving, trusting, functional relationship between a man and a woman, the law, the family courts, and the consensus of the entire rest of the world is that if you and she come to a serious disagreement, the world will move to protect her (the innocent victim) from you (the bad, bad, bad man).

And that means that a conventionally structured intimate relationship between a man and a woman is one in which she holds a metaphorical gun to his head every minute of every day. She has the power to dispose of him, regardless of who, or even whether, anyone in a disagreement is right or wrong.

A great many men outside the MHRM understand this, which is why we keep hearing so much about a so-called marriage strike. Despite the name it's actually not a strike in the sense of a temporary suspension during negotiation. What we commonly call the marriage strike is actually a diaspora.

But for those men who really really wish they could meet a nice, compassionate woman like our own Karen Straughan, or Alison Tieman, or Della, or Suz, or like Dianna or Judgy Bitch, then settle down and build a life together, you gents are sadly out of luck. That thing you want does not exist.

Are there more women like Diana or Suz, or Karen, or Della or Typhon, or Judgy Bitch? Sure there are, maybe even as much as 1% of the female population. But the problem remains that in a conventionally structured intimate relationship, you are still living under the barrel of that metaphorical gun.

Some guys might even say "I wouldn't mind, so long as it's somebody like this or that female MRA."

Let's pick that apart before we swat it contemptuously aside. A woman worth being loved and trusted, who ostensibly loves you, even while she willingly participates in a "relationship" in which she is the fiat owner of the life, freedom, and continued public person as "good man" of somebody she would apparently love?

A sane and moral human being cannot be content as the jailor and owner of their partner, spouse or significant other.

If the person whom you want to love and be loved by is content to hold a metaphorical gun to your neck every minute of every day, then they are nobody you should ever have trust or affection for. Which is why conventional intimate relationships are broken, defunct, and dystopian zombie abuse-relationships, no matter how much illusion and reality denial we may indulge in.

So am I saying we should all give up on even loving or being loved?

Uhhhh, no.

I know a great many detractors and critics of the MHRM as well as the MGTOW movement would characterize it in such terms.

MGTOWs are sad, pale, hairy, flabby, lonely sexless losers – who when not in their mother's basements live in the wildness in canvas tents and caves, masturbating to internet porn and subsisting on potato peelings and ramen noodles.

That sounds pretty damned sad.

Surrounding the MHRM, and men, going their own way, there is a conception that in declaring himself a human being of equal, non-disposable human worth – a man is electing to leave, rather than join the party. He's un-inviting himself from some significant fraction of cultural and social life.

All of that is encapsulated by the conception of the MRM, or the MGTOW movement as the sad, lonely loser.

Nothing could be further from reality. But there are two realities in play here. One of them is the "reality" of public narrative. That's what "we" (the public) all agree, without overtly agreeing, to be real. It's the story we all, by our silence, accept. The other reality is what an empiricist objectivist might describe as reality. This is a little more challenging, because it's reality dependent on observation – while even this discussion of it takes place in that abstract space of an online blog; removed from the direct observation an empirically based world view requires.

As a MGTOW, you are not leaving the party. You are the party.

Does following a MGTOW path include having friendships, even intimate sexual relationships with women?

OF COURSE IT DOES!

It just means that those relationships are not patterned in a conventional format.

Does following a MGTOW path include pursuing a challenging and potentially highly paid professional career?

Um duh, yes.

It just means your reasons for such pursuit are your own, and not likely attached to the public perception of social approval, status, and group hierarchy ladder climbing.

Does following a MGTOW path mean avoiding all contact with women, or leaving the job market, or opting out of public life or society?

Aside from responding with “NO, OF COURSE IT DOESNT!” this point merits special mention. For some practising and advocating MGTOW, a flat rejection of sexual friendships, intimate relationships, economic success and of social engagement. This particular conception is understandable as a gut level reaction to populist anti-male culture and law. But this proposed path of escalating disengagement ends with a practitioner literally hiding in terror from participation in his own life.

I’ll say it again: as a MGTOW, you are not leaving the party. You ARE the party.

This is repeated because it’s one of the points repeatedly misunderstood, and misrepresented by both advocates and critics of MGTOW.

A man defining himself as human, demanding equitable treatment within his personal, professional, and legal relationships does not necessitate the universal opting-out that both critics and some advocates of MGTOW predict.

Doesn’t this posited life of poverty, solitude and lonely masturbation sound like either fear, or the threat from authoritarians when faced by the “threat” of individual male noncompliance?

Doesn’t the projected path of sexless poverty, unemployment and basement-dwelling economic parasitism sound just like something out of the venerable, but still excellent, Shaming Tactics catalog?

Are there elements of public, social, and legal life to disengage from as a Man Going His Own Way? Of course, particularly established social and legal conventions binding men to any enforceable status as lesser legal and social entities by virtue of sexual identity. Marriage, for me, springs sharply to mind here.

But does a MGTOW path include cultivating collegial as well as intimate friendships with members of our human race’s other 51%?

Yes, of course. And in a MGTOW practice, those relationships, whether long- or short-term are non-coercive, nonviolent, and based on honesty and compassion for the men and women within those relationships.

Specific details of such relationships are omitted here from this discussion for several reasons. First being the fact that the “Their Own Way” in MGTOW means whatever solutions and practices one MGTOW may employ are personal, and not prescriptive to be imposed or even outlined as some kind of “you should do what I say” manual.

The second reason being that MGTOW is activism, tackling a very large problem, and in opposition to what, for now, remains the major accepted standards of our society. The wider world is beginning to wake up to, and to seriously oppose MTGOW as a movement can learn the details after their shit has been fucked up. Because just as the culture of MGTOW is not prescriptive for men adopting it, it is also not static.

A man going his own way is defining himself, and consciously defining the terms of his relationships to the world, to friends of either sex, to education and employment. The idea of letting existing social conventions eject him from relationships, or employment, or success, in any area of life is really not going his own way. It’s simply giving in to a culture of abuse.

You are neither invited to the party, or the adventure, or the fun, nor are you disinvited. You ARE the party, and whoever refuses to treat you as a human being, rather than the disposable sub-person of the mainstream narrative: they are disinvited, and too bad for them.

This isn’t, by the way, an article designed to give men in this movement hope. Hope is for losers. This is simply a very polite correction to a false characterization driven by the fear of the opponents of this men’s human rights movement, and the subset of that movement identified as MGTOW.

Thank you for your kind attention.

Self Made Man: Norah Vincent chooses Female Privilege over Male Privilege

AVfM Video Source · 20 November 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Some years ago, lesbian feminist Norah Vincent did an experiment that a lot of gynocentric ideologues wish she hadn't, and would prefer we all forget.

For more interesting videos you might want to subscribe to Astrokid NJ.

Hilarious video helps prove once again: misandry isn't real!

AVfM Video Source · 20 November 2013 · Archived copy · Original

You go girl! That punk obviously has it coming!

http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=undxuVS9h4U

(Our apologies, someone at Jezebel or Feministing has taken possession of us. –DE)

International Men's Day ruminations

Steve Brulé · 21 November 2013 · Archived copy · Original

I had no idea that November 19th was International Men's Day (IMD). Honestly I didn't know there was an International Men's Day. I certainly knew of International Women's Day, which has been celebrated for over 100 years.

Today, on IMD, I learned that Professor Thomas Oaster, University of Missouri, was bullied and harassed by students and administrators when he tried to celebrate IMD in the early 1990's. His career was in ruin by the vicious attacks of the University community until he sued and won compensation for the wrongs he suffered.

International Men`s Day is a little known and largely ignored day, but it didn't escape the attention of Susie Boniface at "The Mirror", who decided to celebrate this day by writing a sarcastic, hate-filled article to ridicule men. A piece laced with self-aggrandization, and bitterness, belittling men and men's suffering at every opportunity.

In her orgy of self-pity she hints that all men are rapists with endearing statements that women could "throw ourselves behind a day that might prompt men into speaking out about rape, and perhaps taking a day off from it." Of course "women, we are above all that," she re-assures us, "we women will just get on with everything else." She then suggests to men "Don't hurry back."
I feel so appreciated now, don't you?

Mz. Boniface claims that Men dominate 364 days of the year. That`s puzzling to me. Why is it that every day I hear or read that "more needs to be done for women," that "Because I am a girl" is really important, and "Girls are the answer."

In fact, since I am self-employed I watch the CBC news during lunch, often at different times throughout the day. Most days I wonder if there are ANY males at all working for CBC. The daytime anchors are ALL female, the vast majority of the on-screen reporters are also female, including sports, business, weather personalities. More often than not, a CBC news segment amounts to a female anchor talking to a female reporter, who found a female interviewee to comment on a "big bad male" politician. Some weeks go by without seeing a single male news person on daytime CBC news. Here's the all-female daytime line up for "CBC News Now":

- 6 AM – 9 AM Heather Hiscox,
- 9 AM – 12 PM Suhana Meharchand,
- 12PM – 3 PM Carole MacNeil,
- 3 PM – 5 PM Reshmi Nair.

I guess it must be true, you just can't find a good man these days.

I remember in 1984 when the VP of Dow Chemical Research informed everyone that they would be preferentially hiring and promoting women as part of "affirmative action," otherwise known as "anything but a white man." This near-ban on hiring males continues to this day, and CBC seems to have taken it to extremes.

What happens on other "men's" days, let`s say, on Father's day?

The typical media article reads like an admonition of all men as deadbeats. Huffington Post, for example, ran an article titled "Fathers Who Abandon Their Kids." Apparently that wasn't enough for HuffPo so they ran another "Father's Day" article instructing men that they need to "Man Up," including a convenient petition to President Obama to get tougher on men. It's so nice to be appreciated on "Father's Day." Thank-you HuffPo!

Next up from Huffington Post: "Men should do the right thing and check themselves into prison," so that they can't commit a crime in the future … you can't be too careful!

And lest we forget, Remembrance Day is to remember the fallen soldiers who died so that we may enjoy freedom. This past Remembrance Day I learned about White Poppies, a movement started by the Cooperative Women's Guild, ostensibly to promote peace. However choosing November 11 was certainly a political move designed to detract from Remembrance Day.

Those White Poppies were made most popular by the Peace Pledge Union, who famously urged politicians to appease Hitler and argued that "Germany should be permitted to 'absorb' France, Poland, the Low Countries and the Balkans." Wow! Those are the people who want to muscle the Veterans out of Remembrance Day!

One day of remembrance is too much for HuffPo feminist-blogger Anne Theriault as well, so she felt compelled to declare that she wouldn't wear a red poppy. With all this love, surely men are overjoyed with their privileged place in society.

I also learned about the Silver Cross Mother, who represents all mothers who lose a child in war. The crowd at the Ottawa Remembrance Day ceremony was totally silent as high ranking soldiers and dignitaries arrived, but the silver cross mother was greeted with applause. Men die, women are praised. Oh, by the way, did her son have a father? If so, his loss was not acknowledged. Must be one of those "male privilege" things.

Another Remembrance Day story ran about a woman who wants the right to wear her dead husband's medals to the Ceremonies. In fact, she defiantly insisted that she was going to wear them no matter what, and no man in this country would dare stop her. But imagine the outrage if a man declared that he was going to wear military decorations that he did not earn! No matter the circumstance, that man would be universally reviled, and jailed… just another example of "male privilege."

You probably didn't notice that ignorant, small-minded article by Mz. Boniface because International Men's Day is just another day in which the media will lecture men on their inherent evil that requires constant restraint, and improvement under the good and moral guidance of feminists, most of whom see little or nothing of value in men, and often argue that men should be castrated or euthanized.

Mz. Boniface`s message is clear: International Men's Day should be all about women, much like Father`s Day, Remembrance Day, and Valentine`s Day. Otherwise men might get uppity and start to think they have the right to discuss their own issues in their own voices …. without feminist supervision! God forbid … errr … Goddess forbid!

On a positive note, I started my International Men`s Day at 6 AM on a really fun photo shoot of a varsity swim team. Athletes are awesome.

[image]

The Whine Club

Mike Buchanan · 21 November 2013 · Archived copy · Original

> I personally think we developed language because of our deep need to complain.
>
> – Lily Tomlin

This article is about some of the weapons shamelessly employed by women to control men – shaming tactics, whining, and sexist behaviour and comments.

Many women without mental health issues employ these weapons, but it's become increasingly obvious that a disproportionate number of women who use them suffer from one or more mental health issues– and most, if not all, are gender feminists. These mental health problems include personality disorders – most notably narcissistic personality disorder – borderline personality disorder, anger management issues, depression, anxiety disorders, and others.

Many gender feminists are driven by poor experiences of men, often an individual man, most usually a father (often absent from the family, whether through his choice or not) or a partner. Damaged women are drawn to feminism like moths to a flame, and are inevitably damaged further. They really need to get treatment for their mental health problems, but they find it easier to spend their lives collaborating with other damaged women in attacking men and boys.

Laura Bates is the creator of The Everyday Sexism Project. At our political party Justice for Men & Boys we always refer to it as The Everyday Whining Project. The following should give you a flavour of the tsunami of whiny submissions the site receives:

> The Royal Mint will be giving away silver pennies in blue and pink pouches to those with babies born on the same day as Kate and William's. Wonder who will get pink and who will get blue?

—

> Purchased a new Hoover at the weekend. Pleasant enough experience at Curry's, until I get to the tills. Male cashier asks if I need a hand getting it to the car, which I politely declined. He then advised me it was 'really quite heavy' (to which I quipped 'well it'll be me lugging it round the house') and insisted I let him know if I do 'decide I need a hand'. I appreciate it's good customer service to ask the first time, but would you persist like this if I were male? I wouldn't mind, but he looked weaker than I do, even with his penis.

—

So what was the hapless cashier to do? Presumably some customers – women in particular – initially decline the offer of help getting items to a car, but then change their minds when they realise how heavy or bulky an item is. If the man hadn't made the second offer, and the woman had changed her mind (a "woman's prerogative," of course) it would surely – given her line of reasoning – have been reasonable for him to refuse to help. In which case she would presumably have made a different complaint on Laura Bates's website.

The site's content is translated into 18 languages. Laura Bates is clearly a full-time whine collector. The amount of exposure she gets in the British mainstream media is beyond belief. By contrast our political party, Justice for men & boys has yet to have a single mention in a major newspaper or publication, although we've had some significant exposure on BBC radio.

I once had the grim experience of debating with Laura Bates on a popular BBC radio programme, The Jeremy Vine

Show. If you wish to get a sense of just how whiny she is, this should do the trick:

One of her many TV appearances, whining on International Women's Day:

I believe girls learn at a young age that whining gets them what they want, especially from over-indulgent parents who might later wonder why their daughters became Entitlement Princesses. Inevitably these girls continue whining into adolescence and adulthood because they continue to get what they want.

It's up to men to break the cycle, and I'll write an article about that subject one day. I make a few suggestions later in this article.

It's been speculated that whining and shaming tactics developed at an early stage in human evolution, so that men worked harder to provide for women and children than they might otherwise have been inclined. Natural selection would have favoured men who were more sensitive to shaming and whining, because when they worked harder, society would have benefited, more children would survive…

The hard-wired propensity of women to whine, and the hard-wired propensity of men to do whatever it takes to stop them whining, have become deeply dysfunctional in the modern world. Many women have insatiable appetites for more goods and services, special treatment, and attention, and their partners are doomed to failure in even attempting to satisfy those appetites. The state, too, is doomed to failure in seeking to satisfy them.

We're about to establish The Whine Club, a club exclusively for whiny women. Inspired by the Entitlement Princess of the Month award, we'll be asking for suggestions for Whiny Woman of the Month. So many obvious candidates to choose from. Laura Bates will, of course, be the inaugural member of The Whine Club. Members will only be permitted to leave the club if they give a written undertaking to stop whining.

There are, of course, numerous different varieties of whine, including:

- Vintage whines – women are paid less than men when doing the same work, all men are rapists…
- Classic whines – men objectify women, men discriminate against women in the workplace…
- Corked whine – the regrettably short period of silence which follows a man deftly popping a cork into the mouth of a whining woman. Champagne corks are particularly effective
- Red whine – one coming from a woman who's so cross, her face is red
- American whine – one coming from an American woman (likewise Italian whine, English whine…).

Then there's "whine drinking" or "whine tasting," terms used to describe the experiences of countless men who let women whine despite having alternative options e.g. walking away, or listening to their MP3 players with the volume cranked up to whatever level it takes to drown out the whining. Men living in houses with cellars can put a sign on the cellar door, "Whine Cellar," and politely direct whining women towards it. In houses without a cellar, the smallest room in the house – or possibly the garden shed – could be designated the "Whine Box."

Moving on from whining to sexism, we've just launched The Alternative Sexism Project and I cordially invite you to contribute your own stories.

We don't want the site to have the whiny tone of the Everyday Sexism Project, we're simply looking for comments from men (and women) about women (and men):

- shaming men and/or boys
- controlling men and/or boys
- disadvantaging men and/or boys
- advantaging women and/or girls

Obvious examples include the following, but there are countless others, both serious and low-level:

- Sexist narratives and statements in TV and radio programmes, in films, newspaper articles, websites and blogs…
- Sexist statements made by politicians, judges, civil servants…
- Lenient sentencing by the judicial system of women convicted of serious crimes e.g. making false rape accusations
- Denial of access to children following relationship breakdowns, judges' unwillingness to enforce contact orders
- Parental alienation of children
- Financial ruin as a consequence of divorce, even when the wife has contributed little or nothing to the couple's joint wealth
- Police not believing male victims of domestic violence, always taking the woman's word for what happened
- Economic disadvantaging e.g. on first dates, even in expensive restaurants, women will either not offer to pay a share of the cost, or will make a cursory effort to look willing to do so, e.g. reaching for the purse when the bill arrives. When the man says, 'Thanks, but I'll take care of it', no woman has ever been known to protest for long
- Lack of respect for men. On a crowded street even elderly men of a certain age are routinely expected to give way to women, including young women
- Women (and many men) preferencing women when recruiting and/or promoting staff
- Women being preferenced for social housing and social services
- When a woman has an unplanned pregnancy, she has the sole right to determine whether the foetus is aborted, the baby adopted, or the child raised at the man's expense. The man has no rights and whatever responsibilities she chooses to give him
- Programmes aimed at diagnosing female-specific cancers are far better funded than those for male-specific cancers
- Teachers (female and male) focusing more time and effort on female pupils than male pupils
- Male pupils treated more harshly than female pupils after committing the same misdemeanours
- If her car breaks down, or a tyre is punctured, a woman can expect a man to stop and help her. Women never stop to help a man in the same situation
- Women shamelessly barging in front of men in queues, expecting service in bars when they've only just arrived, and you've been waiting five minutes
- Women-only gym and swimming sessions
- In Labour and Lib Dem constituencies, women-only prospective parliamentary candidate shortlists

Thank you for your support.

Editor's note: feature image by Davef3138

Barret Weber is anti-Semitic

Eric Duckman · 21 November 2013 · Archived copy · Original

…because I say so. That should be all the proof anyone needs! No need to provide evidence, or do any research.

Men's Rights Edmonton responds to this piece of slanderous clap-trap:

https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=SyDu9lQARNM

Concerned citizens may want to email the following administrators and faculty regarding Barret Weber's and Dr. Cristina Stasia's lack of intellectual rigor:

Red Deer College sociology department:

https://rdc.ab.ca/programs/academic-departments/university-studies/bachelor-arts/ba-sociology/faculty/faculty

U of A President Indira Samarasekera

uofapres@ualberta.ca

Faculty, staff and graduate student directory, U of A:

https://sociology.sitecore.ualberta.ca/FacultyStaffandGraduateStudent.aspx

Misandry in Latvia

OzzieMatt · 21 November 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Recently I was trying to find information about cultures where women outnumber men and how men are treated in those cultures and I stumbled across this article.

Latvian man shortage leaves women lost for love

http://www.bbc.co.uk/news/world-europe-11493157

The 2010 article by BBC Reporter in Latvia, Damien McGuiness, cites familiar statistics in the West that Latvian men die younger than Latvian women and are less educated.

But what sparked my attention was that in 2010, Latvia had the highest disparity of life expectancy between the sexes in the EU and that there are 8% more women than men.

It is no surprise in an age where misandry is acceptable public policy and discourse, that the article focuses on how this disparity affects women and throws in some man-bashing for good measure.

The article introduces Dania, one of these poor Latvian women who can't find love.

Apparently Dania had recently been working at a film festival where 98% of her colleagues were women.

As Dania says: "There's nothing wrong with that" – the fact there are virtually no men in her workplace – "but just for the good balance you would want to have some more men to flirt or chat with. It's just more interesting." Then she laughs, apparently.

So having someone for girls to flirt with is more important than equal opportunities or social justice for Latvian men?

The article then introduces sociologist and lecturer, Baiba Bela, who says there are 50 per cent more women at university than men.

But rather than say anything about how unfair it is that men are greatly under-represented at university, Ms Bela points out how hard it is for the Latvian women to find men with equal education.

So it seems snagging a husband of the same educational background is more important than equality of opportunity for Latvian men.

Does gender equality only apply to women?

The article then says that by the time women want to settle down, there is an imbalance in the genders where men are dying younger and four times more likely to commit suicide.

Again, the focus is on poor Latvian women being unable to snag a husband.

Ms Bela then lists what she believes are some of the reasons for the imbalance:

"Car driving, alcoholism and accidents in the workplace are mainly riskier for men than for women."

I wonder how many deaths from car driving and alcoholism are incorrectly categorized suicides.

Our intrepid BBC reporter, Damien McGuinness, then claims one of the main reasons for Latvian men dying so young and killing themselves is the apparently still prevalent "Macho Culture." This sounds an awful lot like victim-blaming.

The writer then quotes Latvian psychoanalyst, Ansis Stabingis, who treats men for depression and suicidal tendencies.

Mr Stabingis cites the economic crisis of 20 years ago as predominantly affecting men and claims that women have generally proven more resilient than men in coping.

I can't help but wonder if women are more likely to get help and men know this. I also wonder what services are available for men.

It strikes me that the whole article is from a woman's point of view, or more particularly, a Feminist viewpoint since the writer is apparently male.

This is not balanced news reporting and once you get towards the end of the article, you can see where the real problem lies.

It is at this point the writer introduces Dace Ruksane: sex columnist, author, and editor-in-chief of one of the country's most successful women's magazines, Lilit.

Ms Ruksane says:

"The smartest girls are alone. The really beautiful girls are alone – if they are smart."

"They want to find partners who are equal to them. But a man, having all this choice, doesn't need to be very perfect."

"He just sits in front of the TV and knows he can get a woman. And if she doesn't suit him, he will get another."

"Smart women simply don't want to have such men as their partners."

This is what the women of Latvia are being told by the editor-in-chief of Latvia's most successful women's magazine.

In summary, women snagging a husband of equal educational and economic background is of greater importance compared to the problem of men dying 11 years younger, being outnumbered 4 to 1 at university and being 80 per cent of deaths by suicide.

And apparently it is mostly men's own fault because they have a bad attitude and don't ask for help.

This is misandry.

Is rape different?

Diana Davison · 22 November 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Freedom of speech seems to be a broadly misunderstood concept.

When you believe in freedom of speech and fight to protect it you are not just defending yourself, you are fighting for the right of other people to say things you don't agree with. A person who supports censorship can not claim to support freedom of speech.

Freedom of speech is one of the human rights granted to citizens in progressive countries. We consider it important. As such, it was shocking to see feminists@law rallying a protest to the London School of Economics (LSE) Department of Law's recent debate called "Is Rape Different?" It should concern academia that feminist lawyers don't support free speech. They seem to hold myths about freedom.

The October 30th, 2013 debate was led by Helen Reece, based on an article she wrote concerning deeply flawed rape myth studies and other feminist rhetoric which currently informs the law. LSE's event description explains the subject thus:

> Rape is a heinous crime, and many people believe the conduct and outcome of rape cases insufficiently reflect this heinousness. As a result, rape complainants are treated differently; distinct rules of evidence have been developed; and measures to tackle rape myths are in place. But is all this helpful? Rape is a serious crime but is it a special crime, demanding special treatment? Do our rule of law and fairness pay a price? In this first debate in LSE Department of Law's 'Debating Law' series, LSE academic Helen Reece leads a debate on whether or not rape is in this sense special.

The speakers who questioned rape as a special sort of crime were Helen Reece, reader of Law at LSE, and Barbara Hewson, barrister in Hardwicke Chambers. In favour of rape as a uniquely vile crime were Jennifer Temkin, professor at City Law School, and Nazir Afzal, chief crown prosecutor for CPS North West.

You'll notice that both sides of the debate had two equally qualified representatives.

The protest now taking place is quite clear in the reason for complaint: people are talking about Reece and Hewson and no one is talking about Temkin and Afzal. The short story — the feminists feel they lost the debate. We all know what happens when a feminist feels bad: The world must stop and do something to fix it.

Specifically, on November 14th, feminists@law declared

> We deplore LSE Law's decision to give a platform to Reece and Hewson's dangerous and unsupported views and its failure to engage responsibly with the public on such an important and sensitive issue as rape.

They mulled over all the possible courses of action to compensate for the fact that "their views received significantly less media attention" and came up with a solution.

> With such a wide audience, we believe there is an onus on the LSE Law Department to ensure that the ideas that are being disseminated do not feed dangerous stereotypes about women being responsible for the sexual violence perpetuated against them.
> We invite readers to add their names in support of this statement, using the 'Add Comment' function below.

Normally, when a university lecture or event is protested it is a singular speaker who the protesters claim are disseminating "hate speech". This was not a lecture, it was a debate in which four competing points of view were given equal time. Even Jay-Z seems to understand free speech better than feminist lawyers. "We change people through conversation, not through censorship."

It's a sad state of affairs when a rapper would make a better lawyer than a feminist trained in law.

One of the criticisms leveled against LSE by Sarah Keenan and Yvette Russell on criticallegalthinking.com is that LSE defended the debate. It was Barbara Hewson's presentation that got the most media coverage and LSE failed to apologize for inviting her.

"The @LSELaw account responded defensively to criticism of its decision to host Hewson insisting that she was only one of four panellists and that her views were balanced by the opposing arguments of Temkin and Afzal, and urging critics and the wider public to download the podcast, watch the video and 'make up your own mind'"

The other complaint was that LSE highly publicized the debate and intentionally chose a controversial subject to get a bigger response from the public. It seems like, for once, feminists were hoping nobody would listen to them. We must put these complaints in context. The feminist point of view was equally given a chance to convince the public that rape is different from other crimes. If they'd used this opportunity better or gotten a better result they would not be, right now, complaining about the publicity.

After creating a twitstorm about the debate the feminists also criticized LSE for using twitter.

I can't think of a single speaker who agrees to a debate and hopes nobody listens to it or hears about it later. If anything, this farcical reaction is a great chance to learn about which people we don't want to hire when organizing events.

The emphatic rejection of any discussion about rape and rape laws that feminists cling to is based on the premise that women need to know that they will be believed when they report a rape. In Hewson's spiked-online.com reply she takes the time to remind these lawyers about how the law works.

> This [victimization] ideology dominates official thinking about rape and sexual abuse to a point where the police actively solicit allegations with the promise, 'You will be believed'. This militates against the idea that allegations need to be investigated.

Luke Gittos, Law Editor, followed up on Spiked with an article on November 20th entitled "We must be free to question rape laws".

> The discussion around issues related to rape is now so rife with intellectual bigotry and dishonesty that it is hard to know where to begin dissecting it. It is no underestimation to say that a portion of those contributing to this debate are engaged in a wilful distortion of the truth and a cowardly drive to close down any challenge to their false consensus.

This wilful distortion of the truth is one of the issues to which Helen Reece is attempting to bring attention. The rape myth surveys that she de-constructed in her initial article were all peer reviewed. That such shoddy academic work can not only pass peer review but become incorporated into decisions about legal reform is reason for alarm. The need for freedom of speech in academia is best proven by the existence of unsupported feminist rhetoric as the accepted worldview.

> Academic studies require peer review and RMA surveys have not been properly scrutinized because the manipulated results adhere to popular myths about rape myths. If we are to let these studies influence the legal system, as they demand we do, Helen presents important concerns to be addressed about the research being submitted as fact.

While Jennifer Temkin despaired in the LSE debate that "it beggars belief" we are discussing whether or not rape is different, what's really astounding is that we are stuck explaining the importance of free speech to a bunch of lawyers. These outraged feminists are highly educated in the very topic at hand and they just don't seem interested in either truth or justice.

Is rape different? Watch the debate.

The limited horizon of “Game”

Jalon Cain (aka Aaron Sleazy) · 22 November 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Let me highlight what I consider to be the prime reason for the myopia of the entire PUA scene. It can be summarized as one word: pussy.

The image people in the game community like to portray is that they are all pussy-slayers of the highest caliber. They revere their “gurus”, even though many of them have little to no experience with women. Some are even less experienced than many of the feeble men they count as their followers. There have been spectacular revelations, such as that one of the most “famous” gurus has only dated two women in his entire life. That guy is 40 or 50, so time couldn’t have been the issue. Then there was some other PUA who was somewhat in the media spotlight some years ago — he has only had sex with a grand total of one woman before styling himself to be a pickup guru.

This scene is incredibly fucked up. Basically, you get all those men who, for whatever reason, couldn’t even get laid in a brothel. At the same time, many of them hold the absurd belief that if they only got laid, or if they only had a girlfriend, then their life would be complete. Instead of misery, everything would be unicorns and rainbows. They sure have been drinking the Hollywood kool-aid. But is pussy really the answer, or the potential beginning of much bigger problems? If anything, there seems to be hardly any awareness of all the serious potential problems that stem from getting involved with women, and I’m not just thinking of STDs.

Let’s talk about some of those issues.

First, there are guys out there who advocate hitting on basically any woman. They say it’s no problem if she’s drunk because she’s only drinking to have some “plausible deniability” for her behavior, should she go home with some dude. Well, there is some truth to that. However, her being drunk will put you in a very unfortunate situation should she remember the next day that she actually does have a boyfriend. A false rape accusation is the easy way out for her, and there are countless stories to be found online of guys who ended up in this exact same situation.

Too bad for Mister PUA, though. He listened to the call of his cock instead of the call of reason. You could be forgiven for thinking that PUAs would rather deal with a false rape accusation than not getting laid at all. Sure, you could say that the risk is comparatively small, and this may be true, but why would you enter a deal where you could only get a modest gain, when there is also the risk of an unlimited downside?

Then, there is this trend that people write about how they “game their wife,” so that she has sex with them. Here’s a big question for that kind of “gamer”: How did you end marrying a woman who doesn’t want to have sex with you? Marriage is a legal minefield, so I hope that all the PUAs who “quit the game,” after they ran into some single mom who realized that she had found a meal ticket, did their homework — instead of thinking that by “gaming their wife” they’ll keep her on her toes? If you think that the downside of getting involved with a drunk girl was bad, then you’ll surely agree that this is nothing compared to the situation of guys who marry women despite countless red flags. How does “game” help you with that? Oh, I forgot, you just game your wife and everything will be fine and dandy.

The standard explanation when things didn’t work out, no matter whether the PUA was hitting on a chick in a bar but got turned down, or just received his divorce papers in the mail, is rather peculiar. The reason is always that there was a problem with his “game.” What about acknowledging that many women behave in a highly erratic manner, which means that you’ll put yourself at risk, and as a consequence you shouldn’t even think of bothering with her? Regarding the sky-high divorce rate of our times, you’d have to be pretty naive to think that there are no women out there who primarily have an economic motive when getting involved with you. But don’t worry, bro, maybe you can “game” the judge, too, and get out of supporting your ex-wife for decades.

The legal system is stacked against men, and I applaud any guy who chooses to go his own way, considering the many obstacles society has put up. Some say that having kids is the greatest joy in life. Sadly, the legal system is set up in a way that it’s almost impossible for the mother not to get custody. She could be a drug abuser, and have a criminal record, and still the assumption would be that it's better for the kid to stay with the mother–no matter how the law is written, this is still how most judges think and they accept almost any excuse to make it so. If she then denies visitation rights to the father, in most cases she won't even get a slap on the wrist.

On the other hand, should the father not pay, or be unfortunate that he can't pay as much as the court determined he has to pay, based on some pie-in-the-sky calculation of his "imputed income," he can end up in prison. How would "game" help you with that, bro? To me it seems that if you can't get laid, instead of picking a girl from a questionable background, you're infinitely better off going your own way. And even if you have women chasing after you, it's a good idea to generally be apprehensive about getting involved with one.

When I was a boy, I asked a friend of my father why he didn't have a wife. He then looked at me, nodded, and described his decision not to marry with the following allegory:

"Imagine you can chose between two bridges. One of the bridges looks very stable, but some say it's lonely to walk on it. But there is another bridge, and everybody tells you to go that way. It's supposed to lead to a much happier place. Yet, when you ask them about their happiness, they have a hard time showing any proof. All you seem to hear is that they argue in the distance, when they think they are out of earshot. You then walk up to that bridge, and look down into the valley. Then you notice that there are countless dead bodies scattered between the rocks. Some of those men slipped, but most were pushed to their death by the person they were traveling with, and thought they could trust. Some guy sits down next to you and says, '50 % of the men who attempt to cross that bridge don't make it. They lose everything.'"

Then he looked at me and asked, "Now tell me, why do you think I didn't want to take a wife?"

I think there is a big difference between mature men who chose a certain course of action, while being fully aware of the risks, and guys who rush headlong into misfortune. I've seen guys getting wrecked in a divorce. I know guys who have to support their ex-wives because she's too lazy to get a job. Or too busy fucking some new guy. I also know of guys who barely see their children, because their mother doesn't allow it.

Oh, and I certainly know of many women any guy would have to be utterly insane to get involved with for anything more than a one-night stand, if that. Not many of those women seemed to have a problem finding some sucker, though.

But does "game" address any of this? Legal issues, and also the problem of wide-ranging personal consequences if you get involved with the wrong kind of woman aren't even on the radar for the vast majority of people in the PUA community. They hardly look past the next pussy they hope to pound. However, the more you explore the contemporary legal situation, the more your should realize that getting involved with women is maybe not worth it, considering all the risks. Do your homework, man! The PUAs chant "pussy, pussy, pussy!" and ignore all the issues you might run into if you follow their call all too eagerly. How "alpha" is it to pay alimony for 20 years?

You could even easily end up paying for a kid that isn't yours. Paternity fraud is common, but for the legal system it's apparently a non-issue. The way "progressive" governments in many countries deal with it is to ban genetic testing, meaning that you'll end up in jail if you dare to have your kids DNA tested. Or, in some places, it won't matter if you have the DNA test, if you were married when she gave birth, that's it, you're legally the father. They don't care whether the kid you're paying for is actually yours.

Women can claim they got raped or beaten, divorce you on a whim, take your kids, and enslave you to a lifetime of alimony and support payments. This is true in countless places.

No, not all women are out to harm you. Most women aren't that evil. But there are enough toxic women out there that you should be very careful about whom you intend to get involved with. Frankly, I don't think that pussy is really worth that price. It's better to not pursue a woman you've got a bad feeling about — or where the pole with the red flag hits you right in the face — than to fall over yourself trying to get laid. This is what I assume mature men do. However, "gamers" belong to a different breed. Like insects swarming around a Venus flytrap, they wonder, “Geez, how bad could this be?”.

Judge orders Crown Attorney pay cost to Maximus Ferox

AVfM Video Source · 22 November 2013 · Archived copy · Original

A man representing himself in a Canadian court gets a judge to agree that prosecutors harassed him and forced them to pay his costs.

You can subscribe to Attila Vinczer here.

An Arizona YWCA uses its "Social Justice" roots to focus on boys and men

Suzanne Venker · 23 November 2013 · Archived copy · Original

The Young Women's Christian Association (YWCA) of Tuscon, Arizona in the United States says it's time to talk about boys. Ya think?

"The unique, and often overlooked, plight of today's boys and young men will be the subject of an interactive workshop Saturday at the YWCA of Tucson," writes Patricia Machelor at Arizona Daily Star. "A changing social landscape coupled with absentee fathers and a lack of male role models are among the topics to be discussed at "Raising Healthy Sons," which is for parents, teachers and anybody who cares about young people, said Kelly Fryer, executive director of the YWCA Tucson."

Sounds promising, yes? Not so fast. First, note this is a YWCA, not a YMCA. So what's the difference, you might wonder? I know I have wondered, since all YMCAs and YWCAs have come to be known as "the Y." According to a statement from the YWCA, here's the difference:

"Since its inception, the YWCA core focus is the empowerment of women and girls…While its origins are in the Christian tradition, the organization is open to individuals of all backgrounds, and offers programs and services that include men and boys. YWCA was the first women's organization in the U.S. It has been part of and survived every wave of the women's rights movement from the late 19th century until today.

Unlike the YWCA, the YMCA's core focus is on youth development, health and fitness, and social responsibility. YMCA is not as strongly connected to the civil rights and women's issues as the YWCA."

In other words, the YWCA doesn't just provide health and fitness for girls—it seeks female justice. But the YMCA only provides health and fitness for boys because, naturally, boys don't need justice.

So now the YWCA has changed their minds and decided to focus on boys. And here's an example of the type of speaker they'll have at their seminar:

"A lot of people are calling this time a crisis for boys and young men," said speaker Tim Wernette, who works for the University of Arizona's Southwest Institute for Research on Women. "The old messages for boys to be tough and aggressive are really counterproductive for the changes going on in our society."

Wernette has been doing so-called "gender-equity education" for nearly 30 years at middle schools and high schools statewide by "helping teens recognize gender-role stereotyping and by encouraging nontraditional careers and interests for both genders." Today's marriages often include two working partners, he said, and boys need to be prepared to co-parent and help with household tasks.

The takeaway: This YWCA seminar isn't interested in raising healthy sons. It's interested in raising feminist sons who are browbeaten into ideological submission.

Editor's note: this is a slightly-edited version of a piece that appeared first on WomenForMen.org, an organization of women such as Suzanne Venker, Helen Smith, and Christina Hoff-Sommers to advocate unapologetically for men and boys as they are rather than as ideological feminists would wish them to be. –DE

David Cameron's betrayal of fathers and their children.

Robert Whiston · 23 November 2013 · Archived copy · Original

In 2012 the British government announced plans to introduce "shared parenting" and everyone thought, "Wow, what a breakthrough after all these years of lobbying!" Father's Rights advocates and advocates for children had worked hard for years to get promises to help fathers from David Cameron's party to help do more to make sure fathers were allowed to be a part of their children's lives. When Cameron became Prime Minister, for the first time in 30 years it looked as if fathers would be able to have their children stay with them for several days at a time, i.e. "sleepovers," and not just snatch a few hours with them during the day.

But then along came two torpedoes.

The first torpedo was that the promised "shared parenting" legislation turned out to be nothing more than the inadequate wording of the toothless 1989 legislation which in the end did nothing to improve fathers' access to their children.

The second torpedo was the introduction, in these austere times, of "a bedroom tax" intended to lighten the burden on the taxpayer.

The "bedroom tax," which will almost certainly become law this year, is not really a tax on all bedrooms – just as in the same way the Window Tax in the 18th century was not a tax on all windows. But reading British newspapers this is the impression given of the government's new policy announcement.

The background to this class issue is very stark and it hinges on reducing the cost of the welfare state. Whereas the Window Tax was paid mainly by the rich, the Bedroom Tax will be paid only by the poor or those on low incomes.

The Bedroom Tax will affect the young and old; male and female, but it is especially pernicious for divorced fathers. Their hope of seeing their children during sleepovers, at school holidays, or at weekends will, in many cases, be dashed. Generally speaking it will not affect those in well-paid jobs or those living in their own freehold property.

In Britain, as in much of Western Europe, a "welfare state" has long been established – picking up on the relief and help for the poorer in society since 1945, at a point where FDR's policies in the US were left to wither. Philosophically, one can argue that a welfare state gives "tax breaks" to the poor in much the same way as the rich always seem to get tax breaks.

The downside is that, like "Topsy," some welfare benefits have just "growed and growed" out of all proportion – and one of them is Housing Benefit. This has significantly increased in recent decades. In 2001 the annual Housing Benefit cost was £11,688 million and by 2010 it had doubled again to £22 million [Ref. http://www.statistics.gov.uk/STATBASE/ssdataset.asp?vlnk=4007 and http://fullfact.org/blog/housing_benefit_abuse_cost_taxpayers-3224. In an effort to stem the tide Cameron Government has announced a cap, i.e. it will not pay over a set level for rents.

Housing Benefit is paid only to people who live in rented accommodation and who are either unemployed or on a low income. Housing Benefit is intended to pay for all or part of the rent charged. How much is paid depends on your income and circumstances.

Play your cards right and you can, as a single person, have the rent of a three bedroom residence financed by the Government or, more accurately, the taxpayer. So it might be that a divorced mother with two children gets more than a single person (a father), and so can afford to stay in 2 or 3 bedroom accommodation. Whereas, a single father with children who technically only 'visit' will have to make do with a single bedroom level of subsidy. That immediately puts "sleepovers"and shared parenting on a collision course with the bedroom tax.

Laudably, the Cameron Government wants to realign housing resources with housing need, but sadly, in the process some eggs will get broken, and many children who need their fathers in their lives (and who needs fathers more than children in low-income areas?) will be those eggs.

Trolling Academia

AVfM Video Source · 23 November 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Diana Davison's Feminism LOL video series continues, this time discussing academic fraud and feminism.

https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=tDDsesJgVdM

Subscribe to Feminism LOL here.

Are you now or have you ever been a member of the Men's Human Rights Movement?

Sam Allouba · 24 November 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Author's note: I have recently submitted this essay to one of Canada's national newspapers, The Globe and Mail as they are looking for what are called Facts and Arguments Essays. I wrote this after reading the I mourn the passing of my dear friend Feminism. I hope it is published, but in the meantime, you can read it here and at Men's Human Rights Ontario once it goes live. I'd like to thank Dannyboy for choosing to run it as well as Dean Esmay for allowing me to present it on* A Voice for Men.

Editor's Note: After the publication of this article on Men's Human Rights Ontario's site, two different emails were sent to Sammy and also to the theater troupe he works for:*

> From: [redacted]
> Sent: Sunday, November 17, 2013 7:21 AM
> To: Sammy
> Subject: Fwd: Sammy Allouba
>
> Sammy, you need to be more careful.
>
> [redacted]

—

> From: Concerned Citizen [email redacted]
> Date: Sat, Nov 16, 2013 at 8:33 PM
> Subject: Sammy Allouba
> To: [email redacted]
>
> It's quite distrurbing that one of your cast members is posting pro-rape and anti-female articles all over his public networks.
>
> His YouTube rants about the "Male Rights Movement" including him discussing posting victim-blaming pro-rape articles:
>
> http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=Os4dgq2cFKA
>
> Retweeting offensive articles such as this on Twitter: https://twitter.com/sam4reel
> When my rights are raped for the sake of rapes that never happened I #blamefeminism and liars
> Retweeted by Sammy Allouba
>
> And sharing pro-rape articles on Facebook:
> [links to supposedly pro-rape articles on A Voice for Men]
>
> It's truly disgusting and I hope you'll not let an individual like this be a part of your community.

What follows is the article that caused the veiled threats and attempts at intimidation by opponents of human rights. As a response, Sammy has chosen to just get more visible in the Men's Human Rights Community. We commend his courage. The more of us who take a public stance, the stronger we all become. Welcome to the civil rights movement of the 21st Century, Sammy. As always is the case, the establishment and all right-thinking decent people oppose us. After all, we threaten the status quo and the powers that be.

By the way, any readers here may also want to subscribe to Sammy's YouTube channel.

Anyway, as of this writing, it does not appear that the Globe & Mail has published the shocking letter below.–DE

—

Imagine for a moment you have an idea, an opinion. So you then decide to explore that idea a bit further and discover that you're not alone in that there are others who not only share it, but provide some insight into other related issues. These ideas are backed up by well-researched, well-thought out papers and studies, some of which are governmental in origin.

Once you feel you have a concrete base on which to back up your idea, you present it to other people who may not have heard it before. Instead of rational responses, however, you are met with hostility, anger, resentment, personal attacks, and shaming. You are told that you are hateful, have personal issues, that you need help, and that you need to stop saying what you're saying because the people you're speaking to feel offended and hurt by something that is challenging the way they're used to seeing things.

In my brief experience as an MRA, that's exactly what it's felt like.

MRA stands for men's rights activist as someone who follows the MRM or men's rights movement. It is a movement that has been around since the 1970s and only wishes to provide a voice for men who do not have a voice with which to speak out. I have enjoyed my time so far with the movement because I do believe in the issues it is combating such as biased family courts, larger percentage of homeless victims being male, false allegations of sexual assault that ruin the lives of young men, and the general bias in popular culture which portrays fathers as neglectful monsters, and portrays men and boys in general as violent, stupid, or sexually-driven monsters.

As I matured through high school, I noticed moments in which boys had to deal with questionable double standards. The most common example of this would be that a man never hits a woman, but she is free to abuse him as much as she sees fit. It became worse when I went to university. I went to Ryerson from 2005 to 2009 studying criminal justice. As I progressed through my academic career, I was searching for identity. I eventually discovered the White Ribbon Campaign and because I have a female cousin who is a three-time victim of domestic abuse, I saw merit in signing up.

I took part in the Walk a Mile in Her Shoes event and subscribed to the idea that violence against women in particular was a serious issue that wasn't receiving the attention it needed. However, I never called myself a feminist. I rejected the label because for whatever reason, it just didn't sit well with me. I wanted to be known simply as "a guy who believes in women's rights" but that didn't agree with some folks. Eventually I stopped my volunteer work with the Campaign only because I was fast approaching my graduation and wanted to focus on my studies.

One thing though that I could never really shrug off was what I perceived to be a heavy anti-male bias at the university. For example, in any sociology class I took, the consensus was always that white men are the one and only reason why society has problems, women are always oppressed, victims to the grand design of patriarchy, and must be placed on a pedestal if they are to move ahead in life. Other events included the popular Take Back the Night event, designed to help women who feel in danger at night, a crusade against the infamous rape culture feminists talk about in their discourse. I was never comfortable with such events because I saw them as ways of making men out to be natural-born criminals. They unfairly targeted men as if they are the only ones capable of sexual assault – which, as anyone who has seen government statistics on sexual assault can attest to, isn't true.

There were also smaller cases like a first year criminological theories professor I had who cracked a joke when she was having issues getting a microphone to work before the start of a lecture. She proudly exclaimed, "I'll bet a guy designed this!" to which she received a loud, approving laugh from the class. But that made me wonder. Had that been a male professor making the same claim but replaced "guy" with "gal" or some other female pronoun, would he have been met with the same response? I highly doubt it.

The hostility and anger that I have been met with as an MRA has only given me further reason to continue to speak up for marginalized men in society. This is also in addition to being the son of a father who has been homeless for the past year and for now, I am in a position where isn't much I can do to help him for a number of reasons. When I eventually found out what his situation was last summer when I saw him for the first time in over two years, I realized how little support men receive from society, especially in the form of government support and funding for men's services. It breaks my heart knowing that he can't get the help he needs. Men's rights are human rights and they deserve help and support just as much as anyone else.

The myth of patriarchal oppression in Iran

Ali Mehraspand · 24 November 2013 · Archived copy · Original

From the second feminists started spawning their “patriarchy” baby, women’s issues in less-developed countries such as middle-eastern ones were presented as proof of “oppression of women as long as human beings have lived.” Western media and feminists in particular look at a society in a difficult condition and do not see people suffering; they see women suffering.

Western media and in fact eastern media’s handling of the state of affairs is one of adamantly illustrating women as slaves and cunningly displaying men as cruel slave owners. This of course has been only responded to, so far, by some people in these cultures who, in an effort to defend those cultures, usually come up with religious statements explaining the rights of women in Islam and Islamic philosophy, which causes some confusing problems. Among the more evident of the problems lies the question: What if somebody is not religious and does not choose to live with codes of Islamic philosophy?

Iran, for instance, seems to have the least religious people among middle-eastern countries. Rejection of long-ingrained religious doctrines invariably leads to less and less obligation. And for the many who dump religious doctrines, it seems like most are keen to consent to any criticism of the culture – even an unfair one. That is why, for many, the ridding of old cultural norms comes as a package deal with feminism. This is the perfect time for feminism to ride on a mind, repelled of the old restrictions.

However something is amiss here. Are those restrictions all on women? It is fascinating how from a nonreligious viewpoint, the western eyes have only been catching glimpses of some woman in misery while being completely indifferent to the large and ubiquitous pain of men. Feminists are quick to shout “patriarchy!” and others are quick to find faith in it and judge.

Today we pay a little visit to Iran, in hope of finding patriarchy in a highly misandric, feminist-infested culture. This view of Iranian women as oppressed by men, which has been the bread and butter of Western media and feminists, has been served to the public as a patriarchal feast.

Over the past few decades, eyes and ears were bombarded by the media about Iran’s patriarchy and the slavery of women. Unfortunately, that is a joke nobody is laughing at. Each feminist movie was rewarded by Western festivals and film awards up to a level where feminism is now an element of film-making for every director who is desperate for Western attention. Iranians were told billions of times about women’s issues, usually in a lying propagandist manner, and were fed the lies enough times that they actually started believing in them.

So, for any blue-pill readers out there, before your reflexive defensive outburst impairs your judgment and reduces you to a shrill screaming feminist or white knight, crying “women’s issues in Iran!”: let me clarify that I am the last person to discard some issues faced by some women in Iran. I do think some of those issues are legitimate causes about which something must be done. In fact, I wouldn’t discard the notion that any class of people might have some issues.

Having said that, if you bear several paragraphs and put aside the beliefs hammered into your head, you will see how the supposed “Patriarchy” has increased the Quality of Life of women much higher relative to that of most men. In fact, in this part of the world, infantilizing and spoiling women is done to a level possibly unmatched anywhere else. Bear in mind the fact that all the local media, operating under the guidance of their Western counterparts, along with Iranian feminism, are injecting a significant dose of misandry into this society.

We start by examining the basic rights of men and women in Iran, point out some forms of discrimination against both sexes–and then blow your mind about how the media is misrepresenting this whole matter. Although misandry can be easily spotted under the law, it can in no way express cultural norms and expectations of the gender roles which shoot this country right among the top misandric ones.

Keeping in mind that when moving one step away from the law and into the culture, misandry gets much more evident; this article only gives a fair examination of the laws and leaves the cultural misandry for other writings.

Some forms of discrimination against your average woman in Iran include the following.

- In case there is no will documented by a deceased person and no agreement on the part of the deceased's family members, the sons will receive twice as much inheritance as daughters.
- Married women need their husband's signature to get a passport.
- Women must wear rousari (veil) when appearing in public and no, it is nothing like what they showed you on TV (if this is what you saw):

This is what they actually look like when you walk the streets:

Here are some forms of discrimination against men:

- Conscription. All males are mandated to do at least two years of service in the military or armed forces. The conscription is not a draft that one may not attend in case there are enough volunteers. The time to join the forces is as soon as males come of age (18 years old) and is allowed to be postponed to after graduation, if they manage to get accepted in Iran's university entrance exam system within a 1 year period. Unless their full time in the military is served, no adult male is allowed to leave the country, buy or sell anything in their names, get a license to work, use their university degree, etc. The punishment for not enrolling on time, aside from being reduced to a person with no rights, is that the person is to be taken into the military by force wherever he is spotted, with added service time. The mandate of the service is lifted in case a boy is confirmed to have severe disabilities or he is an only son in a fatherless household where he claims to be the provider.The law forbids women from the service, which is a bit different from what it sounds because it is not necessarily about military training per se. Many of the very important, highly dangerous jobs are done by soldiers. Doing extreme specialized and physical work in 120 Fahrenheit degrees in islands with no supply of fresh water (and void of any women), or in -22 Fahrenheit degrees, is a part of service. This especially poses a big problem on athletes. They have to shun their athletic careers for two years at the peak of fitness in their early twenties. Omid Noruzi for instance, the gold medal winner of the 2012 Olympics, was forced to leave his career and not compete in the 2008 Olympics, despite being qualified as he was the world champion in 2007, in order to join the military – which made him suicidal.

- "Free" (paid by men) health insurance for women only. Should a single woman choose not to work, she will be covered under her parent's medical insurance for life even after the death of her parents. Males are covered only up to the age of 21. Married women are automatically covered under their husband's medical insurance plan (even after the death of the husband). Husbands, on the other hand, are not covered under the wife's insurance plan if they find themselves out of job. This of course is in a country where medical costs are so unbelievably high that the government subsidizes insurance for medical care. Should an employed woman with her own insurance get fired or choose to leave her job; she will be covered automatically again under her live/deceased father/husband.

- Pensions for women. Should a husband die, his occupational insurance (his highest salary per day multiplied by the years he worked) will be monthly paid to his wife as a salary for life, regardless of her being employed or not. No such law for men. Just FYI: occupational insurance is mandatory for all jobs.

- Support for divorced women. Should a woman get divorced, in addition to what she gets out of her husband (called Mehrieh – this will be discussed in more detail in another article), her provider is considered to be her father and in case her father is dead, she will get from the government an equal share of her father's occupational insurance as her salary for as long as she lives. This way, most divorced women do not have to work.

- No compensation for surviving husbands. There is insurance for housewives who choose not to work so that after a certain age they will be paid a salary. The husband who pays for the insurance is not compensated in case of the woman's death, but the woman's siblings and parents will receive the lion's share of the money the husband paid for.

- Welfare for women. When it comes to the poor sectors of the society, any woman who claims not to have a providing father and husband and a state-paying job receives monthly paid wages from an association called Kommiteye Imdad that, aside from women of any age, only registers men who in addition to not having any sort of income are severely disabled or are aged.

- Inheritance after divorce. If a woman divorces an ill husband who dies as a result of that illness within a year from the date of the divorce, his ex-wife still inherits as if they were never divorced.

Iran's other marriage and divorce laws, as well as misandry in education, are left for future articles.

Saddening is the fact that nobody even thinks about these issues – to which must be added some other conditions:

- There are currently 1.7 million children laboring (ages 5 to 15), 92% of whom are boys.

- 95% of children living in the streets are boys.[1] (Curiously enough this statistic was very hard to find because almost none of the sources concerning child labor mentioned the disparity between the sexes.)

- Males make 85% of the homeless.[2] (Interestingly enough you will find that newspaper titles are: 15% of the homeless are women and address concerns regarding that, implying that the goal should be that 100% of the homeless are male. Also, numerous articles, investigations and organizations exist in regards to homeless women.)
- 100% of battlefield deaths have been and will be men.
- 100% of battlefield injuries are men.
- 98.5% of workplace injuries in 2005 were men[3]. (In 2004, 2003 and 2002 respectively 98.5%, 98.7% and 98.7%)
- 60% of rape victims are male[4] (excluding prison rapes).
- Males also make up 81.7% of suicides.[5] (Interestingly, it is a piece of cake to find many media outlets openly lying that women have higher rates of suicide.)

This might give you a general idea for starters as to the state of affairs in Iran. But these so far only deal with discrimination under the law and not cultural standards to which men and women are held. The same cultural inclinations that create a society wherein 67% of university students are female, but most will not have jobs. This is not because they are discriminated against, as feminists will tell you, but because the majority won't even fill out one job application form during a lifetime. University and jobs are hobbies and ego-boosters to many Iranian women.

There is a joke going around the country about how women mostly go to universities to have a diploma in their dowry! Their husbands are held responsible and should they not get married, the father is responsible.

Before I end, here is a typical effort of media at representing Iran as truly proof of gynocentrism rather than patriarchy[6]. This is actually one of the least misandric pieces I have read which does not explicitly attack men, rather it solely concentrates on women. That is why this article you are reading is not tackling the extreme, but rather the typical world we are living in:

> "The comparison between modern British girls and modern Iranian girls living less than 3,000 miles apart could hardly be more stark.
>
> In Britain, a young woman can wear pretty clothes and makeup in public, talk on her mobile, smoke, go for a drink and have a boyfriend. If she gets pregnant, the state will look after her. If she commits a crime, the worst that can happen to her is imprisonment in a humanely run prison.
>
> In Iran, she must cover her head at all times and may not wear makeup or do anything to display her femininity in public. She may not drink alcohol or associate with boys and if she gets caught, she will be flogged. If she gets caught having sex or gets pregnant outside marriage, she can be sentenced to death for adultery or moral crimes. If she commits murder or is involved in drug trafficking, she can expect to feel the hangman's noose, perhaps in public. It is claimed by feminist and human rights groups that Iran is one big prison for women."

Now let's comment on this. Starting with the last sentence is nice to get the perspective of why to criticize:

> It is claimed by feminist and human rights groups that Iran is one big prison for women."

There goes your typical gynocentrism; one big prison for women, but for men it is nothing but blow jobs every second of every day. That way it is also implied that men are the prison guards. Getting back to the beginning:

> The comparison between modern British girls and modern Iranian girls living less than 3,000 miles apart > could hardly be more stark. In Britain, a young woman can wear pretty clothes and makeup in public, talk on her mobile, smoke, go for a drink and have a boyfriend.

Except for the drink, a young woman does all of that in Iran.

> In Iran, she must cover her head at all times and may not wear makeup or do anything to display her femininity in public.

Actually Iranian women are among the largest consumers of makeup in the world, along with Iran having the highest rate of nose jobs for women in the world, and being among the countries with highest rates of cosmetic surgery fr women. These exceedingly expensive nose jobs and other cosmetic surgeries are – as you guessed it – almost always paid for by men. Even most women in the rather poor sectors of society force their men to pay for cosmetic surgeries usually by exercising guilt trips and shaming. This article provides some insight into this:

http://www.theguardian.com/world/iran-blog/2013/mar/01/beauty-obsession-iran-cosmetic-surgery

Quoting from the article:

"…Iranian obsession with physical beauty. Far from focusing on internal spiritual values, young people – some aged 14 – are having cosmetic surgery in the hope of attaining "doll faces" to make them look like the actors they see in Hollywood films and satellite television programmes from the west."

Back to the gyno-minded article:

She may not drink alcohol…

Boys cannot drink alcohol either; it is illegal in Iran for anybody to drink. It is called prohibition, not oppression of women.

> … or associate with boys and if she gets caught, she will be flogged.

She cannot associate with boys? She will be flogged? Really? Pfffffffftt. Victim mentality and propaganda is one thing but this is a new low, even for feminists.

Ask yourself, what kind of a lunatic tells these kinds of lies? Or worse, why did these liars have everybody convinced that there is a heinous patriarchy in Iran ripping women apart? Or worse, why have people believed them? Male-domination, my patriarchal ass – I assure you, articles won't stop until this whole pathetic charade comes to light.

She cannot associate with boys? Iranian girls don't have boyfriends? Pfftt and pffft. Perhaps they also think that Iranian boys all have girlfriends. It must be nice to have no logic and be given a platform to dance on the truth. Their key to success is to conflate religionism with sexism. Much more to be said on this later.

> If she gets caught having sex or gets pregnant outside marriage, she can be sentenced to death for adultery or moral crimes.

This is an outright lie which is constantly repeated all over the western media; here is the truth:

If a girl has consensual vaginal sex outside marriage in Iran, she can sue the boy and force him to marry her and she will be legally paid Mehrieh, which for now think of it as $150,000 US. Trust your eyes; you read it right. This will be discussed in another article. Do not miss the upcoming article about Iran's marriage and divorce laws and again how the media is presenting it.

> If she commits murder or is involved in drug trafficking, she can expect to feel the hangman's noose, perhaps in public."

The rest of that article is dedicated to the death penalties of women over the past several decades, but wait a second.

Yes, hanging criminals in public does happen in Iran but here are some facts for you:

In 2012, 580 people were sentenced to death – some of whom were hanged in public. 9 were women, 571 were men.[7]

Actually, it is highly unlikely that Iranian judges make this kind of sentence for women. 76% of the aforementioned hanged cases were sentenced due to drug trafficking – only 3 of whom were women. The bias is too obvious to need further explanation.

Media's distorted representations can be traced everywhere:

http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=YPIWeRdB5Nc

So Hitchens says and I quote: "You insult your sisters in Tehran who are being beaten and raped every day when you say they have rights." When exposing feminist lies and propaganda you just know that rape would come up. Come to think of it, as rape is considered to be a crime of patriarchy; let us study rape statistics in Iran:

900 cases of rape were handled by the police last year in Iran. 60% of victims of rape were men, 40% were women.[8] This shocking fact hides inside it some cultural difficulties that Iranian men and boys face. Also chances of being raped in Iran is pretty much lower than most countries. Suffice it for now to say that in this supposed patriarchy, the punishment for rape is being hanged in public. Same goes for child molestation and being a gay man. Yes, a gay man, not a lesbian.

To sum up, the (western) Mainstream Media is a mess of gynocentrism and feminism. Gynocentric in that you might find 100 articles in English about the extremely few female taxi drivers in Iran, but not one article in any language about the 2076 male taxi drivers only in Tehran who are aged 71 to 80 (also 234 male taxi drivers in Tehran who are over 81)[9] who still work to provide for their thirty-some year old single daughters – daughters who are confused whether they have yoga class or English class today, whether they tell their boyfriends to get out of work early so as to give them a ride home, or if they should go shopping after class. Go figure.

---

[1] http://vista.ir/article/351575

[2] http://www.ghatreh.com/news/nn14651670/

[3] Mahmood Bakhtiyari, Ali Delpisheh, Sayyed Mohammad Riahi, Arman Latifi, Farid Zayeri, Masoud Salehi, Hamid Soori; "Epidemiology of occupational accidents among Iranian insured workers"; Safety Science 50; 2012

[4]Editorial note: after publication the original reference to this was questioned, so please see http://salamatnews.com/interview.aspx?ID=692, as well as the original reference that follows. –DE Original ref: http://ahar91.blogfa.com/category/4

[5]http://markaz-ejtemaee15.com/blog/1390/04/07/%D8%A2%D9%85%D8%A7%D8%B1-%D8%AE%D9%88%D8%AF%DA%A9%D8%B4%DB%8C-%D8%A7%DB%8C%D8%B1%D8%A7%D9%86-%D9%88-%D8%AC%D9%87%D8%A7%D9%86/

[6]http://www.capitalpunishmentuk.org/iranfem.html

[7]http://www.dw.de/%D8%A2%D9%85%D8%A7%D8%B1-%D8%AA%D9%81%D8%B5%DB%8C%D9%84%DB%8C-%D9%85%D8%AC%D8%A7%D8%B2%D8%A7%D8%AA-%D8%A7%D8%B9%D8%AF%D8%A7%D9%85-%D8%AF%D8%B1-%D8%A7%DB%8C%D8%B1%D8%A7%D9%86-%D8%AF%D8%B1-%D8%B3%D8%A7%D9%84-%DB%B1%DB%B3%DB%B9%DB%B1/a-16720688

[8]http://ahar91.blogfa.com/category/4

[9]http://www.asriran.com/fa/news/197120/35-%D9%87%D8%B2%D8%A7%D8%B1-%D8%B1%D8%A7%D9%86%D9%86%D8%AF%D9%87-%D8%AA%D8%A7%DA%A9%D8%B3%DB%8C-%D8%A8%DB%8C%D9%85%D9%87-%D9%86%D8%AF%D8%A7%D8%B1%D9%86%D8%AF

Alimony unlimited (and the emergence of a men's rights movement)

Robert St. Estephe · 24 November 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Robert St. Estephe–Gonzo Historian–is dedicated to uncovering the forgotten past of marginalizing men. "Gonzo journalism" is characterized as tending "to favor style over fact to achieve accuracy." Yet history – especially "social history" – is written by ideologues who distort and bury facts in order to achieve an agenda. "Gonzo" writing is seen as unorthodox and surprising. Yet, in the 21st century subjectivity, distortion and outright lying in non-fiction writing is the norm. Fraud is the new orthodoxy. Consequently, integrity is the new "transgressive."

Welcome to the disruptive world of facts, the world of Gonzo History.

••••

It was such outrageous rulings such as the one Chicago's Judge Ball delivered in 1909 — reported in the news report below — that set the stage for the slowly developing idea of men's rights activism in the United States. It was alimony racketeering that led to the formation of the men's rights movement in the United States, not the 1960s counterculture and its feminist excesses as many still wrongly believe. The earliest known attempt to form a national organization to fight exploitative alimony, which had by that time spurned a widespread scam of "marriage for alimony only," was made in December 1912 by one George R. Esterling of Denver. The publicity surrounding his idea was quickly met with the threat of a pro-alimony organization Leona Oldham, a Denver woman who had gotten her divorce in the very same week that Esterling made his announcement. Esterling's idea for an organization, despite the enthusiasm of men from across the United States who sent him letters, never materialized. Back in 1911, the common term for alimony abuse was called "polite blackmail;" by 1925 the common term for it was "the alimony racket."

The first man's rights activist, Samuel Reid, appeared on the scene in California 1925, and finally in 1927, anti-alimony organizations (the prototype of modern men's rights movement) began spring up around the country — in New York City (American Alimony Payers' Protective Association), Chicago (Alimony Club of Illinois) and Milwaukee. A news report from 1928 disclosed a full-scale golddigging racket operating in Cleveland, in which "divorcees have developed a highly skillful technique of marrying, divorcing and suing for alimony, then remarry some wealthier man, divorcing and suing again for alimony."

Below you will find the story of the faint and early rumblings of the movement which took a century to form itself into what the internet age allows to be a coherent, principled and eloquent resistance to institutionalized female privilege, to chivalry masquerading as "equality," and to a full-fledged ideology of hate (promoting the notion of a sex-based aristocracy) which calls itself "feminism."

••••••

[image]

FULL TEXT (Article 1 of 4): Chicago. May 11. – Divorced men received a shock from Judge Farlin Q. Ball yesterday that caused not a few of them to seek the advice of lawyers at once.

Although divorced fifty years, was the purport of the bombshell exploded by the jurist, and although no mention of alimony was made in the decree, no divorced man is safe from payment of that peculiarly irksome obligation so long as his former wife lives and fails to remarry.

Judge Ball calmly announced from the bench that, while a decree of divorce ended the other marital obligations, the duty of a husband to support his wife and her right to demand and receive such support was not thereby ended. He further held that only the death of one of the parties, remarriage of the woman or a stipulated sum of money accepted by her in lieu of alimony at the time of obtaining her divorce could prevent the divorced wife from demanding alimony at any time she felt the need of such support, and the court felt her former husband was able to render such.

~ Ruling as Interpreted. ~

In other words – that is, in plain American language – a wife who obtained a divorce twenty-five years ago, or even fifty, according to Judge Ball, can bob up unexpectedly and, having discovered that her former spouse has become wealthy or merely well fixed, may go into court and successfully demand her "rights."

That is, of course, providing she hasn't married in the meantime or did not accept a stipulated alimony when she was divorced.

Even though the divorced husband has married again, become the father of ten children, and may be even grandfather, the former wife's rights to alimony are not thereby hampered or annulled in any way.

Ouch!

Furthermore, Judge Ball declared that his novel decision was backed up by a ruling of a Pennsylvania court, made many years ago, and by one other decision of more recent date. Several leading attorneys, when questioned about the decision, declared it was good law and had been since the days of Blackstone.

~ Case Raising the Point. ~

Judge Ball rendered his decision in the case of Mary N. Cobb vs. William H. Cobb. Mrs. Cobb was divorced from her husband on June 13, 1901, on charges of infidelity, which her husband admitted. The decree of divorce was silent as to alimony. She set up the facts that she had never remarried and that her income as a bookkeeper was insufficient for her needs.

Although the couple had been divorced eight years, Judge Ball, after a few days' study of the case, ordered that Mrs. Cobb be paid alimony. He did not fix the amounts to be paid, leaving this for agreement between counsel.

"The question before the court," the decision reads, "is whether it has power, on the petition filed in the original cause, to allow alimony to a wife subsequent to the term in which the decree of divorce was entered, where the bill and decree each is silent in regard to alimony.

~ Gist of the Ruling. ~

"A proceeding for divorce is sui generis. It is the duty of the husband to support his wife in a manner commensurate with his means during the life of both parties. The death of either end the liability. The decree of divorce ends the other marital obligations, but the duty of the husband to support his wife, and her right to demand and receive such support is not thereby ended. Hence upon principle, if at any time, after the final decree and within the lives of both parties, the wife becomes in actual need of such support and a husband is able to contribute it, alimony should be awarded her.

"The principle is subject to the limitation that, if prior to or at the time of the decree the question of alimony was raised and decided against the wife, it cannot again be brought forward: the maxim of res judicata forbids it.

"The petition shows sufficient ground for not asking alimony in the decree by alleging that at the same time the defendant had no means nor property. The changed circumstances now justify her in asking relief."

["Gives Men Who Are Divorced Cold Shivers – Chicago Jurist Declares Alimony is Due in All Cases," Fort Wayne Sentinel (Ind.), May 11, 1909, p. 4]

•••

[image]

FULL TEXT (Article 2 of 4): Denver, Col., Dec. 12. – "Want address of every man in Denver up against the alimony paying proposition. Quick action necessary."

This ad appeared in a Denver newspaper today. It was put in by Geo. R. Esterling.

Esterling is paying alimony to his ex-wife just now. He wants to form a league of grass-widowers and take the alimony question up to the supreme court of the United States.

Esterling's is that is unconstitutional to fine a man for the rest of his life for a matrimonial mistake.

"When a man commits a burglary he is punished for a certain length of time," says Esterling. "But at the end of that time, he is free to start life anew. Alimony goes on forever."

["War On Alimony Stunt." The Day Book (Chicago, Il.), Dec. 12, 1912, p. 9]

***

FULL TEXT (Article 3 of 4): Denver, Dec. 21. – George Esterling, originator of the plan for the organization of all alimony players in the country to make a country wide fight against "Paying alimony forever," has found himself famous. From all parts of the United States scores of letters come from other "victims" practically all commending this scheme.

From Everett, Mass., comes a letter from a man who proposes to establish at least one alimony club in Massachusetts. He says: "I am in favor of making the fight for our rights a national one and I am sure that if we all stand together and fight this dreadful imposition of endless punishment, and fight it increasingly, we will accomplish our purpose."

A letter from Newcastle, Ind. among other things, says: "Men as a class are a bunch of gelatin spined shrimps. All that a woman finds it necessary to do nowadays is to bring a charge against a man and all his neighbors will say: "Well, he's always seemed a nice fellow, but you never can tell."

"A woman can even murder her husband in cold blood with the certainty that right after her acquittal she can take her choice of taking a position in vaudeville, or in the office of some longwhiskered billygoat who has been watching the farce of a trial."

["Anti-Alimony Leader Finds Self Famous – George Esterling Who Started Crusade Against 'Endless Punishment" Now Has Many Followers." The Milwaukee Sentinel (Wi.), Dec. 21, 1912, p. 1]

***

FULL TEXT (Article 4 of 4): Denver, Dec. 14. When George Esterling, would-be benefactor of all divorced mankind, proposed two days ago an organization of ex-husbands to bring relief to those who have been sentenced to pay alimony to their former wives for the rest of their lives, he forgot that divorced womankind might have something to say.

A woman now aspires to be founder of an organization for the protection of ex-wives who, in her opinion, are the real victims of matrimonial blunders. She is Mrs. Leona Oldham, freed from her fetters after a ten minutes hearing in the county court Thursday.

"It's a woman in nearly every case that bears the real burden of a matrimonial mistake. She is the one that makes the big sacrifice of her home, her friends, her position and herself," said Mrs. Oldham.

"What does the man sacrifice? Nothing, except a small part of his weekly salary. He does not give up any of his weekly salary. He does not give up any of his friends. He does not stay at home and wash dishes and mind the baby.

"Too many men regard marriage as a mere pastime. They don't feel any responsibility about marriage. A man has no business marrying a girl unless he expects to support her as long as she is his wife or his grasswidow."

["Calls The Grasswidows To Organize In Defense Of Their Court-Given Rights," syndicated (United Press), Dec. 15, 1912, p. 14]

***

Links:

Robert Ecob, Early MHRA – 1927 – (Sep. 18, 2013)

http://www.avoiceformen.com/series/unknown-history-of-misandry/robert-ecob-early-mhra-1927/

Dr. Vernon P. Cooley: MHRA 1927 – (Sep. 6, 2013)

http://www.avoiceformen.com/series/unknown-history-of-misandry/dr-vernon-p-cooley-mhra-1927/

Samuel Reid: The First Fathers' Rights Activist? – 1925 (Unknown History of Misandry)

http://unknownmisandry.blogspot.com/2012/06/samuel-reid-first-fathers-rights.html

Milwaukee's Anti-Alimony Club – 1927 (Unknown History of Misandry)

http://unknownmisandry.blogspot.com/2013/08/milwaukees-anti-alimony-club-1927.html

Epidemic of gold-digging whores – 1928 – (Nov. 2, 2013)

http://www.avoiceformen.com/series/unknown-history-of-misandry/epidemic-of-gold-digging-whores-1928/

Senseless acts of beauty

AVfM Video Source · 24 November 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Flashmob coolness.

What does this have to do with men's rights? Nothing. Except men and other people are pretty cool sometimes, and it's nice to be reminded of that sometimes. If this doesn't melt your heart you're made of stone.

Intactivists protest in front of pro-circumcision doctor's house

AVfM Video Source · 24 November 2013 · Archived copy · Original

The fine folks at Intaction recently held a protest against a doctor who supports circumcising children before they're old enough to give consent:

https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=hAB9g7uulWQ

Video courtesy of Jerry the Other.

Flooded By False Rape Allegations

Angry Harry · 25 November 2013 · Archived copy · Original

After decades of relatively unsuccessful campaigning in order to highlight the fact that domestic violence against men is much worse and more frequent than it is against women, it is very heartening to see that the latest, and biggest ever, study has at least concluded the following:

"The most comprehensive review of the scholarly domestic violence research literature ever conducted concludes, among other things, that women perpetrate physical and emotional abuse, and engage in control behaviors, at comparable rates to men."

But, of course, thanks to the wholesale corruption of our government officials working in the western justice systems and the dishonesty of so many 'journalists' in the mainstream media, it is, no doubt, going to take many years before the public actually becomes aware of the fact that men make up the majority of victims of domestic violence.

The same will also probably be true when it comes to false allegations of "abuse."

The evidence very strongly suggests that the vast majority of such allegations made to the police these days are malicious and false. And they are mostly being made by women who are seeking some kind of advantage for themselves by seeking to use the state to inflict violence on their behalf.

At the same time, however, the evidence also strongly suggests that most victims of abuse do not go to the police.

For example, it is the officially-accepted view these days that only about 10% of victims of rape report their rapes to the police.

There are many reasons why I believe this.

In brief, they are as follows.

1. Most rapes are inflicted by intimates. And most victims of rape will not want to see the lives of their intimates destroyed for what, in most cases, are likely to be relatively trivial events. Remember: extreme things (like violent rapes) are far less likely to occur than are less extreme things (like pressuring your partner into having sex).

Indeed, most "rapes" as currently defined are trivial affairs.

2. Even violent rapes by strangers, or even by intimates, are most likely not going to be reported.

In the first case, victims are unlikely to want to find themselves having to go through the horrendous ordeal of a rape trial and the various invasive preliminary procedures and testimonies which precede it – particularly given that the chances of conviction are so low. (And even if their attackers are convicted, wherein lies the benefit to themselves?)

And, in the second case, the victim of a violent intimate might also just be too scared to report the matter lest they become the perpetual target of revenge.

3. In more intermediate circumstances, perhaps a rape (violent or trivial) by the boy next door, it still seems to me highly unlikely that the matter would be reported to the police by the victim.

Quite simply, doing so would likely cause such a huge amount of hurt and aggravation to so many people who are known to the victim that the victim would most likely decide not to pursue the matter.

4. I have seen numerous reports over the years on the internet by women who claim to have been raped, and it seems fairly evident to me that those who are credible (and many of them are not) do not report their rapes for reasons that seem totally justifiable.

In short, the point to grasp is that the vast majority of victims will not report the matter when it comes to rape.

Quite simply, most rape victims have nothing really to gain by going to the police – but they have plenty to lose.

Furthermore, by going to the police, not only would they have to submit themselves to months of stressful aggravation should their cases eventually go to court, they would also suffer even worse trauma from the incident itself as a result of not being allowed to forget about it – and 'move on'.

So why do so many women go to the police to report their rapes?

And the answer is, quite clearly, that they don't.

Because the evidence from a number of sources supports the view that most of those women who do go to the police are false accusers. In other words, they are not coming from the same population of women who have been raped.

Even the police believe this.

Indeed, for two decades now the police and the academics have been in complete opposition to each other when it comes to the issue of false allegations. The academics claim that false allegations are very few in number – about 5% of all allegations – whereas the police often claim (mostly in private, for fear of losing their jobs) that the figure is over 50%.

In short, the academics who are chosen and funded by the government officials who are concerned with such issues claim – without foundation – that false allegations are rare.

However, this claim is fraudulent.

And the first thing to say about this claim is that the academics who make it were not present at the time of the alleged rapes. They do not have a magic wand that allows them to view what actually happened.

Essentially, their 'research' involves going through the police reports about those alleged rape incidents that either resulted in no convictions or that did not even go to court. They then decide whether or not the rape allegations were true.

And, generally speaking, these government-appointed academics conclude that the vast majority of these allegations were true.

Now, roughly speaking, some 90% of rape allegations do not result in convictions. Indeed, only some 15% of them actually get to court. The public perception, however, is that the reason for these figures is because it is very difficult for the police to get enough evidence to take a case to court.

But this perception is completely wrong, because in both the UK and America cases are sent to court when there is no objective evidence whatsoever that a crime has been committed.

Time and time again we see cases going to court when the only 'evidence' is derived from the accusations of the accuser; resulting in what has been described as He Said/She Said situations.

In America we see, for example:

A 16-year-old girl, whose allegation that she was raped at Fredericia train station resulted in the conviction of three teenage boys, unknowingly confessed on a hidden camera that she lied about the incident,

The only valid evidence against these three boys was her testimony.

And in the UK we even have examples wherein the police have successfully prosecuted men when their accusers were known to be serial false accusers …

A man jailed when a woman falsely cried rape told of his fury yesterday after learning that police knew the woman was 'unreliable'.

As such, we can conclude that in the 85% of allegations that do not go to court the evidential value is actually worth less than that which is found in the He Said/She Said situations.

So how is it possible for government-funded academics to conclude that false allegations are rare?

And the answer to this question is relatively straightforward.

These academics mostly have a mindset and a corresponding ideology that demands the belief that "women never lie" about rape. Furthermore, if any of them even dared to suggest that most allegations were false, they would likely be vilified, demonised, refused funding, kicked out of their jobs and, very often, they are threatened with physical violence.

Indeed, as just one very recent example of this, Robert Colover has had to resign from the UK's Crown Prosecution Service Rape Panel of advocates for describing a 13 year old girl as "predatory" and "sexually experienced".

Even mentioning the existence of such females costs professionals their jobs.

This is an example of corruption at the highest levels of the justice system because such young girls clearly do exist. And by trying to suppress this fact by intimidating other professionals into silence, the Crown Prosecution Service shows itself to be a corrupt organisation, and that it has no regard for the truth when it comes to the issue of sexual abuse.

As such, you can safely discard almost anything that its officials say when it comes to such issues.

Indeed, this pattern of unbridled hostility directed towards anyone who offends "feminist" thinking has been going on now for four decades. As a result, only those 'academics' who are willing to come up with politically-correct results are given the funding and the attention.

Indeed, Professor Murray Strauss has described the type of chicanery in which academics themselves engage in order to support the feminist agenda.

They include suppressing evidence, hiding data, citing only studies consistent with their agenda, falsifying their conclusions, obstructing publication of articles, blocking funding, demonising other academics and, they "Harass, Threaten and Penalise Researchers who Produce Evidence that Contradicts Feminist Beliefs".

In other words, absolutely none of the research endorsed by the Home Office or the Crown Prosecution Service can be trusted, because their academics will only accept evidence that supports their agenda.

In my own view, there is far more evidence to support the contention that the vast majority of rape and "abuse" allegations made to the police are false and, further, that there is no valid evidence whatsoever to suggest otherwise.

This is not to say that thousands of women are not sexually assaulted or raped every year, but that the majority of those turning up at the police station to make allegations are false accusers.

These, themselves, mostly come from a tiny proportion of women who are willing to use the state to aggress against their male partners or acquaintances.

Indeed, even if 95% of women would never dream of making a false accusation of "abuse", this still leaves us in the UK with one million adult women who would. And, in fact, this number is more than enough to account for all the rape allegations made to the police over a 50 year period

And, in my view, it is mostly women drawn from this population of one million who, every year, are flooding the UK police with false allegations.

Now, whether this is truly the case or not is somewhat irrelevant when it comes to criticising deceitful government officials for proclaiming that false allegations are rare because, as we have seen above, they can have no legitimate basis for this claim.

In other words, the officials working at the Home Office and in the Crown Prosecution Service are lying.

As such, the claims by the Home Office and the Crown Prosecution Service (that false allegations are rare) represent a true corruption of the justice system in numerous ways, not least of which is the fact that they prejudice all jury trials by indoctrinating jurors with the view that defendants are highly likely to be guilty on the basis of accusations alone – accusations which are levied by persons who are clearly very hostile to the defendants and who are often seeking financial compensation.

Furthermore, it is quite clear that these government officials are proclaiming that nearly all of those who have been accused are 'guilty', even though the Crown Prosecution Service cannot find enough evidence to convict them.

This disgraceful claim embeds into the public mind the view that those people who are not prosecuted, or who are found not guilty at trial, are, in fact, guilty.

A more shameful corruption of the justice system is hard to imagine.

Effectively, these government officials are planting false evidence into the minds of the public and into the minds of jurors.

Furthermore, they compound this corruption by referring to all rape accusers as "victims". This prejudices any future trials, and it also tells the public that the men who have been accused are, most likely, guilty.

In summary, there is plenty of evidence to suggest that the vast majority of rape victims do not report their rapes to the police, but there is no valid evidence whatsoever to support the view that false allegations are rare.

On the contrary, there is considerable evidence to suggest that the vast majority of rape allegations are false and malicious, and that they are mostly coming from a small proportion of women who are quite prepared to make false allegations.

Finally, it is well worth noting that for every non-proven allegation that is deemed to be true, it is assumed that another nine women were raped but did not report the crime – because it is assumed that only 10% of raped women will report the matter.

And so the national rape statistics are hugely inflated by the discreditable antics of the academics described above.

In the UK, the effect of this is to inflate the official estimate of the annual number of rapes by a factor of somewhere between 3 and 8. (In other words, every 1,000 genuine rapes will be turned into some number between 3,000 and 8,000 by the academics and the officials.)

UK Police Officer Speaks Out

> As a serving policeman, there are several things I am not allowed to talk about.
>
> There are plenty of operational secrets we cannot discuss, but I'm not referring to those. I'm talking about the taboo subjects. The 'detection' rate for rape is one of these.
>
> It's very frustrating to sit and listen to pundits talking about the low number of rape convictions in Court, when as police officers we all know what lies behind these poor numbers.
>
> For example, I couldn't possibly tell you that out of every ten rapes which are reported in XXXtown, at least eight turn out to be nonsense. To be fair, eight out of ten of everything reported at XXXtown police station is nonsense, why should rape be any different?
>
> I couldn't tell you that of the remaining two, an existing alcohol-fuelled chaotic drug-based relationship is a factor in at least one of these, and 'consent' is probably present in the other to some degree. In my whole service I can only recall three stranger rapes and a half a dozen where consent was withdrawn at the time and he carried on. But I can't tell you that.
>
> I can't tell you that most of the adult rapes reported in XXXtown represent either the latest in a series of allegations designed to score points against an 'ex', lies designed to fend off an angry parent when a curfew has been missed or a defence mechanism when a jilted 'partner' discovers an infidelity.

> A rape once reported, even if withdrawn later, is in the system and a failure to bring someone to justice, even if it never happened, shows up in the 'detection' rate. The 'detection rate' is low because the number of rapes which actually happen is low. I couldn't possibly say that though.
>
> So who suffers when Charlene drops by the nick to accuse Wayne of raping her because she is hacked off that he used her child benefit money for drugs? Who suffers when we deploy a full investigation team, send officers out to arrest Wayne and deploy CSI's and specialist rape officers to the victim suite, all for Charlene to suddenly decide that she loves him and he didn't do it after all? Who loses when she can't identify a scene (because there never was a scene) when we can see on CCTV that Wayne was in the High Street (on his own) at the material time and that her mobile phone records show that she was texting her mate who works at Tesco, right at the time she was supposed to be being brutally taken by the boy?
>
> The next genuine rape victim to walk into the police station, that's who. The next genuine victim who may face the cynical looks and delayed reaction from officers who have just finished dealing with the last ten Charlenes.
>
> I also shouldn't tell you that it is Force Policy, in all but the most exceptional cases, not to prosecute Charlene for wasting police time. Apparently this would prevent genuine victims from coming forward. Make no mistake, the genuine victims suffer, the detection rate is low and we keep pretending that everything is alright.
>
> The facts about rape seen from the street are this: most genuine rapes are against children under 13 years old and are within the family or family circle. Genuine adult rape is rare and nearly always charged to Court; what a jury do next is for them, but it usually comes down to 'consent' issues, and being as they were not in the bedroom at the time, and we are not simply proving intercourse because that is already admitted by the defendant, it's not really within our gift to prove or disprove consent. Consent can amount to one word, said in a half whisper six months before in a darkened room where no one else was present.
>
> But we can't possibly say any of this. We will simply accept that it's all our fault and promise to do better in the future.

American Police Officer Speaks Out

> For 16 years, I was a kickass prosecutor who made most of my reputation vigorously prosecuting rapists. I am unaware of any Colorado prosecutor who put as many rapists away for as much prison time as I did during my prosecutorial career. Several dozen rapists are serving thousands of years as a result of my efforts.
>
> However, during my time as a prosecutor who made case filing decisions, I was amazed to see all the false rape allegations that were made to the Denver Police Department. It was remarkable and surprising to me. You would have to see it to believe it.
>
> Any honest veteran sex assault investigator will tell you that rape is one of the most falsely reported crimes that there is.
>
> … The above statements are heresy to say publicly for many politically correct prosecutors. That is especially true if they want to maintain good relations with the victim advocacy community.
>
> Craig Silverman

Other things to see:

How Official Rape Statistics are Distorted and Inflated (approx 5 min reading time)

Why Do Women Lie About Rape? (10 min)

The Truth About The Rape Statistics (8 min)

Kevin Driscoll Is Innocent Of Rape (10 min)

Can You Trust Academic Research? (6 min)

Also see my short YouTube video entitled “Understanding the Rape Statistics”

… to get some idea of just how ludicrous are the official claims about rape.

Editorial note: this item was originally printed on Angry Harry’s web site. –DE

Adventures in damseling: remembering Shannon Faulkner

Ty Henry · 25 November 2013 · Archived copy · Original (AUTHOR'S NOTE:I wrote this piece in the Spring of 1995 in my past life as a columnist for the University Of Arizona Daily Wildcat. It first appeared in the April 21, 1995 issue. The original link is here.

For those who don't recall the story, or are from other countries, Shannon Faulkner sued a school called The Citadel on the grounds that the military-structured private college's all-male admissions policy was unconstitutional. She had won admission after submitting an application that omitted any reference to her gender, and the school rescinded their acceptance letter. Judge C. Weston Houck ruled in her favor in 1993, but Faulkner was only allowed to attend day classes, not full cadet activities pending appeal. After The Citadel's appeal was denied, Faulkner was the first woman to attend the institution with full cadet privileges… and responsibilities. It's the responsibilities part that was, well, problematic in her eyes [sound familiar?]

For her part, Faulkner did endure opprobrium and scorn on a massive scale, including some death threats and written threats to her safety, all of which cannot be excused. In the face of the criticism, Faulkner quit the program after five days.

The institution continues to admit women, and there is still friction from male cadets, some blatantly sexist, but others questioning the relaxed hazing and initiation standards women are still held to. This focuses on how Faulkner set those standards with her demands to be "more equal than others." Read On.)

Faulkner should conform

Imagine fighting for the right to skydive, and deciding after the jump that you don't want to hit the ground.

Pretty silly, right?

Well, imagine someone fighting to get into a private military academy where no head goes unshaved, where there are no locks on doors, where no earrings, tattoos, makeup or other expressions of individuality are allowed, getting in, and wanting to wear a ponytail, have locks put on her door, have her own shower, flaunt her individuality, and saying with a straight face, "I want the full experience of this institution." People would be quite within their rights to question this person's honesty.

Well, this duplicitous description belongs to one Shannon Faulkner, the young woman who was ordered to be the first female cadet in the 150-plus year history of the Citadel. Now, it seems, she will embark on a new mission; to become the first maverick at an institution whose rules conscript uniformity.

Shannon doesn't get it. Her supporters don't either.

This is not the State U., where the atmosphere encourages dissent. At the Citadel, conformity is mandated.

Shannon's supporters say that the demand for Shannon to shave her head is a deliberate attempt to make her miserable, thus deterring future female applicants, and that it exemplifies the backlash that awaits all women who dare to buck tradition.

They don't get it.

Imagine the first black cadet coming in with dreadlocks and demanding they not be cut, on the grounds that it is punitive. How absurd would that be?

The purpose of the tradition of freshman subjugation is to make them miserable. Ironically, this specter of misery is what draws new cadets. The idea is to persevere and sacrifice to the whole, thereby strengthening the mind and the soul. That is the Citadel mission. Without these rules, it ceases to be the Citadel Shannon purports she is so anxious to experience.

Supporters of Faulkner complain of incessant stubbornness of the "Ol' Boy Network." But most of these same people had a collective conniption fit when the administration at Mills College in California decided to admit men in 1989. We saw images of women sobbing like they were at a funeral. Where were the cries of "equal access" then? Traditionally black colleges admit whites. Fact is, women's groups want to end all-male education, but at the same time want to have their own spaces where men can't enter. At last count, these spaces numbered 84, including Mills, whose trustees eventually ran scared and reversed themselves. The rationale for this toxic sexism toward men is that women often are short-changed in a co-ed atmosphere, and need a place to develop self-confidence.

I don't get it.

This is 1995. Where have these women been hiding?

Most men and women want women to have access to all avenues in life they are willing and able to pursue. But equality is a tricky business, and being seen as an equal is not always fun. Equality can mean having to sacrifice, endure, and sometimes, be humiliated by the group. It is under these circumstances where all too many people expect women to be pampered. It seems that some women only see equality as something uplifting; something that boosts confidence, and gives one a warm fuzzy feeling inside. It is disturbing to men against sexism that some women, when things get tough or call for sacrifice, insist on falling back on the same archaic "fairer sex" stereotypes and gender dichotomies feminism tried so hard to eradicate. The paradox is that so-called feminists want these allowances to be made.

Repeat refrain

Men get these mixed signals and become frustrated, and, as a result, often don't take women seriously.

In this case, Faulkner and her supporters think she is rightly entitled to the full Citadel package with only partial payment. Does anyone truly believe having her hair cut will scar her for life? If so, why did she apply there in the first place?

Because Shannon Faulkner is a poser. She wants to tailor the Citadel to meet her needs, not to become a cadet. If she did, her first questions after the first decision would've been, "Where's the barber, where's my uniform, and where's my room?", and not "Do I have to cut my hair?"

But Shannon can prove all of the critics wrong, even those at the Citadel. Instead of being a whiner, be a cadet. Endure the first year, insisting on being with the men and enduring the same humiliation. Move up in the ranks, graduate with honors. Whether you believe it or not, men, particularly military men, respect a woman who can take it and still dish it back. If you do the things mentioned above, you will get respect. And, oh yeah, cut the hair.

After all, you’re only 20. It’ll grow back.

Tyrone Henry is a political science senior.

Criminal charges requested for lawyers of “NCIS Lab Rat Abbey Scuito” Pauley Perrette

Suzanne McCarley · 25 November 2013 · Archived copy · Original

For those of you who have been following the ongoing story of the Pauley “NCIS” Perrette and her repeated and relentless victimization of her ex-husband Francis Shivers, via the false restraining order, AVFM is bringing you some interesting news. As you will see, this current action is truly historic in its significance and action. All of you rapid mouse clickers out there will want to stay with this one.

There have been countless claims by thousands of people who complain of very greasy and underhanded legal tactics employed by attorneys who will do just about anything to secure false restraining orders on behalf of their clients. In this case proof’ in the form of documents in the case file have been discovered and filed with the LA County Superior Court, the California State Bar, and the LA County Grand Jury. These documents point directly to criminal complicity on the part of two of Perrette’s attorneys.

And they are in the attorney’s own handwriting.

Our cadre of AVFM researchers, investigators, and volunteers have painstakingly sifted through thousands of pages of documents, and have found evidence of criminal acts on the part of Attorneys Alexandra Lavinsky and Ronald Litz, a self-proclaimed high profile “Hollywood Celebrity” lawyer.

Court stipulation – March 10, 2008

Alexandra Levinski Declaration – November 10, 2011

One of the assertions that Mr. Shivers has made many times in this decade long saga (which have been dismissed and ignored) is the fact that attorneys representing Perrette have attempted to circumvent the notification to Shivers of petitions by Perrette for restraining orders which she has succeeded in getting issued ex-parte. This is not the only example of serious attorney misconduct. It is just one of many.

[image]
Alexandra Lavinski

Here we bring you one specific example that was successful for Perrette, but not for long. In March of 2008 one of the attorneys representing Perrette; Alexandra Lavinsky prepared a court stipulation under the direction of Attorney Ronald Litz, Lavinsky’s employer. This stipulation was handwritten by Lavinsky and signed by both Lavinsky and Shivers. It was an agreement that any and all correspondence in this case would be mailed to Shiver’s attorney, Mr. Sanford Passman, His address is clearly stated. The stipulation was then placed into the official record.

In November of 2011, just before Perrette’s current restraining order was about to expire, her legal counsel(s) tried to pull a fast one by sneaking something in. This particular temporary order was the order that resulted in Shivers recent conviction for violating same. Using carnival-like bait and switch tactics, and attempting to get another temporary restraining order in an ex parte hearing, Attorney Lavinsky prepared a signed sworn declaration, under penalty of perjury, claiming that she attempted to notify Mr. Shivers but was unsuccessful, of yet another in a long list of restraining order petitions and hearings by Perrette. Either Perrette or someone on her legal team petitioned for another restraining order extension some time prior to the expiration of the last one which was issued on November 13, 2006.

A hearing was scheduled for November 10, 2011, the same date that appears on Ms. Lavinsky’s declaration. The content of this declaration clearly indicates that Lavinsky claimed that she was unsuccessful in reaching Mr. Shivers. She claims that her assistant attempted to reach Mr. Shivers through alleged contacts with LAPD Threat Management Unit Detective Jose Viramontes and retired Detective Martha DeFoe.

Lavinsky's emails to Shivers the day before the actual hearing on November 9, 2011, reveal another unscrupulous legal tactic (see Lavinsky Declaration). You will notice that Lavinsky sent two emails to Shivers on the November 9, one at 9:56 am and the other at 10:04 am. The Rules of the Court state that you must notify a Respondent of an ex-parte hearing 24 hours prior to the actual hearing. That hearing was scheduled for the next day at 10 am.

Waiting until the last possible minute and just to satisfy the Rules of the Court, Lavinsky sent the first email with 4 minutes to spare and the second one was 4 minutes late, but technically she was within the rules. Given the history of Perrette's diligent filing of petitions for restraining orders, one would think that she and her lawyers would have known weeks or months in advance when her existing restraining order was about to expire, and when she was going to ask for an extension.

Yet in this scenario, Ms. Lavinsky waited till the last possible moment, 4 minutes before the deadline. Why didn't she try to reach him a week before, two weeks before; why didn't she mail the notice to his attorney like she agreed that she would in writing more than three years prior?

The intent here is clear, as is the legal tomfoolery. On one hand Perrette's lawyers have gone to astronomical lengths to try to cross all of their t's and dot all of their i's but they intentionally ignored and did not present the prior stipulation to the court, thereby perpetrating a fraud upon the court. That's fraud, as in felony.

They hoped that Shivers would not check his email; therefore he would not show up at the hearing the next morning because he was unaware of the hearing, and they would get another restraining order by default. Perrette and her legal counsel would be in compliance with the Rules of the Court so far as the notification requirements for an ex-parte hearing, but were hoping that he wouldn't show.

[image]
Ronald Litz
Shivers did check his email, but late in the evening and he did not have sufficient time to prepare any kind of proper response or defense. Surprised at this last minute attempt to get another restraining order, since he hadn't had any contact with Perrette in years and had no violations, he had to go into the proceeding unprepared. The declaration was submitted to the court by Attorney Ronald Litz, who was in attendance as the court record clearly indicates, and unfortunately Shivers was subjected to another temporary restraining order.

The actual hearing to determine if this order should stand has been continued until March of 2014, and Perrette has been ordered by the court to appear. In his declaration, Shivers has asked the court to vacate the current temporary order but allow the hearing to stand in order to force Perrette to testify as she has been ordered to do. If Perrette doesn't show, Shivers has asked the court to issue a bench warrant for her arrest. If one of her legal counsel attempts to give some excuse as to why she won't show, then Shivers has asked the court to remand whichever attorney is representing her at that time into custody for obstruction of justice.

This nonsense, this silliness, this clownish manipulation of the court must be put to a stop.

Perrette has been successful up to this point, through the manipulations of her attorneys to avoid personal testimony in most of these restraining order hearings and other proceedings, obviously to avoid having to lie under oath, as she has already done countless times.

What makes her declaration worse for Attorney Lavinsky is the fact that she was careless enough to use the Internet; two emails to further perpetrate an Intrinsic Fraud Upon the Court, thereby violating Federal Wire Fraud Statutes as outlined in Title 18, United States Code, Section 1343. Phone records will reveal if she or any one of her assistants lied about calling Viramontes or DeFoe, as they have no control over those records.

A subpoena for those phone records will tell the truth about that claim, and they will have to be provided to the court, most likely by state bar investigators.

Upon the discovery of these documents, Mr. Shivers prepared and submitted another public record sworn declaration dated November 13, 2013, advising the court of an Abuse of Process and that an Intrinsic Fraud Upon the Court had been committed with the intentional criminal acts of Attorney Alexandra Lavinsky and Attorney Ronald Litz. Here is a copy of Shivers' declaration:

2013-11-13 Filed State Bar Complaint & Declaration – Lavinsky

The declaration also calls for the reviewing judicial officer to issue a bench warrant for the arrest of Attorney Alexandra Lavinsky and Attorney Ronald Litz for the appropriate violations to include Perjury, Conspiracy, and to refer to the Office of the United States Attorney for prosecution on a violation of Federal Wire Fraud Statutes.

The declaration has also been sent to the California State Bar as an official state bar complaint, and to the LA County Grand Jury. All documents have been sent via certified mail and the tracking numbers were included in the declaration providing proof of delivery. This action should also prompt the State Bar to conduct a review of this entire case and of the several dozen other unethical and illegal acts committed by all California State Bar members who have been involved in this case.

The tables have been turned and the proof is indisputable. There is simply no way that anyone can write this one off and whoever the judge is that reviews this declaration is mandated by judicial canons, state bar professional rules of conduct and rules of the court to also notify the state bar. The law and provisions of various professional rules dictate that when any judicial officer or attorney knows of or has been made aware of serious attorney or judicial misconduct, they are mandated by law to report it. There is no wiggle room. The California State Bar website specifically states that a conviction of perjury on the part of an attorney justifies disbarment.

Let's just hope that the state bar and the courts do the right thing and criminally charge these two lawyers, and that if convicted they lose their license to practice law in addition to spending some quality residential time in a correctional facility. As convicted felons, let's hope that they won't be able to get a job in anything other than the fast food industry upon their release from a state and/or federal correctional facility. Even then they will have to declare that they are convicted felons, so they won't be allowed to work the cash register, just flip the burgers.

Here at AVFM and many of the other organizations have heard case after case of some of the under-handed, unethical and illegal things attorneys do when it comes to procuring false or unnecessary restraining orders for their clients. Rarely do we have actual proof, but in this case we have written proof, official court documents in their own handwriting that have been in the official court record for years. We just had to find them and put the pieces of the puzzle together.

It doesn't get any better than this, and it just shows you how blatant these lawyers have become. They actually feel that they can conspire to violate this man's rights, to pave the way for his wrongful conviction and incarceration, and can violate their oath as attorneys with impunity to satisfy the vengeful desires of a well-paying celebrity.

As many of you already can see, proof of a clearer picture of the truth is slowly coming to the surface. When an abuse of process and a fraud upon the court has been perpetrated and proven, the law and case law is explicitly clear in that the temporary order which is currently in place must be vacated.

Everything that occurred as a result of an illegal order must also be dismissed or vacated. We will see if the LA County Superior Court and the Office of the LA City Attorney does the right thing and vacates the order as well as Mr. Shiver's criminal conviction. The City and County of Los Angeles will also have to consider some type of settlement that will have a lot of zeros in it; so will Ms. Lavinsky and Mr. Litz.

Mr. Shivers has in fact filed a Civil Complaint for Damages with both the City and County of Los Angeles, based on selective enforcement and prosecution of the law. Both of these claims are public record. Under these circumstances, where the level of proof is continuously being elevated, showing unequivocally that not only has Perrette fraudulently abused the restraining order process, but that attorneys and other public officials have also participated and facilitated her fraud.

The filing of a Civil Complaint for Damages actually forces the municipality to conduct their own inquiry in order to either pay the claim or provide justification to deny the claim. If they deny the claim, the claimant has the right to pursue legal action. If they deny the claim, the municipality will be forced into a scenario where they will have no option other than to pursue criminal charges against Pauley Perrette, these two lawyers and others, in order to attempt to justify their denial.

Municipalities often handle these types of claims with immediate, scripted denial of responsibility. 'Gee whiz, we had no idea we have been taken for a ride by Pauley Perrette and her cohorts. As soon as it was brought to our attention we immediately launched a thorough investigation and sought criminal charges against Pauley Perrette, some of her lawyers and a handful of dishonest corrupt public officials. See, we're not liable, we didn't know!'

This kind of statement is crap. Municipalities use this kind of language in order to reduce their exposure to civil liability. They make claims of how surprised they are and how they have conducted all kinds of reviews of policy and procedure to make sure "this kind of thing never happens again."

Right; they've known about this all along but won't do anything until they are backed into a corner, someone is getting ready to lose their job, or someone is in jeopardy of going to jail. Sadly in the Los Angeles area there are those in public service who just won't do their job correctly until they are standing in front of the Intake and Reception area of the LA County Jail.

In this case, unequivocal proof of criminal culpability has been provided; therefore someone should go to jail. It doesn't look like "Abbey Scuito's" magical television forensics will help out on this one.

Maybe she and Alexandra can share a cell.

Perhaps now Perrette and some of her cohorts will understand how Mr. Shivers felt when they set him up to go to jail, how he felt walking into that jail reception area, trying to sleep on a concrete bench, and having to watch over his shoulder to keep from getting shanked by an obsessive Pauley Perrette fan.

The belief system held by some of the high profile attorneys in the LA/Hollywood area has been demonstrated here. Some believe that they can act with impunity and lawless abandon, or conduct certain practices just below the radar, and never be questioned as to their unethical or illegal practices. If it were not for the discovery of these documents and the vast history of similar acts in this case, or the public revelation these crimes, this incident would most likely be ignored, excused, or covered up.

This most recent declaration by Mr. Shivers proving an abuse of process, an intrinsic fraud upon the court, and state bar complaint are by no means the last. There will be more, and with irrefutable and indisputable proof of criminal acts committed by attorneys, prosecutors, cops or judges in this case, we will demand that justice be done, and that these crimes are prosecuted.

This lunacy of this restraining order system must be changed. Everything that everybody has said is wrong with the restraining order system is right here in this case. Lying, manipulating, and conniving cops, prosecutors, lawyers and judges — all wrapped into one example. It is multiplied ten times over when you throw in the Hollywood component and the eagerness of some of our less scrupulous public officials to make a name for themselves, or set themselves up in retirement for the benefit of, and riding on the coattails of, a celebrity.

'So what if we violated the rights of Mr. Shivers, so what that we manufactured violations and elevated this case into night stalker status, we got on the A-List.'

I would strongly suggest that those of you out there who have crossed paths with these two lawyers, or who have had similar experiences, closely inspect your own cases. If it applies, file the appropriate abuse of process and fraud upon the court declarations with the court, and a complaint with the California State Bar. This can apply to anyone who may have violated the law in your case; it doesn't have to be restricted to attorneys in order to file a declaration.

If these two were so blatantly careless in this case, chances are they have been just as careless in other cases as well. The State Bar, the Court, and the Grand Jury have all been put on notice that it may now be necessary to inspect every single case in which Ms. Lavinsky and Mr. Litz have ever taken part. We have just created work for the legal malpractice attorneys.

It is hoped that by exposing the truth in this all-too-common scenario of obtaining unjustified and false restraining orders with the intent of somehow escalating cases into criminal law violations, it will encourage others to re-examine their own situations. Download a copy of Mr. Shiver's declaration, use it as an example and file your own declarations.

Remember that everyone has the right to free speech and to constitutional protections and due process guarantees. In the meantime, as soon as we can get copies of booking photos, we'll be sure to post them here. Stay tuned, there's more to come.

Giving feminist fucktardery equal time

AVfM Video Source · 25 November 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Trigger warning for nauseating lack of talent, ideological retardation, and general stupidity. Let it be known that we even let feminists express themselves here.

Vaginas, EEEEEWWWWWW!

AVfM Video Source · 25 November 2013 · Archived copy · Original

A blogger at “Everyday Feminism” says our society hates vaginas. SparkyFister has some problem with this argument.

http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=_-GwoaEEbpg

Subscribe to Sparky for more patriarchal logic and oppression.

Indian feminists provide cover-up for Tarun Tejpal on rape allegation

Anil Kumar · 26 November 2013 · Archived copy · Original

India got its own "Hugo Schwyzer moment" not long ago. It is a story that reveals a lot about modern Indian society if first you understand the context in which it happened.

Let us begin with that context.

As in other countries, feminists in India have strange, often chauvinistic bedfellows. After all, funding from rich and powerful men helps feminists make their careers. While they complain about male-dominated society, the hierarchy of that society is precisely what they depend on to survive, and in fact flourish. Consequently, they attempt to cover up crimes by powerful men in their own ranks.

While they paint all men as evil, and insist that men must change their mentality, they have a completely different set of standards for rich and powerful men. The resultant system in India is one where rich, elite men now help concentrate power and privilege into the hands of elite women who in turn become tools to oppress the majority of poorer and weaker men — denying their fundamental rights and civil liberties. Of course, these rich "alpha males" don't mind sharing some privilege with feminists. Together they wield great influence on government, politics, media, tax money, NGOs, and the United Nations. Given this situation, the same class hierarchy that has always existed in India will remain in place in an only modified version. Weaker men and women will remain trapped in the stranglehold.

[image]
Shoma Chaudhury
This is the game. Feminists and men of power both benefit as they continue to blame and oppress the remaining population.

Sometimes events transpire to embarrass one of these opportunistic men. Case in point: Tarun Tejpal, a leading male feminist in India, and Editor-in-Chief of the magazine Tehelka (which is Hindi for "Sensational"), has been accused of sexual assault by one of his journalists.

Shoma Chaudhury, the managing editor of Tehelka, is a well-known feminist. She made numerous futile attempts to cover up the sexual assault allegation, and defended Tarun Tejpal in the media. Then, she claimed that this issue was internal to her organization, and that she had set up an internal committee to investigate the charges of sexual harassment. This feminist woman intentionally blurred the line between sexual assault (rape) and sexual harassment. She argued that the victim has not approached police, and she is satisfied with an internal committee to probe the issue. Then, she appointed Urvashi Bhutalia, a feminist friend, to head this internal investigation committee. She said,

> "You cannot say it is a criminal case because the girl has not gone to the police. Let's not conclude it is a sexual assault or rape. My understanding is she wanted an apology and it was given to her. He [Tejpal] stepped down. It was something she had not asked for. It was much more than what she wanted."

For his part, Tarun Tejpal recused himself from Tehelka for 6 months, terming it as lapse of judgement.

> Letter sent by founder-editor Tarun Tejpal to Tehelka Managing Editor Shoma Chaudhury, a feminist The subject line is: Atonement
>
> My Dear Shoma,
>
> The last few days have been most testing, and I squarely take the blame for this. A bad lapse of judgment, an awful misreading of the situation, have led to an unfortunate incident that rails against all we believe in and > fight for. I have already unconditionally apologised for my misconduct to the concerned journalist, but I feel impelled to atone further.

>
> I have already unconditionally apologised for my misconduct to the concerned journalist, but I feel impelled to atone further. Tehelka has been born and built, day on day, with my blood, toil, tears and sweat, and that of many others, against near-insurmountable odds. It has lived for and fought the big battles of our time, always on the side of the oppressed and the wronged, always on the side of equity and justice.

Within days, the email sent by the alleged victim to Shoma Chaudhuri got leaked to public domain and social media with every one to see the naked truth. The email of the alleged victim says, amongst other things:

> On the night of 7 th November 2013, the opening night of Tehelka's Think festival, I had discharged my duties for the day as the chaperone for Mr Robert De Niro. As it was Mr De Niro and his daughter's first night in Goa and at the festival, my editor in chief Mr TarunTejpal accompanied Mr De Niro, Drena De Niro (his daughter) and I to Mr De Niro's suite to wish him goodnight. (As his chaperone, my work was to be available all day to Mr De Niro and Drena, take them sightseeing, make sure they were well looked after in Goa and at the Hyatt—until they retired to their suite at night.)
>
> As we left the suite, Mr Tejpal and I were in conversation — I have known him since I was a child, he had worked closely with my father who was also a journalist, and after my father's accident Mr Tejpal had always been a paternal figure to me. He was responsible for offering me my first job, and was always just a phone call away whenever I needed his advice on a story or life. His daughter, TiyaTejpal and I are very close friends as well.
>
> As we made our way out of the elevator of Block 7 at the Grand Hyatt, Mr Tejpal held my arm and pulled me back into the lift. He said—"Let's go wake up Bob" (Mr De Niro) and I asked him why he wanted to do that. I then realized that Mr Tejpal was simply pressing buttons on the lift's panel to make the elevator stay in circuit, preventing it from stopping anywhere, and for the doors to open.
>
> At this point, he began to kiss me—from the first moment of his doing so, I asked him to stop, citing several reasons, including my friendship to Tiya, my closeness to his family, the fact that he had known me since I was a child, the fact that I worked for Tehelka and for Shoma Chaudhuri—who is my managing editor and mentor. It was like talking to a deaf person. Mr Tejpal lifted my dress up, went down on his knees and pulled my underwear down. He attempted to perform oral sex on me as I continued to struggle and hysterically asked him to stop. At that moment he began to try and penetrate me with his fingers, I became scared and pushed him hard and asked him to stop the lift. He would not listen. The lift stopped on the ground floor as Mr Tejpal's hands were on me and could not press the button for yet another floor to keep it in circuit. As soon as the doors opened, I picked up my underwear and began walking out of the elevator rapidly—he was still following me, asking me what the matter was.

Now, India is a paranoid country as far as women's issues are concerned. It considers itself as a global power, but large-scale poverty and corruption, along with its more than 1 billion population, keeps this country often in bad news in the international media. While the Government and media shield rich and powerful criminals, they harass and torture innocent poor and weak men using the police and courts. If a man breaks up with with his psycho girlfriend of 2 months, the police keep harassing him and the courts may charge him under an absurd statute called, "rape with the false promise of marriage".

> A 22-year-old software engineer was arrested on Sunday by Noida police for having a physical relationship with his colleague on the pretext of marriage.(link)

However, the same Government, liberals and feminists try to shield rich and powerful men. The poor and weak men are made to pay the price in loss of civil liberties.

At the end of the day, it is the male Presidents, CEOs, Media Moguls and the rich and powerful donors who help feminism grow. So, feminists have these strange (or not-so-strange?) allegiances. Powerful men and women together blame ordinary men by spreading misandry throughout society, generating a corrupt but effective synergy. The rich and powerful get to keep weaker men oppressed using feminist governance to increase their social hegemony over the masses.

In India, modern feminists have formed an unholy alliance with the age-old slave owners of Indian society. Both complement each other as they oppress the poor and socially downtrodden, while safeguarding their own interests, making sure they are immune for any crimes that they commit. (Link)

> The location of the alleged crime: Hyatt, Goa, Day 1 of Think Fest 2013 organised by the magazine. The setting: a panel discussion on 'The Beast In Our Midst: Rape Survivors Speak Their Stories'.
>
> Shoma Chaudhury, as moderator, began sombrely, stating how 98 per cent of the rapes that take place are by perpetrators known to the victim. "We never look at how deeply misogynistic and prejudiced our own society is," she said as she turned the spotlight "on our own silences and to deepen our understanding of how complicit we are about the beast in our midst."

Yet this feminist tried her best to cover up for her boss. Tarun Tejpal has not yet been arrested. The victim has not yet filed a complaint. In such situations, rich people tend to pay huge sums of money to stop the victim from complaining. But, per these emails, a crime has almost certainly occurred, and it requires investigation. A case of rape can not be withdrawn by a complainant in India if the police have evidence. Due process of law is supposed to be followed.

The accused in this case is being treated far, far better than he has advocated other men be treated. Should this really surprise us?

References:

1) http://www.ndtv.com/article/india/tarun-tejpal-s-email-to-young-journalist-full-text-449855

2) http://www.firstpost.com/politics/full-text-tejpal-sexual-assault-victims-resignation-letter-1250043.html

3) http://www.firstpost.com/india/tehelka-shoma-chaudhurys-problem-is-her-journalism-of-outrage-1245087.html

4) http://www.indianexpress.com/news/tehelka-case-day-after-the-crime-the-same-shoma-reflected-on-the-beast-in-our-midst/1198153/

5) http://newindianexpress.com/thesundaystandard/The-victims-letter-to-Shoma-Chaudhuri/2013/11/24/article1907442.ece

6) http://www.hindustantimes.com/india-news/tehelka-is-not-hushing-up-allegations-against-tejpal-shoma-chaudhury/article1-1154383.aspx

7) http://timesofindia.indiatimes.com/videos/news/Tehelka-sexual-assault-case-Victims-claim-a-lie-says-Shoma/videoshow/26374171.cms

(Hear about Feminist principles by Shoma Chaudhury)

8) http://www.dailymail.co.uk/indiahome/indianews/article-2512487/Tehelka-journalist-received-intimidating-visit-Tejpals-family-trying-scare-harassment-allegations.html

9)
http://www.dnaindia.com/india/report-woman-journalist-s-mother-files-police-complaint-against-tarun-tejpal-s-family-member-1925399

Russian female soldiers, 1917-1919

Robert St. Estephe · 26 November 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Robert St. Estephe–Gonzo Historian–is dedicated to uncovering the forgotten past of marginalizing men. "Gonzo journalism" is characterized as tending "to favor style over fact to achieve accuracy." Yet history – especially "social history" – is written by ideologues who distort and bury facts in order to achieve an agenda. "Gonzo" writing is seen as unorthodox and surprising. Yet, in the 21st century subjectivity, distortion and outright lying in non-fiction writing is the norm. Fraud is the new orthodoxy. Consequently, integrity is the new "transgressive."

Welcome to the disruptive world of facts, the world of Gonzo History.

•?•

NOTE: "We can do it!" was a slogan used by the U.S. government during World War II to promote women's participation in industrial jobs (within the safe confines of the combat-free homeland) in support of the war effort. The slogan, along with the graphic image accompanying it, has since been taken up by gender ideologues as an expression of female capability in general. In the following article we see an example of female capability in the martial arena within the Russian civil war, where female members of the Bolshevik communist army (the revolutionary extremists) showed themselves to be more reliable than their male counterparts when given instructions to commit war crimes.

[image]

FULL TEXT: Helsingfors – A terrible story illustrating the nature of the war waged by the Bolshevists is recounted by a traveler from Riga. Toward the end of the Bolshevist rule in that city, before the Lottish Red leader Stutska, fled on May 22, companies of women were formed as Red Guards. Their duty was to carry out executions when the men refused that dreadful duty. Nearly 100 executions are known to have been carried out by these murderesses. When the Reds abandoned Riga the women were dressed up as nurses. Anti-Red troops on meeting the women in nurse's uniform examined their hair. If it had been cut short they were arrested, as the presumption was that they had been soldiers. If found guilty of crime they were shot.

["Women In Firing Squad In Russia," The Newburgh Daily News (N.Y.), Aug. 13, 1919, p. 5]

•?•

Here is a little bit of information from two years earlier on the Russian military's use of female soldiers in the Great War before civil war broke out in that country. The leader of this effort was anti-Bolshevik tough gal Vera Butchkaroff.

[image]

Men's Human Rights Advocates will recognize the use of the shaming tactic, a method of exploiting chivalric tendencies, that was also used at the same time in England, in the guise of "White Feather Campaign," to coax men into running off to war.

Wikipedia excerpts: Women's Battalions were all-female combat units formed after the February Revolution by the Russian Provisional Government in a last-ditch effort to inspire the mass of war-weary soldiers to continue fighting in World War I. In the spring of 1917, male shock units and battalions of death were created from pools of enthusiastic volunteers to lead the way in battle. Already some women had successfully petitioned to join regular military units, and now a number began pressing the new Provisional Government to create special women's battalions. These women, along with a number of high-ranking members of the Russian government and military administration, believed that female soldiers would have significant propaganda value and that their example would revitalize the weary, demoralized men of the Russian army. Simultaneously, they hoped the presence of women would shame hesitant male soldiers into resuming their combat duties.

After the 1st Russian Women's Battalion of Death failed to have the intended effect of revitalizing the war-weary elements of the Russian army the military authorities began to question the value of the women's units. In particular, the government found it difficult to justify the allocation of badly needed resources to such an unreliable project. By August 1917, there was a growing inclination in the military establishment to discontinue the organization of women for combat purposes.

•?•

[image]

FULL TEXT: Petrograd, July 27. – When the Russian women's battalion, known officially as the "Command of Death," went into action against the Germans near Smorgon July 25 they captured a number of women from whom it was learned for the first time that German women also were fighting on the battle-front in Western Russia.

The wounded heroines of the women's battalion arrived in Petrograd today leaving their commander, Vera Butchkareff, and Marya Skydloff, former commander of the Baltic fleet and Minister of the Marine, in hospital at Vitebsk. Interviewed, the women said it was reported that of the 200 of the command who reached the front only 50 remained. Twenty were killed, eight were taken prisoner, and all the rest were wounded.

"Several times," said one wounded girl," we attacked the Germans. Especially memorable was our attack at Novospassky Wood, near Smorgon, where the enemy hearing the voices of girls lost their nerve. The result was that many of them were killed, wounded, or taken prisoner. Among the prisoners were a few women, from whom we learned for the first time that German women also were fighting.

"We did not feel the slightest fear for our personal; safety. Our passion was to serve the fatherland. We advanced gaily against the foe with laughter and song, our only unpleasant sentiments being when we first came to the corpses. Once, when replying to the enemy's severe rifle and machine gun fire, we discovered to our amazement that all our men comrades in the neighboring trenches had treacherously fled, leaving us – a handful of women – to face the enemy alone."

["German Women Fighting As Soldiers – Members of Russian Women's Battalion Tell of Capturing Some Near Smorgon." New York Times (N.Y.), Jul. 29, 1917, p. ?]

•?•

[image]

FULL TEXT: Petrograd, June 22 – In a couple of weeks the first battalion of women soldiers expects to go to the front as an object lesson to malingerers and peacemongers. It is worth noting that the recruits to the so-called "Battalions of Death" are most exclusively women and girls of the educated classes.

The women responsible for the Amazonian "battalions of death" movement, began their propaganda of patriotism by a strongly worded and passionate appeal to Russian womanhood, to Russian soldiers, to soldiers and politicians at the front, and to those who wear soldier's uniforms in the rear.

The women of Russia are summoned, in the name of those millions of fathers, sons, and brothers who freely shed their blood before the Petrograd revolution happened, to remember those sacrifices and losses.

True soldiers who have not danced to the piping of the enemy or sold to Germans food taken from the mouths of their children are reminded that every day's standing idle costs Russia $25,000,000. the appeal proceeds:

"You are eating up your country. Know you that the last hopes are fainting in our hearts and that we weak women will turn like tigresses in defense of our homes and children and Russian liberty? Woe unto you if you earn our scorn! And you others, soldiers in name but Judases in fact, who are selling Russia to the foe, know that the time will soon be at hand when it would be better for you to face ten German bayonets and the curse she lays upon you.

"You who make war without annexation and contributions, but expect tribute from your own native towns and eat up your own country, take heed and be wise betimes. Your 'brotherhood of nations' is a jest for the enemy, who still occupies our soil. Until you march against the foe and enter his towns and capitals with flags flying and overturn with your bayonets the throne of Wilhelm, we have no words for you but cowards, traitors and Judases.

"We, your mothers, wives, and sisters, know one party only – the liberty and glory of great Russia. We know only one platform – our country and our homes and the future of our children. Forward upon our foe! We come to die by your side!"

[image]

Another appeal is addressed to workmen, bidding them take example from what the Germans are practicing, though their agents in Russia here preach something very different.

"The Germans," says the appeal, "whether in soldier's uniform or workman's blouse, all are alike in fighting their fatherland and not talking about 'socialistic heavens' and strangling industry and commerce by exorbitant demands."

Finally, there is an open letter to the women of the Allies begging them to have patience for a time, for if Russian men betray the common cause the women of Russia will save it.

["Russian Women Warriors Denounce Men; Bid Slackers Beware of 'Tigress Mothers,'" (from The London Morning Post), New York Times (N.Y.), Jun. 25, 1917, p. 1]

•?•

[image]

FULL TEXT: Petrograd, Sept. 20 – A small riot occurred to-day in the ranks of the Women's Battalion drilling at Moscow and it resulted in an attack by the girls upon Vera Butchkaroff, the twice-wounded girl officer who initiated the woman suffrage soldier organizations. According to the Boston Gazette, an infantry man rescued Commander Butchkaroff after some rough handling from the infuriated girls, who resented some acts of their leader not clearly defined.

In a second riot a crowd of women wrecked the militia headquarters and had beaten to death a government agent who had shot into the crowd before they had shot into the crowd before they were dispersed by mounted militia and Cossacks.

["Russian Women's Battalion Riot – Corps Drilling at Moscow Make Attack Upon Vera Butchkaroff, the Twice-Wounded Girl Officer," syndicated, Quebec Telegraph (Montreal, Quebec, Canada), Sep. 21, 1917, p. 9]

•?•

[image]

Dude, where's my courtship?

Mark Trueblood · 26 November 2013 · Archived copy · Original

The strong and independent daughters of the glorious gender revolution have a problem: Attractive men aren't courting them anymore.

The always-excellent Dalrock posted a recent blog on why some women aren't getting the courtship to which they feel entitled. His analysis focuses on the economic realities of modern dating, and I agree with many of his points. But I think there's another reason why more men aren't courting women.

They believe in gender equality.

Courtship and chivalry are fundamentally incompatible with notions of gender equality. And if there is one thing that modern women say they want, it is gender equality. As well as the need to be "free" from traditional gender roles. Despite this, a couple generations of women have been able to cherry-pick from traditional and modern gender roles if they so choose. Many men, due to their desperation for female approval and traditional social conditioning, continued traditional courtship behaviors decades after the feminist movement started agitating for equality.

But it turns out that when you tell some men you are strong, independent, and equal, they will believe you. It also happens that some men may be enthused by the idea of evolving their traditional gender roles. They no longer feel the obligation to demonstrate subservient provider capacity by wooing ladies with gifts and free entertainment. They are perceptive enough to know that courtship behavior is asking to get treated like a chump. They expect women to play an equal role in the courtship, and they're perfectly happy to say "NEXT!" if she's unwilling to reciprocate.

There are many women who are totally cool with this, and they go on to build fulfilling relationships with like-minded folks. However, as the constant wailing of "Where have the good men gone" indicates, gender equality doesn't sit well with many. Hear their lamentations! A gynocentric traditionalist woman shoves a shame sandwich at men, and a young woman bemoans the struggles of making men pay for something she used to happily give away.

If women are strong, independent, and self-reliant, then men are no longer obligated to be protectors and providers. If the genders are equal, women are not more inherently valuable than men. Some men and women counter this with an appeal to biological assets. If you think women's bodies make them entitled to special treatment, then don't be surprised if men treat dating like a sexual supermarket. If you think women are entitled to special treatment because "that's the way things should be" I urge you to realize the ship has sailed on that BS and shall never return.

Let's do away with expectations of courtship, and promote reciprocity instead. Couples should do nice things for each other. If a woman does something nice for a man, he should reciprocate. If a man does something nice for her, he should look for it to be reciprocated somehow. Note that having sex does not entitle women to payment, any more than men are entitled to sex for taking a woman out to dinner. If you think sex in dating relationships deserves payment, I'll again suggest that you shouldn't be surprised if men treat dating like a sexual supermarket.

I adamantly reject wrongheaded expectations placed on gender, and I encourage all men and women to do the same. I don't say this because I "hate" or "disrespect" women. I say it because I like women and strongly believe they are as capable as any man of being a self-reliant adult.

CAFE Interviews Karen Straughan aka GirlWritesWhat

AVfM Video Source · 26 November 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Our friends at the Canadian Association For Equality (CAFE) have a sit-down interview with AVfM contributing editor Karen Straughan.

Karen makes a few particularly salient points about how avoiding people's delicate ladylike sensibilities doesn't get you very far, we think.

You might want to subscribe to CAFE's channel.

By the way, congrats to CAFE for meeting their fundraising goal.

The feminist deliverer of diabetes

AVfM Video Source · 26 November 2013 · Archived copy · Original

We have a new feminist in town. The bubbly Mariam is out to correct misconceptions about feminism by making us associate the dogma with rainbows, cookies and flowers (no, seriously). Zen rapes Mariam's arguments, because that's what patriarchs do. Zen has also subscribed to Mariam to get new material when he gets writer's block.

https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=gTqgQZIqAGw

From the lowbar:

http://www.avoiceformen.com/feminism/resolved-feminism-is-evil/

http://exposingfeminism.wordpress.com/the-ten-most-common-feminist-myths/http://digitalcommons.lmu.edu/cgi/viewcontent.cgi?article=2216&context=llr http://www.womenagainstmen.com/media/feminism-is-a-hate-group.html http://www.avoiceformen.com/feminism/welcome-to-sweden-where-man-beating-is-sport/http://www.theatlantic.com/sexes/archive/2013/03/women-own-1-of-world-property-a-feminist-myth-that-wont-die/273840/

http://www.avoiceformen.com/suggested-reading/eu-to-ban-anti-feminist-speech/

Quote Kelly Mac: "If you're going to say feminism is not a man-hating movement, I'm going to have to insist that you provide links either to sites showing feminists condemning the statements listed above, or feminists telling women to respect men as men."

If you have not subscribed to Victor Zen, do so now. There's more of this evil ginger where that came from.

Gals already dominate the other 364 days of the year – but men SHOULD support International Women's Day

John Ridgeway · 27 November 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Gentlemen, gather round. We have a problem.

The problem is women. They are in crisis. Dreadful things are afoot for them, and they need our help.

Despite 6,000 years of men protecting and dying for them, despite the fact a mere 16 per cent of men gain custody in child custody cases, despite women having a higher life expectancy globally, and despite the fact that men get higher criminal sentences than women even when all other factors are accounted for, women are not happy.

It's not just because no-one's invented the self-mowing lawn yet, nor because they are more selfish than men and more likely to bad-mouth their friends.

Nor are they unhappy for the more serious and important reason that women are being bluntly told, by feminists, that they should not have bodily freedom in, for example, the sex industry.

They are not particularly bothered about the fact they are less likely to earn as much money in their lifetime as men and less likely to run for and be voted into political positions, because they still control the vast majority of the purchasing power in the western world.

Anyone who can manage that while doing barely any of the dangerous jobs and being so narcissistic as to barely notice the fact is doing pretty well.

No, they're unhappy because they get patronised too much.

They even feel like they're being discriminated against. That men are happier and more privileged, and what's more manage to be this way even when they make up 90% of the homeless and prison population and the vast majority of suicides.

Sneaky us. I hadn't even noticed, but then I was busy mutilating my penis into genitalia women would approve of, and that makes me seem manly yet hygeinic, ditching that smegma and paying the vast majority of the tax burden so women can menstruate.

Me and my privilege.

Anyway, women have started a campaign for some long-overdue recognition. It's called International Women's Day and it happens every March 8.

Now, I know there may be some among the brotherhood who'd complain they've already got the other 364 days a year. And they'd have a point.

But we don't have a perfect world, as all the above has shown. And we must start somewhere.

There can be no harm in recognising mums are just as useful as dads, that gender-specific diseases like cervical cancer need to be stopped, that women too can be victims of violence and suicide.

No-one sane can possibly have a problem praising the value of someone being a generally good gal – whether it's to her dad, her partner, her children, or the world at large.

It would be mean of us to say the gals behind this movement must have never been outdoors if they claim "women are the primary victims of war. Women lose their husbands, their fathers, their sons in combat".

It would be unkind to point out that their objections to the fact 'men make sacrifices every day in their place of work… for their families, friends, communities and nation', based on their opinion that it "applies just as much to women", ignores that men are the vast majority of workplace casualties and fatalities.

And it would be cruel of us to mock them just because the best person they could think of as a ‘positive role model’ is blogger-turned-“gamer”, Anita Sarkesian.

No, men, we are above all that. We can see the bigger picture, and we can and should support International Women’s Day in every way that we can.

We should support anything which might, one day, lead women who make false rape accusations to be held accountable.

We should throw ourselves behind a day that might prompt women into speaking out about rape myths, and perhaps taking a day off from bigoted propaganda such as “Schrodinger’s Rapist”.

If it grows and is a success then maybe in the future International Women’s Day will be the one day a year when women campaign against the recruitment of boys as soldiers, male genital mutilation, male suicide and persecution in the courts, as well as their cervixes, lack of political accomplishment and failure at entreprenurial ventures.

Perhaps one or two of them might even urge others not to demonise every man not to their taste who approaches them as “a creep” or “rapey”, while fully expecting and hoping for a Brad Pitt-lookalike to do exactly the same thing.

Think of that – one day when women urge one another to be better than they are, and insist that every person is treated equally regardless of their gender.

Wouldn’t it be lovely?

One day when all women earn their fair share of the income, refrain from shaming young men and boys into war, and chant ‘I must not use the word “manflu” ever, if I want my partner to look after his health’.

So, women, knock yourselves out. Have your day, do your best, overcome what you can. I’ll cheer you on, in fact I’ll even fill your car with petrol and help you with your placards.

While you’re off dealing with that, we men will just get on with everything else.

Don’t hurry back.

Note: this is a satire in response to Susie Boniface. –DE

Is Maureen Dowd necessary?

Diana Davison · 27 November 2013 · Archived copy · Original

I really don't think that she is.

I understand that she is not literally disposable but I don't think we need her writing in a prestigious publication like The New York Times, and here is why.

In 2005 Maureen had a book published entitled "Are Men Necessary?" In 2013 she had an article published in The Globe and Mail entitled "Maureen Dowd: Men have not only stopped evolving – they're devolving" which started "Are men necessary? No."

After eight years all Maureen has come up with is one more word.

Good authors like to remind people that they've written something else when people want to talk about eight year old projects. Bad authors like to remind people what they wrote eight years ago. The fact that Maureen has nothing new to offer us has been noticed before.

Maureen's main focus is to write silly sentences. She's not so much interested in what those sentences say when put together. For example, she claims that men are "devolving" because they are acting like women. That she just claimed women are lower on the evolutionary scale does not concern Maureen because she's in it for the sentences. Apparently her editors don't care if those sentences link together either.

The one thing we can glean from Maureen's ramblings is that she doesn't understand evolution. After all, she is just an entertainer using old material.

Devolution is a concept used by people who think "that evolution must mean 'progress' to 'more advanced' organisms." The term is mostly used by creationists. Johann Friedrich Blumenbach promoted the theory believing that Adam and Eve both existed, were white, and other ethnicities were a devolution. In his classification of how the various ethnic groups devolved he said "I have allotted the first place to the Caucasian because this stock displays the most beautiful race of men."

When Maureen does write something intelligent, it's a good idea to make sure she hasn't plagiarized it. Despite winning a Pulitzer Prize for writing about Bill Clinton's blowjob (apparently Pulitzer needs to worry about their standards as well) she hasn't learned how to credit other writers for their work.

Maureen is either lazy, sloppy, dishonest, or a genuine cunt. Why pick just one?

For those who have low standards and like to cling to the predictable, Maureen Dowd is definitely your woman. Her tactic of belittling men by calling them "girly" is her standard recipe for cheap laughs. She was criticized by Ann Bartow for this tired routine in 2006 and yet here she is trying to tell us it's still funny in 2013.

I have a theory about Maureen Dowd that explains her columns.

I suspect that Maureen has all of her old articles on a computer program and doesn't actually write them any more. The computer picks out words and phrases reassembles them for her, then she slaps today's date on it. That also explains why her articles don't quite make sense. Garbage in, garbage out.

Maureen Dowd is a bot.

In case you think I'm exaggerating, here are some passages from "Are Men Necessary?" written in 2005 and the comparison passage from her Globe and Mail article in 2013. Let's play a game called "I don't see the difference, do you? "

> "[Manly discourse] was, unlike the feminine chatter in the parlor, thought to be impersonal, unemotional, forthright and reasonable.

> For centuries, it was widely believed that women's physical makeup made them emotionally unfit to be leaders.
> Dowd, Maureen. Are Men Necessary?. (New York: Berkley Books, 2005), 79

compared to

> For centuries, it was widely thought that women were biologically unsuited to hold leadership positions.
>
> Power was best wielded by men, theorists felt, because men were impersonal, unemotional, forthright and reasonable.
> "Maureen Dowd: Men have not only stopped evolving – they're devolving", 2013

You'll note that the only real change was that she (or the computer program) flipped the order of the sentences and used a thesaurus to alter a couple of words.

> Aristotle observed that women's minds should be kept free from exertion because "children evidently draw on the mother who carries them in her womb, just as plants draw on the soil." Darwin said that while the female spent her energy forming her ova, the male spent "much force in fierce contests with his rivals."
> Dowd, Maureen. Are Men Necessary?. (New York: Berkley Books, 2005), 80

compared to

> Aristotle wrote that women's minds should be kept free from exertion because "children evidently draw on the mother who carries them in her womb, just as plants draw on the soil." Darwin observed that while the female spent her energy forming her ova, the male spent "much force in fierce contests with his rivals."
> "Maureen Dowd: Men have not only stopped evolving – they're devolving", 2013

She (or the bot) merely changed "observed" to "wrote" and "said" to "observed".

> Even as late as 1970, Dr. Edgar F. Berman, Hubert Humphrey's personal physician and an official on a national policy-making committee of the Democratic Party, declared that his "scientific position" was that "women are different physically, physiologically and psychically."
>
> "If doctors do not know that there is such a thing as premenstrual tension," he huffed, "they'd better go back to medical school."
> Dowd, Maureen. Are Men Necessary?. (New York: Berkley Books, 2005), 80

compared to

> Even as late as 1970, after the social revolution of the 60s, Dr. Edgar F. Berman, Hubert Humphrey's personal physician and an official on a national policy-making committee of the Democratic Party, declared that his "scientific position" was that "women are different physically, physiologically and psychically." "If doctors do not know that there is such a thing as premenstrual tension," he said, huffily, "they'd better go back to medical school."
> "Maureen Dowd: Men have not only stopped evolving – they're devolving", 2013

The Maureenbot added "after the social revolution of the 60s" and turned "he huffed" into "he said huffily".

> When his words caused a furor among women and he was forced to resign, he ruefully observed: "Pandora's box is no tender trap."
> But at long last, the tables have turned.
> Dowd, Maureen. Are Men Necessary?. (New York: Berkley Books, 2005), 80

compared to

> He stuck to his guns even after his remarks caused such a furor that he had to resign. He left his job with this parting shot: "Pandora's box is no tender trap."
> But the tables have finally turned.
> "Maureen Dowd: Men have not only stopped evolving – they're devolving", 2013

The bot got clever here substituting the "forced" part from the original with "stuck to his guns" but loved the last sentence too much to change it. Are bots capable of "love"?

> Now it is unstable male temperament that is causing alarm…
> Men are engaging in shrewish, scolding, clawing, vengeful, sneaky, vain behaviour that is anything but reasonable and impersonal. Women are affected by lunar tides only once a month; men have raging hormones every day."
> Dowd, Maureen. Are Men Necessary?. (New York: Berkley Books, 2005), 80-1

compared to

> Now it is unstable male temperament that is causing alarm.
> Male politicians are engaging in sneaky, catty, weepy, ditzy, shrewish behaviour that is anything but reasonable and impersonal.
> Women are affected by lunar tides only once a month, after all. Men have raging hormones every day…
> "Maureen Dowd: Men have not only stopped evolving – they're devolving", 2013

The bot kept "shrewish" and "catty", changed three adjectives, and dropped one. I guess six adjectives became passé in the last near decade.

I'll spare you the rest of the article, which is entirely just a copy of 2005's Chapter Two: Why Pandora's Box Is No Tender Trap". Ultimately, the point here is that The Globe and Mail should sue Maureen Dowd for fraud. They paid her for an article "special to The Globe and Mail" and she gave them something already published elsewhere for which she'd already been paid.

To show this isn't a single transgression, the next article Maureen submitted, "Why the Y?" in The New York Times on November 24th, is barely a rewrite of 2005's Chapter Four: Why The Well-hung Y Is Wilting, Even As The X Is Excelling. The New York Times needs to fire Maureen Dowd on the grounds that we've already read the book.

So, is Maureen Dowd necessary when we've got a perfectly good bot doing her job for her?

No.

Maureen is so unnecessary that I debated whether or not to bother writing about her this week. Given her history, I could save my notes, publish it eight weeks or eight years from now, and it would still be just as relevant. At least, this time, Dowd only copy/pasted herself.

Heretics declare women have agency

AVfM Video Source · 27 November 2013 · Archived copy · Original

The Independent Women's Forum, a hotbed of brainwashed women, actually thinks women's choices affect how much they earn!

I think we need to keep a close eye on these heretical women. –DE

Male Domestic Abuse – one man's story (Curled Up)

AVfM Video Source · 27 November 2013 · Archived copy · Original

A moving and impressive video from the folks at Mankind Initiative.

Subscribe to Maxade147.

An open letter to Natasha Stott Despoja

Greg Canning · 28 November 2013 · Archived copy · Original

28 Nov 2013

Dear Ms. Stott Despoja,

I refer to the address you gave at the National Press Club on behalf of the Foundation to Prevent Violence Against Women and their Children (27 Nov 2013)[1].

Firstly let me say that I strongly support preventing violence and I do understand that violence against women and children is an important issue that needs to be addressed.

Violence or abuse of any type is unacceptable in a civil society. However, framing domestic violence, family violence, intimate partner violence, child abuse, elder abuse and sexual assault as "violence against women and their children" (a term you further entrenched today by repeating it 17 times in your address) contravenes principles of equality, tolerance and understanding by viewing all such violence as part of a false dichotomy, reinforcing essentialist stereotypes of violent male perpetrators and passive female victims.

For over 50 years this feminist theory (the Duluth Model, a gendered paradigm) has guided policy and service delivery in Australia and other developed nations. Yet, given the "shocking statistics" you quoted, can it be seen as anything other than an abject failure?

Perhaps you can explain why, when quoting from gender inclusive data sources such as the National Homicide Monitoring Program and the ABS Personal Safety Survey you find it necessary to ignore a principle you otherwise exposé, gender equality, by only citing the data for female victimization?

For example you state:

"89 Australian women were killed by their partners between 2008 and 2010; that's nearly one woman every week in that two year period," yet the report from which that statistic is taken[2] also notes that of the 541 victims killed throughout 2008–10, 68% were male and 32% were female.

In relation to domestic homicide the same report found that throughout 2008–10, of the 194 victims who were killed by an offender with whom they shared a principal domestic relationship, 39% of these victims were male, while 61% were female.

With respect to intimate partner homicide although female's accounted for 73 % of victims (the 89 deaths you quoted), this still means males make up almost 1/3 of victims.

Data for the period 2006-07 found that 48.7% (almost one in two) adult victims of family homicide and 35.4% (over one in three) victims of intimate partner homicide were male.[3]

That's one Australian man killed by an intimate partner or family member every 2 weeks.

The executive summary of the National Homicide Monitoring Program clearly states, "Female victimisation decreased from 1.0 per 100,000 (n=112) females in 2007–08, to an historic low of 0.7 per 100,000 (n=80) females in 2008–09. However, females remain overrepresented as victims of intimate partner homicide." (Emphasis added)

Despite your rhetoric of an epidemic of violence against women, violence is not a contagion and epidemics are not characterized by historic low mortality rates.

You proceeded to quote data from the ABS Personal Safety Survey[4]:

"1 in 3 women experience physical violence; and almost 1 in 5 women experience sexual violence since the age of 15”

Regarding violence overall, in the 12 months prior to the survey, it was estimated that 5.8% women experienced an incident of violence compared to 11% of men, whilst since age 15 the rates are 39.9% of women and 50.1% of men.

The same survey also found 29.8% (almost one in three) victims of current partner violence since the age of 15 were male and 24.4% (almost one in four) victims of previous partner violence since the age of 15 were male.

With respect to sexual assault 29.4% victims of sexual assault during the last 12 months were male and 26.1% victims of sexual abuse before the age of 15 were male. The Personal Safety Survey does not include the prison population where it is estimated that a quarter of young male prison inmates experience sexual assault.[5]

It is true that men account for a majority of the perpetrators of violence overall with the survey finding that people were three times more likely to experience violence by a man than by a woman. Nonetheless a 25% rate of female perpetration is not an insignificant proportion. Men who were physically assaulted by a male perpetrator were more likely to have been assaulted at licensed premises (34%) or in the open (35%), however if the perpetrator was female then 77% of the physical assaults occurred in the home.

It is fashionable to minimize and conceal the plight of male victims behind statements such as the “vast majority” of violence is perpetrated by men, a curious view that would be seen as unethical if applied on the basis of other discriminators such as race or religion. Unfortunately this preconception denies male victims and their children access to much needed services just as it denies female perpetrators access to suitable rehabilitation and most importantly denies mutually violent couples (the largest group) who wish to remain together access to couples therapy. This represents gender discrimination, not equality. Are not all victims equally deserving of compassion and care regardless of gender or other discriminators?

Perhaps the most malevolent misrepresentation however was the isolated use of this half-truth:

“in a survey of 5000 young Australians, 23% had witnessed physical domestic violence against their mothers.”

The Crime Prevention Survey (2001) [6] surveyed young people aged 12 to 20 and actually found that while 23% of young people were aware of domestic violence against their mothers or step-mothers by their fathers or step-fathers, an almost identical proportion (22%) of young people were aware of domestic violence against their fathers or step-fathers by their mothers or step-mothers.

Much more common and damaging than either male-to-female or female-to-male unilateral violence was mutual (or reciprocal) couple violence with the authors concluding “the most severe disruption on all available indicators occurred in households where couple violence was reported.” The study also noted that an almost identical proportion of young females (16%) and young males (15%) answered, “yes” to the statement “I’ve experienced domestic violence.”

Indeed the rates of violence in teen and dating relationships are confronting. The Crime Prevention Survey (2001) also found that one in three females and males say they have experienced at least one type of physically violent behaviour from a girlfriend or boyfriend – this included children as young as 12. The Secondary Students Survey of Sexual Health (2008)[7] reported that amongst young people who experienced sex when they did not want to, one third were male.

As a physician I certainly concur with your assertion that primary prevention is the ideal focus for reducing violence in our society and a huge part of this will as you note depend on education around respectful relationships and promoting gender equality. Yet I fear you and others who advocate only for action to prevent violence against women and their children do not understand that respect and gender equality are reciprocal ideals.

If you have studied some of the programs that purport to encourage respectful relationships in schools you will know that many are rooted in the same gendered paradigm acknowledging only male abusers and female victims. I can assure you that shaming boys and young men as abusers and rapists in waiting and promoting the flow of respect in only one direction is the antithesis of true respect and equality.

Most even minded and reasonable individuals I contend would find the statistics about male victimisation equally as disturbing as the ones for women. But public figures such as yourself and campaigns with an exclusive focus on “violence against women and their children” seem intent on keeping the public ignorant of these particular “dirty little secrets.”

The willful denial of such evidence by the domestic violence sector, in my view, will continue to make the goal of lives free from violence unattainable for men, women and children. One thing is certain violence is an inter-generational relationship dysfunction of complex aetiology, requiring a complex inclusive response rather than ongoing blind adherence to a failed gendered paradigm.

Open up the discourse, embrace principles such as equality, tolerance and understanding from all perspectives and the ideal will certainly come closer to reality.

Yours faithfully,

Dr. Greg Canning

Advocate for Men and Boys

[1] http://www.preventviolence.org.au/media.htm

[2] Chan, A and Payne, J (2013). Homicide in Australia: 2008–09 to 2009-10 National Homicide Monitoring Program annual report. Canberra. Australian Institute of Criminology. http://www.aic.gov.au/media_library/publications/ mr/21/mr21.pdf

[3] Dearden, J., & Jones, W. (2008). Homicide in Australia: 2006-07 National Homicide Monitoring Program Annual Report. Canberra: Australian Institute of Criminology.

[4] Australian Bureau of Statistics (2006). Personal Safety Survey Australia: 2005 reissue 4906.0.

[5] Heilpern, D. (2005). Sexual assault of prisoners: Reflections. University of New South Wales Law Journal, 28(1), 286-292.

[6] National Crime Prevention (2001). Young people and domestic violence : National research on young people’s attitudes to and experiences of domestic violence. Barton: Attorney-General’s Dept.

[7] Smith A, Agius P, Mitchell A, Barrett C, Pitts M. 2009. Secondary Students and Sexual Health 2008, Monograph Series No. 70, Melbourne: Australian Research Centre in Sex, Health & Society, La Trobe University.

DownUnderThink (Part 2)

Jim Muldoon · 28 November 2013 · Archived copy · Original

This is the second of a three-part article looking at the work of the social engineers in the State of Victoria here in Australia.

The first part examined the removal of the common law partial defence for murder known as "Provocation," and the fiasco of introducing and subsequently abolishing "Defensive Homicide" in its place. Foremost in their minds was to allow for women who killed "in response to family violence."

We will now examine some actual Australian legal cases to see the impact:

First, let me explain how these cases are referred to. In criminal cases in Australia, the state takes the accused to trial so it is common to refer to the accused's surname as the name of the case. So for example we will refer to each case by the surname of the accused in italics to distinguish between the case and the actual person. For example: Creamer, the case, and Creamer, the accused individual.

Moffa was heard in 1977. Michele "Mick" Moffa, an Australian man of Italian origin, was found guilty of murdering his wife, Kay. He successfully appealed the conviction, having the murder charge downgraded to manslaughter on the grounds of provocation.

The case is often cited in other cases because the ruling in Moffa set the precedent of allowing what we now call "racial vilification" as grounds for provocation. However, it is also a case where a man, angered by his wife's confessions of "screwing with everybody in the street" with nude photographs to back up the claim, lashed out and killed his wife.

Does this mean that any man could claim this partial defence in the event of killing his wife? In Voukelatos, Peter Voukelatos killed his wife in 1987 by shooting her once in the leg and once in the back. Voukelatos provided an expert witness to prove that his Greek heritage meant that his wife's unfaithfulness would have been a source of great shame for him. It made no difference to the verdict. Voukelatos was found guilty of murder, and his appeal was denied.

Do all murder cases revolve on husbands killing their wives? Consider Johnson, where the brothers, Peter and Phillip, killed their father Ken Johnson. The brothers, then aged 19 and 16 respectively, had an ongoing animosity with their father, who was "evidently a heavy drinker and prone to be violent at least when in liquor." He was also "dominating" by nature. At various times Ken had told the boys that they were no longer welcome in the house.

The boys had gone to visit their mother in hospital and came back home late. They had both been drinking. They retired to their respective rooms when their father came out of his and told Peter to leave. Peter told him he had nowhere to go and it was late. He asked if they could stay until morning. Ken shrugged his shoulders and walked away.

Assuming that the father had given his permission, Peter began to undress for bed. Ken returned to the room and attacked Peter. He punched him on the nose, breaking it, and strangled him to the point where Peter turned blue. Phillip, on hearing the commotion, entered the room and came to his brother's aid. The fight which ensued moved from the bedroom to the hallway. Peter heard Ken say he would kill Phillip. At some point Phillip obtained some knives, one of which the father somehow got control of.

Peter was in and out of consciousness and made some effort to aid his younger brother. He received cuts from the knife his father was wielding. Phillip too was stabbed by his father during the fighting. Ultimately, Phillip got Ken to the ground where he repeatedly kicked and jumped on him, killing him. Both boys were charged and convicted of murder. The conviction was eventually reduced to manslaughter on appeal by reason of provocation.

This is exactly the type of family violence by a dominating male that the feminists are supposedly trying to protect women from. Clearly the Johnson brothers, due to their being male, do not count in the social engineers' eyes as worth protecting.

The last case of "provocation" is Ramage, where James Ramage was charged with murder. In this case James Ramage killed his wife, Julie, in 2003. The jury found Mr. Ramage guilty of manslaughter by reason of provocation. It is clear from the judge's comments that he believes the jury was too lenient.

The Ramage marriage was in trouble. Julie had moved out with their daughter, leaving their son with James. They had a number of meetings and some counseling. James was hoping to convince Julie to come back, but Julie had begun a new relationship with another man.

On the fateful day, the couple met at their house that James was renovating in order to woo her back. Julie was not interested in the renovations, or any other attempts to resurrect the marriage. Instead, James said Julie had taunted him, saying that sex with him had always repulsed her and that the new man was better in bed. James Ramage then says he lost control at this point, knocked Julie to the ground and proceeded to strangle her.

The judge had difficulty with the verdict because the taunts seem too mild to provoke such a violent reaction. There are many men who hear such things in the heat of a breakup who do not resort to such violence.

There is a difference between a poor jury decision and a patriarchal "thumbs up" for killing his wife. Ramage did, after all, serve nine years in jail and is now on parole. However, political machinations were already underfoot to remove provocation from the statute books in Victoria, and Ramage was used as proof in the media that the law was needed to be changed. Provocation was out and Defensive Homicide in. Let us now look at what difference this made:

The timing of Claire MacDonald's killing of her husband Warren meant that Defensive Homicide was unavailable for her. Claire tricked Warren to come to a paddock on their property where she lay waiting, in camouflage, with a rifle. She shot him several times, and he bled to death from the wounds.

For her defence, Claire relied on the notion of the "battered wife syndrome." In this, the general thrust is that Claire was trapped by fear generated by her husband's repeated abuse. However, Claire did not seek help from the police or any of the shelters, social workers, government departments, or non-government services that were available. Had she been turned away by any of these, then perhaps her desperation would have been real. Therefore, she had precisely the kind of unreasonable belief that the social engineers were targeting with Defensive Homicide.

At her bail hearing, the judge did discuss the possibility of MacDonald claiming provocation. As it turned out, the jury were swayed by her tales of abuse and found her not guilty of either murder or manslaughter. So if self-defence was applicable in MacDonald, who was Defensive Homicide for?

Eileen Creamer was aware that her husband David was planning to reunite with his first wife. She killed him by beating him senseless with a blunt object. She then stabbed him when he was unable to defend himself. She left him to bleed to death and called the authorities the next day, blaming persons unknown for the crime.

She was found guilty of Defensive Homicide rather than murder. As Kellie Toole points out in "Self-Defence and the Reasonable Woman: Equality before the New Victorian Law", it is difficult to see how the jury reached this verdict. Worse than Ramage, Creamer had blatantly lied in her defence, inventing rape claims on the spur of the moment. Her version of the "struggle" before she killed her husband David was also not seen as credible by the judge.

Again the leniency of the jury was not echoed in the judge's summation. In other words, if Creamer had a belief that her life was in danger, it was too unreasonable to be believed.

Middendorp is one of the cases where the social engineers complain that Patriarchy had outwitted them. By finding a man guilty of Defensive Homicide the jury was supposed giving its approval of violence against women. However, it is impossible to read Middendorp without the words "drugs" and "alcohol" jumping out. That this could be seen as a "Patriarchal power ploy" is pure nonsense. Luke Middendorp and his partner, Jade Bowndes, lived the lives of addled addicts stumbling from one self-created crisis to the next. The relationship was violent, and that violence was reciprocal and fueled by drugs and alcohol.

In its case, the prosecution argued that the violence was one sided, and gave evidence of times when Luke was violent towards Jade. In his defence, Middendorp cited examples of Jade's violence towards him. On both sides, these examples included throats being cut and trips to hospital. Jade had a Family Violence Order out against Luke, and the conditions placed on Luke's home owned by the Salvation Army was that Jade should not live there. None of this stopped Jade repeatedly re-uniting with Luke, including staying at Luke's home.

On the day in question, Jade and a male friend came to Luke's house. Jade, her friend and Luke were intoxicated. Luke initially refused them entry, waving a knife in the process. Nonetheless, Jade and her friend went inside. Shortly afterwards an argument ensued and Luke, again brandishing the knife, chased Jade's friend out of the house and down the road.

Jade remained inside the house and, according to Luke, challenged him with a knife of her own when he returned. In the struggle that followed, Luke reached over Jade's shoulder and stabbed her in the back whilst wrestling Jade's knife out of her hand. Jade then staggered out onto the street where, with Luke berating her, she died.

The jury verdict was guilty of Defensive Homicide. Again, there are difficulties with the verdict, but differently from Ramage, MacDonald, or Creamer.

There is no doubt that Luke was aggressive before and during the deadly fight with Jade. However, there is also no doubt that Jade met this aggression head on. Perhaps here some element of "provocation" would have been a more accurate summary of the circumstances. Enough to reduce a murder charge? Perhaps, but given that the case was fought in the context of "Defensive Homicide," a clear view on that cannot be formed.

In Middendorp and Creamer, we see that the partial defence of provocation, for all of its inadequacies, was superior to the Defensive Homicide substitute. The unreasonable belief in both cases was simply that: unreasonable. In Creamer there was no threat to her life or liberty; in Middendorp, the threat was real, but so was the threat that Luke Middendorp presented to Jade Bowndes.

It is worth noting here that Creamer is still referred to by the Victorian Legal Reform Council as a case of a woman responding to domestic violence. Scandalous!

It is also important to recognize something of a pattern here. In Ramage, the defence brought in expert testimony to buttress the notion that Ramage "snapped." This evidence was given by the psychologist who was counseling the couple. The judge summed this up as Ramage being "extremely anxious, obsessed and emotionally fraught at the disintegration of [the] marriage."

Likewise, in MacDonald, a psychiatrist testified that she fitted the pattern of the "battered wife." Because of her "learned helplessness" she could not seek outside help or leave her husband.

If we take gender out of the equation, the trials became as much about the pain and suffering of the accused at the hands of the victim as it did about the murder of the victim. Similarly, Middendorp and Creamer became more about the couples' unusual history as it did about the killing itself. In all of these cases, the accused tried to become the victim.

The real question, however, is this: at what point do killings like these become community-sanctioned revenge? In fact, the Feminist argument with Ramage is just that: James exacted instant revenge on Julie for wanting to leave him.

However, they won't phrase it that way because, in truth, the "battered women" defence has the same problem. Unless the women are in actual chains, they do have many options to alleviate their situation and prosecute an abusive husband through the courts.

There can be no question that on the day, both Eileen Cramer and Claire MacDonald were in charge of the situation. Like James Ramage, these women could have walked safely away from the scene and simply got on with their lives without their partner. There is no doubt that David Cramer and Warren MacDonald were at their wives' mercy on those respective days.

It is also impossible to see how self-defense in the face of a dominating, larger, more powerful male could be discussed in MacDonald and even, in some circles, Creamer, but not in Johnson. Even in Ramage and Middendorp, their physical size was cited as a reason for a harsher sentence. In particular, why would the sixteen year old Phillip not be eligible for such consideration?

As long as the social engineers continue to base their laws on the flawed logic of Feminism, they will continue to run in circles of new laws – review – new laws – review – ad infinitum. And, as pointed out previously, the reviews are where the social engineers make their money.

It would be foolish indeed to think that this cycle is not deliberate.

In the final, upcoming part of this series, we will examine how this Feminist logic is being applied to the laws concerning sexual assault.

References

1. Moffa: A 1970s case which allowed the provocation defence
2. Voukelatos: The case of a man murdering his wife where the provocation claim failed
3. Johnson: The case of the two brothers killing their father
4. Ramage: The poster case for the abolition of provocation
5. MacDonald: Bail Application
6. Toole, Kellie: Self-Defence and the Reasonable Woman: Equality before the New Victorian Law (includes details of MacDonald as well as Creamer)
7. Women Kills Husband from Sniper's Nest – The Age
8. Abused wife cleared of husband's murder – The Sydney Morning Herald
9. Tears as 'sniper' woman acquitted of murder – The Age
10. Creamer: Verdict – Defensive Homicide for women
11. Creamer: Appeal denied
12. Middendorp: Defensive Homicide for men
13. Middendorp: Appeal
14. Middendorp: Pre-trial arguments

A Thanksgiving reminder

Paul Elam · 28 November 2013 · Archived copy · Original

For those of us in America celebrating this day, and to all of us in this community, a pause to honor Caleb Leverett, his son Parker, and all the men and their children torn apart on a day, like all other days, that they should be together. From AVFM to all alienated Dads and the children they love, we wish you strength and healing. Image from Caleb Leverett.

[image]

His name is Sammy Allouba, actually

Jim Byset · 28 November 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Editor's note: the new blog, Men's Human Rights – Ontario, deserves to be on everyone's reading list. This is one of several strong posts to be found there and AVfM is delighted to reprint it. – AL

THE GLOBE & MAIL is broadly considered as the newspaper of record up here in the Great White North. Their brand of journalism is viewed as socially responsible, liberal, progressive, and intelligent. They don't do kneejerk reactions. They see deeper into issues. They don't involve themselves with titillating gossip, or with the obsessions of the tabloid hoypoloi. Yes – the Globe and Mail are definitely a notch above. Indeed, so committed to equality, and equality of opinion, are the thought leaders at the Globe & Mail that they actually allow readers to submit essays to their website. This democratization of opinion is welcome indeed. Unlike traditional letters pages or comment sections, this allows readers (as writers) to not only form a more substantial piece – but also to form the context of subsequent discussion.

It is truly by, and for, the people.

However, this approach can only be described as truly democratic if it's actually representative. Need it be said, representation is the defining purpose of democracy. Therefore, all opinions should be catered for – even those that our betters at the Globe & Mail might not agree with. But this isn't happening.

It's not happening in the user-submitted content or in the content generally put out by the Globe and Mail, and this is a situation replicated in the liberal media around the world. Despite their claims of adherence to principles of fairness and objectivity, the reality is that they're plainly biased and routinely ignore or demean opinions that differ to theirs.

On November 4 2013, the Globe and Mail published a piece by Wendy MacGregor entitled "I mourn the passing of my dear friend feminism." MacGregor bemoaned the morphing of feminism from something that she perceived as worthwhile, into some kind of drunken, twerking, immature brat. Her article – self-contradictory, illogical, and awash with cringe-inducing pathetic fallacies – was the equivalent of trying to dead-eye a beer can from 100 yards with a blunderbuss.

It was an exercise in futility.

Ms. MacGregor is clearly not a professional journalist, nor does she appear to be a person in the routine habit of writing every day. There's nothing wrong with that. There is a problem though, when the Globe & Mail is willing to publish logically flawed, poorly-written articles. It's an even bigger problem when someone comes along who wants to talk about the flip side to that particular grimy coin – and is ignored.

[image]
Sammy loves dinosaurs – it's true!
Sammy Allouba, 26, is a regular guy. He's not just a regular guy though – he's a nice guy too. He loves dinosaurs, MMA, and is an active and tireless volunteer in his community. He gets up each morning at 5:00am to work a regular, blue collar job. He gives a lot of himself and doesn't ask for much in return. He's just a good person, and when he read Wendy's article, he was compelled to reply with one of his own:

"Imagine for a moment you have an idea, an opinion. So you then decide to explore that idea a bit further and discover that you're not alone in that there are others who not only share it, but provide some insight into other related issues. These ideas are backed up by well-researched, well thought-out papers and studies…. Once you feel you have a concrete base on which to back up your idea, you present it to other people who may not have heard it before. Instead of rational responses however, you are met with hostility, anger, resentment, personal attacks, and shaming. You are told that you are hateful, have personal issues, that you need help, and that you need to stop saying what you're saying because the people you're speaking to feel offended and hurt by something that is challenging the way they're used to seeing things.

"In my brief experience as an MRA, that's exactly what it's felt like."

It's a pretty bleak perspective, but as any MHRA will testify – it's a rite of passage. This is something that all MHRAs experience – rejection and ridicule. What sets Sammy apart, however, is that he is part of another group that has experienced not just what he describes as "willful ignorance" but a more vindictive and sinister form of attack.

Representatives from Men's Human Rights Ontario met with Sammy at a recent academic lecture at the University of Toronto. It was agreed during that meeting that Sammy should publish his counter article on our site as it was unlikely that the Globe & Mail would do so and more importantly, it was an honest, bloody brilliant article (if you haven't read it yet, you owe it to yourself to do so.) On November 16 the article appeared here: http://www.mhro.ca/?p=461. Neither Sammy nor Men's Human Rights Ontario was aware though, that he was soon to be targeted in a cowardly, disgusting fashion.

[image]
Sammy getting his kicks on the beach.
"It happened the same day – the sixteenth," said Sammy. "I'll admit I was a little bit frightened, when I read the first email. My heart was pounding quite a bit because I was concerned – not for me – but for the group that I volunteer with. I don't want them to come under fire for any beliefs that I might hold." Sammy needn't have worried however, his colleagues pledged their support to him and were disgusted by the attempt to tarnish his reputation.

Those beliefs that Sammy mentions, amount to a heartfelt belief in the principle of equality for all. None of the social media postings that Sammy made could be considered, even in the most obtuse fashion, to be hateful to women, or even to feminism – a fact that left Sammy a little confused. "What I don't understand is that nowhere in the article do I bash feminism. All I said was here is my experience and this is where I am now," said Sammy.

It's pretty reasonable. What's also reasonable is Sammy's path to the MHRM, populated as it was with a series of commonsense observations, a path that so many people have, and continue to take each day.

"It's hard for me to recollect what exactly made me join the MHRM. It's the culmination of events leading up to winter of last year. At one point I came across Karen Straughan's Video on the disposable male I thought 'this was kind of interesting' and I wanted to learn more.

'That led me to the video on the Warren Farrell protest at UofT and the more I read into it the more I agreed with what guys like Paul, Dean, and Karen were talking about and I wanted to be a part of that. And then of course, what happened with my dad; that gave me more of a reason, shall we say, when I began to experience it firsthand. I realized, you know what, 'there's a problem here' because let's say for a moment that the roles were reversed, and this was my mother I was dealing with, there would be any number of support shelters she could turn to; government assistance would have been an easy grab for her – it wouldn't have been a problem. But when I looked at my father and saw he was struggling, it was easy to see how little help men received when in situations like this."

Hardly the words of frustrated basement-dwelling neckbeard. Hardly the words of a sexually frustrated fascist. Hardly the words of a serial misogynist. Hardly the words of someone who is "pro-rape."

But that shouldn't come as a surprise – at least not to anybody who's been involved in the MHRM for more than twenty seconds. Our opponents are losing. We know this. They know this. They will use any tool at their disposal to save their pathetic skins. The attack on Sammy is typical. And to the anonymous coward, skulking behind some computer screen somewhere looking to damage, and hurt people I, and everyone at Men's Human Rights Ontario want to say 'thank you.'

Thanks to you – we now have another member.

It is with great pleasure that we announce the addition of Sammy Allouba to the ranks of Men's Human Rights Ontario.

It was your email that made Sammy's decision to join our ranks an easy one. It was your bigotry – your hatred – that gave the MHRM another member. And not just any member at that. Sammy is a smart, driven individual who is going to make a serious impression – not just here in Ontario, or Canada, but further afield.

To you, coward, libeler, bigot – we want you to remember that fact.

Jennifer McCreight says Richard Dawkins destroyed the atheist community

AVfM Video Source · 28 November 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Because she had nothing to do with it, obviously.

http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=RmO9itntGeM

For those of you not following the ongoing Feminist-Atheist wars, you probably don't get this, but if you do, this is really funny.–DE Scented Nectar, by the way, is always up to something nefarious.

How to fight a baby

AVfM Video Source · 28 November 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Babies. They're wormy, gooey, intimidating, frightening, but true macho men know exactly how to handle these dangerous pests. Gavin McInnes gives lessons every man should know!

We here at A Voice for Men officially endorse men beating up babies exactly like this:

Don't let those babies intimidate you! Show them who's boss!

For more Mixed Martial Arts training against the baby menace, subscribe to Gavin McInnes.

Rosalind Wiseman, the boy whisperer

John Hembling (JtO) · 29 November 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Rosalind Wiseman is the author of Queen Bees and Wannabees, a book published in 2009 addressing feminine relational aggression from the point of view of teenage girls and their parents. It is an important book which not only served as the basis for the Hollywood movie Mean Girls, it's one I've got on order from Amazon. But Wiseman isn't content to rest on past accomplishments, she's also just published a book about boys addressing some of the issues they face every day. It's called Masterminds and Wingmen, published in September of 2013. While researching for the new project, she interviewed at least several hundred high school aged boys, to get a picture of the world they inhabit, and some impression of their experiences.

Truly, this author is breaking new ground, covering a topic never explored in depth by any significant writer or researcher. Except, of course, for Dr. Warren Farrell, who wrote a better version of the same book in 1993, called The Myth of Male Power. Also except for the dozens of books following in the space opened by Dr. Farrell two decades ago. But now, somebody from the mainstream is going to jump on the "me-too!" bandwagon. Well, almost. What Rosalind Wiseman appears to be saying is that she's discovered a new planet: Guy World.

> What is so important to me, that I want adults to realize is boys have deep connections with people. They want meaningful relationships. They fall in love, and when betrayals happen, and they DO, or when breakups happen, they are in deep amounts of pain. They often don't share that with other people but that doesn't mean it doesn't exist. […]
>
> What I am hearing in these interviews are boys really breaking so many of the stereotypes we have about boys. They're so much more complex, they have rich emotional lives. And if we can sit down and really listen to them, they will tell us.

Well by golly, did you catch that everybody? Boys are breaking the stereotypes we have about them. They're much more complex; they have rich emotional lives. If we can sit down and really listen to them, they'll tell us.

Rosalind Wiseman is here to bring us a revelation! They (boys) are apparently not made of wood. They're not mere action machines bolted together from scrap aluminum. Would you believe they're actually human beings?

Zounds!

Thank you, Rosalind Wiseman, for granting actual, publicly-conferred humanity onto those poor unfortunates who, until now, like Pinochio have only wished to be real human beings. Indeed, judging from much of the online commentary, many men and boys are deeply grateful to be acknowledged as: also people.

From the a user identifying as Moviedude22 in the comments section of Time Magazine's Youtube video[1] promoting "Masterminds and Wingmen"

"This woman is very special. young men need more advocates in society especially intellectually sensitive female advocates."

So, on first seeing the Time Magazine video promoting Wiseman's new title, why were my hands shaking with anger?

Wiseman's words:

> What is so important to me, that I want adults to realize is boys have deep connections with people. They want meaningful relationships.

As well as:

> ….boys really breaking so many of the stereotypes we have about boys they're so much more complex, they have rich emotional lives.

This is breaking news? This is the great revelation to the world? That the individuals of the male half of the human species are also human?

That anyone, including Wiseman, has the towering contempt for young men that she can pretend their basic humanity is a secret of her own discovery is beyond belief for any sane adult to consider.

Are we seriously entertaining the pretense of discourse with somebody who condescends to grant humanity, complexity and an inner emotional landscape to the male half of the human race?

Fuck.

How magnanimous of Rosalind to grant all of that to mere boys.

In fact, she magnifies this insult by positioning herself as the sympathetic and humane interpreter who can talk to those poor dumb beasts, unable to communicate without her.

But in a sense, that Youtube commenter was correct that young men need more advocates in society. However, it is not clear that "intellectually sensitive female advocate" is an accurate description of R. Wiseman.

They have rich emotional lives. And if we can sit down and listen to them, they'll tell us.

She's the Boy Whisperer. In fact if reality follows on satire, as it occasionally does, Rosalind Wiseman will soon have her own show on the Discovery Channel, right after Caesar Milan, giving the good people of the world Rosalind's very own teaching and training techniques to prevent the men-childs from chewing up the drapes or pooping on the new ivory-wool shag rug.

Do you think I'm exaggerating? Masterminds and Wingmen seems, in Wiseman's Time Magazine interview, to be a book written not just about, but on behalf of the young men who are that book's subject material. This impression is somewhat diminished by the fact that unlike her earlier title, Queen Bees and Wannabes, the boy-focused book was issued in two versions. The second one being a shortened, simplified free ebook for the boys themselves. Obviously, being mere boys, reading words in a long, paper-bound volume is too much to expect. That might cut in to masturbation and video game time.

Carrie Goldman, writing about Wiseman's new book for Chicago Now dot com said:

> I have seen how difficult it is for parents, moms in particular, to see evidence of the way their children can behave around their peers. I have spoken with moms who said, "My son is a good kid, and he wouldn't do something like that." And then when it comes to light that their sons have participated in unacceptable activities, the mothers feel devastated.

Rosalind Wiseman, when asked by the Chicago Now columnist what advice she had for mothers whose sons engaged in "upsetting activities" said:

> Sometimes we learn things that are painful, and women need to be ethical authority figures with their sons […] When it comes to how your son treats other people, get him to think, if my mother knew I was doing this, how would I act?

Does this sound like human recognition, or does it sound a bit more like manipulation?

Goldman also noted that Wiseman's Director of Communication and Marketing, Charlie Kuhn, was hired with the specific intent of having him relate to the boys. According to Goldman, Kuhn is close enough in age to remember what it was like to be a teenage boy, yet old enough to have some perspective and wisdom that can only come with time. She hired Kuhn to game those boys into revealing their inner lives to her.

This woman is very special. Young men need more advocates in society. Especially intellectually sensitive female advocates like Rosalind Wiseman.

[1] http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=dxTJ0UhPEJg

[2] http://www.chicagonow.com/portrait-of-an-adoption/2013/09/masterminds-and-wingmen-rosalind-wisemans-exploration-of-boy-world/

Note for Jamie Kilstein on Male Privilege

Dean Esmay · 29 November 2013 · Archived copy · Original

So a friend of mine sent me a video by Jamie Kilstein on “male privilege.” I watched it carefully, and left a few comments. I thought I would share with you here.

https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=-l7q71AimrA#t=310

I hope my comments on his YouTube channel are allowed to stand, but either way, I thought readers here would be interested in the video and my response to it. Here’s basically what I said:

Hi Jamie.

I’m a man, I try not to be a dick, I don’t hate women, I don’t hate gays, I’m not afraid of being thought of as gay, and I’m definitely not a feminist.

For your information, as a man you are more likely to be the victim of violent assault on the streets than a woman is. That’s part of the female privilege you don’t seem to be aware exists. Being told to shut up about men’s issues because women are talking is another part of the female privilege you don’t seem to be aware exists.

I’ve had rude things screamed at me on the streets by total strangers while just walking around. As a man, I don’t get to call that “catcalling” even though sometimes the remarks are sexual in nature.

Oh, and I’ve been felt up. By men and women. Also sexually molested. But hey, thanks for telling me feminists “care about” this issue, even though in my experience most of them ignore all the research that shows women are far more likely to be perpetrators and men far more likely to be victims of it than almost anyone wants to believe. I have plenty of peer reviewed scientific literature to show these things, but I somehow suspect you, as as self-proclaimed feminist, will scoff, dismiss, and demean those things, and tell me to shut up and listen to women. Because my experiences don’t matter as much as someone with a vagina, even if I’m more likely to experience assault, be murdered, commit suicide, be homeless, be unemployed, be drug addicted, be thrown out of school, and so on, because of my “male privilege.”

On that slut-shaming thing? Try getting called a “creep” just because you hit on a girl who found you unattractive.

By the way, since women are 55% of all voters in the country, and white women are the single biggest and most influential voting bloc in the entire US, causing both major parties to spend every election catering to them, you realize just how silly you look constantly repeating the refrain that most politicians are men right? Women are perfectly capable of electing women if that’s what they want; instead, in a free and democratic system they don’t seem to care if someone’s a man or a woman, since when a woman runs she’s just as likely to be elected as a man. So what that says to me is that you have two choices: either women are weak and inferior and have to be encouraged to run for office like a man would, instead of having the gumption to do it themselves, or, maybe you could conclude that politicians, who pander to women every election, are representing women just fine as far as most female voters are concerned, and women are just less inclined to run for office, like they’re less inclined to want to be garbage collectors or truck drivers.

I am a man, I try not to be a dick, I don’t hate women, I don’t hate gays, I’m not afraid of being thought of as gay, and I will repeat: I am definitely not a feminist, because I consider feminists willfully ignorant, frequently aggressively hateful people who just won’t look at facts or logic and instead demean and demonize half the human population–just like the prejudices underlying your video here do.

Here’s hoping you open your mind and explore new ideas that may challenge your prejudices someday. Peace out.

The sexual assault on US military members

Michael Conzachi · 30 November 2013 · Archived copy · Original

As is usually the case, we see once again some type of legislation when it comes to the issue of sexual assault and harassment. There are the usual rally cries of an "epidemic" following a survey, followed by some aggressive action by political officeholders to immediately enact legislation to correct the alleged epidemic.

I am referring to the proposed Military Justice Improvement Act (S 967) written and sponsored by New York Senator Kirsten Gillibrand. This proposal and its various amendments are being debated on the Senate floor. If this passes in the Senate it will go the House for a vote. Currently there are certain predictions that it will not get through the House in its current version, but once legislators who oppose this act start hearing the screams of being anti-women and being a 'rape apologist,' some will fold and sign off on it, rather than support their position.

We have heard ad nauseum of the epidemic of sexual assault in our military. There is a number that has been floated around that in fiscal year 2012 there were 26,000 sexual assaults in the military. I. like many others, shook my head in wondrous amazement as to how that could be remotely possible, so I began to find out.

After some considerable difficulty, I was able to get some answers, and they are all contained in the Department of Defense (DOD) Sexual Assault Prevention Response Office 2012 Report. The half million dollar, three-volume, 1,800+ page report is as comprehensive as it is confusing, and many parts were carried out by various governmental contractors.

There is a tremendous amount of information, but here is the reader's digest on how they arrived at this number:

108,478 military service members were surveyed, both men and women. The actual numbers of each gender were not disclosed. The service members had to have at least six months of active duty service. Out of that number, 22,792 responded to what the DOD calls an eligible response, a rate of approximately 24%. 23% of the men surveyed responded while 29% of the women surveyed responded. A response was deemed to be "eligible" when at least 50% of the survey questions were answered. The actual survey and the responses have not been made public and are classified and are only accessible to certain members of the DOD.

Members of the Coast Guard were not surveyed, nor were any members in Reserve Units, and the survey excluded any military member of "flag" rank.

So we have 22,792 people respond who answered at least 50% of the questions and out of those responses it was determined that there were 26,000 sexual assaults. You can already start to see the fuzzy math.
Here is one of the first parts where it gets interesting.

The survey participants were asked a number of questions as to whether they have ever been the victim of an unwanted sexual assault or contact for a period of time while they have been in the military AND up to a year PRIOR to entering the military. Yes, you read that right and it is clearly stated in the DOD report; a year PRIOR to them entering the military.

The sexual assault part is clear and we usually think of the usual crimes of rape, sodomy, oral copulation and the like. It also includes acts such as groping or touching.

Here is another part where it gets interesting.

In the survey, in addition to the usual question(s) of being the victim of an unwanted sexual assault or contact, there was another category.

This category is listed in the report as "unwanted gender-related behaviors."

The first question I had was, WTF is an "unwanted gender-related behavior?" Looking further, the report specifies 12 separate sexual harassment behaviors, such as inadvertently walking into a group where an offensive joke is being told, or being asked out on a date if it was unwanted. There were a host of other similar behaviors, but you get the point.

Using that same logic, if I was still in the military and had to watch former DHS Director Janet Napolitano waddle her ass into a Pentagon briefing on TV, I guess I could consider that an unwanted gender-related behavior. I would have put it more in the repulsed category but maybe that category wasn't listed.

These same unwanted gender-related behaviors also included the time frame of a year prior to entering the service. Apparently the DOD wanted to make sure that all of the survey participants were fully knowledgeable as to what constitutes a sexual assault or contact. Apparently the DOD needed to inform or educate individuals that an innocuous act that occurred prior to them entering the service was now, by definition, considered a sexual assault or unwanted sexual contact of some sort.

According to the DOD, the simple act of asking someone out on a date, and if they did not want to be asked out, has now been classified as an unwanted sexual contact or unwanted gender-related behavior, and it was counted in this survey.

Correct me if I am wrong, but men have been asking women out, and vice-versa, since the inception of language, but for the purposes of this survey and the deception of the American people this simple act is now criminal if the recipient did not want to be asked.

Now you can see how these statistics have been manipulated and how they arrived at this astronomical figure of 26,000 sexual assaults or contacts in fiscal year 2012, with only 22,792 responses. The figure is thrown around as if it is gospel which prompts some radical legislation to fix this "epidemic."

There is another statistic that debunks the myth that military members, primarily women, are hesitant to come forward to report that they have been a victim, because they don't know what to do.

Approximately 96% of those who responded to the survey indicated that they were aware of reporting procedures for sexual assaults in the military and who had received some form of formal training or attended briefings on sexual assault, harassment, and reporting. The issue of the education of what "sexual assault and harassment" is one of the first priorities for training when new people enter the military, and virtually everybody has been trained.

Many of the Soldiers and Marines that I have interviewed called them their "briefings to teach them not to rape," because they are essentially told that they are all rapists by the mere fact that they have a penis and have to be trained not to be rapists. They have also said that the overkill in this area is demoralizing, demeaning, and is decimating morale.

There are more people in the military who know more about what is and how to report sexual assault and harassment, than there are who know how to properly disassemble and operate an M4.

If you take a look at the websites for every military installation, the sexual assault and harassment resources, offices, advocates, policies, and reporting procedures are listed everywhere. Contrary to popular belief, military members who have been the victim of a sexual assault or harassment have all kinds of resources available to report the incidents; they do not have to go to their commander (who may or may not be the violator).

Another comment floated around by Senators in the hearing was the high percentage of non-reporting by sexual assault victims to military authorities. While there are instances of victims not reporting, those incidents that military members experienced prior to them entering the military would not be subject to military jurisdiction.

Another myth that is debunked by this report was something that was covered in recent Senate hearings, in which Senator Gillibrand took the lead. Several women who testified about this alleged epidemi, kept implying that all sexual assaults are committed by military men of command rank, upon subordinate women, and that these poor rape victims had to salute their attackers.

The DOD report indicates that less than three percent of all of the allegations of sexual assault or contact involved someone who was in their direct chain of command. The report didn't specify which gender was the victim or offender.

The actual numbers of reports of sexual assault or contact in the military for fiscal year 2012 are estimated to be around 3,300, with some form of disciplinary action in approximately 1,100 of those cases – hardly a number that would justify major legislative change. Many of the Senators and news reports claim that out of the 3,300 formal reports, there were slightly over 300 convictions. There was and has been no mention of the instances of false allegations that were ultimately admitted to or where determined as a result of an investigation.

The exact figure of sexual assaults, as opposed to sexual harassment cases, was not reported. For a military population of nearly two million, 3,300 reports, and 1,100 adjudicated cases of sexual assault and harassment are considerably lower than the general population, and certainly not indicative of an epidemic.

The report also notes that only 67% of the acts occurred on a military installation, and a percentage of the acts were committed by foreign nationals, and civilians, upon a military member. If a female military member goes to a bar off a military installation, and is groped by a foreign national, how is that a military sexual assault problem?

The bottom line is that the figure of 26,000 purported cases of "sexual assault and contact" that occurred in the military during fiscal year 2012 is an inherently dubious figure. Only by misrepresenting, distorting, and convoluting the survey information do we arrive at this figure. This is always the case when dramatic legislation is proposed to correct an epidemic: the survey is constructed and implemented in such a way so as to achieve the desired result – a result that could be touted as evidence of a problem.

How is it remotely possible, given this convoluted statistical compilation, that we can accurately gauge what the actual problem is? The explanation for this mess is clear: the hysteria is driven by an agenda – an agenda in which a delusional belief system is in place, and in order to quantify that belief, a flawed statistical analysis has to be constructed and presented to the public and pressure placed on political leaders to act swiftly to enact legislation before the facts and the agenda are discovered.

The solution as proposed by Senator Gillibrand is called The Military Justice Improvement Act. Don't be fooled by fuzzy sounding names, and it is critically important for everyone reading this to call, write or email your Senators and congressional representatives and ask them not to support this bill.

There are problems that occur from time to time in the reporting and handling of military sexual assault and harassment cases, but just like in the hysteria a decade ago of the sexual assault "epidemic" at the Air Force Academy, calls for sweeping reforms and investigations come from across the spectrum. In the end and after a lengthy inquiry by the Air Force Office of Inspector General found that none of the allegations were handled improperly, only one cadet was convicted of rape, and less than a dozen others received some form of non-judicial punishment, (Article 15).

What this act seeks to do is to remove certain commanders from the decision-making process, when the crime is punishable by more than one year in confinement. Military-related offenses, such as disobeying an order or going AWOL are exempt. Special emphasis is placed on sexual assault cases.

What Senator Gillibrand and her cohort are trying to accomplish is to remove a commander's authority and ability to have any input on criminal matters that affect their unit. This could be an example where a military member has committed a theft of military equipment in a combat area and that commander decides not to prosecute at that particular time due to manpower restraints.

Gillibrand's intent is clear: she is intent on removing any reasonable oversight only for sexual assault cases, making it illegal for a commander to reign in an over-zealous prosecutor or investigator, or to overturn a wrongful conviction or reduce a sentence if the facts and evidence do not support a particular decision.

Back in May, Gillibrand held up the transfer of Air Force Lieutenant General Susan Helms, a former Space Shuttle Endeavour astronaut, as the Vice Commander to Space Command, because she did what a commander is supposed to do: General Helms overturned a sexual assault conviction of a male captain who had been convicted solely on the allegation of a subordinate, absent any other evidence, and in light of evidence presented of his innocence. General Helms did not arbitrarily vacate the conviction, but only did so after she read, word for word, the entire transcript of the courts-martial and after conferring with a number of military lawyers for their opinion.

This is a classic example of the type of military commander oversight that Gillibrand is trying to eliminate. What General Helms did was completely correct and the right and responsible thing to do. Sadly for the citizens, General Helms decided to retire from the military rather than deal with this kind of lunacy.

Gillibrand seeks to prevent character and military service considerations of the accused from entering into any proceeding, and seeks to virtually reduce or eliminate any cross-examination of sexual assault victims in Article 32 hearings which are probable cause hearings.

In any criminal case, whether that is civilian or military, an accused has the right to face and confront their accuser in a court of law. It's called cross-examination.

In Gillibrand's mind and the minds of ideologues, when you properly and lawfully cross-examine a sexual assault victim in a court of law, you are "attacking" the victim. We only hear the "attacking" part when it involves a female sexual assault victim, not some guy who reports his car stolen to collect the insurance money. Gillibrand wants no questions asked by defense counsel, no cross-examination of sexual assault victims in Article 32 hearings other than the generic questions.

The act also allows for provisions for special courts-martial which have not been specifically defined. Some Senators have proposed allowing a sexual assault victim to choose whether or not they want the case to be heard by a civilian court or a military court. The special courts-martial provision allows for the possibility for the removal of cases from the military judicial process and into federal courts at the direction of politically appointed or ideologically driven federal prosecutors. This defies the constitutional protection for a military member to be judged by his peers.

The act also seeks to severely limit the evidentiary considerations during Article 32 hearings. Plainly put, the act seeks to prohibit any good information coming out for the benefit of the accused and seeks to prohibit any bad information coming out that is harmful to the accuser. For example, an impeccable service record of a service member accused would be prohibited from entering into the proceedings while the negative service record of an accuser, including prior reports of false allegations, would be prohibited from entering into the proceedings. The determination of the truth will be severely if not completely handicapped.

What Gillibrand is proposing is to force a case to courts-martial with little to no evidence other than just an allegation in a he-said/she-said case. This is what we see in civilian restraining order and domestic violence cases: just an allegation is sufficient to justify an arrest or the issuance of a protective order.

We used to see similar types of archaic judicial proceedings in our history. They were called witch trails in medieval times. That is what this act proposes, and what Gillibrand and her cohort want for our military. Gillibrand and her supporters want cases brought to courts-martial (trial) in each and every case whether or not there exists sufficient probable cause to justify a courts-martial.

A military member also faces the possibility under this act for a Dishonorable Discharge even if he or she is found not-guilty in a court-martial or is cleared during the investigative or pre-trial phase. This will escalate to what we are now seeing on college campuses wherein an allegation alone is sufficient to remove a student from a college campus.

The act essentially eliminates the presumption of innocence, and reduces or eliminates truthful or factual information and evidence from entering in the proceedings, and prevents a commander from reducing or vacating a sentence when there is evidence of severe wrongdoing, malicious prosecution, or prosecutorial misconduct in cases of sexual assault.

One recent case in the national news, published here and on other sites, was the wrongful rape conviction of Mr. Brian Banks, who spent over five years in prison, based on nothing more than the word of his accuser. Not until after he was released and his accuser was recorded on video that she made up the story was he finally vindicated. Mr. Banks lost out on a college football scholarship and a possible career in the National Football League. His false accuser has never been charged.

What is also occurring now in the military is the vast increase of the numbers of false allegations of sexual assault and harassment, primarily by female military members for the purposes of avoiding deployment to combat areas or to be removed from combat areas. The DOD is now forcing the concept of women serving in combat units on one hand, but then they come out with this report on the alleged sexual assault epidemic and "unwanted gender-related behaviors" that necessitates radical legislative overhaul.

Common sense would dictate that if there really was an epidemic of sexual assault, then the DOD would certainly not put women in an environment where there could be more instances of unwanted sexual assault or contact or the so-called unwanted gender-related behaviors. So if we put women in foxholes, what happens when the male has to urinate after being in a hole for 15 or 20 hours? Does he wear a diaper so as not to offend his female counterpart? What does the women do if she has to attend to her female needs? Does she risk infection so as not to offend her male counterpart?

Exactly WTF are we supposed to do?

The Military Justice Improvement Act does nothing to improve military justice – it actually makes it worse. While there are cases of sexual assault and harassment in the military, there is hardly an epidemic. This act does not move us forward, it goes in reverse and it will decimate our military.

I strongly urge everyone to contact your representatives and ask them to oppose this act and any other similar-sounding act, and anything else that Senator Gillibrand proposes, even if she wants to propose legislation to feed ducks at the local park. The mind of this woman is dangerous and she has no desire to improve our military justice system; she actually intends to make it worse, primarily for men.

Like a shark, she has picked up the scent of blood in the water and wants to convict military men for sexual assault at any and all costs. She intends to eliminate the normal oversight and evidentiary process and she has touted this flawed and dishonest DOD survey to support her position.

This is the military version of the "Dear Colleague Letter" on steroids.

In fact the more appropriate name for this bill should be the Military Injustice Violation Act.

Coming soon: feminist porn

Jim Muldoon · 30 November 2013 · Archived copy · Original

In the Australia last week, Nikki Gemmell excelled herself in a display of the Sacred Babble. In my mind it is like island hopping. She visits this illogical conclusion here, jumps to that phony correlation there, and then hops over to a false assumption somewhere else. There is no connection between these islands of feminist fantasy, except that they were all visited by Gemmell.

She begins with quoting a Dr. Strasburger who "guarantees" that if a 14-year-old boy has internet access in his bedroom, then he is looking at porn. And if you find a boy who is not looking at porn? That's right, it's a meaningless, empty guarantee of nothing.

This, apparently, led the American Academy of Pediatrics to write a new policy.

My, oh my. Just how high falutin' and hoity toity is that: a policy, no less.

The main recommendation (hang on! recommendation? I thought it was a policy!) is that children should spend no more than two hours a day online. Now that, of course, will bring porn access to an abrupt halt. Or is two hours the recommended level of daily porn? Or have we moved on to a new logical island?

And, of course, no 14-year-old girl, with internet in her bedroom, would ever look at porn. And also, of course, any 14-year-old boy who sees porn is immediately corrupted beyond repair.

We are then transported to a "post-feminist" world. Does she mean Patriarchy is dead? Do we no longer require quotas for female politicians or CEOs? Have we reached the magical equality in opportunity, entitlement and outcome?

You know we haven't. And, you also know that Gemmell doesn't think we have either. Perhaps the word "post-feminist" sounded just that bit more intellectual. But, in this post-feminist world, she knows "enlightened" parents who have taught their boys to be new men: "tender and kind, tolerant of difference…respectful of women, not afraid of them."

Who, you might ask, taught these enlightened parents?

No time for the answer. These new men (or are we back to boys?) have "been raised with a healthy dose of that all-important buzz phrase, EQ. Emotional intelligence." Ah, if only my parents had given me a dose of buzz phrases. I could be positively vibrating with verbal diarrhea.

So, how good is this "EQ?" Next to fucking useless, it turns out. Give them an unsupervised screen and these boys' Emotional Intelligence vaporises as they spiral into the black hole of porn.

Gemmell then takes us on a personal insight into the effects of porn on teenage girls. A man used porn to seduce her. She found it "fascinating at first, then repellent."

Why did this lead to sex? Well, what else could a fair damsel like Gemmell do? After all, she was seduced. Therefore, Gemmell's responsibility was removed like a boy's "EQ." He was "the man," so he did "the seducing" while she lay helpless on her fainting couch. Her being repulsed would have only added to her helplessness.

The ploy of the likes of Gemmell is to try to paint those who would disagree with her into a corner. Any criticism is not just, by default, to approve of pornography, but of the worst kinds of pornography. Not only that, but it is to approve of porn being peddled to 14-year-old children. Further, you approve of these young boys being taught to hate and fear women by that pornography, to such an extent that those boys will oppress women when they are older.

Let me take a moment here to make a few comments of my own in regards to teenage sex and pornography.

Most mature adults will look back on their first sexual encounters, whether alone or with others present, as clumsy.

This does not make it any of it wrong. Our first attempts at talking, walking, writing and all other forms of communication would fall into the same category. So yes, young men may well watch pornography at that age and come to some pretty clumsy conclusions.

So first of all, lets just take a step back.

In days of yore, it was called “don’t let your kids get with the wrong crowd.” Today, thanks to the internet, the wrong crowd don’t need to use the front door. Pornography is only just one of the many “wrong crowds” that have new avenues to children, thanks to the internet. From online gambling (legitimate pursuits) to radical terrorists (illegal pursuits), there are many aspects of life, well beyond the maturity of children, that are only a few clicks away. But Gemmell elevates the issue of pornography above all others to add to the general moral panic concerning “female oppression.”

But her view of pornography is as clumsy as a child’s.

First of all, pornography covers all aspects of sex. This would include gay sex (male or female), sex with animals, females dominating males physically and emotionally, and other “genres” that fall well outside of Gemmell’s definition: “It’s about men exercising control over women – who are always available.”

But even when considering heterosexual encounters, even fourteen year olds understand the difference between videos and real life. For most young men, their first attempts to get girls their own age to dance with them at the local club will dispel any notions of “always available.”

However, having said all these negative things about pornography, Gemmell is suggesting that “we” should champion feminist porn “where the woman is empowered.” She calls for “…different pornographic scenarios that embrace tenderness, vulnerability, reality.”

This isn’t just her idea. According to Gemmell, the philosopher Alain de Botton calls for a “new pornography”. She goes on to quote him as saying “Ideally, porn would excite our lust in contexts which also presented other, elevated sides of human nature – in which people were being witty, for instance, or showing kindness, or working hard or being clever.”

I’m reminded of those complaints made of the lack of reality in mainstream movies. For example, when characters drive in a major city to a skyscraper building and they get a park right outside the front door. The criticism is valid, in the sense that in real life, parking is at such a premium in cities that this would almost never happen.

The alternative, though, is for the audience to sit there for half an hour while the character drives around, negotiating one way streets whilst refusing to pay the extortionate prices of inner city carparks, trying to find a parking zone that will allow sufficient time for him to get to the aforementioned skyscraper, do what he has to do, and get back before getting an exorbitant fine. Hopefully, when he gets inside the building something a bit more interesting happens.

So, what would feminist porn look like? For example, perhaps there would be a pool-cleaner who comes to a woman’s house to clean her pool while she is sunbaking. Perhaps he actually cleans the pool (“working hard”) whilst not objectifying her. Perhaps they could even discuss de Botton’s latest book (“being clever”) or engage in some light, politically correct, banter (“being witty”).

Perhaps they might “embrace reality” and accept that most pool-cleaners don’t have sex with their clients. Instead he might hurry up to get the job finished because pool-cleaner pay is shit and the only way to make a living is to clean as many pools in a day as he can.

And the actual sex?

If there is any at all, it will, of course, require continual repetitions of “enthusiastic consent.” This, of course, will be difficult to convey. How does the woman inform the viewer that she is not just under the “control of men” by being in the video? How does she show that she is not merely regurgitating the lines of a script, written by her Patriarchal director or producer?

What would give the viewer the impression that she unreservedly, through her own volition, actually wants to have sex with the male actor that she has only just met with the camera, lighting and sound crew, and of course the viewers, all watching?

Of course, the real concern centres not on feminist porn itself, but the “we” who would champion such a thing. That is, the state. What happens when the government gives us pornography that no one would watch? How long before the likes of Gemmell would be advocating that such porn become mandatory at schools?

How long before someone can “guarantee” that fourteen-year-old boys will be watching feminist porn? How will the likes of Gemmell “guarantee” that the result will be “enlightened” young men with EQ, and not brain fried Stepford boys or worse?

Links

1. Nikki Gemmell – The Australian – PG: Porn Guaranteed

Another child molester gets child support

AVfM Video Source · 30 November 2013 · Archived copy · Original

From TJ Sotomayor at the TNNRaw2 Youtube Channel. Nothing to add here, the video is pure truth. PE

Meet John Nazarian, the King of Scumbags

Suzanne McCarley · 1 December 2013 · Archived copy · Original

What sort of unscrupulous scum makes a living off of offering professional services designed to teach women how to make false allegations of abuse to police, criminal courts and family courts in order to evict their husbands from the family home and gain the upper hand in a divorce? How morally bankrupt do you have to be to encourage and instruct such conduct, intentionally targeting people you know to be innocent, unjustly depriving them of civil rights, property and even causing emotional and psychological harm to their children?

We all know the family court system is a deck stacked against men and their children. A growing number of people are recognizing this, recognizing the damage it is doing, and working toward correcting the problem. But what kind of human being recognizes the bias and pitfalls in the system, and profits from those problems by encouraging criminality?

John Nazarian is such a parasite. Billing himself as the "King of Divorce," he runs Nazarian & Associates Investigations & Security under a private investigator's license issued by the State of California. But don't take my word for it. Here, watch and listen to it come directly from the mouth of King Scumbag himself.

How to 'Throw Your Husband Out' DIVORCE from John J Nazarian on Vimeo.

Let's take a moment to allow you to stop raging and/or vomiting before we continue.

Better now? Good.

Now, the obvious question that comes up first is how do we go about getting the complaints filed with the State of California in order to shred this asshole's license into pulp, and most certainly we are going to get to that. But I want to pose another question first. What sort of scumbag looks at this kind of person, would size up John Nazarian and figure him to be an asset in their life; BFF material?

Certainly many women at the stage in their marriage where things have gone wrong, when the love they once felt for their husband's has been replaced by disappointment, bitterness and broken dreams, are prone to this kind of conduct. Women in this position often avail themselves to the services of unprincipled lawyers and state functionaries in order to steal the marital assets and take outright ownership of the children. It's predictable, even if inexcusable.

But what sort of woman is so depraved that she not only would secure "assistance" from this kind of overrated sneak thief, but would actually consider his lack of character a qualification for rubbing elbows and proud public affiliation?

[image]

Well, of course, it's Pauley Perrette, the undisputed Queen of Scumbags. And it makes sense, since she is the other person whose obsession with the nefarious use of restraining orders has also earned coverage by this website. Nice picture, eh? The unctuous couple kinda look cute together in a human refuse sort of way.

Nazarian has actually skirted close to the men's rights community in the past. Here he is in a video featuring Glenn Sacks, which outlines the severity of the false accusation problem in family courts, using the snakelike Nazarian to provide commentary on just how easy it is to profit from coaching criminals. Watch the whole thing, but pay special attention at the 0:40 mark and the 1:27 mark.

John Nazarian's offices are located in West Toluca Lake, Los Angeles County California, operating under the California Department of Security Services Bureau of Security and Investigative Services License #16365

http://www2.dca.ca.gov/pls/wllpub/WLLQRYNA$LCEV2.QueryView?P_LICENSE_NUMBER=16365&P_LTE_ID=651

There are two items in the Code of Ethics for private (and apparently public) dicks in California of interest here, according to the California Association of Licensed Investigators.

Item 4. When soliciting work, member investigators will conduct themselves in an ethical manner and will never misrepresent or disparage any member, in any forum, in order to obtain an assignment or to obtain an unfair advantage during an assignment or while carrying out the duties of the association.

I quit reading at "ethical manner."

Item 6. Refrain from any conduct which would bring the investigator or the association under reproach.

Ahem.

And here is where to file complaints, which are open to anyone who wants to file them.

http://www.dca.ca.gov/online_services/complaints/complfrm.shtml

It is time to see if the State of California has any interest in individuals who use the licenses they issue to instruct citizens to file false police reports and commit fraud on California courts.

This information is also available on Nazarian's website:

BEVERLY HILLS OFFICE

PHONE: 310-286-2017

EMAIL: info@nazarianandassociates.com

In case you have not been aware of them, there is a series of articles on this website about NCIS star Pauley Perrette, her use of the legal system and restraining orders to harass and abuse her former husband, Francis Shivers, and the current investigations being conducted into that case. This includes articles about Grand Jury and State Bar complaints naming Nazarian. It is also known that complainants intend to subpoena Nazarian in those cases. It makes me wonder if Mr. Nazarian is aware of these articles. Indeed in light of them I had to laugh when I read him quoted as saying the following:

"I always tell my clients whenever I have the police involved, if you're lying to me and they pull out a big ugly skeleton, I'm getting up and leaving you there," http://articles.latimes.com/2006/jun/13/entertainment/et-nazarian13

We aren't the police, but our investigators have found a graveyard full of skeletons in Perrette's posh Hollywood closet; skeletons that a highfalutin, high profile PI-to-the-stars like Nazarian would have found had he bothered to look. That leaves another question. Now that we have done his job for him, does he plan to hold his number one celebrity client to that standard of honesty? Does he dare get up and leave her there?

AVFM articles on the Pauley Perrette/Francis Shivers case involving John Nazarian.

http://www.avoiceformen.com/mens-rights/activism/criminal-charges-for-pauley-perrette-crew-forthcoming/http://www.avoiceformen.com/mens-rights/false-rape-culture/pauley-perrette-francis-shivers-and-yellow-media/

http://www.avoiceformen.com/restraining-order-terrorism/perrette-setting-up-shivers-again/

http://www.avoiceformen.com/mens-rights/family-courts/pauley-want-a-restraining-order-characteristics-of-false-accusers/http://www.avoiceformen.com/mens-rights/family-courts/restraining-order-terrorism-the-circus-continues/http://www.avoiceformen.com/feminism/government-tyranny/restraining-order-terrorism-the-continuing-saga/http://www.avoiceformen.com/mens-rights/activism/time-to-end-restraining-order-terrorism/http://www.avoiceformen.com/feminism/government-tyranny/restraining-order-terrorism-we-have-arrived/http://www.avoiceformen.com/feminism/government-tyranny/shivers-and-justice-remanded-by-judge-solorzano/http://www.avoiceformen.com/restraining-order-terrorism/shivers-vs-the-restraining-order-mafia/http://www.avoiceformen.com/misandry/star-crazy-the-dark-side-of-pauley-perrette/http://www.avoiceformen.com/mens-rights/domestic-violence-industry/pauley-perrette-schmoozes-the-police/

http://www.avoiceformen.com/mens-rights/family-courts/pauleyp-ncis-pauley-perrettes-pals-daniel-luis-rivas/

Update as of 1/28/2014: John Nazarian is apparently attempting to hide the evidence, first claiming that this was just for “entertainment,” and then, removing it entirely from YouTube. Unfortunatley for him, that just makes this a bigger news story, and countless YouTubers are now mirroring his video. You ever heard of the Streisand Effect, John?

How to ‘Throw Your Husband Out’ DIVORCE from John J Nazarian on Vimeo.

Standing on the brink, surviving that first Red Pill Moment

AVfM Video Source · 1 December 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Suddenly realizing society treats you like a disposable commodity can be a liberating experience. But in the wrong time and place, it can be devastating. For those who find the Red Pill and are devastated, there is hope, as LifeAfterWomen explains so well:

http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=1RjyLCXdL-8

You should subscribe here for more.

The other beauty myth

Peter Wright · 2 December 2013 · Archived copy · Original

[image]In 1991 Naomi Wolf wrote The Beauty Myth where she claimed that women are oppressed by cultural pressure to be beautiful. What she failed to tell us is where this habit originated, and how it is essentially used to gain power over the male sex.

In human beings, various compulsions and desires come into conflict with one another, each jostling for momentary supremacy where one imperative will usurp the claims of another. That game has reached a problematical impasse during the last 800 years because, during that relatively short time span, human culture has thrown its weight into developing, intensifying and enforcing sexual gamesmanship to the degree that our sexual compulsions appear pumped up on steroids and taken to extremes never before seen in human society (myths about widespread Roman orgies notwithstanding). The obsession with female beauty forms a significant part of the problem.

If we lived back in Ancient Greece, Rome or anywhere else we would view sexual intercourse as little more than a bodily function akin to eating, shitting and sleeping – a basic bodily function without the hype. After the Middle Ages, however, it developed into a commodity to pimp and trade, and the new cult of sexualized romance that arose from it resulted in a frustration of our more basic attachment needs – a frustration aided and abetted by social institutions placing sexual manipulation at the center of human interaction. This development entrenched a new belief that beauty was the native possession of women, and only women, and conversely that the desire to possess beauty was the lot of males alone, thus creating a division between the sexes that remains in place today.

Compare this division with the beliefs of older cultures – India, Rome, Greece etc – and we see a stark contrast, with classical cultures equally apportioning beauty to males and sexual desire to females. In Ancient Greece for example males used to grow their hair long and comb it adoringly, rub olive oil on their skin and pay devoted attention to attire -the colors of the toga, the materials it was woven from, the way it was draped on the body- and there is perhaps no modern culture on earth where male beauty is more marvelously celebrated in the arts than it was in Greece.

Another example comes from the Biblical Song of Solomon, in which the appreciation of beauty and associated longing flows both ways between the man and women, whereas in romantic love beauty is ascribed only to the female, and desire only to the male – the roles are radically split. Moreover, in the Song of Songs there is no hint of the gynocentric arrangement; no appearance of man as a vassal towards women who are both Lord and deity. For the lovers in Song of Songs there already exists a God and so there is no worshipping of the woman as a quasi divinity who can redeem the man's pathetic existence – as in "romantic" love.

According to Robert Solomon, romantic love required a dramatic change in the self-conception of women. He recounts;

> They too were freed from an identity that depended wholly on their social roles, that is, their blood and legal ties with men, as daughters, wives and mothers. It is in this period in Christian history that looks become of primary importance, that being beautiful now counts for possibly everything, not just an attractive feature in a daughter or wife (which probably counted very little anyway) but as itself a mark of character, style, personality. Good grooming, as opposed to propriety, came to define the individual woman, and her worth, no longer dependent on the social roles and positions of her father, husband or children, now turned on her looks. The premium was placed on youth and beauty, and though some women even then may have condemned this emphasis as unjust, it at least formed the first breach with a society that, hitherto, had left little room for personal initiative or individual advancement. The prototype of the Playboy playmate, we might say, was already established eight hundred years ago, and did not require, as some people have argued recently, Hugh Hefner's slick centerfolds to make youth, beauty and a certain practiced vacuity into a highly esteemed personal virtue. The problem is why we still find it difficult to move beyond this without, like some Platonists, > distaining beauty altogether – the opposite error. [1]

Modesta Pozzo penned a book in the 1500's entitled The Worth of Women: their Nobility and Superiority to Men. The work purportedly records a conversation among seven Venetian noblewomen that explores nearly every aspect of women's experience. One of the topics explored is women's use of cosmetics and clothing to enhance beauty, including mention of hair tinting for which there is twenty-six different recipes. The following is the voice of Cornelia who explains that men's sexual desire of women (and women's control of that process via beauty) is the only reason men can love:

> "Thinking about it straight, what more worthy and what lovelier subject can one find than the beauty, grace and virtues of women?… I'd say that a perfectly composed outer corporeal form is something most worthy of our esteem, for it is this visible outer form that is the first to present itself to our eye and our understanding: we see it and instantly love and desire it, prompted by an instinct embedded in us by nature. "It's not because men love us that they go in for all these displays of love and undying devotion, rather, it's because they desire us. So that in this case love is the offspring, desire the parent, or, in other words, love is the effect and desire the cause. And since taking away the cause means taking away the effect, that means that men love us for just as long as they desire us and once desire, which is the cause of their vain love, has died in them (either because they have got what they wanted or because they have realized that they are not going to be able to get it), the love that is the effect of that cause dies at exactly the same time." [written 1592]

What I find interesting is that since the Middle Ages, as evidenced in Cornelia's words, we have collectively conflated male love with sexual desire as if they are inseparable, and to women's ability to control that male "love" through a skillful cultivation of beauty. One might be forgiven for refusing to believe this is love at all, that it is instead the creation of an intense desire for sexual pleasure due to the call of beauty. Observation shows that sex-generated "love" does not necessarily lead to compatibility for partners across a broad range of interests, and may occur between people who are, aside from sexual attraction, totally incompatible, with little in common, which is why the relationship often goes so badly when there occur gaps in the sexual game.

This raises the alternative notion of love based on compatibility, on what we might term 'friendship-love' which is not based solely on sexual desire – in fact sexual desire is not even essential to it even if often present. Friendship love is about interests the partners share in common, a meeting of compatible souls and a getting to know each other on a level playing field. However aiming for friendship-love means women are no longer required to pull the strings of sexual desire as is practiced with beauty-based allure, which ultimately frees men and women to meet as equals in power and, with luck, find much in common to sustain a durable relationship.

See also: Nancy Friday on the link between beauty and power
And: Desired Object vs. Disposable Object
[youtube=http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=ji3cxTidTxs&w=560&h=315]

[1] Robert Solomon, Love: Emotion, Myth, Metaphor, 1990 (p.62)
[2] Modesta Pozzo, The Worth of Women: their Nobility and Superiority to Men, 2007
[3] Nancy Friday, The Power of Beauty, 1997

Source: Gynocentrism and its cultural origins

Why we need to fuck their shit up

Diana Davison · 2 December 2013 · Archived copy · Original

So, who defines what words are dangerous? Why are Men's Rights Advocates being silenced? What we are saying is not particularly new. The threat is that more people are starting to listen. In part that's because the evidence that we are right has been accumulating. The other part is that you can only abuse people for so long before they all start getting fed up.

Having a bigger audience has made us dangerous, and feminists don't like competing for attention. Since the point of speaking is to be heard, it seems crass for feminists to use that as an excuse to silence us.

I believe words have power. History has shown us that they do. It's precisely because words have power that we need to be free to use them. I suspect that feminists also realize words have power and that's why they are so focused on censorship.

We are not trying to fool anyone here. I expect my audience to be perceptive, analytical and capable of separating fact from fiction. I'm not concerned about being called out on my facts because, frankly, I'm really fucking good at research.

Feminists and Social Justice Warriors, in their race to the bottom of victim culture, have proven that they have no regard for the purpose behind freedom of speech and, even worse, have shown intent to corrupt the legal system upon which our society rests. The people they want to silence most are academics and intellectuals, not backwoods bigots.

And they keep asking why we are so angry.

Feminists will claim to be offended or scared by just about everything because it serves an agenda. This is not a conspiracy theory. It has been well documented. Broadening legal definitions to include ambiguous terms is counter-intuitive to justice. People have the right to be clear on which actions are prohibited by law and emotion based descriptions make laws subjective.

It's not enough for a person to "feel" like a victim – they have to actually, factually BE a victim of a crime to seek compensation or special status.

How easy is it for someone to "feel" like a victim?

In 2006, criminologist Dr. David Green wrote a report called, "We're (Nearly) All Victims Now," published by Civitas, The Institute for the Study of Civil Society. One of the topics he covers is how "victim groups" like feminists describe anything that challenges them as "hate speech" to silence opposing views. He also explains why they do it.

We can no longer avoid offending people because more than 7 out of 10 people are now officially considered "oppressed." When you take feminist "intersectionality" into account, 109% of the population is categorized by government as oppressed. These oppressed people wish to be granted that status for the explicit purpose of having crimes against them given heavier penalties.

Sounds like privilege to me.

Among other things, Dr. Green noted that:

> Groups who have been politically recognised as victims are starting to use their power to silence people who have had the cheek to criticise them.

He points out that

> The word victim still retains its old meaning, and victims still inspire ordinary sympathy from kindly people. But today to be classified as a victim is to be given a special political status, which has no necessary connection with real hardship or actual oppression.

Any feminists frothing at the mouth yet? This guy has your number.

> Victimhood as a political status is best understood as the outcome of a political strategy by some groups aimed at gaining preferential treatment.

Dr. Green's report is not "hate speech." It is a professional analysis of why this Oppression Olympics is not compatible with democracy. He highlights how these self-interest groups undermine moral and legal equality while seeking to use the state as an aggressor against perceived threats. He also points out how the leaders of so-called oppressed groups claim the disadvantages of group members from the past which they, themselves, do not actually suffer.

In feminist terms this has been an ongoing criticism from both outside the group and from within.

Middle class white women have gained a lot of advantage by speaking about the struggles of their poor Black sisters and Black women have consistently tried to tell them to stop. Women in poverty? Well they're too busy working their asses off to have the time or money to read the books these narcissistic twits are writing.

Though fewer and fewer women are calling themselves feminists, most women are still quite content to collect the oppression group benefits they've been handed.

A woman doesn't have to call herself a feminist to still be gynocentric.

Dr. Green outlines how political power and control is gained at the expense of equality and how the granting of this power to victim groups has led to a desire for people to be classed as "oppressed." Victim groups not only get preferential treatment by government, in the UK – from which Dr. Green is writing – crimes against them carry double the minimum penalty for anyone convicted.

He covers the proclivity of these groups to demand censorship when he states:

> Modern victim groups create entrenched social divisions by defining opponents as oppressors who not only must be defeated by the state, but silenced by the state. It weakens the toleration and give-and-take that have been central to our political culture, and even encourages aggression.

Dr. Green was not just concerned about the health of the legal system either. He gives examples and discusses how people benefit more from being asked to achieve and succeed instead of instructed to wallow in self-pity.

He laments that victim culture encourages people to focus on blame and compensation as if no one should have to struggle against adversity. Green's concerns are reinforced by studies that show ruminating or excessively focusing on trauma impedes recovery by enhancing negative thoughts and eroding social support.

While disability used to be well-defined and indisputable (such as blindness, deafness, or being confined to a wheelchair) it now covers alcoholics and the obese. The rapid expansion of this definition caused the British government to explicitly exclude some potential abuses such as "a tendency to set fires". Green counted one fifth of the British population as being classified disabled in 2006.

This is progress? Seriously?

Green notes that the prevalence of speech codes or political correctness is > …another opportunity [created] by taking offence at innocent remarks or valid criticisms that are > redefined as insults.

He laughs at the speed with which these speech codes are changed by the groups themselves so that they even manage to catch their own members off guard.

That would be more of that infamous feminist infighting.

While this might be annoying and sometimes amusing, why does Green think it is detrimental to the legal system?

While middle class feminist women claim historical oppression they haven't personally encountered, coerce the government into giving them special funding and legal entitlements based on no merit and no actual suffering, and shame anyone who criticises them for it, it creates cynicism that erodes the public trust.

As Green states:

> Victim groups are not just political factions pressing for preferential treatment. They also undermine one of the fundamental building blocks of a free society, the equal legal status of its members.

Does this sound like hate speech to you? Sounds more like love of one's country.

The suppression of legitimate discourse is easily recognizable. Telling someone they are not oppressed is not hate speech. Demanding that people be held equally accountable for their crimes is not hate speech.

Feminism is not a race or a gender, it is an ideology and as such – we have the right to tell them they are full of shit.

Let's be really clear about this: We don't criticize feminism because we're bigots. Hell, I like being a woman. When we tell you that feminists are lying, hypocritical cunts, it's because we have proof.

Dr. Green recognizes that many members of society will support victimhood because they have good intentions and don't realize the negative impact their enablement has upon the illness of the oppression mongers. They wear ribbons in support or sympathy and their misguided compassion can even amount to a form of personal therapy.

Stop! Empowering victimhood just makes them sicker.

Of those leading the victimhood march, Green asks a pertinent question:

> Is it not possible that they have failed to realise the consequences of their actions? Perhaps so, but if they persist in calling for the re-assertion of group identities and denying moral equality, and if they continue to undermine the legal equality of all, even after the consequences have been pointed out, we must credit them with knowing what they are doing.

Well, feminists. Dr. David Green, and others like him, have brought these matters to your attention for a long time now. That is why we must now assume that you are being intentional.

And THAT is why we are here to fuck your shit up.

Sources

Victim Culture 100% Oppression

http://www.standard.co.uk/news/victim-culture-means-seven-out-of-ten-feel-oppressed-7176112.html

Dr. David Green

http://www.civitas.org.uk/pdf/Victims.pdf

Civitas Website

http://www.civitas.org.uk/

Ruminating on victimhood is bad for mental health http://pps.sagepub.com/content/3/5/400.short

FTSU Origins

http://www.avoiceformen.com/feminism/where-is-the-counter-argument/

Are Men the New Underclass?

AVfM Video Source · 2 December 2013 · Archived copy · Original

We were pleased recently to see a non-hysterical, thoughtful, well-balanced piece on the Men's Human Rights Movement: Are Men the New Underclass? in Chill Magazine.

The complete interview they did with Dean Esmay was recorded and is available here:

We suggest you subscribe to Paul's channel if you haven't already, and in any case, check out Chill Magazine.

What is feminism?

AVfM Video Source · 2 December 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Is feminism about what's in the dictionary or what feminists actually do? Grumpy Old Man explores the question.

http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=4NRiK4myEY4

For more terrific videos like this, subscribe to Grumpy Old Man.

Excusing Irrationality

Paul Elam · 3 December 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Recently, Harris O'Malley, a "dating coach" who apparently thinks being a groveling subservient is the way to success in dating, penned an article for HuffPo titled, "On Labeling Women 'Crazy'".

The biggest fallacy of this article, right out the gate, is the premise that labeling is something that men are doing to women. As shown in Diana Davison's article, "It's a woman problem", most of the people calling women names are other women. But the stupidity does not end there.

The core thesis of the article seems to be, "There are certain words that are applied to women specifically in order to manipulate them into compliance: 'slut,' 'bitch,' 'ugly/fat' and, of course, 'crazy.'" Now, I can agree that the words "slut" and "ugly/fat" are indeed used to manipulate women into compliance… when used by other women in intrasexual competition. Unenlightened women don't like other women who "cheapen" what they see as their primary commodity, and they'll use cruel words to undermine the confidence of rivals.

Men do use "bitch" and "crazy," of course, and often together, but the idea that this is to obtain compliance is ridiculous. Any man who has been in an tumultuous relationship can tell you that using these words is more likely to further enrage the crazy bitch, rather than cause compliance. Most of the time, even as acknowledged in the article, men use these words in the presence of their friends as an expression of their frustration and bewilderment. It is most often venting their anger, in a relatively benign way, at women whose behavior is controlling or irrational.

O'Malley's article is mostly about the "crazy" appellation, so let's focus on that. Now when a guy calls a gal crazy, what does he tend to mean? It's usually not any sort of diagnosis of mental illness, but an accusation of stubborn irrationality. In fact the number of women with irrational behaviors and expectations are so common that they have become a part of popular culture.

A classic is the expectation that a man can know what a woman wants without her saying so. The statements "Oh, I don't need anything for my birthday," "Do whatever you want," "No, I don't mind if you go out," are all classic traps, women wanting men to do things for them not because they asked, but because they should want to themselves. Even when men would be perfectly willing to accommodate a woman's true wishes if asked, not spending the time/money the woman expects is seen as insulting, and a justification for anger. Other behaviors, like bringing up old, seemingly resolved disputes, or even dragging out confessed shame from the man's past, behaviors far more common from women, are also worthy of both the "crazy" and "bitch" titles.

Another example, in the same vein, is in the utterly one-sided dating dynamic. Men are expected to know when and how to "make a move," initiate contact, flirt with the right level of subtlety, all while being judged for their worthiness. And if a guy comes on too strong, he can be forcibly and angrily rejected, without any acknowledgement that that level of initiative would not only be accepted, but required to keep another woman's interest. Guys are attempting to do their best without any real cultural standard, so yes, reacting angrily when they violate your personal, unknowable timetable is both irrational and "bitchy".

Further, to a guy, screaming and crying are behaviors that are only permissible in extreme circumstances. Indeed, the sort of frenzied screeching women are free to engage in with their partners, and men in general, would be seen as threatening and abusive coming from a man. Which, of course, is because those behaviors are threatening and abusive, whoever they come from. If someone has driven you to the point that such behaviors are justified, the correct response is to leave, to end the relationship. Thus, whether justified from a cultural standpoint or not, these behaviors are irrational, or "crazy."

Another gem is, "When women are told over and over again that they're not allowed to feel the way they feel and that they're being "unreasonable" or "oversensitive," they're conditioned to not trust their own emotions."

When a woman asks, "How do I look?" what is the proper response when you don't like how she looks? For many, the expectation is a compliment. You see this a lot in the interactions of women with each other, too, where they ask how they look, or even insult themselves, fishing for compliments. Here's a clue: to many women, honesty is not the right approach. Or rather, it is, but only if you've properly conditioned yourself to always see them as the most beautiful creature in any room.

But, all too often, women interpret the actions of men (and other women), only through the lens of how it affects them. This is where the "unreasonable" and "oversensitive" labels are applied, when a woman takes offense at something you say or do, when your reasons for doing so have nothing to do with them. Indeed, that may well be part of the source of their offense, because these women expect all of your actions around them to be about them.

And should women "trust their own emotions"? Is not irrationality built into the very definition of emotions? Emotions aren't wrong, in and of themselves, but trusting them as a guide to action absolutely is. People's emotional reactions to events often include triggering from past, unrelated events, and it is completely unfair to unleash this torrent of emotion without first rationally examining it. Further, it is possible, in most situations, to misinterpret the action or intent of another, thus rendering your initial reaction unjust. You need to clarify before you react. Finally, you may be carrying subconscious prejudices and assumptions that cause you to react in an irrational way, even without these other factors. In other words, no, you shouldn't "trust your emotions," whether you're a woman or a man.

Yet, in part from the encouragement of white knights like O'Malley, women think that their emotions are always fully justified, that they are faultless in their overreactions to the perceived offenses of males, and that men calling them "crazy" for reacting with irrational high emotion to relatively mundane events are being oppressive.

Hate to tell ya, ladies, but avoiding accusations of irrationality, unreasonableness, and oversensitivity requires that you actually approach life rationally. You must examine your emotional reactions thoroughly before you act on them. Accept honesty when you ask a question. Don't expect others to conform to your unstated demands. Clarify the intent or meaning behind words and events before reacting. Until you do these things, bitch, you crazy.

Rape hysteria produces anti-rape wear for women

Attila L. Vinczer · 3 December 2013 · Archived copy · Original

"AR Wear – A clothing line offering wearable protection for when things go wrong."

One is left to wonder why women go to such extremes, or why they are led to "keep safe" from men when men generally protect women from harm much more than they ever harm them. Penis-proof clothing for women?

AVfM has reported that rape hysteria is potentially more dangerous for women than rape itself, which does not occur anywhere near as frequently as some within the "violence against women" industry would have us believe.

What is AR Wear?

"Confidence and protection that can be worn" claims the would-be purveyors of AR Wear. This line of clothing has been developed for women that, according to the manufacturer, is rape-resistant. The product seems cleverly designed, but is it rape-proof, or will it provide a false sense of security from a would-be attacker? Within their promotional video the makers describe the garments as having a layer of protection as well as the potential for frustrating an attack.

Detective French of the York Regional Police Sexual Assault Unit in Ontario said the "Anti Rape Wear" garment would not provide protection against rape. I asked him if wearing this garment would help women. "I wouldn't think it would deter anyone very much," he said. The Detective believes that if someone is intent on raping a woman, they will make her take that garment off. Detective French agreed that using force in general, any source of threats, compromises the woman's position particularly if she ends up in a situation from which it is difficult to escape. "If you can avoid it, not being in the situation would be optimal," he said.

[image]

> "The garments must be very difficult for someone else to remove by either force or stealth (in situations where the victim cannot resist because she has had too much to drink, was drugged, or is asleep)," claims the manufacturer.

[image]

What would happen if a rapist had a knife to your throat or a gun to your head? Would wearing AR Wear perhaps a create further danger? Could it frustrate (as the designers claim) and anger an attacker, putting victims in a more perilous situation?

AR Wear claims that self defense tools are ineffective in many common sexual assault settings. They claim that training in martial arts and/or self defense products such as pepper spray, tear gas, stun guns, etc. can only help if the potential victim is extremely alert and bold when an attack occurs. Worse still, products of self-defense can be taken from the victim and used against her.

Those that are trained in martial arts, including myself for 38 years, who work with women to develop strategies to avoid being assaulted, say the best defense is to not be in a compromised situation to begin with. They say if you do get caught in a compromised situation, you must think and act very quickly to remove yourself from harm's way. According to police and self-defense experts, this can only be attained by training the mind and body by repeatedly employing certain techniques, until you automatically react in a given situation. Striking eyes, ears, throat, groin and the solar plexus are great targets to stun your opponent and give you time to escape.

The police officers, military experts, martial arts experts I have worked with collectively agree that having even a gun or some other device in the hands of inexperienced people can be a detriment to your safety. I have not heard any discussion about the implication or benefit of an anti rape garment in a critical situation of rape or assault. It stands to reason the "AR Wear" garment would be ineffective and could contribute to putting the wearer into further danger and sense of false security.

Marnie of the Yellow Brick House, A women's shelter in Ontario, Canada is concerned about the AR Wear garment. She said;

> "I would be a little hesitant about it, it could increase the violence if someone is attempting to sexually assault their partner and they find out they're wearing this AR Wear. It could increase the level of violence because of being frustrated and being upset that their partner has chosen to wear this.
>
> With regards to cases where you're looking at a stranger, I don't know, I would need to find out more about it. Honestly I would be a little hesitant, I would be very hesitant about it. I would need to learn more about it. I think there's better options."

Men are often too shy to even talk to a woman for fear of rejection. Moreover, many men have become hypersensitive to being around women for fear of being accused of rape or assault. There is no proof that the majority of men have any semblance of thought to assault or rape women, but the rape and sexual assault hysteria created by special interest groups appears to have made us believe otherwise. It seems the makers of these garments are almost daring men to try to breach this protective gear. We know that even the most sophisticated safe can be breached, why would AR Wear think their product would be any different?

Many Men's Human Rights Activists say what is concerning is the perpetual false notion that men are lurking in every corner like tigers stalking their prey, ready to pounce on any woman who falls prey to them. It's mind boggling to watch the lengths women will go to shield themselves from what many would consider their own foolhardy and dangerous behavior. It seems women want everyone and everything garnered to their exclusive advantage when they themselves engage in dangerously foolish behavior by putting themselves at risk. Some say there is no device or law against being stupid.

But never fear, if a rapist did happen to breach this firewall of Anti Rape Wear, she may have another surprise up her sleeve. You may be stuck with this clever device on your penis. The RapeX, an anti rape condom will surely spike your stress level, should you accidentally penetrate a woman wearing this penis trap. It seems women want the exclusive onus on males and not her to be responsible when it comes to sexual and social interaction between men and women.

[image]

We have bullet proof vests for law enforcement officers, and now penis-proof equipment for women.

[image][image][image]

Will AR Wear consider developing anti rape-wear for men? We don't know. Tell us how you feel about this new line of clothing, AR Wear, Anti Rape Wear. Do you think it will deter rape? Do you think it will make no difference at all? Do you think educating women and girls on how to avoid compromising their wellbeing is the sensible and wise approach to the safety of women? Or will women continue to be taught to have unreasonable expectations no matter how irresponsible they may be?

Could AR Wear be the silver lining for men, the answer to the abundantly-growing false rape and sexual assault culture? Or will women continue to make false rape allegations even when they are wearing "penis proof" devices that would make such an act an impossibility? One might think that law enforcement and prosecutors will find ways to continue to accept hearsay from women as evidence, no matter how impossible or patently obvious the flaws may be.

Kevin Driscoll is innocent

Angry Harry · 3 December 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Publisher's note: Later tonight on AVFM Radio News and Activism, hosts James Huff and Robert O'Hara will welcome Kevin Driscoll to the show. In 2009, Mr. Driscoll was falsely prosecuted by District Attorney Michael Dugan and Deputy District Attorney Jody Stutsman Vaughan. We present an article by Angry Harry on the case which he wrote before the trial, in order to refresh our readers familiarity with the case and to introduce new readers to what happened to Mr. Driscoll, who was ultimately exonerated. PE

In January 2009, Kevin Driscoll of Redmond Oregon was charged with three counts of rape, one count of unlawful sexual penetration, one count of sodomy and one count of assault IV. The woman who accused him was an acquaintance of his. It is alleged that she has a history of dishonesty, of making false accusations – in one case, another allegation of rape – and of continually cheating on her husband.

Indeed, there is a video of her giving a man (not her husband) a hand job in a car park just before the alleged rape by Kevin Driscoll and, indeed, a video of her calmly and freely getting into Kevin Driscoll's car with Kevin Driscoll himself, only some two hours after his alleged raping of her. Not long prior to her alleged rape, she was cavorting naked with two or three men in a hot tub.

There is no significant evidence that any rape occurred. Kevin Driscoll denies vehemently that he raped her, but he concurs that he did have consensual sex with her prior to driving her to her car, which was parked a few miles away.

He has no history of dishonesty. No history of abusing anybody. And there is not a shred of decent evidence to suggest that Kevin Driscoll might have raped this woman.

And yet, here we are, October 2009, ten months later, and the situation for Kevin Driscoll – whose trial is due in November – is described by one of his friends as follows. But, before you read about what has happened to Kevin Driscoll since he was accused, let us just assume for the moment that all the evidence above is completely fabricated by his friends and that, in essence, this is just a he said/she said situation. Look at what happens to a man who is merely accused …

Angie says: Kevin is 30 and is very successful. Kevin had been working with the Federal aviation Administration for over 8 years. He was a Electrical Engineer that worked on landing systems at the airport. Kevin was also attending college again to pursue a career as a medical doctor.

He was planning on applying for medical school in the next few years.

Since this all happened he lost his Job.

The company from day one put him on leave until they gave it enough time so they can fire him. He has had to drop out of school because he is on house arrest.

Dont know if this blows his chance of ever getting into medical school. Hope not for his sake. He has had to pay for house arrest at the cost of $400 a month just so he can stay out of jail.

I hear his house is going into forclosure and is going to lose it. His friends alienated him after seeing it on the news. I hear his negibors talk about him being the negiborhood rapist.

I know his mother gave up her job of 15 years and moved right in to kevins house because he could only be release with a ankle bracelet and Third party (His mom) I know his mom and kevin has dumped every penny they have.

I talked to his mom and she just filed bankrupt and Kevin is going to have to soon. I hear this is up around 50, 000 dollars so far.

…

And what all men need to understand is that this shocking treatment of an innocent man (and he is supposed to be treated as if he was innocent by the justice system – until, and if, he is proved otherwise) is applicable to all men – at the whim of any female. But you, me and the law, are supposed to view Kevin Driscoll as an innocent man. And this means treating him as such; not just paying lip service to the notion of "innocent until proven guilty" while, behind everybody's back, he is treated as if he was guilty.

In other words, as I write this piece, Kevin Driscoll IS Innocent as far as I am concerned, and also as far as you and the justice system should be concerned. And there is just no way that what is being done to Kevin Driscoll can be called 'justice' – particularly by those who are working within the justice system. On the contrary, these legal officials have to be some of the most morally corrupt officials that we have dwelling amongst us currently.

And the pathetic excuse that, "We are only doing our jobs," is even more inexcusable than was the one used by the Nazis who ran the concentration camps and who claimed later that they were, "only following orders." At least, in the latter case, you might have been shot or sent to the war front for failing to carry out orders. Not so for people like Michael Dugan, the District Attorney, and Jody Stutsman Vaughan, the deputy.

No-one is pointing a gun at them.

And I really am very sorry to have to use such language to describe those officials who are part of this process, but, in my view, any human being who willfully hurts innocent others so horribly – seriously messing up their future lives – cannot get much lower. Indeed, even most people who end up in prison rarely sink as low as this. And the chances are that Michael Dugan and Jody Vaughan are mostly interested in their careers, rather than with anything to do with justice. By prosecuting `as many men as possible, they can show their voters just how tough they are on crime.

And thoroughly messing up the lives of innocent men is what these legal officials are quite prepared to do – especially if they can portray themselves as the heroic protectors of women.

Think about it.

There can be no other reason for them doing what they are doing to Kevin Driscoll – unless they also get some perverse sadistic pleasure out of doing such things. Either way; they must be deeply unpleasant characters, in my view. After all, people who mess up the lives of innocent others can surely not be regarded as anything else but deeply unpleasant.

No doubt, if Michael Dugan and Jody Vaughan were to read this article, they would protest and try to claim that they are merely trying to protect women. But no-one is criticising them for such a thing. If they want to protect women, fine. They can even put them in safehouses if they appear to be vulnerable.

But what should be completely unacceptable to everybody is for Michael Dugan and Jody Vaughan to treat so appallingly men who have not been convicted of anything, and whose histories do not appear to suggest that they are a threat to anybody. And, "We are just doing our jobs," has to be one of the lamest and most feeble of excuses imaginable. The media reporting of this alleged rape was no less prejudicial, apparently.

According to a USObserver article, News Channel 21 and local TV KOHD (ABC News) simply tried to whip up rape hysteria among the local community when it came to this alleged rape.

As is typical of many journalists currently working in the mainstream media, they demonised a man who was accused of sexual crimes simply in order to keep their readers sexually aroused and titillated. These hacks are nothing more than sleaze merchants who will harm other people simply in order to make an extra buck.

What we see going on here is a complete and utter corruption of the justice system; a truly sickening indictment not only of the system itself, but of those people who run it, and of those scavengers in the media business who seek to profit themselves by stirring up hatred towards a man who has not been found guilty of anything.

And for MRAs reading this; please, please, please try to understand that this disgusting state of affairs is only being maintained because of the greed and the self-serving dishonesty of those who run the justice system. And if we continue to allow these thoroughly corrupt individuals to get away with what they are doing, matters will simply get worse before we finally dethrone them – which we will.

Think about it.

You can lose EVERYTHING that you hold to be dear, just because officials like Michael Dugan and Jody Vaughan are prepared to take it all away from you in order keep their fancy jobs, and all because some woman – even one with no credibility at all – has made a sexual allegation. And if they are God-fearing people – which such officials in America usually proclaim themselves to be – then I can assure them that, "I was only doing my job," will not fool anyone who has any decent religious values.

Indeed, the castigation and vilification of all those people who willfully hurt innocent others has been common throughout all of the major religions across the world for the past two thousand years. It is about only thing that religious people throughout the whole of recorded history have ever agreed upon.

Why? Because it makes such good sense, because it is right, and because we can never live in decent societies if people are permitted to hurt innocent others with impunity. But Mr High-And-Mighty Michael Dugan and Ms Princess Lofty Jody Vaughan clearly think that they are exempt from such morality.

They clearly believe that this global, planetary-wide, moral imperative – to refuse to willfully harm innocent people – does not apply to them. They must believe themselves to be superior beings; even though their behaviour suggests that the complete opposite is true.

And, surely, if they think that it is OK to seriously harm innocent people in pursuit of their aims, then they can have no legitimate complaint if people decide to harm them in pursuit of their own aims. Indeed, they, themselves, are no longer innocent.

On the contrary, they have been breaking just about the most important moral code ever to have existed on this planet.

And we need to stop them; because we should never allow such people to have so much power over us, and we should certainly never allow morally-corrupt officials anywhere near our justice system.

…

End Note:

People who are prepared to harm seriously innocent others in pursuit of their self-serving aims – especially so when alternative routes are available – are morally corrupt.

So, please don't email me suggesting otherwise.

Sociologist declares women who reject feminism dark and foolish

AVfM Video Source · 3 December 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Aparently, women who question this sociologist's thinking have delicate lady-brains that don't work right, and they need him to do their critical thinking for them. Hear that ladies?

SparkyFister takes exception to this well-meaning and thoughtful man who just has women's best interests at heart, and knows what's best for them.

http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=jJ-jiO6-ZLI

SparkyFister is a bad, wicked man who thinks women should think for themselves and make up their own minds. He's probably a racist too. You should subscribe and keep an eye on him.

This is how disgusting feminists really are

AVfM Video Source · 3 December 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Extremely disturbing video footage from Argentina shows a mob of feminists at a recent protest attacking and sexually abusing a group of Rosary-praying Catholic men who were peacefully protecting the cathedral in the city of San Juan from threats of vandalism.

Charles Clymer. This is your feminism. This is the scum that you represent, and the scum that you are.

NSFW Warning. This video contains nudity. And pigs. PE

A pig wearing lipstick...

Jim Byset · 4 December 2013 · Archived copy · Original

It is undeniable that the Men's Human Rights Movement (MHRM) has gained traction in the past few years. Men's advocacy websites and interest groups have seen massive upsurges in membership and participation. Real world activism is taking discernible shape. Men's rights, often seen as a fringe, obscure movement is now shifting towards the centre of public consciousness with distinct groups now clearly apparent. Some (albeit tiny minorities) are characterized by their strongly political viewpoints – while others are apolitical. Some, such as the Japanese grass eating men and the North American MGTOWs eschew societal rules, in particular – romantic or committed involvement with the opposite sex; others welcome involvement with women and see male-female cooperation as vital to the success of the MHRM.

The global MHRM in India

Some label themselves as Men's Rights Activists (MRAs,) others Men's Human Rights Activists (MHRAs) and some, while advocating for men and families only recognize the existence of human rights as a whole, rather than the existence of rights specific, or more applicable to men, than to women. Put bluntly, it's a global, complex movement that for the most part operates with a surprising degree of mutual respect and harmony.

The mainstream media, hitherto oblivious to the growth of the MHRM is taking notice. Major news outlets are asking questions about what the MHRM is, who's involved, and what the issues are. While the media is yet to undertake a substantial survey of the myriad groups, divisions, politics, and realities of the wider MHRM, they are learning – albeit slowly. Results so far have been mixed. Balanced stories and accurate depictions of the MHRM are so far the exception. Reporting is too often misleading, misinformed, and relies far too heavily on the input of those diametrically opposed to the MHRM.

And sometimes, the results are just downright disastrous.

Earlier this year ABC's investigative documentary program 20/20 was forced to pull a piece purporting to profile the rise of the MHRM and the online 'Manosphere.' Prior to air, 20/20 ran a teaser trailer, with snippets from an interview with A Voice For Men's founder Paul Elam, and an accompanying article featuring Anita Sarkeesian – a woman universally despised within not only the MHRM but also the gaming community.

Sarkeesian's shady and questionable past as well as her opportunistic foray into gender-based criticism of the video game industry infuriated gamers and MHRAs alike (indeed both communities have a substantial demographical overlap.)

Anita Sarkeesian, contemplating video games she may or may not have played.

Sarkeesian's inclusion in the documentary was sufficient by itself to enrage the MHRM but there was more. It was evident from the trailer and the look of barely disguised contempt on the face of veteran journalist Elizabeth Vargas that the fix was in – and that objectivity was not high on either 20/20's, or Vargas' agenda.

Paul Elam, himself an unwilling 'veteran' of the media hit piece, saw the signs early. While happy of the coverage, Elam understood ABC's intentions and immediately made his feelings public. The wider MHRM, already skeptical of the mainstream media's agenda and poor track record, unleashed a maelstrom of ridicule and criticism at 20/20 and its producers – deconstructing their agenda in ABC's comment sections, social media sites , and creating online petitions to demand higher standards of journalistic integrity. So taken aback were ABC at the weight of public opinion against them, they pulled the piece, a move that only served to further anger many MHRAs.

As the ABC debacle demonstrated – the MHRM is not without power. Its burgeoning membership, predominantly young, educated, and diverse (not only in terms of gender but also sexual orientation and race) – is laying claim to new territory, in a way not considered possible before.

Feminism – traditionally perceived as the outsider, as the plucky underdog with a score to settle, is now widely acknowledged as the establishment – an establishment from which its traditional core support – young, impressionable female undergrads – is turning away from in droves. The propagandizing, the belabouring of tired clichés such as the myth of involuntary female domestic servitude or the gender pay gap has had its day. The old idée fixes, are just that – old.

Third wave feminism has only recently recognized that there is a massive conundrum at the centre of its existence – that of its increasing irrelevance. As the MHRM grew in popularity the feminist modus operandi wasn't to reach out to those involved or to seek acquiescence on issues affecting men and boys. Instead, feminists went on the offensive, hurling insult, lies, and cast the MHRM as well as individual MHRAs as misogynists, racists, homophobes – bigots of every imaginable variety. It was a strategy concocted by and for those with a lot to lose – highly paid university professors whose jobs, research grants, and tenure depended on the continued promulgation of feminist mythology, and low-level politicians, eager to further their careers by appealing to the ideological status quo.

Chris Green of the White Ribbon campaign, which is neither helpful nor fact-based.

It was a strategy implemented for the most part by naïve, acned undergrads, barely able to tie their own shoelaces, let alone disentangle complex ideology and propaganda from truth. This strategy did achieve a measure of success. The unwillingness on the part of some MHRAs to convene in public due to shaming, intimidation, and doxxing tactics from feminists proved effective.

However, in November 2012, those same tactics backfired in spectacular fashion at what was becoming the epicentre of feminist antagonism towards the MHRM, the University of Toronto.

'Protestors' some openly admitting that they were sent to the event by their gender studies professors, harried and physically intimidated attendees, pulled fire alarms, blocked entrances to the venue, were assaultive to police (called in because of violent behavior from feminists) and verbally abused those present. The video of the event, shot by Canadian filmmaker Steve Brulé, went viral. The violence and bullying tactics of feminist agitators were seen around the world.

It was a watershed moment.

The public were aghast and the media, playing catch-up with a movement comprised of mysterious MGTOWs and hermitic herbivores latched onto the story. It was an event that showed the public the true face of feminism, ugly, vicious – feral and it was an event that gave feminists serious pause for thought. The old ways of intimidation, verbal abuse, shaming, violence – would no longer work. That night steeled many within the MHRM who returned to Toronto in September 2013 and faced down the defunct gay activist group 'Bashback.' Bashback, reduced to a ragtag bunch of professional protestors tried and failed to shame MHRAs convened at Queen's Park in Toronto – there to acknowledge the crisis facing men and boys in society. Activists representing A Voice For Men, CAFE, the National Coalition For Men, Men's Rights Edmonton, Men's Human Rights Ontario, among others were present and shouted back against the shaming tactics – their voice was clear – "we will not be shamed anymore."

This too, was another watershed.

The increasing awareness of feminism as a special interests group, dedicated to enhancing the circumstances of already over-privileged women at cost to society generally is reaching a critical mass. Attendant to this is the growing recognition of the legitimacy of men's human rights. Feminists, now aware of their impending extinction and the intensifying acceptance of the MHRM have begun in recent months to change the record, or at least, to attempt to place it in a shinier sleeve.

In a bid to stop the bleeding, feminists have sparked a debate about rebranding. Led by Elle magazine, the campaign has sought to undo the negative connotations around feminism. From Elle journalist, Hannah Swerling: 'The conversation about feminism, what it means and more importantly, what it means to you, is one that runs continually at ELLE HQ. That's why in the November issue, we invited three feminist groups to work with three award-winning advertising agencies to re-brand a term that many feel has become burdened with complications and negativity.

Of course – it is magnificently ironic that a glossy women's magazine, heavy on aspirational consumerism, should take such a leading role in modern feminism. It speaks volumes as to just how out of touch with reality feminism has become.

Yet this rebranding is not the only change taking place.

Feminists are beginning to begrudgingly accept the existence of men's issues. Refusing to fully relinquish their victim narrative, however, feminists have attached the caveat that MHRAs should not blame feminism for the existence of issues that affect men and boys. November 19th saw the celebration of International Men's Day – an event that in previous years was mostly ignored by everybody outside of the MHRM. This year, though, was different. The celebration was covered by the mainstream media – with numerous feminist writers acknowledging the event, but also using the opportunity to issue edicts on discussion related to the role of feminism. They were not to be blamed – for anything. While a lot of the coverage was plainly bigoted and demeaning, some was more even-handed – and some was actually positive.

Feminism is changing. For the most part, those changes are cosmetic but feminism has a long history of coopting popular causes, and this is something that the MHRM needs to protect against. The softening of rhetoric from feminists may indicate a future attempt to appropriate the issues of the MHRM. Feminists have tried, and failed to convince not only the MHRM but the general public that they were addressing issues important to men and boys. Of course, this was a massive lie, predicated on the idea that smashing the ludicrously imagined patriarchy would fix everything. It is likely, that in yet another act of window dressing akin to the Elle rebranding, and previous coopting, that feminism will try to appropriate men's human rights issues in a bid to obviate the necessity for an MHRM independent of feminism.

It won't succeed.

Feminism has been exposed and no amount of rebranding, rewording, or special pleading will cover over the truth.

They have lost trust; they have lost legitimacy.

They have lost.

Editor's note: This item is reprinted from Men's Human Rights Ontario, images of Anita Sarkeesian and Chris Green reprinted under Commons License per Wikimedia Commons license specified here and here.

Letter to the Queen of England on behalf of males

Attila L. Vinczer · 4 December 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Over the past 6 years or so, I have been closely working with two families in Ontario, Canada where the father in each case has been maliciously prosecuted on the mere words of the disgruntled daughter.

> These two men are known as "Lone Wolf" and "Maximus Ferox."

There was absolutely no evidence in either case. None. I am not permitted to publish the names of the alleged perpetrators, or the alleged victims, due to a publication ban. Consequently I had to cross out the names of the two victims within the letter I have written to the Queen of England for publication at large. When I say victims, I do mean the fathers, as they and their families are the true victims.

False allegations are very near to me as I came very close to being jailed for a false sexual allegation concocted by my ex wife and aided by her sister and family. When I see these men, fathers, taken out of the courtroom in handcuffs, I see myself in their shoes. It is a feeling so deep, that it leaves me feeling numb and shocked as chills run throughout my body realizing how close I came to that exact end. These chills then quickly turn to energy that drives me to work hard, fighting vehemently to stop this tyrannical madness against men. The worst thing we can do is to remain silent. That is exactly what the establishment wants: men to suffer in silence. They want to be able to execute their power exacting a heavy blow against innocent men.

In the case against Lone Wolf, his aboriginal name, a senior Crown Attorney pulled him into a room at the courthouse and privately told him, "I know you are innocent. I sat through your entire trial. I know she is lying. I can not hang for you to go against another Crown. I am sorry." And he walked out leaving Lone Wolf alone in the room adjacent to the courtroom he was being sentenced in.

I can not stress enough how important it is to be audio recording all the time when in these predicaments. Had he been recording, he would be a free man today. The person with the running recorder had just stepped into the bathroom. Now alone, the senior Crown Attorney attempted to clean his conscience, knowing an innocent man had been wrongly convicted.

Understandably, these men being maliciously prosecuted are nervous and scared. They often believe that by complying with the desires of the establishment, their situation will resolve to the better. This time and time again has been proven to be a fatal mistake. It does not get better. It does not resolve itself. In fact it enables these tyrants to continue doing what they do with impunity, with anonymity and in secrecy. We must break the silence!

> "We must break the silence!"

Exhausting all other avenues, I chose to write a letter to the Queen of England, as she is the Most High in Canada. That is why we refer to the prosecutor as "the Crown" or occasionally those work in it as "Crown."

This letter is also being shared with all the Members of Parliament in Canada and all the Members of the Provincial Parliament in Ontario. It is also being copied to the Pope, the Prime Mister of Canada, Grand Master Fra' Matthew Festing and to Monsignor Imre Kozma. We must disseminate to the world for all to know what crimes are being committed against the good citizens of Canada–a set of crimes increasingly spreading beyond Canada and throughout the world. The time has come for men to stand up and loud that we are not capitulating to the abuse of males any longer.

The time has also come for more women to support their men and speak in outrage to their abuse. Enough is enough. The abuse stops here and it stops now! Please take a moment by clicking here to express your concern and outrage to our Prime Minster of Canada that malicious prosecution of men is prevalent and unacceptable abuse of our Criminal Judicial system, designed to keep the Queen's Peace, not to disturb it at the expense of usually males.

Be sure your letter is free of profanity and written in a diplomatic respectful manner, please.

My letter to The Queen follows:

[image]

THE CANADIAN MALTESE CHARITABLE SERVICE TRUST

59 Claywood Road, Toronto, Ontario, Canada M2N 2R3

[image]

Attila L. Vinczer, to ER, Her Majesty the Queen October 26, 2013 Her Majesty the Queen Buckingham Palace London, England SW1A 1AA

Your Majesty: As a Canadian Citizen, I am impelled to bring to your urgent attention, matters of grave concern that is systematically ravaging Canadians throughout this land. A condition that exists within all the Commonwealth Nations. Please allow me to explain, Your Royal Majesty.

Over the centuries, many regimes have attempted to undermine and destroy our freedoms and democracies. Arguably, it was the family, the fundamental essence of a nation, that was under attack. Those attacks were gallantly fought off by loyal soldiers to ensure the sanctity of our family's freedoms and democratic way of life was preserved. Many of those soldiers made the ultimate sacrifice, thereby giving us the safety of life over their own.

Before I delve into these matters of grave concern, not to be remiss, it gives me a great deal of pleasure to congratulate you on your newest member of the Royal Family, Prince George and his recent Christening. Undoubtedly, there is no other greater gift, than the gift of life, the makeup of families and indeed our nations.

I am a 49 year old single father of two wonderful boys. It was my own family turmoil that led to a deeper desire to help my fellow man as I was astounded to see the state of affairs our families are in. Since my early twenties, I have always been benevolent, especially towards children. Perhaps it was my own father who bestowed this wondrous trait upon me.

Peter Vinczer, my 76 year old father, has been on his own since the age of 14 as the iron curtain came between his family and his father. He co-founded with Monsignor Imre Kozma, the Canadian Maltese Charitable Services trust 18 years ago. It is here and within many other organization I continue thriving my benevolent endeavours helping my fellow man.

Recently the Order of Malta celebrated 900 years of existence at the Vatican. His Most Eminent Highness Fra' Matthew Festing, Prince and Grand Master of the Sovereign Military Hospitaller Order of St. John of Jerusalem, of Rhodes and of Malta, Most Humble Guardian of the Poor of Jesus Christ, bestowed the honour to lead a delegation of 5,000 Maltese Knights to Monsignor Imre Kozma of Hungary. The Hungarian Chapter is the most active of all, with a yearly budget of $300 million Euros, by donations alone. Our motto is, "Tuitio fidei et obsequium pauperum."

While I digressed slightly to shed light on whence I come to beseech your much needed help, Your Majesty, I respectfully draw attention to our families who are currently under certain attack. Over 50% of families end up broken in divorce. Children's mothers and fathers are torn apart. Family court aided by lawyers, police, mostly unregistered child protection workers, physicians, foster homes, educators, government, women's shelters and countless lobby groups all attribute in varying degrees to ravaging loving families.

This leads to traumatized children as they endure the pain of watching their mother and father torn apart. Moreover, in Canada 8 men and 2 women will commit suicide each and every day as the ravages of divorce and broken homes becomes unbearable. Crushed and broken, extinguishing one's own life becomes the only viable means to stop the anguish, adversity and complete and utter despair. Children are left in the dark shadows of this destruction. We must take better care of our children, our very future.

Regrettably, I am further impelled to inform you that our laws, designed to keep the Queen's Peace are being surreptitiously and deliberately perverted for ulterior motives in alarmingly vast cases brought before the courts. Innocent men and even boys as young as 12 are being maliciously prosecuted under the Criminal Code of Canada by unscrupulous vexatious allegations with often not much more than the mere hearsay of the accuser. This is akin to the witch hunts in Salem an act that was eventually deemed as a gross miscarriage of justice.

Within the organizations I work, such as Canada Court Watch and A Voice for Men, we have documented hundreds of cases of judicial abuse that is harming families. Unregistered Children's Aid Workers, unlawfully practising social work, who refuse to register are known to produce perjured affidavits. Police officers are mandated to arrest the male in Domestic Violence Calls despite the fact that Domestic Violence is roughly equal between men and women. Prosecutors turn a blind eye, freely pushing for convictions and failing to adhere to the principals of fundamental justice they are sworn to uphold in the general interest of the public.

Many times the male will get arrested even though the male called police for help. Children are removed by Children's Aid Workers from parents for absolutely no reason. Some of these children are abused in care while other children sadly succumb to the abuse.

Ex parte restraining orders are issued without just cause and without proper judicial examination usually against husbands and fathers. Consequently fathers are being removed from their homes without just cause at an alarming rate, literally tossed to the curb. Children are growing up without their fathers. Within schools, children as young as 12, most often boys, are arrested for normal incidents of child play and by false or misleading allegations.

The aforementioned is just a minor sampling of what is going on in Canada today, and in fact within all the Commonwealth Countries and other nations.

Your Majesty, the most disturbingly egregious circumstance is the vast number of innocent men who are maliciously prosecuted and consequently incarcerated for crimes they did not commit. Recently, William Mullins-Johnson was freed by AIDWYC, Aid In Defence of the Wrongly Convicted. An innocent man who spent 12.5 years behind bars for the murder of his niece that he did not commit. In fact there was no murder as the child died of natural causes. The Government of Ontario paid him $4.25 million dollars of compensation for his wrongful conviction and incarceration. There are far too many other such cases that effect horrible conditions on families, but none more then the men they maliciously target.

Over the past two years I have closely worked with two such families where the father was prosecuted for crimes they did not commit. In both cases, there was no evidence and the Crown's case was built strictly on hearsay. Xx Xxxxx, was sentenced to 10 years in prison. A husband and father to six children. On Monday, October 28, 2013 another innocent man, Xxxx Xxxxxxx, son of Xxxx Xxxxxxx a decorated war vet, will be sentenced to an expected 10-12 years for crimes he did not commit. A husband and a father to 4 children.

Such malicious prosecutions lead to terrible devastation of families leaving the very fabric of society in tatters. These are the men who have and would again fight gallantly to preserve our freedoms and democracy, protecting our families, our nation. If we so destroy our men, who I ask will be left to preserve our freedoms and democracy, we far too often take for granted? Sadly there appears to be a war festering within our nation against the male population. As I mentioned, in Canada 8 men and 2 women will commit suicide each and every day as they are literally driven to their ropes end by the devastation of divorce and family breakdown. Divorced men are 8 times as likely to take their own life than a woman in the general population. This is telling of how dire the situation is, particularly for our men and boys.

We have sought your help in the past for Maurice Conway, a war veteran who was raped. The woman that raped him managed to go before the Ontario courts and obtain a child support order for a baby that she conceived by the criminal act of raping a man. There was not enough money left over from his military pension for the basic needs of life. The courts eventually capitulated quashing the child support order when they realized what had been done and that your Highness was made aware of the miscarriage of justice.

Indeed, I am sure many seek your help and have done so for hundreds of years before you. This time it is our fathers, brothers, uncles, sons and grandfathers who collectively seek your Majesty's help. It would appear that while the courts are doing a good job in many cases, there is grave concern about malicious prosecution based on vexatious false allegations of rape, Domestic Violence and other sexually related allegations. They are used to get a leg up in divorce court against men. They are used to inflict vengeance against a boyfriend, a father, a husband or against seemingly any man by women who cry wolf. It is concerning that those women who are real victims of these horrible crimes, may not be taken seriously given the vast number of false allegations.

I have discovered that the Royal Family are Honorary Members of the Law Society of Upper Canada. Within the Criminal Court it is the Crown that prosecutes citizens brought before the courts. Regrettably, the act of malicious prosecution undermines the good name of the Royal Family putting our judicial system in serious disrepute and tarnishing the Royal Family's good reputation. My own 12 year old son was subject to this tyranny earlier this year based on fabrications by a school principal. The Crown prosecutor refused to withdraw the charge laid against my son until I made it patently clear I would make the matter public.

My eyes were opened up to the injustices within Family and Criminal Court 7 years ago when I too was subjected to a very serious false sexual allegation in Family Court. Were it not for the very good advice of a retired police officer to tape record everything, I too would be in jail today had I not captured the plot on my voice recorder.

Over the years I have helped and worked with hundreds of people who are being slighted by the courts. It is having a devastating effect on our families. I am unable to turn a blind eye to this, as my fellow man is being grossly harmed by egregious judicial acts. Innocent men sent to jail every day. I am unable to rest easy knowing this terrible condition continues unabated.

True to the moto of the Order of Malta, "Always on the side of the needy." I am doing what I can to help my fellow man, but I am unable to help enough as I am only one man. We desperately beseech your assistance to ensure that the Criminal Courts and all those within our judicial realm actually keep the Queen's peace and not disturb it. We seek your help to ensure that nobody is maliciously prosecuted and to ensure that all Canadians can live in peace and harmony in a free and democratic land of Canada.

I respectfully and humbly ask that you write to the Prime Minister of Canada, the Right Honourable Stephen Harper that he would carefully review the concerns I have brought before your Majesty the Queen of England and encourage him to take what ever steps needed to stop the abuse within our judicial system.

"Long live the Queen" and "Long live the Royal Family."

Respectfully yours,

The Canadian Maltese Charitable Service Trust

Attila L. Vinczer

Secretary

ALV/kvs

cc pope Francis, Prime Minister Stephen Harper, Grand Master Fra' Matthew Festing, Monsignor Imre Kozma

Michelle Obama is a feminist nightmare? You're goddamn right she is!

Janet Bloomfield (aka JudgyBitch) · 4 December 2013 · Archived copy · Original

This is Michelle Cottle, a delightfully deluded and viciously misogynist contributor at Politico, who writes that First Lady Michelle Obama has betrayed the sisterhood by caring about her husband, her children, food for the nation's children (all of them), wounded soldiers and … gasp! Literacy!

The ability to read?

Who needs that?

> Here, finally, was an issue worthy of the Ivy-educated, blue-chip law firm-trained first lady, a departure from the safely, soothingly domestic causes she had previously embraced. Gardening? Tending wounded soldiers? Reading to children? "She essentially became the English lady of the manor, Tory Party, circa 1830s," feminist Linda Hirshman says.

Let's think this through, shall we?

Michelle cares about her husband.

Michelle's husband Barry works long hours, travels extensively, shoulders a wee bit of responsibility, and faces down some formidable opposition to his ideas about how to do his job. He answers not to an immediate superior, but to the ENTIRE FUCKING NATION.

No pressure.

Barry and Michelle have two children. When Barry got his job, Michelle realized that there was more at stake than just her own personal happiness and she made a choice: she would be there for Barry, and in doing so, be there for their children when he couldn't be.

What a dumb bitch.

She went to law school, people! Can't she afford some other brown lady to raise up those children for her, just like all the white ladies do? What's the matter, Michelle? Something about that feel not quite right?

While there are many, many fault lines in feminism, I think this attack on Michelle Obama highlights one of the most important ones: feminism hates black women in particular, especially when black women align their interests with the men in their community rather than the white ladies who would rather black women fall in line, after they are finished picking up the white lady's kids from school, making dinner for the white lady's husband and ironing the white lady's shirts, which she needs to do her important job as an administrative assistant for some man who is not her husband.

Since when have black women had the luxury of being at home, gardening and caring for their own children rather than someone else's? What would happen if a whole lot of black women decided Michelle and Barry had the right idea and that the nuclear family is, after all, the best form of family organization? What if they stopped cooking and cleaning and gardening and ironing and raising white children and decided to spend all that energy on their own communities and their own families?

Feminist nightmare indeed.

This faultline has been in feminism since it's very inception. White women have done a glorious job convincing themselves and countless millions of others that they have somehow managed to "catch up" with the work men have always done and are now participating on more or less equal footing in the labor market. The wage gap is closing! More women in the board rooms! Women are graduating in record numbers from colleges and universities!

This is all supposed to represent incontrovertible evidence that women are indeed not just as good as men, but BETTER! Men are obsolete! It's the end of men!

In the first place, it's all a giant smokescreen obscuring the fact that most women are doing nothing more than HOUSEWORK in the labor force, earning college degrees in hard subjects like reading, dancing, feeling and caring for small children, while men continue to design, build, operate, maintain and repair the communication, energy, transportation, sanitation and protective services infrastructure that makes all the housework jobs even possible.

And in the second place, the women feminism champions are by and large RICH WHITE WOMEN, who go out of their homes every day to perform some housewifely service for some man other than their husbands and leave the work their own families entail to women of color and poor women, who must neglect their own children and husbands to provide for the white woman's.

All the discussion about "intersectionality" and "inclusiveness" in mainstream feminism is pure sophistry: if feminism were to address the interests of ALL women, it would quickly collapse, because the white ladies cannot engage in their teary-eyed hand wringing over the plight of poor colored ladies without immediately implicating themselves as the principal source of racism and exploitation.

Intersectionality and inclusiveness has never been part of feminism and never can be.

You know where women of color and poor women WILL find their own unique perspectives and interests addressed?

In the Men's Human Rights Movement – MHRM. The moment women of color put the interests of their sons, brothers, husbands, fathers, grandfathers, uncles, nephews and every other black man at the center of their quest for equal rights and responsibilities, they will find the inclusiveness feminism can never deliver.

Feminism promises equality, but is only really interested in equality that delivers a benefit to white women. Where is the cry for equal sentencing before the courts of law? Where is the cry that 50% of all workplace related deaths are women? Where is the cry that half of the nation's garbage collectors and sewage treatment workers are women? Where is the cry that half of all the homeless and indigent be women?

Ew. Icky. Pick up garbage? Gross! And who cares about criminal sentencing anyways? It's mostly black thugs who get the harshest sentences, and the more of them in jail, the easier it is to exploit the women left behind. Please don't forget to vacuum the cat hairs off my couch, Jemima, and make sure you give Bootsie her fresh liver pate. You did make her fresh liver pate, right?

I will no doubt be accused of conspiracy: feminists caaaaaaare about black women and they aren't silent about wildly disproportionate sentencing of young black men because they want a steady supply of exploitable domestic labor. No, no, no. That's just a coincidence.

Men of color have long known that the MHRM has inclusiveness at its core, as have gay men, disabled men, poor men, every other category of man you can think of: no condition other than the simple fact of biological sex comes in to play when it comes to infant genital mutilation. Boys, no what matter their skin color, social status, ethnicity, ability – irrespective of any social condition you can think of – can be legally mutilated during infancy. Pick any other issue: suicide doesn't care how rich you are, the school system doesn't care what color your skin is – boys of every class and race and group will be marginalized.

Women of color have been trying for 80 years to be included in the broad category of "women" that feminism purports to represent.

It will never happen.

And when very successful, accomplished black women like Michelle Obama decide to make their husband and children a priority, they are called "traitors" and "nightmares".

Nightmares: black and scary.

But in Michelle Obama's story lies a kernel of truth, a breath of freedom and honesty and a message we need to get out to women of color in particular: the civil rights of men ARE the civil rights of women.

All women.

We cannot possibly be equal until we are ALL equal.

> I am a firm believer in the people. If given the truth, they can be depended upon to meet any national crisis. The great point is to bring them the real facts.

Abraham Lincoln

The truth is very simple: until men, all men and not just rich white men have equal rights under the law, no man or woman will have equal rights.

Waiting for rich white women arguing with rich white men to notice the interests of everyone is like waiting for a lioness to care about the plight of the earthworms who create the soil that nurtures the life of her entire world.

It won't happen. 20/20 says the MHRM lives in the underbelly of the internet. The deep dark recesses. Well, that's where life begins, no?

It might be dark down here at the moment, but we aren't afraid of the dark. Even when the dark we are talking about is the color of your skin.

All men matter. And so do all women.

And together, we can change the world.

Lots of love,

JB

Men do totally pointless things for no good reason

AVfM Video Source · 4 December 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Men doing pointless things for absolutely no reason at all. Losers living out of their mother's basements, obviously.

Ain't it grand?

More from The Piano Guys here.

Masks Off – A Challenge to Men is hate-propaganda

AVfM Video Source · 4 December 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Never mind that men are the majority of rape victims and all forms of violence, that female perpetrators of all forms of assault, sexual and otherwise, are ignored, marginalized, or quickly forgiven by a misandrist culture and a gynocentric legal system. Never mind that this ad infantalizes women while inculcating shame and self-loathing onto men, making them feel personally responsible for violence that is everybody's problem. Let's just "cure" men of their "toxic masculinity," right?

I made sure to leave some comments. It should be interesting to see if they stay. They were immediately responded to by people spouting things like "patriarchy." We encourage you to give them your opinion too: hate propaganda like this is disgusting and should be called what it is. –DE Leave Nick Reading alone!!!!

AVfM Video Source · 4 December 2013 · Archived copy · Original

We suppose some people won't get the joke, but we were laughing our asses off. Men's Rights Edmonton kicks ass.

Don't be mean to poor Nick! We love you Nick, we love you!

(You should subscribe to MRA Edmonton.

Paternity fraud champion practitioner, Jemima Aiton

Robert St. Estephe · 5 December 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Robert St. Estephe–Gonzo Historian–is dedicated to uncovering the forgotten past of marginalizing men. "Gonzo journalism" is characterized as tending "to favor style over fact to achieve accuracy." Yet history – especially "social history" – is written by ideologues who distort and bury facts in order to achieve an agenda. "Gonzo" writing is seen as unorthodox and surprising. Yet, in the 21st century subjectivity, distortion and outright lying in non-fiction writing is the norm. Fraud is the new orthodoxy. Consequently, integrity is the new "transgressive."

Welcome to the disruptive world of facts, the world of Gonzo History.

●●●

Paternity fraud is a major issue nowadays. It has been on the increase in recent decades. Paternity fraud is frequently employed in order to defraud money from the targeted non-father. The scam has been around, it should go without saying, for centuries. The story of Scotswoman Jemima Aiton, who plied her industrial scale racket in the early decades of the 20th century, offers an example of one of history's greatest practitioners of the art of paternity fraud.

***

[image]

FULL TEXT:

"Queen of Hearts" Rich Lovers Bluffed by Her Bogus Baby – How a Low-Born Scotch Girl Used a Stolen Child For An Extraordinary Career of Crime For Which She Now Must Pay —

A dour old Scottish magistrate glared angrily down upon pretty, wayward Jemima Aiton a few days ago, signed an ominous looking official document, and said to her: "They tell me they call you the 'Queen of Hearts' in the gambling dens of Glasgow. But to me you seem to be the very queen of clever, conscienceless, criminal schemers. Your crime is without precedent. Your plan was diabolical. It is with a clear conscience that I sentence you to prison."

And certainly no criminal of either sex has stood at the bar of justice in Glasgow in this decade for a more unusual crime

Jemima Aiton, twenty-three, and the wife of a man she managed to mislay a few years ago, when she found his honest affection beginning to pall, was convicted of stealing a baby boy less than a month old. The amazing young woman took the infant, not to satisfy an overdeveloped mothering instinct, nor because she loved the babe. She stole him to use in her business – just as other adventuresses use compromising photographs and bundles of torrid love letters.

Representing him as her own, she wheedled, blarneyed coaxed, bullied and blackmailed hundreds of pounds out of a score of men who knew her well. For lovers with whom she had been indiscreet (alas, there were several such!), she had one story.

"He's our bairn, lad," she would say to such a one. "Yours and mine. He's the very picture of you. And how in the world I'm going to bring him up, I don't know."

If that didn't do the business, she would burst into tears. But as a rule it wasn't necessary.

[image]

For elderly admirers who had restrained their ardor, and were not in her power she had another story, equally affecting: "Poor laddie," she would croon, looking at the stolen babe with an all but Madonna-like affection. "His father – my husband – is a drunkard and a wastrel, and I don't know where he is. And how in the world I'm going to bring the boy up, I don't know."

It always got back to that to a question of how she was going to bring him up. Just how many slightly silly middle-aged men of affairs contributed to the exchequer of the tricky grass widow and her bogus baby the authorities don't pretend to know.

When the girl stood in the dock for sentencing, there was just one fact in her favor, and that was what prevented her from getting a much longer term, than she did get. It was that she had not abused the child.

Jemima was born in a tiny Scotch hamlet on the manor, not a great way from "Kilmarnock" and Glasgow. Until she was married, she was never in a town of as many as 500 inhabitants. When twelve years old she was put out to service in the household of a prosperous farmer of the neighborhood, who worked her long hours and hard. Between that and her fifteenth year she saw enough hard work to become aware that she didn't like it and didn't intend to make her living by it. At fifteen she married Alton, a good-looking, shiftless, younger son of a fairly well-to-do family of the village, and escaped from the servants' hall.

Since then, Jemima has confessed she married Aiton because he represented her only possible mode of escape from the hamlet, on the moor. The boy was without ambition; and having gotten the girl, he was prepared to settle down at home, but she "kept at him" until he moved away to Kilmarnock with her.

She was satisfied with Kilmarnock for a few months. After her native village, which was just a "wide place in the road," as an American would say, the larger town seemed a veritable metropolis. Inevitably, however, the day came when she demanded wider horizons, and the flustered and uncomfortable young husband shook himself out of his pleasant lethargy and raised the fare to Glasgow.

Once, there, the sixteen-year-old bride left Aiton in no doubt as to the course she intended to pursue. She ran away from him their first night in the big city, and began to dance her way down that primrose path so many young girls have traveled.

[image]

Without any money when she cut herself adrift, from Aiton, she became almost overnight a member of the "gay set" on the fringe of the half world, and a few weeks later a notorious gambler succumbed to the lure of her vivid, restless, disturbing beauty, and set her up in a cottage in the suburbs.

Month followed month and Jemima followed her card sharper – sometimes playing cards herself, sometimes aiding him, sometimes tolling in victims to be fleeced, earning her title of "Queen of Hearts."

Constancy, though, was not in Jemima's make-up and in time she tired of her gambling sweetheart, and his occasional periods of poverty. Thrown into association with gay young men of fashion, elderly playboys of social standing and business men sowing belated wild oats, she began to turn the acquaintance to financial advantage.

Once a young Scotch laird was her "protector," and squandered upon her the pennies and pounds wrung from the miserable tenants on his mountainy estate. Once a canny Glasgow banker set her up in a magnificent establishment, imported servants and furniture for her, gave her a splendid car of her own, and a little checking account. A crown prosecutor was an admirer once; a shipping magnate lavished a small fortune upon her.

Shrewd, with a peasant shrewdness in matters of money, Jemima of the moors lost out, with her various prosperous admirers because of a constitutional inconstancy in her, and because of common tastes which not even the best of clothes and the politest of surroundings could erase. In her heart, the country girl yearned for the tawdry crowds she knew as the card sharper's sweetheart, and even after she became the favorite of a succession of wealthy men she could not down her liking for the showy and the vulgar.

The banker heretofore alluded to concluded his liaison with the former servant, maid when he found a dance hall dandy leaving the apartment early one misty morning. The shipping magnate quit in disgust when he found that his wild rose of the moors was stealing from his arms to meet a public house rowdy who had been a prize fighter.

With patrons vanishing, money going, and her beauty somewhat tarnished by the wild night life she had been leading, the canny girl from the country began to take thought of her predicament and to plan a coup that would make her financially independent.

Apparently she decided against further amours with elderly admirers well, stocked with silver, reasoning that such affairs were too boring, and, besides, interfered with her freedom.

Just when the idea of using a baby to further her failing fortunes occurred to her, the police didn't establish clearly at the time of the Glasgow trial. One witness did say that he proposed marriage to her not knowing that the absent Mr. Aiton was still her legal husband. He painted a glowing picture of the joys of motherhood, which made her laugh, at first, and then made her stop and loot reflective and calculating.

It wasn't a great while after that at any rate, that she began to scan the little personal advertisements in the Glasgow newspapers, keeping her own counsel while she did so. And one day her eye lighted on the following "agony item": "Young mother, unmarried, wishes to place infant, son with kindly, respectable people. Child may be legally adopted. Mother is unable to support him."

The advertisement had been sent in from Kilmarnock, and after some red tape had been unraveled, Jemima Aiton journeyed to that town and met Ellen MacDougall and her small son, Andrew. One of those flighty after-the-war romances had ended tragically for Ellen, with a baby on her hands, and the shiftless roving father in flight to avoid responsibility. The child was only twenty days old, and the young mother, "on her own," was obliged to go to work.

Ellen MacDougal, the mother of the bogus baby Jemima Aiton used in her clever scheme for living a life of luxury at the expense of unsuspecting victims

The fair but false Jemima professed the most unrestrained admiration for the baby, and assured the unhappy mother that she would love him and rear him as he should be reared. Also, that, she (Ellen) would be permitted to see him frequently.

With that understanding, they started out to the parish council office of Kilnarnock to make the arrangements for the adoption. Of course the "Queen of Hearts" had no intention of effecting such a step. She had studied the lay of the land; had on the way to the office she gave the real mother of the puny infant the slip, and took him back to Glasgow in a cab.

The enterprising Jemima did not relish the care of the infant, which she had to undertake herself to make her plan stand up and almost immediately she went to work upon the admirers mentioned at the beginning of the story. The first victim was a middle-aged draper, it has been learned. With a wife, and daughters almost as old as Jemima herself, he did not argue much, nor protest when she told him the boy was his and she needed money to rear him, the indiscreet draper went straightaway to the bank and returned with close to a hundred pounds. A bank official, elderly, single, and of unquestioned probity and right business was the next. His guilty conscience made him a coward when she taxed him with paternity, and he made his contribution and slunk away.

With a few circumspect men who had been loitering around her little house in Glasgow without, compromising .themselves, the young woman was obliged to be more subtle, but her art was equal to the demands upon it. Knowing she had no holdover then she told them she was a grass widow, that her worthless lout of a husband had left her as their child was coming and that she faced a bleak future unless she got aid from friends. The appeal seldom failed to work.

Having profaned mother love as she plucked her victims, Jemima Aiton was beaten by it in the end. Ellen MacDougal did not weep a little and forget when the schemer stole her baby. She began a search which finally led her to Jemima's Glasgow parlor – and her son.

["'Queen of Hearts' Rich Lovers Bluffed by Her Bogus Baby – How a Low-Born Scotch Girl Used a Stolen Child For An Extraordinary Career of Crime For Which She Now Must Pay," The Ogden Standard Examiner (Ut.), Jul. 23, 1927, Magazine section, p. 1]

***

Marriage is slavery

Peter Wright · 5 December 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Modern marriage evolved from a historical ritual designed to indenture slaves to masters, though most people have forgotten this history. However, many of the behaviors and rituals central to this history can still be discerned in modern marriage.

It's thought that the practice of exchanging wedding rings extends far back into ancient history, with evidence of the ritual being found in Ancient Egypt, Rome, and within several religious cultures. However our modern-day practice of giving wedding rings has a very different origin and meaning, one which may make you, well, cringe a little. As suggested on the Society of Phineas blog, the ring functions as a feudalistic contract between the man and his wife:

> "The ring functions as a proof of ability in the supplicant vassal's pledge to the wife. This is true given the traditional expectation of the amount of resources to be expended in purchasing the ring along with providing for the wedding day. In this gynocentric environment, it's total sacrilege to not present a woman with her One Ring or to present one that is substandard to her or her friends. She uses her One Ring as a social proof of her status around Team Woman (it's a competition much like Valentine's Day gifts), as she will not hesitate to show it off as much as possible when she first gets it if it meets with her approval." [1]

This contention finds support from medievalist scholars who show the origin of our ring-exchanging ritual is found in early literary sources and in artistic depictions of the Middle Ages. H.J. Chaytor, for instance wrote "The lover was formally installed as such by the lady, took an oath of fidelity to her and received a kiss to seal it, a ring or some other personal possession." Professor Joan Kelly gives us a tidy summary of the practice:

> "A kiss (like the kiss of homage) sealed the pledge, rings were exchanged, and the knight entered the love service of his lady. Representing love along the lines of vassalage had several liberating implications for aristocratic women. Most fundamental, ideas of homage and mutuality entered the notion of heterosexual relations along with the idea of freedom. As symbolized on shields and other illustrations that place the knight in the ritual attitude of commendation, kneeling before his lady with his hands folded between hers, homage signified male service, not domination or subordination of the lady, and it signified fidelity, constancy in that service." [2]

[image]Like the description given by Kelly, men continue to go down on one knee and are quick to demonstrate humility by claiming the wedding is "her day", betraying the origin and conception of marriage as more feudalistic in its structure than Christian. With gestures like these it's clear that modern marriage is based on the earlier feudalistic ritual known as a 'commendation ceremony' whereby a bond between a lord and his fighting man (ie. his vassal) was created. The commendation ceremony is composed of two elements, one to perform the act of homage and the other an oath of fealty. For the Oath of fealty ceremony the vassal would place his hands on a Bible (as is still practiced) and swear he would never injure his overlord in any way and would remain faithful. Once the vassal had sworn the oath of fealty, the lord and vassal had a feudal relationship.

Because this archaic contract remains current in contemporary marriages, we might also question our typical concepts of obeyance between a husband and wife. In older Christian ceremonies the women sometimes vowed to love, cherish and "obey" her husband. However, because framed within a feudalistic-style relationship the woman's obeyance was strongly offset and perhaps overturned whereby in practice she tended to be the dominant power-holder in relation to the man. In the latter case the wife as more powerful figure is merely obeying -if she is obeying anything at all- her responsibilities as a kindly overlord to her husband. Notice here that we have switched from the notion of a benevolent patriarchy to a kindly gynocentrism which feminists like to promote as loving, nurturing, peace-loving and egalitarian.

Love service

The Medieval model of service to a feudal lord was transferred wholesale into relationships as "love service" of men toward ladies. Such service is the hallmark of romantic love and is characterized by men's deference to a woman who is viewed as a moral superior. During this period women were often referred to by men as domnia (dominant rank), midons (my lord), and later dame (honored authority) which terms each draw their root from the Latin dominus meaning "master," or "owner," particularly of slaves. Medieval language expert Peter Makin confirms that the men who used these terms must have been aware of what they were saying:

> "William IX calls his lady midons, which I have translated as 'my Lord'… These men knew their Latin and must have been aware of its origins and peculiarity; in fact it was clearly their collective emotions and expectations that drew what amounts to a metaphor from the area of lordship, just as it is the collective metaphor-making process that establishes 'baby' as a term for a girlfriend and that creates and transforms language constantly. In the same way, knowing that Dominus was the standard term for God, and that don, 'lord', was also used for God, they must also have felt some connection with religious adoration. [3]

Recapitulation

Let's recapitulate the practices associated with the ring-giving ritual of marriage:

1. Genuflection: man goes down on one knee to propose
2. Commendation token: rings exchanged
3. Vassal's kiss: reenacted during the ceremony
4. Homage and fealty: implicit in marriage vows
5. Subservience: "It's her special day"
6. Service: man prepares to work for wife for his whole life
7. Disposability: "I would die for you".

Is it any wonder that women are so eager to get married and that men are rejecting marriage in droves? The feudalistic model reveals exactly what men are buying into via that little golden band – a life commitment to a woman culturally primed to act as our overlord. As more men become aware of this travesty they will choose to reject it, and for those still considering marriage I encourage you to read this article a second time; your ability to keep or lose your freedom depends upon it.

[youtube=http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=FEr0BPOfVw4&w=560&h=315]

Sources:

[1] Website: Society of Phineas
[2] Joan Kelly, Women, History, and Theory, University of Chicago Press, 1986
[3] Peter Makin, Provence and Pound, University of California Press, 1978

Source: Gynocentrism and its cultural origins

Art imitating life...and afterlife

Patrice Stanton · 5 December 2013 · Archived copy · Original

With the recent publication of my novel, Oh Hell, inspired by the suicide of Thomas Ball in June 2011, it seemed right to update an article that appeared here just over one year ago, entitled, Only one thing left…. (Oh Hell spoiler alert.)

Shortly after Thomas James Ball's death on June 15th, 2011, I read about it online. I learned about his frustrating relationship with the so-called "Justice System." His tragedy had been playing out in the courts of New Hampshire for ten years by the time it came to an unthinkable end that day. There, back east, this beleaguered divorced father of three committed suicide by setting himself on fire. And he did it in front of the very courthouse that was to serve on the morning of June 24th, 2011 as yet one more opportunity for players within that System to further hound him. This time most likely straight into their own jailhouse.

Instead, in essence, the man decided he'd already been dogged sufficiently. I believe he felt that he was already dead – as a man and as a father, denied normal access to his own precious children and thereby estranged from them.

For eleven days words failed me. Then on June 26th, 2011, I thought I got it, so wrote on the poster board I keep near my bed:

"What can a man do when he has only one thing left for them to take?"

For those yet to choose the Red-Pill and see the U.S. legal matrix for what it's become, it's unpleasant contemplating Mr. Ball's decision, and harder yet to read the writings he left behind (find the full 10,000-word essay: thomasjamesball.com). Hell, we've been conditioned from the first day we're able to look at a flickering video screen to believe our system is the best in the world. But after reading his essay back in 2011, I was further enraged by the pitifully small media coverage the man's death merited. Sure, his very readable, downright journalistic essay contained hard Truths…but only for those who knew to look. It contained Truths about his experiences with the powers-that-be who lord it over all of us, from the uniformed cops out driving the streets to the robed monarchs sitting high on their benches in our courtrooms. Most of it, therefore, seemed relevant to an awful lot of people, not just divorced men.

While the writing certainly needed minor polishing, I felt Ball's personal-essay-plus-investigative-journalism was falsely and disingenuously characterized as "rambling." Damn straight some of his exposé was paradigm-challenging; some of his proposed solutions, shocking. But it was not rambling. In my estimation it earned that label for two reasons: to cause its dismissal and earn the man an ignominious label. That way if his actions were ever referenced he could be easily dismissed as just another Uni-bomber type nutjob with a "manifesto."

I contend that upon an honest reading, even women who might typically dismiss "Men's Rights Issues," or see the entire sex as privileged and part of the Problem-of-the-Patriarchy, would at least recognize how children are routinely decimated by court decisions. They couldn't fail to see how wives are used as pawns; how they have their strings pulled by the velvet-gloved side of the iron-fist simply to perpetuate the big-bucks business which the three-headed, incestuous abuse/rehab/family court creature has metastasized into.

The more poignant reality to take from Mr. Ball's essay is the palpable Hope he has: that his final desperate act, his suicide, would inspire a real-world Justice-seeking League. And wouldn't that be frightening to certain individuals–say, the powers-that-be who are guilty of willfully using that System to spitefully harm others?

He imagined a movement of real-world men who, like himself, had been pushed to their own brink; stripped of their families, their worldly goods, perhaps even cut out of their jobs, or falsely-accused out of hard won careers. He hoped to inspire men whom this corrupt System had squashed, inspire them to once again take charge of their own lives, to take action towards real Change and thereby live fully again. Hoped they'd become fighters for their own Freedom, freedom from the most insidious discrimination in practice today: that against men for simply being men.

Absent Mr. Ball's writing he might have been dismissed as "mentally unstable," but that's impossible now. It is being done however, as I write this: to a 64-year-old man who committed suicide October 4th, 2013, precisely the way Thomas Ball did, only this time on the National Mall in Washington, D.C. Because as you know, only crazy people kill themselves like that. Setting oneself ablaze has never been about protesting anything, right? (Buddhist monks, anyone…anyone?) The media's unspoken – and unwritten – message couldn't be louder or clearer: Nothing to see here; move along….

Too many in this nation seem unaware that even our own long cherished institutions can be corrupted; can become so broken as to leave too many individuals with no way to "redress their grievances." But history is full of warnings and to continue to believe our nation is exempt, "just because," is to choose to remain naïve. Hennessey Pict, the main character in the novel, "Oh Hell," started out like that: well indoctrinated at home by her vindictive divorced mother, with reinforcements from school and the culture at large. She believed without question the stories about a long-gone father who "just walked away," until she, too, reads letters written by his own hand and meets on paper his paranormal anti-hero, Inferno(R).

So, if burying evidence is evil, what then is media-mischaracterization? In the real world, Thomas James Ball was buried twice. Once the usual way, then the Press way. The latter did it by hiding his truths in plain sight, mischaracterizing his writing as "rambling." In my book "Oh Hell!" the fictional Hennessey Pict's estranged father, the Mainstream Media Complex assisted politicians (shocker, right?) in burying his comic book words, and in a wholly un-American, anti-First Amendment way: spreading the lie that Art caused "copy-cat violence" and therefore it should be charged, convicted, and then silenced as Hate Speech. Wouldn't it be ironic if such sophisticates chose to go Savonarola and burn the offending papers on the town square as a 21st century "vanity?"

Both the real New Hampshire man, and the fictional man within my book whose suicide inspired Hennessey's father to create his series, took their lives in tremendous acts of desperation. In a cruel fictional twist, her cartoonist father is killed and, like Inferno, he hasn't "…gone down to the grave in peace…" either. His spirit's gone rogue as well, but not merely in two dimensions on glossy paper. Trace Pict turns vigilante with a capital-V, just like his character. This fictional father returns from the afterlife to stop – by any means necessary – the "Systematic" injustices he's seen and suffered.

Through characters in Oh Hell, perhaps Mr. Thomas J. Ball's spirit can return in some small way; perhaps his non-fiction writings can get a second shot. I dare to hope my book, with a blend of irreverence, humor, and poignancy, will help people look in a more empathetic way at men ensnared in a Justice System also gone rogue.

Links:

Patrice's Amazon Author page

Smashwords Author page

ebook Buy Links:

Patrice's iTunes/Apple page

Barnes and Noble page;

Amazon.com page;

Smashwords.com page (find free short stories here, too)

Print:

Amazon's CreateSpace

Picture of the dishonest whore

AVfM Video Source · 5 December 2013 · Archived copy · Original

An honest whore sets her price up front and collects on delivery. A dishonest whore makes promises she doesn't keep then does this:

If you thought Debtor's Prison and Indentured Servitude were things of the past, think again.

Memewalk: Quit blaming kids!

Paul Elam · 6 December 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Speaking on behalf of the editorial team at A Voice for Men (AVFM), I want to issue a public apology for this website being remiss in addressing the horrific phenomenon of blaming children for being kidnapped, abused and run down in the street by cars. It is time we put a stop to this ultimate form of victim blaming. Parents, please quit telling your children not to get into a car with strangers. You are FORCING them to take on the guilt for those that are really responsible.

It is a tragedy which we must all work together to end, in order to create the Post-modern Utopian Dreamland (PUD). So, parents, remember: teaching children to protect themselves is a form of violence. It is an act that strikes a hard blow to our goals for Social Justice™.

STOP attacking our ideals. STOP pounding your PUD. – PE

[image]

Meme courtesy of Sammich Heist.

A brief interview with the University of Oregon

Paul Elam · 6 December 2013 · Archived copy · Original

I was recently contacted for an interview by someone named Andrea who writes for the Daily Emerald at the University of Oregon. As I have many times in the past I wanted to share the unedited and complete answers I provided to her questions. PE

What is your full first and last name, your age, and your occupation?

Paul Elam, 56, men's human rights activist.

What political party do you consider yourself a part of?

None.

What does antifeminism mean to you?

Antifeminism is a philosophy based on human compassion and guided by evidence-based analysis of social conditions. Antifeminism emerged as a countervailing response to longstanding feminist dogma and disinformation.

The intensification of that response has been necessitated more recently by the growing hegemony and corruption of feminism in academic settings, media and governance.

What does feminism mean to you?

I am going to pre-qualify my answer to this by letting you know that I am assuming when you say "feminism" you are talking about an ideology separate and distinct from the concept of equal rights under the law, which I fully support. I can't discuss the imaginary feminism of equality and gender justice, except to say that it does not exist in any meaningful way, but I can discuss the feminism on the ground and affecting all the institutions in this culture.

Feminism is a corrupt agenda of gluttonous power grabbing through the use of victim politics and the exploitation of traditional gender roles.

While it has provided some superficial benefit to women, its great payoff is in the financial and social enrichment of the ideologues, politicians and state functionaries who embrace or claim to embrace and further feminist aims.

They have accomplished much of this with faulty research, disingenuous propaganda, proxy violence, direct violence and fostering as much division between the sexes as possible.

Why are you opposed to feminism/what aspects of feminism are you opposed to?

I am opposed to it's corrupting influence on scholarly pursuits, its corrupting influence on government, its class demonization for profit, its creation of a hostile and dangerous atmosphere for young men in our colleges and universities, its reliance on fabrications that ultimately harm society, e.g. the wage gap myth, the male only domestic violence paradigm, a non-existent rape culture, its distortion of history, its failure to hold to the promise of gender blindness in the amelioration of social ills and its tendency to produce violent forms of bigotry.

Also, I am opposed to its exploitation of traditional gender roles as a mechanism for gain even as it alleges to seek an end to those gender roles. I am opposed to its use of shame and character assassination to persecute and control anyone who speaks in dissent of feminist dogma, its blatant attempts to demonize and silence individuals and groups who seek to investigate and address issues faced by men and boys, as well as its insistence to represent values and goals which it does not in reality represent.

How long have you considered yourself an antifeminist?

I have always been an antifeminist, even when I was a feminist. Allow me to make that more clear. I was a feminist as long as I believed the agenda was to assist an under represented part of the population that was largely voiceless. Like most men's human rights activists the desire to assist people in trouble, especially people whose problems were being ignored, was what led me into the feminist world to begin with. Once I figured out that feminism was actually about little to none of its stated goals, but was more about the solvency of its advocates – who have no interest in addressing the issues faced by men and boys – I shed the label once and for all.

Are there any personal experiences that have led you to becoming antifeminist? Please explain, (if you feel comfortable.)

Quite comfortable. The answer, in a word, is feminists. Years of feminists reacting to my questions with attempts to shame me, accusations of misogyny, questioning my sexual orientation (with the assumption I am homophobic), questioning my relationship with my mother, questioning my ability to "succeed" with women, often for something as simple as challenging feminist research methodology, provided a great deal of incentive toward antifeminism.

This was not just a few incidents. It started the very same moment that I started to question feminist doctrine. And it continues unimpeded to this day, a quarter of a century later.

What do you think needs to change, if anything, about the way people view feminism and antifeminism? Do you think there are any misinterpretations about what they mean? If so, what are they?

All three of these questions can be answered in positive ways, by feminist adherents and leading advocates actually embracing the goals they disingenuously claim to embrace in the first place. That would alleviate the hypocrisy that has stained feminism's image. The disinformation about men's advocates they make it a policy to further would end. We would actually end up on the same page, and with a humanist movement dedicated to connecting women and men in an atmosphere of mutual respect and in the name of ameliorating problems faced by men and women alilke.

What is your first initial impression of someone who says they're a feminist?

I think, "Here is a person that will tell me how much they believe in equal rights and ending gender discrimination, and who will then tell me, in their very next breath, that my concerns about false accusations against men of sexual assault are because I support rape and hate women."

Have your experiences changed your view of men, women, or American society as a whole in any way?

Most definitely. Being an activist has made me wake up to the fact that many of our problems are caused by women who claim not be to feminist but take advantage of every opportunity that corrupt feminism has afforded them, by men who are feminist sycophants and by men who claim to be antifeminist but who lack courage and conviction, who capitulate to feminist shaming tactics, and fail to take a stand, or take action for their claimed beliefs when it is most needed.

The last part of that is starting to change, though, which is why you are doing an article on this. If men, and a good number of women, were not standing up to the corruption and speaking out, I would not be sitting here answering your questions about it.

Men have been told by feminists for a long time that they needed to express their feelings. And here those feelings finally come. It is slowly restoring my faith in society. Eventually what feminists derisively demanded of men will bring feminism as we know it to an end. It hardly gets any more poetic than that.

What are some things you have done in the past, or have been doing recently, to advocate antifeminism and/or men's rights?

I founded and run (with a great deal of help) A Voice for Men, the largest and most traveled men's rights platform on the internet, which is currently experiencing organic growth. AVFM does direct advocacy for the falsely accused and the falsely convicted and works diligently to expose the lies and misrepresentations of feminist ideologues, as well as the corrupt actions of judicial officials, politicians and other agents of the state that impact the areas of our concern.

Anything else you would like to mention about yourself or any relevant topics?

No, I think I have expressed what I wanted to say. I will, however, allow someone else to speak on my behalf.

Let’s ask Tumblr feminists what they think

AVfM Video Source · 6 December 2013 · Archived copy · Original

A long but very interesting video by Bane666au.

Parental child kidnapping: already a common occurrence by 1856

Robert St. Estephe · 7 December 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Robert St. Estephe–Gonzo Historian–is dedicated to uncovering the forgotten past of marginalizing men. "Gonzo journalism" is characterized as tending "to favor style over fact to achieve accuracy." Yet history – especially "social history" – is written by ideologues who distort and bury facts in order to achieve an agenda. "Gonzo" writing is seen as unorthodox and surprising. Yet, in the 21st century subjectivity, distortion and outright lying in non-fiction writing is the norm. Fraud is the new orthodoxy. Consequently, integrity is the new "transgressive."

Welcome to the disruptive world of facts, the world of Gonzo History.

•••

Parental kidnapping (or "parental child abduction") has been a "social problem" much longer than the experts would have us believe. The history of child custody has been written by historians sympathetic with "gender" ideology, and thus is both distorted and lopsided in favor of women's experience at the expense of men and their children.

The following article is — apart from its intrinsic interest as an interesting account of a predatory woman and the husbands and daughters she used as pawns in her opportunistic exploits — particularly noteworthy for offering evidence, in its comment on the case of a Mr. Thompson, "which has all too many parallels in California," suggesting that parental kidnapping was already, by the 1850s quite a common occurrence in the United States.

Further articles will expose important documentation of parental child abduction which contradicts the politically correct "official story" about that subject (such as that to be found in Paula S. Fass, Kindnapped: Child Abduction in America, Oxford University Press, 1997) written to promote the child control agendas of social engineers who, under the aegis of the United Nations, are currently lobbying for the elimination of parental rights (U. N. Convention on the Rights of the Child).

••• • •••

[image]

FULL TEXT (Article 1 of 2): We would call attention to an advertisement in another column, under the caption of "Information Wanted." Mr. Thompson has called on us, and told us his story. It is one which has all too many parallels in California, yet he is entitled to heartfelt sympathy. It seems that about five months ago, he sailed for China, leaving his wife and two children in San Francisco. Before leaving he gave his wife $375, with which to pay her passage by the steamer to New York, he expecting to return to China by Cape Horn. The vessel, however, and took passengers to this port. On arriving, Mr. Thompson first learned that his wife had not returned to New York, but was living at Vallejo with a man named John Forman, as his mistress.

Thither Thompson went, but found the parties had come to this city, some two weeks previous. He followed here, learned their arrival about that time, but could obtain no further certain clue to them. Partial information leads him to the belief that they went from here to Sonora. Mr. Thompson merely desires to recover the possession of his two children (girls), respectively six and eight years of age. John Forman, the despoiler of his happiness, is represented as being a ship caulker by trade; is a stout built man, about five feet six inches in height, with red whiskers.

The eldest child, Eliza, is of light complexion, blue eyes and has lost two of the lower front teeth. The youngest is of dark complexion and has a scar on the forehead. Any information of the parties will be thankfully received by Ananias Thompson (who appears to be as highly respectable man) at the Globe Hotel, corner of Davis and Chambers street, San Francisco.

NOTE: The comment "all too many parallels" indicates that parental kidnapping was already recognized as a "social problem" by 1856 in California.

["A Recreant Wife," Weekly San Juan Republican (Stockton, Ca.), Jul. 5, 1856, p. 3]

•••

FULL TEXT (Article 2 of 2): We published the other day a case of seduction and desertion, the aggravated party being Mr. Ananias Thompson. In the account we published, it was stated that the seducer was a person named John Forman. From the Bay papers it would seem that the recreant parties had separated, Mrs. Thompson, alias Mrs. Forman, having left her last paramour, a married man at San Francisco named Dougherty. Mr. Thompson learned the fact, applied at the police office for a warrant for her arrest for the purpose of recovering possession of his two little girls but, the papers state, he was informed that he could not testify against his wife, except in a case of assault and battery. He then obtained a friend, cognizant of the facts, to make the complaint, and the warrant was issued.

["Charge Of Bigamy," Weekly San Juan Republican (Stockton, Ca.), Jul. 12, 1856, p. 2]

•••

Critics of the male pill are wrong. It would end conception by deception, empower men and be the ultimate sexual revolution

Peter Lloyd · 7 December 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Earlier this week scientists in Australia revealed a ground-breaking formula for the world's first male contraceptive pill. Researchers at Melbourne's Monash University detailed a reversible way to stop men releasing sperm during orgasm, without affecting their pleasure, sexual function or long-term fertility. The findings – which promise to change the dynamics of sex forever – were published in the journal Proceedings of the National Academy of Sciences.

But, while they attracted much interest, they also garnered some cynicism. In particular, from journalist Tom Sykes, who claimed the idea was 'the least sexy bit of news in the past 40 years' and threatened to emasculate men at their very core.

He's wrong.

In fact, it's the exact opposite – it would quickly become our best friend in the bedroom because it would liberate us from being the reproductive underclass.

Currently, while women enjoy the lion's share of contraceptive choices, we have just three: condoms, vasectomy and abstinence. While vasectomies are extreme and may increase the chances of male cancers, condoms are rarely the practical ideal. They vary in comfort and fit, they can be difficult or embarrassing to get on – risking erection loss – and, crucially, they can puncture; either literally, or the romantic mood.

More worryingly, they can also be tampered with. Ask Liz Jones.

[image]In comparison, the female pill has been a monumental success. Launched in 1960, it is now used by more than 100 million women worldwide and is a cornerstone of the women's movement. Sykes said it himself: 'Many feminists argue that much of what it means to be a woman today is actually defined by and is a result of women having access to the Pill. It has liberated, not diminished, them'.

The same will be said for the male pill. Why? Because it's as much political as it is pharmaceutical. Not only would the male pill offer limitless, no-strings sex, but it would also empower men to control the outcome of their sexual encounters; only becoming fathers when they wanted to.

Yes, accidents happen, but the gritty reality of men being 'trapped' would end overnight. No more shotgun weddings, no more duped daddies, no more surprise calls from the Child Support Agency. Specifically, men wouldn't have casual lovers deciding when they became fathers. They'd make that crucial, life-changing decision themselves. And, in 2013, so they should.

Paul Elam is a men's rights activist and the publisher of the American website AVoiceForMen.com, which gets thousands of hits every day from 18 to 24-year-olds. He argues that men have as much riding on pregnancy as women do in the long-term, but not nearly as much control.

> 'The arrival of a male pill would mark the first time in history that men will be empowered to see themselves as near-full participants in reproductive choices,' he says. 'And it will force wider culture to see them in the same light too.'
>
> 'Currently, men compete for sexual selection and wait to be chosen. When they are, they wait to be informed of any consequences.
>
> 'They wait to be told if the baby will be carried to term, or will be aborted. They wait to be told if they will be allowed to participate in the life of the child. They wait to be told what they will have to pay, and how much for how long, regardless of whether they want or intended to be a parent.'

Given that Britain currently has one of the highest teen pregnancy rates in Europe, this issue is clearly affecting our young boys too. Besides, in an age of so-called equality – where women demand an end to the closing gender pay gap (but seemingly couldn't care less about the life expectancy gap – so much or equality), why should they have all the power in this matter? After all, absolute power corrupts absolutely. And, whether it's politically correct or not to say so, lots of women manipulate birth control and violate men's choices.

Just take Amanda Holden's situation into account. Only last month she confessed to deceiving her husband into fatherhood – even though he expressly said he wasn't ready for another baby. Dismissing this, she manipulated the understanding on which they had sex and effectively took control over his sperm, his lineage and his choice.

This is an outrage.

Ironically, if a man stole a woman's eggs and – by some twist of science – conceived a baby and then charged her child support, all hell would break loose. It would be a feminist hot topic. But where's the uproar when the genders are reversed? These are matters that have a deep and lasting impact on the lives of men, and the ability to prevent them is nothing less than revolutionary.

That said, the sisterhood shouldn't worry too much. The male pill would also be good for women. While the original pill is highly effective, it's also packed with side-effects that include weight gain, DVT threat and reduced libido. A new alternative taken by their partners can only be a good thing.

It also allows men to share the responsibility for birth control, without forcing them to forsake the pleasure of sex. It may also allow women to stop taking dangerous medications that pose significant risks (or they may continue to take their pills as an added precaution). Either way, it brings choice and personal agency to both sexual partners.

However, the benefits wouldn't all be physical – but social too, because a male pill would finally smash the myth that a woman's desire to have a child is greater than a man's not to. In a world of crass self-entitlement but virtually no father's rights, this is crucial. Particularly because the narrative on the issue is so sexist against men.

Ask around you and plenty of women will say: 'I'd never trust a man to take the pill' – which is precisely my point, because that's exactly what men have had to do. We've been forced to trust women who say they're on the pill – with often devastating results. Besides, if everyone took responsibility for themselves, wouldn't it simply mean that all pregnancies were planned by both parties – all the time?

Aside from being fair to men, a pill which offers that sounds like the best bit of news I've heard in 40 years…and then some.

This article was originally posted in mailonline, and was presented here with permission form Mr. Lloyd.

Harvey Silverglate of F.I.R.E.

AVfM Video Source · 7 December 2013 · Archived copy · Original

With a tip of the hat to Bewildered, here is a magnificent example of why the editorial position of this website is to draw no lines of distinction between left and right for the purposes of men's activism. This is the first exposure I have had to Harvey Silverglate, but I fell in love with the guy before this video was halfway through. PE

Wives demand what??? The farce of household equality

Clint Carpentier · 8 December 2013 · Archived copy · Original

There was a time, way back when… when my grandmother remembers. A time when households operated much differently than they do today; in fact, my grandfather has a house that operates in the very manner that most houses once did. I'm talking about houses that were built before modern industry made many of the amenities we now take for granted; it has a wood stove for cooking and heating, bare wood floors, light came from windows during the day and oil lamps at night, and is generally very rustic; outside is a pile of wood (with an assortment of axes and saws), a large basin (for laundry and bathing) and a clothes -ine that doesn't move, an outhouse a little way off, and a stream in the distance for water.

It sounds rather charming and idyllic, until you spend a week there, and your clean clothes run out, and you quickly realize that every bath requires a demanding workout of wood splitting and water-fetching, so by the end of a month, you're either in great shape, or you stink, or quite possibly both (you can short cut this with a pale of heated water and a hand-cloth; but this is you sitting on a stool on the porch, naked to the world).

It's a place to visit; it takes real commitment to stay as a life choice. Before the industrial age, this was the standard model of all houses. Also keep in mind that this was a time of extended families, so getting kinky with the spouse when the elders and kids are in the next room – and nothing for sound deadening – was the norm; the others would have to be a hundred paces from the house before sound of frisky finally abated.

There were many benefits to having a wife in such a household; in a time when working men didn't have the benefit of standardized working hours–agricultural workers still operate on the dawn until dusk system. It wasn't expected of women to go and fetch wood, but she did have to chop it; she also had to keep the chimney clean, lest a chimney-fire were to burn the neighborhood down. She had to fetch the water, whether it came from a stream/river or a neighborhood pump. She was expected to keep the limited number of clothes washed (and when she found some spare time, she repaired old clothes and/or made new ones). She was expected to cook the meals from basic available goods, often having to make her own bread on the kitchen table. She was expected to be the nurse for the kids, for anything not life threatening. She was expected to protect the kids from harm while the husband was out working.

In a time when the "age of reason" was six years old, she could send her sons off with dad to start working; but the daughters began learning how to be a housewife; when the daughter reached adolescence, a choice had to be made: if she was presentable enough to be married off, her training in wifely duties would continue, but if she failed this preliminary test, she was expected to find a job and work for her keep until someone could be found who was willing to take her. And finally, she was expected to give her husband supportive reason to keep going back to that body- and soul-crushing job which was often destined to kill him. Let's not forget that making a bath was such strenuous work, the family often shared bathwater, starting with the cleanest (usually the girls who spent the day doing chores) to the dirtiest (usually the boys and men after a hard day of work).

The industrial age brought two major components which radically changed the way women ran the household chores; in-house electricity and plumbing. The toilet was fairly innocuous on its own, but it meant the wife didn't have to carry a bucket of human waste to the refuse pile herself; but the advent of the dedicated sewer drastically decreased the chance of disease by keeping human waste away from the water supply; further plumbing technologies meant that she had water on tap, right in her own house. Electricity meant she was no longer responsible for the safety of the lighting coming from oil lamps; the electric or gas stove allowed her to cook without overheating the house on a hot day. Water and electricity combined gave rise to the heat radiator; and gone were the days of packing water and chopping wood, saving women at least two hours a day on chores. A side-effect of industry brought about production clothing, so women no longer had to make the family clothes anymore. Unless they were just frugal; they could just go to the shop and buy clothes off the shelf.

The next phase came during the Cold War, when the electric washer, drier, dishwasher and finally a common vacuum cleaner became available; these inconspicuous appliances, are easily taken advantage of and just as easily forgotten. By hand, laundry takes about two hours (assuming you do laundry every few days), and it has to be done outside – lest you splash water on the floor – and on a nice day. Washing dishes by hand is about a half an hour; longer if the dishes were allowed to get crusty. These three appliances are "set and forget" tools; a total of ten minutes per day each, and you didn't have to worry about weather/animals/kids/thieves interfering with laundry day. With the clinical appearance of the then modern house, housekeeping was easy; a well-maintained home would take little more than two hours a day to clean and the vacuum could hold week's worth of dust before needing to be dealt with.

Now she had time to figure out something to do, something fulfilling, a hobby maybe; just imagine the impact daytime television had on her, when feminism splashed into her living room while she was trying her hand at needle-point, embroidering her son's denim jacket with his school team's logo, baking cookies, or dare I say it, learning to cook an impressive meal with the now wide variety of available foodstuffs (thanks to a well-integrated shipping and trucking industry), and a telephone to share her new-found insights with other female friends and family.

She was still expected to provide moral support to her husband; and yes, sex was a wifely duty she was obligated to provide as per the terms of marriage. Despite the growing lack of interior household duties, she still wasn't expected to maintain the exterior of the house; mowing the lawn, painting the siding and fence, pruning the hedge (gardening was optional), raking leaves, maintaining the vehicle, and shoveling snow were all duties of the husband to do on the weekend when he's not working (backbreaking work during the week, to mind-breaking work on the weekend; no rest for the weary).

Skip forward half a century and the modern grocery stores are filled with readymade meals (just add chicken). Even self operating vacuum cleaners and cell phones are available; daycare for the tots, subsides for the working mom (single or married); and Joe Mechanic to do warranty work on that brand new family car. Even as women continue to move into the workforce; they do so in fields that require little physical exertion, have great flexibility, and rarely work full-time; often taking large quantities of time off for maternity, or dropping out of work altogether. Meanwhile, their husbands continue to work, often adding more hours to their workload in order to afford a lifestyle they wouldn't need on their own. And still, women aren't expected to do exterior household duties.

So now we get to the meat of the topic: women demand what? The man's work expectation in regards to family provision hasn't changed; while women working can be classified as a hobby. On average, the husband brings home twice that which the wife brings home; men make up 75% of the tax revenue, while women command almost 80% of the buying power; this means that he's giving her the bulk of his earnings (after taxes of course). And women demand what?

Women demand their men to do "their fair share of household chores." Let's look at this from a fiscal perspective shall we? Women are happy to do their "fair share" household duties; this means basically cleaning up after herself, with all the modern amenities available to her. Many women are happy to receive the lump sum of his paycheck, while keeping her own. Women are happy to make use of daycare, and certainly schools at the earliest possible age (everyone's child is gifted after all). But many women are not happy about cleaning up after her husband, who has added hours to his workload; and no, exterior household duties don't seem to count.

So, if a man has to continue taking care of himself, as he would if he were still single, why is he doubling her available money? He can live comfortably on that money alone, without her, do all his own chores, and still have time and money left over to do his own activities. If it's intellectual stimulation she's after, she's obviously got the wrong job, and it's he who should quit and become a househusband, or at least cut back significantly on the hours he works, stop trying to rise to stardom–but I have yet to meet a woman who was in a relationship of any sort, who didn't rely on interpersonal relations or celebrity affairs as their mainstay of conversational topics; she may have been fascinating, even captivating conversationally before marriage, but afterwards that seems to just shut-off, especially after kids enter the scene.

If its sex, that's once per day of blasé sex any street-hooker can provide, or mind-blowing sex once a week a well trained call-girl can provide; but since the advent of "marital rape," sex is no longer a loving duty, so it has become whim and weapon; children are a neutral factor in this, a shared byproduct of an agreed upon transaction (unless the mother is pimping the child's time to the father), they do not equate. If it's companionship, friends and/or dogs can do just as good a job, because they're actually interested in our other friends and hobbies; and they don't expect us to cut-back or give them up for more cuddle time (speaking of which, that's foreplay, stop leading men on). Expecting men to share the chores, is a sure sign she's not interested in giving her husband moral support to keep plugging away at a job he'd rather do less of, or not at all.

If women are demanding that their husbands do their "fair share" of the chores, then why do men need wives at all? In man's attempt to make their wives lives easier, they have reduced the wifely duties to next to non-existent. Why, women? Why oh why would you drive those final coffin nails of obsolescence in? Aside from children, there's no benefit left to having a wife.

Where have all the good men gone? Well… where have all the good women gone?

… … … And the gestational apparatus is already being successfully tested on goats.

Commissioner Ken Lay's Professional Misconduct

Greg Canning · 8 December 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Victorian Police Commissioner Ken Lay gave an emotive and hyperbolic speech, titled "Breaking the pattern of family violence is everyone's responsibility" at the November 26 National Press Club session on Elimination of Violence Against Women. The audience acknowledged it with much tearful head nodding as Lay portrayed desparately crowded women's shelters overflowing with "the bruised battered and raped." It's worth reading the transcript before proceeding.

Describing the "size of the problem" he reiterated Stott Despoja's one-sided citation of the Australian Data and echoed UN claims of an epidemic of violence against women whilst ignoring the fact the world wide men are more frequent victims of violence and account for 80% the deaths from violence.

Citing police statistics on calls to DV "incidents" Lay fails to elaborate on the breakdown by gender of perpetrator or other demographics. Not surprisingly the full Victoria Police report on Crime Statistics 2012/2013 is no more informative when it comes to "family incidents" despite gender breakdown being presented in aggregate and individually for most other "crimes against the person."

Recently the Herald Sun Newspaper obtained statistics that indicate 21% of these incidents involved a male victim, not an insignificant proportion, considering the systemic and institutionalised bias against male victims in Victoria.

He supplemented those obscurations with the following statement:

> "For Australian female GPs*, a recent survey found that 50% had been sexually assaulted."

*GPs are General Medical Practitioners, often termed Family Physicians in the Americas.

Really Ken? Where did you get that data?

Most likely from popular media coverage of a survey of female GP's exposure to sexual harassment, not sexual assault, a distinction one might expect a police commissioner to comprehend.

The mainstream media reported on a small survey described in a letter to the editor in the October 2013 edition of the Medical Journal of Australia. It was not submitted as an original research paper, which would need to be more significant in its scope and pass more rigorous standards of peer review. The letter was based on responses to a survey of female GP's only, offered a $20 gift card to participate and attracting a mere 180 respondents from the 600 canvassed (a 30% response rate) hardly representative of the 25,000 plus GP workforce. The letter remains restricted access behind the MJA paywall making fact checking more difficult for the public. [1]

Most tellingly the letter provided absolutely no context for the incidents reported. Doctor's encounters (just as police encounters) sometimes involve unpleasant, angry, difficult, intoxicated, mentally ill, upset, obnoxious, sexist and inappropriate and even grubby people. As a GP and longstanding supervisor of GP registrars in training my observations tell me that such traits are not gender specific nor are they only experienced by only one gender in practice.

More substantive gender inclusive research such as this 2005 open access study found that found 63 % of GP's have experienced violence in the previous 12 months including some serious physical assaults (2.7%). Notably the study examined the clinical setting, perpetrator and doctor characteristics to give a more nuanced picture of the challenges facing health care workers in dealing with such clients.

Is the conflation of harassment with assault and elevating the findings a small non-representative gendered survey to national prominence in a keynote speech a simple error or a deliberate misrepresentation? You decide, but it's not the first time Lay has spruiked this figure and I doubt we will see a correction from him any time soon.

Commissioner Lay relates a story of a young policeman confronted with a female victim of longstanding intimate terrorism. As distinct from common couple violence that is most often bidirectional, intimate terrorism is the most severe but least common form of domestic violence. Still if you wish to embellish and polarise the domestic violence issue, painting all victims as women experiencing the most severe variety of abuse, following the use of a statistic that one in three women are victims is a good place to start.

By the way, despite the scarcity of research into male victims of intimate terrorism a ground-breaking study by Denise Hines of Clark University in 2010 suggests that as with other forms of DV it is a gender symmetrical problem. These disturbing cases from the UK are certainly consistent; along with the most recent British Crime Survey that finds married men are more commonly victims of domestic abuse than married women.

Addressing "victim blaming" Lay tracks back more than a decade to cite an example the tragic child kidnapping of Elizabeth Smart. A 14-year-old girl, kidnapped, tortured and sexually abused by a married couple that paraded their victim in public with her face covered whilst police mounted an intense operation to locate her. I immediately saw the similarities between this case and that of an adult woman, trying to escape an abusive relationship, confined to her suburban concentration camp, by a patriarchal power and control freak, unbeknown to the authorities. Perhaps the fact that there was a male and female perpetrator in the Smart case escaped commissioner Lay or perhaps it just was assumed that the women had no agency or culpability for her actions.

Kens ultimate message is that women should be told, "I believe you" when they report domestic violence. However it is certainly not the State of Victoria or the Victorian Police Services policy that male victims be believed. According to State Law, Judicial Guidelines and Police Policy if male victims even exist they must be exceptionally rare. In fact it is not difficult to conclude that the authorities attitude is one that deliberately attempts to justify, excuse, minimise and hide the existence and experience of male victims of DV. Meanwhile female accusers are granted protective orders without proof of wrongdoing and routinely use these to gain leverage in family court and child custody matters.

The Victorian Family Violence Protection Act 2008 is the legislation governing the approach to family violence in Victoria, the preamble to the act makes this unsubstantiated claim:

> In enacting this Act, the Parliament also recognises the following features of family violence (a) that while anyone can be a victim or perpetrator of family violence, family violence is predominantly committed by men against women, children and other vulnerable persons;

This falsehood enshrined in law contradicts the contemporary research on partner abuse, child abuse, and abuse as experienced in the LGBTI community.

Women for example have long been known to be the predominate demographic responsible for child abuse, a fact Australia has since the mid 1990's attempted to conceal by not releasing data on the gender of child abusers, rather using non gendered terms such as parent, step-parent, caregiver etc. Requests for release of such data under freedom of information legislation have been repeatedly refused but in one rare case when Western Australia released such information it confirmed what always has been known in other western countries.

The Victoria Police Code of Practice for Investigation of Family Violence echoes the Family Violence Protection Act; despite apparently gender-neutral wording the introductory details make the conflation of family violence with violence against women clear:

> The key determinants and contributing factors to the perpetration of violence against women are:
>
> > unequal power relations between women and men
> >
> > adherence to rigid gender stereotypes
> >
> > broader cultures of violence."

The guidelines contain a requirement to identify a predominant aggressor and recommendation for “no drop” type prosecution, without a complaint and when a formal complaint is withdrawn.

But the most egregious and misandric guidelines (as recently pointed out by AVFM follower Gwallan in his comment to this post) are to be found in the Victorian Judicial College’s ”Family Violence Bench Book.”

Rather than believing a male victims story, this document advises that any male reporting abuse by a female partner must be assumed to be lying most likely as a ploy to conceal their own abuse of their female partner. Again sexual double standards and gender inequality are at the heart of policy and guidelines, while those representing the establishment, preach the addressing of gender equality as a core principle in reducing violence (against women).

Perhaps the most extraordinary advice Commissioner Lay gives is in relation to advice from parents to daughters about rape. Citing a recent polarized debate amongst feminist groups over advice to daughters to moderate their alcohol consumption to help reduce the risk of rape the best Lay can offer is to tell your daughters, rape is not your fault it’s the rapists fault.

Of course such a platitude will be little value to a victim who may otherwise not have ended up a victim, but when it comes to gender issues Lay seems to think conforming to feminist dogma and rhetoric trumps real prevention. The overt hypocrisy is evident from a cursory view of the Victoria Police website which promotes preventive behaviors such as locking up to prevent burglary and car theft etc. and not one statement could I find stating that if you are burgled “it’s not you fault,” there is “just one person responsible for theft: the thief.”

Yet commissioner Lay and hypocrisy walk hand in hand. In my view Victoria’s top police officer whilst claiming to have “a professional obligation to reduce harm” applies that obligation in a gendered and uneven manner. This should be considered professional misconduct. I would go so far as to say Commissioner Lay is a disgrace to the uniform he wears, a gender bigot, bereft of any demonstrated concern for male victims of family violence or violence in general.

That he is so widely touted as a shining light, hero of anti-violence and pro-gender equality campaigner is a sad reflection on the Australian communities media and government induced ignorance of these issues.

[1] If you would like a copy of the full letter for personal study email me at gregcanning@gmail.com

The Male Pill: Pros & Cons

Walter Romans (TDOM) · 8 December 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Peter Lloyd, whose work I greatly admire, recently posted an article hailing the male pill in response to a ridiculous article by Tom Sykes who views the pill as an assault on masculinity. Neither writer seems to have seen the big picture.

Sykes believes that the pill will be different psychologically for men than women because men do not "live in fear of getting pregnant." Because of this, men won't take the pill. Instead they will view it as an attack on their manhood, because manhood is tied to potency. He cites the small number of British men who get sterilized as evidence in support of his position. This might be a valid argument except for a couple of points.

First, the pill is entirely reversible. If a man wants to have a child, he need only stop taking the pill for a few weeks. Vasectomies can be reversed in some cases, but not all, and the longer a man waits, the less likely it is to work. Second, the manufacturers claim that the side effects of a vasectomy such as loss of libido and increased risk of certain cancers will not be side effects of the pill. Sykes mentions that the psychological consequence of a vasectomy is that men no longer feel virile or potent and feel less masculine which may lead to the decreased libido and difficulty in getting an erection. However, this should not have as great an effect on those taking the pill since it is reversible simply be ceasing to take it.

Finally, Sykes' belief that men don't fear getting pregnant can also be discounted because men frequently fear getting their partner pregnant, then having absolutely no control over the decisions about abortion, giving birth, custody and visitation, and paying child support. This is potentially even more emasculating than Sykes arguments because men typically want to believe they are in control of their own lives. The greatest benefit of the pill would be that it would finally give men a viable contraceptive choice that would allow them control over their own reproduction.

This last point is the main argument put forth by Lloyd. Men currently have no viable choice in reproductive matters. Condoms are inconvenient and reduce pleasure. Vasectomies are permanent and have side effects. And abstinence is usually not desirable. The male pill would, according to Lloyd, "empower men to control the outcome of their sexual encounters; only becoming fathers when they wanted to." He believes that it would allow men to participate in reproductive decisions and share in the responsibility for birth control. "Men wouldn't have casual lovers deciding when they became fathers. They'd make that crucial, life-changing decision themselves." Although this would not end paternity fraud entirely, Lloyd is correct and his argument in favor are far sounder than Sykes argument against. But there are other issues.

Both Lloyd and Sykes discuss trust in relationships. Sykes states that women won't want to trust men who say they are on the pill and they shouldn't have to. He argues that men will lie in order to get sex and that women should not have to trust men to be "as responsible" as they are. Lloyd argues that men already have to trust women when they say claim to be on the pill (or using other types of contraception) and that many of them lie about it. The pill would only level the playing field. Of course if every person (man or woman) simply assumes responsibility for themselves, then both partners will use contraception. This would even reduce the risk of contraceptive failure since it would have to fail on both ends to result in pregnancy.

Neither Sykes nor Lloyd mentions the current legal climate. First, feminists are beginning to argue that men who lie in order to obtain sex are guilty of rape. A couple of years ago a man was convicted using deception to obtain sex in Israel so this is a legitimate concern. Men will need to be truthful to protect themselves and their partners. Second, it will only reinforce the idea that sex (for men) represents consent to become a parent, which is already the prevailing attitude. This means that men who elect not to take the pill will likely have fewer legal remedies than they do now should they impregnate a woman. It could also be seen as the solution for men who don't want children and become the basis for the argument against abortion for men. In other words, the medical ability to abstain from fatherhood could get in the way of a legal solution that would increase men's reproductive rights and not merely their choices.

One last point, I've also heard it said that some physicians won't perform vasectomies on married men without first obtaining the consent of the wife. I don't know whether this is true, but if so, it could become an issue with obtaining the male pill.

While all of these issues are worthy of consideration, none should be sufficient reason not to move forward with development of a male pill. I agree with Lloyd on this; a male pill would finally give men some control over their reproductive choices. However, a male pill should not be allowed to derail those who are concerned with men's reproductive rights. Having a medical choice can be a legal right, but it cannot replace a legal right. Sykes' arguments are largely nonsense and are easily shot down. Lloyd's are far more coherent, but not nearly as comprehensive as they should be. I don't claim that mine are comprehensive either, but there are concerns that will need to be addressed and we shouldn't allow our excitement to derail us from our goals. A male pill is a huge step forward, but it is not the be-all and end-all for men's reproductive rights.

Note: This article is also available in Spanish.

Male birth control pill is on the horizon

AVfM Video Source · 8 December 2013 · Archived copy · Original

The Male Birth Control pill, while still years away, looks to be on the horizon, and it's not the only option that may soon give more freedom of choice to men. Russia Today has a look.

Open letter to Colin Cowherd regarding Jameis Winston

Ty Henry · 9 December 2013 · Archived copy · Original

(AUTHOR'S NOTE: This was in response to Colin Cowherd's "opening rant," a segment that begins his daily show "The Herd," on ESPNU and syndicated nationally on radio. His reaction to the decision of the Florida State Attorney not to pursue charges, and his position on the issue of sexual assault prevalence, can be heard here.)

Colin,

You're fond of saying "you hate when a narrative isn't heard." I'm going to challenge your conviction in the wake of your regurgitation of erroneous propaganda-based numbers on sexual assault.

The 1 in 5 number, which fluctuates from 1 in 2 to 1 in 4, is false, and has been debunked by research done by folks without an agenda. The debased act of rape, of which you speak, means 1) Ending a date with forced sex based on entitlement 2) using the body of someone nearly or fully unconscious for whatever reason or 3) every woman's worst fear, being attacked by a stranger who may go on to kill you or imprison you, as in Cleveland recently.

The number you cited is based on a definition of rape that includes something called "non-violent sexual coercion," such as badgering your girlfriend for sex, just as the Duluth model of domestic violence includes "refusing to give your wife or girlfriend money."

Feminism presumes men want to subordinate women by the threat of violence unless proven otherwise, and that all men are potential or suspect rapists. Does that describe you, Colin? Now look at and think about all the men in your circle, including your dad. Think about it Colin. That number extrapolates to 40 million women in America, more than the state of California. That means about 20 of ESPN's on-air personalities are rapists. Yes, Colin, that also means YOU, and every man on your staff. So think about that hookup in Vegas after a couple glasses of wine. If you had sex, you are a rapist.

Feminism further exploits the natural male instinct to protect women. Indeed, you and others have "damseled" the accuser and thousands of other faceless women at the expense of a man who himself has put hundreds of accused domestic batterers and rapists behind bars.

But you did not come to the rescue of the Duke LaCrosse players in calling for their accuser's arrest, and a man, Reginald Daye, lies dead because of it, a victim at her hands. No one cared this past summer when former Mets pitcher Kris Benson was threatened at gunpoint by his wife, then saw 25 years of potential prison time whittled to 15 months of probation within 2 months.

You had no regard for Jameis Winston every time you used the word "victim" to describe her without the word "alleged," a tacit conclusion that Winston was guilty. People still continue to call her that, which is tantamount to continuing to call Winston "rapist."

As for this accuser, I do not buy the the false binary that either she is a "liar" or "it's true." That is unfair to both sides. It may be she believes her story, and is mistaken, or that it's true, and there isn't enough evidence. If either the foregoing is true, she deserves some consideration and sympathy. However, if things played out closer to the affidavits of Chris Casher and Ronald Darby, then she deserves contempt, and I couldn't care less what she thinks.

There is a saying that "The strength of women is their illusion of weakness. The weakness of men is their illusion of strength." Gender Feminism exploits this well on the issue of sexual violence. It knows that men are easily shamed into silence by words such as "rape apologist" and "misogynist" whenever they have the temerity to challenge the accuracy of these numbers. Indeed, if you speak about the inflated nature of the statistics you cite, inflated statistics which serve to enhance a gender-threat narrative for those who profit from the visceral fears of women, you know you will be fired, or forced to issue an on-air mea culpa.

If you don't fear this, then let's hear you talk of the innocent men I mentioned earlier. Let's hear you speak about

NFL cheerleaders like Elizabeth Garner who gets away with molesting boys, while we amplify Steubenville. Let's call for the arrest of Brian Banks' accuser, instead of patting him on the head and calling him a "good boy" for not being bitter. Start telling the story of investigators and lawyers who coach women to make up sexual abuse and domestic violence stories to get the upper hand in divorce and keep men like YOU away from their kids, the tactic used by Dwyane Wade's wife

All the best, and I still love the show

Ty in Tucson

Follow Ty on Twitter @sportsdroppings

PS: This guy is the only one I saw do an analysis of the entire report.

http://bleacherreport.com/articles/1877570-most-important-information-from-police-report-in-jameis-winston-investigation

Kudos to Matt Fitzgerald for having the sack to do it.

US National Survey: more men than women victims of intimate partner violence

Janet Bloomfield (aka JudgyBitch) · 9 December 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Here are two stories about domestic violence in the news. The first one involves Aron Ralston. If you recognize that name it's probably because he's the guy who was trapped in a canyon in Utah and cut off his own arm to survive.

Aron was arrested on DV charges, but when prosecutors learned that the violence involved his domestic partner, Vita Shannon, punching him in the back of head twice, to which he responded by shoving her on the shoulder, the charges against Aron were dropped, and Vita is facing assault, disturbing the peace and wrong-to-minors charges instead. That last charge means that a child was present (the couple's infant daughter) but was not hurt.

James McGill, of Englewood, punched his wife, tried to strangle her with a power cord, beat her with a laptop and threatened her with a knife. He is charged with aggravated assault, criminal restraint, making terroristic threats, weapons possession and two counts of child endangerment.

Which one of these stories is more common? Which one reflects the true face of DV? Women not hesitating to assault their male partners, assuming (and generally receiving) no or very limited retaliation, or men who viciously assault helpless women?

It all depends on who you ask.

There are two large national surveys of intimate partner violence (IPV) – one is conducted by the Center for Disease Control (CDC) and the other by the Department of Justice (DOJ), which effectively means that one survey frames IPV as a health issue, and the other frames it as a criminal issue.

Unsurprisingly, they reach different conclusions. Let's look at DOJ survey first, conducted by two feminist researchers.

Dr. Patricia Tjaden, a professor of sociology specializing in Violence Against Women (her own words) "developed and executed numerous federally-funded research projects, including the highly-acclaimed National Violence Against Women Survey".

Dr. Nancy Thoennes has more than 30 years experience in the design of surveys and data collection forms and conducts large-scale statistical analyses using SPSS. She is a leading expert on child protection and the courts, as well as in the field of child support.

Patty and Nancy put their heads together and designed a survey called The National Violence Against Women Survey. Gee, that's pretty objective, isn't it? Not the National Violence Against Intimate Partners Survey. Not the National Domestic Violence Survey.

The National Violence Against Women Survey.

Who wants to guess what they found?

It's called a confirmation bias and it is such a rookie mistake, it's almost laughable. 30 years designing surveys and two PhDs between them yet Nancy and Patty couldn't avoid a common undergraduate error?

Impressive.

According to Patty and Nancy, approximately 1.2 million women and 835 000 men were victims of IPV in the previous 12 months. They divided IPV into three categories: rape, physical assault and stalking victimization.

Here are their questions about rape:

> Has a man or boy ever made you have sex by using force or threatening to harm you or someone close to you? Just so there is no mistake, by sex we mean putting a penis in your vagina (female respondents only).
>
> Has anyone, male or female, ever made you have oral sex by using force or threat of force? Just so there is no mistake, by oral sex we mean that a man or boy put his penis in your mouth (or someone, male or female, penetrated your vagina or anus with their mouth or tongue).
>
> Has anyone ever made you have anal sex by force or threat of harm? Just so there is no mistake, by anal sex we mean that a man or boy put his penis in your anus.
>
> Has anyone, male or female, ever put fingers or objects in your vagina or anus against your will or by using force or threats?
>
> Has anyone, male or female, ever attempted to make you have vaginal, oral, or anal sex against your will, but intercourse or penetration did not occur?

Well then. Only females are asked to respond to the issue of forced sex, and the only thing that counts as sex is putting a penis in something. Okie dokie. No problems with that question at all, right? And oral sex never involves women grabbing a man or boy's head and forcing him to perform oral sex. Good thing CK Louis wasn't consulted on this survey.

Gosh, I wonder if male respondents felt maybe a little reluctant to share their experiences when the first question won't even permit them to respond?

Let's look at physical assault:

> After you became an adult, did any person, male or female, ever:
>
> Throw something at you that could hurt?
>
> Push, shove or grab you?
>
> Pull your hair?
>
> Slap or hit you?
>
> Kick or bite you?
>
> Choke or attempt to drown you?
>
> Hit you with some object?
>
> Beat you up?
>
> Threaten you with a gun?
>
> Threaten you with a knife or other weapon?
>
> Use a gun on you?
>
> Use a knife or other weapon on you?

Fair enough. Those all seem like assault to me. No problems here at all.

And finally, stalking:

> Not including bill collectors, telephone solicitors, or other sales people, has anyone, male or female, ever:
>
> Followed or spied on you?
>
> Sent you unsolicited letters or written correspondence?

> > Made unsolicited phone calls to you?
> >
> > Showed up at places you were even though he or she had no business being there?
> >
> > Left unwanted items for you to find?
> >
> > Tried to communicate in other ways against your will?
> >
> > Vandalized your property or destroyed something you loved?

Only victims who were followed or harassed on more than one occasion and who experienced a high level of fear were counted as stalking victims. Of course, that means men who were subjected to any of the above, but who were not made afraid by those actions were not counted as victims.

Sweet!

So what did the NVAW survey find?

> > 0.2% of men and 4.5% of women reported forcible rape.

The only surprising thing about that is that 0.2% of men could find some way to report their rapes, given the way the survey was worded. Overall, 7.3% of men and 21.7% of women reported victimization.

I wish I could post the full article here for you, but it is behind a paywall. If you do have access, the full citation is:

PATRICIA TJADEN and NANCY THOENNES (2000). Prevalence and Consequences of Male-to-female and Female-to-male Intimate Partner Violence as Measured by the National Violence Against Women Survey Violence Against Women February 2000 6: 142-161, doi:10.1177/10778010022181769

The CDC survey, called the National Intimate Partner and Sexual Violence Survey(NIPSVS) reached some startlingly different conclusions. The article I'm going to cite is NOT behind a paywall, and you can access it here.

The tl;dr version:

5.4 million men report being victims of IPV, compared to 4.8 million women.

If you add the 600K rapes reported by women, you still only get 5.4 million women, which is exactly the same as men, suggesting that IPV is pretty evenly divided. It's extremely problematic to add the rape numbers however, as 80% of rape victims also report being victims of violence, meaning they are being double counted.

The best case scenario in the NIPSVS is that women and men are equally violent, but the more likely truth is that women are significantly more violent than men.

Bert Hoff, who wrote the article even has a theory as to why that might be, and I think it's a fascinating possibility. Noting that rates of violence against women are declining, while rates of violence against men are holding steady, Bert theorizes that:

> > This drop in IPV against females and steady rate of violence against males raises an interesting policy question. There are many thousands of support programs, web sites and public-interest media items for female victims of domestic violence (DV), and virtually no programs and only a handful of web sites in the USA for male victims. Perhaps these programs and public education efforts have resulted in males, but not females, getting the message that DV is wrong.

It gets even more interesting when you consider what the NIPVS considered violence.

> > Some 21.6 percent of the male victims in that 2001 survey [the NVAW] were threatened with a knife, contrasted to 12.7 percent of the women The NISVS omission of threats by knife or gun is not only curious, but it flies in the face of the Center for Disease Control's own recommendations on data for IPV. The section of that document that covers the victim's experience of IPV includes sections on sexual violence, physical violence, threats of physical or sexual violence and "psychological/emotional abuse". But NISVS survey respondents were not asked about being threatened with a knife or gun.
> >
> > What is more violent, brandishing a knife at your spouse in the heat of an argument, refusing to wear a condom, or calling your spouse fat or stupid? NISVS did not ask about knife-wielding, but did ask about condoms and name-calling. Men were more often the victims of both psychological aggression ("expressive aggression" and "coercive control") and control of reproductive or sexual health .

The NISVS distinguishes between physical violence (use of force) and expressive aggression (name calling), yet still finds that men are victims more often than women.

Interestingly enough, the police officers who dealt with IPV appear to understand that women are aggressors more often than not, but were reluctant to do anything about it. Men were only slightly more likely to be arrested than women (33.3% vs. 26.5%) and the police identified the women as aggressors 54.9% of the time, and yet:

> > In 41.5 percent of the cases where men called the police, the police asked if he wanted his partner arrested; in 21 percent the police refused to arrest the partner, and in 38.7 percent the police said there was nothing they could do and left.

Here is another interesting fact about male victims: 106 men suffered serious physical injuries, but only 54 sought medical attention. 90% of those men were asked how they sustained their injuries and 60% were honest: I was injured by my partner.

Only 14% got any information on how to get help from a program aimed at reducing IPV.

The best source of help for men were friends, neighbors, relatives, lawyers and ministers. The least helpful sources: programs aimed at IPV.

> > The services least helpful were:
> >
> > . . .those that are the core of the DV service system: DV agencies, DV hotlines, and the police. On the one hand, about 25% of men who sought help from DV hotlines were connected with resources that were helpful. On the other hand, nearly 67% of men reported that these DV agencies and hotline were not at all helpful. Many reported being turned away. The qualitative accounts in our research tell a story of male helpseekers who are often doubted, ridiculed, and given false information.

That's not news to regular readers but it's nice to see it acknowledged in the research literature.

Now if only Facebook could get it's information correct.

> > Survivors shouldn't have to live their lives avoiding every possible situation that the abusive person could misuse. They can't control that person's behavior and we should work to continuously hold abusers accountable for their actions. Abusers go to devastating lengths to isolate their victims from family and friends. It is vital that survivors are able to safely rebuild those important connections, using Facebook and > other social networks. Telling a victim to go offline to be safe is not only unacceptable, it further isolates her from people who love her.

Her? Really?

It's far more likely to be him.

> Three things can not long be hidden: the sun, the moon and the truth.
>
> ~Buddha

Looks to me like the sun is about to shine on the truth about intimate partner violence. Women are far more likely to throw the first punch.

Gives new meaning to the saying "ladies first", no?

Lots of love,

JB

Paul Elam, Girl Writes What, John Hembling, and other rapists and harassers

AVfM Video Source · 9 December 2013 · Archived copy · Original

An important dialogue between two feminists. We are shocked and appalled that Girl Writes What, Paul Elam, John the Other, and the others named here are guilty of the despicable behaviors described herein.

Subscribe to RazorBladeKandy for further updates.

Six year old Hunter Yelton is suspended from school and labeled with sexual harassment, for kissing a girl on the hand

Paul Elam · 10 December 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Are school officials interested in education and the well-being of students anymore, or are they just a bunch of sociopathic, opportunistic scumbags willing to savage children for the sake of political correctness and to get back slaps from their left-of-Mao, morally derelict cohorts in the teachers union?

Never mind, the question was rhetorical. And if it wasn't, it was just given another resounding answer by Robin Gooldy, district superintendent over Lincoln School of Science and Technology in Canon City, Colorado, where he just explained the suspension of six year old Hunter Yelton, for, get this, kissing a girl on the hand, an apparently at some point, her cheek.

Oh, and they also stamped "sexual harassment" on his permanent school record.

I started to write this up as a news story, but I was too pissed off to keep my opinion out of it.

Now, I am not going to waste keystrokes explaining how a six year old doesn't understand sex, much less sexual harassment. Nor am I going to offer a step by step rationale why behavior of this kind is perfectly normal. If you need that explained to you, then I can only suggest Googling "Darwin Awards" and then just using your limited brain power on not getting one. Either that, or consider a career in education.

What I am going to address here is Gooldy. He's the (insert whatever you like here) who offered the following rationale when he was questioned as to why the school officials acted like a band of crazed vigilantes over a schoolyard kiss.

"The focus needs to be on his behavior," said the (insert whatever you like here), "We usually try to get the student to stop, but if it continues, we need to take action and it sometimes rises to the level of suspension."

And red stamping his school records with "sexual harassment."

He also said that no legal action is anticipated because it was only a violation of school policy.

Hear that, Hunter, you lucky little bastard? It was just school policy so you don't have to worry about the slammer. But keep this up and you might end up there about the time you figure out what "sexual harassment" means.

But, seriously folks, and all of this is serious, what kind of empty headed and heartless policy automaton do you have to be to answer questions about this insanity in such a meaningless way? Did he even really hear the question that he was asked? I am thinking, no.

One more time, Gooldy, where it concerns the fact you have taken the opportunity assist in the development of a child, whose care has been entrusted to you, and turned that into an abuse of that child, the question is:

What the fuck were you thinking?

Yes, yes, I know, "The focus needs to be on his behavior," right? That is certainly the safe-for-school-administration answer. After all, that's what's important, right? God help Gooldy if the focus was ever on his behavior.

By the way, the witch hunt was apparently headed not by Gooldy, who just played cleanup, but by the school's female principle. I went through a several news stories and did not see her name in print, even among the repetitious instances of "Hunter Yelton."

Name the victim, protect the perpetrator. That is the way the other media rolls these days.

I have little else I can find to say about this. Folks, the world is not going crazy. It is already gone. From the robotic posturing of school officials to the fact that Hunter's mother is the only person I see that is so far screaming bloody murder at these lunatics in charge of our young boys, it is hard to have much hope.

We saw the same thing with Mike Campbell, whose actions as a school principle led directly to the suicide death of Christian Adamek, with the parents of Sparkman High School kids literally cheering him on.

We saw it again with Johnny Jones, a fifth-grade student at South Eastern School District in Fawn Grove, Pennsylvania, who was suspended from school for making and imaginary bow and arrow in class.

And we saw it again in September, when officials in Virginia suspended two grade 7 boys from school for playing with toy guns, in their own home.

Yes, school officials have decided that their policies now extend past the school grounds and into the private lives and property of students and their parents.

The pedagogy is becoming state muscle on a level never seen before, and it is inflicting its insanity on just about anyone it wants, though its primary victims are male children.

At least that explains why no one is doing anything about it. Yet. I still have to believe that at some point parents will begin to wake up to the fact that our schools have become places where administrators and teachers come to hurt children.

If they can stop shopping and watching football long enough to figure this out, there will be hell to pay. Until then, Mom and Dad, please keep making those PTA meetings and tell the good folks at the school that they are doing just swell, until they come for your son.

This is what the truth looks like

Sage Gerard (Victor Zen) · 10 December 2013 · Archived copy · Original

I stumbled upon an image from 9gag.com, a site with user-generated content. The original uploader of this piece is unknown, but he or she used several shots from JustGirlyThings, a Tumblr blog, and juxtaposed their captions against pictures that actually need them. If this image does not teach you about the double standards and exaggerations that harm men, nothing will.

Death by alimony: The torments of John F. Wacker – New York, 1915

Robert St. Estephe · 10 December 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Robert St. Estephe–Gonzo Historian–is dedicated to uncovering the forgotten past of marginalizing men. "Gonzo journalism" is characterized as tending "to favor style over fact to achieve accuracy." Yet history – especially "social history" – is written by ideologues who distort and bury facts in order to achieve an agenda. "Gonzo" writing is seen as unorthodox and surprising. Yet, in the 21st century subjectivity, distortion and outright lying in non-fiction writing is the norm. Fraud is the new orthodoxy. Consequently, integrity and verifiable fact are the new "transgressive."

Welcome to the disruptive world of facts, the world of Gonzo History.

●◊●

As shown in a recent post on AVfM, "Alimony unlimited (and the emergence of a men's rights movement)," the idea of an anti-alimony organization — the protoype of the modern men's rights organization — was first broached by St. Louis divorcee George Esterling back in 1911. It was not until 1927, however, that such a formal organized effort to combat alimony racketeering was formed — as The American Alimony Payers Protective Association, founded in New York City by Robert Ecob. Mr. Ecob called this racket, which had by the 1920s had reached epidemic proportions, "polite blackmail."

Had the early men's rights activists who in the year 1027 such as those who had formed their anti-alimony organizations in New York, Chicago and Milwaukee known the story of John F. Wacker, they certainly would have retold it as a prime example of insane predation by an alimony-grabber. Wacker, whose ex crossed the Atlantic in her effort to squeeze cash out of the husband she had walked out on in he couple's native Germany, paid the ultimate price for failing to bow down to the American Goddess of Female Privilege. He was, in essence, condemned to death for his disobedience.

Following is the story of alimony martyr John F. Wacker, who met his death on September 6, 1915.

***

FULL TEXT: The application made to Justice [James] Donnelly of the Supreme Court on Friday to order the removal of John F. Wacker from the prisoner's ward at Bellevue Hospital was withdrawn yesterday because Wacker died on Monday [Sept. 6]. Wacker, who was a dealer in jeweler's tools at 21 John Street, had been committed to Ludlow Street Jail three months ago for failing to pay $1,000 back alimony. He was determined not to pay, it being a matter of principle with him that when a woman could not live with her husband she should not expect him to support her.

Six months in jail would have freed Wacker from liability, and he was received to serve this term. In jail he grew ill of cirrhosis of the liver. A week ago yesterday he was taken to Bellevue. Otto A. Glassberg, Wacker's attorney, told Justice Donnelly that Wacker lay in a ward that was so noisy his client could not sleep, and that he was surrounded by drug users and alcoholics who made an inferno of the place. Mr. Glassberg wanted Wacker taken to St. Vincent's or some other quiet hospital.

Counsel for Mrs. Wacker opposed the motion and intimated that the purpose of it was to enable Wacker to escape paying the money he owed his wife. Wacker's son Emil made an affidavit that when he saw his father recently the latter appeared to be in good health. Mrs. Wacker's attorney asserted that Wacker had promised to give his wife $1,000 if she would divorce him. Mr. Glassberg reported that unless his client was removed quickly from the prison ward in Bellevue he would die. Justice Donnelly reserved decision.

["Alimony Prisoner Dies. – Court Plea to Remove Him from Bellevue Hospital Withdrawn." New York Times (N.Y.), Sep. 8, 1915, p. ?; note: "Counsel for Mrs. Wasker" corrected to "Wacker"]

***

Excerpt from Wacker v Wacker Jan. 3, 1913:

The parties intermarried in Germany in 1886, where they continued to reside until some time in 1891, when, according to the allegations of the complaint, the defendant, wrongfully and without just cause or provocation, abandoned the plaintiff, and has since refused to support or live with her. Shortly after the abandonment, the defendant came to the state of New York, where he has since resided. The action was commenced by the service of a summons on the defendant on the 31st of May, 1912, and the plaintiff was not then within the state of New York, nor had she ever been in the United States. Subsequently she left Germany, and reached New York about the 20th of June, 1912; the defendant in the meantime having temporarily left New York for Germany, where he was when she arrived. He did not appear in the action, but his default was subsequently opened, and he was permitted to come in and defend. During his default the plaintiff obtained, ex parte, an order awarding her $10 a week alimony and $500 counsel fee, and also an order appointing a receiver of defendant's property in sequestration proceedings. After defendant had appeared in the action, he moved, upon notice, to vacate the order awarding alimony and counsel fee and appointing the receiver. The motion was denied, and he appeals, urging that both orders are erroneous, since the court did not have jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the action. [p. 79, Justice McLaughlin]

[The New York Supplement, Vol. 139 (New York State Reporter, Vol. 173), Feb. 3 – Mar. 10, 1913, West Pub. Co, St. Paul, pp. 78-9]

***

In defense of the modern [Aussie] man

VFM News and Commentary · 11 December 2013 · Archived copy · Original

On International Men's Day this year (November 19th), advertising and marketing company M&C Saatchi released a White Paper titled The Modern [Aussie] Man. The Paper was the result of eight months of one-to-one interviews with 140 men, primarily aged 27-55 years, from a broad cross section of Australian demographics, workforce and geography.

Seventy men were influential leaders, marketers and role models from business, sport, military, popular culture, hospitality, philanthropy, academia, men's health and wellbeing, education, media, advertising and fashion. Seventy were everyday men from around Australia, including construction and white collared workers, sales assistants, baristas and bartenders.

To quote from the Paper,

> "The Modern [Aussie] Man study is not, and was never intended to be, a definitive summation of Australian men's character, anthropology and imperfections. Nor is it the creation of a new set of male archetypes. Its aim is to draw a line under historic truths and modern day perceptions, and help move society to a new place of heightened awareness and mutual respect.

> "How? By discovering whether Australian masculinity behind-the-scenes differs from the stereotypes of sporty, resilient, self-mocking, laid-back, unromantic and outdoorsy. Are Australian men making progress in the development of gender parity sensibilities, while retaining strong, positive manliness? Are the majority sexist dinosaurs? Or have they succumbed to female will and turned into emasculated wimps?

> "This study investigates what is going on in a significant sample of Australian men's heads, to contribute to the wider discussion about how both genders can create a world where there is mutual equality and respect."

The Paper generated a great deal of discussion in the mainstream media and blogosphere – both positive and negative.

The Equality4Men blog by England's Glen Poole contained a great article titled Men are too scared to talk about gender issues says Advertising giant… and the Herald's Sam de Brito wrote a balanced op-ed titled Ladies, why so serious? The report also received good coverage by SBS, news.com.au, The Good Men Project, Channel 9 News, theDaily Telegraph, and the Financial Review.

Three very hostile attacks were found in the Fairfax 'Daily Life' blog, the Sydney Morning Herald and the Guardian. In defence of the Modern [Aussie] Man, the major myths created by these attacks need to be dispelled.

1. That the Paper is misogynist

Here are some quotes from the Paper's take on men, women and feminism. I'll let you make up your own mind as to whether it comes across as misogynist or not.

> "The majority of Australian men are highly respectful of women [and] advocates for gender equality.

> "A father's experiences with his daughters are different to those with his sons, but are just as treasured. Unlike his father's generation, which spent less time with daughters, he tries to spend equal time with both. He understands that girls need more of an emotional component to play, while also sharing feelings, talking and imagination activation. As daughters become tweens or teens, Modern [Aussie] Man shifts his engagement > style from playing to talking.

> "No-one recognises more than the Modern [Aussie] Man that men and women each have distinct differences and strengths. He is supportive and encouraging of the opportunities this brings to women and understands that it will always be a juggle for both genders. He only asks that women and brands respect men's sensibilities in the process. It's the same thing that women ask of men. It's called mutual respect.

> "Modern [Aussie] Man is an underground feminist. He is supportive of women having parity and respect in society, work and at home. He is a genuine enthusiast, but is unsure of what more he needs to do to support women's equality yet still retain his own sense of purpose and laid back disposition without offending women's sensibilities. He doesn't believe that societal gender equality should mean the dilution of gender differences, yet he feels that this may be inevitable if men and women aren't encouraged to be the best versions of their gender."

2. That the Paper ignores 'the patriarchy'

The White Paper acknowledges Patriarchy Theory by making it very clear that "men have never lacked gender privilege or rights" and "the male gender has historical dominance in powerful places in a work environment."

But it also makes it clear that, after 40 years of feminism, women's studies, offices and ministers for women (with little corresponding masculism, men's studies, or offices and ministers for men), men – surprise, surprise! – have the right to a voice and an opinion on gender issues just as much as women.

It can also be argued that Patriarchy Theory (which has many critics) isn't the only way to understand gendered power relations. There are many other ways that are far more useful and effective when looking at men's and women's issues. The simplistic feminist narrative of gender privilege for men and gender oppression for women excludes many social spheres where men lack power and suffer discrimination, as well as those arenas where women carry a great deal of power and privilege.

One of the Paper's key findings was that,

> "Modern [Aussie] Man believes that women are taking the (much respected) fight for equality into their personal relationships. He feels that women are resetting the gender imbalance in the outside world by subconsciously asserting a reverse gender imbalance in the home/ relationships, singularly taking control of a myriad of everyday decisions.

> "These decisions – ranging from holidays, weekend plans, cinema viewing choices, when it's time to relax, allocation of chores, going shopping (as a couple) or what to eat – may seem insignificant in their everydayness, but Modern [Aussie] Man believes the home and personal relationships should be the heart and champion of mutual respect and equality. In his mind, this should work both ways, but currently it favours women."

If it's not OK that men have arguably asserted more power and status outside the home than women, is it OK that women appear to now be asserting more power and status inside the home? Do two wrongs make a right? Surely fairness and social justice dictates a more equal balance of power in all arenas.

3. That the Paper is homophobic

The report does predominantly focus on the lived experience of straight men in Australia (as the vast majority of Australian men are straight). While the paper doesn't talk specifically about gay men, it also doesn't talk specifically about many other important masculinities – single men, divorced men, Jewish men, rural men, middle-class men, disabled men, Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander men, etc.

The reason for this is not homophobia (or anti-semitism, racism, etc), it's simply that the Paper didn't seek to study the differences between different groups of men, but to study the commonalities between men, as men, in terms of their shared masculinity. As the Paper says,

> "The purpose of the Modern [Aussie] Man study is to identify what defines Australian men, how they perceive themselves, what are their behavioural and emotional triggers, and how best to engage them.

> "The data determined the cluster analysis that resulted, through the identification of obvious patterns which became the 'self-perception' markers. With the self-perception markers identified, a structural framework for painting the multi-dimensional portrait of the Modern [Aussie] Man was layered up.

> "All seven characteristics identified in the findings were evident in conversations with every one of the 140 men, expressed in differing degrees by different individuals. Importantly, all conclusions and insights were drawn from the men themselves. Their perceptions were also their reality."

Most of the key characteristics identified by the paper are present, on average, in most Australian men, whether they are straight or gay, single or married, whether they live in the city or the country, whatever their race, religion, ability or socio-economic status. Of course there will be individuals who don't identify with some of the characteristics found in the Paper, but even those individuals would be hard pressed to argue they don't know men who fit the picture of masculinity painted by the Paper, even in part.

It is a pity that the authors of the Paper didn't at least acknowledge the many and varied masculinities that exist across the spectrum of Australian manhood, even if studying the differences between them wasn't the exercise being undertaken. Perhaps part two of the M&C Saatchi project (if there is to be one), might take on this task. This would certainly serve to counteract one of the main criticisms the White Paper has received.

There are sections of the Paper that would not be relevant to gay men, but one would be hard pushed to argue that makes it homophobic. Such parts include some of the section on fatherhood (other parts would indeed apply to gay dads), some of the section on shopping habits, and the heterosexual language used when discussing relationships and families (which refers exclusively to wives, female partners and girlfriends). This focus upon heterosexual gender relationships was chosen not to deny or exclude the experiences of gay men, but because the paper seeks to examine contemporary relationships between men and women.

It could also be argued that in terms of advertising and marketing, the 'pink dollar' has been extensively researched and is fairly well understood, whereas straight men have largely been ignored until now because they were seen as uninterested in themselves.

4. That the Paper is just a marketing exercise to help sell stuff to men

Of all the criticisms levelled at the Paper, this one probably has the most validity. Yes, the Paper helps brands to market their products to Australian men based upon the average man's actual values and perceptions of himself rather than outdated stereotypes about masculinity that might have guided them in the past. What's wrong with that? If this leads to one less advertisement featuring a bumbling ignorant Dad, or a male victim of domestic violence as a source of laughter, it would be a great thing.

But the Paper is more than just a marketing exercise. By revealing the depth of character of Australian manhood and the healthy place of Australian masculinity, it offers the chance (for those brave enough to take it up) to start a new conversation about gender relations and gender equality based upon the lived realities of men's lives rather than the picture painted by outdated stereotypes or feminist narratives.

5. That the Paper ignores the negative impact of 'traditional masculinity' upon a range of social indicators

Simply put, this wasn't one of the aims of the Paper, nor should it have been. If the Paper's aim was to "identify what defines Australian men, how they perceive themselves, what are their behavioural and emotional triggers, and how best to engage them", why should it focus upon the behaviours of a small minority of atypical men who abuse women, engage in criminal activity, harass or sexually assault others, etc? These are real and important issues, but they weren't relevant to the aims of this study (which to its credit still clearly acknowledged that some ignorant, domineering and sexist men do exist).

Also outside the scope of the Paper were many other important male issues – violence against men, male suicide, men's short life expectancy, the underperformance of boys in schools, etc. The Paper also didn't explore whether these are caused by 'traditional masculinity', 'traditional femininity', biological differences, psychological differences, a failure to focus on the specific needs of men and boys or other social determinants – and that's quite OK.

6. That the Paper claims men lack a voice in society

A common misunderstanding is that the Paper claims men lack a voice in society. It says nothing of the sort. What it does say is that,

> "Modern [Aussie] Man has developed gender issue laryngitis that stops any talk about his thoughts, concerns and issues around either gender, for fear of being labelled sexist" [my emphasis].

Having worked in the men's health sector for 10 years, a constant refrain I hear is 'why don't men open up and talk about their feelings more?'

The Modern [Aussie] Man White Paper contains the voices of 140 men from right across society doing exactly that, and what is the response? To be attacked and pilloried in the media as "paranoid woman haters."

The three hostile articles cited above demonstrate perfectly one of the points the Paper tries to make: most men just keep quiet about gender issues for fear of being shamed, shot down and shut up by the likes of their rhetoric.

By effectively telling men that their feelings and concerns about gender issues are unimportant, the authors of these articles ironically appear to be trying to reinforce one of the most unhealthy components of the traditional male role: to endure hardship without complaining or asking for help.

Moving on…

The report, like Australian men and women, isn't perfect. It is the first step towards the possibility of a new conversation about contemporary manhood and gender relations. One that doesn't start from a place of negativity as so many have over the past 40 years, but from the lived realities and perceptions of Australian men. As the report says, "masculinity is in a good place here."

This new conversation, should we take up the challenge, would see men and women working side-by-side to address women's issues as well as men's issues. It would see men and women listening openly, not defensively, when gender grievances are raised by the other sex. It would renew the long fight for gender equality while celebrating the differences between the sexes.

I'll leave the last word to the Modern [Aussie] Man White Paper…

> "Hopefully, women [and men!] will appreciate this as an opportunity to move closer towards mutual respect, equality and understanding."

Rated “P” for Patriarchy

Paul Elam · 11 December 2013 · Archived copy · Original

One of the most frustrating things to see, to a person who values truth, is valid points misleadingly mixed with ridiculous assertions. Salon’s article by Soraya Chemaly, “The MPAA’s backwards logic: Sex is dangerous, sexism is fine,” is a case of just such an article. In perhaps Chemaly’s only really substantive point, she questions why a sex scene, which depicts something generally positive and fun, should be rated worse than movies where people are literally ripped to shreds. But this isn’t the place to debate such aspects of American morality (although this might be), and aside from this, it is an exercise in fallacy and distorted reality.

Chemaly’s article focuses on the French film, “Blue is the Warmest Color,” which was given an NC-17 rating for graphic, lengthy lesbian sex scenes, using prosthetic genitalia. However, you don’t need to have seen the movie to realize just how ridiculous the arguments in her article are. In one of her first questions, she prompts the reader to, “Imagine if our movie ratings considered sexism and racism as content that children should not be viewing without parental input.”

Okay, I’m imagining it: I see films rated based on a film reviewer’s political convictions and personal beliefs. You know, more than they already do. That way, every movie a person under 17 is allowed to see will give them just the right politically-correct programming, since clearly mandatory schooling isn’t working fast enough.

The article goes on to complain about how women are often portrayed in passive, “objectified,” roles in movies. Of course, there are often very good reasons for that. In action movies, for instance, it is simply implausible that, without a supernatural or science fiction explanation, the vast majority of women would keep up. Certainly not the willowy creatures popular on the silver screen.

A study from 1997 shows why this is so. In multiple tests of upper body strength, men were able to exert an average of 33% of their body weights with their dominant sides, versus 24% for women. The difference in body mass, however, meant that in terms of absolute force men were very nearly twice as strong as the women tested. Another study showed that even female athletes whose sports depended on grip strength had weaker grips than untrained men. Given that many action movies involve large amounts of close combat, this necessarily means that, with any sort of realism, women will not play starring roles in action movies. If women want more realistic portrayals of effective women in combat, they need to take it up with nature, not filmmakers. Indeed, the cases where major female actors, such as Angelina Jolie in, “Mr. & Mrs. Smith,” or Scarlett Johansson as, “Black Widow,” in “The Avengers,” are portrayed beating up men are unrealistic and contrived. Admittedly, Linda Hamilton in, “Terminator 2,” and Jenette Goldstein in “Aliens,” come closer, although a woman like Fredia Gibbs, in her heyday, would be even more realistic.

But of course, showing what would really happen to most women in actual hand-to-hand combat with a man would be a patriarchal celebration of violence against women, right? The (warning: graphic violence in links) depictions of violence against men are clearly much milder and less offensive .

From complaints about adhering in any way to the true nature of our species, the article then moves on to hyperbolic misrepresentation. One complaint is about the movie, “Shark Tale,” which features Kanye West’s song “Golddigger.” “Does the message that all women are manipulative, greedy, money-obsessed whores work for you?” it asks angrily, ignoring the fact that the song is about one woman, not women in general, and that there are indisputably women with a gold digger attitude. Indeed, any man who has dated with and without money can tell you how much of a difference income can make.

Then, the article makes the ridiculous assertion that, ” At the same time, MPAA ratings clearly reveal a serious discomfort with adult women as sexual actors, with depictions of female pleasure, and with portrayals of men as objects of desire.” Really? So, if the actors in Brokeback Mountain were portraying underage characters getting fully nude with extended, explicit sex, complete with genital prosthetics, it would not have an NC-17 rating? The idea that the MPAA acted out of sexism in giving its rating is ridiculous, unless you buy into Ryan Gosling's statement, quoted in the article, that, " The MPAA is… trying to force us to look away from a scene that shows a woman in a sexual scenario, which is both complicit and complex. It's misogynistic in nature to try and control a woman's sexual presentation of self."

Apparently, two straight women pretending to have sex with fake genitals is, "a woman's sexual presentation of self." Whether the MPAA's actions in regards to this film are justified or not, there is no evidence, or even any reason to think, that it was motivated by sexism.

It is a shame that, in as large a platform as Salon, they could not start a discussion about our strange approach to sex and violence in entertainment without filling it with ideological half-truths. Their complaints against the ratings of movies with, "beheadings, severed limbs, bloodied torsos, rapes, decapitations and worse," (that's right, beheadings AND decapitations) as "sexist," despite the fact that such violence is depicted far more often against men than women, are ridiculous on their face. Especially given that, as the feminists love to point out, these dying men are often fighting to save a woman.

“War-marriage vampires” & “Fake war brides” of WW I

Robert St. Estephe · 11 December 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Today’s informed male is aware he is liable to be the target of predatory women who see him as a walking wallet, a sperm donor, a disposable instrument of erotic utility, a handyman and a target of extreme emotional and physical outbursts (which are defined under the gender ideology as justifiable “personal-as-political” responses to patriarchal oppression) that will be blamed on the target himself. Readers familiar with historical stories published on AVfM will be familiar with old-timey women’s rackets which exploited traditional female privilege such as the Badger Game, the Alimony Racket, the Heart Balm Racket and the Lonely Hearts Racket. (Also see: “The profits of love: early 1900?s” – AVfM). Here’s another one to add to the list. It was targeted against servicemen, the majority of them conscripts it would seem, and was called at its inception in the U.S. during World War I by various names: “Fake War Brides,” “Soldiers’ Pay Wives,” and “War-Marriage Vampires.”
Here’s how it worked: When war would break out, gold-diggers, already long-accustomed to view short-term marriage (or oftentimes a series of such marriages) as sources of alimony would, across the nation, mobilize to take advantage of the wartime opportunity to grab some easy cash from the boys going off to war. These industrious girls sought a monthly government check — to which the servicemen’s wives were entitled — and, if the bride was fortunate, the husband, or husbands, would be killed off, gaining the lucky war widow an extra monetary benefit. When the young man survived, the “wife” would on his return promptly divorce him. The most ambitious of these marital scammers would marry several, insuring them a good income.

This is the first installment of several that will trace the history of this particular scam practiced by female predators. Later installments will feature the scam as practiced in World War II and the Korean War, when the predators came to be known under the monikers “Allotment Wives” or “Allotment Annies.”

Following are two historical articles describing the scam in general terms, plus an article on an ambitious young woman who managed to marry 16 victims.

●●●●●●

[image]

FULL TEXT: Bigamy as a regular industry is one of the menaces that soldiers about to leave for the other side, and men in the army camps scattered all over the United States, have to face. There have been several cases of bigamy in Reading [Pennsylvania] only recently, but cases in which soldiers were the victims have not been recovered here. The object in these plurality of marriages is the soldiers allowances and pensions to wives. Because soldiers are susceptible and chivalrous the government of the United States is being robbed of thousands of dollars every month by unscrupulous women. Soldiers in Uncle Sam’s uniform who believe they are depriving themselves of part of their small wages to support a newly acquired wife are merely contributing to adventuresses who are deriving the same source of revenue from several soldier husbands. While the soldier is “carrying on” at the front with the picture of his newly acquired bride close over his heart, the bride is “carrying on” at home as the result of receiving as many allotments as her charms may enabled her to assemble soldier husbands.

~ Stamping out Vampires. ~

In an effort to stamp out this new vampire of war times the government of the United States is starting a nationwide search for the culprits and is meeting with considerable success. Every agency of the government is being brought to bear to ferret out the offenders.

The work of ferreting out fraud against the government in this and other respects is in charge of L. Merriwether Smith, of Harrisburg, Ky., formerly a member of the Kentucky State Senate and now associate council for the War Risk Bureau. More than 100 cases already are prepared for trial, and many women are facing prison sentences as a result of their activities. These case are but the beginning of the prosecutions, which are expected to mount into the thousands. The bureau has worked out a unique system by which soldiers’ allotments are checked up.

~ Victims Young Boys. ~

Most of the victims to this form of “vampiring,” it appears, according to the war risk bureau, are young boys from the country to reach the various camps with chivalrous ideas of women. There boys are attracted by the dashing “camp widows,” fall victim to the appearance of style, and end by marrying them and making an allotment of part of their soldier’s pay as required by law. A private is expected, when married, to make an allotment of $15 to his wife, and the government matches this allotment with an allowance of $15 more, so the wife receives $30 and the soldier goes to the war front with a wage of $15 a month. In some cases women who have participated in this form of depriving both soldiers and government have been drawing allotments and allowances from 12 different husbands. Each allowance calls for the assumption of a different name and the check has to be indorsed, subjecting the perpetrator to the charge of forgery and also that of bigamy. In order to obtain these allowances the women run the risk of having the 12 husbands, more or less, meet each other in the trenches “somewhere in France,” where a comparison of notes and of photographs of the wives left behind might cause embarrassing complications.

~ More from the Pacific. ~

The checks sent out by the treasury department are mailed in an envelope which renders the address and allowance number visable from the outside, so the mail carrier, post office employees and others may become aware of the person receiving them. In cases where suspicion is awakened the authorities are notified.

Singularly enough, the Pacific coast produces more of these cases than does the Atlantic. Mr. Smith, who has charge of the investigations, explains this on the ground that the women of the Pacific coast, especially of San Francisco, have had more experience in this form of fraud than the women of the East.

“These cases were especially prevalent during the time when soldiers were being sent to the Philippines,” said Mr. Smith, discussing the cases today.

~ Soldiers Party to Fraud. ~

While the great majority of fraud cases involve women who have deluded trusting young soldiers, there are also cases of soldiers who themselves have been party to fraud. In these instances they have alleged the existence of wives who were not their wives, and have made claims for allowances for children that did not exist. Under the law, an illegitimate child is entitled to allowance for support, and the government has cognizance of cases where soldiers have made claims to the parentage of illegitimate children who did not really exist.

The government has record of one case where a soldier claimed a man was his relative to whom he had contributed money for support. It developed the man was not related to the soldier in any way but explained the transaction by saying the soldier had stolen $50 from him at [the finish of sentence – the article’s last – is illegible].

[“Bigamy an Industry For Fake War Brides – U. S. Uncovers Thousands Of Cases Of Girls Marrying For Allowance and Insurance,” The Reading Eagle (Pa.), Nov. 3, 1918, p. 17]

***

[image]

FULL TEXT: San Francisco, Oct. 4.—The dollar vampire who schemed to mulct the American volunteer soldier in the great war under the guise of marriage, is cashing in through the divorce courts.

Amazed at the cynical assurance with which many such “war brides” have brought their alimony pleas before him, Judge Thomas F. Graham, nationally known as the “Great Reconciler” for his mediation in domestic tangles, and deep student of the divorce problem, is seeking nation-wide co-operation of courts to thwart further victimization.

~ Up to Courts ~

“Not alone to assure justice in individual cases,” says Judge Graham, “but to support the marriage institution and to heck further growth of love cynicism among America’s youth, must courts be alert to see that disillusioned war veterans are not further bled in the marriage bunco game through undeserved alimony.

“Wherever possible, both parties should be compelled to appear in court. The woman’s story should not be sufficient, and diligent investigation of war marriages that smack ‘for alimony’ is particularly vital at this time.”

~ Hasty Marriages ~

Blame for wreck and mercenary salvage of war marriages is not placed entirely upon women by Judge Graham. The haste and indiscretion of many men marrying on the eve of overseas departure made the designing overtures of women of that kind all too easy.

But such unions are not proper alimony cases, and it is this feature that he is fighting with all the legitimate powers of the court.

Surprised by the unexpected return of soldiers whose allotments she sought, but whom she never again expected to see, the marriage profiteer is hastening to sever the matrimonial bond, but seeks to retain this financial tie.

~ Divorces Double ~

“The matrimonial profiteer,” says Judge Graham, “is a thousand times more dangerous than the economic profiteer who can more readily be reached by law.”

“Since the war began, divorces have increased 50 per cent in California, and I am sure it is the same over the nation.”

“Thousands of young men in the heat of war married women who lived with them perhaps two or three days, then put in claims for alimony. I know of one case in which a woman married five soldiers and for a long time collected allotments from each.

“Many married soldiers hoping they would be killed in France so that they could collect insurance.”

“Now that our soldiers have returned, many are finding how they have being victimized! They are too disgusted, too disillusioned to fight. The courts must do it for them.”

[Paul N. Wilson, “’Halt War-Marriage Vampire!’ – Noted Judge Fights Alimony Drive On Veterans,” syndicated (NEA), Oct. 19, 1920, p. 3]

***

[image]

FULL TEXT: Chicago, Dec. 2. – Mrs. Helen Ferguson Drexler, 22 years old, has confessed to having been married to sixteen men in the past three years. The young woman, who was arrested here today by Government agents, admitted having married the men, all of whom were either soldiers or sailors, for the sole reason of securing the allotment issued by the War Risk Bureau to a wife of a man in the service.

“You men try to make me admit the marriage of ten men,” she said. “Why, that is just more than half. I had sixteen of them during my career and was going to marry another in a few days if I had not been arrested.

“The first man to whom I was married was an auto salesman, in Boston, in 1918. After the wedding we lived together until he was called to France. Shortly afterward I got word of his death. I tried to forget, but being by myself I was soon forced to seek company, and finally married a man from New York. I was getting the allotment from the Government due me from my first husband at that time.”

“I lived with my second husband contentedly for several months. He joined the navy. I got an allotment from him. One day I met a woman who heard of the two allotments I was getting from the Government, amounting to $60 a month. She suggested that inasmuch as the money was easy I should keep it up and marry again. I could make hundreds of dollars a month by this scheme, if it worked.”

“I consented and married again, this time a soldier in the Brooklyn Navy Yard named John Kelly. He signed his allotment to me. I left him and went in search of another husband.”

“From then on life was just one husband after another. The income amounted to $500 a month. After two years I had married ten men. I can’t recall all the names. I went to Norfolk, Va., and married again. Each time I only stayed with my husband until I got the allotment signed to me and then left.

[“22-Year-Old Girl Married 16 Service Men; Collected $500 Monthly in Allotments,” New York Times (N.Y.), Dec. 3, 1921, p. 1]

***

FULL TEXT: Mrs. Helen Drexler Ferguson, 22 years old, was released yesterday from Geneva jail, twelve days before the expiration of her six month’s sentence for marrying a number of soldiers and sailors estimated at from fifteen to seventeen, in order to get their allotments.

She is to undergo an operation at Aurora hospital.

Following the operation Mrs. Ferguson will be given a ticket to Washington, where her parents reside, by the Salvation Army, which has taken an interest in her case.

Mrs. Ferguson says she has no other plans for the future than to go to some small city where she can find congenial employment.

[“Girl Who Married Soldiers For Pay Checks Released,” Aurora Daily Star (Il.), Jun. 21, 1922, p. 1]

***

[Photo from: “15 Husbands, All Yanks,” The Bisbee Daily Review (Az.), Jan. 15, 1922, p. 2]

***

[image]

World War I. US mobilization of 4,355,000. After declaration of war the US target for volunteer enlistment for the first 6 weeks was set at 1 million. Yet only 73,000 men volunteered. On May 18, 1917 the Selective Service Act was passed, with a minimum age of 21. Ultimately 4,355,000 were mobilized. During the war United States forces suffered 323,018 casualties.

***

Normal
0 false false

false

MicrosoftInternetExplorer4

/* Style Definitions */
table.MsoNormalTable {mso-style-name:”Table Normal”;
mso-tstyle-rowband-size:0;
mso-tstyle-colband-size:0;
mso-style-noshow:yes;
mso-style-parent:””;
mso-padding-alt:0in 5.4pt 0in 5.4pt;

mso-para-margin:0in;
mso-para-margin-bottom:.0001pt;
mso-pagination:widow-orphan;
font-size:10.0pt;
font-family:”Times New Roman”;
mso-ansi-language:#0400;
mso-fareast-language:#0400;
mso-bidi-language:#0400;}

A recent essay discussing this subject: “Allotment Annies and Other Wayward Wives:. Wartime Concerns About Female Disloyalty and the Problem of the Returned Veteran,” in The United States and the Second World War Fordham University Press September 2010, pp. 99-128]

***

Not all cops are like that

Paul Elam · 12 December 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Frequently I find myself in a position to be very critical of police. I can't remember a time that I was harsh on their actions that I don't think it was deserved. That, however, does not mean that I would want to be in their shoes, or that I think they are always wrong.

Check out this officer trying to explain what was plainly obvious to an idiot woman and a dumb as a box of rocks white knight with a camera phone.

I am with the cops on this one.

AVFM is hosting International Conference on Men's Issues

Paul Elam · 12 December 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Ticket prices are going up! Purchase yours now while prices are still low!

If we wanted to find a city that was an iconic testament to masculinity, we'd need look no further than Detroit. Founded by a French explorer named Cadillac, it rose up from humble beginnings in fur trade to become the city that literally changed the world; the city that imagined, designed and mass-produced one of the greatest, if not the greatest, invention of modern times: The automobile; the machine that revolutionized the lives of all Americans and indeed all of industrialized humanity.

For over a hundred years, it survived the conflicts of labor, the scourge of racism, and political corruption that would make Chicago blush. Yet it persevered.

And then it fell into hard times. Perhaps by coincidence, perhaps not, it lost its currency and its stature in perfect lockstep with the masculinity that first drove it to the top of civilization.

Bleeding and bankrupt, it now exists in decay and degradation. Once-great industrial complexes now have the look and feel of 1945 Dresden. City parks are overgrown and derelict. Schools and city services are running on fumes; some have quit running altogether. The only vigor remaining is in the rising numbers of the jobless and homeless, and in the handful of citizens doggedly and tenaciously working to salvage what is left.

It is a city teetering and struggling for its footing. It is seeking, like many men, to find its balance and its place in the world again. Also like men, it is in trouble as most of the world looks the other way.

I can think of no better or more appropriate place for men to dust themselves off and start building again. I can think of no better foundation on which men and the women who care for them can stand together and seek change.

With that it gives me great pride to announce that A Voice for Men will be hosting the First International Conference on Men's Issues on June 27 and 28 of 2014 in Detroit, Michigan.

For the conference we have secured commitments from some of the best known and highly regarded thinkers on men's rights and issues ever assembled in one place. They are as follows:

[image]

Dr. Warren Farrell, author of seven books on men's and women's issues, came to prominence in the 1970s as one of the leading male thinkers of our times. Warren originally championed the cause of feminism, serving on the New York City Board of the National Organization of Women (NOW). However, when NOW took anti-male and anti-father positions he began advocacy for boys, men and fathers. He is now recognized as one of the most important figures in the modern men's movement.

Erin Pizzey, author of five books, including the seminal Prone to Violence, is credited with starting the modern women's refuge movement in Cheswick, England in 1971. Erin is a steadfast human rights advocate who has lectured internationally on the subject of intimate partner violence. She is also an Editor-at-Large and domestic violence policy advisor for A Voice for Men.

Robert Franklin, Esq, is an attorney at law and the former Executive Editor of the Houston Law Review. Franklin writes commentary on our family law system and other related men's issues. He is a journalist for the National Parents Organization (formerly Fathers and Families) a shared parenting and family law reform advocacy group. Franklin is also a periodic contributor to A Voice for Men.

Dr. Miles Groth is professor of psychology at Wagner College in Staten Island, New York. He is the founder and former editor of Thymos: Journal of Boyhood Studies and is the current editor of New Male Studies, an international journal that serves as an open access online interdisciplinary forum for research and discussion of issues facing boys and men worldwide.

Barbara Kay is a columnist for Canada's National Post. She has written on a variety of issues affecting men and boys and has been particularly critical of both cultural misandry and the treatment of men and boys by the modern feminist movement. Kay is a lecturer who has spoken on National Television and at talks regarding her views on the rise of feminism to the detriment of men.

Karen Straughan is an internationally recognized writer, lecturer and videographer. As a mother of young sons, Straughan became concerned about the effects of cultural misandry and began writing and blogging on the subject. She also self-produces video commentary on the men's issues and has amassed 50,000 followers of her work. Straughan is an activist and a member of Men's Rights Edmonton and is a contributing editor of A Voice for Men.

Carnell Smith is a nationally recognized expert in paternity fraud. He is the Board President Executive Director of the National Family Justice Association. He is the executive director of the United States Citizens Against Paternity Fraud. He makes radio and TV appearances (CBS Early Show, ABC World News, Abrams Report), on America's paternity fraud crisis and has been frequently quoted in major newspapers (USA Today, Washington Times, Orlando Sentinel, Los Angeles Times, Chicago Tribune, Washington Post, Philadelphia Inquirer, Star Tribune).

 Paul Elam is the founder and publisher of A Voice for Men. Formerly a mental health professional, Elam became concerned about the treatment of men and boys, both in mental health settings and the culture at large. He is also the founder of A Voice for Men radio, a network of internet based radio programs dealing with problems that affect men and boys. He is an outspoken advocate against false allegations and takes a leadership role in A Voice for Men's advocacy for men who are falsely accused or convicted without due process.

Sen. Anne Cools is a member of the Canadian Senate. She became the first Black Canadian to be appointed to Canada's upper house. She is currently the longest-serving member of the Senate. Cools served on the Senate/House of Commons Special Joint Committee on Child Custody and Access, which in December, 1998 issued its report, For the Sake of the Children. A principal recommendation of this report was that, following a relationship breakdown, shared parenting should be presumed to be in the best interests of the child.

Dr. Paul Nathanson is a Canadian academician who, along with Dr. Kathryn Young, co-authored what is regarded as the world's most seminal series of books on the subject of misandry, or the hatred and/or fear of men and boys. Nathanson is a noted lecturer and critic of academic feminism who has been an active proponent in calling attention to the problems faced by men and boys.

Dr. Tara Palmatier, PsyD, is a clinical psychologist who specializes in assisting men who have become entangled in relationships with abusive, high-conflict personalities, many of whom are suffering harassment and persecution through the misuse of the family court system. Also known as "Dr. T," she maintains a website for men seeking to escape abusive relationships and is a regular contributor to A Voice for Men.

Tom Golden, LCSW is a psychotherapist with a focus on men's issues. He is the author of Swallowed by a Snake, The Gift of the Masculine Side of Healing, and The Way Men Heal. Tom is the former vice chairman of the Maryland Commission for Men's Health. His website, menaregood.com addresses the cultural bias that exists as it impacts boys and men.

Along with this fantastic lineup of speakers, there will be a featured panel discussion on news media bias featuring an international panel of AVFM News writers, headed by AVFM News Director Robert O'Hara.

Your master of ceremonies for the event will be Vladek Filler, who will give an opening address and introduce all keynote speakers as each one takes the audience through an important address on 12 different areas of modern life that impact the lives of men and boys.

There will also be various workshops available, including one by Warren Farrell and another by Dr. T and myself.

Other events are being planned and will be announced in the days ahead.

The event will be held at the VFW Post 1146 Walter F Bruce at 28404 Jefferson Avenue.

Very exciting event, and very exciting days.

Get your tickets now while they are less expensive! The closer we get to the conference, the more the price will increase.

$300.00

*All sales are final. While every effort has been made to ensure consistency, individual speakers may change without notice. A minimum number of 130 tickets must be sold for the conference to move forward. In the event of cancellation, all conference ticket purchases will be fully refunded.

Special Addition. On Thursday, June 26, 2014 Dr. Warren Farrell will be presenting a workshop especially for conference attendees. This will be an intimate, limited seating event with the man who started it all.

Go here for details:

http://www.avoiceformen.com/a-voice-for-men/farrell-announces-workshop-for-detroit-conference-on-june-26-2014/

In the trenches: My child's court imposed paternal exile

Gary Trieste · 12 December 2013 · Archived copy · Original

November 28, 2013:

[I]

So, another Thanksgiving has arrived, as have two previous Christmases, Halloweens, July 4th's, three Father's days, and four of our Birthdays. And certain to be missed also, are this year's Christmas and another birthday as well.

All holidays that we had shared, enjoyed and celebrated together for our first 7 years together as father and daughter.

The last three years have not been so; rather we suffered from the bleak emptiness, the fractured love and affection caused by sheer attrition from being apart, and the dull ache of a most loved child missing from our lives.

Shared time and experiences lost forever, the bonding of a father and daughter severed by erosion. Peppered here and there by a cheap pathological drip of contact with each other permitted by the government: 1 hour visits, once a week, and none at all since July 2013.

As I sit here in Durham, NY, at the extended dinner table surrounded by my brother Gregory, his wife Maria, my daughter's cousins, Zane and Edison, and many of our friends, we give thanks for the good food, warm home, and all who could be there.

Notably, the one person who was also invited, but could not be there, was my daughter Anya, who has been involuntarily entrapped in the spider-web that is the family court system – forcibly denied having any contact with me, her father, and subjected to psychological de facto alienation during the tender formative years between 7 and 10 years of age.

As we do for all these missed holidays and birthdays, we left an empty seat for her at the table and served the food for her in absentia, sometimes even addressing the empty chair telling her how much we missed her. It is a coping mechanism, but it soothes our angst at her absence, and like an invocation of sympathetic magic, it makes us feel she is there in spirit if not in person, with a hope to the future.

It has been three and a half months since I last posted my article, "Missing Anya", here on A Voice for Men. In that article I recounted how, over a two year period, I was repeatedly charged with child neglect by the rogue agents and gender discriminatory policies of the Ulster County Child Protective Services (CPS), in New York.

The actions of the CPS were so blatantly predatory toward me as a custodial father, that they couldn't have been clearer in their intent.

For the first seven years of my parenting, I never heard a peep out of CPS criticizing me as a father.

But once my ex and I separated, and we both filed for custody of our child, as a father I was exclusively hounded and repeatedly charged with maltreatment and child neglect in family court by CPS, incurring protective restraining orders to stay 1000 feet away from our child.

Yet, at the same time my ex, as a mother, was left unmolested by them, and given de facto sole custody, while I was branded by their agency with a scarlet letter during the ongoing custody hearings.

Successively, I was charged with maltreatment; then I was charged with emotional neglect, while having my daughter for only 8 hours once a week; I was later charged with emotional neglect while exclusively under their one hour weekly supervised visits. The whole idea of supervised visitation is to preempt the possibility of neglect or abuse, yet they somehow managed to conclude I accomplished that, right before their protective and watchful eyes.

Under these conditions, for two years I attempted to litigate my cross-petition for custody, pro se, trying to argue that I was the better parent while a restraining order was gamed into place commanding that I stay away from my daughter.

Although eventually through dogged perseverance, I did successfully have all those charges dismissed or overturned, the damage was done.

It made little difference that I was not actually found to be neglectful, the inchoate charges alone were virtually equivalent in effect, and in affect upon the lawyers, judges and almost everyone else in my life.

The sheer fact that my daughter has been in the sole custody of her mother for two and a half years became its own in situ justification as a point for future custody. The courts conveniently don't care that this ongoing state of affairs was unjustified in the first place, or whether it was done in bad faith or pursued by CPS for discriminatory purposes specifically to tip the balance in favor of the mother for custody.

Insidiously, during all that time my daughter is witness to me being treated like a toxic mass that she must be protected from, and this is considered to be in the best interests of the child.

The lessons there to her not being explicit enough, she is further told that I am a bad person, that I should be feared, that I am an abuser, a liar and that I call her derogatory names. All this occurs during her formative years, by people in authority and who nurture her, years that a child should be bonding with her parent, not being alienated and made paranoid.

———

[II]

And now after all that, here I sit, having come full circle.

The original Feb 14, 2011 cross-custody petitions having been dismissed on day one of the first custody trial in Nov 2012, ending that first round of the saga, and now having been re-filed 6 months later.

As a backdrop, theoretically I am now coming into these new custody trial hearings with a clean slate.

All the CPS charges against me were dismissed with no neglect ever existing. All restraining orders are rescinded, and the shared custody that is the legal default when two parents have a child, is now reinstated.

Since the last round of custody proceedings, new cross-petitions for custody are in place, a new judge, a new attorney, and a new trial commenced, July 31, 2013. This is considered a de novo trial, meaning that no custody order has existed previously, and there is supposed to be no presumption of which is the better parent.

But that is not how it went down – solely by virtue of [1] my having been accused repeatedly by CPS – accusations that were shown to be defective and meritless, [2] that I am currently accused by my ex in the course of this custody trial, and [3] because I am a father seeking custody of our child. Accusations are enough, even when none of those accusations have merit or are even addressed for validity.

In fact, coming into this new trial, far from a clean slate, a new set of abusive dynamics now comes into play. It is not enough to have a simple straightforward trial to determine custody; dirty tricks, gaming the rules, and abusive treatment against the paternal parent continue to abound.

Consider the contrast in allowed contact with my daughter:

While I was fighting false charges of neglect, I had been seeing my daughter once a week for an hour under CPS supervision.

However vilifying this was to me, and corrosive to my relationship with my daughter, I did have that bare minimum of contact with her.

When, in July 2013, after I revealed on discovery the numerous stealth videos of CPS staff violating federal law that would have been brought out in trial, CPS finally re-assessed the frivolous nature of their prosecution against me, and dropped their charges. I naively expected to be treated whole again, and looked forward to seeing my daughter. However, I would soon again be smacked in the head, and subject to the capriciousness that passes for due process in family court.

The first indication that things would not improve in reconnecting with my child, but get much worse, was the scheduling order the court issued, mapping out the dates upon which the hearings making up the trial would be held.

For the preliminary estimated eight days of trial, the court scheduled the trial to be heard over a period of seven months. Such a duration for trial is abusive, when parents only wish to be with their children.

Not only abusive, it was also a violation of NY statutory law, specifically:

NYCRR §205.14: Time limitations for proceedings involving custody or visitation.
In any proceeding brought pursuant to . . . the Family Court Act to determine temporary or permanent custody or visitation, once a hearing or trial is commenced, it shall proceed to conclusion within 90 days.

But this apparently is a routine and common scheduling violation, and the court dismissed any objections we had with it, insofar that it could extend the duration my daughter was without her father.

As such, when the new custody trial commenced, on July 31, 2013, the very first thing I did was to put in a motion for visitation and/or temporary shared custody so as to reconnect with my daughter during this extended trial span.

Usually, it is pro forma and routine procedure at the beginning of a custody proceeding for a family court to put into place a pendente lite order of visitation and temporary custody, establishing visitation and custody rights of the parents during the pendency of the pre-trial proceedings and trial; as these can often go on for months, such interim entitlements are very important to allow the parents equitable access to their child(ren) during that time.

At this hearing, my attorney very eloquently stated to the court (Jul 31, 2013 page 8, et.seq.):

How about we not continue this charade that my client needs to be in a fishbowl or supervised or engaged in some therapy, when he is the father of this child and has done nothing but try to be a father to this child. The child's put on medications, sees the therapist, is engaged with the Department of Social Services, a whole litany of things which our case legally will show is designed by [her mother], who manipulates these people, and who uses them as a vehicle to keep my client away from his daughter. Prior to the DSS [neglect] case, which is now dismissed, no evidence was offered on it, nothing. Based on that, there was a very restrictive, one hour a week at the Department of Social Services. . . all of this restriction coincides with the ability of [the mother] to manipulate the Department of Social Services, their caseworkers, their mental health professionals, their, everything down to their drivers and the people that sit in the supervised visitation. . . This whole thing, Judge, in our opinion, is a charade. It is a manipulation of the system. Prior to that, they lived together as mother and father and they co-parented and that was it. Now, my client's sitting here, looking to get back there. . . My client at this point should be entitled to some unfettered, frequent access to his child so that he can parent the way he had for over the first seven years of her life.

But, the Family Court, peremptorily denied this motion to provide for ANY visitation of my daughter with me, leaving the discretion of visitation solely up to the child's mother, who, emboldened by the court, has denied any and all contact of my daughter with me, for over five months to date, and likely indefinitely with no supervision coming from the court.

Looking back, however harsh, arbitrary and austere CPS was in limiting contact between father and child, the mother of the child makes them look downright generous.

In denying this request, the judge said:

[I]'m not going to authorize any temporary order for custodial time or visitation time with the child at this point. If I determined, based on the course of the trial, that that is appropriate, I will enter it at a later point. But I don't have enough information to make a determination at this point, whether that's in the child's best interest. I'm going to deny the application for now.

(The full ongoing trial transcripts, updated, are viewable HERE)

This request was submitted three times, Jul 31, Sept 11 and Oct 21, and again each time the court denied it for the same reason. Each time the court stated that there was not enough evidence to issue any visitation order.

This decision stands, despite shared custody, despite myself as a father being completely fit as a parent, and despite that such denial is a direct violation of Federal parenting rights.

Yet, concurrently, the mother of the child is given full access to the child, and given the de facto ability to deny all contact with our child.

Ostensibly, the judge cites this denial as adhering to the best interests of the child. But in fact, this decision cannot be viewed as a determination flowing from a best interests analysis, as the judge himself said he does not have enough information to make that determination.

What it is, in fact, is an ad hoc "just-in-case" standard of review to keep a child away from her father, when there is no evidence to support that denial; nor is there any legal concern of the emotional turmoil and pain the child suffers in being ripped and held apart from her father, of the father's suffering for the same reason, or of the continuing enabling of the alienating mother.

This is not the standard that the law puts forth. In fact unless there are proven and factually established reasons otherwise, federal parenting rights are directly and blatantly violated by such denials; the state should not be interfering with a parent child relationship unless the parent is unfit.

But trying to makes sense of this insanity – treating it like something that actually does make sense in some way – just leads to subsuming one's mind to the same insanity, by trying to force-fit it into being viewed as somehow sensible. In short, you have to become crazy to understand it.

The reality is, the decisions are not driven by reason, logic or even the law and facts. They are driven by an agenda established a priori; the bedeviling disconnect occurs when looking at the mandates of the law, and then trying to fit the decisions made supposedly in adherence to the law.

Post hoc reasons must be later synthesized to justify the final decisions that were pre-ordained in the first place – and that agenda is the gender discriminatory motivation to keep the father outside of the child's life, and to provide every opportunity to ease the quick resolution of custody to the mother. Every official action I have encountered was in furtherance of this goal.

————-

[III]

So, I continue to be enmeshed in what appears to be a facade of due process, literally fighting the government just to keep the child I sired, birthed, nurtured and raised until she was seven years old. I love her and will always love her, no matter what the state does to mute that love, and no matter what malicious efforts are made to corrupt her perceptions of and attachment to the daddy that she had lived with and loved so dearly for all those years.

Despite me being the best and most devoted father in the whole world, our legal system is determined to strip me of my child, and my child of me.

What can be done, when the child enforcement agencies, the operative legal system, the adjunct experts, and even the final referee and decision makers, all supposedly neutral societal institutions, are lined up in concert, determined to achieve a pre-ordained discriminatory outcome?

It is easy to become superstitious when there is a lack of knowledge of what is happening, and in the onslaught of all this bias. It is only too easy to just give up, as I am sure many fathers have.

I still retain hope that there is a trace of independent, neutral due process still guilted into the system, a vestigial moral substrate that might flow beneath all the machinations and special interests.

There are some indications that this does exist, and even in my saga, though few and in-between, some modicum of interim corrective justice amazingly did prevail. The attorney I have now is one of the few and rare ones, who is maverick, articulate and impassioned. The laws themselves seem fair and neutral on the surface. There are anecdotes I have heard, that despite all the road-blocks thrown in the face of a petitioning father, if the matter reaches the trial stage, the outcome is probabilistically balanced, albeit the actual statistics on this are incredibly hard to find.

So, I have these nebulous observations to comfort me some. I really don't know what is true and whether justice is still embedded in the system, but since this is the only arena available, I will do my best, despite these hobbling constraints, to fight for my child.

[IV]

Epilogue – Still fighting in the Trenches:

Usually when we hear and read these articles, illustrating the injustices of the family court system, we come to these stories in the aftermath and the remaining rubble of past battles and of the heartache remaining.

This story however is active and happening now; it is not over or complete or concluded.

It is a story being reported from the filthy trenches of a mid-campaign custody battle, over a harsh landscape and through subversive terrain, where an ongoing fight for the very life of a little child and the father who loves her is taking place.

It is not history, the battlefield is occupied now and can be seen by all in a public arena.

The court has continued the scheduling dates for trial of this case in the New Year 2014:

January 2nd @ 9:30am and 2pm, 9th @ 9:30am and 2pm, 23rd @ 9:30am and 2pm, February 6th @ 9:30am and 2pm, 13th @ 9:30am.
The case is Cayley v Treistman, Dkt# V-01219, File #24593.
The location on those dates is Ulster County Family Court, 16 Lucas Ave, in Kingston, NY 12401.

I invite and encourage all who are motivated and interested to come and observe these ongoing proceedings, the culmination of this saga, and what conclusion it wreaks.

The Future of Women in a MGTOW Society

Clint Carpentier · 12 December 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Once upon a time, in a land… just next door, people knew what marriage was, what it entailed, and what its future bestowed.

The concept of marriage is relatively new to the human species, but was based on the ancient contract emotionally agreed upon by our primitive ancestors when they discovered that due to their big brains, their offspring were born less mature by necessity than other, less intelligent species; this contract promoted the exchange of three C's (cooking, cleaning, and copulation) from the female, and three P's from the male (protection, provision, and progeny).

Despite many cosmetic alterations, the ancient contract has remained the foundation of the family unit for a guesstimated five hundred thousand years, with inklings of it up to two million years ago. As long as both parties have fulfilled their ends of the bargain, humans survived, thrived, and finally civilized. This is the juggernaut our modern media keeps hounding our young men with, and more and more young men are combating it the best way they know how, by side-stepping it.

So, why not marriage?

Well, in modern society, the legal system has been unabashedly twisting the ancient contract into something that amounts to slavery, rather than the symbiotic foundation from whence it originated. While men are still expected to protect and provide, the prospect of progeny has become laughable; so while the hardest part of his end is still concrete, that nice smooth veneer has been stripped clean off; often he doesn't even know if his kids are actually his, and it is becoming increasingly harder (legally) to force that knowledge from his partner.

The responsibilities for women have been eliminated by technology and gender politics, while at the same time their contract benefits have increased. On the whole what was once her responsibility, to copulate, has become whim and weapon. With a legal system in place which has been designed for her to exploit and abuse, it is becoming increasingly difficult to trust women enough to even associate with, never mind marry.

Despite the bombardment of false accusations, crippling divorces, impossible child support fees, and the wholesale demonization of everything male, women continue to impede their own ability to gain their own coveted independence, and demand men to heroically step up and continue to do their duty.

Well, men are tiring of the old song and dance, and they are questioning the necessity of long-term relationships in general. Ever since the industrial age, the need for a woman to maintain the house and home, and care for the children – while the men spent their days doing body- and soul-crushing work – has been becoming increasingly obsolete. The advent of common household electricity, plumbing and other modern niceties meant that women were spared hard work in order to maintain homes.

This was a double bonus for men – the women were less stressed and therefore happier, and they no longer developed the hard roughened bodies associated with hard work, allowing them to remain sexually attractive for much longer.

Then came washers, dryers and the electric dishwasher. For those who could afford these luxurious appliances it meant more time spent doing other things. On the one hand, some of that spare time was used to dream up concepts like the "historic oppression of women." On the slapping hand, it meant men could do chores on their own.

Other things were thrown into the mix, or which soured the deal; no-fault divorce, the Tender Years Doctrine, alimony and child support laws, etc.. Divorce rates sky-rocketed and, after avoiding it for as long as possible, men found themselves trying to figure out these contraptions. While it's long been ingrained into the human male's psyche that they need women, the fact of the matter is, they don't; women provide children, and children provide guaranteed income for women (via child support or welfare, single mothers will meet basic habitable conditions), by men, through persuasion, extortion, or taxes.

What women didn't realize was that the very things which made their lives easier – be they appliances or conveniently boxed pre-made meals at the grocery store – simultaneously reduced the necessity for women. Men are increasingly becoming aware of this, and are opting to go their own way and reject the farce that marriage has become.

Women have inadvertently been reduced to gestational incubators; everything else, men can take care of on their own. And the more that women harp on about how evil, and useless, and stupid men are, and how much men must be responsible for the life choices women make, the more men opt to ignore women altogether.

Science fiction has long since been our window into the future, and the gestational beer keg – while not yet implemented – is already a concept; one hesitates to ask, "On what grounds would its completion be demanded?" For the right price, women sell their "natural" services all the time, going so far as to incubate a fetus for other people; one has to wonder, how much their eggs would be worth to them? And make no mistake, women will sell their eggs, and they'll do it willingly, just as they sell their bodies, as proven when Australia made welfare cuts. And with the advent of Vasagel, a male fertility inhibitor, which is safe, reversible, and lasts roughly ten years per shot, women will lose the stranglehold of procreation over men.

What does this mean for the future of either sex? I can see one of two things happening.

The first, and most obvious answer – and one I so dearly hope for – is women wake up, grow up, and take responsibility for their own life choices. Women are not children, and husbands are not their dads. A radical paradigm shift will have to happen before men begin to have trust in the ancient contract again. A burgeoning respect for the sex that created and continues to maintain the civilization women so blithely enjoy would be nice. Men have been working on it for five thousand years specifically for women. A little recognition would be appreciated.

Men are inherently feminist; we have been for the better part of a million years before it was even a concept to the women at all. We want to work this out. This isn't about misogyny. This is about disillusionment; we love women, we love their flustered approach to parallel parking, we love it… lift something heavy, or get something high down, we love their sense of helplessness, even when we know they're not.

If this approach can't be worked out, women will need to make a choice. Either pull up their pants and knuckle down to some real work under the equal opportunity clause, or take up the business of part-time housewifery. Now the first choice is fraught with problems for women is general, there are very few men who find chapped-pawed, skinned-knuckled and work-hardened women to be attractive; over the course of the last century, women have progressively gotten softer and more delicate in appearance, due largely in part by the lack of household labor. Women over the course of humanity have gotten progressively softer and more delicate than our ape-like ancestors; so to introduce a winning mating strategy to hardened working career… that's a tough choice I wouldn't want to have to make.

The second choice is fraught with its own problems, namely time: single men don't need much living space, especially if they're earning just enough to cover their necessary means; the best housewives will only ever get to associate with middle class men, because the upper classes will have employees for specific tasks – cooks, maids, drivers, secretaries – really all they need a woman for is arm candy, and that's a short career, extended in no small part by intellectual stimulation.

Men might not be willing to accept the ancient contract back, but we have an amazing capacity to forgive a guilty smile, just meet us halfway, we can work this out.

I want to see this outcome, preferably before I quit giving a damn altogether. Because the alternative has, historically, not been pretty.

The second thing I can see happening is MGTOW's becoming criminalized. And here's how it will happen: it'll start with a single's tax, applicable only to men, specifically men who live underneath the tax bracket. Followed by criminalizing cash-payment jobs. If Vasagel can't be quashed at the FDA level, it will become highly taxed, or just made outright illegal; it's unlikely anyone with a criminal record, however slight, will be allowed to get a Vasagel injection, on the fear that the doctor may well lose his practicing license. You'll watch as your fathers, uncles, brothers, friends, get picked up one by one, for what will boil down to not manning up and doing their duty as "men."

You'll feel the first shocks, as the infrastructure fails to maintain itself under the strain of invisible workers who have been imprisoned. You'll watch as convicts are forced into slave labor to sustain the infrastructure. You'll feel the crunch as taxes increase, then increase again, because no government seems to understand that slaves and government workers cannot create GDP; without GDP, you have no tax base, without a tax base, you can't maintain a government, and a large portion of women work for the government, whether directly or through welfare.

And this is only if men are so kind as not to revolt.

The Beard Gotham Deserved

AVfM Video Source · 12 December 2013 · Archived copy · Original

VarmitCoyote (VC), a resident blue-piller, was destroyed by GirlWritesWhat, SparkyFister, Victor Zen and other MHRAs, MGTOWs and anti-feminists for his video called I Can't Not Be a Feminist.

Once VC saw that there were roughly 7 dislikes for every one like his video earned, he retracted his statements in the spirit of learning from his mistakes.

Or so he claimed.

After making another video lecturing anti-feminists on how not to be assholes (all the while screaming into the camera with a middle-finger erected), Victor Zen enters the fray with an exasperated sigh and a brick of logic in each hand.

Subscribe to the ginger bastard on YouTube, and on his new Dailymotion channel.

Was ESPN unfair to quarterback cleared of rape charges? You bet it was.

Pierce Harlan · 13 December 2013 · Archived copy · Original

The Jameis Winston rape investigation underscored the stark double-standard in the way we treat young men accused of rape as opposed to the women who accuse them.

Winston is the 19-year-old star quarterback for the Florida State University Seminoles and frontrunner for the Heisman Trophy. On December 5, 2013, state prosecutors announced that no sexual assault charges would be filed against Mr. Winston stemming from a sexual encounter with a female student that occurred last year. A female student at the school had accused Winston of rape after an encounter that two of Winston's teammates witnessed and described as consensual. The state attorney said prosecutors did not even have enough evidence (probable cause) to arrest Winston, much less charge or convict him. The accuser's blood-alcohol level was 0.04%, which the state attorney said was "not very high." There was no evidence of any drugs in her blood system. Another DNA sample from a different man was found on the accuser's shorts, and the accuser "acknowledged having sex with her boyfriend . . . ."

End of story, right? Wrong.

Shortly after that announcement, FSU beat Duke University 45-7 to win the ACC championship. ESPN reporter Heather Cox trotted down to the field to interview Winston on national television. See here. In the course of that interview, Cox did something that should outrage all persons of good will, but of course, it didn't.

First, Cox loosened Winston up with a series of innocuous, softball questions about the rape investigation – for example, about how his coach supported him — and the young man did his best to answer them.

But then, suddenly, without changing her tone, Cox switched gears and whipped out a question that was anything but innocuous. In fact, it was the ultimate "gotcha" question — the atom bomb of questions to pose to a young man accused of rape. No matter how Winston might try to answer it, it would make him look guilty to most observers.

Cox asked Winston why he exercised his Fifth Amendment by not speaking with authorities in the investigation. Specifically: "How come you decided not to talk during the process and on Thursday?"

Let us pause briefly to explain why Cox's question was so terribly inappropriate. The refusal to speak to police is a right sacrosanct to our freedoms that is enshrined in the Fifth Amendment of the United States Constitution: ". . . nor shall any person . . . be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself . . . ." The Supreme Court has made it clear that this right wasn't designed to safeguard the guilty but the innocent: ". . . one of the Fifth Amendment's basic functions is to protect innocent men who otherwise might be ensnared by ambiguous circumstances." In a criminal case, the burden remains on the prosecution to prove a defendant's guilt, and every citizen enjoys the right to refuse to provide information that may assist the prosecution in its efforts to accuse, charge, or convict him of a crime. So important is this right that Justice Felix Frankfurter described it as "one of the greatest landmarks in man's struggle to make himself civilized."

The Supreme Court has also recognized that "[t]oo many, even those who should be better advised, view this privilege as a shelter for wrongdoers. They too readily assume that those who invoke it are either guilty of crime or commit perjury in claiming the privilege." It is for this reason that judges instruct juries that no adverse inference may be drawn from a defendant's refusal to testify. Prosecutors are not allowed to make an issue to the jury out of a defendant's refusal to speak.

The average person thinks that if a man accused of rape has nothing to hide, he should just tell the police what happened because the truth can never hurt him. Unfortunately, that's not the way it works. The Innocence Project Web site is replete with the cases of young men who had the same wrong idea. The Supreme Court has stated that "one of the Fifth Amendment's basic functions is to protect innocent men who otherwise might be ensnared by ambiguous circumstances."

ESPN's Heather Cox is a seasoned sports reporter and no dummy. Cox surely knows, or should know, that the average person would infer that a refusal to talk to police is a sign of guilt. That didn't stop her from playing "gotcha" on national television with a young man who, despite his fame, is still just a teenager trying to cope with an explosion of attention.

Exactly what purpose did the question serve? Are we to believe that Cox didn't know damn well why Winston did not talk to the police? Obviously, his attorney told him not to. Cox also knew or should have known damn well that when she ambushes an unprepared 19-year-old with that particular question, he isn't going to be able to provide an off-the-cuff tutorial about the Constitution that would to satisfy anyone.

If Cox wanted a real answer to that question, she should have posed it to Winston's attorney. Our guess is that a real answer isn't what ESPN was after. Our guess is ESPN was looking for Winston to stumble around and look guilty so that ESPN could convict him in the court of last resort, the court of public opinion.

After Cox asked the question, Winston did the right thing, in fact, the only thing he could do. He walked away. It was the smartest play he made all day, and that's saying a lot.

What's disheartening is that Cox and Cox's bosses at ESPN might think that insinuating Winston's guilt ambush-style, before a national audience, made for "good" television.

Would Cox and ESPN dream of asking the accuser why the police report reveals that the case was suspended last February due to a lack of cooperation from her? And about how the investigation was only jumpstarted in November by the news media? Of course not. To even consider asking her those questions would cause many to brand the questioner guilty of the ultimate sin, "victim blaming."

You see, it's wholly unfair to ask a rape accuser why the police say she didn't cooperate, yet it's somehow fair to make a presumptively innocent teenage male look guilty on national television by asking why he exercised a Constitutional right that many brave young men his age have died for.

But that's how it goes in the loopy, politicized climate that surrounds all things rape. Need more examples? While the rape investigation was ongoing, Winston's FSU played the University of Florida Gators and some Gators fans wore T-shirts emblazoned with the following: "The Rapers: Forced Sex University." The shirts were intended to maliciously attack the presumptively innocent Winston by suggesting he's a rapist, in the sometimes cruel spirit of intense college football rivalries.

The editors of the University of Florida student newspaper, the Florida Alligator, should have been outraged that their peers took twisted delight in treating a presumptively innocent man as if he were a rapist. Indeed, the newspaper took issue with the shirts, but not for the right reason. They wrote an editorial that said the shirts would send "a damaging message to women that" – wait for it – "victim-blaming is inevitable . . . ." And if that wasn't enough, on behalf of the school, the editors apologized to "the victim and her family."

We can't make up this stuff. And that's not all. Emily Bazelon, a self-proclaimed feminist, wrote the following about the Winston case: "Whether schools should punish athletes who have been accused but not convicted—or in Winston's case, even charged—is a hard call."

In what other setting would people of good will sit still for such comments?

It goes on. The pundits trotted out the tired old arguments that suggested Winston's guilt. Fox Sports reporter Clay Travis wrote: "Would this woman subject herself to intense questioning, physical examinations by strangers — it's reasonable to assume she was treated by medical professionals that night to assess her well-being and examine her for signs of physical trauma — if nothing at all happened to her?" Similarly, Emily Bazelon wrote the following: ". . . it is hard for me to imagine that she had consensual sex with Winston and then decided to lie and say it was rape." (Bazelon also took offense because the prosecutor stated publicly that the accuser "acknowledged having sex with her boyfriend" at some point prior to the encounter with Mr. Winston. Bazelon says this amounted to "slut shaming.”)

We refuse to opine about what happened in that bedroom between Winston and the accuser. Only the parties who were present know for sure. We won’t brand the accuser a liar, and we won’t brand Mr. Winston a rapist. But in response to Mr. Travis’ and Ms. Bazelon’s queries about why a woman in the accuser’s position might lie to police, Bazelon has already provided one answer: fear of “slut shaming.” If you need a real world example, check out the Hofstra false rape case. A young woman lied about rape in the Hofstra case likely because she was embarrassed that she was cheating on her boyfriend in a way society considers nasty. There is a “regret asymmetry” when it comes to sexual encounters that divides the sexes. It is a significant reason for rape lies. See here.

And we won’t even talk about the comments by pundits who suggested Winston was guilty based on the fact that rape is underreported. I mean, because it happens elsewhere, it must have happened here, too, right? Of course!

We are stranded in an era where young men accused of sexual assault are presumed guilty by people who write for major news outlets, and where anyone who dares to speak up for the rights of the presumptively innocent is demonized with terms like “victim blaming.” It is long past time to heed the call of John Leo, the prestigious editor of the “Minding the Campus” web site. Mr. Leo urges everyone to confront the notion that ours is a “rape culture.” He writes: “Stupid ideas spread when people who know better refuse to confront them.” That about sums it up.

Demand for male disposability

John Hembling (JtO) · 13 December 2013 · Archived copy · Original

"Stop Demand"[1] is the name of a project, and a website.

This is nothing new. However it's a particularly naked element of public hatred in an ongoing and escalating cultural war on the male half of the human race.

You remember men, right? They are the humans who are casually disposed of by every single nation in the world as the violence-dispensing and absorbing tools of foreign policy; the ones who die in every society on earth earlier than their female contemporaries; the humans who commit suicide 4 times more often than women; the human beings comprising the majority of the homeless, and who are 70 to 80 percent of the victims of violent crime; the humans who happen to suffer the vast majority of trauma induced mental illness, and who do all the most dangerous, dirty and deadly jobs in the world, while living under a never-ending narrative vilifying their basic human identity.

You know who I mean now, right? They are the overlords and masters of the world in a system of invisible, immeasurable and never to be questioned doctrine of supremacy. It's Name-the-problem-men.

This particular example of hatred seeks, apparently, to eradicate male sexuality. You know, the element of basic human identity making your son not your daughter, and making your brother not your sister?

The website for this vile initiative includes a place for masculine self-loathing indoctrinees of our culture's continued hate-on for men and boys to pledge their allegiance to the ideology of hatred for their own sexual identity.

http://www.stopdemand.org/formwcs0155238/man-up-take-the-pledge.html

The pledge pages includes a 3 item numbered list, along with a heading:

"The Man Up! Pledge is a Declaration by men who…"

1] Acknowledge that sexual violence, sexual exploitation and sexual denigration of women and girls is widespread, shatters lives, does not take place in a vacuum, and is a men's issue to address and solve.

I acknowledge no such thing, because it is simply not true. Does sexual violence impact women? Of course it does. And is that female-impacting sexual violence a problem to be solved or otherwise reduced? Of – fucking – course it is! However, the premise that women are the only victims – or even that they are the majority of victims of sexual violence – is a knowingly-perpetrated lie.

In the United States in 2010:

There were roughly 84,767 forcible rapes reported to police, outside of prison populations. [2] Following the Bureau of Justice statistics definition of rape, this is almost exclusively female victimizing, as the definition is not "sex by force", but penetration by force. In fact, the definition appears designed to omit any male-victimizing rape, other than penetration of the victim.

These 85 thousand rapes are counted as the-rapes-happening-within-American society. But there are also a great many male-victimizing rapes outside of prisons as well. How many? Nobody knows, because nobody with influence or access to funding has ever bothered to figure out how many. It's probably something less than the 85 thousand for female victims. But it's certainly more than the implied number: zero. I'd guess between 20 to 50 thousand, but of course, that's a guess. I know it's more than zero, so for conservatism's sake, I'll posit a number per year of male-victimizing rapes.

Lets's say it's one per year.

One?! That's it? I'm outraged by 1?

No, not quite.

In 2010, Human Rights Watch estimated that at least 140,000 inmates [in American prisons] had been raped while incarcerated.[3][4]

Prisoners are the most state-controlled population in our entire society and 140 thousand of them every year are raped. Clearly, our system endorses and enables such brutality[5].

Did I say 140 thousand? I meant 140 thousand, and one.

Oh, they're criminals – and therefore deserve to be raped? Never mind that a vast majority of prison inmates are locked up for non-crimes such use or possession of cannabis; just try, in your head, to contrive a scenario in which some similar number of women and girls should deserve to be raped.

Organizers and participants of the public hate rallies called "slut walks" may claim "women deserve to be raped" is an element of public narrative–but it's not. Such claims are just victim-posturing lies.

How about men, civilian and military, routinely raped as a tactic of demoralization in war around the world?[6][7][8] United Nations aid agencies specifically exclude them from receiving medical or other help, even when those agencies have funds and systems in place specifically designed to address sexual violence in war zones. Only women qualify. "Aid agencies and human rights defenders at the UN barely acknowledge its possibility."[9]

How about the boy-trainees of the Taliban, raped as part of their indoctrination? Male homosexuals are routinely murdered by their own governments for their sexuality in Islamist states like Saudi Arabia. How about child and adult male prostitutes in cities like the one I live in? They are targeted by sexual and other violence far more than their female contemporaries, but not regarded by so-called anti-sexual violence programs like the vile and amoral "Stop Demand."

To be explicitly clear, I don't simply reject sexual violence against boys or men. Rather, like every other human who can plausibly claim to have a functional moral compass, I reject sexual violence, period. Not just against girls, not just against boys, against anyone. However, I also reject programs like the vomitrocious "Stop Demand" because it actually promotes, by omission of mention, the violence practiced around the world against men and boys. The directors and activists behind "Stop Demand" are not ignorant, nor uneducated. They are pretending. They are cynical profiteers.

Expressio Unius Est Exclusio Alterius:

Latin: the expression of one thing is the exclusion of the other.

http://www.duhaime.org/LegalDictionary/E/ExpressioUniusEstExclusioAlterius.aspx

Item 2 in the pledge list from Stop Demand.

Reject and denounce all forms of sexual violence, sexual exploitation and sexual denigration of women and girls.

No. And furthermore, fuck you. I think I've already covered this. In fact, I covered it directly above in the preceding paragraph. In the number 2 list item statement against sexual violence, the inclusion of the limiting clause "of women and girls" is a purposeful and implicit endorsement of sexual violence against anyone outside the category "women and girls". It's also a reinforcement of the hateful and populist mythology that male sexuality is predatory, violent, exploitative, and otherwise malevolent.

Am I now going to devote one or more paragraphs to a counter-argument that male sexuality is not the evil portrayed by mainstream feminist ideology? No, I won't provide any such argument, because I don't need to.

And the third item in the pledge for quislings? Possibly the most backward and depraved item of the three, reads as follows.

Agree to be proactive – to speak up, to speak out, to assist other men to "connect the dots" between commonly-held attitudes/beliefs/behaviours and harm, and to encourage one another to make better choices.

Oddly, I am, along with other male and female Men's Human Rights Advocates (MHRAs), doing this already. The disconnect is that in the doctrinaire world of the "Stop Demand" project, this third admonition means buying into self-hatred, and into agreement that male identity, and in particular male sexuality, is a form of toxin. That is the hateful lie, and it's the tool of induced shame and control leveraged against men and boys by the amoral and sociopathic profiteers behind projects like "Stop Demand", "Duluth Model", "White Ribbon Campaign", "Don't be that guy" and other poisonous garbage.

The really sick part? That setting aside male victims, human carnage, real harm and real sexual violence against girls and women is the raw marketing material these sociopath rape-profiteers require to justify their continued existence and incomes. When a woman or a girl is raped or suffers actual sexual violence, they make money. So ultimately, that carnage is what they foster more of.

Oh, and the phrase "man up" which appears both in the top-level, and in the secondary headings of the pledge page?

This is what it means. It's an imperative statement:

> Man up.
>
> We recognize you are in pain. We recognize you are wounded, or harmed. Tough shit for you.
>
> Your pain doesn't matter, and doesn't count. In fact, we won't even count you a real man until and unless you just suck it up and get back to being a utility, a doer, a provider or a dispenser for those we've decided matter more than you.

It means, my brothers, fuck your humanity. Fuck your dignity as a person, fuck your injury, fuck your grief. Just suck it all up and get back to being a good, disposable utility.

Once understood, I cannot conceive any answer to this message, to man up, other than:

No, and fuck you.

Actually, "no" is not enough. To the purveyors and activists behind the depraved, and the sickening violence and sexual violence profiteering exemplified by projects like Stop Demand: We are coming for predators like you with a bright, illuminating light.

[1] stopdemand.org [do not link]
[2] http://www.fbi.gov/about-us/cjis/ucr/crime-in-the-u.s/2010/crime-in-the-u.s.-2010/violent-crime/rapemain
[3] http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Prison_rape_in_the_United_States
[4] http://www.hrw.org/reports/2001/prison/report.html
[5] http://www.justdetention.org/en/factsheets/PREA_Fact_Sheet_FINAL.pdf
[6] http://www.irinnews.org/report/93960/health-rape-as-a-weapon-of-war-against-men
[7] http://iwpr.net/report-news/bosnia-struggle-overcome-male-rape-taboo
[8] http://www.nytimes.com/2009/08/05/world/africa/05congo.html?_r=0
[9] http://www.theguardian.com/society/2011/jul/17/the-rape-of-men

All fathers should have this conversation with their sons

AVfM Video Source · 13 December 2013 · Archived copy · Original

YouTuber “6oodfella” is an inspiration to fathers everywhere. We strongly recommend that all fathers have this exact conversation with their sons as soon as possible.

For more fatherly advice and other deep Scottish insights into our hateful rape culture of violence against women, subscribe to 6oodfella.

A conversation between Iain Dwyer of CAFE and Paul Elam of AVFM, hosted by Steve Brulé

AVfM Video Source · 13 December 2013 · Archived copy · Original

This conversation, which was originally going to be posted in the hangouts, was moved to the main article area. It is an important discussion about the recent history and immediate future of the MHRM. PE

Professor of Law seeks legalized murder

John Hembling (JtO) · 14 December 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Elizabeth Sheehy is a respected law professor working at the University of Ottawa, and on 15 December, UBC press will publish her recent book, Defending Battered Women on Trial.

The thesis of the book, stated explicitly in the final chapter, is that murder should be legitimized for women who kill their spouses or partners.

Yes, you read that correctly.

She told The Ottawa Citizen that "battered women can justly kill abusive partners 'because a woman in that circumstance has already lived in captivity'"

Setting aside, just for a moment, the depravity that a Canadian professor of law is publishing a book arguing for the legalization of murder – specifically of men – we must wonder how someone this rabid can be "respected".

Sheehy argues that women, unlike anyone we might think of as adults, or even as "people", are so weak, so infantile, and so free of self-actualization, will, or personal volition that when they suddenly find themselves (as if blown by the wind) caught in a dysfunctional, abusive sexual relationship they are incapable of leaving.

Women, apparently, are merely the possessed dolls of their spouses or romantic partners. A woman in an abusive relationship, mystically becomes incapable of finding her shoes and walking out the door, dialing 9-1-1, contacting the police, or locating a publicly-funded shelter.

According to Stats Canada, in 2010 "there were 593 shelters for abused women operating across the country". However, because Sheehy finds women so completely incompetent, incapable, and feeble, hundreds of shelters, relief organizations, government and non-government agencies, specially trained police departments, gynocentric courts, and twenty four hour support services are inadequate. The legal murder of a sleeping partner must be added to the options.

It reads like a hoax.

Remember that this murder-advocate is a professor of law at a major Canadian university. In a secondary article, The Ottawa Citizen even characterized Sheehy's work as "rife with trenchant observations" after informing us that she is the recipient of "a prestigious award from the Canadian Bar Association for her scholarship on" none other than "women and the law."

In Sheehy's asinine fantasy world, she likens women in abusive relationships to prisoners of war. "We would never say of a prisoner of war that it's not just that she or he kill their captor to escape. It is just to kill to escape that kind of enslavement."

While the Canadian public understands that prisoners of war are generally kept in actual prisons – the kind with locking cells, guards, and layers of razor-wire topped fences – some Canadian lawyers are unclear on the difference. Civilians in Canadian society, even those with abusive or violent partners, tend not to live in guarded, secured prison facilities. They live in houses or condos or apartments.

The only person actually needing this to be pointed out is one sociopathic academic in an ugly dress: Elizabeth Sheehy, professor of law at the University of Ottawa.

Sheehy appreciates that previous experience of violent abuse (or simply the claim of such experience) is already recognized as a legal defence for murder in Canada. She was "pleasantly surprised by the higher-than-expected number who were either acquitted or had charges dropped. But she said it was 'disappointing and worrisome' to see how many women had pleaded guilty."

Her solutions are to refine the definition of "excessive force" so that battered women can claim self-defence, give women a “statutory escape hatch” so they have no mandatory minimum penalty if found guilty, and only charge them with manslaughter so they aren’t afraid of fighting it in court. Why? Because Elizabeth Sheehy thinks charging battered women with murder is “so arbitrary”.

I think Sheehy has a different definition of “arbitrary” than the rest of us do.

Laws, as a professor of law should know, are not whimsical. A legal defense in one instance becomes applicable to other, similar, situations. For example, if a woman can use past abuse to reduce a murder charge then, if your son is bullied at school, he can legally bring his dad’s glock to school the next day and gun down his bully. Oh, whoops, no he can’t.

Let us not forget that men are roughly half the victims of reciprocal domestic violence, and are MORE than half the victims of adult, non-reciprocal domestic violence. However, a man abused in a violent relationship can not use past abuse to lessen the legal penalty of murdering another human being.

Here’s an alternate solution: If your spouse or partner hits you or abuses you, DON’T MURDER THEM, STUPID!!! You are supposed to remove yourself from that abuse – like a fucking grown up!

But according to Sheehy:

“While the legal system sometimes excuses battered women who kill abusive partners by accepting a verdict of manslaughter on compassionate grounds, that does not go far enough”

She absurdly argues that it is “unfair” to call women first-degree murderers because “[m]en can kill women with their bare hands, and they do. Women almost never kill men that way. They can’t”. Apparently, Sheehy seems to think we should forget there was a weapon used because women have trouble killing without one.

But she’s not really talking about fighting for your life against a violent aggressor in the heat of a desperate struggle. She’s defending the murder of a sleeping man, rather than simply using the opportunity to get the fuck out of the house.

And that is what UBC Press is publishing.

What level of blatant, depraved and malevolent corruption is required before a “respected” academic is treated correctly by the public as an evil and violent sociopath? This murder advocate, Elizabeth Sheehy, should properly be persona non grata in any area of civilized society but, instead, she gets a book deal.

When, three years ago, I posted a satirical article on AVFM announcing a new tourist industry for women traveling to Canada – namely, murder-tourism – I did so not expecting to be right.

Normally I like to be right.

Feminists: more equal than others

Diana Davison · 15 December 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Like a general assembly of Orwellian swine, feminists have gathered together to justify their creed that "some animals are more equal than others." As in the tale of Animal Farm, the changes to the legal system happened incrementally and with only a few grumbled objections, which were dealt with swiftly in retribution. As a society, we now find ourselves staring with astonishment at the writing on the wall and wondering how the pigs have managed to get away with this blatant corruption of equality before the law.

The legal system for criminal court was founded on a few, basic principles or cornerstones:

> 1) the presumption of innocence;
> 2) the burden of proof is on the Crown;
> 3) proof of guilt beyond a reasonable doubt; and > 4) proof is made during a fair and public hearing.

Overall, these building blocks remain intact for most criminal proceedings with one exception: crimes against women.

Thanks to feminism, we have re-created a Star Chamber reserved only for men. In this chamber, accusers are anonymous, guilt is assumed, false confessions may be extracted, and those who escape are ostracized regardless of legal innocence. To find oneself in the star chamber requires one simple accident of birth: you have a penis.

Violent crimes have now been segregated into two types: violence, and violence against women. The explanation for this separation is that feminists feel women are more vulnerable than men and require a unique status in court that serves to 'enhance' their equality with men.

In 2000, feminist scholar Sara Hinchliffe, described her concerns with this demand for special treatment of women by the courts.

> The debate about equality raises serious problems for conceptions of women as freely choosing, rational agents. If a different standard is required by which to judge women because they are unequal, then social inequality may be formalized in law. The fact that battered woman syndrome has become an acceptable defense to murder in the United States is one contemporary example. If women are not susceptible to the same assumption of equality and rationality as men then women may be excluded from the presumption that they are capable actors.

In cases of rape or sexual assault, the disturbing changes to the legal system are thus:

1. The presumption of guilt;
2. A shift of the burden of proof onto the accused;
3. Removal of mens rea or "guilty intent" as a requirement for conviction;
4. Rape shield laws that interfere with public hearings and defence rights.

You'll note that these changes reduce to rubble all four cornerstones of criminal law.

Hinchliffe goes on to elucidate the dangers of allowing feminism to infantalize women in the eyes of the law. "Under the guise of a set of reforms presented as defending the interests of rape victims, we are seeing the undermining of hard-fought civil liberties."

In an article for The Independent, Hinchliffe warns that "the radical British feminists Lorraine Kelly and Jill Radford claim that the law's distinction between rape and sex is problematic since it 'suggests that clear distinctions can be drawn between violence and non-violence and thereby between abusive and 'normal' men'." The radicals were no longer fringe and their suspicion or criminalization of normal, heterosexual activities had gained influence with policy-makers.

The women founding these changes to how the law treats rape unabashedly declared all heterosexual sex to be rapey; an act to which no rational woman would consent when in her right mind.

As journalist, Nathalie Rothschild pointed out in a 2011 Spiked-online article, "It is curious that self-described feminists are propounding such a paternalistic view of women as unable to make their own minds up, as too weak and silly to say 'no' to men, and as putting themselves at risk by drinking and flirting and potentially knocking out their critical faculties, leading them to wake up in a strange bed without having first given their 'active consent'."

Not only have modern women been utterly stripped of their adulthood by feminists, we let it happen. We put on our 'fuck me' boots and proudly slutwalked the path to perpetual victimhood.

Like Animal Farm, after the revolution had been won and the rules of a just society were written on the wall for all to see, every time the animals looked up another rule had been altered which catered to the whims of the pigs, who became the ruling class. Feminists are now the ruling class, adding their brackets to the end of our civil liberties.

No animal shall sleep in a bed (with sheets)
No animal shall consume alcohol (to excess)
No animal shall kill another (without cause)

And now we've reached the day where we stare at the side of the barn and all the rules are gone, replaced simply with "All animals are equal, but some are more equal than others."

Only women get special funding for shelters, schooling, and business ventures. Only women are deemed not responsible for their actions when drunk, or not guilty of murder when under emotional stress. Women are given lesser criminal sentences when found guilty of a crime, and special treatment when they claim victimization. We no longer seek to maintain a safe, productive community; we have mandated that the world be made safe "for women" and cater to demands that we elevate women to positions of power merely to prove our morality.

As Hinchliff points out,

> Demands to increase the conviction rate in rape cases (in other words to lock more men up on less evidence) through a more inquisitorial approach to rape trials are becoming commonplace. New precedents are being set, which call into question the central idea of equality before the law for men and women.

Feminism has corrupted the law, but there are two courts we face in society: the legal system and the court of public opinion. As important as it is for society to restore equality to our civil rights, we must also deal with the vigilante mobs that back up the feminist ideology.

Cases in which men have been murdered or have committed suicide after false rape allegations were made do not even employ the court system in the accusations. Where feminists declare "rape myths" deflower the reputation of women who have been assaulted, the reality is much more gruesome. Men are at high risk because of feminist "rape myth myths". In fact, despite the sob story they bleat in our faces every day, society is so keen to protect and defend women that the vigilante court of public opinion is not content to let the legal system deal with accusations at all. White knights abound, eager to do the bidding of their fair maidens.

The world is not a safe place for men.

As Warren Farrell so wisely noted, "Men's greatest weakness is their façade of strength, and women's greatest strength is their façade of weakness." Where women have used their feigned weakness to warp the justice system and manipulate men into proxy violence, men must now overcome their weakness and use what strength they have to fight for their own rights.

In Animal Farm, Boxer is the dedicated and loyal workhorse who represents the feminist vision of a “good man.” This is what women tell men they should aspire to and, like the pigs of Animal Farm, they enjoy the profits from the fruits of your labour. And when you collapse or become of no use to them they’ll sell you to the knacker’s yard for a case of whisky.

While lawyers and academics embolden themselves to take on the dominant swine who have corrupted our equality and justice, we need not sit by silently and wait to be rescued. Where Boxer adopted the motto “I will work harder” and “Napoleon is always right,” we can choose our own mantra.

Men’s rights are human rights.

Femtrain: A feminist programming language

August Løvenskiolds · 16 December 2013 · Archived copy · Original

A recent note by a student named Arielle Schlesinger at HASTAC.ORG discussed the exciting possibility of creating a feminist computer programming language. Arielle believes the object-oriented programming languages (like C++) "reifies normative subject object theory" – which, in human-speak, means that they are real-world examples of the abstract patriarchy theory that men (subjects) do hateful things to women (objects).

In reality, of course, men do things not to women, but FOR women, and usually after the women demand those things be done for them – a concept known as "gynocentrism".

In her vision of rainbows and unicorns and free love, Arielle imagines that this language would replace objects with entanglements, which are the silly new-age (rhymes with "sewage") creations based on the principle of quantum mechanics that two or more particles can become linked in ways that make their destinies interrelated no matter how far apart they are – an idea Einstein called "spooky action at a distance".

In the feminist world, "Entanglements" are feminist-defended entitlements that women earn because: vagina. For example, one entanglement, called "alimony," is created when a man is stupid enough to marry a woman. Another entanglement, called "child support," is created to pay money from a man to a woman, to use as she sees fit, after the man has sired (or unwittingly served as the nominal father to) children of the mother.

Also dying under Arielle's daywalker gaze is logic (or, more precisely, formal logic), which she plans to replace with "feminist logic." What is "feminist logic", you ask?

A complex description of feminist logic can be found at the link here, but it is easier to see their differences when you compare an example of formal logic to one of feminist logic.

Formal:

One S is A – "Socrates is a man"

All A are B – "All men are mortal"

Therefore, S is B – "Socrates is mortal".

Now, for the feminist logic version of this same argument:

One S is A – "Socrates is a dead white male"

All A are B – "All dead white males are evil oppressors who deserve death"

Therefore, W should be K – "Therefore, wives should be allowed to kill their husbands with impunity"

From this we can discern two of the key features that distinguish Feminist from Formal logic: "trolling" (attempting to create an angry, emotional response where none is warranted), and "derailment" (jumping to a new, unrelated subject in the midst of a serious discussion).

The other feature of feminist logic is that opposing or contradictory statements are perfectly valid. In other words, the foundation of computing is binary logic (true or false, yes or no, 0 or 1), which is seen by feminists as bullshit – to feminist thinking, something can be both true and false at the same time.

An example of this is when a woman consents to sex with a stranger, and then later, after the sex is complete, decides that she didn't really consent at all, and thus, RAAAAPE!

Maybe she changed her mind because she feared what her parents/husband/boyfriend/bestie might think of her, or maybe the "walk of shame" was a bit too unpleasant, or maybe she discovered the stranger was rich and she wanted to extort money out of him – but for whatever reason, the question of "did she consent?" can be answered as both "Yes", and then later, "No."

Giving this background, it is intriguing to think about how a feminist programming language might work. Such a language actually exists, in fact, and it is known as feministtranslator, or femtrain. (There is a drug for women – estrogen, basically – that happens to carry the more obvious trademarked name femtran.)

Femtrain is designed to create, and then, exploit, entanglements in order to process information effectively.

Again, let's use some examples to see how a regular program in an idealized programming language compares to the same program in femtrain.

First, a regular program that computes the area of a circle:

program "find_the_area_of_circle";

uses systools; {a collection of various utilities} constant Pi = 3.14159; {good enough for this project} var diameter, radius, area : real; { some variables we can use for our calculations} begin

input("Enter the diameter of the circle", diameter);

compute radius := diameter /2;

compute area := Pi * radius * radius;

output("The approximate area of the circle is", area);

end.

Now, let's look at the same program, coded in femtrain:

demand "find the area of something that looks like a nipple"; entangles "find_the_area_of_circle"; {steal the man's resources }

begin

issueComplaint("Pi is oppressive to women because it implies kitchen work, and is short for 'penis in…'");

issueThreat("Let me use your program for my project or else I'll report you for sexual harassment."); issueRelationalAggression("She thinks she can wear that. What a slut."); issueWhine("I want to go get something to drink and fuck a wealthy man.");

executeStolenProgram("find_the_area_of_circle"); issueDisposal("You're creeping me out, fuckface. I'm calling Human Resources."); period.

Notice the innovative differences in femtrain: a program is called a "demand." Outside resources are entangled so that the feminist programmer can exploit them. The feminist programmer creates "issues" of "complaints", "threats", "relational aggressions", "whines", and "disposals" to manage her relationship with the male programmer, whose work she co-opts/steals before she disposes of him. All processing ends when she reaches her period.

We know that femtrain exists because female programmers have created massive lists of "issues" that they use to shame male programmers into compliance. These issues are also called "privileges".

Some other attractive features of femtrain:

- Perfection. All femtrain programs compile bug-free, because bugs are in reality microaggressions against women, and pointing out bugs is victim-blaming.

- Simplicity. Femtrain does not support oppressive operators like those from mathematics that are often used to demean women.
- Unique operators. The femtrain function woozle generates a random integer between 2 and 4 that can be used in issuing whines. Example: "1 in [woozle] women are raped every 10 seconds."
- Deniability. Because femtrain is designed to co-opt the work of others, the femtrain programmer has a perfect defense to the charge of incompetence – it is a man's fault.
- Career-building. Promoting a talented programmer into management is usually a bad idea – you lose his skills as a programmer and his management skills may be iffy at best – but since femtrain programmers become skilled at manipulating others instead of doing their own assigned tasks, they are natural candidates for management.

So there, Arielle, I just completed your project – to design a feminist programming language – for you. Oh, fuck. I've been femtrained!

I guess femtrain is recursive, too.

Analysis of the Jameis Winston Saga

Ty Henry · 16 December 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Jameis Winston is the quarterback for Florida State University, the top ranked college football team in America, which will play for the sport's National Championship after winning their conference title Dec. 7. He was also the focus of an investigation, that alleged he raped a student last winter. After a bizarre series of stops and starts, twists and turns, and embarrassing official missteps, the State Attorney chose not charge Winston in the case. Citing a lack of evidence, spotty cooperation, and "memory lapses" from the accuser, prosecutor announced at a press conference that, "after careful consideration no charges will be filed against anyone in this case."

The reactions were to be expected. Fans of the football team were relieved in the aftermath, although according to ESPN's Mark Swarz on "Outside The Lines," the general atmosphere on campus was measured and not celebratory. Among television and radio personalities, there was the usual lip-service of respecting the process. The most common criticism was the tone of levity at points during the press conference, with some contending it would have a chilling effect, making future victims reluctant to come forward.

Spinning forward, this matter is hardly put to rest. Following are questions, speculations, observations and conclusions based on the official reports and coverage of the entire saga.

UNIVERSITY DISCIPLINE STILL POSSIBLE

The Florida State University Code Of Student Conduct proscribe both "Sexual Miscounduct" "Recording Of Images without consent" and "Harassment." Under a Preponderance of Evidence standard, which is has always been the standard at FSU for all cases, sexual misconduct is defined, in part, as "any sex act that occurs without consent," consent being defined as "willing and clear participation in the sex act." Consent is not freely given absent that which is "clear and verbal," or is brought about by force, threat of force or coercion." Lack of consent includes a participant who is "under the influence of alcohol or drugs" or who is "unconscious, sleeping, ill or in shock." Misconduct can also include any "unwelcome or unwanted gender-based behaviors." Harassment includes acts that "invade the privacy of another."

This code could not only implicate Winston, but his teammates, who admitted to having viewed the event, but not taking part. There is also suggestion one may have attempted to record the event, but did not upon protest from the accuser. I made inquiry as to whether there is Code Violation case in progress on this matter, but Emails to Dean Of Students Jeannine Ward-Roof and Victim Advocate Melissa Ashton were not returned, and neither were calls to Florida State Sports Information Director Kerwin Lonzo.

LACK OF ANALYSIS OF THE STATE ATTORNEY'S REPORT

Most glaringly absent in the aftermath was analysis of, well, the actual police and state attorney's reports. That may due in part to laziness, but also embarrassment. Indeed, a thorough reading illuminates how much of the narrative the sports media and punditry got patently wrong, or how they were misled, and in turn, mislead us.

Credit should first be given to Bleacher Report's Matt Fitzgerald, who, instead of having a fainting spell over the conduct of a press conference, did what neither ESPN, CBSSports, USA Today nor almost any other major sports news organization did; he actually read, and wrote a summary of, the police and state attorney's evidence. But hey, why spend time digging into the collateral evidence (you know, that "reporting" thing) when pearl-clutching is so much easier? Especially when even a cursory review reveals what likely did not occur.

From the start, I gave the accuser to benefit of the doubt. Like the Steubenville victim, she immediately went to police, gave her story, submitted a rape kit, and cooperated with police. Or so went the narrative.

Too bad some of it wasn't true.

As promised, State Attorney Willie Meggs released all police, investigative and lab reports in the case. The first thing they reveal that isn't kosher is the sequence of reports.

You see, it wasn't the accuser who first reported the rape to police. It was her friends. . .who weren't there.

Nonetheless, I do not blame Bria Harvey and Jenna Weisberg for calling the police. Indeed, they should be applauded. If my friend had texted me that 3 random men clubbed her upside the head outside the club, and that her next memory was being on a bathroom floor with a strange man between her legs, I'd call the cops too. Of course, I'd assume that the part of about the caveman act preceding the sexual assault would find itself into her report. It did not.

As for the intervening time period, the accuser's memory was remarkably clear in at least one account, from men fumbling to pay a cabbie, to being badgered to invite her girlfriends, to walking into the apartment, to having her clothes removed, to suggesting one of the other players told Winston to "stop."

It's no wonder, then, that 1) the accuser told her friends not to tell the police or her parents (they of course did not comply) and 2) she refused to cooperate with police after February
Indeed, when ESPN's Mark Schlabach asked Willie Meggs about whether he believed the accuser to be credible, his pause was as pregnant as the Godzilla in the 1998 movie.

It appears the accuser may have gone Mel Gibson and played the "Pack Of N*gs" card, which sends chills down my spine as a black man, especially in the wake of the recent posthumous pardon of the Scottsboro boys. That trope undergirded the Central Park Jogger "Wilding"case , and allowed the Parkside rapist to go free and rape more women. Black male threat-narratives have also led to riots which have burned down entire towns, like Tulsa, and were behind scores of lynchings.

Could she have embellished a true story to make it stick? Or was it a red herring to hide some sense of regret? None of us know, nor likely will we ever.

REACTION TO MEGGS PRESS CONFERENCE DEMEANOR, DET. WARNINGS FURTHER PROOF "RAPE CULTURE" IS A CANARD

I'm watching textile stocks very closely. They're sure to go up considering what should be assumed to be a spike in cape sales. How else to explain the scores of Caped Crusaders in sports media who swooped down to rescue thousands of faceless women, whether it be from the Evil Prosecutor, laughing like Jack Nicholson's Joker, or the obstructionist Detective, erecting a "rape culture" firewall in an effort to intimidate the "victim?"

Were there moments during the State Attorney's press conference that made me squirm? Sure. Was it tone-deaf? Certainly, considering who was watching and the subject matter. But let's not forget the laughter came mostly from the assembled media, and usually to a dumb question (Q: "Was there a sexual assault" A: "I think that's why we're here"). Could it have also been nervous laughter? Keep in mind that even soldiers facing bullets have been known to indulge a bit of gallows humor. Oh, and lest the press forget, the focus should primarily be on what is said. Nevertheless, sports media tripped over themselves in outrage, implying a 35 minute conference with three moments of brief levity was Robin Williams Weapons Of Self Destruction, many in real-time, such as Dan Wetzel of yahoo! sports

Of course once USA Today's Christine Brennan set off the dog whistle, it was a Doberman-like feeding frenzy. Over the ensuing 2-3 days, it was universal as man after man after man came down harshly on the state attorney.

Fine. Willie Meggs is big boy, and can answer for himself and to his constituents in Leon County Florida in the next election. But at some point, the hyperventilating should desist, and reporting must begin. Like, say, vetting Meggs' claim that he prosecutes athletes which, upon examination, proves true in just the last few months in the case of senior receiver Greg Dent.

Emblematic as well of the cognitive dissonance of the "rape culture" narrative in sports is that the same folks sounding the alarm over possible post-decision pilloring of the accuser, were the same who castigated the lead detective for warning her, well, that she may be pilloried for bringing the case. Indeed, rape-crisis zealots use the anonymous, sophomoric insults from feral fanboys to prove too much, conflating naked self-interest with generalized contempt for victims. Gender ideologues and their proxies could give Garfield's sidekick Odie lessons on how to chase their own tails.

The reality is, tsunami of invective sustained by the Tallahassee State Attorney parallels the typical reaction of men when they hear that a woman is raped, especially if the know her.

That is to say, they typically go ape-shit.

The annals of the criminal corpus are replete with examples of proxy violence by men against men who were merely alleged by one woman to have transgressed sexually. High profile cases include John White, who shot high schooler Daniel Cicciaro after Cicciaro led a mob to his home, chasing his son to deal out justice over a rape-threat hoax. As we speak, college professor Norma Esparza is being held to answer for the murder of Gonzalo Ramirez. In 1995, she allegedly told someone Ramirez raped her, and he was subsequently found chopped into bite-size bits. Of course, victim's groups, ever enthralled by the myth of Universal Accusation Veracity, are rallying to her defense.

WILL GENDER IDEOLOGUES AND WHITE KNIGHTS BEHAVE THEMSELVES?

Recent history suggests otherwise. From Dave Zirin calling for the shutdown of Notre Dame's football program after a young lady's suicide 10 days after a groping allegation (contrary to the zealots' claims, it was NOT a rape) to the post-Duke LaCrosse fallout which ranged from the smirking Schadenfreude of Amanda Marcotte, to the obstinate belligerence of Selena Roberts , shameless demagoguery has been the coin of the realm(although to be fair, ESPN's Jemele Hill actually issued an apology). A national month of mourning and gender guilt-mongering followed the murder of Kassandra Perkins, three years after no one in sports media, and few in the general media, called the murder of Steve McNair "domestic violence," some even saying out loud that he deserved it.

Indeed, as events unfolded, ESPN's Jemele Hill took full advantage of her platform, touting the litany of rape-hysteria talking points on Mike & Mike, from how rare false accusations are (the good folks at www.cotwa.info would beg to differ), to how much it "bothered her" that Winston invoked his 5th Amendment rights to remain silent until a charge was levied.

Predictably, the concessions after the decision not to charge were of the standard, paint-by-numbers variety, if half-hearted: "we must respect the system/Jameis Winston is innocent because the system says he is/he should receive the Heisman trophy," most prefaced by the standard disclaimer "we don't know what happened in that night and we never will." (More on that later). Indeed most were willing to let the matter go, with the appropriate acknowledgement of the ordeals victims go through.

Of course, parting blows were still in order. Colin Cowherd's December 6th opening rant was a fountain of fallacies, which could not have been better delivered by Mary Koss herself. Reporter Heather Cox lived every victim advocate's wet dream, delivering five questions about the case just seconds after the Florida State victory to sent them to the National Championship.

Now, as a journalist by practice, let me state that for Cox to not ask one question along the lines of "how did this investigation affect you" would have been malpractice. But then two… then three… four… FIVE? On a night where there were so many game related storylines (namely, "Jameis, why did you throw the ball so erratically in the first half"), it was amateurish and gratuitous.

Emblematic of the uneven response to the matter was the Sunday morning ESPN show The Sports Reporters, paneled by columnists and best-selling authors Mike Lupica and Mitch Albom, and Miami columnist Israel Gutierrez. The tenor of the discussion moved from sanctimonious to measured and balanced. Although he was clearly struggling with the issues, Lupica found himself unable to lessen his hold on innuendo, adding that "something made this young lady come forward." (Mike may want to do some research on "regret asymmetry"). Gutierrez was even-handed, reminding the panel that "seedy sexual encounters" are commonplace on all corners at any college, not just among athletes. Though Albom was mostly fair to Winston, he couldn't help but invoke the moral hazard card, stating that the message to athletes is “don’t put yourself in these situations.” If that sounds familiar, it was called victim-blaming when Serena Williams said something similar (albeit ham-handed) about the Steubenville victim last year, and was lambasted for it. Or is it only victim-blaming to suggest to young women that drinking to excess could make one vulnerable to, well, two meatheads who can’t keep their hands to themselves? How about sending a message to women to stop falsely accusing by, you know, prosecuting such women? Maybe Reginald Daye might be alive, another inconvenient truth sports media does not want to come to grips with.

The fallout from this case isn’t over, as the accuser’s counsel called for an independent Attorney General investigation on December 13, although there are doubts as to whether such an investigation will happen since evidence of wrongdoing by the original investigators is pretty thin so far. Make no mistake, though, for “rape crisis’ advocates, every stage of a high-profile case is not a search for truth, but an ideological battle station. Every press conference, every criminal/civil/school proceeding, every broadcast, every release of information–likely, even Jameis winning the Heisman this weekend (winning despite having been dropped from about 13% of Heisman ballots because of the allegations) will be used as a way to leverage their industry to higher visibility. If and when they are on the side of truth, they will deserve support. Where they shamelessly advance their destructive narrative, on the other hand, they must be resisted.

We’ll be watching.

Editor’s note: image of Jameis Winston from Wikimedia Commons, under Creative Commons Attribution license.

Nothing new under the sun

VFM News and Commentary · 16 December 2013 · Archived copy · Original

A tip of the hat to Peter Wright who brings us a news clipping from 1898. As you can see, and as Robert St. Estephe will surely attest, the stacked deck against men in family law is nothing new, nor is an organized reaction to it. The only thing these poor chaps needed was the internet, and a mind for FTSU.

[image]

Citation: “Bachelors’ League Against The Fair,” The World (New York, N. Y.), Feb. 21, 1898, page 8.

Why do I even bother?

AVfM Video Source · 16 December 2013 · Archived copy · Original

So apparently some pop song is about rape (or so some feminists say) and saying a woman has a baggy vagina is…. oh hell, we can't even untangle it, but Spark Fister does it better than we can anyway, and GirlWritesWhat chimes in with a great comment.

GirlWritesWhat's comment from YouTube:

I find it bizarre that this girl castigates Robin Thicke (and I'm no fan, believe me) for having scantily clad women in his video, while simultaneously asserting that she should be able to walk around half naked.

And this is a rape song:

I hate these blurred lines
I know you want it
I know you want it
I know you want it
But you're a good girl
The way you grab me
Must wanna get nasty
Go ahead, get at me

The only sexual assault occurring here is the woman grabbing the man without him making clear he was consenting.

The way you grab me, must wanna get nasty, go ahead get at me

That's an invitation to "enthusiastic consent", not rape. The only actual physical contact that occurs in the song is the woman grabbing at the man. The rest of it is him telling her what he would do, if she consented. What he can do, that other men can't.

Swag on, even when you dress casual
I mean it's almost unbearable
In a hundred years not dare, would I Pull a Pharside let you pass me by Nothing like your last guy, he too square for you
He don't smack that ass and pull your hair like that
So I just watch and wait for you to salute
But you didn't pick
Not many women can refuse this pimpin'
I'm a nice guy, but don't get it if you get with me

"IF you get with me."

So in literal terms, the woman in the song is sexually touching the man. He's expressing his willingness and then handing the next move to her. And she is playing coy, and despite his hair-pulling, ass-smacking cred, the song ends before he ever lays a finger on her. The ball is totally in her court.

Likewise, the video consists of women showing off their sexuality, while the men alternately drool, ogle, long for, but never really touch. It's hands off, unless the woman wants it, even though the women are using every possible way of getting the men under their thrall.

The song is a paean to the power of female sexuality, and male subordination to that power.

"I just watch and wait for you to salute."

RAPE!!!!!!

Again, I'm wondering how these women manage to tie their shoes, they're so dim. How can they call a song where a man invites a woman to enthusiastically consent before he lays a finger on her promoting rape of women by men? How can they call a song where a woman is pawing a man (who is internally consenting, but who did not explicitly indicate such prior) promoting rape of women by men?

What the fuck drugs are these feminists on?

Interview with Bob O'Hara about Men's Rights, MGTOW & Paternity Fraud

AVfM Video Source · 16 December 2013 · Archived copy · Original

News director Bob O'Hara recently called in to Reginald Kaigler's DEMCAD Channel. We thought you'd want to hear what he had to say.

Subscribe to DEMCAD here.

MHRO and AVFM offer help – to a feminist

Jim Byset · 17 December 2013 · Archived copy · Original

AS EVERYBODY in the MHRM knows – false accusations of sexual assault are real. They're very real. Far too many men and boys have been and continue to be persecuted by educational, legal, and criminal justice institutions based simply upon the word of a woman. As soon as the words 'he sexually assaulted me' are uttered – a male's life is never the same again. In North America, those who utter those words are immediately treated as victims – not as alleged victims; phalanxes of social and criminal justice institutions assemble to offer assistance, to counsel, to provide help to the accuser. Those who are accused, ostensibly innocent until proven guilty, are in truth exactly the opposite and treated at almost every juncture, as criminals. So damaging is an accusation of rape or sexual assault that even when a man clears his name – he is still left with almost overwhelming reputational damage. It is an unfair burden that he must carry for the rest of his life.

[image]
Justice, like equality, should be for all
With the exception of small organizations, operating on less than a shoestring, there is nobody to reach out and help these people. Those accused of such crimes are routinely denied even the most basic semblance of due process. The current state of affairs represents a series of wholly unbalanced and transparently unfair systems. The reasons for the existence of this situation are myriad and complex. While false accusers clearly provide the impetus for putting these forces into action, they are not directly responsible for their existence. Rather, it is the historical influence of feminist-led agitation for change in laws and in how police and courts prosecute sexual assault that have brought us to this juncture. Indeed, perhaps the most infamous 'victim' of this rampant paring down of men's rights before the law was none other than prominent feminist Judith Grossman, who writing in the Wall Street Journal earlier this year claimed that '[u]nsubstantiated accusations against my son by a former girlfriend landed him before a nightmarish college tribunal.'

Poor Judith.

History, of course, just like hackneyed literary clichés, has a habit of repeating itself so it should come as no surprise that it's happened again. Another prominent feminist's son has found himself entangled in the criminal justice system and SHOCK! HORROR! according to his mommy, he didn't get treated fairly.

Amy MacPherson is a journalist for Huffington Post Canada. She has worked for CBC and a number of other publications as an investigative journalist and considers herself to be an equality and political activist. On December 6, 2013, MacPherson published an entry to her blog 'These Eyes,' entitled 'I Might Go To Jail For This, But Have Little Choice (Lawyer Needed).' It is a massive, galumphing entry – some 20,000 words long, with more twists and turns than a bowl of spaghetti. In the blog entry MacPherson discusses her professional background and openly describes herself as an 'anti-conservative' whose journalistic investigations had implicated Canadian politicians in the past. She describes a campaign of harassment and death threats aimed at her and her family caused by her work as an investigative journalist and goes as far as to suggest that her son is the victim of a false accusation specifically because of her work.

It is a hellishly complex story and is populated with a mass of players, a labyrinthine plot that would put James Ellroy to shame and at its centre a young boy – who according to MacPherson has been framed. Her son is the innocent victim of a conspiracy and while MacPherson doesn't name her agent provocateur(s) she implicates numerous individuals, and institutions. She implicates school boards; principals; police; prosecutors; witnesses; and slates her own lawyer – labelling him as 'reluctant' to act in her son's defence.

Her son, unnamed in the blog entry due to a publication ban was found guilty of sexual assault in an Ontario court. He was charged with three counts of sexual assault, three counts of forcible confinement and one count as an accessory, all of which occurred over a three-day period. "She (the victim) says 2 weeks ago that my son, a handicapped boy and 2 other boys she refuses to name, forced her to be assaulted by DEE. Three days in a row they dragged her through the school to the same bathroom, in front of all the other students as classes ended for the day." Because of the judge's interpretation of sentence parity (the principle of parity mandates that a sentence should be similar to sentences imposed on similar offenders for similar offences committed in similar circumstances: Criminal Code, s. 718.2(b)) MacPherson's son didn't go to jail but was sentenced to a combination of community service and travel restrictions for two years.

Additionally, according to MacPherson, the Crown and the school devised a lifelong 'Safety Plan' for her son which places additional restrictions upon him. Should her son wish to continue at school he would have to do so with a guard that escorts him at all times on school property. On top of this – he is also not allowed to use the bathrooms at the school. He must use the principal's bathroom, with a guard posted outside. He must also "submit to lifelong counselling to help him accept his guilt, via the school board." For these reasons – MacPherson will not send her son back to school and views his participation there as a form of needless humiliation. "Guilty or innocent, appealing or not; no matter what it's airing a minor's criminal record to the community on a daily basis. The law doesn't allow this and neither does the publication ban, but everyone running Hazard County is above the law. Therefore if I go to jail for this letter, I just don't give a damn anymore. Playing by the rules and jumping through inhumane hoops hasn't helped my son yet."

MacPherson does have grounds for her suspicions. In her blog she catalogus numerous problems with the prosecution's case not least of all is the victim's constant rehashing of her story. On three occasions, she said the sexual assault occurred on different dates. On two of those dates MacPherson's son was able to prove that he wasn't at the school and therefore couldn't have participated in the attacks. There were illegal searches as well as testimony from two of the attackers that MacPherson's son wasn't present. Yet – none of this mattered. The machine cranked on regardless and found him guilty.

Of course, this is a pattern that many within the MHRM are familiar with. MHRAs have been screaming – for years – about the inequality and institutional corruption within the legal system. One such person is AVFM's own Attila Vinczer who earlier this year worked with Velvet Martin to get the truth out about what happened to her daughter Samantha. Martin, like MacPherson, was hit with a publication ban by an Ontario court. The reason was clear – to protect the people at CAS who put her daughter into a care home – a 'care' home where she lost her life. Vinzcer, in an act of defiance convinced Martin to violate the ban and to use her name. In a conversation with Men's Human Rights Ontario, Vinczer said that 'had it been my kid – I would have shouted her name from the highest mountains.' Vinzcer's decision led to Martin violating the ban and the court immediately lifting the ban as a result. It was clear that not only was the ban unenforceable, but it was also morally corrupt.

Amy MacPherson didn't think so and berated Vinzcer for his defiance and openly backed the CAS in a Facebook argument with Vinzcer. In fact, MacPherson doesn't really like the MHRM at all – and in her blog entry warned MRAs to stay away from her son's case. "MRA voices had better stay away from this too. My son marches alongside the ladies when they need to fight for their rights, no different than his own. This isn't and can't be a gender issue. That's been the most confusing part. It needs to be equality and access to justice for all, full stop."

Well… guess what? We didn't stay away from it. Men's Human Rights Ontario have reached out to MacPherson in a bid to help her son. Not only that but we also reached out to our good friends at Canada Court Watch and are expectant that a lawyer will contact MacPherson soon. Unlike Amy MacPherson we know that what happened to her son is likely not the result of a massive conspiracy but is actually just the way the system works against men and boys. We know this – because we've seen it time and time again. It is for that reason that we reached out to her.

Ms. MacPherson, our offers to you are sincere. Right now – there is nobody beating down your door to help you. The 'sisters' won't help you. You know that. In fact it is not a stretch at all to say that there are many feminists that would be happy to see him dead. You wrote that a "mom will do anything for her child and that's the context in which I hope you will read this. I will bring shame upon myself, no doubt. But that's okay in the bigger picture and I accept that too." There is no shame in helping your son.

We want to help you.

It's up to you.

Publisher's statement: On behalf of A Voice for Men I want to also offer the services of our Judicial Accountability Committee in order to seek justice for Amy MacPherson and her son. Regrets for being so blunt, but as Mr. Byset clearly stated, we are the only help you are ever going to see. Unless you want your son to be just another convicted offender on a list of social undesirables, contact us. Paul Elam, publisher, A Voice for Men.

The real reasons we do not have a male birth control pill

Robert O'Hara · 17 December 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Authors note: I originally penned this article three years ago for Antimisandry Forums and Men's News Daily. While some of the information is dated the issue remains as pertinent as ever — if not more so. We are re-publishing it here in order to promote tonight's broadcast of AVFM News and Activism where we will feature Elaine Lissner of the Parimus Foundation who will be telling us about the latest developments in research efforts for VASALGEL, a reversible form of male fertility control that is safe, effective and affordable. Please join us tonight for that important conversation.

Thursday, May 10, 2013 was the the fifty third anniversary of the introduction of the female birth control pill. In those fifty three years no equivalent for men has been developed. Why?

Every five years or so, and you can almost count on every five years like clockwork, we hear news concerning the development of a discrete male fertility control drug or device whose side effects are tolerable and whose fertility effects are reversible. In fact, men in many parts of the world already enjoy the benefits of such methods. Why do we have not one single method in the U.S., the U.K, Australia and Canada?

In China and France men have the option of hormone treatments rendering them temporarily infertile. In India, RISUG (Reversible Inhibition of Sperm Under Guidance) has been used successfully as a long term, reversible method of fertility control for nearly twenty years. As of this writing the U.S., U.K. and Australia are conducting studies that hold tremendous promise for the male pill.

Standing in the way of all this coming to fruition, however, are the drug companies themselves. They are very sketchy about putting up money to develop, produce and market these options. Why are they frightened? Who or what is keeping them from taking the plunge into what could be a very lucrative market. It seems to defy common sense.

But common sense has very little to do with reproductive issues in the western world.

Unfortunately, and to our tremendous discredit, men have been almost entirely silent about the male pill, leaving the discourse on reproductive control methods, and for that matter reproductive rights as a whole, to be dominated by a chorus of female voices. Also, like clockwork, this chorus starts chiming in just around the time mention of a pending male fertility control method comes up.

Many of these voices support the idea of a male pill citing fairness and the desire that men carry more of the contraceptive burden. The most energetic and pernicious, however, come from a hoard of columnists writing "from a woman's perspective" who oppose the idea of a male pill.

The timbre of the commentary ranges from the condescending to the appallingly bigoted. In January of 2010 HLN's Joy Behar discussed research developments with, of all people, Ashley Dupre, Eliot Spitzer's over-priced sidekick. Along with discussing the "G Spot" with the supposedly renowned expert on male fertility issues, they also "covered" the inability to trust a man when he says he is on the pill, the "fragile male ego" that we hear so much about and how rendering one's self infertile might just be too much for a man's pride to take.

Also predictably plugged was the idea that men simply do not possess the intelligence to realize we can get an sexually transmitted disease without the use of a condom. Hmmm, who'd'ave thunk you could get somethin that AJAX aint gonna wash off by not wrappin' it up first? Not nobody ever told me that!

Other commentaries include a particularly offensive one written by MJ Deschamps from the University of Ottawa's Centertown Journal called "Give Them the Remote Not the Pill" in which she parrots the concerns presented on the HLN interview.

> "What I'm worried about are all the other men – the unmarried, uncommitted, casual daters who can walk > away from a situation if an accident happens because they forgot to take their birth control, or just lied about taking it altogether. Never mind the large increase in STIs and AIDS that would probably arise from the inevitable decrease in condom use."

Walk away? Yea right, men are NEVER thrown in jail for failure to pay child support and we are all just an ignorant bunch of jackasses who have no idea how STDs are spread.

No doubt pharmaceutical company executives, in lieu of very expensive market research, will take note of these voices and conclude that spending the money to develop and viably market such a method might pose more a financial risk than it's worth. If there are so many opposing voices and not much observable support for these methods why put up the money?

So why is there is so much opposition to this idea of male fertility control? Surely enabling men with the option to control their fertility would be good for them as well as society. There would be fewer unwanted pregnancies and couples and single men would have more control over their futures. But keep in mind the operative word here is "control."

What does this word mean when talking about reproduction?

Historically, rules were developed to ensure that fertile women were paired with men that could protect and provide for them and any resultant offspring. Men, taking on the burden of providing and protecting, were also guaranteed authority as it applied to their mode of living as well as access and control where it concerned raising their offspring. Both sexes were given roles, rights and responsibilities related to their children. Similarities are ubiquitous throughout all of human civilization.

It was imperative the female had to give some assurance to the male the children he was to protect and provide for were his. This was achieved, admittedly, through strict social enforcement of female chastity before and strict loyalty after pairing with a male. Neither she nor society could rightfully expect the man to support her and her children if this was not the case.

Just as importantly the male's status and prestige were almost solely based on his ability to protect and provide for his family. Failure to do this has always resulted, with every society and culture, in social ostracism, diminishing his "Family Name," the value of which determined his offspring's ability to find viable mates within their social group.

This arrangement was by no means perfect. Some even call it oppressive. But it supported countless generations, each producing healthy, well kept Homo sapiens who were much better off than their counterparts in other primate species. Without this system of rules not one red brick would have been laid atop another, foregoing virtually every single feature of civilization as we know it.

In the Late twentieth century medical advances and changes in the law regarding reproduction, parental rights and responsibilities changed this paradigm forever. By changing how we bring children into the world and raise them, we changed the path of human civilization.

In 1960 the female oral contraceptive was brought to market, to be followed in subsequent years by a plethora of effective and relatively inexpensive methods through which women could control their fertility in a safe and reversible manner. This truly freed women to seek sexual affection without fearing the consequences they would have suffered prior. Ostensibly men would benefit, too, but they would have to rely on the word of women with whom they had relations as men still had the same ancient responsibilities that come with a pregnancy.

But this was ok, right? Pregnancy is so treacherous and the ordeal of taking care of an infant so daunting no woman would ever want to be anything but honest while disclosing her fertility status……. Right?

Unfortunately for men at that time there was no equivalent solution to the problem of controlling their own fertility. To be fair, it was a hard nut for scientists to crack, pun intended. Surely though, science would work it's wonders and make available in good order the same type of option for men.

Years went by and the pill became safer. New methods were being tested as well with the promise that if women could not or did not want to take the pill there were other options to be made available. Also on the horizon were rumblings of a totally different form of birth control, separate from a medicinal form. Soon, the use of the operative word “birth” would take a whole new meaning in the phrase: “Birth Control.”

Abortion had been available illegally for some time but in 1973 the Unites States Supreme Court’s decision in Roe v. Wade declared that the “imposition of parenthood” on an individual was just too much of a burden for the state to rightfully impose. This meant that even after conception women would have a right to decide whether or not the pregnancy would come to term. Males however were not to enjoy that same option. Consequently, men were given the legal burden for someone else’s choices.

This development fostered the expansion of parental responsibilities for men and diminished those of women. It is now, for all intents and purposes, legal for a woman to terminate a pregnancy as well as, abandon, or give up for adoption a child without the consent of the father. There are armies of social workers and lawyers on the government payroll who will assist her in taking the child out of his life if she so wishes. Men, however, are subject to incarceration for not being able to write out a child support check to a woman who has no accountability for how that money is spent. This can happen even if the child is, in fact, not that of said man and said man can prove it.

In our society a man’s parental and human rights are based almost entirely on the assumed good will and integrity of the mother.

Let’s take our attention to an article written by the UK Daily Mail’s Leah Hardy entitled “Of Course Women Don’t Want a Male Pill- It Would End All of Those ‘Happy Accidents”. This particular article enraged me more than any other commentary on the subject concerning a man’s right to seek control over his own fertility and future. In spite of the fact that there have been millions of men jailed because they didn’t (or couldn’t) hold up to the state imposed responsibilities as parents, Hardy asserted that children for men are nothing more than “happy little accidents.”

This article illustrates perfectly and unabashedly the real reason that so many women and woman’s advocacy groups demonstrate a fierce resistance to the male pill. That reason is not that they are afraid that we will lie or forget. Rather, it is the fear that we will actually use it. It is the fear that men will seize reproductive control. But the question remains what it will take for men to assume that control.

Female birth control was, in spite of anything you might hear from feminists, handed to women on a silver platter. For men, it will not be handed over in the form of a social mandate or government entitlement. No president will ever be able to buy men’s votes with the free goody of birth control. For men, it will take something else.

A fight.

Yup, that’s right. There are too many agencies and interests representing the female gender’s total control over reproduction for there not to be a fight over it. Whenever a woman says “you men have birth control it’s called a condom” or “keep it in your pants” or “just get a vasectomy” the response should be equivalent cynical verbal spit. We, as men should no longer sit idle while those in academia, the media, government, or for that matter, casual conversation maintain control of this most important topic.

Men also need to get vocal as a group concerning the male birth control pill, writing pharmaceutical companies and encouraging them to develop an internal male fertility control method is a good start. Most importantly though, we absolutely must wrestle the male fertility control debate out of the hands of women and take ownership of it.

This may sound extreme to exclude women, but they are free to support the idea if they want. They should not feel free to oppose it without reaction from indignant men. The male pill is about men, not women, not children, not the government. It is about men and men alone.

Gentlemen, let us get busy and start doing something about this.

The men who died to save the world

Kalan Chinuck · 17 December 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Editor's note: This article is also available in Romanian.

The nuclear crisis which continues to plague Japan and the world has received scant attention from mainstream media. Given the potential magnitude of the threat posed by this disaster, it would seem there is an agenda to redirect the world's attention. The question of who is being served by that agenda is one readers are encouraged to ponder further.

It is difficult to know precisely what is occurring now at the Fukushima reactor site. Certainly clean-up efforts are underway – equipment and technicians and workers are working – but how far the long-term damage to the world will reach, in lives, lifestyles and financial costs, as well as geography, is a matter of conjecture. The Japanese government's new fascist whistle-blower law may ultimately ensure that the entire body of truth never comes out, an outcome which will no doubt benefit bureaucrats and corporate officials alike.

In spring of 1986, Gorbachev's USSR faced a similar crisis at the Chernobyl power plant – an explosion and meltdown coupled with the major risk of a subsequent catastrophic nuclear event which would have leveled cities hundreds of kilometers away and left Europe and much of Russia uninhabitable due to high radiation.

An eye-opening feature-length documentary, The Battle of Chernobyl, provides harsh details. Although initially the usual tactics of obfuscation and truth-avoidance were wielded by the state and its institutions, eventually the scale of the crisis, along with pressure from other countries, overcame the predictable bureaucratic waffling and butt-covering. There stirred the first real inklings of perestroika, although incomplete, in the cause of launching an all-out fight to save the world from catastrophe.

And the world WAS saved.

The people who saved it were the firefighters who tackled the initial blaze without protective gear. They were the soldiers evacuating citizens from the nearby town of Pripyat. They were the specialists, summoned by Gorbachev, who lived on site while analyzing the monster and planning their strategy. They were the helicopter pilots who flew into a 180 °C column of poisonous radioactive air directly above the blown reactor, and the people in those choppers who dumped hundreds of tons of lead, and sand laced with boric acid, onto the melting pile. They were the 10,000 young miners who dug tunnels by hand under the reactor in massive heat and radioactivity without protection or ventilation.

They were the engineers and technicians who installed a giant refrigeration unit beneath the reactor to cool it down. They were the 'liquidators' who went out into the highways and byways and washed every room, every building, every road, every structure, clear of the built-up radioactive dust the explosion had left behind, and then turned their efforts to the reactor itself, where they could only survive a few minutes of exposure. They were the construction workers who erected the enormous concrete and steel sarcophagus which now entombs the toxic ruin. They were the 'bio-robots,' the human beings who stepped in when the real robots broke down under radioactive assault.

Many of these people died. They died of horrific skin lesions that rotted flesh down to the bone. They died of cancer. They died of burns. They died of bone marrow deterioration and thyroid disease and the host of other ailments caused by exposure to lethal levels of radiation. They died in their tens and their hundreds and their thousands.

Who were these people? Many were unwitting, as the risks of the work involved were likely never fully disclosed. They were citizens, they were Russians and Soviets and Ukrainians, they were military and civilian, they were (and remain) unsung, unacknowledged and unappreciated by the people whose lives and countries they saved. They were, of course, heroes.

Unsurprisingly, they were not bureaucrats, nor were they women's studies academicians, nor egalitarians, nor social construct theorists, nor equal rights lobbyists, nor gender-quota HR specialists, nor feminists.

Who were these people? The answer is as simple, as bleak and disturbing, as it is timeless: they were men, all of them – men who died to save the world.

Take back the meme!

Robert St. Estephe · 17 December 2013 · Archived copy · Original

I just cooked this up — an “unhelpful” and “insensitive” parody — altered “RECLAIM THE NIGHT” banner. — I am NOT a nice person (R. St. Estephe).

Source for original image:

http://www.lippymag.co.uk/interview-lippy-talks-to-rosie-robinson-boardman-creator-of-reclaim-the-night

[image]

12 reasons for DNA paternity testing

Carnell Smith · 17 December 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Early detection of false paternity could prevent or minimize ...

[image]12. "Loss of Driver's Licenses"
11. "Loss of professional and business licenses"
10. "Loss of your home and real estate"
9. "Arrest and incarceration"
8. "Seizure of paycheck"
7. "Seizure of savings, checking and investment accounts"
6. "Reporting to credit bureaus"
5. "Seizure of state and federal tax refunds."
4. "Seizure of lottery winnings."
3. "Seizure of unemployment compensation"
2. "Seizure of your car, truck, motorcycle"
1. "No fault divorce"
****

12. Loss of driver's licenses

A DNA test for paternity could be quite useful in keeping or preventing the loss of a driver's license in the United States. As a child support enforcement tool to collect unpaid money from men and women ordered to pay child support, many states can suspend a driver's license. If a driver's license is needed to commute or as a job requirement — making on-time child support payments should be a top priority. Sometimes, a court hearing is not required to confirm actual arrears nor actual paternity before license suspension goes into effect.

Imagine hearing, "That's too bad about the layoff last month and now you can't drive to work nor drive for work. No problem, we'll release the driver's license when the outstanding balance is paid in full. Next person in line … ". Since your driving privilege is on the line, taking that legal DNA paternity test before signing your name is not such a bad idea.

11. Loss of professional and business licenses

Years of hard work, education and investments could be affected by the loss of a professional and business license. It does not matter if you are an attorney, doctor, dentist, accountant or business owner in the United States. If a professional or business license is needed to produce income then making on-time support payments should be a top priority to avoid the life altering impact of another child support enforcement tool.

The idea of taking the means to generate income while still demanding payment does seem a bit strange. Taking a DNA test to confirm paternity could be a career saver for some people.

10. Loss of your home and real estate

Perhaps you have realized that paternity testing can determine if "he is the father" or "he is not the father". A divorce can be a painfully and devastating experience for men and women. When considering whether to get a paternity test or not – did you know that your home and real estate can be seized and sold to pay child support and/or alimony?

Let's see, the choices are take the DNA paternity test, asap or risk losing your home and real estate. Hmmm …

9. Arrest and incarceration

Failure to pay court ordered child support puts your freedom at-risk when appearing in “pay or go to jail family court” in the United States. Also applies to countries that have adopted the practices of US Child Support Enforcement agencies. Many states have laws concerning child abandonment and delinquency of support plus contempt of court for failure to pay. Sometimes the accused man gets an opportunity to have a court ordered legal DNA paternity test if he pays for testing and sample collections. The result of court ordered testing may show paternity is zero percent and “he is not the father,” it could address the criminal abandonment charge and leave the paternity order in effect until overturned by a subsequent order. Choose one – jail or DNA Test. We recommend the legal DNA test for peace of mind then making support payments based on the truth.

8. Seizure of paycheck

Refusal to pay child support can lead to garnishment or seizure of your paycheck. This begs the question “what happens if the man learns he is not the father”? Generally, the truth about paternity is irrelevant in some states as long as a child support order is in place. Sometimes the man has agreed to paternity and signed a confession before obtaining a DNA test and later discovers paternity is zero percent. The man is apt to be shocked even more upon learning that his wages will continue to be garnished until there is a signed order to vacate or overturn. So, how does he afford legal representation while losing his paycheck? Suggestion: No DNA test, No paycheck.

7. Seizure of savings, checking and investment accounts

Since the paycheck can be seized as a child enforcement action in the United States, why stop there? Some men without paternity test results will be shocked to learn that financial institutions report the balances of your savings, checkings and investment accounts to state child support enforcement agencies. This reporting of your financial information is done without your knowledge or consent. Furthermore, there’s no notice to the account holder nor is consent required as part of the DataMatch Program. If there are arrears (verified or unverified), the balances from saving, checking and investment accounts can be seized without a court order to satisfy the balance. What if you discovered that you are not the father … years after signing a confession of paternity and refused to pay? “Take the money first, ask questions, second”. A word of caution for the wives and girlfriends (joint account holders) of men that believe they’re fathers of kids from ex-wife of ex-girlfriend.

6. Reporting to credit bureaus

Any child support arrears can be reported to the Credit Bureaus. This can lead to negative credit ratings that affect employment, insurance, credit, refinancing and obtaining loans. If DNA testing reveals that you are the father, never get behind on child support payments. Forget about borrowing money to settle the arrears after your score dips to 600. Boy, oh boy, taking that DNA paternity test versus losing your 795 Fico score is sounding like a good idea.

5. Seizure of state and federal tax refunds

What if you are not the father? Taking the paternity test is confirming the facts versus feelings. If you are the biological father or adopted father — no problem with seizing tax refunds to pay past due child support. A legal DNA paternity test for paternity could be quite useful in keeping your state and federal tax refunds. Another child support enforcement tool is to seize state and federal tax refunds from men and women ordered to pay child support for arrears. There goes the money!

4. Seizure of lottery winnings

Refusal or inability to pay the full ordered child support can lead to seizure of your lottery winnings. If you win enough money, you may see the child support and alimony increased due to material change in circumstances. The state lottery agencies share information about lottery winners with state child support agencies to collect arrears. If the man learns through DNA testing that he is not the father? Generally, the truth about paternity is irrelevant.

The lottery money is subject to seizure as long as a child support order is in place. If the winnings are substantial and there is an existing order, the child support agency may proceed with an action to increase the child support order.

3. Seizure of unemployment compensation

A DNA test for paternity could be useful in keeping or preventing the loss of unemployment compensation. As a child support enforcement tool to collect unpaid money from men and women ordered to pay child support, many states can seize unemployment benefits. Imagine being told, “That’s too bad about the layoff last month and you need the unemployment money to survive and look for work. No problem, we’ll release the order when the child support balance is paid in full. Next person in line … “. Taking that legal DNA paternity test before signing your name is sounding better and better.

1. No fault divorce

There can be no rational argument for equal rights and equal responsibilities when there is different treatment in court for adultery. If a DNA test reveals that a married man committed adultery because he is the father of his girlfriend’s child(ren) — he cannot say “my marriage license shields me from personal responsibility and child support to my girlfriend”. The adulterous wife can file for divorce on the fault grounds of adultery and pursue marital home, alimony, child support (if any adopted or biological kids).

The courts in some states like California, Texas, New York, Michigan and North Carolina treat the wife’s adultery differently by ducking the truth behind best interest of the child.

Essentially this means the wife is not responsible for her adultery when DNA paternity testing reveals that some or none of the children are her husband’s children. The adulterous wife can say judge “you cannot make my boyfriend pay child support, that is my husband’s job”.

In fact, many states support paternity fraud through imposing secret time limits and various legal procedures. For example California and Delaware have an unpublished two year time limit of challenging marital paternity from birth. If the secret can be hidden from the husband for 2 years and a day then file for “No Fault Divorce”, dump the husband, keep the family home, keeps his cash by alimony and child support then move the children’s father into the home. Try and imagine losing your home in a “No Fault Divorce” after DNA testing reveals those are her boyfriend’s kids, she is not going to let you see those kids and she is marrying the boyfriend to move him into your house.

Moral of the story: Confirm paternity at birth, before the second birthday and before final divorce hearing.

As you can see from the list above, agreeing to paternity without legal DNA proof can be a risky situation. Fortunately, DNA paternity testing can assist people in the quest for truth by answering the question of “who is the father?” before agreeing or signing any kind of documents admitting to paternity of a child. The advances of technology in DNA testing can narrow the list of biological fathers to one man, except in situations where the alleged fathers or paternity candidates are identical twins.

Copyright (c) 2009, Carnell Smith www.PaternityFraud.com

Jezebel has some trouble understanding Camille Paglia. Let's help them out.

Janet Bloomfield (aka JudgyBitch) · 17 December 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Camille Paglia has a written a new piece for Time Magazine, called It's a Man's World and it Always Will Be. Camille has the audacity to point out that if men are "obsolete", then women will soon be extinct.

Oh dear. Cue the shrieking harridans over at Jezebel. They demand to know just what Camille means by that! How could that be possible? The increasingly clueless and defiantly obtuse Erin Gloria Ryan has some questions for Dr. Paglia.

Let's help her answer those, shall we?

> A peevish, grudging rancor against men has been one of the most unpalatable and unjust features of second- and third-wave feminism [Citation needed].

http://www.munkdebates.com/debates/the-end-of-men http://www.theatlantic.com/magazine/archive/2010/07/the-end-of-men/308135/

http://www.amazon.com/Men-Are-Not-Cost-Effective-America/dp/0941138119

http://www.goodreads.com/work/quotes/1339991-are-men-necessary-when-sexes-collide

> Men's faults, failings and foibles [Like? Aggression? War? Rape? Dick-waving? The Jackass franchise? What?] have been seized on and magnified into gruesome bills of indictment [By whom?].

By whom? Are you kidding me? ARE YOU FUCKING KIDDING ME?!?!

How about by Jezebel?

Men are rapists (especially MRA men)!

Assholes who don't know how to clean but can be trained like dogs to do so by the truly dedicated!

Boys are gross!

Jezebel hates men!

The end of white men!

Fathers are not really that important after all!

blah blah blah blah …. Basically the entire site is devoted to pointing out any flaws the ladies can find in men, all the while ignoring the fact they would have no power, clean water, communications or computer technology and would essentially be screaming messages back and forth between grass huts without men, a point Camille has made in the past.

> Ideologue professors [Who?] at our leading universities [Which ones?] indoctrinate impressionable undergraduates [How? Are you implying that young people internalize ideologies simply by hearing them once? How is this indoctrination occurring] with carelessly fact-free [Odd hyperbole] theories alleging that gender is an arbitrary, oppressive fiction with no basis in biology [Bold statement. Source?].

This is almost too laughably ridiculous to warrant a response. Has Erin never heard of the women's studies department? Almost every liberal arts oriented university has one, stuffed full of professors that do not study women, they study "feminism", which is not the same thing.

> Creating whole departments of ethnic, gender, and other 'studies' was part of the price of academic peace. All too often, these 'studies' are about propaganda rather than serious education.
>
> – Thomas Sowell

People internalize ideologies by hearing them once? What? Show me the university degree that can be earned after one class. Impressionable undergraduates are typically enrolled for four years. Four years is more than sufficient for complete indoctrination.

If you want carelessly fact-free, just consider your questions at the beginning of the paragraph. Who? Which ones? Are you seriously patting yourself on the back for your epic take down of Camille? Really? That's what Camille means by "fact-free", toots.

And now you are denying that feminism considers gender a fiction with no basis in biology? Really? Here we go with the "fact-free" again. Google "gender as a social construct" and tell me what you get. Seriously. Go do it. It's not a bold claim at all. It's pedestrian at this point. Feminism claims that gender is a social fiction with no basis in biology.

> There is no gender identity behind the expressions of gender… identity is performatively constituted by the very 'expressions' that are said to be its results.
>
> – Judith Butler

Moving along…

> Is it any wonder that so many [How many?] high-achieving young women, despite all the happy talk about their academic success [Cite examples here, otherwise it just sounds like you're talking out of your ass], find themselves in the early stages of their careers in chronic uncertainty or anxiety [See previous note about ass-talking] about their prospects for an emotionally fulfilled private life [See two previous notes about the origin of talking w/r/t Your Ass]?

Here we go with all the stupid facts again. The Anxiety and Depression Association of America reports that approximately 40 million people aged 18 and over suffer from anxiety issues, which is the most common mental illness in the US, and women are twice as likely to be affected as men.

Happy talk about women succeeding academically? Oh, you missed this article? And this one? And this one, too? They're all from Jezebel, you moron.

> When an educated culture routinely denigrates masculinity and manhood [Clarification needed here to explain what your argument even is. What is manhood? What is masculinity? A John Wayne movie? Like, Iroquois manhood? Mustaches? Fatherhood? Dressing in plaid shirts? Dying of prostate cancer? Can the men be gay? Can the men be peaceful? You're assuming your audience understands dog whistle shorthand that only exists in your brain.] then women will be perpetually stuck with boys, who have no incentive to mature or to honor their commitments.

Well color me fucking SHOCKED that Jezebel has no idea what masculinity or manhood means. Here's a starter course for you.

> From my long observation [Anecdata], which predates the sexual revolution [Cut this; reminding readers that you formed your opinion before hippie-times doesn't add to your cred; it makes you seem > doddering], this remains a serious problem afflicting Anglo-American society, with its Puritan residue [Sounds like a euphemism for dried ejaculate; cut].

Anecdata? Dr. Paglia has been teaching at universities since 1972. Her book Sexual Personae topped the bestseller lists in 1990, a rare accomplishment for a scholarly book. She has been active in universities as an educator for over 40 years. That's hardly "anecdata".

"Doddering"? Charming. I'm surprised Erin didn't pull out the fat and ugly arguments to go along with "old". All praise the sisterhood, huh? What was that about critiquing other women on their thoughts and ideas again? No? Just call her old and be done with it?

How clever.

"Ejaculate"? That icky boy stuff? Ew, gross.

How mature.

In France, Italy, Spain, Latin America, and Brazil, in contrast, many ambitious professional women [How many?] seem [Ugh] to have found a formula for asserting power [Statistics? Something? Back this up please? Careful with the "Latin America, sexy feminist wonderland" stereotype; easily disprovable, or at least vehemently argued against. Also kind of in line with troublesome "sexy brown chick" trope you keep going back to; careful here] and authority in the workplace while still projecting sexual allure and even glamor [Oy.]. This is the true feminine mystique, which cannot be taught but flows from an instinctive recognition of sexual differences [Girl what are you even talking about here? Get some new cultural references].

Want facts? Probably not, but here are some anyways. This report might help.

Quantitative research was conducted in France, Germany, US, UK, Brazil, Mexico and China. Qualitative research was conducted in France, Germany, US, UK, Brazil, Mexico, China, Japan, South Korea, India, Thailand, Malaysia, Singapore, Philippines and Indonesia.

> Nearly 70% of women globally think that being beautiful helps them get what they want out of life, and the same number believe that the relationship between happiness and beauty is directly proportional. 93% of women said they felt more confident overall when they knew they looked beautiful.

Careful now. This may not be racist at all. Rather inclusive if you ask me. That's kind of foreign to feminists, though, isn't it?

> After the next inevitable apocalypse [Okay. That is your argument. Men aren't over because the world is ending. Okay. Okay. Got it.], men will be desperately needed again [Again, not sure you established that men aren't needed now…]!

Not sure you established that men aren't needed now.

Wow.

That needs to be "established", does it? Okay, here you go. All information taken from the Department of Labor, Bureau of Labor Statistics.

> Oh, sure, there will be the odd gun-toting Amazonian survivalist gal, who can rustle game out of the bush and feed her flock [Who is this piece about? Women who have children without men around? Childless young women with academic accomplishments? Why is the subject of this piece constantly morphing?], but most women and children will be expecting men [Citation needed] to scrounge for food and water and to defend the home turf [Just to review: we're now arguing that gender roles must exist > because after a theoretical apocalypse, women and children will "expect" men to fend for them? That's what's happening here? Okay.].

Most women want breadwinner husbands? Uh, yes. Yes they do.

> 'Women with young children are going back to the very traditional division of labour in which they want the husband as the breadwinner.
>
> 'Having tried full-time working themselves they have found the home much more interesting and want to be enabled to have that."

Stupid facts, again!

Indeed, men are absolutely indispensable right now, invisible as it is to most feminists [Citation needed], who seem blind to the infrastructure that makes their own work lives possible [Who hurt you, Camille?].

Citation needed? Go back to the top. Men are obsolete. The end of men. Are men necessary?

> It is overwhelmingly men who do the dirty, dangerous work of building roads, pouring concrete, laying bricks, tarring roofs, hanging electric wires, excavating natural gas and sewage lines, cutting and clearing trees, and bulldozing the landscape for housing developments [Who is this argument against?].

It's not an argument against anything. It's pointing out the reality. Facts. I know, Erin, facts confuse you and make you feel all wobbly inside. Don't worry. You can stick your head back in the sand very soon.

> It is men who heft and weld the giant steel beams that frame our office buildings, and it is men who do the hair-raising work of insetting and sealing the finely tempered plate-glass windows of skyscrapers 50 stories tall [Ok.]. Every day along the Delaware River in Philadelphia, one can watch the passage of vast oil tankers and towering cargo ships arriving from all over the world [Don't mention that you hang out in Philadelphia; undermines credibility].

Aw, no argument left? Just an insult against Philadelphia?

How very, very clever.

> These stately colossi are loaded, steered, and off-loaded by men. The modern economy, with its vast production and distribution network, is a male epic, in which women have found a productive role—but women were not its author [They just made every man who ever existed inside of their bodies; nbd]. Surely, modern women are strong enough now to give credit where credit is due!

Hey, looky, looky. We actually agree! Women's greatest contribution to society is to be a mother to children.

They made every man who ever existed. Erin, you do realize that human reproduction requires that icky ejaculate you were grossing out over not so long ago, right?

Women: they made every man

Men: they made every man AND THE WHOLE FUCKING ECONOMY, TOO.

Credit?

It's due.

Lots of love,

JB

Employee writes AVFM to defend Oblong Industries

Paul Elam · 18 December 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Yesterday Robert O'Hara penned a news story about a company in California, Oblong Industries, which has segregated parking areas for employees by sex based on the erroneous idea that women are more prone to being victims of violence than men, and thus should have a parking area closer to the main building.

Today I received an email from Pete, who says he is an Oblong employee and who indeed wrote me from an Oblong email address. I wanted to share this with readers, as well as my response to it. PE

Hello. I'm writing in response to your recent article about discrimination at Oblong.

First, some introduction and disclosure.

I'm a male employee at Oblong. I manage the web site and noticed the link to our page in the analytics this morning. I haven't spoken to management and these comments are my own.

I'm no stranger to discrimination against men. 5 years ago, I learned my wife was having an affair with my boss. Despite my best efforts to keep the family together, she filed for divorce and took full custody of our two children. Despite her reckless behavior, the law sided with the mother. The incident soured my professional career. I left the company, and my children now live with their mother and my former boss. I was not an absent father, but extremely close to my children and their upbringing. It's taken some good counseling to move forward, but I'm good now.

My initial reaction to your article was shock. I admit, I did not find the parking policy offensive when it was announced–ignorance on my part I see. Regardless of safety/distance, it's clear the policy is flawed, but definitely not enough to merit this kind of public backlash. Had the issue been raised internally (and there are many clear ways for that to happen), it most definitely would have been changed without incident. No one is ever in danger for speaking out here.

You should more fully understand this company and how it really treats its employees (male or female) before speaking out so heavily against it.

I have worked here for over two years, and of all the companies I've worked for (these include ad agencies, design studios, large software companies, and large universities), Oblong is the last place I would associate with discrimination. It is the most human corporation I know. Employees are treated like real people. Vacation and health benefits are above average. Parking and bus passes are paid for. There are 6 spaces in front of the building that are clearly open for anyone in particular need: late for a meeting, parking after dark, ankle sprain or other issue, wife expecting a baby, etc. These–which are far closer than any others–are almost exclusively used by the men who work here.

We eat together 3 days a week——food prepared by a male chef who makes some of the best food I've eaten in LA. We hold weekly all-hands meetings where everyone is allowed a voice in open forum. Employees frequently call into question company policies, great and small. We are encouraged openly to voice our opinions on even the most sensitive issues. Management has an open door policy (and is comprised of both male and female officers). They are thoughtful, humble, empathetic, and the antithesis of oppressive.

Not long after I started working here, my CEO learned that my children were coming to visit me in California (a rarity for me). He immediately offered his own home to me and my kids so that we could be closer to the beach. That's the kind of management that runs this company.

Surely, there are better examples of discimination you could bring to light than Oblong. We are a young start up building meaningful tools. It is the kind of company your group should want to succeed. Come and visit our lab. I'd be happy to take your around myself and show you what it's like here. It's more like a home to me, and the employees here are like family regardless of gender, age, race, or other affiliation.

END OF EMAIL

My response:

Hello Pete,

Thank you for writing regarding Robert O'Hara's story on the parking policy at Oblong Industries.

First, let me express my sympathies concerning the circumstances of your divorce and the impact it had on you and your children. As you might imagine I hear countless similar stories in the course of my work. Each one is personal tragedy.

I am thankful to hear, though, that at least you are being given important support by company management. In that respect I am pleased but not at all surprised to hear that Oblong is a great employer, demonstrating otherwise good values and treating their employees as valued, equal members of a team sharing a vision of growth and prosperity.

I am sure that many of the principles guiding Oblong Industries are quite similar to those embraced by A Voice for Men.

Be that as it may, Oblong being a really great place in some respects does not and should not exempt it from criticism where it is due. This is particularly true of criticism that speaks directly to the core values of equal and fair treatment regardless of sex or other distinguishing factors that have long been the source of discrimination in our society.

With all respect to your well reasoned, articulate and moving defense of your company, the rationale that we should not treat such a blatant example of sex discrimination as a news story, and that we should not take issue with it, falls completely flat on me.

Wrong, is wrong Pete, and we don't correct wrongs until we start pointing them out.

There have been countless excuses through history of targeting groups for different treatment. From separate water fountains to blanket exclusion from different kinds of employment our culture is replete with examples of treating people differently based on one particular identifying characteristic or another. Many if not all of these unfortunate customs were based on misguided but nonetheless prevailing ideas of decency and propriety. Your egregious treatment in family court was a supreme example of this kind of bigotry in action. The harm that you and your children endured was based on the prejudiced idea that their mother deserved special treatment.

All of these forms of discrimination are wrong and they all ultimately cause damage. This is no less true for Oblong Industries.

As with most or all other forms of class discrimination, the rationale for justifying the Oblong parking policy was erroneous in the first place. It is men, not women, who are at greater risk of experiencing violence on all levels in every area of our society. Thus the policy itself is a perpetuation of stereotypes and disinformation which benefit one group at the expense of another. All of Oblong's admittedly good deeds do not change that, nor do they issue a pass for Oblong to ignore its own mistakes.

I appreciate your good words in informing me that Oblong Industries is the kind of environment where employees can speak up about any issue that concerns them without fear of reprisal. However, I must also point out that we first learned of your company policy from one of your own employees who was not comfortable speaking up or being identified by us. Perhaps the spirit of openness is not as pervasive at Oblong as you might believe?

At any rate, I do want to thank you again for writing, and for speaking to the issue at hand as well as for the acknowledgment of error in the policies at your company which clearly discriminate against male employees and extend undue privilege to females. Now that we have a shared understanding of the basics, we at A Voice for Men will wait to see if Oblong Industries corrects its mistake, and more fully joins a society standing against sex discrimination, or if it will settle for the complacent acceptance of a bad and unjust policy.

Kind regards,

Paul Elam
Publisher, A Voice for Men

Indian Feminist Diplomat arrested for visa fraud and paying low wages to domestic help.

Anil Kumar · 18 December 2013 · Archived copy · Original

It is a myth that empowered women are sympathetic to poor women. More women CEOs, Presidents or diplomats will in no way change the condition of poor women, just the way more male CEOs or Presidents do not make any difference to poor homeless men.

US Government followed its law and arrested Deputy Consul General of India at New York Devyani Khobragade for alleged Visa fraud, and for lying to the government, as she paid only $3.31 per hour to her Indian maid, much less than what is legally permissible in New York. She was strip searched as per standard procedures. Now, India's Home Minister Sushil Shinde has gone crazy. India summoned US ambassador at New Delhi Nancy Powell to protest.

It is to be noted that India openly violates International Conventions and US laws by refusing to return US Citizen Children, who are illegally taken to India by one of the parents violating custody orders of US Courts. FBI lists this crime as parental kidnapping.

For example, if an Indian woman is married to an American citizen and the child is born in US, then, she cannot just fly to India carrying the child during a marital dispute as the child belongs to both parents and the child is a citizen of USA by birth. Only courts in the US have the right to decide about custody arrangements and well-being of a child since that child is a US citizen. International Conventions like tge Hague Convention on this issue are very clear about it. The Indian Government violates these conventions openly, while it criticizes US Government for doing what is legal in their own country in this issue of low wages to maid.

It is to be noted that Indian Government and its police subject its own citizens including women to worst form of humiliation and harassment in false dowry cases or what is known as false cases of section 498a. Now, the same India is complaining when US Govt arrested this Indian woman for Visa fraud.

Devayani Khobragade is a women's rights activist and if she has employed a servant to work in her house full time for such a low wage then it is almost like modern day slavery. It also underscores the point that modern Indian working women are used to paying low wages to female servants in India. This is due to huge rich-poor gap in India. A working woman in America cannot afford such luxuries of employing full time servants. When these Indian women migrate to USA or work in USA with a Green Card etc, they think of getting a servant (often a poor woman) from India to work in their home in US, because these poor women are much cheaper than a domestic help of American origin.

Huffington Post Reports (link):

> According to an employment contract obtained by NDTV, the nanny — an Indian national named Sangeeta Richard — was supposed to be paid $4,500 per month (as stated in her U.S. visa), but Khobragade later changed the salary to $537 a month. Prosecutors say this means Khobragade provided false documents to the U.S. government and committed visa fraud. Khobragade's lawyers are arguing that since she earns only $4,000 monthly, she paid the nanny what she could afford, NDTV reports.

The Indian women employing such low-wage servants may even feel that she is being noble and generous for providing free food and accommodation in a developed country to the poor Indian woman. However, the poor servant has to live in US with literally no rights, as she is given very low wages. Furthermore, she cannot walk out of house in that alien land, if she is discriminated against or abused by her "employer."

Recently, the wife of a member of Indian Parliament is arrested for murdering her servant. Abuse of servants by Indian women whether in India or in middle-east, where there is significant Indian population, is regular news.

Times of India Reports (link):

> The wife of a Bahujan Samaj Party (BSP) parliamentarian was arrested Tuesday for allegedly torturing her maid to death and beating another minor servant with sticks and rods, police said. Jagriti Singh, wife of Dhananjay Singh, who represents Jaunpur in Uttar Pradesh, was arrested on Tuesday and booked under the sections of murder, attempt to murder and the Juvenile Justice Act for beating and torturing her maid Rakhi (35) and Rampal (17) for days.

At this point of time, the Indian Government should try to educate privileged Indian women to stop treating fellow women as slaves, and give detailed guidelines to Indian women in US or middle-east who are hiring these poor women as domestic servants. Instead of doing that the Indian Government is raking up the issue of strip-search of a diplomat and trying to mislead the people in India. This is election year and the ruling Congress Party's Government wants to show to Indian people that as far as dignity of its women are concerned, India can take on world's no. 1 super power.

The security and barricades around US embassy at New Delhi are reduced and the Government has asked the diplomatic staff and their family members to surrender their special id cards. Some politicians have gone to the extent of threatening to imprison the same-sex partners of US diplomatic staff by saying that homosexuality is illegal in India and by living with same sex partners, the US diplomatic staff have violated the law of the land.

It is to be noted that the Indian Government and Indian police treat their own citizens in the worst possible manner. Recently, the 60 year old mother of a Men's Rights Activist was detained in a police station in South Indian state of Tamil Nadu for more than 9 hours, and she was used as a hostage to threaten the activist and his old father.

In 2012, more than 47,000 women were arrested without evidence or investigation by Indian police under section 498a of Indian Penal code. They are presumed guilty until proven innocent. The reason for these arrests is to facilitate blackmailing of the women's male relatives, including their sons or brothers, by police and the wife's relatives.

In Delhi's "crime against women" cells, the Indian Government and judiciary openly facilitate blackmailing and extortion of husbands and their female family members to facilitate out-of-court settlements in marital disputes under the threats of arrests of husband and his family members in false cases of section 498a. When civil courts or family courts exist for settling marital disputes and for deciding alimony or out of court settlements, the Indian Government uses its police and bogus criminal laws to indulge in illegal activity and extortion of its citizens including humiliating female members of husband's family.

The speaker of Indian Parliament, Meira Kumar has openly come out in support of such laws and procedures.

Now, the same Indian Government and media are claiming that the servant of this Indian diplomat blackmailed her for a compensation of $10,000 and facilitation of a special US VISA which would have helped her live in US.

Times of India reports (link):

> July 8: Khobragade, who had also filed a complaint of theft against the maid, is called to an immigration lawyer's office where she is asked by the maid to shell out $10,000, convert her official passport into an ordinary one and help with her visa which would allow her to live in the US. Angered by these tactics, India revokes her passport. She was now living illegally in the US.

My 50 top stories about men and boys' inequality from 2013 (part 1)....

Glen Poole · 18 December 2013 · Archived copy · Original

JANUARY

1. We don't spend equal amounts of money trying to cure male cancer

We've long known that we spend less time, money and energy trying to improve men's health. In January the Prostate Cancer charity revealed that we are still spending 3x less money on male cancer research than female cancer research, in spite of the gap being closed in recent years by the huge fundraising success of Movember. In the same month, new data revealed that men remain at significantly greater risk of developing cancer and dying from cancer.

2. Working class white boys are less likely to get to university

Also in January the Universities Minister, David Willetts, called on Universities to do more to help working-class white boys access further education after university applications from men fell by 22,000 and the university entry rate for men fell four times faster than the entry rate for women. Mary Curnock Cook, the head of the admissions service, Ucas, warned that men are becoming a disadvantaged group who are a third less likely to get to university. According to Cook the university gender gap will continue to grow and will be wider for boys and men from poorer backgrounds.

3. Beat up your boyfriend phone app causes outrage

'Boyfriend Trainer', a new free app which encouraged girls to domestically abuse their boyfriends caused outrage in January for encouraging women to electrocute, hit and mace a virtual boyfriend after he does annoying things – such as leaving his clothes lying about on the floor. It was made available through Apple, whom The Telegraph said had previously had "a good track record at disallowing apps which in any promote violence against women". Louise McCudden in The Independent said "sexism against both genders feeds off itself. Sexism against men is facilitated by sexism against women; sexism against women is justified by sexism against men."

FEBRUARY

4. Welsh nurses call for men's health strategy to tackle health inequality

In February the Royal College of Nursing in Wales (RCN) said that the principality needed a strategy to reduce men's high level of preventable, premature death. According to the RCN, 40% of men die before the age of 75, but many of these premature male deaths could be avoided if systems were put in place that would help them access the treatment that they need.

5. Top judge admits to House of Lords she unfairly demonized campaigning dads

In February the former High Court Judge and cross-bench peer confessed to the House the Lords she'd lied to them about the campaign group Fathers 4 Justice. In December 2012, Baroness Elizabeth Butler-Sloss told the House that she's received death threats from the group, a claim that was repeated in the national media. She put the record straight saying that while she had received threats, they weren't made by the group. Nadine O'Connor of Fathers 4 Justice said:

"The making of false allegations within the family courts is something that our fathers have to deal with on a daily basis, so as an organisation we were extremely upset about the allegations that were made against us."

6. A new political party launches for men and boys

February saw the launch of a new political party that aims to focus entirely on men's issues. Justice For Men and Boys (and the women who love them) is a right-wing, anti-feminist party that aims to contest the 30 most marginal Conservative seats in the 2015. The party, run by Mike Buchanan, has published a draft manifesto with proposals in 20 areas including paternal access to children, education, employment, paternity fraud, domestic abuse and abortion law reform. You can offer your feedback on the proposals, and suggestions for other proposals to be included election manifesto for the 2015 general election at the J4MB website.

7. Young Men are less optimistic than young women

According to researchers at Durham University, men aged 16 to 24 are unhappy, unhopeful and deeply pessimistic about their future prospects. They have more negative expectations than their counterparts in the 1970s and 1980s and a bleaker outlook than young women from the same background. I reference the research in an article I wrote in Telegraph about the inequalities faced by young men later in the year.

8. Negative stereotypes are causing boys to underperform at school

In February, Bonny Hartley from the University of Kent released her latest findings on the impact that negative stereotypes have on boys performance at school. Her study found that girls from age 4 and boys from age 7 believe (and think adults believe) that boys are academically inferior to girls. She further found that when children aged 7-8 are told that boys tend to do worse than girls at school then boys' test scores fall. She further found that this "stereotype threat" can be counteracted. When children aged 6-9 were told that boys and girls were expected to perform similarly, the performance of boys improved. Hartley's earlier research warned teachers against fueling the gender gap in education by reinforcing negative stereotypes about boys.

To be continued…

Editor's note: People who've read the book "Equality For Men" are saying it's a "skillfully produced," "compelling," "really great," "truly excellent" book that "focuses on the main point brilliantly" and should be "mandatory reading." The best way to find out why is click here to buy Equality For Men by Glen Poole. –DE

Everybody jump on the rape train – Daily Mail's Jennifer Smith is the conductor

Paul Elam · 18 December 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Someone just emailed me a link to a Daily Mail article by Jennifer Smith reporting on the "torrent of death threats and sexist remarks," (apparently one comes with the other) that was allegedly unleashed on journalist Carolina Criado-Perez after she advocated for images of women being placed on British bank notes. A man and a women have been arrested and will soon be charged. They either tweeted something offensive, or threatening, or sexist, or something else altogether. The article did not say if the woman or the man threatened to rape Criado-Perez.

It is really hard to tell what precisely is alleged given that Smith did not cite the content of any of the tweets.

That is correct. An entire article in Daily Mail about criminal proceedings against people for making illegal tweets, only it did not include, you know, the tweets. To make matters worse Smith rambled through her piece never quite making up her mind whether the tweets were actual threats, or offensive or sexist or all three. She just kind of traded the terms back and forth like she was in a creative noun contest, and to make sure readers were confused as to what actually happened. That tends to happen when you don't tell them what actually happened. Or when you are making it up as you go along.

The article was also replete with other forms of confusion, not all of which was Smith's fault, but which she could have clarified a little more by bothering to ask the right questions. For example, this passage:

> Detectives ruled there was insufficient evidence to prosecute one suspect, while another who is accused of sending offensive messages to Stella Creasy MP will avoid sentencing as prosecution 'would not be in the public interest'.

Hmm, what could be in the public interest here? Maybe not prosecuting people who have not committed crimes? Maybe not turning satire or internet taunting into a legitimate rape threat only to find out that things like actual criminal codes and the like will get in your way if you want to prosecute someone?

Yeah, public interest. That's the ticket. The public isn't interested in it because it is pure bullshit.

The story is not a new one. It goes back several months before the Crown started to showboat the latest feminist outrage with the current witchhunt. Typhon gave it a brief treatment in a video back on August 1.

It is really hard to add anything here to what Typhon just pointed out. It is just a lot of obscure allegations about tweets that can be found by the millions all over the internet, and which are aimed at everyone and their brother. It is a part of modern life in the age of the internet. If you speak up about anything, someone will tweet you badly for it.

Most of us just get over it. Feminists play it like a cheap violin. You can bet your ass some woman will be on a £100 note now that the feminists have figured out how to damsel their way into it.

It is time to add to the lexicon, and we might as well give credit where it is due. This technique of using damseling to achieve goals that are quite likely stupid or worthless, like choosing people to be on currency because they have a vagina, or raising a cool $160,000 to make YouTube videos about video games that you don't even play can only be called one thing. A Sarkeesian.

I know, it is awkward, and it presents challenges. Am I really going to find myself typing words like Sarkeessianed, or Sarkeesianing? Well, yes, I am, because this is how third wave feminists are going to find support for their pet projects now that governments are starting to figure out just how much they cost. And now that white knighting and woman firsting is all the social rage, it will deliver in spades.

Want to raise a quarter mil to study the incidence of sexist remarks in Quentin Tarantino movies? Just start blogging and tweeting your intentions. When the inevitable jokester tweets that Tarantino should rape you, get the screen shot and tell your tearful story to Jennifer Smith. She'll announce your KickStarter and the next thing you know you will be taking notes on Django Unchained from your cabana in Antigua.

Do the Sarkeesian. You could laugh right in the face of your most avid supporters and blow their money on cocaine and Stoly. They won't even know the difference.

In this day and age, this is what we call being oppressed.

Elizabeth Sheehy can't even justify herself

Diana Davison and John Hembling · 18 December 2013 · Archived copy · Original

When responses started flooding in to the Ottawa Citizen article about a new book by law professor, Elizabeth Sheehy, the professor had a choice; face the criticism bluntly or weasel out of her responsibility. Sheehy is a feminist so she chose the latter option.

A Voice For Men and Barbara Kay, writing for The National Post, both addressed the insanity of Sheehy's recommendations in her book Battered Women on Trial but it was Kay's article that moved the good professor to explain herself. And what a treat that was. The recommendations Sheehy put forth are quickly summarized as follows:

1. Battered women who kill their spouses should not be tried for murder.
2. They should not go to jail as they have already been "prisoners of war" in their own homes.
3. We should refine the definition of "excessive force" to allow women who kill sleeping men the ability to claim self defence.
4. Charging women, who have murdered men, with murder is "arbitrary"

Surprisingly, the Canadian public are not yet ready to tolerate a public academic and legal scholar advocating the murder of their sons, brothers, husbands, or male colleagues. Barbara Kay's own rejection of Sheehy's intellectually bankrupt ideology seems to have hit its mark, but actually gave the morally-depraved professor entirely too much credit.

Where Kay excused her with the comment that "[w]hen ideology takes up the brain space normally reserved for reason and the golden principle of equality under the law, the very best minds can go AWOL" Elizabeth Sheehy should not be coddled as one of "the very best minds". Despite that misplaced generosity by Kay, she correctly points out that the existing "theory" called Battered Woman Syndrome, used to excuse murder and other violence by claimed abuse victims, is essentially a pile of shit.

> In fact, "battered woman syndrome" (BWS) is merely a theory, with the "science" behind it too flimsy to support any change to the legal codes. (See David M. Paciocco's 1999 book, Getting Away with Murder: the Canadian criminal justice system. Ironically, Paciocco was a colleague of Sheehy's at Ottawa U's law faculty.) Moreover, BWS has been rejected in other high courts, such as Australia's, which used Canada as a (negative) precedent.

The University of Ottawa's murder advocate replied "I wish I were the radical that columnist Barbara Kay claims I am in her column".

That's the first line of Sheehy's "defence" of her own position, and she's already lying. Barbara Kay does not claim Sheehy is a radical. The word "radical" appears nowhere in Kay's criticism. Rather, the columnist correctly identifies Sheehy as follows:

> She is an ideologue, whose gender-biased advocacy has been honoured by the Canadian Bar Association. Which begs the questions: How can a Bar Association throw centuries of hard-won legal protections out the window in the name of political correctness? And how can a faculty of law endorse such intellectual corruption in their classrooms?

Sheehy next positions herself as no more than simply a reporter of the news.

> I am a rather boring law professor who knows history and the law. The Ottawa Citizen reported that I said women are justified in killing their abusers, even if they are asleep or passed out. The thing is, back in 1982, a

> Nova Scotia jury of Jane Stafford's peers said just that, when they acquitted her of murder after a lengthy trial for the death of her husband Billy Stafford — of Life With Billy fame.

The thing is, Professor Sheehy, for a rather "boring" law professor, you absolutely have had a lot to do with shaping the current law that resulted in those acquittals.

I don't find her boring at all. Sheehy has an impressive feminist biography that outlines her extensive involvement with Women's Legal Education and Action Fund (LEAF) which has been, arguably, the most aggressive organization in lobbying for changes to the law. "As intervenors at the Supreme Court of Canada, LEAF has argued that…women who murder their husbands who battered them may have a defence of battered women's syndrome."

Where Sheehy tells us she's just studying legal history, absolving herself of responsibility for what the courts have already decided, it is a contemptuous farce. LEAF credits Sheehy with being "involved in many law reform activities around equality rights and social justice issues and was a co-counsel for LEAF in its intervention in R v JA ("advance consent" to sexual assault) (2011 SCC 28)."

The professor would have us believe that it's not her who thinks battered women should get away with murder, it is merely a precedent set by a jury of our peers and a Canadian Supreme Court judge. She doesn't think it's important that she was key in instituting the laws that caused them to reach those decisions. Let us make this clear: Sheehy claiming that the acquittal of women who have murdered isn't her fault is like Charles Manson claiming he didn't kill anyone because he, himself, never held the knife.

How stupid does she think we are?

Sheehy backpedals with "I would never advocate homicide and I don't in my book. Instead, I ask readers to judge for themselves." She pretends that her book isn't advocating a pro-murder position at all. All of Sheehy's hard work devoted to changing the legal system, for which she has won an award, is shoved in the closet when people start asking questions. "Who, me? I'm just a boring nobody," says the serial killer. In fact, isn't that what the neighbours always say after the fact? "He looked like an average guy."

Now, rather than making a moral argument for pre-emptive murder, Sheehy is attempting to downplay her own published position as if it's merely a legalistic weather report.

We are being asked to ignore what The Ottawa Citizen reported:

> Would it not be just, Sheehy asks, "to shift the risk of death to those men whose aggressions have created such dehumanizing fear in their female partners?"

> Battered women can justly kill abusive partners "because a woman in that circumstance has already lived in captivity," she said. "She's already lived in a form of imprisonment and enslavement in a relationship like that."

> Sheehy was pleasantly surprised by the higher-than-expected number who were either acquitted or had charges dropped. But she said it was "disappointing and worrisome" to see how many women had pleaded guilty.

> Mandatory minimums are a "huge, huge barrier" to justice for battered women who kill their abusers, she said.

But forget what you just read. Elizabeth Sheehy is in control of history and she wishes to delete her own words from the public record. She's studied history and, as a feminist, is well aware that it can be rewritten. Let's call this the Herstory of Elizabeth Sheehy, in which she is completely innocent of advancing any personal agenda or exercising her position to install a pussy pass for murder into the legal system.

So how long has Sheehy been corroding equality in the law? From a downloadable doc about a seminar she gave:

> Elizabeth Sheehy has worked in the area of legal defences for battered women who kill for 20 years; she too worked on the SDR and has participated in research and publications with respect to reform of the law of self-defence. For example, her publications include:
>
> * Thrice Punished: Battered Women, Criminal Law and Disinheritance (2004) 8 Southern Cross University Law Review 96. With Barbara Hamilton.
>
> * Battered Women and Mandatory Minimum Sentencing (2001) 39 Osgoode Hall Law Journal 529.
>
> * Review of the Self-Defence Review (2000) 12 Canadian Journal of Women and the Law 197.
>
> * The Response of the Canadian Association of Elizabeth Fry Societies to: Reforming Criminal Code Defences. Provocation, Self-Defence and Defence of Property. (Ottawa: Canadian Association of Elizabeth Fry Societies, 2000).
>
> * Stop Excusing Violence Against Women! NAWL=s Position Paper on the Defence of Provocation. With Andrée Côté and Diana Majury. (Ottawa: National Association of Women and the Law, 2000).
>
> * What Would a Women's Law of Self-Defence Look Like? (Ottawa: Status of Women Canada, 1995).
>
> * Developments in Canadian Law after R. v. Lavallee in Women, Male Violence and the Law, Julie Stubbs, ed. (Sydney: Institute of Criminology, 1994) 174.
>
> * Defending Battered Women on Trial: The Battered Woman Syndrome and Its Limitations (1992) 16:6 Criminal Law Review 387. With Julie Stubbs and Julia Tolmie.

And what was the aim of her seminar?

"This course is aimed at both preparing future lawyers –that is, you!— to defend battered women caught up in the criminal justice system and at developing a package of materials to aid defence lawyers charged with this important task."

How's the weather up there, Elizabeth?

In her lame attempt to defend her own arguments, this law professor has shimmied from a moral argument to an economic one. She explains her real concern is not helping women legalize murder but to pose an intriguing question of resources: "Is it an appropriate expenditure of taxpayer dollars to prosecute battered women [who murder] at full tilt, in light of the compassionate response of Canadian judges and jurors who hear all the evidence?"

See? Its not about whether killing your spouse is justified, or morally defensible, it's just cheaper if we don't prosecute women who kill. Perhaps the University of Ottawa will grant Sheehy an honorary degree so she can teach economics next semester.

In regards to whether or not battered women should be given the opportunity to murder with impunity, we should look closely at the honesty of their advocates. As it stands, Elizabeth Sheehy can not even justify herself.

My 50 top stories about men and boys' inequality from 2013 (part 2)....

Glen Poole · 19 December 2013 · Archived copy · Original

MARCH

9. More male victims of rape come forward in wake of Jimmy Saville case

It's difficult to find anything positive to say about the Jimmy Saville sex scandal but one upside appears to be that more male victims of rape and sexual abuse are reaching out for help. The trend was revealed in an interview with Duncan Craig who set up Survivors Manchester in 2009 after he was turned away from local rape support services himself for being a man. Duncan's doing great work in Manchester and tragically the majority of towns and cities in the country don't have a local support service for male victims.

10. 92% of allegations are made by women are false

Keir Starmer QC, the Director of Public Prosecutions, confirmed that false allegations of rape can and do happen and must be treated seriously and that in 92% of cases people suspected of making a false allegation of rape or sexual abuse are women.

Allegations can ruin reputations and devastate lives, Starmer added. "Such cases will be dealt with robustly and those falsely accused should feel confident that the criminal justice system will prosecute these cases wherever there is sufficient evidence and it is in the public interest to do so."

However some campaigners were concerned that Starmer downplayed the scale of the problem of false allegations.

11. Male nursery worker subjected to sexism from female colleagues

Sexism cuts both ways and in March, John Warren, who is a regional manager for a chain of children's nurseries, revealed how he was the victim sexism in his early career.

John was bullied throughout his training by his teacher for being a man; he was unable to do a required placement in a special baby unit because he was a man and after applying for 42 jobs without getting an interview he was told that "mothers didn't want a man looking after their children".

Fortunately, John stuck with his career choice and is now a champion for boys in particular to have more time with male role models.

12. National Union of Students wages war on lads

The National Union of Students declared war on lads after a self-selecting survey of female students came to the conclusion that sexism, laddism and sexual harassment are such serious problems on campus that the Women and Equalities Minister Jo Swinson should "convene a summit on 'lad culture'."

Meanwhile, the NUS remained silent about the fact that women are now a third more likely to get to university and the gender gap is widening. According Mary Curnock Cook, the head of the university admissions service, Ucas, the "gap between males and females" is worrying and they are "beginning to look at men as looking more like the disadvantaged group".

Meanwhile Patrick Hayes at Spiked Online revealed that the NUS's survey sample was unrepresentative with participants being around 9 times more likely to be feminists than the rest of the population.

13. Men in the criminal justice system are treated more harshly than women

The Guardian commentator, Ally Fogg, delivered an excellent response to plans to treat women in the criminal justice system less harshly. Fogg supported the idea of prison reform but was at a loss to understand why these reforms should only apply to women. In a thoroughly researched article Fogg revealed that:

"Women make up more than a third of formal police cautions and nearly a quarter of court defendants, but fewer than 5% of prisoners. Even when all other factors are taken into consideration, women are significantly less likely to be imprisoned at all, and receive shorter average sentences than men for the same offences."

A similar trend is seen with boys who account for "81% of child offenders, and 95% of those in custody".

14. Men in Europe dying 7.5 years sooner than women

Research by the World Health Organization revealed that the life expectancy gap between men and women is 7.5 years on average in Europe. While life expectancy is improving, men have not yet reached the average rise in years of life that women enjoyed back in 1980.

Prof Alan White, chairman of the Men's Health Forum and professor of men's health at Leeds Metropolitan University, said: "men are not programmed to die young. Although the survival gap between men and women has always been present it does not have to be so wide."

Previous research by Professor White's team had found that men in Europe are twice as likely to die before the age of 65.

15. Labour Party supports mums but not dads

The Labour Party, which aspires to be a "one nation" party, revealed itself to be more of a "one gender" party in March. The party responded to news that the the Coalition Government is making a real terms cut in both maternity and paternity pay from 2013/2014 by launching a #MumsNotMillionaires campaign and ignoring dads in the process.

I responded to the news on my Helping Men blog as follows:

"The #MumsNotMillionaires campaign sits within a much broader campaign to present Government cuts as having a greater personal impact on women than men.

"Whether it's The Fawcett Society describing the Government's austerity measures as the biggest threat to women's rights in "living memory" or Unison campaigning "to stop women being ground down by the government's devastating cuts", the idea that the cuts are a gender issues is a political meme that has taken hold."

This is in spite of the fact that the number of men in work fell at nearly 50 times the rate for women from 2008-2012 (with 387,000 fewer men in the workplace compared with 8,000 fewer women).

16. Disgraced MP highlights archaic law that only women can use against men

The bizarre case of the disgraced MP, Chris Huhne, who avoided a driving ban by asking his wife to take a speeding fine for him, brought to light the archaic and sexist law of marital coercion. Under the law wives (but not husbands) can claim that they only broke the law because their spouse coerced them.

Huhne's ex-wife, Vicky Pryce, brought the matter to light after the couple had split. Both Huhne and Pryce received eight-month prison sentences after it emerged that she had taken driving penalty points for him a decade ago. The former energy secretary pleaded guilty on the first day of a planned joint trial in February, and economist Pryce was later convicted by a jury. Both have now been released from jail.

In a bizarre twist in the tale, Britain's most high-profile black woman judge, Constance Briscoe—who was a friend and neighbour of Vicky Pryce—was accused of working with a Sunday newspaper to bring down Chris Huhne.

Briscoe has now been suspended and charged with perverting the course of justice and will stand trial in January 2014.

17. £4 million Government funding ignores 4 million male victims

Charities helping male victims continued to be excluded from the Government's Rape Crisis Fund in 2013. Minister Helen Grant announced £4 million in funding to open four new rape crisis centres and secure 65 existing centres.

Martyn Sullivan, the chief executive of Mankind Counselling in Brighton, said: “We welcome any funding that supports victims of rape and sexual abuse but it saddens us that yet again little thought has been given to adult male survivors of sexual crimes.

“The Government’s own figures estimates that 1 in 9 males have suffered childhood sexual abuse and 1 in 29 have experienced rape in adulthood. With this decision, they have chosen to ignore the 3.8 million actual men and boys that these figures represent.

18. Charity sector blocks family law reform

Karen Woodall, formerly of the Centre for Separated Families, continued to be one of the fiercest critics of the way we deal with family breakdown in the UK. In March she claimed that Government plans to reform family law had been blocked by the charity sector saying:

“It has taken less than three years to arrive at a place where all the voices speaking for fathers, whole family support and collaborative services to separating parents have been silenced at the policy tables.

“There is a massive mismatch between what governments believe happens to families when they separate and the reality. That mismatch is created and furthered by a ‘sector’ which sits around the government.

“Despite administration changes, business as usual continues. And that business as usual has got absolutely nothing whatsoever to do with supporting fathers or ensuring that children maintain their relationships with both of their parents.

“Despite its promises of a brave new world, this government has created an illusion that something has changed, whilst changing nothing at all. Apart from removing all the voices that spoke for change and silencing all the support for separated fathers”.

To be continued…

Editor’s note: People who’ve read the book “Equality For Men” are saying it’s a “skillfully produced,” “compelling,” “really great,” “truly excellent” book that “focuses on the main point brilliantly” and should be “mandatory reading.” The best way to find out why is click here to buy Equality For Men by Glen Poole. –DE

My 50 top stories about men and boys' inequality from 2013 (part 3)....

Glen Poole · 20 December 2013 · Archived copy · Original

APRIL

19. Campaigner for equal rights of male victims kills himself

April saw the sudden death by apparent suicide of the Canadian men's rights campaigner Earl Silverman. Silverman was a victim of domestic abuse at the hands of his former wife and struggled to access help:

"When I went into the community looking for some support services, I couldn't find any. There were a lot for women, and the only programs for men were for anger management," he said recently. "As a victim, I was re-victimized by having these services telling me that I wasn't a victim, but I was a perpetrator."

Three years ago Silverman set out to help other men in his position by turning his own home in Calgary into the Men's Alternative Safe House (MASH). Around 20 men, some with children, used the service before it closed last month.

Silverman, who self-funded the venture, was unable to keep up with the bills and closed the shelter and sold his home last month. He was found hanging in the garage.

Around $5,000 was raised by men's rights activists in the wake of the death to establish and Earl Silverman Center for male victims of domestic violence, though the future of this project remains uncertain.

I wrote a tribute to Earl Silverman at the Good Men Project and was impressed with Ally Fogg's "need knows no gender" article in The Independent.

20. Scouting and Guiding confirm their sexism towards men

In 2013 the Guides declared itself to be the "ultimate feminist organisation" with the arrival of its new chief executive, Julie Bentley who aims to "use her frontline campaign experience to direct Girlguiding UK's growing work to give girls a voice on the social issues impacting girls' futures.

The worldwide Scouting and Guiding movement, founded in England, has more than 40 million members and attracts more nations to its global "Jamborees" than the Summer Olympics. It is an internationally significant movement and we now have a situation in the UK where Scouting is concerned about women and girls being equally represented at every level—but doesn't consider gender issues from a male or female perspective. Meanwhile, Guiding is taking a much more gender conscious approach in terms of issues like violence against women and girls, but doesn't concern itself with the equal representation of men and boys in the movement and in fact bans men from its leadership.

Bentley has so far defended the status quo telling the BBC that girls need access to girl-only spaces and girls should also have the choice to join the Scouts. Some girls join both Scouts and Guides but male-only spaces are now banned from the movement.

I explored the changing gender landscape in Scouting/Guiding in my Good Men Project feature "who took the boy out of boy scouts?"

21. Girl Writes What lectures Libertarians on gender equality

This is not so much a news story rather a plug for one of the most consistently watchable anti-feminist thinkers on gender issues in the English-speaking world. Karen Straughan is a divorced Canadian mother of three who has become a YouTube hit with the men's rights community under the screen name girlwriteswhat.

In April, Karen got out of the kitchen (where she films most of her broadcasts) and headed to New York to lecture the Libertarians on gender equality. The talk is particularly notable for the refutation of the idea that men oppress women in the way that whites oppressed blacks.

You can see Karen's lecture on YouTube and read the transcript on her blog.

22. 70% of child abductors are mothers

The Guardian carried interviews with two fathers whose children had been abducted by their mothers.

According the article the number of children abducted and taken abroad by a parent has risen by 88% in just under a decade, according to official government figures. About 270 new cases were reported in 2003-4, while last year there were more than 500 new reported cases. According to the charity Reunite International, in 70% of cases the abductor is the mother.

The Rights of Man blog reminded readers that the BBC had previously published a story revealing that "74% of people thought fathers were most likely to abduct their children".

23. Feminist campaigners oppose university men's group

The University of Toronto became a symbolic battleground in the gender wars in 2013 with violent opposition to a series of talks by leading experts on men's issues rapidly becoming a cause célèbre for men's rights activists around the globe.

A broadcast by CityNews Toronto described this controversy as "an ugly battle…a battle of the sexes [that] includes allegations of hate speech, free speech, bullying, harassment [and] even violence".

The video footage of feminist protestors trying to prevent Dr. Warren Farrell, the creator of the proposed White House Council on Boys & Men, from delivering a talk on 'the boy crisis in education', was certainly shocking.

I wrote about the story at the Good Men Project and facilitated a public discussion between two men on opposing sides of the debate.

24. University Men's Officers still opposed by sexist NUS

The debate over whether University student unions should have men's officers bubbled up again in 2013 in Manchester. One male student, Matt Fenton, proposed that the union should have a men's officer but the idea was rejected by the union assembly. The student newspaper, The Mancunion, ran an opinion piece before the vote called "the executive team doesn't need a men's officer", though the most insightful opinions come below the line form a commentator called "Joe" who said:

"If, when a man tries to raise his gender-specific issues he gets told to "man up" and "check his privilege," that's precisely the reason he needs an outlet that won't judge him for it. That is precisely why he needs an officer. It's not about spreading misogyny or fighting back against women.

"Men have unique needs that can't be addressed the same way we address general issues, and they aren't currently addressed. It sucks that that difference exists, but it's a fact of life. What's the best way to address them? Appoint somebody who's job it is to understand and cater to men."

Meanwhile the National Union of Students maintains its policy of supporting a drive for a "women's officer" in every university whilst simultaneously opposing any men's officers being elected

MAY

25. Calls to helpline for male victims treble thanks to Coronation Street

Mark Brooks of The ManKind Initiative thanked Coronation Street for making a difference to the lives of male victims of domestic abuse in May.

Following Coronation Street's success at the British Soap Awards for its cutting edge domestic abuse storyline involving the character Tyrone Dobbs as a male victim, UK charity The ManKind Initiative believes the storyline has made a difference to hundreds of thousands of men who suffer in silence behind their front door.

The charity experienced treble the number of calls to its national helpline when the episodes featured the domestic abuse storyline (including from mothers and sisters wanting help for their son or brother). One caller remarked that after seeing the storyline with his abusive partner, he wrote the number of the charity's helpline number down, called and has now escaped from the relationship he was in.

26. Masculinity is in crisis (again)

One of the biggest surges of interest in men's issues in the media this year was sparked by Diane Abbott, MP, who delivered a speech at the think tank Demos about the "Crisis of Masculinity".

Early previews of Abbott's speech, revealed that she would say: "It's all become a bit like the film Fight Club – the first rule of being a man in modern Britain is that you're not allowed to talk about it."

Writing in The Guardian, I responded, saying: "Looking at a preview of Abbott's speech, it becomes apparent that Labour's new message about valuing fathers is underpinned with a familiar, negative narrative about disaffected men who are hyper-masculine, homophobic, misogynistic and obsessed with pornography. Abbott is right to say that there aren't enough men engaged in conversations about manhood, but is it any wonder when modern masculinity is described in such negative terms?"

In addition to my comment in The Guardian I compiled a list of the Top 10 responses to Diane Abbot's speech here.

27. Researchers prove (again) that men are victims of domestic violence

In May, a new study, heralded as the most comprehensive review of the scholarly domestic violence research literature ever conducted concludes, among other things, that women perpetrate physical and emotional abuse, and engage in control behaviors, at comparable rates to men.

The Partner Abuse State of Knowledge project, or PASK, whose final installment was published in the journal Partner Abuse, is an unparalleled three-year research project, conducted by 42 scholars at 20 universities and research centers, and including information on 17 areas of domestic violence research.

For more information see the Domestic Violence Research Group.

28. The Other Gender Divide

The Guardian ran an article on its Datablog by Mona Chalabi in April, which, after dealing with the predictable and unquantifiable caveats that "women suffer more than men as a result of their gender"—provided a strong list of hard facts about the inequalities that men experience.

The article—"the other gender divide: where men are losing out"—covered many key men's issues like suicide, workplace deaths, boys' education, the harsher treatment of male prisoners and gave a new insight I hadn't encountered before, than men are more likely to be made redundant and less likely to be re-employed than women.

The article is worth a read and stands as testimony that the issues that advocates for men and boys have been highlighting for years are starting to reach the edges of the mainstream.

Editor's note: People who've read the book "Equality For Men" are saying it's a "skillfully produced," "compelling," "really great," "truly excellent" book that "focuses on the main point brilliantly" and should be "mandatory reading." The best way to find out why is click here to buy Equality For Men by Glen Poole. –DE

Southern Poverty Law Center takes aim at A Voice for Male Students

Robert O'Hara · 20 December 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Yesterday, the Southern Poverty Law Center posted an article on the "anti-woman" section of their website targeting, of all people, Johnathan Taylor from A Voice for Male Students. In it, writer Arthur Goldwag states:

> "The alleged spread of this anti-male "rape culture" on college campuses is getting new attention from the political right. The most dramatic example of that may be the website A Voice for Male Students, founded by "men's rights activist" (MRA) Jonathan Taylor. To Taylor, American colleges are key battlegrounds in the all-out war that feminism has allegedly been waging against boys and men since the mid-1970s — a war that Taylor says they appear to be winning."

Taylor, who has never identified himself as amember the "political right" or any other political affiliation, has established himself as the Men's Human Rights Movement's go-to guy for discrimination against males in education.

[image]Having made excellent videos for years concerning the matter, he established his website last year as a warehouse of information concerning misandry and discrimination against men and boys in all levels of education. He is regarded by many as being unmatched in expertise in this area and is also regarded as being the most eloquent advocate for male students everywhere.

"A Voice for Male Students' Taylor doesn't do his cause any favors with his strident, relentlessly accusatory rhetoric," says Goldwag. "His over-reliance on cherry-picked anecdotes and out-of-context quotations, or his monomania about hegemonic feminism."

Taylor's "anecdotes" are hardly "cherry picked," as Goldwag contends. His assertion that male students are in the minority and are quickly becoming a rarity in higher education is well documented not just by Taylor, but also by the National Center for Education Statistics.

Source: A Voice for Male Students from the National Center for Education Statistics

In the spring of 2012, the SPLC published in its Intelligence Report a list of several "anti-women" websites. Included were A Voice for Men, SAVE Services, Men's Rights Reddit and the False Rape Society.

The SPLC has since backpedaled from calling out these organizations as all-out "hate sites." In a subsequent article dated May 2012, Goldwag stated: "It should be mentioned that the SPLC did not label MRAs as members of a hate movement; nor did our article claim that the grievances they air on their websites – false rape accusations, ruinous divorce settlements and the like – are all without merit."

Yet in his latest article Goldwag re-characterizes these same websites in derogatory terms when he asserts: "A Voice for Male Students, which appears to take its name from the much more virulent MRA site known as A Voice for Men, does not qualify as a so-called 'hate site.'"

"It's not like Goldwag was talking about AVFMS on a blog called 'Generally Good-Faith Groups Advocating Social Justice.' He included it in a blog called "Hatewatch" and categorized the article discussing my website under the blog section "Anti-Woman," said Taylor in an email response to AVFM News.

"He also misrepresents AVFMS as being dramatically far-right (AVFMS has always been non-partisan) and accuses it of over-reliance on misquotations, statements for which he provides no evidence."

"If organizations like the SPLC were committed to monitoring all types of institutionalized hatred regardless of which sex it is directed at, websites like A Voice for Male Students would not need to exist. But currently we have a pervasive problem regarding anti-male bias in academia that has remained unaddressed from a pro-equality, pro-human rights perspective for too long. AVFMS exists to help fill that void," he added.

A Voice for Male Students and AVFM are currently partners with the National Coalition of Men in starting men's issues groups across the U.S modeled on the Canadian Association for Equality's similar groups in Canada.

Kids, false reporting is bad, mmmkay?

John Hembling (JtO) · 20 December 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Occidental College in Los Angeles, California is not the first school to institute a system designed to facilitate the anonymous reporting of sexual assault and rape. Nor will the LA college be the last. However, it is presently at the centre of public attention and outrage, outrage because the online anonymous sexual assault reporting tool has been used exactly and precisely as it was designed to be used. The problem is that it was used by the wrong people.

Writing for the Huffington Post, Tyler Kingkade reported that "internet trolls" filed at least 400 false rape reports through the Occidental College anonymous online form. Kingkade wrote that members of a [scare-quotes] men's rights website and the online-mobious-strip-of-tomfoolery, 4chan, weighed in, quickly suggesting the form be bombed with false reports. And why not, that is why the system is anonymous. That is the purpose.

Rape and sexual assaults are serious crimes. That seems like an obvious and redundant point to make, but it has become relevant in the widespread pious posturing of shock and outrage that just-anyone would abuse an instituted system for enacting aggression through an anonymous proxy. Just imagine!

Of course, the fatal design flaw in the Occidental College anonymous assault reporting tool is that just-anyone can use it. Clearly, only members of a protected caste should be able to access an online tool accusing those outside their caste of violent or sexual crimes from behind a screen of anonymity. The college's administration are, of course, working on a solution to that flaw.

One possible solution – I thought it up while writing this – would be for the school's victims' center to supply cards printed with hash-generated keys. The numbers could be encoded as QR codes, saving accusers from the difficult task of correctly hand typing a generated key value. Victims could have easy access to a bin full of printed cards, located next to the bin of condoms and the table full of literature. Of course, this would all be located in a victim-only area, preventing the wrong people from using any of the supplied digital keys. Then, of course, scanning a card with a QR code would take any "victim" directly to the online accusation form right from her smart phone, and the wrong people (men's rights activists and other "trolls") would be effectively locked out of the anonymous accusation tool.

As everybody knows, men's human rights activists are exclusively male, white, cis-gendered, middle-aged and angry. They're easy to spot.

However, when the "men's rights" website (actually Reddit, thus the scare-quotes) mentioned by Kingkade reported that the form was being flooded with false reports – I posted a comment on the site, including the headline, which read as follows:

> "'Men's rights activists' conspire to cripple college rape reporting system with false reports"
>
> GOOD! Go forward, brothers, and fuck their shit up.
>
> Rape is a crime. If somebody has a report to file of being the victim of this crime – file that report with a POLICE ORGANIZATION, not with some jumped up kangaroo court or administrative star chamber. And when operating in an environment where the star-chamber rules – FTSU with the same fraudulent reports they've tuned their system to process against you.

However, contrary to the possible perception that the Men's Rights subreddit is populated exclusively by rape-enabling-neckbeard-MHRA-types (like me) a majority of the individuals reading my comment condemned and down-voted it.

In addition, several follow-on commenters showed a clear understanding which I continue to lack, that false reports of sexual assault are bad, as distinct from non-false reports of the same. The difference being which demographic files those reports, either the female victims of sexual crime, or male sexual criminals.

In response to my Reddit comment:

> "This came off so silly and juvenile I thought it was one of the troll comments the mods talked about, but you seem to be some kind of widely-known MRA. In favour of making false reports. Appalling."

Of course, this comment and the concomitant condemning down-votes created considerable confusion in my mind. The term "false reports" is likely the culprit. My definition was clearly in error. A false report of rape is not one in which the crime being reported did not actually happen. A false report is one made by a non-victim. This obviously requires further clarification of the term "victim." Not somebody subjected to an actual incidence of sexual violence, but rather a member of the protected victim demographic – those whose reports of victimization should be correctly made from anonymity, enabled by a system such as that in place at Occidental College in California.

Another response said:

> "Fuck their shit up" has to be done with some sophistication, so you don't look like an asshole with nothing but hate on the agenda. This wasn't the time to do that….

It certainly would be awful to look like an asshole with nothing but hate on the agenda. But that's not all the commenter supplied.

When we talk about rape, we are talking about a felony. Unless we're talking about regretted sex, or drunk sex, or refused sex, or no sex, or imaginary sex, or bad-idea sex, all of which are variously defined as criminal offences or sometimes not criminal offences, depending on legal jurisdictions. Victims, we must understand, are not fully realized, self-possessed adults in the same way that men are. Thus, for victims, consent to sex, enthusiastic participation in sex, and even non-sex do not actually constitute acts of volition. Victimization, including criminal victimization, occurs whenever a member of a victim-demographic feels like it.

The Reddit user correctly and roundly condemning my false-reporting endorsement also correctly pointed out that:

> All complaints of rape should be handled by law enforcement. No student should agree to be subject to such a process and should hire legal counsel immediately." [emphasis mine]

Indeed, if we're going to work towards a more perfect society realizing the doctrine that all animals are equal, it's important to remain focused on what should be, rather than what is.

But this is very good news indeed for the proponents of rape culture–that's the cultivated public narrative that rape and sexual assault, are not the lowest-incidenced crimes tracked by law enforcement according to the FBI's Bureau of Justice Statistics; rather, rape is a dominant feature of our culture. However, to understand how, in the relative absence of rape as defined by law enforcement – rape (of victims) is a foundational feature of the culture, a redefinition of the term is necessary. Thankfully, thousands of individual activist victims have been working on this for years.

You know, like this.

Although the above image is likely a photoshoped fake, it correctly characterizes the meaning of "rape" in the context of feminst-defined "rape-culture."

The New Rape[TM] isn't a violent crime, it's a feeling. A rape occurs not when a victim is victimized, but when a self-selecting victim has an emotion. In fact, in Toronto, while attending a presentation by Drs Paul Nathanson and Catherine Young, I was instructed by a crowd of victims that regret after enthusiastic consensual sex /is/ rape. The post-facto change of opinion from "let's screw" to "damn, that was a bad idea" is in the mainstream gender ideologue narrative, definitionally rape, and of course, Rape-Culture[TM].

However, as a very bad man, and one prone to use redundant adjectives, my continued re-education by pious bloggers continues. I'm thankful that the other very bad folks, including feminine patriarchal collaborators at AVfM, will continue to afford me space as a token on the site.

And I thank you all for your continued, and very kind attention.

Qantas places women in its management – S&P reduces credit rating to 'junk'

Mike Buchanan · 20 December 2013 · Archived copy · Original

We now know a good deal about the impact of increasing female representation on corporate boards. Longitudinal studies (the only ones of any relevance, as they separate causation from correlation) of companies in the United States, Germany and Norway show it leads to corporate financial decline. A briefing paper on the matter prepared by Campaign for Merit in Business has the Abstracts and URLs of five such studies:

Increasing gender diversity on corporate boards leads to declines in financial performance: the evidence

Across the developed world major corporations are increasing female representation on their boards and senior executive levels, sometimes under government pressure, sometimes not. We're indebted to M, a supporter who lives in Eastern Europe, for pointing us to some intriguing pieces. He's just come up with a new one, a real gem, relating to Qantas. From Wikipedia's entry on the company:

> Qantas Airways Limited is the flag carrier of Australia. The name was originally 'QANTAS', an acronym for 'Queensland and Northern Territory Aerial Services'. Nicknamed 'The Flying Kangaroo', Qantas is Australia's largest airline, the oldest continuously operated airline in the world, and the second oldest in the world overall… Qantas carries a 65% share of the Australian domestic market and carries 18.7% of all passengers travelling in and out of Australia.

Qantas has been going through turbulent times (pun intended). With fairly stable revenues and passenger numbers, it moved from an A$249 million profit after tax in 2010/11, to losses of $244 million in 2011/12, and a derisory profit of just A$6 million in 2012/13. Also from Wikipedia:

> In August 2011 the company announced that, due to financial losses and a decline in market share, major structural changes would be made. Up to 1,000 jobs would be lost in Australia…

The last thing Qantas would need in such difficult times would be time-consuming and distracting initiatives to drive up female representation on its board and senior executive levels. Under government pressure, however, that's exactly what it has faced for years, since at least 1999. Our thanks to M for pointing us to a 24-page document which will be depressing reading for any normally intelligent person – gender feminists, by contrast, will love it – Qantas's 2011/12 report to the Equal Opportunity for Women in the Workplace Agency (EOWA):

131207 Qantas 201112 report

To protect your sanity we've extracted from the document just a little of the content, from p.3:

Introduction

The Qantas Group is covered by the Equal Opportunity for Women in the Workplace Act 1999 (Commonwealth) and to comply with the Act is required to:

– Develop an equal opportunity for women in the workplace program – Report annually (by 31 May) to the Equal Opportunity for Women in the Workplace Agency (EOWA) on the program and its effectiveness.

The report is being submitted on behalf of the Qantas Group and covers our workplace program gender diversity activities during the reporting period 1 April 2011 – 31 March 2012.

Diversity Highlights for 2011/2012

Representation:

– The Qantas Board of Directors appointed one additional woman, increasing female representation to 25%, up by 8% since the last reporting period.

– Qantas has 57% female representation on the Qantas Foundation Board, as 4 of the 7 Directors are women.

– 2 of the 10 Directors of the Qantas Superannuation Board, including the Chairman are women, representing 20% of the Board.

– During the reporting period, the number of women employed on the Qantas Executive Committee (ExCo), reporting directly to the CEO increased to 3 or 27%. This is a significant increase from having zero representation 3 years ago in 2009.

– Qantas' Company Secretary is female.

– The number of women in Senior Management roles (levels 2-4 in Table A) increased by 2% to 29% during the reporting period.

<End of extract. We apologise for inflicting that on you.>

So what's been the consequence of the relentless march of women into senior roles at Qantas, both before and during the period in which the company has faced severe financial difficulties? Well, Standard & Poor's (S&P) have just cut Qantas's credit rating to 'junk' (link below). Oops.

http://www.bbc.co.uk/news/business-25252286

In an effort to pour salt into Qantas's wounds, Australia's government is refusing to bail out the company, despite having assaulted it with gender diversity initiatives since at least 1999. We expect this matter will be resolved by an Asian company – probably a Chinese one – taking over Qantas, and immediately cancelling all such stupid initiatives. We assume that Australian feminists, and the politicians who've pandered to them for so long, are proud to have brought a once-great company to its knees.

As time goes on, across the developed world, we'll see ever more examples of major companies being destroyed by gender diversity initiatives, and the Chinese in particular buying the assets at rock-bottom prices.

Beware The Blue Eyed Butcher: Susan Wright

AVfM Video Source · 20 December 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Woman stabs her husband over 193 times… TV show tries to paint her out to be sympathetic.

Subscribe to The Mad Shangi for more.

Great Moments in MGTOW

AVfM Video Source · 20 December 2013 · Archived copy · Original

On of our favorite series by the guys at MRA Edmonton is “Great Moments in MGTOW.” Here’s a perfect example:

For more, subscribe to MRA Edmonton.

An attack on bachelors – and their reply

Peter Wright · 21 December 2013 · Archived copy · Original

In the 1890's a proposed 'tax on bachelors' caused the very first MGTOW (Men Going Their Own Way) and Men's Rights group to form.[1] At that time a group of bachelors banded together in response to the tax and to fight for their freedom from gynocentric slavery. They can also be considered the first Men's Rights group to fight against patently misandric laws.

Background

In 1896, a Mrs. Charlotte Smith, feminist activist and President of the Women's Rescue League, spearheaded an anti-bachelor campaign, based on her concerns about the increasing numbers of women who could not find husbands — a surprising development considering men outnumbered women in the United States then by 1.5 million.[2] Her solution to the "problem" was to denigrate, malign, and ultimately punish bachelors in order to pressure them into marrying any women unlucky enough to remain unwed. Mrs. Smith's malignment of bachelors began with attacks on public servants and officials, saying that bachelors have always been failures, and that bachelor politicians, especially, were "narrow minded, selfish, egotistical, and cowardly." She further claimed that, "It's about time to organize antibachelor clubs in this state. It should be the purpose of every young woman to look up the record of each and every man who is looking for votes and, should his moral character be such would make him unfit for office, then his shortcoming should be the point of attack by the antibachelor women of Massachusetts. There are 47,000 girls between the ages of 20 and 29 years in this state who cannot find husbands… [and] the bachelor politicians, they do not dare discuss the social evil question."[3] She states:

"No man can be a good, honorable and upright citizen who has not entered into the holy bonds of wedlock" [Charlotte Smith][4]

Poor Bachelors.

Charlotte Smith is after the bachelors in good style. She is prosecuting them summarily because they won't marry. They are protesting and framing all sorts of excuses, but to no avail. She is stern in her purpose to do away with the unmarried class and looks with horror upon the number of spinsters in New England, ever on the increase.

Like an avenging fury she pounces upon the men who have fled to Klondyke in despair—not even there can they gain respite for she has sent a ship load of the scrawniest, oldest, most forbidding women of New England to marry them. Poor helpless bachelors. How much, more than ever, are they to be pitied and condoled with. Is there for them no balm in Gilead?

The Chipley banner, Sept. 1897

Part of her remedy was to have bachelors excluded from employment in prominent public sector positions. Her second punishment proposed a universal bachelor tax of $10 per year be applied,[5] amounting to between 1-4 weeks of the average wage, with the proceeds to provide living standards for 'unmarried maidens', orphans and the poor. In 1911, Mrs. Smith was still spruiking the tax on bachelors, claiming statistics showed that 60% of eligible men in Massachusetts never married, especially men of "small means" because "in order to be popular at the club now it is necessary for a man to have one or two automobiles, a yacht, and two or three mistresses, but no marriage."[6]

Many proponents of the tax believed that it would encourage marriage and thereby reduce the state's burden to care for those who did not financially support themselves. Perhaps most importantly, Mrs. Smith felt that the tax would lower the number of men "who go around making love to young girls."[6]

The bachelor band of 1898

The bachelor tax proposed by Smith was by no means the first. In 1827 a "highly numerous and respectable" group of men met in a New York City hotel to organize a protest against a bill before the New York legislature that replaced a current tax on dogs with one on bachelors. The bill, they claimed, was "onerous and in direct violation of the great charter of their liberties."[7] In 1854, in Connecticut a legislator argued in the House of Representatives against a proposed bill to tax bachelors: such a bill was unnecessary, he claimed, because "There was a tax laid already upon a goose, and any man who had lived 25 years without being married could be taxed under that section."[8] These two bills were not unique, as bachelor taxes have existed around the globe and throughout the millennia, dating back at least to ancient Greece and Rome.[9]

The culmination of attacks on both the finances and character of bachelors resulted (in 1898) in the formation of a small resistance group in Atlanta Georgia, known variously as the Bachelor Band, The Bachelor League, or famously the 'Anti-Bardell Bachelor Band.' The latter takes its name from the case of Bardell vs Pickwick in Charles Dickins 1836 classic novel The Pickwick Papers in which the character Mr. Pickwick is forced to defend himself against a corrupt lawsuit brought by his landlady, Mrs. Bardell, who is suing him for breach of promise, and which ultimately results in his incarceration at Fleet Prison for his stubborn refusal to pay the compensation to her. Thus 'Anti-Bardell' in the title refers to men's struggle against corruption, greed and bigotry, with the bachelor band publicly claiming that "One of its main objects is the suppression of Mrs. Bardell's large army of female followers today."[10]

The Bachelor Band undertook political activism on behalf of men's rights, including articles in numerous mainstream newspapers, letters to politicians, and public petitions to raise both awareness and support for men against misandric laws and practices. In response to Mrs. Smith's campaign for what she termed "compulsory marriage," the Bachelor Band held an emergency meeting chaired by Al Mather, a prominent real-estate dealer. At the meeting a member cried out, "We are pledged to celibacy, and we must remain true to our resolve!" Another member, Henry Miller, stated "It is an outrage to attempt a tax on bachelors. The next thing, I suppose, will be to put tags on us or make us get out licenses as is now requires for dogs."[11] The meeting then moved into a secret session where the proposed bachelor tax was discussed, with attendees concluding that is was not the tax per-se that was the problem, but the spirit of the thing. The members, one and all, declared the tax was an attempt to place bachelors under a ban, and by doing so force them into matrimony. With all members of the same opinion a resolution was passed as follows:

> "We hereby ask and request that the Senator and the Assemblymen from this district, namely Mr. Daly, Allen, and marshal exert themselves to the best of their ability and means to defeat the bill now before the Legislature to tax bachelors; and it is further resolved that the Secretary be authorized to forward a copy of the above resolution to each of the gentlemen mentioned, and further to notify the proposer of the bill, Assemblyman Weller, and the governor of our action."[11]

Another group, the Hoboken Bachelor Club, further discussed the merits of drafting a petition protesting against the bill and circulating it for signatures. As can be seen from the political action taken, the assault on men was not going to be taken lying down, with the bachelors forming a resistance movement headed by Lawyer John A. Hynds who not only resisted pressure to marry but challenged the bachelor tax and the cultural misandry that accompanied it. According to one media account the bachelor group was still active four years after the date of the above controversy, making it a successful long-term organisation.[12]

One of the more humorous, but effective examples of the group's media activism was this piece in the New York World:

> BACHELOR'S LEAGUE AGAINST THE FAIR
>
> >
>
> John A. Hynds –
> (Chief Officer of Bachelor Band)
>
> Twelve bachelors have formed a league against marriage under the name of the "Anti-Bardell Bachelor Band," a name which recalls the woes of Mr. Pickwick, of immortal fame. The motto of the club is Solomon's proverb: "It is better to live in a corner of the housetop than with a brawling woman in a wide house." The objects of the club are to oppose matrimony, to fight for the liberty of man, to encourage the manufacture of all such devices as bachelor buttons and to check the movement inaugurated by Mrs. Charlotte Smith "and other disgruntled females" to require bachelors to wed.
>
> Any member who marries will be fined $1000. The club will attend the "funeral" in a body dressed in black, wearing long, mournful faces, with an abundant supply of crepe. In addition to this they will emit groans during the whole ceremony. When the fine is paid the member shall be declared legally dead.
>
> Another offense is "getting the mitten." If a member is "mittened" by a widow or old maid the fine is doubled. Among other offenses are calling a woman "sweetheart," "dearest," "sugar lump," "dovie," "tootsie-wootsie," "honey," "lamb" or any such kindred nonsensical, absurd and disgraceful terms, and "walking with the female in the moonlight, speaking of the stars or the weather, quoting poetry –original or otherwise, riding through a tunnel in a car when any female occupies a contiguous seat, getting down on his knees before or at the side of a woman, carrying a girl's picture in his watch, hat or pocketbook, staying later than 12 o'clock at night, sending cologne, cinnamon drops or other kinds of perfumed liquids or shopping in a dry-goods store with any one of the fair sex."
>
> The chief officers of the club are: John A. Hynds, chief marble heart; E. C. Brown, junior marble heart; Mark J. McCord, freezer; J. D. Allen, iceberg.
>
> Mr. E. C. Brown, the junior marble heart, was tried recently on the charge of deserting the Atlanta charmers and visiting a Marietta widow and sending the widow flowers and candles. He was forbidden to visit Marietta for two months and fined twenty-four theatre tickets.[13]

* * *

Penalties against bachelors as enticements to marry are seen as far back as classical Roman times and, as with Eliza and Mariana who in 1707 AD proposed harsh penalties for unwed men, women are the most passionate advocates of bachelor punishments.

The Anti-Bardell Bachelor Band represents possibly the earliest MGTOW and MHRA group we know of, with men fighting for the basic right to determine their own lives and liberty, including the right to not marry. As mentioned by Paul Elam the stacked deck against men is not new, nor is an organized reaction to it. The only thing these poor chaps needed was the internet, and a mind for rebellion. With this in mind let's make sure we milk the internet for all we can squeeze out of it… it's our best chance yet.

Notes

[1] Specifically, the earliest MGTOW and Men's Rights groups currently known by this author. If an earlier MGTOW or MR group is brought to my attention this page will be updated accordingly.
[2] The Crusade Against Bachelors, The Norfolk Virginian. (Norfolk, Va.), 02 Sept. 1897.
[3] Antibachelor Clubs: Mr's Charlotte Smith Starts New Political Crusade, Rock Island Argus. (Rock Island, Ill.), 28 Aug. 1897
[4] No offices for Bachelors, Kansas City Star, Thursday, August 19, 1897, Kansas City, Kansas
[5] Massachusetts Bachelors Taxed $10 a Year, The Salt Lake Herald. (Salt Lake City [Utah), 01 March 1898
[6] Tax on Bachelors, Boston Globe, Feb.15, 1911, 1. (Smith was also campaigning against women riding bicycles, which she considered immoral).
[7] Editorial, Connecticut Courant, February 5, 1827
[8] Connecticut Legislature, Senate, House of Representatives, Hartford Courant, June 26, 1854
[9] Taxing Bachelors in America: 1895-1939, by Marjorie E. Kornhauser
[10] Evening star, February 15, 1898, Page 13, Image 13
[11] Bachelor Tax Feb 12 1898 New York World
[12] The Times 19 January 1902 › Page 4, "Allison Mather, former president of the Hoboken Bachelors' Club, and who for many years was proud of the distinction or being a confirmed woman hater, is suing for divorce. When he married last year the members of the club went into mourning."
[13] New York World, 1898 [Note: "mittened" or "getting the mitten" is an old-time New England expression, meaning to have your offer of marriage rejected by your "best girl," and has an origin in the customs of the earlier days. Two hundred years ago, gloves were unknown in the country towns, and mittens were knitted and worn in all families. If a young man, going home from singing school with the girl of his choice, was holding her mittened hand to keep it from getting cold, and took that opportunity to urge his suit, if the offer proved acceptable, the hand would remain; if taken by surprise, an effort to withdraw the hand would leave the mitten. So the suitor would "get the mitten, but would not get the hand."

Source: Gynocentrism and its cultural origins

Please help AVFM continue to spread the message that Men's Rights are Human Rights by contributing to our quarterly fundraiser. Thank you.

Protesting the spread of mortal violence by law professor Elizabeth Sheehy

Attila L. Vinczer · 21 December 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Please sign this petition protesting the spread of mortal violence against males within the book Elizabeth A. Sheehy has written. She is the Shirley Greenberg Professor of Women and the Legal Profession in the Faculty of Law at the University of Ottawa. Her book promotes violence and even suggests that women can kill their husband while they sleep.

Sheehy wants to legalize murdering men in Canada.

Promoting violence against anyone in Canada is wrong and in violation of Canadian laws and moral principals that govern our conduct. Sheehy, a law professor and a member of the Bar, has lost her moral and lawful compass. The book that the University of British Columbia Press has agreed to publish is also promoting and enabling the spread of hatred and violence against man. We are directly opposed to this book that promotes violence against man.

Please contact UBC Press and Prime Minister Stephen Harper to express your concerns about the contents of this book.

Feminism vs Facts: Marissa Alexander, Angela Corey, & Melissa Harris-Perry

Diana Davison · 22 December 2013 · Archived copy · Original

The end of 2013 is fast approaching and it's that list-making time of year. Weighing in at number twenty three in iconic feminist moments was the release of an African-American woman named Marissa Alexander from jail while awaiting a retrial for three counts of aggravated assault with a deadly weapon. Given that women get lesser sentences for actually killing their target, this case is curious.

So, who is this feminist poster girl?

Feminists will tell you that Marissa is a battered woman "condemned" to 20 years in prison merely for firing a warning shot into the ceiling to prevent her abusive husband from beating her. They have campaigned relentlessly for her release. Radicalwomen.com joined the "Free Marissa Now" campaign pleading with us to "stop the legal lynching by Florida's mandatory minimum sentencing laws of an African American domestic violence survivor." The Feminist Wire begged readers to sign a petition with the slogan "Justice for Marissa! Set her Free!" And the Free Marissa Now website boasts a number of feminist organizations that are supporting and funding her legal defence.

The feminist version of the story goes like this: Marissa found herself trapped in her home with a violent husband, who had a history of abuse, and against whom she had a restraining order. She had given birth just nine days before the altercation. When she escaped from the house and arrived at her car, she realized she had forgotten her keys. She then grabbed a gun (for which she had a permit) from the car and fired a warning shot at her estranged husband when he threatened to kill her and made a movement in her direction.

Marissa invoked Florida's "Stand Your Ground" defence. She was denied that defence and found guilty by a jury in just over twelve minutes. This resulted in the mandatory minimum 20 year sentencing for gun crimes in that state.

Sounds like a travesty.

It also sounds like a hay wagon full of horse shit.

As it turns out, the feminists' story lacks the following details: Marissa was not assaulted in her own home. Days after giving birth, she left her newborn in the hospital and drove to her estranged husband's house. At the time, there were mutual restraining orders in place. Her husband was not home so Marissa parked her car in his garage and waited for his return. She eagerly showed him photos of her newborn on her cell phone and an argument arose when he noticed text messages between her and her ex-husband on the phone.

Marissa stormed out of the house and into the garage, where she grabbed a gun from her car and went back inside. Marissa claimed that the garage door was broken, forcing her to return after she had successfully left. Police found no evidence that the garage door was broken. She later claimed that she had left her keys behind.

The supposed "warning" shot was fired at head level and only ended up in the roof after ricocheting out of the other side of a wall. There were two children in the room standing next to her husband when Marissa fired the gun at his head.

Three months after being released on bail Marissa violated the no contact order, went back to her husband's house and gave him a black eye. When police contacted her, Marissa claimed that she was never there but later confessed.

The "Stand Your Ground" defence places the burden of proof onto the accused to show that their life was in danger. By attempting to use that defence Marissa made her case harder to win. She also refused a plea bargain that would have only sentenced her to three years in jail. Marissa chose to take her chances in court despite enough evidence stacked against her – so much that a jury of her peers only needed twelve minutes to reach a guilty verdict.

Stand Your Ground did not apply to Marissa's case since she was able to leave the house safely and not only returned but, upon her return, escalated a non-deadly altercation into a deadly confrontation by bringing a gun into the conflict. There was no evidence of bruising or violence to Marissa's body when police arrested her. The 911 call was placed by her husband who fled the house with his two children and called police to have them remove Marissa from his home.

The prosecutor in the case, Angela Corey, is known for her staunch victim's advocate stance. Corey has confronted the misrepresentation of Marissa Alexander's case in the media numerous times explaining that she has a duty to the main victims in this crime: two young children. But no one wants to hear what Angela Corey has to say because it doesn't make for a good feminist campaign.

Unsurprisingly, when given the choice, feminists are more worried about a black woman than they are about two black children. Of course part of their battle cry is that Marissa won't be with her own children while incarcerated, and they were forced to choose between the custodial children of a woman and the custodial children of a man. It's easy to see the complicated scales of equality feminism at work here.

Not being the ones to let facts get in the way of a good campaign, feminists have compared Marissa Alexander's Stand Your Ground case to that of George Zimmerman and the Trayvon Martin shooting. Their bone of contention is that a white man got away with murdering a black kid under Stand Your Ground, but a black woman was unsuccessful with that same defence even though she didn't kill anyone.

First of all, George Zimmerman is Hispanic. Secondly, Zimmerman did not use the Stand Your Ground defence in his trial. His lawyers wisely advised Zimmerman that he stood a better chance of acquittal if he kept the burden of proof on the state. Third, they were both shooting at black people.

To help us understand the case better, Melissa Harris-Perry, host of MSNBC, wrote an open letter to prosecutor Angela Corey. It starts like this:

> Dear Angela Corey,
>
> It's me, Melissa.
>
> Angela, there are few times in life that we get second chances to right our wrongs. Well Angela, this is yours.
>
> You have been called a fierce victim's advocate, so it is way past time that you start acting like it.

Dear Melissa Harris-Perry,

It's me, Diana.

Melissa, there are few times in life that we get second chances to realize that we acted like complete cunts. Well, Melissa, this is yours.

You have been called an educated woman and it's way past time that you start acting like it.

As the host of a television show, which has much greater access to the facts of the case than I do, I'm looking forward the explanation of how it only took me two minutes with Google to find out the details of the case that seem to have eluded you.

Since, Melissa, you obviously care about abuse victims, I suggest you remember that two young children watched a psychopathic woman aim and fire a gun at their father's head. This woman, who you are so passionately defending, has shown herself to be incapable of staying away from the home of a man who allegedly beats her even when restraining orders are in place and her bail conditions stipulated "no contact."

Since you are trying to educate us about domestic violence, Melissa, I am left wondering why you left out the part explaining how Marissa kept finding herself driving to her abuser's house. Usually battered wives are "stuck" there because they live with their spouse and the "domestic" part of the violence references their own home, creating the sticky part of “stuck”.

Finally, I am greatly intrigued by your response to the detail that Marissa’s “warning shot” hit the wall at adult head level. You explained with exasperation that “Marissa is three inches shorter than [her husband].” Being rather tall, I had no idea that the ceiling is located in a different place for short people.

Thank you, Melissa, for this enlightening example of how a feminist brain functions.

Sincerely,
Diana

Please help AVFM continue to spread the message that Men’s Rights are Human Rights by contributing to our quarterly fundraiser. Thank you.

Some editorial thoughts on Occidental

Paul Elam · 22 December 2013 · Archived copy · Original

The most recent "big thing" in the overlap between internet and real world strife over sexual politics has been the spamming of an online rape reporting device at Occidental College in Los Angeles, California. Reportedly some 400 internet users (or a smaller group of repeat offenders) filed false reports to the controversial system, rendering it at least temporarily useless for its intended purpose.

One possible source that triggered the reports is the Men's Rights subreddit.

The result has been outrage from college administration as well as widespread condemnation from gender ideologues and some mainstream sources.

To be clear, AVFM was not engaged in this particular event, nor do we officially endorse what happened. We do not denounce it, either.

After discussion with senior management, however, it became apparent that we needed to publish an editorial opinion on what happened.

That discussion led us not to make a declaration of whether we think what happened was appropriate, even as we reject it as one we are going to officially endorse. Instead it led us to a question that should be posed to Occidental College as well as to society at large.

What the hell did you expect?

The modern academic climate in the United States can be likened to a table that rests on four legs. Those legs are rape hysteria, demonization of men, fraudulent academic feminism and the continual erosion of due process for men and other Constitutional principles. The problem with the Occidental "reporting" system is that it sits square atop that table. In that position, it not only should be a target, it necessarily will be because a long-due backlash against the processes that put it there is emerging from many corners of society. That backlash is 100% justified. Indeed, that backlash can perhaps be seen as proof that we may have reason to hope for society yet.

There is some conditional — and temporary — sympathy for college administration in regard to this event. Their creation of a device where students (read: women) can make anonymous rape complaints (against men), a dicey proposition to say the least, was taken up somewhat under duress.

In April of this year, a group of 37 students, faculty and alumni filed federal complaints accusing the school of violating the Title IX gender equity law and the Clery Act. The Clery Act is a campus security law requiring the school to accurately track and disclose campus crimes.

Undoubtedly this left the school scrambling for another way to increase their ability to report sexual assaults. An "anyone can report anyone else for anything they want anonymously," system was probably regarded as a way that would satisfy litigious feminists. It would also help that those feminists could possibly be able to control the number of reported sex crimes by manipulating the system themselves.

So, we understand that the effort was put forward by the school after it was threatened with legal action.

But of course, an academic environment tolerating corrupt scholarship, ideological domination of multiple departments, harassment of dissenters and the open spread of hateful propaganda under the auspices of education is precisely what produced the federal complaints to begin with. The complaints are chickens coming home to roost in the most generous interpretation.

So we ask again, what the hell were you thinking? We even ask that rhetorically of Occidental administrative officials, knowing that corrupt feminist ideology reaches to the very top of school governance. Yes, we are saying it is entirely plausible to speculate that the school's administration could have colluded in the federal complaints.

Perhaps the most telling of the schools mentality regarding sex crimes was offered by the school's interim Title IX coordinator Lauren Carella:

> "This abuse of our reporting system is unacceptable to all of us. This form is an important option for the Oxy community to use to address the serious issue of sexual assault."

And therein is the problem. Schools are not foreign embassies. They are not sovereign, extralegal fiefdoms, beyond the scope and reach of criminal statutes in California or any other state. They are schools. The entirety of their properties, students, faculty and administration fall under local criminal jurisdiction.

Rape and sexual assault are crimes, regardless of whether they occur on campus or off. As such, those victimized are entitled to police investigation of their allegations, as well as criminal prosecution and punishment of the perpetrators when the evidence so justifies.

The accused, too, are afforded specific rights; due process of law and the presumption of innocence among them.

What we actually have now, sitting squarely on our metaphorical table next to that horrific reporting system, is a network of Star Chambers driven by hysterics and ideology. That system has shamelessly swept aside all pretense of a liberal educational environment and, even while accepting direct and indirect government funding, shamelessly sweeps aside the values enshrined in the Bill of Rights.

Roy Bean would be beaming with pride.

The deplorable nature of this system has been roundly criticized by feminists and non-feminists alike. Yet it goes unabated because this is what our institutions of higher education have produced and invested in perpetuating.

That there are people who are seeking to wreck it by any means necessary would only be a surprise if it had not happened. We are certain that it will happen again.

The solution to this is simple, even if unpalatable to gender ideologues. Rape and sexual assault are criminal activities. When they occur, report them to the police and let the criminal justice system do its job. There is no plausible way to believe, as the individuals on the internet just proved, that such a reporting system can produce reliable data on which to calculate the incidence of sexual assaults. It is just too vulnerable to undermining and misuse, by feminists and their detractors alike.

Also, producing star chambers and the anonymous reporting systems to keep them busy, just to satisfy litigious activists, is not only a poor answer, it is a stupendously corrupt one that will deter rape reports from going to actual police. It will result in irreparable harm to even more young men who are already vulnerable to the current system, as well as continuing the further erosion to the credibility of real rape victims which feminism has already caused.

Regardless of your feelings, pro or con, to what the spammers did to the Occidental College reporting system, it is going to continue, and to worsen, until the things driving those reactions are addressed.

Criticizing the tactics of the spammers may seem almost obligatory. And it is. Much in the same way as criticizing the civil rights riots in the late 1960s. That too, was very easy and remarkably simple to condemn.

It is only when we have to discuss why those riots happened that things get a lot more complicated.

Free Fundraising Thermometer by:
Easy Fundraising Ideas

Donate

VISA

Fundraiser will end on December 31, 2013

Joy Smith Continues Her Attack On Men

Jim Byset · 22 December 2013 · Archived copy · Original

JOY SMITH has been in the news a lot lately. She just recently held meetings at her offices in Ottawa with religious crazies and radical feminists in a bid to further demonize male sexuality by censoring internet porn. Now, the Conservative MP for Kildonan-St. Paul has continued her attack on men by positing the idea that male buyers of sex from prostitutes should be criminalized, but not the sellers.

It is hardly surprising that Smith should think this – given that she is incapable of formulating any worthwhile, original ideas herself. While meeting with her group of radical fringe collaborators earlier this month she presented her idea of making internet users register with Internet Service Providers (ISPs) to access freely available, legal, adult material. The thing is, the idea is not hers.

It was already tabled in the U.K., where it now set to fully roll out in early 2014. In fact, such is Smith's fanaticism that while speaking to the National Post she made the astounding (and frankly unbelievable) claim that she "got a letter from a young boy 10 years of age telling me he was addicted to porn. It just brought me to tears."

Smith's statement today is in response to news that the Supreme Court of Canada (SCOC) has declared current laws on prostitution unconstitutional. Her statement, however, is little more than another pathetic attempt to demonize male sexuality by aping the legislation of other feminist zealots. This time, she's chosen to copy the efforts of feminist legislators in Sweden, who in 1999 made it illegal to purchase, but not to sell, sex.

One has to wonder what they're putting in the water in the constituency of Kildonan-St.Paul. Here's the statement – get your sick bags ready:

"The Supreme Court of Canada has ruled that the Criminal Code offences around prostitution are unconstitutional. This ruling leaves police without important legal tools to tackle sex trafficking and organized crime and does not reflect a 1990 Supreme Court of Canada decision which stated that the elimination of prostitution through law was a valid goal.

"Despite this ruling, the debate around prostitution is hardly settled. There are those who wish to legalize and normalize the industry, those who wish to criminalize all aspects of the industry, and finally those, like myself, who recognize prostitution as an industry that is inherently harmful to women and girls and therefore must be eliminated.

"I am convinced that the most effective route to tackling prostitution and sex trafficking is to address the demand for commercial sex by targeting the buyers of sex. Countries that have legalized and regulated have seen sexual exploitation, human trafficking and violence towards women and girls increase drastically. In fact, a 2012 comprehensive study of a cross-section of up to 150 counties revealed that legalizing prostitution increased sex trafficking. In contrast, countries like Sweden and Norway, which have adopted the Nordic model of prostitution, have seen a significant decrease in prostitution and sex trafficking.

"The Nordic model of prostitution is effective due to its three approaches: explicitly criminalizing the purchase of sexual services, a national awareness campaign to educate the public that the purchase of sexual services is harmful to women, and finally strong support programs for those who seek to exit prostitution.

"Many police services across Canada have already shifted to policing models reflecting the Nordic model approach that women, girls and vulnerable populations are victimized and profoundly harmed by prostitution. The Toronto Police Service, Canada's largest municipal force, mandates their Sex Crimes Unit Special Victims Section to recognize 'sex workers as victims first.'

"Vancouver Police Department's Counter Exploitation Unit acknowledges 'that Aboriginal women are over-represented' among prostituted women and focuses on assisting 'young people escape from the sex trade.' The Winnipeg Police Service's new Counter Exploitation Unit has also adopted 'victim first' driven investigations.

“The harm caused by prostitution to women, girls and vulnerable populations has been well documented by women’s and First Nations organizations. During the June 13, 2013 Supreme Court of Canada hearings, the majority of interveners that were directly opposed to legalizing and regulating prostitution represented women’s organizations such as Canadian Association of Sexual Assault Centres, Native Women’s Association of Canada, and Vancouver Rape Relief Society. These organizations presented compelling evidence to the Supreme Court of Canada that legalizing prostitution would place women, girls and vulnerable populations at much greater risk of exploitation.

“Even the buyers of sex recognize the harm caused by prostitution to women. A 2012 Canadian study on the buyers of sex called Buyer Beware, found that of the 20 men interviewed, 8 of the men indicated that they acknowledged that women were most harmed by their act of buying sex and another 10 of the men felt both the woman and the buyer were harmed. Result – 90% of the men who bought sex recognized the women involved in prostitution were harmed by act of prostitution. The same study revealed that all 20 sex buyers would warn a first time sex buyer against engaging in prostitution due to the harm caused.

“Prostitution must be eliminated because it dehumanizes and degrades humans and reduces them to a commodity to be bought and sold. Legalizing prostitution is a direct attack on the fundamental rights and freedoms of women, girls and vulnerable people. In the same regard, continuing to criminalize the women and vulnerable populations being prostituted creates barriers that prevent them from escaping prostitution and entrenches inequality.

“Let’s be clear: those who advocate either approach ignore mounting empirical evidence and will find themselves on the wrong side of history and women’s equality.

“As a nation, we must ensure pimps remain severely sanctioned and prostituted women and girls are not criminalized and instead given meaningful escape routes out of sex work. Most importantly, Canada must focus on the real root of prostitution by targeting the buyers of sex.”

Court Officials Continue To Protect Kelly

John Brown · 22 December 2013 · Archived copy · Original

[image]
Judge Michael J. Kelly
He's kept a dying grandmother from a final visit with her grandson-then lied about it. And he ordered PutnamLIVE.com's publisher, Mark Hallburn, illegally detained and handcuffed despite having two payments for an illegal bill of sanctions. He also lied in court documents about when the first payment was received.

Despite his repeated lies, outrageous, and illegal behavior, Kanawha County Family Court Judge Michael J. Kelly remains on the bench collecting nearly $100,000 a year in salary and benefits as he harasses more people each day.

That's because West Virginia officials, including Kanawha County Prosecutor Mark Plants, are derelict in their duties and refuses to prosecute Kelly.

In addition to Plants, the West Virginia Judicial altTeresa A. TarrInvestigation Commission's lawyer, Teresa Tarr, and the West Virginia Supreme Court of Appeals Administrator Steven D. Canterbury continue to fail to charge Kelly with his obvious wrongdoing-protecting the rogue judge from prison time.

"They're protecting the tyrant," says Hallburn. "There's no other explanation. Kelly is out-of-control, violates the law, and Canterbury, Plants and Tarr let him get away with it. Kelly shoule be in federal prison. Judge Kelly and the coverup of his gross misconduct is an embarrassment to the fine citizens of the State of West Virginia.

Sources:

http://www.putnamlive.com/index.php?option=com_content&view=article&id=3891:kelly-obviously-a-four-year-old-is-not-going-to-appreciate-it-visit-of-grandmother&catid=74:special-reports&Itemid=112

http://www.putnamlive.com/index.php?option=com_content&view=article&id=5819:canterbury-plants-wont-charge-kelly&catid=74:special-reports&Itemid=112

Publisher's note: Photograph courtesy of WVMetroNews.com.

Replace the West Virginia Judicial Investigation Commission

John Brown · 22 December 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Bad judges are protected by other judges

When Putnam County Court Judge William M. "Chip" Watkins was allowed to resign November 30th, 2013, it marked the end of an era – both with Watkins' blatant courtroom misconduct and with a bad Judicial Investigation Commission that works harder to protect bad judges than discipline them.

Here are some facts:

●Complaints were filed against Watkins in early 2012. His discipline hearing wasn't until November 27th, 2012.
●A complaint was filed against Judge Michael J. Kelly who lied about a budget not being received and caused a little boy to miss a final visit with his dying grandmother. The complaint was dismissed.
●A complaint against WVJIC Commission President Judge Ronald Wilson for the commission's refusal to charge Kelly was dismissed.
●When Kelly was sued, Judge James Hatcher lied and said that court documents were not filed. A complaint against Hatcher was dismissed.
●The WVJIC refuses to release complaints against Judges, hiding their transgressions. This is a blatant violation of The First Amendment of the United States Constitution. Reporter Lawrence J. Smith filed a lawsuit which the WVJIC is vigorously fighting in court-rather than "coming clean" with the information.
●The WVJIC meets privately with no public disclosure of minutes, issues, and how each commissioner votes on whether or not to charge a judge.
●A complaint against Kelly illegally incarcerating PutnamLIVE.com's Publisher, Mark Hallburn, despite Hallburn providing TWO methods of payment for sanctions has yet to result in charges against Kelly and his removal from the bench.
●Complaints filed against Watkins by Margaret Farmer and Troy Sexton have not been acted on by the WVJIC, denying these citizens justice.
●Watkins has not been ordered to pay sanctions against those that he admitted to wronging.
●Commission members only meet once per month while judges are allowed to abuse people every day. This double standard is a sham.

These are the issues that we can report to you. As stated above, the WVJIC refuses to release complaints against judges and refuses to hold commission meetings in public – effectively conspiring to protect those that it is supposed to discipline. This lends people to believe that the West Virginia courts are corrupt and that judges can get away with misconduct on a daily basis. Unfortunately, the West Virginia Supreme Court of Appeals won't fix the problem.

We are calling on a replacement of the WVJIC with a civilian review board that meets daily to take action on complaints against judges. We are calling for the public disclosure of all complaints against judges. We are calling for all WVJIC meetings and hearings to be open to the public and the press. We are calling for complete transparency in all areas of government-including the WVJIC.

Amazingly, despite world-wide publicity about the Watkins videos, West Virginia legislators refused to replace the WVJIC in the last session. That's a failure that must be rectified with a complete overhaul of the WVJIC. Show some leadership, legislature, or get out of office!

West Virginia's court system is an embarrassment and a sham. Corruption runs rampant because the WVJIC refuses to clean up its process. The only way to fix the WVJIC is to immediately replace it with an independent civilian review board.

Publisher's note: This commentary was first published on PutnamLIVE.com.

Hood Rat In Washington Assaults Man & Goes Crazy When Treated Like A Man

AVfM Video Source · 22 December 2013 · Archived copy · Original

I wonder if this idiot has any idea how hard should COULD have been hit? She probably did, but knew he would not do it. She seems to know the rules around this stuff fairly well, as she was counting on forcing this man to defend himself, even by calling him a nigger, so that she could damsel her way into some proxy violence, or just a way to get him locked up.

I thought his composure was remarkable. Some other men would have knocked her into next week. PE

http://youtu.be/AYR7_SX1ksU

Santas warned “ho-ho-ho” offensive to women

Mike Buchanan · 23 December 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Our thanks to a regular contributor M, for sending us two emails yesterday. He wrote:

“I don’t think feminists could sink any lower than attacking the reputation of the symbol of Xmas, Santa Claus. They’re portraying him as a possible danger to children, an abuser, a molester, and so on… It appears that feminists don’t like the idea of children feeling affection towards men in general, and older men in particular. Oftentimes, not even their own fathers.

Also, feminists now have an issue with Santa’s traditional call ‘Ho-Ho-Ho’ which apparently has sexist overtones, and is supposedly disrespectful to women. Feminists clearly wish men could be separated from children altogether.

No matter how hard I think about it, the only plausible or logical explanations that comes to mind are demonization of masculinity and/or jealousy of men and/or an attempt to increase the feminists’ power base still more. They probably feel that Santa should be either female or not exist at all. The trouble is that he isn’t female, and turning him into a female character, or eliminating him on the pretext of multiculturalism, would destroy a centuries-old tradition – one that most children across the Christian world hold dear.

Women spend a great deal more time more around kids than men do in any case, so having a male Santa is only fair to the kids, come to think of it. But in my view, the attacks on Santa are very similar in nature to the attacks on fathers and men in general. I hope to see traditional male Santas around for many more years.

Allegedly Santa’s call ‘Ho-Ho-Ho’ could be offensive to Australian women because it could remind them of American slang! Also, it could be scary to children. Give me strength!!! What’s happening to Australia? A report on the matter in an American paper:

http://www.denverpost.com/ci_7470303

It’s not just Australia where this madness is gripping formerly sane people. Kids around the world shouldn’t sit on Santa’s lap this Xmas, as all Santas are by default suspected of being paedophiles:

http://www.modernmom.com/3dd77c0e-3b36-11e3-be8a-bc764e04a41e.html

http://www.parenting.com/blogs/show-and-tell/lauren-parentingcom/kids-banned-sitting-santas-lap

From the second article, which links to a Daily Telegraph piece:

> According to the National Association of Head Teachers, volunteer parents who dress up as Father Christmas have been told to avoid all physical contact with children, which of course excludes lap-sitting. ‘Santas in schools should be treated in the same way that other visitors to the school are managed,’ a spokesman for the Department of Education stated.

What’s wrong with the people working across the British education system, all of them Guardian readers, I would assume? They are nothing short of TOXIC to the young people in their charge. As many times as I’ve seen Santas at Xmas events, I can’t remember a single time that a boy or girl didn’t want to approach one or sit on his lap… I’ve never seen a kid terrified of Santa, and I’m no young kid.

As you can see Mike, feminists are attempting nothing less than the total destruction of western Christian traditions and values, which will inevitably destroy the whole society based upon it, together with the economy. If you take out the pillars of the building, the building will collapse, inevitably… simple math.”

Please help AVFM continue to spread the message that Men’s Rights are Human Rights by contributing to our quarterly fundraiser. Thank you.

A Christmas Letter for Fathers Alienated from their Children

Janet Bloomfield (aka JudgyBitch) · 23 December 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Kate Winslet has been in the news lately, threatening to sue Fathers4Justice over an ad campaign criticizing comments she made in the media indicating that she does not believe in shared parenting.

> None of this 50/50 time with the mums and dads – my children live with me; that is it.

The comments appeared in Vogue magazine, and Ms. Winslet does not deny that she uttered them.

Winslet, who has three children by three different fathers, may or may not be handling her family dynamics well, ensuring that her children continue to enjoy the undeniable benefits of a continued relationship with their fathers. That is a moot point. Winslet's personal circumstances are irrelevant. What IS relevant is her assertion that shared parenting, this "50/50 time with mums and dads" – is negative and detrimental to children's well-being.

> "Oh, my God! Those poor children! They must have gone through so much".
>
> Says who? They've always been with me. They don't go from pillar to post; they're not flown here and there with nannies.

Winslet's first husband, Jim Threapleton, agrees with Fathers4Justice, and said he went months without seeing their daughter, Mia, but even so, the point is not how Winslet is managing her own circumstances – the point is that as a public figure, she is explicitly encouraging custodial parents to reject shared parenting.

And for that, she deserves to be called out.

Winslet makes her living as a public figure. Her words were not taken from a private conversation she had with friends. She made her statement in Vogue magazine, which she clearly understands will be read by millions of magazine subscribers and buyers. Total average circulation for Vogue magazine is 1.2 million, which only includes direct purchases. The number of shared reads (you read my copy) increases the circulation number even further. Indeed, that is the point of appearing in Vogue: it keeps her in the public eye and bolsters her value as a performer and public figure, allowing her to charge high prices for her services.

No one cast Winslet as a vindictive, alienating shrew. She did it to herself, so crying foul now is a bit rich.

The simple fact is that divorce, and separation from children is a critical public health issue. Divorced men are 39% more likely to commit suicide when they are separated from their children. The complete article is behind a paywall, but here is the citation:

Daniel S. Felix, W. David Robinson, and Kimberly J. Jarzynka. The Influence of Divorce on Men's Health Journal of Men's Health. September 2013, 10(1): 3-7. doi:10.1016/j.jomh.2012.09.002.

It is unconscionable that Winslet would promote separation as being good for her children, or good for her ex-husbands. She deserves every ounce of opprobrium she has generated.

I am the adult survivor of parental alienation following divorce, and I would like to spend the rest of this article addressing fathers who find themselves in this terrible situation. You can read the story of how the alienation played out here.

Christmas was always the worst time of year. My father was rarely a full participant in the celebrations, but he would drop off gifts, or have them mailed to us, and then be on his way. We had no idea at the time that he was in violation of court orders when he showed up, and that my mother would only permit him to stay for a few minutes. He considered himself lucky to have even that.

We hated him for thinking that being a father meant spending some money and then taking off at the earliest opportunity. Whatever presents or gifts he brought, it was never enough. We showed no gratitude. The words "thank you" were never uttered. We glared at him sullenly and perhaps begrudgingly conceded that some presents were "okay".

We were utterly miserable and angry and ungrateful and terrible to him.

We had no idea that everything my mother had told us was a lie. I feel so wretched now, as an adult, looking back at how my brothers and I behaved towards my father, who, bless his courage and strength, never lashed out at us, and never gave up. I have no idea where he found the heart, but he did.

My father was no angel. He embraced a particularly violent form of Christianity that encouraged… interesting, shall we say… disciplinary techniques. He believed in the value of physical labor, and took that to extremes, sometimes. He believed in the character-building value of hardship. He was not always the best father.

From those flaws, my mother built a careful psychological cage around her children and taught us to hate him. Not just dislike, but to actively despise and hate him. And she succeeded. He faced that hatred and never wavered. It is often said that women grow up to marry men who remind them of their fathers, and I have often said in the past that I am so glad I married a man nothing like my father.

The poison runs deep, and bleeding it out takes a long time.

The truth is that I married a man who has all the strength and character and goodness of my father. His cheerfulness is exactly like my father's unwillingness to ever abandon hope. They are both relentlessly optimistic that thing will work out, eventually. I was blind to that for a very long time.

I cannot imagine the pain I have caused my father, and I take some responsibility for that. As I child, I was more or less helpless against the lies my mother told. I could not understand how I was being manipulated, and I therefore could not resist. As an adult, I have fewer excuses. My father was the one who reached out to me. I cannot say if the day would ever have come that I would have looked for him. The truth about my childhood came as a complete shock, and yet, once I knew, it was all so obvious.

This is the hardest part. All across the world, there are countless fathers, facing down a Christmas season with children who hate them. Who resent them. Who are ungrateful, unappreciative, sullen, unpleasant and just generally unlikeable.

Their minds have been poisoned. They have been subjected to a kind of psychological torture called "parental alienation". It is an extreme form of child abuse and the goal is to deprive both the children and the alienated parent of love.

And it works.

Oh how it works.

But not forever. Resisting parental alienation as it is happening is incredibly difficult. I wish I could offer some happy solution. Here are a few success stories to consider. And a few more.

It is bitterly unfair that both the alienated parent and the alienated children are condemned to missing one another's lives while the children are young and being subjected to extreme brainwashing. And the devastating truth is that the effects can last long after childhood.

In most cases of parental alienation, it is fathers and children who are victims of vindictive mothers – women who are fully prepared to destroy their children psychologically for their own twisted desires.

I am by no means suggesting that alienated parents give up the fight to have their children rescued from the psychological abuse that is parental alienation. Absolutely not. This is an issue that must be understood as deeply harmful abuse with long-lasting effects.

I've lived through both physical and psychological abuse – the psychological was far more difficult to overcome.

And that is the heart of my message. My father was not perfect. And neither was I. I held on to my irrational anger for a long time. Much longer than I should have. I know that. My unwillingness to confront the truth means I lost my father for ten years. Ten years I should have had, but didn't, because I was not willing to see the truth.

And believe me, this is no attempt to garner sympathy – "oh, no, JB, you were just a child, it isn't your fault." That's bullshit. It violates the central maxim of my life: you don't get to choose your childhood, but you do get to choose how you respond to it.

I chose badly.

My children have an adoring grandfather, my husband has a father-in-law he loves, my neighbors have a man who can fix almost anything mechanical, my friends have a conduit into my past and the stories that made me who I am, my community has a watcher who keeps an eye on the pets and children – and I have my father back.

Not because of anything I did.

Because my father never gave up hope.

> What is Christmas? It is tenderness for the past, courage for the present, hope for the future. It is a fervent wish that every cup may overflow with blessings rich and eternal, and that every path may lead to peace.

Agnes Pharo

To every Daddy without his babies this Christmas season: Our hearts are with you.

May that give you the strength to never lose hope.

Merry Christmas.

All the love,

JB

Please help AVFM continue to spread the message that Men's Rights are Human Rights by contributing to our quarterly fundraiser. Thank you.

Editorial note: Merry Christmas and much love and support for Fathers 4 Justice. You guys are heroes. And have a Lousy Christmas, Kate Winslet. Child Abusers like you don't deserve happy Christmases. –DE Feature image by Chrisa Hickey under Creative Commons license.

Must-see video of the week: 84% of UK agree Christmas is ruined for Dads

AVfM Video Source · 23 December 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Aimee Nicholls wrote a wonderful article we published earlier this year, and this year she's created another Christmas video we think you'll all draw inspiration from.

LINKS

LINKS

2013 – My story on whats wrong with family law: http://youtu.be/pjz12QXnHBk

2013 – Tony Ashby Christmas 2013 Hunger Strike: https://www.facebook.com/groups/38135…

2013 – Aimee Nicholls versus the Star Chamber: http://www.avoiceformen.com/mens-righ…

2013 – Psychology today cover my story: http://www.psychologytoday.com/blog/c…

2013 – Researching Forum cover my story: http://researchingreform.net/2013/11/…

2012 – YouGov research on fathers and shared parenting: http://yougov.co.uk/news/2012/06/13/e…

2012 – My Christmas message from last year: http://youtu.be/NxxLe1Up9nQ

2011 – My dad and Matt O'Connors hunger strike: http://youtu.be/SKo5P_9w9Qs

Here's the wonderful video she did last year:

On The Importance Of Being A Supervillain

AVfM Video Source · 23 December 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Please help AVFM continue to spread the message that Men's Rights are Human Rights by contributing to our quarterly fundraiser. Thank you.

My 50 top stories about men and boys' inequality from 2013 (part 4)....

Glen Poole · 24 December 2013 · Archived copy · Original

JUNE

29. Men's psychological needs aren't being addressed because we don't think of men as being vulnerable

Luke Sullivan of Men's Minds Matters wrote an excellent comment piece in The Guardian for Men's Health Week in June on men's psychological vulnerability. He said:

"A more empathic approach to understanding the psychological wellbeing of men and boys is needed. It seems more difficult to think of men as victims and vulnerable. Men, too, can experience physical and sexual abuse, domestic abuse and violence and abuse from other men. They suffer from adversity and experience psychological and emotional difficulties regardless of how physically strong or financially well off they are. While men are advantaged in some respects, they are at greater risk of nearly all major illnesses and injuries, as well as suicide. We also ask men to be protectors and providers for others and send them off to fight wars in far greater numbers, to work down mines and in other dangerous environments, and to stand last in the queue (or not even get in the queue) for help and support."

30. Teenage girl speaks out against the treatment of dads in the family court

One of the most powerful and unexpected voices advocating for fathers rights in the UK this year was 16-year-old Aimee Nicholls. After 11 years of her parents fighting in the family court, Aimee voted with her feet and went to live with her dad. Her video outlining her experience, how the court failed to act in her interests and how she and her father are still unable to have a relationship with her seven-year-old sister, make a powerful testimony.

Aimee created a number of YouTube messages and the most powerful are probably this 10 minute Fathers' Day message and this tear-jerking "for dads not seeing their kids at Christmas" message.

31. Male homelessness rose 62% in past three years

Male homelessness rose again in 2013 though it wasn't reported in the media as "male" homelessness.

According to the latest annual figures 6,437 people were seen rough sleeping in 2012-13, compared with 5,768 the previous year, a 13% rise year on year and an increase of 62% since 2010-11.

As can be seen from this report in The Guardian, the fact that 88% of these rough sleepers are men is not mentioned in the mainstream media, but if you dig down into the data you find that men are eight times more likely to sleep rough in London than women.

This means that out of those 6,437 people, around 5665 are men and 772 are women. The figures do not include homeless people who are squatting or "sofa surfing" on friend's couches.

32. Michael Douglas becomes unlikely champion for male cancer vaccine

Michael Douglas caused a stir this year by claiming that he had contracted throat cancer through oral sex—unwittingly shining a light on the issue that girls are vaccinated against the cancer causing HPV virus but boys are not.

Experts confirmed that while smoking and drinking are the main causes of throat cancer, oral sex can lead to throat cancer through the transmission of the some strains of the HPV virus that is associated with cancer of the penis, anus, mouth and throat (as well as the cervix, vulva and vagina in women).

The campaign aims to give boys equal treatment to girls (as happens in Australia) and vaccinate them against HPV.

The issue of boys getting the vaccine has already been raised in the UK and Scottish parliaments and by the UK charity Throat Cancer Foundation.

In September the President of the Faculty for Public Health backed the call for equal treatment for boys saying:"the actor Michael Douglas' recent comments have helped raise awareness of the links between certain types of HPV and cancer". In November it was revealed that Government advisors were now considering whether to recommend giving the vaccine to boys.

JULY

33. A quarter of boys in Blackpool will die before they reach 65

The latest life expectancy figures from the Office of National Statistics revealed the that huge gender gaps still exist not just between men and women, but from region to region.

According to the figures, a boy born in Blackpool is four times more likely to die before 65 than a girl born in East Dorset, with nearly a quarter of Blackpool boys expected to die before they reach 65.

Men are not pre-destined to die younger than women and there are many, many factors that contribute to men dying younger than women on average.

One of the most interesting voices speaking out in the field of men's health this year was Dr Sarah Hawkes at the Institute of Global Health. In this 10 minute interview "are men ignored in gender development" Hawkes says:

"When it comes to health, contrary to what most people would expect, men actually suffer at least equally and usually more from gender norms and gender behaviours than women do and have less access to the means to mitigate those norms."

34. Men dying in workplace ignored by Government again

The Government's Health and Safety Executive continued to ignore the fact that the vast majority of people who die at work are men again this year.

The annual report on workplace deaths makes no mention whatsoever that year in year out over 95% of people who die at work are men—-their report and press release speak only of "workers".

The blogger "Skimmington" at the Rights of Man blog was the only voice I have found speaking out about this, after manually sifting through a list of named fatalities to discover that 98% of people who died at work in the past 12 months were men.

According to Skimmington:

"Despite the fact that the overwhelming majority of victims were men, the Health and Safety Executive chose not to highlight that in their statistics or press release. They do not even acknowledge it anywhere at all. If the figures were the other way round, they would. So why do they choose do that? Is it because they don't think men matter? Where is their equality impact assessment? Where is their diversity manager talking about it in the media? They chose not to so a clear case of discrimination by omission and institutional sexism."

35. Libertarians fight back against "fourth-wave feminism"

There was a wave of high profile campaigning by what's been dubbed "fourth-wave" feminism this year with the prize for the most entertaining example coming from "Amanda Fucking Palmer" whose naked, musical open letter to the Daily Mail is worth watching as an example of highly innovative campaigning whatever your gender politics.

According The Guardian, other leading voices in the feminist fourth wave include Caroline Criado-Perez who campaigned for women to be represented on bank notes; Laura Bates, founder of the international website Everyday Sexism, Kat Banyard of UK Feminista, who campaigns against lads' mags and Lucy-Anne Holmes, who is calling for an end to topless page three models.

There are two main criticisms of fourth-wave feminists. The first is that they tend to focus on men being problems and women having problems—and issue I touched upon in my Guardian comment piece: online abuse is not limited by gender. I also wrote a blog piece called: online abuse, is a man thing or a woman thing?

The second criticism of fourth-wave feminism is that it is authoritarian and anti-libertarian—which has led to criticism from both feminist libertarians and non-feminist libertarians—most notably at Spiked Online where:

- Editor Brendan O Neil shared his insights from a Spiked editorial meeting on the "new feminism"
- Nancy McDermot dismissed new wave feminists as "zombie feminists"
- Saleha Ali spoke out against the "Lose the Lads Mags" campaign
- Saira Khan said "feminism used to be about freedom, not censorship
- Brendan O'Neill said the hysteria over misogynistic trolls is classic moral panic
- Tim Black complained "the new feminism is just snobbery"
- Patrick Hayes wrote about the "NUS's prissy war on lad culture"
- 17-year old Eleanor Stammeijer spoke on the banning of Robin Thicke's Blurred Lines by some student unions
- Patrick Hayes said "No to modesty bags for lads mags"
- Brendan O'Neill asked "you know which other countries cover up women?"

36. Boys in England and Scotland come bottom of the OECD league for literacy

Scotland and England occupy the bottom two places in the OECD league table of boys' literacy in developed countries.

Research for the Sutton Trust educational charity found that the brightest boys from poor homes in England and Scotland are at least two-and-a-half years behind in reading compared with those from the richest homes, a study suggests.

The study was carried out by John Jerrim at the Institute of Education, University of London. He found that the reading skills of England's youngsters as a whole are heavily linked to their socio-economic background, but that this gap is average for countries in the OECD.

However, when you look just at high achievers – the brightest in each socio-economic group – England and Scotland perform worse than other countries for boys. In England the gap is equivalent to 30 months (two years and six months) of schooling for boys, while in Scotland the gap amounts to nearly three years (two years, 11 months).

37. Soldier Suicides

In July the BBC revealed that one British soldier dies by suicide every week, more than are killed fighting the Taliban in Afghanistan.

The British government does not record the suicide rate among ex-soldiers, but researchers at the BBC's Panorama programme have discovered that 21 serving soldiers killed themselves last year, along with 29 veterans.

This total of 50 male suicides is greater than the number of British soldiers who died in Afghanistan where 44 were killed in the same period (40 of whom died in action).

38. TV lawyer slams Ministry of Justice for ignoring male victims

TV lawyer Marilyn Stowe has slammed the government's Ministry of Justice (MoJ) for ignoring the plight of male victims of domestic violence.

According to Stowe, a family law practitioner and resident legal expert on ITV's This Morning, The MoJ's online guidance on legal aid for victims of domestic violence excludes men, saying:

"To get legal aid you must be able to give your solicitor some evidence that you have been a victim of domestic violence by your partner or husband."

Writing about the issue on her blog, Stowe said:

“Domestic violence against men does exist more frequently than many people imagine, and it certainly should not be casually disregarded in this way. If the government feels that it is appropriate to hang ‘women only’ signs out on a website about practical help for victims, where are men in need supposed to turn?

“It is another message from the establishment that the distress of male victims is imaginary. In the 21st Century we should be beyond lazy stereotypes of women as passive victims and men as perpetual villains.”

39. Social workers must change how they work with men

In July, Professor Vivienne Cree at the University of Edinburgh said social workers need to revisit how they work with men.

Professor Cree is an influential figure who co-authored the 1996 book Working with Men: Feminism and Social Work which promoted the principle that ‘women are our first priority… work with men is done in order to improve the quality of life for women’.

Cree now says it’s time to change our attitudes towards men:

Men are still, more often than not, seen as the problem: they are presented as the absent fathers, abusive partners, sexual predators and generally bad examples for their children.

“Men are, more than ever, presented as dangerous to themselves and others. Women and children, on the other hand, are increasingly seen as vulnerable and in need of protection.

“Life is much more complex and uncertain, as evidence of women who abuse and men who care for others demonstrate. Social work must now revisit how it works with men, learning some of the lessons of the past and accepting the complexity of the lives of women, men and children today.”

Editor’s note: People who’ve read the book “Equality For Men” are saying it’s a “skillfully produced,” “compelling,” “really great,” “truly excellent” book that “focuses on the main point brilliantly” and should be “mandatory reading.” The best way to find out why is click here to buy Equality For Men by Glen Poole. –DE

Please help AVFM continue to spread the message that Men’s Rights are Human Rights by contributing to our quarterly fundraiser. Thank you.

1 year, 5 months and 4 days

Paul Elam and John the Other · 25 December 2013 · Archived copy · Original Noted false rape accuser, and Professor of Biology at the University of Minnesota, Morris, Pee Zed Meyers, has some words of advice for a certain "big shot" (JtO) at AVfM. "A word for Hembling: Yes, rape is a crime. So is falsely reporting a rape."

He's referring to John's comment on the content aggregator website Reddit, where he posted in response to the headline, "Men's rights activists' conspire to cripple college rape reporting system with false reports"

He reposted that headline, appending his own commentary.

"…GOOD! Go forward, brothers, and fuck their shit up. Rape is a crime. If somebody has a report to file of being the victim of this crime – file that report with a POLICE ORGANIZATION, not with some jumped up kangaroo court or administrative star chamber. And when operating in an environment where the star-chamber rules – FTSU with the same fraudulent reports they've tuned their system to process against you."

Strong words. And we note for the record that they were not posted as a matter of AVFM policy. AVFM had nothing to do with the online attack of the rape "reporting" instrument at Occidental College in Los Angeles, which is why you saw JTO's comment on a site aggregator and not as a part of organized activism promoted by our team.

That, however, does not place an editorial value judgement on what happened. While we are not keen from the management position here to place a "right or wrong" value on the attack, we do assert that in the current climate of hostility, rape hysteria, draconian policies and ideological public deception, that such forms of backlash are inevitable.

Now, the thesis driving the good professor's public admonition? Bombing an anonymous rape reporting tool clearly designed to proliferate reports by any means necessary, including providing fertile soil for false reports, is, according to him, an escalation of the problem of fraudulent reports. It's not a statement against the extra-legal processing of criminal complaints by an administrative railroad lacking legal due process.

Should we all now entertain Pee Zed's pantomime; his charade that he is so mentally defective that this needs to be explained as if he'd been lobotomized at some point in his unfortunate existence?

Ah, no. Indeed, we won't waste many keystrokes explaining. Even the occasional victim of prefrontal lobe scrambling that occasionally visits here will probably see the transparent, lying scumbucketry in attempting to circumvent JTO's point by feigning outrage at false allegations — those being the current raison d'être of Free Thought Blogs. Roughly a year after Myers posted an anonymous, fraudulent accusation of rape against another public academic of far greater accomplishment than himself, the egg remains on his face.

> "A word for Hembling: Yes, rape is a crime. So is falsely reporting a rape."

How sweet. Pee Zed has finally found religion.

It is worth pointing out that while falsely reporting a rape to an actual police organization is at least theoretically a crime (it is rarely punished) – filing a phony report of the same to an extra-judicial administrative star chamber is something else entirely.

The "honor" courts now extant on American college campuses have a mandate from the department of education. But that mandate is a profound violation of the foundational principal of due process which has characterized human rights in the western world.

The mechanism of anonymous accusations and administrative show trials are now the "apparatus of justice" on a college campus. Treating them with the respect of a legitimate legal system is, therefore, to endorse the purposeful corruption of justice into ideologically driven fascism.

In fairness it must be said that a significant number of Men's Human Rights Activists have publicly renounced the flooding of the Occidental "reporting" tool with false reports.

We understand their position, but do not agree with it. One comment immediately following JTOs read in part:

> "'Fuck their shit up' has to be done with some sophistication, so you don't look like an asshole with nothing but hate on the agenda. This wasn't the time to do that. The university was under the eye of the feds and now we are under those eyes. I'd call this a serious misfire."

We are inclined to believe this encapsulates the most common aversion to the act of sabotaging of an anonymous false report facilitating system.

There is a public consensus that accusers are always victims. This isn't necessarily an honest consensus. After all, even feminists admit that 1 to 5 percent of "reported rapes" are fraudulent. Some academic studies have placed the number much higher, between 40 and 50 percent, and some senior police officers, speaking publicly have estimated at least similar numbers of reports of rape are fraudulent. In 2010 the Orlando, Florida Police Department felt compelled to issue a public plea for false rape allegations to stop because of the drain they were causing on police resources.

However, the consensus exists, dishonest or not; that an accuser of sexual assault is automatically a true victim of sexual assault. That consensus has real power. Open defiance of this public narrative can earn the owner of nonconforming opinion extreme public censure as well as the loss of public personhood as a "good person" or "good man". The pious, fraudulent shrieking and phony outrage has a chilling effect on the natural expression of healthy human conscience. We refer to that expressed in opposition to obvious evils such as suppression of free speech and elimination of due process, and anonymizing of criminal accusations.

And few people have the stomach to openly defy that pious public consensus when their own public personhood is the price to be paid. To be defined, by public consensus as no longer a decent human being. The threat of loss of the "good man" card is powerful stuff.

We are not good men. As men's human rights activists, we are villains. We may even be a super-villains.

So we will both repeat together what we have both already said separately.

What should we expect to happen when a high profile institution of higher education provides a publicly accessible method for reporting anonymous criminal accusations?

Do we believe that such a tool would be widely publicly embraced? Only if we also believe that our neighbors, co-workers, and all the anonymous travelers in traffic in our day to day lives are individuals of no moral compass, and an infantile, literalist credulity toward the public misinformation we are continuously force fed by commercial media.

On the contrary, presented with free access to an obviously ideologically driven "reporting tool", one which appears tailored to facilitate fraudulent reports, a mentally healthy population will subvert such a corrupt tool.

A mentally healthy individual will engage in the practice of FTSU.

Without apology, without embarrassment, and with a considered evaluation of right and wrong according to mainstream sensibilities.

Without even the prompting of a public-bad-man like JTO, whose endorsement came after the rest of the world have already responded by sabotage to the institution of Occidental College's "reporting form".

Good!, go forward brothers and sisters, and FTSU.

Incidentally, as the mighty Pee Zed has deigned to turn his mighty eye once more on JTO's writing, Its worth noting that as of today, it is 1 year, 5 months and 4 days since the professor was challenged by John to actually use reason, rather than invective to refute or dispute anything written on this site.

The challenge to Pee Zed was first issued in July of 2012, and re-issued half a dozen times since:

> "Address the substance of anything I've written in my last 100 articles on this site in a manner befitting an academic celebrity and intellectual. Show me where I'm wrong, and change my opinion. And do it without recourse to the usual tactics of censure, identity-politics and attempted shaming tactics.
>
> I absolutely swear my opinion is readily changeable, provided a strong, reasoned argument can be made. Do it like a grown up. That's my challenge to you PZ. Act like a man, for a complete full article. If you can do that absent of the usual puerile drivel, I'll publish a permanent article right here on AVfM announcing to the world that you changed my mind."

To date, he has not responded, despite apparently continuing to read every single thing JTO writes. Even comments on places like reddit. A favour neither Paul nor John can return, as tedious, predictable and unsupported invective and puerile authoritarianism make for rather dull reading.

"And gosh, but Hembling is really an awful person".

Feature photo shamelessly stolen from Reap Paden.

Please help AVFM continue to spread the message that Men's Rights are Human Rights by contributing to our quarterly fundraiser. Thank you.

A man's way of healing

Paul Elam · 25 December 2013 · Archived copy · Original

I recently read a piece on fatherhood and attachment parenting (AP). I read and participated in the comments as well. Since then the aftereffects have been bouncing around in my head like a pinball (yes, there is that much room in there) and it just won't leave me alone.

It has nothing to do really with AP or any other kind of parenting. It was more about the emotional reaction I had to the discussion of men and their feelings.

It has reminded me of my father. Not him as a parent, or even a man, but actually the emotional aftermath of his death.

About a month after my father passed I was with a friend in a tavern. It was one of those rare places suited for someone like me. It had walls paneled in dark wood, oversized leather seating strewn across a carpet thick enough to keep the room near soundless, even when it was busy. And it had the look of never having been busy. The memory of quiet conversations hung in the air like the secret history of a thousand friendships. A single, gentleman barkeep polished glasses; on the ready to pour your choice of poison or listen to a joke.

We were just there making quiet small talk, probably poking a little fun at politics or maybe discussing the latest in movies. I don't exactly remember what we were talking about that day. It was over twenty years ago.

At some point, in the middle of a short lull, he asked me, almost as though it were an afterthought. "So, how are you doing now…since your Dad?"

And I told him, you know, pretty much in the way of small talk between two friends in a bar.

"Oh, you know. It's a process. It goes up and down. Pretty normal path of grief, actually. But I am getting along with it. Doing well. It happens to all of us, you know?"

My friend listened to me, nodded his head and downed the last of his beer without saying anything. Then he hopped up from his chair, took a step away, then turned back toward me and leaned down. He spoke, almost whispering, "Another beer?"

And as he spoke he rested his hand on my shoulder. He gave me a gentle, almost non-existent squeeze; just enough pressure, just barely enough, to register, and in it I could feel the most profound love of my friend. It was a touch that made words useless; that transcended any crazy notion that there was something that needed to be said, and indeed proved just how empty and useless the human mouth can be at times.

With that touch, a tear instantly slid from my eye and mercifully tracked down the other side of my face, away from his view.

And before you decide to butcher that moment by observing that I should not be ashamed of my tears, or that I think they should be hidden, please don't do that. I am not ashamed of my tears, nor would my friend have ever harbored any such thought.

The thing is that he did not need to hear the admission of my pain, or see my tears, to know my grief. He knew me. He knew my father had died. So, he knew what he needed to know. He did not require anything from me to offer his love in a way that my heart could take in, like water on a dry sponge. I did not need to lay my grief at his feet or satisfy his need to pull my feelings about the loss of my father out through my lips.

He honored my privacy. He did not dig and scrape and invade underneath my platitudes to get at the rawness of my loss. Nor was he fooled by the shallowness of my answers. He simply walked around all those things and offered me what only another man could. The silent, undemanding love of a brother.

In his touch was the compassion of a thousand therapists. And in his honor of my private way of grieving was the skill so few therapists ever learn. He, in that brief but timeless moment, was the protector of my broken heart; standing as a sentry guarding my wounds and allowing me to lean on him in the way of men.

These days, when I hear the prattle of the allegedly enlightened about the hearts of men, I almost always laugh at their lack of understanding; about their desperation to prove competence and expertise in matters on which they are truly clueless.

I listen to them talk about men's need to be ok with sharing their feelings, about being emotionally open, but most often this is all framed in the most disrespectful and ignorant tone of someone asserting that men would be better off if they were more like women.

As always, a bushel of foolishness usually contains a kernel of truth. Certainly men do need to give themselves more permission to feel, and to express it. But as I look past all the sneering condescension of those who think men would benefit from sitting in circles and passing Kleenex, satisfying the sick and outrageous egos of book hucksters and Oprah aficionados, I am reminded of my friend and his healing love.

I am reminded that emotional pain is not a dog and pony show, that love is not a brass band or a group hug, and that friendship is defined and proven by the people in it. With all respect for women, and in honor of their ways to handle their own hearts, this is all especially true for men.

I am not pretending you can meet all of a man's needs with such a simple expression. But I received healing that day; a kind of healing that I carry with me and always will. It did not require an emotional breakthrough, or some vast cathartic moment or rounds of counseling, insurance forms and the dissection of my childhood. All that was needed was the company of a friend who chose to see my pain, and who chose to offer comfort, not with his ego and false wisdom, but with his love and grounded respect.

This is the way of men, when we get out of their way and choose not to force them into the mold of ideologues. Look as hard as I may, I can find nothing in it to fault.

Please help AVFM continue to spread the message that Men's Rights are Human Rights by contributing to our quarterly fundraiser. Thank you.

My 50 top stories about men and boys' inequality from 2013 (part 5)....

Glen Poole · 25 December 2013 · Archived copy · Original

AUGUST

40. Government accused of not doing enough to tackle men's unequal risk of suicide

In August the BBC's Today Programme ran a feature about male suicide with the excellent men's charity the Campaign Against Living Miserably (CALM). The charity's key complaint was that the Department of Health is failing to recognise the problem.

Jane Powell, the campaign's founder and director, told the Today programme that the problem was "cultural", she explained that "we don't see men as needing help".

12 men a day currently die by suicide in the UK.

41. There are 3 ancient rules of masculinity

One of the most interesting new takes on masculinity in 2013 came from Psychologist Martin Seager. The former government advisor is undertaking research on the ancient rules of masculinity in an attempt to put these rules into words.

Martin, a pioneer of male psychology in the UK, is hosting a male psychology conference in 2014 and has been campaigning for several years for the British Psychological Society to approve a Male Psychology Section.

Speaking on BBC Radio 4 this week, Martin said there are three ancient rules of masculinity which we've been which add up to a male script:

- Men should be fighters and winners
- Men should be protectors and providers
- Men should retain mastery and control

Seager says these are shame rules which means that when a man is unable to remain control or to provide or be a winner he may sit on those feelings which can make him more vulnerable to suicide for example.

Seager shared his masculinity rules during a BBC Radio 4 Today Programme interview about male suicide.

42. Yes, men can be victims of online abuse, too

August saw an outbreak of media coverage about men abusing women online, and so trolling—like stalking, domestic violence and sexual violence—became another social problem that is presented as "men doing it to women".

I attempted to add some balance to the debate with an article at The Guardian called "online abuse is not limited by gender", in which my key was simply that if you cast a wide enough net you soon discover that online abuse is not limited by gender.

I also compiled a mix of views in a blog post "online abuse, is it a man thing or a woman thing" which uncovered some interesting stories such as online bullying of women by other women; a TV journalist being harassed after a women sparked a tirade of online abuse and comedian Dom Joly discovering that one of the people anonymously trolling him was a 14-year-old girl.

I also wrote a longer feature for the Good Men Project called "men we have a problem with online abuse" in which I asked:

"So where do men who are concerned about all victims of violence and abuse stand when people speak out about men's abuse of women? Do we get behind them? Do we leave them to get on with it? Do we say 'what about the men'? Do we say what about everybody?

"From my perspective, holding men who threaten women with rape to account for their actions is a welcome move and at the same time we need to ask ourselves this very important question—why are we collectively more tolerant of violence against men and boys?

"Until we ask that question, the majority of gendered conversations about violence will continue to focus on men abusing women and when it comes to violence and abuse, online or off, that isn't the only gender angle we need to focus on."

SEPTEMBER

43. Are women just as likely to rape men….?

Ally Fogg wrote an eye-opening blog about sexual aggression by women towards men.

Fogg highlighted the findings of 2010 research from the US that revealed that the proportion of men being forced to penetrate women in the previous year was identical to the rates of women being raped.

Fogg admits that he has been dubious and sceptical about the findings for some time and drew a blank when he tried to find other reports to back up the finding. Then as he dug deeper he discovered that the data wasn't unique and that there was a raft of research going back to the 1980s that made similar claims.

"Society needs to be aware that it is a serious issue, not a joke", concludes Fogg. "Our mental health and social care systems need to be more alive to the extent of the issue, be open to the possibility that emotionally and sexually troubled men might be troubled for this very reason.

"And this might sound bizarre, but perhaps women need to be aware that they can and do assault and abuse men. I strongly suspect many women genuinely believe that any man will be (literally) up for it at any time, and will always be glad of a sexual thrill. This is as much of a rape myth as any other."

In November, American psychotherapist Tom Golden in the U.S. pointed to separate research that revealed that boys were more likely to experience the most severe forms of sexual abuse than girls, with male victims being around 10 times more likely to be abused by a woman than female victims.

44. Male victims of domestic violence are invisible

Abused Men in Scotland (Amis) continued to evolve as one of the most forward-thinking voices in the world of domestic violence. One of the key contributions they have made to the debate this year is highlighting the existence of the "public story" of domestic violence which tells us that domestic abuse is perpetrated exclusively by men against women.

Nick Smithers of Amis highlighted the "public story" concept in an excellent article for The Scottish Review. According to Nick:

"Men experiencing domestic abuse can be caught in a double bind – the fabled stoicism of the Scottish male preventing many from seeking help to escape the trap of coercive control and miserable existence. The fear that, if they leave, their children will remain in the care of an abusive parent is very real for many fathers as the public story powerfully marginalises them from apparently universal services.

"While some may bemoan the Scottish man and his unwillingness to seek help it behooves others to consider the services they provide and to question how open they are to men and how much consideration they give to accessibility to all.

"Is it right that we dismissively blame men's reticence to seek help on their innate characteristics when domestic abuse services are framed as violence against women services across the vast majority of the country? With such unambiguous terminology it is hardly surprising that a man will not pick up the phone and ask for help."

To be continued…

Editor's note: People who've read the book "Equality For Men" are saying it's a "skillfully produced," "compelling," "really great," "truly excellent" book that "focuses on the main point brilliantly" and should be "mandatory reading." The best way to find out why is click here to buy Equality For Men by Glen Poole. –DE

Please help AVFM continue to spread the message that Men's Rights are Human Rights by contributing to our quarterly fundraiser. Thank you.

A Woman Should Never Hit A Man: Common Sense

AVfM Video Source · 25 December 2013 · Archived copy · Original

You know, this is one of the most controversial articles Paul Elam ever wrote: When is it OK to Punch Your Wife?

Yet somehow I suspect those who roundly condemned him for that article will have much to say to this woman:

You know why? I'll tell you why. Paul Elam treats women like adults with agency, just like this woman does.

And the operant definition of "misogynist" in today's society is "anyone who thinks women are full-fledged responsible adults and should be treated as one."

Welcome to the "Misogyny Club," KCNOODLE. Or, more seriously, welcome to adulthood. Let's hope more people join us. These days it feels like we're few and far between.

Please help AVFM continue to spread the message that Men's Rights are Human Rights by contributing to our quarterly fundraiser. Thank you.

In the memetime...

VFM News and Commentary · 26 December 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Undoubtedly this will be treated like slut shaming, but probably by a bunch of really stupid sluts, so who cares….

[image]

Please help AVFM continue to spread the message that Men's Rights are Human Rights by contributing to our quarterly fundraiser. Thank you.

.@Whiteribbon is a sexist, anti-male hate group which spreads vile propaganda and false cultural narratives. #whiteribbon

Dean Esmay · 26 December 2013 · Archived copy · Original

The YouTuber and social media critic known only as Fidelbogen, one of the prime movers behind Coalition JS38, has created a meme for Twitter that is well worth repeating:

[image]

If there is any flaw to this meme–and it is barely a flaw, for you can argue that what I suggest is unnecessary–it is that Fidelbogen did not make sure that the people at the White Ribbon campaign got the message directly. To understand this, it is probably necessary for a digression and short tutorial on Twitter, how to use it, and why you, as a Men's Human Rights Advocate, probably ought to be using it.

I am frequently told by friends that they "do not understand" Twitter. These are invariably older people ("older" in this context being almost anyone over the age of 25), and are usually veterans of online forums, blogs, and/or places like Facebook. They are frustrated by Twitter because they expect it to be something it is not: a forum for lengthy discussions. It is no such thing, it will never be any such thing, and to use it effectively you must throw away and forget every preconception and look at it as a different thing.

Fuming that Twitter does not work the way you want it to work is as pointless as railing with anger that a movie is not in 3D, or that a book you are reading does not include smells and sound effects. Further, if you fume that you are "better" than Twitter and proudly insist that Twitter is pointless, that is an exercise in arrogance. It is a reality that Twitter is one of the most influential information platforms in the world. In some ways, it is the most influential. Television show and movie producers and ratings organizations use and watch Twitter to measure how popular a TV show or movie is. Politicians use and watch Twitter. Major industrial leaders watch and use Twitter. The White House uses Twitter. So do the Pope and countless other religious leaders.

Shaking your head and saying this is some sort of proof of the decline of Western Civilization is also pointless. It exists. It is massively popular and, more importantly, it is massively influential, and to understand why, it is important to understand what it is, and what it is not.

It is not a blog. It is not a discussion forum. It does not have convenient threading. It does not allow lengthy discourse. You should instead think of it as an exercise in discipline and restraint, like writing a haiku. You must distill your message to its absolute essence. If you cannot make what you say extremely pithy, with a straightforward and easily-digested message, you need another medium. If you find this frustrating as a writer, think of it as a challenge: how can you make your point in as few words as possible? And if you have multiple points to make, which of them are truly important and which can you do without if you must?

> First time Twittering
>
> Tweeter tries to write a tract
>
> Message goes nowhere

Why so few words? Because Twitter is not a a forum, and it is not a blog. Twitter is not and never shall be those things. Nor will a submarine ever be a helicopter, nor shall a penguin ever be an antelope. Nor will an article be an encyclopedia. So you must stop wishing for Twitter to be what it isn't, and embrace it for what it is.

So what is it? Simply put, it is telephone texting with a few creative twists added.

Let me repeat this point for emphasis, so it sinks in: it is telephone texting, with a few creative twists. Only instead of using a telephone number to send the message, it uses a Twitter address, and all twitter addresses start with @. My Twitter address, for example, is @deanesmay

Twitter was designed to work primarily as a telephone app. For added convenience, they created a web interface which you may also use, although it was really designed to fit compactly into a telephone. And because it uses technology that is fundamentally the same as telephone texting, you are limited to 140 characters.

The other twist is that whatever you tweet is public information. So imagine that anyone could connect to your phone and see every text you ever sent out. Does that seem not-very-private? That's because it isn't. So bear that part in mind, what you tweet you should treat as you would any public communication. Anyone who Follows you, and even those who do not, can see anything you tweet, any time, unless you block your account.

If it seems impossible to say anything meaningful in such a format, contemplate that you sound like someone in 1890 complaining that the Telegraph was destroying the art of letter-writing and that you could say nothing useful by telegraph. So, you know, a telegram like this must have been a completely useless communication, right?

> DAD HAD STROKE STOP CAN'T FIND YOUR BROTHER STOP PLEASE COME HOME STOP

Hmm, yes, nothing meaningful in such a short message rendered in such primitive text. Why did anyone ever use such worthless technology as the telegraph?

The truth: Twitter, like the old telegraph, is an exercise in restraint, in learning to put the maximal information in a minimal amount of space. If you can't be pithy, that's not Twitter's problem, it's yours.

So whether you put Twitter on your phone, or, like me, just use its handy web interface, you must take off your author hat and put on your announcer hat: you have something you want to say and you must say it in as few words as possible. In fact, not just as few words as possible, as few letters. Because of this, abbreviations abound. And before you whine that you don't like some of today's abbreviations, ask yourself why modern abbreviations are somehow inferior to classics like QED, SOS, etc.

As a bonus, however, you have a choice: you can address your message to a single party, a small number of parties, or, to anyone generally interested in a particular subject. To address to a single party, you use their Twitter address. To address multiple parties with an interest in a subject, you create or follow an existing group called a "hashtag." Hashtags always start with the # character. Thus anyone following the subject of the White Ribbon campaign is likely checking #whiteribbon at least now and then.

Twitter also sometimes makes it possible for you to see a "conversation," but frankly it does not do this very well. You are, most of the time, better off at thinking what message you want to send to an individual, and it's up to them whether they respond or not.

Contemplate the fact that million-dollar decisions, and questions affecting millions, are now frequently answered (or at least first asked) via this medium, and you realize that any fulminating that you dislike the medium is foolish; it is the message that matters. Saying nothing important can happen in 140 characters is like saying semaphore has no purpose.

Oh yes, there is one other nice feature: you can "retweet" a message. All that means it that you've repeated the message to anyone who happens to be following you on Twitter. You can follow any individual you want to see their tweets, and any individual may follow you to see yours. Every time you retweet, you help to spread that same message to others. It's rather subversive that way, really.

So. It can be argued that Fidelbogen made a minor oversight here: he did not send his important, 100% accurate, vitally important message directly to @whiteribbon (and @whiteribbonaust), which is the address of the bigoted hatemongers, the enablers and encouragers of domestic violence and child abuse, who run the hate campaign known as White Ribbon. In my own tweets on the matter, I made sure to include @whiteribbon directly, and not just anyone who happened to be reading the #whiteribbon hashtag.

Some will probably call this form of activism “slacktivism.” This, I submit, is like suggesting that political tracts served no purpose in 1770s America. Yes, taking a revolutionary stance may make you unpopular in some circles. It may even cause family members and so-called friends to deride you or try to shame you into silence. What rabble-rousing troublemaker ever lived who did not have people in his life who mocked him or advised him he was being foolish?

If you want to change the world, you’ve got to spread the message that change is needed, and let the powers that be know that they must either change or perish–and that their only way of shutting you up is to either kill you or change their ways.

One last tip on Twitter, which I otherwise hope you will sign up for. When you tweet, try not to call people names, swear sparingly (saving such usage for maximum effect if you use it at all), and never issue anything that could be confused as a threat, or even a threat-oid like “I hope you die in a fire” or other such hyperbole. Choose your words carefully. Say exactly what you mean. Here was my message, inspired by Fidelbogen’s, for example:

> @Whiteribbon is a sexist, anti-male hate group which spreads vile propaganda and false cultural narratives. #whiteribbon

You can feel free to retweet that (which the White Ribbon hatemongers will receive copies of), or you can make up your own.

Good luck to my fellow workers in the vinyard. Go FTSU on Twitter. And discover how much fun it can be.

Editorial note: Image of hatemonger Patrick Green of the White Ribbon Campaign used under Creative Commons license as found here on Wikimedia Commons.–DE

Please help AVFM continue to spread the message that Men’s Rights are Human Rights by contributing to our quarterly fundraiser. Thank you.

Movie Review: The Hunt

Paul Elam · 26 December 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Movie reviews are not my thing. I have never written one until now. Indeed, the last time I even saw a movie that would have inspired a review from me for its relevance to men's rights was Sam Mendes' 1999 masterpiece American Beauty; the story of an average American man, Lester Burnham (Kevin Spacey), who goes full bore MGHOW after dealing with a bitch of a wife and watching an 18 year old young man tell his boss to fuck off. Of course, the story is not just that simple, but the movie conveyed all the subtlety and nuance required to carry the MGTOW message with power and sensitivity.

In one way it's a shame I never wrote a review. It was before I was blogging. In another way it is just as well. Unfortunately Mendes, erstwhile sperm donor for sociopath broodmare Kate Winslet, is now on record supporting her life as an overdressed welfare whore.

I was fortunate, however, to have just watched a 2012 production of the Danish film, The Hunt (Jagten), and cannot resist sharing it with readers with glowing recommendation.

The film, directed by Thomas Vinterberg, stars Mads Mikkelsen as Lucas, a divorced father who is falsely accused of sexually abusing children at the kindergarten where he works as a teacher. The story begins with Lucas contending with an alienating ex-wife who is using the family court system to undermine his relationship with his teen-age son. He takes refuge from his ongoing grief with healthy, loving relationships with the school's children. From this point on you become aware that the makers of this film are going to take off the gloves and tell this story with gritty, often gut-wrenching realism.

It is pointless for me to issue spoiler alerts here. This is a brutal story with no surprises, at least not for those who have ingested a red pill. Lucas is accused by a vindictive child, Klara (Annika Wedderkopp), after he gently rejects her crush on him. She parrots a statement she heard from her brother about an erect penis, points the finger at Lucas, claiming he exposed himself to her, and everyone goes fucking crazy. It immediately sends his life into a tailspin and turns his community into something at least as monstrous as child predators.

The town mob gets a lot of inspiration from the school headmistress, Grethe (Sussie Wold), who conducts a shallow and meaningless interview of an instigating child, and immediately goes nuclear. She fires Lucas and informs the authorities, She also tells all parents of the school children about the danger that he has more than one victim, advising them all to be on the lookout for symptoms of sexual abuse, like headaches and bedwetting. Grethe repeatedly reminds fellow characters and viewers alike that "children don't lie" about these things, even as the makers of this movie remind us that they most certainly do.

Lucas is arrested, and is later cleared of charges, but not before the community turns vicious. His dog is killed, he is beaten by employees of a grocery store for trying to buy food there and his ex-wife seizes on the charges against him to try to drive a permanent wedge between him and his son.

There is very little in this film on the legal process over the allegation. For those interested there is an adequate treatment of the prosecutorial malfeasance often involved in these cases in the 1995 American TV Movie, Indictment: The McMartin Trial. It is the true story of the notorious McMartin Preschool case in California, the hysteria from which resulted in the longest, most expensive (and completely unnecessary) criminal trial in American history.

What The Hunt (as in Witch), lacked in addressing the criminal justice system, it more than made up for with its deft treatment of the interpersonal tragedy and society's instantaneously vengeful mentality in the wake of sexual allegations against men.

A brilliant screenplay (Tobias Lindholm, Thomas Vinterberg) helped Mikkelsen deliver a flawless performance as a man first bewildered and then sinking into the morbid insanity of his circumstances; ultimately fighting back as the world around him turns increasingly hostile and dangerous.

The narrative is utterly convincing and realistic, from Klara's mother, Agnes (Anne Louise Hassing), disregarding and suppressing her daughter's admission that she made the story up, to the portrayal of men in the story, who were the constant deliverers of proxy violence against Lucas, but who were also, in much smaller numbers (including his son), the only ones who stayed loyal to him as he worked to defend his name. Central to the story is Klara's father, Theo, whose slow, compelling realization that Lucas is innocent is skillfully played by Thomas Bo Larsen.

The staff of the kindergarten (where Lucas was the only male employee) was the most histrionic and reckless in stoking the fires of revenge in the community, telling themselves, each other and anyone else who would listen that every child at the school with a headache is probably one of Lucas' victims.

This is where the movie shines. It is a remarkable portrayal to two very human maladies at once. The first is the story's real victim, Lucas, who very nearly succumbs as the accusation rips a chasm in his life. And, even as the lie takes its toll on him personally, it also spreads like a cancer through the entire community, obliterating its collective capacity for reason; fostering incredible heartlessness and evil in otherwise decent people, and worsening the evil already in residence in others.

It is the human instinct to protect children, especially females, and how mindlessly destructive that instinct can be, that is the real story here.

And, sadly, we are reminded by the movie's makers that the truth, no matter how simple or obvious, will not remedy the consequences of this particular brand of lie. In this movie, just as it is in real life, Lucas will never be free of the anchor chain that any female can wrap around a man's neck. There will never be a day when his nightmare really ends. He will always be a marked man.

On an even more somber note, this story is a reminder of the treacherous path we are now on, thanks to the toxic alliance of feminism and traditionalism. Due process of law is one of man's most noble inventions. It is the guardian that stands watch between human beings and their tendency to destroy each other – and themselves. Feminists seek to destroy that sacred failsafe against human fallibility, and traditionalists take marching orders to destroy accused men as though they were issued directly from the mouth of God.

I have never seen that more clearly portrayed than in The Hunt. This is a must-see movie.

Editor's note: This article is also available in Romanian.

White Knights and Acolytes

Anja Eriud · 27 December 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Been meaning to do this for a while, and now the time is I believe, right. The Men's Human Rights Movement (MHRM) is part of a larger activism spectrum, with feminists on one end – the nasty end – and Men's Human Rights Activists on the other end – the good end. It is an eclectic mix of sites, blogs and youtube channels gradually coalescing around one single idea:

MEN'S RIGHTS ARE HUMAN RIGHTS.

The reason I include feminism at the shitty end and included a shitty end, is because the MHRM is the answer to feminism, is the positive, and on-the-side-of-the-angels Human Rights Movement, to feminism's negative and most definitely on-the-side-of-evil and hatred.

In between these two points is a mixed bag of, first, pseudo-feminists also known as "useful idiots," pawns of feminism, who spout meaningless "women's rights" rubbish and "I only believe in equality" crap. Aligned alongside them are the "White Knight" men who champion women, and not just demonstrably good women, but all women, because you see, all women are special simply for being women.

These white knights have other names: manginas, male feminists, "traditional men." But I prefer a simpler more descriptive word – fools.

There are some other types in this mess in the middle of the spectrum that bear closer scrutiny. These are for example, the chameleons, the shapeshifters, the "whichever way the wind blows" types, one minute they're for men's rights, the next they're talking about how women are actually "a bit discriminated against" don't ya know?

They pay lip service to Men's Rights but really don't want to get too mean about bad behavior from women. Because after all they can prove that NAWALT (Not All Women Are Like That) because these are usually married men, or those in a long-term relationship who have a "good woman" and while they might have experienced a quick blast of truly toxic femininity in their lives, it passed, and they dusted themselves off and voilà, everything came up roses for them.

What they don't actually comprehend, or even glimpse, is that their constant smug affirmation of how "happily married" or "happily coupled up" they are, is an insult. It is a self-absorption of such massive proportions that it blinds them to two things:

The core mission of the MHRM, and the majority of experiences of most men and boys.

It is a slap in the face, a calculated and blithely unaware insult to that core mission, and to the men and boys for whom the MHRM exists to support, to fight for, and to stand up for.

I'm glad they're happy, pleased they have this in their lives but, they are the lucky ones – the blessed – the exception. This is a good thing, but to wave it in the faces of the men and boys who the MHRM exists to serve is thoughtless.

But, they are either incapable or unwilling to see beyond the end of their own noses, to step outside their own limited perspective and see the big picture. All issues must be filtered through the rose-coloured spectacles of their personal lives. Oh yes, they're "sympathetic" and have a superficial grasp of the issues. But the fact that it never occurs to them to shut the fuck up about what a great life/wife/girlfriend they have and continue to wave this smug little world in the faces of deeply hurt, devastated and angry men illustrates how clueless they are about what the MHRM is about.

These are the acolytes. If it's got a vagina then they're hooked, if it plays the "woman card" then you may kiss men's rights goodbye, if it says "I'm just a girl" then it's "gosh darn it and shucks, let's just make a nice comfy place for this little gal to sit herself down" and of course "guys watch your tone, there's laaaaaaaaaaaadies present – watch that mouth buster!"

Which leads me on to the next group in this mixed bag. They are perhaps the most devious, the most underhanded of all, the "I'm not a feminist but…." types. These are those who see the wind changing, who recognise that feminism is dying and realise that if feminism dies, if Men's Rights become a viable and potent force in the cultural, social and political world, then the "women are special" myth dies as well.

This is exactly what is starting to happen. Feminism is dying, women are losing the shield of "perpetual victim and perpetually special" that has served them so well, helping to absolve them of accountability and personal responsibility for themselves.

So, they come, they come sniffing around men's rights sites and blogs with a very specific agenda, to tame men's rights activism, to give it a female twist, to bend it into a woman-centred shape, that they can approve of. After all, men don't get to have rights movements, men couldn't possibly know what the important issues are, nope, men need a certain type of female to come along and knock them back into shape.

They write articles about how "everybody just misunderstands feminism" and "women are still not equaaaaaaall" and "men are still being mean to women", and on and on and on.

But, as with all things, women know that in order to get men to readjust their attitude, they need other men to act as "enforcers" to prevail upon their "brothers in arms" to "see things from the woman's perspective." Again.

We are witnessing the birth of feminism 4.0, the "man-friendly" feminism, the "here's a few crumbs now shut up and let us take care of this whole men's rights" hoo ha. This is the feminism that is now evolving to take into account the growing voices of men, those voices that must not be allowed to get out of control, they must not be allowed to drown out women's voices (as if that was even possible) therefore, some small concessions must be made, a few crumbs thrown men's way, but the goal?

Feminism gets to remain in charge, feminism still gets to control the discourse, and that discourse will be, and always is, from a Woman's Perspective.

But, of all these idiots, worst of all are the male fools, the ones who write articles about how big of a fool they are, who proudly announce their stupidity by declaring themselves to be feminists, how they support "women's rights" and how all you guys need to get back on your knees and start worshiping the golden uterus again.

Let me explain something for those of the "thinking is hard" mindset: feminism entrenches and translates gynocentrism into political power, it informs public policy, legislation and economic policy.

But it is Women, feminists or not, who entrench hypergamy, the disposability of men, the cultural, political and socially, lesser status of me into everyday life. Women who perpetuate, validate and insinuate the anti-male bias that exists in and at every level of our cultures and societies. Women who drive the engine of feminism, who feed this toxic vile ideology with the corrosive and putrid fuel it needs to keep going.

I'm female, and there is not one single Human Right that I do not have, and then some. Where I live there is absolutely no law, no piece of legislation in existence, that violates any one of my universally-recognised Human Rights. Not one.

In order for me to obtain, or be endowed with, any more "rights" I would have to become a feminist and find some pathetic meaningless pointless "issue" to have a whine about.

And Hell will Freeze Over, before I would become a feminist, in fact, before I would give two flying fucks about "women's rights." Anyone, female or male, who thinks or believes for one microsecond that "women's rights" is a valid issue is a moron who wouldn't know a Human Rights abuse if it jumped up and bit them on the backside.

So, could all you fools, white knights, manginas and acolytes playing at being Men's Rights activists kiss my female Irish arse and grow a brain. Thanks.

This item first published on Not A Feminist.

Please help AVFM continue to spread the message that Men's Rights are Human Rights by contributing to our quarterly fundraiser. Thank you.

Parental Alienation & Child Abduction: Australian Govt in collusion with mother

AVfM Video Source · 27 December 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Although it is difficult to trust mainstream news sources on cases such as this, the media usually spins whatever tale it wants to tell, this story is all too believable, and appears to be an excellent expose on how the entire nation of Australia was fooled… for a while… by a child-abusing family.

Via AstroKidNJ. There's an epilogue, which we'll publish in the next day or so.

Please help AVFM continue to spread the message that Men's Rights are Human Rights by contributing to our quarterly fundraiser. Thank you.

As Expected: Physical Fitness Standards Lowered and Delayed Again for Female US Military Members

Michael Conzachi · 28 December 2013 · Archived copy · Original

While writing this, I just got an email update that the Military Justice Improvement Act has been passed in congress and is on its way to being signed by the President as part of the National Defense Authorization Act. I am going to have to do some digging to see exactly what changes and amendments have been made. Initially, it looks like the worst case scenario. MC

As we have seen so many times before, military standards for females are reduced in order for them to be "equal."

The United States Marine Corps quietly announced recently on social media that the current requirement for female Marines to do a minimum of three (3) pull-ups as part of their training by January 1, 2014 has been delayed for another year. Currently, females are not required to do even a single pull-up, but rather a test called a "flexed-arm hang" in which they can score points based on the amount of time that they can hang from a pull-up bar absent any gear. A maximum score can be obtained if they hang for 70 seconds with their chin over the bar.

http://cnsnews.com/news/article/barbara-boland/female-marines-not-required-do-1-pull http://www.dailymail.co.uk/news/article-2530172/Women-U-S-Marines-SPARED-new-physical-fitness-requirement-wont-three-pull-ups-pass-muster.html http://www.thegatewaypundit.com/2013/12/pc-insanity-female-marines-cant-do-pullups-but-will-be-allowed-to-serve-on-front-lines-anyway/

U.S. Marine Corps spokesman Captain Eric Flanagan stated that 55% of female recruits tested at the end of boot camp were unable to do three pull-ups as compared to 1 percent of male recruits. Off the record, Marine Corps Officers stated that mandating the three pull-up rule at this time would risk losing new recruits as well as current female Marines who could not pass the test.

Three pull-ups? Really? I'm an old guy with two rotator cuff surgeries and can still do 15-20 during a routine workout. Hell, I can do three with just my nose hair. Who in their right mind; in any branch of the military would want anyone, male or female, who could not do the basic minimum in order to pass boot camp? Even three is not sufficient for combat operations and I wouldn't want a male next to me who could only do the minimum.

This just goes to show you that despite the vast preparation programs afforded to prospective military recruits, especially women, the knowledge ahead of time of the physical fitness requirements that well over half of all women, at the end of boot camp still can't perform the minimum. So much for equality. How are they going to perform under stressful combat conditions wearing 20-30 pounds of body armor, 50-60 pounds of gear, helmet, weapon and ammo, while bullets and RPG's are flying?

Author Walter Williams in a 1999 article entitled "Feminization of the Military" reported on a study conducted at the women's boot camp at Parris Island South Carolina which found that nearly half of all female recruits didn't have sufficient strength to throw a hand grenade with enough distance to keep from injuring themselves.

Take a look at this video.

Three were nearly killed, two of them male.

http://econfaculty.gmu.edu/wew/articles/97/military-fem.html

An initial kill radius of a standard hand grenade is approximately 5 meters while the injury radius is about 15 meters, and for the sake of argument, a hand grenade weighs about a pound. If you're within about 50 feet of an exploding grenade, you're going to get hit with something.

Retired Army Lieutenant Colonel Ralph Peters, a military expert author and Fox News contributor has stated that the military, despite all the post-modern technology is still essentially physical. He stated "If you can't pull yourself up, have the decency to pull yourself out."

Pentagon Insider and retired Army Lieutenant Colonel Robert L. McGinnis, in his book "Deadly Consequences: How Cowards are Pushing Women into Combat" states that this vast social experiment will have deadly consequences." "We are sacrificing combat effectiveness on the altar of political correctness."

http://www.amazon.com/Deadly-Consequences-Cowards-Pushing-Combat/dp/1621571904

This book should be a must read for every member of Congress and the Department of Defense. If you want political correctness, this is not it.

Physical fitness standards have declining for years for female members and recruits. Now when the feminist minded rocket scientists at the Pentagon make it policy to allow women in combat units, they can't get a substantial number to pass the most basic of fitness standards to be effective. So they delay the minimum requirements for yet another year in preparation for the implementation of females in combat units by 2016.

After so many studies spanning a number of years, basic common sense would dictate that the vast overwhelming majority of women simply do not possess the physical strength necessary to perform effective combat operations. Are there some women who are fit enough for combat duty? I am sure there are, but the numbers do not justify radical lowering of basic fitness standards in order to satisfy some feminist social experiment.

Are there females who can do a variety of jobs in the military? Of course there are, and they are needed, but not in front line combat units. It's one thing to pass a basic minimum fitness test but another thing to "Man-Up" when the shit hits the fan. I am not even going into the other related physical and medical issues nor the social issues that make this a ridiculous proposition.

Yet despite all of this knowledge, the studies, the opinions of medical experts and evidence, exercise physiologists, physical fitness instructors, the Pentagon is still pushing this forward to satisfy the microgram of exceptionally loud feminists who claim that women can do everything a man can do. Ask that same question to the young male infantry Soldier or Marine who is put in harm's way and getting ready to clear a building or engage in a firefight with insurgents, or jump over a wall to get clear of a suicide bomber.

Men have already borne the brunt of the vast overwhelming number of wartime deaths and injuries. The enemies to world peace that our nation and other nations face constantly strive to outdo and exploit our military weaknesses. With political correctness run amok and in a state of feminist lunacy, why would anyone in a position of decision making, willingly place us at further risk?

I think that if you ask the fathers, sons, brothers and friends on the front lines and in harm's way the same questions, you will get the same sentiment.

Please help AVFM continue to spread the message that Men's Rights are Human Rights by contributing to our quarterly fundraiser. Thank you.

Janet Street-Porter: the most vile woman in Britain?

Mike Buchanan · 28 December 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Our thanks to J for pointing us to this story. An hour ago he called and spluttered, 'Mike, you won't believe what the hag has written about today!' Sure enough, he was referring to a piece by the 'personality' and 'journalist' Janet Street-Porter. I can't recall when a piece in a newspaper – British or otherwise – last made me so angry.

The Daily Mail has many fine female columnists and one truly vile one, Janet Street-Porter. At the very time of year when so many men are suffering the most due to denial of access to their children, because their vindictive ex-partners employ the services of the state to enforce that denial, JS-P has been so cruel as to write a piece published in today's edition titled, 'Deadbeat dads are the real problem'. It's the second story in her column:

http://www.dailymail.co.uk/femail/article-2528123/Janet-Street-Porter-Never-EVER-trust-celeb-tries-tell-theyre-normal.html

In a vile piece, possibly the most vile is this:

> In this country, courts do not deny dads access to their children unless they are deemed a threat. There has to be a very good reason not to grant them the right to see their kids every other weekend.

Leaving aside the issue of whether access to children 'every other weekend' is reasonable access – we believe it's not – can JS-P possibly be unaware how blatantly untrue these remarks are? More importantly, can her editor be unaware? And how about this?

> One new study reckons there are about 1 million dads who live apart from their children – one in ten of all dads – a huge number. After talking to 1,000 dads who were separated from their children, it emerged that many were not working, had a poor education and had married or lived with someone three or more times.

You'd be forgiven for thinking '1 million dads' live apart from their children through choice. We're not told what the 'new study' is, of course. That aside, is she implying that it's reasonable to deny fathers access to their children, if they're not working? Or if they've had a poor education (hardly their own fault, after all)? Or if they've married or lived with someone three or four times? As far as the last point is concerned, Kate Winslet would fall in the same category, having had three children by three different men. Would JS-P favour denying Winslet access to her children? JS-P herself has been married four times. Pot, kettle, black? And how about this?

> Of course, some women deny fathers access to their children without due cause, which is incredibly cruel, but what about the men who produce babies by different women and don't pay for any of them?

Vast numbers of single mothers in the UK know perfectly well who the fathers of their children are – to be fair, many of them are genuinely unsure, but that's another issue altogether – but they tell the authorities they don't know who the fathers are in order to be supplied with social housing for life, welfare benefits etc. And who pays for that accommodation and those benefits? Men, in the main, who pay 72% of the income tax collected in the UK.

In April 2012 we presented JS-P with a 'Harpy' award. It seems appropriate to provide a link to that story now. It will also take you to her award certificate:

http://fightingfeminism.wordpress.com/2012/04/12/janet-street-porter-wins-a-harpy/

More than a few people have asked us if the image of the woman in the certificate is JS-P herself, but it's not. It's a picture of a waxwork female vampire. The same image appears on the cover of my book Feminism: the ugly truth.

Two months ago this awful harridan made another 'misleading statement' – about the impact of women on companies' performance – and we made a public challenge, as yet unanswered:

http://j4mb.wordpress.com/2013/10/07/our-public-challenge-to-janet-street-porter/

In the highly unlikely event this disgusting men-hating crone ever responds to the challenge, we'll publish her response on this website. Here's the link to her profile on the website of a programme she appears on regularly, ITV's Loose Women:

http://www.itv.com/loosewomen/presenters/janet-street-porter/

The following extract from her profile reveals all you need to know about her self-perception, and what others think of her:

> The first thing I do in the morning is: Remind myself I am fabulous because no one else is going to!

I imagine her ex-husbands wake up every morning and spontaneously burst into a loud rendition of, 'Oh, what a beautiful morning… oh, what a beautiful day!'

Please help AVFM continue to spread the message that Men's Rights are Human Rights by contributing to our quarterly fundraiser. Thank you.

A Voice for Men Winter Fundraiser

AVfM Video Source · 28 December 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Alison Tieman, aka Typhonblue, has a video message for the holidays. Looking forward to June? We sure are.

Please help AVFM continue to spread the message that Men's Rights are Human Rights by contributing to our quarterly fundraiser. Thank you.

Review of Cunt: A Declaration of Independence

AVfM Video Source · 28 December 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Victor Zen started reviewing books with a focus on gendered literature. The pilot book is Inga Muscio's Cunt: A Declaration of Independence. Cunt flaunts hatred while masquerading as the New Testament of self-acceptance. The misandry and gynocentrism in this 1998 text is so potent that the pages burned Zen's hands. Muscio proudly inducing a miscarriage and happily describing the flavor of cervix mucus did not make the subject matter as liberating as she would like to believe.

The video is NSFW, and has been age-restricted. Eating yogurt while watching is a really bad idea.

Subscribe to the white male tyrannical fuck for monologues, dialogues, media interviews, book reviews and other content on gender issues.

Intersectionality is not just a word

Diana Davison · 29 December 2013 · Archived copy · Original

On December 23rd, Eleanor Robertson made a passionate plea in The Guardian "In defence of intersectionality – one of feminism's most important tools". She laments that many feminists revile intersectionality as meaningless and appeals to us to recognize the internal importance of the issue.

I agree. There is much to be learned.

Intersectionality is not just a word, it is a word with many letters. Some of those letters are privileged. They are over-represented not only in this word but within language as a general body. While the letters C and Y are acknowledged as oppressed members of the alphabet, as evidenced by their enhanced point value in Scrabble, there are many letters with only a singular occurrence in this word which struggle to be seen as uniquely disadvantaged.

The letters A and I share the distinct privilege of being, in and of themselves, an entire word. Yet we can see with intersectionality that the letter I occurs a whopping three times whilst the letter A struggles to be seen only once and, even then, doesn't appear until the the word is over half finished… almost as if an afterthought. Obviously the situation is more complex than we thought. Just as white feminists are deemed by some to be advantaged they, like the letter A in this word, have their own unique battles that they fight to expose.

We all know that the letter Y is marginalized. Quite often it only appears tacked on to the end of words and not only does Y suffer from being consistently last, it has the multiple oppression factor of being placed in a suffix.

While we might feel sympathy for the Y at this point, intersectionality reveals more. C and Y's oppression is alphabetically surpassed by letters such as J, K, Q, X and Z which, as you'll note, are not even acknowledged in this word at all.

Please find this content at

A Voice for Men
HUMANIST COUNTER-THEORY

www.avoiceformen.com

Scrabble has done a wonderful job recognizing the privilege that some letters have over others and, though it tries to counterbalance this injustice by increasing the point value of the most oppressed members of the alphabet, it hasn't yet been able to address the source of the problem. Where these letters struggle to appear they are inevitably surrounded by the privileged which overshadow them. Consonants can often be seen ganging up in clusters and vowels diphthong, constantly drawing attention to themselves.

The dictionary, obviously, was written by men.

When we look at the segments of intersectionality we can begin to realize how each section is both burdened and dismissed. The root "sectional" must carry the weight that gives meaning to the word but it is nearly smothered by the prefix and suffix placement. “Inter” bears the unique responsibility of introducing the root and yet it is considered to be only a variation of the root and not a word unto itself. While “ity” is only given three letters, it has the onerous task of of transforming the entire word from an adjective into a noun and, as we have discussed, is treated very poorly in return.

The entire class of letters employed in suffixes experience a specific kind of exclusion that other letters will never understand. When “isms” started to proliferate and enjoy a certain kind of notoriety, pop culture struck it down in Ferris Bueller’s Day Off.

“Ism’s, in my opinion, are not good. A person should not believe in an ‘ism,’ he should believe in himself.”

I’m sure it is no coincidence that film was also written by a man.

The opponents of intersectionality argue that the theory is unproductive and reduces a whole being down to isolated parts. What those people fail to realize is that by breaking down the sectional pieces of identity we create an appreciation for the parts of the sum and increase the individual value of those multiple identities. While men are content to walk about acting like whole people, feminism has recognized that it is only in dissecting the whole and reducing it to miniscule components that can we appreciate the value of what has been lost.

While male-dominated psychiatry has labelled multiple personality as a problematic disorder, feminism is fighting a slow but winning battle to recognize the value of compartmentalizing one’s personality. On a sheer pragmatic level, when you allow sisters of the feminist movement to expand their identities the number of supporters increases exponentially. Where there was previously only one feminist we now have four or five distinct personalities to contend with. While quantity doesn’t trump quality, it’s a good start.

While adapting to non-offensive language that acknowledges this explosion of split-personality rights has complicated communication at the moment, we should recognize that feminism is fixing that. It is obvious that the entire dictionary needs to be overhauled. This is just a difficult time of transition. When the marginalized letters like X, C, and K do stick together the results can be “exciting,” and ass can be “kicked.”

Some feel this vision to be quixotic. Feminists could argue that the word “quioxotic” proves their point. The word employs many oppressed letters and society giving a dismissive meaning to that noble word is both insensitive and, ultimately, corrosive to Social Justice.

Until the letter Q can be used on a daily basis without requiring the accompaniment of a vowel, language, and civilization itself, will continue to be ruled by Patriarchal control.

Eleanor Robertson concludes her article with a warning to the wise. “Far from being some bizarre esoteric theory, intersectionality is alive and kicking all around us, and not just in exclusive ivory tower gender studies clubs. Call me a conspiracy theorist, but there must be some reason pop feminism puts so much effort into repressing a concept that has huge theoretical explanatory power and enormous utility as an organising strategy.”

Intersectionality is gaining ground and the only choice is whether you are on the bus or off the bus. Let’s face it, language has been around for a very long time and the moment has arrived to try something new. Where men have dominated the formation, use, and privileging of some words over others, the elevation of some letters over their companions, and allowed oppressive conjugations, feminists ask us to take a bold but simple step to the side.

Binary thinking about sense and nonsense, right and wrong, meaning and gibberish, has forced linear limits on the accomplishments of large portions of the population. Feminists are determined to give those marginalized segments a voice and they aren’t about to let the dictionary stop them.

I think Reggie Watts summarized the issue best when he said

> It’s not so much as so little as to do with what everything is. But it is within our self-interest to understand the topography of our lives unto ourselves. The future states that there is no time other than the collapsation of that sensation of the mirror of the memories in which we are living. Common knowledge, but important > nonetheless.

>
> As we face fear in these times – and fear is all around us – we also have anti-fear. It's hard to imagine, or measure. The background radiation is simply too static to be able to be seen under the normal spectral analysis.

feature image by William Hoiles

Please help AVFM continue to spread the message that Men's Rights are Human Rights by contributing to our quarterly fundraiser. Thank you!

Dannyboy with a fundraising message

Paul Elam · 29 December 2013 · Archived copy · Original

As only Danny could deliver. It's why we love him so much.

Please help AVFM continue to spread the message that Men's Rights are Human Rights by contributing to our quarterly fundraiser. Thank you!

A Message From Edward Snowden

Paul Elam · 29 December 2013 · Archived copy · Original

The subject of Edward Snowden is one rife with heated controversy. As this is a movement that embraces the principles of human civil rights, I thought it fitting that we would let him have his say in his own words here on the pages of this website. The following letter from him was written to the people of Brazil during the time that Snowden was seeking asylum. He is now reportedly in residence with temporary asylum in Russia.

This letter was originally published in Folha De S.Paulo and is presented here for the purpose of editorial discussion. The question, in my mind is at once simple and complex. Did Edward Snowden betray his country, or did his government betray its people? I know my answer. What's yours? PE

Six months ago, I stepped out from the shadows of the United States Government's National Security Agency to stand in front of a journalist's camera.

Espionage Whistleblower Edward Snowden to Seek Asylum in Brazil

I shared with the world evidence proving some governments are building a world-wide surveillance system to secretly track how we live, who we talk to, and what we say.

I went in front of that camera with open eyes, knowing that the decision would cost me family and my home, and would risk my life. I was motivated by a belief that the citizens of the world deserve to understand the system in which they live.

My greatest fear was that no one would listen to my warning. Never have I been so glad to have been so wrong. The reaction in certain countries has been particularly inspiring to me, and Brazil is certainly one of those.

At the NSA, I witnessed with growing alarm the surveillance of whole populations without any suspicion of wrongdoing, and it threatens to become the greatest human rights challenge of our time.

The NSA and other spying agencies tell us that for our own "safety" –for Dilma's "safety," for Petrobras' "safety"– they have revoked our right to privacy and broken into our lives. And they did it without asking the public in any country, even their own.

Today, if you carry a cell phone in Sao Paolo, the NSA can and does keep track of your location: they do this 5 billion times a day to people around the world.

When someone in Florianopolis visits a website, the NSA keeps a record of when it happened and what you did there. If a mother in Porto Alegre calls her son to wish him luck on his university exam, NSA can keep that call log for five years or more.

They even keep track of who is having an affair or looking at pornography, in case they need to damage their target's reputation.

American Senators tell us that Brazil should not worry, because this is not "surveillance," it's "data collection." They say it is done to keep you safe. They're wrong.

There is a huge difference between legal programs, legitimate spying, legitimate law enforcement –where individuals are targeted based on a reasonable, individualized suspicion – and these programs of dragnet mass surveillance that put entire populations under an all-seeing eye and save copies forever.

These programs were never about terrorism: they're about economic spying, social control, and diplomatic manipulation. They're about power.

Many Brazilian senators agree, and have asked for my assistance with their investigations of suspected crimes against Brazilian citizens.

I have expressed my willingness to assist wherever appropriate and lawful, but unfortunately the United States government has worked very hard to limit my ability to do so –going so far as to force down the Presidential Plane of Evo Morales to prevent me from traveling to Latin America!

Until a country grants permanent political asylum, the US government will continue to interfere with my ability to speak.

Six months ago, I revealed that the NSA wanted to listen to the whole world. Now, the whole world is listening back, and speaking out, too. And the NSA doesn't like what it's hearing.

The culture of indiscriminate worldwide surveillance, exposed to public debates and real investigations on every continent, is collapsing.

Only three weeks ago, Brazil led the United Nations Human Rights Committee to recognize for the first time in history that privacy does not stop where the digital network starts, and that the mass surveillance of innocents is a violation of human rights.

The tide has turned, and we can finally see a future where we can enjoy security without sacrificing our privacy. Our rights cannot be limited by a secret organization, and American officials should never decide the freedoms of Brazilian citizens.

Even the defenders of mass surveillance, those who may not be persuaded that our surveillance technologies have dangerously outpaced democratic controls, now agree that in democracies, surveillance of the public must be debated by the public.

My act of conscience began with a statement: "I don't want to live in a world where everything that I say, everything I do, everyone I talk to, every expression of creativity or love or friendship is recorded.

That's not something I'm willing to support, it's not something I'm willing to build, and it's not something I'm willing to live under."

Days later, I was told my government had made me stateless and wanted to imprison me. The price for my speech was my passport, but I would pay it again: I will not be the one to ignore criminality for the sake of political comfort. I would rather be without a state than without a voice.

If Brazil hears only one thing from me, let it be this: when all of us band together against injustices and in defense of privacy and basic human rights, we can defend ourselves from even the most powerful systems.

An alimony slave's bricks of logic

Robert St. Estephe · 29 December 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Robert St. Estephe–Gonzo Historian–is dedicated to uncovering the forgotten past of marginalizing men. "Gonzo journalism" is characterized as tending "to favor style over fact to achieve accuracy." Yet history – especially "social history" – is written by ideologues who distort and bury facts in order to achieve an agenda. "Gonzo" writing is seen as unorthodox and surprising. Yet, in the 21st century subjectivity, distortion and outright lying in non-fiction writing is the norm. Fraud is the new orthodoxy. Consequently, integrity is the new "transgressive."

Welcome to the disruptive world of facts, the world of Gonzo History.

[image]

While the above poster advertises a classic movie from the 1940's, its theme was based on a very real social malady spanning the length of the 20th century. It was the alimony racket that inspired the first organized resistance in the United States to government-sponsored misandry. The first of many anti-alimony organizations was formed in New York City on 1927. (see "Robert Ecob: Early MHRA"). Newspapers regularly recount horror stories of men whose lives were ruined by women who demanded to be supported by ex-husbands and, research has revealed, wives enjoyed the power to demand an ex-husband's incarceration at will when he could not afford to pay up– even when the former wife had no need for the funds (see "The Alimony War of 1935" for the results of this research). It was in 1933 that a young Italian immigrant, a humble bricklayer by the name of Umberto Politano, became the poster boy of the New York anti-alimony activists with his story of a de facto "life sentence" to jail for failing to live up to his briefly-wedded wife's demand that he support her and the Italian relatives she imported.

Umberto was only a poor laborer who could not even speak the tongue of his new homeland when he was thrown into alimony jail, but he did possess common sense. Logic was the weapon he used to eventually defeat the law ruling and the institutionalized female privilege of the chivalric American culture to at least gain his freedom after two and a half years in jail – his punishment for not paying the alimony which his jailing prevented him from being able to pay.

The words of Justice Bonygne and the commentary on this case and the alimony racket in general written by famous magazine writer Ruth Seinfel,* dating from 1933, have a familiar ring to them — as if they were written 80 years later by the typical A Voice for Men contributor.

***

[image]

FULL TEXT (Article 1 of 6): New York, Dec. 20. – Mrs. Politano must show cause why her husband "must be a prisoner for life" in a Brooklyn jail just because he is unable to pay $12 a week alimony.

Supreme Court Justice Edward Riegelman listened yesterday to the story of Umberto Politano, the imprisoned husband, and then issued the order.

Politano told the court: "I have been in this jail for two and a half years and each day my sentence becomes longer. I want a chance to get out so I can get a job and obey the court order. Must I be a prisoner for life?"

Politano said he came to this country in 1921 and had $3,000 in the bank when he married. Trouble started, he said, when the wife's family came to live with them. The $3,000 soon was eaten up and the wife got a separation decree and the alimony order in 1929. Since then Politano has been in jail, unable to pay.

"I've been in this jail longer than anyone else," he told Justice Riegelman, "I have learned to read and write English while here."

["Wife Must Show Cause – Hubby Tired of Staying in Jail for Failure to Pay Alimony." syndicated (AP), The Daily Mail (Hagerstown, Md.), Dec. 20, 1932, p. 1]

***

[image]

FULL TEXT (Article 2 of 6): An Italian gentleman named Umberto Politano languishes in jail in New York for the heinous crime of failing to pay his divorced wife $12 a week alimony.

He has already spent two and a half years in durance vile for the offence and now he is arguing before the courts that unless he gets out and earns some money, his wife is going to have rather a slim chance of ever seeing any alimony at all.

Probably the proper reaction to his news would be to wax virtuously indignant over a law that holds a lad in the coop because he gets a bit behind with his tribute money.

We might even work in a few choice and dripping phrases about rendering unto Caesar those things that are Caesar's, etc.

But we all refrain.

Rather are we moved to observe that a fellow is a good deal more free within the bars and shadows of the village jug than he would be living with a wife who would toss him in the cooler for a mere $12 a week.

[Cupid's Prisoner," The Vancouver Sun (Canada), Dec. 27, 1932, p. 4; spelling "offence" is in original source.]

***

FULL TEXT (Article 3 of 6): New York, March 2 – Umberto Politano, a bricklayer, war veteran and, by right of jail seniority, president of the Brooklyn Alimony Club, was freed from confinement with the tart observation of Supreme Court Justice Bonynge, "this carries the supposed rights of women to absurd, not to say unconstitutional lengths."

For two years and seven months. Politano has been inmate of Brooklyn Alimony Jail, failing to pay $12 a week to his wife, Mary Politano, who sued him for separation in October, 1927 – a suit that never has been tried.

Repeated contempt orders have renewed his term and Justice Bonynge's decision was rendered in the face of a recommendation by a special master which the court set aside.

~ Wife in Contempt. ~

"Even a lowly alimony prisoner has constitutional rights," said Justice Bonynge, and he quoted the constitutional guarantee: "Cruel and unusual punishment shall not be inflicted."

Criminal contempt, Justice Bonynge pointed out is more grave than civil contempt, and yet, even in flagrant cases punishment is limited by statute to a jail sentence of 30 days and a fine of $250.

"However, let a waspish woman pluck the sleeves of the judicial gown, or nudge the elbow concealed therein, and this temperate restraint immediately cast aside and the delinquent spouse faces the possibility of unending imprisonment through successive adjudication of contempt."

~ Husbands Have Been Patient. ~

"Through the ages man has yielded authority in the home to the opposite sex and accepted the consequences with humility. With a bland of humor, resignation and affection, the relationship has come to be known as petticoat government."

"While the institution has functioned reasonably well, there are those who doubt the expediency of its extension into a form of petticoat justice."

Concluding his opinion, Justice Bonynge wrote:

"If an evil-doer invades my court room and reviles me or my ancestors or my country, with indecent or blasphemous utterances, a penalty of 30 days in the straight-jacket of my righteous wrath is incurred. Can I truthfully say that through poverty or misfortune this defendant, who shouldered arms when the need was great, who omits to pay alimony to a vindictive and relentless wife has offered my court an affront more than thirtyfold greater?"

"The answer being obvious, the defendant is ordered released from imprisonment forthwith."

["Even Patient Husbands Have Rights Says Court – In Jail 31 Months for Not Paying Alimony, Jurist Denounces Waspish Women," The Reading Eagle (Pa.), Mar. 2, 1933, p. 7; spelling "thirtyfold" in original]

***

[image]

FULL TEXT (Article 4 of 6): Umberto Politano, the long-suffering martyr to our alimony system is free at last after two years and seven months of languishing in Raymond Street jail, Supreme Court Justice Paul Boynynge set him free the other day, and I am told that the Justice's decision will set a precedent for future common sense and mercy in dealing with men who are without funds to meet their ex-wives' demands.

But his Honor did more than set a precedent. He wrote an opinion which not only ex-wives but women who have no thought of Reno might do well to ponder. In pointing out that "even a lowly alimony prisoner has constitutional rights," Justice Bonygne had some crisp things to say about "petticoat government" and "waspish wives."

"Let a waspish woman pluck the sleeve of the judicial gown or nudge the elbow concealed therein," his Honor meditated, "and … restraint is immediately cast aside and the delinquent spouse faces the possibility of unending imprisonment through successive adjudication of contempt. This carries the supposed rights of woman to absurd, not to say unconstitutional, lengths."

And so he set Mr. Politano, who has been called the "alimony lifer," free. I should like to be able to say fine words about the triumph of justice, but I am too much humiliated by the outrage that has been perpetrated so long in the name of justice, and by members of my sex.

I suppose it was necessary for the unfortunate Mr. Politano to lie in jail more than two years ago and a half so that bills might at last be brought before the Legislature at Albany to curb the dreadful power of vindictive women. But what I should like to see is an administration of justice which would throttle what Justice Bonynge calls petticoat at its source.

~ A Morning in Family Court ~

I remember with the keenest delight a morning I spent sitting beside Magistrate Jonah B. Goldstein in the Family Court. Domestic disagreements of all sorts were laid before his Honor, some tragic and some that made it hard for your reporter to maintain a dignity befitting a guest of the court. When a young woman stepped up to the bar and began to tell a story of nonpayment of alimony I pricked up my ears. Now, I thought bitterly, I would see a man sent to jail.

Magistrate Goldstein has thick black brows and he can look very stern. He now looked very stern, indeed, as he leaned toward the woman before him.

"Madame," he asked, "are you in good health?"

The woman said she was in good health, and indeed she was blooming with it."

"I understand that you have no children?" his Honor asked further.

No, she had no children. his honor leaned back on the bench.

"Madame, you have no children and you are in good health," he said. "Yet you ask this man to contribute so much per week to your support. Do you keep house for him? Do you cook his dinner? Do you look after his clothes, darn his socks, mend his shirts, do his washing? Do you provide him with companionship? No, you do none of these things.

The young woman opened her mouth to speak and closed it again. A few minutes later she emerged from the court to seek a living for herself. The alimony judgment had been set aside.

And that is what I mean by justice.

[Ruth Seinfel, "'Petticoat Justice' – Some Sharp Words Emerge from the Supreme Court in the Case of Mr. Politano, Alimony Lifer," New York Evening Post (N.Y.), Mar. 6, 1933, p. 13; The word "system" has been inserted in the place of a word that is illegible in the photographic digital source from this article has been transcribed.] Ruth Seinfel was a regular contributor to Collier's magazine, the leading magazine of investigative journalism of its time. Wikipedia notes that "as a result of chief editor Peter Collier's pioneering investigative journalism, Collier's Weekly established a reputation as a proponent of social reform."

***

***

FULL TEXT (Article 5 of 6): The court of appeals today granted authority to Umberto Politano, of Brooklyn, to renew his suit for $50,000 against Sheriff James A. McQuade, of Kings County, who was accused of illegally confining Politano in jail for failure to pay alimony.

Politano was sent to jail on July 29, 1930, for three months for failure to pay alimony. Subsequently he was accused of neglecting to pay during his imprisonment. His sentence was stretched to nine months. Politano contended he should have been released on April 29, 1931, but instead was held until March 1, 1933.

Sheriff McQuade argued that Politano was held because he failed to give security for future alimony payments as ordered in his complaint and that the facts were insufficient to support an action. The Applelate Division ruled that there was cause for action because no time limit had been set for Politano to comply in posting bond. Politano's wife obtained a separation order and an allowance of $12 a week alimony in 1921 and he was $216 in arrears when he was jailed.

["'Alimony Lifer' Gets Right to Sue McQuade," New York Tribune (N.Y.), Dec. 7, 1933, p. 17]

***

FULL TEXT (Article 6 of 6): New York, Feb. 4 – Umberto Politano, president of the Alimony Club of Brooklyn, who is known as the "alimony lifer" because of the time he has served, moved today to recover damages for excessive imprisonment.

Justice Mitchell May, of the Supreme Court, Brooklyn, gave Mr. Politano permission to sue the Fidelity & Deposit company of Maryland, which provided $60,000 in bonds for the two Sheriffs who held Politano in the Raymond street jail, Brooklyn, for a total of two years and seven months. The Sheriffs were Aaron L. Jacoby, whose term expired December 31, 1931, and Sheriff James A. McQuade, who died May 5, 1935. Mr. Politano originally sought to sue the Sheriffs on the ground that they kept him in jail twenty-two months illegally. Mr. Politano contended that he could be held only three months on each of the three alimony orders served on him.

Justice May told that Mr. Jacoby's liability extended only until his term expired and that Mr. Politano should have instituted suit within a year of that expiration. He added that Mr. McQuade's death had absolved him personally of responsibility, but that it did not absolve the bonding company. The bond issued for each Sheriff was for $30,000.

["Alimony Lifer" Allowed To Sue Surety Firm Here – Brooklyn Man Given Right To Bring Action Against Fidelity And Deposit Company On Bonds Of Sheriffs For Excessive Imprisonment," The Sun (Baltimore, Md.), Feb. 25, 1937, p. 26]

Indian Communist Feminist Khurshid Anwar commits suicide after rape allegations

Anil Kumar · 30 December 2013 · Archived copy · Original

In New Delhi, the Jawahar Lal Nehru University, which is popularly known as JNU, is a strong bastion of communists. Many of its professors have strong left-wing orientation. This place is also a hotbed of radical feminism. Khurshid Anwar, aged 55, is a former student of JNU and he a communist, who used to run a Non-Government Organization (NGO) known as the Institute for Social Democracy. He was a male feminist and just like other male feminists, all through his life he never bothered about false allegations of rape and their possible impact on the innocent men, who are accused. In fact, he may have even believed that the percentage of false allegations are miniscule or less than 2% and hence not worth any attention, which is the standard Feminist line.

After an incident of rape of a young women one a bus in Delhi, violent protests broke out in Delhi, as many people read in the international news. Khurshid Anwar, his NGO, and his fellow comrades organised many of these protests. Pictures in his Facebook profile show him leading one such protest and he standing next to the police barricade.

On 18th December, less than 1 year of the protests that Kurshid Anwar organised, he committed suicide by jumping from his building, after media started flashing news that he allegedly raped a young feminist colleague, working in another NGO. The alleged incident happened in the month of September in his house, where some members of an NGO had organised a party.

His dead body was taken to Communist Party headquarters in New Delhi. The communist journalists and feminists then started claiming “trial by media.” It is Indian communists and feminist NGOs, who had campaigned for decades for draconian rape laws, which leave no scope for an innocent man to prove his innocence during the investigation stage, let alone have the presumption of innocence. Thanks to these activists and their allies, men accused of rape are presumed guilty until proven innocent and they are degraded in media and sent to prison for months, after which they are released on bail as the trial starts.

Now, when one of their own comrades dies, the communists are in a tight spot. Given their political stands around feminism, they can not talk about misuse of rape laws or false allegations. They know, Indian MRAs control the “Misuse” meme and they do not want MRAs to prove their points. So, they started blaming “trial by media.” When they have championed for laws that presume any man accused of rape as guilty, then they themselves have given media the right to presume guilt and present the news story using that context. Needless to say, there were thousands of cases in India, where media has termed innocent men as rapists and monsters before even the trial started. However, the communists and feminists never had a problem with that. The Indian Supreme Court has also warned about trial by media and the harm it causes to possibly innocent accused. But, war mongering communists and feminists always opposed that argument.

Indian Express published a part of facebook post that Khurshid Anwar sent to a friend (link).

He was referring to an impromptu party, organised at his house by members of an NGO:

> Everybody consumed alcohol. After consuming alcohol, a girl began to feel unwell. I don’t know when somebody made her lie down in my bedroom. I was sitting in the drawing room with the others. Then came the time to leave. I had called two taxis to ensure that everybody could go back and that nobody stayed back.

According to his post, the woman was left at his house despite his concerns.

> One person announced that everybody should leave the place and let the girl rest in my house. The person who made the announcement wasn’t ready to stay over herself. But I thought that since this girl was unwell, she should be looked after by a woman only.

Anwar claims in his post that the girl began crying after a while. When he checked on her, Anwar claims she made comments, but he returned to the drawing room.According to Anwar's letter, the next morning the girl accused him of spiking her drink.

> She came into the drawing room and demanded of me what she had last night. I was shocked. I said, 'Stop it' and asked her to shut up. A girl says those words to me thrice. Why? I kept thinking over this but didn't think it was a conspiracy at that point.

Anwar also says he spoke to a member of the NGO about the incident, but nothing happened for a few days.

> Then I found out that I was being blamed. The members of the NGO who I knew beforehand stopped talking to me. The friend told me they had met the girl. Even after repeated requests, they refused to meet me. Why? I don't know. Then after a few days, around 8 to 10 people came over to meet me. I also called over somebody from my side. I found out later that one of the members of the NGO was saying that she will put me in trouble.

In the meanwhile, Khurshid Anwar's separated wife, who is also a feminist, claimed that this media coverage is anti-women. His separated wife, Dr.Meenakshi Sundriyal, is a professor of JNU. At the Press Club of India here on Sunday, Dr. Sundriyal said (link):

> "I have been an office bearer of the Gender Sensitisation Committee at Jawaharlal Nehru University. I can say that when we try to take matters into our own hands and not follow laid-down procedures on sensitive matters such as rape, it is usually the women who suffer. Those branding him as a rapist on various media platforms did not follow the process of law and instead took matters into their own hands."

Hearing this, Indian MRAs are saying, "what the hell she is talking?"

In this particular case, the victim's statement was enough to presume Khurshid Anwar guilty and if he had not committed suicide, then he would have been sent to prison for at least a couple of months anyway. Then, the media would have discussed this story for one or two weeks defaming and degrading him. There is no process or mechanism built into India's rape laws or police's investigation processes to filter out innocents and dismiss the claims of a complainant. So, media trial on rape accused is entirely unavoidable.

Is this entire episode going to help stop misuse of rape laws? It is highly unlikely. The communists and their feminist leaders like Kavita Krishnan are now calling for husbands accused of raping their wives also to be presumed guilty and to be subjected to the same pre-trial detentions and imprisonment as any other man accused of committing rape.

These communists are anarchists and they stupidly forgot that their own male feminists are also at the risk getting false rape charges. When it happened, they are attempting to blame someone else, in this case the media, rather than doing any soul-searching. It is just a matter of time, they will argue again in the media that false rape cases are too few and no woman must be punished for false rape allegations, because that will hamper reporting of incidents of rape. For only they can be innocent.

References:

1)
http://articles.timesofindia.indiatimes.com/2010-10-07/mumbai/28268417_1_vinamra-soni-tiss-kundan-raj-borgohain

2)
http://ibnlive.in.com/news/women-misuse-rape-law-to-force-lovers-to-marry-them-delhi-high-court/393929-3.html

3)
http://www.indianexpress.com/news/rape-laws-being-misused-cant-tell-fake-from-genuine-says-high-court/1094383/

Boycott Divorce Corp Movie? “Mother’s Rights” Versus Fathers

Susan Terrell Tompkins · 30 December 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Divorce Corp, a documentary due to be released in January 2014 is causing quite a stir between mother’s rights / “women’s rights” and groups of men and women who support equally-shared parenting. In calling for a boycott of the movie, so-called mother’s rights groups are quite upset that Divorce Corp advocates for more fair and balanced divorce and family court process, something that apparently irks those who for years have enjoyed courts centered around them. As shared-parenting is being advanced across the world, it appears that many in the “mother’s rights” arena are calling for a boycott of Divorce Corp in an effort to maintain their position of total control.

It should be noted that you can not find one father’s rights group that advocates for family courts that are centered around fathers having primary physical custody and control–but you can find hundreds of mother’s rights group that advocate for that. These women are at the front for the equality movement?

Mother’s rights groups are particularity upset with (and boycotting the documentary) Divorce Corp over the fact that the producers of the movie advocate for an equal system that puts mothers and children “within reach of abusers” (in their scare-language) as if men are the only abusers and domestic violence offenders, or child neglect and abuse perpetrators.

Another fascinating concept I see put forth by mother’s rights group in calling for a boycott on Divorce Corp is that 60% of women who have children in the world have a son. And these women are calling for a family court system that makes sure their own sons are marginalized when they become adults? Where are these mother’s rights groups going to be when they, as a paternal grandmothers, have very little access to their grandchildren because she helped lay the foundation for biased courts?

Also, there is a lot of talk about protestors who will be boycotting the documentary and harassing those that go to see the movie, and attempting to harass movie theaters that host Divorce Corp. Are we sure that men are the only humans on earth that harass and use aggression to forward an agenda?

Where are the many thousands of women in paternal families who have for the past 80 years watched as their sons are systematically marginalized by feminist-controlled family courts? Courts that have no problem with seeing all of your sons as potential abusers? Have any of the mothers witnessed abuse by women on their sons? If so, why are you not standing up to these radical mother’s “rights” groups who are calling for your inability to love and help raise your children and grandchildren equally?

In some ways I am happy to see “mother’s rights” groups boycotting Divorce Corp as I think it will allow the shared parenting movement to finally show that mothers like this have no desire for equality unless it benefits them personally, and will allow our movement to draw in more resources from women in paternal families who realistically make up the largest segment of father’s rights groups.

Lastly, it should be known that we think a vitally important part of getting the equal-parenting and shared-parenting movement to a national consciousness is for there to be a group of women that does not allow men in their ranks; men have their own movement and groups on this and we support them. But we think there should be women-only groups, women who are tired of watching feminism and mother’s rights groups advocate for a system that harms children and the relationship with their fathers. So boyycott away ladies! Boycott Divorce Corp so that we can use your advocacy to draw in more women into our movement for equality.

If you are a woman in a paternal family who is concerned about your son, husband, brother, or nephew’s ability to have a equal relationship with his children, and radical groups attempts to call your loved one’s abusers, then we would love for you to use the comment section below to leave your thoughts. And, please do not forget to share this post on Facebook, Google+, and Twitter so that others can join in the conversation.

The Proposed Boycott of Divorce Corp Should Teach Women a Few Things About Equality

If the proposed boycott of Divorce Corp and calls for protestors to disrupt and harass those going to see the movie teaches us anything, it is that there are very well entrenched groups who benefit from the family courts, and for women in paternal families, it certainly is not you.

Our organization tries regularly to get women to see that malicious mother's groups and officers of the courts, who have for a century labeled your sons as only abusers who should pay money to the system, has kept you from having a normal life with your grandchildren, step-children, and nieces and nephews–and maybe even your own father.

It should also teach women that there are radical groups who have hijacked the idea of equality, whose purpose is to demoralize and malign your sons for an agenda. This is not what feminism was supposed to be about. Or was it? You should really be asking these mother's rights groups about their idea of equality because the family courts is a major red herring that stands in the way of equality.

We encourage women in paternal families to make more of an effort to get in touch with your activism as it relates to family law, and hope you will view Divorce Corp and tell us your experiences with any groups that were boycotting.

Again, the ONLY argument these malicious women have against family court reform is that all your sons are domestic offenders and that there are no false accusations. It is time for women in paternal families to stand up to these malicious protestors and stop their false narrative.

The isolated male

AVfM Video Source · 30 December 2013 · Archived copy · Original

One of the best new YouTubers on men's issues is Spetsnaz. This is his latest video, but all the others we've seen are every bit as powerful.

If you can watch this and not see it as very close to the reality that everyday men face, we have to think something's wrong with you. –DE

Why Antifeminism is a Thing

AVfM Video Source · 30 December 2013 · Archived copy · Original

YouTuber VarmitCoyote approaches Victor Zen (Sage Gerard) with questions. Sage was asked if he can support men's issues without attacking feminism or women as a whole. His "yes" is followed by a much needed "but" to justify the existence of antifeminism as a necessary and rational response to modern bigotry.

Sage cites examples of problems feminists either cause or won't solve in the YT video description (not copied here for brevity reasons). Calling for accountability in light of facts is not misogyny. It just isn't.

But what does Sage know? He's a white, male, cisgender ginger mansplaining the Patriarchy! RAPE! RAAAAPE!

You wouldn't subscribe to this scum.

A full translation in Spanish of this video is available here.

Please help AVFM continue to spread the message that Men's Rights are Human Rights by contributing to our quarterly fundraiser. Thank you!

Fundraiser: Taking AVFM into 2014 on a Roll

Paul Elam · 31 December 2013 · Archived copy · Original

What a year! 2013 has undoubtedly been a year of rapid expansion for the Men's Human Rights Movement. More and more people are either joining our ranks, or just speaking up on their own against the bigotry of feminism and male disposability. We are also knocking on the door of the mainstream media, and not waiting for permission to come in.

I am proud to say AVFM has been in the thick of much of this.

We have even more good things on the way. You will be seeing much of that announced on the site over the next couple of days, so expect it.

One of those announcements is the launch of AVFM multi-siting. Soon, AVFM will be just one component in a network of blogs and websites that will stretch over the globe, all addressing the issues that face men and boys under the AVFM umbrella.

We are still tweaking some of the final details, but you can read more about multi-siting, and even submit your request for a free AVFM regional blog, here.

With the help of James, we have just launched AVFM on Live365, a platform on which all AVFM Radio operations will be migrating early in the new year. Much more than just a transfer, we are planning to build our way to live 24/7 streaming news, opinion and culture worldwide in the coming new year. Too lofty? Watch us do it. Read more here.

There is so much more on the way for next year, including the AVFM's first International Conference on Men's Issues in Detroit next June, which is already stirring up some well-deserved excitement.

As you can imagine, even with the tireless help of our incredible volunteers, there is increasing expense with all of this. Never before has it been so expensive for AVFM to maintain its daily operations. It might even be depressing if it weren't working so damn well.

So I am coming to you again with the request, on behalf of the entire team of managers, editors, technical personnel, media specialists and contributors, asking you to take us into 2014 with the tools to double our accomplishments of the last year. This is our most ambitious fundraiser ever because we have planned the most ambitious year ever.

The train is running smoothly, folks, and we have people here like never before, ready to shovel coal into the furnace. But we need you to give us the means to do it. Please contribute what you can to usher us to a mind blowing 2014.

Fundraising Thermometer by:
www.easy-fundraising-ideas.com

Fundraiser will end on January 4, 2013

Men’s Rights Edmonton: A year in review, 2013

Men's Rights Edmonton · 31 December 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Well, we are entering into the 14th year of the third millennium, and I would like to take a moment to look back on everything that MR-E has accomplished over this past year. The purpose of this reflection is to celebrate our successes and hopefully inspire other MRAs to take their activism into the real world by showing you what is possible. This reflection also allows us a chance to set the bar for activism the following year. This can also act as place for exact dates and relevant info for future reference for all things which transpired in 2013. Some information in this article will be redundant to a seasoned MRA, but it is presented here to provide the proper context to newcomers who aren’t totally in the know. Please bear this in mind as you read through.

January, February, and March were relatively uneventful. MR-E took this time to meet with it’s members and plan out events for the year. We designed posters and brainstormed on how to force these issues to the surface of public discourse. We printed posters and had professional business cards and car magnets made up with our logo on them. We also took this time to meet and recruit new members. Each of whom brought their own talents and assets to the table. These meetings would occur at regular intervals throughout the year. Sometimes we would get together to discuss projects and other times we would get together just to hang out and unwind.

On April 3rd we upgraded our website to it’s present wordpress format. This provided a place for people to go and see what we’re about. It also helped prospective new members and media personnel contact us.
On April 26th, we received the tragic news of Earl Silverman’s suicide. As every MRA is keenly aware by now, Earl founded and ran the only domestic violence shelter for men in Canada. Twenty years ago, Earl was a victim of domestic violence at the hands of his ex wife, and when he went looking for assistance, he found nothing but resources geared towards teaching men to manage their anger and stop their abusive behavior. So Earl founded M.A.S.H. the “Mens Alternative Safe House” in Calgary, Alberta. The final piece of research Earl produced reveals the Alberta Coalition of Women’s Shelters (ACWS) lists 43 women’s shelter locations in the province of Alberta. FInancial information on 9 of these shelters (mostly those on Indian reserves) was unavailable. These 34 remaining shelters received 44 million dollars of taxpayer funded subsidies in 2010 alone. For twenty years, Earl ran his shelter in Calgary out of his own pocket. He constantly petitioned for financial assistance, but in the span of 20 years, he would only get one $700.00 cheque from the government. After Earl was forced to sell the house, he tragically chose to end his life by hanging himself in his garage. On May 11, MR-E hosted a memorial service for Earl at an Edmonton legion. Our thanks to those who attended and to those who donated to help make this possible. If only Earl knew how many people cared about him and his work.
http://www.avoiceformen.com/earl-silverman/mr-e-hosts-earl-silverman-memorial/

On June 8th, we introduced you to Tom Matty, a man fighting to regain access to his kids. In many respects, Tom’s case wasn’t remarkable, but it did demonstrate clear and undeniable bias on the part of the Canadian courts. Repeatedly, they ruled against the best interests of the children, and in favor of a woman who’s claims of abuse were totally unsubstantiated. In fact, regardless of the fact she wasn’t a Canadian citizen, Tom’s ex girlfriend had her entire legal representation paid for by Canadian taxpayers, while Tom (a Canadian citizen) had to pay for his own legal fees out of his own pocket. MR-E, AVFM radio and Mr.Matty partnered up to attempt to change the legal climate in the form of an appeal. If successful, this appeal would have set a new precedence for all men fighting to regain or maintain access with their kids by giving them an example of proven bias in the Canadian courts to refer back to. Due to the nature of this appeal, and the strong likelihood of success it had, those who wanted to see it fail slapped it with a $5000.00 legal surity, hoping this would kill it dead in it’s tracks. In truth, 99% of the time, this strategy works for them. But not this time. MR-E hosted a fundraiser to give this appeal a chance, and in an astonishing act of generosity and solidarity which should never be downplayed, mens rights activists all over the world rallied together and raised more than $6000.00 in less than 24 hours! Our appeal was funded, and Tom’s lawyers got to work preparing it. A third of the remainder of that donation money went to Tom so he could afford a trip to Thailand to see his kids. A third went to a supposed shelter for male victims of domestic violence in Montreal, (which unfortunately turned out to be a dud). The remaining 1/3 of that donation money went towards funding MR-E's activist activities. Even though we would learn on September 5th, that this appeal had failed to succeed, the point for the take away is that we still showed up and tried. In the work we do, we will see many more failures and successes. The only guarantee is: unless we try we will never see any successes at all.

http://www.mensrightsedmonton.com/thank-you-from-tom-matty/http://www.mensrightsedmonton.com/matty-appeal-dead-on-arrival/http://www.mensrightsedmonton.com/tom-post-appeal-decision/

MR-E then learned Dr. James Brown was taking his message on the crisis facing boys in education on tour across Canada. When we were notified Dr.Brown was including Edmonton on that tour, we did everything we could to advertise this lecture and set up a proper venue in the Edmonton Public Library. We hung our posters on kiosks, universities and anywhere else we though we could attract the attention of those who would be interested in this sort of discussion. Dr.Brown's lecture took place on July 8th, and it was a resounding success. We had a great turn out and some very generous people donated to help pay for the cost of the venue and compensate Dr.Brown for coming out and sharing his knowledge on this topic. We strongly encourage you to watch the footage we captured at this event here:
http://www.mensrightsedmonton.com/mr-e-hosting-dr-brown/

<iframe width="750″ height="420″ src="//www.youtube.com/embed/iS-QwfwJAhQ" frameborder="0″ allowfullscreen></iframe>

On Postering:
Please keep in mind that in between these major events, MR-E members constantly participated in smaller forms of activism. Individually and sometimes collectively, MR-E members did things like drive the car with it's magnets advertising our website through busy streets in the middle of the day. we would also hand out business cards to those who we feel deserved our message. And several times a month we also hung mens rights themed posters all over Edmonton city streets. It was a fairly predictable routine. We put posters up, and like clockwork, the local feminists would slither out of their dark holes as soon as the coast was clear to tear them down. We exercised our right to free speech, and at the same time we gave our attention starved dissenters a sense of accomplishment. As mentioned before, one of these poster runs was done to advertise the Dr. James Brown lecture. And one of the areas we made sure to hit was the University of Alberta campus. Our logic of course being, that who would be more interested in a lecture on education than the academic community. Since we were out there, we also put up our other posters as well. Among them was a poster which we had never put up before. It sat in the cue waiting for it's time in the rotation, like a goon on a hockey bench. As luck would have it, today was that day. The poster spoofed a previous poster campaign which was concocted by feminist ideologues which essentially gendered the crime of rape, insinuated women were helpless objects with no control over what happens to them, and insinuated rape was a crime of opportunity, and given that opportunity, most any random male would take it. So, "Just because she's drinking, doesn't mean she wants to have sex. Sex without consent equals sexual assault. Don't Be That Guy".

On July 10th, MR-E put up posters reading "Just because you regret a one night stand, doesn't mean it wasn't consensual. Lying about sexual assault equals a crime. Don't be that girl." Through some ridiculous coincidence, Lise Gotell (as in "Go tell it on the mountain, that it's moron hour up in here!"), a bigot extrodunaire who is the chair of the UofA's women's studies department, happened to notice these posters herself as she was arriving to work the following morning. She was one of the masterminds behind the original "DBT" poster campaign and when she saw how we violated her brainchild over and over on every flat surface in sight, well, she threw a royal knipshit. At some point the media was notified and a complete shit storm ensued. At work the following day, I struggled to manage the interview requests which relentlessly poured into our MR-E email. Articles about this parody poster campaign would be written all over the world. Our website traffic for that week alone spiked a ludicrous 122% above our per week average up until that point, and has maintained a level several times that original average ever since. Radio shows were aired, pathetic law suits were filed, panties were ruffled, and countless comment sections were inundated with arguments both for and against the messages of these two poster campaigns. Control over the discourse on rape was instantly wrenched from the hands of bigoted ideologues, and for the first time ever, honest discussions about this topic took place on mainstream platforms. This event certainly put MR-E on the map, but most importantly, it brought the entire MRM to the forefront of the Canadian public's eye for at least one 24 hour media cycle (which in Canada, lasts about 1 month, eh). We had no idea when we set out that day that this poster would spark this kind of a reaction. If we did, I guarantee you we would have put them up a hell of a lot sooner.

http://www.mensrightsedmonton.com/official_statement/http://www.mensrightsedmonton.com/feminist-no-show-during-live-avfm-debate/http://www.mensrightsedmonton.com/dont-be-that-lying-feminist-girl-writes-what/http://www.mensrightsedmonton.com/dont-be/

At the hight of the DBT girl poster campaign controversy, internet celebrity GirlWritesWhat and members of MR-E were invited to appear on the infamous Tom Lykis podcast. Even though I sat in the cue for 2 hours and never got a chance to speak on the air, I enjoyed listening in as our own GWW expertly fielded Tom's questions about MR-E, what we stand for, as well as our activist activities. Great job Karen!

On August 12th, MR-E attended the Edmonton 2013 SlutWalk. We were there waving signs which said "I love sluts" and "Whor-Ah for sluts!" Video here:

<iframe width="750″ height="420″ src="//www.youtube.com/embed/SRoKSMOKhkU" frameborder="0″ allowfullscreen></iframe>

We bet that even if we showed up to this supposedly pro-slut demonstration with signs expressing our support of sluts, the feminists would be so intellectually deficient that they would go through all sorts of mental gymnastics just to take offense by our signs by virtue of the fact they were being waved by their sworn enemies. And they didn't disappoint. Only a few short days after this event, on August 18th, a mental midget named Ryjin Vander Hoek published a video criticizing MR-E. Talk about your low hanging fruit.
http://www.mensrightsedmonton.com/ryjin-vander-hoek-what-a-tangled-web-we-weave/http://www.mensrightsedmonton.com/next-up-activism-is-anti-semitic/

On September 11th, MR-E fired up the shit-mobile and invaded Calgary. We lost a good car magnet that day, but we also helped establish Mens Rights Calgary. As is our nature, we postered the crap out of cow-town and had a blast with some local MRAs there for a whole day. Mens Rights Saskatoon, Mens Rights Sydney and A Voice For Men branches in the UK and Romania also became active in 2013, our best to each of these new groups and their fledgeling broods. Here's to a long and hopefully productive era of cooperation and success. That's our official stance. Unofficially, if any of you punks think you can out-activist us here at MR-E, then well, you're freaking dreaming! It's on now, bitches!
http://www.mensrightsedmonton.com/mr-e-helps-establish-mens-rights-calgary/http://www.mensrightssaskatoon.com/http://mensrightssydney.webs.com/http://www.avoiceformen-uk.com/
http://ro.avoiceformen.com/

September 14th, we finally did something we hoped to do for many months. We managed to capture two feminists tearing down some of our posters. These two cowards were fine with censoring those messages they disagreed with, but when confronted with their fascist behavior they didn't seem to have anything to say. Apparently feminists think their right to free speech includes their right to censor us. So once again, showing up and winning.
http://www.mensrightsedmonton.com/mr-e-confronts-fascists/

By the 15th of September, the hype surrounding the DBT Girl poster campaign was noticeably dying down. Sure a few feminists were just getting caught up, but to those that mattered, it was yesterday's news. So MR-E put up a new controversial poster. This time challenging Lise Gotell herself. We put these up AROUND the UofA campus so we could not be accused of trespassing on their precious property where contrarian points of view are not welcome. Once again, MR-E was in the media spotlight where we belong.

http://www.mensrightsedmonton.com/lise-gotell-bigot-extrodunaire/

On September 24th, MR-E submitted a candidate for city council in the Edmonton elections. Yeah we did. Our candidate ran on the "patriarchy" platform, and promised to further the systemic oppression of women and breed animals to more closely resemble the almighty phallus. Most people got the satire of this fake campaign instantly. For those slightly slower individuals who didn't, please allow me to break it down for you now. The point of this patriarchy campaign was to demonstrate just how ludicrous this "patriarchy" theory truly is. If a patriarchy existed, THIS is what it would look like. We used feminist's own definitions of patriarchy to write that platform. It literally came straight from the pig's mouth. Juxtapose this obviously phony campaign platform with the society we actually live in and ask yourself; how insane would we have to be for somebody like this to win in an election. To anybody sympathetic to feminism, always remember this patriarchy is what feminists claim YOU believe in, and according to them, only their social justice programs and social engineering can restore us to sanity. On election day, our candidate received the fewest votes of everybody. Even the anarchist who told people "not to vote for him" beat the pants off us. So the next time some brain dead blow hard tries to claim we live in a patriarchal society, use this example to take away their argument. And by all means, feel free to rip this material off and replicate it in your local community.
http://www.mensrightsedmonton.com/patriarchal-overlord-nick-reading-addresses-his-minions/http://www.mensrightsedmonton.com/mr-e-submits-candidate-for-city-council/http://www.mensrightsedmonton.com/patriarchy-party-responds-to-zombie-wall-questions/http://www.mensrightsedmonton.com/669/
http://www.mensrightsedmonton.com/692/

On September 28th, the much anticipated mens rights rally took place in Toronto, Ontario. Duckman, GirlWritesWhat, and my humble self were in attendance representing MR-E. The lecture on the need for men's centers was very interesting, but the highlight of the trip (for me at least) was getting to meet and party with the great men and women behind this movement in person for the very first time. It was very reassuring to learn such genuinely good and decent people are fighting along side us in this effort. People who's integrity and commitment to fairness and justice was simply unrivaled. Except Paul Elam. What an ass! That man stands 10 feet tall and has absolutely zero moral fiber to speak of. LOL, well obviously I'm joking here. Paul is probably more like 8 feet tall. Aside from the radical marxist feminists who made an appearance on the second day, to protest our peaceful public demonstration in Queens Park, the entire weekend went off without a hitch. We even found time to leave our mark on the Toronto light posts (not what you think) before flying back to Edmonton.
http://www.mensrightsedmonton.com/mr-e-posters-toronto/

In early November, another group of genius manginas took their best shot at denouncing us with predictable results. By this time the smarter feminists had learned to ignore us, as we represent the turning of the tide. I have a theory that the feminists must have though that our DBT Girl parody poster was the product of some uninformed pranksters who were just having a laugh and would surely crumble under a little pressure from them and scrutiny from an intense media spotlight. They raised the alarm thinking they could bully whoever was responsible into denouncing this parody poster and use this as an opportunity to renew their rape culture bullshit on national TV. Instead, they got Karen Straughan, an entire movement of well informed counter-feminist MRAs and a local group of rag-tag activists who can't be shamed into compliance and who don't give a fuck. Suddenly they realized there is nowhere for them to go from here but down and the more they struggle the more they hasten their decline. However, even though the smartest of our foes know to stay away from us, there will always be the more impulsive types like the dopes in this video who can't help themselves. This re-affirmes a simple truth: when they show up to challenge us, they make fools of themselves. When we show up, we win!
http://www.mensrightsedmonton.com/arguments-against-mre-and-avfm/http://www.mensrightsedmonton.com/razlo-to-male-feminists-bite-my-shiny-metal-ass/http://www.mensrightsedmonton.com/uncle-berns-got-mr-es-back/

On the 16th of November, MR-E launched a new series called "Great Moments in MGTOW". Instead of telling people what MGTOW philosophy is about, we aim to simply demonstrate it. If you know of a great moment in MGTOW, please submit it to our email (MensRightsEdmonton@gmail.com) Thank you.

http://www.mensrightsedmonton.com/great-moments-in-mgtow-1/
http://www.mensrightsedmonton.com/great-moments-in-mgtow-2/
http://www.mensrightsedmonton.com/great-moments-in-mgtow-3/

<iframe width="750″ height="420″ src="//www.youtube.com/embed/B3AygjimgyY" frameborder="0″ allowfullscreen></iframe>

On November 20th, in keeping with our penchant for performing public services, MR-E exposed a local post secondary teacher, Barret Weber's rampant anti-semiticm. Yes, we are heros.
http://www.mensrightsedmonton.com/barret-weber-is-anti-semitic11/

And finally, in December, MR-E helped our new contributor Fidelbogen launch the "Feminism poisons women" meme. Spread this around, would you? Spreaad it!!
http://www.mensrightsedmonton.com/feminism-poisons-women-2/

Now I'm going to take off my humility hat for one second, just to stress something I feel very strongly about. And that is the need for MRAs to form real life activist groups like ours. Get out there and take this into the real world. You have no idea what can happen as a result. "Postergate" as it is now being referred to, was an accident! We didn't plan on that, it just sort of happened as a result of the work we were doing. Imagine the change that would be possible (both accidental and deliberate) if dozens of activist groups like ours and other branches of AVFM were in operation all over the world. You think the feminists could stand up to that with their message of guilt, shame and submission? Despite all their ill-gotten power and finances, I tell you right now, they would be absolutely DEVASTATED by the cultural shockwaves we would create. They could hardly be called our opposition. We have the logic and the facts on our side. Use them! When local feminists put on a demonstration shaming or blaming men – show up and MOCK THEM! When manginas stupidly stray from their flock and engage you in an argument – make them pay by exposing their ridiculous beliefs in full view of the public. Let's get to work making the term "feminism" fall into the same level of disrepute as "nazism".

And that about wraps it up. All in all I'd say it was a damn good, bloody good, damn good year. Our thanks to all our friends at AVFM and to all of you who pitched in to help us with these projects, be it in the form of your time, or your effort, or your financial contributions.

Special mentions go out to:
Every single person who donated Typhon Blue
James Huff
Robert O'Hara
Dannyboy
Fidelbogen
GirlWritesWhat
and me, Razlo (okay humility hat has now been put back on).

One thing I can guarantee you is that we will be relying on you again in the coming years. Your contributions make what we do possible and open up new options and possibilities for us. And trust me, we got some BIG plans that are lying in wait until we have the funding to do them right. Seriously, you haven't seen anything yet. Can't wait to see what 2014 has in store for us. Let's make it a big one.

That's FTSU!

~Raz
MR-E

Oh, and one more thing.
It's "Mens Rights Edmonton!"
Not "MRA Edmonton", or "Edmonton MRA", or "MRE-Edmonton", or whatever else. Enough is enough!

Please help AVFM continue to spread the message that Men's Rights are Human Rights by contributing to our quarterly fundraiser. Thank you!

The “yonic cultus”

Ernest Belfort Bax · 31 December 2013 · Archived copy · Original

The following was written by E. Belfort Bax in the year 1887 under the title No Misogyny But True Equality. In this piece Bax speaks of the ‘yonic cultus’ and ‘yonic superstition,’ referring of course to the magical vagina. – PW

No Misogyny But True Equality

And now let us come to the main point in dispute [about female privilege]. I have made no “impeachment of women in general.” What I have impeached is the ascendency of women as a privileged caste or class. What I maintained is that whatever may have been the disabilities of women in earlier stages of society, in our modern bourgeois society (Western Europe and its colonies), there is an increasing tendency to erect women into a “sacra-sacred” class, the members of which are to be exempted from all the disagreeable consequences of their own actions, to have the criminal law suspended in their favour, to win in every civil suit, to be treated as martyrs and heroines every time a slight inconvenience befalls them. This is what I term the modern 19th century form of the Yonic cultus.

Mrs. Besant will not take me seriously when I state that men have been given six months for protecting themselves against their wives’ violence. Yet this is literally true. The case I had in my mind occurred, if I remember rightly, about March last. The exact date I forget, but I noticed it in the Commonweal at the time. About a year-and-a-half ago there was a case at Highgate (as far as I recollect), in which a woman actually attacked her husband, who was an invalid and I think a cripple, with a knife, inflicting serious injury, and was let off scot free. If in the higher administration of the law there is gross and egregious favouritism shown to women as women, this is none the less so in the mere setting of the law in motion. A little more than a year ago a boy was sentenced, by Mr. Justice Day, to penal servitude for life, for attempting to extort money by threats of an indecent charge. Now women are allowed (vide Mr. Howard Vincent, Pall Mall Gazette, July 13th last) under the very eyes of the police to exercise as a regular trade, a practice which in the male, on a single offence, is deemed worthy of the penultimate penalty of the law.[1]

Now I ask has ever greater privilege accrued to any class than this. The mediaeval “benefit of clergy,” pales down before the modern bourgeois “benefit of Sex.” Again, an alderman ventures upon a little feeble civic banter with some flower-girls who are brought up before him for obstructing the pathway. The Yonicists are up in arms. These "poor girls," are insulted. The newspapers gush with indignation. Mdme. Dronin is arrested on false information; by virtue of her sex the whole delinquent officialdom bows before her, from Home Secretary downward, with apologies and costly gifts. A scream goes forth that women are bullied by the police in the streets. Parliament adjourns. The welkin rings with wrath against police tyranny. Over mere male Socialists, that does'nt matter – but over prostitutes – Oh! The Pall Mall Gazette rubs its eyes and snivels "Brethren shall we harry our sisters"? The same Pall Mall Gazette, bien entendu is very anxious to have its brothers "harried" for so much as looking at a woman in the streets; for the crime of accosting two years hard labour would, we suppose, be "grossly inadequate."

Talking about the Pall Mall Gazette, by the way, it is difficult to believe its editor was not intentionally "lying" at home "for the benefit of his country" – women, as he conceived, when he declared the other night that only a woman could be arrested on unsupported testimony. A man deserves to be condemned to travel every day for a twelvemonth with single women on the Metropolitan Railway that can make such an impudently false statement. As regards this matter, however, I, for one, am quite willing that no charge should be taken against a woman for annoyance in the street on the unsupported testimony of a man, provided no charge is taken against a man for indecent assault on the unsupported testimony of a woman. How now, what do you say to this, Mr. Stead? Completely destroy the blackmail industry – wouldn't it? Now take this case – Barbarous cruelty to a young child, through whipping, is charged against the police – the child is a boy, a question is asked in Parliament, an investigation promised, and the matter shelved. Compare this with the case of a female arrested on an unproved charge by a policeman, and locked up for a couple of hours. She whimpers, and the respectable classes are set in a blaze.

Yonic Superstition

I think that the Yonic superstition is in nothing more clearly evinced than in recent criminal legislation. The tender body of a young child may be flayed by a brutal policeman, just because it happens to be of the male sex; if it be of the female, to lay a finger on it is sacrilege, and for precisely the same offence it practically receives no punishment. The British Bourgeois affects horror at Count Schouvaloff's birching of the court maids of honour at St. Petersburg, whose bodies were presumably better able to bear a castigation than the babes he complacently reads of in his paper as being sentenced to ten strokes of the birch by a police magistrate. Then take the clause in the recent Criminal Law Amendment Act, which provides that in the case of illicit intercourse between a boy and a girl, while the boy may be sent to the penal servitude of a reformatory for five years the girl remains absolutely untouched. Now it is universally admitted that girls develop earlier than boys, so that this is a simple premium for girls with precocious criminal tendencies to entrap youths. If it is prejudicial to the interests of society that intercourse should under any circumstances take place in the case of girls under sixteen, what conceivable rational ground can there be for limiting the penal consequences to one side of the equation. A more abominable infamy it would probably be difficult to find in the whole course of modern legislation.

Such are the outward and visible signs of the worship of the female principle in the modern world. Newspaper gush, one-sided legislation, "purity" meetings.

As it is holiday season, perhaps the editor of To-Day will allow me to be frivolous, and narrate a dream I had the other night:

> I had been reading the Pall Mall Gazette, and Mrs. Besant's article after supper – and on going to sleep me thought I was in an ancient city. Temples, with griffins and other queer stone creatures abounded on all sides. Groups of quaintly robed idlers were standing about an open square (in which I suddenly found myself) talking eagerly together. Presently there issued from one side of the square a procession of white-robed figures that looked ghostly in the twilight as they advanced with measured step to the sound of the lyre and the lute. I asked of one who stood near what it was that I saw. "Knowest thou not, O son of the stranger," replied he, "that the great goddess (the name I couldn't quite catch) has vouchsafed to appear to men in mortal form, that she commands new rites, and will unfold to her worshippers the holy mysteries of the militant virgin."
>
> This was interesting, and I eagerly watched the approaching votaries. While I had been waiting it had been > growing rapidly dusk. But now the moon shone forth. By its light, I thought I detected, in spite of their strange garb, foremost among the advancing throng, not as I expected, Orientals of the third century B.C., but the homely figures of Mr. Stead and Mrs. Ormiston Chant, hand in hand, singing as they danced, and dancing as they sang, a joyous hymn of ecstacy. I looked again, and behind them detected, as I fancied, the features of Mrs. Josephine Butler and Mr Waugh, in similar raptures. My historical sense suffered a shock and I essayed to withdraw a little, but ere I had done so my neighbour laid his hand on me, "See," said he, "the goddess herself approaches." As I turned, the sharp cut features of a man, evidently a priest, caught my eye. He was clad like the rest in a plain white robe, but on his breast a large triangular silver breastplate glistened in the moonlight, and on his head was a conical crown. Could it be, but no – yet it was very like – the good Mr. Marson! In his hand he bore a standard whence gleamed in massy silver the model of a fish.

>
> Behind the high-priest followed a car drawn by eight milk white mares, and in a kind of palanquin a veiled figure I knew to be the goddess. "Bow, vile stranger," said my neighbour, "adore that virginity which was, and is, and is to come, before which even the legislators veil their faces." But I kneeled not, neither adored, but standing looked on. The procession halted before a temple, four priests came out and raised the palanquin. A thrill ran through the assembled multitude as the time arrived, when just for one moment the sacred veil should be raised. At the further end of the square a body of richly-attired old men emerged, with bowed heads, from a massive and imposing building. These, I understood, were the legislators, the fathers of the city.
>
> Now, thought I, for a chance to see one of the great types of ancient female beauty, if not the Trojan Helen, at least a Semiramid, a "Mrs." Caudaules, or a Cleopatra! The veil was raised, there stood forward in the pale moonshine – "Miss" Cass ! I turned and felt a little sick. I suppose I must have swooned at the sight of the shopocratic vestal, for the next thing I recollect is being aroused by a crowd rushing forth from the temple, headed by him and her, whom I had taken for Mr. Stead and Mrs. Ormiston Chant, shrieking death and destruction to the male principle. "Hail to the eternal virgin-militant womanhood!" They all raised diamond-shaped daggers on high and conjured the moon-goddess that ere her virgin rays paled that night the city should be purged for ever of maleness, and dedicated a holy priestess to her service.
>
> I didn't know exactly what it all meant, but thought I might as well go and look at something else, and so moved away, clutching a steel J pen and a fragment of the Pall Mall Gazette, which, in the event of the hero of Northumberland street beginning to show "venom," I intended to use as a charm, crying In hoc signa vinces, (The allusion to the power of the new journalism; I thought would be sure to "fetch" him and make him forget his dreadful vows). However, at that instant I awoke – to reflections on the mutability of human affairs and the difference between the militant Yonicism of two thousand years ago – the group of smooth-faced white-robed fanatics, fish-sign on forehead, triangle on breast and diamond-shaped dagger in hand – and the militant Yonicism of to-day with its black frock coats, Exeter Halls, newspaper articles, London police-courts, lobby wire pulling, and vigilance societies, and I thought that on the whole in spite of certain elements of unpleasantness I preferred the former.

Let me assure Mrs. Besant I am no hater of "women in general." What I hate is – women in the "particular" position of a privileged class as they are at present. I decline to bow down before a sexual principle, or to admit the justice of granting privileges on the basis of a sex-sentiment. What I contended and still contend is that the bulk of the advocates of woman's rights are simply working, not for equality, but for female ascendency. It is all very well to say they repudiate chivalry. They are ready enough to invoke it politically when they want to get a law passed in their favour – while socially, to my certain knowledge, many of them claim it as a right every whit as much as ordinary women. Says Mrs. Besant, "Why use the existence of bad women as an impeachment of women in general?" Now I want to know who has done so. I certainly have not. All I say is, don't allow the worst characteristics of bad women to come into play by giving them free leave to use the tribunals for purposes of spite, revenge or blackmail! Don't pull out your biggest pocket handkerchief at every tale of wife-beating, before you have heard the other side! Don't allow women to ruin men by legal process, as a punishment for not marrying them, when they want them to! Don't allow wives to "sell up" their husbands, or to compel their husbands to maintain them in idleness, while they are allowed to keep all their own property or earnings singly to themselves.

In stating this view of the question plainly, I may say I am only giving articulation to opinions constantly expressed in private by men amongst themselves. A noisy band fills the papers with lying rhodomontades, & c., & c., on the "downtrodden woman," and their representations are allowed to pass by default. I am styled a misogynist forsooth, because I detest the sex-class ascendency, striven for by a considerable section at least of the bourgeois Women's Rights advocates, and desire instead a true and human equality between the sexes.

Notes:

1. This is not all. It is now proposed by the Saturday Review and Pall Mall Gazette that this promising branch of female industry should be "protected" by the curtailment of cross-examination. A Mrs. Brereton, the other day, brought what the jury by their verdict pronounced a false, or to put it mildly, "doubtful" charge against a man. It is now actually complained by the journals in question that this verdict was obtained or furthered by the too severe cross-examination of the prosecutrix. Hence it is argued that cross-examination must be in future limited to questions not embarrassing to the prosecution. Could sex privilege go much further!

My New Year's Resolution for 2014

Paul Elam · 31 December 2013 · Archived copy · Original

I rarely use this site any more for personal style blog posts. It just seems inappropriate, as though AVFM is no longer just mine. And it isn't. This corner of the internet as my personal blog yielded to a movement a long time ago.

I am still going to ask your indulgence as I take a selfish trip into the personal.

It is a time of resolutions for many and I am no exception. As I look back on the last year and examine myself, looking at the (many) things I could do to make changes for the better, one of the things that strikes me as the most glaring is composure.

I am not a particularly patient man. That is something that frequently works both for and against me. Whatever it does, it is what it is. I am seeker of change, and when I think it is important I am generally not happy till I get it.

This part of my personality sometimes has me at odds, even with people whom I care for and respect. It plays out, even a little more frequently these days in the comments of this website. For those bothered by that, you have my apology, even if it is perfunctory.

My pet peeve, more than anything else, is traffic directors that don't know how to drive. It is those who won't roll their sleeves up, but who want to fly in and tell others "how it is done."

This bothers some more than others. It bothers me a lot. The least I can do is offer an explanation.

At the risk of sounding like a bellyaching feminist, my chosen path in life is hard. The conflicts are stimulating, even exciting at times, but I really don't think anyone in their right mind enjoys reading in national media that they are a hate monger. There is nothing particularly gratifying at seeing your name as a high profile target on the SPLC's website, or to speak to one "journalist" after another only to have them twist some of your words, and outright fabricate others, just to make you look like an ogre.

It is a constant grind on the spirit. It wears at my will even though I know quitting is simply not an option. It is stress and then some.

It takes a toll on health and, yes, happiness. It also wears at my peace of mind. At the end of the day I still have to face a partner who loves me, but who is sometimes afraid when someone knocks on the door. I have run out of dismissive platitudes to appease her. And I have to admit I have taken to making sure I know who is on the other side before opening it.

None of this includes any of the stress of trying to keep up with the actual activism and daily operations and the ever present bills.

All of this as a part of life has a cost. With me, part of that is my patience and my manners. They are both at their most strained when dealing with those who come to AVFM, or to the YouTube Channel, the Forums or other venues we run to let me know that while they aren't interested in doing anything for the MRHM, they still want to tell me how I ought to be doing my job.

Including tonight, they have been the recipients of more than a few "fuck yous."

I have just run out of patience for armchair quarterbacks and seagull contributors. For those that don't know what a seagull contributor is, it is one who flies in, squawks a lot, shits on everything and flies back out.

My ability, indeed my interest in handling them with any care is used up. I am not even interested in making myself a better person by being more tolerant of it.

Still, this brings me to my New Year's resolution, which I intend to keep. First, and once again, if my gruff exterior (and interior for that matter) have been a source of offense, you do have a genuine if somewhat mechanical apology.

For my New Year's resolution for 2014, my pledge is this. When it comes to dealing with self-elected but non-functional directors of matters in which they will not share in the work, I pledge to tell you to fuck off with a little more courtesy than I did in 2013. And that is the only promise I can have hope of keeping.

You see, I am, above all else, a realist about myself. Or at least I like to think I am. I know that I have nothing but contempt for seagulls. And I do feel like I came by that contempt honestly. Not being one to feign affection also means I am not going to bother promising that I will even try.

My only request is that for those who are not seagulls, but who really do wish I would show more patience, that they understand that I do not have that patience to give. I just don't have it, not do I imagine that I am at all alone in this respect. I am not the only activist here, and others have paid prices similar to mine.

For those of you, and there are many, who have had the compassion to forgive me this innate imperfection. I want to thank you, and tell you that I will count on you to carry me though the days ahead, which promise to be rougher than the days that came before it.

The closer we get to our goals, the harder they will come for us, and yes, for me. I want you to know that I will never quit. I do want to ask you to understand that this diligence, in the face of what it takes to follow things through, comes with a price.

Thank you and Happy New Year.

Stop Edmonton's Sexual Assault Specialist, Karen Smith, from her possible crime spree!

AVfM Video Source · 31 December 2013 · Archived copy · Original

We have for some time suspected that a member of the hate group known as Sexual Assault Voices of Edmonton, (which we sometimes refer to around here as Edmonton's SS-A) may be a serial rapist. We have no actual proof of this, nor really, anything else to back up this claim except that she's part of a known hate group and is obsessed with rape and believes false accusers are rare and don't matter. Because we have had no actual proof of our suspicions, we have remained uncomfortably silent in the face of nagging down… until Eric Duckman, aka Nick Reading of Men's Rights Edmonton, publicly revealed that he shared our suspicions. We'll let Nick explain:

Now, because it's so very difficult to report things to the police–it's emotionally wrenching and all, plus they might ask pointed questions that make you feel uncomfortable–we support efforts to allow people to anonymously identify potential predators like Karen Smith of Edmonton might be.

So, if you were sexually molested or assaulted or otherwise the victim of criminal conduct by Edmonton's Karen Smith, here is a form you may use to report what she did and when she did it. Complete assurances have been given to us by Men's Rights Edmonton that this form will only be used appropriately and will not be used in any "official" investigations and its contents alone will not be used as evidence against potential sex offender Karen Smith of Edmonton.

We would be very relieved if she turns out to be innocent, so if there were no reports on that anonymous form, why, I guess we can conclude that she probably isn't a sex offender.

So, you should only use this anonymous form if you genuinely think it's possible something happened somewhere at some time involving Karen Smith of Edmonton.

If you're a victim of Karen Smith of Edmonton's SS-A, however, please be brave, do the right thing, and help bring a psychopath to justice via anonymous allegations!

Women, time for you to man up

John Hembling (JtO) · 1 January 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Ladies, do you have moral agency?

As the opening of this article, this is a rhetorical question. But in the post-legal world created by 3 generations of feminism, it's not a rhetorical question. Are you (a woman) a moral agent?

Of course, the opponents of the human rights of men and boys have a long history of feigned incomprehension of the arguments of this movement, so an explicit definition of terms is necessarily included here.

Moral agency is an individual's ability to make moral judgments based on some commonly held notion of right and wrong and to be held accountable for these actions.[1] A moral agent is "a being who is capable of acting with reference to right and wrong."

Men, as the word is commonly used, are universally moral agents. Even bad men, those vilified in our media based on improper behavior, or criminal behavior, are moral agents. They are held accountable for their actions and speech. Picture any recent celebrity dragged over the coals of public censure, tearfully or earnestly apologizing in a press-conference-of-atonement.

But the question, for women, is apparently different. Elin Woods, ex-wife of the golf superstar apparently routinely assaulted her ex husband using a variety of weapons, including a golf club. Accountability for her? Nope. She was the victim. Pay no attention to that satisfied smile on her face as she made off with millions of the dollars earned by the superstar athlete she "caught" having sex with women who didn't regularly initiate violence against him.

We will omit any tedious recitation of recent media-featured women for whom personal accountability in their own criminal and violent conduct was not a feature.

Distinct from individual women, women-the-class are not moral agents. No, they're victims, they're objects, they're helpless, they're subject to the prevailing winds of fortune.

The war on women. Rape culture, patriarchy. Women's historical oppression, the wage gap, the glass ceiling, et cetera. All of these are pseudo-mystical elements of our culture's narrative, re-enforcing the non-agency and continued self selected identity of victimhood of women-the-class.

The question is not whether women-the-class are moral agents, since that question has already been answered. They are not.

The remaining question is reserved for the individual. Are you, being a woman, a moral agent?

This question, asked within the context of an article, if of course rhetorical. But, when asked personally, it requires a real answer. In the post-legal, feminist-influenced culture we currently inhabit, it's a question to be asked of, and answered by, anyone with a uterus or a double X chromosome as entry to any nontrivial, friendly, working, or other relationship.

You must be at least as tall as this sign to ride the coaster. You must be a self-possessed adult exercising your own agency, volition and self responsibility to be an associate or friend, or colleague. At least, my associate.

There are a few realities on the ground, rarely if ever acknowledged by any element of our culture's narrative. Items of fact which everybody knows, but will not admit to, because to do so is forbidden.

Women have much more social power and prestige than men. Women also have more economic and political power than men.

Who controls access to sex? Women, obviously. Who controls the spending of most disposable income? Can you guess? Take a look at the amount of retail floor space in any store, and who it is arranged to cater to? Who are 55% to 65% of the voting electorate? A hint: not men. And who are the majority of graduation outcomes as well as students in any major college or university? Again: not men.

The point here isn't to "prove" our culture is powerfully gynocentric, because anybody to whom that fact is not painfully obvious is either mentally defective, or too dishonest to be worth addressing.

But coupled with the social, economic, and political power wielded by the so-called weaker sex is a grotesque, sickening cultural fraud: "the weaker sex." The idea central to feminism is that women are less capable, less rational, less adult, weaker willed, and of lesser personal agency and volition than men.

In cases where women commit crimes, or initiate violence, or other general counter-ethical ass-hattery, we are treated through our mainstream media to a never ending torrent of pubic excuse-making. Kasey Anthony murdered her 2 year old infant, apparently because being a mother interfered with the important pursuit of partying. After a six-week trial, in July of 2011, the jury found Casey Not Guilty of first degree murder, aggravated child abuse, and aggravated manslaughter of a child, but guilty of four misdemeanour counts of providing false information to a law enforcement officer. But there was no doubt about whether she had killed the 2 year old victim. But Anthony was abused as a child, or maybe sexually abused as a pseudo-adult–or maybe suffered some other misfortune. Because male criminals are always afforded the excuse of a bad childhood or relationship gone wrong, the same considerations are extended to female child-killers like Casey Anthony, right?

Except that no male offender is ever afforded such consideration, and nor should they be.

So why are female offenders so often and so publicly excused? It is the idea, central in the feminist narrative of our culture: that women are weaker, less capable, less adult, and lacking in the personal agency we assume and require of the real grown-ups in our culture, i.e. men.

But this cultural tendency is present not only in our post-legal, feminist-influenced culture, it's been present for millennia, long before privileged, rich middle class white women began writing books about how oppressed they were. In fact feminists, for all their talk of radical change, have done nothing more than amplify the aspects of "patriarchy" they claim to oppose. What is commonly called "feminism" is a paternalistic view of women as society's incompetent infants to be be taken care of at all costs.

Of course, not everyone is necessarily raised in a powerfully feminist family, but almost our entire society demonstrates continued willingness to instantly fabricate excuses for female offenders and criminals. However, it's worth noting that the rise of modern feminism to preeminence as the culture's governing ethic coincides exactly with the mainstreaming of excuse making for any and all feminine criminality, violence, or pathology.

Obviously, given examples like the publicly excused infant killer Casey Anthony, cheered-for sexual mutilator Catherine Becker, or any other public female criminal – there will be cries of "not all women are like that". And that complaint will be true, but it will also be entirely beside the point. For those who do demonstrate violence or other antisocial pathologies – there remains the public chorus of excuse making.

What this means on an individual level is that any woman, even one with no history of criminal or violent behavior has the permanent, ever ready escape clause of the public's excuse making capacity. Personal accountability is, for women, an optional indulgence. It's also a choice usually selected only when convenient.

So we return to the question, asked not of women-the-group, but asked directly of you.

Are you, a woman, a moral agent? The answer for most is no, but what about you personally? If it's no – well then, kindly get lost. there's the door, don't let it hit your ass on the way out.

Obviously, this article is written from the perspective of it's author, myself. Just one man, arguably a very bad man indeed. However, a growing fraction of men and women are adapting their own viewpoints independent of, but similar to what I have described here. That is why variations of this article's central question, "are you a moral agent", addressed to women, are beginning to appear through the ecosystem of public and private discourse.

The examples provided earlier are extreme cases. Dialling calumny down, it appears common, based on articles in the daily mail and elsewhere that women taken with a desire for a baby feel no compunction at all about deception to rope a man into a 20 year legal and financial obligation.

http://www.dailymail.co.uk/femail/article-2059548/Four-men-reveal-trauma-dad-deception.html

IN other news Erin Wotherspoon is a Toronto resident and grifter who routinely eats at fine restaurants, and brags through her blog that she dates-and-discards several different men every week. She does this so that her "marks" pay for her expensive appetite. As I write this, canoe.ca has a current article reporting that she will shortly have her own reality TV show. Most of the commentary was positive, praising Wotherspoon for her initiative and invention. However, one particular negative comment on the article called the Wotherspoon an attention whore, a phrase demeaning to sexual service workers by comparing them to a scammer. Sadly lacking from any editorial commentary is the strictly accurate term grifter.

A grifter: A thief who operates by fraud, rather than direct violence.

But violence and theft aren't even necessary to find numerous normalized examples. The now popularized gender ideological rhetoric surrounding sex and consent includes the flatly moronic idea that a wiling sexual liaison between a man and women after both have consumed alcohol is definitionally a sexual violation of the woman. Why, if both hypothetical participants are similarly socially lubricated is it rape. Further, if we accept that fallacy why is it not the male participant victimized. The answer of course is simple, because participating in an act of sex, or indeed, participating in any action is an act of volition. But the modern feminist ethic holds; as distinct from people possessed of minds (even drunk minds), women do not possess personal agency. It is likely only a temporary oversight that driving while drunk is not also exempted from women's legal responsibilities in the criminal codes of western nations. Auto manufacturers, designers, and salespeople would be advised to retool their professions, in preparation for routine litigation, each time a female drunk driver kills pedestrians or other motorists. Unless of course the offending engineers, manufacturers and car salesmen happen to also be women.

The examples given above are varied, as the question of moral agency reaches widely into every area of life. As already mentioned, when applied to women-the-class, comes pre-supplied with the resounding answer; no. Women-the-class are not moral agents.

Which is why, in a world of Not-All-Women-Are-Like-That, the same question is increasingly asked of women as individuals. However, as suggested by the included definition of moral agency near the beginning of this discussion, the question is not always asked most effectively as a direct inquiry.

Feigned incomprehension is a serviceable deflection. Rather, the question is most often asked indirectly by the quiet measurement of behavior. Are you a moral agent, or are you an actor to whom the produced outcomes of your choices are divorced from your exercised agency.

And that question, are you a moral agent, however it is asked – requires an answer. From you.

I have previously asked this question publicly in the form of an article called The Gun In the Room. When challenged to answer the question as it was framed in that article – a woman claiming to be "concerned" about the issues facing modern men responded with an abject abdication of adulthood.

The violence our society puts at the proxy disposal of women, with no attached accountability is the gun, referred to in the title of that article.

Her reply : The violence by proxy which women can initiate : " is not [her] problem, it's not [her] responsibility to do anything about the gun placed in [her] hands".

The child with a deadly weapon, which we are all to agree isn't there, even while it is carelessly fired at bystanders.

Are you an adult, or are you a child?

If you claim the answer for you is that you're an adult, simply saying so will not be sufficient.

You’re going to have to prove it.

[1] Angus, Taylor (2003). Animals & Ethics: An Overview of the Philosophical Debate. Peterborough, Ontario: Broadview Press. p. 20.

Please help AVFM continue to spread the message that Men’s Rights are Human Rights by contributing to our quarterly fundraiser. Thank you!

Another red pill star is born

AVfM Video Source · 1 January 2014 · Archived copy · Original

In case you have not been introduced to his work, please meet a new red pill star. I can't say I agree with 100% of everything Spetsnaz says. I found myself only agreeing with 99.996% of the material. It is some of the best to emerge from the red pill horizon of late; worthy, I think, of presenting all nine of his videos in one post. They are all excellent. I don't suggest listening to them in any particular order, save for the first one, which is just stunning. He takes on the subject of female psychopathy and drives home his points with the force of Thor's Hammer. By all means, watch them all, though. PE

Please help AVFM continue to spread the message that Men's Rights are Human Rights by contributing to our quarterly fundraiser. Thank you!

Male Sexuality by Spetsnaz

AVfM Video Source · 1 January 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Can any man here fundamentally disagree with a word of this? At all? We don't think so.

You should all of Spetsnaz's videos.

Please help AVFM continue to spread the message that Men's Rights are Human Rights by contributing to our quarterly fundraiser. Thank you!

Cathy Young Takes Aim and Fires: Side of Barn Still Safe

Paul Elam · 2 January 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Cathy Young, an opinion writer often quoted in the men's rights community for her frequent criticism of victim feminism, has offered up a superficially sterling New Year's resolution on the pages of realclearpolitics.com. Acknowledging the heightened awareness of the men's rights community that operates in general defiance of feminist dogma, she expresses the hope that we can move toward a unified movement more centered on gender equity.

She delivered the message from the on high perspective of an informed and experienced social commentator:

> Top wish for 2014: a "true equality" movement. In 2013, there was a fair amount of attention to men's rights groups—which often raise legitimate issues but have a regrettable tendency to mirror the gender antagonism, hyperbole, and victim mentality of radical feminism. But, with men's issues on the table, perhaps the next year will see more calls for a balanced approach that promotes fairness and goodwill toward both sexes. That would make a good, if optimistic, New Year's resolution.

That would also be a crock of shit.

One has to wonder, just who are the radical feminists with whom Young has acquainted herself? Did she spend an afternoon at the Good Men Project or Pandagon and imagine that this taught her what she needs to know about radical feminism, or is she playing dumb?

Truthfully, I don't have a clue how Young got it into her head form a parallel between the men and women of the Men's Human Rights Movement and radical feminists. I just know she got it dead wrong.

Is she seriously comparing people who eschew marriage and are provocatively outspoken about false rape allegations to people who espouse murder and eugenics? Would she have us think that MHRAs writing harsh satire about the very real lack of due process for men in sexual assault cases are on par with ideologues who advocate for forced castration and a reduction of the numbers of men on the planet to between 1 and 10%?

I suppose so. After all, she is the same person who has no problem saying this publication offers "a steady diet of vulgar woman-bashing," which it does not, while entirely missing the feminist website that calls young boys "rapists in waiting" and advocates for teachers throwing them out of unopened windows… just for starters.

Comparing the men's movement, even the most provocative and hyperbolic elements, to morally bankrupt and wantonly violent gender feminists is like comparing the Civil Rights Movement to the Ku Klux Klan.

Cathy Young ought to be ashamed for doing it.

Have men's activists ever blocked doors and harassed attendees at lectures on women's issues, as feminists did to Warren Farrell in November of 2012? No. Nor did they return time after time to disrupt events and abridge the free speech of any gathering, as we saw feminists subsequently do with Drs. Paul Nathanson and Katherine Young, as well as Dr. Janice Fiamengo.

Simply put, MRAs don't act that way. Ever. Feminists do, and they do it regularly.

Of course, all this is just a comparison of the extremes, which we are better off not dwelling on too long. They distract us from primary way Young entirely misses the point.

I hate to break it to you, Cathy, but your comparison of MHRAs to radical feminists scores high on the lameness scale. Little higher, though, than it would have scored if you had compared us to mainstream feminists.

Mainstream feminism, the feminism Young seems to think we should merge with to form one big old happy gender justice family, has managed to make enormous strides and garner significant power while lacking any moral or ethical legitimacy, as well as scientific integrity.

Young knows this is true. She has written about it on many occasions, often with surgical efficiency. It is just that she appears to draw a line when the menfolk (and the women who are similarly sick of this bullshit) start getting all uppity and won't play nice with the bigots.

Drawing the line where Young does is helpful, though, in assessing her relative worth to the idea of gender equity, which is to say that her shelf life has expired. There was a time when what Cathy Young did was of benefit to informing the public about issues facing men and boys, and about the tailspin into absurdity that now typifies gender feminism.

That time is over.

The remarkable truth is that she only had this utility before the men's movement started to grow, and a real voice for men (you bet your ass that pun is intended) started to emerge. Now that there is an actual movement afoot, the days of settling for "We will superficially admit your problems as long as you don't get pushy" are about to go the defunct way of all other forms of arms-length, latte-sipping social justice.

Feminism is differentiated in waves. So too, is the men's movement. The wave of polite men with hat in hands, begging for a place at the table, has run its course, and achieved all it can. The next wave, the second wave, isn't going to be polite and is not going to ask to be heard. Cathy Young and those like her had better get used to it.

I actually share her hope for a true gender equity movement in this society. And I believe it can happen, just as soon as bigoted ideologues and their enablers either change or get out of the way.

Bygones for the new year

Dean Esmay · 2 January 2014 · Archived copy · Original

One thing that differentiates A Voice for Men from a lot of publications is that while we allow comments, and moderate them only lightly, but, we are an activism-oriented organization. So we want comments to be conducive to activism and supportive of activists in their efforts, whether that's online advocacy or boots-on-the-ground work or anywhere in between. And, as our commenting policy clearly states,

> The comment policy is simple. Threats, advocacy and ideations of violence are strictly verboten. All other manner of speech is allowed unless it becomes disruptive to the continuity of discussions.
>
> Of course, there will be those from time to time that post comments bashing men, women, gays, transgender, racial slurs, anti-Semitic or other similarly ignorant and misguided ideas. If you are one of those people, you will be treated like to moron that you are, and you will get booted when your painfully stupid ideas become a distraction. More simply put, you will be used as the community piñata till we get tired of you and then you will be shown the door for derailing. That's how we roll.
>
> The editorial policy does not apply as rigorously to comments. Readers are free post any and all ideas in dissent of published articles or the comments of other readers. The main exception to this will be the "redundancy" exception. For instance, if you want to assert that "real" men do not support LC4M, fine, post away. But if your posts become a repeated diatribe, incessantly repeating your objections after they have been vetted by other readers, then an intervention from management could occur. The same goes for mainstream politics, chivalry, religion and other matters. Also, personal attacks on front-page contributors and regular commenters will not be tolerated, and the response will be anything from a warning to a banning. While we strive hard not to, we may also occasionally declare some conversations too far off topic to be allowed to continue.
>
> You have a right to be heard here, but not a right to derail every discussion with your agenda.
>
> Management will strive to use as much constraint as possible in enforcing these policies. It is unavoidable that a certain amount of subjectivity will play into decisions. This cannot be avoided. But it will be AVfM policy to support the unrestricted speech of its readers wherever possible.

Of late we have been working harder in the "ad hominem" department, which we've sometimes gotten a little loosey-goosey with. Seriously, if you're going to be making personal attacks on the authors who contribute their work here, and activists who come to our site offering and soliciting support, you're probably not working in the spirit of what we're trying to accomplish: actually, y'know, change in the world in ways large and small. And yes, regulars to this establishment will tend to get cut more slack than newbies who've never contributed much to discussions, but no one's immune to being chided that they're derailing or letting things get too personal.

There is an addendum to the officially policy, which, really, is somewhat redundant, but may serve as clarification for some:

> At AVFM we encourage healthy and robust debate and invite thoughtful and respectful dissent, both from the opinions expressed by our article contributors and from fellow commenters on the site.
>
> We also insist that debate and disagreement does not include ad hominem, personal attacks or the intent to derail threads with either an agenda not germane to the organization or with "badgering" a point to the degree that it undermines the quality of the environment or the unity of the activist community. If you want to argue about things like why we all need to smoke weed or lowering the legal age of consent or child porn or why abortion is bad or good or about how we should bomb North Korea, do it somewhere else.
>
> Obviously, measuring standards along these lines is a subjective affair and not everyone will be pleased with > management decisions, but so that readers know, our great tendency will be to err on the side of decorum. Derailing and overt disrespect, particularly of activists that are doing the hard work on the behalf of our cause, will not be tolerated.

>
> Also, if a member of management asks you to not belabor your point or otherwise beat a dead horse, please heed their request. Ignoring that request won't be allowed.
>
> If you have received a warning from a member of the management team, and have been referred to this page as a result of one or more of your comments, please be advised that this has happened to encourage you to understand these policies and avoid banning from the site.

So. There have been some individuals banned from this site in the last year or two. For a site with tens of thousands of registered comment accounts and daily visits, that it's such a small number is actually pretty impressive. Nevertheless, because these policies do always involve a degree of subjectivity, and management is no more immune to occasional losses of temper or composure or impulsive moves than anyone else, we have decided that we would like to offer anyone who wants one a "let's let bygones be bygones" pass. The past shall be the past, and come on back if you want and you think you can abide by the policies, and no more need be said. The new year comes with a new clean slate.

So if you want back on in, you should find your old account is working now, or if it's not, shoot me a note at dean@avoiceformen.com and I'll look into it.

There are a tiny handful individuals who have been so egregiously hateful to the community or advocating such outrageous things they will not be welcomed back. That is a very short list indeed. If you are worried that it might be you, let me just say that it probably isn't, and if your account still isn't working just go ahead and shoot me a note. Like I said, it's a very short list of people who will be refused and they likely know exactly who they are. And even if you are on that (very) short list, if you email me you will get a polite response declining you and nothing more. Nothing will be published. In any case, for anyone, no apologies will be asked for, no explanations are required, no discussion is required, just, come on back and try to help us make 2014 an even bigger year than 2013 was.

Cheers,

Dean Esmay, Managing Editor

PIV is always rape, ok?

AVfM Video Source · 2 January 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Diana Davison has seen the light thanks to radfem logic. And she is a very, very naughty girl.

You might want to subscribe. We're just sayin'.

Please help AVFM continue to spread the message that Men's Rights are Human Rights by contributing to our quarterly fundraiser. Thank you!

Independent: ‘More than half of women are discriminated against at work’

Mike Buchanan · 3 January 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Our thanks to Greg for pointing us to this gem in the Independent:

http://www.independent.co.uk/news/uk/home-news/more-than-half-of-women-are-discriminated-against-at-work-9029535.html

Greg asks:

> What are they whining about? I thought that last year 98.7% of women were discriminated against in the workplace, and 45.2% of them experienced sexual harassment twice daily, after they’d made tea for their male colleagues? Things are clearly picking up for women in the workplace… it’s almost as if they LIKE whining!

The article, by Emily Dugan, might just get our vote for the most stupid newspaper article published this year relating to women in the workplace (and there’s lots of competition). Female journalists have a near-monopoly on reporting on this topic, and most of their articles are so absurd and divorced from reality they’re almost beyond parody. Almost. Let’s analyse the whole piece, which starts:

> Almost a fifth of the women surveyed so far say that their careers have stalled because managers failed to promote them or offer training opportunities.

Let’s put that another way, shall we?

> Over four fifths of the women surveyed so far say that their careers haven’t stalled because managers failed to promote them or offer training opportunities.

Hmm, that’s not quite so bad, is it? But of course it leaves aside the issue of women who haven’t been promoted because either:

> There aren’t positions to be promoted to; or
>
> They’re not well-qualified for promotion (never a problem for Entitlement Princesses)

The article continues:

> The scale of workplace inequality still faced by millions of women has been laid bare by a survey that suggests more than half of female employees have experienced some form of discrimination at work.
>
> The finding comes from the interim results of the most substantial survey ever conducted into the experiences of Britain’s female workforce. Project 28-40, undertaken by Opportunity Now, has already been completed by more than 25,000 women and aims to get to 100,000 before publishing its final results.

Hmm, I wonder what kind of woman would spend her valuable time completing such surveys? That’s right. The whiny kind. We hadn’t heard of ‘Opportunity Now’ before – it’s so difficult to keep up with the multitude of women’s whiny initiatives, and who in their right mind would try to? – but the strapline under the organisation’s logo is ‘Men – Women – Workplace’ which is obviously ironic given what their website says the organisation aims to do:

> Opportunity Now is the campaign on gender diversity from Business in the Community. Opportunity Now > aims to increase women's success at work, because it's not only good for business but good for society too.

Both 'good for business' and 'good for society' are plain wrong but I don't need to explain why to regular visitors to this publication. Let's look at the Leadership team, which has the sort of balance we've come to expect when women run things:

http://opportunitynow.bitc.org.uk/about-opportunity-now/leadership-team

With a deep visceral groan, I note the chair of the Advisory Board is Helena Morrissey, CEO of Newton Investment Management. I do wish she'd spend more time at home with her nine children instead of working 24/7/365 in her bid to destroy the British business sector. She runs The 30% Club which aims to get major companies to increase female representation on their boards, regardless of the evidence showing financial decline will result. A third of FFTSE100 chairmen are members of the club. Why, those damnable patriarchs, keeping women down! The deputy chair of the Advisory Board is also a woman. Of the 16-strong Leadership team, 12 are women, including the Group HR Director of the Guardian Media Group, who looks more cheerful than you might expect of someone working for the Guardian. Back to the article:

> Almost a fifth of the women surveyed so far say that their careers have stalled because managers failed to promote them or offer training opportunities. Just over one in 10 experienced sexual harassment. The insight follows the news that the gender pay gap is widening for the first time in five years, according to data from the Office for National Statistics released earlier this month.

There's no evidence that any gender pay gap widening has anything to do with firms paying women less than men for the same work (which I take to be the inference from this paragraph). Year after year it's explained that the gap is fully accountable by differences in the professions men and women go into, levels of seniority, sizes of organisation, industry sectors, blah, blah, blah. I'm too tired to comment further on that matter. So, did the Independent go to a respected organisation to comment on the interim findings of the Opportunity Now report? No, they went to the Fawcett Society. Hmm, I wonder what those upbeat gals had to say?

> Daisy Sands, policy and campaigns manager at the Fawcett Society, said: "Today's findings present a stark reminder of the raft of deep inequalities that women continue to face in the UK labour market, well into the 21st century. Women continue to dominate in low-paid and undervalued work – two-thirds of those in minimum-wage jobs are women. Conversely, women are sorely lacking at the top tables of power – only 25 per cent of senior managers in the UK are women."

Back to the article:

> Some 81 per cent of women believe having children will affect their career progression…

No shit, Sherlock… sorry, Emily. Would men who took the same time out of the workplace have the same problem? Of course. Moving on:

> … and more than two-thirds say society expects women to put their family before their job.

Hmm, no mention of Dr Catherine Hakim's Preference Theory (2000). Her research showed that while four in seven British men are 'work-centred', just one in seven British women is. Let's move on:

> Susan Himmelweit, an economist for the Women's Budget Group, which analyses how women fare in the workplace, said: "Whenever there are pressures on people, as there are now – such as high unemployment – employers are in a better position to put more pressure on staff. Women with caring responsibilities have more > difficulty with this [pressure]. Very often they've juggled things just to work and it's more difficult for them to respond to changes. If it is a competitive environment then employers will think it's not worth bothering with them."

>
> Professor Himmelweit said she believed the key to improving the gender gap lies in better rights for those who work part-time or flexibly. "What we really need is flexible working that the worker doesn't have to pay for in some form," she said. "The legislation on flexible working needs to become tougher so that those who have to use it are not discriminated against."

Cool. In the interests of gender equality, should men who want to work flexibly not be discriminated against, too? Back to the article.

> The Project 28-40 study found that 48 per cent of women had witnessed bullying or unfair treatment of a female colleague, but just 28 per cent said they had seen male colleagues suffer such abuse.

I'm losing the will to live now. We move onto some comments from a notorious gender feminist:

> The TUC General Secretary Frances O'Grady said: "The battle for equality in the workplace is far from over. The gender pay gap got worse this year for the first time in many years, and spending cuts have hit women hard as many work in the public sector."

Whoa, hold the horses. Two-thirds of public sector workers are women. Should the spending cuts have hit women less hard than men, so the proportion of women in the sector would increase? We can't see any flaws in that argument. The genius continues:

> "What really sets back women at work is becoming a mother. Career breaks, a period working part-time or simply the need to work sensible hours hold women back and limit job opportunities and promotion."

'What really sets back women at work is becoming a mother.' Well, don't become a mother, then.

> Simples.

Alimony Princesses

Robert St. Estephe · 3 January 2014 · Archived copy · Original

1911 was the year Judge Farlin Q. Ball delivered his startling ruling holding that it was permissible for divorced women to file for alimony even decades following their divorce if they learn that their once-spouse has managed to earn enough money to make him an attractive target for the then aged gold-digger. 1911 was a year that produced remarkable cases of profligate alimony princesses, whose insatiable passion for luxury made international news.

The exploits of Ethel Stewart Elliott of New York and a Mrs. Trude of Chicago offer us an illuminating glimpse of the horrors of patriarchal oppression as practiced by courts following laws "made by men for the benefit of men" (as is claimed by feminists) as it was experienced by the "victim gender" early 20th century United States.

[image]

NOTE: In 1911 the average annual income in the United States was $520. Here are a few consumer product prices to put this figure into context: pound of butter was 34 cents, a half gallon of milk was 17 cents, a pound of round steak was 18 cents, a pound of potatoes was 22 cents and a brand new car was $750.

***

FULL TEXT:

• HERE'S THE MILLION DOLLAR ALIMONY GIRL • She Was an Actress, Married a Rich Man, Learned Extravagance, Was Divorced, Got a Million Alimony, But Couldn't Stop Spending Money, So Now She Is "Broke."

NEW YORK, Nov. 21.—The "million dollar alimony girl"— Ethel Stewart Elliott—went into bankruptcy the other day, giving as her main asset unpaid alimony amounting to $28,000.

Eleven years ago as Ethel Stewart, dancing in the extravaganza "Chris and the Wonderful Lamp" she danced her way into the heart of John Love Elliott, millionaire mining man.

For a few years they were happy. Then came the break and – divorce in 1907. Elliott at that time, it is said, settled $1,000,000 on his wife and allowed an extra $28,000 yearly to support her and her daughter.

In the years since then Mrs. Elliott satisfied her craving for fine clothes, for travel and a life of ease. The million dwindled away and now she's "broke."

Here are some of the debts listed in Ethel Stewart Elliott's bankruptcy petition:

[image]For dresses, hats and furs …… $11, 600
Underwear…….……. 672
Shoes …….…….. 16
Music lessons …… 310
Cab hire …….…… 205
Saddle horses …….…….…… 88
Jewellry …….….……..1,391
Toys …….…… 64
Rent …….…… 2,166

Source: ["Here's The Million Dollar Alimony Girl," The Tacoma Times (Wa.), Nov. 21, 1911, p. 1]

NOTE: According to one source, the average wage in the US in 1910 was 22 cents an hour. In 1911 a Pound Sterling was worth about $3 US. Thus, I offer a rough equivalent of the value of £375 1911 as $67,100 US today.

***

FULL TEXT:

“The sum of £375 a year for beauty aids, such as face-powder, is not too much for a woman of moderate means,” This statement (says the New York correspondent of the Daily Telegraph) was made in Chicago by Mrs. Trude, who, in her application for alimony, specifies certain personal requirements. The lady estimates that the following items are “reasonably necessary” for a lady of fairly good position:—

Perfume and toilet water £120
Face powder 90
Manicure bills 40
Hairdressers’ bills 70
All other cosmetics and miscellaneous 55
Total . . . £375

“There are many women in Chicago,” says Mrs. Trude, “whose bills are much higher. Perfume bills often run into hundreds of dollars, and the special kind I buy costs £1 10s an ounce. If I worried every time I receive a £10 perfume bill I should be busy.”

Mrs. Trude says that she practices economy in all her buying. She keeps her silk stocking bill down to £15 a month by buying carefully. She says that her hats don’t cost more than £240 a year. She believes in being well shod, and says that money spent on the best shoes is economy. That item does not exceed £35 yearly. “I never buy clothes or beauty things unless I positively need them. I keep my wants 10 per cent, under my income, regardless of the demands of society.” Every woman should do that. She should save at least that percentage of her income every year, even if she has to go without the best perfumes now and then.”

Source: [“Extravagant American Women.” Hawera & Normandy Star (Hawera, New Zealand), Oct. 14, 1911, p. 10]

AVFM First Annual Occidental College Accuse-a-thon

Paul Elam · 3 January 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Every human being, at least the decent ones, should have a New Year's Resolution that serves women. Around here, ours is to put an end to the virulent pandemic of rape, against women, that has made western college campuses literally gauntlets of sexual danger and violation for women.

The incidence of rape of women has exploded violently, because men, since it was determined that college women have no agency, personal accountability or the basic competence to make sexual decisions after ingesting undetermined amounts of alcohol. Fortunately, men are happy to assume agency-built-for-two in these matters, shouldering the responsibility for women's choices, even when they are just as intoxicated as women.

There remains one glitch in this equation, though. Women are indeed so bereft of agency and self-responsibility that, much like children, they cannot be expected to follow normal channels of crime reporting, e.g. telling police, presenting evidence, etc… We must provide them an opportunity; an instrument to make accusations that is both remarkably facile, and, most importantly, does not burden them with the weight of autonomy or adulthood.

Because rape culture, patriarchy, and misandry don't real.

Occidental College has ingeniously come up with a solution, herein after referred to as "The Tool." Using the cutting edge and highly secure technology of Google Docs, Occidental created a rape reporting form that overcomes many of the common problems encountered by non-adults when faced with the dilemma of wanting to report a crime but not wanting to offer any evidence that said crime actually happened or be inconvenienced with being present for an investigation.

There are three key elements to the form that make the tool so valuable.

1. Complete anonymity. The accuser does not have to be burdened with revealing who they are or standing behind their accusation in any way.
2. No evidence is necessary. That is right, none. Luckily false claims never happen because no one lies about rape. Ever. For realz.
3. The accused, henceforth referred to as "The Rapist," will be called to the carpet by university administration. That is stated on the form itself. All the rapists at Occidental will be put on a list so that the school will know who is running around raping women.

Other benefits of The Tool also serve the school, which has been in trouble with Title IX compliance for allegedly (it must be true) not reporting rapes that happened at the school.

There has been some objections raised to The Tool, all of them by misogynistic, kitten eating reprobates known as MHRAs, that by allowing anyone to accuse anyone else of rape anonymously without evidence, that it will not only cause innocent men (oxymoron?) to be tracked and monitored as sexual predators as a part of their academic life, but that it will also undermine the perceived legitimacy of rape victims who actually come forward and offer evidence of the crimes against them.

Rubbish.

Unfortunately, we cannot kill MHRAs (or more correctly we cannot mandate that they identify as dead in the life-death binary) until there are further revisions in the criminal code. So, in the meantime we will have to settle for reminding society over and over again that all claims of rape should be treated the same as a conviction. If she said she was raped, and even if she didn't as in the case where mutual intoxication leads to "sex," then he is a rapist. We can't prove it in a criminal court, but thanks to university honor courts we don't have to. The word of the rape victim, hereinafter described as "she" will be summarily accepted over the word of The Rapist. Duh.

And at AVFM, we want to help with this noble effort, which is why during the auspicious month of January, 2014, we are sponsoring the first ever Occidental College Accuse-a-thon!

Please do your part to help Occidental satisfy gender ideologues and to comply with the mandates of Title IX, by reporting all rapists using The Tool. Report often and with enthusiastic brio. You can report with the knowledge that you are going to please a lot of people invested in high numbers of rape reports as well as some elements in the federal government who have paperwork that MUST be completed!

There will be prizes for those who do the most work: An AVFM T-shirt for the highest number of reported rapes. Just check the total number of male students and staff at Occidental before you file your report. We don't want those MHRAs accusing you of exaggerating, do we? Win a coffee mug with logo for the most creative rape scenario. Raped in class during at lecture at the feet of your professor? Report it and start sipping that AVFM cup of java! Raped in class BY your professor? Get TWO cups!

Finally, we have the category for most important perpetrator. A sports coach ranks near the top with a free AVFM mouse pad and beer koozie. A dean, any dean, will get you a red pill hoodie. And finally, any alum now sitting in political office gets you a genuine ceramic, somewhat German-looking stein, sharpie autographed by the entire management team of A Voice for Men.

The best part of this contest Is that we are playing by the same rules here that Occidental is playing by when it comes to impacting the lives of their young students. You don't have to prove you made the reports. We know people don't lie about such things. So, if you say you reported, by God you reported!

But seriously, folks, there really is no contest. There are no T-shirts, hoodies, mugs or beer steins to give away for spamming this outrageous form. There is, though, very much a rape form at Occidental College that is one of the most shameless acts of academic and bureaucratic sloppiness, arrogance and callousness I have ever seen.

Occidental has opened the door to the most casual and arbitrary methods of systematically abusing male students. By actually acting on accusations that are levied with no proof, without even the identity of the person making the accusation, this school has crossed a line from which it should be forced to retreat. Either that, or people of good conscious should, by whatever means are necessary, ensure that this form is crippled to the point that it cannot be used to persecute innocent students.

It demands to be sabotaged.

If the satire is lost on you and you require further, more explicit explanation, you will find it here. If you want to see dissent, from even joking about doing this, you can find it at Raw Story, which of course came out today and did its best to misrepresent why MRHAs object to this form.

In all fairness, Raw Story is not one bit less scummy than the Occidental College Administration that is allowing this obscenity to be acted out at their school.

Do what you want with this form. The data they gather from it means nothing except in its ability to harm innocent people and undermine the credibility of all victims of sexual violence. It is an abomination.

https://docs.google.com/spreadsheet/viewform?formkey=dFNGWVhDb25nY25FN2RpX1RYcGgtRHc6MA

Father Exposes His Baby Mama Denying Him His Right To See His Son

AVfM Video Source · 3 January 2014 · Archived copy · Original

The stereotype of the “deadbeat dad” needs to be challenged wherever it’s found, and nowhere is this stereotype more prevalent in America than with black men–who do not deserve it any more than any man does.

The only thing we’d probably argue (mildly) with here is the “lawyer” up advice. There are a lot of garbage lawyers out there who don’t give a damn about you, just your money. The real smart thing is what this father did: be recording.

Always Be Recording.

NCFM questions Congress re: Bogus sexual assault activist research

NCFM · 4 January 2014 · Archived copy · Original

You can read the letter here :131220 Military Justice Act ltr to congress FAXED Or, the text is below:

December 20, 2013

Military Justice Improvement Act S-967 (MJIA):

Is a seriously flawed legislation

Problems with the MJIA, a Request for Reconsideration and Investigation by the DOD

The MJIA's sexual assault provisions were bolstered by the Department of Defense (DOD) survey 2012 Workplace and Gender Relations Survey of Active Duty Members between 2006, 2010, and 2012. Supporters of the MJIA spun survey results to create the appearance of an epidemic of sexual assaults, even though the Study shows no such epidemic exists! Many of the conclusions are patently false, misleading, and reveal a multitude of deficiencies in the conduct, information collection, and reporting or data. It appears the survey was manipulated to provide substance to predetermined ideologically driven outcomes.

1. According to the Study "there were no statistically significant differences in the most serious behaviors for men and women" from 2006 to 2012.
2. Of 108,478 active duty members surveyed, only 22,792 were counted ("deemed eligible"), a poor response rate seriously distorting results.
3. If the 26,000 number was accurate then the 33% reported rate of USC for FY 2012 (see page 25, Volume I) would calculate to 8,580 actual reported cases. Yet there were only 3,374 cases of sexual assault reported among military service members in the same year, which means the 26,000 estimate is grossly inflated, a mathematical impossibility which raises questions about the studies accuracy.
4. Data included behaviors a year before military service.
5. FBI crime statistics show historic lows of violent crimes, including sexual assault.
6. Even though the Study differentiates between "unwanted gender related behaviors" and "unwanted sexual contact", the two terms sound similar and may have been conflated by survey participants even though the study claims that unwanted behaviors were not included. The term and its use is a major pitfall.
7. The term "unwanted sexual contact" by definition may include fewer crimes than the more broadly defined military term for "Sexual assault" which includes … "unwanted and inappropriate sexual contact. The Study has too many similar terms to describe sexual misconduct that could be confused.
8. Because of "confidentiality" reports were not investigated, no details were required, and subject's identities were not requested or maintained by DOD. What is the purpose of recording limited, sketchy information derived from the restricted reports about alleged "sexual assault" crimes, many of which are likely to be baseless accusations? Capturing too much extra information diverts attention away from the central issue? Information gathered cannot be verified and can be freely manipulated.

New provisions of the MJIA will: (1) virtually abolish the presumption of innocence (2) remove the right to face one's accuser in formal judicial proceedings (3) severely limit an accused' ability to raise a defense (4) encourage prosecutions rather than truth finding (5) (6) criminalize anyone who tries to hold false accusers accountable (7) allow false accusers to avoid sanctions, and (8) create a roadmap for lowering moral in the military by primarily targeting, shaming, and blaming men for a nonexistent fabricated epidemic.

Sexual assaults must not to be tolerated, but a racy joke, an invitation to a movie, or an inadvertent touch should not destroy a male's or female's military career. The MJIA is another ideologically driven anti-male legislative affront which will harm females and military families too. NFCM urges a reconsideration of the MJIA sexual assault provisions and that this matter is referred to the DOD, Office of Inspector General for investigation.

Congress just turned the military on it's head with bogus sexual assault provisions.

Sexual assault is wrong, but so is the current definition of sexual assault.

Men's Issues & Music – Kool Moe Dee

Ty Henry · 4 January 2014 · Archived copy · Original

As I related to Dean Esmay in a phone conversation, I had been planning a series like this for a while, inspired by Robert St. Estephe's brief historical misandry dispatches. The recent Nick Ahlverdian piece on Beyonce, specifically his comment in the thread that music is feminist and misandrist, prompted me to stop procrastinating.

While there is no doubt of the feminist infection of movies and TV, music has been one area where broad perspectives have been not just allowed, but actively promoted, even where highly charged or controversial.

Indeed, one genre has long been the vanguard for giving voice to men's issues, some of which we are only now assigning proper names and descriptions. As a long-time fan of rap music from its rise in the 80s, hypergamy, paternity fraud and using the womb as an ATM are not new areas of discourse for me nor for men with similar backgrounds.

Lest we forget, even recently feminist banshees unloaded a cacophony of scorn upon the Academy of Motion Picture Arts and Sciences (all movie industry professionals, not the public), whose members saw fit to award a song called "It's Hard Out There For A Pimp" its 2005 award for Best Song From A Motion Picture. Another example was the surprising appearance by the openly gay Elton John, accompanying Eminem at the 2001 Grammy's for a rendition of "Stan" while he was under fire for allegedly "homophobic" lyrics.(John said that as a Brit, he has an elevated understanding for "gallows humor" and that people did not grasp the split-personality device of "Marshall v. Shady")

The first entry is from Mohandes Dewese, aka Kool Moe Dee, who tackles the complimentary topics of hypergamy and paternity issues in 1989's "They Want Money." Holding a BA from SUNY, Dewese used an eloquent but aggressive style marked by copious internal rhyme with an expansive vocabulary. He was the only "Old School" group artist to achieve solo success. Some sample lyrics include. . .

"You better settle for an autograph/Or a hug and kiss on the cheek, maybe/
But I ain't tryin' to make no baby. . ."

"I made the rhymes/I made the cash
Why get married and you take half…"

Note: Kool Moe Dee to this day has no children and has never been married. Call him the Rap Music MGTOW.

A Guide to Controlling Your Identity

Sage Gerard (Victor Zen) · 5 January 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Your reputation is what other people say about you.

While you, as a mature adult, don't care what strangers think, we do live in an existential nightmare where potential employers and vigilantes can and will look you up and get their first impression of you from other people. For that reason, your identity must be protected in our interconnected world.

Of course this makes participating in politics awkward, because adopting a political label means associating with controversies around that label. For this reason, identifying with a label is a serious decision with real consequences. People will write demonstrably false lies about you, and there is no lie about your character so laughably ridiculous that your political opponents won't spread it.

AVFM's primary audience is young men aged 18–24, but I conjecture that they seem to be the least active demographic if we consider activism away from the computer. Note that I said "conjecture," since I cannot find any data to prove this directly. I can only point to data showing that whippersnappers tend to limit their political activism to actions performed on the Internet using social media (which comes with the obvious benefit of a pseudonym).

As the youngest man on staff at AVFM, I have not been around long enough to establish the social and financial support that will keep my career and my future secure. I infer that the risks involved with my circumstances are probably what keep other young men like me behind their aliases.

The fact of the matter is that men's rights is still a hotbed of controversy that can ruin reputations. But a 30+ year old adult with a stable job and good friends has much less on the table than a young man still trying to get secure footing in the job market. No one wants to hire a rape-advocating, misogynistic chronic masturbator, which is what people will most likely call young men who dare to speak up for themselves.

I want to encourage more men aged 18–24 to come out and stand for their own rights.

You have heard some variation of the following statements in passing:

- If you believe X, you are a Y. (conditional association)
- You are X. (declarative association)

Both of these statements are always uttered by someone trying to speak for others without permission. As I insinuated earlier, labels carry obligations. If someone labels you, they are indirectly assigning you obligations attached to the label. Learn to interpret this as disrespect towards you as a participant in politics.

Obviously, I aggressively forbid anyone to tell me "If you believe in equality, you are a feminist" because I don't want to be anywhere near that fucking label. But to some people's surprise, I also won't even let people label me as a libertarian or as a MRA (note the missing "H"), even though my values are comparable to what the labels currently represent.

Do not let anyone label you without your consent, even if the label seems to describe you at first glance. Only you get to label yourself through your actions and your values.

How shall I kill him? Let me count the ways.

Robert St. Estephe · 6 January 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Robert St. Estephe–Gonzo Historian–is dedicated to uncovering the forgotten past of marginalizing men. "Gonzo journalism" is characterized as tending "to favor style over fact to achieve accuracy." Yet history – especially "social history" – is written by ideologues who distort and bury facts in order to achieve an agenda. "Gonzo" writing is seen as unorthodox and surprising. Yet, in the 21st century subjectivity, distortion and outright lying in non-fiction writing is the norm. Fraud is the new orthodoxy. Consequently, integrity is the new "transgressive."

Welcome to the disruptive world of facts, the world of Gonzo History.

●●●

There was a time in the early twentieth century that equity feminists fought for true equality: the right of a woman to be executed; the right of men to alimony (when justified), the end of predatory alimony (for young, childless women looking for a free ride) and an end to the excessive lenience towards woman as exhibited by male juries in homicide trials, among other items on the equity wish-list. In the United States Judge Rhea M. Whitehead (Seattle, 1921), Judge Florence Allen (Cleveland, 1921), and Chicago lawyer Gladys McHugh (Chicago, 1917), had strong words of condemnation for the gullible male jury members and the teary-eyed murderesses they routinely set free.

Today, we are faced with a proposal, from Canadian law professor Elizabeth Sheehy — a feminist of a much different kind, a dogmatic gender ideologue — to turn the clock backwards and openly return to the ethos of rampant privilege, of old-fashioned chivalry. A Voice for Men editor, John Hembling, had choice words form the professor and her cult-like devotion to irrational dogma of gender ideology. His tirade against the haste-monger and her disgusting ethos of automatic immunity for man-killers of the "better gender," is titled "Professor of Law seeks legalized murder," which went online the day preceding the issuance of Sheehy's philosophical guide for women who kill too much, Defending Battered Women on Trial (University of British Colombia Press). The title should not deceive you, the book proposes leniency not for women who have been subjected to genuine criminal assault, but is extended to any gal with the never to tell a story, verifiable or not, that can evoke that magical and famously vague term: "abuse."

A Voice for Men has published a number of reprints of historical articles which tell the atrocities of chivalry justice, " "Woman and her right to kill" (1922), "Divorce by murder: France 1930," "Why Do Juries Acquit Women – 1922," and in the future we will be publishing many more.

Mr. Hembling aptly observes that should Sheehly's ill-conceived supposed-reforms come to pass in Canada the actual outcome is sure to be "murder-tourism. Should this sound far fetched, it is recommended that you study the career of "battered woman" poster-victim Melissa Friedrich , the "internet black widow," who became a domestic violence superstar while serving time in the early 1990s for one brutal homicide-for-profit committed in Canada. Her talented performance playing herself as "victim" in the documentary film "Why Women Kill" about the "battered woman syndrome" (National Film Board 1994) got her a very special award — a full pardon in 1996. In 2005 Melissa Friedrich was back in prison for fraud related to an attempted murder of her next mark. She was released and deported to Canada in 2009. In 2012, at the age of 77, Melissa found another man to marry in Nova Scotia and, once again got caught in an attempted murder (for profit). Her elderly victim barely survived a poisoning.

What might Canadian murder tourism look like in the nightmare future of a Sheehly-designed nation where any woman has, by virtue of her female sex alone, a license to kill (provided she, or her public defender, is willing to weave the requisite abuse-narrative)? Take a look at the history of *Black Widow serial killer*s in "Exciting Careers in Serial Widowhood" (AVfM), and give yourself a tour through the rather astonishing variety of abuse-narratives, some quite fantastical and bizarre, that were collected in 1911 from the crime reports of 10 husband-killings spanning a period of just a few weeks.

***

[image]

FULL Headline & Sub-headlines:

“Why Are So Many Wives Killing Their Husbands?

Ten Cases, With Such Unusual Features as to Attract National Attention, Within a Few Weeks, Emphasize a Remarkable Condition Which May Be Both a Development of the New Woman Movement of the Baleful Fruit of the Extraordinary Leniency Shown in the Courts of Women Accused of MurderPublic Attitude in Such Cases Shown When St. Louis Coroner’s Juries Weep With Two Fair Defendants and Texas Judge Has to Force Indictment of Another.

ARTICLE FULL TEXT:

~ Wives Recently Accused of Killing Husbands ~

– Following is a summary of the status of cases against wives in the United States recently accused of killing their husbands.

– Matheson, Mrs. Lucy: Shot her husband in the home of a negress. Indictment found with difficulty and jury acquitted her in 10 minutes.

– Stannard, Mrs. Laura: Accused of poisoning her husband with a drug intended to stop him from drinking liquor. Acquitted.

– Mollicone, Mr. Assunta: Held for trial in Denver jail for the murder of her husband.

– Valentine, Mrs. Eleanor: Held for trial in Denver jail for the murder of her husband.

– Patterson, Mrs. Gertrude: Held for trial in Denver jail for the murder of her husband.

– Quinn, Mrs. John M.: Two of her husbands mysteriously murdered in homes. Wife says burglars committed crime. Held in Chicago for investigation.

– Felton, Mrs. Moses: Shot her husband as he lay asleep. Exonerated by Coroner’s jury on her statement man had threatened to kill her before morning.

– James, Mrs. Alma Palmer: Shot her husband as he lay asleep. Defense theory is it was a somnambulistic killing.

– Murray, Mrs. Clara: Shot her husband with cat rifle. Held on daughter’s statements she threatened to kill man if he went to keep engagement with another woman.

– Vermilya, Mrs. Louise: Held on charge of murdering policeman Arthur Bisonette by poison. Suspected of poisoning Richard Smith and two husbands. Pleaded not guilty and is in Chicago jail awaiting trial.

***

FULL TEXT: Not since the dark days in the Middle Ages [Renaissance, actually, 1656] when 366 women are said to have formed a Roman Sisterhood of Death, and most of them poisoned husbands, has the world been shocked by so many deaths caused by women as in the United States in the latter days of the year 1911.

Within a few months writers for the press have been called upon to recount an appalling series of crimes. If the cases that obtain extensive publicity are criteria, they force the conclusion that more husbands are being killed by wives by husbands.

It is cited, merely as a curious coincidence, that this increase in the number of women’s crimes comes at a time when women are more active in public affairs than ever before in history. Doubtless it would be unfair to hint at any connection between the two conditions. The fact they exist simultaneously is given for what it is worth. But it cannot be denied that while some women are showing – rather convincingly, it must be admitted – the right of the sex and political leadership, other women are showing with equal conclusiveness the truth of Poet Kipling's recent dogma, "The female of the species is more deadly than the male."

~ Women in History Often More Ferocious Than the Sterner Sex ~

The long list of recent crimes committed by women or attributed to them bears out a theory held by the criminologists from Lombroso down. And that is that while women are less inclined to acts of violence than men, on account of their physical weakness, when they do become criminals their crimes are characterized by a cruelty and relentlessness not found in male offenders. [Editor's note: In my view, events and crimes, subsequent to 1911, show that men can be as cruel as women: full sex-equality is demonstrated in sociopathy. (St. Estephe)]

When a woman turns to murder she becomes ferocious. The bloodiest murders of the French revolution were not half so cruel as the fierce-eyed, wolfish females that urged them on. [What this sentence identifies is now known as "Proxy violence," a mode particularly favored by women (as well as political leaders), whereby males are used to do the dirty work.] Mme. Defarge, who sat at the guillotine with her knitting and counted the heads as they fell into the basket, was a true characteristic of them.

In the early biblical days Jael lured Sisera, the friend of her house, to sleep, promising to shield him from his enemies, and as he slept she took a nail and drove it through his temples and into the floor below. And from that day until the last husband murder in today's paper such crimes when committed by woman have been unspeakably brutal and inhuman.

The idea of a woman turning murderess is so repugnant to the average man that he scarcely can believe it possible. And the story of society's leniency to women criminals is as old as the mountains of India, as old as the Ganges or the Nile, old as the pyramids with all their secrets. And back of all of it is unwillingness of one man to believe that the women he knows to be infinitely softer, more tender, more abhorrent of violence than he could dabble her delicate hands in human blood. And some singer spoke the truth when he said such things as this:

Cold eyelids, that hide like a jewel

Hard eyes that grow soft for an hour;

The heavy white limbs and the cruel

Red mouth like a venomous flower.

When these are gone by with their glories,

What shall rest of thee then, what remain,

O mystic and somber Dolores,

Our Lady of Pain?

***

[image]

~ Perhaps Leniency Toward Women Murderers Account for It ~

Whether this characteristic leniency of society toward women malefactors is responsible for the Amazing increase of husband murders of late is a matter, of course, of speculation. That criminologists should think so is not to be wondered at.

The Anglo-Saxon people are pretty thoroughly convinced, as a general thing, that capital punishment is a great deterrent of murder. The thing is easy enough to demonstrate, the advocates of the extreme penalty say. Switzerland abolished it and murders increased so rapidly that it was restored as an experiment. Murders immediately decreased in Lumber.

Practically the same thing has been found true in France. For years the guillotine was in disrepute. And while its knife rusted in idleness France gave to the world some of the most appalling murders in the history of crime. The restoration of the death penalty was demanded by popular necessary.

Even in the United States murders have increased in commonwealths that have abolished the gallows. There is a great city on the border line of the two mid-Western states in one of which hanging in the extreme penalty for murder and the other life imprisonment. Newspaper men of that city say they have had to record many more atrocious murders in the latter than in the former.

If this be a true test, as it appears to be, justified by the fact, the criminologists strengthen their theory by applying it to women murderers. In late years but one woman has been put to death by process of law for murder. This woman's crime was committed in a [sic] Eastern state and was most atrocious. She wished to be rid of her husband, with whom she had quarreled. She sent word she wanted to make up and named a trysting place of their sweetheart days.

~ Texas Case May Become an Issue in Political Campaign ~

After they had kissed and made up they spent several house there. The woman playfully picked up a rope and asked her husband to tie her hands. He did so. She then said she bet she could tied his hands so he couldn't get away. Laughingly he let her try. She called a half-breed Indian boy to her aid, when they had secured the man's hands they deliberately murdered him and threw his body into a stream.

Never was a more treacherous-crime committed. But when it was announced the woman was to hang, the Governor of her State was swamped with letters of protest. He withstood the pressure, however, and the sentence of death was executed.

That case was an exception. Everywhere jurors simply refuse to pronounce sentence of death against the women. In the rare cases when they do, popular sympathy compels an executive commutation of sentence. Within the last few weeks, readers of the Post-Dispatch will remember, at least two Coroner's juries have wept in sympathy with women who have killed their husbands.

In the Forty-Eighth District Court of Texas the action of a judge in compelling the indictment of a woman who had killed her husband will be made a political issue. It is not impossible that the Judge will be defeated for re-election on the strength of it. Popular sympathy is with the woman, and, it must be admitted, that if murder is ever to be justified, the woman had a claim upon his sympathy.

Mrs. Lucy Matheson was a child of 11 years when she met Charles Matheson. She became betrothed to him a year later and was married to him at 15. she was very pretty, a typical, well-bred Texas girl of good family connections. She discovered that, 15 years before, Matheson had married a negress in New Mexico, pretending that the woman was an Indian.

The influence of the negress continued after he married her. One day the wife went to the Black woman's home, found her husband there and shot him to death.

~ Everything Done at Trial Is Favorable to Accused Women ~

Judge Blanton, at Fort Worth, called a grand jury together and instructed them to look into the case. The jury reported it had no indictments to return. The Judge sternly reminded them of the Matheson affair and ordered them to do their duty, with a hint at citations for contempt if they failed.

Tardily they returned an indictment. The woman was immediately served with a warrant and 100 Abilene citizens, some of them millionaires, offered to sign her bond. Two leading attorneys volunteered to defend her.

The trial was altogether favorable to her. The jurors were selected from the first 20 men called to the box. None was asked if he opposed capital punishment. The woman told her story. There was a hint that the negroes had shot at her and that she fired to protect her own life. It took the jury about ten minutes to reach a verdict of acquittal.

This, of course, is an extraordinary case. If conditions were reversed and a man stood in the same place, he also would have been acquitted in short order by a Texas jury, for the South still recognizes pretty clearly the right of every man – or woman – to preserve the sanctity of the home.

A jury at Ontonogan, Mich., a few days ago returned a verdict of acquittal for Mrs. Laura Stannard, charged with murdering her husband. The woman is a believer in Spiritualism and is convinced that her husband's spirit was with her throughout the trial.

Stannard died at Greenland, Mich., last March and a post-mortem examination proved that he had died of strychnine poisoning. He was a habitual drinker and his wife was very anxious to break him of this habit. A servant girl testified at the trial that Mrs. Stannard told her she had intended to give her husband a tablet in his coffee to stop his drinking.

~ Three Women in One Jail for Causing Husbands' Death ~

The theory of the defense was that Stannard took the poison as a stimulant alter he had been on a spree, that he took an overdose and that it killed him. The jury seem to hold to this theory also.

Three women are awaiting trial in adjoining cells in a Denver (Colo.) jail for the murder of their husbands. They are Mrs. Assunta Mollicone, an Italian; Mrs. Eleanor G. Valentine and Mrs. Gertude Patterson. In each case the alleged motive is jealousy or cupidity.

Of these three the Patterson case is the most celebrated. Mrs. Patterson was a poor girl of Sandoval, Ill., when she first met Emil Strouss, a Chicago millionaire. Strouss took a fancy to her because she was extremely beautiful, and arranged to educate her, sending her away to Paris. When she had finished her schooling he called for her and they traveled about Europe together.

After the return to America she met Charles A. Patterson, a former collage athlete. He fell in love with her, she went to Los Angeles, Cal., sent for him and he married her. Chance revealed to him her relations with Strouss.

She confessed everything and he promised to forgive and help her live down the past. She charges that, when they became hard up, he sold her to Strouss for a monetary consideration. She charges that she finally refused to hold up her benefactor for more money and that, in a quarrel, Patterson attacked her and she killed him in self-defense. The killing took place in Denver, where the Pattersons were keeping a select boarding house.

~ Her Two Husbands Killed as They Lay Sleeping Beside Her ~

Several days ago John M. Quinn was shot in his house in Chicago and was killed. His wife, who called the police, said that a burglar had committed the crime. When she was questioned by detectives she said that Quinn was her second husband and that her first was a man named McDonald.

Subsequently it was found that she had been married twice before. Her second husband was a man named Warren Thorpe. Investigation revealed that Thorpe also was shot in his sleep when he and his wife were living in Jackson, Mich., and that the woman said a burglar had done the crime. Her two stories of the two crimes were remarkably alike in detail.

A thorough search was made of the Quinn home. Behind a bathtub was found a revolver, one chamber of which had been discharged.

On the morning of Nov. 9 Moses Felton, a farmer of Macon, Mo., was found dead in bed with a bullet hole through his head. His wife notified the neighbors and said she had killed her husband. She told a pitiful story and the Coroner's jurors, in exonerating her, wept when they returned the verdict.

She said she and Felton had quarreled about their daughter the night before and that he had threatened to kill her. He had shown her a revolver, she said, laid it near his bed and told her he was going to kill her in the morning.

He lay down and went to sleep the wife added, leaving her to pass the night awake and in terror. Once he awoke he reminded her that she had but a few more hours live. She waited until he dropped off to slumber again, she said. Then she slipped out of bed, got the revolver and killed him.

~ Two Recent St. Louis Cases of Interest to Criminologists ~

St. Louis has produced two recent cases. Early on the morning of April 28, Mrs. Alma Palmer James shot and killed her husband. Leo James, as he lay asleep in their flat at 4457A Lexington avenue. The affair has never been satisfactorily explained. When asked about the killing the woman had but one answer, which she repeated over and over again in a dull way: “I don’t care.”

At that time the theory was that Mrs. James killed her husband because she had been infected with a serious disease and thought he was responsible. This was disproved later, and the theory of the defense today is that it was a somnambulistic crime, that she intended to kill herself, sat down by her husband to think it over and fell asleep. The report of a pistol awoke her and she found that, while she slept, she had shot her husband instead of herself.

A St. Louis Coroner’s jury wept when it held Mrs. Clara Murray for the death of her husband, who was shot while in his home, with a Christmas gift cat rifle [nickname for a .22 caliber rifle]. The woman’s daughter, 9 years old, was the principal witness. She said her mother learned her father had made an engagement with another woman, that her mother told him if he went out she would shoot him, that he went out and the mother did shoot him.

A doctor who was passing the house told the jury that when he reached the place soon after Murray fell, his wife had her arms about him and was kissing him, saying, “Darling, wasn’t it all in fun?”

“No, the dying man said, “you shot me deliberately.”

Neighbors testified Mrs. Murray had been drinking whisky on the afternoon of the killing.

~ Recent Cases Show Difficulty of Convicting Accused Women ~

The difficulty in getting convictions when women are defendants was shown in the recent trial of Mrs. Zoe Runge McRee at Oplousas, La. Mrs. McRee, a married woman, shot and killed Allen Garland, a young neighbor, who was calling at her home. Her story was calling at her home. Her story of it was that Garland made improper proposals to her and that she shot in defense of her honor.

The prosecution contended that she and Garland had been friendly for a long time. It offered evidence tending to show that Garland was shot from behind as he sat in a chair. The trial resulted in a hung jury.

Taking these cases in connection with the recent accusations against Nurse Vermilya in Chicago, accused of using poison for half a dozen murders, more or less, and of another nurse, in New Orleans [Annie Crawford], accused of poisoning members of her own family, the criminal activities charged to women within the last few weeks present an amazing and startling ensemble.

[“Why Are So Many Wives Killing Their Husbands? — Ten Cases, With Such Unusual Features as to Attract National Attention, Within a Few Weeks, Emphasize a Remarkable Condition Which May Be Both a Development of the New Woman Movement of the Baleful Fruit of the Extraordinary Leniency Shown in the Courts of Women Accused of Murder. – Public Attitude in Such Cases Shown When St. Louis Coroner’s Juries Weep With Two Fair Defendants and Texas Judge Has to Force Indictment of Another. ” St. Louis Dispatch (Mo.), Nov. 19, 1911, part 2, p. 1]

***

[image]

Tough new domestic violence laws proposed for Britain

Mike Buchanan · 6 January 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Our thanks to Greg for pointing us to this piece in the Guardian:

http://www.theguardian.com/society/2013/dec/28/domestic-violence-new-law-jail-term

We could find only the following gender-specific statements in the fairly lengthy piece (726 words). Feminist fingerprints are all over both the article and the proposed new bill:

> Supporters of the new bill say it would encourage more women to report a crime which is often neglected by the criminal justice system…
>
> Supporters say this would encourage more women to report a crime…
>
> Now the proposed law would provide a legal framework that would make domestic abuse a specific offence and would allow for the examination of an offender's course of conduct over a period of time. Supporters say this would encourage more women to report a crime that is often neglected by the criminal justice system, sometimes with tragic consequences…
>
> According to the Home Office, some 1.2 million women in the UK said they had experienced domestic abuse last year. Two out of three incidents involved repeat victims. Two women are killed by a partner, ex-partner or lover each week. Last year 400,000 women were sexually assaulted, of whom 70,000 were victims of rape or attempted rape.

Home Office statistics cover both female and male victims of domestic abuse, of course, so why is there only female victim data in this article? Because feminists. Because Guardian pro-feminist anti-male bias. Even by the standards we're become accustomed to with respect to reporting of gender matters in the Guardian, this marks a new low in ideologically-driven reporting.

Infinitely more important than the feminist-inspired gender bias of the article, the proposed legislation will inevitably result in huge numbers of miscarriages of injustice against men. A few observations on the legislation, and predictions on how the police and the courts system will respond to it:

1. A new area for false allegations is created. This will be a charter for malicious women (who haven't been abused) to make false domestic abuse allegations – in effect, to abuse their partners, possibly not for the first time. In the vast majority of cases, who but the two people involved will know the truth? Which will the police and the courts believe?
2. Most domestic abuse is reciprocal, but most people reporting the abuse will be women, as currently. Being the first partner to report the abuse, the woman will be more likely to be believed by the police, quite aside from the default presumption (never admitted publicly, of course) of the police that women are more likely than men to tell the truth.
3. 70% of the victims of uni-directional domestic abuse (the victims 'take it' or exit the situation) are men. But we know from British Crime Survey statistics that men are far less likely than women to report abuse, often because they know that if they did so, their relationships would end, and it's likely they'll never see their children again. If after a prolonged series of attacks over time an exasperated man finally lost control and struck his partner, whose account of events would the police believe? The woman's, inevitably. The police would point out that the man hadn't reported being a victim of abuse to them previously, so his version of events couldn't be trusted.
4. The maximum prison term of 14 years is grotesquely high. A woman who kills her partner in cold blood – e.g. by plunging a kitchen knife into his chest while he slept – need only claim she'd 'feared' him, by way of mitigation. She need produce no evidence that she had any grounds to fear him. The charge will then automatically be downgraded from murder to manslaughter, and she'll probably serve under five years with good behaviour. A man, by contrast, under the proposed domestic abuse legislation, could serve 14 years for domestic abuse. It's utterly inconceivable that even in the most grotesque cases any woman would serve 14 years.

5. As with other offences, men will be far more likely than women to be charged, regardless of the weight of evidence. They'll be more likely to be convicted. They'll be more likely to be incarcerated, and if they are, they'll serve much longer sentences.

This is nothing less than a major intensification of the state-sponsored and state-enforced war against British men. The balance of power in intimate relationships between men and women already favours women strongly. It's about to tilt women's way yet further. Vast numbers of British women are going to exercise that additional power, and ruthlessly. Not only marriage (and the nuclear family with it) are dying. This legislation will in time prove to be a death sentence for unmarried couples' relationships.

> The state, and gender feminists, will be happy with nothing less.

How do civilizations commit suicide? By elevating women at the expense of men. It doesn't have to be this way.

Janet Bloomfield (aka JudgyBitch) · 6 January 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Oh dear. Camille Paglia is back in the news, pointing out some icky truths that make feminists stamp their feet and pout, as icky truths tend to do.

In a three hour interview, Paglia points out just what we're getting wrong, culturally.

The diminished status of the military means that the cultural elite has no military experience – no explicit training in analysis, strategy, defense, offence, subterfuge – any of the tactics that permit an understanding of how to face down evil and triumph.

This leads to the idea that everyone is basically nice and if we're nice, they'll be nice right back. North Korea: just be nice and everything will be okie-dokie. How's that working out, Jang Song Thaek?

> "These people don't think in military ways, so there's this illusion out there that people are basically nice, people are basically kind, if we're just nice and benevolent to everyone they'll be nice too. They literally don't have any sense of evil or criminality."

Women in particular are oblivious to the dangers of the world, and insist that they have every right to put themselves in vulnerable situations and when bad things happen, they cannot and must not be held responsible for that:

> "I believe that every person, male and female, needs to be in a protective mode at all times of alertness to potential danger. The world is full of potential attacks, potential disasters." She calls it "street-smart feminism."

Men are neutered, essentially from birth, and taught that their energy and desire to interact physically with the world is a mental disorder that requires medication. "Sit quietly and color, boys, and please don't build projectiles with your crayons".

> "Primary-school education is a crock, basically. It's oppressive to anyone with physical energy, especially guys," she says, pointing to the most obvious example: the way many schools have cut recess. "They're making a toxic environment for boys. Primary education does everything in its power to turn boys into neuters."

Primary school teachers, who tend to have backgrounds in the Barista of Arts academic tradition (degrees in reading, dancing, feeling, etc.) dislike teaching hard facts and quantitative skills (math is hard, Barbie!), and instead focus on "female values" such as sensitivity, cooperation and socialization. And it doesn't get better in higher education, either.

> "This PC gender politics thing—the way gender is being taught in the universities—in a very anti-male way, it's all about neutralization of maleness." The result: Upper-middle-class men who are "intimidated" and "can't say anything. . . . They understand the agenda." In other words: They avoid goring certain sacred cows by "never telling the truth to women" about sex, and by keeping "raunchy" thoughts and sexual fantasies to themselves and their laptops.

The loss of the manufacturing base has stripped men of role models, leaving only the sports arena where traditional masculine virtues are openly celebrated. Being faster, stronger, smarter and more relentless than the opposition is a undeniable good. Of course, there are plenty of arenas (tech development, finance, high level corporate management) where men are as competitive and ruthless as ever, but the difference is that we only celebrate the sports heroes. Corporate heroes make the ladies feel a bit queasy, and they only like the soft, gentle ones. Bill Gates and his geeky ways are okay. Mark Pincus, not so much.

> Pincus obsessively tracks analytics for all staff, sets harsh deadlines, and aggressively pushes his employees to meet them.

And how is that working out for Pincus?

> The data pipeline allows Zynga to fine-tune its games to optimize engagement, helping the company attract some 270 million unique users each month, many through Facebook. The four-year-old Zynga, which has emerged as the Web's largest social game company, recorded $828.9 million in revenue in the first nine months of 2011, more than double the period a year earlier. It is also the rare Internet start-up that is profitable, earning $121 million since the start of 2010.

Oh well then. Let's strangle that puppy on the doorstep. What could go wrong?

Paglia notes that it's not just men and boys who suffer when the demonization of men and masculinity becomes culturally de rigeur. She throws a bone out to the rich, white ladies, too, because we all know that no one has cornered the market on suffering quite like rich, white ladies.

> Women, particularly elite upper-middle-class women, have become "clones" condemned to "Pilates for the next 30 years," Ms. Paglia says. "Our culture doesn't allow women to know how to be womanly," adding that online pornography is increasingly the only place where men and women in our sexless culture tap into "primal energy" in a way they can't in real life.

A lifetime of low-fat yogurt, Pilates and porn. Gosh, the tears are welling up here. It's so heart-rending. Poor, poor elite white ladies. That's just terrible.

Whatever can we do?

Paglia has a few ideas:

> A key part of the remedy, she believes, is a "revalorization" of traditional male trades—the ones that allow women's studies professors to drive to work (roads), take the elevator to their office (construction), read in the library (electricity), and go to gender-neutral restrooms (plumbing).

Indeed. We've argued that exhaustively. Let's stop proclaiming men obsolete and start recognizing that our entire economy and civilization depends on men continuing to believe that their role is to provide and protect, even in the face of a culture that actively denies them basic human rights, such as reproductive freedom, equal treatment under the law and the right to genital integrity. The ingratitude of feminists is staggering, and Paglia is not shy about pointing it out, either, although she does frame it in terms of women only. Well, Paglia does call herself a "feminist", so that doesn't really come as a surprise.

> In her view, these ideological excesses bear much of the blame for the current cultural decline. She calls out activists like Gloria Steinem, Naomi Wolf and Susan Faludi for pushing a version of feminism that says gender is nothing more than a social construct, and groups like the National Organization for Women for making abortion the singular women's issue.
>
> By denying the role of nature in women's lives, she argues, leading feminists created a "denatured, antiseptic" movement that "protected their bourgeois lifestyle" and falsely promised that women could "have it all." And by impugning women who chose to forgo careers to stay at home with children, feminists turned off many who > might have happily joined their ranks.

Well, this stay at home mother would never have joined their ranks in a million years, largely owing to the fact that feminism outright lies to women and actively attempts to deny women what they most desire: a life with children and family. A movement that has at its heart the destruction of women's most deeply held desires does not come across as "pro-woman" to me.

> "I want every 14-year-old girl . . . to be told: You better start thinking what do you want in life. If you just want a career and no children you don't have much to worry about. If, however, you are thinking you'd like to have children some day you should start thinking about when do you want to have them. Early or late? To have them early means you are going to make a career sacrifice, but you're going to have more energy and less risks. Both the pros and the cons should be presented."

Paglia's prescription for how to "fix" feminism includes expanding membership to stay at home moms and focusing on true injustices by tackling matters like rape in India and honor killings in the Muslim world.

That's nice. But it won't "fix" feminism. Feminism, which continues to trumpet that gender is a mere social construct and that the lack of female engineers and computer programmers is due to the fact that boys are mean, cannot be fixed.

Paglia is absolutely correct that in neutering the masculine, we are destroying our civilization. But the solution is not more or better feminism. We can take all the things we have learned from this disastrous cultural experiment and apply them to create a world of true diversity and equality.

The first step is to recognize that women have been elevated at the expense of men, a situation that was observed a long time ago.

Bringing the cultural conversation back to equality is the first step, and where we are right now. We cannot effect any change until the need for change is acknowledged. And then what?

Here are three strategies that could be put in place to dramatically reverse the decline we are all facing together:

1. Full reproductive rights for men

When men have full reproductive rights, and cannot be forced into fatherhood (as women cannot be forced into motherhood) a few dramatic changes will take place. The era of the babymama will essentially evaporate overnight. When men are given the same rights as women to choose fatherhood, all the incentives to trap men and extract maximum resources without consequence will be eliminated. The only men who will have child support orders enforced against them will be those men who have legally agreed, in writing, to father children with a particular woman.

We used to call that "marriage". We still can, but I see no reason why any sort of legal agreement to parenthood should not be enforceable. And marriage itself is not a sufficient condition in which to enforce parenthood. Couples who intend to be childless need to specify that legally. Every child must be wanted by both parents. Every individual reserves the right to parent alone, but when that gargantuan task becomes even more difficult, we will see the rates of single motherhood collapse.

Men are grossly exploited by child support laws, and ending that is a matter of keystrokes. Change the legislation and give men and women equal reproductive rights.

2. Separate school streams

Schools should fall into two categories: those that emphasize qualitative skills with only a slight focus on quantitative, and those geared towards developing quantitative skills, with a correspondingly lesser focus on the qualitative.

In reality, boys will skew quant, and girls will skew qual, but there is no need to force anyone into any particular pathway. Boys who wish to study art and poetry and psychology will be permitted to do so and we will vigorously protect them from having their masculinity questioned or derided. Girls who wish to study robotics and calculus will be permitted to do so and we will vigorously protect them from having their femininity questioned or derided.

Creating a stream of schools, from primary onwards, focused on developing analytical, mathematical, hard skills will bring men back into the teaching profession in droves, because they tend to be the ones who have those skills. At the secondary stage, the schools can split further into skilled trades and advanced analytics, both quant and qual. Quant schools would feed programs in masonry, plumbing, carpentry on the skilled trades side, and STEM on the advanced analytics side. Qual schools would stream into hairdressing, childcare worker, food preparation on the skilled trades side and all the liberal arts on the advanced analytics.

People should be free to change streams according to their own desires and talents.

This is not a physically hard system to imagine. Germany runs an educational system that already does most of this in practice.

The opposition is entirely political and comes mostly from feminists, who cannot stand that the skills gap between men and women will be stark indeed when polytechs and vocational schools stand alongside liberal arts schools in the same numbers. And to be clear, this is not an argument that women are incapable of developing quantitative schools. Perhaps they are, or perhaps it is merely a complete lack of interest: either way the outcome is the same. It's mostly men who pursue quantitative occupations and skills.

3. Financial incentives to encourage parents to care for their own children

The practice of allowing families to deduct child care expenses as a tax credit needs to end immediately.

The correct incentive is to allow families to income split as long as one parent is at home fulltime with children. A single earner paying income tax on $50,000 will pay more tax than two individuals earning $25,000. Same income, lower tax burden. Effectively, one parent should be able to pay the other parent for their services. This not only incentivizes families to care for their own children, it offers a prestige and acknowledgement of the value of childrearing, something that is sorely missing in our culture.

Whether mommy or daddy stays home does not matter. The legal right to pay your partner for the work they do at home should be enshrined in law. Canada is slowly moving to make that a reality, but not fast enough.

Again, it is a simple matter of keystrokes to make this law. The short term loss in revenue will be made up for by having a nation of citizens who understand what responsibility and obligation actually means, by seeing that a lived reality in their own lives, and who are growing up without the negative effects in social development that arise when children are parceled out to daycare institutions.

It's really not that hard to reverse our decline. The first two strategies require a close focus on the rights of boys and men in particular, while subtracting nothing from women. Give men the same right to choose parenthood that women already have, and provide boys with schools that match their strengths, whatever those might be, while not excluding girls in any way.

If we can get those first two right, the third one will become a saner, more reasonable choice for men. It will restore reciprocity and interdependence to marriage, replacing the competitiveness and selfishness (mostly on the part of women) that currently reigns.

Paglia is right to highlight that we are in condition critical culturally, but her suggestion that a more inclusive feminism will light the way to salvation is ludicrous at best.

Focusing on the rights of boys and men is the way out of this mess. The good news is that this is not a zero sum game: enshrining the rights of men does not mean women will lose some of their rights.

The bad news is that women will have to surrender some unfair advantages.

- They will no longer control men's incomes by controlling reproductive choices.
- They will no longer exclude men from appropriate training and education by eliminating male interests or attributes.
- They will no longer control poor men and women by exploiting them for cheap domestic labor.

And they will gain some important advantages, too.

- If women stay home to care for their own children, which were born in legal agreement with the father, they will be rewarded with an income, as agreed to by both parents.
- If they choose to work, they can legally pay their partners to care for their children

It's win-win.

And begins here. A Voice for Men.

We're not just an advocacy group. We're a suicide prevention group.

And we intend to save our whole world.

> Let us go forth with fear and courage and rage to save the world.
>
> Grace Paley

And so we shall.

Lots of love,

JB

Women complaining about lack of available slavemasters

Anja Eriud · 7 January 2014 · Archived copy · Original

One of the favourite myths of feminism is that ALL women were oppressed everywhere by ALL men – and that the mechanism by which men oppressed women was marriage.

Ah yes, in secret patriarchy meetings all over the known world, scheming men got together to lay their nefarious plans to trap and enslave these innocent and delicate flowers of womanhood into the bonds, the cruel and tortuous chains of matrimony.

But, of course a few brave souls resisted, they struggled against this demonic plot to entrap and enslave them, then of course they wrote books about their "struggle."

According to received "wisdom," and in the context of anything that emanates from the mouths or pens of feminists one does use the word "wisdom" with a large dose of irony, this nefarious plot has been going on for centuries, nay millennia.

For the purposes of this essay we shall confine ourselves to a quick but focused examination of some specific periods. Because after all, if feminists are correct, then like blindly putting a pin in a map with your eyes closed, wherever we landed in the timeline of human history we would reveal examples of this ongoing and nefarious patriarchal plot to enslave poor helpless damsels in the chains of matrimony. Makes sense, doesn't it?

Let us begin with a gem of historical research that can be found at Gynocentrism and its Cultural Origins, and a campaign to impose a Bachelor Tax on those patriarchal sods who… well, were refusing to do their patriarchal duty and enslave some poor maiden into the chains of matrimony.

One Mrs. Charlotte Smith in 1896 was so riled up and so aghast at the numbers of men who were refusing to get married that she started a campaign to force men to marry, and called upon public servants and officials to "do something" about this calumny against women.

> "Mr's Smith's malignment of bachelors began with attacks on public servants and officials, saying that bachelors have always been failures, and that bachelor politicians, especially, were "narrow minded, selfish, egotistical, and cowardly." She further claimed that, "It's about time to organize antibachelor clubs in this state. It should be the purpose of every young woman to look up the record of each and every man who is looking for votes and, should his moral character be such would make him unfit for office, then his shortcoming should be the point of attack by the antibachelor women of Massachusetts.
>
> There are 47,000 girls between the ages of 20 and 29 years in this state who cannot find husbands… [and] the bachelor politicians, they do not dare discuss the social evil question."[3] She states:
>
> "No man can be a good, honorable and upright citizen who has not entered into the holy bonds of wedlock" [Charlotte Smith][4]"

Now wait just a minute – that can't be right – men are roaming the land in hordes, gathering together in secret patriarchy meetings, laying plans on how best to trap and enslave these fair maidens into marriage! Feminists have said so.

In her paper entitled, Sisterhood and Slavery: Transatlantic Antislavery and Women's Rights, Karen Offen, Institute for Research on Women & Gender, Stanford University, takes a jaunt through history to justify the use of the word or analogy "slavery" as comparable to the status of women, especially married women from circa the 1650's to 1848:

> "In this paper, I extend the timeframe back some two hundred years from 1848 to the 1650s, providing evidence of the slavery-marriage analogy in published literary and political works by women and men (who > deploy it in support of what can only be termed, retrospectively, a feminist politics). I will raise questions about exactly how we might interpret the feminist use of the slavery analogy as well as about how scholars and theorists have heretofore approached the separate subjects of women's rights and slavery. "

Which is indeed what she does. Now it must be said that Ms. Offen's grasp of "history" is somewhat shaky, and she does take the long way around, via the usual suspects of "revisionist" and selective feminist history. Olympe De Gouges, John Stuart Mills, Elizabeth Cady Stanton, etc., with some rather unusual choices – Napoleon and Jean Jacques Rousseau – thrown in at odd moments. But basically what this paper seeks to do is what all feminists seek to do: correlate the status of women historically with the status of slaves – black slaves in particular. Ergo, she concludes with:

> "The power of the slavery analogy, for feminists, was its insistence that women, and particularly women who married, were individuals in their own right, that they possessed "human rights" and free will and could not be legally disposed of like chattel or forced, even for family reasons, to do things against their will. The slavery analogy applied to marriage struck at the heart of institutionalized male domination in the family, and it continued to haunt the Western consciousness and to inspire subsequent generations of feminist action, both by women and by men well into the twentieth century, when in most countries the legal institution of marriage was totally (however reluctantly) restructured. It continues to characterize campaigns against sexual slavery into the twenty-first century."

This is very odd, because you see men were presumably having secret patriarchy meetings, but not about what feminists seem to believe. You patriarchs have hoodwinked millions of "womens studies" graduates to believe you wanted to enslave them. But nope, men were having meetings about fighting for the right NOT to be coerced into marriage by harridans like Charlotte Smith demanding that unmarried men be punished for NOT getting married.

In case you haven't noticed, Ms. Offen's paper covers the period from the 1650s to 1848, a period during which women campaigned to have bachelors punished for refusing marriage. It is also a time in which we read of women having the legal liberty to choose for a husband any man who took her fancy, and if that man refused to marry her he was heavily fined according to the value of his possessions.

Yet, less than 50 years later, in the late 1800s, Mrs. Charlotte Smith was getting her corsets in a kerfuffle over men not marrying, and how there are "47,000 girls between the ages of 20 and 29 years in this state who cannot find husbands" (the state she is referring to is Massachusetts). Somehow, I suspect that Mrs. Smith was probably not the only busybody, in the only state in 1896 America, squawking about all those lonely and bereft "ladies" pining away for slavery – ermmmmm – marriage.

Let's fast-forward a bit in history and the period just after the first World War – the Great War it is called – though how one can call a war that claimed the lives of an estimated 10 million men great?

What was one of the major issues that exercised the minds of the public after this "War to end all wars"?

> "Condemned to be virgins: The two million women robbed by the war:
>
> They dreamt of love, marriage and children. But, as a new book reveals, the Great War robbed two million women of the men they would have married, leading many into relationships which could only be whispered about…"

The book referred to here is Singled Out: How Two Million Women Survived Without Men After The First World War by Virginia Nicholson (Viking, £20).

You will note of course that the emphasis is on the struggle of women to survive without men after the war, rather on the estimated 10 million MEN who didn't actually SURVIVE the war.

> "World War I was an extremely bloody war that engulfed Europe from 1914 to 1919, with huge losses of life and little ground lost or won. Fought mostly by soldiers in trenches, World War I saw an estimated 10 million military deaths and another 20 million wounded. While many hoped that World War I would be "the war to end all wars," in actuality, the concluding peace treaty set the stage for World War II."

In fact the article cites some piteous and heartbreaking examples of the "struggles" of these sad and lonely maidens and what they are prepared to do in order to enslave themselves:

> "Many placed advertisements in the Press in their hope of finding any man – like the following heartfelt plea published during the war: "Lady, fiancè killed, will gladly marry officer totally blinded or otherwise incapacitated by the War."
>
> By 1921 publications like the Matrimonial Times were carrying columns of advertisements placed by spinsters and widows.
>
> They included:
>
> MATRIMONY – Spinster, 38, loving disposition, fond of children, entertaining and country life, is anxious to correspond with a wounded officer of cultured tastes, with view to a matrimonial alliance; one with some means.
>
> LADY, aged 49, spinster, cultured, bright temperament, small capital… would like to meet officer or civilian age 45-60… could be very happy with disabled officer needing a cheerful companion and pal."

Couple of things to note here: while there were an estimated 10 million men killed in WWI, there were a further 20 million men injured. Need I say that those 20 million injured men did not have the benefit of the kinds of medical technological marvels available to us today? So, being "injured" carried an extra dimension of horror and anguish for these men.

Now take a closer look at the extracts from the letters cited in the article, "…will gladly marry officer totally blinded or otherwise incapacitated by the War" – "….anxious to correspond with a wounded officer of cultured tastes, with view to a matrimonial alliance; one with some means" – "…..could be very happy with disabled officer needing a cheerful companion and pal."

Even when women were prepared to "settle" in a desperate attempt to "get married" there were conditions. The ladies preferred their men –injured or not, disabled or not, to be of a certain status, to be the "right class." To be "Officers." Hypergamy anyone? Gynocentrism?

This was such a burning issue that the government stepped in, to ease and attempt to resolve the plight of these "surplus women"

> "In 1919, the Society for the Oversea Settlement of British Women was established and was provided with an annual grant. The Society's panels included ones for areas – Africa, Canada, Australia and New Zealand – and for work – for nursing, for training and for agriculture. All of this effort was in spite of the evidence collected by the Dominions Royal Commission of 1912-1917 which found that the casualties of men from the dominions during the war meant that marriage prospects in the Empire had also declined. Additionally, men were emigrating as well as women, perpetuating the imbalance in Britain. So in 1920, 125,000 women emigrated but 115,000 men also did. Between 1923 and 1927, fewer women than men emigrated as a result of the Empire Settlement Act (1922), through which the government provided financial assistance to emigrants."

As you can see, it kind of backfired – but – hurrah for the attempt, to provide a means to give women what they wanted – "enslavement" in marriage.

So, here we are in the 21st century and has anything changed?

Well yes, and no – according to feminists men are still patriarchal bastards roaming the land trying to trap innocent virgins into the chains of matrimony – except:

> "Among pre-adults, women are the first sex. They graduate from college in greater numbers (among Americans ages 25 to 34, 34% of women now have a bachelor's degree but just 27% of men), and they have higher GPAs. As most professors tell it, they also have more confidence and drive. These strengths carry women through their 20s, when they are more likely than men to be in grad school and making strides in the workplace. In a number of cities, they are even out-earning their brothers and boyfriends.
>
> Still, for these women, one key question won't go away: Where have the good men gone?"

Perhaps the attitude toward men in the following might give all those lonely and pining fair maidens, yearning to get shackled up, an insight as to where all the good men have scarpered to?

> "Single men have never been civilization's most responsible actors; they continue to be more troubled and less successful than men who deliberately choose to become husbands and fathers. So we can be disgusted if some of them continue to live in rooms decorated with "Star Wars" posters and crushed beer cans and to treat women like disposable estrogen toys, but we shouldn't be surprised."

Because after all, as the redoubtable Mrs Charlotte Smith also claimed so vehemently all those years ago:

> "No man can be a good, honorable and upright citizen who has not entered into the holy bonds of wedlock"

Like Ludwig Von Beethoven, Nikola Tesla, Henry David Thoreau, Isaac Newton? Those kinds of dishonorable and presumably irresponsible men who wasted their lives away without the "civilising" influence of women!

Hanna Rosin says we are witnessing the end of men! Oh yeah? How about we look at the facts?

Janet Bloomfield (aka JudgyBitch) · 7 January 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Let's get Hanna's motivations clear right from the get-go, shall we? Hanna Rosin is not interested in equality. She is interested in dominance. Female dominance. Nothing more, and nothing less. From the author's own website:

> I come from a long line of matriarchs, women who either ruled over their husbands, or ran away from them. My mother is an intimidating figure. She has always served as the neighborhood watchdog, taking on bullies and running the co-op board with an iron fist. If you met her, it would be obvious why I was open to possibility of female dominance, because she embodied it long before it became the defining trend of our era.

Hanna acknowledges that female dominance is a central part of her understanding of how the world works, and that female dominance has become the defining trend of our era. Well, kudos to Hanna for at least being honest.

Hanna has been on a crusade to prove female dominance for some time now. In her original article, published at the Atlantic, she mused that "[f]or years, women's progress has been cast as a struggle for equality. But what if equality isn't the end point? What if modern, postindustrial society is simply better suited to women?".

What if female dominance is inevitable?

Her recent article at Time Magazine lays out five reasons men are slated to be the oppressed sex – five ways in which men are complete and utter failures:

> Men are failing in the workplace
>
> The traditional household is vanishing
>
> Men are increasingly subjected to violence from female partners
>
> Working and middle-class fathers have become non-existent
>
> Men have become feminized

Let's take these one by one:

Men are failing in the workplace?

And what workplace would that be? The one that keeps our infrastructure up and running?

Statistically speaking, 100% of power plant operators, distributors and dispatchers are men.

- 91% of the nation's electrical engineers are men.
- 97.6% of electrical power line installers and maintenance workers are men.
- 95.5% of water and liquid waste treatment plant and system operators are men.
- 95.9% of aircraft pilots and flight engineers are men.
- 98.4% of aircraft mechanics and service technicians are men.
- 91.9% of computer network architects, who design and implement all our computer based communications systems are men.
- 94.2% of radio and telecommunications equipment installers and repair technicians are men.
- 93.4% of garbage collectors are men.

- 78.2% of all workers in production, transportation and material moving occupations are men
- 82.4% of all industrial production managers are men
- 97.5% of all extraction workers, providing the raw materials to run our economy are men

Transportation, energy, communications, water treatment, resource extraction and waste management. Those are the things that provide us with a little something called civilization as we know it, and they are overwhelmingly provided by men.

While it is true that the manufacturing sector has taken a hit in recent years, the United States remains the world's largest manufacturer, with a 2009 industrial output of $2.33 trillion. Its manufacturing output is greater than Germany, France, India and Brazil combined.

- 70% of that total workforce is male.
- Primary metals manufacturing? 85.6% men.
- Apparel manufacturing? 68.3% women.
- So ladies in manufacturing are basically just sewing clothes?
- How shocking! How surprising! How very housewifely!
- What are the ladies doing in the workforce anyways? Most common job categories for women in 2010?
- Secretaries (96.8% women)
- Nurses (92% women)
- Primary and elementary school teachers (81.9% women)
- Cashiers (74.4% women)
- Nursing aides (88.5% women)
- Retail sales (51.9% women)
- Retail sales managers (44.1% women)
- Waitresses (71.6% women)
- Maids (89.9% women)

Oh ladies. Thunderous applause. Doing all the same work in the paid market that you used to do at home. Progress!

Well, maybe the future will be different!

The top ten industries by annual average employment growth between 2nd Quarter 2009 and 2nd Quarter 2013:

- Information Services
- Support Activities for Mining
- Educational Support Services
- Technical and Trades Schools
- Oil and Gas Extraction
- Computer Systems Design
- Management and Technical Consulting Services
- Other Schools and Instruction
- Ambulatory Healthcare Services
- Employment Services

Educational support services? Maybe. Ambulatory healthcare and employment services? Okay. Sure. Women will dominate! But IT? Computer systems design? Mining support? Oil and gas extraction?

Ahahahahahahahahahaha!

Yeah. Right.

Hanna Rosin, you are full of shit. Women aren't excelling in the workplace. They are doing all the same housewifely jobs they've always done.

The traditional household is failing?

Gee, I wonder why? Women are out in the workforce doing their housewife gig, neglecting their children and partners and are deeply, deeply unhappy as a result.

They file most divorce proceedings, have more mental health problems and express greater dissatisfaction with their lives.

But let's blame men for that, shall we, Hanna? What women need is to be more dominant. To rule with an iron fist. Oh, except that women in traditional marriages are much happier.

Men are increasingly subject to violence from female partners?

It's just sickening that Hanna sees this as a good thing. There is no question that it's true, but how on earth can it ever be a net positive? Hanna links violence to women's sexual confidence, which is deeply disturbing in and of itself.

> Women are becoming more sexually confident, and something Camille Paglia has been waiting for, more aggressive and violent in both good ways and bad.

What Hanna is not taking into account is that women get away with hitting partners because the men are taking it. For now. How long does she expect that state of affairs to last?

Suzanne Venker puts it nicely:

> It is a dangerous thing to create a society of angry men. Feminists have no idea what a can of worms they've created — and what it's about to do to our nation.

Working and middle class fathers are becoming non-existent?

Again, it's just sickening that Hanna thinks millions of children being raised without fathers is proof that women are dominant and men are obsolete. Children raised by single mothers do poorly on every imaginable scale. They have more emotional problems, experience more stress, are more likely to grow up poor, they have lower educational achievements and experience way more behavioral problems than children who grow up with married parents. Depression, suicide, drug abuse, jail and psychiatric medications are all more common in populations of children raised by single mothers.

The absence of fathers from the home is proof that women are stupid, heartless and profoundly unconcerned with their children's well-being. If that's dominance, I'll pass, thanks.

Men are becoming feminized?

Which men?

64% of men do not wear any fragrance of any kind. Only 23% of men wear cologne daily. And cologne is hardly some arty-farty invention of middle class ladies.

And let's have a look at what men and women choose to spend their money on, hmm?

Top Ten Things Women Enjoy Buying:

- Handbags
- Shoes
- Summer dresses
- Concert tickets
- Jeans
- Jewellery
- Little black dress
- Chocolates
- Underwear
- Beauty products

Top Ten Things Men Enjoy Buying:

- Watches
- Spirits
- Apple Gadgets
- Televisions and A/V equipment
- Gifts
- Dates and relationships
- Life experiences
- Sports
- Gambling
- Cars

It's interesting that the lady list has only two things that could ostensibly be shared with a partner (concert tickets, chocolates), while the men's list contains almost ALL shareable items. The preference for gambling, cars and sports doesn't suggest the sissification of men to me.

Keep dreaming, Hanna. Men are becoming the gentle kittens you would like them to be? Don't be fooled. Just because men can be and are very often gentle, kind and giving to women doesn't mean they will always be that way.

Here's an idea for you: let's claim that men are obsolete and worthless, like a map of a flat earth or a woolly mammoth snare, completely ignore the fact that they run the entire economy and make possible every service industry by doing the hard, shitty work, slap the shit out of them at home, take their children from them and then call them sissies.

How long do you think it will take before you discover that men are not only far from obsolete, they are faster, bigger, smarter and stronger than you?

How long will it take before they decide they have had quite enough of your shit?

How long, Hanna, can you live without water, power, communications, transportation or sewage treatment?

Obsolete?

I don’t think so.

> Obviously people want social calm, but if you do not let clever and ingenious people participate, there must be some dormant volcano that will erupt, sooner or later.
>
> Lech Walesa

Hanna and her ilk think the revolution will be the triumph of feminism and the utter domination of women.

I wouldn’t count on it.

Not for one second.

Lots of love,

JB

Feminism Liberates the Dark Feminine

AVfM Video Source · 7 January 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Youtube icon Fidelbogen takes the radical notion that all human beings have a dark side, and that feminism liberates the dark side of half the human race, leaving almost no accountability for it at all.

If you find such philosophical explorations as fascinating as we do, you may want to subscribe to Fidelbogen.

Andybob's Corner #4

andybob · 8 January 2014 · Archived copy · Original

One of our favorite (and our most strongly upvoted) commenters at AVfM is a mysterious fellow named "AndyBob." Funny, bitingly insightful, a joy to read – it is always worthwhile to slow down and read his thoughts carefully – and more than once.

Every now and then we like to round up some of Andy's work for your enjoyment, and ours. So gather round, boys and girls. Bring your cups of hot chocolate and pillows; Andybob, the Minister of Truth, has come to visit. And when he speaks, everything that crawls on the ground or goes bump in the night falls to stillness in the shadows; hoping, praying, ne're to be seen.

For this edition of Andybob's Corner, AB speaks to:

Thoughts on Occidental

"I expect this stuff from Jezebel, but something like this coming from a college sociology professor is just frightening." Sungecko says

Not frightening, just typical.

What else can someone saturated in feminist ideology possibly say about the spamming, other than the usual shaming language about 'little boys', victim-speak about silencing women and some kind of vacuous reference to male privilege? Being a feminist, she doesn't believe that false allegations even exist, which is why doesn't feel the need to address them.

Feminists cannot address any of the issues of the MHRM with anything other than dishonesty, obfuscation and snark. Sociology professors are no different – they just use bigger words and slightly more accurate punctuation. These vanguards of organized feminism are among the principal authors of their all-too-familiar narrative. It is beginning to fail them because they never expected it to be challenged by rational humanitarians, like John Hembling.

Feminists are now floundering to contrive an emergency contingency plan, which so far seems to consist of bribing the SPLC to slander MHRAs, and waiting for David Futrelle to come up with a cunning plan. In other words, they're fucked. Until this fact becomes apparent to people other than ourselves, they've elected to double-down on their wheezy old narrative.

It is narrative which is starting to make people wonder what little boys ever did to make feminists hate them so much.

On having patience

I was raised in a time and place that taught children that patience was virtue, goodness was its own reward, and you should do unto others as you would have them do unto you. Wonderful edicts to live by when those who participate in your life share them, or you somehow get trapped in a Disney movie.

Unfortunately, these edicts can work rather dangerously against you when you come into contact with certain types of persons – like serial killers, sociopaths and feminists. They can only perceive virtues as weaknesses to be exploited and manipulated to their advantage. It is difficult enough to successfully negotiate the real world with this knowledge – without it, you're done for.

Well-informed MHRAs who genuinely care about the rights and welfare of men and boys, understand that the time for patience has long passed – and not just with feminist ideologues. It includes patience with hand-wringing tone warriors, armchair quarterbacks and those recovering white knights who can't quite bring themselves to throw the last of their jousting utensils on the garbage heap where they belong.

Paul Elam has always understood that these self-proclaimed allies are almost as much of a hindrance to the MHRM as those feminists across the globe who are busily scribbling anti-male legislation as we type. It is never a surprise when Dr Elam loses his patience with people who contribute nothing but pointless distractions that the MHRM simply cannot afford. Our issues are too urgent for such luxuries.

Accusations of impatience stinks of Code Red Shaming Language – impatient = angry. It reminds me of Chanty Binx: "Be patient, feminists are working your issues. Anyway…" When you start to remind MHRAs of that charmless chanteuse, don't be surprised when your value to the MHRM gets questioned by a man who may lose a little of his composure.

"When it comes to dealing with self-elected but non-functional directors of matters in which they will not share in the work, I pledge to tell you to fuck off with a little more courtesy than I did in 2013." Paul Elam

A little more courtesy? Very little, I hope. Happy New Year you, and to all my fellow MHRAs who aren't 'bothered' by Dr Elam's passionate commitment one little bit.

Excusing irrationality

It has been more than twenty years since I have sought any kind of advice from women. That includes women I would describe as sensible and rational – I know a few. I came to realize that acting upon any advice offered to me by a woman would have invariably made whatever problems I have had, infinitely worse.

Their advice was always emotion-driven. Rather than offer ideas on how to resolve conflicts, reach accord and understanding, or simply calm troubled waters, they would invariably suggest inflammatory responses that relied heavily on acts of petty vengeance, violence, and an awful lot of name-calling.

Problems with the boss? Tell them to get fucked. Problems with a friend? Punch their lights out. Problems with a woman friend/colleague? Apologize, buy them chocolates and tell them they look pretty. Whatever the problem, acting on their advice – common sense always prevented me from doing so – would have had me fired, arrested, friendless, or turned into a spineless, vagina-worshiping lap dog, like Harris O'Malley.

You should have heard the howls of shock and dismay from a group of women when I recently let slip that me and my partner of more than a decade have never had an argument. I let them drone on about arguing being healthy, the importance of communication, and how sad that men have been socialized to bottle up our feelings – emotional retards that we are.

I explained that me and my partner handle our issues by sitting down and discussing them in a calm, honest and reasonable manner because that is the grown-up way to handle problems and conflicts in relationships. If an issue doesn't warrant that much effort, we take it as an indication that it is either unimportant, or isn't really a problem in the first place, so should be forgiven and forgotten.

They didn't understand.

I didn't expect them to. They made a lot of rancorous noises of course – how dare a man presume to know anything about relationships? I countered that I presumed nothing about any relationship other than my own. I did, however, point out that I was the only person at that table who had ever been in a successful relationship – and that they could make of that what they liked. The atmosphere turned sour, as it usually does when you call women out for talking crap, with some even storming out in a huffpo. Good.

I have said this before, but I'll say it again. Being gay, I am often in close range of women discussing their ideas about relationships. It usually leaves me angry and sad about what straight men, like my twin brother, have to put up with.

Most women view intimate partner relationships as some kind of playground where they have permission to unleash their inner 'crazy bitches'. Everyone, from their gal pals, to HuffPo hacks, have told them so. After all, who's going to stop them? I can't, and neither can the bewildered men who haplessly wander into these playgrounds, and find that they've been rigged like minefields. Their only sensible recourse is to escape while they still have their limbs – and their balls – intact.

Rational, fair, unselfish and sensible women have become an endangered species due to dwindling habitats – and feminism. Some have found a home at AVfM, toiling away in the Honey Badger enclosure and sammich mines. They are rightfully prized and respected. Unfortunately, they cannot, as yet, be cloned. As always, I salute them

_____

Many women enjoy acting crazy due to the adrenaline rush it infuses into their otherwise humdrum lives. Popular culture condones this behavior by conflating it with positive connotations of female empowerment and self-worth.

How many women do you see on reality TV shows proudly declaring, "I'm a diva" in order to explain away their selfish and entitled attitudes and actions? Obviously, "I'm a crazy bitch" doesn't have the same self-affirming, warm & fuzzy ring to it.

Most women are actually quite ignorant of the densely tortured ideologies of academic gender feminists like Andrea Dworkin. Their understanding of feminism has been distilled into one central tenet: 'I can act out however I like, and no-one is allowed to criticize me for it'. No wonder they accuse anyone who confronts them with, 'No princess, you can't act out however you like, and yes, I can criticize you for it', of being a patriarchal oppressor – it sounds like Daddy, the rational voice of reason, admonishing spoilt, out-of-control toddlers.

Unfortunately, when those toddlers are actually grown women who have the full weight of society's institutions behind them, we have to deal with legions of dangerous and potentially malevolent individuals. The damage they can, and do, cause to the men and women required to deal with them makes this phenomenon a very serious issue.

It is very telling that so many women, and men like Mr O'Malley – whether or not they identify as feminists – demonize those of us who do examine our emotions before acting on them, as being stunted, buttoned-down, emotional retards that have tragically failed to evolve (into divas?). Feminists are people who drone on endlessly about emotional intelligence, without demonstrating the slightest understanding of what it actually is.

One of the reasons the MHRM struggles to communicate with feminists is that we are rational voices trying to reason with divas – otherwise known as crazy bitches.

Rebranding feminism

Attempts to re-brand feminism are doomed to fail for the same reason feminists cannot honestly address any of the key issues of the MHRM. Feminists are incapable of concealing their hatred of men and boys any longer than Jaclyn Friedman can keep her hands off a chocolate Danish. They just can't help themselves. Even at their most restrained, their hatred oozes out like puss from a rancid boil. Contact with the tiniest prick has it spewing forth like projectile vomit.

That's why I'm never without my industrial-strength scrubs – and lancing utensils.

The mind boggles over what might be pinned on Elle magazine's ideas board. How are they going to turn lies, shaming, hypocrisy and violence into a glossy vision of fashion-forward loveliness? It'll take more than a few complimentary perfume fold-outs to mask the stench emanating from this ideology's hate-mongering bigotry.

Whatever monstrosity they send down the runway, we can rest assured that feminists will continue to respond to the MHRM with spectacular bad taste, ineptitude and someone else's money.

Women being discriminated against in the workplace

Yet another piece of feminist propaganda that reeks of the desperation that has seeped into their public discourse.

One can sense their struggle to keep their narrative on track in the face of mounting skepticism towards the core tenets of feminist ideology. This pitiful attempt to create a sense of national emergency based on the feelings of disgruntled women is particularly transparent. Judging by the comments attached to the article, people are beginning to see through it.

One of the biggest mistakes that feminists are making is that their assertions simply don't correlate to people's own experiences. Ask the women you know about their personal experiences with workplace bullying. They will tell you, very promptly, that other women are usually the culprits, and that men are just as likely to be their targets as women. Only an ideologue with an disintegrating agenda would try to tell fibs about such a universally acknowledged truth.

Workplace bullying is a very serious phenomenon which can have devastating effects on those who experience it. Another opportunity has been squandered to discuss an important issue honestly and seriously, because a feminist journalist decided that contributing to war-on-women hysteria was more important. They take the same wantonly irresponsible approach to other issues, especially domestic violence.

Many gender feminists, like those cited in the article, are quite explicit about their belief that any setbacks – in terms of salary and advancement – experienced by women who become mothers are due to the patriarchy's desire to punish women for having wombs. I'm not making this up. This is actually the stated belief of many influential and highly placed Australian feminists who hold lucrative positions in publicly funded organizations.

Feminists have finally overreached themselves. It must be enormously frustrating for them to realize that people are starting to call them on the absurdity of their beliefs, as well as their vast sense of entitlement. If Emily Dugan thinks she's helping them out with her article, then she's as deluded as they are.

Reproductive rights for men

"When men are given the same rights as women to choose fatherhood, all the incentives to trap men and extract maximum resources without consequence will be eliminated." Janet Bloomfield

Whenever you are introducing the key issues of the MHRM to women – from surly radfems to the merely curious – be sure to wear protective gear and stand well back when you get to bit about full reproductive rights for men. Otherwise, you could be scrubbing brain splatter off your favourite shirt for weeks.

If their heads haven't exploded already, then raising this particular issue is always guaranteed to do the trick. I have yet to witness any response other than visceral hysteria, usually revolving around the idea that MHRAs just want to control women's bodies. "You want to imprison women in baby factories so you can rape them and force them to have babies."

Um, no. But thank you for your creative projection.

In stark contrast, most men just stare open-mouthed, as if someone's switched a light on in their heads that they never knew was there. What they are experiencing is nothing short of a revelation. It isn't difficult to determine which group has hitherto enjoyed a monopoly on reproductive rights and which has only known obligations and responsibilities.

The often bizarre and extreme responses of otherwise sensible women suggest that there is more at stake than the loss of power, control and the means to extort money from men. Underpinning their barely coherent rage is an almost palpable fear that the MHRM is attempting to encroach, not just on their autonomy, but on their very identities as women.

Perhaps Honey Badgers, like Janet Bloomfield, can acknowledge and accept male reproductive rights because their identities as women are more expansive and self-determined than those of women who have never explored and evaluated MHR issues.

In the same way, the articles and resources at AVfM have enabled male MHRAs to question, and ultimately enrich our notions of male identity. Men can be so much more than just disposable utilities. By the same token, one of the most positive, and least noted, benefits derived from exposure to AVfM is that it encourages us to have a greater appreciation and respect for the potential of women – a potential that is suffocated beneath the infantilizing baby blanket of feminism.

Reading the opinions of Camille Paglia and Honey Badgers like Janet Bloomfield reminds me that the best women are independent, free-range thinkers whose heads don't explode when confronted with the concept that men's rights are human rights. It gives me tremendous hope – for which I am grateful.

That was invented by a woman? Cool story, Sista!

Kevin Wayne · 8 January 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Ah, Tumblr Feminists. What would we do without them to provide comic relief, eh? Actually the truth be known is that contrary to popular belief, Tumblr Feminists are in fact a good representation of the Feminist mainstream. I know, I know: "You can't go by the Feminists on these little social networking sites," many exclaim. "They don't represent true Feminism!"

Actually, all that amounts to is just another variation on NAFALT, or the "No true Scotsman" fallacy. One only need to examine a topic often brought up that you can find most anywhere: The notion of women inventors. This fatuous nonsense that comes so straightforwardly from the mouths of the younger Feminists on Tumblr, Facebook, MySpace, Twitter, et. al,? It's all over the Internet! Don't believe me? Do an online search for it. There are copious websites throughout that list several alleged female formulators for your perusal. Some of them repeat the same names, some have names of their own they add to the wood pile.

I'm old school, so I'm going to jump into this – at least at first – the way I would have sampled a vinyl record album back in the day: Drop the needle somewhere and let it play! So in randomly picking out one of the sites I've managed to dredge up, I go through the names and one jumps out at me big time. A name that goes back to my boyhood lustful fantasies: Julie Newmar, better known by her most famous role of Catwoman.

I first encountered the name of the divine Ms. Newmar on a meta-list of Women Inventors here. Accessing the link on her name takes me to a page titled "Who Invented Pantyhose?" This is what we find:

> [image]
>
> In 1959, Glen Raven Mills of North Carolina introduced pantyhose invented by Allen Gant. Pantyhose are a combination of underpants and stockings all in one garment. With the addition of an opaque nylon top, pantyhose eliminated the need for multiple "foundation" garments. In 1965, Glen Raven Mills developed a seamless pantyhose version that coincided with the introduction of the miniskirt. Allen Grant is the descendant of John Gant, who founded the textile mill in 1902.

> Julie Newmar – Improvements to Pantyhose

> Julie Newmar, a living Hollywood film and television legend is an inventor in her own right. The former Cat Woman patented ultra-sheer, ultra-snug pantyhose. Known for her work in films such as Seven Brides for Seven Brothers and Slaves of Babylon, Newmar has also appeared recently in Fox Television's Melrose Place and the hit feature-film "To Wong Fu, Thanks for Everything, Love Julie Newmar."

Call me crazy, but doesn't this amount to Allen Gant being the actual inventor of the pantyhose and Julie Newmar being an innovator of something a man already brought forth into the world? Most people I think would say so, And it's worth noting that the entry makes one sentence about her contribution, then goes onto talk about what we should be lauding her for: Her stellar acting career.

Changing the subject so soon, are we?

The US Patent & Trademark Office does mention the former Catwoman on its website. An innovation on another recognized invention can apparently be itself called an invention, provided it meets the "Inventive Step" or "Non-obviousness" requirements for a patent to be issued. However, I'm not sure that most people understand that in terms of popular usage of the words "inventor" or "invention." Probably most people think of an invention as "a device, contrivance, or process originated after study and experiment." In other words, Allen Gant's having invented pantyhose as opposed to Julie Newmar's improving on them.

Be that as it may, it's really quibbling over details, here. What's more obnoxious is this pattern of attempted "me-too-ism" or even (attempted) one-upmanship that seems to permeate most of these websites. Take for instance this little gem on Mother Jones, titled "Ladies Last: 8 Inventions by Women that Dudes Got Credit For."

Excuse me whilst I take the time to tear this article to shreds.

First up in their list (technically the 1st, even though they can't help but list Ada Lovelace twice. Desperate, much?) is actually Rosalind Franklin, whom they laud for her "discovery of the DNA Double-Helix."

What a minute? I thought this was going to be about women who "Invented" things? Nobody "invented" the DNA Double-Helix. it was brought on by God or "nature" depending on your perspective. But the point is, it's not something a human being made. It's exactly as the subtitle says: She "discovered" it.

I'm guessing that Mother Jones figures people will skim through the article, see the short list of names and not bother to read any further to see if it really does affirm their confirmation bias. But as far as Frankin's part in the discovery of the DNA Double-Helix, I invite the reader to peruse the Wikipedia article that mentions her. If seems to me that she was one person surrounded by a team of male colleagues, and that her main contribution was an X-Ray photo of DNA. Is this her not "getting credit," or is it someone highlighting the fact that "A gurrl was 'dere in da mix, dammit!"

With Wikipedia these days, you have to be on your guard. Really! In fact before last Fall semester started, 15 Universities around the globe were to offer college credit for "Writing feminist thinking into Wikipedia."

Funny, but I remember the day when Feminists would tell me that citing Wikipedia meant that I didn't know anything about good sources, since Wikipedia allegedly wasn't credible!
Anyhoo, back to the Mother Jones article. Here's the rest of the list that MJ has to offer us:

- Ada Lovelace According to MJ, she contributed notes she translated on an early model of the computer that was built by Charles Babbage. "The notes are considered the first descriptions of what we now call algorithms and computer programming."

Check this entry on Controversy over Ada's contributions to Babbage's work and decide for yourself. MJ claims that Babbage lauded her in his memoir, others have taken a differing viewpoint.
But again, what does all this matter? Can Ada really be considered an "inventor?" Would the US Patent & trademark office really issue a patent for her work?

- Margaret Knight Here we get the 1st entry that actually appears to be what the article is supposed to be about: A woman invented something, and a man stole the patent. In this case, it was a machine for making paper bags. Not exactly earth-shattering, and actually it's something that grates on me at the moment. My fair city recently had the bad judgement of banning plastic grocery bags, and making all the elderly, disabled and those who use public transportation struggle with paper grocery bags that easily tear (unless they buy cloth bags from the store.) Not in the mood for giving Maggie a pat on the head at the moment.

(Seriously, how do we know that it wasn't all about politicians caving into the Timber Industry, anyway?)

- Judy Malloy Was what she came up with all that important? You decide.

- Lise Meitner Not really an example of a "dude" getting credit for her work. More an example of her name being left off the research due to her male colleagues not wanting to have NAZI's crawling up their arse.

- Candace Pert More of a discovery done with a male colleague, not really an invention.

- Martha Coston The Chinese already had flare guns about 600 years before her, and she seems to have mostly cashed in on an idea her late husband had. In fact, hubby Benjamin drew up the original plans that she got the patent for!

Are most of the articles that talk about "Women Inventors" this dodgy? I'm afraid so. Another example is this HuffPo piece that not only has the audacity to call Chocolate Chip Cookies an "invention," but begins an entry with "We don't actually know the individual who first created beer…"

Among the assumed accomplishment by lady innovators listed are: Windshield wipers (good job, but a man came up with almost the same thing in the same year;) Monopoly (though one could argue that Lizzie Phillips came up with a slightly different game? Solar Heated Homes (hmm… ok, perhaps Maria Telkes might be another Curie, so I'll give you that one;) the Fire Escape (sorry, Daniel Maseres was over 100 years ahead of Anna Connelly;) and Kevlar (she "stumbled across" it accidentally trying to make something else, and didn't really have much to do with how it would be used.)

Other sites repeat some of the same items and add things like the Circular Saw, (although Tabitha Babbit can't really be said to be the 1st one to come up with it;) the Dishwasher (come, on! It's a Washing Machine turned sideways with the spindle taken out;) "Engine Muffler" (you can tell a woman writes these things. It's just called a Muffler and two men beat out El Dorado Jones with a patent by over 20 years.)

I gotta say, though: I like this quote from El Dorado Jones:

"Do not forget to exploit men all you can. Because if you don't, they will exploit you"
I think the Feminists need to make that their slogan, in honor of her. Even put that in the "Dictionary definition of Feminism."

But the sublime totally crosses over to the ridiculous with the times I've seen Feminists try and credit Radia Perlman with inventing the Internet. Radia herself wisely eschews the title "Mother of the Internet" that some foist on her (she really isn't) and it's hard not to notice that her name is absent from reliable histories of the Internet that are out there.

Ladies, look: If you have a list of women scientists you want us to give recognition to, be sure you make them all the equivalent of Marie Curie, and skip the Chocolate Chip cookies. It'll make you look less desperate, at least. Meanwhile, know this: Men are running circles around you, as far as the most prolific inventors in history are concerned. (You can't even complain about discrimination, since the scientist who's the most prolific of all emerged in the latter half of the 20th century, when copious women were enrolled in college, equaling men in the 80's and surpassing since the 90's.)

Men are simply overwhelmingly responsible for building, making, and constructing most of what's around us. They created today's economy as Camille Paglia has pointed out. They are the one's who keep the world running on the behalf of women – and really, all of us, as Judgybitch has pointed out. And all for what? So men can be told that being asked to safely carry their babies for 9 months is "slavery." Or that most boys are "rapists in waiting." Or be told how "privileged" we are, despite the fact that the overwhelming majority of the homeless are men, and that the gender disparity for jail sentences for the same crime is usually in favor of the woman. It's time for a serious reality check. Next time the Feminists start up about how many inventions are by women, I'd keep this post bookmarked. Could come in handy.

Editorial ntoe: reprinted from Under the Goddess.

The Other Man Is You

AVfM Video Source · 8 January 2014 · Archived copy · Original

A video is a classic because no matter when it was made it's still awesome. Such is the case is this great entry by the legendary ManWomanMyth. DE

If you haven't by now, you should subscribe.

Father jailed for paying child support

AVfM Video Source · 8 January 2014 · Archived copy · Original

That's right, for paying it. Yet you have these people out there still denying that there's any such things as Debtor's Prison for fathers. –DE

Please stop doing this to your sons

AVfM Video Source · 9 January 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Look, if you were misled and thought this was a desirable procedure with cleanliness and health benefits, it's not your fault, you were misled. All parents make mistakes based on bad information. But please, it is not safe, it is not harmless, it is not just a flap of skin, it carries serious dangers, and it is completely unnecessary. Not to mention cruel.

It is also not a religious requirement for Christians, to correct the guys at The Advice Show. Besides that point, though, thanks to The Advice Show for covering stories like this without apology.

“Divorce Corp” Director Joe Sorge

AVfM Video Source · 9 January 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Paul Elam recently spoke with the director of Divorce Corp, a movie he strongly encourages people to see.

Look for a full review of the film in the near future, but in the meantime, you will want to see it if you can.

Update: See Paul Elam’s full review of the film here.

Divorce Corp: Review and Interview with Director Joe Sorge

Paul Elam · 9 January 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Tomorrow the new documentary Divorce Corp, an exposé on the United States' family court system, will debut in theaters nationwide. Directed by filmmaker Joe Sorge, the movie has already been drawing heat and threats of boycott from groups clinging to the advantageous (for some) corruption in family courts.

After viewing the film myself, I can understand why anyone accustomed to an unfair advantage might be angry.

The bomb has finally been dropped and the truth has exploded all over an industry whose corruption and raw evil have not been matched since Jim Crow. Divorce Corp is a long awaited oracle of truth about an area of American life where mendacity and turpitude have been legislated, institutionalized and turned shamelessly into profit at the expense of families and children.

From start to finish, the movie educates viewers about the mechanics of the problem. It efficiently shows how family law attorneys, the chief architects of the misery-for-profit scheme that now defines the system; systematically ensure that divorces have just enough turmoil and conflict to drain their clients of assets.

It works for the attorneys. It works for the judges. It also works for all the ancillary personnel like social workers, whose living depends on helping attorneys and courts justify the destruction of the parent-child bond, because it is necessary to the "winning" of a case. The film does a particularly good job of showing how all this is packaged and sold under the "best interest of the child," canard.

If those words don't already make your skin crawl because you have been through a divorce, then they will after seeing this film – if you have an interest in the well-being of children.

The case studies are devastating, from a man who was put in prison for five years for criticism he made online of the judge in his divorce, to the more subtle but no less heartbreaking examples of children sheared away from their parents out of spite and avarice.

Divorce Corp also delivers a silver lining along with an almost incomprehensible amount of bad news. It offers possible solutions. There are some Scandinavian countries that approach divorce without the financial interest of lawyers in mind. This seems to work wonders for "the best interest of the child."

And it also appears to do the same when there is no financial incentive to treat children like chattel, using them as pawns of convenience the moment someone becomes disenchanted with their marriage and wants out.

It is a case of no gain, no pain. And we would do well to take a good long look at it in the rest of the western world.

Is this movie perfect? In a word, no. I was troubled by what appeared to be too much effort to portray the issues as gender neutral. They aren't, and that needs to be addressed. I was also disappointed that there was no mention of Title IV-D, and how it provides significant financial incentive for courts to operate protection rackets for single mothers.

In the big picture, though, these are small concerns, likely mitigated by the fact that we can only expect our culture to swallow one small bite at a time of this very large, unsavory pie.

In fact, this film, for the world we live in, may well be the perfect platform to spark some interest in change. Either way, it's worth the price of a ticket. Though I suggest you skip the popcorn. Within the first few minutes you won't have much of an appetite. It's a gut wrenching movie, but one that you should see, just the same.

Interview with Director Joe Sorge:

Editor's note: More on where you can see Divorce Corp here. –DE

Socialism, capitalism, and the woman question

Ernest Belfort Bax · 9 January 2014 · Archived copy · Original

The following article by Ernest Belfort Bax appeared in To-Day in July 1887 under the title 'Some Heterodox Notes on the Women Question.' – PW

The above is one of those questions on which a particular species of traditional nonsense is expected of one. The "advanced" writer starts from certain dogmas, which the "advanced" reader has had handed down to him in the apostolical succession of "advanced" thought for a century past. These dogmas of "advanced" faith in the Woman Question are (1) that a natural equality of the sexes obtains in all respects save that of physical strength; (2) that women have always formed an oppressed class, but that the advance of civilization may be measured by the lightening of this oppression (here, of course, we get into the tail of the great bourgeois Panegyric of Civilization); (3) the convenient corollary from the first position, namely, that women ought to have all the rights of intellectual capacity with all the privileges of physical weakness, otherwise expressed, all the rights of men, and none of the duties or hardships of men.

For it is a significant and amusing fact that no mention is ever made by the advocate of women's claims of the privileges which have always been accorded the "weaker sex." These privileges are quietly pocketed as a matter of course, without any sort of acknowledgment, much less any suggestion of surrender. I may add yet another thesis to the dogmas of "advanced" bourgeois thought on the Woman Question. This is what I may term the theory of "womanhood." It is to be found in its most formulated and definite guise in the Comtian worship of woman with its virgin mother and other accessories; But in a general loose way it pervades a large section of modern Radicalism, and consists in the notion of the sacredness of the female sex as such.

The sentiment, when analysed, may, I think, be traced to two sources. One is the sentiment of consideration for weakness, laudable in itself, but which has got transformed into that of the right of weakness to privilege or domination over strength which is, of course, a very different thing. But the other and most potent factor is, I fancy, a survival of the ancient worship of the principle of generation. The exponents of Cuniform tell us that a well known symbol of the alone, corresponding to the Greek Θ, is to be taken to signify the word "woman." Now, I think there is a certain moral attached to this piece of Cuniform lore.

Woman is, and has been emphatically the sex. The veneration of the generative principles in their grosser form is of course impossible to civilised man. And while male man has ceased to represent a sex, in developing into the human personality complete up to date; woman still represents a sexual principle; her personality centres in sex, in fact she still remains for the most part, an amplified, beautified, embellished sexual organ. Otherwise expressed, sex enters into the substance of woman, while in man it is only an accident.[1]

Man has a sexual side which he recognises as something more or less distinct from himself – "He" is not the male principle of humanity in the same way that "she" is the female principle. With man sex enters into and affects the personality it is true, but is clearly distinguished from the personality as such; with woman, sex is identified with, and indistinguishable from the personality as a whole. This is easily seen in the incapacity of the average woman to abandon herself to interest in any impersonal question. Discourse in any drawing room with the "ladies" there assembled and you have an irresistible but uneasy sense that, however well-feigned may be the interest in the subject of conversation, the real interest of the woman centres round the fact that she is female and you are male, and in the various conventional barriers with which this fact is surrounded.

The way otherwise shrewd men let themselves be deceived by the very thinnest assumption of interest in their pursuits on the part of their wives is to the last degree amusing. A friend seriously speaks of his wife's opinion, say on some literary point; on being introduced to the wife she tells you she thinks Shakespeare must have been a very clever man! The real interest of the good woman is, of course, entirely absorbed in the personal matters springing directly from the sexual relation of married life. In modern gyneolotry I think then we may see the survival of the cultes genatrices of antiquity exhibiting itself, not in the coarse form of the worship of the actual organ, but in the refined one of deference for the representatives of the principle of sex[2] par excellence.

In the course of this digression I have forestalled one or two points in the subsequent argument. However, I will now jot down in succinct manner a few criticisms of the cardinal dogmas of modern gyneolotry. Like the dogmas of the Christian theology, and of the Bourgeois economy, these dogmas are supported by one or two stock pseudo-arguments of a conventional nature, the rottenness of which is manifest at a glance. For instance, in support of the potential intellectual equality of women with men, in face of the obvious actual inequality, the fiction is promulgated that women have been cut off from the possibilities of culture which men have had. Now this, I submit, is very much on a level with the Bourgeois argument in support of a class-society, which consists in trotting out the virtuous man of industry and frugality, and the vicious man of indolence and extravagance.

There is a grain of truth, of course, in both arguments, but it is imbedded in a mountain of error. It may be true in isolated cases, and under special circumstances, that women have suffered from the lack of training in special departments which men have enjoyed, just as it may have been true in some few cases that wealth has been the result of industry in a sense, and poverty of laziness. The objection of course is, that as arguments they are inept, if for no other reason than that they fail to account for ninety-nine per cent of the facts.

The curriculum of higher education has until recently, by general consent, been adverse rather than propitious to the development of intelligence in those subject to it. Years devoted to Latin verse-making can hardly be deemed stimulating to general mental development. This, at all events, women have been spared. Secondly, it has only been in a few departments of learning that at the best, men have had any considerable advantage over women. From the days of Sappho, there has never been any obstacle, real or conventional, in the way of women “taking to” literature or the fine arts in any of their forms. Yet what (in comparison to men) have they ever achieved in any of these departments?

It is said that women have always been taught to limit their interests to home, & c. This may be true, of the Englishwoman of a generation ago and to a less extent even of to-day. But it was not true of the cultivated Greek hetaira, or of the Roman lady of the Augustan age. It has never in modern times been true of a large section of women in France, or in numberless other instances that might be mentioned. Besides, we find that with men individual character and genius has always shown itself precisely in the overcoming of such obstacles of environment. This is also true of women who have attained distinction. There was nothing, for instance, in the training of George Eliot different from that of the ordinary Englishwoman. The argument from social and educational disadvantage therefore plainly breaks down. It is not this which has prevented the average woman intellectually equalling the average man, or the exceptional woman the exceptional man.

The argument for equality, drawn from examination statistics, is hardly worth mentioning. That by great efforts some women can equal men in capacity for “cramming” proves nothing. The “examination” intellect means little more, in plain English, than a good memory and an acquired facility in using it. It is, in fact, an improved calculating machine, which is comparatively rarely accompanied by general or special ability otherwise. What senior wrangler or tripos man has ever been heard of by the world after his examinations are passed and forgotten?

Let us now consider the question of the physical strength of women. The inferiority of bodily or muscular strength is supposed to entitle woman to special privileges. That all weakness is entitled to consideration (though not to domination) goes without saying. But I submit that in the ordinary life of the modern world the question of muscular strength or weakness has very little significance. Even on those rare occasions when it becomes pressing, the invention of firearms has reduced its importance very considerably. A woman flourishing a loaded revolver could hold a room-full of able-bodied men in check. Again, on this argument the consideration shown to weakness ought to be shown quâ weakness and not quâ sex, as it is at present.

But the chief form of female privilege is the assumed constitutional “frailty” of the sex. We come now to an important point. Muscular weakness is commonly confounded with constitutional; strength of body with strength of health and vital power. Woman, because she is muscularly “frail” has obtained the credit of being constitutionally "frail." But is this belief in accord with facts? Does muscular frailty involve constitutional frailty? If it does of course there remains a certain basis of reason in some, though not all, of the exemptions and privileges of women. But I contend it is contrary to facts open to everyone.

It is a universally admitted fact that the female infant is much stronger and more easily reared than the male infant. The registrar-general's statistics alone illustrate this, as broadly as could be desired. The number of male births is enormously in excess of female. The numerical proportions of adult men and women is, as is well-known, just the reverse. This superior vigour of the female infant would of itself lend probability, in the absence of strong evidence to the contrary, for assuming certainly not less vital power in the female than in the male adult. And what evidence is there to the contrary? A widespread assumption and nothing more. In observations (relating to this matter) extending over some years of accidents, severe illnesses, injuries, & c., I have noted the excess of women over men who "pull through," as the expression is, to be enormous.

While inviting the reader to take careful note of his personal observations and his newspaper in this respect for the next six or twelve months I may recall haphazard one or two instances of female toughness of constitution, probably exceeding that of any man on record. It is well known that to be sentenced to the knout in Russia was only deemed a euphemism for a sentence of death. The only recorded instance of anyone passing through the ordeal unscathed is that of Mme. Lapuchin, who was knouted by order of Elizabeth of Russia, survived without serious impairment of health, was deported to the mines of Siberia, survived that also, and returning to St. Petersburg; died at a green old age.

Most of us recollect the instance of the old Scotchwoman, the winter before last, who being in ill-health, was on her voyage from the Shetlands to the Mainland in quest of medical advice, was wrecked, drifted about on a raft in intensely cold weather, without food of any kind, for nearly a week, when she was picked up by a passing vessel, was taken ashore, and tended, and in a few days completely recovered. Not so very long ago, a woman experienced but slight constitutional disturbance after jumping from the Clifton Suspension Bridge, a height of some 800 feet.

A case came within my personal knowledge recently of a young woman having to undergo an exceptionally severe surgical operation for internal tumour, involving removal and replacement of a portion of the intestines. "She'll never get over it" was remarked to me. "It may seem incredible," I replied, "still strong is the female constitution and will probably prevail." The truth of my observation was attested when in a few weeks after her two or three hours surgical vivisection she was better than she had ever been before. Now these instances, which are taken merely at random, as they occur to me while writing, and which might be indefinitely multiplied, may be termed exceptional, if you like, but allowing the utmost latitude to their exceptional character, I contend they altogether upset the traditional assumption of the "frailty" of women as regards constitutional vigour and the capacity for endurance. The fact is the "lady" of civilisation is brought up to regard herself as a "frail" creature, is always being told "my dear, this is too much for you," that it is fatal for her to stand on her feet for a few minutes together and so on, till at last she persuades herself it is true, or at least proper and womanly for her to pretend it is.

Among the proletariat where these fancies are an unattainable luxury the equality of health and staying-power between men and, women is much more obvious; so, also, to a somewhat lesser extent with those women among the educated classes who have to earn their own livelihood by teaching or literary work. The injustice to men which the conventional superstition of the "frailty" of woman, with its customary rites entails is seen on various occasions. In an omnibus on a wet morning how often does it happen that one of that unhappy class of exploited employees, the city warehouse clerk, with health undermined by long hours in a vitiated atmosphere is driven to dangerous exposure to make room for some fat, hulking matron, out to do her "shopping," who has probably ten times his physical stamina.

I think we may fairly conclude then (1) that no case has, as yet, been made out for reconsidering the opinion dictated by the obvious facts of the problem as it stands, viz. that women are radically inferior in mental power to men;[3] on the other hand, (2) that there is a very good case, supported by a large mass of evidence, for reconsidering the received opinion of the inferiority in constitutional strength or vital power, of women as compared with men, an opinion which is accepted like most traditional beliefs, in the absence of evidence, and without examination.

The second main position of orthodox Radicalism, that women are, and have been in the past, grievously oppressed by men, is, on one side of it wholly false, and on the other true only to a very limited extent. It is a common fallacy in this connection to represent women as an oppressed class. Now, as a matter of fact, at no period of the world's history has the female sex constituted a disinherited or oppressed class. Women may have been liable to certain disabilities. But these have been always compensated and often more than compensated by exemptions and special privileges.

Economically, although dependent on men, women have for the most part had the "lion's share at the banquet of life." The real state of the case is that the condition of women has been determined by that of the men of the class to which they belonged. Women of the privileged class have always been privileged, women of an oppressed class have been oppressed, not as women, but as belonging to an economically inferior section of the population. We repeat that women as a sex have never been at any time treated as an inferior class to be exploited, in the same way that the slave class of ancient times, the villein class of mediaeval times, or the Proletarian class of modern times, has. The, analogy sometimes attempted to be drawn between the female sex and an oppressed class is therefore altogether inept.

Coming to the present day, the talk of male oppression, in any form or degree is simply the grossest and most impudent piece of cant. Law, custom, and opinion, in this and in most other western countries are wholly and absolutely on the side at women as against men. It is hopeless for a man to attempt to get justice where his adversary is a woman. This has reached a condition of scandal in this country that every assizes shows a crop of spurious charges of indecent assault brought by women against men, without a single instance of one of these women being prosecuted for perjury.

There was an atrocious case, recently, of a woman who, charged an unfortunate workman in the same factory with her, because he refused to give her money. Baron Huddleston who tried the case remarked that the woman ought to be prosecuted. Was she? Not a bit. Now suppose these cases were reversed. Suppose men of the baser sort to have discovered a way of blackmailing "ladies." Conceive the yell of indignation that would well up from press and platform; conceive the proposals to apply the "cat" to the dastardly ruffians; conceive the sentences of penal servitude for life which would re-echo from the walls of every tribunal! Imagination pales before the terrific ebullition of Bourgeois fury that would ensue. But, of course, when it is men who are the sufferers, and women who are the assailants it is only a matter on which Mr. Stead may exercise his small wit.

Again, it is a fact, the explanation of which for obvious reasons, cannot be given here, that severe corporal punishment is more likely to injure young boys than girls. Yet if there is a case of a female child receiving a very mild castigation it is invariably magnified into a violent assault and emotionally commented on from the bench, and this in face of the brutal flogging systematically inflicted on the unfortunate lads on board government training ships, and in industrial schools.

Yet again, take the case of the law of husband and wife. The husband is compelled to maintain his wife, under all circumstances, while the wife, who has her earnings protected, can sell him up for drink or to keep a paramour at her sweet will and pleasure. If he remonstrates she may proceed to rejoin with a chair, or a flat-iron, or a poker; and should he then be rash enough to stay the uplifted arm, he has committed an assault, she proceeds with wailing to the nearest police-court; commiseration from magistrates for her and six months "hard" for him – la voila – she is but an ill-used matron, and a convict-felon he. And this is what you call advancing toward equality between the sexes.

The success of Barnum journalism and its maiden tribute agitations, Langworthy marriages, & c., shows the ease with which a cheap conventional indignation can be trumped up on any question supposed to point the moral and adorn the tale of the fiendish malignity of man and the angelic innocence of woman. How different is it with any infamy perpetrated not for the immediate satisfaction of an imperious passion (however unnatural or perverted) but in the cold-blooded pursuit of gain.

A few months ago a fishmonger at Hammersmith, was sentenced by the stipendiary to a month's imprisonment for one of the most revolting crimes a man can commit-he had tried to sell to the poor of the neighbourhood a portion of a putrid cod, which, had it been eaten, must, the medical officer stated, inevitably have produced inflammation of the intestines, probably resulting in a horrible death. This fishmonger appealed, the already ridiculous sentence was quashed, on account of "previous good character," and a fine of ten pounds substituted. Did the humane philanthropic Bourgeois make the welkin ring with his protestations? Oh dear no. This was done in pursuance of a legitimate branch of trade. (It cannot be said in excuse that such offences are not common for it is admitted that only in the most extreme instances, and not always then, are they brought to justice, and notwithstanding, scarcely a week passes without one appearing at one or other of the London police courts.)

This same Bourgeois philanthropist can foam at the mouth, gnash his teeth and vomit an ocean of gushing indignation over the chance seduction of a girl under eighteen! The latter has nothing to do with trade, and is connected with the wellspring of traditional emotion, so you have only to turn the tap on, and out spouts the sentiment ready brewed.

Notwithstanding the state of law, public opinion, and custom, the "shrieking sisterhood," and their male lackeys continue to invoke male "chivalry" in defence of every usurpation or act of injustice perpetrated in the interest of female domination. This invocation of chivalry now is about on a level with the capitalist's invocation of "freedom of contract." With both ideas, while their form remains intact the content has entirely changed. Under an Individualist system of production, "freedom of contract" between employer and employed had a meaning; under the great industry it has none – it is merely an excuse for exploitation by the Capitalist class.

In the early middle ages, when strength of arm was commonly called into requisition for defence, "chivalry" had a meaning; in the nineteenth century it has none, and is merely an excuse for the privileges and domination of the female sex. In fact, if "chivalry" means taking the side of the weaker, it would be shown more often to-day, in championing the cause of the man against the woman, than that of the woman against the man.

Hegel said that every typical character appeared twice in history – once as tragedy and once as farce. If we apply this to the chivalric type, and take King Arthur or Sir Launcelot (regarded for the nonce as historical personages) as the embodiment of the former we may certainly find the latter in the person of the great cheap-jack of London journalism, and exponent of the sorrows of husband-hunting wenches. The drop is certainly great from the hero of the "City of Legions" to the "Northumbrian boy."

It might be thought from the general tenor of these remarks that they were intended as an attack on all idea of equality between the sexes. Such, however, is not the case. All I have meant to do is to attack the spurious social and political equality advocated by the bourgeois "woman's rights" faction, male and female, an "equality" which, to employ the celebrated bull, is "all on one side." This to my thinking is to be fought at all costs. As a friend intimately acquainted with current political life recently observed to me, what these people want to get the suffrage for is not to further any broad social views whatever, but simply to get infamous laws passed against men as men. This I believe to be true. What they really want is the erection of a sex domination.

I have also endeavoured in the foregoing to show the baselessness of the arguments supposed to tell in favour of the intellectual equality of men and women. Two things seem to me clear. (1) There is and has been a palpable inequality. (2) The arguments hitherto put forward to explain away that inequality won't hold water. It will be observed that this is a very different thing from dogmatically asserting the inequality to be necessarily permanent.

I believe it to be much more radical than many people would wish to imagine, but we can none of us foresee the results which such a revolution as that toward which modern socialists look forward will effect in modifying human life generally and with it calling into play latent and as yet unproven capacities in the female mind. With regard to the practical point of equality of social status between men and women the question entirely rests on an economic basis.

As has been often said, so long as a man “keeps” a woman, whether as wife or mistress, as things go, it is perfectly natural he should expect to control that woman. It is a part of the system. Abolish the economic independence, place woman on an equal economic footing, and you have cut the ground from under any other possible dependence. In this great socialistic step toward real as opposed to sham equality between the sexes, two other points are I think involved. One is the definitive overthrow of our sham monogamic marriage and the formal recognition by society collectively of free relations between the sexes; and the other is the repudiation by women themselves of the anachronistic notion of “Chivalry,” as being due to them from men. (This reconstruction aspect of the question would require a special article). If we are to have equality and fellowship, let it be equality and fellowship, and not a hollow fraud masquerading under the name.

---

1. This does not, of course, touch the question as to the relative strength of the actual sexual appetite in the two sexes. The latter may quite consonantly with the argument be, as some physiologists allege, greater in man than in woman. The statement in the text is best illustrated by the two aims of the “respectable” woman, which are (1), to maintain her virginity, or (2) to make a good marriage.
2. Christianity, in accentuating as the first of virtues, the essentially female morality of sex, really, tended to drag men down to the level of mere males. When “sex” interpenetrates the whole personality a sexual ethic is obviously the dominant one. Chastity – as in the case of women – becomes the first of virtues. Where sex is merely one side of the personality, the sex-morality necessarily loses its importance, even if it is not formally abrogated.
3. I have refrained from entering into the strictly scientific questions of embryology and craniology which nevertheless make entirely in favour of the above thesis, partly from incompetence to deal with them adequately, partly because they would extend this paper too much.

Male Sexual Abuse

AVfM Video Source · 10 January 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Spetsnaz has done it again. Can't even think of anything to say about this except: watch it!

Oh, and, subscribe. –DE

Respect: A Meme

AVFM · 10 January 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Sammich Heist strikes again. Put this down all you want, you know it's true. PE

[image]

We fear Carina Kolodny's children, and so should your sons

John Hembling (JtO) · 10 January 2014 · Archived copy · Original

I fear Carina Kolodny's children, and so should you.

Why, you may wonder, should you fear them, and for that matter, who on Earth is Carina Kolodny?

According to her byline at the Huffington Post, she's a writer, media activist, and sex educator. Apparently, she also holds a Masters in Social Media & Social Change. In other words, she's a professional Social Justice Warrior (SJW). For some readers, that may seem like a positive appellation.

For clarity, this is an individual who repeatedly engages in arguments on "social justice," often in a shallow or poorly reasoned way, for the purpose of raising their own personal reputation. A Social Justice Warrior, or SJW, does not necessarily believe anything they say, or even care about the groups they are fighting "on behalf of." The term also connotes an established tendency to advance arguments based solely on the immediate utility of moral one-upmanship, and completely unattached to reality, truth, or any core moral principals, such as non-initiation of violence.

But returning to Kolodny's children, and why fear is an appropriate response to them: they're rapists and violent criminals. Does that sound hyperbolic? It's worse than you think. Kolodny's children, those children, teenagers, and in time, the adults they will become, are not simply her actual offspring. In fact, Carina Kolodny doesn't have children. Rather, they are all the children and teenagers raised to believe in the same popularized narrative Kolodny perpetuates in her writing, media activism, and sex education.

What narrative? This one; "It is a young woman's responsibility to safeguard herself from rape, assault, harassment, stalking and abuse because boys will be boys and some of them just can't help themselves."

There are two separate and contradictory ideas at play in Kolodny's quote, so we will examine each one independently. The first is that of self-responsibility. Apparently, when contemplated for women or girls, the Social-Justiciar and sex-educator Carina Kolodny finds it objectionable. Protecting yourself is not girls' jobs, it is society's job to protect girls (and apparently no one else).

"It is a young woman's responsibility to safeguard herself from rape, assault, harassment, stalking…"

Kolodny is being sarcastic, but why? Yes, every young woman (and old woman, and every young man, and old man) has a personal responsibility to mitigate risk, to make responsible decisions about attire, displays of wealth, and to generally avoid stupid, unnecessary risk of criminal victimization. This is not to suggest that any individual falling prey to criminal victimization is at greater fault than whatever violent perpetrator may have committed such victimization–but being an adult means taking responsibility for oneself. That this needs to be explicitly stated is one more indictment of the modern ideology of gender flying under the big "F" brand name. Women apparently are not to be treated like adults: that appears to be the sarcastic underlying assumption of Kolodny's humor.

But now, let's return to her opinions on the propensities of boys and girls. The reason, unfortunately, that women have to safeguard themselves against rape – you know, as if they are adults — is because "boys will be boys" and they "Just can't help themselves."

That's right, if your son, your brother, or yourself happens to be male – he's not a human being, he's a rape-inclined animal, and only the careful guidance of a right-thinking feminist will prevent him from his inevitable realization of his "true nature": a violent sexual predator.

What is more devious about this formulation of hers, however, is that it's ultimately a lie. Kolodny would undoubtedly object and claim she doesn't believe men are "that way" by nature, but rather that they are socially conditioned to behave that way, and that the rest of her remarks are ironic or sarcastic. But our culture does not teach men that rape is OK, it has never taught men that. Since boys and men are not taught that rape is OK and never have been in this culture, the only reasonable conclusion she and those of her ideological ilk can therefore reach is that, whether the cause is “natural” or “socially constructed,” boys and men are inherently rapey and have to be taught otherwise.

This whole confusing ideological Gordion Knot of Kolodny’s fucktardery can be cut cleanly with one statement: she’s an ignorant bigot and only an ignorant bigot would say the things she’s saying, even supposedly in jest. Boys aren’t inherently rapey, and neither are they taught to be, you stupid bigoted asshole. All your garbage does is teach them to hate their natural sexuality and believe themselves to be potential rapists when the vast majority of them are not and never will be so inclined. In fact, news flash, you stupid bitch: even if you encouraged boys to rape, most of them would recoil and refuse.

Kolodny’s article continues on with her hatemongering bigotry with various admonitions and advice to be imparted to young men by their mothers, and possibly, if they were properly socialized, maybe even their fathers.

I have had quite enough of Carina Kolodny and every other fuck who subscribes to the ideology of gendered hatred she promotes. Fuck Kolodny’s open letter to the mothers of boys, and fuck every other vile, hateful garbage-spewing ideologue singing from the same songbook. My patience for those who heap hate, disdain and contempt on men and boys is exhausted. No, Social Justice Warriors, boys are not innately rapey, nor are they taught by our society to be rapey. Both are hateful, disgusting, deplorable lies, and fuck you for spreading either one of them.

There is really no point in further criticizing or attempting to converse with such hatred than to just identify it as what it is.

However, we do have a few suggestions to offer the mothers and fathers of boys growing up in what is now a feminist-dominated culture. Here’s a few words of advice on that score:

When you speak to your son, teach him that his identity is his own. It will be his own choice to be the man he wants to be. Not the man other people may demand him become because of his utility to them, or his convenient disposability, or his need to be shamed for things supposedly in his character that aren’t actually there. Teach him to beware of those who will confer an identity on him, especially in such a manner as Kolodny does. Tell him he is not a “good” man, nor a “bad” man, as both of those ideas are traps designed to control him. Those intellectual traps are for the convenience of those who disregard and even deny his fundamental humanity. If some stupid fuck tells you you’ve got a “rape switch” tell him to go to Hell. If some stupid fuck tells you your inconvenient erection means you’re “objectifying women” tell them to go fuck themselves. If someone tells you it’s your job to “stop rape,” tell them it’s their job to stop murder first and otherwise go fuck themselves.

You may also want to teach your son something he will never learn from this culture’s mainstream feminist narrative. Admittedly, he may figure this out himself, but why not give him a heads-up when he’s 10, rather than when he’s in his 30’s and sorts it out for himself? His sexuality, particularly his sexual desire, is his own. Nobody is entitled to it. No, he is not required to fuck just because a girl wants to. No, he is not inferior if he finds a particular girl (or boy) unattractive. No, he is not to be shamed if he has standards in women. No, his penis is not a dancing pony expected to fuck on demand. And his right to say “no” to a sexual encounter is every bit as vital and real as a girl’s right to the same.

This, of course, runs against the populist public narrative. In the popular narrative, it is not merely assumed that masculine sexuality is predatory, exploitive, and 95 other negative adjectives. It is also flatly assumed that the sexuality, and the sexual desire of men, is a public resource to be not merely condemned and criticized, but used as a lever of control over, either through direct exploitation or through shame.

Your son’s penis is not simply not a weapon, as it it characterized by mainstream propaganda. It is also an intimate part of a boy’s body to which nobody else has a right. He will be living in a world where women assume ownership of his sexuality and desire. The idea that a man is always on, always eager, that he really doesn’t even have a right of refusal, is common; that he has a right of refusal is something he isn’t even taught to consider. He should be taught to consider it in the face of a culture that endlessly suggests otehrwise.

Your sons should know that he should command his own sexual self-ownership. A few useful phrases for your son to add to his repertoire might include variations of “talk to the hand bitch”, and “look sweety, I’m not actually gay, but for tonight, you should assume I am.”

“My cock is fabulous, but do not ever assume you’re entitled to it, or entitled to my wallet for another of whatever sugary shit your drinking tonight.”

You might also want to convey to your son that nobody has any right to initiate violence against him. We’re all familiar with the common admonition to “never hit a woman.” This carries the implied, but false, implication that women can rightfully initiate violence against him. This includes feminine incitement to other compliant men acting on the behalf of members of the leisure caste. Your son will need to know explicitly that he has a right to his own integrity and freedom from coercion or other violence. Indeed, his explicit moral right to self defence even against members of “the weaker sex.” If a girl slaps him, he probably shouldn’t slap back (in a just world this would be allowed, but we don’t live in a just world), but he should never accept it and should probably forever terminate his relationship with any woman who does that to him.

Your son will also likely be bombarded by public messaging admonishing him to “respect women.”

Not respect people. Not respect other men. No. Just respect women. But of course, this doesn’t actually mean respect women as individuals, because individuals have to earn respect. No, the respect they mean is like the respect that Indian peasants were supposed to have toward white British colonialists: the “respect for women” they want is the respect of an inferior to a superior. Don’t give it to them. Real respect is something earned, not commanded by fiat. The common admonition to young boys to respect women is actually a command to demonstrate obeisance – while also invisibly acknowledging the fraudulent doctrinal conception of female-as-inferior. Why else would respect for individuals of a particular social caste require the common command for respect?

Aside from respecting the fundamental respect for basic rights and courtesy due to all human beings until they demonstrate otherwise, your son should only respect those who earn his respect. You should tell him to do so with or without instruction from public opinion-crafters. If the “respect” publicly propagandized to boys and men of “women” were the respect of humans as individuals with basic human rights, they would say “people,” and not merely the social caste “women.” Teach him to recognize this for what it is: a demand for unearned. And teach him that this hateful “respect for women” canard is all the proof he will ever need that feminists lie when they say “feminism is about equality.”

On the matter of sex between men and women, you might also want to acquaint your son with the increasing, absurd and amoral public ethic of feminine non-accountability.

This idea, increasingly popular, is that women, distinct from men, are held exempt from any concept of responsibility in matters sexual. This is important knowledge of the mine-field that gender ideologues have chosen to create for members of the disposable social caste to negotiate.

If your son makes any decision, or takes any action – whether drunk or sober – he will be held responsible for it. In the legal and popular culture today, this is the reality: a woman is – due to the ideology of her inferiority as a human – explicitly not a responsible actor in her own life. For example, if a man and woman are both intoxicated during a sexual encounter – SHE is a victim, and HE is a victimizer. Yeah, that makes sense, right? If two people are drunk, the one with a penis is automatically the rapist.

It doesn’t end there either. Increasingly, any withdrawl of her consent makes you her rapist, even if it’s days or even weeks later.

Your son, when he is very young, may not understand this. Most young children are actually far more rational than most adults. As young people, they are not yet acculturated to many of the widely accepted stupidities and insanities people like Carina Kolodny buy into and peddle to an unthinking public. So it will be up to you to teach him that

BECAUSE of MAGIC, or Fairies, or Wizards, or Aliens from planet X – that women are uniquely incapable of having opinions or making choices – particularly after drinking a grey goose martini.

Or, maybe just tell him that hateful bigoted nutjobs who think like this are in control, and he needs to be aware of it.

Your son, as he matures from a child into a sexually mature and active person, will be well-advised to demand evidence of mature accountability and self-responsibility from the women he allows into his life. We live in a world contorting reality into pretzels to exempt women from personal responsibility. It is rare to find those few women who demand their own realized adulthood, which includes personal responsibility. Your son will need a tool-kit to detect the real adults among a vast majority of female victim-toddlers whose irresponsible whims and moody tantrums are used to justify the suppression of the rights of others, and even justify violence on her behalf.

Such a toolkit is being developed by the various current practitioners of MGTOW – although details of the same are outside the scope of this discussion.

Advise your son to exclude women who fail these tests from his life.

Last but not least, while there may be many other important talks to have with your sons, you will also wish to discuss the various meanings and social values of words like “slut” and related terminology. As a parent taking on the task of describing sexual relationships in the real world of today you must remember that words like “slut,” “whore,” and even “rapist” take on different meanings when used by different people. If you can’t be honest about the real world with your child then you have no business engaging in such conversations. Leave that to others who are more capable.

“Slut” has several different meanings, three of which will be mentioned here:

The most currently popular of these is the use by gender ideologues of slut as a “positive” label. This is the reclamation by feminists of what they assert was once a condemning insult. In this application, it is claimed that slut means a sexually liberated, free-spirited and unashamed woman positively exercising her sexuality. Picture the proud self-identifying sluts of the emergent public parades known as “slut-walks” around the world. In reality, the term “slut” used in this context really means “grifter.” A self-identifying feminist slut is as sex-denying, as condemning, and as hatefully judgemental as a klansman opining on issues of the black community. Just ask a slut-walker if they’d like to go for a quick shag, and see that sluttiness precipitate into a shower of false outrage. “Sexually irresponsible jackass” might be another, more accurately descriptive, way to phrase it.

The term “slut” is also used to condemn a woman of truly open sexuality. But interestingly, this condemnation is often from another female. The sexual openness of one woman is, in this context, treated as de-valuing the woman offering that condemnation. This is also likely why among a certain subset of the feminist mainstream, sex-workers are criminalized and marginalized. Female prostitutes, by providing sexual access for a finite exchange of money, break the sexual trade-union of state feminism. A slut who, within the reasonable limits of hygiene personal capacity, will fuck just “anyone” (or the whole hockey team) is seen by sexually-withholding women as a threat to the control of the market.

The final use of the term “slut” to be mentioned here is the usage of the term by men. In this instance it is a term of admiration for women who place high value on honesty in their own sexual communication, as well as physical affection, openness and sexual disinhibition. This is by far the least-commonly used of the three different meanings of slut. But it is also a genuine term of admiration and affection – even among men who themselves are sexually insecure, or sexually cautious.

Related to the multi-definitioned term “slut” are two other words, namely “whore” and the aforementioned “grifter.” “Whore” of course is a much-misused term. Opportunist lawyers, politicians, attention seekers and other bottom feeding creatures are regularly labeled as whores, in an abuse of the word, and a failure to understand the nature of actual pay-for-sex merchants. Actual whores – of the type practicing their business honestly, are arguably a valuable part of their community. They provide a useful service, often under very difficult conditions. Much of the world still criminalizes the independent practice of sex for money, creating a criminalized environment of escalated harm for sexual service providers as well as their customers.

“Grifter” is of course a term somewhat out of fashion in modern usage. This may be because the practice of grifting so closely resembles what is the populist ethical practice of sex, and manipulation through access control.

A fourth term, “rapist,” is perhaps the most troubling of these terms. Among the gender ideologues presently dominating public narrative – like Carina Kolodny – a rapist is any man who is labeled one based on no more than the whim of a female accuser. The term once meant a sexual criminal, including women sexually abusing minors or anyone else who couldn’t reasonably consent to sex. However, “rape,” while it retains the powerful stigma and condemnation of violent sexual victimization is increasingly coming to mean any sexual activity in which a member of the disposable sex participates.

The disposable sex being you, my son.

But of course, in the practice of parenting – particularly of boys, these are just a few of the talks a responsible and loving parent will have to have. It is boys now being raised with an awareness of this culture’s need to control them through shame and coercion who will grow into men who cannot be controlled, or manipulated to their own self-destructive utility to others.

What the gender ideology of State Feminism always promised, namely a humanitarian, equalist society, is coming. But it is not coming from feminism. Even so, it’s coming with the inevitability of gravity, and it will be boys going their own way – and the men they become who bring it. These men, some of whom exist now as MGTOWs, are not men allowing themselves to be defined by their utility, or by their approval by women. They are not the tamed lap dogs that even radical feminists privately find repulsive just as they publicly demand continued male obedience.

It is not the point of this article to establish the thesis that boys are not naturally any of the evils routinely heaped onto them as if defining masculine identity. For the real parents of boys, this simple reality requires no exposition except for you to explain to them that the popular narrative lies about them and subjects them to unearned hate, to to teach them to be aware of it without accepting the hate. The talks you, the parent of a boy will have, will arm him to defend against the self-hatred they want him to absorb, and arm him to be ready to define himself by his own compass, and to armour himself against a poisonous wind which would warp him into a man of conditional identity rather than sovereign adulthood.

Your son should know that a boy taught to be a “good man” by feminist standards is one whose public personhood depends on consensus of utility and approval by dysfunctional women and their lapdogs. His identity to them is dependent, and referential. A “real man” is based on the (stated or unstated) agreement of his mother’s friends. And boys raised by mothers to be these pleasing slaves, so that they may one day be approved of by their female contemporaries, eventually becoming the cooperative beasts of burden we typically call husbands and fathers. Do your son a favour and teach him not to allow himself to become a compliant servant of men and women who would use him as a disposable utility.

Finally, teach your boy to use his own best judgement, and to seek only the counsel of those who first prove that they believe he is a sovereign adult and that women should be treated as no less and no more than that. Otherwise, teach him to beware those who would confer on him any identity he himself does not gladly accept or, better yet, craft for himself.

Teach him also of the ideologues who hate him based only on an aspect of biology, and to recognize them. And let him learn to fuck their shit up.

ElevatorPress: How Feminists are Making Their Move on the WordPress Community

Paul Elam · 10 January 2014 · Archived copy · Original

WordPress geeks won't be able to say that I didn't warn them. Their friendly and quite frankly remarkable open source community is about take a very serious turn into turmoil, thanks to feminist ideologues.

We have already seen this happen in the atheist/skeptic movement with the likes of Rebecca Watson, PZ Myers, et al, and with the gaming community's interloper-in-chief, Anita Sarkeesian. Other components of the tech industry have been similarly targeted. Think Adria Richards of Donglegate fame. The feminists are coming in to co-opt and to dominate. And the result will undoubtedly be the same. There will be disharmony, warring factions and the resultant stagnation of purpose that comes with it.

They are even approaching this with the same M.O.. First, set up the victim narrative; create a crisis for women that literally does not exist. This is done by a small number of very vocal ideological women who claim to be victims, and who need "special" enforcement of even more "special" rules, in order to make them feel safe and welcome (because we all know that women are not welcome anywhere, especially by men, right?). Then, of course, the idea is to punish anyone who disagrees with them with demonization and ostracizing.

The white knights in any given community, seeking female approval and an ego boost, will ride in and do the heavy lifting for them, demanding that the community in question bend to their demands for the sake of decency and everything holy.

As always, the ultimate objective is not enhanced safety, but control; control of language, control of rules and ultimately control of everyone's thinking.

In fact, the very first, but completely unmistakable signs of this happening have already begun in the WordPress community. Further research may uncover more information, but for now I suggest that members of the WordPress community can mark January 7, 2014 on their calendars as the day the effort to undermine their community started.

It begins with a piece by Stephanie Leary writing in Women of WordPress, "How to Report Harassment at WordCamps." WordCamps are are regular conferences/social events attracting WordPress users and developers. They are highly informal affairs which Leary wastes no time redefining, saying, "[T]hey are in a sense our workplace."

Of course, we all know that harassment in the workplace is totally unacceptable, don't we?

Leary needed an attention grabbing bit of foulness to convince others of the egregious sexual harassment happening to women at WordCamps. Her only problem was that she did not have one to cite. So, she borrowed a case from another community, science-fiction buffs, and used a year old story of a sci-fi fan who alleged that there was a serial harasser in their midst.

Very compelling if you don't require evidence. Not that this sort of thing does not happen, but just saying.

As to her own community, the one she now wants to rouse to action, her investigation there yielded a "couple of people who'd experienced minor harassment but hadn't reported it to the organizers."

That is literally all she had, but it was enough to set the chain of events we have seen so many times before in action. First, and so predictable, a white knight was quick to respond. The very first comment on her article was from someone named Alex Vasquez.

"It's sad, yet not surprising," he said, apparently of the couple of minor alleged incidents that were not reported, "that we have to account for things like this at WordCamps."

Leary was quick to come back and thank Alex for being so gallant. The rest of the comments were quite supportive.

Calls to name and shame (with one exception concerned about libel) formed the group consensus.

But of course, it did not stop there.

Just yesterday, Sarah Gooding of WPTavern chimed in and escalated the conversation, with her offering, "Cultivating a Culture of Respect in the WordPress Community."

If you think that has a distinct social justice warrior ring to it, just wait till you read it. It is straight from the Rebecca Watson handbook, complete with a call for designating safety officers so that women will have someone to whom they can report their "harassers."

No potential for abuse there.

After advising us of "a few incidents of [uncited] harassment," that have "popped up" in their community, Gooding lets us know that they now have a "movement to create a Code of Conduct or set of Community Expectations." That task is being handled by one Jen Mylo, who is heading up their "Community Expectations," team. She brings with her the predictable mindset, especially in her concerns about "people who've never thought about what it's like to be a member of a minority or anything other than able bodied/financiallystable/caucasian/American/male/heterosexual/bearded/whatever-the-majority-is might not realize how unwelcoming some language or imagery may be to those who are different."

Do you hear that you insulated, unthinking, privileged straight male neckbeards? Your training, excuse me, your code of conduct (it applies to no one else), on making women feel warm and welcome is on the way. And if you don't think that you will toe the line, and roll over when instructed, you better ask around.

As we have seen in other communities, the initial dissent was also quick to appear. Raelene Wilson at wmpudev quickly penned a response to Gooding, stating that the idea of security offices designated to handle unwanted advances is "ridiculously over the top."

"Come on," she asks, "are we in high school?"

No, Raelene, but if your community yields to this nonsense, you will wish you were. The standard of the infantilized woman is on the way to WordPress. And it will cause more damage than I can possibly describe.

But don't take my word for it. After all, I am just a crazy men's rights guy. I wear a tin foil hat and see feminist evil under every rock (when I am not snickering, twirling my mustache and trying to relegate women back to the kitchen).

No, I am not someone you should listen to at all. But perhaps you should spend a little time investigating what has happened in the atheist/skeptic community, as well as in gaming and other tech sectors after feminists asserted the victim narrative and started making demands in those communities.

That is what is in store for the WordPress community right now.

If, on the outside chance, you do that investigation, and it understandably raises some hair on the back of your neck; if you don't want to see the same thing happen to a community that you now obviously feel connected to, then the solution is for you to talk to your male counterparts, and to do it quickly.

You see, those guys stepping up to pat the showboating victims on the head, who puff out their chests and do the Dudley Do-Right for those poor little girls that can't handle an unwanted come on, those are your real problem. They are the stalwarts for turning you into a child. It makes them feel like a real man™

Shut them down and you shut down the attack. Yes, it is an attack, on your community. And no one can shut them down as well as a woman. In fact, the only people that can shut them down are women. When men try to do it, those obsequious saps only see it as an opportunity to prove how brave and manly they are. That makes the battle intensify, for some taking on the appearance of a conflict between men and women. That is precisely what the ideologues want, and if they get it they will win, every time.

The only way to prevent that is to tell those men, pointedly, that you are insulted by their assumption that you can't take care of yourself. After all, it is insulting, is it not? And while you are at it, keep telling those ideologues that they don't speak for you or the other adult females in the room.

Yours is not the first community to experience this problem, but if the women in your ranks who have agency and autonomy take a stand, you might be one of the last.

DEMCAD & Robert O'Hara on Anti-Male Bias in Education, False Rape Accusations & Sex Double Standards

AVfM Video Source · 11 January 2014 · Archived copy · Original

AVfM's News Director Robert O'Hara recently sat down for an extended chat with Libertarian Reginald Kaigler on his DEMCAD channel about a number of important issues.

You can subscribe to Reginald's DEMCAD channel here.

Contribution and kids

Clint Carpentier · 11 January 2014 · Archived copy · Original

I was standing there at my job site, an utter hellhole which had never been ready for my contribution to the renovations; I'm a flooring installer, and I require the general construction to be complete before I add my professional touches for the leisure class; needless to say, the renovations hadn't even begun, but I didn't know this at the time; it turned into an utter sideshow of agony, akin to trying to have sex while giving birth; why would you do such a thing?

It started out innocently enough, the guy was going to remove two hallway closets, a bedroom closet, and use the space to expand the bathroom. As all the necessary spaces were in the same area, and somewhat out of the way, it wasn't terribly inconvenient; but it cost me two days of prep-work, because I had to prep two halves of the house at separate times, and being an hour drive from home, this it also cost me in gas. It snowballed from there, going from changing the direction of the vinyl plank to diagonal, to ripping out drywall in an area I was about to enter. What would have been a two week job, turned into a four week job stretched over two months; and the only reasons I kept plugging away at it was, I needed the work (usually not a major driving factor in my tolerance for retardation, but…), and the guy's wife was due to give birth and they were hoping to be moved in before that happened… it didn't.

So there I am, at the final stage, the most ignorant part of the job without the rest of the hang-ups involved, ready to burn the house down, smoking a cancer stick and staring at the chains on my van which were required to get up the icy driveway. It dawns on me the inane importance of having kids; I have three of my own, all girls (guess I'm not man enough to have a boy), and I'm pragmatic enough to understand that those girls will be my only real contribution to humanity. In my job, I bust my body all day, not for my customers necessity, but for their luxury; my customers literally walk all over my best work, and there's no real benefit to them that I do this; unlike carpenters, plumbers or electricians, my customers won't suffer by making do with plywood floors.

I'm reminded of a little fridge magnet my mother has which has a charming feminist sound bite, "Well behaved women rarely make history." This of course brings to mind several connotations that the feminist who wrote it didn't think about; first, that neither do well behaved men; second, in order to make history, you actually have to DO something, either for or against humanity; third, most people don't care to make history even when the opportunity is handed to them, more often than not, they make history by accident.

There will never be a flooring emergency which I will miraculously solve in the dead of the night in forty below weather, which will somehow save lives; nor will I ever acquire the skills necessary to solve some great humanity mystery. I will never do the flooring in the White House, Buckingham Palace, Parliament Hill, or even so much as a three star hotel. My job is one of invisible luxury, in which case, should I be doing my job in the house of anyone of any sort of fame, they will never know who did the floors, only that something doesn't seem quite perfect enough for them to tread upon. So much for the down sides, Patriarchy hurts men too, right.

So why is it I actually do my job. First and foremost, every job is different, therefore it's a constant challenge; even cookie-cutter homes are slightly different. Second, it keeps me in reasonable shape, maybe not "good health", but that's mainly due to other life choices (smoking and energy conservation). Third, I work in women's houses; people ask "who controls the money" well, who chose the color of the floor, it ain't cheap, and neither am I; as an added bonus, I have a foot fetish, and women are comfortable being barefoot at home; I've also had some experiences that any blue piller would envy, but would suck the breath from any sane red piller. Fourth, it puts food on the table; when there isn't a recession, I make damn good money, which exacts a hard toll on my body (if women are "taking over" during a recession, why am >I< not working?

Because the money they use to afford me, come from husbands pockets). Finally the fifth reason, it's a happy medium; it's above the minimum wage status, yet below the responsible status; that is to say, I won't be viewed as someone stuck in a "no-where job" at some fast-food joint or gas jockeying, or packing groceries; but I'm also not responsible for any flaws which may endanger the inhabitants of the house after I'm gone: carpenters build houses which hover over the homeowners, plumbers install pipes which will hold water in lines hidden in and under the house, and electricians install inherently dangerous wires in all the walls and floors and ceilings, and those trades are responsible for any "accidents" which happen after; I… am responsible for something peeling up off the floor and scratching a toe, yet I will hear more grief about how my job looks, than any of those guys together, cuzz cosmetics are of almighty importance, but a cheap plastic shower stall is… "prudent stinginess".

So now I've assessed my worth to civilization and humanity in general as little more than a sperm donor and parasite feeder; yay me. The sad thing is, this is the reality for most men in general; our greatest contribution to humanity, having kids and ~~raising them~~ enabling adulthood. Even IF, through some miracle of "good parenting" we inflict the next great mind which MAY change the world as we know it, we will be nothing more than a footnote as "son/daughter of Mr and Mrs who cares…"; yet that is good enough for us, we can wear that with pride, "that's my child!"

The people, who have impacted the world the most, have had few – if any – kids of their own. It seems strange to me, that a man's life can be summed up as such, "I made it to old age, I paid my taxes, and I've had kids." I'm not knocking kids, I love my three girls and hope the best for them, they are my… everything; there's no other way to state it, they are literally, the sum total of my contribution – as just another cog – to humanity, and that's just plain reality.

When I came to this realization, as I flicked my butt across the icy driveway, my heart sank. It's not that I'm ashamed of amounting to very little; I'm pragmatic enough to understand that the world can only handle so many Albert Einsteins, Nelson Mandelas, Richard Dawkins', etc. No, it's because us cogs, whose only contribution is our kids, who are willing to invest our blood sweat and lives, to ensure those kids see adulthood with the best chance we have the means to provide. Those kids are the very weapons which can be used to decimate us in a matter of heartbeats; for blue pillers, it is abject blindness that they have kids in the quantity that they do; for us red pillers, it is profound courage under a Sword of Damocles.

An interesting tale that; The Sword of Damocles. Damocles was pandering the fortune of the tyrant Dionysius, who offered up his throne; Damocles eagerly accepted, but Dionysius had a sword hung over the throne by a horse hair; Damocles soon gave the throne back as "too much fortune for such a humble man as himself". A powerful story for the MGTOW community.

I am saddened, that so many women would eagerly cut the horse hair on a whim. Not only would they cut it without a moment's thought, but ridicule the man's demise; and then have the gall to wonder why other men aren't rushing up to replace him, and shaming them for not having the balls to meet her desires.

And yet, while kids become the shackles and tools of torture and execution for women to use against men, they represent a life "do-over" for women. What I mean to say is, no matter how terrible the life choices a woman makes, when she has a kid, it's like she's considered to be reborn; tools of her redemption, to remake their mother's lives. I don't get it. I remember often hearing "kids are blessings from god"; and when I still believed, I always wondered why nuns never had children, and yet the sewage of society bathed in brats.

I can understand why men would risk their lives for their children, after all, they are in fact, their lives, the whole point of their continued existence. What I can't understand, is how we let our kids become the legislated tools of women; kids are kids, not tools… aren't they?

Gender feminism: the approaching crisis

Mike Buchanan · 11 January 2014 · Archived copy · Original

A young gender feminist blogger, Ellie Slee, recently wrote a blog piece containing a false allegation about J4MB. It was published by The Huffington Post. I politely pointed out to her that the allegation was demonstrably false, but as I'd anticipated – because she's a gender feminist – she was willing to neither retract the statement, nor apologise for it. I contacted the legal team at AOL – HuffPo's parent company – and the offending allegation was swiftly retracted.

Impressed by the professionalism with which the matter had been handled – given HuffPo's business model, I feel confident they weren't aware of the misleading statement in advance of publication – I was intrigued to get a call from a supporter suggesting I offer blog pieces to HuffPo. It's well-known for being left-leaning so I doubted they'd publish any pieces from me, but I got in touch anyway. The lady there was very polite, and asked me to submit a piece for consideration. I duly submitted an 800-word piece, as requested. Like all short articles, it took a surprisingly long time to write. It takes so much less time to write a long article.

I then had an exchange of emails with the polite lady, and it soon became evident that the changes she required to make it acceptable for publication by HuffPo were such that I wouldn't be prepared to put my name to the piece. But having spent time writing it, I thought the least I should do was publish it elsewhere. So here it is, modified only with an expanded 'author biography':

Gender feminism – the approaching crisis

I lead the British political party which campaigns for the human rights of men and boys; Justice for men & boys (and the women who love them).[1] Their rights have been increasingly assaulted by the actions and inactions of the state for 30+years, although British men collectively pay 72% of the income tax collected in the UK, and women only 28%.[2]

In our public consultation document[3] – the precursor to our 2015 general election manifesto – we cover 20 areas where men and/or boys are disadvantaged, generally to advantage women and/or girls. They include fathers' access to children following relationship breakdowns, legislation, education, welfare, employment, family support, marriage and divorce, domestic abuse, healthcare, the justice system, the business sector, homelessness, suicide prevention, and male genital mutilation ('MGM'). We've repeatedly asked feminists to point to areas where the state disadvantages women and/or girls. They've collectively come up with nothing.

In Who Stole Feminism? How Women Have Betrayed Women, first published in 1994, the American feminist Christina Hoff Sommers made a distinction between 'equity' feminists such as herself, and 'gender' feminists. Another American feminist, Camille Paglia, wrote in Vamps and Tramps that the book '… uses ingenious detective work to unmask the shocking fraud and propaganda of establishment feminism.'

Hoff Sommers defines equity feminists as people (not always women) who believe in equality of opportunity, and equality under the law. The vast majority of people who self-identify as feminists are equity feminists, and while I wouldn't identify as a feminist, I believe in those things too.

In stark contrast gender feminists (not always women) strive for female supremacy, regardless of the consequences. They're driven by misandry – the hatred of men. Gender feminism has been a defining ideology of the political and other classes in the UK for 30+ years. Under David Cameron's leadership the government is progressing all the gender feminist agendas of the 1997-2010 Labour administrations.

Gender feminist narratives consist of conspiracy theories, fantasies, lies, delusions and myths, which become 'public knowledge' through endless repetition. Compare what you believe to be true about Domestic Abuse/violence ('DA') with a few facts:

1. Around 300 international studies show that women are as physically aggressive, or more aggressive, than men with respect to intimate partners.[4]

2. 40% of DA victims are male.[5]

3. Where one sex is the sole perpetrator of DA, it's more likely to be a woman than a man.[6]

4. Only 4% of female perpetrators of DA report self-defence as their motivation.[6]

Despite these facts, state support for male victims of DA is close to non-existent.

For the past 30+ years in the UK gender feminists have been assaulting almost every pillar of civilised society. The mainstream media in the UK – press, radio and television – haven't provided any in-depth accounts of the impact of gender feminism over that period. It's hardly surprising that most people don't yet 'connect the dots', but public consciousness is growing rapidly.

Gender feminists are immune to rational challenging, and shamelessly refuse to retract misleading statements they've make in the media. Their most outrageous claims are accepted at face value by journalists and interviewers. Our list of gender feminists caught making misleading statements and refusing to retract them in response to our public challenges is lengthy[7] and includes Kat Banyard,[8] Caroline Criado-Perez,[9] and Janet Street-Porter.[10]

For decades gender feminists have used shaming tactics to silence men, but their tactics are powerless against the rapidly growing army of Men's Human Rights Advocates (MHRAs). They present MHRAs as misogynists, sexists, rape deniers… in short, they lie. It's their default tactic.

Gender feminists are facing a crisis. They're being challenged not only by men, but also by women, who are rejecting gender feminists' claims to speak and act on their behalf. Mothers are angry at the education system's treatment of their sons. Women in general are recognising gender feminists as men-hating ideologues, and an increasing number – notably university students – see feminism as an outdated term.[11]

We're seeing the emergence of 'Honey Badgers', women self-identifying as MHRAs. They're fiercely intelligent and independent-minded. One of the best-known is Karen Straughan ('GirlWritesWhat') a Canadian. Her YouTube video library[12] demolishes gender feminist narratives.

I recommend you subscribe (no cost) to the American website A Voice for Men,[13] the most-visited (and most influential) men's human rights advocacy website in the world. The site features articles (my own 15 are here)[14] – videos, and radio shows by many MHRAs including the Honey Badgers Erin Pizzey,[15] Karen Straughan,[12] Janet Bloomfield,[16] Diana Davison, Della Burton, Alison Tieman, Dr Tara J Palmatier,[17] Anja Eriud[18] … By subscribing to AVfM you'll have a front-row seat from which to witness the approaching war between men and women jointly driven by concerns about human rights, and female supremacists driven by hatred of men. Which side will you choose?

If you're now in need of some light relief, try this.[19]

Author biography

Mike Buchanan is a men's human rights advocate and leads the political party Justice for men & boys (and the women who love them).[1] He also leads:

►Anti-Feminism League[20]
►Campaign for Merit in Business[21]
►Alternative Sexism Project[22]

He owns the self-publishing company LPS Publishing[23] and has written nine books including:

Feminism: the ugly truth (2012)

The Glass Ceiling Delusion: the real reasons more women don't reach senior positions (2011)
David and Goliatha: David Cameron – heir to Harman? (2010)

References

[1] http://j4mb.org.uk
[2] http://www.avoiceformen.com/feminism/government-tyranny/he-who-pays-the-piper-calls-the-tune-or-does-he/
[3] http://j4mb.wordpress.com/our-public-consultation-exercise-2/
[4] http://j4mb.wordpress.com/2013/05/08/women-are-as-physically-aggressive-or-more-aggressive-in-their-relationships-with-spouses-or-male-partners/
[5] http://mankind.org.uk/factsmalevicitms.html
[6] Dr Nicola Graham-Kevan, University of Central Lancashire, 'Female perpetrators of intimate partner violence' – paper presented at the 2013 National Conference on Male Victims of Domestic Violence.
[7] http://j4mb.wordpress.com/our-public-challenges-to-feminists/
[8] http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=3R3fMxygLXw
[9] http://j4mb.wordpress.com/2013/08/25/caroline-criado-perez-is-asking-the-media-to-fact-check-no-seriously-she-is/
[10] http://j4mb.wordpress.com/2013/10/07/our-public-challenge-to-janet-street-porter/
[11] http://www.palatinate.org.uk/?p=44069
[12] http://youtube.com/user/girlwriteswhat
[13] http://avoiceformen.com
[14] http://www.avoiceformen.com/author/mikebuchanan1957/
[15] http://erinpizzey.com
[16] http://judgybitch.com
[17] http://shrink4men.com
[18] http://mensrightsarehumanrights.wordpress.com
[19] http://youtube.com/watch?v=EakCqdkSoPs
[20] http://fightingfeminism.wordpress.com
[21] http://c4mb.wordpress.com
[22] http://thealternatvesexismproject.wordpress.com
[23] http://lpspublishing.co.uk

What if the U.S. government spent nearly $1,000,000 bucks to promote and study porn?

Hannah Wallen · 11 January 2014 · Archived copy · Original

What if said funding, provided to an endeavor called the Everyday Erotica Project, were to cover the following:

- a feature-length documentary, Between the Sheets, for international television broadcast, focusing on the global community of erotic visual media viewers, writers, directors, actors, and crew
- an interactive, content-rich website allowing the website's users to see erotic visual media in a broad context across time and space
- an academic symposium on the past and future of erotic visual media hosted by the American Folklife Center at the Library of Congress
- a nationwide series of theater programs dealing with the past, present, and future of erotic visual media, plus a traveling exhibit, organized by the Adult Film Association of America

What if the project description glorified erotic visual media and the businesses surrounding its consumption?

What if the project description laid out a plan to "bring together disparate groups of scholars, writers, viewers, editors, erotic visual media fans, and the general public, to launch an entertaining, substantive, lively discussion about how everyday erotica is created, who consumes it, and how it helps to shape private lives and public cultures?" Wouldn't that sound a bit like federally funded pornography creation and promotion, and industry networking, all thinly disguised as academic study?

Do you think there might be a bit of public outcry regarding that spending?

Would people not question the point of federal involvement in the porn industry?

Would the argument not be made that there's not sufficient benefit to the U.S. population to justify federal funding for such an endeavor?

Would feminists not loudly question why women's hard-earned tax dollars should go toward paying for what amounts to glorification of and support for sexual entertainment for men?

Of course they would.

There would be hell to pay, and probably a lot of shaming thrown in for good measure. How dare the patriarchal overlords fund such a one-sided project? How dare they throw women's money at behaviors to which many women strongly object?

And for at least some reasons, they'd be right. Such funding which would not be in the interest of the general population. Federal money shouldn't be spent on something so unnecessary – so frivolous – not because a portion of the population finds it abhorrent, but because it's not a national need. It's entertainment, and private commerce. If such a project were conceived, it would and should be up to the industry to fund it.

So what if we replace "porn" with "romance novels?"

Now you have a real government funded program. The Popular Romance Project is Wastebook 2013's 3rd item, with spending listed at $914,000. Other funding for the project was provided by Mass Humanities, Romance Writers of America, Tavris Fund at Brandeis University/Women's Studies Research Center and donors to a Kickstarter campaign.

Take everything I've written above about the Everyday Erotica project, substitute the reference to romance and romance novels for every place where I mentioned erotic visual media, and you have the gist of it. According to its website, the Popular Romance Project "will explore the fascinating, often contradictory origins and influences of popular romance as told in novels, films, comics, advice books, songs, and internet fan fiction, taking a global perspective—while looking back across time as far as the ancient Greeks." The feature-length documentary will be called "Love Between the Covers." The academic symposium will be hosted by the Library of Congress Center for the Book. A nationwide series of library programs will be organized by the American Library Association.

This is no less wasteful or sexist than it would be for the government to fund a project to promote and study porn, and politicians in the U.S. would know better than to even try. In fact, according to former Library of Congress curator Ralph Whittington, the Library collects nearly everything (including phone books) but not porn. Yet the National Endowment for the Humanities had no problem throwing nearly a million dollars at a project centered around material which is nothing but sexual entertainment for women.

Of course, there are those who will cry, "But this is different! This is sophisticated. Porn encourages the objectification of women! Romance novels don't do that!"

Of course, they do.

Every complaint feminists make about pornographic portrayals of women can be made about portrayals of men in romance novels written with women as the target audience; they promote in women unrealistic standards of male aesthetics, unrealistic expectations, and an unrealistic and exploitative attitude toward men. If one argues that these portrayals have little or no effect on the female reader's relationship with men, then one has no business making claims related to portrayals of women in pornography.

The difference isn't in the effects or validity of the material. It's a gaping double standard within society's attitude toward the aspect of the target audience which makes these media entertaining to them: their sexuality. Male sexuality is treated as aggressive and controlling, and women in heterosexual interactions are generally seen as being acted upon by the men they're with, rather than as participants in a mutual experience. Therefore, sexually suggestive or explicit entertainment for men must be treated as dirty, shameful, and exploitative, and hidden away from public view. On the other hand, female sexuality is treated as valuable and important. Important enough that even a woman's most mundane effort at heterosexual interaction is treated as a favor or prize offered to the man involved. Important enough for the National Endowment for the Humanities to tuck nearly a million taxpayer dollars between the collective straight female population's lascivious… covers.

Feminists complain that women are slut-shamed for expressing their sexual needs whilst men's sexuality is celebrated, yet the stark difference in social and official response to gender-targeted sexual entertainment tells an entirely different story.

Paul Elam vs Michael Flood on Male Studies

AVfM Video Source · 12 January 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Michael Flood makes a cute little case for himself on why no one but feminist ideologues should be allowed to study men and masculinity. PE

Does Metro News support Holocaust Deniers?

AVfM Video Source · 12 January 2014 · Archived copy · Original

We’re not saying Omar Mouallem of Canada’s Metro News is a Holocaust Denier, nor for that matter that Dr. Cristina Stasia is secretly a supporter of the Ku Klux Klan. However, based on the evidentiary standards of Metro News up in Canada, we have to say that with such serious allegations, well… questions must be asked. For more, please see this important report from Nick Reading, Karen Straughan, and Men’s Rights Edmonton:

The creator of ManWomanMyth returns!

AVfM Video Source · 12 January 2014 · Archived copy · Original

It appears that he'll be taking a new direction and a slightly new focus, but one of the best of the best has returned:

Subscribe to his new channel. Right here.

This is a day to remember

Paul Elam · 12 January 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Tory Shepherd, an Australian "journalist," with a long time reputation for libel and publishing falsehoods, has just spearheaded the expected ideological attack on the Male Studies initiative that was to launch at the University of South Australia in the near future.

http://m.adelaidenow.com.au/news/south-australia/lecturers-in-worldfirst-male-studies-course-at-university-of-south-australia-under-scrutiny/story-fni6uo1m-1226800150348

Sources close to the story report that this is likely a terminal setback for the new initiative which would have helped academicians better investigate and understand problems like male suicide, depression and educational failure.

The article by Shepherd is saturated with the typical lies, e.g.: that the SPLC named AVFM as a hate group, which they did not, and that this website regularly calls women "bitches and whores," which it does not. She also implied a connection between AVFM and those championing the initiative which does not exist.

In writing this article Shepherd actually served as a mouthpiece for academic feminists invested in blocking the attempt to study human males in a non-ideological, scholarly fashion. Most of you will not be surprised to see Michael Flood's name among the critics.

It is yet another example of the fascism that now typifies the feminist establishment, and as such of course it will result in more who are overtly hostile to that fascism, which is now all but synonymous with their cause. That will happen even as they repress moderate, academically oriented individuals simply concerned about the issues facing men and boys.

It is another very, very dumb move from very, very corrupt people.

The Men's Human Rights Movement is not going to go away. Indeed, even as we regret the temporary setback of an important and valuable initiative, we do welcome another opportunity to shine a light on the ideologically twisted agenda of people who would undermine an academic program with the ambition to enhance our understanding of an egregiously underserved population.

This type of bullying and public deception is precisely what has catapulted the Men's Human Rights Movement into rapid growth and increasing popularity in such a short period of time. From assaultive, criminal demonstrators in Toronto blocking doors to a lecture on male suicide, to this – an obviously orchestrated attack on honorable academicians — the reality of what feminism has become, and the depths to which it has lowered, is again in full public view.

There will be other similar setbacks in the future. That is the brutal truth of the matter. As we know, feminist ideologues are well placed with the luxury of great control. But while this is clearly an exercise in their power, it is an exercise in power that is waning.

Now, and in the future, they will only be successful in their attacks against supporters of men and boys who hold the most promise for the non-acrimonious advancement of the issues. They will only cower and stop those who will be cowered and stopped, clearing the way for those who will not.

We have seen this pattern before in every civil rights movement in history. They will persecute those who would work with them, till what is left are those who will not.

Men's rights is an idea whose time has come. The desperate and despicable actions of those holding to power will not stop it. Indeed, they will only accelerate the process of their own eventual downfall.

We will force their hand, again and again. And each time they demonstrate their moral bankruptcy; their limitless capacity for tyranny, the more they will generate the contempt and indignation they deserve. And the more people will realize that the only way forward is straight through them.

Today, we moved one step closer to that day.

Through the feminist looking glass

Diana Davison · 12 January 2014 · Archived copy · Original

> "If I had a world of my own, everything would be nonsense. Nothing would be what it is, because everything would be what it isn't. And contrary wise, what is, it wouldn't be. And what it wouldn't be, it would. You see?" ~Lewis Carroll, Alice's Adventures in Wonderland

Only a world crafted by feminists could be so surreal.

And so we awake in a strange room full many doors of different sizes. A bottle labelled "drink me" and a platter of small feminist patty cakes promises to help us on our journey but it is only through ingesting these sketchy offerings that we may discover where each door leads: Truly a world of nonsense.

Let us begin as an anonymous traveller.

Anonymity can be a noble state; the right to which is considered highly valuable in a free country. Nobility itself is the question at stake as, trapped in the room, we take a drink and shrink to the size of an ethernet cable in order to step through door number one.

As the gateway slides shut behind, the ground gives out and we are falling. The vastness of the internet twists and turns with endless possibilities yet with every click of the (Dor)mouse we land at a mad tea party in which some woman is afraid of getting raped. At this party, it is always six o'clock, someone is always getting scared of turning on their computer and, when the cups are empty, everyone just moves to the next chair and it's six o'clock all over again.

The Mad Hatter gleefully pours more tea.

A riddle is posed: "Why are women targeted for more harassment on the internet?"

"They aren't," we reply.

"That's just your white male privilege," says the March Hare.

> Some argue that racial and gender harassment are part and parcel of participation in online discourse. As one white man commented on my prior post: "Welcome to the jungle . . . . If you want to have a voice . . . just do what we have been doing for over a decade and laugh it off." (In context, "we" meant "white men.") Of course, it's easy to talk about "laughing it off" when, because of your status as a white man, you're virtually never the target of identity-based harassment that deploys historically subordinate or marginalized status as a silencing tool.

When we try to explain that online harassment is based on convenience and laziness, not on race or gender, everyone stands up and switches chairs again. Trying to keep up a dialogue, we attempt to point out that calling all dissenters "white men" perpetrates the very act the author purports to be fighting but the clock faithfully strikes six again and the table is too circular and shifty to recognize hypocrisy.

A wisp of smoke drifts through the air and, hoping it is a puff of logic, we follow the scent. A caterpillar lounges atop a mushroom, drawing on his hookah pipe, and tells us "Internet anonymity is passé." Confused, we wonder if passé has another meaning in this strange world.

"Really? I thought the 'hacktivist' group Anonymous were the vigilante public hero 'rape culture' destroyers the feminists have been dreaming of." We wait, brows knitted, for an explanation.

"Yes, but they turned on us. And now the internet is bad again." The caterpillar exhales a long, heavy plume and the smoke grows thick enough to make our eyes water.

"…Everybody knows anonymity leads to bad behaviour!"

The caterpillar's laughter echoes after us as we stumble backwards into darkness and find ourselves back in the room with many doors. The carpet is now emblazoned with text outlining the sins of anonymity and the writing is clear:

DISSOCIATIVE ANONYMITY
Anonymity allows people to separate their actions from their real lives.

INVISIBILITY
Not facing people directly gives courage to perform uncharacteristic acts

ASYNCHRONICITY
Lack of real time interaction makes it feel 'safer' to act uncharacteristically

SOLIPSISTIC INTROJECTION
Absent face-to-face communication, people believe they know what others are thinking as if reading minds.

DISSOCIATIVE IMAGINATION
People feel they can leave behind the anonymous self and thus lack responsibility.

MINIMIZATION OF STATUS AND AUTHORITY
Authority figures are less relevant when people feel removed from them and protected by anonymity.

INDIVIDUAL DIFFERENCES AND PREDISPOSITIONS
Some personalities are more susceptible to acting out when offered anonymity.

SHIFTS AMONG INTRAPSYCHIC CONSTELLATIONS
Anonymous people may feel like their "true self" when given freedom to act without consequence.

Still absorbing the information, we near the legs of the table in the middle of the room where the carpet assures us these things are well known.

Mulling over our new found knowledge and feeling quite small, we find a bright pink ladder and climb until we reach the table top to partake of some high intensity feminist patty cakes. The transformation is quite astounding. As an anonymous and chastised person we find ourselves growing incredibly large at an astounding rate. With our new, enhanced size we open door number two and find our anonymous self in a court room. A very different scene ensues.

"OFF WITH HIS HEAD!" The Queen gorges herself on some tarts while glaring with menace at the accused before her. The trial has just begun and the whole room seems to cower before the bench.

"Shall I not get a defence?" The man dares to entertain a moment of hopefulness.

There is a brief conference and the Queen begrudgingly asks him to present his evidence.

There is some confusion as the man can't say who he is accused of harming. As the anonymous figure in the room, we discover that we are, in fact, the victim.

Apparently, we have been heinously raped and don't remember. Thankfully we have our anonymous online friends to help us figure out what happened.

> I don't remember the assault – does that mean it isn't rape?
> Just because you don't remember being assaulted doesn't necessarily mean it didn't happen and that it wasn't rape. Memory loss can result from the ingestion of GHB and other "rape drugs" and from excessive alcohol consumption. That said, without clear memories or physical evidence, it may not be possible to pursue > prosecution (talk to your local crisis center or local police for guidance).

Just because we aren't sure we were raped doesn't mean it didn't happen and when a woman isn't sure, all her anonymous online buddies are there to encourage her to prosecute.

Expert witnesses are called and a robust pair of twins arrive to give evidence. They state their names before the court.

Tweedle-Tweet and Tweedle-Twat
Agreed to have a spat;
Tweedle-Tweet thought all sex rape
And Tweedle-Twat did not.

"It's only rape without consent."
Said Twat to Tweet, upset.
"You can't agree to such a thing,"
Said Tweet in a cold sweat.

And whilst the Tweedles twaddled so
The Queen's patience there did snap.
"We'll cut off his head tomorrow then, right now I need a nap!"

The courtroom breaks into a disturbed silence and we are ushered off to prepare a statement which will be given via closed camera while enshrouded in screens so we don't have to either connect our actions to reality, tell anyone our name, participate in real time, face the accused, feel responsible for what we say, face the authority of the court, or act in a characteristic way, and thereby allow our "true selves" to attain justice.

Sequestered and distraught, we protest that nothing happened to us and we read a rug about these things but a crowd gathers around, cooing and coaxing and telling us that it's okay to be afraid and that rape is a terrible thing.

"But I wasn't raped," we mumble. The crowd grows aggravated.

"Of course you were. Women get raped every day!" They insist.

"But I wasn't…"

"You owe it to the team! No rapist should walk free!"

"I don't even know you people. How did I get here?" We get woozy as the feminist magical cakes start to wear off. The lights flicker as the court patrons turn into a deck of playing cards and seem to start flying erratically about the room.

We stumble our way back, amidst the flurry, to the strange corridor with many doors and they all slam shut as we fall the floor. The rug outlining the dangers of anonymity has disappeared. Feeling quite lost and disconcerted we look at the doors. None of them are numbered any more and we can't remember how we got here.

A smile appears in the middle of the room, followed shortly by a cat. It lounges and licks its paw luxuriously as we look frantically from door to door.
"Still curious?" the Cheshire's body flickers but its grin never wavers. "If you're looking for the door back to reality, it's over there."

We follow the sharpened claw to find a bright red door in the distance. It's hard to believe we hadn't noticed it before. As we move to turn the handle, a disembodied chorus of voices advises us not to enter. "This door leads to certain social death" it warns. "There is no turning back."

We turn the doorknob and walk through. We are not afraid.

> "Why it's simply impassible!
> Alice: Why, don't you mean impossible?
> Door: No, I do mean impassible. (chuckles) Nothing's impossible!"
> ~Lewis Carroll, Alice's Adventures in Wonderland

Unfortunately, unlike Carroll's story, we can not simply awake from a bad dream but we can do our best to rescue the bits of reality as they are being swept away from under us.

Anonymity is the current issue.

Anonymity is a social right that protects free speech in public places. The marketplace of ideas grants that freedom of expression allows greater diversity of thought which will be whittled down by selection of the best ideas.

Feminists claim that the marketplace of ideas demands we have to listen to them by virtue of them having an idea and claiming to be a minority. That is not the case. The marketplace of ideas permits that some of the people in that marketplace are going to think you're a cunt. That's how the marketplace works. Sometimes people just don't want to buy what you are selling.

What feminists demand is not a marketplace, but a captive audience.

Feminists hate anonymity except for when they love it: for women in courtrooms. Anonymity does not belong in a courtroom. Unlike public spaces, law is not conducive to anonymity for a multitude of reasons best outlined by Helen Reece in her article "Rape trials must be completely open"

Unsurprisingly, feminists have gotten it backwards. Again.

They want to talk about the need to remove anonymity, and I agree. It's time to have a real discussion on the issue. Let's talk about those studies that show how anonymity negatively affects social accountability and, when we're done talking about taking anonymity away from rape accusers, we can discuss the internet.

Attila Vinczer files suit against Carol Taggio, Dameian Muirhead, Janet MacMillan & More

AVfM Video Source · 13 January 2014 · Archived copy · Original

AVfM Canadian Activism director Attila Vinczer is going on all-out offensive against local police and school authorities in defense of his son. His video and notes on same are below, expect a fuller article on the matter within the next couple of weeks. You can subscribe to Attila Vinczer in the meantime:

Video notes:

Carol Taggio – school principal, Police Constable Dameian Muirhead badge No, 1618, Janet MacMillan – vice principal, Have collectively severely harmed my son Steven when he was barely 12 years old. Carol Taggio fabricated evidence and provided misleading information to police that began a chain of events leading to Steven being arrested. The incident was about a door that swung open and touched another child on the head. Carol Taggio failed to mention in her notes that this child's sister had moments earlier choked him at school making him distressed and hypersensitive. The parents of the child admitted to us at school that their son often over reacts.

Carol Taggio made up a lie that my son caused another child to have severe head injury and a goose egg on his head. She in writing insisted the mother take the child to the Hospital where the doctors found not even a bruise and certainly no bump on the child's head. In fact the medical report stated there was nothing wrong with the child.

I gave Carol Taggio a chance to clear up her lies at a Board Meeting appealing Steven's 20 day suspension. Instead of clearing up her lies, she continued to lie even more. Carol Taggio, after this meeting went ahead and privately attempted to fish for anything from my son to use against me and to deflect attention from her malicious mischief.

She asked Steven; "You don't really get along with your dad, do you? Reason you were late getting home a couple of times is you don't really want to go home to you dad, do you? You did not want to go to your appeal hearing, did you? Your dad just dragged you out there, didn't he? My son was smart enough not to fall for this ploy and refused to answer any of her leading questions. He just said, "I love my dad!"

Janet MacMillan, lied to CAS (Children's Aid Society) and the police that my son had cut another child with a pair of scissors. The CAS worker did a good job catching Janet MacMillan in her lie. Janet MacMillan called the police. The mother of the alleged victim told me that the school heavily pressured her to have my son charged. She was very uncomfortable with that and did not want to destroy my son. Consequently the Detectives closed the file.

For example, it is ironic how you can see Janet MacMillan at 1:29 hugging another woman, while I was called into the office about my son hugging his girl friend as they boarded the school bus. I was told that NO hugging is permitted at school.

Dameian Muirhead was called to the first event. He deferred the matter to CRP (Community Referral Program) where young children can do community service instead of going through Criminal Court defending against charges. I thought, it would be a good life lesson for my son to see how serious a Criminal Code violation can be. I only agreed to this program on a without prejudice basis, as I did not believe my son committed any crime.

Staff Sargent Detective Krista Kempster decided to order my son charged as a result of my inquiries about the CRP program. They wanted to psychologically assess my son for violent and aggressive behavioural tendency. I asked who would undertake this assessment and what their policy was. The women who attempted to answer me seemed very nervous, nebulous and hesitant to answer my warranted questions.

Dameian Muirhead attended my home and arrested my then 12 year old son Steven. We had to walk to the police station, where my son's legs buckled under the stress. I had to stop and thought I would need to carry him. Steven believed he was going to jail. At the police station, I vehemently argued my case pleading that Dameian Muirhead use his discretionary power and not lay the charge against my son. The Staff Sargent said NO, we have been ordered to arrest and charge your son. Dameian Muirhead then said, “Steven sign this document or you go to JAIL!!!”

Children, especially boys are under attack at schools. Policy designed to protect children, is now harming them. School Boards have gone over the top. Police are called for non police matters. Children, usually boys, as young as five are labelled as sexual predators for innocently kissing a girl on the cheek. Schools are failing to provide a safe environment for children to learn, play and socialize. Schools have become increasingly inhospitable for boys.

FTSU Sverige

Paul Elam · 13 January 2014 · Archived copy · Original

The recent agitprop attack by Tory Shepherd against the Male Studies initiative at the University of South Australia might have discouraged some of us around here. That is, if we weren't so fucking good at what we do.

And what do we do? Well, among many other things we make sure that an ever growing percentage of the population gets to hear a rational and exceptionally well-articulated response to 50 years of feminist lies, disinformation and narcissistic delusions. We produce bricks of logic, throw them at feminism's glass house and then get a chuckle out of watching them walk barefoot though the shards trying to create more lies to explain what just happened.

In 2014 we are taking that to another level entirely, and it starts with Sweden.

If you have been watching the news and bulletins here for the past two days, you have seen more than one reference to the launch of AVFM Sverige (Sweden), the first, and one of the most incredibly important, of the new official regional AVFM Websites on the AVFM Voices Network.

Unfortunately, I was very busy with the Flood of bullshit lies being posted in Adelaide Now, and did not have the hours in the day to attend to this historic launch for AVFM, and for the Men's Human Rights Movement. Better late than never, as they say.

Folks, AVFM Sverige is a really, really big deal. It is a pivotal moment for all of us. It is, I am going to openly wager, the next big thing for the MHRM in 2014.

AVFM Sverige is being handled by a team of activists, headed by William Andersson. William is hard core red pill, pure FTSU, and he means business. While there are still some organizational matters to be tinkered with and refined, the basics are set in place. Soon, AVFM Sverige will be doing for Sweden, in the Swedish language, what the AVFM main site has been doing on an international level; which is to say they will be kicking ass and taking names in that country.

Can you think of anywhere else that needs it more or where the effect would be more profound for the men's movement? Sweden is ground zero in many ways, and we just dropped a bomb in it.

I want all AVFM readers, and the entire team at AVFM Sverige to know, that we have you covered. Sweden is one of those countries that gets kinda funny with blogging; what is said; who says it and how they say it. There is even a government permit required to go online and express your opinions through a website.

Oops. Too bad, fair Sverige, AVFM is not the property of — nor does it require the approval or permission of — the Swedish government to operate on a global basis. Any attempt to intervene in that will be met with yawns, giggles, and a brick wall.

AVFM Sverige is here to stay. And the issues facing men and boys in Sweden, a country now under fascist feminist governance, are going to be brought to the Swedish people, as well as everyone else in the world.

The problem of modern tyranny is that it has been protected by public support. The brainwashed masses, robbed of true history, misled with false information and propaganda, and shamed into compliance have abetted and enabled insane policies and outright oppression to occur, under the false belief that it furthered and enhanced the civil rights of a class of people who were never disadvantaged to begin with.

In order to correct that problem, the public will have to be educated out of it. That is what AVFM has been doing on a global level for five years, and that is what AVFM Sverige will be doing in the days ahead, right in the heart of the fascist, feminist beast.

There are other countries, and even individual US States on the way as well, all taking the global message, tailoring it for local consumption, and bringing more enlightened people into the fold as they go.

Please join me in thanking and celebrating William Andersson and the other brave human beings of AVFM Sverige who will be setting an example for all of them.

Rationally irrational feminists

Jon Gunnarsson · 13 January 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Rational irrationality sounds like an oxymoron, but is actually a perfectly sensible concept. Roughly speaking, to be rationally irrational is to rationally choose to have certain irrational beliefs. People have preferences about which beliefs to hold—some beliefs are more comforting than others—so people may in some instances be happier holding irrational beliefs. Some false beliefs are very costly to hold—such as believing that cyanide is nutritious and water poisonous—but many generally are not, such as believing that Christopher Columbus discovered that the Earth was round.

The concept of rational irrationality was popularized by American economist Bryan Caplan in his book The Myth of the Rational Voter[1] to explain why people are much more irrational in their capacity as voters than they are in their capacity as consumers. Having correct beliefs about which products one likes is instrumental in choosing how to spend one's money. The consumer directly decides which products he wants to buy and is immediately rewarded or punished through being satisfied or dissatisfied with the purchased item. Being wrong about politics, on the other hand, is largely costless, since a single vote is exceedingly unlikely to sway the result of an election. Hence, a voter can indulge in irrationality and vote for the party or candidate with the strongest emotional appeal.

Thus, Caplan casts irrationality as a consumption good. Like with any economic good, the amount consumed depends on price and expected benefit. If an error is cheap, people will consume more irrationality. Similarly, if the expected benefit is high, this will also raise consumption, i.e. people will be more irrational when it comes to emotionally powerful topics, such as religion, and more rational when it comes to practical matters such as how to repair a car. Of course, Caplan isn't suggesting that people consciously choose to be irrational, but rather that they fail to make the mental effort of critical thinking on certain topics and instead just go with their natural prejudices.

I believe this model can also be applied to examine feminism. Feminists (and to a lesser degree most people in modern Western society) want to believe flattering things about women and they want to believe negative things about men. They also want to see men as patriarchal oppressors and women as their innocent victims. They are irrational insofar as they exaggerate the importance of evidence and arguments which support their prejudices (gender pay gap, low representation of women in parliaments and boardrooms, high beauty standards, unwanted male advances, "rape culture," etc.), and ignore or downplay evidence and arguments which point in the opposite direction (lower male life expectancy, higher incidences of violent crime against men, harsher criminal sentences for men, biased education system, etc.).

This conforms well with the rational irrationality model. Views about sex, gender, and gender relations are highly emotionally charged. Feeling like an innocent victim of unjust oppression who is finally fighting back against her abusers can be downright intoxicating. For male feminists, there could hardly be a higher calling or a more righteous task than to resist the patriarchy that is perpetuated by all those other, unenlightened men.

Having these beliefs is not costly for feminists. Among many circles, espousing such views, especially in a moderate form, is socially rewarded.

Given this high emotional benefit and low cost, it is hardly surprising that most feminists and feminist supporters drink long and deep from the heady wine of irrationality—or perhaps more accurately, they fail to apply their rational faculties in favour of keeping intact their comfortable prejudices.

This irrationality manifests itself in most everything feminism does. Even if the goal of feminism would be solely to promote women's welfare at the expense of everyone else, many of the means employed by feminists are unfit to attain this end. Take for instance maternal leave. Feminists favoured maternal leave because they irrationally believed it would help women. Laws forcing employers to grant their female employees maternal leave obviously help some women, so it is easy to see why an irrational or partially rational thinker could come to the conclusion that such a law helps women.

But a dispassionate analysis of the economics involved shows a very different picture. Employers are not charities, so an employer hires an additional worker only if he believes that the added productivity of the worker will bring in greater revenue than her cost (primarily in the form of wages). If employers are punished for hiring female workers through a law forcing them to reserve a job for years on end whenever the worker becomes pregnant, this means that the cost goes up. Hence, the demand to hire women of child-bearing age will go down, leading to reduced wages. Moreover, employers will be less willing to promote women into leadership positions. After all, the higher up an employer is in a firm's hierarchy, the more difficult it will be to find a temporary replacement for her during maternal leave.

What happens in effect is a redistribution of wealth from childless women to mothers. Women who don't have children and have no plans of having children are unfairly punished. Those who do have children and take advantage of maternal leave receive this privilege at a discounted cost. But even they do not necessarily benefit from this arrangement, because some of them would have actually preferred getting full wages even if it meant giving up a right to maternal leave. There is also a general loss of efficiency that always accompanies such governmental intervention in private contracts. Instead of being free to work out whatever contract is acceptable to both parties, the state limits the range of alternatives, which means that some mutually agreeable arrangements cannot be legally made. This also hurts employers and indirectly also male employees and older female employees.

Maternal leave is one of the many reasons for the oft-bemoaned wage gap. This gap, seen through the eyes of feminist irrationality, is just the sort of thing to justify fantasies of patriarchal oppression. Sober analysis of the situation would of course lead to the conclusion that the gap is primarily due to women's choices[2], but accepting this sobering reality would not be emotionally fulfilling. And so the explanation must be misogynistic discrimination.

Seen in this light, the gap must of course be challenged. This has led feminists to clamour for laws which ensure "equal pay for equal work," never mind the fact that there is no objective way of measuring what equal work is[3]. If the story of patriarchal oppression were actually true and the wage gap were the result of misogyny, then there could be nothing more destructive to women than a law mandating equal pay. In such a patriarchal fantasy land, the only thing that entices sexist employers to hire women at all is that they can get away with paying them less. If you then managed to mandate equal pay, then no employer would continue to hire women because now discrimination is free.

Reality is of course a different matter. Most employers are not sexists and are quite happy to employ women who have the right skillset. However, such laws lead to women becoming less attractive to employers as they must fear litigation if they don't promote their female employees often enough or if they pay them less than their male colleagues, even if such pay differences are justified by different performance. All of this stifles economic output, which hurts everyone in the economy, including women.

Thus we can see that many programmes promoted by feminists which were aimed at helping women, are actually harming them. Rational irrationality gives us a good explanation of this phenomenon. Individual feminists and feminist-friendly voters want to help women and have certain pre-conceived notions of what could be done to help women. When such a policy is proposed, they want very much to like it and support it. They prefer believing that the plan will be effective. Deeper questioning and analysis would reveal the plan to be misguided, but the beliefs of any individual feminism-supporter have a negligible influence on whether the proposed policy will be implemented, so the individual cost of irrationality is low, while the collective cost is high. Hence it makes sense for every supporter to be ignorant, even though everyone would be better off if all feminism-supporters faced uncomfortable truths with all of their rational faculties engaged.

So if this explanation is true, what can be done about this sorry state of affairs? Unfortunately, the rational irrationality model doesn't give us cause for hope. It suggests that feminists are not merely incidentally irrational, but are irrational for good reason (hence the label "rational irrationality"). Throwing arguments and facts at feminists will not work, since it's not in their interest to engage in a rational examination of the counter-evidence.

Neither will we have much luck convincing politicians. As Upton Sinclair put it, “It is difficult to get a man to understand something, when his salary depends on his not understanding it.” Once we have an anti-feminist society, we will have anti-feminist politicians, and no sooner.

Instead, we need to focus on the underlying economics of feminist irrationality. We need to raise its price or lower its benefit. I don’t see any effective way of achieving the latter. We can’t control other people’s feelings. But there are a number of ways to raise the price of feminist irrationality. Ultimately what we need is to make expressing feminist opinions socially unacceptable. We’ve won once society treats feminism similarly to racism. There would still be feminists out there, but at least they’d keep their bigotry to themselves.

We are still far away from that point, but we we’ve already seen first signs of this on the internet. Increasingly, feminists are called out on their hatred and irrationality in comment sections, forums, and blogs. There are also many things we can do in ordinary life to make feminism costly. We can refuse to associate with people who are vocal about their feminism. In particular, we should avoid any and all romantic involvement with feminists. We should also advise our family and friends to stay away from dating a feminist. No matter how much feminists rant about needing a man like a fish needs a bicycle, at the end of the day, most of them still seek male companionship (and male resources!). If being a feminist significantly narrows down the pool of available men, this may get some feminists to re-evaluate their positions.

Lest we get too smug, we should realize that the rational irrationality model also applies to us. We, too, are vulnerable to believing comfortable myths, especially when it comes to emotionally charged topics where there is little or no punishment for error. We must be especially vigilant in these areas. We want to think the worst of feminism and feminists, so it is of particular importance to always second-guess our knee-jerk reactions.

In summary, the lesson of the irrational rationality model is this: combating feminist irrationality through political means or through appealing to feminists’ better nature is unlikely to work. Rather, we should take a market-based approach to raise the price of irrationality.

This article is also available in Romanian.

Notes

[1] Bryan Caplan – The Myth of the Rational Voter: Why Democracies Choose Bad Policies

For a shorter (and free) introduction, see Wikipedia and Bryan Caplan – Rational Ignorance versus Rational Irrationality

[2] See Robert O’Hara – Special report: BLS data do not support existence of “wage gap” and Lucian Vâlsan – Gender Pay Gap – Between numbers and propaganda

[3] Jon Gunnarsson – What Pay Gap?

Equality: A Step Down for Women?

Tom Golden · 13 January 2014 · Archived copy · Original

I was talking with Paul Elam after his interview with Elizabeth Vargas on 20/20. Paul mentioned that one of the things he had told Vargas was that equality would be a step down for women. He said it stopped her in her tracks. She was speechless as he explained his reasons. This video is a youtubue version of that conversation. Many thanks to Paul for his help in writing the script.

I remember as a boy that I really wanted to be a pro baseball player like Harmon Killebrew. I dreamed and wanted the accolades, the fans, the home runs and all the good stuff but was not the least bit interested nor even aware of the workouts, the grueling practices or any of the lifestyle that would be necessary even if I had the necessary talent. I think some of that is going on today. More importantly, in today's world we need to get jobs in baseball or in other workplaces based not on skin color, sex, religion or just about any other category other than the talent and skills that are needed to get the job done. Finding the most qualified candidate is a win for everyone especially when we do it based on character, skills, knowledge and talent and not on skin color or sex or religion.

See what you think of the video.

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

►1.4 to 1 ratio of men dying from disease: [see here]. Deaths in 2010 2,468,435 men 1,028,510 women died and 1,439,920 men difference is 411,000

►Circumcision [see here] [and here].

►21 million college students: [see here]. Percent female: [see here]. Females are about 57% of all college students = about 12 million girls. and 9 million boys. about 3 million would need to go.

►Murder 2010 males 10,978 females 3044 difference 7754 almost one murder an hour: [see here]

►Garbage collectors NYC 200 out of 7000: [see here]. Sewage 5 of 426: [see here].

►Workplace fatalities 4383 93% = 4073-male 310 women 10 per day 3763 needed to be equal with men every two hours: [see here]

►Prisons – total 2.418 million women=113 thousand men = 2.305 million total needed to catch up 2.192 million: [see here].

►Mental impairment – 4.6 million have intellectual disabilites need nearly one million girls to make things equal: [see here].

►Life expectancy – lop off 5 (4.9) years of women's lives: [see here].

►4.2% of fortune 500, 4.5% of fortune 1000: [see here].

►Prior to 1985 no anesthesia with circumcision 88 million males in US born before 1985 % males in us circumcised = 57% = 50,160,000: [see here].

►[Male 75%] total for US 650,000 – 487,000 males 162,000 females need 325,000 homeless females to reach the number of males: [see here].

►Women are only 2.1% of those who are executed. [see here]. Murder and women [see here].

►Women are 9% of the construction workforce
15% farmers
12% engineers
2% plumbers
~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

3% electriciains
3% construction laborers
5% fishing and logging
[see here] [and here]

Editorial note: you may want to subscribe to Men Are Good.

Documentary on Swiss misandry – with English subtitles

AVfM Video Source · 14 January 2014 · Archived copy · Original

An interesting documentary on misandry and feminist governance in Switzerland – with English subtitles provided by Lucian Valsan.

Deconstructing Game, and PUA Frauds

AVfM Video Source · 14 January 2014 · Archived copy · Original

From the incomparable Bar Bar. Stick this in your pipe and suck on it, Roissy. PE

Feminism: men are actors, women are acted upon

Alison Tieman (Typhonblue) · 14 January 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Men's Rights versus Feminism explained using magnets.

Men's Rights activists seek to bring awareness to how men are acted upon by society, acted upon by other men and acted upon by women.

They are opposed by feminists who think that bringing attention to how men are acted upon will take something away from women.

Every era has had its mythology of women's weakness and men's strength. Ours is no different and it's not progressive.

How easy is it for you to see Jill as a victim? How hard is it for you to see Jack as vulnerable?

Full Text: http://www.genderratic.com/?p=3908

White Knight Judge of Indian Supreme Court claims false sexual harassment complaint by a law intern

Anil Kumar · 14 January 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Asok Kumar Ganguly was a Judge on the Supreme Court of India. He was also a big-time white knight. He supported India's much-misused law against dowry harassment and cruelty to wives, called "section 498a of Indian penal code." For example, when delivering the keynote address at a seminar on "Negotiating Spaces: Gender Concerns in Conflict Zones' on Feb 05, 2011," he said the following:

> There is a lot of argument that 498A should be repealed because it is being abused. I am sorry to say that even Supreme Court judges have said it openly in courts. Which law in this country is not abused? This [498A] is a law which empowers women. I am not saying it's not abused. Just because it empowers women and gives them a negotiating space, [there are demands] that it be repealed. This is male chauvinism.

(As reported by The Hindu)

Ganguly actually believed that women have a right to misuse these criminal laws to negotiate for a very high amount of alimony. Men and their parents, who succumb to such blackmail, often go bankrupt trying to buy peace in a divorce.

He retired in 2013 at the age of 66 and he was appointed as chairperson of State Human Rights Commission of the State of West Bengal.

He then fell into a grave that he dug for other men

30 months after uttering these words about "women's empowerment" and how it is "male chauvinism" to object to misused laws, he claimed that a young law intern had falsely accused him of sexual harassment. Needless to say, the leaders in the Men's Rights Movement in India sent directives to all activists not to support him in media. Activists who are fed up with anti-male attitudes in the judiciary wanted to see this judge being tried using the same yardstick that he used on so many other men. Indian MRAs had no sympathy at this professional White Knight. The federal Government forced him to resign by threatening to get a Presidential Reference to sack him.

As NDTV reported:

> Former Supreme Court judge AK Ganguly, who bowed to pressure and quit as the Chairman of the West Bengal Human Rights Commission after being indicted for sexual harassment, today said his resignation should not be taken as an admission of guilt.
>
> "It was very difficult for my family members to take it anymore," he told reporters at his Kolkata home.
>
> In his most detailed defence since the allegations that he sexually harassed a young lawyer surfaced three months ago, Justice Ganguly questioned, "Can I force a glass of wine on a woman? I can't do it with my wife of 45 years. Forget wine, I can't force even tea or coffee on anyone."
>
> The woman said in her statement to the probe panel that in December 2012, the retired judge had forced her to drink wine with him, kissed her arm, said 'I love you' and suggested that she share his hotel room.
>
> Commenting that he felt shattered by the allegations, Justice Ganguly said he "wished the intern well" and would not contest her allegations legally. "I will never file a defamation case against a person who is my student; I'd rather go to jail.

Indian Supreme Court judges are known for their traditionalist thinking and insensitivity towards men who face marital problems or false cases of sexual harassment or rape.

Within a month, another Supreme Court judge also got exactly similar allegations and now his name has been released to the media. So, it's payback time for these white knight judges of Indian Courts. As the Economic Times reports, this time it's former Supreme Court judge Swatanter Kumar:

> The Supreme Court has found itself at the centre of a fresh sexual harassment controversy after one of its former judges, Swatanter Kumar, was accused by an intern of making sexual propositions while in office. Kumar, now retired, has vehemently denied the allegations.
>
> In an affidavit, the intern, then a student of West Bengal National University of Judicial Sciences who was interning with the judge in May-June 2011 and working out of his official residence on Delhi's Tughlaq Road, accused Kumar of inappropriate physical contact and also seeking to know if she was willing to travel with him and stay in hotel rooms.

Jusice Swatanter Kumar has now threatened to sue some mainstream media channels for defamation. In India, courts often dismiss defamation cases filed on media by men, who are accused of dowry demand, domestic violence, sexual harassment, or rape. But, these judges think a separate yardstick should apply to them.

Times of India reports:

> Former Supreme Court Judge and NGT chairman Justice Swatanter Kumar on Saturday sent legal notices to three media organizations demanding apology within 24 hours for publishing and telecasting reports about an intern alleging sexual harassment charges against him.
>
> The legal notice, settled by senior advocate Mukul Rohatgi, warned that he would initiate both criminal and civil defamation suits if the media organizations — Indian Express, Times Now and CNN-IBN — failed to apologize within the deadline.

One must wonder how many more judges will face the punishments they have meted out to others with impunity. It is difficult to find any sympathy for them, as they are hoisted with their own petards.

Who's really the troll here?

Jim Byset · 14 January 2014 · Archived copy · Original

IT WOULD be funny if it wasn't true. It would be funny if so much wasn't at stake. It would be funny if the Canadian justice system wasn't mollycoddling and indulging the childish, whiny, bullying behaviour of feminists. However, unfortunately, it is true – the trial of Toronto artist and father-of-four Gregory Alan Elliott really is happening.

And it is a disgrace.

If you're a Torontonian, it's likely you've come across Gregory Alan Elliott's work at some point. Elliot's art is featured all over the city – from Kensington market to Bloor and Landsdowne. It's also just as likely that you don't know who the guy is – but he's a prolific and talented street artist with a clear artistic philosophy of self-individuation, truth, and love. But what really sets Elliott apart is that unlike other graffiti artists, he actually signs his work – with his real name. 'I wanted to challenge graffiti artists around the world; the concept was to tell them and challenge them by signing my full legal name all in caps. If you sign it you take responsibility for it.'

Taking responsibility is a concept that means a lot to the father-of-four.

Elliott is facing charges of criminal harassment for the supposed "crime" of sending some tweets to Toronto feminists Stephanie Guthrie, Paisley Rae, and Heather Reilly. If found guilty, Elliott faces up to six months in prison – with the verdict having far-reaching implications for freedom of speech in Canada. This is the first trial of its kind in Canada and is a test case for setting precedent in this area. If Guthrie et al are successful then the interpretation of the criminal code is expanded to include online activity. This in-itself isn't necessarily a bad thing. If people receive legitimate threats, and feel threatened as a result – it is a criminal act, regardless of the medium. The problem arises however, when one examines the facts of this case and the specific criminal code in question.

Canadian criminal code 264 defines criminal harassment. Its definition describes a number of potentially criminal behaviours, such as stalking, repeated communication, and threatening behaviour. In order for these behaviours to be considered criminal – they must cause the complainant to 'reasonably, in all the circumstances, to fear for their safety or the safety of anyone known to them.' In this particular case then, the prosecution faces two burdens of proof – the first that there was a form of behaviour that matches any one of the criteria laid out in the code, and that that behaviour was sufficient to cause the complainant to reasonably fear for their safety.

The Crown's case, in both instances, is thinner than paper; indeed it is barely a wisp – and this is the reason why this case is so dangerous.

Should the Crown succeed in this reckless prosecution then not only is the interpretation of the criminal code expanded to include online harassment, but it is also expanded in terms of how personal safety is understood. It is important to note that not one of Elliott's tweets or virtual communications is threatening – even by the most liberal interpretation of the word. Indeed, so unthreatening is Elliott that the officer in charge of the case, Toronto Police Detective Jeff Bangild, said in testimony last week that he found no tweets from Elliott that were threatening – none – among thousands. Just to be clear – this is from the officer in charge of the case.

If Banglid's interpretation of the evidence is accurate then the prosecution's case rests on selling the idea that this repeated communication, by itself, caused fear. This is almost impossible because the internet does not operate according to the rules of more traditional communication. It is extremely easy to block, or ignore people online. It is not like receiving multiple letters through the post or constant phone calls at three in the morning. It's nothing like that. Consequently, the prosecution will have to demonstrate that Guthrie and her pals were genuinely frightened despite the fact that nothing Elliott did was actually threatening and that they could easily block him and ignore his tweets. They're going to have a particularly difficult time with Guthrie given her constant boasting of having a folder on her computer full of death threats. Guthrie has made this claim on a number of occasions – one such occasion being the Ontario Public Interest Research Group (OPIRG) meeting held at the Onatrio Institute for Secondary Education (OISE) at the University of Toronto last year. Guthrie made the claim to a room full of freshman and feminist activists at a meeting whose purpose was to spread lies about the MHRM and to call for militant action against those that support men's human rights. One has to wonder if death threats don't frighten her – then why would the non-threatening, repeated communication from a man she dismisses as a 'troll?'

*****

It may surprise some to learn that Elliott and Guthrie were at one time friendly. Elliott was sympathetic to some of Guthrie's causes, such as her WiTOpoli (women in Toronto politics) campaign and at one point offered his considerable talents as a graphic artist to help. Things changed though, when con artist Anita Sarkeesian was the target of an online game that encouraged players to virtually beat the crap out of her. Guthrie and her pals, unfazed by Sarkeesian's shady past (and the anger within the gaming community at her questionable exploits) doxxed the game's developer Bendilin Spurr, and openly attempted to destroy his reputation, employment prospects, and even his romantic life in his hometown in Ontario. Elliott spoke out against Guthrie – labelling her behaviour as bullying and dangerous. What followed was a barrage of abuse between Guthrie, her feminist cohorts, and Elliott.

There was abuse on both sides but as the tweets make clear Elliott was the victim of a concerted effort by Guthrie and her friends to bully the artist. Indeed, when one looks closely at the date stamps on the tweets – one can clearly see that Guthrie, Rae, and Reilly appear to adapt the same 'communication strategy' with Elliott on certain dates. For example, on September 9 2012, all three switch their message from open communication to attempting to create the appearance of actively ignoring Elliott. It is, however, extremely transparent from the tweets that this is a deliberate strategy – likely in anticipation of an action on their behalf (Elliott was arrested just two months later.) It is a pattern that marries well with defence attorney Chris Murphy's assertion this week in court that Guthrie and her feminist stooges are guilty of deliberately manufacturing the entire debacle in an attempt to harass and discredit Elliott. Murphy alleged that in a meeting in Summer 2012 a group of feminists, including the three complainants got together to hatch a plan in which they would target Elliott's followers and set up a parody account – both of which they did. (They created the parody twitter hashtag #GAEhole to refer to Elliot and openly called for people to shun him online.)

The internet has become an ideological battleground with feminists imposing their agenda on the unwilling and censoring dissent wherever it arises. Feminists, with Rebecca Watson as the figurehead, have ruined the atheist community. Feminists, with Anita Sarkeesian as the figurehead, have ruined the gaming community. Feminists, with Adria Richards as the figurehead, have ruined the coding community. Feminists, now with Stephanie Guthrie as the figurehead, are looking to do even more damage to the social media community. (Feminists have also ruined the Wikipedia community and are currently trying to ruin the WordPress community.)

Their modus operarndi is becoming increasingly transparent: group together, time an "action," and hurl as much mud as possible. The truth doesn't matter to them. The idea of personal responsibility, of doing what Gregory Alan Elliott is willing to do – to sign one's name to one's actions – does not matter to them. It is time for this cowardly, disgusting behaviour to be highlighted and punished. It is hoped that the Criminal Court of Ontario finds Gregory Alan Elliott not guilty. It is overwhelmingly likely that they will, and it is further hoped that this will see an end to the public whining and private scheming of over-privileged feminists like Stephanie Guthrie, Heather Reilly, and Paisley Rae.

Michael Flood is a cheap lying whore. So's Tory Shepherd.

Janet Bloomfield (aka JudgyBitch) · 15 January 2014 · Archived copy · Original

In what amounts to a heartening trend in the land Down Under, The University of South Australia will be offering a "world first" course in "male studies," if all goes as planned.

If.

Australian feminist writer Tory Shepherd is already doing her best to derail the course by using logical, reasoned argument and irrefutable facts outright lies, obfuscation and omission to demonstrate the course is unnecessary and even dangerous.

Let's take a look Tory's argument:

> LECTURERS in a "world-first" male studies course at the University of South Australia have been linked to extreme views on men's rights and websites that rail against feminism.

This is probably a good time for some definitions. "Male Studies" is indeed a world first, and there is an important distinction to be made between Male Studies and Men's Studies.

Male Studies is "a new academic discipline [that] explores the male as male, masculinity, and the lives of boys and men."

Men's Studies, on the other hand, "came out of feminist analysis of gender, which includes biological differences."

Here we go with obfuscation number one: the fact that an academic discipline is not embracing feminism as a theoretical paradigm is not the same thing as "railing against feminism." While it is certainly true that many, many websites are deeply critical of feminist thought (cough JudgyBitch cough), the attempt to conflate an academic discipline that eschews feminist theory as an underpinning as automatically "anti-feminist" is disingenuous at best.

There is nothing in the course outline that mentions feminism one way or another. Gender? Yes. Absolutely. Power and privilege? Yep. Masculinity? Sexism? All on the course outline.

The main source of rage from feminists is that nowhere does the course claim these issues will be viewed either through the lens of feminism, or in a way that is critical of feminism.

Feminists are losing control of the narrative. And that doesn't sit well with them.

> The lecturers' backgrounds are likely to spark controversy, but organisers of the predominantly online course, promoted as the first of its type in the world, insist they are not anti-feminist and "it's very difficult for anybody who has opposing views to get a word in".

Gee, Tory, why would anyone think that? Isn't this whole article an attempt to silence the conversation? And this one. And this one. And this one. And this one, too.

Shut up and go away?

> Two lecturers have been published by prominent US anti-feminist site A Voice for Men, a site which regularly refers to women as "bitches" and "whores" and has been described as a hate site by the civil rights organisation Southern Poverty Law Centre.

So much bullshit here.

AVfM regularly refers to "women" as "bitches" and "whores," does it? Which is completely and utterly different from Jezebel regularly calling men "assholes" and "creeps", right? Since there is no rigorous definition of "regularly", and since one contributor actually refers to herself as a bitch, let's just go with it.

It's called hyperbole. In more colloquial terms "shock jock" journalism.

What is the difference between

Catering to Assholes

Republicans Worried Women Won't Vote For Assholes

Chris Christie is a Petty Asshole

Samsung Thinks Women Will Fall for a Creep With a Nice Watch

and Namaste, bitches!

Feministing: privileged white bitches in our dust

That second article about bitches actually begins with the sentence "OK, so the title is a bit sensational and a bit misleading".

And how about this little nugget: the course Tory is referring to is not the one being offered. Her entire critique of the instructors is based on the wrong fucking course.

> The university has approved one of four proposed graduate courses, a certificate in male health and health promotion, which will begin online next month.
>
> But an original proposal by one of the university's academics outlined three further certificates, including a course called "males and sexism", which named lecturers who have been published on radical men's rights websites.

Let's follow up with one more mind blowing fact: The SPLC did NOT refer to AVfM as a "hate group".

Oh, oopsy.

> The US site specifically welcomed the UniSA course as a milestone, editor Paul Elam saying it marked the end of feminists' control of the agenda.

Yay! A sentence that does not contain a lie! Good job, Tory!

> One American US lecturer – US attorney and self-professed "anti-feminist lawyer" Roy Den Hollander – has written that the men's movement might struggle to exercise influence but that "there is one remaining source of power in which men still have a near monopoly – firearms".

Yeah, we can cherry pick feminists for appalling quotes, too.

Most feminists don't hate men, as a group (we hate the system that disproportionately favors men at the expense of women), but — congratulations! — we are starting to hate you. You, the person.

The ever charming Lindy West in a post titled If I admit hating men is a thing, will you stop turning it in to a self-fulfilled prophesy?

> He also argues that feminists oppress men in today's world and refers to women's studies as "witches' studies".

…rage-filled, obsessively anti-woman horseshit

…unapologetically misogynistic bags of rot

…entitled shitbags who hate women

The lovely Kate Harding, describing men's right activists in her post titled "Fuck You, Men's Rights Activists.

Clearly only men engage in shock jock tactics.

> Another, US psychology professor Miles Groth, says that date-rape awareness seminars might be deterring men from going to university.

Yay! Another sentence that is almost true. Because asking a question is almost the same as answering it, right? Dr. Groth's actual quote:

Indeed, what does it mean to a first-year male student to have to attend a date-rape seminar where they are told they harbor dangerous impulses that must be controlled, when they have never for a moment ever in their lives thought about coercing a female (or anyone) sexually.

> Mr Den Hollander has tried to sue ladies' nights for discrimination against men. He has likened the position of men today to black people in America's south in the 1950s "sitting in the back of the bus", and blames feminists for oppressing men.

Women get special privileges in bars that entitle them to cheaper/free alcohol or admission for no reason other than the fact that they are women. Comparing that situation to slavery would have been pretty over the top, but comparing it to the American south in the 1950's?

A child born to a Black mother in a state like Mississippi… has exactly the same rights as a white baby born to the wealthiest person in the United States. It's not true, but I challenge anyone to say it is not a goal worth working for.

Thurgood Marshall

Interesting that New York City is on a campaign to prevent hairdressers, dry cleaners and nail salons from charging different prices based on gender, handing out fines that range from $50 to $500 for violating a law that makes gender-based pricing illegal. 580 violations handed out in 2012.

Must be pretty rare, huh?

> The course, which has no prerequisites, begins this year and will canvass subjects from men's health to gender bias.

Yay! Another 100% true sentence, but what is up with that "no prerequisites" comment? Is it supposed to suggest that anyone can take the course? Like, just any common person?

Well, that's terrible.

What prerequisites does women's studies require, again?

The five courses offered at University of South Australia in Gender Studies appear to have zero prerequisites or co-requisites.

Interesting.

> Course founder Gary Misan, from UniSA's Centre for Rural Health and Community Development, said they were "not anti-women" and that lecturers were associated with a range of groups.
>
> "I wouldn't say any of them are extreme or anti-feminist," Dr Misan said.

Oh, this is so cute, Tory. You do know that anti-woman and anti-feminist are not the same thing, right? You see how she switched the words?

> "The aim of the courses are to present a balanced view and to counter some of the negative rhetoric that exists in society in general and in some areas of academe about men.
>
> "It's very difficult for anybody who has opposing views to get a word in. As soon as somebody mentions anything they perceive as being anti-feminist, they're pilloried, and in some cases almost persecuted."

And their words are changed from anti-feminist to anti-woman. See above.

> Dr Misan also said that writing something for a specific website did not necessarily suggest an affiliation.

Wait, there's a word for that….. let me think …. Freelance writer?!?! Who knew such a thing existed? Remarkable.

> Dr Michael Flood, from the University of Wollongong's Centre for Research on Men and Masculinity, said these types of male studies "really represents the margins".

Hmmm. AVfM has an Alexa ranking of 11,419 in the US, and 33,713 globally. Visitors from virtually every country on the planet.

Yep.

Pretty marginal.

> "It comes out of a backlash to feminism and feminist scholarship. The new male studies is an effort to legitimise, to give academic authority, to anti-feminist perspectives," he said.

How does questioning disproportionate sentencing for male criminals relate to anti-feminism?

How does exploring male health seeking behaviours relate to anti-feminism?

How does investigating male workplace deaths and safety relate to anti-feminism?

How does addressing the wildly different suicide rates for men relate to anti-feminism?

Make no mistake, all these topics certainly can be and should be explored through anti-feminism, but I am just one, admittedly very vocal, writer. There is no requirement built in to to address any aspect of feminism or women's interests at all when discussing the interests and rights of men and boys.

Oh boo hoo. Feminists aren't the center of the world?

Cry me a river…. The refrain comes to mind.

> Flinders University School of Education senior lecturer Ben Wadham, who has a specific interest in men's rights, said there was a big difference between formal masculinity studies and "populist" male studies.
>
> He said there were groups that legitimately help men, and then the more extreme activists.

Yep. There is a big difference.

> "That tends to manifest in a more hostile movement which is about 'women have had their turn, feminism's gone too far, men are now the victims, white men are now disempowered'," he said.

Again, conflating "women" with "feminist" serves no purpose other than to suggest that questioning a very specific ideology is equivalent to hating an entire group of individuals who may or may not share that ideology.

Don't like radical Islam? You must hate all Muslims everywhere.

And the accusation that somehow it is only "white men" who are sensitive to the fact that women's healthcare is funded at four times the rate of men's healthcare, despite the fact that men die earlier, is utterly laughable.

What kind of world do you live in where you imagine black men or Asian men or gay men or any man anywhere doesn't care that his children are only likely to go to college if they happen to be female, and they get to go with their genitals intact because only male infants can legally be mutilated?

> "I would argue that the kinds of masculinities which these populist movements represent are anathema to the vision of an equal and fair gendered world."

Right.

Equal healthcare funding

Equal sentencing

Equal educational opportunities

Equal reproductive rights

Equal parenting rights

Equal obligation to serve the state

Why, if that kind of equality came about, that would be no fair to women at all.

> Dr Wadham said that universities needed to uphold research based traditions instead of the populist, partisan approach driven by some.

Research based –traditions? Which traditions? Whose? The first universities were established in 1088. By men. The first women's studies course was offered in 1969.

Ya sure you want to appeal to tradition? That could come back and bite you in the ass real hard.

And you know how research is conducted, right? You gather some data and analyze it. Facts. Evidence. Hypothesis. Analysis.

You don't refuse to allow the conversation to happen because someone's feelings might get hurt.

> Men's Health Australia spokesman and Male Studies lecturer Greg Andresen is also the Australian correspondent for US-based site National Coalition For Men, which declares false rape accusations to be "psychological rape", argues that talking about violence against women makes men invisible.

Yeah, no. Here is what Greg actually has to say about intimate partner violence:

Uncovering the staggering depth of brutality women used to be subject to at home without question – and denouncing it – is one of the signature civilising social movements of the past 40 years. To this day, women are more likely to be severely injured, assaulted or killed at home. But are a smaller but significant number of men victims of domestic violence, too? And are they falling through the cracks?

> Asked about his connection to NCFM, he said they were the longest-running organisation in the world to look at discrimination against men and boys.

> "Certainly they don't shy away from touching issues like false rape allegations, domestic violence, some of those hot topics," he said.
>
> "We have had 20 if not 30 or 40 years where the only study on gender has been from a feminist perspective … that's why I think this course is so long overdue," he said.

Yep. Long overdue.

> UniSA's Provost and Chief Academic Officer, Professor Allan Evans, said the courses covered important men's health issues and would equip allied health professionals who deal with men's health.

How offensive. That's misogyny!

> "All new courses are reviewed thoroughly prior to being offered to ensure they are suitable and beneficial to our students," he said.

And obviously, when it comes to the University of South Australia, all courses are put through the ideology machine to make sure equality is not a goal, if it means feminists have to surrender some privilege.

Such as the privilege to talk exclusively about gender.

I call bullshit.

Anyone else?

Lots of love,

JB

The Male Homeless

AVfM Video Source · 15 January 2014 · Archived copy · Original

The realities of homelessness that no one wants to see, courtesy of Spetsnaz.

If you fear for the future of your sons, you should.

What else is there to say, other than subscribe to Spetsnaz?

Someone Please Give John Nazarian a Plaid Jacket, a Straw Hat and a Cigar

Paul Elam · 15 January 2014 · Archived copy · Original

As many who follow this website know, John Nazarian is a California private investigator who has been tied to the Pauley Perrette restraining order scam that has been covered by several of our writers and investigators. Interestingly enough he can also be found in the new documentary on the corrupt family law system, Divorce Corp, essentially telling people that the system is so corrupt that bottom feeders like him can make a good living at gathering, and apparently creating, dirt on behalf of their clients.

Nazarian, whose facial hair appears designed to mimic the top of Mr. T's head, came up on our radar again when we discovered one of his YouTube videos in which he advises women on how to manufacture false domestic violence charges in order to get their husbands ejected from the home and tossed into jail so the woman can then more easily use the court to steal his property, income and sever him from his children. Pity the fool who don't listen.

Well, it appears that the scumbag-to-the-stars investigator, who has been named in complaints filed with the state of California, has not taken too kindly to the attention.

He has restricted commenting on his fraud police report instruction video, as well as put a disclaimer on it saying that it is "for entertainment purposes only."

Oh yes, Mr. Nazarian, you are entertaining and then some.

He seeks to entertain further. Nazarian penned his thoughts, (such as they are) about this matter, just to show us all that he knows how to handle Coyote Shivers and a "male group." It is complete with what appears to be obsessive use of a caps lock (because we all know that extra big writing is extra powerful writing) and redundant disparaging references to Texas — excuse me — TEXAS. Apparently critique of his ethics, which he imagines emanates only from the Lone Star State, is less valid for geographic reasons.

Hoo-wee, y'all, I don't rightly know what to say about that.

He has also apparently enlisted the help of one of his big time media connections at rosespeaks.com, a website following celebrity trials that gets literally dozens of visits annually. Someone there named, hold on to your seats, Rose, wrote an article saying essentially the same things that Nazarian did in his piece. She even shares John's attraction to the use of the caps lock, and his distaste for all things Texas. Ah, the California upper-crust, such savoir faire!

Rose also echoed, as though a pull cord were embedded in the back of her neck, Nazarian's contention that his fraud police report instruction video was just a bit of entertainment. After all, this is Hollywood, right?

Now, seriously, let me just see if my little old Texas brain can grasp the message from these two comically condescending not-even-B-listers.

John Nazarian, a licensed private investigator, who as a matter of public declaration makes his living off of smearing people for clients in a court system that he knows to be completely corrupt, makes a video instructing women on how to create the illusion of domestic violence, report it to police and gain the upper hand in a divorce.

But it is for entertainment purposes only.

Of course it is, and he told us so shortly after he was publicly called out on it and reports were filed with the California licensing agency.

This son of a bitch thinks Texans are dumb?

Why does Tory Shepherd support mass murder and terrorism, but oppose programs on male health?

Jonathan Taylor · 15 January 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Tory Shepherd, a writer for the publication Adelaide Now who has recently written a hit piece on the emerging Male Studies program at UniSA, is a supporter of mass murder and terrorism. How do I know this? Because she has been "linked to it." Don't worry; as you'll see in this article, it all makes sense.

As this site reported earlier, The University of South Australia will be offering courses in male studies in 2014. Contrary to the fraudulent assertions of various Feminists and their friends, the only courses available currently are for a certificate in male health.

There have been so many lies publicly circulated by Feminism & Co. about the nature of the course that the university had to make a public statement saying:

> The certificate has been developed by the University and consists of two short courses – one covering male health in perspective, another dealing with health promotion programs that target males. No other courses have been approved and any proposed courses will be evaluated through normal university processes.
>
> Contrary to its description in some media reports, the certificate is framed for people already working in health and allied health industries, and has been developed by and will be taught by University of South Australia staff only.

There is incredible need to study male health issues. Men die five years earlier than women and more often from nearly every major disease. They are also 80% of suicides and 93% of workforce deaths (see here for sources). Due to unrealistic standards about male psychology, men and boys are deterred from engaging in help-seeking strategies that may help them resolve these issues.

But apparently this is too much for some people. Tory Shepherd has taken it upon herself to launch a fusillade of distortions and smear attacks against male studies in a recent article. Upon pulling it up, the first thing one sees in bolded letters is this:

> LECTURERS in a "world-first" male studies course at the University of South Australia have been linked to extreme views on men's rights and websites that rail against feminism.

In case there was any doubt, this is a hit piece. Note the shady use of the phrase "linked to," presented in the passive voice. We'll be coming back to that soon.

Let's conduct a little experiment as we dig into this. Looking at the original article at Adelaide Now, let's count how many paragraphs and lines of text it takes before Shepherd actually allows the course instructors to define the course in their own words. Or at least, let's see how long it takes her to simply state that the courses are about male health.

We're already at one paragraph and three lines (again, looking at the original article). Let's continue.

> The lecturers' backgrounds are likely to spark controversy, but organisers of the predominantly online course, promoted as the first of its type in the world, insist they are not anti-feminist and "it's very difficult for anybody who has opposing views to get a word in".

I don't like it when we are only given quotes that in and of themselves appear very likely to be taken out of context, with no way to find the original context of the conversation ourselves. The fact that this is more or less used as a lead-in to the article is even more questionable.

Opposing views on what, exactly? Opposing misandry? Opposing Feminism? Opposing waffles and snow cones? Opposing dishonest journalism? What is being "opposed," exactly? Indeed, with the kind of quote clipping that appears to be going on here, it seems that it is indeed difficult for them to get a word in edgewise.

That's six lines, two paragraphs. We still aren't told that the courses are about male health.

> Two lecturers have been published by prominent US anti-feminist site A Voice for Men, a site which regularly refers to women as "bitches" and "whores" and has been described as a hate site by the civil rights organisation Southern Poverty Law Centre.

The SPLC? The extreme left-wing political hack group that frames everything it disagrees with as "hate"? The one that tried to slime this site by implying it had some kind of extreme right-wing agenda and wound up with a dozen eggs on its face? The one that classifies pick-up artist websites as "hate sites"?

Let's see how Shepherd's own tactics would look if applied against her. Recently a man in Virginia decided to go on a shooting rampage against the Family Research Council, taking his information about them from the SPLC's "hate map" of conservatives. He got 25 years in jail, and the government labeled it terrorist activity.

So I suppose that makes the SPLC a terrorist organization rather than a civil rights organization. Given that Tory Shepherd seems to have a lot of faith in this organization, I suppose we need to ask why Tory Shepherd supports mass murder and terrorism.

I'm sure she would disagree with the notion that she supports mass murder and terrorism. But she has been "linked to it," so that must make it true. Right?

That's the kind of slime I could throw at Shepherd if we acted like her. But I won't do that. I'll transparently acknowledge that I am writing satire. And why am I being transparent? Because I don't want to sink to the level of Tory Shepherd.

And technically, one could just as easily say that A Voice for Men is a civil rights organization. After all, one of their chief slogans is that men's rights are human rights. AVFM has consistently advocated due process for men and boys who are wrongly accused of sexual misconduct, and due process is indeed a civil right.

Oh, and that's nine lines and three paragraphs of Shepherd's article with no mention that the courses are about male health, but plenty of slime-coated attacks against the people teaching them. We continue:

> The US site specifically welcomed the UniSA course as a milestone, editor Paul Elam saying it marked the end of feminists' control of the agenda.

Even if this statement is true, why is that a bad thing? Why should the conversation on gender equity be dominated by a group of people who are gynocentric to the core? Aren't there two sexes, rather than just one? Isn't intellectual diversity a good thing? Or is conformity for the mere sake of conformity a virtue?

It's also worth questioning whether this singular program – which, again, is about male health – really has the capacity to mark the end of the Feminist hegemony in academia. It's a grand claim, but one that is – in my assessment – unrealistic. Male Studies is an excellent milestone and its developers have done an extraordinary amount of work to create it, but it simply does not have the resources to carry out such a task, even if that was its intention.

Also, that's eleven lines and four paragraphs without Shepherd telling anyone what the courses are about.

> Another, US psychology professor Miles Groth, says that date-rape awareness seminars might be deterring men from going to university.

Again, why is this a bad thing? Many "date rape awareness seminars" are really just cultish male-bashing indoctrination programs. We all remember Dr. Keith Edwards's "She Fears You" seminar at over 60 colleges and universities, don't we? Here's a picture of it for you (video here):

[image]
Imagine if the presentation was about gang violence, required only blacks to attend, and was titled "Whites Fear You?" Wouldn't that be deemed racist? This kind of institutionalized bigotry was preached at 60 colleges and universities, and that was considered A-OK by those who claim to be all about "gender sensitivity."

"She Fears You" is not alone, not by a long shot. As this site has documented time and time again, academia has been a refuge for poisonously anti-male attitudes for decades. While this atmosphere has been accepted by academics and Feminists of many stripes, apparently one program at one university on male health is unacceptable.

> Mr Den Hollander has tried to sue ladies' nights for discrimination against men. He has likened the position of men today to black people in America's south in the 1950s "sitting in the back of the bus", and blames feminists for oppressing men.

This is something that needs to be framed carefully. While the disadvantages men and boys face do sometimes function in similar ways as the oppression of blacks, it is of course not the same in terms of degree. I advise all men's advocates to not only make sure they understand this distinction, but also to make that distinction clear in their advocacy if and when they attempt to use such comparisons.

Twenty-one lines, eight paragraphs. Eight paragraphs with no mention that the course are about male health. Not some crazy patriarchal conspiracy. Just illness, death, and dying.

> The course, which has no prerequisites, begins this year and will canvass subjects from men's health to gender bias. Course founder Gary Misan, from UniSA's Centre for Rural Health and Community Development, said they were "not anti-women" and that lecturers were associated with a range of groups.

At last, after dumping a barrel of verbal feces on the course instructors, we are told what the courses are actually about. Male health! Indeed, a matter of life and death. What a terribly misogynistic thing – to be concerned about the death of men. How dare they? Shouldn't these academic upstarts know their place after decades of Feminist advocacy?

> "I wouldn't say any of them are extreme or anti-feminist," Dr Misan said. "The aim of the courses are to present a balanced view and to counter some of the negative rhetoric that exists in society in general and in some areas of academe about men.

Those "some areas of academe," in my experience and observation, are most often the humanities and certain administrative sectors.

> "It's very difficult for anybody who has opposing views to get a word in. As soon as somebody mentions anything they perceive as being anti-feminist, they're pilloried, and in some cases almost persecuted."
>
> Dr Misan also said that writing something for a specific website did not necessarily suggest an affiliation.

I can agree with that, depending on how you define affiliation. If you define it as two entities each sharing their entire missions, then what Dr. Misan said makes sense. Also, you can appear and make statements at various venues without agreeing with everything that is said at that venue, especially in the comments section of various online websites.

Let's be honest here: the opposition to male studies has nothing to do with equality. This is about a gang of hateful ideologues seeking to maintain their dominance over the conversation on gender issues in higher education. Contrary to their lies and insinuations, the knee-jerk reactionaries are not those concerned with men's health, but those stuck in the 1970s era of gender advocacy who oppose any change to the ideological status quo.

This isn't the 1970s anymore. They seriously need to bring themselves into the 21st century.

There's a lot more that I could unpack concerning Shepherd's article, but I'll stop there. Not that I can't, but the gist of Shepherd's article has been established by now. Go read Tory Shepherd's article here, and lend some comments in support of male studies.

Male Studies: canceled?

Some people have made the claim that the male studies program has been canceled. All I can say is that my information from a reputable source, which is current as of noon today, is that registration for the program is still open.

So please, if you are interested in the study of male health, if you would like to support male studies, and if you have the time to do so, please register. It is usually the case that whether a significant number of students show interest in a course will determine if it remains open, and for how long.

Although the politics of the current situation may render that general practice uncertain, it is nonetheless a point that needs to be made.

Official course information and registration links are here.

Editor's note: this item originally published on A Voice for Male Students. –DE

Elizabeth Sheehy Wants to Buy This Woman a Gun

AVfM Video Source · 16 January 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Is it me, or is shit like this getting so common that it is just another cliche at this point? PE

Are women obsolete? They are according to Statist Feminists.

John Hembling (JtO) · 16 January 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Are women obsolete? According to feminists, apparently, the answer is yes.

9 Years ago, Maureen Dowd published her book "Are Men Necessary", along with a supplied answer of "no". However, while the book's title was new, the idea was not. In fact, not even the content of the book was new. A review from Entertainment Weekly called it "a hodgepodge of recycled columns, Dorothy Parker quips, and peekaboo glimpses into the glam journalist's personal life." [1]

But Statist Feminism has been crowing about the imminent obsolescence and elimination of 49% of the world's population for over a century. It was only the rise to a nearly total control of public discourse on gender, emboldening current feminists to publicly brag about their own fascist and genocidal leanings.

Hannah Rosin, another leading light of Gender Statism, claims to have coined the term "the end of men", jumping on board the bandwagon in 2010 with a Slate article, a TED talk, and then international lionization.

The claim, formulated as a question "are men obsolete?" is also repeated on a yearly basis, most recently in January of 2014 by Dowd and Rosin on the "men are obsolete" side, and two other feminists, Caitlin Moran and Camille Paglia on the "no" side. It's certainly heartening to hear from at least some female gender ideologues that an entire class of human being still have some reason to be allowed to take up space on sidewalks and breathe public air.

I like to imagine that before they were routed from polite society, members of the KKK might have held private debates about the utility of keeping a few blacks around.

However, amid all the talk of the male human beings being unnecessary or obsolete, it's worth reviewing a few other offerings from the camp of state feminism.

Women, we are authoritatively informed, are so weak, and so bereft of personal agency, that after consuming an alcoholic beverage, they lose the adult power of being able to make a decision to participate in the act so many women and men drank for the purpose of facilitating in the first place. Namely, to get themselves a piece of ass. A woman participating in sex while drunk is not acting with the self-actualization of an adult, nope. She's a victim of rape, even if she thinks she wants sex. But what about a similarly drunk man, is he the victim of rape if he has sex while drunk? No, of course not, he's the rapist in this pantomime.

But the now-prevalent attitude advanced by gender ideologues and Statist Feminists is that a drunk and horny woman making the exact same choices as our hypothetical drunk and horny man – she is uniquely the victim. Obviously then, she is not a competent adult, while if her gender was reversed, and she were a man, the same choice would be correctly treated as an adult act of personal volition. And if we accept the public messaging we are endlessly bludgeoned with, how can we come to any conclusion other than feminine inferiority?

Considered also is what is commonly called the "wage gap." This is the claim that for every dollar earned by a man, a woman doing the same job earns only a fraction of the same pay. Usually the number is 77%, although the claimed percentage varies.

The reality of the wage gap is that averaged over the entire population, the lifetime earnings of men and women do vary by 20 to 30 percent. However, the reason for these differences are almost entirely based on the choices of career made, on average, by men and women. This has been known to be true, scientifically demonstrate, for literally decades. The reality is that women typically make career choices affording them flexibility, access to family and friends, and the option to take periods of extended leave from the workforce. By contrast, men on average make their career choices far more on the basis of income. This translates to longer hours, less time away from the work force, less flexibility, higher physical risks, and other tradeoffs of quality of life for higher pay.

Of course, in the gender-ideological narrative, none of this reality is ever touched on. Instead, it is a world-wide conspiracy to subjugate women by paying them less for identical work. That this story is stupid, and purposefully omitting significant parts of that strange thing called “reality,” seems of no import to the story’s proponents. If women really were paid only a fraction of the income men are paid for identical work, why would any company hire men at all? The first corporation to discard male employees in favour of female would obviously have an immediate economic advantage.

Some experiments along such lines have obviously been performed: corporations mandated under law to force a certain percentage of female directors. But returning to the unavoidable fact that women and men make different choices on average over their careers, is the question of what drives those choices: women and men are differently valued as human beings. Stated simply, women own their own humanity. The social concept of a woman being a human deserving her own life, freedom from coercion or violence, and freedom from harm does not require any particular accomplishment.

Men, by contrast, live with the concept of the “real man”. This is public personhood dependant on behavior, accomplishment, provision for others, and adherence to consensus evaluation of social attitudes. So when corporations are mandated by law to seat women in senior positions based on sex rather than merit, because of the differing social motivations felt by women and men, those companies under-perform compared to corporations without mandated sexual quotas.

Don’t believe me? Here’s a couple of independent studies on the matter that might help:

http://papers.ssrn.com/sol3/papers.cfm?abstract_id=1364470

http://www.bundesbank.de/Redaktion/EN/Downloads/Publications/Discussion_Paper_1/2012/2012_03_06_dkp_03.pdf?__blob=publicationFile

But of course, the realities ignored by gender ideologues will continue to operate, regardless of the wishes of the willfully ignorant.

“Women earn only 77 cents per dollar! Oh my god! They’re oppressed! It’s not the choices they make! No no, it’s not the different social expectations men and women live with, no! Noooo! They’re oppressed! Really really, and anyone pointing to evidence refuting this narrative, they just hate women!

Let’s just pause here, and take a couple of deep breaths.

The question naturally emerging is just this: How stupid do we believe ourselves to be, to keep buying into this popular narrative? Because however much we believe ourselves stupid, we become just that stupid.

Women are 51 to 52 percent of the world’s population. When pointing this out to feminists in direct conversation, they have shouted at me that women are a minority, and that 51% is not a majority.

Majority (noun): the greater part or number; the number larger than half the total[2]

For at least the last 30 years, women are also the majority of registered and active voters in almost every western nation.[3]. The difference varies geographically and over time, from 4 to 10 percent.

Had enough concrete reality for the moment? Returning to the populist fiction, we can cling to the fact that most elected representatives are male. Proof that women are oppressed and that men run everything to elevate male interests to suppress or to oppress women. Obama, just like every other US president is male, therefore, he serves the interests of men, ahead of any interests of women, right?

Sorry, but: reality time again. Reading through the language of the Obama administration’s health care legislation, how many provisions exist for women, excluding concern for men, and how many male-specific provisions exist, excluding women? How are costs distributed across the sexes, compared to how much each gender utilizes health care? More care for women, and more cost distribution onto men. This isn’t by itself a problem. At least, it wouldn’t be in a healthy culture in which women and men were not at war with one another. However, it is also obvious that elected politicians, even being mostly male, cater mostly to female interests. The majority of voters are female. And, in the Obama administration's Affordable Care Act, a number of provisions exist specifically excluding care for men.

And yet, in almost every element of our culture's Statist Feminist narrative, women are victims. The "oppressed" majority. A majority who live longer, who dominate by 65% of enrollment and graduation in universities. A majority who consumes more public health care resources. A majority who sends more of everybody's disposable income, regardless of who earns more on average over a lifetime of work.

I can still hear the crying: "But women are oppressed!"

Has anybody else noticed that domestic violence is increasingly rarely referred to as "domestic violence?" The new label, created and promoted by the actors in the Domestic Violence shelter industry, is "violence against women." Unfortunately, when domestic violence occurs in the real world, it is almost always reciprocal. That means in male/female couples, violence is initiated and maintained by both parties. A relationship including domestic violence is one with deep underlying dysfunctions, such as PTSD, drug addiction, poverty, mental illness, alcoholism or unresolved trauma from past experience of both parties. All credible and methodologically sound research on DV confirms this, but we now wrestle with the rhetoric of a billion dollar industry pretending only half the problem is real, and the other half is magic'ed out of existence by public propaganda. The shelter industry is driven by the ideology of Statist Gender Feminists, and Canada has over 500 DV shelters catering only to women, and 1 catering to men.

Incidentally, in the smaller fraction of non-reciprocal violent domestic relationships in which there is only 1 aggressor and 1 victim, the majority of the initiators of that violence are women. Piling on top of this is the equally-inconvenient fact that when we include heterosexual and non-heterosexual relationships, gay men have the lowest per capita incidence of domestic violence, and lesbian women have the highest, with heterosexual couples in the middle.

And everybody buying into the continued narrative from Statist Feminism keeps claiming, as loudly and as often as they can, that the gender of majority (i.e. women) is now, and always has been oppressed by the gender of minority (men).

But surely everybody knows our culture is a patriarchy, set up to advantage men at the continued and every escalating expense of women. Right? Right?!

Well, men do dominate in some areas. The jobs with the highest worker death tolls, and highest rates of worker-targeted violence for example. Construction, logging, fishing, law enforcement, taxi driving and so on.

Men also dominate the world of being homeless, comprising 70 to 90 percent of those who live and die on the streets.

Men are 4 out of 5 suicides. Men die earlier in every country on the planet, men are even subject to more rape per capita than women, even if we allow ideologues to exclude female perpetrated rape from their definition of that crime. The term "rape culture", by the way, was originally coined during the rise of the black civil rights movement to describe the institutional support of the rape by prison staff, and other prisoners, of mostly black, male inmates in American prisons. Now however, in spite of that, the term is used to maintain a fiction that women are victimized by a common social acceptance of female-targeted rape.

While its arguable that many men, and possibly even most men, understand much of this already, they do not dare say so openly because it is culturally forbidden. For men, speaking openly of any of these forbidden realities carries the cost of social death: the loss, by consensus, of public identity as a "good man".

But the Statist Gender Ideologues we commonly refer to as feminists not only continue to insist on the eternal, ever-escalating victimhood and oppression of women, they also demonstrate an established, persistent pattern of authoritarian, organized censorship of any real criticism of that pernicious, violent and hateful ideology. However, in Toronto, where so much public feminist absurdity has been practiced for the benefit of observers around the world, sponsored by the University of Toronto and the Canadian Union of Public Employees, the feminist "protestors" attempting to silence non-conformists actually put "down with fascists" in their chants.

Supported by the a public University, a national union of public employees, censoring the expression of differing view-point–classic fascist tactics–shouting, among other things, "down with fascists." I don't know how to draw a simpler picture without breaking out a box of crayons.

Despite decades of overwhelming public support, public funding, and government support and funding, feminism is the underdog here, right? A permanent federal commission on the status of women. A national office and minister of the status of women, with no such institution addressing the needs of men. Every major university in the Western world operating university-funded women's centres, and no balancing men's resources. DV shelters catering only to women, and the fraudulent fiction of sexually one-sided female-victimizing domestic abuse maintained to keep the money flowing. Despite women being the majority of the population, the majority of voters, and consuming the majority of disposable income, we are to believe women, being the majority, are oppressed by the minority who die earlier. The minority who do the most deadly and dangerous jobs, who kill themselves more, who are homeless more, who suffer 60% higher criminal sentencing for identical crimes, and who die 4 to 7 years earlier than women.

If the gender of majority are actually the victims that Statist Gender Ideologues claim, then they must also be the gender of inferiority. There is no other possible conclusion. Feminists are telling us, and have been telling us for over a century, that women are, in almost every way, the inferiors of men. In fact, if you do not believe that women are oppressed, then you are not a feminist. This is not my definition, it is the definition feminists routinely insists on as a critical component of their own narrative. The message from feminism is inescapable – and that message is that women are now, and always have been inferior. In fact, what feminism, our culture's dominant narrative is saying to every one of us in 1000-foot-high text is that women are obsolete.

[1] http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Are_Men_Necessary%3F_When_Sexes_Collide

[2] http://dictionary.reference.com/browse/majority?s=t

[3] http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Voting_gender_gap

The true meaning of oppression

Sam Allouba · 16 January 2014 · Archived copy · Original

I'd like to share two hypothetical scenarios with you today.

The first involves a young child living with her parents. She has access to clean, running water and a hot shower. She has a fridge, stocked with all the food she could want. She sleeps in a warm bed and has parents who love her. She has a driver's license. She access to free health care. She's literate and educated. She votes in annual general elections, and works full-time.

The second scenario involves a young child also living with her parents. She does not have access to clean, running water as she has to get it from a local well in her village. There is no clean shower at home and has to clean herself in a small stream, just a ways from her home. She shares a broken bed with her sibling. Her father was executed by local religious fanatics and her mother was savagely assaulted and nearly left for dead. She is not allowed to pursue an education and most certainly does not have the right to vote because the ruling government has deemed such rights to be heretical. Does she work? What do you think?

Now here comes the fun part. Tell me which person is suffering from oppression.

[image]
What the guy in the purple suit said…
The first scenario is a day in the life of a Western girl, living in Canada, the U.S., or the U.K. The second scenario is a day in the life of an Afghani girl, living under former Taliban rule. You would think the easy answer would be scenario number two when asked to identify the oppressed one. It's not that it's difficult. It's just inconvenient.

A few days ago, I made the grossly miscalculated decision to engage in an online discussion with an ideologue. While I did my best to keep the discussion on track, all I was met with was hostility, anger, and a general attitude of, "You're wrong, I'm right, you're stupid, I'm not, yada yada yada". Eventually, this individual took it upon himself to write a status update with the words, "Men's rights groups are bullshit". It's his opinion and he's entitled to it just as much as anyone else but I made another mistake in responding to that update as it only invited further vitriol, especially when the feminist brigade showed up and brought the usual shaming tactics with them.

The best part was when the subject of male victims of domestic violence came up and when asked for hard facts, I presented a joint study conducted by the CDC and U.S. Department of Justice which showed that men comprise over 40% of severe physical violence victims, and that more men than women were victims of intimate partner violence than women. Did that change anything? You guessed it; no. The reasoning of the contributing gender warriors was that because the study is governmental in origin and not from a scientific journal, its validity was in the toilet.

So how does this all tie in to my scenarios of oppression? Because the conversation took a turn when one such ideologue commented that MHRAs do no kind of activism or advocacy, opting instead to be keyboard warriors against feminists online. Another commenter followed up with, after I said I do not claim oppression status as a male living in Canadian society,

"Which given your lack of an ability to empathize with others, gives you a very limited ability to understand what oppression really is."

[image]
Male privilege in India – 1972
This comment came from an educated woman, who lives on her own, in a major city, from the comfort of her own home, likely on her couch in her living room, behind a laptop screen that she owns. You know what else? She identifies with feminist ideals.

How anyone can think of themselves as being oppressed while living in this society is beyond me. I'll say the same thing here that I said on Facebook. There are Palestinians living in the West Bank that would kill for that kind of oppression. Ladies and gentlemen, listen to me very carefully.

If you live in Canada, America, or Great Britain, you are not oppressed. If you were born here, raised here, educated here, and enjoy the rights and freedoms each country's respective constitution affords you, you can't even begin to imagine what oppression truly is. You do not know what it is like to have your basic human rights denied to you, to live in fear of a military government, to not be educated, to starve, or to watch your loved ones die in the street because they crossed the road at the wrong time of day. Do I believe men and women are marginalized in their own ways in Western society? Absolutely they are. Both sexes have their share of rubbish to deal with in life, though I would contend that men have it worse in a lot of ways. Like I said, we're marginalized.

But oppressed? Not in your wildest dreams.

Editorial note: this item first appeared on Men's Human Rights Ontario. –DE Masculinity is more than a mask

Dr. Christina Hoff Sommers · 16 January 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Editorial note: a recent popular documentary has been getting a lot of press lately. Just seeing the trailer for this film, we suspect most AVfM readers will spot things they agree with in this trailer but will probably also see huge problems with what look like major problems with the filmmaker's premises. Here is the trailer for that movie:

Dr. Hoff Sommers had some things to say about it which confirm we're not alone in our suspicions. –DE

Are school shooters and mass murderers born out of an aggressive emphasis on masculinity in our society? The trailer for filmmaker and feminist activist Jennifer Siebel Newsom's new documentary, The Mask You Live In, would have us think so.

The recently released trailer has attracted 1 million views on YouTube. It argues that American boys are captive to a rigid and harmful social code of masculinity. From the earliest age, they are told to "Be a man!" "Don't cry!" "Stop with the emotion!" and "Man up!" This "guy code" suppresses their humanity, excites their drive for dominance and renders many of them dangerous. The trailer features adolescent men describing their isolation, despair and thoughts of suicide, artfully interspersed with terrifying images of school shooters and mass murderers.

I admire Newsom for using her considerable talent to advocate for boys. But I worry that she is less concerned with helping boys than with re-engineering their masculinity according to specifications from some out-of-date gender-studies textbook. The trailer is suffused with males-are-toxic ideology but shows little appreciation for how boys' nature can be distinctively good. The Mask You Live In is scheduled to be released later this year. Let's hope there is still time for edits.

Here are a few suggestions:

1. Recognize that masculinity is more than a "mask"

The title and content of the film suggest that masculinity is a cultural creation. That is only marginally true. A lot of typical boy behavior, such as rough-and-tumble play, risk taking and fascination with gadgets rather than dolls, appears to have a basis in biology. Researchers have found, for example, that female monkeys play with dolls much more than their brothers, who prefer toy cars and trucks. Are male monkeys captive to a "guy code?" A recent study on sex differences by researchers from the University of Turin, in Italy, and the University of Manchester, in England, confirms what most of us see with our eyes: with some exceptions, women tend to be more sensitive, esthetic, sentimental, intuitive and tender-minded, while men tend to be more utilitarian, objective, unsentimental and tough-minded. We do not yet fully understand the biological underpinnings of these universal tendencies, but that is no reason to deny they exist.

2. Appreciate the difference between healthy and pathological masculinity

Some boys are hypermasculine or pathologically masculine. They are bullies and worse, establishing their male bona fides through destruction, mayhem and preying on the weak and vulnerable. But most boys evince healthy masculinity. They may enjoy mayhem in games and sports, but in life they like to build, not destroy. Their instinct is not to exploit vulnerable people but to protect and defend them. Of course, all boys need guidance and discipline from the adults in their lives. I agree with Newsom that telling a boy to "man up" can be harsh and degrading. But teaching him to "be a gentleman" is another matter. It's a tried-and-true way to bring out the best in males.

3. Acknowledge the virtue of male reserve

Newsom's film tells us that boys in our society don't feel safe talking about emotions and personal struggles. To do so violates the boy code and subjects them to shame and ridicule. The driving message of Newsom's film is that we must free our young men to become emotionally expressive. Of course, parents should do all they can to improve their sons' emotional literacy. But parents (as well as wives and girlfriends) should keep in mind that male reticence has its advantages.

A 2012 a study surveyed and observed nearly 2,000 children and adolescents and found that boys and girls have very different expectations about the value of problem talk. Girls were more likely to report that personal disclosure made them feel cared for and understood. Boys, overall, found it to be a tedious waste of time — and "weird." Contrary to what we learn from Newsom's film, boys did not find personal disclosure embarrassing or unmasculine. According to the study's author, Amanda Rose: "Boys' responses suggest they just don't see talking about problems to be a particularly useful activity" (emphasis added).

But in girls, excessive problem talk is in fact linked to anxiety and depression. Male stoicism may be adaptive and protective. If you want a boy to be more forthcoming, Rose has good advice for parents and counselors: "You will have to persuade him that it serves a practical purpose." Engage his male instinct for problem solving.

4. Make clear that most boys are psychologically sound and resilient

The Mask You Live In gives the impression that the average adolescent boy is severely depressed. In fact, clinical depression is rare among boys. (National Institute of Mental Health data show that the prevalence of depression among among 13- to 17-year-old boys is 4.3%; among girls of the same age group, it is 12.4%.)

Newsom's film reports that every day in the U.S. three or more boys take their own lives. Suicide is, indeed, primarily a male disease. Among 10- to 24-year-olds, 81% of suicide victims are male. In 2010, a total of 3,951 young men died by their own hands. Male suicide is a much neglected scourge, and Newsom's efforts to raise awareness are admirable. Still, in a nation of nearly 33 million boys, that means that the percentage of boys who commit suicide is close to 0.01%. Each of these deaths is a tragedy. But it helps no one to pretend that suicide is typical male behavior.

Attention-deficit/hyperactivity disorder (ADHD) does appear to be an epidemic among boys, but the implications of that are ambiguous. It could be that as a society, we are pathologizing age-old male rambunctiousness. Some experts have suggested that ADHD would be significantly reduced if we allowed boys more unstructured recess and occasions for spirited rough-and-tumble play. Yet, in Newsom's documentary, scenes of boys engaging in mock fisticuffs, playfully head-butting and chasing one another around the playground are offered as evidence of how young males are driven to "prove" their aggressive masculinity.

5. Include specific ideas on how to help boys with depression or thoughts of suicide

Some of the most promising, innovative ideas are coming out of Australia. In 2006, a report in the Medical Journal of Australia argued for a paradigm shift in the nation's mental-health system. Rather than blaming "masculinity" or trying to "re-educate" men away from their reluctance to seek help, the author asks, "Why not provide health services that better meet the needs of men?"

The Australians are now developing male-specific mental-health protocols. A 2012 Australian study, for example, found that large majorities of young men associate the term mental health with insanity and straightjackets. Mental fitness seems to go over better with men. The Australians recently launched a mental-fitness app for guys. The focus is on acquiring "skills," developing "strengths" and achieving "self-mastery." But doesn't that reinforce traditional narratives of masculinity? It certainly does — that's the point, and the key to its promise.

The energy, competitiveness and corporal daring of normal males are responsible for much good in the world. No one denies that boys' aggressive and risk-taking tendencies must be socialized and channeled toward constructive ends. But the de–Tom Sawyering of the American boy should not be anyone's agenda. I am sure it is not Newsom's. Yet her film in progress suggests otherwise.

Editor's note: this item has been cross-posted from Time Magazine with permission.–DE

One for the boys

AVfM Video Source · 17 January 2014 · Archived copy · Original

You might have minor quibbles with the delivery, but it still needs to be said.

Meme: Facebook Fail

AVFM · 17 January 2014 · Archived copy · Original

As the social media giant Facebook continues to slide directly into a mud pit of political correctness, they are now banning people for getting healthy and inspiring others to do the same. C'mon Jaclyn Friedman, you know it was you. If you just lost the weight, you would feel better about yourself.

[image]

Propaganda by Trust Law: 1 out of 6 women are trafficked for prostitution in India

Anil Kumar · 17 January 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Often, International Media opens the eyes of common people like me in India. One fine day in June 2011, I was shocked to be told that 1 out of 6 of all my female friends were trafficked for prostitution. Not only that, one out of six women I will meet at my workplace, on the street, or on the train are also victims of human trafficking. I got enlightened that day due to Trust Law, an NGO run by Thomson Reuters Foundation.

Trust Law Website says (link, link)

> India ranked fourth primarily due to female foeticide, infanticide and human trafficking. In 2009, India's then-Home Secretary Madhukar Gupta estimated that 100 million people, mostly women and girls, were involved in trafficking in India that year.
>
> The practice is common but lucrative so it goes untouched by government and police," said Cristi Hegranes, founder of the Global Press institute, which trains women in developing countries to be journalists. India's Central Bureau of Investigation estimated that in 2009 about 90 percent of trafficking took place within the country and that there were some 3 million prostitutes, of which about 40 percent were children.

Trust Law and its noteworthy social scientists would actually deserve a Nobel Peace Prize for revealing the startling facts to the world that 100 million people, mostly women and girls, are involved in trafficking in India in 2009. If it were true.

A back-of-envelope calculation by a 5th grader can show that this statistic is complete bullshit. India had 1.2 billion people with a female population of about 600 million. So, in the single year 2009, 100 million out of 600 million women and girls in India are involved in trafficking.

Why just stop here? I can do a roleplay of an international gender expert and now extrapolate this yearly data to calculate how many women and girls are involved in trafficking in a decade or 50 years? I can easily estimate that in a decade, there may be 150 million, and in a lifetime all women are trafficked at least once.

What pained me the most is the stupidity of thousands of journalists and sociologists across the world who failed to do a simple calculation. The collective stupidity is dismaying. Needless to say, India was soon ranked as 4th most dangerous place for women and the Indian parliament started shaking, with communists attacking the Government for the "plight of women."

Hundreds of main stream new media outlets published the news and media channels in India debating endlessly for couple of days. (CNN, NDTV)

Of course, Trust Law claimed that the estimate is supplied to them by India's Home Secretary Madhukar Gupta, a top Bureaucrat in India's Home Ministry. Now, there is no way anyone track him, as he is not a public figure. Maybe he was misquoted. But, Trust law used his shoulder to fire the gun.

Why did Indian Home Ministry not challenge the figures?

For that, we need to understand something about India's relation with western countries. For most of its history after independence, India was a poor country helplessly dependent on Russia and many Western countries. They used to get foreign aid. So, the Indian Government never used to be assertive in International politics (except when they blasted the nukes) and they used to lack confidence in dealing with even small countries like Sweden or Denmark.

I grew up watching news in media about how a low ranking Minister from Denmark has acknowledged India's position in Kashmir. Basically, Indian politicians and Government often used to look for certificates from even the smallest western countries. This has stopped now.

The diplomatic rows India had with Australia, Norway, Italy in the last couple of years, and a recent diplomatic row with USA show, the current experimentation by the Indian Government in taking on other countries.

So, India is still not-so-confident country. So, the Government has not yet developed the skill or confidence to challenge the negative propaganda about India in western media, which has been going on many decades. Indian Politicians and older generation of bureaucrats often have no clue about how to deal with such propaganda, and they tend to avoid the issue.

But, if Trust Law had dared to publish ridiculous statistics, like, “100 million women in China involved in trafficking,” the Chinese Government would have asked the British Ambassador to stand in front of Forbidden Palace and apologize on behalf of Trust Law. They would have also banned any Reuters publications in China.

Irresponsible Main Stream Media

Today, many Main Stream Media editors openly claim about the accountability they have built into reporting, while they term social media as irresponsible. We can see how hollow their claims are. If they really wanted to lie or publish false statistics, at least they would have attempted to create some type of coverup. Maybe, they should have claimed 20 million women are girls in India are trafficked for prostitution. The fact that they did not even attempt to cover up shows they are incompetent and stupid. The question is, can we leave our societies to such idiots?

Expectation from British Government

The headquarters of the Thomson Reuters Foundation is in London. Its CEO is Monique Villa. The British Government should conduct an investigation into this issue and force Trust Law to give an unconditional apology to the people of India for publishing false statistics. The choice is with the British Government and the British people.

No one in the world likes false statistics about his culture or civilization. The British would not certainly like false statistics stating that 1 in 6 British women are forced into sex traficking being published in India or another country. As we know, the main stream media and NGOs are rarely held to account. It is time for British Government to step in and put the records straight. Such propaganda from British soil can and probably will eventually trigger a diplomatic row in the future.

Monique Villa should resign to set an example for others about restoring integrity in main stream media.

Now, if the British Government or Thomson Reuters do not act on this issue, they lose our respect and they degrade the reputation of the British people across the world.

A weird spectacle: destroying children “for their own good”

Robert St. Estephe · 17 January 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Robert St. Estephe–Gonzo Historian–is dedicated to uncovering the forgotten past of marginalizing men. “Gonzo journalism” is characterized as tending “to favor style over fact to achieve accuracy.” Yet history – especially “social history” – is written by ideologues who distort and bury facts in order to achieve an agenda. “Gonzo” writing is seen as unorthodox and surprising. Yet, in the 21st century subjectivity, distortion and outright lying in non-fiction writing is the norm. Fraud is the new orthodoxy. Consequently, integrity is the new “transgressive.”

Welcome to the disruptive world of facts, the world of Gonzo History.

●●●

Men Going Their Own Way (MGTOW) is an ethos of freedom, an anti-slavery mindset. Yet so is FGTOW (Familes Going Their Own Way): homeschooling, rejecting State-sponsored ideological indoctrination, Pavlovian reward/punishment conditioning conducted in child-warehouses, refusing to cooperate with the government-pharmacological complex.

Below are three articles, the first of which is a dramatic story from 1907 showing a Nebraska American Indian family’s struggle against the United States government’s “re-education” policy.

This new story is followed by an article from1892 — 15 years before the event described in the Nebraska story — illustrating the treatment of American Indians by the Federal government as it was implemented in its progressive social engineering policy.

And below that is a much more recent account, from 1974, showing the horrible consequences of this government experiment in “outcome-based education” (the buzzword in current use by federal education experts) and the continuing struggle for civil rights waged by the target population, Indians.

The patriarchal natural family (whether “nuclear” or “extended”) is traditionally the target of ideologues who envision a cradle-to-grave all powerful nanny state. Feminist dogma, as it is promulgated today, claims it has a lollipop land of painlessness and unchecked bounty in store for us all if we would all just cooperate in its “it takes a village” vision. Here’s a book at what top-down bureaucracy can pull off.

The perversity of the early American experiment of government-implemented social engineering through the warehousing and “training” of children to make them more utilizable “human resources” will prompt you to wonder: “How the hell to think you can get away with calling that a ‘village?'”

***

[image]

FULL TEXT (Article 1 of 3):Waterloo, Iowa, Aug. 22. – With only one arm and one leg, an aged Indian, who kidnapped his boy from an industrial school in Nebraska, to-day fought off two deputy United States marshals who, having pursued him across two states, overtook him in the woods thirty miles north of here. The red man’s nose was also gone and as he fought desperately for the possession of his son with his one hand, he presented a weird spectacle.

The officers were armed with revolvers and the old man had only a club, but he flourished it so spiritedly that his pursuers kept out of range. While the combat was in progress the boy escaped and his in a cornfield.

The old Indian’s story is sad. One son died two years ago. The boy that he kidnapped was the only remaining [male] child. The government officials placed him in an industrial school for some unknown reason. This grieved the father and mother. The father imagined that his son was being worked so hard that he, too, might die. Then, after a consultation with his wife, he decided to abduct the boy. He succeeded, and the reunited family set out with a span of ponies for the Wisconsin reservation. Officers took the trail and overtook them.

When the crippled old Indian saw the officers approach he broke down and wept. His wife and daughter united their tears with his. Seeing that tears would not avail to save his son, the father grabbed a club and attacked the officers with terrible fury.

["Crippled Father Fought For Son – Aged Indian Held Two United Sates Marshals at Bay With a Club." Manitoba Free Press (Winnipeg, Canada), Aug. 23, 1907]

NOTE: The Indian Industrial School at Genoa, Nebraska was the fourth non-reservation boarding institution established by the Office of Indian Affairs. The facility opened on February 20, 1884, and, like other such schools, its mission was to educate and teach Christianity to Native American children. The village of Genoa was selected because the Federal Government already owned the former Pawnee Reservation property there; however, existing buildings at the site were unsuitable and in poor repair. Like many buildings designed for Indian school campuses, this was a simple three-story structure with a hipped roof and a small triangular pediment above the center entrance. The pairs of tall windows and the strong horizontal lines across the front created a balanced composition. This was a popular design during the late 1880s. The school closed in 1934. [fromWikipedia]

[image]

FULL TEXT (Article 2 of 3): A dispatch, from Kingman, in Arizona, announces that a few days ago representatives from five tribes or bands of Indians met at Pine Springs to protest against having their children taken away and sent to Government schools in the East. It is said that some of them were for resorting to arms, and that a great many families had gone to the mountains to prevent their boys and girls from being carried off. It is quite possible that the parents have exaggerated the risks they run, but their feeling that it is a hardship to have their children carried a long distance away is natural. The Fifty-first Congress at its second session passed a law authorizing and directing the Commissioner of Indian Affairs "to make and enforce by proper means such rules and regulations as will secure the attendance of Indian children of suitable age and health at schools established and maintained for their benefit." This compulsory attendance law furnishes the basis for the action of which the Arizona bands complain. But whether Congress foresaw that the authority thus given would be used to take children against the will of their parents hundreds of thousands of miles from their homes may not be so clear. To civilized people such a removal will, of course, seem a great opportunity for the youngsters. They are cared for, fed, clothed, and instructed without cost, and are made much fitter for citizenship and for success in life than their companions who receive no such advantages. But while we understand all this, to the Indian fathers and mothers the forcible wresting away of their children must look very much like kidnapping.

The Indian Bureau itself has recognized this difficulty in its rules and regulations, which prescribe that, "So far as practicable, the preferences of Indian parents or guardians, or of Indian youth of sufficient maturity and judgment, will be regarded as to whether the attendance shall be at Government, public, or private schools." But it is further provided that, if schools in the reservations are lacking or already filed," or if for other reasons the good of the children shall clearly require that they be sent away from home to school, they will, be placed in non-reservation schools." – which seems to mean that, unless the parents part with them willingly, they may be taken away by force. But a law which is perfectly sound and wise, if administered by people with discretion, for procuring attendance at the reservation schools, might cause some distress if enforced to the extent of separating children from their parents for years together. Nor is is it usually understood that the Eastern training schools are unable to get their quota of pupils without such a process. There are Indians, presumably, who allow their children to go to these schools. But, however that may be, it is particularly desirable, in neighborhoods where objection is made, if the Government schools are full and private or contract schools can take them, that they should do so where the provisions made by Congress will permit.

There is no doubt that the main hope of civilizing the red man and of bringing them into line with American citizens lies in the training of their children. It would be unwise to allow the prejudices of ignorant parents to deprive the rising generation of the provisions made by the Government for their benefit. Yet it is quite evident that in this matter sound judgment and careful consideration of the peculiar circumstances of the red men are needed. Commissioner MORGAN has noted that the Indians “are loath to have their children taken from them, even for a short time. They are devotedly attached to them, miss their companionship, and are accustomed to rely upon their assistance in the performance of such simple duties as they are capable of.” Perhaps in this statement may be found an explanation of the feeling of bitterness against the Government which is now reported to exist among some of the Arizona bands. It would hardly be fair to charge them with prejudice against education if what they are really prejudiced against should turn out to be simply the sending of their offspring far away. It does not appear from the dispatch that they would object to having them instructed in schools where the parents could still have a share in their companionship. The problem, no doubt, is a difficult one, but it is evident that, while an admirable work is done by the Eastern training schools – one of whose advantages is in taking the children at an impressionable age away from their savage home surroundings – yet the ultimate reliance for the great body of the Indians must be in schools on and near the reservations. Commissioner MORGAN in his last report made a strong appeal to Congress for the multiplication of day schools, fully supplied with all the means to make up for the lack of home instruction. It would require no very extravagant amount to furnish sufficient schools and instruction for such of the Indian children of school age as cannot now be accommodated somewhere, and it might be a wise expenditure to do this within the next few years. With more reservation schools the compulsory attendance law would be enforced with a better grace and without embittering the lives of Indian parents in seeking the benefit of their offspring. [“Indian Education.” The New York Times (N.Y.), Sep. 20, 1892, p. 4]

[image]

FULL TEXT: (Article 3 of 3): Washington, D.C. — At what point does governmental intrusion, whether federal, state or local into Indian family life to protect a child become “kidnaping” [sic] and “cultural genocide,” and what should be the role of a tribal government in this area?

These questions were at the heart of testimony taken from about 30 witnesses by the Senate Indian Affairs Subcommittee in two days of hearings April 8-9 to document what Committee Chairman Sen. James D. Abourezk, D-S.D., called “abusive child removal practices which are destroying Indian families.”

Lead-off witness William Byler, executive director of the Association on American Indian Affairs, stated that based on his organization’s surveys, “approximately 25 to 35 per cent of all Indian children are separated from their families and placed in foster homes, adoptive homes, or institutions.” Institutions were defined by Byler as federal or mission boarding schools or state training schools.

Byler cited the following statistics: In Minnesota the rate of adoption of Indian children per capita is five times greater than that of non Indian children; in South Dakota the foster care rate is nearly 16 times greater per capita; in Washington state the adoption rate is 19 times greater, the foster care rate 10 times greater; in Michigan, 16 times greater.

A number of Indian parents before the subcommittee recited a litany of abuses they and their children suffered at the hands of state and county welfare workers eager to remove the children from what they deemed a home environment of “neglect” or “social deprivation.”

Margaret Townsend (Paiute) of Fallen, Nev., described how her children were forcibly taken from her home without her consent and placed in foster care homes by county welfare workers after she had been arrested — her first arrest — for driving while intoxicated. With the aid of an MIA attorney Mrs. Townsend was finally able to get a court to release her children from the custody of the county and return them to her.

Her daughter Anna was also a witness. Anna was supposed to describe to the subcommittee the treatment she and her younger brother endured in their foster home. Instead, Anna gave more effective testimony. After a brave start; she broke down and cried.

Other witnesses told of outright abduction of Indian children from their parents Byler of AAIA told how Benita Rowland had been taken by two Wisconsin women with the collusion of a local missionary from South Dakota after her Oglala Sioux mother was tricked into signing a form purportedly granting them permission to take the child on a short visit but, in fact, agreeing to her adoption. It was months before Mrs. Rowland could obtain counsel and regain her daughter.

Governmental intrusion in to the privacy of family life is not confined to Indian families. However, witnesses testified to the qualitative differences between removal of non-Indian children and that of Indian children.

Non-Indian children are taken into custody by the government when, said two physician witnesses, the child has no recognized or legally appointed guardian, that is, is dependent or abandoned; when the child has been involved in delinquent acts; when the child's needs are not being met by the family, constituting neglect; and when the child is being physically abused.

According to the witnesses, Indian children are removed for the above reasons and in addition for the following reasons: to meet the educational needs of the child, or because a social worker does not feel the reservation is a fit place for any child to be brought up, or because the lowered birth rate in the dominant race leaves fewer children available for adoption, and thus Indian children are considered "fair game."

The effects of these unwarranted removals and placements with non-Indians are psychologically disastrous for both parents and children, according to witnesses. Gov. Robert E. Lewis, president of the National Tribal Chairmen's association (NTCA), said:

"Children who must adjust to a new way of life away from their own cultural group often must overcome a language barrier, adjust to a new religion, learn new foods and are often faced with overt and covert racism."

Melvin Sampson, Yakima tribal councilman, while acknowledging the good intentions of non-Indians who adopt Indian children, said: "The damaging effect this creates on our Indian children is beyond the scope of evaluation. The Indian is on the receiving end of a total lack of understanding. They literally surfer when they discover that their physical appearance is not that or their adopted parents. The wonderment and search for true identity is crucial and probably, at times never completed."

The causes of this latter day "Indian removal" campaign were described by witnesses as follows: a lack of standards for what constitutes mistreatment that is relevant to Indian culture; failure of social workers and courts to follow 'due process of law"; strictures in taking children away from parents; social conditions in Indian families such as low income, poor health and substandard housing which make Indian children prime targets for removal.

One particular problem stems directly from the inadequacy of tribal courts to cope with demands by social workers that they authorized the removal of a child. According to witnesses, they have no independent means of either experts or resources to judge the validity of a request by a social worker to remove a child from his home. In states where tribes have lost civil and criminal jurisdiction over their reservation under Public Law 280, the situation is even worse because the tribes have absolutely no role in removal.

The BIA also came under fire at the hearings for its role or lack of it in this area. A witness charged that the BIA is spending over $1,040,000 in Minnesota to provide for foster care payments. Since it is a PL 280 state, Minnesota should be picking up this expense, according to Abourezk aide Sherwin Brodhead. Recommendations for reform by witnesses included repeal of PL 280 so affected tribes will have more control over what happens to their children, revision of standards governing child welfare issues to conform to Indian cultural life, and strengthening of due process to protect parents faced with losing their children.

["Indian Adoption vs. 'Kidnaping' Answers Sought," Independent (Gallup, N.M.), Apr. 23, 1974, p. 2]

Canada: a first world cuntry

Diana Davison and John Hembling · 18 January 2014 · Archived copy · Original

January 18th is an important day for Canada. It's a day that should be flagged in history and remembered annually as a moment that marks a monumental change in the direction of society. It is now the Canadian National Disposable Male Day and Canada is paving the way for a brave new world in which men are, officially, insignificant in the eyes of the law.

On January 18th, one year ago, the Supreme Court of Canada made a decision: They found that Nicole Ryan (now using her maiden name of Nicole Doucet) had been acquitted of her admitted crime due to an error in law. The crime? Trying to hire someone to kill her estranged husband. The Supreme Court of Canada acknowledged that justice had not been served but put a stay on prosecution for a retrial because they felt Nicole had been through an emotional ordeal.

On January 18th, Canada judicially stopped caring about attempted murder when the criminal has a vagina. Because of her feelings. Because Nicole had been through a lot of stress and had lost weight. Because Nicole, a woman, was looking a little peaked.

While Men's Human Rights Activists (MHRAs) know that women being absolved of responsibility for their crimes against men happens all the time, this case is unique. The Crown prosecutor, along with every legal professional versed in the case, presumably aside from the defence attorney, was shocked with the acquittal. The husband, Michael Ryan, was not called to testify because the prosecutor felt the case was a "slam dunk" and he didn't need to subject Michael to the trial proceedings. And yet she was acquitted.

Nicole confessed to her undercover RCMP assassin that Michael had never physically abused her. Nicole's accounts of the threats and fear she harboured were inconsistent. Nicole's husband lived 180 km away from her at the time and had custody of their child because psychological assessments deemed Nicole less stable as a parent.

Nicole, prior to these events, also tried to kill her sister by running her over with a car. Twice.

But Canadian Justice David Farrar decided that Nicole, despite lacking any corroborating evidence, was telling the truth and acted in the only way any "rational" person would: by contracting the death of another human being.

Congratulations, Canada. Murder is now a rational choice. If you have a vagina.

To be fair, the Supreme Court recognized that the judge, David Farrar made a mistake. He failed to apply the laws properly and Nicole's defence of "duress" was not an admissible defence for the crime of which she was accused: It was similar to claiming that the Devil made her do it.

At the time, Canadian law did not, at the level of Supreme Court, accept the existence of Satan. This might have caused Nicole problems if she'd been a man.

What Canada decided to do about this situation was, again, unique. January 18th marks the day when the law put the health of a person accused of attempted murder above the concern for the crime of attempted murder.

Caution: Don't try this at home unless you have a vagina.

Appeals are a specific thing. In law you can only appeal a case if there was an error in the application of law, you can't appeal just because you didn't like the decision. This is a point of confusion for many people. The prosecutor in Nicole Ryan/Doucet's case was well versed in law and in the appeal pointed out that her defence was illegitimate. This ended up being held against the prosecutor, even though he was right.

The Supreme Court of Canada recognized that the prosecutor was correct and that Nicole should be retried for trying to murder her ex-husband but they stayed a retrial for the following reason:

> The abuse she suffered and the protracted nature of these proceeding(s) have taken an enormous toll on her.

The “abuse” Nicole suffered was actually the bone of contention.

Nicole was not only free from duress, she was free from abuse. Her “abuser” lived almost 200 km away. Indeed, Nicole admitted during a videotaped interview with the RCMP that her ex husband had never physically abused her, and that he had not kidnapped their child. Rather, he had been granted custody after an investigation by child advocates in family court decided she was not the better parent.

It takes a lot in Canada for a mother to be deemed unfit.

Nicole’s “abuse” seems to have been that she didn’t think she was going to get her fair share of property holdings. Her father was keen to help her secure a financially sound future and participated in the acquisition of a hitman.

Comedic break: They first tried to convince a local fisherman to kill Michael Ryan by shoving $25,000 at him. The fisherman took the money but didn’t kill anyone. Because, what are they going to do? Report him to the police?

By the time Nicole figured out that fishermen don’t make good killers (other than killers of fish) just by virtue of their masculinity, she was getting a little pressed for time. Perhaps that’s when she started losing weight and looking a little stressed out. It must have been difficult for her to continue her job as a schoolteacher, training our youth to be moral citizens, while actively seeking the murder of her ex husband.

During this time Michael Ryan was under no stress by the obvious fact that he had no idea that a hit-man was being hired to kill him. Only men have this privilege. Women, on the other hand, are constantly informed by feminists that they could be raped at any moment so we carry the burden of worrying about our personal survival where men are kept in a blissful state of ignorance.

Only the Canadian Supreme Court has been bold enough to recognize that ignorance of one’s own impending demise makes the threat less relevant.

As of today, the stay of proceedings has reached it’s expiry date. Lawyers fumed and fretted, protested and objected, stated their cases and were validated, and made no difference in holding Ms. Doucet liable for her crimes. But while Nicole Ryan/Doucet may never be forced to stand trial for a crime she acknowledges committing , we will not forget.

> He was a six-foot-three former soldier and 230 pounds. She was five-foot-three and 115 pounds.

And yet it doesn’t take 230 pounds or more than five-foot-three in height to hire an assassin.

So we are here to celebrate a national event in a ‘first world cuntry’. Canada has paved the way. We no longer have to wonder who is superior, who is in control or which gender gets to decide who lives or dies. The only demand upon women who find their spouses problematic is that they should try to not get caught.

Trials, you see, are expensive and time consuming. Indeed, Elizabeth Sheehy, a University of Ottawa law professor and prominent legal activist with the Elizabeth Fry Societies asked in the National Post last month: “Is it an appropriate expenditure of taxpayer dollars to prosecute battered women [who murder] at full tilt, in light of the compassionate response of Canadian judges and jurors who hear all the evidence?”

Interestingly, Doucet admitted to RCMP she had never been physically abused by her ex husband, despite the attempt to use a narrative of abuse in her defence.

But it costs the public a lot of money to prosecute women for crimes for which they will ultimately be absolved.

However, another Canadian, also a professor of law, at Dalhousie University, had a bit of a problem in just letting this day become a point of acceptance. Professor Archibald Kaiser has been tackling the issue from a point of view that feminists protecting Ms. Doucet didn’t expect: the enforcement of law.

Yes, some people still care about upholding the law regardless of which genitals a murderer happens to be born with. Not many people, but they still exist.

Of course they have formidable adversaries. In the case of Her Majesty the Queen vs Nicole Patricia Ryan we had the following “intervenors”: The Attorney General of Ontario, The Canadian Association of Elizabeth Fry Societies, The Women’s Legal Education and Action Fund, and the Criminal Lawyers’ Association of Ontario.

We’ll pause here to say hello to Elizabeth Sheehy, a feminist legal activist who claims to be merely reporting the weather, rather than creating it.

Isn’t interference considered a foul in sports?

But there you have it. Canadian law is not a matter of upholding a civilized society anymore. It’s just a sport, and the referees are feminists.

There is, however, a bit of a problem standing in the way of Canadian National Disposable Male Day. The problem is Professor Archibald Kaiser, and Men’s Human Rights Activists, like us.

We can’t speak for Professor Kaiser, or know with certainty if he is in this for the long haul. What we know is that MHRAs are marking January 18th as a day to remember. Don’t cry for Michael Ryan. In the historical record: January 18th is the day Canada decided that trying women for attempted murder is “unfair”. Feminists rejoiced. On the other hand, human rights activists decided to do something about it.

This is not a loss, it’s an opportunity.

And of course, to feminist legal activists, feminist lobbyists, and feminist law professors who have, until now, worked with the court’s enthusiastic consent to legalize the murder of men. We are coming for all of you.

For Canadians, and others, interested in actual equality being more than just an empty noise , please consider joining the Canadian Criminal Justice Equality mailing list. This is where we will be providing updates and announcing opportunities for participation in an ongoing project opposing the growing ideological bias in the Canadian Justice System.

The Canadian Criminal Justice Equality mailing list sign up form. Thank you

Crotch-Cam Proves That Women Are Pervs Too

AVfM Video Source · 18 January 2014 · Archived copy · Original

So, you're a "pervert" if you look at women, eh? Well here's an experiment worth pondering then:

More at Ebaum's World.

The misandry of Code.org

Jalon Cain (aka Aaron Sleazy) · 18 January 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Code.org is a non-profit organization that exploits the current “everybody has to learn how to program” paranoia, in which even Obama himself chimed in, urging Americans to learn how to hack.[1] The stated goal of Ali and Hadi Partovi’s brainchild is to promote computer science education in the US, in order to fight a projected shortage of one million laborers in this sector of the industry. Given that people like Google’s CEO Eric Schmidt, Bill Gates, or Mark Zuckerberg support Code.org, one may wonder whether all those statistics might also be used to convince Congress to loosen visa regulations in order to, you know, keep the wages of domestic programmers down. Just head over to the fake grassroots movement FWD.us this illustrious bunch also supports.[2]

It’s not just a shortage of programmers Code.org is afraid of. No, that would be too simple. They also have to have the correct sex! On their homepage you’ll find the statement, “While 57% of bachelor’s degrees are earned by women, just 12% of computer science degrees are awarded by women.” So, there is nothing wrong with women attaining almost 60% of all college degrees.[3] But Code.org would like to see this percentage reflected in computer science departments as well. I don’t think I ever saw a prominent and well-founded campaign that was aiming to increase the percentage of male graduates in a field were they were underrepresented. In case you’ve been living under a rock, I’m referring to virtually every academic discipline.

It’s not just university that troubles the minds behind Code.org. The glut of male students has to be fought already in high school. For this purpose, Code.org published some ideas about improving K8 education, like establishing a basic introduction to computer science. I wouldn’t have any problem with that. However, it is tied to a financial reward, and the message is that girls are more valuable than boys. Look at the specifications:[4]

> When 15 or more of your registered students complete the course and earn all 27 “concept mastery” trophies, you will receive a $750 DonorsChoose.org gift code. If 7 or more of your participating students are female, you’ll receive an additional $250, for a total gift of $1,000 in DonorsChoose.org funding! Make sure your female students fill in the gender field on the registration field when they sign up.
>
> What are my chances? Everybody wins while supplies last! The first 1,000 public school teachers who successfully teach the course will win these rewards.

I had to chuckle at the line “everybody wins while supplies last”. What about instilling a sense of competition among students? This doesn’t seem to be a popular thought in the contemporary education establishment, in which every kids is seen as special and “gifted”. Everybody gets an A as long as they manage to sit still. Otherwise, pump some Ritalin into them!

If you have any doubts that systematic preference of girls is part of the agenda of Code.org, then have a look at their homepage.[5] Here is a screenshot, in case the text gets magically altered:

[image]

Girls, girls, girls! There is just one little problem with the implied message that girls don’t get much encouragement: boys don’t really get much encouragement either. It’s not as if every guy in every high school programs computers in his spare time. Especially these days, where cheap hardware is abundant there really are no barriers to entry. However, most interaction with hardware is purely consumptive. I don’t want to make a value judgment, but there is quite a big difference between a 15 year-old being able to navigate to his favorite social media websites on the Internet, and implementing a basic sorting algorithm.

All it takes to gain competency in this field is a bit of cash and some spare time. And motivation. And a certain proclivity towards thinking in the abstract. John Carmack, one of the most influential programmers the world has ever seen, summarizes this as follows:[6]

> In the information age, the barriers [to entry into programming] just aren't there. The barriers are self imposed. If you want to set off and go develop some grand new thing, you don't need millions of dollars of capitalization. You need enough pizza and Diet Coke to stick in your refrigerator, a cheap PC to work on, and the dedication to go through with it.

Here's another one from Carmack:[7]

> The situation is so much better for programmers today – a cheap used PC, a Linux CD, and an internet account, and you have all the tools necessary to work your way to any level of programming skill you want to shoot for.

Focussing on outliers is deceptive. John Carmack bought himself a Ferrari with the money his company made with Wolfenstein 3D, and a couple more later on. However, there are countless examples of people who taught themselves how to program, and who went on to have good careers in this field. Yet, this doesn't seem to fit into the chosen narrative of Code.org, so they rather spread a message according to which girls are more valuable than boys, and in which the educational system has to be "fixed" to get more girls into this field.

Sources:

[1] http://www.wired.com/wiredenterprise/2013/12/obama-code/
[2] http://www.fwd.us/immigration_reform
[3] http://code.org/stats
[4] http://code.org/educate/20hr
[5] http://code.org/educate
[6] Quoted in: David Kushner, Masters of Doom: How Two Guys Created an Empire and Transformed Pop Culture Chapter 16, p. 292.
[7] Quoted in: David Kushner, p. 254

Inclusivity On The John

AVFM · 18 January 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Publisher's note: This is a guest post from Sammich Heist, our resident meme master, provocateur and kitten mixologist. I am beaming with pride as he proves there really can be cooperation with gender ideologues, and that we can change the world, one terlet door at a time. PE

Here at A Voice for Men we feature articles written by people of different ethnicities, sexual orientations, genders, species, taste in movies, dietary habits and whatever other categorization may be invented in the future.

We seek to accommodate these categorizations, which will be invented to further divide and alienate everyone from everybody else, into their separate little lonely boxes in the name of this "inclusiveness" that Feminists love so much, because we can never have enough Marxism and segregation.

So it is with joy that I have discovered that my local hospital here in Canada has recently spent some of our health care tax budget to replace all of its unisex bathroom door signs throughout the entire hospital to be inclusive of non-deterministically gendered individuals:

[image]
That, or super-heroes in capes … TO DO: buy some Superman stickers
Now, they have to be applauded for their intentions because we all know gender-confused individuals might be unable to work up the courage to enter a bathroom marked as accepting both binary genders; rightfully so as hospital security regularly beat up people entering facilities without having an exact matching gender. Good thing they're already in a hospital offering public health care to all human identifying individuals.

But I give them a D-minus for the blatant lack of broad inclusiveness and foresight. They could be quite rightfully accused of being a class-A worthless discriminating judgmental camab-fetishizing binarist objectifying white-privileged cisgender-normative intolerant classist nonracial-hypersexualizing gender-overprivileged traditionalistic transpeciesexual-shaming entitled non-ethnic-elitist poc-kinkshaming pansexual-oppressing middle-class-elitist celestial-shaming ageist reptilian-denying insensitive body-shaming multiethnic-denying smallfat-normative genderfluid-ignoring transmisogynist able-body-priviledge-blind omnigender-sexualizing nphobic rape-apologistic patriarchistic mouthbreathing bigotted oppressive subhuman lowlife dudebro neckbeard virgin creeps.

A passable effort would have been to also include other body types:

[image]

As Feminist have very helpfully pointed out, comic book and anime conventions are a cesspool of sweeping discrimination and exclusion and it is very important to include individuals who have alter-egos and would be totally destroyed — their psyche eradicated — if we didn't specifically and explicitly include them.

[image]

But that's not enough. It never is.

To be absolutely on the safe side we need to cover all the bases; every single possible permutation, real or imaginary, of sentient beings must be represented on toilet doors across the world!

We will not stop until absolutely everyone has enthusiastic access to relieving themselves without the experience of toxic shame. We will cater to every single individual's caprice. The entire universe shall bend over backward to conform to every single one of them, not the other way around.

For global peace, love and prosperity.

[image]

We will not stop until every single bathroom door in Canada, on Earth, IN THE UNIVERSE is inclusive of all.

Let it be known that at AVFM, we care.

MGTOW Strong!

AVfM Video Source · 19 January 2014 · Archived copy · Original

"…MGTOWs embody interpersonal strength. We have the strength of will, the fierce independence, and 'Don't Tread On Me' is our flag. We have the self-confidence not to give a damn about petty insults and shaming language. We have the intelligence and wisdom to think on our own. It is easy to go along with the crowd, it is difficult to stand up for what it is right and to be one against many. It takes courage to stand up to society, and it takes forgiveness and compassion to still want to help our indoctrinated brothers."

More from Life After Women.

Porn, and semen: The devil's glue

John Hembling (JtO) · 19 January 2014 · Archived copy · Original

There might be a few thousand men world wide who haven't watched porn online. You know, guys who live in villages in the jungles of Papua New Guinea – places without internet, or computers, or electricity, where the grass and the trees themselves are still black and white.

For the rest of the world though, it's a safe bet that men watch porn. Its even a reasonably safe bet that women watch porn as well. A survey conducted several years ago indicated that 30% of porn's online audience was female, and that number made no account of under-reporting, or lying by female respondents. However, in spite of a substantial female audience, most porn is a male oriented entertainment medium. And a nearly universal element of modern porn is a standardized device within the visual narrative of fantasy sex depicted in this entertainment medium, called the money shot, in which a male porn performer, usually reduced by camera angle to a de-personalized, disembodied penis ejaculates onto the face, or sometimes the face and breasts of the female performer.

This is usually the climax of a porn scene, and in fact is such an important element the visual language of modern porn that an entire genre of porn focuses on just this climactic moment. Taken from the japanese word meaning "to splash" the porn genre of "bukakke" is a distillation of this visual moment, often using more than one male performer to multiply the visual effect of the porn performance.

And this is a key point to remember; that what we're talking about when we discuss porn is not sex. Certainly, it's an activity that simulates sex. It involves naked people, various sexual activities, orgasms and so on, but the performers are not people in the privacy of their bedrooms doing what you or I would do with our respective partners. Along with one or more male and female actors are cameramen, sound technicians, if its a bigger budget, a producer, sometimes directors, make up people props and such.

Porn is not sex. It is theatre. Within that theater, the semen – or in some cases – the water and icing sugar splashed onto the face of the female performers is both more and less than bodily fluid produced during a male orgasm. It is, in the language of porn a mystical substance. What we might call semen, whether it's icing sugar or corn starch or silicone and water or actual ejaculate is the distilled concentrated and symbolic representation of the sexual desire, the lust and the sexual identity not of the male actor, the guy objectified to a degree that he's not even a person, but an anonymous cypher, standing as a place-holder for the projection of the male porn audience's fantasy. Semen in porn is the symbolic representation of the sexuality, the lust, and the sexual identity of the viewer.

A female performer, turning her face up, opening her mouth and smiling sweetly as several tablespoons of sticky white fluid are squirted onto her face is conveying, in the visual language of porn – her acceptance, indeed, her love of the sexual desire, pleasure and sexual identity of the man watching that porn, from behind a computer screen.

That is the visual device employed, and that is what we are shown in porn every time we seem so-called semen splattering the upturned face of a female performer – this is not semen and even if it is semen, it is only there to symbolize the presence, the desire, and the human sexuality of that fantasy's intended audience. Within the visual world of that fantasy, theatrically splashed semen is the symbolic acceptance of the masculine sexuality of the audience. It is, in modern context, almost a mystical fluid.

Of course in the view of those who condemn porn, calling for it's prohibition and variously claiming it degrades the paid performers, this nearly mystical moment has another character entirely. Rather than symbolizing acceptance of the sexuality, the desire and the pleasure of that invisible first person presence – porn's audience – the depiction of a female performer splashed with semen is a moment of unique degradation. She is the object of scorn, hatred and violence and those few tablespoons of fluid are concentrated malice.

Saint Augustine wrote in the forth century that the penis was a demon rod. This was a purposeful attack on male sexual identity because the pre-Abrahamic pagan religions provided a path to male spiritual identity. In order to yoke men to service within the doctrine of the early church, this natural path to male spirituality and and divinity had to be closed.

Feminism's condemnation of male sexuality is a direct borrowing from the church's closure of masculine sexuality as a path for men to connect to a spiritual identity through their own bodies and sexuality. To an anti-porn feminist semen cannot be a symbolic representation of human desire, lust and pleasure – splashing on the face of a female performer. No, for them this magical white fluid is the devil's glue.

But for this conception to have currency, and in order for the theatrical act of performed sex to degrade women, male sexuality must be in poisonous in concept. And when this is understood the cry of degradation of women in porn is revealed as a truly hateful view of male sexuality and masculine identity.

Bourgeois idols

Ernest Belfort Bax · 19 January 2014 · Archived copy · Original

The following excerpt from Ernest Belfort Bax' essay was originally published under the 1886 title 'Some Bourgeois Idols; Or Ideals, Reals, and Shams.' – PW

Let us take another idol. This time we tread on sacred ground indeed – equality between the sexes. Well may the iconoclastic hand tremble before levelling a blow at this new Serapis. Nevertheless here also – as the phrase is understood by the ordinary modern woman's right, advocate – we are bound to recognise a vampire. In earlier stages of social development, woman was placed in a condition of undoubted social inferiority to man. Into the grounds of this inferiority it is unnecessary here to enter. Suffice it to say it existed, and that against the state of things the cry of "equality between the sexes" was raised, at first in a veiled, and afterwards in an open manner. For some time it represented a real tendency towards equality by the removal of certain undoubted grievances. But for some time past the tendency of the bourgeois world, as expressed in its legislation and sentiment, has been towards a factitious exaltation of the woman at the expense of the man – in other words, the cry for "equality between the sexes" has in the course of its realisation become a sham, masking a de facto inequality.

[image]The inequality in question presses as usual, heaviest on working-man, whose wife, to all intents and purposes has him completely in her power. If dissolute or drunken, she can sell up his goods or break up his home at pleasure, and still compel him to keep her and live with her to her life's end. There is no law to protect him. On the other hand, let him but raise a finger in a moment of exasperation against this precious representative of the sacred principle of "womanhood," and straightway he is consigned to the treadmill for his six months amid the jubilation of the D.T. and its kindred, who pronounce him a brute and sing paeans over the power of the "law" to protect the innocent and helpless female. Thus does bourgeois society offer sacrifice to the idol "equality between the sexes." For the law jealously guards, the earnings or property of the wife from possible spoliation. She on any colourable pretext can obtain magisterial separation and "protection."

Again, we have the same principle illustrated in the truly bestial outcry raised every now and again by certain persons for the infliction of the punishment of flogging on men, for particular offences, notably "assaults on women and children." As a matter of fact, in the worst cases of cruelty to children, women are the criminals. Some few months back there was a horrible instance in which a little girl was done to death by a stepmother in circumstances of the most loathsome barbarity: yet these horror-stricken advocates of the lash never venture to support flogging as a wholesome corrective to viragos of this description. It would be opposed to middle-class sentiment, which would regard such a proposition as blasphemy against the sacred principle of "femality." No other explanation is possible, since it can hardly be assumed that even the bourgeois mind is incapable of grasping the obvious fact that a man pinioned and in the hands of half a dozen prison-warders, is in precisely as helpless a condition as any woman in a like cage, and that, therefore, the brutality or cowardice of the proceeding is no greater in the one case than in the other. The bourgeois conception of "equality between the sexes" is aptly embodied in that infamous clause of the "Criminal Law Amendment Act," which provides that in case of illicit intercourse, between a boy and girl under sixteen years of age, though the girl escapes scot free, the boy is liable, to five years imprisonment in a reformatory.

Even the great Radical nostrum which is supposed to involve the quintessence of political equality, is, when closely viewed, the hollowest of shams. The revolutionary socialist perhaps does not much concern himself about questions of the suffrage, esteeming but lightly the privilege of electing men to help to carry on the present system of society, which he believes destined to perish before long. But looked at from the ordinary point of view, it is quite clear that considering the fact that the female population of England is in excess of the male by about a million, female suffrage, in spite of its apparent embodiment of the principle of equality, really means, if it means anything at all (which may be doubtful) the handing over of the complete control of the state to one sex.

These are only a few of the illustrations which might be multiplied almost indefinitely, of the truth that the tendency of the modern middle-class world, is, while proclaiming the principle of "equality between the sexes" in opposition to the feudal subjection of woman, to erect, the female sex into a quasi-privileged class. The real equality between the sexes aimed at by socialism is as, I take it, much opposed to this Brummagem sentiment and sham equality, as it is to the female slavery of ancient times of which, of course, we do not wish to deny that survivals remain even at the present day. With the economic emancipation of woman and the gradual transformation of the state-system of to-day into an international league of free communes, the feudal subjection of women to man and the middle-class subjection of man to woman will be alike at an end.

Meme: Rape Culture Insanity

Paul Elam · 19 January 2014 · Archived copy · Original

I thought I would throw a meme into the meme pot. PE

[image]

The Princess and the Plow Horse

AVfM Video Source · 20 January 2014 · Archived copy · Original

If there was ever a better allegory for understanding Men Going Their Own Way, and men's refusal to "man up" and provide, we don't think a better one's been done than this:

You should subscribe to this channel.

Erin Pizzey on Feminism

AVfM Video Source · 20 January 2014 · Archived copy · Original

A previously-unreleased short interview on feminism by AVfM Editor-at-Large and radio host Erin Pizzey:

More at Humanity Bites.

Men’s Rights Edmonton’s report on accusations against Edmonton’s Karen Smith

Men's Rights Edmonton · 20 January 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Troubling reports. Troubling reports indeed.

Please help Men’s Rights Edmonton by subscribing.

A brief history of circumcision

Jim Byset · 20 January 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Editor's note: This article is reproduced from our friends at Men's Human Rights Ontario.

BY Jacqueline Hooman

As you read this, you may be sitting to breakfast eating your morning Cornflakes. But have you ever stopped to think about the man behind the cereal? Born in 1852, Dr. John Harvey Kellogg, of Cornflakes fame, was a nineteenth century puritan. His ideals about health and hygiene are some of the most oppressive to women and men alike. He attained his medical degree in 1875 and was hired by the Adventist Church as a Health Reformer. Among many controversial practices, one of the most highly debated treatments recommended by Kellogg was circumcision of males.

Kellogg recommended male circumcision as a cure for masturbation, impure thoughts, and sexual desires. He is quoted as saying, "A remedy which is almost always successful in small boys is circumcision… The operation should be performed by a surgeon without administering an anesthetic, as the brief pain attending the operation will have a salutary effect upon the mind, especially if it be connected with the idea of punishment, as it may well be in some cases." It was important that the boys not be infantile, so as to be mature enough to understand the "punishment". His remedy for females was, "…the application of pure carbolic acid to the clitoris an excellent means of allaying the abnormal excitement, and preventing the recurrence of the practice in those whose will-power has become so weakened that the patient is unable to exercise entire self-control."

The circumcision techniques performed by Kellogg and colleagues are practiced the same way today. However, modern circumcisions are performed on infants as opposed to older children or teens. But the method remains the same. The male is strapped down or restrained, his penis is clamped, crushed, and the foreskin is sliced away from his body.

Many may argue that modern circumcision is an effective way to prevent infections or diseases. But it is no more effective now than it was in the nineteenth and early twentieth centuries. The procedure remains the same while the reasons for it continue to evolve. It was once recommended to cure everything from epilepsy to blindness.

The concept of circumcision is almost as old as recorded history. There are hieroglyphics of Ancient Egyptians performing circumcisions. It is even mentioned in the Bible and other religious texts. Circumcision thousands of years ago was a vastly different procedure than the one practiced today. In Biblical times, and previous to them, circumcisions involved either a prick of the foreskin to draw blood, or a small slice of the skin. Little to no tissue was removed. Alternatively, modern circumcisions remove up to half of the penile skin, along with more than a dozen immune, protective, and sexual functions, as well as twenty thousand highly sensitive nerve endings found nowhere else on the human body.

Even in this modern world of medicine, antibiotics, doctors, and hospitals, circumcisions are still being performed as preventative medicine. The fact remains that less than 1% of intact males will ever need to be medically circumcised. The male prepuce (foreskin) is fused to the glans (head) in infancy in childhood. Its sole purpose is to keep out dirt and bacteria, thus preventing infections. There is no other healthy body part, on males or females, which is legally allowed to be amputated without immediate medical need. Parents cannot authorize, or consent to, appendix removal at birth on the chance that it may become infected later in life. Nor can they request that a male child have his breast buds amputated at birth as prevention for breast cancer, of which he is more likely to die than penile cancer.

The Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms guarantees that "Every individual is equal before and under the law and has the right to the equal protection and equal benefit of the law without discrimination and, in particular, without discrimination based on race, national or ethnic origin, colour, religion, sex, age or mental or physical disability." (Section 15-1.) While females are protected from even a prick of their foreskin, males continue to be subjected to ancient barbaric practices with no medical or legal basis. The Canadian Medical Association's Code Of Ethics maintains that medical personnel have a duty to "consider first the well-being of the patient" and "refuse to participate in or support practices that violate basic human rights."

Furthermore, the Ontario College of Physicians and Surgeons deems that for consent to be valid it must be "related to treatment, informed, voluntary, not be obtained through fraud or misrepresentation." In Layman's terms, the Physician is obligated to inform the patient of all potential risks associated with a procedure, along with the risks of not performing said procedure. But infants are incapable of giving consent. In the instance of proxy consent (parental consent) to treatment, the O.C.P.S. states, "A physician must provide the substitute decision-maker with the information that would otherwise have been given to the patient to enable him or her to make an informed decision as to consent." (18.) and that "A physician must consider whether the substitute decision-maker is complying with the principles set out in the HCCA. If a physician is of the view that the substitute decision-maker is not acting in accordance with the HCCA, he or she can call the Office of the Public Guardian and Trustee." In other words, doctors are not allowed to amputate healthy, functional body parts just because the parents request them to do so.

The rights of the parent end when they infringe upon the rights of the child.

So why are circumcisions still being performed if they violate the law and medical ethics? One word: money. As per The Human Tissue Act which states, "A person shall not buy, sell or otherwise deal in, directly or indirectly, for a valuable consideration, tissue for a transplant or a body or part of a body, other than blood or a blood constituent for therapeutic purposes, medical education or scientific research" it is illegal to sell human tissues. They must be donated with written and informed consent. Consider the appalling fact that forcibly amputated foreskins are (illegally) sold to cosmetic and pharmaceutical companies to make everything from skin grafts to anti-aging skin cream, and can fetch up to a whopping $100,000 each in sales and subsequent profits. There is money to be made, hand over fist. A prime example would be an enthusiastic public endorsement by Oprah Winfrey of a skin moisturizer by SkinMedica. Its not-so-secret ingredient? Foreskin. And the fibroblasts are not hard to come by, if one knows where to look. Anyone with a credit card can buy them online. There is also a market for foreskin fibroblasts with uses in skin grafting and cosmetic testing. Circumcision is a billion-dollar-a-year industry. It is a business, nothing more.

The Ontario College of Physicians and Surgeons (Consent):
http://www.cpso.on.ca/Policies-Publications/Policy/Consent-to-Medical-Treatment

The Canadian Medical Association Code of Ethics:
http://www.cpso.on.ca/cpso/media/uploadedfiles/cma_code_of_ethics.pdf

The Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms (in its entirety):

http://laws-lois.justice.gc.ca/eng/Const/index.html

John Harvey Kellogg:
http://www.whale.to/a/john_harvey.html

http://www.encyclopedia.com/topic/John_Harvey_Kellogg.aspx

The Sale of Foreskins to Cosmetic Companies:

http://www.plasmetic.com/skin/skin-care-cosmetics/foreskin-face-cream-from-skinmedica-promoted-by-oprah-winfrey.html

Functions of the foreskin. As published by John R. Taylor, MB, MRCPEd, FRCPC in the British Journal of Urology:
http://research.cirp.org/func1.html

http://www.cirp.org/library/anatomy/cold-taylor/

Medically Necessary Circumcisions (less than 1%) and common myths debunked:

http://pediatrics.aappublications.org/content/early/2013/03/12/peds.2012-2896.full.pdf+html

Human Tissue Act (Official Version):

http://www.assembly.nl.ca/Legislation/sr/statutes/h15.htm#5_

Foreskin fibroblasts used in cosmetics:
http://www.truthinaging.com/review/reader-review-skinmedicas-tns-essential-serum http://www.skinmedica.com/skin-care-products/tns-essential-serum

Foreskins used in skin grafting:

http://www.foreskin.org/f4sale.htm

http://thestir.cafemom.com/baby/111805/your_babys_foreskin_makes_you

Huffington Post withdraws a false allegation against J4MB

Mike Buchanan · 20 January 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Followers of AVfM will need no reminding of how gender feminists have lied decade after decade in a whole range of areas, most notably with respect to their two key political weapons, rape and domestic violence. Even where they've been caught making demonstrably misleading statements in the media, they invariably refuse to either retract the statements or apologise. We've made numerous public challenges of gender feminists (and their male collaborators) and not one has ever been responded to. To say they're utterly shameless would be an understatement. For gender feminists the ends – notably, maintaining feminist narratives – always justify the means (relentless misleading statements).

Of the public challenges we made in 2013, one was to Kat Banyard in connection with her exaggeration of the frequency with which schoolgirls experience sexual harassment http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=3R3fMxygLXw, the other to Caroline Criado-Perez about her claim of an evidence base supporting the notion of a causal link between increasing female representation on corporate boards and enhanced financial performance: Caroline Criado-Perez is asking the media to 'fact check'. No, seriously, she is!.

Given this backdrop, we start the year with some good news. We recently gave some coverage to a young Huffington Post contributor, Ellie Slee, who'd made a false allegation in an article, namely that J4MB refers to women as 'gestational incubators'. Our piece on the matter:

Ellie Slee misrepresents J4MB in an article in 'The Huffington Post'

The term 'gestational incubators' had been used by Clint Carpentier in an excellent article on AVfM, "The Future of Women in a MGTOW Society":

In a blog piece I'd approvingly linked to the article, but nothing more. Ellie Slee's allegation that J4MB itself refers to women in this way was demonstrably false. We politely explained this to Ms Slee, and invited her to retract the statement and apologise. Predictably, as a gender feminist, she refused to do either. She posted this comment on her Twitter account:

> Men's rights campaigner, rape denier and party leader @MikeBuchanan11 – who is older than my DAD – is writing abusive stuff about me online!

'… older than my DAD…' Full marks for casual ageism there.

The bottom line? Ellie Slee was refusing to withdraw an allegation against J4MB which she knew to be false. Now we have little time here for false allegators (I couldn't resist that). We duly placed the matter in the hands of the legal team at AOL – the company which has owned the Huffington Post since 2011 – and told them that if the statement were not retracted, we'd be taking legal advice on the matter. After a brief exchange of emails, we received one five days ago which included this:

> In relation to Ellie's blog on the Huffington Post, I've followed up with our blogs team here with respect to the 'gestational incubator' comment and they have now removed the reference to your political party, with the agreement of Ellie. Please note that we have taken this action as a gesture of goodwill and it should not be treated as any admission of AOL (UK) Limited's alleged liability. We trust that our prompt action in removing this reference upon receipt of your complaint will be the end of this matter.

'… with the agreement of Ellie.' Priceless. We'd have preferred her publicly not to 'agree', to be honest, but you can't have everything in life. So, what do we know of Ellie's true feelings about our challenge? We need only turn to a comment she posted on Twitter after the retraction:

> @EllieSlee @MikeBuchanan11 Thanks for contacting HP. The blogs editor and I have changed the article so it's more reflective of your ideas.

So, no admission she'd made a false allegation, never mind an apology. No, the Huffington Post blogs editor and Miss Ellie 'changed the article' so it better reflected an anti-feminist's 'ideas'. You really couldn't make it up, could you? Again, priceless.

In her original article Ms Slee wrote the following about rape:

> On that note, I am currently training as a volunteer with Rape Crisis under the knowledge that only 1% of raped women ever see justice – in the form of a conviction – for their attackers. In light of this, in a survey completed last year, the majority of rape crisis workers attested that they would not report a rape to the police if it happened to them. We live in a country where women are marginalised, not only on a base, societal level, through rape, domestic violence and genital mutilation, but at an authority level, as well.

I threatened her with a libel action with respect to her 'rape denier' remark on Twitter, and she pointed me to the comments stream on one of my posts about our challenge to her, in which I'd written this:

> The 1% claim is laughable outside gender feminist circles, i.e. among rational people. Gender feminists fight for a world where the default position is that women are believed and men aren't, and we're already there. I regularly refer feminists to Swayne O'Pie's 'Why Britain Hates Men: Exposing Feminism' but of course they never read it. Why would they be interested in the truth? Feminists' power comes from repeating lies endlessly – '1 in 3 women', '1 in 4 women', and the rest. For 30+ years they've succeeded in persuading the masses left is right, black is white, up is down. But the masses are rapidly wising up to their lies. Feminists are on the wrong side of history, and the smart ones know it… so 99% of them don't. This is going to get interesting, sooner than they can possibly imagine. Happy days.

We shall continue to threaten legal action against media outlets and individual contributors who misrepresent what J4MB stands for.

On a lighter note, gender feminists are of course notorious for being miserable. Indeed, Ellie Slee is the current 'Whiny Woman of the Month'. In one blog piece I speculated that if she were to marry a Mr. Peahead – Ivor, possibly? – she could thereafter rejoice in the name of Mrs Slee-Peahead. Like Queen Victoria, she was not amused. Returning to her Twitter account, she wrote to me:

> You're allowed to take the piss out of my name and I can't call you a sad old man?

Ironically, Ms Slee has made this old man very happy.

Feminism: A Disease of Right and Left

Ernest Belfort Bax · 21 January 2014 · Archived copy · Original

The following excerpts taken from The "Monstrous Regiment" of Womanhood, chapter in Essays in Socialism New & Old (1907), pp.108-119. – PW

> Nowadays any one who protests against injustice to men in the interests of women is either abused as an unfeeling brute or sneered at as a crank. Perhaps in that day of a future society, my protest may be unearthed by some enterprising archaeological inquirer, and used as evidence that the question was already burning at the end of the nineteenth century. – E. B. Bax

All parties, all sorts and conditions of politicians, from the fashionable and Conservative west-end philanthropist to the Radical working-men's clubbite, seem (or seemed until lately) to have come to an unanimous conclusion on one point – to wit, that the female sex is grievously groaning under the weight of male oppression. Editors of newspapers, keen to scent out every drift of public fancy with the object of regaling their "constant readers" with what is tickling to their palates, will greedily print, in prominent positions and in large type letters expressive of the view in question, whilst they will boycott or, at best, publish in obscure corners any communication that ventures to criticise the popular theory or that adduces facts that tell against it.

Were I to pen an impassioned diatribe, tending to prove the villainy of man towards woman, and painting in glowing terms the poor, weak victim of his despotism, my description would be received with sympathetic approval. Not so, I fear, my simple statement of the unvarnished truth.

Now, I think it will be admitted, as a general principle at least, by all parties in the present day, that equality before the law, as it is termed, is the first condition of liberty, and that where you do not have respect of persons in this connection, you are destitute of the primal elements of personal freedom. According to the popular theory just indicated, respecting the position of women, we might expect to find every law framed in such a way that women should invariably come off less than second best in any dispute with men: in short, that law would be enacted and administered solely to the advantage of men. Is this so in actual fact?

[…]

The foregoing, then, I repeat, is the present state of the woman question – as it exists in our latter-day class society, based on capitalistic production. The last point that we have to consider is the relation of this sex-question to Socialism. Some years ago, on its first appearance, I took up my esteemed friend August Bebel's book Die Frau in the hope of gaining some valuable hints or at least some interesting speculations on the probable future of sex-relations under Socialism. I was considerably disgusted, therefore, that for the "halfpennyworth of bread" in the form of real suggestion I had to wade through a painfully considerable quantity of very old "sack" in the shape of stale declamation on the intrinsic perfection of woman and the utter vileness of man, on the horrible oppression the divine creature suffered at the hands of her tyrant and ogre – in short, I found two-thirds of the book filled up with a second-hand hash-up of Mill's Subjection of Women and with the usual demagogic rant I had been long accustomed to from the ordinary bourgeois woman's-rights advocate.

It was the reading of the book in question that induced me to take up this problem, and to make some attempt to prick the bladder of humbug to which I was sorry to see that Bebel had lent his name.

In doing this I of course acquired the reputation of a misogynist. This is the natural fate of any one who attempts to expose that most shamelessly impudent fraud (the so-called woman's-rights movement) which was ever supported by rotten arguments, unblushing misrepresentations, and false analogies. I have given some instances of the former in the course of this chapter. I will give one instance of a transparently false analogy which is common among Socialists and Radicals. It is a favourite device to treat the relation between man and woman as on all fours with the relation between capitalist and workman.

But a moment's consideration will show that there is no parallel at all between the two cases. The reason on which we as Socialists base our persistent attack on the class-privileged man or woman – on the capitalist – is because we maintain that as an economical, political, and social entity he or she has no right to exist. We say that the capitalist is a mere parasite, who ought to and who eventually will disappear. If it were not so, if the capitalist were a necessary and permanent factor in society, the attitude often adopted by Socialists (say, over trade disputes) would be as unfair and one-sided as the bourgeois represents it to be.

Now, I wish to point out that the first thing for the woman's-rights advocates to do, if they want to make good the analogy, is to declare openly for the abolition of the male sex. For until they do this, there is not one tittle of resemblance between the two cases…

What does Socialism, at least, profess to demand and to involve? Relative economic and social equality between the sexes. What does the woman's-rights movement demand? Female privilege, and when possible, female domination. It asks that women shall have all the rights of men with privileges thrown in (but no disagreeable duties, oh dear no!), and apparently be subject to no discipline but that of their own arbitrary wills.

To exclude women on the ground of incapacity from any honourable, lucrative, or agreeable social function whatever, is a hideous injustice to be fulminated against from platform and in press – to treat them on the same footing as men in the matter of subordination to organised control or discipline is not to be thought of – is ungentlemanly, ungallant, unchivalrous! We had an illustration of this recently. At a meeting held not long since, the chairman declared that all interrupters of speakers should be promptly put out. A man at the back of the hall did interrupt a speaker and was summarily ejected, Subsequently a woman not only interrupted, but grossly insulted another speaker, but the chairman declared that he could not turn a woman out. So it is.

A woman is to be allowed, of course, full liberty of being present and of speaking at a public meeting, but is not to be subject to any of the regulation to which men are subject for the maintenance of order. And this is what woman's-rights advocates and apparently some Socialists term equality between the sexes!! Advanced women and their male supporters in demanding all that is lucrative, honourable, and agreeable in the position of men take their stand on the dogma of sex-equality. No sooner, however, is the question one of disagreeable duties than "equality" goes by the board and they slink behind the old sex-immunity.

This sentiment also plays a part in the franchise controversy. Let women have the franchise by all means, provided two things, first of all: provided you can get rid of their present practical immunity from the operation of the criminal law for all offences committed against men and of the gallantry and shoddy chivalry that now hedges a woman in all relations of life[1]; and secondly, provided you can obviate the unfairness arising from the excess of women over men in the population – an excess attributable not only to the superior constitutional strength of women, but still more, perhaps, to the fact that men are exposed to dangers in their daily work from which women benefit, but from which women are exempt, inasmuch as they are, and claim to be, jealously protected from all perilous and unhealthy occupations. Now, surely it is rather rough to punish men for their services to society by placing them under the thumb of a female majority which exists largely because of these services.

Of course all the economic side of the question which for this very reason I have touched upon more or less lightly falls away under Socialism. Many Socialists, indeed, believe that the sex-question altogether is so entirely bound up with the economic question that it will immediately solve itself on the establishment of a collectivist order of society. I can only say that I do not myself share this belief. It would seem there is something in the sex-question, notably, the love of power and control involved, which is more than merely economic.

I hold rather, on the contrary, that the class-struggle to-day over-shadows or dwarfs the importance of this sex-question, and that though in some aspects it will undoubtedly disappear, in others it may very possibly become more burning after the class-struggle has passed away than it is now. Speaking personally, I am firmly convinced that it will be the first question that a Socialist society will have to solve, once it has acquired a firm economic basis and the danger of reaction has sensibly diminished or disappeared.

Nowadays any one who protests against injustice to men in the interests of women is either abused as an unfeeling brute or sneered at as a crank. Perhaps in that day of a future society, my protest may be unearthed by some enterprising archaeological inquirer, and used as evidence that the question was already burning at the end of the nineteenth century.

Now, this would certainly not be quite true, since I am well aware that most are either hostile or indifferent to the views set forth here on this question. In conclusion, I may say that I do not flatter myself that I am going to convert many of my readers from their darling belief in “woman the victim.” I know their will is in question here, that they have made up their minds to hold one view and one only, through thick and thin, and hence that in the teeth of all the canons of evidence they would employ in other matters, most of them will continue canting on upon the orthodox lines, ferreting out the twentieth case that presents an apparent harshness to woman, and ignoring the nineteen of real injustice to man; misrepresenting the marriage laws as an engine of male, rather than of female, tyranny; and the non-possession of the suffrage by women as an infamy without a parallel, studiously saying nothing as to the more than compensating privileges of women in other directions.

Working-women suffer to-day equally with working-men the oppression of the capitalist system, while middle-class women enjoy together with middle-class men the material benefits derived from a position of class-advantage. But in either case, as I have shown, as women, they enjoy a privileged position as against men as men. Only the will not to recognise the truth on this question can be proof against the evidence adduced.

Footnotes

1. A friend of mine is fond of arguing that the privileges of women are simply the obverse side of laws for the protection of the weaker. On this principle I would observe that any system of tyrannical privilege can be condoned. For example, it might be urged that the power of the Southern state planter over his slaves was necessary to the protection of the physically and numerically weaker white race against the ferocious negro. A similar argument is, in fact, used to-day to justify the action of negro-lynching mobs. Any system of oppression may be explained away, if one chooses, as being designed for the “necessary protection” of the oppressor against the oppressed.

Sara Ylen False Rape Claim Shows Ease With Which Innocent Men Convicted

Robert Franklin · 21 January 2014 · Archived copy · Original

On January 17, Sara Ylen was sentenced to serve five years in prison for fabricating claims of rape against two Michigan men and for tampering with evidence in the ensuing investigation. Fortunately, neither man was charged, arrested, tried or sent to prison. The purpose of this article is to give a detailed example of how easy it is for a man to be convicted of a sex crime.

To put it modestly, Sara Ylen is a serial liar, a fact Judge Daniel Kelly alluded to in sentencing her when he said it would be a "travesty of justice" to sentence her to anything less than five years, which exceeds statutory guidelines. Ylen lied about the two men raping her. We know she did because both had airtight alibis for the time she claimed she was assaulted.

If this were Ylen's only false claim to the police, it would be bad enough, but it's far from the only one. In fact, going back to 2001, she's falsely accused her father of rape once, her brother twice, some unspecified friends of her brother once and an unknown assailant once. She's also made one false claim of kidnapping and pleaded guilty in her cash-for-cancer scam in which she bilked unsuspecting donors out of thousands of dollars on her false claim to be suffering from the disease. She'll be sentenced for that in February.

Finally there's the false rape claim I want to discuss in this piece – the one that sent James Eugene Grissom to prison for ten years. He was sentenced to two concurrent 15-35 year sentences, but was released by order of a Michigan Circuit Court due to post-conviction discovery of Ylen's multiple lies.

The awful facts of Ylen's efforts to put innocent men in prison, waste the time of the police, medical and court personnel are all contained here in her lawyer's brief to the Michigan Supreme Court that ultimately succeeded in springing Grissom from prison. It makes for shocking reading, but is not the focus of my piece today.

One of the standard tropes of feminism is that, for a number of reasons, it's too difficult to convict men of rape and therefore steps must be taken to make it easier. Unsurprisingly, we find a certain lack of intellectual rigor to that feminist assertion. So, for example, British feminists are given to citing the number of claims of rape, the number of convictions for the crime and shouting "See how few rapists are convicted and imprisoned!"

Needless to say, they neglect a few things. One is that the rate of conviction for rape is about the same as it is for other crimes of violence. The simple facts are that (a) with rape as with few other crimes, there occur a substantial number of false claims and (b) even when the crime occurs, there's not always sufficient evidence with which to charge or convict the accused. Another is that feminist discourse, at least in the U.K. routinely confuses the rate of acquittal with the rate of attrition, i.e. those claims that are actually false or for which there's too little evidence to file a charge. That the two are not the same for rape or any other crime escapes feminist commentary on the subject.

Then of course there's the fact that, almost alone among criminal acts, rape can be proved by the word of the accuser without more. Imagine, for example, proving car theft solely by the allegations of the accuser. Try it. Call up the police and tell them your car was stolen and tell them the name of the person you claim did the deed. One thing the police are sure to do is to locate the accused and see if he/she has your car. They may stop around to the local chop shops to see if there's evidence your car has come to their attention. And, if they don't find your car in the possession of Mr./Ms. Accused or a fence, they're not going to file charges. The reason? No evidence. Yes, they have your word for it, but they require more, i.e. corroboration.

But, as we'll see in the James Eugene Grissom case, when it comes to rape, there need be no corroboration to bring charges or obtain a conviction. Indeed, there need be no objective evidence at all. A man can be convicted on the word of a woman alone, even one that's directly contradicted by objective evidence and brought into question otherwise.

So it's no surprise that, in fact, the crime of rape, far from being difficult to prove is in fact one of the easiest of prosecutions for the state to get a conviction. That fact is powerfully supported by the results of a little study I did. I went to the website for the Innocence Project and counted the number of exonerations they'd gotten and how many of them involved allegations of one or more sex offenses. At the time I did this, the Innocence Project had achieved the release of 287 people from prison because they'd been proven to be innocent of the crime(s) charged. Of those 287, an astonishing 237 had been convicted of at least one sex offense. That's a whopping 82% of all cases in which innocent people had been imprisoned.

The question for feminists then becomes "If sex crimes are so difficult to prove, how is it that so many of the innocent are convicted of them?"

To put real faces on that rather impersonal concept, let's examine the James Eugene Grissom case.

On May 12, 2001, Sara Ylen came home and told her husband James that a man had approached her in the parking lot of the Meijer store in Fort Gratiot, Michigan, and struck her several times. The two didn't feel the need to report the matter to the police right away, so they went to a wedding rehearsal dinner instead. The next day Ylen went to the police. She mentioned nothing about a sexual attack to them.

She also went to an emergency room where she once again told the doctor she had been struck, but never mentioned any form of sexual encounter. On May 16, four days after the alleged incident, Ylen called her gynecologist, reported she had been sexually assaulted and demanded an examination. The gynecologist said she'd be better off seeing an ER doctor, so she returned to the emergency room.

The doctor there noted signs of minor trauma to the cervix, but stated it could be the result of penetration by a foreign object or simply normal but rough sex. Because Ylen had waited more than 72 hours to make her first claim of sexual abuse, no rape kit was obtained. Ylen told the ER doctor a man had penetrated her with his finger on which there was a gold nugget ring, but made no mention of penile penetration.

Eleven days later, on May 27, Ylen went to her gynecologist who noted scratches on her labia and bruising to her legs.

During September of the same year, Ylen and her husband traveled to Lamont, California to visit her parents. It was there that she engaged in a series of lies to her friends, her family and law enforcement officers about a variety of sexual assaults that never happened and one kidnapping that likewise hadn't occurred. The police reports are clear that they understood Ylen to be lying, but no action was taken against her.

None of the several incidents of lying by Ylen to California authorities was known to Michigan police or prosecutors at the time of Grissom's trial.

In June, 2002, 13 months after the alleged incident in the Meijer parking lot in Michigan, Ylen began calling the St. Clair police, in their words, "quite a lot." Now she was claiming penile rape in addition to everything else. She also claimed she'd seen her assailant, but soon admitted that too was a lie.

In October, 2002, the St. Clair police had her in to view photo arrays of possible suspects in her, by then, 17-month-old allegations. She eventually picked out a photo of James Eugene Grissom. On November 7 she attended a police lineup that included Grissom among several other men. She picked someone else. At the time, police noted that Grissom was 13 years younger than the age given by Ylen of the man she claimed had assaulted her.

Grissom was employed at the Meijer store and, shortly after the alleged incident, had pawned a gold nugget ring at a local pawn shop. He denied doing so to police, but later admitted he'd pawned the ring.

Three years after the alleged incident, Ylen "remembered" that the man whom she claimed assaulted her had a tattoo of a skull on his upper right arm. Grissom in fact had such a tattoo.

On the basis of that, Grissom was charged with two counts of sexual assault of Sara Ylen.

At trial, the state's case consisted of essentially nothing more than Ylen's allegations. She claimed she'd been raped in the parking lot of the Meijer store by James Eugene Grissom. There was no rape kit and no DNA. There was no semen that could be analyzed and she'd washed her clothing. There was no confession by the accused and no one had witnessed the alleged incident. The videotape from the Meijer security camera in the parking lot showed, at the time of the alleged incident, no rape, no crime and that neither Ylen nor Grissom was present. Ylen's injuries were medically inconclusive.

Ylen had made no allegation of sexual assault of any kind for four days following the alleged incident, and when she finally did, made no mention of penile penetration. She later did so.

In addition, Ylen had been, on May 12, 2001, a participant for over a year in an organization that provided support to rape victims. As such, she surely knew the importance of the 72-hour period for preserving DNA samples and knew the importance of not bathing or washing her clothes for the same reason. And yet Ylen waited over 72 hours before claiming sexual abuse and bathed and washed her clothing before police could obtain the evidence.

James Eugene Grissom worked at the Meijer store. Sara Ylen knew that because she shopped there. She'd doubtless seen him and made a note of his ring. Many months after the alleged incident, she probably saw his tattoo as well and was able to add it to her short list of facts she hoped would incriminate him.

In the final analysis, the jury had but a single thing on which to rely in convicting James Eugene Grissom – Sara Ylen's word. Without that, neither police nor prosecutors nor the judge and jury would have had even a scintilla of evidence that (a) a crime had occurred or (b) James Eugene Grissom had committed it. But for Sara Ylen's word, no one – neither Grissom nor anyone else – would have been charged, tried, convicted or sent to prison.

But Sara Ylen gave her word and, shaky as it obviously was, the police and prosecutors went along with her claims. Even without the multiple lies she told in California and even without her cancer fraud, Ylen's claim that someone assaulted her in the Meijer parking lot on May 12, 2001, should have appeared questionable at best.

But, questionable as it was, it was sufficient to send James Eugene Grissom to prison for what must have looked to him like the rest of his life. And let's be clear; he'd be there till yet were it not for the spree of lying Ylen went on in California and later in her cancer scam. Just months after Grissom's conviction, police in Fresno and Bakersfield forwarded their files in Ylen's multiple rape fabrications to prosecutors in Michigan who duly sent them on to Grissom's lawyers. It took them over seven years to get him a new trial and three more to get him released based on actual innocence.

They were able to do so for one reason only – that the conviction of James Eugene Grissom rested entirely on the credibility of his accuser, Sara Ylen, and that her credibility was non-existent.

Grissom was present at Ylen's sentencing for her false claims of rape against the two Michigan men. On hearing that she was to serve only five years, Grissom understandably called it "a tap on the wrist."

Whatever becomes of Sara Ylen, she teaches a valuable lesson – if a woman like her with claims like hers can send an innocent man to prison for a rape that never happened, no man is safe.

It's a lesson that must make many feminists smile.

Men's Issues & Music – The Notorious B.I.G.

Ty Henry · 21 January 2014 · Archived copy · Original

The second installment of this series features the late Christopher Smalls, a legend known by his interchangeable monikers Biggie Smalls and Notorious B.I.G., and widely considered one of the top five most influential rappers in hip-hop history, and among the genre's most important and groundbreaking figures. Indeed, his influence even today befits his imposing 6'3", 280lb frame.

Entitled "Suicidal Thoughts," this recording off his morosely-titled debut album Ready To Die is the most stark, haunting and realistic treatment of male suicide maybe ever recorded. It uniquely illustrates how hopelessness and self-loathing can overtake a man in the "wee small hours" (apologies to Frank Sinatra), like the literal darkness itself, surrounding and shrouding the human soul, until all will to see the next light is suffocated. Biggie's tone is neither frantic, maudlin, or sardonic, as he weaves his tale of how he's come to this personal crisis, from "baby mama drama" to not feeling truly loved by anyone. Emblematic is this heartbreaking lyric as Biggie ponders his mother's ambivalence to him… and his demise…

> All of my life I been considered as the worst
>
> Lying to my mother, even stealing out her purse
>
> Crime after crime/From Drugs to extortion
>
> I know my mother wish she got a fuckin' abortion
>
> She don't even love me like she did when she was younger
>
> Suckin' on her chest just to stop my fuckin' hunger
>
> I wonder if I died/Would tears come to her eyes?
>
> Forgive me for my disrespect/Forgive me for my lies

The mildly dissonant alternating synth and bass chords, giving way to a stripped down kick and snare beat set a foreboding and discomfiting atmosphere. There is nothing warm & fuzzy, pithy, nor rollicking about the song. Listen to the increasing desperation and uncertainty (do I stay on the phone or come over? Is he actually serious?) of his friend on the other end of the line, played brilliantly by producer Sean "P.Diddy" Combs.

What ultimately happens? Well, I won't spoil it. But make sure you're not heading to a jovial occasion when you listen.

The full lyric can be found here:

http://rapgenius.com/The-notorious-big-suicidal-thoughts-lyrics

It does not wear a male face: Thoughts on Andrea Cardosa and Jamie X

Dean Esmay · 22 January 2014 · Archived copy · Original

So there's this video. It's hard to watch. You probably should:

The accused, remarkably, admits it, and has resigned her position as Vice-Principal of Alhambra High School.

It kind of hit me hard, this. Brought up thoughts and memories I haven't exactly buried, but mostly came to terms with and put away a long time ago.

I'll spare you the details. It was all decades in the past, and of those I know to still be alive, they're not likely going to be able to hurt anyone again. Besides, I usually make it a point not to make what I do here on AVfM about me and my own damage. Doing a bi-weekly show with Erin Pizzey on these issues makes it seem nearly impossible never to do it at all, mind you, but I try to keep it to a minimum, and only bring it up when I think it will help someone. So what the hell. Maybe Jamie X, or someone else like her, will read this, and maybe it will help.

There were five of them, between my infancy and my late adolescence. With three of them, what they did was relatively minor, mostly just disturbing and confusing in a young life that was already disturbing and confusing and unstable. The minor ones were the middle-aged housewife neighbor who felt me up, and the theology teacher who did pretty much the same but with more intimacy. With three others, however, it was more than minor. Of the three who weren't minor, two were women, one was a man.

No, none of them really knew each other. It was different predators, different times and places. There just seems to be something about sexual predators: they can spot us. They're drawn to us.

Who's "us?" The vulnerable ones, the lost ones, the ones who are looking for guidance and understanding and security in a world that we can't seem to find it in. I fancy they can tell by the way we walk, the way we talk, the way we interact–or fail to interact–with others. Whatever it is, the sexual predators, they can spot us a mile away I think.

Well, except for the ones who go after their own children. But that's a different type of monster I suppose.

In any case, some may be born predators. Most, I think, probably not. Probably they're reacting to their own childhood damage.

That doesn't make what they did OK. It's not. It just helps to know it, and to realize that while you can never wipe out evil deeds and evil actions, it's easier to heal the trauma and reduce the incidence and help others through it if you recognize where it comes from.

Jamie X says something here about how her life was ruined. No Jamie it wasn't ruined. You can heal from things like this. It can make you stronger and wiser.

There is a certain deal the devil offers us here in this modern culture, which says that if we internalize these experiences and make them the core of our identity, it will give us power. And it will. For a little while. I hope you don't take it. I sense, just watching this, you probably won't. Good.

Because that deal, it's like taking methamphetamines: in the short term, it does good things for you.

With amphetamines, there's no doubting it: you feel good, you're sharp, you're alert, you're not at all tired, your memory is better, you can concentrate better, you can think more clearly about things, and the world seems like an awesome place. For a while. But pretty soon it robs every bit of that from you, and takes away even more. Eventually it consumes you, and you lose everything.

So too comes what I think of as the "victim mentality." If the victim mentality consumes you, if you repeat over and over that this defines you, that this has crippled you forever, and use your victim status like a club to hit anyone who challenges you, as an excuse for every setback… well, it's empowering for a time. But long term, you slowly just get sicker and sicker, and rather than gaining mature wisdom from it, you make yourself a permanent emotional cripple. And that's not even your predator's fault anymore, it's yours.

Life's a bitch that way, ain't it?

I hope I'm right in my assessment, and Jamie X turns down the deal with the devil, and emerges stronger. Something tells me she will, but only time will tell.

There are also other thoughts this brings up, and these have nothing to do with Jamie X. So Jamie if you're reading, you can stop here. The rest has nothing to do with you.

In this jumbled mix of thoughts that came to me listening to Jamie's call, came sure knowledge that if I read this story in a place like The Good Men Project, or Salon, or Slate, or even some conservative organ, or even a mainstream media organ with no major political axe to grind, I'd read a line something like this:

"Sexual predators don't always wear a male face."

And you know, people would just nod sagely at that stupid line. "Of course, of course, not always, thanks for the important reminder."

My response to that headline is, fuck you. Abuse does not wear a male face period. Nor does it wear a female face. Abuse is fucking abuse, and we have a cultural blind spot, an enormous one, when it comes to female predators. We tell ourselves they aren't common even though they are quite common indeed. Just look at the difference between who gets prosecuted and convicted, versus what people report of their own experiences. On the self-reports, it turns out that females are anywhere from one-third to more than half of all sex predators. They just don't go to jail for it anywhere near as often.

You know it's one thing to be abused when you're a child. Then it's another abuse to be told that the abuse comes from males and maleness. For women, what this does is make it easier for the female predators to get away with it, and makes women more afraid of men.

But you know what it really does? It abuses little boys, and men of all ages, and makes them believe that this is their problem, that this problem wears their face. And it's a whole other level of abuse, because it's a hateful, bigoted lie.

If you tell a young man that he was sexually abused and raped by a woman… "but the problem is overwhelmingly a male-on-female problem," and that he can use his experience to empathize with women, and you know what you are? An ignorant fool. And if you persist in that ignorance even after someone takes the time to try to educate you on the matter? Now you're not just an ignorant fool, you're an aggressively ignorant bigoted asshole.

Sexual abuse doesn't have a male face. It doesn't have a female face. It has a human face, and one day, with any luck, we'll all recognize that.

Here's hoping.

J4MB official complaint to the BBC – 'Newsnight' piece on domestic violence was in breach of 50+ BBC Guidelines

Mike Buchanan · 22 January 2014 · Archived copy · Original

The BBC has a long track record of following feminist and other left-wing narratives, and a glaring example is their coverage of domestic abuse/violence ('DA'). For many years the BBC's narratives have been solely – or almost solely – about female victims and male perpetrators, despite an overwhelming body of evidence showing that women are often perpetrators of DA, and men often victims. There are occasional balancing pieces, including this one on (surprisingly) Woman's Hour, on 10 October 2013:

While such pieces exist, they're rare – Woman's Hour generally follows feminist narratives, as we'd expect. Other high-audience BBC programmes which are even keener on following those narratives includes the flagship news programmes Today and Newsnight. A particularly bad example on the Newsnight episode of 5 April 2013:

Late in the evening of 7 January 2014 we received a large number of emails from supporters appalled at that evening's episode of Newsnight. Not only was there a piece on the programme concerning menacing tweets sent to Caroline Criado-Perez – a subject the BBC has covered at inordinate length on many occasions – but more importantly to our supporters, a lengthy piece on DA failed to mention male victims and female perpetrators:

Our blog piece on the matter:

http://j4mb.wordpress.com/2014/01/08/bbc-newsnight-abuses-male-victims-of-domestic-violence-yet-again/

We decided it was time to send our first official complaint to the BBC, and to increase our chances of having an impact we decided to focus on the 7 January episode, and scrutinised the BBC Editorial Guidelines in detail. The BBC Editorial Guidelines page will take you through to those guidelines, which are viewable online and downloadable as a PDF (215 pages).

There are three documents associated with our complaint. The cover letter:

140120 letter to BBC re Newsnight 7 January 2014 – FINAL DRAFT

Our critique of BBC Editorial Guidelines in connection with the complaint, showing the Newsnight piece breached 50+ guidelines:

140120 Newsnight report's breaches of BBC Editorial Guidelines – FINAL DRAFT

Dr Nicola Graham-Kevan's slides from last year's presentation to the National Conference for Male Victims of Domestic Violence:

140108 Nicola Graham-Kevan presentation, 'Female perpetrators of intimate partner violence'

We'll post the BBC's response online as soon as we receive it. In the meantime we invite you to submit your own complaint about the Newsnight episode. First online page about making a complaint http://www.bbc.co.uk/complaints. If you wish to make a complaint online start here http://www.bbc.co.uk/complaints/complain-online/. Key pieces of advice:

> Try to restrict yourself to one complaint, this increases your chance of getting a substantive response
>
> Clarify you're making a complaint, as distinct from a comment, and you require a written response
>
> Ensure the BBC receives your complaint (whether by mail or online) by 5 February

Feel free to email me mike@j4mb.org.uk if you receive an interesting response to your complaint.

Five rights feminism delivered for women, but doesn't want to share with anyone else

Janet Bloomfield (aka JudgyBitch) · 23 January 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Modern feminism, with its incessant whining and complaining and victim proclamations has quite rightly come under increasing fire not only from sites like AVfM, but in the mainstream media, too. The recent brouhaha surrounding Jezebel placing a $10,000 bounty on Lena Dunham's head, demanding to see the unretouched photos from her recent Vogue shoot, serves as an illustration of just how far feminism has strayed from its original roots. In a fit of mean-girl spite to make Regina George herself blush, Jezebel was absolutely positive that Vogue had grossly retouched Dunham, because there is no way she is actually that pretty. Lena is ugly! Let's prove how ugly that bitch is! Someone get me the unretouched photos, stat! Here's $10,000 for the favor.

Charming. Turns out Vogue hadn't retouched Lena all that much, and Jezebel ended up looking like exactly the group of bitter, jealous bitches they are. And "good, it's about time" is all I can say to that.

With feminism seeming to be on a self-destruct cycle all of its own, I thought this might be a good time to reflect on the good things feminism has accomplished and then ponder just why it is that feminism doesn't want those gains to be extended to everyone? Could it be that feminism isn't about equality at all, but more about power and dominance? Let's investigate.

1. The right to reproductive freedom

Margaret Sanger and Otto Bobsein are credited with coining the term "birth control" and were early proponents of the wide spread adoption of family planning.

By the 1960s the birth control pill was available for women and unleashed a social revolution that broke the bonds between sex and reproduction. The ability to choose motherhood yet still have sex offered women a freedom that had never been possible for all of human history, and women took full advantage of that freedom. Freedom given to them by mostly male scientists, by the way.

Women had the children they wanted, when they wanted them.

The 1973 Roe vs. Wade Supreme Court Decision further solidified women's reproductive rights, allowing them to abort children they did not want before they were born.

Recent attacks on abortion rights are rightly seen as an affront to womankind itself. The right to choose parenthood is absolutely essential if women are to realize their full human potential.

That is not a statement that is contested with any vigor by feminists. Planned parenthood–there can be no other way.

Curious, then, that the push to make parenthood a choice for all humans is resisted by feminists specifically. Amanda Marcotte, writing for The Raw Story is completely dismissive of that half of humanity which would also like the right to choose parenthood.

There are absolutely writers who question why feminism appears to be concerned only with women's choice, but few will venture further than curiosity.

What is it about feminism that insists women must have the right to summarily confiscate male assets while retaining the absolute right to choose for themselves whether they will dedicate any resources at all to parenthood?

Equality seems to have gone missing from the argument.

2. The right to have rape taken seriously

Caveat: let's keep in mind that raping white women, or even the allegation of having done so, was always a serious crime when the defendant happened to be a black man. It was generally punishable by death.

> In 1793, 17-year-old Lanah Sawyer was pushed into a brothel and raped by a seemingly respectable man who had taken her for a walk in the streets of New York. In court, her assailant's attorney said she had basically consented to sex when she agreed to go walking with him, and warned the jury against placing "the life of a citizen in the hands of a woman." The man was acquitted.

By the 1970s, the National Organization for Women was busy drawing attention to the leniency most rapists received and the brutal questioning victims were forced to endure.

The Oscar-winning film The Accused, starring Jody Foster as a drunk woman who was gang-raped on a pool table as bar patrons watched was a watershed moment that convinced Americans that rape was a serious crime and that perpetrators deserved to punished.

The subsequent rape-hysteria of contemporary feminism is not the topic of this post, but I will remind readers that rape hysteria is utterly out of control. As if you needed such a reminder, right?

What I am interested in is the curious phenomena of feminists dismissing male rape statistics and willfully ignoring the fact that boys are raped more often than girls. Not to mention giggling over actual cases of male rape.

Feminism succeeded in making rape a serious crime. When the victim is a woman.

Why then is feminism so reluctant to extend the same sympathy and legal protections to male victims that are afforded female victims? And just to be clear, I don't mean sympathy extended by the courts or the general public. I mean sympathy extended by feminists, who insist that every woman who claims she has been raped must be believed, no matter how fanciful or spurious the claim.

What is that about? Again, it doesn't look much like equality from where I sit.

3. The right to have mental health issues taken seriously

Anxiety, depression, despair, hopelessness, traumatic responses to events long passed, anorexia and suicidal thoughts were often thought to be the product of women's innate hysteria, often relieved through the thoughtful (ahem) application of vibrating machines (double ahem) applied to a woman's genitals (holy ahem!).

Feminists worked hard to demonstrate that women's mental health issues were linked inextricably to their life circumstances, and rightly so. Simply dismissing the despair of some women as inherent to women was grossly insulting and reductionist.

Interestingly enough, our modern feminist sisters have no problem claiming that men's mental health issues are inherent to men and masculinity: it is the very concept of "manhood" that creates mental illness. Describing men as "emotionless dickbots", Anna North proposes that all masculinity needs is a good dose of shame.

> But do men need, in addition, "a positive, masculine gender identity?" It's something of a strange concept — few feminists would ever say that women needed "a positive, feminine gender identity." While plenty of women take pride in being female, "femininity" is so loaded with patriarchal expectation that, for feminists, it's kind of a dirty word. This may not be a bad thing — in fact, I'd argue that "masculine" should go the same way.

What is going on here? Women have genuine, human emotional problems that are most certainly not the simple result of being women, but mental health problems in men is proof of "toxic masculinity"?

Really? Interesting.

4. The right to NOT be assumed natural caregivers

Feminists have long railed against the stereotype that women are "naturally more loving" than men, and therefore better suited to be caregivers for small children.

Of course, these very same women hire other women to care for their children when they are occupied with something more important, and are reluctant to even contemplate hiring an occasional babysitter who is male, but we'll ignore the inconsistency for the moment.

If women have no innate advantage over men when it comes to caring for small children, why then are feminist organizations so opposed to shared parenting and automatic joint custody when parental relationships fail?

What's up with that? Are men and women equally suited to be providers of care, or are they not?

5. The right to genital integrity

Feminism has worked hard to lift the veil on the grotesquely cruel practice of genital mutilation, but only if the genitals in question are of the female variety.

Indeed, some feminist websites openly mock men for being anti-circumcision, claiming the "intactivist" movement arises because men feel the "world revolves around their dicks".

As opposed to all those mutilated girls who probably think the world revolves around their vaginas?

Circumcision: only cruel when it's done to girls.

Conclusion

What are we to make of this curious state of modern feminism?

Reproductive rights, but only for women.

Rape awareness, but only when women are victims.

Mental health awareness, but only when women are affected.

Assumption of natural caregiving ability, but only when the option is to have a man care for children.

Genital integrity, but only for girls.

How can anyone possibly see feminism as a movement to achieve equality between men and women when feminist organizations and individuals actively work to ensure that the hard fought rights their older feminist sisters won apply to women, and women only?

I personally think it's important to separate modern feminists from their historical counterparts. When we critique feminism, I think we should make it clear that we are critiquing modern feminism. Some might argue that the current state of affairs is not a bug of the feminist system, but a feature: that feminism intended to end up exactly where we are. I'm not convinced that is a productive conversation to have.

I think we can celebrate the triumphs of feminism while being wholly and deeply critical of the limitations. There is no room left to maneuver in modern feminism.

The rights women have gained for women now need to be extended to everyone. Reproductive freedom, the right to make rape accusations and be given a fair trial, the right to have mental health issues taken seriously, the right to be assumed a loving caregiver and the right to genital integrity.

You won't find those issues championed at NOW or Ms. or feministing or Jezebel or any other mainstream feminist media site.

But you will find them championed here.

Feminists have completed their work and now have nothing to do but circle their wagons and try to keep others from achieving the same rights.

Well, when they're not busy calling other women ugly and paying $10 000 for proof of just how ugly.

Fuck feminism. It's over. The game is now ours. And we will fight for every last right.

For everyone.

Lots of love,

JB

Feminism vs Male Reproductive Rights

AVfM Video Source · 23 January 2014 · Archived copy · Original

They always have some interesting content over at The Advice Show. How often do you hear a conversation this blunt about the issue of male reproductive rights? –DE

It gets really good toward the end, if we do say so ourselves.

You may want to subscribe to The Advice Show.

Violet Paget on the grotesque worship of women

Peter Wright · 23 January 2014 · Archived copy · Original

The following excerpts on the subject of mediaeval love are from author Violet Paget's landmark work Euphorion – Vol. II, 1895. Perhaps an early example of the fabled HoneyBadger, she concludes that chivalric love was a "grotesque" worship of women, that has been bequeathed to the modern world. – PW

[image]
Violet Paget (aka Vernon Lee)

In what we call the Middle Ages there was invented, by the stress of circumstances, elaborated by half-conscious effort and bequeathed as an unalienable habit, a new manner of loving.

To describe mediaeval love is a difficult matter, and to describe it except in negations is next to impossibility. I conceive it to consist in a certain sentimental, romantic, idealistic attitude towards women, not by any means incompatible however with the grossest animalism; an attitude presupposing a complete moral, aesthetical, and social superiority on the part of the whole female sex, inspiring the very highest respect and admiration independently of the individual's qualities; and reaching the point of actual worship, varying from the adoration of a queen by a courtier to the adoration of a shrine by a pilgrim, in the case of the one particular lady who happens to be the beloved; an attitude in the relations of the sexes which results in love becoming an indispensable part of a noble life, and the devoted attachment to one individual woman, a necessary requisite of a gentlemanly training.

Mediaeval love is not merely a passion, a desire, an affection, a habit; it is a perfect occupation. It absorbs, or is supposed to absorb, the Individual; it permeates his life like a religion. It is not one of the interests of life, or, rather, one of life's phases; it is the whole of life, all other interests and actions either sinking into an unsingable region below it, or merely embroidering a variegated pattern upon its golden background. Mediaeval love, therefore, never obtains its object, however much it may obtain the woman; for the object of mediaeval love, as of mediaeval religious mysticism, is not one particular act or series of acts, but is its own exercise, of which the various incidents of the drama between man and woman are merely so many results. It has not its definite stages, like the love of the men of classical Antiquity or the heroic time of the North: its stages of seeking, obtaining, cherishing, guarding; it is always at the same point, always in the same condition of half-religious, half-courtier-like adoration, whether it be triumphantly successful or sighingly despairing.

The man and the woman or rather, I should say, the knight and the lady, for mediaeval love is an aristocratic privilege, and the love of lower folk is not a theme for song the knight and the lady, therefore, seem always, however knit together by habit, nay, by inextricable meshes of guilt, somehow at the same distance from one another. Once they have seen and loved each other, their passion burns on always evenly, burns on (at least theoretically) to all eternity. It seems almost as if the woman were a mere shrine, a mysterious receptacle of the ineffable, a grail cup, a consecrated wafer, but not the ineffable itself. For there is always in mediaeval love, however fleshly the incidents which it produces, a certain Platonic element; that is to say, a craving for, a pursuit of, something which is an abstraction; an abstraction impossible to define in its constant shifting and shimmering, and which seems at one moment a social standard, a religious ideal, or both, and which merges for ever in the dazzling, vague sheen of the Eternal Feminine.

Hence, one of the most distinctive features of mediaeval love, an extraordinary sameness of intonation, making it difficult to distinguish between the bona fide passion for which a man risks life and honour, and the mere conventional gallantry of the knight who sticks a lady's glove on his helmet as a compliment to her rank; nay, between the impure adoration of an adulterous lamia like Yseult, and the mystical adoration of a glorified Mother of God; for both are women, both are ladies, and therefore the greatest poet of the early Middle Ages, Gottfried von Strassburg, sings them both with the same religious respect, and the same hysterical rapture. This mediaeval love is furthermore a deliberately expected, sought-for, and received necessity in a man's life; it is not an accident, much less an incidental occurrence to be lightly taken or possibly avoided: it is absolutely indispensable to man's social training, to his moral and aesthetical self-improvement; it is part and parcel of manhood and knighthood… Frowendienst, "lady's service," is the name given by Ulrich von Liechtenstein, a mediaeval Quixote, outshining by far the mad Provencals Rudel and Vidal, to the memoirs very delightfully done into modern German by Ludwig Tieck; and "lady's service" is the highest occupation of knightly leisure, the subject of the immense bulk of mediaeval poetry.

"Lady's service" in deeds of arms and song, in constant praise and defence of the beloved, in heroic enterprise and madcap mummery, in submission and terror to the wondrous creature whom the humble servant, the lover, never calls by her sacred name, speaking of her in words unknown to Antiquity, domna, dame, frowe, madonna words of which the original sense has almost been forgotten, although there cleave to them even now ideas higher than those associated with the puella of the ancients, the wib of the heroic days lady, mistress the titles of the Mother of God, who is, after all, only the mystical Soul's Paramour of the mediaeval world. "Lady's service" the almost technical word, expressing the position, half-serf-like, half-religious, the bonds of complete humility and never-ending faithfulness, the hopes of reward, the patience under displeasure, the pride in the livery of servitude, the utter absorption of the life of one individual in the life of another; which constitute in Provence, in France, in Germany, in England, in Italy, in the fabulous kingdoms of Arthur and Charlemagne, the strange new thing which I have named Mediaeval Love.

Has such a thing really existed? Are not these mediaeval poets leagued together in a huge conspiracy to deceive us? Is it possible that strong men have wept and fainted at a mere woman's name, like the Count of Nevers in "Flamenca," or that their mind has swooned away in months of reverie like that of Parzifal in Eschenbach's poem; that worldly wise and witty men have shipped off and died on sea for love of an unseen woman like Jaufre Rudel; or dressed in wolf's hide and lurked and fled before the huntsmen-like Peire Vidal; or mangled their face and cut off their finger, and, clothing themselves in rags more frightful than Nessus' robe, mixed in the untouchable band of lepers like Ulrich von Liechtenstein? Is it possible to believe that the insane enterprises of the Amadises, Lisvarts and Felixmartes of late mediaeval romance, that the behaviour of Don Quixote in the Sierra Morena, ever had any serious models in reality? Nay, more difficult still to believe because the whole madness of individuals is more credible than the half-madness of the whole world is it possible to believe that, as the poems of innumerable trouvères and troubadours, minnesingers and Italian poets, as the legion of mediaeval romances of the cycles of Charlemagne, Arthur, and Amadis would have it, that during so long a period of time society could have been enthralled by this hysterical, visionary, artificial, incredible religion of mediaeval love? It is at once too grotesque and too beautiful, too high and too low, to be credible; and our first impulse, on closing the catechisms and breviaries, the legendaries and hymn-books of this strange new creed, is to protest that the love poems must be allegories, the love romances solar myths, the Courts of Love historical bungles; that all this mediaeval world of love is a figment, a misinterpretation, a falsehood.

But if we seek more than a mere casual impression; if, instead of feeling sceptical over one or two fragments of evidence, we attempt to collect the largest possible number of facts together; if we read not one mediaeval love story, but twenty not half a dozen mediaeval love poems, but several scores; if we really investigate into the origin of the apparent myth, the case speedily alters. Little by little this which had been inconceivable becomes not merely intelligible, but inevitable; the myth becomes an historical phenomenon of the most obvious and necessary sort. Mediaeval love, which had seemed to us a poetic fiction, is turned into a reality; and a reality, alas, which is prosaic. Let us look at it.

Mediaeval love is first revealed in the sudden and almost simultaneous burst of song which, like the twitter and trill so dear to trouvères, troubadours, and minnesingers, fills the woods that yesterday were silent and dead, and greeted the earliest sunshine, the earliest faint green after the long winter numbness of the dark ages, after the boisterous gales of the earliest Crusade. The French and Provencals sang first, the Germans later, the Sicilians last; but although we may say after deliberate analysis, such or such a form, or such or such a story, was known in this country before it appeared in that one, such imitation or suggestion was so rapid that with regard to the French, the Provencals, and the Germans at least, the impression is simultaneous; only the Sicilians beginning distinctly later, forerunners of the new love lyric, wholly different from that of trouvères, troubadours, and minnesingers, of the Italians of the latter thirteenth century… Such is the moment when we first hear the almost universal song of mediaeval love.

Source: Euphorion Being Studies of the Antique and the Mediaeval in the Renaissance – Vol. II

Promoting Marriage

Mark Trueblood · 23 January 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Recently, conservative New York Times columnist Ross Douthat ruminated on the possibilities of promoting marriage to young people through social policy and social shaming. The article was mostly geared to low-income and working-class demographics, given that this group is less likely to marry than middle and upper classes. (But such an initiative would effect other demographics as well, of course). Douthat states:

> 1) the kind of family stability America enjoyed 50 years ago had massive social and personal benefits, 2) that the socioeconomic benefits of family stability have, if anything, increased as marriage has gone into decline, and 3) that policymakers should therefore look for ways to make it easier for stable, two-parent homes to be formed and then endure.

I don't dispute that marriage does have benefits. However, marriage isn't just a ceremony and a cake; it is a financial contract. As I would assume Douthat would agree, one should not enter into a financial contract without considering both the benefits and the risks. Sadly, the risks of marriage are dire.

Divorces are disastrous. The divorce industry enriches the courts, law enforcement, and lawyers, while often greatly favoring the female spouse. Yet, efforts to make alimony more fair are often met with bipartisan opposition, such as in Florida when "Tea Party" Governor Rick Scott vetoed just such a bill.

If there are children in the divorce, the risks become even more dire. Child support enforcement is notorious for placing unfair burdens on one spouse while failing to hold the parent with primary custody responsible for their end of the bargain. Failure to meet child support obligations often result in the noncustodial parent being thrown in debtor's prison. Last but not least, divorce has dire effects on children and often result in the child being raised in a single parent home, associated with its own risks.

With the advent of no-fault divorce (an innovation in family law that has long enjoyed bipartisan support) spouses can initiate divorce for any reason, or no reason. While it will be nearly impossible to roll back no-fault divorce, spouses should not be incentivized to blow up marriages with the promise of cash and prizes. Reforms are needed in family courts.

Now, let's look at the other side: the great incentives for young people to stay single: Sexual intercourse is easy to obtain, especially if one is attractive and/or willing to visit a sex worker. A deluge of sexual excitement can be had instantly on the internet. There is a wealth of non-sexual free and low-cost entertainments one can immerse themselves in.

There is little shame in being a single person these days, and being a single parent is not met with as much shaming as it used to. Employed single people are regarded as a valuable resource by many employers. And if one doesn't have a job, or only has a minimum income, that is supplemented by a large social safety net, which is often enough for people with no life aspirations. Given the colossal risks associated with marriage, and the comparable benefits of singlehood, is it any surprise young people are increasingly choosing the latter?

The proponents of marriage do recognize the incentives of singlehood. In response, they have ramped up attempts to shame young people (especially men) who stay single. And propose social engineering schemes to promote marriage, a la Douthat. Yet they are conspicuous in their silence on the problems with divorce and family law. Their silence may be out of ignorance or apathy, or perhaps they support the family court system as – is. But until the proponents of marriage turn the corner on this, their efforts should be regarded as halfhearted at best.

P.S.- not all marriage proponents are like that.

Moms who kidnap kids: The back story

Robert St. Estephe · 23 January 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Robert St. Estephe–Gonzo Historian–is dedicated to uncovering the forgotten past of marginalizing men. "Gonzo journalism" is characterized as tending "to favor style over fact to achieve accuracy." Yet history – especially "social history" – is written by ideologues who distort and bury facts in order to achieve an agenda. "Gonzo" writing is seen as unorthodox and surprising. Yet, in the 21st century subjectivity, distortion and outright lying in non-fiction writing is the norm. Fraud is the new orthodoxy. Consequently, integrity is the new "transgressive."

Welcome to the disruptive world of facts, the world of Gonzo History.

***

Parental kidnapping, also known as parental child abduction, has a long history. And it is a subject that has never been documented historically. In the United States the phenomenon was by the 1850s so widespread that in a news report on one such case, involving the abduction of the children of a Mr. Ananias Thompson by his wife which took place in northern California, the reporter noted his reporting on one case "has all too many parallels in California." The most readily-available historical study that makes some effort to offer the history of this phenomenon, Kidnapped: Child Abduction in America (Paula S. Fass, Oxford University Press, 1997), is a poorly researched, politically tendentious and unreliable source. One can quickly see how its "social constructionist" attempt at offering an account of parental kidnapping in the early 20th century is just by reading the first article ever written, appearing in 1907, on the topic treating it as a recognized social problem, titled "Love Proves Superior to Law's Decrees." The article was syndicated and appeared in numerous newspapers across the nation.

The quantity of material on parental kidnapping cases residing in old newspapers and that has gone untapped by scholars is of a scale that is truly monumental. The three cases here, each involving the abduction of children from their fathers by the mothers, represent some of the more notable ones from the earliest period in which newspapers carried information on such cases in the United States. These three are not, however the earliest examples, nor are they the only ones from the period. Many many more exist, but these have been selected for the particular interest each offers. The first, Peirson case, is typical of most records. The record of the case takes the form of a legal debt disclaimer, which was a standard way for husbands to protect themselves from estranged wives whose debts he was legally liable for. The Peirson advertisement is notable in containing the earliest known image depicting — in a very crude and generic fashion — a case of parental kidnapping.

The Tuthell case represents the earliest known well-documented account of a parental kidnapping in the United States. It is a highly colorful story, involving a sizable reward for the return of the child and the adventures — and death — of the wife's career criminal paramour, of a father in search of his baby child.

The record of the Bonnell case, like Peirson, takes the form of a debt disclaimer, yet in the short space of a one-paragraph "Public Notice," it reveals a tale of paternal woe that could have, if elaborated further, filled a book.

The official history of the relations of the sexes that is now taught is politically correct rubbish, based on the faulty "social constructivist" theories of people trained to follow artificial and ideologically tainted intellectual models of analysis and who frequently lacking common sense. Any person serious about understanding the monstrous and destructive "family court hell" we are all, every one of us, touched by today either directly or indirectly should be interested in looking the historical record which tells a tale so very different from the one we are sold by mainstream media, feminists, government and the education industry.

(Archaic spellings in the originals have been preserved.)

******

1) 1792: The Peirson case

[image]
Such debt disclaimer ads as this one constitute the earliest public reports of parental kidnapping. This example contains the earliest known illustration connected with a parental kidnapping case.

FULL TEXT: Whereas RUTH, my Wife, eloped from my bed and board on the twenty ninth of instant January, with one child: — This is therefore to forbid all persons trusting them on my account, as I will not pay any debt of their contracting after this date.

WILLIAM PEIRSON, Shelburn, Jan. 30, 1792.

[Advertisement "William Pierson." The Vermont Journal and the Universal Advertiser (Windsor, Vt.), Mar. 13, 1792, p. 4]

*** ***

2) 1810: The Tuthell case

The Tuthell case is the earliest fully documented parental kidnapping case to be reported in a United States newspaper.

[image]
FULL TEXT (Tuthell, article 1 of 3): Some time since a person who calls himself John Creston, but from circumstances it is supposed his real name is Charles D. Walsingham, and it is more than probable he has a number of names, came to the (publick) house of Howard B. Tuthell, in the character of a gentleman; he appears to be about 35 years of age, about 5 feet 8 inches high, thick set, and clumsy appearance, dark complexion and dark hair, cut short behind but long on the top of the head, dark eyes; his hands tanned very black, with two scars, one across the back of his left hand, and a scar on one of his legs near the ancle [sic]; a good set of teeth which appears to be a little indented; from his conversation he appears to be a captain of a vessel or a British officer; he wears a dirk and pocket pistols; he drove a bay horse about 16 hands high, stout made, about 8 years old, with bushy main and tail; his legs and feet very large, has a small white spot on his back, occasioned by the saddle; he rode in a calash top chair, of a light jean color; the body a dark green, with a red lion on each side; the carriage and wheels a green, with small yellow spots; the left side of the box a little injured; the harness very plain; he had a yellow canvass case which he sometimes wore on his chair box, with a spread eagle behind, and a small new one on before; he has a two barrel gun which he generally carries with him; he has several thousand dollars in specie with him, most of it in doubloons –

The unprincipled wretch, on the third of July, inst. absconded with the wife and child of Edward B. Tuthell. She is a slender, delicate made woman, about 20 years of age, about 5 feet 5 inches high, fair complexion, and a little freckled; light brown hair; dark grey eyes, short face and prominent cheek bones; her teeth fair and good and shows them much when she laughs; her name is Frances.

The child a female, about 7 months old; the hair brown and dark eyes; her name is Susan, but they changed it the second day to Mary. She may change their clothes as they took but very few with them. They started with an intention (as they said) of visiting Mrs. Tuthell's friends, about 8 miles off, but took the direct road to Naston, in Pennsylvania, where they were seen on the 4th July, and from there they took a south west direction.

The disconsolate husband offers a reward of 200 dollars to have the villain detected, and will give 100 dollars and all reasonable charges to recover the lost infant. The distressed parents of the deluded woman would be glad to receive any information concerning her, and will at any time be happy to receive their humble and penitent child to their distressed dwelling. All humane people are desired to give all information they may get of either of them, to Edward B. Tuthell, post master, in the town of Monroe, Orange County, and state of New York.

The printers of newspapers in the southern states, are requested to give the above a few insertions in their papers, and they will much oblige the distressed connexions, and assist to detect a monster running at large.

[“300 Dollars Reward. The Public is earnestly requested to apprehend a finished villain,” Poulson’s American Daily Advertiser (Philadelphia, Pa.), Jul. 16, 1810, p. 4]

•••

FULL TEXT (Tuthell, article 2 of 3): The press is stopt to state, that by a gentleman last night from Fincastle, we are just informed that Creston, alias Walsingham, who carried off Edward B. Tuthell’s wife and child, on the 3rd July last, from the town of Monroe, Orange County , New York, as particularized in the advertisement on the last page of this paper, was a few days ago arrested in Fincastle, and committed to jail. A very considerable sum of money was found in his possession, which from disclosures made by him to the lady, has been unrighteously obtained. It is stated that he was the captain of a vessel which her cargo he sold on his own account, and decamped with the plunder; and disliking solitude as most men do, he embraced the first opportunity as was very natural of engaging a companion, &c. to soothe his solitude, and smoothe the tedium of travelling in foreign parts.

Mr. Walsingham on being first apprehended delivered his keys to the lady with the direction to take what money she wanted – She took 3 or 4 hundred dollars with which she engaged professional men to prosecute her betrayer. His trial is set for to-day and the lady recognized to appear as a witness. Further particulars soon.

[Untitled, Charleston Courier (South Carolina), reprinted from Lynchburg (Va.) Star, Aug. 24, 1810, p. 3]

***

FULL TEXT (Tuthell, article 3 of 3): Gentlemen, The following is an extract of a letter received this day, dated Fincastle, the 14th August, 1810. The circumstances mentioned are so extraordinary that I conceived it material to publish the information. Should you be of the same opinion you will be willing to give it a place in your Mercantile Advertiser. — August 25 – A subscriber.

The town of Fincastle has been in a great uproar in consequence of a suicide committed on Friday last in the jail. You may remember an advertisement inserted some time ago in the New-York papers, relative of the elopement of a Mr. Walsingham, with the wife and child of a Post-Master in Orange county. It appears that Walsingham was an assumed name; and that during his progress to this place he at various times went by several different ones; when he was taken here he called himself Smith. A civil action being commenced against him, and he being unable to find bail to the amount ordered by the magistrates, he was committed to prison; and after a few days confinement executed that justice upon himself which the laws could not have inflicted. But the only thing which induced me to mention his fate, was the mystery which it involves. Before the magistrates, and after committed, he steadily persisted in refusing to reveal his name, and after his death, it was found that he had not only buried every article of his clothing that could lead to a discovery of his family, but had also burnt a large sum in bank notes, from an apprehension that they might afford some clue to that object – He has left a paper, on the subject of his conduct, which is not written in his common hand, but in round letters. His very boots were cut in small pieces, lest they should betray him; and his face and body so mangled as to bear no resemblance to their original appearance. This circumstance has given rise to a variety of conjectures, and will probably afford an exclusive topic of conversation here for a month at least.

[Untitled, New York Evening Post (N.Y.), (reprinted from the Mercantile Advertiser), Aug. 24, 1810, p. 3]

******

3) 1815: The Bonnell case

[image]

FULL TEXT:

PUBLIC NOTICE. On Thursday afternoon last two ruffians, by name Jonathan and Ephriam Simpson, employed by my wife Catherine, seized and took by force of arms, my daughter Caroline, nearly 4 years of age, and at the same time presented their pistols and threatened my life, if I attempted to interfere. The conduct of my said wife had been before so base and wicked, that I had publicly forbid all persons harboring or or trusting her on my account; and her recent and still more aggravated conduct has been such as to induce me to give this public notice, and again forbid, and I do hereby forbid all persons harboring her, or either of my children, or trusting her in any manner on my account, as I am determined not to pay any debts of her contracting from the date of my former notice.

ELIAS BONNELL. Waverliet, May 8, 1815

NOTE: Any person that will safely convey my children to me shall be handsomely rewarded.

[Elias Bonnell, Public Notice, New-Jersey Journal (Elizabeth-Town, N.J.), May 30, 1815]

***

(Editor's Note: Archaic spellings have been retained.)

Sources for Thompson case: "A Recreant Wife," Weekly San Juan Republican (Stockton, Ca.), Jul. 5, 1856, p. 3; "Charge Of Bigamy," Weekly San Jose Republican (Stockton, Ca.), Jul. 12, 1856, p. 2

Violet Paget on the “grotesque” worship of women (1895)

Peter Wright · 23 January 2014 · Archived copy · Original

The following excerpts on the subject of mediaeval love are from author Violet Paget’s landmark work Euphorion – Vol. II, 1895. Perhaps an early example of the fabled HoneyBadger, she concludes that chivalric love was a “grotesque” worship of women, a practice that has been bequeathed to the modern world. – PW

In what we call the Middle Ages there was invented, by the stress of circumstances, elaborated by half-conscious effort and bequeathed as an unalienable habit, a new manner of loving.

To describe mediaeval love is a difficult matter, and to describe it except in negations is next to impossibility. I conceive it to consist in a certain sentimental, romantic, idealistic attitude towards women, not by any means incompatible however with the grossest animalism; an attitude presupposing a complete moral, aesthetical, and social superiority on the part of the whole female sex, inspiring the very highest respect and admiration independently of the individual’s qualities; and reaching the point of actual worship, varying from the adoration of a queen by a courtier to the adoration of a shrine by a pilgrim, in the case of the one particular lady who happens to be the beloved; an attitude in the relations of the sexes which results in love becoming an indispensable part of a noble life, and the devoted attachment to one individual woman, a necessary requisite of a gentlemanly training.

Mediaeval love is not merely a passion, a desire, an affection, a habit; it is a perfect occupation. It absorbs, or is supposed to absorb, the Individual; it permeates his life like a religion. It is not one of the interests of life, or, rather, one of life’s phases; it is the whole of life, all other interests and actions either sinking into an unsingable region below it, or merely embroidering a variegated pattern upon its golden background.

Mediaeval love, therefore, never obtains its object, however much it may obtain the woman; for the object of mediaeval love, as of mediaeval religious mysticism, is not one particular act or series of acts, but is its own exercise, of which the various incidents of the drama between man and woman are merely so many results. It has not its definite stages, like the love of the men of classical Antiquity or the heroic time of the North: its stages of seeking, obtaining, cherishing, guarding; it is always at the same point, always in the same condition of half-religious, half-courtier-like adoration, whether it be triumphantly successful or sighingly despairing.

The man and the woman or rather, I should say, the knight and the lady, for mediaeval love is an aristocratic privilege, and the love of lower folk is not a theme for song the knight and the lady, therefore, seem always, however knit together by habit, nay, by inextricable meshes of guilt, somehow at the same distance from one another. Once they have seen and loved each other, their passion burns on always evenly, burns on (at least theoretically) to all eternity.

It seems almost as if the woman were a mere shrine, a mysterious receptacle of the ineffable, a grail cup, a consecrated wafer, but not the ineffable itself. For there is always in mediaeval love, however fleshly the incidents which it produces, a certain Platonic element; that is to say, a craving for, a pursuit of, something which is an abstraction; an abstraction impossible to define in its constant shifting and shimmering, and which seems at one moment a social standard, a religious ideal, or both, and which merges for ever in the dazzling, vague sheen of the Eternal Feminine.

Hence, one of the most distinctive features of mediaeval love, an extraordinary sameness of intonation, making it difficult to distinguish between the bona fide passion for which a man risks life and honour, and the mere conventional gallantry of the knight who sticks a lady’s glove on his helmet as a compliment to her rank; nay, between the impure adoration of an adulterous lamia like Yseult, and the mystical adoration of a glorified Mother of God; for both are women, both are ladies, and therefore the greatest poet of the early Middle Ages, Gottfried von Strassburg, sings them both with the same religious respect, and the same hysterical rapture.

This mediaeval love is furthermore a deliberately expected, sought-for, and received necessity in a man's life; it is not an accident, much less an incidental occurrence to be lightly taken or possibly avoided: it is absolutely indispensable to man's social training, to his moral and aesthetical self-improvement; it is part and parcel of manhood and knighthood… Frowendienst, "lady's service," is the name given by Ulrich von Liechtenstein, a mediaeval Quixote, outshining by far the mad Provencals Rudel and Vidal, to the memoirs very delightfully done into modern German by Ludwig Tieck; and "lady's service" is the highest occupation of knightly leisure, the subject of the immense bulk of mediaeval poetry.

"Lady's service" in deeds of arms and song, in constant praise and defence of the beloved, in heroic enterprise and madcap mummery, in submission and terror to the wondrous creature whom the humble servant, the lover, never calls by her sacred name, speaking of her in words unknown to Antiquity, domna, dame, frowe, madonna words of which the original sense has almost been forgotten, although there cleave to them even now ideas higher than those associated with the puella of the ancients, the wib of the heroic days lady, mistress the titles of the Mother of God, who is, after all, only the mystical Soul's Paramour of the mediaeval world.

"Lady's service" the almost technical word, expressing the position, half-serf-like, half-religious, the bonds of complete humility and never-ending faithfulness, the hopes of reward, the patience under displeasure, the pride in the livery of servitude, the utter absorption of the life of one individual in the life of another; which constitute in Provence, in France, in Germany, in England, in Italy, in the fabulous kingdoms of Arthur and Charlemagne, the strange new thing which I have named Mediaeval Love.

Has such a thing really existed? Are not these mediaeval poets leagued together in a huge conspiracy to deceive us? Is it possible that strong men have wept and fainted at a mere woman's name, like the Count of Nevers in "Flamenca," or that their mind has swooned away in months of reverie like that of Parzifal in Eschenbach's poem; that worldly wise and witty men have shipped off and died on sea for love of an unseen woman like Jaufre Rudel; or dressed in wolf's hide and lurked and fled before the huntsmen-like Peire Vidal; or mangled their face and cut off their finger, and, clothing themselves in rags more frightful than Nessus' robe, mixed in the untouchable band of lepers like Ulrich von Liechtenstein? Is it possible to believe that the insane enterprises of the Amadises, Lisvarts and Felixmartes of late mediaeval romance, that the behaviour of Don Quixote in the Sierra Morena, ever had any serious models in reality?

Nay, more difficult still to believe because the whole madness of individuals is more credible than the half-madness of the whole world is it possible to believe that, as the poems of innumerable trouvères and troubadours, minnesingers and Italian poets, as the legion of mediaeval romances of the cycles of Charlemagne, Arthur, and Amadis would have it, that during so long a period of time society could have been enthralled by this hysterical, visionary, artificial, incredible religion of mediaeval love?

It is at once too grotesque and too beautiful, too high and too low, to be credible; and our first impulse, on closing the catechisms and breviaries, the legendaries and hymn-books of this strange new creed, is to protest that the love poems must be allegories, the love romances solar myths, the Courts of Love historical bungles; that all this mediaeval world of love is a figment, a misinterpretation, a falsehood.

But if we seek more than a mere casual impression; if, instead of feeling sceptical over one or two fragments of evidence, we attempt to collect the largest possible number of facts together; if we read not one mediaeval love story, but twenty not half a dozen mediaeval love poems, but several scores; if we really investigate into the origin of the apparent myth, the case speedily alters. Little by little this which had been inconceivable becomes not merely intelligible, but inevitable; the myth becomes an historical phenomenon of the most obvious and necessary sort. Mediaeval love, which had seemed to us a poetic fiction, is turned into a reality; and a reality, alas, which is prosaic. Let us look at it.

Mediaeval love is first revealed in the sudden and almost simultaneous burst of song which, like the twitter and trill so dear to trouvères, troubadours, and minnesingers, fills the woods that yesterday were silent and dead, and greeted the earliest sunshine, the earliest faint green after the long winter numbness of the dark ages, after the boisterous gales of the earliest Crusade. The French and Provencals sang first, the Germans later, the Sicilians last; but although we may say after deliberate analysis, such or such a form, or such or such a story, was known in this country before it appeared in that one, such imitation or suggestion was so rapid that with regard to the French, the Provencals, and the Germans at least, the impression is simultaneous; only the Sicilians beginning distinctly later, forerunners of the new love lyric, wholly different from that of trouvères, troubadours, and minnesingers, of the Italians of the latter thirteenth century… Such is the moment when we first hear the almost universal song of mediaeval love.

Source: Euphorion Being Studies of the Antique and the Mediaeval in the Renaissance – Vol. II

ABC News Retracts Lies Against A Voice for Men

Paul Elam · 24 January 2014 · Archived copy · Original

This is something I would normally post to bulletins, but the gravity of the matter is significant enough that I want it to run for the weekend front and center.

Following the lead of Mike Buchanan, a Men's Human Rights Activist from the UK, who regularly comments here and periodically contributes articles, we have decided to engage the legal departments of and possibly litigate against elements in the mainstream media that have intentionally misrepresented the views on this website, and the nature of the Men's Human Rights Movement.

Naturally, one of the first entities that came to mind with this approach was ABC News 20/20, who published an online article by Alyssa Pry and Alexa Valiente that egregiously and I think maliciously misrepresented the content of this site as well as the intent of our mission here.

To wit, they took an article I penned three years ago condemning the advocacy of violence and asserting that commenters violating our antiviolence position would be banned after their comments were stricken and claimed that comments like these are so commonplace that visitors to the site feel free to post them.

I wrote the legal department of ABC News and informed them of my concerns about this kind of journalism and of our intent to have the matter corrected.

To the credit of the ABC News Legal Department, sufficient action has been taken to address the open act of libel on the part of Pry and Valiente. The following statement by the editor has been added as an addendum to the article itself.

> Editor's Note: ABC News wants to clarify that the two passages quoted in the second paragraph of this story, which were originally part of a comment posted several years ago by a user on the "A Voice for Men" website, were removed by Mr. Elam shortly after they were posted and that he posted a warning to contributors that such comments "would not be tolerated" on the website. Mr. Elam, who contacted ABC News to point this out, also said in his message that "as our five year online history reflects, such comments are exceptionally rare, but when they do occur they are treated with zero tolerance." The editorial and comment policy of the website states that "A Voice for Men" is "anti-violent" and that it "supports only peaceful change on all levels of human interaction; social, political and otherwise."

While ABC News is still remiss, in my opinion, by calling this a "clarification" rather than what it actually is, a retraction of the bald-faced lies from the ABC News department, I still appreciate the fact that the retraction is now a part of the public record.

That leaves Maclean's Magazine and The Week, both of whom have printed malicious lies about A Voice for Men and whose legal departments I have contacted, but who have not yet responded. Should they continue to ignore AVFM demands that they retract their libelous works, we will look into whatever legal options are viable for us to pursue.

In the meantime, and with thanks to Mike Buchanan for his sterling example, I want to take a moment to enjoy the fact that the rule of law still occasionally affords power to the little guy against the powers that be.

And I want to issue a notice to the mainstream media. Printing lies about AVFM will no longer be tolerated or handled with pleas to the decency of publishers who don't have any. We don't intend to take this crap anymore.

J4MB presents a Toady award to NOMAS (National Organisation for Men Against Sexism)

Mike Buchanan · 24 January 2014 · Archived copy · Original

There's a group of people who live even deeper in the gender feminism sewer than female feminists – male feminists. The Denver-based National Organisation for Men Against Sexism (NOMAS) is awash with these men, and claims roots going back to the mid-1970s. The organisation's strapline:

> Pro-feminist, gay-affirmative, anti-racist, enhancing men's lives.

A pro-feminist organisation "enhancing men's lives." You couldn't make it up, could you?

It would be inadvisable to look through their website http://nomas.org soon after eating a meal, but the thread that runs through it is that men have to change in order that women may become yet more advantaged than they are already – although of course that's not the spin the website puts on it. The Reading List contains 21 books and papers by Michael Kimmel alone – an internationally infamous feminist poodle. Here's a taster of what these geniuses believe (from 'Tenets'):

> Whatever psychological burden men have to overcome, women are still the most universal and direct victims of our patriarchy. Our organization must take a highly visible and energetic position in support of women's struggle for equality. Our movement was born directly out of and continually nourished by feminism. Even if we could not see any pragmatic ways in which we as men could benefit from an end to traditional patriarchy (and we can see many), most of us would strongly support women's struggle, simply because it is so unquestionably just and right. Our support for women's rights and specific women's issues must be vigorous and unmistakable.

Needless to say there aren't just vile men in NOMAS, there are vile women too, presumably there to stamp hard on any early signs of independent thought amongst the men. Here's NOMAS's piece on male victims of domestic abuse http://www.nomas.org/node/220:

> Not a Two-Way street: Men are NOT the victims of what is meant by Domestic Violence and Abuse
>
> Just as some mental problems are more prevalent among women (e.g. depression) or men (e.g. alcoholism); many crimes are very, very highly correlated with gender. Men commit near 100% of forcible rapes, 90% of murders, etc. It is a simple fact that men are usually larger and physically stronger than their female partners. It is true that men are far more often raised to enjoy and practice fighting, boxing and wrestling skills. Far more significantly, we live in a world where men globally have dominated women, physically, politically and economically, a stubbornly-held patriarchal domination which is deeply rooted in history and pre-history. So it is hardly surprising that men are the perpetrators of controlling or violent partner abuse.
>
> But there is an adage in journalism that "When a dog bites a man, that's not News; but when a man bites a dog, that's News!" So perhaps on that impulse, the national press has always had a seeming fascination with the lurid possibility of "battered husbands" and frequently run articles with quotes and citations suggesting that this is a real but hidden problem. Many of these originate from so-called "Men's Rights" groups, which proclaim that there are just as many battered husbands as battered wives. (The problem is not seen they say because the battered husbands are always just too embarrassed to tell anyone. As if women aren't!)
>
> Incredibly, in response to these claims, some funding for battered women's programs has been reduced, on the grounds that equal funding should go to battered men. More indirectly, some authors and agencies and legislators have sought to linguistically de-gender the crime, describe it in phrases like "family violence," and obfuscate the reality that this is a crime that men commit against women. (Domestic abuse among Lesbian and > Gay male couples does also occur of course.)

>
> Are there instances in which men are physically dominated and assaulted by their female partners? This does occur, often when a man has become weakened by a factor such as illness, injury, or old age. Even in these circumstances abuse by a woman is unusual and when it does occur, it is most often motivated by self defense, fighting back and other protections. Even in these instances, the language "battered husbands" is not useful especially in light of the thousands and even millions of women known to have suffered or been murdered at the hands of a male abuser.

Anyone familiar with the statistics on domestic abuse will know most of the piece is feminist-inspired nonsense. Let's just concentrate on this element:

> Are there instances in which men are physically dominated and assaulted by their female partners? This does occur, often when a man has become weakened by a factor such as illness, injury, or old age. Even in these circumstances abuse by a woman is unusual and when it does occur, it is most often motivated by self defense, fighting back and other protections.

As we've repeated many times, official statistics (in the UK) show 70% of the perpetrators of uni-directional domestic violence (the victim 'takes it' or exits the situation) are women. Only 4% of women who've abused their intimate partners report self-defence as a motivation. There's also the issue that around 300 studies have shown that compared with men, women are as physically aggressive, or more aggressive, towards their intimate partners.

The cohort of people with the highest reported levels of domestic violence are lesbians. What do the geniuses at NOMAS have to say on this?

> Domestic abuse among Lesbian and Gay male couples does also occur of course.

It "does also occur of course." Wow.

From time to time we present "Toady" awards to male collaborators with gender feminists. David Cameron won the award in 2012 and 2013, and the bookmakers are giving short odds on him winning again in 2014. We haven't given a Toady award to an organisation before, but NOMAS is clearly a very worthy winner. Here's their certificate:

Toady award presented to NOMAS

I'll send NOMAS a link to this post and invite them to engage with J4MB if they want to learn the truth about domestic abuse or any of the other areas where their analysis is demonstrably ridiculous. We won't hold our breath waiting for a response.

About Economic Risks and Rewards

Jalon Cain (aka Aaron Sleazy) · 24 January 2014 · Archived copy · Original

In an Wired article with the promising title, "Silicon Valley isn't a Meritocracy", Alice Warwick doesn't take long to make one of the dumbest statements I've read in a while:

> If the tech scene is really a meritocracy, why are so many of its key players, from Mark Zuckerberg to Steve Jobs, white men?

It almost seems that you could compile an encyclopedia with examples of logical fallacies just by skimming feminist blog posts for a couple of hours. Here, Alice Warwick, let me teach you something.

First, you should have learnt about survivorship bias. Yes, some entrepreneurs are very successful. However, the great majority is not. Since you mention him, Alice, why don't we spend some time discussing Mark Zuckerberg? Sure, he is a billionaire now, and inspiration to thousands of young men and women who are building their own startup. But do you think those thousands of people will all become billionaires as well? You know, Alice, just because one guy wins the jackpot doesn't mean that it's a good idea to spend all your disposable income on lottery tickets.

Mark Zuckerberg dropped out of Harvard to launch Facebook. Great idea, right? Well, it's a great idea in hindsight. Look what Matt Welsh, one of Zuckerberg's professors in the Harvard computer science department, had to say:

> I thought that social networking sites were a complete waste of time — both for the users and those developing the sites — so I earnestly tried to talk Mark out of squandering his precious Harvard education on such a frivolous endeavor. "You think you're going to compete against Friendster and Orkut?" was the general outline of my argument. There were already too many social networking sites out there, I claimed, and building yet another one was clearly a waste of time.

Some of you may not even remember Friendster anymore, or Orkut, or MySpace. The point is that Zuckerberg was up against pretty bad odds. The reasonable choice for him would have been not to drop out. If this is too philosophical for you, Alice Warwick, then maybe you remember something from the statistics classes you hopefully took. Let's say you have a look at Wikipedia's list of college dropout billionaires.

Wow, look at all those rich people! But not so fast, Alice! There are 30 college dropout billionaires, but does this imply that it's a great idea to do as they did? I'm quite certain that the number of people who dropped out of college, or didn't even attend college, and did not become millionaires or billionaires is many orders of magnitude larger than that. Zuckerberg took an enormous risk, but he also reaped astronomical rewards. Does this imply that Silicon Valley is sexist? If you look at all the "losers", in other words, those who launch a startup and fail, or get nowhere for years, you can only conclude that despite the fact that the few winners are male, the vast majority of losers are male as well.

Women just don't seem to want to take those risks. They don't have to, but as long as they don't, it seems rather silly to claim that the problem is sexism. Feminists cherry-pick their evidence and are either unable or unwilling to reflect over their perception of the world. To repeat: The risk-takers are predominately men, and consequently the few winners are men, but also the vast majority of losers. In Alice Warwick's world it almost seems as if the wild economic success attained by a very few is not meritocratic just because there is no 50-50 gender split. However, where are all those female CEOs supposed to come from if women aren't interested in making those big bets, the big gambles that sometimes that lead to great payoffs, but are much more likely to end in disaster?

The more rational choice for Zuckerberg, and Jobs, and many others who succeeded, would have been to continue on their chosen path towards a solid middle-class existence. Shall we use another example, Alice Warwick? Okay, let's say you're a professor at an elite university, and one of your first-year students told you he wanted to quit his studies and become a musician. The student is a young lad studying accounting at the London School of Economics, and his name happens to be — Mick Jagger!

This is not a joke. Mick Jagger did indeed study accounting at the London School of Economics. This would arguably have set him up for life. Instead, he took a gamble and became one of the most successful musicians in the world. He's not Zuckerberg-rich, but with a few hundred million dollars in the bank he is quite a bit more comfortable than the average Joe. In hindsight he made the right choice.

In 1961, his choice was not rational, and there were thousands of boys his age who did the same thing who are now sweeping streets, collecting garbage, or tending bar.

The odds that you're going to become a wealthy musician are laughably small. Even just getting by as a musician is incredibly difficult. The chance that the startup you're working on in your bedroom will blow up to be worth billions of dollars is virtually zero, and so is your chance of becoming a tenured professor at Harvard, a successful author, an influential composer, a ground-breaking movie director, a lauded painter, or a star athlete. However, the reason why it's so often men who end up in exactly those positions is because they do take those utterly irrational risks.

The vast majority will fail. Plenty will waste years if not decades of their life. Many will never recover economically from pursuing their dreams in their 20s and 30s. Yet, a very small and fortunate number does succeed. It's mostly men who succeed because it's mostly men who do take those risks. As a society we should be proud of those men–and also of all those who try but fail. I can't help but think that instead of trying to guilt-trip men and insist that they enjoy some kind of "privilege," a stronger focus should be on why women tend to avoid those risks.

The answer is of course that they are more risk-averse.

Without risk there is also no reward. This isn't so bad, because if you don't take any risks, you also minimize your chances of failure. But, dear Alice Warwick and all you other feminists, doesn't it strike you as absurd that you do want to have your cake and eat it, too? You don't want to take any risks, yet somehow society is supposed to turn women into CEOs, superstar programmers, tech billionaires and whatnot, even though they themselves make little effort to take the risks necessary do so?

This article is also available in Romanian.

Possibly the stupidest argument in the history of humankind

AVfM Video Source · 25 January 2014 · Archived copy · Original

This speaks for itself, we think: Every bad, stupid, gynocentric, gender-feminist bullshit argument rolled into two incoherent sentences.

You can subscribe to Banne666au here.

Soften the fuck up!

AVfM Video Source · 26 January 2014 · Archived copy · Original

The following video was first featured on the Australian website SoftenTheFckUp. – PW

"Harden the Fuck Up. Suck it Up. Man Up."

These are words we've heard plenty of times before. We pride ourselves on being a country where "men are men" and we stare down problems with a steely, unflinching gaze.

This is fine in theory, but in reality we live in country where suicide is biggest killer of men between 14 – 44. In fact, 80% of all suicides in Austalia are men.

Why is this? As blokes, we can be too stubborn and proud to take action and to get some help when we going through tough times. And, let's face it, we're all going to go through some shit times in life, so we need to learn how to deal with them.

We're here to make it easier for men to take action than to take their own lives.

We want to return to an Australia where the idea of mateship trumps all. Where if a bloke is going through a rough patch, his mates are there to see him through.

We also want let guys know that it's OK to take action and ask for help when needed. Think about it for a second – if your mate had problems, would you prefer him to take his own life or ask you for a bit of help? Yeah, we thought so. The same thing goes for you, too – your mates would prefer to give you a hand and have a chat than see you deal with your problems alone.

We think it's a simple idea: Go hard and soften up.

Campaign Background

Soften the Fck Up is an initiative of Spur Projects. At Spur, we believe that to tackle the rate of suicide among men in Australia, bold new approaches to suicide prevention are required.

We also know that the risk of suicide diminishes with help and support. For many men, however, seeking help and support is the last thing on their mind. That needs to change, and we exist to change that.

Who is Soften the Fck Up? We are a group of passionate people made up of project managers, entrepreneurs, marketers, hr people and a range of other professions that have nothing to do with mental health. That's why we have a kick-ass advisory board who have been in the mental health spacefor years. They include doctors, psychologists, youth workers and people who have been a part of organisations like Lifeline, beyondblue and Young and Well CRC.

Mind-raping with more zest!

AVfM Video Source · 26 January 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Diana Davison is a naughty girl who wants you to do naughty things, taking “mind-rape” and “eye-rape” to a whole new level.

Subscribe here to Feminism LOL.

Free Cock Is Not Oppression

Jason Gregory · 26 January 2014 · Archived copy · Original

As you'll answer it, take heed
This Slave commit no Violence upon Himself. I've been deceiv'd. The Publick Safety
Requires he should be more confin'd; and none,
No not the Princes self, permitted to Confer with him. I'll quit you to the King.
Vile and ingrate! too late thou shalt repent
The base Injustice thou hast done my Love:
Yes, thou shalt know, spite of thy past Distress,
And all those Ills which thou so long hast mourn'd;
Heav'n has no Rage, like Love to Hatred turn'd,
Nor Hell a Fury, like a Woman scorn'd. –Congreve, The Mourning Bride

The Jezebel ladies are busying themselves concocting evidence of their oppression. It's a "spectacular tale" of a man who is too weak to last more than two hours online as a woman. In this tale, a man is said to have created a fake online dating profile of a "pretty average looking girl." His inbox quickly filled with perverted messages and offers of free cock. The man was so disgusted at all the free cock thrown his way that he had to delete the profile and spend the rest of the night "with a very bad taste" in his mouth.

The tale is suspect, but we all know that free cock is everywhere. Men give it away like it's worthless. There is no doubt in my mind that this is probably typical of the experiences of women with online dating profiles. I doubt that it is unusual at all for a woman to get 300 messages in her inbox from men who are desperate for female affection, approval, and sex. There is no doubt in my mind that men send "dick-pics" and clamor, bother, and sometimes harass women for their affections and attentions. There is no doubt in my mind that men deal with gobs of rejection and there is no doubt in my mind that some men handle this rejection in very poor ways—becoming relatively "hostile" after being told that they are not interesting, not good enough (too poor), or, in various ways, that they are not worthy of affection and attention. The harsh reality for some men is that some women will never bestow upon them a position high enough in the male hierarchy of dominance to be "worthy" of affection, attention, and sex. We all know it's true in-general, even if this specific tale is suspect. Free cock is everywhere.

This is something that I've never understood about men. If women want to ride my cock, they gotta pay. I'm the one doing all the work in bed. It's my sweat all over her and the sheets. It's her fucking orgasm and foreplay that is a job. Yet, men give away cock like it's worthless. Dudes, get a fucking clue and stop giving it away! For the sake of fuck, at least make her pay for a juicy sirloin to replace all the jizzed-out protein.

All you men who give it away, all you do is reinforce the entitlement mentality of women who believe that their being present is plenty. You reinforce the idea that women don't owe anything to the relationship—that they deserve a free-ride of cocks and that they don't even have to break a sweat. Even the most aggressive cock-breaking volley-ball girls barely break a sweat after saddling up. You may be able to find a few coked-up girls who really get into it—the kind of girls who end up with sweaty hair, mascara, and cum dripping down their cheeks, but those girls usually have emotional disorders and are simply trying to bury their emotional problems in various sorts of drug induced escapes.

Women typically feel entitled to free cock. Don't believe me? Rejected girls are often the most vindictive, hateful, and slanderous women of thunder ever unleashed upon the world of men. Try telling a girl no. Tell her, after she makes it clear that she wants your cock, that you're not interested in giving it to her. Tell her that she isn't interesting, that her soul is dog-shit and that she has nothing to offer other than boobs and booty, that she is a piece of shit and a total failure as a human being, that you don't find her attractive and that she isn't even good enough to be a cum-bucket. Tell her that she is never going to be any good at sucking cock and that she needs to stop pretending that she is doing any favors and learn to compensate for her inadequacies by becoming “kinky.” Tell her that her vapid life of shoes and pop-culture and materialism are soulless pursuits of dog-shit. Watch what happens. If you Jez-ladies wanna know what “hostile” means, see this rejected woman.

It’s typical for these Jez-ladies to complain that men feel entitled to a shag after paying for dinner, drinks, and a movie, being chivalrous and paying compliments, but there is nothing like the hostility of a rejected woman who feels entitled to free cock…and for doing nothing other than being present with her pussy. So, before you Jez-ladies start complaining about all the free-cock-oppression, assess your own entitlements and privileges. Before you condemn men as being “hostile” about rejection, perhaps you should consider how well most men actually do handle rejection, for hell hath no fury like a woman scorned.

Free cock is not your oppression. It is your privilege. Get a clue.

Ben and Jerry's is a radical hate group

Dr. Tara J. Palmatier · 26 January 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Trigger Warning: If you have below average intelligence, if you are an emotional reasoner, if you think holding a woman accountable for her behavior is a form of domestic violence, and/or if you are a radical feminist, please be advised that this is a work of satire. And, no, satire does not have anything to do with Satan or satanic cults and the sexual abuse of children.

With all the hullaballoo over the SPLC 2011 "Intelligence" Report on emerging hate groups, we failed to notice that one of the most nefarious men's groups was omitted from the report: Ben Cohen and Jerry Greenfield, the purveyors of Ben and Jerry's ice cream. It boggles the mind how someone who calls himself Manboobz, the SPLC's very own Deep Throat, could have made such a glaring oversight. [1]

The Evidence

Ben and Jerry's is an emerging hate group. I know this is true because I read a comment on the Internet about men who like ice cream. Here's the smoking gun:

You like ice cream? Well, ice cream is dairy. Dairy comes from a cow. Cows are female bovine. Female bovine put a lot of work into making the blessed milk* for their children. Then what do YOU do, you patriarchal pig? You not only take the milk not intended for your species, you mix it with eggs, salt, and ice. A total perversion of it's original form, for your own patriarchal pleasure, you misogynistic consumer you!

THAT, is misogyny writ large! [2]

Ice cream makes women fat. Fat is a feminist issue. [3] Sure many MRMs will argue that ice cream doesn't make women fat; that some women make the choice to over-indulge in ice cream without a commensurate amount of physical exercise to counter their caloric intake, but they are wrong. It has been proven that women are not responsible for their choices. Ever.

The FBI's newly broadened definition of rape makes it clear that women are not responsible for the choices they make. [4] Ergo, ice cream makes women fat against their will. It is nonconsensual fat.

Ben and Jerry's is one of the most successful ice cream brands worldwide and is run by two men; Ben and Jerry. Therefore, Ben and Jerry are agents of the patriarchy; a two-man, anti-women hate group. As previously noted, ice cream comes from milk. Milk comes from female cows, as opposed to male bulls. Milk is the sacred life force of the Divine Feminine. Ben and Jerry are men who are stealing the sacred life force of the Divine Feminine for personal profit and the oppression of women by making them fat.

It cannot be stated enough that Ben and Jerry are both men. If they cared about the plight of women and women's long history of oppression, they would rename their organization Beth and Jerry or Ben and Jenny or Beth and Jenny. Ben and Jerry are clearly representatives of the business as usual Old Boy's Club. They are stopping women from breaking through the dairy ceiling.

The first letters of Ben's and Jerry's names are B and J. BJ is the abbreviation for blowjob. A blowjob is a degrading sexual act that is perpetrated on 15 out of 10 women every 3 seconds for the sole purpose of a man's pleasure as found by the Random Statistics Generator ™ from the Outtamyass Institute of Femtechnology. Therefore, Ben and Jerry are supporters of oral sex rape.

Need further evidence? Ben and Jerry plan to unveil a new flavor next month; Dominique Strauss-Cone.

Ben and Jerry have no fashion sense. They look like a couple of slacker stoner dudes who live in the basement of their mother's underwater house. You just know they wouldn't be able to support a woman. They don't look like they even know how to groom and dress themselves. Losers.

Their callous disregard of the latest fashion trends just goes to show how right Star columnist Heather Mallick was when she wrote, "Women often shop for men, and I shudder to think how men would dress if they didn't. Most men can't even enter shops to buy their own pants." [5] (* No joke: This excerpt is taken from an attack article Ms. Mallick directed at a 17-year old boy).

Ice cream is served in scoops. The French word for scoop is boule, which translates to ball. Men have balls. A few years ago, I ordered a dish of glacé at a French restaurant in Zurich. The Italian waiter teased me by asking how many "boules" I wanted. He sexually harassed me with Ben and Jerry's ice cream.

Couples often frequent Ben and Jerry's ice cream shops after a dinner date. Men ply unsuspecting women with Ben and Jerry's ice cream in order to get them into bed. After a woman's inhibitions are disinhibited with a little Cherry Garcia, for example, the act of seduction becomes much easier.

Furthermore, many women who are tricked into bed with Ben and Jerry's, never hear from their dates again. Not only is this an act of domestic violence [6] it is evidence that these so-called seduction artists are members of a hate group. [7]

Ben and Jerry give their ice cream flavors misogynistic names. Don't think for one moment that I've forgotten the Schweddy Balls ice cream incident. [8] Forcing women and children to lick Schweddy Balls. Sickos. These two creeps should be on the sex offender's registry.

Not to mention, Alec Baldwin was in the SNL Schweddy Balls skit. [9]

This is the same Alec Baldwin who believes PAS (Parental Alienation Syndrome) is real and supports equal custody laws. [10] On the other hand he is a liberal and contributes to the MuffPo. [11] Dammit. Cognitive dissonance is tugging at my brain cells. CONFLICTED! [12]

And let's not forget about the Ben and Jerry's flavor Chubby Hubby. [13] This is indisputable evidence that Ben and Jerry support same-sex marriage. Everyone knows girl on girl is hot and man on man is not.

If men are allowed to marry one another, they will deprive women of resources that they are entitled to via heterosexual marriage and then heterosexual divorce (e.g., spousal support and child support). Ben and Jerry support denying access to money and other valuable resources for marriageable women and their children.

Additional MRM hate groups currently under investigation:

Dick's Sporting Goods

Hungry Man Dinners

PS3, Xbox and Nintendo

Dungeons and Dragons (for the old-schoolers)

The Boy Scouts of America

The NFL

The Sarasota Men's Barbershop Quartet

The Gherkin Building (Well, I mean, c'mon. Just look at it. It's a phallic monument to the patriarchy. I hear MRMs meet in its basement and think misogynisticky thoughts and act all misogynisticky.)

Disclaimer: This is a satirical editorial. Stating that Ben and Jerry's and its co-founders, Ben Cohen and Jerry Greenfield, are misogynistic MRMs and leaders of the growing MSM hate movement in no way implies that AVfM or I believe that they are misogynists or members of any hate group.

Tom Martin and the Streisand Effect

AVfM Video Source · 27 January 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Tom Martin, a student at the London School of Economics, filmed a series of interviews with other students, addressing his lawsuit against the school, for teaching a sexist, bigoted ideology. One of those students, who participated in the interview knowing it would be uploaded is now trying to censor this video by having it taken down from Youtube (on Tom Martin's channel, this is a mirror)

While this is annoying, it also suggests that the student has matured, and now recognizes their own point of view, as expressed during the interview, is in fact ignorant and bigoted. Unfortunately, they're still evidently immature enough to believe censorship is a good path to pursue to cover up their bigotry.

Possibly also, they are unfamiliar with what is often called the Steisand effect, where people make copies of materials and put them up in multiple places, to stop the censorship attempt.

Which is happening now to Tom Martin's threatened videos.

Note: Here at AVfM we have had some strong disagreements with Tom Martin. But so what? Censorship by harassment and abuse of the flagging and reporting system: not cool. Whether you do it to us or anyone else.

By the way, why do we suspect something very similar is about to happen to John Nazarian, but for different reasons?

As close as we get to a real debate with a feminist

Paul Elam · 27 January 2014 · Archived copy · Original

OK, so a stray comment came in to this piece. It was an invitation to debate, of sorts. Or rather it was the closest thing we get around here from a feminist. This one calls themselves notsince67. Notsince wanted to make some points, and wanted some answers from me. Rather than put an hour into a two year old comment section, I though some readers here might find some of this interesting.

First, notsince's comment:

Would like your thought's Mr. Elam. So here goes.

Your most heavily cited paragraph, in attempt to qualify the legitimate status of this site, not as misogynistic, but as a bearer of the human rights torch, to me, carries many red herrings. I'll elaborate.

First, I believe your statement of men "committing" (it is hard to commit what is no longer a crime, as you as a "mental health" professional should understand.) suicide more often than women is in fact a red herring and simply a misrepresentation of the issue of suicide. Women are far more likely to attempt suicide, whereas men are far more successful in COMPLETING suicide. Reasons for this have been attributed to the difference in lethality of suicide methods when split along gender lines. Your statement is made to present that men are under more mental duress than women, but the numbers tend to suggest the opposite is true.

Secondly: "America's exploding prison population, which overwhelmingly includes and victimizes the working class and new poor, contains more than 2 million people, but under 100,000 women. This disparity has had profound effects on African-American men, as more of them are incarcerated than in post-secondary education… Young men, ignorant rather than criminal, are placed on lifelong sex offender registries that prevent them from obtaining education and even healthcare, and ensuring that they will never contribute to society."

I first, had to laugh. Let's call a spade a spade. Criminals (IMO) are violent and property offenders. Sex offenders are violent offenders. "Young men ignorant rather than criminal…placed on lifelong sex offender registries" in itself displays sympathy for ALL male sex offenders, regardless of the specifics of the offense. Now I do understand, yes there are men who are wrongfully convicted as the result of fraudulent accusations. However, I've seen the figure placed at around 10% or less. So do we give 90% a free pass? And how does the picture change when you taken into account the under reporting of sexual crimes, on both side of the coin? The statement in itself in itself draws sympathy to all sex offenders. That's garbage. If your bone to pick is the WRONGLY ACCUSED, so be it, but it seems it is not.

But in terms of the prison population, it's entirely unrelated to gender dynamics when you consider all the facts. The reality of the situation is the vast majority of the explosion in the U.S. prison population is due to the use of mandatory minimums on drug crimes, with drug offenders representing the largest growing segment of all incarcerated offenses. When you take into consideration the vast majority of drug offenders (and crack vs. powder cocaine sentencing beginning in the 1990′s) that police departments centralize enforcement in poverty-stricken black communities, and the black male population bears the brunt of these harsh sanctions. Add in the fact labour at 0.18 cents an hour for 40+ hours a week is MANDATORY in Texas prisons, you see an evolving scheme of neo-slavery which strengthens the prison-industrial complex. What you speak, or point to, is not an issue of gender rights, it about punitiveness and racial equality. It is a criminolgical issue which you have entirely hijacked to support your cause. And let's not get into the effect "three-strikes and you're out" type legislation has on the mentally ill and essentially makes life sentences for drug addicts who struggle to shake their habit.

Finally, I laughed too at this: "Relatedly, male attendance in higher education has fallen to 40% and continues to diminish, and men lag far behind women in obtaining advanced degrees. The performance of boys in our grade, middle and high schools is deteriorating. Meanwhile, men have become a minority in the workforce, ensuring their further social and economic marginalization, as well as any hope of upward economic mobility."

Is seems to suppose that there is some sort or concerted effort to discriminate men from employment. Is that what you suggest? That employers are denying candidates jobs for being male? That academic institutions are turning away otherwise qualified and dedicated applicants on the basis of having a penis, and systemically they are denied education where ever they turn? Is that something you can support?

I've read a few articles. I can say that you touch on real issues. Gender-bias in the courts, the use of family law and domestic violence policy that is preferential to women. But to attribute it to feminism is misguided. Why? If you killed EVERY feminist, the policy would remain unchanged. Feminism is not the issue, policy is the issue. I understand the link between feminism as the advocates for change, but saying "well, fuck them" is ignorant of the issues (and that's aimed at more of your "minions" than you yourself) and really is misguided anger. Don't be mad at women, be mad at the courts. So women fight to keep that staus-quo? Engage in dialogue. This "fuck those bitches" type mentality is just a sign of someone who feels sleighted which, as someone with BPD, is what cause stupid rage. Rage gets you no where, and is unproductive. What works is constructive dialogue, such as what MLK aimed to do.

I could go on, but I'll leave you the chance to reply and leave a little meat on the bone.

And here is my answer:

Normally, I would not invest this kind of energy on a stray comment on article pushing two years old, but I think this will make an article, so I will bite. OK, then, point by point we go.

First, People commit suicide. It is common terminology. Deal with it. Pedantry and silly semantics won't make your points. Well, neither will anything else, as we will shortly see.

As to the issue of suicide, genuinely suicidal people, both male and female, generally tend to succeed at their death-wish. Ask your nearest mental health professional. It is common knowledge in the profession that people who want to die, usually do.

So either that leaves us with women being too incompetent to choose a method that gets the intended result, or it means that their choice to employ a non-lethal attempt is likely indicative that the action was for a different outcome than death. Yes, many non-successful "attempts" just like suicidal "threats" are attempts at gaining attention, or gaining control – not genuine attempts to die.

Still, that leaves us with a question. What is a greater problem? Several people who scratch at their wrists and call for help, who are then still alive and available for counseling and support, or the fewer people who wind up dead?

One of the most telling aspects of feminist and traditionalist mentality I regularly encounter is people who, with a fucking straight face, call foul on the subject of male suicide by comparing three women who swallowed 10 Advil and immediately called 911 to one man who put a gun to his head and blew his brains out. If the comparison were not so sick I would laugh.

I never made the argument that women were under more or less mental duress, just that men ended up dead from it a lot more. Capisce? Never mind, the question was rhetorical.

Next, regarding alleged sexual offenders, the sympathy you imagine I harbor for them, and your ridiculous attempt to characterize all sexual crimes as violent. NOTE: Your attempt to break down all crime into violent or property was equally fatuous, but I only have so much time.

Sorry, but you are just being stupid. Men get on sex offender registries for a variety of reasons, and many of them have nothing to do with violence. There have been young men placed on them because as teenagers they had consensual sex with girlfriends who were younger than them. Consider the case of Ricky Blackman.

http://www.avoiceformen.com/feminism/government-tyranny/sexual-predator-insanity/

His story is just one nightmare. I could link you to more, but you don't really care about it so I won't waste keystrokes.

There are men on offender registries for “public indecency,” again, a non-violent crime (given that public nudity is somehow criminal)

Your claim that registries are for only violent crimes is just, well, ignorant. So here’s something else for you to either not click through on, or to go read and then ignore. It is about how the lives of normal, innocent kids are ruined on these registries.

http://www.publicintegrity.org/2013/05/01/12594/report-details-lives-ruined-children-put-sex-offender-registries

Or perhaps I can tempt your sick indifference to this story of a 15 year old boy that killed himself after streaking at a high school football game, likely because he feared being put on a registry.

http://www.avoiceformen.com/misandry/asshole-of-the-year-principal-michael-campbell/

Maybe I can get you to callously disregard this story about a 78 year old man beaten to death with a baseball bat because his name was similar to someone on a registry.

http://articles.orlandosentinel.com/2010-05-14/news/os-murder-victim-mistaken-sex-offende20100513_1_baseball-bat-deputies-sexual-offender

Tell you what, after you ignore all those items you can go back to ignoring the wrongly accused and wrongly convicted. Or you can just add all of this to your personal “don’t give a fuck about it” pile. I am sure there is always room for more.

Now, you actually make cogent points, some anyway, about the exploding prison population and the profiteering of the prison industrial complex off the drug war, but then shoot yourself directly through the clay in your feet before you can even conclude your points.

You admit, explicitly that “the black male population bears the brunt of these harsh sanctions.” And then, nearly in the same breath, you say, “What you speak, or point to, is not an issue of gender rights, it about punitiveness and racial equality.”

Your problem, in black and white (no pun intended), is that you have no problem seeing Black men as Black. You just don’t see them as men. It is the same problem with almost every feminist ideologue I have ever encountered.

News for you, cupcake. Black men are men. And when Black men suffer disproportionately more than White men and more than Black women from the intentional acts of others, or from systemic injustices, then it is because of their race, and their sex. If Black women were filling prisons I have no doubt you would see this clearly.

By the way, we have other words for people who look at a human being and the only thing they can recognize about them is their race. I trust you won’t need a dictionary to help with that one. Now, lets move on to some other information you care nothing about and from which you will learn even less.

I pointed to the fact that men were disappearing from both higher education and the workforce. And it is true. Here are a couple of charts for you to gloss over and forget.

Men disappearing from education:

[image]
Credit to A Voice for Male Students
Also, as to men and employment, here are some links to articles you will find completely boring:

http://online.wsj.com/news/articles/SB10001424052970204505304577000380740614776

http://www.carseyinstitute.unh.edu/publications/IB-Bean-Unemployment.pdf

Now, to all this you had to say:

> Is[sic] seems to suppose that there is some sort or concerted effort to discriminate men from employment. Is that what you suggest?

Seems and suppose. Right. Actually, I did not attribute or attempt to attribute a cause to these problems. I just stated them as problem. In the world of people who give a fuck, that counts enough to, say, start looking for the causes and solutions. Sorry, won't bother you with that any more.

Finally, you say you read a few articles and then proceed to tell me that feminism is not the only problem. Conclusion: You did not read (or comprehend) enough articles. Woven throughout the content of this website is repeated references to the very facts that you have somehow imagined that you are imparting here for the first time.

Funny thing about a couple of hundred years of collective experience invested in the issues faced by men and boys. We tend to stumble on certain ideas, like the problems with traditional culture, gynocentrism and misandry, and were aware of them long before they started being red-lined by spell checkers. We certainly had a grip on those subjects long before you showed up.

The rest of your comment, the condescending emotional advice, the misrepresented and misunderstood ideas on this website, delivered from the mouth an ignorant bigot, is really what is laughable.

Now, you said you wanted a reply with some meat on it. There is plenty of meat there. Feel free to chew on it, at least if you have not at this point already forgotten it is there.

Male Rapists Are NOT Lurking on Every Campus Corner

Suzanne Venker · 27 January 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Dear Vice President Biden,

During a White House meeting last Wednesday about rape culture on college campus, you said, "Men have to take more responsibility; men have to intervene. The measure of manhood is willingness to speak up and speak out, and begin to change the culture."

I'm curious about two things. (1) Does this "speaking up and speaking out" that signifies manhood apply to all injustice? Or just the kind in which women are the victims? In other words, should men speak up about male injustice? (2) Are women culpable in any way when it comes to sex—on campus or anywhere else?

You used the word "responsibility" when referring to sexual liaisons and added this: "Our daughters, our sisters, our wives, our mothers, our grandmothers have every single right to expect to be free from violence and sexual abuse. No matter what she's wearing, no matter whether she's in a bar, in a dormitory, in the back seat of a car, on a street, drunk or sober — no man has a right to go beyond the word 'no.'"

I agree, but this is where the word "responsibility" gets confusing. Few would argue that when it comes to forcible rape, and it's perpetrated by a male, men should take responsibility. But what about all the other scenarios? The ones that are so murky neither you nor I honestly know what happened? Because those scenarios are the ones in abundance on today's college campuses.

As I'm sure you know, the sex scene isn't what it was in your day. In your day—heck, even in mine—men and women dated. They had relationships. Young people today don't know even what that means. Or did you not get this week's memo?

That's largely because women no longer develop a relationship before having sex with a man. To prove their status as liberated women, they have sex "like a man"—so much so we now have a term for this new environment: the hook-up culture. This new dynamic between women and men can make it difficult, if not impossible, to determine who's to blame when a sex act goes awry.

My question for you is: Why do you exempt women from all responsibility when their behavior is now identical to men's? And why do you assume women are saying no and men are forcing themselves upon women anyway, when it's just as likely—indeed, more likely—she said yes and changed her mind during the actual event, or even after the fact? And then cried rape the next day knowing full well the system is stacked in her favor?

Did you not know these things happen? Allow me to enlighten you.

The New White House report on rape and sexual assault ignores the growing problem of false allegations and relies on inflated rape statistics. Three peer-reviewed studies have found the rate of false accusations of rape to range from 41% to 60%, and a recent study of prisoners convicted on sexual assault charges found 15% of the cases lacked a DNA match to the victim. Your report was also released, ironically, just days after a Michigan judge sentenced Sarah Ylen to five years in prison for falsely accusing two men of raping her, labeling Ylen's actions "diabolical."

And now back to (1). I love the idea of encouraging people to speak up and out when they see injustice, but I only love it when it applies to both sexes. Here at Women for Men, we see male injustice everywhere—but your administration doesn't. A great example is the fact that you and Obama have poured your energies into establishing a White House Council on Women and Girls but have yet to establish a White House Council on Boys and Men, despite a preponderance of evidence that shows males are suffering.

I know you're only interested in justice for women since they voted you in, but here are the facts about the state of males in America today.

To remedy this grave problem, Dr. Warren Farrell put together a proposal for a White House Council on Boys and Men, and it's my understanding it's been languishing on some desk at the White House for two years. Why would that be? I thought you said the measure of manhood is the willingness to speak up and speak out. I can only conclude you mean men should speak up only when women are in trouble—but not when men are.

That must be what you mean because the alternative would mean your own manhood has now been called into question.

Sincerely Yours,

Suzanne Venker

Editor's note: This was originally published on Women For Men.

Karen Woodall: Gender based Family Services – killing children in the UK

Mike Buchanan · 27 January 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Karen Woodall is a highly-respected British family counsellor who has worked with vulnerable children and their families since 1991. Her personal profile:

http://karenwoodall.wordpress.com/

Our thanks to commenter "T" for pointing us to a piece published by Karen a couple of months ago.

https://karenwoodall.wordpress.com/2013/10/04/gender-biased-family-services-killing-children-in-the-uk/

The piece relates primarily to the killing of children by their (biological) mothers, which happens in the UK on the same scale as the killing of children by their (biological) fathers. The difference is that when women kill their own children, it's assumed (by social workers, the media, and others) that there must be external explanations – abuse by a male partner, severe mental health issues.. – so these women are untypical of women in general. In stark contrast, when men kill their own children, no external explanations are necessary – they're typical of men in general.

Some extracts from Karen's piece, which take up the remainder of this blog piece:

The reports of Filicide, the murder by a mother of her child, are all over the news this week.

Baby P, Daniel Pelka, Hamzah Khan, Keanu Williams being just four names that are engraved upon our consciousness, not just because of their untimely deaths, but because of the nature of the suffering inflicted upon them before they died.

Collective handwringing is in evidence up and down the land and who is to blame is being widely discussed. The sight of the Head of Birmingham Children's Safeguarding Board attempting to squirm out of the reality of her responsibility for allowing yet another death of a child to happen on her watch, was excruciating on the BBC news last night. Her words, in a statement released this week scream out the reality of why children are dying.

> 'I wish, on behalf of all the statutory agencies who sit on the Board to express very deep regret and distress about Keanu's death. We apologise unequivocally for what were totally unacceptable and unnecessary failures both collectively and individually in every organisation which had contact with Keanu. We fully accept all the findings of the Serious Case Review and the recommendations made.
>
> Keanu died because there was failure across every agency to see, hear and respond to him in the context of what he was experiencing at any one point in time. Staff were distracted by his mother's needs and by taking what she was telling them at face value.'

"Staff were distracted by (this baby's) mother's needs and by taking what she was telling them at face value." In other words, a systemic use of gender-biased practise which focuses practitioners not on the needs of children, but on the needs and rights of women. If ever there was proof needed that social work and our children and family services are, as a very senior social worker said recently, a "feminist industry," this is it. Gender-biased family services, upholding the rights and needs of women above those of children, are killing those children in a neighbourhood near you and until we name it, we are never going to stop it.

Gender-biased family services kill kids by working from the feminist perspective of seeing a woman who is vulnerable instead of a woman who is dangerous to her children. Gender-biased family services kill kids by refusing to look the reality in the face: that mothers can and do kill their children–and intervention to prevent it starts with believing it. Gender-biased services kill kids because they spend too much time looking for a man to blame and seeing domestic violence (by men) as the root cause of all dangers to children.

The children who die at the hands of their mothers are the vulnerable ones, not the other way around, and we should be acting to support those children first before we analyse and excuse maternal responsibility. I have no doubt whatsoever that women, like men who kill their children, need an awful lot of work to reverse the impact of being so divorced from their own humanity, that they can act without thinking and often without remorse.

Sheehicide – Why “a woman’s right to kill” is a bad idea

Robert St. Estephe · 27 January 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Robert St. Estephe–Gonzo Historian–is dedicated to uncovering the forgotten past of marginalizing men. “Gonzo journalism” is characterized as tending “to favor style over fact to achieve accuracy.” Yet history – especially “social history” – is written by ideologues who distort and bury facts in order to achieve an agenda. “Gonzo” writing is seen as unorthodox and surprising. Yet, in the 21st century subjectivity, distortion and outright lying in non-fiction writing is the norm. Fraud is the new orthodoxy. Consequently, integrity is the new “transgressive.”

Welcome to the disruptive world of facts, the world of Gonzo History.

●●●

In honor of Canadian law professor, Elizabeth Sheehy, who has in her new book called for the legalization of homicide in those cases where a woman who has killed a man can relate a consistent enough narrative supporting her feeling that her violence was emotionally justified (no conventional standard of evidence need be applied), I have engaged in a bit of lexicographical innovation, and have engaged in the time-honored art of neologism-coining (the creation of a new word).

Vocabulary word of the day: “Sheehicide.” Definition: The court-sanctioned murder of a husband by a wife. 2 varieties: 1) premeditated sheehicide; 2) cupidic sheehicide. — ALSO SEE: “Murder tourism.”

In early US, women were acquitted of murder frequently (not always) if they claimed to have been physically abused. In some cases the testimony would involve witnesses stating that the husband was never known to have struck the killer and evidence would show the victim of the homicide was shot in the back. Yet the weepy thespian — having mastered the art of courtroom as stage — would still be promptly acquitted.

The big question, when looking at the homicidal woman who talks of “abuse,” is this: where is the solid evidence of battery? If acquittal can follow without it, then it becomes very attractive to marry men with money or to take out life insurance for the express purpose of murdering him, a type of crime that is already common enough. By legalizing the practice of killing men accused of such behavior we are guaranteed a crime wave of Black Widow murders for profit. Just look at the case of would-be Texas murderess Andria Stanley — as documented in detail by the diligent female prosecutor of her 2013 trial — if you want to get a good idea of how the exploitation of every possible feminist victim-pose can be exploited almost endlessly by a woman with a personality disorder.

Did you accidentally bump your wife in the hallway? — and then 3 months later (insensitively) buy her a second rate birthday present? Under feminist victim-jurisprudence, you now are a marked man — marked for life. And your “abusiveness” can be trotted out against you — and your children, by association — with the flick of a speed-dial. Your “victim” – provided she is one of those not-so-terribly-rare women suffering from excessive self-involvement, a victim-complex, or a personality disorder — will hold over your head her right to summarily execute you, and hold it over you forever (if the doctrine of feminist jurisprudence has becomes institutionalized). This is the reality when, from infancy onwards, a girl is raised to believe in the fictional (politically correct, ideology-based) historical narrative that the education system has adopted and which which it aggressively and callously indoctrinates its innocent subjects.

Obey! That is the message of feminist jurisprudence that is directed from the experts on high downwards to the members the scapegoat sex.

The above described scenario is the quite realistically expected one for a great many couples who have yet to come together. Any woman whose weakness is for harboring, and — with encouragement from the culture at large (TV, magazines, school, etc.) — for deliberately nurturing her cumulative collection of resentments, so that she comes to fetishize every perceived slight as a prized mental possession to be arranged like model furniture in her interior doll house, will have a wide open course for lashing out in any fashion that fits the impulse of the decisive expressive moment. This is the twisted gift that the Professor Sheehys of the world want to hand down from their safe little ivory towers.

Empowerment!

***

Following is a small collection of three — culled from a quite voluminous corpus — of newspaper articles, dating from 1912 to 1921, that affords the contemporary reader a bit of direly needed historical context — context of the sort your professors would most likely be condemned for were they to have proffered them in the classroom. But that is what A Voice for Men is here for: to dish out the perspective which the education industry and the corporate media work so diligently at withholding from you.

***

[image]

NOTE on this post's title "He Fears You -1912": "She Fears You" is the name of a mandatory conditioning session initiated in 2010 which some universities require their male students to attend. It is "a program at which they will be pressed to acknowledge their personal complicity in a "rape culture." "She Fears You" is based on the theory that men need a "combined cognitive and emotional intervention" in order to change their "rape-supportive beliefs."

[Samantha Harris, "Hamilton Requires First-Year Men to Attend Presentation on Campus 'Rape Culture'; Female Applicants Not Forewarned of Dangers of Attending Hamilton," Fire (Foundation for Individual Rights in Education), Sep. 27, 2010]

***

[image]

FULL TEXT: Chicago, Oct. 4. – Minor Cortalyou, a salesman, appealed to-day to the Court of Domestic Relations for protection from his wife. In arguing the case Isaac Lipson, his attorney, said

> No man's life is safe from an attack by an infuriated woman since the freeing of so many women accused of having murdered their husbands.

Cortalyou testified his wife had threatened to kill him and had driven him from home. He had been arraigned for alleged wife abandonment. Within the last two years four or more women have been acquitted in Chicago courts of having either shot or poisoned their husbands, and in other parts of the country as many more were freed.

"The life of my client is in danger," Lipson declared. "His wife's mind has become inflamed as a result of the wholesale freeing of wives charged with murdering their husbands."

["Says Women Jeopardize Men – Acquitting Wives of Murder Endangers Male Sex, Asserts Attorney." New York Tribune (N.Y.), Oct. 5, 1912, p. 6]

***

[image]

FULL TEXT: "Women must be barred from criminal trials in Fulton county [Georgia]," stated Mrs. Hattie Barrett, female detective, who has been subpoenaed by the state.

"The courtroom of the average murder trial is merely the training school where wives learn the tricks used by other women in killing their husbands, and then go home, talk them over with their neighbors and then use said tricks in ridding themselves of their husbands."

Mrs. Barnett had a conference with Judge John B. Humphries in regard to having the female of the species barred from sensational trials. Mrs. Barnett stated further that she saw during the Abbott trial women offering cooked chicken legs to court attaches in order to have the attaches reserve seats for them.

"Women of this class brought their lunches and spent the day, often bringing their children of various ages with them. If I have to go to the legislature, I shall get morbid women barred from such trials," she completed.

["Murder Case Trials Called Schools For Women Slayers – Mrs. Hattie Barnett, Female Detective, Asks the Judge to Bar Members of Her Sex From the Courtroom." The Atlanta Constitution (Ga.), Mar. 8, 1919, p. 1]

***

[image]

FULL TEXT: Washington, Aug. 10—"Compulsory disarmament of women" was suggested today by Alice Robertson, Oklahoma's lady congressman. With murders by women on the increase, she declared it as necessary as the disarmament of nations.

"'The lady from Oklahoma" had been asked to comment on the shocking and growing tendency of her sex to kill off the male population.

"The women talk so much about disarmament – well, why don't they disarm" she demanded. "Why don't they begin it by disarming women."

When informed a movement was under way to have her named as a woman member of the American delegation to the president's disarmament conference, she said:

Why should I be? There is no place for women.

~ Get Off Too Easy. ~

Speaking her mind on women murderers, suffragists and other females of the species, she said:

"Women who murder get off too easy. They're not judged according to the same standards as men who murder, but you don't hear the suffragists demanding equal rights for the men, do you? No the suffragists want equal rights for women with special privileges.

"Men are not so bad. Women declare them cruel and unjust but they are not. It is to be remembered that men who are bad had women as their mothers."

"But to disarm only the women – that would be unjust," it was suggested.

"There should be compulsory disarmament of men too – of course, the men should be included," said Miss Alice

[image]

[Mildred Morris, (International News Service Staff Correspondent), "Oklahoma Congress Woman Declares Move As Necessary As For Nations Comments On Murders – She Declares Women Who Commit Crimes Are Let Off Too Easy." Syndicated (INS), Logansport Pharos-Tribune (In.), Aug. 10, 1921, p. 1]

***

See also:

Diana Davison & John Hembling, "Elizabeth Sheehy can't even justify herself," A Voice for Men, December 18, 2013

http://www.avoiceformen.com/feminism/elizabeth-sheehy-cant-even-justify-herself-blamefeminism/

John Hembling (JtO), "Canada's New Travel Attraction for Women: Murder Tourism," A Voice for Men, Jan, 4, 2011

http://www.avoiceformen.com/women/canadas-new-travel-attraction-for-women-murder-tourism/

Anna Lee McNelis and Brandon Grunewald, “A story of domestic violence unlike any you’ve ever heard,” TDCAA (Assistant District Attorneys in Travis County) Website, NO DATE (after May 16, 2013)

http://www.tdcaa.com/journal/story-domestic-violence-unlike-any-you%E2%80%99ve-ever-heard

***

Tom Golden: The End of Men? Or the End of Women?

AVfM Video Source · 28 January 2014 · Archived copy · Original

From the Men are Good Video Channel, which if you have not subscribed to, you are, we must declare, suspect.

This is the first youtube to use a more talking approach. The others are highly labor intensive and take weeks and sometimes months to produce. This kind of video can be done much quicker. I hope you find it of interest. TG

The happiness research is fascinating and can be seen in this link:

http://www.nber.org/papers/w14969.pdf?new_window=1

There are many who are hypothesizing about the reasons for this marked shift and the I don't think there is a clear winner to date. However, as I say in the video it looks to me that the shift in roles for women has taken a toll. I could be wrong.

This is a chart showing a slice of the date taken from 12 graders. It gives you an idea of how things have shifted:

http://www.tmbc.com/legacy/site/strongestlifebook/resources/HappyDifference12thGraders.pdf

The narcissism data is also fairly controversial as can be seen in the NYT's piece. It is interesting that Twenger first started her research when she saw a large shift in women claiming to be masculine. I think this Times article goes into that a bit.

http://www.nytimes.com/2013/08/06/science/seeing-narcissists-everywhere.html?pagewanted=all&_r=1&

No question that our obesity, both men and women, has risen in the last 50 years or so. Yes, it has risen for both but I think there is an important difference. A man can be very successful and of high status (wealthy, powerful, star os some sort) and be obese. I don't think the liklihood is the same for women. If women are obese it plays directly into her attractiveness and that is an important factor in women attracting mates. So the increase in obesity is likely more deleterious to women then to men. At least that is the way I see it.

http://www.cdc.gov/nchs/fastats/overwt.htm

http://www.livestrong.com/article/384722-how-much-have-obesity-rates-risen-since-1950/

John Nazarian tries to change the subject

Suzanne McCarley · 28 January 2014 · Archived copy · Original

We see that A Voice for Men has come to the direct attention of self-described skunk John Nazarian, a "retired" cop (or as some sources we've checked with suggest, an incompetent former cop who couldn't hack it in a real police force). Ex-cop Nazarian now works as a Private Investigator, and is a notorious enabler of vexatious litigant and restraining order abuser Pauley Perette, of Star Crazy fame.

[image]
Nazarian's proud public association with Pauley "Star Crazy" Perette – Click to Enlarge Amusingly, Nazarian (pictured at right with his friend Pauley Perette) seems to be obsessed at the moment with AVfM Managing Editor Dean Esmay, linking to some obscure blog called the "Encyclopedia of American Loons." For anyone who's interested in this attempt at derailment, Esmay, who has had very little to do with our coverage of Pauley 'Star Crazy' Perette and her cronies, has published a response to those allegations. If anyone's interested in that sad attempt to change the subject, we suggest you take it up with Dean on his blog. Straight from Paul Elam, "AVfM takes no position on anything Dean has written on issues unrelated to civil rights and legal corruption. We view what our staff writes on their own sites as their own business, so long as they are not personal attacks on us or our supporters."

In other words, we view this as a pretty weak attempt at changing the subject.

Nazarian also, in rather pathetically homophobic fashion, refers to AVfM as being run by a cross-dresser. While the thought of Paul Elam in a dress is rather shudder-inducing (he'd look pretty scary in one, and at 6'8″ the thought of him in high heels is rather dizzying), the fact of the matter is that we regularly publish materials from members of the LGBT community. On the other hand, Mr. Nazarian seems to think it's appropriate to attack members of that community. We're sorry to break it to you, John, but: even if we were all drag queens, it wouldn't make a single thing we've published about you, your work, or your ethically-challenged buddy Pauley Perette untrue. And you, of course, know it. So instead of trying to correct the record and address the substance of what you're accused of, you go right for gay-bashing? Tsk, tsk. That looks like not just a self-hating gay guy, but also someone who knows he can't just respond to the truth.

Nazarian also fails to acknowledge that he was invited to talk to us in our last Hangout On Air and clear up any issues in which he felt we might be mischaracterizing him or his work. Instead of taking us up on that offer and the opportunity to clear up any possible confusion about his record or his opinions, he chose to go off on half-assed, bigoted rants.

Does this look like someone firing wildly in all directions to you? It does to us.

Anyway, John Nazarian is apparently upset that we called him out for advocating criminal behavior. This self-described "skunk" first came to our attention in the trailer to the spectacular movie Divorce Corp. Oddly enough, Nazarian seems rather proud of his appearance in it, blissfully unaware that throughout the entire thing he comes off as an incredible sleazeball and a true embarrassment to his profession. Here's the trailer where you can see the sleaze in action, on the subject of using false allegations in family court:

Make special note of where he starts talking at 1:27. Then, take a look at this video which we found John Nazarian had made and put up on YouTube himself, long before Divorce Corp came out:

Does that look or sound like someone who's just joking to you? It doesn't to us.

Now the fact is that after AVfM published those videos, Nazarian appears to have panicked. First, he added a bunch of new disclaimers to the old videos, claiming they were for "entertainment only." Then, in an apparent attempt to hide (as opposed to just tampering with) the evidence, he seems to have removed them from YouTube completely.

Unfortunately, Nazarian seems not to have heard of "The Streisand Effect." We suggest he Google it. Men's Rights Activists and other civil libertarians are even now busy making and distributing copies of that and other incriminating videos–like this one where he makes it clear that he advises his clients that behaving in a fair and ethical manner is, in his view, stupid.

You're a real champion of doing the right thing, aren't you Mr. Nazarian?

Right now multiple copies of these videos are all over other YouTube channels and other sharing sites, ones we don't control and don't want to, and we hope everyone reading this grabs copies and does the same. We hope, John, that while the Grand Jury considers the charges against you, your pals, and Pauley "Star Crazy" Perette, they not only get to see these videos, but get to note that you did your best to tamper with that evidence.

By the way, Mr. Nazarian, you seem to be obsessed with, and blaming, Francis Shivers for our coverage. We can assure you that you're shooting at the wrong target there, since our people on the ground in California are acting independently, and we wouldn't stop doing what we're doing even if Francis begged us to. We're not all that interested in Francis Shivers, to be honest: we're interested in a corrupt legal system and corrupt thugs who fill their grubby hands with cash by exploiting it.

And now you're promising to "get your boots dirty" on Francis, which we view as a clear and unequivocal threat of violence.

In case anyone's wondering what we're talking about, Nazarian ranted incoherently about Francis Shivers repeatedly on a recent radio show (which we made sure to get copies of, naturally). On that radio show Nazarian seems to think, still, that his appearance on Divorce Corp was anything but damaging to his reputation. Weeks after being exposed for his deplorable advocacy of illegal and unethical behavior, he is now wildly claiming that this is all just jokes. We don't see any reason to believe him.

On that radio show Nazarian also bragged about his political connections, his other ex-cop buddies, and pretty clearly, in our view, threatened physical harm to Francis Shivers. Give it a listen here, and be sure to grab a copy, after you ask yourself what bragging about getting your cowboy boots dirty would mean to you in this context. We know what it means to us: he wants Francis hurt, physically, and our opinion is that if Francis Shivers has not yet filed for a restraining order against John Nazarian, he most certainly should.

We also hope Nazarian knows we will be watching very carefully and if so much as a hair on Francis Shivers' head is damaged, we will make sure John Nazarian is answering questions, not just from LAPD, but from State and Federal law enforcement. Is someone who physically assaults or kills people someone you want as your private detective? Maybe Pauley Perette's insane enough for that, but we suspect most people wouldn't be that dumb.

By the way, if anyone doubts that his original YouTube videos were intended as serious advice for filing false reports, or that he is a proud associate of Pauley "Star Crazy" Perrette and a supporter of her abuse of the legal system, here's an unaltered screen shot of what his channel looked like before he panicked and tried to alter and then destroy the evidence, which we took just before going public with the truth: And his photo with his friend Pauley is already at the top of this article.

[image]
John Nazarian's YouTube video as it appeared before he altered then destroyed it (click to view full size)
Oh, and what did his channel look like before he took it down? Like this.

[image]
Nazarian's "Divorce Advice" channel.
Poor John. Instead of just coming clean and getting ethical, he bashes gays, issues threats, calls people names, and tries to sweep his past under the rug. Does that look like a guy with nothing to hide to you?

Nah, not to us either.

Crenshaw and Sheftall Speak at Kennesaw State University

Sage Gerard (Victor Zen) · 28 January 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Kimberlé W. Crenshaw, LL.M and Dr. Beverly Guy-Sheftall are two prominent and powerful radical black feminists who spoke at Kennesaw State University on Jan. 27th, 3:30 PM EST.

Crenshaw is credited for coining the term "intersectionality" based on her observations of how the law operates at the "intersection" of race and sex. While the feminist conception of intersectionality dates back to the 19th century, Crenshaw was the person who elevated intersectionality to a recognized feminist sociological theory. She is also one of the primary influences behind the equality clause of the South Africa Constitution and an advocate of affirmative action.

Dr. Beverly Guy-Sheftall is the founder of the first women's studies program in Spelman College, a Historically Black College. Note that this was not the first accredited women's studies program ever, just the first in a college that was servicing black students before 1964. Sheftall's program also started the national conversation (or "blamestorm" depending on who you ask) on the objectification of black women by rappers.

The origin of women's studies in the pre-1964 black community ended up in the same room with the origin of intersectionality, and I got them both on tape.

Two of the more interesting points are as follows:

- The speakers criticize white feminism while discussing the pressure they feel to use white women to get votes.
- The speakers discuss their efforts to make affirmative action not look like preferential treatment.

The aftermath of the event made me realize how aggressive paparazzi have to be to get a clean shot. Crenshaw? Forget it. When she got up to make her hasty exit to her next speaking engagement, she became a magnet in a vat of iron fillings. It was impossible to see her through the crowd of escorts and salivating sociologists.

I did have an opportunity to take a clean photo, but I had to pass it up. There was no stage in the room, and I was right by the podium. I am not exaggerating when I say I was in arm's reach of two of the more (most?) powerful feminists in hundreds of miles. I was not starstruck, but I was anxious. I was the only MHRA in a room full of people who would crucify me if they knew that.

Taking a photo two feet away from a protected duo who would consider me a mortal enemy would be like running screaming at an armed guard in a military base at 1 AM. I know better.

Since I do not have quality AV equipment, I ask you to bear with the limited capacities of my smartphone while I try to get a copy of the video footage from the KSU Interdisciplinary Studies department. If you want to know what feminist authorities are up to, listen to this talk. I uploaded two parts:

1. The main dialogue between Sheftall and Crenshaw.
2. The Q&A session after the dialogue.

The speech in Part 1 cuts off due to a technical issue, but that's okay because the speech was almost over, and the speakers repeated their sentiments. You are not missing much.

Recall that universities invite speakers that would typically not appear in other venues, so if you are a student, jump on every opportunity to track the powerful. Go to your social science departments and look for bulletins on upcoming events (ask for help where needed). Dirt like this keeps the MHRM aware of institutional feminism, and it illustrates the internal battles feminists are having. Track this stuff so you know what organizations to pressure, what ideas are out on a quest to become laws, and the internal strategies employed by feminists.

If you find information like this in your university, contact me and we will discuss the material's relevance to the MHRM.

The woman who took on Kate Winslet: Fathers4Justice manager Nadine O'Connor

Peter Lloyd · 28 January 2014 · Archived copy · Original

[image]
The infamous ad calling out Kate Winslet as a sorry excuse for a mother
Meet the woman who took on Kate Winslet: Fathers4Justice manager Nadine O'Connor explains why she humiliated the Hollywood icon and mother in THAT controversial ad.

When Kate Winslet became the subject of a Fathers4Justice campaign last month, the world watched as a glamorous Hollywood icon became embroiled in the gritty debate on fathers' rights.

No place for an Oscar-winning screen star, the 38-year-old was unimpressed when the equal parenting group used her home life as the launch of their Crummy Mummy ad campaign.

The initiative, which attempts to stop women denying fathers access to their families, coincided with the birth of Winslet's latest child – Bear – and followed comments she'd made to fashion bible Vogue, which said: "None of this 50/50 time with the mums and dads – my children live with me; that is it."

The advert, which ran in the Daily Express, criticised the Titanic star for her comments on shared parenting and re-ignited the debate on our country's creaking custody courts.

Unsurprisingly, Kate – who also has a 13-year-old daughter, Mia, from her first marriage to director Jim Threapleton and a nine-year-old son, Joe, from her second marriage to Sam Mendes – objected to becoming a poster girl for sexist mothers, launching a legal threat against F4J along the way with high-power law firm Schillings.

But, rather than finding angry men in Batman costumes at the helm, the kingpin was – perhaps surprisingly – a woman.

[image]
Nadine O'Connor, Fathers4Justice campaign director
Nadine O'Connor was the brains, the braun and the balls behind the controversial ad, which directly questioned a woman's automatic, unquestioned power in family law.

So the first question when we meet in London's Waterloo is perhaps an obvious one: why on earth would she want to swap sisterhood for a superhero suit? After all, no matter how powerful women have become in recent years, the partnership remains an unlikely one.

The answer, it seems, is simple. From 2002 to 2012, Nadine – a devoted mother-of-two – had her own devastating insight into what fathers experience on a regular basis. And it moved her.

For ten years she endured 25 judges, 70 hearings, 54 criminal allegations, 45 court orders and over £120,000 in legal bills when a dispute with her ex-husband over residency of their daughter turned into a living nightmare.

Despite offering him shared residency and unlimited contact, the dispute continued for over a decade because her ex wanted sole custody at the exclusion of Nadine.

During that time she lost her home, her job, her health and nearly her mind as she was driven to the edge of a breakdown.

But, rather than becoming angry with men, she identified with them – and got angry with the system.

"In 2005, three years into my own battle, a girlfriend told me about Fathers4Justice. She said my story sounded like that of the men she'd read about in the papers, so I went to a meeting with my Dad," she says.

“I had second thoughts and very nearly didn’t go because I was worried they’d be hostile towards women, but I couldn’t have been more wrong. In fact, they saved me.”

Several years of activism followed – including interrupting a live BBC broadcast of the National Lottery – but fast-forward to the present day and Nadine, who is fashionable and funny as well as fantastically formidable, is now the organisation’s campaign manager: uniting men who, ironically, have been disenfranchised by women.

Specifically, between 2010-12, she led negotiations with both the Conservatives and Liberal Democrats on family law reform.

But how did such an unlikely relationship blossom? “I came to Father4Justice… READ THE REST ON THE DAILY MAIL

Laci Green: I Object

AVfM Video Source · 29 January 2014 · Archived copy · Original

There was recently a very stupid video about “sexual objectification.”

It was so stupid, it hurt our brains so badly we couldn’t even think how to respond without damaging ourselves. Fortunately, John Hembling was willing to take one for the team. Go John!

You should subsscribe to John’s channel.

True Gender Equality: Adrien Martinon at TEDxYouth

AVfM Video Source · 29 January 2014 · Archived copy · Original

"In a time of universal deceit – telling the truth is a revolutionary act." – George Orwell

This kid is awesome. I hope to talk to him one day. He is our future.–DE

Nadine O’Connor of Fathers 4 Justice on ITALK

AVfM Video Source · 29 January 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Nadine O’Connor of Fathers 4 Justice, who rumor has it may be appearing on AVfM Radio soon, had an interesting interview a couple of years ago:

A doofus's guide to feminism

B.R. Merrick · 29 January 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Feminism, as we all know since we are repeatedly reminded by feminists, has flowed in from down south on three separate, crimson waves. They are referred to as First Wave Feminism, Second Wave Feminism, and – in a surprising twist on the first two – Third Wave Feminism. Having briefly read something online about writing essays and shit, and using a template to show me how to outline my ideas, I shall now attempt to demonstrate what a waste of time all three waves have been. This article fulfills the requirement for Post-Doofus Integrative Review 502. Yes, I'm going for my Master's.

The First Wave of feminism began with machines in the nineteenth century. Prior to the invention of machines, women were far more likely to give birth multiple times, cling to a man to help provide, breast feed their babies for long periods – and pray that maybe half of their children would survive; and that at least one of them might remember enough love and affection from childhood to take care of dear mother when the provider fell over dead and she could no longer wipe her own ass. She was more likely to experience the positive outcome that she sought if she let that child suck on her breast; not for a few weeks or months, but for years. It's that simple.

There were no machines for baby formula back then. There was no baby formula. There were no microwaves, or gas or electric stovetops. There were no convenience stores. If you lived in town, there might be a general store in your general area. If there was a blizzard in your town, the general store would probably be closed.

Oh. I just looked this up: There were also no phones.

In Doofus Babysitting 103 (and the first half of the semester of 104 that I missed because of my bruised tibia), we learned that babies back then would die without breast milk. Sometime the next year, it dawned on me that without machines, and absent any breasts, these babies would seriously die. Three weeks after that, I finally realized that roughly half of these dying babies would be girls who supposedly possess a massive amount of rights, if feminist arguments are to be believed.

The Industrial Revolution changed the landscape of this planet, and did so permanently. It changed the way we think. I had a friend who knew a man in the computer industry who told him that the Industrial Revolution did not begin with the creation of the railroad; it began when industrialists started to use the rails to transport freight. In like fashion, he felt that the Internet Revolution did not begin with the widespread use of computers; it began when entrepreneurs set their businesses up in cyber-reality and no place else, like Amazon. I agree completely with this observation.

We simply cannot comprehend a life without electricity, and I don't care if you're a camping fanatic who camps at least once a month. Take away machines and life is going to slow way, way down. Washing clothes is going to take all day. The man that impregnated the woman is going to be too busy working his ass off in order to stay alive in a hostile, cold, uncaring, unsparing universe to remain at home and wash clothes. The one who is busy breastfeeding is better prepared to do it and, according to one of my professors, is geographically much, much closer to the pile of dirty clothes.

The Industrial Revolution gave her one appliance after another after another after another. It liberated her. It was brought about by the tireless and largely thankless efforts of a great many male actors. Ordinary women now had access to devices that Queen Eleanor of Aquitaine would have envied, perhaps even killed for. Now there is less need to stay at home all day, because there are machines to help with raising children and keeping house.

First Wave Feminism came along under these societal circumstances, buttressed by mostly wealthy women, like the one portrayed in "Mary Poppins," who had less need to stay at home, or to do much work at all. This frequently led, as it always does, to feelings of boredom and uselessness. The political process, a phenomenon that the newspapers were bringing into these women's homes, undoubtedly looked a great deal more enticing. Furthermore, what woman wouldn't want a roomful of attractive men admiring her every word?

I propose to you that the First Wave was entirely useless based on several criteria:

1. Voting is an act of violence. If you don't believe me, just think about what men and women have voted into place: a vast and unstoppable bureaucracy that will only cease its Industrial-Revolution-sized machinations when it collapses of its own weight, which may very well happen in our lifetime. Take any vote where you were disappointed in the outcome and think about what that did to your mind, your emotions, and your free will. Then, when the vote goes your way (as it is doing for me while one state after another embraces gay marriage, a political momentum which at least sends me a nice message), remember that your opponent is out there thinking exactly what you were thinking when you lost that other vote. That is how politics feels when you lose. It ain't like playing Sorry. (And in politics, no one ever is.)

2. Millions of women (and men) don't care about voting. To this day the turnout of eligible voters is roughly half. Do people really think it's due solely to apathy or laziness? Hell, nobody's lazier than this candidate for Master's of Doofosity, yet even I voted when I believed in friendly neighborhood violence. It's just that a lot of these women have better things to do.

3. Women were not oppressed. If you need further clarification on number three, scroll back up and read that cool stuff about machines and baby formula and shit.

Betty Friedan and her husband went at it hot and heavy one night in the 1950s. In a fit of ecstasy, Friedan's husband, Mr. Betty Friedan, had what we learned in Doofus and the Little Man 245 is called an orgasm. This resulted in Mrs. Betty Friedan getting pregnant. She was fired from her job when the results were discovered by her boss, Mr. Non-Betty-Friedan. Enraged, she wrote a book entitled The Feminine Mystique, which blamed the suburban ennui of rich, white, American women on Betty's mean boss.

Determined to do something about the "comfortable concentration camp" in which she lived, Betty went to the garage, got some rubber-handled clippers, and snipped her way through the electric barbed-wire fence that Mr. Betty Friedan had set up around the compound to keep her in. As a result, 30% of the work force at that time that was female became more than 50% female today.

Women display a greater overall satisfaction level with employment than men. Then again, most of these women aren't steering ships for weeks, shoveling coal, digging in dirt, and spending hours in heat, rain, or snow. Furthermore, outside of urban and suburban civilization, there always was and always will be much more ordinary work that needs to be done for many more hours per week, for both males and females. Therefore, I say that Second Wave Feminism was entirely useless based on several criteria:

1. Work, in general, sucks outside of the office or university environment, one that looks and acts remarkably like a domestic one. Other domestic work, the raising of children, is farmed out to other "equal" women to do during the day, leaving those children less attached to the breast that will desire their reciprocal "care" later in life. "Shady Pines, Ma!"

2. Most women don't want to work that much outside of domestic situations. It's not because they're lazy. It's because even this long after the Industrial Revolution changed the way we think, men and women are still dealing with natural, evolutionary principles in their bodies and minds. Women walk around all day knowing full well that humanity grows in them. They also know that children, even with all the child-rearing machinery out there, need lots and lots of attention. I think a lot of working women fear that their children aren't getting enough. I think they're probably right.

3. Women were not oppressed. There is no evidence anywhere in history that women as a group were ever more likely to be illiterate, less educated, or denied the opportunity to do what work they really wanted, within the limited worldview that all of mankind has had throughout most of this world's existence. This is because women, for millennia, have been given modes of education more tailored to girls. If they are going to stay at home where there are no machines while tiny people feed off of their bodies, the education they receive is bound to be different.

You can certainly find areas in previous centuries where women were prohibited from formal or institutional education, but even in the case of Elizabeth Garrett Anderson, you do not find much to complain about, and certainly nothing to be horrified by. The slight to Garrett Anderson seems to have been taken care of fairly easily, mostly due to the fact that she already knew what she was doing. Please keep in mind the big before-and-after of the Industrial Revolution, and that even after two centuries and the lesson of Garrett Anderson, we still deal with the fact that women flock to lesser jobs and careers more frequently than men due to that kid-making business, and that they then feel free to express greater job satisfaction.

When I was 14, Madonna masturbated with a bridal veil on the MTV Video Music Awards. She's done far better performances, even masturbatory ones: she was way off key, and not a single interesting dance move, unless you're using her performance to wank off more privately.

Regardless, mothers across America were horrified that their little girls were expressing the desire to dress like world-famous, slutty-looking, multi-millionaire, force-to-be-reckoned-with Madonna. Somewhere in the cacophony, The Feminist Matriarchy were sitting in their back room, playing cards, smoking phallic symbols, and nudging each other like mustachioed Eric Idle about the cumming Third Wave: "I'll bet she does, I'll bet she does, wink, wink, say no more, say no more!"

The Sexual Revolution gave women The Pill, which liberated them from baby formula and microwaves. Roe v. Wade gave women power over human life. "The Vagina Monologues" celebrates a part of the body that heterosexual men find infinitely fascinating, as Larry Flynt told the world in an interview. Women are free to express their sexuality to its fullest, to change their minds, and to receive praise for their sexual honesty and integrity. How, then, could I conclude that this wave is just as useless as the first two? Easy:

1. Women are far more likely than at any previous time in human history to grow old alone and childless. Where did the phrase "biological clock" come from?

2. Women are far more likely than at any previous time in human history to engage in less satisfying sexual encounters, since many more of them now come without commitment or romance, in part because of the increasing anxiety over the first criterion, which undoubtedly leads to uncertainty of self, society, and future. The actions of a porn starlet are going to seem foreign to such a woman. All of a sudden, what was voluntary seems more like exploitation, even (gasp) rape!

3. Women were not sexually oppressed any more than men. Feminists make a big deal about shaming language, but fail to point out that shame is a sexless human emotion. Humans tend to separate themselves by sex quite often, and unite the sexes in different ways than when they are sex-segregated. Where sex roles develop naturally they can also be developed by force, and where you are dealing with humans who are childish enough to use shame, you will find that feeling the oppression of sexual shame is not unique to women. As I pointed out in my last article, in a shotgun wedding, who is pointing the gun at whom?

However, this wave is not only as useless as the first two, but has proven to be far more insidious. Why? I believe that it has to do with something we call misandry. Let's go back to the first act of violence to see how the hatred of men has unmistakably revealed itself the third time around by being silently present all the while.

The presumption during the First and Second Waves was that women needed a voice: first in politics, then in the workforce. This conclusion must be based on some serious wrongs. After all, we Western and American thinkers are familiar with phrases like "Freedom of Speech" and so on. We are used to living in a world where everyone, male and female, old and young, is supposedly enabled to live free from social, political, military, or legal punishments for speaking out. It would be hard for us to comprehend a time when people were not free to do so. We think about people in Soviet Russia or Nazi Germany walking through the streets with their heads down and mouths shut so as to escape notice. We think of frightened citizens in Mao's China speaking in hushed tones so that no one finds out what they really think.

We think less about those white people who lived in the pre-Civil War South who might have actually had a problem with slavery, or someone who belongs to a fundamentalist religion that is tired of the fundamentals, and the social stigma attached to any in these situations who might want to speak up. Therefore, when First and Second Wave feminists assure us that there is a "mystique" or a "concern" about women's whatever, then there must be some truth to it, or perhaps some evidence.

We're waiting. While we were waiting, these same feminists came up with terms like "Patriarchy" and "glass ceiling" to persuade us that just because we don't see it doesn't mean…

In the meantime, what is happening with the political process embraced by these first two brands of feminists? I'll tell you plain and simple: it is being forced. To coerce, I am convinced, is to kill. Once you convince yourself to coerce, the killing begins. It begins in your own head, coercing the mind against recognition of existent truth. I also propose to you that you often don't realize what you're killing. Ever been caught lying to yourself?

The dunes carved by these waves no longer look beautiful to me when I think about this operating premise (or what you would call "belief"). Here is why: When you introduce the element of violence – no matter how mild you think it is or how widely accepted or "normal" it seems – you imply that the party receiving the violence has done you a wrong and needs to be forced to stop or change.

The implication, therefore, from the first two waves, is that women have been wronged by men and society, and that both men and society need to change, or progress (a familiar term, I'm sure), by violent force if necessary. The Third Wave, since it involves self-expression guided by and using vital organs of the body, and since it is built on the misandric presumptions of the first two, has profoundly and negatively affected the most intimate relationships that men and women can have. It happened at least in part because the Second Wave encouraged so many more misandric, Second-Wave-thinking women to teach at university. Since most of those who embrace feminism are on the political Left (where all the "progress" is), is it any wonder that conservatives and libertarians are wailing about the Marxist takeover of college education? Since when do Marxists enjoy getting laid? There're too many pamphlets to hand out.

So the angry Second-Wavers are teaching the confused Third-Wavers to treat men like dildos. Meanwhile, the culture is completely unaware of exactly what happened as a result of this triple tsunami.

Part of the end result is god-awful movies like "She-Devil," which I've mentioned before, but I'll provide more detail here. The jilted wife, played by Roseanne Barr, taking a cue from her philandering husband, sets out to accomplish the goal of taking her husband's life from him by writing down four assets her husband had previously listed during an argument:

- His home
- His family
- His career
- His freedom

She succeeds at destroying her lousy husband's life instead of just getting on with her own, but is nice enough to smile and talk nicely to her imprisoned husband at the end of the film. There was no mention of her husband being raped in prison, so I'm assuming he wasn't. He did burn the muffins, though, yuk, yuk.

What I find instructive, however, is that like this silly movie, feminism seems to be concerned with entering wherever there are men doing something without women–based I'm assuming on the faulty operating premise that men like to oppress women–and forcing change within the all-male community. This is where they have gone thus far:

- Into the largely male community of politics
- Into the largely male community of work
- Into male sexuality

The end result of women getting involved in politics and work is that the discourse had to change. I'm not talking about women finally getting a voice to have all of their precious programs put into place; I'm talking about how the political process actually proceeds. Now that the discourse has been changed, how do you tell a female fellow-senator that your male opponent on some bill has got you by the balls? The two of you won't be continuing that conversation while standing next to each other at the urinals, either, or in the sauna, or in the locker room (unless you're a bitchy female reporter). Have you ever heard the relentless teasing that can ensue between men who actually like each other? Have you ever seen a professional football player pat another player on the ass? I have. Repeatedly. (Gay Doofosity 315a, extra credit.)

It is the same deal getting women into the universe of male sexuality, only far more visceral and potentially emotionally damaging. To accept male sexuality to its fullest extent, one has to conclude that the phenomenon will involve behavior that sounds extreme for most women but a little more commonplace with many men, as well as controversial. It will include semen shot out on the floor in the back room of an adult bookstore; men pulling their pants down at night in a park behind bushes for a quick fuck; paying a female to perform three specific sex acts in half an hour's time in a cheap motel; strip joints; pornography; and worst of all yet far more universal, a complete change of mind and mood once ejaculation has taken place.

Like the first two waves, the Third will ultimately fail to bring the majority of women what it promises, because not only are lesbians not being arrested for cunnilingus in public parks, but women can climax multiple times during sex, and can go from almost complete disinterest to mind-blowing orgasm if he leaves his hand there long enough. When a man's mind is blown, it's done. He's up and moving around. His underwear is back on. He's getting something to eat. The television is on. Where are you, baby?

That's right. What you want is different. A female politician is more likely to want the debate on the House floor to take a calmer, more pleasant tone. A working woman is probably going to want a softer and more amenable workplace. A horny lady is bound to last, by natural dictate, a lot longer than he is. How in the hell are the sexes ever going to see eye to eye?

Answer: there's a little something called "cooperation." I learned about it on "Sesame Street," a program that taught me how to count to 20 in Spanish quite poorly, a talent that won me a scholarship to Doofus U, one that I had to turn down because I forgot that I left the offer on that other desk. I think. Actually, I have no idea where I left it.

Wait… I don't have that other desk anymore.

Anyway, the difference between voluntary cooperation and the forceful intent (or is that *un*intent?) of political action is glaring. The problem with feminism is not that it concerns itself with women's concerns; the problem is that the core reason for feminism is nonsense. The idea that men will ignore women's issues if women don't speak up united is laughable and demonstrably false. It is easy, once your operating premise is flawed, to go right off the edge. Therefore, it doesn't surprise me that women who embrace a false and hateful premise would then go immediately on to political action to make the necessary changes. All political actions are enforced by law. Policemen are charged with enforcing the laws passed by the politicians and their politically-minded constituents. Policemen are given Billy clubs, electrocution devices, and guns to enforce misandric laws.

If you are a woman, you are now free, like the mother in "Mary Poppins," to hire a cook, a maid, a nanny, all with the money your super-smart and uptight husband makes; and go throw eggs at the Prime Minister because you're bored. Then, if the boredom continues (and quite unlike "Mary Poppins"), you're free to walk out of the bedroom wearing nothing but one of his dress shirts; and lastly, as a result of the cute little outfit you've improvised, you're free to play with a hard cock for a few minutes as a distraction. This is what First Wave, Second Wave, and Third Wave feminists call "oppression."

It doesn't surprise me either, that Friedan couldn't maintain control of her own organization; not because she's a woman, mind you, but because her premise was false. The answer to her ennui was in her own moxie, not in some Madison Avenue conspiracy about vacuum cleaners and orgasms. The reason she couldn't keep out the man-haters is because in her own operating premise: she resented men for a pretended offense. If you start with a hateful premise, don't expect a loving conclusion.

I submit for potential future personal embarrassment and forceful removal of my undergraduate, glow-in-the-dark doofosity degree, that there will be no Fourth Wave Feminism. Once you've taken a man's house, family, career and penis, what else is there to take? Not only that, but the Internet Revolution, begun by Amazon and finished by the men's movement, ensures that the shit emanating from the Horse's Ass of Feminism will be called out whenever it is excreted. It stinks. It has always stunk. It will stink when it comes out again. It is perfect, however, to use as fertilizer, as we apprentice doofuses learned in Proper Uses for Modern Female Complaints 410.

Everything is wrong with MGTOW

John Hembling (JtO) · 29 January 2014 · Archived copy · Original

For the uninitiated, MGTOW (men going their own way) is a movement which exists as a partially overlapping subset of the men's human rights movement, and it is characterized by men opting out of society's conventional, prescriptive, and increasingly toxic male obligation. The MGTOW movement is, of course, highly individualistic, and since it is by definition contrarian to mainstream sensibilities it also widely misunderstood and mischaracterized.

And it is fundamental to the nature of Men Going Their Own Way – that what it means to the practitioner matters. Conversely, what it means to you, to the critic or the opponent of MGTOW, does not matter at all.

Establishing who this is written for, along with the claim of that audience's irrelevance to practitioners of MGTOW might suggest this article's pointlessness as well.

In the interests of honesty and self-awareness, it must be admitted that there is an element of Schadenfreude (pleasure derived from the misfortunes of others) in the continued and escalating whingeing from opponents and critics of the MGTOW movement. But there is also an honest desire among many practitioners of MGTOW to share with potential newcomers the freedom, the pleasure and the power over your own life which 'going your own way' brings.

It's for this reason that a few common falsehoods about different aspects of MGTOW will be addressed.

The first objection:

The MGTOW manifesto is flawed, or psychopathic, or illogical, or the ideology is malevolent, or perverse, and possibly pornographic.

Something like this is one of the most common criticisms of MGTOW, and also one of the easiest to swat aside.

There is no ideology, there is no doctrine, and there is no Men Going Their Own Way manifesto. Obviously, a few minutes of googling will uncover dozens of websites each posting some version of what this or that blogger believes is a manifesto for MGTOW, but opinions are like assholes. Not only does everybody have at least one, they're very often shitty. There are also certainly a fair number of voices, mostly online pronouncing support for that version of a MGTOW manifesto, or that other version – but again, all of this is mere opinion mongering. MGTOW is a movement based not on any blog-written doctrine, but on its practice. And it is the practice that this movement that has reality. For the men actually practicing MGTOW in their own lives, the TOW in the acronym is the most important part. Their Own Way means each, individually, making their own choices about how to live their lives. It most certainly does not mean following anybody else's prescribed set of rules, not even rules written by another practitioner of MGTOW.

Of course, writing by activists is a major part of any social movement, so it is natural for MGTOW manifestos to proliferate online, even as some of the authors may believe themselves authorities to be followed. In reality, these manifestos have value, not as prescriptive solutions to strictly follow, but as a collection of ideas to be considered, and if judged individually useful by practitioners, adopted on an item by item basis. MGTOW is, of course, a strongly libertarian movement. The idea of dictating some doctrinal methodology – "do this or you're not a real MGTOW" is logically self-defeating. It's not called Men Going John The Other's Way, it's men going THEIR OWN way. And, of course, this guide I'm writing is my own opinion, reflecting my understanding of the MGTOW movement, which other MGTOW are welcome to adopt or to reject as they see fit.

On MGTOW and women:

Claim: MGTOW are celibate, or sexually abstinent, or socially crippling themselves by their aversion to women.

It is beyond the scope of this discussion to establish or to prove that our society is socially and legally imbalanced along the line of sexual identity, in the direction of power and advantage to women. However, understanding that social and legal imbalance exists, it is natural for the average majority of those so legally and socially advantaged to view their elevated legal station as a natural right, and to casually abuse their power. Certainly, some women with a developed moral compass will avoid abusing the power they have, but most have no such reservations, nor even any conscious self-awareness of their own power nor awareness of their indifference to men as fellow humans.

For men contemplating relationships with women, this has some serious consequences. Some proponents of MGTOW advocate a total disengagement from women. Indeed, some MGTOW practitioners may strictly avoid women on an ongoing basis – as it is every individual's right to do. In fact, even for male MHRAs who don't self-identify as MGTOW, a finite period of such avoidance can be highly effective in achieving self-realization, emotional equilibrium and self-identity apart from our culture's typical consensus conferral of public personhood onto males.

However, going forward, it's also true that we are all humans, and as such we are social animals. Men, even supposedly "woman hating" MHRAs and practitioners of MGTOW, almost all have great affection for women. Indeed, most MRAs, whether they will admit it or not, harbour a deep desire to love and to be loved by a woman within a relationship based on trust, affection and so on.

The problem, of course is the gun in the room, and the willingness of averagely socialized, "normal" women to use that metaphorical gun.

This means that aside from those practitioners of MGTOW totally disengaging from women, men who don't opt for celibacy have a particularly challenging hazard course to navigate.

Relationships with women are certainly possible – including intimate sexual relationships. However, any such relationships pursued in a MGTOW context will have to avoid conventionally patterned relationships. Indeed, women within MGTOW relationships will have to be explicitly committed to minimizing the potential for abuse of the power and violence that our culture and laws put unilaterally at the disposal of women, against men.

A number of specific techniques are practiced and shared within MGTOW circles, a few of which this discussion will mention.

One area worth mentioning is that of voluntarism within relationships, as a consciously chosen alternative to conventional sexual-relations between men and women as practiced outside the MGTOW movement.

In a "girlfriend" and "boyfriend" relationship, the naming of relationships reflects common social assumptions of proprietorship : She is "my girlfriend" or he is "my boyfriend". This also reflects a fairly common sense of social obligation to whoever occupies that role of girlfriend or boyfriend. Activities such as dining together, pursuing recreational or entertainment activities, or sleeping together, while they are obviously mutually enjoyable, also have an element of obligation in the context of boyfriend or girlfriend. Are you sharing a bed with your girlfriend because you wanted to in each specific instance, or because that's what you're "supposed to do"? In almost all cases, it's a little from column A, and a little from column B, and as this is "normal" most people in such arrangements are not particularly aggrieved. But there /is/ an undercurrent of coercion in any such arrangement.

By contrast, consider the dynamic of a non-sexual relationship between two friends. Are they spending time together because they are "supposed to", or are they choosing one another's company in each instance, because that's what they want to do, every time they may spend time together. That is a relationship based on voluntarism.

What happens when sex becomes a part of such a voluntarist relationship? Obviously, although not unique, voluntarism is a non-standard practice in the context of sexual relationships. It specifically requires clear communications and trust between any two people practicing such a friendship, as well as concrete agreement on details such as explicitly and clearly defined sexual agreement, residence, and so on. In particular, some elements common in non-MGTOW sexual relationships may be explicitly excluded in such an arrangement. This is necessary, because unstated and unexamined in most conventional relationships are a number of social norms which facilitate the devaluation of human rights of men, which women take for granted.

A detailed examination of such conventional assumptions is outside the scope of this discussion, but a few examples will illuminate some of the coercion present in “normal” relationships.

Women obviously enjoy a legal, as well as a social right to reproductive self-determination. That is to say, a woman can choose to become pregnant, or choose to avoid pregnancy through the use of birth control. The choice to do so is her legal right, and it is a right practically enabled through the ready availability of numerous consumer technologies providing women control over their own fertility.

To be clear, this is separate and distinct from the right to engage in, or to eschew participation in sexual intercourse. That is a separate question.

Also a separate issue is the legal and social right to utilize pregnancy terminating medical intervention, either through surgical practice, as with abortion, or less invasive medication, such as a “morning after” pill. Pregnancy termination is a separate and distinct issue also.

By contrast, men lack the basic right of reproductive self-determination. This is manifested in social convention, in law, and in the absence of reversible fertility-governing technologies for males.

If a women decides to become pregnant by lying about her use of birth control, the man whose gamete cells she uses has no legal say in the matter. If he doesn’t want to become a father, but she wants to become a mother, tough luck for him. He will be legally bound by whatever she decides – whether he agrees or not. Indeed, he will be required by law to finance a woman’s legally unilateral choice to reproduce for up to 2 decades. And in this legal obligation, over which he has no voice, if his obligation exceeds his ability to pay, then he will be jailed, retaining his debt, even after completion of his imprisonment.

A few standard objections to this are worth noting as well, because although they are common, they are also false.

But he should have just kept his pants zipped up. He chose to reproduce when he chose to have sex!

Have you heard this one before?

This is false, and for those making this argument, it is dishonest. The choice to participate in sex is not the same as the choice to reproduce. Imagine a woman, convinced the sex she was having was “safe” because her partner in bed assured her he’d had a vasectomy. Turns out he was lying, and surprise, she’s pregnant, and finds that she has no legal right, and no social right to not be a baby factory.

Tough luck, you should have kept your legs together, lady.

Almost any sane adult will understand that such a social and legal standard would be absurd and monstrous. Despite common recognition of this absurdity when considering the basic human rights of women, most people suffer cognitive malfunction when contemplating the possibility of affording the same basic rights to self-determination for men.

If she chose to get pregnant, if she got pregnant carelessly, or if she was careful, but became pregnant through the failure of birth control, she has rights, but you don’t, buddy. Pay up, sucker, or go to jail.

This is socially normal, and legally enforced. It is also grotesque. It is, effectively, reproductive slavery, enforced with nearly complete public support.

And as a note to anyone who objects to the use of the term slavery, first define that term, then explain why it’s the wrong word.

But of course, an awful lot of MGTOWs really like women, at least, those women who lack what appears normal culturally induced psychosis of male-disdain. So friendly, even sexual relations with women is not antithetical to the practice of MGTOW. It’s merely that such relationships will not follow conventional practice or pattern. Incidentally, although it should be obvious, it’s worth explicit mention that marriage and MGTOW cannot coexist.

They are mutually exclusive choices.

The next objection to MGTOW:

It's bad for society – you bad men need to settle down and have families.

Believe it or not, this is a common argument. We are, of course talking about the same "society" which ignores the 4 out of 5 suicides which are male. The same "society" which co-opted language of the black civil rights movement describing the systematic and cultural acceptance of (mostly black) male inmate targeting rape within the American prison system. That language co-opted to portray a fraudulent narrative of social acceptance of culture-wide female sexual victimization, while erasing public consciousness of institutional rape of men in the prison system.

"It's bad for society" being the objection to a culture in which men victimized by violence from their spouses are typically arrested, rather than helped.

This objection also applies to the very same society in which it is socially normal to discuss domestic violence as "violence against women" – despite the reality shown by all credible research showing it to be co-equally committed by women and men, and unrelated to the sexual identity of aggressors or victims. Indeed, the socially "normal" model of domestic violence is one which guarantees to not ameliorate the problem. But of course, it's solid gold for tapping into everybody's natural inclination to protect women, and thus, is guaranteed to keep the profiteers of the DV industry in their cushy salaried positions.

But the argument, "it's bad for society" – fielded as an objection to MGTOW – is about as practical or logical as objecting to the use of cockroach poison because it's bad for cockroaches.

However, noting that the growing adoption of MGTOW among younger men is now having, and will continue to have a corroding effect on a culture considered by MHRAs as dysfunctional, that corrosion is not the principal purpose of MGTOW. Recalling the opening of this discussion, that the evaluation of MGTOW by non-practitioners does not matter to the movement, nor to individual men going their own way. Indeed, it is a major feature of the practice of MGTOW that the standard narrative of shame and censure heaped onto non-conforming men – that shame is abandoned and excised from the emotional repertoire of MGTOW practitioners, also sometimes called by the more elegant identifier Zeta Males.

In fact, the public admonition levelled against MGTOW/Zeta Males that the practice of increasing numbers of men of going their own way will have a negative overall effect on society – is almost always couched in shaming language against Zeta Males and their supporters. This attempt at manipulation is rightly dismissed by MGTOW with utmost contempt and scorn, because it is really nothing more than the rephrasing of "get back on the treadmill of provide, protect and die when your utility to others is exhausted."

No thanks.

However, all of that public corrosion is secondary. It is the principle feature of MGTOW that in avoiding the self-destructive conformity enforced on men, they end up enjoying power over their own lives, and particularly, over their own identities. The importance of this cannot be overstated.

But of course, in the populist narrative, MGTOW is a drain on society. This means the same society running on the corpses of disposable men. Thank you for noticing.

The next objection:

Women civilize men – and if men don't get civilized, cats and dogs will live together, the dead will rise, seas will boil.

Setting aside the comedic predictions of apocalypse, this claim is garbage. It is the attempt at conflation of all positive aspects of humanity with female identity, and the corollary attempt to associate antisocial and negative human behavior with male identity.

In fact, the argument that women civilize men – and all related arguments, is so vapid, ignorant and contemptuously stupid that to dignify it with a detailed refutation would elevate it higher than the claim's arrogant gender supremacist stupidity deserves. We will leave this one in the garbage where it belongs.

> Tucker Carlson:
> You're not a man until you take responsibility for somebody else.

And because they refuse to take responsiblity for others, MGTOWs are sad, pathetic virgin, losers, and sexual failures.

This, of course is straight out of the shaming tactics catalog. Categorized as the "charge of unattractiveness," the catalog correctly points out that like almost all standard shaming tactics, it is a circumstantial ad hominem argument, and thus, it completely lacks any merit or relevance. However, the minimalist refutation supplied by the catalog does not go nearly far enough. "The target's romantic potential ultimately does not reflect on the merit of his arguments. "

The effectiveness against most men, of the public perception of their imputed lack of appeal to females retains a great deal of power outside of MHRM and MGTOW circles, and so is worth examining.

The shaming tactic of imputing undesirability, or unattractiveness taps directly into a feature of male public identity often discussed within the MHRM. This is a perfect example of the consensus conferral of male public identity by the female collective.

The response proposed in the shaming tactics catalog to such exercised manipulation, is logically sound, but given the radical nature of MGTOW as a practice by some MHRAs, the provided refutation doesn't go nearly far enough.

"MGTOWs are pathetic virgins, losers, and sexual failures"

The public characterization of the relative value of the sexual identities of men going their own way makes at least one profound, fundamental and catastrophically flawed assumption.

The assumption is that the sexual identity, sexual value, and by extension, the sexual attractiveness of any particular MGTOW man is a public resource to be critiqued, consumed, condemned or even praised.

Recalling that rather than a prescriptive, all-included package to be followed, the practice of MGTOW discussed here is offered for the consideration and selective, item-by-item adoption by prospective MGTOW men, this is one man's Zeta path, condensed and simplified for public comprehension. Even with the aforementioned caveat, opponents of MGTOW will almost certainly continue to purposefully get it wrong, which is okay, critics are all quite welcome to keep crying.

However, returning to the publicly evaluated, and condemned sexuality and sexual-value of men going their own way; unlike almost all other males in this culture, men going their own way are not, as a rule, offering their sexuality for anyone else's consideration. Just like their identities, the sexuality and sexual value of MGTOW-men belongs to themselves, and is not automatically offered up as a public resource and lever of control and manipulation.

No, really, as an outsider to the MGTOW movement – (whether supporting or condemning) – if, as that outsider you imagine your opinion on the sexual identity of a MGTOW man is relevant, or interesting, or worth even being heard, then you are sadly delusional. Of course, nobody in the MGTOW movement will tell critics they're not entitled to their own opinions, however, nobody in the MGTOW movement finds such opinions interesting or relevant. MGTOW men don't care if you're not turned on by them. Be assured, the reason the MGTOW movement exists is they find a vast majority of women (and men, we're an inclusive movement) repellant in context including the sexual, and truly repellant in so many other ways as well.

Moving right along – we have another common objection to the practice of MGTOW.

Society needs more babies. Economies require constant growth, marry up and make babies or we're all screwed.

Before addressing this, its worth noting to readers that yes, this really is a common argument against MGTOW men and Zeta males.

So, in the interest of clarity, let's address one the most stupidly absurd objections of MGTOW yet fielded. Also, I know the previous sentence, posted here without justification could be considered poisoning the well. But honestly, is there anyone alive today not yet aware that unabated continued human population growth is a world-wide problem?

I knew this in 1977, when I was 7 years old.

However, it's also true that modern economies do depend on constant growth. And this is a problem. The solution is not more growth, even 7-year-old me knew that for fuck's sake. Rather, the solution will be fundamental changes to the way we naked pink and brown monkeys organize our economies. Those changes will come when we have a political will to create them, or when the hard reality of a finite planet forces us. The second possibility will be much more painful than the first, but appears to also be more likely.

For my own part, and as a self-identifying MRA and MGTOW, I have no interest whatsoever in preserving a corrupt, broken system which has always run, and continues to run on the corpses of good men.

> "We do not ride on the railroad; it rides upon us. Did you ever think what those sleepers are that underlie the railroad? Each one is a man…. The rails are laid on them, and they are covered with sand, and the cars run smoothly over them. They are sound sleepers, I assure you. And every few years a new lot is laid down and run over; so that, if some have the pleasure of riding on a rail, others have the misfortune to be ridden upon."
> ~1854: Henry David Thoreau

You're quitters!

Yup, that's actually an argument against MGTOW. Particularly the element of men, going their own way apart from social interactions with women. To be clear, some following a MGTOW practice use language which includes "giving up on women". But rather than surrender, this indicates a conscious evaluation and rejection of a cultural norm which, to most MGTOW, has become unappealing, toxic, unreliable and dangerous.

If the grocery store began selling rotten, poisonous and inedible slop – you'd stop buying your "food" there. You'd find an alternative.

The accusation of "you're quitters" also found in the venerable but still excellent shaming tactics catalog is actually an empty characterization of effective tactics, masquerading as an accusation of inaction.

The complaining will no doubt continue. MGTOW men, in response to this complaining, will likely not even notice, because they are busy, doing the most useful and productive thing they can, defining themselves and defining the terms on which they interact with the wider, gender ideological world.

That is really why so many people are excited, and exercised about MGTOW men. It's because they are afraid. They are afraid of the growing numbers men refusing to be defined and controlled by women.

And of course, to those opposing, criticizing, condemning, and crying about the growing adoption by men, particularly young men of MGTOW as a model for their own lives: cry some more.

Here be dragons

AVfM Video Source · 30 January 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Ok, we admit it: Laci Green struck a nerve in the MHRA community. But this means her claims will not stand the test of time. Victor Zen manages to utterly destroy everything Laci stands for with five minutes of raw ginger rage.

Subscribe to Victor Zen for book reviews, commentary, monologues, interviews and activism from the state of Georgia.

When is sexism actually sexism?

Jim Byset · 30 January 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Editor's note: This article is reproduced from our friends at Men's Human Rights Ontario

BY Baldwin Bravo

THERE is an old saying, 'ask a stupid question, unleash a wave of outrage on a global scale.' Or, at least, I think it goes something like that.

Earlier this week, a reporter in Australia asked an extremely stupid question of 19-year-old Canadian tennis player Eugenie Bouchard. Bouchard had just made Canadian tennis history (yes, such a thing actually exists) by becoming the first Canadian woman to reach a semi-final in a Grand Slam. It was the latest milestone in Bouchard's amazing journey in becoming a serious force in world tennis. A smiling Bouchard, breathless but clearly thrilled with her win, was asked – 'if you could date anyone in the world of sport, of movies, who would you date?'

Social media reacted instantly with severe criticism of the reporter, an accomplished athlete in her own right, as well as the network that prompted her to ask such a question.

[image]
Eugenie Bouchard prepares to serve. Copyright, Edwin Martinez

My first reaction to this story was that there is no story here. It is a stupid question to be sure, but sexist? On the surface it would seem that yes, it is possibly a little sexist, but no more sexist than asking a male athlete what kind of car he'd most like to own. Sexist, but nothing worth getting your Y-flys in a twist over.

But look a little closer, and you'll find that the answer to the question 'would a man be asked this?' is an overwhelming yes, a man would be asked this question. American swimmer and Olympic gold medalist Ryan Lochete, was asked this very question in a cringe-inducing article by that most progressive and venerable of media institutions – the Huffington Post.

The mental obstacle here is the word 'man'. I don't know about you, but when I picture a 'man', he's in his mid 30's to mid 40's. If we were to pose the question "would a 40 year old woman be asked that?" we would tend to assume the answer is no… that would make it ageism rather than sexism. Do we still need the pitchforks and torches? Of course not, ageism is not society's pet form of discrimination.

It's just a stupid question.

But, of course, there is more to it than that. This is, we are told, 'just another example of female athletes not being taken seriously.'

And again I find myself in agreement. That the "only" question the network could think of to ask this young woman after all she has accomplished is about cute boys, then that is indeed quite sexist.

Except that isn't what happened.

The clip that was included with just about every story that was written about this was only a moment in a much longer interview. Eugenie was first congratulated on her accomplishment, then asked to comment on the match itself, then asked about her coach, then asked if her on court composure transfers to her off court life, then the stupid question, and finally she was asked to comment on her past experiences in competitive tennis.

One stupid question notwithstanding, she was very much taken seriously as an athlete.

Interestingly, if you compare the full interview with the clip that has been included in articles published by sources such as The National Post, you will have no doubt noticed something else.

The clip, it seems, conveniently starts just after reporter Samantha Smith reveals that this is a question submitted by a viewer. It wasn't the reporter's question, it wasn't the network's question, it was a fan question. Does anyone believe that this was just an accident?

There seems to be a much bigger story here than I originally thought. Not a story of sexism, but a story of deliberate, manufactured outrage.

Bouchard made over $550,000 from her exploits at the Australian Open. That was more money than she had made in her entire career to date. She also broke into the elite group of top twenty female tennis players in the world.

Maybe it will be easier for her to do the intelligent thing and brush off the question for what it was – a dumb question from a dumb person – solely designed to provoke outrage – and nothing else.

The Everyday Solipsism Project

Diana Davison · 30 January 2014 · Archived copy · Original

When Laura Bates started the Everyday Sexism Project, the story goes that she did it to provide women with an outlet to talk about whatever they wanted. The project itself specifically only asks them to relay stories about sexism. Unsurprisingly this resulted in a website full of nothing but sexual assault accounts, making it appear that sexism is rampant in society. Now, having carefully manufactured her facts, Laura is insisting we have to listen.

Laura most certainly should be allowed to holler, shout, blubber, whine, stomp her feet and carry on like a shrill harpy with a hashtag. But we don't have to listen. There is an important difference between those two attitudes: One is right and one is stupid.

While freedom of speech offers people the important ability to speak their minds and convey their ideas it does not mean that anyone need be forced to listen. Having the right to an opinion does not make your opinion right.

Laura, and her ilk, believe that filling a website with unverified descriptions of events which may or may not have happened, perpetrated by unknown assailants, and relayed to us by anonymous internet users, equates to legitimate social research. It's not her fault though. Feminist so-called scholars have long been allowed to corrode academia to the point where statistics can be created through citation alone, and subjective anecdotes are renamed "lived experience" then treated like scientific data.

Laura Bates can hardly be held accountable for her incompetence since, as Laura explained, she didn't even know what feminism meant two years ago but is now, miraculously, considered one of its leaders. This isn't a big problem since Laura is a professional actor. Well, she didn't quite make it as an actor in film and television but she certainly hit it big with the new fourth wave feminists. Their standards are apparently lower.

Laurie Penny, for example, wrote an article for the NewStatesman this week which informed us how the Patriarchy feels about her haircut. And people took her seriously.

These two feminists, Laura and Laurie, should get together and have a chat.

Laura claims that women don't want male attention but Laurie asserts in her byline that "choosing to behave consciously as if the sexual attention of men is not [her] top priority has made more of a difference to how [her] life has turned out than [she] ever imagined."

The key words here are "as if." Laurie seems to be admitting that male attention is, in fact, her top priority and she must struggle to act as if it is not. I'm not convinced that Laurie intended to reveal this to her readership but the truth is out. Meanwhile, Laura insists that women are bothered by sexual attention and every evil male gaze, catcall, or graze of the hand is an assault of great magnitude. Both of them rely on "lived experience" (anecdotal evidence) to validate their claims.

Laurie's problem, aside from considering pick up artists (PUAs) to be men's rights advocates (MRAs), is that she has "rubbish" hair and can't grow it long. She copes with her misfortune by recognizing that women put so much time into managing and grooming their tresses it's amazing they can still hold down an outside job. So when feminists, like Laura Bates, claim that women do nothing to draw male attention, we have Laurie Penny to set us straight on the matter.

> It takes energy and money and attention. …The point is to look like the performance of femininity matters enough to you that you're prepared to work at it.

The Everyday Sexism Project is a fact-fabrication project, pure and simple. It takes the feminist-despised cover of internet anonymity to solicit vitriolic and disparaging comments for which the users reasonably feel they will never be held accountable. According to feminists, there is only one difference between the descriptions offered as proof of sexism on Laura's project and the negative response emails she's received from those who oppose her narrative: Anonymity for women is empowering and should be trusted, but anonymity for men is malevolent and turns them into dangerous predators.

To make sure we don't discount her as an invested party in the outcome of her project, Laura assures us that she only expected to get about twenty-five or fifty replies. From her friends. The astounding response "proves" to Laura that her current world view is the correct one. She knows this because "lived experience" (anecdotal evidence) trumps research in the modern world.

Given that Laura didn't know anything about feminism prior to starting her "original" idea it is forgivable that she didn't know her idea had already been thought of many times. It had, in fact, already received much mainstream attention up to, and including, the former leader of the UK "holler back" campaign also helped promote slutwalk as an award winning activist. It's forgivable because Vicky Simister mysteriously disappeared from the "Everyday Sexism" scene a couple of months before Laura Bates launched her own #shoutback hashtag to replace her.

What is surprising is that the mainstream media went all Orwell on us and erased history to pretend that Laura Bates was a pioneer of an event that they'd already hailed as "new" two time before.

It's something between a circus and silly place.

Back to Laurie Penny for proof of absurdity:

While mocking an MRA argument that biological psychology explains attraction to long, luscious hair as a sign of health and fertility, she tries to refute this logic while simultaneously sharing the sad story of her sister who lost her long luscious hair because she became ill. If that wasn't enough, she then goes on to describe the ideal woman she thinks MRAs are looking for:

> The "ideal woman," who wakes up looking like an underwear model, who is satisfied with her role as housewife and helpmeet but remains passionate enough to hold a man's interest, who looks "bangable" but never actually bangs, because that would make her a slut, is almost entirely fictional.

You read that correctly. Ms Penny thinks that men covet women who tease but won't fuck them. Yes, Laurie, you have successfully created a fictional man who loves a cock-teasing piece of slime.

If we are generous and exclude Laurie Penny as an anomaly in a sea of otherwise coherent women, we are still faced with the generalizations about men that every other feminist makes. Is it wrong to generalize about all members of a gender based on a single person's lived experience?

Apparently, it's only wrong if you're someone like Samantha Brick.

Samantha caused a major hoopla when she accused women of being scathing bitches to each other. Ms. Brick published an article claiming that women hate her because of the male attention she receives. Samantha asserts that women are particularly vicious to each other and that they have a social problem.

This is Samantha Brick's lived experience, but feminists lost no time expressing their lack of support for it.

According to psychologist Emma Kenny, a repetitive experience of negative responses is an indication that if everyone reacts to you in a negative way it's probably something wrong with you instead of them.

Emma Kenny elaborated.

> One of the big questions is; if, as a person, everywhere I go I am met with a certain reaction from people, for example that reaction is negative,…well if you just hear me out… If I get that reaction I have to in the end embrace the fact that actually it might be me that needs to change and not the society around me. The very fact that you are entertaining these relationships with people, you instantly have a paranoia.

Paranoia? Interesting she should say that. Paranoia is the base problem with the interpretation Everyday Sexism, Laura Bates, her predecessors, and feminists of all sorts, paint their descriptions with. All described events are coloured by their assumed motivations projected onto men.

Why is Samantha Brick delusional yet Laura Bates is not? The answer is simple: in Brick's description women are the villains and we can't have that. In the preferred narrative, men are the only aggressors.

When Samantha Brick explains, as the Everyday Sexism Project tries to assert, that her experiences absolutely happened even though they were spread out over the span of her life, now being 41, Emma responds "so what you're actually saying then is is that this is a very minority of experiences… this doesn't apply to the generic population, which is what you stated."

Oh, really?

Where Samantha Brick is honest and acknowledges that her experiences didn't happen all in one day, feminists are quite happy to make you think twenty or forty years worth of secretly harboured memories happened to them every day of their lives. It simply is not the case.

Samantha Brick is also not anonymous. She is prepared to face the multitude of women who attacked her, true to character, for telling them that they–women of all people!–ought to behave themselves in a more civil manner.

Half of the thousands of email responses Samantha received were from the very hateful women she sought to describe. The other half were from women who recognized the phenomenon Samantha outlined and thanked her for speaking out on their behalf. Who is listening to Samantha Brick? Certainly not the feminists.

So why does Laura Bates think the world now has to listen to her and the Everyday Solipsism Project? Has Laura Bates addressed Samantha Brick's problems? Does Laura Bates not agree with Emma Kenny, the feminist psychologist, who thinks a woman who encounters daily negative experiences has a personal problem which she is projecting onto society?

Laurie Penny's haircut will not be the answer to this problem.

MEME – Your thoughts must be correct

Robert St. Estephe · 30 January 2014 · Archived copy · Original

[image]

More women (and men) prefer male bosses to female bosses

Mike Buchanan · 30 January 2014 · Archived copy · Original

We know that when the proportion of women on corporate boards is increased financial performance can be expected to decline, but could there be other outcomes which might partly compensate for this assault on meritocracy? For example, will the working environment become more pleasant and supportive for men, or women? Proponents of more women in the senior reaches of business often claim that women are more 'consensual' or 'collaborative' than men, or as I prefer to think of it, hopelessly indecisive.

What might one of these consensual geniuses do when a topic arises unexpectedly at a board meeting? Perhaps take a 'comfort break' during which she'll attempt to forge a "consensus" among whoever is around to "collaborate" with at the time? So long as boards are happy with female directors taking two-hour-long comfort breaks, I see no problem. Of course board meetings could then last all week, but that's surely a small price to pay to keep up the charade of often poorly qualified female directors appearing competent.

Our thanks to "M" for sending us links to two intriguing documents on employees' preferences with respect to the genders of their bosses. The first is from the Gallup organisation in the United States, a report titled, "Americans Still Prefer a Male Boss," which draws on a survey conducted in August 2013. Gallup has been asking questions in this area since 1953, 60 years ago. The report:

http://www.gallup.com/poll/165791/americans-prefer-male-boss.aspx

Intriguingly, a higher proportion of women (40%) than men (29%) prefer a male boss. Key findings from the study:

> MEN
>
> 29% prefer a male boss
>
> 18% prefer a female boss
>
> 51% have no preference
>
> WOMEN
>
> 40% prefer a male boss
>
> 27% prefer a female boss
>
> 32% have no preference

Young Americans showed the same preference for male bosses as older Americans. Also from the report:

> Implications
>
> Although four in 10 Americans do not have a preference for a male or a female boss, those who do would rather work for a man than a woman – as they have since Gallup began asking this question in 1953.
>
> The minority of working Americans who have a female boss break even in their preferences for the gender of their boss, suggesting that if the percentage of Americans who work for a woman increases, so might the percentage who would rather work for a woman. However, young Americans' preferences are in line with the average, which suggests that the aging of today's workforce may not in and of itself produce changes in these attitudes in the years ahead.

The fact that even in 2013 women are more likely to prefer a male boss over a female boss will come as no surprise to anyone who's read Steve Moxon's The Woman Racket (2008). One of Moxon's key theses is that men are innately comfortable with rules-based competition – one of the reasons why so many more men than women engage in competitive sports, or watch them – and with a male dominance hierarchy based upon power, or its modern proxy, money. The female dominance hierarchy, by contrast, is based upon youth and attractiveness, so women tend to be less comfortable than men with the male dominance hierarchy which remains the basis of the vast majority of commercially successful organisations.

Many times over the course of my 30+ year-long business career women complained to me about their treatment at the hands of female bosses who generally had a small "in group" they favoured in numerous ways. The situation was made worse by women being promoted beyond their abilities, in an effort to get more women into the senior reaches of organisations. In my experience men were rarely promoted beyond their abilities in this way, but if they were, they soon realised they had a problem, admitted it, and a solution was found. Women in the same situation would struggle on in an effort to save face, they could become unpleasant to deal with, and end up with depression, stress-related absences from work, substance abuse issues…

Crossing the pond, we turn to a short but interesting article in the Daily Telegraph, published in 2010, "Workers Prefer Male Bosses":

http://www.telegraph.co.uk/finance/jobs/7938593/Workers-prefer-male-bosses.html

From the article:

> Two thirds of employees agree they would rather work for a man than a woman. Female bosses were accused of being moody and incapable of leaving their personal lives at home. A third of those polled claimed women in charge are 'loose cannons' – ready to stab colleagues in the back at any time, and who constantly feel threatened by other people in positions of authority. By contrast, both male and female workers believe male bosses were less likely to get involved in office politics, were easier to reason with and rarely suffered from mood swings.
>
> Men are also said to be more straight-talking than women and rarely talk about others behind their backs, it emerged.

The article ends with the following:

> Ten reasons why men are considered the best bosses
>
> 1. Straight talking
> 2. Less likely to get involved in office politics
> 3. Easier to reason with
> 4. Less likely to bitch about others
> 5. Less likely to suffer from mood swings
> 6. Able to leave their private life at home
> 7. No time of the month
> 8. More likely to share common interests
> 9. Don't feel threatened if others are good at their jobs
> 10. More reasonable

Who could argue with any of the 10 reasons? So there we have it. When organisations drive up the proportion of bosses who are women, not only can they expect to see financial performance decline, but also a less happy workforce. It's a lose/lose situation, engineered to keep a small number of privileged women in positions of power for which they're poorly qualified. So why do the government, the business sector, employers' organisations and professional bodies all relentlessly pursue this insane direction of travel? Things may have to get a lot worse before people in positions of influence come to their collective senses.

Judge Pirro slams women's violence against men

AVfM Video Source · 31 January 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Judge Pirro addresses female perpetrator: "I've heard enough! I've heard too many cases of either men being stabbed or killed by women. Men don't want to talk about it, or they just think that it is something that will go away. It will not go away."

To male victim: "The next beating is going to be worse than the last beating. Men are less likely to report the violence due to embarrassment or the assumption that others won't believe you, but I believe you! I believe you."

To female perpetrator: "I have never seen a police report more blatant in terms of the pride you take for assaulting someone. What planet are you from?! You keep doing this and you're going to end up in State prison – and maybe that's exactly where you belong. You don't take out your anger and physically abuse another human being – man or woman…. you should get your tail out of here and hide your face."

Justice – Canadian style

Jim Byset · 31 January 2014 · Archived copy · Original

THE TRAVESTY of justice that is the gynocentric Canadian legal system continues unabated with the news that Meredith Borowiec is to receive a paltry 18 month sentence for two counts of infanticide, with a suspended sentence on the charge of aggravated assault. Borowiec killed her newborn babies in 2008, 2009, and attempted to kill another newborn in 2010. Judge Peter McIntyre handed down the sentence yesterday, noting in doing so that it was "a terrible case."

No doubt McIntyre's assessment is correct. He is correct insofar as two human beings, utterly dependent on the immediate care of their mother were brutally and callously killed – cast aside literally as garbage. It was only due to fortuitous circumstance that her third victim survived. Borowiec's boyfriend, Ian Turnbull, discovered the baby in a dumpster when he overheard crying. In interviews with police Borowiec, who has given birth four times, admitted to hearing her new-born children cry as she disposed of them.

Mitigating factors in sentencing were the defendant's lack of a criminal record and her mental state at the time of giving birth. It was this supposed mental state that enabled the court to change the charges from 2nd degree murder to infanticide. Infanticide, in Canadian law, is treated differently from the crime of murder. It is, from a legal standpoint, a far lesser crime.

Canada implemented the law in 1948 and modelled it closely on the law then extant in Great Britain. The law was used in Britain as a stop gap measure, as the crime of murder was, at the time, a capital offence – meaning women found guilty of killing their newborns would hang. Judges and juries were consistently hesitant to hand down this sentence. It was deemed overly harsh and so the lesser crime of infanticide was introduced to punish the female-perpetrated murder of newborn babies – and to save women from the gallows. (It is perhaps needless to say, but men cannot be charged with the crime of infanticide – regardless of their mental state.)

However, this is Canada in the 21st Century – 66 years later. Women no longer have to worry about having children out of wedlock. There is no social stigma even remotely comparable to that of 1940s Great Britain. It is simply not accurate or truthful to make that argument. Canadian women have abortion on demand – with no term limits. There are adoption agencies. As unpalatable as it may sound, there are churches, police and fire stations, hospitals – all institutions that would unquestioningly take in a newborn and make sure it is given care. There are countless options available – all of which makes Borowiec's crimes even more despicable.

In sentencing, Judge McIntyre remarked that all three crimes were committed while the defendant's "mind was disturbed while giving birth." If this is the case then why did Borowiec continually lie about her pregnancies to co-workers – passing off her growing torso as uterine cysts? Why didn't she take precautions to ensure that after the first incident it never happened again? The truth of the matter here is that she knew what she was doing and simply did not care. Concocting a story whereby she underwent mental stress in childbirth, to the point that it led her to throw three babies into dumpsters, all in almost identical circumstances, is utterly ludicrous.

However, it is not surprising that it should work. Since 1977 there have been 86 such cases in Canada. The law was challenged in the Ontario Court of Appeal in 2011 by the Crown prosecution but was ultimately defeated. The Crown challenged the law in the case of a Guelph, ON woman who smothered her two infant sons. They lost the case and the woman known only as L.B. served just one year in prison. The stark reality is that Canadian law and legal institutions are heavily slanted in favour of any woman who stands before them and that crimes – even those as sickening as these can be waved away with nebulous references to mental duress.

As Barbara Kay put it, writing in yesterday's National Post, it's now 'open season' on unwanted infants. It's hard to disagree with her assessment. The bodies of Borowiec's victims were never found and most likely ended up in landfills. It should be remembered – these were human beings. These were people – although we'll never know their names. We'll never know their gender; Boroweic never bothered to check before throwing them away.

Their deaths are a stain not just on Borowiec but on those who support her. Their deaths are a stain on the Canadian justice system. Their deaths are a stain on those who stand by, and do nothing.

It is a black day for Canada – and there are more on the horizon.

E-mail RAINN on Saturday, March 15, 2014

A Voice for Men News · 1 February 2014 · Archived copy · Original

The current FBI definition of rape is “The penetration, no matter how slight, of the vagina or anus with any body part or object, or oral penetration by a sex organ of another person, without the consent of the victim.” As we’ve said before, this erases victims of rape who are forced to penetrate, generally men forced to have sex with women. The number of victims who are erased this way is not insignificant; according to the 2010 CDC NISVS, it’s almost equal to the number of women who are raped.

While the FBI definition doesn’t have a direct legal impact, it affects how crime statistics are collected and serves as a model to state legislatures. This continued erasure is a self-perpetuating cycle that must be stopped. Rape victims who are not ciswomen victimized by cismen need more support. With this in mind, I’m asking any readers of this post to help me in an effort to try and create a world in which fewer rape victims are erased.

While it’s probably unrealistic to expect the FBI to change their definition again in the next few years, it might be possible to encourage certain other organizations to stop erasing male victims. RAINN in particular is a very popular source of statistics regarding rape, some of which erase many victims.

I’d like to get as many people as possible to contact RAINN at info@rainn.org and/or chelseab@rainn.org on Saturday, March 15, 2014, asking them to consider using a more gender-inclusive definition for their statistics and rape awareness campaigns. It would be best for all of this contact to happen all on the same day; it’s easy to ignore a few scattered pleas, but a flood of concern is harder to brush off. Until that date, I’d like people to reblog this post and spread the message as much as possible. Talking to local feminist groups or other gender rights-oriented groups is particularly important. Additionally, I’d like anyone interested in taking a more active role to contact me; a clearer line of communication would help me organize this effort.

While we most likely will not succeed at actually getting RAINN to change their policies, this campaign will increase the visibility male victims, help us learn how to organize social justice campaigns, foster positive connections with feminist groups, and encourage greater activism within the MRM and egalitarian movements.

What do you guys think?

-DJ

info@rainn.org is the “umbrella” RAINN e-mail for contact. Here’s a possible general model for e-mails directed there:

> I’m an individual concerned about gender issues. While RAINN’s overall message and purpose is amazing, your methods often are both problematic and uninclusive.
> Your definition of rape, which can be found at http://www.rainn.org/get-information/types-of-sexual-assault/definition-of-rape, is pretty intersectional. However, it directly contradicts one statistic regarding male victims that can be found at http://www.rainn.org/get-information/statistics/sexual-assault-victims. The current FBI definition of rape is “The penetration, no matter how slight, of the vagina or anus with any body part or object, or oral penetration by a sex organ of another person, without the consent of the victim.” This erases victims of rape who are forced to penetrate, generally men who are forced to have sex with women. The number of victims erased this way is not insignificant; according to the CDC NISVS, it’s almost equal to the number of women who are raped. More information on the topic can be found at http://permutationofninjas.org/post/57003274589/gender-symmetry-in-sexual-assault-an-analysis-of-the.
> You should change some of the information on your site and materials to more accurately represent the facts. Additionally, some particular campaigns, such as http://www.rainn.org/get-information/sexual-assault-prevention/men-can-help, should become more inclusive. Changing the message from “men can try and stop rape” to “everyone should try and stop rape” would be a good start towards addressing sexual assault without erasing male victims or female perpetrators.

chelseab@rainn.org is an e-mail line for membership inquiries. Here's a possible model for e-mails directed there:

> Mrs. Chelsea Bowers,
> I'm an individual concerned about gender issues. RAINN's overall message and purpose is amazing, and I'd be interested in joining and supporting your organization. However, your methods often seem both problematic and uninclusive.
> Your definition of rape, which can be found at http://www.rainn.org/get-information/types-of-sexual-assault/definition-of-rape, isn't the best, but it's okay. However, it directly contradicts one statistic regarding male victims that can be found at http://www.rainn.org/get-information/statistics/sexual-assault-victims. The current FBI definition of rape is "The penetration, no matter how slight, of the vagina or anus with any body part or object, or oral penetration by a sex organ of another person, without the consent of the victim." This erases victims of rape who are forced to penetrate, generally men who are forced to have sex with women. The number of victims erased this way is not insignificant; according to the CDC NISVS, it's almost equal to the number of women who are raped. More information on the topic can be found at http://permutationofninjas.org/post/57003274589/gender-symmetry-in-sexual-assault-an-analysis-of-the.
> You should change some of the information on your site and materials to more accurately represent the facts. Additionally, some particular campaigns, such as http://www.rainn.org/get-information/sexual-assault-prevention/men-can-help, should really become more inclusive. Changing the message from "men can try and stop rape" to "everyone should try and stop rape" would be a good start towards addressing sexual assault without erasing male victims or female perpetrators.
> Thank you, and I'd love to hear back from you!
> (YOUR NAME)

—

Editorial note: The above is reprinted from Permutation of Ninjas. The content is under the Creative Commons Attribution-NonCommercial-ShareAlike 3.0 Unported License, which allows for reproduction or derivative works so long as you include a linkback or attribution. We suggest anyone who shares the sentiment copy this article as we have done.–DE

John the Other is a traitor

Diana Davison · 1 February 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Traitor, turncoat, douche canoe. These are words one never expects to use when describing a friend and ally. Yet all of these terms, especially the last one, echoed through the canyon of my despair when I discovered the proof that John Hembling is a very bad man.

The reality hit me like thunder as I read, eyes wide with horror, the new battle cry of Jessica Valenti. "Back The Fuck Up!" she demanded. Back the fuck up and give women some space!

A creeping feeling of familiarity settled over me as she repeated the phrase, over and over and over. It was an odd sensation, like finding a flimsy staple gun that is somehow shooting seven inch nails. It was the right fastener but in the wrong equipment. The right tool, but in the wrong hands, and the wrong place. Then, as the facts broke down my resistance, there was no escape and my mind was raped of all illusions. There was only one way Jessica Valenti could come up with a slogan that crass and confrontational:

John the Other has an apprentice.

If you harbour any doubts that he has schooled the enemy., trained them in the ways of "Fuck Their Shit up", and taken Valenti under his wing I give you the irrefutable evidence: Valenti concludes her new "national call" to "Back The Fuck Up" with the more usable, shortened version.

> So, until we can walk through the world unencumbered by misogyny, BTFU.

Dear fellow activists, it is with a heavy heart and much woe that I bring you this devastating news. We have been betrayed.

All chances of coincidence vanished with those four, simple letters. The only question left is… why?

Why, John?

For the love of all good things, WHY?

We believed in you, John. We sunbathed in your soliloquies, subscribed to your sadism, frolicked in your furious funhouse, revelled in your rants, and applauded your audacity. What more did you want from us? How could you, of all people, betray the movement?

I want answers.

I suppose we should have seen the signs. In John's recent video to Laci Green he offered Ms. Green advice for being taken seriously. It was a clever ploy, making us think that his wig and painted, luscious lips were a mockery of Laci instead of a marketing ploy. Sometimes the truth is hidden in plain site.

What are they paying you, John? And was it worth your soul?

[image]

As Dante wrote, "Abandon all hope, ye who enter here."

Though I'd like to wish John luck on his journey through the gates of hell, I am still too mortified and embittered to feign the proper etiquette.

But all is not lost. The writing is on the blog wall and, even given John the Other's wit and coaching, Jessica Valenti remains a fool. "Back The Fuck Up", demands legal enforcement that men do not engage women in public within a defined "buffer zone."

Aside from women being uncomfortable trying to move about in a safety bubble (which, in trying to squeeze through doorways, could make her feel fat and would interfere with the display of her fashion choices) it would, ultimately, amount to that dreaded victim blaming. While Valenti failed to mention how she envisioned her BTFU policy being implemented, I imagine it looks something like a male body condom.

The running flaw with the Valenti version of JtO's FTSU campaign is something John should have been able to foresee. Feminists can not maintain a train of thought long enough to complete an article let alone to follow through on a campaign. Where Jessica Valenti starts by complaining that feminists are always being defensive instead of proactive, she tries to resolve the problem with a campaign that again, eliminates female agency.

Back The Fuck Up sounds aggressive but, in reality, it is yet again merely focused on what other people should do. It is the equivalent of yelling “Stop! Or I’ll yell ‘stop’ again.” Teaching Valenti to inject female agency into her campaign ideas is as impossible as teaching Laci Green to stop flaunting her cleavage in videos complaining about sexual objectification.

Give up, John Hembling. You’re grooming a lame horse.

I’ve mulled over all the possibilities, trying to make sense of John’s betrayal. I raged, I seethed, then worked through the stages of grief and allowed myself to cry. The pool of tears that gathered in the bottom of my ramen bowl became a scrying glass and I was enlightened by a singular solution that could make sense of John’s betrayal.

He was bored!

I don’t want to raise false hopes here, but I believe there is a small chance John the Other is not dead to us.

In the past, John has lamented that FTSU is far too easy. All a person has to do is google “feminism” in the news, make one random click of the mouse, and find material so laughable it’s hardly sport to pull it apart.

It is entirely feasible that JtO hasn’t actually abandoned the ship for a douche canoe after all.

Perhaps this isn’t a betrayal but a sacrifice. John has descended into the intellectual void to make the fight more fair and interesting. As we know, MHRAs believe in equality and, if anyone can do it, John Hembling could immerse himself in feminist madness and still emerge intact.

If ever there was a time we could help bring JtO back safely, the moment is now. Jessica Valenti’s campaign has begun and, though she doesn’t see any practical uses for it, she is bathing in the “ethos” and might not notice John’s escape.

Run, John, run!

Come back to us! But, for the record, you got some splainin’ to do.

The 53rd Hour...

AVfM Video Source · 2 February 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Waving goodbye to your kids is something most parents do without thinking. Follow this single Dad's journey as he documents 8 months of saying goodbye to his two children, by capturing the missing moments between. Honest, heartfelt and true, this short was captured entirely on an iPhone.

For single dads receiving visits from their kids on limited occasions only, the leftover evidence from the visit becomes a special reminder – the unfinished drink on the table, the toy they were playing with in the garden, a dirty handprint on the wall, the indents in their pillows…. these are sacred keepsakes to be cherished until the next visit.

State incentive to collect child support : bigger piece of federal funds pie

Laura Lynn · 2 February 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Here is a link to the Social Security Administration website that explains how money is divided up between the states to add incentive to collect child support.
It reads:
INCENTIVE PAYMENTS TO STATES
Sec. 458. [42 U.S.C. 658a] (a) In General.—In addition to any other payment under this part, the Secretary shall, subject to subsection (f), make an incentive payment to each State for each fiscal year in an amount determined under subsection (b).

(b) Amount of Incentive Payment.—

(1) In general.—The incentive payment for a State for a fiscal year is equal to the incentive payment pool for the fiscal year, multiplied by the State incentive payment share for the fiscal year.

(2) Incentive payment pool.—

(A) In general.—In paragraph (1), the term "incentive payment pool" means—

> (i) $422,000,000 for > fiscal year 2000;
>
> (ii) $429,000,000
> for fiscal year 2001;
>
> (iii) $450,000,000
> for fiscal year 2002;
>
> (iv) $461,000,000
> for fiscal year 2003;
>
> (v) $454,000,000 for > fiscal year 2004;
>
> (vi) $446,000,000
> for fiscal year 2005;
>
> (vii) $458,000,000
> for fiscal year 2006;
>
> (viii) $471,000,000
> for fiscal year 2007;
>
> (ix) $483,000,000
> for fiscal year 2008; and
>
> (x) for any succeeding fiscal year, the amount of the incentive payment pool for the fiscal year that precedes such succeeding fiscal year, multiplied by the percentage (if any) by which the CPI for such preceding fiscal year exceeds the CPI for the second preceding fiscal year.

(B) CPI.—For purposes of subparagraph (A), the CPI for a fiscal year is the average of the Consumer Price Index for the 12-month period ending on September 30 of the fiscal year. As used in the preceding sentence, the term "Consumer Price Index" means the last Consumer Price Index for all-urban consumers published by the Department of Labor.

(3) State incentive payment share.—In paragraph (1), the term "State incentive payment share" means, with respect to a fiscal year—

(A) the incentive base amount for the State for the fiscal year; divided by

(B) the sum of the incentive base amounts for all of the States for the fiscal year.

(4) Incentive base amount.—In paragraph (3), the term "incentive base amount" means, with respect to a State and a fiscal year, the sum of the applicable percentages (determined in accordance with paragraph (6)) multiplied by the corresponding maximum incentive base amounts for the State for the fiscal year, with respect to each of the following measures of State performance for the fiscal year:

(A) The paternity establishment performance level.

(B) The support order performance level.

(C) The current payment performance level.

(D) The arrearage payment performance level.

(E) The cost–effectiveness performance level.

(5) Maximum incentive base amount.—

(A) In general.—For purposes of paragraph (4), the maximum incentive base amount for a State for a fiscal year is—

(i) with respect to the performance measures described in subparagraphs (A), (B), and (C) of paragraph (4), the State collections base for the fiscal year; and

(ii) with respect to the performance measures described in subparagraphs (D) and (E) of paragraph (4), 75 percent of the State collections base for the fiscal year.

(B) Data required to be complete and reliable.—Notwithstanding subparagraph (A), the maximum incentive base amount for a State for a fiscal year with respect to a performance measure described in paragraph (4) is zero, unless the Secretary determines, on the basis of an audit performed under section 452(a)(4)(C)(i), that the data which the State submitted pursuant to section 454(15)(B) for the fiscal year and which is used to determine the performance level involved is complete and reliable.

(C) State collections base.—For purposes of subparagraph (A), the State collections base for a fiscal year is equal to the sum of—

(i) 2 times the sum of—

(I) the total amount of support collected during the fiscal year under the State plan approved under this part in cases in which the support obligation involved is required to be assigned to the State pursuant to part A or E of this title or title XIX; and

(II) the total amount of support collected during the fiscal year under the State plan approved under this part in cases in which the support obligation involved was so assigned but, at the time of collection, is not required to be so assigned; and

(ii) the total amount of support collected during the fiscal year under the State plan approved under this part in all other cases.

(6) Determination of applicable percentages based on performance levels.—

(A) Paternity establishment.—

(i) Determination of paternity establishment performance level.—The paternity establishment performance level for a State for a fiscal year is, at the option of the State, the IV-D paternity establishment percentage determined under section 452(g)(2)(A) or the statewide paternity establishment percentage determined under section 452(g)(2)(B).

(ii) Determination of applicable percentage.—The applicable percentage with respect to a State's paternity establishment performance level is as follows:

If the paternity establishment performance level is:		The applicable percentage is:
At least:	But less than:
80%		100
79%	80%	98
78%	79%	96
77%	78%	94
76%	77%	92
75%	76%	90
74%	75%	88
73%	74%	86
72%	73%	84
71%	72%	82
70%	71%	80
69%	70%	79
68%	69%	78
67%	68%	77
66%	67%	76
65%	66%	75
64%	65%	74
63%	64%	73
62%	63%	72
61%	62%	71
60%	61%	70
59%	60%	69
58%	59%	68
57%	58%	67
56%	57%	66
55%	56%	65
54%	55%	64
53%	54%	63
52%	53%	62
51%	52%	61

If the paternity establishment performance level is:		The applicable percentage is:
At least:	But less than:
50%	51%	60
0%	50%	0.

Notwithstanding the preceding sentence, if the paternity establishment performance level of a State for a fiscal year is less than 50 percent but exceeds by at least 10 percentage points the paternity establishment performance level of the State for the immediately preceding fiscal year, then the applicable percentage with respect to the State's paternity establishment performance level is 50 percent.

(B) Establishment of child support orders.—

(i) Determination of support order performance level.—The support order performance level for a State for a fiscal year is the percentage of the total number of cases under the State plan approved under this part in which there is a support order during the fiscal year.

(ii) Determination of applicable percentage.—The applicable percentage with respect to a State's support order performance level is as follows:

If the support order performance level is:		The applicable percentage is:
At least:	But less than:
80%		100
79%	80%	98
78%	79%	96
77%	78%	94
76%	77%	92
75%	76%	90
74%	75%	88
73%	74%	86
72%	73%	84
71%	72%	82
70%	71%	80
69%	70%	79
68%	69%	78
67%	68%	77
66%	67%	76
65%	66%	75
64%	65%	74
63%	64%	73
62%	63%	72
61%	62%	71
60%	61%	70
59%	60%	69

If the support order performance level is:		The applicable percentage is:
At least:	But less than:
58%	59%	68
57%	58%	67
56%	57%	66
55%	56%	65
54%	55%	64
53%	54%	63
52%	53%	62
51%	52%	61
50%	51%	60
0%	50%	0.

Notwithstanding the preceding sentence, if the support order performance level of a State for a fiscal year is less than 50 percent but exceeds by at least 5 percentage points the support order performance level of the State for the immediately preceding fiscal year, then the applicable percentage with respect to the State's support order performance level is 50 percent.

(C) Collections on current child support due.—

(i) Determination of current payment performance level.—The current payment performance level for a State for a fiscal year is equal to the total amount of current support collected during the fiscal year under the State plan approved under this part divided by the total amount of current support owed during the fiscal year in all cases under the State plan, expressed as a percentage.

(ii) Determination of applicable percentage.—The applicable percentage with respect to a State's current payment performance level is as follows:

If the support order performance level is:		The applicable percentage is:
At least:	But less than:
80%		100
79%	80%	98
78%	79%	96
77%	78%	94
76%	77%	92
75%	76%	90
74%	75%	88
73%	74%	86
72%	73%	84
71%	72%	82
70%	71%	80
69%	70%	79
68%	69%	78

If the support order performance level is:		The applicable percentage is:
At least:	But less than:
67%	68%	77
66%	67%	76
65%	66%	75
64%	65%	74
63%	64%	73
62%	63%	72
61%	62%	71
60%	61%	70
59%	60%	69
58%	59%	68
57%	58%	67
56%	57%	66
55%	56%	65
54%	55%	64
53%	54%	63
52%	53%	62
51%	52%	61
50%	51%	60
49%	50%	59
48%	49%	58
47%	48%	57
46%	47%	56
45%	46%	55
44%	45%	54
43%	44%	53
42%	43%	52
41%	42%	51
40%	41%	50
0%	40%	0.

Notwithstanding the preceding sentence, if the current payment performance level of a State for a fiscal year is less than 40 percent but exceeds by at least 5 percentage points the current payment performance level of the State for the immediately preceding fiscal year, then the applicable percentage with respect to the State's current payment performance level is 50 percent.

(D) Collections on child support arrearages.—

(i) Determination of arrearage payment performance level.—The arrearage payment performance level for a State for a fiscal year is equal to the total number of cases under the State plan approved under this part in which payments of past–due child support were received during the fiscal year and part or all of the payments were distributed to the family to whom the past–due child support was owed (or, if all past–due child support owed to the family was, at the time of receipt, subject to an assignment to the State, part or all of the payments were retained by the State) divided by the total number of cases under the State plan in which there is past–due child support, expressed as a percentage.

(ii) Determination of applicable percentage.—The applicable percentage with respect to a State's arrearage payment performance level is as follows:

If the support order performance level is:		The applicable percentage is:
At least:	But less than:
80%		100
79%	80%	98
78%	79%	96
77%	78%	94
76%	77%	92
75%	76%	90
74%	75%	88
73%	74%	86
72%	73%	84
71%	72%	82
70%	71%	80
69%	70%	79
68%	69%	78
67%	68%	77
66%	67%	76
65%	66%	75
64%	65%	74
63%	64%	73
62%	63%	72
61%	62%	71
60%	61%	70
59%	60%	69
58%	59%	68
57%	58%	67
56%	57%	66
55%	56%	65
54%	55%	64
53%	54%	63
52%	53%	62
51%	52%	61
50%	51%	60

If the support order performance level is:		The applicable percentage is:
At least:	But less than:
49%	50%	59
48%	49%	58
47%	48%	57
46%	47%	56
45%	46%	55
44%	45%	54
43%	44%	53
42%	43%	52
41%	42%	51
40%	41%	50
0%	40%	0.

Notwithstanding the preceding sentence, if the arrearage payment performance level of a State for a fiscal year is less than 40 percent but exceeds by at least 5 percentage points the arrearage payment performance level of the State for the immediately preceding fiscal year, then the applicable percentage with respect to the State's arrearage payment performance level is 50 percent.

(E) Cost–effectiveness.—

(i) Determination of cost-effectiveness performance level.—The cost-effectiveness performance level for a State for a fiscal year is equal to the total amount collected during the fiscal year under the State plan approved under this part divided by the total amount expended during the fiscal year under the State plan, expressed as a ratio.

(ii) Determination of applicable percentage.—The applicable percentage with respect to a State's cost-effectiveness performance level is as follows:

If the cost–effectiveness performance level is:		The applicable percentage is:
At least:	But less than:
5.00		100
4.50	4.99	90
4.00	4.50	80
3.50	4.00	70
3.00	3.50	60
2.50	3.00	50
2.00	2.50	40
0.00	2.00	0

(c) Treatment of Interstate Collections.—In computing incentive payments under this section, support which is collected by a State at the request of another State shall be treated as having been collected in full by both States, and any amounts expended by a State in carrying out a special project assisted under section 455(e) shall be excluded.

(d) Administrative Provisions.—The amounts of the incentive payments to be made to the States under this section for a fiscal year shall be estimated by the Secretary at/or before the beginning of the fiscal year on the basis of the best information available. The Secretary shall make the payments for the fiscal year, on a quarterly basis (with each quarterly payment being made no later than the beginning of the quarter involved), in the amounts so estimated, reduced or increased to the extent of any overpayments or underpayments which the Secretary determines were made under this section to the States involved for prior periods and with respect to which adjustment has not already been made under this subsection. Upon the making of any estimate by the Secretary under the preceding sentence, any appropriations available for payments under this section are deemed obligated.

(e) Regulations.—The Secretary shall prescribe such regulations as may be necessary governing the calculation of incentive payments under this section, including directions for excluding from the calculations certain closed cases and cases over which the States do not have jurisdiction.

(f) Reinvestment.—A State to which a payment is made under this section shall expend the full amount of the payment to supplement, and not supplant, other funds used by the State—

(1) to carry out the State plan approved under this part; or

(2) for any activity (including cost-effective contracts with local agencies) approved by the Secretary, whether or not the expenditures for the activity are eligible for reimbursement under this part, which may contribute to improving the effectiveness or efficiency of the State program operated under this part.

Editor's note: this item reprinted with permission from Examiner.com. – DE

A Message From Ryerson University to the World

AVfM Video Source · 3 February 2014 · Archived copy · Original

From Dannyboy.
Just sayin.

Patriarchy News – First Internet Troll Discovered

AVfM Video Source · 3 February 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Johnny Shadowfax has an important Patriarchy News Update. Be sure to keep close tabs on this story as it develops.

Shadowfax, also known as AVfM's own John Ridgway, can be found here on YouTube.

On CAFE, Free Speech and the Ryerson University Extortion Racket

Paul Elam · 3 February 2014 · Archived copy · Original

This work brings with it opportunities for humility aplenty. That is what happens when you deal with a population of disaffected people, and especially when that disaffection is the subject of great social denial.

Such was the case not so long ago when I opened an envelope that I found in the AVFM PO Box. It contained a note, and three single American Dollars. It was a donation to AVFM, and on the piece of paper was scrawled, get this, an apology for not having given more. The donor explained that after paying child-support, a percentage of arrears and "trying" to buy enough food, he had little that he could give. He said he would try to give more if his life ever got better.

I will spare you the details of my reaction except to say that I am glad I was sitting in my car alone and not still inside the postal store when I read it. Even as I sit here and think about it again, I am thankful to be alone.

It is situations like this that I can and must remember when I consider the current situation regarding the upcoming lecture of Karen Straughan at Ryerson University, sponsored by CAFE — and the protection racket scam that Ryerson University is now allowing to taint the event. For some details on what is happening I refer you to the statement made by CAFE earlier today that is now posted on this website.

For a more blunt observation, let me try to encapsulate what is actually happening here. It appears that the Ryerson Student Union, the very same group of fascist thugs that preemptively declared that any attempt to speak to men's issues at that school was to be summarily judged as a misogynistic attempt to undermine women's progress, has alarmed the school administration of potential security problems (that the fascist thugs themselves will create) in order to force the school to hire additional security for the Straughan lecture — thus charging CAFE an additional $1,600.00 in "security" fees.

The intent here is obvious. Bleed CAFE of their ability to host lectures by threatening to act out violently, forcing CAFE to pay in order to exercise "freedom" of expression.

They did it at the University of Toronto. They are doing it at Ryerson. And part of the unholy arrangement is that CAFE is now forced into a smaller lecture hall that only seats 100 people. That too, as far as I know, was a university administration call, the rationale being that when fire alarms are pulled they will only disrupt the event, and not students in other classes.

One way of looking at this is that it is not such a big deal. $1,600.00 is a serious bit of money, but not world shaking. Well, not world shaking unless you are a refugee from family court struggling to get food on the table; that struggle having a positive side only in that it serves as slight distraction from the heart-crushing absence of your children.

And that, folks, represents a fair amount of people that finance us, CAFE, and every other men's rights initiative going. We have a handful of donors who can afford to make substantial offerings, the kind that make or break efforts like these. No less important are the donors that leave you wiping tears off your face when you get their donation.

There has been spirited debate within the very vocal group of AVFM editors, contributors and supporters in our inner circle about what is happening in Toronto. While opinions are diverse, there seems to be universal agreement on some basic principles.

One, setting the standard that men's advocacy groups are willing pay off university administrations who are either ignorant of the issues or who willfully collude in the ongoing extortion of money for "free speech," is dangerous and unwise. It is a standard that does not just affect CAFE, and those who contribute to their good work. AVFM also has efforts to establish men's issues groups in colleges as evidenced by KSUM at Kennesaw State University. We do not plan on stopping there. Also, the National Coalition for Men (NCFM) has a group at Montana State University with plans to expand to other schools.

Training the feminist academic establishment to know they can harm us financially with illegal, disruptive behavior is a mistake that will cause detriment to every current effort afoot to further this badly needed advocacy.

Accepting the underhanded tactics of feminists as a routine “cost of doing business” which is transferred directly onto the backs of the disenfranchised men we are supposedly seeking to serve is not an option.
In this particular circumstance, however, we have the unique situation of having Karen Straughan, one of the most important and articulate anti-feminists speakers known, scheduled in just days to speak at one of the most virulently hateful and anti-male institutions of higher education known – Ryerson University.
Also mitigating this scenario is CAFE, which has included in its statement language that indicates it is not staying on the path of paying for the right to speak.
To be more specific:

> It involves finding ways to meet our commitment to host events for the sake of those students who will benefit, while using the opportunity to put on a positive show in order to build a good relationship with University administrations. And when necessary, it also means taking whatever action is required to guarantee our fundamental rights and freedoms under the law.

I have reasons to believe, which I am not at liberty to go into at this time, that this statement is an indication that CAFE does not plan to continue on a path of approaching schools with their hat in hand, obsequiously pleading for the right to be heard, and willing to pay money, some of it given by people who scarcely have it, in order to enjoy the same freedom of expression afforded to every other Canadian citizen.
In fact, at this time I believe so much that this to be the case that I have donated $250.00 to CAFE in order to help them with this effort. If you can afford it, I ask you to consider supporting them as well.
But I do so acutely aware of where this money comes from and the sacrifice it represents. I will not be a party to keeping organizations flush, using the money of those who are not, for the sake of saving them from a principled and unambiguous fight for their rights.
I believe in the work of CAFE. And I believe that they are on the correct path, but the time is also here for all of us to recognize and remember that we are fighting for the underdog, not the other way around.

Important update*: Ryerson University’s President Sheldon Levy has announced that Ryerson will not charge the security fee but will absorb the cost of extra security, to protect free expression principles on his university. Well done President Levy. This is a strong rebuke to the fascist forces that so scurrilously tried to sabotage the event. –DE

Domestic violence scandal in Serbia

Lucian Vâlsan · 3 February 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Editor's note: This article is also available in Romanian.

Most people who have visited the Balkan area will contend that at least the Serbo-Croatian-speaking men are usually people who take no bullshit, and once you meet the Serbian women (be they traditional or more modern) you'll probably get the impression that feminist policies have little to no chance of being supported by the population.

But, as it is the case of Hungary or Spain, feminism doesn't really need the support of the population to be imposed upon the people – especially given that men's suffering is by default ignored pretty much all over the planet. This is particularly true in the Balkans where the "concern" for women's wellbeing goes through the roof – not only in Serbia but also in Bosnia, Montenegro, the Republic of Macedonia, Croatia – in an area where bombs fell allover the place and tens of thousands of men died and untold thousands remained permanently disabled just a little over 15 short years ago.

And, just like 15 years ago when thousands upon thousands of men were killed because they were men and the entire world looked the other way[1], the same is true in today's Serbia when it comes to domestic violence against men.

The wall of silence

The overwhelming attitude towards this topic in the Serbian culture seems to be complete and utter silence above anything else. It took years of gathering mountains of cases to get the State to even recognize that male victims of female abuse exist in the first place.

In the entire Balkan area, there is only one domestic violence shelter for men, located in the village Supska, close to the Ćuprija municipality, Serbia. The shelter is being run by a non-governmental organization called Muška Sigurnost (Men's Safety) and it is, at least in theory, supported by the Ministry for Human and Minority Rights[2]. This support translates in practice that the Ministry acknowledges their existence – which one could think it's still better than being considered a bunch of misogynistic haters.

The problems, at a legal level, are pretty much the same as everywhere else. The president of Men's Safety was saying in 2009[3]:

> There is no penalty for a woman when she files a false domestic violence report against her husband. Here, I have our client Ljubisa S. (43) who has a court order to be received back into his house, but there is no enforcement. There's a court order that he must see his children as well, but again – there is no enforcement. He lived in a hotel until he could not pay any longer, and now sleeps here with. We live in a world which seems to be only about women's human rights.

And it's mainly due to the efforts of Dušan Trifunović, the founder of Men's Safety and former mayor of the Ćuprija municipality, that we even get to hear about these disenfranchised men. Until just a few years ago, the Serbian State didn't even acknowledge that male victims of domestic violence even exist. Now, the Ministry for Human and Minority Rights shyly admits that these men exist and claim that between 7 and 10 percent of the Serbian husbands suffer from domestic abuse at the hands of their female partners[4].

Men's Safety argues that the number is probably much higher and their strongest argument is the reluctance of most men to even attempt to seek help when they find themselves in a situation of abuse. Men's Safety says that most of the cases they handle are brought to them by a cousin or a friend who notices the abuse going on for an extended period of time – and not by the male victims themselves.

The Feminist opposition

The State is largely ignorant of the problem (except the judiciary, which treats men with a similar meatgrinder mentality, like everyplace else in Europe), but the feminist lobby is aggressively campaigning quite literally against all men.

Zoran Jovanović, the current president of Men's Safety, recollects a case from 2008 in an interview Vesti that tells you everything you need to know about the feminist lobby in Serbia[5]:

> Remember the case from 2008. First, news came out that a man poured hydrochloric acid on his wife and four children. Vesna Stanojević expressed her opinion about the event and knowingly deceived the public, saying that the man qualifies as a monster. The pressure on the court of the feminist lobby basically sent him to prison. Only seven months later it was found that, in fact, his wife did the crime that he was charged with, and she even tried to kill and/or hurt their children multiple times. Some media outlets have just apologized for the misleading information they printed in one or two sentences, while Vesna Stanojević continued to defend the woman. I just wonder who is going to compensate this innocent man for the seven months he spent in custody. He was found guilty solely because he was a man!

Vesna Stanojević is the coordinator of the network of safe houses for women in Serbia and she makes no secret that she believes all men are violent maniacs, and that she holds this view because she saw once a man attacking his wife and child.
These safe houses for women are mostly used, just like in other parts of Europe, to gain leverage in the divorce courts. Women can get into a safe house and cut off husband's access to kids by having a relative/friend/accomplice who works in a hospital write a fake battering report. In former Communist countries, bribing a doctor in a State hospital to write a fake report is fairly common and proving in court that it's a fake takes time and money – usually much more time and money than the divorce.
Also, courts in Serbia make it difficult for men to prove anything. By stalling and prolonging the case until it exceeds the two-year limit required in that country, the courts can throw the entire case out. In short: a man stands little to no chance of winning, no matter what.
To add insult to the injury, Vesna Stanojević and her ilk get media exposure anytime they wish to say something (even if it's demonstrably false) whilst organizations such as Men's Safety get little to no media exposure. Zoran Jovanović in the same interview[6]:

> I almost have no access to the media and the public. When a man seeks protection, they all make fun of him. This is especially the case when he goes to the Center for Social Work, which is mainly done by and for women.

What Mr. Zoran Jovanović is talking about when he says the Center for Social Work is done by women and for women is that, besides the fact that open mockery of male victims is the common practice, even the application forms to seek aid are entirely using female pronouns, so applying for aid and shelter as a male victim is both de jure and de facto impossible.
Jelena Radević from the Center for Social Work said that she doesn't understand why men don't apply for aid[7]:

> We are in a position to notice that something is wrong. Basically men are indeed exposed to psychological violence, but they simply do not apply [for help].

Jelena Radević's claim that psychological violence is the main issue raised by Men's Safety organization is disingenuous, but her claim that she doesn't understand why men don't rush into that Center is even more disingenuous. Dušan Trifunović, the founder of Men's Safety clarifies[8]:

> The forms from the Center for Social Work and the Police reports are solely for women who report domestic violence. A man can not [legally] sign such an application. If that were to be attempted, he would be ridiculed.

But whilst the feminists and the State can get away with ignoring and even openly mocking men that were severely beaten and then jailed because they were beaten, non-feminist women who understand how the dynamics between the sexes work can't even get away with being pro-male for more than one sentence.

Smiljana Antić, the vice-president of Men's Safety and the spokeswoman for the organization, has all her statements pushed by the media to include the disclaimer that she doesn't pretend that women aren't victims of domestic violence, but that she's simply pointing out that male victims exist, along with female ones. Ms. Antić was telling to the Serbian press in 2009[9]:

> Women may be the weaker sex, but they can also be real experts in verbal and other manipulation techniques. Men need to have their own safe space and that is why I, as a woman, am part of the men's safe house.

The wall of silence that surrounds this topic is not, however, a product of the feminist lobby, but rather a product of pre-existing ignorance of men's suffering. Dušan Trifunović, the founder of Men's Safety said two months ago that[10]:

> [it all starts in] the community, especially in the small communities, where the man is marked, isolated and mocked [for complaining of being a vicitm of domestic abuse]

Help for male victims as a joke
Men's suffering is invisible. So invisible that Đorđe Mišić entered into the world of helping male victims of domestic abuse via what he thought it is a joke[11]. He put up a sign "Safe house for men," rather jokingly, by his own admission, on his log cabin on the lot where he chops and sells firewood. He had no idea that so many men who suffered abuse at the hands of their wives would contact him. A few months after unwittingly opening the shelter he was saying:

> I was joking with my friends, and wrote "Safe house for men." And then abused husbands actually started coming. I am no establishment, I can't provide for anyone, but just in case, I do have five beds in the cabin.

However, as time went by, Mišić, who is himself a man who was thrown out of his own house by his wife because he lost his job, realized that there are more men like him out there. So he decided to keep the establishment from Dušan Popović street, not far from Ćele Kula.
Milan Veličković, one of the occupants of Mišić's "Safe House" told the Serbian press[12]:

> When I was fired, my wife told me "Leave, I don't need you". During the day, we chop and haul wood around here, and take breaks whenever we want. I am at peace here.

Milan's story is not uniqe, that's for sure. Đorđe Mišić was given a small interview in the press a while ago and he talked a bit more about his shelter[13]:

> It's a big pain. Who hasn't felt the female abusive hand on their skin doesn't know what it is. I first took refuge here myself from my wife, and then I and others beginning to arrive. All sorts of people come here, one even came late in the night all the wayfrom Kovin. Before that he was sleeping under a bridge, but he told me that he was better off there than anywhere near women.

Kovin is a place that it's 175 km away from Mišić's "Safe House". Also, as we can see, Đorđe Mišić is no longer joking.
Just as in the case of Men's Safety organization, the Ministry for Human Rights completely ignores Mišić, and ignores the problem that he is treating out of his own pocket while being a victim of the same problem himself. This is frustrating for Mišić:

> I am sorry I can't take better care of people. I think that our government should help. Abused women are > entitled to State care, as if domestic violence is somehow different for them. It's the same pain when a woman beats you up as well.

Instead, the media tried to portray him as a homophobic bigot because he doesn't include gays in his efforts:

> We have different needs [compared to gay people]. If they need something like this, I'm sure the state will help them. I made this place for me and those like me.

Whether you think Đorđe Mišić should include gays in his small shelter or not, the question still stands: Which one is worse? A straight man being thrown out in the street by his wife because he was fired, having his house taken away from him – then re-establishing himself financially and now aiding other men in his situation? Or the State-sponsored feminist lobby that openly claims that men are abusive maniacs and even boys over a certain age are strictly verboten in their network of shelters?

Is there any hope?

The main hope for abused men in Serbia is definitely Dušan Trifunović's organization, "Men's Safety" which in December 2013 announced plans to open a new and bigger shelter in Mladenovcu[14], a 24/7 helpline and more resources to actively seek and help more victims.

Dušan Trifunović, as a former mayor, is the kind of person who can get things done – since in Eastern Europe, having the political connections to the right people is one of the only ways to be sure that you can do something without interference.

The activity of "Men's Safety" is entirely supported by donations, and yet they have done more for the men from whom the Serbian State extracted taxes for so many years than anyone else.

Đorđe Mišić also expects his shelter to always be overcrowded in the coming years[15] and, whilst Dušan Trifunović still thinks that the State can't ignore the problem indefinitely, Mišić is already resigned to the idea that the State doesn't care, and says he'll continue to rely on the surrounding community to support his shelter.

Meanwhile, the City Hall of Belgrade just announced that it wants to modify the law to allow them to give priority in employment to women in shelters who seek a job or city government[16]. In the words of the feminist lobby: "The entirety of Belgrade must be a safe house for all these women"

Welcome to Serbia!

References:

[1] http://adamjones.freeservers.com/effacing.htm – Adam Jones, Ph.D. – Effacing the Male: Gender, Misrepresentation, and Exclusion in the Kosovo War, Published in: Transitions: The Journal of Men's Perspectives, 21: 1-3 (2001)

[2] http://www.kurir-info.rs/muska-kuca-clanak-3368 – Nebojša Vuković – Muška kuća, Published in: Kurir, 16.08.2009

[3] ibidem 2

[4] http://www.alo.rs/stari-alo/Zena_me_je_tukla_bejzbol_palicom/19440 – Žena me je tukla bejzbol palicom! (My wife beat me with a baseball bat!), Published in Alo!

[5] http://www.vesti-online.com/Vesti/Srbija/323184/Dame-biju-cime-stignu – Z. Gligorijević – Dame biju čime stignu, Published in Vesti, 23. 06. 2013

[6] ibidem 5

[7] http://www.vesti-online.com/Vesti/Srbija/364326/Sigurna-kuca-i-za-muskarce – Sigurna kuća i za muškarce, Published in Vesti, 1.12.2013

[8] ibidem 7

[9] http://www.rts.rs/page/stories/sr/story/125/Dru%C5%A1tvo/165581/Sigurna+mu%C5%A1ka+ku%C4%87a.html – Sigurna muška kuća, Published in Radio-televizija Srbije(RTS), 17.09.2009

[10] ibidem 7

[11] http://www.alo.rs/stari-alo/Iz_sale_otvorio_sigurnu_kucu_za__muskarce_a_oni_masovno_dolaze/46595 – Iz šale otvorio sigurnu kuću za muškarce, a oni masovno dolaze, Published in: Alo!

[12] ibidem 11
[13] http://www.pressonline.rs/info/politika/205577/stovariste-odbacenih-muzeva-sebi-napravili-sigurnu-kucu.html Dragana Kocić – Stovarište odbačenih muževa: Sebi napravili sigurnu kuću, Published in: Press Online RS, 26.02.2012
[14] ibidem 7
[15] ibidem 13
[16] http://www.blic.rs/Vesti/Beograd/432555/Mali-Zenama-iz-Sigurne-kuce-prioritet-u-zaposljavanju-u-gradskim-sluzbama – D. Živančević – Mali: Ženama iz Sigurne kuće prioritet u zapošljavanju u gradskim službama, Published in: Blic Online, 6.01.2014

Hannah Smith of the National Union of Students is afraid of facts and human rights

Greg Canning · 3 February 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Hannah Smith is the NSW President of National Union of Students (NUS Australia). Hannah is upset about some posters that appeared at the University of Sydney courtesy of the recently-established Men's Rights Sydney. Hannah writes:

> After talking to my housemates about it though, I realized that misogynistic "men's rights" discourses start with a whimper and not a bang. A few years ago we would've not heard of such groups on university campuses, now we have proposals for entire courses on men's rights at some universities. We have pro-life groups funded by our student unions and proposals for "men's clubs" as well. When we let MRA posters onto our campuses (even those with poorly designed webpages), we are legitimating their claims that there is a 'debate' to be had about feminism and gender equality. As women's activists, we know there is lots of debates to be had about feminism, but none of them should involve questioning the core premise; that women are fundamentally unequal in our society.
> By allowing them a place in our intellectual institutions we are detracting from the fights that need to be had and allowing ourselves to be dragged back to square one of the movement- defending its existence. The person who saw these at our uni tore them down. I will be doing the same and encouraging others to do so also. Some will disagree with this tactic because it stifles "debate" and free speech. But I know there is no debate to be had. The stats and figures speak for themselves.

The posters were apparently so absolutely vile and disgusting and caused such fear of a pending misogynistic men's rights discourse on campus that the only recourse considered by Hannah and her cronies was to tear down and deface the said posters.

Posted at around 8 pm Sunday night, a spokesperson for Men's Rights Sydney told AVFM that "by 9.30 am Monday more than half had been removed or defaced."

But Hannah's work was not yet done. Ambivalent about "wasting energy on pushing back on their feeble intrusion on our campus" when important issues like students' reproductive rights were in question, she did what students do and resorted to that citadel of wise consul, her housemates. So convinced that this could be the thin edge of the wedge Hannah penned a 344-world treatise to stop this whimper becoming a bang.

After all terrible things are happening on campuses in Australia; some "pro-life" groups are apparently being treated equally to pro-abortion groups and given a platform to speak on campus and student feminists not happy about it; equality is only championed when it suits their agenda.

Worse still, according to Hannah, some "men's clubs" and "men's rights courses" have "been proposed." Hannah gives no example of a proposed "men's club" but in relation to "men's rights courses" links to a disingenuous and misleading article in the Adelaide Advertiser by notorious feminist bigot Tory Shepherd.

Hannah's bio states that she "is failing her Political Science and Economics degree because of her passion for student unionism." I can see why. She does not seem to be particularly good at research, argumentative logic, or composition. It appears her student activism is mediocre as well if her brief article is any thing to go by.

Firstly she has does not address the message on the posters. She just give an emotional reaction to these supposedly hateful words:

"You don't fear and hate men do you?

DO YOU?

MEN'S RIGHTS ARE HUMAN RIGHTS"

Do you fear and hate men Hannah? Certainly many of your feminist icons do, and feminist dogma is based on spreading, legalising and sanctifying misandry. You probably don't hate all men, just those who dare challenge feminism and stand for gender equality for everyone, not just "equality" for women. Possibly you even like or love some men–you know, the useful idiots, male feminists?

Do you believe men have rights Hannah? Are those rights human rights? You know what human rights are, don't you Hannah? That they apply universally to all human beings?

The preamble to the Universal Declaration of Human Rights states "the advent of a world in which human beings shall enjoy freedom of speech and belief and freedom from fear and want has been proclaimed as the highest aspiration of the common people."

Do you believe men are human beings Hannah? The declaration is for *everyone. Y*ou should read it and then tell my why you object to the statement men's rights are human rights. We don't deny that women's rights are human rights.

But no, you prefer to manufacture straw men, yet are incapable of even defeating those.

Reproductive rights in Australia for women include free or Medicare-subsidised contraception (via Family Doctors and other services such as Family Planning Australia), easily available and safe Medicare-funded medical and surgical abortion up to 20 weeks of pregnancy, and after 20 weeks where medically indicated. Women have the right to give up children for adoption or for care without question or penalty, or to keep the child and claim child support even if they deny the father any opportunity to parent. What exactly else is it that you want? Legalised late term abortion, neonaticide and infanticide perhaps?

Contrast the reproductive rights afforded men in Australia in the event of an unplanned pregnancy: men only have input into the situation if the woman allows them too, and there is no guarantee that the man's wishes will be respected. Want gender equality? Then give men the same choice to opt out of fatherhood without penalty that women in Australia currently enjoy.

What's that you say? They should keep it in their pants then they won't have any problems? So true, and in an equal world woman would keep their legs closed and wouldn't have any problems either. But you would never dream of challenging women's sexual freedom by telling them that! So we don't live in an equal world do we?

"Men's Rights Courses?" Really Hannah? I'm sure you mean the Male Studies courses being offered by the University of South Australia. Very frightening stuff indeed. The first certificate is a Professional Certificate in Male Health and Male Health Promotion. Perhaps you have heard that men's life expectancy and health indicators significantly lag's women's. If you doubt it you can easily access the information from the ABS (that's the Australian Bureau of Statistics) or the AIHW (that's the Australian Institute of Health and Welfare) or even the Australian Government (that's the Government of Australia) who produced the first Australian Men's Health Policy in 2010.

I could provide you the links, but you really do need the research practice. Now given feminism is about equality I would assume you should support activities that aim to even health outcomes between men and women–yet this appears to be something you fear. We are not about making female health outcomes worse or deflecting resources from women's health that already receives a disproportionate excess government funding, it's about attempting to improve male outcomes to match the enviable ones women have achieved. You know about advocating for equality.

You say Hannah that "The stats and figures speak for themselves." Yes they do there are many stats that highlight male disadvantage. If you are unaware of them then it is simply ignorance on your part, they are freely available online and we'll also be happy to help you find them if you can't.

You "know there is no debate to be had." Sorry that is just plain wrong. A debate is being had, it is happening all around you, you may choose not to partake and pretend that it does not exist but it will not go away.

I have invited many feminists who take your stance in denying that men have legitimate issues that are worthy of addressing to debate me. All have declined. All sorts of excuses but I can't help believe that the real reason is that deep in their hearts they know that their beloved feminism is not really about gender equality, and they fear that this may be exposed.

I am happy to give you also the same opportunity: let's have a public discussion or debate. I fully expect you to decline, but the offer is sincere, so, go ahead prove me wrong: name a time and place and let's see who can put forth the best argument for equality between the sexes.

[image]
screen shot – click to see full image

Editor's note: you may also want to use Twitter to contact Hannah's NUS Women's group to ask of they support this fascistic censorship @NUSWomens. You may also want to contact The Advertiser newspaper @theTiser and ask if they still stand by Tory Shepherd's lies, or if they support the censorship being bragged about using the work of their journalists. You may also want to contact reporter Miles Kemp @bykemp at The Advertiser, who has expressed interest in men's issues in Australia. –DE Note: Nazi book-burning photo used under Creative Commons license from Wikimedia Commons.

Vigilante killing saves Canadian economy

Diana Davison and John Hembling · 4 February 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Canadian lawyer Elizabeth Sheehy lives in a country that does not employ capital punishment but, after twenty-five years of diligent work, she has found a way to get around that inconvenience with a legal backdoor. A carefully stylized form of lethal vigilante justice. Sheehy has written a book explaining to Canadian women, and their lawyers, how they can use case law and performance art to legally execute men, and simultaneously save Canadian taxpayers the expense of a costly trial.

In addition to teaching law at the University of Ottawa, Sheehy is a prominent public intellectual, legal activist, co-counsel to the Women's Legal Education and Action Fund (LEAF) and to the Elizabeth Fry Societies (CAEFS), and has a curriculum vitae impressive enough to warrant her classification as an expert in women's legal issues. Professor Elizabeth Sheehy is as mainstream and connected as it gets, and she is advocating murder.

So, why isn't the mainstream talking about State Feminism's push to legalize the murder of men by women?

The answer is simple. Journalists within our mainstream have been convinced of the expertise of this educated, connected, and sophisticated professor who has not only a long history of legal and academic success, but an agenda which she has not previously exposed to public scrutiny.

Now, after eight years of research, Elizabeth Sheehy, acclaimed professor of law, has published her masterpiece Defending Battered Women On Trial, in which she posits that women who have murdered their male partners are not only "morally just", which is a legal term describing acquittals, but that they show "moral courage".

She argues that these praiseworthy killers, should not be tried for murder in the Canadian court system, for a number of reasons, not least of which is that they are rarely convicted.

This, she claims, is evidence of public sentiment that female perpetrated murder is justifiable. What she omits to mention in this train of "reason" is that all violent crimes, committed by all people have very low rates of conviction. Feminists have frequently used these low conviction rates – narrowly examined for rape offences to claim that society condones the commission of that crime; "rape culture". Sheehy is effectively using the feminist "logic" commonly used to claim ours is a rape culture to say it is actually a murder culture. (of men, by their wives). The only difference being that rape of women is bad, and we should oppose it, whereas murder of husbands by their wives is apparently no problem. It's courageous even!

Recognizing that her conclusions are unconventional, Sheehy maintains it is simply the will of the wider population, expressed through the acquittal of female killers in Canadian criminal courts. It is not actually her own, personal opinion that female killers should be given a legal pass. It's just an opinion that no one else has ever promoted in the form of a book.

Finally, after 25 years of diligent activism and lobbying in pursuit of legally permissible husband-killing, she has pulled the curtain back to let the world see her great creation. Pieced together from ill-fitting, mismatched assertions and pseudo-logical legal loopholes, Doctor Sheehy's monster is almost ready to lurch upright, and begin terrorizing Canada's unwary citizens.

Sheehy's book argues that when a woman kills a sleeping victim, charging her with murder is "unfair", it's "arbitrary", and it fails to recognize the reality of women's lives. Also it is a waste of Canadian taxpayer dollars to prosecute.

With the book's publication and over a dozen interviews reiterating and clarifying the book's thesis, Canada's most influential and respected feminist legal scholar has been very clear about her intentions. She's not merely telling us to legalize female-committed spousal murder, but hoping to provide Canadian women a legal how-to manual.

So, why is the twenty-five year long feminist project of legalized husband killing not now a mainstream news feature, talked about by anyone besides the human rights activists on this so-called hate site?

When she is correctly accused of advocating murder, Sheehy says the motive for her book is that lawyers must provide clients with the best defence possible and women don't seem to be aware that fighting a murder charge instead of settling for manslaughter is more likely to result in acquittal. Somehow, while maintaining that the law disadvantages women, Sheehy happily reports that courts rarely convict women for murder.

But Professor Sheehy isn't just redefining words like and "unfair" and "disadvantaged", she's also redefining what it means to be an expert. In this case, it means she has a very, very, very strong opinion, while remaining largely ignorant of her own topic of specialization.

In the course of promoting her book the professor has conducted interviews and written articles, explaining and justifying her position. Having examined more than ninety cases in her research, she is an expert on domestic violence, and on spousal murder in Canada. However, when asked by the CBC, on December 19 of 2013, if the changes in law she recommends would help battered men she responded "Well I don't know. I'm not an expert in men's experience of violence at the hands of women. You'd have to find a different expert on that topic."

When asked if her recommended changes would apply to same sex couples where a woman is battered by her female partner Sheehy replied "Well, again, I'm not an expert on that."

This self-defined expert either has no knowledge of the reciprocal nature of most domestic violence common in dysfunctional relationships or she is being wilfully obtuse. It is like a biologist studying the plant ecology of a species which is codependent upon another species – but that scientist emerges from a twenty-five year career knowing nothing about that partnering plant.

It's unclear whether, in Sheehy's case she is incompetent in the field of her own expertise, or if she is simply a fraud.

On the question of why women don't leave abusive situations, Sheehy told the CBC on December 19th, 2013, that women can't leave abusive men because, upon leaving, their risk increases "nine fold". However in January she told Meghan Murphy of Feminist Current that the risk is eight fold.

On December 16th, 2013, she told the Loop that a woman is killed by an abusive partner every six days, but relaying that claim in her CBC interview it became a woman killed every four days. Over at Feminist Current it went back to every six days again.

The market for truth fluctuates on a monthly cycle.

> But probably, more importantly, it's actually quite dangerous for women to leave. And the most dangerous time, the time at which women face, ah, I think it's an eight times increase, eight-fold increase in being vulnerable to intimate femicide is within the eighteen months after a woman has left the man. So telling a woman to just leave, or expecting women to just leave, is actually putting their lives at risk, and the lives of their kids. And it is simply, um, you know, bad advice, unless the woman has had a very careful, um, risk assessment. And safety plan put in place.

Never heard of "intimate femicide" before? Neither had we.

It's another one of those social science terms that feminists made up. It describes a special kind of death. One of the pioneers of the term, Diana E.H. Russell, describes it as ""the killing of females by males because they are females." If that wasn't a cherished enough gift to the English language, they bless us with the ensuing assurance that "intimate partner femicide only accounts for 5–8% of all murders of men, disproportionately affecting women to a large extent, making it a gendered problem."

You are invited to reread the previous sentence, and check the source. Femicide: 5-8% of all murders of men. That was not a typo.

After explaining that women are safer to stay in abusive relationships and kill their partner instead of leaving, because of femicide, and reasons, Sheehy complained about accusations that she's advocating for murder. According to Sheehy, fewer men would die if they just gave women the things they need.

> Um, women also who leave face issues around custody and access with respect to their kids. We don't place control in the hands of women so they can in fact keep their children away from an abuser like this that we're talking about. So we have a problem there. You know, many battered women are mothers, and that makes them doubly vulnerable, because they cant simply escape with their children without facing sanction by the criminal justice system and family law. Then of course there are all the other problems. Access to money, social welfare. You know, long term housing. All the things that women need, if they're going to leave and > create new lives and freedom and safety.

Incidentally, as an “expert” on domestic violence, Sheehy likely knows that it is women who are the primary killers of children. Infantacide is a word specially created for women who kill babies and is given lighter sentencing than the murder charge a man would face for the same crime. Husbandicide, the female killing of men, is really just the new black. By “black” , of course, we mean nigger.
Predictably, Sheehy feigns surprise at critics who assert she is telling women it’s justified to kill men.

> But you know For those people that are very concerned that somehow I’m not doing justice to men’s lives. What I say to them is – what we need to do is invest in women’s safety, because when women are safe, are able to exit, with their children and protect their children, men do not die.

Men, do what women want, or we’ll kill you. This would be contemptuously pathetic, except for the fact that Sheehy is a veteran of twenty-five years of legal activism which has been spent changing laws in favour of her ideology. Professor Elizabeth Sheehy is the law.
To understand this as anything other than overt and flamboyant evil, it’s necessary to see Sheehy’s feminist vision of what a woman is: so weak that all the available supporting female centered infrastructure is not enough. Even though only four of the ninety-one women she studied were sent to prison for murdering their spouse, she thinks women are disadvantaged and misunderstood by the law – the law which suggests they not kill people.
Conversely, men’s human rights advocates take the view that women are competent and capable adults. Some of them even vote, obtain law degrees, and teach at major Canadian universities.
In the debate over whether Sheehy is incompetent or an outright fraud, there is a third possibility. She entered the profession of law with a malevolent intention of perverting it.

Alain Soral on Feminism

AVfM Video Source · 4 February 2014 · Archived copy · Original

A prominent leftist intellectual and film-maker in France, Alain Soral has some thoughts on feminism worth thinking about.

Ryerson President puts manners on student union

Jim Byset · 4 February 2014 · Archived copy · Original

The Canadian Association for Equality (CAFE) has become used to opposition. Since its formation they have come under sustained and unprovoked attack from those who wish to maintain control of the political gender discourse in Canada. Their opponents have ranged from bit-part, anarchist politicians to prominent feminists and, of course, ideologically driven student unions. CAFE, in insisting upon a more inclusive, civil debate, has been ridiculously labelled as a hate group. This message, however, has lost almost all traction over the last year or so; indeed it seems that only those convinced of their own ignorance still believe this sham. The overwhelming majority within the Canadian media now accept the quite obvious fact that CAFE are neither a hate group, nor composed of misogynists. And that message is spreading.

Yesterday's announcement from Ryerson University President Sheldon Levy, that the university will absorb the cost of the extra security for CAFE's upcoming event is not only extremely welcome but a recognition of CAFE's status as an organization dedicated to expanding the debate on gender issues – particularly as they pertain to men. In a statement released to the National Post, Levy described the ludicrous imposition of a "security fee" as a "barrier to freedom of expression."

Levy's announcement comes as a stinging rebuke to those within the Ryerson Student Union (RSU) who, in an act of malice designed to stifle free speech, levied the unprecedented fee on CAFE for extra security at the event. The lecture, featuring YouTube sensation Karen Straughan, is slated for February 6 and was put into jeopardy when RSU called a meeting between CAFE representatives and Ryerson security, just days away from the event. At the meeting RSU told CAFE that they believed that there was a security risk at the original venue of Mattamy Athletic Centre. Consequently, they decided to move the event to the Chang School of Continuing Education to a far smaller room – and to hand CAFE a bill for $1,600. As has been widely reported, this act was a transparent attempt to disrupt the event and cause financial damage to CAFE. Neither Ryerson nor RSU have divulged any information to the media relating to these supposed security threats.

It is clear that RSU feel that bullying and harassment are legitimate forms of direct action. However, the timing of Levy's announcement is extremely serendipitous; RSU is in the midst of annual elections and Levy's decision will act not only as a reminder to RSU as to who is really in charge at the university, but also as a stiff object lesson. Silencing those you regard as your opponents is never acceptable. Levy's remarks – that 'the cost was a barrier to freedom of expression' will no doubt anger those within the student union – but in truth, it should shame them. RSU need to reflect upon their actions. The idea that freedom of expression is a right that applies only to those with whom we agree is deranged, and ultimately dangerous not only to the reputation of Ryerson University – but also to Canadian society. It is worrying that Rajean Holiett, who has in the past made grossly inaccurate, incendiary statements regarding the MHRM, is likely to win the RSU presidential race. It was Holiett who was instrumental in denying three Ryerson students the right to form a men's issues group at Ryerson in March of last year. Holiett, speaking to Ryerson University Television (RUTV), pointedly referred to CAFE's men's group at UofT, as something he didn't want to see at Ryerson. "They, like, talk about rape in very problematic ways and blame survivors and rape victims for their raping. These are things that we didn't want to bring to our campus; I didn't think that student union resources were best spent on these kinds of conversations." If Holiett is successful in landing the top job in RSU, it is likely that Ryerson will see RSU attempt an even more draconian clampdown on free speech there.

However, with Levy's effective denouncement of RSU's anti-free speech antics and the growing recognition that CAFE and the wider MHRM are in fact legitimate, it is unlikely that Holiett et al will find a receptive audience for further repressive actions. It would be better for all involved if they simply stopped, and tried listening. It is, after all, how we learn things.

Boy-shaming "sex education" campaign planned for UK schools

Jonathan Taylor · 4 February 2014 · Archived copy · Original

We need to be careful when we start singling out only one group of people based on their genetic code and demanding that they "respect" another entire group of people. The reasoning is quite simple: it's mindlessly discriminatory. It also has the potential to turn into a condescending shamefest.

1. Not everyone in one group needs to be taught to respect others because they already do.
2. If we single out only one group to respect other groups, no one is teaching the others to respect that group.
3. Not every individual in any birthgroup is entitled to respect.

Of course, no one should disrespect someone based solely upon their being men, or women, or white, or black, and so forth. But teaching such values doesn't mean we have to single out any of those groups, either.
Which is exactly what is being advocated in the UK. From The Daily Mail:

> Teenage boys are learning about relationships through internet pornography and need to be taught about how to respect women through compulsory sex education lessons in schools, campaigners have warned.

So…only boys need to be taught to respect others?

> Boys are developing worrying sexual behaviours as a result of watching internet pornography, which is often sexually aggressive and easy to access, it has been claimed.
> The group, which includes experts from online parenting forum Mumsnet, has said education in schools could also help girls learn how to protect themselves from abuse and harassment.

Apparently boys do not need to learn how to protect themselves from abuse and harassment. Or if they do, that need is invisible to these campaigners.
Mumsnet is a parenting organization with a significant Feminist slant, by the way.

> In a letter to The Times today, the group said that one in three girls is groped or experiences unwanted advances at school.

This statistic is useless at best and dishonest at worst. How many of those "1 in 3″ are groped, as opposed to simply receiving "unwanted advances" (asked out by an unpopular guy)? One? Two? 0.00001?
For all we know, if 9,999 girls get asked out on a date by a guy they don't like and only one gets groped, these people would say "10,000 girls experience unwanted advances or are groped."
It's a classic fearmongering tactic among Feminists:

- Conflate two types of undesirable behavior, one of which is far more undesirable but also much, much rarer.
- Assign those behaviors only to men, or only refer to women as victims.

We see more fearmongering tactics here:

> Officials teaching literature for sex education lessons were last updated in 2000, and contain no mention of the internet.
> 'In an age of one-click-away violent and degrading pornography online that is becoming the default sex education for some young people, this is woefully inadequate,' the letter says.

I'm all for making education relevant to the modern age. But there are some problems here. First, violent pornography is not the "default" type of porn, let alone the default type of sex education. Second, a lot of violent porn involves violent women.

Just as these campaigners seem to assume men are never abused, apparently they also live in a fantasy world where women are never violent. I don't see any reason to encourage those in the UK to throw their hard-earned tax dollars toward a condescending male-shaming campaign.

> In September Deputy Prime Minister Nick Clegg warned sex education should include lessons in the 'menacing' impact on young girls.

Translation: teach young girls to distrust, fear, and resent boys.

> The Office of the Children's Commissioner has warned that easy access to online pornography encourages teenage boys to see girls as sex objects and to engage in risky sexual behaviour.

Do women never engage in risky sexual behavior? Do they never say "don't worry, I'm on the pill" when they are not? Do they never drink while intoxicated? Do women never deliberately manufacture themselves into sex objects to exploit the world around them? Do they never use beauty to manipulate others or ahead?
Here's a new idea: we are all responsible for the culture in which we live. Both sexes feel pressure to act certain ways, but many in either sex have also made the choice to act in those ways when it has benefited them.

> In a major report it lifted the lid on the corrosive effect of hardcore porn on children, concluding that those who access adult images and videos are more likely to lose their virginity at a younger age.
>
> There were even indications that boys who look at violent porn are more likely to become sexually aggressive.

I'd like to see these "indications," because almost all the credible studies out there demonstrate that rape has declined as porn consumption has increased. Indeed, it has actually made men less sexually aggressive and adventurous when it comes to real, live women. Feminist Naomi Wolf herself wrote an article about this.

> The study called for urgent action by ministers, schools and parents to 'develop children's resilience to pornography' after finding that a significant number have access to sexually explicit images.
>
> If children are viewing pornography at home, especially violent pornography, that is the fault the parents (or whoever is taking care of the children).
> In September Deputy Prime Minister Nick Clegg warned sex education should include lessons in the 'menacing' impact on young girls, but revealed his call for guidance to teachers to be updated for the digital age was being blocked by Education Secretary Michael Gove.

Yes: unlike what we would see in the United States, the secretary of education in the UK has the courage to question the dogma of Feminism. Well done, Mr. Grove.

> In response, Mr Gove insisted he takes the 'whole question of sex education very seriously'.
>
> Speaking at a Policy Exchange event, he added: 'We conducted a review recently of personal, social, health and economic education and one of the conclusions we drew from that is that the right thing to do it to trust teachers.

Did you see that? A politician said that we should trust teachers more than lofty and disconnected government officials. When's the last time you heard a politician say that in the U.S.?

Seeing the other side, and a brief digression

On a basic, conceptual level there is something missing from the minds of these campaigners. Are women never taught to objectify men by our culture? Are men and boys never under pressure to act a certain way to please women? Shouldn't we be including the distinctive experiences of men and boys and trying to understand them?
The reality, of course, is that women are taught through all sorts of cultural influences to regard men as their providers, and to use their beauty to attract men in order to gain access through their resources. While some men may do this, it tends to be far rarer among them.
Here's what Disney teaches young men about how to attract women. Try to find the common denominator:
[image]
Yes, men: if you ever want to attract a quality woman, you have to be rich. Preferably a good-looking man with smooth moves, but at the end of the day rich really is where it's at.
Some may say these phenomena are simply symptoms of evolutionary psychology: the philosophy that much of human behavior is influenced by millennia of humans selectively deciding with whom they will reproduce, with the overall purpose being the survival of the tribe, nation, or species.
Thus men would have more of a natural tendency to desire women who are physically beautiful because such a metric is a good index of fertility. Women, by contrast, would have a greater natural tendency to desire men who are able to provide for them when they are vulnerable during pregnancy.
If we're going to behave as though men's "base desires" are crude and unrefined,we shouldn't pretend that women don't have them as well, or that their own are somehow morally superior.

Editor's note: this item originally appeared on A Voice for Male Students. –DE

Female killers prefer gentlemen juries

Robert St. Estephe · 4 February 2014 · Archived copy · Original

The following article from 1912 is one of the more complete documents of the old established "woman's license to kill" phenomenon that plagued much of the United States, especially and most notoriously in Chicago, in the early 20th century. It was a time when there was no need for an Elizabeth Sheehy to prompt the naive chivalry of the masses into assisting every spoiled brat princess whose talent for Olympian-scale resentment-hoarding gave her license to act on impulse and expect to use her talent for story-telling, self-pity and flirtatiousness get her off scot-free.

The most notable thing about this article are the quotations collected by its industrious author, who provides us with the defendants' opinions regarding the desirability, or its reverse, of the institution of female jurists, for the purpose of overriding the chivalrous instincts of the male citizens who, in the vast majority of jurisdictions, provided the only available jury pool from which a prosecutor could select. As you will see, the accused killers had a decided preference for being judged by members of the more malleable and more pro-woman sex — the male. This period — the early 20th century — was one in which the false narrative of ubiquitous victimization of women was not prevalant but who, according to today's mythology, are always too petite, too frightened and too sensitive to initiate unwarranted violence. Indeed, it was not until the 1970s that the myth began to be promulgated that female serial killers — who had been for the preceding century been featured in newspapers regularly, numbering in the hundreds — "do not exist."

Following you will find "the mother of all "Chivalry Justice" articles."

***

[image]

FULL TEXT: State Attorney E. W. Wayman of Chicago says it is next to impossible to convict a woman of murder in Chicago courts. He made this assertion recently after a jury had returned a verdict acquitting Mrs. Minnie Bernstein of the murder of her husband, whom she was accused of having shot in their home while he was asleep.

Mr. Warren says the impossibility of convicting women is due to the fact that men jurors cannot keep sex sentiment out of any case in which a woman is defendant. It will continue to be almost impossible to convict woman of murder he says, as long as men only serve on juries. He advocates a change in the State Constitution which will make women eligible for jury service and plans to take the matter up with the legislature in Springfield next winter. Only women jurors he declares, would view a woman charged with the graver crime with impartial eyes and punish her if she were found guilty.

Thirty-eight women charged with murder have been acquitted in Chicago in the last nine years. Twenty of the women were charged with the murder of men. Only seven women arraigned for killing men have been found guilty in the same period. This in the face of the fact that many of the crimes were as deliberately premeditated as any in Chicago's history. Mr. Wayman says that if men had been arraigned for the crimes they would have been hanged in every instance.

Man's sentimental construction of the statutes is a phase of the unwritten law which has been evolved in the last decade or two. Formerly the "unwritten law" as supposed to prevail chiefly in the South. The "unwritten law" of the old South was that sentiment or tradition which held guiltless of crime the man who shot another man in defence of a woman's honor. But this latest phase of the "unwritten law" which acquits a woman charged with killing a man is as effective in the North, East and West as in the South. In short, the attitude of American men toward a woman in distress leads them everywhere to set sentiment above law.

The written law is supposed to be equal in its application to man and woman. If a man guilty of murder should be handed, a woman guilty of a crime of equal gravity should also go to the gallows. The sentimental attitude of men jurors makes of a theoretically equal law two laws in actual practice, one for man another for woman.

A feature of the modern crime situation is the increase throughout the United States of murders of men by women. scarcely a day goes by but one reads in the parlors of such a crime. The great majority of the women are acquitted. It is perhaps conservative to say that hardly one in fifty is convicted. Why there should be such an increase in crimes of this character presents an interesting psychological problem. Twenty years ago, one rarely heard of a murder committed by a woman. Now they are so common as to pass without notice unless marked by sensational features.

The increase in murders may be due, Mr. Wayman says, to woman's greater freedom, to her equal footing with man in the industrial world and to the feeling independence due to her gradual endowment with suffrage and the equal rights of citizenship. Yet he admits it may be due to none of these causes. There would seem to be some subtle connection between the increased number of such murders and the apparent immunity of the women who commit them it is logical, he suggests, to that the seeming impossibility of convicting women who kill men has had an effect upon women who have a grievance against men or who are cruelly used or who labor under a delusion of cruelty.Seven women charged with murder are now in the Chicago jail awaiting trial. How women charged with murder view State Attorney Wayman's idea of having such cases tried by women jurors was learned from these women. They were unanimously and strenuously opposed to women jurors. Here are their views:

Mrs. Louise Vermilya, accused of poisoning nine persons: "I do not believe a jury of women would do me justice. I should insist on being tried by men." [NOTE: Vermilya was a serial killer.]

Mrs. Antonio Musso, charged with killing her husband: "I was ill treated and abused, yet a jury of women would feel sorry only for my husband. Women are too emotional and sentimental to act as jurors in grave cases."

Mrs. Harriet Burnham, charged with shooting her husband to death: "Women are spiteful. They would show no mercy to a woman. They would take pleasure in convicting me."

Mrs. Louise Lindloff, indicted for seven deaths by poison: "I want justice and women have been pretty successful in getting justice from juries composed of men. I want no women to sit on the jury that tries me." [NOTE: Lindloff was a serial killer.]

Lulu Blackwell, charged with killing Charles Vaughn: "It would be foolish to consent to have a jury of women try me. I want a man's jury to sit on my case."

Margaret McCabe, charged with killing Edward Lee: "No women for me. If the State's Attorney wants women juries, that is reason enough why I should not want them."

Elizabeth Buchanan, charged with the killing of Josephine Rice: "I would never consent to be tried by women, I should say not. I feel that I could only get justice from men."

[image]

"It is practically impossible to convict a woman of the murder of a man nowadays in Chicago," said State Attorney Wayman. "The Bernstein murder was one of the ugliest cases that ever came under my knowledge as a lawyer."

"Mrs. Bernstein shot and killed her husband while he lay asleep in bed. The evidence was that she had planned the murder for several day. She previously had been separated from her husband."

“The motive for the killing was not definitely established. The theory of the State was that she shot him to prevent him from leaving her again, as he had threatened to do. It may have been that she shot him out of revenge for his having left her and because she hated him. There was evidently much bitter hatred behind the killing.”
“The defence did not deny that she shot her husband while he was asleep. The fact of the actual killing under such cowardly and atrocious circumstances was at no time controverted. The defence pleaded in extenuation what is called furore transitoria, which is another term for temporary insanity. It declared that the insanity and the killing grew out the fact that Bernstein was cruel to his wife and planned to make a ‘white slave’ of her and live upon the earnings.” [NOTE: This is virtually identical to the “battered-wife syndrome” defense, invented in the 1980s.]
“There was really no ground for believing that he had planned anything of the sort. He was a quiet, mild, inoffensive man. Moreover, the State knocked out the insanity plea altogether and the trial Judge omitted giving any instructions on the point. The entire evidence of marked the murder as a carefully premeditated crime without palliating circumstances. If ever a murder deserved to be expiated on the gallows this was one. If a man had committed the crime any jury in the world would have sentenced him to death.”
“Yet the jury acquitted Mrs. Bernstein and in discussing the verdict declared that it was based on the belief that the woman was insane when she killed her husband. The jury had a right to do this, and it is the judge of the facts, but there was absolutely no evidence to bolster the theory of insanity and the theory was purely an idea of the jury’s.”
“In acquitting Mrs. Bernstein the jury gave a typical illustration of the attitude of Chicago juries toward women charged with murder. Mrs. Bernstein is not pretty, yet in her widow’s weeds there was much in her appearance, much that would appeal to any man of susceptible and sensitive nature and tender heart.”
[image]
“She was a sufficiently clever actress, too, to make the most of her looks and dramatic possibilities of her situation. With her pallid face and dark eyes she looked wistful, helpless and appealing. At times she wept into a dainty lace handkerchief – this is a fetching trick of women defendants – and again she bowed her head upon her arms upon the table while her shoulders shook with sobs.”
“Sitting there in her neat black clothes and her trim bonnet, she looked so like ordinary women, so like sisters and wives of the jurors, that the jury found it to believe this woman had committed murder. The jurymen knew many women and best of all the women of their own home. These women they knew as good, kind hearted, sympathetic, ministering to their men folks, bearing domestic burdens patiently, making their homes cheerful and happy.”
None of the women the jurors knew, none who ever had come within their personal experience, knew anything of crime. And, as I say, in all outward appearance this woman who had shot her husband while he lay asleep was exactly like these good women whom the jurors had known all their lives. A consequent association of ideas was inevitable.”
“The ordinary man such as a juror finds it difficult to differentiate between an exceptional and abnormal woman, as most murderesses are, and the everyday woman he has known since he was a boy. When a woman appears for trial before him, straightway in his own mind he manufactures some extenuating circumstances, some excuse to account for her of the murder.”
“He feels sure that this woman who looks so much like the women of his own family must have been abused and hounded and driven insane by the cruelty of the man she killed. So in almost all cases the juror, unsophisticated in the subtle psychology of the woman criminal, has made up his mind long before he retires to the jury room that the woman on trial committed her crime during some violent brain storm that rendered her irresponsible.”
“Is it necessary for a woman to be pretty to insure a verdict of not guilty? Mr. Wayman was asked.
“Not at all,” he answered. “More homely women are freed of murder charges than pretty women. This is due to the fact that more homely ones are placed on trial. But there have been some extremely pretty women tried for murder in Chicago, and some of the prettiest of them were charged with the most fiendish murders.”
“One of the women, who, I am convinced was guilty of an atrocious crime, was a beauty of the type that suggests innocence and purity. Her eyes were a baby blue, her brow was as smooth as a Madonna’s, her mouth was a Cupid’s bow curved in a perpetual smile, while her skin was as soft and delicately tinted as a healthy child’s.
“It goes without saying she was acquitted. A jury probably could not have been found in the entire nation that would have convicted this beautiful creature. But it is not necessary for a woman to be pretty. All that is necessary is for her to be a woman. A jury of men will do the rest."

"A woman's crime as a rule exhibits a far greater degree of moral turpitude than a man's. Few murders by women are the result of impulse. They are marked by premeditation, cunning, cruelty and cold blooded diablerie. For the most part the crimes of women have these characteristics in common."
"Women usually take their victim unawares. Many of their victims are killed while asleep. The saving clause for the woman in most cases is that the murder is committed without eye witnesses. Usually the woman and her victim are alone when the murder occurs. This invariably is the result of the woman's cunning plan. It enables her in court to tell whatever story she chooses and there is no one to contradict her. The charge of murder stands on purely circumstantial grounds."
"In cases in which there have been no eye witnesses it is not difficult to formulate an effective defence [sic]. Even if there are grave reasons for disbelieving the woman when she goes upon the witness stand and with affectively sad countenance and crocodile tears tells the jury her carefully concocted tale with all a woman's natural histrionic art – and they are all actresses – the jury will believe her in nine cases out of ten, no matter how strong the evidence introduced by the State.
"Here is another point to be noted in woman murderers. Having killed a man in cold blood they never hesitate to blacken their victim's reputation to clear themselves, and to do this they lie without scruple. The man may have been a square and honorable fellow. He may never have laid his hands upon her. Yet she invariably accuses him after he laid in his grave of revolting conduct or savage cruelty.
"Always when she does not deny the killing or make it out a suicide or accident she tells a story of having been driven temporarily crazy by the man's inhuman treatment. When a woman, sometimes fragile, always weak and always helpless looking, tells between heart-broken throbs a story of abuse so cruel that it wrecked her reason where is the jury that will not believe her?"
"Jurors, being ordinary men, read a woman's character through their eyes. If she looks like an ordinary woman they rate her as an ordinary woman. If she is pretty they are sure she is not guilty. If she has a certain motherliness they know her to be innocent. The most eloquent prosecuting attorney – and the prosecutor in such cases is usually as popular as the villain in a play – could not make them believe that the face of a saint sometimes hides the heart of a fiend.
"The long and short of the proposition is that man to-day no more understands a woman's mental processes than he did in the dim days when he dwelt in a cave. A man does not understand a normal woman's processes. When it comes to dealing with the mental processes of an abnormal woman he is a rudderless bark on an uncharted sea drifting helplessly and hopelessly. The criminal woman may have all soft and feminine graces and yet be hard, cold, treacherous, unscrupulous, merciless and a genius in deceit. Yet it is always difficult if not impossible to give a jury an adequate idea of her true character."
[image]
"There is but one remedy, flint is, to give women the right to serve on juries. Only a woman can understand a woman. Only a woman would be uninfluenced by sentiment. Only a woman would punish n woman guilty or murder. Only a woman would vote to send such a woman to the penitentiary or the gallows. Only a woman would construe the law impartially where a woman was concerned. A jury of women would look upon a woman criminal with cold, sexless, unsentimental eyes and return a verdict in accordance with the merits of the case."
"The Bernstein verdict, which was one of the most flagrant miscarriages of justice I ever knew, determined me to go before the next Illinois Legislature and endeavor to have the Constitution of the State amended so that a proposition providing for woman suffrage will be put at once before the people. Only by making women citizens and giving them the right to vote can they be made eligible for jury service. I hope to see the day when women will serve on juries. Then only can we expect to obtain justice against criminal and murderous women in our courts."
Some of the cases in Chicago in which women have been charged with the murder of men have been the most sensational in the criminal history of the city. Mrs. Rena B. Morrow, a poetess and writer, was acquitted only a few weeks ago of the murder of her husband in their home in the fashionable Hyde Park district.
Mr. Morrow, an inventor and business man, was found dead on a back porch with two bullets through his body, one of which had gone into the floor, proving that it had been fired after he had fallen. Either bullet, the doctors said, would have proved fatal instantly, which eliminated the idea that Mr. Morrow had committed suicide, because if he had fired the first shot he could not have fired the second.

The State showed that the couple were estranged and had been heard in a violent quarrel on the night or Mr. Morrow's death. Its evidence was considered unusually strong. The defence was that Morrow had killed himself or had been by burglars. Mrs. Morrow, who was very pretty, was acquitted.
The killing of Webster Guerin by Mrs. Dora McDonald was another celebrated case. Mrs. McDonald was the handsome wife of Michael McDonald, who had made a large fortune as a gambler in Chicago's early days. McDonald was an old man and an indulgent husband. Mrs. McDonald and Guerin, a handsome young fellow, little more than a boy, had long carried a clandestine love affair. It was brought out that Mrs. McDonald had given the boy much money.
One day she visited Guerin in his office in a downtown skyscraper. While they were together Guerin was shot an instantly killed. The defence was that he had shot himself in a scuffle while attempting to pistol Mrs. McDonald. The State showed that Guerin was about to break off relations with the woman and went upon the theory that she killed him because of his prospective desertion. Mrs. McDonald was acquitted. Her husband later died of what was called a broken heart. There is no doubt that the tragedy in which his wife had figured hastened his end.
Lucille McLeod, a girl still in her teens, killed William Nieman, Jr., in a downtown hotel. The two had been sweethearts and it was said that the young man had refused keep a promise of marrying and was about to marry another woman. When the door to the hotel apartment was broken open the man was dead and the girl lay seriously wounded beside him. After a long illness she recovered. At her trial she declared the man had done the shooting. There were no witnesses to the tragedy. The jury believed her story and set her free.
Mrs. Minnie Williams was the wife of a street car motorman. The couple lived in a second story flat on the North Side. Williams had an insurance of several thousand dollars on his life and his wife, who was fifteen years his junior, had a lover. While Mrs. Williams was working away from home as a nurse her husband was found dead in his bed in a gas filled room off the kitchen. The Coroner returned a verdict of suicide.
The dead man's brother had the case reopened. It was shown that Williams was a born optimist and had no motive for killing himself. When he retired on the fatal night he left his clothes hanging by the base burner to dry and had set the kitchen table as if in preparation for a hasty breakfast the next morning. An alarm clock set to ring at his usual hour of rising was on a chair beside his pillow.
In addition to these evidences to disprove suicide, the gas jet over his bed was not turned on. The gas which had suffocated him had poured from the hanging kitchen jet and the jets of the cooking range, all of which were on full. Williams evidently had been murdered by some one who had slipped into the flat and turned on the gas of the kitchen, allowing it to flow into the adjoining sleeping room. The murderer evidently had been afraid to enter the room where Williams slept to turn on the gas there for fear of waking him.
The State proved that on the fatal night Mrs. Williams had been seen within few doors of the flat and going toward it and a little later had been seen going away from it. But no evidence was obtainable to show that any one had seen her enter the flat or leave it. There was missing link in the evidence that could not be supplied.
The defence admitted that Williams' death was murder, but did not attempt to explain it. It merely denied that Mrs. William had had anything to do with it. Mrs. Williams was acquitted.
[image]
Mrs. Jane Quinn was arraigned a few weeks ago for killing her third husband. Two former husbands, heavily insured, had died under mysterious circumstances. The third Mr. Quinn was shot while he was asleep in his bed. The revolver with which he was killed was found hidden under the bathtub. It had been stolen from one of Mrs. Quinn's boarders. Mrs. Quinn said her husband had been killed by a burglar. His life was insured. Mrs. Quinn was found not guilty.
Mrs. Louise Vermilya was charged with committing a series of nine murders by poison. If the charge were true, they would indicate that the woman poisoned for the love of poisoning, though in some of the deaths, insurance might have supplied a motive.
The death that brought the hand of the law upon her was that of Policeman Arthur Bisonette, who roomed at her home. Her arraignment for the Bisonette murder resulted in a mistrial, the jury being unable to agree. She is to be tried a second time for the murder of Richard T. Smith.

Estelle Stout, a girl of eighteen, shot and killed Henry Hornberger, an agent for a picture frame concern. He had brought a picture frame to the young woman's flat. There was a dispute over the pay and Miss Stout shot him. It was not denied in court that she killed the man. Her defence was that he had acted in a threatening way. The jury was out only a short time and brought in a verdict of acquittal.
In every instance in Chicago courts in which women charged with murder were acquitted strong cases of circumstantial evidence were made out by the State. In every instance the defence rested chiefly on the woman's own story. This was often weak and sometimes flimsy. Several times the presiding Judge scored the jury for its verdict. Frequently the acquittal of the woman was plainly a miscarriage of justice. An illuminating fact is that one young woman tried for murder became afterward addicted to drink and was known to boast that she was guilty of the crime of which a chivalrous jury found her innocent.
["Women Jurors Needed To Try Women For Murder – Men Too Chivalrous to Convict Even in Cases of Guilt, Says State Attorney Wayman of Chicago – Thirty-Eight Women Accused of murder Acquitted There in the Last Nine Years and Only Seven Found Guilty," The Sun (New York, N.Y.), Sep. 8, 1912, Magazine section (Sec. 4), p. 13; Note: The spelling "defence" appears in the original source.]
***

Featured image: Edvard Munch, "The Murderess," 1906, The Munch Museum, Oslo, wikipaintings.org

End of Whom You Say?

Paul Elam · 5 February 2014 · Archived copy · Original

It has been the subject of widespread speculation, mostly by women, since Hanna Rosin penned her opus to the decline and fall of the modern male, The End of Men. And at times it would appear to have merit, given the lack many men tapping Hanna on the shoulder and saying something like, "Unlike your husband, David Plotz, I still have a pulse and an opinion on the matter."

This set me to thinking, which admittedly can be a dicey proposition, about whether this is indeed the End of Men, especially since so many of them haven't noticed that they have been given their notice.

Typical male that I am, desperately clinging to my white male privilege, I decided to come up with a list of five reasons why we know this is not the End of Men. I mean, aside from the several odd billion of them that are still taking up room on the planet. Feel free to add to the list. That is, if you are silly enough to think your opinion still matters.

Top Five Reasons We Know That This Is Not The End Of Men:

5. You are reading this. Unless someone handed this to you on a piece of papyrus, inked with a mixture of lampblack and gum, then the only way you are going to know this is not the End of Men is because men envisioned, designed and created the technology that women like Rosin use, without understanding, to tell you that the men don't fit in the modern scheme of things. Oh, the papyrus, lampblack and gum? Pretty sure that was men, too, but who's counting?

4. You are reading this with the lights on. Of course, men discovered, then figured out how to produce, store and distribute electricity, but that was a long time ago. We got bored and moved on to other things like how to produce, store and distribute electricity to billions of people so that it brings light and runs tens of thousands of different appliances that men conceived, designed, invented, produced and placed in hundreds of millions of homes, largely for the convenience of women whose understanding of how they got there is limited to "amazon.com." That too, by the way, was invented by men.

3. You are not up to your knees in shit. There is a secret world under cities; one of endless pipes, tanks, pumps, drainfields and the like. It is why we can have good, clean water coming into our homes, and the really yucky stuff just sort of goes away, courtesy of the men that conceived, designed, built and maintain these systems right under our noses. Yes, they actually need to be maintained. I don't mean that someone needs to come round once a month and read a meter. I mean that the entire water delivery and sewage infrastructures have to be regularly inspected, repaired, updated and improved. It is really nasty, arduous and often dangerous work, and it is done almost exclusively by men. If that were not happening, we would all be constantly be foraging for water, at least until we caught something and died.

2. Hanna Rosin has the right to say this is the End of Men. It is still the dark ages in some parts of the world, but where free speech flourishes, so do stupid ideas. We get to blame men for that, too, since they conceived of, fought for and died protecting the idea of freedom of speech to begin with. They are still the ones maintaining it with their lives, by the way, despite the fatuous claims of Pentagon and Pandagon.

I know, free speech is not always what it should be, and it has perhaps some unintended consequences. For instance, we live in a culture now governed by a patriarchy made up of mostly white males who rule over women and mercilessly rig the game to men's advantage, and at the same time men are obsolete, finished, kaput and otherwise Ended. All of this is pretty much according to the same people talking first out of one side of their mouth, the out of the other, to a population of people who nod like bobble-head dolls to both versions of reality. It is pathetic, indeed embarrassing, but bad ideas are still better than no ideas (in most cases). I am betting the architects of freedom, men by the way, would agree with this, even if reluctantly.

And the number one reason why we know this is not the End of Men?

It is precisely because most of them can't and won't be bothered to say squat to Hanna Rosin. Oh, there are always guys like me, writers who like saying squat to people like Hanna Rosin. But for the most part today's man is busy doing one of two things. He is either busy with his daily life, irrefutably proving that any notion of the End of Men is retarded, by doing things like maintaining the world and everything in it. Or, he is busy being as oblivious to the inner workings of human survival as Hanna Rosin — and not giving a damn what she thinks.

To be even more frank, a lot of the latter group are starting to take a look at what modern women have become and figuring out that Hanna Rosin and women like her can be replaced with a dishwasher, a Panini press and a fleshlight – all on the cheap due to the ingenuity of men.

End of whom?

It is not men. Men are doing pretty much the same thing they have done since they invented cuneiform, figured out that 2 + 2 = 4 and accepted that civilization often means brutal sacrifice – from them. In fact, scarcely a thing has changed in the world of men except that they have improved the world to the point that more of them can stay as unblemished and leisurely as most women.

But what of the world of women? The real world of women. Well, that has changed drastically. It has become a ruse to imitate being in the world of men. We have raised two full generations of paper pushers and phone answering commuters who are still loathe to get their hands dirty (while demanding equal pay), and a gaggle of really obnoxious social commentators to tell us that all this means that men are being replaced.

It is not deceit. It is ignorance. How can you know that men are still here and still, I mean this literally, running the world, when you don't have a freaking clue how the world is actually run?

It is easy enough to see. If you have never been behind the wheel of a semi, blistered your hands for a living, walked into a burning building, or fought back your gag reflex as you wade through human filth to put bread on the table and ensure that disease does not spread through your community, then it might be easy to start thinking the world really runs on smart phones, word processing programs and lunch break at the food court.

Now, of course there are a very small number of women who actually have ventured into the world of men, outside that of the corner office. But you can bet they are not the ones talking about how irrelevant men have become. They are too busy actually being like men to give two shakes about the likes of Hanna Rosin.

Bless Hanna's pointed little head. I would normally give her an "E" (well, maybe lower case) for effort. It is understandably easy to see all the women who dominate the labor force's soft spots and to think that is the world. You can't know what you never see. But Hanna had to have seen something when she grew up in Queens with a father who drove cab for a living.

Or maybe she didn't see him either.

Still, one has to think that she might pause someday to recognize that when she turns the heat on that there are not magic "heat bunnies" pushing warm air into her Manhattan apartment, and that clean water actually does not originate in her tap.

It's men, Hanna. Always was. And the end of them is the end of you.

2014 Men on strike: Helen Smith interviewed by Forbes' Jerry Bowyer

AVfM Video Source · 6 February 2014 · Archived copy · Original

More from Jerry Bowyer on the topic on Forbes.
If you have not bought Men On Strike yet, you probably should.

"My Lie: A True Story of False Memory"

AVfM Video Source · 6 February 2014 · Archived copy · Original

We have not read this book, although the reviews on Amazon look mixed but overall quite good.

Those who say lying about these things is extraordinarily rare have a lot to answer for in the way that they have manipulated others into, and outright encouraging, lying. We hope one day they are called to account.

Sentimental feminism vs. political feminism

Ernest Belfort Bax · 6 February 2014 · Archived copy · Original

In the following quotes Bax describes 'Sentimental Feminism' and 'Political Feminism', a distinction having striking similarities to Naomi Wolf's 'Victim Feminism' and 'Power Feminism' (coined 80 years after Bax). The main difference is that where Wolf sees Power Feminism as positive and Victim Feminism as negative, Bax described, convincingly, that both polarities of feminism acted corruptly. – PW

[image]

Ernest Belfort Bax – FTSU personified

"Modern Feminism rose slowly above the horizon. Modern Feminism has two distinct sides to it: (1) an articulate political and economic side embracing demands for so-called rights; and (2) a sentimental side which insists in an accentuation of the privileges and immunities which have grown up, not articulately or as the result of definite demands, but as the consequence of sentimental pleading in particular cases. In this way, however, a public opinion became established, finding expression in a sex favouritism in the law and even still more in its administration, in favour of women as against men.

These two sides of Modern Feminism are not necessarily combined in the same person. One may, for example, find opponents of female suffrage who are strong advocates of sentimental favouritism towards women in matters of law and its administration. On the other hand you may find, though this is more rare, strong advocates of political and other rights for the female sex, who sincerely deprecate the present inequality of the law in favour of women. As a rule, however, the two sides go together, the vast bulk of the advocates of "Women's Rights" being equally keen on the retention and extension of women's privileges. Indeed, it would seem as though the main object of the bulk of the advocates of the "Woman's Movement" was to convert the female sex into the position of a dominant sexe noblesse. The two sides of Feminism have advanced hand in hand for the last two generations, though it was the purely sentimental side that first appeared as a factor in public opinion."

The Fraud of Feminism – Chapter I: Historical (1913)

"Up to this time (the close of the eighteenth century) no advance whatever had been made by legislation in recognising the modern theory of sex quality. The claims of women and their apologists for entering upon the functions of men, political, social or otherwise, although put forward from time to time by isolated individuals, received little countenance from public opinion, and still less from the law. What I have called, however, the sentimental aspect of Modern Feminism undoubtedly did make some headway in public opinion by the end of the eighteenth century, and grew in volume during the early years of the nineteenth century. It effectuated in the Act passed in 1820 by the English Parliament abolishing the punishment of flogging for female criminals. This was the first beginning of the differentiation of the sexes in the matter of the criminal law. The parliamentary debate on the Bill in question shows clearly enough the power that Sentimental [1] Feminism had acquired in public opinion in the course of a generation, for no proposal was made at the same time to abolish the punishment of flogging so far as men were concerned. Up to this time the criminal law of England, as of other countries, made no distinction whatever between the sexes in the matter of crime and punishment, or at least no distinction based on the principle or sentiment of sex privilege. (A slight exception might be made, perhaps, in the crime of "petty treason," which distinguished the murder of a husband by his wife from other cases of homicide.) But from this time forward, legislation and administration have diverged farther and farther from the principle of sex equality in this connection in favour of female immunity, the result being that at the present day, assuming the punishment meted out to the woman for a given crime to represent a normal penalty, the man receives an additional increment over and above that accorded to the crime, for the offence of having been born a man and not a woman.…

[1] I should explain that I attach a distinct meaning to the word sentimental; as used by me it does not signify, as it does with most people, an excess of sentiment over and above what I feel myself, but a sentiment unequally distributed. As used in this sense, the repulsion to the flogging of women while no repulsion is felt to the flogging of men is sentimentalism pure and simple. On the other hand the objection to flogging altogether as punishment for men or women could not be described as sentimentalism, whatever else it might be. In the same way the anti-vivisectionist's aversion to "physiological" experiments on animals, if confined to household pets and not extended to other animals, might be justly described as sentimentalism; but one who objected to such experiments on all animals, no matter whether one agreed with his point of view or not, could not be justly charged with sentimentalism (or at least, not unless, while objecting to vivisection, he or she were prepared to condone other acts involving an equal amount of cruelty to animals)."

The Fraud of Feminism – Chapter I: Historical (1913)

"The basis of this side of Feminism is a sentimentalism – i.e. an unequally distributed sentiment in favour of women, traditional and acquired. It is seldom even attempted to base this sentimental claim for women on argument at all. The utmost attempts in this direction amount to vague references to physical weakness, and to the claim for special consideration deriving from the old theory of the mental and moral weakness of the female sex, so strenuously combated as out of date, when the first side of Modern Feminism is being contended for. The more or less inchoate assumptions of the second or sentimental side of the modern "Woman's Movement" amounts practically, as already stated, to a claim for women to be allowed to commit crimes without incurring the penalties imposed by the law for similar crimes when committed by men. It should be noted that in practice the most strenuous advocates of the positive and articulate side of Feminism are also the sincerest upholders of the unsubstantial and inarticulate assumptions of the sentimental side of the same creed. This is noticeable whenever a woman is found guilty of a particularly atrocious crime. It is somewhat rare for women to be convicted of such crimes at all, since the influence of sentimental Feminism with judges and juries is sufficient to procure an acquittal, no matter how conclusive the evidence to the contrary."
The Fraud of Feminism – Chapter II: The Main Dogma of Modern Feminism (1913)

"We have already pointed out that Modern Feminism has two sides or aspects. The first formulates definite political, juridical and economic demands on the grounds of justice, equity, equality and so forth, as general principles; the second does not formulate in so many words definite demands as general principles, but seems to exploit the traditional notions of chivalry based on male sex sentiment, in favour of according women special privileges on the ground of their sex, in the law, and still more in the administration of the law. For the sake of brevity we call the first Political Feminism, for, although its demands are not confined to the political sphere, it is first and foremost a political movement, and its typical claim at the present time, the Franchise, is a purely political one; and the second Sentimental Feminism, inasmuch as it commonly does not profess to be based on any general principle whatever, whether of equity or otherwise, but relies exclusively on the traditional and conventional sex sentiment of Man towards Woman. It may be here premised that most Political Feminists, however much they may refuse to admit it, are at heart also Sentimental Feminists. Sentimental Feminists, on the other hand, are not invariably Political Feminists, although the majority of them undoubtedly are so to a greater or lesser extent. Logically, as we shall have occasion to insist upon later on, the principles professedly at the root of Political Feminism are in flagrant contradiction with any that can justify Sentimental Feminism."
The Fraud of Feminism – Chapter III: The Anti-Man Crusade (1913)

"While what we have termed Political Feminism vehemently asserts its favourite dogma, the intellectual and moral equality of the sexes – that the woman is as good as the man if not better – Sentimental Feminism as vehemently seeks to exonerate every female criminal, and protests against any punishment being meted out to her approaching in severity that which would be awarded a man in a similar case. It does so on grounds which presuppose the old theory of the immeasurable inferiority, mental and moral, of woman, which are so indignantly spurned by every Political Feminist – i.e. in his or her capacity as such. We might suppose, therefore, that Political Feminism, with its theory of sex equality based on the assumption of equal sex capacity, would be in strong opposition in this matter with Sentimental Feminism, which seeks, as its name implies, to attenuate female responsibility on grounds which are not distinguishable from the old-fashioned assumption of inferiority. But does Political Feminism consistently adopt this logical position? Not one whit. It is quite true that some Feminists, when hard pressed, may grudgingly concede the untenability on rational grounds of the Sentimental Feminists' claims. But taken as a whole, and in their practical dealings, the Political Feminists are in accord with the Sentimental Feminists in claiming female immunity on the ground of sex. This is shown in every case where a female criminal receives more than a nominal sentence."

The Fraud of Feminism – Chapter IV: Always the "Injured Innocent"! (1913)

"Chivalry to-day means the woman, right or wrong, just as patriotism to-day means "my country right or wrong." In other words, chivalry to-day is only another name for Sentimental Feminism. Every outrageous pretension Of Sentimental Feminism can be justified by the appeal to chivalry, which amounts (to use the German expression) to an appeal from Pontius to Pilate. This Sentimental Feminism commonly called chivalry is sometimes impudently dubbed by its votaries, "manliness." It will presumably continue in its practical effects until a sufficient minority of sensible men will have the moral courage to beard a Feminist public opinion and shed a little of this sort of "manliness." The plucky Welshmen at Llandystwmdwy in their dealings with the suffragette rowdies on memorable occasion showed themselves capable of doing this. In fact one good effect generally of militant suffragetteism seems to be the weakening of the notion of chivalry – i.e. in its modern sense of Sentimental Feminism – amongst the populace of this country.

The combination of Sentimental Feminism with its invocation of the old-world sentiment of chivalry which was based essentially on the assumption of the mental, moral and physical inferiority of woman to man, for its justification, with the pretensions of modern Political Feminism, is simply grotesque in its inconsistent absurdity. In this way Modern Feminism would fain achieve the feat of eating its cake and having it too. When political and economic rights are in question, bien entendu, such as involve gain and social standing, the assumption of inferiority magically disappears before the strident assertion of the dogma of the equality of woman with man – her mental and moral equality certainly! When, however, the question is of a different character – for example, for the relieving of some vile female criminal of the penalty of her misdeeds-then Sentimental Feminism comes into play, then the whole plaidoyer is based on the chivalric sentiment of deference and consideration for poor, weak woman."

The Fraud of Feminism – Chapter V: The "Chivalry" Fake (1913)

"Chivalry, as understood by Modern Sentimental Feminism, means unlimited licence for women in their relations with men, and unlimited coercion for men in their relations with women. To men all duties and no rights, to women all rights and no duties, is the basic principle underlying Modern Feminism, Suffragism, and the bastard chivalry it is so fond of invoking. The most insistent female shrieker for equality between the sexes among Political Feminists, it is interesting to observe, will, in most cases, on occasion be found an equally insistent advocate of the claims of Sentimental Feminism, based on modern metamorphosed notions of chivalry. It never seems to strike anyone that the muscular weakness of woman has been forged by Modern Feminists into an abominable weapon of tyranny. Under cover of the notion of chivalry, as understood by Modern Feminism, Political and Sentimental Feminists alike would deprive men of the most elementary rights of self-defence against women and would exonerate the latter practically from all punishment for the most dastardly crimes against men. They know they can rely upon the support of the sentimental section of public opinion with some such parrot cry of' "What! Hit a woman!"

Why not, if she molests you?

"Treat a woman in this way!" "Shame!" responds automatically the crowd of Sentimental Feminist idiots, oblivious of the fact that the real shame lies in their endorsement of an iniquitous sex privilege. If the same crowd were prepared to condemn any special form of punishment or mode of treatment as inhumane for both sexes alike, there would, of course, be nothing to be said. But it is not so. The most savage cruelty and vindictive animosity towards men leaves them comparatively cold, at most evoking a mild remonstrance as against the inflated manifestation of sentimental horror and frothy indignation produced by any slight hardship inflicted by way of punishment (let us say) on a female offender."

The Fraud of Feminism – Chapter VII: The Psychology of the Movement (1913)

"In the foregoing pages we have endeavoured to trace some of the leading strands of thought going to make up the Modern Feminist Movement. Sentimental Feminism clearly has its roots in sexual feeling, and in the tradition of chivalry, albeit the notion of chivalry has essentially changed in the course of its evolution. For the rest, Sentimental Feminism, with its double character of man-antipathy and woman-sympathy, as we see it to-day, has assumed the character of one of those psychopathic social phenomena which have so often recurred in history. It can only be explained, like the latter, as an hypnotic wave passing over society.
As for Political Feminism, we have shown that this largely has its root in a fallacious application of the notion of democracy, partaking largely of the logical fallacy known technically as a dicto secundum quid ad dictum simpliciter. This logical fallacy of Political Feminism is, of course, reinforced and urged forward by Sentimental Feminism. As coming under the head of the psychology of the movement, we have also called attention to some curious phenomena of logical imbecility, noticeable in the utterances of educated women in the suffragette agitation."
The Fraud of Feminism – Chapter VII: The Psychology of the Movement (1913)

Source: Ernest Belfort Bax: Father of the Men's Rights Movement

Face of German feminism loses face

Jon Gunnarsson · 6 February 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Alice Schwarzer has a problem. For decades, she's been the ugly face of German feminism. No other feminist in Germany comes anywhere close to her notoriety and she has single-handedly done more to discredit feminism than any MRA could ever hope to. If she didn't exist, we would have to invent her as a textbook example of everything that's wrong with her hateful ideology. She seems to be the bodily incarnation of all negative stereotypes about feminists: her rather unflattering and androgynous appearance, her outspoken opposition to heterosexuality, her hostility toward pornography and prostitution, and her thinly-disguised contempt for men. Presumably, she also has hairy legs, though I haven't verified this (nor do I wish to do so).

But all this is not Schwarzer's problem. Despite these obnoxious attributes, she has attained fame and fortune as the undisputed spokeswoman of German feminism. Wherever there is some discussion even tangentially related to women's issues, Schwarzer is invited onto every talk show or televised discussion to spout her toxic opinions. She has received several important awards, including the Bundesverdienstkreuz (Cross of Merit, first class) and she was made a Knight of the French Légion d'honneur, a rare honour for people who are neither French citizens nor residents of France.

But now, Schwarzer's reputation is finally unravelling after Der Spiegel revealed last Sunday that Schwarzer had had a substantial amount of money on a Swiss bank account for decades and didn't pay taxes on the interest which accumulated there.[1] According to German law, its possible to avoid criminal persecution for tax evasion by confessing (before an investigation has been started) and paying back the taxes owed. This is what Schwarzer did last year, after many wealthy Germans were found to be guilty of tax evasion through Swiss bank accounts. She paid €200.000 in back taxes, interest, and fines for the last ten years and nothing for the preceding years, which fall under the statute of limitation. This means that she still got to keep much more of her money than if she'd paid taxes from the start.

For this, she has been crucified all over the mainstream media. The political magazine Cicero went so far as to call her the "Erich Honecker of feminism" (Honecker was the socialist dictator of East Germany). Even members of the arch-feminist Green Party are attacking her now.[2] The general population is similarly outraged; hardly anyone is still willing to defend Schwarzer. There's even a petition for her to return her Bundesverdienstkreuz, which already has 6,000 supporters.

Though I have nothing but contempt for Schwarzer, I do not share this outrage. Of all the horrible things Alice Schwarzer has done over her long career, tax evasion, to me, is by far the least objectionable. She has demonized men and male sexuality. She's campaigning to get prostitution banned. She praised Valerie Solana's SCUM Manifesto for having the courage to openly express hatred of men. She cheered on Lorena Bobbitt, who cut off her sleeping husband's penis. She persistently refused to engage in civil debate with her critics and instead resorted to smear campaigns and name-calling. For a perfect example of this, consider her 1975 televised debate with Esther Vilar (author of The Manipulated Man) in which, as one of many insults, she called her opponent "not only a sexist, but also a fascist." Compared to all that, trying to keep more of her own money seems quite harmless to me.

So even though Schwarzer is now publicly condemned for what I regard as the wrong reasons, I'm not going to look a gift horse in the mouth. Especially not considering that Schwarzer has long profited from taxpayer money being funnelled into her own projects. Moreover, the whole way Schwarzer is handling this scandal is disgraceful. In an article on her website she admitted to having acted wrongly, but simultaneously attacked Spiegel for revealing her tax evasion, calling these revelations illegal and unethical. Of course Schwarzer is quite happy to enjoy freedom of speech when it comes to spewing her hateful propaganda, but when used to tell the truth about her, it suddenly becomes "character assassination." On top of that, she seems to have developed an absurd persecution complex, speculating about political reasons for damaging her reputation. While Schwarzer has certainly earned the enmity of many people, the far more likely explanation for this revelation is that it's a really juicy story. When a prominent person who was always quick to condemn others for real or imagined misdeeds admits to a crime, this is interesting, so journalists report on it. That's their job.

Schwarzer gives a curious justification for opening the secret account in the first place. She claims that public opinion was so hostile to her that she feared she would have to flee the country. It's one thing to leave the country and quite another to have all your assets seized. Of course nothing of the sort ever happened to Schwarzer. However, it was her critic Esther Vilar who was actually forced to leave the country after being beaten up by a group of angry women. But even if we assume for the sake of argument that Schwarzer's fears were justified, this still does not explain the tax evasion. It would have been perfectly possible to open an account in Switzerland—or some other foreign country—and declare her interest income to the German tax authorities. Unless of course Schwarzer feared that Germany would somehow be able to also seize the money in her Swiss account. This is a feat that not even Hitler accomplished at the height of his power, so it is a rather outlandish worry.

At long last, the tides have turned against Alice Schwarzer. She was losing ground before, especially with her unsuccessful fight against prostitution, which even many fellow feminists opposed. This tax scandal will hopefully prove to be the last nail in the coffin of Schwarzer's reputation. Now she finally gets the scorn she so richly deserves, though unfortunately most of the mainstream media attacks on her still claim that she "accomplished" many great things for German women in the past (though these claims are always made in terms of vague generalizations; no one seems to be quite sure what concrete improvements Schwarzer brought about). We can only hope that this too shall pass.

Notes:

[1] For the original article, see Der Spiegel: Alice Schwarzer beichtet schweizer Steuergeheimnis. A good English article can be found here: DW.de: German feminist Alice Schwarzer admits to Swiss account, then goes on offensive

[2] For one example, see the last paragraph of Notizen aus der Politik

[3] See http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=N5rt3tsHxi8&list=PLwRQEFL0KbbpyLIrRj8uGu1zZkCAs23tM for the debate with English subtitles. The whole debate is well worth watching.

Editor's note: feature image by Michael Lucan

Karen Straughan (Girl Writes What) Live at Ryerson University – raw!

AVfM Video Source · 7 February 2014 · Archived copy · Original

We believe Steve Brulé intends to edit this footage to improve sound, edit out irrelevant parts like crowd noise and setup, but this was a fantastic event and we wanted to make sure everybody could see it. When and if an edited version is made available we will also point that. In the meantime, we suggest skipping about the first 17 minutes as it's little but crowd noise and people talking about setup:

If you are wanting to skip straight to Karen's presendation, skip to about the 33 minute mark.
Congratulations to the Canadian Association for Equality for fighting the good fight and winning against closed-minded reactionaries and censorship.

How gold-digging got professional

Robert St. Estephe · 7 February 2014 · Archived copy · Original

The "Heart Balm Racket" was the ultimate gold-digger scheme. Here is the classic version as it was developed over time by its female practitioners (with the assistance of male lawyers who were in on the deal):
Step 1: Target a man of means;

Step 2: Flirt with him and get him to propose marriage, in writing, ideally in at least three courtroom-ready love letters;

Step 3: Become an impossible, flighty, ill-tempered, and thus no-longer attractive prospective bride, resulting in a change of mind on the part of the prospective groom;

Step. 4: Feign sorrow and suffering and sue his butt off for breach of promise.

The year 1911 seems to have been a hot one in the history of "patriarchal oppression," as evidenced by the following exposé, combined with the infamous "alimony unlimited" ruling of Chicago Judge Bonygne and reports on the financial woes of suffering alimony princesses Ethel Stuart Elliott of New York and Mrs. Trude of Chicago (see: "Alimony Princesses of 1911").

The following is one of several installments that will appear on A Voice for Men exposing the long and forgotten history of this species of gold-digging denominated: "Heart Balm Racket." Already published is the story of ardent anti-misandrist Roberta West Nicholson's heroic, and successful, efforts starting in 1935 to stamp out the racket throughout the nation, starting with her home state of Missouri in her capacity as state legislator:

[image]

HEADLINE: Rising Market in Balm for Jilted Girls; $10,000 Current Quotation for the Week

By Nixola Greeley-Smith

— Only Moral From Week's Crop of Breach of Promise Cases Is That Now Is a Good Time to Sue.
— Man's Income Suggested as a Fair Basis of Settlement, the Same as Prevails in Fixing Alimony.
— Court Interjects Sordid Questions of Actual Damage Sustained in Wardrobe Preparations, Wedding Cake, Etc.
— But What Have These Considerations to Do With the Injuries to a Seared Soul and a Wounded Heart?
— Financial Remuneration Logical to the Type of Woman That Considers Marriage in Itself a Goal.

What is the value of a woman's heart? What balm may be applied to the wounded feelings tender soul who discovers suddenly that she is not as much engaged as she thought she was?

Ten thousand dollars is the current market quotation on heart balm, as disclosed by two verdicts for that amount rendered by sympathetic juries in New York this week.

In the first case, that of Henrietta French, a South Dakota girl, who sued David H. Decker jr., a civil engineer of this city, for breach of promise of marriage, Justice Erlanger announced that he would entertain a motion to set the verdict aside as excessive. But when we consider that the young woman, who must possess at least normal intelligence, had to receive and answer letters beginning "My ownty donty darlingest, sweet honey bunchums," we may not agree with the view of the learned court.

The other blighted young woman is Miss Fanny Libenau, to whom a jury in the City Court awarded $100,000 for injuries to her affections inflicted by Joseph Krauss.

~ Is Interesting Problem. ~

But the problem involved in these suits is a most interesting one.

Undoubtedly the strictly logical aspect of the breach of promise suit was presented by Justice Erlanger in the French-Decker case.

“Not a dollar of damage has been shown, except that naturally arising from the alleged breach. Not a dollar on wardrobe, wedding preparations, or anything else.”

But what have the sordid questions of wardrobe, preparations, etc., to do with a broken heart?

How may the damages to a seared soul be assessed? The average woman, of course, does not feel broken engagement so poignantly that she seeks or even thinks of financial balm. But the logic of the breach of promise suit is irresistible. To a certain too frequent type of female, marriage in itself is a goal, an achievement irrespective of the individuality or personality of the husband. The conjugal state seems to be essentially more honorable and dignified than spinsterhood. Once having the goal in sight she does not forego it without a death struggle. From being assured of an easy livelihood, earned by some one else, she faces the prospect of a future of struggle and perhaps self-support. What is more natural for her than to seek to capitalize love’s wounds.

~ Should Jury Fix Damages? ~

After all, marriage as it is viewed at present by the majority of persons has as its basis the financial dependence of woman. A deserted wife asks and receives financial balm in the shape of alimony. Why should not a deserted fiancee have similar redress if she chooses to avail herself of it? For those who take the view that women should be supported by men, the justice of the breach of promise suit seems inevitable.

But should the extent of the damage be left to a susceptible jury to fix? Damages based on wardrobe purchased or wedding cake ordered are not adequate or reasonable. One can wear the clothes and eat the cake even though the faithless bridegroom should disappear.

But what can one do with a broken heart except ask for balm for it? It seems to me that a fair basis of settlement would be the man’s income. That is what fixes the amount of alimony.

One of the verdicts of $10,000 rendered this week was against a painter and decorator who has nothing but his trade by which to live. Yet he is mulcted for an amount that he cannot possibly pay, and a young man of some wealth, the defendant in the French case, gets off with damages for the same amount.

A man would spite his heavenly bliss
And all his worldly worth for this;
To waste his ailing heart in one kiss
Upon her perfect lips, is the poetic as opposed to the legal view of what a woman’s love is worth.

But perhaps if the highly respected British poet who wrote that glowing estimate had ever been sued for breach of promise he would have become as practical and matter-of-fact as Justice Erlanger.

Perhaps, after all, the only moral to be deduced from the week’s crop of breach of promise cases is this now is a good time to sue.

[Source: Nicola Greeley-Smith, “Rising Market in Balm for Jilted Girls; $10,000 Current Quotation for the Week,” The World (New York, N.Y.), Mar. 4, 1911, p. 3]

John Nazarian Puppet Theater

John Hembling (JtO) · 7 February 2014 · Archived copy · Original

John Nazarian, King of the scumbags, has recently become upset as we have exposed in other stories (such as here and here) is a most unhappy man. A known associate of serial false accuser and liar Pauley "Star Crazy" Perette, Nazarian is also a known advocate for filing false police reports and is unhappy we exposed this indisputable fact by posting videos showing him doing exactly that. In an act of blatant attempts at altering potentially criminal evidence, Nazarian pulled his videos from YouTube. Then when others began mirroring his videos, he began filing complaints to YouTube to have those mirrored copies of his criminal advocacy removed. So far as we can tell, everyone who has made a point of sharing the evidence of his criminal advocacy has had their videos taken down. So it seemed appropriate to give you all a re-enactment of what John Nazarian, friend of bullying thug Pauley Perette, actually advocates:

It's so eerie you can barely tell it from the real thing!
Here is a transcript of the video:
Hey, welcome. I'm John Nazarian. I'm reading the bible, remember? I do God's work.
You know, if you women, have you ever really thought about trying to get rid of your husbands? Not like shooting them and digging a hole and putting them in. No, no. I'm talking about, no… that's not what I'm talking about here. What I'm talking about is the fact that… putting the trash out. You've had it up to here.
You don't want to see his hair, you don't want to smell his breath. You're done.
But how do you get him thrown out of the house?
heh. It's tough. You don't have ten or fifteen thousand dollars to hire a lawyer. Here's my suggestion:
One nice day when he goes to work, you go get your hair done, get your nails done. And I know for some of you out there this might sound utterly impossible, but you know women do this. They get their hair done, nails done, clean themselves up, put on a pretty dress and if you know your husband hates meatloaf.. you make the biggest meatloaf you've ever made. If you know your husband hates spaghetti, you make the biggest pot of sauce and macaroni you've ever made. And when he comes home that night, he's sitting there giving you all of the usual shit that he gives you, this is your Waterloo. Or I should say HIS Waterloo.
This is where Napolean meets the bad(?) this is, this is it – it's over. You look at him and he goes "what the fuck is this? You KNOW I don't like meatloaf" or "you know I don't like spaghetti sauce." You look at him, you throw meatloaf up in the air, you take pieces of it, you throw it around the room. Or if it's spaghetti you throw that spaghetti everywhere, you rub it all over yourself, you don't touch HIM.
And, right about now he's looking at you like "what the hell?" You hit 9-1-1 and start screaming "He's trying to kill me!" and you throw that sfood all over the house, all over the kitchen, break the dishes. If you happen to hit yourself in the head with the kitchen door… coming or going… that's good too.
And I'm here to guarantee you something. When the cops show up, and he, they look at you all nicely dressed and AND now you look like you got food all over you. He's sitting there looking like Prince Charming? He will go from looking like Prince Charming to an expression of Wile Coyote as to what just happened.
And what you're gonna tell the cops is, ya know, you made the mistake, you made a nice dinner, he didn't like it and he freaked out.
Try that ladies. Show him the door. Otherwise known as… You just put the trash out.
And since you might think that is in some way an exaggeration, in the interests of honest news reporting we still present to you here on AVfM the video that John Nazarian doesn't want you to see. You can find it right here.
You are encouraged to mirror this video to your own channel, with a link to this article here on AVfM if anyone has any questions.
Also, if Nazarian files a DMCA claim against your mirroring it, refute it and note that you can provide written proof of permission to mirror this video–and just link to this article as your written proof. You are hereby authorized to redistribute this video anywhere you like, just so long as you provide a link to this article to explain it.

Thank you for your kind attention.

The male body and the masculinity police

Jason Gregory · 7 February 2014 · Archived copy · Original

The most culturally acceptable locus of violence is the male body. The policing of masculinity assures this fact. Call this policing and violence whatever you want. Call these things The Patriarchy™ if you want, but neither of these things are male privilege and neither of these things are male domination. I prefer to call these things the lived-experiences of men.

I generally dislike "The Good Men Project" because most of their articles are milquetoast and because they try to understand the lived-experiences of men through the lens of feminism(s). This is problematic because ALL feminism(s) assume The Patriarchy™ (so far as I can tell) and proceed from that problematic assumption to make what are often wrong-headed assumptions about masculinity and men. However, I will give credit where it is due. Beth Leyba wrote this article the other day, "I Hate the Broncos: Daring to Question Whether Football is Worth It."

In her "daring" article, Leyba gets a few things right. She writes. "Football is a brutal sport that sometimes ends up destroying the lives of those who play it." She says that she was never a fan of football, but that her apathy about this sort of violence against men "morphed into moral opposition" because of the costliness of the sport.

She notes the physical damage done to men via multiple concussions and relates this to her own experiences with an injury that she suffered on a swing-set. She writes about football being a sport that "literally chews people up and spits them out." I agree with her, but swing-sets, unlike football, don't generally chew people up and spit them out. Note how it takes a remotely similar and personal experience of injury before she is willing to toss out her apathy regarding this sort of violence against men. I really want to give her the benefit of the doubt and be kind here because we have similar conclusions about violence against men; though we arrive at these conclusions through very different routes. From her feminist lens, a swing-set accident "has helped to crystallize" her feelings about the grotesque amounts of violence against men that exist in our culture.

I'm not sure that she understands the depths of this violence that permeates our culture, considering how it took the traumatic swing-set accident to cause her to shed her apathy, but she can see that our culture celebrates this violence against men. She notes that "football brings people together" for tailgate parties, for thanksgiving tradition, and etc. Hell, if not for this culturally accepted violence against men, most sports bars would probably not exist.

I just finished watching "Super Bowl XLVIII," where millions of people all across our country and throughout sports bars tuned in to cheer about this violence against men. I'm not going to link to the tweets, but there were assholes celebrating the fact that Richard Sherman (a player for the Seahawks) suffered an ankle injury during the game.

There is also human cock-fighting, better known as the "UFC." Yeah, sycophants can dress it up as strategy and as a violent form of chess, but it's still primarily violence against men. It was only a few weeks ago where millions of people tuned in to watch Anderson Silva kick another man so hard that Silva horrifically broke his own leg.

Look at the suffering of this man. Anybody can see that these sports are a form of violence against men. This fact is so obvious…just look at him.

It shouldn't take a traumatic swing-set injury for a woman (especially a feminist who is supposed to be knowledgeable about gender issues) to acknowledge this fact and sweep aside her "apathy" about this violence. It shouldn't take one's own personal experience with a loosely related concussive injury to bring about the empathy needed to understand such blatant suffering of men.

If you can't see this suffering, or if you've only now begun to see it, perhaps you have been blinded to it because your theories about The Patriarchy™ have blinded you to it. Perhaps you have been so busy in-fighting with other feminists and jockeying for status on various feminist hierarchies of oppression that you have simply failed to see the obvious. These men are not dominating. These men are submitting to a culture that glorifies violence against them. These men are submitting to a culture that demands their suffering through the policing of masculinity.

We live in a culture where violence against men is not only culturally permissible, it is celebrated as heroic. Our president and congress perpetuates this norm. President Obama delivered one of the biggest standing ovations at the SOTU address. (You can watch the ovation here.) The ovation was for Cory Remsburg. It was an ovation to celebrate his heroics—being deployed 10 times by our military, having his body mutilated and sacrificed, paralyzed, blinded. The standing ovation was a policing of masculinity such that men-as-cannon-fodder are praised. Our entire congress cheered about the dehumanization of this man. They cheered that he was put through a meat grinder and spit out as a hero "who never quit."

"Ahhh…but these are adult men who are well-paid to take these risks and subject their bodies to violence," say fans and apologists of violent sports and the military. I say rubbish. These men were all conditioned via culture to "be a man." One of the first questions I was asked when I spoke with military recruiters was whether or not I played high-school football. I don't think this was any sort of unusual question asked by military recruiters. It makes sense that the military would want boys and young men who have a history of having had their personhood mutilated through violent "sport." Hell, one of the first things done to young men, when entering the military, is the shaving of their heads—to try and strip young men of individual personhood differences—making new recruits a gaggle of "maggots."

This conditioning (abusing) starts at a young age. Take, for example, the horrific show, "Friday Night Tykes." It's all about the policing of masculinity in boys, making them into violent monsters who are willing to harm other boys, robbing boys of their emotional well-being, robbing boys of their personhood, distorting masculinity into this grotesquery of socio-culturally acceptable violent behavior.

This kind of policing of masculinity ensures that the male body becomes the most socio-culturally acceptable locus of violence. This is not male privilege. This is not male domination. This is male submission. These are the lived-experiences of men.

So, when Ms. Leyba and other feminists write about shedding their apathy toward this violence against men, it's hard for me to take seriously their often made claims about feminism working on men's issues–how feminism cares about men, and how The Patriarchy™ hurts men too. If Ms. Leyba had actually cared about men, she would never have had apathy about them in the first place.

Ms. Leyba, take off your feminist goggles for a moment and try to understand the lived-experiences of men. You don't need to be bonked on the head in one of your swing-set accidents to do this. Simply look around. You will see the policing of masculinity. You will see a culture of male submission. You will see the male body as the locus of culturally acceptable violence. That is not male privilege. That is not male domination. Such things are the lived-experiences of men.

7 Staple MHRA Arguments

Sage Gerard (Victor Zen) · 8 February 2014 · Archived copy · Original

#1: Criticizing women is not misogyny

[image]
Modified version of free image from OpenClipArt.org

This brick of logic reminds the world that women aren't special.
You can replace "women" with "men," "Singaporeans," "Jets fans" or anything under the kaleidoscopic constellation of humanity in the argument and still be right. The sound of the brick's impact resonates when it hits the stupid pedestal that women end up on all the time.
"If women ran the world, there would be no violence!"
CLACK
"Women are more spiritual than men!"
CLACK
"Girls don't fart!"
CLACK

There is nothing misogynistic about criticizing women. After all, they're only human.

#2: Anger can be healthy

"Hey MHRAs, when are you going to stop whining and do some actual activism?", some ask. The Dayton Rally, UoT dramas, Karen's excellent RU speech, Kennesaw State University Men and the upcoming international MHRM June conference should answer that question. If it wasn't for righteous anger at gynocentrism and misandry, no activism would have taken place.
It is okay to be angry about injustice. If you contribute to injustice, it is okay to be angry at you. Those who profit from hatred such as Anita Sarkeesian, Laci Green [1][2], or Micheal Kimmel will be treated with the disrespect that they rightfully earned.

Since men are often told to be stoic, encouraging men to express healthy anger helps them develop their confidence. Unhealthy anger is often the product of dwelling in isolation, which is not something we encourage. But denying men their anger is a surefire way to castrate their emotional growth.

#3: Specialization is not Gender Centrism

Animal liberationists helping baby turtles are not blamed for undermining whales, so why are humanists helping men blamed for undermining women? If helping men makes you androcentric, then volunteering at a church make you a Christian zealot.
I used to think "equality" meant not helping demographics until I realized that helping everyone at once is like trying to put a tornado in a thimble. It makes more sense to work on specific problems without getting drunk on utopian ideals that blind you to scale.
But even the people who continue to advocate universal solutions put women first in gender issues. There is no "first!"
Helping men does not stop others from helping women at the same time. A humanist specializing in women's issues is fine so long as he or she does not fuck with other innocent people in the process.
We do not need a generalist Utopian consensus to do work concurrently.

#4: Dictionaries do not reliably define ideologies, including "feminism"

My butt clenches when someone says "If you are fighting for equality, then you're a feminist!"
Jesus Christ in a titty bar, please go back to calling me a misogynist. PLEASE.
People who say this nonsense often have a dictionary open to the definition of "feminism."
The map is not the territory, so unless you solved world hunger by chucking a globe in a vat of pudding, put the dictionary down and look out the window. Dictionaries don't always make sense because they are written by the linguistic equivalent of mob rule.
This is not to say that dictionaries are bad, but definitions must be empirically verifiable to be useful. To verify the definition of "fork," look at a fork.

Some motherforking forks. Source: Wikipedia

Ideologies, being normative and malleable, take work to define. If you have ever argued semantics with an ideologue, you may have noticed that your opponent equivocates to avoid committing to any part of his or her ideology that you criticized. This is what's called being a chicken shit.
To define an ideology, describe how the ideology translates to actions, policies, traditions, institutions or precedents that are either endorsed, enabled or excused by self-described adherents to the ideology.
Motivations and actions change with the times, so the definitions of ideologies change over time. Dictionaries can accurately define an ideology if the definition is freshly updated to match the description.
But no matter what the dictionary says, people have always experienced political ideologies in terms of their institutional manifestations. If you think a dictionary accurately represents the sum total of these experiences, then please don't act on your stupid thoughts.

#5: MHRAs are not the mirror image of feminists

Show me a bunch of MHRAs doing the below, and I will entertain the idea that MHRAs "mirror" feminists:

- Sexually abusing and hitting female church-goers while pantsless.
- Pulling fire alarms at events they don't like.
- Shooting someone's goddamn dog in response to that person saying that people hit each other.

- Screaming “SHUT THE FUCK UP” at complete strangers in public, on camera.
- Pasting random women’s faces on a poster reading “CHILD ABUSER OF THE MONTH.”
- Making excuses for a man who basically grinds a woman into hamburger as “self-defense” before selling T-Shirts at the trial.
- Attacking ad-revenue streams of tech giants to impose gender-centric interpretations of issues that affect both men and women.

We evaluate people on an individual basis without making comparisons to some ideal benchmark that we change at will (which is a feminist habit). All we know is that if you, as a self-declared MHRA, act crazy, then fuck you. Making exceptions on the law based on ideals, no matter how well-meaning, opens the door to forgiving vices in the name of an ideology. Universal accountability is a must.

#6: Suffering is not a competition

You are not special, but you matter. If everyone thinks that you, as a real victim, aren’t worthy of consideration because someone looks like a bigger victim, something is wrong. I emphasize “looks like” because the human protection instinct is so exploitable that people can easily be fooled into aiding someone for almost no reason at all. Feminists are the champions of manipulating unwary men into a cycle of codependency, while teaching women the toxic art of narcissism. The results are soul-crushing on a couple-by-couple basis, so imagine the problem scaled to the size of culture itself. Feminism contributes to a political climate where you don’t deserve attention if you individually aren’t a bigger victim than women as a demographic. Feminists do not see women as anything more than victims, and they will fight to make sure that you aren’t as important as women.

This toxic climate clouds reality. The reality is that life is not fair, and people suffer. Justice is not about adopting idealistic principles defined subjectively by the perpetually unsatisfied, justice is about (attempting to) resolve unfairness in a context-centric and reasonably proportional manner.

Making suffering a competition where women are always declared the winner before the game is played is denying men justice.

#7: Where is this motherfucking Patriarchy?

As a white, good-looking, cisgendered, soulless ginger (“cisginger,” according to Alison Tieman and Hannah Wallen) male business owner, I never got a memo from the Patriarchy asking me to bring donuts to the next good-ol’-boy rape orgy.

But radical feminists do not claim that the Patriarchy is a legislative body in a volcano lair, they claim that the Patriarchy is a ubiquitous institution that permeates global culture.

But under “Patriarchy,” women have gained suffrage, affirmative action, scholarships, legal preference, media focus, and other benefits that many human beings don’t actually get to enjoy in some parts of the world for reasons that go beyond sexism. The vast majority of the major benefits women enjoy were either implemented or approved by men.

Women would not have been given an inch in the socioeconomic pecking order over the whole of human history if the Patriarchy actually existed.

Women, as the majority voter in many developed Western countries and the primary consumer, must approve of market conditions and politicians for either to remain institutionalized. You don’t need to have an impressive title to have decision-making power. And despite the favor genetics gives to men in terms of physical strength, women have no trouble dissolving men in fucking acid and becoming Internet sensations when they kick the shit out of men.

If this is the Patriarchy, what are feminists complaining about?

From woman to man to red pill

Steven · 8 February 2014 · Archived copy · Original

I never thought my transition from female to male would lead me to the Men's Rights Movement.
I never even knew such a thing existed until a year after the fact. My transition was not about sexual politics, but about achieving personal brain-body congruence. I was correcting an internal dysphoria that had persisted since age 7, when I angrily declared to the boy next door that I was "Super Boy and not Super Girl," and staunchly defended my decision to enter the boys' restroom to a stressed-out elementary school teacher.
At 11 I begged my mother to let me cut my hair as short as possible and was thrilled when our dentist mistook me for a boy. In short, everything I was inside; everything that I could sense and attach to my identity, was male, even as my body said otherwise.
That conflict intensified harshly. The next year I tried to cut off the breast stubs that grew on my chest with a steak knife, and expressed a strong desire to get breast cancer, "so that I can get a double mastectomy like Grandma!"
When I was 16 I developed anorexia in order to stop my periods and shrink my breasts as much as possible.
My distress never had much to do with social roles, and for the most part I did not transition in order to gain any perceived social privilege. I played with Barbie dolls and dressed up as a princess (though I always added a sword just to prove I was a tough princess). Xena was my role model.
From a young age, though, I did express extreme anger at not being able to enlist in the Army as an infantryman, and was enraged when a friend's grandmother presumed that I did not know how to put gas in a car because I was a girl. Any time a man showed "chivalry" towards me, such as offering to help me carry something heavy, I was insulted and angry. I also experienced howls and whistles on a daily basis from men in cars when I went out alone for walks.
"Well, I must be an extreme feminist," I remember thinking. "Because feminists are the only other girls who seem to get as angry at these things as I do."
I got the double mastectomy I'd always wanted the day before I turned 20. By this time I had learned of the existence of female-to-male transgender people and knew that this described my condition almost perfectly. I had gotten to the point where it was either get a sex change or kill myself.
After having my breasts removed I began administering weekly testosterone injections. My voice dropped and I began to grow a beard. At this time I began to be taken as male in social settings.
The first thing I noticed was that the cat calls from cars as I walked down the street came to an end. No longer feeling sexually threatened was a huge relief, although it also led to me to another most interesting observation. I wondered if I made an ugly boy since I no longer received daily assurance that I was sexually desirable. It actually took a while to get used to not being seen as the physically attractive sex. My gain became an unexpected loss and I began to realize there are some things on the other side of the fence that you cannot see until you cross over and stand there.
Standing there, as I do now, provides a very different view of life, and of men, than I ever had. Until I got here, there was much I was unaware of, like the previously unseen objectification of my body as an appliance.
It took a while to get it. I was pleasantly surprised when a female friend asked me to help her move furniture shortly after I began hormone therapy. At this point my muscles had developed somewhat in response to testosterone, but I was still within the female range of strength. Nevertheless, I was able to move the furniture (though I'm sure she could have done so herself). I felt very manly and tough. Wasn't it wonderful that people now presumed I was strong and capable rather than weak and in need of chivalric protection?
I was happy, celebrating the fact that I was no longer seen as just a piece of meat–although later I realized that now society either uses me or ignores me, because I'm not attractive enough to be a piece of meat. I'm instead just an ugly, hairy beast with a wallet and a pair of muscular arms. Or, I might say with some measure of irony, a piece of meat that doesn't even rate a cat call.
I have also found it very difficult to get used to always having to take action and make decisions. Men are expected, forced rather, to be the active agents of society. If there is a problem, men are expected to take the initiative to solve it rather than seek help or advice or take advantage of social services.

In straight relationships, the man is expected to approach the woman, initiate conversation, and move the relationship in the direction he wants it to go while simultaneously being extremely careful to monitor her unspoken cues to ensure he is not being rapey or creepy (and if he fails to correctly read those cues, he risks being put away in jail and raped himself).
Even in gay male relationships, no partner takes the "female" role: both are expected by the other to approach, initiate, take charge, and make decisions at least half of the time.
Being an active agent 24/7 is not a privilege, but a very tedious and stressful responsibility. Having it suddenly forced upon me without being trained for it since birth was mentally and physically exhausting.
The burden of all that hyperagency has a huge downside. Sometimes men need help as well. When they do, people are very reluctant to come to their aid and do not hesitate to make fun of them for needing assistance. There are virtually no domestic violence shelters for men, nobody cares if a man is homeless, or out of work, or if he is mentally ill and needs care and concern, because he's a man, damn it. He's supposed to be strong and capable, all the time, or else he's useless and might as well not exist (just like an older, unattractive and overweight woman is seen as useless).
According to feminism male privilege guarantees that he has it so much easier than women. They laugh at the notion that it might be difficult to be a man in this society, because they can't see the other side.
Well, I've stood on both sides of the fence and, without bias from either, I can safely say that "male privilege" in this day and age is bullshit. Women face a lot of threats, to be sure; but men face many of the same exact threats without the social and legal support that women have. Men's issues are for the most part not even acknowledged to exist.
Due to stress from college and bullying (which, oddly enough, came only from within the campus' LGBT/feminist community) I required a brief stint at a mental hospital last summer. I was at a very low point and began whimpering during my intake evaluation, at which point the doctor told me, "You're a man, right? That crying is pathetic. Man up!"
Man up. It suddenly hit me that most men are probably told this phrase hundreds of times throughout their boyhood. At one point I would have given anything for people to encourage me to toughen up like Xena. Now I realized that sometimes, men, like women, just don't feel tough and need the same love and care that women do when they are hurting. Why is this so hard for society to accept? Both men and women can be tough most of the time, but everybody has points in their lives in which they need to be taken care of by others.
Nevertheless, I stopped crying immediately (which testosterone makes physically easier to do), having been reminded that it is now socially unacceptable to show my feelings, even when being admitted to a mental hospital. I didn't mind that much. After all, it's a man's responsibility to always be strong and capable, right? I was a man, damn it, and right embarrassed that I'd failed to behave like one.
After a year of these experiences, and a year of listening to extreme feminist doctrine at my liberal arts college (which schooled me on the inherent violence of male sexuality, "rape culture," "trigger warnings," "safe spaces," etc.. it seemed to me that many of them wanted to be seen as weak, delicate flowers rather than as strong and capable women), I began to change the way I saw things. I took the red pill, you might say.
Since women now share traditional male "privileges," they also ought to share traditional male responsibilities; that is, to carry their own weight and acknowledge guilt when they are guilty, and to respect and care for the men in their lives like men respect and care for them.
Current feminist doctrine wants to retain traditional female privileges (in the form of the Violence Against Women Act, courts favoring mothers over fathers and ex-wives over ex-husbands, etc.) as well as all the traditionally male rights they have rightfully earned over the last hundred years (ability to enter virtually any career they wish and fully participate in society). It is a human rights victory worthy that women now share traditional male rights, but it is unfair that they are not willing to give up traditional female rights in return, because this now puts men in a disadvantaged position.
Editorial note: this is a reprint of a classic article from 2012 we think may be of particular interest to new readers, or worth re-reading for those who've read it before. –DE

Are Men Obsolete? Karen Straughan at Ryerson University

AVfM Video Source · 9 February 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Karen Straughan's address at Ryerson University will undoubtedly go down in history as a watershed moment. We have previously shown raw footage of the event, we now present a version more cleaned up for sound and video, provided by Sandman:

Men are financing the state's assaults... on men

Mike Buchanan · 9 February 2014 · Archived copy · Original

The following is an article just published by The Backbencher, an online magazine aimed mainly at young adults with an interest in politics, especially university students.

Men pay 72% of the income tax collected in the UK, women only 28%.[1] British men collectively paid £64 BILLION more income tax than women in 2012/13, yet the state relentlessly assaults the interests of men, never the interests of women. In our party's public consultation document[2] we list 20 areas in which the state, through its actions and inactions, advantages women (and/or girls) over men (and/or boys).

Feminist politicians and civil servants systematically advantage women at men's expense, but the mainstream media rarely report on the extent of their manipulations, and it can be difficult to 'join up the dots'. Let me join a few of them up for you.

Two-thirds of public sector employees are women, and women use the 'positive action' provisions in the 2010 Equality Act to preference women over men when recruiting and promoting, where women are 'under-represented'. While men could conceivably be preferenced over women on the same grounds, they never are.

Men and boys have been disadvantaged by an increasingly feminised education system. Then they're disadvantaged in entering some employment fields by government initiatives, and grants directed to institutions which preference women over men when recruiting and promoting staff, for example research institutions.[3]

30+ years ago, the majority of university students being men was deemed 'a problem to be addressed' by feminists and other left-wing social engineers, who were then (as today) found in key positions in government, in all political parties, and throughout the civil service. The secondary school system has become ever more feminised. In 1970, 45.4% of secondary school teachers were women; the proportion had risen to 62.3% by 2010.[4]

The secondary school system has been manipulated to advantage girls over boys, and 60% of undergraduate students today are women. Why is this gender balance not 'a problem to be addressed'? Because gender equality was never the motivation for increasing the proportion of female university students. Gender equality narratives are smokescreens for feminists' quests for female supremacy, driven by their misandry (the hatred of men).

Four out of seven unemployed people are men, and unemployment is known to be a bigger driver of suicide among men than women.[5] The single largest cause of death of young men in Britain today is suicide. It would be perverse for the government to spend taxpayers' money encouraging women into historically male-dominated professions, yet that's exactly what's been happening for decades, while virtually nothing has been spent encouraging men into female-dominated professions.

Let's consider women studying STEMM subjects – science, technology, engineering, medicine and mathematics. Huge sums of taxpayers' money have been spent encouraging women into studying STEMM subjects, and choosing STEMM careers, although few women return to STEMM careers after having children, possibly an indication they weren't happy working in those fields, and were happy to leave them?

For 30+ years there have been sustained efforts to drive up the proportion of women in medicine, and 70% of medical students today are women. It costs £250,000 – £500,000 to train a doctor. Large parts of the NHS are in crisis today[6] because compared with male doctors, female doctors are more likely to:

– quit the profession altogether – work part-time, whether or not they have children – opt for the least stressful lines of work, notably general practice (50% of GPs today are women)
– decline to work in the most stressful areas, notably A&E – decline to work unsocial hours
– retire earlier

It's been estimated that the NHS gets around half the number of working hours over a career from the average female doctor, compared with the average male doctor. One highly predictable consequence of the influx of female doctors has been a slump in the staffing capacity of the NHS, a problem which has been 'solved' through the recruitment of large numbers of foreign doctors, at considerable expense to taxpayers. Many of these doctors are drawn from poor countries which financed their training, and which can ill afford their absence.

There are fields where the government's efforts at driving women into formerly male-dominated lines of work almost beggar belief. While women have entered medicine in large numbers, few have chosen engineering. Some of the reasons are obvious. Compared with medicine, engineering is:
– less well paid
– less secure (private sector)
– more likely to entail working in unpleasant conditions and/or away from home for extended periods – less flexible working hours
– less human interaction and appreciation from patients / clients
Legions of taxpayer-funded social engineers are driven by the delusional conviction that men and women are intrinsically the same. They ignore gender-typical preferences, and always seek equality (or superiority) of outcomes for women. We come to the ultimate manifestation of their thinking. At Brunel University, female postgraduate engineering students are eligible for an additional £15,000 p.a. grant solely on account of their gender.[7] The grant's worth considerably more than the annual gross income of a person working full-time on the minimum wage. Male-to-female transsexuals (and those 'in transition') are also eligible for the grant.[8]
So there we have it. Female students have to be bribed to do the course, while male students don't. Does anyone seriously imagine these women are motivated to work as engineers? For every woman who does the course, a man is denied a place. Let's remind ourselves that unemployment is the single largest cause of death of young men.
It's not only the government which seeks to drive women into male-dominated professions at the expense of men. Professional bodies are pursuing the same objective. Some months ago we publicly challenged Nick Baveystock, director of the Institution of Civil Engineers, over the matter.[9] The vast majority of ICE's members must surely be men. Our challenge remains unanswered.
It's often claimed we 'need' more female doctors, engineers, company directors etc. – but do we? I leave you with a link to a video which explores an intriguing question:

> If we 'need' more women in boardrooms, do we 'need' more white sprinters in the Olympics 100 metres final?

References:

[1] http://www.avoiceformen.com/feminism/government-tyranny/he-who-pays-the-piper-calls-the-tune-or-does-he/
[2] http://j4mb.wordpress.com/our-public-consultation-exercise-2/
[3] http://j4mb.wordpress.com/2013/11/05/the-athena-swan-initiative-an-assault-on-male-scientists/
[4] http://www.avoiceformen.com/sexual-politics/evo-psych/david-camerons-absurd-medical-policies/
[5] http://www.amazon.com/Feminism-Ugly-Truth-Mike-Buchanan-ebook/dp/B00795BPEO/ref=sr_1_1_title_0_main?s=books&ie=UTF8&qid=1391511366&sr=1-1&keywords=mike+buchanan
[6] http://j4mb.wordpress.com/2014/01/04/why-having-so-many-women-doctors-is-hurting-the-nhs/
[7] http://j4mb.wordpress.com/female-postgraduate-engineering-students-to-be-given-15000-p-a-more-than-their-male-counterparts/
[8] http://j4mb.wordpress.com/2013/12/20/male-to-female-trans-sexual-students-to-receive-15000-p-a-higher-grants-than-male-students-at-brunel-university/
[9] http://j4mb.wordpress.com/2013/09/04/our-public-challenge-to-nick-baveystock-director-general-of-the-institution-of-civil-engineers/

Dennis Sobin Interview – creator of The Idiots Registry

Robert O'Hara · 10 February 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Dennis Sobin is a Registered Sex Offender. Whatever you think of his past, he recently won a major 1st amendment case regarding sex offender registries, establishing that it is legal to publicly identify individuals who work in government departments implementing these registries. We had a chance to sit down and chat, and found him a fascinating interview:

Hyper-hypergamy: Eveline Neal, the Super-Vamp with 43 husbands

Robert St. Estephe · 10 February 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Lonely hearts rackets have long been a favorite way for the woman without a conscience to get rich quick. But in the history of the practice of the lonely hearts scam — in all its manifold variety (including the category "female lonely hearts serial killer") — the case of Englishwoman Eveline Neal stands out. Eveline was truly a "vamps vamp." This Channel-crossing gold-digger had beaucoup de class, in sharp contrast to that much more famous lonely hearts racketeer from rural Indiana, USA, Belle Gunness, the husky farm woman who lured men by the scores (over twenty of them, with some estimates being much higher) with her "husband wanted" newspaper classified ads, got ahold of their cash or property and then drugged them before dispatching them with her handy farm axe.

Although this charmed English adventuress — Eveline Neal — seems to have allowed each and every one of her victims to remain above ground following her thorough fleecing of same, she most certainly deserves to be known far and wide as one of the world's greats in her particular and highly sophisticated craft. The Neal story is an amazing one, and for the lesson it teaches — of the relentlessness of the hypergamy instinct in some females — it well deserves to be retold, and retold often.

***

[image]

FULL TEXT: London, March 29.— The story of the woman who married forty-three husbands, brief reference to which was made in yesterday's report, has no equal in the criminal annals of modern times. Eveline Neal is the child of a well-to-do farmer in Shropshire, the fertility of whose acres made it an easy matter to provide handsomely for his family, composed of one daughter and three sons. Eveline, like many others in the same position, being the pet of her father and brothers, and fairly good looking, soon learned to command, and grew up in the belief that mankind was created to do her homage and minister to her wishes. How early she started in her present career is not yet known, but, as she is still young, if not in the heyday of youth, it is supposed that she early entered the crooked paths in which she has since strayed. Eveline's methods were admirable in their simplicity.

Fearing that the sturdy common sense of the majority of her countrymen might not prove favorable to her schemes, she long since transferred herself and her belongings to French soil, finding in Paris, and the general practice of patronizing marriage bureaus and answering advertisements holding out attractive inducements to commit matrimony, a congenial atmosphere and much encouragement.

Behold her, then, located in the gay capital, if she could be said to have a location when the necessities of her trade compelled her to be as locomotive as a grasshopper and quite protean in her many disguises. Of course, a woman of Miss Neal's genius could not adhere slavishly to any particular method. She had many, but a favorite scheme, and one that won her much wealth, was the announcement in the journals that she was a widow, with a fortune varying in different advertisements from 200,000 to 1,000,000 francs, and desired to marry a gentleman in good circumstances belonging to "high life" if not to the nobility, or to the select circles of commerce.

Answers were directed to be sent addressed poste restante, where they were called for by an accomplice. The latter then selected such of the replies as madam was pleased with and made appointments for an interview, not with the English maiden, but only with her friend. At this meeting the accomplice, M. urges, passed the candidates in serious review, noting down carefully the physical characteristics of each, the amount of fortune, etc. In cases where this examination proved satisfactory the victim was invited to madame's sumptuous apartments in sight or the Rond Point in the Champs Elysees, or some equally attractive quarter of the city.

On every occasion the widow assumed a new name, but each time she told a pitiful tale of how she had been married against her will, and, while she would like to please herself on the present occasion, she still had a mother, her lather being dead, whose wishes she must consult, and who still deemed her, in spite of her previous matrimonial experience, "o'er young to marry yet." In short the applicant must wait. Then began the most profitable portion of the game, the courtship being made as expensive as possible for the suitor. Nothing but the most costly presents would placate the imperious beauty, and if they fell off in the slightest from her high standard of quality and quantity, the dream of the infatuated admirer was promptly ended. Nor was this done in any disagreeable manner. There was no scene, no reproaches, no tears.

[image]

Madame simply disappeared. The profusely bled victim sought her in her accustomed haunts, but the most diligent search failed to reveal her. It goes without saying that the presents, constituting the magnificent "Corbeille," [A tradition in 19th century France, the corbeille de mariage was a gift basket given by the groom to the bride upon the signing of the wedding contract] were also missing. The precious stones, rich jewels, and other valuable booty were not only invisible to the donor, but he would have been compelled to take ship in order to see them again. They had been safely transferred to the madame's snug little mansion in the suburbs of London, which was rich from garret to cellar with the proceeds of her Parisian industry.

But madame had yet another method. In cases where something more than the sedate joys of a French courtship were needed to induce the fiance to part with his means in sufficient abundance, Eveline kindly consented to an actual marriage, which piece of gracious condescension never failed to produce the desired effect. The "Make" and the church would be visited in due course, the wedding breakfast eaten, and the presents duly received and ticketed, but when the shades of night had fallen on the scene the groom, who mayhap had indulged too freely in Chambartin, would suddenly be rudely awakened to the knowledge that both bride and gifts had departed.

The French police declare on their honor that in 1881, when Eveline was brought to their official attention for the first time, she had been married in this peculiar way thirteen times, but that now she had increased the score to the extraordinary total of forty-three. The cause of the present unsought publicity given to Eveline and her ways is her experience with a certain viscount, which led to her arrest at the Hotel Meurice yesterday. This gentleman had ruined himself by gambling and was naturally anxious to obtain more wealth wherewith to regild his tarnished escutcheon.

At first attracted by Eveline's supposititious millions, he at length became really in love with the adventuress, and followed her and her companion with canine fidelity in their travels throughout England, Belgium and Norway, the expenses being paid by the nobleman, who borrowed right and left on notes of hand based on his expectations of marrying a wealthy widow. This, however, could not go on forever. The viscount insisted that the happy day should be named; Eveline, knowing that no more presents could be gained by an actual marriage, declined to do so, and her suitor laid his case before the police. Eveline was astonished at her arrest but is a woman of too many resources to be greatly cast down.

["Married Many Men. – Extraordinary Matrimonial Career of a High-Spirited English Girl. – Eveline Neal Achieves Fame and Fortune by Wedding Gullible Frenchmen. – She Also Reaps a Heavy Benefit by Selling Nuptial Gifts. – Her Little List of Sorrowing Husbands Now Foots Up Forty-Three." St. Paul Daily Globe (Mn.), Mar. 30, 1891, p. 1]

***

Illustration: poster, undated (circa 1900, based on the automobile depicted), "La Corbeille de mariage." Klein & fils ameublement…, Gustave Lecharpentier & Cie peintres; Bibliotèque Nationale de France.

***

John J. Nazarian Threatens Lawsuit

Paul Elam · 11 February 2014 · Archived copy · Original

It seems that John J. Nazarian has taken exception to our reportage and commentary on his efforts to coach women to illegally file falsified police reports in order to have their husbands removed from their home by police, and has retained an attorney to threaten us.

I am in receipt of a letter from Attorney Larry Bakman, Avenue of the Stars address dontcha know, expressing Nazarian's intentions.

As I often do with the mainstream media and other entities, I have opted to respond to Bakman with a link to this post. Nothing like keeping everything on the public record. I suggest first that you read his letter.

Threat Letter

Dear Mr. Bakman,

Thank you for your letter, though I am forced to inform you that it is of no more merit than John Nazarian telling a woman to throw meatloaf against the walls of her home and call 911. Your client's demands, therefore, are rejected.

Your client's conduct was placed on the public record by his own actions, and, as we have well documented, at the time they were discovered there was no indication that his was a work of satire or parody, and was presented, in fact, on a playlist entitled "Divorce Advice" on the website Youtube.com.

Your client further demonstrated consciousness of guilt as he first altered his youtube account to call the videos "entertainment" and later removing them altogether after his work came under public scrutiny.

Mr. Nazarian has further publicly bragged about his profitable complicity in unscrupulously manipulating the family law system in the movie Divorce Corp. He seems quite proud of his success at this.

I hardly think this qualifies Mr. Nazarian as a credible advisor to a community of people who have been seriously and adversely affected by the very kinds of problems he creates, but I do appreciate the collegial suggestion.

Mr. Nazarian was given ample opportunity to tell his side of the story in this matter, even being invited to appear on one of our programs live and unedited. He refused to respond, and instead aired a series of fallacious claims and veiled threats on his internet radio program and his website.

Mr. Nazarian's video advising women to file false police reports is now presented on this site as a part of a news story, which we have every Constitutional right to do. Just as we have the right to report to our readers the fact that Mr. Nazarian has been named in Grand Jury complaints in the State of California related to corruption in family courts.

Again, all of this is a matter of public record.

Additionally, opinion writers on this site have the right to editorialize on all of this, regardless of how Mr. Nazarian feels about it.

Mr. Nazarian is welcome to pursue whatever course of action he likes in this matter. Nothing on this website is going to be removed and we will not refrain in the future from reporting on Mr. Nazarian's actions, where newsworthy. Nor will our opinion writers be gagged by threat of frivolous legal action.

Most sincerely,

Paul Elam, publisher, A Voice for Men

Men's Rights vs Feminist Rape Culture explained using Puzzle Pieces

AVfM Video Source · 11 February 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Transcript: http://www.genderratic.com/p/4057/mens-rights-vs-feminist-rape-culture-explained-using-puzzle-pieces/

From the description: If you enjoyed this video, please subscribe and/or donate. I have decided to remove ads from my channel due to youtube's new copyright policy. Despite the fact that the content of my uploads is entirely original to me (or I have gained permission to use it from the involved parties), youtube keeps suspending monetization on my account. Also, the ads are profoundly annoying. The production expense of these videos is substantially higher than that of my previous videos so anything donated to help defray the cost of making them is greatly appreciated.
References
Female criminals seen as less violent:
http://www.sciencedaily.com/releases/2010/05/100525090554.htm
The Centre of Disease Control's National Partner and Intimate Violence Survey:
http://www.cdc.gov/violenceprevention/pdf/nisvs_report2010-a.pdf
Tables specific to sexual violence:
http://i.imgur.com/Ps9wW.jpg
Tieman's Analysis of the CDC's NIPSVS:
http://www.genderratic.com/p/836/manufacturing-female-victimhood-and-marginalizing-vulnerable-men/
Mary Koss Promotes Rape Culture:
http://www.genderratic.com/p/836/manufacturing-female-victimhood-and-marginalizing-vulnerable-men/http://www.genderratic.com/p/2798/male-disposability-mary-p-koss-and-influencing-a-government-entity-to-erase-male-victims-of-rape/http://www.genderratic.com/p/2943/mary-koss-the-corruption-continues-manboobz-style/
Feminist groups block or remove men's protections against rape by female sexual predators.
http://www.jpost.com/Israel/Womens-groups-Cancel-law-charging-women-with-rape http://toysoldier.wordpress.com/2013/03/06/a-sad-day-for-male-rape-victims-in-india/

MGTOW Forums Pulls the Plug

Paul Elam · 11 February 2014 · Archived copy · Original

The following message is on the web page where MGTOW Forums used to be. It is a message from its owner, Nacho Vidal.

> Dear all,
> For 3 years I've worked to build up MGTOW Forums into a force to be reckoned with, but alas it has failed. It has failed because of the very reasons which brought down the previous MGTOW board: inexperienced idiots who were angry at not being able to get laid – betas, zetas, red pills and the rest of the rubbish.
> At MGTOW Forums, we spent years fighting such fools who were psychos, incels and who vocally supported other places, that I won't mention, over our own. Such people were against us yet we managed to beat them time and time again.
> For some strange reason, many of our so called supporters found it just fine for our competitors to constantly attack us whilst they themselves used rhetoric such as "we're all in it together" and "we're all after the same thing" when clearly we were not. As someone who has always stood up against bullies, I thought my own energy to go head to head with such people would be appreciated. But instead I found myself surrounded by fools who were more concerned with likening our way of life to a fantasy sci-fi flick? The same fools then wondered why folk like Manboobz, who was more friendly to us than our enemies, constantly mocked them?
> Well today is MGTOW Forum's 3rd birthday and quite frankly the vast majority of you deserve what's out there. For me, things have got to the point where I recognise there is no support for taking MGTOW Forums into the wider world. However, MGTOW seems to be a successful concept for incels and psychos so that is where I'm going to leave it.
> I'd like to thank hasmat, toadman, cobalt, womanhater, fairi5fair, jake, thrasher, dsc, Waking Up, pcr, MrLahey, Labisah, Nim and all the other guys who have tried to tame the immature beast that is MGTOW.
> As for those who donated, well I have to thank you for contributing towards the server and other costs. It was very much appreciated. I had recently upgraded the server because I had plans to take us further, what a waste of time and money.
> When the curtain falls it is time to get off the stage and that is what I propose to do. I'll leave you all to wallow in the Red Pill and Alpha/Beta/Zeta fantasy garbage which was our downfall. If things are going to change then the habits of old have to be swept away. I steadfastly refuse to let MGTOW Forums become the graveyard that is MABTW, so better to put it out of it's misery now rather than watch it suffer a slow and painful death.
> As of yesterday, our average daily traffic was in excess of 6,000 unique visits per day. So I was doing something right eh? Meh…very few of you were worth the effort.
> Good luck and time for me to Go My Own Way
> Adios and fuck off
> Nacho Vidal

Translation: "I set out to build something powerful, a "force to be reckoned with," by festering in a hostile worldview of all women and 99.999% of all men, but what I built was a house of cards that ultimately could not fill the void of my personal emptiness, or be called a home. So fuck everyone, which is precisely where, and why, I started."
Personal opinion: Good riddance.

Allow me to qualify. I am sure there were men who actually benefited from involvement in MGTOW Forums. There is great need for the MGTOW philosophy, which is powerful in these times, with comparatively few outlets. The truth, even when served up on a trash can lid by idiots, is a powerful thing.

But I never had the belief that MGTOW was really about what happened at MGTOW Forums, which amounted to one rolling "cunts and whores" diatribe after another, spiced only with vicious attacks on men who were deemed less than worthy by Nacho Vidal's standards.

I never thought, and I still don't, that self-consuming bitterness was required to Go Your Own Way. Venting? Sure. And by god, MGTOW Forums was good for that. Problem is, venting without release or healing is not really venting. Venting implies relief. What happened in that place was mostly psychic and emotional atrophy.

And that is why Vidal never realized his ambitions. One look at that goodbye letter and anyone with sense could tell that a product of that mind was never going to lead to anything, much less a force to be reckoned with.

He was kind enough to say thanks for the cash, but ultimately spit on everyone, including his donors.

It is a lesson in many ways. The primary one is that misandry, and yes goddammit, misogyny is a piss poor way to build cooperation between men.

If anyone is new to this movement, like showing up within the last year, you now have in front of you a text book example of why so many have failed. Men, when in intelligent competition with each other, land shit on the moon and fly back to talk about it. When that competition is petty, uninspired, mindless and juvenile, they just land in shit.

Someone in our editor's room just commented that AVFM holds together because of strong leadership. That is 100% true, but I am not showboating about it. There are many strong leaders here. There are so many strong leaders in this place that I would have to spend some time writing all the names down to make sure I did not miss any of them. They hold this place together like gravity. So do the greatest majority of you.

I urge anyone interested in the success of the MRHM to take a second read of that letter. If you ever wondered why we don't cotton much to internal attacks, flame wars, free-for-alls in the comments and other forms of self-gratifying ad hom under the guise of free speech; if you ever wondered why we value unity over pissing matches and refuse to get bogged down in semantic quicksand, it is for one simple reason. We want to survive the worst of our own nature.

I don't say this to be cruel to MGTOW Forums, or to Vidal. I say it because watching and learning correlates positively to longevity. And we need longevity.

Men are dying, languishing in prisons, dropping out of school and employment (not in a MGTOW sort of way) and getting screwed beyond sickening in family courts. Boys are failing, being doped by people who won't be bothered with their natural state. Too many men aware of these crippling issues think the appropriate response is to simply bash at everyone, including the few who are actually trying to do something about it.

For a while, that sort of thing is understandable. Once stuck in it though, you are only turning understandable outrage into a chronic, festering wound.

Some of these men will empty their cups enough to make room for more in their lives. Then they can regroup seek change, or Go Their Own Way in peace. The rest will just go the way of Nacho Vidal.

That way will not be the way of AVFM.

—

 Editorial Update * According to Reddit, a new version of the MGTOW Forums has been resurrected under new management. We wish them luck. –DE*

Chasing normal

John Hembling (JtO) · 12 February 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Going mainstream or: How I learned to stop saying "fuck" so much and love polite dissent.
The men's human rights movement (MHRM) is going mainstream. A Voice for Men is also becoming a respected publication, of sorts, but it seems the sort of respect afforded to a bear by wary hikers, not so much the respect a senior credentialed professional enjoys. No matter, it's a start.
The site founded by Paul Elam as a chainsaw-flavoured men's rights blog now attracts a growing number of contributors whose established work features prominently in the mainstream. The success of the site, and its continued growth, comes with this mainstreaming effect. For some time, the ideas and opinions published here have been adopted and repeated by writers elsewhere. However, as the site gains traction, and indeed, as we temper the style of our commentary to encourage participation from high profile contributors, those new voices will inevitably bring some of the assumptions of populist public narrative into the landscape of this site.
One such is the phrase "failure to launch". Popularized by gender ideologues including Kay Hymowitz and Micheal Kimmel, along with conservative traditionalists such as Penny Nance and Bill Bennett. That phrase has been widely adopted since then.
The term refers, of course, to our present mainstream's characterization of the growing segment of men in the culture who have, whether consciously or not, decided not to mount the traditional treadmill of self sacrifice, career, and marriage. Sometimes this is talked about as "the marriage strike" – another phrase popularized in mainstream commentary. Within the men's rights community, we have a few terms for such men, including "zeta males" and "and men going their own way" (MGTOW). But there's more to the difference in label inside or outside the MHRM than a simple preference of wording.
The phrase "failure to launch" is a transparent attempt to induce compliance through shame. You are failures! Not earning your status as "real men" via enthusiastic buy-in to the inequitable deal our culture affords to men.
However, beyond the attempt to shame men into compliance – something MGTOWs quickly learn to swat aside, the term "failure to launch" is factually incorrect.
Failure to launch is a mischaracterization. The phenomenon of men refusing society's rotten deal is not their failure. It is their refusal to be slaves.
This is just one example of populist rhetoric we will increasingly see from respected and well known commentators entering the men's human rights movement from without. We will all need to learn to identify the unrecognized falsehoods repeated by those with good intention, joining this movement, and writing or speaking on behalf of men and boys.
However, in refuting and correcting the falsehoods embedded in items of mainstream rhetoric, we're going to have to learn a skill some well known and successful MRAs have trained themselves away from: we're going to have to be nice.
At the very least, we will have to, on occasion, practice a little bit of diplomacy. The problem is that, for many writers and activists who have established themselves in the MHRM, the sadistic and dishonest counter-narrative we face from gender ideologues is considered normal, and ignorable. Indeed, many writers who have learned their skills addressing inequities felt by men and boys have developed a necessarily rough and tumble prose.
When refuting "traditionalist" or so-called "progressive" opinions in the mainstream, calling for men to quietly suck up abuses heaped on them, men's rights advocates on and off this site have an earned reputation for eschewing the conciliatory phrasing often found in more consumer-friendly media.
So, when a highly esteemed guest writer, new to AVfM's particular flavor of commentary inadvertently includes public rhetoric this movement rejects due to embedded assumptions, we're going to have to address such gaffes with kinder language than: "the esteemed Professor Fuzzyface is full of crap, and here's why…"
In fact, "we" have been culpable of just such plain spoken opinion towards respected contributors in past commentary. But, observing a difference between friendly pugilism among men's rights advocates and a more collegial style employed in "respectable" circles is a necessary part of this site's continued success.

To be sure, development of such dexterous delivery does not diminish our disposition towards the practice of F-ing Their Something, in the direction of Up.
And just as a chainsaw should be sharpened and oiled before it is stored; so, gentlemen and ladies, be assured I am hard at work, sharpening my own pencil.
And, as always, I thank you all for your very kind attention.

Fuck You, Tammy Bruce

Paul Elam · 12 February 2014 · Archived copy · Original

The old feminism is on the way out, creating a vacuum in women's politics. Tammy Bruce has apparently decided to take over and fill in the void. Here is her video edict, slickly produced and polished, in which she mightily hails a new breed of feminism, with her at the helm, that is going to replace the corrupt, hateful ideology that current feminism has become. Just watch.

Wow, isn't that cool? Tammy Bruce has a whole new breed of feminism! She will need a new name for it though; maybe something like feminism-plus or not-the-old-feminism or something else equally catchy and original. Feminism 2.0 is so 2.0.

There are some actual differences between what Bruce is saying and what we have come to know of third wave feminists. First, Tammy does not like sluts and says so with haughty Victorian brio. This is by design. One, she wants to remind women, truly enough, of the power of pussy when they are not slinging it like cheap recreational drugs in a bad neighborhood. She is also reminding women, perhaps unintentionally, that a vagina is for more than just alleging it was violated by someone. Also, she means to raise the hackles of the anti-slut shaming sluts that now fill our universities, and, interchangeably, our night clubs.

This is called publicity. As we know so very well here, offending insane gender feminists is better than a large advertising budget. Tammy Bruce, make no mistake about it, knows that, too.

So her command to women now is to control the dick (and the dicks) by realizing that men won't buy a cow with so much free milk around. Regain the power of commodity over your vagina. Clean men up and make them presentable because, after all, they need women's "civilizing" effect. Your father, if the state allowed you to have one, could not have said that part better.

So, what is Tammy Bruce offering women now? It's third wave feminism with a chastity belt and another big fat shame sandwich to force down the throats of men.

Oh mind you, Tammy threw in all the needed sound bites to satisfy most reasonable, modern people. Every woman is entitled to self-determination, the pursuit of happiness, the right to (insert noble human sentiment of choice here). Men are too, of course, but we can't fault Tammy for not noticing. No one else does, either.

She rightfully called modern feminism out on its promotion of victim mentality and the completely vacuous worldview of men as oppressors. She was just spot on in the radical idea that women should view men as partners, touting the importance and value in cooperation between the two sexes.

Even as she tells us repeatedly that men are slovenly, unsophisticated, sexually promiscuous pigs.

I am mostly unclear whether she is advocating that women should partner with the pigs, or whether they should use their vagina to control the pigs, clean them up – thus turning them into serviceable men — and then "partner" with them once they are fit for public presentation. I am voting for the latter.

Gee, Tammy, can't wait. Oink. Oink.

Side note: I have just suffered a twenty minute block in writing this piece. Not the kind of block that comes when you don't know what to say next. It is the kind of block that comes with not knowing how to say fuck you in strong enough terms without resorting to larger fonts and the caps lock.

Fuck you, Tammy Bruce, in a regular font will have to suffice.

As I said, Tammy is smart enough to know that feminism as we know it, the damseling, distressed, victimized, statistics-pulled-out-of-your-slutty-ass variety of idiots now running academe and the media are just starting to see the curtain close on their 50 year reign of terror. And she imagines, in her mainstream media-addled mind, that she can head the fourth wave as long as she bashes men to a pulp in the process and tries to instill shame and puritan values in women.

Uh, take a look around you, Tammy. You are peddling the same shit gender feminists have made their raison d'etre for a half century. You are belittling men, calling women superior, screaming for pussy power and pushing to make men of service, while paying lip service to words like "partnership."
You brilliant bitch, you! How fucking original.

Seriously, Tammy, if you think there are problems with feminism, you are right. If you think you are the solution, then watch your own video while using your brain. There is a lesson in it if you are teachable.

If you want men and women to partner with each other constructively, here is a hint. Pigs and humans are different species. We use pigs. We benefit from them in many ways, but we don't love and partner with them. Not for the sake of a better society or any other reason. And if we did, it would not work. The pigs will always end up on someone's plate.

Men and women working together is a great goal, and we will move close to that once we get women (and men) like you try another new product. It's called Shut the Fuck Up 2.0™. Take your hateful ideas, and get out of the way. You are not helping anything. You are only further attempting to convince people that healing between men and women who respect each other as human beings isn't possible. Your just like all the other gender feminist whackaloons before you.

There is indeed a response coming to the feminism of old. And it is long overdue. But if anyone has the notion that the next wave of sexual politics is going to include an unchallenged attack on men and masculinity, they are sorely mistaken.

Like I said, fuck you, Tammy Bruce.

Tara Culp-Ressler: Man & woman have drunk sex, he's a 'rapist' and she's a 'victim'

Pierce Harlan · 12 February 2014 · Archived copy · Original

James Taranto has written a piece for the Wall Street Journal that is the epitome of common sense. Of course it has been purposefully misconstrued by chattering radical feminists.

Taranto writes about sex partners who engage in mutually reckless drunken sex; that is, both parties are intoxicated and mutually decide, in their drunken states, to have sex.Taranto says it is unjust to hold only the man responsible when two drunks mutually decide to have sex.
And this is controversial, how?
It's not. To label one drunk who decides to have sex a "victim" while labeling the other drunk who decides to have sex a "rapist" — based solely on the genders of the drunks — is something out of "Mad Men." In Taranto's scenario, the male is every bit as much a rape "victim" as the female, and the female is every bit as much a "rapist" as the male. Taranto wasn't talking about a man who decides to rape an incapacitated woman, Taranto was talking about mutually stupid drunken sex. Period.
Taranto's take is common sense, people. Only someone dishonest, stupid, or insane could disagree.
Cue Tara Culp-Ressler.
"In a Wall Street Journal column published on Monday," Culp-Ressler writes, "conservative commentator James Taranto argued that a 'balanced' approach to the college sexual assault crisis involves placing equal blame on rapists and their victims, if both of them were drinking alcohol."
What the hell are you talking about, Culp-Ressler?
Culp-Ressler can't respond to Taranto's piece, so she rewrites it. She twists and pounds it beyond recognition. She holds it up to a funhouse mirror. I haven't seen so much straw man since Dorothy met Ray Bolger on the yellow brick road.
Culp-Ressler has deigned to label the participants "rapist" and "victim" based solely on their genders and nothing more. In Taranto's scenario, that's the only thing that differentiates them — their genders. Is this what feminism is — a man and a woman engage in precisely the same conduct, and one party is is a felon, and the other is a victim, based solely on their genders?
Shades of Milton Academy. Remember that? Teen boys and a girl all commit what could be construed as statutory rape — but only the boys were charged. The boys were forced to mouth humiliating apologies to the girl and her family in open court. The brilliant Prof. Alan M. Dershowitz said this: "The idea that these youngsters should be branded rapists and the girl should be labeled a victim is preposterous," he said.
And they actually wonder why so few people — including so few women — identify as feminist? It is pieces like Culp-Ressler's that engender disrepute of this tired movement.

Editorial note: This article is reprinted from COTWA (Community of the Wrongly Accused). COTWA is a valuable resource for anyone facing false accusations of rape and is devoted to equal justice under law.–DD

Slavery 101 – dating as taught to girls

Diana Davison · 12 February 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Women are groomed to enslave men. This is no secret.
They openly, unabashedly, share their tips on how to capture and keep men as their possessions, and some writers make a good living by sharing their advice on how to be a good slave owner. Women's magazines are filled with articles telling them how to get and keep a man and women read these articles enthusiastically because they want to learn all the tricks.
Sherry Argov is a New York Times bestselling author. Her books, Why men love bitches and Why men marry bitches use humour but the message is clear. "Men control the world, but women control the men."
Having control in a relationship manifests in many ways but attempts at control are quite simple. Get the man you want, get him to marry you, make sure he doesn't leave or cheat on you. Those are the basics. What happens in the daily manifestations of that relationship merely depends on how good you are at slave owning.
Books aimed at teaching those three principles are a self-help market unto themselves which generates significant income for the authors. Quite often these enslavement techniques go awry and they result in a different sort of book.
Feminists wish to tell us that men are toxic, abusive, and dangerous to women. Radical feminist lawyers wish to tell us that battered women get stuck in toxic relationships because they are vulnerable to male power. Dr. Lilian Glass, while still blaming men for being toxic, finally hints a bit of the truth behind the problem.

> Dr. Glass says women become "toxic men magnets" when they convince themselves they can tame "bad boys" – that's the ego talking, she says. Others quietly believe their love is like no other – that's naiveté. Others still are addicted to drama, mistaking intensity for love.

The problem is not the men, it's that women want to own them.
While Glass acknowledges that so-called toxic men can be completely non-toxic in other relationships, she doesn't quite make the leap to switching who the victim in the relationship might have been. Given the advances in psychology, she feels that women "can do a lot more now than walk away – you have options. Sometimes a bully needs to be bullied." Slaves are, after all, an investment. If you can tame your slave it's better than trading him in.
In case you wonder if the word "slave" is hyperbolic, Sherry Argov clears that up.

> That's the big picture, your happiness. And health. You should never care what a man thinks of you — until he demonstrates to you that he cares about making you happy. If he isn't trying to make you happy, then send him back from "whence" he came because winning him over will have no benefit. At the end of the day, happines, joy…and yes…your emotional stability…those comprise the only measuring stick you really need to have.

A good slave does more than just care though, he is a laborer. They work for you. If they're a good slave they do it without question or lip, they don't try to escape and, ideally, adopt a Stockholm syndrome response. Argov outlines the value of attaining this state of submission.

> With a woman he's crazy about, he'll put in all the overtime in the world. He'll be doing things for you, he'll be considerate, he'll want to please you, he'll try to cheer you up if you are down, and he will enjoy every moment because you are the person he values most.

So the question that we need to ask of women is: why do they want a slave?

One is too many – hypocrisy laid bare

AVfM Video Source · 12 February 2014 · Archived copy · Original

How is it we're pretty certain the average person watching this won't even get it and will stay something like "what's the point?" It's a sad, sad, sad, sad, sad world.

Subscribe to MrShadowfax for more great stuff.

Social Science in 60 Seconds

AVfM Video Source · 12 February 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Anyone who quotes Simone De Beauvoir as a serious expert on anything but solipsism ought to be laughed at. Sparky Fister is up to the task!

You should check out his other videos.

MRE DDOS'd THA FEMBOTZ, BITCHEZ!

Eric Duckman · 13 February 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Paranoid pseudo-skeptic PZ Myers, sycophant to feminist ideologues everywhere, hypothesizes that just because some sites like his own FreeFromThought Blogs, NotVerySkepChick, and others experienced a DDOS attack, it was not random hackers. Nor could it be the case that most high-traffic web sites (including this one) eventually experience some sort of hacker attempt at vandalism. No, it must have been those dastardly Men's Rights Activists whom he refuses to even engage in intellectually honest dialogue with because we're pure concentrated evil.
Well as it turns out he's partially right. The Patriarchy did it. In fact, as leader of The Patriarchy, I did it myself, and say so right here!

I would tell you to Subscribe to Men's Rights Edmonton, however, I should not have to tell you that, as a servant of The Patriarchy you will do so or be destroyed.

Should men boycott Valentine's Day?

AVfM Video Source · 13 February 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Marc Rudov explains that men spend twice as much money on women on Valentines Day than women on men, and that men should boycott such a one-sided ritual. Here he debates the case with feminist Tanya Acker who claims that Valentine's Day is a necessary way for men to demonstrate chivalry toward women.

In case you were wondering: we're on Marc Rudov's side.

Woody Allen and the Court of Public Opinion

Janet Bloomfield (aka JudgyBitch) · 13 February 2014 · Archived copy · Original [image]Let me say straight up that Woody Allen revolts me. He seems, to me, like a repulsive little toad of a man. Though it's not his littleness that offends me; it's the whole snivelling, ingratiating pseudo-intellectual package. If it came down to me and Woody Allen as the last two people on earth, humanity would be over.

And do you know what all of that is evidence of?

Nothing.

My feelings about Woody Allen and his epic un-fuckability (in my eyes) are not evidence of anything. The most common word to describe the feeling Woody evokes is "creepiness. " I know that is a word used to shame men who haven't done anything wrong, but in this case, all it describes are my feelings: he's a man I find the thought of fucking revolting. Sexual attention from him would disgust me.

I think a lot of women are as viscerally disgusted by Woody Allen as I am, but rather than understand that their feelings are their feelings, feelings that are their problem not Woody Allen's, they are using those feelings to convict Woody Allen of child molestation in the courts of public opinion.

Nuh-uh. Your feelings haven't got anything to do with it, cupcake. They're your problem not anyone else's.

Now, this case is complicated by several factors independent of anyone's "feelz." Let's take them one at a time.

Woody Allen married one of his previous lover's children:

Soon-Yi Previn. Previn. Not Soon-Yi Allen. Woody may have been in a long term relationship with Soon-Yi's mother Mia Farrow, but he was not her father. Soon-Yi says she never thought of him as her father. He was her mother's boyfriend and eventually became her husband.

That hits lots of women hard. The idea of being usurped not just by a much younger woman, but by your own daughter, carries a sharp barb. It stings. Getting tossed for a younger woman always stings. The fact that older men have sexual access to younger women is something that pisses off lots of women.

No fair! Men value beauty and youth and use their own assets of wealth and power to access that resource, and there is fuck all older women can do about it other than piss and moan. Well, older women can also try not to be nasty slovenly bitches, but that's asking a lot, isn't it?

The fact that Woody married Soon-Yi (a marriage that has lasted 15 years and counting) is not evidence of anything other than Woody apparently likes to live dangerously. Hell hath no fury like a woman scorned.

Dylan Farrow "remembers" being abused by Woody

I have no doubt that Dylan Farrow believes she was abused by Woody Allen but that doesn't make it true. False memories are very real and Dylan was so young at the time the abuse allegedly occurred she would have been particularly prone to incorporating those memories as fact.

This is precisely the reason we have courts of justice in the first place. The accusation carries such serious consequences that we must be completely unwilling to convict unless evidence beyond a reasonable doubt is presented. Dylan's case was investigated and prosecutors declined to pursue charges against Woody.

Does that make him innocent?

Er, yes. Yes it does. No one is guilty of a crime, any crime, until they have been convicted in a court of law full stop. The alternative is vigilante justice and kangaroo courts and those tend not to work out very well for anyone.

The question is not did Woody Allen molest Dylan Farrow? The question is has Woody Allen been convicted of abusing Dylan Farrow?

He has not. Dylan's accusation that Hollywood is lauding a child molester carries no weight because we do not give weight to feelings when it comes to crimes of this magnitude. Feelings are not relevant. Facts are.

Mia Farrow is a piece of work

So, at 24 years of age herself, Mia had an affair with a 40 year old musician that resulted in her becoming pregnant, Andre Previn's marriage ending and Andre's wife Dory ending up on a psych ward getting electroshock therapy. Dory even wrote a famous song about it. Oh, and did I mention that 19 year old Mia Farrow had married 50+ year old Frank Sinatra before she had that affair with Previn? Yeah, might want to mention that while you're pillorying

Woody and Soon-Yi for a similar choice.
Yeah, sure, Mia. Tell us how offended you are by younger women doing a bit of husband-stealing.
Her Valentine's Day card to Woody in 1992 is charming too, no?
And letting Woody know through the media that she fucked her ex-Frank Sinatra while he was with her, and their son Ronan just might be Frank's baby not Woody's after all, is super classy.
Mia Farrow also testified on behalf Roman Polanski who pled guilty to having sex with a 13 year old girl he'd given drugs to. But somehow that one was okay. Mia had nothing to say about Polanski taking home the Oscar for The Pianist.
This all smacks of sour grapes to me. Mia can't stand the fact the that Woody has gone on to lead a happy and productive life without her.
Our favorite little feminist harpy Amanda Marcotte would like to see a new preponderance of evidence standard applied to men like Woody Allen. Why? Because sleazy assholes make her feel feelings that are bad feelings and that is unacceptable. Because feels.

> More to the point, it's worth saying to yourself that if a guy that creeps people out and is known for crossing boundaries that often is accused of rape—or if a guy who is a sleazy asshole who emotionally abuses his girlfriend/wife in front of others and who she seems to be scared of is accused of hitting her—it really, truly is okay to cut the strings and let him go and offer your support to the accuser instead. Doing so isn't taking away his freedom.

In other words, consult your feelings and convict away. Shun that guy. He's creepy! Always believe the victim. Tell her you support her unconditionally and there is no need for irritating little things like evidence for convictions except feels.
There, there, sweetie pie. Did that bad man hurt you? We'll ruin his life and make it all better for you.
Gee. What could possibly go wrong?
Ultimately, I don't know if Woody Allen is a child molester. What I do know is the fact that he repulses me physically, married a younger woman and behaves in a way that I "feel" is "creepy" is not evidence of anything other than my own personal feelings.
Feelings are not evidence.
I refuse to see Woody Allen films because I find him a snivelling asshat who is not the slightest bit charming or appealing to me. I don't like him.
By some miracle, I am able to live in a world with men I don't want to fuck without declaring them guilty of some crime. I can be repulsed by Woody and still be capable of some objectivity when it comes to deciding if he is guilty of a heinous crime. I can find him stupid and annoying and be insulted by his preference for younger women and still consider him innocent until proven guilty.
Because ultimately, I am not owed a world filled with hot men who conform to my personal ideas about charm and wit and appeal.
It is not a crime for a man to not appeal to me.
And until Woody Allen is convicted in a court of law, I will not call him a child molester.
I will however call him an ugly skinny irritating little motherfucker.
Because he is.
And that's not a crime.
Lots of love,
JB

Editorial note: Image of Soon-Yi Previn and Woody Allen used under Creative Commons "Share and Share Alike" licence, as noted here. –DE

Quick divorce, easy money – It's not about "equality"

Robert St. Estephe · 14 February 2014 · Archived copy · Original

As regular readers of A Voice for Men know already, it was in the mid-1920s that "the scam hit the fan," so to speak, with regard to what in that was universally known as "the alimony racket." It was the era when the first formally established anti-alimony organizations came into being, headed by such proto-MHRAs as Dr. Vernon P. Cooley and wife Bessie Cooley in Chicago ("Alimony Club of Illinois," founded 1927) and Robert Gilbert Ecob (Alimony Payers Protective Association," founded 1927). The battles to eliminate alimony racketeering — the predatory exploitation of the institution on the part of petitioners and lawyers, as opposed to legitimate, justified, alimony — still rage to this very day. We might be tempted, at this moment, to coin the phrase "90 years war" to describe these unabated long-term hostilities, however, such an idea would be impractical, as that numeral would necessarily have to be continuously updated, since war's end is nowhere in sight).

Of particular interest to many readers will be the expression of sympathy in the following texts — by women, it will be noted — towards an attitude which today can be seen in the MGTOW (Men Going Their Own Way) movement, and which has been recently brought to the attention of the wider public in book form with Dr. Helen's Smith's book, Men On Strike.

Isn't it amazing how facts (such as those documented here) can so quickly undermine the polemics we are so used to being bombarded with — polemics that employ vague abstract notions as "equality" and "patriarchy?" A fairly small dose of plain truth can lead us close to a genuine and relevant understanding of lived reality (as opposed to abstract ideology), and lead us on further to learn to spot just how much we have been lied to by our teachers and other purveyors of distorted, censored, "politically correct" history? Spotting the lies of "herstory" is one of the fundamental prerequisites to discovering the path away from feminist governance and the aggregated authoritarian institutions that prop that grotesque creature up and keep it supported, like a lifeless limestone gargoyle, high up on its pedestal.

***

[image]

FULL TEXT: Jefferson City, Mo. – Missouri's lone woman legislator has offered a bill for the "relief of alimony-ridden" men, or those in danger of being classed in that state.

Mrs. Gladys B. Stewart, Republican member from Douglas-co and a former assistant district attorney, has sponsored a measure which she believes will tend to curb "alimony grabbing tendencies" of some members of her sex.

If enacted, Mrs. Stewart's bill would prohibit the granting of alimony unless the marriage had existed more than five years, unless children of the divorced couple are living, or unless the wife has become physically disabled since her marriage.

Under the present Missouri divorce laws, trial judges may allow alimony with few restrictions.

~ SEEN AS DIVORCE CURB ~

Mrs. Stewart believes her proposal would reduce the number of divorces and make wives think twice before rushing to an attorney to file divorce proceedings.

"I feel that something should be done to discourage divorces," she said, "and I know of nothing which would tend to slow down marriage dissolutions so much as curtailment of alimony.

Opponents of the bill, however insist her proposal would have the opposite effect on freedom-seeking husbands. Men who have been married less than five years and have no children would take ad vantage of the law to sever marital bonds, knowing they would be free from paying alimony, according to male adversaries of the measure.

Many lawyer members of the legislature are outspoken in their attempts to defeat the bill.

~ DOUBT SENATE PASSAGE ~

Legislators believe the bill may have some chance to pass the house, but doubt that it will survive the lawyer-controlled senate.

Mrs. Stewart, holding no chivalrous ideas of male deference for any of her bills, thinks, however the men at least should be grateful that a woman member sponsored a bill “definitely drawn for the relief of men.”

“At least they can’t say that a women are interested in seeking alimony,” she said, “and I thin the men should be grateful that woman saw fit to sponsor such a bill.”
Mrs. Stewart, mother of one son, served as a special circuit judge and is the only woman Missouri to sit on the bench. She is the only woman member of the State Council.
[James E. Helbert, “Bill Designed To Protect Men In Missouri Causes Furor Lone Female Legislator Payment Banned Unless Couple Had Been Married Five Years,” syndicated (UP), The Lima News (Oh.), Mar. 18, 1937, p. 10]
[Photo source: “Woman Legislator,” Jefferson City Post-Tribune (Mo.), Jan. 8, 1937, p. 4]
***

[image]
FULL TEXT: Those weepers who like to say, “It’s the woman who pays!” every time the subject of marriage for women, careers for women or life for women comes up, forget one little item of our present way of living – alimony.
When two people who have honestly tried to make their marriage successful find at last that it is impossible to do so, and divorce seems their only way out, it is only just and logical that the husband make some provision for the maintenance and future of the wife and children, if any.
But what there is about marriage that justifies the divorced woman in her demands for alimony is yet to be proved – although the alimony racket is made more legal by the courts every day, in their awards.
* * *
A Missouri woman legislator has just put this question on the public records by filing a bill for the “relief of alimony-ridden” men, and those likely to become such. The plan formulated by Mrs. Gladys B. Stewart would prohibit the granting of alimony unless the marriage had existed more than five years, unless children of the divorced couple were living, or unless the wife had become physically disabled since her marriage.
The fact that the subject is going to be aired in legislative chambers is at least encouraging, for alimony has been showing all the earmarks of a big-time racket, and has helped to develop cynicism toward marriage beyond the point at which it makes for levelheadedness.
* * *
In the recent notorious Elaine Barrie-John Barrymore case, Miss Barrie filed suit for alimony amounting to more than $2000 a month, although she had remained married to Mr. Barrymore for scarcely more than two months. Even if those two months did seem like years, or whatever the reasoning was, that’s a high interest rate to ask! (The suit was later withdrawn, but is cited here because it was so well known and so sadly typical.)
Women who marry that they may divorce for money are high-class chiselers who have so far got off scot-free. It’s an old con game with streamline trimmings, and even if the men are dumb enough to fall for it, the women are still responsible for it as they who put over the idealistic and romanticized picture of womanhood which still makes a man believe that the little woman really does want a vine-covered cottage when she says, “Yes.”
It’s all too easy these days for a woman to reason along these lines when she is momentarily bored or angry, “Why should I go on putting up with this guy? A divorce, with alimony to take care of the money problem, and I can live my own life as I please.”
* * *
Far from being confined to the already married, this easy come, easy go attitude has become the philosophy of many about-to-be-marrieds. It results in a “Why not try being married, anyhow? There’s always the divorce court” principle. A marriage must survive upsets of every kind, and it is not going to if the “Off to Reno!” slogan winds up the first quarrel.
Men can hardly be blamed for shying away from the mere mention of marriage, when it has brought many of their pals nothing but the obligation to pay off a slice of alimony every months. Young people can’t be blamed for their skepticism toward the idea of marriage and a home, when they can see by the papers that a high percentage of marriages hardly outlast the second installment on the furniture.

As long as the home remains the working basis of our society – and no satisfactory substitute has yet been found – it surely deserves some workable protection from such ills as the alimony racket.
[Maxine Garrison, “Blame The Alimony Racket For Marriage Fear In Men – Too Many Girls Enter Matrimony With An Attitude Of “Quick Divorce, Easy Money’,” The Pittsburgh Press (Pa.), Apr. 8, 1937, p. 30]
***

The Art of Differentiation: Woody Allen, Bill Clinton, Richard Nixon, Roman Polanski, & others

Philip W. Cook · 14 February 2014 · Archived copy · Original

> Great minds discuss ideas. Average minds discuss events. Small minds discuss people. — Eleanor Roosevelt

[image]
Composer Richard Wagner

Stephen Fry is the grandson of British Jewish immigrants, who made a documentary for the BBC on his life-long passion for Wagner, the composer whose music is most closely associated with Nazism. Fry had relatives who died at Auschwitz. "Imagine a great beautiful silk tapestry of infinite colour and complexity that has been stained indelibly. It's still a beautiful tapestry of miraculous workmanship, but that stain is real, and I'm afraid Hitler and Nazism have stained Wagner. For some people that stain ruins the whole work; for others, it's just something you have to face up to."

By nearly all accounts from fellow players and those who knew him, baseball's Ty Cobb was a mean, nasty individual–but sports aficionado's still count him as one of the greatest players in history.

Liberals point to Watergate and the crudeness of oval office diatribes, but tend to ignore the fact that Richard Nixon was a key advocate for the environment. Acting against Republican business interests, his administration championed the Clean Water and Clean Air Acts and created the Environmental Protection Agency. Conservatives may point to President Bill Clinton's sexual dalliance with an intern and tend to ignore his championing of welfare reform against the wishes of many members of his own party and his record of being the only president in modern times that actually reduced the size of the federal workforce.

Movie director Roman Polanski, who directed the Jack Nicholson classic film Chinatown, was arrested in 1977 for the statutory rape of 13-year-old girl and plead guilty. To avoid sentencing he fled the U.S. and has never returned. In 2002, Polanski won the best director Oscar for The Pianist.

[image]
Actor Philip Seymour Hoffman

This brings us to the more recent news involving Woody Allen and Philip Seymour Hoffman.

Hoffman was one of the best actors of his generation; his performances in films such as Capote and Charlie Wilson's War were remarkable accomplishments for an actor who did not fit the more typical Hollywood "pretty boy" image. He was also a heroin junkie whose overdose death would not likely make the local news, let alone generate national news or comment, were it not for his fame and talent. If there is anything to be gained from this sad news is that it may bring more attention to the costs of substance abuse within personal lives and put a greater spotlight on public and philanthropic efforts to combat it.

Woody Allen's case is more complicated and deserves special attention. Not just because of who the acclaimed film director and screenwriter is, but of what we must consider in such cases. As most know, Dylan Farrow penned an open letter revealing details of the sexual abuse she claims happened 20 years ago at the hands of her adopted father. One of her brothers has different view. Moses Farrow told People Magazine, "Of course Woody did not molest my sister." In fact, he claims that Allen's then-girlfriend Mia Farrow was abusive:"My mother drummed it into me to hate my father for tearing apart the family and sexually molesting my sister. And I hated him for her for years. I see now that this was a vengeful way to pay him back for falling in love with Soon-Yi."

Washington state residents might be more particularly mindful about the veracity of such charges given the Wenatchee witch hunt of 1994 and 1995 In which forty-three adults were arrested on 29,726 charges of child sex abuse, involving 60 children; Child Protective Services removed some fifty children from accused parents and relocated them in foster homes. Eventually, all those who were convicted were either freed by higher courts had their convictions overturned or pled guilty on lesser, usually unrelated, charges in exchange for the prosecution dropping the charges of sexual abuse. Five served their full sentences before their cases were overturned.

In the same state, in February of 2013, former Vancouver police officer Ray Spencer was awarded nine million dollars by a Tacoma jury for wrongful prosecution. Spencer spent a decade in prison after being sentenced to two life prison terms plus 14 years. Investigators found that prosecutors had withheld medical exams showing that there was no physical evidence of abuse, even though the child's mother contended they had been repeatedly raped.
In this case, it is worth noting that Spencer's natural children eventually testified in they were never molested or raped by their father, to this day, his step-son has refused to recant and contends that he was molested.
"Believing the victim" is sometimes the best policy, sometimes it is not. My own analysis of cleared and exonerated cases (those falsely convicted and ultimately released) in my book When Women Sexually Abuse Men (Cook/Hodo, Praeger 2103) finds that 21% of the total were in cases of child or adult rape or sexual abuse cases.
The Canadian Incidence Study of Reported Child Abuse and Neglect analyzed data from 7,672 child maltreatment investigations. Among the 798 cases of alleged sexual abuse, only 38 percent were substantiated. Most professionals believe that the proportion of false allegations of child sexual abuse is highest in divorce and custody disputes. Writing in the journal "Forensics" the authors report that out of five hundred divorce and custody cases, "For three-fourths there was no determination of abuse by the legal system. That is, charges were dropped or never filed or the person was acquitted in criminal court, or there was no finding of abuse in family court. Dwyer (1986) reports similar statistics. She states that 77% of the divorce-linked allegations of sex abuse cases coming to the Human Sexuality Program at the University of Minnesota have turned out to be hoax cases. This was based upon the opinion reached by the agency staff that the allegations were not accurate."
Samuel R. Gross in a research paper for the University Of Michigan School Of Law found that the false rape conviction rate in which physical evidence was examined by the Virginia Department of Forensic Science from 1973 through 1987 found an innocent rate of least 3.2 to five percent, and "almost certainly quite a few more." A major study in a Midwestern city over the course of nine years reported in the "Archives of Sexual Behavior" found 41 percent of all rape claims were false. Gross also reports that an analysis of police records at two large state universities found 50 percent of the rapes reported to campus police were determined to be false. As reported in "Forensic Science" by researcher Charles McDowell an Air Force study evaluated 556 rape allegations, and concluded that 60 percent were false. Somewhat unusually, the Air Force study attempted to determine the reasons behind why such accusations were made. From most frequent to least frequent they were: Spite or Revenge; To compensate for feelings of guilt or shame; Thought she might be pregnant; To conceal an affair; To test husband's love; Mental/emotional disorder; To avoid personal responsibility; Failure to pay, or extortion; Thought she might have caught VD.
Speaking of all types of wrongful convictions or accusations, Gross adds: "If as few as 1/10 of 1% of jetliners crashed on takeoff, we would shut down every airline in the country. That is not a risk we are prepared to take – and we believe we know how to address that sort of problem. Are 10,000 to perhaps 50,000 wrongfully imprisoned citizens too many? Can we do better? How? There are no obvious answers. The good news is that the great majority of convicted criminal defendants in America are guilty. The bad news is that a substantial number are not."
A remembrance of details by a child of sexual assault is not by itself prima fasciae evidence that the assault did in fact occur. It may or may not be true. An adult later giving what appear to be details of a child sexual assault seems compelling and may in fact be true, but it may also be false. Tried in the media or via the internet when a police investigation resulted in no charges as in the Woody Allen case, should give us some cause for doubt. This is particular true when the evidence suggests that in a bitter custody and divorce cases such charges are more likely to be made.
With the Woody Allen case particularly in mind but relating to all of the people mentioned here, I applaud the ability of those who make a conscious choice to separate art from the personal life of the artist-whoever they may be. For those who cannot do so, I respect that as well. Is there some repugnance associated with say enjoying "Chinatown" as a great movie or "Annie Hall" or if I were an opera fan attending a concert of music by Wagner? Yes.
[image]

Woody Allen & his Jazz Band

Would I choose to never again watch a Woody Allen movie or one by Polanski? Or even a movie made by a junkie like Hoffman? No. There is an art to differentiation. I believe we should celebrate it. We should also keep our skepticism level high while at the same time when there is independent (the key there being independent) credible evidence of abuse whatever its form it should be dealt with in an evidentiary fashion and prosecution may be warranted under the legal system, even though that system also has its flaws.
We can feel repugnance for the private lives of artists, politicians, and sports players and there have always been plenty of examples to point to throughout history. Whether or not their work can still be appreciated despite this, is a judgment that each individual must make for themselves. As for the lasting worth of their creations that must await the ultimate judgment of history itself.

—

Editor's note: In addition to being author and/or contributor to a number of respected books and peer-reviewed journals, Phil Cook has a great website where you can find good talks like this one. You may also want to check out the excellent discussion we had with him on Revelations with Erin Pizzey. –DE Article image used under Creative Commons Share and Share Alike license from Wikimedia Commons.

Paul Interviews with the New Republic

AVfM Video Source · 14 February 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Also see Karen Straughan's recent talk with them here. Also, if you goad Dean into it, he may post his interview here, too. PE

How the German legal system failed Horst Arnold

Jon Gunnarsson · 15 February 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Editor's note: This article is also available in Romanian.

Imagine you are accused of a terrible crime against a woman you didn't commit. One of your co-workers claims you raped her. And not just any rape, but a brutal anal rape that left her bleeding from her rectum. You are arrested by the police and questioned. You are put on trial where your accuser produces not a single shred of evidence. Rape kit? DNA evidence? Examination of physical injuries? No, none of that. Not even any bloodstains on the supposed victim's clothing. She claims she burned her bloody underwear because she was so ashamed of what had happened. The trial doesn't last long. It's your word against hers. She's seems like a charming woman who could never make up a horrible story like that. The judge believes her.

You are sentenced to five years in prison. Most people don't have to serve their entire sentence. They are released earlier for good behaviour. But a requirement for that is to show remorse for what you did. You don't feel remorse. You aren't guilty and you cannot regret what you didn't do. You could fake a confession to get out earlier, but you know you are not a rapist. You insist on your innocence. After the full five years, you are finally released. But much more than just five years of your life have been stolen from you. You've lost your partner, your friends, your job. Only your family still believes in you. You send out hundreds of applications for new jobs, but no one is willing to hire a convicted rapist. You're in your late forties and you have two children of your own, but you have to move back in with your parents. The world has betrayed you and you become depressed.

The first timid ray of light comes when a lawyer offers to take up your case pro bono. He discovers that your accuser has a long history of outrageous lying and he gets the case to be retried. You are finally declared innocent, but the damage has already been done. You try to get your old job back, but you are delayed by bureaucratic hurdles. No one is willing to make an exception for you, despite everything you went through. They haven't even started paying you the reparations you are owed for your wrongful imprisonment. A year later, you suffer a heart-attack and die at age 53.

***

This is the story of Horst Arnold's life. He was a school teacher until his life was ruined by his co-worker Heidi Külzer. He went to jail from 2001 to 2006 and was finally exonerated in July of 2011. He died on June 29th 2012. He didn't live to see his false accuser get sentenced to five years and six months in jail. The only piece of good news in this tragedy is that for once, a false accuser got the punishment she deserved instead of merely a slap on the wrist as happens all too often.

But this doesn't help Horst Arnold, nor would it help him if he were still alive. Revenge is a poor substitute for justice and the injustice that was committed against Mr Arnold can never be righted. The closest we could have come is monetary compensation. Since Mr Arnold is dead, the next best thing would be for the compensation to go to his children.

To this end, Arnold's daughter sued Külzer. The regional court in Darmstadt found Külzer guilty and awarded €80,000 in damages.[1] However, Külzer appealed the verdict and Arnold's daughter has now dropped the case.[2] Her exact reasons are unclear. A plausible explanation is that she does not believe it likely that Külzer will actually be able to pay. In that case, the daughter would have to pay the legal fees out of her own pocket without getting anything in return. Heidi Külzer on the other hand doesn't have to pay any legal fees. Her lawyer is provided at taxpayer expense, so she doesn't mind dragging out this legal battle for as long as possible.

This is a central flaw in the German legal system, as in most modern legal systems. Because there are so many laws and navigating the system is so complicated, law suits frequently get dragged out for years and cost obscene amounts of money. As a result, all too often justice is something only the wealthy can afford—or those who are supported by the state and can off-load their legal costs onto the unwilling shoulders of taxpayers. For an ordinary person like Horst Arnold's daughter, justice is out of reach.

But this flaw pales compared to what happened in the original rape case. In all the justified outrage over Heidi Külzer, it is easy to forget the other villains in this piece: the prosecutors, and most importantly Dr Christoph Trapp, the judge responsible for the case.[3] Without their gross incompetence, laziness, or malice, Arnold would never have been convicted. There are always going to be insane psychopaths like Heidi Külzer who try to ruin an innocent man's life for no good reason. It is the duty of the legal system to stop this from happening. It failed to live up to this responsibility in spectacular fashion.

From the start, Külzer's story should have given anyone pause. [4] She claims that the rape took place during recess in a well-lit biology classroom with open windows. Anyone passing by could have seen the supposed crime happen, anyone could have come into the room. Supposedly, Arnold pressed up behind her, held her mouth closed with his left hand and used the right hand to take off his trousers and pull aside her skirt and then anally raped her while she lay across a counter. This course of events is quite implausible. According to Horst Plefka, detective chief superintendent in charge of the case, anal rapes are rare and when they do happen, the victims are defenceless, tied down, or drugged. Immediately following this supposed traumatic event, Külzer taught a class without showing any signs of distress or injury.

Detective Plefka searched long and hard for evidence to corroborate Külzer's story. He found none. All he found were contradictions in Külzer's account. For example, she claimed that Horst Arnold threatened her days after the rape had allegedly occurred—at a time when Arnold was already in custody. Research into Külzer's background would have revealed her to be a compulsive liar. She invented the most far-fetched stories. A few years earlier, she had told her then-husband that she had a fatal illness and would die soon. She claimed that her co-workers at one school had tried to poison her. Her marriages never lasted long and she never stayed long at a school. Eventually people always began to sniff out her bullshit, and then it was time for her to move on. But the police didn't research her background. It would have been rude and improper to impose that on a "victim" of rape. Still, Detective Plefka had grave doubts about Külzer's story. However, he was not allowed to appear in court to testify in favour of Arnold.

In the absence of evidence, the persecution rested entirely on character and prejudice. Horst Arnold was a big man with a loud and boisterous attitude. He was known to have a drinking problem. He was the sort of person who one could plausibly think of as a rapist. Heidi Külzer appeared to be charming and innocent: the perfect victim. She didn't look like someone who would invent an outrageous story like this. And if her account of events occasionally contradicted itself, this was only seen as a normal reaction to the trauma she had undergone. After all, as feminists like to remind us, women don't lie about rape.

Christoph Trapp presided over this travesty.[5] He decided that Horst Arnold was guilty, based on nothing but the alleged victim's incoherent account and his own worthless intuition. In his unbridled arrogance, Trapp even now claims that he acted rightly and made no mistake in sentencing Arnold to five years in jail. "Our judgement back then had been carefully reviewed." When there is any reasonable doubt, a criminal court is supposed to rule in favour of the accused. Trapp must have forgot this elementary principle.

Judges are only human and they do make mistakes. That is to be expected. But this is more than a simple mistake. Christoph Trapp ruined an innocent man's life, based on nothing more than a hunch. For this crime, he will never have to spend a single day jail. Nor will he have to pay any damages. Horst Arnold's daughter should have also sued Trapp, though of course she didn't. That would be a hopeless prospect. Trapp is part of the legal system and protected by it. He won't even lose his job over this.

This is the real tragedy in all this. Because Horst Arnold's case is unique only in how much media attention it received. For every Horst Arnold, who knows how many innocent people are in jail who are never exonerated? Many of them are men falsely convicted of rape. Rape is the most problematic crime in this respect because it is very difficult to prove. The only difference between regular sex and rape is consent. Even rough sex leading to injuries may have been consensual. Compare that to a crime like murder: "He wanted me to stab him in the gut!" is not a very convincing defence. Moreover, due to the private nature of sex, there usually aren't any witnesses or recordings. This makes it much more difficult to prove rape in court. Given the usual standard of in dubio pro reo ("when in doubt, for the accused"), many rapists would get off scot-free. Under the influence of feminist lobbyists, this principle has been undermined for rape cases and many judges are now willing to convict based on less conclusive evidence—or as in the present case, based on just a hunch. And while it is good that this has led to more rapists being convicted, the unacceptable side-effect is that many innocent men have been caught in the crossfire. When offered to have their sentence reduced by one third for “admitting” their guilt and showing remorse, how many innocent people lie? Once an innocent man has taken that road, he will forever be marked guilty. And even for those who stick to their guns and refuse this offer, the hurdles to get an old case re-opened are high. Most cases are not nearly as clear-cut as Arnold’s. And in those rare cases where a false verdict is overturned, the judge responsible still has to suffer no consequences. This is a system that cannot possibly work. It is guaranteed to lead to abuse. Holding judges personally responsible for such glaring errors would not eliminate the problem altogether, but would at least ameliorate it. Judges would have to be more careful before throwing a man in jail. Unfortunately, this is wishful thinking. In the foreseeable future, there is no chance to get any sort of legal accountability for judges. The best we can hope for is harsher punishments for false accusers. In this case, Heidi Külzer was convicted to a prison sentence because her false testimony lead to Arnold’s imprisonment. If her story had been discovered from the start to be a lie, most likely she would have gotten off with just a warning or a slap on the wrist. This needs to change. If we want to stop cases like Horst Arnold’s in the future, we need to start treating false accusations as the serious crimes they are.

References

[1]http://www.spiegel.de/panorama/justiz/erfundene-vergewaltigung-einspruch-gegen-schmerzensgeldurteil-a-929330.html
[2]http://www.spiegel.de/panorama/justiz/erfundene-vergewaltigung-heidi-k-muss-kein-schadensersatz-zahlen-a-951726.html
[3]http://www.odenwald-geschichten.de/?p=2192
[4]http://www.faz.net/aktuell/gesellschaft/kriminalitaet/freispruch-nach-fuenf-jahren-haft-wie-konnte-es-zu-diesem-fehlurteil-kommen-11108682.html
[5]http://falschbeschuldigung.org/Christoph_Trapp

Being a man

Mike Buchanan · 15 February 2014 · Archived copy · Original

The inaugural Being A Man Festival was held in London two weeks ago.
It was an event primarily focusing on how men should change so they could better serve women's wants and needs – 'redefining masculinity', that kind of thing. A recurring theme of narratives around 'redefining masculinity' is that men must become more like women, in order that women can become more like men. There's never any recognition in these narratives that the majority of people are gender-typical, for example that many working women would prefer to be at home looking after their children, rather than working to raise the money to pay strangers to look after them. In the UK the tax system militates against women making the choice they'd prefer.
The founder of The White Ribbon Campaign was a keynote speaker at the Festival. The campaign's strapline is, 'Men working to end violence against women'. No mention in the Festival programme of men as victims of violence at the hands of women, needless to say. No mention of the many other problems men and boys face today, and what might be done about them.
The event was predictably lauded by the left-leaning press. A piece in the Guardian had the following to say:

> The festival is – obviously – the idea of a woman, Jude Kelly, artistic director at the Southbank Centre. Her mission, she suggested, was in part age-old female wisdom: that men need reminding that it might be a good thing to share their anxieties. Or, as she put it, to provide the space "for an overhaul of masculinity" and an "opportunity for men to go naked" – prompting a proportion of her male audience to cross their legs.

The end of the article:

> All movements need a manifesto, and it took Grayson Perry in one of his Bo-Peepiest pink party dresses to provide one. Few men have done as much original thinking about what it means to be male as the transvestite potter, champion cyclist, therapy survivor, Turner prizewinner, devoted husband and father.
> Grayson insisted that all we believed about men could be unbelieved – men can, despite the propaganda, multitask ("I never go upstairs without carrying something") – and they can prevail in the constant battle with testosterone and keep it in their pants (frilly or otherwise), if they put their minds to it.
> He ended with a scribbled series of demands. "We men ask ourselves and each other for the following: the right to be vulnerable, to be uncertain, to be wrong, to be intuitive, the right not to know, to be flexible and not to be ashamed." He insisted that men sit down to achieve them. He received, deservedly, a standing ovation.

I'd sooner gnaw off a hand without the benefit of anaesthetic than attend such an awful event, so I was pleased to read a letter in yesterday's Daily Mail. It was penned by an intelligent man, Andy Dumas, and takes up the remainder of this post:
"Attending the much talked about Being A Man Festival at London's South Bank, I discovered that most of the organised discussions about modern masculinity assumed that 90 per cent of males spend 90 per cent of their time watching hard-core porn online.
Manliness as a topic was shunted aside in favour of a feminist agenda which catered only for grievances against the Great White Male.
One focus group, advertised as a discussion of the challenges facing black male professionals, digressed immediately into a predictable, hackneyed, ideological attack on culturally-embedded racism.
I admit superficial multicultural policies have failed to eliminate institutional racism, but I read all about that at university, long ago. What I wanted was an insight into the psyche of a black man operating in this pseudo-equality environment.
A panel discussing male sexuality, promiscuity and fidelity, soon drifted into a bland discussion about the evils of pornography and Britain's uninspired sex education curriculum. Might there not have been more intellectual usefulness in exploring how men express their masculinity in the context of increased gender equality?

The final session of the day focused on ‘ordinary blokes’ – such as plumbers. Plumbers were referred to several times by the distinctly unblokey panellists to describe the archetypal ‘bloke’. But each struggled to describe how he had experienced the blokeyness so typical of plumbers.
The day descended into farce when the festival organiser, a woman, mounted the stage to screech about the evils of white male dominance, finishing by reading A Man’s Bill of Rights which was so neurotic it could only have been written by a girl. Smirk. But I was wrong! It had been penned by Grayson Perry. Smirk. It included, among other stupidity, ‘the right to be wrong’. What self-respecting man, black, white or brown, straight, gay or transgender, would sign up to that?
On balance, this show was intellectually vapid, politically cloistered and a waste of £12. I blame Jon Snow. I went only because he did. Next year I’ll take my £12 to the pub and watch the footy with the plumbers.”

Spetsnaz on the Psychology of Walter White

AVfM Video Source · 15 February 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Breaking Bad fans, and MHRAs will appreciate this one. PE

Lectured by a Mumbai Feminist

Amit Deshpande · 16 February 2014 · Archived copy · Original

It was through the mail that I received notification about a prestigious event, the 21st Smt. Bansari Sheth endowment lecture to be delivered by the famous feminist, Flavia Agnes from Mumbai.

This was the invite:

The Asiatic Society of Mumbai takes pleasure in inviting you and your friends to the 21st Smt. Bansari Sheth Endowment Lecture by Flavia Agnes

Legal scholar and Director, Legal Centre of Majlis

on

'The making of a modern nation through the Hindu code bill:

The Nehruvian agenda'

on

Wednesday, 12th February, 2014, at 6.00 p.m.

in the Durbar Hall of the Society.

Dr. Kamala Ganesh

Former Professor of Sociology, University of Mumbai, will preside.

Needless to say, I was keen for the chance to interact with a feminist of her stature. I enquired with the Asiatic Society about the event, whether it was open to the general public as well as whether or not there would be a Q&A session – although I almost smiled at my naiveté in expecting feminists to debate their beliefs or even being allowed to question them. My comrade-in-arms Nurdy Dancing explains the shunning away of feminists from debate quite well here. The assurance from the Asiatic personnel wasn't comforting either, he was non-committal about the Q&A session saying there was no guarantee but urged me to take a chance for some interaction after the event.
The lecture began. There were a few lies, half-truths, and some damning contradictions within her speech. Flavia started talking about 'The Hindu Code Bill' that came into enforcement in 1955 and how the Hindu women were never given rights over property prior to this law, as compared to women from other religions. She mentioned that there were chapters dedicated to Women's rights in the Hindu law books like Manu's law, Yadnyavalkya's law, etc. Yet she also suggested women were not given rights before 1955 and it was only the Nehruvian agenda that gave respect to women. Now I'd like to see her point of view, but the question then is if the Hindus were not following any of their existing laws which had chapters dedicated for women, then what law were they following?
Next on her list was the formation of the 'Hindu Undivided Family' concept which gave tax exemptions to Hindu families living together as joint-family. She claimed the founding fathers of our nation had done this so that the Hindu Family System could be protected. Implying which, it would be aptly clear that the founding fathers of India wanted to keep the family system running since it formed the backbone of Hindu traditions.
She also, in her lecture. interestingly mentioned an aspect of laws, wherein if something is left out or not considered when the law was formed, then it has to be included keeping the original vision and spirit of the law that was formed. If this was to be practiced today then Flavia would be the first person to oppose the Marriage Laws Amendment Bill, 2014 that is being introduced in the Parliament of India.

The proposed amendment would include new grounds for divorce under a situation of Irretrievable Breakdown of Marriage by amending the Hindu Marriage Act and the Special Marriage Act. It is a property division law wherein: A wife can file a petition for Irretrievable Breakdown of Marriage and, upon citing grave financial hardship, can have a share in the husbands property – self earned both pre and post marriage, inherited property and also inheritable property – duration of the marriage be damned. A husband can also file a petition for Irretrievable Breakdown of Marriage and part with his property – self acquired and ancestral. But the catch is that a husband cannot oppose a petition filed by a wife, which defies any logic or common sense. Feminists have been supporting this law vehemently which has given rise to higher divorce rates, increased spousal murders, and decreases in the number of marriages wherever it has been introduced in the world. More details can be found on www.rollbackirbm.in Does such a law fit with the vision that the lawmakers had when they drafted the Hindu Code Bill?
About the half-truths: Flavia believes there has been a mockery of justice and abuse of laws at the hands of the judges of India who operate within an anti-woman ethos. She cited a few judgements which, according to her, were anti-women. One thing of note was that almost all of her lecture focused only on the rights of the wife. There have been innumerable women – mothers and sisters – implicated in false dowry harassment cases with one arrest being recorded every 3 minutes, but this problem was not visited at all.
As far as the approach of the judiciary is concerned, if the judiciary in India was really anti-woman, then:

- It would not have awarded child custody to mothers in 98% of the cases.
- It would not have had asked men to pay maintenance to their adulterous wives
- It would not have asked men to beg, borrow or steal to pay maintenance to their parasitic wives,

Heck no! It would not have entertained allowing a man sell his kidney to pay maintenance. Unfortunately for the feminists, all these have happened and numerous other judgements favouring women occur far more regularly.
Finally, it was time for the much hoped for Q&A session. A few members of the audience had raised hands and the presiding chairperson initially disallowed any queries but, looking at the large demand from the audience, decided to ask Flavia before closing the session if she was able to take some questions. Flavia refused! Was it fear? Was it living in denial? Was it guilt? Or was it a false sense of superiority?
